Thank you for supporting the work of A Voice for Men with your contribution! We have grown over the years into a robust organization producing both literature and activist missions aimed at helping men and boys. With that growth comes increased expense.

It is working, though. We are finally witnessing the narrative starting to change. You have just become a part of making that work.

With appreciation,

Paul Elam, Publisher, A Voice for Men.

HUMANIST COUNTER-THEORY

Men Made This

Theodore Labadie · 21 January 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I remember reading when I was younger a biography of the artist Jean Cocteau, how on his first plane trip he remarked how wonderful man was, enraptured by the technological marvel that was carrying him across the sky. Of course, by “man” he likely meant “humanity.” Years later I note how I have spent much of my time gazing on man’s works: his buildings, his art, his machinery. I can look at dock cranes or the engine of a vintage Bentley for hours. But unlike Cocteau, my awe is inspired in part because although I recognize the beauty of these things, I know that it is not man who is responsible, but men.

My favorite building is the Roman Pantheon. It contains the world’s largest unreinforced concrete dome which inscribes a perfect sphere 142 feet high. It has stood without collapsing for almost one thousand, nine hundred years. There is only one reason this building still stands aside from the engineering genius that built it: it’s indescribable beauty. As the barbarians sacked Rome they destroyed temples, villas, art. They burned it all or pulled it to the ground. But when they saw the Pantheon they were stopped dead in their tracks. They couldn’t bare to touch it. I recounted this tale to a younger man I knew, a rather self-conscious metrosexual who had actually seen and stood within the dome. He said that he had felt nothing. The Pantheon was nothing special.

What was it that those violent, masculine “barbarians” could see that my friend could not? I don’t have a complete answer for this, yet. Like so many young men I’ve known he was preoccupied with chivalry. He was heavily whipped and complained bitterly that his girlfriend had no understanding of him and no real interest. I wanted to shake him and tell him that with his beauty and strength the world was his. All he had to do was reach out and take it. But I doubt he ever will. Feminized, as at the Pantheon he looks at himself and does not see.

Men do not see the world like women do. The gaze of men projects outward into it; they see it, they take what they need from it, and they remake it anew. The gaze of women falls inward. The world becomes them, it exists for them. And thus, women do not build; they consume. It is not the vicissitudes of society or the education system that makes women like this. It is their nature. And, I hazard a guess that few others have made, that because of the consumptive nature of women and of men’s desire to give them every comfort and convenience that we are eating ourselves alive.

I wonder, if the genius of men were fully recognized where would we be now? The ancient Greeks developed the steam engine some two thousand years ago but saw it as no more than an amusing toy. Another kind of engine, a mechanical computer called a difference engine, was conceived by Charles Babbage nearly two hundred years ago, but a lack of vision in the general public meant Babbage could never acquire the funds to build it.

Those societies, the ancient Greek and the Victorian, are perceived by history to be patriarchal and every advantage given to the men who lived in them. But both societies had large populations of slaves and most men were anything but their own masters. What will we be able to do, what wonders will we be able to build, when men are finally, for the first time in human history, truly free?

A Miracle in February

Paul Elam · 1 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It was February, and I drove through Athens into the heart of east Texas with a chilled wind blowing dead leaves and debris across the highway. The sky, dark and moody, mimicked an ancient turmoil in my heart.

"Just talk to him," Jim had said. "There is much you have to say and you won't have many more chances."

"You just don't fucking get it, do you?" I blasted back at him. "He has Alzheimer's. It's late in the game. He doesn't even know my mother most of the time, much less me. What possible good is this going to do?"

Jim smiled, placed a hand on my shoulder and gently squeezed.

"Just talk to him."

I cursed him again but made the commitment. I thought he was out of his mind to hand me this as a task. But the man, part friend, part brother and all mentor was seldom off the mark.

Nonetheless I cursed him some more as I drove on, watching the buildings in the small town give way to bare trees and farmland.

I had no idea at all of what I was going to say. My father, at least when it came to our relationship, had always had Alzheimer's. He was there, and not there; close but closed off, as though guarding his humanity were a fatherly duty. I spent the first eighteen years of my life living with him, but never really knowing who he was. We lived in the same house without living together, ate at the same time at the same table without ever actually sharing a meal. We even watched and laughed at some of the same 1960's television shows, but that laughter was no more shared than our lives.

There was me. There was my Dad. But never me and my Dad.

His idea of fatherhood stopped at disciplinarian. A product of the great depression, a military career and two wars, his edges were cut in granite, his hand even but forged in steel. And his tolerance for nonsense, as he called most of the interests of my youth, was nonexistent.

The only real gentleness I ever saw in him was with my mother, whom he loved beyond words. But that tenderness didn't translate to his sons. He had three boys, and all of them had marching orders for manhood.

In my home, his word was the law, as surely as if it had been carved into stone tablets and carried down from the mountainside. He taught me, sometimes brutally, the importance of hard work and discipline. His affections were almost never spoken. They were considered to be implied in the lessons he taught, even when delivered on the back of his hand.

Honor. Work. Obedience. Especially obedience.

And it was the obedience, of course, that I ultimately refused to embrace.

That refusal was a source of chaos in my home. It earned me the lifetime ire of my brothers and the stern disapproval of my mother. It eventually pushed me out the door and into the army recruitment office, the quickest escape I could find. Despite all the circumstances, I can say, largely with thanks to my father, that I left with my head high. If nothing else, anyone raised by that man would have a spine.

But the echoes of all that family combat lingered, and were still with me as I pulled into the driveway and shut off the car.

The last time I was there was for Christmas. It was a time of pleasantries and temporary amnesia of past conflicts. Just as it always had been since I left home. But this wasn't other Christmases. My father had a disease that had carved a sinkhole in his mind and all of us seemed to teeter on the edge of it, at times clinging to our fractured connections to each other for balance; to keep from falling in after him. We went though the holiday rituals somberly, mechanically. The Christmas music seemed cruel; a haunting, melodic reminder that this was the last time we would all be together, and alive.

My father sat in the corner watching a dark TV screen while we opened presents.

I watched my mother open one wrapped in red and green striped paper. She untied the ribbon and took off the card which read TO: Ann FROM: Jerry, with love.

It was in her handwriting.

She opened the box and pulled out the robe, a long white drape of thick terry cloth. She hadn't bothered to remove the price tag when she wrapped it.

"Oh, look," she said, "He got me a new robe. Isn't it pretty?"

She got up, went to him, and kissed his forehead.

"Thank you, sweetie. I just love it."

He never took his eyes off the TV.

As I got out of the car I cleared my mind of that memory and went to the front door. This was going to be hard enough without thinking about Christmas.

When I got inside, the sight of him paralyzed me. Just since I had last seen him almost all of his hair had fallen out. Even his eyebrows had thinned into slight whisps. There were sores on the top of his head, a simple skin condition that often came with the disease, but the image in my mind was that the horror of his rotting brain had spread through his skull and was eating his scalp.

He was seated in his easy chair. An apron covered his chest and stomach. And then I noticed that the apron was fitted with strands of thick fabric that ran behind the chair and were tied together.

I looked at my mother. She sighed plaintively, and regarded me with concern.

"It was necessary," she said. "It was either that or send him somewhere. He has taken to turning the burners on the stove and pulling everything out of the fridge unless I am here to stop him. I'll leave it on while I am gone, but you can take if off if you want to. Just don't leave him alone, even to go to the bathroom, unless he is tied in."

Her words battered my brain and my heart. Suddenly, my memories transformed themselves, as if the sight of him in such degradation rewrote thirty years of history in an instant. I was enraged at his loss of strength; that strength I used to fight so hard to resist. I wanted to rip that goddam apron off of him and shred it. I wanted to shake my fist at God and curse him for the shell of a man that was bound like an animal in front of me.

I wanted my father back. Even if he was a father I never really had.

My mother interrupted my internal fit when she picked up her purse and keys. She had never asked why I wanted time alone with him, she just agreed without comment.

"He doesn't talk much," she said, as she opened the door, "But he can still surprise you. He has these…moments. I can't explain them."

With that she was gone and I found myself thrust into the most profound silence of my life. I stood there for a small eternity wondering what to do. The room felt like a vacuum; time suspended and hanging still in the air, like a noose waiting for a neck. I shook myself out of it and untied him.

I took a seat on the sofa just adjacent to his chair and he got up. He shuffled to a set of bookshelves and ran his fingers along the wooden edges. He sat back down and was up again just as quickly. This time he went to the front door and jiggled the doorknob. He didn't try to open it. He just seemed to like feeling it rattle in his fingers.

'Oh God, Jim, what do you have me doing here?' I asked myself. And somewhere in my struggling thoughts, the answer was whispered.

Just talk to him.

When my father returned to his chair again, that is exactly what I did.

I won't tell anyone everything I said to him. This was between my father and me. But I will say that I left nothing unsaid. I covered every heartache and every disappointment. And I made every apology I could think of. There were many. And I told him the secrets of my heart that I could never have spoken before. I talked and talked. I wept and talked some more.

How long this went on, I don't know. But what I do know is that the whole time I was talking he never got out of that chair, which is to say, in his own way, he never stopped listening.

And then, just when I thought I was done, I found myself reaching for his hand. I took it in mine and held on to it like a little boy, then leaned over and touched it to my cheek. His skin felt thin and fragile, not even a memory of the hand that had so often found my face in screaming anger.

Tears rained down my face and my breathing shuddered and hitched. I swallowed and, finally, managed to say the only real thing of importance that I had come to say.

"I love you, Daddy."

And with those words every wall that had ever been built in me tumbled down. Every chip I carried on my shoulder fell to the ground and every bit of manhood that I had used to prop myself up through life gave way to a heartbroken boy that had been voiceless for a lifetime.

I looked up through my tears and studied his eyes. I couldn't believe what I saw. He was looking back at me, directly in the eyes, and he seemed to search my face for who I was.

He wanted to know who I was!

A small, sentient light flickered his eyes. It looked like a fire to me, burning with the fury of the greatest human spirit. And then, as though from some other lifetime, some other history that I had longed to live, he spoke.

"I love you, too," he said. "I always have."

For the first time since my arrival I heard a clock ticking in the background, as though time had started again. It sounded in my ears as I sat there, stunned and shaken, trying to wrap my head around the magnitude of the moment; my moment. Then, just as what had happened began to register fully, I saw the light fade from his eyes as he slipped back into the void of his broken mind.

'No! Come back! Come back!' raced through my mind, but my pleading was too late. He got up from the chair, his hand sliding from mine and went toward the kitchen. This time I got up and lead him back to his chair. I sat with him in silence till my mother got back home.

The winter weather chased me back to Houston the next day. The clouds were no less dark; the trees were just as bare and lifeless.

But it was not the same drive as the drive up. I left the radio off and listened to the chilly wind howl around my car. I watched the ribbon of asphalt come at me and disappear behind like bad memories. And I carried with me a gift; a miracle from my Dad, the man who had just given me everything I ever needed.

My hand was steady on the wheel.

PTSD

Paul Elam · 1 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Amy sat across from me in one of the two Queen Anns. She looked vacantly at the floor and her shoulders slumped downward, as if ready to collapse under the weight of a hard life. She used a pale finger to absently toy with a strand of hair that hung by her cheek and was silent save the sound of her breathing. She was the third of four assessments I would do that day. Clients came in waves in residential treatment and that day I was surfing.

I had read her intake notes, a page of dispassionate scrawls from the admissions nurse, and was already writing the psychosocial in my head before I asked her any questions.

22 year old white female, complaint of cocaine dependence. Patient admits to alcohol and poly-substance abuse since age 11. Began using intranasal powder cocaine 3 years ago and has been using I.V. intermittently for the past six months in amounts averaging from 1-2 grams daily while binging.

I didn't need the chart to tell me she had likely been supporting her habit with dancing or hooking or both. It came with the territory.

She was a pretty girl. Even with the dark bags under her eyes that looked like bruises against her wan skin, and the track marks in the soft tissue at the bend of each arm, she had a beauty that softened the ravages of her addiction.

She shivered, but remained silent. I went to a linen closet and got her a blanket. She wrapped herself in it without speaking.

I would get past the preliminaries with her as quickly as possible. Like all addicts, she had a story that went past her drug use. That story was my job. The rest, the drugs she used, how much and when and for how long was just the requirements for documentation; an insurance matter. But it was something that had to be attended to.

I wish I could tell you that my work is like breaking a great and mystical code; that it requires a combination of high intellect and finely honed skills. I can't though. One look at her and most people would have a pretty good idea what the story was. Something, somewhere in her life had caused her enough pain, enough trauma, that she would stick needles in her arm to keep from thinking about it. Something, likely someone, had robbed her of enough self worth that she could smile while crawling naked on a dirty floor, scraping up the money for her habit from a crowd of drunken fools.

The only trick was getting her to talk about it.

I would do that. I had my ways. But I still had no assurances it would help. Addictions have no memory. They move forward of their own volition, by their own will. But when repressing the trauma is killing you, the only thing that makes sense is to get it out; to face the demons and talk them down. It's not a cure, but it's a chance.

And talk she eventually did, though it didn't come easy. She sat through most groups as though cloaked in a shadow, responding to queries with short, sometimes monosyllabic answers designed more to fend off other questions than to give up information. In her individual sessions she would talk a bit more, focusing mostly on her drug use, but quickly withdrew when I nudged the conversation a little deeper.

At two weeks into her treatment, and more importantly with only two weeks remaining, I tossed in the towel on tact and strategy and asked her the question.

"Amy, did someone sexually abuse you?"

It was the most animated I ever saw her. Her eyes went wide in surprise. Her mouth opened and froze in place. Her skin color, which she had regained with two weeks of abstinence and regular meals, drained from her face and was replaced by a bloody flush. Tears pooled and teetered on her lower eyelids, but didn't fall.

"Can you talk about it?"

She shook her head slightly.

I waited a moment, then leaned forward and spoke to her as softly as possible.

“I understand,” I said. “But I want you to consider putting it on paper. You don’t even need to show it to me. You may find at some point you want to show it to someone. And maybe whoever you show it to can help you understand that it wasn’t your fault.”

I let her go early from the session and called the nursing station to have her put on close observation. Tapping in to peoples pain sometimes has tragic results.

When I got to work the next morning I found a blue folder that had been slid under my door. It was Amy’s story, in Amy’s words, and each page I turned cut through me like hot knife.

It was her father.

He started touching her at age six. That progressed to other things as he continued grooming her; using her.

And along the way he taught her, in his own way, what all fathers are supposed to teach. Her worth as a person.

For him, her hand was worth five dollars. Her mouth twice that much, even more if she “finished.” Other parts of her body had their value, too. And he paid for, owned, all of them.

For ten years.

He trained her well enough. Eventually, when she wanted money or other things, she came to him. She would tell me later that it made her feel special, even powerful.

But that illusion of power eventually played it’s way out, and you could see the results all over her life and all over her body. Every degradation she ever suffered had traveled through a spike and up her arms. Every violation a prescription for hopelessness. Humiliation and abuse became a deviated septum and hepatitis C; Every needle mark a thousand unshed tears.

That power? It had lead her, no, dragged her, to my office, unable to look me in the eye or even to tell someone, anyone, that she was cold. And it forced me to do something that I am not supposed to as a professional.

Care.

The one necessity of my work is detachment. You get too close, too involved, you are helping no one, and you run the danger of causing harm. Anyone in this field will tell you that the ground rules mean doing the best you can and letting go of the results. That was no longer an option for me. I wanted Amy to make it.

I passed her in the hall a couple of days before she discharged. She was sitting on the floor with her back to the wall. An assortment of family photographs was scattered across the tiles at her feet. She was sifting through that collection of memories as though it were a puzzle. Her face was cheerless, even more than usual, and her fingers trembled as she stopped to take a longer look at a particular picture.

She looked up and seemed to notice me for the first time. She hesitated, then tilted her head to the side in an invitation to sit with her. It was the most intimate gesture she’d made to me since her arrival.

I took a spot on the floor next to her and looked at the picture. It was her at about eight or nine years old. The camera had caught her in a smile, but she carried a sadness in her eyes that remained with her till that day. I started to say something, then remembered that one of my most valuable tools was knowing when to keep my mouth shut. I just sat with her, joining her in her silence and we studied her picture together. After a few moments she cleared her throat and spoke.

“I used to love horses,” she said. “I used to day dream that like a prince or something would come and take me away on a horse and I would be happy and safe my whole life."

A tear fell down her cheek and she laid the picture down on the floor. She rubbed her eyes and tried to offer a half-hearted smile, one of Amy‘s sure signs she didn‘t want to talk.

I spotted a tablet on the floor. ‘Amy’s Artwork’ was written calligraphy style across the cover. I pointed at it and asked, "Do you mind?"

"Sure, I used to draw, some." she said, her tone confirming her mind was elsewhere.

I opened the tablet and my first reaction was simply being impressed. But as I turned the pages my reaction went from just impressed to startled, then disbelief, then, finally, complete awe.

The subjects of her drawing were people. Not just faces and features, but emotions and states of mind. She went far beyond the simpler interpretations of anger, sadness and joy. She drew curiosity into the eyes of a child, contemplation in an old woman; brief hesitance in the expression of a man; and of course, despair in a young girl. She drew the depth and subtlety of human emotion with the deftness and clarity of a great master.

In her work, done with merely pencil and paper, she demonstrated more understanding of the human soul than most therapists. Each page I turned was another awakening, another breathtaking revelation of the genius that sat next to me. Suddenly, I felt as humbled and inept as I ever have in my life. I reached up and wiped my eye, then looked at the tip of my finger, now moist with one of my own tears.

Two months after she left treatment, a month after her father began serving time, I got the call that she was dead. It was an overdose, of course. They found her splayed out next to a dumpster. Whoever she was using with just dumped her onto the pavement amid the garbage to avoid problems with the law.

I’m sure the coroner’s report cited cocaine as the cause of death. But that was just the interpretation of cold science. The coroner no more knew what caused her death than I knew how to help her live. What I do know is this: Amy’s death was a homicide. Her father murdered her when she was six years old.

It just took her 16 years to figure it out.

A Prayer for Joe Bob

Paul Elam · 2 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Seeing his reflection in the lives of all the lonely men who reach for anything they can to keep from going home.

-Kris Kristofferson

Joe Bob searches his home futilely for a place to store a box of baseball cards he‘s collected since childhood. Everywhere he looks is already packed to the edges with something else. The bedroom closets, all four of them, are choked with enough clothing and shoes to start an EBay business. The ones in the hallway are equally spoken for, stacked chin level with cardboard boxes much like the one he‘s holding, except they haven’t been opened in a generation.

With a sigh he lumbers to the garage and wedges the box in a corner, feeling the sides buckle a little as he forces it between his fishing gear and some power tools. Back inside, something starts to claw at him somewhere in the pit of his stomach, like talons sinking into a small animal. It was the trip to the garage. It was a little too…familiar.

There were two things that all his closets had in common. One, as you know, they were all full. Two, almost none of that stuff was Joe Bob’s. Between wife and kids his home was fully occupied. And it wasn’t just the closets. Everything from bathroom counters to bookshelves to basement was the terrain of others. What remained for him was trying to squeeze in what little he had around the property of those considered to actually live there.

Joe Bob’s heart sank with an intractable sense of the walls closing in around him. It was as though he had become the baseball cards, stuffed into a cardboard coffin and shoved in the corner with no room to breathe. It wasn’t just a shortage of square feet. It was something much more personal; more important.

He thought about the fishing gear. If he were to actually use it again he’d have to replace all the line. By now it was brittle with age and neglect. Somewhere along the way, exactly when long forgotten, the fishing trips just ended. They had been shelved with other childish things that interfered with his duties to provide for a family. His wife was instrumental in helping this along. Any mention he made of fishing, or any personal enjoyment, was met with cold disapproval and not so subtle questioning of his priorities. The few times he didn’t cave in to that he paid for with guilt being tied around his neck like a noose. Eventually he got the point. He might go fishing, but he wasn’t going to be allowed to enjoy it.

As time passed by, so did life in a way. Friends slipped away, personal interests and hobbies became memories. The lack of personal space became a lack of personal identity. Somewhere between the early days and where he stood now his life had morphed into something defined only by automated compliance with the needs, and frequently whims, of others. Eventually he reached a place where he could barely remember that he liked fishing to begin with. He wasn’t sure he could remember liking anything at all.

Not that there wasn’t an abundance of rewards from taking care of his family. He loved his family; would lay down in traffic for them. In the end, though, robotic care taking leaves a lot to be desired. Ask any woman. Rebelling from it is inviting a firestorm into your home. Ask any man.

As you probably know, Joe Bob is an imaginary friend. Rather he is a composite of a lot of men I have known. And while the character is fictional, his story is not. It’s a story not often told, much less in mixed company.

Contrary to popular worldview, men feel. They feel as deeply and profoundly as any woman. If you peel back a mans skin, you find flesh and blood, not gears and wires. Men have wants, needs, desires and dreams outside their role as protectors and providers. They are not whole without these things and yet they all too often surrender them without so much as a struggle.

Many men are Joe Bob; working to provide, complaining little about their lot in life and sacrificing much for the sake of those they love. But sooner or later something gives. It always does.

Joe Bob is average as far as men go. Likely as not he can't really identify and articulate why the world seems like it is closing in around him. It just is. He doesn't know that standing up to his wife and insisting she support his taking time for his own interests might solve the problem, or at least lessen it. If he thinks of it at all, he knows such an effort would only result in heated conflict and fishing gear gathering more dust in the corner of his garage.

So he reaches for stuff. He does it without exactly knowing why. A bottle, drugs, violence, even another woman. Anything to feel alive again. He is reaching for the wrong things for the right reasons.

I am not excusing Joe Bob, or trying to say that this explains the worst to be found in some men. I am saying is that it might indeed explain some of it. And it surely needs explanation. For when all the things Joe Bob reaches for ultimately fail him, he sometimes reaches for a gun. This isn't a blanket explanation of suicide. Nor would any one thing explain it so simply. But I do know this: People who take their own lives often feel like they are alone.

Joe Bob doesn't feel like he is alone, he is unshakably certain of it.

Some Thoughts on Whores and Liars

Paul Elam · 2 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

David Evans. Collin Finnerty. Reade Seligmann. Don't be surprised if the names sound only vaguely familiar, though not so long ago they were the subject of national headlines. Perhaps the mention of another name will jar your memory.

Mike Nifong.

Yes, Evans, Finnerty and Seligmann were the accused in the stridently publicized Duke Lacrosse rape case. A rape that never happened. A case that never should have been.

In a supersonic rush to judgment, these three young men were subjected to a virtual lynching at the hands of the media, the Duke administration, the prosecutors office, police and every other public institution that could help toss a rope over a tree branch. Dukes administration canceled its lacrosse season, fired coach Mike Pressler, and ignored death threats against Pressler and the team.
Indeed, the university administration fanned the flames of public outrage and hysterical student protests against the players by publishing a letter that addressed the accusations with the following:

"The students know that the disaster didn't begin on March 13th and won't end with what the police say or the court decides…To the students speaking individually and to the protestors making collective noise, thank you for not waiting and for making yourselves heard."

Duke reacted to the allegations without the least regard for the concept of assumed, or even actual innocence or for the rights of those three members of their student body. Instead, they lit torches and incited the mob.

All these actions were given inertia by the knee jerk outrage of a public that didn't have the facts and appeared not to want them.

It may be too generous to say that the public didn't have the facts. The public did have enough to question the cases integrity, but ignored it. It was understood from the beginning what this "woman" did for a living. I know, I know, in this all too enlightened world we live in, I am supposed to take great pain to point out that ones profession isn't an excuse for rape.

Consider it pointed out.

But let me also point out that her life as a pathological liar, stripper and drug addled hooker didn't diminish her credibility for a moment, and it didn't take the railroading of those young men off the fast track. Such is the power of accusation when it comes to men and women.

It is a power that has unjustly ruined the lives of untold thousands; a power that goes unchecked and unchallenged, all because we live in a culture that cannot imagine women as anything but victims; men as anything but perpetrators.

The results of this cultural psychosis are written in statistics that should outrage anyone remotely interested in justice.

Charles McDowell, a researcher in the United States Air Force Special Studies Division studied 1,218 cases of rape that were reported between 1980 and 1984 on Air Force bases around the world. Initially, 27% of those cases were found to be fraudulent because the alleged victims admitted to lying when asked to take a polygraph or after just having failed one. Another 212 of the cases were exposed as frauds with no polygraph involved, as the alleged victim convincingly recanted the accusations early in the investigation.

In other words, 45% of all the rape charges were proven to be hoaxes. The great majority of those did not recant until they were caught in the lie.

A 1996 study published by the U.S. Department of Justice revealed 28 cases in which men were exonerated by DNA evidence of rapes for which they had been convicted and sent to prison. The men were released after having served an average of seven years behind bars.

Former Colorado prosecutor Craig Silverman is quoted as saying. “For 16 years, I was a kick-ass prosecutor who made the most of my reputation vigorously prosecuting rapists. I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations that were made to the Denver Police Department. A command officer in the Denver Police sex assault unit recently told me he placed the false rape numbers at approximately 45%.”

The Innocence Project, which seeks to secure the release from prison for those falsely convicted of crimes, reported that “Every year since 1989, in 25% of sexual assault cases referred to the FBI where results could be obtained, the primary suspect has been excluded by forensic DNA testing.” And those men freed were just the ones lucky enough to have DNA evidence available. There are certainly more who remain incarcerated.

And by the way, the crime for which The Innocence Project has had the most success in freeing the wrongfully convicted?

Rape.

Men, scores of them, have been Nifonged, robbed of freedom and reputation, all on accusations that no one bothered to scrutinize. Or worse, as in the Duke case, their innocence was known and they were prosecuted anyway.

This problem has infested the criminal justice system, which marches on like a Nazi battalion while the masses throw ticker tape.

Unfortunately, it doesn‘t stop there.

False accusation has become the WMD for modern women who choose to use it, and by the frequency it happens, that is no small number.

I know, I know, in this all too enlightened world, I am supposed to take great pains to point out that not all women falsely accuse men of wrongful actions.

Consider it pointed out.

But let me also point out just how pervasive the problem is. It happens in family courts where allegations of spousal abuse, child abuse, sexual misconduct and the like are routinely fabricated to facilitate restraint orders that are dispensed with no corroboration. In those courts, the lie is just another tool for winning a case.

It also happens in the workplace, where accusation alone of sexual harassment or discrimination can snuff out a career and generate huge legal settlements that companies feel compelled to pay to keep the allegations out of the press, truth and justice be damned.

Allegation has become the fiat currency of social power over men, and it is working in spades. Corporations cave in, shrinking from the bad press of lawsuits that go to trial. Prosecutors that cannot politically afford to be seen as soft on sex crimes, or hard on women, run innocent people through with grinding wheels of injustice without compunction.

And John Q. looks the other way, unwilling to take an honest assessment of this behavior and the women who commit it.

Vindication is of little solace. This is not innocent till proven guilty. It isn’t even guilty until proven innocent. It is guilty until proven innocent, but still guilty in the eyes of the world, even if your only crime was to have a whore point a finger at you and cry rape.

Try a Google search on any one of the Duke three. Their connection to rape charges will be there for life.

What does a man released from prison for a rape he didn't commit tell an employer?

"Yeah, I did seven years on a rape, but they cleared me."

Sure.

What does he tell a woman in which he might be interested?

It isn't the accusers that pay the price for their criminal deception, it is the accused, exonerated or not.

The reason that these travesties continue is obvious. It can be summed up in one word.

Impunity.

The reality is that there are no real consequences for destroying the life of a man if you ruin him with a fraudulent charge. There are indeed laws on the books against it, but they are not enforced. It is a crime without a criminal, mainly because the perpetrators are women, or men acting in their behalf, and we all know they don't lie about such things.

Crystal Gayle Mangum, the street walker who ruined the lives of those three young men wasn't prosecuted. She was referred to counseling, and eventually graduated college herself, with a degree in police psychology.

I wish I made that one up.

But the fact is that the world not only tolerates this stuff, it embraces it. Or as Catherine Comins, a former assistant dean at Vasser College said, "Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometimes benefit from the experience."

I wish I made that one up, too.

Mike Nifong, the rogue prosecutor who broke every canon of legal ethics and more than a few laws, to further himself by prosecuting young men he knew to be innocent, was fired, disbarred, and spent one day in jail.

I am sure all this strikes terror into the hearts of the Mangum's and Nifong's of the world.

A Message to Women

[box type=”note” icon=”none”]There is a problem with the women in this culture. [/box]

[dropcap]Y[/dropcap]es, I know, there are problems with men, too. Believe me, I have heard about them for the last forty years. Some of it true and fair, much of it neither. It was a necessary dialogue just the same. So is this.

To understand this we need a brief look at history. Women, in the past, were denied voting rights, couldn’t own land and didn’t have much access to employment that would give them the freedom to make it on their own.

This needed to change, and of course, did, as can be confirmed with a cursory glance at the world around you. I laud those changes and would not turn back the hands of time if I could. But there is a problem in how we got here.

The reality is that the gender roles of our history were traps for both men and women. Women were assigned to home and children; men to sacrificial roles as protectors and providers. The simple but accurate truth of the matter is that we developed those roles to facilitate the survival of the species. And when the time came, we set out on the often complicated path to change. Most men embraced those changes and to this day continue to do so.

The problem here, and it is a monumental one, is that your knowledge of these historical events is largely shaped, convoluted rather, by feminism. Feminists taught you that your history with men was of unremitting evil; that you were chattel, slaves to men who held all power and wielded it over your lives in a system of sadistic, male dominated governance. They even gave it a name.

Patriarchy.

It is a word that has become synonymous with oppression. But feminists are loathe to acknowledge to you that “Women and children first,” was the patriarchal mantra, and that much of the social norms, even when misguided, were a product of a code adopted for the sole purpose of preserving your life. It wasn’t always fair, but the unfairness wasn’t always yours. Men died by that code, and trained their sons to do the same.

[box type=”alert” icon=”none”]The fact that we still do is evidence that while gender roles have undergone drastic change, the job is incomplete.[/box]

So what happened as a result of this systemic pattern of half-reality? Feminist distortions were increasingly embraced, and intertwined with the legitimate need for change, while men did what they usually do. They reacted to the message and not the messenger, standing up for and supporting your right to freedom from expectation based on your sex; to stand aside and yield, as it were, as you walked out of the entrance to the metaphorical cave.

Many of you spit on us on the way out. Many of you still do. It has to stop.

This isn’t just about decency. And it is not just about the chasm of mistrust that separates us from each other, or the legions of the walking wounded from this godforsaken gender war. It is about our future. The vilification of men that you have accepted as appropriate now translates to catastrophe for our sons; for your sons, your husbands, your fathers and your brothers.

The problem is that what we say, think and feel about people invariably translates into what we actually do to them. Nowhere is this more evident than with our sons, in the here and now. If you take an honest look at the academic environment to which our boys are subjected, you will see that their masculinity itself is under attack with ideology that teaches them they are inherently flawed.

[image]Christina Hoff Sommers documented this in her highly recommended book “The War Against Boys.” She writes, “The pedagogy is designed to valorize females, such as teaching history in a woman-centered way. Boys are to be inspired to revere Anita Hill and to “enjoy” quilting. At the same time, schools discourage activities that are natural and traditional to boys, such as playing ball together.”

She goes on to say, with sad accuracy, “Most parents have no idea what their children are facing in the gender-charged atmosphere of the public schools.” What Sommers didn’t add to that but I will is the fact that most parents have no idea about this because they choose not to. As girls and girls programs increasingly flourish, boys are falling to the sidelines in ever growing numbers.

The results of that are chilling. Boys are more likely than ever to drop out of school and engage in delinquency and other problems. They are representing less college graduates every year (40% and dropping quickly). With this diminishing education and wholesale marginalization, they are on a fast track to being the “second sex,” that position that so many feminists touted as the greatest evil of human history when they claimed it applied to women. This is the lasting legacy of spitting on men and your sons will not be the exception.

Young men now grow up to be destroyed in corrupt family court systems where women are encouraged to and even praised for using their innocent children like pawns in order to drain the father of assets. Those same children also have their badly needed connection to their fathers severed in the process. And when those exploited, abused children start quite naturally to act out and get in trouble, we blame the father who was removed against his will, for of all things, being absent.

[quote float=”right”]Are you offended by this letter? Does it make you want me to shut up and quit criticizing women? Then that is what you will teach your son[/quote] And the “freedom” women gained on this frenzied path of vengeance and victimization? It doesn’t appear to have settled well. Women are growing increasingly violent. They are matching men in domestic violence, blow for blow, and they are causing the lions share of injury and death to children in the home. All while feminists insist that domestic violence can only be defined by men assaulting women.

But we don’t speak of these things. We are not supposed to. In your position as the identified victim, and mine as the identified perpetrator, there is supposed to be an indelible silence on these matters. For the most part, there is. And that silence is destroying us.

It is a silence that is maintained with the collusion of shallow, weak men and misguided, self-serving women who despite their insistence on an image of independence actually feed parasitically off the men in their lives. In other words, I am talking about most of our culture. The only answer I can think of is for men, and for women, to change.

Perhaps you will consider this before concluding that men’s rights activists are whiners or woman or products of bad mothers. With an open mind you might actually coclude that most men’s rights activists are men who above all else, seek justice. For their children, for themselves, and ultimately for you.

I hope that a few of you will read this and consider it the next time you hear someone say “men are pigs,” or when you hear a woman refer to her first born child as “the insurance policy,” or before you giggle at the thought of acts of savagery by women like Lorena Bobbitt or Katherine Becker. Or even before you nod your head in unconsidered agreement with whatever generic negatives about men happen to be making the rounds. All of this can and will be visited on your sons, and their sons.

I hope too, that some of you look at your sons and ask yourselves what kind of world in which you really want them to live.

When your sons choose wives and marry, I hope you consider the agony they will go through when “taken to the cleaners” and robbed of their children in the family courts. You will be forced to stand by powerlessly and watch them have their hearts ripped out. As always, it will look much different to you when the system you help maintain with your silence crushes your son, and not just some obscure, unknown male whom you quietly think is getting what he deserves. It will happen to more than half of them.

The best prevention for this last one is to teach your sons to choose carefully; to scrutinize a woman before committing his life and labor to her; to evaluate her morals and values as a woman prior to putting a ring on her finger, or even whether it is wise any more to marry in the first place. But how can we do this if we keep teaching them that such evaluations are the stuff of misogyny? Indeed, how can we do this if scrutinizing women at all is such a taboo?

Are you offended by this letter? Does it make you want me to shut up and quit criticizing women? Then that is what you will teach your son when it comes to making himself vulnerable to the woman he chooses to marry. I hope he does not become one of the countless that take their own lives during the process of a divorce. I hope he does not have a mother that will wear blinders to the truth that this could happen if he does not have the skills, or the information, to choose wisely.

And therein lies the rub, ladies. It is indeed time, just as it was for men, for women to be held to scrutiny, and to account. More importantly, it is time for women to do this on their own. I'll do my best to provide a fair and compassionate mirror in my writings. It is always up to you whether that mirror is a place you want to look.

First, a Rant at Men

Paul Elam · 2 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been an MRA (Men's Rights Activist) promoting gender equalitarianism for over twenty years. Recently I have been downright giddy over the emerging voices of men and women who have had enough of feminists, and are throwing the lies promulgated by them right back in their faces.

This is especially true on the internet. These days, if it gets loud enough on the internet, even the sycophants in the mainstream media start paying attention.

But I have to say it is time to stop, at least for a moment.

The real problem we have now isn't feminists, it's men. I am not talking about MRA's, at least not most of them, but about Joe Average next door.

I might be talking about you.

And so I am here to do some male bashing of my own. And men now have that coming to them far more than feminists.

I am not going to reinforce the stupid ideas about men that feminists have spread for so long, but to point out the stupid actions of men that have enabled feminists to keep grabbing more power without much of a challenge.

We have had a gender war, guys. The problem is that you didn't show up.

While men, and by that I mean you, your brothers, fathers, sons and friends get bent over and raped in openly rigged family courts, you look the other way.

While your sons get marginalized and fall behind in ever more female centered schools systems (they now only represent 42% of college students), you have pretty much reacted by making sure the TIVO is set to get the next ball game.

While the media has portrayed you as one dimensional idiots, bumbling fools who couldn't buy an analgesic without instructions and supervision from your wife, you have validated that idiotic treatment by tolerating it, and have indeed begun to emulate it.

While your sons are used as cannon fodder in illicit wars and are simultaneously excoriated by society for having too much power, your response has largely been:

"Man, look at the caboose on her!"

You have taken to reading magazines like Men's Health, the COSMO for the new age male, so you can learn how to get those six pack abs and make princess take a second look at you.

And five years from now, when princess robs you of your children, your income, your property and your dignity, your best friend will console you with something really profound and helpful, like "Dude, that really sucks. Want a beer?"

It will happen to more than half of you that get married, but somewhere along your way in life, you hung a vacancy sign on your common sense, and you are likely helping your sons hang that same sign on theirs.

It is enough to make someone say, "Wake the hell up!"

You know, that may be the wrong thing to say. Most of you aren't asleep, you're in a coma; anesthetized by a thoughtless existence, you're crippled by one of the few things feminists have said about you that happens to be true.

You think with your penis.

And you know, though you likely won't admit it, when you think with your penis, the first thing it does is take your spine out of the picture. With that goes your values and credibility.

And that is how most of you live, in a penis dictated servitude; as trained seals fearful of saying or doing anything that might cause princess to get upset with you, or, God forbid, that might keep you from getting laid.

Personally, I have seen enough of this garbage from men to last me a lifetime. There are men and women out here right now, fighting an uphill battle you can't imagine just to give you a fair shot at justice when the wife calls in the lawyers and the state to dissolve your marriage and your assets; to dissolve your life.

You don't owe them or me anything, but you might, if you can pull your head out for five minutes, think about what you owe your sons.

Many of you who have already been destroyed by family courts are still raising your daughters to be replicas the princess that handed you your head, and your sons to be the pack animals that will carry the weight for them through life, only to be discarded when they are used up. Just like you were.

And you are still more interested in big screens than the big picture. It's completely pathetic.

This chosen ignorance is fatal. Men die more frequently of all the top killer diseases than women, though women get the lions share of gender specific medical research money. Women outlive men by seven years, and though they have had a national office for women's health for decades, we are just now hearing the first inklings that we might have one for men. It hasn't happened yet, and wise men aren't holding their breath.

Maybe you don't care if you die of heart disease or prostate cancer before you are sixty. But if you have a son, at least give him the honesty to turn to him and tell him you don't care if he does either.

That's not shame, it's blame. And if you are the "average" man in western culture, you deserve a boatload of it.

I imagine that more than a few of you won't much like what I have to say. You'll have to just imagine my concern about that. But if it upsets you, it won't last. All you need is fifteen minutes of acting like a lap dog for the nearest feminist, or hiding your cowardice behind words like traditionalism, manliness and chivalry. Say all three like you actually believe yourself and you'll be right as rain.

But if you are so upset that you want to do something about it, then I have a suggestion. Instead of buying those tickets to the ball game, or that next 12 pack, send the money to a fathers rights organization that is doing work for which you do not have the sense or the nerve.

Or how about this? The next time you hear someone take a stupid, bigoted stab at men, say something about it.

And if it happens to be a woman, don't say something agreeable so you can score points. Don't lie now, you know you have done it. After all, what is self respect compared to some tail? Your sons can live on their knees, too, though it is an ironic life for a species distinguished by it's ability to stand upright.

But if you can't manage a single moment of real backbone, please just keep your mouth shut. You are quite skilled at that one, anyway.

There are men our here trying to do for you and your sons what you won't. There are already enough obstacles in the way. The last thing we need is foolish beneficiaries to shoot us down. Just let us do what we do. Let us be the advocates for your sons that you fail to be.

Like I said, feminists are not the real problem any more. Men are. *You*are. They launched a gender war and, rather than fight back, men just blindly followed, out of fear, out of biological programming and out of abject weakness. What else can we call it but weak when men and their sons get flogged with rampant injustice and they react, in a thunderous collective voice, saying:

"How 'bout them cowboys?"

I know, this is a rant, and after I have unleashed all my hostilities I am supposed heave a sigh of relief and say something conciliatory, like “Sorry if I offended.” But the truth is that if this stuff applies to you, then you need to be offended.

You need, I dare say, whatever it takes to get you to spine up and learn to think past the next ball game or round of the horizontal bop.

If that is as far as you can reach, then you don’t deserve to be heard at all.

The following are descriptions and links to organizations that deserve some of your hard earned bucks for the cause.

National Coalition For Men
Uses lawsuits to challenge laws that discriminate against men. Successfully overturned a law in California that denied public funds to male victims of domestic violence. Advocates for men on a broad array of issues, not just fathers.

Domestic Violence – Women are Half the Problem

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

> The response to our finding that the rate of female-to-male violence was equal to the rate of male-to-female violence not only produced heated scholarly criticism, but intense and long lasting personal attacks. All three of us received death threats.~ Richard Gelles

Domestic Violence. Even the mention of the words conjures up the larger than life image of some battered, bruised woman on a highway billboard; a day glow orange hot-line number beneath her visage, and some catchy slogan like "love shouldn't hurt."

And no, I am not insensitive to battered women. My heart goes out to any real victim. But the day I see the images of bruised men on those billboards, I'll be less prone to being offended at seeing the images of beaten women being propped up like the starving children you see on your TV at two in the morning; the ones you can feed, clothe and send to Harvard for 12 dollars a month.

The myth is simple and designed for the simple minded. Domestic violence is almost exclusively perpetrated by men against women. Even better, it means brutish thugs pounding the crap out of Mary Poppins for burning the toast. And here and there, that is true. But if you think it defines the problem, or even comes close, you need to take Dr. Phil off your DVR to do list and start picking up some real books.

This nonsense didn't spring out of thin air. It was and is the raison d'être of feminists, in their claim of patriarchal domination and how that extended into the home and family. And on the surface it makes sense, especially if you don't think about it. And of course we didn't, so the idea spread like chlamydia in a cat house.

But let us scrutinize it now. You deserve a lot more depth than is offered in a sound bite.

I'll start with some research that most would feel was from a reputable source. The Center for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta, GA. This is the summary of their findings as published in the American Journal of Public Health, May 2007.

First, almost 24% of all relationships had some level of violence. Half of those relationships involved just one of the partners being violent. The other half were reciprocally violent. Now, in relationships where violence was perpetrated by just one person, over 70% of that was committed by the woman.

Did you get that? In all relationships in that particular study, more than 7 out of 10 batterers were female. Let's look even closer at the data as it relates to relationships where both partners are violent. This half is even more interesting than the first half. The study concluded that reciprocally violent relationships were most likely to result in injuries, particularly to women. They were also a solid predictor of future, repeated violence for women, but not men. In other words, women who engaged in mutual combat with men were much more likely to have a pattern of instigating repeated assaults. Men's violence was much more likely to be isolated, and, contrary to the repeated assertions of feminists, not likely to be repeated.

Now let me sum up those conclusions in a clearer form of English. Relationships where both are violent are more likely to result in the woman getting hurt. Those relationships are also marked by women who are much more likely than men to initiate and maintain that violence in the first place.

We have common expression for much of the men's violence in these situations. It's called hitting back.

> Women who engaged in mutual combat with men were much more likely to have a pattern of instigating repeated assaults.

I know, there is no excuse for violence. Ever, some would say. But there is legal, and in the belief of many, moral justification for self defense. Either way, it is a judgment call made after, and only after, an attack has been made.

In fairness, it has to be pointed out that this one study, for many reasons, including methodology, can't fairly be generalized to the entire population. And one study alone is easy enough to dispute, even from a sound source. So let's look at a hundred more.

Professor John Archer is a psychologist at The University of Central Lancashire and the esteemed head of the Aggression Research Group at the same university. In his analysis of 100 British and American studies he concludes that women are more likely than men to initiate violence in their relationships and are more likely to be aggressive more frequently. He also addresses the myth that women are only violent as a matter of self defense by reporting that 29% of female college students admitted to physically attacking their boyfriends when no threat was perceived.

I know feminists won't be convinced by this, nor will they by several hundred more studies, but let's look at them anyway. Professor Martin S. Fiebert of the California State University Psychology Department conducted an analysis of 249 scholarly investigations, 194 empirical studies and 55 reviews regarding domestic violence. The aggregate sample size in the reviewed studies numbers over 241,700 people.

Fiebert's conclusion? Women are as physically aggressive or more physically aggressive in relationships than men.

And if you think that the incidence of female on male violence is mitigated by women suffering more injuries at the hands of men, think again.

There are widely conflicting studies on this. Some of them place women at greater risk, but many of them place men. If we examine Fiebert's annotated bibliography which covers an exhaustive amount of studies, there are many times more studies cited that show women more likely to inflict serious harm, including with the use of weapons, than are men.

Are there other studies that contradict this? Absolutely. But there is a significant enough body of evidence to make three things patently clear.

- Domestic violence is not a product of gender. Attributing it to one gender over the other is not only misleading, it actually hinders efforts to address the problem.
- Society is wildly misinformed about the nature, origins and realities of domestic violence.
- Most of our legal and political handling of domestic violence is based on the myths and not the realities, leaving us to put all of our resources into half of the problem.

As in so many other ways, we demonstrate a cultural tendency to remake reality, even embrace lies, when the truth about the fairer sex doesn't make them look all that fair.

Now, many people of sound mind might well say, "Fine, let's just focus our attention on dealing with abusers and the abused, regardless of the sex." But to say things are not that simple is a monumental understatement. Richard Gelles is currently a dean at the University of Pennsylvania and holds The Joanne and Raymond Welsh Chair of Child Welfare and Family Violence in the School of Social Policy & Practice. He is an internationally known expert in domestic violence, and was influential in the passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997.

Gelles wrote, regarding his work with Suzanne Steinmetz and Murray Strauss, "The response to our finding that the rate of female-to-male violence was equal to the rate of male-to-female violence not only produced heated scholarly criticism, but intense and long lasting personal attacks. All three of us received death threats. Bomb threats were phoned in to conference centers and buildings where we were scheduled to present."

Now is it me, or is making terroristic threats of bombing and murder a rather ironic way to protest being called violent?

Returning to the evidence, though, it would be easy to make an argument that domestic violence is more a female than a male problem. There are, after all, numerous studies that support that conclusion. But that would be as pointless as the current paradigm, and might result in my car blowing up the next time I start it.

So for those of you screaming for me to quit picking on women and take gender out of the equation, that is precisely what I am doing. And what I am asking you to do, once and for all. If you really believe that all violence is bad and shouldn't be tolerated, then here is what you can do to prove it.

1. Write Vice President Biden and tell him to seek an end to the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), the legislation he authored that allocates billions to women victims but leaves men totally out of the picture. Men are, after all, injured by domestic violence, too. 835,000 per year in America alone.
2. Hold shelters and social services to account when they have no real programs designed for men. Their failure to do this is institutionalized sexism and needs to go.
3. Confront police and prosecutors for their actions. Men who call for police help when attacked by their partners are more likely than not to be the one arrested, regardless of the circumstances. Victims should be helped, not arrested, incarcerated and stigmatized.
4. Be sure to express your objections to and boycott the media outlets and corporations like Pepsi and Fedex that use men getting abused as a sight gag in their advertising.
5. When you see or hear a public service announcement that says something like "A woman is abused in her home every 15 seconds," realize that is is a actually a public deception, a convoluted half-truth, based in blind bigotry and callous indifference to the victimization of men.

Those are a few good beginnings, but you can best start by simply and publicly acknowledging what so few seem to know. Domestic violence has nothing to do with what sex you are. It never has. Disinformation is a poor way to address social ills. In fact, it just breeds more of them.

Harry Reid and the Fine Art of Backpedaling

Recent events on Capital Hill not only provide some significant insight into the severity of misandry in modern American society, but also point to a culture that struggles rather feebly to get a grip on the problem; a struggle highlighted by the fact that the word misandry itself -the hatred or contempt for men and boys- still has to be explained to far too many people who don't know what it means.

On February 22, Senator Harry Reid stood on the senate floor and told fellow legislators and the American people that passing the new jobs bill was important because "Men, when they're out of work, tend to become abusive." Of course he added for the benefit of his female constituents that "Women aren't abusive most of the time."

The subtext here is clear enough. We don't need to create jobs because American men are suffering from unemployment and are finding it tough to provide security for their families. We need jobs so those abusers-waiting-to-happen don't take out their frustrations on their wives by beating the crap out of them. If that's the case, perhaps we should just divert VAWA funding to the jobs bill and kill two birds with one stone. Or is that language too violent?

Thing is, of course, that is not the case. Domestic violence is roughly a50-50 proposition; a now well known fact that is commonly ignored for the sake of political expedience and bloated government programs. It's a matter not so shocking in our political system. Politicians lie for money and votes, and we have come to expect as much without getting too troubled over it.

We do, however, expect their lies to have at least a vague resemblance to the truth. And when they don't, we can usually expect the media to check things out and play gotcha for the sake of making their own money. We can expect them to do some truth mining on just about everything politicians say, from bailout money to WMD. Everything, that is, except in the realm of socio-sexual politics.

The events following Reid's gaffe are quite illuminating.

Like many concerned citizens, I contacted Reid's Washington office and spoke with his press rep about the statement. They would not discuss it over the phone but asked for my email address, and sure enough, within a couple of minutes I got an email claiming that Reid was accurate, citing a 2006 report by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) on domestic violence.

The only problem is that the study didn't support Reid's claims at all. In fact, it contradicts him entirely. (I had to run it down myself because the link they sent me went to a "page not found" message) I suppose that explains why they didn't read it carefully.

While the report asserts that financial stress (unemployment) is one variable in possible predictors of domestic violence, it doesn't claim anywhere that the violence correlates any more to men than it does to women.

So Reid's press office is simply waving a piece of paper and saying "We have documentation!" And they do. Documentation of Reid's lack of knowledge of the issue, and possible lack of integrity.

Being the intrepid investigator that I am, I decided to go one step further than Reid's office and look for some facts. What I found was that Reid has no support for his claims. The one study that comes closest is a 2004 report by the National Institute for Justice. They found that the risk of intimate partner violence goes up for women incrementally with each period of repeated unemployment by their male partners.

But in the politically rich environment of "justice" studies, there are factors related to the study that elucidate matters more clearly than the study itself.

- The study didn't even purport to apply it's findings to men in general.
- There was no investigation as to increased female violence in the same circumstances.
- There was no causal relationship established. None.

That last one is a matter of some significance. Unemployment is caused by a number of reasons other than a bad economy. Mental illness, alcoholism and drug abuse among others, all known to have an impact on the incidence of violence. Chronic unemployment, even in a bad economy, is usually indicative of other overarching life difficulties. So attributing it to intimate partner violence without the consideration of other factors is tantamount to offering the following:

- Almost all heroin addicts went to grade school.
- Therefore, grade school leads to heroin addiction.

That outlandish and myopic conclusion is, scientifically speaking, no less valid at all than Harry Reid's statements. This is why the National Institute for Justice Study couldn't, with any credibility, generalize their findings to men. It is the same reason Harry can't either. Unless he is just trying to increase his chances for reelection and doesn't care how he gets there.

Were Reed the only culprit, this would be a slam dunk for the truth. Unfortunately, this isn't the case.

Last night, CNN, gave a nationally televised demonstration of that when they broadcast a "fact check" on Reid's comments and supported his claims. They did so by waving the same study by the CDC, which they apparently, like Reid, either didn't read or didn't mind that the study wasn't supportive of his position. Apparently their research into the matter consisted of a phone call to Reid's press office, and retrieving a shopworn rubber stamp from a correspondents desk drawer.

Players in the print media have followed suit as well. In a glaring example of playing fast and loose with headlines, The Las Vegas Sun, who has given Reid glowing editorial endorsement, announces that "Domestic Violence Workers Find Truth in Harry Reid's Jobless Comments."

One might suppose that The Sun assumes readers won't be any more interested in the content of their articles than the average TV viewer is interested in the factual conclusions of a CDC study on domestic violence. For within the body of that article the truth starts to raise it's inconvenient head, making the headline read, in retrospect, like the shameless snow job it is.

First a telling quote for the paper from Reid himself. He says, in defense of his remarks, "I'm just telling you what two people working in the field say every day. There is no question that people being out of work causes more people to be involved in domestic violence."

Aye, there's the rub. So it's people now, not men, who commit domestic violence. Heck, they don't even commit it, they become involved in it. It's called reshaping the story after the fact. Caught with his political pants down, uttering a bald falsehood, Reid now joins the enlightened and informed intelligentsia, addressing domestic violence in oh so open minded gender neutral terms. And in doing so he manages, quite efficiently, to distance himself from his own words and stand on them at the same time. Smart fella', that Harry, at least if you are not paying attention.

It would be more forgivable if the media wasn't in such blatant collusion with him. In the CNN report, they switched the language as well, citing that financial stress did result in increased domestic violence, but they pulled back from pinning that on men quite seamlessly when drawing their conclusion.

The rest of The Sun Article reveals more.

Maria Outcalt, a spokesperson for SafeNest, a domestic violence outreach group, is quoted in the article as saying "People that are not abusive are not all of the sudden going to become abusive because they lose their job. Abusive behavior is not just because somebody is having a hard time."

Another quote was provided by Sue Meuschke, the director of the Nevada Network to End Domestic Violence.

“The economy doesn’t cause domestic violence, but certainly economic conditions can impact the circumstances.”

In all the quotes, including one that directly affirmed Reid’s remarks, all the language was sex neutral.

It has all the appearances of a massively organized spin machine. All the quotes either contradict Reid directly or shift the language to avoid his initial stance, supporting him with statements that don’t support what he actually said. The focus is being taken off the sexist and unsupported remarks by Reid, and reframed into a sexless dialogue that might help support the jobs bill he is trying to pass. Reid and the media and the domestic violence industry are doing a public relations ménage à trois; a graceful and deceptive ballroom fling, counting on the public not to notice that they changed the tune in the middle of the dance.

And it may be a desperate last move for Reid. For the first time since taking office, his senate seat is not secure. He is lagging in polls, and come the next election, he could be out of a job.

Perhaps his wife should contact a shelter and make her escape plan now.

An Open Letter to Robert Brannon of NOMAS

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

To: Robert Brannon, Professor Emeritus, Brooklyn College, Co founder- NOMAS

Dear Dr. Brannon,

I just received a notification that your organization, the National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS), has announced it's 35th National Conference on Men and Masculinity in partnership with the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence (NCADV).

I share an active interest in the same issues as your organization, namely, as stated in your principles, "enhancing men's lives." In that light, I wish to pose some concerns to you regarding your conference and other aspects of your organization.

In answering these concerns, hopefully you can clarify precisely how your activities are designed to achieve our common goal.

First, I did an exhaustive search of your website looking for policy positions or other information related to matters that affect men and boys adversely in modern culture, especially as pertains to the following:

Men are nearly 80% of all suicides.

Men are over 80% of all homeless.

Men are 93% of all workplace deaths.

Male college enrollment has dropped to 42% and continues to decline.

In the recent, protracted recession, nearly 80% of all job losses have been those held by men.

Men die almost six years younger than women (in 1920 the variance was 1 year) and are victims of nearly all fatal disease more than their female counterparts. But the lions share of gender specific medical research is done to benefit women. Also, there has been a National Office on Women's Health since 1991, and there is no such office for men.

In an egregious violation of basic civil rights, men are routinely severed from their children, their homes, their assets and future income by state functionaries, on the basis of unsubstantiated allegations in family courts.

Additionally, there remains a blatant bias against men in matters of child custody in divorce cases.

False allegations against men of rape, sexual abuse, spousal abuse and sexual harassment have become epidemic.

The anti-male sentencing disparity in criminal courts exceeds that of racial discrimination.

Though volumes of reviews and analyses, scholarly investigations and empirical studies prove that women are as likely or more likely than men to commit intimate partner violence, we continue to operate on the false assumption that domestic abuse is a "boys club" problem, denying services to male victims and refusing to acknowledge and treat female perpetrators seriously, often leaving men and children at the mercy of systemically enabled abusers.

And lastly, a prevailing culture of misandry -sexism that fosters the hatred of, or contempt for, men and boys- now flourishes in the media, politics, academia and the culture at large.

Unfortunately, Dr. Brannon, after a thorough search of your website, including a look at your past conferences, I didn't see any attention at all paid to these serious and overarching problems in the lives of men and boys. It is as if these problems, according to NOMAS, do not exist.

Furthermore, what I did see was a wholesale promotion of the very stereotypes of men and disinformation about their character that often precipitate and aggravate the problems I cited.

And I was most disheartened to see that in 2005 that NOMAS successfully joined an amicus brief to help shut male victims of domestic violence in California out of state funded services, keeping them “women only.”

So, with all respect, your response to this query will help me, and I am sure many others, determine if NOMAS is fighting sexism, or simply practicing and promoting it.

I respectfully await your response, and in the meantime, I invite you to consider sponsoring another sterling effort toward enhancing the lives of men.

On April 7, 2010, the On Step Institute is bringing together a collection of esteemed academicians for a symposium on male studies at Wagner College in Staten Island, New York. The purpose of this conference is to promote the furtherance of male studies initiatives at the university level which will pursue a more enlightened understanding of men and boys with, as stated by On Step founder Edward Stephens, M.D., “global implications.”

Your active endorsement and vocal support of this vitally important initiative will go a long way in both achieving your stated goals, and in demonstrating your true concern for the condition of men and boys in modern culture.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam

How to Tell if He Hates Your Fucking Guts

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Standard Dr. Paul disclaimer: This advice is not intend for all women. So if it does not apply to you do not be offended by it. If you are offended on behalf of all women, then please stick around. Grandiosity is treatable.

There is an incalculable amount of advice in the world for women on relationships with men. Scarcely an issue of COSMO or any other women's magazine has been printed that doesn't contain articles by some woman or another claiming to give you all the "how's" on the man in your life. How to snag and keep a man, how to get him to pop the question, how to drive him wild with desire, how to catch him in a lie, how to get him to treat you like a queen or how tell if he is cheating.

And it is not just women's rags, it's almost everywhere. You can't even check your email any more without some headline grabbing your eye that is also pitching the now ubiquitous "how to get what you want from a man" advice.Almost all of it written by and for women.

The fact that so many of you are still reading this stuff might point to the idea that whatever you are reading isn't doing a lot of good.

Sarcasm aside, I thought I would offer up some self-help magic for the ladies about men, from a man's point of view.

Let's call it "How to Tell if He Hates Your Fucking Guts"

Catchy, eh?

I know, I'm just a man, and as such not as sympathetic to the need for both constant approval and unconditional tolerance for bullshit that has likely left you batting squat in the man department. But I do know that love, at least as far as emotions go, is more conducive to a healthy romantic life than, say, loathing. And I happen to be an expert on how to prevent that hate monster from eating up your dreams of the future.

I won't leave you hanging by just pointing at the problem, either. For each sign of infectious hate that I identify, there will be a clear cut plan of action to ensure you will ameliorate the problem and move forward with a more loving relationship. You can trust Dr. Paul to cover all the bases.

Your advantage here, ladies, resides in the fact that men are quite simple. You won't need to buy a study guide or hire a relationship coach to ferret out the truth about how that hombre in your life feels. You just need to be willing to observe and digest what is right in front of you. Your man isn't prone to subtlety. He doesn't hint at hating, he radiates it if you are just paying attention.

That being said, let's get to work. Here are the three most common signs that your man spits upon the ground on which you walk, and what you can do about it.

Sign number one:

He quits fucking you and/or starts fucking someone else.

If your man isn't fucking you there is definitely something wrong, and there are only a three possible explanations for it. One, he's gay and has been hiding it. Two, he has a physical problem that needs medical intervention. Or three, the thought of touching you makes his dick wilt like a boutonnière in a blast furnace.

Since number three is the only one that can possibly apply to you, my solution will be confined to that problem. First, you may need to consider that four hours of bitching is not foreplay. Now, some guys are so sex driven that they will actually fuck you while you're bitching, but you should also know they're imagining you're someone else while they're doing it. Maybe your younger, prettier sister.

There are, however, a lot of other guys that lose the amorous mood by the time you have reached bitch #17 on your much longer list of complaints. To them, there is a big difference between whispering sweet nothings in his ear and yelling “You’re nothing,” at him, from across the room, projectile spittle issuing from your mouth.

What you can do about this is simple, assuming you can’t shut up. Organize! Take a minute or two out of each day to make a list of the things about him that dissatisfy you, and then heap them on him all at once. You will find the list reusable because it will only contain things you have been repeating since three months into the relationship. As he continues to reveal his imperfections you can just add to the list.

Oh, and try to get it all out in 7 minutes or less. Brevity is bliss, in the bedroom and out.

Timing is also important. Give him an hour or so to unwind after coming home from work. Then, after you decide where he is taking you for dinner, you can use the car ride to get in your digs. It is a great place for you to say what needs to be said. He is trapped with you next to him, you can keep the nagging out of the home, and, if you finish your tirade before you get to the restaurant, you can set about taking the evening in a more pleasant direction.

Additionally, you may have to skip a day of berating him here and there. Also, and this is the hard part, you will need to occasionally point out some things he does right. You know, just to make things look balanced.

Sign number two:

He does anything, anything he can, not to come home.

If you met your man at a Sierra Club convention and he suddenly takes an interest in hunting wild hog with a crossbow, 300 days a year, well, that is one of those not so subtle signs I was talking about.

As you have surely heard from some of the women writers, men like to retreat into their caves. Whatever your man likes to do for an outside interest, his favorite spot in his home is something sacred to him. So if he finds all manner of reasons not to be there, then there is a problem. And most likely the problem, at least for him, is you.

Ostensibly, you can just refer to the solutions to problem number one. After all, being present is one of the few hard prerequisites to having sex. If you can modify your behavior enough that it will induce him to walk in the door in the first place, it will solve problem number two and go a long way toward helping problem number one as well.

So, the next time you find yourself wanting to ask your man why he doesn’t want to spend more time at home, first take a quiet moment and ask yourself “Why should he?”

Oh, and answering yourself honestly would be a plus.

And by the way, here is a link to some more support. It’s some more detailed advice on how not to nag. There is some good stuff there, but I encourage you to skip over the parts that of course blame him for everything you do and just focus on being less of a pain in the ass.

Sign number three:

He hauls off and smacks the living shit out of you.

This far from subtle sign that your man hates your fucking guts comes generally one of two places. One, he is an abusive asshole and hates everyone, most of all himself. Or two, you are an abusive asshole and he got one too many rounds of your mouth and snapped.

Now if your situation is the former, and you are really sure of that, then your solution is a better man.

But if your situation is the latter, then your only solution is to be alone. Why? Because you are either physically, verbally or emotionally such a complete ass wipe that anyone around you will eventually turn mean. His main mistake was that he didn’t wise up and dump you before things went too far. He was likely just trying to do the right thing, but with the wrong person. And your treatment of him and of the other men in your life leaves you in a position that self help articles sandwiched between lipstick ads aren’t going to help.

The premise is simple. If you want respect, be respectful. If you want to be treated well, treat him well. If you want love, then give it. The only relationship tools that are worth anything are the ones found in the mirror, and ten thousand issues of COSMO ain't getting anyone around that.

Ever.

You should drop the COSMO anyway. Articles on how to get what you want from relationships aren't what anyone needs. In fact, running around trying to scheme and manipulate ways to get what you want from someone else is the problem. It is the chosen, narrow minded path of the selfish and undeserving.

It's all about what you have to give, baby, and what you're willing to. Take it from Dr. Paul.

And remember ladies. I am not a real doctor, but I play one on the internet.

Your Feelings, and Why They Don't Matter

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Standard Dr. Paul disclaimer: This advice is not intend for all women. So if it does not apply to you do not be offended by it. If you are offended on behalf of all women, then please stick around. Grandiosity is treatable.

Dear ladies,

Let's talk feelings. Actually, forget that. I'll talk feelings, because if you talk feelings, I won't get to talk at all.

I know, that sounded insensitive. Well, it was insensitive, and quite intentionally so. But keep reading, there is a method to my malice, and a message that you really need to hear. I don't want you to miss out on it because you're in a huff over the fact that I regard your feelings at best, as obstructive, and at worst, the primary and overarching cause of failure in your love life. And worse yet, as a source of abusive control for anyone crazy enough to get close to you.

As ironic as it may sound to you, if you want a good love life, the first step is to get your feelings out of the way, or at least quit using them as a weapon. So let's get out of Oprah mode and just use our brains long enough to sort this thing out.

It starts, like most of your problems, in childhood. That's the cute and annoyingly whiney phase of life that boys, unlike you, are forced to outgrow. You don't get all the blame for that, but if you really want a meaningful relationship, you'd better start taking some responsibility for correcting it.

Babies, whether blue or pink, are pretty much alike. When a child gets hungry or dirty or tired or sick or lonely or scared, they tend to react by screeching until someone does something about it. It makes sense. Babies, after all, can't take care of themselves.

But not too far along in life the paths of boys and girls, emotionally speaking, fork into two very different directions. By the time both have some measure of language and cognitive skills the reaction to all that caterwauling changes, and not so subtly.

Pretty early in a boys life, about the time he can speak in complete sentences, tolerance for remaining a baby wears thin. His wailing is met with everything from ridicule to threats. If "big boys don't cry," doesn't work, then, "I'll give you something to cry about," usually does, especially after a few rounds of following through.

Psychologists will tell you that this is where we harm boys, that we dissociate them from their feelings and shut down their emotional selves. They even call it emotional abuse.

But in most cases, unless taken too far, it doesn't abuse boys feelings as much as it teaches them to start mastering them. That kind of self control is a pretty good skill that comes in handy for a lot of things, like, say, being an adult. You see, before the psychologists came along to tell us what rotten parents we were, we had a different name for the effect we had on boys, although not so catchy and marketable.

We called it growing up. It was all the rage.

We knew, even without a Ph.D. in conjecture, that not maturing was a bad thing. It resulted in all sorts of problems, like permanent childhood and self centeredness.

And women.

That's because while we were insisting that boys learn real life skills, girls got a different message. Actually, they got the same message that they'd been getting since birth. Namely that squawking loud enough will get you what you want. And that is why that while boys your age grew into manhood, you just got older, hairier and more irritating.

And more vulnerable to being exploited.

The self help gurus have zeroed in on that one like chicken hawks and turned your feelings about your feelings into a cash cow. For a fee, they tell you to express your feelings, write them down, trust them, affirm them, discuss them in groups, put them in a journal, confront people with them, list them, learn more words for them, read about them, mouth them through a sock puppet like a neurotic ventriloquist and above all, get them validated as something sacred by all in your life.

That have led you to attend the Church of Emotionalism, where your tears are holy and Kleenex are passed right along with the collection plate. Can I get an amen?

But they aren't telling you anything really different than the same bullshit you have been told your whole life, and that you now tell yourself. When you have pain, or even a sense of slight annoyance, someone else is supposed to by God fix it.

And so you remain, born again baby that you are, stuck in self delusion until you get some things straight.

Despite what your therapist told you, or what you saw on Oprah, your feelings don't have any inherent value compared to say, facts, logic or a good cheeseburger. Most of the feelings you think are so important are as transient as campaign promises and worth just about as much attention.

What you feel right now won't be the same thing you feel in a few hours, or, if you are like a lot of women, in a few minutes. So expecting your man to stand constantly at the ready, as though his purpose in life is to validate and honor every fleeting emotion you have at each and every point of their temporary existence is a non starter. If that is what you expect, you don't need a relationship, you just need a better therapist.

And the same for taking your relationship straight into turmoil because you use your feelings to undermine communications every time a logical solution undermines your agenda.

You know exactly what I am talking about. The more reason and logic point to your being wrong, the more unreasonable and illogical you become. It is calculated and intentional. It's the tried and true plan of "If being reasonable doesn't get me what I want, I will just be increasingly unreasonable till I get it anyway." Nothing like frustrating someone into compliance.

And in a really twisted, perverted way, it makes sense. Heck, you're a slave to your feelings, why shouldn't everyone else be?

For a while, in many cases, it even seems to work. But it ultimately blows up in your face because all this nonsense is just a recipe for him to eventually cook up a great big casserole dish full of fuck-this-crazy-bitch.

Are you feeling me?

Ladies, the only real purpose for your feelings is to tell you there is a problem you need to fix. After that, continuing to dwell on them, or childishly forcing your partner to obsess on them with you, only keeps you from finding solutions.

It may annoy him into fixing things for you, as surely as you were still laying in a crib, but at this point in your life that is only to shut you up, and leaves you less respected, and less respectable, every time it happens. And so when your man gives in to this, he isn't meeting your emotional needs, and you certainly aren't meeting his. All you have accomplished is pressuring him into changing your diaper.

If you think that is the path to a healthy relationship, think again. Jerking people around on an emotional leash is only good thing if you are a psychopath.

Hostility will always be the natural result for people who use emotions not to connect or to create intimacy, but as a weapon to control and manipulate. It is hostility well deserved.

Now, there has been a long running misconception about men and women that has been around about as long as igneous rock. That is that women are somehow more gifted in the emotional department than men.

Of course, that's more bullshit. Training half the population to be childish, emotional puppeteers in ways that ultimately sabotage their own emotional fulfillment is hardly a gift. It is more like a cruel joke. And it may seem funny with you are 20. But it may seem much different at 45 when you are rapidly graying, cooking for one, and wondering why so many men get tired of listening to you in about 5 minutes.

With that in mind, if you want to see evidence of real emotional acumen, consider the following names:

Shakespeare, Keats, Hemmingway, Steinbeck, Gibran, Kipling, Blake, Wordsworth, Byron and Shelly. Or even the great contemporary songwriters, Simon, King, Kristofferson, Dylan, Hiatt, Lovett and Henley. This list is a drop in the bucket, and if we added to it till we covered every genius in world history in the realm of the human heart, we would have to address 95% of them as mister.

In fact, truth be known, most of the men in your life who you have dismissed as emotional zeros more likely belong on that list than you do. You just never knew it because you are such an emotional mess.

Feminists would tell you that this is sexism, and perhaps they are right, though as usual for the wrong reasons.

It may well be sexist to the core to raise half the population, your half, to be emotional cripples while telling them they are emotional giants.

Meet Dr. Paul

(Authors note: For the interpretively challenged, this is the disclaimer: This is a somewhat tongue-in-cheek column that also contains very serious advice. If you are a woman and the opinions expressed here don't apply to you, then you have no reason, or right, to be offended by them. If you are offended "on behalf of all women," then stick around. I can do wonders with grandiosity.)

[dropcap]D[/dropcap]ear Ladies, I thought it best to start my column off here with a personal introduction, and to give you a general overview of how and why grabbing you by the collar and holding a mirror up to your face will lead you to a happier life.

I am Dr. Paul. And I am to self help what Dr. House is to diagnostic medicine. That is to say, I'm a complete jerk, but the jerk you want to call when you're in real trouble. And if you are a woman in western culture, you are most likely in trouble.

You should know up front that your feelings are about as important to me as your opinions, which is to say that they aren't important at all. In fact, your feelings and opinions are the problem. By fixing them we can fix you, and everyone goes home happy.

You see, I already know how so many of you feel and where you are in life. I know about your struggles with men, how disappointed and disenchanted you have become. I know you are tired of guys that look great in the beginning but end up hurting and disappointing you.

[quote float="right"]They would tolerate any amount of your smugness and indifference just for a chance to be near you. And with this, they continued to enable you; reinforcing your delusions of speshulness.[/quote] That's why you have been watching Oprah and Dr. Phil, and why you read magazines like COSMO for advice on relationships. You're yearning for answers, and in fact you have probably spent a fair amount of yours or your man's money chasing after them. Your bookshelves are filled with everything from John Gray to Gloria Steinem and it hasn't done anything but leave you wondering if there are any good men left in the world at all. You are on an unending quest for an elusive solution, and you don't see anything promising in sight.

It's not entirely your fault. From the time you were born, and I am going to put this in bold italics because it is very, very important, the whole world has been lying to you . And when all you hear is lies, you can only get the net result of where you are right now: Fucked up and clueless as to what to do about it. The only thing you are sure of is that none of your problems are of your own making.

You see, all these lies have convoluted your expectations.

Your sense of self-importance has been inflated to the point of psychic mutilation; your sense of responsibility proportionally reduced. It starts in childhood with unicorns and Prince Charming, Daddy's little princess and sugar and spice. Yes, you are what little girls are made of. And while that as all sweet and gooey, it pretty much screws the pooch when it comes to creating a tenable relationship with a grown man.

Being a princess is a cozy role for a child, but a piss poor ambition for a grown woman. And while the people in your world pinched your cheek and cooed at you in your youth, they should have told you at some point in your life to take the tiara off and grow up. But the people in your world did just the opposite, didn't they?

[box]By the time you were a teenager, hormonal boys were telling you whatever they thought you wanted to hear just to get in your pants, or at least cop a feel of your tits.[/box]

They would tolerate any amount of your smugness and indifference just for a chance to be near you. And with this, they continued to enable you; reinforcing your delusions of speshulness. It made you feel powerful, important. Obsequious comment by obsequious comment, they helped you perfect the expectation that life would never demand from you humility or fairness. They taught you what your fathers did, that respect was not to be earned, but handed to you, by a man, regardless of your true nature.

And for years you lived with this as a constant, as there was always at least a few guys hanging around trying grovel their way into giving you the high hard one. You could have a man and toss him away any time you wanted and you knew it. As a result you only gave attention to men who told you what you wanted to hear, and performed for you as expected. And even when you did follow your primal instincts into riding bitch on a Harley with a guy who didn't spoon feed you bullshit, you made it your mission to mold him, too, into treating you like a princess. Often you succeeded.

And you ate it up like a beggar at a buffet.

Then you got a little older and feminism picked up where fathers and suitors left off. You learned that you were not only a princess with all the entitlements that come with that, but that you were also a victim of history; that all this entitlement that had been lavished on you was really oppression, and that you were owed even more.

And what's more, you were able to quickly deduce that you could hang on to all those "oppressive" entitlements and take advantage of all the new doors being opened at the same time. All while you were more and more deeply entrenching yourself in the idea that you were not getting everything you deserved; that some man was responsible for it; that some man should fix it.

No wonder you're so fucked up! Who wouldn't be? All that molding that the world performed on you; the stuff that made you feel so very good about yourself was bound to come crashing down at some point. Probably about the same time you figured out that no man with an ounce of self respect would put up with you for near as long as you would hope.

The world set out to produce an entire generation of personality disordered females and that is exactly what we got. Exceptions notwithstanding.

And so that leaves scores of you now here, in a state of perpetual dissatisfaction and disillusion. Many of you are downing anti-depressants like popcorn at a matinee, spending half your time ripping men, the other half looking for one that will fulfill your insanely unrealistic expectations of what he should be. And then wondering why it isn't happening.

All the while, your relationship shelf life is ticking away. Your looks are fading and your options are narrowing. But you can't seem to grasp the notion that it has anything to do with you. That is in part because all the mainstream self help options to which you have availed yourself have only made things worse, fueling the fires of your entitlement and aiding your projective denial. Your gurus and therapists and talk show hosts have only fed you more of the same that ultimately led you back to where you started, minus whatever portion of your earnings you gave up to them.

They are in business counting on the fact that everything I am saying here is true; counting on the fact that you won't buy anything unless it is what you want to hear. You have been a good customer, which means you have been screwed. And since you can't blame them or yourself, you just add it to your list of reasons to blame men.

It is a trap you can't get out of because you have been taught to shun accountability like an AIG executive and point the finger of blame like a snitch in a drug bust.

It is time to grow up. And unless you do, you will never get out of that ditch, whether you know you are in one or not.

It won't be easy. Growing up at 30 is a bitch; at 40 a nightmare; at 50 a lost cause but for a precious few.

Your ace in the hole is right here, though. I will help whip your mind into shape. It's a hard job because right now your cranium is just a bucket for a glob of disoriented, infantile mush. The only cure for it is very high doses of the truth on a regular basis.

You won't like it because I won't mince words; because I won't feed you the same poison that has ruined your life. If you want sugar coated, go get a doughnut. COSMO has one on every page, but Dr. Paul doesn't do junk food.

Most of you will come back here again and again hoping for another column. Why? Well, for different reasons. Some of you will just come back to hate me some more. You are addicted to that sort of thing with men, and those of you the most far gone will only seethe and seethe more at my words.

[quote float="right"]They are in business counting on the fact that everything I am saying here is true; counting on the fact that you won't buy anything unless it is what you want to hear. You have been a good customer, which means you have been screwed. [/quote] But others, though you will curse me even in your sleep, will come back to visit me at The Spearhead because I am the first human being in your life to ever shoot totally straight with you. And you will come back because you are, though in terrible shape now, capable of understanding that getting the truth for free is much better than paying money for a pack of lies. And let's face it, you do free pretty good.

We are on a rebuilding project here, ladies. And relearning. Through this column I will give you the reeducation you so desperately need. We will cover communications, intimacy, trust, and friendship. You will learn new concepts, like your man has feelings and desires of his own; new, radical ideas like making your man your emotional pincushion is actually a bad thing. I will teach you that you are not the center of the universe, that you never were; that you were never supposed to be.

You will grow from a child-woman into a paragon of mature partnership material. And it will bring you the happiness that only a grown up can know. And all you have to do is understand that humility is better for you than hubris; that abandoning any notion that you are royalty will free you from a depraved trap. I know you will thank me later.

Speaking with Zed: Interview With an Underground Warrior

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[image]It was 15 or so years ago. I had spent a few years in private activism for men in the mental health field, but had just found my way into the then comparatively low tech forums, newsgroups and discussion boards related to men's rights.

Like some men new to the movement, I was more passion than knowledge, well intended but green.

I stumbled into Rod Van Mechelen's old Backlash forum, read a handful of posts there and promptly posted my ideas about why no one in that forum really knew men's issues, but that of course, I did.

Some guy stepped out of the shadows there, dismantled everything I said with the skill and dispassion of an experienced surgeon, as though he were writing a grocery list or performing some other mundane task while he was eviscerating me and exposing my ignorance.

Then he invited me to "go piss up a rope."

Many of you know that man today as Zed. And though he has been known by other names, his writings have taken him to iconic status in the minds of many men who have been at this for a while, this writer included. This has happened despite the fact that he has eschewed the path of self promotion and opted to speak from behind the persona of an archetype, maybe because of it. Either way, he has wielded a sharp sword from his underworld den, and worn the uniform of a warrior in the battle for sanity between men and women, though he might want to tell me to go piss up a rope for saying so. Recently, Zed agreed to an online interview regarding his personal experiences and perspectives, then and now.

So without further delay, an interview with the man himself.

What brought you into the men's movement? Or if you don't like the label, what started so much passionate writing about men and feminism in western culture?

I basically got thrown into it about 40 years ago when I entered the gauntlet of the mating years. I went to an ultra-liberal college just about the time feminism was starting to really take off. Most of the women who were my potential mates were either actively feminist or thought they were expected to be. Men in my age group were raised with one set of values and expectations regarding marriage and then suddenly, just about the time we were getting ready to do it, all the rules changed – or rather, all the "rules" got thrown out and people started making it up as they went along.

I had the luck to be in the right place at the right time to encounter some of the REALLY radical thinkers who harbored an unbelievable hatred for the social values of the time and were dedicated to changing and destroying them – the backbone of the COUNTER culture described by Theodore Roszak. I was certainly part of the Zeitgeist of the time – the "Woodstock Generation", but neither fully immersed nor completely convinced. Some of what they were saying made sense, and some of it sounded completely wacko. Like many people at that age, I made the erroneous assumption that most people thought the same way I did and that the parts, which made sense, would get adopted and the rest of it dismissed.

One thing, which baffled me, was the seeming inability of so many people to recognize the profoundly anti-male foundations of feminist thought. It was a fairly common rumination of young women in those days "Can I be a feminist and still like men?" The effects of lesbian thinkers like Kate Millet on defining what feminism was and was to become made it impossible for feminism to be anything other than adversarial toward men.

By the mid-1970s it was becoming obvious that the target of the wedge to be driven between men and women was going to be based on sexuality. That is the foundation mechanism for bringing men and women together as men and women, and men were seen as sexual competitors by lesbians in their pursuit of sexual relations with women. Susan Brownmiller covered the “sexuality as victimization of women” angle with “Against Our Wills”, and Shere Hite covered the sexual satisfaction of women angle with her report on female sexuality. It was pretty obvious that one core strategy was to alienate women from men sexually, and thus attack the most fundamental force of the man-woman pair bond.

As this theme got carried forward by MacKinnon, Dworkin, and Koss, I kept expecting people to wake up and start to dismiss it. My opposition and counter-argument gradually intensified over a 30-35 year span of time, evidentially resulting in the level of intensity you see today in my writing – what you call “passion.”

If you were to give a state of the union address on the condition of modern men, what would some of the highlights be?

Unlike a lot of guys who hang around with “Men’s Rights” types, I’m far more positive about the condition of modern men than most of them. A lot of men are leading longer, healthier, lives than the average man ever has before in history. We have what is from a historic perspective a miraculous level of health care available to us. The modern world is full of convenience, and comfort, and simple survival is no longer the real challenge that it used to be for a lot of men.

I also think men have a great deal more freedom regarding life choices – if they choose to exercise that freedom – than the average man has in the past. The social changes of the past half-century have made the provider role optional for men. We are now free to choose lower stress ways to make a living and pursue that “work-life balance” which is one of the favorite buzzwords of our contemporary culture.

Modern communications technology has made ignorance of any subject a choice – the internet alone puts far more information resources at anyone’s fingertips than even huge university libraries had when I was growing up. Transportation technology gives us mobility that was only dreamed of barely a century ago. I can literally get to almost any part of the world in a few hours – instead a few weeks or months. The real barrier today to a man’s horizons is his motivation, drive, and interest – compared to times past when the simple act of traveling a few hundred miles was arduous and challenging.

And, something which a lot of people don’t think about is the fact that there are fewer men from the United States – both in terms of raw numbers or as a percentage of the population – who are walking around crippled or mutilated as a result of war than at probably any time in the past; certainly in the past 150 years or so.

Statistics and factoids, unfortunately, do not do a very good job of capturing a sense of what an environment is really like. To try to illustrate what social conditions were like in the past compared to today, I like to use the example of building the Panama Canal. Approximately 25,000 men died during its construction. Now, try to imagine for a moment what social conditions must have been like for so many men to find it attractive to take that kind of risk with their lives. How many men do you know today who would volunteer to head off to the jungle and face a high probability of death? The pressures going on in the lives of those men are probably beyond anything we can imagine today.

Or, take the “White Feather” campaign. Imagine being so sensitive to social pressure that having a woman hand you a white feather would be shameful enough that you would sign up to go to war in order to avoid it. I think a lot of men today, probably most if we are talking about younger men, would say “Take that feather and shove it where the sun don’t shine.”

Or, consider the “Mormon Migration.” Between 1846 and 1868, thousands of people made the arduous 1300-mile journey from Nauvoo, Illinois (or Independence, Missouri) to the area of Salt Lake City, Utah. Many made the trek on foot pushing the sum total of their worldly possessions in a handcart. Many perished along the way.

Imagine a life so hard and hopeless that walking a thousand miles or more dragging everything you own in a handcart was an attractive alternative. Then look around at the life you lead today and try to tell me with a straight face that you don’t have things pretty darned good.

You've said that the provider role for men is "optional" in modern times. Some might argue that this is true, but primarily in the abstract. What would you say to those that would point to the combination of female expectations being relatively unchanged with the fact that most young men are still raised with the provider role as the mandate? Doesn't this give the word "choice" a slightly different meaning?

I suppose it is a matter of comparative degree. I don't see anything like the pressure to live up to that role that men my age were subjected to. When I was 4-5-6 years old my old man would kick me out of bed at oh-dark-thirty in the morning to go hunting because "We have to provide for the family. That is our job as men!" Even with that sort of upbringing, I was able to shed my own expectations that I would live up to that role like a snake sheds its skin when I started hearing that providing for women was "oppressing" them.

It may simply be my situation, but when I look around at the world in my local vicinity I don't see that much pressure on young men to be the sole provider. My great-niece is a young married with a 2 y/o child and I don't think her being a SAHM and not working was ever on the table with her and her husband. It seemed to be just assumed by both of them that she would use the college degree her father paid for her to get and contribute to the maintenance of their lifestyle. Even among my age and social group, unemployed wives are rare. In my personal experience, shared breadwinning is the norm and the man doing it alone is rare.

I don't think that single mothers can indoctrinate a boy into believing that role is part of his identity the way that fathers used to. With 40% of children being born to single mothers these days, and something like 60% of all children spending some of their childhood years in a single parent family, the father, as "provider" is no longer the norm at all. I think the subtle shift from resident parent to payer-of-child-support which fatherhood has gone through in the past few decades will have a profound effect on the way future men view their role, with the unfortunate effect that children will become bills to pay – more like the cable bill and utilities than actual direct involvement in their lives.

In the UK within the past couple of years a survey of school-aged children found that a full quarter of them did not see a "father" as an essential part of a "family." It is also the case there now that the mother can put the name of anyone she wants on the birth certificate in the blank labeled "Parent B."

So, as opposed to boys who grew up in families which were "mom and dad and the kids" who saw all those roles as being part of a "family", a lot of kids are growing up with absent dads who are somewhat to largely unknown to them except as senders of checks. I don't believe that a boy who grows up without a man in that role to be a model for it and pass it on will see it as an integral part of his identity.

Add to that the fact that boys have been somewhat driven out of higher education, and men simply won't be in a position to be able to live that role. At that point, yes, the word "choice" does kind of drop out of the picture and they won't have much choice to live up to that role if they choose to have families. If they choose to only support themselves, which I think a lot of men will do, then they do still have choices.

What are your thoughts on modern marriage? Is it advisable for men, women? Are the problems "fixable?"

Marriage as most people understand it and think of it doesn't exist any more. Around the net you will see this idea reflected in it being called "Marriage 2.0? to distinguish it from what people normally think of when they hear or see the word "marriage." It has been transformed from a core social institution – one of the hallmarks of full adulthood and citizenship – to a vehicle for personal gratification and entertainment. The current expectations and beliefs about marriage are far too unrealistic to work for most people.

And the value systems which emphasized delayed gratification and long-term planning over immediate gratification no longer exist

I think trends are emerging which reflect a return to marital patterns of several hundred years ago – relatively affluent people are using marriage to pool and aggregate resources, while the less wealthy are more likely to be involved in a series of temporary relationships – with or without children.

You pointed to the trend toward transience in modern relationships, with or without children, particularly in lower socio-economic groups. Do you see an impact from this on social factors like crime? Do you think that humans as a species can eventually adapt effectively to the resultant norm of so many children being fatherless? And by adapt effectively, I am saying maintain rule of law and continue technological progress.

Good questions. There is certainly a "narrative" among MRA types that a descent into a more matriarchal social structure is going to lead to increased crime and decreased progress, I think there are whole lot of X factors out there which may not necessarily be being taken into account in those grim predictions.

First, one has to question how many scientists, etc. a culture actually needs in order to progress. Second, one has to define some sort of guideline for rate of progress

To illustrate what I'm trying to convey here – the US population crossed the 200 million mark between 1967 and 1968. Let's take a hypothetical 1% of the population involved somehow in technological progress – 2 million. The years since 1968 have been no slouch in that department. Now that the population is 300 million, do we need the same 1%, or 3 million now, to maintain the same rate of progress? Or will the same 2 million maintain us at the same rate while another million make us progress faster?

The issue is less what happens at the cultural level than what is likely to happen to subgroups within the culture. Fathers certainly tend to motivate children to achieve, and being a father – a father actively involved in a child's life, that is – certainly motivates men to be as productive as they can. What I think you will see is a progressive two-tier culture in which the ones in the top tier are not doing badly at all, and the ones in the bottom tier have very difficult lives. The UK seems to be is ahead of us in terms of fatherlessness, and indications are that the rate violence is going to go up and even the upper tier group is going to be less safe.

I'm a bit more concerned about the overall levels within the economy and the drain on it represented by the lower tier in terms of public benefits. As the number of producer's shrinks and the number of non-producing dependents grows, eventually I think the economy will stall. At that point I do think general technological progress of the culture as a whole will slow down, and violence will increase – look at what happened in Argentina

Many members of the MRM seem to fall into more conservative camps. Do you think modern conservative politics, as they are practiced, hold any promise for men in general? Is this a better option than the other side of the partisan fence?

No. The biggest problem is that there is no real coherent body of conservative thought any more. Every ideological camp is approaching value systems like cafeterias of beliefs from which they can choose the ones they think "taste" best. At best what we have today is the choice between full-bore leftist and a sort of "liberalism lite." The so-called "conservative" political leaders of the past few decades have expanded government as much or more than any of the fire-breathing radicals could dream of.

The biggest flaw with what passes for conservatism these days is that most conservatives refuse to acknowledge that times and social conditions have changed radically in the past 50 years and they are trying to hold men to standards of behavior that were part of a system of values that no longer exists. I always think of the old Biblical story of the Exodus and the incident where the Pharaoh reacts to Moses by saying that he would no longer provide straw for the people to make bricks – that they would have to gather it from the fields at night – but they would still be required to produce the same number of bricks. All of the social support systems for men living up to those old traditional roles have been progressively de(con)structed, but men are still expected and required to produce the same number of bricks.

There is a lot of pressure from the SoCons (Social Conservatives) to hold men accountable for the traditional male role, while women are allowed to do whatever they please. They have attempted to replace social values and pressure with an extensive legal enforcement system, and live in denial that conditions are such that it is just about impossible for the average man to live up to their traditional ideas of manhood.

It isn't working, and the more it doesn't work the more that both sides of the political aisle bash men for that fact.

Do you think women, at least in western culture, were ever oppressed? Why or why not?

No. And this is one of my sorest spots. Life used to have a lot of challenges and survival was by no means assured for ANYONE. Simply surviving required everyone to do what it took to survive, whether they wanted to do that or not.

Instead of looking at all the advancements made by civilization, all the comfort and relative safety we enjoy now, and regarding that as a monumental achievement; the "oppression" mentality interprets how long it took to achieve this level of relative wealth, safety, comfort, and convenience, not as a measure of how great the achievement really is, but rather as evidence of malice on the part of someone for not giving them near-utopia sooner.

Do the problems men face today lie in the laps of women? In gender politics? Or in men?

Of the three, I think men have the most power to address their "problems", and therefore bear the greatest responsibility for doing something about them. Gender politics is certainly a mess, but I have a somewhat colder and more detached view of how that plays out than many people have.

There is no getting around the fact that "men" have been the primary agents in developing the anti-male legal and educational climate in which we now live. So right away we've already divided "men" into a couple of different groups, which have conflicting agendas. Mike Nifong and Joe Biden are both "men", as far as I know, and both have been very active agents in pursuing courses of action which have harmed other men.

So, we actually have three groups here instead of two – men who burn other men, the women they do it on behalf of, and the men they burn. Of these three groups, only the last sees that there even is a problem. There is no way to convince people to address a "problem" that they do not perceive as existing.

Thus, the responsibility lies squarely on the people who think there is a problem to come up with ways to address it. If they have not, or will not, they are the ones who suffer, which would cause most rational people to expect them to be the ones to be most motivated to do something about the "problems."

The problem with the "problems" is that they are far older and far larger than feminism. The area of North America that became the United States practiced slavery for hundreds of years, and many people did not see that as a "problem." The Bill of Rights of the US Constitution very explicitly spelled out some rights which the government could not take from the people, which would lead to the reasonable conclusion that the framers of the Constitution had studied enough history to know that certain patterns of human behavior crop up over and over.

The fact that these patterns of mass behavior are beginning to manifest themselves again really should not be that much of a surprise to anyone who has studied much history. And, confronting the obtuseness and resistance of the average person when trying to make them aware of the dangers inherent in the growth of government power makes a lot of history more understandable.

Women for the most part are not coming after men with guns and forcing them at gunpoint to give the women what they want. Almost every "problem" that is affecting men these days began with a situation in which the men participated voluntarily and then conditions changed in a way they did not like.

While I am not without compassion for men who followed social rules and values in conducting their relationships with women and got burned as a result, my general level of compassion does go down a little each day as I encounter men who either ignore or flatly refute the evidence right in front of their own eyes. It's difficult to feel much empathy for someone who stubbornly engages in willful denial.

You and I have been on enough discussion lists together to know that what "men" seem to do more of and better than they do anything else is chew each other out for not doing enough to fix the problem, call each other names, and brag about how much smarter they are than everyone else. Many times I have observed the impossibility of convincing a man that there is a problem any time up until the divorce papers hit, and frequently even afterward.

Personally, I have given up on wasting my time trying to convince men like that, and am quite happy these days to let life experience make my points to them for me. I think when the number of men who have been burned by the system reaches critical mass that we will see a rather abrupt and significant shift in the prevailing attitudes.

Until then, it is on the men who are aware of the problems to take whatever measures they have to in order to minimize their own risk.

Feminists have attempted to re-engineer masculinity over the past 40 years. Has it worked? Are men inherently different than they were in 1969?

I think we have to separate the biological attribute of maleness from the social expectations of what "being a man" or social masculinity is about.

First of all, I totally reject the nonsense of "gender is a social construct." That is truly messed up thinking and exists on the same level as belief in magic. Sex is a biological fact. Most people are born in some variation of two standard models of human beings and there is a lot of recent research showing that there are some fundamental differences in the average expression of those two models.

There are some disturbing biological findings that indicate environmental pollution may be causing some severe effects on masculine development. Supposedly both sperm counts and testosterone levels have fallen in men over the past 50 years. Populations of both humans and animals are experiencing a shift in sex ratios of births, and males of some species are showing distinct signs of feminization.

But, setting those considerations aside for a moment as being more issues of degree than kind, no I don't think men are substantially different than they were in 1969 – biologically.

However, the social definitions of manhood and masculinity have changed somewhat. But, bear in mind these are more issues of fad and fashion than actual substantive changes. If you take a quick survey across human cultures and history, the ways that cultures developed to manifest and manage natural human traits are almost infinitely variable. For example, in 17th Century Europe (France, for example) men commonly wore powdered wigs, high-heeled shoes, fancy stockings and lots of lace – all things we associate today with feminine fashion.

You might be surprised at what I see as the major change – which is not in how men actually are, but in our expectations and definitions of manhood or masculinity. I think we have seen less change in how men are actually behaving than in mass media influenced archetypes of manhood. We have this John Wayne mystique as a template for the archetypal "REAL Man(tm)" which is completely bogus and unrealistic. Even "John Wayne" never actually behaved like the character he created of "The Duke." The reality of the man behind the myth is of someone who was named "Marion Robert Morrison" when he was born, and who never once actually engaged in any of the wartime activities of so many of his movies – but rather sat out the war as a studio pretty boy getting manicures, hawking war bonds, and chasing the wives and girlfriends of the men who were actually doing what he only pretended to do.

I think this one-dimensional caricature of manhood/masculinity is very confining and destructive. First and foremost, it is BOGUS, it is fiction. It bears no relationship at all to reality. That is a fundamental point. Most people are grounded enough in reality to realize that they are not Spiderman, or Superman, or Batman – those characters are clearly artificial and thus can be part of harmless fantasy. The problem with the character of "The Duke" is that it is believable – people can mistake that for reality, or a prescription of what reality "should" be like.

Compare a guy like John Wayne, "Marion Robert Morrison" (hmm? "MRM", that's kind of catchy), with an authentic and genuine man like James "Jimmy" Stewart. Not only was Stewart AUTHENTICALLY a soldier, the characters he played as an actor almost invariably had more depth and substance than the one-dimensional characters that Wayne portrayed. They were actually realistic in having a mixture of strengths and weaknesses, human failings and a desire for nobility. Think of his character in "It's A Wonderful Life." George was a "real", genuine, authentic, man.

Perhaps you have heard of the term “Generica” used to describe the homogenization and blanding which have come about as a result of the growth of national branding. It used to be that each region of the US (and other places as well) had their own character and there was a distinct difference in the atmosphere between, say, a town in the Northeast and one in the Southwest. But, the generification of the ubiquitous shopping mall eliminated a lot of those differences.

I believe the same thing has happened with manhood/masculinity – that we have been force-fed a media created and promoted, one-size-fits-all, view of masculinity that is extremely distorted, unrealistic, and destructive.

And, tying this back to your earlier question about “conservatives”, I think that the SoCons are among the most deluded who have bought in to this John Wayne mythos and are trying to be like Procrustes and force every contemporary man into their own preferred dreamed-up mold of manhood.

For every genuine “John Wayne” type of man, there was also a Walter Mitty. Men are not stamped out with cookie cutter molds in “man factories” creating a single type and model.

My goal for my involvement in the MRM is to reclaim the right for men to lead full human lives as their authentic selves.

You make a pretty clear statement regarding the fallacy of gender as a “social construct.” I am not going to press you for a broad analysis of sexual differences, but I am curious if you think that feminism taught us anything about the similarities between men and women, or if the women’s movement shed any real light on women’s capabilities that wasn’t already a part of the collective consciousness?

The most basic axiom of the study of individual differences is that the variation within a group on any particular measure will always be greater than the differences between the averages of two groups on that same measure. Broad and rigid generalizations about the differences between those groups will therefore almost always be wrong.

“Men” in general are taller than “Women.” This obviously does not mean that any and all men are taller than any and all women. The differences in height between the shortest and tallest man, and the shortest and tallest woman, are going to be much greater than the difference between the average height of men and women.

Feminism promised that both sexes would be “liberated” from the rigid stereotypes which used to exist in the form of “(all) Women are _____ ” or “(all) Men are _____ .” If feminists had actually delivered on that promise, I think it would have been to everyone’s benefit.

But that is not what happened. The feminist narrative skillfully mixes very rigid positive stereotypes of women and very negative stereotypes of men with hysterical outbursts if anyone so much as mentions the possibility of a difference that may not advantage women – e.g. Larry Summers. Thus, they hold tightly to the “all women are better nurturers than ANY man” to maintain their advantages like child custody following divorce. And they viciously defend the stereotype of the pure moral woman when it comes to things like Domestic Violence and false accusations – “women don’t lie”, “women are only violent when they are defending themselves from abusive men.”

I think if the changes of the past 50 years have taught us anything, it is that women are capable of every bit as much human destructiveness as men. When the cult of the moral woman is destroyed, and people begin to accept women as human beings with capacity for both good and extremely bad behaviors, then maybe a path will be cleared to something resembling real equality.

Where do you see men in 10 years? A hundred?

Don’t have a clue. And I’m not really being a smartass here. If you want a great stock tip, ask me what I would do and then do the opposite. My crystal ball was consistently so worthless I just tossed the fool thing out.

I think men will adapt, that’s about all I can say. There may be a lot of people who don’t like HOW they choose to adapt – the advocates of “Game”, for example – but they are going to adapt to the culture the best they can.

In recent years we have seen some new additions to the MRA lexicon. Words like “mangina.” We have also seen much more of a challenge to the concepts of chivalry and traditionalism, even a growing rejection of what Farrell coined as the male role of being "disposable." Your statement that you don't have a crystal ball has been duly noted, but I am curious if you see the possibility of this mentality becoming the norm for western men?

Yes, I do. What I see happening culturally is like one of those old cartoons with a character who has each foot on something that is moving apart from the other foot. Eventually the feet are going to move so far apart that the character does the splits and falls down. The short term ability we have seen of the culture to practice doublethink – holding two contradictory and mutually exclusive beliefs to both be true – will eventually give way to evidence and changing cultural perceptions.

I just saw a comment on The Spearhead –

"Men used to be chivalrous with all women because it was assumed that most women are virtuous. Now that most women aren't virtuous, chivalry is dying."

The new narratives among young men about female hypergamy, young women loving bad boys and passing over nice guys, and the whole "party away your 20s, then find some affluent man to pick up the bill" show that younger men see women entirely differently than older men do. Guys with ex-wives who have taken them to the cleaners in family courts and kept them from seeing their children simply are not going to have on the same sort of rose colored glasses when they look at women that older men who still think women are like they were 50 years ago have.

And, here is where I think fatherlessness is going to have the greatest impact. Boys raised by mothers with mental issues who did not have a father to counter-balance that and give them some sanity and stability in their lives are not going to have any source of traditional values and the whole set of ideas and beliefs are going to be completely alien to them.

What do you make of the overall state of women in modern culture? Has feminism helped women toward the constitutional ideals of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness?

Back in 1970 or '71, Norman Mailer came out with a book called "Prisoner of Sex." In his introduction he mentioned his belief that women had "the better half of the deal, already." I agreed with him then, and still do. I think women have lost far more as a result of feminism than men have. They enthusiastically threw away that "deal", thinking that men had it better, and now that it is gone there is no way back for women.

Just look at the foundation premises (not all the victimhood which is just the natural feminine character overlaid on the ideology) – women, as they were and acted 50 years ago, had something wrong with them. The only way they could be considered valid human beings was to become more like men and do what men did.

In short, "feminism", contrary to its name, actively threw away any uniquely female identity. A lawyer is a lawyer, not a woman.

Personally, I believe this is a big part of what is behind the unbelievably overt and outrageous displays of female sexuality which have become characteristic of women – without all those "oppressive" social positions which women used to occupy outside the fast lane of earning money, the only uniquely "female" identity women have left is the sexual one.

The Men's Movement has been stuttering phenomena, with a lot of false starts. We seem to be gaining some traction recently, but it's not the first time for that, either. Do you get disenchanted with this? How do you keep yourself going with so little move in the movement?

It's a mental orientation that few people seem to share. It begins with the idea that I, and no one else, am responsible for the quality and conditions of my life.

To play the devils advocate for a moment, what in the world do we NEED a "men's movement" for? I think that if you dig down under all the layers of rhetoric, you will almost universally find that what most people are saying

(both in and out of the MRM) is “I wish other people would change so that the world would become more like I wish it was.”

People get trapped by their values and beliefs about how things “should” be. And, they want everyone to get together and behave in a way that brings that about. The problem stems from the fact that people’s beliefs are all over the place and there is very little consensus regarding which particular set of “shoulds” are going to be implemented.

My generation of men was tremendously affected by the Vietnam War, so maybe using that as an analogy will illustrate something, which is fairly subtle and goes against the grain of most people’s thinking.

When I was in my teens the US was involved in the war and young men were being conscripted to fight it. What they wanted or preferred was simply not on the table as anything to consider – they were forced to go whether they wanted to or not. Any guy who didn’t show up at the induction center when ordered to was hunted down by federal marshalls and dragged there in handcuffs and leg irons.

It really sucked, but that was the way it was.

They went through basic training, and then were shipped over to SE Asia and plopped down in the middle of the jungle where people shot at them, dug pits and lined the bottom with poisoned sharpened bamboo stakes, and generally did everything they could to harm or kill the young men who didn’t really want to be there in the first place.

It really sucked, but that was the way it was.

Over the years I have developed the view that I live in a sort of “gender Vietnam.” I have absolutely no legal protections from a woman who decides to behave in a sociopathic manner. If I trust a woman and she betrays that trust and burns me, the most likely cultural reaction I will get is that it is my fault for trusting her.

It really sucks, but that is the way it is.

It all boils down to accepting the risks inherent in the environment and taking appropriate measures to manage them. I can do whatever I want to try to change that environment, but must bear in mind that it isn’t changed yet, so I have to live in it as it is – not as I wish it were.

Doing that requires certain mental adaptations that are not the most fun things in the world, but are not absolutely horrible, either. In the grand scheme of things, simply making sure that I am never alone with a female co-worker without witnesses present, for example, in order to protect myself against a bogus “sexual harassment” accusation, requires nothing more than a slight adjustment to my thinking. Moving women from the mental category of “potential romantic partner” to “potential false accuser” has other benefits as well.

So, the short answer to your question is that I do what I can to change the world I live in to what I want it to be, at the same time I realistically assess the world that I DO live in and conduct myself in a way which minimizes the hazards it contains for me.

If there were any single piece of advice that you could give a young man coming of age in modern times, what would that be?

It is a serious mistake to depend completely on someone else for our own salvation and well being. They may rescue us, and they may not. To whatever extent a man can control his own circumstances and destiny, he will benefit from doing so.

First, a word of thanks, Zed, for taking the time to answer these questions and for so many years of writing that have compelled many of us to challenge the thinking of others and our own thinking as well. If you would please, tell us about the meaning of the name Zed. It is one of a small handful of names you have used in your writings.

Does this indicate you are still a work in progress?

Mike LaSalle nailed it in a comment to one of my pieces here on MND – it comes from the movie Zardoz, which I think has a lot of allegorical meaning for our current circumstances. . The name Zed is a literary device indicating some sort of end. The last letter of some alphabets is often called "zed" – as in "From Ah to zed", A to Z. As Zed in the movie was the agent to end the boredom and ennui of the "immortals", trapped by their own success at dealing with all the nasty un-fun tribulations of real life into a sterile existence which drove them insane, in my more melodramatic days I dedicated myself to being an agent for bringing about the end of some forces and trends which I saw as being very destructive.

This concludes my interview with Zed. I mentioned at the beginning that my introduction to the man was a tad frictional. It wasn't the last time there was friction, either. But through some of the lessons I have learned to view that friction in pretty good context. Because, you never know. The fellow that tells you one day to go piss up a rope might be your mentor or your friend the next.

Sometimes both.

More of Zed can be read at The Spearhead and in his contributions to MND.

On Killing the Alpha Male

Scores of men today are crowded together at a bewildering impasse in the path toward their own identity as men. Largely severed from the lore of their father's fathers, they are left struggling to feed their souls in the arid wasteland of a misandric Zeitgeist.

We live in a realm where the classic male archetypes, models of inspiration and aspiration, have been gutted and replaced with a model designed not to battle for progress, power or the greater good, but to fall on its own sword in self loathing, imposed from outside by its feminist creators.

Our archetypal Samurai has been replaced by a Shogun of Shame, a Sampson sheared of his hair, and the world of men now suffers from it.

The result is the grievous spectacle of masculinity succumbing and descending into the dismal culture of shallowness and self indulgence that is the hallmark of third wave feminism; the land of options without obligations; of self gratification without self awareness or self discipline.

This aimless, narcissistic existence is a fitting escape from lives lived as apologies for being male, making all efforts to deny their true nature, unless it serves the whims of others. And while serving others is and always has been entrenched in the nature of men, it is now just a trait to be exploited when convenient, and denied when not in use. Most men submit to this without even knowing it.

With the male image so vilified and demeaned in today's world, and betrayed by the previous generation of men that let it happen, the newly reengineered man is all but defenseless against this downward spiral into insignificance.

It's happening all around us.

And though they must be held to account, we must remember that they live in a world they inherited, not one of their own making. And without an available model of manhood that does not lead to their own destruction, they will be lost forever.

Underlying the platforms and politics of the Men's Rights Movement is an unspoken mission to serve as a lifeline to this lost generation of our brothers. More than anything else, it is the job of men who understand, who have taken the red pill and seen through the Matrix, to push a meaningful archetype of manhood into the collective consciousness; to push it past the feminist censors and their obsequious male henchmen; to be willing, in fact, to roll over them in the process.

The only real question is what that manhood should look like.

And that, just as with the lost men of this generation, brings us to a crossroads as well.

I have written recently about what it means to be an MRA; how we must abandon reflexive chivalry and blind reverence for traditionalism; how we should dispense with party politics and move past internal divisions to further the cause of men and boys. That task, as important as it is, is just a preamble to this one. Because the real point of all of this is not what we do so much as activists, but that in doing so we define and exemplify what we aspire to as men.

The road to that enlightenment will not be an easy one. We remain divided along the many lines I have already mentioned. Underneath that, though, are the real divisions; divisions as old as mankind itself.

The world of men has always been a hierarchy. Alpha males residing at the top, the rest of us falling behind them, either as soldiers to their causes or as potential competitors for a spot at the top, and frequently both.

And in a world of defined gender roles this served us pretty well. Civilization progressed; advances were made and made again. And most of us shared, if not always equally, in the benefits.

The warrior, the athlete, the statesman and the like gave us models to emulate, traits of greatness to pursue and achieve in our own right. And honorable codes kept in check, as best can be, the corrupting influence of power. While evil existed and sometimes flourished, the system also produced widespread goodness, progress for all, and produced warriors, when needed, to combat the worlds evil and stop it in its tracks.

But in a world where one sex has moved past their role to assume political and legal dominance, and where the codes of honor have been replaced by the unbridled quest for control, the alpha male, the pinnacle of masculine archetypes, has gone from a needed figurehead to an agent of evil.

Ask yourself this. When feminism launched its attack on the core of masculinity some forty years ago and spread like cholera though every aspect of western existence, where were the alpha males?

They were doing what they have always done, consolidating and using power, often for the greater good, and admittedly sometimes not. Only, now, in our unanswered gender war, codes of honor and integrity were the first fatalities, killed off as enemies to the feminist agenda.

Faced with either retaliating against a population they had always served, or giving up power altogether, alpha males compromised, rather capitulated, with the surrender of their values.

Stripped of their guiding, corruption inhibiting principles, they became the muscle of the feminist Mafioso, maintaining rank and privilege through enforcing feminist will on the defenseless masses beneath them. They became cops hauling men to jail on the simple accusation of their wives. They became judges bludgeoning men with their gavels in corrupt courtrooms; politicians passing ever more misandric legislation; C.E.O.'s of pharmaceutical companies pushing drugs to sap the masculinity out of our boys, to make them more malleable to feminine control.

They became the enemy their codes had always compelled them to fight, and so colluded with evil to destroy the world of men. In an ultimate act of irony, the men who had been charged by feminists as evil, stooped to embrace them, and for the first time became the evil that had been alleged.

And since there will be no power for alpha males in heralding the cause of men and boys until the feminist hegemony is terminated, they are the primary enemy of the cause. It serves us well to consciously reject any notion that they are a relevant model to which men should aspire.

Another archetype is needed. And another archetype is available.

He is The Social Warrior.

He has many names. One of them is Tom Joad.

The protagonist in Steinbeck's classic novel "The Grapes of Wrath," Joad was an unlikely hero trapped in a Machiavellian landscape during the great depression that bears eerily similar features to the lives of men in more modern times.

Much like the growing phenomena of men in the west who increasingly either expatiate or seek to marry women from cultures other than their own, Joad abandons Oklahoma in the Dust Bowl for dreams of a better life in California. And just like the many men who find themselves duped by mail order brides more savvy to western law than they imagined, Joad lands himself squarely in the middle of troubles he intended to leave behind.

This leaves Tom faced only with more circumstances that seem beyond his control. He is pummeled by a shadow government, designed to use him as slave labor for the enrichment of a ruling class.

Joad tries first to keep his head down and work, surviving and ensuring the survival of his immediate circle. But he discovers, much like the men of today, that he is not going to be left alone to simply live his life.

As the prevailing powers seek more control and more utility from Tom and others, the ensuing friction finally ignites.

Tom witnesses the murder of Jim Casey, a disgraced former minister who has mentored Tom in the philosophy that divinity is not an ethereal ideal, but a tangible, supportive connection between fellow men.

And it is that ideal to which Casey martyrs himself, transforming Tom into a heroic archetype that avenges his mentors death and moves on as a fugitive to organize and fight on behalf of his exploited brothers.

In departing from what remains of his family, he becomes a Man Going His Own Way, but promising that his path is not of corrupt self indulgence. We will see him, he assures, not in the flesh, but in the spirit of men who fight back on behalf of their brothers against the forces of tyranny in whatever form they take.

It is easy, and I think in error, to infer that Joad's rebirth is just an indictment of capitalism and a move toward collectivism, though it's an idea that seems plausible in a story that unfolds against the backdrop of depression era America.

But the real message here is transcendent, delivered by a spiritual, not political leader, and speaks to the fellowship of man in a universal context, a connection far removed from the polemics of human political struggles.

One might also observe that the enemy of Joad was also the alpha male. That would be partially correct. Mankind has always struggled with the ebbs and flows in character from the corrupting influence of power. But Tom was merely the manifestation of the positive force in that struggle; the human embodiment of the code that has always risen to put evil in check.

Tom Joad was among the men that stormed the beaches at Normandy. He was the American revolutionary that fired the shot heard round the world. It was his arm that gave the first mighty swing of the hammer that toppled the wall in Berlin.

And he is the unknown, unsung and unrealized hero of men who face a similar struggle today.

In this context, Steinbeck offers us an archetype to replace the old one; to replace the one that failed us when he failed his own honor. We can now reject this model of manhood, the one that first enabled, then rode on, feminisms wave of power. And we can call these men out as the enemy they are, armed with philosophy and the righteousness to take them on, and win.

Call it the rejection of the archetype, or rebuilding of it if you will, as long as you keep calling these men to task.

And while they still have power and can inspire fear, we will see more men, cornered and desperate in this feminized world order, rise against it to fight. Or, in the immortal words of Tom Joad himself:

"It don't take no nerve to do sumptin' when there ain't nothin' else you can do."

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Like all social movements, the Men's Rights Movement struggles with its identity at times, and with factions withing its ranks that tend to do more harm than good. Many of us are a little hesitant to take this problem on directly. We have enough problems with divisions and infighting as it is. But the dangers of ignoring these things altogether are probably more significant than the frictions that ensue from talking about them. And, after all, it seems to be the calling of MRA's to talk about a lot of things people would rather we didn't.

First, defining a real MRA is just as hard as defining what a real man is, which obviously means it can't be done with any authority whatsoever.

Opinions are all we have.

That being said my personal definition of an MRA is very loose, but it isn't just about being against feminism. A lot of people are against feminism, but you would never know it unless you asked them, and you might not get an honest answer anyway depending on who's listening. They are the silent and quite useless majority, and they are more hindrance than help because they care more about social and political approval than speaking up for their values.

The truth, rather my truth, is that if you can leave your values at the door when you walk into a room you never really had them to begin with. MRA's in my experience are people who have and act on their values in many situations that other people won't. It is what will eventually make the movement an unstoppable force for change, and it is what makes the MRA stand out above all others when gender is discussed.

When someone makes an asinine, vacuous statement like "If women were in charge there wouldn't be any wars," the MRA is the man or woman that stands up and says, "Excuse me, that's BS," and then spouts off a string of names like Margaret Thatcher, Golda Meir, Indira Gandhi and anyone of a number of female European monarchs. The MRA is the one person that will publicly rip the covers off of someone who is spouting slanted numbers from an imaginary gender wage gap or making the ridiculous claim that domestic violence is mostly a male thing.

So, in the simplest of terms, an MRA is someone, anyone, who sees the emperor has no clothes and says so out loud.

Marxist-feminist hate mongers were successful in hiding behind a thin façade of equalitarianism for a long time simply because no one wanted to challenge them. It was MRA's and MRA's only that finally blew the whistle on the stinking lot of them and continue to do so whenever the opportunity arises.

Another group of men, part of the social phenomenon we now call MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) are also MRA's in my opinion. These are men who see through the misandry of modern times and vote with their feet about marriage and about relationships. They won't trade their dignity for sex, for attention and approval, and certainly not for a pathetic illusion of love.

So far, all of this is easy enough to talk about. Most MRA's agree that feminism is the enemy of decency and justice, that it is nothing more than female supremacy dressed up as a movement for equality, and we all agree that the MRA's are the only ones that are actually doing something about it.

It gets a tad stickier, however, when we start talking about what an MRA is not. This is the discussion that sends fingers pointing from and to within, and that's seldom pleasant. But, it is an important dialogue because in defining what an MRA is not we create the opportunity to identify and rid ourselves of some pretty heavy baggage.

First, a chivalrist is not an MRA. The guy who thinks his purpose in life is to care for women like they were children, to pay their way, to open all their doors, to rescue them from the harshness of the world, to pamper them and treat them like a princess is no friend to men and boys. He is just a trained seal balancing a ball on his nose for a piece of fish, and he is a Judas among his brothers. When he is not that, he is generally one of a truly dying breed, a real deal male chauvinist, seeking control in exchange for his niceties; the "man" that thinks he is paying in advance, that sex is owed him when he slides the plastic to cover dinner and drinks.

Either way, the chivalrist will sell his best friend out over a skirt and a pair of legs. He does this because it is the only identity he knows or can even imagine. He sees himself as good and gallant, but he is actually a white knight with a black heart and bloody hands.

He may call himself a traditionalist or chime on about his family values but he's really just interested in getting laid and being admired (or obeyed) by women. He has no identity whatsoever without their approval and/or submission, and has much more in common with a feminist than he does with "us" because in every waking moment he is about and only about giving women whatever they want in exchange for his validation fix. That validation is his drug and he will walk right over our broken, bleeding bodies to get it.

Regrettably, the traditionalist must be approached with some amount of caution as well.

While tips of the hat are well due to men who chose and succeed at traditional marriage, they are the exception– not the rule. The traditionalist who knows his good fortune will not aspire to obligate other men to that path in life. They recognize the risks and vulnerabilities of modern marriage and they do not condemn, but rather fully support, men who choose not to go that way. They stand behind men who opt to un-tether themselves from the role of protector and provider and do not let shaming language about that choice pass between their lips. They tend to see their own path in life as one of free will, a choice followed by some measure of good fortune, not of the mandated disposability to which men have been historically yoked.

Troubled families are a concern in this culture, but the men and boys bear the worst of that burden, so it is the otherwise unnoticed men and boys that remain the concern of the MRA; not marriage, not women or girls as a group. This is not an attitude of supremacy or contempt, but a rational response to the egregious state of imbalance that already exists. By advocating for men and boys, we pursue parity, not hegemony.

The biggest pretender in the Men's Rights Movement is the neocon. This is the right wing ideologue that asserts whatever Republican hopeful du jour is some sort of de facto MRA, and consequently a friend, despite their well documented track records of selling us out.

In fact, this usurper is more dangerous than the left wing ideologue. We already know the left is owned and operated by feminists; that their thinking is saturated in misandry. And we know that they embrace whatever they are told to by McKinnon and the rest of that ilk. But that chap from the right, the one who hangs out in the MRA forums and contributes to threads, cheering on the Men's Rights Movement and weaving in pitches for republican politics as usual is looking only for useful idiots.

In reality he is a cancer growing near our vital organs.

The modern right offers men nothing more than religious fundamentalism, conscription to traditional marriage and disposable roles for men like that of cannon fodder; all the things that have hindered us from fighting back against feminism in the first place. It still seems clear that elements in the right hold much more actual promise for men than anything on the left, but that promise won't be realized with blind allegiance and automatic votes.

The right must be brought back on track towards small government, constitutional ideals, and must become openly and energetically counter-feminist to be anything but useless to us. We must hold allegedly conservative leaders to account for participating in travesties like VAWA and the full gamut of feminist governance that they have either supported with their votes, or by omission with their shameful silence. Joe Neocon in the comments section doesn't care about all that, he just wants to push his Republican candidate. So it is Joe Neocon who should be pushed right out of the Men's Rights Movement and into the street where he belongs.

And it means. at least to me, that all politicians of both parties are considered feminists or sympathizers till proven otherwise.

It must be said, however tactfully, that misogynists are not MRA's either. Misogyny is a touchy subject in the MRM. All of us who take public stands with our opinions are used to being called woman haters. It comes with the territory. But there are a scant few real ones in our ranks.

They should be invited to join Joe Neocon in the street, but by MRA's, not by feminists.

In the end, it seems clear that the MRM doesn't have a political party (I'd vote for a three-legged chihuahua if it would dump VAWA). We don't have a religion, or even a sex. We don't have a nationality or an ethnicity; a universal identity or even national organization that centralizes our leaders. Heck, we don't even have leaders.

We are more a scattering of diverse and independent voices, unified by the quest for justice and an unyielding refusal to be silenced. As such, we are generally policed from within, all of us keeping an eye on each other, and keeping the all but ungovernable masses more or less in line for the greater good.

The few misfits among us won't stop any of that from happening.

Women in Combat: On Suffering for Suffrage

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The new decade will dawn with the United States still in two wars in the Middle East. It's not so different from other times. Since it's inception, The U.S. has been hard pressed to string together a significant number of years without rolling out the tanks for one reason or another. Some of those conflicts, as the two current ones, have relied on volunteers to do the fighting.

In other engagements, citizens, excuse me, male citizens, were drafted and forced into harms way without any thought of, or concern with, their consent. And even in times of a volunteer army, men are still the cannon fodder of choice, the only ones required to register with Selective Service, not-so-gently encouraged to do so under the threat of imprisonment and stiff fines. Men are the only ones to be allowed into combat units, or forced into them when circumstances dictate such extremes.

It is considered an American's duty, a uniquely male one, to stand at the ready; for a man to live one induction letter away from putting down the tools of his trade and picking up an assault rifle. The reasons for the wars don't matter. That our government sees fit to wage them is enough.

In principle it is sound. Nations sometimes require defense, even with all the nightmarish consequences that defense can entail. It is the price of citizenship; the sometimes horrific cost of freedom. And it buys us the right of self determination. It justifies, however meager, our voice with the leaders that we entrust with the weightiest and most solemn of decisions.

One might easily think that it reasonably follows that those who can not be compelled to defend their country, who are indeed exempt from that risk from the moment of birth, should not have a voice in how it is run. If you can't be forced into an induction center, simply because you are female, then perhaps you shouldn't be allowed in a voting booth for the same reason.

If your sex exempts you from paying for your freedom, then maybe it should exclude you from having the power to send others to do the same. Therefore, every female elected official from both parties should resign their seats in the federal government and just sit back and enjoy the protected privilege that their birthright has afforded them.

That is, until women have to play by the same rules men do.

It's simple. No pay, no play. Any society that ignores this cannot be seriously taken as one that embraces equality.

But of course we don't embrace equality where it comes to women. We hanker only for their privilege, and then look the other way and whistle while the men have to ante up. The net result is a culture that demands women enjoy freedom and security that only men must die to preserve.

So the question becomes, who is responsible for this?

Part of it, of course, is feminists. Since running out of discriminations in the west that don't work in women's favor, and being caught regularly at the ones they fabricate, they now spend more time railing about middle eastern ladies wear than much of anything else. It is part of a consistent and now predictable pattern for feminists, our designated "pursuers of equality" to stop short when equality means the short end of the stick.

One might think it is the military itself to blame. The military still bars women from the infantry, special forces, artillery and armor.

And the resultant breakdown of military deaths by gender vividly demonstrates what a difference those exclusions make.

Deaths by gender in the current conflicts (as of February 2009) are as follows:

Operation Iraqi Freedom

Male military deaths- 4,143 97.6%

Female military deaths- 102 2.4%

Operation Enduring Freedom

Male military deaths- 641 97.9%

Female military deaths- 14 2.1%

But the military doesn't make these rules, they simply follow directions from the Commander-in-Chief. And regardless of who is in office, the CIC is a politician that is prone to calculated moves that he thinks will garner support from the public in general.

And that leads us right back to the mirror, and to the social neurosis that guides our military policies. The culprit is public opinion, which is a slightly kinder way to say that the problem is us and our misandric norms.

Everyone thinks women should be equal. No one wants women in body bags. But, unfortunately, one comes, must come, with the other.

It's enough to make looking the other way and whistling habitual, and has. And it leads the more intellectually malleable among us to embrace the most outrageous of fallacies.

Hillary Clinton spoke at the First Ladies Conference on Domestic Violence in San Salvador, El Salvador in 1998, and said the following, with a straight face.

"Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat."

In other words, the dead, maimed, crippled, disfigured and psychologically destroyed from combat are secondary. The primary victim is the woman a soldier won't be providing for once he is disabled or deceased.

These are either the sentiments of the mentally unemployed, or just someone who values male life with the compassion of a vulture circling above a wounded animal.

Sure, Clinton was crazy for saying such a thing. But she was actually parroting the unspoken sentiments of much of the general population. We prefer that men do the dieing, and that women be spared hardship. But we want to be equals. It is the cognitive dissonance of post feminist culture.

And since that dissonance is preferred over necessary change, we are stuck, one foot inextricably lodged in the old paradigm, the other only planted in the new firmly enough to bring women privilege without commensurate responsibility.

And it means the lies we live are covered with the blood of men who pay the price for them. It is just enough "male dominance" to ensure women don't have to fit the bill for their freedom. And the roughly 98 to 2 disparity of casualties is sufficient to force politicians to carefully acknowledge our "men and women" who serve in harms way, further reinforcing the collective denial.

It's like acknowledging the "blacks and whites" that were harmed by apartheid in South Africa.

That kind of insanity is where we will remain unless the forces of reason compel us to take action. And that action can only go in one of two directions.

The first option, repealing the 19th Amendment, won't and shouldn't happen. So the method of choice to end the free ride on Freedom Train would be women in combat, women in selective service, and women in the draft should we ever need that again.

It wouldn't be a first in history. The soviets did it in World War II, and by law the women in Israel do their time in uniform as well. There are other examples.

There are some problems, primary among them the complications that women can present on the battlefield.

Those are minimized in much of the current war zone, where the number one mode of transportation is on wheels, and hydration is more of a challenge than navigating the terrain.

It will be much more interesting to see how women in combat perform when they have to manually hack their way through long stretches of jungle in 110 degree heat to reach an objective, or when they have to scale canyon walls with half their body weight in gear strapped to their backs.

Even researchers bent on finding as much evidence as possible to reframe the gender strength gap into a socially caused phenomena concede that women on average have roughly half the upper body strength as men, less aerobic capacity (endurance), 37% less muscle mass and lower bone density that contributes to more fractures and structural injuries than seen in men.

When strength and stamina count, the average woman will hinder the average man. Not just a little, but a lot. And in a war zone that means she will go in an instant from being a soldier, to being deadly baggage; baggage that the other soldiers will have to carry because she will be taking the place of a man that can keep up.

Of course, same sex combat units would solve that and a lot of other problems.

Generally the real physical differences between men and women don't pose a problem for the dissonant. After all, when it comes to domestic violence, men are the stronger, more physically capable of the sexes and can only be perpetrators. But when something has a pay check attached to it, suddenly that goes out the window and men and women are equals in every way.

But in this case, since we can't afford to run on delusions, we may finally find a legitimate rationale for the doctrine of "separate but equal." Women can and should take responsibility for defending their country. And they needn't get our men unnecessarily killed in the process. They can do it, on their own, true to the idea that they can do anything without the help of a man.

Or, as President Obama has said, "Women can do anything men can do, and do it better…and do it in heels."

One would think if that were anything more than a pitch for women's votes that he would have instructed Robert Gates to issue DoD changes for combat rules the day he assumed the position of Commander-in-Chief.

Or does the president secretly think that women in combat is a bad idea? Has he reduced himself to paying lip service to women's equality while he quietly believes them to be inferior and inadequate for the task? Does this make him just like most of the rest of John and Jane Public?

Oh, one does have to wonder.

By being all hat and no cattle on women's equality, the POTUS reflects still more of the stagnancy that results when reality meets PC nonsense and doesn't know where to go from there.

There is but one way to go where it concerns women in combat, and that is not to let them in, but to force them in, just like men, and to slam the cage door shut behind them as they enter. It is one of many changes that must come if men and women are to be treated equally under the law, and we are long past any other options that make sense.

And in doing that we will truly see what happens where the rubber meets the road, because the quickest way to see if anyone really desires equality is to give it to them.

Dockers Ad Campaign a Good Fit, With Some Alterations

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"We can thank Levi Strauss & Co. for a new Dockers ad campaign that weaves sexism and homophobia into a pitch for pants," says The Boston Herald's Lauren Beckham Falcone. Similar sentiments are being echoed in print media across the nation and scathing condemnations have gone viral on the internet, particularly on feminists websites.

"It's time to answer the call of manhood," the ad says, "It's time to wear the pants."

It's a pretty straight forward pitch. Reactions to it have ranged from tepid to histrionic, with a growing amount of traction for the latter.

Falcone asserts that Levi Strauss is "..waxing romantic about the days of submissive ladies and alpha males.."

It's a fairly moderate statement compared to offerings of walletpop.com writer Jami Bernard, who says, ""Wear the pants" is a call to arms, even when used jokingly, that says the only way to be a man is to put women in their place."

Bernhard further castigates Strauss's campaign as tantamount to rejecting women's suffrage and a desire to relegate women to vacuuming and other "womanly" duties.

Those pants pack quite a wallop.

Intertwined with the allegations of misogyny and homophobia are cursory, glancing blows at the commercialization of masculinity, and sometimes embracing it. Amanda Hess of The Washington City Paper writes, "For all the absurd fashion and beauty trends thrown at women, as gender-essentials, it's refreshing that men, too, are being encouraged to satisfy societies gender norms by shelling out $70 for a pair of pants."

Hess may have a point, but as far as gender-essentials go, cars and homes, which men are routinely measured by, run a lot more than lipstick and mascara.

Still, there are problems with the ad to be sure. Masculinity doesn't have a dress code and can't be purchased off the rack. But demonizing Levi Strauss for that stretches reason and fairness to the breaking point.

Traditional masculinity has been sold in cans of beer, bottles of aftershave, sticks of deodorant and a plethora of other products for ages, ever counting on men to head out and shop for those things in Chevy Tough Trucks.

The real men buy our product pitch isn't new, and hasn't raised eyebrows in the past.

No, it's something else that makes Dockers campaign different, and it has painted a target on the company, with detractors happily adjusting their sights to zero in on the kill shot.

The reason, the real reason, for all this outrage, pretty much boils down two key phrases in the ad.

"The world decided it no longer needed men."

And, following that,

"There are questions our genderless society has no answers for."

There's the ideological bombshell. It is the politically incorrect, but completely cogent idea that the loss of traditional masculinity has a higher price tag than a pair of trousers. It's a common sense reality that nonetheless has a lot of people outraged, and fearful, that anyone would express a positive regard for traditional men.

To understand that anger and fear, we must understand that there is much more that drives it than is on the surface, just as there is much more to be gleaned from the meaning of the ad than can be achieved with literalistic reductionism.

Levi Strauss & Co. are drawing fire because, intentionally or not, the company challenged an orthodoxy that sees traditional men as evil, and old school masculinity as something that required reengineering into the feminized model that more and more men are emulating today. This gender Zeitgeist includes the advertisers. They are in the upper echelons of movers and shakers in the world that "decided it no longer needed men." At least not as they were born to be. Those that embraced that kind of thinking are largely the same people making all the noise right now.

So if we are going to honestly dissect and evaluate what is happening here, it helps to understand that the outcry about the Dockers ad isn't a reaction to sexism, but indisputable evidence of it in those complaining.

Their indignation isn't because there is sexism in the ad, but because it is the wrong kind of sexism. Their contempt is a backlash fueled by misandry- the hatred of men and boys. For it is misandry, not misogyny that has become the gold standard of advertisers. And it became institutionalized in the mainstream media the moment they figured out there was a fortune in it.

One might ask where the voices of Falcone, Bernard and Hess were when Fedex and Pepsi used images of Burt Reynolds and Justin Timberlake, respectively, getting their genitalia smashed as a sight gag in television commercials?

Quiet as church mice, perhaps?

They are just a small part of the deafening media silence as men have become the punching bags of choice in pitching everything from bathroom cleaners to breakfast cereal. The latest offering is a commercial from Anheuser-Busch that depicts a woman, with an unmistakable sadistic glint in her eyes, fixing a boutonnière to her husbands lapel with a nail gun, while he is wearing the jacket.

Then, of course, once done with the flower, she wants to take it further and use the same nail gun to repair the zipper in the pants he's wearing. Were it not for the implications of a faulty zipper, it could have doubled as a Dockers ad.

And no one would have said a word, just as they are saying nothing about the Busch commercial.

By the way, Anheuser-Busch's Mr. Masculine, who grimaced and flinched as nails were driven into his body, actually managed to say "no" to driving them into his crotch. But the commercial ends with her still going for it.

The point has again been made. Sexually mutilating men is funny, and profitable. It is such an effective tool in the arsenal of advertisers that it can be used to sell veal to a vegan.

Keep in mind that this was a beer commercial broadcast during a pro football game. Again, veal to a vegan.

Where physical abuse isn't employed, humiliation often is. It's routine to portray men in commercials as one dimensional idiots who couldn't pick an analgesic without a lecture and close supervision from their wives. Men have become, in the eyes of ad execs and consumers everywhere, the weakened, less-than-masculine objects of ridicule that the Dockers ad points to as a problem.

And while Levi Strauss & Co. stopped short of getting the message 100% correct, the company has nonetheless taken a big step away from the redundant misandry of the advertising industry– and have agitated the prevailing powers in the process.

It's a groundbreaking step in the right direction.

It is also a step that will foster more reactions. Admonitions will be issued and boycotts will be called for. Pressure will be brought to bear to compel a retreat from the campaign.

Let us hope they are not successful. For if they are, the net result will be Levi Strauss learning all the wrong lessons. It will force the company to abandon something quite rare these days, an intelligent and thoughtful ad campaign, and send it back to a world where nail guns and kicks to the crotch are considered enlightened advertising.

It will send Levi Strauss back to a world that no longer needs men.

And if Strauss is concerned about that world, as it appears to be, it will eventually understand that the time for measuring men by compliance with forced chivalry has passed; that men have intrinsic worth that transcends mere utility to women. But if given simple respect; a modicum of dignity, they will protect women with their very lives. Men didn't get that from a code of chivalry. It is, and always has been, in their nature. Chivalry is just a label; a tag put on the actions of men to define what was already there.

Let's hope that the Strauss Co. will see that assuming that what is happening to men is of their own making, reflects, however well intended, the very sexism against men that created all these problems.

But above all let's Hope that the good people of Levy Strauss & Co. see that the forces that are lashing out with such vitriol at their ad campaign today have been lashing out at men and boys for the last forty years, and that they see, once and for all, that it is time for it to stop.

The company will need courage and conviction to do that. But that shouldn't present a problem. Courage and conviction are just two of many things that come with wearing the pants.

Men's Rights Will Prevail While Feminism Sinks its Own Ship

It might appear that men's equality sits on a mountaintop too high to reach in our lifetime. Feminist hegemony seems to reign like the Catholic Church in the age of Copernicus. Academics, government, media and the judicial system look like little more than extensions of feminist dogma. The workplace and even the social strata appear to have become feminist property.

For a number of years, average men have been acting as though they lived in 1936 Berlin or 1970 Moscow, measuring their words carefully and casting a quick, vigilant glance over their shoulder before speaking. Others extol the virtues of feminism with sincerity that can only be properly expressed with help from a straw hat, a cane and some Vaudeville piano. And Some men are the real deal, born again believers in feminism, dancing though the socio-political morass like Hare Krishna's in an airport, complete with dirty faces and donation baskets.

Meanwhile, many Men's Rights Activists, genuinely passionate about the cause, work under assumed names because of the very real danger of personal and professional retaliation if they are "discovered."

Vee know vaht you haff been dooink.

It's a sad testament to the reality that the thought police are not just imagined characters in some novelists dystopian fantasies. Men who mix the truth with their identities can be hurt by it, and have been.

But there is trouble brewing for feminists. Not just annoyances from the cacophony of uppity MRA's that plague their online comment threads, but real trouble of the catastrophic variety. In fact, feminism as we know it is going to unravel sooner than you might think.

The First Great Wave of masculism is on its way. It isn't a revolutionary tsunami, but it is happening fast, like flood waters rising with deceptive speed and force. And in the end, it will drown the feminist orthodoxy before they even notice the waterline is over their nostrils.

If you think this is wishful thinking, keep reading.

MRA's are already influencing and shaping a new Zeitgeist. The evidence of that is clear and measurable and is already changing the collective consciousness of the western world.

In little more than the past year we have witnessed events in the Men's Rights Movement that range from relatively impressive to significant…to groundbreaking.

There were two major court decisions in California and West Virginia that were very real, judicial cuts at the corrupt, feminist controlled domestic violence industry. Very recently the European Court of Human Rights dealt a severe blow to anti-father laws in Germany. In the last year we witnessed fathers rights protests in the presumably unlikely country of Mexico and the emergence of the movement in India. Men in Missouri recently won the right to use paternity testing in child support cases.

And as just reported on Men's News Daily, The On Step Institute issued a press release announcing a convention on creating men's studies programs at the university level. This is not just more of what we have seen in the past in men's studies, which amounted to nothing more than a women's studies program dressed up with a fake beard and a pair of plastic, pin-on cajones. It's an effort that will ultimately produce a tectonic shift in the academic landscape with lasting, positive effects for men in western culture.

All these things leave one wondering what precisely has happened in recent times to spark such a flurry of events, seemingly unrelated, yet all bound to the common theme of positive changes on behalf of men. Why, after decades of trying, are things finally starting to happen, and why so fast?

The answer isn't complicated.

The idea of speaking up for men is finally gaining acceptance. And that acceptance is all the culture ever needed to effect positive changes, the first of which was unclenching the vitriolic stranglehold that feminism had taken on our common sense.

Feminists are no longer The Untouchables of western politics, and once that reality spreads some more, and it certainly will, the proverbial gig will be up.

For this it is easy to credit to people like Warren Farrell and Christina Hoff Sommers; Kathleen Parker and Stephen Baskerville. Or the handful of others published and well known within the men's rights community. And no doubt they have done much good.

But there is something else afoot here; something even more powerful. It is rooted in the collective consciousness of the society we live in, and it is much more dynamic than any given handful of writers or activists.

Forty years ago feminists steamrolled their way into the limelight of our attentions. Riding on the coat tails of the civil rights movement, they forced, with a less than legitimate agenda, a pendulum swing of such momentum that it literally swung out of sight. It moved so far away so fast that it appeared primacy in the gender dialogue belonged to feminists, and always would.

That pendulum is swinging back

Recently a fellow MRA pointed me to some very interesting statistics regarding the internet and gender activism. And what they reflect is that MRA's are taking over the online world.

Fact is, we already have.

In 2007 if you did a google search on both men's rights and women's rights you would have gotten the following results.

Women's rights: 4,270,000 hits

Men's rights: 511,000 hits

Exactly two years later you can do the same search with these results:

Women's rights: 48,300,000 hits

Men's rights: 70,600,000 hits

In other words, we went from lagging by over 400% to a very substantial lead in two years flat.

You may wonder why the internet matters considering the feminist influence in the mainstream media.

It matters very much.

Some elements of the mainstream media, largely as a result of the internet, are on the decline. Print media is clamoring against ever narrowing profit margins, cutting costs as much as possible but still falling behind the curve.

Cable and network news outlets have been forced to integrate the internet into standard operations to reach the increasingly valued demographic of consumers who blend traditional and online sources for news.

Political discussion forums and online campaigning are growing astronomically. Even political fledglings are using social networking sites like Facebook to launch their ambitions.

It all points in the same direction. The internet is the mainstream media of the future, and it's nature doesn't allow the traditional gags to be placed on alternative ideas.

In other words, in the online world, when the media talks, we get to talk back. And that fact makes it impossible to ignore any group with sufficient numbers and the will to voice their ideas.

MRA's have the drive and will, and the exponentially growing numbers. We are literally changing the way people think each and every day. And feminists are hardly in a place any more to stand in the way.

Their dominance in so many areas has been long taken for granted, standard operating procedure if you will. But it is highly vulnerable for a variety of reasons. After a generation of debunked assertions, bad science and overtly sexist propaganda, their legacy of lies is finally making it's karmic return to the source.

Keeping a grip on power at some point hinges on having a grip on reality. Failing at this, modern feminism has become a paper tiger, caged in it's own hypocrisy, subsisting on a diet of delusion and hubris. Which is another way of saying they are eating their own excrement.

A once almost unassailable socio-political fortress, the gynocracy is now gimcrack on it's way to rubble, and feminism's no longer a sustainable movement, but just a profoundly neurotic hitch in social evolution that is in the early stages of being corrected.

Going though demographic information provided by sites like Alexa.com and others, you get a pretty clear picture of average people keeping abreast of gender issues. When you compare feminist websites like Feministing.com to sites like mensnewsdaily.com® it paints a pretty embarrassing contrast for feminists, assuming they can be embarrassed. Their demographics, particularly in education, look to be drawn from a mosh pit in an urban hell hole.

Intelligent, informed people seldom stay with shaky logic and false premises. As feminism continues to exceed the average life expectancy of bad ideas, those that cling to it are often the only ones dumbed-down enough for the job, or those so hopelessly brainwashed that they no longer can tell reality apart from deified victimhood.

So while men's rights activism is on a steamroll and will soon be barreling like a locomotive right at the feminist power structure, the gate keepers won't mount much of defense. The worm has already turned; consciousness of the truth is already being instilled into the culture on a growing scale. And truth is the ultimately terminal blow at any bogus ideology.

We won't know about this from picketing, shrill demonstrations or flaming effigies on the streets. There won't be a trumpet call or a celebratory parade. We can simply see that the tide is turning each time a court inflicts justice on the tainted domestic violence industry. Our evidence will be the demise, one by one, of rape shield laws, the prosecution of paternity fraud and lying for the purpose of a restraining order. Or crying rape when sex was consensual to cover guilt, or simply to cover the "victims" reputation with the person to which they were supposedly committed, but betrayed.

We will witness it in the eventual end of Title IV-D funding to corrupt family courts and the enforcement of shared parenting. The groundwork, and more importantly, the consciousness, for all this is being laid out as we live and breathe.

This movement will find it's way into social circles where statements like "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them," are met with stone cold glares and the righteous indignation they deserve.

And we will know how real it all is as we hear the increased wailing of feminists who claim MRA's are about misogyny and denying equal rights, followed by the dull thud as it falls flat on ears that grow more and more weary of histrionics and crying wolf.

Feminism will die from a synergistic overdose of stupidity, smugness and sexism.

And the men's rights agenda will prevail because it is one of justice and equality under the law. That agenda isn't just carried by those in the limelight. It is a groundswell of outrage that has been corked up for nearly a half a century.

It is legions of men and women who are finally waking up and deciding that enough is enough.

We have reached the time that if you want to get on the train, you will have to get a move on for a good seat. But it will be worth the effort. Or, as I recently read from another MRA, "This train is the only one that knows where it's going."

All aboard.

Kimberly Munley, Jessica Lynch and the Path to Being a Media Heroine

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The media loves a hero with lipstick. Female Rambo's sell, big time, translating into the holy cha-ching for news outlets and talk shows. Problem is, the media is so eager to exploit the heroics of a (hopefully photogenic) gun toting girl, they tend to get carried away with themselves and do silly things, like print packs of lies. That happens when you are more interested in headlines than practicing journalism. And nothing makes headlines quite like a real life Wonder Woman, or even the concocted possibility of one.

The latest firearm femme is Kimberly Munley, now the erstwhile savior of Ft. Hood, Texas, credited with stopping murderous madman Nidal Hassan all by herself, even as she was peppered with bullets in the process.

According to the military, and subsequently regurgitated by the media with little or no investigation, it was like a scene out of Dirty Harry, with Munley playing the role of super cop so well that Clint Eastwood would have bowed and handed over his .44 magnum in red faced shame.

It turns out that this isn't how things happened at all.

Who'da thunk, eh?

The name of the person, ahem, man, who actually took Nassan down is Sgt. Mark Todd, a retired soldier working on the army base as civilian police officer. He was the one who got the job done and ended the nightmare at Ft. Hood.

Currently, there is no question of Munley's bravery. She apparently did her job and probably deserves our admiration. Pardon the insertion of words like "apparently" and "probably." History tells us that we need to reserve judgment till the facts are in; facts that the media tends treat like the loose change in a million dollar transaction.

But even if Munley's actions ultimately prove exemplary, we need to acknowledge that were it not for the confusion created by the pursuit of a sensational story about a heroic woman, the headline would have simply read, "Gunman Taken Down by Police," and Sgt. Todd would have been lucky to even have his name mentioned.

And now the that hero has been identified as a man, we can watch the media lose interest in that part of the story like a car salesman loses interest in people with bad credit.

One would easily view this as a testament to the fact that bravery from men in uniform is commonplace. After all, how many bother to remember the name of the second guy to walk on the moon? We are a culture that remembers firsts. We love the groundbreakers, the top dogs, the Super Bowl winners, and have collective amnesia about anything else. When it comes to an absolute victory by the heroic actions of a woman under fire, we are still awaiting the benchmark event.

And in our desperation for it we are giving the media a pass to create one for us out of thin air.

We saw a sadly similar story in the matter of Jessica Lynch, the American Soldier who became an iconic figure in the Gulf War via that Hollywood style propaganda machine we also call The Pentagon. And why? Not because she did anything of military significance, but because the managers of the war recognized that a flesh and blood ballerina barbarian was a bonanza of 24 carat PR. And they knew the story, at least initially, wouldn't face much scrutiny from the media, or from an American public that would race mindlessly to embrace the whatever they were told.

And I specify "American" because it was an American fabrication. Or as Group Captain Al Lockwood said regarding American and British military handling of the story, "We had two different styles of news media management. I feel fortunate to have been part of the UK one."

Who knows if the British are more patient for a real heroine, or if they are holding out for one of their own.

Still, Lynch was such a great opportunity for America that the military reported she had been shot during the firefight that led to her capture, then stabbed and beaten by her captors. None of it was true. Gleefully undeterred by the facts, officials made a short, expertly edited film production of Navy Seals and Army Rangers converging on and aggressively securing the hospital where Lynch was being held. Rather where she was being compassionately treated by civilian doctors for injuries she suffered when her vehicle crashed.

The problem was that there was no enemy around to pose a threat, or to justify the orchestrated, Entebbe style raid. The enemy had already moved on, leaving Lynch behind to be taken care of at the hospital. A fact, it seems, that the military was well aware of before going in after her, and one that found its way to the cutting room floor before the official story being released.

It was a story so staged and scripted that you could almost hear a The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shout, “Cut! That’s a wrap!” after the first news conference on the “rescue.”

It was, however, a win-win for everyone. America had it’s heroine, and The Pentagon had its feel good moment; an entertaining and uplifting anecdote from the war at a crucial time when support was starting to lag.

And it worked for a while in spades, though it left an American public largely ignorant of the fact they were duped.

People seem happy with it, though. Our proclivity to embrace fantasy where it comes to women appears bottomless. We have turned an entire collective consciousness into an episode of Xena- Warrior Princess, lending us to sit with happy, vacant, smiles, shirts covered with popcorn as we watch her battle ten men at a time, nine of them standing in the periphery, making jerky, ambiguous movements while they wait in queue to be the next one she dispatches with ease.

We love Laura Croft and are transfixed by Uma Thurman slicing through legions of martial arts experts with her Hattori Hanzo sword. Female butt kicking is high profit hokum for the big screen, and perhaps staves off our appetite for when the real life Dirty Harriet finally makes her debut.

It would seem harmless enough. After all, it’s only human nature to indulge in fantasy. Whether that is Sigourney Weaver walking over dead marines to wipe out a horde of aliens with acid for blood or Buffy the Vampire Slayer destroying armies of the undead doesn’t make much difference.

But in the real world we should take pause. Nine soldiers lost their lives in the battle that resulted in Jessica Lynch’s capture. It was a battle in which by her own account she never fired a shot, but rather hit her knees to pray when the bullets started flying.

And rather than do the right thing, which would have been to go pick her up from the hospital and quietly retire her back to civilian life, we turned her into Sally Stallone and toasted her bravery. We made her a hero of fools.

In the other tragedy, 13 people lay dead at the end of Hassan’s rampage. A somber enough event to warrant some respect for the truth, and a good measure of diligence in getting to it. But in the end, it was the headline, the right headline, that mattered, not the story behind it. And it is a shameful example of media gone awry in the pursuit of realizing a fallacious dream.

Like all forms of fraud on behalf of women this ultimately hurts them.

Someday, the inevitable will happen, and a woman will emerge as a bona fide hero on wheels. But once the public has been taken through so many more rounds ala Jessica Lynch and Kimberly Munley, she will only be taken with a grain of salt.

And that will be insanely attributed to sexism against women, which the media will gladly, and redundantly, report.

Who are River Smith and Heidi Raynor and What Kind of Cult are They Running?

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Complaints are currently being filed with the state of Ohio against the owners and operators of the internet website known as allaboutcounseling.com.

These events began as an almost routine story about a mental health advocacy website spreading disinformation about domestic violence that demonizes men, denies male victims and shields female perpetrators.

And while the disinformation is there in abundance, more digging behind the scenes at allaboutcounseling.com revealed what appears to be gross professional misconduct and an ongoing scheme involving psychological extortion, abuse and depraved indifference. Multiple sources have alleged that the site management is preying on and manipulating site users for cash with the finesse and brio reminiscent of a corrupt televangelist operation.

And they are reportedly heaping a plethora of emotional abuses and threats on site users who speak up against it.

All of this is being conducted under the auspices of mental health advocacy; with the professional blessings (and under the state license number) of a clinical psychologist.

The details of this story have the expected intricacies and complications of most scandals, especially with the efforts that the alleged perpetrators have made to disconnect their names from their actions. But the scam runs something like this:

Allaboutcounseling.com runs a members only on-line forum in which individuals are invited to join and participate for the benefit of “Confronting fears, honest feedback and active growth through the use and benefits of anonymity and healthy communication.”

Users are made to believe that there interactions there are completely anonymous and conducted in an environment where it is safe to be openly vulnerable and to disclose intimate details of problems in their lives.

For some this seems to be the case.

But many former site users are saying that frequently what happens there is markedly different. In fact, after a month long study of the site and several interviews with former ACC members, I found the reports too consistent to be ignored.

In what appears to be a systematic pattern of significant abuses, the site management presents professional psychological qualifications, induces users to rely on the forum as a source of peer and arguably professional support, but subsequently acts toward many of the members with the following:

- Banning users without notice, reason and without a referral to other help.
- Redirecting banned users to pornography websites when they attempt to log on.
- Tacit email threats to expose users identities publicly for dissenting from site management
- Site management “diagnosing” members with personality disorders as a reaction to dissent.
- Regularly threatening members who depend on the site forum to close it unless money is donated.
- Encouraging the abuse of most male members and abusively targeting female members who had congenial communications with males.
- Fomenting conflict between forum members and encouraging some individuals to abuse others.

In fact, as I studied reports of the abuses from some of the sites former members, the picture that clearly emerged was that of tactics used by cult leaders to control and manipulated their followers. Or, as one member, who requested anonymity, put it, “I felt that it was abusive because of the way it chummed vulnerable, trusting people who came to the site, and drew them in to a charmer/abuser codependency cult."

This same member, after posting that she felt the instigated conflict helped the hit count of the site was reportedly told publicly by site management that she was "delusional, sick and paranoid."

Another member, again speaking on the condition of anonymity, reported being banned from the site without notification and then being redirected to a pornography site when he attempted to log on.

Part of his reaction to this, taken from a statement which is available in the comments section at avoiceformen.com, was unsettling. "I had always respected the site coordinator," he said, "but after she did this to me I was sad to say the least. I was hurt. I felt deeply betrayed, humiliated and abused."

Another former member reported that she too was redirected to a pornography site after being banned from the forum.

And yet another member reported getting an email from site management that repeatedly demeaned her, and made multiple references to her location, number of children and her profession. This was interpreted as a veiled threat to reveal her identity or worse. And it is of particular concern because there are many members who have joined the allaboutcounseling.com forum for support when escaping abusive relationships in which they were or are being stalked.

Such a breech of confidence in those situations could have disastrous results.

On the surface, some of this behavior may appear part and parcel to the internet. There is a lot of flaming going on, and capricious site administration is hardly rare. It happens on a lot of websites. But this isn't just a lot of websites. It is a site that proffers, with professional credibility, to extend support to people at highly vulnerable moments in their lives. Indeed, it beckons them to participate throughout most pages on the site and assures them they are in a safe environment.

These actions not only reflect a moral deficit, but are likely in violation of the State of Ohio's rules and regulations governing professional counselors, the American Psychological Associations Code of Conduct, and various other state laws. This is especially true as site management presents professional credentials, accept money and places no disclaimer whatsoever regarding participation in the forums.

"Site management" is most likely better identified as Heidi Raynor, M.Ed., who in her bio claims to be an experienced counselor with two years of individual counseling experience, but lists no license information or professional references.

She also apparently doubles in the site forum as "Site Coordinator or "SC" as users refer to her. Raynor herself never openly makes the admission that she is SC, but in several posts, SC claims ownership of the site and solicits for donations regularly. Those donations have to be made payable directly to Raynor and are to be mailed to her home address at 4227 W. 15th, Cleveland, Ohio.

Raynor states in her solicitations that checks must be made out to her personally, and not to allaboutcounseling.com, leaving the speculation open to whether or not she is claiming the income when filing taxes.

But Raynor is not acting alone. According to information provided on the site, the content on allaboutcounseling.com was authored by River Smith, Ph.D.. Further investigation revealed that Smith is an Ohio based clinical psychologist who practices under Ohio State license number 4658, at 11206 Clifton Blvd., Cleveland, Ohio tel. 216-651-1302

According to information received from a source at the State Board of Psychology of Ohio, Dr. Smith's presence as one of the creators of that site, and the provision of his license number, inextricably ties him to the conduct and practices of it's managers, whether that conduct comes directly from Dr. Smith or not.

And under those circumstances, that translates legally to the site and everyone who manages it being subject to all applicable statutes and codes of conduct for that profession.

Most of Smith's role appears to be providing content related to mental health issues, making him the direct source of the misleading statistics and disinformation. But also by attaching his credentials to a site that is taking money, he puts his license on the line for any improprieties and ethical violations that transpire.

It also raises the significant question of whether the site is, in reality, an online psychology practice. Early information from the state of Ohio suggests that it is, though there will not be a final determination on this until complaints about the site have been investigated by officials in Ohio.

According to several of the former members of the site, Dr. Smith may be in direct violation of several statutes that govern the practice of psychology in that state. These include, but are not limited to the following:

- Failure to report sexual abuse of children to authorities (there were several posts by members that reported their children being abused)
- Failure to report physical abuse of children
- Failure to report suicide threats by members
- Children being allowed to log on and read detailed and sexually explicit accounts of other members lives.
- Domestic abuse reports ignored by site management
- Questionable solicitations for money
- Presentation of misleading information
- Proffering false counseling qualifications

Regarding the child molestations, according to a source at the Ohio State Board of Psychology, psychologists are mandated to report knowledge of child abuse to authorities and it makes no difference that the reports were received online, nor does it matter that the reports came from anonymous sources. Discovery of the sources is a police matter, not one for the psychologist to undertake or even be concerned with. Their mandate under state law is to report these incidents immediately.

There is no evidence that any reports with police were filed, meaning that a licensed psychologist and another individual claiming to be a professional counselor knew or should have known that children were being abused and did nothing but ask for more money.

At the time this article goes live, at least two and perhaps more individuals are compiling complaints against allaboutcounseling.com which will be filed with The Ohio State Board of Psychology and The American Psychological Association. This summary and a copy of the complaints will also be forwarded to the Ohio State Attorney General's Office for consideration.

When I first brought this story to avoiceformen.com and mensnewsdaily.com, I also forwarded it to about two hundred psychotherapists that supported the site by listing their services there and by purchasing an enhanced presence in the site directory.

To their credit, several of those clinicians directed allaboutcounseling.com to remove their listings. Most did not, however, and did not respond to my emails. Their practice information is listed below.

Once the complaints with the named agencies and the State Attorney General have been filed, an update will be provided regarding this matter. And in the update, I will begin exploring how the practice of "feminist therapy" has naturally led to such abuses of ethics and hopefully what can be done to stop it.

A list of over 200 psychotherapists, counselors, social workers and psychologists that list their services at allaboutcounseling.com is available at the Men's News Daily article here.

[Update: While the state of Ohio has not yet taken any action on the complaints, all information and reference to River Smith has been removed from the site, as has all information on the other individuals who manage and maintain allaboutcounseling.com. Just like cockroaches when the lights go on.]

Supermom, Supermyth

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Women often lament the state of their modern identity. Every woman is expected to be Wonder Woman; the successful professional, harlot and homemaker for their husbands; the perfect mom, heroine to the children they bear. They are victims of dichotomous demands that pull them in different directions and that sometimes threaten to pull them apart.

It's a sympathetic and unfortunate reality, and one that society imposed on women, despite their complaints, at the behest, indeed insistence, of women themselves. At least enough of them to effect sweeping change.

Modern feminism is the feminism of choices, is it not? And haven't women by and large demanded compliance with that agenda? Women, most of them, understandably want the freedom to choose their path in life, whether that path is of financial pursuit or the path of family or some frequently complicated combination of both. And society, as it always does with women, accommodates these demands. But while we succeeded in opening doors, we cannot and never will be able to provide an out for the responsibilities and pressures that come with such a menu of options.

Indeed, the only way to reduce the pressure is to reduce the number of options themselves, and we aren't going to squeeze that particular glob of toothpaste back into the tube.

The great writer/philosopher Kahlil Gibran wrote:

Much of your pain is self-chosen. It is the bitter potion by which the physician within you heals your sick self. Therefore trust the physician and drink his remedy in silence and tranquility.

A hundred million other people put it even more succinctly.

Be careful what you ask for, you just might get it.

And so now women have gotten what they wanted, or claimed to want. And as in so many other areas it brings them a step closer to the world of men, but only in the abstract; only on the surface.

Men, too, are becoming like stressed rope in the tug-o-war of gender identity, though they never collectively asked for it. Today's man is called on to be, as much as any woman, all things at once. He is expected to be the warrior standing in harms way, ready to kill and die for our protection and often for less noble causes. He's also the empathetic counselor with the unending patience to listen and accept; the provider for a home but not it's leader; the teacher of ideas and ideals, but only those that pass feminine muster.

He is the savior, the pin cushion, the straining back of labor and the sponge for our social scorn. He is the powerless servant reviled for having too much power; the identified problem and the secret solution. And he is always, *always*the one we induce to act when the Ultimate Sacrifice is required.

These splintered expectations of men were not a result of choices, but of obligations; not an escape from their gender role, but proof of men being inextricably chained to it.

And as laudable as are any efforts toward equalitarianism, the seemingly mirrored struggle of men and women with identity is not evidence of progress to that end, but an indicator that we are going in the wrong direction.

For in the final analysis, women are complaining about the stresses the come with freedom and men are remaining silent about the burdens that come with servitude and expectation.

Equality is an impossible yet noble objective. It is something we strive for knowing it can't be accomplished. It would behoove us to pursue such unobtainable objectives with at least some measure of thoughtfulness. To date, we haven't done so well in that department.

But we will come perhaps a small step closer to that unreachable finish line when men are routinely encouraged to voice their frustrations with the twisting, often clashing demands of social pressure.

Or, when women are routinely encouraged to stop.

VAWA- Corrupt Law and Joe Biden's Abusive Sister

The Associated Press recently reported that on Tuesday, September 29th women's groups gathered at the home of Vice President Joe Biden to celebrate the 15th anniversary of The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), legislation authored by then Senator Biden aimed at ending violence against women.
The party also signaled an opening day of sorts, as during the month of October the calendar will host the 22nd annual Domestic Violence Awareness Month. October 1st is the Black Friday in the Domestic Violence version of the Christmas shopping season. Women's advocates will be reminding us of the plight of women at the hands of men that has no end, politicians will be supportive, delivering bombastic speeches replete with whatever unscreened statistics are provided to them by their handlers, and most importantly, the money raised and momentum gained will serve proponents well as we head toward VAWA reauthorization in 2010.

In other words, it will be another 31 days of fundraising, fanaticism and fraudulence; another month in which America and the western world is misinformed on an epic scale, all in the name of perpetuating the myth that the ill effects of domestic violence is a "girls only" club and that draconian legislation is the only answer.

And each year at this time men's rights activists increasingly struggle to offer up the facts against the tsunami of slanted statistics. Those facts are simple and unassailable. Women are as violent or more violent than men in relationships. Men severely under report being victims of violence in the home due to social shaming, lack of services and the propensity of police to arrest and incarcerate whatever male is in the home, regardless of who made the assault or called for help. And there is mounting evidence that women over (falsely) report due to incentives offered them by VAWA and family courts. Many illegal aliens have used provisions of VAWA to commit immigration fraud by falsely alleging domestic abuse.

The facts around domestic violence point to the unavoidable conclusion that VAWA is legislation rooted not only in sexism, but in an ill-conceived agenda that severs men from rights and recourse with the crushing legal efficacy of Dred Scott.

Individuals who follow these issues will see further dissection of the nuts and bolts of VAWA as the month progresses. But there is another area seldom explored that might possibly explain actual motive for the legislation to begin with.

One might be pressed to wonder why, with 835,000 men a year being victimized by violent partners, would Joe Biden conjure up a mammoth piece of legislation that outright denies that reality? Why, after being trained with VAWA funding, do police arrest men almost exclusively in domestic disputes where many of those men are either acting in self defense, or are in fact the sole victims of the abuse?

The answer may be in Biden's childhood, as he was himself a male victim of violence in the home.

According to Biden's own words his sister regularly beat him in his childhood and adolescence. "And I have the bruises to prove it," he said, at a senate hearing on violence against women, December 11, 1990. To make sure the audience knew this wasn't a joke, he added, "I mean that sincerely. I am not exaggerating when I say that."

As with any victim of abuse, even with the Vice President of the United States, it is imperative to consider the long lasting psychological impact, especially given how the abuse was delivered.

In Biden's brief tell-all, he acknowledged that the beatings he received were condoned and sanctioned by his parents, and that he was prevented from defending himself; That he was literally, in fact, powerless to make the abuse stop.

"In my house," he stated, "being raised with a sister and three brothers, there was an absolute. It was a nuclear sanction, if under any circumstances, for any reason –even self defense– you ever touched your sister, not figuratively, literally."

"My sister, who is my best friend, my campaign manager, my confidante," he continued, "grew up with absolute impunity in our household."

In these disturbing revelations, Biden offers us a glimpse into a tragically dysfunctional and abusive family. The rules he describes are clear. His sister was granted license to terrorize and abuse him over a period of years while the family strong-armed him into the role of her designated punching bag. This was maintained under the threat of a "nuclear sanction" if he dared attempt to defend himself or stop the beatings.

One has to infer parental enabling and complicity in Joe Biden's childhood tragedy, either through chosen indifference to what was happening, or by outright collusion in the abuse. Whatever the failings of his parents, it resulted in the systematic degradation of a defenseless child.

These are disclosures better suited for the therapists office than the senate floor.

And indeed some form of counseling for Biden might have gone a long way. It could have even prevented the wholesale abuses of the legislation Biden authored that more resembles a reenactment of his family dysfunction –women operating with impunity while men are held under threat– than a legitimate effort to address domestic violence, which all the evidence demonstrates it is not.

Consider what mental health professionals now say about the psychological consequences of repeated childhood abuse.

From the book, Traumatic Stress- The Effects of Overwhelming Experience on Mind, Body and Society, edited by Bessel A. van der Kolk, Alexander C. Macfarlane and Lars Weiseath, comes the following, well researched conclusion.

"Many traumatized people become involved in social situations that bear a striking similarity to the context in which they were first traumatized. Freud thought that the aim of such repetitions was to gain mastery, but clinical experience shows that this rarely happens; instead, repetition causes further suffering for the individual or for other people in their surroundings."

That this phenomena could manifest itself in the monumentally larger scale of government and politics is not outside possibility, nor the speculation of historians and mental health practitioners.

Alice Miller, Ph.D., in her meticulously documented book, For Your Own Good, aptly describes how the autocratic (dysfunctional) nature of the turn of the century German family played a pivotal role in the occurrence of Nazi atrocities during the Hitler regime. She bolsters the point about Hitler personally in an article in which she wrote "The Fuhrer once told his secretary that during one of the regular beatings given to him by his father, he was able to stop crying, to feel nothing, even to count the thirty-two blows that were received"

It was part of what Miller called "The concealed concentration camp of childhood," and she postulates the possibility that it was this element of Hitler's upbringing that resulted in an individual detached enough from human suffering to order the torture and death of millions.

Whether part or all of this applies to the actions of Vice President Biden is a matter of pure conjecture. But there are two things that are not in dispute. One, by his own words, Joe Biden was raised in an environment of systemic abuse that was enforced by family dictates that eviscerated his personal safety and forced him, under duress, to submit.

And two, Joe Biden grew up to author legislation that has the same net effect on millions of innocent men. Indeed, he does this with his primary abuser at his side, guiding his political success.

Any attempt to easily insert the word 'coincidence' here defies reason. So it may well be that with VAWA we are not fighting a plague of domestic violence but the simply and sadly the demons of Joe Biden's abusive childhood.

And it boggles the mind to consider that the scars of his unfortunate youth will result not in lessons learned about real abuse, but only in more damage to many, many more innocent people.

Libertarians Hear, But Stay Silent

As the American political scene increasingly takes on the shape of an ideological war zone, we are witnessing the emergence of countless born again constitutionalists that are railing against business as usual in Washington. And it's little wonder since both political parties seem to be engaged in speed trials on shredding the constitution, even as they compete for the hearts, minds and wallets of the voters.

The Libertarian Party has gained some valuable real estate in the shifting political landscape and is riding a modest but growing wave of support among the disenfranchised and disheartened electorate. It's an offshoot partly of the Ron Paul Revolution, promising a restoration of America to its constitutional ideals and a return to the fundamental liberties embodied in our great constitution.

The question is, is this revolution real, or is it just more antics by political hacks scamming votes and bucks off the citizenry, as the nation continues to decline?

While the rhetoric from the new wave seems genuine, some the realities simply point to more shenanigans as usual.

In an article on Men's News Daily "No Large Men's Groups?" September 22, 2009, Men's Rights Activist, Angry Harry pointed to the problem of "self serving government" and how the political system benefits from profitable, woman-centered programs and ignores men's programs because they are not so economically viable.

In response to Harry's piece, Eric Dondero, publisher of The Libertarian Republican submitted the following comment.

"There are a handful of us bloggers on the right that do see a connection between the men's rights agenda and the libertarian/conservative agenda. Not all of us have a closed ear to the concerns of the men's rights movement."

Heartened by this statement, I went to the Libertarian Republican hoping to see some column space that supported Dondero's claim and lent support to men's initiatives, or that hopefully even acknowledged them.

I might as well have been looking for icebergs in Arizona.

In a review of the last two months of their archives there is no reference to men's issues at all. A keyword search on the site yielded the following results, as of this writing.

Men's rights- No returns

Fathers rights- No returns

VAWA- No returns

Family Court- Bingo! We have a winner!

Oh, but wait.

The single return for family court was an article supporting Fahtima Rifqa Bary, the seventeen year old girl from Gahanna, Ohio who told the world she ran away to Florida because her Father was going to murder her for converting to Christianity. It's a claim that she maintains despite the fact that three separate law enforcement investigations found that no such threat ever existed, and despite the fact her father, the Muslim "extremist," allowed her to be a high school cheerleader, dancing in shorts in front of cheering crowds, and knew about her Christian conversion a long time before she ran away.

By all reasonable indications, this is just another case of false allegation by a woman against a man, only with an Islamic twist. And it sheds about as much light on men's issues as Ms. Magazine, except to the extent that we get yet another lesson that in the world of politics. Even with the libertarians, it's still about the great partisan divide; about Muslim and Christian, conservative and liberal, right and left, but not right and wrong. And it sure as hell isn't about constitutional values.

This problem pervades the Libertarian Party as much as it does Republicans and Democrats. And it is symptomatic of the political cowardice that infests the American body politic, libertarians included. They rail on about our loss of rights, but conspire to servile silence the moment the issues of men are raised, or worse, as in the Bary case, capitulate and abandon even the most fundamental respect for innocence until guilt is proven.

Perhaps they are just gagging on their own tea bags.

Right now this country is inhabited by millions of men that have been stripped of their property and assets, restricted in their movements, severed from their homes and children and forced into indentured servitude by family courts run amok. It is the greatest collective violation of civil rights since slavery itself, and none of these would be emulators of the founding fathers have the resolve to open their mouths and speak out about it.

Not one of them.

Instead, they have joined with the D's and R's, colluding to placate the implacable enemies of freedom that practice an all but unrestrained tyranny on men and boys. They cry foul at comparatively minor indignities but look the other way and whistle when the worst losses of liberty are mentioned.

They boisterously bash Biden for committing money to Amtrak, but become a mischief of church mice when the same man commits heinous attacks on the freedom of men in their own homes through acts like VAWA.

Our founding fathers risked imprisonment and death to unshackle us from the chains of tyranny. These men hide from opinion polls and angry wives. It is enough to make Thomas Payne scream, even in his current condition.

Harry had it right. One of the biggest reasons that men's issues remain cloaked in the blackness of a great political void is because there isn't a buck or an elected office or a cushy government job to be had from speaking up and doing something about it.

It will take real men to get the job done, but as anyone should be able to see by now, they won't be men with an R or a D or even an L behind their name. Buying into the lesser of evils mentality of one party over the other is just a pipe dream for the hopelessly polemic; those with more interest in playing the game-as-usual than in the actual outcome.

But with time, men with more guts and less tendency to be cowed by disapproval will rise to this task. And when they do, they will do for the culture what most men won't currently do for themselves.

ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM- All About Misandry

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Most of the mental health related “helping professions” e.g., psychotherapists, social workers, psychologists and counselors, have a code of ethics that guides their professional conduct. They are sworn, supposedly at the risk of their professional licenses, to follow the ethical mandates of that code in regard to how they conduct their practices and in their relationships with clients.

The rules require them to maintain objectivity, to offer accurate information to the best of their ability and to act in their clients’ best interests at all times.

Failing to do this is considered professional abuse and is subject to sanctions. In most places, professionals are admonished to take all this into account regarding their professional affiliations as well.

In other words, aligning themselves with other professionals or organizations that act to the detriment of those ethical standards is strictly forbidden.

Why then, one must wonder, are there so many therapists that get client referrals though the website that operates under the name ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM?

ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM is on the surface a simple referral resource for helping people find mental health services, and for connecting mental health professionals to possible clients.

What is disturbing is that the site doubles as a tool for the political indoctrination of it’s visitors. They weave information on mental health services with a pro-feminist and overtly anti-male agenda, and target that message at people who are logically presumed to be at highly vulnerable points in their lives.

ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM quotes statistics on issues like rape, sexual abuse, domestic violence and even alleged wage gap information that are wildly inaccurate and misleading, much of it without the benefit of research sources. Most of this information has been thoroughly debunked by sound and unbiased research so its presence on the site can only be interpreted as calculated to deceive.

For example, the site states that half of all marriages experience domestic violence, a complete falsehood. The Centers for Disease Control puts the percentage at less than one quarter, and many other valid studies point to even less frequency.

The site erroneously claims throughout it’s information pages that it is almost exclusively women that are the victims of that violence and that the small fraction on women who are violent only act violently in self defense.

Women who are victims of violence are a serious problem, but they won’t be protected or assisted by propaganda that is designed more to indoctrinate than to help. And this is where ethical violations are quite clear.

ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM proffers a redundant message that demonizes men, and paints women as victims in every way imaginable. And intertwined with their entire body of false statistics and misleading statements are pitches for feminism, dangling the philosophy like a carrot before clients as an integral part of the overall mental health picture.

Think about what this means. People come to the website, usually in enough emotional pain to make them vulnerable and impressionable, and rather than offering an objective, truthful and beneficial doorway into improved living, the authors of the site exploit that pain and vulnerability in order to further their own political agenda.

What would you think of a psychotherapist who implies to their clients that some of the solutions to their emotional problems are to be found in the Republican Party? How about a solution that tells people that saving the environment will also save their marriage?

That is precisely the approach taken by ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM

Political organizations and philosophies are not considered a form of mental health treatment by caring, objective and competent professionals. In fact, the truly professional and skilled in the field would never associate themselves with such practices.

This insanity needs to end, and that starts with the professionals who list their services in the ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM directory.

Following is a list of said clinicians from the state of California, with their names and contact information as listed in the directory.

I will start with them, sending them an email together with an explanation of why they should divest themselves from ALLABOUTCOUNSELING.COM

It is hard to know how many of them are aware of the breeches in ethics on the site, but they will certainly be aware of those breeches after being contacted. They have only to evaluate their own involvement and make the ethical decision that their own evaluation will foster.

If they choose to remain listed, they should be ashamed of themselves, and should not bemoan the considerable and exhaustive efforts I will personally undertake to expose their activities.

APA- Virginia Tech Was a 'Guy Thing'

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On April 16th, 2007 Seung-Hui Cho went on a shooting rampage at Virginia Polytechnic and State University killing 32 people, committing the deadliest incident of its kind in American history.

In the aftermath, as the nation struggled for answers, fingers were pointed everywhere, mostly at campus security failures and gun control. Though many would agree that little can be done to prevent the actions of a mad man, the resultant scrutiny was understandable.

Well, most of it.

Unfortunately, in the polemically charged atmosphere of gender politics it was more or less predictable that men themselves would eventually become the target of blame. Usually we can depend on the likes of N.O.W., or by proxy a feminist academic to seize the opportunity and insert some sound bites into the media, covering men with a blanket of shared culpability.

That may well have happened, but they didn't need to put forth the effort on this one. The American Psychological Association (APA), acting as sycophantic sock puppets for the feminist orthodoxy, toted that barge, and did so quite well.

In a statement issued by the APA's Division 51, Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSSM) signed by president Mark Stevens, Ph.D., they conclude, "Therefore, although most men aren't violent, most violent people are men who were influenced by exaggerated notions of masculinity…"

Let's start with the first word. "Therefore" indicates a certainty based on previously offered evidence. Their "evidence," in this case, consists of pointing to the fact that mass murderers are nearly 100% men. And that's true unless you consider the tide of female suicide bombers or the numbers of Black Widow Killers that marked their lives and fortunes by how many husbands they put in the grave. Or unless you also consider the numbers of women that have snuffed the life out of their children.

They also point to the fact that most violent crime is committed by men. And of course there is no mention of the real explanation for this either. They just sort of let the reader infer that it comes with chest hair and an addiction to a remote control.

Since the intelligentsia at the APA won't bother you with thoughtful analysis, let me see what I can do to help.

Violent crime is usually the conduct of people on the lower end of the intelligence scale. Women and men are roughly of equal intelligence, but the bell curve in the distribution of intelligence scores makes two things vividly clear. On one end of that curve there are many more male geniuses than female, and on the other end there are many more low functioning males than females. It is why men dominate the sciences, and it's also why prisons are crowded with aggressive men that aren't very bright.

Men commit most of the violent crimes for the same reason that men created every significant technological advance in human history. It all boils down to how and where intelligence, or a lack of it, is concentrated in the general population. In that, masculinity won't be helped till the day comes that really ingenious men figure out a way to make the less intelligent men smarter.

Only the influence of hidden agendas can spin that one into the pathetically misguided realm of gender socialization.

The rest of the "evidence" they offered is based on a very narrow analysis of domestic violence, in which they pointed only to the murders of women by partners and ex-partners. They ignored that fact that women do kill men, and also side stepped the reality that women are more likely than men to physically attack their partners, including with the use of weapons.

So we must go back to SPSSM's use of the word "therefore." Actually we need to delete it. Non sequiturs and false conclusions don't teach us diddley. It is an insult to even the remotely scientific minded.

Consider Andrea Yates, the Texas mother who waited till she was alone with her children so no one could stop her, and then dragged them, one at a time, kicking and screaming and pleading for their lives into the bathroom and drowned them.

Now let's apply SPSSM's embarrassingly poor style of judgment and come to a conclusion about women in general, acknowledging in advance the act that women are responsible for the lions share of child homicides and violence toward children in the home.

Therefore, though most women don't kill their children, most child killers are women, who were influenced by exaggerated notions of femininity.

As absurd as that sounds, it is every bit as valid as the statement on masculinity by SPSMM. Which is to say it has no validity at all. It's pure gobbledygook, and it reveals SPSSM and the APA itself not as valid advocates for their mental health disciplines, but just another extension of misandrist academia; a women's studies product with a fake beard painted on it.

It is no wonder that the mainstay of their mission statement is more about ingratiating themselves to feminists than it is about improving the lives of men and boys.

They also argue, though, as most feminist ideologues do, that the core of the problem goes to male socialization; that males are taught to limit their emotions to anger and not to seek help. And in that they do indeed come close to one actually cogent idea, except for the fact that they of course stop short of the whole picture on this and remain in their cozy paradigm of myopic masculinity.

The insane emphasis on male strength and power is a result of the insane requirement for male disposability. As long as men are designated as biologically determined and expendable human appliances, to be used and discarded for the benefit of women and children, we will have unfeeling men.

And most importantly, we will have women that are attracted to them, for that mechanical heart is the one that offers the most protection and provision.

If there is anything there that is in need if repair, it is both sexes. And it will start by raising our sons with the idea that it is not their job to take responsibility for the lives of women.

But I won't ever expect ideas like that to grace the pages of SPSSM's website. They are much to busy reducing 100,000 years of biological and social evolution to feminist sound bites.

And they do it to the exclusion of all reason.

The most egregious example of just how sexist and indifferent to the truth these people are can be found in the following from their statement:

"There is a tendency to see violent tragedies like the one at Virginia Tech as solely the product of a disturbed individual, rather than as the interaction of individual factors within a gendered culture. Clearly there is a need to examine and redefine what it means to be masculine and men in the U.S.A.."

Seung-Hui Cho had been getting mental health treatment since he was in middle school. Not long before the shooting one of the faculty urged him to get counseling. He clearly was a disturbed individual and had been his whole life. His actions were tragic, considerably more disturbing even than the incompetence emanating from the APA.

But with his last pull of the trigger, the murderer removed any future threat he might be. Not so for the APA that remains, ready and willing to help us do anything but find answers.

Feminism can easily be described as an ongoing dialogue on what's wrong with men. And now the APA, supposedly invested in enlightening the world, offers it's own take on what's wrong with men.

Isn't it about time we had a dialogue on what's wrong with this picture?

To Man Up or Stand Down

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Among the many emails I get that don't support men's rights or don't support my take on them, a hefty number of them are from men who take issue with the idea of other men shedding traditional masculine expectations and going their own way.

The common theme among those emails is a short lecture on what men are supposed to do; replete with sonny-lemme-tell-ya-what-it-means-to-be-a-real-man instructions. Most of them are written with enough swagger and brio to make John Wayne sport a proud, if grossly posthumous smile.

And curiously, many of the concordant emails I get from women totally miss the point. I just read one from a woman who lauded my work against feminism because she lamented the loss of days when a man "knew how to treat a lady."

Apparently she thought my objection to feminism was because it kept me off a white horse. She assumed I am engaged in a fight to protect my right to sacrifice, like a real man. A glaring misunderstanding, but she did provide an opportune segway for the correct question.

What if a man doesn't want to?

When all is said and done, this is the question that speaks to the heart of a growing voice, not just in the world of Men's Rights Activists, but in the world of men collectively. And it is the first of many questions that are sure to form tempests of debate and ire in the coming years.

Should men break with tradition? And in that should they quit expecting themselves to be the financers and custodial protectors of women's lives? Should they quit paying for dates? Should they refuse assignment to the role of breadwinner? Are men supposed to be congenital bodyguards, socially and biologically indentured in a world where women no longer need such protection? Indeed, we now live in a world where it is men that increasingly need protection- from women, as is clear in family courts, the workplace, universities -think Duke- and frequently their own homes.

The answers to these questions, which are, like it or not, relevant now, require some intellectual scrutiny that won't be found in myopic edicts like "Be a real man." In fact, I'd argue that anyone issuing such proclamations needs to take a more lucid look at the world in which they live.

Women don't have roles any more, except as they choose to take them on. Even then, they can change that role fluidly depending on whether they are vying for a promotion or sitting with a man in a restaurant when the dinner check arrives. Feminists and flat tires are seldom in each others company, so women don't really so much have roles as they have a choice as to which role benefits them at the moment.

Perhaps carte blanche for opportunism is a better way to put it.

It is the new, but no longer sparklingly new social doctrine of equality-plus. Women now enjoy a range of options that men could not possibly dream of. They have been granted equal and often preferential entrance into the realm of financial opportunity and independence while social mandates still leaves the door wide open for them to do what they have historically done, e.g., draw sustenance and enhanced lifestyle from the sweat and labor of men.

It's the net result of feminist doctrine and men's complicity in it; a paradigm not of parity, but of parasitism; a Kafkaesque realm for men where they are bludgeoned with messages of their uselessness to women, often while being bled dry by them.

This isn't to cast men as victims of women. All this is enabled, lock, stock and barrel, by men rigidly maintaining their traditional roles, giving women whatever they ask for by rote. By practicing chivalry like a crack habit, and by excoriating other men for not doing same.

In fact, were it not for men engaging in this mindless form of collective patricide, feminism would have been deservedly quashed at least thirty years ago. Real men would not have tolerated all this nonsense for a minute.

The catch-22 of this affair, however, is glaringly obvious. The traditional mindset, previously more tempered by reason, has served as the foundation of stable families and adjusted children for countless generations. It is indeed an area where expressions like the fabric of our society and backbone of our civilization are not just tired and overused metaphors, but spot on descriptions of reality.

That, in and of itself, might appear to be a sound reason for men to just shut up, shovel and sacrifice; to labor for what has worked in the past as though the last 40 years never happened. But that is the problem. The last 40 years actually did happen. That toothpaste is already out of the tube, and much more likely than not trying to squeeze it back in is a noble and pathetically fruitless task.

It is not that traditional roles can't work. They can for a waning few; those willing to find their way to each other though the modern morass of traditions in a world largely stripped of them. But it is a gamble with Las Vegas odds and therefore should be a choice, and one that doesn't include a license for risk takers to place a proscription on alternatives for those more survival minded.

As long as we deny men choices that women are allowed to take for granted, we will continue to see men marginalized and exploited. As the New York Times just reported, it is possible that for the first time in history that in America women will surpass men in the workforce. And that right soon.

It is a picture consistent with men's drastically decreasing presence in higher education and punctuated by their suffering the lions share of job losses in the bad economy.

And men are to continue to sacrifice for women and protect them? There are still plenty who say yes. But then there are plenty who think Elvis is still alive.

When enough men find themselves paying for dinner with a gainfully employed woman with money from their unemployment checks, there will likely be a lot more men, at the very least, saying:

"Hey, wait a minute."

That would be one giant step in the right direction.

In what has become a more or less common turn of events, the female Hofstra University student that accused five men, including one classmate, of gang raping her in a school dormitory bathroom has recanted the charges. That's legal and media speak for admitting she cheapened herself by taking on five men willingly on a men's room floor and lied about it later out of what little capacity for shame she had.

I suppose, I say yawning, that this is the time for outrage. And there are plenty of reasons for it, starting with Nassau Police Detective John Allen, commander of the special victims squad. Allen announced in a press conference that the men had tricked the 18 year old woman into coming to a dorm by taking her cell phone.

"Clearly," he said, "I think the cell phone was taken to lure her away from the crowd to do her harm."

And of course, in the Nassau Police Department as in so many others, "Clearly" means she said so.

And next we have Nassau County District Attorney Kathleen Rice. After releasing four of the men from jail (the fifth was still being hunted down), Rice issued a statement that a criminal investigation would be conducted but that no decision had been made as to whether to file charges against the woman.

Rice already has more evidence of an actual crime committed by the woman than she did against the four men that were incarcerated. Which is to say that she didn't have any evidence against them at all save a single allegation. And she is waiting now for what, the fair application of justice? Due process? Her next hair appointment?

I guess we can also save some indignation for when, over the next few days, stories of the woman's mental health issues and other reasons emerge to soften her treatment. This will happen, regardless of the DA's decision on whether to prosecute, and it will be used to lessen the consequences, if any, for what the woman did.

After all, we shouldn't imperil the future of a woman simply for committing a possible felony that lead to the false imprisonment and public humiliation of four innocent men.

And I suppose that there should be some ire directed at the media, who continue to print the names of the men but not their disgraced accuser, hiding the name of the only real criminal in the story. Her name will come out now, but only after the search engines bring back a few thousand returns on the names of the men.

There should be too, I assume, and yawning again, a fair amount of finger pointing at feminists who pushed for and got these insane rape shield laws, resulting in so many travesties of justice, so many lives ruined.

Truth tell, though, when I read what one of the accused had to say about the matter, I'd rather focus all my anger at him. In fact, I want to put him back in jail myself and throw away the key.

Upon being released, accused Stalin Felipe had this to say:

"Basically, I have no hard feelings toward her. I don't know why she did it. I don't know her so I don't want to say anything bad about her."

Bottom line is, if this guy wants to give her a pass, why should anyone else give a damn?

And the truth is that this guy is not unlike most men. Even with their neck planted squarely on the guillotine, if a woman's hand is on the lever, the last words of men will likely as not be, "I'm sorry if I get your blade bloody."

Men are, it seems, the greatest masochists of all time. Whatever you do, don't get between a man and an opportunity to excuse a woman for whatever harm she causes to others.

You'll be road kill in a nanosecond.

And that is precisely what men are becoming. They are like dumb animals that wander onto the super highway of gender politics, unable to grasp the concept of speed and Mac Trucks. After getting hit, the ones who don't get squashed flat simply limp off to the shoulder, covering their pain with a smile and saying, “Please, ma’am, may I have another?”

Is this blaming the victim? You better believe it. And it is blame they have coming. Truckloads of it.

I am not going to bother asking. ‘where is the outrage?’ It’s like asking ‘where is the free health care?’ There isn’t much point in pursuing fantasies. I’ll leave that to police departments and DA’s. They have become experts at it.

I know that in the minds of many I am supposed to point to the nobility of men’s desires to protect women at all costs. That is why men continue to remain silent while they are destroyed before each other’s eyes. Yeah, that’s the ticket, it’s the nobility.

Normally, I’d expect feminists to find a way to mistake cowardice for nobility. Such delusions seem more their forte. It’s disgusting to see so many men do it. But such behavior has become part of the modern masculine repertoire. And frankly I am growing weary of men, myself included, protesting modern affairs as long as we are leaving jails and courtrooms like grinning weasels, wearing our disgraces like badges of honor.

Where are the Duke three? Why are they not all over this story? Why aren’t they doing anything to help prevent what happened to them from happening to others?

I’ll tell you where they are. They are busy being men. Which is to say that they are doing nothing at best, doing more damage at worst. It is the same place the Hofstra five will be by early next week. And with that they will join the legions of men wrongfully accused, falsely imprisoned, publicly humiliated and shamefully silent.

The only way that this is going to change is if some shepherds emerge to protect a flock that is incapable of, and unwilling to, protecting itself.

It is going to be a hard job. Not only do the sheep need to be protected from the wolves now stalking them, they have the unfortunate tendency to collude with the wolves themselves, to seek their approval and attention, and to extend to them blanket exonerations, even as the wolves size them up and make dinner plans.

The same sheep also have the insane habit of pushing each other into the line of fire whenever they get the chance. They then stare at the carnage of their dead brothers in front of them, in the words of Don Henley, “uncomprehendingly, like cows at a passing train.”

It reveals a bitter truth that advocating for men is trying to extend the lifespan of lemmings.

And so it isn’t just standing guard for the shepherds, it’s remaining on suicide watch the whole time. And it explains why so many efforts for men to organize and make things happen result in exactly squat. It’s easier to heard snakes with a stick.

Better that a few shepherds go wolf hunting on their own than to take the sheep with them, keeping in mind the whole time that the sheep themselves could be sneaking up behind them.

Concinnity and Conviction

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I learned a new word recently and am now pledged, of course, to use it in a piece as though it's been in my vocabulary since grade school. I even managed to work this one into the title.

Concinnity.

For those of you that this fine word has eluded in the past, as it has me, it means:

Harmony in the arrangement or interarrangement of parts with respect to a whole.

And it would seem to be a word apropos of the times where it involves the men's rights movement, and a concept direly needed.

There seems to be a rift in the movement between proponents of gay marriage and advocates for family values. And I say seems most intentionally, because from the outset this is an erroneous and misleading definition in terms.

Searching high and low, I have found no MRA's that have taken on the cause of promoting gay marriage. They don't exist that I know of, though I could have easily missed something in a movement so comprised of scattered voices.

There are some, like myself, that view it as a non issue and a waste of time. Most of these are MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) minded fellows who are much more worried about the personal and legal hazards of heterosexual marriage than they are the supposed dangers of gay marriage to the culture.

So perhaps we can jump start the walk toward concinnity with a more accurate and honest description of the problem, keeping in mind that there is no absolute and monolithic mindset on either side of the fence.

The rift, if we have one, is between some MGTOW's and some family values advocates. Or to be shorter, and more succinct, those that promote traditional marriage and those who think it should be avoided. In my mind, it is a rift that has been largely manufactured from within our ranks and is purely unnecessary.

Indeed, with some balanced perspective it is easy to see where these two camps complement each other and have the possibility for productive synergy, via concinnity.

First, the very reason that family advocates in the men's rights movement exist is because the institution of marriage has been crippled and reduced to a hazard zone for men and children, and to a lesser degree, for women. The efforts of activists to change this is important and laudable. We will have marriage for some time, and growing numbers of people are losing their freedom, property and family bonds to the state enforced intrusions we now allow.

These would be the same intrusions, by the way, that drive many MRA's to speak out against involvement in the institution in the first place.

Being motivated by the same factors would seem to be a motivation toward concinnity as well, but for reasons beyond my grasp we are in a movement that never seems to miss an opportunity to divide and implode.

I hope eternal it is just growing pains, and in fact believe it is.

And part of the pain of that growth is born from facing honest assessments and taking appropriate action, regardless of how we wish things were, or how we think they ought to be. Advising men to invest in marriage because we are trying to make changes in the laws is like telling people to keep smoking because we are working on a cure for cancer.

The very idea is as unsound as blindfolding men and pointing them toward the mine field with marching orders and an "atta boy," and it sadly reflects an abject indifference to their mangled bodies when inevitable explosions come.

Such are the results when we forget that being a men's rights activist means advocacy for the men themselves, not necessarily the institutions that they have historically served.

And in taking this unfortunate stance we take from the movement what could be the one-two punch against the current paradigm by boycotting marriage and simultaneously pushing for reforms in family law. Instead, in the folly of this divide, we turn that flurry of punches inward, and suffer the self inflicted wounds of infighting.

We rob the movement of the concinnity that could actually result in inertia and momentum, breeding destructive divisions; taking the move out of a movement that has still not found its initial stride.

I will always support work to change family law and to lessen the stranglehold the legal system now has over our parents and children. I consider the men and women who pursue these changes an indispensable asset to the men's rights movement.

I also support men and women who warn of the pitfalls of modern marriage, and caution men in the strongest possible terms to avoid it.

I am one of those with such a message and I won't do much in the future but turn up the volume.

When marriage has been made safe again, the dynamics and the message, at least my message, will change.

Till then, I hope we can see the wisdom in supporting efforts toward change on all fronts, in keeping our fingers off each others throats, and in helping children and men avoid the gallows till some badly needed changes occur.

[dropcap]Y[/dropcap]ears back, in another life, I presented at seminars and conferences that provided continuing education units for professional re-certification. In one particular module, I used a portable grease board in a room in front of my waiting audience. Without introducing myself or saying anything else, I used a grease pen to write the words "Men are…" at the top of the board, and then silently invited the audience to finish the sentence.

Almost invariably, "pigs" or "dogs" was the first offering, accompanied by a room full of good-natured chuckles. I would nod my head and write it down on the board and return to the audience, still silent, for more.

"Controlling," says one. "Afraid of commitment," says another. "Aggressive." "Macho" "Afraid of intimacy." "Violent." "Sexist," and "Power hungry." More of the pejoratives, and almost only pejoratives, would come from the audience till the board was full.

I then flipped the board to the other side. "Women are…" was the cue, and the answers were even more rapid fire than they were with men. "Strong." "Capable" "Empowered" "Sensitive." "Nurturing," and the like would fly from the audience to the grease board like a barrage of arrows, till that side too was full.

"What do you imagine," I would ask, taking a strategic pause for a sip of water, "that these answers tell us about the real nature of sexism in the way we view men and women?"

Asking them a question with actual spoken words must of thrown them for a loop, because the stock response to that question was almost invariably a room full of nonplussed, cognitively dissonant faces. And that confusion usually gave way to irritation, clearly at me, though every answer on both sides of that board had come from them. And by the way, the participants in the crowd? They weren't accountants or nurses or teachers or financial advisors.

They were mental health professionals.

They were counselors, psychotherapists, social workers and the lot; the very people we love to imagine possess the objectivity to rise above the mindset of bigotry and sexism. And the people, despite our want of faith in their work, least likely to actually do it.

I wanted a little more pressure so I asked more questions. "How could this affect our therapeutic alliance with clients?- Could it make our relationships with females enabling?- Punitive with men?" And always, the final question I asked was "Do we carry sexism, against men, unconscious or conscious, into our work with each and every client?" With that question the anger usually intensified.

In one talk, a female participant, a social worker, jumped out of her chair and threw her papers everywhere. "You're the sexist!" she hissed at me, and stormed out of the room. She later wrote letters of complaint both about my topic and the fact I would not sign off on her attendance.

Welcome to the wacky world of mental health.

It is a telling study in the psychology of hate. Indeed, as we peel back the layers of fantasy from the profession, we are forced into a most disturbing conclusion. Psychology is hate. At least as it is practiced in western culture.

It's most evident in the junk psychology market. Since the mid-eighties, get-rich-quick psychology gurus have often made their way to bestseller lists. Books like Robin Norwood's Women Who Love Too Much, Susan Forwards, Men Who Hate Women and the Women Who Love Them and others have been runaway hits, all predicated on rigid stereotypes of men who hate and women who love; all just more additions to the already crowded grease board.

Some time ago Karen Salmansohn appeared in a Fox News segment on women executives. She was given a nice plug for her new book, Bounce Back. They could have, and probably should have in the interest of balance, given her credit for her previous publication, How to Make Your Man Behave in 21 Days or Less Using the Secrets of Professional Dog Trainers. I don't make this stuff up. Unfortunately, I don't have to.

Currently, male bashing monarch Phil McGraw reigns in the ratings, and it won't be long before another emerges, fighting to be top dog in dogging men. All you need is a warped worldview and a nod from Oprah. And these are just the media hucksters. At least we can say that the men and women who embrace their misandry-for-profit schemes are just another dumbed-down group in a dumbed-down media culture.

The more culpable and dangerous are the ones with the air of legitimacy. These folks don't write, or don't just write. They teach, do research, and most dreadfully, hang out their shingles and help infect the world, one gullible client at a time.

The world of psychology in academics and practice has become a weapon in the realm of gender politics. Almost all pretense to objectivity and academic integrity has been forced aside by ideologues with an ax to grind against men and who are using the loathsome disguise of helping professionals to further their agenda. If you think that is extreme, read on.

Allaboutcounseling.com is purportedly an information and referral resource for people seeking mental health services. What it is in reality is a portal, a conduit that induces women into the mentality that it is the vile scourge of manhood at the root of their problems. And they offer feminism as the solution before the first session is booked.

Some tidbits from their site include some detailed hype about the fundamentals of feminism and some reassurances that not all feminists are lesbians. I suppose they figure heterosexual women need such basics. And it's good pre-sell to overcome objections before they are raised. Ask any used car salesman.

They even have a nifty section promoting a new masculinity. These people have the key to re-engineering men for the better, with the implication, of course, that the way men are now is defective and in need of an overhaul.

Part of that overhaul is a gag. This is just one of the standouts, as it appears word for word on the site.

Openness– To others (especially to women) criticism of our behaviors and attitudes, listen, listen some more, and only speak if the critic wants feedback.

This isn't even speak when spoken to. It is shut up and take it. Speak with permission only, from whichever woman is attacking you at the moment. Ah, the finer aspects of mental health.

They have much more there. Enough bogus stats on domestic violence, rape and sexual abuse for a N.O.W. convention, and staunch defenses of feminism tied in directly with the counseling message. Their ultimate point is clearly that sound mental health for women depends on embracing feminism, and with it the hatred for men. Sound advice for those seeking love and intimacy if I ever saw it.

At this point, the grease board is showing more grease than board.

I wish I could say that this was the bottom of the pit; that the infection stopped there, but we are still dealing more with the symptoms than the actual disease.

Enter the American Psychological Association, and it's Division 51 group The Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity. (SPSMM)

Here are two of the bullet points of from the Mission Statement on their home page, out there for the world to see.

- Endeavors to erode constraining definitions of masculinity which have historically inhibited men's development, their capacity to form meaningful relationships, and have contributed to the oppression of other people.
- Acknowledges its historical debt to feminist-inspired scholarship, and commits itself to support groups such as women, gays, lesbians and people of color that have been uniquely oppressed by the gender/class/race system.

Aye, there‘s the rub, and with it goes the last remaining bit of room on the grease board. Men are defective, pernicious banes to civilized society. And feminism is the answer.

Even our most revered experts in human nature are saying as much.

And this is how it worked in the old Soviet Union. It is wise to consider that in the Solzhenitsyn era of gulags and iron fisted reaction to political dissent, that most of the dissidents were imprisoned in “mental health facilities,” the logic being that if you disagreed with the state, there must be something wrong with your mind.

It was also a strategy of, and yes, I will say it without reservation, the Hitler regime, to poison the minds of the populace with disinformation about Jews, prepping the people to look the other way while they were dispatched in the name of a master race.

The plans for men may be less extreme and of longer duration, but it is happening nonetheless. Men are being marginalized year after year. Their numbers in college graduating classes are waning. 42% at last count. They have lost over 80% of the jobs in the current recession. They are dying by suicide and all other manners of death at rates that make women’s lives look like vacations in Fiji.

It’s hell having all this power. It is a wonder how we find time to oppress the world with it, much less twirl our moustaches and snicker while we do it.

But the anti-male hate machine keeps grinding away. Spasm would no doubt classify the MRM as a mass shared psychosis, and MRA’s individually as antithetical to humanity.

I used to remember that social worker who threw the tantrum in my class with a smile. It was a funny image. But that was some years ago. At the time, I knew the sexism was there, but it was not entrenched as deeply as it is today. And I naively thought it would go away.

I am not smiling about it any more.

Gay Marriage- Who Cares?

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It is hard to turn on cable news any more without having your senses assaulted by some ersatz conservative wailing like a bagpipe about the evils of gay marriage.

“We need to stop this from happening,” they say. “Marriage is one man and one woman. God-almighty Hisself said so.” And then there is the obligatory, nauseatingly redundant, “We need to protect the sanctity of the institution.”

Excuse me? The sanctity of the institution?

It makes me wonder if they have a rehab for this type of thinking.

Modern marriage, in case these Einsteins haven’t noticed, has all the sanctity of a ten dollar hooker. Matrimony has devolved into just another throwaway institution in a throwaway culture and it wasn‘t homosexuals that got us here. Nor will it be them that drives the final nail in the coffin.

As usual, we are not facilitating any real understanding with sound bites from talking heads. “One man and one woman,” no more illuminates the problems of modern marriage than nonsense like “my body, my choice,” illuminates the issue of abortion.

Worse yet, as any men’s rights advocate knows, marriage hasn’t been “one man and one woman” for a long time. The reality of the times is that men marry the state they live in. The woman just comes with the deal for a few years. When it’s fini with the woman, things really heat up with the state, shearing the man of his assets and adding a new, bizarre dimension to “till death do us part.”

And allowing gays into this fiasco is going to hurt the institution?

I wish I could corner a couple of these pundits and make them answer some questions. Maybe Hannity, or the anorexic looking chick with stringy bleached hair.

The questions would be simple. Where were you? And what are you doing about it now?

When the feminists pushed for and got no fault divorce, and the divorce rate consequently hit the stratosphere creating legions of dysfunctional, fatherless children, where were you? What are you doing about it now?

When feminist ideology spread like a malicious rumor though the media, academia, government and the culture, demonizing all things masculine and creating the fundamental rift between the sexes that plagues marriage to this day, where were you? What are you doing about it now?

When the family courts started taking Title IV-D money, turning benches into private fiefdoms, profit centers whose stock-in-trade became eviscerating the father-child bond, where were you? What are you doing about it now? And add to that another question. Do you even know what Title IV-D money is and how it makes it’s way from the federal government into family court coffers? Or would that take more information than you can squeeze in between Cialis commercials on Fox News?

Of course, the point is that we already know where these people were and where they are now. They’re in the place they have always been, crawling like roaches over every media news outlet that will call on them to say something profoundly meaningless about profoundly meaningless topics, in the name of plugging profoundly meaningless books.

These vultures want to protect the sanctity of marriage in the same way Courtney Love wants to protect chastity.

And those that caterwaul the loudest about the supposedly sinister prospect of gay marriage are the same ones that can’t stop wagging their tongues about the virtues of constitutional conservatism.

I’m fascinated by people that call themselves limited government conservatives, but sit by complacently like grinning, plastic bobble-heads, as long as the government is enforcing their religious and moral beliefs on the rest of the population.

News flash, that is not conservatism, it's not even a cheap imitation. It's theocracy. Ayatollah style. And it's about as conducive to men's rights as feminism.

I wouldn't be bothered by this all that much if it were contained to media pinheads. I expect them to say a lot and understand little. It's what they get rich doing.

But when I see MRA's espousing this cause célèbre, it puts a spike in my "shoot-yourself-in-the-foot" detector.

Why, for the love of Pete, would men's rights activists seek to protect the sanctity of an institution that is currently the most prolific source of oppressive discrimination against them?

But I see it all the time, from MRA's, rather from patriarchs who think they are MRA's.

Just as theocratic zealots shouldn't confuse themselves with constitutional conservatives, patriarchs shouldn't confuse themselves with MRA's. In this writers opinion, our agendas are diametrically opposed.

Patriarchs want to return to the imagined days of chivalry and glory for men, when they were the heads of their homes and women did the dishes and pretty much anything else they were told. And I used the word imagined for a reason. The idea of days when men held all power and dominion over women never happened. It is just another in a long line of feminist delusions and revisionist history. It is a fantasy that modern patriarchs have swallowed, lending them to wax nostalgic about somebody else's pipe dream. I'm sure it would be a nice world for the control obsessive, but that toothpaste, inasmuch as it never existed, is already out of the tube and is not going to be squeezed back in. And chivalry, in that it hinges on putting women first at the expense of men, has much more in common with feminism than it does with men's rights.

MRA's just want to escape the sexism and bias and treachery involved in marriage and every other institution that affects men. And that puts us, again in this writers opinion, in the ironic place of finishing what feminists started; an all out assault on marriage itself.

The feminists won this one. Game over. A shutout. What remains of marriage is not salvageable. It's water that can't be decontaminated; a cripple that can't be healed. And the best thing to do is to put it out of its misery and start the whole shebang over from scratch. Hopefully that would be sometime after the culture has recovered from the damage of feminist doctrine and placed some sanity back on the table.

So if gay marriage erodes the sanctity of the institution, I say fine, let's print them licenses by the truckload. I'll spring for some rice.

There are plenty of real issues, the ones the pundits ignore, that need plenty of real attention. I won't be bothered to invest in anything else, especially something that ultimately undermines men even more.

It was no doubt feminists that put marriage on life support. We should mourn that and look to the future for renewed hope that some day men and women will share life again with love and dignity. But today, MRA's should do the decent thing with marriage and pull the plug

Men, Math and Marriage

I've been just sitting here for 30 minutes now. My hands have been poised over my laptop, but they're frozen. Actually they have a slight tremble, like all the keys are painted with cyanide and my fingers know it.

I have decided to do a piece offering some marital advice to men. And I know men pretty well. I might as well be doing a porn review for the readers of Ms. Magazine. But I am feeling dangerous and my fingers are starting to work, so here goes.

My first piece of advice for men when it comes to marriage is simple.

Don't. And I do mean never. And, yes, that means you.

I don't cotton much to psychobabble, so I won't make a hypocrite of myself by putting you though it. Thankfully, it is not necessary. For it isn't relationship dynamics that will get you. It's math. And the numbers are scary.

First, and most of you know this, more than half of all marriages end in divorce, not counting the ones that end in murder, suicide and psychiatric facilities. But that doesn't mean that only half of marriages are failures. There is a lot of failed marriages that don't end up as divorces. These are people who stay married and make a hobby of hating each other like Palestinians and Israelis.

And the math on marriage isn't near as disturbing as the numbers you will be faced with when it's over. The equation goes roughly something like this.

1 angry wife + 1 lawyer + 1 family court = 1 impoverished man living in a studio apartment and driving a 1981 Buick Skylark.

Numbers are sometimes ugly, but they don't lie.

But wait, you say, I can change that equation with a pre-nup!

Yes, you can. Here are the factor weighed results.

1 angry wife + 1 lawyer + 1 family court + 1 prenuptial agreement = 1 impoverished man living in a studio apartment and driving a 1982 Buick Skylark.

Pre-nups take more time to draw up than the courts take tossing them aside.

The fact of the matter is that in modern culture men are better off downing ten shots of tequila and walking blindfolded through a mine field. The odds are better.

Think about it for a moment. Marriage is quite literally an investment of not only your heart, but all of your work, income and future income, especially when children are involved. Now, if an investment broker told you he had a deal in which you could invest, and there was more than a 50% chance that you would be wiped out and spend most of the rest of your life paying the margin call or going to jail, how much would you invest?

Well?

Oh, come on now, you might be saying. It's not fair to reduce the institution of marriage into a financial equation. Well, yes it is. Believe me, if the woman you marry doesn't heavily consider your income prior to saying yes, she is the infinitesimal exception. And for those of you who still think it is natural and right for a man to be the breadwinner and the head of the family, please know that would be the same head that gets lobbed off in the family court where more than half of you will end up.

And even if you don't think, for who knows what reasons, that marriage isn't in large part a financial arrangement, you better believe that divorce is. Reducing holy matrimony to assets and liabilities is precisely what family courts are designed to do. And they do it with brutal efficiency. If you walk in to one of those places as a man in western culture, you will find that out in the most sobering ways imaginable.

Your experience there will leave you with a mental block. You won't even be able to say the words "family court" again, for they will find you, shivering in the corner, mumbling incoherently about "that place."

A lot of married men already know this. Those are the guys in the other half of the marriage statistics. You know, the group that is "successful?" Plenty of them have consulted lawyers because they wanted to escape insufferably nasty, horrifically high maintenance wives, but the more legal realities they heard, the more those banshees they were married to began to resemble June Cleaver. As soon as they coined the phrase "Take him to the cleaners," the follow up, "cheaper to keep her," wasn't far behind.

Just don't do it.

Living with a woman may be a better option, but you need to be careful with that one, too. Depending on the laws where you live, you could end up married without knowing it. So gather your facts.

Yes guys, that means go see a lawyer, one that understands men's legal issues, before you even shack up. Do it the moment she asks if she can leave some clothes in your closet. Better yet, do it now, while you don't have a girlfriend and can still think from the neck up. Consider the legal consult the investment of a lifetime, because it is.

And having children? Sure. Just be prepared for the very real possibility that every connection to those children will be severed when it's over. Except, of course, for the financial connection. That will be maintained at gunpoint.

So choose that Skylark carefully. You'll be driving it for a long time.

I know that some of you are thinking, "Oh, that will never happen to me." All I can say is that more than half of you are deluding yourselves, and the rest of you have no reliable way to know just how lucky you will be. For those who maintain that adolescent sense of invulnerability, such admonitions will fall on deaf ears. Never underestimate the power of denial.

I also know that some of you, especially some women that are reading this, are saying "Hey, wait! Not all women are like that! They are not all the same!" And you are right, they're not. But all family courts are the same. Screwed in L.A. Shafted in New York. Swindled in London. They are all the same.

Just don't do it.

Since you are likely not going to listen to me and make your own decisions, and you insist on taking that plunge, I have some suggestions on finding a suitable bride that might help with damage control down the road.

First, never finance a relationship. Only date women that pay their own way from the start. It will only reduce your chances of dating and ultimately marrying women who will feel entitled to all your assets when and if it ends.

It leaves you with a better, if less common, class of woman. For if a woman feels that she is entitled to ride your wallet though life when she is infatuated with you, when you can do no wrong and are the most amazing man she ever met, just imagine how she will feel about your wallet when she hates the very sight of you and the sound of your voice makes her want to claw her own eyes out.

Watch her behavior and learn from it. How does she act when you disappoint her? What is her reaction to hearing the word "no," or when you choose your way instead of her way?

If she takes it in stride and moves on, then you might have a keeper, inflection on the word might.

However, if she responds to the fact that you went golfing when she didn't want you to by cutting you off in the bedroom for a few days, or by telling you how selfish and immature you are for having any interests that don't revolve around her, what do you imagine she will do when she fully believes that you are the anti-Christ and are responsible for every ill in her miserable life?

And that, gentlemen, is precisely the woman you will face in a divorce. She won't be rational or reasonable or even principled. She will be, quite literally, your mortal enemy. And she will have the full force of the state on her side, ready to inflict retribution for her broken dreams, all of which will be your fault.

Make that a 1971 Pinto.

And so there you have it, guys. A blunt but nonetheless honest assessment of the modern state of matrimony, which has become the legal equivalent of a slot machine. If you have been alive more than about an hour, you know someone that the worst has already happened to. Quite likely you know more than one. No one will fault you for pursuing the same goals that men have been pursuing for ages; wife, children, family and all that comes with it.

But we live in an age unlike any other in our history. All it takes to see that is the ability to do subtraction, hopefully before the state does it for you, in order to come to a sensible conclusion.

Just don't do it.

Child Abuse on the Docket

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Family court, the place we are forced to contend with when matrimonial bliss goes bust, has become the demolition derby for troubled families. It's a shooting gallery, where children and fathers are driven past women and lawyers like pop-up targets, not for the sake of justice, but because the carnage is a cash cow for all the wrong people.

This is not just a scenario endemic to divorce. It is not just the best we can do with a system that means well. It is a bad system that does bad things for all the wrong reasons, the most common being money.

The family law system has evolved, or devolved, depending on how you look at it, into an adversarial theater of the damned, where turpitude and mendaciousness are considered good breeding; where children, fathers and families are exploited as a matter of routine.

Court officials are quick to tell anyone interested that they act in "the best interest of the children." They even practice saying it in a haughty, sanctimonious tone.

Don't buy it. The courts are about only two things. Money and winning, in that order. They even have it rigged so that we usually know who the winner is before the gavel ever hits the wood. The only real mystery is the final tab.

And children? Their best interest is the first thing to go, disposable as Kleenex. That's what happens when you turn them into property and use them as bargaining chips along with houses, cars and bank accounts, and when you put them at the mercy of judges and lawyers that see them not as children being traumatized by the unraveling of their families, but as marks in a carnival side show.

The money game goes much deeper than the bottom of the average pocket. Carol Rhodes, author of the highly recommended "Friend of the Court, Enemy of the Family," was involved in the family courts for 20 years. She is a former enforcement officer and investigator for the 37th circuit family court in Michigan

Her considerable experience in a system touted to be in the best interest of the child, was quite actually the opposite.

"It was all about money," she says.

"How to get the federal and state dollars that were allotted each case for enforcement. In fact," she continues, "our director would say regularly, 'we are not the friend of the family, we are the friend of the court.'"

In her book she goes on to describe how caseworkers were encouraged to robotically push through increases in child support, with rubber stamping from the judge, because it meant increases in revenue to the court. She details how her offices were managed with a philosophy of deception and a focus on increased revenue rather than the interests of families.

It was a system, she maintains, that regularly buried complaints over visitation because there was no money in enforcing the rights of the visiting parent, or in acting in the interest of the children from which those parents were severed.

Ultimately the 37th Circuit became such a success at generating revenue for the court that they became a model of training for other counties and states that were only too happy to emulate their practices.

Gathering up the cash from broken families isn't limited to the courtrooms and the lawyers.

Dr. Stephen Baskerville, in his enlightening book, "Taken into Custody," also exposes the rampant corruption in the entire system. Baskerville points out that psychotherapists, social workers and various social agencies are also in the game.

He cautions us to remember and consider, and I quote, that "Involuntary divorce involves government agents forcibly removing innocent people from their homes, seizing their property, and separating them from their children. It requires long term supervision over private life by state functionaries, including police and jails."

It is evident, both from sound research and common sense, that it would be in the best interest of the child to maintain a close, loving relationship with both parents regardless of the marriages collapse; to let the parenting continue, to insist on it, even as the marriage ends. Courts could make that the objective if they were interested in childrens welfare. Instead what usually happens early in the process is the first strike by the court on the core of the family, the restraining order, almost always on the father. They issue them without proof or corroboration, not to protect children, but to take the family down the road to child support orders and the money the courts make from enforcing them.

Read Roades and Baskerville. It's all there.

Fighting the process is treacherous. Rhodes informs us that when men who knew their rights or fathers rights activists came to the court, the word was passed around beforehand and they were targeted for all the punitive wrath at the judges considerable disposal.

It's all part of protecting the game; in the best interest of the court, as it were.

And the bias toward women as better guardians of children from earlier days fits in quite well with the schemes of modern courts. All the better and easier for the fixed fight to have a designated winner. No one has to take a dive when the judges hold the scoring cards and have them marked before the opening round.

Best interest of the child? Indeed.

If it stopped there, at the money, it would still be bad enough. But that is the problem. The courts set up Mom and Dad as lifetime adversaries. They often continue their battles after the divorce with the dedication of Palestinians and Israelis, their children (remember them?) ever caught in the crossfire.

Let's be really clear about what child custody means. It translates quite literally to ownership. It isn't just the ability to control when and where Dad and children see each other and how much he will pay Mom and the courts for the privilege of doing so. Managing conservators have the unilateral power to undermine visitation and the father-child bond with impunity. The courts give it to them.

They have the daily opportunity, and quite frequently the desire, to assassinate the character of the absent father; to twist the child's memory and perceptions to fit with those of the embittered mother.

Over time, fathers go from being Daddy to being a visitor to being estranged to being a memory, and probably not a good one. It's not uncommon. You know people to which this, or something like it, has happened.

And the next time you hear someone bemoan that Dad doesn't even try to spend time with the kids since the divorce, consider what he might be dealing with when he does.

Sara Jane: "Daddy, did you beat mommy up?"

Dad: "No, sweetie, I never did anything like that!"

Sara Jane: "Mommy said you did and that is why you had to leave."

Dad: "Well, honey, I never did."

Sara Jane: "Daddy?"

Dad: "Yes, sweetie?"

Sara Jane: "Are you going to beat me up, too?"

He can't fight this. He doesn't have enough parenting time to give the needed, corrective balance to his daughters life. The courts have made sure of it. The ex knows it and uses it.

It is easy to tell Dad that he just needs to man up and rough it through seeing the minds of his children poisoned with lies and hatred against him. But of course, if we do that then we are no more really concerned with the best interest of the child than the courts or some of the mothers. For in the conversation you just read, it is the child who suffers most. She is being condemned to a worldview of men and fathers that will stain each and every relationship she has for the rest of her life.

Restructuring a family is a delicate and difficult matter. But it will remain much more difficult than is necessary until we restructure or eliminate the corrupt, arrogant and destructive family courts that currently have the responsibility for doing so.

There is no panacea, though getting government out of marriage and divorce would be a good idea. In the absence of that, removing incentives for courts to exploit broken families would be a start. False allegations in family court to obtain restraining orders should result in prison terms. And judges should be removed from the bench and prosecuted themselves for severing a parent-child relationship without a proven reason.

It's child abuse, pure and simple, and sadly illustrates that while what we need desperately are judges with integrity and a passion for justice, what we have in reality are legions of Tony Soprano's in black robes.

To Man Up or Stand Down

Paul Elam · 3 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Among the many emails I get that don't support men's rights or don't support my take on them, a hefty number of them are from men who take issue with the idea of other men shedding traditional masculine expectations and going their own way.

The common theme among those emails is a short lecture on what men are supposed to do; replete with sonny-lemme-tell-ya-what-it-means-to-be-a-real-man instructions. Most of them are written with enough swagger and brio to make John Wayne sport a proud, if grossly posthumous smile.

And curiously, many of the concordant emails I get from women totally miss the point. I just read one from a woman who lauded my work against feminism because she lamented the loss of days when a man "knew how to treat a lady."

Apparently she thought my objection to feminism was because it kept me off a white horse. She assumed I am engaged in a fight to protect my right to sacrifice, like a real man. A glaring misunderstanding, but she did provide an opportune segway for the correct question.

What if a man doesn't want to?

When all is said and done, this is the question that speaks to the heart of a growing voice, not just in the world of Men's Rights Activists, but in the world of men collectively. And it is the first of many questions that are sure to form tempests of debate and ire in the coming years.

Should men break with tradition? And in that should they quit expecting themselves to be the financers and custodial protectors of women's lives? Should they quit paying for dates? Should they refuse assignment to the role of breadwinner? Are men supposed to be congenital bodyguards, socially and biologically indentured in a world where women no longer need such protection? Indeed, we now live in a world where it is men that increasingly need protection- from women, as is clear in family courts, the workplace, universities -think Duke- and frequently their own homes.

The answers to these questions, which are, like it or not, relevant now, require some intellectual scrutiny that won't be found in myopic edicts like "Be a real man." In fact, I'd argue that anyone issuing such proclamations needs to take a more lucid look at the world in which they live.

Women don't have roles any more, except as they choose to take them on. Even then, they can change that role fluidly depending on whether they are vying for a promotion or sitting with a man in a restaurant when the dinner check arrives. Feminists and flat tires are seldom in each others company, so women don't really so much have roles as they have a choice as to which role benefits them at the moment.

Perhaps carte blanche for opportunism is a better way to put it.

It is the new, but no longer sparklingly new social doctrine of equality-plus. Women now enjoy a range of options that men could not possibly dream of. They have been granted equal and often preferential entrance into the realm of financial opportunity and independence while social mandates still leaves the door wide open for them to do what they have historically done, e.g., draw sustenance and enhanced lifestyle from the sweat and labor of men.

It's the net result of feminist doctrine and men's complicity in it; a paradigm not of parity, but of parasitism; a Kafkaesque realm for men where they are bludgeoned with messages of their uselessness to women, often while being bled dry by them.

This isn't to cast men as victims of women. All this is enabled, lock, stock and barrel, by men rigidly maintaining their traditional roles, giving women whatever they ask for by rote. By practicing chivalry like a crack habit, and by excoriating other men for not doing same.

In fact, were it not for men engaging in this mindless form of collective patricide, feminism would have been deservedly quashed at least thirty years ago. Real men would not have tolerated all this nonsense for a minute.

The catch-22 of this affair, however, is glaringly obvious. The traditional mindset, previously more tempered by reason, has served as the foundation of stable families and adjusted children for countless generations. It is indeed an area where expressions like the fabric of our society and backbone of our civilization are not just tired and overused metaphors, but spot on descriptions of reality.

That, in and of itself, might appear to be a sound reason for men to just shut up, shovel and sacrifice; to labor for what has worked in the past as though the last 40 years never happened. But that is the problem. The last 40 years actually did happen. That toothpaste is already out of the tube, and much more likely than not trying to squeeze it back in is a noble and pathetically fruitless task.

It is not that traditional roles can't work. They can for a waning few; those willing to find their way to each other though the modern morass of traditions in a world largely stripped of them. But it is a gamble with Las Vegas odds and therefore should be a choice, and one that doesn't include a license for risk takers to place a proscription on alternatives for those more survival minded.

As long as we deny men choices that women are allowed to take for granted, we will continue to see men marginalized and exploited. As the New York Times just reported, it is possible that for the first time in history that in America women will surpass men in the workforce. And that right soon.

It is a picture consistent with men's drastically decreasing presence in higher education and punctuated by their suffering the lions share of job losses in the bad economy.

And men are to continue to sacrifice for women and protect them? There are still plenty who say yes. But then there are plenty who think Elvis is still alive.

When enough men find themselves paying for dinner with a gainfully employed woman with money from their unemployment checks, there will likely be a lot more men, at the very least, saying:

"Hey, wait a minute."

That would be one giant step in the right direction.

Male Studies Conference Delivers- With Some Friction

Paul Elam · 7 April 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Truth is regarded as a terrible word in this age of deconstruction," said Katherine Young, while fielding questions at the Conference on Male Studies today at Wagner College in New York. Young was among a panel of varied academicians that spoke at the conference, which was hosted by Wagner Professor Miles Groth and chaired by the erudite pair of Lionel Tiger and Christina Hoff Sommers. The purpose of the conference was to introduce the concept of male studies to a broader public and academic audience.

True to Young's words, however, there was resistance to that truth in the panel itself. After a great start, with On Step Institutefounder and MND board member Dr. Ed Stephens posing the initial question "What are the ethical concerns of dedicating 90% of resources to one sex?" and eloquent opening statements from Tiger and Sommers, the momentum faltered briefly with the statement issued by Professor Chip Caprero of Hobart and William Smith Colleges.

First, Caprero attempted to paint the entire conference as an afterthought to the field of men's studies, tossing Michael Kimmel's name around and suggesting that the academic pursuits being considered by the other panelists were not new, but already well underway. He seemed not to notice that the remainder of the panelists seemed to view Kimmel's work as the problem.

And then he made the incredulous (and outright stupid) statement that masculism was an attempt to "re assert male privilege."

It was as though no one had prepped him with a conference description before asking him to speak. Indeed, it was as though no one had awoken him from his intellectual slumber before giving him a microphone.

The implication is not that he should have or would have spoken otherwise with prepping, but that the conference was apparently organized out of necessity due to a paradigm that has too long operated on Caprero's point of view. They might as well have invited Carol Gilligan or Catherine McKinnon to fill his seat for all the benefit it would be to male studies.

It was the only low point of the two hour presentation, but it actually turned out to be a blessing in disguise, due mainly to what followed. What was amazing was that in a time when we are used to seeing feminist ideologues on college campuses being rewarded with wild applause and almost universal agreement, the statement from Caprero yielded only one thing.

Tension in the room.

And you could see it, even through the small, grainy video image presented through the live feed, and hear it, even with the occasional audio glitches.

And then, something even more remarkable happened. Caprero was shot down cold.

Immediately following his statements, Paul Nathanson, co-author of Legalizing Misandry, dismissed Kimmel as "naïve" and brought the conference back on focus. From there the rest of the event was underscored by the sound of academicians citing the horrific results of feminist ideologues being in charge of university programs and the research they produce; and of those same ideologues having sway over university policies that affect young men. It was a theme hammered on incessantly by Sommers and echoed by all but one of her peers. And they clearly offered male studies as a needed remedy for this problem.

The focus was apparently a little too intense for Caprero. He spent most of the remaining conference physically shrunken back from his peers. He spoke more, but with far less self assurance. The more they hammered in the need for the study of males not driven by feminist ideologues, the more he faded back into the wall.

And this is where he provided a valuable service to all watching. The more academicians spoke of the problem with gender ideologues in academia, the more the one gender ideologue on the panel became insignificant to the conference. If this is a foreshadow of how other ideologues will behave as real scholars sign on to study males, this may be easier than one might have at first thought. Perhaps as easy as light erasing a shadow?

One can hope.

One thing for sure, we will be finding out. Journalists for Newsweek and Cosmopolitan were in attendance.

The conference get's an A+, given a slight curve for Caprero. It was a good start, but there are miles ahead to any viable destination. Money needs to be raised, as well as more awareness, even on such an illustrious panel of experts. Not once during this groundbreaking event did the word chivalry come up. Or, as conference attendee Tom Golden, LCSW, said. "They never even mentioned the chivalry that drives all this stuff. Until they start addressing that, we are not going to get very far." Golden is the publisher of the website Men are Good, and produced a seminal video outlining men's issues.

Still, this was an auspicious and hopeful beginning. I can well imagine that if we would have had cameras and live feed at Seneca Falls, that we would not have witnessed a model of perfect unity, or perfect insights. So imperfections notwithstanding, the case for male studies was made today, with effect and credibility.

As soon as the conference becomes available for online viewing, I will bring you the link.

Congratulations to Ed Stephens, Dick Elfenbein, Joe Notovitz and the esteemed assembly of presenters for a job well done.

We got your self-esteem here

Paul Elam · 3 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Let me tell you what I'd do if I liked money more than self-respect. I'd go to the local shoppers club and buy a hundred gross of small brown paper bags. Then I'd drive out-of-town to the nearest auction barn and pay them a fair price to let me go into the stalls and fill every bag with an even pound of cow crap.

Then I'd slap on some shiny pink labels with "Bag-O-Women's-Self-Esteem," printed on them in a distinctly womanish font, add a five, no, ten-dollar price sticker, and tie 'em closed with couple of nice frou frou ribbons. Next, I'd set up a kick back arrangement with Dr. Phil in exchange for an endorsement and take out an ad in Cosmo or Redbook.

Then I would head down to Belize and sit on the beach, throw back cocktails and check the bank account on my Droid 8 or 10 times a day. After about a week I'd buy the beach I was sitting on, and maybe that cute little senorita that was fetching my drinks. The word expatriate would start sounding pretty good.

And I'd be doing myself and you ladies a big favor. It would be perfect synergy. I like money, and you like buying bullshit.

You've been doing it for as long as I can remember. Fake self-esteem, like 98% of everything else that is marketed just to females, has become the psycho-porn of the western woman, with profits that would put a twinkle in Bill Gates eyes. How much profit exactly is anyone's guess.

What I do know is that the self-esteem racket comes in a lot of guises. I will deal with the two major ones here because that is all I have time for.

First, the plastic surgery route. With 8 year olds getting bikini waxes and high school juniors getting fitted for an instant C cup, it is a growing industry for the grrls. For the supposed grown ups it is a monster. Plastic surgeons know how much better you will feel about yourself if your tits draw some more stares and your lips look a little more blow job ready.

This is what they pass off as self-esteem, and they use it as an advertising come on in the same way beer companies use girls in bikinis. Since you are the consumer, it sells like cheap crack in a bad neighborhood. And so now you and your sisters are lined up like schoolgirls for tickets to see Pink, to get cut and stretched, injected and inflated, and to have your fat asses suctioned down to bubbles of perfection.

But, there is one ever so slight problem. Actually, it's a big one.

You see, vanity isn't self-esteem. Neither is narcissism. Not the real deal, anyway. If you think self-esteem and self obsession are the same thing, then go buy those plastic titties. They will match your character and personality just fine, and they might go a long way toward a career as a porn star or topless dancer if the scars don't show too much. After all, it's common knowledge that self esteem abounds for women who can squat down and pick up folded dollar bills off the floor with the crack of their ass while a room full of drunks howl at them.

Then you can attract more men and join the millions of other women that spend their time bitching about how those men won't look at them from the neck up. It's a small price to pay for all that self-worth.

Tell you what -today only- two bags of cow crap for the price of one.

Now, if you are not on an elective surgery budget, you needn't feel left out. There is a whole world of cheaper but equally fake assistance with your problem. It's the Stuart Smalley route of the self-esteem simpleton. And it is for sale in the wacky world of mental health. The purveyors, usually women who don't have any more self-esteem than you do, are scattered across the world-wide web, thicker than Henry Kissinger's accent. For a mere hundred or so per hour, they will give you the stalwart advice to look in the mirror -each and every day- and say really affirming things like "I am unique. I am special. I am the only 'me' there is!" They will advise you to smile while saying it, but I dare you to simply keep a straight face.

They will tell you there are lots of reasons you don't have self-esteem. The most common one being men that don't see just how special you really are, or don't tell you as much every 15 minutes. Those are the relationships where you lose your self-esteem. Yes, ladies, you can have it and then lose it, like there was a big hole in your pocket and it fell through and rolled under the sofa.

Actually, they will make it look a little more sinister. It's like this: You get into a relationship and at first he is all roses and chocolates. After time though, he starts saying things that are not really bad, but just a little cutting, like "I'm going fishing with my friends,"

After some more time passes, it gets worse. When his fishing trips don't stop simply because you tell him how important it is for him to give them up for you, what started as "I'm going fishing with my friends," ends up being "Get off my back you insufferable fucking control freak."

Self esteem into the drink, right then and there.

Seriously though, ladies, disinformation about your self-esteem aside, the self-help gurus aren't any better at it than the cutters. And they miss the most important thing about self-esteem, just like you do.

The cold truth is that if you have self-esteem, nobody can take it from you. And if you can surrender it to someone, even an asshole that says he loves you, then you never had it to begin with.

That is partly because there is no such thing as self-esteem. It is just a made up word; a marketing tool to get to your purse, or through you, your man's wallet. There is, however, self-respect. And self-respect, since it must be earned, is rarely sacrificed.

When you have it, respect from others is a given. But you can't have respect from others or yourself if what you keep chasing is scripted adoration and unearned preeminence. And if you are the average woman in today's world, you don't have a damned clue as to the difference. It makes selling you bags of bullshit all the easier. In fact, as long as you insist on hanging on to the idea that your being special is a demand you can put on anyone else, or obtain by making an ass of yourself in a mirror, it makes selling you anything but bullshit impossible.

Unlike what any plastic surgeon or psychobabble spouting huckster will tell you, you have to get off your ass and earn the way people see and treat you, and the way you see and treat yourself.

You do this through the development of your character, not as a princess or little girl or the self designated center of someone else's universe, but as a grown human being with more focus on your responsibilities than your entitlements. Ante up like a big girl and see how quickly the world, and men, treat you like one.

And if you are taking shit, stop it.

If you don't stand up, and I mean immediately, to any mistreatment from any other human being, and put an end to it, then don't whine about being a door mat. You volunteered for it the second you laid down.

But the real trick here is for you to understand that people, particularly men, failing to meet unrealistic expectations isn't robbing you of anything. They aren't respecting you by catering to your childishness, they are just giving in to it, and, in the mother of all ironies, disrespecting themselves.

Now you can take this advice, which is totally free, and start applying it today. You can start growing up this very minute. Before you know it other people, men included, will be looking at you in a way you have likely never seen before. With genuine admiration. I know, it's a poor substitute for adulation, but in the real world it has to do.

Or, if you just can't wrap your mind around the idea that the onus is on you to get the job done; that self-respect is a by-product of maturity and humility, I have another form of self-esteem, right here, by the bag full.

Operators are standing by.

Sexual Predator Insanity

Paul Elam · 11 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

At sixteen, Ricky Blackman was fairly typical of teen-age boys. He loved sports, especially basketball and football, and played them well enough to have realistic hopes for a scholarship. He liked socializing and hanging out with his friends. And girls—of course there were always the girls.

His Middle American upbringing produced unsurprising ambitions. He dreamed of serving his country in the Navy after school, and ultimately of a career in law enforcement. He was, by all accounts, a healthy and well adjusted young man.

Skip ahead three years, and you'll find Ricky and his life have changed radically. He takes private instruction in web design because he isn't welcome on a campus. He no longer trusts the law he once wanted to serve, and, when in the presence of young women, he panics and withdraws. In fact, his life, once so full of promise and hope, is now little more than a daily struggle to survive, and a challenge to even find reasons for doing so.

While Ricky's view of the world has changed since his younger days, it is nothing compared to the way the world's view of Ricky has changed. He has become the ultimate pariah and outcast. He is, at least in the eyes of most, pernicious persona non grata; human refuse hardly worthy of life itself.

It all started before his seventeenth birthday. Ricky was at a local hang out for teens and met a girl there. Amanda was from his area, said she was fifteen years old and they seemed to have much in common. They began seeing each other, and eventually had sex on two occasions.

The encounters would undo the rest of his life.

Like many young people trying to impress someone they like, Amanda lied to Ricky about her age. She later told Ricky's mother, Mary Duval, that she was only fourteen, and pled with her not to let Ricky know. Mary promptly told her son of the confession, and he cut off the romance immediately. They found out later that she still wasn't being entirely honest.

Later Amanda, a runaway, became involved with the police, who discovered her prior ties with Ricky. She admitted the sexual relationship to the police during questioning. She also admitted that she had lied to Ricky about her age. After evaluating the situation, Amanda's parents weren't interested in pressing charges and the police weren't interested in making an arrest. Until, that is, the Dallas County (Iowa) District Attorney's office got wind of the case.

Shortly after Ricky turned seventeen, he was questioned by the police. His mother was present, and it was her instinct to remove Ricky from the interview. But she had just undergone surgery on her eyes and was disoriented due to the post-operative medications she was taking, so she allowed Ricky's then-stepfather to handle things. Unfortunately, the stepfather wanted the matter quickly resolved, and signed a waiver for the police to question him without legal counsel.

The police had something they wanted Ricky to sign as well.

It was a simple statement that he had, in fact, had sexual relations with Amanda. Ricky was apprehensive, but he signed. It was, after all, the truth. And in Ricky's world, the truth served an honest person well.

"Sorry to tell you," the police officer told Ricky after he had signed the statement. "Amanda admitted she lied to you about her real age, but she was only thirteen."

It probably wasn't the tactics Ricky envisioned, when he thought of becoming a police officer: Get a kid to sign a confession, and then tell him what he just confessed to. Ricky's naiveté took a hard blow. But it was only the first of many times that the real world would land on him like a Mack Truck.

The officer told him that the case would be sent back to the D.A., and that it might come to nothing since Amanda had confessed to lying about her age. He also advised him, in a rare moment of clarity and honesty from the system, that it could go either way.

The Arrest Made the Papers

Ten days later, Ricky was handcuffed in front of his friends and taken to jail. He was charged as an adult with two counts of third degree sexual abuse, a felony. In an almost artistic manipulation of timing and the system, police and prosecutors used laws applying only to juveniles to garner evidence and a confession, and then used it all to charge him criminally as an adult.

He was threatened with twenty years in prison (more time than he'd yet been alive), but that was only the beginning of a two-pronged assault on his life. When the arrest made the papers, complete with Ricky's full name, address, and the nature of the charges against him, the community in which he had lived and thrived turned on him in an instant.

When Ricky and Mary went food shopping, cashiers in one line at a local grocery store refused to check them out, forcing them to go to another line while other customers glared. His younger brother, who was nine at the time, was badgered and humiliated at school.

Duval read the writing on the wall, and immediately made plans to take Ricky and his brother to Oklahoma in hopes that they could put the matter behind them. Unfortunately, the move would have to wait until the Dallas County Prosecutor's Office was done with him.

That process began with a rare, upbeat moment that seemed to promise a partial reprieve. The prosecution offered a deal with Ricky that almost seemed reasonable, given the circumstances. He would plead guilty to one count of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, a class D felony, which would be expunged from the records if he satisfied the terms of his two-year probation. He would not have to state a felony on job applications, and, because of the adjudication, he would not be placed on a sex offenders' registry.

It seemed like the best offer possible, all things considered, and Ricky agreed to the plea.

Ricky and his mother took their seats in the courtroom. Then, just minutes before the hearing was scheduled to begin, the state appointed attorney advised them that there had been a recent change in Iowa law.

Any plea arrangement Ricky made would be contingent on being placed on a sex abuser registry for ten years. Both Ricky and his mother erupted in tears at the news, causing a commotion in the courtroom. It took some time for them to compose themselves.

The "recent" change in the statute had happened, they would discover, nearly a year earlier, but right now, Ricky had just moments to decide whether or not to take the deal.

He didn't want to be placed on the registry. He didn't think it was right. But to fight it was risking two decades behind bars; a place where young men, especially those not hardened by criminal life, were sure to find out what real sexual deviance and assault are all about.

It was a double blow for Duval, who had lost her eyesight entirely, just five weeks before the hearing. Now she could lose her son.

Ricky took the deal, but almost ran into another snag with the court. The prosecution wanted Ricky to state on the record that he had lured the girl to his home for the purpose of having sex. The request was clear. In essence they wanted Ricky to commit perjury, a real crime, so they could have on the record a phony allocution to something he never did. Blackman, with courage almost unimaginable for his age and the circumstances, refused. He told the court that the sex was what they both wanted, and he wouldn't make a statement to the contrary.

They entered his statement into the record and closed the case. Ricky had received the adjudication, and they were now free to move away from Iowa.

It was something Ricky couldn't wait to do. The promise of getting away and making a fresh start almost made the situation bearable.

A Fresh Start

The state of Oklahoma, and some of its citizens, had other plans.

They'd had no idea when they moved, but Oklahoma law required Ricky to register as a sexual offender for life. And because of the age difference between him and Amanda, he would be listed as a Level Three Offender, which labels him as violent and dangerous, and his crime as "aggravated." He was placed on the sexual offender registry, and, as a result, Ricky's life has been affected in ways that most of us cannot imagine.

Since moving to Oklahoma he has been kicked out of school, ousted from public parks, and verbally abused by neighbors and strangers. One neighbor shouted obscenities and videotaped him whenever he stepped outside his door. The same man came to their home and told Mary Duval he would not quit bothering them till she took her "child rapist" away. He was not interested in the facts surrounding Ricky's case. He had seen everything he needed to know about Ricky Blackman on the "Offender Registry."

Ricky cannot live or go within 2,000 feet of schools, parks or any other establishments where children are known to be present, and this forces him to live as far from town as possible. It also means he cannot attend his younger brother's football games, or go almost anywhere where he could make and maintain friendships. He cannot even attend church unless he informs the clergy there that he is a sex offender and gets their permission.

Now that Ricky is off probation, his younger brother can have his friends in the home while Ricky is there. But most parents don't want their children in a home with a registered sex offender. And the reality is that children around Ricky do present a dangerous vulnerability… for Ricky. Any allegation against him, even the most patently false, could have disastrous results.

His probation officer had him dismissed from the school system, saying, according to Duval, "He is a liability to them." He was denied G.E.D classes because they were offered on a school campus, and the State Board of Education denied him online classes because he was on the registry.

Ricky was eventually allowed to take G.E.D. classes, at a local police station.

He now lives his life in near solitude, helping to take care of his mother and trying to sort out how he is going to make something of the rest of his life. He had a job in a fabrication plant, but was "laid off" when his employers discovered his history. Effectively in prison, Ricky will remain that way for the rest of his life unless something changes.

Ricky and his mother are both involved in trying to effect those changes. They have both taken the story public, and Duval has an on-line radio program to raise awareness of what the registry actually does. She has managed to get the story covered by some television stations and newspapers. She also has an internet petition demanding changes in the laws. Primary among those demands is that the states recognize the difference between sexual predation and consensual sex between teens.

In many places, including Oklahoma, the law sees no such difference, and consequently makes no legal distinction between someone who lures a child into a car and rapes them and someone like Ricky Blackman.

The Court Knew Better

It was a difference, however, that the prosecution in his case was apparently able to see, even as they held twenty years in prison over the young man's head in order to coerce a guilty plea. It was the prosecution that recommended to the court that Blackman receive two years probation with deferred adjudication. In that recommendation, they advised the court that this course of action would be sufficient to rehabilitate the defendant.

One only need consult a mental health professional with experience dealing with sexual offenders to learn that the nearly universal perception is that recidivism for sexual offenders is high. In my considerable time in the field, it was the general consensus of clinicians that predators were untreatable, and that incarceration was the best option. (There is research that disputes all this, but in Blackman's case, it was always perceptions that guided events, not reality.)

That being said, prosecutors are generally less generous than psychotherapists. With their recommendation to the court, the prosecution openly acceded to what everyone else in that courtroom already knew.

Ricky Blackman was not a sexual predator.

Ricky Blackman was just a kid that had sex with a girlfriend he thought was a year younger than him.

Ricky Blackman had no business being there in the first place.

At this point, though, it was too late. Blackman was caught up in a system largely devised by politicians clamoring to quell public fears about the safety of children. Fanning the flames of public outrage, and sometimes lighting them, lawmakers run for office against each other on platforms largely consisting of "tough on crime" one-upmanship. One ever more draconian measure after another is offered up as a sales pitch to a panic-ridden, woefully ignorant public that will sign on to whatever sounds the most extreme.

The result is laws that not only fail to protect our children, but in the case of Blackman and others, have actually started destroying them. Elected politicians, like prosecutors and judges, fearful of being seen as soft on crime, force people like Ricky through the legal gauntlet without compunction. They have become robotic assassins, creating unthinkable collateral damage in a war that is supposedly being waged in the public's best interest.

Meanwhile, children are no safer on the streets than they have ever been.

His Whole Life in Front of Him

It is perhaps fitting to point to the silver linings in this story. Duval, the loss of her sight notwithstanding, has emerged as a dogged and tireless advocate for her son, and for bringing problems with the sexual offenders registry to the public's attention.

Ricky has found some focus for the future as well, though it took some hits and misses. He wanted to get a law degree and work to change the system for the better, but he won't be allowed to practice law anywhere, because of the registry. Now he takes private lessons in web design, a profession suited for someone who has little reason to leave the house. He also wants to reach out to young people and caution them about the hazards and consequences of teen sex. The jury remains out on whether that can ever happen.

These are thin consolations, lending neither redemption nor solace. Even if Mary Duval had not lost her eyesight, she would never again see the Ricky she knew before all this happened. Her life is, and will be, consumed with trying to find justice for her son. She openly admits this may never happen.

Ricky, at nineteen, is supposed to have his whole life in front of him. When he should be looking forward to the time he will marry and have children of his own, his path looks to be marked by a single set of footprints. His ideas on women are not what they used to be.

"I don't trust them," he says. "When I see one looking at me I just walk away."

Still, he is a young man with a message, albeit forged in the fires of adversity. It is a message that assaults the complacency in which we all too often and too easily find comfort.

"Anybody who looks at the registry should not judge people just for being there," he says, "There are lots of people that don't belong. People like me. There are even people that had to pee so bad they went outside and the next thing you know someone takes a picture with a cell phone and they end up on the registry too."

Right alongside the child rapists.

Little at this point would ameliorate the damage done to this family. The Kafkaesque tempest that overtook them three years ago still darkens every horizon and pummels the simplicity out of life that they used to take for granted. It rattles their doors and windows, as though trying to shake loose the last of their dignity. And it has swept away hope for the future, leaving behind only the solemn, desperate need for peace.

We love to think that justice is blind. But we also pray that those who administer that justice are people of vision. When systems become so twisted that the letter of the law strangles its spirit, then justice cannot exist. It will die as surely as the dreams of a teen-age boy when the world caves in around him.

Paul Elam · 24 May 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"We can thank Levi Strauss & Co. for a new Dockers ad campaign that weaves sexism and homophobia into a pitch for pants," says The Boston Herald's Lauren Beckham Falcone. Similar sentiments are being echoed in print media across the nation and scathing condemnations have gone viral on the internet, particularly on feminists websites.

"It's time to answer the call of manhood," the ad says, "It's time to wear the pants."

It's a pretty straight forward pitch. Reactions to it have ranged from tepid to histrionic, with a growing amount of traction for the latter.

Falcone asserts that Levi Strauss is "..waxing romantic about the days of submissive ladies and alpha males.."

It's a fairly moderate statement compared to offerings of walletpop.com writer Jami Bernard, who says, ""Wear the pants" is a call to arms, even when used jokingly, that says the only way to be a man is to put women in their place."

Bernhard further castigates Strauss's campaign as tantamount to rejecting women's suffrage and a desire to relegate women to vacuuming and other "womanly" duties.

Those pants pack quite a wallop.

Intertwined with the allegations of misogyny and homophobia are cursory, glancing blows at the commercialization of masculinity, and sometimes embracing it. Amanda Hess of The Washington City Paper writes, "For all the absurd fashion and beauty trends thrown at women, as gender-essentials, it's refreshing that men, too, are being encouraged to satisfy societies gender norms by shelling out $70 for a pair of pants."

Hess may have a point, but as far as gender-essentials go, cars and homes, which men are routinely measured by, run a lot more than lipstick and mascara.

Still, there are problems with the ad to be sure. Masculinity doesn't have a dress code and can't be purchased off the rack. But demonizing Levi Strauss for that stretches reason and fairness to the breaking point.

Traditional masculinity has been sold in cans of beer, bottles of aftershave, sticks of deodorant and a plethora of other products for ages, ever counting on men to head out and shop for those things in Chevy Tough Trucks.

The real men buy our product pitch isn't new, and hasn't raised eyebrows in the past.

No, it's something else that makes Dockers campaign different, and it has painted a target on the company, with detractors happily adjusting their sights to zero in on the kill shot.

The reason, the real reason, for all this outrage, pretty much boils down two key phrases in the ad.

"The world decided it no longer needed men."

And, following that,

"There are questions our genderless society has no answers for."

There's the ideological bombshell. It is the politically incorrect, but completely cogent idea that the loss of traditional masculinity has a higher price tag than a pair of trousers. It's a common sense reality that nonetheless has a lot of people outraged, and fearful, that anyone would express a positive regard for traditional men.

To understand that anger and fear, we must understand that there is much more that drives it than is on the surface, just as there is much more to be gleaned from the meaning of the ad than can be achieved with literalistic reductionism.

Levi Strauss & Co. are drawing fire because, intentionally or not, the company challenged an orthodoxy that sees traditional men as evil, and old school masculinity as something that required reengineering into the feminized model that more and more men are emulating today. This gender Zeitgeist includes the advertisers. They are in the upper echelons of movers and shakers in the world that "decided it no longer needed men." At least not as they were born to be. Those that embraced that kind of thinking are largely the same people making all the noise right now.

So if we are going to honestly dissect and evaluate what is happening here, it helps to understand that the outcry about the Dockers ad isn't a reaction to sexism, but indisputable evidence of it in those complaining.

Their indignation isn't because there is sexism in the ad, but because it is the wrong kind of sexism. Their contempt is a backlash fueled by misandry- the hatred of men and boys. For it is misandry, not misogyny that has become the gold standard of advertisers. And it became institutionalized in the mainstream media the moment they figured out there was a fortune in it.

One might ask where the voices of Falcone, Bernard and Hess were when Fedex and Pepsi used images of Burt Reynolds and Justin Timberlake, respectively, getting their genitalia smashed as a sight gag in television commercials?

Quiet as church mice, perhaps?

They are just a small part of the deafening media silence as men have become the punching bags of choice in pitching everything from bathroom cleaners to breakfast cereal. The latest offering is acommercial from Anheuser-Busch that depicts a woman, with an unmistakable sadistic glint in her eyes, fixing a boutonnière to her husbands lapel with a nail gun, while he is wearing the jacket.

Then, of course, once done with the flower, she wants to take it further and use the same nail gun to repair the zipper in the pants he's wearing. Were it not for the implications of a faulty zipper, it could have doubled as a Dockers ad.

And no one would have said a word, just as they are saying nothing about the Busch commercial.

By the way, Anheuser-Busch's Mr. Masculine, who grimaced and flinched as nails were driven into his body, actually managed to say "no" to driving them into his crotch. But the commercial ends with her still going for it.

The point has again been made. Sexually mutilating men is funny, and profitable. It is such an effective weapon in the arsenal of advertisers that it can be used to sell veal to a vegan.

Keep in mind that this was a beer commercial broadcast during a pro football game. Again, veal to a vegan.

Where physical abuse isn't employed, humiliation often is. It's routine to portray men in commercials as one dimensional idiots who couldn't pick an analgesic without a lecture and close supervision from their wives. Men have become, in the eyes of ad execs and consumers everywhere, the weakened, less-than-masculine objects of ridicule that the Dockers ad points to as a problem.

And while Levi Strauss & Co. stopped short of getting the message 100% correct, the company has nonetheless taken a big step away from the redundant misandry of the advertising industry– and have agitated the prevailing powers in the process.

It's a groundbreaking step in the right direction.

It is also a step that will foster more reactions. Admonitions will be issued and boycotts will be called for. Pressure will be brought to bear to compel a retreat from the campaign.

Let us hope they are not successful. For if they are, the net result will be Levi Strauss learning all the wrong lessons. It will force the company to abandon something quite rare these days, an intelligent and thoughtful ad campaign, and send it back to a world where nail guns and kicks to the crotch are considered enlightened advertising.

It will send Levi Strauss back to a world that no longer needs men.

And if Strauss is concerned about that world, as it appears to be, it will eventually understand that the time for measuring men by compliance with forced chivalry has passed; that men have intrinsic worth that transcends mere utility to women. But if given simple respect; a modicum of dignity, they will protect women with their very lives. Men didn't get that from a code of chivalry. It is, and always has been, in their nature. Chivalry is just a label; a tag put on the actions of men to define what was already there.

Let's hope that the Strauss Co. will see that assuming that what is happening to men is of their own making, reflects, however well intended, the very sexism against men that created all these problems.

But above all let's Hope that the good people of Levy Strauss & Co. see that the forces that are lashing out with such vitriol at their ad campaign today have been lashing out at men and boys for the last forty years, and that they see, once and for all, that it is time for it to stop.

The company will need courage and conviction to do that. But that shouldn't present a problem. Courage and conviction are just two of many things that come with wearing the pants.

The first Shrink4Men was published by Dr Tara J. Palmatier, PsyD on January 12, 2009. Dr Palmatier began Shrink4Men because she recognized that men who are in abusive relationships in which the perpetrator is a woman do not have the same support resources as their female counterparts. Much of society and support organizations refuse to recognize that men comprise approximately 50% of relational abuse targets or, worse yet, ridicule men who seek help for this reason.

Many men in relationships with abusive women don't even recognize that what they're experiencing from their nearest and dearest is abuse. There are many double standards in our society when it comes to what is acceptable behavior for men and what is acceptable behavior for women.

Dr Tara holds a PsyD in Clinical Psychology and an MSc in Counseling Psychology. She has over 15 years of experience delivering direct services to diverse populations in a variety of settings. Dr Tara completed and successfully defended her doctoral dissertation, Ce ci n'est pas une these: An applied psychoanalysis of Rene Magritte, in 2004. It examines unresolved childhood bereavement, the effects of a mentally ill mother and creative outcomes in an adult artist. She continues to have an interest in psychology and the arts.

Dr Tara currently publishes the Shrink4Men website, blog and forum. She specializes in helping men who are trying to end relationships or seeking coping strategies for dealing with their abusive wives, girlfriends or exes, many of whom have been diagnosed with personality disorder or whom they suspect have personality disorders or traits.

The philosophy of Shrink4Men is as follows:

- Abuse is unacceptable from either sex.
- Abuse is unacceptable even when the perpetrator has a personality disorder or other mental illness.
- Tolerating abuse from your wife or girlfriend doesn't make you a good guy; it makes you a victim. If you remain in the relationship or don't take steps to stop the abuse once you recognize you're being abused, manipulated, controlled or terrorized you are enabling your own mistreatment.
- Ending a relationship or a marriage in which you're actively being emotionally and/or physically abused doesn't make you a "bad guy"—even if you have children.
- Double standards and inequities in relationships are unhealthy and unacceptable. You shouldn't have to "take it" or shoulder the entire financial burden because you're a man.
- Both partners' needs and feelings are equally important. Both partners come first in a relationship. Both partners need to compromise.
- Allowing yourself to be devalued in a relationship is not okay. Relationships should ultimately be a source of comfort and support not a series of endless hostilities, psychological castration, no-win situations, hoop jumping, emotional withdrawal, transactions and resignation.

When a man is abusive, he's designated a jerk and we encourage his wife or girlfriend to end the relationship. Abusive men are publicly humiliated, vilified and often imprisoned for their violent behavior. When a woman is abusive, we advise her male target that she's just emotional, she was abused as child, so he needs to be patient and sensitive to her feelings and stick with her no matter the personal cost. When a woman is violent toward a man in the context of an intimate relationship, it's still the man who usually gets carted off to jail even when he's the one with the cuts and bruises.

Dr Tara J. Palmatier is in no way minimizing the legitimate abuse many women suffer in their intimate relationships from men. She is, however, trying to shine the spotlight on the abuse suffered by men who are targets of their female intimate partners and exes, which is just as real and just as painful, if not worse, due to the lack of ready social and personal support.

[image]I grew up in the 1970s, when feminism's second wave was cresting. Predictably, I absorbed and internalized the public messaging of the mainstream. I also absorbed a major fraction of my value system from an earlier generation, having had access to the library of my grandfather, who along with my grandmother, were among the last of the real Victorians. I knew, without being conscious of it that women were better human beings, and that my sexual identity was corrupt, unless it was bent to the service and protection of women.

During my childhood and adolescence, without understanding the deeper social forces at play, I witnessed the dissolution of almost every marriage of my parents and other relatives, but did not fail to notice that the men seemed always come out badly damaged, while the former wives seemed to skate away mostly unscathed, and retaining most of the familial assets they'd shared during their relationships. This pattern was so monotonous and one sided, I never found the prospect of marriage to be even slightly attractive.

Speeding forward several decades, I found myself fascinated by the spectacle the foreign and domestic policies of western nations, particularly the US. I was both puzzled and outraged by the apparent insanity and obvious self contradiction of the claimed, versus what appeared the obvious motivations of the elected and appointed governments of the apparently "free world".

This came to a head for me with the public scandal of the Bush-Junior-era Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and his apparently politically motivated firings of roughly a dozen state level prosecutors. Around this time I began writing a blog, noting the inconsistencies between the public narrative sold by mainstream media, and what appeared an irretrievably corrupt apparatus of government in not just the United States, but every western nation including Canada, where I live.

I went to university in Canada, studying geology and physics, which led to work in the canadian mining industry. I also found the time to form and and develop several small and modestly successful businesses, including a software company which over a decade grew from 2 employees to over 100.

But out of observing and writing about the visible behavior of the North American political establishment, I began to see a consistent pattern sharply at odds with the publicly accepted social and political narrative.

This led eventually to my adoption of many of the views common within what is now called the Men's Rights Movement, although I had no early that idea any such movement existed. In 2010, I had written several articles from a strongly MRM point of view without realizing a larger movement existed, but did not begin to self identify as a "men's rights activist" until seeing Paul Elam's "thehappymisogynist" videos on Youtube.

In 2010 Paul contacted me, and I began submitting articles for publication on AVFM, I soon joined Paul as the co host of his radio show, and eventually became the Site's Editor In chief.

[image]I started my life as half of a stereotype. My parents divorced a few months before I was born so according to just about every sitcom and movie of the nineties, I was destined to be one of those men whose "father was never there." Destined to be one of the stoic and immature man-children who never listened to his mother and needed a woman to teach him how to be a proper human being worthy of a relationship and societal acceptance.

Yeah that half of the stereotype didn't happen. Mostly because my mother didn't take advantage of a legal system designed to destroy the lives of men. My parents held equal custody of their children. No allegations of abuse to win a case, no weekend visitation rights, no child support; equal custody. When I was with my father, his money is what fed me and the same with my mother. One of the most important examples of equality humanity has to offer in this day and age graced me upon birth.

So I suppose it's obvious why I eventually became involved with Men's Rights.

Misandry was recognizable to me growing up. My parents taught me that there are people in the world who do bad things to other people. However, school and television told me that there were men in the world who do bad things to other people, mostly women, and sometimes kittens, female ones. As the years went by I did what most people do when faced with things they don't like or agree with. I ignored it. I changed the channel and turned my head when the billboards popped up. Being told that I was the problem because I happened to be born male didn't sit well with me but I had a life to live. I was sure someone would start saying something about the one sided nature of the message being put forth.

I joined the army when I was nineteen. By age twenty I was in Iraq. The things I didn't ignore on television told me that soldiers and policemen and firemen were heroes. I always had a strong impulse to run towards the dangerous situation everyone else was running away from so the choice seemed like the right one. Even though I didn't like it, I think I took away a lot more positive learning experiences from the army than I'd like to admit but I digress. By age twenty-two I was back home, out of the military, and working a normal nine to five. I knew nothing of feminism back then except for the soundbites of equality and Women's Rights.

That all changed the day I was given a simple warning from my boss.

My boss wasn't the bad guy in this situation. I don't work for him anymore but I still like and respect him. He was basically looking out for me. Apparently because of an argument that was overheard between myself and a woman from a different department, the supervisor of this woman decided to make an informal complaint against me. I later learned that this supervisor hadn't even heard the argument, just our elevated voices, nor had the woman I argued with made any complaints to her against me.

Women should never be hit by men, not even in self-defense because men are stronger; however, sometimes men deserve to be hit for the unforgivable crime of being honest if a woman asks you if she looks fat or if he upsets a woman in some way. This is why we were arguing, because I took issue with that sentiment. My boss, being the old school "look out for his guys" man that he was felt it necessary to warn me.

"Stay away from that one. You don't want a sexual harassment charge."

Needless to say I was at a loss for words. I knew he didn't think I did anything he was just explaining to me without explaining to me that I could be fired over a sexual harassment complaint for an argument. I'm on good terms with the woman I argued with. She later saw the ridiculousness of what she said. I still to this day don't know if I've even met the supervisor who made the complaint against me. But that day did something to me. It made me mad; furious. I wasn't fired. However, there was a complaint lodged against me by a faceless accuser and no one wanted to hear my side of the story. I knew I hadn't done anything wrong, at least no more than the woman I argued with so why was I being treated like a criminal and warned about sexual harassment charges? Why was everyone given a voice in this situation but me?

I went on youtube, for the first time I believe. I don't remember what I typed in the search bar. Probably something along the lines of "WHAT THE F#&K!?" I soon became one of the many youtube "debaters" who would seek out videos where I know people will be saying things I disagree with. That got old. I wasn't angry anymore but I still felt like I needed to do something to right the wrong done to me. Then I stumbled across a video on an account called TheHappyMisogynist.

After that things just started falling into place. At first I was just ripping off Paul's style. Then I tried, with my blog at least, to do some things different. I never really had a "red pill" moment. In fact I think this is the first time I've ever typed red pill and I write fiction so that's really saying something. What I received through videos on men's issues was a name for one of the major reasons why men's issues continue to exist; feminism. Everyone I saw who flew the feminist banner spewed the same hateful garbage. Some fluffed it up in ludicrous theories while others proudly shouted their hatred of the male sex. It was always obvious to me that a bias against men existed. Now I had a name for it.

Those who follow the feminist ideology propagate that all men need feminism's "end violence against women" and "men can stop rape" classes as young boys to prevent them from being abusers and rapists as men.

I am not a dog that needs to be trained to lick at the heel of the feminist ideology.

After writing for Men's News Daily, I was invited to write for A Voice for Men, though I still wanted to do more. I've been interested in creating music for a large portion of my life. Artists tend to put their ideals into their work and thus the message that men and boys are not the oppressive overlords that feminists claim made its way into my music.

When time in-between my two jobs permit, I'll be busy producing content for my website and AVfM. Men are human beings, not abusers. Masculinity and male sexuality are not an affront to women's humanity and no feminist is the authority on what makes a man good or bad.

Spread the word.

[image]Having been born and raised in an Eastern European country, I've seen a lot of ugly stuff and I've seen what many have only read about in biased books.

I come from a family where longevity is rather the norm. I've personally met one of my great-grandfathers, two great-grandmothers and both my maternal and paternal grandparents. I have made audio recordings and written statements that go back to 1880s and I made them with people that have actually lived through those times. One of my great-grandmothers, for instance, lived through both World Wars and survived multiple bombings – whilst on the radio she was told that the Allies were "the good guys" that were not bombing civilian establishments. Yeah right! I might have met some more of my great-grandfathers, had it not been for the World Wars that claimed their lives.

Most of my old relatives are now dead, after living unusually long lives, but what I've learned from them gives me a unique perspective which is far more comprehensive than any history book can provide.

For the last 24 years I've seen my country and the entirety of Eastern Europe going rapidly from oppressive Marxist-Leninist governments to oppressive "progressive" Marxist-Feminist governments. It was an even more spectacular transformation than what the former West had. In the former West it took 40 years to transform the society to be unrecognizable, whilst in lest than 25 years, the same thing happened in Eastern Europe.

Admittedly, the previous 50 years of oppressive Stalinism represented an advantage, but the transformation was so deep that Romania from 1994, when Gheorghe Hagi conquered the United States in the World Cup, to 2013, Romania seems like a totally different country and society.

I started learning my first foreign language at the age of 3, then electronics at the age of 4. I knew how a satellite analog antenna worked and how to install it before I started school.

School was boring for me as I was always a few steps ahead. Fortunately for me, at that time this was appreciated, unlike now. Had I been 10 or 15 years older, I would have never graduated from high school, or even elementary school because I would have been deemed as "grossly offensive" or punished for "grossly affecting others' self-esteem".

I'm not kidding. In the Romanian elementary schools of today a student can be penalized for reading the lessons ahead of time or for knowing too much more than the average student in the classroom.

Then I went to college and I tried, really, really tried to hold on until graduation. But I didn't. I keep telling myself that it was because of the money but the fact is that it was boring, and the feminization of Universities had just begun. Thankfully, I was out of there before it hit really bad.

Times were tough. I had my first job at the age of 12 and worked throughout my schooling. This gave me the opportunity to get used to being self-reliant and get away from dependency – it allowed me to grow up even faster.

I took the pink pill during high school, but chugged the red pill all the way through less than 10 years ago whilst volunteering for an NGO. Cultural Marxism (or political correctness, if you prefer) was already mainstream, along with its friend, feminism, but during my stay at that NGO, I had the opportunity to see a lot of cases that completely went against every single element of the official narrative about men and women, about race, about class, or any other favorite topic of the ideologues.

Maybe someday I will go into details, but the thing is that once you see these things happening, you can't un-see them – and once I got the first reactions after I started writing about these issues, I knew that I got things right. As the old saying goes, if you want to find out who rules over you, find out who you can't criticize.

My parents' generation was told that it is a "sacrifice generation." Now my generation is being told exactly the same thing. Well, I'm done being of sacrificed for anyone and I'm done being disposable. And that brings me here, at A Voice for Men, offering my unapologetic perspective in an attempt to contribute to a global FTSU.

[image]I was born in the mid 1960's, bringing up the tail end of the Baby Boom. My dad was a retired cop who taught criminal justice at a community college and my mom was a homemaker (previously a psychiatric nurse.) Both of them were older than most of their peers when they married and they are still alive and still married after five and a half decades. I was the fourth of five children and the youngest girl, and yes I identified with Cindy Brady, although I was jealous of her perfect hair.

We were raised in a small but growing town in the distant Chicago suburbs. Although all five of us were born in Albuquerque, I for one am very Midwestern at heart. My childhood was perfectly dull and fairly ordinary, though I regret to say I took for granted the proximity of Chicago. It never occurred to me until adulthood that the world was not full of people who routinely took family trips or school field trips, to some of the finest museums in the world. We kids shared a paper route, and throughout the summers we were free to ride our bikes all over town.

For a few years there, our front sidewalk was "home base" for nightly neighborhood games of Kick the Can. On those occasions when we all met on someone else's front steps, the whole "gang" knew the tone of Dad's piercing whistle when it was time to head home. We also watched a lot of "educational" movies on the screened porch, that Dad checked out along with a projector, from the college library.

I was a mediocre student, very bright but introverted and rather lazy, and reading was my favorite thing in the world. Hiking through the local nature park and writing were my second and third favorites. My career goal was to be a high school English teacher, though I secretly wanted to be a cop. In hindsight I'm glad I never became either. I attended college for three years, majoring in English with enough electives to minor in French, Psychology and the Sociology of College Town Bars. I dropped out in 1986, hoping to finish my degree at a school closer to home, but I never did.

Two years later I was married. We bought our first house, had our only child, and transferred to rural central Indiana where we stayed for eighteen years. That was an education. A whole lot of Hoosiers don't quite know how to use helping verbs. Or turn signals. Overall though, it was a good place to raise a child, and I now live on the east coast. Throughout those years I worked at a series of "mom jobs," full or part time as needed, with flexible schedules, and often low wages. Although I had to work, "Wife and Mother" was my career. My job titles included retail clerk, cleaning lady, machine operator, bank teller, Ford salesman, realtor, day care "teacher," substitute teacher, veterinary receptionist, library clerk and bookmobile driver. Not surprisingly, also during those years I neglected my reading and writing almost entirely.

When my son joined the military, I thought I'd try to write a crime novel, to give myself some focus while adjusting to my new identity as an empty nester. I joined Blogger to follow some cop blogs and familiarize myself with their world, and I started a blog of my own. Through the cop blogs I found a few gun blogs, and heck I love to shoot, and what a cool community of writers! Then I discovered Captain Capitalism, who introduced me to Dalrock, and suddenly I found myself immersed in the Manosphere. And the world finally made sense.

Not only am I an introvert, I have never been "one of the girls." I never understood girls and how girls think and interact. It was as if their words had different definitions than those found in the dictionary, and I never caught on to their usage. All my life I have been more comfortable around males than around females. I knew where I stood with guys; they said want they meant and they meant what they said. Not that they confided much in me, but what they did say was open and frank.

Needless to say, discovering a dozen or so websites where men speak freely, was a revelation. It wasn't just a new perspective on old questions, it was all new questions! Important questions that I had never thought to ask. Questions that I soon realized nobody was supposed to ask. And for me personally, questions that would likely have profound effects on my son's life, whether I addressed them or not!

I spent the better part of a year reading and learning, debating and thinking. I started making regular donations to a couple of sites but I knew I could do more if I wanted to, and I probably should. However I've never been political; I have always despised the naked hypocrisy of every political movement I've encountered. I'm not a "joiner;" groups and communities don't hold much appeal to me. I was not a reformer and I was not a proclaimer. But I am now. One day I emailed Paul Elam and asked if there was anything I could do in West Virginia, to help publicize Judge Lori Jackson's kangaroo court. There was. I hit the ground running and I have no intention of stopping.

[image]Being born in the mid 50?s, I grew up in a much different world than we live in today. My father was career military, serving faithfully through two wars and bearing the scars to prove it. My mother served as well, being an army wife and raising three boys. She earned a masters degree with honors after, and only after, that job was done.

My youth, of course, was rocked by the late 60?s and early 70?s, as was the rest of the country. I came to question and suspect, as did most everyone my age, everything my parents stood for. It took some time to figure out that my father wasn't the guy that got us into Viet-Nam, he was just a soldier doing his job. I also figured out my mother wasn't a domestic slave, just a woman who put her family first.

It also dawned on me that what they stood for was work, sacrifice and above all else, their children.

I did my own stint in the service and found myself unsuited for the grueling conformity and dedication to tedium it requires in peacetime, though I can't imagine I would have preferred walking in my fathers footsteps to the battlefield. The fashionable rebelliousness I acquired in adolescence didn't help, but it made things a lot more interesting.

Unsuitable for the military and uninterested in manual labor I eventually escaped to college. After a few attempts at majoring in beer, I settled on psychology and minored, according to the faculty, in driving them to giddy fascination with razor blades and other sharp objects. Apparently the military had not beaten the irreverence for authority out of me.

The problem with college is that it almost always leads to a job, unless you stay there and teach. I liked the idea of not working very much but the conformity required in academia rivals that of the military. Been there, done that, if you'll forgive such a blatant clich.

I wanted something really easy to do so I chose a career of trying to talk crack heads and alcoholics into staying out of bars and crack houses. That turned out to be almost as hard as reasoning with professors, but it was also for a much better cause. I stayed with it for the better part of twenty years.

Interesting thing about counseling addicts; you can only talk about booze and dope so much. Sooner or later you have to get around to other things like work, social life and the lot.

Like marriage and family.

Addiction takes it's toll across the board. Much of the recovery from it is repairing damage. The addicts family is often the biggest casualty. It's a given in the treatment world that including the spouse is essential; that we are, in actuality, treating the family and marriage as opposed to treating the individual.

This is difficult work at best, but it got even more complicated. Somewhere along the way, about the time gender feminism stepped in to commandeer the realm of therapy, we stopped really treating addiction. The entire field seemed to morph into one giant episode of Sally Jesse Raphael. We began to identify and treat masculinity as the disease, not the addiction. The preferred treatment modality was emasculation, and the profession proceeded with that wholesale. Or as one psychotherapist once told me, just before being paid to address a group of male clients, "I love to take men's macho bullshit and shove it down their throats."

She wasn't kidding, and she wasn't looking any more differently at me than she did the male clients.

She also wasn't an exception. Many of the clinicians I worked with took the same view of men and masculinity. It was a positively hateful environment. The insurance companies didn't bat an eye. They continued to pay. Treatment continued to suffer. And as time passed, relationships suffered more. Anti-male hate speech filtered it's way into therapy and the culture at large in the same way tabloid journalism took over the news. Mainly because it sold.

It still does.

Having the unusual notion that it was more my job to counsel addicts than to neuter men and worship women, it often put me at odds with the prevailing powers. Never subscribing to the adage “If you can’t beat em, join ‘em,” I fought. In many ways I got my ass kicked.

The old saying goes, you can’t fight city hall. That may be true, but it’s nothing compared to fighting titty hall. Not even close.

I’ll have to ask your forgiveness for the digression, but this is my story. It forms who I am and what I do as surely as my childhood and education. And it leaves me here, at A Voice for Men, offering thoughts and annoyances to those more interested in finding their way out of the morass than in finding someone to blame.

Michael Kimmel Defends NOMAS, Misandry and the Promotion of Bigotry

Paul Elam · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I posted an open letter to Dr. Robert Brannon of the National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS) regarding their upcoming conference on men and masculinity. The letter was also sent to Dr. Brannon via Email.

In it, I expressed concerns over what appears to be positions and activities by NOMAS that are in diametric opposition to their stated goal of "enhancing men's lives," namely the absence of any attention to the many legitimate struggles faced collectively by men and boys in modern culture. I also expressed concern over their pervasive negative stereotyping of men as violent, power obsessed anathemas to civilized society.

The email also included a suggestion that they support the upcoming Male Studies Symposium at Wagner College, which brings an objective and academically sound approach to studying the condition of men and boys in modern culture.

On behalf of NOMAS, I was contacted with a response via email by Michael Kimmel, a sociology professor at Stony Brook, State University of New York, purportedly to address the concerns of my letter.

Unfortunately, in a few thin paragraphs Kimmel managed only to amplify the concerns about NOMAS's activities and confirms the crypto-misandric sexism that is clearly the true agenda of the organization.

Here is Kimmel's complete and unedited response:

Paul:

Bob Brannon circulated your email message about the National Conference on Men and Masculinity, sponsored by NOMAS. I thought I would take a minute to reply.

NOMAS is a unique organization about masculinity because it rests on four co-equal principles, just as a table rests on four legs. (1) We are pro-feminist, which means we believe in gender equality. (2) We are gay-affrmative, which means we suppor the rights of all men to live lives of dignity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their sexuality. (3) We are anti-racist, which means that, again, we support the rights of all men to live lives of integrity and love, free of all discrimination, regardless of their race. (4)And we believe in "enhancing men's lives" by which we mean that we want to enable all men to live lives of integrity and happiness.

Unlike other organizations, we believe that all four of these elements are essential — indeed, we believe that one cannot enhance men's lives without committing to the struggles against racism, sexism, and homophobia. These four principles cannot be separated.

Our conferences, therefore, address many of the issues you raise But we raise them in context – a social context in which, sadly, gender, racial and, sexuality discrimination and inequality are still very much with us. So, we will discuss many of the themes you raise — Intimate Partner Violence, parenting, engaging men as involved fathers, sustaining that involvement after divorce, engaging boys in school, health issues and epidemiological disparities — and many that you don't mention, like the repeal of Don't Ask, Don't Tell, the crisis of black males in the inner city, supporting gay fathers as involved fathers, HIV risk reduction. However, I suspect by placing them in the larger contexts of persistent institutional and interpersonal inequalities, as we do, we probably won't agree very much about how to remedy these problems.

I should point out, though that the national Conference on Men and Masculinity includes a Men's Studies Conference, which, together with the American Men's Studies Association's annual conference – both of which have been taking place for about two decades — provides ample evidence that a robust and healthy field of Masculinity Studies already exists and is well institutionalized in the U.S. and abroad. This includes several international journals, 3 encyclopedia sets, a several theoretical and methodological handbooks for people researching the field, and numerous books series and other materials. No need to think your conference at Wagner is "creating" a new field. The field is strong, diverse, and remarkably exciting already. I myself have been working to build this field for nearly 30 years.

Good luck.

Now, the largely non responsive and dismissive language Kimmel uses, combined with the activities of the organization, raises a fundamental question, not only about NOMAS, but about the entire field of "men's studies" as it is practiced today.

Are these people academicians pursuing the study of masculinity to enhance the lives of men and boys, or are they simply educated political whores, seeking to repress any legitimate studies in the area they claim to represent?

Even cursory objectivity confirms the latter.

First, there are the four legs of NOMAS's metaphorical table, none of which support the weight of the organizations hypocrisy. They fail the strength test in the following four ways:

1) Confining the belief in equality to feminists is disingenuous and incredulously infers that disagreement with feminist ideologues amounts to being anti-equality. It also ignores the great body of feminist literature that is misandric and advocates female superiority. 2) Being supportive of men and boys cannot be tied legitimately to a political agenda based on sexual orientation any more than it can be based on shoe size. It is a non sequitur clearly driven by political motives. 3) The issues of men and boys are not a function of race, unless you consider how legislation like VAWA, which NOMAS supports, inflicts disproportionate damage on African-American communities already brimming with disenfranchised men. Leg three of their table is a race card played to garner support from one of the communities that suffers the most from their work. 4) This is the most unstable leg of NOMAS's table in that it is predicated on a complete and clearly intentional falsehood. A very limited overview taken from NOMAS's website points unambiguously to how they view the majority of men:

NOMAS denounces father's rights groups as "male supremacist" and accuses them of encouraging child abuse. In reality it is NOMAS that encourages real harm to children by actively undermining the father-child bond on a broad social scale. NOMAS asserts that the only reason a father would fight an allegation of abuse by the mother during a divorce, or attempt to gain access to, or custody of, his child, is to "punish her for leaving."

And that is just one of many outrageous slurs from NOMAS against the people whose lives they claim to "enhance."

NOMAS endorses the New York Model dealing with batterers, which identifies them as unsuitable for psychological treatment and better handled through the criminal justice system, even while they steadfastly cling to the myth that domestic violence is a male only offense. The result of this can only be that female batterers are enabled to repeat abuses on spouses and children, and men alone are identified as perpetrators and are incarcerated as incorrigible social liabilities.

NOMAS, though the words of their founder, Robert Brannon, suggests that men who hire prostitutes are rapists, because prostitutes cannot be considered to be making an informed decision to engage in sex for money. In doing so, he creates false victims of women and false perpetrators of men with a line of reasoning so myopic it could only be the result of an underlying agenda.

NOMAS officer Barry Goldstein, who is also co-chair of the organizations Task Group on Child Custody, argues that family courts are biased- against women. In a glaring example of denial that would shame an alcoholic, Goldstein totally reverses the reality of family courts that are corrupt and biased against fathers, and presents us with a fantasy world in which we need to take action to provide women even more leverage in a system that is already rigged in their favor.

This is the same strategy common throughout the NOMAS organization, which appears to follow the same disturbing methodology- determine the political position on an issue, generate evidence by any means necessary that supports the agenda, ignore any evidence that doesn't support the agenda (and if evidence can't be ignored, demonize the messenger), and finally, present the information to the world at large with the fraudulent claim that it was a result of scholarly investigation.

This brings to the sad reality that we are in, and have been for some time, a crisis of authenticity in the study of men and boys. And a crises of moral integrity.

In fact, there is very little legitimate pursuit of male studies and organizations like NOMAS are playing their part as much as possible not to advance those studies, but to make sure they never happen. One element of the repression is demonstrated by Kimmel resting on 30 years of pursuit of those studies, which has not resulted in a single men's studies degree. And we witness another as we watch women's studies programs across the nation begin to change their name to "gender" studies, with no corresponding change in curriculum. The ploy here is obvious. "Gender studies" implies coverage for both males and females, even when coursework and degree programs tailored for men do not exist. It is a preemptive move designed to forestall the inevitability that at some point the detrimental effects of misandry, as furthered by organizations like NOMAS, would require scholarly investigation in order to ameliorate.

The posturing from Kimmel is symbolic of that crisis, and common to those who embrace the unwholesome marriage of activism and scholarly pursuits. For what Kimmel asserts here is not a quest for knowledge, but personal and organizational hegemony over an entire field of study. It is an arrogant and dangerous approach that, by necessity, corrupts scholarly integrity to serve a political agenda.

And indeed this is the stated creed of NOMAS, who on their website openly declare that they are "activist scholars." It is a quintessential oxymoron, exposing the fact front and center that these men are no more scholarly than Dr. Phil.

In what is purely political activism on behalf of feminists, the gay and lesbian community and other "victim groups," NOMAS and a host of other organizations and university departments have surrendered their academic credibility and acted to repress any legitimate investigation of the male condition. And in doing so, they have taken on the authoritarian tone reminiscent of the medieval church, clinging hostilely to the orthodoxy they serve in the face of emerging science and enlightenment that they view as a threat.

Miles Groth, Ph.D., is a professor of psychology at Wagner College, which will host the Male Studies Symposium sponsored by the On Step Institute in April of 2010. In email communications I questioned Dr. Groth about the philosophical differences between the prevailing model of "men's" or "gender" studies now in place in universities across the western world, and the "male studies" initiatives like the one underway by the On Step institute.

"Gender Studies programs and departments claimed to include as many courses on men as on women," says Groth, "In fact, courses such as "Psychology of Men" or "Literature by and about Men" are rare, both as stand-alone courses in departments or in Gender Studies curricula (usually as electives). Often such courses are not welcome and there is pressure on faculties to reject the acceptance of such courses—unless they explicitly indicate that they are grounded in profeminist ideology." [Italics mine]

Groth goes on to state that the Male studies initiative was actually a reaction to this reality. "Such restrictions have led to the current initiative, begun several years ago by the On Step Institute and launched on May 27, 2009, with a conference at NYU's Steidhardt School of Culture, Education and Human Development on "The Future of Men," to form a Male Studies department at a major research university."

"The goal is to begin by creating Male Studies programs, then undergraduate degrees in this academic discipline. Ultimately, there will be a master's and terminal (PhD) degrees offered in the discipline. Hence the name of the Wagner teleconference–"Male Studies: A New Academic Discipline."

So, contrary to the assertions of Kimmel, which rest on the wobbly table with the rest of NOMAS's rhetoric, Male Studies is, in fact, a new discipline. And it is bound to raise even more ire as it gains momentum.

But in the words of Mahatma Ghandi, a prime example of masculinity and an icon of activism, "First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you win."

It appears round one is about to start.

You can support the On Step Institute by attending Male Studies Conference online. The cost is $15.00, and the proceeds will go to helping OSI establish Male Studies as a new academic discipline that will genuinely enhance the lives of men.

A Garden Variety Nightmare

Paul Elam · 25 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I get email from readers in trouble on a fairly regular basis. Most of the time it is men looking for a divorce lawyer or those trying to defend themselves from a false accusation. I seldom have a place to send them for any relief.

Upon occasion I get someone's "whole" story. Many of them are standard, men falling under the oppressive thumb of a family court system that is to the idea of justice what cigarettes are to pulmonary health.

Last might though, I got the following from a reader, Mr. Rick Welsh. It is a story that demonstrates in clear detail many of the things that plague the life of the modern American man. It will shock few who frequent these pages regularly. But I hope it might serve as a warning to the uninitiated visitor, especially if you are a man contemplating marriage.

And I present it here with a message to you. This is one mans account of his story. It is written in his words and I cannot vouch for its accuracy. But if anyone tells you this could not happen to you, seek advice elsewhere.

Preface

As you read this I may very well be incarcerated, as I am to be sentenced March 17, 2010 on felony non-payment of child support. This post may very well be the only means I have of voicing my concerns for myself, and others who, through no fault of their own, have no financial resources to affect change prior to sentencing. Perhaps this letter will bring about necessary change, before others have dealings with the unfairness and unfortunate nastiness of the public servants of Ingham County's Friend of the Court (FOC.) I can't leave out some attorneys of the AG's office, who seemingly feel it necessary to put notches in their belts to secure their employment, at the expense of many of us. Simply put, I just don't find where they are sincere about having the children's best interest at heart. How unfortunate!

As many of you know, fairness is meted out to those who have financial resources, or if they have family/friends in the system.

In my case, I do expect a small settlement whereas I can tend to my arrearage, but not for some time if I am incarcerated. So it is not like I am a deadbeat father. More on this explained in the following.

Background

I hit forty-eight years old last week. As a troubled teen, I managed to accrue three non-violent felonies. I faced the consequences and have not had any troubles with the law since. In fact I've worked hard, continued my education and helped youths navigate in the sometimes awkward teen years in a positive way as a youth leader and Sunday school teacher. In 2004 I took a position with the Department of Defense as a contractor, (DOD only requires a seven year background check) working in Iraq to logistically support our troops and to assist Iraqi's in the rebuilding of their infrastructure.

In 2005 my wife filed for divorce while I was in South Tikrit, Iraq. Shortly after being served papers in a war zone I found our joint account closed and she had taken our money. I had little recourse being out of the Country and had to settle on an attorney via email who happily took my money each pay period but didn't do one thing for me.

The Court ordered sole custody and over $1,300.00 per month in support/medical for my young daughter to be managed by my ex-wife. Though not relevant, my ex made then and makes now a great living; certainly more than I did at the time. The support and custody was decided before I could get my leave papers to return home. When I did return to Michigan, I found my truck moved from the garage and left next to the road; covered in graffiti, tires slashed, and my ex had left my home unfortunately, unattended.

To my ex wife's credit upon my return, she did allow me to visit my daughter on weekends for the six weeks I was home. It was hard to leave my daughter and return to Iraq but I needed to return in order to make the amount of money to keep up with the high support payments. I also needed to return because the State of Michigan does not expunge felony records regardless of the number of years that have passed (over 30 years in my case) making it impossible for me to obtain suitable employment.

Injured In Iraq

February 2007- I was severely injured in Iraq, examined in the M.A.S.H. unit and instructed to seek medical help immediately upon my return to the States to include an MRI as their field x-rays showed suspect but inconclusive damage to the c5-c6 areas of my spine.

My Return Stateside

February 2007 – Though I paid my mandatory insurance premiums every month AIG refused treatment. I sought medical and used my meager savings for a basic diagnostic and again was referred for a MRI which I was unable to afford.

As a result, or along with, my medical issues I was unable to focus, sleep, eat, etc. I lived in Mexico for 6 months before returning to the States where I roamed aimlessly, sleeping under overpasses and park benches. I contacted a friend who had served in Iraq with me and he convinced me to join him and his family in Southern Oregon.

Eventually I arrived in Oregon at which point my friend sought immediate emotional help for me. They were able to locate a clinic in Austin (Union Treatment Centers) who were just beginning a pro-bono PTSD program for returning contractors. I was diagnosed with Combat Post Traumatic Stress Disorder Chronic/Severe, Agoraphobia Chronic/Severe.

Because I was a Chronic Pain patient as well they had a physical therapist perform medical tests and determined I had suffered a torn rotator cup as well as the neck injury at no charge to me. The clinic submitted another request to AIG for an immediate MRI and it was denied. Four months later the Union Treatment Centers' funding ran out and patients were on their own. I returned to Southern Oregon where I lived for nearly a year.

Part of my PTSD treatment was to face avoidance issues. We set small goals and worked out steps I would need to take to achieve them. Renewing my relationship with my daughter and possible child support arrears issues were at the top of my list. We contacted the Michigan Bar for a list of pro-bono attorneys to no avail. We searched the Internet for Lansing, MI area attorneys and called several only to find that their pro-bono funds were exhausted for that year. We were referred to Thomas M. Cooley Law School's Center of Ethics, Service, & Professionalism whose response was; "Dear Mr. Welch: Because our program is not available to contractors, I don't think we can assist you in this matter."

I'm wondering … why not contractors? Next, I contacted Loomis Law firm of Lansing, MI, to inform them that I was aware of a balance I still owed for services rendered and would settle when my settlement comes in. During that correspondence an attorney from the Loomis Law firm, Theresa Sheets, offered to take my case pro-bono. Theresa Sheets and her assistant Beth Owen advised me to lay low and be patient. When I asked if I could get on general assistance they responded that it would require a social security number (helping FOC to locate me) and advised against it reiterating for me to be patient.

They knew I was living in the mountains and eating what fish I could catch and yet I learned they never even filed a motion to adjust child support, didn't respond to my many pleas for updates, etc. After eight months of being patient I finally received an apologetic email at my friend's residence in Oregon from Theresa Sheets stating that they were too busy to continue pro-bono and wished me luck. I have emails to support this action which I deem unprofessional.

Frustrated, I contacted the F.O.C. for myself without counsel and was that ever a huge mistake. I emailed Larry Harrison, an Enforcement Officer and introduced myself. I briefly updated him on what was going on with me, offered documents and contact numbers to assist him in verifying my assertions and assured him that I wanted to resolve issues. This is his response verbatim: "Rick. You need to contact me immediately. I am in the process of seeking a felony warrant on you and have you extradited back to Michigan." (I thought I had done just that)

In response, I told him I thought he sounded hostile to someone trying to resolve issues. I asked if he would set up a 'Show Cause Hearing' allowing me at least ten days lead time for travel, as I would be hitchhiking. His next response was commending me for taking care of this matter, etc. In retrospect, I should have been suspicious but I trusted him because of his position. (Never make that mistake…get counsel!) A show cause hearing was set for January 16th.

About 1 month prior to leaving Oregon for the Show Cause. I felt ready to start working on communicating with my ex and with my daughter. I was shocked to get a response from my ex like the one I did. She wrote me and encouraged the idea of me slowly entering my daughter's life again. She also said that she would forgive most of the accumulated back arrears as she was certain I wasn't making the kind of money I once was (She was unaware I had been injured). Things seemed to be moving in the right direction and I was ecstatic.

I hitched as far as South Dakota and nearly froze to death. A couple saw me under an overpass, stopped and saw my condition. They took me to the nearest Greyhound depot where I called my friends from Oregon who sent me money for a round trip ticket to Lansing and back to Oregon and extra for a room and food when I arrived in Lansing.

I phoned Mr. Harrison (FOC Enforcement officer) again when I arrived in Lansing and left a message letting him know I would be there on time, where I would be staying and left a message asking him to phone if he had any questions of me. He must not have had any questions.

I arrived an hour early for my Show Cause hearing and checked in. The security door to the offices opened and my ex-wife was called in. Roughly twenty minutes later, two Lansing police officers arrived and went behind the security door and then returned to the lobby and flanked me. I knew I was going to be arrested but had no idea why. I assumed the position and cooperated fully. I was lead towards the exit when the Director – Shauna Dunnings asked the officers to bring me to her. She introduced herself and said "I know that you and your ex had an agreement worked out but the Attorney General's office handed down a felony arrest warrant and it is out of our hands."

In the Lansing Police Station, I was booked and put into a cell. Hours later I was arraigned by Judge Garcia who denied me a Personal Recognizance bond because I didn't live in Michigan. This is where I began to learn that the AG's office wasn't only trying to get me for a felony, but because of my 30 year old felonies they attached a 4th habitual offender charge as well. Now being tagged with a habitual offender charge I could spend up to 15 years in prison. (I have never committed a violent crime in my life nor would I ever.)

I was given a public defender and spent 48 days in one of the most violent cell blocks because of the habitual charge. I informed the jailers at booking of the U.S. Department of Labor's findings of my disability, chronic pain and severe PTSD. They never put me into a medical cell block. I spent a total of 52 days on the top bunk of a steel rack and could barely walk, let alone be shackled and walking. Finally I appeared before the Circuit Court Judge who had yet to hear from me at all. The AG offered to suspend sentencing for 11 months seemingly allowing me time to get my back compensation for my injuries.

The Judge released me from custody except I had a hold for Jackson, MI on a non-active support with outstanding arrears due to my injuries. The difference here was that it was a 'show cause' hearing so I was able to speak directly to the Judge. After hearing my plight he asked the bailiff to search the Internet for my claims attorney, called a recess and called my claims attorney from his chambers. Thirty minutes later he returned to the court room and said; 'Mr. Welch I have just hung up from an enlightening conversation with your claims attorney who validated what you have articulated to me and expounded on legal matters of particular interest to me.' He then addressed the Jackson County F.O.C. representatives saying; 'I do not find Mr. Welch in contempt of court. Release him from custody.'

After being released from Jackson County I made my way back to Lansing in the middle of a severe cold snap. I went to the Ingham County F.O.C. to request my support be modified. I had no idea who my caseworker is, and still don't, though I have tried repeatedly to speak with said person. The clerk informed me that my caseworker was not in, so I requested Larry Harrison as he is the only person I knew who was familiar with my case. After some time, Larry Harrison and another enforcement officer stormed into the waiting room where I was. He walked toward me in a confrontational manner and asked; "What are you looking for?" as if I were challenging him by merely being there.

I told him I hoped to have my support amount modified and he told me I was using the wrong verbiage. He gave me the general question form which I filled out. I turned the form in to the clerk and started to leave.

Unbeknownst to me and evidently to Larry Harrison, there was another person in the waiting room and that person was a channel 3 news reporter named Jon Erickson. Mr. Erickson asked if he could interview me for a news segment. Even though I wanted to blab to the world everything that had transpired, I was very much afraid it might affect my endeavors to adjust my child support. Who knows what the ramifications of whistle blowing on the entire F.O.C. might be. I wasn't the only one worried as evident by Larry Harrison and the Director Shauna Dunnings's sudden appearance. They shadowed the interview and just before the camera was turned on Larry Harrison interrupted Mr. Erickson and I to offer assistance in finding a different caseworker for me to speak with. I declined. I resolved to offer a careful interview and to offer pertinent advice to others who may end up unable to meet their child support obligations. Archived transcripts of the interview can be accessed via the link below.

http://www.wlaj.com/news/child-14628-support-less.html

I strongly suspect that the Ingham County F.O.C.'s enforcement officer Larry Harrison was irritated by my pointing out his callousness, and went out of his way to push for the AG to hand down a felony arrest warrant prior to my show cause date so that I would not be able to speak directly to the Judge as he undoubtedly knew the results would be similar to the outcome of my Jackson show cause hearing. I believe he intended to manipulate the system simply to make me pay for having taken exception with his unprofessionalism.

I returned to Oregon and agreed to take my friends up on their invitation to stay with them until my settlement or sentencing.

Ten months later we finally received a date for a formal hearing in federal court regarding my claims (in June 2010). I forwarded this great and long awaited news to my public defender who took the news to the AG's office. The person in charge of my case from the AG's office (Mitch something) said that he would agree to postpone sentencing until after my claims court date. I still needed to come across country for my February 2010 sentencing date and Mitch would ask the Judge to postpone my sentencing. When I showed up, once again I was misled, and the AG's office moved to have the court sentence me immediately instead of requesting a postponement. Furious, I asked my attorney to try to pull my plea, but the Judge denied the motion.

My hope is that I will be able to put this behind me and move on with my life though it will be with another felony on my record. I am hoping to be an important part of my daughter's life, and to receive medical, emotional and financial compensation after over three years of waiting.

Sadism, Sodomy and Other Forms of Justice

Renada Williams got mad at her boyfriend. So she had him beaten, raped and tortured.

According to Philadelphia police, Williams, who was angry at her 29 year old lover for undetermined reasons, orchestrated a plan of revenge so sadistic and unconscionable that readers must be warned in advance that the details are graphic and disturbing.

Williams lured the man into her bedroom with the promise of sex. At some point, she excused herself from the room and returned with two assailants, including one juvenile, whom she had recruited to express her considerable displeasure. She enlisted the men's help by alleging that the victim had previously raped her.

The two attacked the innocent man in William's presence, pummeling him with fists, even as he denied having committed rape.

Then the beating worsened. The assailants dragged the man from the bed and tied him to a sofa where they went after him with a 4 by 4 wood plank, extension cords and a mop. Police reported that the wood plank inflicted multiple lacerations. The perpetrators doused the open wounds in Clorox bleach and ammonia.

Next, they sodomized him repeatedly with a mop handle, which they lubricated with Pine-Sol cleaner.

The attack lasted 24 hours, and would likely have continued to a deadly end had Williams's roommate not arrived and managed to free the victim, despite attempts by the trio to prevent her from dialing 9-1-1 and notifying authorities.

The reaction from police to the case was predictable. "This type of crime shocks your consciousness," said Detective Captain Jack McGinnis.

There was no indication if he was referring to the brutality of the two men, or the vile scheming of the woman involved. Perhaps it was both.

It hardly matters.

Because, our repugnance aside, we might at some point need to wonder what difference there is between Renada Williams and Crystal Gail Mangum, the infamous liar and false accuser of the Duke Rape case, other than they each sought a different form of power to enforce their will.

And I say we "might" wonder, because it seems apparent that we should actually be asking a question that is really more to the point.

What is the difference between the assailants in this case and the criminal justice system itself?

As it applies to the crime of rape, the answer is a simple as it is disturbing; negligible.

With all the indignation and repulsion we feel for the almost unspeakable things happened to this man, we learn absolutely nothing from it if we don't recognize that what happened here is not so different than what we sanction and justify routinely in the name of justice.

When it comes to rape, even the substantial number of them that are of the concocted variety, we pay officials to react with the same destructive mindlessness as those two disgusting automatons acting on behalf of Williams. Indeed, we cheer them on as surely as she must have done while they violated and abused an innocent man.

So, perhaps we should not be so outraged when private citizens emulate the actions of people that we vote for and admiringly call the guardians of the public peace. Thugs with mop handles are thugs with mop handles, even if we dress them in black robes, or call them Mr. Prosecutor.

You see, those two culprits weren't torturing a human being. No, no, no. They were delivering some by-god-law- and-order on behalf of us decent folk. The enforcers acting at William's behest were doing so with no less regard for presumed innocence than Mike Nifong or a slew of other state functionaries strewn across the Kafkaesque landscape of the American legal system.

It's the stuff of Mel Gibson movies; Charles Bronson in slightly older school terms; not justice, but naked vengeance. And as a culture, we eat it up like beggars at a free buffet.

It is a biologically driven bloodlust to protect women by playing hero for them. Any of them. At times we play that role so well that we look at a lying, skanky, and drug addled hooker- and imagine that she is actually a damsel in distress. Then we can go after a bunch of college kids, who have never committed a crime in their lives, and seek to do everything we can to destroy them.

We created rape shield laws so that even when the accuser is a lying, skanky, and drug addled hooker, it can't be taken into account by jurors in determining her credibility. School administrations, like that at Duke University, will host rallies, light torches and instigate other fomentations. Media outlets across the land saturate us with the story and run features on the plight of women to drive in some emotional punch.

And unless the accused is able to prove quadriplegia or clinical death at the time of the alleged attack (and often when he can), most of us will sit and wait for the orgasmic moment that the hammer comes down on his head.

When those falsely accused are convicted, as many of them have been, they are sent to prisons where they are regarded as the lowest of the low, and are often subjected to the very tortures for which they were wrongfully convicted- over a period of years.

Yet we are outraged about this being done summarily, and on the street, rather than through the system?

Please.

The culprits in this case are nothing more than vigilantes that cut into the action of a system that routinely does the same under a thin facade of legal decorum that is every bit as manufactured as Williams' phony story.

Rape vigilantism and rape justice have simply become two different railroads, the latter only distinguished from the former by the pomp of placebo credibility, and the fact that vigilantes actually believe they are going after guilty people.

One might imagine that the scores of innocent men now imprisoned are not so comforted by all of this. That comfort is left to be enjoyed by the masses who patronize, buckets of popcorn in hand, the criminal justice systems theatre of lies.

And in the end, the poor unfortunate in this case may well have been lucky. His accuser could have sought, and would have received, help from the state, had she chosen them to act out her rage rather than a couple of hoodlums. The way things stand now, he has escaped with his life and his freedom, and he will get one benefit that seldom falls on those falsely accused.

There will be some who will believe his innocence and see him for the victim he actually is.

The plague of modern masculinity

Paul Elam · 1 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Scores of our young men today are stranded at an impasse on the road to realizing manhood. They are bogged down in the confusion of a generation lost to treacherous forces they never saw, for reasons they were never able to comprehend. They are struggling and starving; unable to feed their souls in a world that finds them increasingly unnecessary and burdensome.

They have come of age in a time of coerced impotence, their nascent masculinity gutted and stripped long before having the opportunity to shape their character and their destiny. In that they are suffering from the loss of things never held, from things missing but never known. They are, quite literally, a lost generation of the walking wounded, wandering blindly from a battlefield on which they never knew they stood.

In that light, the path they are on is not really a road to manhood, but simply a retreat from the effacing malice woven into the very fabric of their developmental lives. And it takes them not to safe ground, but directly into a dismal culture of shallowness and self-indulgence; a realm of options without obligations; of self-gratification without self-awareness or self-discipline. It is the death march of the western male, destined for a withering end ensured by intellectual, psychological and moral atrophy.

This aimless, narcissistic existence is a forced escape from lives shrouded in shame; from manhood being reduced to an evolutionary joke in the eyes of a culture that holds it in contempt, even as the elders deny it is happening. With the wholesale whitewashing by society and abandonment by the fathers more or less complete, the newly (de)engineered young man is all but defenseless against this downward spiral into terminal insignificance.

It's happening all around us. One only need look at current events to see that the world of men is quite literally circling the drain; disappearing from the stable foundations of education and employment. They are targeted with disinformation about crime and domestic violence, and about deviant sexual proclivities with women and children. These are no longer just the ruminations of twisted ideologues. The demagoguery now emanates directly from the government, backed by men with gavels, and men with guns. The judicial apparatus has been reshaped, not to pursue justice, but to incarcerate men at every opportunity, even to enable and encourage false accusations to accomplish that goal. This isn't just about male bashing any more. It is about male subjugation. And it is not being executed by feminists or women, but by men.

We might proffer that the solution is a redirection to days past, when we imagine that men made masters of sacred codes; when they possessed strength and purpose and would stand against this growing tragedy and defeat it. We would be wrong. We can only find that Thomas C. Wolfe was right. You can't go home again. And what's more, you really don't want to. It was, in a sense, home that got us here. And that is a truth we must face, no matter how natural or compelling the tendency to point to any other "outside" force and satisfy our frustrations with the simplistic convenience of an easily identified enemy.

As always, our true enemy is in the mirror. The only thing that will save us is to face up to that and act accordingly.

In the fitful and often strange world of the men's movement, we attempt to answer this social malady; to create a haven, if only an intellectual one, for the refugees of this godforsaken gender war. It is a mission often hobbled by our own hands, yet the work goes on, limping toward solutions. We strive, I think, as men who have awakened, to formulate an appropriate response, and in our own way to push some sanity and balance back into the collective consciousness; to force it past the architects of institutional misandry, both male and female. But even as we exert pressure, we don't have a firm grasp on what it is we are fighting.

We have not ascertained, nor have we even really thoroughly tried to, what role traditional manhood plays in the problem. Unfortunately, what we have too often done is practice the obstinate politics of wounded children who insist that they have no role in whatever befalls their lives. We have, at times, angrily and energetically reacted to misandry, but have balked with equal vigor at seriously examining how we fostered and enabled it with allegedly masculine codes of conduct. Consequently, all of our efforts rooted in this approach have failed, and miserably so. We have made some progress, and will no doubt eventually mature into a more effective movement, but not before we embrace more than the hostility we feel for perceived enemies.

Our most functional response thus far is to check out and go our own way, but I contend that an exit is not a destination, but just a needed removal from the line of fire; a chance to collectively regroup and rethink. Remember that the young men festering at those crossroads have, in their own way, checked out, too. It isn't looking too good on them.

And it forces us, sooner or later, to swallow a pill that some will find bitter. And to face a reality that some will find unconscionable.

The feminists were right. What we call masculinity has, as it relates to modern realities, corrupt, oppressive and destructive elements that need to change.

And yes, I mean that literally. And no, I'm not kidding.

In fact, the entire thrust of my argument is that the monstrous social degeneration we are now witnessing, more than anything else, is the result of outmoded and horribly misguided masculinity.

Of course, once we dig more than a nanometer deep into the subject we find that objectivity and reason veer us onto an entirely different philosophical trajectory than the pathologically twisted and apoplectic mindset of feminist ideologues.

To chart our course, we will do two things that feminists never did. First, we will look at the subject without a politically driven agenda for unjustified revenge, or a mandate to dominate the other half of the population. And two, we will proceed with the sincere goal of benefit for everyone, not just an elite group.

The only sensible place to start is with a more grounded understanding of masculinity itself, something that can't be done in a 3,500 word essay, but can, with even marginally appropriate treatment, arrive at far better conclusions than the last forty years of women's and gender studies. We can rely on the combined contributions of history, mythology, politics, elements of sociobiology, and most importantly, human compassion.

In the end we are a species of animals whose very existence depended on the development of reproductive strategies, the primary of which is that the most aggressive and powerful males are selected for mating by the most reproductively viable females. Those strategies arose from an environment of necessity and produced an effective way to produce offspring with the highest probability of survival. As a function of survival, that strategy, and not patriarchal conspiracy, shaped the male hierarchy, as well as what we now call, often erroneously, masculinity.

Some dry facts- The hierarchy of men:

Despite the numerous male archetypal figures of history and legend, for the purpose of this writing I will explore only four basic types of men. Three of the more commonly known are the alphas, betas and omegas. The fourth I will address later.

Alpha males are a very small fraction of the male population. They are highly dominant men who reside at near the top of all populations, from social groups to national governments. These men are generally characterized by the ability to force the deference of other men. In other cases, they simply have the strong leadership qualities on which human civilization as advanced and flourished.

In a sense, alpha males are either Einsteins or Frankensteins, heroes or hooligans, leaders or leeches.

Alphas also tend to be obsessively controlling, abusive and megalomaniacal. If you point to any despot in world history that slaughtered scores of his own people, for the need to maintain control, or for sheer sadistic pleasure, you are pointing at an alpha male.

And yet the same can be said for the men who took us to the moon, cured diseases and who accomplished great humanitarian goals.

With negative alphas, you can throw your imagined codes of honor out the window. Those codes are nothing more than tools used to force betas and omegas into compliance with their agendas. All romanticism aside, the code of the alpha male is to conquer and control, both the objects of his desire and the men he exploits and expends to acquire them. Characterologically speaking, they are a minute, worst representation of the male of the species.

They also get things done, and with great efficiency if you don't factor weigh the loss of freedom and human life.

Incidentally, the characteristics of negative alphas are also the same ones that feminists have erroneously used to define masculinity in one broad stroke, painting all men as domineering and oppressive. Success at this enabled them to take other microscopic minorities of men and attribute their characteristics to men in general as well, e.g. abusers, pedophiles, rapists, etc…

Historically, the challengers to alphas frequently came from other alphas and often from the ranks of beta males, who form the next tier down in the male power structure. Betas serve as the alphas enforcers, the strong-arms used to maintain control over greater numbers. They also play the role of "yes men," affording them their own realm of power and putting them within striking distance (or scavenging proximity) of the alphas position and status, including sexual primacy. Like roadies for a rock band, fortune often filters its way into their hands, and beds.

At the bottom, and most heavily populated part of the hierarchy, are the omega males. These are the pawns on a chessboard, often under the direct control of alpha, or by proxy, beta males. This is the common man, and the one most vulnerable to the hazards of common life.

A good way to look at this is to take a look at the military chain of command. The general tendency is that the alphas, betas and omegas shed increasing amounts of blood in descending order and claim the spoils of victory in ascending order.

Government runs in the same way. In the simplest of terms, alpha lawmakers use beta law enforcement officers to exercise their will on the generally omega population.

Or rather government used to work that way, but it really doesn't any more.

The political sell out that changed the world.

Alpha males in government didn't just collude with feminist ideologues in order to garner a sizable and dependable voting bloc. They had wives, daughters and other familial females to contend with, many of whom were supporting feminism. This effectively reduced everything to the biological imperative. Alpha males are no less, and arguably even more disposed to take whatever measures are necessary to ensure sexual status. Faced with a perceived threat to that, they effectively ceded the alpha position and became beta enforcers for the feminist agenda. You won't find better examples of that than Barak Obama or Joe Biden, or George Bush for that matter. These alphas became the beta muscle for a feminist Mafioso, maintaining rank and privilege through enforcing ideological imperatives on the defenseless masses beneath them. They became cops hauling men to jail on the simple accusation of their wives. They became judges bludgeoning men with their gavels in corrupt courtrooms; politicians passing ever more misandric legislation; C.E.O.'s of pharmaceutical companies pushing drugs like Ritalin to sap the vitality and strength out of our boys, to make them more malleable in female hands once the father had been removed from the home.

Isn't this ironic? The supposed pinnacle of strength in the male hierarchy was revealed by feminism to actually be the pinnacle of sexual weakness. This series of events is also a lesson in real power, and where it resides, which in the realm of sexual selection has always been in the hands of the women who did the selecting.

But an even greater irony is revealed. Women, who have bemoaned a lack of power for ages, and in fact still do, found out four decades ago that all they had to do to gain almost complete control was step up and demand it be handed over, playing the sex card as they did so. And it was handed over, by the most powerful men in the world, who in the presence of these women became like butlers offering cocktails on a serving tray.

I am not fond of that conclusion. In fact, as a man who continually struggles to break old world ties, I am rather embarrassed by it.

Nothing learned, nothing gained.

Nonetheless, what happened here on the whole was that women, their raw biological power masquerading as feminism, have taken the dominant alpha status in our culture, and the result is quickly becoming an age of oppression and injustice more insidious and intractable than any other. It is in the biological, survival oriented nature of women to enhance their lives through the utilization of male labor and male expendability, without compunction or moral constraint, and that is exactly where our culture has ended up on an Orwellian scale.

Defeating this monstrosity requires the insanely formidable task of battling (figuratively) through beta enforcers masquerading as alpha controllers, not to a command post with someone in charge, but through a pervasive ideology that snakes like countless invisible tentacles through the consciousness of the population at large, and that emanate from the very heart of human evolutionary psychology.

And the first strike in that battle should be, must be, at the elements of alleged masculinity that allowed it all to happen.

Meet the new boss, same as the old boss.

They say there is nothing new under the sun. History infers wisdom in those words. We can see with proper discernment that the women's movement was not really a new era for women at all. It is, on close inspection, just women and men practicing their biological strategies in a highly successful manner. So successfully, in fact, that it is rendering large portions of the male population even more expendable. So expendable, in fact, that we are now creating reasons to get rid of them.

It was destined to happen once male control of the environment made it safe enough for women to start acquiring power and resources outside the traditional and protected realm of the home. This is why you see feminism with its strongest foothold in industrialized nations founded on the rule of law. And it is why you see that law itself is now being manipulated away from the idea of justice (which was its intent in a man's world) and toward the funneling of added protection and resources to women (which has always been the intent in the world shared by both sexes).

It is not the pursuit of equality or the love of egalitarian values that has led to feminist governance, but pure blind human biology, practiced in the same way it was on the African Savanna three million years ago. And the stunning successes of men making all manner of advances since then has now begun to take us out of the picture.

Quite simply, men have worked themselves out of a job.

As noted earlier, we have already begun to disappear from the ranks of the employed and educated, and the government is adopting policies to accelerate that process. In practical terms, there are not near as many men needed proportionally as there once was. The ones that remain will be of increasingly lower status and will be subject to ever more draconian control.

But of course, there is one factor that will turn the tide before it's over. It is the instinct for survival. It is the only instinct stronger than sex, and it has already shown signs of emerging. We call it the men's movement; MRA's, MGTOW, and the like. We are the evidence that men transcending biology is possible; proof that there actually can be something new under the sun. And we are growing rapidly because more and more men are beginning to see misandry for what it is; a loaded gun pointed directly at their heads, and at the heads of their sons.

Unlike feminism, which is simply a normal, functioning part of the female sex role advanced to destructive levels, the men's movement is the exact polar opposite. This is the first time in human history that an actual rejection of gender roles has begun to happen, and it is coming not from women, but men.

This is precisely the battle we need to fight. Not with women and not with feminists of either sex, but with the aspects of alleged masculinity that are leading to our destruction because they are now outmoded, archaic and self-defeating.

As we depart from the old definitions of masculinity, our first step in that direction is away from the institution of romantic chivalry. It may have once also been a code embraced out of the need for survival, but in the modern world we all know it has but one meaning- female privilege.

We can now call chivalry by more modern, more appropriate names, e.g. VAWA, primary aggressor laws, Title IX, rape shield laws, Title IV-D, family court, prosecution on false accusation, media bias against men, or, if you prefer the short and simple version, misandry, or the hatred and fear of men and boys.

The fourth type of man- the zeta male.

As previously noted, the men's movement is a unique and literally unprecedented phenomena. It will bring with it innumerable firsts. One of them is the socio-sexual warrior, and I refer to him for the purpose of this discourse as the zeta male. The tag remains faithful to the Greek alphabet classification of other men but there is more purpose to the label.

I took it from the star Zeta Persei. I liked the navigational metaphor of the star as it is applicable in the context of the lost generation. But I was also intrigued that Persei is a direct reference to Perseus, the first of the Greek mythological heroes.

Perseus had a remarkable talent for slaying archaic monsters, Medusa the Gorgon among them, who as a mortal woman possessed great beauty, and was self enamored and struck with the power of her sexual allure until she was turned into a hideous monster by Athena, who later used her severed head as a weapon on her shield.

In 1940, an article by Sigmund Freud was posthumously published, entitled Medusa's Head (Das Medusenhaupt) in which he postulated that Medusa represented castration in a child's mind related to discovered and denied maternal sexuality.

Even more interesting is that in modern times, feminists (Women: A Journal of Liberation, 1978) adopted and reinterpreted the image of Medusa as representative of women's rage, and it served as a binding symbol of feminist solidarity.

So Perseus, namesake of Zeta Persei, was the slayer of Oedipal shame (control) and the murderously powerful raging feminist archetype.

The zeta male.

This classification of a male is new because this is a male that until recent times was never needed. He is emergent and unpolished and struggling to find his legs, but is doing so thanks to the fertile, safe ground, provided by, of all things, other emerging zetas on the internet.

He has no allegiance to tradition or nostalgia for the past, and in fact is charged with plotting a new course. He cannot be shamed into control or intimidated into silence or seduced into capitulation. He doesn't fit in the classic hierarchy, and would gladly bring it down in the name of his cause. When someone says he needs to act like a real man, he smiles and says, "No, thank you."

He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him. He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction.

A Voice for Men Has a New Face and Feminism is a Communist Plot

Welcome to the recently overhauled A Voice for Men website. The relaunch is an auspicious time to hone in again on the basic mission here.

The purpose of this web site is to offer information, perspective, and most importantly direction for men living in the age of virulent misandry.

The problems relate to feminist ideology, and you will read a lot about that here. But most of that is just addressing a symptom of the problem. The core of it is what I call Marxist Consumerism. It is a term that would ostensibly appear to be an oxymoron, but is actually a perfect description of where society is heading. Our cultural evolution is tracking toward a dumbed down population of brainwashed consumer units who are wholly owned and controlled by a State that is now a government/corporate complex. And it rules, largely by a system of Governance Feminism. Let me explain from the start:

Feminism is a Marxist strategy designed to undermine the family and all other traditional institutions so that the primary relationship individuals have is ultimately with The State. In the process of accomplishing this, private property, the only tangible proof of individual liberty, becomes a thing of the past. That is your New World Order in a nutshell. And if your eyes are open you have been watching it happen for most or all of your life.

By destroying marriage, creating a chasm between men and women, alienating fathers from children, dissolving parental authority, indeed dissolving the family itself, the barriers to state control of everyone are removed. Think of any social ill inflicted by feminism, and then think about those ills in terms of an agenda for autocratic control of the entire population. You will find they are almost indistinguishable; that one serves the other in every way.

Central to pulling this off was to first vilify masculinity, then criminalize it. We have long coined this as the Gender War, but we have mistakenly interpreted it as something contained to a struggle for control, or even about equality, between men and women. Since you already know that feminism isn't about equality, let's take a look at what it actually is about.

Think about laws like VAWA that only recognize men as perpetrators of violence. Consider the emerging "primary aggressor" laws that are designed to make sure that men, and only men, are arrested in domestic disputes. Think about how restraining orders are routinely issued with no evidence or corroboration and how the power of accusation from women has become an epidemic ripping apart the lives of innocent men.

Do you really think all this is just because feminists are just getting their way about things?

If you really think it is that simple, please read and ponder on the implications of this passage from Atlas Shrugged, 1957

"Did you really think we want those laws observed?" said Dr. Ferris."We want them to be broken. You'd better get it straight that it's not a bunch of boy scouts you're up against. We're after power and we mean it. There's no way to rule innocent men. The only power any government has is the power to crack down on criminals. Well, when there aren't enough criminals one makes them. One declares so many things to be a crime that it becomes impossible for men to live without breaking laws. Who wants a nation of law-abiding citizens? What's there in that for anyone? But just pass the kind of laws that can neither be observed nor enforced or objectively interpreted – and you create a nation of law-breakers – and then you cash in on guilt. Now that's the system, Mr. Reardon, that's the game, and once you understand it, you'll be much easier to deal with."

Those words, published in the year of my birth, have come to dominate and define the world we live in. Trust me, I would not use an excerpt from a novel as a reference source if I did not already know you could confirm it with your own observation of the world around you.

By destroying the power of men, the historical guardians of the family, and of our individual liberties, the state becomes the unopposed totalitarian overlord.

Now, if you have any doubts about the Marxist roots of feminism, and the intent to create and exploit resentment between the sexes in order to destroy the traditional family, take a look at this poster from pre World War II era (1932) Soviet Union. The Soviets knew, just as your government does today, that if you want total domination of the population, you must undermine the family and turn the government into surrogate husband and father.

Because once you take away man's social status and dignity, and his authority in the family, the only thing he will fight for is a paycheck, some benefits and misguided nationalism. He will never again challenge the government he lives under, no matter how tyrannical or oppressive, because he has nothing of meaning left to protect. And men, despite the pervasive cultural mendacities of our time, are hardwired not to even complain on their own behalf, much less to fight for themselves as a group.

Of course, many people, including many men's rights activists, have never come to the realization that feminism is something more than just a corrupt anti-male agenda operating under a guise of gender equality. And one picture, while worth a thousand words, is not going to tell the whole story.

I suggest, to make yourself more aware of the history, that you start with visiting this series of essays by Carey Roberts, and reading through the links there to see where they take you. It's a rabbit hole that runs very deep.

In the west we have been blinded to the true nature of all this massive social change with unbridled, shallow consumerism, political correctness and the intentional erosion of our education system. Children, from grade school to high school are dissuaded from critical thinking and pressured into conformity by a Marxist Feminist pedagogy. It is the perfect set up to participate in a system of higher education that is geared primarily for indoctrination. And it is no coincidence that the indoctrination so rampant in the modern halls of western academe is also an artifact of dominant feminist ideology. The average college graduate today, especially in the arts and humanities, leaves school convinced that men are inherently bad and that women are oppressed, despite the incontrovertible evidence that neither is so.

Any voice of opposition to this has been all but eliminated. By putting a dress and lipstick on Marxism, the social engineers furthering that agenda were able to rely on chivalry and other aspects of traditional masculinity for protection. It is mind blowing. They actually used the people being the most viciously attacked to protect the very people who were attacking them. It is, in all fairness, fucking ingenious.

And at the same time, at the other end of the social spectrum, they jockeyed themselves into further protection by popularizing the charge of misogynistic hate speech against anyone who opposed them.

Yes, quite ingenious.

But the point of A Voice for Men is not to fight against that. And the reason for it is simple.

It is too late.

This Gender War is over and the Marxists won. Whether you live in the U.S., the U.K., Canada, Australia, New Zealand or anywhere else in the western world, you will find no relief, no solutions in your voting booths, or in the people who occupy your seats of government. They are all bound, no matter their party or their proclaimed platform, to the new agenda. All the legislation that matters, the legislation that indentures men to women and ultimately makes both wards of The State, will be supported by the prevailing powers, whoever they are.

It is not the fault of women, though I say that knowing you may be one of many men who do not want to hear it. They have been hoodwinked as well, and before it is over, but after it is too late, almost all of them will end up enslaved to the same agenda that promised them freedom and independence. They will almost all be working in low paying service jobs, marginally subsidized by the confiscated income of men. They will find that government- as-husband and the cold drudgery life hovering around the poverty line is the only real result of their promised "liberation." In fact, it is already happening.

But the equally impoverished, disenfranchised men will be both unable and hopefully unwilling to help them out of it.

The only thing that remains for men is their own survival. It is men who are the pack animals and indentured servants of this new world order. And their answer is not in going to war against Marxism, which will only result in the certain evisceration of their lives. Their answer is quite simply…to abandon any notion of commitment to women or vulnerability to them.

The sad reality is that women have become the weapon of choice that government is using to dominate and control the lives of men; to steal their property and income; to force them, in ever increasing numbers, to surrender their assets and live in bare subsistence, and to incarcerate or kill them if they don't comply.

And the only appropriate response, for the precious few who can do it, is the development of an unorganized sub culture of men that are focused on surviving, and as much as possible, flourishing in this corrupt system. And on sharing that information with other men.

To do that requires men to make job one of a radically different view of women.

It will be a small culture of men who can do it, as most men simply cannot think outside the bounds of their own sexual programming. But .25 percent of a billion is a pretty respectable number.

Whatever size the community of men takes, our lifeline, for as long as we have it, is the internet. It is the only way most of us will ever make contact with each other.

And so that is the purpose of A Voice for Men. The site is here to educate men that the only movement that matters is the one away from the control of women, and therefore The State. The articles and videos here will henceforth reflect that in every way. I will be writing essays on Zeta Game, to explore methods of reversing the traditional power flow that undermines men via the protect and provide proviso and the standard, female entitled mating ritual. There will be offerings with a locus around anti-consumerism; living outside the realm of corporate influence as much as possible. And with the way that men are being drummed out of education and the job market, anti-consumerism will become synonymous with survival.

The emphasis, per usual, is anti marriage, anti commitment, and anti consumerism, but the short route to the point is anti corporatocracy and pro male protectionism.

I will strive to listen to your wishes and include content that you suggest and to address topics that you think are important, as long as it serves the core mission.

It will be a library of information and opinion encouraging men to consider a new form of masculinity, yes, that would be Zeta, that reduces vulnerability to this God awful system, promotes independence from women and points to a path of freer living; eschewing the way of mere utility and servitude.

And so we are clear from the beginning. This is sacred ground, and I mean that literally. Civil dissent and discussion are welcome from men who are on board with this websites agenda. Women are even welcome as long as they are with the program.

But, feminists and White Knights will be immediately and unceremoniously dumped and banned. If you morons are looking for debate, feel free to waste your time commenting on my videos at YouTube.

So there you have it; an explanation of A Voice for Men, and the direction this site will be going in the future. I am counting on you to send me your ideas, post comments and help me guide this ship on a steady course.

After all, it is A Voice for Men, not The Voice for Men. Without you, I have no reason to be doing this.

Now let's get ready to rock and roll.

Men's Studies: The Complete Freak Show

Paul Elam · 3 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A disgraced shyster. A male feminist comedian that admits to being sexist and prone to violence. A transsexual. A grandiose, pathological exaggerator. A supporter of domestic violence perpetrators. A McCarthyesque academic thug out to get anyone around him that doesn't have their mind right. And a gaggle of puffy, self loathing, pseudo intellectual ne'er do wells; the inhabitants of a picaresque house of postmodern freaks.

No, this isn't the set up for a work of comic fiction, but rather an unblinking look at a real life cadre of laughable gender activists in the world of men's studies. And by their stranger than fiction behavior, they amplify the meaning of Jonathan Swift's famous words, "When a true genius appears, you can know him by this sign: That all the dunces are in a confederacy against him."

In this case, the genius isn't a man, but an idea. Male studies. It is admittedly radical in that it is a proposed discipline intended to further scholarly investigation that would actually benefit men and boys without feminist permission or approval.

In another time, perhaps, this would only be sensible. But in today's world, it is genius.

And the mere mention of it has set these less than relevant academic autocrats, this Men's Studies Confederacy of Dunces, on the warpath.

And so they have appointed themselves the defenders of feminist orthodoxy; the male guardians of misandry in academe. It is fitting, then, that they are now introduced to the larger world of men; that they be seen, even as they sit on their stools in the corner, for exactly who they are, right up to the very tops of their pointed hats.

All of them belong to, or are in some way affiliated, with two men's [sic] organizations called the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) and the National Organization for Men Against Sexism (NOMAS). Those are the new age fig leafed boys clubs, so let's meet their versions of the alpha dogs.

Barry Goldstein

We'll start with Barry Goldstein, JD., who is listed on the NOMAS website as their co chair on child custody. He is also an expert witness on domestic violence and has written a book on the subject, Scared to Leave, Afraid to Stay: Paths from Family Violence to Safety. The book chronicles the experiences of ten females, alleged to be victims of domestic violence, including, get this, how the courts abused these women for seeking help.

But even aside from the idea that courts discriminate against battered women, there's a credibility problem here. Goldstein had his law license suspended by a New York appellate court for deceit, fraud and misrepresentation. The laundry list of charges against him stemmed from two cases. One was misappropriation of funds involving his representation of a not-for-profit tenants housing resource center. The other was from his involvement in the Gina Shockome divorce case, which was a feminist cause célèbre in New York just a few years back.

In an internet article he wrote about the case, he accused the presiding judge of denying his client due process and of causing her to suffer PTSD, among a slew of other accusations he leveled at the court. None of it turned out to be true, or at least provable, and that was added to the charges against him.

Perhaps the most comical of Goldstein's antics was to claim to the court during the Shockome case that he had a seen a video tape that showed a court appointed supervisor had slept for 15-20 minutes during a visit. When the court demanded that Goldstein produce the tape he claimed to have lost it. During one court appearance, he claimed the video tape was in his car, and later, at another appearance, he denied ever having had the tape in his car or anywhere else.

Well, apparently, to Goldstein's misfortune, his dog didn't eat the tape, which was about the only excuse he didn't offer. Officials eventually acquired it, and after viewing the video, the court stated, "Anyone looking at that video will see that there is nothing on that video that suggests that [the supervisor] was asleep for 20 minutes."

It seems that Goldstein was caught lying like a, well, like a crooked lawyer. And misappropriating money like one, too.

Among some of the other complaints was that Goldstein repeatedly defied a court directive to refrain from calling the father in the case, who was eventually awarded custody, "the abuser" as there was no proof to support such a statement.

Imagine that.

Additionally, in the last 60 days, the Supreme Court of neighboring Pennsylvania disbarred attorney Barry Goldstein.

Despite all of this being a matter of public record, NOMAS retains the now legally defunct Goldstein as an elected member of its national council.

Ben Atherton-Zeman

Perhaps his presence there is actually funnier than that of another council member that touts himself as a professional comedian. Any sense of ironic metaphor notwithstanding, Ben Atherton-Zeman, hyphenated surname and all, is the designated spokesman, excuse me, spokesperson, for NOMAS. He lists among his primary qualifications that he is an actor and a comedian; that he does impersonations and that he is a feminist.

Impressive credentials, but given the circumstances in the organization, it's probably good that they don't require a license.

Among many notable statements attributed to Atherton-Zeman is that he identifies himself as a "recovering sexist" and believes that every man should challenge sexism and violence, in the world, and in themselves.

Let us hope that there is a mental health professional on the board at NOMAS. Perhaps with some counseling, Ben's projection of his personal struggles with sexism and violence onto the entire male sex can be resolved. Or, if he can identify the women he discriminated against and people he battered before getting into "recovery," he can make amends to them as a part of the healing.

He might benefit from a referral to Doug Gertner, another NOMAS National Council Member. Gertner, it seems, has considerable experience counseling men, particularly young fathers for whom he runs a "Boot Camp for New Dads."

But there is a concern about that one, too. The boot camp looks to have a problem with condoning and enabling domestic violence.

Seriously.

According to information reported on their website, the young male recruits in his basic training have made reports of "their hormone driven mates sometimes using them as a punching bag."

Gertner's answer to the abuse? Well, there isn't one. After all, if a young soldier can't take an ass kicking with his mouth closed, who can? He sends them home "with a new sense of confidence." Perhaps it is from their reeducation.

No intervention on the violence. No protection. No concerns. Gertner just ignores the assaults and issues marching orders for his young men to go home and take it.

National Organization for Men Against What?

Also, NOMAS President Robert Brannon penned a piece on their site,Does Consensual Prostitution Exist?, in which he implies that female prostitutes are not competent enough to make informed decisions on what to do with their own bodies, and tacitly implies their male customers are raping them.

Men Against What?

Perhaps the best explanation for NOMAS as an acronymic misnomer can be found in their motto, "Pro feminist, gay affirmative, anti racist, enhancing men's lives."

As you take a trip through their website, you get a sobering dose of what they mean by "enhancing" men's lives; they demonize anything masculine and further every anti male sexist stereotype imaginable, including a wholesale endorsement of the New York Model for batterer programs. That program explicitly sees all domestic violence as male perpetrated, despite the overwhelming proof that it just isn't so. And with that endorsement they embrace a proscription on any notion of counseling or treatment for batterers in favor of criminal consequences.

Do you hear that Mr. Atherton-Zeman? There is no recovery. You are unfixable. Please turn yourself in to the nearest authorities. And bring the rest of the male sex with you.

The NOMAS mission is enhancement through sexism, bigotry and incarceration. And they are steadfastly working to further those ideas.

AMSA, a similarly misnamed organization, with a similarly misleading mission, turns out to be just as misandric as NOMAS, with a crew no less motley than their abhorrent brothers. But they are significantly more dangerous if taken seriously, which an unfortunate few in the mainstream media have done.

Robert Heasley

After the recent conference on male studies in April, AMSA president Robert Heasley was spotted in places like Forbes.com complaining that the new discipline wasn't really new, but actually an unnecessary redundancy. Regarding male studies he told Forbes "Their argument is that they're inventing something I think already exists."

That sentiment was also expressed by Michael Kimmel, author of Guyland, which is basically an attack manual for use against almost all men and on women who don't subscribe to feminism. Kimmel admonished me personally not to think that male studies was anything new, and informed me that "a robust and healthy field of Masculinity Studies already exists, and is well institutionalized in the US and abroad." He also went on to boast, "I myself have been working to build this field for nearly thirty years."

These would seem to be two of the authorities on men's studies, such as they are; The President of AMSA and a well regarded author on masculinities. Both are touting the idea that any new approach to studying men is unnecessary, but perhaps, as Heasley suggested, "Why not just add some new classes?" [to already existing studies]

The question becomes where to add them actually. Despite Kimmel's assertion of the field's vitality and Heasley's call for male studies to be surrendered to men's studies, here is the track record.

Michael Kimmel

After thirty years of Kimmel's personal work and AMSA's group contribution, the field has yielded the following degrees awarded in men's studies.

Ph.D. – 0

Masters – 0

Associates – 0

That is correct, after three decades of effort, begging for (and then spending) money, and the current territorial, defensive reaction we are witnessing from the men's studies leadership, we are left with a discipline that for all practical purposes does not exist, except in a handful of publications and in the minds of an intellectually incestuous group of ideologues seeking their fifteen minutes of fame.

I think I understand Kimmel's thinking very well now. Exactly squat = robust and healthy. No degrees = well institutionalized.

A man could run for elected office on the tricks from academe.

And win.

The lack of substance in Masculinities is apparently in direct proportion to a lack of substance in those who supposedly study it. It isn't just Kimmel and Heasley. And a quick look at AMSA conference literature reveals even more.

At one of their more recent conferences, all of which appear to float on paper submissions from grad students and even some undergraduates, the focus of men's studies is revealed in all its irrelevant glory.

Here are a few of the topics presented.

Contemporary Queer Cinema in a Men's Studies Curriculum

Masculinities in Play: Examining Hegemonic and Technomasculinity in Action-adventure Video Games

A Queer Greenwood Beyond the Cricket Pitch: Queer Sporting Masculinities in the writings of E.M. Forster, D.H. Lawrence and Edward Carpenter

Foucalt and Parenting: A Feminist Essay of Personal Reflection and Application

What are You? Transvestism in Octavia Butler's Kindred and Fledgling

Black Gay (Queer) Masculine Studies: Insights from Richard Bruce Nugent

And

Differently Straight Guys: How Did That Happen?

Setting an example for such scholarly pursuits relevant to the average man is Dr. Christopher Kilmartin, a former comic (yes, another comedian) who recently presented the master lecture, Guy Fi: The Fiction that Rule Men's Lives

How they have avoided a wild proliferation of university courses and degree programs in this discipline is mind boggling, unless you consider that the men's studies group is actually representative of, and obsessed with, about 4% of the male population, while condemning and attacking the other 96%.

Paying attention to the issues of homosexuals and transgender people has its place in modern culture, but to use that agenda to play a part in hoodwinking people into believing you are addressing the lives of men in general demonstrates a deficit in integrity and a pathological drive to ensure the problems of the great majority of men and boys are either ignored or exacerbated, or both.

It's bullshit. And not just bullshit that helps a bunch of middle aged, meagerly accomplished men get together once a year to feel important and mark the progress of receding hairlines, but crazy, mean spirited bullshit that draws attention away from some very serious problems in our society.

Raewyn (Robert) Connell

And how could we ever have expected a different outcome? The circus of men's studies has gone so far astray that they have coalesced around an ultimate masculinities icon, Raewyn Connell, who was born a man, Robert Connell. He opted for elective sexual reconstruction as a woman about four years ago. That is correct, Connell, afflicted with an extreme gender confusion that involves disgust for his own male genitalia, coincidentally made the academic endorsement of demonizing masculinity a profession. Note that Connell isn't just an icon for men's studies, but the icon. The widely published and acclaimed Connell is roundly regarded by the entire men's studies community the erudite harbinger of forward thinking modern masculinity.

This is not to say Connell being transgender cannot have an informed opinion on issues about masculinity. It is fair to question, though, whether personal conditions predispose Connell to have a negative view on masculinity connected to her own discomfort with life as a male.

Those questions and similar ones are not well received in this community, however. They are much more likely to yield retribution than answers.

Recently AMSA board member Harry Brod (no, not even in this gender bending train wreck of a true story did I make that name up) wrote an editorial on the AMSA website in which he departed from the notion that male studies was a repeat of men's studies and opted to just paint the entire new discipline as bullshit, using that exact word.

He invoked the surgically altered Connell, though, to vilify the new discipline as "just another excuse to ignore gender injustice." It was the first of what will sure to be more salvos aimed at publicly ridiculing the proponents of male studies.

MND publisher Mike LaSalle posted a brief, but courteous dissent in the comments section of Brod's article, as follows:

The kernel of your argument against Male Studies is revealed here: Men's Studies scholars are primarily concerned with Justice, not Science.

Male Studies assumes knowledge comes before justice, not the other way around.

The comment was posted, and then promptly deleted.

And that is the very least of their efforts at censorship.

MND contributor and Wagner College professor of psychology Miles Groth, who hosted the recent conference on Male Studies, is a former member of AMSA. He is also the co founder and former editor of Thymos*: Journal of Boyhood Studies* which became a part of the Men's Studies Press (MSP).

Harry Brod

Some time into his involvement with AMSA, he grew concerned with aspects of the organization that he described as “out of touch with the current concerns and needs of most males, especially young males.”

Groth went on to express concerns with the nature and quality of literature being featured at AMSA conferences. “Some presenters at the last conference were undergraduates. At such events [annual conferences in a major discipline] it is customary to hear the work of senior researchers.”

MSP director James Doyle became aware of Groth’s unfortunate propensity for independent thought, and didn’t take to the idea of such intellectual diversity with much enthusiasm. In an email he wrote the following to Groth:

Over the past several months, it has become clear that you believe the field of “men’s studies” in all its forms to be a pointless, if not harmful, pursuit. As disseminating “men’s studies” research, serving “men’s studies” scholars, and promoting a positive image of “men’s studies” to a broad readership are the central purposes for the Men’s Studies Press and its publications, it seems clear to me that you current involvement with the Men’s Studies Press is antithetical to your new found philosophy for the study of men’s lives.

Therefore, it is with regret that I must terminate your editorial duties with the Men’s Studies Press as of this day, April 29th, 2010

James Doyle

In short, when ousting Groth for not having his mind right, he stripped him of his editorship of Thymos, the journal that he co-founded and edited all the years of its existence.

Booted, berated and burned, all for having an actual concern for men and boys in defiance of a group of bigots that seek to undermine the same. There is no greater demonstration of the kind of people we are talking about here. And all my attempts to add levity to this situation aside, it is clear they are capable of the most pernicious kinds of fascist bullying.

It now seems they are gearing up to exert the same, if they can, on anyone else interested in helping men and boys, especially those furthering the idea of male studies.

After a decade old split between the organizations, that by their own account demonstrates that slash and burn politics are no stranger to this crowd, there is a lot of kissing and making up. Kimmel, who has operated more or less independently since the split, is returning to give the key note address in 2011. This had to happen for a reason that overcomes the petty divides that sent them on their own separate paths.

In an email from James Doyle provided to me by someone within their ranks who wishes to remain anonymous, Doyle reveals his personal feelings about Kimmel while acknowledging the sacred adherence to ideology.

Says Doyle:

"I have no problem with people being turned off by Kimmel (I am also) but only in terms of his arrogant and self-centered personality. As for social constructionism, I think this an extremely useful theory."

Aside from the fact that neither social constructionism, nor narcissism, begin or end with Kimmel, Doyle tips his hand on priorities quite nicely, and along with his treatment of Groth solidifies his ideology over values, and over truth in scholarship.

This entirely sordid matter would be far funnier if it were not so serious. We might even expect a punch line or two from Atherton-Zeman or Kilmartin. We might even laugh. But we are, in some of the most serious ways possible, talking about the future of our sons in this culture.

These fascist pigs are part and parcel to a system that helps shape government policy. If you are interested enough in those policies to have read this far into this article, then you are likely all too aware of what those policies are and in how they are harming our men and boys. When the intellectually carcinogenic on this level operate under the blanket of political and social denial, their work eventually becomes cancerous and starts to metastasize.

It is time to gear up for treatment.

This is especially true now, as we watch these frauds broadcast their intent to start a campaign of bullying and strong arming against anyone who disagrees with them.

The men's studies establishment does not pursue knowledge, but a program of wholesale skullduggery, all to fit a political agenda whose only connection to education is to corrupt it.

After all, if you'll lie to a court of law about domestic problems, about men being abusers when they are not, is there anyone you won't lie to, about anything?

Let's start taking the garbage out in academe.

Do You Have a Voice for Men?

Paul Elam · 6 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Two years ago, when I started A Voice for Men, I had hopes that my single voice would one day become a chorus. There is certainly room for it. More cogent and well articulated commentary is found in the comment sections of men's movement websites than in any mainstream publications. The men's movement, I say without reservation, has more raw intellect waiting in the wings than any other place I know.

But inviting in other writers has its drawbacks as well. Message dilution is always a possibility, and so is comment sections that turn into flame wars that I don't have the time or interest in moderating. In the end though, the more the merrier seems to carry with it some time tested wisdom..

So I am opening up A Voice for Men to literally anyone with something to contribute to the men's movement. There is a good bit to be worked out in the future, but let's start with the basics:

You have to be able to write effectively. You needn't be Hemmingway, but fundamental writing skills are a must. You can have the greatest ideas and perspectives in the world, but if you can't set them to pen in a way that keeps people engaged, then no one will finish what you have written, or come back to this website.

This is not a place for partisan politics. Period.

This is not a place for woman bashing. That probably needs some clarification. I would love to see some really good pieces on the dark side of femininity as we still have a lot of disinformation about "woman as porcelain princess" that needs to be debunked. My point is that bitches and ho's diatribes are not the same thing as incisive analysis about what is wrong with women in this culture. OK, lecture over.

Those bare fundamentals being addressed, there are some subjects that I think would be of interest to readers, and very relevant to the mission here.

New World Order– With one caveat. You have to source your info credibly and not sound like you're wearing a hat made of tin foil.

Ghosting– Underground living; beating the sytem. How to fly under the radar in society or how to beat the 9-5 life of a corporate drone. How to get by on the cheap. Better yet, how to live well on the cheap. The staggering amount of male unemployment and underemployment should make this of particular interest.

Game– Got Game? Share it with us. Game is a powerful tool for men, if for no other reason than the fact feminists regard it as men being tools. Most importantly, it has potential, with development, to becoming a "go to" source on reducing men's vulnerability to women and an effective way to practice risk management in the gynocracy.

Those are just some of the basics. If you have other ideas, as a prospective writer or from a readers standpoint, let it rip.

This will be a slow process and should be. I intend to be selective and discerning. And I intend to keep the mission I started here true to it's purpose. That alone makes things tough. The two other major websites that utilize a broad spectrum of writers are Men's News Daily, where I am Editor-in-Chief, and The Spearhead, where I am also a contributor.

I would like this to be different than both of them. MND has more educated writers than a staff meeting at the Harvard business review, and it remains the flagship publication for the men's movement for just that reason. The Spearhead, darker and edgier, has a fine collection of writers covering a wide range of topics, and it has a very appealing free for all environment.

Here, I would just like to focus on men understanding, surviving and actually learning to flourish in the misandric Zeitgeist.

If that sort of thing floats your boat, and you can wield a keyboard like a sword, then shoot me an email at avoiceformen@yahoo.com. Send me a submission or writing sample (no attachments, plain text only please) and let's add another voice to the choir.

Paul Elam · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I suppose it is inevitable for the personal investors in the man-o-sphere that we have to occasionally speak up in our efforts to pass the hat. I think most of us would rather imagine that the donation buttons we put on our home pages will just magically attract and inspire people to drop something in the tip jar.

Nobody likes asking for money.

But since I am going to do just that, I hope to do so without a sales pitch. So let me just lay out the facts. One, I am compelled to refrain from using Google Ads for three good reasons. First, they make a good neighborhood look like a trailer park. Second, they bring with them advertising from almost every enemy there is to the MRM. For instance, if I write a piece on some feminist hack, the system reads the text and the next thing you know a banner ad for one of her books is flashing and blinking on the home page.

Not good.

Last, and most important, Google loves control, and the organization is infested with capricious ideologues who love to play invisible, untouchable censor. So the bottom line deal with google is that in exchange for some nickels and dimes they will trash up your website with garbage and then play petty dictator about your content.

So Google is out. And that leaves you and me.

I am not going to lie to you. If no one ever gives a dime to this site it will still be here. You won't be getting any threats that the doors will close if I don't raise some money to help with the expenses. I am not a wealthy man, for sure, but any way you look at it, I will scrounge out a way to keep this thing going as long as I am sucking air.

But even some loose change from those of your who enjoy the work would be really appreciated. Here is the button and the permanent one is set up at the bottom of the page:

Thanks in advance for those that choose to help out.

‘Til Divorce Do Us Part

B.R. Merrick · 8 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I am one of the fortunate few. My parents stayed together through it all. They still live in the house where I grew up. I can’t tell you what it means to me to be able to go back there for visits, and be surrounded by everything familiar. It will always be my home. It will always be inextricably linked to Mom and Dad. There, in the midst of those thick walls built at the turn of the 20th Century, lies a vault of memories.

I may now disagree with them religiously, politically, and in other ways, but they gave me hearth and home. They gave their children an example of sticking it out “for better or for worse.” I was talking with a friend of mine the other day. We are both approaching middle age, and are crossing over that threshold where we can begin to imagine actually losing our parents. They are senior citizens now, and truly part of a dying breed. They are the last generation of Americans to not be overly concerned with self-fulfillment. They are our connection to an America that vanished before we were born. All of those cars, those Main Streets, the music, the atmosphere, it only exists in photographs and old black-and-white movies now. They lived it. They actually remember life without television. I vicariously drink it up from their memories. Our generation has nothing to compare to it. The Baby Boomers stand awkwardly and rather obnoxiously in the way between our two eras.

Divorce was unheard of in my parents’ generation; it is practically revered in mine. It is so commonplace that its ill effects go unnoticed. For a good example of what it does to a child, and how it still affects the adult, read this man’s account. I can’t say I agree with all of his conclusions, or how and where he lays blame, but his sentiments reflect those of other adults of his generation whose politics lay elsewhere, including Steven Spielberg, who admits that “E.T.” was about his parents’ divorce. (How many of his movies feature children being separated from their parents, especially their mothers?)

I think the most sobering account I have yet read on this scourge is from Touchstone magazine, in an article written by Stephen Baskerville, author of Taken into Custody: The War Against Fatherhood, Marriage, and the Family. Most disturbing to me as an anarchist is the realization of how much of a hand the government has in these private matters. There is an entire industry created to actually aid families in breaking up. From this industry, the government makes a great deal of money, what the government affectionately refers to as “revenue.”

You know what revenue is, don’t you? Revenue is what the government collects whenever a cop pulls you over for going 3 miles per hour faster than he prefers on a particular day. Revenue is what the government slips out of your paycheck before you even see it. Now, thanks in part to the eye-popping success of the feminist movement’s quest for The Ring, revenue can be gained from sending a helpless dad to jail.

How did all of this happen? To Baskerville, and a host of Christians like him, it mostly begins and ends with the advent of modern feminism and no-fault divorce in the ’60s. A lot of Christians’ minds work this way, which is one of the problems with modern American Christianity. Baskerville gets the solution partly right at the end of his article when he states, “Family integrity will be restored only when families are de-politicized and protected from government invasion.” Spot on. However, though this may not apply to Baskerville’s thinking specifically, I can tell you as a formerly religious individual that for an explanation of the cause of divorce, the idea of Satan is very powerful. It’s all his fault!

Now that I’m an agnostic, I can’t say there is an evil spiritual presence that is ultimately responsible for all the evil in this world. Nevertheless, one of the central points continually driven home by Christian teaching is that there is a spiritual war going on at all times, between actual angels and demons, for the soul of humanity. For a lot of religiously conservative people, this–not government, nor the ideas that government is created from–is the core of the problem. Feminism is merely a part of Satan’s plan. Even Baskerville makes the contention that divorce is “today’s greatest threat to constitutional freedom,” as if we’d be all right if we abhorred Satan and embraced the God-given Constitution.

In my view, this has been part of the problem all along: "constitutional freedom." My journey to anarchy was greatly precipitated by the Internet, as I have previously stated. I come from religious conservatism. Another religious conservative whose online writing used to be of great importance to me, Joseph Farah, who owns WorldNetDaily, is probably firmly in Baskerville's camp. Both wring their hands to Heaven over the loss of "constitutional" government. What these men don't understand is that one need only look cursorily at the document itself to understand the true nature of what they're advocating. Need a little help? Okay. I've alluded to it before, and I'll point it out again. Just look at Amendment 16:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

For all you religiously conservative, Constitution-worshipping Christians out there, read that quote several times. Understand that the Constitution has authorized the federal government, since 1913, to take whatever it wants from whomever it will, however much it desires.

Is that the only problem with the document? Not by a long shot, but let's just say that it is. Let's say that next year, while the nation is still under the spell of its light-brown Messiah, two-thirds of the states ratify a new amendment to overturn Amendment 16, and set in stone a commitment to do away with income rape:

"1. The sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"2. Neither the Legislative, the Executive, nor the Judicial branch of the federal government, nor any other branch of government whether elected or appointed, shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from any source derived, whether there be apportionment among the several States, with or without regard to any census or enumeration.

"3. The Internal Revenue Service is hereby abolished."

Would this be a Constitution a religious conservative could weep over while pounding the pulpit? I think so. But every man out there who is concerned with the loss of manhood brought about by government interference in marital matters should understand that we've had Amendment 13 for well over a hundred years, yet in the last hundred years alone, men have been drafted into "involuntary servitude" to their violent, bloody deaths in no less than four massive wars — for other countries' interests. Do you really think that an amendment to overturn one of Leviathan's sources of revenue is going to stop them from calling income tax something else? "This isn't a tax on income. It's a tax on 'profit'… a tax on 'personal revenue'… a tax on 'individual distributions'… a tax on 'financial privilege'… a 'Victory Tax'…" Okay, I know that last one's a bit of a stretch. Who the hell would buy that one?

The threat brought about by the divorce/abuse industry isn't a threat to our constitutional republic. We don't really have one, and we don't really need one. It's a threat to the individual who goes to prison because his wife is tired of him. It destroys his children emotionally, who are far more likely to repeat the pattern of divorce once they're older. The threat exists because at some point in our history, we decided that Judeo-Christian marriage is so vital to our way of life that it must be enshrined in law. It must be enforced with the threat of violence. We gave the beast our freedom when the Constitution was ratified. Then we gave it our families.

The problem with the Baskervilles and Farahs of this world is that they still believe in using force and violence in matters that are important to them. Farah even goes so far as to advocate murder when adultery has taken place, continually calling the murder victim "The Creep" throughout his article. Tongue-in-cheek, perhaps, but violent and bloody all the same.

The issue conservative Christians have with feminism is its very existence. The issue I have with feminism is that it is looking to make itself the government, the "-ism" that gets the gravy and the guns. This is why I also have an issue with conservatism. It's another power grab. Neither side is going to help those who are the real victims here, whether or not they're "creeps." Allow me, as a single guy who is never going to be married, to give a little advice to my brethren who plan on taking the plunge someday:

1. Don't. At least, don't get a license. True, the government will find a way to call it "common law" and rape you anyway. They need their revenue, after all, but why help them by giving them ammunition? Find a church that isn't particular about requiring some legal license.
2. Pardon my being crude, but don't think with your… ahem. If she's a hottie, or if you think so little of yourself that she's the best you can do, you may find it difficult using your, uh, other head, but you must, for the sake of your own freedom. Then proceed to Numbers 3 through 8.
3. Take a good look at her parents and siblings. Also know her extended family as well as you can. If divorce happens, what is she likely to try and do? What is her family likely to try and do? How do they get on with your family? How does she get on with your family?
4. Be like my parents: Stay put. Go one step beyond my parents, and live in the same town as your extended family. With the country headed in the direction it is, it's time to resurrect small-town America . I say, bring it on. I've never liked this culture where people uproot and drastically change their lives in a matter of weeks without prior warning. My grandparents moved away when I was very young. Their deaths meant nothing to me, though they were nice people, because I didn't know them. It's not good for us. We're homing creatures.
5. Your hottie's family, extended and all, should live in the same local area as yours. If the state is able to interfere in your "common-law marriage" and divorce happens, where's she going to go with the kid? How is any court going to take a kid completely away from that much family? (This worked for a friend of mine. He got full custody when she decided to move out-of-state.)
6. If she is a feminist who believes in being politically active to any extent (including voting), say goodnight, Gracie. She's really after that other ring.
7. Bury some gold coins in an undisclosed location. I'm not kidding.
8. Use condoms until you have mutually decided to become parents. You must use birth control that you can control. A kid changes absolutely everything, and boy, do women know it.

Baskerville is right to stress the central nature of family life. He is also right to admonish the churches, who can be considered a type of voluntary extended family, to intervene in these private matters instead of the state. But he never gets to the root of the problem. As Thoreau says at the top of the STR main page, he's flailing at the branches with a lot of other Men's Rights Activists. What makes us want to be violent towards feminist ideology? What makes us believe that a "constitutional" government is a tiger cub that will never grow up? What don't we understand about having freedom in our hearts continually? How is it that we don't understand that freedom and peace are interminably linked to non-violent and thoroughly voluntary relationships? If Men's Rights Activists succeed in biting The Ring off the feminists' finger and taking it for themselves, will humanity be any better off? Well, at least divorced fathers will. For a time.

Religious conservatives of many denominations have recently gotten themselves heavily involved in California's Proposition 8, in spite of the fact that it should have been the first priority of every so-called Christian in this country to stand against these wars in the Middle East, and in spite of the fact that gay marriage will only finish off an institution that heterosexuals have beaten into a coma all by themselves. Perhaps now is a good time for all those men who are still religiously devoted to make the separation of church and state in their hearts, to get up quietly and peacefully from the table that government has set, and walk away. The wind is taken out of the sails of the feminist grab for power with each step you take. You have the cojones. Now do it.

Life is interesting, if anything.

Within the first 72 hours of the recent facelift for A Voice for Men, two key points of interest emerged. One, the new forum allowed me to invite and present other writers in this world of defiant men (along with facing the challenge of finding them).

The other was an unexpected but perhaps inevitable twist. The subject of a connection between members of the gay community and the MRM was approached. (note: I am not particularly fond of expressions like the "gay community," as it paints a monolithic picture where the reality is at least somewhat different, but you get my point.)

I have always believed that there was value to the idea of an MRM that wasn't paranoid about homosexuality, and in making inroads with gays that were not misandric and brainwashed by feminism (as though we don't have the same exact problem reaching straight men).

Personally, I have maintained for years that the real source of resentment and hostility to gay males in this culture is not because they are defective or immoral or dangerous to children, but because they are free from the mandates that straight men face when it comes to protecting and providing for women.

They are the original "Men Going Their Own Way," which has always made them the object of ire in a culture where men are supposed to be indentured, not free to pursue life without the typical biological chains.

Well, in a supreme, killing two birds with one stone moment, I was contacted by B.R. Merrick, a writer on social issues who identified himself in his introduction as a gay anarchist, among other things. He linked me to one of his pieces which I found impressive enough to run here. In fact, I was so impressed that Mr. Merrick himself is going to run it here because I have invited him to be the first new addition to an incipient community of writers at A Voice for Men.

I don't want to dwell on Mr. Merrick's sexuality, nor will A Voice for Men become the "gay arm" of the MRM. And, as you will clearly see in the post he is about to present, he has much more to talk about than that.

But I also think this is an important opportunity that should not be missed, and an important crossroads for many in the movement who would find value in expanding our affiliations, and indeed, in adding to the timbre of our collective Voice.

With that I heartily welcome B.R. Merrick to A Voice for Men. I look forward to the continued original content he has promised to bring to the readers here.

I've Been Scroogled

Paul Elam · 9 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I have been a bit under the weather of late, and have not been on-line as much as usual. To add to my surprise when I returned, in my email was a message from the team at YouTube that they had removed one of my videos and put a strike against me for violating their "community standards."

The video in question was one entitled "Feminist Porno Sluts." It was an analysis of the changing attitude and relationship between the pornography industry and feminist culture, specifically how that attitude had changed between the second and third wave.

Click for full image

There was no nudity in the video, the same as the rest of them, but what was most concerning was revealed in the snip I am including with this post. It seems that someone on Team YouTube, who, let's face it, is now Team Google, decided that the video was promoting illegal activity, though of course they did not specify which illegal activity they were talking about. Of course, they could not get specific because there was no such promotion there. In fact, I pointed quite explicitly to the increased incidence of drug abuse and other life damaging activities that is common to women in the porn industry.

I said I was surprised to get the email. I suppose I should have been surprised that it didn't come sooner. Our esteemed Godfather of the on-line MRM, Angry Harry, not too long ago had a video he made lampooning Harriet Harmon unceremoniously removed from YouTube, with similarly bullshit explanations offered.

In his video, one of the images is that of an obese man with his shirt off. The reason that YouTube/Google gave for censoring the video? Nudity!!

It might be easy to think that this action, even both of these actions, were just some sort of power tripping by some front line corporate manager with too much power and too little education, or perhaps in the age of feminist academe, too much. But either way, this isn't really the case.

There are THOUSANDS of YouTube videos that are borderline pornographic in content, most of them serving as fronts for porn sites. I am quite sure Youtube tolerates them from the traffic they generate. In this and many of other ways, Google is a huge supporter of pornography on the internet. I am not sure why, but I think it perhaps rhymes with cha-ching.

The Feminist Porno Sluts video was viewed over 10,000 times in the first week simply because of the name. I had to go in to the comments and post an advisory that it was NOT a porn video to get the traffic to slow down. I simply didn't want to piss off people who might have thought I mislead them about the content.

As I said in my post about donations to the site, I don't want Google to have a foot in the door here. At the risk of sounding like a conspiracy nut, I honestly think the organization has it out for MRA's and a few other targeted groups. Telling the truth seems to be a common thread among them, and the truth is an awful thing to speak in a media world that depends on controlling whatever you are told.

Screw ‘em.

This may well mark the beginning of the end of my time on YouTube, as I have seen in the past that once they start in on someone that has a growing audience (I am pushing 1,500 subscribers) then they don’t quit till they get rid of them.

YouTube has been orchestrating censorship for some time now. Even a mainstream rag like the New York Times, back in 2006. reported that since the moment Google expressed interest buying the fledgling YouYube, the management at YouTube found religion along with the dollar signs and started making things quietly disappear. YouTube knew Google’s style up front, and have been emulating it ever since.

They are proving the Times was right, even as you read this.

On Men Burning Alive

Paul Elam · 10 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Just yesterday, a man died in Brisbane, Australia. He self immolated, reportedly after going through the family court system.

Let me repeat that. After experiencing the family court in Australia, the man doused himself with gasoline and set himself afire, resulting in 3rd degree burns to over 90% of his body. The scene was apparently so disturbing that the local police who responded would not comment on what they saw.

There is something else that was set afire in the aftermath of this tragedy. The facts, and the main one being that this type of death only really disturbs those who have it shoved in their face as an occupational hazard.

After searching through several on-line news accounts of what happened, most of them reported that he was a 39 year old man who had received a bad outcome in the family court (imagine that). Two of them said he was 60 years old, and one of those said his suicide was unrelated to the family court.

What none of them even attempted to do was tell us this man's story. Not of his life, and not really of his death, save the headline value of such gruesome business. For underneath the headline, we learned more about his burning body for the traffic problems it caused than for why he set himself on fire in the first place. There was one story, the one that quoted an unnamed police as source saying the event had nothing to do with court proceedings, also said that he was "mentally ill."

As usual with the mainstream media, it is headlines first, facts a distant second. So we may never know what happened or why. But it would be hard to argue against the possibility of an impaired mental state in anyone who would choose death, especially in such a horrifying and painful manner. The problem here is that with men, that emotional dysfunction is not a reason to ask more questions, but the main reason to quit asking questions at all.

He was mentally ill, end of story.

Such was also the case of 26 year old Daniel Shaull, who died Wednesday after setting himself on fire in front of a fur store in Portland, Oregon. Of course, he was mentally ill, as well. We needn't bother with exploring that any more.

And that is what it is like for men lost for a million unknown reasons. They were crazy; they were impediments to traffic; they were less column space than your average classified ad.

They were just more dead men.

And as we live in a culture that has men committing suicide at epidemic rates in much less newsworthy fashion, we can, at least in this corner of the manosphere, take pause to wonder:

What would the reaction be if women were lighting themselves up in the streets?

Perhaps those that continue to deny that the world is woman centered will answer that one. But of course I have an answer of my own. I wonder if that fact that the world actually cares about the lives of women has anything to do with the fact that they are so much less likely to kill themselves?

Nah, that can't be it.

Right?

Real Men Use the "N" Word, Often and With Extreme Prejudice

Paul Elam · 11 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"My answer to the question is No," says The Man, brushing off an attempt to suck up free booze by a generic female barfly.

That brief statement, pulled from a recent video installment of Bernard Chapin's Inferno, would seem to be something perfunctory and uncomplicated. A Simple No, as it were.

But that particular kind of "no" is anything but simple for the average man. In fact, men use it so sparingly in this situation, we rightly call it by the first letter. It is the new "N" word.

And Chapin obviously thought it worthy of addressing. While I am sure many men might shrug it off as no big deal, and many others will simply claim to, I haven't known Bernard to waste his time on the extraneous. He recognizes, as he is often prone to, what the world would prefer he didn't. In this case that men, particularly younger ones, are financial sitting ducks, and can be charmed from their hard earned money via innate biological vulnerabilities that almost any woman can exploit with a hint of feigned sexual interest.

Bernard points out quite accurately to a culture of female con artists and men that can only be described as easy marks in a carnival side show.

Step right up Gents, for the price of a few call liquors, or perhaps the good ladies car note, you too can imagine that her real intent is to turn your evening into an unbridled realization of your wildest sexual fantasies.

Thus sayeth P.T. Barnum himself: "There's a man sucker born every minute."

And indeed there is, for if any man thinks that having sex with her is worth the price of a double shot of Hornitos, or that even if she puts out that it would actually end up being so inexpensive, he is indeed a sucker of the 24 karat variety.

All of this of course invites the even more questions about how to deal with the gender royalty and their steadfast belief that the sole purpose for men is to play endless rounds of Me Government, You Welfare Leech, whether that be for money, merchandise or free labor. The only real difference is that men, unlike government, actually have to earn their money.

And this is where Bernard is giving us sage advice. And where we, I dare assert, should pick up his message and carry it to as many young men as possible.

We have to start, not with women or young men, but with an older generation of men who are still enamored of their role as an ATM on a leash. At least we have to start by dismissing nearly all their beliefs about women. After all, who is it that is raising these young men to feel so financially obligated by rote? And who has been training women to expect this from men, every bit as much as their mothers?

Yep, it's the male baby boomers; the quintessential Daddy's Little Girl being one of their greatest legacies. Didn't these men ever figure out that Daddy's Little Girl always grows up to be Joe Average's Big Financial Drain and the darling of famiy court? While these dinosaurs are quickly fading by attrition, their other legacy- boys raised to sit up and beg, is the lingering enabler for the raging sense of entitlement their sons face in these women each and every day of their lives.

It was a sick set up to begin with, and now it is just ridiculous. Tack it to the growing list of MRM "Must do's."

I am reminded of a time several years ago when I was walking through the parking lot of a hospital where I was contracting. I passed a car with an open trunk and found a rather buxom nurse was standing there trying to manage a weighty looking box in the trunk.

I stopped to look and started to offer her a hand when she smiled at me and said, "I need a big strong man to help me with this box." And dig this, she actually shook her tits back and forth gently in unison with the words "big – strong – man."

She didn't take my answer very well, and she didn't get the help I was about to offer her unsolicited before she tried to sexually manipulate me into playing step and fetch.

Now, I am sure that many would say that what she did was innocent. In a way, that is true. She was only doing what men have always responded to, what has always worked. She was just another woman in the normal practice of a social disease.

But here is the point. This is how women have always gotten what they wanted from men. It may have made sense at some point, though I am not so sure. What it boils down to now though is pure scheming.

When does the time come for men to start pointing out that pre-feminist manipulative behaviors from women, in a post feminist world, are just despicable and petty machinations of an overly entitled class of parasites?

When do men put the word "NO" on a default setting as a response to sexual manipulation?

My vote is today. Hell, yesterday. When it comes to the girl that Bernard describes in his video, there is only one difference between her and the ne'er do well hanging in front of the convenience store panhandling for beer money. Her turf is a lot wider and user friendly. And she can work bars, with protections abounding, while he works the mean streets on his own, and at his own peril.

Eventually the cops will run the male "bum" off. And later on, when they are off duty, you might just find those same cops reaching for wallets instead of night sticks when princess hits them up for her free drunk at the local tavern.

The male panhandler fears police. The female panhandler can drink on their dime.

So the message today? Say NO young man. Say it often and say it like you mean it. If you want to take her home, let some other guy get her drunk for you first. She may leech off a mark, but she isn't really attracted to him. Besides, anyone who so lacks dignity as to walk up to a stranger and demand free drinks, isn't worth the price of domestc beer.

How we kill Johnny

Paul Elam · 13 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It was three weeks after I left the last residential treatment center for which I would ever work. A Saturday morning to be precise, and the phone rang- jarring me from the rare pleasure of a sleep in. It was Camille, so I knew it wasn't good.

She wouldn't call me if it were good

> "You remember that boy Johnny you worked with, the one from Louisiana?" she asked.
> "Yeah, why?"
> "Dead," she said. It was uttered in the tone of someone doing a poor job acting like they didn't like delivering bad news.
> "Drugs?" I asked.
> "No," she replied, "Suicide. Killed that little girl he was married to, as well. And shot some guy she was sleepin' with, but he made it."
> I just lay there silent.
> "Anyway, I knew you would want to know."

I hung up without saying anything else. Knew I would want to know? My ass. Couldn't wait to tell me was more like it. The bitch was a feminist crusader. She made a career of telling the men we counseled what louts they were for being men, and I made a career of pulling them aside and telling them how full of shit she was. We were the only two counselors in that program and the mix was volatile. I spent many days in the administrative offices fending off complaints about my "unusual style" in dealing with male clients. That is what they called not hating them.

Johnny wasn't the first in twenty years of doing that kind of work. Quite honestly, I had lost count. But counting is just for statistics anyway. In the work I did the numbers had faces. They had families and stories that I learned from listening to them. And they had pain that mostly went unnoticed by the very people that were supposed to be there to help them.

I remembered Johnny's story, and his pain. He was a twenty two year old stock boy at an auto parts store in the hot and humid swamp lands of southern Louisiana. When he spoke, it was with rural earnestness, and a Cajun accent thicker than gators in bayou country.

[quote style="boxed"]"Man, Paul, I doan know what to do 'bout that girl o' mine. I know she cheatin'. I know I doan make a dime what she don't spend right away. Sometime she spend it on some other guy. But I can't help it. Every time she call my name I got to come runnin'. Lord never made a bigger fool than me."[/quote]

And Johnny was right. He was a fool, and couldn't be talked out of his foolishness. Just like all real men. And his story isn't reserved just for those who drink and drug themselves into oblivion because they have a woman they can't live with, or without.

In this awful age of misandry, we live so many lies about men that we have lost all touch with the reality of what they are really like. And the cost of it is written in caskets and countless souls lost in a world with no memory of why they died.

You see, men love. They love with the most profound intensity and selflessness of which any creature on this earth is capable. And the steely bond between them and women is, unlike their hearts, unbreakable. When men die on the battlefield, they often fade away telling fellow soldiers "Tell my wife I love her." Others cry out for their mothers as blood soaks the soil.

[image]They are flattened by divorce, and many will eat a gun rather than face the loss, even if it is the loss of someone that has already destroyed their lives.

They will lay down in traffic for the women they love and stand in the way of bullets to protect them. And they will strike down any many who dares offend them. They have been doing this for all of human history.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]79% of all suicides are men.[/quote] Yet all this has been rewritten with misandric ink. It has been revised by scholars who tell us men are bad, by psychologists whose main field of work seems to be recommending divorce, complete with male scapegoat, as a cure all for women for whatever petty dissatisfactions they feel about their mates. And it has been inculcated into the consciousness of our family law system, driving men to despair and despondency on levels never before seen in history.

If you want the statistics, go look them up. I am tired of turning dead men into numbers and "proving" there is a problem to the Camille's of this world.

I hope, more than anything else, that at some point in our future that people start to think. When you see the story on the evening news about a man who set himself ablaze outside a family court, ask yourself what kind of pain could drive someone to cure it with fire? When you read in the newspaper about the man who holed up in his house with a gun and his children, threatening to take them all out, ask yourself if this is just a crazy man, or a man driven to the brink by a pain so monstrous and devastating that even the unthinkable could become an option?

[quote style="boxed" float="right"]During divorce, men kill themselves at 10 times the rate of women.[/quote]Indeed, there is a great deal we have to ask. The only problem is that all the wrong people are asking all the wrong questions. We have a president who marks Father's Day by shaming men for not being better Dads. We have psychotherapists telling us that it is women who love too much. And we have a system of higher education that cares more about the life expectancy of a fruit fly than a young man who blows his brains out.

And this in a culture that still raises men to put women in lifeboats and then try their hand at breathing saltwater, as though death were their only true calling.

Is it any wonder why, when we create men to so devalue their own existence; to be disposable, that we can so often see them doing just what we have insisted that they do? And shouldn't we, perhaps, question at times whether it is suicide that takes these men… or murder? Who, after all, is putting the gun in their hands and promising them the pain will stop if they only pull the trigger?

Perhaps Obama, in his own erroneous way, is right. We do need better Dads. We need Dads to teach their sons, not "how to treat a woman," but how hold their own with them. We don't need to teach them to "take care of their woman," but to only accept one who demonstrates the character and integrity to be trusted, from the start.

And we need to teach them how rare that is in modern life. More than anything else, we need to teach them how to let women go, and watch them as they grow up to make sure they can do it. And we need Dads to role model that, in their own families with their own wives. In other words, we need to do a lot of things that we are not doing.

I know it is obligatory. I can't write a piece like this and not include some resources for men to call in in times of crisis, such as those paltry resources are. So I will include something at the end. But I would still like to think, that somewhere, at some point in time, we can quit offering Band-aids for men to put on tumors and start helping them with their real problems.

It seems, hell or high water, that we are going to continue to destroy men in courtrooms and therapy offices and offer them up as convenient political fodder. It isn't anything new. But we better start calling on the fathers of this world to stop raising their sons to do nothing more than stand against a wall for whatever woman is in their lives, just waiting for their turn in a box.

Murdering Mom Waddles Free

It is always a tendency in MRM forums to post stories about the horrendous amount of sexual discrimination in the legal system, both for women and against men. I made a pledge to myself that I was not going to fill headlines with this stuff because, one, it's redundant- anyone who doesn't know the men get the hammer and women get the kit glove in criminal courts is living under a rock.

And two, it would be doubly redundant here. In the right column I have created a "Men in the News," section with links to relevant stories that fall into this category.

But Aset Magomadova is a different story.

In a stunning decision by the Court of Queens Bench Justice Sal LoVecchio, of Calgary, Alberta, murdering mom Magomadova was let off with probation after strangling the life out of her 14 year old daughter with one of her scarves.

That, in and of itself, is neither surprising or uncommon. In our women-don't-do-bad-things-unless-someone-makes-them world, women have grown accustomed to taking a walk while bodies are lowered into the ground. We have become a culture, when it comes to women, that can find an excuse for the inexcusable quicker than you can drown five children in a bathtub in Houston and say Post Partum Depression.

The kicker to this one was delivered, as it often is, by the press that covered the story. PostMedia News reporter Daryl Slade, reported in a Calgary Herald story posted at Canada.com that Magomadova was sentenced to three years probation with the condition that she take grief, depression and anger management counseling.

Translation: Get through the grief of murdering your daughter and then learn how to manage your anger well enough not to kill some other child.

Secondary Translation: We know what you did, but we are letting you off anyway.

Tertiary Translation: If you kill anyone else, we will extend your probation.

Justice LoVecchio would disagree. "At first blush (a suspended sentence) may seem like a get-out-of-jail-free card. It is not," he said.

Uh, yes it is, Sal, and even an incompetent political whore like you knows it.

Between the lines in the case- actually not between the lines unless you want them to be- are facts that defy the notorious lack of reason and sexual bigotry presiding at the western bench.

The knife that the accused alleged her daughter attacked her with did not have the daughters fingerprints on it. That was apparently part of why the judge stuck down the woman's claim of self defense.

Also, the medical examiner in the case testified that it would have taken approximately two and a half minutes to cause death by strangulation in this manner.

Two and a half minutes. How long is two and a half minutes when you have a scarf twisted around the neck of your child?

Anger management? I'll damned well bet.

Now, it was noted in the case and the news story that the daughter, Aminat Magomadova, had a history of violence, including an assault of her teacher at school.

Any bets on where she learned that?

This is just one more shameful case in which a woman snuffed the life out of another human being and it was reduced to a counseling matter by the legal system. In a strange twist for sexual parity, it apparently didn't matter that the victim was female, or a child. Female killers have equal opportunity when it comes to their victims.

You've come a long way, baby. Yes, indeed.

End Game- The Beginning

Paul Elam · 18 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Game has made a big splash in the man-o-sphere in recent times. And of late I have begun writing on the subject myself, to one degree or another.

As a primer to the uninitiated, Game is ostensibly the tactics and methods of scoring with women while placing yourself in the alpha position among other males. I offer that definition simply from extrapolating what I have read on the subject, and as I have never found a concise definition from its main proponents.

On a slightly deeper level, Game purports to differ itself from Pick Up Artistry (PUA) in that it stems from an enhanced cognizance of human female sociobiology, and uses that knowledge to manipulate women into bed.

I have to admit that I have been frequently stuck when trying to sort this thing out. Exploring the implications of Game in juxtaposition to my beliefs as a men's advocate drew me into an intellectual tug-of-war with myself that for weeks seemed to be a complete standoff. It's been a frustrating time that until now had left me with about 10 incomplete essays and nothing to post.

But then it hit me. The tug-of-war was self inflicted. And the only reason I was in struggling was because I was blinding myself to the obvious. Game doesn't really stem from PUA, it is PUA (which is also nothing new), just warmed over and re-branded with a catchy lexicon and a "new and improved" label on the bottle.

In other words, it's male pussy centrism, just like it always has been.

HOWEVER,

Roissy and the others have unearthed, or at the very least articulated an idea that has the potential for massive utility. Understanding the Evo-psychology of women, and using it to your advantage, is an untapped gold mine for male sexual empowerment, and male protection from the gynocracy. For all their work, they have introduced us to the possibilities of Game, and now it is time to take those ground breaking efforts and move forward with a model designed exclusively with male protectionism in mind, both in public and private life.

Let's face it. Pussy is power. It always has been. Pussy power is so great that women can have an entire world of men working like dogs and handing over their money, yielding seats on life boats, opening their doors, acting like trained seals for their approval, agreeing with whatever bullshit comes out of their mouths, and at the same time have those men nodding and agreeing when women claim that men have all the power and need to do more to make things better for women.

True to their unfortunate nature, men will pass laws, lock each other up and brutalize each other to make sure that all these feminine biddings are done.

If that isn't power, I'll eat my hat. And if you don't believe me, ask Sampson, Dillinger, Bill Clinton, John Edwards, Tiger Woods, the Duke Three, The Hofstra Five or any of about a million men, from average to "powerful," who have had their heads handed to them by even the weakest of women.

Clinton was outwitted by a 19 year old bimbo, with a little help from feminist governance. And if he had been a republican, whoa Nelly, his ass would have been fried to a crisp.

Am I making this up?

I think not.

Perhaps there was a time when the fake power of manhood worked. Hell, it got us to the moon when I was 12 years old. But we live in a different world than when I was 12. The average woman in today's western culture should have a manufacturers warning tattooed just below the naval at birth. I used the one on the pic for the sake of brevity, but a more accurate one would read something like this:

MANUFACTURERS WARNING: Use of this product can result in early death, suicide, clinical depression, imprisonment, false accusations, destroyed reputation, poverty, spousal support, child support, loss of property, joblessness and social isolation.

Those would do for starters.

And this is where Game, if we take out the 99% bullshit focus on chasing pussy, can have a dramatic impact that can significantly improve the lives of men by helping them weed out the most destructive females, which they will more likely if not under the pressure and influence of perceived scarcity.

And that scarcity is just a perception because getting laid is the easy part. Hell, women these days are so sexually available that the whole idea of PUA would seem to be moot. There is no "artistry" to picking up women, and anyone who thinks there is should not be trusted with a box of crayons. But the traditional methods for men to "attract" women are, in fact, a product of real historical scarcity. And while the sexual landscape has changed dramatically, three million years of programming dies hard.

But the point of Game, which I now call Zeta Game, is in recognizing that while neither sex nor women are scarce, they can both be as dangerous as they are pleasurable, and that an intimate knowledge of the forces that unconsciously drive women, and the ability to exploit it, can help men meet sexual needs and stay out of harms way at the same time.

In the end, it's not about getting women, but in being able to select them at will, and dispose quickly and safely of the unwanted and/or dangerous ones.

You don't need a book or a series of articles on this. If you are a quick starter, you can get everything you need to know about attracting women from these two eight minute videos. It isn't that I am that smart. It is that women are that simple. This isn't rocket science.

You see, the important thing here is not that I succeeded in getting laid. What was most important was that one, I put no real energy, or money, into the equation. And two, I turned the power dynamic between myself and women a full 180 degrees from what I had always known. I became the selector from a pool of willing women. No need for bullshit pick up lines.Why would I have wasted my time approaching women in bars and other places, trying to impress them or get their phone number when I could just pick among the women that were offering themselves up to have sex with me on a regular basis?

Answer, I fucking wouldn't. And neither should you. Picking one woman and "going after her" is for men who can't get a room full of women to come after them. And the truth is that almost any man can own that room, top to bottom, if he wants to.

And the advantage to this is monumental. You find out things about women who are crawling into bed with you, and even before they do. You can, and should, take the opt out when the danger signs show up. Too entitled? Next. Two kids and an attitude about the ex? See ya. Whatcha gonna buy me? Hasta la vista, baby. All these women are problems, and bigger problems waiting to happen, but you can adios any of them before or after having sex with them.

Why? Because there will be more waiting for you. And the more of them you pump and dump, the more the others will tingle when you walk into the room. They may hate you, or fear you, but they will want you just the same.

And why should you want to dump them so unceremoniously? Remember that warning label? Well, it wasn't made up out of thin air. People always broadcast who they are…if you are listening.

If a woman you barely know thinks she is entitled to dig into your wallet just because she is going to sleep with you, then what do you imagine she would feel entitled to after sleeping with you for a year? After getting married?

If a woman talks constantly about the abusive, horrible men in her life, and men in general, how do you think she will end up talking about you? And to whom, the police maybe?

The thing is, contrary to popular feminist belief, men fall in love and dedicate to women at some point in their lives. And their tendency is to give everything. Usually the routine goes along traditional lines. Man spots girl, sets out to impress her and win her affections. He leads with his wallet, puts on his best act and ignores every warning sign she is broadcasting because he views her as a scarce resource. Because he feels like he has very limited options.

So if she accepts him, he considers himself lucky. He has found the woman of his dreams, she has returned his love, and all is right with the world.

He may spend the better part of the rest of this life finding out just how wrong he was. And in most cases, while he will find out that he was wrong, he will never know why. He will usually be incapable of figuring out that when you fish with stink bait, you catch bottom feeders. If you use your money to attract women, you get shallow materialists. If you use your willingness to sacrifice to her whims, you get narcissism. If you use deference and agreement, you get entitlement.

If you use all three, you get the typical western women.

The techniques for helping you avoid that pitfall, and perhaps find someone atypical to hang with for a while, are simple. Once you have established yourself as a sexually in demand with the women in your group, there is a code, a list of four screening behaviors and attitudes that will help cull out the deadweight (almost all of them) and set you up to find what I call a “manageable” woman. More on that in the next Zeta Game piece.

Da Rules

1. Leave your wallet in your pocket. If you want a whore, go to a massage parlor. They are guaranteed to put out for a fixed price, and they don’t follow you around and talk when you’re done.

2. Don’t “date,” women. Ever. Hang out with them. Party with them. Eat with them. But it is never a date. Dating implies financial responsibility on your part, and perhaps gives the impression of exclusivity before you desire it. You owe women nothing for their company or their bodies.

Look at it this way. You can “ask a woman out” and spend a lot of money on food and drink. But if you take the social club route as I suggested in the video, she can eat and drink with the group on her dime (or some beta‘s), vie with the other women for your attention, and then go home with you if you select her.

3. Never make a pass at a woman. Never. Stay Zeta and they will make a pass at you.

4. Remember- Sleeping with a woman does not mean you owe her anything. Not a relationship, not a call the next day, not even a promise not to sleep with her sister.

Notice something about these rules. None of them govern anything you should do, but simply show you what you don’t have to do. There is nothing here that says do this or do that for women. It is just the opposite. You do nothing for them at all. You simply live your life without regard to them one way or another. They will show up offering their goods without you doing a damn thing.

It is just that simple.

When you join a social club, make it one that you would enjoy if it were just men. Keep it in your own comfort zone. Make it a group where you can and will make male friends. It has to have some value to you without the female presence.

If you are a staunch conservative, don't join the Sierra Club thinking it is Zeta. It's not. Joining a group like that when you think they are all morons for the sake of being around women is fake, and it calls on you to start things off with a lie.

I know what some of you are saying. Ha! Joining any club, even one you would like, with the idea of women in mind is just more pussy begging.

All puns aside, I beg to differ.

Avoiding pussy centrism does not mean you have to crawl in a hole or only go places that you think women aren't. In fact, that can be as pussy centric, only in reverse, as practicing PUA. Living a life that presents sexual opportunities is normal for any man. Only a few are so jaded from being screwed over that they have ruled out any possibility of sex or relationship again.

Most men will keep trying. Either to meet sexual needs, or find a "partner." And while I caution against the latter, I understand that it is going to happen whether I caution against it or not.

So unless your goal is the complete removal of women from your life, which is understandable given what many men have gone through with them, then a sexual empowerment and risk management program is in order.

When men don't operate out of a sense of scarcity, they have the opportunity to make better decisions. When they make better decisions, they have a tendency to get screwed over a lot less.

Next in the Zeta Game series- OK, so you started something regular, what next?

Drugs, War, Money and Blood

Paul Elam · 20 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"You want me to do what?" The look on Jerome's face was bewildered, angry.

"It's like I said," I replied. "For the next 28 days you have to live at this facility. You have to go into groups of people you don't know and tell them all you are a drug addict. You have to tell them stories about how drugs ruined your life and harmed your family. You have to go to Narcotics Anonymous meetings and do the same thing. You'll have to convince everyone around you that you're an addict trying to get better. And the fact that you don't have, and have never had, a drug problem will have to remain between you and I."

"If you want to save your job," I added.

Jerome leaned back in his chair and let out a great breath. His eyes watered for a moment and then stopped. An African American man that looked younger than his 35 years, Jerome was straight up blue collar and no nonsense. It was clear that nonsense like this did not sit well with him at all.

He had worked for a large telephone company in the Southwest since he was 20, working his way up from lineman to a top tier foreman. He started working there the same year he got married and now had three children.

"How the hell could this be happening to me?" he asked, and his eyes started to glisten again.

The answer to his question was simple. He worked for a company that periodically forced employees to surrender bodily fluids for examination. On a recent weekend, he had been to a bar-b-que at a friends house and someone passed a joint. It was an infrequent indulgence for him, but he took a few hits and passed it on.

The following Monday he was tested. Company policy afforded him the option of intervention and treatment or the end of a career that was the only source of income for his family. There were no gray areas The fact that they didn't start drug testing till he had invested 10 years of his life in working for them didn't matter. If you tested positive on a drug screen, you were an addict; a liability, and you needed treatment; expensive treatment, though no one has ever demonstrated that this was true.

I could have told Jerome a lot more about how his life was about to change; the mandated outpatient treatment after he discharged, aftercare meetings for a year, and 12 step meetings, one hour each and every day for the first three months after he went home.

I didn't have the heart. He would find out at as time went by, and make the adjustments. For the time being my only goal was to help him not do anything stupid. He was caught up in the system, the system that I worked in, and if he wasn't careful he could lose everything.

I told him, as I will tell you now, that he was one of the lucky ones. Employers can have a powerful impact on your life when they decide to. But it is nothing compared to governments.

Absolutely nothing.

Jerome just got a scratch compared to what was happening elsewhere. His was a slight wound from a war on drugs that regularly kills more people than drugs do. We have been doing it a hundred years now; making criminals of our countrymen; making war on our own people in their own homes.

And as MND publisher Mike LaSalle just reported to readers, it is a war that is now hitting close to home.

It started, like a lot of deadly bad ideas, with politicians. We can thank the Democrats for the inception, but somewhere along the line, the Republicans stepped in to prove they were just as stupid.

Woodrow Wilson, who also gave us the Federal Reserve Act, the first draft since the Civil War and rave reviews of the stunningly racist movie "Birth of a Nation," helped usher in the age where America turned questionable personal habits into concrete walls and steel gray bars.

It was called the Harrison Tax Act of 1914, and it was the result of nearly fifteen years of disinformation and racist propaganda promulgated by Wilson's associates.

In 1900 the Journal of the American Medical Association published in a report that "Negroes in the South are being addicted to a new form of vice– that of 'cocaine sniffing' or the 'coke habit.'" That was followed up by several newspaper reports that cocaine was causing blacks to rape white women and was improving their pistol marksmanship.

Eight years later President Teddy Roosevelt appointed Dr. Hamilton Wright as the first Opium Commissioner for the United States. Among his most notable observations was that "cocaine is often the direct incentive to the crime of rape by Negroes of the south and other sections of the country."

Wright also postulated that "one of the most unfortunate phases of smoking opium in this country is the large number of women who have become involved and are living as common-law wives or cohabitating with Chinese in the Chinatowns of our various cities."

Let's see. A bunch of drug crazed horny black men and a growing number of loose white women with no qualms about crossing racial boundaries?

Yeah, man, it was time for war, alright; time to break out some fucking law and order.

And so it started. Police began busting heads, most of them black and poor, and prisons started to fill. Law upon law was written and enforced with no more thought to the truth than Dred Scott. The edges of The Constitution were already starting to singe.

It got a boost in 1937 with the Marijuana Tax Act, signed into law by Franklin Roosevelt. And just like the Harrison Act, its roots are steeped more in racial bigotry than in public safety. In fact, marijuana had already been criminalized in many states prior to the federal prohibition. Most of this started with border states and stemmed from a fear of indigenous Mexicans. One Texas legislator is quoted as saying, "Mexicans are all crazy, and this stuff (marijuana) is why."

Now it was brown heads getting busted, and prisons became bilingual.

And the drugs kept coming.

And now there is money in it. Big money, your money, fed into a vast machine that is eating up the very freedoms it purports to protect.

Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt were both Democrats, but as time passed and political stances vacillated, it was the republicans that took over the reigns of anti drug insanity, not out of racial prejudice (though for some that seems to be a big plus), but puritanical fundamentalism. Many a good Christian constituent doesn't cotton much to personal choice when it comes to drugs.

So the right has pretty much owned the war on drugs since. And for the efforts of these "keep the government off our back" conservatives, they have given us the mammoth sized DEA, a thousand federal regulations, a rainbow coalition of busted heads, overflowing prisons, enough dead bodies to please Pol Pot, a meaningless Constitution and a bevy of government functionaries that are literally out of their minds with power.

We wanted a war on drugs and that is exactly what we got. Only it isn't drugs we are attacking, it's people. It is a civil war with a guaranteed Viet-nam style ending that might be worth paying attention to.

Because the drugs keep coming.

You would think a century of this would be enough to have learned a lesson or two. I mean, we actually did learn something with alcohol. We made it illegal, and then, when we got tired of mobsters, mass murder, poisoning deaths from bad hooch, graft and the fact that everyone that wanted to was still drinking anyway, we got a little wiser.

Today, we have alcohol in its various forms being distributed nationwide, in complete peace, with no underground economy and most importantly, no bullets flying.

Are there consequences? Sure. Some tragic ones. I have seen it first hand a thousand times over. After all, most of the people I worked with were not Jerome's, though his situation is a direct result of the woefully inept way we are approaching this problem.

In the end, though, and anyone with a half a mind should already know this, there are plenty of problems you can't fix with a badge and a gun. The best we can do is damage control.

Sadly, all you have to do is get a news report from the border with Mexico, or take a look inside one of our prisons, to find out just how far we are from the best we can do.

Jury duty at a rape trial? Acquit!

Editorial note: in the early years of A Voice for Men, when it first started, deliberately inflammatory articles were often written in order to shake people out of their comfortable sensibilities and confront brutal realities they just did not want to see. This tiny handful of old articles is cited time and again by critics of the Men's Human Rights Movement's literature as "typical" and the sort of thing you see "all the time" or in a "steady stream," when, rather tellingly, these are almost always articles at least a few years old and actually rather unusual.

In this particularly controversial essay, Paul Elam asks a provocative question: if you truly believe you cannot trust police, prosecutors, or judges to make sure you get the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, when rape shield laws withhold exculpatory evidence, how can you in good conscience trust anything you see in a court of law, no matter how damning the evidence might look?

It is an uncomfortable question, but it is rather telling that in the years since this was written, almost everyone continues to bring up this old article without ever addressing the substance of it, but instead just emotionally characterize it as "Paul Elam says men should get away with rape," when what he actually says could not be more clear: due process and presumed innocence have been undermined, and until that changes how can you in good conscience convict a man of practically anything?

Until the system is reformed, it would seem to us that a growing number of people are going to come to the same uncomfortable conclusions Elam does here, and although not everyone in the Men's Human Rights movement endorses this view, it is telling that most reactions to it are emotional and not logical. What most frequently happens is the whole thing is misinterpreted as "rape apologia' rather than what it is: an indictment of a flawed criminal justice system.

It is also telling that, once again, this unusual article, not typical at all of AVfM content, is still years later regularly cited as "typical," instead of what it was: a provocative piece meant to force people to think about things they don't like thinking about. Eds

> I consider trial by jury as the only anchor yet imagined by man, by which a government can be held to the principles of its constitution. ~ *Thomas Jefferson

With the possible exception of the sexual molestation of a child, rape is a crime that evokes the most visceral of responses from the average person. And for good reason. Sex that is physically forced or obtained by threat of harm sadistically reduces victims to their most helpless state, and leaves lingering damage that may well last the remainder of a persons life.

It is fitting then, that we seek to justly punish those guilty of the crime, but also that we proceed with caution and diligence, ever observing the rule of law in the process. That rule of law is integral to maintaining order; to preventing justice from being circumvented by political motives or mob rule; to ensure, as should be ensured in a just society, that the rights of the accused are protected with vigor and transparency.

Regardless of the personal repugnance we may feel for any crime, including rape, we must remember that without an overarching concern for justice, laws invariably become nothing more than the instruments of tyranny.

Unfortunately, where it concerns the crime of rape, that tyranny has been upon us for quite some time. With the epidemic of false rape reports, poor and sometimes corrupt police work, prosecutors blind with power and ambition, and an unconscionable but successful feminist campaign to define rape in the most ludicrous terms possible, we have created a monstrous system of abject injustice, with rights of the accused routinely ground to dust in the name of convictions, and to our national disgrace, in the name of sexual politics.

Whereas feminists lament what they call a rape culture in today's society, we actually live in a false rape culture, and it is in growth mode.

It seems every day there is a news story about a man freed from prison after being falsely convicted. Just recently, two Texas men were released from prison who had been falsely convicted of rape in separate incidents. One had served 27 years, the other 19.

That's two men, at the same time, not just from the same state, but from the same city.

Both men were from Houston, and their stories are being repeated around the country, revealing a somber reality that continues unimpeded.

There are a lot of innocent men in prison for the crime of rape. And much worse, our capacity to identify and exonerate them is overwhelmingly exceeded by an unjust legal system that continues to put them there.

The Innocence Project, which seeks to free individuals falsely convicted and incarcerated has overwhelmingly had the most success with the crime of rape. In a review of the 251 cases in which they have succeeded in freeing innocent men, nearly all of them were for sex crimes, and their average length of incarceration was 17 years. Most of those were freed only because they were lucky enough to have DNA evidence that could be evaluated. Many others are not so fortunate.

While the laudable efforts to free the innocent must continue, it is clearly time to seek to understand how we got to such rampant injustice, and what we can do about it. And that begins with a candid examination of what happens in a rape prosecution, from beginning to end.

It all starts with a police report; a compliant filed by a private citizen alleging that a rape has occurred.

And that is where we encounter the first of many problems. As the facts would have it, the chances of a rape accusation being true are barely more predicable than the toss of a coin.

Former Colorado prosecutor Craig Silverman once opined, "For sixteen years I was a kick ass prosecutor who made the most of my reputation [by] vigorously prosecuting rapists. I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations made to the Denver Police Department. A command officer in the Denver Police Sex Assault Unity recently told me he put the false rape numbers at approximately 45%."

Silverman's experience is not isolated.

Just recently the Orlando Police Department made the public proclamation that false rape allegations have become an epidemic. Last June the Baltimore Sun reported that police claimed that more than 30% of rape accusations were deemed unfounded. Louisville and Pittsburgh reported similar numbers.

A longitudinal study conducted by Professor Eugene Kanin concluded that over a period of nine years, 41% of rape allegations studied were fraudulent, concocted by the alleged victim to either create an alibi, seek attention and sympathy, or to seek revenge.

And there is the McDowell Study cited by Warren Farrell in The Myth of Male Power, which concluded that of 1,218 reported rapes on Air Force Bases around the world, 45% were discovered to be fraudulent.

This 45% of cases are not ones that could not be proven or for which a suspect could not be apprehended, but cases that were proven to be fabricated by the person filing the complaint. 27% of the false claims were admitted after the accusers were asked to take a polygraph test, or having just failed one.

Keep in mind though, that these are good results. All these false claims were discovered by diligent investigators who were seeking the truth. But what happens when police are not so careful?

33 year old William McCaffery spent four years in a New York prison because a false rape claim from Biurny Perguero Gonzalez, who alleged McCaffery had raped her after she accepted a ride from him when she was intoxicated.

The truth was that her acceptance of the ride from McCaffery had angered her girlfriends, and she made up the rape story to turn their harsh feelings into sympathy.

When questioned about the events, McCaffery cast blame at the officials, including "the arresting officers, the prosecution."

Everyone, he said, "wanted to believe the lie. The ADA (assistant district attorney) first and foremost."

And that is the status quo. While arrests for making false allegations appear to be on the increase, the norm has been to treat the criminality of the reports as a mental health issue. Crystal Gayle Mangum, the notorious liar in the Duke Rape Case, was referred to counseling, as was Danmell Ndonye, the woman who falsely accused five men in the Hofstra Case of gang raping her in a men's room at a school dorm.

The police themselves add to the problem. In the Orlando, Florida story, the NBC News affiliate reported statements by police saying that they do not want to arrest these women. In fact, they only seemed to notice the problem when it got so out of hand that it was causing a stress on resources within the police department. They also noted the deleterious effect on the "real victims" of rape, but did not utter a word about the men at risk for being wrongly placed behind bars as a result of the allegations.

This type of police complicity in the false rape culture, by ignoring and enabling this criminal activity, is a cornerstone in the current crisis. And while they now publicly bemoan the false allegations, they show no signs of recognizing that the epidemic they face is partly of their own making; that it is, quite literally, the chickens coming home to roost.

And where the police leave off, the prosecutors go into overdrive.

Mike Nifong, the supposedly "rogue" prosecutor who pursued the Duke rape suspects long after there was abundant evidence to exonerate them, has become the poster boy for false rape culture.

Nifong, while getting massive amounts of coverage from the media, was hardly the exception, and not even the most extreme. Mary N. Kellett, a prosecutor in Bar Harbor Maine, is making a career of rape cases. She is averaging one indictment a week, from a population of less than 60,000.

Her most notable case so far has been against Vladek Filler, who was convicted of raping his wife, with no forensic evidence, and only her word that the rape occurred. The conviction was overturned due to prosecutorial misconduct and Kellett is appealing the case to the Maine Supreme Court.

The chronology of this story is lengthy and the details somewhat complicated, but have a look, and a good listen, to the following recording of police interaction with Filler's wife.

This is what passes for a credible complainant in a modern rape case. This is the compelling reason to put a man behind bars. Kellett is clearly a prosecutor out of control, but she is nonetheless still serving as an Assistant District Attorney, and rumor has it she has ambitions to run for the District Attorney when her boss retires.

The Innocence Project gives a detailed breakdown of the factors that play into bad convictions, both from police and prosecutors. Key factors range from coercion of defendants, to knowing use of false testimony (suborning perjury) and a host of other unscrupulous tactics.

Here first, is the breakdown for police actions, representing nearly half of the first 74 people exonerated by The Innocence Project.

And now the breakdown for prosecutorial misconduct on the same group.

In light of what is going on in our legal system, Kellett is no more a “rogue” than Mike Nifong.

It is the system that is rogue; Kellett and Nifong were/are just an unusually visible parts of it.

Even given the rampancy of false allegations and misconduct by law enforcement and prosecutors, this is still not justification for looking the other way when a crime is committed. Liars, whether shedding fake tears or wearing uniforms or arguing before a jury, cannot be allowed to so subvert justice that we abandon the law itself. For it is the law, when justly and rightly applied, that gives us the checks and balances to overcome those who abuse the system.

Enter, however, Rape Shield Laws; the final nail in the coffin that holds the remains of our presumed innocence and right to a fair trial.

Ostensibly, rape shield laws were enacted to limit a defendants ability to cross examine a plaintiff regarding her past sexual conduct, the logic being that such information is not only irrelevant, but might prejudice jurors. For instance, if it were brought out that a married woman alleging rape had engaged in extramarital affairs, it might cause a bias in some jurors that strongly disapprove of such behavior and prompt them to acquit her alleged assailant.

It would seem reasonable, until you go back and review the information provided by The Innocence Project and consider what this type of system does with these kinds of laws.

In 1998, Oliver Jovanovic was convicted and sentenced to 15 years to life for kidnapping, sexual abuse and assault. It was alleged that he held 20 year old Jamie Rzucek in his apartment against her will for 20 hours while he brutalized her with sadomasochistic torture. Rzucek testified against him for six days in court.

During the trial, the judge, under the rape shield statutes, refused to allow email communications that she sent to Jovanovic after the incident, among other evidence.

Later an appeals court found that the judge had misapplied the laws and the conviction was overturned, but only after Jovanovich had served 20 months in prison, during which he was attacked and injured by another inmate.

The email from the woman that was excluded? In it, she described herself as “quite bruised mentally and physically, but never so happy to be alive.” And in another communication, she said, “the taste was so overpoweringly delicious, and at the same time, quite nauseating.”

It was also revealed that in the early part of the relationship the woman had expressed an interest in snuff films (films where actors are actually killed or death is simulated in a fashion as to appear real, for sexual stimulation).

Despite the conviction being overturned, and the prosecutor, Linda Fairnsteen, knowing about the exculpatory evidence, she still wanted to charge and retry Jovanovic. It was only when Rzucek, having to face the certainty of questions about her emails, refused to testify a second time that the case collapsed and was dismissed with prejudice.

In 2004, Jovanovic sued the city of New York, seeking $10 million for damage to his life and reputation, also asserting that the prosecution had prior knowledge of other false rape allegations made by the woman. An attempt by the city to have the case dismissed was denied by a federal judge.

A case grabbing even more headlines was that of Marv Albert, a formerly legendary sportscaster who pled guilty to assault stemming from an allegation made by his then girlfriend, Vanessa Perhatch. In a story that put Alpert’s admittedly unusual sexual proclivities in living rooms across the world, he was accused of sadistically biting Perhatch during a sexual assault.

Withheld from evidence by rape shield laws was Perhatch’s history of aggressive and vindictive actions against men who left her (Albert was about to be married) and the testimony of a former boyfriend that claimed that biting was a normal part of sex play for the woman.

Under the circumstances, Albert was compelled to either plead to a lesser charge or face very severe penalties at the conclusion of a trial. He opted for the former, was completely disgraced in the public eye, and in the process became nearly unemployable.

He was last seen playing a sidekick role on the television show Marriage Ref.

There are many more of these cases that are known, and undoubtedly many more that will never see the light of day. They are part an parcel to a system gone woefully astray, even if the original intent had some merit.

And there are more problems with many practices in courts during the course of a sexual assault trial. In some cases, the court will erect a partition; a screen that separates the alleged victim from the defendant, the logic being that the sight of the him will cause traumatic stress.

It has the prejudicial power of putting a sniper in the room with a gun trained on the defendant in case he decides to jump up and rape the plaintiff during proceedings.

It is clearly the presumption of guilt, legitimized by the same court that is supposed to protect the presumption of innocence.

These are all problems in need of a solution. And solutions are not forthcoming.

It would seem clear that reforming or eliminating these laws is in order. But neither is likely to happen. Imagine the professional life expectancy of a politician that tries to address this in the legislative sense. He, or even she, would be immediately branded as pro rape by feminist academics throughout the western world, and the pro-feminist machine we call the mainstream media would assassinate their image till they could not get a job alongside Marv

Alpert.

Police are not going to help. They are a fundamental part of the problem.

Prosecutors? Who, Mary Kellett?

No. This is a problem so intractable and entrenched in the culture that any attempt to address it through conventional means is certain to result in failure and vilification.

So, what do you do within the system when the system is the problem? What do you do when laws that purport to serve the cause of justice can be so easily wielded as an instrument for revenge or the next rung up on a political ladder? And when there is all but impunity for those that do so?

What do you do when courts practice tyranny and innocent men are ground to dust along with their rights?

What do you do when these concerns are dismissed out of political expedience by a system that has built, with the majority of public support, a brick wall around its own systematic malfeasance?

Extreme circumstances call for extreme measures. And there is no better example of extreme than in the way this false rape culture has run common decency and sacred rights into the ground.

One possible extreme is jury nullification. When a law or system of applying laws becomes the source of injustice, jury nullification has long been a viable option.

Nullification occurs when a jury acquits a defendant despite the weight of evidence against him. It is legal and completely moral depending on the application.

For instance, a 1930's white jury finding a white male not guilty of murdering a black man despite a mountain of evidence that points to a conviction would be an immoral application of this principle.

But on the other hand, what would you think if a cancer patient were on trial for possession of marijuana, and you knew that drug was the only resource they had to help them tolerate their chemotherapy? Would it be immoral to ignore the law and let them go?

The law is clear. Marijuana is illegal. If they were in possession of it they were breaking the law. Should we not then send them to jail?

Now, I am not comparing an accused rapist to a cancer patient, but simply pointing to the fact that when the legal system fails to seek justice, when it is, in fact, undermining the very concept of justice, juries are equipped to put a stop to it.

Now what if you are on a jury in a rape trial, and you know that it is highly likely that evidence that may be exculpatory has been deliberately hidden from you? What if you think there is a genuine possibility that the trial is more about the career of the prosecutor than about the pursuit of justice?

What if you know you cannot trust what you are seeing?

In your mind, here and now, I challenge you to ask yourself. What kind of impact do the answers to these questions have on the concept of reasonable doubt?

And I would argue that if you are aware of how the system actually works, then you must be aware that reasonable doubt cannot be ascertained in a rape trial. There is just not enough trustworthy information in many cases to make that judgment, and unfortunately as a juror, you are not able to discern if the case you are seeing is one of the ones that has been tainted.

There are perhaps exceptions to this. If the state is able to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt that breaking and entering, an abduction, the use of a weapon or extensive bodily harm occurred during the alleged attack, then a guilty vote may be justified.

But I say perhaps for a reason. Remember the Jovanovic case? He was convicted of kidnapping with the other charges. It never happened. The Albert case as well. There were “injuries” involved there. All consensual. And he was convicted anyway. So even with these possible exceptions the state could be running a political circus instead of a legitimate trial.

Now, as to nullification, it is easy to conclude that the chances of getting 12 people on a jury knowledgeable enough of the system to see it for the railroad that it is, are highly unlikely. Actual acquittal is out of the question.

Never happen.

But in most cases it still takes unanimity to convict. It ususally takes unanimity to convict on retrial as well. It takes only one to bring the system down, even if only for the time being. And it is a system so tainted that it quite clearly needs to be corrected- for the sake of justice.

There are people that will react to this with outrage and indignation. “How could you?” they will demand, “How could you let someone walk when the evidence shows you that they have committed something as heinous as rape?!”

It is understandable. These are horrendously difficult decisions that test the moral bearings of any human being.

But often the same people who would react to the idea of nullification with such outratge, after reading account after account of innocent men being imprisoned, raped, tortured; destroyed, killed, on lies, will reveal the utter depravity of their indifference by refusing to face what is happening or acknowledge that it even matters.

Their idea of justice is just as corrupt and selfish as the false accuser. They want only punishment, and only where it suits them, at any cost. They care less for the rights of men than Mike Niphong, and their objections should be discarded as quickly as they are raised.

Jury nullification may not be the appropriate route to take in a rape trial, but until society learns to approach this problem without pitchforks and torches, it must be an option that is on the table.

And We Sell These People Weapons?

Paul Elam · 22 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the age of misandry, each and every day is a day when you can say, "Just when I thought I saw it all."

Now a man ends up in prison for rape… because he lied about his religion.

Just recently in Israel an Arab man was sentenced to 18 months in prison for "raping" a Jewish woman. A court ruled that her consent to having sex with the man, who she had just met, was invalid because the man had told the woman he was Jewish.

The story went like this. The couple met in 2008 by serendipity in downtown Jerusalem. The man, 30 year old Sabbar Kashur, allegedly told the woman he was a Jewish bachelor seeking a serious relationship. Preliminaries dispensed with, the couple immediately retreated to a nearby building and had sex.

Later the woman, who is of course unnamed, discovered that Kashur was not Jewish and filed charges. The judges in the case agreed with her, citing that "If she hadn't thought the accused was a Jewish bachelor interested in a serious romantic relationship, she wouldn't have cooperated."

Cooperated?

Wait just a damned minute. The idea that sex is something that happens just by the "cooperation" of the woman rules out the idea that mutually consensual sex ever happens in the first place. Two people don't find themselves attracted to each other and just decide to have sex? The man decides, and the woman only cooperates with him?

While racism also obviously played a role in this (Israelis imprison Arabs by the truckload), it is also clear that modern day Israeli coochie has lapdogs aplenty in their criminal justice system.

Now, I am not going to bash this woman for having sex with a man as part of a formal introduction. It is a free sexual world and women have gained the sexual liberation they demanded. That works for me.

But you have to ask, just how discerning could she have been if her only criteria for cooperating with him was to hear he was Jewish and single? Ah, but as always is the case these days, the lesson in discernment here is for him.

I suppose it never entered the judges minds that she got to know this guy well enough to satisfy her criteria, and obvious desire, for a quick fuck, and then turned legal terrorist when she found out her Mr. Right Now had not been as forthcoming as she wanted.

It puts women in the role of very dangerous children, and makes every man a predator.

How man men have, say, lied about their income to make themselves more appealing to the money grubbers out there? Are they now all rapists? How about the guy that is a recovering alcoholic and doesn't want to tell someone that until he knows them well enough? Is he a rapist for not putting that on the table?

Where are the limits to this? And it must be asked, though it certainly won't be in any venue that matters, what about women that lie to men in order to get them interested in a sexual relationship?

I once had a woman lie to me about her age. If she had told the truth, I would likely have passed. Did she rape me?

Sorry, I forgot, only women can be raped.

Sexual freedom has become a womans domain, and with it has come unfettered power to take on the role of black widow, destroying any man with whom she cooperates. One more rigged game in a rigged system where women hold all the cards and men just pay for whatever their whim of the moment happens to be.

I know, I know. Not all women are like that.

Patriarchy for Dummies

Paul Elam · 24 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

If you have followed the ongoing volumes of discussion in the gender war, you are familiar with a constantly regurgitated bit of feminist claptrap.

Feminism isn't anti-male, it is anti-patriarchal and of course, it's about equality.

Sure it is.

We should consider, though, that in their constant attempt to reshape reality to fit the needs of the moment, there is a dirty little secret that feminists continually keep from themselves. Well, one among many. This one is called reproductive strategy. And without understanding that, you can't understand why and how we developed a patriarchal system.

It is really simple. Men are wired to do whatever it takes to be selected by women for mating. Women are wired to select men that are dominant and aggressive, e.g. patriarchal.

Do I need to say that again?

Do you ever wonder why men like Scott Peterson show up at death row with a stack of marriage proposals waiting for them? That's what happened, and the proposals came from women who only knew one thing about him: He savagely murdered his wife, cutting his own baby from her abdomen and dumped them both out of a boat into the bay.

How is that for marriage material?

It isn't any different with Joran van der Sloot. After skating on the Holloway murder, van der Sloot became a sexual celebrity. Everywhere he went, young women in their sexual prime threw themselves at him like he was Mick Jagger.

Something about the missing body of a young girl and his fingerprints all over the case acted like Spanish Fly on these women.

Of course, he killed again. And of course, his marriage proposals started rolling in as well.

Here, by the way, is the video of Joran and his last victim, Stephany Flores, checking into the hotel room in Lima, Peru, where he would kill her. Watch it closely.

Did you get the way she followed him like an obedient dog? Note the two steps behind and head bowed like a Geisha body language. It is the age old false female submission to male authority, killer authority, in order to have access and eventual control of that power. It is the same type of power that has been making women wet and tingly since the prehistoric plains of the African savanna.

Are the women gone ga ga for Peterson and van der Sloot the exceptions to the rule?

No.

What they are is more extreme examples of the norm. Everyone eats, and in every culture there is a certain percentage of people that eat to the point of obesity. It doesn't make eating abnormal, it just points to some abnormal eating. These women are the same type of phenomena.

They are attracted to killers for the same reasons that the average young woman is attracted to thugs, bad boys on motorcycles, rock stars and politicians as ugly as Henry Kissinger. It is all about power. Power to protect, power to provide, power to dominate and control.

Power to be corralled and used.

When all that power gets channeled into a box and served up on a platter for women's benefit, you have the ultimate aphrodisiac. There's your patriarchy in a nutshell, and all the laws, codes, social norms and gender roles that came with it. Women use the illusion of submission and being demure, coupled with sexual appeal, to get men to perform for their benefit.

Ultimately the master is the slave. He lives under the illusion of power, when in reality he is only the provider of it.

And this of course explains why feminism has not resulted in equality, but only more privilege for women. Feminism only takes what is already there, the female drive to benefit from the power acquired by men, power that almost all women are incapable of gaining on their own, and takes it to the extreme level. In that light, feminism is an extreme that showed up in normal sexual life, just like a letter bearing a marriage proposal on death row.

And as always of course, the chief enablers of all this are men jockeying for sexual approval/selection.

As I have said before, take it up with God or Darwin as you please, but don't blame me for telling the truth.

But that truth, in these modern times, presents a unique dilemma for men, at least the ones that have pulled their heads out and started to read the writing on the wall.

The acquisition of all the power needed to attract women brought with it a rather unfortunate consequence.

Disposabilty.

Pulling 12 hours in a coal mine with trembling walls and death in the air you breathe is a high price to enable a woman to remain at home taking care of children, especially in an age where that kind of life is absolutely unnecessary.

If you are fortunate enough to be alpha material, you get to own or run the coal mine, have men do the digging for you and perhaps even have some of their wives yield to the tingle you give them while hubby is down in the depths doing what a man has to do.

But this is really where we run into a wall that is unscaleable in the movement toward this incredulous thing called "sexual equality."

The minute that man takes a real look at what he is doing and decides less money is a better option, then that is where hypergamy kicks in to overdrive with the wife and he loses her.

The very moment he values his safety and quality of life more than he values her standard of living, the clock starts on her departure.

Without playing by the same rules that gave us patriarchy, there is no real connection between men and women. The men who undermine patriarchy in the only real way it can be undermined, by refusing to take care of women, are automatically reduced to the status of loser and placed on the sexual sidelines.

The only answer to this is to open the door for women on the way out, and perhaps give them a little shove as they go. It's the feminist equalitarian thing to do, after all. These men should be lionized by Steinem, et al, because it frees women from all the "oppressive" patriarchy that comes with marriage (which they will then, invariably, look to get from some other man) and it allows the man, at least in the case of a coal miner, to add a decade or so to his life span and perhaps enjoy it a little more.

If feminism were about being either anti patriarchy or pro equality, the only focus it would have had would be on challenging women to quit picking the most powerful provider that they can and using them to live as close to the state of royalty as possible.

It would have also told women to put down books and pick up shovels.

Instead, what we have is women dominating the work force in the most cushy jobs available, many of them low paying, while men still bear the brunt of often fatal occupational hazards so they can make enough money to be an attractive provider. Whatever financial gaps result in this for women, they simply use The State, that ultimate expression of patriarchy, to fill in.

And do you think these under employed women are more prone to marrying down than any other woman?

Let‘s be real here, all feminism has done is give women a new place to kick back and take it easy while men ante up the blood, sweat and tears. And it leaves their supposedly lamented patriarchy safe and completely intact, ready to do their bidding in any way they want.

Same as it ever was.

Housewives, Prostitutes and Beggars

Uma Challa · 24 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I recently participated in a TV discussion on why prostitution is on the rise in the country. I shared the panel with a closet feminist and a radical feminist, both of whom were of the opinion that prostitution was better than marriage since the house is unsafe for a woman, and she would at least get paid for her services if she were a prostitute.

I returned home thinking about their wise utterances and went to bed discussing the same with my husband.

I said, “For decades, feminists have claimed that one out of three women is unsafe in her own house. They have told us horrendous tales about how it was daily grind for men in the country to abuse, assault, set afire and murder their wives. They lobbied for laws which would facilitate a woman breaking her shackles and barging out of the “tyrannical household” or throwing her alleged oppressors out, whichever is convenient. They ensured that every woman who had a problem “clearly understood” that all her problems were because of men, marriage and the household.”

“By the same token,” I continued, “feminists have also been shouting off of rooftops that streets are terribly unsafe for women. They claim that everyday nine out of ten women are subject to manhandling, rape, sexual assault, acid attacks and what not. While they believe that, ideally, a woman should able to walk safely on the street at midnight, they are constantly scaring themselves and the rest of us in the society about how women are unsafe on the street even during the day.”

All of a sudden my husband had an epiphany and said, “A WHOREHOUSE!”

“YES,” I agreed, “This is brilliant! It is neither the house nor the street. It is something in between – the utopia that my feminist friends on TV spoke so highly of. They have to be right. That’s where they think our women would be safest, well paid and properly fed, and that’s why prostitution, with the more fashionable label of ‘commercial sex’, is on the rise.”

I then thought of how far we have come thanks to the feminist movement from pre-independence days.

We had a time when prostitution was a recognized profession and we had the*Devadasi* system. The system was severely condemned by communists as the handmaid of patriarchy. Their unrelenting crusade against the oldest profession resulted in a legislation for the “prevention of immoral trafficking” in 1956.

While this “prohibitive” legislation decriminalized prostitution, a few decades later, the Government went a step ahead and tacitly legalized commercial sex and sex tourism, recognizing how it can financially empower women and thereby boost the economy.

Today, we are at a point where we are talking about prostitute rights. While we have women’s rights champions like Brinda Karat who proclaim that “Society should have no right to control what women wear or do”, we have others who say, “If you respect a woman’s right to say “no” to sex, you should also respect her right to say “yes” to sex.”

Simultaneously, all heterosexual relationships have been prostitutionalized so that a woman can claim compensation for all sexual or non-sexual, real or imaginary interactions at any time during or after the relationship.

A woman who chooses her hearth and home is not left behind either. She is tagged with the honorary title of “prostitute” as feminists believe that she is unaware that she is only trading sex for social and financial security, and they will not take “no” for an answer.

We surely have come a long way, baby!

While I was still marvelling at this astounding progress, I saw a news item which said that the recent Government Census clubbed housewives, prostitutes and beggars into a group. What a timely gesture by the Government!

While housewives have already been clubbed with prostitutes, would it not be unfair to ignore the scores of women who have taken to a glorified form of begging by standing before the Courts of Law for maintenance and alimony from their estranged husbands?

Feminists have not only taught women to shun all the age-old encumbrances imposed by marriage and family but also to shed all inhibitions associated with parasitic living. Accordingly, there is no trace of shame in these modern liberated women, but it is with a sense of pride and entitlement that they artfully exact money, thus claiming their rightful inclusion by the Government in the club.

The feminists reduced housewives into prostitutes and beggars long ago. The Government has just made it official by grouping them in the Census.

Why, then, is the Supreme Court cross about it? Beats me!

CBS Takes Aim at Paul Elam- Shoots Self in Foot

I just recently had the very dubious honor of a CBS News affiliate doing a hit piece on my recent essay, Patriarchy for Dummies.

Well, I say "hit piece," but I actually found it reminiscent of the scene in the old movie Cat Ballou, when an old and drunken Lee Marvin, sitting atop an equally aging and intoxicated horse, took aim at a barn with his six shooter, fired- and actually missed it.

The broad side, that is.

The critique, penned by someone who didn't bother to post a byline, was that bad, and that off the mark.

Whoever it was used the shopworn "Blame the Victim" allegation, and gave an apt demonstration why such over used charges are losing their effect with thinking people.

They intoned that my questioning the judgment of a young woman who would go into a hotel room alone with Joran van der Sloot was somehow burdening her with the responsibility for her own death. I scratched my head a lot while reading the piece, trying to figure out just how they came to that conclusion, and was still a tad bemused later when I came upon a comment on the matter by our good friend Mr. Snark over at The Spearhead.

This was his take on the CBS piece:

> The 'victim blaming' shaming tactic is really old. YAWN

> Serial Killer: Hello Ladies. I am a man who likes to disembowel and torture women to death when they get close to me. How are you doing today?
> Woman: OMG! You are so, like, totally awesome! Coffee?
> The next morning
> Coroner: This women appears to have been disemboweled and tortured to death.
> PAUL ELAM: If she hadn't gone with that obvious serial killer-
> FEMINISTS: BLAMING THE VICTIM BLAMING THE VICTIM BLAMING THE VICTIM BURN HIM! BUUURRRNN HIIIMMMM!

I always liked ending my confusion with a little laughter.

But the point Snark makes is valid. And in his comedic little melodrama for The Spearhead, he could have interchanged the word "feminists" with the word "media," or the words "public opinion," because thanks to the feminists and the media, public opinion has largely reduced itself to the herd mentality of a bunch of consumer zombies that have to wait for Sean Hannity or Al Franken to tell them what they think.

And one of the things they think for sure is "Don't Blame the Victim!"

Oh, Gawd no!

Not even if it might keep young women from being murdered.

And that's the greater problem here. Human beings have some very dark problems. Some of them indeed are tied to our sexuality and our innate biological drives. Female attraction to dangerous men is one of them.

Female attraction to dangerous men is a big one.

But as long as anyone gets the bums rush for daring to take a candid look at the problem, we will never be able to even entertain the idea of valid solutions. We will remain completely oblivious to what Lincoln called “The darker angels of our nature.”

Should we try to understand the nature of dangerous men? Of course. We will do a lot of that here as a matter of fact, only not in packaged neat little PC bundles that you can squeeze between Viagra commercials in a 30 second sound bite. I have no female centric sponsors to please here so anything reasonable is on the table.

But we damned well better be willing to take a look at the real problems of women as well, including their own propensity to give and receive harm. I have never made it a secret that I am no fan of what western women have become, but despite the television induced hysterical reaction of the occasional nitwit that wanders in here, it genuinely matters to me that they don’t come to harm.

I am not so sure about CBS.

A Special Announcement From MenZ Magazine

Tom Givens · 27 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

(Paul's note: I have been working with Factory for some time on the conversion of MRm! Magazine to MenZ Magazine. Well, actually, I have talked a lot and he has done all the work. I suggested he run the editorial letter from the new issue, which you can now download directly from the sidebar on this very site, and others I am sure. So here it is.)

Welcome to the very first issue of MenZ magazine. Why the change from our previous iteration? Well, frankly we just didn't see the need to limit ourselves to one subset of society. The concerns we have are Universal, and don't only apply to those of us who live and breathe this stuff.

So, onward and (hopefully) upward we go!

What have we got in store for you this time? Well, if MRm! Issue 6 was a pistol, this inaugural issue of MenZ could be considered a double-barrel shotgun. Yup, the gloves are coming off, and as you will see inside, this means addressing some pretty taboo subjects. But I don't want to give too much away.

As time goes on the growth of this magazine, and indeed the Mens Movement itself, is making it obvious that one man is not enough to do this for much longer. So, I am putting out a call for help.

Don't worry, it's easy stuff. I won't go into it here though. Suffice it to say, I would like some emails from people (hint hint).

We also welcome Paul Elam to the masthead in the role of Contributing Editor. In addition to being the Editor of MND, and his own site A Voice For Men, Paul does some excellent videos that I highly recommend. Since Paul and I seem to share views on the Mens Movement, and the future, the fit has been quite natural. I look forward to working with him more in future.

So, without further ado, I present Issue 1 of MenZ Magazine.

I hope you like it.

An Open Letter to Sgt. Art Eld, Orlando Police Department

Paul Elam · 28 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Sergeant Eld,

I write this letter to you because you were identified as the spokesperson for the Orlando Police Department in a story on false rape accusations that recently ran on NBC Channel Two in Orlando, both in their television broadcast and on their website.

There were some statements attributed to you by the station that raise some questions that I think need to be posed, given the gravity of the subject at hand.

You were quoted as saying, "We want victims to continue to report crime. We don't want to spend endless hours and resources chasing ghosts."

You added to that comment by saying, "False reports take personnel away from other calls for service, increasing the response time for real victims," and that, "It also taints the jury pool in Orange county for true legitimate rape cases."

Finally, you were quoted as saying, "False reports cause unnecessary fear in the community."

With all respect to the dangerous and often thankless work done by police everywhere, and with great appreciation for your public call to address this problem, isn't there something else that these false reports cause?

Like the lives of men devastated, their reputations and well being destroyed? Like innocent men behind bars?

I found it troubling that it appears you did not mention this, especially given the reality that so many men have ended up in prison, falsely convicted and paying an egregious price for lies that have been all too often carried to the courts by police that are either poorly trained, overly chivalrous or under skilled at what they are paid to do. I say that because something else that sheds light on these tragedies was also mentioned by Channel Two, but for some reason was not quoted from you or another direct source. The story said, "Cops said they don't want to arrest the women, but feel they must."

I found this to be a staggering statement, and quite telling.

I thought it was the duty of the police to arrest criminals, regardless of their sex? In fact, I am pretty sure that is true.

Why would your officers not want to arrest criminals that are causing such pervasive and destructive problems? Because they are girls?

Are the officers on your force confusing their squad cars with white horses, or has it been a matter of routine policy in the past to give women who make false allegations a pass on their crime?

Since the problem itself has grown to such proportions that the police department has to make public proclamations about its severity, it would seem safe to conclude that police inaction on false allegations has been a systemic problem all along.

What percentage of false accusers have been arrested and criminally prosecuted in Orlando in the past 10 years? The answer to that question will either exonerate the police department (and the D.A.'s office) or prove my point entirely.

Being a professional in law enforcement, I am sure you are aware of The Innocence Project. Are you aware that the crime for which most of their beneficiaries are proven to be innocent is rape?

I am also sure you are aware of how convicted sexual offenders are treated in prison, and the unspeakable things that can happen to them there.

Does this not make the veracity of allegations of critical importance in the criminal justice system, in which you play such a vital role?

But now we hear, from you, that those untruthful allegations are a problem because they cause an undue workload on police officers? Because people in the community get scared?

We will never know, Sergeant Eld, just how many men are languishing in prisons right now because a woman had consensual sex with them and later regretted it, or because, as we saw in the Hofstra case, a woman wanted to cover herself with her boyfriend- and because those types of claims are often treated by police as factual with no evidence. It is, just as the story said, an epidemic problem, and clearly not just with the women making the allegations.

Those men in the Hofstra case were saved by a video taken on a camera phone, but there have been many, many men not near so lucky.

Perhaps you should consider that it is not the public at large, or the average police officer, or even the unfortunate victim of a real rape that pays the price for false allegations. It is innocent men- men who have done nothing wrong, that bear the brunt of these easily accepted and usually unpunished lies, in the most horrific way possible.

Kind Regards,

TED Gets It Totally Wrong

B.R. Merrick · 30 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently, Sam Harris is "feared by the pious" and "adored by secularists." Ooooo. As a former pious individual, I'm so, so scared. I occasionally defend the pious in spite of my current lack of faith. I can't ever imagine that I'll defend Mr. Harris.

Mr. Harris is a scientist. Guess what? So am I. What is science, after all? It is knowledge. Anyone who possesses knowledge is a scientist. You can't live on this earth successfully unless you are a scientist. Therefore, a toddler is a scientist. He has five senses (hopefully), and with those, he ambles from one part of the room to the other in order to pick up a book. He hefts it, learning. He turns the pages, learning. He looks at the colorful pictures, learning. He looks at the strange, black symbols at the bottom of each picture, learning. He knows there is a connection between these characters and the sounds his mommy makes with her mouth. He's learning. He's a scientist.

Primitive man observes animals, learning. He figures out that a sharp rock tethered to the end of a straight stick, if shot by a bow he has fashioned, will insert itself in the animal and cause it to die. He's a primitive scientist.

But Mr. Harris is a special kind of scientist. He wins applause. He's suave. I think he's cute. He's well spoken. When he was a toddler, he ambled across the room to heft books. He was a scientist long before he won accolades from whatever universities he attended. But he's the only one who gets to call himself a scientist. And much later in the video to which I linked above, he goes totally off the cliff, and tries to prove scientifically that all you straight men reading my column are nothing but a bunch of womanizing sleazebags. Mr. Harris is a scientific misandrist.

He starts off with a complete falsehood, from any scientific standpoint:

"Values are a certain kind of fact."

He never proves this statement. That's not the reason it is fallacious, but that is telling. Since he assumes this, everything else he says to his adoring audience is bunk. Watch the video until he shows everybody an "appalling" magazine cover (roughly halfway through). Do you see the fallacy? Are you watching the video?

If not, then I'll elaborate. (Maybe you have a piss-poor computer. Too bad for you.) Harris shows a picture of women trapped somewhere in the Middle East, where women are subjected to forced behavior, requiring them to cover themselves from head to toe in cloth, obscuring their faces and bodies. This is the essence of religious fundamentalism. It is the height of misogyny. It is the nadir of modern feminist failure that they have done very little about it. But even this is not "immoral," because no one as of yet has proven the existence of morality outside the human mind. Even so, Harris doesn't stop here. The next picture he shows is of a gaggle of gorgeous babes, each posing and puckering for the camera. He draws a parallel. The audience responds agreeably. I myself was left dumbfounded. That Harris doesn't understand the immense differences between these two pictures is beyond telling. It reveals his whole game, and the central problems with modern science.

By using a single example of alleged misogyny, Harris argues: Now that religion is dead, its myths exposed, science can and should tell people what to do and how to think. This "take charge" attitude apparently is intended to warn you straight boys exactly how much ogling is scientifically acceptable. Good luck, Sam. And don't touch any of those muscle mags!

If science is good for anything, it ought to reveal that religion never should have taken on the mantle of coercing others to do anything. Now, I do not reject all religious views outright. There is non-coercive love in many religious teachings. I have seen a lot of evidence of individuals turning to the greater love within us all as a result of religious conversion. I see the myths and our mistaken attempts to clutch at the remnants of them as temporary solutions, something that can help some individuals scrape through this world a little easier, like carving a god out of wood and putting him in your hut. I have seen religion give people a sense of purpose, and to be honest, I miss a little of that myself. Reject religion if you want, but refusing to study and understand its impact on your life is a serious mistake.

Now that freedom is my purpose, I am reminded of the harshness of scientific truth, and the necessity to embrace not only the idea that truth-seeking can be arduous and saddening, but also the fact that morality is not existent, and therefore, science cannot be in charge of that which exists only in the subjective mind of the individual. How's that for harsh scientific truth?

I don't write for an MRA website because I think men are being treated "wrongly" or "immorally." Those are subjective labels that I feel, but I can't assert as facts. I write for an MRA website because I see individuals whose volition is violated, which is indeed factual. I see modern-day feminism as being anti-individual, coercive, and death-oriented (all factual), which means it is "bad" for life-oriented men and women. Harris, in showing "despicable" images of scantily-clad supermodels, is kowtowing to the establishment that embraced the "man as machine" idea more than one hundred years ago, according to John Taylor Gatto. Anybody who currently clutches at The Ring, including feminists, has to embrace this ideal, because it is entrenched in the establishment. It did not die out after the sinking of the Titanic (where men gave their lives to save more women) or the advent of World War I (where men were encouraged by their women to stay in the trenches until they coughed up their lungs). Harris still believes that the machinery that makes up a complex, wondrous individual can be made to operate differently with a tweak here and there. He is dangerously wrong.

The very idea that science can teach us how to treat women, who comprise half the population of a planet inhabited by billions, is laughable. How you treat a woman depends on the woman; how you treat a man depends on the man. If you take the anarchist principle of non-aggression as an axiom, it gets a little easier, but to really relate involves circling individual boundaries until they are volitionally broken down by both parties. When will Mr. Harris and his cracker-jack team of researchers ever be able to figure that one out?

There is an entirely different way, a way that probably never even crossed Harris's mind, of looking at the two images of two groups of women. The first image shows total oppression of an entire sex. It is the physical embodiment of misogyny. It is the fear men have of their own sexuality, and scapegoating the object of desire into subjection.

The second image shows the total liberation of an entire sex. It is the physical embodiment of complete freedom. It is a celebration of both men's and women's sexuality, and the setting of the object of desire on a level that can only exist in fantasy, that of a goddess. I fear that Harris, like fanatical Muslim men, possesses a fear of his own sexuality that drives him to feel guilty for it. (I'm assuming, much to my own dismay, that the man is straight.) He shouldn't want to look at women, the way they move their hips, the way their breasts heave when they breathe, to smell the scent they've sprayed on their bodies, to observe how tightly their pants cling to their rumps. The feminized Mr. Harris cries, "Exploitation!", links it to despicable acts of cultural cowardice and the religious intolerance of an entire sex, and receives the approval of a fawning, feminized audience.

Let me tell you something about the "exploited" women on those magazine covers. Every single one of them read countless such magazines as girls. They played supermodel in their rooms with their girlfriends. They hung out with the pretty girls in school. They reveled in the attention from the most attractive boys. They eventually thought to themselves, "Hey. I could make money with this body. I could get lots of attention and approval. I don't have to play supermodel, I can be supermodel!" I know. I used to hang out with girls when I was a kid. Lots of them.

But then it gets ugly and difficult. These girls grow up. If they want to be models, they have to face rejection after rejection. They need agents. They have to monitor what they eat. They have to obsess about their bodies. They have to wear the right labels. They have to show up early for screenings and auditions. They have to work, and work hard. They have to be dismissive of too many fawning admirers, and focus on the shoot ahead. They have to deal with temperamental and demanding photographers. Through it all, they have more than one opportunity to walk away from it all. It is easy to do so. The demanding world of modeling cannot afford to coerce eager young women. They stay, not because they are starving, or because they have no other choice, but because they are hoping against all hope that the shot where they've grabbed their tits and thrust them forward will make it on the cover, and next week they'll be in the supermarket, seeing that coveted picture in the checkout isle. Where Harris and like-minded, machine-oriented, feminist-indoctrinated individuals see exploitation, there is none to be scientifically found.

The first image is coercion. It is death. That much is scientifically proven fact. (Read my STR article "Coercion Is Death" if you don't understand how.) The second image is freedom. It is life. That is also scientifically proven. It makes pretty girls rich and gets them noticed. A head-to-toe burqa makes pretty girls invisible and ensures that the rest of their lives will be spent in squalor. So try and dream up a scientific strategy to dig women out of that, my friend. You can start by showing Muslim men that Allah does not exist, and that coercion leads directly and immediately to death — two facts.

Gentlemen, let me clue you in on what I've learned about "science" — not the science you use every day to stand up, walk, communicate, fix the car, earn a paycheck, type an article, masturbate to a provocative magazine cover, or wash the windows. The "science" embraced by Sam Harris and a host of others, many in high positions of authority unfortunately, is a religion. This is why Mr. Harris talks about moving in where religion is waning. He doesn't want to replace religion; he wants to win converts. Step One is regulating sexuality, most importantly male sexuality, something with which virtually every religion has concerned itself since time began. In days gone past (and in the current world of fundamentalist Islam), it meant placing blame and heaping rules upon women, to deflect attention away from men's embarrassing erections. These days, it is directed by "science," along with its allies in coercive feminism, at the erection itself. The end result, however, is the same. It is a condemnation of female sexuality, male sexuality, and men in general, who have always been more expendable than women since all a man does is squirt for a few seconds and leave the woman to go through a troublesome and life-changing nine months. Since it takes so long to make another human, you protect those who make them. And when you believe that God is disgusted with virtually every little thing you do wrong, then your constant erections, a sure sign of your animal instincts, must be ungodly. Furthermore, when the hurt and pain evident in errant behavior of children makes itself apparent, and the immediate need for family and nurturance becomes unavoidably obvious, the idea of a man spreading his sperm this way and that becomes more troublesome. Society can't survive with wild, out-of-control, unloved, and unfathered children. That's a lot of responsibility heaped upon a man for something that feels so central to manhood, so why not blame the woman and force her to cover her beautiful eyes, nose, and lips, especially since she's physically weaker?

Take God out of the equation, uncover the scapegoated female, make it easier to raise kids, and what do you have left? Erections, spilled semen, and a whole lot of self-inflicted guilt, now reveled in by a celebrity culture that dishes out autobiographical confessions. Mr. Harris is unknowingly indulging in the same hatred of women as fanatical Muslims and many more men of ancient times, only now it is augmented by hatred of self, or men in general. He may claim he's replacing religion with science, but all he has succeeded in doing is incorporating the guilt trips of religion's bible into his supposedly scientific mind. Virtually everything he has to say in his presentation is entirely subjective and unscientific.

"Science" now wants us to feel guilty if we ignore our "depression," create "greenhouse gases," cause "extinction" of animals, bury plastic in the soil, fall behind other nations' governmental schools, not measure up to the "IQ test," depend too much on oil, carry around too much body fat, and now forbids looking at pretty girls. If there is truly a human need for guilt, then I suppose science will have to step in, now that less and less people believe in Jesus. It's a pity that science can only give us Sam Harris and his kind as a replacement. Open up the Four Gospels sometime, and you'll see why I consider myself a "Post-Christian" as opposed to an "ex-Christian." I'll take that rhetoric any day over false cries of "Exploitation!" Spare me.

B.R. Merrick · 3 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Rosemary's Baby" is one of the greatest films of all time, a one-of-a-kind original. The director of this masterpiece, one Roman Polanski, raped a thirteen-year-old back in the '70s. Technically, he never admitted this, and the charge of rape was dropped during a plea bargain, the state's cynical way of making its own version of justice easier for the guilty, not guilty, and victims alike. But based on the victim's testimony and her stalwart defense of that testimony throughout the years, she said, "No" and he didn't stop. So why would I not restrain myself from praising this man's cinematic talents? Why would I call for a rapist to be left alone? Two reasons, both of which I think any committed anarchist and individualist should take under serious consideration, and neither of which has to do with Polanski's artistic abilities.

First, and most importantly, the victim wants all of it to end. She has forgiven him, and wants the government to drop it. For something as serious as rape, where there can be no true justice or complete restitution to the victim, I would say let the woman live in peace with her husband and children. Consider what a rape victim already has to live with, and then compound it with incessant media attention and governmental interference. For her sake, and for this first reason alone, it should be done; that is, if we truly had a government that was concerned with "defending" people's "rights" in some Jeffersonian tradition.

But that's not what we have, and this is at the heart of my second reason for defending the seemingly indefensible Polanski. We are under the control (and most of us are in thrall) of a government that goes after a criminal even when the victim herself does not wish for it to happen. Polanski's real crime, as I shall explain, is not rape, but contempt for The Law. In the government's zeal to keep this case open after more than 30 years, everyone involved except the presiding judge, now dead, has been adversely affected, and virtually all of them wish for it to end.

If your objective is to help a rape victim, after being convinced that a rape did indeed occur, you would think the next logical step would be to ask the victim what she wants, and then follow through. Would you like to know how the government determined what the thirteen-year-old victim wanted?

By asking her the most detailed, graphic questions about the incident. She sat in a roomful of grown men and discussed where Polanski touched her, where he placed his penis, where his semen ended up, the color of her panties, and much more. In the victim's own words (from a fascinating documentary called "Roman Polanski: Wanted and Desired"):

"All that stuff was so traumatic, that I never even had a chance to really, you know, worry about, you know, what happened that night with him. It was like– it… just… I had to worry about surviving the next day…

"I would've as soon just as walked away from it the next day, but you can't stop it once it starts [emphasis mine]. I mean, I just, I just went in my room pretty much, and just turned it off."

You can't stop it once it starts. Instead, the government is flagrantly ignoring the victim's repeated requests, and going after Polanski as if he raped the government, or the idea of government, or the government's idea of society, or its rather perverted sense of right and wrong, a sense that is far more perverse than Polanski's perception. That is the true objective: Polanski violated the state's authority by fleeing to a safe place to escape the state's incomprehensible sentencing, which is its only recourse toward restoring anything to a rape victim.

Polanski was given the opportunity to plea bargain, which he did. The government's way of dealing with this rape was to drop the rape charge. Perhaps this was in part due to the family's reluctance to put the victim on the stand, but there you have the state's version of justice. In doing this, the government has admitted that slapping Polanski with anything that will stick is "justice," just like going after Martha Stewart. The plea bargain was for "unlawful sexual intercourse," a crime so simultaneously innocuous and foul that the criminal could spend anywhere from 6 months to 50 years in prison. For "unlawfully" screwing. This is called "plea bargaining." Slap me with anything that hurts less, your honor. What nonsense.

The prosecutor admits that he watched numerous of Polanski's films in preparation for his case. He noticed thematic use of "corruption meeting innocence over water," and drew a parallel with part of the rape scenario taking place in a Jacuzzi. He was planning on using this "evidence" in court. Apparently, the Jacuzzi was central to Polanski's plan to corrupt the innocent "over water." Proof of guilt if I ever saw it. More nonsense. If this is proof of guilt, then why can't I draw a parallel between the fictional Rosemary surrounded by evil men and women who wish to exploit her body, and the evil of the non-fictional state surrounding a young rape victim, demanding intimate details and flagrantly denying her family's request for Polanski not to be incarcerated?

Polanski's plea bargain originally allowed him to leave the country to continue working, which he did. The prosecution permitted it; until he was photographed in Germany sitting next to a young woman during Oktoberfest. More proof of guilt. As one member of the state's prosecutorial apparatus admits in the film, he told the judge, "He's giving you the finger, he's flipping you off." Apparently, the state told Polanski before he left for Europe not to sit next to any pretty girls. Good grief.

Polanski's "violation" of the state's probation was what caused the further confusion in the state's already horrendous manner of administering "justice." Polanski had already been subjected for more than a month, in frightening prison conditions, to "psychiatric evaluation." In spite of the fact that up until this point Polanski was obedient to all the state's directives, it was not enough. Amazingly, the lawyers on both sides of the issue, including the plaintiff's own private lawyer, agree that Polanski was treated unfairly. The victim again:

"I was young, but the way I felt was: The judge was enjoying the publicity, and he didn't care about what happened to me, and he didn't care about what happened to Polanski. He was, like, orchestrating some little show, um, you know, that I didn't want to be in."

As Arthur Silber has pointed out:

"From a broad, theoretical perspective, any trial in any State can be regarded as a show trial. In this discussion, I use 'show trial' to refer to a trial in which the guilt or innocence of the defendant may be a concern to those dispensing justice (or what is designated as justice in that State), but that determination is not the primary concern. The primary objective is not answering the question of guilt or innocence in a strictly legal sense (applying the relevant law to the specific facts of the case), but political in nature. The major value of a show trial to the State is its usefulness as propaganda; more specifically, the major value is the utility of the proceeding to the enhancement of the perception of the State as legitimate and/or to the demonizing of the State's chosen enemies. In the absence of a widespread campaign of terror directed against the general population, a people will regularly and consistently submit to the State only if they view that State as basically fair and good, devoted at least to some significant extent to their well-being and welfare [emphasis mine]. Thus, even and especially in a show trial, the State will be at pains to demonstrate its fairness and objectivity."

Thus, the state must go after Polanski the Eternal Rapist, perhaps until he is dead.

The state has a whole lot of bloviating idiots on its side, none of whom is listening to the victim any longer. Even these film critics think that Polanski deserves to be consigned forever to some distant circle of hell. Honestly, to listen to enough of this would make you think some greater atrocity had been committed by Polanski than what the state is doing on a daily basis on the other side of the world, all of it based on lies.

Granted, the rape was certainly atrocious, but the victim herself, and she is the only victim, has verified that it is over and time to move on. Why, then, is there this collective outpouring of vitriol on one man, but "Collateral Murder" can be shown in viral fashion all over the web, yet these same angry writers and critics make no calls to shun or even complain to the politicians and military personnel making the daily atrocities happen?

To question the state in the way Polanski has done is a crime; to accept whatever the state does as "good intentions" is a virtue. The state is in charge, regardless of what you think. Therefore, you may protest the state's mass murders all you want. But when the state says, "Jump!" or in Polanski's case, "Stay!", you had better do so. The protesting of endless war can only go on as long as the government will tolerate it. But when they tell the anti-war crowd to disperse, they'd better disperse.

The state can commit atrocities as long as it can sell itself as the enforcer of The Law. The Law, as foolish millions believe, is something that exists outside of ourselves, somewhere in this universe. The Law is merely an abstract, made by men — men who rape; men who steal; men who lie; men who murder. We trust these men to go after another rapist. This is "justice." It makes no logical sense.

The fools who support the state's latest arrest (in collusion with another state) of Polanski think this is all about rape, which is all about women as victims, which is all about feminism, which is all about being morally righteous, which is all about The Ring. The fools are wrong, as they will refuse to admit to themselves whenever the state comes after them, which is approximately every two weeks with every paystub that shows 1/4, 1/3, or 1/2 of their income raped by the state.

The state's latest arrest (in collusion with another state) of Polanski is not about rape at all. It's about the state's inability to do anything about rape or most other crimes against the volition of individuals, for whose protection the state allegedly exists.

Think about the morning of September 11, 2001. Taking the state's specious claims at face value, in the span of two critical hours, the state that steals billions of dollars every year from those of us stuck on this land mass, that erects an insurmountable bureaucracy, that has the greatest technology at its disposal, that regulates and oversees every air traffic control tower in the country, was totally and completely incapable of stopping a single bad thing from happening. The government's response was to shut down the entire airline industry for a week and give them a ton of money they stole from all of us, affecting untold numbers of other businesses, an action that prevented absolutely nothing but cost private businessmen millions. You can't stop it once it starts. Now think about a thirteen-year-old scared out of her wits. The state's apparatus is completely incapable of preventing or stopping the rape. The state is equally incapable of sparing the victim any further harm, and only exacerbates her pain. This is something else you are forced to pay for.

The state's latest arrest (in collusion with another state) of Polanski is about the state's desire to grandstand, to show its usefulness. It's about power and authority, and our lack of the state's permission to question its power and authority.

If the state's actions were anything at all about justice for the rape victim, I would gladly shut up and let the bureaucracy run right over Polanski, "Rosemary's Baby," "The Pianist," and my anarchist convictions notwithstanding. The artists and entertainers signing the petition on Polanski's behalf are probably only doing it because they love his work. I doubt very many of them question the state's existence or legitimacy any more than Polanski's detractors. But on this single point, I stand with them.

Run, Roman. Run.

Army's Rx for PTSD? More Trauma!

Paul Elam · 4 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I suppose I should not be surprised. But I am.

It seems the U.S. Military has dreamed up a new strategy to treat soldiers for PTSD. Keep them in in the combat zone. Hey, nothing like a win-win, right?

And the Army even has a poster boy for their new cause, albeit a reluctant one.

His name is Sgt. Thomas Riordan, of Colorado, and his story was not so uncommon before the military's quest to stay on the cutting edge of psychological treatment for soldiers with shattered minds.

Riordan was recently home on leave from Afghanistan, fresh from a battle in which eight of his fellow soldiers were killed. When he got there, his wife, who apparently is to "in sickness and in health," what the Army is to "Be all you can be," announced she was leaving him. Riordan was so distraught at the news, and possibly the timing, that he contemplated killing himself that night.

He went to see an Army psychiatrist who asked him what he wanted to do. He wanted to stay Colorado for some reason, but apparently the question was rhetorical. The Army shipped him back to his base in the Afghan mountains -a place where mortar explosions and sniper fire are a regular occurrence- for treatment.

That's right, get back up on that horse and ride, son. You'll thank us later.

Apparently, the Army's reasoning, if I can use those two words together, is that Riordan and soldiers like him will be better off surrounded by people they know rather than being dropped off at some stateside treatment program with no familiar faces.

And, uh, no screams of dying men, trails of carnage or friends bleeding to death as they look at you desperately for help. You know, all the modern therapeutic modalities.

It seems to be a pretty good solution for the Army. Riordan will be right there in the base camp on stand-by, ready to pick up his M-16 and go as soon as the doc scribbles his say so. That is, if a sniper doesn't take him out while he is in therapy.

Oh, but one little bit that the Army left out of the Riordan story. He has no friends where they have him. So now he is surrounded by strangers and gunfire.

Like everything else the military is doing these days, it is rooted in the thoughtful consideration of experts.

Says Terri Tanielian, a military health policy researcher with the RAND Corp., "There's not been a lot of studies on those types of interventions."

You don't say? Does that mean there have been some studies on having traumatic stress units in combat zones? The article on this didn't point to any, but hey, this is the Army we are talking about. Anything is possible.

Perhaps this will lead to setting up chemical dependency programs in crack houses.

Tanielian should be sent to the front line for a couple of months for even calling this an intervention. But as egregious as that is, it is nothing compared to Riordan's commanders, who say they are doing their best for him by keeping him in Afghanistan.

I am sure Sgt. Riordan's best is all they have in mind. That and the fact that their all volunteer outfit is stretched a bit thin these days.

Here's a pic, by the way, of Sgt. Riordan taken in May.

[image]

Looks O.K. to me. Maybe he's faking and the wife is in on it.

Perhaps the Army should commission someone to do treatment Patton style. He simply slapped soldiers and threatened to kill them if they, for whatever reason, didn't find the bloodbaths agreeable.

There is no great closing to be had for this one. I can't think of any clever way to sum up this kind of disgrace; no words of wisdom; no tacit connection to some feminist evil.

But one thing is patently clear. None of this is about helping Sgt. Riordan or any other soldier. It's about keeping fresh meat on the front line. We are at the point that we are killing and destroying men faster than we can get them to enlist. And stop-loss measures, which is where the military extends your agreed term of service without permission, aren't quite getting it done either. It's what you do with your "all volunteer" Army when you don't have a draft.

What's next from the administration of our "anti-war" president? Prosthetics with bayonet attachments?

The Best Movie Scene in Human History

Paul Elam · 6 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Overall, the movie “American Beauty” is a great must-see movie for any MRA. It deals with and captures some of the struggles that men experience when they wake up, and find out that they’re a cog in a larger system.

No scene in the movie however captures this awakening, better than the scene you see above. This scene is of a man assuming power over his own life in his own home. It will resonate perfectly with millions of men who have long lived in quiet deference to the demands of their wives.

Ringing William Quincy's Belle

Every once in a while I get an email or a comment or some other communication that has the effect of side tracking me from whatever it is I am engaged in at the moment. Today was such a day, when I got the following comment in the admin to from William Quincy Bell posted to the "About" page.

> I visited this web site "A Voice For Men". I read "About" to understand who Paul Elam is and where he's coming from. I watched his video "The Myth of Women's Oppression". I read the article on jury duty in a rape trial. I learned what the term mangina means. This man has put in a lot of time and effort to describe his views, to support them and to disseminate them. Paul is an intelligent man and a good writer.
> However, it is obvious to me that Paul is a troubled man and he is having a difficult time in this modern age. In the same way some people blame the Jews for the ills of the world, Paul seems to be blaming women for the ills of men.
> I don't need to debate Paul. I won't try to convince him otherwise. I will only conclude with this picture which is worth more than a thousand words:

[image]

Told me, didn't he?

Actually, you might wonder why I would bother with Mr. Belle, given the nature of some of the comments brought to this site. Things like wishing my mother to be raped while I am forced to watch, being told I am going to hell and enough other invectives more hostile by far than Mr. Belle's rather mild but condescending analysis.

To me, this post was worth some attention because unlike the furious onslaught from some who take objection to my work, Mr. Belle takes a reasoned, rational and well articulated approach to proving just how obtuse he really is, which only makes him appear credible to the equally or more obtuse than himself.

It is people like Mr. Belle that give really destructive thinking a face the masses love.

First, let me point to an item in his conclusion that is generally revealing of this type of commenter.

> I don't need to debate Paul. I won't try to convince him otherwise.

Translation: I have no intention of defending or supporting my points, or even to allow them to be subjected to rebuttal by the target of my allegations. I am simply going to do a drive by critique and go back into the shadows.

It makes one wonder just what sort of person does this kind of thing. I don't recall, in twenty plus years of activism, ever standing up in front of the world and saying, "Here's what I think, but don't make me say why."

Indeed, I regard any such act as intellectual cowardice.

Normally I am just given to ignoring such activity as a past time for trolls, but there was something about the quality of Mr. Belle's writing that did get my attention. He can, it seems, at least when he chooses to, articulate his ideas quite well. So I went to take a look at his blog.

Ah, what a little peek can do for your understanding.

In a moment of near elation I found the following penned by Sir William:

> As I've said elsewhere, my wife aptly compared ideology with fundamentalism whereby a person follows a line > of reasoning without regard to the facts. In other words, we pick our solution then we try to change the problem to fit the solution.

Hallelujah, I thought! We have a thinker here, or at least his wife! But then reading through some more of Belle's material it became clear that while he wrote the line, he has no fundamental understanding of what it means. The remainder of what I found there is sound bite leftism and feminism, replete with obligatory "women were chattel," type, unimaginative clichés; the same ones you have heard repeatedly fall from the lips of every Dworkinesque ideologue for the past fifty years. Pure polemics with no regard for the facts.

Perhaps you should go back to the missus, William, for some clarification on what she meant.

Maybe this explains why William is talking in pictures instead of asserting and defending real ideas. If that is the case, here is my rebuttal to his comment:

[image]

[image]

There now, Mr. Belle, there is four pictures. At least four thousand words worth. Does that mean I win?

Oh, I forgot, you are not debating. You are, well, just doing whatever it is you do.

But it does bring an idea to mind. And a challenge for you. You are quite clearly articulate and well reasoned when you choose to be. If you like, we can put up the picture book and put this to a test. I offer this forum as an arena for debate, and will give you a great deal of latitude in how that transpires.

You can choose to actually put the premise of your original comment out there and we can debate it out. If you don't think that is very supportable (which it isn't) then you an choose any article on this site written by me, or any video from my YouTube Channel, and take your best shot at destroying my ideas, not with pictures, but with words and ideas. Failing that, you could instead choose one of your own pro-feminist pieces and we can debate that. However, if you can't defend your original comment, or find a single article or video of mine that you are willing to take on, or even take any of your own work and put it under the test of scrutiny and debate, then I suggest you find something other to do than blog, and for pity sake, stop visiting other peoples sites leaving undefended and unsupported critique.

I will grant you contributor status so what we can keep it contained within an article posting area rather than the comment sections, and I assure you complete and unedited access to present your ideas.

It's your move, Mr. Belle, but I sense we are just gearing up for the crickets to start singing.

Women's Sexual Peak Rests Atop a Pile of Lies

Paul Elam · 8 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

(Authors note: For those interested, Chuck Ross did an excellent piece of writing on this, in The Sexual Peak Myth, He approaches the subject with a good bit more scientific diligence than I am willing to do here. I have already accepted that the subject is mythical and am much more interested in posing some questions about why this is the case.)

Some years ago I was at a night club with a group of men and women. Naturally the conversation turned to sex. One woman, in her late forties, said, in a good natured way, "It's a shame that by the time men really learn what they are doing in bed, their equipment doesn't work like it used to."

"I understand how you feel," I said, in an equally jovial tone, "By the time women start learning what they are doing in bed their looks start fading."

Needless to say, my response, while as truthful as hers, more or less took her out of the conversation. It was not my intent at all, but you could tell by the look in her eyes that she felt like every line on her face was magnified a thousand times, reading like a giant "use by" date from the last millennium. Fortunately for me, I didn't have all manner of ego and identity tied up in my penis, or I might have felt the same way.

There was a silver lining, though. It did spark a rather lively round of verbal sparring with the rest of the people at the table. And I am sure that it was a discussion that has been echoed millions of times at millions of night club gatherings.

Why is it that men and women hit their sexual peaks at such radically different ages?

And the answer is, of course, that they don't. It is just another one of the myriad of lies we enable women to live for the sake of not disturbing their self image- and perhaps for the sake of getting in their pants in leaner times.

Where else but the current gender Zeitgeist can a woman with crows feet, sagging breasts, reduced sexual hormones, a vagina that does not lubricate as it once did, more difficulty conceiving and less ability to attract sexual partners of their preference, stand up and say "I am in my sexual prime," and have everyone in their presence nod their head in agreement?

Only in a world where we tell women whatever they want to hear, no matter how ridiculous.

And it admittedly fits with part of women's experience to maintain the lie. An observation I have, one that I cannot back up with any research, is that as women's biological clocks tick down toward the final moments, there is a tendency, in the words of Dylan Thomas, to rage against the dying of the light.

It's not sexual primacy, it's desperate horniness. Their fantasy of being in their sexual prime when they are well past it is only the labored breathing of someone in their last moments, struggling to suck air just a little while longer.

I am not knocking it. When I was 21 I had a 45 year old woman show me what fer, good and proper, for three weeks in a cabin in Oklahoma. It was an educational rite of passage and a very fond memory in my life. Wouldn't trade it for the world.

But, let's face it, the only one in that cabin in their sexual prime was me. I was a youngster with a gold mine of a horny older woman desperate for sexual relevance. And when the experience was over, I walked away smiling, and a little better equipped to take care of business with women who were, well, who actually were in their sexual prime.

And she had at least one more round of clinging to her sexual power; to her relevance in the world.

The point is that without sexual viability, the power of most women in this culture is reduced to whatever is afforded by rote chivalry. And while that chivalry affords them a great deal of latitude, it doesn't provide them with the meaningful significance of a younger woman who still turns heads- and can have babies.

Being in your sexual prime is about being ready to make babies, not about how willing you are to be ridden hard and put up wet.

In the pure biological sense, infertile women, even those that just appear to be, are just so much excess baggage. And since women as a group either cannot or will not draw their self worth from anything but sexual power (NAWALT stipulated), we will forever have them demanding to live lies. And in modern times, they even have the option of paying surgeons to cut, suction and inject that lie until it looks damned near the truth.

Business is booming.

There is a solution to this, though it is doubtful we will ever get there.

Women, feminists in particular, have long lamented the male beauty standard. They claim it drives women to extremes like surgery and eating disorders, and results in damaged self esteem, all because men want women to look a certain way.

But of course, once you peel back the layers of victimized drivel and get to the core of the matter, you find that women drive themselves to do these things, biology leading them by the nose, because that is their quickest route to personal power, and because they don't rise above it and find relevance in other ways.

Like the ways men do.

When women collectively quit worrying about sexual primacy and start focusing on their own innate human potential, when they learn to value their own accomplishments more than they value what they can sexually manipulate out of men, the plastic surgeons will be out of business and their bad self esteem, rather than their personal significance, will be facing expiration.

What's that you say, women already are like that? They already do more on their own than they try to get men to do for them through sex and other forms of manipulation?

Well, I would like to address that here, too. But I only take on one lie at a time.

Does This Dress Make My Ass Look Fat?

Lie to me. I promise, I'll believe. Cheryl Crow

Every man knows that when answering the question posed in the title that he does so at his own risk.

It's a typical non question, designed more for adulation on demand than an honest answer.

And you have seen it before, or one of a thousand variations of it, because it's a universal part of the male experience in dealing with women in relationships.

The general rule is, women ask a question and men search for the "right" answer, or at least for one that will result in as little trouble as possible.

Perhaps illustrating further with a joke will help.

A man and woman are leaving a movie. The woman asks, "Do you think Sigourney Weaver is pretty?"

The guy knows this is potential trouble, but he also knows he has to answer.

"Well, yeah, I guess," he says, trying not to sound at all enthusiastic. Nothing else is said and the guy feels relieved.

Two weeks later they are in a restaurant having dinner.

"How's the meatloaf?" she asks.

"A little dry," he says.

"Well, then," she says, her tone snide and suddenly hostile, "Maybe you should have had Sigourney Weaver make it for you!"

It's a funny joke, and might be best left to the realm of humor until you consider that this is how many, many men live their lives; trying their best to not say the wrong thing, even if they have to lie, and constantly being set up with a series of questions for which there is no right answer.

What does it say, one might ask, about a human being when they not only insist on being told what they want to hear, regardless of its truthfulness, but will also, in fact, deal out retribution when given the wrong answers to impossible questions?

I have three words for it.

Complete moral bankruptcy.

Actually, I have three more words that are more accurate.

Spoiled rotten child. That is actually more fitting because we don't expect children to have the moral development that we would an adult. And nowhere but in modern western culture are we satisfied when women measure up to the moral development of a five year old.

It's a state of affairs that affects both men and women. But there is a major difference in how and when and why it happens between the two.

First, for a man to have the world around him lying to him for the sake of his over inflated sense of self importance, he has to have a lot of money. You can bet that Donald Trump and Bill Gates have a slew of people around them that would point to a blue sky and call it green if they thought that is what those guys wanted to hear.

But The Donald and Gates represent a very decided minority of men- and they have to pay, literally, for the privilege of being surrounded by obsequious Yes Men.

Any of the rest of men that expect automatic deference, that become childish and punishing when denied agreement or coddling, are rightfully regarded as immature pricks and written off, by men and women alike.

It has to be mentioned though, that there is some reason to question whether the self importance of men like Gates and Trump is all that over inflated. Arrogant and spoiled? No doubt, but they have accomplished incredible things in their lives.

Women, on the other hand, have a much different set of circumstances. All men are Yes Men, or are damned well expected to be, and it costs those women absolutely nothing to realize their expectations; their only qualification for that status is the possession of a vagina. No need to build and empire or revolutionize technology. Just sport the P-nay-nay and the lap dogs will come a yappin'.

You don't have to look any further than the comments on MRA websites to see what happens when some of us get uppity and start telling the truth, without say so from the Princess Collective.

I can even hear even more of it coming now. Eeewwwwww! That's so hateful and misogynistic! You're just frustrated because you can't get laid!

Sure, cupcake, and I have no doubt you fully expect people to agree with that assessment. Aren't you entitled to that, as a woman?

I will answer those comments, should they occur, in advance.

First, the truth isn't hate speech. Never was. Second, if you don't like the truth, grow the hell up and quit living by a standards that require people to lie. And third, grow the hell up and quit living by standards that require people to lie.

Failing any of this, quit expecting anyone to regard you as an equal. It just doesn't work that way.

Sheesh, and they say men have fragile egos? Gimme a break.

I often consider all of this when women question me about a gender wage gap that does not exist. Or about the myth that women in this culture were ever oppressed. Or about domestic violence being only committed by men.

And my conclusion is that those questions aren't really those questions.

Those questions are "Do you think my ass looks fat in this dress?"

Of course, I am supposed to maintain the status quo and give the answer that is expected to those and a litany of other non questions, for fear of getting Sigourney Weaver thrown back in my face. Just as I am supposed to not recognize that such inquiries are really just fishing expeditions from the imagined infallibles that are the fairer sex in modern culture, NAWALT's notwithstanding.

Unfortunately, I lost interest in the right answers to anything a long time ago, figuring that the best answers are always the truthful ones. That became necessary when I discovered that I could not seek the truth and placate children at the same time.

But it gives women what they have claimed to want for so, so long.

Equal treatment.

After fifty years of endlessly disseminating information on the darker side of masculine nature- information that morphed into the unrestrained male bashing that now pervades modern consciousness, it is fair and just, in the name of equal treatment, that we begin to explore the darker, more destructive side of the feminine as well.

Funny how that does not sit so well with so many of them.

For the Feminists Who Aren't Like That

This site did way better than expected the first month and is now getting over a thousand visits a day. O.K., so I am not competing with Amazon.com, but it is a pleasing outcome with expectations for growth in the future. And of course there are some problems.

They were more than just expected, they were a clearly foreseen, predictable list of online maladies that happen wherever men congregate to speak honestly, in our own language, about the circumstances of our lives. It's the sort of thing manginas and feminists can't resist. Honestly, I think it just bugs the shit out of them.

The latest round of comments from that particular peanut gallery have been of the NAFALT (Not All Feminists Are Like That) variety. Please note that all NAFALT comments will be moved to the Feminist and Mangina page, and though I know it is insane to suggest you lessen my workload, placing those comments there to begin with would be appreciated.

Why, you ask?

Check out the latest quote from the President of The National Organization for Women, Terri O'Neill. She says, regarding a controversial rap song by Eminem and Rihanna, "The fact is, it's only two year olds and violent men who use violence to get what they want."

Pure feminist, misandric drivel, to the core.

So, O.K., I will publicly stipulate that Not All Feminists Are Like That. But all the ones that matter are. The ones that don't matter, the "good feminists" only seem to show up at MRA's sites lecturing us on how Not All Feminists Are Like That.

When the "good" feminists you are so convinced are repping your cause are in charge at major feminist organizations, we will look at a policy change here. Till then, before you come in here trying to lecture anyone that not all feminists meet the stereotype, please bring some proof with you that you have actually done something to clean up your own house, like with the President of N.O.W..

A copy of your scathing email to that silly bitch will do.

Cheers

And PS, some FACTORY for all you good feminists.

The Men's Movement- Fair, but Imbalanced

Eincrou · 13 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In my very short time as an observer of the budding Men's Movement I have been impressed with the analytical prowess of not only those who regularly write articles or run websites and blogs, but also those who intermittently leave comments. The concentration of Eureka! moments induced by the content I have viewed on men's websites is unmatched by anywhere else I have been on the Internet. However, not everyone who has happened upon this growing movement has been as captivated by the quality of discourse as I have.

There is a certain brand of commenter who announces that the discussions in the men's movement are unbalanced. Though they don't necessarily disagree completely, they want to remind us that our analysis is flawed by not taking everything into account. It is true that the biggest challenge of proper analysis is incorporating all relevant information, but I have yet to see a commenter make an argument of this type that successfully invalidates an analysis. They invade the discussion as a champion of 'balance' but all they are actually doing is disrupting the scale by adding dusty rocks, broken twigs, crumpled tin cans and all manner of otherwise irrelevant debris.

I have to wonder why they would find it necessary to tell a feather being weighed against a hammer about the importance of 'balance.' It would seem that in this circumstance, the most efficient way to promote balance is to somehow address the massive weight of the hammer, rather than ensuring that the tip of the feather weighs as much as the stem. These people would better spend time in their search for equality and fairness if they did exactly what the men's movement aims to do: strengthen the wills of men and tear down the zero-sum benefits women gain at the expense of men, specifically and civilization, ultimately.

Why, then, do they try to promote 'balance' here? Is it because they see us as actually willing to change our minds? Could it be an acknowledgement that what we think will soon have a great effect, and they want us to not forget to care about women? Or, could it be the opportunity to satiate their misandry at the same time as they imagine themselves to be intellectually competent enough to think about a topic as grand as the course of human society?

We are certainly easy targets here. Neither men nor women seem to have any qualms or fears about arguing with men. Both men and women have come to A Voice For Men to tell us we are unbalanced, and that we should be promoting everybody and not just men. I suppose they take issue with the fact that men's sites honestly state a clear intention to uniquely help men. Feminists lie about their false position of balance by claiming to promote equality, even though they are literally incapable of even conceptualizing what that would mean. The 'balance' commenters expect us to be even-handed when feminists clearly are not. That hammer definitely has one end which is heavier than the other.

There is a distinct need for a school of thought unified towards promoting men because this is something men and women will not do passively. There must be articles written that totally fail to address women's issues, by intent and by design. We need thinkers who conduct skewed analyses of society, especially taking into account how men are affected. This should not be done in ill faith or by sacrificing truth and accuracy, but balance in the presentation is a luxury we must be willing to jettison. Anything less would be selling men short for the unique benefit of women a septillionth time.

Women have immense power over the minds of humanity. It is the power to get people to want to help her. Women have always had the ability to tip the scales of 'balance' in their favor by an innate and effortless ability to make people care about their concerns. Feminism represents a lust for the male form of power: forcing people to do things they do not want to do. Both of these powers combined is disastrous for men, and men must have the ability to focus on their issues for as long as this dynamic continues.

The people saying we are not taking everything into account about men and women are duly noted, and they are correct that we leave a lot out about 'bad men' and 'good women,' among other things. However, our goal is not to produce the most complete assessment of modern society in the West. It is to stop the abuses of decent men by governments at the behest of women, and it is difficult enough to get people to care about the well-being of men without setting our concerns parallel to those of women.

Bashing Women in the Name of a Better World

Paul Elam · 13 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Bernard Chapin once said in one of his videos that we have been asking women the same question for years.

“Are you equal, or are you special?”

And they have answered, “Yes!”

I thought of this recently as I went through some of the comments here and at places like reddit, where some of these articles are posted.

Chapin was spot on in his analysis, and it speaks to why some of my writings are not just about injustices against men or the misandry that is pervasive throughout western culture, but about the darker side of the western women- the lot of them.

Yes, I am talking in generalizations; in my mind generalizations that hold up impeccably to scrutiny and fit the common experience of western men to a T.

And that experience, as it has been related to me by many men over the past several years is consistent.

Western women are:

- Grossly immature
- Petty
- Vindictive
- Overly Entitled
- Self centered
- Shallow
- Untrustworthy
- Morally deficient
- Disingenuous
- And Indisputably Fucking Dangerous.

NAWALT, if you insist.

I am not citing this list of bullet points to make a case of proving their accuracy. Some of that has been addressed in articles that have already been posted, and some are yet to come.

The point here is to talk about why we are talking about these things, and why we need to.

In my opinion it certainly isn’t just for the purpose of gratuitously bashing women. In fact, I quite honestly hold men more culpable in this mess than I do women, for it is men that are the chief enablers of these, now two generations of spoiled brats disguised as women that we are dealing with.

For every woman whining about a mythological pay gap or who lives in denial of the protections and provisions afforded them by the patriarchy they so love to malign, there is at least one man cheering her on and joining in the attempts to shame anyone who disagrees with her.

Men either do this because they are blind, ignorant, full of false and misguided masculine brio, or so helplessly addicted to women’s approval that a sideways look from one would cause them to panic. But one thing for sure, if men were not enabling this, it would not be happening.

And that is, of course, why we need to talk about these things in a men’s forum.

It is clear that women need to be depedestalized. And I don't mean that we need to depedestalize them in an attempt to change them. We don't need to convince them how fucked up they are or otherwise. What we need, as a culture of men, is to have them firmly depedestalized in our minds. And we need to create environments where knocking women off that pedestal is not just breaking taboo, but the socially acceptable norm. We should welcome other men to consider taking their own swing at knocking the damned thing over.

Let me give you an example. I recently got a PM at YouTube that said the following.

"Man, when I first started watching your videos I thought you were really too rough on women. But now I am just surprised that I didn't see all this stuff sooner. I can't believe I was in that much denial."

I think what was getting in this man's way was the mentality that is the product of the feminist-chivalry complex. Through the unholy marriage of feminist supremacy with the blind protectionism of chivalry we have put women in the position of being absolutely untouchable in this culture, and put everyone in a position to keep their mouths shut about it.

That feminist-chivalrist marriage is a perfect one. It is more and more apparent that we cannot tell where one ends and the other begins. They have become the intertwined serpents of ill fate in the New World Gender Order.

The result? There is literally no such thing as a fair critique anything that has to do with the sexes. And especially where discussing the dark feminine is concerned. The feminists regard it as misogyny and the chivalrists regard it being less than a real man. Their language, shaming tactics included, has become indistinguishable.

I get a chuckle every time I see a chivalrist write that he hates feminism as much as anyone, and then goes on to berate MRA's with the same exact verbiage as you would see from a fembot.

But while it may be funny, it is quite serious. The compulsory silence mandated by combination of chivalry and feminism isn't just a gag order, it extends into the very consciousness of society. It adds further proof to the idea that if you can control what people say, what ideas they can express, you can also control how they act, and think.

And it has been so effective at that, that we are a culture that cannot even face and answer a most compelling truth.

You cannot pursue equality while half the population maintains a status so privileged that you cannot even talk about them honestly.

Fortunately, the solution to this is simple. All we need to do is speak the truth. And the truth is easy. We live so many outrageous lies about women that breaking myths about them is like shooting fish in a barrel.

What we lack are sufficient numbers, but as you know, that is changing.

Of course, I am not talking about ranting about what bitches and ho's women are. It may be good venting, but it is poor education. And it doesn't help break the myths in the minds of anyone on the fence.

More importantly, simply fulminating about women rarely takes us to the important subject of male enabling. It distracts us from some other really important facts.

Men in western culture are:

- Enabling
- Blindly protective
- Gullible
- Pussy Whipped
- Obsequious
- Dishonest- especially with and about women
- Weak
- Emasculated

- Cowardly
- And Indisputably Fucking Dangerous

In short, of the lists of problems shown by men and women, one reads like a list of bad traits in children, the other reads like bad traits in parents. I am sure you can figure who belongs to which list.

And we better be able to figure it out. A society comprised of spoiled children and weak adults isn't going to find any answers any time soon. For this to change, women need to grow up, and men need to spine up.

When women are forced to act like adults, and men are forced to quit coddling them like children, we might just make something good happen.

Needless to say, in doing this we are kind of taking on the world.

But what the hell, it's the only world we have. We might as well try to make it better.

Equality vs. Reality

B.R. Merrick · 14 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"All we ask for is equal respect and rights." – Ophelia

"Feminism was born out of a genuine need for gender equality…" — Morghan

Ophelia. What a great name. A tragic case of a woman who didn't understand her own worth, who was too weak to deal with the unfolding tragedy around her, but a beautiful name all the same. I quote the lesser known Ophelia, along with Morghan, not out of a desire to disparage or "gang up" on those who feel differently, but because these comments, with which most men and women would agree, are premised upon a fallacy.

I, too, feel that women are better off the more confident they are, and the more they are able to live their true selves. I just happen to believe that modern feminism, while certainly beneficial if it ever inspired a woman to further her education in a volitional manner, and made no further inroads to various forms of oppression, obsesses about that which can never be fixed, and clutches at The Ring in the process. The problem for modern feminists is that the "equality" they seek simply does not exist.

Now, it is certainly true that 2 + 2 = 4. This is equality, yes. It is comprised mainly of the idea that numbers, abstract representations of both the separateness and sum of existing entities, can be equal, given the correct circumstances. 2 is not equal to 4, but two 2s are. Likewise, 3 + 1 = 4, although 3 is not equal to 2. Algebra, not to go off on too much of a tangent, takes this abstract idea even further to denote that if 2 + x = 4, then x = 2. In this scenario, x also equals 1 + 1, but not 3. Therefore, haven't I just proven my previous comment incorrect?

No, I haven't; not the "equality" mentioned in the two quotes. You see, for mathematical purposes, equality is quite useful. If I have two rabbits' feet, a pencil, and small box to put them in, I have 4 items. 2 rabbits' feet + 1 pencil + 1 box = 4 things, but the things themselves are not equal. They are all different. Even the two rabbits' feet are not the same, although they have a great many more similarities between them than the pencil or the box. To categorize existing entities, to call them "pencils" or "rabbits' feet," is to make use of language to communicate. If I ask for one of the rabbits' feet, I don't want you to hand me the box. Are you deaf?

A rabbit's foot is not equal to a pencil. They both exist in the broad category of "thing." Men and women also exist in the broad category of "thing." Narrow it down, and they exist in the still-broad category of "living thing." Narrow it further to "animal," then "mammal," then "great ape," and finally "human being."

Feminists see the category of "human being," and this is where the faulty idea of "equality" comes in. As an individualist, I can see that all individuals who fall into this category of "human" ought to be treated with a certain respect. (I think this respect is what a lot of people refer to when they say "equality." The respect afforded, however, is thoroughly arbitrary and can never be "equal.") As a life-oriented individual, I believe in the Non-Aggression Principle, which is essentially to refrain from the implementation of aggression (or my preferred term "coercion") against other "humans." This does not mean that I believe in equality. A woman whose shoe is untied does not need my help; a small child does. I'd jump to help that kid, but I probably wouldn't even bother watching the woman. (Yeah, I know a lot of you would watch, but stay with me.) In that instance, the woman and the child are hardly equal. Yet, I hold first to the Non-Aggression Principle with both. That's as far as "equality" goes with me.

Now let's talk about a woman who is (or ought to be) an icon for feminists everywhere: Elizabeth Garrett Anderson. Of her own volition, she went to numerous medical classes that had traditionally only admitted men, was barred from a few, and spent her spare time as a nurse cutting up body parts to learn. This is a woman who knows what she wants, and sets about getting it. This is wonderful. It is unique, not just as a woman, but as a human being. Most men, if the systems of coercion that were used against her were also used against them, would probably not have done as much. This is persistence that, I have to admit, even I do not possess. Elizabeth Garrett Anderson is not my equal. Nor is she my better. But what she did is inspiring. It led to a great many women doctors who know what they're doing. I am eternally grateful to the female doctor who irrigated my right ear. (Small digression: As a former French Horn player, I can tell you that few other Horn players have any idea how much they depend upon the right ear. I couldn't tell whether I was playing in tune or not. Another digression: If you've never had your ear irrigated, well then, you've missed out, boy.)

Anderson does not need to be anybody's equal to become a doctor. She simply has to study the human body. Her brain, separate and unequal to anybody else's, will learn what is required or not. Any time spent searching for "equality" was time spent away from the scalpel, the books, the body parts, the classes, and the sick whom she aided.

Anderson was taller than some women, and shorter than some; fatter or thinner, depending on the other woman; more easily aroused sexually, or less; quicker-tempered or far more phlegmatic; longer or shorter hair; larger- or smaller-breasted; a more or less fine-tuned sense of humor; a greater or lesser capacity for remembering crucial medical facts. The list could go on endlessly; such is the amazing nature of individuality. There were realms of this one woman's mind that remained unknown even to her, and none of it was ever equaled.

Although I am more interested in men, I have always championed women, and preferred a woman who could show her stuff in a traditionally male-oriented sphere, simply because the individuality of that woman would have a tendency to stand out. Her individuality does not become worth more than another's, but it gets noticed.

I started watching "Seinfeld" because Julia Louis-Dreyfus made me laugh when she took too many painkillers while visiting Jerry's parents. Mi-ran Jang also made me laugh when, after a successful lift of more pounds than my back would ever allow me to heft, she went all girly and started crying at her triumph, bear that she is. Nadja Solerno-Sonnenberg gets my vote for her brilliant interpretation of Shostakovich's First Violin Concerto, based on two notes only. That's right: two notes. When a woman succeeds, not at the expense of another, but of her own volition, she impresses men like me, and turns a great many of my brothers on big time. (Well, Louis-Dreyfus anyway, probably not Jang.)

So, in order for a woman to achieve greatness in medicine, comedy, music, or weightlifting, what "equality" is needed? Are we talking about equal access? Should a private medical school be forced to admit women? If a woman lives fifty miles away from the nearest improv comedy theater, and most of the men are within walking distance, should a special tax be heaped upon everyone to get the wannabe Louis-Dreyfus to the theater on time for rehearsals? Should money be taken from the populace by force to give every little girl a violin? Should North Korea invade South Korea to ensure that all girls who want to play with weights have the exact same weights to play with, in gyms that look exactly the same, staffed with employees who, for the most part, look and act the same?

Let's put six little Korean girls in a big gymnasium and watch. What are they going to do? One is going to be perfectly bored, because she'd rather be home. In fact, she's getting homesick. Another one gets up to go to the drinking fountain. Two of them start doing cartwheels. Another watches, makes the attempt, and fails. The other two don't seem to care. The sixth is contented to stretch various limbs. Feminists everywhere, please make these six little girls equal.

Put a man three blocks east of a university, and a woman three blocks west. Both walking paths have identical traffic lights and traffic patterns. Both students are charged the same tuition, and come from financially equal backgrounds. Is access equal?

Not quite. The woman is a foot shorter. She must take more strides, and a little more time, to get to the university. Okay, move her a block closer. Is it equal access now?

No, it is not. You didn't bother to make their brains equal. Furthermore, prior to your moving her a block closer, since he always arrived at the steps of the building before she did, she was distracted every morning with the curve of his muscular butt as he walked up the steps in front of her. (Lady, I sympathize.) That's not fair, is it? Now she's thinking of his manly ass while sitting in the lecture hall, thoroughly distracted. So take her out of a coed university, and put her in the exclusive company of women, who have no bulges in the fronts of their pants to admire… Where was I?

Oh yes. So now she's at an all-female university, free of sexual distraction. We'll leave aside the fact that the few lesbians at this university have plenty of distractions, making some inequality already apparent. We'll also leave aside the fact that, thanks to laws largely championed by feminists, they have had to hire a male professor, complete with bulge and man-butt, who is distracting this young woman even more. (For you straight boys, I need to point out that a gorgeous man cannot compete with a gorgeous man with salt-and-pepper hair.) Beyond that, it was a beautiful fall morning, something which most of these New England "progressive" women have seen every Fall since they were girls, but this young woman, fresh from San Diego, has never seen anything like it. I mean, it's positively fluorescent! Gorgeous! So now she's distracted by leaves. Her quest for equality will only result in continued frustration. It does not exist. 2 women plus 2 more women may equal 4 women, but there the equality ends.

Ophelia, Morghan, their fellow feminists, and "progressives" everywhere are looking for equality, and humanity is paying the price. You cannot have that which does not exist in nature. One of the principle ideas behind individuality (and anarchy, as I see it), is that you shouldn't want it. Once you embrace the idea, it becomes an obsession. In an effort to enforce "equality" on all Cambodians, Pol Pot ordered everyone shot who wore glasses, the "logic" being that anyone who had glasses obviously spent more time with books, and everyone should be equally smart. An extreme example, and not something with which most "progressives" would agree. In fact, most of the examples I give above are probably considered too preposterous (especially the "man-ass" one) to be taken seriously. But that's where "equal access" and "equal opportunity" lead. When the desired "equality" does not come about, the blame lies everywhere else — the patriarchy, the glass ceiling, discrimination, sexism, mass media influence, substandard schools, stereotypes, people with glasses, a guy's butt, etc. — because the "equality" premise is taken as truth.

The premise, however, is completely false. It does not exist. You may not even apply the Non-Aggression Principle equally, as I explained above. It certainly feels like aggression to a child who can't tie her shoe, standing there and choking back tears, because she can see that a fully grown man sits and passively stares while her frustration is obvious. For me to do this would be to aid her own mind in initiating coercion against the truth, and coercion is death. A child who experiences such coldness immediately begins lying to herself, during which process, volition — in the absence of reality — dies, along with a little part of her individuality. A woman who stoops to tie her own shoe does not endure this. Two separate and completely unequal reactions to the same, simple dilemma of an untied shoe.

Take the government's guns and direct them in the name of equality, and what do you have? Divorce courts that ruin men's lives, wars started by liars who now make cannon fodder out of women "equally," everyone on a particular land mass stolen from "equally" to fund this or that project to aid women and men, old and young, black and white, gay and straight, in the absurd quest for a nonexistent, abstract falsehood. The search for equality is "equal" to the idea behind government: that we exist not as individuals, but as a collective. With the advent of modern feminism, women are seen as a collective, in spite of the fact that each woman in this collective is an individual, with her own mind and her own volition. Every single one of those bored housewives that Betty Friedan interviewed had separate problems, but somehow the solution is supposed to be the same for each. Not so.

If a woman wants to be a fighter pilot, so be it. (Just don't steal my money.) Very few women are up to the task. Oppression, you say? Well, I don't feel terribly oppressed, but I couldn't last ten minutes with those boys. Is it because of their muscles? Not really. Put untrained men who are far more muscular than I am in the cockpit, and they won't last, either. Is it the training? No, because the muscle is also required, along with the brain. Is it the mathematics? Only in part; you need to spend time in the cockpit, and you need muscle. Is it the attitude? Oh, yeah. That's most of it, in my opinion. I am unequal to all of them, because I do not possess the attitude, nor can I even fake it very well. Men who fly fighter jets have minds that are incomprehensible to someone who weeps at the end of Stravinsky's "Orpheus." I am not their equal. Most women aren't, either.

Nor are they my betters; they're just different. Put fighter pilots in a group (preferably with as little clothing on as possible), and you only have a rough, categorical assemblage symbolizing a particular type of "equality." Each of those fighter pilots is an individual. None of them is equal. One of them likes comic books, one of them beds every woman he meets, one of them misses his mom terribly, one of them is fascinated by geology, one of them is a closeted gay, secretly in love with the budding geologist. The one interest and talent that unites them is flying fighter planes. Great. (Just don't steal my money!)

If women currently searching for "equality" really want to band together like a group of fighter pilots, it's perfectly alright to find similar interests and act upon them. However, they should never forget the following:

1. At all times, use the Non-Aggression Principle, aided by the Golden Rule.

2. Each and every woman is an individual.

3. Collectives exist only in your mind (with the possible exception of biological families).

4. Don't steal my money!

5. Equality is impossible, because it does not exist.

6. Leave B.R. Merrick out of it. I'm far more interested in individual men and their problems, and there ain't nothing wrong with that little bit of inequality. I give you leave, however, to impress me with your individuality.

B.R. Merrick writes for "Strike The Root" and "A Voice for Men," lives in the Northeast, is proud to be a classical music reviewer at Amazon.com and iTunes, and in spite of the poisonous nature of television, God Himself will have to pry his DVDs of "Monty Python's Flying Circus" out of his cold, dead hands, under threat of eternal damnation.

Announcements From A Voice for Men

[box type="note" icon="none"]

There have been a couple of recent changes to the front page that I wanted to make readers aware of.

First, at the top of the page you will see a banner for S.A.V.E. (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments). Now, it may cause the average visitor here to scratch their heads and wonder why A Voice for Men would be promoting an organization that openly purports to be "Strengthening VAWA."

The answer is simple. This organization is reaching out to the public, policy makers and to victims of domestic violence with a very unusual message.

The truth.

If you like, you can read more about it in their New Report on VAWA Accountability.

What better way to fix the problem than to become part of the solution? And for those of you sending me emails asking, "How can I help?" this is one of the very few places I can send you that is actually doing something.

On the lighter side, A Voice for Men welcomes the addition of MRA rocker RulaZ. His YouTube channel is replete with a growing collection of dingy, sometimes down and dirty rock offerings, all original, that are slathered with the frustrations and sometimes the fuck you's common to the modern male experience. Check out "Pain in the Ass," here on the home page and give him a sub and a thank you over at YouTube.

We are getting our own music genre, guys, free of charge. Like the rest of us, he is doing it for love, not money. Let's support him.

The Impetuous Battle of Good vs. Good

Eincrou · 16 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Crack open any novel, flip your television to a popular dramatic series, or procure tickets to the latest box office blockbuster and you will be exposed to the entertainment industry's best attempts at giving you the fictional scenarios you crave. Lamentably, derivation and strict adherence to formulaic plot constructions abounds, but step back even further in your analysis and take notice of that which binds the mediocre fantasies of the modern era with every enduring epic since the invention of cuneiform script. Succeed and you will find the most successful thematic foundation of all time.

Humanity's history is replete with struggles against both nature and fellow man, but the tribulations that most often draw our concern are the interpersonal tensions that can move individuals, groups or entire nations. Conflicts between members of our own species dominate both the real world and our imaginations.

The concepts of good and evil are uniquely applied to human behavior, serving as a guide for what actions should or should not be taken. The good person succeeds in focusing his energies toward good actions, and the bad person does not care either way.

A rudimentary indexing of the themes in fiction from all cultures and time periods will show a clear pattern. Good versus Evil is a never-ending source of interest, one which defines the human experience. Interpersonal conflicts are not even intelligible to us until we first identify who the good and bad guys are.

All of this is wonderful when we want to pull away from the struggles of our own existences and titillate ourselves by observing the far greater trials of a fictional hero. However, a serious problem arises when these black and white distinctions that are acceptable within imagined universes bleed into our perceptions of the unfathomably complex real world.

The Nazis are generally regarded as the most evil group of human beings to ever draw breath from the air surrounding planet Earth. For most, this is all they know about these people. And for most, this is all they care to know. The word 'Nazi' itself is synonymous with evil, and a serious epithet to level against another person. It seems safe- even beneficial, to have an understanding of the Nazis that does not escape the second dimension.

This manifests within our own lives as a desire to simplistically define both our perceived enemies and ourselves within two constricting ethical boxes that necessarily must be eternally set against one another. One is labeled 'Good,' and the other 'Evil.' The effect is to contrive a setup that would be deserving of any story worth being told.

We convince ourselves of the terrible nature of those who would hold enough arrogant audacity to disagree with us. It is useful as a preparatory exercise before we greet conflict. It sets our hearts aflame and allows our resolves to become staid. There is no cause greater than fighting for truth and justice, and today we enter combat in the name of all that is holy.

What could possibly be wrong with that? Surely there could be no downside to pursuing these goals with eager abandon.

Lower the massive Glinting Aegis of Righteousness you are gallantly wielding; it is obstructing your vision. An interesting development has occurred on the other side of the battlefield.

Your opponent has assumed the exact same posture!

He is certain of your own moral turpitude and intends to raise his Sword of One Thousand Truths against any doer of evil. You were expecting to run your weapon through the chinks in his blackened devil armor, but in truth, his armor shines brightly in reflection of his identical intentions. Both believe they bear the standard of Good.

It is truly a pitiful sight. Two well-meaning people- so desperate to be as a hero from lore, trying to turn a disagreement into a foolhardy opportunity for good to violently assert its primacy over evil. As a result, they have eliminated all possibility of a useful meeting of their minds. They are now bound to either completely destroy each other or to simply walk away, with neither becoming the greater for it.

We live in an age that allows or sustains few genuine demons. Not as many people with truly macabre intentions still walk among us in these times that are, by comparison to the past, morally verdant. There is still much work to be done, for sure, but hold back your sword when you sense that a hell spawn may be near. There is a likelihood that they are broken and flawed in many critical respects, but they may genuinely want to see a better world for all. Most people believe in and want to do good, but they are in need of your guidance, and it is solely their responsibility whether they take or refuse it. You can make that offer, but do not forget that you may not control their actions, only your own. Accept this and ensure that you live up to, and even beyond, the ethical nobility you rightly demand from others.

Save your furious wrath for when it is needed against a true overlord of directed and purposeful malevolence. They do yet exist.

[box type="note" icon="none"]Author's Note: This is a gentle reminder that most of the people we interact with are not wantonly morally deficient people and we should not go out of our way to brand them as enemies. The source of disagreement is rarely that you are good and wonderful, and they are bad and terrible.[/box]

Notice and observe how other people arguing are each convinced of their own intellectual and moral superiority. When the disagreement reaches this point, there is no way either side can give up or give in, because they both believe they are fighting pure spiritual bankruptcy.

Catch yourself before calling your opponent a scum bag liar; they may truly believe what they are saying, even if you understand it to be false and irrational. You can help them order their thoughts, should they accept it. If not, then don't be afraid to move on to someone who will. Don't mistake this for weakness; it's easier to give in to emotional aggression than to walk away.

When it comes to the issues of the men's movement, some will get it immediately, but most won't without assistance. The falsehoods and delusions we fight against run deep into the core of people's understanding of their lives and the world. Expect resistance. Your energies are best spent carrying the message to those who need your help, not in seeking out false battles against evil or stupid people.

The male beauty standard: an anorexic myth

[dropcap]S[/dropcap]uzy had been reading women's fashion magazines for a while. And the more she read, the more concerned she got about her appearance. She started obsessing on her weight and began skipping meals. Then she started skipping nearly all of them. Before long she was severely under weight.

Her family got concerned and called in the psychotherapists, and then, when she continued to self emaciate, they called a team of doctors. She was fed intravenously in intensive care units several times, which helped her put some weight back on, but it didn't help long term. Eventually she withered down to a living skeleton, suffered heart failure, and died.

The family, stricken with grief and still bewildered, wanted answers. And of course the psychotherapists, who thought nothing of claiming to have answers, in spite of Suzy's dead body, were happy to oblige.

Poor Suzy, it seems, was the victim of too many pressures to meet a beauty standard which had been forced upon her and all women by the media and the fashion industry.

Magazines, designed for women readers, show all manner of super thin models dressed glamorously in the latest fashions, surrounded by ads for weight loss programs and diet pills and it pressures them to take action to become thinner, sometimes triggering a psychological free fall where they hit bottom, light as a feather and dead as a door knob. Even the ones that don't die or get diagnosed with some sort of disease are affected. Poor body image "issues" abound in western culture.

That is just how pernicious this beauty standard is. In fact, it's not just a beauty standard, the self help gurus will tell you, but a male beauty standard. Wouldn't you know? It's always the male something, isn't it?

That's been a big part of the take on things every since certain numbers of women started embracing the Auschwitz and Dachau weight loss programs, and others figured that calorie control meant two fingers shoved down your throat after every meal.

Always ready to feed and legitimize this kind of insanity, the world is now starting to respond, with laws, which as we all know eventually means with badges and guns.

Australia has now made it illegal, yes illegal, for female models to be too skinny and male models too muscular. And in association with their recent legal orgy, happily pushed for by uberfeminist Prime Minister Julia Gillard, the legislation also provides funding to fight eating disorders.

For the cuteness factor, perhaps, Brown Shirt Youth Minister Kate Ellis, another radical feminist, has unveiled a body image tick-of-approval program, sort of like the Good Housekeeping seal for designer clothing.

In this, the latest fit of neurotic protectionism for women, the government down under, which can't balance a budget, is now going to legislate women finding balance at the scales.

I am sure that when the Aussie bureaucrats figure out what too skinny and too muscular actually mean, it will end Anorexia Nervosa and stop millions of fingers from tonsil tickling their way into re-serving lunch via the big hurl.

But of course, there is another problem here.

It's that male beauty standard thing. It doesn't exist, and never did. There is, however, a kind of attraction biopsychology, but it applies to the human species- the whole human species. It was never a matter of conscious choice, certainly not by one sex, so it can't be considered a "standard." It just is.

"Standard," is just political speak for "this must be men's fault, let's pass some laws and take more of their money to enforce them." When it comes to what attracts men, it's a simple formula. A waist to hip (WHR) ratio of 0.7 in women will do it. (For men it is 0.9.) That is all there is to it. It is universal, maintaining consistency, even after factor weighing for women of different sizes and the different ways some ethnicities tend to store body fat. For instance, African American women tend to store more body fat in their buttocks than Whites and Asians. And African American men are reputed to prefer women with larger posteriors.

But African Americans, when tested on attractiveness scales found the most attractive WHR in women to be, you guessed it, 0.7. The thing is that the WHR has nothing to do with the size of the woman. It is the ratio that is attractive, not the specific measurements.

It's a human thing, and we are not getting around it. Certainly not with some wildly off base political victim ploy. Of course, where would the world be these days without wildly off base political victim ploys?

I know, I know, we'd be much better off, but the question was rhetorical. One might argue that the problem is that men prefer the universally attractive WHR in women that are smaller overall and that this contributes to the problem. That's a fail as well.

Take a look at the overarching female sex symbols from American cinema- the blond bombshells, and even some brunettes and redheads, over the last couple of generations and see what you get. Women like Raquel Welch, Sophia Loren, Jane Mansfield, Anna Nicole Smith, Marilyn Monroe, Rita Hayworth, Jane Russell, and on and on and on.

What do they all have in common? Big boobs, trim but not tiny waists, strong, ample, "child bearing" hips, and of course the roughly 0.7 WHR. But they are generally all big girls with meat on their bones. So if men have collectively expressed what they like physically in women, it's sure not Twiggy.

So what the hell, exactly, is really going on here, since this isn't about men or what they want?

The truth is that when you talk to objective medical, or even objective psychiatric experts about eating disorders and poor body image, their firm answers about their origins are that they just don't know. Most speculate, however, that family dysfunction and/or abuse plays a part.

The problem arises when the subject is handled publicly by gender ideologues who unfortunately have psychological credentials behind which to hide their activism. They never see a problem that they cannot trace back to something about men, and about how women are victims to them.

Hey, I understand, that's where the bucks and power are. Just take a trip to Sidney and find out. My guess is, though, that you really don't need to go that far. But what if there is a different explanation than offered by the gurus? God forbid, right? But just the same, let's take a stab.

Someone once said that if you really want to understand people, forget psychology and sociology. If you want to understand people, look at advertising. And what do we see when we examine advertising to women in western culture. We see corporations that understand that women are obsessed with image and other exterior matters and have very little going on under the surface.

Sorry, but take it up with COSMO. I don't make this stuff up.

In a world where women claim to want men to see them for who they are on the inside, their purchasing patterns and areas of interest say the exact opposite. In fact, their consumer behavior says there is naught but a meaningless void to see if you bothered to take a peek under the surface.

They put their money (and their men's money), time and attention into how they look, and pretty much only into how they look. The fashion industry doesn't create this, it simply exploits it. And any attempt to control it legislatively is doomed for that very reason.

The problem isn't with the fashion industry. The problem is with women. And as long as we keep creating illusions for them to point the finger at while they are en route to get that next Gucci accessory or boob job, we will keep losing them, both in body and spirit, to their own devices.

A poll conducted of females in the UK in 2006 indicates that women there spend approximately 8 years of a 63 year life shopping, and they make more trips for their appearance then they do for food.

What if women suddenly said fuck my appearance? I can feel the hackles going up now.

But that isn't the point, some would say. Women are judged, and harshly, on their appearance! It's not that simple! Of course, that is a good point. So let's try again.

What if women suddenly said, fuck my appearance and the people who judge me based on it?

Yep, that is the answer. Rather the right question. But the problem is that going this route has an unfortunate effect. Women who don't obsess on their appearance aren't going to be as successful as those who do at manipulating money and other goods out of men. They will have to start getting everything on their own. Bummer.

But you know, there might be something kind of positive that comes with such a crazy idea. Like the development of an internal self. Like focus on accomplishments instead of image. Like less women starving themselves to death in the psychotic pursuit of glamour.

The fact is that eating disorders radiate a problem with modern femininity. And before anyone rushes to point out that there has been a recent increase in male eating disorders, hold up. What the hell should we expect in a society that is inhabited by a lot more emasculated, feminized men? Feminists have pursued turning men into women for 50 years. The up tick in male eating disorders is proof they have made progress.

The solution here falls into the ranks of those you will never hear offered by the gurus, mainly because there is no money in the truth.

Women need to change. They need to quit living shallow, image obsessed, pitifully dependent lives spent in the pursuit of the fruits of other peoples labor, and using their physical appearance to get it done.

If they want to be seen for what they are on the inside, they need get out of the mirror and make sure something on the inside is actually there.

And perhaps, just perhaps, once their inner selves are filled with some substance and character, birthed from their own efforts and accomplishments, they will have something inside they won't try to heave into the nearest toilet.

NAMbLA, Coercion, and Misandry

B.R. Merrick · 20 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

One of the comments for an article that I originally submitted to "Strike The Root," concerning Roman Polanski's rape of a thirteen-year-old, perhaps needs a little light shed upon it, in spite of the bigoted, anti-Semitic, and thoroughly incorrect nature of it. I can't clarify the commenter's position all that much, but I do need to clarify what I think about an issue that the commenter raises. In essence, the point that the commenter is trying to bring home is that "Roman Polanski is a pedophile and had sex with children."

The commenter rightly points out that sex with children is equal to death. With this I agree, and factually so. Rape of an adult, being a coercive act, is also an act that leads directly and immediately to death, on multiple levels, as I pointed out in my article "Coercion Is Death." It's this troublesome business of sex with children, and the commenter's insinuation that I am somehow responsible, given my views, for the encouragement of this death-oriented activity, with which I feel I must take issue.

But first, let's talk about the movie "Nine," starring the talented Daniel Day-Lewis. This was one of those rare films in my Netflix queue that got taken out of the DVD player before it finished. First there's the fact that it appeared to be a musical that was more concerned with people belting out tunes than it was with creating any kind of inviting or enjoyable atmosphere, and I found myself not caring in the least that this spoiled, oversexed, stereotypical Italian male film director was lacking any inspiration for a movie yet to be made. The makers of this musical never bothered to stir the pathos in me.

Beyond that, there is an abhorrent scene in the middle of the film (at about the point where I pushed the eject button) where a group of eight- and nine-year-old girls pay a grown man to whip out his penis. That feminists en masse are not up-in-arms about this scene is condemnable. The idea that any adult should take money from children, even with no touching involved, to reveal sexuality to them is abominable, as I shall explain.

Except that I need to make one correction first: It wasn't a bunch of giggling girls and a grown man; it was a bunch of mystified little boys – little boys – and a grown woman. The women who belt out everything they sing (as if that's the very essence of singing), are practically yelling, "Be Italian!" Get it? Italian prepubescent boys are just as horned up as Italian men. They can't help it. It's in-a the blood!

I guess a few things need to be explained to the lyricist, the composer, the playwright, the screenwriter, Daniel Day-Lewis, Judy Dench, and a host of other nincompoops: Children don't understand sex.

Mind you, if a five-year-old who is in my charge wants to know where babies come from, he or she is going to find out. Not by putting in a porno, but by simple explanation of the facts of life. Children are curious, and should have that curiosity satisfied by responsible adult caretakers.

It has been a practice across cultures for centuries to find healthy ways for boys to bond with men, and to satisfy a natural curiosity that most boys possess about the adult male body. Sadly, there have been parallel practices to induct children in the ways of adult sexuality, and these death-oriented practices, inhabiting a gray area, have found their way into the lives of many boys, to their detriment. It is this area where groups like NAMbLA thrive.

I admit freely to questioning the appropriate boundaries in the past (only in my mind, I assure you), as I have talked with other gay men who became sexually active at much younger ages than I did. (I didn't lose my virginity until I was 29.) Many of these men don't seem to have a problem with what happened, which interested me. I am not one of those guys who turned gay because some irresponsible adult introduced me before I was ready. I have read "testimonials" from men who were the younger participants in sex acts, confirming their volitional desires to engage in sex with adults. Prior to understanding how coercion is death, I must say that I found such arguments compelling, but was not convinced.

I am now convinced that the opposite holds true, and that the alternative argument can be backed up with facts.

Having sex with children – babies, toddlers, and prepubescents – is never anything but coercive, and therefore death-oriented. Lovers of "Nine" beware.

Coercion can be used against more than the volition of other individuals; it may also be used against the truth. Truth does not live like we do, but it does indeed exist. Its very nature is immovable and unchangeable. Our continued discovery of the intricacies of natural law make it apparent, but they do not make it so. Children, I believe, should know the truth about everything from math and science, to the truth about Santa Claus and where babies come from. I also believe that children should be in charge of the progress and criteria for their own education, which is why I believe in unschooling, free-schooling, and homeschooling.

The truth of human sexuality, as far as procreation, can be grasped by little minds, but the full force of this natural phenomenon cannot be explained in words; it must be experienced, if only vicariously, when full sexual arousal is possible. This phenomenon, according to natural law, cannot be experienced by children. True, children can experience orgasm, as well as other sexually stimulating feelings, to an extent, but there are a great many crucial parts of sexuality that are completely absent in a child's mind. Not to go on at great length about it, but the simple facts that boys cannot ejaculate semen during masturbation, and that girls cannot menstruate, should be wisdom enough that this is so.

If it's at all possible, try to remember your own curiosity about men when you were a boy. For many heterosexually-oriented prepubescents, a few experiences, skinny dipping with dad, for instance, are enough to satisfy this natural curiosity. That was never the case with me, but stay with me. Go back to this innocent experience you had and try to mentally interject an adult male (or female) introducing seduction into the experience. How do you feel about it now?

Whether or not a child is volitional in sexual experimentation with adults is irrelevant. Children don't get it, because sexuality, in order to be understood, has to be experienced. I don't mean that you have to lose your virginity, but you do have to experience the arousal. This is why responsible Catholic priests can counsel married couples. Sure, maybe the guy's a virgin since he's been a priest since he was 19, but by that time, he has had erections, wet dreams, and if he's like most men, he's experienced the pleasure of his own penis in his hand. If he's a heterosexual priest, he has also felt the attendant desires to caress and mount women. If he is sufficiently mature and has done his research, he's ready to counsel without ever having committed the marital act. An altar boy is not.

This truth is hidden from children by nature, not by society's dictates, not by the state, not by some set of arbitrary religious rules. Children don't get it. What Mom and Dad do to make babies is weird. Girls are gross. Boys are stupid. This mentality doesn't truly understand what is happening when an adult begins touching in a sexual manner, even if it's what the child wants.

Therefore, to coerce against the truth is to reduce the volitional capacity of the child. To coerce a child's volition by withholding vital information is death. Abused children, whether willing or not, are permanently damaged.

Even after puberty has commenced, and the area is far grayer (since cultures the world over have been known to marry off 12- and 13-year-olds), it is also unwise for adults who have passed through puberty to disturb the sometimes agonizing process of growing body hair, bleeding from the vagina, descending testicles, wet dreams, budding breasts, and so on. In those critical seven or eight years, a great many changes are happening, and to interfere from a more mature perspective is likewise coercion against the greater truths that will only be obtained when the young adult has made it all the way through. That is how I perceive it at this time; however, I am fully aware that grown men, in the past, have thought nothing of taking teenage brides as child-bearers. How messed up were those women? I can't say for sure, but a great many of them managed to raise children all the same, and stay with their marriage partners for life.

Therefore, it is now undoubtedly clear to me that organizations like NAMbLA are coercive, and therefore death-oriented, in a particularly pernicious way. Since the finer points of individuality lay hidden to the majority of adults wandering around on land masses all over this planet, the efforts of such organizations can be sadly be expected to make headway. This is not a good development.

Notice that I've hardly brought up Polanski's rape. That is because not only have I thoroughly covered my thoughts and feelings on the matter elsewhere, but it doesn't matter to me whether the victim should be considered a child or a young woman. Rape is rape. All sex with children should be considered rape. I also believe that nature has infused humanity with a general disinterest in children as sex partners, an infusion that goes ignored along with individuality, when adults who themselves have been so abused disregard the truth. These things are plain to me.

So the commenter's accusations sting not because they are true, but because he reveals his inability to see me as I am, as an admirer and defender of children. It reminds me that I will never have any, and my brief opportunities to spend time with them are not enough.

I have endured other people going on about how grown men who want to spend time with little children are weird, like there's something wrong with us. I had to defend myself, and gay men in general, over at "Strike The Root" when I made a passing comment about a funny article at "The Onion" about gays in the military. My opponent in the ensuing argument is of the opinion that I should not be in intimate contact with prepubescent boys, since some gays are molesters. In spite of the fact that the majority of child molesters are heterosexuals, and in spite of most comments at "Strike The Root" being directed at ideas of individuality, I am to be lumped in with coercive, death-oriented adults by virtue of my liking men's cocks. (And people think it's all downhill for us faggots because "Will & Grace" was a hit.)

The idea that I would ever want to coerce any child, or would ever be accused of such an act, offends me as a member of the gay community, and as a man. Make no mistake about it, condemning Polanski after he served his time and made financial restitution to the victim, most especially when she herself wants the condemnation to stop, is part and parcel with misandry. See here a far superior writer talking about much the same thing. When scare tactics are used by the state, it is not the image of violent women running into the streets brandishing weapons that is used; it is the violent image of violent men. Us guys are all just a few steps away from it, at all times. And the children will suffer.

This is nonsense. It is false. It makes me sick. It is tiresome. It is cruel and hurtful. It separates children from manhood, to the detriment of both boys and girls. Men who join in the chorus are doing the rest of us no favors.

The thought occurred to me earlier today as I was driving home from my boring corporate job: Why are marriages failing? There are probably many reasons, but up until now, no one has bothered to touch upon one reason that I think is worth considering. Government schools, television, corporate superstores, so very much of modern life is meant for the purposes of homogenization. The ruling elite can thrive on a continent filled by people who buy the Democrat-Republican-division ruse, who all watch the same inane programs, who tune into the same radio stations, who go to schools that teach the same things, who all have tax "withheld" from their paychecks.

Beyond the fact that modern technology has made obsolete the dire necessity of making a family for survival purposes, the modern corporate state also attempts to make the same that which can never be equal. Individuals are bound to have separate strengths, and consequently separate interests. Remove children from the surrounding community all day, set them in front of the homogenous television all night, ensure that the same packaged foods are available in Alaska as well as Florida, and you have people who experience many of the same things.

So why wouldn't marriage between two same-thinking people work? One reason is because these two people have spent their most critical years separate from grown men, grown women, old people, toddlers, immigrants, babies, prepubescents, teenagers, shop owners, mechanics, farmers, truck drivers, entrepreneurs, construction workers, nurses, doctors, homemakers, and various other individuals pursuing their individual interests in the communities in which they "live." This experience ought to be quite natural, and should aid children in learning to relate to many different kinds of people.

Unfortunately, people are stifled from what ought to be natural relationships. They are kept from everybody else. Children now go on play dates. Men are suspect if they're sitting in playgrounds. All of this, thanks to the hysteria over NAMbLA and what some man somewhere might do. People who don't know how to get along with lots of different people are bound to have marital problems. It's easier to despise those with whom you are unfamiliar.

If people truly understood their very natures, so much of what separates us, as well as what truly threatens children, would simply go by the wayside. Instead, Polanski is an eternal villain in spite of the pleadings of the very person he hurt, and men everywhere are suspect as rapists and child molesters, especially us homos. Sadly, my prediction is that this backward, reactionary way of thinking is far from over. Those who will pay the price are children, kept from vital relationships that would teach them about getting along in marriage, and the most unfortunate few that come into contact with adults who never bothered to face their own childhoods of abuse. It is a pity that there are some who choose instead to read into my words that which is not there, rather than listen to hurt children, whether they've grown up or have yet to do so. It will take a world of men willing to stand up to the cacophony to set things right.

Sexual Harassment

manwomanmyth · 24 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This video takes a look at the prevalence of female sexual harassment of men in the workplace and how this is ignored in favour of only recognising male misbehaviour.

Even though men and women are both extremely sexual beings, we live in a society that only recognizes the downfalls of male sexuality, while letting the female misbehavior go. The mantra is that “only men can do wrong”.

This directly produces employment and personal risks for men in working with women. Among the many mines in this minefield, the main produces of risk for men, is the arbitrariness of women’s harassment complaints.

Feminist-Conservative Misaporno

B.R. Merrick · 25 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Well, well, well. Surprise, surprise. Sam Harris would be proud. I couldn't possibly give a shit.

Madonna couldn't, either. That's what I've grown to love about her, in spite of any of her faults. The woman's got it going on. She understands. Even Camille Paglia gets it. So let me praise the former for a bit.

In spite of my previous dislike of her, and she is very dangerous to the Religious Right, Madonna was quite obviously not the flash in the pan we all suspected she would be. She built a media empire. She has two strengths, as I see it now, and singing isn't one of them. (She sounds sharp when she sings live.)

You can't study with Martha Graham if you don't know what you're doing. Having done so, Madonna is an expert choreographer, something she put to good use in what I consider to be the greatest music video of all time. That song, incidentally, had the remarkable ability to outlast its release by twenty years. I'm not just talking about the fact that people still download it or listen to it. That happens with The Beatles as well, and their music, while timeless in one way, is very dated, just like J.S. Bach. "Vogue," on the other hand, still sounds like it could have been written last week. Madonna can't take all the credit. Perhaps she deserves very little of the credit. From what I've heard of her lyrics, she should leave it to someone else to come up with what to say.

Beyond that, she also possesses tremendous business acumen. Unlike her protégé Britney Spears, she was not handled and repackaged by corporate businessmen. Everybody probably originally thought she was, but she couldn't have lasted as long as she has in the business without knowing what she's doing. Spears, whose career has been in a downslide, just gets up on stage and does whatever her choreographer tells her to, singing what her manager asks her to sing, wearing what the makeup and costuming departments deal her.

Madonna, on the other hand, conceived of the idea in her "Deeper and Deeper" video of having a bunch of girls sitting around in a basement, peeling bananas while a hunky male model posed for them in his underwear. Madonna is not a misandrist.

Nor is she a misapornist. I doubt she would have stood to applaud Sam Harris in that stupid TED video. How many magazine covers has she posed for, baring her alabaster skin and smiling seductively?

I get it now, after years of agony via false guilt for wanting to watch men have sex. She got it, thanks to an abusive father and a conservative religion that did nothing to stop the abuse, nor to stand up for little Madonna Ciccone. Gail Dines, the feminist writer of yet one more big fat blatant warning against the evils of exploitative pornography, will never get it, and now has clueless allies in the conservative arena. Then again, on this issue, they've always been allies, but only in the way the United States ruling elite were allies with the Soviet ruling elite during World War II. For them, the only enemy worth worrying about was the Nazi ruling elite. For feminists and conservatives, the enemy is pornography, hence the new word I've coined: misaporno.

They hate it, hate it, hate it. I used to "hate" my desire to see what a guy's hiding behind his zipper. Shame on me. Shame on Madonna. Shame on the photographer who took the picture, the sleazebag who runs the magazine, the layout artist, the writer who types clever captions to go along with the picture of some girl (who also ought to be ashamed) who puts one finger on each side of her labia to open it up to the man who ought to be ashamed that he's looking at it and getting hard. Shame on all of us.

The feminists want you straight men to be ashamed that you're degrading women. The religious conservatives want you to be ashamed because you're doing something immoral (and to feel really, really bad, if, like me, you find yourself totally gay). Unfortunately, for feminists and their polar-opposite allies, degradation and immorality, like beauty, are in the eye of the beholder.

How much skin before it's degrading, Ms. Dines? Where should the man place his hands? Where should his eyes be directed? How hard is too hard? At what point is the picture that I'm getting off on immoral, Mr. Harden?

When we see pubic hair? Can the man put his hand on her waist? Clothed or bare? Can I get a hardon? Can I masturbate? If I masturbate to an underwear model, does that make the picture immoral? What if he's just modeling BVDs? In the picture I linked to (don't worry, straight men), his penis appears to be causing the second-to-last and longest diagonal bulge. This may give me some idea of what's behind. If I had no access to hardcore, this would probably get me off. So is he immoral, or just me?

Both Harden and Dines, in the article linked above, express dismay over pornography that apparently shows "one nightmarish scene after another, full of men punishing and humiliating women sexually on camera." Not only that, but "[e]very sort of bodily waste and fluid, and every conceivable method by which a woman's body can be pushed to the limit, often at the hands of two or three men at a time, is commonplace in today's porn."

Now, I've been a bad, bad boy for a long time. I have looked extensively for mostly male-centered porn online, fairly steadily for the last seven years. Before that, I would occasionally violate God's laws with whatever gay porn magazines I could get my filthy hands on since I was 24. And prior to that, I had occasion to see mostly straight porn (thankfully with men also displayed) a few times beginning at about 12 or 13. Would Ms. Dines say this is the reason why I'm sad and shy? So it had nothing to do with the many miniscule ways that I was hurt as a child by my parents, or the abusive government school system where I quickly learned exactly where my place was, thanks to whatever Bully-of-the-Month was in charge?

So I started with pornography at about the same time as a lot of other boys who are apparently finding it: according to this article, at age 11. And according to the above quotes, these impressionable 11-year-old boys are seeing every conceivable bodily fluid and the punishment and humiliation of women.

Bullshit. As I already said, I have done extensive searches for dick online. In all that time, I have encountered child pornography once by accident, and immediately reported it. I have never encountered it again, and that was years ago.

Furthermore, I have only ever seen one trailer for one pornographic video where a woman was featured being severely punished. Yes, there are bondage videos, and I have to sidestep those on occasion, but then again, the men and women in those videos are volitionally participating, and they were far less severe than the trailer I saw. They are infrequent, and you have to be spending a lot of time to encounter one. Beyond that, you have to actually be interested in them to be aroused by it. I think it's disgusting. I am reminded, however, that disgust is also in the eye of the beholder.

Which leads to the bodily fluid comment by "Mr." Harden. As far as I know, there are six bodily fluids that can be "encountered" by an eleven-year-old who is curious about what a vagina looks like and how it's used: blood, semen, vaginal lubricant, saliva, urine, and feces. In the vast world of online porn, vaginal lubricant, saliva and semen are abundant. Are these the "disgusting" fluids? Ms. Dines probably didn't spend much time on those, because that would be arguing against her main point. She undoubtedly looked for, and "fortunately" found, some porn featuring men peeing on women, cutting them, and/or pooping on them. I have no idea where you would find most of that, and I'm not going to bother researching it. See how easy it is to avoid?

Please explain, Ms. Dines, how it is possible for me to spend seven years of my life looking for all sorts of raunchy stuff, and I never encountered, save that one time, blood being spilled, or anybody taking a dump. Now I certainly spent the majority of my time looking for gay-centered erotica, but in all my many, many searches for straight porn, I seldom saw a man peeing on a woman. In fact, I'm pretty sure that you have to go out of your way to look for it. I'm not going to come up with any scientific data on this, but based on my experiences and those that I've heard of from some of my disgusting man-friends, I'm almost positive that's true.

So how did Ms. Dines find all this stuff, and beyond that, how did she miss the bestiality angle? Those videos are out there, too, you know. Shame on her for ignoring this horrible blight on our empire. When our boys head over to the Middle East to tear other people's babies limb from limb via predator drone, they had better not have encountered any pornography where men and women volitionally fake being cut, or where anybody gets peed on.

They are, after all, doing the Lord's work.

Speaking of the Lord, what did he have to say about pornography? Absolutely nothing, if I remember correctly. Adultery and fornication are mentioned in the Bible, but much of that is in the Old Testament. Let's go to the source Himself and see what He has to say.

The ancient Jewish leaders brought a woman condemned for adultery and demanded of Him what they should do. In His typical manner, Jesus simply put the issue right back into their hands, just like the rich man who asked Him about eternal life, and the hypocrites who asked Him about Caesar's taxes. He won the argument by rightly pointing out that they all had their own faults and weaknesses, then simply told the woman, "Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more" (John 8:11). Notice He didn't say, "Go and commit adultery no more," nor did He infer, "Go and commit adultery, for thou shalt learn a great deal." The issue for Jesus wasn't adultery; it was what was in the hearts of the leaders who almost killed the woman, and what was in her heart as well.

He did this again with the question of adultery, setting it up for Himself in the Beatitudes: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: But I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart" (Matthew 5: 27-28). Once again, Jesus didn't say what those who claim to follow Him think He said. He didn't say, "Woe unto him who looketh on a woman to lust after her." He is once again saying essentially that the question is not what you should do or should not do, but what is in your head? What's going on with you?

He did this, as I explained earlier, with the rich man who wanted to know how to obtain eternal life. Jesus, probably already figuring this little dude out based on what he was wearing, and on the nature of the question itself, gave him a textbook response, assuming that's all his feeble mind needed: "Thou knowest the commandments, Do not commit adultery, Do not kill, Do not steal, Do not bear false witness, Honour thy father and thy mother" (Luke 18:20). When the young oaf persisted, Jesus threw at him an impossible task, one that He knew full well the dufus wouldn't get: "Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me" (verse 22).

From a libertarian perspective, this makes no logical sense. If entering into the Kingdom of Heaven requires that you "sell all" that you have, then that means you are giving other people things they are going to need to sell. What if you sell something to someone who doesn't have the opportunity to sell it to someone else before he dies? The item in question therefore becomes a hot potato, and the buying and selling of such items becomes a macabre game. Think about all the incredibly prescient things that are contained in the Four Gospels. Jesus doesn't literally think you have to sell everything and live without possessions. It is impossible for humans to do this.

Jesus is, once again, showing us that the questions he receives from his inquirers are premised upon the wrong thoughts. This young man only claims to want to return to Heaven when he dies, but his mind is fixed upon earthly things. Jesus's answer was to point this out to him. Like most people when confronted with what's really going on in their heads, however, the young rich man went away sorrowing.

I'd like to know what's in the head of an 11-year-old boy who goes out of his way, and I'm pretty sure that's what would be required, to see a woman getting her tits sliced off with a lawnmower (the disgusting trailer I stumbled on), or a man peeing on a woman. Then again, I'd also like to know what's going on in Ms. Dines's head, and Mr. Harden's as well.

I have a pretty good idea. For Ms. Dines, male sexuality is ape-like, purely animalistic, unthinking, uncaring, and needs to be safely guarded. As the woman, she'll be in charge of that. For feminists (and even conservatives), this is the function of female sexuality. (Poor Madonna.) For Mr. Harden, sexuality in general is a necessary evil for procreation and, because we get it on from time to time for other reasons, barely acceptable. He may even be one of those people who insist on missionary position with eyes closed.

Maybe not, but I see no celebration or explanation of human sexuality in that article. There is rampant misandry, misanthropy, and even a little misogyny, as any female willing to have her bruises displayed is obviously a slut.

Forget about the fact that she is living on a land mass that, for all its present difficulties, still has relatively easy and cheap access to education. But what is a girl who has been thoroughly dumbed down by the schools to which Ms. Dines and Mr. Harden send their own children supposed to do?

What's in my head? As the years go by, I get more and more information about that, and as painful as it is sometimes, as a seeker of truth, I am grateful. Do I learn from the gay porn I buy? Hell, yeah. Do I love it? Fuck, yeah! Is Ms. Dines the least bit concerned with gay porn?

Hell, no! And why not? Well, it's hardly exploitative of women, is it? Not a pussy in sight. The woman in a straight gang bang is simply replaced by a man. Now he's the one taking two dicks in his hole, getting disgusting sperm dripped on his face, "demeaned," "degraded," "demoralized." Makes you wonder why he even showed up for the shoot.

Sure there's disgusting pornography out there. I've seen it, and guess what? I turned it off! No social sanction necessary. Neither Ms. Dines nor Mr. Harden is qualified to tell me what erotica is acceptable, if any.

You want a lesson in morality? The dresses that women currently wear, that are considered modest, would have been abominable at the turn of the twentieth century. You couldn't show any ankle. Men went ape-shit for a little of that. Years ago, in my church, one of the leaders wrote a book in which he claimed that any movie that featured passionate kissing was pornographic. That means "The Lord of the Rings" is pornographic. Maybe the Dineses and Hardens of this world will eventually get it right, but not this week, mainly because the only thing they want is an end to the thing they dislike, for thoroughly different reasons.

Bestiality, homosexual sex, pedophilia, adultery, fornication, fellatio, cunnilingus, orgies, erotica, and pornography have been around for at least as long as humanity has created marriage and the innumerable laws that have surrounded the regulation of human sexuality. I see one death-oriented activity in that grouping, and I have already explained why. I see one more that causes me to seriously question, "What are you thinking when you do that?" Yet even with that (and I'm pretty sure you know which one I'm talking about), I see no reason to get up in arms about it and write a book. The wonderful counselor on individuality, Jesus, has given us the blueprint to handle that: What is in your heart? That doesn't appear to be a question that either Ms. Dines or Mr. Harden care very much about. They'd rather spend a great deal of effort researching the most sensational stuff that a few men are hot for, and warn us all that men in general are headed that way.

Again, bullshit. The men in those weird videos go home after the shoot, and they've got bills lying on the table. The women in those "exploitative" movies have the possibility of going back to school on their minds. The boys, whose parents are still stupid enough at this late date not to even consider an amazing blocking software that is totally free, are probably going to occasionally be curious, continue to satisfy it with porn, until Mom and Dad wake the fuck up, and move on with the business of being indoctrinated all day long about how wonderful our president is. If we just enact the right laws, sponsored by misandristic feminists and misanthropic conservatives, the phenomenon of misaporno will sweep the land like purple mountains and amber waves of hair grain.

How many times in a single article can I say, "Bullshit"? Pardon me, but I need to get off now. When I spew after watching "straight" rugby players discover one another in an English locker room, I'm aiming for my keyboard: the D and the H.

Note to Ms. Dines: Penises are great.

Zeta Game- Hypergamy

Paul Elam · 27 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

When you are married, you might as well wake up every morning, go look at yourself in the mirror and say, "Fuck you. Fuck your dreams, your ambitions and anything else that is important to you. It's all about her."

-Chris Rock

In our efforts to understand and quantify women's power, we are hobbled by the fact that our culture has very, very limited ways to articulate the nature of that power. In fact, we live largely in denial of the massive amount of muscle and sway inherent to being female, and are under any number of cultural pressures, reinforced by massive societal denial, to act as though that power does not exist.

What would seem to be a minor example of this at work can be seen every time your spell check redlines the word misandry. Though this is actually not so minor. A culture that refuses to acknowledge that a perfectly legitimate word exists on paper, is in effect denying its existence to the collective consciousness. And when such prejudicial elimination of ideas runs unchecked, it not only has the power to skew attitudes and perspectives, but also to shape law and policy, education and public awareness. Misandry runs rampant because misandry does not exist.

Women need empowerment, and always will, because women's power itself does not exist.

We do have one exception to this. It is the "I am woman, hear me roar," exception. We are bound as members of this society to proclaim women to be powerful, capable equals to men, even as we are also shackled to the opinion that women are the subjugated victims of oppression by the men who they are supposedly equal to. In its own ironic and completely contradictory way, the "I am woman," exception is just a publicly mandated, schmaltzy affirmation of the Stuart Smalley variety. We are all compulsory grrl power cheer leaders, chanting therapeutic mantras at women about a kind of power they do not have, and never have had.

And it only serves to lead us further astray from the very real power that they do possess.

We don't have common expressions like "female dominance," or "matriarchal oppression," and despite their absolute legitimacy, as sure as we use them 98% of the public will roll their eyes in summary dismissal, thus demonstrating another aspect of overarching female power that bears no name, and therefore does not exist.

It is like trying to describe a cloud without being able to use the word itself- to a world that does not believe in clouds. We are limited to talking around the subject; we present our meanings in metaphors and similes and anecdotes. We may describe how the power of accusation from women often ruins innocent men, or how men go in to family court at a complete disadvantage by virtue of having a penis, rather not having a vagina, but we really have precious little language to address all this directly. As a result, much of what we say is dismissed as hyperbolic and overly reactionary.

It's the female advantage to have power that is at once overbearing and invisible; everywhere and nowhere.

But this is beginning to change, thanks to the MRM. Growing numbers of men and women are now aware of misandry, despite their spell checks continued ignorance of it. And with the furtherance of the use of that word, we are not only pushing another addition to the lexicon, but some very key ideas that go with it.

- Women can, and do, irrationally hate every bit as much as men.
- Women can be sexist, and many are.
- Men can be self hating, and many are.

That is the power of a single word, and the more it is forced into mainstream use, the more, albeit slowly, that attitudes begin to change. We are not there yet, but the day is coming that misandry will take its place alongside misogyny in the collective consciousness, and people will have a hard time thinking of one without a cognizance of the other. Language is the locus of social change.

In that spirit, I am continuing the Zeta Game series with a focus on not only reversing the polarity of the power flow between men and women, but on attempting to infuse some more meaning and clarity into the language we use when doing it. And I can best start by taking a word that has been popping up in the Game dialog for some time now.

Hypergamy.

The word is literally defined as the custom of women marrying up, or marrying men who have a higher socioeconomic status than women possess on their own. Gamesters have already expanded on it to describe women's natural inclination to be sexually stimulated in the presence of powerful men. I read a recent comment in another forum saying that even the most committed of married women will get the 'gina tingle in the presence of such men, even when ugly ass Henry Kissinger walks into a room.

I have no doubt it is true.

But there is much more to hypergamy, and at the very least it serves the purpose of men well to revise and expand upon our understanding of it, and include that into our common language.

First we should consider that the literal definition of hypergamy and the Game definition both point to the same outcome- women with access to, and use of, the power generated by men.

That power can come in many different forms, and will be pursued differently by different women, especially at different points in their lives.

A younger woman may be attracted to the immediate presence of personal power via thug attraction, while an older, more sophisticated woman will be turned on by a successful man of means. There is, in the biological sense, not one iota of difference between the two women. Both get hot and bothered by what they hope to eventually have control over.

So whether the 'gina tingle is sparked by a guy on a Harley or a guy with a Harley factory, they are tingling over essentially the same thing.

Both women will enter the relationship in honeymoon phase, but will eventually use the tried and tested methods of sexual manipulation and/or emotional blackmail to put the man on a leash and start assuming ownership of everything he produces, including money, home and personal time.

The average woman will become increasingly demanding and insistent that the energy all revolve around her, and the standard response is for the man to acquiesce. And as I wrote about in my essay, "A Prayer for Joe Bob," this is where we also see the man lose more and more of himself to her wishes and whims.

Women don't just marry up. They are on constant alert to better deal themselves, even within, especially within, their current relationships. They enter relationships with the intent to eventually exert total control over them. I saw a woman wearing a T-shirt once that said it as succinctly as I have ever seen it.

More me. Less you.

To illustrate the point further I am reminded of one of the questions I used to ask in the men's groups I facilitated.

"How many of you," I would ask, "have ever had the feeling that you wanted to pull all of your hair out by the roots and scream bloody murder because no matter what you did, she was not happy with it and wanted more?"

The roughly 5% of men who answered this question in the negative were all gay.

Even men that claimed to be happily married were able to relate to this frustration, and indeed many of those men attributed their "happy marriage" to the fact that they gave their wives whatever they wanted with no questions.

I call this hypergamy in action, and it is a form of exercised power that is unequaled in its ability to control a man's life- and it is all but universal to the male experience.

For men who desire the ability to avoid that trap, giving hypergamy an expanded definition (and yes, I can do that if I want to) is in order.

Hypergamy is the innate tendency in women to reduce men to mere utilitarian value, to extract as much personal use from men as possible. And to continue to do so until the man is used up.

In short, hypergamy is the universal drive in women to turn men into appliances, and whether that appliance is a dildo or an ATM or both, makes little difference.

And the hell with NAWALT, in one way or another ALL heterosexual women practice hypergamy, and my money is on the idea that most lesbians do as well. It is biological programming, not conscious choice, so hating women for it is about as useful as hating men for liking tits and ass.

And besides, one need not hate women to understand and counteract hypergamy. Indeed, it is quite possible to force any woman you are connected to into more or less chasing her tail in circles with her hypergamous tendencies, leaving her to experience the frustration that she usually is the one to inflict. And it does not require scheming, manipulation, dishonesty or any of the other less savory aspects of non Zeta Game.

In fact, it demands that you do just the opposite of those things and operate only in honest, direct ways that scream self assurance and self awareness.

I will cross that bridge in the next article, Hypergamy Crossroads.

So Long, MND

Paul Elam · 29 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Mensnewsdaily.com's publisher Mike LaSalle made the announcement yesterday that MND is shutting down operations as of the end of this month. After nine years as the flagship of the men's movement online, an important voice will fall silent, marking an end to an era in the men's movement.

MND
mensnewsdaily.com®

Any way you look at it we are taking a hit. MND reaches over a million people a year and was the only men's movement website indexed by Google News.

Like I have read in a lot of the comments and emails I have gotten already, I am saddened by this development and sincerely wish that another path had been taken. But this isn't, IMO, a time for hindsight- or for armchair quarterbacking.

Mike LaSalle is to be commended for nine years of dedicated, largely unparalleled service. He certainly has my thanks for all he has done. And in response to many of the anticipated questions that will arise, I can say without hesitation that there is nothing under the surface of these events of a darker political nature. Mike needed a change of direction and went for it. Wherever he is going, I hope he arrives in style.

But now, it is simply time to move on. As Mike alluded to in his article, the men's movement is first and foremost a shift in consciousness. It is the process of men revising self perception and their ideas of the world around them, sometimes one painful bit of insight at a time. With or without MND, this is a process already happening, and I dare say that the operations of one website don't have any real significant impact on the big picture.

In fact, if Angry Harry, Glenn Sacks, The Spearhead and this site were to all shut down today, others would fill the void and this "movement," for lack of a better word, would continue to trudge slowly forward.

Men are changing because they have to change to survive, and we are not dependent on any one entity to facilitate our efforts.

We can't afford to be.
If there is anything to be immediately gleaned from all this, it is that for however long any of you are out there posting comments, writing articles, running blogs or -most importantly- refusing to be complicit with feminist governance and female hegemony, you are as valuable as Mike LaSalle. And if you grow tired or burned out, which is completely understandable, there will be someone to lift their voice after you take your leave.

I used scare quotes around the word movement because I think what we are really talking about here is a simple dialog. It is a conversation about ourselves, about women, and about our collective condition in this world.

That conversation will continue, and the number of men involved will increase.

Personally, I have every intention of doing what I do till I pass from this world, but if that were to happen today, some other voice for men would rise up and shake the rafters even harder.

This train ain't stopping for nothing or no one.

The Road: a must-see movie for men

B.R. Merrick · 30 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I used to pay a great deal of attention to the Oscars. I've been a serious movie buff ever since I saw Spielberg's "The Color Purple." Before you all get started, yes, I know all about this film. I won't go into details, or the reasons why I continue to watch it in spite of how it disdainfully showcases black men, except to point out that even though she's a feminist, the author of the book upon which it is based, Alice Walker, treated the character of Mr.____ far better than in the movie, and her masterful book, "The Third Life of Grange Copeland," centers around a far greater and more admirable male character. Feel free to hate the movie, but I have to admit, that's when the love affair with cinema started for me.

Since then, I've always wanted to take movies more seriously, and a very basic way to tell what's good and what's not is to note who gets nominated and who wins. Sometimes the Academy gets it right, and sometimes totally wrong. Then there are a few occasions when they mislead me into believing that I'm going to enjoy something I don't.

Such was the case with "No Country for Old Men," an intense cat-and-mouse thriller off of which I could not take my eyes, not only for the intensity, but for Javier Bardem's mesmerizing (and deserving) Oscar-winning performance. However, I wish, like "Nine," that I could have found the strength to press the "eject" button. Instead, I was subjected to far more frightening and graphic violence than I can stand. Like a bagel I accidentally bit into when I was a teenager that was glazed with salt on the bottom, an act that has prevented me ever since from salting anything, this movie has turned me off to violence in a big way.

Therefore, when I saw a trailer for "The Road," starring the very manly Viggo Mortensen, and realized that it was based on a book by the same author as "No Country," in spite of the fact that I found the teaser intriguing, I thought, "No way." I've seriously had enough. Lucky for me, there's this dude who calls himself Angry Harry, who mentioned this guy named Paul Elam, who has this cool website where I post now. Paul and a commenter named Jabberwocky calmed my squeamish self down, and assured me that violence was merely incidental in the film, and not the main bloody point.

What a fantastic film. On every level. Every man should see it. This includes politicians, who for the most part are nearly shells of men, as far as I'm concerned, and even alpha males, who probably won't get it, but you never know. However, before I can give you the reasons why every man should see it, I need to explain why, as an anarchist, I loved it so much, and how it enhanced what I have been thinking about lately, concerning the advance of feminism in our lifetime.

By itself, feminism could never have gotten anywhere, except on the back of a relentless machine set in motion and largely supported by alpha males: government. It is the nature of government, as I pointed out in "Coercion Is Death," to initiate coercion over everyone who inhabits a particular land mass (or masses, if you live on an archipelago, or if you intend to build and empire). By itself, feminism is basically powerless to force itself onto anyone other than another feminist.

Men like me don't do this. My general attitude, in spite of my Religious Right upbringing, when confronted with opposing beliefs, viewpoints, and behaviors face-to-face, has always been, "Hey, whatever floats your boat." Anarchy has only augmented that, and I have now joined in by floating my own boat. It has always been, and always will be, alpha males who set about sinking the boats. Their general attitude is opposite mine. It largely consists of, "Screw you. That's mine." I have never liked men like this. That is why I had such a hard time with Bardem's character in that horrific film. The kindly old gentleman who offered assistance on the side of the road did not deserve to get punctured in his brain. The alpha male takes and hurts. All I do in the presence of one is get taken from and hurt. In general, I don't care for gangster movies, either. Why would I want to indulge in watching alpha males take from others? As far as I'm concerned, they deserve their comeuppance.

There are certainly a few alpha females out there (okay, probably more than a few), but in general, when a woman says, "Screw you. That's mine," she is unable to take on her own, as an alpha male would, unless she has a gun, which is seldom. It reminds me of an interview with a nineties gay male porn star I read in a magazine a long time ago. He was a former bouncer at a gay bar, and he remarked that he had to be careful, because gay men would get "bitchy like women, but they're strong like men." An effeminate-acting gay man may seem like a weak female, but have you forgotten? He's 200 pounds with thick arms. That's the essential difference between alpha males and alpha females.

And alpha females know the difference. Men conceive of guns, design them, gather the resources to make them, hire workers to fashion them, hoard them, sell them, make improvements to them, study them, share information about them with like-minded alpha males, obsess about them, write songs about them, paint them, draw them, praise them, covet them, buy them, steal them, show them off, practice with them, bond with their sons using them, dream about them, mimic them with their dicks, etc. Alpha females know this. Alpha males know alpha females know this. The power struggle begins.

When power-hungry feminists see the opportunity, they pounce on the government created by these men, and the revenge fantasies begin. Alpha males with fewer guns, less money, and less smarts, along with the rest of us males, suffer, along with a great many women. Even if feminism went by the wayside tomorrow, this would still be the case. It is the smartest (and sometimes luckiest) alpha males who sit at the top. I had an alpha male dog as a teenager. (Cute story: As a puppy, he would hold his cloth leash in his mouth when I took him out for a walk. "Screw you. I'm taking you for a walk!") He could bark any other dog into submission, and he always did. My non-alpha male father remarked that in a pack of dogs, ours would either be dominant or he would be dead. This was one of the most correct things Dad ever said. This is how alpha males are. Feminists are aware. Like minarchists, those who believe in a small, constitutionally limited government, feminists see a system that isn't going to go away, so why not use it to their advantage?

This is what was going on when Betty Friedan wrote her seminal "The Feminine Mystique." America was a brand new empire, at least to the rest of the world. (The empire was building before the ink was dry on The Constitution, but we'll leave that for another rant.) By the late Fifties and early Sixties when Friedan was researching her book, women had enjoyed more than a decade of corporate, imperial luxury. The poorest of American housewives could expect what Stephen Sondheim wrote in "America" from "West Side Story," sung by Puerto Rican immigrants who came from nothing:

"I like to be in America!
O.K. by me in America!
Ev'rything free in America
For a small fee in America!

"…Automobile in America,
Chromium steel in America,
Wire-spoke wheel in America,
Very big deal in America!

"…I like the shores of America!
Comfort is yours in America!
Knobs on the doors in America,
Wall-to-wall floors in America!"

All this prosperity, so effortless and available even to the poorest among us, and now we're bored. I believe Friedan when she remarked at how surprised she was to have these women, who were virtually strangers, talk to her about their sexual fantasies. When you're bored, a sexual fantasy or two usually does the trick. The point of the empire was to ensure that the minions (that's you and me) are happy, the ruling elite have a comfortable, easily controlled populace, and the empire remains forever and ever. We'll leave aside the glaring fact that no empire on this earth has ever lasted, and it wasn't because modern technology wasn't available. Empires, based on initiatory coercion, are death-oriented, and must therefore eventually die. Feminism, the whore-wife of empire, is also death-oriented and won't last long when the emperor is finally dead.

When life comes this easily and quickly — when machines can now take care of the house, and since all women on this land mass have been subjected to numerous systems of coercion, one especially egregious one, government schooling, that spends countless hours drilling into you the idea that the empire of which you are a part is the best, with the best government, and the best way of life — why not grab at the reins of power and wield a little more of it on behalf of other bored housewives?

I have no doubt that the sometimes stifling manner of suburban culture was not sufficient for women, but then, I don't think it was sufficient for men, either. Small communities and big cities have always been a bit more spontaneous. People tend to gravitate to one or the other. Suburban life is good for a few things, and where it can grow organically, I would think it would have the appearance and attitude of small towns. But so much of modern community planning requires the input of a coercive body of people in order to ever come about (zoning, building permits, property taxes to keep out the n*ggers, et cetera, ad nauseam). Beyond the overarching system of coercion known as government, there are the softly coercive traditional roles for men and women, once crucial to our very survival, many no longer necessary, but tradition speaks louder (and more coercively) than individuality. In spite of modernity, we are still quite tribal. So we have bored housewives, malcontents like Friedan, government-planned suburbia, and a system of coercion in which these women have all been indoctrinated to place their trust. This is what's otherwise known as a powder keg. It also would have been impossible without the efforts of the alpha males to coerce, coerce, and coerce some more. "Give that to me. I have a date with an alpha female, and she wants some."

What does this have to do with the haunting, dark, and exquisitely beautiful movie, "The Road"? Well, the movie takes as its premise a great conflagration of the earth, accompanied by massive earthquakes, which wipe out swaths of humanity, virtually all animal life, and kill all crops. What's an alpha male to do?

They congregate amongst themselves, riding about the wasteland formerly known as America, shooting at will, taking, and generally causing distress to anyone unfortunate enough to come into their path. We are talking about a rapidly diminishing food supply, since the only things left to eat are canned goods and other humans. (There is a particularly disturbing scene in the middle, where a hapless mother and child are running from some of these alpha cannibals.)

What about the rest of us? How would we fare? As someone who believes that the state is not the answer, I found my own beliefs challenged, making the film darker than it already was. Ultimately, however, I found the direction of my present thinking enhanced, and in a way, cemented by the unfolding of the story. It centers on Viggo Mortensen as Papa, and his prepubescent son. They wander further and further south, perhaps clinging to the idea that they might eventually meet up with the boy's mother, who has left their once happy home, in a desperation that does not disparage women, so much as show how different people would react to such an unprecedented world event. The abandoned father and son have adventures, conversation, bonding, fear, arguments, and live the lives of refugees.

It is extraordinary to watch the level of intimacy between these two: one man, and one soon to be. It is the very essence of what a father and son relationship should be. In spite of the difficulties facing a father who knew a completely different world, the primal frustration is never taken out on the son. Beyond that, Papa constantly imparts to his son preparatory advice, which will come in handy late in the film, as it reaches perhaps its most touching moment. Anybody who thinks this is a misogynist film due to the mother's flight, or the relative absence of female characters in the movie, must watch until it's all over. Only then can you understand why this is the first film I have ever bothered to completely review. It is truly magnificent.

Beyond the wonderful father/son relationship you are privileged to see, the movie ultimately hints at the necessity of men in order to build the world. Although it never happens in the course of the film, you get the sense that someday crops will be sown again, due to the presence of the good men you see in this movie. Perhaps people will once again, when the earth ceases the constant burning and shaking, be able to rebuild society. Even more importantly, you are left with a hope that this time it will be built by men and women who understand and repudiate the true nature of the alpha personality, but that ultimately men, with their greater bodily strength, and their higher numbers of intellectually-minded members, along with the lesser numbers of women who are up to the task, will form a society that can deal with the new challenges that the planet has provided with its upheaval. The remaining women will concern themselves in general with the desires of their sisters and children. One of the last lines in the movie seems to hint at this, and it's the essence of motherhood and womanhood.

After all, in the world this gifted author has dreamt up (if the movie is any indication of the book), rights, privileges, opportunities, feminism, fascism, corporatism, militarism, statism, liberalism, libertarianism, socialism, communism, capitalism, and virtually every other -ism you can imagine, have all been burned to a crisp. All that's left is what individuals possess inside. They either have the will to live, to merely scrounge, or to take by force. All pretense has vanished. There is no time for women to think of luxury when the young haven't been fed for several days. Friedan's concerns would not exist. All that would be left for women to think about, and for the children to observe, is how hard the men have to think, work, and live, simply so that everyone else will go on. (Incidentally, I would not recommend this film to women, as it touches too strongly on what I believe a great many women fear the most.)

It's a tremendous concept, and one that was wrongfully ignored by the Oscars (can't always depend on them). Its spare, imaginative, horrifying look at the fragility of what we have built in the modern age, and the pretentious ideologies we have pulled so tightly over it, should have been praised to the high heavens, including the filmmakers' use of costuming, makeup, set design, sound and visual effects, music, and excellent pacing.

Perhaps the reason it was ignored was because of the blatancy of its portrayal of the essentials of manhood. Maybe if a couple of irresponsible feminists who shot a rapist had sped their Cadillac through the proceedings, it might have gotten the attention it deserved. No matter. When the America sung about by those Latina immigrants has finally collapsed, I pray that I will find myself in the company of the family that appears at the end of the movie. They think like me.

The Problem With Gay Rights

Paul Elam · 1 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

If you have spent any real amount of time reading the articles, and in particular the comments in men's movement forums, then you are aware of an often anti-homosexual attitude that has been prevalent for quite some time.

On a political level, some of the resentment is understandable. Gay activists have aligned themselves with feminists, and, while marching in misandric lockstep, have draped themselves in victim couture and made their grab for special government considerations. The resultant draconian intrusions and bullying on behalf of gays and other special interest groups is a core issue in the men's movement, and for good reason.

Heterosexual males are the societal default for the role of perpetrator and are subsequently the identified enemy for whatever victims du jour have the stage at the moment. Just more misandry in a culture that seems to run on it these days.

But while the politics of this may have helped structure a façade of improvement for gay men, it has actually revealed something about their political agenda that becomes more apparent with each public campaign.

They have no idea who their real enemies are. No, not a freaking clue. And that ignorance sets up them up to lose more rights than they could ever hope to gain.

Allow me to digress for a moment to make a statement about gay men in general.

Gay men have invented new technology, built cities, researched cures for disease, made profound contributions to the arts, literature and philosophy, excelled at athletics and participated wholly in every aspect of the development of civilization as we know it.

But of course, they did not do these things because they were gay. They did these things because they were men. Solving problems and making advances is what men do, and there is no evidence to suggest that gay men are any less proficient at it than straight men.

And therein, in my opinion, lies the problem. We live in a culture that doesn't regard gay men as men. So, it would stand to reason that a movement of social awareness and enlightenment, proffering that men who are gay are no less men than men who are straight, would have been in order. And it would have served a purpose not dissimilar from what we see in the men's movement today- to wit, that holding men to standards and expectations based on sex, while relieving women of their corresponding expectations, has led directly to their systematic, conscripted misuse as human beings.

By embracing feminist ideology and misandry, gay men only buy into the myth that they are not, and shouldn't be, men. And by allowing themselves to be co opted by a group of ideologues that hate men to the core, they have only further undermined solutions to their very real problems.

And this leaves us with what we see in the "gay rights" movement today- a dissonant ideology that is designed to attack the very nature of who they are. For in the end, whether you are an avowed deconstructionist of traditional masculinity, or an equally fervent traditionalist that thinks real men sit tall in the saddle and lay their coats in the mud for women to walk on, gay men will remain what they are- men. And to whatever extent they seek to include themselves in the "rights" of men in the modern Zeitgeist, they will invariably suffer the consequences for that pursuit.

The two current hot spot examples of this are gay marriage and military service. Roughly speaking, the activism that seeks to include gay men in these realms is, in reality, placing them directly in the crosshairs of corrupt family courts, and on the battlefield, where they can join straight men in being used as the cannon fodder of choice for hegemonic corporatism.

Let's dig a little deeper into both of these gay "causes" and try to understand what they really mean.

To be sure, gays have been targeted for exclusion from legally sanctioned matrimony. And with that has come exclusions from some of the legal advantages we place on marriage. There are will and property considerations, hospital visitation, tax breaks and a number of other things largely bestowed on legally married couples. By refusing gays the right to get married, we are also refusing them many other rights taken for granted by the rest of the population.

Were things that simple, this would be a no brainer. But, as we often see when it comes to the law, things are not near that simple. And the more we examine the realities on the ground we find that a legal marriage is not a pathway to expanded rights, but a direct route to allowing state functionaries to eviscerate personal freedoms.

Also, and I don't think this can be understated, pushing for legal recognition of gay marriage is a de facto endorsement of statist culture; a capitulation to recognizing the state, not the individual, as the ultimate authority over human relationships.

Depending on the government to legitimize your commitments is the same thing, literally, as giving the government control over them. And when the honeymoon is over -and over it will be- no one will be saved from family court by their politics, or their sexual orientation.

When newspaper stories cover gay weddings, they always run them with accompanying pictures of the happy couple(s), and some not so thinly disguised commentary about people finally realizing dreams, of being included in "normal" society. What those newspapers won't do is run follow up stories, complete with pictures of dueling attorneys, confiscated property, false allegations, ex parte restraining orders, garnished wages and jail cells for those that don't comply.

These are the results of the state sanctioned marriages in which gays are fighting so hard to be included.

I don't fault anyone for demanding their fair share of misery, but as long as we are talking rights, we should also include those that are lost to this "sacred" institution.

It would seem sensible that since marriage, at least in western culture, is a religious institution, that men -all men- push for taking it out of the hands of government completely. Religious institutions would be able to marry whomever they please, which would ensure the rights of almost anyone to marry- and to suffer for it down the road.

But much better that suffering be a simple artifact of broken dreams than the for-profit destruction of lives routinely inflicted by family courts.

Family courts are a war zone, but they are nothing compared to the real thing.

In the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the total count for American dead and wounded is 43,459. This number does not include the 16+ war veterans who kill themselves each and every day. 98%+ of these dead and wounded are men, by design.

Selective service is a boys club. Straight or gay, you are required to register or face time in jail. It is only women who are exempt. And if there were ever a draft again, it would be men and only men conscripted, with or without their consent.

We do have a draft of sorts, by the way. It is conveniently called "stop loss," and forcibly extends the time on active duty when fresh meat is needed on the battlefield. In fairness, female soldiers too are subject to stop loss measures, but they still enjoy the military's strenuous efforts to keep them out of harms way at the expense of the men. By the sex distribution of combat deaths, they are incredibly successful at it.

And for what? Oil profits? Imperialism? If we have ever had a war in defense of this country, rather than just a defense of our corporate interests, it has not been in a long, long time. Likely not in the average man's lifetime.

All these wars are waged by an extreme minority of wealthy men, and paid for with the en masse suffering and death of much poorer ones.

Should gay men be allowed to serve in the military? Sure, and of course many do, if not openly. But again, as a political objective that purports to move a class of human beings toward more equal treatment under the law, the whole idea is a total fail.

In war, the discrimination is against men, from the induction center to Flanders Field. Seeking inclusion in it may well be a human right, but it will ultimately be at the expense of the same. Such is often revealed when taking more than a cursory glance at complicated matters.

This reminds me of a story I read some years ago that ran in The Houston Press, a local political and entertainment rag for the Houston Area. The story was about a gay man who was being repeatedly beaten by his boyfriend. He tried at several local agencies to get help, but was more or less laughed out of all of them. The Press wrote the story with the angle that he was discriminated against because he was gay. Having worked in a field that often referred victims of domestic abuse to support organizations, I knew better. I wrote The Press and informed them that the man was discriminated against because he was male, not because he was gay. There were simply no services for men, but plenty for women, including lesbians, who received help regularly.

They never published the letter.

It's abundantly clear that they didn't want to acknowledge the truth, even if the truth meant that men like the one in their story would eventually find some help when needing it.

Once again, gender politics took precedence over all, and the real reasons for this persons, this man's struggle, were hidden from public view.

And this is where the men's movement, if it heads in the right direction (my opinion of course), will make a decided difference. And when I look at the emerging mentality of the movement, I feel like we will get there.

The men's movement, or at least a growing part of it, is about casting off all sense of expectation and obligation based solely on our sex. It is a fitting and appropriate response in a world where women are taught they are bound by nothing and can rightly choose whatever path they want in life. And it seems perfectly consistent that the unshackling of those expectations would include sexual orientation as much as it would anything else.

Coincidentally, I see growth in two areas familiar to this particular article. Men are learning to say no to marriage and to being designated bullet catchers for a small group of avaricious bastards. We are learning to tell the world around us that no one will be allowed to shame us as men, nor will they be allowed to instruct us on what a man is.

And when we learn this lesson well enough, it will provide fertile ground to allow us to see the real resentments that fester against gay men- which boil down to one inescapable fact:

Gay men are and always have been resented because they provide no utility to women. They are literally born free of the constraining and egregiously burdensome expectations that heterosexual men are still raised to fulfill.

They are, in fact, the natural recipients of what many men in the men's movement clamor for every day- freedom from the control of women and from the control of the state on women's behalf.

It is my hope that this movement comes to invite and include gay men within the ranks, not as gays, but as men. But I fear that this will take some real time; time for the very few within our ranks that actually hate gays for being gay to either wise up or leave, and time for many gays to wake up and understand that ideologies, like feminism, based on hating men, will only produce self hatred, and worse.

Right now the agenda for feminists includes sending men to the alter, and ultimately family courts, and to the combat zone.

Men should work together to avoid both.

Nothing Makes a 'Gina Tingle Like a Killa

Authors note: I have to offer a public thank you to Tom Golden, LCSW, whose regular, sterling insights helps to shape a good bit of the work I do. Had he not provided me with the research information in this article, I would not have obsessed on writing it over the past 24 hours. Also, Tom will be using some of this information in his next Youtube video, due out soon, and it will be featured here as well. Thanks, Tom.

"That's not opinion, it's science.
And science is one cold hearted bitch with a 14 inch strap on."
-From the television show, "Dexter"

On July 24th of this year, I posted "Patriarchy for Dummies," on this site. In it, I proffered that there was an element to the normal female psyche that gravitated toward violent, dangerous- murderous men. I used Scott Peterson and Joran van der Sloot, and the numbers of women sending them marriage proposals in prison as prima facie evidence that supported my contentions. I also pointed to the fact that van der Sloot went on a sexual rampage, attracting scores of attractive young women after he skated on the Holloway murder.

It turned out to be one of the more read and commented on pieces on this site. And not just here. One of the other places was over at reddit.com/mensrights, which has a few actual MRA's, including a couple of really insightful ones, and a slew of feminist trolls that down vote anything pro male or that hints of fairly criticizing females or feminism. Let me digress further to add that most of them down vote MRA articles without commenting, which I suppose is their version of drive-by-activism, but some actually speak up, reminding us of why we oppose feminism- and why we see its practitioners as such insufferable dullards.

At reddit, even the most thoughtful comments dissenting from the ideas I suggested boiled down to a regurgitated load of NAWALT vomitus.

Oh, noooooo, women can't be like that! Women choose men based on qualities like sensitivity and whether they like Teddy Bears and snuggling up on the couch to watch The Bachelorette. Those other women who are like that? They are just sicko's, sad exceptions to the rule And they probably got that way because of some abusive, violent man.

Of course, that's the PC line, and we all know that women are only what the political correctness police tell us they are, which is basically sugar and spice and all things superior. There is no way that women in general get the 'gina tingle for gangsters, thugs and killers.

Just ask any feminist over at reddit.

But just in case you are interested in answers that aren't screened by gender ideologues, there is some actual research available to consider.

From a study done on the Yanomamö, a large Amerindian hunter-gatherer people that reside in the Amazon Basin, some very telling observations were made regarding sexual competition and violence among men by Chagnon (1988, 1997).

First, in Yanomamö culture, like most all hunter-gatherer (and agricultural and pastoral) societies, violence occurs either continuously or frequently. It is the men who are more aggressive and violent. And it is the most violent men that are successful at being selected for sex.

Yanomamö who are fierce warriors, and "fierce warrior" is defined by those who have participated in the killing of at least one member of a rival village, have 2.5 times as many wives and 3 times as many children as men who don't kill.

It is also noted that the status of material wealth was not connected at all to being a fierce warrior. Indeed, there was no other difference identified between killers and non killers except that the former were much higher up on the ladder of sexual selection.

The same elevated status, and lack of other corollaries, also held true for men who were politically powerful. (It should be noted that political power frequently translates to power over life and death, though the killing is often done by decree, and executed by men who specialize in violence.)

So it can be legitimately deduced that in hunter-gatherer societies, those with the power -and the tendency- to kill are at a sexual premium with women in those cultures.

Now, it must be asked, from which type of society did our modern, post agrarian life emerge?

Ah, yes, that would be hunter-gatherer, the base template for all of modern human existence- and the mode in which most human evolutionary development occurred.

Now, I am sure that the average PC ideologue would insist that since the invention of internal combustion engines, non fat latte's and women's studies programs that we have unwritten three million years of sexual selection programming and now women really prefer those soft little puppy dog guys; that the women who go for thugs and killers are just freaks; rare, unenlightened throw backs to the African Savanna.

But of course, like with most everything else, they are dead wrong.

While it is true that women's selections have shifted somewhat in keeping with modern realities, it only demonstrates that growing numbers of them will select the guy who controls, and sometimes kills, other men, than settle for the guy of lesser status. How many people is President Obama getting killed right now? How much trouble would he have getting laid? How many women would jump his bones if Michelle herself were in the same room screaming bloody murder?

Plenty. And you have to being in complete denial of human nature to blind yourself to that reality.

Politicians have the favorable characteristics of political savvy and the power to kill, even if with just the simple stroke of a pen. Is it any wonder why for most all of them that a quick blow job is just a snap of the fingers away?

This is the power that most, if not all, women respond to. From Al Capone to John Dillinger, Genghis and Kublai Khan, Scott Peterson and Joran van der Sloot, Adolph Hitler and Alexander, and Ronald Regan to Barack Obama, men who kill, and men who have the power to have men killed cause a 'gina tingle in many, many women that would register on the Richter Scale.

And there is one more bit of information in basic biology to help us understand this.

For a half century now we have made a half assed study of men's violent tendencies as though they happen in a vacuum. We have mostly put that study in the hands of women with so many neurotic self image and Daddy Issues, and a political agenda to act them out, that anyone with two brain cells to rub together could see that their efforts were not headed for a scientific end.

As a result, their conclusions about men's violence falters after they demonstrate the obvious, that men are naturally more violent than women.

They reach conclusions that are something like this:

"Men are violent because, well, let's see, yeah, it's because they are fucking pigs, that's why! Now where's my Nobel?"

What these Einsteinettes, and their supportive male sycophants have failed to notice -as do many people who allow a degree in women's studies pass for an education- is that throughout the animal kingdom, two things are universal.

Whichever sex, male or female, that is in the position to compete for sexual selection, develops more aggressive and violent traits, among other things.

AND

Whichever sex, male or female, that is in the position to choose among those competing for sexual selection, chooses those that are the biggest, strongest, most aggressive and violent.

It doesn't matter if we are talking about human beings, hedgehogs or house cats, it has nothing to do with what sex the animal is, and everything to do with whether or not the animal is competing to be selected for sex, or doing the selecting.

With seahorses and sandpipers, whose males gestate and tend to the young, we find -you guessed it- females that are more aggressive. Interestingly enough, we also find in those species that the females are larger, slower to develop, and die younger.

Sound familiar? It should. It is the same across the animal kingdom.

And this is where feminists, with their myopic and ideologically twisted use of research have done little more than reduce understanding of human behavior to "Man Bad-Woman Good."

I suppose that is far as you need to go when staying locked in a cyclical pattern of man hating is your primary goal in life. But for people who want to understand this sometimes crazy, mixed up thing we call the human condition, a little more perspective is in order.

Men are violent largely because being violent, or having the capacity for it, gets them a few significant rungs up on that sexual selection ladder- because those are the men that women select. Those are the men that turn them on.

This isn't going to change any time soon. Maybe never- it took millions of years to get where we are, although that should not stop people who claim enlightenment on the sexes from viewing it objectively and understanding where it comes from.

But since our culture still recognizes feminists as the authority on that subject, that isn't going to change any time soon, either.

Let's Play Countdown to Blame the Victim!

Paul Elam · 7 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

O.K., so far, here is what we know. 29 year old April Holmes of Houston got into an argument with her husband Donald Wesley Holmes, also 29. According to neighbors, she ran into him, as he was standing, with her car, and then in a style reminiscent of fellow Houston murderess Clara Harris, ran over him several more times to make sure he was good and dead.

You might think I want to do an analysis of violent women- or point this out to feminists who are always saying men are the problem.

Booorrrring!

Instead, since the event is fresh as of today, September 7th, 2010, I want to post this article as the beginning of the very first A Voice for Men Countdown to the Big Excuse Event.

I want to time this one, and readers are welcome to start a pool, to see just how long it takes before her attorney, or the media, or some politician comes out with some reason for us to believe that she is not just another murdering bitch, but how she was driven to it from abuse, mental illness, being on her period, or as a response to 3,000,000 years of patriarchal oppression.

People in the comments at The Houston Chronicle have already beat the mainstream to it with claims that she must have been provoked by the track marked husband. One even commented, with cloying empathy, "she has the saddest eyes I have ever seen."

Sniff.

Really, these people don't count. We all know the average reader ingesting mainstream media news is brainwashed beyond hope.

My interest is in establishing and refining what I call the Gender Excuse Time Index- or how long it takes after death is pronounced before the real push for public sympathy comes out on behalf of the female killer. I think Andrea Yates (also of Houston) has the record so far, but I will have to do some research.

I am guessing in this case it will be 96 hours (or less) before one or more soundbites about how she was the real victim -not the dead and mangled husband- will be delivered to a desperate and impatient public from a high profile source.

Do I hear 72 hours? 48?

Prostitution and the Evil, Evil Penis

B.R. Merrick · 9 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Oh, God. Here we go again. Gentlemen, when will you get it through your brains that your dicks are little more than of the devil? Someday, humanity will wake up to the wonderful truth set forth by the mother in that memorable film, Peggy Sue Got Married: "Peggy Sue, you know what a penis is… Stay away from it!"

Some lady named Janice G. Raymond has written an article about the "evil" of prostitution. According to her bio at the end, "Janice G. Raymond is professor emerita of women's studies…" Need I say more? You already know what Ms. G. Raymond thinks about whores and their enablers. How dare a woman accept money for sex! She should be made to wear a chastity belt, no tongue kissing, and "stay away" from the P-word, until she accepts money on the ring finger of her left hand, for staying home to cook, clean, having exclusive use of the car, and oh yeah, sex. Money for sex with a stranger: evil. Money for sex with a man who is successfully tamed, whom the thugs in charge of your land mass have officially declared to be your husband: good.

Ms. G. Raymond, a studier of women, thinks that bartering with one's body is somehow perverse. What Ms. G. Raymond doesn't realize is that both men and women barter with their bodies on a regular basis, and not just for sex. A man who doesn't show up to work with a working body doesn't get paid. If he doesn't get paid, he may very well not get laid, because a man who doesn't show up back home with a paycheck is just one more mouth to feed, and there ain't no food where there ain't no paycheck. What difference does it make whether the man barters his body on behalf of a coal mine, or the woman he's banging barters hers for a little domestic security? Remove the man from the ability to barter at all, as has been done successfully in the black American community, ensure that the woman gets paid for getting laid and pregnant, and the woman accepts money for sex: a welfare prostitute. Why isn't this exploitation, Ms. G. Raymond? (By the way boys, Mo'Nique deserved that Oscar.)

Because when we're not talking about the prostitution Ms. G. Raymond abhors, you're not going to hear about exploitation. A man who is pushed off his land and taxed into submission by a government, who has his choices limited by wealthy men (and now women) that start corporations and get into bed with that same government, takes one of the few choices left for any man that wants to feel like a man, and goes deep into that coal shaft. A woman with similarly reduced choices gets on her back, while the paying customer on top of her does most of the work. Both the man and the woman have bartered their bodies. The difference lies in the fact that the woman has made a physically safer choice, although admittedly more intimate. It is also a far easier choice. However, in some small way, she is doing what an ordinary housewife does: She brings herself to the transaction, knowing full well what the man wants out of it. She can just lie there and wait fifteen minutes if she wants.

And why is it that we never hear about male prostitutes when the official heralding of the Exploitation Horn is heard? They're out there. I've seen 'em… Okay, I've met 'em. There're quite a lot of them. Sadly, from what I hear, the heterosexual ones are "forced" to accept male clients quite a lot, mainly because most women who really, really want sex simply have to ask the nearest man for free. Why don't these feminists ever explore that angle? Oh, that's right: women's studies!

I think it's more than that. After all, these are men. Men can look after themselves. Men are natural providers; they should figure out a way of providing for themselves. Men are generally smarter than women, physically stronger, tougher-minded, more solitary, territorial, better at navigation and spatial relationships, and have visibly accomplished far more in this world than women. If a man wants to be a prostitute, therefore, he simply cannot be exploited. Women, being generally weaker than men in every way, are too easily manipulated and pushed around. Therefore, men and women are not equal.

Whoops! How did a women's studies expert (who has probably never been laid properly) stumble on that conclusion?! That can't be right. Back to the drawing board, girls. It must be something else…

I'll tell you what it is, you coercive, death-oriented Madam of the Brothel of Feminist Nonsense: punishment for possessing a penis (or PPP for short). Prostitution, in general, pleases men. More specifically, it pleases the part of a man that he normally considers his favorite, virtually the only visible part of the anatomy that classifies him as a man at all: his dick. This marvelous organ is genetically pre-programmed to respond to anything soft, wet, and warm. Chiefly, it responds to pussy. Access to one may prove difficult for some men, so one more option for pleasuring the little guy is, from time to time, to pay for pussy. The only difference is, for access on an ongoing basis not only to pussy, but to all the other wonderful things a woman can bring into a man's life — her cooking, her femininity, her decorative abilities, her niceness, her gentleness, her sense of humor, her miraculous ability to create life, her nurturance, her innate intelligence — it is required of the man to pay up quite a lot more. The kind of body-bartering that Ms. G. Raymond opposes is actually far cheaper monetarily. Granted, there may be emotional or psychological side effects that the man or the woman finds displeasing, but all of that is so relative as to beggar belief. Ms. G. Raymond would have us believe otherwise.

Which is why rent boys are never mentioned. Being a male prostitute has nothing to do with PPP. Beyond that, it evens the field for playing victim, and the feminist/misandrist team wants to play where there's a little hill they can control. The men's team must always be at a disadvantage, or the game is called off. When a straight male prostitute takes it up the ass from a male client, as opposed to a straight female prostitute being sodomized, the idea of exploitation suddenly evaporates, in spite of the fact that the straight male prostitute will probably spend a great deal more time afterward in a much hotter shower to get the feel and stink of another man off of his body. (I've watched straight boys do it for money online — they genuinely do not like it. To be honest, I've tired of watching them. Misaporno, here I come!)

I am baffled by the article's obsession with European prostitution. Germany, of all places. A woman who finds herself selling her body in such a country is, at any given moment, a stone's throw away from any number of institutions that have spawned the world's greatest philosophers, composers, playwrights, poets, architects, artists, scientists, mathematicians, and economists. Beyond that, she is exposed every hour of every day to the onslaught of feminist ideology, enshrined in virtually every institution throughout Germany, including their mass media. Instead, that whore is taking the easy way out.

That isn't just a female trait: It's human. We all want the easy way out. Try going back to writing everything by hand. Try walking two miles to the store instead of driving. Try going back to office work without computers. Try washing your dishes, even your clothes, by hand. If you're Ms. G. Raymond, try doing something about prostitution purely voluntarily, as opposed to running off to bureaucracies with guns to make them do it. If humanity didn't want the easy way out, then a man with a gambling problem, who has solicited prostitutes in the past, would not suddenly embrace Jesus Christ as his Lord and Savior, supposedly wiping away his manifold sins in an instant. He also wouldn't have a car. Prostitution is easy for a great many women, because there are a great many men who aren't getting any, or not nearly enough. The ease of a career path does not equate with exploitation.

At what level is exploitation not up to individual interpretation, Ms. G. Raymond? She'll never have an answer, but the crowds will applaud her nonetheless, because if you bother to read her stupid article, you'll notice that much of what she says is simply a given. The article is not questioning the "evil" of prostitution; it merely questions how different European bureaucracies handle the "evil" itself. The article is not questioning who is responsible: Men are. The article is not questioning who the victims are: Women, and children who are lumped in sexless, with female adults engaging in volitional behavior that is inherently "evil."

In the article there is no mention of Denmark's record, a country where prostitution is semi-legal. (Maybe she couldn't find anything bad about Danish whores?) Instead, all the article says about semi-legal prostitution in other European countries is that: "In 2007, a federal government report found that the German Prostitution Act had not improved conditions for women in the prostitution industry nor helped them to leave. It had also failed 'to reduce crime in the world of prostitution.'" (I wonder what the odds are of an act being able to improve conditions for prostitutes when one of the intentions of the act is to help them leave prostitution.) What about The Netherlands, famous for its red light districts? "The government-commissioned 2007 Daalder report found that the majority of women in the window brothels are still subject to pimp control, and their 'emotional well-being is now lower than in 2001 on all measured aspects."

That's more arbitrariness and subjective description than I even care to think about, and that's just three sentences about two semi-legal countries. What conditions need improving? What are the crimes being committed, and should they be considered crimes, or are we just talking about volitional drug-taking? Define "emotional well-being," you self-righteous idiot. How many other horrible things have happened in this world since 2001 that might be having an impact on well-being? War? Recession? This ringing any bells?

The governments of Europe, who came along after the creation of human relationships, the division of labor, and the creation of currency, put themselves in charge of the money supply, embraced dangerous and foolhardy economic standards, and are now in the process of destroying the economy upon which these women depend for their very survival, and yet because hookers aren't completely happy, well Ms. G. Raymond now has a shot at the big time, so fuck all of that other stuff. When the economies of these First World countries finally do collapse, there will be a great many more women turning to prostitution to make ends meet. So much for women's studies.

But not for Ms. G. Raymond's ego. This has been the problem with progressive ideology all along. Results don't matter. What does matter is whether or not the feminist progressives in charge get laws passed that say what they want, and whether they also get the credit. Soon, women all over the continent of Europe will be scrounging for food, but at least Ms. G. Raymond and her lesbian lover will be safely insulated from the greater horrors, because they know how to play the political game. Alpha females who succeed on the backs of alpha males have no real need to explore the inner lives of female prostitutes, because they know how to direct the biggest and baddest guns, manufactured by men. PPP will thrive until there's nothing left to eat. You want to see exploitation? Lady, you ain't seen nothing yet!

Here's another article that argues for reduction in rape via legalization of "exploitative" prostitution. According to the author, "Using this model, it is estimated that if prostitution were legalized in the United States, the rape rate would decrease by roughly 25% for a decrease of approximately 25,000 rapes per year." Below is the list with the rate of rape sorted ascending:

As you can see, there are plenty of Portuguese dudes getting a piece, and look at their comparatively low rape and homicide rates. Portuguese prostitution is not prosecutable, unless a third party is involved. (No threeways?) Conversely, in Ms. G. Raymond's home country, where prostitution carries a terrible stigma (along with the male sex drive), and is still a prosecutable offense in most geographic locations, the rape and homicide rates are much higher, while the pussy action rate is much lower.

Color coding seems to indicate a trend of increased homicide and rape when there is less sex available, and the inverse when more men are getting laid. In fact, if you color code the countries and replace the rates (all ascending) with the names of the countries, you will see a very interesting trend. The color-coded countries at the top of the sex/month column (meaning very little humping going on) have a tendency to have higher rape and homicide rates:

The color-coded countries at the bottom of the list (meaning a lot of happy dicks) have a tendency to have lower rape and homicide rates (excepting The Netherlands, which oddly enough has the highest homicide rate):

[image]

Which goes along with what Angry Harry says: "Indeed, there is nowhere on this Earth where the people can be happy if the men are not happy." I have been amazed (and I truly mean this on an intellectual level), since fully embracing my sexuality, at how easy it is to please another man in bed. Happiness, it seems, comes quite naturally to men. No pun intended.

So here's a message for the man-hating Ms. G. Raymond: First of all, I will gladly take your supply of dick, since you don't want it. Secondly, in countries where more men are having sex, there is frequently less rape and less violence. This is probably because all that pent-up sexual energy has various outlets. If you put less legal stumbling blocks in the way of penises, they will search out what they want, and, quite literally, BOOM! Problem solved.

But Ms. G. Raymond will never listen. She is convinced of her own "superior" intellect, and since she now has a title with "emerita" in it, a Latin term for "accepted by the only tribe that matters," she can go on her merry way, now that decades of feminist thought, backed up by Puritanical beliefs that outlawed most of men's sexual desires centuries ago, have given her faulty premises the look and feel of solid foundations. Sadly for all of us, her baseless beliefs will lead to more government intrusion into the most private of matters, more PPP, a great many more angry and shamed men, a lot more unhappiness, more guys walking around with UXP (unexploded penises), more rape, and more homicide. At some point in the future, I'm sure Ms. G. Raymond will be living in a gated community. I would, too, if I could afford it. Unfortunately, I'm not "emerita" anything.

PRESS RELEASE

Contact: Teri Stoddard, 925-681-9654

WASHINGTON / September 9, 2010 – October is Domestic Violence Awareness Month, and this year the theme is “Domestic Violence: Understand the Truth, Stop the Abuse.”

To help abuse victims, S.A.V.E. has recently established an Online Support Group for survivors of domestic violence. The Support Group is designed to assist persons in their journey from hurting to healing to helping. Available in a Yahoo group format, the group is open all to victims and survivors of domestic violence.

In addition, S.A.V.E. has published a series of 11 tip sheets designed to help persons who are recovering from an abusive relationship. The sheets include a self-assessment checklist, safety plan, restraining order tips, and more. One sheet highlights how false allegations of abuse rob true victims of needed services and protections.

For those persons who want to receive announcements and updates, S.A.V.E. has also established a Facebook page called SAVE for Victims and Survivors.

Finally, S.A.V.E. has developed “Seven Key Facts About Domestic Violence,” featuring accurate information that is designed to debunk the widespread myths of partner abuse:http://saveservices.org/pdf/Seven-Facts-Every-American-Should-Know-About-DV.pdf

“We’ve made good progress in curbing the epidemic of partner abuse, but our journey is far from over,” warns Dr. Claudia Cornell, S.A.V.E. director. “Stop Abusive and Violent Environments expects these new online resources will help all victims of partner abuse, whether they are female or male, young or old, married or single.”

All resources for victims and survivors on the S.A.V.E. website are available free of charge: http://www.saveservices.org/victims-and-survivors/

As we approach Domestic Violence Awareness Month, S.A.V.E. calls on all Americans to consider the devastating effects of partner violence on our families and children, and work to stop intimate partner aggression in our communities.

A Lack of Rights for Men- A Mother Fights Back

Beth Lang · 11 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Do Men Really have Equal Rights?

It is a question I really never thought of until recently. It was just jast week, in fact, that I was sitting in a court room waiting for my 18 year old son's hearing to end. He was taken to court to pay child support for a child he did not want and did not agree to have, who he was, in fact, tricked into fathering by a dishonest young woman. Unfortunately, he was the "winner" of the paternity test (We were told it could have been one of three boys). I told my son he wasn't a winner at all, because being the winner of the DNA test he just lost everything that he doesn't even have yet.

While waiting in the filled court room, I sat there alone with my thoughts and worries about what was about to happen. Since he is 18 years old, I wasn't allowed to sit with him. He is considered an adult in the eyes of the court. An 18 year old boy with braces on his teeth, a sweet smile, and who still enjoys watching cartoons in the morning. As an adult, he is uneducated, underemployed, and naive enough to be duped by a pretty girl; damn, he doesn't even have his driver's license yet.

Millions of things were going through my head that day, but I was mainly thinking that I just wanted it to be over. Perhaps to escape, I was daydreaming about things I would rather be doing whenI heard his name being called.

And just like that the judge orders him to pay $759.46 per month plus $10,000 retro for the first year, plus court fees. I shook my head thinking I must have fallen asleep and was now in a nightmare. I had to gather myself together. I then whispered to an older man sitting beside me. "Did she just say $759.00 a month?" The man turned to me and said, "Yes, that dude must have a whole bunch of kids."

Sitting there in a room full of strangers, all from different walks of life, I felt more helpless than I have ever felt before. I felt powerless to defend my child. I stood up quickly and yelled "wait a minute there must be a mistake," though I think I remember uttering some swear words in the process. I said," this is wrong, how can this happen? " My son only works part time if he is lucky. He hardly makes enough money to survive himself. Now he was just ordered to pay this much a month for a child he never agreed to have?

There was yelling from the bench and I was ordered to sit down and be quite. I continued to demand an explanation. The judge pounded her gavel on the bench and ordered me out of her court room. I turned to my son son and said, " let's go. " The judge shouted back at me, " He is not going anywhere- I am not done with him yet. He leaves when I tell him to leave." As two deputies were walking towards me, I replied to her, " You are more than done with him. He is coming with me. Go ahead and try to stop me." I looked at my son and he looked scared to death; not sure which one of us he should listen too.

Where are his rights?

A woman has the right to abort, adopt, or abandon her baby and there are no consequences for her decisions. A woman can have an abortion and no one can force her to keep the baby regardless of the father's feelings. A woman is allowed to leave her baby in a safe place and walk away with no questions asked. A woman has the right to give her child up for adoption. It's wonderful our country gives woman such liberties. I am a woman and I am grateful I have these rights.

Why aren't men given these same rights?

Why are men forced to be fathers when they don't want to be? Why are men forced to pay child support for a child they did not want to have? Why are men allowed to be tricked into being a father? Why are men being punished for having sex?

There are many women who have lied or tricked the man so she would get pregnant. Because she wants a baby to love her, and she wants someone else to pay for it. Where is the woman's responsibility? Shouldn't we, as women, be responsible for our own bodies? Shouldn't that come with all these rights we have? Shouldn't we be the ones to reap the consequences if we get pregnant while we are single? I hear it so often about unwed women saying they are against abortion for religious reasons. Well, what about them having sex before getting married? They weren't thinking about God then- were they?

Feminism claims to promote the idea that women have the same equal rights as men.

From Wikipedia ~ In the subsequent decades women's rights again became an important issue in the English speaking world. By the 1960s the movement was called "feminism" or "women's liberation." Reformers wanted the same pay as men, equal rights in law, and the freedom to plan their families or not have children at all.

OK, if this is all about equality, then where are men's reproductive rights?

I want to see CHANGE, and I am prepared to fight for it. We need equal rights to be equal for both men and women. The system is unfair. Furthermore, the ridiculously high child support orders on impoverished men in this country is a form of slavery. And that is exactly what the courts are doing to my young son. They are turning him into a slave- and allowing the woman who deceived him become his master- his owner.

Courts that are supposed to find just solutions are now the main cause of the problem. The child support orders not only set financial expectations too high to meet, but it also forces young men to become criminals, and some even commit suicide. We criminalizing an entire class of human beings, and ignoring the real criminals who are behind all this.

Women can get off their butts, put their children in daycare, and get a job.

As long as we have "My body, my choice," shouldn't we also have "my responsibility," as well?

An Open Letter to Senator Charlie Justice

Beth Lang · 12 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Just recently, my son received his high school diploma. As you may understand from my previous article, he now lacks motivation to do much of anything. I am at his side pushing him to continue his life in a good decent direction.

Together, my son and I will refuse to let this evilness take control of him and bring him down. We refuse to let this situation make him become someone he is not. We refuse to let this issue stop him from obtaining his life's dreams!

Several weeks after the graduation ceremony, my son received a letter from Senator Charlie Justice. (he was a guest speaker at the ceremony) Basically, the letter congratulates my son and tells him about all the doors of possibilities he has opened and all the opportunities of success in his life.

If you can't tell already, I don't just sit down and be quite. Here is my reply to Senator Justice's letter.

September 7, 2010
Senator Charlie Justice
Gateway Executive Center
8601 4th St. N. Suite 100
St. Petersburg, Fl. 33702

Dear Senator Justice,

Thank you for the wonderful letter you sent to my son. Any words of encouragement are good for him to stay positive about his future. I was impressed to see you attend the graduation ceremony on [August] 26, 2010. I too am very proud of my son for his accomplishment. He knows how important it is to have a diploma and continue a higher education.

Sadly, unlike most nineteen year old boys, my son does not have the same doors open to many possibilities in his life. He will not have the same opportunities as others and will struggle to be successful. He has a lot stacked against him.

Like many young men, my son trusted a girl he was seeing; when she told him she was on birth control. Little did he know, girls don't always tell the truth. Nine months later a baby was born. He knows he has nothing to offer a child, a child my son did not want, a child he did not agree to have, and a child he was tricked into conceiving. Tyler was recently ordered to pay $759.46 a month in child support. He works part time and makes minimum wage. The judge imputed income based on what she feels he could be making. Not based on any employment history. Along with the ridiculous high monthly child support order, he was also ordered to pay $10,000 in arrears. I can not believe this is happening in the United States. Most men with educations do not make enough to pay that much in child support.

As I looked into this issue further, I discovered what a huge problem this is in Florida and the entire US for that matter. Where are the men's rights? Why it is okay for a woman to make the decision to have an abortion, adoption, abandon, or keep their child? A man has none of those choices. Why are unwed men forced into being fathers when they never wanted to be? I thought there were equal rights for everyone. Sadly, I am finding this is very untrue.

Along with hundreds of other men, my son's life is basically over. He has been given a death sentence. He will NEVER be able to meet the courts expectations. He can not continue his education because he needs to get a few more jobs to pay this debt he owes. As you know Florida is leading in unemployment. So when the judge told him he needs to get five jobs, I seriously think she forgot what state she is in. He will become so far behind in payments since he can not even come close to paying that amount. He will never be able to apply for a loan, save money, or obtain credit.

He risks having his driver license suspended and/or jail time if he gets too far behind. This is even more ridiculous. If these men have their licenses suspended and spend time in jail, this will put them even further behind. Senator Justice, I am sure you agree jail is for bad guys. It is not for men who are tricked into becoming fathers and who can not afford to pay such high amounts in child support.

Men are being punished for having sex. Where is the woman's responsibility? Why are women in control of a man's future? Why are women able to give up all rights to their child with no questions asked, but a man can not?

This is a major problem in our country. Young men are turning to lives of crime and some are committing suicide over this issue. Something needs to change. The ridiculously high support orders and the not so equal rights need to change. I feel the courts make it so high because they want these young men to fail. This isn't about a war on women and children & deadbeat dads. Women aren't the victims here. This is about unfair treatment to men. These women need to stand up and take responsibility of there own bodies and their own lives.

This letter to you is just the beginning of my journey to make people aware of this problem. The only thing that makes sense is there has to be a corruption between Child Support Enforcement and the Family Court system. I hope if this is true it will be discovered. All I want is for it to be equal and fair to both men and women.

I am looking to you for guidance. We need to get our legislators aware of this issue. It has been overlooked for far too many years. There are way too many good men who are loosing everything, as President Obama stated during his election, "We need CHANGE."

I look forward to your reply.

Respectfully,

Beth Lang

The Weakest Link

kevinbrian · 13 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Editors note: I first encountered this piece of writing almost two years ago on another website- one geared for writers. I have no doubt that many readers here will quickly understand why, when reading this, it registered so deeply with me, and why, at that time, I thought to myself- "if I realize my ambitions have a website with some decent traffic, then I will come back and ask for permission to run this one."

Today, I am affirmed, both by posting this with permission to my website, and again from having given it another read. -Paul

I woke from a stress dream this morning. In the dream it was 1992, and I was back working that $7 per hour temp job on a packing line at the Johnson Controls bottling plant in Merrimack, New Hampshire. My job was to hand-pack 16 Oz Poland Spring water bottles. Thousands of them every day.

Those bottles were the bread and butter of this plant. One of only two such staple lines, and both running 24/7/365 with no excuses. And the flow was unrelenting, moving at 4 units per second down a single-file guide line, burped straight from the dull green blow-molding behemoth; the whole act swinging through the air with no net – no rescues allowed. I was good, but no matter how fast I packed those bottles, that machine always seemed determined that I would lose the battle to keep its line clean of jams at my crucial end. Like the damn thing was setting me up for a disaster all day, every day.

As I tried to stay focused on restricting my entire body to that very specific suite of movements that ensure a premier execution of bottle packing process efficiency – eliminating all other extraneous physical motion – I began to realize that my bladder was launching a challenge to that restriction. In fact, in a determined effort to have an impact on the situation, it was offering a sudden and rapidly building pressure of its own, even as the pressure from the bottle line mounted steadily from instant to instant. I looked at the clock. It would be over an hour until my scheduled break, and every other line was slammed, with nothing but asses and elbows visible from one end of the plant to the other. No net, no rescues allowed, and my bladder didn't care about that line of 16 Oz Poland Springs bottles coming at the rest of me. Not at all. It'd decided that a show of force was in order.

As if it really needed to remind the rest of me what kind of influence it could exert if put to the test. Within minutes, the whole of me was suffering but by now I was determined. I'd be damned if I was going to be pushed around by a belligerent bag of piss.

At some point, I suppose I lost my concentration. Hell, it was inevitable. I don't remember the specifics, and really, what difference does it make?

As soon as my work flow skipped a beat, my line of 16 Oz Poland Spring water bottles jammed, and they jammed right in front of me. That blow-molding machine had won the battle, and there was no saving the established process, as it mashed its bottles into each other, crushing the entire line into one solid mass of PET plastic waste. New bottles from the machine were spit into the air and onto the floor to become instant casualties due to FDA regulations, and at that maximum four bottles per second rate of production efficiency. Me? I just stood there and surrendered to the fact that there was nothing that I could do to fix any of it.

My attention was suddenly directed to the machine's operator, who'd run across the floor to scream at me. Poor bastard. I kinda felt bad about his bottles spraying in every direction; lost as soon as they emerged from that big green contraption he served. The monster couldn't be shut down without a five minute wind-down process, or the thing would…I don't know…eat itself or something. Who knows. It wasn't my job to know why the damn thing was going to need five minutes to stop turning perfectly good bottles into complete garbage. I just knew it would. Everyone knew.

As he yelled at me, I silently calculated the loss, 4 bottles per second –60 seconds per minute – 240 bottles per minute – times 5 minutes. I didn't want to make things worse by telling him that the longer he berated me, the more bottles his machine was going to send to the recycling grinder. I figured he probably knew. Like I said, we all knew.

After a while, he was replaced by the floor supervisor, a small man with an even smaller voice, whose waving arms let me know of his disdain for my inability to hold up my end of this enormously valuable endeavor, as sirens wailed, lights flashed, and the wheels of large, corporate profit ground slowly toward an inevitable halt around me.

As the deafening one-per-second boom of the blow-mold machine fell silent for the first time in the five months I'd worked there, I took the ear plugs out and listened to the little guy who raged on before me. I learned about how much money I'd just lost for his bosses, and I learned about how much they pay him to deal with worthless, irresponsible losers like me. I learn about why the plant's staff had decided to replace their permanent floorworkers with temporary scum – scum like me – as this policy made it easier for them to replace that scum with other scum when that scum finally showed everyone why it was scum in the first place and would always be scum.

I never said a word. I just took it in and let the guy rant. After all, his bosses were paying him a lot of money to rant, and I was happy to let them get their money's worth as I stood there and let the man to do his job.

When he was done, I smiled and pointed to the carnage that surrounded us.

"I did all this at only seven dollars per hour," I said, "and without a contract or benefits. Hell, I did it without even trying."

Then I handed him my ear plugs and walked toward the door to the break room. By the time I reached the time clock, I heard two other line sirens go off. Two other temps must've realized the power they held in their weary hands. The power they'd always held, and at seven dollars per hour; without a contract or benefits. I didn't bother to calculate the impact on the company's bottom line. I just punched out and headed for the door.

I woke up at that moment.

The weakest link reigns over the entire chain, and if that link is deliberately denied what it needs to ensure the integrity of that chain, then whose fault is it when the chain fails? This is a truth that business ignores on a daily basis, and at its own collective peril. That blow mold machine operator never held the power to ensure that line, and neither did that floor supervisor. The power was always solely in my hands, even as those two milled around and busied themselves with their little fidgets, while I sweated from minute to minute, hour to hour, and day to day, trying my best to keep their bottles flowing into 24 count cardboard cases at the rate of 4 bottles per second.

I get the feeling that if every other no-account, temp scum that shows up each day to that same high pressure onslaught of corporate disdain took a moment to let their line jam, we'd see some lower and middle management heads roll. Then, once those heads started rolling, we might see them react with some sudden resistance to the upper management's downhill shit-roll, and who knows where it all might end once that progression begins its own trajectory within the corporate structure.

A fish rots from the head; meaning that, ultimately, systemic decline descends from the top. We know this is true, but we also know that renewal rises from the bottom, from that foundation that provides stability to the whole. If that foundation is decimated, there is no renewal; and no amount of effort will succeed in bringing that whole back to sustainability.

I got to wake up from my stress dream, but what's happened over the last few years to our economic structure isn't a dream. The foundation needs to be repaired if we want the renewal that only it can provide. Bailouts for the top won't force the foundation to support what it's already decided to abandon as repugnant and destructive to its own viability.

The foundation of this economy, those temp scums that can be replaced with other temp scums, aren't worried about the failures in the boardrooms on Wall Street. Why should they be worried? Their lot won't change either way, and it was insanity for the top to re-engineer the structure to insult its own foundation in the first place. The talking heads tout the business owner as the foundation of this economy. That assertion is now being debunked, as the real foundation – the waged worker – is deciding that they see no value in supporting that which crushes down upon them, and has always crushed upon them; even in the best of times.

In my dream, I watched thousands of dollars evaporate in lost productivity and spoiled inventory and did so at my own earn rate of 11.6 cents per minute. My loss was minimal. I could spare it without raising my stress levels. Certainly without lifting them near the levels that my service to that productivity had raised them. The same holds true for the foundation of this economy as it emerges from the fog of its own leveraged acquisitions. Buying that it had engaged in on behalf of those who profited alone from their dedicated efforts. Their unrewarded spending is done. "Let the damn line jam, and to hell with the sirens." They seem to sense that it's time for the top to lift a finger on its own behalf.

And if not, then to hell with all of it. The beauty of living low is that there's no fall to worry about. You're on the ground, and below that…well, there is no below that. When it all crashes around you, it's you who now owns the neighborhood where everything has just found its new home. When the structure craters, relative wealth is the only wealth, and if you own the ground, you get to set the terms for a change. Just like when, in my dream, I handed the floor supervisor my ear plugs and walked easily to the door, as my peers came to the same conclusion concerning their respective lines.

Let it fail if that's what the structure demands through its undeniable disdain for its own foundation. Let it crash. The foundation will still be there. It will become the foundation for something else. Maybe something better? Maybe something more aware of the value that sits directly beneath it, and provides it stability? Or maybe not? Maybe it's a cycle that needs to be repeated again and again, as one empire inevitably falls to allow for the rise of the next?

Whatever. I sit at the foundation. I can't fall. I can only sit here and watch it all crash around me.

From the Publisher of MenZ Magazine

Tom Givens · 14 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Alright, so here it is folks, issue 2 of MenZ magazine. A lot of people have asked me if this magazine is an MRA zine, basically a continuation of MrM!, or if it's something else.

Here's the answer. It's something else.

Much of the Men's Movement is finger pointing and blaming, and while this is indeed the role of much of activism, it's not the whole picture.

We need to begin to address some of the issues facing men head on. Issues like Male Suicide, and the Government complacency about same. Or unequal treatment before the law, or simply the way boys are raised to be sacrificial lambs for the nearest woman.

The men's movement is not simply about attacking Feminism, even if that route is the most effective one to combat the hatred of men. Chivalry plays a large role in the predicament men find themselves in. So does acquiescence to vague assertions of 'authority' over common decency or sense.

We live in a time when no one can be taken seriously unless they have a degree. That nothing can be known without first being officially 'studied'. We live in a time when "Appeal to Authority" is not only acceptable, but the law of the land in many cases.

Just as there is no requirement that one have a degree in Women's Studies in order to criticize Feminism (yet), it's equally valid to say one can criticize anything political without a Political Science degree, and for that matter one can question Science without having a degree in a STEM subject as well.

Frankly, if the 'expert' can't explain these questions in plainly understood language, there's something fishy going on. Usually, when people try to hide something behind their 'expertise', they say it's 'too complicated' to solve easily…but don't explain why.

'Too complicated' to talk about, but vitally important to implement…of course…

Well, right here in this magazine, we delve into those things the Politicians and Lawyers want you to think are 'too complicated' for the average person. We ask the questions that journalists in the Mainstream Media seem to continually 'forget' to ask. We explore ideas deemed 'too controversial' by the media (meaning too critical of PC sacred cows), and expose their hypocrisy and that of the Political Class.

In short, we ask questions the Establishment doesn't want you to know even exist, let alone hear answered. And we credit our readership with the intelligence to make their own decisions.

Sound like a big grab bag of hyperbole to you? Can't believe there could be anything left that opens your eyes and gives you a 'eureka!' moment?

Well, come on by menzmagazine.blogspot.com, give an issue or two a read, and decide for yourself…

When is it OK to Punch Your Wife?

Paul Elam · 14 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It might be easy to think that the title to this piece is simple provocation, a tool to inspire people, perhaps mislead them, through sparking an angry reaction or just plain morbid curiosity, into taking a look at what this article is about.

Even though the thrust here is slightly different than the title would imply, there is no deception here at all. The question is serious, and the answer, to be certain, is so clear it need not take an entire article to address.

When is it O.K. to punch your wife? Well, anytime you are defending yourself from her physical attack. You have the right, at that moment, legally and morally, as is explicit in every legal model I know of, to use whatever force is necessary to protect yourself.

Ah, but you really don't, which is of course the real purpose of this article, and a purpose well worth study and consideration.

You see, the surface answer about self defense only applies in the world of legal theory and the land of ought-ta-be.

In the real world, where we actually live, the preponderance of people, from your friendly neighborhood patriarch to his twin sister the Gloria Steinem clone, see this type of dialog as a reason to go nuclear. In fact, I knew that the title would be provocative precisely because we live in a culture where I am not supposed to even ask such a thing. It's like asking when it is OK to hunt an endangered species, or steal a senior citizens social security check, or joke about children with cancer.

And people, whether it is women gone insane with the power of the pussy pass, or the men who are in fact the underwriters of those passes, will surely bring their wrath down upon you. They will rush in to scream, "You NEVER hit a woman! NEVER, NEVER, NEVER!"

I can just see the bulging veins in their necks, their flushed cheeks, and spittle flying from their mouths.

And of course they are right. A man should never hit a woman.

NEVER.

Not if he knows what is good for him.

It's not because some women don't deserve it. Heck, there is many a woman that righteously deserves a foot being broken off in her ass. You read about them a lot these days; women who beat and abuse their partners, who poison them, who hire paid killers to take them out, who shoot and stab and cut their husbands and boyfriends in their sleep, who run them down and kill them in cars, who get other thugs to torture and abuse them.

There are women, and plenty of them, for which a solid ass kicking would be the least that they deserve; where any justice at all would deliver to them the executioners needle. But hey, we can't even defend ourselves against them, so it makes perfect sense that they won't find themselves on the wrong side of the glass window in a death chamber-no matter what they do.

The real question here is not whether these women deserve the business end of a right hook, they obviously do, and some of them deserve one hard enough to leave them in an unconscious, innocuous pile on the ground if it serves to protect the innocent from imminent harm.

The real question is whether men deserve to be able to physically defend themselves from assault when it comes from a woman. Does the concept of self defense even apply to men who are the victims of violent females? Technically, the law says yes. But the people around you, especially the ones with guns, regard the pussy pass as a higher authority.

You hit a woman, even in self defense; indeed if you even call the cops on one that is beating the crap out you, the beta thugs we have come to call police will come round to your house and deliver some fucking law and order- on you.

I know, I just crossed another line. This time that thin blue one. Just like asking when it is alright to punch your wife, I am breaking a social gag order to point at police, rather at what police have become, and speak the truth.

But of course, that is how the police ended up doing what they are doing- by everyone keeping their mouths shut.

I respect the idea of police work very much. I have known many in law enforcement, including members of my family.

I also know that street cops are obliged to follow department policy, no matter how screwed up it is, or face losing their jobs. For that reason alone I have taken a soft line with the police for a long time.

In other words, I have been a part of the problem. I hate those kinds of look-in-the-mirror moments, but there is only one thing you can do with them- freaking fix the problem. And so I am here to start.

If you are willing to keep your job as a police officer by taking an abused man to jail for the sake of department policy or convenience, or even for your job, then you lack the integrity to be a public servant. Please take off your badge and resign. I am sure there are openings in the nearest street gang- where rule by force, not law, is much more your cup of tea.

Or perhaps you like your position a beta male thug enforcer. Perhaps you don't care who you cuff and cage as long as it gives you a hard on. Either way, I am tired of the public overlooking your actions, and worse, patting you on the back for being morally bankrupt and abusing innocent men.

Lest you think I am being over reactive about just how far the police have gone. Let's take a look at a case or two.

In Sacramento, California David Woods's wife Ruth took their young daughters outside in 39 degree temperatures, for seven hours, till their lips were blue and they were borderline hypothermic. After she returned, Woods argued with his wife about her actions, till she grabbed a serrated kitchen knife and stabbed at him. The blade passed through the collar of his shirt and actually gave him a small nick in the flesh of his neck. Apparently unsatisfied, she reared back to stab him again, but this time he hit her in the mouth. She dropped the knife and ran to call 911. Sacramento Sheriffs Deputies arrived at the scene to intervene, drew their guns, and slapped cuffs- on Mr. Woods.

They were preparing to take him to jail, over his protests, but it was the daughters, who insisted that the deputies listen to them (they sure as hell were not listening to him), that finally prevented them from taking their father to jail and leaving them alone with the disturbed and violent mother.

But, they did not take the mother anywhere either. They released Woods from his handcuffs advised him to get her to counseling.

After the incident Woods was quoted as saying, "Now, isn't that strange? When she had a fat lip it was a felony and I was going to jail. But when they finally realized she tried to stab me in the neck, it stopped being a crime and became a mental health issue."

Woods is not alone. This sham is passing for good police intervention on family violence in every major city in the country. From L.A. to New York City, police are embracing policies for handling domestic calls that can only be described as politically motivated, simple minded and criminal.

Whatever happens, arrest the guy, unless someone beats you over the head hard enough with the truth that you have no choice but to consider arresting whatever aggressor the evidence points to.

In doing this, our police, with our absolute complicity, have gone from being public servants to public menaces, trampling on victims, enabling criminals- mindlessly obeying department policy to the point that Gestapo references would not be overblown.

Their handling of domestic disputes is part of the a massive roll back in civil and constitutional rights and they need to be called to task for it.

Consider the following clip from ABC news that measures reactions of people to seeing a man violently abused by a woman.

Predictably, few people cared at all, one even celebrated the guy getting a beating, and most just decided on their own that he had it coming, but most telling is the cop that walked past this scene doing nothing and later told reporters, “Yeah, if it had been the other way around I would have definitely done something.”

Then he excused it by talking about how he was raised, admitted that it was a double standard, but informed us that even being confronted with it was going to change nothing.

“Hey, it is what it is,” he says.

Consider the recent story out of Orlando, Florida, regarding the false rape accusation epidemic. Even in that situation, as reported by police themselves, they do not want to arrest women– simply because they are women. The pussy pass is police issue.

Note the basic turn of events. Man angers women. Women attack, verbally and physically. Man refuses to comply. Women call police. Women lie. And lie again. And lie again. And lie again.

Police office treats the man as though he is the problem, going as far as to tell him that he cannot disrespect women.

Any thoughts on what would have happened if this man were not smart enough to film his actions?

And this is what we have, people. From rape allegations to domestic disputes, to civil protests, we have police that are badge wearing, gun toting enforcers of feminist governance. They are either too poorly trained, or too brainwashed or too stupid to realize the socially destructive nature of their actions.

So when is it Ok to punch your wife? Ask David Woods, he’ll tell you. Don’t defend yourself. Don’t expect help. Just run. Forget your property. Forget justice. And get a hotel because there won’t be a safe house. Not for you.

If you are a man in this culture and you are unfortunate enough to have an altercation with a woman, you know who is coming to take care of things, don’t you?

That’s right, the Sacramento Sherriff’s Department. Or maybe the Orlando police, or maybe that muscle bound cop in the park who would walk past you getting beaten like he was a fry cook instead of a law enforcement officer.

Whoever comes, they are not about the any law except her law, and you will find that out as they put the handcuffs on you and haul your ass to jail for having been stupid enough to expect them to do the right thing.

Let that sink in. Let it sink in any way you like, but I advise you to get it on your way out of her reach, and theirs.

This ain’t no country for men, any more.

Dick's Corner – Gender Studies Bias

dickelfen · 15 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: As we continue our efforts to shine the light of truth on the darkness of cultural misandry, the need for current, credible information is always a constant. To offer his personal contribution to that end, Dick Elfenbein, an advocate for Male Studies and long time journalism and communications expert has volunteered to offer his considerable expertise in bringing needed facts to the table for the benefit of the men's community.

In Dick's Corner, Mr. Elfenbien will bring his periodic observations and findings to the readers of A Voice for Men, in short and concise format, so that activists may consider it in their future work and so that everyone may have it as food for thought in the present. With thanks to Dick, here is the first installment of Dick's Corner- PE

VERMONT UNIVERSITY WOMEN'S AND GENDER STUDIES FOCUS ON THE TRANSGENDERED WHILE IGNORING MEN

Futher evidence, if any is needed, that the voice for men has been muted, at least in reference to "gender studies," comes from the University of Vermont.

That state supported institution announced that beginning with this fall term it has added a visiting lecturer who will supplement its existing academic offerings in Women's and Gender Studies with a course on "Trans/gender Identities, Communities, and Politics" which the new faculty member said "focuses on the ways in which trans people negotiation (sic) their identities across a variety of social situations, from bathroom use to clothes shopping and international air travel."

Despite the fact that the academic program's name includes the word "gender", which Webster's Dictionary defines as meaning "a set of two or more categories , as masculine, feminine, and neuter," there is no reference to anything masculine –men, males or boys–in descriptions of its 30 plus courses. The absence of references to males whose sex is determined by the presence of XY chromosomes and who constitute 50 plus percentage of the world's population is particularly interesting when contrasted with the transgendered population estimates which range from .01 per cent to .001 (or for those of us who are decimally challenged, the range is from one in 10,000 to one in 100,000).

Dick Elfenbein is a veteran journalist, communications professional and former university professor. He taught communications and public relations at the Rutgers University Graduate School of Business and Fairleigh Dickinson University. He began his journalism career with the Bergen Record of Hackensack, NJ and was a reporter and copy editor for Fairchild Publications before joining the The Voice of America during the cold war era and moving on to NBC Radio News as a writer/editor. Later, he was a communications executive with IBM and for more than two decades a consultant to major domestic and foreign corporations. He is currently the chair of a New York City not for profit educational foundation and research director and board member of the Foundation for Male Studies.

Death Row and the Pussy Pass

Paul Elam · 17 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap] suppose I should out myself from the beginning as being opposed to the death penalty. At the very least I'm against it till we develop a system that assures 100% certainty that we are killing the right person, and that assures that every deserving scumbag gets an equal chance at the needle.

We are nowhere near that competent, or even concerned about getting it right for that matter, so I remain at the default position of con.

That being said, in regards to the September 23rd scheduled execution of Teresa Lewis in Virginia, I have an amended position.

Let's throw some burgers on the grill, crack open a few cold ones, and watch them ice this murdering bitch on pay-per-view. Or maybe we could tweak the date a little and do it at half time of a football game. Terry Bradshaw could do the play by play.

[image]
Teresa Lewis
We'll put Sponge Bob on DVD in the other room for the kids.

I'm not just fascinated by the Lewis case because executions of women are rare. Though they are, exceedingly. Since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976, there have been over 1,200 executions in the United States. A whopping 11 of them, or less than 1%, were women. Lewis will, if not saved by the Supreme Court or the Virginia Governor, be the first dead woman walking in that state in 98 years.

This stands in pretty stark contrast considering women commit, by DOJ estimates, 10% of all murders, are involved in 35% of all domestic homicides (are involved means, like Lewis, they get other people to kill for them) and nearly 30% of murders where the victim was another family member.

On death row, it seems, the vagina exemption is almost a given.

And that really is what makes this particular case so interesting. It is not just that female executions don't keep up with female criminality, it's why they don't. And that requires us to take another much needed look at that most peculiar of growing social phenomenon, the pussy pass.

From all the evidence available, Lewis used her pussy to get into this trouble and now wants to use it to avoid paying the price. For the latter she is getting a lot of help; that coming from her attorneys, but bolstered by a gynocentric media that is reaching a frothing and feverish pitch in activism on her behalf.

On the surface, it might appear that they have a case to make for her.

One of Lewis's hired killers, 22 year old Matthew Shallenberger, is alleged to have written a letter in which he claims to have manipulated Lewis, who reportedly has a low I.Q., into the crime. Apparently, the boy had Game, but not on a level that helped him with the state. He killed himself after getting a life sentence.

Lewis's lawyers have had trouble getting the letter admitted into evidence.

It is also the contention of her counsel, with supporting expert opinions, that Lewis has a Dependent Personality Disorder, which makes her susceptible to being manipulated by men.

That's clinical speak for the pussy pass. It has to be the man's fault, right? Women don't do these things unless someone makes them, and that someone is always a man.

But there are some other inconvenient facts around the case that don't work in Lewis's favor. For instance, there was an earlier failed plot to kill her husband and step son, and to help seal the deal Lewis had taken her 16 year old daughter to have sex with the second gunman, 19 year old Rodney Fuller. Apparently it was all the encouragement he needed.

Also, in consideration is the fact that Lewis financed the purchase of the weapons, left the front door of the home unlocked so that the gunmen could slip in and waited over 30 minutes as her husband lay bleeding to death before calling 911. It was actually the husband, Julian, who stubbornly clung to life long enough to tell the police at the scene that his wife knew the people who shot him, that quickly put investigators onto Lewis as the culprit. When she broke under questioning, she told investigators she did it for the money.

It would be easy enough to argue that any of that could still be consistent with her attorney's assertion that this was a simple minded woman who got drawn in by a more intelligent and manipulative mastermind.

The only problem with that is that it really doesn't matter. Death chambers have taken the lives of many men of low intelligence and who were highly impressionable. But there is not a penis pass, so they get the needle anyway.

And as you peruse the headlines of any of about a hundred news stories currently running on Lewis's execution, you get the real reason for wanting to save her from her debt to society.

She is, well, a she. Lack of intelligence and impressionability aside, the one thing every news agency, and her lawyers keep hammering on to the public is that we are about to kill a woman. The rest is just window dressing that can be seen on every death row appeal ever written in the last hundred years.

Low intelligence means nothing, unless it is low enough that the person cannot comprehend the nature of their acts, or tell the difference between right and wrong.

All of Lewis's behaviors, before the murders and up to this very moment are bombastic advertising that she knew exactly what she was doing and knew that it was wrong. And all we are witnessing now is a society struggling to cling to the idea that a woman's life, even a calculated killer, is more valuable than a man's.

I think we should start sending female killers to death row, and keep sending them, until we finally get smart enough to give this stupid and vile form of sexism its swan song; until we execute our own bigotry.

And if you are against the death penalty, this would be the wisest strategy to pursue. If you really want to end capital punishment, start executing women every time they legally deserve it. The death chambers would shut down overnight. And if that is not a sign of a very sick society, nothing is.

The Great White Lie

Like most good anarchists, I read Antiwar.com on a regular basis. They are to be commended for the outstanding work they do, and for the fact that they do it with such consistency. Recently, James Bovard posted an entry in the blog concerning the Obama Administration's refusal to permit discovery in the case of Maher Arar, a man who was tortured in Syria after "his" government in Canada willingly and volitionally worked with "our" government in supplying false information, leading to his arrest and deportment. The comment I left at Antiwar under Bovard's blog post has been removed. It was brief and somewhat sarcastic, but I thought the point was clear. Perhaps it was a technical glitch, or the comment was taken at face value instead. I posted a far lengthier comment at Chris Floyd's invaluable website, and I hope he'll keep it there, because my reaction to the Canadian government's complicity in this man's torture is not unwarranted.
Neither Bovard nor Floyd expounded much on the Canadian side of this issue, perhaps because the Canadian government apparently apologized and made some financial compensation to Mr. Arar. (There was even some mention somewhere on the web that they may not have cooperated had they known he would be sent to Syria. I will not bother linking, because I feel it is largely irrelevant.) The way that these issues are normally approached, this is the reaction people often have, I suppose, when a government "remedies" one of its many wrongs. Therefore, I cannot intelligently comment on Bovard's or Floyd's opinion of the Canadian government's involvement or subsequent "sorrow." I can only give you my view of this "apology." Brace yourself.

The Canadian government is "sorry"? So what? After being tortured in a Third World prison, a nightmare from which you may never see yourself rescued, when just days before you were standing in an airport in the midst of one of the world's most peaceful and prosperous cities, so what? Mr. Arar is my age. I grew up in a peaceful American suburb, where my parents still leave the doors unlocked all day long, even when they've left the house for several hours and gone miles away. Mr. Arar grew up in Syria. What would it be like for such a man to come to this continent when he's 17 and see what life is like here, to get used to it, to rely upon it, to enjoy it? Then the government that promises all of this and more shows its true colors (the red in their flag is apparently no accident), cooperates with a neighboring government in supplying false information, and is complicit in sending an innocent, peaceful, married father in his thirties straight to hell, to be beaten for hours at a time, days on end, with shredded cables, while listening to other men scream. For this, they are "sorry," after months of legal negotiations with his expensive lawyer whose every action is regulated by them. So what?

Now, I'm an overly sensitive individual. That's just my nature. If something this horrendous happened to me, I probably would not survive it, at least not emotionally. It is entirely possible that Mr. Arar is a lot tougher. Maybe he's able to pick up the pieces of his life and move on. Maybe he has a supportive wife, and maybe his two kids are just adorable. They are now millionaires, thanks to the Canadian government's marvelous ability to steal money, so perhaps this will give him some comfort. In short, maybe Mr. Arar will be able to find joy once again in his life. Again I say: So — the fuck — what?

A man's ability or inability to overcome a year of being subjected to the absolute worst of humanity, abhorrent behavior on par with Nazi atrocities, the Rape of Nanking, and Hiroshima, coupled with a legally acceptable apology, does not compensate for the irreparable damage done. The Canadian government — the bureaucrats who followed him, spied on him, informed on him, stalled his government-approved lawyer for months, and stole money from innocent bystanders to pay for their sickening actions — have gotten off scot-free. Not a single one of them was beaten with a shredded cable, even once. And two Internet writers, whose abilities and intelligence outshine mine at every turn, had too little to say about this aspect of the story. They rightly condemned the government claiming lordship over this part of the land mass, but it's not enough.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Canadian government's actions, the United States government's actions, the Syrian government's actions, are all the same. They are all complicit. They are all filled with people who think that stealing for the government is "morally good" while all other stealing is "morally bad," and needs to be hidden from the peasants when they do it regularly. They are all comprised of people who think that killing when the government says to is "necessary and proper" while all other killing is "suspect and dangerous," therefore, when it hasn't been passed into law, they have to cover it up. They are now filled with people who think that torturing terrorists is "acceptable" but torturing innocents is "unconstitutional," hence their torturing of Mr. Arar has to be legally compensated. These governments may also be comprised of a few people who are willing to say that stealing is stealing and murder is murder, but who also mistakenly believe that if we just change one or two aspects of this law or that constitution, we will have the necessary checks and balances in place; if we just go back to what Jefferson talked about — a man who owned other people, who refused to give them their liberty, who purchased massive amounts of land out from under the people who depended upon it for their lives and did so with other people's money, who sat atop the bureaucracy for eight years — then we'll be just fine. Then Mr. Arar won't be tortured anymore.

The government is a system of initiatory coercion. Coercion leads directly and immediately to death, which I hope to explain in a follow-up article in greater detail. [Author's Note: The article has since been written, entitled "Coercion Is Death."] In short, coercion, being an anti-individual phenomenon, leads to four deaths in succession, as I see it now. Coercion first kills volition, then relationships, then wealth, and finally, when it goes on long enough, the individual himself. Of course, if someone puts a gun to your head, or beats you hard enough with a shredded cable, all four deaths happen at once, but never out of that order. Permit me to make a syllogism based on this conclusion:

Major premise: Coercion leads directly and immediately to death, therefore it is death.
Minor premise: The government cannot exist without first initiating coercion.
Conclusion: Government is death.

I submit to you that this is not my opinion, but a logical conclusion based on fact. If, prior to my publishing another article about the nature of coercion, any readers have any facts concerning this phenomenon that have not yet sunk into my smaller-than-average brain, please feel free to let me know. But if I'm right, think about that fact: Government is death. Not government is "evil," or government is "unnecessary," or government is "too big," or government is "useless." That's just opinion. (Four of mine, actually.) I'm talking about irrefutable fact: Government is death.

The death-oriented government of Canada went after one of its own because of his odd name, his light-brown skin and his handsome but unusual beard. They initiated coercion against Mr. Arar; therefore, they have permanently killed a part of his individuality, a part that might have been shared with at least two other individuals who are dependent on him, physically and emotionally (remember what I said about the death of relationships). I wonder if any responsible journalist will ever follow up on his two kids, named Barâa and Houd, a few years from now, when they are young adults. I wonder what they'll say about what, if anything, has changed about their dad. They may never know, but because of what I know about coercion, most especially the type of sickening, soul-wrenching coercion used on Mr. Arar, although he himself may never fully know, some very significant part of him is now dead. Forever. For which the Canadian government is safely, legally sorry, with other people's money. I'm sure every bureaucrat involved in this sordid bloodletting has been fired. (I hope that sarcastic comment doesn't get accidentally deleted.)

As I did in my remarks at Chris Floyd's website, let me relate a story I just finished reading not too long ago, about a man who was willingly tortured to "cure" his homosexuality at my alma mater back in the 1970s (quote from Connell O'Donovan):

"I also personally recall an Affirmation meeting [a support group for gay Mormons] in 1988 when a man showed up calling himself only David. He sat alone in a corner during our meeting and became extremely jittery when anyone approached him. I spoke with him but he requested that I remain at least six feet in distance away from him. He then rolled up his shirtsleeves and showed me his arms. The deeply scarred skin on the inside of his arms looked like raw hamburger and I almost vomited from the sight. He informed me that he had participated in electric shock therapy at BYU in 1977 and had been allowed to turn up the voltage as high as he wanted to. The results were badly burned arms and a complete inability to come physically close to any male without him emotionally breaking down from the trauma. His homosexual desires were as strong as ever but he was unable to touch another man even for a simple hug, he had no heterosexual desires whatsoever, and he was constantly on the verge of suicide. David never returned to Affirmation and I suspect from his fragile emotional state that he did not survive his ordeal for much longer."

Also as I pointed out at Floyd's website, "This is what a man who has been tortured WILLINGLY goes through. What does a man who is in fear for his very life endure?… [Arar] is forever changed, forever scarred. He is damaged goods. He will never look at the world the same way again. He is just as traumatized, if not much more so, than every broken, indoctrinated soldier returning from this war."

This is what the Canadian government, its subsequent investigations (paid for with stolen money), its bloviating, its legal maneuvering, its "shock" at its own misdeeds, its unforgivable complicity, has wrought. This is what the government will always deliver after promising freedom and security. This is government. This is coercion. This is death. And virtually everyone with whom you come into daily contact believes in this institution.

Eternal shame on the government of Canada.

Feminist Frankenstein Experiment

Paul Elam · 23 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This video is a discussion of Rebecca Walker's fine article called "How My Mother's Fanatical Feminist Views Tore Us Apart". If you're not familiar, the gist of the article is this: Radical feminist has a daughter. Daughter gets married to an evil patriarch. Feminist mother disowns daughter for not hating men enough.

The most fascinating part of the article is that it almost sounds like it was written by an MRA. It seems no one is more capable to see the vile misandry inherent in a professional feminist – than is the daughter of a radical feminist author.

Shrugging Misandry

Paul Elam · 25 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The men's movement has long carried with it a strong undercurrent of frustration. We lack organization, have made all but inconsequential progress on the political and legal fronts, and remain on the outside of an impenetrable wall around the mainstream media. Countless times the ambitions of MRA's start up in a flash and falter as just as quickly. Uncle Zed himself has dubbed our tendency to undermine any emergent leaders, and each other, as The Circular Firing Squad.

In other words, we are doing just fine, thank you very much.

The negatives are real, but let's put a little perspective on this. First, it is critically important to consider that any movement a mere 40 or 50 years old is in its infancy. For women, it was 72 years between Seneca Falls and the 19th amendment; almost 50 years after that before mainstream feminism took hold, and still another 25 or so years before gender activists really started getting the power to destroy families and generally fuck up everything else they touched. That is roughly 150 years from inception to the resultant destruction.

And that was in a culture where base biology drives men to throw each other under the bus in order to open doors for women- and drives women to feel entitled to that kind of paid-for-in-blood privilege.

Following the feminist example is thus an ineffectual and agonizingly slow road for men. Feminists were able to whine their way into de facto governance by the same forces that quash men's grievances faster than they can be stated.

It all boils down to two simple but insurmountable equations.

Women's whining = pursuit of justice. Men's pursuit of justice = whining.

Trying to reason with or educate people in a culture where this mindset is biologically rooted is absolutely foolish. The people we would engage view all forms of support for men like they were dirty hypodermic needles scattered across a schoolyard playground.

Allow me to expand on this.

I recently read an article on a feminist website, Sociological Images, authored by a couple of female Ph. D's, in which one of the comments named yours truly as an MRA who wrote about men's superiority over women, and yet another person who commented said they visited A Voice for Men and found a lot of whining going on here.

Par for the course, right?

But let's just run a short comparison to further demonstrate what I am talking about.

Recently on A Voice for Men, we have engaged in the standard discussions that relate to men in modern culture: A police state that arrests and incarcerates male victims of domestic violence and enables female perpetrators to continue criminal behavior; a ten to one death gap concerning capital punishment that works against men; a five to one death gap against men related to suicide; the staggering attrition of males in higher education and employment; the utter lack of reproductive rights for men, and the incidence of false rape allegations against men which even the police are calling epidemic.

And that is just the past two weeks.

On the other hand, the article from which the comments I cited at Sociological Images was about:

Rulers.

No, not heads of state. Measuring sticks. The kind that sell for $1.19 in your grocery store. It seems the fembots in question found a line of rulers commemorating great scientists of history, and a woman scientist, Marie Curie, had her own ruler under the heading of “Great Women Rulers of Science.”

That’s the horrific injustice that pissed off the author.

Her problem was (or at least appeared to be) that the women were separated from the men, giving us a default position of men as human and women as, uh, something else. Perhaps something less.

But wait a second. For half a century feminists have shrieked and bellowed and raged to get us to recognize women; often insisting we deluge them with pomp and ceremony, even over some of their more mediocre accomplishments. And let’s face it, even after 50 years of efforts for inclusion and assisted access for women into all realms of modern life, mediocre accomplishments are as good as it gets.

Still, when it comes to their demand for recognition, earned or otherwise, we have surrendered our reason (see: psychobiology) and complied. But now, even acting out of that acquiescence, and giving Marie Curie her own 12 inches of fame, this is somehow an affront. We have insulted all women, relegating them to subhuman status, by lauding their accomplishments in the “wrong” way.

And we are the whiners?

And that is really the point here. These educated idiots aren’t some isolated group of imbeciles. Well, they aren’t isolated, anyway. They are not operating outside of mainstream consciousness. They are mainstream consciousness. The sooner we get a firm and comprehensive grip on that, the better.

The current mentality toward men mirrors that toward blacks in the antebellum south. And no, I am not comparing the struggles of modern men to black slaves. Not at all. I am, however, most certainly comparing the mentality of modern women to that of slave owners, complete with manginas and white knights aplenty to serve as their house niggers.

They practice the same level of denial and entitlement that was needed to maintain justification for slavery. No amount of moral outrage will affect them; no amount of suffering (except their own) will reach their hearts.

And no amount of reason will produce anything more than the blank, uncomprehending stare of a cow seeing its own reflection in a pond.

With all respect to Glenn Sacks, just what does anyone really think he is going to accomplish in terms of popularizing our agenda in this kind of moral and intellectual void?

And there’s the rub. Where reason and dialog fail; where activism as we understand the word is a non starter, then responding with more of the same is as stupid as finding a sinister, sexist plot in the school supplies section at your grocery store. The more sensible route to go is withdrawal and intentional neglect.

Or, as Ayn Rand would advise, shrug it.

Shrug it all- the whole nasty, filthy rotten enchilada.

And it’s already happening. It does not require leadership or organization. You don’t need to donate money to it or try to get it on the ballot in your local elections. Men are now shrugging marriage, and for every one that does it will mean another man the state will not be enslaving through the family courts. And it will mean that many more children will not be ripped to shreds as sacrificial fodder to the system.

Men are also starting to shrug partisan politics, chivalry, nationalism, consumerism and the mainstream media; all the slow acting toxins that have landed men in the position of needing a movement in the first place.

And it will continue happening because that is the nature of social physics. There is a pendulum swing in effect here, and it is happening in total indifference to feminists, mainstream media, and yes, to the men’s movement as well.

In short, we aren’t causing anything here. We are just giving it a name, a voice and a language.

We chronicle what is happening; document it, and perhaps in our own way urge some men to reconsider what the fuck has been happening in their lives. But for the most part, I think that many men, when they stumble on our literature, aren't convinced by it, nor do they need any such persuasion. They just find something that finally puts some pieces together for them; something that articulates the unnamed knot that has been twisting in their guts for a while.

That is why I don't give advice, don't see myself as a leader, and don't want to.

Men don't need advice or guidance near as much as they need information. And if there is anything that most of them actually need to learn, it is that the only real leadership is in the mirror. Our agenda is defined by our own choices and actions. Our "cause" is our own life, on our own terms.

Most any man can still reasonably secure his freedom and well being with a simple (if not always easy) decision to shrug everything that gets in the way, and to be prepared to build and maintain his own life raft, instead of waiting for the government, feminists, or some supposed MRA leader to do it for him.

Our problem, if we actually even have one, is that there are a lot of MRA's who still have a hard time comprehending this. They are waiting for someone else to point the way. Or maybe for an instruction manual on how to act like a vertebrate. But give them time. They will change or end up settling for life on their knees, begging for scraps of shopworn pussy and pretending that they are still in Kansas.

I suppose it is obligatory that I state the obvious and say this is just my opinion, and that I maintain full support for the handful of activists that are trying desperately to chip away at the social and legislative machine that is hell bent on destroying men. But I also think it is pretty obvious that we spend too much time wringing our hands over a lack of progress as measured against feminist strategy.

Ironically, my greatest personal inspiration came from the mouth of a feminist icon. To be specific, from Marilyn French, who penned the following:

My feelings about men are the result of my experience. I have little sympathy for them. Like a Jew just released from Dachau, I watch the handsome young Nazi soldier fall writhing to the ground with a bullet in his stomach and I look briefly and walk on. I don't even need to shrug. I simply don't care. What he was, as a person, I mean, what his shames and yearning were, simply don't matter.

It was easy for French to make such a statement, because no matter how much she disdained men, she still lived her entire life benefiting from their sacrifices; an ingrate on the tit, she stopped suckling only long enough to complain about the free meal. It was her beta husband who put her through school, and of course she divorced him once he paid for her "independence," and made himself expendable. And this is precisely the direction a growing number of men are going, only with one very distinct difference.

We don't need women. Men don't die, or even get sick without them. There is no RDA for pussy. And as more men start to figure out that being on your knees is the wrong position to be in to receive a blowjob, they will also start learning to get themselves out of harms way, and to assume authority over their own lives.

As I have said before, women are the modern shiv that the government uses to stab men in the back. No one needs leadership to recognize that and act accordingly. All they need is a little common sense, and a good measure of the very uncommon sense that comes with being able to imagine yourself outside the role that has been prescribed for you.

If you are reading this, you likely are one of the lucky ones who have that kind of good sense. Enjoy your own rareness, and enjoy watching what happens when the time comes that men like you are not so rare.

Most men just can't do it. Fine by me, let 'em rot. They sure as hell won't hesitate to walk past your stinking carcass. They have the information at their disposal 24/7 to point to a different path than that of the mangina or white knight. And the more of us that Go Our Own Way, the higher the price those unfortunates that just can't "get it" will have to pay, and the more appealing our way of thinking will become.

Relative freedom is just a few short decisions away. All you have to do is choose it.

Chapin Announces Men's Voting Block

This video reveals a plan for some real activism. It's all about having a real men's voting block. It is such a good idea that it's a wonder why no one has done this before.

The idea is to run a special dedicated Facebook page, and the initial goal we have going on is getting a good 10,000 members to start it off.

Though it's always wise to cast a very wary eye at any reliance on mainstream politics, this idea deserves serious attention and merit. In fact, its recommended that you sign onto it right away.

A Stay-At-Home Dad and Son Abused

rlaspari · 27 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I was a stay-at-home dad. I still am a stay-at-home dad, but it is not the same. I cannot be a stay-at-home dad much longer.

I have been a stay-at-home dad since before my son was a year old, and always the primary parent responsible for his care. Even before I was a stay-at-home dad I was the parent who took my son to doctor visits or stopped by to see him during lunch break. When my son did not adjust well to his daycare, I wanted to stay home with him. His mother wanted to continue working. So I quit my job to parent my son at home.

When he was three and a half years old, his mother filed for divorce.

I do not know why she filed for divorce. We argued more towards the end, but no more than many couples who stay married and work things out. I have since learned that in families with children, women file for divorce the majority of the time. College educated women, like my son's mother, file the vast majority of the time. I could speculate on a variety of factors that led to her decision to divorce — disagreements about parenting, difficulties with "role reversal" and possible loss of respect for me, interference from her parents who moved close to us, missing her single life — but all that would be speculation. In the end she left for same reason so many do — because it was easy for her to do it and obtain a favorable outcome. I did not want a divorce, but I had no say in the matter. With a divorce forced upon me, I would have preferred a collaborative divorce to an adversarial one; but, I had no say in the matter. I would have preferred to gradually change my son's residential schedule over changing it abruptly, but I had no say in the matter. The divorce process was unilateral.

After my son's mother filed, she presented me with a large stack of papers. Among other things in these papers, she wrote her opinions of my parenting ability. I learned that she was accusing me of some form of "emotional abuse" as well. This enabled her to bring papers before a judge for "immediate relief" prior to presenting them to me. I was fortunate that no immediate relief was granted. I have since learned that many men are not so lucky. We both argued with each other, and she was the only one to ever be physical in these arguments; but, only she leveled accusations of abuse.

In her papers she requested to be named the primary parent, and I be given visitation. I had a chance to respond, and she then had the final say with a response to my response. Lawyers took these papers to the court. They spoke in front of a commissioner with each of us standing next to our respective lawyers. Her lawyer spoke for about 5 minutes. My lawyer responded for about 5 minutes. Again she was granted the final say when her lawyer spoke for another 5 minutes. Immediately after this the commissioner ruled, and my son was taken from me half the time.

This was the "temporary arrangement" until the entire process was complete. The process took almost a year and a half to complete. Another part of the ruling was the commissioner telling me I should find work. I asked for a revision hearing to try to have this custody schedule revised. It was not revised, and I was told at the revision that I need to pay half the mortgage on the house until it is sold.

Throughout the divorce process I heard the phrase "best interests of the child." The court used the phrase often. My son's mother used the phrase often. I was coerced into signing documents with the phrase. Until the hearing my son saw me every day. We spent all day together most days. I would lie next to his bed every night to help him fall asleep. My son cried and cried and cried during the first weeks when he was taken from me. He didn't sleep well when he was away. He was only 3. He still asks his mother if I can come over with him when she picks him up. The courts say they only act in the best interests of the child.

After filing for divorce, my son's mother wanted to put him in daycare. I thought it would be a foregone conclusion that, if there was a parent that is willing and able to stay home it would be allowed, but because his mother wanted daycare, there needed to be a hearing. My son has certain special needs that led to his mother and I to have him evaluated by the university when he was 2, and by the public school system soon after. They made certain specific recommendations for schooling and care that I wanted to carry out. Both my son and I were fortunate for this. The court was compelled to follow the recommendations.

I believe without these recommendations my son would be in daycare today in order to comply with the mother's wishes. The type of preschool I requested for my son was one where parents assist the teacher. My son's mother said it should not be assumed that I would be the parent to do this. I made no such assumption. Nevertheless, the commissioner ruled that my son's mother could replace me whenever she wanted and as often as she wanted, as long as she gave me one week's notice. I was worried she would exercise this privilege all the time, and I would not get to participate at my son's preschool; but, she rarely did.

My son's mother requested a parenting evaluator. My lawyer told me I had to agree to this. Our parenting evaluator was a social worker. The evaluator writes a report with recommendations when he finishes, and my lawyer said the court almost always follows these recommendations. My lawyer also said the parenting evaluator will ask me to sign forms to waive my rights to privacy and confidentiality so that he can talk to doctors, therapists, teachers, and anyone else he might feel is relevant. My lawyer told me I should sign whatever the evaluator wants me to sign. When I met with the evaluator, I did. I was told by many, including my lawyer, that it is a good idea to keep a daily journal of what I did with my son and how I interact with his mother and her family. According to the evaluator, my journal consisted of over 500 typed pages. I don't know what he did with it, and it was never returned to me.

I had two meetings with the evaluator. During the first meeting the evaluator spoke with me in an office. I told the evaluator I wanted to stay home with my son until he started kindergarten. He told me that children of divorce have to go to daycare. During the second meeting he watched me play with my son for half an hour through one-way glass. I am proud of my parenting skills, but this was still frightening for me. I felt violated by this evaluation.

Eventually, my son's mother and I "settled." I have since learned most adversarial divorces end with a settlement, and not a trial where information about the proceedings is made publicly available. I was afraid of the extra costs of a trial, and I was afraid that worse things could still be done to me and my son. I found nothing particularly "amicable" about our settlement. We reached an agreement where I only got to see my son half the time, but I could stay with my son during times when his mother was working.

Since the divorce I have had the chance to meet several divorced mothers through single parent groups. They had custody arrangements where they had their children at least 70% of the time – often more. They collect child support. I did not meet any stay-at-home mothers who had their children only 50% of the time. According to the most recent US census 5 out of 6 custodial parents are women. All the single mothers I have met so far initiated their divorces.

I noticed something else about the divorced women I met. They have a tendency to speak in the passive voice. Family court uses similar language. I asked one woman about her custody arrangement. She said it didn't make sense for her husband to have custody. I recognized the passive voice. I asked her if that was what her husband wanted. She said he just wanted whatever he could get. The passive voice extends to the description of the process – phrases like "the divorce was finalized on this date" or "we're divorced" – not "I divorced" or "I initiated the divorce." The other person is thus put in the position of having to ask awkward questions for more information. It reminds me of governments that know they are doing bad things and wish to deflect attention and criticism. "People are being detained." Who is detaining them? They are being detained. Some of these women also accused their husbands of abuse of one form or another. It seemed incongruous to me because, like my own ex-wife, these same women often seemed aggressive, angry, and intimidating to me – but they all had a seemingly instinctive and masterful grasp of social language.

People have been using passive language in divorce for a long that now. A friend of mine recently told me that my description reminded him of the separate conversations he had to endure as a teenager once a long time ago. The mom explained that it was just something that developed, that it was nobody's fault. But the dad explained, she filed for divorce. Active versus passive voice. Same stuff, different decade. The courts encourage the use of passive voice when speaking to children, or an active voice with "we" to indicate the parents are on the same page about what is happening. The courts say to use the active voice would constitute blaming the other parent. To adhere to this standard leaves the parent who did not want a divorce (most often dads) in the position of saying he is ok with a scenario in which he is not permitted to have as active a role with his children as before. In effect, parents are supposed to tell the kids: I won't see you as much, and I'm ok with it, and it's no one's fault — thus making these parents appear either callous or foolish.

Throughout the divorce I was told that I should seek work, and that I should be able to find work. This presupposition affected how assets and obligations would be divided. Income was "imputed" to me. I have been out of the workforce for nearly 5 years, and unemployment is very high. Finding work will be a challenge for me. If I need to move out of a state for work, I will be at the mercy of my ex-wife. I have been told that if it went before a court, I would lose what custody I have if I move. My ex-wife has a good job and is worth between 1 and 2 million dollars. I am worth a small fraction of that. Child support is determined based on the percentage of overnights the child spends with a parent. If the number of overnights are equal, no child support is warranted. I will not be getting child support. I have recently spoken with a divorced mom who decided to allow the dad to see his son half the time. In her case they determined child support based on the disparity of incomes. She gets $1000 a month. If I am forced to move because I can only find a job out of state, the likely outcome will be my seeing my son only for most of the summer — and I would have to pay my millionaire ex-wife child support. I would be reduced from a full-time, stay-at-home dad to a dad who only gets contact with his son for maybe three months out of the year.

I was a stay-at-home dad. I still am a stay-at-home dad, but it is not the same. I cannot be a stay-at-home dad much longer.

So that's my story. It is probably not a particularly gripping one if you haven't lived it. As for me, I still take medication for anxiety as a result of all of it. As a stay-at-home dad I went from full time with my son to half the time. I worry I might lose more time in the future. Working dads often go from part time to virtually no time. There are things that people can do to make a difference in the future though. The first thing is to talk about it and build awareness. Everything about divorce is designed to keep people from talking about it. That's similar to any corrupt process. The only way to fight it is to talk about it more. Statistically speaking, men do not recover from divorce (Even if they remarry problems remain.). They die younger and have more physical, mental, and financial problems. Statistically speaking, children do not recover from divorce. They have deficits relative to other children, and they grow up feeling like they can never be themselves or never truly be at home. They have different selves for different homes. They feel they have to grow up sooner. They are more likely to have all sorts of problems.

Remarriage does not help them and may make things worse. Statistically, the only time divorce benefits children is when there is violence or threats of violence in the home. Yet as a society we make it easy and condone and even sometimes encourage people to do this to their children. Though I use the word "people," the vast majority of people who file for divorce when children are involved are women. Ask them whether they filed. Watch for passive language. Watch for gender bias. Gender bias is still rampant through the process, even in states where the language has finally been changed to be gender neutral.

Many people recognize the system is broken and want to fix it. The best idea I have heard is this one: a rebuttable presumption of custody of any minor children to the respondent. What that means is if someone files for divorce when there are kids involved, there will be a presumption that the other parent gets custody of the kid. This would greatly reduce the number of divorces with kids. All of a sudden, the divorcer could not use the kids as pawns, and would face the possibility that she might not get custody herself. The divorcer could still get custody if there is evidence that the other parent did something bad, like abuse the kids or something — but we would have the presumption of innocence first — something we really like having in most other areas of the justice system. That presumption of innocence is still elusive in family court.

Even if we could enact this change to the family court system, it might still be subverted so long as the basic undercurrent of prejudice against men remains. Men are inherently as good at parenting as women. Men need just as much protection under the law as women. So long as people reject these notions of equality, the people who enact and enforce these laws will find ways to make sure women continue to receive favorable treatment at the expense of men and children.

Requirements for counseling prior to divorce would also be a good idea — but first we would need to change the secular counseling system as well. Right now it adopts a “divorce neutral” attitude despite mounting evidence that divorce is harmful in a multitude of ways. It is equivalent to having a neutral attitude towards whether the earth is round or flat.

We need to see to it that society has support structures for men equal to those women have. In my own case, at one point I went to my local community college’s women’s center for help because there is no equivalent men’s center. They were kind and tried to help, but did not have much they could offer me. The best word I can come up with to describe how I felt going through this process is rape. I felt raped, and I felt like I had to watch my son being raped as well. I felt we were violated, and I felt one person violently imposed her will on us with the aid of the court. I find it hard to believe we have support systems in place for the rapists, but not the victims.

There is a lot that needs to be changed, but there are entire industries built on keeping things as they are. The only hope for change is if people get over the built-in discomfort and start talking about it more.

Nothing sucks worse than asking people I like for money so that I can do something I love, and that I will keep doing no matter what. Well, O.K., there are probably lots of things that suck worse than that, but it isn't my favorite thing to do, nonetheless.

I wish I had a much, much better angle than I acually do. If I were an evangelical preacher I could tell you that your donations will earn you eternal salvation, or would help me fight Satan and keep him out of rock-n-roll. For that matter, I wish you were kinda stupid so I could tell you that every dollar you sent sends a feminist to a reeducation camp where she would learn common decency or how to properly fellate MRA's.

But alas, I am stuck with being honest. This site isn't going anywhere (voluntarily), and I will keep doing this if no one ever sends a nickel to help with the expenses. Just the same, your donations are needed and greatly appreciated.

I passed the hat once fairly soon after the site re-launched, and decided I would write another beg letter with each change of season, or thereabouts, in hopes that those who have not already given might toss something in the tip jar.

So here I am again, in these early days of Autumn, asking you to scrape some change from between the cushions and send it my way. Hell, you don't need groceries this week anyway.

Or send check or money order to:

Rape Hysteria Dismantled

manwomanmyth · 28 September 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The societal parasite known as feminism feeds on its own self-produce garbage. The only way that feminism can self-perpetuate is by continually inventing and constructing issues that it then poses itself as the solution to.

One of these constructed problem is the one known as rape hysteria. In this video, rape hysteria gets deconstructed and dismantled, bit by bit, to where there's nothing left except the plastic skeleton of lies and deceit that it's based on.

Pat Tillman: Dying Like a Real Man

Paul Elam · 1 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Note: I recently read an article that raised my hackles over at goodmenproject.com. It concerned the life and death of Pat Tillman. I was upset by it enough that I fired up an angry email to them about it. To my surprise, I got a cordial response back, inviting my opinion to be posted as a blog on their website.

I have to say I think the site leaves some things to be desired, primarily in what I see as the editorial assumption that it is more important to invest in making men "better" than they already are, rather than focusing on the very real problems they face in misandric culture. But the response from them about my concerns seemed genuine enough that I submitted this piece.

We seldom find common ground in this arena of sexual politics, so I don't want to pass up any opportunities that might help that. PE

In going through the recent tribute here to Pat Tillman, the former NFL star that gave up a lucrative career in football to serve his country, I found myself nodding my head a lot. I also experienced a kind of sick feeling. There were many references to his bravery and sacrifice as indicators of quintessential masculinity.

In an age where men struggle to find the increasingly elusive meaning of manhood, the Tillman story should prove helpful, but only in discerning a path to avoid.

I proceed with caution here. Pat Tillman was clearly a man of integrity and commitment to his own ideals. He sacrificed much, ultimately everything, to follow his convictions. Those that loved and needed him paid a crushing price as well.

But when we look past the fanfare and accolades, and the understandable desire to lend meaning to his death, there are unsettling truths here that insist on our attention. His life was just another one of thousands of blood payments in an ill conceived war, fought for all the wrong reasons. Worse yet, the army in which he faithfully served sought to deceive the public about how he was killed in order to turn his death into good PR for the war effort. In short, they sought to capitalize on one of their fallen, and didn't mind lying about it to get the job done.

This isn't anything new. The blood of men like Tillman has stained the pages of history since they started writing it on papyrus; men and boys routinely sacrificed for the sake of greed and/or misguided nationalism – then touted as a heroes, men's men, to be idealized and emulated (hopefully with enlistment contracts).

And that brings us to the first order of business if we want to legitimately resolve the issue of men's place in the modern world. The insane reverence for cannon fodder has to stop, and, in the bigger picture, the view of men as expendable.

And that is precisely where we run in to a lot of problems. Understanding that requires some unabashed candor, not just about gender roles, but about gender politics.

There is a lot of talk these days about making men good fathers, husbands and citizens. Much of this, of course, is predicated on the egregious myth that men are none of these things to begin with, and that their lives do not need or deserve compassionate attention simply for the sake of improving their lot in life. Everything we want men to be is somehow meant for the benefit of others. However well intended (and sometimes not), these efforts are doing little more than regarding men as human appliances.

And aside from the sexist entitlement inherent in these ideas, none of it makes any real sense when you look at what has happened in western culture over the past half century.

We embarked on a sexual revolution unlike anything seen before. Women, who were largely sequestered into the arguably limiting aspects of their gender roles, broke free like thoroughbred's at the starting gate. They have demolished barriers, entering all realms of employment, education and entrepreneurship. They have done so well, in fact, that they now make a solid majority on our college campuses and outnumber men in the workforce.

All of this hinged on the idea that women no longer could or should be confined to kitchens, housework and child rearing. I personally agree with this, but even if you are more traditionally minded the fact is that our culture has embraced it, and there certainly appears to be no squeezing that toothpaste back into the tube.

However, with the celebrated transcendence of women from their old school roles into supposedly more self actualizing lives, we also turned our attention to men, examined their gender role and concluded: well, we concluded that we wouldn't conclude anything if it got in the way of getting men to provide whatever service we needed or wanted.

For men, there would be no liberation from their role. Rather we would just keep them trapped in it and start adding on the things we used to expect of women.

Put down that remote pick up a mop. Unless, of course, we need you to carry a rifle.

These recently added notions of real manhood, mostly about housework and enhanced chivalry, seem to define our only real interest in changing men. After all, sacrifice and death, as they apply to the male role, are pretty severe forms of limitation themselves. But that fact, inconvenient to a society that lauds phony equality, goes largely ignored. So while we gave women suffrage, we just gave men more suffering.

The natural result of the liberation of women from the mandates of their sexual role should have been to do the same for men. And that alone would have brought women commensurate responsibilities and burdens with their increased rights. It would have, most unfortunately, brought them the increased death and suffering men have long endured. As we can plainly see, that did not happen, and it removes all credibility from the cause that purported to establish a more equal society.

To help muddy things even more, we have, while valorizing men's ability to kill, and willingness to die, peppered them with shame and ridicule about their tendency to be violent. We have come to insist, with a familiar dishonesty, that the "new masculinity" is to be characterized by gentleness and sensitivity, while we treat them as though they are deserving of neither.

This doesn't just apply to the battlefield.

Men, for all our supposed efforts to produce a gender neutral society, remain 98% of all combat deaths, 93% of all workplace deaths and 79% of all suicides. And this reveals what we are so loathe to acknowledge about the lives of men. We see them as powerful and privileged, as the undeserving heirs to more than their share. And worse, as oppressive tyrants who take what they want from the weak in their midst.

This is true for less than one percent of men and always has been. For the rest, including the Pat Tillman's of this world, their lives are about servitude and death. To maintain that as the status quo we habitually see them all as belonging to that fractional minority. We mistake what is most common, male powerlessness, for male power; male disposability for male dominance. And we hail them in their finest hour only as we lower them into the ground.

And we have blinded ourselves to a reality we will have to wake up to if we are going to actually shape men into what we claim to want.

If we want to teach men to quit killing, we must first teach them to quit dying. And to do that, we first have to go where no one really wants to. We have to teach men to reject the pressures put on them to be protectors and providers first, self valuing human beings a distant second. No women's studies professor, nor attempts to mold men into socially convenient automatons, is going to get us out of that one.

The answers to this are not easy, simple or likely to be realized any time soon. But getting off on the right foot is as simple as recognizing that men like Pat Tillman have a lot more to offer the world if they are still alive.

What's Chinese for "Abortion"?

B.R. Merrick · 1 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Chai Ling is a very interesting woman. I just stumbled on this article about her a few days ago. I don't know what her politics are. I don't know if she's fully embraced feminism, although some of what I've seen at her website indicates that she has embraced some style, form, or genre of it. Note this passage: "Since 1978, the implementation of China's One-Child Policy has led to female gendercide, abandonment of daughters, human trafficking and violations of women's reproductive rights" [emphasis mine].

Despite this, I don't see any hints of misandry. I think I even spot some elements of libertarianism. I also see a mostly voluntary effort at educating the world about a stupid government solution. Yes, I know, using the word "stupid" is redundant when speaking of government, but without knowing it, Ms. Ling has unintentionally endorsed what ought to be a concern of men for their own sakes, without even considering the numerous ways in which women are harmed.

In an effort to curb "overpopulation," a term embraced by governments that all of a sudden find they can't plan and control that many people, China has enforced, through fines, confiscation of property, and involuntary abortions, a "one-child" policy for more than thirty years. According to the website: "The math behind the implementation of the One-Child Policy is questionable. The calculations were performed by a notable Chinese rocket scientist who used a rocket formula (replacing rocket variable[s] with people) to predict future population levels." (Well, that's understandable. The creation of a baby involves a "rocket," does it not?) Ms. Ling's central complaint is that this policy targets women and girls. She is correct, as there is now an increase in the male-to-female ratio that shows a significant decrease in the number of women.

There are both cultural and practical factors at work. The Chinese character for "good" is the combination of the characters for "woman" and "son." (See the astoundingly gorgeous Gong Li to the left. Try to pay attention to the character for "good" written in red.) Also, since men have a tendency to ease into the provider role with greater success than women, parents who are forced to have only one child are, for practical reasons, going to choose to have a son. I have little to no problem with the Chinese character for "good"; I see it mainly as an interesting cultural artifact. Societies the world over have traditionally looked to men to provide, fight, protect, warn, build, instruct, and plant seeds of all kinds. That's just how it is. Government mandates won't change that.

However, due to my abhorrence for abortion and government mandates alike, just as in the bizarre alliance between feminists and conservatives over what I have termed "misaporno," I find myself in agreement and alliance with Ms. Ling, but I'm coming at this issue from a different angle, as an anarchist, a men's activist, and a sibling.

Governments, being the initiators of coercion, are death-oriented; therefore, all government solutions that are not clearly directed back at the governments themselves are bound to cause widespread destruction. As if Mao's Great Leap Forward (which turned out to be the Great Leap Into the Abyss) wasn't bad enough, this death-oriented government then decided that it could dictate one of the most private, personal decisions that a heterosexual couple could possibly make: "Wanna have a baby?" The very idea that something so intensely and wonderfully intimate should be dictated by outside forces is repugnant. And now the afterbirth of this misbegotten communist solution is pouring out for all to see:

"The Chinese Academy of Social Sciences reports that in 2020, there will be 40 million more young men than women; by comparison, there are currently 40 million young men in the entirety of the U.S. Not surprisingly, China's crime rates and the prevalence of women and child trafficking have risen dramatically" [emphasis mine].

Nice work, commies! As I pointed out in "Prostitution and the Evil, Evil Penis," where there is less sex available, there is more rape and more homicide. The communist Chinese government is now sitting atop a very dangerous situation. Where young men have to compete for mates, there is sadly going to be bloodshed, unless Tibet is overrun by millions of single Chinese dudes who all of a sudden wish to become Buddhist monks, or my team inexplicably explodes (no pun intended) with a ton of new Chinese converts. I don't see either of those things happening in the near future.

What I do see are Asian women dating white men, black men, Latino men, and Asian men. Asian women are prized by many different kinds of men because when an Asian woman is beautiful, she is normally considered beautiful. (Again, refer to the picture of Gong Li above. But be sure to finish the article.) I have to confess to being ever-so-slightly interested in the feminine sex, and I can tell you that the most beautiful woman I ever took out on a date had pure Asian ancestry. She was drop-dead-frickin'-gorgeous! The most beautiful woman I have ever seen, beyond compare. (Okay, Gong Li compares. See the picture above.) She had an attitude to match. (And I'm not talking about a "beautiful" attitude. I'm talking about the attitude that beautiful girls can afford to have in a free and open society. We had one date.)

I do not see Asian men dating women of any other ethnicity or color. There are exceptions, to be sure, but not many. Since the norm is for Asian men to date Asian women; since the most populous Asian country is obsessed with who is doing what to whom; since those fewer women are getting online now and marrying themselves off to non-Asian Western men to have a better life; since that country employs a highly trained and intelligent military armed with nuclear warheads, and that military is mostly comprised of men who are becoming sexually and procreatively frustrated; what does this tell you about the state of the world that Mao helped to build?

It's bad enough to force women into abortions, an act abhorrent to this pro-life anarchist even when it is voluntary. How much worse is such a procedure when the "patient" is unwilling? But what Ms. Ling has left out is the glaring fact that the world is now dealing with a potentially devastating problem due to its effects on men, not women.

So Ms. Ling is looking for a change in policy. Perhaps the Federal government, a body that is better at hiding its atrocities, one that has permitted more freedoms than the one she defied in Tiananmen Square, will listen to her pleas. Therefore, her website has a petition: "Abolish China's One-Child Policy." Abolishing the policy is fine, but soliciting a man currently slaughtering women and children (oh yeah, and men) on the other side of the earth via predator drones, an act of which he makes fun? Somehow, I doubt that is going to make much difference.

Then again, the repellant Nixon did visit China, and did make some headway with a few free market principles by opening trade with them. Perhaps you can occasionally get a murderer to do things right, twice a day, like a broken clock. I have a feeling, however, that the American government putting pressure on the Chinese government will only lead to more problems. The premise of both governments is something that ought to be checked before asking either one to save an unborn little girl's life. The problem with the Chinese government's solution isn't the "one-child" part, after all.

Take a look at the horrifying situation in Romania, brought about by a different policy on forced family planning. The mass-murdering Nicolae Ceauşescu made it mandatory for people to have multiple children, once again, like Mao, sticking his nose in where it didn't belong, where it was most unwelcome. The end result is disturbing to say the least: "Not all the children in the orphanages were actual orphans. Many had been abandoned by desperately poor families who had been forced to have more children than necessary as part of Ceauşescu's insane [population] building policy."

Wow! Commie solutions just get better and better. Ceauşescu even made it impossible for hospitals to treat women who had given themselves abortions, adding to the Romanian death toll. My convictions against the death penalty aside, I'm relieved that they simply did away with that guy. (And being pro-life, I would not hesitate to assist a woman who had a self-induced abortion, in case you're wondering.)

Compare this to America: Have 15 kids, adopt an African kid, have two kids, "end" the third one in the womb, give the one you don't want up for adoption, or have no kids at all. For all the Federal government's intrusion into our private lives, the one area where this country has never suffered is "overpopulation" or "underpopulation," because this is one area where the government has largely remained absent. That will undoubtedly change, and has already changed somewhat (try defending your newborn against getting a Social Security number, or keeping your kid out of government schools), but the lesson is there for anyone who cares to learn from it before we're exposed to greater tyranny:

Leave people alone!

Better yet:

Leave men alone!

There aren't a whole hell of a lot of men out there who are going to impregnate women without their consent, just as there aren't a whole hell of a lot of men out there who are going to penetrate women who say, "No." In a free society, women have a bewildering number of options for birth control, one quite volatile and controversial, but the rest are not controversial at all outside the softly coercive Catholic Church. (Remember, boys: Your sperm is sacred.)

But governments thrive on the idea that ordinary multitudes of men cannot be trusted. To the contrary: If any government has proven its inability to be trusted based on its own glaring, undeniable, historical record, it's the death-oriented government of China. Even the United States' government has a record that belies its own untrustworthiness. Just one example for the unconvinced: Name a single thing the Federal government did on the morning of 9/11 to ensure the one thing that most people agree it is there to do, namely, protect its "citizens" from attack.

Nixon's visit to China was, in a way, an effort at turning away the government's guns: more trade was opened up with China. If you need an idea of how that's turned out for the Chinese, look no further than the ever-changing skyline of Shanghai. Overpopulation, my ass:

"Noted economists Thomas Sowell and Walter E. Williams studied and found no correlation between population density and famine & poverty, which were the two original reasons behind the implementation of the One-Child Policy. In fact, these economists found that corrupt government—rather than population density—is the main indicator for nations impacted by famine & poverty" [emphasis lovingly mine].

When the government's guns are turned away from heterosexual couples who wish to reproduce, I can assure you that the outcome will be much the same. It's a pity that it will be too little, too late for a generation of Chinese men looking for sex, and mothers for their children. How do we convince these bachelors to turn to peace? Your guess is as good as mine.

Legally obscene: Rape, statutory rape, and child support

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 4 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Statutory rape laws have often been controversial and unequally applied to male and female victims and perpetrators. While very few believe that sexual activity with minors who have not yet reached puberty (child molestation) is acceptable, many believe that once a child has reached puberty, the child should be capable of providing consent to sexual activity. Statutory rape laws are based on the premise that persons below a specified age or who suffer from certain mental deficiencies are incapable of providing consent. These laws make it illegal for adults to coerce children into having sex.

Historically, statutory rape laws were designed to protect teenage girls from males who may take their virginity, impregnate them, and refuse to take responsibility and marry them. Thus, they served the purpose of protecting the honor of the girl and of preventing teenage pregnancy. They also helped to ensure the child would have a means of support. It wasn't until much later that these laws began to be applied to protect boys as well. However, the application remains quite uneven.

[quote style="boxed" float="left"]In California, an appellate court upheld an order (San Luis Obispo Count y v. Nathan J., 1996) forcing a 15 year old boy to pay child support to his rapist after she became pregnant and gave birth.[/quote] According to the DOJ, 95% of statutory rape victims reported to law enforcement are female, yet many studies have determined that boys comprise a much higher percentage of the victims. For instance, Dorais estimates that one in six boys will be sexually abused before the age of 16.

Social attitudes are primarily responsible for the double standard. According to Miriam Denov, there is a "myth of innocence" surrounding female sexuality that frequently regards sex between a young male and an older female to be a rite of passage and that it is somehow acceptable or less harmful than when the other way around. Further, boys are taught not to view themselves as victims as this is "unmanly."

Law enforcement may not take such complaints seriously. In a previous post (Living in a Culture of Denial), I discussed the problems with the attitude of law enforcement towards male victims. Officers and other professionals may even redefine the act so as to make it acceptable. Even the male victims may view it as a positive experience and not a crime, leading to gross underreporting. In what may be the most bizarre denial of the existence of male victims, courts have held that male victims of rape can be held responsible for child support.

In California, an appellate court upheld an order (San Luis Obispo Count y v. Nathan J., 1996) forcing a 15 year old boy to pay child support to his rapist after she became pregnant and gave birth.The court ruled that although the boy was considered too young to provide consent to the sex act, he was an admitted willing participant and therefore liable to pay support stating that he was not an "innocent victim" because he had discussed it with his rapist prior to having sex.

That this act was illegal and may have constituted coercion was apparently lost on the court. If the boy is considered legally incapable of providing consent, how can he be considered legally liable for giving that consent? Any consent or cooperation on his part should have been considered coercion and therefore not consent at all.

[box type="note" icon="none"]California is not the only state where this is the case. Kansas, Texas, Ohio, and other states also force rape victims to pay child support to their rapists. [/box] In Kentucky, a prosecutor stated that he would help a woman collect child support from a man who was 14 at the time she raped him while neglecting to charge the woman with statutory rape. The state of Colorado attempted to recover AFDC payments from a man who was just 12 when he became a father with an older woman. Contrast this with the allowances made for abortion for women who are raped (including statutory rape) even from many who are opposed to abortion in other circumstances.

Mothers are also permitted to give up their children for adoption, no questions asked, should they not want their children. In no case is a woman forced to raise or pay for a child conceived during a rape.

But this is not the case with fathers. Two separate cases indicate that even when sperm is stolen or a man is forcibly raped, the man remains liable for child support. In Louisiana a man was ordered to pay child support to a woman who had him wear a condom during oral sex. She then took the condom extracted the sperm and impregnated herself. In Alabama, a man was actually raped by a woman and was still ordered to pay child support. This man got drunk at a party and passed out. The next morning he awoke in bed, naked from the waist down. He testified that he did not remember having sex. Others testified that the mother had actually bragged about having sex with him when he was "passed out" and "wasn't even aware of it." This constitutes rape in most states, yet the man was ordered to pay support to the woman who was apparently not even criminally charged.

The National Legal Research Group refers to this as "a strict liability theory of sperm," i.e. a man is liable for his sperm no matter what the circumstance. One court has attempted to justify its actions on the basis of biology rather than admit discrimination:

> "[w]hile it is true that after conception a woman has more control than a man over the decision whether to bear a child, and may unilaterally refuse to obtain an abortion, those facts were known to the father at the time of conception. The choice available to a woman vests in her by the fact that she, and not the man, must carry the child and must undergo whatever traumas, physical and mental, may be attendant to either childbirth or abortion. Any differing treatment accorded men and women . . . is owed not to the operation of [state law] but to the operation of nature."

While there may be natural differences between men and women, in this day and age, it is simply wrong to place all the rights in the hands of women and all the responsibility on the shoulders of men. Rights carry responsibilities. If a woman desires the right to choose, then the woman must be required to bear the responsibility for her decision. If, as the above court stated, the "facts were known to the father at the time of conception" then certainly they were also known to the mother. To hold her to a different standard simply because of biology is morally wrong. She should have the right to choose, but her decision should not be forced upon the father. She may have to bear the burden of either childbirth or abortion, but she also has a wide variety of options for birth control that the man simply doesn't have. Further, in this day and age, she also has career opportunities that will permit her to support a child on her own.

This is especially true in circumstances where the father was a victim of rape or statutory rape. Ordering a victim of rape (even statutory rape) to pay child support to his rapist is tantamount to allowing the rapist to rape him over and over again. Not only is it a constant reminder, it is like he is being punished for being a victim of a crime. It is unthinkable that our court system not only condones, but has legalized this draconian practice. It is not only an injustice, it is an obscenity that is being perpetrated on male victims. It needs to end.

Before You Sign on That Dotted Line

Young men join the Army for a variety of reasons. Some are seeking adventure, a bastion of masculinity in a feminist ravaged world, or a steady paycheck in a time of economic crisis. Others join out of sense of patriotic duty, remaining true to family tradition, or other reasons altogether. No matter why a young man might join the service, his signing on that enlistment contract comes with many risks and issues he might not think about, especially while very young and fresh out of the halls of high school. We all know the best known and most dangerous risks of military service: death while deployed or training; a traumatic physical injury; traumatic brain injury and psychological casualty. However, precious few are fully aware of the other risks service members may find themselves facing and few recruiters share the full story.

1. Thanks to the FERES doctrine, active duty military members who are killed or injured due to egregious negligence while under the care of the military medical system have no legal recourse for their injuries. The same goes for the surviving family of a service member killed due to botched medical procedures while on active duty. In recent years the death of 29 year old SSGT Carmelo Rodriguez from skin cancer brought this issue to the attention of the media and the federal government but for now not much of this gross injustice has been changed.

2. The amount of active duty time you sign up for on your enlistment contract may not be the amount of time you serve. Anybody who signs an enlistment contract with the US Army is required to serve eight years total. Two or four years might be spent on active and the remainder will be served either in the active Reserves or the Individual Ready Reserves. During this time a service member who is now separated is still eligible to be recalled to active duty dependent on the needs of the Army.

Stop-loss is another risk that has come to the attention of the public during the current conflicts. The term stop-loss has been wildly abused in the media, often being used in reference to an IRR recall as discussed above or in instances when active duty soldiers have had their deployment extended. Neither of these are stop-losses though frustrating realities they may be. A true stop-loss refers to a service member being required to serve past what would have been their separation date from the Army. Stop-loss is not new and is, in fact, a possibility service members agree to when signing their enlistment contract and can be read in section 9c of the enlistment contract all soldiers sign.

3. Recruiter promises mean nothing if they are not in writing. Recruiters, like most sales people, try their hardest to make a sale. They will not necessarily lie but may sugar coat or withhold information to get enlistment contracts signed. This holds true whether this is a MOS choice, duty station preference, or orders to a certain school (Airborne for example). Ask for copies of any papers you sign and consider bringing somebody along to be an extra set of ears if you are planning to enlist in the military. Be aware that even if you have everything in writing, the military still reserves the right to renege on promises to suit their needs at any time.

4. Your MOS may have nothing to do with the job you actually do. Some companies will have slots for a certain MOS but no usage for the job. You can deploy and not perform your MOS for the entire you are overseas. A 88N for example, who is trained in transportation management and coordination, could wind up driving a bus to and from a base in Iraq and coordinating absolutely no transportation beyond getting themselves from point A to point B.

5. The military pay system discriminates based on marital and family status. If you are not married and/or a parent you will make less in BAH (housing allowance) than your married counterparts. BAH is only authorized to single soldiers who are over a certain rank (E6 in the Army) and single soldiers below this rank must reside in barracks. Thankfully barracks are improving at many posts and becoming more “apartment with privacy” than the dormitory style of yesteryear (See Randolph Point at Fort Bragg for one example), but this does not fully solve the unfair financial practices. You will also not be eligible for Family Separation Allowance while separated from your duty station for 30 days or more while your married or single parent peers will be earning this extra money.

6. Housing and other services are assigned in an almost communist fashion. For instance an E5 with a wife and one child at Fort Bragg would only qualify for a two bedroom house in an old housing neighborhood if he opts to live on post. He will pay his entire BAH of roughly $1100 for this home while an E1 with four children might pay hundreds less for a four bedroom home in a much nicer and newer community. For many families they will be able to find a better price per square foot off base, even with transportation costs and utilities factored in, so unlike other military lifestyle issues, this frustration can be easily solved.

7. On-post housing is not always in the best of shape and sometimes even of questionable safety. At Fort Bragg there is an on-going investigation of a junior enlisted housing neighborhood and Picerne, the company that owns the now privatized post housing following the death of three infants who have died over the last two years in the very same housing unit. There is speculation that poor quality drywall may be a factor, however, the Army and Picerne are both denying any link between the three deaths. Sadly a husband and father may enlist to have better opportunity to feed his family and keep a safe roof over their head but may be unable to do so despite his hard work and service to the military.

8. Just because you are "home" does not mean you are ever home. Many young men who are single when they sign up may not factor in the potential issues with being active involved fathers should they have children later on in their military careers. Field exercises are frequent at most large bases and this is especially true in certain large units, including the 101st & 82nd Airborne Divisions, 3rd ID, and other groups who have shouldered much responsibility during the long wars. CQ and Staff duty require a soldier to be awake and working for twenty four hours with a day off to sleep afterward. It's not uncommon for a junior enlisted soldier to pull duty two or three times a month and he may have to do this even more depending on where he's stationed.

As a soldier gains rank and becomes an NCO he can expect to really work for his money and miss out on much time at home. If he does not have a wife who is ready and willing to go the extra mile to keep him as a beloved and important figure in his child/ren's eyes, he may lose them emotionally while working his self into the ground to take care of them the best he can.

9. After you have been in the military for awhile you may no longer fit into the civilian world. There exists a great divide between the 1% involved in the Long Wars and the civilian community. My husband recently came across an article that he said describes his feeling on this matter well. A soldier can become almost a myth and legend who people idolize, unsure of how to act or connect with this warrior who has been off fighting in the war most see only on the television screen. Many will no longer look at him as a human but something bigger than that, perhaps making him feel useless or no longer part of the world the rest of us inhabit.

10. You give up many of your constitutional rights to serve in the military. When you sign a contract you sign away your right to free speech, freedom of assembly and free expression and put yourself under the restrictions of UCMJ for the duration of your service. Military bases are also notoriously pro-gun control, restricting the rights of service members to arm and protect themselves while commuting to and from work, during the workday, and while residing in any form of on-post housing.

11. THE VA WILL NOT TAKE CARE OF YOU! Forgive my e-yelling but this point cannot be stressed enough. Walk around a large military town and you will see the forgotten ghosts of wars past, the men nobody gives a care about, the men often cheated and abused by the Veterans Administration. Service members may have to jump through hoops prove their need for VA service and go through frustrating appeals process when their claims for benefits are denied. Getting approved for medical care can takes months, or even years in some instances. The future may be even bleaker should the VA tighten the belt further in response to the recession. Hours and job positions could potentially be cut resulting in a greater backlog of cases to be reviewed.

12. Under the Uniformed Services Former Spouses Protection Act, an ex-spouse can be entitled to up to half of a soldier's disposable pay and benefits at the discretion of the court granting the divorce. Up to 65% of a soldier's pay can be awarded when child support or alimony are ordered by the court. If the marriage was ten years or longer during the duration of his active duty service, the ex-wife may also be entitled to a portion of his military retirement benefits, up to 50%.

There are many risks that must be considered before a young man signs an enlistment contract. This list is not comprehensive by any means and everybody must read over an enlistment contract carefully to find other issues and gray areas. If you are considering military service, talk to veterans before you join. Ask questions and find out risks and also benefits of which you need to be aware. Do not rush into your decision, but take whatever amount of time you need to make the best choice for yourself. There is no easy do-over or quick way to quit and turn back once you've signed on that dotted line and even in the best of military outcomes, eight years of your life is no small amount of time.

More Hestia here.

Legally Obscene II: Equal Protection, Consent, and Liability

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 6 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In response to my first article, Legally Obscene the question arose about the difference between civil and criminal liability. The argument was posited that while the female perpetrator of a statutory rape can be held criminally responsible for her actions, the male victim was in fact a willing participant in the act and should therefore be held civilly responsible for child support. I disagree, both on legal and moral grounds.

Should a 15 year old male victim of statutory rape have an obligation to the child whether or not he was a "willing" participant? Consider for a moment that this were a female victim. Should she have an obligation to the child? The answer in our society is a definitive "no." Where legal, any female can obtain an abortion for any reason whatsoever. Should she choose not to have an abortion, she may surrender the child for adoption and have her parental rights and responsibilities terminated with no further obligation to the child. This is true whether or not she was a victim of statutory rape or some other type of sexual assault or whether the sex was consensual. If a woman does not wish to take responsibility for her child, she does not have to and cannot be forced to unless she has already accepted that responsibility and acted as the child's mother. This should be no different for men.*

This is What Pedophiles Look Like

The Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution guarantees equal protection under the law for all U.S. citizens. It states "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Clearly, any law that provides that one group of citizens may abdicate their parental rights and responsibilities that is not extended to another group of citizens based solely on the sex of those citizens should be considered to be a violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment and as such should be considered illegal and unenforceable regardless of whether the law is criminal or civil. This argument alone should suffice. But wait, there's more.

Should the 14th Amendment prove insufficient, the concept of consent should not. The difference between sexual assault and legal sex is consent. Consent is defined as positive cooperation in the act as a result of free will. It must be voluntary and with knowledge of the nature of the act and it may be withdrawn at any time, provided that the withdrawal is communicated. Breaking this definition into its components, one might ask whether there was positive cooperation, was it an act of free will, voluntary, and with knowledge and understanding of the nature of the act. If we assume the boy acted "willingly," then we might assume his actions to be voluntary and exhibiting positive cooperation. We might also assume that he acted with knowledge of the nature of the act (This is debatable given his age and possible stage of cognitive development). But there is a fourth requirement; his actions must be the result of free will.

There is a natural power imbalance between adults and children that results in a natural hegemony wherein the child looks to the adult for guidance, advice, and leadership. This hegemony places the adult in a position to manipulate a child and influence that child's actions and desires. In fact, this is a primary tactic of persons who are sexual predators (especially females who typically do not use force). It is referred to as "grooming." This is a process in which an adult, who establishes an emotional connection with a child in order to lower the child's inhibitions in order to prepare them for abuse. It is a form of psychological manipulation. Sexual predators are generally looking to exploit this power imbalance to wield power and control over their victims. Because the minor is in an inferior position and the adult in the superior position, the minor cannot be considered to be acting of free will. Therefore, consent is not possible and any "willingness" or "positive cooperation" on the part of the minor must be viewed as the result of the manipulation of the child on the part of the adult. This negates any willingness or complicity in the act of the minor-victim. Since the judicial decision in civil court was based on an erroneous view of "willingness" the court reached the wrong decision.

Finally, if one ignores the above and assigns civil liability to the minor-victim, the minor-victim should be awarded damages for the harm inflicted by the perpetrator. These damages should compensate the minor-victim for any physical, emotional, and monetary harm inflicted by the perpetrator as a result of her criminal act and should extend into the future. Therefore, if it can somehow be justified that the minor-victim is liable for child support, the perpetrator should be liable to her victim for an amount greater than or equal to that support.

By not offering equal protections to both male and female victims, this decision is in violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. Further it demonstrates a lack of understanding of the dynamics between sexual predators and their victims and misinterprets the result of manipulation by the perpetrator as "willingness" on the part of the victim. It erroneously assigns civil liability to the victim of a crime for the result of that crime.

*I am not arguing here that a man should be able to force a woman to have an abortion or to give her child up for adoption. I am arguing that a man should have the same right as the mother to surrender his parental rights and responsibilities at any time prior to accepting the role of father and acting as such. I would also argue that if he is deceived into believing he is the father, he should have the right to terminate his rights and responsibilities upon learning of the fraud.

Press Release- Domestic Abuse Service Includes Men

Paul Elam · 7 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Intimate Partner Violence (IPV) against men, especially against men by female intimate partners, has always been a hot button issue. The mere mention of male victims in a gathering of traditional domestic violence advocates creates great controversy. While domestic violence advocates may know men are victims they insist that their victims service agencies (over 2,000 of them in the country) should focus exclusively on ending violence against women by men because women are the most injured and prevalent victims.

As a result, serious outreach and services for the male victims of IPV are sorely lacking.

According to a Dept of Justice Study men are victims of assault by their partners in approximately 36% of the reported cases in the U.S. each year. The disparity between the needs of those victims and the services available is large. The gap must be closed and that can only be done through education, services and advocacy.

The Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men and Women (DAHMW) does just that. Now in it's10th year of specializing in outreach and services for male victims, DAHMW has worked hard to bring public awareness to this under served group of victims and survivors. Much more outreach and services are needed.

While resources for men are still scarce, awareness is increasing and hopefully more services will follow. IPV is not a gender issue, it is simply a human issue. DAHMW envisions a world where services are available to victims and survivors without prejudice.

Legally Obscene III

Paternity Fraud and Reproductive Freedom

The first article in this series (Legally Obscene) identified the injustice of forcing male victims of rape and statutory rape to pay child support to the women who raped them and became pregnant and produced children as a result. The second article went into a bit more depth surrounding consent and "willingness" as it concerns the hegemonic relationship between sexual predators and their prey, and 14th Amendment issues of equal protection of the law for male victims.

This segment will address issues of paternity fraud and reproductive freedom. This latter issue having been a cornerstone of the women's movement of the 1960's and 70's that resulted in a woman's right to choose and take control of her own body. Reproductive freedom holds similar significance for men.

The idea of reproductive freedom for women is born of the risk present in their own biology as it pertains to pregnancy and childbirth. Pregnancy carries risk to a woman's health and well-being and therefore it is imperative that she have the freedom to control that risk. This entails everything from the right to withhold consent to sexual relations, to the use of contraception, to the decision to terminate a pregnancy or bear a child. The risk is a factor of her biology. In a similar vein, male biology carries its own risk.

A man's sperm is a necessary component of reproduction. It is impossible to reproduce without it. Therefore ownership and control of a man's sperm must remain with the man. Anytime a woman obtains and uses a man's sperm to impregnate herself without his consent, it must be considered theft. Just as a woman should have the right to control her body, a man should have the right to control his. Reproduction without his consent can have serious repercussions on his physical, psychological, and emotional well-being.

The use of a man's sperm without his consent, whether obtained by theft or by fraud, should be illegal. Reproductive freedom allows both a man and a woman to choose when and with whom they will have a child.

There is a second component to reproductive freedom that should either be afforded to both men and women, or to neither. This is the freedom to choose whether or not to parent a child that has already been born. This choice is not accompanied by biological risk to either the man or the woman. It is a matter of ethics, morality, and law. Currently, in the United States, mothers hold all the rights in this regard and fathers hold none. This situation is a blatant violation of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment as the parental rights and responsibilities of one parent are determined by the decisions of the other based solely upon the sex of the parent. A father's rights and responsibilities are determined by the mother.

In most states, the father of a child is said to be the man who is married to the mother at the time of conception. This is true whether or not the man is the biological father and it can be legally binding even if it is later determined that he is biologically unrelated. The mother is under no legal obligation to disclose to her husband that another man fathered her child. This is one form of paternity fraud and one way that a woman determines the father's rights and responsibilities to her child. She denies paternal rights to the biological father and affords them to her spouse, thus denying reproductive freedom to two men at once.

If the mother of a child is not married, she is under no legal obligation to name a father and thereby deny reproductive freedom to the child's father. Conversely, she may also name anyone she so chooses whether he is the father or not. In some jurisdictions this is more than enough to obtain an order for child support. Both the failure to name a father and the intentional naming of the wrong father constitute forms of paternity fraud and allow the mother to determine the father's parental rights and responsibilities.

Mothers are also afforded the right to abdicate parental responsibility by unilaterally surrendering their children for adoption. In many states, any mother can take a newborn infant to any fire station or emergency room and hand over the child “No name, no shame, no blame” as the saying goes. She doesn’t have to name herself, let alone the father. It is only slightly more complicated for an unmarried mother to surrender older children. In most cases, if she hasn’t named a father, he need not be notified and she is under no obligation to name him. The unilateral decision to surrender a child for adoption is another method a mother can use to determine the rights of the father. While it is generally not well known, in some states putative father registries exist in order to protect the rights of a father who is not married to the mother of his child.

Putative Father Registries

According to the Ohio.gov website and the Department of Job and Family Services a putative father is:

“a man who may be a child’s father, but who is not married to the child’s mother on or before the date that the child is born, or who has not established paternity of the child in a court or administrative proceeding or completed an acknowledgement of paternity affidavit before the filing of an adoption petition for the child.”

Many states have such registries. Should a putative father fail to register within a specified time (30 days after the birth of the child in Ohio), he loses all rights to his child, unless of course, the child’s mother later decides to name him (usually after deciding she wishes to collect child support). On the surface, this appears to be a good idea; it is a way for a father to assert his rights. In practice, putative father registries are a gross violation of a man’s reproductive freedom.

First, they are poorly publicized. Very few men have ever heard of them. If a man doesn’t know such a registry exists, how could he possibly register? Second, they are time limited. If a man fails to register within a specified timeframe, he loses his rights. This serves the state better than it serves the father. It allows the state to grant the adoption of a child without interference from the child’s father. Third, it is a complete invasion of privacy.

Registration consists of full disclosure to the state of the sexual nature of a relationship a man has with a woman. This isn’t simply a one-time thing. A man is required to disclose every sexual relationship he has in order to claim his rights should a child result from that relationship. In addition, should the relationship be ongoing, he must continually re-register; keeping the state informed of his sex life every step of the way.

While it might be argued that registration is completely voluntary and therefore the state is not forcing men to disclose personal and private information, the state is, in fact, coercing men to surrender this information under threat of taking away their children. It is difficult to conceive of a more malignant use of state authority.

Solutions

In order to establish reproductive freedoms for men that are equivalent to the reproductive freedoms enjoyed by women, several steps must be taken. Paternity fraud must be addressed, putative father registries eliminated, and men should be granted the freedom to abdicate parental rights and responsibilities in a similar manner permitted to women. In addition, women must be required to name the potential father(s) of her children so they may be informed they are potentially the father of a child.

Ownership of a man’s sperm must remain with the man who produced it. Without his specific consent (vaginal intercourse would imply consent to conceive), it should be a criminal act for anyone to use his sperm for any purpose whatsoever. The man should also be exempt from any civil liability for such use including child support.

Paternity fraud in all its forms should be a criminal act. No man should be held civilly liable, including for child support, for the theft or the fraudulent acquisition and use of his sperm. No man should be held civilly liable (including child support) without his consent for a child fathered by another man. This should include cases where the man was initially deceived into believing he was the father or the child. This crime could be reduced and/or eliminated by requiring that paternity testing be conducted on all children at birth. All potential fathers could then be tested and a determination of paternity could be made.*

As mentioned previously, the ability to abdicate parental rights and responsibilities should be extended to men. The implementation of this could be difficult; however notification of the potential father could be in the mother’s best interest should she be unwilling or unable to provide care for the child once it is born. Once a father is notified, he should be given a timeframe in which to notify the mother of his decision. This would allow the mother to use this information when exercising her freedom to choose whether or not to terminate the pregnancy or carry the baby to term, or to surrender it for adoption.

These potential solutions would also address the issues discussed in the first two parts of this series where men are ordered to pay child support for fathering children after being the victim of rape or statutory rape. Reproductive freedom is considered to be a fundamental right for women; it is long overdue that it be considered a fundamental right of men.

*Steps would have to be taken to ensure that the DNA samples and profiles would not be used for any other purpose in order to protect the privacy and rights of individual citizens.

On The Mend

As some of you have surely noticed, my offerings here have been scant of late. I have had some medical problems, mainly some rather nasty kidney stones and the resultant treatments and medications that go with that.

Add to that the wonderful experience of getting my medical treatment through the Veterans Administration and it is shaping up to be three months of treatment for what could have been resolved in a couple of weeks.

I have been promising myself for 10 days now to finish an article that still waits for me to work on it when I am not loaded with hydrocodone and pissing blood.

My apologies for all the delays, but I am going to just resign myself to the fact that I can't do what I want to do at the moment. I will place some filler material here as it comes up. And any of you that might have something to post, this would be a very good time.

Thanks for you patience with the patient.

Bullying and Avoidable Grief

B.R. Merrick · 16 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Another one bites the dust." — Freddy Mercury, fellow homo

The usual suspects line up to decry the bullying of Tyler Clementi. The crowdsful of mock mourners will nod in agreement that bullying just has to stop, especially hate-crime-gay bullying. More celebrities like Alan Cumming will insist that we need to stop using words like "faggot," and that such censorship will make it all better. When the world is done with its fake mourning and concern over a cute, cute violinist — just like the fake mourning over Matthew Shepard and Princess Diana — the bullying will continue. Then the crowds will get additional mourning time in, which is great, because we could sure use more hyper-emotion in our increasingly deadened culture. Along with a few more deceased gay guys, the truth will also remain silent. Well, everywhere else but here: Pull your kids out of school.

Now, this particular suicide gets special attention because Clementi was gay, or at least experimenting with gay feelings with another man, which experimentation ended up on the Internet when his roommate posted it there without Clementi's permission. Furthermore, Clementi was not one of the countless victims of government schooling; he was at a university.

Although I can sympathize somewhat more, the bullying to which I was subjected in government school was, for the most part, about being a wimp. Will Alan Cumming do another commercial about that word? How about "fat ass," one that neither Cumming nor I have ever had to worry about? Or "n*gger" (a special epithet that has already been subjected to the social sanction Cumming desires for "faggot," hence the necessity for the asterisk)? Perhaps it's not as easy to lobby government with those words. Forget it.

Unfortunately for Mr. Cumming, I happen to like the words "fag" and "faggot." I think they're funny. I use them constantly around my fag friends, although my personal favorite is "rump ranger": far more descriptive, erotic, and to-the-point. What Mr. Cumming, Ellen Degeneres, and a host of other (I'm assuming) left-leaning celebrities of the gay and bi persuasion fail to understand is that words are far less important that context.

Why is it that not a single fellow rump ranger has objected to my calling him a fag? Probably because he knows he's not being bullied. (Also probably because he knows he's about to get some.) Context is everything. To understand context, of course, you have to understand where the speaker is coming from. Where do bullies come from? Clementi didn't know any better than anyone else. All he knew was that he was stuck with a roommate he didn't like, and made repeated requests to be relieved of this aggravation. This is called "freedom of association." Rutgers is a state school. Even though nobody is forced to go to Rutgers, it apparently acts in much the same way as a forced government school, the kind where younger queens are compelled to spend the most glorious of their waking hours for twelve arduous years breaking rocks alongside bullies. You're not free to associate there, either. This lack of freedom is never questioned. It's going to be questioned (and answered) here: Pull your kids out of school.

Everybody's got an opinion about how bullying starts. The good Christians at The Christian Science Monitor are speculating about it now, after it's too late for that cute little redhead. Apparently, the best the educrats in charge of your brats have been able to come up with is inventing a new term for kids who kill themselves instead of being subjected to further bullying: bullycide. When they aren't inventing new terms that look good on their grown-up term papers, handed around the table to other educrats who immediately harrumph at the atrocity; they're enacting zero tolerance policies, which, according to numerous reports I've read, are just as horrific as bullying. In spite of zero tolerance for action figures with guns, remarkably, the bullying continues. Huh. Somebody write that up and pass it around. Harrumph!

Well, I can write, too. I don't work for the Christian Scientists, so here's how I would have rephrased a few choice passages of this great, big, harrumphing article:

"Most recently – in March – the term [bullycide] pierced national consciousness when a Massachusetts district attorney indicted nine students on criminal charges arising from the suicide of a 15-year-old Irish immigrant named Phoebe Prince who also hanged herself after experiencing persistent bullying."

That should read: "Most recently – in March – the term pierced national consciousness when a Massachusetts district attorney indicted nine students on criminal charges arising from the suicide of a 15-year-old Irish immigrant named Phoebe Prince who also hanged herself after experiencing persistent forced relocation by her own idiotic parents to the scene of the initial bullying."

So this bullycide involved a female victim. That will happen from time to time. It is boys, however, who are overwhelmingly the targets of the physical bullying that grabs headlines and starts the Great Fake Mourning Parade. We'll get to what I think are the reasons why in a bit. In the meantime, pull your kids out of school.

Another Tyler, this one named Tyler Lee Long, was not a rump ranger; straight as an arrow, I guess. He killed himself, too. I doubt any celebrities are going to speak on his behalf. I'd be pleased to be wrong on that. But why did he do it? Bullying. At least, bullying was the last straw, although, by the time I'm done with them, you'll see what sort of parents he was apparently subjected to:

"[I]n March, the Longs filed a lawsuit in federal court against the Murray County School District and Murray High School principal Gail Linder for allegedly failing to protect Tyler despite many entreaties from his parents."

That could very well read: "[I]n March, the Longs filed a lawsuit in federal court against the Murray County School District and Murray High School principal Gail Linder for allegedly failing to protect Tyler despite many entreaties from his parents, who also had a hand in Tyler being sent right back to the bullies." Now that he's dead, Tyler will be unable to sue his own parents. Instead, the money that the Murray County School District receives from the county, state, and Federal governments, who steal that money from everyone else, will be given to what remains of Tyler's dysfunctional family, if they happen to win.

Here's another gem about poor, straight Tyler: "In the seventh grade, a teacher was assigned to walk Tyler to the bus and through the halls, and to sit with him in the cafeteria." Well, I'm sure that helped him feel like less of a "special case," didn't it? He's physically protected, yes, but what about the stares, the whispers, the continual seven-hour-a-day reminder that he's got no goddamned friends? That sort of bullying can continue unabated, as far as the government school is concerned. (That is largely the bullying girls are subjected to. Guess Tyler was really a girl.) What sort of man was Tyler supposed to magically turn into? In the seventh grade, he's definitely turning into one. How does a budding man ever score with young women when a mother or father figure has to escort him around? Do any of these idiots remember what it was like to be a boy? Or is it turned into a big, colossal joke like in "A Christmas Story"?

You will have to forgive my sarcasm, but I'm not actually trying to be funny. You may also think that I am not expressing enough compassion for Tyler's parents. I understand that they're in pain. Unfortunately, I cannot escape the feeling that the pain with which they now suffer could have been easily avoided by removing their kid from the location where the bullying was taking place. (No one's invented a new word for that, though, so bullycides will continue unabated.) I can also remember with exquisite clarity the sort of bullying to which I was subjected, so unfortunately for these grieving parents, I am entirely too angry to give a damn about their grief. What kind of parent subjects a child to this, five times a week, seven hours a day? What is so goddamned necessary about receiving a "free" education at the hands of a bullying government, that the slightly more childish bullying must be tolerated until educrats do something about it? When have educrats ever done anything about anything?

My own parents can be forgiven for not doing anything about the bullying, because they didn't know about it. What I won't forgive them for is being emotionally unavailable to discuss it. I will also not forgive them for sending me into the lion's den in the first place, a building where I never wished to be, and they knew it. And I didn't want the lunch lady to keep the bullies away from my area, or for any teacher to intervene on my behalf. I simply didn't wish to be in the presence of those assholes. I didn't want to be in their classes; I didn't want to be on the same playground; I didn't want to be seen by them, period. I didn't wish to be subjected to government-tolerated bullying at all. It's something called "freedom of association," something that boys on this land mass do not possess. Who is the dumbfuck who came up with the idea that the bullying alone needs to be contained, but nothing else about this sick system needs to be changed?

The article continues shoveling shit: "'We're hopeful that because of the renewed interest in bullying and attention from the federal government, schools will begin to take the necessary steps to makes sure all students, including LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender) students, are safe and have an opportunity to get an education,' Presgraves says."

God, I hate that acronym LGBT! I have virtually nothing in common with lesbians or "transgendered" individuals, except that we're all misunderstood. Well, so are Aborigines and Native Americans. Should we call it LGBTANA? Beyond that, what's this crap about "an opportunity to get an education"? You mean I won't get an education unless I'm stuck in a room with fifteen nice kids and two complete assholes who throw stuff at me whenever the "protecting" teacher has her goddamned back turned?

Let me tell you something about education. I'm not a singer, but I'm aces at harmonizing. I can definitely carry a tune, and if you give me the music, I can sing parts in any choir. I learned this sitting next to my parents in church, both of whom were fine singers in their day, and they could also harmonize. I would pick everything in the music apart every Sunday when we sang hymns for worship. I figured it out on my own, you see. Why did I do this? Because it interested me.

I'm a firm believer in unschooling. You'll get an education when you want one. The Internet has rendered modern government schooling entirely obsolete. Computers and Internet access are now affordable to dirt poor people, thanks largely to the government being taken completely by surprise. Clementi's fuckface roommate used these tools to do something inexcusable, but even from this atrocious example, the ease of using it to communicate and learn is obvious. Kids who want an education can log on and get one. So take your "opportunity" for government education and shove it straight up your ass.

Now, just imagine for a minute that you're a really, really mushy beta male. You and your wife go to a restaurant, where one of the other patrons continually makes loud and lewd remarks in your wife's direction. She doesn't like it, and asks you to do something about it. You speak to the owner. The owner does nothing. The second time you go, the jerk is there again. You can see him through the window. Here are your beta-male options:

1. Go in and hope he's not such a jerk this time. It turns out he's a full-time jerk with disability benefits. You complain again to the manager, who again does nothing. You go back a third time because you're a fucking idiot.

2. Become an alpha male suddenly overnight, and go in because you want to show him up.

3. With your wife waiting outside, go in alone, to discuss the matter with him calmly and rationally, and then get beat up.

4. Go someplace else, and berate your beta-male self that you even thought about going back when the owner didn't do anything the first time.

Now, just imagine for a minute that you're a really, really mushy beta-male father, whose kid is bullied. Look at options 1 through 4 again in the context of school. If you do 1 or 3, you really are a fucking idiot, and when your kid kills himself, he's the one I'm going to feel sorry for, not you; and not so much for the bullying, but for being stuck with such an idiot for a father. If you're hoping for 2, you are still a fucking idiot. If you choose 4, you, like me, are a recovering fucking idiot.

I didn't use to have a problem with what my parents subjected me to with the 12-year sentence, because all parents subject their children to the same sentence. When it's normal, anyone who questions it looks like the fucking idiot. This is understandable. However, it is also no longer tolerable. When someone you love is hurt by another, and you know that you can do nothing to change the other, why in the hell are you sending your loved one back into the same situation? What part of "freedom of association" escapes from what's between your ears?

I think it must have something to do with the research of the late Alice Miller. Children die without love touch, at least babies do. I think children remember this, if only on a subconscious level. There is no magic date when this thought leaves an individual's mind. I wanted to believe that my parents' love was pure. As much love as I got, it wasn't. If you don't pull your kids out of this abusive environment, especially your boys, who are increasingly being fed drugs, then clearly you don't understand the impurity of your own love. The only way to purify it is with truth. Gay, straight, bi, Aborigine; I couldn't care less what your kid identifies as. There is no reason to subject them to bullies, and no excuse. If you do, then I hope someday you attempt number 2 above and get the crap beaten out of you. Then maybe you'll understand what bullycide is really all about.

"The National Center for Educational Statistics, in 2009, said nearly 1 in 3 students between the ages of 12 and 18 reported being bullied in school." Do you get it yet? How are you going to change that? By forcing kids into "freedom of association"? Good luck.

"Studies show that bullies tend to have above-average intelligence and an excess of self-regard. They view themselves as entitled, an inadvertent outgrowth, says Stan Davis, an antibullying consultant in Maine ["antibullying consultant"?!], of a culture that stresses every person's specialness and uniqueness while perhaps giving short shrift to empathy. 'We need to emphasize similarity,' Mr. Davis says, 'not uniqueness.'" Oh God, another anti-individualist in charge of your kids. Wonderful. A little later on: "In education circles, school climate refers to many factors seen as contributing to a positive learning environment: tolerance for differences…" Well, make up your mind. Do you teach sameness or uniqueness? Christ, in the same damn article, no less!

"'I had a lot of anger, hate, and depression,' says Joey, now 20. 'It made me think, "Why am I even here?"'" That's a good question, Joey. Take a good look at your fucking idiot parents. That should give you a clue. And that's how much they love you. As for Tyler Long, all his mother seems to have learned is: "This… was his way of having peace." I'm sorry, grieving mom, but this was Tyler's only outlet of communication, in a family of the emotionally deaf. He apparently failed to communicate loud enough for you to hear.

Boys like Joey, and the Tylers Clementi and Long, whether they're straight or gay, are taught early on to toughen up and take it, by their schools, their peers, their bullies, and their parents. Clearly, they're not able to. They are still developing individuals. By their teen years, they ought to have more fully developed volition, where they can actually walk out of the front door of such schools and never go back. Unfortunately, the culture to which they were all subjected artificially places men their age in boyhood far longer than they belong there, and praises one violent man after another: putting their visages on the coins, erecting statues to them, handing them awards, recreating their love of manly violence in mass media, etc. The only way for them to communicate when school administrators say, "Boys will be boys," when dorm leaders won't reassign them, and when fucking idiot parents won't pull them out of school, is to stop communicating entirely.

Ellen, Alan, educrats everywhere, moms, and dads: the world will never be rid of bullies. Too many of them run for office, and then start lecturing us about bullying. Human nature isn't going to change; bully boys will indeed be bully boys. What is going to change is my low level of tolerance for bad parents. It's just gotten a little lower. Pull your kids out of school!

I suspect that the hurt of these bullycide victims went much deeper than bullying, as mine did and does. The only difference is that I decided against suicide, and in favor of being honest about it. None of us should have been subjected to that which we didn't want. Sadly, these other men didn't get to experience emancipation. If there are any bullied, teenaged males reading this, I say to you now without reservation or fear of legal consequences: To hell with school. Get your own education, and associate with whomever you will. Don't wait for Mommy and Daddy. They're too busy being fucking idiots. If you are a teenaged male, you are a man now. Welcome.

On Female Sexual Offenders

Consider the following taken from a police report:

The victim is a sixteen year old male who delivers groceries and a local convenience store. At 5:45 p.m. he makes a delivery for the second time that day to a motel room. On the second visit, the forty-one year old female suspect invites the victim in for a drink. The victim accepts and drinks two beers. During the conversation, the female suspect puts her hand between the victim's legs and asks if he will tell the police that she did so. The victim says no, out of fear of her reaction. Despite the victim's protest, the female suspect removes the victim's clothing and touches his penis.

At some point, the victim touches the suspect's cat, which makes the suspect very angry. The suspect reacts by grabbing a nearby knife and threatens to castrate the victim. She puts the knife to his penis and yells" Do you want me to cut it off?" A short time later, the victim manages to take hold of the knife and throws it out of reach. The suspect gets very angry and grabs the victim by the neck and attempts to strangle him, causing bruises on his neck. Throughout the incident the victim wants to leave the premises, but fears the reaction of the suspect. The victim remained in the room for over two hours.

Once the victim was allowed to leave the room he reported the incident to his employer who then called police" (Denov, 2001, pp. 321-2).

It is the account of a violent rape, or at the very least, an attempted rape, unless of course, you are a police detective later describing the incident.

"Sexual abuse by women will be more subtle and there won't be any violence… a woman can't be violent… like the recent case of that woman in the motel. Did you hear about it? [laughter} The woman called for a delivery at her motel and then asked the boy in and offered him a beer!… [loud laughter]" (Denov, 2001, p. 322).

After being reminded of the boy's injuries, the detective continued:

"Well, those marks on his neck – those could easily have been hickeys! [laughter]" (Denov, 2001, p. 322).

In her 2001 study, Myriam Denov reports on the culture of denial that exists in the very agencies charged with investigating such crimes that prevents these agencies from even acknowledging the existence of female perpetrators of sex crimes. She observed that the detective's comments effectively render harmless, a violent sex offender based on the assumption that a woman cannot commit such a crime. He also transforms the victim of this violent act into a willing participant.

In a separate study, Denov (2003) reports on the "myth of innocence" (p. 303) surrounding the sexuality of women that influences attitudes and beliefs, and even law concerning the perpetration of sex crimes against children and adults. In several US States, at the time of her report, the crime of rape was defined in such a way that a woman could not be charged with the crime, unless she acted to facilitate a rape in conjunction with a male rapist.

This "myth of innocence' is so ingrained in the culture that the prevailing attitude is that sexual abuse of male victims by female perpetrators are viewed as less serious and less damaging to the victim, than the same crime when committed by a male against a female (Broussard, 1991 in Denov, 2003).

With the existence of such a culture of denial, is it any wonder that we seldom hear about women who perpetrate sexual abuse? Or is it? Perhaps it's not the culture, it's the reality? Do these cases actually exist?

Fifty years ago, it was suggested that child sexual abuse was practically nonexistent. Denov (2003) cites two studies, Weinberg (1955) and Freedman, Kaplan, and Sadock (1975) that suggest incest was extremely rare or almost nonexistent. However, by 1992, over half a million cases of child sexual abuse were reported in the US. The public image of these cases is that of a male perpetrator and a female victim. Certainly if we examine case studies, female sex offenders are quite rare and comprise anywhere from 1.2% to as many as 8% of all cases (Denov, 2003).

On the other hand, self-report studies find prevalence rates approaching 60%.

In two studies of college students, Fromuth, Burkhart, & Webb Jones (1991) and Fromuth and Conn (1997) found that 3% of college men and 4% of college women, respectively, admitted in surveys to committing behaviors consistent with sexual abuse of children when they were adolescents. In a 1987 study, Fromuth and Burkhart found that in two samples of college men, those reporting they had been sexually abused as children, reported that the perpetrator was female 78% and 72% of the time.

These researchers also found qualitative differences in the experience of men vs. that of women who had suffered abuse. Men reported higher incidence of oral-genital contact and intercourse but less violence or threat of violence that women (Fromuth & Burkhart, 1987).

Men also reported their experiences as positive or neutral 85% of the time as compared to 59% of women viewing their experience as negative.

Obviously, the reality of the male experience of sexual abuse has had some influence over culture. However, culture appears to be perpetuated by myth as well. These studies indicate that female perpetrated sexual abuse is quite common and not rare at all, although the effects on the victims may be less severe. It is easy, then, to understand how a detective might come to see a violent sex crime perpetrated by a woman against a boy as a sexual initiation in which the victim was a willing participant.

It also demonstrates the importance breaking down cultural myth that may represent barriers to labeling these crimes as crimes and treating them as such. As a society, if we are concerned about the welfare of all of our citizens, we must insist that our laws, public policies and practices, and government entities not be guided by cultural myth, but by a rational decision-making process not governed by ideology or political agenda.

One Morning In Baghdad

hestia · 18 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Baghdad, Iraq, Spring 2004

"49 weeks down in this desert" said Ian to Elliot as they walked through the rail station on one of their last days of work before handing the reins over to their replacements. Just three weeks until their boots hit the soil in the States after a year spent in the heart of Baghdad, helping patrol the city and training Iraqis to assist Coalition forces with certain tasks in the city. Of all the experiences he and Elliot have shared through their years of friendship, this deployment at the beginning of Operation Iraqi Freedom was hands down the most intense. The tents they shared as Boy Scouts in middle school were just the beginnings of a special sort of friendship that developed through the years. They've done everything together. Built fires, tied knots, stood in line for the latest greatest video game, and chased girls in high school. They even went into the recruiters office together, signing on the dotted line to join the Reserves when they were seventeen, barely in need of razors, barely able to drive, barely turning into men. And here they were, several years later, a part of history, wrapping up a year long deployment to Iraq at the beginning of a controversial war.

Walking into work, the conversation turns to planning for their first weeks back to the US. "I say we have a Stargate SG-1 marathon and then ride down the Oregon Coast. Our last boyish hurrah before you get married Elliot" suggests Ian. Elliot nods, liking the plan very much, adding "this winter we'll have to be sure to go snowboarding again. Man, it's been too long since we had a fun weekend trip like that." Heading into their respective offices, the friends end their jovial conversation until break time when they plan, like always, to meet out front.

The morning was like so many others: mundane, routine, nothing out of the ordinary. Signatures were necessary here and there. Paperwork had to be done to tie up loose ends before the hand off to the replacements in just a matter of days. As the morning dragged on, lunch time was becoming all the more enticing. Around break time, Elliot set his papers aside and got ready to join his buddies outside. As he stood up to leave the room, he noticed something in the window. It looked as if the sun were rising, but this wasn't the right time of day. "Oh fuck" Elliot managed to blurt out, right as the window shattered and the glass came flying at his face, cutting him on all exposed skin and clinging to his uniform. Grabbing his weapon, Elliot took off outside, not fully comprehending what had just happened but on high alert, primed with adrenaline for fight or flight.

When he arrived outside a large number of the Iraqi men who had been outside working were nothing but blood and guts strewn across the ground. The remnants of a vehicle was ablaze and was clearly the car that had held the bomb. Debris was everywhere and the officer in charge was freaking out and panicking, unable to gain composure and issue orders. Time seemed to stand still, yet it passed quickly all the same. The chaos was loud but inside his head was a deafening quiet. Elliot could hear his heart beat clearly with yelling outside his head jumbled and unclear. One of Elliot's soldiers followed him and once they made sure everything was clear, that the danger was gone, they began to offer medical aid to the survivors of the blast. There were too many people who needed help for them to adequately tend to everybody, and some were too far-gone to offer anything beyond comfort and an ear to listen to their precious last words as they died outside under the hot desert sun. The men who could be moved to safety were flung over shoulders and carried away until more help could arrive. The soldiers stopped bleeding with torn up pieces of their own clothing, cleaned and bandaged wounds, provided IVs and treated shock with whatever makeshift blankets they could make, and kept traumatically injured men breathing and alive until transport arrived.

As Elliot and his soldiers ran around assessing the damage, locating those who were still alive and those who needed immediate care, he heard a familiar voice cry out. He looked over to the side of the building where the noise was coming from. Elliot couldn't see much in the bright sunlight, made all the more confusing by the surrounding chaos, but then he saw a peek of camo around the corner. He ran over and realized right away who it was: the man on the ground was Ian. Bloody and gravely wounded, but his friend all the same. Desperately, Elliot applied pressure on the worst of his friend's wounds, ripping off part of his clothing to serve as tourniquets to stop the bleeding. As he worked frantically, Ian told him to stop, “The pain is leaving. I’m going to die, aren’t I?” Before Elliot can answer his buddy, Ian gives him a message to bring home.

“No NO NOOOO!”

Elliot desperately screamed, demanding his friend hold on, but it was too late. He’d lost too much blood. He was hurt too badly to hold on. There was nothing left to do. “I love you, man” said Elliot as his best friend, the closest thing to a brother he had ever had, slipped away to the other side. Ian was just twenty years old. He was intelligent, talented, extremely gifted in the sciences, and had a world of opportunity awaiting him at home. So many plans for the future, so many dreams left unfulfilled. All gone in just a second as he left this world too soon.

With his DCUs ripped, torn, and covered in blood, with bits of debris lodged into his helmet and even stuck on his body armor, it was only then Elliot realized he was injured and could attend to his own medical needs. Bits of shrapnel from the bomb, bone fragments from the people who had died, and gravel from the ground were lodged in wounds all over his body and he realized he had been treating patients, bloody patients, with his wounds unprotected. He might not only be injured but could have been exposed to HIV, hepatitis, or any number of other diseases. After returning to camp, he went for medical treatment and returned to his tent where he could finally let the events of the day sink in. Thirty five men had been killed. Men who were simply trying to feed their families were murdered for being involved with the Coalition Forces. Some of the soldiers he worked with were dead, and his tent was now empty except for the ghost of his best friend, the laughs they shared inside just this morning nothing but a cherished memory now. He looked over to the cot across the tent, the one that no longer had an occupant, a friend gone in just a instant… Elliot just sat there and stared for a while. How much time he’ll never know but it felt like a lifetime. Unsure of what to think or how to feel, he lay in his cot, listening to mortar attacks around the airport until he finally awoke the next morning, groggy and numb, and called home to connect with loved ones for the first time since the blast. One voicemail said, “there’s been an accident, but I am okay.”

Two weeks later, when his boots hit ground in the USA, the homecoming was not the joyful celebration originally imagined, but rather a dark and somber occasion. They were home with three fewer men than they left with last spring. They’d said goodbye to three brothers in arms just about the time they thought they were safe and danger was over. Elliot kept his promise to Ian and visited his friend’s parents to share the message he had been entrusted with. This wasn’t all, he said; far from it in fact. He had an apology to offer for these people who were nearly family. With a guilty survivor’s conscience he offered an apology for not getting there in time, for not being able to save their son. They were supposed to come home together. They always did everything together.

Arlington National Cemetery, Spring 2010

Six years since the blast and Ian still lives on in hearts, in love, and in memory. Once again Elliot traveled to his grave in Arlington, as he does whenever the opportunity has arisen, to place a wreath on the grave of his lost friend. This time is different, however, as he doesn’t go alone but brings his little girl along. Ever curious, the little one asked why they are here. Elliot told her that he wants her to know a special man, a true American hero, somebody who was brave even when it hurt. His little girl doesn’t yet understand death, but she does know what it means to be brave and serve in the Middle East. She remembers well when her daddy was gone for a year. With the innocence only a child can posses, she lays her small American flag on Ian’s grave and offers a salute for “being Daddy’s bwave fwend.” This she repeated as she and Elliot walked away, her tiny fingers clasped in her daddy’s strong, but trembling hand.

Male Studies: Back for Round 2

Paul Elam · 18 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Last year at Wagner College at Staten Island, New York, we witnessed a first in academic history with the first annual conference on male studies. It raised a minor media firestorm and for good reason. At long last there was a group of esteemed academicians recognizing and asserting the need for the study of men and boys that was not controlled by gender ideologues. In short, they want to do some good for a culture that is attempting to limp forward paying attention to only one sex.

Naturally there was vehement and often scathing resistance from those whose toxic hegemony over this subject has long been an unchallenged norm.

And how did the advocates for this new discipline react?

It is with this, the press release for the 2nd annual conference on male studies, to be held at the prestigious New York Academy of Medicine.

This post, I am beaming with pride to say, is the first notice of the new conference anywhere. The good people of the Foundation for Male Studies have allowed me to run this in advance of the actual release to the public. PE

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: FOUNDATION FOR MALE STUDIES

FOUNDATION FOR MALE STUDIES APRIL 6 CONFERENCE TO FOCUS ON DETERIORATING STATUS OF BOYS AND MEN.

NEW YORK: The Foundation for Male Studies will focus on the research and programs needed to reverse the downward spiral now effecting virtually all aspects of the lives of men and boys, at the Second Annual International Conference on Male Studies – Looking Forward to Solutions, April 6, 2011.

Edward M. Stephens, MD, FMS' Founder and Chair says that in addition to the conference's solution-geared presentations by leading authorities, the Foundation is calling for papers from academics on how to best deal with increasing levels of male unemployment, depression, suicides, high school and college dropout rates and related problems.

Marianne Legato, MD and Tom Mortenson will co-chair the conference at the New York Academy of Medicine. Dr. Legato, founder and director of Columbia's College of Medicine Partnership for Gender-Specific Medicine, edited the first text on gender medicine, and founded the journal, Gender Medicine. A widely acclaimed author of works on men's and women's health, her most current book is Why Men Die First. Mr. Mortenson is senior scholar at the Pell Institute for the Study of Opportunity in Higher Education and the recipient of major national awards for contributions to educational research.

Others participating in the conference are Gordon Finley, PhD, Professor of Psychology at Florida International University, who will speak on the need for a national policy on fatherhood; Michael Gilbert, a Senior Fellow at the University of Southern California Annenberg School and author of The Disposable Male on coping with the cascading loss of male jobs, Katherine Young, PhD and Paul Nathanson, PhD, both of McGill University, authors of published studies on the origins and implications of misandry – the hatred of men.

Scholars seeking to submit papers for the conference may do so by writing to elfenbein@malestudies.org by March 15. 2011. Or call 845-362-0893

Rape Culture: Female Scam, Male Nightmare

Paul Elam · 19 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Rape culture is a term used within women's studies and feminism, describing a culture in which rape and other sexual violence against women is common and in which prevalent attitudes, norms, practices, and media condone, normalize, excuse, or encourage sexualized violence.

That is just one of the definitions for rape culture I found online. It is as good a definition as any for something that does not, and never has, existed. And it has been taking its rightful place alongside a nonexistent gender wage gap, nonexistent employment discrimination, nonexistent media bias and a nonexistent domestic violence crisis that only affects women, continuing the litany of nonexistent feminist outrages.

This collection of imagined slights and hurts form the basis of Lie Culture. And it is nothing new. We have been lying to women since the first one asked, "Does this mastodon hide make my ass look fat?" Rather we have been lying to women since the first one started crying and getting cold in the bedroom when being told the truth. And that trump card, issued in the name of survival biology, has long ensured that for the most part, women will not be inconvenienced with reality. And nor will men who want to remain on their "good" side.

In that light, feminism has succeeded, by and large, by counting on public willingness to accept two mutually exclusive realities at the same time. First, women are exactly equal to men in capability, aptitude, strength and every other measure of human potential. And two, women are the weaker, unsupported victims of stronger, more aggressive men, requiring government and all other manner of intervention to give them a helping hand. Yes, people, when you buy the lie, they are both at the same time. It's like saying Pee Wee Herman could beat the crap out of Mike Tyson in a fair fight, but we need to give him a .45 auto before he gets in the ring.

Thus every area where feminism has shaped public perception has forced intellectual integrity into the shadows.

Rape culture is just the latest offering in string of imagined curses on the lives of our all powerful, yet strangely helpless women. We don't just have a problem with rape as a crime, but we are all complicit in it. The culture itself wants women to get raped. The criminal justice system, from police to prosecutors to judges and juries, all smile and wink and look the other way as already traumatized women get raped a second time by a system that is indifferent and uncaring. The media is in on the action, glamorizing sexual violence against women. And our colleges? They're the worst. We might as well leave mattresses and handcuffs between the bushes on campus to make things a little more convenient on the rapists.

Yeah, that's the ticket. Rape is hawt, dude, it's all the rage. We hear this all the time now from the same people that say chivalry is a patriarchal conspiracy, while demanding that men still practice it. Never mind that the simple and often false accusation of rape will destroy a man's life. Never mind that it happens all the time because women can count on the system to react with mindless vengeance on their behalf. Forget about all the men who have unjustly served the lion's share of their adult lives behind bars because we are desperate to convict somebody, anybody, when a rape has been alleged. Just accept it. We all want women to get raped and we have built an entire culture that will ensure it happens.

Just ask Keith Edwards, feminist blowhard and Indoctrinator-in-Chief at Hamilton College. He has developed a new program for all freshman males (read: rapists), who attend that school. It's a class called "She Fears You." The intent of this program is to combat rape culture, by branding innocent students, all male, as sexual deviates in waiting, and treating them that way from the first day they attend school at that institution. Edwards is hell bent on proving to young men how unambiguously dangerous they really are. All men are potential rapists, and Edwards is going to by God set them straight.

Oh, and according to the good professor, they are also racists and homophobes, a couple of bonus pejoratives he tossed in for good measure. Perhaps it was to give his reeducation camp a well rounded effect, or maybe to cover what few men attend that aren't actually rapists. Hell, they're men, there has to be something wrong with them, right?

Obviously this is a political operation, and one that seeks to invade and destroy the very consciousness of any man that chooses to get his education at Hamilton. Despite objections from students, many of the faculty, the Hamilton Alumni organization, and other concerned groups, the elite powers to be at that institution backed the crusading Edwards, and pressed forward with the class- even sending out threatening emails to male students, warning them, in bold red letters, that the event was mandatory.

It is hard to fight off the knee jerk reaction to grab Edwards by the scruff of his neck and give him an earful of reality, like the fact that only a microscopic fraction of men are rapists. Even better, one might press him to answer, if such alarm is warranted from the mere presence of males in the university setting, then where were the equally strident warnings that should have gone out to all the female students and their parents? Why are they not being warned about the dangerous "rape culture" that awaits them in the school they have chosen to attend? I mean, shouldn't women be damned afraid to attend Hamilton?

Aside from the fact that you would not get a credible answer to any of those questions, there is actually a more important and less pursued concern in the midst of all this contrived hoopla.

What about all the men in those classes who have already been sexually abused and victimized by female teachers in the elementary schools, middle schools and high schools they attended prior to attending Hamilton? The fact is that there is an all but silent epidemic of female teachers in America that are sexually abusing, raping, young male students. And they are getting away with it, either at the hands of a judicial system that seldom delivers more than a slap on the wrist to the perpetrators, or the media that is as likely to play the "hot for teacher" angle as it is to covering it like the crime it is. This, and much worse is fostered by an indifferent and misandric culture that ultimately either finds blame with the male victim, or sees him as just another guy who got lucky, or both.

Oh yeah, 12 year old Johnny should be high fiving it because his 36 year old math teacher groomed him into satisfying her perverse sexual needs. Maybe his celebration will end when she comes back pregnant and sues him for child support, and wins because the same judicial system that convicted her for raping him now thinks he is liable for the child that rape produced.

There's your fucking rape culture. The only one that ever existed. It targets men, not women. And it continues unabated while feminists caterwaul and shriek about a problem that only exists in their imagination.

We should have been paying attention to this, doing something about it. But instead we begin an era of marching young college men into academically disguised indoctrination camps, targeting their innate masculinity as a social evil, and insisting they become something more appealing in the eyes of gender ideologues. In doing so we reveal another of the many realities that we are so often loathe to examine.

It is not the students we need to worry about, but the teachers. Whether it is the perverted schoolmarm with a secret taste for little boys, or the ideologically depraved and effete academic activist with an administrative pass for ax grinding, the educational environment is now one that can only be described as predatory.

This might offer some insight into why our boys and young men have been falling ever by the wayside in school, or how they so often end up in chemical handcuffs like Ritalin for sake of an autocratic teacher's convenience.

But hell, without the truth we are going to have a tough time addressing those things as well.

Will you people please stop paying attention to this assclown?

Editors Note: Even though I took a bit of a spanking in it, I really enjoyed this piece from fellow Spearhead contributor and blogger Ferdinand Bardamu. He is challenging the idea of whether debating with the likes of David Futrelle is beneficial. As far as current events, I am committed to the upcoming exchange with Futrelle, so it is very unlikely that I would change my mind.

But I was hoping that Bardamu's post would drag up some discourse on the matter of debate. When it is and isn't worth it, that sort of thing. While the intellectually scrawny Futrelle isn't a real threat to anyone, I would still like to hear readers ideas on whether he is a waste of time. PE

Will you people please stop paying attention to this assclown?

By Ferdinand Bardamu

As I've mentioned before, I generally don't bestow attention on blogger haters who aren't in the general vicinity of popularity that I am. It's precisely what they want – a writer with a vastly larger readership to train their guns on them and give their stats an unearned boost. Starve the trolls and they'll either go away or curl up and die. Which is why I am making this plea to my fellow manosphere denizens: will you please stop writing about David Futrelle?

For those who don't know who David Futrelle is, he's the twerp behind Manboobz, a blog that "offers a critique of the Men's Rights Movement and anti-Feminism generally." He writes in his opening statement:

> I've been watching the Men's Rights movement, such as it is, for some time, with a mixture of amusement, horror and disgust. It's a movement that's bad for everyone — for men, for women, for children, and probably even for my cat, though I haven't yet quite worked out how. The best thing you can say about the Men's Rights Movement is that it doesn't, and hopefully never will, have anything near the impact on the world that feminism has had over the years. And this blog, in its own little way, hopes to help keep that way.

Apparently, he never read that Schopenhauer quote about how truth is first ridiculed, then it is violently opposed, then it is accepted as being self-evident.

Manboobz is little more than twelfth-rate feminist boilerplate with the added twist of anti-men's rights activism, all leavened with snark. Snark is the preferred humor of dweebs like Jon Stewart, Stephen Colbert and all Beigeist posers who like to imagine themselves as heroic underdogs being pissed on by the evil elites, when in fact they're the elites doing the pissing. And make no mistake, David Futrelle is carrying water for our cultural overlords, evidenced in part by the fact that he can post his opinions under his real name while the majority of anti-feminist bloggers have to use pseudonyms to avoid impoverishment, censure or even imprisonment in some countries. "Free speech" my ass.

David even has an "enemies list" of anti-feminist sites that gets top billing on his blogroll over actual feminist blogs like Jezebel, Feministing and Shakesville. The "enemies list" includes such diverse contrarians like myself, Roissy, MarkyMark, Dalrock, Laura Grace Robins, Elusive Wapiti, and Robert Lindsay. In fact, I was the recipient of Futrelle's effete ire recently, when he took umbrage at my discombobulation of "gay pride":

> You know, I didn't bother reading the whole thing, which has something to do with Carl Paladino, and apartheid, and elephant poking, whatever that means, but this little nugget stood out in the latest post on In Mala Fide, a generally retrograde Men's Rights-ish blog:
> > "Gay culture" … has about as much cultural legitimacy as redneck jokes. A bunch of nearly-naked men marching down a major city street beating each other with riding crops and wearing makeup is not a > > legitimate expression of culture, any more than a group of married dudes finger-fucking their wives on a giant vagina float would be an expression of culture.

Since he's clearly incapable of following a metaphor, I'll lay it out for him en anglais – radical gay activists, in their obnoxious way of shoving their lifestyles in the faces of the heterosexual majority and demonizing them, are poking and prodding an elephant.

Elephants are big, heavy and have sharp tusks, and can gore or stomp you to death without breaking a sweat. If gays don't clean up their act and stop treating straight people with contempt (hat tip: grerp), they could inspire a violent homophobic backlash. Capisce?

Under normal circumstances, a nobody like Futrelle wouldn't be worth the mental energy it takes to read one of his posts. Feminist quislings are a dime-a-dozen, and this guy is just an attention whore who's looking for his fifteen minutes of fame. And yet for some reason, MRAs continue to waste time on this idiot. It's bad enough that the majority of his commenters appear to be anti-feminists, but men's rights bloggers are now devoting blog space to Futrelle's tiresome dribblings.

I first heard of Futrelle when my fellow Spearhead contributor Pro-Male/Anti-Feminist Tech wrote him up as a hater. That post lead to another one where he made some additions to the Catalog of Anti-Male Shaming Tactics, which inspired me to come up with my own addition, so PM/AFT gets off. Next, Rob Fedders of the NO MA'AM blog lambasted Futrelle as "the Tit Man":

> David is another typical Western Male Fucktard, thinking that even on-line sucking up to fembots will slather his withering pole. A true SNAG (Sensitive New Age Guy) in every dimension.
> Reality is not so, Mr. Futrelle, it is not so.
> You are anethema to female vaginal lubrication.
> Hope you feel proud! You are the reason panties are starting to be modelled without the protective cotten-lined-gussets! Who needs such a thing when the West produces poofs like you?
> Hopefully, this blog and your willingness to be a dancing jackass for the matriarchy will help me illustrate this – over time, of course. A suave man of your persuasion will take many moons to out-manoeuvre.

Rob is now accusing Futrelle of libel for calling him a "fag basher." I'm not up on Canadian hate speech laws, but an MRA suing a feminist toady into next Monday would just make my day. Talk about cosmic justice.
But the last straw came yesterday. Paul Elam, another one of my Spearhead comrades, laid into our very own Menopause Man over at A Voice for Men. And he ended it with this nugget:

> Take heart though. I have challenged Futrelle to a debate, he has accepted and chosen domestic violence for the topic. Should be coming through with the beginning of the debate late this coming week.

You read that right. Paul Elam, former editor of MND and one of the most well-known proponents of men's rights, is debating a feminist blogger whom no one has ever heard of.

I don't understand. Why must you people give this nitwit the attention he craves? David Futrelle is nobody important. He's not a Jessica Valenti, a Melissa McEwan, or a Hugo Schwyzer. He's not even a Barry Deutsch. He's a miserable mediocrity who's trying to get famous, an ant in our blog ecosphere. All you're doing is feeding his ego. I feel bad about even having to pollute my abode with his name.

To my brethren, I say forget about Manboobz, and forget about David Futrelle. He's not worth your time or your ire. Paul, good luck in your debate, but after you've kicked Futrelle's ass, exorcise him from your brain. Your bullets should be conserved for bigger, more important prey.

And David, this is the last time I'm ever mentioning you here or anywhere else, so relish it. Oh, and you're welcome.

Why Men Won't Commit

Paul Elam · 21 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

This video is probably the best explanation of how men feel and act when it comes to commitment. It does a great job of explaining the male psyche, as well as dismantling mainstream shaming methods.

The greatest point it makes is to describe the difference in incentive and reward that men and women get from commitment, as well as the different dreams that men and women have.

The video is made by a guy called Tom Golden. He is in my opinion the most intelligent and insightful psychotherapist I have ever spoken with. And he is an incredible, but under recognized asset to men in western culture. He's also a great asset to women, too, if they are fortunate enough to accept his wisdom.

All About Your Dick

"♪Isn't it awfully nice to have a penis?♫" – Eric Idle, The Meaning of Life

I remember years ago hearing about a program at Ohio State University (originally from a Newsweek article) to put signs in the urinals on campus that would inform the men reading the signs: "You hold the power to stop rape in your hand."

I remember back then that I thought the men's movement was mainly about reconnecting with boyhood and blaming daddy. I do not remember the word "misandry." I remember being a bit pissed (okay, pun intended) about that little program at that stupid university. Then I got on with the business of living, and forgot all about it. I never stopped to think about all the implications of that terrible statement.

The reason why I didn't is because I read that news item while living and learning at a university run by a religion that told me that God Himself was not happy about my penis, either. I grew up with actual doctrine surrounding this loveable organ that was reminiscent of, and premised upon, the article found here. Based on rhetoric like that, these were essentially my church's teachings about dicks:

You must never touch it.

You must never let anyone else touch it, unless it's your wife.

You must only let her touch it when it is the highest expression of love, and within rather arbitrary limits.

If it is touched in any other manner, God will eventually withdraw His love.

I am not exaggerating. That was how I thought. That was what I was taught, and what I made an effort at teaching to poisoning others with. Gentlemen, it is the same as the feminist-embracing Left. It is misandric.

Feminists make headway with social conservatives when it comes to pornography (male-centered), prostitution (male-centered), and dicks (obviously male-centered – heck, they're located in the exact center of a man's front side!). They made headway with me, and I didn't even realize it. They are, the femin*ism* and the Mormon*ism,* systems of coercion, meaning that they are death-oriented. Apparently, at least one young man has done just that, when the church made him feel bad for enjoying being a man. He was taught the above four rules, and both of us unfortunately translated those rules as follows:

You must never enjoy it.

You must never let anyone else enjoy it, unless it's your wife.

You must only let her enjoy it when it is the highest expression of love, and within rather arbitrary limits.

If it is enjoyed in any other manner, God, the same loving Father who gave you one, complete with a sex drive, will eventually withdraw His love.

Who could handle a threat like that? You don't want to love imperfect little me? Then I'll just take myself out of the game right now. How do you feel about that? Suicide for that young man was, unfortunately, as childish as the teachings with which he suffered so.

Let's acknowledge a few facts, shall we? The human race has evolved: fact. We are, in general, a hell of a lot smarter than we used to be, and not just because we learn our history lessons well (which we don't): fact. We can now gain complete control, if we all choose to do so as individuals, over procreation: fact. Men still grow dicks: fact. Therefore, the only reason left in modern times for a man to have a penis is simply to enjoy being a man who has one. Secondarily, it is for physical and other emotional enjoyment (separate from the first reason). Thirdly, for having children if he so chooses. Lastly, for taking a piss, which, like the previous two, is permanently intertwined with the first and only reason left to have it.

Try enjoying your dick when I tell you that you have the power to stop rape and child molestation in your hand. Try just a little harder when I tell you that God is watching, and he's rather puritanically disgusted. I know that I've seen many a porn movie when the "bottom," whether male or female, has blurted out, "Yeah! Oh baby! Oh! Oh! Unh-do you realize that you have the power to stop rape deep inside me, baby?"

We are almost, almost – in the eyes of those who spout this nonsense – evil, simply by virtue of permitting one to dangle there between our thighs. This does not come from any God. This stems from one of the facts mentioned above: This is an evolutionary concern.

I suspect that volitionally composed groups of humans, long ago, were greatly worried about building future generations to carry on their legacies, and keeping those generations in line with traditions, which we embrace to this day because they give the illusion of continuity, certainty, and immortality. Men, guard your dicks. That's where we come from. That is still what a great many of us think.

We now live in a world with such rapidly advancing knowledge, tastes, economic stability (for the most part), mobility, and cultural transformations, that keeping this old way of thinking has become quaint. It's not so quaint to me, anymore. It's unhealthy and counterproductive. We can control to an amazing degree where and when we will spill seed for procreative purposes. We can even reach deep in the womb to rescue, whether prematurely or to full term, the children our seed creates. We do not need dicks for this. All we need is the ability to manufacture semen, whether inside the body or, perhaps someday, even outside of it, and the ability to transfer that semen into the womb. There are many non-sexual ways to do this, if you care to use your imagination. I don't.

All that is left is possession of a dingle, and the enjoyment of that ownership. This does not mean go out and have sex. This does not mean you can't live a life of celibacy if you so desire. Nor does it mean that you don't have tremendous responsibilities laid upon your manly shoulders when you volitionally spill seed to grow babies. But you will at the very least come into contact with your manhood several times a day in a nonsexual fashion. That's why urinals should be free from stupid signs about an activity in which you are never going to engage. You should be able to enjoy a good piss in solitude, or side by side quietly with a fellow hanger, without being lectured about how naughty your boys are. Therefore, allow me to give you some new rules, based on the above facts:

You should enjoy being a man with a dick.

You should call it by whatever euphemism or pet name you choose. Refer to the song linked at the top of the article if you need ideas.

You may enjoy it with someone whose body you might also enjoy.

Any God that disapproves of any of the above enjoyment is not a god with whom you should want to spend a friggin' eternity.

That does not need to be written on a urinal. That should be self-evident. It should also be self-evident that Ohio State's misandristic experiment is complete bullshit. Any woman who does not love your dick does not love men; any woman who does not love men may very well worship the male form (as some gay men do), but you shouldn't want a woman who merely worships your body. How does that worship continue when you are wheelchair bound, or become impotent? This is a question to ponder the next time you have to relieve yourself.

A woman's genitals are rated R; a man's genitals are, for the most part, rated X. The mere sight of one, in this culture and many others, is considered threatening. We definitely can't let children see that!

I remember watching Bill Maher talk to Camille Paglia on his old show "Politically Incorrect." He spoke the truth. He talked about the transformation that a man's body has to go through in order for sex to take place, and the pressure that a man feels to perform in this manner. Therefore, your genitals are rated X, but your erections are definitely rated XXX.

Misandrist women are afraid of them; a lot of gay men want them disconnected from the rest of the man; a great many men fear their own. Probably a few of my straight brothers have already stopped reading. "Will this stupid fag ever shut up?" I will when my body and manhood get the respect they deserve.

I spent a great deal of time trying to fit in with the virginal straight boys at my college (remarkably free of urinal signs). I tried "going straight" via "reparative" therapy. Luckily, by the time I started this therapy, the church had abandoned revulsion and electroshock treatments for us freaks. I actually learned a lot about my family, and about how I viewed myself in society, through therapy. Unfortunately, the premise of the therapy was wrong, and I ended up wasting a lot of time feeling guilty for "sins" that involved the "naughty bits."

Life goes on and things change; you can't stop either one of those processes. (It's natural law.) As my life went on, and as I removed myself, however reluctantly, from the miniature, virginal, straight society to which I was subjected, I became aware of a much larger world. Moving back to the East Coast awakened a great many new thoughts. Here, people have gotten on with life in a great many different combinations, from a great many other parts of the world. All of a sudden, by doing my own thing, I fit in.

Straight, "virtuous," married sex is just one option. One of many. It was only a matter of time before I discovered the truth about my church and organized religion in general. To make this as brief as possible, I no longer wish to be straight. You heard me right.

Being gay is no better. It comes with a complete set of stainless steel challenges. But holy cow, do I love it! Far more importantly, I love being a gay guy. If reincarnation is existent, I would hope to come back once more as a gay man. That song at the top of the article is one with which I agree completely. It is awfully nice to have a penis!

My former religion always encouraged learning, but the process had boundaries all around it: "Don't learn over there! Oh no! Over here. That's better. Now, don't go anywhere." By fully embracing the way I want to be, you would not believe the things I have learned about men. Many of those things probably wouldn't interest any but the prurient, so I'll keep them to myself. However, I have seen vulnerability, heard secrets, kept confidences, grown closer, made friends (yeah, friends who will actually help you move), cried with, hugged, laughed with, caressed, loved, hurt with, and genuinely appreciated a great many of my brothers. It's wonderful, what I've learned. I wouldn't trade in my vast knowledge of manhood for a hundred heavens. Every single man who has taught me more about myself, and the world in which I live, has a dick. Every single one of those puppies is beautiful, including the great many I haven't seen.

Sure, a man's body, like fire or water, can be good or it can be horribly destructive. Nobody runs around disparaging fire and water, though. Why? Because we need them. The uses of both far outweigh the occasional havoc they wreak.

I say here and now that the uses and benefits of manhood far outweigh the few scum out there who rape and molest. I also declare quite boldly that although dicks are no longer evolutionarily necessary due to our increasingly superior intellect in the animal kingdom, the benefits of owning a pecker and associating with other owners, whether platonically or not, far outweigh the absence of that manly knowledge.

Feminists and social conservatives, arch enemies in every other way, would regulate manhood back at least a century. They all believe in using coercion. The death that flows from the initiation of coercion as I see it is as follows:

First, coercion kills volition. Consider this coercion against your erection, the first physical sign revealing the desire that has led to the plans you're making in the sack. Dead.

Next, coercion kills relationships. Fear of legal reprisals now requires young men to use condoms and take the semen with them when they are done, so that unplanned pregnancy does not occur. In my former religion, it can actually get a young man kicked out, and if that young man has invested his entire life in the church – something that is encouraged – the end result can be devastating. A lack of trust with a sex partner is a terrible development. When trust dies, so do relationships.

After that, coercion kills wealth. Your wealth, as I explained in the STR article linked to above, is everything about your life that makes it worth living: your muscle (or lack thereof), your balding scalp, your erections, your schooling, your accomplishments, your scores, your woman, your porn collection, your car, your dog, your house, your memories, your relationships (which are already dying above, with your erections), your pain, your grief, your gout, your bad heart, your impotence, your celibacy, the injustices you suffer, your band of brothers supporting you, your kids, all of it. Wealth is a great deal more than stuff. What might you have learned if you were allowed to pursue the pleasure your dick can provide? You may not care to learn what I have learned, but Good Lord, man, have you any idea what you're throwing away? When forces from outside prevent you from learning, say goodbye to your wealth.

When coercion goes on long enough, or is terrible enough, it kills you. I would bet just about any amount of money that a few years have been shaved off the ends of the lives of those three young men falsely accused of dick crimes at Duke University.

Your penis, circumcised or not, is just as beneficial to your life full of wealth as your eyes and ears. You hold the power to stop rape in those organs as well. You won't see any signs put on mirrors or headphones, though. Those two body parts are rated G, and are also possessed by women. Every penis-hating misandrist out there is flat-out wrong. I can assure you I am through listening to them. If I ever chance to accidentally read one of their little men's room reminders, my rated G ears will hear the sound of my own laughter followed by piss hitting a plastic-coated sign.

DV Debate: David Futrelle Fulminates; Loses Temper and Debate

Paul Elam · 25 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Below is the entirety of a debate on domestic violence that I had with David "Manboobz" Futrelle. It was a fun debate that served its purpose. And part of that purpose was to demonstrate convincingly that in the world of blogging on men's issues, David is an unknown now for the same reasons he will remain one for all time.

He's a fucking moron. He was, though, annoying enough to gain his 15 minutes of mediocrity.

Now that it's over, it's over. He won't be getting attention from AVfM again.

PE

And now for the debate.

David Futrelle of the blog Manboobz has agreed to enter a debate on the subject of domestic violence with me here at A Voice for Men. Since Mr. Futrelle maintains a blog in which he asserts that MRA's have pretty much everything wrong, and in which he specifically claims he will, concerning MRA's, "dismantle their rickety logic and dubious statistics," it should follow that he will do just that on the subject of DV, starting right now.

During the brief negotiations it was decided that my excellent centerpiece article on domestic violence, and the research it was based on, will serve as the object of his dissent. For readers' convenience I am posting the video version of that article and the research links here as well.

Quote from abstract: Particular attention is paid to the cultural influences that shape our conceptualization of "domestic violence" and the fact that empirical research suggests that domestic violence has been falsely framed as exclusively male initiated violence.

As I stated in the article and video, the main assertions I am putting forth about domestic violence are generally as follows.

1. All domestic violence not in self defense is wrong.

2. Sex is not at all predictive in either perpetration or victimization of DV.
3. Men are unfairly labeled as default perpetrators by the domestic violence industry, and ignored as victims, as can be easily supported with an examination of laws like VAWA and the dominance of female only DV services (funding).
4. Finally, that feminist ideologues and feminist organizations are actively involved in keeping things this way, as evidenced by organizations like NOMAS, who joined an amicus brief to shut men out of services for domestic violence in California.

Mr. Futrelle has 48 hours to respond to this by emailing his response to me, which I will post in its entirety. There is no word limit, and Futrelle may respond to any of the preceding four points, or anything else he chooses directly from the video or article.

The debate will terminate after five exchanges.

David Futrelle, of the blog Man Boobz, [http://manboobz.blogspot.com/] replies:

Paul, you have delivered up a fairly standard-issue MRA argument on Domestic Violence, from your pro forma anti-feminist jabs down to the almost ritual invocation of Martin Fiebert's sacred Annotated Bibliography.

Like most such efforts, your argument depends on a highly selective reading of the scientific literature on DV, virtually ignoring a huge number of studies — literally several thousand — that directly contradict your conclusions. [MK] You've ignored the serious methodological flaws of the studies you cite, and drawn conclusions from the research that the researchers themselves have stated explicitly are completely false. Your grand conclusion, that "domestic violence has nothing to do with what sex you are" could not be more wrong.

Let's deal with the first two points first.

Anyone looking into the vast literature on the subject will be struck at once by the radically different conclusions researchers have drawn from their data.

One group of studies, the one that you relied on almost exclusively, advances an idea called "gender symmetry." That is, they seem to show that men and women start fights, and land blows, in roughly equal percentages.

A second, and much larger, group of studies, finds men responsible for the overwhelming majority of DV. According to a nationwide survey conducted by the National Institute of Justice and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, some 22% of women said they had been assaulted by a current or former intimate partner at some point in their lives; only 7% of men said the same. [NIJ]

And that may actually understate the imbalance: indeed, one Department of Justice survey found that 95% of the victims of DV were women. These studies also find that women are injured far more frequently, and far more severely, by DV: one study of domestic disturbance calls involving injury found that women were injured 94% of the time; men, only 14% of the time. [APA]

There's a good reason why we should take these studies more seriously than the ones you cited. Most of the "gender symmetry" studies are surveys conducted using a methodologically flawed research tool called the Conflict Tactics Scale, originally developed by researcher Murray Straus in the 1970s. Indeed, the vast majority of the studies examined in the John Archer meta-study you mentioned used the CTS. [MK]

Researchers using the CTS ask survey respondents about an assortment of specific acts of violence. What the CTS doesn't ask about are the causes, contexts, or consequences of these acts of violence.

As a result, one critic notes, the CTS "equates a woman pushing a man in self-defense to a man pushing a woman down the stairs. It labels a mother as violent if she defends her daughter from the father's sexual molestation. It combines categories such as "hitting" and "trying to hit" despite the important difference between them. Because it looks at only one year, this study equates a single slap by a woman to a man's 15 year history of domestic terrorism." [MYTH]

This problem is exacerbated by the lack of attention given to the motivations behind the violence. While both men and women use violence to express anger, a number of studies show that men are far more likely to use domestic violence to control their victim, to "show who is boss." Other studies that look at motivation find that much female "violence" is in fact self-defense. [APA]

There are other serious problems with the CTS as a measure of DV. The first version of the questionnaire left out sexual assaults by current or former intimate partners, which according to the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) make up nearly 20% of all spousal assaults; such assaults are overwhelmingly committed by men against women. [MK] And the CTS also ignores violence that happens after partners separate, another critical omission, because violence tends to escalate, sometimes quite dramatically, after a separation. The NCVS found that separated women are 8 times as likely to face violence from an ex-partner than married women are from their husbands. [MK]

Researchers who use the CTS and similar surveys have acknowledged that their surveys provide only a limited look at DV as a whole, and that they do not capture much of the most serious kinds of abuse.

Unfortunately, the Men's Rights Activists who have seized upon these surveys as evidence that women are equally abusive as men, ignoring these crucial caveats.

As a result, the researchers most involved in developing and refining the CTS over the years have explicitly denounced the opportunistic use of their findings by MRAs and others with an axe to grind against feminism. Murray Straus, for example, has noted that "the statistics are likely to be misused by misogynists and apologists for male violence." [MF]

And you may recall Richard Gelles; he was one of the original developers of the CTS and has been one of the loudest proponents of the "gender symmetry" argument. You quoted him in your post to buttress your points. But he has been as scathing towards the MRAs who misrepresent his research as he has been to those who originally greeted his research with threats:

> "The statement that men and women hit one another in roughly equal numbers is true, however, it cannot be made in a vacuum without the qualifiers that a) women are seriously injured at seven times the rate of men and b) that women are killed by partners at more than two times the rate of men….

> [W]hen we look at injuries resulting from violence involving male and female partners, it is categorically false to imply that there are the same number of "battered" men as there are battered women. Research shows that nearly 90 percent of battering victims are women and only about ten percent are men… The most brutal, terrorizing and continuing pattern of harmful intimate violence is carried out primarily by men. [FAQ]

Straus, meanwhile, urges those citing his research to remember that women suffer far more from the consequences of abuse, and that because of this the "first priority in services for victims and in prevention and control must continue to be directed toward assaults by men [MS]

So, Paul, do you still think that "domestic violence has nothing to do with what sex you are?"

The point of all this is not to deny that men suffer from DV. They do, and though a much smaller percentage of men suffer from serious abuse than women, the suffering they endure is every bit as real. Men don't have to suffer half of all serious abuse for their suffering to count; there is no need to exaggerate to make the point that we as a society need to take abuse directed at men more seriously.

The question is what is to be done about it. And it is here that the Men's Rights movement in general, and you in particular, Paul, have failed completely, in many ways making the problem even worse. The solution to DV against men is not to publish articles with titles like "When is it OK to Punch Your Wife," filled with explicit fantasies of male retribution against women. [EL] The solution to female violence is not more male violence.

And it is not to send angry MRAs to harass the donors to a DV shelter with phone calls in an attempt to get them to stop funding the shelter, as Glenn Sacks did to The Family Place, a DV shelter that ran some ads he deemed "misandrist." Even if the ads were "misandrist" — and I don't think they were — how is trying to make life harder for female victims of abuse possibly going to help male victims of abuse? [ALAS]

Shelters for women did not fall from the sky. They were not set up by a feminist matriarchy. They exist because individual women activists — and some men, but mostly women — built them, over much opposition, over the course of several decades, starting at a time when almost no one took DV against women (or men) seriously. Most shelters today run on shoestring budgets, and face the constant threat of violence from men angry at the women sheltered in them. Most, while not set up to handle male victims, try to help as best they can; the Family Place, the shelter targeted by Sacks, gives male victims vouchers for hotel rooms so they have a place to stay. [ALAS]

My challenge to the MRM is simple: if you really want DV shelters for men, and aren't simply interested in scoring rhetorical points against feminists, build them. Don't complain that feminists aren't fighting your battles for you. Get off the Internet, get your hands dirty, and actually make a difference.

Elam Response- Part 1

Given that the terms of this debate allow me 48 hours to respond, I have decided to post my response in two parts. I think it is necessary because there is a problem here – an egregious one – that requires individual attention.

That problem, David, is that you are coming to the table to debate scholarly investigation of a social problem relying almost exclusively on opinions and conclusions, not of legitimate academicians, but of political ideologues with a rigid and predetermined view of the issue. Those ideologues do not seek truth, but only to mold selective data into conformity with their political agenda.

That fact compels me, before proceeding with anything else, to address this problem with credible proof of its existence, providing a compelling rationale as to why it (they) cannot be trusted to provide anything untainted by bias.

This ideological rigidity is fine for the sake of some internet debates, David, but sets a dangerous standard for social research and public policy, which is, after all, what we are ultimately discussing.

Let's begin with an important, if rudimentary, understanding of feminist theory as it applies to domestic violence.

The pillar of feminist perspective about domestic violence is that it is an extension of patriarchy, and patriarchal dominance through physical intimidation in the home – exclusively by husbands against their wives. (Dobash & Dobash, 1979; Loseke & Kurz, 2005)

I will use only the preceding references for this assertion unless you contest the idea that feminist doctrine hinges on the patriarchal model of domestic violence and that it serves as the primary lens through which all research and review is seen. If you won't stipulate this, I will provide ample additional evidence for it in my rebuttal to your next post. But if you accede that point, then you must also admit to the following:

The patriarchal theory of domestic violence absolutely mandates that research conclusions point to male on female violence only, or the theory that said violence stems from patriarchal power falls apart completely.

And so too would a lot of funding, from VAWA, to university departments, to DV shelter budgets across the western world. We must never forget that there is a huge financial interest in feminist hegemony over the DV issue.

This is the Achilles Heel of feminist "scholarship" on domestic violence, and quite frankly yours in this debate as well. It is a corner that I will assert right now that you cannot "unpaint" yourself out of, unless you acknowledge the bias of your current sources, then seek out, and provide, others.

The only thing I need do for this part of my response is to demonstrate that your sources are indeed gender ideologues and activists, bent on perpetuating the patriarchal model, which is quite simple and easy. And of course I can offer that while I am an activist, none of the studies I offered in my original article or video were conducted by anything other than academicians without a known political agenda.

The first bit of evidence that I offer as to the activist nature of your offerings is the fact that this is what they say about themselves.

First, you cite the National Organization for Men Against Sexism (NOMAS), an organization with ongoing affiliation with Michael Kimmell, yet another one of your sources. If you go to their website, you will find that their description, placed on the header of their home page, is Pro-feminist, Gay Affirmative, Anti-Racist, Enhancing Men's Lives.

Their Statement of Principles is headed, in large red font, with

The National Organization for Men Against Sexism is an activist organization of men and women supporting positive changes for men.

In addressing men's roles in advancing their cause, Brian Klocke of NOMAS writes the following:

> "As suggested by Alison Jaggar and others, men must first learn the text of feminist theory. This learning must not only involve the traditional reading of seminal works in feminist theory by feminist authors but must also involve a learning of social and political experience from a feminist perspective. [bold text mine] Men should consult with feminist women when writing about feminist theory. Men should also support more authorship of feminist theory by women and challenge other men to see feminist theory as a legitimate and necessary practice that challenges men to end patriarchy. Above all, men need to engage with feminist theory and practice, letting it work on them, in order to liberate all genders and build a society constructed on justice and nourished by love."

The activities of NOMAS clearly demonstrate their sincerity about maintaining a purely feminist first, anti patriarchal perspective of domestic violence vs. a paradigm that would foster outreach to all victims. In 2005 they joined an amicus brief in the Blumhorst case, in order to prevent the allocations of any monies in the state of California for the provision of support services to male victims of domestic violence. They don't want a dollar of tax money to go to male victims, or for that matter, for the system to even recognize they exist.

Somewhat outside the realm of DV, but highly germane to the issue of academic integrity has been the reaction from Michael Kimmel, on behalf of NOMAS on the issue of the emerging field of Male Studies, which intends to study the condition of the human male outside the sphere of influence of feminist ideologues.

I personally wrote NOMAS president Robert Brannon about this, with questions about their organization and an informal invitation to support the Male Studies initiative. The response I got was from Michael Kimmel, who sent me a rather curt, dismissive email indicating that he and his associates were already in control of this field of study, as though the intellectual pursuit was their property.

Can you imagine that? What sort of academician assumes ownership of an entire discipline, and rules out potential research, collaboration and support, sight unseen, simply because he knows the individuals involved don't align themselves with his personal sexual politics?

Allow me to answer that for you. It would be the same academician whose critique of CTS you rely so heavily on in your rebuttal; an academician who has lost all pretense to objectivity and academic integrity.

And that would be fitting with NOMAS in general. Another one of their members, Barry Goldstein, J.D., co chair of the NOMAS task force on child custody, had his law license suspended and was ultimately disbarred for perpetrating a fraud on a court.

And the circumstances of that fraud? He lied repeatedly to a court about evidence in, you guessed it, a domestic violence case against a man.

Goldstein can still be found listed on the leadership page for NOMAS.

Many of the others you mentioned, while maybe not as proprietary as Kimmell, or criminal as Goldstein, nonetheless emerge as ideologues of the same camp with the same political motives. Below are their names as links that demonstrate feminist ideological roots.

You have been provided, David, with ample studies, clearly conducted by persons without a political attachment to their work (at least you have not established such an attachment) and you need to respond in kind or your entire position becomes a sham.

Critiques of surveys, or of the CTS, are fine and needed to make your point, and I will indeed address those critiques, and more adequately than you will likely care for, within the deadline on my next post, as well as the DOJ stats, etc. But it needs to be clear from the beginning, you are putting Greenpeace on trial and trying to stack the jury with whaling execs. I won't let it pass without calling you out on it.

Get some real research, David, and some untainted, credible critique. And if, perhaps, you have a hard time finding anyone but gender ideologues that are challenging the soundness of the research in question, then you will have stumbled on yet another reason to rethink your position.

Futrelle responds:

So, Paul, instead of actually responding to anything substantive, you:

*attack feminist scholarship that I didn't actually cite

*rehash a tiff you had with one of the experts I quoted

*attack someone else completely irrelevant to the debate at hand because he happens to belong to an organization the the guy you had the tiff with also belongs to *list a bunch of researchers that I do actually cite, but that you've somehow decided are evil ideologues and not to be trusted, without actually examining any of their work, simply because they have described themselves as "feminists."

I guess your modus operandi is simple: when you have no ammunition, you start flinging bullshit.

Let's run through the actual substantive disagreement underlying our debate.

You claimed that with regard to Domestic Violence "women are half the problem."

I showed you, clearly and simply and logically, why this is not so. I made arguments. I offered evidence, from government surveys and peer-reviewed academic journals, backing this up.

Not only this, but I offered evidence of this from THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE to support your argument. They, too, say that male violence towards women is a bigger problem than women's violence. They, too, recognize that the Conflict Tactics Scale (CTS) that they use in their research has limitations, particularly when it comes to making sense of the actual impact of abuse.

Fact is, there is NO credible researcher in the field who thinks "women are half the problem." Not one. The people who invented the CTS scale don't think that's the case because, even if women hit half the time, they do far, far less damage than men, and cause far fewer injuries.

Let's try a quick quiz: Who said the following?

> Women are seriously injured at seven times the rate of men and … women are killed by partners at more than two times the rate of men….

> [W]hen we look at injuries resulting from violence involving male and female partners, it is categorically false to imply that there are the same number of "battered" men as there are battered women. Research shows that nearly 90 percent of battering victims are women and only about ten percent are men… The most brutal, terrorizing and continuing pattern of harmful intimate violence is carried out primarily by men.

Was it: Michael Kimmel? Barry Goldstein? Daniel G. Saunders? Jack C. Straton? Michael Flood? Michael P. Johnson? Patricia Tjaden? Nancy Thoennes? Walter Dekeseredy? Martin Schwartz? Andrea Dworkin?

The correct answer is: None of the above! The person who said it was a fellow named Richard Gelles.

So who is this Richard Gelles? Here's a short bio of him I found online:

> Richard Gelles is currently a dean at the University of Pennsylvania and holds The Joanne and Raymond Welsh Chair of Child Welfare and Family Violence in the School of Social Policy & Practice.
> He is an internationally known expert in domestic violence, and was influential in the passage of the Adoption and Safe Families Act of 1997.

He certainly sounds like someone whose opinion might be worth paying attention to, doesn't he? I guess you already knew that, given that I'm quoting your description of him.

Question 2: Who said:

> [Women are] physically injured to the point of needing medical attention seven times as often as husbands, they suffer psychological injury at much higher rates … [The] first priority in services for victims and in prevention and control must continue to be directed toward assaults by men.

Was it: Michael Kimmel? Barry Goldstein? Daniel G. Saunders? Jack C. Straton? Michael Flood? Michael P. Johnson? Patricia Tjaden? Nancy Thoennes? Walter Dekeseredy? Martin Schwartz? Andrea Dworkin?

I guess you probably figured out that was another trick question. It was Murray Straus, one of the three researchers who, along with Gelles and Suzanne Steinmetz, was most responsible for the whole "gender symmetry" thing.

Oh, but you know that, because you mentioned him in your post — though you spelled his name incorrectly. (It's Straus. One "s" at the end, not two.)

As for the rest of your nonsense:

You reject the work of Michael Kimmel, because, as far as I can tell from your crazy convoluted account, he said in an email that Men's Studies as a discipline has existed for several decades? Guess what! It HAS existed as a discipline for several decades. You may not like the ideological tendencies of some of those involved in it, but is has existed. I thought his note to you was quite polite, actually.

I'm not sure how any of this is relevant to our debate, or how this might somehow invalidate the findings of the article of his I cite. And neither do you, I bet, because you show no evidence of actually having read the paper in question.

And the others? I clicked on your links. Apparently they are indeed … feminists.

So that's all it takes for you to reject their work without even looking at it? Work that has been published in actual peer-reviewed journals?

If you really think what they're putting out is feminist propaganda, why not take it up with the editors of, say, Family Law Review, or Trauma, Violence & Abuse? Oh, but then you'd probably have to actually read the articles. Also, the editors would probably laugh and hang up the phone. Because "s/he's a feminist!" isn't much of an argument.

I don't know if you know this, but not all feminists are like Andrea Dworkin. They don't all think the same things. They don't all hate men. (You may not believe this, but very few of them do.) They don't eat babies.

Lots of people, of various ideological persuasions, describe themselves as feminists. Some Gallup polls over the last few decades have found as many as 30% of Americans describing themselves as feminists. Hell, Sarah Palin has described herself as a feminist. (Of course, she's also described herself as a grizzly bear, but that's a whole other topic.)

And guess what? Murray Straus, the guy who invented the CTS, and who is responsible more than any person for the notion of "gender symmetry" in DV … is also a feminist.

Let me repeat that: The guy who designed the research tool that underlies all the research you've cited to buttress your argument … describes himself as a feminist. Oh, sure, he's no fan of the feminists who've attacked his research, not by a long shot; he's absolutely scathing towards those particular feminists. But he still calls himself one, and he's appreciative of what feminism has done in fighting domestic abuse. As he puts it:

> [I]t is important to recognize the tremendous contribution to human relationships and crime control made by feminist efforts to end violence against women. This effort has brought public attention the fact that PV [partner violence] may be the most prevalent fom1 of interpersonal violence, created a world~wide detem1ination to cease ignoring PV, and take steps to combat PV. It has brought the rule of law to one of the last spheres of life where 'self-help' justice … prevails by changing the legal status of domestic assaults, by changing police and court practices from one of ignoring and minimization PV to one of compelling the criminal justice system to attend and intervene. In addition, feminists have created two important new social institutions: shelters for battered women and treatment programs for male perpetrators.

(The source for that, and for him calling himself a feminist? One of the articles by him I cited earlier. You can find out which by actually reading them.)

So if you're going to throw out all the research I have cited that has been done by self-professed feminists, you're going to have to throw out his work as well.

Now if instead you want to reconsider, and actually offer a real critique of the studies I've cited instead of dismissing them out of hand, then we might have an actual debate. "Feminists bad!" is not an argument.

First, though, you might want to address the fact that the researchers you tout as the best in the field have explicitly stated that their work should NOT be used to claim that women are "half the problem" in DV, that women on average are injured much more often and much more seriously than men, and that the bulk of the resources should be directed towards women victims.

Once you've done that, perhaps we can have a serious debate over the other research I have cited, one that involves an actual discussion of their claims and their methodologies.

Do I expect you to actually address these substantive points? No. I don't think you're interested in an actual debate, because on some level you know your position is in fact untenable, and is not supported even by the research that you yourself cite.

But perhaps I should have guessed as much from someone whose response to Domestic Violence Awareness Month is to make tacky jokes about "Bash a Violent Bitch Month," replete with detailed descriptions of said bashing:

> I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall till the smugness of beating on someone because you know they won't fight back drains from their nose with a few million red corpuscles.
> And then make them clean up the mess.

Paul, I think it's time for you to clean up your own mess.

Elam Response:

A few quick items. First to this from my recent article:

"I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall till the smugness of beating on someone because you know they won't fight back drains from their nose with a few million red corpuscles.

And then make them clean up the mess."

And now, David, for the part of the article that you intentionally left out.

"Am I serious about this?

No."

Just thought I would include that since you don't seem to understand satire, or the literal, it seems.

Then there is this, from you:

> "First, though, you might want to address the fact that the researchers you tout as the best in the field have explicitly stated that their work should NOT be used to claim that women are "half the problem" in DV, that women on average are injured much more often and much more seriously than men, and that the bulk of the resources should be directed towards women victims."

First, where it concerns the incidence of violence, women are indeed half the problem, or more! The research I offered to that effect still remains, and you have not debunked a single study just because you parroted some other ideologues critique of the method of gathering information.

If you want to debate the severity of injury, that is always possible, but this debate is a about incidence. Given that we all operate that all domestic violence is wrong, injurious, dysfunctional and an overarching social issue, we must address the issue of all violence, not just narrow it down to the kind that suits your purpose for this debate.

Or are you proposing that the only violence we address is where there is an injury sustained?

And lastly, this:

> So, Paul, instead of actually responding to anything substantive, you:
>
> *attack feminist scholarship that I didn't actually cite
> *rehash a tiff you had with one of the experts I quoted
> *attack someone else completely irrelevant to the debate at hand because he happens to belong to an organization the the guy you had the tiff with also belongs to
> *list a bunch of researchers that I do actually cite, but that you've somehow decided are evil ideologues and not to be trusted, without actually examining any of their work, simply because they have described themselves as "feminists."

Ah, no. What I have done is reveal the fact that the authors of your sources are biased, in fact that all gender ideologues are biased, and that their reaction to any non patriarchal, and thus not exclusively male model of domestic violence is predictably negative. It is called research bias, and it is fair game here.

Remember this?

*attack feminist scholarship that I didn't actually cite

One of your most prominent sources was from your main squeeze Kimmel. Your claim here about attacking scholarship you didn't cite is bogus.

Now, regarding the critiques of CTS specifically, and aside from the fact that your "source," Michael Kimmel, is clearly biased, yes, there are some limitations and difficulties with the information gathering. That has been pointed out by Gelles and Archer, so there is no secret about it. But let's take a closer look at the objections you raised. Or at least for what you are passing off as objections.

You say:

> As a result, one critic notes, the CTS "equates a woman pushing a man in self-defense to a man pushing a woman down the stairs. It labels a mother as violent if she defends her daughter from the father's sexual molestation. It combines categories such as "hitting" and "trying to hit" despite the important difference between them. Because it looks at only one year, this study equates a single slap by a woman to a man's 15 year history of domestic terrorism."

This is about as poor an example of the problem with CTS that can be found. Let's try that statement with simple sex reversal.

As a result, one critic notes, the CTS "equates a man pushing a woman in self-defense to a woman pushing a man down the stairs. It labels a father as violent if he defends his son from the mother's sexual molestation. It combines categories such as "hitting" and "trying to hit" despite the important difference between them. Because it looks at only one year, this study equates a single slap by a man to a woman's 15 year history of domestic terrorism."

I am sure you don't get this David, but both of these descriptions are equally valid. The only problem you can come up with is if you enter the analysis, as your quoted reference here clearly did, assuming that the male MUST be viewed as the default perpetrator.

Your first (borrowed) observation about CTS is a complete fail.

Now for the next.

> This problem is exacerbated by the lack of attention given to the motivations behind the violence. While both men and women use violence to express anger, a number of studies show that men are far more likely to use domestic violence to control their victim, to "show who is boss." Other studies that look at motivation find that much female "violence" is in fact self-defense.

This is simply a distinction without a difference as it applies to this debate. We are not here arguing the motives for violence, but the incidence, especially in regards to sex distribution. Many of the studies cited by Archer and Fiebert also found that much of men's "violence" was in self defense. Unless you are prepared to demonstrate that female violence in self defense is significantly more frequent than men's, then you have actually said nothing with this.

Oh, and regarding the incidence of "who is the boss" type violence, Archer had he following to say:

"It is the alternative, supposedly context-sensitive concepts that lack clarity and operational definitions: It would not be worth reviewing the area, let alone undertaking a meta-analysis, if the only categories were those such as battering, psychological terrorism, and social disempowerment, advocated by White et al., because their meanings are imprecise and hence could vary from study to study."

In other words, David, you can't even qualify any standard that adequately defines violence that is from a perpetrator showing the victim "who is the boss," much less that can be replicated from study to study. It is an utterly useless concept.

FAIL Part Deux.

Again, the motives for violence were never the focus of my article or video, except in the case of self defense, and thus not germane to this debate. But hey, you opened a door to another crappy idea on your part, so I was glad to take it.

We are also reminded by Archer that feminists are significantly less concerned with CTS in studies when they are the ones using it:

"White et al. (2000) made a number of familiar criticisms of the CTS, a measure that they have used in their own research (White & Koss, 1991), as indeed have some feminist researchers when only male perpetration or female victimization is involved (see, e.g., DeKeseredy & Schwartz, 1998)."

And finally you offer this:

> There are other serious problems with the CTS as a measure of DV. The first version of the questionnaire left out sexual assaults by current or former intimate partners, which according to the National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) make up nearly 20% of all spousal assaults; such assaults are overwhelmingly committed by men against women. [MK] And the CTS also ignores violence that happens after partners separate, another critical omission, because violence tends to escalate, sometimes quite dramatically, after a separation. The NCVS found that separated women are 8 times as likely to face violence from an ex-partner than married women are from their husbands. [MK]

While adjustments have been made (the first version of the questionnaire) to compensate for some problems, there is actually some merit to this last block of crits. And it is hardly uncommon. The shortcomings of methodology are a constant in research, and to my knowledge there has never been any studies immune to this type of critique. But the question is, do these possible shortcomings constitute any sort of concrete reason to dismiss the entire body of research?

Are we going to reject the results of hundreds of studies entirely because they did not include violence after the relationship was over?

It is a subjective question, one on which the readers of this debate will simply be left to their own decision. But it seems clear to me that if we must dismiss on these grounds that there is hardly a shred of research on DV that we can count on reliably. And if that is the case, it actually does your argument much more harm than mine, as you would be stuck with proving that women are abused at all.

But it may be helpful now to examine some of the methodological shortcomings in feminist research, though after that examination readers my conclude as I have, that the expression "feminist research" is an oxymoron.

I do encourage readers to read the following carefully. It is a devastating indictment of what is going on in the world of feminist research. and it forms the backbone of the twisted world view that Futrelle is here to push. We are not talking about the ordinary concerns of the methodological soundness, as one might find with say, CTS. Rather it addresses coercion, intimidation, deception, misrepresentation and outright fraud. And it further refutes much of the critique against CTS.

From the findings of Murray A. Straus and Katreena Scott, Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence: The Evidence, The Denial, and the Implications for Primary Treatment and Prevention, we have a list of the 7 most egregious practices in feminist DV research. To be fair, we can't even call them flaws in methodology. What they are is a representation of systemic and pervasive fraud, justified and practiced with histrionic brio in the name of outcome oriented activism.

Method 1. Suppress Evidence Researchers with a commitment to the idea that men are almost always the sole perpetrator, or whose commitment to increase services to women victims of PV is so strong that it overrides their commitment to science, as shown previously, often leads to concealing evidence that contradicts this belief. In addition, many researchers not committed to that ideology have withheld results showing gender symmetry to avoid becoming victims of vitriolic denunciations and ostracism (see Method 7 below). A typical pattern is to publish only the data on male perpetrators or female victims, deliberately omitting data on female perpetrators and male victims. This practice started with one of the first general population surveys on family violence. The survey done for the Kentucky Commission On The Status Of Women obtained data on both men and women, but only the data on male perpetration was published (Schulman, 1979). Among the many other examples of respected researchers publishing data on assaults by men and the data on assaults by women are Kennedy and Dutton (1989), Lackey and Williams (1995), Johnson and Leone (2005), and Kaufman Kantor and Straus (1987).Method 2. Avoid Obtaining Or Analyzing Data On Female PerpetrationDue to prevailing ideology that women are almost never perpetrators of PV and men are almost never victims, researchers designing surveys have typically asked female participants only about attacks by their male partners, and male respondents only about perpetration. To achieve this, the Canadian national Violence Against Women survey (Johnson & Sacco, 1995), modified the Conflict Tactics Scales by omitting the questions on perpetration by the female participants in the study. The American National Violence Against Women Survey (Tjaden & Thoennes, 2000) sponsored by the Department of Justice originally planned the same strategy.Fortunately, the US Centers For Disease Control added a sample of men to the project. But when Johnson and Leone (Johnson & Leone, 2005) investigated the prevalence of "intimate terrorists" among the participants in that study, they guaranteed there would be no female intimate terrorists by using only the data on male perpetration. Many other studies of PV have also omitted questions about female perpetration and male victimization. Many, agencies do not permit collection of data on PV unless questions on female perpetration are omitted. This may have been the reason that a comprehensive four site study of batterer treatment programs asked the women only about violence by the partner (Gondolf, 2002). This was a tremendous lost opportunity because it may be the only comprehensive study of male offenders which had access to their female partners.Method 3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male PerpetrationAnother method used to conceal evidence of gender symmetry is to selectively cite studies of male perpetration and avoid citing studies of female perpetration. US government, World Health Organization, and United Nations documents show that this method of concealment and distortion is institutionalized in official publications. For example, US Dept of Justice publications almost always cite only the National Crime Victimization study, which shows male predominance (Durose et al., 2005). They fail to mention the Department Of Justice published critiques which led to a revision of the survey. but which that only partly corrected that bias (Straus, 1999). Not only do Department of Justice publications on PV rely on data that they previously acknowledged is inaccurate for measuring PV, but they also ignore a major and more accurate study that they themselves sponsored – the National Violence Against Women .Survey. This study found that women perpetrate about 40% of PV incidents, which is close to gender symmetry in perpetrationThe widely acclaimed and influential World Health Organization report on domestic violence (Krug et al., 2002) reports that "Where violence by women occurs it is more likely to be in the form of self-defense (32, 37, 38)." This is selective citation because almost all studies that have compared men and women find about equal rates of self-defense. Perhaps even worse, none of the three studies cited provide evidence supporting the quoted sentence. For example, Study #32 (Saunders & Hanusa, 1986) shows that about two thirds of female perpetrated PV was not in self-defense. Study #37 (DeKeseredy, Saunders, Schwartz, & Shahid, 1997) found that only 7% of women said their violence was in self-defense. Study #38 (Johnson & Ferraro, 2000) is a review paper that has no original data. It cites #32 and #37, neither of which supports the claim.A closely related method is to present the results on female perpetration/male victimization and say nothing about those results. The 2006 US Department of Justice report on PV gives a chart showing trends for both men and women from 1993 to 2004 (Catalano, 2006b). The only thing said about trends in male victimization, i.e. female perpetration, is that "The rate of nonfatal intimate partner victimization for males increased between 2003 and 2004, returning to levels last seen in 1996 (and)1…for white males… (victimization)…increased between 2003 and 2004, from 0.5 to 1.1…" It is almost certain that that there would be a commentary and an extensive analysis if Nonfatal PV victimization of white females had increased between 2003 and 2004, from .5 to 1.1 victimizations per 1,000 i.e., if the female victimization rate had doubled. But the doubling in the male victimization rate was ignored.Method 4. Conclude That Results Refute Symmetry When They Do Not
The studies cited above, in addition to be illustrating selective citation, are also examples of the ability of ideological commitment to lead researchers to misinterpret the results of their own research. A study by Kernsmith (2005), for example states that "Males and females were found to differ in their motivations for using violence in relationships." (p. 173), and that "female violence may be more related to maintaining personal liberty in a relationship than gaining power" (p. 180). Although Kernsmith's Table 2 shows that women had higher scores on the "striking back" factor, only one question in this factor is about self-defense and this item is endorsed infrequently. Other more frequently endorsed items are about being angry (e.g., "to show anger") and getting back at a partner (e.g. "to get back at your partner for hurting you emotionally"). In contrast to the idea that women use violence to maintain liberty, these finding suggest that women are more likely than men to use violence in retaliatory anger. In addition, Kernsmith's conclusion ignores the fact that the scores for men and women were approximately equal in respect to two of the three factors ("exerting power" and "disciplining partner").Thus, Kernsmith's study generally found the opposite of what was stated as the finding.
Method 5. Create "Evidence" By Citation
The Kernsmith's study, the World Health Organization report, and the pattern of selective citation show how ideology can be converted into "evidence by citation" or what Gelles (1980) calls the "woozle effect." A woozle effect occurs when the frequent citation of assertion in previous publications that lack evidence mislead us into thinking there is evidence. For example, subsequent to the World Health Organization study and the Kernsmith study, papers discussing gender differences in motivation will cite them to show that female violence is predominantly in self-defense, which is the opposite of what the research actually shows. But because these are citations of an article in a scientific journal and a respected international organization, readers of the subsequent article will accept it as a fact. Thus, fiction is converted into scientific evidence that will be cited over and over and further strengthen the woozle effect.
Another well documented example is the claim that the Conflict Tactics Scales (Straus, Hamby, Boney-McCoy, & Sugarman, 1996) does not provide an adequate measure of PV because it measures only conflict related violence. Although the theoretical basis of the CTS is conflict theory, the introductory explanation to participants specifically asks participants to report expressive and malicious violence. It asks respondents about the times when they and their partner "…disagree, get annoyed with the other person, want different things from each other, or just have spats or fights because they are in a bad mood, are tired or for some other reason." Despite repeating this criticism for 25 years in perhaps a hundred publications, we have not located any empirical study which has provided evidence showing that only conflict-related violence is reported. In fact, where there is both CTS data and qualitative data, as in Giles-Sims (1983), it shows that the CTS elicits malicious violence as well as conflict-related violence. Nevertheless, because there are at least a hundred articles with this statement in peer reviewed journals, it is treated as an established scientific fact.
Method 6. Obstruct Funding of Research That Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is The Cause of PV
An example of denying funding to research that might contradict the idea that PV is a male-only crime is the call for proposals to investigate PV issued in December 2005 by the National Institute of Justice. The announcement stated that proposals to investigate male victimization would not be eligible. Another example is the objection by a reviewer to a proposal one of us submitted because of "…naming violence in a relationships as a 'human' problem of aggression not a gender-based problem." When priority scores by the reviewers are averaged, it takes only one extremely low score to place the proposal below the fundable level. Others have encountered similar blocks; for example Holtzworth-Munroe (2005). Eugen Lupri, a pioneer Canadian family violence researcher, has also documented examples of the resistance to funding and publishing research on female perpetrated violence (Lupri, 2004).
Method 7. Harass, Threaten, And Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs
Suzanne Steinmetz made the mistake of publishing a book and articles (Steinmetz, 1977; Steinmetz, 1977-1978) which clearly showed about equal rates of perpetration by males and females. Anger over this resulted in a bomb threat at her daughters' wedding and she was the object of a letter writing campaign to deny her promotion and tenure at the University of Delaware. Twenty years later the same processes resulted in a lecturer at the University of Manitoba whose dissertation found gender symmetry in PV being denied promotion and tenure.
A PhD student working with Straus was warned at a conference that she will never get a job if she does her PhD research with him. At the University of Massachusetts, Straus was prevented from speaking by shouts and stomping. At two hearings held by the Canadian Commission On Violence Against Women the chairperson stated that nothing Murray Straus publishes can be believed because he is a wife-beater and sexually exploits students. When Straus was elected President of the Society For the Study Of Social Problems, a group of members occupied the first few rows of the auditorium and, at the start of the presidential address, stood up and walked out.
As a result of these types of harassment, there is widespread self-censorship by authors who fear that publishing politically incorrect data will undermine their reputation, or in the case of graduate students, their ability to obtain a job.
Also from Straus:
Lord et al. (1979) and Janis (1982) focused on judgments, not on academic studies. In fact, the notions of scientific objectivity and falsifiable hypotheses act, at least in principle, against the formation of "groupthink."
However, social scientists frequently become aligned with contemporary notions of social justice and attempt to fit their enterprise to the objectives of achieving social change. In so doing, they increase the risk of straying from objective reporting of data.
In domestic violence research, the sense that a greater good for women's rights and the protection of women should prevail over scientific accuracy has provided this function of directing the search, data reported, interpretations, and applications of the data.
In concert with value-laden theories, the focus of attention has been on male violence and simultaneously has deflected study and acceptance of female violence. In effect, a paradigm (cf. Kuhn, 1965) has developed in the domestic violence literature in which perpetrators are viewed as exclusively or disproportionately male.
Any and all data inconsistent with this view are dismissed, ignored, or attempts are made to explain them away. The function of the gender paradigm originally was to generate social change in a direction that righted an imbalance against women (see Dobash & Dobash, 1978, 1979; Dobash et al., 1992; Patai, 1998; Walker, 1989; Yllo & Bograd, 1988). The result, however, has been to misdirect social and legal policy, to misinform custody assessors, police, and judges, to disregard data sets contradictory to the prevailing theory, and to mislead attempts at therapeutic change for perpetrators (see also Corvo &Johnson, 2003; Dutton, 1994; George, 2003).

With the exception of addressing the DOJ stats, which I will do in my next post, it is clearly time to move past the research. The case has been made on two key issues here. One, there is no successful refutation of the valid research that supports the conclusions in my original article and video. Futrelle attacked on the grounds of flawed methodology, tried to shift the argument from incidence to severity, and relied on personal insults. In the end he has only succeeded at demonstrating that he is an ideologue, not interested in the amelioration of domestic violence, but in furthering the politics of misandry, at the despicable expense of men, women and children caught up in this social illness.

Second, it has been more than established here that he just another part of a culture of unprincipled activists that are seeking to attack and undermine both research and researcher, because that research is now exposing lies they have been fostering for so long. Additionally, we are now on the slow road to those distortions of reality being corrected, something these people will fight to the end for ideological and financial reasons.

The important thing in my mind at this point is to identify and explain what is really happening with these activists, people like Futrelle, who can look at all this information and dismiss it in favor of maintaining a false set of beliefs.

We need to ask why, when male victims of DV are a well documented fact of life, would these people seek to deny they exist and even take whatever action necessary to ensure that help is unavailable to them or to their chidren.

The answer to that, at least in my opinion, is groupthink. Futrelle and the others have had their capacity for critical thought, their human compassion and indeed their personal integrity compromised because rather than exercise common scrutiny when examining information, they have become a part of a collective of non thinkers with tunnel vision; a simple cell in a groupthink brain. It is a seriously debilitating condition with significant individual and far reaching social implications.

It is the same phenomena that allowed masses of people to justify slavery in their minds, countless wars, the collective festering and mindless hatred in 1936 Berlin, and many other forms of social malady.

More on this as we continue to peel back the layers of deception from Futrelle's mindset in the next post.

Futrelle Responds:

Your reply to me is once again an exercise in missing the point.

Let's rehash the debate, such as it is, so far:

You: A large number of studies show that women hit men as often as men hit women, therefore women are half the problem.

Me: Those studies have serious methodological flaws, and do not address the context of consequences of DV. Women are injured far more often and severely than men. These facts are readily acknowledged BY THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT. Because of that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT do NOT think women are "half the problem."

You: Some of the studies you cite are from known feminists, therefore I will dismiss them without even reading them. Also, Michael Kimmel once sent me an email I thought was really rude, and someone in an organization he also belongs to did some bad shit.

Me: Huh? Did you not hear me when I pointed out that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT state quite plainly that women are injured far more often and far more severely than men? And that, because of this, THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT do NOT think women are "half the problem?" Also, "feminists=bad" is not much of an argument.

So that's the story up until your latest post. So let's dig into that one.

First, I will just point out the obvious once again: You STILL have not dealt with the fact that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT do NOT think women are "half the problem." You can say whatever nonsense you want about the evils and the biases of feminist research, but unless and until you deal with this simple fact, you have not offered a rebuttal to my main point. No amount of rhetorical obfuscation can conceal this point, not even equating me with slaveholders and/or Nazis, as you do in your conclusion.

So let's go through this again. The flaws in the Conflict Tactics Scales (CTS) I have mentioned are readily admitted to by those who use the tool, and by Straus and Gelles, TWO OF THE PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT. They acknowledge that the CTS:

*Does not address the context or consequences of the violence.

Proof? Here's Murray Straus, who invented the CTS, and who is ONE OF THE PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT, frankly acknowledging this fact, in precisely those terms: "The number of assaults by itself . . . ignores the contexts, meanings, and consequences of these assaults." [quoted in APA cited above]

Straus also says:

> Female assault rates based on the Conflict Tactics Scales (CTS) can be misleading because the CTS does not measure the purpose of the violence, such as whether it is in self-defense, nor does it measure injuries resulting from assaults.

[From Straus, 1997, cited above]

When Straus set out to specifically research injuries suffered by both partners, he found that man-on-woman violence caused many times the number of injuries as women-on-man violence. This is him again, speaking of himself in the third person as is sometimes the case in academic research:

> Stets and Straus found a rate of 3 percent for injury-producing assaults by men and 0.4 percent for injury-producing assaults by women. Somewhat lower injury rates were found by Brush for another large national sample-l.2 percent of injury-producing assaults by men and 0.2 percent for injury-producing assaults by women. An "injury adjusted" rate was computed using the higher of the two injury estimates. The resulting rate of injury producing assaults by men is 3.7 per 1,000 (122 X .03 = 3.66), and the rate of injury producing assaults by women is much lower-O.5 per 1,000 (124 X ,004 = 0.49). Thus the injury adjusted rate for assaults by men is six times greater than the rate of domestic assaults by women.[Straus, 1997]

Other problems of the CTS:

*It does not deal with the most severe forms of violence, which Gelles himself plainly acknowledges are mainly caused by men. I have quoted him twice above on this topic; I will not bother to quote him again.

As for the study you mentioned that found that, within their sample, 70% of the violence in relationships where only one partner was violent was caused by women, here is one critical take on the study that highlights this issue. The questions on the survey, the critics write:

> do not capture all forms of violence that occur between relationship partners, including many of the more severe forms of partner violence … Questions about emotional, verbal, psychological, or sexual aggression were also not included. Similarly, only a single item assessed injury to victims and it focused on injury frequency and excluded injury severity and whether medical attention was needed or sought. Thus, it is unclear whether the data presented here would be similar had the violence and injury assessment been more thorough or if different forms of violence had been measured and analyzed separately. [CDC2]

Who are the critics here? You should know: it's the authors of the study themselves, in their writeup of their own research.

Further, the CTS:

*Ignored sexual violence, a major component of violence between intimate partners, and again a form of violence dominated by men. (While the CTS has been revised, many of the older studies cited by Archer and Fiebert used the original form)

*Does not deal with violence that occurs AFTER separation. Numerous studies show that violence can escalate, sometimes dramatically, after separation. This is a major limitation of the CTS, as this sort of violence can be especially brutal. One study reports:

> A higher percentage of women than men are physically abused, harassed, and stalked after the relationship ends. In a random U.S. survey, 4% of the women and 0.5% of the men reported being stalked by a current or past partner (Tjaden & Thoennes, 2001). In a random survey of the Canadian population, 24% said that violence became worse after separation,
> 37% said it stayed the same, and 39% said it occurred for the first time (Statistics Canada, 2001).Women in this study were significantly more likely to be severely victimized: 60% of women and 25% of men required medical attention. The results of the National Crime Victimization Survey show that violence against separated women is more than 8 times higher than rates for married women (Bachman & Saltzman, 1995).[APA]

As for the most severe form of violence — murder — one survey notes, “homicide rates are higher for women who have separated from their partners than for women in intact relationships … and this heightened risk of homicide following a separation is not found for men.”

[Source: the Kelly and Johnson paper I cited above.]

So this is a very serious limitation of the CTS research. You ask: “are we going to reject the results of hundreds of studies entirely because they did not include violence after the relationship was over?”

My answer is no. Are the studies conducted using the CTS worthless? Not at all. They just have limitations. In addition to not taking into consideration post-separation violence, there are two other very serious limitations: they don’t do a good job of capturing the more serious kinds of violence in relationships, and they don’t measure injury rates. Therefore they cannot be relied on to provide a comprehensive answer to the question “who abuses more?”

One last point:

I absolutely DO NOT agree that the DV debate is about whether or not men or women strike one another “equally”, at least according to a survey method that ignores or obscures many of the more severe forms of violence, and does not measure the CONSEQUENCES of this violence.

In the end, I think that it is precisely this, the consequences of the violence, that matter most. The severity of the violence is critical, and so is the intent. If someone, male or female, slaps their partner lightly on the face in the heat of an argument, that’s unquestionably a bad thing, but it is not as bad as if that person beat their partner black and blue. Both are counted as “violent” by the CTS, but there is a world of difference between these two kinds of violence. These sorts of distinctions matter.

And again, THE RESEARCHERS YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT agree that men cause far more injuries than women, both physical and psychological. Yes, some women are extremely violent batterers. Yes, domestic violence against men, even when it doesn’t result in injuries, should be taken seriously. But most of the victims of the most severe violence, as Straus and Gelles have both plainly stated, are women. I cannot see how you can possible conclude that women are “half the problem.”

As for Straus’ complaints about the reactions of some feminist researchers to his work: Does he have a good reason to be angry? Yes. Do his complaints mean that all research conducted by feminists should be dismissed out of hand? Absolutely not. (Besides, as I pointed out earlier, Straus still considers himself a feminist, and you’re certainly not rejecting his work.) Do his complaints apply to any of the specific research I have cited in my posts here? No. Do these complaints somehow change the fact that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT believe that women suffer far more from DV than men? No.

If you want to make the case that any of the specific research I have cited is simply feminist propaganda, you cannot just assert this. No matter how often you repeat this specious argument, the fact that some feminist research is tainted by ideology does not mean that ALL or even much research by feminists is so tainted.

In this post, you do actually make several specific arguments about specific research. You note that the genders could be reversed in the quote I used about how the CTS "equates a woman pushing a man in self-defense to a man pushing a woman down the stairs, etc" and it would still be true. Of course, but as I've repeatedly pointed out, both Straus and Gelles acknowledge that women suffer far, far more severe violence than men, so that in the vast majority of cases in the real world, the more severe abuse described in that quote will in fact apply to male perpetrators and female victims.

On self-defense, again, studies vary, but as you will see below, Straus and Gelles believe that women are far more likely to strike back in self-defense.

On "who's the boss" violence: Yes, there are some conceptual differences in how best to measure this, but the studies that we do have find men much more likely to use violence to control their partners. In the world of social science research, this is hardly a FAIL, as you put it. It simply means we need more and better research. Of course, we ALWAYS need more and better research. If you know any studies that find the opposite, I'd like to see them.

I will end with a quote from an article co-authored by Straus and Gelles that I find particularly illuminating. Again, to remind you, these are the GUYS YOU CITE TO PROVE YOUR POINTS:

> Perhaps the most controversial finding from our 1975 National Family Violence Survey was the report that a substantial number of women hit and beat their husbands. Since 1975 at least ten additional investigations have confirmed the fact that women hit and beat their husbands. Unfortunately the data on wife-to-husband violence has been misreported, misinterpreted, and misunderstood. Research uniformly shows that about as many women hit men as men hit women. However, those who report that husband abuse is as common as wife abuse overlook two important facts. First, the greater average size and strength of men and their greater aggressiveness means that a man's punch will probably produce more pain, injury and harm than a punch by a woman. Second, nearly three-fourths of the violence committed by women is done in self-defense. While violence by women should not be dismissed, neither should it be overlooked or hidden. On occasion, legislators and spokespersons . . . have used the data on violence by wives to minimize the need for services for battered women. Such arguments do a great injustice to the victimization of women. [quoted in MK]

Speaking of which: Your "Bash a Violent Bitch Month" nonsense. I plainly referred to it as a joke. That doesn't really make it any more acceptable, nor does it suggest to me that you take violence against women very seriously.

Elam: Last response

Note: His Majesty King David got mad at being held to the same standards as others and walked on the debate. Either that or he just got scared and ran. Boobz is out, and the cause goes on all the better for it.

Futrelle begins, with apparently enough anger to melt his cap lock key in few places, by asserting yet again that he thinks I am not paying enough attention to his objections to the studies I offered as evidence of gender symmetry in domestic violence. Says Futrelle:

> Those studies have serious methodological flaws, and do not address the context of consequences of DV. Women are injured far more often and severely than men. These facts are readily acknowledged BY THE VERY

> PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT. Because of that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT do NOT think women are "half the problem.

Here David simply takes a normal part of post research scrutiny – critique of methodology – and attempts to entice us to play make believe with him that the methodological flaws were so severe as to render the entire body of several hundred studies useless and untrustworthy. He does so citing statements by the researchers themselves.

I think this confuses David because he may not be accustomed to seeing routine academic accountability. He concludes that because Gelles, Straus, et al, pointed to aspects of their work where they observed in hindsight an opportunity for improvement, that they were actually disavowing and discrediting their own results. They were not. They were simply practicing the good ethics of principled researchers. But now Futrelle is attempting to spin that into a sweeping and disingenuous dismissal of their results.

But of even more apparent concern to David is the fact the researchers collectively agree that women are injured more frequently and severely when IPV occurs. He is presenting this common sense observation as some sort of mandate to accept that women are not equally responsible for IPV, even though he acknowledges they initiate at least half of it.

And this is where David's ignorance leads him directly into intellectual quicksand.

It's the whoever gets hurt the most is the rightest, position, which is about as thoughtful as, well, say, claiming that domestic violence is all men's fault, simply because women are less capable combatants.

Serious injury as a result of DV represents a very small portion of DV victims, with the majority being female. But DV that does not result in physical injury does not equate to DV that has no consequences. Indeed, the consequences of "non injurious" DV, the kind that occurs with gender symmetry, can be harmful enough to the adult victim, but catastrophic for children who, due to gender politics, become collateral damage.

Children and teenagers who witness violence at home are at significantly greater risk of emotional, social, behavioral and academic difficulties. They are also at much more risk of being abused by the offending parent. Children are negatively impacted by the role modeling of parents who use violence in problem solving and tend to end up either being either violent or abused as adults themselves.

Children who experience early school failure, conduct difficulties, social withdrawal and other similar problems are much more likely to continue a pattern of dysfunctional behavior, which can lead to drug use, truancy, teen pregnancy and criminality.

None* of this is contingent on whether the violence they witness is physically injurious.

This is one of many reasons you have heard, and correctly so, the mental health system mantra that all violence is wrong.

Failure to comprehend this, which David glaringly demonstrates, forms a faulty, female centric mentality common to a good many service providers and profiteers in the domestic violence industry.

Can you possibly understand that, Mr. Futrelle? This is not just about women. It is not about who can be first to produce a visible bruise. And as long as people like you take the unconscionable position of playing gender politics with identifying victims and perpetrators, it will be at the unnecessary expense of those who have already been harmed the most.

Accurate assessment of the abusive environment is essential to needs identification and appropriate intervention on violent households.

Now, again, Mr. Futrelle, it has been acknowledged that women are injured more often and more seriously in the course of IPV incidents. That was never in dispute.

But you are seriously coming here to argue that we should all but ignore everything else and blindly dedicate the overwhelming share of our understanding and our resources to women because a comparative fraction of them turn up with more bruises, often as a result of mutual combat?

The very thought of it is obscene.

Next, I turn to what I think is an incredibly avoidant and shallow reaction to the damning evidence regarding the seven most egregious research practices by feminist ideologues involved in DV research, as written by Straus.

> First, I will just point out the obvious once again: You STILL have not dealt with the fact that THE VERY PEOPLE YOU CITE TO SUPPORT YOUR ARGUMENT do NOT think women are "half the problem." You can say whatever nonsense you want about the evils and the biases of feminist research, but unless and until you deal with this simple fact, you have not offered a rebuttal to my main point. No amount of rhetorical obfuscation can conceal this point, not even equating me with slaveholders and/or Nazis, as you do in your conclusion.

I also find it confusing, almost comical that Futrelle is at this point almost rabidly hammering away at the idea that I should heed the words of the very researchers whose research he has dismissed with near equal vehemence.

To the DOJ study in a moment, but first, what I said about feminist research was not nonsense. It was valid, documented, highly relevant and points to no less than rampant corruption in the academic community you so depend on for your information.

To add to that (as if I really needed to), I am going to include here a stellar video made by Tom Golden, LCSW. It is an exemplary piece of work, painting a clear picture of the multiple ways that scholarly pursuits have become fraught with sexual politics, and why, as a group, we need to be very mindful of what lies under the surface of claims made by all ideologues regarding violence against women.

Nonsense, Mr. Futrelle? Well, perhaps, but it is not coming from me.

Almost all the rest of David's post was continued hammering at CTS, which has exceeded the level of dead horse beating a few times over at this point. It is stipulated that CTS, like all research devices, has shortcomings. That being said, I have also demonstrated that this does not justify the Chicken Little scenario that Futrelle is so feverishly shooting for.

I stand completely by my original assessment. Domestic Violence- Women are Half the Problem.

And the DOJ study doesn't alter that fact either.

Before I dig into that study too much I first need to reveal that it has a serious problem up front.

It's a CTS based survey study. That is right, I kid you not. The one supposedly non ideologically influenced offering that David and has touted – as though it were some sort of anti-MRA Kryptonite – uses the same basic methodology for gathering information as the studies that David has been trying so fervently to discredit.

Tell me David, is this where I get to copy and paste all your redundant, repetitive and regurgitated objections to CTS, and then just dismiss the DOJ without an honest examination?

Never mind. I won't do it. Call it a values thing. Besides, there are plenty of other reasons to take the study to task.

First of all, this one could very easily have been the object of one of Tom's videos.

We get kind of a hint in the beginning, to wit:

> Violence against women first came to be viewed as a serious social problem in the early 1970s, in part because of the reemergence of the Women's Movement*. In unprecedented numbers, scholars trained in such diverse disciplines as philosophy, literature, law, and sociology began to examine violence against women* in the context > of a feminist ideology. Despite the resulting outpouring of research on violence against women, particularly in the areas of rape and intimate partner violence, many gaps remain in our understanding of violence against women.*

Yes, in this the very first paragraph of the study, they identify not as academicians, but feminist ideologues. With a profound lack of erudition that can only be rooted in hubristic hegemony, they inform readers from the beginning that this is a political action. Straight from jump.

OK, though, since we have established during the course of this "debate" that this is nothing less than we should expect from these people, let's take a brief, very brief look at what they do have. Thankfully, what they have is well presented so it takes little effort to get the picture.

First, here is a chart of lifetime incidents of rapes and assaults by sex.

Click for full size
As you can see, with the expected exception of rape, when it comes to the experience of being assaulted, across the board it appears that men have it a good bit worse than women on average.

Now, let's take a look at the incidence of intimate partner violence during the participant's lifetime.

[image]
Click for full size
As you can see, at the top of the list women were more than three times as likely as men to have been the victim of IPV when considering all forms of assault.

And as you go through the breakdown of different types of assaults, everything from pushing and shoving to being shot, the numbers consistently point to women being at greater risk.

Case closed right?

Wrong. To their credit they did factor weigh for under reporting. To their disgrace they did not figure it in to the graphs. What they did provide, very visibly, was the following:

[image]
Click for full size
And so there you have it. A rough sketch of the math will lead you to a very familiar situation.

Domestic Violence- Women are half the problem.

But the real kicker comes in with the headline, as follows:

[image]
Click for full size
And there you have it. The data, as always, points to the same thing. But the conclusion; the energy; the focus and concern goes only to women.

Just like we heard and saw from Tom Golden. Just like we see in the corrupt and dishonest actions of feminist researchers; just like we see from organizations like NOMAS; just like we see in legislation like VAWA, and just like we hear from a narcissitic little shit like David Futrelle. No matter the truth, no matter the consequences, or even if it is our children that suffer them, women are vics, men are perps. Your guilt is in your nutsack, your privilege in your pussy, and you're a hater, demonizing women and wishing them ill if you dare to say otherwise.

I have one more piece to write on this subject. I am going to take a couple of days off and then I am going to go to work on it.

What could come out of this, no, what should, is more than just pointing to the problem and calling foul. We need ideas, real ones, that offer us a path to start walking should the day ever come that we can just reach out and help people who need it, regardless of their sex, and in defiance of the really horrible people that have taken a serious social ill and turned it into an ideological freak show.

What I come up with may well just sit and gather cyberdust as we continue endlessly on this insane but commonly traveled road. It may even deserve to.

But I want to try. After all, isn't that what we are supposed to do with the impossible?

Our best, I mean.

Strategies for Men Before, During and After False Allegation

DISCLAIMER: The Author is not a lawyer and the following information is not given as legal ADVICE, but to give readers ideas of possible legal avenues to research and pursue to redress their own grievances. The author assumes no responsibility for the results of the strategies herein…and is in fact ashamed he's the only one who's thought of them…K.K.

In 2008, the Nevada Review-Journal published a human interest story entitled "A Mother's Struggle". The story documented a local divorcee's attempts to gain custody of her daughter, as she was convinced that her ex-husband was sexually abusing the child.*

To her credit, the writer did list the facts in the case: that the divorcee had left the marriage while pregnant, and initiated the divorce; that her husband had passed a polygraph test; that she herself failed a polygraph test; that her husband had been investigated three times by the police, twice by court-ordered psychologists, and once by a private investigator—none of whom could discover any evidence of sexual abuse by the husband. The divorcee had also denied the husband's court-ordered visitation rights and served 48 hours in jail for contempt of court. With only arguments, allegations and accusations, the divorcee continued to petition the courts. Finally her ex-husband gave up his paternal rights altogether by leaving the United States for his country of origin. The divorcee now has sole custody of her daughter, lives in her parent's house, and is seemingly content. The conclusion of the writer infers that justice, although delayed, as apparently been served.

Still, the article remains titled "A Mother's Struggle".(1) While every actual fact exonerates the ex-husband, the specter of sexual abuse looms large in any reader's mind, defeating the notion that the article could just as easily been entitled "A Father's Struggle".

Bear in mind, this is just one article.

(*–Names withheld)

Some months earlier, in the Osceola County Corrections Facility, a man in an orange jumpsuit confided to me that his wife had come home drunk at four in the morning. He said "Enough of this", and immediately began packing his children's clothes to take them to his parent's house. His wife's mother, who was on the premises, called the police and reported that he was hitting his wife.

The police came and summarily arrested him.

Since the passage of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) in the United States, a majority of states have created Mandatory Arrest Laws dealing with domestic disputes.

These laws oblige the investigating officers to make an arrest, and in the overwhelming majority of cases it is the man who is arrested.

Beyond domestic disputes, we have seen that in allegations of rape, the alleged rapist's name quickly becomes a matter of public record, whereas Rape Shield laws guarantee anonymity to the accuser. Incredibly, the assistant Dean of student life at Vassar College has said that "Men who have been falsely accused of rape can benefit from the experience". (2)

Meanwhile, investigations of rape cases within the United States Air Force revealed that 55% of rape charges were falsified.(3) Reasons that were given for making the false rape charges ranged from covering up a pregnancy, to testing a husband's love, to a reason for being late to work.

The Innocence Project, which uses DNA testing to free the wrongly imprisoned, has given 205 unjustly accused convicts their lives and freedom back. 204 of them were men.

If there is indeed still a 'battle of the sexes', then false accusations are its secret weapons. They pierce Constitutional Rights and freedoms, mangle due process, and shatter reputations, relationships and families. No witnesses are required, nor is physical evidence of a crime. As previously demonstrated, a mere phone call is enough to serve as 'probable cause' for search, seizure and arrest. The effectiveness of the false accusation lays in the perception of the heinousness of the accused crime: assault, battery, rape and/or sexual molestation of women and children almost universally brings emotion to tread roughshod over logic. (The reader comments of the Nevada Review-Journal story all vilified the accused father.)

While both sexes are able to use false accusations, victims in the overwhelming majority of cases are male. Men have even been victims of domestic abuse by their female partners, and have either been denied police protection or arrested themselves. It therefore behooves men to imagine worst-case scenarios, research legal precedents, and know their rights—while they last.

Not enough men are standing up for themselves. Far too many are shocked and cowed by false allegations, and the legal system is far too willing to take a woman's word over a man's (the prevailing logic being that the man is 'bigger' and therefore capable of more damage, even though he may have never harmed a fly). Truly law-abiding men remain ignorant of the legal process, thinking "It can't happen to me". When it does, policemen and court officials are more interested in telling a man what he can't or shouldn't do than what he can or should.

BEFORE A FALSE ACCUSATION:

Perhaps the best defense against false accusations would not to be giving anyone a reason to make one against you. In a just and perfect world, that would suffice. The phrase 'Love Is Blind' has a good deal of truth in it; when you're in love, you may very well be blind to behaviors that could prove harmful to you in the future.

At Vassar College, a male student may have consensual sex with a female student—that night—and the next day, she can say she 'felt bad about it, in retrospect', and the male student can be charged with rape

John Dias, creator of the website www.Don'tMakeHerMad.com, suggests using surveillance as proof of one's innocence. There is a valid danger of legal 'collateral damage'—surveillance of another person without their knowledge may constitute a crime in itself, but when used solely as a means of legal defense, it should be less prosecutable. There are hidden closed-circuit cameras and recording devices that can be placed throughout one's home, or worn on one's person (in the form of pens, watches, lapel pins and more).

BEFORE ALLOWING A WOMAN TO ENTER YOUR HOME…actually before allowing anyone to enter your home…hopefully you can answer one or more of these questions:

Do you know her FULL NAME? (Thousands of men have only needed to hear "Hi, I'm Bambi", and it's good enough for them.)

Have you seen her car, and its license plate number?

Is she employed? Do you know where she works?

Is she wearing a wedding ring? (Married women who indulge in extramarital affairs may seek to contact other men as patsies for false rape charges in the event of a pregnancy or venereal disease.)

BEFORE HAVING SEX WITH A WOMAN:

Is she SOBER? Very inebriated women may claim to want or even demand sex, but it may be wise to see if "that was the alcohol talking".

Are you sober? Did you leave any of your drinks unattended, or consume any drinks that she bought for you that you didn't see being made? (The origin of the term "Mickey Finn" comes from a bartender who enabled female thieves at his tavern to drug men's drinks.)

Are you using Birth Control? Note that while she may claim to be using birth control, it does not automatically mean that she is…she may normally be on birth control but has forgotten to take it, or is experiencing a false period, or is using a form of birth control with a lower rate of effectiveness. Most of these factors have not legally excused men for having to pay child support, although they should.

Has she verbally consented to sex? It is better to ask "Do you want to make love?" and receive a positive response then to merely assume she's consenting to sex via body language. Some colleges insist that males must receive verbal consent prior to intercourse, and any sex without it is non-consensual.

Does she display or claim enthusiasm for BDSM (bondage and sadomasochism) activities? As exciting as it may seem, do not permit a barely-known woman to handcuff you to anything (that you can't break loose from on your own)!

Does she claim to 'like it rough'? Even if so, that claim does not obligate you to play rough. No matter how insistent she may be, you should not bruise or break the skin.

During foreplay, or before or during coitus, does she 'tense up', act frightened or apprehensive? Does she cry? If so, she may have been previously raped or molested. Her sex drive still exists, but she may psychologically equate sex with pain, servitude or dishonor.

In any event, you should get to know a woman as well as you can, and think very hard, before A) giving her a key to your home, B) signing a lease with her, C) merging any financial assets into joint accounts.

BEFORE MOVING IN WITH A WOMAN:

Even if a woman has a place that puts the Taj Mahal to shame, and invites you to move in with her, remember that you are moving in with her. She can tell you to leave whenever she wants, so it is in your best interests to prove that you live there. When you contribute to the rent, ensure it is in the form of a check, and request your bank to furnish you with receipts. Signing a lease makes you legally liable for all rent payments through out the rental contract. You may wish to offer to 'cover all utilities' (And/or groceries) instead, which can provide proof of residence without making you liable for the rent.

Realize that once a woman has moved in with you, and made some contribution to the household…anything from rent payments to utilities or groceries, she may be able to legally claim "I live here". As such, you may encounter difficulty having her legally removed from your domicile.

You should also ask her if she has any serious allergies, debilitating health issues, and how to contact her closest next of kin.

DURING A FALSE ACCUSATION:

Some women will often use the threat of a false accusation to achieve some desired goal…anything from changing your behavior to having you removed from your house.

Note that if she does threaten you in this manner: "I'll tell the police you did such and such…" you will probably want to take steps to sever all ties with her. It may have been a heat-of-the-moment threat, but she can't 'un-make' it, and she'll realize that option will always remain open to her. Calmly reply to her threat with "If you do that, you leave me no choice but to charge you with Wanton Endangerment*, making a false police report, and sue you for defamation of character."

(*You may wish to substitute Assault or Criminal Mischief for Wanton Endangerment. Assault is the threat of harm. Being taken from one's home under threat of force, incarcerated, and forced to pay a bond should legally constitute harm. Wanton Endangerment is placing someone in harm's way by proxy…i.e., someone who's HIV positive is guilty of Wanton Endangerment when they don't inform their sexual partners of their status.)

If your woman fights with you verbally, that can be grounds for Nuisance, especially if she's loud enough to be overheard by neighbors. If she's verbally goading or provoking you towards violence, tape it if possible, but walk away as soon as possible. Verbal provocation to fight—in conjunction with 'fighting words', insults with no redeeming Free Speech defense—is a form of disorderly conduct known as a fighting ruckus.

As unpalatable as it may be, imagine yourself accused of misdemeanor domestic battery, and the police have been summoned. The phone call alerting them serves as probable cause to enter any establishment. Note that in many areas, interference with such a phone call…disabling the phone, for instance…can constitute a felony in itself.

If the woman in the situation has in fact not been harmed, try to get a photograph of her (many cellular phones are equipped with cameras ideal for this situation). You may wish to hold up the day's newspaper within part of the photo to prove the date, unless the camera 'time-stamps' its images.

See if any neighbors are nearby and within earshot. If so, you may wish to open the door and tell her she can leave, in a voice loud enough to be heard. Not that she must leave, but she can leave. If she does leave, you can make a good case for refusing to let the police enter your home without a warrant. However, if she does live at the place in question, she can give police her consent to enter or search the premises. The police can and probably will still try to gain entrance to your home to make an arrest, but you have a much better case for Unreasonable Search and Seizure.

If she refuses to leave, it may be in your best interest to leave the area, even if it's your own domicile, before the police arrive. Take whatever you can with you; your wallet, house and car keys at the very least. Before leaving, inform your accuser that telling a police officer that you abused her when you didn't warrants a criminal charge of making a false police report and will be grounds for a separate lawsuit of Slander. If she or the officers in question make a written statement accusing you of battery, there will be an additional lawsuit for Libel. This warning in itself may be enough to convince her to withdraw the accusation, but if the police are en route they will probably follow through with an investigation anyway.

Leaving the area, especially if it's your own domicile, may be a nuisance, but it can give you time to take steps you would not be able to take if you were arrested: contacting employers, loved ones, attorneys, setting up alternate phone service or a post office box, transferring or securing bank accounts, getting a credit line increase, et cetera. If the police have an arrest warrant for you, the warrant must be "fresh", or between three and ten days old. Misdemeanor warrants normally have to be served during the daytime—between 6 am and 10 pm.

It's probably better not to call your home from a land line, as police technology can often triangulate your physical location from them. If you do call, assume the police are listening.

If the police do arrive before you can leave, be on your best behavior, although it normally goes without saying. Police need a warrant to arrest you at your home, but they do not need a warrant if they believe A) you have committed or are about to commit a crime, B) other people are about to get hurt, C) you're about to destroy evidence or property, or D) there's already a warrant out for your arrest. This obviously gives the police a lot of leeway.

Once the police begin asking questions, it is in fact an interrogation. Keep your voice audible, but calm and low. Memorize the time, the location, and the names and badge numbers of the officers. Police are looking for any evidence that a crime is committed, so even sarcasm will work against you ("Oh yeah, just look at her, I beat her to a pulp, that's why she doesn't have a hair out of place.").

There is a possibility that, by communicating calmly and reasonably with the officers, you can convince them that the dispute is not or should not be treated as a domestic situation. This possibility is unfortunately slight. Flattery and bribery generally don't work and should not be attempted. Apologies, however, have been known to work. "I'm sorry you were put to all this trouble, I know you're just doing your jobs, but I really would rather not answer any questions without a lawyer present."

Police will use a variety of techniques to gather evidence for a case. They can lie, and say they have evidence they actually don't. One policeman may seem to be 'gunning' for your arrest, while their partner may seem friendly and say “we just want to hear your side of it”. A policeman may say “This happens all the time, and the judge will go easier on you if you confess.” (However, the policeman is most definitely not the judge.) They may threaten you with obstruction of justice if you don’t confess, but only the DA can charge you.

If you are arrested—and police do not have to use the term ‘arrest’—do not panic or resist arrest. You can ask the officer if he can simply issue you a citation. Regardless, remain as polite as possible; say only “I’m remaining silent, I want a lawyer.”

If you are in custody, and interrogated by police or different law enforcement official, and have been not been informed of your Miranda Rights (Right to remain silent), the police have acted improperly and your case can be thrown out. This only applies if the police take you into custody (a situation you feel not free to leave) and interrogate you, not either/or.

You should consider the idea of Malicious Arrest, where police know you are innocent and arrest you anyway. This may be difficult to prove, but if you have evidence of her false accusation (on audio or video), whereas she has no evidence to back up her accusation, it could have the foundations for a case. Consult your attorney.

Note that you are not legally entitled to ‘one phone call’. You are entitled to speak with a lawyer, and if you need a phone to contact one, you’ll be provided with access to a phone. If you don’t have a lawyer or know a lawyer’s phone number, call a friend or family member and ask them to contact a lawyer for you. Never assume that your phone call is private!

Some states will have an officer of the court called a pretrial officer that can enable you to pay a bond fee and be released on your own recognizance. If you can qualify for the bond and afford it, you’ll agree to appear in court, then be released.

While you are being processed, the police assisting your significant other will strongly suggest that she get an Injunction, or Temporary Restraining Order against you. The TRO can be processed immediately, and you will be notified in jail that a TRO has been issued against you. It succinctly states that you are not allowed to come within a certain distance—anywhere from 500 yards or more—of your significant other’s place of residence (even if it’s yours as well) or her workplace. Most TROs will also have a ‘no contact’ clause which considers any attempt at communication-phone calls, letters, e-mails, etc., a violation of the TRO. Communications through another person are considered ‘contact through a third party’ and may also represent a violation.

Defense lawyers in your area routinely check daily arrest records, and will offer their services via mailings as soon as your name appears. Ironically, the TRO may in most cases prevent you from receiving your mail.

This in itself may provide a grievance in your favor: in the case of a live-in girlfriend—not a wife—if you are restrained from accessing your own mail, and if she takes your mail from the mailbox, even just to save it for you, that may legally constitute Theft Of Mail, a Federal offense. Also, if a restraining order bans you from collecting your mail, you clearly cannot be ‘served’ court papers through the mail.

You will be given a hearing before a judge, hopefully within 48 hours. A public defender told this writer “The less you say to the judge, the better”. The judges in initial hearings may not even address you, but only hear statements from the attorney and prosecutor (sometimes over a closed-circuit TV system). The judge will set a bond (bail) amount and any other conditions for release. If you have a credit card among your personal effects, you can use it to bond yourself out if you have enough to cover the bond. In cases where you can’t afford the entire bond, you may call a bail bondsman who will cover 90% of the bond if you can pay 10% of it.

If you have been served with a TRO while in custody, do not attempt to return home on your own. If so, you can be charged with violation of the TRO and arrested all over again. With a police escort, you should be able to return home to get certain necessities. The TRO is temporary; generally lasting two weeks or until a court hearing to determine if the TRO should be permanent.

Note that some women have been known to use TROs ‘offensively’…that is, they will shop at stores they know you also shop at, in the interest of reporting that you violated the TRO. If you see this occurring, immediately leave the area. Contact the venue's management and ask if they have their premises under video surveillance (a great many businesses do). You may need to subpoena their tapes later.

You should also consider filing a Stalking charge or Criminal Mischief charge.

Also, an Injunction or TRO does not give her the right to change the locks on your home (generally both the permission of all lease-holders is necessary to change the locks), nor can she destroy or dispose of any of your property. Wrongfully interfering with another's personal property is one definition of Criminal Trespass.

As for lawyers, it is better to have one than not have one, although you can use a public defender, or represent yourself. If you do choose to represent yourself, you owe it to yourself to do as much research as you can beforehand. Judges will not accept ignorance of the law as an excuse.

Once you have been released, it may be extremely tempting to leave the state, or even the country. The father in the Review-Journal case ultimately did leave the country. While you may remain technically 'free' by doing so—perhaps indefinitely—refusal to appear in court will result in a bench warrant against you, and a simple traffic stop thousands of miles away would result in your arrest. Leaving the area also smacks of guilt. It's probably better to remain in the area, with friends or family, until your court date(s) are finalized.

You will probably be better served by preparing and researching your own case, as well as filing whatever civil suits you can.

AFTER A FALSE ALLEGATION

If you retain counsel—even a public defender—you should work closely with him or her to present the best defense you can. Give your attorney all the facts you can: date and time of the arrest, any witnesses, the approach and behavior of the police, your work history, anything you can think of. Don't hold anything back from your attorney. If the allegation is flagrantly false, add your willingness to take a polygraph test and ask if your accuser could be given one as well.

Some very harried or underconfident public defenders may suggest that you plea bargain. The 'deal' may be tempting, but you should not ever plead guilty to something you didn't do. As mentioned previously, some criminal charges may apply to your accuser: Wanton Endangerment, Assault, Criminal Mischief, Disorderly Conduct, Making a False Police Report. These charges may seem 'retaliatory', but turnabout is fair play, and criminal charges should let your accuser know that A) there are consequences for her actions, B) you're fighting mad, and C) you're fighting mad within the boundaries of the law.

It's best if you're able to provide evidence, of course. You may be able to use a photocopy of your own arrest record. If the police demand that you provide evidence or witnesses, politely ask them why, since they did not require evidence or witnesses to arrest you. If the Watch Commander tells you to forget it, note his name and badge number and politely ask when the next Watch Commander comes on duty.

You can bring a civil suit for Defamation of Character (Libel or Slander) in small claims court without a lawyer, but the maximum amount you would be able to sue for would be $5,000.00. Beyond small claims court, civil trails become very lengthy and expensive.

Libel should be proven through the police report itself. It is—or should be—an unproven accusation or a criminal offense. You should sue for the amount of your release bond, court costs, attorney's fees, any time lost from work and any expenses incurred from being restricted from your residence (hotels, meals, etc.). If this amount totals more than a small claims court can award, consider filing a claim in a higher court. You should also ask for your record to be expunged.

You will need to subpoena the responding and arresting officer(s) as witnesses. Since the allegation was fabricated, they will actually be 'anti-witnesses'—to all the events they were told occurred but did not actually see. If you are representing yourself, here are some sample questions you might consider asking. Only ask questions that you are certain will be answered to your satisfaction!

"Did you check for priors through your NCIS database?" (Yes)

"Did I have any previous arrests?" (No)

"Had you ever been summoned to the residence before on a similar complaint?" (No)

"Had any of the neighbors complained previously?" (No)

"When you arrived, did you see a struggle taking place?" (No)

"Did you see any signs of a struggle?" (No)

"Was I acting in a violent manner?" (No)

"Did you notice any injuries to the accuser?" (No)

"Did she ask for medical attention?" (No)

"How many domestic disputes have you responded to previously?"

"Among those disputes, how many resulted in your arresting the man?"

If your accuser cross-examines the officer(s), remember that anything not witnessed or corroborated is hearsay.

If you win in court, ask that the case be either sealed or expunged (erased from your record).

It may be possible to sue for the police (or sheriffs) for Malicious Arrest, or the Prosecutors for Malicious Prosecution.

Malicious arrest occurs when police arrest you knowing you were innocent. You ARE innocent until proven guilty. Unfortunately, Malicious arrest is notoriously hard to prove, as is Malicious Prosecution.

Malicious Prosecution occurs when the prosecution came after you with malice and without probable cause. In the case of someone with no previous criminal record—especially a case without evidence or witnesses—a good attorney could argue that Arrest and/or Prosecution are malicious, since the ordeal and trial will seriously malign your reputation.

Using the letter of the law itself, it may be possible to bring additional charges against your accuser, and/or the law enforcement officers in question. For example, Kidnapping is simply detaining, or taking someone to another area against their will. Conspiracy, and Aiding and Abetting the same may technically apply to the police, along with Unreasonable Search and Seizure.

These may seem like extreme measures, and may require a very aggressive and creative attorney.

However, if the victims of false accusations continue to remain on the defensive, merely leaving their fate to an attorney or public defender, and do not research, explore and demand their rights, then the wheels of injustice will continue to grind our lives with impunity. It is only if we consistently challenge and punish false allegations—and hold the judicial system accountable—that we can hope for any true justice and change.

FALSE ALLEGATION ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

Whereas,* false allegations of criminal behavior or activity are acted upon by law enforcement personnel and are resulting in 'warrantless' arrests depriving citizens of due process of law and unconstitutional search and seizure, regardless of the motive behind the allegations;

Whereas,* otherwise law-abiding citizens with no prior criminal records are being deprived of liberty, property and dignity by false allegations;

Whereas,* false allegations of crimes strain police resources, overload the court system, result in lost work, wages and tax revenue;

It is thereby suggested that the provable False Allegation of a Crime shall be classified as a Class D Felony (Assault), punishable by a maximum of 6 months in jail and a fine of $1,000, and/or probation, mandatory counseling, community service, and full financial restitution to the victim, including lost wages and court costs.

Criminal Injustice

Paul Elam · 27 October 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the second Kevin Driscoll rape trial, in which he was acquitted by jurors in less than an hour, it is fitting that USA Today has reported that they have uncovered over 200 cases of prosecutorial misconduct in which state officials subverted justice by any means necessary, including lying to juries and judges, hiding evidence, breaking plea bargains and enticing testimony from felons by promising early release from prison.

Those abuses, often criminal in nature, not only imprisoned the innocent but set guilty people free. And it happened to the tune of millions of dollars in taxpayer money.

Judges involved in the cases were livid, condemning the misconduct as "outrageous" and "flagrant."

But the problem is not by any means isolated. Says Pace University law professor Bennett Gershman, an expert on misconduct by prosecutors, "It's systemic now, and … the system is not able to control this type of behavior. There is no accountability."

That statement is buttressed by the fact that of all these documented cases, not one prosecutor lost their license to practice law, or even their job as prosecutor. In fact, there was only one case where a prosecutor was temporarily suspended.

Remember Mike Nifong of the infamous Duke Lacrosse Rape Case? It took a story that had saturated the media, and public criminality on his part to create enough pressure to get him disbarred. And he spent one day in jail.

This story is a reminder, though, that the travesty of sending innocent men to prison is not just a symptom of feminist governance. It certainly plays into their hand, and I am sure that the Catherine MacKinnon's of this world would gladly don cheerleader outfits at sentencing hearings if it would not so egregiously violate our sense of the aesthetic. But the fact remains that the entire criminal justice system is now in the hands of criminals. Either by action or omission, they are all complicit.

The rape industry is just an offshoot enterprise of a much larger and successful parent company. And the parent company, after all, makes men its stock in trade.

I recall the first Kevin Driscoll rape trial. I sent an email to Deschutes County Prosecutor Michael Dugan, asking him why his office would so fervently pursue the conviction of a man on nothing more than the accusation of a woman who had passed herself around at a party like a bowl of chips, and who also had a documented history of false rape accusations. I let him know in no uncertain terms that the world was watching, and that a growing number of people were taking a dim view of this kind of prosecution.

He wrote me back, his message saturated with the smugness of a criminal who just knows he can't be caught. And he said something quite interesting as well.

He quoted Shakspeare. "Truth will out," he said.

Indeed it will, Mr. Dugan. And it has. Driscoll's jury didn't buy your fraud, and were last seen hugging the man and shaking his hand.

And now, even a major player in print media isn't buying the fraud, either.

Truth will out. And it will out more in the future.

In regards to the second Driscoll trial and acquittal, Deputy Assistant District Attorney Jody Vaughn, who actually prosecuted the case is quoted as saying, "I have no idea what happened back in the jury room."

I do, Ms. Vaughn. Justice. And justice has a way of finding even the most well heeled of criminals.

So I hope all these prosecutors remain smug and sanctimonious. I hope they think they don't need their raincoats. Because in the days ahead, the bills will all be coming due. It is becoming increasingly evident, in the immortal words of Bob Dylan, that "A Hard Rains Gonna Fall."

I know, I know, the guy is kinda like a zit that won't pop or respond to Clearasil. And I know that this quisling is supposed to be in the rear view mirror at this point, but he has raised his empty head for one last stab at mediocrity.

It seems now, after publicly agreeing to, and participating in a debate on domestic violence, he now wants all evidence he ever participated in said debate removed from this website. To wit, he just left the following in the comment section:

Paul:

You do not have my permission to post my debate contributions on your site any longer. Since you do not have legal ownership of any of my writings, I expect you to take them down immediately.

I will put my debate contributions up on my own site. You will be free to link to them, of course, and say anything you want about them.

I wrote you about this before, and got no response. I expect a response this time.

By the way, this was the general tone of his emails whenever he had an issue with anything. Arrogant and demanding.

And of course I gave him my response in the comments. ?

Thing is, readers, this debate, which I invested considerable time and unparalleled talent in putting together, is now, in it's complete form, my intellectual property. As Manboobz voluntarily submitted writing is now inextricably tied to mine in the form of debate, removing one would essentially destroy the other.

That would represent a significant loss to me.

As you can see in the comments, if you are so inclined, I have offered Mr. Boobz an arrangement, fully detailed, for compensation that I think is very appropriate.

While he thinks it over, let it be known now that any blogger in the sphere, MRA or otherwise, has my permission to repost this debate in full on their blog or website. I would appreciate a link back to AVfM in consideration, but I am not requiring it if you are not so disposed.

I am changing the current headline on the debate to reflect Manboobz name in full, as this will help anyone find the debate who does a search on his name. May I be so bold as to request those that repost the debate to use the title I provided? I am also killing the links to his site in the debate. As we pass this around, there is no point in boosting his search results back to his blog.

Sterling!

Cheers.

Slowing Down for Kiwi's

As I have whined about incessantly in recent days, I have been struggling with a sack full of kidney stones, and the Veteran Administration's rather casual attitude about removing them. As fate would have it, I have, for a much longer period of time, also been planning on a trip to New Zealand.

The two don't mix as well as I would like.

But MRA's are accustomed to facing dilemmas. So, on November 5th, with a string of rubber in my right ureter, and a suitcase full of hydrocodone, I am going to do what any sane man would do and get on the plane.

Did I say I was sane? Well, actually, I already had too much invested in the trip to back out or reschedule. And I am not missing it just because one of my internal organs has taken up geology as a hobby.

So I am posting this for two reasons. One, any of you that would like to submit additional, or even your first articles to the site, any time up till the 4th would be a very good time. I will try to post a few short items, like select videos, etc., while I am away, but I have pledged to myself not to spend my trip hammering at this keyboard.

The other reason is to give you all a warning. I am old enough to remember the days when people would corner you in their home with an album full of vacation photos, eating up precious minutes of your life, never to be regained.

But this is the information age, so that means I get to force those photos on everyone who wanders in here, and I don't even have to offer up something to drink.

I will try to keep it to a reasonable level, but despite current health concerns I am excited about the trip, and will make you all suffer for it.

Maybe I'll come back with a fresh Maori tatt, and put that up here as well.

Stephen Fry in the Dog House: “Women Don’t Really Like Sex”

Theodore Labadie · 1 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Stephen Fry has outraged feminists in an astonishing outburst where he claimed that women only use sex to manipulate men into having a relationship. Well, isn’t this largely true? Lesbians, unfettered by never having to deal with a man’s reticence for instantaneous domesticity pick out china patterns even before they hear that fateful question, less an offer for sex where women are concerned and more an invitation to nest building, “So, what are you doing tonight?” Apparently not, judging by the Daily Mail article and the author trots out the lascivious ladies from Sex and the City as evidence. Except, I was under the distinct impression that *Sex and the City*was really an allegory for mainstream gay sex, not heterosexual female sex.

More surprising to me is the *Attitude*journalist’s opinions on Fry’s interview:

> Gay men debating the whys and wherefores of female sexuality… for very obvious reasons, we can hardly claim to be experts.

Oh yes we can. Any gay man who has ever had a fag hag girlfriend knows the sexual psychology of women in exhaustive detail. And I emphasize the word exhaustive; women can never shut up about even the smallest slight they feel that they’ve endured at the hands of some man. That’s what gay boyfriends are for. Free therapy.

> I’m more interested in his feeling that straight men are somehow to be pitied. That’s quite a radical standpoint.

There’s nothing radical about it. Women treat most straight men like shit and this treatment should be evident to even the dullest homosexual. However, pity is the wrong word in my case. Pity is a useless emotion that infantilizes the recipient. I do not pity straight men. I empathize with them. And, judging by the reaction of the howling maenad hordes to Fry’s interview, in the Anglosphere at least, the fate of any man, straight or gay, who dares to criticize women is the same. Stephen Fry is very lucky to have established a career without typecasting himself as a heterosexual male lead, otherwise he would now have no career.

Swiss Stage World's First Anti-feminism Event

Man, wasn't just yesterday that I posted a link to the only known sympathetic men's movement coverage from a mainstream British radio station?

Anti-feminist conference attendee Andersson and wife. This is what an MRA looks like.
Not to be outdone, the good men of Switzerland have opted to take things a giant step further. They are actually holding an anti-feminist conference and have received interest in the event from at least 30 journalists. It has caused so much concern among Swiss fembots that the men have taken the event underground in order to forestall any planned protests or disruptions.

Feminists in Zurich, already outraged by the event, have taken to the streets, passing out leaflets and vandalizing public property.

It is really interesting. In a recent phone conversation I had with MenZ Magazine publisher Factory, we were discussing the exponentially accelerating activity in the men's movement, something that has become palpable in recent days. We both made our predictions on when the misandry bubble would burst. My pick was three years. He chose six months.

I think we are a lot closer to his prediction than mine.

I could continue to hammer out some commentary on this event, to do what I am used to doing with media treatment of men's issues, which is to read between their convoluted lines and sort the facts out from misandric slant. But in this case, it isn't even necessary.

There is actually a fair treatment of the upcoming event right here.

Read for yourself.

It seems that Europe is becoming the epicenter of the men's movement. I have only three words to say to that.

Export. Export. Export.

MGTRW: Men Going the Right Way

Ken Kupstis · 3 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Don't look back in anger, Don't look back in hate, Just look to the future and concentrate…"

~Raven

Some time back I learned of the new collective movement called MGTOW: Men Going Their Own Way. The basic tenets—self-reliance; independence; the realization that men did not need to be married, or even in a relationship, to be valuable or successful; the rejection of societal demands that gave them responsibilities without any reciprocal benefit—appealed to me immediately. Naturally I could also see where other groups would feel irked or threatened by MGTOW: the marriage industry, the recruiters of the military, religious institutions that champion families over singles, corporations and governments that fear independent single men.

After some time of absorbing the MGTOW dialogue, I realized another group might be threatened by MGTOW: Men trying to live the MGTOW lifestyle themselves.

There's an intoxicating freedom in the MGTOW lifestyle; an old biker t-shirt emblazoned Sworn To Fun—Loyal To None comes to mind. Indeed, the MGTOW philosophy seems to be nothing but fun, when you're single-handedly steering your own destiny: the complete absence of nagging, relationships based on 'your way or the highway', experiencing Las Vegas or Rio De Janeiro on a whim.

For some men, however, the MGTOW lifestyle could mean isolating themselves in studio apartments playing WORLD OF WARCRAFT for hours on end, surrounded by a cubic yard of Budweiser cans. As I write this, there's an unfortunate group of Japanese bachelors who never leave their apartments until their food runs out…and once they secure more, they again become recluses.

On a recent work assignment for Sony, I learned that their market research indicated American consumers were what they called "Cocooning"…staying inside their homes, and only emerging to consume and accumulate more luxuries.

Dr. Andrew Weil, in his book Eight Weeks To Optimum Health, described a bachelor patient who complained of unending pain from a back injury, that made him just "Work, and then crash". Digging deeper, Dr. Weil discovered that his patient was divorced, with no children (or, apparently, charisma). His friends had scattered to the four winds after college, none of them lived nearby. He didn't even have a pet. Dr. Weil made a diagnosis called Disconnection Syndrome—something yet to be recognized by the medical community at large, but doubtlessly quite accurate. Dr. Weil told his patient "You don't have a connection to anyone or anything; you only interact with people at work, your friends are far away, you don't have anyone in your life…" Disconnection Syndrome, as Dr. Weil terms it, is again not yet recognized by the medical community at large, but it's waiting with baited breath for many of the men living the MGTOW life.

I'm not so arrogant as to presume I can tell other men how to live their lives…if playing W.O.W. in a maze of beer cans keeps a man from lighting up a shopping mall with an AK-47, I'm all for it. But I have assembled some ideas for transforming Men Going Their Own Way into Men Going The Right Way…

(The reader is free to declare these 'ways' aren't the particular 'right way' for them, but I'll challenge anyone that says they're the wrong way.)

For MGTOW to become MGTRW, the key word is Mastery.

1. Achieve Mastery of your own body, and health.

Your philosophical and ideological freedom avails you nothing if you're trapped in a body that's plagued with problems. MGTOW's are especially vulnerable to a 'party' lifestyle high in alcohol and low in nutrition. Husbands and family men might have their wives or children nag them to visit the doctor. But as a MGTOW, the only one looking after your health is you.

Find a doctor you trust. Listen to them—but get a second opinion if necessary. Eat right. Exercise. Practice safe sex. Repeat as necessary. A gym membership, and/or a program in the martial art of your choice will also keep you active and widen your social circle.

(SUGGESTED READING: EIGHT WEEKS TO OPTIMUM HEALTH, by Dr. Andrew Weil.)

2. Achieve Mastery of your finances and resources.

You can't be independent or free when you're mired in debt. If you are, transfer all of your available resources to get out of debt…no matter how long it takes. Afterwards, either invest in the stock market (statistics reveal that stock market investments have paid at least an 11% dividend on average, while bank CDs or bonds have paid a mere 4-6%), or invest in yourself, in your own business venture. If you're in a corporate job that pays a healthy amount, that's commendable…but ensure you're essential to your organization, and can't be replaced right away. Financial independence, if not actual wealth, should be an optimal goal.

(SUGGESTED READING: PAY IT DOWN, by Jean Chatzky, and THE FIVE PILLARS OF WEALTH, by Tod Barnhart)

3. Stay Positive.

By this I mean not only strive for a positive attitude and worldview (perhaps difficult, I'll concede), but be a positive force in society, or at least in your community. It's your perfect right to live in a log cabin with a rifle in your lap, but this doesn't do anything to improve the world.

Getting positive might mean 'killing your television', as the phrase goes; making friends in real life instead of some internet social network, or exploring a new sport, hobby or craft you've always been interested in. Staying positive might mean realizing you don't have to be a husband or father to be a role model…in fact, bachelors have a surplus of labor they can put to use, whereas family men have a deficit of labor due to the maintenance they're obliged to perform. Find a way to give back more than you take.

(SUGGESTED READING: LIVE WITH PASSION, by Anthony Robbins)

4. VOTE, or don't complain.

Too many people in the electorate are opting out of the political process, thinking their vote doesn't matter. The 'vested interests' that thrive on apathy love this. In actuality, voting should be the absolute minimum of any man's participation in the political process. If you're truly concerned about a misandrist government, you should know who your local, state and federal officials are and how to contact them and keep abreast of bills being passed before they become law.

Post-Modern American Honor

B.R. Merrick · 5 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

James Bowman is a stereotypical modern-day conservative. The only exception is that he's not only very smart, but his take on mass media and present-day culture is thought-provoking and poignant. I very much enjoy reading his movie reviews. He's definitely a throw-back to a previous era. One of the main ideas with which he is concerned is the loss in today's culture of what is generally referred to as "honor." If I understand the essence of his argument, the loss of an ancient phenomenon such as honor corresponds to the degradation of modern living, and the emasculation of men. Furthermore, honor is not defined in purely righteous terms, but is instead oftentimes, and most certainly in "post-modern" times, associated with attitude, reputation, or what could be considered a façade. Therefore, this phenomenon can be exhibited by both God-fearing Christians and street thugs. He even goes so far as to say, "Honor is not one among the other virtues," and that it has the tendency to be "hypocritical." In fact, there is so much of this in his many other articles on honor, that the reader begins to wonder whether such a phenomenon is good, right, or necessary any longer.

Until I encountered Bowman's writings on the subject, I had always thought that honor, having the same Latin root as "honesty," was about something more than just saving face among the clan to which one belongs. I've always seen it the way it is portrayed in "The Lord of the Rings" trilogy, where at the end of the first film, Samwise tells Frodo that he made a promise to look after him, and he intends to keep it. Honor was as simple as that. It is because of the influence of this phenomenon in the story that Bowman reluctantly gave the movie a higher rating (one star out of a possible two) than he originally did (no stars). The best part of the film, in my opinion, has to do with unquestioning loyalty and trust, aspects of honor for which Bowman grieves. After Sam and Frodo encounter Merry and Pippin, they are sought after by one of the Ringwraiths. As they make a quick escape, Frodo tells Merry, "I have to leave the Shire. Sam and I must get to Bree." It is in this moment that the viewer learns everything he needs to know about Merry, and about whatever inherent virtue there is in honor. With hardly a thought about the strangeness of what has just transpired, about Frodo's cryptic plea, or about any future dangers that might follow from providing Frodo and Sam with assistance, the camera closes in on Merry's thoughtful face as he calmly replies, "Right. Bucklebury Ferry. Follow me." This is a moment of pure gold, and I'm glad to see that it forces an old codger like Bowman to admit there's more to the film than outstanding visual sweep and technical brilliance.

But Bowman is also correct that we live in a culture that no longer understands this phenomenon, nor celebrates it. He also points out that much of the rest of the world persists in ancient honor cultures. It is one of these cultures of lost honor against which the government of the United States initiated aggression eight years ago. This is where I have to part company with Bowman, the old ideas of conservatism to which I subscribed, and perhaps with the true meaning of honor.

I don't know much about post-modernism, other than that it is mostly used these days to describe the "unprincipled" Left: feminism, nihilism, hippies, black supremacy, queer theory, etc.; in other words, everything Bowman despises about his own generation. Having come from a conservative background like Bowman, I understand to a much greater degree the significance and importance placed upon tradition and heritage. To Bowman and other conservatives, honor would appear to be something we ought not to lose, for no other reason than that we've always had it, in one form or another. It may also be his belief that we can't actually dispense with this phenomenon, as it is perhaps ingrained in our physiology somehow, that honor is something that separates us from all else in the animal kingdom. Therefore, if we ignore it, or refuse to recognize our innate possession of it, we will be unable to direct it in the proper fashion, and at some point in American history, we may see families slaughtering women for minor sexual offences, something that still happens to this day in other parts of the world. Post-modernism, in the nihilist sense of the term, doesn't recognize honor as having any value, because nothing, including post-modernism, has any value either. There is indeed danger in nihilist thought.

There is also danger, and a considerable amount at that, in Bowman's views of honor, however. Just read "The Worth of National Honor" to understand what I mean. At some point, to Bowman anyway, we owe so much to honor that "we" should have stopped the debate on the morality of the killing "we" were about to do (in the First Gulf War) to focus on the honor of what "we" were doing. If his argument is taken to its extreme, it is as if he is saying that "we" need to follow through on "our" word, for the sake of "our" word. Of course, when he says "our," he means "the government," which, naturally, he expects us all to support. Reflect for a while on the nature of what transpired in those few months in the Middle East in 1991, and what it has now led to. When truth, critical thinking, and bravery (and I'm thinking here of standing up for truth and critical thinking, not the bravery of running into an exchange of gunfire for whatever honorable reason) are swept aside so that a pampered elitist like George H.W. Bush can do the bidding of his pampered elitist friends, perhaps it's time to go back on "our" word and reconsider what it is that "we" are giving "our" word to, rather than continue the bloodletting. We do not need to follow through on bad decisions. We need the humility to understand what Captain Robert Lewis at least briefly understood in the cockpit of the Enola Gay over Hiroshima , after he did his part in incinerating thousands of people at once: "My God, what have we done?"

This is what honor, be it socially invented or biologically induced, routinely does. (Think of the absurdity of a duel, usually brought about by nothing more than an insult.) If Captain Lewis had had the capacity to think more critically beforehand; if he had displayed that ability early in life; if his mother and father had encouraged that, along with the importance of being honest and cultivating a love of truth; if all the men who were assigned to fly that day had honored their abilities to question authority and challenge information given to them, to apply their innate abilities for rational thought; then perhaps the war would have ended sooner, or never involved the United States at all. Instead, the more pathetic conception of honor, tied to old traditions of meritorious advancement, romanticization of violence, a strange, American-Christian God who frequently gives sanction to war, and unquestioning socially dictated behavior, produced men who could listen intently to another man who informed them, "We think [the bomb you'll drop] will knock out almost everything within a three-mile area," and continue with their plans to do just that. The Japs had it coming, you see. Besides, our honor was at stake. Ten paces, gentlemen.

In the balance of such bloody nonsense, regurgitated for future generations to digest, is the future of the human race. Lewis's complicit behavior in dropping that bomb did more than "knock out almost everything within a three-mile area." It altered human history, and mostly for the worse. The only bright spot is that it forced much of humanity out of part of its stupor of conventional honor. It made them question, in a way so many did after the First World War, what the hell they were doing. That question is a good ten times more important in my mind than any question of honor.

When writers and thinkers like Bowman ruminate on The Great War, they merely lament the unfortunate effect it had on the idea of honor in Western culture. Perhaps the final meaning of World War I is that man's technological ability to wage war has finally outstripped man's ability to honorably wage it at all. In much the same way that mass, instant, global, digital communication has shrunk the world and aided us in seeing the essential humanity in every human face and the fact that this humanity existed long before to our ability to grasp it, technology in its most horrendous forms has shown us what we ought not to do to one another and what we always ought not to have done. The one who for centuries kept telling millions in the Western World not to do it was ignored, right up until the moment that it became impossible to follow the admonition, in the advance of a hideous yellow cloud that turned men's bodies into torture chambers: "Love one another." Bowman himself admits that Jesus was challenging the honor culture built up in ancient Judaism. Since this is the guy Bowman worships, you would think our shared knowledge of the increasingly torturous and shockingly instantaneous instruments of war, coupled with God's word, would be enough to reassess the need for honor, or what honor should have been about all along.

If honor cannot contend with the truth we are learning about our obsession with using force and violence on our enemies, the only way for it to save face is to bow out gracefully, forever. If we as a culture do not learn to honor love, freedom, peace, and truth above all else, then I doubt it will matter very much what we do honor, if we honor anything at all.

I would urge Bowman to go back and watch “The Lord of the Rings,” only this time, sit through the entire trilogy. He would see that the only truly honorable actions were performed by those who did their part in helping to destroy The Ring, the symbol of power, or the desire and ability to use force and violence to control the outcome. Perhaps there’s hope when an intellectual like Bowman, who normally despises such Hollywood flummery, can see through it to find the hidden jewel of honor, and perhaps in the future he’ll see the inherent good in putting away any further ideas of honorably waging war. Perhaps someday there will be another Captain Robert Lewis who has the courage to eliminate the “we,” and ask himself, “My God, what have I done?”, and to do so before the atrocity is committed. Perhaps that day is sooner than we think.

Take Some Pride in That Penis, But Don't be Hung by it.

bowspearer · 7 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Yes I have a dick and I'm proud of it, but it doesn't define me."

A while back B.R. Merrick wrote a very controversial article on here on male pride over having a penis. In many ways it's very positive in terms of the Men's Rights movement, but in many ways it is also highly destructive and shackling and highlights the deeply insidious prison (so insidiously laid out that it doesn't even look like men are in a prison).

For B.R. Merrick was only half right. On one hand, certainly, we are taught to be ashamed of our penises and to view them as a source of perpetual debauchery. However it is this last point which actually points to the depraved double standard which exists regarding masculine sexuality.

For as much as men are taught to be ashamed of their penis, they are also taught that having a penis makes them perpetual whore (in that a penis automatically means consent), in the same way that women used to be taught that the moment they wore a certain outfit, that they were perpetual whore; by that duality, the penis has been seen not just as a symbol of debauchery, but of perpetual nymphomania over the course of history.

Now certainly, there is an argument for the necessities of traditional views towards sexuality from a survivalist perspective.

Before the advent of modern medicine, arguably a good 80% of all children died before reaching adulthood- with a good portion of those taking their mothers with them during birth. The rampant mortality rates dictated in an almost eugenic manner, that only the best stock of men and women should breed. With women, that was taken care of with biology- the weak would most likely die in childbirth anyway and for those that didn't their children would never reach adulthood.

With men however, it needed to take a turn for the more insidious- essentially taking the primal mating conflicts which take place when the females of any species are in heat and extrapolating them into the very underlying fabric of all aspects of the construction of fundamental society.

The reality of that society was that literally, "might makes right", and that manhood was measured equally in terms of a man's physical prowess and virility. Over time, this also extended to intellectualism and fiscal prowess in an ever increasing scale, but it was all based on the same principle- where men were expected to adhere to the most masculine character traits and expressions, with any deviation from this resulting in ridicule, ostracism and a complete, utter and permanent destruction of their reputations to the point where men are effectively regarded as not really men anymore, either jokes or homosexuals, who are the lowest of the low when it comes to manhood.

If this sounds incredibly barbaric to you, then that is because it was. However at the same time, it was necessary and is the reason we survived as a race to the advent of modern medicine and it is because of that that we should be thankful that it took place back then.

However with the advent of our modern civilisation, our salvation has almost become our doom. So ingrained was the evolved form of the mating conflict between males that as society changed, people were almost oblivious to it.

This leads me to something which would almost shock the average person on the streets- men can actually say no to sex. I know, gasp, shock, horror. Yes, by all means feel good about your sexuality; however your sexuality transcends far beyond your hormones and far beyond your anatomy. Men are allowed to not want sex, in the same way that feminism has correctly pointed out that women are allowed to not want sex (arguably one of the few things which 2nd and 3rd wave feminism has gotten right). If a man is too upset or hurt to have sex, then that's all he is, incredibly hurt and upset. It does not make him any less of a man, gay or any less virile in any way shape or form.

Yet this very issue is the reason why we have such a battered man and violated man crisis in society.

The reality is that we simply do not know what the stats on male rape victims (especially heterosexual rape victims) are. Likewise, the same is true of IPV stats.

Feminists claim that male-on-female violence and abuse eclipses female-on-male abuse, based almost entirely on reporting figures and the multitude of studies which focus almost exclusively on female-on-male violence based on said reporting figures. However they also in the process fail to take into account the disparities between survey based studies and crime reports. When this disparity is properly examined, what is discovered is alarming to say the least.

A recent study of police in Western Australia found that when called out to a female-on-male domestic violence situation; that the victim was 3 times more likely to be arrested than their perpetrator.

A few years back, a Muslim cleric in Sydney, Australia, was publicly lambasted for declaring that women who dress a certain way invite men to rape them by women's groups and the general public and correctly so. However, these same women's groups also hypocritically diminish and dismiss correctly fingered accusations at law enforcement and the courts for possessing this very same type of sick stereotype towards men.

Even experts like Dr Elizabeth Celi, have recently gone on record, stating that the situation for battered men is as bad now as it was for battered women before the past few decades. Even a brief examination of both social values and the legal system shows just how accurate this is.

Judging by my own experiences when contacting the NSW Police regarding a childhood sexual assault that I had finally worked up the tentative courage to report to police and the reaction I received from them which destroyed the tiny shred of it I had worked hard to build up; I would be inclined to believe her.

Certainly, a good portion of this is due to feminist politics and stereotypes, however these stereotypes merely borrow from and build on the traditional stereotypes of men being sexually dominant, strong and indomitable, especially in relation to women and and in turn that any male who does not meet this benchmark, regardless of the reason, is "not a man".

Until we address this long obsolete fundamental social construct turned insidious trap; all male pride will do is steer us back into the insidious prison of traditionalism, while allowing the vile and hypocritical gender stereotypes concerning abuse to continue to not only prosper, but flourish.

So where does that leave us. If I was a feminist, I would no doubt conclude that B.R. Merrick's blog leads us back into the dark days of traditionalism and that we should retain our shame of masculinity because of how it harms society- the usual baseless scape-goating of fatherhood.

However that vile brand of emasculation is equally as harmful as the insidious prison of traditionalism- where we are reduced by shame into social androgyny at the same time as being trapped by traditionalism. The solution is quite simple- a rejection of all notions of conditioned shame regarding being male, including those set out by traditionalism- to literally be proud of every aspect of being a man.

The reality is that there are times when men will be strong just as there are times when they will be weak. There are times when they will demonstrate great logic, just as there are times when they will demonstrate great sensitivity. There are times when they will be sexually active and virile, just as there are times when they will be chaste. Sadly and finally, there are times when they will be free and happy, and there are times when they will be victims.

In each and every one of these cases though, they are still men. For any of these, provided they are not harming an individual there should be no shame felt by men. Regardless of the actions of men, they are still men when displaying them, and with one notable and obvious exception, men should enjoy feeling any and all of the above.

That exception is being a victim. Here, the true shame is society's, for ridiculing, dismissing and further abusing male victims psychologically through dismissiveness, emasculation and invalidation, rather than giving them the compassion and empathy which women can in the vast majority of cases, expect from society. While being a victim should never be something to be embraced, it should equally be something which is rejected as a source of emasculation.

If Shylock's famous speech from "The Merchant of Venice" were spoken today with the current gender crisis, it might arguably have been transplanted into another situation to read:

"I am a Man. Hath not a man eyes? Hath not a man hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer, as a woman is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die?"

In short, in the same way that the feminist notion of empowerment (going right back to 1st wave feminism) taught women that they should not feel less of a woman for possessing or displaying some trait, men in society need to realize that they are always "being a man" simply by living and having lived.

I am not trying to dismiss what B.R. Merrick has said here. In fact this arguably compliments everything he has said. However, considering the insidious pitfalls and traps which men face along their journey and struggle for true gender equality it is critical that this be read alongside what he had said to not only properly contextualize it but to also avoid falling into an insidiously laid out pitfall in the form of traditional views on masculinity; to recognize just where the true destination for male pride has to lie, so that men can strive for complete and true equality at a fundamental level.

New Life for Men on College Campuses

Miles Groth Ph. D. · 8 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The lives of most boys and men are now more unfulfilling than ever before in postmodern America. It is situation the beginnings of which arguably can be traced back to the post-World War II generation of men. That is an important history to be told. In general, misandry—typically dressed down in the media in the tatters of bad jokes—has by now produced two generations of males born since 1975 who feel less than welcome at home, in the workplace, and especially at school.

This state of affairs is slowly coming into focus in our public collective sensibility even while the slack water of a turning tide has made it seem that things are at a standstill for men and boys. They are not. A movement is underway that is proactive. It is taking hold in colleges and universities, even as the enrollment of young men in college nationwide (now at about 39%, an all-time small proportion of male post-secondary students) continues to decrease. Significant spaces are opening up: men's centers where small groups of young males can meet informally to talk about what is important to them, their doubts and concerns, their hopes and aspirations.

Men's centers on college campuses are the place to work most effectively for boys and men. The students are at risk, but with our support they will lead us forward to a new generation of males, as exemplars and as fathers. They will be the next partners and friends, and will speak for men who have been silent for so long. Their influence on sons and young boys will help change the dismal literacy situation and emotional state in which so many of these young males currently find themselves.

This is a first report on such centers. Only four years ago the Men's Center for Leadership and Service was formed at St. John's University, in Minnesota, by Gar Kellom. Subsequently, with his steady guidance, a grant was secured from the Lily Endowment to sponsor two-year funded pilot projects at 14 colleges and universities. The results of these projects which focused on vocational discernment were published this summer in Engaging College Men: Discovering What Works and Why, edited by Kellom and Miles Groth, and published by the Men's Studies Press. This fall, Wagner College, one of the pilot project schools, opened a men's center on its campus on Staten Island, New York. It now serves as the model for such centers across the nation.

Within eight weeks of opening, the Wagner center gained the support of a benefactor. A designated gift has made possible the Theuer Men's Center at Wagner College. Thirty other schools are now considering implementing the Wagner model. The formula for establishing such a center is follows:

A faculty member identifies himself as a mentor for the college men at his institution. There is at least one such person on every campus just waiting to step out of the shadows and sponsor a men's center.

The faculty mentor gains the support of a visionary president.

A small core group of students known individually to the mentor are brought together. These boys invite other young men to sit in on the center's discussion group, which usually meets weekly. One of them takes on the role of managing the schedule of meetings. The faculty mentor meets individually with members of the cohort, but the group itself provides its own essential leadership. That is crucial.

In the second phase of establishing a men's center, the mentor works with the school's development and alumni relations offices to identify alumni/ae who would likely be in a position to fund the center for a two-year start-up period. The center is named after the benefactor. There will always be alumni with a son of college age or younger who are concerned about the deteriorating situation for men on college campuses: lack of a vital and engaging academic and co-curricular life, often a feeling of being unwelcome on campus. A target amount for a two-year period is $4,000 per academic year for a core group of 10-12.

Featuring the initiative in the institution's alumni/ae quarterly bulletin is effective in reaching out for further support. Coverage by the local newspaper brings attention to the college and to the situation college males now face. The biggest surprise is that most people are simply not aware of the situation as it is.

Let this be a call to readers to take part in helping establish a men's center on the college campus where you once studied or have a son in residence. The tide is rolling in for boys and men, and that means we are finally beginning to learn, not more about what males have done, but about their experience. Contrary to the standard view, this is unknown territory.

If you have not been in contact with your alma mater for a while, call or write to the officers in alumni relations and tell them that you would like to support a men's center on campus on the Wagner model. If you know a faculty member there who once made a difference in your life, contact him and invite him to be a mentor. Ask about the ratio of males to female now enrolled there.

If you have a son or grandson at college, ask him about his life there. He will have stories to tell about feelings of disengagement, even alienation from campus life. He may be among the few males on campus who are still engaged, but most of his friends are not. Ask him to identify a faculty member who is willing to work to establish a men's center. He will know such a person. These teachers stand out as being male-positive in their classes and on campus.

If you are on the faculty or staff at a college or university, bring this idea to your colleagues' attention. Many have been wading in the slack water, knowing what it coming to pass and waiting for news of others' interest in how boys and men are faring. In every case, it will be a challenging and rewarding experience. A lot is at stake here.

Next in this series, a description of the activities of a college men's center.

Shameless

Anonymous Contributor · 10 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The author of this piece hosts Ideologue Review, a blog devoted to the case study of fanaticism. He wishes to remain anonymous.

Article: "You will not shame me."

Review:

This article is classic Feministing, published April 12, 2007. It covers the ideologue reception to the aftermath of the Duke Lacrosse verdict, and is a good insight into typical fanatic behavior. The author, an "activist, writer, and Executive Editor of Feministing.com" who identifies herself as "Samhita," implies from the title that she is wounded and confrontational. How dare the justice industry not put these innocent men – erm, boys – in jail! Do they know how bad that makes me – I mean, women – look?

Let's begin with the title – "You will not shame me." One would think that after her articles complaining about the solidarity shown by female Duke students equating to 'complicit oppression,' she would be ashamed. Had she had an ounce of foremost knowledge that the stripper, Gail Magnum, had made numerous false accusations in the past or not outright omitted this information from her articles, perhaps she would not be in this embarrassing situation to begin with.

Moving on to the first paragraph, which reads:

"I have gotten email upon threatening email to rescind what I said last year about the Duke Women's Lacrosse Team and their uninformed support for the accused rapists in the Duke rape case. The case that was mishandled, manipulated and finally dropped on Wednesday."

*"I usually ignore emails that intend to put me in my place but I think we owe it to our supportive readers to say something outside of "black strippers are lying whores" and the "we won" mentality that seems to have overtaken the public imagination with the dreaded interplay of rape and race."*

I never saw any claims equating Black women or strippers to liars. In fact, the only people I saw who fixated obsessively on the ethnicity of the accuser were the self-righteous ideologues. I never heard on any talk show, nor saw in any paper, that her race somehow made her testimony any less reliable. In fact, the media, academic, and justice industryofficials harped on this clear-cut case of a poor victimized black woman and these evil, 'privileged' white men. Once again, I challenge one of my readers to find an article from a mainstream source which actually claims her race negatively affected her reliability. Hell, even a two-bit tabloid wouldn't touch that with a ten-foot pole.

She goes on to claim papal infallibility for her past bigotry:

I just want to say first and foremost, I still stand by what I say and have said. It does look bad for people to support accused rapists, at that point we didn't know the facts either way.

It looks bad for people to support the accusers before a case is even made, actually. In fact, I presume the notion of 'innocent until proven guilty' has never rung well with her beliefs.

She goes on to point her digits at everyone and everything except herself, because she would be the last person to warrant scrutiny.
Furthermore, women of color are in fact OFTEN sexually assaulted and usually the criminal justice system and/or the media either overlook it or mishandle it. Women of color often have a higher burden of proof that they are not lying about rape.

Really? I never knew there was a burden in 'proving you're not lying about rape.' There is that pesky 'innocent until proven guilty' notion that ideologues are trying to do away with – and with some success, the system is rigged against men from the beginning.

Paul Elam of A Voice for Men states:

"A longitudinal study conducted by Professor Eugene Kanin concluded that over a period of nine years, 41% of rape allegations studied were fraudulent, concocted by the alleged victim to either create an alibi, seek attention and sympathy, or to seek revenge."

He goes on to link to numerous studies and police estimates which point to similar percentiles – about 40-50% are confirmed innocent.

Case in point (as Amanda and others stated): when the lack of DNA evidence was announced — before we even knew whether the players were innocent or not — people were quite quick to accuse the accuser of being guilty of lying. So be it.

So DNA evidence is now suspect? And this was because of her race, not her past history of false allegations? Or perhaps the fact that there were about 40 people there who all, conveniently enough, had the exact same alibi?

So, to make a long story short:

The charges were dropped. Does this mean that they are innocent? None of us actually know what happened that night. Sorry, unless you were there, you don't know what happened.

But you weren't there! It might have happened! The earth is flat! The moon is cheese! People never lie!

Typical fanatic attitude – all snark and no logic. "I'm right, end of conversation." That's the attitude you expect from a small child, not a grown woman.

This is a clear intellectual black hole. It's the same argument nutcase creationists argue on the other end of the spectrum. "You weren't there, so it's not your place to say how the Earth was created." It's a precept of rational thought to accept the most logical conclusion, and a sign of some semblance of emotional and intellectual maturity.

Now for the rest of you that have such a die hard belief in the criminal justice system and evidence, well quite frankly I pity you. This is a system that arrests a disproportionate number of people of color, subjecting them to unfair trials, inadequate representation and longer sentences (in a prison system that resembles slavery). SORRY, I don't trust the courts.

What do what all those people arrested have in common? Nearly all of them are men. I don't trust the courts either, but I think she just invalidated her case. It's anti-minority, but it's by far more anti-male. Additionally, it's not necessarily the courts which directly cause this, but the legacy of slavery, oppression, and a lack of economic (and by proxy, educational) opportunities for minorities.

This breeds the social conditions which cause increased crime, and increased arrests of men. To just point a finger at one part of a very complex machination and say it's the sole cause – and deliberately omit the anti-male bias of societal and court systems alike – is either a sign of severe mental ineptitude or a malicious desire to misinform. Either way, it does not speak well for her cause
But hey, let's just give a big "Feminist Fuck You" to all the factual evidence against the felon and fixate on race and money.

*When you're a woman of color who's a sexworker, up against white kids with money that can afford good lawyers, the outcome is not looking so good.*

She left out the part where the District Attorney did a few things like omit evidence, lie, etc. Small things which imply a bias against these men, and not our innocent, angelic sex worker with her golden ovaries.

But, but, but – the charges, they were dropped! Uh, that makes me right!

'They were not found to be innocent, the charges were dropped from lack of evidence.'

By that logic, I could accuse the author of raping me, drop the charges before they hit the courts, and claim that she'll "never be found to be innocent." I won't because I don't have a narcissistic need for attention and callous disregard for human life like some people, but I could.

'Oh, but these white men are getting treated poorly, but so do other people! That somehow means they deserve it!'

Moreover, innocent until proven guilty only applies to certain people. Ideally, it would apply to everyone but a lot of people are guilty at arrest, just for being who they are and where they are. We are not operating in a vacuum, but within a long history of corruption and injustice in the supposed justice system. So, if these guys were in fact falsely accused, they got a taste of how black men are treated EVERY DAY by the criminal justice system.

And what is the outcome of all of this? The general public now believes that black strippers ARE in fact lying whores and the worst thing that could happen to a strapping Duke lacrosse player is that his lily white reputation is marred by false accusations. Beyond this being a terrible precedent set for women that bring up rape accusations (still something underreported) to never ever report rape again, the racist and sexist reaction from the media and public have been to say the least profound.

So you're somehow trying to shift the blame to the victims for having the gall to be falsely accused of rape. "Their 'lily-white reputation' being marred" is actually something a lot of men have to deal with. Additionally, I'm surprised she can't find one article or link to support this 'racist and sexist' reaction from the media. As I mentioned earlier, the odds were stacked in this sex worker's favor, and she still lost the case. Not only that, but she was conferred a degree in police psychology.

Oh, but look at these emails I claim I got. I won't include any excerpts or anything, but I got them and after proving myself irrational and unreliable, I'll just paraphrase them:

I have gotten emails reminding me about not only the details of this case (because you know I can't read), but how the possibility that this black woman lied shows us that blacks, in general, are liars who play the race card. And strippers are also liars who deserve to be raped.

I wouldn't be surprised if she was semi-literate. As for the facts of the case – well, if she knew them all, why would she side with a convicted felon to begin with?

However, how relevant are things like 'innocent,' 'guilty,' 'liar,' 'wrong?' It's all relative as long as I'm still right.

Why do I say all this? Because the details of the ACTUAL case are only tangentially relevant here.

Indeed, many facts are only tangentially relevant to a bigot.

Oh, and it's totally her race – and my race fetish – that makes people question the stripper's reliability. I'll just slather that claim on all my opponents and ignore any of those pesky, irritating 'facts about the case.'

What is relevant is that certain folks are very quick to jump on the offensive when there is a little bit of evidence that perhaps a black woman lied about a rape.

No, not a little bit. This would be like setting Mike Tyson against Ghandi in the ring, and then giving Tyson an assault rifle to 'even up the odds.' It was an unfair fight which people like her had decided from the beginning, and these innocent men still were able to walk with only their 'lily-white' reputations sullied.

But look – somehow this other injustice, this other injustice waaaay over here, makes this injustice, look how far away it is, it makes this injustice alright! It's okay now that I supported the incarceration of these innocent men because they're WHITE!

You know because people NEVER accuse (random) black people of crimes that they did not commit. I mean, seriously.

That would be black men. Samhita and her 'sisters' at Feministing.com have been quiet as church-mice about the issues facing black men in comparison to the deafening roar for black women and cataclysmic quaking for (Western) middle-class women, despite the fact that black males are incarcerated at an exponentially higher rate than women of any race.

Now, I'm going to ascribe some meaning to this tragedy and take the moral high road after, you know, maliciously fetishizing the destruction of these innocent mens' lives. Yes, because of my ideology, I am God.

So what is the moral of the story? That much of the American public does in fact hold very racist and sexist beliefs and when given the opportunity to air these sentiments, goes ahead full force.

Clearly, as the author has shown immense bigotry against white males. If this were written with Jews substituted for white men, it could be in a Klan pamphlet.

Look, I hallucinated that this stripper had an ounce of credibility to begin with! And she might have been right, so those Duke students deserved it anyway. A few sacrificial lambs to our insane religion.

It is this same culture of racism and objectification of people of color in most sectors of our society that would create a situation where a black woman would potentially lie about a rape (which we don't know if she did). And the same culture that would allow for the subsequent manipulation of her story for political gain.

So predictable.

No, I'd have to say the moral of this story is that ideologues are incapable of accepting defeat, no matter how wrong they are.
The title is the one appropriate aspect of this article, however. You can't shame that which is clearly shameless.

Putting Faces on Victims – Stories of child abuse and domestic violence: When the political becomes personal

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 11 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For 13 years I worked as a case manager and investigator handling child abuse cases for one of the largest child welfare agencies in the U.S.. During that time I saw the results of some of the most horrific violence and abuse imaginable.

I saw the striped scars from shoulder to heal on the back and legs of a 9 year old boy who had been beaten by his mother with an extension cord on multiple occasions. I listened to his mother after she had undergone parent training and counseling tell me in no uncertain terms that if he needed it, she would do it again. I sat with my jaw dropped in horror as I hung up the phone after learning that the judge in the case had sent the boy home to live with her against my recommendations. I often wonder what became of him.

I saw the bruising around the lips of a 10 year old girl. It had been caused by her own tongue as she incessantly licked them, unable to stop due to emotional problems after suffering physical and sexual abuse from her father and grandmother who also made her, her older brothers, and younger sister compete with the dog for food by throwing leftovers onto the back porch. The children weren't permitted in the house. They were kept in the garage and given a 5-gallon plastic bucket to use for a toilet.

I saw the tears on the face of a 12 year old boy who had been cowering in the corner, curled into a little ball crying from the fear that his new social worker would be a woman and the tentative smile on his face when he saw that I was a man. The boy wouldn't speak. His father told me that he had requested the case be re-assigned to a male because his son was afraid of women after having been molested by his mother and her girlfriend who had also forced him to have sex with his younger sister and had videotaped everything. The sister was institutionalized.

I sat and listened while a 6 year old girl told me she hated her father for what he had done to her, all the while calling him horrible names. Then, when asked about what her father had done, she described playing with him in the park, being taken to Disneyland , and going to movies. When asked whether he had ever hurt her, she said "no." She eventually said that she hated him because her mother had told her to hate him. Her mother wasn't nearly as shy about it. In between a string of expletives that would have made any sailor proud, I gathered that this guy was a cross between Ed Gein, Jeffery Dahmer, and Charles Manson.

I can go on. I can tell you about the couple whose 5 children were up for adoption because they wouldn't stop fighting each other. I can tell you that the children's father showed me two scars, one on his back, the other on his thigh, both the result of being stabbed by his wife. The two of them joked about it as though it were no big deal. He deserved it. He provoked it. He would flirt with other women until she would beat him senseless.

He did it because the makeup sex was incredible. Meanwhile, it cost them their children who they claimed to love more than anything.

I can tell you about the two little girls who witnessed their mother shoot their father as he slept, once in the groin and once in the head. It was shortly after the Lorena Bobbitt case and she claimed that the father had been sexually abusing the children. There was no evidence of it. The girls denied it. There were no reports to law enforcement or children's services. She couldn't even produce a single witness to testify that she had told anyone prior to killing the man. At her trial, she plead guilty to some lesser charge and got off with time served, a year in the county jail.

And the mother who shot and killed her husband while her daughters looked on? Her case was back in the system several years later.This time she had been sentenced to 25 years to life for the murder of her mother over money and having her new husband dispose of the body. He's serving 12-25 while the two girls and a new half-brother are in foster care.

What does each of these cases have in common aside from being some of the most horrific cases I had to deal with during my years of service?

In two words: domestic violence.

Domestic violence is frequently categorized as man beating woman. Only men commit this atrocity, only women are its victims. If women are violent, it must be because she is defending herself or her children. That's what many in the industry will tell you. What I will tell you is that not one of these cases was like that. I handled some that were, but most were not. In most cases that I handled that involved DV, the DV was mutual. In some it was the woman abusing the man.

In the first case of the boy beaten with the extension cord the boy's father was in jail, having been convicted of hitting the mother. I read the police report. I read the court testimony. I might as well have been reading an Orwellian novel. The mother was beating the boy, again. She was high on methamphetamines. The father intervened to try and stop it. She then hit him, with the cord. He finally punched, knocking her out. He called the police who then arrested him, not her.

The boy was striped from head to tow and removed from her care. She was never charged.

The case of the girl with the bruised lips is the worst case I have ever seen. The two parents had eight children. The first four grew to adulthood before they had the second four. They had abused all eight. According to one of the adult daughters, her mother would beat them and their father. The sexual abuse happened on nights when their mother would kick their father out of the bedroom, usually after being quite violent.

The girls would try to take care of him, often having to stop some bleeding. To quote her "Things would get romantic after that." The father once told me that he had been molested by his own mother beginning at the age of twelve. In fact, he fathered his own sister at the age of fifteen.

In the case of the boy who was afraid of women, he was in his father's custody at the time I received the case as a result of the sexual abuse. But prior to that, custody had been awarded to his mother in the divorce. In family court the parents had each accused the other of DV, the judge chose to believe her in spite of the child's testimony that it was his mother who was violent. The father was awarded monitored visitation to take place at his expense in a therapist's office. He wasn't permitted to even ask about the mother's treatment of the children.

The girl who hated her father hated him so badly that during one of my visits to his home while she was present, she curled up in his lap and went to sleep. Her mother was the violent one. She used to throw things at the father and destroy his property, once having intentionally burned his stamp collection worth several thousand dollars. All of which was verified by the girl before she went to sleep and away from the presence of either parent. Although she did, I didn't need the girl to tell me this. Her actions spoke much louder than her words. When I interviewed her at her mother's house, she refused to allow her mother to hold her and, during my interview when we were supposed to be alone, she kept checking to make sure her mother couldn't hear what she was telling me.

Each and every one of the abusive parents in these cases had been abused as a child, whether it was physical, sexual, emotional, or neglect. This isn't to say that all abuse victims grow up to become abusers. In fact, research suggests that it's only a small percentage. But it is to say that a high percentage of abusers have been victims of abuse themselves.

This includes both domestic violence and child abuse. It also demonstrates that women can be just as abusive as men and points to flaws in our current system that neglect this fact, allowing and even perpetuating this "other abuse" that is said not to exist. We will not end (or even begin to address) the problems of domestic violence and child abuse until we learn to recognize that these are not gender specific problems and we address all perpetrators and treat all victims regardless of whether they are male or female.

Challenging the Etiology of Rape

AVFM · 14 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: we find it fascinating that this article, written in 2010, is still frequently cited by the Mainstream Media and critics of the Men's Human Rights Movement as "typical" of the views of the movement and/or this web site. The truth is, this was written in the very early days of A Voice for Men to be deliberately provocative, to get attention and challenge people to think. It was, to use a phrase feminist Camille Paglia once used, a "necessary savaging" of a once-taboo subject.

Today the culture at large is beginning to acknowledge that both men and women can and do engage in abusive behavior that can provoke violent, dangerous reactions in psychotic and irresponsible individuals, and now that the culture is beginning to recognize that men are at least as likely to be victims of sexual assault as women, and women far more likely to be perpetrators of sexual assault than we'd like to think, a more mature dialogue seems to be developing on the non-gendered nature of rape and sexual assault and abuse. Many such articles on that have appeared on AVfM in subsequent years, so it seems strange that this old article is still repeatedly gone back to by critics. Why, out of the countless thousands written on this site, pick this one and hold it up as "typical" when it is simply not?

From our point of view, we think its intentionally provocative style no longer serves its intended purpose and it's being obsessed over by people who want to avoid thinking hard about complex issues. We think it mostly tends to be quoted out of context by dishonest ideologues as "typical" rather than the unusually provocative article that it was.

Therefore, with reluctance, we are removing it from our archives. –Editors

A Powerhouse of Lies in New Zealand

Paul Elam · 16 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Doubtful Sound in New Zealand is one of those places you should see before you die. The scenery is enough to eclipse any of my paltry attempts to describe it, but I can try to tell you what I saw; scattered, small emerald peaks rising out of placid, reflecting water the color of tea. Still larger rocky summits, capped in rugged ice, reaching up to meet a sky of blue-gray steel. They stood like ancient sentinels in a timeless place.

Getting there is a day long event, no matter where you start. It involves a boat ride across the impressive expanse of Lake Manapouri, then boarding a tour bus for an hour long 22 kilometer drive across the Wilmot Pass on a gravel road, ultimately rolling down a long, winding, dizzying grade to the waters edge.

It is like a trip backward through geologic history, and would seem to be the most unlikely place on earth to stumble on an example of sexual politics gone awry, but that is precisely what happened.

The tour bus I was on took a slight detour en route to the boat waiting for us on the sound. The driver/tour guide spoke in a friendly, informative manner as he steered the bus into a 2 kilometer long tunnel that had been blasted and scraped directly through the solid granite of the Fiordland mountains.

At the end of that tunnel we filed off the bus to take a short tour of the Manapouri Power Station. It would initially seem to be a yawner of a side trip, but I was quickly educated otherwise. The Manapouri Power Station is an engineering and technological marvel, arguably one of the greatest collective accomplishments in New Zealand history.

It operates by channeling lake water past turbines buried deep in the mountainside and then sending it down the 10 kilometer long tailrace tunnel, excavated from the same, almost impervious granite. It shot down to the sound below and out to the Tasman Sea.

And when I learned a little more of the history of the project, it got even more interesting.

Especially the way I learned about it.

I was informed by the power station tour guide, not my driver/guide but a power station employee, that it took sixteen hundred “workers” two years to excavate that tunnel. And that in the process, 16 “workers” were killed.

It was a spiel I was used to. When men die on the job, they are not men. They are “workers.” Sometimes they’re “firefighters,” “soldiers,” and other professional labels designed to distract us from the idea that they are human beings. Sometimes, they are even reduced to something as generic as “personnel.”

Anything but men.

And of course I listened to this with the certainty that if by any chance any of those “workers” happened to be female, I would have heard the now obligatory woman inclusion. The tour guide would have to work from an amended script, telling us that 16 “workers” died, including one woman. Or something like that.

And that is par for the course. A regular reminder that men die on the job in anonymity while women pass in the limelight, showered in accolades for posterity. It is something I don’t take to heart so much any more. I knew who built that power station; who conceived it, planned it, sweated and bled for it, even if the world obscures their identity with generic labels.

Hell, I didn’t even mind that the tour guide, the power station employee with the gender neutral script, was, in fact, a woman. Along with the rest of the world, I suppose that I’ve grown accustomed to seeing them move into good paying jobs after the dying is done.

Doesn’t mean a thing anymore. Just more postmodern bullshit in a world where 93% of all workplace deaths are still men.

But what got to me, what made my skin crawl and turn crimson was on the wall behind me; a backlit testimonial hanging on the wall above the row of exciters in the machine hall, informing us that when the men who dug that place out weren't working, or dying, they were drinking themselves into oblivion and engaging with women of ill repute. Carousers to the last man, they were. It's a wonder they got anything done.

There I was, standing above the plant's machine hall, which was housed in a space carved out of a million metric tons of solid rock, listening to a female plant employee in a pink hard hat tell me about the "workers" who died building her place of employment; all while the wall behind me cast the men who did it like a bunch of drunks and derelicts.

I wanted to scream.

They said that somewhere in the plant was a plaque that bore the names of all the "workers" that died there, but that it was not in an area for public viewing.

Small wonder.

But I did, by chance, (and I mean literally by chance) stumble on a plaque outside the plant, at the very summit that led down to the sound after we left the power station. We stopped for the chance to take a photo from the top. At that time I noticed a small cutaway into the side of the mountain. It was dark and the sides of it were overgrown with local fauna.

The tour guide didn't say a word about it. I don't think he even knew it was there. I just happened to go in and look while others were snapping pics of the sound from above.

I read the words and the end several times. I tried to imagine that kind of sentiment, "He loved his fellow men," fitting with the mindless, alcoholic thugs they tried to tell me built that place.

And I wondered how many other "workers" who perished were such men as Terrence M.J. Smith. Men who loved, and who were loved and needed by others. Men who were cut short, first from their life blood in the name of a greater good, and then from their legacy, in the name of a great and ignoble lie.

International Men's Day 2010

PRESS RELEASE

INTERNATIONAL MEN'S DAY – 2010

All India Men's Welfare Association (AIMWA)

International Men's Day (IMD) is celebrated on 19th November the world over.

This year, on the occasion of IMD, AIMWA is felicitating three positive male role models namely, Dr. Viswanath Gogte, Sri. A.V. Gurunadh and Sri. Gangadhara Sastry for their extraordinary contributions to academic, civic and spiritual education, respectively.

Why celebrate Men's Day?

In the recent years, it has become common practice to neglect, ill-treat and demean men in the society. Male bashing (both physical and verbal) and portrayal of men as villains, idiots and inferior creatures is seen as an innocuous way of increasing profits of media houses and other businesses. Discrimination of men under law and violation of their human rights have become synonymous with empowering and protecting women.

Undermining the positive contributions of majority of men and exaggerating the misdeeds of a few has serious impact on the psyche of men and the self-image of young men and boys. Discrimination against men in areas of social services, social attitudes, social expectations and law is very demoralizing to the common men who lead decent, honest lives.

International men's day is about celebrating and honoring men in our lives for all the contributions, services and sacrifices they make for the well-being of the family and society. It is an opportunity to revive respect towards men and improve gender relations. It is an occasion to promote positive male role models, to reinforce the self-esteem and pride of young men and boys about being male. It is a day to remind everyone of the fact that men are human too and that they desire and deserve love, care and respect just as much as women do.

In an attempt to shed light on the various issues affecting men, All India Men's Welfare Association (AIMWA) is organizing a conference where experts in various fields will share their observations and recommendations.

* Physical Health of men – Dr. Sudhir, BHMS, Kakinada

The National Family Health Survey does not consider men's health important – enormous focus on women and children, and the mention of men only in relation to how they should contribute to the health and welfare of women and children, clearly indicates the apathy of the Government towards men's health. No funds are allocated to conduct research on or develop remedies for diseases specific to men such as prostate or testicular cancers. Since men define their lives largely by their professions and protecting and providing for their families, they tend to ignore illnesses, lead less healthy lifestyles than women, miss getting medical attention in time, and as other stresses in life increase, the diseases catch up with them. Men are more likely to die from heart disease, prostate cancer, stroke, infectious diseases, accidents and suicide. Males have a higher overall mortality rate than females at all ages (roughly 1.6 times greater). It is necessary to understand the genetic, environmental or age related illnesses which can affect men, and provide them with insurance to get the right kind of medical attention at the appropriate time.

* Men as protectors – Sri. A.B. Pratap Reddy, A.P. Police Department, Hyderabad

Men as individuals and as a group are expected to protect not just their own respective families, but also, all women and children in the society. Right from the age of 7, a boy is trained to be an "unpaid bodyguard" to girls and women. Accordingly, anytime a girl or woman is in distress, one always sees men rushing to her rescue. The fire department, police, armed forces and all other security forces are filled with men. Even in forces where women are recruited, combat and other risky operations are considered the exclusive job of men. The country pays tributes once a year to all the fallen heroes who sacrificed their lives for the country. We also need to remember that the so-called protector too needs certain kinds of protection and support in order to perform his job efficiently on a daily basis. Government should pay close attention to improving working conditions, salaries, housing and professional development opportunities for men in uniform.

* Men as providers – Sri. Manoj David, President, National Litigant Bench, Chennai

Men and boys are always expected to be and conditioned to become protectors and providers. Even though more women are entering the job market and defying their traditional roles within the family and the society, resulting in reduced employment opportunities for men, the society refuses to free men of their traditional duties of protecting and providing for women, children and the aged. Men who cannot provide for the family are considered incapable, unmanly and unfit for marriage and having children. So, men often undertake some of the most risky and challenging jobs in the society and put their lives at stake just to be a provider. Financial hardships drive thousands of farmers, artisans and providers of crucial services to commit suicide. Treating men as ATMs and expendable commodities is nothing but abuse of their human rights, which must be opposed by individuals, society and Government.

* Emotional Health of men – Dr. Praveen Chinta, MBBS, DPM, MRCP, Hyderabad

Boys are discouraged from expressing their pain and feelings from the age of 7-8 yrs. This leads to fear of self-expression and even numbness to abuse for the rest of their lives. Men find emotional confrontations extremely painful when they grow up as they are no longer good at articulating their emotions. A lot of men take refuge in addictions like smoking or drinking to combat stress. Most men enduring emotional turmoil in marriage contemplate suicide and a substantial percentage of them (around 56,000 a year) actually commit suicide. Twice as many married men, compared to married women, commit suicide every year. Scientific research is necessary to understand the emotional health issues of men, especially the Indian male. There is a need for psychiatrists and psychologists to specifically focus on issues pertaining to men.

* Men in old age – Smt. Kamakshi, Secy. Senior Citizens Forum, Hyderabad

While men in the “productive” age bracket are subject to the pressures of professional competition, family issues and financial problems, one expects that they would be relatively stress-free during their post-retirement years. However, due to the breakdown of the joint family system, and the advent of nuclear family and individualistic culture, more and more aged men are suffering from anxiety, loneliness, financial hardships and despair. Many aged men also suffer neglect and abuse in their homes, but they appear to be better adjusted than women in similar situations, because men in general are not expressive about their emotions. Overemphasis on professional and family responsibilities at the expense of their own health, and the ensuing stress could be the reasons why life expectancy of men is much lesser than that of women. As the physical and emotional health of aged men depends, to a large extent, on their lifestyles during their younger years, men need to maintain a healthy lifestyle so that they are more resilient and capable of coping with the challenges posed by age and age-related diseases and disabilities.

* Men and anti-male laws – Smt. Rama Subhadra, Mahila Satta Legal Cell, Hyderabad

Many laws have been made in the last 60 years in the name of protecting women within and outside the home. These so-called pro-women laws such as IPC Section 498A, Domestic Violence Act, adultery laws, laws against rape and sexual harassment and family laws (divorce, maintenance and child custody) aggravate problems rather than mitigate them. These discriminatory laws are anti-male and anti-family, and serve as weapons that promote family destruction and large scale human rights abuses against men, women and children. They are tools of blackmail and extortion in the hands of unscrupulous women, law enforcement personnel, lawyers and judiciary. There is an urgent need to eliminate discrimination against men under law, make all civil and criminal laws equally applicable to men and women, and also to ensure that strict penalties are imposed on those who misuse the laws.

* Respecting male sexuality – Smt. Uma Challa, President, All India Men's Welfare Association, Hyderabad

Sexual arousal is easily discernible in men, whereas it is not obvious in women. As a result, men constantly face the allegation of being obsessed with sex. It is also believed that men always indulge in sex voluntarily, whereas women are thought to take part in sex either to fulfill the sexual or emotional needs of men or because they are forced to do so by men against their will. Male sexuality is often attacked to break a man down emotionally. Sexual exploitation and rape of men/boys by women is not acknowledged as an offense, and in fact it is considered as a non-existent problem. Today, male sexuality is ridiculed, insulted, misunderstood, undermined, disregarded, criminalized and everything but respected. Proper awareness on male sexuality is very important for both men and women. Provisions and laws for protection against sexual assault and abuse are as necessary for men as they are for women.

Wielding the Ban Hammer

It has been an interesting week to say the least. I have been enjoying the spectacular scenery and people of New Zealand, and have been donning the flak jacket here at AVfM much more than usual.

It's all good.

But I do think I may be in for another round. I have decided to ban Peter from posting here. I actually hate to do it. I feel sorry for Peter (which he has never asked for) but the nature of his posts are just too distracting, questionable and often just plain bizarre to allow this to continue. The pic he posted in Merrick's last piece was too much, and prompted complaints from readers whom I know have no interest in excessive censorship.

So if anyone wants to take a shot at me, or walk because you think I am being too heavy handed, feel free. I won't even respond to defend myself.

Either way, I don't want readers grossed out by sick comments and pictures every time they log on.

Let Us Awake Now

B.R. Merrick · 18 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

On May 30, 1962, a modern musical masterpiece premiered in England 's newest cathedral, built next to the remains of the cathedral that was destroyed when the Nazis bombed Coventry . Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem" combines two choirs, two orchestras, three vocal soloists, and the Latin religious funeral text with English poetry. In the final section, the words "Let us sleep now" are slurred over and around the Latin "In paradisum," in a swirling wash of diatonic sonority, as more staves are added while instrumental and vocal groups softly divide and subdivide, each in its own direction. For anyone unfamiliar with reading an orchestral score, this is virtually impossible to follow. It does not matter. There is no longer anyone for the conductor to cue, nor is one musical line more important than the other. Dozens of meandering phrases are sung and played with essentially the same seven notes, as melody and harmony, English and Latin, become static. The listener may not be aware, but as in every other part of this astounding work, Britten is saying something powerful and direct. Having been schooled in every aspect of the Western musical tradition, as well as being an ardent pacifist, Britten knew exactly what this sort of music would express: Where there is no harmonic motion, musical direction, nor any definitive thematic statement, there can be no resolution. The music may safely remain in a particular key, but having never left the tonic to venture into any related or secondary harmonies, there is no way of telling for certain where the starting point is, nor where the ending point should be. If you think that the "pastoral" finale of this mass for the war dead refers to some sort of serenity after the tumult that went before, you'd be wrong. In so many ways, you'd be dead wrong. This is no peaceful slumber.

According to an article this past [2009] Memorial Day in The Washington Post, the names of military men who commit suicide as a result of the trauma with which they suffer are not being listed on newly-constructed memorials to the ongoing War on Certain Kinds of Terror. The surviving families are quite understandably upset. There is another aspect of this story that is telling:

"Mary Clare Lindberg's son, Army Sgt. Benjamin Jon Miller, was home in Minnesota on leave [emphasis mine] from Iraq in June when he shot and killed himself…

"Connie Scott, whose son, Pvt. 1st Class Brian M. Williams, also killed himself while home on leave from Iraq… took his life by carbon monoxide poisoning the day before he was to return to Iraq [emphasis mine]…"

These men would rather die than continue fighting for the "liberation" of the Middle East . Could the threat of redeployment conceivably be a contributing factor? What's so horrible about returning to a disintegrated country filled with men that want you dead? Unfortunately, once a suicidal man has succeeded, he can't tell you the reasons why he did it, although it seems pretty obvious to me. According to this article (among other sources I have read in the last several months), military suicides are increasing.

I empathize with parents who have lost military children to this war. I cannot comprehend the grief. It is understandable that seeing a son's name on a plaque would offer some comfort to the living. I, too, am disgusted with the military's inability to acknowledge, even in this trifling fashion, the horrific sacrifice its warmongering has brought about. But in the end, these suicides speak of the greater evil of war itself, of the lies of numerous presidential administrations and the Beast they serve, and of the agonizing truth that names on a memorial do not even begin to compensate for what has been lost when a single man is killed, moreover when that man kills himself.

Each of these suicides takes from this world a wealth of experience that could have and should have been shared for decades to come. These men are trying, out of fear and incomprehensible suffering, to escape their own worldview, one that is custom-tailored to each man alone. No matter how much homogenization they underwent through nationalized, regulated, corporate/popular culture, sustained by an insidious government schooling system and a complacent media establishment, they can never be denied their separateness from one another. Each of these men dies a unique individual. I firmly believe that such uniqueness continues after this life. In what way, I have no idea. But if it all does indeed end at death, then the deliberate taking of a single life is doubly terrible, even incalculable. Worst of all, it is obvious, given the circumstances surrounding the suicides happening in the military, that these men who take their own lives are dying while still mired in oppression of mind and spirit. They are crying out, "Let us sleep now." I can guarantee that not a single man who takes his own life in this manner ever knows what freedom really is, nor do any of them know how to be free.

You cannot be free by obeying the rules. You cannot be free by waiting for someone to rescue you. You cannot be free simply by hoping for a brighter day tomorrow. Freedom comes from within. It does not come from without. It does not come from a charismatic leader. It does not come with a set of instructions. It does not come from being raised with doses of discipline and dogma. It does not come from being given your freedom only after you prove yourself to your parents, teachers, pastors, or other authority figures. It does not come from any God who demands obedience before He promises blessings (or threatens curses). It does not come from delineated rights. It does not come from The Constitution. It is you from whom freedom springs. It is you in whom freedom thrives. No one gave it to you. Like Dorothy and her ruby slippers, your way home was with you all the time. You just didn't realize it. Do you understand? You are freedom. Contrary to that tiresome cliché, freedom is free.

You are free when you join the military. You are free if and/or when you are drafted. You are free when they put a gun in your hand and bark an order. You are free to say, "No." Even when you are certain that you aren't, you are free to deal with it internally any way that you wish. If you are falsely imprisoned for rightfully resisting, you are still free. As the example of Viktor Frankl shows us, freedom can exist even within a death camp.

There is an incomparable German film that came out a few years ago, about freedom. I've mentioned it before, and I believe that I first heard about it from this website. In "The Lives of Others," there are three characters that exhibit the consequences of knowing or not knowing this essential truth. (WARNING: If you haven't seen it, the following paragraph contains spoilers.)

The film centers on a playwright who is enlisted by dissidents to surreptitiously write a report on East Germany 's disproportionately high suicide rate, an exposé that will hopefully be broadcast on television before the government can prevent it. The playwright agrees to the plan, knowing that he is free in his heart, but not knowing that his apartment has been bugged by the Stasi (the East German secret police). His girlfriend, who supports him but does not know this freedom, relents when pressured by the government, and confesses all she knows about the plot. Lastly, the main character of the film, a member of the Stasi, undergoes a remarkable and very moving transformation, having discovered this freedom for his self, and joins in the quest without the knowledge of any of the other people involved. He and the playwright are able to move on after events unfold in the Soviet bloc of the 1980s (in perhaps the most satisfying dénouement in cinematic history). The playwright's girlfriend, however, gives in to the despair brought about by oppression, suffered in the absence, and ignorance, of freedom.

The men in this Memorial Day article, like the fictitious playwright's girlfriend, died without knowing this freedom. For them, it is too late to send the message out. Those of us who know freedom from the inside have a tremendous responsibility to tell everyone who is still living. I do so here.

If you are reading this and you are in the military, I say to you now: Suicide will not make you free, nor will it release you from the pain. If suicide was freedom or a workable way around "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," then we are all fools for making the effort to live. I cannot and will not condemn anyone who takes this rash action. But it has to stop. You must not do this thing. You must not kill. You must turn from violence. You are not here to be obedient. You are not here to have someone else take charge of your education. You are not here to simply be entertained. You will not find solace in lobbying the government, or in taking part in Leviathan's evil to any extent. I can't tell you to give up your commission outright, but from within the cage compelled upon you, you should be able to see through the bars and think for yourself. Plan out what you can do. Open up to others (if only online) to help you with your freedom plan. You can find your own way to quietly, peacefully walk away from the table government has set. This is a far better choice than running from the problems of your life, whether self-inflicted or not. It's a hell-of-a-lot better than killing yourself.

If you are actually contemplating suicide, this article, written by a confirmed doofus, will certainly not help much. My effort is meant to help you go elsewhere to the get the help you really need. If you would like an online resource to start with, I highly recommend you try Alice Miller's website. I know virtually nothing about post-traumatic stress disorder, but I do know something about confronting childhood pain and oppression, and if you grew up in the society I did, you had plenty of it. Unknowingly, your parents engaged in a form of abuse if they sent you to government schools to be educated. Indeed, if they sent you to any school at all against your will, they did you a disservice. The learning process for children is a natural one, and ought not to be tampered with. That is where your intimate knowledge of oppression began. I can assure you of that much.

Your parents most likely raised you to be obedient, with subtle or blatant threats, emotional manipulation, or actual violence if you did not comply. Much of what happened to you probably did not feel like abuse, because it is widespread. When all parents treat their children with such contempt, it appears normal. Worst of all, if you're a military man, then you're probably much more of a he-man than I am. Listening to a professional weakling like me tell you that bad parenting is to blame for suicidal thoughts that are directly linked to unspeakable wartime memories, is probably a bit of a stretch for you. That's understandable. A bomb is far louder and more physically dangerous than a screaming parent.

You must understand, however, that your decision to join the military did not come to you out of thin air, nor does it come from a good place. It comes from years of being lied to by government, government schools, military recruiters, and heavily-regulated "private" media outlets. This war is a lie from the start. There will be more lies, and more wars, to come.

An education in freedom will take time. When I first started, I scoffed at some of the ideas with which I was confronted. I eventually embraced them all. You will follow a logical path that will eventually lead you to the same open air I am now breathing. But killing yourself out of fear or psychological pain will end your journey. I shudder to think what waits for you on the other side, if anything at all. At the very least, you ought to give yourself the chance to follow some of the above links and determine for yourself whether I'm full of shit, before you finally decide to do it.

Lastly, you may come to a realization that you were never given the unconditional love that children require for survival. This still does not justify taking your own life. You are capable, now that you are a grown man, of building your own life, and receiving what love is available. Wait for it. You can find it. It can come to you. You can increase it once you experience it. You will feel more of it when you truly experience freedom in your heart. But you cannot have this love without truth, and truth, like love, is inseparable from freedom. Let the truth make you angry. When I contemplate the number of lies I believed for decades, and how well-meaning people participated in the furtherance of untruth, I get plenty upset. Anger is okay, when you know how to deal with it.

Do not be afraid of the stigma of seeking help. It's not unmanly. It may also lead to decades more of freedom. The other way out will never lead there. You can sleep later. For now, live and be free.

I Want the Fucking Apology

Anonymous Contributor · 18 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It must be nearly a year ago that I got the following email from a fellow MRA. I say it was an email; actually, it was a bit of a rant, and a rough draft for an article idea. The man who sent it to me never quite finished it. I think I understand why. This is real life shit at its most raw. But he has, with some coaxing, agreed to let me run it anyway. I have made some very minor edits for the sake of continuity, and tried my best not to screw it up or dilute it. PE

Many years ago, under another name, I was on the board of directors of National Coalition of Free Men – I didn't know the guys. I gave talks on the radio and I HATE public speaking. What I got for it was years of abuse-you are stupid- slap slap-you don't have a right to a different view-slap slap.

I was shy in ways others wouldn't guess. I gave radio talks and University talks and was trashed badly by feminists in the press. Stupid man, can't get laid, hates women. Deal with the issues bitches, and few ever would.

You have been around. You know the damage years of child abuse can do. I read last week in the paper that the brave, fearless guys are the ones who often crash and burn from Iraq. I was always that guy. Housing project, on the streets, police and prison work. Hey man, grab a couple of guys and go into C block, unarmed and see what's happening.

I am OK with getting shot, not OK with being tortured and abused… Always a concern in prison work. So, some brain damage and some PTSD but I never quit and I didn't lose but I did get hurt, badly, a few times

So, name changes, hide out every so often, sometimes I take a year or two off.

AND, I always come back.

Because from the 60's to 70's I thought I was the only one crazy enough to see this PC bullshit for what it was. Well, I have never been impressed with how chicken shit most men and women are; gutless, following the crowd, buying bullshit from bullshit artists.

So there I am, housing project bad ass – trying to move from lower class to middle class. The only thing I had going for me was being tough and good looking and brave.

I got dumped on year after year, and then I saw a man's name and a woman's name speaking up against PC bullshit about gender, then others… and yet the gender feminists were always still in charge.

I saw a movie last night called "Flash of Genius" where about the professor that invented intermittent wind shield washers. Good movie for guys. Slow. But the guy is a little crazy; fights FORD for ripping him off, 8 years, loses his wife on the way, and is told he doesn't have a chance. He's been dumped by a lawyer for not taking a million.

He wanted the apology along with the money. He ended up getting offered 30 million, but not apology, to bail before court. He didn't take it.

In the end, he got the money and the apology.

I want the apology.

I want it from the upper classes and the teachers that beat boys. I want it from the grandma long dead who straddled my face when I was four, more than once, while I was in her care- dark room, don't tell because The Devil will get you.

I want it from my mom who slapped me a thousand times. I want it from my step-dad who hated me because I was smarter and better looking than his sons and proof that my dad fucked his wife first as he showed me his knife and said he would "cut it off."

I want it from feminist teachers who didn't see men dying in work and war, or men getting humiliated time after time. Males – inarticulate, confused – thinking their sexuality was wrong or bad, thinking women were superior, told our forefathers who sacrificed their lives for women and children were pigs.

I have a good wife that earns 70K a year working her ass off when she could be in a town that isn't fun and make 100K. She has always been good to me, so why don't I, with cancer three years ago, just kick back and stop stressing about "Gender issues?"

I have my dog to go running with. Kayaks with rivers close by, a nice bike; so why the fuck am I still carrying this torch when there are smart and well educated guys like Paul Elam, and Bernard Chapin and Pelle Billing, guys who are way better prepared and smarter and better educated. Why don't I just quit?

Because I want the fucking apology.

I didn't quit on racism and civil rights issues until it was a done deal. I didn't quit on protesting the Viet Nam war while a military police Sgt, with hippies at my house on post, war protestors, and I won't quit on gender until the press, TV, and women's studies stop trashing my great grandfather and my son.

Because quitting isn't what I ever did; not in college when I was ill prepared; not on marathons after I stopped drugs and cigarettes. Not when dealing with racists in the south or black gang bangers in prison or those fucking feminists who are way more evil than the racists or gang bangers. I want to quit but I can't.

I won't.

The racist and gang bangers have a good reason to be pissed off. They were pissed on. They were treated like dirt; growing up abused. I get their anger.

But women, who in our culture are given whatever they ask for by men who have given to women and children for eons, to have those bitches shitting on boys in schools until those little boys tell their smiling feminist teachers "I think men are pigs?"

Fuck you, bitches. You need to apologize.

Why do I do this to myself? It actually is something more than the apology.

It's the warrior.

I didn't stop fighting for civil rights or for some closure on Viet Nam until there was success. It makes me want to toss firebombs when I see Biden, Obama, and others kicking our asses while they kiss NOW's ass. I wrote somewhere that I would challenge the women who run NOW to seeing how many wheelbarrows of sand they could fill, and move, and that I, at age 63, with anemia from cancer, a screw in my left hip, two screws in my right shoulder, would work circles around them.

So who should we hire, men or women for such jobs? Because men can work you bitches into the ground. This is why they want a law to pay the women as much money or more than men working on bridges.

70,000 men died on the Suez Canal, how many on the Golden Gate? But we don't talk about that.

We talk about the lie, that women get screwed by men.

I want the apology. For myself. For all the warriors. For the living and for the dead, but mostly for those who kept giving as they were being spit on; those that kept shoveling and kept standing a wall while being told how worthless and evil they were.

I am not quitting till I get it.

Sirs/Madam:

I recently had the first time pleasure of visiting New Zealand from the United States, and also had the pleasure of flying Air New Zealand to get there.

From the ticketing process to my interactions with your flight crew, to the in-flight food and entertainment, to disembarking, my experience with your organization was nothing short of impressive. It is clear that Air New Zealand is run professionally from the top down, and that showed in every aspect of my journey with you.

I think that it makes it all the more important then, to write and tell you why it is highly unlikely that I will ever fly with Air New Zealand again.

Not too long after I had purchased tickets for the trip, I was made aware that Air New Zealand has a policy of disallowing unaccompanied children to be seated next to male customers, as though males, as an identified group, carry with them an increased risk of child molestation and/or other aberrant behavior.

Quite frankly, I find this type of policy to be offensive and shockingly sexist, and it prompted me to ask myself why I would ever again patronize a business that sees me personally, purely based on my sex, as a potential threat to young children.

And I am, in part, writing to ask you that very question.

While I understand the development of policies and procedures to protect the well being of unescorted children, as your competition Qantas does by segregating them from all unfamiliar adults, the policy you have in place targeting males is clearly discriminatory.

As I am sure you are aware, British Airways was involved in recent litigation over a similar policy and was compelled, quite reasonably so, to change that policy so that it did not discriminate on the basis of sex.

That being said, however, it is not your legal vulnerabilities or even my personal offense to being regarded as a potential child molester that causes me the most concern. It is, quite frankly, what message your policy sends to the children it was supposedly designed to protect. You are teaching those children that men, as a class, are potentially dangerous, and that women, as a class, are to be trusted without scrutiny.

Neither message is truthful, informed, or in the interest of those children.

And given that the vast majority of men do not molest or otherwise harm children, and that there is a small percentage of women who do, your policy is based on a completely false set of beliefs.

You are breeding unnecessary fear on one hand, and thoughtless vulnerability on the other. It is the quite expectable and understandable outcome of any policy based on such unabashed bigotry.

I could not help but notice that the Air New Zealand Executive Group, the group that is the addressee of this missive, is comprised of eight men and one woman. So according to your own policy, it would appear that your Group General Manager Vanessa Stoddart is the only one of you that would be deemed safe for contact with children.

Your policy also raises questions about male flight crew members, including your pilots. If the four flights I traveled on were any indication, the great majority of those pilots are male.

So please allow me to ask, who is protecting the children from your male employees? Or do you have some sort of testing instrument to weed out practicing pedophiles?

I found your country to be a fantastic place to take vacation, and will undoubtedly be returning over the years to come. But I will be doing so by taking my business to airlines whose standard operating procedure does not involve the assumption that I am suspect around children, and who will not be teaching the children on their planes that I am to be viewed as a potential threat, simply because I am male.

I cannot abide by that type of child abuse, even if under the guise of protecting them.

I encourage you, in the strongest possible terms, to learn from the examples of Qantas and British Airways, and to abandon this unfortunate and ill conceived policy.

Kind regards,
Paul Elam

I was cruisin my etheric consciousness recently to see what's new in the world of men, my world. I like to see if there is any new logic orbs added to the survival satchel, or possibly new dangers crossing the frontier of the post hypnotic victim gulag. It's always good to keep up to date on charges pending against your existence. My last run in with the gender police, one of the orifice-hers came undone and they cuffed me for resisting a breast.

Once they charge you it's open season to search the rest of your cardboard box for evidence. I knew I was screwed. Sure enough, they found it. This was not good …….a copy of architectural digest. State policy did not sanction the viewing of material that objectified shape and form. I tried to explain that the open spaces gave me a sense of freedom.

Freedom is it! You fucking pervert!

Well you can tell that to the drudge. We're charging you with linear arousal, but if you want to stick to that freedom story we can up the charge to sedition. That should get you a nice little term down on the hygiene retraining farm. That's right, you'll be rolling tampons for the sisterhood. You know what they like to do with architectural perverts like you on the farm don't ya? That's right, you get to test the tampons.

Seriously, I was reading an article at Misandry Review offering more insight on the plight of masculinity from the big penis guru, Michelle Kimmel. For those wondering, yes I thought I would give him a head start on his own personal sex change. Hopefully he won't gag on it. This is "the" guy struggling for so many years to release men from the bonds of masculinity and introduce them to a new way of self-actualising called fetish feminism. Let it not be said that there is a lack of selection in his product offering. My last count rendered 27 different flavours, made from all natural, 100% pure home grown feminists. Thaaats rite! Not all women are like that, and you can be too!!

Sorry only one sex change per customer, children not included, 100% restocking fee on all returned penises- give yours today!

Sorry, no really I'm sorry but mostly because I'm a man. You see every time I read this guy's stuff I feel like I'm in the middle of some tacky game show with some obnoxious host and all the prizes are upholstered in paisley except for the penis shaped rape whistles. I think at some time in the not too distant future Mr. Kimmel's book "Guyland" will make a great comic book or cartoon series, not unlike The Jettson's vs Predator.

While I may be venting somewhat, a much more cogent review by Peter Allemano of the book can be seen here and I highly recommend it.

What Kimmel fails to grasp in his concepts is that men's "idea of masculinity" has been socially criminalized and legislated as such. It is a street level experience that is less political and much more personal. Men no longer possess a concept of themselves that would offer a safe place to start or belong in the social equation. Men in fact are found guilty before a crime is ever committed. That guilt is assigned to masculinity only in the proximity of women, only in a social construct that includes women. It is less about a zero sum game than a negative sum prosecution for being a man. While many men may support doctrines such as Kimmel's and support a feminist cause, they are only one finger point away from the truth. The role they play in their own lives is leased to them by women and requires no notice, evidence or reason under the law to terminate that agreement.

It would be equally true to identify that the "idea of femininity" has not changed in the female mind. Where it may have served the female cause for equality to rail for shared custody of children, they are steadfast in denying it, arguing their cause by criminalizing fathers. Such a paradigm as fathering may well represent a strong role model for change in male consciousness it is however not supported by women or their lick spittle legislators. This is the societal privilege for which Mr. Kimmel speaks that ultimately renders men invisible, particularly to their children. It is increasingly the case that young men are simply opting out of the social collaboration with women in an effort to hedge risk. It is specifically the area of risk in which maleness and masculinity reside and in this area where equality is silent. It is against issues such as these that evidence the real strides made are in fact not by women but by ministries of government, their funding and your tax dollars.

It is within these ministries that government is defining masculinity with legislation and law. It is there that the term male is changed to rapist, husband to primary aggressor and father into deadbeat. Against these identities awaiting our young men, an issue such as equality becomes a bad joke to further mock them. This is no longer about laundry hampers, walks in the park and who shovels snow, it's about managing risk for a future. Although a future without a partner or children may not be ideal for most men it is still a future. Matrimony today for a young man is about marrying a police state that will evict you from your life with a point of the finger and chase you to your grave relentlessly. It is feminism by proxy and the egalitarian answer to a surreal ideological equality, another great stride by women.

To say "men define themselves in relation to women, so therefore masculinity can only be characterized as non-femininity" as Mr. Kimmel does, is to ignore a societal precondition of purpose. IT IS THE SOCIAL MESSAGE. It would better serve the integrity of intellectual honesty to state that "men are defined in relation to women". Let's face the obvious, if the latter wasn't true, you, Michelle, would have no market to sell your candy store consciousness. The majority of men still able to differentiate between the primordial echo of their hormones and the prosthetic attachment of their genitals have heard this spiel in "men's studies" programs for years. The ultimate value of your message is evidenced by well, who's buying it and the tenure of that discipline. Young and old men alike are currently reviewing the significance of their "essence" based on experiences endured. Many are unimpressed and many more are pissed.

Mr. Kimmel seems to be living squarely in the past and rehashing the ideals of gender roles better understood in 1975 or 80. In an age where men are prosecuted first in the media and then in courtrooms on nothing more than accusation, sex and marriage, without recording devices are better defined as pure risk. Because of the lack of birth control options for men, there is clearly no such thing as safe sex for any man. Risk in engaging in sex can be calculated against accusations of rape, STD's, false paternity, child support accompanied by estrangement from children, jail, a criminal record, economic marginalization and servitude, alimony and social isolation. That's if you used a condom.

Kimmel goes on to describe women's advances in sexual agency to result in discord for "the last tenant of masculinity". I can't help but think he meant "tenancy" as I am ushered out the door of my home in handcuffs and served a restraining order. If we hold this to be true, the shape of intimacy may change into a ghost of recollection. We are functioning in a consumer society on the brink of economic implosion men are relegated to the status of rapist, murderer, deadbeat and criminal. The value of a woman's sexual agency may well exceed the male economy's ability to barter an exchange. Many men have read the legislation on the wall and choose to invest in longer dividends and a more stable portfolio than can be found in junk relationship futures.

However a woman can achieve her bodily integrity and comfort by simply accepting the polygamous wedding to big government. We have handily achieved the destruction of marriage, family and any purpose that it may have served. The final bait and switch tactic Mr. Kimmel is serving is the notion that "men can have the type of relationships they desire with women and with their families". Since men are stripped of such equalities as parenting and fatherhood, it should be understood that as progenitor sperm donor, the "families" he refers to are not yours they are hers. The message is clear in that all things being equal, you are as replaceable to her children as you are to her.

All of us, men, women and particularly children have been reduced to a statistical inventory of tax fodder to feed a gluttonous layer of tenured bureaucratic entitlement and corporate corruption. It would do well for young men to recognise that within the script of marriage, your partner is much more likely to be a financial predator. Although she may have “settled” for the likes of you that compromise can be corrected no questions asked. While many may see this as a harsh definition and prompt me to recognise that not all women are like that, I can only say all women are like that. The law says so.

United Nations to the World: Kill Those Faggots!!

Paul Elam · 23 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The United Nations has been a long time ally of gender ideologues, promoting feminist politics on a global level and creating countless committees and funding organizations dedicated to women's causes. Intertwined in the language from many of those organizations are statements of support for the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered citizens of nations across the world.

It is consistent with popular feminism's apparent support for people in those communities, as you would find stated in the charters in most feminist organizations.

If you sense a but here, there is one, and it is big enough to make J-Lo jealous.

On the 17th of this month, the nations of the U.N. voted to remove sexual orientation from a resolution condemning summary and arbitrary executions. The resolution admonishes member nations to protect the right to life of all people, and calls on states to investigate killings based on discriminatory grounds. For the past 10 years, the resolution included sexual orientation in the list of discriminatory grounds on which killings are often based.

But the specification of gays was removed by a vote of 79 for, 70 against, 17 abstentions and 26 absent. It effectively issued an international gay hunting license for the numbers of nations that consider homosexuality to be a criminal offense, often looking the other way when gays are murdered, and including the 5 or so nations that treat it as a crime punishable by death.

As you might imagine, the feminist reaction has been, well, it has been… nonexistent.

In another moment of selective and convenient political silence by western feminists, their reaction to this shocking vote echoed with the intensity of their objections to Bill Clinton lying and obstructing justice related to his extramarital sexual exploits.

In other words, they, for once, kept their mouths shut.

If you visit the NOW website and do a search on the United Nations, you will get a number of returns on that organization. The top three are rants about why the U.N. has not elected a female Secretary-General. The remaining pages of results are filled with standard NOW fare concerned with the treatment of women and girls across the planet, especially in nations where feminist ideology meets the staunchest resistance.

Off to the left, as you can see in the pic provided, is a link to a single page outlining NOW's valiant efforts to support lesbians, especially across the more solvent demographics of white, professional, western culture.

click to enlarge

What you will have difficulty finding anywhere on the site is any mention of the fact that the United Nations, the organization that has become a hotbed for promoting their influence, just issued fag hacking carte blanche to any nation who wants it. A number of them do.

And of course, it makes me wonder.

Could it be because those laws are almost exclusively enforced against men?

Well, that would be the case.

While most countries that outlaw and even execute homosexuals are regarded as dangerous to both gays and lesbians, their laws are not written in gender neutral terms. For instance in Iran, under Sharia Law, the penal code contains the following provisions:

"The punishment for sodomy [lavat] where penetration has occurred is death, and the method of execution is at the discretion of the Sharia judge."
— Article 110, Islamic Republic Penal Code

In other words, the death penalty is only provided for acts common to male homosexuals, e.g. penetration. So while lesbians may well be punished, the most severe consequences are reserved for men.

This holds true for even lesser offenses, and the laws are written in a fashion that targets males even more specifically. Article 123, for example, reads: "If two men, unrelated to one another, lie, without necessity, naked under the same cover, they will each be punished by up to 99 lashes of the whip."

Again, this is not to say the lesbianism is condoned or would go unpunished, but it is clear that the laws target males by design.

This is further evidenced and documented in a report from Iranrights.org:

> In July 2005, after an inconclusive medical report, a court in Esfahan sentenced five young men to 75 lashes apiece and three years of exile to Khouzistan province for "having confessed one time to a homosexual act."[4] According to Arsham Parsi, founder of Iranian Queer Organization, "being flogged has become routine for many Iranian gays who may even express relief at the fact that they were 'only sentenced to corporal punishment.' "
> Twenty-nine years of institutionalized violence and discrimination have driven Iranian gays and transsexuals [bold text mine] to an underground life marked by the fear of being caught. It has also made them easy targets of violence in recent government campaigns against "hooligans". In the summer of 2007, the Revolutionary Tribunal of Shiraz sentenced several "hooligans" to prison and other punishments. Among them were two men whose punishment included 175 lashes each for homosexual acts. [5] More recently, in March 2008, another "morality campaign" led to the arrest of 30 male guests at a party in Esfahan. Security forces broke into a private home, and the guests were arrested, detained for weeks with no access to legal counsel, and reportedly examined for evidence of homosexual sex. [6]

Where are the female victims in all this madness?

My guess, and I have to qualify it as a guess because empirical gender breakdown statistics are elusive, is that in relative terms they don't exist any more than feminist outrage over dead gay men.

And of course one would have to figure that if watchdog organizations wanted to invoke the maximum sympathetic response from the world community, they would be showcasing such travesties committed against women.

But time and time again as I researched this information, it was references to males, and males only, who were beaten, imprisoned, hanged and stoned for their sexual choices and conduct.

Does NOW's silence make a little more sense now?

At the start of last month, I wrote a piece "The Problem With Gay Rights," in which I asserted my belief that gay men in western culture were backing the wrong horse by siding with feminist ideologues simply because they have taken to flying a gay banner and have been making some meaningless political noise about gay marriage.

I have just been proven right again.

The women's movement is quick to toss out the catch all phrase, "Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgendered."

Don't buy it for a minute. The only word that really matters at all to feminists in that phrase is Lesbian, because lesbians are female, and because lesbians comprise a healthy percentage of their leadership and power players.

Gay men who think that feminists are really their advocates are nothing more than window dressing; useful idiots used to garner public approval from the egalitarian minded. And as we can witness, with our own eyes on this very day, they will be abandoned to malicious and murderous judgement, like all other forms of male fodder, without a second thought.

The only discernable reason for it, other than inherent utility and disposability as males, is that the real focus for feminists is to get another white, western woman elected to a lucrative and powerful position so that she can return favours to the sisters that got her there.

Happy Thanksgiving

Well, once again it is time for American's to overeat, imbibe, watch football, tolerate obnoxious relatives, and take a moment to reflect on something, anything, to be grateful for.

Not bad as far as holidays go. I mean, it beats shopping yourself below the poverty line just to feed the corporate gods – and to feel adequate, but maybe not as good as fireworks displays and ribs on the grill. Your call, but I kinda like Thanksgiving, and I extend the grateful sentiments to my friends in Canada, England, Eastern Europe, Australia, New Zealand and elsewhere across the globe.

Worldwide friendships, courtesy of the MRM. Now that is something to be grateful for.

I count the people in this movement, people who regularly remind me I am not crazy, or a whiner, or hateful or to be ashamed, as being among the many things I am grateful for; certainly not the least of them either. You are my buffer against a world that would prefer I was self loathing, for being an MRA, and for being a man.

Here's to the MRM, and to the readers and writers of AVfM. May you all find something to be grateful for, and hang on to it with all you have.

Birth of Vagicon

Theodore Labadie · 26 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

There just aren't many good words to describe how women manipulate men and those that do have long fallen out of use, now meaningless to most modern ears—words like termagant, virago, fishwife. All of these words are ancient, dating back to the Middle Ages or earlier, and focus on the nagging, scolding, nattering nature of women known to mankind long before the advent of feminism. None describe the sexual manipulation of men that has escaped the confines of the harems and brothels of old to permeate our culture like snot soaks a Kleenex.

A new word, then. Writing in a living language it is ours to shape and where inadequate to relate the vagaries of our decaying culture, our duty to invent terms by careful design or serendipity that add to our cognitive repertoire and descriptive power. Thus, vagicon—a portmanteau of vaginal con artist.

A vagicon is a woman who manipulates a man into doing her will with the suggestion, whether by innuendo in speech or titillation through posture, expression, or provocative dress, that by obedience he will be rewarded with sex, but then reneges on the offer. She has many tricks of her deceptive trade: heels that pitch the buttocks into a display of receptiveness, tints to color the face like a sex flush—the engorgement of skin with blood as a signal of intense arousal, highlights for the eyes to appear wide with desire. The boob-hoist, the hair-toss, the sultry pout.

The vagicon is everywhere. Whether you are emptying your wallet in a local pub in the vain attempt to get her pants to liquefy or stripping the skin from your palm opening that stubborn jar of spaghetti sauce (two advanced university degrees and she still can't figure out that trick with a wet dishcloth) the vagicon is everywhere. You'll even find her in the hallowed ranks of feminist activism, like those Ukrainian chicks demonstrating in skimpy outfits slathered with mud like lady wrestlers, railing against sex tourism. (OK say men, we'll campaign against prostitution. Can we have sex now?) It never occurs to these vagicon activists to praise men for their kind attention. It never occurs to them to thank men for bringing much needed cash to their underdeveloped country and demonstrating highly refined taste by showing appreciation for the beautiful Ukrainian people—and for scrumptious, hunky poon.

If you have ever wondered how after showering a woman with attention and gifts you can be left with your dick in your hand, if you have ever lept to a woman's defense only to be backhanded at the slightest displeasure, if you live each day in a hellish cycle of repeating arousal and rejection, my friend, you have been vagiconned by a woman who believes that modernity has relocated the axis of the Earth to rotate around the vortex of her pussy.

Take great care not to get sucked in.

Air New Zealand Stands on its Sexist Policy

Paul Elam · 26 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[box type="note" icon="none"]Robert Cumming / Shutterstock.com[/box]

I recently sent a letter of complaint by email to Air New Zealand about their policy of treating all male passengers as potential child molesters, and seating them away from unescorted minors. True to the promise of their auto responder, I have received a more personal response. Rather I should say that they have responded with a non response. Following is their email to me and then my response back to them.

Dear Mr Elam

Thank you for your email regarding your recent flights with us.

It was a pleasure to read your comments regarding the excellent standard of service which you received on your flights with us, and that you had an enjoyable stay in New Zealand. It is certainly always encouraging to receive feedback such as yours as it is proof to us that the high standards which we aim to provide are being maintained.

However, I am sorry to read of your disappointment in an aspect of our Unaccompanied Minor policy, namely in regards to not seating minors next to male passengers. By way of explanation, Air New Zealand 's internal procedures relating to the seating of unaccompanied minors and young persons travelling alone are as follows:

- For Crew surveillance reasons, unaccompanied minors and young persons travelling alone are normally seated together in the rear of the aircraft and next to the crew galley.
- Where possible, a spare seat is kept empty next to unaccompanied minors and young persons travelling alone to be used by the crew where special attention is required.
- Where a flight is full, we will endeavour to seat a female passenger next to unaccompanied minors and young persons travelling alone.

These procedures reflect the approach adopted by leading airlines around the world and have been in place for some time.

Mr Elam, thank you once again for taking the time to write in to us. I trust that I have been able to address some of your concerns, and that we may have the opportunity of welcoming you and your wife onboard our flights again in the future.

Kind regards,

Claire McLister

Customer Support Specialist

———

Dear Ms McLister,

Thank you for taking the time to respond to my questions, and in such a prompt manner. However, your response would have been much more satisfying had you actually answered my questions rather than just tell me what I already knew, namely that it is Air New Zealand's official policy to practice gender profiling against male passengers, regarding them all as threats from which the children on your planes need to be protected.

I sought in my query to find out why that was happening, Ms. McLister, not to get a non responsive reiteration of what I was obviously complaining about in the first place.

So I am here, asking you again.

What determinants did your airline use to arrive at such a policy? How do you respond to my concerns that the policy is discriminatory and fostering inaccurate and negative stereotypes of fully half of your clients?

I am quite sorry, Ms. McLister, but your statement of "These procedures reflect the approach adopted by leading airlines around the world and have been in place for some time," has the ring of a child excusing their poor judgment by saying " Well, everyone else was doing it."

First of all, not everyone else is doing it. As I indicated in my original communication, Qantas, who appears to be your primary competitor among the USA to NZ air service providers, does not do it. And, as I also reminded you, British Airways was recently sued over the policy, and was compelled to change it because there was no demonstrable reason to have it in the first place.

Your response to me, as courteous and professionally worded as it was, was simply avoidant of these points and the quite reasonable questions raised about your practices.

Would you kindly answer those questions, or am I to understand that you are going to defend a sexist policy by avoiding any meaningful discussion with a customer?

Lastly, Ms.McLister, I am not married, and so was not traveling with my wife. It appears you just made that assumption when seeing I was traveling with a female. Given the other assumptions you made about me, and all men boarding your flights, I should not, I suppose, be surprised.

It seems to be policy on all levels at Air New Zealand.

But I would nonetheless really appreciate either a straight answer from you regarding my inquiry, or the courtesy of forwarding these questions to someone who will provide as much.

Kind Regards,

Paul Elam

Deliverance From Rape: Can You Squeal Like a Pig, Or Just Talk Like a Chauvinist?

J Galt · 28 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The issue of rape is an ongoing drama of ownership. Beliefs have placed this event of violence on an auction block of ownership, haggling the victims numbers and nature to establish an outcome that barters a broader definition. It is in fact a definitive understanding we are bidding on. Because we live in times in which our popular perceptions are directed to see the glass as half empty and the half that is full as financed, threats to our safety loom larger by perception. It is this very perception that drives public policy to a frenzy of selective policing in response to our fears. It is no different with rape, as evidenced by a zero tolerance policy that can be understood as more of a selective response to what we choose to believe.

Any discussion of rape between genders is quickly polarized by highly politicized statements such as "all men are rapists" and in most cases the conversation turns to the effects of rape rather than contributing factors. It is justified ad hominem and correct for a man to feel a sense of shame in discussing this with a woman. It's called empathy and it is a very human trait. It is reasonable to suggest discussing the effects of rape leads to a more sympathetic view. However sympathy from a rapist would only be directed at themselves if at all. With the ever changing definition of rape it would do well for men to understand that no means no and unless you choose the risk, yes also means no. Curbing rape may lie solely in the hands of women and the documentation they are willing to provide.

Numbers Don't Lie…Until Questioned.

The numbers unfortunately have been politicized to an extent that the nature of prevalence is obscured by argument as to what is valid. The FBI offers a model of aggregate statistics collected from law enforcement agencies from state to state based on actual occurrence, with accompanying caveats as to the accuracy. When drilling down further to local municipalities it is evident that the numbers are not recorded based on occurrence but may be grouped. Sexual assaults may include common assault rape may be diluted with occurrences of sexual assault. The method in which statistics are aggregated or mixed on a local level may be to service local issues relating to deployment of support services, manpower and funding.

Following the trail of other groups for numbers, such as the National Organization of Women leads to the Bureau of Justice web site. Reading the references supplied by N.O.W. it is the survey year of 2006 in which they aggregate their message regarding "sexual violence". It is this year in which the Bureau outlines anomalies in their statistics that result in an exaggerated outcome that cannot be attributed to an increase in crime and have been removed from their year to year tables.

Click on graph to view the original web page which includes a definition of rape and additional information and links

The Bureau collects their information by survey direct to households in search of victims. The year to year table is stunning and I have included it here. It is worth noting that the graph includes statistics for all occurrences of rape over the age of 12, both genders gay and straight. What is noticeable is the decline in the occurrence from 1979 to 2009, with no meaningful upturn since 1991. To translate this into the lingo of the N.O.W. in '79 there were roughly 1,945 rapes per day. Contrasted to 2009 in which approximately 208 rapes per day were committed. It is a decline in occurrence almost tenfold. Breathtaking to see a decline almost eight fold occur over the course of just twenty years. Such a decline in prevalence raises questions although not conclusive I suggest the following, attrition, law and abortion. Many suggest "aging out" a demographic transition in the youth population away from a "baby boomer" population. North Carolina in 1993 became the last state to remove the spousal exemption for marital rape, a closing message to the culture of marriage. My favourite is Roe v Wade and sanctioned abortion in 1973, eighteen years later we see a steady decline not just in rape but all areas of crime. Interesting to note that between 1973 and 2005, 45 million abortions have been carried out, a compound affect in that it removed perpetrators and victims from the population.

The Body as Currency

It is strictly my opinion, but I contend that rape has long been part of an economy of the body, the ability to trade when we have nothing except ourselves. It is this marketplace where you will find the most deception, and the least reward. The ability to exploit with cunning and insight in this economy can yield dividends and profit and is as subtle as a favour and as exploitive as slavery. It is what moves the planet when the banks are closed. In the lower ranks of existence where money is short and work is long the skin trade may be the only source to gain bonus and benefit. An afternoon building a deck can be traded for, well whatever you can get that will settle your bill. A hot meal, use of the car, all the beer you can drink (till the jobs done) or sex. It's an economy that trades in satisfaction, not prosperity or profit, And once you monetize satisfaction you objectify everything.

Every Man Is a Rapist…Yeah, so What's Your Point?

Every man is in some way offended by this statement it removes dignity and applies accusation to the sense of their own humanity. I am less offended by it and in fact, agree with it in a way most men don't. If you are married you may be upset with the "inventory" of your partner's complaints. Conversations are quickly hijacked by the never ending "list" while the difficulty you are attempting to address takes 2nd then 3rd place. Welcome to female economics. You may have experienced sex for service in your relationship right after the purchase of a new refrigerator or jewellery. I myself was offered a blow job by my partner for every 5 thousand dollars of receivables I collected in my business, this from someone that was repulsed by the thought. Is it any wonder that when sex is devalued by not meeting the asking price that a man would be a rapist. The "list" of complaints is your bar tab, your outstanding debt. When a woman "settles" she is not settling for you it's your debt to her that she "settles" for. It's a skin trade of female economics and you owe, you owe, it's off to work you go.

It is no different outside of marriage when courting the painted package batting her eyes and smiling sensually as you reach for the bill. It's a product launch seeking the best price, monetized in easy weekly payments with financing built in, a consume-her driven economy. Men should be wary, product offerings and discounted specials may be the warning sign of a vagicon lemonade stand. When seeking refreshment it is a safe bet and prudent to get a receipt, even if you record it yourself. The vagicons are everywhere armed with crooked smiles and feigned competence just waiting for a big strong man. In fact for those who can't resist bartering drinks in a bar for vagipoints, next time you decide to bring her home don't sleep with her get her to build your deck or do the dishes. In this economy there is no equality only debt from the moment of purchase, the moment you plant your seed you have leased the land and your occupancy. There is no doubt in my mind that many bad deals in the dating milieu have ended with charges of rape. Let the buyer beware!

What's the Big Deal…Isn't Rape Educational?

Again with the "rape culture" the bellowing can be heard by the deaf, better it should be called what it is, "selective rape". This culture has a single focus and a single language spoken by the cunnilinguist. The plight of anyone else and particularly men will garner a double dose of shame to set you straight. So callous is the mindset that Catherine Comins, assistant dean of student life at Vassar is quoted saying "men who are unjustly accused can sometimes gain from the experience". Cunnilinguists openly ignore the plight of men and particularly those in prison, Ms. Comins preferred institute of education for men. She speaks in cunnilingualisms with the brevity of a self-serving worm better defined of late by the term vagicon. It is the violence of rape that Ms. Comins suggests is the educator in a prison system where 1 in 5 men suffer from attack, where the prevalence inside exceeds the prevalence outside. There is no better definition of "rape culture" than a culture that would incarcerate men and ignore their plight, a culture that controls the institutions, the very cages where it occurs and offers it as comedic candy and entertainment.

Because the portion of our glass that is full is financed, we are invested in the improvement of our lives to such an extent that we rely on others and particularly the media for our larger understandings. It is our larger understandings that form a public opinion that is bartered by professional politicians to form the policy that will govern our daily lives. It is the media and it's manipulation that serves this bullshit on a daily basis, I for one am shutting them off, and advocating for an education in the truth.

Another Reminder on Comments

Paul Elam · 28 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

During my recent vacation I was not on line often enough to monitor comments as well as I normally like to. And today I had the following comment from Redpill on the 11th of this month brought to my attention. It is something I missed while overseas:

Women are the natural enemies of men. No matter what anyone says and how good women claim to be, that is just the truth. This will never stop and men will continue under the tyranny of women. I should have known that things would come to this. Like I said in the comment section on another post, these women have no regard for human life whatsoever, they murder innocent babies through abortion, phsyically, sexually, and emotional abuse they're own children or even other children who are close to them and come into contact with them, and abuse and betray their husbands and men altogether. Men die in wars, have practically erected society altogether, and have made contributions to society to make everything better for the human race, and yet have no right to be with their children or even exhibit their own natural manhood and be themselves, and are constantly disrespected. We are called rapists, abusers, bullies, and even homophobes because we don't embrace the faggots biologically backward, queer-ass culture. Yet again men are constantly discriminated against in the media and society altogether. I am so fucking tired of this shit, that I really wouldn't mind shooting a bitch dead in the face. We can't even defend ourselves without getting arrested, attacked, or even murdered, our children are still being tortured, and babies are still being murdered, because these bitches say that its "their bodies, their choice". They are evil. ALL OF THEM!!! Man was created in Gods image and Woman was created in Satans image. This will never stop until us men rectify the situation and we can never have families, never go anywhere without anyone being suspicious, and jobs are taken from us and given to women, because they want the fucking equality of being fucking slaves! This is a gender war, and women, ALL WOMEN! are the enemies, there is no compromising. I never asked to be born into bondage and I am forced to deal with it, Fuck that!

No Redpill, fuck this kind of post. It has been sent to the trash where it belongs, and I am willing to do the same with your username if you ever post this kind of garbage to my website again.

Look, once again, here's the deal- for the tiny fraction of you that need to hear it. I don't give a rats ass what feminists think about me, the MRM or this website. In fact, as long as they are hating on all three I feel secure in the fact that me, the other writers and readers who comment are doing their jobs. The haters should hate us.

I don't care what feminists try to use against us, or whether what is posted here offends mainstream sensibilities. Mainstream sensibilities are about as cogent as the sensibilities you find in a crack house, so they are on my don't give a shit list as well.

I have satirized violence several times, and it has of course been taken out of context and even drawn criticism from MRA's and sympathizers. I am fine with that, too. If people don't recognize satire or humor then let 'em stew.

So it should be clear that there is a lot of latitude here for both writers and those who comment.

But the bottom line is that I am vehemently against violence. So if you make reference to it, and your intent is satire or humor, it needs to be crystal clear that this is the intent.

When I read comments like the above, though, they, and if need be the one who made the comment, are going bye-bye.

I don't even mind the shit about men being made in the image of God and women being made in the image of Satan. It's straight up stupid, but at least it is non violent. so I am not going to make a fuss over it or other res ipsa loquitur postings.

Why this stance? Because I say so. It is the one area I am calling the trump card of ownership and leaving it at that.

Child Murder: It Must Be the Husbands Fault

Paul Elam · 29 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Ju know, they say eet was the hoosbands fault," announced the thirty something Mexican immigrant who was cutting my hair that day, two months before 9/11 changed the world. The big story of the moment was not about terrorists or toppled buildings, but about Andrea Yates, the Houston area mother of five that snuffed the life out of all of her children a mere half hour from where I live. And my stylist, using up every word of almost English in her repertoire, was attempting to 'splain to me how the whole mess could rightly be hung on the man.

"Oh, yeah?" I asked, unsurprised at the stupid remark, but too far into the haircut to get up and walk. "Who are they?" I was instantly pissed and made no effort to hide it.

She looked a bit nonplussed, then shrugged and said, "Somebody say eet on the noose." She sounded less self assured; feebly attempting to distance herself from the remark. Apparently, the language barrier didn't prevent her from picking up the tone in my voice.

I didn't bother trying to educate her. It was clear she had been in America for a short time, just long enough to learn how to cut hair and trash men in a second language, but she was already beyond redemption. The absence of a tip and my repeat business would have to serve as my first and last retort.

I am sure by now she can rattle off misandric invectives in impeccable English. After all, she has the entire western world for a classroom.

Canada has made some recent additions to the lesson plan.

Ontario's Elaine Campione was really mad at her estranged husband, so she murdered their two daughters, Serena 3, and Sophia, 19 months, by drowning them both in the bathtub. It was reminiscent of the Yates case, only the attempts to issue this woman a pussy pass were significantly less veiled, and, so far, less successful.

In The Canadian Press's coverage of the trial, which resulted in two convictions for first degree murder, the first three words of the article were, "An abusive husband."

We can at least credit them for cutting to the chase. Before telling us about the crime, the accused, the verdict or the sentencing, The Canadian Press wanted to make sure that we knew who the guilty party really was. I mean, surely it wasn't the woman who held the heads of those two little girls under water till their tiny lungs filled with water and the life slipped from them forever. No, never. Not in Houston and not in Canada.

"You know, they say it was the husbands fault, eh!"

The judge in the case was apparently offended in equal proportion to The Canadian Press. Justice Alfred Stong was quoted as saying, after the verdict was read, "It is more than disconcerting to think that if Ms. Campione had not been so abused, so used and discarded as a person, her two daughters could still be alive."

There was, however, a peculiar reality that seemed to escape both reporters and Justice Stong. The "abuse" of Campione by her husband was only alleged. There was no proof offered the court that he ever laid a hand on her, not that it would have justified her actions if he used her for a daily punching bag. But that is a really big if. Unlike her killing her own children, the allegations about Mr. Campione amounted to nothing more than finger pointing by a murdering lunatic. The only proven abuse in the case at all was that of the murders, committed and admitted by the mother, who was diagnosed with Borderline Personality Traits. (Quick, call Dr. Palmatier, she'll be shocked to know a borderline did something evil.)

Unfortunately for the press and the Canadian legal system, the jury in the case annoyingly listened to the evidence and voted for a conviction in accordance with the law. Pesky thing, the law. One might think that Canada will do something about that as soon as possible. After all, how can that father, who didn't murder anyone, who wasn't even charged with a crime, just be allowed to walk free?

I mean, aside from his dead children, he is probably laughing it up right now.

Oh, were this the isolated case. But it is not.

It was pretty much the same with murdering Canadian mother Penny Boudreau, who strangled her daughter to death and half stripped her when dumping her body to make it look like a sex crime.

The headline from Mail Online?

'Mummy, don't': Woman kills her only daughter, 12, after boyfriend says, 'It's the child or me'

As far as going to disgusting levels in search of a pussy pass, this one takes the cake. Lots of people with step children or who date people with children come to stand off's in the relationship regarding the kids. Be careful what you say though, guys. If she kills them you are likely to end up in a headline with blood dripping from your name.

Your vilification will be a lot more important to the press, and perhaps even the courts, than in finding truth or justice.

It's one more reason to steer clear of single mothers.

But the more overarching problem here can be summed up in two words.

Dead children.

What we excuse, we enable. And what we enable, we get, in ever increasing amounts. When enabling women to excuse, rationalize, justify and shift blame, even over their most heinous acts, we will pay for it. Sometimes the dues are paltry. Sometimes payment comes in little caskets.

Read the news story on the Campione case. What you will find is a press and a judge doing everything in their power to coddle and pity a murderess. You will read statements by politicians pledging to investigate in the aftermath of this tragedy. There will be reports on the Canadian mental health system. There will be cries for even more attention and support for "abused" women, if that is even possible. There will be the expected and obligatory condemnations of abusive men.

And the kids will keep dying.

Until our justice system starts considering what this means, it should be impossible to listen to anyone in government who talks about "the best interest of the child," without laughing directly in their face.

Or perhaps spitting in it.

Much of the trial information, even as related in the highly biased Canadian news story, points to the distinct possibility that Campiones real motive for killing her children was because her husband was going after custody. He may well have been doing everything in his power to protect them from a mother with a history of presenting a danger to her children.

If so, he would appear to be the only person in Canada that ever had an interest in that at all.

Where was this man's help? Where is the outrage that he has lost his children? Where is anyone who even gives a shit?

We don't have time to give a shit. We are too busy babysitting and holding the hands that killed two innocent children.

And we are too busy pretending that we are actually doing something else.

Back Home Women Veterans Battle Sexism?

Steven DeLuca · 30 November 2010 · Archived copy · Original

That was the headline on my Sunday paper 11/28/2010. A more accurate and Politically Incorrect view would be to notice that male and female vets deal with sexism at home and overseas but to notice, really notice, the sexism men live with shows a certain lack of chivalry and we just don't go there.

"Women have always been the primary victims of war" said Hillary Clinton, while at a conference on Domestic Violence in San Salvador.

If 58,000 women had been killed in Viet Nam and 8 men would Hillary suggest that "men were the primary victims of war?" She says women were the primary victims because they lost husbands, fathers, and sons in combat. Dear Hillary, trust me, my mother could care less that I have a 100% disability from military duty. Life isn't as black and white as your feminist lens shows you it is. Some women grieve, some don't, but living with a 100 percent disability or losing your life is a bigger price than you can begin to understand because of your protected status as a woman.

Pat Schroeder, D- Colo, served in the House Armed Services Committee from 1973 to 1979. To emphasize the risk to women she said of Iraq "The whole place is literally a front line. She wants you to believe that the women face the same risks as men. If that's true than why is it that last week, and the weeks before, and this week, and for weeks after we can count on males being killed and are surprised (and dismayed) when a woman is killed?

Mark Brunswick of the Minneapolis Star Tribune wrote "Back home, women veterans battle sexism," in a spirit befitting Shroeder and Clinton. And most who read such commentary regarding sexism towards women just shake their heads in despair noticing that one more time women pay a price for sexism that selfish men are spared in our "patriarchal society."

"721 women have been wounded and 132 killed in action in Iraq and Afghanistan more than in all U.S. conflicts since World War II." You can find this message in Brunswick's article and if you Goggle "Number of women killed in Iraq." You will find similar articles.

I do know that if you doubled the number of men killed in Viet Nam it would be 116,000 and tripling the number of women would be 24 but without exact numbers for comparison with men readers would assume females are going all Rambo in Iraq, carrying huge packs and tracking down the enemy. One woman wrote these two lines in an online article.

First the title: "Why are Women Still Considered Second-Class soldiers?" followed by, "More women have died in Iran and Iraq that all the wars since WWII."

She, like Brunswick and Schroeder and Clinton want you to believe that in civilian life and war that women run similar risks and pay an equal price as men. Facts don't matter. What was left out is that many of those deaths are typical deaths related to what you would find in any population of 250,000 in a year.

A death from a car wreck is more likely to happen to a female soldier than death from a sniper and most likely Clinton and Shroeder would call those car accidents "war deaths," "on the front lines," if they happen in a war zone.

Feminists like to inflate their numbers any way they can. Inflating military deaths to heroic proportions is no different than how they look at a man shoving his wife and calling it "battery" to inflate Domestic Violence numbers. The intent is to make women look heroic when they are not. Likewise, they ignore a woman slapping a man and suggest that "he had it coming." They are silent about male pain because it is based on chivalry and makes women look more angelic- when many women are not.

Compared to male deaths few women are dying in our wars, period.

Deal with it.

Men are 93% more likely to die in American work places than women are and 99.999 percent more likely to die in war, Men are 4 times more likely to commit suicide as woman and much more likely to end up on the streets or in jail.

Young males, black males especially, are much less likely to graduate from college. Men are much more likely to die early because of pollutants and stress from decades in dirty and dangerous work places while supporting children and women. Men are much more likely to be victims of robberies, beatings and homicides. Men in prison, innocent or guilty, are at exceedingly high risk of rape, and few people, very few, care.

We rarely hear about the price men pay in work or war or civilian life in general because of gender. We are "bombarded" with MSinformation regarding gender and always the assumption is, sexism is a one way street – something men do and women pay for. Male victims rarely count, female victims always do.

Any man who protests sexism towards men or the outrageous indoctrination of our children by such lies and myths in such PC times will be accused of misogyny, hatred of women, by those who can't even define the word misandry; hatred of men.

We like men to shut up, not whine, not complain, strong and silent equals a good man. Brunswick is doing what many modern male authors do, kiss feminist ass to get front page coverage in the press. He gets a paycheck and praise while another generation of children grow up hearing such stories about how the male gender is sexist.

Brunswick wrote about a female soldier: "Sgt. Bieber was part of the combat mission, except officially she wasn't. How can a solider simultaneously be part of a combat unit and not part of the unit.?"

Well, it depends on if they are going to intentionally put you in harms way, or not. We intentionally put males in harms way, we do the best we can to reduce the risk to women, it doesn't always work out. I have as much respect for Sgt. Breena Bieber as any male soldier. She is leaving the military after seven years, and said "There is nothing I would change about my military career."

But respecting her doesn't mean I have to disregard the truth.

Any sexism she faces because of her gender, related to war, pales compared to the number of injuries and deaths of men and boys because of their gender.

Some individual men and women face sexism, some don't, but Politically Correct journalists like Brunswick assume sexism only harms women. He mentions how a male left at home to care for children had support, unlike women who are expected to do such things alone.

Reading his article I would guess that he was neither a stay at home dad or in the military. As a veteran with a 100 percent disability I took care of two children while their mother worked on her masters and worked-full time. It wasn't easy for either of us but harder for her. There are some real perks caring for a child that many men don't know about and that women seem to hide from men while claiming "men just don't know how hard it is."

For the record, many professional women who left kids in day care wish they could go back and do it over while supported partially or fully by a man. There is a good reason or two for this.

While caring for the children some women overdid the patronizing comments about what a great and unusual man I must be. Others said "men shouldn't care for children" and others treated me as equal to women in that role. It's not only women caring for children who face sexism but such sexism is easy to deal with compared to military life, 24/7, for soldiers, male or female.

When we hear how the current wars are claiming more female lives than all the wars since WWII many will think it must be in the thousands. It's not. Mark Brunswick informs us that 250,000 women have served and that 5% of homeless vets are women and that a higher percentage of women vets are unemployed.

Last one first. Are they unemployed because a spouse is supporting them, something male vets are less likely to find? Are they searching for flexible, easy and meaningful work as women tend to do if a man is supporting them?

Did Brunswick even consider that? And if 5% of vets who are homeless are women, what percentage are men? Isn't that more worthy of note and indicative of sexism?

He said female vets are less likely to seek help? Based on what study? It took me 25 years to go for help because my disability was from police work and not war. When I went for help I ended up with a 100% disability the first time through.

In vet groups we did some outreach and found men from WWII who had been living with PTSD for decades. Brunswick's article doesn't even deal with the higher rates of male suicide in battle areas and at home. Is he unaware that men are more likely than women to kill themselves, or use drugs and booze to get by or to have one car or one motorcycle accidents? Driver error?

Hillary and all the women alive in America today have had the vote. It's been about a hundred years since women, the largest voting block there is, have been voting and none protested when only males were drafted, many too young to vote, during the Viet Nam era. Few noticed the "sexism" of 58,000 males and 8 females dying in Viet Nam for our country. Boys might have avoided the war because they thought it wrong but not because of the sexism while some females protested the sexism of not taking shop class.

My son and daughter didn't go into the military. I had children late in life, age 40 plus. They are college students. If both were in the military the odds that my son would be blown apart are so much higher that it's obscene to pretend that women face equal risks.

In civilian life it's the same; it's much safer to be born a female in America. Pop Quiz. In America women outlived men by a year in 1920 and now it's seven years, so which gender had five national health centers and now finds the Obama crew making it ten while the other gender has none?

It's not women who face the worst discrimination in America; it's men. We teach boys to hide their pain, suck it up, "man up" or shoot yourself. Girls tears are kissed away. It's always been that way.

Clinton's sexist idea of war was expressed to the First Ladies' Conference on Domestic Violence in San Salvador: "Women have always been the primary victims of war" she said. Does anyone really believe that if women were coming home in body bags every week, or suffering brain injuries from road side bombs at the rate men are, or killed by snipers at the rates men are that she would not still claim it was women who were and are the primary victims of war? In wars overseas and in the gender war at home it's men who pay the highest price.

It's time to stop pretending otherwise.

Superman Returns?

J Galt · 1 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The World Doesn't Need Superman

I recently sat to watch the movie Superman Returns, again. A movie like this, because of the archetypal and symbolic role play, causes a cathartic mood leaving me with puzzling questions about the nature of masculinity. The character of Superman himself is puzzling to me. As a super being, I would have thought him to have better communication skills. In my view, what most men would experience as strife at being assigned an absentee father role seems to result from an inability to communicate in the original, from deeper questions of self. It is from the position of the original, we enter an invisible rite of passage that either disenfranchises and disconnects us from youth, or introduces us to the migrating event of our next organic progression – our maturity. It is here that the script will direct us as human beings or human doings. Khalil, as he is called in the original, is dealing with the biological imperative that he may be the last of his kind. His immediate solution was coitus with Lois Lane. After all, an objective solution is the shortest route back into our implied purpose of doing, where a subjective discovery although less corporeal could give us our being. This is a first gesture towards personal fulfillment in which the original Khalil, struggles against his simulated identities of doing, those of Clark Kent and Superman. It is only in his fortress of solitude that Khalil is identified and mentored by recorded shadows and crystal memories. It is an act of subjective individuality to leave the script of doing the "saviour", travel through dark space alone to discover the context of his origin to know Khalil.

As polite and tolerable, Clark Kent follows a script of behaviour that allows him to fit in. He animates himself using the exact opposite of invulnerability. Why? With only glasses and a suit as his disguise, he is really hiding within perception, using the perception of others as the real disguise. Animating or acting to provide an appropriate illusion, he collaborates with the beliefs of others to achieve a persona that is self-sustaining. He is simulating simulacra, or is he? In this collaboration, who is free to change it, refine it or end it? The collaboration of a simulation may be the fundamental expression of our non-verbal language, the hive brain or concordantly the matrix. If simulation is the safest haven for our fears and vulnerabilities, who is free to change it?

It is in group think that a collective consciousness establishes a simulation, as a chaos of collective beliefs. The chaos of group beliefs orders or organises into an acceptable expression of group think, with attached roles, individual utility and purpose. By similarity it may well describe your family and mine it also describes street gangs, corporations, priesthoods and ideologies. So powerful is a simulation and it's collaboration it can be impenetrable to challenge. Priesthoods sanctify crime, police protect their own hegemony politicians subvert freedom children are killed in the crucible of context, ideologies script truth. It is the result of beliefs in a simulation, a collaboration of purpose. The spirit and ghost of the group and it's simulation neither fears nor answers to the wrath or judgement of deities. It is so intense as to be hypnotic, it is where people cocoon for safety and establish a reality. It is the ideology of the group, the simulation that is coldest to the individual. It is an imperialism of consciousness, seeking new real estate, speaking on behalf of you as it, testing your orientation with half spoken messages for you to complete, pitting the subjective against the objective, nurture against nature and darkness against light.

Extending this to my own life begs the question as to whether I am fulfilling the simulations in which I am performing. As a foster child in my youth residing in foster homes and boys homes I am very familiar with shifting from one simulation to the next and the doings required. I am astute at recognizing that the happiness most people describe is nothing more than happiness at surviving the simulation and getting away with it. Very quickly communication can change from conversation to a statement of purpose. Once adequately indoctrinated into the simulation, individuality slips away into a netherworld of phantasm and fear. As a younger man I had read a book by Carlos Castaneda called A Yaqui Way of Knowledge. I found it to be a sort of "rite of passage" book for males, supporting a mentor and student scenario. In one exchange the mentor Don Juan tells his student Carlos that "life is an impersonal experience". Understanding this statement may be one of very few tools to assist in surviving the eviction from your simulation. It is those evicted from their lives who against their will or desire, come to know how impersonal life is, while searching a new simulation.

Simulacrum is certainly a defining aspect of the gender dialogue if it can be called a dialogue. The simulation of masculinity itself has been and is being reshaped into a diverse product selection that ranges from conscripted killer to cuckold to criminal. Change to male consciousness is promoted in a much more aggressive process than empowering. Fuelled by a simulation of misandry the legislative and legal machinations in our society are furthering a cause that renders many men emasculated from their previous and current simulations. You may attempt an amendment to the truth with another study of whatever truth you are seeking to define, the truth industry is always for hire. Or you may attempt to amend the truth at the top of your lungs. You may battle the tentacles of simulated truth or buy her flowers. But you will not defeat the simulation or it's ghost, without defeating yourself.

So pervasive is the effort to reshape the male paradigm, to own the simulation, the corporate branding and marketability, the very existence of maleness and it's utility, that a war of control has been mounted on males of every age group. The war against the youngest of males, those most vulnerable, our sons, has been carried out with the use of psycho active drugs. Between 1960 and 2010 and particularly since the advent of a diagnosis referred to as "attention deficit disorder" the drug Ritalin has been added to the arsenal of feminist simulation to advance their war against a "patriarchy of mass destruction", to find where it is hidden. During these fifty years the prescription of this drug to our sons has increased 700 fold and in comparison to girls at a rate of 4 to 1 . Together with a social policy called zero tolerance that redefines educators as behaviour police males are being shown the exit door to their own epigenetic experience.

A book with a unique perspective called "Freakonomics" by authors Steven Levitt and Stephen Dubner, carries a by line on the cover that reads, "A Rogue Economist Explores the Hidden Side of Everything". In their book the authors suggest a correlation between legalized abortion in the U.S. and the reduction in projected and actual crime rates during the Clinton Presidency. It is interesting and controversial, certainly an unexpected hypothesis of available statistics. It is a stark contrast to the claims of the politically motivated who may only seek to enlarge their cache of stem cells. Not unlike the beauty products produced with the harvested foreskin of circumcised male infants. There is however a disturbing resonance in such a hypothesis that may be pertinent to a current crisis that has been highlighted and somewhat publicised but otherwise ignored. The as yet unstudied correlation between the drugging of our sons with the psycho active drug Ritalin, a drug known to atrophy the brain with prolonged use, and the subsequent decline in College enrolment of our young men?

It is unequivocal that there is a war mounted and ongoing against males. The protagonist in this war is represented by a disembodied ideology claiming injuries actual, intended and implied. Based on de facto beliefs in the physics of size, it mires our sensibilities such that we are able to identify the criminal before the event of the crime with primary aggressor laws. So insidious is this notion, that by simply typing the term "silver bullet technique" into Google, of the 499,000 results returned, the first result describes the most effective method to winning a divorce dispute, is too make the primary aggressor law work for you.

Statistical evidence has been shaped with contrived studies and unasked questions that only now are being challenged with intellectual honesty and a new found integrity within academia. Still from the battlefield we are yet to reveal or accept the true violence expressed in this war. Violence by proxy has been served by police batons, tasers, policy and legislative prejudice.Families and futures washed away by a masculo/feminist chivalry expressed from affordable and safe positions of power, tenured in wealth and socio-political esteem. We reside in the sphere of a police state that sees only one crime, maleness, evidenced only by gender it is maleness that is sentenced to not exist. No doubt these murderers of the masculine would and have responded with an age old reply. "Am I my brother's keeper"? As men are ground into the fodder of social engineering under the thumb of law to redecorate the Patriarchy with Matriarchy one wonders. Is it worth the gender-cide to validate an accusation of privilege?

No, Now This You REALLY Have to See

Paul Elam · 2 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Even with all the nonsense life manages to deliver, like watching a trainload of men get assaulted by women who have police there to enforce their criminality, there are some really bright moments.

Like right now.

Our brother RulaZ is releasing an album of his music; pure and raw zeta rock to the last song. And by referencing A Voice for Men, he honors me and pays homage to all of you. He has taken the pain and frustration we all feel and sent it screaming out through balls to the wall rock and roll, complete with scorching guitar riffs and lyrics that pull no punches.

The album can be pre ordered at I-tunes by going here:

http://itunes.apple.com/de/preorder/on-the-mend/id404297753

The album is 8.99 Euros (less than $12.00 American) for 20 groundbreaking songs.

Am I going to support him by getting my own copy?

Oh, yeah. Betchurass I am.

This You Have to See

Paul Elam · 2 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Straight from the “I could not possibly make this shit up,” department. This video shows men being assaulted en masse by women aboard a train in Delhi NCR’s Gurgaon area, India, for entering a “woman only” car when the rest of the train was full. It reeks of a “back of the bus” mentality, and a state apparatus that is perfectly prepared to see it carried out on its own citizenry.

Worse, it appears at the end of the video that some of the men were ordered to do squats in retribution for their transgression, and to further their humiliation.

And they fucking did them!

This will go into the files to be rerun at next years Bash a Violent Bitch Month, in October of 2011.

Since I need to point it out for the mentally unemployed, Bash a Violent Bitch Month is not advocacy for unprovoked violence. It is self defense advocacy for men who are treated exactly the way you see happening in this video. These women are openly assaultive because they know they can act with impunity, and for no other reason. And these men are role modeling life as punching bags and door mats for their children.

Bash a Violent Bitch Month is a satirical title, but addresses a very serious subject.

Some words on Abortion and the MHRM

Paul Elam · 3 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Someone once said, "Never discuss politics or religion." Obviously they never had a discussion about abortion, which manages to raise hostilities at the mere mention of the word. And a whole lot more.

We got an example of this recently on the pages of this website when I submitted, despite being personally opposed to the practice, that the editorial position here would be that an anti-abortion agenda would not be acceptable for article submissions, and would not be included in the revised mission statement to come in the future.

I got called a baby killer (figuratively). And that by someone I'd grown quite fond of over a period of years.

Whatever abortion is, it is not something people take lightly.

That intensity is magnified exponentially when you consider that this website is a growing part of a growing movement involving many men and women, but one where the responsibility and authority for editorial decisions rests solely with one person. I suppose I am a smart enough fella. Not smart enough to please everyone all the time, but smart enough not to try.

It's a potential tinder box on minor issues, much less one as incendiary as abortion. So after having taken some time to digest the reactions and consider the future of this site, I want to take the opportunity to clarify policy and rationale. I do this knowing that fires are still smoldering and subject to instant flare up.

The question that I took into consideration for this as foundational was, "Does anti-abortion activism, as opposed to sympathies with those efforts, enhance or diminish efforts to advocate for men and boys?"

My personal opinion leans heavily on the side of diminishment. First there is the problem of political affiliation. As already stated in the rough draft of the policy I wrote, the AVfM position on mainstream politics is clear. They won't be part of the equation here except to point out that all popular political groups are misandric and antithetical to the cause.

Abortion is highly polemicist, with the mainstay of its opponents squarely on the neoconservative religious right.

Socons, as we call them. It's a group with more nuts than a pecan orchard, and most of them would love nothing more than to have all men chained into a state sanctioned marriage (between one man and one woman, of course), which is to say they would ultimately make slaves of all of us.

Sometimes the enemy of my enemy is just another enemy.

My personal opinion is that the MRM should not officially embrace causes that will attract mainstream political ideologues. My personal decision is that AVfM won't, for sure. It will be more in keeping with policy here to run them off with a stick. I think I take that position for sound reasons. During my time as Editor-in-Chief for Men's News Daily, I was accused, regularly, of being a right wing demagogue. To be fair, I was accused of being a leftist sycophant from the other side as well.

It's what happens when you refuse to join the circus or follow the thinking of people who educate themselves on sound bites from cable news channels. But, I digress.

The point here is that making abortion a part of the AVfM mission is a prescription for infestation by those who also undermine men and boys. It's like turning over a jar of honey on a picnic and then taking a nap. That is not going to happen here.

Then there is the matter of LC4M. As long as women have unencumbered power and authority over abortion it also gives them equally hegemonic dominion over men for the bulk of their adult lives. In fact, child support is the primary instrument by which state functionaries assume and maintain iron fisted control over the lives of men in western culture. We have an entire father's rights movement necessitated by the fact that millions of men have had their lives eviscerated, their freedom forfeit, their assets garnisheed, even where paternity fraud has been proven and acknowledged by the courts.

If a man is even in the general vicinity of a pregnant woman, his life can and will be completely undone. The only possible solution to this, however unlikely, is the cause of reproductive rights for men. And however doomed that cause may be, it at least can be a vehicle to start educating men to regard their sperm as property every bit as sacred as their blood. And it is a path that Karl Rove and his chivalrous ilk are not going to walk on right into our public identity.

I want to point out, though it hardly seems necessary, that the editorial policy of this site doesn't stop anyone from throwing abortion directly into the faces of feminists wherever possible. I know it won't stop me. Feminist hypocrisy with abortion is one of many intellectual and moral weaknesses they are inextricably bound to. They can be savaged with the issue at any time they bring it up, and even when they don't.

But the point here is smart activism, not the most strident or flag waving; certainly not the most pigeon holing. Someone on this site, I believe it was the illustrious Dr. Snark, recently commented that we needed to be philosophical chameleons. I agree with that assessment entirely.

Abortion is a universally polarizing and defining issue, one that can be used to dismiss, anyone, at any time, as a religious zealot bent on the control of women. That comes the territory when your main cause happens to be anti abortion, but it is not like the MRM needs any more of that.

So it will not be a defining cause of the MHRM in my opinion, or of AVFM, in fact. In that light, I see no value in chaining myself, or this site, to anti abortion activism, and a good many reasons not to. I know, for those who feel deeply about this issue, this will not suffice as an explanation. Nor, for some, would any explanation do that did not result in a mandate for me to be in the street, waving a "BABY KILLER!" sign and frothing at the mouth.

So if there are to be some fireworks on this, let it be now. I will do my best to keep my mouth shut and enjoy the show. And any readers that cannot abide by this, I understand. I wish you well, and I appreciate your efforts on behalf of men and boys. I just can't, won't actually, join you on this one.

The Irrationality of Feminism: Remembering the Sokal Affair

Theodore Labadie · 4 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago I was talking with a feminist of long acquaintance about our different reasons for going to school. I wanted to learn something useful and dig myself out of poverty. She, quite to the contrary, had no interest in learning anything useful, only to learn how "to talk like academics" having overheard their discussions around town in cafes and the like. They had impressed her, using a language with unfamiliar words whose meaning she could only guess at, discussing such "impressive" and esoteric subjects as the construction of femininity in literature. Although she's never read Simone du Buvoir I'm certain that she would agree with her thesis that our understanding of the female mind as a consciousness quite different and distinct from the male mind has no origin in biology whatsoever. As I understand the theory, the female mind is completely an artificial construct forced on women by culture.

Which is nonsense. Women are not made; they are born. It should be inconceivable that the sex endowed with the biologic machinery to gestate, breastfeed, and nurture infants would not by necessity also be endowed with the mental machinery to use their sex-specific organs of procreation for maximal genetic and evolutionary advantage and it should not be a surprise that this template informs their entire psyche. Yet, this is exactly the message we get from the academy: there is no such thing as human nature.

The study of the biological provenance of human nature was at one time called sociobiology, but feminist and leftist propaganda has so demonized the word that it can no longer be used safely. Instead, euphemisms like "evolutionary psychology" were invented, but they too are used only with difficulty and with great resistance from most leftist academics. I remember reading how the progenitor of sociobiology, Edward O. Wilson, a venerable old Southerner who is perhaps the world's preeminent biologist and a writer of Pulitzer Prize-winning caliber was assaulted by members of the leftist International Committee Against Racism who dumped a pitcher of water over his head during a conference, chanting that he was "all wet." Good thing they had never heard him say, "Karl Marx was right, socialism works, it is just that he had the wrong species."

So much for the sanctity of reasoned academic discourse. But to my mind, there is no event that better illustrates the intellectual poverty of leftists and feminists and in particular the language they use in our institutions of higher learning than the Sokal affair.

In 1996 Alan Sokal, a professor of physics at New York University, became dismayed by the lack of intellectual rigor in the humanities and by the pervasive notion that science was socially constructed—an unprivileged method of acquiring knowledge. Determined to do something, he submitted a paper to an interdisciplinary postmodern journal, Social Text. The paper, "Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity," was a hoax. It was purposely crammed with obscure leftist and feminist jargon, appealed constantly to academic authority through the prodigious use of quotations, made outrageous scientific claims that anyone with some knowledge of physics would recognize as suspicious, and although grammatically correct was completely impenetrable. It made no sense at all. The paper was accepted uncritically and published without peer review. Here's a taste:

One characteristic of the emerging postmodern science is its stress on nonlinearity and discontinuity: this is evident, for example, in chaos theory and the theory of phase transitions as well as in quantum gravity. At the same time, feminist thinkers have pointed out the need for an adequate analysis of fluidity, in particular turbulent fluidity. These two themes are not as contradictory as it might at first appear: turbulence connects with strong nonlinearity, and smoothness/fluidity is sometimes associated with discontinuity (e.g. in catastrophe theory); so a synthesis is by no means out of the question.

Every statement makes an unsubstantiated claim, except, apparently, in Sokal's use of quotations which seem to be always taken out of context in a cut-and-paste approach to mimic the evidence-follows-claim convention of academic writing. Yet the evidence is false and nonsensical, in no way explaining his postulates. For example, what does he mean by “nonlinearity” in the context of an “emerging postmodern science” and how is it evident in chaos theory, phase transition theory, and quantum gravity? Phase transition is the transformation of the physical state of matter from solid to liquid, liquid to gas, etc. It is not a theory; it is a fact that anyone can observe by watching ice melt. In the sense that effect immediately follows cause (as when you apply heat to ice it turns to liquid water) it is also perfectly linear. As to quantum gravity, I’ve read that there’s no evidence as of yet to show that it actually exists. It’s still only a gleam in some scientist’s eye. Being non-extant there is only one thing that quantum gravity can say concerning the philosophy of science or even of society: nothing.

On publication of his paper Sokal exposed his hoax in the journal Lingua Franca. The editors of Social Text immediately cried foul and added a misplaced criticism of Sokal’s writing style. They missed the point, entirely. Sokal’s intent was to write badly (and think badly) yet have his poor scholarship overlooked due to its superficial accordance with leftist ideology. It is very simple: most people will accept anything uncritically provided that it sounds like something they already believe.

The Sokal affair is described as famous but I have never heard anyone in the academy, student or instructor, discuss it or even to have heard about it without my introduction. I suppose this is because leftists find the Sokal affair so deeply embarrassing. They should. It exposes the deep poverty of intellectual discourse in our universities, a pry bar laying waste to rusting scrap, the impressive language so admired by my feminist acquaintance hot air.

I should point out that Sokal is not an anti-feminist. In fact, he is a leftist who wanted to point out that his compatriots were shooting themselves in the foot by accepting uncritically the kind of claptrap he parodies in “Transgressing the Boundaries.” No matter. A writer takes what he needs where he finds it. I suppose I should also disclose that at one time I uncritically accepted the label of “leftist,” though no longer. I am neither left nor right, only a man who out of life desires nothing more than for his mind to be completely free of false convention and ideology. And although such perfect freedom may be, as it is with the possession of perfect truth, unattainable it is nonetheless a very worthy goal on which to base a silly little life. There are indeed some people who will die for the fact that 2 plus 2 equals 4.

The entire text of Sokal’s “Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity” is available in pdf form here.

Dowry death and bride burning: A look beyond the smoke screen (MRM India)

Uma Challa · 5 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The phrase “bride burning” conjures up images of a cruel husband and his family members dousing a young woman in kerosene, flinging a lighted matchstick on her and gloating as the hapless bride goes up in flames. The term “dowry death” also sparks off vivid imaginations of a woman being taunted and harassed for money and finally, hanged to death within the four walls of her house. We also have watched movies and TV serials where a malicious mother-in-law poisons the unsuspecting daughter-in-law’s meal or quietly causes a gas leak and locks the new bride in the kitchen right before she lights the stove to make tea for the family.

There must be many families who burn their brides for dowry as a routine practice otherwise, why would there be so many news reports about dowry deaths? As they say, there cannot be smoke without a fire. Right?

Feminists would have you believe that every unnatural or untimely death of a married Indian woman is dowry death. Not only that, the feminist hyperbole on “bride killing” and “dowry harassment” makes it look like Indian men have an uncanny propensity to commit violence on their wives for money, while men in other countries commit domestic violence for other reasons.

In reality, it is the number of registered suicides of married women which are passed off as statistics of dowry death, and even these numbers are almost always exaggerated. It has become a custom to claim that all the women have been “driven to suicide” due to dowry harassment.(Links No.1-6) The husband and in-laws are immediately arrested under IPC Sections 304B and 498A and incarcerated for a couple of weeks to several months without bail. They are promptly subjected to media trial and labeled criminals even before investigation or trial can begin.

Even if all the noise about Indian brides being “driven to suicide” for dowry is indeed well-founded, one would expect that the number of suicides of married women would be significantly higher compared to that of unmarried women. However, the National Crime Records Bureau’s statistics show that there is no significant difference in the rates of suicide by married and unmarried women.

Justice Saldana’s remarks (in Crl.A. no. 589 of 2003) are testimony to how anti-dowry laws are being misused to the detriment of innocent citizens:

> …we need to sound a note of caution that the police and investigating authorities should not improperly and technically jump to the conclusion that merely because death has occurred that ipso facto a criminal offense has been committed . In as many as 44% of these cases prosecution is thoroughly unjustified. Unless there is cogent and convincing evidence and unless there is material to sustain these charges, it would be totally impermissible and completely unjustified to embark upon legal action. The consequences of these charges are extremely grave because the accused husband and invariably family members are placed under arrest. There are serious social and economic repercussions.

> The fact that we do come across considerable number of instances where prosecution was unjustified seems to indicate that in every case of death of young woman or recently married women that prosecution and filing of charge sheet has become automatic. There does not appear to be a proper application of mind at the stage of scrutiny and having regard to this position we direct the concerned authorities to ensure that requirements of the law are correctly and responsibly followed.

It is important to note that more than 56,000 married Indian men end their lives every year. According to statistics obtained from the National Crime Records Bureau, every year, twice as many married men, compared to women, commit suicides unable to withstand verbal, emotional, economic and physical abuse by their wives and in-laws.

Deaths of these men make for the brief stories we often read in newspapers stating that a certain man “killed himself due to family issues or financial problems”. (LInks No.7-12)

Thanks to the concerted efforts of the feminists, thousands of men are also becoming victims of “legal terrorism” unleashed through laws like Sections 498A and 304B of the Indian Penal Code, Protection of Women Against Domestic Violence Act, adultery laws, laws against rape and sexual harassment, and even divorce, maintenance and child custody laws. Many men are ending their lives unable to endure the fear, humiliation and trauma caused by the legal harassment.(Links No.13-18)

While it is insisted that the death of every young married woman is a case of dowry death requiring immediate arrest of the husband and in-laws, accompanied by media-hype, male-bashing and breast-beating, driving thousands of men to commit suicide is considered social service in India.

Feminists have always wanted “dowry harassment” and “bride burning” to remain hot issues that fuel the Indian Domestic Violence Industry.

The feminist Taliban will surely burn in rage as we look beyond the smoke screen and call their bluff.

MRM: Hiding in Plain View?

Tom Givens · 7 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

After much discussion with Paul Elam about the state of the men's movement, pop culture, and the way forward, I've formed the opinion that we MRAs are, at best, little more than hands on a broken tiller. I have contended in the past, and I still do, that history will judge the 'turning point' in the Gender War as being sometime before the middle of next year. I personally think things are snowballing enough, quickly enough, that early next near politicians the world over will not be able to avoid these issues anymore.

I'm sure that's not a surprising thing to hear, and probably your only quibble would be with the timing. I say that timing is based on the 'straw that broke the camel's back, that is/will be when all these unemployed men, with no benefits other than welfare left to fall back on, will have run out of things to sell. And then, they will be facing homelessness. And getting more and more angry at the entitlements given women.

But these things don't come out of nowhere, and to date, the men's movement has been largely invisible, and when not invisible- painted as villainous sexism. So where will this cultural awareness, this impetus to effect change, focus its efforts? How will all these angry men know who to get angry AT?

My contention, as an MRA, is that they already know. My contention is that the Men's Movement is literally nothing more than that first guy to stand up and say something. Once that happens, all the other guys (in order of confidence) will then stand up too- if the first guy doesn't get his head cut off.

We MRAs have had our head cut off….a lot. But, we grow new ones, and get back up. And now, other guys are standing up too, and not getting their heads cut off. And it is for THIS reason alone that I think we will see exponential growth in progress on men's issues. After all, you can only be heard if you have a head, and more and more of us are keeping them.

Another aspect of our discussion revolved around the concept of popular culture, and the acceptance of the MRM as worthy of attention. Many here and elsewhere seem to believe that our concepts, the injustices we identify, and the criticism we level are neither accepted widely, nor seen as anything but whining. I contend that not only are most of our concerns reflected in popular culture, nearly all of them are, and so much so that not seeing it is likely a matter of cognitive dissonance.

Take music, for example. We all know of the Eminem / Rhianna take on DV, which could have been taken straight from an MRA site. We mistakenly attribute that to 'broken clocks are still correct twice a day' type thinking. I say mistakenly, because a good portion of society is concerned about certain aspects of daily life. There ARE people who are concerned about male suicide, for example, that still firmly believe in The Patriarchy(tm). There are even people who are concerned about nearly all of the things we MRAs are, that don't identify with (or even show awareness of) the Men's Movement.

Sometimes, that person is in a band. Like The Shins, for example.

I have to confess, I got the idea to write this while listening to this band, so I apologize for the obvious segue. I haven't kept up with them for the last couple of years, but I recently ran across a couple CDs, and after giving them a spin, I figured I'd share with you folks.

Here's a song called "Girl Sailor". Read these lyrics, then tell me it doesn't mirror your feelings on the matter exactly:

The Shins – "Girl Sailor"

The gutter may profess its love,
Then follow it with hesitation,
For there are just so many of

You out there for rent

A stronger girl would shake this off in flight,
And never give it more than a frowning hour,
But you have let your heart decide,
Loss has conquered you,

You've won one too many fights,
Wearing many hats every time,
But you won't win here tonight,

You've made it through the direst of straits alright,
Can you help it if plain love now seems less interesting?
You haven't changed an ounce in my eyes,
And I cannot lecture you,

And does anything I say seem relevant at all?
You've been at the helm since you were just five,
While I cannot claim to be more than a passenger,

But, you've won one too many fights,
Wearing all of your clothes at the same time,
Let the good times end tonight,
Oh girl, sail her, don't sink her,
This time,

Just a moment or two from now,
Not a mind will retain even a trace,
Of the thoughts that I struggled to tell
And how our stack of cards just fell,

So settle this once and for all,
The light no longer shows the cracks around my door,
And I have no lantern to light your way home tonight,

You are not some saint who's above,
Giving someone a stroll through the flowers,
You've got so much more to dream of,
Oh girl, sail her, don't sink her,
This time,
This time,
This time.

I've struggled on many an occasion to put into words exactly how I feel about what feminism has done to relationships between men and women. I've also struggled to put into words the disillusionment that becoming conversant in Game brings a man. Not only do The Shins put these complex issues into clear focus, they do it in what is probably the most difficult timing a song can be in. This is a band for intellectuals, and high-level musicians – and yes, that does mean it's not as catchy as Ke$ha, thank God.

Folksy stuff not your bag? You prefer a little more synthesizer and booming to acoustic guitar? How about a little Industrial music? There's a band by the name of KMFDM that I listen to regularly. You may recall them as the band largely blamed for Columbine (which compelled the band to rename themselves MDFMK), even though a hallmark of the band is what could best be termed 'violent pacifism'. For as far back as I can remember, this band has had fairly leftist viewpoints…ones that I heartily agreed with (and still do – SURPRISE!, I'm a lefty!)…but wait, look at some lyrics from their latest album:

KMFDM – "Bitches"

All these years, all this time
We have been messing with your mind
You thought us Noble, Right and True
You just don't have a fucking clue

All the humor, pun, and wit
A heaping, steaming pile of shit
With a smile and a wink
We make believe our poop don't stink

Rip the system, revolution
Adding fuel to your confusion
Gobble up the crap we feed you
We don't really love and need you

We just want your cold hard cash
Get our hands into your stash
Now shut up, listen, and behold
Finally the truth's been told

[Chorus:]
We're only in it for the money
To dip our fingers in ya honey
We pretend to no end
We are bitches for your riches

My tide and the audacity
Of a handsome crook from Germany
A million sheets of patient paper
Chronicle his every caper

You never had us figured out
Lend stature, relevance and clout
Even called us pioneers,
When really we were privateers

You reveled in our plagiarism
Joined into the organism
Your pompousness and indecorum
Spewed on every online forum

How you dribbled, how you drooled
Priceless how we had you fooled
We hijacked your bedazzled souls
For ransom 'til we made it gold

[Chorus]
We're only in it for the money
To dip our fingers in ya honey
We pretend to no end
We are bitches for your riches

We're only in it for the gain
Sex and drugs, and rock and roll fame
Jewelry, luxury
We are jammin' for your ….

We're only in it for the encore
We want it all, and then some more
All our deeds, plant the seeds
Prime booty is our duty

We just want your cold hard cash
Get our hands into your stash
Now shut up, listen, and behold
Finally the truth's being told

We're only in it for the drugs
The … never burns
Can't get enough to stuff
The artifice of avarice

We're only in it for the money
To dip our fingers in your honey
We pretend to no end
We are bitches for your riches
We are bitches for your riches

There are countless songs like this out there, and while the phenomenon may be nothing new, the frequency is increasing. These songs are resonating with the public…you know, all those people who don't know about us, or 'agree' with us?

These social memes are out there. The sentiments of the MRM are universal sentiments. Frankly, I think there's even merit in completely disbanding the MRM altogether, in some ways. Our sentiments certainly aren't exclusive to us.

All we are, remember, is the first guy in the room to stand up.

Men and Violence: Blaming the Blameless

Paul Elam · 8 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The scholars at the Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSMM), a division of the American Psychological Association, have for some time been asserting a simple philosophy about violence and all other manner of social woes. It comes in two parts.

Men are the problem. Men are the solution.

Most recently, they posted an article tellingly titled, "Violence is a Men's Issue," to goodmenproject.com. It is another in a continuation of efforts on their part to promote the idea that "toxic definitions of masculinity," are the root culprit of much of our cultural violence, and that we must band together as men and confront each other till the problem is ameliorated.

All the article does, in reality, is provide a prime example of an egregiously thoughtless worldview, driven not by concern about violence, but by a mandate to promote a blind and sexist political ideology.

As you take the short trip through the conflated, convoluted and contradictory lines of that piece, penned by Christopher Kilmartin, you will need to irrevocably suspend your common sense, not to mention your sense of decency, to agree with any of his conclusions.

To begin with, toxic masculinity, as stated in the article, is defined in the most lacking and muddled of terms. Kilmartin writes, "In gender-based violence—rape, intimate partner violence, etc.—these definitions of manhood include an especially strong dose of dominance and woman-hating. And these definitions are supported by the men they associate with, and the culture at large."

First, one must wonder, in a culture where the "vast majority" of men are non violent, where does the support from the "culture at large," come from, women?

Furthermore, intimate partner violence is not "gender based." And the assertion that it is can only be regarded, in the least impolite way possible, as pure nonsense. There are volumes of research that point conclusively to the fact that women are as often, or more often than men, the initiators of IPV.

While men are often more successful at causing injury than women, it does not detract from the fact that all violence, physically injurious or not, can result in emotional harm to the victim and to children, regardless of the sex of the perpetrator. As most people are aware, it is not about the bruises to the body, but to the psyche- to all those involved. Actual physical harm is serious, but treating the greater incidence of female injuries as though they encapsulate and define the IPV problem in its entirety is myopic at best, ideologically disingenuous at worst.

It is born of gender tunnel vision, where only one victim, one kind of pain and one perpetrator is visible.

Also, not even rape is gender based, particularly in the legal sense. We are currently experiencing an epidemic of female teachers that are sexually molesting – raping – their underage students. And given that we have a massive male prison population, where the probability of rape is 1 in 5, it is clear that the victims of rape are not exclusively female, and they could well represent the overall minority.

In attempting to attribute the problem of violence to toxic masculinity, Kilmartin, in moment of clarity, rightly suggests that ideas linking testosterone to violence are flawed. He writes, "[R]esearch into the biological correlates of violence doesn't support that hypothesis."

But then he goes on to say that, "Research into psychological factors has been much more successful," without citing a single study. There is a good reason for that. The studies don't exist.

Let me repeat that. The studies don't exist; much less provide an example of enhanced success.

So rather than fabricate our ideas about social problems from within the miasma of postmodern fantasy, why don't we just take a look at what we already know? Violence may be a difficult problem that evades quick solutions, but the root causes of it are far from misunderstood. They are, in fact, common knowledge in circles that value academic integrity.

John Monahan, Ph.D., a professor at the School of Law, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, provides a well articulated synopsis of the variety of precursors to violence that have been well studied and documented. And in his observations he also notes that men are more often arrested for violent offenses.

He writes, “We know that the overwhelming majority–close to 90 percent–of the people arrested for crimes of violence is men and that despite enormous changes in gender roles in recent decades, this figure has not budged for as long as criminal records have been kept. Indeed, there is no place in the world where men make up less than 80 percent of the people arrested for violence, now or at any time in history.”

The difference between Monahan and SPSMM is that he does not attempt to deduce, out of thin air, that these numbers have anything do to with masculinity itself, toxic or otherwise. He even honors our intelligence by sticking to what he can prove- arrest rates. They do not speak completely to the incidence of perpetration, as women are far less likely to be arrested for violent acts.

Monahan also notes that “We know that the arrest rate–and the victimization rate–for violent crime for African-Americans is now about six times higher than for whites.”

Would this information serve as motivation for Kilmartin, et al, to conclude that there is a “toxic blackness,” for which all African American’s need to start confronting each other?

Monahan didn’t go the way of bigotry, for blacks or for men as a group. Instead, he took the much higher path of enlightenment and pointed to the known culprits:

Poverty, lack of education, history of abuse, substance abuse, lack of parental supervision. (all referenced and sourced in Monohan’s article)

It’s a fascinating list, and one that points to the real common denominators shared by men with blacks and other minorities, almost all of which are rooted in poverty and disenfranchisement.

Males who are physically abused as children are more than twice as likely to eventually be arrested for a violent crime. Similar spikes in risk can be found for males that are uneducated, homeless, chemically dependent and fatherless.

Now consider that males, as a group, are substantially more susceptible to all these risk factors than women. Men and boys are falling by the wayside academically, largely due to the neglect in our education system of boys as a whole. More boys than ever are technically fatherless, depriving them of needed supervision and the positive male influence. Men are more prone to be afflicted by substance abuse and alcoholism, and they make up the vast majority of the western worlds homeless population.

And Kilmartin would have us believe that all this is a product of masculinity run amok; that it is, in essence, John Wayne’s fault.

And in doing so, he reveals a either a dangerous ignorance of what masculinity is about, or perhaps a dangerous indifference to it. He is blaming the victim, or at the very least, blaming the blameless. Yes, men, as a group, cannot be collectively blamed for anything, unless the pointing finger is on the hand of a bigot.

The common theme among men is and always has been about protection and provision, particularly for women and children. For every violent man who threatens the peace in our society, there are countless other men that will face him down to put a stop to it.

SPSMM released a statement after the Virginia Tech tragedy where a lone gunman took the lives of 32 students and faculty in 2007. Again, toxic masculinity was to blame. In a statement issued by SPSSM, signed by President Mark Stevens, Ph.D., they concluded, “Therefore, although most men aren’t violent, most violent people are men who were influenced by exaggerated notions of masculinity…"

Again, they make this claim without a single shred of evidence supporting its authenticity. And again, it was for the same reasons. It was a political statement, not a scholarly one. And it ruled out any other cause for the rampage other than what the tenets their ideology would require. It was not, nor could it have been, psychosis or other form of mental illness. It was not a deranged gunman, but a toxically masculine one.

Of course no mention was made of the many men who faced death to go on to that campus in order to stop the killings. That is masculinity for you. The only kind there is. Men who stray from the protect and provide proviso to become attackers and harmers aren't toxically masculine. They are un-masculine, as is easily observable by anyone with unbiased intentions.

Despite Kilmartin's assertions regarding toxic masculinity, that the dysfunctional definitions of manhood "[A]re supported by the men they associate with, and the culture at large," the evidence in the world around us abounds with a contrary reality.

Rape and destructive violence in men is a breakdown in masculinity, not an academicians imagined perversion of it. Just like a woman throwing a newborn in a dumpster to die, out of sheer convenience, is not a form of "toxic femininity." It is a complete failure of feminine instincts.

And were we to find anything in masculinity to fault for the violence of men, we would only do so at the expense of everything we depend on in them. Violence, or the capability of it, is a requirement for the ability to protect. Ask any soldier or police officer or husband who hears a window break at 2:00 a.m..

Ask any of the women they protect.

If we want to reengineer men to be less violent, then perhaps their role as congenitally selected bodyguards is the first thing that needs to come into question. Perhaps we should confront men about their universally common knee jerk reaction to protect others in distress, even if violence is required. And perhaps we should confront women for selecting men with such capabilities.

If we are not going to acknowledge the true causes of violence, we may well be getting on that road, with help from Kilmartin and SPSMM.

Feminism's Victim Complex- and Consequences

John Hembling (JtO) · 8 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Organized feminism as a movement is about 40 years old. It's the same age that I am. During my lifetime, I've been told, various things, some true, many false. Among them is a message from organized feminism that rape is endemic in the society of which I'm a part. Further, that this rape is my fault, mine personally, for being a member of a class of oppressors, and violent, depraved, sub-humans.

Rape is actually defined by some of our social institutions as a crime which only one sex is subject to, and that fault for this belongs to the other sex, the one I'm a part of. Domestic violence too – another crime popularized as mono-directional abuse of the members of one sex, by members of the other. I will be citing research refuting this common knowledge as we go forward.

Although partner violence is committed by members of each sex, the legal system in the United States pretends that only women are victims, and only men are perpetrators. [1] A Harvard Study conducted in 2007 indicated that in nonreciprocal partner violence, women comprised 70% of the offenders in a sample of 11,000 individual surveyed. In reciprocally violent relationships, the same study indicated women are more often the initiators of violence, 25% versus 11% for men.

In spite of this, and similar research, the violence against women act in the United States fast tracks conviction for men in situations of domestic abuse, circumventing the due process required by legitimate criminal courts.

This law exists despite the fact that men are more likely than women to be victims of violent crime –including rape. According to the United states Department of justice, bureau of justice statistics [2], In 2008 21.4 violent crimes were committed against men for every 1000 individuals, while 16.7 were commuted against women. This difference in rates of victimization by sex has been diminishing for many years. In 1980, 68.3 male victims of violent crimes stacked up against 33.1 female victims of violent crimes per 1000 individuals.

How many times have you seen messages in corporate media addressing violence against men?

The answer is probably zero, while messages addressing the supposed epidemic of male-on-female violence permeate our media, creating a public perception sharply in contrast with research indicating that "women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners"[3] .

As a man I am constantly told that because I am male, I'm a violent criminal, an abuser of women and children, and a rapist. I've also had drilled into me the knowledge that a simple accusation of rape, true or not, leveled against me by a woman will destroy my life, career, and family. I've seen the wreckage of other men's lives following their destruction through false accusation.

I know how dangerous it is for me to be alone with a child, not dangerous for the child, but for me, based on the hysterical fear manufactured in our society that every adult male is a secret pedophile just waiting for opportunity.

This is the soup we all swim in.

Some men have reacted to this climate of fear and loathing by adopting a position of prostrate atonement. Women are angry, men are to blame, so an attitude of ritual male self loathing and self flagellation is assumed. By being more vocal and strident than their feminist counterparts, these males create themselves as honorary women, accepted conditionally on their continued self abasement. Some men simply try to keep their heads down, and avoid offending the women in their lives. Some men see this climate of vilification and reject it.

This is a tiny fraction of the male population, but a growing fraction. That these men are rejecting the mechanisms of control through social prestige and social shame is a topic I've discussed before. What I haven't examined prior to now are some of the consequences of a growing fraction of the male population who make a thoughtful choice to overrule their own biological drives, which until now have been used to force conformity to behavioral norms.

Throughout human history, men have been disposable, this is the natural outcome of being the sex which doesn't bear children. Unlike women, men do not have a factory for making new human beings within their bodies. Women's bodies are less specialized than men's. In addition to eating, moving around, performing work and so on, women's bodies are also capable of fabricating tiny new human beings within them. This capability requires nutritional and metabolic resources as well as structural specializations.

Men, whose bodies don't have this functional capacity are more specialized for high stress, high risk activities. This is why men are typically stronger than women and have different emotional needs and responses. This is basic sexual biology, no matter what the social constructionists say. Through the greater part of the history of our species, the physical strength and size of men compared to women has conferred on them the necessary prowess to be the protectors of the family units they were a part of.

Also to hunt, persistence hunting being the oldest known form of hunting, and the skill that places humans with their lack of claws or large teeth above all others in the food chain.

I'll talk in more detail about persistence hunting in another discussion. But this social role, informed by biological differences also made males individually more disposable than women in the calculus of group survival. Feminist scholarship recognizes the continued disposability of males in high-risk jobs such as soldier, lumberjack, oil rig worker and so on, but characterizes these jobs as high status, or high pay, disguising the fact that they're the jobs men die doing. [4] In 2009 in the United States, 93 percent of workplace deaths were male. This is not discussed in mainstream journalism, but organized feminism uses the media to continue to loudly push the discredited claim that the wage gap exists due to discrimination, rather than individual choice.

In fact, the [5] "wage gap is not proof of widespread discrimination, but of women making choices about their educational and professional careers in a society where the law has granted them equality of opportunity to do so," according to Diana Furchtgott-Roth on April 12, 1999 in testimony given before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Throughout the history of the human species, men's individual disposability was balanced by the tribal and familial necessity for the capabilities of men. That individual necessity for group survival increasingly diminished by advances in technology and the evolution of social institutions.

On the other hand, women's reproductive and nurturing capabilities are the reason women form the core of human societies, starting from the family unit of mother, child, and then male protector. It's the reason that in primitive societies, women of reproductive age were more individually valuable than males, and why in hunter gatherer societies a clan or tribe would survive the loss of many male members while a clan would not survive a similar loss of females.

Men and women were each valued for what they could do, but for women, the ability to bear children trumped all.

Does this mean that in a modern context women are of no value other than reproductive? No, but as the reproducing sex, women have always been the reproductive and sexual selectors, while men have always competed to be selected for sex and reproduction.

Technological innovation and population growth has, in the past several thousand years, radically reduced the need for highly dangerous and physically stressful work as a necessity for survival. Men as individuals are just as disposable as they've ever been, but are far less individually necessary in the calculus of group survival.

Radical feminism is the political and social manifestation of this cold reality. Women are just as necessary for human survival as they've always been, and so a redistribution of privileges, powers, and entitlements within human societies is a natural social adaptation to the underlying calculus of the reduced survival importance of the utility of males.

Women are still the social class around whom society wraps physical protection – as evidenced in mandatory military service for males, but not females, and evidenced in the socially normal expectation on men to provide physical protection to female companions, without a reciprocal expectation on women to protect their male companions.

This is further demonstrated in legislation like the Violence Against Women Act, a set of laws which flies in the face of law enforcement statistics demonstrating that intimate partner violence is coequally committed by men and women.

It's evident in the differential treatment of men and women by the legal system. [6] As a New York family court Judge pointed out recently. Women are also the class to whom financial and material resources are allocated. This is demonstrated in the spending of disposable income in our society. Regardless of whether men or women spend –disposable income is spent mostly on women. Department stores know this, and devote 75% to 85% of their floor space and displays to women. [7]

In her 2007 book, the 51% Minority, Feminist author Liz Wiehl states truthfully that women control the economy, spending 80 percent of every discretionary dollar. In addition, women control the outcomes of elections outnumbering men as registered and participating voters. [8] According to the Centre for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University, In 2004, 60.1% of women and 56.3% of men voted, while in 2000, 56.2% of women and 53.1% of men voted. But despite this preponderance of spending and political power, we are always reminded by organized feminism, that it's women who are oppressed.

Let's return for a moment to consider that torrent of accusation, vilification and manufactured blame against men that we know by the label of radical feminism. This seemingly new narrative of accusation is really just the amping up of the long established societal mechanism for social control of individuals through shame and prestige. It's amped up because in a highly technological society, men, those specialized, physically strong, risk taking members of our human race are less individually valuable than they were in the less technological society of the past.

I mentioned that some men are choosing, consciously, to opt out of this game of social prestige and social shame.

These are the zeta males.

Why have men always been the class to assume the physical risk of being society's protectors? Partly physical capability, but partly also a social contract in which men were valued for their role as risk taker, protector and provider. As masculinity is increasingly treated with scorn, derision and vilification, this old social contract is breaking. A man who doesn't step up to protect a woman menaced by some kind of threat is, by traditional standards, not much of a man.

Accepted masculine identity requires risk and possible injury in defense of a threatened female. Refusal on a man's part is treated by society as unmanly failure, a source for social shame.

The zeta male however is not playing that game, understanding as he does, that while he's expected to assume that risk and damage, the side of the social contract compensating him and valuing him as a man is no longer operative. The zeta male's identity is one developing around conscious evaluation of behavior's risk and reward, and disparaging of traditional social control through shame or prestige.

A practical consequence of this is that a traditional, ingrained behavior – that of assuming personal risk in the protection of women; is being questioned by men.

Questioned and rejected.

To be sure, the onus to selflessly, thoughtlessly assume a position of self sacrifice and service is rejected by very few men, and the world is still populated by white knights eager to discard personal interest in the benefit of women. That's the old biological balance of sexual power at work.

Men however, are increasingly waking up to the dystopia of a world governed by radical feminist ideology. Self sacrifice fails the simplest cost benefit analysis in a world where masculinity is increasingly the basis for social, political, economic and legal hobbling.

Manliness has always encompassed the assumption of self sacrifice, and traditionalists will be quick to call men defining themselves apart from it as unmanly, weak, selfish, along with many other pejoratives intended to shame these man back into compliance. To those detractors – I will pre-emptively offer the suggestion that they should worry about themselves and try to stay out of our way, because the zeta male is coming, in fact, some of us are already here in the future, and not waiting for the world to catch up.

Are You a Chooser or a Competer? Sex Differences

Paul Elam · 9 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist academicians, for as long as there have been feminist academicians, have been insisting that gender is a social construct; that there is no innate biological difference between men and women and that everything we do is a product of socialization. Of course, that is just bullshit. Throughout the animal kingdom there are plenty of examples that stand in stark contrast to feminist views, held religiously close by the ideologies followers. Check out this cogent and reasonable video, rooted in the tenets of human sociobiology.

Gender War

By Uma Challa

Ding Dong Bell
Frog in the well
She pulled his hair
You think it is fair?
He screamed his lungs out
As he was being thrown out
Who goes to jail?
It's Johnny, without fail
Oh what a nasty bitch you are
To gloat on a gender war!

Nothing Really Matters

By Kevin Carr

In the end,
nothing really matters
except for the mistakes and petty weaknesses brought to surface
by exhaustion or dismay.

What is done is done,
payment is forever
without exception.
No excuse is good enough, no nonjudgmental stance acts as shield from the judgments of the never judged.

No forgiveness is forgiven, no supporting stand for those that fail or fall is left unpunished
by abandonment, or remembered
when the gavel falls.

What is sown is reaped regardless of intent,
no fertile compost

will bring nourishment to soil razed
in accidental flame.

No supporting act will be repaid
in currency or kind,
the wheel turns around with cold vengeance ready to annihilate.
No escape is possible
from the bonds of history.

No price or premium
insures against the past,
no payment is enough to allay a liquidation earned by failure.

In Exorcism

By Nergal

Her eyes tell lies that only you can hear lulling you to sleep before she disappears
And upon her hands is the blood of a child
She says she's an angel, but her wings are defiled

Her mouth is a pit, it has teeth of steel
Chewing your soul til you're unable to feel
Cast upon the screen is a dying lamb
It writhes and bleats in the theater of man

When the sedatives drain into your veins momentarily blotting out the pain memories of snakes that crawl into your bed
Dance like the sweet angels that crawled into your head

Her lips are the color of adultery drawing you inside until you cannot breathe
You struggle in the snares but you can't break free
She calls you a monster,but she knows it's envy

In exorcism,in nomine Dominis, EGO dico super Lucifer ut orior oriri ortus quod recipero vitualamen.

The smoke of the gun sculpted in your hand
it's the only way out before it ends
And upon the clock is the face of her doom
A matter of time before the evil consumes

Oh, little snake only I can forgive wipe your slate clean to absolve you of this
Your tear-stained face is a mask and excuse
Your little ticket to help explain the abuse

She crawls like a worm,but scaly and dry shedding off her husk like the tears in her eyes
And baring her teeth when she slithers away
I turn to my angel, and I kneel to pray

In exorcism,in nomine tenus Principatus , EGO dico super Lucifer ut orior oriri ortus quod recipero vitualamen.

The cost of freedom

By TDOM

The words run ‘round my head
What the poet* once said
“Find the cost of freedom buried in the ground”
It’s arisen from the grave
Taken the form of a slave
And once paid cannot be found.
Wars fought in its name
Still try to proclaim
The cost is not so high.
Yet freedom itself is the price to be paid
To conceal the government’s lie.
Communism, drugs, organized crime
Excuses, none sublime
For theft of liberty and justice from some
If accepted mean slavery for all.

The Feminist Failure to Redefine Manhood

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 10 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

For over half a century feminists have attempted to redefine manhood and masculinity by characterizing traits that they consider to be predominantly masculine as destructive, and then attempting to replace them with traits they believe to be more acceptable. These attempts have met with utter failure.

At the same time, feminists have successfully managed to redefine womanhood. There are many ways to look at the reasons why they have been so successful on the one hand, while being complete failures on the other. One way is to examine the changing relative value to society of both men and women.

Historically, the value of men as a group has been relatively equal to the value of women as a group, while the value of the individual woman has been higher when compared to the individual man. Men have been the providers and protectors, while women have been the nurturers and child bearers. The superior size and strength of the male has made him better suited for his role while reproductive biology has made the female better suited for hers.

The frequency and risk associated with reproduction has added value to the individual female, while subtracting value from the individual male. Coupled with the risk to women from pregnancy and childbirth, a society could hardly afford to add the additional risk of the role of provider and protector. A society might be able to survive the loss of a substantial number of men for a generation, it would be far less likely to survive the loss of a substantial number of its women due to the length of time it would take to replenish the population after such a loss. This meant that the individual man was more expendable than the individual woman, all of which made the man the logical choice for the role of provider and protector.

Women have limited reproductive ability and reproduce slowly. This was once a high risk endeavor. It is no longer. Technological advancement has significantly reduced the risk. Larger numbers of women surviving childbirth (and lower infant mortality) have reduced the need for quantity of reproduction among individual women. This has allowed individual women more opportunity for other pursuits, such as assuming the role of provider and protector. The assumption of this role has increased the relative value of the individual woman and women as a whole. Thus the rise of feminism and the demand to be permitted into areas of society once reserved for men.

The entry of women into these areas has made women less dependent on men for survival. Combined with technological advancements that have reduced the risk for men (fewer men dying as a result of war, work, and disease), there are more men than ever before in competition for fewer women, as many women have removed themselves from the reproductive marketplace. This phenomenon has created an excess of unnecessary men who hold little value to society and rendered men as a whole to be of less value, and therefore more expendable than ever. Thus, the relative value of women, both individually and as a group, has risen compared to men.

The solution to this problem can come in one of two ways.

Many second wave feminists proposed a culling of the herd. They saw little value or need for men beyond their reproductive necessity, as women would prove to be as good as, if not better than, men at everything men used to do. They also examined the negative qualities of men and viewed them as a violent threat. The population of men, according to the second wave feminist, had to be reduced and controlled. Valerie Solanas was not the only feminist to propose this. Her SCUM Manifesto was simply the most extreme and most widely known. Aside from the feminist proposal, a major war or plague might accomplish the same thing, i.e. eliminating a large percentage of the male population, thereby returning value to the individual man.

The second potential solution would be to find value for these unnecessary men by redefining manhood and masculinity. This has resulted in many attempts to redefine men from a feminist perspective. None have succeeded. This failure could be attributed to two factors. Men are what they are, and what they are not is feminine. Attempts to redefine masculinity in terms that the feminine would find acceptable are bound to fail. The second factor is that feminist attempts to redefine masculinity have rarely included value for these unnecessary men without diminishing the value of other men. The requisite for any feminist redefinition of manhood is the statement that there is something wrong with manhood and it needs to be fixed.

What the feminist perspective ignores are the very factors that allowed women to redefine themselves. First, technological advancement added value to women and allowed them to break out of their traditional roles. Pregnancy, childbirth, and child rearing became safer and less time consuming, allowing women to expand their role in society, making them more valuable. The new definition of womanhood includes the old definition. Attempts to exclude it met with utter failure. The housewife remains a viable option for women and single motherhood is also now an option, as is the non-mother, career woman.

The inclusion of the old definition with the new is what allowed feminism to gain the almost universal acceptance of women. The persistent attempt to redefine manhood by rejecting the old definition rather than incorporating it into a new definition is doomed to fail just as the exclusion of the old definition failed in the attempt to redefine womanhood. One cannot simply point to a few characteristically male traits, determine that they are unacceptable, then eliminate them from the equation as if they never existed. Feminists demand that men become something they aren't.

A second factor in the failure of feminist redefinitions of manhood is that they have subtracted value from masculinity rather than adding value to it. What made the redefinition of womanhood appeal to women is that they added value to womanhood. They turned womanhood into something more than it was before. Instead of using this same successful strategy with masculinity, they have done the opposite. They have attempted to discard the old definition and have subtracted value with the new ones.

It is why they have failed.

Any attempt to redefine manhood and masculinity, in order to be successful, must include the value of the old definition and add value by expanding the definition rather than contracting it. By doing this, it would return the balance between men and women to its natural state. Men as a group must be of equal value to women as a group, even if the individual woman holds more value to society than the individual man. Men must be permitted to be men and their role must increase their value. A feminist definition of manhood will never accomplish this.

If manhood is to be redefined, men must redefine themselves and they must do it on their own terms.

Countering APA Mythology: A Response to Christopher Kilmartin at The Good Men Project Magazine

Paul Elam · 11 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I posted a response article here to Christopher Kilmartin's article at goodmenproject.com, where he not only asserted that violence is a "men's issue," but justified that position by alleging that men, as a monolithic group, are actually culpable for the problem of violence in our culture.

It isn't just a men's issue, but it's men only; a boys club. And we all need to call each other to account for "our" denigration and violation of women.

I also submitted my response to Henry P. Belanger, Senior Editor of The Good Men Project Magazine, and to his credit he has published it (with reasonable edits).

As you can also see here in the comments to my original article, Kilmartin, a member of the Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSMM), aka Division 51 of the American Psychological Association, an organization of gender activists, posted a comment expressing his frustrations at what he called my "distortions," of the subject. He also posted a list of studies and invited me to scrutinize them, saying "After you read them, I will look forward to your reasoned criticism of the scholarship."

I think this presents a unique opportunity. First, it is good to see the people of SPSMM reach outside their insulated academic enclave and take their ideology into forums where disparate views are allowed and encouraged. I also note that while I do not agree with some of the material presented in The Good Men Project Magazine, I am encouraged that its management is clearly not interested in an editorial orthodoxy and is willing to showcase a badly needed discussion directly in view of the public. Their support for this could provide a unique opportunity for increased public awareness of some very serious issues.

So rather than just respond to the studies posted by Kilmartin to this site at this time, I am opting to wait until he, or anyone else from SPSMM has had the opportunity to rebut the current article posted there from me.

I will respond in kind, and will certainly include my reactions to the studies provided in the comments here. And I will continue to respond as long as SPSMM does the same. This is an incredibly important subject, both in ideological and real world terms.

I expect, should the scholars at SPSMM allow their views to be vetted by the reading public in an open forum, there will be several comments from readers of this and other MRA sites. I would like to respectfully suggest that those responses be civil and within the Terms of Service for The Good Men Project Magazine.

Human Rights Day: An Indian Fraud

Paul Elam · 11 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Note: I recently posted a video involving men being assaulted by women at a Delhi train station. The video used here is a different, more expansive one. -PE

December 10th is officially recognized as Human Rights Day by the United Nations. Nations from all over the world are encouraged to measure themselves in respect to their contributions to the human rights movement; to assess their progress and learn from their shortcomings. It's a day for pundits and politicians to make arguments and take stands, and it will inspire some, as it has in Cuba, to take to the streets in protest of rights still not recognized.

Unfortunately, the day will also be used for disingenuous political grist; for a ruse presented to the world, painting a picture of progress where none exists, or where even slippage from human rights is the actual course of events.

India is now the shameful example of that. It's commitment to civil rights is now officially confined to photo ops and spurious political rhetoric, painting only the thinnest veneer over the fact that the largest democracy in the world is now the most virulent enabler of segregation enforced with violence, with men as the targets.

First, here is a picture of what India wants the world to see.

It's so posed it could double as a post card, or the cover to a "We are the World," album.

But now let's take a look at a different India; the real India, where forgetting your place as a man and stepping on a train car reserved for women will get you beaten, while police oversee the abuse and encourage it.

There is India's true stand on human rights. Only women are regarded as human.

It might be hard to understand why these men, who committed the sin of entering a woman's only train car when the others were full, would stand by and take such abuse without defending themselves. Sure, the police/thug enforcers are certainly deterrents. But it is likely possible that there is another reason.

All I had to do to understand was to think of my father.

He was a veteran of two wars, complete with bullet holes, white phosphorus scars and pieces of shrapnel embedded in his back. He was also a golden gloves boxer. Not someone to be messed with. But I think he would have taken the slaps (if not the humiliating squats) just like the men in the video. In his time it was unthinkable for a man like him to hit a woman, even when under attack.

But he was a man when men were honored for what they did. He didn't grow up and live with forty years of people telling him he was a pig, and that everything he did to protect women was just a cover for oppressing and abusing them.

Now me, however? I am quite certain that I would have cold cocked the first woman that lay a hand on me, and taken down as many attackers as I could, male or female, police or civilian, before I went down, which I am sure would have happened before it was over.

I think that is the effects of feminism and misandry, if the two really are distinguishable. I don't feel bound by a code to protect women, sacrifice for them, and certainly not to be their punching bag because they think I got uppity and forgot my place. I watch this video and only see the disgrace of hired thugs posing as law enforcement, of immoral women gone drunk and stupid with power, counting on the fact that the men still regard them as untouchable.

Keep it up, India. Eventually your men will lose their reverence, and their fear, and then you can celebrate Human Rights Day at the train station, with blood on the platform.

And I will not fault your men for one drop of it. Even a dog will come out fighting if you put him in a corner long enough and kick him.

Super Bowl Hoax: The Continuing Distortions about Intimate Partner Abuse

Teri Stoddard · 12 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon="none"]Ken Durden / Shutterstock.com[/box]

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) is pleased to announce an upcoming event to commemorate the Super Bowl Hoax. "Super Bowl Hoax: The Continuing Distortions about Intimate Partner Abuse" will feature a series of presentations designed to highlight how domestic violence half-truths and misrepresentations continue to the present day. The event will be held on Thursday, January 27, 2011 in Washington DC.

These distortions of fact have become deeply embedded in American culture,and cause harm to the many offenders and victims of domestic violence who are being denied the services and protections they need.

The event will be held at the Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave NE, Washington DC 20002. The event will be held 12:00 – 1:30pm. Attendance is free, and advance registration is required. Email your name, organization, and telephone number to Teri Stoddard, Event Manager: tstoddard@saveservices.org .

The Super Bowl Hoax, which occurred in 1993, falsely claimed that more women are victims of domestic violence on Super Bowl Sunday than any other day ofthe year. The public outcry arising from the hoax spurred passage of the Violence Against Women Act the following year. A complete account of theSuper Bowl Hoax can be seen here: http://www.snopes.com/crime/statistics/superbowl.asp

SPSMM Responds to Paul Elam

Paul Elam · 13 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSMM) editor for the Good Men Project Magazine (unnamed in the article) has responded to my rebuttal of Chris Kilmartin's blanket condemnation of masculinity in the piece entitled, "Violence is a Men's Issue."

The purported gist of the response, as I understand it, is that since some men are violent that it looks bad for all men. And that consequently we should coalesce, as men, to confront it within our ranks. But unfortunately the author quickly and erroneously mischaracterizes the nature of my argument. "Mr. Elam wants you to think about the issue in terms of men vs. women: who's more likely to start violence, who's more likely to engage in violence, and who's more likely to get hurt," is offered to readers.

Actually, between myself, the person who wrote those lines and Kilmartin, I am the only one doing just the opposite of what is alleged. My contention has been clear throughout; it is not "men vs. women" but perpetrators vs. victims. It was SPSMM that narrowed the view of societal violence through a gender specific lens, managing only to acknowledge and address male perpetrators and female victims. How much more instigating of a men vs. women mentality can you be than that?

I certainly did bring up women's perpetration of IPV. It was the necessary counterbalance needed to address the divisive and significantly biased nature of Kilmartin's offering. And it should be part of any rational discussion on societal violence.

In my attempt to rattle loose the prejudicial nature of the 'men only' approach to dealing with violence, I offered the question of whether the significantly higher incidence of arrest for violent crimes in the African American community pointed to a condition of "toxic blackness," for which the African American community should intervene on its own. It is clearly an idea I find lacking.

The response to this was, "Black communities throughout the U.S. have found a myriad of ways to try to prevent their young men from becoming violent and thus being killed or incarcerated (admittedly, some programs have been more effective than others). Kilmartin is arguing for the same: that we, as men, find ways to help other men refrain from violence."

And of course this misses the point entirely. The African American community is certainly seeking ways to prevent their young men from becoming violent, but I have not heard of a single community effort that targeted "blackness," toxic or otherwise, as the source of the problem. And yes, Kilmartin is arguing for more of the same. The African American community also has problems with violent and abusive women, like every other community. And like every other community that violence is scarcely acknowledged as a problem. Regardless of the good intent, it feeds the misconception that violence is the exclusive province of males, and it leaves the same trail of unrecognized, traumatized adults and children in its misandric wake.

Finally, and most disappointingly, the response ended on the ironic note of mandated gender roles, and not without a somewhat personal shot at me, as written in the following:

"This seems to be especially problematic for Elam, who believes that men should "abandon any notion of commitment to women or vulnerability to them," and who is "anti-marriage and anti-commitment to the core."

To be fair, this is a very accurate representation of my beliefs, even though obviously served up as an attempt to shame.

My sentiments are pro equality and anti gender roles. I remember well the same year that we landed a man on the moon that the help wanted ads were divided clearly between men and women, reflecting higher and lower paying jobs respectively. It was an arrangement, while understandable in a world that demanded male bread winners, that was no less suffocating the ambitions of women who wanted to choose the path of self reliance and self sufficiency.

We have come a long way since then, and I laud those changes. No one should be forced, by public policy or social coercion, to live up to expectations based simply on the sex they happened to be born with. It is unthinkable in a world striving for any sense of personal freedom and justice.

But as we keep learning that we still haven't learned, that should apply to men as well. I am not, nor are my fellow males, the congenital bodyguards assigned to protect women- even as we strive for their "equality." If that path is chosen by a man, so be it, and I find no fault in it. But that path coerced or followed under duress is nothing but evil. Telling me that it is "my job" to protect and provide for my equals is no different than telling a woman in an office to fetch the coffee for all the men, or that she should not be allowed the same pay for the same work.

So I reassert that SPSMM is misguided in it's efforts. A few violent men does not make all men look bad. And a few violent women does not make all women look bad. It all makes violent people look bad. Unless, of course, you are simply looking to play a game of pin the tail on the scapegoat.

Until we start getting this, and address our problems as a community of equals, we are only perpetuating the same old sexism under a different guise.

I didn't much like it in 1969, and I don't much like it now.

War=Good, Sex=Evil

B.R. Merrick · 13 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Did you know that Julian Assange, founder of WikiLeaks and traitor to the "These Colors Don't Run" crowd, likes sex? Did you know that it is now confirmed beyond any doubt that he has had sex at least four times in his life, with at least three different women? Did you know that before having sex with two of these women, he stopped foreplay long enough to roll a condom onto his erection? Well, if you didn't, I'm here to tell you what you desperately need to know, in order to make sense of the War on Certain Kinds of Terror, a war that, before it is finished, may very well lay claim to everything you've ever known. Not content with ruining the economy and running on lies, this war may very well call into question, on the part of a government supposedly "of the people, by the people, for the people", the very existence of the Internet.

Yes, it may only be a matter of time before the corporations given control of the Internet are called upon, as VISA, MasterCard, Amazon, and PayPal have learned, by the government they support and believe in, to yank "objectionable" material off this pesky thing for good. They will never learn, and they will never stop. There is too much money to be made, and too much security given by getting into bed (so to speak) with the world's most successful mafias. But more importantly, the prosecutors of this never-ending war want you to know one thing: Julian Assange has a sex drive, which makes him less of a hero and more of a pervert.

Assange's sex drive is dirty, disgusting, and rapine. His free-thinking mother never bothered to explain to him that a man's sexuality must be thoroughly tamed by a woman, who has remained a virgin until their wedding night. And now Assange, by virtue of being a dirty, disgusting male, is accused of rape. The government of the United States is so angered by this charge that they have put themselves behind an international warrant of arrest for Assange, and they have succeeded. It's a victory for feminism, and a refreshing sight to all of us who had lost our faith in the mafia of government, a crime family that sat on their hands all morning on 9/11 and failed to do a single thing for which they steal our money. But that's not important. What's important is what Assange — who has blood on his hands (according to bloody-handed politicians that ought to know how it looks, smells, and tastes by now) — wears or does not wear on his dink.

Before Assange, the media in bed with bloody-minded politicians got quite a lot of mileage out of destroying Tiger Woods, another man who has (gasp) had sex. It's true that Woods's sexual behavior led to a divorce, but the only thing that concerns me is that children are involved, and they will never get over that divorce. Try counting the number of articles you've read that discuss in any detail the trauma that his kids will now suffer with for life. Should be fairly easy. Now count the number of articles describing in detail their father's sexual dalliances, and explain to me how these articles will help them cope with the sudden, shocking reality that Mom and Dad don't really love each other.

Is Woods entirely to blame? I don't really know, and I'm not going to play Armchair Divorce Judge. It's none of my business, after all. I can tell from his press conference last year, however, that he's not the slightest bit interested in determining how the whole mess started: "Buddhism teaches that a craving for things outside ourselves causes an unhappy and pointless search for security." Then stop eating, sleeping, having sex, accepting endorsement deals, watching movies, and generally enjoying the world in which you live, most of which can be found outside the self. No pets, either. No wonder the children aren't mentioned in any of these articles. According to Buddhism, you shouldn't enjoy them either? Is the divorce going to cause any "unhappy and pointless" searches for security on the children's part? Geez, this is boring and unpleasant. It's much more fun to talk about their father's sexual escapades, so back on topic we go.

It appears that American Buddhism teaches much the same thing about sexuality that American Christianity does: You should feel somewhat bad and weak for enjoying it, especially if you're a man. I also suspect that a father like Earl Woods, who started coaching his son before he was out of diapers, may have been the type of father who applied numerous systems of coercion to get his kid to be as good at golf as he became. It is highly unlikely that any child prodigy is given much leeway with his free time. Sex would undoubtedly be something that would make a dead man feel alive again. But Buddhism, like Christianity, never goes there. It always goes someplace else, like a politician desperate to wipe the blood off of his hands onto the nearest passerby.

Now that people care less about Woods and more about Assange, let's have an endless debate in the media about the fact that Assange also likes dirty, disgusting sex. More than one million people are dead due to the murderous policies embraced by many people in government, but we can save that for, oh, let's say ten years from now, when we can find a way to blame it on the free market or voter apathy. Surely by then, everyone will have forgotten about the collapse of World Trade Center 7. For now, it's about un-Christian, non-Buddhist sex. (At least all those dead Middle Eastern men have stopped having it.)

In the London Daily Mail, an intriguing article was written about the whole sordid affair. It is clear, once you reach the end of it, that the charges are as baseless and pointless as the false rape accusations against the Duke Lacrosse players. Regardless, there's this gem: "This is only one of several puzzling flaws in the prosecution case." Yes, indeed, it is puzzling, unless you've already drawn the conclusion that I have: It's a load of crap and these women are liars. Just in case they're not (and I have a greater chance of winning the lottery twice after pigs learn to fly), this article gives the women pseudonyms. But why are they using the pseudonyms Jessica and Sarah, when Justin Raimondo over at Antiwar.com has already given us their full names? (And if any article sums this thing up better, I'd like to see it.)

Interestingly, at the masthead for the Daily Mail, there is a link for "Femail." Just go to that link to find all sorts of crucially important "news" items centered on and around women:

"Emotionally cut off. Physically strong. Sexually aware. How does a mother cope when autistic boys grow up?" Yes, their autism is all about you, Mum.

"I waited years to have first child, says tumour mum, and I've spent £30k on her." Well, she'll have plenty of false security to help her cope with the lack of real security coming from her mother.

"Liz Hurley… shows off her lacy side (but the sheer shirt and bra combo fail to make the style grade)." Bitch. How dare she?!

"For Wills and Kate, the bishops' guide to a happy marriage." Look at his parents. You're screwed. The numerous systems of coercion to which you are both subject are likely to drive your husband into the arms of Tiger Woods's ex-sex partners. Learn to grin and bear it. There will be plenty of false security to help you cope with the lack of real security from your husband, or from his grandmother, who will probably like you about as much as she did his mother.

Is it any wonder, reading this garbage, that there have been dozens of articles written about Assange having sex with two gorgeous Swedes, but very few about more than one million dead people, and millions more displaced? Are you even aware that 1 in 5 Iraqis was displaced? Are you aware that the former population of Iraq equaled California? Are you cognizant of how radically different any Californian's life would be if he were to go to work one day to discover that 1 in 5 of his coworkers had simply disappeared, and that an occupying army with an incomprehensible language was wandering around on the street outside? Forget it. Back to Assange's Nights of Unbridled Anarchist Passion.

We know far more about Mr. Assange's sexual proclivities than we ought. The same can be said for Woods; for Paul Reubens, who was arrested for doing nothing wrong; for Bradley Manning, who may or may not be gay, none of which is any of our business; and yes, I hate to say it since the man is a politician, even for Senator Larry Craig, who was arrested and humiliated in front of millions for being a closet gay and sticking his fingers under a bathroom stall wall.

(And let's just jump off once more for a second. Why, if so many heterosexual men have a problem with fingers being run under the stall wall, and other such horrific events, do stall walls still fail to go all the way to the floor?

For that matter, why, to this day, do stall doors still have cracks in them wide enough that you can usually see some part of the stall user's body as he's sitting on the toilet? Why doesn't someone do something about this, like they did in Little America, Wyoming, where each bathroom stall is a separate room with a goddamn lock and a full-sized door? Okay, back on topic.)

"Clearly, he is responsible for an avalanche of political leaks. Whether he is also guilty of sexual offences remains to be seen." No, it doesn't. He's innocent. What remains to be seen is exactly how long men will continue to take this nonsense. I doubt it's much longer, especially given the tone of this next phrase:

"…[H]e is certainly a man of strong sexual appetites who is not averse to exploiting his fame." He may also very well be a desperate man with mild sexual appetites, who has no home, who is subject to numerous systems of coercion to which he is not entirely accustomed, that threaten every hour that he is conscious to end what is left of his life, and a little sexual relief might just be one of the few things he has left to make him feel alive and manly. Certainly, that can also be true. So why the conclusion about him thinking of himself as a sex god of some sort?

When an article that paints Assange as "a man of strong sexual appetites who is not averse to exploiting his fame" can't find a single thing to substantiate the rape charges, what are the chances that a single male reader will not see this as a wake-up call? What is the possibility of men continuing to support or believe in a government that uses these false charges as an excuse to nab someone who has embarrassed them? The government and its media, desperate to milk the non-existent-sex-scandal angle as long as possible to distract attention from the bloodshed, are counting on us being just that stupid, that we won't see through it. Allow me to show you some of what you're being sold, just in case you actually are that stupid.

The article cannot defend the rape charges. It is obvious that those responsible for writing, editing and publishing this article know it. Therefore, the admission of innocence is carefully couched: "…there remains a huge question mark…" "Again there is scant evidence — in the public domain at least — of rape, sexual molestation or unlawful coercion." In that last sentence, "scant" is synonymous with "no," and the phrase "in the public domain at least" means "outside the memories of two thoroughly untrustworthy witnesses who are obviously lying."

The article claims that one of these women was someone "with whom he was having a concurrent fling." There is nothing "concurrent" about two one-night stands in a row. But now Assange is painted as a womanizer who practically did a three-way with two women who were each unaware that the other woman was lying on the other side of the bed. Now Assange is a "cheater" and a "pervert" as well as a "traitor." Enjoying this so far?

[image]They post a big picture of Assange, just in case no one has seen his lithe, Aryan form before, posing like a successful model, but the faces of the "victims" are blocked out, and they're given pseudonyms, even though their names have been printed elsewhere, as I mentioned above. The message: This man likes pounding it good and hard, with as many women as he can get, but the "victims" must have our protection until the system of coercion in which we trust has run its course. They can and should be forgiven for enjoying getting it good and hard. They are, after all, victims, at the very least, of someone who was in a position of authority, and being women, they were quite naturally in a position of inferiority, even though men and women are equal.

More juicy details, then this sentence: "Afterwards, she hung around and was still there when Assange — who has a child from a failed relationship around 20 years ago — left with a group of male friends for lunch." There is no reason, of course, to bring up a failed relationship or a "bastard" child, except to remind everyone that Assange is a sex fiend, who squirts out kids left and right, for whom he feels no responsibility. Disgusting.

"Jessica [not her real name] asked if they would meet again. 'Of course,' said the WikiLeaks supremo." See? Assange was in a position of authority (probably bangs on top), and the writer is simply reminding us that as far as the dastardly WikiLeaks is concerned, he's the head honcho, the big cheese, numero uno, the buck stops here, yada yada yada.

[image]"A few hours after that party, Sarah apparently Tweeted: 'Sitting outside … nearly freezing, with the world's coolest people. It's pretty amazing!' She was later to try to erase this message." This is all the governments of the United States and Sweden need to know if they're truly concerned about whether rape occurred. Since we know it, they know it, Assange knows it, and his two sex partners know it, then we also know what these governments are actually up to, and we ought to know what the people who published this article are up to.

If you continue reading this salacious play-by-play (that unfortunately leaves out the most pornographic details… maybe the next article), you will also stumble upon one of feminism's goals, ready to be put into practice by the People's Government of Sweden: "Sarah [whose real name is Anna Ardin] next spoke to a newspaper, saying: 'In both cases, the sex had been consensual from the start but had eventually turned into abuse.'" In other words, what "Sarah" wants is to prosecute a man based on her testimony alone. "Sarah" has no scars on her body, no hidden camera or microphone recordings, no witnesses, and no evidence of any wrongdoing. What she has is the testimony of the accused, who has admitted to consensual sex, and the testimony of the accuser, who also testifies that "part" of the sex was consensual. Twice.

If a case like this goes to court, it essentially turns women into cops. This is what cops can get away with, at least in traffic court. A cop pulls you over, uses a device no one else can see, writes down what the device says, interviews you in direct violation of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution (which he swore to uphold and defend when it is convenient for his purposes), and shows up in court with nothing but his testimony. Yes, he has a video camera in his car, but all that does is verify that he pulled you over and asked you questions. If you don't say anything against yourself, the officer will have you convicted of an offense based on nothing but his testimony. And cops, like women, are scrupulously honest. As the ancient Romans used to say, "Fuck habeas corpus."

The article asks us: "So what to make of a story in which it's hard to argue that any of the parties emerges with much credit?" You get it? Assange had sex with two women over a matter of days. This offense precludes him from getting any credit, for showing the world the murderous nature of war and the dishonesty of their ruling elite, for suffering at their hands, for having to run year after year from country to country and seeking a little solace inside an inviting, warm, wet, safe, feminine place, as she softly coos and moans while he fully experiences his manhood. Disgusting. No credit for you! Come back after you've had a Tiger-Woods-style press conference. Pig.

The ruling elite, who bungle every war, who steal tons of money, who regulate everything to death, who lie, who cheat, who have tons of sex, who pretend they don't, who mangle everything they've touched, who are routinely exposed by journalists like those at WikiLeaks, could not engage Julian Assange on the facts. Therefore, they invented a scandal, with the aid of two silly-headed women, out of thin air. They did this because the shame of sexuality, especially male sexuality, is so ingrained in most First World nations (which sprang from a deep bed of Judeo-Christian philosophy), that such a scandal would even be possible. In a world filled with something other than idiots, the baseless charges would never have made it to the press, because it was obvious they were made up. The only reason they have done so is not because anybody believes them (outside a few radicals, perhaps — even prominent feminists are abandoning these women), but because millions still believe there is something wrong with what Assange did in bed. What he actually did was seek a little relief. It is unfortunate for him that he is unmoved in the same-sex direction, where seeking a little relief seldom carries any baggage at all, and never a baseless charge of rape. If it's possible to be guilty of something good, then it appears that Assange, like all other victims of society's disdain for dick, is guilty of being a heterosexual man with a conscience. Why don't we put him on trial for that? At least there would be some honesty about what's happening, and some reasonable chance of convicting the pervert.

Jessica Valenti Calls for End to Presumption of Innocence, Due Process

False Rape Society · 14 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Valenti: America should model rape laws after Sweden's — where some legal experts want to make sex a presumptive crime whenever a woman cries rape.

Jessica Valenti's take on the Assange sex case in last Sunday's Washington Post was more of the same old same old, a mish-mash of the usual feminist victim blather about America's supposed tolerance of rape.

But then, just as we are nodding off, Valenti tosses a bucket of ice water on us by — it seemed to me (you read it and decide for yourself) — at least tacitly endorsing what would be the most unjust, inhumane, morally grotesque law in our entire jurisprudence. Read carefully what she says:

". . . we should look to [Swedish rape laws] as a potential model for our own legislation.

"In fact, some activists and legal experts in Sweden want to change the law there so that the burden of proof is on the accused; the alleged rapist would have to show that he got consent, instead of the victim having to prove that she didn't give it."

Valenti, who, by the way, is not above resorting to the cheap feminist trick of calling a rape accuser "the victim" (which means, of course, that the accused must be a "rapist"), seems to at least tacitly endorse turning the most fundamental act of intimacy, an act that has been performed countless times every minute of every day of every year since the beginning of time the world over, into a presumed felony.

Read that again. It's not hyperbole. Under the plan proposed by some Swedish legal experts, once a woman cries "rape," the accused male would be sent away to prison for many years unless he could prove consent.

What would this mean in practice? In many rape cases, there is no significant evidence aside from the testimony of the accuser and the accused. Under this plan, if the jury doesn't know who to believe, as is often the case, the male would be guilty because he is unable to meet his burden of proof.

He will have lost the trial before it has begun.

From a legal perspective, such legislation would do an end run around one of our most cherished rights — the right not to testify against oneself. At present, a prosecutor is not permitted even to suggest that the jury draw an adverse inference from the defendant's refusal to testify. Under this plan, the defendant would have no choice but to testify because it would be his burden to prove he didn't rape the accuser.

It would be a setback to pre-Magna Carta days.

Reversing the presumption of innocence for consent is the radical feminists' Holy Grail. Linda Brookover Bourque's Defining Rape said in 1989 that the ultimate objective of rape reform is shifting the burden of proof from "the victim" to "the offender." It is the most dangerous, most radical proposal in this entire field.

But, you see, for Valenti and her ilk, there are far too few young men rotting away in prisons for rapes they surely must have committed. If we flip the burden of proof for consent, America, which is already the prison capital of the world, would need to double or triple the number of existing prisons to house the young men guilty by reason of penis. Our colleges and our military literally would become pink ghettos.

The misandry underlying this proposal is so vile, so breathtaking, that it ought to frighten anyone who possesses a Y-chromosome, and anyone who loves someone who possesses a Y-chromosome. All of us need to be alert to the fact that this proposal lurks out there, and that there are committed zealots in this country who would love for it to be the law of our land.

Site Update

[box type="note" icon="none" style="rounded" border="full"]

First allow me to thank those of you who took time to post responses to the debate, here and over at The Good Men Project Magazine regarding societal violence. I had the pleasure of writing the articles that were featured in that debate, but as usual the comments carried the day and once again the scourge of misandry was exposed for the unsupportable social disease that it is. In grand fashion, I might add.

For every decent man and woman that stood to speak, my sincere thanks. You are a credit to the decent side of humanity. And oh, it is not too late to go over there and add your opinion.

And now on to other matters.

As some of you may have noticed there have been a few changes to the site in recent days. I have set up RSS feeds for several of the very select sites that I am willing to give space on this website. Those that do not have RSS feeds have their static links remaining. A banner for Godfather Harry has also been placed.

There are also new social networking options at the end of each article, as well as a Facebook "like" button. Please allow me to request your use of them regularly. They are invaluable and effortless tools for spreading the word.

I have also added a video section for John Hembling's Youtube channel, JohnTheOther, as well as a "Comment of the Week," area that will be changed each Saturday. Currently it features some wisdom courtesy of Keith.

And I am sure you have noticed that threaded responses are now enabled in the comments. It was requested by users and seems to finding good use.

As always, if you have any suggestions or requests leave something in the comments here or shoot me an email.

Man thrown from moving train by police for boarding women's car

Paul Elam · 15 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I posted videos of men in India being physically assaulted by women for boarding a "women only," train car, because other cars were full, while police supervised the beatings. At the time it seemed to me like the shocking display of women's and police brutality against men epitomized the extreme degree of misandry that has come to grip that country.

I was wrong.

An AVfM reader just forwarded a news story to me from The India Times. According to train passenger, Bishnu Basak, he boarded the train at Samudragarh Station in a hurry as it was leaving, not realizing that he was entering a women only car.

According to the news story a constable for the government railway police confronted Basak, demanded to know what he was doing in the women's car, confiscated his ticket, and threw him from the moving train. Locals rushed him to a nearby hospital from where he was moved to the SSKM Hospital. He was then shifted to the Sambhunath Pandit Hospital where he is now admitted.

It is hard, even after years of writing on men's issues, to convey the heinousness of this incident. The only thing that comes to mind in comparison is the story of James Byrd, Jr., who was drug to his death in Jasper, Texas behind a pickup truck after his ankles were wrapped in logging chain in 1998.

Basak lived, but the constable that threw him off the train had no way of knowing he would survive. And while authorities in India have promised an investigation, it will likely not be the same kind that happened after Byrd was murdered.

It is clear, beyond any conceivable notion of error, that this incident is a result of a culture of government sanctioned, no, promoted, violence against men in India. I will summarily dismiss, in advance, any notion that this was just an isolated incident and not sparked by the pervasive mentality of government authorities that men are legitimate targets for unjustified abuse on the supposed behalf of women.

Watch the video if you have any doubts.

We are rapidly moving toward a definition of Gender War that will exceed even the most outrageous fantasies of the conspiracy obsessed. And you will only hear about it on sites like AVfM because the American media is still more concerned with selling tampons and douche than in informing the American people.

The Modesty of Man

Uma Challa · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

"Whoever, intending to insult the modesty of any woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen by such woman, or intrudes upon the privacy of such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both", reads Section 509 of the Indian Penal Code.

Section 354 of the Indian Penal Code prescribes a maximum sentence of two years in prison to a person convicted for outraging the modesty of a woman.

The Supreme Court of India has, on various occasions, elaborated on what modesty of a woman means. According to the apex court,

- Modesty is a virtue which is inherent to a female owing to her sex;
- Modesty is an attribute associated with female human beings as a class;
- A woman, young or old, intelligent or imbecile, awake or sleeping, possesses modesty, which is capable of being outraged;
- Modesty of a woman is outraged when the act of the offender is such that it is shocking and can be perceived as an affront to feminine decency and dignity. Example: slapping a woman on her butt, disrobing her, asking her for sexual favour etc.;
- Mere knowledge that the modesty of a woman is likely to be outraged is sufficient to constitute the offence without any deliberate intention of outraging her modesty.
- Section 354 will apply to all sexual acts committed or intended against a woman that stop short of penetration. (Note: The latest Criminal Laws Amendment Bill 2010 proposes to include ALL sexual acts as rape);
- Lack of protest by a woman cannot be an alibi for the "offender" who has "outraged her modesty".

Women's organizations are also constantly up in arms about beauty pageants, movies and commercials indulging in "objectification" and "commodification" of women and outraging the modesty of women as a class. These gender zealots are of the firm conviction that female models and actresses are rather forced to trade their bodies and prance around half-naked purely to satisfy the perverse desires of men.

I will reserve my comments on how much I agree or disagree with the above laws or views on the modesty of a woman for a later time.

What I wish to point out here is the popular, egregious notion that men have no modesty to outrage, and the reinforcement of this view by our legislature, executive and the judiciary.

A more recent, very alarming trend spreading in India is the full blown attack on maleness and male sexuality in the print and electronic media, a phenomenon I found quite common in the United States.

Today, men and boys are routinely portrayed as idiotic, pathetic, uncouth and inferior creatures who are constantly in need of rescue by their "superior" wives, girlfriends or female relatives who are all set to overhaul them.

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aDKtW7_Hyr8
- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mPwhMoQBg_8

The society considers kicking, punching and slapping men as acceptable and even laudable behaviour on the part of women and girls.

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mhL13x2ZULU

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=jbC1kDUCHBk

Ridiculing male sexuality is considered harmless entertainment, and the few men and boys who protest are considered peevish and lacking in humour.

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4JSeRYDcTgU
- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LdNVuMSKB8A
- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tNE3l2LPiEY

There are scores of men who, upon their modesty being outraged, resort to self-destructive behaviours such as giving in to substance abuse, depression and suicidal urges. One such “humourless” young man, incapable of handling “innocuous” attacks on his dignity and modesty, recently ended his life.

- http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Q9qvNvv92Wk

When I was growing up, I noticed that every time a woman or girl suffered injustice, insult or attack (real or perceived), in the hands of a male, someone would promptly ask the offender, “Don’t you have a mother or sister?” Men and boys in India are constantly reminded of their mother, sister and daughter no matter what another woman is pained about.

I eagerly wait for the day when women will be reminded of their fathers, brothers, sons, partners, male colleagues and friends every time they cause, commit or witness injustice, insult or injury against a man. I look forward to the day when men will shed their silence, stand up and thwart the slightest attack on the sexuality, dignity and modesty of men.

How to Avoid a False Rape Claim

False Rape Society · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes there is nothing an innocent guy can do to avoid a false rape claim. Sometimes he is just in the wrong place at the wrong time. But a significant number of false rape claims can be avoided by exercising caution and staying clear of situations where the likelihood of a false rape claim is enhanced.

When it comes to rape, political correctness gone mad tells us we should not even suggest advising our daughters to avoid certain situations where rape is more likely to occur (they call it "victim blaming" — as if the mere admonition to "be careful" transfers blame for a rape from the rapist to the victim). It would be unfortunate if we similarly hesitated to urge*our sons* to minimize the risk of false rape claims out of some warped, politicized sense of principle. The long-term damage from a false rape claim is so potentially enormous that every reasonable effort should be taken to avoid one. Make no mistake, the onus for a false rape claim is on the false accuser, just as the onus for rape is on the rapist. But failing to discourage our young people from putting themselves in harm's way just to make a political point is something no sane parent should ever do.

Having closely studied the false rape phenomenon for a considerable period of time, we have compiled a short list of situations where the likelihood of a false rape claim is enhanced. We've run similar lists in the past, and we are constantly updating it. A lot of it is common sense. Sometimes, more than one of these situations is present in a given instance, thus increasing the likelihood of a false rape claim.

One important point needs to be made at the outset: the vast majority of women would never tell a rape lie under any circumstance, just as the vast majority of men would never rape under any circumstance.

Here are the situations to watch for:

▲Where the woman will feel a need to deny her consensual tryst to someone important in her life.

This one can't be overstated. It is the foremost reason why women lie about rape. In Prof. Kanin's first landmark false rape study, he found that the motive to cover up a sudden illicit encounter was the primary motivation for false rape claims. It is manifested in a variety of ways, but if you remember the general principle, you should be able to spot the warning signs.

If a woman feels a need to keep the affair from someone important to her, she is more likely to falsely cry rape because she fears the tryst will become known. How will it become known? She might fear that she has become impregnated, or that she has contracted a sexually transmitted disease, or that you will reveal the affair to someone and that it will get back to the person(s) she wants to keep it from. In light of these fears, some women figure that the only way to avoid blame is to make a preemptive false rape claim. It is cruel and heartless to the falsely accused male lover, but, sadly, it is more common than we'd like to think.

Specific situations where this occurs:

(1) Having sex with a woman who has a husband or a boyfriend. Aside from the moral considerations of interfering with someone's marriage or committed relationship, you should avoid this at all costs because it is ground zero for a false rape claim. Even if you think the woman is estranged from her husband or boyfriend, you may not know for sure, and there is always the possibility they will get back together soon. Too often, the innocent male won't know that she's married or has a boyfriend — a cautionary tale about the dangers of bedding a woman you don't know well.

(2) If the woman is young, or if she is still under her parents' emotional thumb and they either disapprove of you or of her having sex. If a girl needs to hide the fact that she's having sex with you from a parent, as most teen girls below college age do, you are playing with fire. Moreover, sex with college-age women or older is sometimes problematic if she is still under her parents' financial or emotional thumb, and if they disapprove either of her having sex, or of you.

(3) If the woman would be embarrassed to let her friends know she is serious about you. If you are the quarterback of your school's NCAA division one football team, chances are, this won't be a problem. If you are a geek who's not very popular but who "gets lucky" one night while you're both drinking, you stand a greater chance of a false rape claim the next morning.

(4) *Group sex where there was one woman and multiple guys.*Think Hofstra. This is a recipe for a false rape claim. Ground zero, in fact. We've seen this multiple times. The reasons are obvious: how on earth can she possibly explain this to a boyfriend, a parent, or a friend? How will she hold her head up on campus? Most sane young women will deeply regret that encounter after-the-fact and will worry that if word got out, it would destroy what's left of her reputation. The fear of "slut shaming," as the feminists call it, seems to spawn off-the-charts regret, and that is a false rape claim waiting to happen. Men should never, ever put themselves in this awful situation.

Divorce and custody disputes spawn false rape claims in order for the woman to gain the upper hand in the dispute.

Spurned ex-lovers sometimes use false rape claims as a tool of revenge. If you are cheating on a wife or a girlfriend, a false rape claim is more likely, and many people will view it as a sort of justified payback.

These situations are sometimes difficult to avoid and give men even more reason (1) not to cheat, and (2) to do a much better job of getting their know the woman before getting serious with her.

▲Where it will be confusing as to whether rape occurred.

The alcohol-fueled hook-up culture is a disaster for both men and women. To suggest that couples should never drink and fool around denies eons of accumulated knowledge about gender relations. Couples often drink to lower inhibitions, knowing full well where it will lead. It's drinking to excess that's the problem, especially for college-aged couples and slightly older. Asking the police or a jury to sort out what happened afterwards based on a "he said/she said" account puts an impossible burden on our law enforcement and judicial apparatuses. Young men looking to "score" in that situation need to understand that (1) when women drink to excess, at some point, they lose the ability to factually and legally consent, and the breaking point is very difficult to discern; and (2) women experience much greater after-the-fact regret than men do. Sometimes feelings of regret are translated into feelings of "being used," and sometimes feelings of "being used" are misinterpreted or purposefully misconstrued as "rape." Unfortunately, it is the politically correct thing to urge young women to party like the guys — without bothering to tell them about the regret asymmetry that separates the genders.

Older male, much younger female. A false rape claim is less plausible when it involves peers around the same age because the likelihood of a consensual relationship is greater among same-age partners. When a teen girl below the age of consent accuses a middle-aged man of rape, there is no possibility of legal consent, and actual consent seems less likely than if she was having sex with a same-age boy. Moreover, the older man/young girl allegation is generally viewed as so terribly loathsome that the mantra "guilty until proven innocent" is truly a reality for this one. Even when a young woman beyond the age of consent accuses a middle-aged man of rape, the initial inclination is to assume he's a lecherous old man, and that she would have no desire to have consensual sex with someone like that.

Teen boy, older woman. Sometimes women (they are often teachers) who statutorily rape teen boys will twice victimize them by falsely accusing them of rape. Such tactic has facial plausibility, given the male-as-predator stereotype and the exploding hormones of teen boys. It is especially disturbing that a woman would, as the cliche goes, throw her callow young lover under the bus in order to save herself. This is almost always a situation where the woman will feel a tremendous need to deny the tryst to someone important in her life — often her husband, her children, her friends, the principal at the school where she works, and the school board, all at once.

If you are male and are a school teacher, a police officer, an ambulance paramedic, or a cab driver, you need to be especially vigilant.

Police officers are at risk because some women charged with crimes lie about rape out of revenge or to claim that the charges were trumped up.

Ambulance paramedics and cab drivers are sometimes targeted by delusional women or women looking for an excuse for some indiscretion (refusing to pay a cab fare is a big one).

Teachers are forced to interact with many girls who are experiencing significant emotional and hormonal changes and whose immature judgment allows them to do things a more mature person wouldn't do. The ease with which a false claim can be made is a concern for male teachers, and that profession, more than the others, is attuned to these dangers.

This is often impossible to spot, at least initially. We've reported here on a woman who sent a man to prison for five years because she was bored. Another woman tried to destroy the life of a man she didn't even know with a rape lie because he wouldn't give her a beer. A girl accused another man of rape for throwing a flower at her. Innumerable women tell rape lies for attention or sympathy. Some women are just plain nuts, and men who are close to them stand a greater chance of being smeared by a rape lie.

▲The woman has no compunction about lying.

This one surely overlaps with the others. If a woman is sufficiently selfish that she has no difficulty lying — to extricate herself from trouble or for other reasons, she may not even need one of the reasons noted above to tell a rape lie. Some women will tell rape lies to avoid getting into trouble for being late for work. Liars are dangerous, and are to be avoided at all costs. Again, this personality type will almost always be impossible to spot immediately.

The best way to avoid a false rape claim is not to engage in sexual relations outside a committed relationship. In my belief-system, that means a stable marriage to someone you trust. I fully realize that this will strike some as old-fashioned and moralizing; I also appreciate that in this no-fault divorce era where 70% of all divorces are initiated by women who are afforded significant advantages in family law courts biased against fathers, that a happy marriage is all too often elusive. I merely point out that false rape claims are virtually non-existent in a happy marriage.

Here endeth the sermon.

The End of Men

Paul Elam · 16 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

By Paul Elam

This article begins with a blog post I came across in October over at Oz Conservative. OzCon's views fit well with his blog name. He's definitely right of center, with a clear antifeminist slant and an ostensibly supportive view of the men's movement- at least his men's movement.

But in this article, he asks in the title, "What's Wrong with the Men's Rights Movement?" And in that piece he takes some very specific shots at our problems as he sees them, which mainly boil down to the fact that not enough of us are patriarchs. His rationale for this is simple and plainly stated. There are essentially two factions of the MRM, liberals and sexual separatists, and that we have formed an alliance that few men will embrace because, like feminists, we are anti marriage and hypercritical of traditional masculinity.

He even feels we are more a compliment to feminists ideologically than would appear on the surface.

I am going to come back to all this, but I must first sidetrack to a recently released video by Hanna Rosin, in her continuing diatribe about "The End of Man."

The rest of this article will be written with the assumption you have carefully viewed all of it.

Both Rosin and OzCon get a lot of things wrong. Truth tell though, Rosin, despite all her drivel, from females being more intelligent and focused than males, to her thoroughly muddled and inconclusive rambling on why men are falling behind, gets a lot more right than OzCon- at least where it counts.

So rather than hack away at this keyboard, pointlessly dissecting either of their fallacies, it is more advantageous and informative to point to what Rosin gets right. Because what she gets right is a very apt description of the precipice edge on which every man and boy in modern western culture now teeters.

We are in the process now of being marginalized into a servile shadow existence by women. We can attribute this, as Rosin does, to a changing economy, or we can look at the forces of consumerism that are more likely behind the social metamorphosis, with feminism stoking the fires along the way. We can pick most any reason we want. In the end, it doesn't matter. Rosin is right, men are on their way out- and there is nothing that is going to stop it.

As we have beaten into the ground around here lately, men are falling father behind women at an exponentially increasing rate.

If you have any doubt, consider the following; the areas where Rosin hit her target. Young women now out earn young men, the majority of the workforce is female, and the gap will increase. Women are dominating managerial positions, and the gap will increase. Men's presence and performance in education, from grammar school to grad school, is plummeting and shows every sign of worsening in the future. Women are rapidly becoming the majority of single home owners and will exceed men drastically in the future in almost all growth professions, and especially in jobs that are financially lucrative.

Meanwhile men will face low paying jobs and rampant unemployment. It is estimated that when the current bad economy recovers, 18 million men ages 25 to 54 will be unemployed and unemployable. And that is not even considering the millions that will be employed at below sustenance levels in dreg jobs across the western landscape.

We have an educational establishment intractably dominated by anti male ideology, a law enforcement/judicial apparatus that has become an incarceration machine for men, and every bit of public sentiment needed to take all of this much further than it has already gone.

All this is happening in a culture that will continue to place the social onus on men to use their earnings and their blood to enhance the lives of women. Where social pressures fail, state functionaries will take up the slack.

This is the end of men, at least as we have known them to be in our lifetimes. I am not suggesting that we follow Rosin's advice to just 'drink the kool-aid,' and comply, to make the transition less painful. Just the opposite. But if we are to pursue any rational course of action we better accept that we are on an irrevocable path to female domination, and male subjugation. The only thing that will stop it at this point is a catastrophic event that leads to anarchy.

They say there are no atheists in foxholes. Well, there aren't any feminists either.

By the way, if you think subjugation is too strong a term, try hopping on a woman only train car in India and see what happens. Perhaps if you live through it you can tell us all about it. Or better yet, just have enough sex with enough women till one of them gets you thrown behind bars.

OzCon would likely have us believe that this makes the case for traditional marriage. But given the state of marriage and family law, that is a delusion of such magnitude that it would register on the Richter scale.

The decision to marry is a personal one. It's a man's choice and a man's folly. But I'll have no truck with any man that would teach our boys and young men that marriage and the caretaking of women is what makes him a real man. It is the woefully misguided and pathogenic pipe dream of men who invest more in their idealizations than they do in common sense; who in fact invest more in securing their genetic legacy than they do their own children's well being.

And it doesn't begin and end with marriage. In fact, we don't need a marriage strike, per se, at all. Women will out prosper men in every way, but they will always be hypergamous. The future will bring us nothing but a vast majority of women who thug-fuck for reproductive reasons, while manipulating and/or coercing Omega and Beta lapdogs for supplemental income. Most of the rest will compete with each other ever more viciously for the steadily dwindling numbers of men that can support them in ways they cannot on their own.

The other two are already married. I hope that OzCon is one of the guys with bragging rights.

In the end, though, there is little room for marriage in the future. It is toast– even if you have your nose too far up Ward Cleaver's fetid, decomposing ass to smell it burning.

What we need, assuming there is a "we," is a chivalry strike, which is to say a total abdication and rejection of any responsibilities to women, individually, and as a group. It is, after all, fitting in a world where women have no responsibilities whatsoever toward anyone but themselves.

As to contempt for traditional masculinity, I have none. I don't even know that anyone can tell me what it means (though many try). I'll save my contempt for stupidity and chosen blindness. Let the "patriarch's" of the world have their foolish ways. It matters not to me. I will be busy surviving as they march themselves and their unfortunate progeny into the grinding halls of family justice. We'll call it intellectual culling, and the world will be better for it.

This is not an activist's call to action, at least not collectively. There is no petition to sign, no club to join, and not many would heed the call if there was. Most men, especially traditionalists, will do what men have done in the face of gender feminism for half a century now; that is, follow their instincts to please women and wait for Hannah Rosin to tell them what to think about their own lives, how to live them, and what their place is.

As an individual though, I feel compelled to do something more than just take care of me. I have seen noticed in the analytics for my YouTube Channel that there are a small, but not insignificant number of young people, mostly male, who watch my videos. I get email from teenagers who read this site from time to time.

I have never considered fully what to say to them. But the times they are a changing.

I have started a list of titles for open letters to write to these young men. I think geared for 12 year olds and up seems appropriate. I want to spend some of my time writing these letters and developing ways to ensure distribution of them. Maybe I will even launch a new website for the effort.

There is a really rough road ahead for these unfortunates, and hardly anyone around to tell them about it. And maybe I could actually help a couple of them avoid a bad end.

Life delivers no promises, but I can always hope.

Hanna Rosin Abusing her Children: ON VIDEO

Adam Kostakis · 17 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Hanna Rosin's recent video on the "End of Men," a continuation of her efforts to assert that women are taking over the world because in societies that don't depend on brute strength, intellectually superior women should naturally ascend to dominance.

Never mind the glaring Master Gender implications of Rosin's elitist ideology. There is another concern here that Rosin smugly showcases for her viewing audience.

Her psychological abuse of her own children.

Having spent two decades counselling populations that are disproportionately affected by abuse of all kinds, I happen to know something about the subject.

Her abuse of them is clear and unmistakable, though some may not notice because we tend to see abuse in terms of overtly physical and sexual acts. Psychological abuse, a devastating form, can be much more subtle, but Rosin does manage to make it more obvious when she drags her children into the video, which is provided at the bottom for your convenience.

At 7:15 in the video, Rosin unambiguously asserts that females are superior to males in several ways, most notably that they are more intelligent and better communicators and listeners that are able to focus better than males, essentially making them more suitable for lucrative professional positions. She uses these ideas to essentially laud the creation of a male underclass- as women continue to thrive.

She also notes that boys are falling way behind girls in education (which she acts as though is troubling), but says she can't offer any reasons for that because she is writing a book about it and has not done the research.

So rather than use scholarly references, she offers up her 10 year old daughter's "expertise," showing a home video of an interaction involving the Rosin family.

First and foremost, we must keep in mind what this interaction is. It is one of a 10 year old girl, gloating on an outrageous sense of superiority over boys, while her younger brother is forced to sit silently and listen.

At 9:40 we are introduced to Noa, who is sitting next to mother Hannah at a table. Opposite this pair is the father and Rosin's son, neither of whose names did Rosin mention. Noa is there to explain why the boys in her class do not perform as well as the girls.

"The girls are obviously smarter," she says, her tone laden with derision. She goes on, stating, "I mean, they [girls] have much larger vocabularies. They learn much faster."

At this point the son lifts his arms and attempts to object with, "No!"

The father touches his arm, clearly an admonishment, and says, "Let her talk," without as much as looking at him.

The message at this point is already crystal clear. In the Rosin family, the belief is that females are superior to males, and any dissent from this will not be allowed.

Noa continues her speech. "They [girls] are much more controlled. The boys today are losing recess. …[O]nly boys."

At this point Hanna interrupts to ask. "And why is that?"

"They were just not listening to the class while the girls sat there very nicely," answers Noa, her sense of superiority even more evident in her voice. Apparently in her class, each and every boy is a behavioral problem, while each and every girl is a model student. Either that, or the teacher is gender profiling for punishment in the classroom.

But either way, make no mistake about it; where the Rosin family is concerned, this is the psychological abuse of both children.

First consider the son, and I know there will be many that would say he did not appear to be adversely affected by what happened in this video. It's true; he does not appear to have clearly visible effects for the three seconds the camera was on him.

But that camera is not capable of telling us what is going on with his self image, even though he tried to tell us himself by objecting to being barraged with messages of how inferior he was to his sister, and indeed to all women.

Now, if that does not convince you of a problem here; if you are looking at this and asking, "Hey, what's the big deal?" let me ask you to imagine your reaction to a family scene where a son, with scripted assistance from his father, is allowed to tell his younger sister how superior boys are while the mother sits by to enforce the daughters silence as it happens?

It would be abusive, would it not? So is this. Period.

If Rosin is actually writing a book on why boys are failing, I would suggest that her abusive form of parenting might provide her good source material. She will likely be able to support it later when her son fails out of school. It happens to a lot of people with diminished self worth.

The father is no less culpable. Almost all abusive homes have one primary abuser, and a chief enabler. While likely well controlled by Hanna, Dad is obviously the muscle behind his wife's philosophical edicts. His son would not be being abused if didn't have a father who allowed it. And his daughter would not be learning a hateful mentality if her father was giving her the loving guidance she needs.

And that brings us to the matter of young Noa. What are we doing to children when we raise them with the mentality that they are superior to entire classes of human beings?

Well, for one we are subjecting them to the same learned hatred that resulted in a countless forms of bigotry and discrimination that we have long sought to correct; the same learned hatred that resulted in segregated schools (though that will not be necessary with boys if we just drum them out of education altogether).

We have fought the scourge of racism being taught to our children. We teach young men now, from an early age and rightly so, that any notion of superiority to women is misguided, destructive and will not be tolerated.

It is not just because those ideas are wrong, but because we know that raising children with hateful, racist and sexist ideas has a severely negative impact on what kind of adults they will turn out to be.

These same concerns should extend to boys as well, but as we saw in the snickering reaction of the audience to that video, and the smugness with which Hanna Rosin puts her abusive mothering on display for the world, we have a long way to go.

Rosin's personal catch phrase in recent times has been, "The End of Men."

It is an idea she is obviously dedicated to, as evidence by the fact that she is destroying the youngest, most vulnerable man in her life, right in her own home, and putting it on display for the world laugh at.

Women Declare Victory Over Men

Denver Banning · 18 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Have you seen Hanna Rosin's video where she's smugly celebrating the "End of Men." You can have a look at it here.

Here are the largest growing jobs projected by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics to the year 2016. All of them are women's jobs except one or two, according to Rosin. But this will be corrected. Women are working on expanding Affirmative Action and Title IX to all the S.T.E.M. fields (Science, Technical, Engineering and Mathematics), to ensure there is no professional field in which women do not dominate. The feminized economy is here. Women are now excited that they are the majority of the workforce and that men are being economically marginalized.

I suppose they got what they wanted.

[image]

The question is why women think it a good thing that service jobs are the top growing jobs in the country. It may be that they don't understand economics. Below is our trade deficit which is much larger now than in (2005):

[image]

I'm not sure women, at least the ones celebrating with Rosin, understand what a trade deficit means. In short it means that we don't produce anything of tangible value to offer on the global market. Excitement about all this and the fact that men are out of work indicates they have little clue of what this all means for the future of our country. They are lauding the homogeneous service sector feminized economy, but they don't understand the economic impact of marginalizing a nations men.

Strange, isn't it?

They don't seem to understand what the production of goods and tangible products means to an economy. Women are welcome to service everyone in our service economy, this is fine by me. But with as much political agency as women now have they would have fared much better in the long run by directing the government to do something more economically sound than abandon manufacturing and construction. And it is their call; our government does what ever women tell them to do.

There is really nothing we can do now. Rosin has announced that she and all women will get us out of this mess and that men don't have to produce anything any more. They insisted that the Stimulus Package be devoted to them….and it was… There is really nothing men should do now except drink beer, watch sports, play video games and collect unemployment until women rescue the economy.

Ms. Rosin was right, feminists lied to us about "the wage gap". Women have been out earning men for years. It is only when they decide to have men take care of them does the gap show up at all. More on the wage gap HERE.

Women, I should also note, continue to have Affirmative Action in job hirings and college admissions despite the "End of Men."

[image]

Rosin was also correct about the growing female dominance in education. A good thing according to her.

[image]

She also mentioned that women's "empowerment" has affected marriage. Indeed it has, we now have the lowest marriage rate in American history:

[image]

….and the highest single mother birth rate in American history:

[image]

(Sorry the graph is a little dated we now have a 40% single mother birth rate and growing with significant trend momentum)

[image]

Women are getting exactly what they want, apparently. Our birth rates have dropped below replacement levels. None of this is sustainable.

In other words, the United States is in grave danger.

In the meantime, I suggest that, as men, we continue to promote the conscious choice to not just liberate ourselves from the matriarchy, but to learn how to feed on it. No alimony and no child support to women and their children is a given. But we also need to learn how to take from them. Freely and without conscious or moral compunction.

This is the moment of truth for what remains of western male culture.

Women should now provide for men and our children in this new order.

If women form families they must now pay men alimony and child support should we decide to divorce them. Otherwise women should raise their own families. And that is perhaps what men with wives who are breadwinners should do; withdraw from the women and their families- and take what they can get as they exit.

Men fortunate enough to be unmarried should remain that way.

We will not have to worry about that, though, because in honesty the combination of hypergamy and economic primacy for women will be the final nail in the coffin for marriage. The more educated a woman is, the more money she makes on average. The more money she makes on average, the less likely she is to ever get married or have children.

[image]

Again, fine by me. This is what women want. But they should not complain when economically disadvantaged men start putting an eye on that money.

Nor should they be surprised when we seek, not just an end, but an actual reversal to affirmative action for women in job hirings and college admissions. In fact, since it is the case that we now have separate and secular representation under law by gender in direct violation of The Constitution of The United States, we should now create affirmative action for men in all fields of work or study which men are a minority.

You want marginalized men, you get a marginalized mentality.

Men need to continue to find independence and liberation from women and their matriarchal families. This means an absolute rejection of chivalry. True female independence and liberation is here, right?

Let's help them celebrate it with both, sawed off barrels.

Men must now begin to mount an offensive while defending our rights and our wellbeing. Men are beginning to understand clearly that women have finally proclaimed victory, and with it, “the end of men”. Everything women have sought after has come true for them beyond their wildest dreams.

And we will see that the net result is a entire class of women with the power to make the money, and that power will weigh on them like it has on men for thousands of years, like an anchor around their necks. Perhaps we should tie rocks to the chains. The effect should prove even more interesting as they experience the consequences of their designed-to-collapse economic strategy.

After all, who are we to stand in the way of making a better world?

Breaking Bad: The Male as Designated Criminal

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In her 1989 book, Defining Rape, feminist author Linda Brookover Bourque argued for a shift in the burden of proof in rape cases to the defense, which would entail that the defense establish, with a preponderance of evidence, that it was most likely that a woman alleging rape against her gave clear assent to engage in sex. This argument is made on page 178 of her book.

This is not an argument in favor of men obtaining consent before having sex. No, she means to alter the principal of western jurisprudence in which the accused is innocent until proven guilty through evidentiary proceedings. Bourque proposes a new, improved system in which for accusations of rape, guilt is assumed by the court, and the accused must present overwhelming evidence of innocence.

Article 11 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted in 1948 by the United Nations General Assembly by unanimity, describes the principle of presumption of innocence as follows:

Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a public trial at which he/or she has had all the guarantees necessary for his defense.

In Western law, it has always been the case that the burden of proof rests on the party who advances a proposition affirmatively.

In the brave new world of radical feminist jurisprudence, for men, the obligation in the face of accusation would rest on the accused, and the presumption would be of guilt.

We call our system of laws, courts and police “the justice system”. And it’s likely that we will call it this for the foreseeable future, but the principle of justice is arguably no longer the foundational philosophy of our justice system. Through a 40 year campaign of lobbying, misinformation, activist education, and biased journalism; the construct we call the justice system is changing into a tool of privilege and control.

Susan Caringella, a sociology professor at Western Michigan University, wrote in her 2008 book Addressing Rape Reform in Law and Practice:

“It is high time to give victims a fair shake, to dismantle the zealous over-protections for men accused of this crime, which have been buoyed up by the myths about false accusations, ulterior motives, and so on, commonly embraced when rape charges are levied.”

Caringella commits the formal logical fallacy of the unstated major premise, or “begging the question” when she mentions zealous over-protections for men accused of the crime of rape. No such protections exist, in fact, men accused of the crime of rape are routinely named, prior to any legal or evidentiary proceedings, or trial, while women making accusations as presumptive victims are protected and held legally anonymous.

Similar to Linda Bourque, Caringella is arguing is for the dismantling of due process and the establishment in legal principle of guilt by accusation for men.

Radical feminist Jessica Valenti recently threw her considerable influence behind this grotesque idea in an article the Washington Post published on Dec 12 2010 called “What the Assange case says about rape in America.”

Valenti suggests that America should model its rape laws on Sweden’s where activists and legal experts want to change the law, so that the burden of proof is on the accused. In fact, although Valenti’s position advocates a monstrous perversion of the concept of justice, she should be thanked for bringing a decades old thread of feminist legal activism into the public light.

While presumptive guilt in accusations of male-on-female rape is wrestled over by activists and lawmakers, another point is missed, and that’s the point that the construct within western society of the rule of law based in the principle of justice is no longer operative in reality. The rule of law still operates of course, but it has become the rule of private law, where criminal and civil laws are applied differentially depending on social class.

In the past 2 years we've watched as bankers who made fraudulent, irresponsible loans, and lost, were paid off with a 7 billion dollar bail out, and the burden for paying that debt transferred onto the public. This is private law for the very rich, in which responsibility and risk for the gambling of bankers is transferred to middle class Americans. The very rich have always enjoyed privilege – which actually means "private law" – but another privileged group – women, is asserting a much more powerful hold on legal and social advantage, at the expense of men in our society.

This is expressed in laws like title IX and the violence against women act, in spite of the reality that men are far more likely to be victims of violence. And, soon may be expressed in the legal principle of guilt by accusation. This is the ultimate trump card of feminist utopia, or as I once called it, the lightning-bolt-finger of feminism.

We are not poised as a society to move into a world of male non person-hood, or subjugation. We're there already; the only question now is a matter of degree.

In the past, I've discussed the need to recognize chivalry as a system of social control, attaching social position to the degree of conformity to male service to females. I stated that individual self actualization for men requires the rejection of the concept of chivalry.

I also suggested that the concept of heroism be recognized as one based in the subjugation of personal actualization in favor of the other or of the collective. That the label, hero; is a blind for personal slavery.

The ongoing transformation of the legal system from one based on justice to a system of control of one class of people by another suggests something deeper to men in their self identity and concept of what it means to be ethical. When the law ceases to be an of justice, and becomes one of increasing apartheid, an ethical mandate for self ownership by individuals must embrace the self identification of outlaw.

While it would be easy to stumble into the trap of cynicism and embrace a self serving philosophy that "what's good is that which is good for me," I'm going to step carefully around that soft ground, as well as advising other men struggling to define themselves outside the untenable masculine role mainstream society allows – do the same.

What I'm suggesting, or contemplating is a more difficult path than a simple philosophy of self interest. Through most of my lifetime, while there have been laws I disagreed with or thought foolish, I still viewed the larger framework of the law as a pretty good reference point for ethical conduct, for myself as well as others.

Increasingly, with laws that not only criminalize masculine identity, but seek to characterize normal, healthy human behavior as pathological, the law loses its legitimacy as a metric of the normal, the moral, or the ethical. It is not simply a handful of laws which trample on a sane conception of human rights; it is the system of law, perverted into the tool of a hate fuelled ideology which in the philosophy I contemplate, becomes anathema to continued self identity as "an ethical human being".

This poses a problem, or at least, from this contemplative vantage, it appears to. Without a social baseline which can be trusted, the law being no longer adequate, it may be significantly challenging to judge the rightness of a course of action or decision. Humans, being social animals are influenced very strongly by social pressure, and I don't need predictive powers to say that censure and condemnation from the cool aid drinking majority will follow the actions of men deciding for themselves to flout socially expected models of masculine behavior. Not just socially expected, but with the shifting of the legal system from one of justice to one of control based on sexual identity, ethical self determination must stray increasingly into a newly defined criminality.

I'm aware that opponents of men's rights will jump on this and claim I'm endorsing criminal behavior such as rape, and if any hearing or reading this should attempt such characterization, it's with my blessing. I like it when my opponents tell absurd lies, because it makes knocking the legs out of their arguments so simple.

No, the problem I mentioned a few minutes ago is that in a climate of reactionary criticism, finding a reliable path to ethical self interest may be a substantial challenge. On the other hand, newly forged paths are hardest the first time they're walked, and may appear much more daunting at the outset than they prove to be in the traveling. I am not afraid of the identity of outlaw.

Now, it's also easy in contemplating this philosophy to opt entirely out; to go ghost.

There's a major subset of the men's rights movement characterized by the phrase Men Going Their Own Way, and for some, this means severance from a major fraction of civil society. While I don't condemn that option, it is not what I am discussing here. My current and continued identity one that includes a strong and participatory role in the community of my friends, colleagues, associates and so on. I abrade the social conventions which I find objectionable actively and directly, and not by my absence.

Opponents to male rights, like Valenti, have already demonstrated a desire to redefine the most basic act of procreation as abhorrent. To take a physical act which for centuries has an expression of love, and call it an act of violence.

Characterizing Valenti's intent as perverse is inadequate, but my vocabulary fails to mount the enormity of it.

In England, where radical feminism is a bit farther along than the United States, a man who walks away from a woman in the midst of an argument is characterized as having committed assault on her, by his act of walking away. In France, criticism by a man of his wife is treated under French law as battery. In Scotland, flirting without explicitly obtained consent is a crime. Is anybody confused as to who that law will be selectively enforced against?

As the normal is increasingly redefined as the abnormal and masculine biology and identity named pathological by ideological feminism, to remain a man, right in the centerof activity, rather than a fawning yes-mouthing house pet will carry the stigma, and the legal stamp of outlaw. Not outlaw in the cute, commercialized wrapping of the Hollywood bad boy, no, I mean the old definition. An enemy of the state. Certainly an enemy of the status quo. The ethical, self determined individual is, of course always the enemy of the state – and of any collectivist ideology.

One question which springs to mind is, will feminist ideologues shaping the retooling of western law flinch at the subjugation of their brothers, fathers, and sons? I suspect the answer is no. But do feminist scholars and law makers recognize the consequences of rendering a social class who have traditionally been problem solvers, inventors, philosophers and shapers of their surroundings into legislated criminals by identity?

To that I suspect the answer is also: no.

What does feminism want to be when it grows up?

Paul Elam · 20 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The woman holding the sign in the picture is protesting on behalf of N.O.W., who is suing the Hooters restaurant chain in San Francisco claiming that the use of waitresses in camel toe cut offs and t-shirts constitutes the illegal provision of "adult entertainment." They've added a lot of save the children rhetoric to the PR end of the lawsuit.

Save the children from scantily clad women? Are you kidding me? Is this really N.O.W., or is it Families First? Maybe it's some deranged splinter group of the Moral Majority fronting the ugliest of their womenfolk as feminists.

At any rate, this can't be modern feminism. They buried the rest of the second wavers with Dworkin's fat, undoubtedly pockmarked ass, right? The third wave is here, right in our depraved male faces. But you would not know it from their silence about this story.

Where is the outrage of the super sluts, whose idea of feminist empowerment is picking up folded dollar bills from a dirty dance floor using their cracks of their asses?

That picture, though, is a hoot, if you'll pardon the pun. It's proof positive that in the wild and wacky world of modern western culture, being butt ugly and bitter about it is still grounds for litigation. Wanna bet the area directly behind that sign is as hooterless as the facially challenged nut cases at N.O.W. would like all women to be?

Personally, I won't eat at Hooters because they assume I am stupid enough to pay too much for chicken wings because they are served up by some bimbo in a tight t-shirt. But I never thought of calling a lawyer over it.

Seriously though (at least as serious as one can be about this kind of law suit), what does feminism want to be when it grows up?

Right now, there seems to be a split between women that want to fellate their way to financial mediocrity while the world says, "You go, grrl," and the desperate last members of the old guard, who were at least smart enough to see that ridiculing and politically pussy whipping men in power was a lot more profitable.

Could there be conflicts in their future, or are they just enjoying the way that mixed messages have always kept a world trying to please them off balance?

Whatever the answer is, I have something to say to Ma Kettle holding the sign: You are half right. You are not a decoration. However, the women to your right, are.

Harassment, Bullying and Toxic Femininity

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 21 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It isn't often that I read feminist blogs. For the most part they don't take too kindly to dissenting opinion and they are often far too infuriating to simply read and not comment. So I tend to stay away. Thus it was quite by accident that I stumbled across an article on Feministing by Dena Simmons who proclaims herself to be a doctoral student at Columbia University entitled Making the links between street harrassment (sic), bullying, and toxic masculinity.

The author begins by stating "I set out to write a piece about the psychological effects of cat-calling on women." So far, so good. Then she discovers "I realized how easily the respondents and I started to villify [sic] men." And then she concludes "If we are going to talk about feminism, we cannot ignore discussions of manhood or what it means to be a man in most societies."

At this point I'm beginning to wonder "why not?" Feminism has very little to do with manhood or what it means to be a man, but I figure she was just trying to empathize a little, so I read on. She goes on to discuss her observations of her male students during the time she spent as a middle school teacher. She says "Almost all of my students, boys and girls alike, considered boys who were not manly enough (tough, aggressive, outspoken, confident, violent, and sexually experienced) effeminate and 'gay.' 'Gay' and 'faggot' were the ultimate insults for boys at the school and community where I taught, and that made me cringe."

Thus she has managed to link street harassment and bullying. Though she never quite uses the term, she eventually explains what she means by the "toxic masculinity," as mentioned in the title. " [W]e must tackle gender stereotypes and redefine hegemonic masculinity so that boys are not bullied for not being manly enough, and so that boys do not feel the need to have multiple sexual partners, engage in homophobic bullying or in violent behavior, or hiss and holler at women just to prove their masculinity." And so it appears that boys and men trying to prove their masculinity in ways she deems unacceptable is toxic masculinity.

At this point I ask myself why is it that boys feel the need to prove their masculinity at all, let alone in socially unacceptable ways? Ms. Simmons almost sees the answer, but because she is blinded by her feminist colored glasses, she misses it entirely. What she calls toxic masculinity is merely a reaction to toxic femininity. Having been a teenage boy, I suppose I have an unfair advantage at addressing this issue over someone who has never been a teenage boy. Call it male privilege if you will, but as you may have guessed, I intend to exercise that privilege.

Teenage boys are motivated by three basic drives, food, sleep, and sex. Now it's only a guess, but I am willing to bet that food and sleep have very little to do with this so-called toxic masculinity.

I said that Ms. Simmons almost gets it. She says "Almost all of my students, boys and girls [bold text mine] alike, considered boys who were not manly enough… effeminate and 'gay'" (emphasis added). Note that she includes girls in the bullying behavior that she considers toxic, though she doesn't quite grasp the meaning of her words. It is part of toxic femininity.

Girls tend to go after boys who are higher in status. Some may settle for less, but typically, girls are attracted to those in higher ranks. Alpha males, if you will. Bullies are alpha males. They are dominant and higher in status than those they bully. Now I understand that there are a lot of girls who are turned off by this and wouldn't be caught dead with a bully regardless of status, but there are many who are attracted to this type of male, the bad boy. It is these girls for whom the bullies compete.

This attraction to the bad boy is another part of toxic femininity. The two parts go hand in hand to create the reaction of what Ms. Simmons terms toxic masculinity. Thus toxic masculinity is born of toxic femininity and if Ms. Simmons wishes to tackle gender stereotypes as a means of reducing street harassment and bullying, the place to start is with girls, not boys. It is the toxic femininity of girls who are attracted to bad boys that poisons the masculinity of those boys that leads to the behavior that so offends her.

Ms. Simmons needs to learn behavior theory, more specifically, operant conditioning. If girls reinforce the behavior in boys, they will act accordingly. This behavior will be likely to continue into adulthood where it continues to manifest itself in ways that many women find offensive. Change a girls' idea of what is sexually exciting and you will change the way boys (and men) behave. Don't blame the men, Ms. Simmons, you girls and your toxic femininity rewarded that behavior and taught them to behave that way.

NOTE: I do not condone street harassment or bullying, which is one reason I don't condone feminism. The constant negative portrayal of men, manhood, and masculinity is nothing more than harassment and bullying and is every bit as offensive as the harassment that Ms. Simmons is complaining about.

Living in the Dark Age

Theodore Labadie · 21 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It is truth alone that frees, not the activity of will.

—Jiddu Krishnamurti

I take the above quote not to mean an invitation to inactivity, but an assertion that right action can only follow right thinking, or, better in keeping with the philosophy of Krishnamurti, with the perception of the world as-it-is. I'm reminded of a conversation I once had with a feminist scholar when I was in my early twenties. She argued that "praxis," the leftist term for the application of social and political theory, could not be aided by objective facts or knowledge of the origins of any particular social problem. One only needs to know the objective, the goal that the theory is meant to illuminate.

Which struck me as ludicrous then and strikes me as even more so today. Such a philosophy can say nothing about the fitness of a goal and I think it is instrumental to the survival of feminism that it do everything it can to dismantle rational, objective observation as a tool privileged in acquiring knowledge. Feminism does not and cannot have a foundation in reason, it has one only in desire. It's also a very bad strategy to try to get somewhere without first knowing the direction. A very simple way to outline the folly of my interlocutor is to show that if we want to find a cure for a disease our power is radically increased by the ability to discover exactly its etiology—that which causes it. Of particular relevance to women is the fact that many used to die giving birth due not to any inherent difficulty in the process of labor but to sepsis. Until Louis Pasteur's germ theory of disease doctors and midwives did not know that it was a good idea to wash their hands before touching a birthing mother and legions of women throughout the ages died needlessly from postpartum infection.

But I want to use the idea of right thinking as a point of reference to tell what I have learned about the growing educational divide that separates men and women, as told by Hanna Rosin in a recent TED lecture and in her essay for The Atlantic, "The End of Men." It doesn't exist. There is no educational divide because we no longer have education. Aside from a few islets of reason in the sciences (and these too seem to be treading water) we now have ideological indoctrination and credentialism.

In her book Dark Age Ahead, urban theorist Jane Jacobs identifies several signifiers of our cultural decline similar to those faced by the collapsing Roman Empire. Primary to these is the decay of the nuclear family but, sadly, Jacobs is not an anti-feminist theorist. She identifies the climbing divorce rate as the result of economic pressures on families and of collapsing community infrastructure. These are valid arguments but incomplete explanations of the problem. However, she also identifies credentialism as one of the reasons for our decline and Dark Age Ahead is one of the very few works I can find that discusses the topic critically. Jacobs shows that the reason for credentialism's destructive power is simple: our universities and colleges are cranking out graduates that although they have the papers to claim otherwise have little knowledge and less ability.

Expansion of first-rate faculty—memorable teachers of the kind the 1960s student protesters were mourning—has not kept pace with expansion of enrollments and courses offered; professors lack the time and energy they could once devote to personal contact with students. Slack had been taken up by what became known as "gypsy faculty," lecturers hoping for permanent appointments as they move from university to university, and by graduate students as part of their apprenticeships. So many papers to mark, relative to numbers and qualities of mentors to mark them, changed the nature of test papers. Some came to consist of "True or false?" and "Which of the following is correct?" types of questions, fit for robots to answer and to rate, rather than stimulants and assessments of critical thinking and depth of understanding.

In the meantime, rejoicing that university education has become a growth industry, administration and legislators seek increasingly to control problems of scale by applying lessons from profit-making enterprises that turn expanded markers to advantage by cutting costs. Increased output of product can be measured more easily as numbers of credentialed graduates than as numbers of educated graduates. Quantity trumps quality. (1)

And what is the quality of our graduates? Consider the large number of students who can barely speak English, let alone write it, and the potentially vast number of essays and dissertations that are plagiarized or are written for students byprofessional essay writers. In addition, I can think of almost no students and indeed few faculty members outside the hard sciences who are capable of critical thinking. While searching for statistics on the number of female students studying hard science, physics or engineering for example, I discovered this scholarly work that seeks to place blame for the lack of female students in mathematics on the social environment:

Fishbein and Ajzen assume that one's intention to perform a behavior constitutes the best predictor of behavior. The intention to perform a given behavior is in turn predicted by one's attitude towards the behavior in question and one's subjective norm with respect to the behavior (Fishbein & Ajzen, 1975, p. 400). This relationship may be expressed algebraically as follows:

$$I = [A_B]\ W_1 + [SN]\ W_2$$

Thus, the intention to perform a specific behavior [I] is determined by one's attitude towards the behavior [A_B] and one's belief that others (the family and peer groups) think that it is important that he or she should perform the specific behavior (subjective norm [SN]). W_1 and W_2 represent weights attached to one's attitude and the subjective norm. For example, persons may be differentially motivated to comply with the opinions of the important people in their lives. (2)

Shades of Sokal! Here we see a scholarship-approved, "scientistic" way to lend an argument credence by ascribing to it a mathematical methodology. But such an ascription contains no less than three errors in critical thinking in immediate succession. The first is the variables. They seek to quantify quality, similar to how credentialism grants precedence to quantity over quality. The way a female student feels about social pressures, the subjective norm variable SN in the equation, cannot be quantified nor can her feelings towards the subject's attitude or towards the subjective norm. There is no answer to the question, "How much good or bad do you feel about x?" The second error is to relate qualities mathematically. Only quantities can have a mathematical relationship. The third error is to assume the logical validity of the entire mathematical statement which results in yet another quantity meant to describe a quality, or in poetic terms: sweet fuck all. Nevertheless, show this equation to humanities students and they will ooh and aah over it like a tribe of smurfs without any critical appraisal of whether it could possibly be true.

I'm a sucker for ironic serendipity. It just so happens that the most scathing criticism of credentialism I could find comes from Hanna Rosin's very own The Atlantic, albeit a quarter-century earlier. James Fallows casts a very keen gaze on ascendant credentialism in the mid-80s and finds it lacking:

In 1970 Ivar-Berg reported on a study conducted by the Federal Aviation Administration, which wanted to understand what made 507 highly competent air-traffic controllers good at their jobs. The question was whether advanced educational requirements would produce competent controllers; the answer was no. As Berg explained,

"This complicated job . . . might well require, not merely the details of engineering or management science or mathematics, but all the supposed 'correlates' of education—a disciplined mind, for example—and the more personal qualities that education is supposed to produce–reliability, steadfastness, responsibility, ability to think quickly, motivation, etc."

Common sense might suggest that the better controllers would be more educated—but the FAA found that fully half the top-ranked controllers had no formal education beyond high school. Many of them had come directly to the FAA for rigorous technical training specifically related to the jobs they were expected to do. Berg said,

"Because it was 'stuck with' less educated men . . . the FAA became a little laboratory in which the relevance of education for attainment of, and achievement in, important managerial and technical positions could be examined. Education proves not to be a factor in the daily performance of one of the most demanding decision-making jobs in America. (3)

If non-credentialed men with only high school educations can do technically demanding jobs and do them well, even more, if their job performance is indistinguishable from those who have degrees this means that all those pretty pieces of paper Rosin is so proud of may be worthless. Indeed, the mancession can be seen not as a reorganization of our societies and our economies, but a type of cultural inflation whereby the currency of knowledge is continually devalued by a glut of valueless claims to knowledge. It's no wonder that men now find our education system daunting to the point of failure; they generally have low tolerance for bullshit.

In science, the simplest explanation is often the most true. I am tempted to judge that after forty years of affirmative action and all efforts to shunt women into hard science and mathematics the reason that there are relatively few female students in these areas is because such studies generally don't interest them. This is a calamity for our civilization, because the educational and occupational mancession described by Rosin means that our guiding institutions are becoming run by people who cannot think. Worse, they do not remember a time when people could.

What is a dark age? It is cultural amnesia of such a degree that people in a society do not even know that they have forgotten the past. This image is of what was once a lowly canteen in a hospital for convalescent sailors—for men. Greenwich Hospitalwas built in a time that even though men were not their own masters some of them were nonetheless still valued for their service. It understood what we have utterly forgotten despite all our prodigious efforts at medicine and psychology: beauty heals. Quite likely it could not be built today, not even with modern materials, not even with Auto CAD and 3D printing. And all those female graduates trained neither in truth nor in the methods to recognize it. What will they build? I suspect their will enabled by their false credentials will sink us.

A new Dark Age is not ahead. We have been living in one for some time.

URGENT ACTION ALERT! Stop the I-VAWA Lies Now!

Teri Stoddard · 21 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The upcoming week will be the last days of the Lame Duck session of Congress. But this is no time for complacency!

This past Tuesday the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee approved the International Violence Against Women Act. Now the VAWA Mafia is trying to bring this anti-family bill for a full Senate vote. We can't allow that to happen, because I-VAWA is filled with more lies than you can imagine – see the SAVE analysis here:http://www.saveservices.org/downloads/VAWA-International-Violence-Against-Women-Act-Analysis

For example, I-VAWA makes this claim: "The World Health Organization has reported that up to 70 percent of women in some countries report having been victims of domestic violence at some stage in their lives."

That claim is ridiculous, of course. The truth is, studies conducted in 38 countries around the world show women are as likely, or more likely than men to engage in intimate partner aggression:http://www.saveservices.org/policymakers/what-is-the-profile-of-domestic-violence-around-the-world/

I don't know about you, but I was taught not to lie. On Monday, I'd like you to call your two Senators at this toll-free number: 1-866-220-0044 and urge them to oppose the International Violence Against Women Act, S. 2982. "Victims of domestic violence want the truth, not I-VAWA."

Florida Woman is Beaten Near Death- How Funny!

Paul Elam · 22 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

A Deland, Florida woman was severely beaten by her husband and found half naked and semi-conscious in her car by police.

Lenora Shorts, whose last name also describes the only thing she was wearing, was so badly beaten that she was able only to mumble to police, and point in the direction her husband had run after getting so, ahem, short with her.

Short with her, get it?

Police were summoned to the scene after a caller reported seeing a woman being dragged across the street, giving new meaning to the term, "ball and chain."

Mr. Shorts, who was found later hiding in the bushes, suffered dog bites when a police dog attacked him. It is not known at this time whether those injuries were serious, or if he suffered any muscle strain dragging around and beating his old lady.

——-

There now, are you sufficiently disgusted? After all, no decent individual would find humor in such a sickening scenario, would they?

Well, they do at the New York Daily News [sic], but only if the victim is male.

Let's take a look at the "journalism" behind this, one of their December 17 headlines:

Berlinda Dixon-Newbold arrested for allegedly setting boyfriend's crotch on fire, police say

Oh, but you can already hear the one liners coming, can't you? And NYDN reporter Sean Alfano doesn't disappoint.

The first words of reporting he penned on a story in which a female psychopath tried to set her man on fire:

"This couple gives new meaning to the phrase heated argument."

Ta dump!!

Most of the remainder of the write up stuck to the alleged facts; in this case that Dixon-Newbold got upset at her boyfriend for taking a nap, and decided to wake him up by sexually mutilating him with fire.

I am sure that Alfano and his buddies haven't had belly laughs like that since Lorena Bobbit bobbed it.

Ta dump-dump!

And it doesn't help that the less than razor sharp victim was turning it into a joke himself, but that could be a preemptive move on his part. Maybe he's a regular reader of mainstream news and decided it would be better to laugh with, versus just being laughed at.

Whether he has learned anything from the experience may have to wait for his next girlfriend. As Alfano so wittily reports near the end of his story, the relationship between he and Dixon-Newbold has "flamed out."

Ta dump-dump crash!!

Is it any wonder why these mainstream nimrods can't seem to get a grasp on why their work increasingly ends up lining floors for not yet housebroken puppies, and not being read?

I guess it doesn't matter when you're using misandry (Yes, Sean, that's a real word) as filler between cosmetic ads, but there is a side to this even darker than Alfano's hateful sense of humor.

The efforts to make mainstream media user friendly to narcissistic female consumers is bad enough in sitcoms, commercials and the Hollywood production of vapid romantic comedies. But we have finally arrived at the point that nothing is left for this ideological contagion to infect. Straight journalism was the last domino to fall.

So now, when it comes to violence against men perpetrated by women, it is either completely ignored, or, as in this case, it is just a scenario ripe to be mocked in newspapers and sneered at by the ignorant, morally deficient masses on which they so completely depend.

For women, it's a different story. Newspaper ad sales would drop like media stock if they were equal opportunity sexists. So they are careful to convey, subtly or not, their moral indignation at the harming of the fairer consumer. But for men, every attack they suffer is a handy joke; every punch a punch line.

Godfather Harry summed it up just right. "I don't know who you are, sir," he said, "But I can tell you what you are worth. If your partner was to cut off your penis tonight, the world would laugh. What a piece of shit is man."

Harry, you've have been proven once again to deserve your good reputation. Man is a piece of shit. I've gotten the latest confirmation, courtesy of Sean Alfano at the New York Daily News.

Note: The interpretation of the Lenora Shorts story is satire. There is nothing funny about what happened, or about the Dixon-Newbold story. If you struggle with the meaning of satire, please check here. If it still bothers you, you may qualify to report for the New York Daily News.

Chapin Strikes Again- Chivalry for Female Criminals

Bernard Chapin · 23 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The sentencing disparity for the same crime committed by men vs women is far greater than that for whites vs blacks or any other minority.

Simply put, women get a pass on a whole range of crimes, from murder to child molestation to false allegations of abuse and sexual assault.

This video takes the subject on and should cause anyone pause to consider that sexism isn't just something that happens to women.

All This MRA Blogging is Just Talk– Suuuure it is!

Paul Elam · 23 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

We occasionally get comments here from people that think MRA blogging is a waste of time, that we are "just talking," and nothing more. If you have been around these forums for very long, you have seen your share of those sentiments. From this end, I can tell you I get regular reminders of why this kind of thinking is so untrue. I recently received another one in the form of the following email.

It is, if you follow what he is saying, proof positive of one man's life changing because of all this "talk." And from that change of attitude we end up hearing the wisdom of a man who has seen through the feminist matrix and is now willing and able to carry the message in his own way to others. He also offers up some damn good advice, and a promise for the future.

So please, keep those articles and comments coming. Other people may think this is just a bunch of howling wind, and I am fine with that. But the fact is that we are changing lives here, and adding more to our ranks every day, simply by speaking our truths without compunction and in defiance of a world that would rather shut us up.

Well, we are becoming the world, even if it is one man at a time.

So here is the email, which has been edited to respect his privacy. And remember, I have a file full of these that is getting bigger all the time. The MRM is gaining steam, and there ain't no stopping it.

———

Mr. Elam,

You get my blood boiling (in a good way).

I am a 30 year-old man about to finish my last year in law school at [name of school deleted.] I have been thinking about men's issues for some time, but only learned the word "misandry" a couple of years ago–yet I have felt it nearly my entire life.

I could tell you in great length and detail of my horror stories that are as recent as this past week. I received a demand letter from my ex-girlfriend's attorney stating that my behavior in trying to get her to contact me and our apartment office and pay for damage she caused on an apartment I live in, that WE previously lived in, that SHE signed a lease on, and then WALKED OUT on, has been "inappropriate and at times hostile." Also, "[she] is in fear for her safety." To summarize, it was a letter threatening to sue for harassment if I did not stop contacting her. It was insulting and it made me feel like a creep.

Mr. Elam, I have never laid a hand on a woman. I have never even so much as threatened to do so. I have a mother and two older sisters that I love dearly and who adore me. I have a strong, smart, and loving father who set a great example for me, and I have friends both male and female who know my good character. That said, I have learned from the experience and have few important lessons to share.

First, never leave a paper trail. While the language I sometimes used in dealing with my man-hating ex was sometimes "colorful," it never rose to the level of threatening or hostile. Still, when the dust settles and a judge or jury have to figure out whether or not you are a danger to women, a cell phone text message or e-mail taken out of context can be incredibly damaging.

Second, if you do receive a demand letter such as the one I received, DON'T GET ANGRY. This was my first reaction. Like I said, the letter was incredibly insulting and the attorney told me to "shape up" and "pull myself together." He even went as far as to threaten to report my conduct to the State Bar. He forbade me from speaking to her, her family, her friends, or her former classmates (which is strange because they are my classmates as well). After the initial wave of anger subsided I started thinking: why WOULDN'T he write an insulting letter like that? He probably WANTS me to get angry and call her to tell her off. That's more business for him. This might sound crazy, but if you are familiar with attorneys, especially family law attorneys, this is a perfectly reasonable theory. Don't get angry.

Third, don't date or marry female law students or female attorneys.

I tell you all this as a man about to set out into a frightening job market (again) and a man who has learned a few lessons about the state of gender relations in the Western world. Things aren't good. They aren't good at all. When I first started thinking about men's issues, I read a book called The Myth of Male Power. I am sure you are familiar with Dr. Warren Farrell. While I don't agree with everything Dr. Farrell writes in Myth, it was the first time I had ever read a cogent and well-written analysis of the TRUE state of affairs in the war between the sexes. (It IS in fact a war). Luckily, I happened upon your writing. I read your posts on a regular basis after discovering the podcast that you did. Your writing is fantastic and is truly "a voice for men." Thank you for what you do.

As a young man still at the threshold of his adult life, I am lucky that I learned the lessons I did before I made a huge mistake (like getting married or having sex with a woman that would falsely accuse me of rape). You have used a word a few times in your writing when you speak of the future of the men's rights movement: survival. That is an unqualified truth that more young men like myself need to learn. Though it might seem extreme, I have made a few decisions about the way I will conduct my life that I think will keep me out of trouble and allow me to focus on my career and being the best man I can be:

1. I will not get married.
2. I will not date or "subsidize" a woman in any way.
3. I will share my views concerning men's rights with honesty, courage, and intelligence.

I just wanted to let you know that you have a fan. You can also be confident in the fact that I am a wild fire for the men's rights movement. Whenever the occasion arises, I am eager to discuss and debate these issues with women and ESPECIALLY with men. Keep up the great work, though I have one request: please think about the young men that could benefit from your wisdom. I read the post you wrote about how not to be the victim of a false rape allegation and I thought it was AWESOME. When the time is right, I will be sharing this information with my two younger nephews (when they are much older).

Thanks again for everything. I just donated through Paypal for your website. It is not much as I am a struggling law student, but I love what you do and wanted to help out in some small way.

A Modest Proposal for Male Reproductive Rights

roberthara · 23 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The issue of reproductive rights is, no doubt, one of the most important issues that any society deliberates. The decision to reproduce, with whom, when, and under what circumstances is, by far, the most important decision that any individual will make in their lifetime. Because of this human beings have, in every society, developed social conventions, laws, contraception, fertility control methods and medical procedures to both enable individuals to exercise control of and hold them responsible for their reproductive decisions. Since we are a diecious species the division of rights and responsibilities between genders is of tantamount importance and should be done so in an equitable manner if we are to value gender equality.

Yet one thing is certain: Women currently have total control l over their reproduction and exercise the right whether or not to assume whatever degree of parental responsibility they choose both before and after child birth. Men, on the other hand, have very little control over their reproduction and are held completely responsible for the choices women make as far as becoming a parent is concerned. There are those who would argue that this has largely been the case for most of civilized history and that it is only right and good. But this is not so.

As pointed out in a previous article, "The Real Reason We Do Not Have a Male Pill" the paradigm of reproduction before the advent of birth control and abortion was drastically different than what it is now. If a woman were to reproduce she had to do four things that were crucial for her well being and that of her offspring. These were:

1. Find a man who was able to assume the parental role of father
2. Find a man who was willing to assume the parental role of father
3. Make it worth said man's while to take on the parental role of father of her child
4. Do something to make said man feel assured that the child/ren she were to present to him were in fact his through chastity before their relationship, fidelity during the relationship or through flat out lying about who the real father was

If a woman failed to do these things and chose to have sex with a man, thus causing a pregnancy, (and make no mistake, I am talking about adult women who know where babies come from-not children) without doing these things then she would put herself and her offspring in a very precarious position. Likewise a man who wanted to become a father had to make decisions converse to the decisions a women would have to make such as carefully observing the woman's behavior as far as fidelity, assessing her motherly attributes and demonstrating his ability to assume the role of father to her child. Parental responsibilities were divided along the lines of care giver and home maker for the women and provider and protector for the man. These roles and responsibilities where never the result of social constructs such as "patriarchy" or "male privilege" or "gender stereotypes." Rather, they were deeply rooted in biology and the fact that they are ubiquitous throughout history and across all cultures proves this. This division of labor between men and women who chose to have children has resulted in many generations of healthy, happy children and the recognition of the responsibilities and rights of both parents is responsible for all of civilization as we know it.

Let us return to the state of reproductive rights and responsibilities as they stand today.

Currently, in addition to abstinence, women have virtually total control over if and when they become pregnant as well as with whom. Furthermore, any woman can, without the permission of the father, terminate a pregnancy after conception on demand and for any reason no matter what the relationship with the father. If she is not wed and decides to bring the pregnancy to term she can decide to keep the child or she can very easily give the child up for adoption without even having to notify the father. If she does decide to keep the child she can make the father a wage slave for the next eighteen years even if the father was lied to about her fertility status or the father was the victim of statutory rape. Furthermore, the father's right to parent his child by being part of the child's life and instilling his values as well as protecting the child from harm and the ability to simply see and share affection with his child is based in most part on the goodwill of the mother.

This is not good for children, and it is not only unfair, but underscores an incredibly inhumane set of circumstances that a particular group of much maligned people in our society are subject to-fathers.

Consider the fact that an astounding number of children, currently around 40% of all newborns in the U.S., are born out of wedlock to women, over 50% of whom, have never even lived with the fathers of their children. Also consider that 25% of all children in the U.S. are living off of food stamps. Consider again that fatherless children are susceptible to a wide array of physical, mental and social ills that include much higher rates of mortality in youth, morbidity in youth, mental illness, delinquency, criminality, addiction and incarceration-just to name a few. What is unnamed in that list and what is indeed incalculable is the denial of a set of needs children have which cannot be fulfilled by mothers alone. The need for someone to make you feel safe, the need for guidance and conditioning while developing into adulthood and advice throughout young adulthood and beyond-crucial advice. Perhaps most importantly is the need for a child to have a man-a father- hold their hand or comfort them when they are crying or to hear his voice say things like “I know you can do it”, “I am very proud of you” or simply “I love you”.

Family Planning services and the discussion surrounding family planning is all but entirely gynocentric. No one who believes in family planning services like contraception and abortion would deny that they are crucial to happy healthy children being born to mothers who are ready and willing to have children. Indeed, the proponents of these services sell the idea of family planning to politicians and the public in these terms. What is never mentioned, or even considered, are the familial planning needs of men and male reproductive agency. It is as if these things didn’t even exist, or even if they did, that they would be antithetical to the entire idea of family planning itself.

Are they?

Is it really dangerous to give men equal consideration in family planning and give them the same power to make decisions as to when and with whom they become parents? Is it really dangerous to allow men to have complete control over whether or not they become parents at all? As to the last question, keep in mind that men do not have complete control as to when they become parents. As noted above any woman can lie about her fertility status and, despite what many would have you believe, far too many women do just this in order to drag men into parenthood who are not ready or willing to become parents.

Think about it, do you really believe that every one of these single mothers by choice were completely honest about their fertility status? Do you really think that married couples who ostensibly didn’t want that third child simply had a “happy little accident” just like mommy said? We also need to ask if this is good for children. Is it ok to force a man to finance a child that he cannot afford? Is it good for children that men who do not want children simply because they don’t really care to have them be forced into the parental role of father to a child that they didn’t want?

Whenever a woman forces a man into fatherhood when he is not ready or willing and negative results occur it is he alone who is blamed. When he complains that he was tricked or wasn’t ready we always hear something along the lines of “you have the right to wear a condom” or “keep it in your pants.” Do women not have condoms? Do they not have diaphragms? Do they not have a whole arsenal of devices, pharmaceutical products and methods including “keeping their panties on” to prevent a pregnancy? Is it not extremely bigoted to tell men these things when they are forced into parenthood and complain about it? Are not men truly far more susceptible to forced (coerced) reproduction then women are? Can we honestly say that any woman can be coerced into being a parent when they have all of these fertility control options as well as the option of abortion and the ability to put the child up for adoption after birth? Amazingly, mothers even have the ability to abandon their children even up to the age of 14 under the safe haven laws.

Why is it that when we talk about reproduction we see women as having rights and no responsibilities and men as having no rights and all of the responsibilities?

This is clearly a big problem and the differential between rights and responsibilities between genders is the primary cause of fatherlessness in our society. This has been argued by many men who support the idea of male reproductive rights. The resistance to the idea of male reproductive rights, however, is intense and most see the problem as insoluble or the very idea of male reproductive rights as esoteric. But the problem of male reproductive rights is neither insoluble nor esoteric. There is nothing esoteric about a boy aged 14 who is forced to pay child support to his rapist and there is nothing insoluble about the problem of forcing men to become parents when Roe V. Wade clearly states that the imposition of parenthood is too much power for the state to hold.

Clearly something needs to be done.

There are two popular ideas that Lawyers and Men's Rights advocates tout concerning male reproductive rights. One proposal is to have a window of time in which a man gets to choose whether or not to assume the responsibilities for and assert the rights to his child that is contemporaneous to the period of time a woman can have an abortion. Another proposal is that, after the birth of a child, a man should be able to bring to court a case in which he can establish, by some standard of evidence, that he was misled by the mother who misrepresented her fertility status.

Both of these proposals are problematic. The window of time proposal makes the outcome of a case in which a mother does not inform the father of the pregnancy ambiguous. Would he be required to pay child support if only after the birth she decided to announce that he was a father? Could he assert his rights as a father if the mother did not want to have him in the child's life? How can he prove that he was lied to about the mother's fertility status if an "unwanted" pregnancy occurs? Are verbal contracts binding in such instances? Clearly establishing fault on the mother's part would be difficult and litigation would be expensive. Could a man with anything less than a substantial amount of money be able to defend himself from such a legal problem?

There is a third, less talked about, solution that could eliminate if not greatly mitigate the problems associated with the other two. This solution would come in the form of a legal document called an "Acknowledgement of Consent."

Before any mother can enter any court of law and demand support for her child at the expense of any man she must produce an Acknowledgement of Consent. This is a document signed by both parents in which the father asserts and the mother recognizes the father's rights also in which the father assumes the responsibilities outlined in the document. These rights and responsibilities would only apply if the child is biologically his or if otherwise stated as in the case of adoption.

This document would be presented to the putative father before conception, as in the case of a married couple planning to try for a child, after conception or even after the child is born. It would be presented in some certifiable manner (certified mail or signed in the presence of a witness) so that in the event that the mother conceals the pregnancy from the father he can still assert his rights if the mother attempts to exclude him from the life of his child. He can say that he was never notified and therefore never given the opportunity to make a decision to parent the child, giving him the ability to contend for fatherhood in court.

This legal instrument would not in any way diminish the reproductive rights of the mother. She still has available to her every form of contraception as ever, can still abort the pregnancy and in the case she wants to give the child up for adoption the father can still, in absence of being given proper notification, be given the chance to assert his rights and responsibilities as a father. The mother CAN NOT force him to sign the Acknowledgement of Consent thus giving the man full reproductive rights.

This will require that a mother or mother to be who wants a man to take on the role of father of her child to do four things:

1. Find a man who was able to assume the parental role of father
2. Find a man who was willing to assume the parental role of father
3. Make it worth said man's while to take on the parental role of father

4. Do something to make said man feel assured that the child/ren she were to present to him were in fact his through chastity before their relationship, fidelity during the relationship or have a DNA paternity test performed.

What would happen if women were again required to do these things when they wanted a man to take up the responsibility of providing for her children? There is almost no doubt that fatherlessness would all but disappear. Women would be forced to assume responsibilities to both their children and the fathers of their children commiserate with their rights as women and mothers. This, although some will surely disagree, is a modest proposal, one that involves the free will of both parties and the clear and necessary consideration of the children and of each parent for the other. In other words fathers would be put back into the equation of families giving children the proper upbringing they need and deserve.

Not only a modest proposal, but one that would have the most positive of outcomes.

Interesting icon no? This is my personal contribution to MRA art. Course I didn't do it all by myself. No, this piece took many years and a whole lot of help. It is somewhat of a work in progress. Feel free to contribute, there's always room for more. They say a picture is worth a thousand words and it's true. Take a moment to let this sink in.

After all- it's a portrait of you!

Previously "the thinker" now called "DAD"

Is your skin burning from the tattoo artists that have been shaping you into the latest master piece? Remember when you were a kid, you used to say, "sticks and stones"? Well if what you see here were just mutterings, I'd agree, but they're not. This is what your government see's- when and if they even choose to look at you. It's only taken the last 50 years of throwing shit to make it stick, and now it does. This is what women have been pedaling in the mainstream to invalidate you and anything good you might represent. It's been a very effective smear campaign because that's the way governments wanted it.

Dare I say that it must be true of every man because women say so?

Just ask their lawyers. And the words have been changed into sticks and stones that your government uses to define you and deal with you. From law enforcement, to the courts to your legislators, they got your number "man". Your personal history is gone, you are no longer an individual, your struggles and achievements do not represent you and what you see is what you are. And the man in the picture that I call "DAD" is exactly what is going through the minds of bureaucrats that will deal with you. Get used to it, this is all your government and country have to offer to you. You are a disease not safe for family consumption, so don't count on seeing your kids. As a matter of fact if you don't want to be arrested stay away from kid's altogether.

You are a piece of shit, fodder for the feminist service industry to repair, but at least you created a job for someone. If you're lucky you might even get drugs to help you along, psycho-active drugs; of course they might conflict with that drum they will have you beating on.

This is your new freedom, in the greatest democracy in the world, if you're lucky you can even die for it. Better yet just get maimed, permanently disabled, or psychologically traumatized and your status goes immediately from piece of shit to worthless piece of shit. Of course if you're a sperm donating father then you're a deadbeat piece of worthless shit.

And you were maimed by your own government. Of course, you can always rent an address from a friend in another state so they never come knocking on your door. If this was the titanic I would definitely be looking for icebergs, anything to get this tour over with.

If you believe this has been some sort of conspiracy by feminists, you're probably right. But what if you're wrong? What if the real culprits are governments, with a vested interest in removing your rights and freedoms by dividing the genders into a palpable war that fuels social discontent and actually promotes violence. Why would it be so hard to understand that policies that serve private industry and interests can be promoted within a disconnected bureaucracy, where the right hand does not know what the left hand is doing? Why would it be so hard to believe that feminism is the wife of government? And that a rape case against Julian Assange is nothing more than your government pimping out its whore wife– feminism.

Why is it so hard to believe that women as a gender having shared relational interdependence with men for thousands of years would magically over the course of 50 or even 100 years become independent and not turn to a relationship of dependence with your government? Why is it so hard to understand that feminism is a tool of the police state in which you live to provide evidence or accusation to justify any charge brought against you.?

Any woman not declaring herself a feminist is immediately admonished by her "sisters" to comply otherwise she won't make a good witness against you. Why is it so hard to see that as dependant as we are on our relationship with information, controlling that information is the best method to control us all? And that is why all media outlets are owned by a very few corporations. It only takes a few shepherds to watch over the flocks (by night).

How many times does the same fucking arguments have to be engaged to get through? I have been visiting men's sites for years and have finally been disjointed by the repetition of the same shit in a different suit. I particularly like reading comments from noobies and the guys who agree with the content but somehow figure their world is safe enough.

The hair splitting is entertaining too, cause the truth and accuracy will set you free!!

Something I have noticed in the many years of my life is that the truth is agreed upon and established by repetition. If you say it loud enough and long enough and often enough, it's true. Picture a snowball rolling down hill; ever notice how it only picks up the honest and accurate snow and leaves the rest behind?

I ran a business for a number of years and always had to deal with guys who were know it all's; loved to argue with me about what was the right way and what was the wrong way. I had one simple answer for them and it goes like this. Whether it's right or whether it's wrong doesn't matter, all that matters is whether you are willing to take the responsibility to answer for the choice. If I'm going to fire at the enemy, I'm not going to pick through the ammunition for the best one. Anything that will make them duck and run is fucking great as far as I'm concerned…..no argument. Abortion…bang Fatherlessness….bang Corruption…bang Sluts….bang Game…..bang anything…bang

If you think the truth matters, scroll up and have a look at that picture again, you missed it. (actually, I think the picture should be circulated far and wide for men to rally against)

Angry Harry and Paul Elam have just posted links to an activist page. I think this is the best thing since the fleshlight for guys who are getting itchy. As a matter of fact, for those who don't know, there's talk about censoring the internet and with the number of men's sites currently it's not hard to monitor them and take them down.

Imagine if this resource was not there the next time you log on.

I think we have reached a time when if you want this resource you better throw up a blog page. It's a lot harder to track 5000 pages than it is to track 50. Fuck it throw up two pages and make it 10,000. Just imagine all those bangs!! There might even be enough to screw up the resources to monitor them. I'm thinking of a site banner called "PIMPING FEMINISM" ideological sluts for hire. Bang! Actually I've been thinking of a few but can't decide any suggestions?

"The White Knight Project" tracking the rise of male prostitution

Males More Histrionic Than Females Over Rape Claims

False Rape Society · 26 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

New York Governor David Patterson has commuted the sentence of John White, a 50-something black father, who was serving a two-to-four year sentence for manslaughter in the shooting death of 17-year-old Daniel Cicciaro, who was white. The tragic shooting stemmed from a false rape claim.

At his trial, Mr. White testified that late in the evening of August 9, 2006, his 19-year-old son, Aaron, woke him up to tell him that he had just come from a party where a young woman wrongly accused him of threatening to rape her on a MySpace posting. Aaron told his father that a group of angry white youths were headed to their house to beat him up because they wrongly believed the young woman. Mr. White and his son walked to the end of their driveway to confront the youths, and in the heated confrontation that followed, young Mr. Cicciaro was killed. Mr. White claimed his gun accidentally discharged.

The girl later recanted the rape claim.

Mr. Cicciaro's mother, Joanne Cicciaro, said her son was trying to protect the girl. "The thing is, that night, Daniel believed Aaron threatened to rape a girl that was like his little sister."

One boy is dead, and a father was imprisoned after a racially charged trial that divided a city. But the girl, apparently, escaped unscathed.

The scope of the tragedy is Shakespearean. But it raises an important issue that we frequently confront at my blog, False Rape Society. Those of us who follow the false rape phenomenon see patterns of gendered reactions to rape claims. Based on my review of the reported cases, it is fair to assert that men, as befitting their status since the beginning of time as women's protectors, typically express greater outrage over rape claims than do women.

This is in contrast to the significant number of women who treat the notion of rape so cavalierly that either they tell rape lies in order to serve some ulterior, selfish purpose (only a small percentage of women actually tell rape lies, just as only a small percentage of men actually rape), or they minimize, excuse, or rationalize false rape claims (a far more significant percentage of women do this).

Mr. Cicciaro's death is just one of many tragedies stemming from male outrage over false rape claims. A 15-year-old girl falsely told her boyfriend that Sumbo Owoiya, 18, raped her. The girl, the boyfriend, and another man then drove to the innocent youth's apartment. While Mr. Owoiya was looking through a peep hole, the other man shot him to death through the door. The boyfriend was sentenced to seven years imprisonment, but the girl was given a suspended sentence. We wrote about it here: http://glennsacks.com/blog/?p=3316

Last year, two teenage girls lied to a 19-year-old man that another 19-year-old, Cory Headen, had raped one of them, so the man broke into Mr. Headen's home and beat him to death with a baseball bat while he was sleeping. At the man's trial, the judge described the teens who accused Mr. Headen of rape as "stupid, drunken, immature girls" who delivered a vile message. The judge sentence the man who did the beating to seven years in prison. One young man was dead, another's life was destroyed, all because of a false rape claim, and the girls who ignited the fire apparently escaped unscathed. We wrote about it here: http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2009/08/awful-price-of-false-rape-claim-one-man.html

John Chalmers, a 47-year-old prominent businessman, suffered devastating brain injuries in a vicious attack after a woman's brother was wrongly convinced that Mr. Chalmers had raped his sister, so the brother thrashed Mr. Chalmers. So terrible was the beating that Mr. Chalmers has had to "learn everything again." We wrote about it here: http://falserapesociety.blogspot.com/2009/03/man-viciously-attacked-suffers.html

Darrell Roberson had come home unexpectedly from a trip when he found his wife, Tracy Roberson, and her lover, Devin LaSalle, together in Mr. LaSalle's truck. To cover up her affair, Mrs. Roberson falsely told her husband she had been raped, and Mr. Roberson shot and killed Mr. LaSalle. In a rare switch, a grand jury refused to indict Mr.

Roberson, but Ms. Roberson was charged, convicted, and imprisoned for five years for involuntary manslaughter. "The wrong person went to prison," fumed Jill Davis, Roberson's attorney. Read about it here: http://www.star-telegram.com/2008/05/05/623920/arlington-mom-who-cried-rape-gets.html

And we could go on and on and on. Men, far more than women, typically are the ones who act out their rage when it comes to rape claims. They usually don't go so far as to murder the accused, but they manifest their vitriol in any number of other ways.

This, of course, points up the monstrous lie repeated with zombie-like repetition by members of what can aptly be called the sexual grievance industry. They insist that rape is normalized, rationalized, and excused, principally by men, in our so-called "rape culture." This, of course, is just another in a cavalcade of offensive, gender-divisive straw men concocted by persons financially dependent on the counterfeit perception that rape is a massive, unresolved problem that only they can solve.

The Cicciaro death, and the other tragedies stemming from false rape claims, raise a more sinister question: what role do men play in fostering our false rape culture? While rape liars must always assume principal responsibility for their falsehoods, and while the sexual grievance industry pumps out a steady diet of Chicken Little propaganda to foment good old fashioned lock-the-doors-hide-the-daughters rape hysteria, it seems that men and boys falsely accused of rape are mostly harmed by the overreactions of other men. It is mostly men who beat them to death, who fire them from their jobs, who splash their names all over the newspaper, and who are too quick to arrest and charge them on the basis of an unsubstantiated claim before an investigation has been concluded.

If the false rape crisis is to end, we must ask whether men, acting out their roles as women's protectors, have become the unwitting tools of the politicized purveyors of misandry, who are all too happy to see men overreact at the slightest whiff of rape.

For the Benefit of Newcomers: A Review of Some Basics

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 27 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

The non-feminist revolution is growing — no doubt of that. I see signs of this busting out everywhere, like the first crocuses of spring or the first influx of robins. Sometimes I think it is just my imagination. That is, I quickly grow accustomed to the latest hints of quickening life and these in turn quickly become the new norm, the new baseline. Hence, these things become old hat. And straightway, stasis and boredom set in, and it feels like nothing is changing after all. So I become jaded, and I write off my spell of hopeful enthusiasm as "imagination". But then, without warning, larger and improved signs of life arise to remind me yet againthat I am NOT imagining this.

Yes. So much is happening — everywhere, all at once, at all levels — that it always comes back around to the vexed question of where to begin.How to start talking about all of this? Especially with new recruits and sympathizers, who have arrived by way of the grassroots? For are they not themselves the foremost among those signs of life which I have spoken of?

Aye, it is good that these new ones have arrived by way of the grassroots, because this thing of ours is a grassroots revolution before all else. It is a revolution of, by, and for the people, with its wellspring in the mundane micro-world — the non-political universe of everyday thoughts, feelings, conversations, conclusions and decisions. Such is the territory to be reclaimed, and fiercely guarded. And all manner of intellectual machinery — even the loftiest — may eventually be inducted into the service of this micro-world. But for the present, let us make the evils and blessings of the day, sufficient unto the day.

I write with newcomers chiefly in mind, although old-timers are welcome to profit by anything they find here. But I will address the question of "where to begin" quite simply, by embarking directly from where the new arrival is most likely to be. And that is, in a state of perplexity. "Where do I fit in?" is what the newcomer will most likely be asking. The newcomer wants a map, marked with a bold, bright 'X' upon the spot where he or she is presently situated. And I will undertake to provide such a map, and to proffer such hints and helps upon the journey as will assist the pilgrim to draw the big, bold X-mark from his or her own reasoned conclusions.

At the outset, I feel safe in concluding that you are not a feminist. I am so sure of this, that I will take it as the organizing premise for all that follows. If you are not dead certain, at the very least, that you are not a feminist, then I would counsel you to retire elsewhere until you have cemented this conviction firmly in your own mind.

Very well, let us review a few basic things. I say a few, because there exist far more such things than I can do justice to in the allotted space. So I will stick to such items as a newcomer would find profitable for orientation. Accordingly, since you, the newcomer, are not a feminist, I think it is safe to say that you are situated in the non-feminist portion of reality. What do you think: does that sound about right to you?

Good. Now, if it will further assist your understanding, think of a hard line drawn straight through the middle of the human race. On the one side of this line, picture a banner with the word FEMINIST inscribed upon it. And on the other side, a banner inscribed with the word NON-FEMINIST. Are you visualizing that?

What you are mentally depicting, is something we call the sector system.And what is the purpose of this . . sector system? I'm glad you asked! Simply put, the sector system is an efficient way to organize your thinking in terms of the larger sociopolitical struggle which presently engages us. Yes, each side of that conceptual line is called a sector –that is the term we use. And so accordingly, we have both a feminist sector and a non-feminist sector. And friend, you and I both know which sector we belong to . . . don't we?

The sector system is useful because it throws feminism on the defensive, forcing it to justify its own presence on earth by answering to something objectively OTHER than itself. Feminism is not the world, but the feminists want very badly to convince the world otherwise. And feminist behavior toward the rest of us is very much like American foreign policy:"We will bring you the blessings of our way of life whether you asked for it or not! We know what is good for you!" But again, the sector system rises up as a challenge to the feminist attitude.

Yes, the hubris and arrogance of feminism has been colossal; it is a revolution meant to encompass even the tiniest dimensions of life, and it aims to convert the rest of the world entirely to feminism — it will not take no for an answer! The feminist posture toward the rest of the world is one of sheer aggression, blended with a heavy dose of totalitarian psychology — a macro-plan which they intend to cram into the micro,whether the micro wants it or not! The micro? That's you and me, friend!

Briefly then, feminism does not look kindly upon the existence of anything independent of itself or unequivocally other than itself. That is to say: the feminist sector aims to squeeze the non-feminist sector completely out of existence.

And what is wrong with that, you ask? Many things, foremost of which is that the project which feminism proposes is impossible; it cannot be accomplished; it is a falsehood from the very outset, and to impose it by force can only end in grief and calamity for all concerned. But however far the wreckage extends, feminism can never force the non-feminist sector to stop existing. And that is for the same reason that a lie can never force the truth to stop existing.

The True Believers of the feminist cult believe that Feminist Theory has the power to explain all of life, universally. But the falsehood of this can be demonstrated, and indeed, has been so demonstrated, thousands of times, by the philosophers of the non-feminist revolution. These fine thinkers have plied their trade patiently, and thanklessly, for many years. The reason they advance so slowly, is because they are voices in the wilderness with so very little power against a massively entrenched establishment. When the powers-that-be ordain you as the "village idiot", nothing you say carries any weight. What walks tallest upon this earth is not truth, righteousness, or intellectual integrity, but power pure and simple. The powers-that-be know this well, and they chortle about it.

It makes no matter if feminism has been discredited a thousand times, or ten thousand, or untold thousands. All of that intellective work is no better than spinning your wheels in the mud if it gains you no traction in the arena of sociopolitics. So here is where the sector system turns the tables. In one clean stroke — by merely declaring itself!– the non-feminist sector delivers a revolutionary message that feminism is not the world. By sheer self-announcement, non-feminism occupies space in the world and demands to know what the hell feminism plans to do about this. It is as if non-feminism were saying to feminism "what the hell makes you think you are the only game in town?" In the end, the message of the non-feminist sector to the feminist sector, is a simple, non-negotiable DEMAND FOR SOVEREIGN CO-EXISTENCE.

And what does this mean in terms of everyday practice? It means you are entitled to proclaim openly, even loudly, that you are not a feminist, to go your jolly way unmolested, and to quietly pass the balance of your days in a like manner. At first, this might not sound like anything much, but I can assure you that the moral dimensions are critically significant. And in time, those dimensions will fan out into other dimensions.

As a non-feminist, you are nowise bound to answer to any feminist for your personal indifference toward feminism. That fact is immensely important. On the face of it, there is no better warrant to be so interrogated by any feminist, than to correspondingly interrogate said feminist in non-feminist terms. What gives them the right, anyway? Who do these people think they are?

Remember, that you have told them nothing save that you are not a feminist. And that reveals very little about you — in fact virtually nothing! And so long as you say no more about yourself, they cannot possibly know more. THEY might think that it says a lot about you, that you would verbally disown feminism. But they are just plain wrong! For they cannot possibly know what another person understands by the word "feminism" if that other person does not explain what he understands by it. So they areout-of-bounds if they merely presume that the non-feminist means the same thing by "feminism" as THEY do, and they are a thousandfold out-of-bounds if they derive any moral imputation from such a circumstance.

We have a special counter-feminist name for this feminist “presumption of shared meaning”. That name is feminist subjectivism. Feminist subjectivism embraces the fullness of feminism’s narrative authority, and may be understood as the sum total of stories which the feminists tell themselves about themselves, and so are constrained to tell others. Among such “stories” may be included the many conflicting, ill-defined, and incoherent understandings of the word feminism. Thus, feminist self-definition comes under the broad umbrella of feminist subjectivism, and will be found to be pivotal.

Feminist subjectivism combines readily, and rapidly, with the feminist conceit that feminism is the world — or at least, that feminism authoritatively interprets the world. Thus, it is nigh on impossible for a deeply indoctrinated feminist to accurately assess people and circumstances in the non-feminist world — which, truth to say, lurks around every corner! Given that those external objects are not permitted to operate under their own laws and narratives — or not acknowledged to do so — they are transformed by the feminist gaze into a projective hallucination of feminism itself, and feminism becomes, for its participants, a house of mirrors with no windows.

Feminism’s projective hallucination is simply the worldly gamut of people and situations interpreted to fit feminist theory, and as such, it composes the actual fabric of the wall. Such is the transformation wrought by the feminist gaze. To phrase this more elegantly, the projection is not projected onto the wall — it IS the wall. It is objective reality subjectivized, which is precisely what makes it hallucinatory. It is like a fantastical soap-film of deluded understanding which clings to the surface of people and situations, falsifies their nature, and blocks the feminist gaze precisely at its opaque boundary — so that the world beyond becomes impenetrable to feminist comprehension.

But the opacity works only in one direction — from the inside-out. From the outside-in, however, the wall is transparent, even non-existent! In consequence, we on the outside can see those on the inside very, very clearly, yet cannot be truthfully seen by them!

And everything we do means something different to them, than it does tous. And so they would have us believe, that whatever they think we are doing . . . is in fact what we are doing! You see, they have never bothered to consult us about this! Apparently, they know more about us than we do!

Very well. Their delusion about us is the “original sin” in this scenario, the initializing transgression that started the whole charade rolling. Yes, they started it! They have built their supposed higher understanding upon a theoretical foundation that is far from settled, and therefore open to dispute. But they will not (because they cannot) acknowledge this, and not to mince words, it means that they are living a lie. And since they are living a lie, they cannot afford to see or comprehend anything that wouldgive the lie to that lie. That is why they cannot see past the hallucinatory wall of their house of mirrors, and why we can see them with more authority than they can see themselves. We are not encumbered by a deception from the outset.

That is also why they have sewn us into the fabric of their hallucination — fraudulently turning us into something we are not, and making that falsification binding upon us. They have, to coin a new word, hallucifiedus — even though we are REAL and know that we are real! And the more we struggle to break free from this trap, the more surely we “become” what the eye of feminist subjectivism insists upon seeing — because, so far, they have the worldly power to “make it stick”. We are both real AND the figment of another’s disordered imagination, and it does not please us to be trapped in such a paradoxical hell.

So much for the evils of feminist subjectivism. It suffices to understand that this can’t go on forever, and can only culminate in violence and destruction — that the house of mirrors will be shattered without mercy, but that said shattering will not go unaccompanied by a general shattering of everybody and everything. In short, a pandemonium from which none will find haven — that is, unless we take considered steps, and right soon, to forestall such an eventuality.

Very well, the new recruit to our scene is at the very least not a feminist.That is neither asking, nor expecting, too much. I hope I have made clear by now, that people other than feminists are permitted to furnish adefinition of feminism according to their own criteria. I say this simply because the objective reality of feminism is as real as the subjective reality of it, because that objective reality is knowable only by an objective seer who walks an objective path of knowledge, and finally because feminists themselves, of all people on earth, are the least amenable to such a path.

To suggest that we are “misrepresenting” feminism is itself a misrepresentation. We are not misrepresenting it, but rather RE-representing it. It is our weighty conclusion, that the feminists themselves cannot be trusted to represent feminism accurately beyond the limits of their own sector. I mean, that while the feminist word about feminism is undoubtedly true within the moral gravity-well of the feminist sector, it merits no credence anywhere outside that perimeter. Such are the fruits of feminist subjectivism. Accordingly, what a feminist says about feminism, though it be the sweetest of nectars within the feminist domain, at once becomes the untreated effluent of a sewerwhen it overflows into the non-feminist sector. Feminism’s writ does not run beyond feminism’s border, and that includes both narrative authority and the power of definition. Again, feminism is not the world.

And so you, my recently-arrived friend, face a question that we all face at some point in our counter-feminist careers. You have confirmed in your own mind that you are not a feminist, and you now propose to sink operative roots in non-feminist territory. But have you thought long and hard about what it really means, to be a non-feminist? Algebraically, what does it mean to be not X? Clearly, you must know the value of the term X. And in the social algebra which presently concerns us, you must likewise know the value of the term feminist. Or more to the point, the termfeminism.

So it is not enough simply to know that you are not a feminist. You must, in addition, have a clear, precise conceptual model of what this thing feminism actually IS — so that X becomes a known quantity. And finally, in order that you will not be at cross-purposes with your non-feminist cohorts, your conceptual model of feminism ought to bear a marked similarity to their conceptual models — so that you and they shall agree upon the value of X, and shall proceed, as it were, by an algebraic understanding of things. I go now to enlarge upon this.

The non-feminist sector is populated by a variety of humans of both sexes, who cover the spectrum of human nature, and about whom no moral generalization is either possible or politically relevant. The non-feminist sector — or as habituated insiders would more tersely say, the sector — includes folk who are in varying stages of political awakening. Some of them do not yet know that they are non-feminists; the question has not yet migrated to the forefront and become vital for them. Such ones are distinguished chiefly by the nascent elements of a worldview which, if fully fleshed-out, would urge some manner of political confrontation with feminism. But, they haven’t quite yet gotten there.

However, there will come a time when the inert non-feminist turns into an activated non-feminist, or if you prefer, a partisan of the non-feminist sector. This is when confrontation becomes imminent. The partisan will gravitate toward the sphere of real-world practice, and will need to direct her endeavor toward a target of operations — a defined region of sociopolitical space. So the need arises for a pragmatic template by which to chart this defined region. And when all activated non-feminists have mastered this template, we say that they have gained critical consensus, or more precisely, target consensus. The character of their separate endeavors may vary tremendously as per ways and means, but it is imperative they converge upon the same target of operations with the necessary esprit de corps.

Briefly, they must be unlike the blind men in the fable, for they must see the elephant. And that is especially true if they are working on different parts of the elephant, in which case they must communicate and coordinate.

Target consensus is founded upon a common understanding of what feminism IS, and this understanding informs all decisions about what to strike, and when, and how. And counter-feminist analysis claims to provide the master template, the parting of the waters, the necessary objective vision of reality that will generate target consensus and render activated non-feminist projects operable.

The non-feminist revolution is every imaginable thing that is willfullyopposed to feminism. It is found side-by-side with every imaginable thing that is simply not feminism. These two categories are both not feminism, but the former is activated while the latter is inert. And the non-feminist sector is the territory which they cohabit. It is critical to understand that this territory is in no sense a “movement”, but only a container of everything that is not feminism — only some of which is presently trying to damage feminism.

And the non-feminist revolution itself is likewise not a “movement”, but a motley, sprawling aggregate of separate and distinct motions that are sometimes aware of each other, and other times not. However, these separate motions are in the process of finding each other and synchronizing their efforts. We call this a “revolution” because it serves to turn the tables, and if there were another word more all-embracing than revolution – we would use it.

As simply as can be stated, the goal of the non-feminist revolution is to bring about feminism’s moral isolation by driving a wedge between feminism and non-feminism, and by reducing feminism’s presently vague and fuzzy borders to a sharp line that anybody can clearly discern. This will embrace a multitude of operations, both intellectual and political, and will prove fatal to feminism if properly carried out.

The present treatise does not aim to bring the newcomer to a point of target consensus. That is a task the reader must herself gradually bring to fruition in her own way. But I have posed for consideration, in a merely rhetorical fashion, the question of the reader’s non-feminism. I have urged the reader to ponder what that non-feminism might actually consist of, and I have stressed the importance of aligning such mental ingredients with those of other non-feminist partisans, in furtherance of our work.

The newcomer has likely heard of certain individuals known as “MRAs”, and been made aware that many of them, at any rate, have a rather piquant reputation. With respect to these . . “MRA” people, altogether too little, and too much, has been said. So at the risk of saying either too little or too much, I will venture another groat upon the heap: that any non-feminist man or woman who is “all fired up” about the idea that men are human beings with human dignity and human rights, may properly consider himself or herself an MRA.

But for the feminists, who are the dullest clods on earth and have no idea what is going on, the term MRA is simply an emotional lightning-rod for their barely suppressed guilt, and for their growing anxiety about feminism’s future.

On that note I conclude this treatise, trusting that the reader has gleaned something of value by the study of it.

All women are pedophiles and that's all they are

Paul Elam · 29 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

There have been innumerable, wanton characterizations of men as sexual deviants over the last few decades. This was reflected on directly by Marilyn French, who penned the idea that "All men are rapists and that's all they are."

Perhaps, in her quest for social justice, though, she neglected to consider the part of equality that involves equality. And in doing so, Ms. French, who inspired the title to this article, aided the world in overlooking a rather glaring problem. That would be the epidemic of female sexual predators that have infested our public schools.

It is a problem out of control largely because everyone knows that women don't do such things, right? It gives credence to the truism first uttered by Mark Twain. "It ain't what you don't know that gets you into trouble. It's what you know for sure that just ain't so."

Oh, and lest you think that the following pervs represent too small a percentage of teachers to bear meaning, please keep in mind that these are not just normal teachers, whose offending numbers are much, much greater. In fact, here is a couple of hundred more of those for your edification. These, however, are just a sampling of predatory special education teachers. You know, the ones that oversee the development of mentally and emotionally challenged children; the absolutely most vulnerable children of all.

To be fair, it was not clear in some cases whether their victims were developmentally disabled children, or just "normal" children who happened to wander into their clutches. Either way, this should call into question how we address female pedophiles in this society. Most of these women were given slaps on the hand, of course, in exchange for the lives they screwed up. It's the way we do it here.

But one must wonder if the time for chemical and/or surgical intervention should be undertaken to curb the abhorrent impulses of these sexual deviants. Perhaps at the very least we should consider life imprisonment with no possibility of parole. Even the death penalty could be placed on the table.

So many options, so little motivation for society to recognize the problem.

Don't stop reading when you get to the last to these teachers gone wrong. There is a couple of bonus categories at the end. We may well need them before this is over.

Here is just a few examples of women who turn special education into special abuses.

Apparently, some schools are more infected than others. These next two teachers shown here were molesting the same 13 year old boy, at the same time, and were not even aware of each others actions. Following those examples of toxic femininity are a short list of school administration officials and wives who wanted their fair share of kiddie sex. Much more to come on this in the future.

[image]
Linda Nef, 46, was one of two teachers from Bountiful Junior High School in Utah, accused of sexually assaulting the same 13-year-old boy. Nef was a studies teacher and cheerleading adviser at the time of her arrest.
[image]
Christine Camer, 58, of La Quinta, California, a former assistant principle of La Quinta Middle School, was arrested on January 23, 2010, for suspicion of lewd acts with a child under the age of 14 and oral copulation with a person under age 16.

On March 6, 2009, Valynne Bowers, 39, was one of two teachers from Bountiful Junior High School in Utah, accused of sexually assaulting the same 13-year-old boy. According to the Bountiful police, the two teachers were unaware of each other's involvement with the same boy until recently

[image]

Donna Lou Sanders, 46, was a special education teacher and wife of the assistant principle of Magnolia High School in Magnolia, Arkansas, when she was arrested and charged with two counts of accomplice to rape, four counts of third-degree sexual assault, and six counts of permitting abuse of a minor. She was charged after an investigation determined she allegedly took a 12-year-old girl and 13-year-old girl to a motel so they could sex with underaged boys and a 22-year-old man they met through Facebook.

The assistant principal of Middleton High School in Tampa, Lauren Tilo, 30, has been accused of sending a sexually explicit photo of herself to a 14-year-old boy.

Seriously, I had to force myself to stop laughing long enough to post this video. I know the person that posted it to my Facebook page, but don't know yet if that is the same person who made the vid.

Whoever it was, thank you. It made my day. Lyrics are posted below the video.

Lyrics:

Christopher Kilmartin and the Amazing Frozen Vagina

Paul Elam · 30 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]t began innocently enough. A group of men at a country club had a men's only golf tournament. In retrospect, I suppose, that should have been the first warning sign. It is common knowledge that when men group together, to the exclusion of women, some nefarious purpose is afoot. OK, so maybe when buildings are burning down or bullets are flying on battle fields, or something goes bump in the night we might find a million or so exceptions. But better not to dwell on such trivialities, especially in light of what those misogynistic, toxically masculine golfers were up to.

You see, for their locker room party they ordered an ice sculpture. No, not just any ice sculpture, but one of a woman, butt nekkid, sitting with legs open (as though inviting a rape), sending a streaming flow of vodka from between her parted, seductively melting thighs.

Oh, the horror; the despicableness; the sexually objectifying vodka pissing depravity of it all.

Thank God and male feminists we have the likes of Christopher Kilmartin to put the thaw on this abomination, uncovering our denial of the violence against women that invariably ensues when blocks of ice are carved into particular, female forms and enjoyed in the hideous, shadowy world of male dominated golf tournaments.

They apparently have a mesmerizing effect, freezing the sensibilities of even good men (as if those exist), making them dangerous to the whole of womankind.

"[A]lthough I'm sure they didn't realize it," Kilmartin postulates in an article for National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS), "every one of them made it just a little more possible for any one of them to commit an act of violence against a woman."

Kilmartin seems willing to give the men credit that the threat they are creating toward women was out of ignorance. Damn them all to hell, I say; the oppressive, leering, moustache twirling lot of them. We have only to look at Kilmartin's erudite understanding of the matter to know why that any mollycoddling of these men (and I use that term loosely) is a grave mistake.

Kilmartin, the real postmodern man among men, lays out the plain, simple and unassailable facts as only a men's studies scholar could, or would. He writes,

> Men's violence is the single most serious health problem for women in the United States. It causes more harm than accidents, muggings, and cancer combined. For women aged 15-44, an estimated 50% of emergency room visits are the result of violence at the hands of their husbands, boyfriends, ex-husbands, or ex-boyfriends.

Did you get that? The most serious health problem for women in the United States! Half of all women who visit the ER for treatment got there because some bastard was beating her! And we are wasting time on pink ribbons and breast cancer fundraisers?

Mind you, Chris (and I hope he doesn't mind my using his name in such a familiar way) didn't link or post any sources for his information; an understandable oversight, I am sure. It could happen to anyone, and often does in his milieu.

So I took the liberty of doing some checking.

It seems there is no actual evidence to support any of these claims. It did, however, appear to come directly from the mouth of former Surgeon General of the United States, Antonia Novello. Novello, sister-in-law to Don Novello, aka Father Guido Sarducci of Saturday Night Live fame, was the first female Surgeon General for the United States.

Novello's statements were similarly unsupported with research. They actually appeared more to be a bit of a political rant for the media, but of course we won't let that rustle our feathers, either. Men's studies, and in no small part due to efforts by men like Chris, has blessed us by removing the burden of hard evidence in forming opinions about social realities.

He got the numbers from a credible person, after all, an esteemed doctor and politician. That should be enough, right? I don't even think we should pay much mind to the fact that our first female surgeon general was also the first surgeon general to be convicted of a felony after leaving office.

Novello was charged in a 20 count indictment on May 12, 2009, in New York with theft of government services, defrauding the government and filing a false instrument.On June 26, 2009, in a plea deal with prosecutors, she pleaded guilty to one charge of filing a false document involving a worker's duties.

Certainly things like fraud and filing false documents by a politician should not cause us to question her veracity. After all, for all we know those brigands at the country club set her up for a fall.

They might have done the same number on NOMAS's Barry Goldstein. Goldstein, whose JD is touted proudly on the pages of the NOMAS website, is, among other things, the co-chair of the NOMAS Task Group on Child Custody.

Oh yes, he was also stripped of his law license for committing fraud on a court in a case that involved domestic violence.

I am not faulting Chris for the company he keeps. After all, there is a mission here, and the ends obviously take precedence over credibility and accuracy. Quoting convicted felons, hanging with disgraced shysters and fabricating facts are just necessary measures in the age of frozen vaginas.

And this brings to mind some need for action by all of us interested in using masculine power to mindlessly sacrifice for the benefit of women everywhere, against all enemies, foreign or domestic, real or imagined, proven or perjured.

First, there is the matter of the USDOJ. They are spreading disinformation about the incidence of domestic violence related emergency room visits.

The DOJ reports that 17% of those requiring ER treatment for violence-related injuries, about 243,000 persons, had been injured by someone with whom they had an intimate relationship; a husband, ex-husband, boyfriend, girlfriend, ex-boyfriend, or ex-girlfriend.

This is curious, and where the math gets fuzzy, given we live in a nation that hosts over 116 million ER visits per annum.

Note that these numbers reflect treatment for violence related injuries, again which only make up 17% of all emergency room visits, and that the numbers also included male victims

Wha? Male Victims? No bother, we can correct that later.

Anyway, let's see what we have to do in order to understand the importance and accuracy of Chris's numbers. According to the DOJ, women were more likely than men to have been injured by an intimate. So let's assume for the sake of postmodern guises that there was only one man who was treated for injuries by a woman in that group. And let us also assume that no women at all were injured by strangers or other acquaintances in the commission of crimes like rape and robbery.

There now, that only leaves us with the need to accept that 99.085% of all ER visits are men, and that half of the remaining .015% of visits that represent women are those brought on by physically abusive partners or former partners, all of whom are male. Viola, there you have it. 50% of all ER visits by women are because of IPV. It has to be true, right? Were it not, then that would make Christopher Kilmartin an intentionally deceptive piece of rent-seeking pond scum. And how could a man who keeps the company he does be anything like that?

More vodka, please. Cold and neat and make it a double.

And speaking of drinking, has the DOJ staff been hitting the super chilled vaginal vodka themselves, or is something else wrong here? It can't be Chris, as he has already demonstrated the awesome credibility of his sources and those of NOMAS as well.

We will simply have to work harder at this. So my fellow men, I implore you, help me stop the spread of the DOJ propaganda machine. It starts with us, of course. Please confront each other accordingly.

And who knows where it may take us. Chris has unveiled a seemingly innocuous bit of fun by golfers for the pernicious and sinister threat to women that it is. And he has proven it with statistical evidence suitable to be recorded with the finest crayons.

[image]But this rabbit hole may run much deeper than we know at present. I mean can you ever look at a fountain like this (see right) again, in the same way, now that you know the truth? How many wars has this "art" caused? How much degradation and shame? And how many Lorena Bobbit's are out there, one visual image away from wielding a knife of vengeance on behalf of all women?

I don't know, but I intend to help.

It seems clear that men like Christopher Kilmartin and Michael Kimmel (Kilkimmel for the sake of brevity), are now intent on getting their message out there past the insulated, back patting circles of feminist academe. They are now posting to sites like The Good Men Project, spreading the word about evil masculinity and how feminist doctrine can help us all build a better, more principled world (after all, look what it did for the attorney general's office- and the credibility of NOMAS).

I want the readers of A Voice for Men to know that I am going to be out there doing my part; shedding light on Kilkimmel's work, and passing it around as much as possible so everyone can have a good, long sobering look at what these men really represent.

In fact, I'd say that 2011, hell or high water, is going to be a year dedicated to following their efforts, and heeding their call to ask good men to do something about it.

Staring Out from the Abyss

Lecture No. 1

"I love an opposition that has convictions" – Frederick the Great

The Battle of the Sexes has degenerated into a Dirty War, and we are, each of us, being drafted into it by forces who care not a whit for equality or fairness.

Propaganda, as a tool of control, is effective only insofar as the vision of the world that it presents concords with the perception of the world experienced day-to-day by its targets. The wider the gap between the perceived world and the propagandistic representation of the world, the less effective – and therefore less useful – the propaganda will ultimately be. We have reached a juncture at which women are increasingly rejecting feminism as irrelevant or inapplicable to their lives, because the world that feminist orthodoxy describes does not appear to be planet Earth. At the same time, we are approaching a zenith of feminist control over the actual inhabited world, which combines state repression with gender tribalism, both forces intensifying exponentially as they use each other as leverage to climb ever higher.

I am reminded of an ancient riddle, which asks, 'how high can one climb up a mountain?' The answer is 'to the top,' because once you reach the summit, the only possible way is down. Feminism has no obstacles left; total control is within its grasp, and by total, I do mean in the sense that it shall be totalitarian. The victim card has served as an entry pass through the back door of state and supranational institutions. Now empowered over men, feminists have re-established the principles of Valerie Solanas' Scum Manifesto, declaring – in language clearly evocative of the Final Solution – that we shall soon witness The End of Men. The 'sex war' is not cooling down as women approach (or in some cases, surpass) equality with men – it is heating up. Feminists are not only publicly inciting male hatred and getting away with it, they are using their positions in government, in academia, in think tanks and in the media to make their violent fantasies a reality, advocating the renunciation of men's basic human rights.

To take one recent example, the Secretary of State of the most powerful nation in the world announced in 2010 that an international mobile prosecution unit shall be established specifically to target men around the world. To take another recent example, a leading feminist has suggested that certain legal principles designed to protect innocent citizens from persecution and unjust imprisonment, dating back to the signing of the Magna Carta, should be withdrawn from men. Nor is feminism a problem confined to the Western world. Men are subject to the arbitrary rule of women in India, facing severe penalties for inadvertently causing the slightest offense.

None of this squares with the 'women-as-victim' cliché, which has so usefully served feminists in getting to this point. Nevertheless, feminism is firmly entrenched and in control of the mechanisms which boast the monopoly on physical power, legitimate or otherwise. There is hardly any countervailing force which remains. The West has found its new Imperial Mission to replace Global Christendom: enforced worship of women. As any dissenting voice is immediately and violently stamped out, feminists are free to radicalize their anti-male agenda to the point of moral sickness and to unleash unto the world all manner of vindictive atrocities.

For you see, when propaganda has ceased to be an effective tool of control, one seeking control will simply find other means. Control of the state – the monopoly on physical violence – is the means which feminists have sought. But unlike propaganda, which manipulates the mind, state control only brutalizes the body. The power of the controllers always ultimately rests upon the resilience of the controlled, hence consent must still be manufactured. The Roman Empire did not last for five hundred years by the exercise of brute force, but by mass support; the Emperor was glorified as a mortal deity, and even the smallest townships in his realm voluntarily erected statues and altars in his honor. For too long, men have been worshiping at the altar of the female, and it is tempting to believe that this psychological submission will not yield even in the face of physical oppression or extermination – that men will march to their demise like sacrificial lambs, hoping to win women's favor with their last servile actions. But proclamations regarding The End of Men may well turn out to be as empty as those which were made nearly twenty years earlier, concerning The End of History. The so-called Clash of Civilizations which followed led that author to refute his own position. We should be optimistic that a true Clash of the Sexes will soon have feminist-minded women eating crow.

As feminism grows ever more powerful, and begins to realize its radical ambitions, it will simultaneously exhaust its capacity for manufacturing consent. Those chivalric illusions which ensure the consent of men, and which feminism ultimately rests upon – 'women-as-victim,' 'women-as-precious,' 'women-as-helpless,' and so on – will become rather more difficult to maintain in time. The more force is advanced against men to bridle and inhibit their lives, the more discontent shall be nurtured among them. The misandry bubble is due to burst, and with every example of overreach, which sees yet more good men cast into the role of criminal and subjected to humiliating and vicious punishments, another crack appears in the wall, another step we take closer to the day that the whole hateful edifice collapses under its own weight – and, crucially, under ours.

Our task, then, is twofold: first, to prepare the ground, in order to hasten the collapse of feminism.

Second (and complementary to the first): to construct the ideological weapons to help prevent a feminist resurgence following its collapse.

Both of these goals require, not force, but some propagandizing of our own. Things being the way they are, this does not require us to distort the truth. On the contrary, we shall, for the most part, be exposing those truths which others have distorted; revealing the facts to a wider audience than has yet received them, diligently and unapologetically. As one notable activist in the field recently put it, he does not need to attack feminists – all he needs to do is quote them. Simply exposing feminist hatred to the disinfecting sunlight of the world might well be enough to turn the tide – which is why enormous energies are expended on misdirecting, discrediting, neutralizing and obscuring the arguments and advocates of the opposition.

One key strategy for the achievement of our task was announced at an April 2010 conference, in the form of Male Studies, a new discipline already facing hostility from an academic world that has long been a bastion of radical feminism. That this sore thumb, this thorn in the side of scholarly uniformity should provoke such outrage as it has done should not be surprising. Here is a selection of topics which Male Studies is set to cover:

> Socioeconomic factors leading to males' over-involvement in the criminal justice system, underemployment and limited opportunities as fathers, resulting from changes in child custody law (economics, forensics, law, public policy);
> Misandric representations of boys and mature males in the media and advertising (media studies including cinema, television and internet, and advertising);
>
> Accounts of the experience of being male (history, literature, autobiography);
> Pressing issues related to the emotional well-being of boys and older males, most notably depression and suicide (clinical psychology, medicine and psychiatry, social work).

Friedrich Nietzsche, writing in the late 19th century, warned that if one gazes into the abyss for long enough, then one shall find the abyss gazing back into them. It must be deeply troubling for feminists, to wake up one morning and find other people deconstructing them, having made it their mission in life to expose and correct feminist wrongdoing.

This would seem to be the reason for the abusive response, from the feminist sector, to the idea of men discussing issues of sex and sexism without the supervision of women. It matters not what feminists think of Male Studies, because feminists are not the discipline's target audience; its success is not dependent upon their approval, a fact they will no doubt have trouble reconciling themselves to. Regardless, even if they launched a concerted campaign to stop men from discussing their experiences through the fora of academia, they are incapable of preventing this from happening elsewhere. The true sticking point for would-be dictators today is that we live in an Information Age. It is rather difficult to control the flow of information when our very epoch is defined by it. So, let's have these discussions right here, right now – as long as people can use the internet to congregate and speak their minds, nothing can stop us. Let's have these discussions in a million other places too, out in the real world – because if men had never spoken up about their experiences, as men, then we would not be looking forward to the commencement of Male Studies in the near future.

There are already a great number of websites devoted to Men's Rights issues; indeed, these seem to have proliferated over the last few years, sprouting up all over the pasture like so many delicious mushrooms! For most of these weblogs, their content needs no greater unifying theme than opposition to feminism. Given the growing and active network of people concerned about the status of men today, it has become possible to push the envelope a little further. This weblog aims to encourage the intellectual crystallization of what we are calling the Men's Rights Movement, by taking a narrow lens across a broad range of topics. This weblog is dedicated to the elucidation of Gynocentrism Theory.

What is Gynocentrism Theory? To put it simply, it is a system which explains social relations between the sexes. It supersedes Patriarchy Theory, the cornerstone of all feminist thought. Now memetic, Patriarchy Theory has proved a remarkable tool in denying men their rights, including their most basic human rights to dignity and bodily integrity, on the pretense that all men are oppressors (or at least, allied with oppressive men from whom they receive benefits) and that all women are victims of male power. Gynocentrism Theory is the articulation of many years of effort by various thinkers in the Men's Rights sphere to describe a vision of the world which more accurately reflects the experiences of men – and many women, too. In contrast to the simplistic, black-and-white tribalism of Patriarchy Theory, Gynocentrism Theory does not equate male fulfillment with the holding of tyrannical power over women. Gynocentrism Theory does not accept that men act as a power bloc. On the contrary, Gynocentrism Theory exposes the divergence between demographics and interests; fundamentally, that while a small number of men may be the ones holding social and political power, this by no means implies that they do so for the benefit of all men; and that in fact, more usually, they do so for the benefit of most women and to the detriment of most men. Gynocentrism Theory advocates that power be understood as multi-faceted, and that policy has historically been a matter of appealing to, and protecting, women.

The above, no doubt, shall make heads spin among those who assume that power at all levels can be identified according to the shape of the genitals of those who get to make important decisions – regardless of what they actually decide.

Any more shall be beyond the scope of this introductory lecture. And so, we shall continue this train of thought next week. Lectures will be held on Saturdays, and students from around the world are invited to attend – or catch up in their own time if they prefer. Discussions shall be held immediately afterwards. Unlike most feminist weblogs, whose authors take after their mentor Mary Daly in systematically denying men a voice, all shall be welcome to speak here, although expulsions shall be warranted in the case that obscene material or personal information is posted. I prefer that feminists be fisked than filtered out, but the fate of truly persistent trolls shall be delivered at my discretion.

I bid you all a reflective day, and I'll be seeing you again.

Sooner than you think.

Adam Kostakis has been carefully reading Men's Rights websites for the past couple of years, and has finally decided to contribute something himself. His blog is named Gynocentrism Theory and can be found here.

The Core Values of Feminism

Dusty · 1 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

When discussing men's rights, men have a tendency to discuss issues down the line: false rape accusations, domestic violence, chivalry, abortion, and sexual harassment- everything neatly, cleanly divided into nice, symmetrical topics. This is a good thing. Brain scans show that the average male brain is highly compartmentalized when performing certain functions. When doing A, part A lights up. When doing B, part B lights up. It's as though every part of a man's brain has its respective job that it does extremely well and that is all it does. (This is an oversimplification, but it works for my purpose here.)

Could this division of labor in the male brain give us clues as to how men came up with science and mathematics? We all know that there are no such things as the number 2 or an inch or a foot, but yet some guy drew an arbitrary line in the dirt somewhere and now we have things such as measurement, physics, mathematics, engineering- oh, and don't forget civilization!

The female brain scans differently. When doing both A and B, the female brain lights up over a bigger, more general area. Some would say that women use more of their brains than men. I suggest that this functional ambiguity makes the female brain slightly less decisive. One who is not decisive does not have a tendency to act. This could explain why men took charge of history- that and physical strength. It could also explain why so many women seem to find postmodernist drivel so appealing- with its fuzziness, its hatred of measurement and data and facts, etc. And finally, it could explain the greatest social bane of the last fifty years: radical feminism.

With this piece I take you close to the edge without dropping off. I take you as close as I can to feminist thought while still having a brain left to think with. Won't you come with me on a tour of this haunted mansion, the feminist cranium? I don't pretend to have distilled feminist thought in its entirety. You'll notice that many of these bleed together, but like the female mind, things aren't so distinct and separate. These are the core values of feminism:

Revenge, lack of remorse, and threat of retaliation– Whenever women hurt men, they are "turning the tables" for past oppression. Women need not feel guilty if they treat men badly. Their abuse is justified, because they were wronged by men historically ("Men deserve it."). Also, men better watch what they do in the present and future, because women can and will punish them for any given transgression (as defined by them). This is part of what feminists call "empowerment."

Dishonesty– If facts don't motivate women to join their cause, feminists make things up to stoke female anger. Postmodernism- the idea that there is no such thing as objectivity- and revisionist history are a great way to put marginalized people (women) at the center of things. That way, we all can pretend that women played a larger role in shaping the world than they actually did. Feminists also distort data, misuse studies, and tell outright lies to spread the idea that women are actively persecuted by a demonic patriarchy that wants nothing more than to eradicate women.

Blurring the lines between belief and reality, saying and doing– This is also related to postmodernism. Feminists and women in general are so verbally gifted that they convince others and even themselves that their opinions are literally true. If they say they are oppressed, this makes it so- according to them. If they say women should be paid more, this makes it so- according to them. Also, feminists will equate a catcall from a construction worker with a criminal violation such as rape or interpret the rape of a woman by a violent loner as a statement of male purpose. If we allow feminists and women in general to do this, it will encourage a new kind of discourse between the sexes that renders everything we say to each other meaningless.

Lack of empathy– Feminists never ask themselves how their accusations and condemnations make others feel. It never occurs to them that anyone else is capable of having feelings. Feminists are very sensitive to feelings- their own feelings. They can see how they as women suffer, but it never occurs to them that men also suffer. This leads to all matters of unfairness and hypocrisy. If feminists convince women that their pain is worse than men's, then women will always demand special treatment.

Exaggeration of female suffering, marginalization of male suffering– Let us suppose that a man and a woman carry out a dangerous task. During this task, the man loses an arm and a leg, while the woman loses half of her pinky finger. It's obvious the man is suffering more- yet newspaper headlines will go on about the woman's suffering! This is because women have advocacy groups that make sure the world knows about female suffering. No one argues on the man's behalf. We've been conditioned to believe his suffering is unimportant. Nor does the man argue on his own behalf. He's also been conditioned to believe his suffering is unimportant. (Besides, complaining won't reattach his severed limbs.) The feminist thinks that complaining is the same as suffering, but it isn't. Her complaining creates the appearance of suffering, which helps her elicit sympathy from others. (However, her complaining does increase everyone else's suffering.) Women do suffer, but when we deny male suffering, we get a distorted vision of reality. And with this distorted vision, we pass legislation that offers yet more protection for women but none for men.

Convenience– This too is related to postmodernism. Women should be able to do whatever they want without any consideration for logic, consistency, or cause and effect relationships. If the rules are to a woman's benefit, then enforce the rules. If not, ignore the rules. All that matters is that it benefits a woman.

Passivity, feigned powerlessness, and lack of responsibility– Feminists don't hold women responsible for anything, which makes them believe they have no power. If a man makes a mistake, it's because men are bad. If a woman makes a mistake, it's because men are bad. Men are expected to apologize for everything, but women aren't expected to apologize for anything. They didn't do anything, after all. But this also convinces women that they have no control over their situation- not exactly the "empowerment" that feminists talk about. And if women believe they have no control, then they have one of two options: 1) do nothing ("Why bother?"), or 2) overcompensate by trying to control everything and everyone around them.

Replacing self control with government control– Feminists don't control themselves but want to control others. They equate total lack of self restraint with self expression. (Never mind that being an asshole is a poor way to express one's individuality.) Because feminists don't control themselves or their actions, they assume that everyone is the same way. They believe that, to restore order, we need a large government (i.e. Daddy) to control all of us.

Commiseration– Women should share each other's burdens. The burden of one woman becomes the burden of all women. The slogan "The personal is the political" becomes a way for maladjusted women (feminists) to foist their personal problems onto women who are otherwise happy and well adjusted. Feminists often try to disguise commiseration with innocuous activities such as women's studies classes, book discussion groups, or quilt making.

Resentment and misandry- Feminists are hypersensitive. They see female victimhood everywhere because their perceptions are colored by an overabundance of emotion. They are on a constant lookout for any perceivable slight against women and take everything personally. Feminists do not hold women responsible for anything and blame men for everything. They believe men are the demonic source of female agony. This resentment gives way to a hatred called misandry.

Paranoia, belief in conspiracy, and alienation– Men are innately dangerous and untrustworthy. They are the source of female agony. They comprise a group (called patriarchy) that is making every effort to marginalize (and possibly destroy) women. This leads to a terrifying worldview which not only causes new converts to break away from mainstream society, but makes it impossible for them to rejoin that society. (Such "drinking of the Koolaid" is the same strategy that cults use to amass lifelong followers.)

Female superiority and male inferiority– Women are morally, spiritually, psychologically, and biologically superior to men. Maleness is a disease for which femaleness is a cure. Feminism strives to make men more like women, not make women more like men. Men aren't good enough for women, while women are too good for men. Men do not make enough effort to meet female needs. Women do too much to meet male needs. Men should expect less from women. Women should expect more from men. Female sexuality is beautiful and highly evolved. Male sexuality is ugly and primitive.

Male servility- Men are the ipso facto servants of women. All social customs (such as dating and courtship, clothing, and etiquette) and all laws with regards to marriage, divorce, child custody, child and spousal abuse, reproductive rights, rape, assault, murder, and sexual harassment should reflect this inferior status.

Male utility– Men are only good in an expedient or a materialistic sense. Not only should men serve women and expect nothing in return, but they should be grateful that they are used rather than useless.

Female autonomy and male obsolescence– Men and women traditionally needed each other in order to have children. A man's sperm met a woman's egg, and the process that results in life began. With the advent of cloning, reproduction without sperm (parthenogenesis) will create a situation in which men will need a woman to carry a pregnancy to term, but women won't need a man's sperm to become pregnant. Men will need women, but women won't need men, rendering males obsolete. This is something that feminists are clamoring for.

Homosexuality and sexual segregation– Feminists are on a campaign against heterosexuality, because they see it as the core value of the patriarchy. Not only do they constantly attack heterosexuality in the media and the classroom, but they constantly exalt homosexuality- particularly lesbianism. Most feminists are lesbians, so by pushing lesbianism onto heterosexual women, feminists simultaneously discourage marriage and open more avenues for female companionship. They praise male homosexuality, because they see it as a subversion of patriarchal, white, heterosexual, male values (whatever those are). Homosexuals are seen as a safe alternative to threatening, violent, predatory, heterosexual men, and are thus "honorary women." Here, feminists prey on the occasional alienation that gay men feel at the hands of heterosexual men who have been raised to think that homosexuality is immoral or even pathological. However, this support is only in theory, and feminist love is entirely conditional. If a homosexual chooses to live his life as a proud man rather than a feminist lapdog, feminists have no use for him and quietly reject him.

Choice– Women should have choices, but should not have to actually choose anything. However, if a woman does make a choice, and it's a good one, she should be praised and allowed to reap the rewards of that choice. If she makes a bad choice, not only should she not be criticized, but she should be protected from the consequences of that choice. Also, women should have limitless options, while men should have limited or no options.

A Brief Review of 2010

Zeta Male · 1 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It has been an interesting year for MRA's. Some highs, some lows; never a dull moment. We have seen a lot over the past year and as it has gone on, I have been compiling a list of some of the most monumental moments across the world. These may in fact be some of, if not the fondest and most disappointing moments from the past year.

There was the Male Studies Symposium, a rather enlightening and much anticipated event that did not fail to deliver. We saw many great minds gather together to discuss the revolutionary idea of studying the human male outside the realm of feminist influence. It was successful enough that there will be another conference next year.

In the UK we saw what we thought was going to be a great thing; Anonymity for those accused of rape; However due to feminist political pressure, skeptics and financing (not that there is a huge difference between pressure and financing these days) we saw it taken away. However, British Airways was rid of its policy where traveling children are not allowed to be seated next to male passengers. So even though we lost anonymity, we still made a small dent.

Meanwhile back in the USA we had one of our biggest losses. It was announced that Men's News Daily was going to be shut down. For whatever reason (I never saw the announcement) it is still going strong and publishing. And to top things off, it is now a crime to interfere with custody in Utah .

Traveling overseas again, Brazil outlawed parental alienation. This is going to be the first of hopefully many countries, and for a country of its size and population, there are many children who stand to benefit from this policy.

Germany may be our greatest source of victory this year. While far from perfect, Germany is ending its draft, removing a policy where countless men would have been sent away against their will. Fathers of children born out of wedlock have more rights, which is monumental.

Germany has done quite a bit more actually. They have also been quite good at bringing down suicide rates with a public awareness campaign. The Family Minister went out and tore feminism a new one, much to everyone's amusement. If I were to give a country an award for most progressive for men I think Germany would be the winner. With luck, many other countries will follow Germany 's path over the past year.

If there was a runner up, I think it is safe to say that it would be Switzerland . Attention was drawn from all over the world, as they held the first antifeminist conference. Something tells me it won't be the last. With luck, it will not involve anywhere near as much secrecy next time around.

Yes, the world is changing all around us. There is nothing we can't do. We ARE making a difference. Not just in the US and the UK but all over the world. We are here and we are here to stay. Next year will bring many more pains and even more victories to the table. Stand tall and stand proud the day shall be ours.

Canada's New Travel Attraction for Women: Murder Tourism

John Hembling (JtO) · 4 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The arrests in Indonesia of 28 male prostitutes – accused by the authorities of selling sex to female tourists illustrates a surging global phenomenon – that of sex tourism catering to western women. This brand of sex tourism has been observed in many countries including Jamaica, Jordan, Senegal, Ukraine and elsewhere.

Canada however may be opening a new market for affluent western women to travel and indulge themselves, taking advantage of the country's progressive, female friendly legal system.

A landmark legal case, reported today in the National Post sets the stage for the new thrill for women bored with sun and inexpensive sex, and other tropical attractions. Murder tourism is Canada's newest way of welcoming traveling women, with anger towards men and a daring streak.

New Brunswick resident Crystal Dawn Mckenzie walked free on Monday after her acquittal for the knife-killing of her common law husband, whose name doesn't matter, because he's male, and dead.

McKenzie's Lawyer, David Kelly pointed out that "Of course she had other options," but that she was drunk at the time, and also female, so a violent history between the acquitted killer and her murdered husband was used to excuse making a choice to stab the man to death.

Robert Moore, Canada's minister of state for small business and tourism did not make the public statement that murder tourism proposes an exciting new travel opportunity for women only, since men committing murder within Canada are still subject to the now obsolete patriarchal judicial system, and are likely to go to jail for killing people.

Rosa Ambrose, Canada's Minister for the Status of women also did not say that now that 40 years of feminist policies have ensured that 60% of master's degrees are awarded to women, affording them women as a class near term economic supremacy, while men still comprise 90% of workplace deaths.

Canada is ready to set a new standard allowing man-slaughter as a travel incentive to wealthy women from all over the world.

And now the weather. It's cold and dark out, and getting darker.

Feminism Explained

Paul Bonea · 5 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If you have ever had a conversation with a feminist, and actually asked some thoughtful questions about the ideology, then this video will ring a familiar bell.

It covers most of the basics. Feminism is about equality, but only for women. It is about justice, but only for women. It is about fairness, but only for women.

And of course, there is something terribly wrong with anyone that questions this sort of thinking.

Yep, feminism explained, for sure.

The Reason Men are More Violent Than Women

Paul Bonea · 5 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I was up burning some 4:00 a.m. oil when I ran across a comment just posted to my YouTube video "Domestic Violence, Women are Half the Problem." Actually it was a two part comment. The first half was just standard shame trip and ad hominem. Not worth posting here. And while the second half of the comment was still peppered with feeble attempts to be insulting, it did contain a kernel of importance in the form of a couple of questions. Here that part of the comment, as written.

What you should concern yourself with is exactly WHY men have been responsible for the vast majority of murders, beatings, rapes, genocides, and incidences of pedophilia in the world, throughout recorded history. Bonus points if you can figure out how we can curb that reign of terror. Put your beefy male brain to work on that problem, sport. Keep me posted.

The broad stroking of so many social ills as all but male exclusive is ridiculous, of course. But the central fact that men are more violent than women is without dispute. The reasons for that, actually, are quite simple. She (of course I am assuming this human individual has decided to self identify as female) should have thought of something more challenging.

Bottom line, men are responsible for most of the egregious violence in the world because every culture in the world expects their men to be aggressive and capable of extreme violence, just as it expects them to make themselves subject to aggression and extreme violence.

Those expectations come from women every bit as much as they come from men. Even more so in many ways. Men are hard wired to reproduce, and women are hard wired to ignore men who can't protect and provide for them. That's the nuts and bolts, but there is more to the equation.

With most women choosing to either thug-fuck or money-fuck their way into a better standard of living, it makes competition even rougher. And the end result isn't masses of power drunk males, but a standard that forces all men who want to compete to the disposable role of protector and provider. Once those men couple with women they are less likely to be violent toward her than the other way around.

So you see, your fight is not with men. It's with Darwin, and you are getting your ignorant ass kicked.

The human race breeds violence. It is an artifact of 3,000,000 years of humanity in an environment that often boiled down to immediate survival. Add to that the ever present folly of human greed, which is hardly contained to men. That is what fostered sexual selection for violent capabilities; not an innate flaw in men but proof that they were madly successful at what they were challenged to do in order to reproduce.

Throughout the animal kingdom, in most species, the biggest baddest boy on the block gets all the action. Why? Because it works, you silly feminist. Because it works. If you think humans are all that different, I would suggest a straight shot of wake-the-fuck-up with a shut-the-fuck-up chaser. And for any possible MRA's that are saying, "Ewwww! That's so naaasthy! You shouldn't sink to their level," all I can say is please join the feminist at the bar and order what she's having. This is a hard core bigot we are dealing with and this is not a coffee house conversation.

It's a war.

Failing to understand the fundamental realities of sexual selection is not a failure based on simple ignorance. It is based on an inability to effectively reason. I keep that in mind as I approach the next question.

The fembot offered bonus points if I could figure out how to end the reign of terror. Assuming she is not talking about feminism (which she should be); I will answer it as posed.

Again, cupcake, it's real simple. If you want to curb the excessive amount of violence from men, you need to do two things.

First, women will need to start selecting men whose qualities and attributes are exactly opposite of what makes their pussies wet. Forty years of feminist mythology that most women want “nice guys,” (when they want men at all) only changes the facts in the mind of the feminist. Women, wherever they can, still choose men for the same reasons they did on the African Savanna.

They don’t just select these men, they are lined up to select them.

The other way to address this problem, and one more practical than hoping for a shift in the ‘gina tingle, is for men to abandon the notion of protecting and providing for women entirely and refuse to compete for them on that level.

But oh, wait, that is already happening. It’s called the MRM. And by its very nature it will be producing far less violent men. MRA’s don’t hit women, they send them packing- which is, after all a great move toward the independence we all know feminist want women to have.

So the way I see it, I should not only get extra points for knowing what to do, but I should hit the point jackpot for dedicating my life to doing something about it. That is, I would if I gave a shit about earning points from a feminist.

Now put your fishy female brain to work on that one.

Dodging Dogma at Home

Tom Givens · 5 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It's important in any political movement to keep in view those things which unite us. The reason for this is not to define a Dogma, or to enforce membership adherence to predefined views. The reason is to make sure we never lose sight of why we are doing this in the first place.

Fair enough, you may say, but what exactly "unites" us?

Good question, I say rhetorically, and also one I'm sure many of our opponents would like to answer.

I aim to answer that question, both for them and for me…hopefully you agree as well.

I recently got into a debate on an Australian Conservative website, essentially debating the Chivalry vs. Feminism thing. And as frequently happens during such exchanges, things came into minutely sharper focus, at least for me, and at this time. Maybe I should cut back on my "advocacy" for marijuana…but I digress. Anyway, the point is that the sum total of most of the arguments I heard were that essentially their "Man Up" was well-intentioned, while they agree that the feminist "man up" is not.

And then they challenged me on the similarities between the Feminist movement and the MRM, s pecifically with regards to the adherence to a philosophy of self-determinism.

Basically the charge was, that as the Men's Movement advocates more and more for the eschewing of female attentions, we begin to look more and more like Catharine Mackinnon. With every article on False Rape Accusation and the (very real) threat this poses to men, we resemble Andrea Dworkin more and more.

And you know what, they have a point.

Don't get me wrong, I'm as reactionary as the next guy. I certainly don't think there's much percentage in "taking the high road", as should be easily understood by any Divorced man. But the Men's Movement has undeniably become far more Dogmatic than it used to be. We have our own Shibboleths as well.

And frankly, I find that reprehensible. I find that intellectually, and morally, lazy.

Without a doubt, there is no shortage of stories for Pierce to publish on his site. Glenn Sacks and Robert Franklin seem to be making a career out of trying to stop anti male legislation (Thank God). There are Academics struggling to rescue the reputation of Scholarship, at least as regards Gender, and bring some much needed perspective to the Intelligentsia.

But if you look at these people making a difference you will see one major commonality.

They are not quoting others. They are not spouting "received wisdom". They are using their own faculties, and analyzing what is in front of them, and they are taking in what is around them. They have experience, but do not adhere to man=good, woman=bad type philosophies….not even Marc. They acknowledge reality, both natural and political…and do not rely on others to tell them how things are.

So what exactly is it that unites us? Where is the soft chewy center of this mish-mash of PUAs, MGTOWs, MRAs, FRAs, HOLYFUCKINACRONYMs, etc…?

Fairness. Truth. Equality. Realism. On the FRONT end.

Basically, we prefer our largesse to be voluntary.

It's funny just how old our principles really are, actually. Typically, an MRA would be more than happy if all you did was wipe out 90% of the Bureaucracy (and taxes), gave everyone the same legal and social standing, and yelled "Go!" I bet 99% of what we stand for is written on some old parchment kept in some library somewhere, serving as a basis for a whole mode of government, in fact.

Other than that, the men's movement seems to largely consist of trying to get society to stop lying to itself about a range of topics. Again with that ring of Truth….

And this is why I am taking heart, seeing so many disparate groups making so much headway into the public consciousness in so many spots. I truly hope that the MRM can serve as a catalyst to constructive change in lots of areas, not least of which is this apparently pathological hatred of the Christian faith that pervades society these days..

Friggin' weed….where was I?

Oh yeah…

I tend to be quite vehement when I debate, with flat accusations and aggressive tones. I tend to employ a fair bit of hyperbole as well. And I'm definitely not above flipping my shit on occasion.

But at the end of the day, it still comes back to whether or not I can look at myself in the mirror. Thankfully, I can say the vast majority of MRAs (so far) have a great deal of integrity. Even the ones I disagree with. But it will not always be so. As time goes on, the Men's Movement is assured of growing exponentially. And with that influx, there will be efforts to twist this movement into a mirror of the Feminist movement.

The defense to this is as simple as it is difficult to do. Remain true to the original goals, not the task-goals. It's not about "ending false rape accusations"; it's about making the legal system sane again so men and women can form relationships without the inevitable power struggles the current system fosters. We might be after the destruction of certain feminist power structures, but it's to end their hateful efforts, not to "silence women".

As long as we remain focused on equality, rather than equal outcomes (as the Feminists did), we will likely remain true to our original intent.

But there are examples of times when MRAs fell into the "my side is better than your side" arguments. Several times I have done so myself. And that is why it's vitally important for MRAs to never forget that they are part of the Manosphere…ALL of the Manosphere (including MRAs, PUA, MGTOWs, black, white, yellow, gay, straight, or some kind of swirl), and we all have something of importance to contribute.

I do, however, reserve the right to kick stupidity square in the ass, and recommend you do the same.

Deadbeat Dads vs. Miscreant Moms

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 6 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Battle of the Ex's

We have come to hear an awful lot about fathers who don't support their children. Some won't, some can't, but the father's ability to pay doesn't matter much. What matters is whether or not he pays. We even have a rather cute name for this obnoxious animal, "deadbeat dad." There are no national statistics kept to track these loathsome creatures, but one estimate (probably an over estimate since it comes from a group that is out to snare them) is that there are about a quarter of a million of them. I say this is an over estimate because hunters of any animal must inflate their numbers for it to remain legal to hunt them. If the numbers drop too low, they may be placed on an endangered species list and would no longer be considered fair game. The state may be forced to stop issuing licenses to hunt them in order to save them from extinction.

As with most big game animals, it is only legal to hunt the male of the species. The female is considered far too valuable to the survival of the species. So typically, the male is characterized as violent, dangerous, aggressive, or lazy while the female is supported as being caring and nurturing. This helps prevent the cognitive dissonance from occurring due to the blatant sexism involved. After all, if the decision to hunt them is based on value to the species and not on sex, it isn't sexism even if only one sex is hunted. This is no different when it comes to hunting humans, especially the parents of young humans. Fathers are vilified as dangerous threats to their children while mothers are praised for their tender loving care of the young.

So the question arises, is the mother of young humans really more loving and caring than the father or is this just propaganda used to justify the hunt? In 2005, there were approximately 64.3 million fathers and 80.2 million mothers alive in the United States. Not all of these had young children under the age of 18, but I couldn't find any figures for that, so these will have to do. Besides, since women outlive men on average by several years, more mothers than fathers will not have young children at home, so the statistical averages used for comparison should favor the female of the species, thus verifying the hypothesis that human mothers make better caretakers of their children than do fathers. Better to err on the side of the woman in such matters, don't you think?

So let's get cracking. If there are approximately 250K deadbeat dads as stated above, then the overall percentage of deadbeats as a part of all fathers is .4%. Of course this is an underestimate because there will be a few million fathers who have managed to live long enough for their youngest child to reach the age of 18. Because we know it is an underestimate, we can now justify saying that it is an under-reported crime and we can then guesstimate that only about one in every thousand or so cases gets reported, therefore we know that at least 40% of all fathers are deadbeat dads, perhaps even more. This then becomes justification for claiming that all fathers are potential deadbeats. Once we have claimed this to be true, we can then have the state issue hunting licenses for us to hunt the entire species.

There is no reason not to exterminate all fathers.

But what about miscreant moms, surely there can't be very many because we never ever hear about them. There is no uproar, no organizations to hunt them, and no corals to pin them up. Therefore, they probably don't exist and even if they do, then it isn't likely to be their fault. Since deadbeat dads are defined as fathers who do not pay financial support for their children, miscreant moms must be defined in the same way. It's only fair, right? You know, equality and all that nonsense.

The first problem we encounter when we attempt to find miscreant moms is that they are mistresses of disguise. They are very cunning and difficult to find. According to NOW, there are approximately 5.6 M stay-at-home moms in the US. These are obviously non-working mothers with no income. As a percentage of the whole, they amount to 7% of all mothers.

This amounts to 17.5 times as many miscreant moms as deadbeat dads, right? Wrong. There can't possibly be that many miscreant moms; it must be some sort of mistake. In our count of deadbeat dads, we forgot to include stay-at-home dads. NOW estimates there are about 143K of those nasty critters. Add that to our figures and we get just under 400K deadbeats. This ups our percentage of deadbeats to .62% of all fathers, which in turn increases the number of unreported cases to include about 60.2% of all fathers. That definitely helps us justify our claim that all fathers are potential deadbeats. Further, we can state with confidence that the stay-at-home moms are in fact providing financial support for their children either via the rare father or a home business. Therefore the deadbeat mom does not exist. Or does she?

There is one other type of stay-at-home mom, the welfare queen. There are approximately 4.3 million welfare recipients in the US today. Almost all of them are women with young children. But this is probably just a myth, no more provable than the existence of the miscreant mom. Since only about half the people in the US are openly female and far more of them actually work for a living than men, it stands to reason that women couldn't possibly comprise more than about 10% of all welfare recipients. This leaves us with a count of about 430K of the special breed called welfare queens. Calculating these as a percentage of the whole, we arrive at approximately .5% of mothers belonging to this special breed. But that's almost as many welfare queens as deadbeat dads, can that really be so? Don't be silly. Like other types of stay-at-home moms, welfare queens also provide financial support for their children. They aren't even really unemployed. They are, in fact employees of the federal, state, and local governments whose job is to provide childcare. These women work hard and therefore cannot possibly be miscreants. This drop the percentage of miscreant back to 0% where it belongs.

However, there is one other type of miscreant mom being promoted by a fringe group of radicals known as male chauvinist pigs (they prefer to be called MRAs, but we all know what they really are). This group is comprised mostly of deadbeat dads who do little more than whine about their predicament and idle away their time trying to avoid their financial obligations to their children. They are deadbeats of the worst kind who are well-known to fabricate statistics based on actual science instead of the more popular and accurate pseudoscience used by their superiors who control the propaganda machine. There really should be a special license issued to hunt down that particular kind of ugly scum. But I digress.

These chauvinist pigs actually believe that a very high percentage of mothers kill their children when in fact it is simply not true. Women almost never do this and when they do it is done in order to protect them from their deadbeat dad and therefore perfectly justifiable. At any rate, it occurs so infrequently that it would have no impact on the actual statistics. Surprisingly fathers don't kill their children very often either and although they are far more dangerous than mothers, the number of homicides committed by fathers against their children is also negligible. But those nasty chauvinist pigs aren't satisfied. They claim that one in six pregnancies ends in abortion and that women who kill their unborn children should be defined as miscreant moms. This is insanity, simply because there were about 820K abortions in 2005 and about 4.1M children who lived long enough to be born is no cause for alarm or concern. Obviously the vast majority of pregnancies are carried to term so children are still being born and women are still becoming mothers who love and care for them far more than those awful and abusive deadbeats. Further, what these pigs call an unborn child is really more like a cancerous tumor that posed a threat to the woman's freedom of choice and therefore needed to be cut out anyways. Besides, she probably decided to kill it either to protect it from the abusive deadbeat that sired it or because she knew the deadbeat wouldn't support it and she didn't want to. Her body, her choice.

In fact, it is this last point that further skews the statistics. Abortion actually prevents deadbeat dads. It could be considered the cure for that particular disease. If only more women would exercise their rights and make that choice, there would be fewer and fewer deadbeats. This works in two ways. First it prevents a man from fathering a child and becoming a deadbeat. Secondly, it prevents them from being born in the first place.

In conclusion, we can see from the facts presented that there every man is a potential deadbeat dad and that there is no such thing as a miscreant mom. She is a fiction, obviously created by chauvinist pigs to demonize and vilify women and shift the blame from themselves. There is no reason not to exterminate all fathers. This type of misogyny must not be tolerated.

Misandry Hits New York

New York State regularly has campaigns against domestic violence. Nothing wrong with that, domestic violence is an important issue. However, there are a couple of serious problems with their campaigning:

1. They pretend that intimate partner violence is only about men hitting women, thereby forgetting all the other scenarios (women hitting men, women hitting women, men hitting men).
2. They use and abuse young boys by having them pose for their posters. They also shame all the young boys who see these kinds of images and message in libraries, on the sidewalk, etc.

Here are a few examples:

The Same Old Story

Lecture No. 2

"I'm not cut from the same mold. I don't read from the same old story." – Pennywise

My readers must understand that the concerns which Gynocentrism Theory addresses are not limited to feminism. Feminism is still fairly new on the scene, while Gynocentrism has been around for as long as recorded history. The Men's Rights Movement seeks to address problems associated with feminism, but does not limit its attention to these problems. Many of these problems existed prior to the emergence of feminism proper in the late 19th century, although they have been expanded and exacerbated since. Feminism is only the modern packaging of Gynocentrism, an ancient product, made possible in its present form by the extensive public welfare arrangements of the post-war period.

In spite of its radical rhetoric, the content of feminism, or one could say, its essence, is remarkably traditional; so traditional, in fact, that its core ideas are simply taken for granted, as unquestioned and unquestionable dogma, enjoying uniform assent across the political spectrum. Feminism is distinguishable only because it takes a certain traditional idea – the deference of men to women – to an unsustainable extreme. Political extremism, a product of modernity, shall fittingly put an end to the traditional idea itself; that is, in the aftermath of its astounding, all-singing, all-dancing final act.

Allow me to clarify. The traditional idea under discussion is male sacrifice for the benefit of women, which we term Gynocentrism. This is the historical norm, and it was the way of the world long before anything called 'feminism' made itself known. There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism, for instance. That the two are distinguishable is clear enough, but the latter is simply a progressive extension of the former over several centuries, having retained its essence over a long period of transition. One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures. Take any of the great Empires that swept the globe – the Roman, the Ottoman, the Spanish, the British – and you shall find Gynocentrism as the order of the day. Such extensive geopolitical enterprises, historical testaments to man's triumph over the earth and sea, were built and maintained by men perfectly accustomed to the idea of dying for the sake of their women. It is an idea that has outlived nearly every other, and endures to this day in our American Empire. That men should sacrifice themselves utterly – their very essence, their being and their identity, to save women that they do not even know – is neatly encapsulated in that popular phrase, 'women and children first.'

(And if you're paying special attention, you will notice that it is never uttered as 'children and women first.' The very thought is absurd! This is because what is really meant by the phrase is 'women first, children second.')

The endurance of these social and class codes owes nothing to totalitarian control. Even when staging bloody revolts against tyrannous monarchs and landed elites, men aspiring to power left the Gynocentric code well alone. The self-sacrifice of men is a sexual constant which has survived all regime change. Gynocentrism, it seems, was not entirely without benefit to men; in peacetime, a man could be fairly assured of a stable familial structure and of his own paternity for the children he helped to raise. Regardless, what was offered to men was essentially compensatory. For most of history, men apparently considered this compensation to be reasonable enough – or perhaps, Gynocentrism was so deeply ingrained that they simply did not consider it at all. Through their actions, they affirmed (and renewed) Gynocentrism, and whether it went by the name honor, nobility, chivalry, or feminism, its essence has gone unchanged. It remains a peculiarly male duty to help the women onto the lifeboats, while the men themselves face a certain and icy death.

It is only now, with the political and social developments of the 20th century that have driven a wedge between the sexes, that the kind of thoughts found on this weblog can emerge. Late modernity provides us with new conceptual resources – new ways of thinking, which can be traced back to the Enlightenment of the 17th-18th centuries. Out of this intellectual melting-pot eventually crawled feminism, a vindictive blend of classic Gynocentrism, victim fetishization, radical utopianism and liberal presuppositions.

It would be an oversimplification to say that feminists set out to make gains. On the contrary, they made demands for both gains and losses. They wanted to gain men's rights, but lose their traditional female responsibilities. This, it seemed, would put women in a social position equal to that of men. It was an argument rooted in the liberal tendencies of individualism, civic equality and self-definition. In rhetoric if not in reality, feminism asserted its points of concurrence with the most admirable aspects of traditional liberalism: equality before the law, the abnegation of arbitrary rule, and so on. Extending rights to all women appeared, logically enough, to be the successive phase of human liberation following the extension of rights to all men.

It was assumed – more fool us – that once granted equal rights, women would voluntarily adopt the accompanying responsibilities that men had always fulfilled. This did not come to be. Feminists were happy to gain men's rights, and lose women's responsibilities, but they were horrified by the suggestion that they should adopt men's responsibilities as a corollary. Rather than men and women sharing the burdens of the world, we got the White Feather Campaign:

> This campaign began in the early days of the First World War in Great Britain, where women were encouraged to pin white feathers on young men who were not in military uniform. The hope was that this mark of cowardice would shame them into 'doing their bit' in the war. The practice soon spread to Canada, where patriotic women, in response to declining voluntary recruitment figures, organized committees to issue white feathers to men in civilian clothes and publicly denounced the 'slackers' and 'shirkers'.

It is surely worth remarking that many of these women were suffragettes; and thus, even as they campaigned for equal rights with men, they used shame as a tool for ensuring that men, and only men, fulfilled traditionally male obligations. Particularly, duty to give up their own lives, because they were men, for the sake of women. Whatever disadvantages women may have faced at the time, there is surely no greater coercion than death.

Much has changed since the First World War, and the feminist project to slack and shirk on women's responsibilities while extending their license to act however they damn well please has met with wild success. And it is precisely this state of affairs which begs certain questions, made possible by the conceptual resources we have inherited from the Enlightenment: what if a man doesn't want to live this way? Why should men continue to fulfill or perform their traditional obligations, when women will not live up to theirs, but neither will they adopt the responsibilities corresponding to their rights at present? The questions arise: were men wrong, all this time, to sacrifice for the sake of women? Should we, in fact, have no obligations to women whatsoever?

The reason why the Men's Rights Movement arouses such hostility, from both the left and right, is because it is the first attempt in history for a sex to attempt to break out of its traditional role. Feminism is not this; it is the entrenchment of the power that women already held. The Men's Rights Movement today goes far beyond simple accusations of feminist wrongdoing. Its adherents labor at historical analysis and social criticism, and with the benefit of two-and-a-half centuries of imagination and innovation stemming from the Enlightenment, can easily conceive of a world in which men, for the first time in history, are not required to self-sacrifice for women.

This is surely the future, and it is an inevitable reaction against – thus, an unintended consequence of – feminism itself. In times past, when men could claim compensation for their self-sacrifice, they accepted that this was simply the way of the world. In the absence of compensation, and with the screws being turned ever tighter on men in every sphere of life, they are provoked into questioning the new arbitrary rule, and into formulating their very own liberation project in response.

My statement above – that political extremism, the product of modernity, shall put an end to the traditional idea – should now be clear. Feminism, which is the extreme form of Gynocentrism, shall put an end to Gynocentrism altogether through the reaction which it creates. We are fifty years into the tremendous final act; a grand, orchestral performance, a theatrical display making unprecedented use of sound and light to confuse and cast illusion. But if all the world truly is a stage, then all men and women are actors – with roles of our own choosing, now free to toss aside the scripts we have been handed and create a new story in place of the old.

And when the curtain finally falls, I do believe that there shall be no encores.

Adam Kostakis has been carefully reading Men's Rights websites for the past couple of years, and has finally decided to contribute something himself. His blog is named Gynocentrism Theory and can be found here.

An Overheard Conversation

Miles Groth Ph. D. · 10 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A: How did you get here?

B: On Earth?

A: Yes.

B: My mother gave birth to me.

A: How did that happen?

B: My father got her pregnant.

A: Are you sure?

B: It might have been a sperm bank donation and artificial insemination. Or did she use a surrogate mother? I don't remember. Come to think of it, she never told me. Dad hasn't been around, you know, since I was born.

A: I knew. How did you get here?

B: You already asked me that question.

A: I meant to this room where we are talking.

B: I took the elevator.

A Who installed it?

B: I never knew them.

A: They were all men. How did you get here?

B: Same question? You mean, how did I get to this building?

A: Yes.

B: I came by subway, the A Train, after the ferry.

A: Who dug out the tunnels the train traveled through? Who laid the track? Who built the ferry?

B: Didn't machines do the tunneling?

A: It was mostly manpower as they say.

B: I walked here from the Penn Station stop.

A: Who built the sidewalks and laid the asphalt on 34th Street? Who built the building? Five men died building the Empire State Building. The view is spectacular, isn't it?

B: Where can I find their names?

A: I'm not sure. But it took 7,000,000 man hours to complete. How did you friend get here?

B: She came by car from Staten Island.

A: Who built the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge?

B: Men?

A: Yes. And three of them died working on it. Who built the expressways on Staten Island and Brooklyn? Who maintains them?

B: I think I know. My friend's grandfather works for the City. During the winter, he uses the garbage truck he operates to remove snow from the streets. The rest of the time, he collects garbage. He lifts the bags of trash from the sidewalks and throws them into the truck.

A: How's his back? By the way, who built the subway cars and the trucks? Who mined the ore used to make the metal for beams in the subway stations and the frames of the cars and trucks? Who forged the pieces? Who drilled for the oil that the gasoline used in the trucks was refined from? Who made the glass for the windshields and subway cars? Who pilots the tankers that get the crude here? Or the windows we're looking through? Look! You can see the Chrysler Building. Who cut down the trees and milled the beams used in constructing this room? Who quarried the stone that was crushed to make concrete and cement? Who made the bricks?

B: I'm hungry.

A: Let's order food from the deli down on the street. I'll have a salad. You?

B: Corned beef on rye.

A: Who brought the food to the deli?

B: Men in trucks. They hauled it in, too, didn't they?

A: Now you're catching on. Who raised the cattle and butchered the steer for your corned beef? Who farmed the lettuce and carrots for my salad? Do you want milk?

B: Sounds good. I've given up coffee.

A: Who raised the dairy cattle for the milk? Who grew and harvested the coffee beans? (I love really good espresso.) I have a bottle of wine in my drawer. I feel like a sip. Who grew the grapes and harvested them? Who made the wine? Who hauled cases of wine from a truck to the liquor store?

B: All men?

A: All men.

B: Let me write some of this down.

A: Where did the paper come from?

B: Staples.

A: The pulp? Originally, loggers cut down trees. Who carried the carton of paper into your office over on Staten Island?

B: I'll use my computer instead.

A: Who invented that thing? Who designed the programs that run it? And the internet. Your wifi gets signals from towers and satellites and a lot of it sent through cables. Who built those towers and got those satellites up there into orbit? Who laid the cable? Who installed your cable at home?

B: How did you get here?

A: I flew into JFK yesterday from Pittsburgh.

B: Who piloted the plane? Who got it ready for take off? Who serviced it on the ground?

A: Good questions. Who monitored the flights in air traffic control towers?

B: All men, I'm guessing.

A: Where's your brother?

B: Ah. He's in Iraq. I really love him.

A: (Phone rings. A takes out his cell phone.) Ah. I can take this later. Who invented the cell phone?

B: I think I'll pass on the sandwich. (B's phone rings. She answers.) Great! See you in few minutes.

A: Really? I'll give it to your friend when she gets back. I take it she's on her way. Yes. She's coming down from the observation deck.

B: We're going to leave as soon as she gets here.

A: So where are you going? Back to the Island?

B: No. We have dates. Great guys, both of them. They're looking for jobs. But they're really great guys.

A: Have you told them that recently?

Welcome New York Times Readers

Paul Bonea · 10 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If you came here after seeing A Voice for Men mentioned in the New York Times, welcome. You were led here after reading the following:

"Lurking around the edges of the male studies movement, moreover, in Web[sic] sites like Paul Elam's A Voice for Men, is a certain amount of anti-feminist hostility, if not outright misogyny," or so says Times writer Charles McGrath.

Please allow me to take a brief moment to demonstrate how fallacious this statement is, and why.

First, and it seems silly to have to say this, we are not "lurkers" here, though I give McGrath due credit for creativity with dark metaphors. Very compelling.

I support the concept of male studies, and I have been personally enthused about the efforts of the Male Studies Foundation since my days as Editor-in-Chief at mensnewsdaily.com. I have no official relationship with The Foundation and am much more concerned with an array of issues other than Male Studies.

The Times article was just taking ideological sides in the men's studies vs. male studies debate and attempting to paint the very misleading picture that male studies is appealing to misogynists. It was intended to color your perception and to send you here prepared to be angry.

If you are unfamiliar with the men's movement, it's easy enough to throw those kinds of stones. There is an abundance of anger here, unapologetically expressed. Much of that anger is intensified because we live in a culture that renders men's struggles invisible- or worse, believes that men deserve to suffer.

A Voice for Men is a place where that and other problems are examined, with unblinking candor. We are on the frontier of ideas about sex differences and institutional misandry. Being on the frontier things can get pretty raw. But it is also where there is a meaningful conversation about things that are otherwise taboo in our PC culture.

However, there is no hatred of anything here but injustice. And even as McGrath was forced to concede in his article, there are many factors negatively impacting the lives of men and boys. Actually, he barely touched on them. The sad reality is that with the exception of times like this, when something threatens the status quo at places like feminist academe and the New York Times, they will scarcely even acknowledge those problems exist.

In fact, as this article demonstrates, they can be quite hostile to the idea of even discussing the problems of men and boys without feminist supervision and approval. That approval seems to be their litmus test for calling someone a misogynist.

I would like to invite you to review the articles on this site, and I would like to suggest a few in particular. Reading them might surprise, even shock you about many of the ignored difficulties faced by men and boys. And yes, some of the things you read here might raise your hackles. Perhaps knowing that no one here is lying to you will make it more palatable.

Either way it still might help you understand the growing numbers of men and women from all walks of life who are concerned about the future of men and boys- and are beginning to speak up. And getting louder.

The web is lighting up with them.

Addendum: Also please note that in the online edition of The Times article, your ability to comment on the piece has been denied. I submit that this is not accidental, but rather just part of the abundant evidence that these ideologues, both in the media and academe, operate only on the graces of a society that refuses to hold them accountable for deceptive propaganda.

They know those days are near over, and the wagons are circling. There really is A Voice for Men, and the time of it being silent is coming to a close.

I originally made the agreement with readers that I would stay out of their hair about money except with each change of season. It didn't occur to me at the time that this time of year would put that four days before Christmas, so I delayed it till after the first. As it turns out, recent events give me the opportunity to try to kill two birds with one stone.

There has been a lot of excitement about making some headway with the MSM because of the recent mention of AVfM in the NY Times. I certainly share the enthusiasm. It is a small, but real hole punched through a wall that separates us from a much larger audience (not accidentally, I'm sure). And now it remains to be seen if we can tear at that small hole until it opens up enough to push a large wooden horse through.

I am in for that effort.

I have made it clear that if some see leadership in me, I don't really see it in myself. It's actually a moot discussion. It is what it is. And I am going to keep on doing what I am doing, regardless. I do know, though, that I have to remain on the same track as when I started. Well that, with some additions.

Friend Bill Price over at The Spearhead has made the call for attempts to initially push our message into radio stations, and suggested, along with others, that I would be at least one good choice for that kind of effort. I am in for that as well. So to begin with I have decided to set up an internet radio station and start broadcasting once a week. It is an idea I have had mulling around for a while. It should give me some good practice for the future, as well as provide another tool for the movement. I also plan to put together some media promos to try to get some MSM spots. I would welcome consultation on that from anyone in the know.

Also, to assist with the PR end, I am selecting my top articles over the past couple of years and putting them into a book for distribution in soft back books and all electronic formats, including Kindle.

I am fortunate that I am in a position to dedicate a lot of time to this, and have the freedom to dedicate more, but I am in that position because I am satisfied living the life of a poor activist, not because I am well off. Far from it.

That's the deal. I am on freaking fire to take this on, but I need to add some extra umph to the call this time for donations. This stuff is going to cost, both from a lot of time and some other expenses that can't be paid in sweat. So I really need those that can to slide some plastic or send a check to the P.O. Box. As usual, I will scratch and claw at getting things done regardless of finances, but right now the money would help expedite matters at a critical time.

I know there as some really good plans starting out there, and I will help with those as I can, but for the foreseeable future my activist mission is going to be dedicated to making more videos, growing and promoting this awesome website and moving toward the radio market.

So, here's the button (with my thanks). Let's saddle up this pony and ride.

Oh, and a PS here. It should hardly be surprising that the NY Times closed comments on their article that took a shot at me. Half the people who were in that article with McGrath kissing their ass were the very people, Kimmel and Heasly, et al, that I have been outing in the men's studies community for conning the public with misdandry. It was rigged to be the only conversation they can handle. One way. These are the same clowns that make occasional drive by comments here, send me admonishing emails and now, it seems, are calling out a big gun to fight for them because they can't do anything with me themselves but run away.

I'd like to discuss this more on the air.

If you logged on earlier today, you noticed the banner running at the top of the page detailing the fundraising efforts to start up A Voice for Men Radio (Thanks to Alek Novy for the graphics).

But if you logged on in the last few minutes, you may have noticed that the donation slide went up from $1,255.00 to $2,133.00 – nearly half way to completion!

As if we all didn't have Angry Harry to thank for enough things, we can now thank him for most of that significant jump in funding. Harry came through in spades.

I don't for a moment want to appear like I am any less appreciative to other donors. I am not. Regardless of the amount you have given, it is all going to the same place. It is all helping. We even had one man part with $100.00… of his unemployment check.

How's that for toxic masculinity?

If we keep this up, A Voice for Men Radio will be a reality much sooner than expected.

Kind regards,

Paul

It Happened in New York

Paul Bonea · 12 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Admin note: Recent events here at AVfM, and in my personal life, has made for some very hectic times of late. I am running behind on some articles to be posted and at this point my email is a bloody mess that may be beyond catching up. My apologies to those I have not answered and those who are waiting for an article of yours to post, but for obvious reasons we are going to remain on current events for a few more days. Thank you for your patience.

Surprise events often have an interesting story behind them. The recent mention of A Voice for Men in the New York Times is no exception.

I have heard a lot of speculation about why The Times would not only print my name, but also provide a link to this website in the online version of their article on male studies. Like the rest of the MSM they have an illustrious history of refusing to acknowledge that we, or issues that affect men and boys, even exist. Ostensibly it would seem that the intent was to send people here to see some of the anger that comes out on these pages (preparing them in advance to see it as misogyny), in order to have them attribute negative qualities to the Male Studies Foundation and to the subject of male studies in general.

On the other hand, it has been speculated that the move was friendlier than that. Some have asserted, quite reasonably, that it is possible that McGrath reads AVfM, sympathizes with the message, and provided the link in order to direct traffic here in the only way he could at The Times; attached to insults and invective.

But there is a more plausible story here, in my opinion, especially given that is seems more reasonable that until McGrath wrote that article he had never heard of AVfM, or myself.

The answer lies in the subjects of his article. Two of the "men's studies" icons referenced in the article were Michael Kimmel and Robert Heasley. Both are men who make their bread and butter by acting like academicians when in reality they are simple political ideologues. They have as much interest in the truth as, well, political ideologues.

And not so coincidentally, methinks, they happen to be two of the political ideologues that I have been outing in my articles on the men's studies freak show since my days at Men's News Daily. See here, here and especially here.

I have been fortunate enough to have ears to the walls in their midst for quite some time now. And I can tell you from reliable sources that they don't handle my handling of them very well. There was talk of suing me, but that withered when they stopped fantasizing about revenge and talked to a real lawyer, the theory being that I have to actually do something wrong in order to win a law suit against me. I also know in some of their circles they have even been going after each other for not being feminist enough. Yes, AMSA, NOMAS, and SPSMM, I know all about it and will address it all in due time.

Anyway, it seems most likely to me that during the course of McGrath writing this article, my name and website came up when talking to one of the men's studies crew, whom I will identify as a Men's Studies Blowhard (MSB). I imagine the conversation went something like this.

MSB: Remember, male studies bad, men's studies good.

McGrath: O.K. Got it.

MSB: And there is something else. Paul Elam.

McGrath: Who?

MSB: Paul Elam. He's this super toxic, linear thinking, phallocentric, hegemonically masculine male with a website called A Voice for Men. He doesn't…

McGrath: What's that you say, a voice? For men?

MSB: Exactly! And as I was saying, he doesn't like men's studies – remember, that's bad – and he has been saying bad things about us.

McGrath: Like what?

MSB: Well, he doesn't understand that our subjective internal experience is just as valid as hard evidence!

McGrath: Say what!?

MSB: No, seriously. He actually challenges our subjective internal findings by citing sss…sss…science. Sweet Jesus, I can't believe I had to say it.

McGrath: Dear God. I wish I was there to hug you.

MSB: (sniff) Thanks. It's all true, though. And what's worse, when we try to get our point of view about how evil men are out to the world, he dis…dis…disagrees with us. Publicly! He's been making us all miserable for a really long time now.

McGrath: Bastard.

MSB: It is not so bad in most places. We usually only talk where dissent isn't allowed. But like I said, we have been trying to get our message out, you know, to the commoners, and some of the places we go they let people give dif…dif…differing opinions.

McGrath: Despicable! Not here, I tell you! Not at the New York Times!

MSB: I knew you would understand.

And so the seed was planted. And it grew.

Into a windfall for the MRM.

Let's face it, these people are not the sharpest pencils in the box. They had no way of knowing (but I did) that what they just did was shoot their own foot. Since The Times article ran, traffic here, especially from the Eastern Seaboard, has spiked significantly. And they are reading past one article and digging into the site.

My request for donations and help with building a web based MRM radio station has been met thus far with resounding support. And I see some real fire going on in the Manosphere; even stronger than before. There is a certainty brewing in the air that the long silent voice of men is preparing to resound in a thunderous chorus.

And so allow me to conclude this matter, for now, with some words to the men in academe that have exploited cultural misandry for fun and profit.

You're fucked.

All of you. The days of your maligning men and boys with impunity are over. The days when you can speak only to cowed audiences wherever you go are done as well. You are now focusing so much of your energy now admonishing men to hold each other to account regarding behaviors that are destructive to society. We are heeding your call, and coming for you. The truth is coming for you. And this means all of you men. It means the men of SPSMM, NOMAS, AMSA and similar hate groups. It means Kimmel, Kilmartin, Smiler and even Connell. No, Raewyn Connell, you are not exempt because you cut your balls off. It didn't change a single set of chromosomes in your body.

Every lie that you people spread will be exposed and exposed again. All of your websites and articles are full of such lies, and we are only going to get louder and more strident until you fucking fix it.

And please know that we are aware that you are attempting to speak your poison in more public forums online.

As Andrew Smiler found out recently, we are not going to allow anything you say to go without refuting it. Every lie you tell will be debunked; every distortion revealed. Wherever you go, whether it is to attack the male studies initiative, or simply to attack your fellow man with stereotypes and bigotry, you better hope you can call in favors again, like you did at The Times, to make sure no one but you is talking. Because in any public forum that lets you speak, we will be there more and more often.

We are not going away. In fact, we have barely even started.

Remember – BOYCOTT Valentines Day

Paul Bonea · 13 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As we are roughly one month away from another shopping extravaganza for the sake of pleasing women, it seems an auspicious time to remind readers that Valentines Day is to be avoided for what it is; a socially coerced day of hyper-entitlement for a generation of princess leeches.

If you are a man in a relationship and you like doing nice things for your partner, fine. There are 364 other days in the year to do it. Just don't do it on February 14th. And by the way, if you think loving someone means your wallet comes out while her purse remains closed then you will delighted to know that A Voice for Men will be selling monogrammed knee pads in the near future. All we need is the circumference of your knees and what sort of flooring is in your bedroom. We expect an endorsement from Joe Biden.

For some of you it may be hard to face this. You may be with a woman that is there waiting for her yearly take in gold, diamonds or something else equally valuable and liquid. And it is no wonder with the world around you adding to the pressure she is putting on you. Consider this:

A correction is needed here gentlemen. It would be better to say that every blowjob begins with Kay. After all, those full, moist lips they are promising you on the ad can go in quite a few places, and likely will if the tennis bracelet has enough carats.

But underneath all this is something actually a little darker. Not all men are getting blowjobs and other forms of sex for the presents on Valentines Day so much as they are getting a reprieve from constant nagging and criticism, if they happen to get the right present. Nobody wants to talk about it, but Valentines Day, for far too many men, is actually Lighten Up and Don't be such an Insufferable Bitch Day, but only if you get the present right.

Women are seriously invested in this shit, guys. Single women, or women with men who won't hit florists and jewelery stores when instructed, have been known to send flowers to themselves at work on Valentines Day just so they won't seem like such a loser to their co workers.

It is not just a matter of entitlement, but one of self esteem. And as most readers of this site already know, anyone who depends someone else making a trip to Zales or FTD in order to feel good about themselves has serious fucking issues. Feeding that on Valentines Day is like handle a bottle of Jack Daniels to your local sot.

He is only going to come back looking for more, and he won't quit till his liver gives out.

For men who are still interested in any kind of romantic involvement with women Valentines Day is a perfect day to assess what your values are and how easy or difficult it is to shame you into financial servitude. It is also an opportunity for you to understand that you get what you attract.

I used to counsel groups of men. It was a tough job getting them to be honest about women because of fears that putting reality on the table would drive women away. But with time almost all of them came to admit their constant frustrations with the pressures to to keep pleasing their women, especially where it concerns materialism.

But when they did I was compelled to ask them to describe their behavior early in their relationships. Almost without exception the men who were the most frustrated with financial pressures were also men who had entered those relationships wallet first, making sure Princess felt like a princess every minute of the day.

In other words, they went fishing with stink bait and caught bottom dwellers. And then they ended up silently stewing over it.

They got exactly what they paid for and nothing less.

So, gentlemen, if you want your kisses to begin with Kay, please allow me to suggest a prostitute, or at least a woman that admits that is what she is. They may not actually kiss you, but I am thinking their skills in the fellatio department are considerably more developed. And when they are done they will go away!

How cool is that?

But you might also want to start thinking about the fact that Valentines Day, along with modern romantic relationships in general both add new (and improved) meaning to the term “buying yourself problems.”

Someone else already officially started off the Valentines Day Boycott. It is time for the rest of us to finish it…off.

Heroes and Whores

A Costume Parade Down Your Avenue.

Don't Forget To Put Up Your Hands!

No, it's not time for Mardi Gras. You can put away your beads and be-dazzlers. And yes, the bottle of bourbon, too. This is somewhat less entertaining and a little less fun, but there are flashy costumes to look at. So how's about a peek.

No doubt the title is a little striking. If it's not Mardi Gras time just what the hell are these two words doing parked side by side. Seems a contradiction in terms, verging on shock value that might put an expression on your face stiff enough to make you realize there's just no comfortable response for this incomplete sentence. It might feel a little like a fresh botox injection, you want to form an expression but the skin just isn't moving. That's called a blank stare. It's really just a collision of neurotransmitters in the brain competing for the same destination, a complete thought. And while the botox crowd may strenuously struggle to achieve the blank stare of mindlessness with every injection, that's not the point here. You'll get no cheap tricks of that calibre from me, and thinking doesn't result in the production of neurotoxins, at least not for everyone.

You can relax now. Yes, you read it right. Heroes and Whores, just like up and down; in and out and the ubiquitous good and evil; different locations in the same continuum.

Kinda like a melodic progression on a slide guitar. Sounds great doesn't it? Nice flow, a little change up here and there. It makes you want to tap your toes, doesn't it? Maybe even hum a few bars. It's the kinda thing better not to think about, just let it flow – in and out, up and down, one and two and three and four and on and off and good and…Men.

Right out of the middle of nowhere the melody ends unexpectedly, replaced by this nerve cracking squeal in the middle of your head. It makes you wonder when the chalk board was installed. Your standing there contorted and ready to swallow your face and begging for it to stop and it just won't.

Gimme the botox please, into the right frontal lobe. Make sure you hit the language center. Just let us get back to normal.

That's how it is whenever I put these two words together. Hero whore, and whore hero. That's the way it is today. Pick up a paper and read the latest piece on justice or crime. Check the header at the top. Yeah, I'm still on the same planet but what the hell is going on? Seems like sanity has left the planet and I'm in the middle of The Rocky Horror Picture Show.

Speaking of whores, is it me or do you feel like you're in the middle of a religious inquisition and moral turpitude has been pre-assigned? Guilt by genitalia seems to be the course of events, like every institute has taken up the cause against the masculine. Feminists are describing it, women are accusing it, cops are arresting it, courts are prosecuting it and governments are funding it. Everyone wants to be a hero and get that guy.

It seems like heroes running to the rescue to save female innocence[sic], the damsel in distress, has actually become big business. Those days are every day and every hour. It's amazing what you can do with statistics when you vibrate them …on high speed. If you listen close you can hear the orgasmic wave coming from the feminist misanthropes. Ah, Ah AH, domestic violence. Oh,Oh,OH, misogyny. Ooh, ooh, OOH, rape, and of course eeh, eeh, EEH, funding.

What's left for you is argh, argh, ARGH, unemployment. Make no mistake about what you are reading and witnessing in main stream media. It is the stuff of career making and the corruption is right in your face. When we see crime policies based on ZERO TOLERANCE we must now ask, towards whom?

Obviously in the case of rape allegations there is no hesitation to charge and release information to the media to begin an immediate smear campaign. It's done to enhance the careers of prosecutors and law enforcement. It is apparent to any thinking person that a media campaign to smear a suspect serves only to glorify the efforts of bureaucrats. When the door swings the other way and allegations prove to be false, just what is it we see of the ZERO TOLERANCE policies?

If you don't know, just ask Julian Assange. Quoting the feminist fatale Naomi Wolfe, "these women did not make charges against him.".

Well if they didn't file charges, what the fuck and who the fuck is the law serving?

What's incredibly sad is women have been so hypnotised by their own personal vagina monologue that they ms the big picture. They are destroying their relationship to the masculine and continue the effort by supporting rabid social policies and laws that rightly belong on a parker brother's game board. The bureaucrats continue the effort, with the realization that this is the greatest thing since take out terrorism. They are definitely running with it, to an extent that gives credence and justification to all things spending and career related.

The laws have been completely rewritten in Dudley Do-right legal ease with only one determination: get to the railroad tracks and release that woman from her velvet Velcro restraints.

I've always been impressed by people who can provide answers when no questions have been asked. Or file charges when no complaint has been issued. But hey, who says you can't reshape society with just a liberal arts degree and a lisp. It would seem that saving the feminine from all things….well from all things, has become the policy of the western world. But just who is being saved here? Bureaucratic whores come running with predetermined policy to ignore reality and to apply their particular brand of ideological heroism. I mean, come on, shouldn't we be having some kind of socialist Oscar Awards here?

We can legitimately ask if charges for false allegations will provide the same career enhancements, and the answer is NO.

So what we are seeing is the absolute worst of government corruption; the effort to charge and convict anyone who can be sold as a villain to the voters. Since main stream media is in lock step with selling themselves to the public we have a media that will not question the integrity of the process. What we have without accountability is bureaucrats running afoul with legal privilege to squash anyone they point their finger at and the money to do it; your money.

It is a conflict of interest that is obvious and not obscured. The payoff is tenured income and a jet fuelled boost to a career. Fundamentally, it is why it serves no purpose to charge for false accusations. The real purpose is career.

It is a perfect scenario for zealous and heroic bureaucrats to whore themselves and the public. Men who have become the primary target in this society will feel hostility and anger for their female accusers, railing against feminist fear mongering dogma. But the real culprits are self-serving prosecutors and lick spittle police painting a career of effectiveness that does not exist, while angling for a bigger budget and legislators purchasing votes regardless of the cost or collateral damage. It cannot be understood any other way when we realize that it is not for the purpose of justice that a policy so clearly stated as ZERO TOLERANCE in fact has a caveat, and that caveat serves to withhold justice.

We have "primary aggressor" laws that tell us whoever possesses the most body mass must be guilty. When that doesn't work we move to whoever possesses the most testosterone. In one wave of the pen we have discredited our own civilisation and base our judgements on primal notions of animal aggression. We have nothing to teach our children when we direct our judgments in this way. Civilisation against such methods of judgement has been deemed to be a hoax and charade. In these kinds of judgements we can only be animals, the largest preying on the smallest; the strongest preying on the weakest. Literature, art, education and law, all a hoax.

These things do not civilise us.

With laws such as the “primary aggressor” law we are all animals and thugs.

Overwhelmingly, and on a daily basis, we see a justice system not serving the public or the victim, but serving the whore of their very own special interests by glorifying their efforts and seeking more of your tax dollars. It would be no surprise to discover that the truth behind not charging a false accuser is simply because they were prompted by circumstance with no supporting evidence and the culpability of a prosecutor and or the police would be exposed. It requires no more than these questions to justify taking these bureaucrats to task for the integrity of their office and the methods by which that integrity is served to the public. It has become abundantly obvious in these offices of justice that celebrating the discovery of innocence cannot be held up as a standard to evidence an integrity they are attempting to sell to us all.

It has always laboured in my mind to consider what remains of justice when the hero whores have left the scene of a crime. What is left when the feeding frenzy of the media and the bureaucrats have consumed their portion of self-righteous popularity. They fuel their careers by “gaming” us with the misery of their cause and devour more tax dollars for their own privilege. Just what is left when they are finished saving us? Broken homes, family members in crisis, compromised employment, shattered reputations, flamed futures and poverty knocking at the door.

This is not governance, it’s just corruption.

It is not hard to see and to know that in any circumstance of real crime the victims do not seek popularity at the very time of their vulnerability. From this understanding came laws to protect victims, such as rape shield laws and privacy laws to protect our youth and children. We have become so gluttonous for the main stream media’s warped perception of “political game” that as viewers we fuel this social weather and the storms it brings. We are simply feeding a layer of people to protect us while they take our money and our taxes and feed us lies to fuel our fears.

It is not hard to understand that to fight our worst fears and to protect our communities, our families, our children and our futures we must be there in the middle of it. Only from there can we know the truth and respond to it justly. We must be our own heroes. We must stop paying for and relying on whores. These corrupt breast feeding bureaucrats really need to understand that the milk is gone and that it is time to move on to solid food.

Refuting the Appeal to Dictionary

Adam Kostakis · 14 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Lecture No. 3

"Have you ever actually looked up the word feminist in a dictionary? It means equality between the sexes. It is not about hating men. This is very simple and you would know if you actually looked it up" – Diva

Following on from last week's overview of Gynocentrism then and now, I propose that there is a common thread of female-worship running through, and linking, traditional conceptions of masculinity – historically expressed in what we might call 'patriarchy' – and feminism, which has taken over state and supranational institutions, and is poised to unleash the explicit persecution of men.

It may well take many more of these lectures before this is fully elucidated, but I mention it here for two purposes. The first is a reminder that reference to this common thread runs through all these musings: that Gynocentrism has been with us for a long, long time, and has only changed its form, not its content. This is the crux of Gynocentrism Theory, and it is the narrow focus which I am taking over a broad range of subjects.

Secondly, to shift the discussion towards feminism. There is the danger of reading into Gynocentrism Theory a minimization of feminism's effects, considering that it is only the most modern version of a phenomenon which is centuries old. On the other hand, though, it is the most active form of Gynocentrism that we must presently deal with; it is the enemy, and as the all-singing, all-dancing tremendous final act in this regard, it is a phenomenon worthy of study in its own regard.

Better the devil you know! It is said that it is better to know thine enemy, but feminists are highly effective at obscuring their own intentions, actions, history, and penchant for the use of eristic. Amidst the smoke and mirrors, a chorus of shrill voices from all directions can be heard to proclaim, "it's not our job to educate you about feminism!"

Fine – then we shall have to cast around for ourselves, burrow for gems of knowledge, and procure our own judgments on what feminism is. And since feminists themselves have disavowed their role as our educators, the conclusions which we reach shall require no sanction from them. If it is not their job to educate us about feminism, then it could hardly be anybody else's but our own, could it? And yet, strangely enough, when we do seek out knowledge for ourselves, they object most vociferously to our findings, as though they do in fact covet the role of educator after all. It has been repeatedly suggested that we might like to check the dictionary.

This is a spurious request, not least because there is no 'the dictionary'. Rather, there are dictionaries (plural). The Appeal to Dictionary is one which is made by people who, to put it bluntly, are not very bright. Such people apparently believe that language is a finite array of words, each carrying a single objective definition, the final arbiter of which is The Dictionary.

In the real world, language is ever fluctuating and it is corruptible. It is a collection of meanings, designated by terms – but quite how these are configured is determined by the vagaries of time and place! And very often, people disagree about how terms are, or should be, designated to meanings – and how meanings are, or should be, designated to terms!

The very existence of contested terminology, then, seems to refute the Appeal to Dictionary. Where disputes arise over the definition or use of a term, this is an indication that we have several meanings (or ideas, or concepts, if you prefer) huddled together under the same word-umbrella. To put it another way: there are several things, but they are all designated by the same word. A given configuration of terms to meanings may benefit certain people, and be of detriment to certain others!

Let's take an example – sometimes, the claim that feminism supports women in making false rape allegations has been refuted by a reference to feminism's stated support for sexual equality. "Feminism," a feminist would say, "is about sexual equality, and nothing more."

And yet false rape allegations still exist – as does feminist complicity in the making of them. This issue has only been deprived of recognition in language. The feminist has expertly obscured the complicity of feminism in the making of false rape allegations, by whitewashing the ideology as being "about sexual equality, and nothing more." If we accept her argument that feminism only refers to support for sexual equality, then we no longer have any terms with which to discuss or understand false rape allegations, beyond viewing them as a series of unrelated incidents. Certainly, we wouldn't be able to consider false rape allegations in their proper context, which is as part of a system of control and persecution. The phenomenon of a false rape allegation is surely not explicable by what we understand when we say "sexual equality," and since feminism is about nothing more than that, we are left with no linguistic resources with which to meaningfully speak about it; we have been struck dumb. In short, we have an existing thing, but it is no longer designated by any words. How then could we draw attention to it, criticize it, oppose it?

Let's take another example. A feminist may well create a false partition in the problem of Father's Rights by defining it in such a way that feminist culpability is overlooked. She could, for instance, say that "patriarchy is to blame for the unequal treatment of fathers." Once again, she has controlled the language – meanings are split between terms, or they are compressed into one, and the intended outcome is that the guilty party avoids being taken to task!

Now, you might think – "why does this matter? A feminist might say this or that, but I don't believe her; my own experiences tell me that it's not true, and I'm unlikely to be fooled by what she says."

That's all well and good. But there are a lot of people out there who will be fooled by what she says – including those who possess the very real physical power to imprison you, destroy you, or alienate you from your loved ones. Feminists aren't just saying this to people like you and I – their nonsense gushes forth in all directions, like crude oil from a burst pipe, flowing towards anybody who will listen, and especially those who can "do something about it." Their message comes through, louder than a rushing waterfall, whether you want to hear it or not – and their whole project depends upon the relentless repetition of a dozen or so mantras, and the sinking of their sentiments into the collective subconscious. This is why they endlessly prattle on, typically parroting stock phrases like loyal cells in a hive mind! They do it because it works – at least, until somebody stands up and points out that the Emperor's not wearing any clothes.

And then, all hell breaks loose!

It was necessary to speak at length on this point, because we must realize that political language is never neutral, and implications are always hidden in the configuration of ideas and terms. The role of Men's Rights Advocates is to critically assess the feminist use of language, and to determine where we would be well-served to separate out several ideas which are referred to by one term, or to compress several terms into one. We should never respond to a feminist argument without first looking critically at the terms through which it is being conducted. To put it in Gamespeak, we must "control the frame!"

The Appeal to Dictionary can be summarily dismissed. Official dictionaries represent establishment positions. Feminism, as it is in vogue, is officially defined in the way that its adherents would like the world to see feminism; it is not defined in a way that describes, or accounts for, the totality of the project. That which happened, or still happens, but does not reflect the establishment view, is simply ignored. To define feminism as > the advocacy of women's rights on the grounds of political, social, and economic equality to men is to brush aside much of its unpleasant history – and to deprive skeptics of the resources for an unofficial linguistic and historical analysis of the term. This old revision of the Wikipedia page 'Feminism and Equality' contains plenty of material which disputes the black-and-white dictionary definition, although the page itself has fallen prey to the very same forces which seek to delimit the linguistic opportunities of their critics. Thankfully, Wikipedia archives old versions of its articles, so the efforts of one Nick Levinson in exposing the explicitly anti-male tenor of several famous feminist works has not gone to waste. Let's get cracking!

> Jill Johnston, in Lesbian Nation, called for men to eliminate the qualities they hold as men. "Man is completely out of phase with nature. Nature is woman. Man is the intruder. The man who re-attunes himself with nature is the man who de-mans himself or eliminates himself as man […] A small but significant number of angry and historically minded women comprehend the women's revolution in the visionary sense of an end to the catastrophic brotherhood and a return to the former glory and wise equanimity of the matriarchies."
> Mary Daly, in Gyn/Ecology, wrote in favor of reversing power between the genders […] "As a creative crystallizing of the movement beyond the state of Patriarchal Paralysis, this book is an act of Dis-possession; and hence, in a sense beyond the limitations of the label anti-male, it is absolutely Anti-androcrat, A-mazingly Anti-male, Furiously and Finally Female."
>
> "Do women need land and an army . . .; or a feminist government in exile . . .? Or is it simpler: the bed belongs to the woman; the house belongs to the woman; any land belongs to the woman; if a male intimate is violent he is removed from the place where she has the superior and inviolate claim, arrested, denied parole, and prosecuted. . . . . Could women 'set a high price on our blood'?" – Andrea Dworkin
> Phyllis Chesler, in Women and Madness, drew on matriarchal history, Amazon mythology, and psychology and, with some ambivalence about relying on biology alone as a justification, argued that a war between the genders has always been underway and that women would benefit from using their full powers to be the exclusive wielders of political power to produce an unequal society in which men live but are relatively powerless, even if such a society is no more just than a patriarchy, and called for feminist women to dominate public institutions in their self-interest. "Amazon society, as mythology, history, and universal male nightmare, represents a culture in which women reign culturally supreme because of their gender […] In Amazon society, only men, when they were allowed to remain, were, in widely differing degrees, powerless and oppressed […] If women take their bodies seriously—and ideally we should—then its full expression, in terms of pleasure, maternity, and physical strength, seems to fare better when women control the means of production and reproduction. From this point of view, it is simply not in women's interest to support patriarchy or even a fabled 'equality' with men."
> One organization that was named The Feminists was interested in matriarchy. Two members wanted "'the restoration of female rule'".

Unless the aforementioned organization and books did not really exist, we are forced to conclude that feminism cannot only have been about the advocacy of women's rights on the grounds of equality with men. At the very least, what we must say is that some feminists may have supported equality, while other feminists have overlooked equality and have outright supported female superiority. And neither can the latter group be reduced to a handful of fringe lunatics. As Nick Levinson points out (much to the chagrin of feminist moderators), two and a half million copies of Phyllis Chesler's Women and Madness were sold.

That's a whole lot of hate.

And a whole lot of energy is spent actively sweeping this kind of thing under the rug, by those who have since realized how damaging honesty can be to one's case. Modern feminists are far more rhetorically disciplined than their forthright foremothers, and have concluded that unpopular plans are not helped into motion by being discussed openly. Rhetorical discipline adds a whole new layer of subterfuge to all that has been said regarding the designation of terms to ideas. It will not suffice only to look at what they say; we must watch carefully what they do. And haven't some of the above recommendations come true, per the actions of feminists? Is it not now the case that male intimates accused of violence are removed from their homes in which the woman has the superior and inviolate claim, as Andrea Dworkin hoped for? Have feminist women not dominated public institutions in their own interest, as Phyllis Chesler advocated? As Gynocentrism Theory tells us, women already had a "high price on their blood" – much higher than that of men, at almost any time in history. This simple fact is the reason why it was possible for the prescriptions of radical feminists to be achieved in the first place – and for dissidents to have been so effortlessly marginalized.

Still, times change. Establishments are overturned, and words are officially redefined. If the new definition of a word proves more accurate, then it must have existed for some time, unofficially, before the word's revision. Sometimes, establishments must change before terms catch up. The dictionary lags behind definition, because the establishment is stuck in the mud. I predict that, as we reach a critical mass opposed to feminism, and shortly before its collapse, we may well see some concessions in the form of alternative definitions of the term becoming accepted.

Adam Kostakis has been carefully reading Men's Rights websites for the past couple of years, and has finally decided to contribute something himself. His blog is named Gynocentrism Theory and can be found here.

Chivalry Gone Awry

hestia · 14 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

An interesting conversation has been taking place on Dalrock's blog recently on the topic of chivalry, which sex provides more selfless help, and what words should be used to highlight the difference in help between men and women. Chivalry has been the word proposed and the word used but for a variety of reasons I have been left wondering if this is an appropriate choice.

What Chivalry Was Supposed to Mean

The code of chivalry was never meant to apply to the male population at large but rather a small subset who were the tough warriors of their day. These warrior ethos did not mean male servitude to women but called for a brotherhood between knights, courage during times that conjure up great fear, and dedication to king and cause. Part of the code did address taking care of the widow and orphan and being courteous to women but this was hardly the end all be all of this knightly code of honor. And back then, just as today, not all women were ladies; this was a title reserved for those of a certain social class not women who behave with a healthy heaping of decorum and propriety as the term is used today.

Taken in it's proper context, chivalry is not dead today. Our society still has a small minority of men who feel called to serve in the military, a reality that is well illustrated when one reads the creeds and military ethos of today. Yet it's not just on paper we see this modern day chivalry alive and thriving but in the way the media and justice system may treat military members who misbehave. In military towns it's not uncommon for news reports to say that a soldier/sailor/marine/coastie/airman committed the crime as opposed to using man or woman. If the accused service member happened to be in an elite branch the media will eat this up much as they did in 2002 when the now infamous 'Fort Bragg Wife Murders' were committed by men who happened to be part of Special Forces and Delta.

On my blog and The Spearhead I've said several times that should my family's home need to be defended from a criminal that legally speaking it would be best that I, not my husband, pull that trigger. This isn't because I am a woman but because my husband is a trained soldier and I am not. A civilian man would make out better legally in such a case than my husband or his military peers would, just as would happen if it the case was their committing an assault. The argument would likely be made that the Special Forces soldier, well trained in combatives and other warrior skills, has the potential to be deadlier with his bare hands alone and should have had enough discipline to control himself.

To this day society expects and hopes that their best trained warriors are disciplined not only in the artifices of war but in self control as well and this is not without good reason. Nobody wants strength to be used inappropriately for the danger that comes about when tough meets evil. In short form: chivalry is the same as it always has been. Nothing has changed and it's certainly not dead, just hijacked and twisted quite a bit.

Combating the Chivalry Perversion

If the idea of chivalry is kept in its proper usage–the honor code of a society's meanest toughest warriors– the female entitlement that has been bred with the perversion of the word is all the more perplexing. The men who were required to give up their seats on the Titanic were not knights of that day. They weren't men who were operating under an honor code they have willingly submitted themselves and shouldn't have been treated as such. The code of chivalry never required that all men open doors, buy flowers, pay for dates, and bend over backwards for all women. To get from military ethos to male servitude to women was a wild crazy leap. Examining the modern day perversion of the chivalric concept blows out of the water the harmful and demeaning idea that all men must sacrifice themselves to the degree that a warrior did/does (to death if need be) in order to be Real Men. There has always been just a small percentage of men who felt "called" to this lifestyle; those who aren't now and never were bad men or masculinity rejects. Society needs the poet, the engineer, and the brainy scientist and all other sorts of men just as much as it needs its warriors. How did we get from a code of ethics designed for a warrior class to male subservience towards women as a group and a limiting myopic view of how this ideal fits into “real” masculinity as we have today? It’s mighty odd…

In pointing this out those who espouse and expect and demand male disposability and deference to all women the reality of this perversion and the sickness of what they preach to men is out in the light of day. They are demanding something entirely different than what chivalry was instituted to be and this raises many perplexing questions, ones that don’t even require the feminist/equality angle. How do they justify their position? What makes women so special and more worthy of protection than their brother human beings? And if feeling especially brazen it could be asked what happened to the brotherhood aspect of the code. If we need to “bring back chivalry” surely you guys deserve “wings and beer night with the boys” or hunting trips or something.

Perhaps our opponents will not be so rational as to understand where their entitlement mindset falls apart but any rational individual who is listening/reading might be led to ask questions about this important topic. And even if they don’t, looking at chivalry in it’s proper context may provide men with the reality that they do not need to fulfill the obligations demanded of them to be Real Men. They may better appreciate that they can be successful men and fully masculine without the need to demean themselves or put themselves in positions they do no wish to be in. They might be able to not just ask why society has different expectations for men than women but put into practice what they, individually, believe they should do.

The connotations, misunderstanding, and baggage that come with the word are immense and it fails to drive home the most important point of the good deeds men graciously and freely give to women and others they help. It also keeps alive the perverted expectations that have been placed on the shoulders of men and may even keep men chained to said expectations. Chivalry today implies that men “owe” this service to women whereas a term like “selfless service” describes precisely what is being offered: men giving a gift of themselves that wasn’t “owed” but given by their own choice. To not highlight this reality and the beauty in the act does an immense disservice to men. Separating help that is given by choice versus that given by societal expectation would go a long way in highlighting just which sex gives more benevolently and freely to strangers than the other. “What a selfless giving man! He helped me fix my lawn mower when he didn’t have to!” should be how we think of what men give, not “grrrr why didn’t he carry my bags! Loser!” Controlling the language may be one way to change the minds at least of a few.

Answering a Schoolgirl's Questions

Tom Givens · 15 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Some time ago I was contacted by a journalism student with what I thought at the time were pretty lazy questions. So I let it slide, and didn't answer in time. I realize now that this was a mistake, since navigating the Men's Movement related sites can be a bit tough to do. Sure, there is The Spearhead and A Voice For Men (and MND, SYG, etc), but these sites cycle so many articles so fast that its sometimes difficult to get a handle on the main issues.

So, I decided to answer the questions with some writing of my own. Her questions are in bold:

How has the feminist movement negatively impacted society?

It would be more productive to ask in what ways has Feminism helped society? It would certainly be a much easier and quicker answer. But since you asked I can give you a brief run down from an MRA perspective.

First, Feminism has largely achieved its goal of the destruction of the Family. You may think I'm employing hyperbole here, but I am not. From its very inception Feminism has sought to destroy the family unit as a first step to 'deconstructing' society, and Feminist icons have never been shy about stating as much either.

It's important to see the interconnected-ness of most of the social ills facing society, so rather than list them (and thus appear to simply blame "everything" on Feminism), I will attempt to outline how things came to the way they are. I will largely leave up to you the reasons why.

Feminism often refers to marriage as a "comfortable concentration camp", and portrays the lack of achievement (at least, achievement of things women seem to hold in high regard) of the female sex as having come about by design. Their pet conspiracy theory – that all men of all social classes in all societies everywhere, and throughout history, collectively worked together to 'hold women down' – has been used to "justify" all manner of evil acts.

The first one relevant here is No Fault Divorce. By succeeding in getting the idea of 'fault' removed from one's entitlement to property, essentially No Fault Divorce gives women license to cheat with impunity, in addition to receiving reward for cuckoldry. It's also important to note that never once did this "egalitarian movement" called Feminism allow one iota of women's control over the familial sphere to degrade. If anything, Feminism utilized Chivalric impulses in men to garner even more (some would say totalitarian) control over "Family Matters".

One of the methods used to cement this power, was the co opting of Domestic Violence shelters into the feminist fold. Erin Pizzey, the founder of the first battered women's shelter in history, has repeatedly stated that feminists had her ousted from the shelter, issued death threats to her until she had to leave the country, etc. Curiously, after this "egalitarian" movement became involved in DV, suddenly men were no longer victims, but always the perpetrator.

These shelters continuously used the phrase "women and children" (echoing the paternal past nicely) when referring to DV victims.

Now, they could cry "think of the children" (with echoes of Goebbels) as an attack against men. And they did…viciously. Now, we live in a time when men are literally afraid to approach lost children, for fear of accusation against them! That is the product of the hateful misandry-laden DV industry.

But they didn't stop there. They have begun to attack boys too, in the hopes of heading off these boys developing self-esteem, or free will and independence. In New York, Atlanta, Denver, and Austin, DV shelters have taken to putting pictures of prepubescent boys on the side of busses, with the words "future abuser" on them.

Feminism also ushered in a highly intolerant age for 'misbehaving', resulting in skyrocketing rates of imprisonment. The U.S. now imprisons a higher percentage of their population than Soviet Russia did, and the majority of those imprisoned are there for things like marijuana possession or failure to pay child support. Add to this hyperregulated environment a single mother birthrate of 41% (yes, 41% of all children born in the US are born to unmarried women) along with all the attendant social problems, and you see social collapse as a very real possibility.

But we can't stop there. We have to look at Affirmative Action as well, which severely limits the future of a whole lot of men. They are the 'unpopular' group of men known as "White Males", and while we all 'know' white males are privileged, it seems the data is simply not showing that to be the case. In fact, Feminist "research" in any area having anything at all to do with measuring white males against anything else, that data is always presented in such a way as to make the white male look as bad as possible; which, so far, has served to distract from the fact that the biggest beneficiary of all is the White Female.

And that's if the man can get a job at all. Education is increasingly necessary in this ever more credentialist society. Feminist lobbying for restrictions on means companies can employ when screening applicants have led to there being little more than prior experience, or a degree, that can be used as criteria. Yet the education system is notoriously anti-male, cries to the contrary answered by referencing the educational attainment of boys, and the lack of reasoned response by educators (keep in mind, this is a 30 year old phenomenon).

Has the feminist movement negatively impacted the family unit?

Yes.

The feminist movement has done nothing but 'negatively impact' the family unit. The entitlement complex indoctrinated into women from birth is a result of "You Go Grrl!" type feminism coupled with Disney-esque adoration. This has resulted in women's expectations of men rising to incredible heights, and a distorted sense of worth in women. Where marriage used to be more about getting ahead together, now it is much more mercenary at the outset.

Boys, in particular, are negatively impacted in the family as well. Contrary to feminist ideology, boys are not born with an arrogant sense of entitlement. But boys generally do get their sense of self worth by the same way girls still measure the worth of boys as well; from accomplishment…a concept virtually outlawed in feminist society. Given that some 40% of boys go through the first 8 years of school never having a male teacher, and grow up in single mother households, in a society that has vilified male achievement, it's a wonder our society still stands.

And no wonder it is currently standing on wobbly legs.

As for the balance between men and women, it's no secret that women hold utter control in the family. The idea of taking all of a man's possessions and removing him from his children's life is so common as to become a stereotype, and one that is unquestioningly accepted by everyone, including feminists.

Men are put in the 'dog house'. Men must perform for women, be useful, try not to be too embarrassing in the process, etc. These stereotypes could not exist without being common, and that says a LOT about the common balance of power in most relationships. Men only 'joke' about it because it's so emasculating otherwise.

Could it be argued that feminism is an anti-men hate movement?

Wikipedia: "A hate group is an organized group or movement that advocates and practices hate, hostility, or violence towards members of a race, ethnicity, religion, gender, sexual orientation or other designated sector of society. "

There have been a few MRAs that have written on this subject. Erin Pizzey (that DV shelter founder from a while back) said this of feminism:

"Feminism, I realised, was a lie. Women and men are both capable of extraordinary cruelty. Indeed, the only thing a child really needs – two biological parents under one roof – was being undermined by the very ideology which claimed to speak up for women's rights. "
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-1215464/Why-I-loathe-feminism—believe-ultimately-destroy-family.ht ml#ixzz1AW6gqCxA

Fidlebogen at The CounterFeminist does not mince words either on the subject. This is how he opens his article on Feminism being a hate movement:

"T*o remove man-hating from feminism would be to extract the DNA nucleus from a living cell, the fuel rod from a reactor, the teeth from a rottweiler. I would assert that man-hating is feminism's moral center of gravity, and that without man-hating or at least some degree of disaffection toward males, feminism could not logically continue to exist—it would flounder without purpose, and disintegrate. "*

http://counterfem.blogspot.com/2006/10/is-feminism-hate-movement.html

This would be nothing but bluster and hot air except for the small problem of very high profile feminists saying pretty much exactly the same thing:

"I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them."

Robin Morgan – former president of the National Ourganization for Women (NOW) and editor of MS magazine

"I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it."

Former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan.

"My feelings about men are the result of my experience. I have little sympathy for them. Like a Jew just released from Dachau, I watch the handsome young Nazi soldier fall writhing to the ground with a bullet in his stomach and I look briefly and walk on. I don't even need to shrug. I simply don't care. What he was, as a person, I mean, what his shames and yearnings were, simply don't matter."

Marilyn French; The Woman's Room.

"All sex, even consensual sex between a married couple, is an act of violence perpetrated against a woman."

Catherine MacKinnon

Does the feminist movement violate the identity of men?

Not only does it seem like feminism is has made its mission to violate the identity of men (for instance, there's no shortage of feminists telling men how "real men" should act, think, dress, look, smell, etc.), but Feminism is highly averse to the very idea of men figuring stuff out for themselves. It seems the greatest reason for existence many feminists can come up with for their movement, is to suppress ours.

Feminism as an ideology does not allow for dissent, and since it's built upon a stack of bald-faced lies, any questioning of basic feminist principles is harshly rebuked, rather than welcomed. This is the surest sign of a totalitarian regime based on injustice.

Totalitarian regimes thrive on subverting individual identity across the board.

Is equality between men and women achievable?

Given the performance of women over the last 50 years, I would say no, it is not. The main problem with power is the temptation to use that power to benefit yourself, and people like you. The truest test of leadership is the ability to treat even the most (to you) distasteful people in a manner of at least surface equality. Women have made no bones about their self interest politically, with pundits and politicians alike openly declaring women will vote for a certain candidate based solely on that candidate's sex. And the record is clear that women have largely pursued an agenda, not of equality, but of unmitigated self-interest to the detriment of the rest of society.

Men are not blameless here, as their desire to please women has also led them to enable these slanted pursuits, again to their own detriment. And women will not be the ones to reverse this trend; their hypergamous instincts not only do not allow them to fully 'see' men they don't value as mating material, but it prohibits them from seeing non-useful men at all. Moreover, they are most to be repulsed by men that complain.

But the long and short of it, is that given women's history with political power in North America, I think you would have a hard time arguing women having the vote is a good thing. I truly do. And that's not my fault, its women as a whole that shit the bed on that one.

If you search the internet for feminist groups there are several hits but a lot fewer when looking for the counterbalance. Is it important for more men to speak out about the negative effects that the feminist movement can have?

Of course it's important. It's actually vital to the survival of our society. I know that sounds hyperbolic but you have to remember that destroying this society has been the very reason for the existence of feminism since the 1960's. And it's doing a remarkably good job of it.

Many men have thrown up their hands in disgust already. Some have expatriated, some have "gone ghost", but men are turning off from society – and women – in ever increasing numbers. And while this is a logical response, it's not the best solution.

Feminism and the social memes it has inserted into the public consciousness are incredibly destructive, and countering that is job one. Much of the MRM is composed of broke guys with no money for a social life, but they have a computer and a net connection. If those guys can work together and get enough momentum that places like the NY Times are finally, finally starting to pay attention, just think what would happen if people with access could do.

Peace Needs a Woman Like a Fish Needs a Bicycle

B.R. Merrick · 16 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I'm lazy. I'm also willfully uninformed. When I occasion to inform myself, I have to use the Internet, since I ditched TV in 2007, and quite happily, I might add. I frequently inform myself by going to Antiwar.com, as I have come to trust the information they provide based on how things have been panning out over the last few years. That trust has now been reduced a fraction as I stumbled on what I thought would be an inspirational article about using peaceful means to combat war. How wrong I was, and how disappointed I have become.

The article is entitled "Why Peace Is the Business of Men," by Tom Englehardt and Ann Jones. (I think I clicked on it because the title is entirely true. Gee, maybe it was a trap to sucker us misogynists.) I have read a lot of Englehardt's articles in the past, and he frequently recruits intelligent writers that he then features. I think Jones has some admirable qualities, but they are dwarfed by her rampant misandry and "progressive" idiocy. Since Antiwar.com is chiefly a libertarian website, I have come to tolerate the views of the less-than-libertarian writers they sometimes feature, but this one is too much for me. Jones is under the impression that the world will have more peace when more women are brought to the negotiating table.

If you choose to read the article, you will see not a single reference to a single fact, a single survey, or a single statistic that accounts for this belief. Instead, when you get to Jones's article after Englehardt's opening remarks, you find that the original title of Jones's article is actually: "Why Peace Is the Business of Men (But Shouldn't Be): A Modest Proposal for the Immodest Brotherhood of Big Men." Get it now? Jones's agenda isn't really peace. If it were, it wouldn't matter what special, lovely thing the ambassador has between thighs that are safely out of reach under the negotiating table. All that would matter would be peace.

There can be no peace, however, where feminism can be found, because where there is feminism or "progressivism," there is deep-rooted unhappiness. "Look at those people! Look at their destitute situation! Look at that rich man laughing maniacally at them! We need Daddy — I mean government — to do something about it! Look! Look over here at this woman who wants to be an astronaut! Look at how these men with their awful, terrifying penises, have rigged the game so that she can't be one! We need quotas! Make that man in the Oval Office do something about it! I don't care! Suck his dick if you have to!" Once a woman's soul is thus agitated, war cannot be far behind.

There are more women working and making decisions in world governments now than at any previous time in history. Quite a few of them voted in favor of attacking a nation that didn't attack us. What have historical female political leaders done about peace? Let's take a look:

"How can we return the occupied territories? There is nobody to return them to." Golda Maier, March 8, 1969.

"And we have got to be vigilant. We have got to show the support, in this case, for Georgia. The support that we can show is economic sanctions perhaps against Russia, if this is what it leads to." Sarah Palin, September 11, 2008.

"I think this is a very hard choice, but the price [the deaths of innocent children from non-Republican economic sanctions] – we think the price is worth it." Madeline Albright, May 1996.

"I have the heart of a man, not a woman, and I am not afraid of anything…" and: "Though the sex to which I belong is considered weak you will nevertheless find me a rock [sic] that bends to no wind." Both Elizabeth I. (Where are these bending rocks anyway? Seriously, did she mean or actually say "tree" instead? Or am I missing something about Old English? Whatever.)

There are more quotes than this. Not much, because I can't find that many female world leaders, but one of the posters here (goes by bugdoctor) lists a few gems:

"QUEEN MARY I

"She ordered the so-called Marian Persecutions, the execution of countless religious dissenters especially Protestant leaders; thus the epithet 'Bloody Mary.'

"QUEEN ELIZABETH I [the Manhearted]
"She had thousands of Catholics in Ireland and England murdered… [sniff She's just like her father…]

"JIANG QUING
"Wife of Mao Tse-tung,… [i]t is believed that she was the driving force that propelled the Cultural Revolution of China, of which she was the Deputy Director…

"Boudica: Celtic War Queen Who Challenged Rome
"She slaughtered a Roman army…"

There's even more boys, but again I must remind you, I'm lazy. (I'm definitely a bending rock.) And I tried awfully hard to find something about another politician with whom I have a few grievances, but sadly, this non-progressive, somewhat sensible woman merely had this to say:

"I owe nothing to Women's Lib." Margaret Thatcher.

The main reason you don't find many women in positions of power is probably because women have a natural predisposition towards children, nurturance, and home. None of this equals a disposition for peace. Furthermore, why bother when you can order a man to do it? Like the mother in "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" told her engaged daughter concerning the structure of the family unit: "The man is the head, but the woman is the neck. And she can turn the head any way she wants." I remember laughing hysterically when she said that (not because I agree, but because it's just the sort of thing her character would say), but think about it: Does controlling the thoughts and behavior of another individual sound peaceful to you? How many ruthless male politicians had women in their early lives acting like necks for the heads of unwilling boys?

The structure of government, a most egregious system of coercion, is designed for those who wish to initiate coercion. Since "progressives" like nothing better but to initiate coercion against "oppressors," it's easy to see why Jones has a jones for the power-play of political peace. Therefore, the only women who are going to be invited to the table are women who can be just as ruthless, uncaring, spiteful, greedy, and violent as the men who are sitting there. In short, the really nasty sort of feminists. To be more specific, not the sort of women who are truly anti-war.

But back to Jones and her delusions: "In 2001, the U.S. and by extension the entire international community cast their lot with Hamid Karzai… We could have seen this coming if we had kept an eye on how President Karzai treats women." As if Karzai's sins against women would have been exposed and prosecuted, and himself removed from consideration for Prime Asshole, if the bloodthirsty men and women of the U.S. government had observed his treatment of women.

Worse still is her "progressive" way of ignoring definitions, and reality itself: "Judging by what we have already done, it seems to be perfectly all right for the West – aka the U.S. – to rain bombs upon this agrarian country… and impose an ultraconservative Islamist government and free market capitalism…" When you can't even get your definitions straight (somebody show me the "free market" that exists in Afghanistan), can the rest of what you assert be any more credible? Will female Afghani leaders give greedy American businessmen, in bed with the U.S. government, the oil pipeline they so desperately want? Is Afghanistan suffering because only men are currently in power, or is it suffering because the "egalitarian" Soviet Union invaded in the 80s, and now the "egalitarian" United States has done the same? Is this writer expecting me to take seriously the idea that all that needs to happen for Afghanistan's situation to improve is for the U.S. government's puppet leader to appoint more women? Are you fucking kidding me? That will stop the drone strikes?

"Well, no. Actually, the worst thing for women is to have a bunch of men – and not even Afghan men at that – decide one more time what's best for women." I would agree that men should not be making decisions for women, but it goes much further than that: Men should not be making decisions for anyone but themselves. The same goes for women.

This is the main reason I am convinced that Ann Jones's "solution" is utterly absurd. I clicked on this article thinking it would be an inspirational bit about peace, from a trustworthy website. No, it's one more diatribe against men, about how we've fucked things up. Let me give Ms. Jones a tiny little lesson in how to fuck things up:

Whether you're a mother or a father, teach your children superiority vs. inferiority. Once you have made your children feel inferior, it is highly likely that they will always feel inferior to you. Then you can extract from them pretty much anything you want. How many men grow much bigger, heavier, tougher, and stronger than their mothers, yet would never say a word against them? Why do they do this? Why do women do this with their mothers as well?

Because mothers are the primary love source. Children die without love. At the very least, some subconscious part of the brain believes this, and children think and act accordingly: "If I am slapped or yelled at, it is because I am inferior and need the guidance of the superior, not because she doesn't love me. The second possible reason is totally unacceptable and I won't even think it." It's that simple. I suspect that Ms. Jones is another victim of this phenomenon.

So let's not think about it. Let's lay the blame elsewhere: free slaves who haven't learned to be civil, savage Indians who need to be spanked (on an erogenous zone) when they're young, Jews, the Religious Right, commies, Democrats, Republicans, potheads, men, the evil free market… Then, once blame has been appropriately affixed, vetted, voted on, and heralded sufficiently in the press, we can go to war. We will go to war with the inferior race/nationality/political ideology/religion/sex, and we will win. Pay no attention to the collapse of this building.

If men are brought up by an abusive primary love source, then sent to the negotiating table, leaving at home a wife who was also brought up by an abusive primary love source, what are the chances that peace will immediately fly out the window, until the ruling elite, whether male or female, are just plain sick of fighting (for now)?

Perhaps Ms. Jones's "modest" proposal (a reference to a far superior literary work that actually managed to be sardonic about what it proposed) would actually work if she checked her premise. Unfortunately, her premise seems to be that, based on her own observations, men have historically been in charge and we've had lots of war; one province of Afghanistan that has more female leadership is slightly less of a hell hole; therefore, it's time for women in this one Afghani province, who act more peaceful, and with whom Jones occasionally has lunch, to be brought to the peace negotiations, so that they can sit there and act peaceful. Then all of Afghanistan will be slightly less of a hell hole. Also, the U.S. will finally find those responsible for 9/11 (remember that?), withdraw their troops, and Afghanis everywhere will spontaneously begin acting like model Americans, whom they love. It's got nothing to do with that pipeline. It also doesn't matter that none of the Most Wanted Terrorists on the FBI's watch list is wanted in connection with 9/11. (When you get to the table of peace, love and full gender equality, don't bring that up.)

In Ms. Jones's world, women are superior to men in matters of peace. If this is the case, why don't we have more peace? Women have brains, ability, and an astounding amount of intra-sex verbal communication. Why haven't they stumbled on the solution yet? Why wasn't it the rallying cry of feminists of the mid-twentieth century to elect women to office so that we could finally abandon war? Why isn't that their rallying cry now? What have they been talking about all this time?

Apparently these women have been digressing quite a bit, before they get around to talking about the subject on which they are experts: "Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia [abandoned] all discretion recently and [declared] that the promise of equal protection in the 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution does not extend to protecting women against sex discrimination." What Scalia has to do with internal Afghani politics escapes me, but here is what he actually said:

"You do not need the Constitution to reflect the wishes of the current society. Certainly the Constitution does not require discrimination on the basis of sex. The only issue is whether it prohibits it. It doesn't. Nobody ever thought that that's what it meant. Nobody ever voted for that. If the current society wants to outlaw discrimination by sex, hey we have things called legislatures, and they enact things called laws. You don't need a constitution to keep things up-to-date. All you need is a legislature and a ballot box."

Regardless, Jones states: "That opinion puts Justice Scalia cozily in bed with former Chief Justice Shinwari,… who interpreted Article 22 of the Afghan Constitution, which calls for men and women to have equal rights and responsibilities before the law, to mean that men have rights and women have responsibilities to their husbands." No, it doesn't put Scalia "in bed" with this guy. The two views (if that's Mr. Shinwari's actual view) are entirely dissimilar. But when you hate men, it gets easier to make the illogical and unfounded comparison. Understand this about "progressives": They want a blanket, centralized, heavily-enforced law across this entire land mass, for all 300-plus million people living here, to be interpreted and enforced the exact same way each and every time it allegedly happens, probably numerous times each day. Good luck. Idiots. I can't wait for my new job at Hooters. I'm sure my straight, male customers will also be pleased.

CUSTOMER: "Where's Amy?"

ME: "She's not working tonight; they hired me to satisfy the government's quota."

CUSTOMER: "What the fuck?!"

ME: "Hey! Stop sexually harassing me!"

More of Jones's jones: "Even I don't expect men in power to take seriously the serious proposition that women must be equally and fully involved in peacemaking or you don't get durable peace. Too many men, both Afghan and American, are doing very nicely thank you with the present traditional arrangements of our cultures." No, they aren't. They're doing poorly, and how they're doing is getting poorer by the day. Why don't the peace-loving women in their lives set them right with a few kind words, since they possess this vast knowledge of how to live harmoniously?

I can speak for American women: They're too busy aborting their children, watching vapid, senseless entertainment, consuming, sending their un-aborted children to abusive daycare centers and government schools, smacking them, ordering them around, threatening them, ignoring the expression of their deepest emotions and then emotionally manipulating them, giving them toys as property and then confiscating them on a whim, teaching them mythology as fact and the nonexistent idea of superiority (Mom) vs. inferiority (child), and supporting the troops. This is peace.

Ann Jones is admirable for pursuing what interests her: the plight of women in a war-torn country. If that's all you care about – not the suffering men, only the women – that's fine. I will not tell people what they "ought" to spend their time researching. But what she does is roughly equivalent to someone like me going over to Afghanistan and researching how this war affects gay men and only gay men. Not gay women, not straight anybody, not kids, not wildlife. Just gay men. That would be okay, too, wouldn't it? But it's hardly sensible or intelligent for me, after talking to a handful of gay Afghani men, none of whom is involved in the political or martial matters of the country, to then state that all Afghanistan needs is to ensure that gay men are involved in peace negotiations. "Then everything will be absolutely fabulous!"

The article has a link to a study by the Human Rights Research and Advocacy Consortium called "Women and Political Leadership." It's only 54 pages, but I have this inability to finish that which I find repulsive, and it's awfully hard for a lazy, easily upset faggot to continue reading past one of the opening paragraphs that lists several other studies this organization is involved in:

"…The Need to Extend [Labor] Protection and Security to Afghanistan's Informal Workers," "Afghanistan's Female Home-Based Workers: Isolated and Undervalued," "Report Card: Progress on Compulsory Education" (there's that wonderful word "compulsory"), "Take the Guns Away…" "Fight Poverty…" Fight poverty with peace or violence? Will the peace that Afghani women bring to their countrymenwomen in order to fight poverty involve taxation? If an Afghani woman refuses to participate, what will happen to her when peaceful women sit in the Afghani parliament? Who will wield the peaceful guns of the sexually equal Afghani government: men or women? Will it be a 50/50 mix, or will it end up being what it always is: a horde of disposable men?

A wonderful writer over at "Strike The Root" who goes by tzo said it all with the title of this article: "Progressivism Is Not Progressive." This report from HRRAC is nothing more than the same tired, feminist tropes, and the only reason Ms. Jones's article got published at Antiwar.com is because Tom Englehardt co-wrote it. I don't know much about Englehardt's views, but he never struck me as "progressive" or feminist before. Perhaps he only suffered Jones's article because it is thinly anti-war. But it is also anti-male and anti-sense: To be anti-male is to be pro-war.

I am increasingly convinced that true peace, while certainly having nothing to do with sex quotas, will be achieved only when truth, freedom, and love are built up at the same time and at the same rate as peace. Nothing governmental can be a part of this process. Nothing shoved on the populace by feminism can be a part of this process. The only freedom movement that will work will have three characteristics:

1. It must be peaceful. Not the quota-ed, equality-of-the-sexes peace envisioned by this feminist activist, but actual, genuine peace.

2. It must be individual, with no mass movement to join. Mass movements, like government edicts with which one agrees, are too easy to follow, and too easily dissolved.

3. It must lack a charismatic leader. It most certainly must lack a "progressive" or feminist charismatic leader.

None of the above three principles specifies what sex the freedom fighter needs to be, nor do I care. The idea that manhood is to blame for Afghanistan's problems, when each and every problem suffered by the millions unfortunately still living there can be traced back to specific men and women, would be a laughable idea if it weren't so odious. It has been made that much more nauseating by virtue of being published at a website that purports to stand for freedom, and against war. I guess that's how much misandry currently bleeds.

B.R. The Intersection of Patriarchy Theory and Female Accountability

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 16 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

What offsets feminism from its host surroundings, is the essential simplicity of feminism itself.

Feminism merely spawns complexity in order to conceal its underlying mindset and camouflage its intentions, but the unifying equation which underlies the complexity may be tersely stated: Feminism = Female Supremacism.

However, this equation must not be nakedly stated, for it would be socially unpalatable and politically indiscreet to appear to advocate female supremacy. What's needed, is deniability. Accordingly, feminism as a sociopolitical organism must undertake a number of covert and distributed operations, in order to move forward circumspectly along the multiple pathways of its intentions.

Accordingly, feminism exploits every inherent tendency in the world that might accelerate the world toward a feminist—read female supremacist—state of existence. To put that another way, feminism harnesses those tendencies: horses roaming at liberty in a pasture will not pull your wagon—you must harness them.

In the end, the critical question is not "who exactly is or isn't a feminist?", or even "what exactly is or isn't feminism?", but rather "who or what, directly or indirectly, accelerates the worldly agenda of female supremacism?".

"Feminism" is best identified by the totality of its operations, and by its "fruits". Look for anything that either directly or indirectly strengthens women at the expense of men.

I don't mean to suggest that people or things correctly identifiable as feminists, or as feminism, don't exist. What I do mean is, that feminism as a cultural phenomenon is greater than the sum of its parts or of its conscious membership, and that the separation between feminism and the rest of the world is like a duotone rather than a boundary.

[image]

As I have stated elsewhere, feminism has fuzzy borders. In the vernacular of postmodernism, feminism is imbricated. There are many people or things which mightn't be purely feminist in themselves, yet they accelerate the feminist agenda all the same, because they transmit or validate feminist memes.

Feminism thrives and grows because it taps the immense reservoir of human venality, cupidity, fear, conformity and other psychic crud—especially the female half of this reservoir! Without access to this reservoir, feminism as a movement and as an ideology would crumble and blow away in the wind.

Now, the feminist sociopolitical organism couldn't keep existing solely on the back of such naive and passive support as I have suggested. In order to get going (and to keep going), it needed (and continues to need) an active cadre of self-identified indoctrinated believers—preferably in seats of influence. The organism cannot live without a brain—and a brain needs administrative capacity, otherwise, what's the point?

And so the indoctrinated operators (identifiable as feminists) find ample work, whatever their vocational standing.

And their work. . . is what? It is, to drip-feed the memes of female supremacism into the collective mind through channels large or small. Briefly, to plant suggestions. For although a suggestion is not the same as a command, there is at least a chance it will be taken up. Or, which is equally good, propagated by word-of-mouth!

And when suggestive indoctrinations trickle down the chain from voice to voice, they shade by degrees into enculturations, and therefore into unconsciousness. For culture, as we know, is propagated in naive oblivion. The original composition of a compost is discernible only in the outermost layers. . .

To recapitulate: feminism as a sociopolitical organism is set in motion, and kept in motion, only because indoctrinated operators work to make this happen. The world has gotten poisonous for men only because these pioneering activists and ideologues have set about to make it that way, blazing a trail which others have followed, and made into a broad highway by the trampling of more numerous feet.

Were it not for the existence of the pioneering operators, there would be no operation. Their collective presence in the world has the virtue of a magnet, which generates a field in excess of its own dimension. The field, in turn, activates anything of a ferrous nature within its range.

This field would neither spring into existence, nor continue to exist, were it not for the existence of the magnet. And while it is literally true that the field is not the magnet, it is beyond dispute that both field and magnet are jointly comprehended under the rubric of magnetology—together they compose a unitary phenomenon.

This metaphor of the magnet roughly illustrates the principle that there is "more to feminism than feminism." The point is this: that the indoctrinated operators are feeding certain elemental, organizing ideas into the world—propagating them in all directions. And these organizing ideas are all implicative or supportive of the occult dogma of feminism— to wit, female supremacism.

The idea of patriarchy is the skeletal framework that holds the entire slamboozle together because, one way or another, everything hangs upon this idea. Patriarchy "theory" runs all through feminism (albeit more commonly implied or assumed than openly stated), and without such a doctrine feminism wouldn't amount to much.

Female supremacism implies moral license for women, because it implies that women are quintessentially more "right" than men, and therefore entitled not only to the benefit of the doubt in most cases, but to extra perks and pamperings as well. But female supremacism by itself is merely an "attitude," and insofar, has need of an "analysis" to back it up. Patriarchy theory provides that analysis.

Patriarchy theory is the harness, the device which draws together all of that otherwise random energy, magnetizes it, points it in a politicized direction, makes it into a coherent cultural undertow, a galvanizing narrative unity. . .

Propagate this narrative among the masses, or even the camouflaged elements of this narrative, and women everywhere will take the idea on board, finding in it a convenient way to conflate their dysfunctional psychic tendencies with what appears to be a transcending rationale—something "bigger than themselves," a Great Excuse From Heaven that parts the clouds and descends to earth like a sparkling column of sunlight.

The narrative, once internalized, spawns a multitude of spinoffs, sub-narratives, sub-memes and hybrids, all of which make their way from mind to mind through a variety of channels, dispersing randomly, like a fog, through the mental environment. Soon, it becomes difficult to define the source, or to occupy any kind of external standpoint.

The "personal" becomes the "political," and so every encounter with a male person becomes (potentially) a politicized moment, framed in the rhetoric of power imbalance. This instills women with a vague, almost mystical sense that some manner of recompense is owed them*simply because they are female*—and traces of this feeling can percolate into the smallest transactions of life. (The recompense in question being, of course, a restitution of some abstractly-understood thing which "patriarchy" has originally stolen—or so theory would have it.)

Under such a scenario, individual lives, essences, motivations and reflexes are negated, and subsumed by an ideological requirement, and women are converted into moral robots in the service of a zero-sum game.

Yes, the innate (inborn) proclivity of feminism, is to bestow moral robot-hood on women. And the shimmering, razor-thin line which divides moral robot-hood from moral agency, is the line that divides the non-feminist sector from the entire feminist zone of influence. That bright line, precisely, is the boundary.

And the day that feminism commences to preaching that bright line, robustly and full-bloodedly, is the day that the femplex goes into remission. But feminist preachers instead smear this bright line all over the landscape and make it a fuzzy duotone, because the last thing they ever want to see, is the dawning of that day.

For feminism, you understand, has amazingly little to say about ethical behavior toward men. Hear the feminist silence roar! Their sparse words upon that subject are perfunctory and pro forma—rhetorical trinkets at best. In theory, feminism makes moral robots of all women, for it would have women believe that immoral behavior toward men is precluded from the realm of possibility. Were it otherwise women would, in theory, possess moral agency. And with moral agency would come responsibility—to wit, the primordial possibility of transgression.

But the sequestered intention of feminism (read female supremacism) is to endow women with power minus responsibility. For if women were to assume the burden of ethical behavior toward men, they would ipso-facto relinquish feminist power over men, by which I mean the power to deal with men arbitrarily—and female supremacism, in the form of perpetual revolution, could advance no further.

I, the present writer, am pro-choice, meaning that I believe in choice for women: ethical choice. I further believe, as a general thing, that choices have consequences, and that women should not be shielded from the consequentiality of their choices. For to experience the consequentiality of one's choices is an element of freedom not to be neglected and, which is more, indispensable to spiritual evolution. And I believe that women should undergo as much freedom as men would undergo, for I wish to see an efflorescence of their spiritual evolution.

Can't we all benefit from such blossomings?

Is TED now compensating for Hanna Rosin's misandry?

Paul Bonea · 17 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

How long has it been since child abuser Hanna Rosin trotted out her children as fodder for the ideological war she is furthering, and used them as a way to trash boys and make them look stupid and unviable?

Well, she got some well deserved criticism for this, and so did TED, who regularly presents Rosin's misandric efforts.

And then suddenly this comes up, full of what seems to be real concern for male children.

Watch and decide.

Got Voice?

Thanks to you A Voice for Men Radio is well on the way to becoming a reality. One of the ideas that has emerged in discussions behind the scenes is that of lending some humor to the show by creating advertising and PSA parodies that relate to issues in the MRM. There is a limitless supply of material, but so far only one voice behind the microphone.

So if you, male or female, are able and willing to lay down a good audio track (we can add music and effects) and would like to participate in creating the tone of the show, feel free to contact me at avoiceformen@yahoo.com.

Or if you have ideas for ad parodies, feel free to let me know about those- or just post them here for discussion.

Again, thanks to all for pitching in to make this happen. PE

Feminism Is A Doctrine of Violence

John Hembling (JtO) · 18 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

One of the foundational messages of organized feminism is that men are violent. In fact masculinity is a synonym for violence. If you're male, or have male relatives, you'll be aware that this doctrine doesn't correspond to reality, but checking theories against evidence has never hindered the adoption of ideologically driven law and policy making, in education, the courts, law enforcement and government.

There is no evidence that men, as a class, are inherently violent. Nor is there any evidence to support the idea that male sexuality is oriented towards rape, violence, or oppression of women, as organized feminism seems so intent on projecting.

They employ dishonest tricks to suggest that research backs up a claim and then fail to provide direct citation of that research. When you read articles from the camp of radical feminism, I encourage you to watch for that trick. (Studies show that x, y and z, with never a specific mention of what studies) That trick is one of the ways you can tell when people are lying. Murray Straus, an internationally recognized expert on violence and outspoken critic of feminist methodological flaws, referred to this as evidence by citation.

But today, rather than provide further refutation of the feminist lie that masculinity is inherently violent, I'd like to point out something a lot of people seem to miss.

Feminism itself is an ideology of violence.

If you're anything other than an MRA, that might sound outrageous; even hysterical. In demonstrating that I will not attempt prove that feminist ideology informs policy in the government, the courts, the family courts, direct law enforcement and in the educational system. If you're unaware of this, then you're too far behind to be usefully informed by this article, so I'd suggest an intro to men's rights for you. (see here and here).

Domestic violence incidents in which the police are called, mandatory arrest laws overwhelmingly result in the arrest of men, this is due to the widely propagated myth that domestic violence is a sexually differentiated form of violence. In reality, hundreds of peer reviewed studies show that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners. [1]

Individuals working within the women's shelter industry as well as organizations addressing domestic violence have as much access to published, peer reviewed research demonstrating this as I do with a laptop and an internet connection, but produced media on the topic of domestic violence depicts men exclusively as the offenders, and women and children as the victims.

It does not seem reasonable to surmise that everyone working in the DV industry is simply incompetent, and that leaves two possibilities. One, the individuals in the women's shelter industries producing "educational" media on the topic of DV are all, as individuals, maliciously dishonest. This is possible, but in my opinion, not likely.

The other possibility is that the prevalent ideology creates a cognitive blindness or bias towards men, and the assumption of innocence and victimhood of women.

This ideology also informs the behavior and decision making of subscribing men and women, and it renders acceptable violence against non subscribing men, as well as non subscribing women.

A very small fraction of this accepted violence is direct, such as women striking or slapping men, because both the women committing such violence, and the men in receipt of physical abuse are trapped in a cognitive illusion that women's smaller size and lesser strength somehow justifies acts of violence done by them against men.

But direct violence, acceptable within the framework of feminism forms the smallest fraction of the pervasive violence justified by this ideology. Most of the violence promoted by, and enacted under the aegis of feminism is done on behalf of women, by proxy, at once or more removed from the instigator of the violence.

I am not playing word games, or being clever, I am being as clear as my vocabulary allows me to be. Women in domestic disputes – and I don't mean violent disputes but simple arguments – can and do use the police as muscle to escalate a nonviolent disagreement to a violent altercation.

The violence in such a situation doesn't directly touch the female aggressor who calls in state sponsored muscle in the form of police, but it cannot be disputed that forcible removal by armed enforcers is not an act of profound violence against theman who is removed.

That is one example. Another is the creation and enforcement of protection orders against men, by women. To be sure, in some cases protection orders are necessary and appropriate. Unfortunately, in many cases they are wholly frivolous, but still granted by the courts, without an evidentiary inquiry, simply based on the assertion of a woman that she "feels" threatened. Men have the same rights to protective orders, in law, but not in practice.

Enforcement of protective orders is again the once removed violence of police acting on the behalf of offended females.

Some indirect violence done under feminism's aegis targets women, as well as men. Laws which de-legitimize and criminalize prostitution do nothing to reduce its prevalence – assuming for the moment that this would be a useful goal at all. But criminalizing prostitution means that women providing sexual services for money must do so as non legitimate practitioners, without the protection from abuse that workers in other jobs enjoy.

The criminalizing of any area of commerce leaves it ripe for exploitation by criminal elements who are free, in an illegal business, to employ brutal violence, as well as addictive drugs to control workers. The illegal nature of a business also makes it much more dangerous for the clients, who may be robbed, assaulted or otherwise injured by service providers. Escalated violence within a sphere of activity is a normal byproduct of rendering a human activity illegal. This is not unknown to proponents of organized feminism seeking to criminalize areas of human activity they ideologically (read: personally) despise.

According to Doctor Kate Shannon at the British Columbia centre for excellence in HIV/Aids research; "while there has been a growing body of qualitative evidence documenting the negative impacts of criminalization of prostitution on the health and safety of sex workers, our study demonstrates, empirically – a direct link between the criminalization of sex work and the increased odds of violence against female sex workers." [2]

Indeed, escalated violence in prohibited activities is used for victim-assistance fund seeking, and as post facto justification for continued and expanded prohibitions under feminism's so called "humanitarian mandate."

Increased harm and human damage is the real product and the real goal of feminism's abolitionist movements against porn and prostitution, because the harm makes a good story to secure funding and political power.

Bureau of Justice Statistics on violent crime show that for all types of violent crime men are overwhelmingly more likely to be the victims. [3] Despite this glaring fact, the United States enacted a set of laws providing extra protection for women, and shortcutting the track to conviction for men. Men, who you may note were already more likely to be subject to violence.

The reason for this apparent discontinuity between data and policy is that feminism is, as stated, a doctrine of violence. In the case of VAWA laws, it's the pre-existing violent crime of which men are victims, compounded with the state enacting escalated violence against men through the police, the courts and the prison system.

To make sure I'm clearly understood*, locking a human being in a cage is an act of violence.* Enforcers armed with batons, guns, aerosols, and manacles enact violence by proxy on behalf of women under VAWA laws. Before VAWA, assault, battery, murder and rape were no less illegal than they are now, but VAWA, and the police policies that resulted from its enactment, is an escalation of violence against the group already most subject to it.

Every woman in a relationship with a man holds a metaphorical gun to his head, whether she chooses it or not. And every man in a relationship with a woman lives under her license until she chooses to exercise her power to destroy him. Recently, in Canada a woman who was in a violent relationship with a man chose to stab him to death while he slept. The courts, informed by a feminist ideology of women's victimhood and innocence, acquitted her, even after her defense attorney admitted during the trial that she had options other than murder of the sleeping man.

The country's national newspaper, The Post, published a front page article exonerating the murderer based on her drunken state and her violent history. This outcome is only bizarre when considered outside the light that feminism is in fact, a doctrine of violence.

I realize that to anyone other than a men's rights advocate – what I've just said is going to be a bitter pill to swallow. In fact, I predict that a substantial fraction of the audience or readership of this article will reject what I've said here with a fit of outrage, indignation and will self righteously condemn me.

I'm accustomed to that, and I do not care.

Indeed, responses freighted with accusations of psychopathology, delusion, irrational hatred and other pathologies tell me and others that those leveling such ad hominem arguments lack the acumen or courage to actually address the substance of the argument. It doesn't actually matter if I'm a university professor or a slime mold, my argument stands or falls on its own.

I challenge you to address it.

Why Rape Culture is Essential to Feminism

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 18 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

If feminism is primarily concerned with equality, why is it that feminists are so adamant in their vilification of the masculine and the angelification of the feminine? Why are feminists so insistent that all men are potential rapists, wife beaters, and child molesters? Why is the existence of rape culture so important?

If feminism were actually what the dictionary purports it to be, most of us would consider ourselves feminists. But feminism is far more than a belief in the need to secure rights and opportunities for women equal to those of men, or a commitment to securing these rights, or even the movement committed to securing and defending rights and opportunities for women that are equal to those of men. This definition from the Encarta World English Dictionary is the surface view. It is what feminists want us to believe about feminism. It is feminism through rose colored glasses.

The truth about feminism can be found in the methods used to accomplish its rather noble ideal. It wasn't enough for feminists to demand equal rights to men by pointing out that women did not have equal rights or opportunities which should have been sufficient. Such discrimination would have been easy to prove and eliminate. Instead, early feminists created a myth of oppression. This myth was called patriarchy and it purported that women had historically been oppressed by men throughout history. Oppression is far worse than discrimination as it implies a form of control and can be equated to slavery.

By equating the discrimination faced by women with oppression, feminists accomplished two things. First they placed their movement on a par with racism in America. Blacks had been historically oppressed. They had actually been slaves and were actively being oppressed even after the end of slavery. Second, by stating that women had been oppressed, feminists painted men as evil oppressors and women as their victims. Since no one really wants to be seen as an evil oppressor, many men immediately joined their cause, lending it legitimacy.

But it would take more than mere statements to maintain that legitimacy. While the discrimination was apparent, the oppression was not. How were men as a class oppressing women as a class? That was a question that had to be answered. That women were financially dependent upon men was an obvious beginning. By keeping women financially dependent, men were oppressing women. This explanation also proved insufficient. The situation could simply be corrected by ending the discrimination that kept women out of the workforce and therefore was a by-product of discrimination, not actual oppression. To gain acceptance of the myth, feminists would have to do better.

Marriage became the next target. Feminists claimed that marriage bound women to their husbands like slavery bound slaves to their masters. This was a bit of a leap and even most women didn't believe it. For most, marriage was a social contract that bound man and a woman together in order to raise children. It was a cooperative endeavor that had, over time, resulted in the development of sex roles that suited each partner. Only women were able to become pregnant and nurse children so it was more natural for the woman to assume the role of raising those children while the man went off to work. The man's responsibility was to provide for and protect his wife and children. This view would make it difficult for the feminist to equate marriage with slavery despite the development of rigid sex roles.

But there was one other aspect of marriage, sex. It was a subject rarely talked about and that few knew little about prior to the sexual revolution, kick started by the birth control pill. Therefore it could easily be turned into the primary issue for women's liberation. Marriage bound a woman to a man for sex. It was sexual slavery according to the feminist and suddenly marriage was a horrible thing that could be painted as legalized rape and legalized rape was oppression worse than slavery. The onslaught began.

Rape became the vehicle through which all men controlled all women. All men were rapists or potential rapists, violent, controlling, and dominant. Thus marriage had to be destroyed and women had to have an easy way out. No fault divorce, alimony, child support, and guaranteed custody of their children became feminist issues, as did legalized abortion. Each of these things would help end women's dependence upon men therefore liberating them.

Almost simultaneously, domestic violence was becoming an issue in society. The first shelters for victims were being opened and the crime was being exposed for the horror that it is. Unfortunately, early research was beginning to show that women were just as abusive as men. Suzanne Steinmetz published a journal article and subsequent book called "The Battered Husband Syndrome" that detailed the problem of women abusing their husbands. For the feminist, this would not do.

Feminists hard worked hard to maintain a focus on the evils of patriarchy. If women could be painted as violent, the notion of patriarchal oppression would disintegrate. They immediately attacked Steinmetz and other researchers who agreed with her point of view. They also set about to turn the issue of domestic violence into a gendered issue in which only one gender committed the violence and only one gender could be its victim. Men committed domestic violence and women were their victims.

Of course this could be contradicted easily. All one had to do was open their eyes to find male victims and female perpetrators. Women killed their husbands and the dead bodies were the proof. This had to be explained. It was simple. Women killed their husbands in self-defense. The husband was the real abuser and the woman who killed him was the real victim. There could be no other explanation. Even in cases where there was no evidence of abuse, it had to be true. Even in cases where the husband was asleep or the woman awaited to ambush him, it had to be true. Battered woman's syndrome became the explanation.

This disorder proposes that abused women frequently see no way to end the abuse other than to eventually kill their abuser. But it was dependent upon a pattern of abuse that persisted over time. Many cases did not fit this pattern, so it became necessary to convince the public that women simply do not lie about being abused and that it was quite easy to hide said abuse. Abused women were afraid to tell others or seek help. They explained away their injuries as "accidents."

They were too terrified to leave their abuser or did not want to leave their children. Even the children (who would never lie about the abuse they suffered) would lie to protect the abuser. And so it went. A lack of evidence was not proof that abuse had not occurred, in fact it might actually be evidence that it had. That such cases did exist became proof that such cases could exist and that became proof that all cases where abuse was alleged the abuse had occurred. Therefore, it was plausible that women who killed (or committed violence against) their husbands did so in self defense even when there was no evidence to support that they had been abused.

This led to another problem. If women were killing their husbands in self defense even when there was no evidence of abuse, this would mean that women were not reporting abuse when it was occurring. Therefore it became necessary to convince the public that domestic violence is a crime that not only can be easily hidden, but is vastly underreported and that because of this underreporting and hiding of the violence, women must be believed when they make such allegations.

Rape culture became the vehicle for the delivery of the message. Using the theory of rape culture and patriarchal oppression as a base, feminists set about to paint a picture of all men as potentially violent abusers of women. But they didn't stop there. They began the campaign of painting all men as potential rapists and began to paint them as child abusers and molesters as well.

Many studies were launched focusing on men as perpetrators of violence and rape against women and children to highlight male violence. These same studies typically ignored female violence. Even studies that did study both male on female violence and female on male violence ignored the latter when reporting the results when it was discovered that women commit domestic violence at nearly the same rate as men. This disparity made it appear that female violence didn't exist and the male violence is far more prevalent. This gender bias in research design allowed feminists to paint women as victims and men as perpetrators and to lobby for legislation to address only that side of the issue.

The passing of legislation like the VAWA lent more credibility to the feminist argument that men are the problem and that violence is a gendered issue. In fact this legislation went so far as to disallow government funding for research projects designed to study female on male domestic violence or to provide services for male victims. It also funded training for law enforcement, prosecutors, and judges that promoted a gender based view of domestic violence and led to the passage of mandatory arrest laws and primary aggressor laws that define men as the perpetrators and require their arrest even in circumstances where they have not committed an act of violence.

The promotion of rape culture is the fuel for the fire. It is the trump card in the hand of the feminist war on men. By claiming that all men are potential rapists, feminists create an argument that cannot be refuted. By virtue of having a penis, it is possible for every man to commit rape; therefore all men are potentially rapists. Rape is a crime that by many definitions could only be committed buy male against female. This of course, completely ignores the fact that the vast majority of men are not rapists and would never consider committing such an act. Thus the argument is an illusion, nothing more than smoke and mirrors. Nonetheless, it is the cornerstone of the feminist movement and therefore must be maintained.

To keep up the illusion, the definition of rape must continually be expanded. The feminist strategy has always been to propose the preposterous in order to move public opinion when taking a position on an issue, while giving as little ground as possible. So it is no surprise that early rape feminists proposed that all sex is rape and that because of their position as the oppressed, no woman is capable of giving consent for sex to her oppressor. The statement was radical and extreme and those who proposed it must have known that very few would buy into it. But they proposed it anyways, knowing that once the seed was planted, it would grow.

Proposing a more radical view of rape would make it easier to propagate a less radical expansion of the definition. That is exactly what happened. Rape grew from an act of violence to include sexual activity that many women freely engage in, but regret later. Today's notion of rape is that many women are raped without knowing they've been raped and many men are rapists without knowing they are committing rape. This view was promoted by Mary Koss in the 1980's that resulted in her proclamation that one in four women would be the victim of a rape or attempted rape by their early twenties. Such a definition also makes it easier to justify the statement that rape is a grossly underreported crime. After all, how can one report a crime when they aren't aware they've been victimized? Rape culture is the result of a widespread acceptance of rape to the point where many women aren't aware they have been raped.

This same strategy of gross exaggeration and distortion of a problem in order to move public opinion toward acceptance of the feminist viewpoint has been used successfully time and again. Patriarchal theory was a gross distortion that is now widely accepted and unchallenged. That domestic violence is a gendered crime committed by men against women is a gross distortion that is now widely accepted and unchallenged. That all men are potential rapists, child molesters, and wife beaters is a gross distortion that is now widely accepted and unchallenged. Promotion of rape culture is essential to feminists because rape is the most heinous of these crimes. It is the very foundation for the belief in the lesser distortions regarding child abuse and domestic violence. After all, if one is guilty of rape by virtue of one's gender, then guilt by gender of any lesser crime is easier to believe.

Guilt by gender necessarily establishes the moral superiority of the non-offending gender over the offending gender; in this case it is the moral superiority of the feminine over the masculine. By definition this is not equality and through the use of this tactic by feminists, feminism cannot be said to be about equality no matter how much it purports to be so. Rape culture provides the foundation for and is the cornerstone of feminist theory and is the justification for proclaiming the moral superiority of women over men and the resultant vilification of the masculine.

A New Super Bowl Hoax that Eclipses the Last One in its Sheer Depravity

Paul Bonea · 18 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

You know, I like to watch an occasional football game. This year I think I watched two but I have long been of the mind that in the end a hundred million Chinamen couldn't give a damn. Consequently I have no personal stake in anyone winning or losing, or in the game itself. However, I just got one of my regular deliveries from the mail list of change.org – which I follow for examples of cultural misandry. In it I was sadly reminded that rabid sports fanatics, as irritating as I sometimes find them, are a minor diversion in life.

It is gender fanatics that I worry about, and they have just thrown a Hail Mary of misandry the likes of which I have not seen in quite some time. I could say a thousand things about this, but I could not put it any better than Bernard Chapin does in his latest Inferno. What I will say is that when people urge me to dialog more civilly with these people, this post is why I am so hesitant. As Bernard says quite accurately in the video, these are "terrible, vile human beings."

And they are. They are not misguided, uninformed, overly indoctrinated or brainwashed. Well, they may actually be one or more of these things, but they are also the worst kind of human trash possibly imaginable. They are worthy of nothing but contempt and extreme condescension, and if anyone is expecting me to show them the civility that I would your average pedophile, please don't hold your breath. Misandric gender ideologues are worse than pedophiles. Unlike pedophiles, they are not satisfied with one victim at a time. They want nothing less than to harm an entire society, its children be damned, and they are willing to tell any manner of lie; proffer any kind of distortion and exert any amount of corrupt pressure to satisfy their sinister goals. This message from Change.org is proof positive of that.

This vileness needs to stop, by any means necessary.

People can make of that whatever the hell they want. Right now I am past caring.

Traffick911's Statistical Misrepresentation and Misandry

Paul Elam [1] and Bernard Chapin [2] have exposed the evil campaign perpetrated by Change.org [3] and Traffick911 [4] to draw attention to the scourge of domestic sex trafficking. Through statistical hyperbole and by lumping men, in general, with a few pathological sex traffickers, those activists have sacrificed men and used the Super Bowl as the chopping block.

Traffick911 perpetrated male universal criminality by employing NFL player Jay Ratliff in their PSA [5] in which he stated "And I'm mad [about sex trafficking]. Men I'm talking to you." One wonders which men is he talking to? He shouldn't talk to me; I've never trafficked anyone. Talk to the men (and women) who sell children into sexual bondage.

Ratliff goes on to say, "Real men don't buy children. They don't buy sex." Some "real men" do buy children, unfortunately. After all, androids aren't doing it. But "real good men" don't do it. Ratliff conflates the two because it has more mass appeal. And he goes a step further by saying that "real [good] men" don't buy sex. That is debatable and depends on the definition of the word "buy".

On the supply end, Traffick911 produced another PSA in which a youthful looking "All-American" boy type intimated that he was the face of sexual trafficking. Not the ex-con with tattoos on his face. He, the everyman, was a sexual deviant. And his clients are "just like us": they are fathers, husbands, teachers, and lawyers.

Vanillaizing, Americanizing, domesticizing, demonizing. That is the tactic activists utilize by spouting these myths to drum up support for their cause du juor. Twenty years ago it was domestic violence [6]; today it is sexual trafficking.

Now that Messrs. Elam and Chapin have elucidated the macro mechanism that allows activist organizations to foist their lies onto a sympathetic and unsuspecting mass, and considering that these groups are vying for precious resources – time, attention, and money – it is necessary to inspect the quality of the statistics that Traffick911 is using to conjure up sympathy for their cause.

In their high-gloss pamphlets [7] set for release in the Dallas area, Traffick911 offers these facts:

100,000 to 300,000 U.S. children are forced into sexual slavery each year for the pleasure and profit of their perpetrators.

Initial estimates cited in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA) put the number of trafficking victims entering the United States at 50,000. Since then, the estimate has been reduced to between 14,500 and 17,500 [8].

Traffick911 doesn't provide a citation for its statistics although it seems to be traced back to an article published in 1996 [9] by the Christian Science Monitor (it seems likely that this article is the source of the number, which includes the United States and Canada, because they use another citation from this article in another one of their bullet points). But the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services cited an estimation that between 244,000 and 325,000 American youth were at risk for sexual exploitation. The researchers responsible for these figures, University of Pennsylvania professors Estes and Weiner, suggest that the numbers be used with caution [10]:

These estimates…reflect what we believe to [be] the number of children in the United States "at risk" of commercial sexual exploitation, i.e. children who because of their unique circumstances of runaways, thrownaways, victims of physical or sexual abuse, users of psychotropic drugs, members of sexual minority groups, illegally trafficked children, children who cross international borders in search of cheap drugs and sex, and other illicit fare, are at special risk of sexual exploitation. The numbers presented in these exhibits do not, therefore, reflect the actual number of cases of the CSEC in the United States, but, rather, what we estimate to be the number of children "at risk" of commercial sexual exploitation.

Despite the caveat, the researchers used a curious methodology to arrive at their "at risk" estimate. They provided a list of "feeder" characteristics or markers that suggest an increased risk for becoming a child sexual trafficking victim. These at risk youth were tallied up to arrive at the large number being cited. For example, 14,329 American youth, ages 13-17, living within driving distance of Mexico or Canada were added to the "at risk" pile.

If anything, the number of domestic youth sold or forced into sexual bondage is much lower than the numbers cited in Traffick911's literature.

Our society, with the normalization of commercial sex and the glamorization of pimping, is driving the horrific crime against our children. One pimp said, "we don't have to groom our girls anymore, society is doing it for us."

Ah, from the mouths of pimps.

If one reads the litany of feeder characteristics listed by researchers, victims are commonly poor and abused. "Society" isn't grooming girls for anything; they are falling into it because they have few viable options, or they are preyed upon by a small number of bad men.

As for "glamorization of pimping", take that up with the leftist propaganda arm previously known as Music Television [11].

1 out of 3 children who become homeless are sold into sexual slavery within 48 hours of hitting the street.

This is the most egregious lie of the entire campaign. The willingness to lie to this extent calls every single one of Traffick911's statistics and motivations into question. Here's what a discerning person should know:

The original citation of this statistic came in a 1996 article published in the Christian Science Monitor. The author stated [12]:

> Within 48 hours of hitting the streets, a juvenile will be approached with an offer of money, food, or shelter in exchange for sex.

This isn't cited either, but it is still much less benign than the picture painted by Traffick911. The group would have us imagine that gangs of men are roaming the streets black-bagging runaway youth and forcing them into sex. Instead of being forced, they are solicited for sex in order to "get by".

The tactic of these activist groups is to shorted the window of opportunity for us to act on this very urgent problem. By making sensationalist claims, giving us a 48 hour window to save these youth, the activists hope to force a critical mass of people to make irrational decisions with their money, time, and attention.

A war of attrition. War of attention. Same difference.

The Department of Justice designated the I-10 corridor as the number one route for human trafficking in the U.S.

Traffick911 brings this up because the interstate runs several hours south of Dallas, where the Super Bowl is being held this year.

But I-10 [13] is an interesting highway because it runs contiguously along the southern portion of the country. It begins in Jacksonville, Florida, touching the Atlantic Ocean; moves down to the mouth of the Mississippi River; stops in Houston, Texas – a major port; then touches El Paso – which is damn near Mexico; and it ends up in California.

I bring this up because Traffick911 is concerned with domestic sex trafficking. But being so close to major American entry points like El Paso, Houston, New Orleans, and Jacksonville indicates that trafficking victims are both non-domestic and not necessarily used for sex. Which brings up a whole other part of this debate that isn't being discussed: labor trafficking and the use of male victims.

Using the Super Bowl and Conclusion

Curiously, Change.org has made a national case by honing in on the Super Bowl and its fans, calling thousands of them "rapists" and demonizing men. This reeks of the tactics used by domestic violence activists back in the early 1990s who conjured up false claims about the prevalence of domestic violence on Super Bowl Sunday.

But why focus on the Super Bowl? There are large conventions held in American cities all year long. Las Vegas' modern existence is based on them. If sex trafficking is as big a problem as activists claim, why not focus on those venues? By leveraging a "masculine holiday", they are able to kill two birds with one stone. The draw attention to their cause and they diminish an event that is heralded and looked forward to by men across the world. Not only this, but they use an occasion where men are smashing their heads into one another to draw attention to their issue and then turn around and paint all men with one brush.

That loose cabal of feminists are employing macro and micro tactics to destroy masculinity.

An Open Letter to Congressman Ted Poe of Texas

Paul Bonea · 19 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Congressman Ted Poe

2nd District of Texas
Washington, D.C.

Dear Congressman Poe,

Over the past few days I have become aware of some very disturbing events taking place in the state of Texas. A radical left wing organization, change.org, has undertaken a campaign to promote egregious disinformation about child abuse happening here and is targeting the upcoming Super Bowl, characterizing it in no uncertain terms as a gathering of pedophiles that will be raping children over the Super Bowl weekend. As shocking and incredulous as that sounds, it is exactly what is happening.

The front organization for this effort, called Traffick 911, which ostensibly operates as an educational program geared to prevent forced childhood prostitution, has been disseminating information that is characterizing men generally, and male football fans in Texas specifically, as disproportionately populated with child sexual predators. They are doing this with outrageously inflated and fraudulent statistics which can be seen prominently displayed on their website at traffick911.com.

Now, with the direct and active assistance of change.org, they are attempting to coerce the Super Bowl Host Committee into supporting and endorsing their activities. I personally received an email from change.org containing a petition to be presented to, among others, the committee. That message opened with the words, "Every year, children as young as 11 are trafficked to Super Bowl cities. There, football fans – usually men, often inebriated – will pay traffickers to have sex with them."

Digging further into the information provided by Traffick 911, I found that they claim that "300,000 U.S. children are forced into sexual slavery."

What I have learned, Congressman Poe, from the report from The Texas Human Trafficking Prevention Task Force, paints a picture markedly different than that claimed by change.org and Traffick 911. The task force report indicates that since January 1, 2007, there have been 554 human trafficking investigations, which is roughly 11 investigations per month to date (48 months). Those investigations led to the arrest of 132 people (2.75 per month). In total, 29 suspects were convicted of a human trafficking-related crime.

This represents little more than one conviction every two months by the efforts of four federally funded task forces, as 5% of cases investigated resulted in a conviction. Of sex related crimes deemed to be an extension of human trafficking, "24 were charged with prostitution-related charges, 15 were charged with rape," says the report.

If those charged with sex related crimes were all convicted, it would add up to less than one conviction a month over the 48 months.

And this is justification for characterizing Texas football fans as a collection of pedophiles?

No, Congressman Poe, it is not. And it makes this patently disingenuous approach to the problem an obscenity against the truth—proffered by left wing ideologues that are attempting to extort support and funding, indirectly from the football fans in your state.

So I am sure you can imagine how dismayed, how utterly shocked I was to see that you, sir, a supposedly conservative representative of the citizens of Texas in Washington D.C. are scheduled to speak in support of Traffick 911 and change.org's disgusting agenda to play politics with abused children at a "Tailgate Rally" scheduled for February 5th of this year in Mansfield, Texas.

Anyone would agree, Mr. Congressman, that we all need to work together in the best interest of children everywhere. And of course those efforts should be bi-partisan. But this campaign of lies and slurs against innocent, hard working citizens who happen to attend a football game is so far beyond the pale that it defies decency. I urge you to please consider what your public support for this group and organizations like change.org implies about your allegiance to the honest voters who have entrusted you with your office.

At the same time I am sending you this letter I am also posting it to my website at avoiceformen.com, where we get tens of thousands of visitors per month. We have readers from all over the world, with many from Texas. And while we do not endorse or oppose particular candidates, most all of us share a concern for what has happened in our society from a tide of toxic left wing politics. This particular set of circumstances is about as toxic as it gets.

So again, I urge you to investigate what and who you are choosing to affiliate with in regards to Traffic 911 and change.org. There are much better ways for you to advocate for our children, and serve your country, than this.

Sincerely,

Paul Elam
Houston, Texas

It is Not a Light Matter, to Set Yourself Alight!

To the right is a photograph of Vasilica Iulian Grosu, a Romanian father who has chosen self-immolation as a way of protesting the custody arrangements involving his son. This picture was taken at Victoria Square in Bucharest on 12 July, 2005, in front of the Romanian government building.

Mr. Grosu is protesting the fact that although a Romanian court had awarded him the custody of his son, the son remained with the mother in Spain where a Spanish court had taken the boy away from him. And it seems that the Romanian government had taken NO steps to expedite the boy back to Romania. Nor could Mr. Grosu get any satisfaction from the International Court in The Hague. Mr. Grosu had exhausted all conventional measures when he finally hit upon this incendiary method. In the end, the police stepped in and doused the flames, but Mr. Grosu's body was burned over 55% of its surface. So he took an enormous risk of killing himself even though it isn't clear if he actually intended to do so. But whatever his intentions, Vasilica Iulian Grosu died of his burn trauma 8 days later on 20 July, 2005. Read more about it here, and here.

[image]In our next photo, we meet a very different man with a very different mission. This is the Vietnamese Buddhist monk Thich Quang Duc who, like Mr. Grosu, chose self-immolation as a form of protest. On 11 June, 1963, Quang Duc set himself ablaze while seated in the Buddhist posture of meditation. His aim was to protest the brutality of the Diem government which amongst other barbarities practiced genocidal repression against Buddhists and Buddhism – and concerning which, President Diem responded with the kind of pompous official stonewalling arrogance that we know too well. Quang Duc did not have the benefit of timely rescuers – no doubt he wanted it that way. So unlike Mr. Grosu, Quang Duc endured no 8-day lingering agonies in the hospital – the inferno did its work and toasted him to a crisp within a few short minutes! And according to witnesses, he sat through it with all the unflappable composure of a Sakyamunic sage. Afterwards, his friends reverently removed what was left of him.

What on earth could drive a man to set fire to himself? One thing is for certain: setting fire to yourself is no joke. I don't intend to try it, and I would not encourage you to try it either! To do such an horrific thing, you must be feeling very, very strongly about something, and you must feel that nothing else any longer avails you. It is clear to me that both Vasilica Iulian Grosu and Thich Quang Duc had no further care for this life at all, and chose to express this in a way which they thought might make a difference.

Such is the power of martydom. And this (pointing to myself) is not the stuff of which martyrs are made!

So I shall have done with these morbid fooleries that weigh so heavily upon mine heart! It is time now to "lighten up".

Perhaps I will go to amuse myself with a silly computer game about throwing rocks at boys. . . .

Lecture No. 4

"It is as if the ordinary language we use every day has a hidden set of signals, a kind of secret code" – William Stafford

To recap on last week's lecture: Men's Rights Advocates should not be afraid to play around with words; to reframe debate; to recast conventional linguistic usages however we see fit. Don't be afraid to make a game out of it. Use words – and the meanings you choose to ascribe to them – to mock, humiliate, and confuse your enemies. Here's a good example – it makes use of typical feminist phraseology, but with one major difference:

> Not all patriarchs are like that. I am a patriarch – and proud of it – but that doesn't mean that I, personally, am responsible for what other patriarchs do, particularly not those radical patriarchs. But patriarchy isn't a monolithic entity. There isn't only one kind of patriarchy. There are lots of different types of patriarchs who have different views.

Note that defining yourself as a patriarch need not imply that you define yourself as feminists think that patriarchs should be.

Feminists are not linguistic arbiters; you are absolutely free to call yourself a patriarch using your own definition of the term, which may or may not coincide to some extent with their definition. Whatever the case, though, you certainly don't need to explain which qualities you possess that, in your mind, make you patriarchal. However, upon announcing that you are a patriarch, you may find feminists attempting to trick you into giving some definite shape to your patriarchy; the shape having already taken form in her mind, her task now is to get you to acknowledge it. She will say something emotive like, "oh, so you think men should just be able to rape women with impunity?"

Your initial response, of course, will be a furrowed brow. Then you will say, "of course I don't think that. And yet I am still, most certainly, a patriarch."

In this example, you could define patriarchy any way you please; having decided in advance that feminism is non-credible, you have dismissed altogether any feministic notion of what patriarchy is. You could even, if you like, define yourself as a patriarch on the grounds that you support equality between men and women. Yes, that kind of wordplay will wind them up no end, because feminism depends upon a peculiar configuration of words and meanings, which may not be circumnavigated without signaling a threat to the ideology's power base.

Does the suggestion above sound preposterous? Well, I can but refer you to a real example of a social movement, the success of which has depended, for the most part, on its adroitness at linguistic manipulation. I am speaking, of course, of feminism, the proponents of which have made it their business to recast perceptions of reality through the redefinition of words. But this weapon is available to all those who are marginalized; it is the establishment which must defend its orthodoxy, not the outcasts! And while feminists once made great use of this strategy on the linguistic battlefield, it has become a point of vulnerability for them now that they control the machine, rather than rage against it. Now, you see, they must consolidate their gains; they must conserve what they have created; and thus, they are placed on the defensive, guarding their etymological orthodoxies from those who beg to differ. As I noted in the first lecture, their capacity for controlling perceptions of reality is faltering. The iron is hot. It is time to strike!

But, have I been too quick to dismiss the definition of feminism as offered up by feminists? I think I may have been. Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common.

So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because, as I uncovered last week with the help of one Nick Levinson, there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious. That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before:

feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

We must not be swayed by feminist attempts to deny the universalizing tendency inherent to feminism. In their attempts to win the debate over what feminism is, feminists are notorious for abridging their own ideology to a nub of its whole, and presenting their support for – and your dissent from – feminism as resting entirely on a single issue.

Let me give an example, in which you are confronted by the Appeal to Franchise. You have just stated that you do not support feminism. Your feminist opponent's next move is to reduce the entirety of feminism to women gaining the right to vote – thus implying that you must oppose this, since you claimed to oppose feminism. You must simply remind all onlookers that feminism is about more than this and cannot be reduced to a single item as she has tried to do. You can openly state your support for that single item – in this case, the vote – while nevertheless maintaining your antipathy towards feminism, this being in no way reducible to women's right to vote.

Essentially, your conscience is clear, and you are free to label yourself a non-feminist – and even, an anti-feminist – sans the implication that you therefore support every single thing that feminism opposes.

So, to recap: the only thing we are all going to be able to agree on is that feminism is the project for increasing the power of women. As you may have noticed, feminists go a little further than this when speaking about what they think feminism is, and they shall have plenty of half-truths and obfuscations to offer up if you ask them politely enough – though remember, it's not their job to educate us about these things.

As such, we may leave them to their own fluffy fantasies, and move beyond the universal definition to one which more accurately accounts for men's experiences of the world.

So, here is the definition I offer up: "feminism is the most recent, and presently the most culturally dominant form of Gynocentrism. It is a victim ideology which explicitly advocates female supremacy, at every facet of life in which men and women meet; it does so in accordance with its universalizing tendency, and so it does so in each sphere of life, including but extending beyond the political, social, cultural, personal, emotional, sexual, spiritual, economic, governmental and legal. By female supremacy, I refer to the notion that women should possess superiority of status, power and protection relative to men. It is the dominant cultural paradigm in the Western world and beyond. It is morally indefensible, although its adherents ensure that their hegemony goes unchallenged through the domination of societal institutions and the use of state violence."

In response to last week's lecture, Primal offered up his own definition of feminism, which is not quite the same as mine, but the two are certainly complementary:

> Gender-feminism is an overarching ideology built on a stack of bald-faced lies. As the primary reverse-sexist superstition of Post Modern age, it forms the foundation for female sexual supremacy in the name of 'gender' equality. Like other half-baked Utopian fantasies, it is totalitarian to the core. It is formed from a witch's brew of recycled but dis-credited ideological relics from the trash heap of history…relics like Marxism, Romanticism and Classism. It's proponents proudly destroy well-established standards of scholarship to force others to take the ideology seriously. It's adherents have spread like carcinogenic pathogens in authoritarian institutions…that is wherever power is perverted for political reasons. It's philosophy is nonsensical, circular, and self-serving. As the primary moral foundation for the mainstream hate groups which operate in the name of Women's Rights worldwide, gender-feminism is a dangerous dogma and one that has no place in civil discourse.

Both of our definitions are rather lengthy, although I think it is useful to have a statement of exactly what we mean by the term. It could be much shortened and presented as follows: feminism equals female supremacism.

That the shortened version is more memorable is offset by its unfortunate implications that i) only women are feminists, and

ii) all women support feminism. Neither i) nor ii) is correct. The charge of supremacism alone is not really sufficient for our purposes; it leaves too much left unsaid regarding what this supremacism is, and about the success rate of feminism so far. For shorthand purposes, it will do, but it should be remembered that it is a reduction of broader definitions as worked out here and elsewhere.

What may be more useful for our purposes in presenting our view of what feminism is is a brief statement of its goals. Feminism essentially seeks the following goals:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.

(2) The punishment of men.

(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.

I feel that such a definition will strike a nerve with feminists themselves – because it hits a little too close to home. That the real-world effects of the feminist project have indeed been (1) and (2), and that these have increased in scope and intensity over the years (3) is frankly, irrefutable.

Time has yielded the truth about what happens when feminist-minded women come to occupy the most powerful positions in society, and that is that Men's Rights are systematically trashed. The more power that feminists have, the more new laws are created to accomplish greater confiscation of men's property and intensifying violations of their liberty, bodily integrity, and lives.

But there is hope. For it is deeds, not words, that shall speak our enemies.

Have a pleasant weekend, everyone.

Starting out 2011 with a Bang

Paul Bonea · 23 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As a writer, I am supposed to avoid clichés like the plague (pun intended). However, today I couldn't even title this article without using one that is as old as the hills (2nd pun intended as well). But as with most clichés, it tends to fall short.

To put it more succinctly, we at AVfM did not start out the new year with a bang, but with a massive concussive explosion that is blowing the windows out three streets down from me.

Let's take a quick review of what has happened since we started referring to the year as 2011, just 23 days ago.

First, on January 8th came a mention of AVfM, not just in the mainstream media, but in the NY Times, complete with a link to this site. I know, I don't hold them in any higher regard than you do, but what they lack in prestige they more than compensate for in exposure.

Just a couple of days after that, our "little globe" near the top right of this page passed 200,000 visits. It has been recording the traffic here for all to see since July 3rd. We got the first 100k hits in four months and the second 100k in just a little over two. That spells growth, for sure.

Then, on this very auspicious morning, AVfM also hit another landmark, as you can see here. 10,000 comments. In the blogging world, 10,000 comments is an accomplishment in and of itself.

I say with no small measure of pride that that within those volumes of postings, we have the collective wisdom of men (and some women, as well) in the MRM that is unrivaled anywhere on the net. That means you have put this site on the path to becoming one the most prominent voices in men's rights in Western culture.

And make no mistake about it, A Voice for Men IS a men's rights website; no compromise, no apology.

To cap all this off (damn, those clichés!) we recently undertook a campaign to raise $4,500.00 US to kick off an internet radio program that will help this movement gather even more steam. To be quite honest I was prepared to be elated if we raised 75% of the funds in 30 days.

We exceeded the goal by a nearly a thousand bucks in 13 days (banner to be updated soon).

And the donations are still coming in.

So did we start the new year with luster? Oh yeah. Big time.

And now it is time for me to get really busy. It is time for your soon to be Chef de Cuisine (the under-chef of your MRM kitchen) to do mise en place for the upcoming banquet. I need to get four one-hour shows in the can and two in pre production before we launch, so I won't have time for writing outside the need for what you have just paid for.

Luckily I have some articles in reserve, from some very good writers, and they will be coming out starting tomorrow. But if you are a contributor here, or have wanted to be, this is a really good time to crank up the submissions, as well as the volume.

Content is king on the internet (and everywhere else in media) and we need to keep this thing going.

This article is also a very good place for readers to comment with suggestions on show content. What would you like to hear on A Voice for Men Radio? It is, after all, very much subject to your input. Just as this website has been from the beginning.

Again, another parting word of thanks to everyone, financial and moral supporters, who have driven us to smash though our goals and raise the bar forever on what can be expected from the MRM. And I have no intention of seeing this end with internet radio. It is a stepping stone, for me, and for us, to getting our message out to a world that does not want to hear it. Their choice to not listen has been too available, too long.

That is going to change, and right soon.

An IMPORTANT Announcement About AVfM Radio!!

Paul Bonea · 23 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The following message was posted to the AVfM Radio thread just recently by Stu, a regular reader of this site. I urge you to read his entire post and consider the amazing generosity he has offered to help us launch A Voice for Men Radio- PE

Good to see the donation meter moving up again. It is not fast enough though. I was reading the comments from that person "feministing bitch" and the comments after by other people. What ever this person is……feminist man hater…..MRA trying boost donations…..general shit stirer….male or female…..doesn't matter. The opinion represented is a true reflection of typical feminist opinion and feeling. Even if it's just a shit stir from a person with no interest either way….hate to say this….but it has some truth in it.

It doesn't matter where this person came from either…..if you go to feministing…..even though there doesn't appear to be any discussion about this impending radio station…..the sentiments are in line with so many posts on that site that it would relect most of their opinions even if it is not from one of their own. Therefore…..real or not…..it has had the effect of sending readers to feministing in search of "feministing bitch"…….only to find that they are all "feministing bitch"

The truth is that we are raising this paltry $4500 very slowly. Of all the men that are writing about the evils of feminism and misandry…..and who are victims of such…..you would think that out of those tens of millions……$4500 would be raised in a heart beat. I live in Australia, and I have donated $100. I know that Angry Harry…….who lives in the UK has made a substantial donation…….very possibly the biggest donation so far……but I don't know the exact amount.

I want to see this radio station get up and running asap. So I'm making an offer here that should……hopefully…….loosen a few purse strings.

Here in Australia……it is the 23rd Jan 2011…….time right now is 12:56pm.

I'm working on my time…..so you can do the conversions depending on where you live.

I will check the donation meter on 24th Jan 2011 at 1:00pm…….my time. That gives 24 hours for you guys to dig into your wallets and donate…….and……I will match all donations received in that time……dollar for dollar…….up to the $4500 dollar threshold.

That means if a total of $200 is donated and appears on the donation meter by then……I donate $200. The donation meter right now is showing $1057 left to go. That means potentially…….you guys could donate $528.50…..and I would have to match that……and it would be done….mission complete.

For those that might think…..this guy who's not even in US….must be loaded……..well…….I'm not…..I'm a blue collar wage slave……a forklift driver storeperson…..I'm not broke….but I'm hardly loaded.

Paul……hope you read this soon….and maybe you would like to copy this post to somewhere prominent where everybody will read it.

Good luck.

What Is Masculinity?

B.R. Merrick · 24 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Just recently, a rather contentious issue was examined at this website, concerning the design of another website for male studies. I was struck by the high level of "Hot debate" comments underneath the article, as well as the large number of comments themselves.

I do not wish to reexamine the issue of whether or not that other website's design can be considered masculine, gay-centered, feminine, or even whether Paul should have written the article in question. I think that Paul's decision to end the debate on a high note is sufficient. However, I do think that many of the points mentioned by numerous commenters are worth exploring in a different vein. One comment in particular, by the writer whose article sparked the whole debate, is definitely worth closer examination. Jack Donovan is under the impression that the word "masculinity" has lost its meaning.

I am not interested here in delving into Donovan's mind, or creating more hot debate. If such disagreement arises again, so be it. But I will take issue here with definitions, meanings, usage, and our society's tendency to destroy, whether intentionally or not, a wonderful word like "masculinity."

But first, some music.

Below are two audio selections from the orchestral repertoire. If you are a classical fan, you may recognize one or both of these works, so my little experiment may not work so well for you. If you are not a classical fan, don't worry: Both examples are two minutes or less. Simply listen and tell me which piece was written by a man, and which was written by a woman:

Musical Example 1

It seems fairly obvious, doesn't it? Musical Example 1 is soft, slow, with long, drawn-out notes played by the strings, a delicate harp playing descending modal scales, and the whole of the work sounds rather sad or forlorn. For a piece such as this to be expressed well, an attention to fine details and an intuitive grasp of emotional expression is required. Are these not the qualities we normally associate with the feminine?

Musical Example 2 is loud, harsh, exciting, violent, and tremendously difficult to play. It requires an orchestra at the top of their form, each player a virtuoso. It is commanding and demanding. It makes you sit up and take notice. (It is also, incidentally, my favorite piece of music of all time.) I would argue, and I'm sure most would agree, that these are qualities we normally associate with the masculine.

I'm sure you realize where my little experiment is headed. You may be thinking that I want you to think that Musical Example 1 was written by a woman, and Musical Example 2 was written by a man. The more perceptive reader would probably anticipate that I'm up to something, and that there is some sort of trick being played here.

The more perceptive reader is correct. I did play a trick. Neither piece was written by a woman. They were both written by a man. A single composer: Igor Stravinsky.

These two brief examples help to explain why I think Stravinsky was one of the three greatest composers of all time. Granted, that's an opinion, and can never be more than that. But it can also never be more than my opinion that the first example, from the ballet "Orpheus," and that the second example, from Stravinsky's earth-shattering, landmark masterpiece, "The Rite of Spring," are both an exploration of the masculine.

Just because I assert that the above is merely my opinion does not mean that "masculinity" is ultimately meaningless, or that it is always thus symbolized in music and art. I think that much of what is normally or traditionally associated with the masculine is merely perception, and nothing more. That's not such a bad thing.

The masculine, as it is represented in "Rite," is indeed violent. The final whirlwind during the finale is, again in my opinion, the single most violent passage of music ever written for orchestra. By the time the ballet is finished, The Chosen One has been chosen, and she will be sacrificed by the men (with the blessing, of course, of the surviving women of the tribe) to appease the gods of spring. Was Stravinsky a misandrist? I have never seen any evidence of that.

To the contrary, the way that the masculine is represented in the ballet "Orpheus" seems to indicate that Stravinsky understood something about masculinity that I like to think I understand. The title of Musical Example 1 is actually "Orpheus weeps for Eurydice," who was his wife, according to legend. Here we have a heterosexual man with the ability, through the normally feminine-associated arts, to charm nature, and to sensitively explore deep-rooted emotion. Was Stravinsky a poof? Hardly. (Although Tchaikovsky was. And if you choose to follow that wonderfully funny link, you will hear a segment of the most violent part of his final work. This is the same Tchaikovsky that wrote the intricately delicate and beautiful "Nutcracker.")

Does this mean that "masculinity" has no meaning, since these two pieces of music are so divergent? To the contrary. But would there be any problem with going back to original meaning? Perhaps, because it's also true that many of the words we use have evolved over time, making original intent impossible. Sometimes, political considerations are responsible. It is my view that the word "liberal" was hijacked some decades ago by a political ideology that is far from liberal. There is even an argument currently en vogue within the anarchist community as to whether or not we should try salvaging the word itself, or move on to calling ourselves "voluntaryists" or "abolitionists." There are good arguments to be had on both sides.

There is also the consideration that what normally falls under the heading of a particular term has changed to such a degree that the definition has to be reduced. In keeping with the musical examples I have proffered, I can safely say that this has happened with the term "music."

I am quite certain that the definition of "music" used to mean: "Sounds that are deliberately organized for the human voice and/or musical instruments, where such organization leads to a harmonious outcome." If you listen again to the example above from "The Rite of Spring," you may think that it doesn't qualify as music, if you were to go by this definition. It is true that the twentieth century brought about such an explosion in ideas, genres, styles, and attitudes, that the above definition simply won't work any longer. Therefore, I believe that the definition of music at this point is probably: "Sounds that are deliberately organized for the sake of their sonorous qualities alone."

Therefore, we basically have three options with the word "masculinity," as I see it:

1. Declare the word to be meaningless, and weep like Orpheus.
2. Fight for the original meaning.
3. Strip down the meaning to its bare essentials, and stand for that no matter what.

I see no point in Option Number One.

I see very little point in Option Number Two, because there are numerous things about "original meaning," depending on the individual or group of individuals who stand for that meaning, that would count people like me out of the realm of what is "masculine." In fact, I think that in modern-day America, perceptions of manhood are so far askew as to leave a great many heterosexual men out in the cold as well. I believe that feminism and misandry are only partly to blame. There are also various systems of coercion in place doing their part, many of which were in existence long before modern-day feminists sank their talons into those systems. There are also non-coercive elements to blame, such as the consumer culture; and there are developments that have been a positive boon to humanity, such as the Industrial Revolution, which has altered every single aspect of human existence beyond recognition from ancient times, yet has presented us with challenges that I don't think we have completely addressed. To go back to some ancient form of masculine existence or an outdated definition is simply out of the question; therefore, original meaning has very little use in a Post-Industrial, Post-Enlightenment, Information Age.

The option for me, even if I go it alone, is Number Three, to strip the word down to its bare essentials, and to grow it from there, with equal amounts of love, freedom, truth, and peace. Here, in my view, is the bare, essential, pure, fundamental meaning of "masculinity":

The existence of manhood; and the perception, recognition, and application of reality through it.

It is my considered opinion that both musical examples above fit nicely within this definition, as both were written by one who existed in manhood, and who perceived, recognized, and applied the principles of the universe in which he lived to create his music. His contribution is different from a football player's, from Jack Donovan's, from mine, and from every other man who ever walked upon this earth, or whoever will, but it is still masculine.

The key, as I see it, is to take that basic definition, own it like you own manhood, and walk in whatever direction your volition takes you, so long as you're not causing harm to anyone else. Always remember that your face, body, musculature, brain, and various internal organs, even if women possess many of the same, are unique to men in the way that they have been affected by your masculine genetic code, and the attendant hormones surging through your masculine body. We can travel the world and recognize men, distinct from women. We have always been able to do this. We always will.

As I said in my first comment on Paul's hotly debated article, I have no problem with effeminate men. The reasons why I have no problem with them are, first of all, because "effeminate," like beauty, is in the eye of the beholder; secondly because, as I hinted in that comment, I had numerous positive experiences with effeminate men in group therapy. Without getting into detail, let me tell you of a singular experience I had where the transformation began:

I had put up with these guys for several weeks when I first started in the group. As I saw it at that time, the "girliness" was out of control. It irked me to no end. I did not like these boys at all.

At some point, I finally got up the nerve to voice my concerns. I remember Randy (not his real name) finally sat still, looked me directly in the eye, took me seriously for once, and asked me numerous direct but inoffensive questions about my feelings. As I returned his gaze and spoke about what I was feeling, I could feel the resentment leaving, and a bond forming. I admitted it openly at the time, and the group seemed to be appreciative.

Over the next several months, or perhaps it was longer than a year, this group of men became my lifeline, my outlet, my anchor, and my friends. They were the genuine article. (Turns out that they all loved Madeline Kahn as much as I did.) I wasn't the only masculine entity walking around on that campus that initially dismissed them as less-than-manly. I'm sure I am not the last to have been proven wrong. The masculine qualities these guys expressed were different than most. But there was no mistaking that each of them had a penis and testicles, and that the unavoidable, external acknowledgement of the possession of those members, along with the internal surging of testosterone, had its influence on their behavior and their manly bodies. None of these guys wore a dress. None of these guys wanted a sex change. None of them was under the impression that he wasn't really a man. Unhappy, yes. (Just look at the religion each of them felt compelled to swear allegiance to.) But masculinity was not in question for them.

To embrace a stripped-down, fundamental definition of "masculinity" is not destructive of anything worth saving. It is merely to ask the question, "Have we been wrong all along?" In some ways, I think we have. We separate boys from men during the most crucial years of their development, right up until they're ready to leave the fiery confusion of puberty. Once these "boys" are 18, they know next to nothing about paying bills, holding down a job, starting a business, getting a mortgage, screwing or drinking responsibly, what to watch out for as their bodies start aging, starting a family, taking care of babies, how to be on guard against dangerous women, or what on earth "misandry" means. We can give them automatic weapons when they're 18, however, and cross our fingers that they don't get their legs blown off. Well done, America.

Masculinity, whether we choose to define it or not, will continue. It's natural law. What is required at this point in time is not to abandon the word, any more than I think we ought to abandon the word "honor." What will benefit us the most is understanding, whenever we encounter it, those aspects of manhood that have been left behind, ignored, derided, or simply misunderstood.

I would also propose to all women out there that the definition of "femininity" be reduced similarly, for the benefit of people like me, who care about words and their definitions, and who are on occasion utterly fascinated with the feminine. However, if the word "feminism" simply meant a pre-concern with the problems of women, then I would consider myself a masculinist, ever since I started reading about men's issues in the mid-90s. Unfortunately, that's not what feminism is. It cannot be reduced to a feel-good definition like what I have proposed. Its track record is far too deadly. With all the damage it has already done, it would be a shame if a few well- or ill-intentioned individuals have the final say on a wonderful, mysterious, and highly beneficial word like "masculinity." As long as I feel that I embody some aspect of the term, I ain't gonna let that happen.

Another Historic First for 2011: RulaZ Introduces MRA Rock CD

Paul Bonea · 24 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As long as the debate is officially over on whether the MRM is coming of age, it seems to be a good a time as any to finally announce that as of the first of this year, brother RulaZ has officially launched his debut CD at ITunes.

We have played his stuff here before, and it has been a crowd pleaser over at YouTube as well. This is one talented man, playing every instrument you hear in these all original songs. The flavor is pure rock, decidedly his own, but you will also hear the influences of everyone from Carlos Santana to AC/DC.

We have our own music genre, guys, and it is being delivered like a middle finger pointed directly at feminine hegemony by a man who has lived everything we have all lived that brought us to the MRM. You can hear it in the passionate, defiant lyrics, and in the cutting, ballsy rock riffs that rip through each of no less than 20 tracks.

RulaZ is one of us.

He has also agreed to donate 10% of all proceeds to this website. But don't buy it for that. Buy it because it is some bad ass Rock-N-Roll that speaks with authority to the issues that have you out there championing the truth, each and every day of your life.

RulaZ CD is available here. And here is a taste.

Dr. Phil Can Suck It

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 25 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

[note: this article is reprinted with permission from Dr. Palmatier exactly as it appears on her blog. The title, however, was subject to editorial license – ⍰ – PE]

Oh, Dr Phil. . . From time to time, Shrink4Men community members email to let me know that they've sent links of my articles to the Dr Phil and Oprah shows because they believe the material here is important and should be seen by a wider audience. I thank them, but tell them not to be surprised if the topic of female perpetrated domestic violence and parental alienation continues to be ignored by these two talk show titans. Oprah is unlikely to ever go there, for obvious reasons, and Dr Phil. . . well, who knows what reasoning lurks behind that moustache.

Dr Phil describes the January 10, 2011 episode, Afraid of My Husband, as a case of he said-she said. The wife, Sonja, says her husband, Lawrence, is abusive while he says he's just reacting to her abuse. Fair enough, most high-conflict domestic cases are one partner's word against the other's, which is why I encourage men and women in these situations to document, document, document. In the digital age, it needn't be a case of he said-she said.

The show begins with a request for help from Lawrence's sister, Krishina:

> Dear Dr Phil,
>
> I'm reaching out to you to appeal for your guidance, assistance and intervention. My brother and sister-in-law are in a marriage that is in unimaginable shambles.
>
> Both of them are so angry about so many things.
> They are immensely disrespectful to one another and allow their children to consistently hear their horrific exchange of words. I am beyond hope sometimes in thinking that this monstrous situation can ever be changed.

Please note, Krishina is describing bi-directional abuse; she describes bad behavior from bothparties. She denies knowing about any physical violence in the relationship. Dr Phil then plays some audio of the couple. Here's the first thing the audience hears:

> Sonja: I'm afraid of my husband. Lawrence isn't the man I married. We fight all the time. Sonja: I'm afraid of my husband. Lawrence isn't the man I married. We fight all the time.
> Lawrence: Sonja can argue 24/7.
>
> Sonja: My husband will always start the fight.
> Lawrence: She's very combative and she instigates a lot of fights. She'll push my buttons.
>
> Sonja: Lawrence calls me every name in the book. Idiot. Bitch, Fat ass. He's yelled F— you to me in front of the kids. I've been called a c—. A f—ing c—.
> Lawrence: Sonja's called me a loser. A f—ing a–hole.
>
> Sonja: Lawrence is violent. Lawrence has punched holes in our armoire, doors. He has broken skateboards.
> Lawrence: Sonja's broken two laptops, a big TV. She gets very violent. She's hit me multiple times.
>
> Sonja: When I'm violent towards Lawrence, I'm trying to protect myself and the children. I explode and I'm violent towards him.
>
> Lawrence: I'm not violent. I'm just responding to what Sonja's actually doing.
> Sonja: When I was pregnant, he twisted my arm and forced me to the ground and I just sat there and I'm like, 'Do you realize what you just did? You just threw me down and I have a child in my stomach,' and no response. Nothing.

> Lawrence: A total fabrication. I didn't throw her down when she was pregnant. She gets in my face and pokes me. She'll knock your head off. She'll spit in my face. I've had to run away and lock myself in a closet just so I can get away from her.
> Sonja: Once when we were at a hotel…
> Lawrence: She grabbed a laptop and threw the laptop against the wall…

The two of them have different descriptions of the altercation that ensued. Sonja insists that Lawrence kicked her in the stomach and pushed her to the bed. Lawrence states that Sonja got in his face because she wanted his attention while he was on the computer. He tried to leave the room after she broke his laptop, but she blocked his egress and he pushed her to the bed in order to get away from her. The police report states that Sonja had red marks on her chest and that her shirt appeared "pulled and stretched" and that Lawrence had red marks on his chest as well and a cut upper lip.

Dr Phil questions Lawrence and he admits pushing Sonja was wrong and that kicking her would've been wrong, but maintains that he did not kick her. Dr Phil does not ask Sonja if it was wrong to throw the laptop against the wall. He does not call her on her behavior throughout the entire episode.

Dr Phil asks the couple to stand up and points out their size difference because, of course, someone who's smaller in stature couldn't possibly abuse someone who's bigger despite ampleresearch that proves otherwise. Gotta love that reasoning—never mind the fact that Lawrence had a cut lip and that Sonja admits she instigated the altercation by destroying his property and blocking the doorway when he tried to exit.

Sonja accuses Lawrence of being a control freak and of "pestering [her] for sex." She states sex with her husband feels like "a job" and that she thinks he "isn't appreciative enough" when she*does* agree to have sex with him. She even claims that he raped her one night as she slept. Dr Phil does not challenge her on this. I'm a sound sleeper, but I'm pretty sure I'd wake up during the act unless I was passed out cold on sleeping meds. In other words, I don't believe her rape claim. Lawrence denies this calmly and matter of fact-ly as opposed to Sonja who becomes indignant on more than one occasion. An example of DARVO, perhaps?

Sonja admits to her abusive behaviors; Dr Phil says nothing.

If you don't want to watch the entire episode, click and drag the YouTube embed below to 17:01 on the counter. Sonja openly admits that she has spit in her husband's face, kicked a hole through their big screen TV (she smirks and suppresses a laugh when Dr Phil mentions this particular incident), has broken Lawrence's laptop computer not once, but twice and that she gets in his face to make him listen, so much so that Lawrence has shut himself in a closet with his feet bracing the door to get away from her.

Sonja admits to hitting, kicking and punching her husband in the chest, arms and stomach. She claims she is violent towards Lawrence because he is violent towards their children and still Dr Phil says nothing. Yeah, because you teach children that violence is wrong by engaging in more violence. It wobbles the mind.

Question: If you were living in fear of your partner, would you strike him, spit in his face, get in his face, chase him into closets and break his property or would you be tiptoeing around him so as not to set him off? Something doesn't add up here. When I'm afraid of someone, I try not to provoke or deliberately antagonize the person, but that's just me. How about you?

The couples' son holds both of his parents accountable; Dr Phil says nothing.

Lawrence describes how Sonja undermines his parenting. When he tries to set limits with the kids, she tells the kids they don't have to listen to their father. Essentially, Lawrence is frustrated by his wife continuously undermining his parenting and he expresses his frustration by being hard on and physically rough with the kids. For example, he tells his son to leave the kitchen because he's not doing his homework after being asked several times to do so. Lawrence becomes frustrated and physically propels his son out of his chair by his shoulder.

Lawrence says he feels bad about this and owns that his behavior is wrong. Sonja is never asked if it's wrong for her to undermine her husband when he tries to set reasonable limits and consequences for the kids. Given Sonja's behavior toward Lawrence, I'd be willing to bet she behaves in a similar fashion towards the kids when they don't listen to her, that is, if they dare to disobey her. Dr Phil never asks these questions, however.

Go to 22:29 to hear the couple's son describe what goes on at home. Notice the boy attributes abusive behaviors to both parents equally, states he wishes his parents wouldn't put him in the middle and that his mom talks to him a lot about why she and his father fight. This is most likely an indication that Sonja is parentifying her son and possibly attempting parental alienation—at least their son's words raise these potential red flags for me. Dr Phil doesn't explore this, however.

Dr Phil tells the couple the potential consequences of exposing their children to their ongoing conflict and violence.

At 24:50, Dr Phil lists the possible consequences of exposing kids to abuse and violence. He makes some good points until he says the following: "These kids will be aggressive in their relationships. The girls will be aggressed against and he is likely to become an aggressor." Whoa, whoa, whoa, whoa, whoa, Dr Phil, just you stop right there.

It's a coin toss as to which child will become the aggressor and which ones will become the aggressed. The boy has seen his mother attack his father and his father defend himself against his mother. The girls have seen their mother physically assault their father. Why is the boy destined to become the aggressor and why are the girls destined to become the victims? Utter poppycock.

Granted, I think it's a given that these kids are going to be screwed up for years to come because both of their parents are dysfunctional and engaging in a mutually abusive relationship, but Dr Phil's prediction is biased. I think there's a very strong likelihood the daughters will grow up to be aggressors who play the role of professional victim. Way to perpetuate a false stereotype that's paints all men as potential abusers, Dr Phil.

Dr Phil tells the husband his behavior is abuse and, in the same breath, describes the wife's violent behavior and provocations as a "relationship issue."

Dr Phil, in no uncertain terms (26:03), calls Lawrence out for his abusive behavior, which I believe is largely a dysfunctional coping mechanism he employs when confronted with his wife's own highly aggressive, confrontational, abusive and violent behavior. Then, in what I can only describe as one of my biggest "WTF, Dr Phil?!" moments ever, he minimizes and justifies Sonja's reprehensible behavior as a relationship issue:

> Now I didn't put labels on this before. I just wanted to get the facts out [the couple gave contradicting stories, but remember, Sonja admitted being physically violent on numerous occasions, so much so that Lawrence has hidden from her*]. Let me put some labels on this now. [To Lawrence]: What you're doing is abuse. It is domestic violence. It is physical abuse. Mentally, emotionally and physically, it is abuse. Just what you have admitted to is abuse. There is no question about it.
> And you say, 'Well, what about all of what she does?' That's a relationship issue. When we're talkin' here, we have abuse issues and then we have relationship issues. You say, 'Well, why can she do it and it's okay, but I can't and it's abuse? She does it—no problem. I do it and I'm an abuser. It doesn't seem right.' There is an imbalance of power here. You are bigger. You are stronger. [To Sonja]: What you're doing, you should not be doing. That's a relationship issue.

Wrong, Dr Phil. Sonja's behavior is domestic violence, too. It is equally abusive and just as wrong. It doesn't matter that she's physically smaller than Lawrence.

Dr Phil then tries to put words in Lawrence's sister's mouth, Krishina, by saying, "Isn't it true you're afraid of your brother?" (27:33). She corrects him and Dr Phil is condescending toward her, which seems fitting, if not ironic, since the topics are power imbalances and abuse. Check out the look on Sonja's face when Krishina describes both partners as “bullish.” Priceless. Dr Phil continues to beat the “power imbalance” drum by citing their difference in physique again. Um, that’s not a power imbalance, Dr Phil; it’s a body size difference. It’s not the same thing.

There is a struggle for power in Sonja’s and Lawrence’s relationship, but it’s not what Dr Phil thinks.

Sonja seems to want absolute control of her husband and the relationship. She uses verbal and physical violence and the kids to try to exert her power over her husband. Lawrence doesn’t want to be controlled and seems to fight back in unhealthy ways and, yet, Lawrence is portrayed as the abusive villain in this situation.

I think it’s healthy for a person to push back against behavior like Sonja’s. If she got in my face the way she does to Lawrence, I’d tell her to back off and knock it off. So, if I, as a woman, said, “Back off!” and shoved Sonja in retaliation to her shoving me, would it be abuse because we’re both women or would it be a “relationship issue” because we’re both women? Would I be the abuser if I’m a couple of inches taller than Sonja? What if she’s taller and heavier than me? How would Dr Phil define that?

Dr Phil tries to explain the difference between abuse issues and “relationship issues”(28:37):

> Lawrence needs some help and Sonja needs some help. We are at two different levels here. Because of the imbalance of power, what a man does in a relationship to impose his will can be an abuse of power and control. What a woman does in a relationship is a relationship issue. It is not an abuse issue here.
> [To Sonja]: You may be too controlling. You may be one of those people who likes to get in somebody’s face and get it to a point that may not be the best problem-solving skills that you could use. And I want to give you some different coping skills. [To Lawrence]: But she does not have the ability to isolate you and exercise power and control over you. And you do have that ability with her. Do you get the distinction? [Lawrence tries to respond, but Dr Phil talks over him.] We have to hold ourselves to a different standard, Lawrence. Do you agree or disagree, Lawrence?

In the above statement, Dr Phil unequivocally states there is a different set of rules for men and women when it comes to abuse. Dr Phil appears to believe that it’s not abuse when a woman tries to impose her will through physical force and verbal abuse, but it is when a man does the same exact thing. It wouldn’t be surprising if the average home viewer interpreted Dr Phil’s postion to mean that it’s acceptable for women to be violent and emotionally abusive toward men, that men cannot be the targets of abuse because they’re men and, therefore, physically stronger and that women cannot be guilty of abuse even when they admit to physically assaulting a man. The most Dr Phil seems willing to acknowledge is that Sonja’s behavior is inappropriate, which is a gross understatement and just plain wrong.

Lawrence tries to answer Dr Phil’s rhetorical question (29:35):

> I do agree to a certain extent, but I think what happens is I tend to back down. Maybe I’m not going about it the right way, being the father figure in the house, but in reality, I find myself running away from Sonja 99% of the time. Running to the car, sleeping in the car, you know, just trying to get away from the arguments.

Sonja interjects:

> The car is actually his tool to isolate me. He takes the car numerous times and leaves me with nothing.

No, Sonja. The car is where Lawrence goes to escape from you. If he were using the car to isolate you, he would lock you in it and throw away the key.

Dr Phil and Sonja then reveal that Lawrence has a gambling problem (scratch tickets and online poker). Lawrence admits that he has a problem, says he uses gambling as an escape from Sonja and as a cry for help that he wants her to hear. This is duly ignored by both Dr Phil and Sonja, lest we forget who the one and only victim is here.

Sue Else, President of the National Network to End Domestic Violence, chimes in.

In the next segment (32:21), Dr Phil brings on Sue Else, president of the National Network to End Domestic Violence. She rattles off a list of Lawrence's alleged abusive behaviors (remember, Lawrence flatly denies Sonja's rape allegation and many of her other claims), observes that his violent behavior is escalating and becoming more severe and that it makes Sue fearful.

Ms Else then trots out the old chestnut, "Love does not equal fear." Ms Else ignores the fact that Lawrence stated, more than once, that he is afraid of his wife and has hidden from her, which Sonja herself confirmed as true. Ms Else does not address this inconvenient fact nor does she address Sonja's own other admitted extremely violent and abusive behavior. Else's fear is exclusively for Sonja and herself.

Dr Phil jumps in (33:22) to remind us that, while Sonja's behavior is "inappropriate," it's still just a relationship issue; not abuse:

> [To Lawrence]: What's happening with you is different because of the imbalance of power and I'm trying to convince you of that, but I'm getting nowhere. I can see that I'm getting nowhere. This situation needs a hero and you're the best candidate here. I'm just trying to tell you, just man-to-man, that what you're doing is not right.
> Lawrence: I do need need a lot of help. That's why I'm here.
> Dr Phil: Are you acknowledging anything I'm saying? I mean you blame this on her. You even say your daughter is smart and knows how to push your button, but it can't ber fault. It can't be your son's fault. It can't be your wife's fault. The only person you control is you. And you have power that you have to manage in a relationship. And if you abuse the power, you abuse the relationship and everybody in it. That's what I'm trying to tell you, you have to be better.
> [Lawrence asks Dr Phil what he needs to do.] You have to be willing to say, 'I will never put my hands on my wife or children in anger again ever no matter what. That's where you start, right there. You just don't ever. Just say, 'I will not accept that from myself, character-wise. I am a better man than that. I will not do that.' [To Sonja]: Do you get that? And you should not settle for that for yourself or for your children. [Lawrence should not accept or tolerate that from Sonja either, but Dr Phil is selectively mute on this counterpoint.]

Dr Phil perpetuates a dangerous double-standard.

Dr Phil states that abuse in a relationship is an absolute deal-breaker (35:44). I agree. However, Sonja's behavior is also abuse. It is not a relationship issue—whatever that is, although, from what I can tell, it appears to be double-speak for "abuse" when the woman is the perpetrator. He tells Lawrence he needs to be the "hero" by deciding if "[he] wants to be happy or if [he] wants to be right" and that [he] needs to "rise above it." Essentially, Dr Phil is advocating that Lawrence tolerate and not react to Sonja's abuse. He advises Lawrence to not only accept her abuse, but to accept it unquestioningly and unflinchingly.

Now, imagine Dr Phil giving the same prescription to Sonja. It's unthinkable and it's unconscionable that he basically tells Lawrence it's his job, his responsibility, to rise above Sonja's abuse and take it. Wrong, wrong, wrong. It's Lawrence's job to set healthy boundaries with Sonja for both himself and his children. If she continues to abuse him and drag the children into it, he needs to rise above it by removing himself and his children from an unhealthy situation instead of sinking into a mutual race to the bottom.

Please note: Lawrence asks for help and guidance several times throughout the episode. He admits his behavior is wrong. Sonja never really admits her behavior is wrong. She says she wants help. What she really wants is help "fixing" Lawrence because, naturally, her "relationship" issues are Lawrence's fault. She doesn't need to change anything about her behavior.

Dr Phil enables Sonja's scapegoating of Lawrence by telling her that she just needs some better "problem-solving skills" and "coping mechanisms." It's okay for her to blame Lawrence for her bad behavior, but not the other way around. Furthermore, while Lawrence states that Sonja provokes him and that he allows her to push his buttons, he acknowledges that it's wrong when he responds physically. Sonja just makes excuses for her behavior and takes no responsibility for her own actions and Dr Phil enables her. The twisting of reality and propaganda that Dr Phil perpetrates in this 42-minute episode is staggering.

What Dr Phil should have said.

Abuse is wrong. Initiating abuse is wrong and responding to abuse with more abuse is wrong. You both have issues.

Sonja, you're no innocent victim. I don't care if Lawrence isn't giving you his undivided attention or obeying all of your commands. You have no right to lay your hands on him in violence nor do you have the right to destroy his property.

Quit putting your kids in the middle. Quit undermining Lawrence's mutual authority as a parent and take responsibility for your own abusive behavior. Just because Lawrence married you does not mean you own him or have the right to control him. That is an unreasonable expectation.

Lawrence, you may need to accept the fact that your wife has control issues and she may not be able to change. She won't even admit she has a problem, which is the first step in the change process. You have a right to be an autonomous being. You have a right to equal input on how your children are raised. You have a right to respect, love and affection. You may need to realize that your wife just wants a submissive lackey even as she grows to resent you for being a submissive lackey.

You also have a right to defend yourself, but let's face it, as a man, if you defend yourself from physical attacks by a woman, even to just push her away so you can escape, you might get arrested. Therefore, continuing to live with a violent woman increases your risk of being incarcerated, whether you retaliate with force or not.

Don't take your frustation with your wife out on your kids. One of the parents needs to be a grown-up and act responsibly and, given Sonja's apparent inability to do so, you're going to have to be the grown-up. You may need to get a good divorce attorney who understands high-conflict cases and sign those divorce papers your wife uses to control you by playing on your fear of abandonment or some unfounded sense of obligation or commitment.

Jan Brown, founder of the Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men and Women, posted an article about this Dr Phil episode on the DAHM Blog that includes responses from Dr Phil's fans on his own forum, many of which express their disappointment in the way he dealt with this couple.

Lawrence, if you're reading this, your wife's behavior is also abuse and you deserve help and support; not one-sided condemnation. You ARE better than that and you do need to hold yourself to a higher standard because, clearly, no one is going to hold your wife to a higher standard and your kids need at least one healthy, functioning parent.

And All Women are Potential Child Abusers, Too

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

All men are potential rapists. This is an old and well worn chestnut. You don't often hear men say it. No, it's women who tend to trot this one out. A principal reason for this is that it is a technically true statement which can be used to shame and silence men, and against which it is hard to argue. Another use for this statement is to inculcate in women a fear and mistrust of men; to separate men and women and prevent them from cooperating as each other's natural compliments.

"All men are potential rapists" is such a troubling statement for most men who have no desire or urge to commit rape. And its troubling because it is, on it's surface, true. True, but incomplete. Men do have the capability to rape. Yes, we do. But to just say that without some additional context is misleading. In fact, it's deceptive.

There are more ways to lie than the simple utterance of incorrect statements of fact. So to make the claim "all men are potential rapists" into a complete, and thus, not a deceptive statement, I'd like to do a little filling in. All men are also potential murderers, all men are potential robbers, all men are potential child molesters, all men are potential chicken fuckers.

There's undoubtedly other things which I could add to that list. It's still a true statement, but it's now more complete. Unfortunately, it is still deceptive. No, to make the statement that all men are potential rapists complete and no longer deceptive, we need to add something else.

All women are also potential rapists.

Did the room just go silent?

Women are also all potential murderers[1], child rapists[2], and robbers. Nobody likes to talk about rape when its committed by a women, though. Some apologists for feminist theory will condescend to explain that women cannot commit rape because they lack the requisite protuberant sexual appendage. This is a nonsense argument, rape is a crime of violence and imposed control, and can, and often does employ foreign objects such as bottles, brush handles and so on. I won't belabour the fact that women can and do commit assault, robbery, child abuse and other crimes, in some cases at rates of offence exceeding those of men. [3]

All humans are potential rapists[4], but if you're a radical feminist that won't give you the warm glow of satisfaction to be had by only accusing males. The "all humans" argument is true, considerably more so than the misleading mention of only men, but even stating all humans are potential rapists is misleading. We know from FBI uniform crime reports [5] that only a very small fraction of humans in civil society participate in violent crimes. This is the great lie of omission used with so little resistance against men in our society.

The statistic that some number of women are subject to a particular violent crime – given by the media, in the absence of context or comparative victimization rates for men is another way to lie to the public. The number most often given for rape against women is 1 in 4. The source for this number is never provided, of course, because it's a lie fabricated by sloppy advocacy research. [6]

The study which turned up the 1 in 4 number was funded by MS magazine, and conducted by the same Mary Koss who declared the crime of rape to be simply an escalated expression of normal male behavior.

Koss questioned 3000 college women in 1982 – and determined they had been raped if they answered yes to one of the following three questions:

- Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man gave you alcohol or drugs?
- Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?

- Have you had sexual acts (anal or oral intercourse or penetration by objects other than the penis) when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?

15 percent of the women surveyed answered yes to at least one of those questions. This translates to 1 in 6. Koss added an additional 12 percent to this number for individuals who reported an "attempted rape" as defined by affirmative answer to one of the three questions, the total of 27 percent then translated to a nice, inflammatory claim of 1 in 4.

Interestingly, Koss herself reported that only 27 percent of her "victims" identified their own experience as "rape" even under the influence of her highly questionable methodology. Even accepting Koss's questionable identification of what constitutes a "rape" a simple calculation indicates the rate of offence to be 1 in 14, not 1 in 4.

How telling is it that some radical feminists are now throwing around the number 1 in 3? That's an claimed increase of 32% over the previous 1 in 4 number which was false to begin with. Are we expected to not notice these mobile "facts"?

All these numbers are meaningless of course, because they are never given in any context. [7] The UK home office produced advertising reporting that 2 women die each week from injuries sustained in domestic violence incidents. That's 104 women killed each year, and it is shocking and inflammatory. It's an emotionally charged number. But it's meaningless, because what they do not say is how many men die from the same cause. Neither do they give any context by providing the sample size that this 2 per week actually means in terms of deaths within a population.

Being reasonable people, we might assume that no men die violent deaths at the hands of their spouses. According to Erin Pizzey, founder of the women's shelter movement in the UK, in reality, for every 2 women who die, so does 1 man [8]. Bearing in mind men's normal size and strength when compared to women – this fits neatly with stats showing coequal rates of offence between women and men in issues of domestic violence [9].

It is unacceptable to publicly declare all members of an ethnic demographic as criminal, or evil. In fact doing so is defined in some countries as a hate crime. All Germans are not nazis, all Jews are not greedy, all Muslims are not terrorists.

Where it applies in law, hate speech is any speech, writing, or display calculated to incite violence or prejudicial action against members of a group based on identity such as sexual orientation, religious affiliation, sexual identity or ethnicity.

It seems that this applies unless the group targeted happens to be the 48% of the population of this planet who are male. The term to describe this sexism has become unfortunately misunderstood to mean only a negative attitude towards women, and in western societies, that negative attitude generally doesn't lead to state-sponsored murder – almost all victims of the death penalty in the United States being male.

Nor is sexism understood to lead to our society's endemic male suicide rate, 4 times higher for men than women in Canada[10], and the United States[11] . Sexism also isn't understood as a factor in the overwhelming majority of work related deaths belonging to only one sex, 93% of which are male[12]. So calling the hateful lie "that all men are potential rapists" simply sexist lacks the impact it should have. It is a phenomena so ugly, antihuman, and inexcusable that it deserves to be called that ugliest of words; racism – the hatred of one group, by another.

Make a Comment for Free – AVfM Radio Scores Five Bucks – Oh! – Zed Makes it Ten!

Paul Bonea · 26 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The expression "no brainer" comes to mind. In another ingenious move to set up AVfM Radio good and proper, KARMA MRA MGTOW, has come up with a donation scheme that takes the burden off of everyone's wallet. Well, except for his.

Here's how it works:

The Sydney Morning Herald has posted an online article that has to do with whether men should be expected to commit to a relationship after three months. They have a comment section with a 300 word limit. The offer is on the table right now from KMM that he will donate $5.00 for every comment placed on that article via someone at this site. It's not only a generous offer that ices the cake on his already stellar financial support, but it is a great idea for another couple of reasons.

[Emergency addendum: In the early running, zed has matched the offer to make it $10.00 per comment!]

One, it gives those who cannot afford a direct financial contribution the opportunity to help out, simply by going to the site and speaking up. And it is killing two birds with one well aimed stone. It will leave a mark in this very active thread that is being read by a lot of people who never heard of the MRM.

Like I said, no brainer, win-win, everybody's happy; perfect solution.

I have a couple of suggestions to help with this one. One, the comments are moderated, but they are letting us through. So I would keep it civil. The other is to give these comments some thought. It's only fair to see KMM get his monies worth. However, I doubt that expecting thoughtful comments is a problem with this crowd.

I don't know how long he wants to extend the offer, or if he has other conditions, but I am sure he will comment soon with more details if needed.

So here is the URL. Now anyone here that wants to help, or add to their donation at no expense, can do so with a few keystrokes.

http://www.smh.com.au/lifestyle/lifematters/blogs/ask-sam/

This could be a very important moment for us. Understandably, the paypal donations have slowed down. How could they not after that rush of generosity?

But here's the rub. We are now at almost $6,200 dollars, with a handful of donations still expected in the mail. I have no way of knowing how much those will total to. But if I can get even close to the $7,000.00 mark, then I can do a lot more to promote the new program, primary among them being that I can upgrade show services at BogTalk.com to their Pro Package (another $1,490.00).

We currently have the next level down, the plus package, but if youlook at the difference in services through the link provided, you can see that we will end up with significantly more exposure. And perhaps just as important, we will be able to live stream the show to any website on the internet.

My take is that we will get there with securing the Pro Package sooner or later, and we are starting on schedule regardless, but that pro package is looking pretty sweet. And KMM's generous offer here can really help toward that end.

So, if you are so inclined, please go share with the good people of Australia what you think about expecting men to commit on a 90 day schedule.

You will help us kick off in better fashion than we could have ever expected, and you might just have some fun.

Conservative Misandry

hestia · 27 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The evils of misandry and feminism are oftentimes believed to come packaged in one particular way, the leftist branch feminism that immediately pops into mind when the topic is mentioned. While this may indeed be the most visible type of anti-male streak running through our culture today, this is not the only form, nor the type of misandry that is most harmful. There is a strain of feminism, one I've dubbed "conservative feminism" that is typically comes packaged in sparkles, ribbons, and bows. At first glance, this form may seem innocent, but upon pondering certain ideas and stereotypes floating around out there, one will quickly realize that something sinister is flying around the conservative religious world that proclaims their hatred for feminism.

Any belief system or idea that attempts to elevate women above men or proclaim femininity better than masculinity is feminism. In both leftist and conservative feminism this is done, often using the same wrongful ideas about men, just spinning them a bit differently for their intended audiences.

As you will see below, in conservative feminism, we find hatred of men in many ways:

*__Men As Wallets-__ In every part of society, men are now treated as walking breathing wallets. It is their job to hand over money to state through child support (usually without DNA proof of paternity) and alimony when marriages go wrong. Men are still expected to cover the bill for dating and they typically bear the burden of breadwinner even in two income households.

In the conservative world, the burden of work takes an even more troubling turn as woman are taught they have a right to stay home with their children and if their husband cannot afford to provide the standard of living that makes this necessary, then he is out of God's will, a sinner, or backslidden. When the talk turns to Titus 2 or other other verses used to support this women's right, there is not an admonishment to wives to be frugal, to be industrious and start a home business, a garden for cooking and canning, or so forth, just a strict requirement for men without a rule of cooperation on the part of women. Staying at home is simply her right, with no responsibility to aid the burden of breadwinning.

Men are not allowed to express their anxiety, anguish, or upset about this rule and expectation, but are made to suffer in silence, carrying their burden alone. In fact, men's fear is so poorly tolerated that should a man express genuine concern over not being able to have more children, for fear of feeding them in tumultuous economic times, his worry will be brushed aside and said to be the sin of "not trusting the Lord". The poor man is simply to worry himself to a heart attack, work more hours and miss out on the lives of his children, or risk having his worst fear–that of being a financial failure–come true.

*__Men As Expendable-__ Our culture sees men as disposable. We have yet to establish an Office of Men's Health (though one is possibly in the works), do not provide the same amount of funding for diseases that primarily effect men as we do for women, and we collectively expect men to perform the most unpleasant and dangerous of jobs, from coal mining and logging to law enforcement and serving in the military, without so much as an ounce of appreciation for putting their lives on the line for the enjoyment/protection of us all.

Conservative feminism takes this a step farther by expecting men to take on the responsibilities of modern day chivalry. Some ministries have publicly expressed contempt for men at Virginia Tech who did not take bullets for their women classmates when the tragic shooting occurred on the campus. Others preach that it must be husbands who do the dirty and gross jobs around the house, that is must be husbands who check for the bumps in the night, and that should there be an emergency of some sort, it better be the husband who is operating the fire extinguisher or hammering the boards before the hurricane arrives. There is no talk of women humbling themselves and learning to help alongside their husbands, if this is what their husbands would like, or being prepared to be their own heroes should a situation warrant this. On the contrary, in many instances, anything labeled as "mans work" will be considered a feminist activity and thus inappropriate for a wife to do, even if she must (as in the case of the wife of a deployed soldier like myself) or if her husband encourages her to help him with such tasks. There is not even admonishments to be appreciative of men for taking on chivalrous duties, but rather an expectation of such special treatment is taught.

Fathers As Optional- We all know in what low regard fathers are held in today, and sadly this reality does not end at the church door. The contempt had for fathers may not be as open as it is in mainstream society, however, it's well and alive despite being a bit more hidden. We often hear talk about how much small children need their mother at home, how they cannot grow and thrive without them. We'll see motherhood elevated to the highest levels, being considered the most important and difficult job in the world. While this isn't a bad thing, the lack of high praise for fatherhood, or even mere mention of a father's importance, is striking. Yes children of all ages need their mothers, but they need their fathers just as much, from the bittiest baby to the teenager entering adulthood.

When conservatives bemoan women being in the military, the typical reason named is because the children miss and need their mothers. The reality of fathers deploying and leaving behind children is absent, not thought of at all. This is the same when the Titus 2 mandate is discussed. The importance of having mothers spending quantity time with their children is raised to the level of the highest importance, yet the reality of fathers perhaps working two jobs or more than 40 hours work week, and thus hardly seeing their children at all, does not warrant a mention. If fatherhood was being held in the high position it needs to be, this stunning disregard for daddies wouldn't be uttered without objections and dissent.

Men As Perverts- "All heterosexual sex is rape" the leftist feminists proclaim, and while the conservative feminists may take the gross crime of rape off the table, a respect for healthy male sexuality they do not bring. In the conservative world, there are numerous harmful stereotypes floating about when it comes to sex. For starters, all men are not seen to be potential rapists but potential adulterers. There exist books and advice is shared that encourages wives to use sex as a means of manipulation. Women are being advised they need to be intimate with their husbands not because they love them and desire to be close to them, not for the bonding experience, not to celebrate this special gift God has given to married couples but rather to prevent their husbands from straying. What could be a beautiful expression is lowered to the level of deceit and manipulation just like that.

Perhaps not quite as sinister but still problematic is the contempt had for the male sex drive. A man's sexual desire is at best merely tolerated and at worst, looked at as a perverted dysfunction for he is not "normal" like a woman. Cruel jokes are often made by woman, both in mixed company and not, about a man's sex drive, remarks about how husbands always want it, laughter about denying one's husband, and many other words to pathologize healthy male virility.

Men As Immoral Uncivilized Brutes- The Victorian "angel in the house" is still alive and well in today's world and nowhere does this appear to be more true than in the churches today. Never pausing for a brief moment to consider that the cherished idea of chivalry and men as soldiers allows women to live in a civilized world with special perks, the declaration of women as the more civilized & moral sex is shouted from many a pulpit today. (And nevermind that it is women who have initiated 70% of divorces and killed millions upon millions of precious babies, neither of which are moral or civilized by any definition…) Typical male traits, such as courageousness, justice, fairness, and take charge initiation are denigrated so that female nurturing, passivity, openminded love, and modesty can instead be elevated as the correct way to be morality. The reality of an important balance existing between these two types of morality, making both worthy of celebration is never mentioned and becomes all the more downplayed as churches feminize further, pushing men from their pews.

Men At Fault- Men are blamed for much in today's day and age, both in and out of the church, but the most disturbing fault I have ever heard placed on men is that of their wife's willful rebellion and self chosen sins. There are people preaching the heresy that if only men led their wives better, these women would never sin, commit adultery, or do anything of this sort. If men were taking charge correctly, their wives would submit to them and never do wrong. In some denominations and churches, this is taken a step further, not merely placing the burden of a wife's sin on a husband here on earth, but for all eternity as well. Lessons are being taught that state a man will be held accountable to God for the decisions his wife made, including those that went against his wishes and directions. Actions of which the husband had no part. This is outrageous and heretical.

*__Men As Unfeeling Robots-__ This final idea about men should be perfectly obvious with all the terrible ideas that are allowed to circle around about men and masculinity, for if we cared about men's feelings, these lies would not be allowed to spread. In our culture, we have a very narrow view on male emotional expression and are quick to judge a boy or man who does not fit into this stereotype. "Man up" and "boys don't cry" starts on the tot lot playground.

We expect men to be able to hear the most cruel of words and not take them to heart. Men are expected to put themselves on the line for others with no appreciation and no way to seek emotional support to ease the many burdens placed upon their shoulders. All men are expected to handle trying times without help or support and some men–especially law enforcement, firemen, soldiers, and others we'd see as "tough guys"– are expected to hold in all the terrible sights they have seen, man up and keeping going on. Men from all walks of life are told to toughen up all the way to a suicide, heart attack, or breakdown. And even then, we'll collectively feel for his family more than we will for him. "Oh his poor wife and children, I wonder how they are handling this tragedy."

We also expect men to express their anger at real slights in a feminine way, so we women feel most comfortable. Women seek to tell me how to feel. They seek to own the experiences of men. They attempt to tell men how masculinity should be lived and what they experienced. Men are not allowed to own their emotions, life experiences, or masculinity, for this makes women uncomfortable. Our culture attempts to silence them, to appease those who are scared of men being men on their own terms.

*__Woman As Children-__For my final note on conservative feminism, women as children is the topic I must bring up. Just as is the case with leftist feminism, the conservative strain does not seek to help us mature into capable adult women who can be true helpmeets to our husband and mothers to our children. Instead, it seeks to keep us as children forever.

Male headship is often twisted to mean that women do not need to take responsibility for anything in their family for this falls in the husband's duties. A husband must provide the paycheck, the discipline for children, and all the hardwork around the house while the wife stays home with the children and doesn't truly work at home. Wives are not encouraged to ask their husbands what they need to best help them, to form a healthy type of cooperation in which a marriage and children can thrive, to help bear the load with the men with whom they are supposed to share and build a life with. The talk is most often exclusively on privilege rather responsibility, leaving husbands with a lopsided bargain which adds far more the his plates of responsibility than to his wife's.

NCFM Joins Appeal to Congressman Ted Poe

RE: Human Trafficking

The National Coalition For Men is the oldest men‟s rights organization in America. NCFM also has members in several countries. One of our oldest chapters is in Dallas/Ft. Worth. The president of our Dallas/Ft. Worth Chapter was once a president of a National Organization of Women chapter in Texas.

I am writing because Chang.org is wrongly connecting Super Bowl Sunday to an increase in trafficking, raping, and otherwise abusing children. One of its articles implores the public to "Ask the Super Bowl Host Committee to Stand Up and Protect Children," and asserts "The trafficking of children for sale at the Super Bowl is well documented." The link provided to substantiate the "well documented" claim leads to one Hawaii News Now article spotlighting one pimp who took a total of three prostitutes last year to work the Super Bowl in Miami, two of whom were adults and the other a 16-year-old runaway. In that same article, an FBI agent asserts "Listen if any case exists out there in Hawaii it's one too many and fortunately it's not an epidemic problem here [emphasis mine] . . ." Hardly evidence of "well documented."

The change.org article ends with "DFW-based Traffick911 is leading a comprehensive game plan to protect American children. Local, national and international organizations have joined forces with Traffick911 in the I'm Not Buying It campaign. This Super Bowl Host Committee has proven it has the power and influence to make history. Join me in asking the Super Bowl Host Committee to endorse and fund the "I'm Not buying it" campaign to protect and defend children during the Super Bowl!! [sic]."

Traffick 911 is committed stopping human trafficking for which they should be commended. But I don‟t recall them targeting the Women‟s National Basketball Association, Women‟s Professional Soccer, or the Ladies Professional Golf Association. The organization transparently targeted Super Bowl Sunday and the NFL for exposure and money, "Join me in asking the Super Bowl Host Committee to endorse and fund the "I‟m Not buying it" campaign…"

NCFM members have reported receiving email from change.org containing a petition with this opening message, "Every year, children as young as 11 are trafficked to Super Bowl cities. There, football fans –usually men, often inebriated – will pay traffickers to have sex with them." Interestingly they fail to mention that many, if not most, child proffering pimps are women. Unmentioned is the article on their website "Madams and Pimpettes: A Look at Women Who Sell Women" in which they assert most traffickers are men and ask "But what is it that makes a woman sell another woman (or a girl), for profit? They don‟t seem concerned if a female trafficker sells a man (or a boy) for profit and by omission suggest it doesn‟t matter.

Missed or ignored was the report on the largest trafficking investigation ever conducted in the UK that found, "… 10 of the 55 police forces never found anyone to arrest. And 122 of the 528 arrests announced by police never happened; they were wrongly recorded either through honest bureaucratic error or apparent deceit by forces trying to chalk up arrests which they had not made. Among the 406 real arrests, more than half of those arrested (230) were women [emphasis mine], and most were never implicated in trafficking at all." Clearly the report casts doubt on police veracity of statistics as well.

Belarus is a transit route for immigrants, thousands of whom become prey for traffickers. The sex trade is the largest segment of the international slavery trade. Belarus has compiled the following a list of sex trade traffickers that are wanted by the Belarus government for various organized trans-international sex crimes. They are all women.

According to United Nations Office on Crimes in Nigeria 60% of prosecuted persons are women in trafficking cases and 50% of convicted traffickers are women though that varied by country. Overall, for the countries examined, this report concluded sex recruiters were 53% men and 42% women.

The Time Magazine article "Iraq's Unspeakable Crime: Mothers Pimping Their Daughters" reports,

"That underworld is a place where nefarious female pimps hold sway and where impoverished mothers sell their teenage daughters into a sex market that believes females who reach the age of 20 are too old to fetch a good price. The youngest victims, some ages 11 and 12, are sold for as much as $30,000, while others can go for as little as $2,000. „The buying and selling of girls in Iraq, it's like the trade in cattle,‟ Hinda says. "I've seen mothers haggle with agents over the price of their daughters."

These organizations cause is certainly just but wagging a wicked finger at men in general and Texan men in particular is outrageous. Confusing data to exaggerate their cause is typical feminist-based protocol as is downplaying the criminality and vicious nature of some women. Taking advantage of both to extort the Super Bowl if not the NFL and Texans is business as usual.

There is no question human trafficking is horrendous in every sense of the word. Like other social ills,solutions are impeded by the shame, blame, and guilt gender game. The extent of human trafficking and gender of traffickers is not definitively known. Organizations such as these play on the mercies of good people with questionable information. Human trafficking is serious business and traffickers are despicable criminals regardless of gender.

When you speak on these organizations‟ behalf at the "Tailgate Rally" in Mansfield please keep the above in mind. We hope you will help raise awareness about human trafficking without the gender politics. The lives of many people are at stake including lost, abandoned, and abducted children.

On Marriage

John Hembling (JtO) · 28 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It probably will not surprise anyone to learn that I'm not a fan of marriage. I believe I've said in the past that ill never be married. This statement has been cynically interpreted by some to mean no woman will ever have me, and unflattering to me as that may be, if it's true, I'll still be content with the outcome.

In 1970, MS Magazine publisher Robin Morgan wrote about herself and her feminist colleagues, saying: "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage." I don't know that marriage has been destroyed since then, but it's certainly been transformed.

Formerly a social and legal institution affording benefits and protections to men and women, It is increasing regarded by men as a bad risk. Certainly, cooperative and mutually fulfilling marriages still exist, but within marriage and in a marriage's dissolution, an increasing preponderance of legal and social power belongs to women. That power is subtracted from men in a zero sum game.

This is not movement towards equality of legal rights between men and women, but a movement to an increasing imbalance of rights. Men can see this, as can some women willing to view the world without the ideological lens of radical feminism.

I will not bother to point out divorce statistics, or mention other than in passing that women are the principal beneficiaries of court ordered divorce settlements, as well as the major initiators of divorce. Those arguments have all been made before. I will suggest to individuals that whatever religious or spiritual belief you might have, that you consider marriage as a business contract. Whether a marriage is instantiated through civil or religious ceremony, a contract is what it is. I do not pretend here that a marriage's validity depends on it being between a man and a woman, or pretend that same sex unions are invalid, but I'll be focusing on male/female marriages for this discussion.

So, in a male-female marriage, as well as in same sex marriages, what is actually going on is that two people enter a business relationship based on sharing of resources including accommodation, income and responsibilities, and physical and emotional intimacy. One of the problems with this is that the particulars of this shared income and responsibility aren't detailed or formalized as they would be in any other business partnership.

The financial and personal responsibilities within a marriage are mostly assumed based on historical or traditional roles, combined with whatever modern sensibilities a married couple prefer.

Did you spot the logical fallacy in the previous statement?

A couple cannot prefer anything, only the individuals within a couple can be said to have opinions. A collective is not a person. So already we're talking about two separate people, who, unless they're extraordinarily fastidious about documenting their expectations, are almost certainly not in total agreement, whether they realize it or not.

Normal business contracts detail rights and responsibilities of participating individuals, as mentioned, but they also include provisions for the termination of a contract. Sometimes after the contracted agreement has been fully satisfied; sometimes after a period of time. "Till death do us part," is the popular language describing the term of a marriage, but this is fanciful. Fully half of marriages end in divorce, often in acrimonious circumstance. Issues of adultery, finance, child rearing, employment, psychological or physical violence and even personality conflict can precipitate a break up.

These are all equivalent to the breach of a contract in normal contract law, and contracts normally include penalty clauses for such eventualities. The defaulting party in a normal contract might forfeit shares, assets, employment, or rights obtained through the contract.

Family law as presently constituted doesn't follow this logic. A legal construct commonly known as no fault divorce allows for the contract of marriage to be dissolved by petition of one party, with no evidentiary inquiry or assessment of default. Addressing this in the terms of a normal contract, this means that if one party to a marriage defaults, by committing adultery, engaging in abusive behaviour, abusing the fiscal assets of the marriage, there is no contractual penalty as there would be in a normal contract. The misbehaving partner has nothing to loose by breaking the assumed terms of the contract. The courts will not consider any actions by a defaulting partner, in the disposition and settlement of familial assets.

Looked at from a purely mercenary view, all advantage lies with the partner breaking the terms of the marriage, whether it's by sleeping around, defrauding the marriage of assets, abusing the other partner or the children or anything else.

If we consider the tendency of women toward hypergamy [1] it's understandable that of the 50% of marriages ending in divorce, most of these no fault contractual dissolutions are dissolved by the petition of the female partners.

According to a study published in the American Law and Economics Review, [2] women currently file slightly more than two-thirds of divorce cases in the United States. In the same study indicated that after the introduction of no fault divorce, among college educated couples, women initiated roughly 90% of divorces.

If a man's financial status, or his income exceeds that of his wife, then she is actually motivated to dissolve the marriage, with or without adding insult to injury by abusing him, sleeping with other men, or other general jackassery on her part. Equal distribution of assets favors the least contributing party. Except when it doesn't such as when the woman's financial input exceeds her husband's. There are cases where court ordered distribution of a dissolving marriage's assets works in the favor of the man, but lets be honest – this is not usual. Marriage as it exists presently is a contract of advantage in only one direction. As long as the construct of no fault divorce persists in western law, men are now rejecting it, and should increasingly continue to reject it as an institution.

And this society we're living in, it's a patriarchy, right?

Everyone in the MRM Should Watch This Video

Paul Bonea · 29 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

It is very seldom that I see anything in the mainstream that seems to be a perfect philosophical fit with the MRM, but in this TED video presented by Seth Godin, that is just what I stumbled upon.

Peel back your last lifetime of programming and perspective on marketing and sink your teeth into the message here.

It is timely, on target and would benefit all of us to pay close attention.

Going Under

Paul Bonea · 29 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Normally I loathe the use of exclamation marks. They always seem to be a cheap device used to add an inflection that unskilled writers can't do just on their facility with words alone.

That being said, holy shit what a month! Incredible!

You will have to bear with me a little because I am still in a surreal state, trying to reach the floor with my feet as I walk in a cloudlike semi-stupor. That is the impact that recent days have had on me. And I have honestly relished every single sleepless moment of it.

But now it is time to get down to bidness, as they say, and down to bidness I am going to get because I want to have A Voice for Men Radio yielding you a return on your investment in thirty days or less.

That means having at least four shows written and produced, as well as two more in pre production before the first show airs. I want to start out well ahead of the game, because as we all have learned in recent days, you never know what sort of thing is going to rise up overnight and change the world.

To get that done, I will be spending all day every day until that production work is done.

So, I won't be around the site any more than I have to be in order to approve comments, post submissions and give you the occasional update on progress. I have a few article submissions in reserve so we are good for a little while But if you have been writing for AVfM and have something to submit, there has never been a better time for it. And if you have wanted to submit something, but never have, the same thing goes.

I'd like to see the content here stay to at least an article a day, but till I have things in balance the scales will tip toward AVfM Radio.

A couple of items in preparation that you can help with, if you wish. First, you can go to blogtalkradio.com and register as a member. Then you can go to the AVfM show page and send in a friends request to the show. The friends are presented on the show page and I would like nothing more than to have as many friends as possible representing the MRM for all to see.

Also, please notice that in the far sidebar we now have a subscription button that allows you to subscribe to AVfM with recurring monthly donations that range from $5.00 to $50.00 depending on your budget and desires.

In addition to all your magnificent financial support, Keyster has volunteered his considerable expertise (along with his sound studio) to play a mighty hand in producing the sound for the show. Alek Novy, the MRA that has been faithfully producing and updating the donation graphics will also head up the full customization of the show page at blogtalkradio.com. Big round of applause for both of these men.

Blog Talk Radio, by the way, is ranked, as of this writing, with a site rating of #2,521 worldwide at alexa.com, and boasts more than 8 million unique visitors per month. The package you supported us buying is getting AVfM Radio 20,000 impressions per month on the home page plus "featured show" status for additional exposure. It also gives us an embeddable show player so that the show can be listened to live, streaming, on any website.

A player will be embedded here permanently.

There is much work to do, and I am going under now, to get to it. When we get to the point that the show is ready for a starting date, of course you will hear about it here first.

In the meantime, get ready for it. I am not going to quit until every last dollar you have sweated for, and sacrificed for this cause, yields a ROI that will make a feminists head spin like Linda Blair's in 1973.

Sexless Neutrality and Futility

B.R. Merrick · 30 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

My respect for Stefan Molyneux knows very few bounds, indeed. I have watched a great many of his YouTube videos, and read a great many things he has said about freedom. He is, as far as I'm concerned, a life-oriented man. I encourage anyone with time on his hands to listen to just about any video he's posted. You'll learn a few things in the process, I can assure you. He is incredibly smart.

With all of this in mind, I feel I must take issue with one interview that he posted with Dr. Cordelia Fine. I'm also warning you beforehand that I find myself in agreement with some of what she says, and I'll specify what it is as I write. (So if you're looking for my regular surplus of sarcasm, look elsewhere.) However, it seems to me that the direction in which the thinking of both Molyneux and Fine is headed is ultimately a dead end for society and a dead end for men.

The video is concerned with a dispute over what constitutes brain differences between males and females. I think Dr. Fine is right to take a closer look at scientific study, if her inquiry into these matters is honest. I will leave it to researchers better equipped than a lazy-ass doofus like myself to determine whether her methodology is correct. I, too, believe that mass media, which is driven by the corporate need to fulfill corporate greed, looks for anything sensational that can be fed into desires that the viewing audience already has. The more sensational the supposed sex difference is, the more airtime it will receive. Having come from the religious right, I can say that they like nothing better but to take "scientific" studies and tote them around to keep naughty boys like me in line.

Unfortunately, I think what Dr. Fine proposes, and what Molyneux seems to be open to, is impossible, and probably should never be attempted. The human brain, I am coming to believe, is always going to be a lot of science mixed with a lot of mystery. I am sure that we will continue to study it, and it goes without saying that we will continue to amass useful information, but for what Fine appears to be proposing, I think it would be better to begin mankind's inquiries with the study of various animals, and end those inquiries where damage could be done to humans.

As with the work of Dr. Marian C. Diamond, this is already being done, and the results sound interesting:

"For the female animal, the main functions in life are to bear, protect and raise her offspring. These roles challenge her to go in many directions, both geographical and conceptual, something that may be more accessible and readily achieved with a symmetrical brain. We might conjecture that the trend to right dominance in the older brain of the female without ovarian hormones suggests a shift to the more visual focus demanded of the male…

"What might be the advantage of having some cortical areas asymmetrical in the male? In general, male behavior involves finding and defending his territory and finding his female, all rather focused functions, possibly benefiting from an asymmetrical cortex."

Mind you, that's a study involving rats, not humans. So what exact criteria, if any, can be relied upon to help us understand any differences between men's and women's brains? I am not well-informed enough, nor sufficiently familiar with the science behind the research to know for certain. And I do appreciate a scientist's skepticism in the face of popularly accepted conclusions that get trumpeted loudly and repeatedly in the media. We need quite a lot more of that, so long as the skepticism of those conclusions is based on logical reasoning.

It would be easier to take Dr. Fine's assertion that she doesn't have a background in feminism or women's studies at face value, however, if she didn't use that word "equality." As I never tire of explaining, equality is non-existent. In the context of this video, she is clearly using the word to express a different idea, and I suspect it is also the reason why Molyneux decided to interview her in the first place: Girls should not be prevented from following their volition.

Well, I agree. To interrupt the process of an individual following through with what private thoughts and feelings naturally lead to, when it does not interfere with the volition of another for himself, is to kill off some small (or great) part of the self. Without your volition, you are not you. If you are not you, then you do not exist. The word for this is "death."

The trouble with children is that, even though they are individual in nature, they are not fully developed individuals. They are almost entirely helpless at birth, and little more than slightly autonomous for the first several years. Therefore, if females, beginning at an early age, are being prevented or halted in their volition through emotional neglect, threats, physical abuse, sexual abuse, indoctrination, nutritional deficiency, or any other form of coercion, then volition is, at least in some small way, going to die. (I believe furthermore that these horrible phenomena lead to misandry, feminism, and, as I repeat ad nauseam, death.)

However, the problems with what Molyneux and Fine discuss are increased when you hear Fine critiquing the methodology of these studies. As the conversation goes on, you get the idea that the reason she and Molyneux have discarded so many human brain studies is because "gender neutrality" was not a starting point.

If that's the case, we're screwed. I am not now advocating, nor will I ever enforce, a sex role for a child. If she's a tomboy, or he wants to play with dolls, fine. Kids have a tendency to grow out of these roles. One of my sisters was a tomboy, and yeah, alright, I admit it, I liked my sisters' dolls. (Thankfully, since I was so enmeshed in so many simultaneous systems of coercion growing up that would have denigrated me for continuing the hideous practice, along came Star Wars action figures: dolls for boys. And just in case you suspect I am a total poof, most of my playtime with action figures involved a sudden, horrific ending where the base they were all in was destroyed by an earthquake.) My sister went on to be quite feminine, getting married, having kids, and I can honestly say that my fascination with girls' toys (for the most part) is over with.

But the discussion on this video is about dressing children in "gender-neutral" clothing and raising them in a "gender-neutral" environment. How is this done, exactly? Define "neutral," and its variance in application between males and females. I would assume that this would eliminate children from wearing several colors: definitely pink and blue, but what about lavender and other pastels? In this day and age, it is fairly easy for girls to get away with wearing just about anything they want and still look like girls; not so for boys. So is Molyneux not dressing his cute little girl, whose name is Elizabeth, in any dresses at all? I don't think Fine is advocating the elimination of dresses from women's fashion any more than I think Molyneux would forbid his daughter, once she's older and more able to express herself, from wearing one. But is my desire to watch little girls in their cute little pink outfits an acquiescence to some hidden system of coercion? If it is, then so is my love of Christmas, my deep and abiding interest in the orchestral repertoire, the change of seasons in the Northeast, and even my love of hot chocolate with buttered toast. Why?

Because among my fond memories of growing up in the Northeast are all of the above. My parents planted themselves here, begat four kids, and celebrated Christmas every year with a ton of decorations, music, taping Christmas cards they received to the entryways of the dining and living rooms, making food (including hot chocolate with buttered toast), caroling, parties, presents, fires in the fireplace, listening to Tchaikovsky's wonderful ballet "The Nutcracker" (thus cementing my future "coming out" as a classical music fanatic), board games, forcing the World's Greatest Cat to wear a fuzzy red ribbon around his neck, and on and on. Can you understand why I love all of the above?

Was there anything wrong with my parents subjecting me to all of that? How is it different that my parents subjected me to wearing pants and never got me the skirt I apparently so desperately wanted? Christmas is the same as a boy wearing pants: They are both artifacts of our culture. All cultures, like the beauty of the free market, pick and choose, based on the individual concerns of a great many participants, which items, ideas, and practices will remain and which will go.

The Christmas tree made headway with millions of revelers only in the nineteenth century, when a cultural icon, Queen Victoria, married a kraut and put one in her gigantic estate. From that point forward, on this land mass, Christmas was permanently altered. Now the practice of decorating a tree is simply not questioned. The crucial difference between this phenomenon and actual coercion is that no one who lives here and wishes to ignore Christmas, or refuses to plunk down money for a Fritz-inspired tree, has to participate. Non-threatening traditions such as these can influence one's mind, but it can hardly be called coercive.

If I decide tomorrow that I've had enough of acting and dressing like a regular guy, I can whip off my pants and put on a skirt if I like. No one's going to stop me. However, I will be subjected to stares, whispers, stifled laughter, rolling eyes, etc. Is that coercive? Well, it would certainly make my life more difficult. But as long as none of them threatens me, or puts a gun to my head, what's stopping me?

My brain is. I have always worn pants. My parents started me on that habit. I never questioned it. I have questioned a great many things they did since then, and rejected quite a lot of it, because I recognize the important difference between coercion and benign influence. Dressing me in pants did indeed influence me according to my sex. I perceive myself differently because of my recognition of living in a society full of pants-wearing men.

Then again, everything else with which I have come into contact has had an effect on my brain. I hate to quote a character from a creepy movie, but truth is truth, and truth in popular culture should always be pointed out. In "The Silence of the Lambs," during one of his interviews with Clarice Starling (played by Jodie Foster) where covetousness is discussed, Hannibal Lecter (played by Anthony Hopkins) says, "We begin by coveting by what we see every day." This is entirely true.

Why are they called The Terrible Twos? Because she has finally figured out how to walk. Uh oh. Now she's going to run off to wherever her covetous eyes are taking her: "What's this? What's this? What's this? Go away, Mom. What's this?" Is the oppression that is going to dissuade her from becoming an architect because she's using her chubby little legs to run around while she's wearing a pink, frilly dress?

The unavoidable, logical conclusion of sexless child-rearing is that ultimately it will be contradictory, because there is an unavoidable, logical fact that has to be taken under consideration: Boys have penises, girls have vaginas, and they know it.

A girl's genitals are visible only slightly on the outside of her body; a boy's genitals are almost impossible to hide, and to do so requires a great deal of manual manipulation. This leads, I believe, to a woman's sexuality being more "secretive" than a man's. This, if it is true, is part of the reason why men find women so attractive. Yes, women can show off their tits, and those marvelous glands comprise one of the many, many female erogenous zones, but many of the other zones remain hidden, as most of the vagina does.

A man's sexuality is not hidden. It is out there for all to see. If a man within your field of vision has a hardon, there is very little hidden about what is on his mind. Even though boys are incapable of fully understanding sexuality, they get a hint whenever they experience erections. How do these researchers propose to divorce a boy's brain from recognition of this important difference? Worse than that, his brain is going to sound a four-alarm alert when he's 13, when he notices that this "occasional" hardness is poking out much, much further than it did before:

"Oh… my… GOD!"

I haven't even addressed the fact that we are dealing with a language that does not have any other "gender-neutral" pronoun other than "it," or the fact that a great many other Romantic languages have "masculine" and "feminine" words. What does it do to an "oppressed" little girl's brain, to be subjected to a language where she understands "he" refers to Dad (who she has been told has something called a "penis") and "she" refers to Mom (who has what she has, and she's seen it)? Would Dr. Fine be content with a "gender-neutral" study of the brain where masculine and feminine are woven into the language, and where the female children are aware that the boys in the study have something different between their chubby little legs? That doesn't sound neutral to me.

Therefore, I would propose that for these two reasons alone, we can never truly have a "gender-neutral" study of the human brain, because the human brain develops so rapidly, from so many different influences, that it simply boggles the human brain that thinks about it.

Children aren't sexless. There's a crucial difference between a father who sits his son down and tells him what's expected of him as a man, and then proceeds to indoctrinate him with false, outdated, or coercive ideas; and a father who sits his son down, tells him how his body works, how a female's body works, some of the things he can expect, and that he's there if the boy ever wants to talk. No dad, as far as I know, ever has to apologize to his son for always dressing him in pants, any more than any mom has to make amends to her daughter for The Pink Frilly Fiasco.

Yet Dr. Fine is concerned that people still think that men are better at the hard sciences than women, and that this "false" belief contributes to faulty brain studies and some sort of oppression of the female spirit. If brain science is truly faulty, go for it. Critique it. Challenge it. A truly hard science, like a rock, isn't going to budge.

But there is no such thing as "gender neutrality," and I'm not just saying this because I hate the word "gender." Each of us is either one sex or the other (love the word "sex"), and that is going to permanently affect how the brain thinks. Beyond that, each of us is exposed to adult versions of whatever sex we are, and adult versions of the opposite sex as well. None of them, including Dr. Fine, is "gender-neutral." Our brains, which refuse to stop the process of learning (unless they've been damaged beyond repair), are bound to observe attitudes, behaviors, and appearances, and from that point forward, the brain is not the same.

It isn't that my brain thinks better because I'm a man. To the contrary, I have been bested by women at many things I have tried, from sports (which I loathe) to music (which I love). My brain is different from a woman's brain because it is attached, and has always been attached, to a male body. Furthermore, my brain is different from every other man's brain because my brain, body, and mind have an autonomy that is uniquely and entirely mine. Other men did not celebrate Christmas with my family. (Their loss.) This creates a great and insurmountable inequality: I am without equal. The sameness I seek with like-minded individuals has to do with similar tastes and interests. Like any other individual, I am bolstered by agreement and association. It's electric and exciting. It is only this rewarding, however, when it is based on truth. If I were to change my views based on whatever group of individuals with whom I wish to associate wants me to think, the dishonesty would eventually catch up with my level of enjoyment. Dishonesty is coercion against the truth, which is a necessary component of volition, and I never tire of saying it: Coercion is death.

To dress and raise children sexlessly is to separate them from their sex needlessly and pointlessly. Between coercive sex roles (boys are tough, girls are sweet) and sexless mindlessness (girls and boys are equal), is a whole world of freedom: freedom to question, freedom to challenge, freedom to change, freedom to stay comfortably the same, freedom to put the toy truck to bed, and freedom to make the Barbie doll explode.

If Dr. Fine thinks there is still too much "inequality," and that the "gender expectations" placed upon women in the First World at the advent of the twenty-first century are still that great, I would like to point out that these women have more than enough access to libraries, universities, government, birth control, menswear, the Internet, and everything else men have traditionally used to build the roads and buildings, write the symphonies, pen the books, direct the movies, steer the ships, fight the wars, and develop the philosophies upon which our civilization is based. Non-sexless women have had this access for quite some time now. They have been backed by decades of popular culture virtually screaming, "Girl Power!" They have watched their mothers go off to work.

No one forbids them to learn to drive, open bank accounts, or fix sinks. No one forbade Dr. Fine to go to school and learn about the human brain. No one stopped her from writing a book. No man I have ever known personally, or even observed on television or in print speaking his mind, stands for such nonsense.

Women who want to do something more are always going to be in the minority, because they are born into this world with bodies that create humanity and come equipped to feed that which they create, and they love it. I cannot even begin to comprehend how amazing that must be. My brain will never figure it out. Dr. Fine's brain will probably never grasp that I myself will never have full sexual "equality," since my pool of potential sex partners, as well as where I can or cannot openly express my thoughts about being different, are severely diminished. But where inclusion in a minority takes a back seat to individuality, these are no longer concerns.

The utopia sought by the kind of thinking in this video will never appeal to individuality in an imperfect world. The imperfection of this world, and everything living in it, is natural law. Cutting off our sex organs, or adopting some sort of cognitive dissonance by pretending that we don't notice them, does not help us to reckon with the terror of living finite lives on a planet that doesn't care whether we live or die. All it does is give humanity one more headache, bolster the agendas of those that despise men, and work against the freedom that Molyneux seeks. I sincerely hope men and women will wake up soon to the myth of equality, and walk their own paths to freedom in a naturally sex-differentiated world.

Anatomy of a Victim Ideology

Lecture No. 5

"The weakness of men is the façade of strength: the strength of women is the façade of weakness" – Warren Farrell

Among the worst mistakes that freedom-loving people can make is to stereotype feminists as a small, motley crew of angry lesbians who have long since ceased to be relevant. Take note: this stereotype helps them.

I must repeat myself: this stereotype helps them.

Let that sink in for a moment. Every time you have belittled feminists as a bunch of cranky old hags that nobody takes seriously, you have helped to obscure their program and indeed, their very existence as a form of organized power. Belittle them, you must – but do so in a way which exposes, not obscures! For feminism is far from being a relic of the past. The feminist movement is taken very seriously indeed by those with the power to enforce its core aims:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.

(2) The punishment of men.

(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.

Obscurity assists the realization of these goals by creating doubt amongst potential opponents. The misidentification of feminism as a cultural artifact which no longer holds sway over the operations of government and society is a product of feminism's own metamorphosis. Note that the essence, or substance of feminism has not changed over the years, only its form, or packaging. The change of packaging has proved so effective that some now deny that the product still exists.

Au contraire. As much as the times changed with feminism, feminism has changed with the times. In the transformation of feminism from a movement opposed to government and society at large, into a movement which controls the state and public opinion – and uses this position to persecute the new enemies of the state – its strategies underwent a certain cultivation. Today, feminists no longer need to throw temper tantrums to get their way, because while they once raged against the machine, they now control it. This is the truly profound shift in Western societies since the height of consciousness about feminism in the middle of last century; it is not that feminists have become less relevant, but more.

When feminists were outside the tent, causing offense was one of their prime weapons – poorly disguised as edgy boundary-pushing. Who remembers this lovely piece of propagandistic hate, published in the 1970s?

The above is precisely the kind of thing that feminists today like to pretend never happened. Now that feminists are inside the tent, they are forced to defend their gains; in the 1970s, when the above picture was produced, they attacked from the outside, and sought to tear down official morality rather than (as they do now) define and dictate it.

And how better to maintain control than by punishing those who attack, or who might attack, the new status quo? We are of course referring to men, who stand to lose the most from the three core aims of the feminist project as listed above. Today, feminists believe that women have the inalienable right to not feel offended, and they do not hesitate to employ state violence to enforce this. Prosecuting those (men) who cause offense is their new weapon, one which has replaced the old (causing offense). Of course, persecuting people merely for being offensive is rather less charitable than men were to feminists before feminists took over. But, as Gynocentrism Theory tells us, men were only charitable to offensive women in the early days of feminism because women already exercised substantial control.

Do feminists believe that they are doing right? The answer is an unequivocal yes for most of them – they truly do believe that they are a righteous people, and even when they become cognizant of doing wrong, they rationalize that they are also, simultaneously, doing right. How could this be? Well, let me show you how it works, by tracing the anatomy of a victim ideology.

Once a period of consciousness-raising has propagated the belief that the members of a group are – by their essential nature as members of the group – victims, the group shall pursue two objectives:

(1) To equalize with the designated 'enemy' group;

(2) To forge their own 'victim identity', separate from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

You will notice that, while the first objective brings the 'victim' group closer to the 'enemy' group, in terms of status, expectations, autonomy, etc., the second widens the gulf between them. The first objective, we are told, will unite us in our common humanity, and bring about liberty for all, and other nice things like that. But as soon as we get close to this, there tends to be a drift towards proclamations of the importance of the second objective. Nothing will ever be enough to satisfy the 'victim' group, because they view themselves as essentially and inherently the victims of the 'enemy' group, regardless of what may have changed in reality. A victim ideology is anti-contextual, and its followers – the self-designated 'victims' – shall never see themselves as anything but. Their victimhood is affirmed in advance, and the facts must be made to fit the story. In other words, they will spin any situation into one where they are most harshly treated.

This is why feminists like Hillary Clinton can get away with saying things like > women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat.

Well, sure – losing family members to horrible deaths is so much worse than actually having to die those horrible deaths. That is, if your whole worldview is tainted by sexism and you reduce the status of men to Protecting/Providing Objects. In Mrs Clinton's quote, no humanity is ascribed to men whatsoever. The real problem is not that they are traumatized, mutilated and blown to pieces per se; it is that, because of their being subject to atrocities, men will not be able to fulfill their protecting/providing roles quite so effectively. It is, therefore, women who lose out, because men don't actually matter except insofar as they can assist females. This is precisely the kind of attitude which emerges out of a victim ideology. The entirety of existence, in all its wonderful complexity, is reduced to black-and-white primitivism: my people matter, your people don't. Or, as we shall see, my people good, your people bad. Anything good for my people is good, no mind whether it is good or bad for your people.

This kind of thinking is known as Manichean Essentialism, and it is the metaphysical cornerstone for feminism as a whole. Decades of consciousness-raising have ensured that women are reflexively considered to have been wronged, whatever the facts. Whenever genuine examples of women being wronged cannot be found, compensatory privilege becomes the sanctioned goal. That is, women are treated more leniently in one regard because they are believed to be disadvantaged in unrelated regards, or just disadvantaged in general. One recent example of this from the United Kingdom is the order issued by Dame Laura Cox to judges that they must treat female criminals with greater leniency, a ruling which simultaneously reduced British men to second class status while green-lighting abusive women who might otherwise have been deterred.

There are some who go further than this. Baroness Corston, who explicitly identifies as a feminist, believes that women don't really deserve to be punished at all when they commit crimes. Her 2007 Government report advocates that all women's prisons should close, and that even the most violent and abusive female offenders should not be locked up. Indeed, they > would no longer go to one of the country's 15 women's prisons, which would all close. Instead, killers such as Rose West, serving life for the murder of ten young women and girls, would be sent to "homely" local custody > units. There they would be allowed to live as a "family unit" with between 20 and 30 other women prisoners, organising their own shopping, budgets and cooking. The units would also allow them to stay close to their families … All the women's jails would shut within the next decade, and could instead be converted into prisons for men … The report claims: "Women and men are different. Equal treatment of men and women does not result in equal outcomes."

The above is a classic example of Orwellian Newspeak. Anti-feminists of all stripes have been saying for decades that men and women are essentially different. Feminists have insisted that men and women are essentially the same, and we must therefore have equal treatment. But as soon as equality works retrograde to the goal of female empowerment, it is dropped like a hot potato, and feminists twist themselves around in incredible semantic gymnastics to justify the sudden turnabout.

> Women also (sic) never be sent to jail to "teach them a lesson".

Of course they shouldn't. Women shouldn't have to actually learn how to abide by the law, much less how to be functioning members of civilization. They should be allowed to run wild and free, abusing and destroying anything they please with absolute license. They shouldn't even expect a slap on the wrist for their misbehavior – that would be domestic violence, don't you know?

But if feminism truly was about equality, shouldn't feminists be pushing for new laws to criminalize more women, rather than their anti-egalitarian approach of imprisoning less women and more men? Or does equality only matter when it is women who are deemed unequal? (In and of itself, this would imply strongly that women are a privileged class like no other.)

The female incarceration rate is just one-eighth that of men in the United States (Wikipedia, accessed 10th October 2010), while women account for only 5.7% of inmates in Great Britain (accessed 10th October 2010). Surely, if equality was the goal, we would be relaxing the punitive, feminist-inspired laws against men, and seeking to punish more women instead. I can think of nowhere in modern society that is more male-dominated or unrepresentative than the penal system – something which, in the interests of sexual equality, needs to change.

But no – flatly contrary to the principles of neutral, impartial justice, feminists deem it a good thing for its own sake to lock up fewer women! It is as though women who are guilty of crimes aren't really guilty – and are therefore victims of whatever is done to them as punishment. It is a popular notion that women are disadvantaged – generally, inherently, essentially, within the very fiber of their being – and so must be disadvantaged in every particular area of life; thus, anything done to assist them must be a reduction of unfair disadvantage. Any rationally-minded person can see how absurd this all is, and I include leading feminists in this, as they are shrewd but not stupid. Just deserts, deterrence, fair treatment, civilization itself be damned; this is Gynocentrism in action.

To recap, victim ideologies such as feminism seek to:

(1) Equalize with the 'enemy' group;

(2) Forge their own 'victim identity', separate from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

That these two objectives are in contradiction is not just a logical flaw; it's part of a strategy which allows the 'victim' group to shift its stance as circumstances require. Objective (1) might be consistently pursued for a little while. But if the movement comes under scrutiny for disadvantaging the 'enemy' group, the 'victims' can just switch to objective (2) and emphasize the importance of their own uniqueness in ways for which equality does not suffice. Or, as feminist Germaine Greer puts it:

> In 1970 the movement was called 'Women's Liberation' or, contemptously (sic), 'Women's Lib'. When the > name 'Libbers' was dropped for 'Feminists' we were all relieved. What none of us noticed was that the ideal of liberation was fading out with the word. We were settling for equality. Liberation struggles are not about assimilation but about asserting difference, endowing that difference with dignity and prestige, and insisting on it as a condition of self-definition and self-determination. … the visionary feminists of the late sixties and early seventies knew that women could never find freedom by agreeing to live the lives of unfree men.

Once equal status has been reached, the rhetoric of equality can be discarded, because who wants to be only equal to a man anyway? Here, in black and white, is a statement of female supremacy.

Same as it ever was.

If equality had ever been the end goal, then men's disadvantages would have been addressed seriously, and not exacerbated while men themselves were goaded. To this day, the only time a feminist bothers herself with an issue of male disadvantage is when it benefits women to point it out – as in the case of parental leave. Enforced equal paternity and maternity leave rules out any disincentive that employers have to hire women. A feminist will set aside her 'all fathers are rapists and abusers' shtick, just long enough to insist that men should have equal rights to parenting – but this is typically presented as a demand that men shoulder the burdens of raising children so that women may be empowered in the workplace. Even when injustices against them are being redressed, men are tools for female betterment.

Same as it ever was.

Another example is male rape in prisons. This is occasionally highlighted by feminists, but only because men can be shown to be the oppressors, allowing them to attack maleness itself. Feminists pick up the torch once the rapist has done his part; they complete the rape victim's sexual humiliation by destroying his self-identity, poisoning his mind with aspersions that maleness itself is to blame for his victimization; and so a fundamental, immutable part of himself was the cause of his rape. They force upon him the identity of rapist along with rape victim, their vilification of 'toxic masculinity' serving to assure him that he shares the abusive characteristics of his abuser. On the other hand, the high level of female culpability in child abuse, both sexual and non-sexual, is ignored or denied.

This is why our universally applicable definition of feminism could not have included any reference to 'equality' – it's not a reasonable statement to make if we're using analytical tools more incisive than Manichean Essentialism. The universal definition remains, and no ground can possibly be ceded: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Power in what regard? Power to do what? Such questions inevitably arise. The answer, if you've been following closely, is obvious – whatever they please, no matter who else is harmed. Silence is not consent, but it is complicity, when you have the power to draw attention towards abuse and the resources towards stopping it, yet you fail to do so on the grounds that the abusers have genitals that resemble your own.

And that's what it comes down to, folks – we are dealing with primitives in pantsuits.

The Colonization of Male Space

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 31 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism, in the nearly half-century of its systematic cultural revolution, has worked doggedly and persistently to erode male space in every possible form. From the beginning, it has been a central feminist project not only to whittle down the amount of time that men spend together in the absence of women, but to fragment the continuity of such time, to break it into smaller and smaller chunks, and to cast the very idea of it into disrepute.

It is a classic recipe. If you aim to take away the power of a targeted group, you must undermine their solidarity by making it progressively more difficult for them to bond with each other. And if you fragment the continuity of their time together, what bonds they might form will be correspondingly fragmentary, and accordingly ineffectual.

The colonization of male-only workspaces and institutions, under the convenient banner of "equality", "ending discrimination" or the like, is only the most commonly understood and popularly visible 'wedge' manifestation of something that runs far deeper—but the politically motivated double-standard is clear enough when you consider how many female-only clubs, jobs and other settings will pass without a murmur where the male equivalent would soon come under hostile scrutiny or even litigation.

Clearly, the ruling energy in society has dictated that women are welcome to be alone with other women, but that men ought not assemble in the absence of female supervision or female presence in some form. For the colonization of male space means not simply that male-only time has dwindled in quantitative terms, but that qualitatively speaking, the likelihood of female influence or even intervention has proportionately grown, and now throws a shadow over such occasions.

Male space, in a conceptual sense, encompasses many things. Thus, male preserves, domains and "discourses" of any sort whatever are under direct or indirect pressure to, as it were, lower the drawbridge, and admit the circulation of females or at the very least some infused awareness of femaleness in principle.

In the long run, the final frontier of male space is the space inside your male head. So when male space breaks down into small enough pieces, the last chunk to be cracked open will be the sovereign castle of your own mind. By then, the defending forces will barely exist any more, and the besieging forces will hold every possible advantage. Yes, the colonization of male space advances by logical steps to a logical endpoint, which is the colonization of male INNER space.

In the feminist war, men and maleness are under attack. And if men collectively cannot grow a robust, inwardly articulated community of interest among themselves, endowed with durable focal points and folkways, then each man as an individual will be more and more thrown upon his own devices, hence a sitting duck. Hang together or hang separately: such is bonding; such is solidarity.

The feminist campaign of attrition against male space, which operates on so many levels, aims chiefly to weaken men and to strengthen women by building up "womanspace" as much as possible. On the surface, this appears to be an extension of patriarchy theory, and patriarchy, as any counter-feminist will tell you, is merely a feminist codeword for male power of any kind.

Accordingly, the best way to deplete "patriarchy" is to deplete male space, since men cannot effectively "hang together" if they are not together in the first place—they cannot compare notes about their experience; they cannot connect the dots; they cannot "do the arithmetic"; they cannot develop a culture of resistance; they cannot build networks. And being thus separated, it's a pretty sure bet they will "hang separately".

At this point, a feminist might chime in with more patriarchy theory, informing us that men and women are alike, that patriarchy forced men and women to assume separate roles in society, and that integrating them into the same social spaces (with interchangeable roles) is how we end 3, 427 years of patriarchal oppression.

But the sheer hypocrisy of actual practice gives the lie to this speech, for no such programme has been followed.

Instead, the practice has been to invade male space in order to gain advantage for women, while continuing to ban men if women don't want them around for any reason.

The view that men and women are non-physically different in a way that cultural training does not explain, is called essentialism. The old school feminists of the 1960s and 1970s were staunchly ANTI-essentialist, and anti-essentialism remains, overtly at least, a critical prop of feminist ideology to this very day.

Anti-essentialism is, let me say it, a scientifically dubious notion. But that didn't stop certain people from launching a monumental campaign to re-engineer society on the strength of it. They didn't even blink about what they were doing; they went right ahead and did it anyway because it fit their politics, and because they sold their plan to a passel of idiots who thought it sounded like a cool idea.

But we must reflect on the mass of evidence which favors essentialism. Now is not the time to review this evidence, but trust me, it is a lot. Enough, I dare say, to open an ominous crack, from top to bottom, in the facade of patriarchy theory. For if men and women turn out to be naturally different, then they would naturally gravitate toward different things, yes? And so the idea that men collectively forced women to stay home and clean the house becomes a hard sell.

Once again, women in general (thanks to feminism) were able to invade male space and gain material advantages—jobs, for example—while at the same time banning men from female space if they wished to do so. Meanwhile, the feminist plotters in particular were advancing their deeper agenda of weakening "patriarchy" (to wit, male power) by making it harder for men to be alone together, less likely to pool their observations, less likely to bond, less likely to become political, and less likely to gain solidarity for any purpose whatsoever.

The feminist plan was to destroy the male power structure ("patriarchy"), by colonizing male space. In this project they have been quite successful, although they have no intention of slowing down until they have eradicated as much "patriarchy" as they can possibly get their hands on. For it surely troubles them to see men conferring seriously when no woman is nearby to barge in and, if necessary, derail the proceedings. Feminist hostility toward male space is, in most cases, barely concealed. They fear the growth of cabals and combinations, and their fear is not unjustified.

Now, most men have not conceptualized the loss of male space in terms of a collective deprivation: that is to say, they have not conceptualized it politically. And so men must understand, that the division of male and female space in society is fundamentally a division of power. Male space equals male power, and female space equals female power.

That's all there is to it.

The feminists jabber on and on about "patriarchal power and control", but what do they really mean by that expression? I will tell you: they mean men having power as opposed to being powerless, and they mean men being in control as opposed to being either out of control or controlled. In the end, they don't want men to have power for any reason, and they don't want men to be in control of anything at all—especially themselves!

Again, male space is identical with male power. The two are one. And the secret of this power is, that it controls nothing but itself. I mean, that "patriarchal" power and control signifies no more, and no less, than power and control within the perimeter of male space.

Simply stated, this means that patriarchal power is not truly about controlling at all. No. Patriarchal power is about not being controlled. Properly speaking, patriarchal power is not even asserted, being rather a passive power—a mighty boulder in the stream which parts the rushing waters, an unmoved mover like unto the god of Aristotle.

Cross this power, and you shall reap the harvest that your own free will has brought upon you. Patriarchal power is only violent in self-defense.

"Only violent in self-defense". Where have you heard that phrase before?

Yes, we have heard that phrase before. . . haven't we? And all I've got to say is: two can play at that game. I grant you it is a dirty game of reversal—especially when the feminists play it. Still, two can play at that game. No principle of moral equilibrium rules out any such two-way traffic.

So "patriarchal power and control" is, finally, the assertion of equilibrium, integrity and home rule within the realm of men's business. It is male authority in the foundational sense of local expertise, the pristine autonomy of male space and the principle of undefiled male identity—which at its inmost core excludes female input.

Barring women from male spaces (as with the boys club sign that reads "no girls allowed") is regrettably apt to be taken for "misogyny" by people of shallow understanding. Yet this will prove unavoidable and, in the long run, a necessary prophylaxis against the growth of ACTUAL misogyny. It is neither evil, nor a "necessary" evil. It is a necessary good.

Feminist ideology, as touched upon earlier, has bequeathed us an anti-essentialist legacy, and this legacy pervades law, public policy, pedagogy, and, to a great extent, even popular culture. The pervasion is regrettable because it means that too much of our common life and common understanding is built on something questionably true at best, if not disastrously wrong. For if we accept that men and women are endowed by their creator with different inclinations, then it should come as no surprise that a social experiment which tries to iron this flat would end in a social train wreck.

All of which is to say, that men and women just might need to get away from each other at times, so that each sex can do what it does best without the other sex throwing a spanner in the works.

But the focus now is on men, so of men I will speak.

Men cannot do what men do best if they cannot work as men among men, unhindered by women. Men cannot follow their natural rhythm, their natural logic, their natural genius and their natural joy, if they must forever accommodate to the alien demands of a different behavioral idiom. This will only slow them down and cripple them, which, unless you have a political reason to encourage such things, is not a good idea.

And upon that note, I turn to the political. The colonization of male space is designed principally to exploit men and to poison their environment, hence their well-being and their existence on every level. And it brings about all of this very simply by robbing men of power—for male power, as we have established, is identical with male space.

The pre-feminist system of life made rational allowance for the natural differences between men and women, and most importantly, allowed for male and female space by mandating separate roles. The feminist system of life has done away with this, and in the process given men the short end of the stick. Men can no longer function optimally AS men (among men), but in addition their political and social power has been cut off at the root in an absolute sense. And this, once again, was part of the feminist plan.

Women are, of course, free. Free to live as they will, to move unencumbered in the world, to taste the bitter and sweet alike from the orchards of life, and even chart their destinies by the stars if it strikes their fancy. They are also free to shoot themselves in the foot, for that, unfortunately, comes with the package. One would not think to interfere with women's freedom. One would not think to oppress them. One knows them to be capable adults, willing to assume full responsibility for their lives, and willing to embrace equality in the entirety of its aspects. In good faith, one knows women to be on their own.

And a consequence of the feminist plan (whether planned or not), is that men and women are now separate political power blocs, and the idea that they owe any political obligation to one another is a quaint fiction—a vain conceit with no foundation in either morality or objective circumstance. Men, accordingly, are entitled to grab what they can grab, and to look out for their own. Feminism has licensed the same for women, so the demands of symmetry are clear enough.

I call upon men, therefore, to reclaim and reoccupy male space by whatever methods their creative imagination might suggest to them—and those methods might be very, very many indeed.

No need to be coy, Roy. . .

Just DO IT!

You don't even need a pretext, although at times that can be useful. But there is nothing more to it, than to charter an organization or start a club, and announce very, very openly that you mean for this to be a men's club. And if you intend to reclaim male space, then why not announce that fact itself very, very openly for all the world to hear. In fact, why not start your club for OPENLY STATED POLITICAL REASONS, and if anybody doesn't like this, ask them what the hell they plan to do about it?

For example, you could organize a study group with the plainly stated intention of re-establishing patriarchy. You could make this sound tongue-in-cheek. . . or you could make it sound deadly serious—that's up to you. And you would have leeway in your definition of terms such as "patriarchy". But whichever way it goes, you would be thumbing your nose at the world and asking people what the hell they planned to do about it.

And really, what COULD they do about it? If they did something really stupid, you would be ready to hit them with a lawsuit. . . wouldn't you?

I say, you could have great fun all of this, and you could inspire others. . . couldn't you?

Do you understand the principle of what I am telling you here?

I am saying: TAKE WHAT IS RIGHTFULLY YOURS!

And damn the torpedoes.

Think about that.

The market works

One of the most important discoveries to find when reviewing the results of the American experiment is that men, when able to chart the courses of their own lives, will gladly focus their efforts on better interfacing with reality. The limits of the physical universe are the ultimate oppressor, but they can be overcome. Our efforts are better spent fighting with the universe rather than with other men's petty desires for power. Freedom is not just the pinnacle of peace and morality, but it is the only way to ensure that the future of humanity will be better than the bitter struggles of our ancestors and indeed, our own lives.

The economic manifestation of men's freedom to create, share and trade the resources they acquire and hold ownership of is the free market. The only way a man can gain all the items he needs in his life—or as we all often seek to do, increase his total share of resources—is by peaceably serving his neighbors in ways they find valuable. It sounds great in theory and works far better in reality than anyone has the capacity to predict.

This essay is not primarily about the free market, but it does use it as a basis from which to consider why the sexual 'free' market has been such a disaster in the past and in the present. It is assumed that you, the reader, understand the basics of this issue. If not, read a few of the other articles about female sexual preference on A Voice For Men first, with special consideration given to the woefully incomplete Zeta Game series. F. Roger Devlin's Sexual Utopia in Power is supremely indispensable. Generally, if you understand hypergamy—and more importantly, accept it as real—then you are good to go.

The above links are the only explicitly referenced external sources you will find in the entirety of the essay. Distinguished readers are called upon to apply their own experiences and knowledge when viewing this. The purpose is to provide a highly abstract logical analysis of an important aspect in the fundamental ordering of human societies. It is important for men to know how to best go forward when we finally begin to recover from the toils of 'feminism' and misandry.

The hypothesis is that any hands-off approach to organizing sexual reproduction defaults to women pursing the low-quality results of hypergamy at any cost—the opposite of what the economic free market accomplishes.

Creation of market mechanisms

If the free market can quickly and efficiently distribute resources and produce ever increasing quality, then could a "sexual free market" be the best way to solve the problem of joining men and women together for the purpose of reproduction? Why not allow men and women to enter and exit relationships at will?

An important difference immediately arises before we bound from the starting gates—truly, before we even walk onto the track. There can only be a sexual 'free' market in the sense that there is no human involvement in denying the actors from participating in the manner they choose. To use more familiar terms: there is little regulation from outside the market itself. It does not have the same success because key factors that make the unregulated economic free market work are non-existent in an unregulated sexual 'free' market. What would surface from abandoning the previous cultural controls of men and women's sexuality is not a genuine free market, but an inferior quasi-market that has nature already created through hundreds of millions of years of brutal trial-and-error. The prefix 'quasi-' is Latin for "almost, as it were," and is usually used to describe one thing that has a false appearance of being another.

In any individual transaction, there is a buyer and a seller. Both have something the other wants, so how do we know which is which? We know who the buyer is because he the one with the least to lose by not transacting. For example, the person holding dollars is in a position of strength over the person holding widgets. Dollars can be used to transact with anyone at any time, but widgets can only be traded with people who happen to want widgets right now. If the man with dollars leaves without trading anything, there are still millions of other people he can trade with. This is probably not so for the seller and his widgets.

Nature has rigged the game so that most females are, in the vast majority of their interactions with males, the buyers. This is achieved through the software humans run on, i.e. psychology. The mechanics are that by creating a disparity in what the sexes find attractive, a rudimentary form of competition can be exploited for its quality-increasing benefits. For reference, the most important factors for each—and the qualities they approximate—is, men prefer youth and beauty (fertility), and women prefer markers of fertility as well, but with the added criteria of high relative wealth and social ascendancy (proficiency in dealing with the real world).

The existence of desires, and of people who could potentially fulfill them, creates a quasi-market. Participants attempt to fulfill both their own desires and necessarily also the desires of those they are attracted to.

A contrived market: a quasi-market

What men desire is exhibited to some degree by nearly all women, and this fact puts him at a disadvantage in meeting his needs. Fertility is the simplest and most obvious quality to desire in a mate. It is all that is necessary to successfully mate, but women strongly desire more than that from their suitors. She is unlikely to be interested in a man simply because his testicles work. There is little danger of her not finding an opportunity from another man if she turns one down for not offering her enough. Men have a more powerful drive compelling them to mate because they have to be forced into playing the game even though it is rigged against them. This is necessary to solidify the virtual and elevated value of women so that they will be able to be the choosers in most cases.

This mismatch in interests places women in the position of the buyer. Their fertility is desired by many men. It is her eagerness to tell men “No” that creates a virtual scarcity in an environment where, in truth, there are nearly equal numbers of fertile men and women. This false scarcity allows humanity to benefit from the quasi-market’s competition for reproductive opportunities. Women (in actuality, their limited fertility) are not able or willing to meet the massive sexual demand men are psychologically programmed to have, and so it is men who must go the furthest to meet their own desires.

The whole purpose of the psychologically created sexual quasi-market is exactly the same as the economic free market: to more efficiently and effectively make use of limited resources. The sexual mating dynamic in humans and other species could have easily just been a blind fuck-for-all in which males and females had the same desires and only luck would determine how females’ eggs, energy and time were spent. Unsurprisingly, species that evolved to take advantage of some market-like mechanisms tended to out compete other sexually reproducing species.

Many people in the men’s movement condemn women for their hypergamous desires, but it is that extra requirement they hold for mates that informs how they make decisions in the rigged quasi-market that nature guarantees. As lazy, sickly, and gormless as we may think many people are these days, the state of humanity would be far worse—if it survived at all—absent hundreds of millions of years of hypergamy and females’ ability to make sexual choices based on it.

The quasi-market fails to maintain civilization

With the nature and advantages of hypergamy and the sexual quasi-market stated, it is time to move to the limitations, which are legion. As to its main purpose—facilitating humanity’s survival by improving the gene pool—put simply, hypergamy is obsolete, and has been for quite a while. Using reason and good thinking to manipulate the environment for our purposes fully supersedes basic biological evolution as the driver of human progress.

Civilization has since arisen, providing us solutions to problems that far exceed what rote trial and error through the evolutionary process could ever hope to give. We do not depend on women giving birth to fast runners; we have cars and airplanes. Likewise, we do not depend on women giving birth to children resistant to malaria; we have medications such as Chloroquine.

Moreover, hypergamy is only a rough approximation of what are useful qualities in men. It exists deep within the emotional areas of psychology and is about as accurate at giving good advice as any other emotion.

The strength of humanity is our ability to use reason, a capacity both men and women share. It is certain that accurate, methodological thinking is the way of the future. Reason tells that we must use economic free markets, imperfect as they are, to take advantage of various human weaknesses such as greed and envy, and it also tells us why hypergamy must be similarly redirected to our advantage.

Allowing the primeval sexual quasi-market to operate within our civilization is folly. Civilization is possible because cultures have found more effective ways of organizing reproductive capital than the quasi-market. This newly found efficiency is the basis on which everything else in civilization is possible. Hypergamy is 100 times more effective than all woman being willing to mate with any man, but cultural controls on sexuality that compel mates to stick together and competently raise children are 1,000,000 times better than hypergamy. Replacing them with the quasi-market inevitably leads to significant regression and civilizational collapse.

'Civilizational collapse' is used here to describe a receding standard of living, rather than one that is genuinely improving. It does not necessarily mean a total doomsday scenario, though it potentially could.

Male and female power

Most people in western culture would maintain the importance of the 'feminist' view that complete sexual autonomy for women is supremely moral and has no failings. To them, it is perfectly acceptable to remove all the social controls that had sustained civilization for thousands of years. Fairness dictates that we must allow women to use their sexuality to its maximum ability to provide her personal pleasure and social benefits, they say. Certainly freedom is moral and coercion usually is not, but this all misses the point. What is actually done with that freedom is of great import.

In truth, there is no removing the controls on female sexuality. Cut out the socialization that previously governed it, and the result is not women who have no longer have any idea how to distribute their sexuality (which is, as always, merely fertility in disguise). Removing the custom settings in a piece of software does not break it; the 'removed' settings are simply set back to their defaults. The default for women is not long-term monogamy and it is not "free love," it is hypergamy and the chaotic quasi-market. Women will be 'controlled,' anyway, but by ancient principles less conducive to social order. This results in a massive increase in female power in the short term, which 'feminists' of course find desirable, but at the expense of older women, men and especially children. These disadvantaged groups constitute a large portion of the population who is not young and female, hence the massive destabilizing effect to civilization as a whole.

Men's comparative advantage—size and strength, i.e. more control over the physical world—was nature's boon to give nearly all men a potential to have a source of value that both complemented and offset women's sexual power. We learned early that giving men unlimited license to make use of this advantage was not conducive to civilization. Controls were imposed that discouraged and punished using physical prowess, also known as violence, to achieve personal aims. The distributed, cumulative gains peaceful trade and coexistence provided to each individual man far outweighed what he could accomplish on his own through violence, and good men happily adhered to these rules.

The righteousness of doing this is clear and obvious to all, but there is no longer such an understanding as it relates to women's social and sexual power. Misandrists have sought to completely eliminate this form of male power, but have conducted the exact opposite campaign with regards to women's power, allowing unlimited license to all powers legal, social, sexual, and indeed, physically violent.

The damage caused by men's unlimited physical license is immediate, visible, and leaves evidence. The damage of hypergamy is not in what happens and is apparent, but rather in what does not happen and must be imagined and extrapolated. To do one thing is to not do literally thousands of alternative actions, and this is where the primary damage can be found. The inefficient distribution of fertility, though we commonly interpret fertility as sexual intercourse itself, manifests indirectly in various ways. That there are often no instant and obviously visible consequences, such as lightning strikes or atmospheric descents, does not mean that superior alternative opportunities have not been lost. It does not mean that we are forced to pay in other ways.

The most present result is the failure to create stable families in which to optimally raise children. Strong families have been the basis of human progress and undermining them, whether intentionally or not, will set humanity back. Often repeated claims that families are obsolete are being proven wrong by the bankruptcy of the West in its unsuccessful attempt to replace the family with communal services and "safety nets" that seek to minimize the impact of failed cultural practices.

The West has taken on the daunting task of putting massive resources toward forcing unlimited female sexual license to 'work.' This is like removing all controls and expectations about violence because we have suddenly decided that it is 'righteous' to do so, and then blowing the size of government to massive proportions to deal with the ensuing problems. The people who remain non-violent would be the only ones in society living with a culture capable of producing more than it consumes, and they would be punished through taxation all so we can maintain the 'right' of people to pursue the maximum social and personal pleasure violence can afford them. The cultural rot of violence inevitably spreads when the natural and logical regulations dis-incentivizing it are covered up by the 'safety net.' Again, civilizational collapse is the result.

The consequences of female promiscuity, and by extension hypergamy, are the same as they have always been for the duration of civilization. The difference now is that governments have bribed women by promising to minimize its effects through various means. Extreme wealth, misandry and a cultural refusal to hold women to account for their actions have all resulted in a situation where hypergamy is able to persist with a purity of execution never before seen. Nearly all the immediate pitfalls have been eliminated, and many of the long term effects are assuaged by many programs that take from productive sectors in an effort to guarantee women's continual financial solvency.

Male and female relations are already rigged in women's favor by the sexual quasi-market, but policies that seek to ensure that there is never an experience of substantial loss in either casual relations or in marriage guarantees that quality deteriorates, just as with comparable artificially maintained monopolies in business.

The "dating market" is none other than the sexual quasi-market

Men and women's psychologies are oriented in such a way that women are the choosers, and they are permanently ensconced in the position of higher virtual value. They will attempt to meet the desires of the few men they are interested in, mainly by flaunting or emulating youth and beauty, but this is not true competition. Nature has assured that most women's reproductive opportunities are sound regardless of their faults, because there are always a multitude of men willing to overlook those issues. Men get no such reprieve, because women on the whole rarely overlook his material and social failings. Most men are stuck in the risky role of competitor, while women are excused from having to increase their quality in any tangible way. It is cultural artifices that can compel women to become better people—not the sexual quasi-market that actually minimizes women's need to socially compete in meaningful ways.

Think of all the money, time, and energy spent on dating in our culture which has forgotten how to efficiently or effectively pair men and women. Think of all the resources that are spent on relationships, both ones that bear fruit and those that do not. Surely, there is satisfaction to be had and value to be found. Generally, humans find it important to have relationships with the other sex, but this attitude actually makes the problem worse. For many people, no amount of repeated failure would compel them to stop putting resources into dating because their psychology so strongly compels them to have relations with the other sex.

The American dating situation has been a massive squandering of resources. It produces a big sack of nothing at the hefty cost of 100 sacks of gold. But, this is exactly what one would expect with the resurgence of the sexual quasi-market. Women, the perpetual buyers, expect resources to be put forward as the price of admission. They want men to demonstrate that they have a desired product, or they move on to evaluate his competitors who will.

The quasi-market of yore at least produced children, whether intentionally or not, and hypergamy tended to ensure that there was at least a bit of quality in the father. Contraception gives men and women the opportunity to circumvent the psychological trick designed to give continuance to the species and experience the benefits of the scam without paying the piper, so to speak. As such, there is no hard cap to warn us on how much we can waste doing this before reaching the final limit: drastic civilizational collapse.

The failure of the quasi-market in the United States

The economic degradation that is now coming to a head has actually been ongoing for about 30 years in the United States. It was around 1980 that governments, businesses, and individuals began to reach deep into the future to falsely claim that the economy was still legitimately growing. The paradigm of leaving the world better than we found it for our children was abandoned when they decided to cover up an ever more inefficient culture and economy by promising that the people of the future would pay for current consumption.

Most of the accomplishment of the new science of leftist Keynesian economics has been to find ways to mask the damage caused by how inefficient Americans have become at solving many problems, not least of which is reproduction and child-rearing. They have done a great enough measure of success that not even most conservatives or libertarians have detected what is really going on. Welfare, stimulus, wealth redistribution, government programs, regulations, and the rest have all become necessary to keep this thing limping along—all so we do not have to face the backward slide caused by cultural values and implements that are not successful at dealing with the harsh realities of life on Earth.

The fact is that the only thing we have proof for is that men can drive humanity forward when placed within the framework of a free market. The reasons for this are varied and these aspects of masculinity have been covered in detail by authors on A Voice For Men.

The deal 'feminists' originally sold us was that women were just as eager and capable of generating wealth if they were allowed complete cultural freedom. From day one, we have been propping up women at outrageous cost both upfront, and in hidden lost opportunities. All markets only work if people are forced, even against their will, to compete fairly. We will never know how far forward women can take humanity until the economic pedestal is shattered.

It may be impossible to allow women freedom to execute their basic programming of hypergamy, just as it is impossible to allow men the freedom to be violent. The costs to society may forever remain too high in both cases. Or, perhaps with time solutions that are currently unimaginable will be discovered. The only certain thing is that we are all unlucky to be born in a time where we must make such sacrifices for the continued progress of our species. Our own ancestors gave up far more than the future's unborn progeny are asking of us now.

The original American experiment has been superseded by an experiment in using the previously produced wealth to promote women socially and economically at the expense of all—including men, women and children, both present and future. The misandry bubble is looming over us and its inevitable collapse threatens to ensure a cultural, economic and governmental dislocation whose results may be entirely unpredictable.

How False Rape Allegations Destroyed My Family

geralddonisi · 31 January 2011 · Archived copy · Original

My family was destroyed by a series of false rape accusations made against me, over a period of several years.

Those words are just a summary, a cursory sketch of the pain, betrayal, hatred, and continuing grief for everyone involved. The true magnitude and scope of the damage is beyond my ability to describe in any way with both brevity and precision. The truth is that I am writing this more than 20 years after the facts, and it is difficult, not because events have faded in memory, but because they are fresh and sharp, and the wounds still raw.

The story I am recounting is for context, so I will keep it as succinct as I am able.

When I was 11 my parents divorced. There was lots of drama, and after the divorce each waged war on the other, using my brother and I as weapons, with apparently no recognition of what impact this would have on us. When I was in my late teens, my Father married his immigrant girlfriend, bringing her and her then 13 year old daughter into our family. My pointing out that she was an immigrant is deliberate, not because I harbour resentment of people seeking new opportunities, but because she escaped from the former nation of Czechoslovakia when the Russians invaded, smuggling her then-3 year old child across the militarized border under cover of night.

I don't know what she went through to accomplish this, but I recognize that it demonstrates a will to survive, and pragmatic mentality. Her daughter was, in her eyes, the vessel in which she placed every ideal, dream and hope.

The practical impact of this was that the daughter never experienced a consequence for her own actions in her life. She could do no wrong, and her formidable, and superficially beautiful mother defended her against all personal accountability.

The child at 13 was a pampered, entitled sociopath, with an attractive face and an athletic figure. Being in my late teens, I simply found her irritating, and frankly I was too busy with life outside the house to take much notice. I did observe her skillful manipulation of her mother, and indirectly, my father, and I consequently avoided contact with her.

At age 18, I moved out on my own, although my bedroom was maintained as my own for some time afterwards. When I was 19, the first of the rape accusations reached me through my father. My brother, several friends, and my father and I had been camping, and it was on the 5 hour drive home, trapped in a vehicle, that he said, "Your stepsister says you've been sexually molesting her."

I was stunned into silence, and when I finally spoke, I asked if he believed her. He did not answer this question, and that hurt me most. The accusations emerged in a muddle over the next several days and weeks, but the key was that my stepsister had been discovered by her mother, nude except for a pair of my underpants, in my old bedroom in the house I no longer lived in. The child's story was that I had forced her into this, forced her to get undressed, forced her to take a pair of my underpants from the chest of drawers, and wear them.

How I actually managed to force a willful 13 year old from the distant location of my apartment in another city wasn't examined. Her mother swallowed the story whole, and the child was rewarded with increased attention, conciliatory gifts, and the unimpeachable political power of her new status as victim. It's likely that she was simply a 13 year old exploring her sexual impulses, and using my old bedroom and the absent figure of a sexually potent older male for her exploration. I could take exception to the pilfering of underwear, but from an intellectual point of view, I get it. I even get the covering story she fabricated when her mother caught her. He forced me. When the individual accused isn't present, and doesn't even live there, it makes sense, it's a safe lie fabricated by a child's mind in a moment of embarrassment.

The reward of attention, status and gifts precipitated additional accusations. The stories overlapped, conflicted with each other and observable reality. The accusations grew more bizarre and outlandish. With the mother, there was no question, her daughter was the perfect child, the centre of her universe. With the mother and daughter a united front, my father didn't dare to openly oppose them.

The accusations, flamboyant and multiplying as they did never went as far as the channels of law enforcement. I wanted charges, and a trial, but being still a teenager in my father's psychological shadow, I acceded when he forbade me from taking these matters to the police. It was the family's great shame, and had to be kept hidden.

This was the wrong approach, because unchallenged by the apparatus of the courts, the terrorism by mother and child escalated. They attacked my father by attacking me. This went on for years in various forms and consumed the members of the family in an ever expanding smog of lies, manipulation, accusation, and hatred. It consumed the considerable wealth of my father, destroyed his career, and scattered us all to the winds. During the divorce of this woman from my father, the child and the mother taunted him by telling him they had invented the accusations of rape against me, and against him which came out during the divorce.

This admission was not recorded, and was not allowed to be heard by the court. It was hear-say.

It has been 10 years since I received death threats. In case you missed it, there never was any molestation, but the damage splashed outwards onto the extended family, and onto friends and colleagues of every member.

It continues to reverberate 20 years later.

That simple, puerile accusation devastated myself and my family, and the lives of everybody it touched.

My accuser never tasted a hint of consequence, and attended a prestigious university paid for by my father's appropriated savings.

A casual reading of the news shows an increasing number of false rape accusations, sometimes by idiotic teenage girls, sometimes by successful female meteorologists on major news channels. The consequences to these false accusers are trivial.

Louise Creighton falsely accused a man she had consensual sex with of raping her. She was sentenced to community service (1). An American Weather Girl reported an imaginary rape committed against her in 2010. If she is convicted, she could face up to a year in jail, or a 1000 dollar fine (2). If anybody thinks these are serious consequences, let me point out that a man convicted of actual rape will go to prison for 10 to 15 years, and will be raped in prison, and possibly killed.

In Canada a New Brunswick woman was recently acquitted of murdering her sleeping husband even after her defence attorney admitted during the trial that she had options besides stabbing him to death (3).

A Freedom Of Information Request (4), made to the Bedfordshire UK Police department on the topic of false rape accusations revealed that in 2008, 12 false accusations were made, while 21 accusations resulted in prosecutions.

This equates to 36% of rape accusations being false in a city of 252,900 individuals in 2008 (5). The same information request included a question about prosecutions for false rape accusation, but provided no answer other than the implicit zero since false rape accusation is not defined as a crime.

Increasingly, the system of law in western societies suspends the concept of accountability for women, while vilifying men, and holding men accountable for an expanding set of issues over which they have no control.

As an aside, what kind of job of protecting and empowering women are we doing by treating them like children without volition or accountability. The false rape accusation is arguably the ultimate expression of women's privilege and the systematized, automated destruction of men. As a free pass to celebrity victimhood, and compensation, there is almost no faster track to social lionization for a woman.

The courts typically protect an accuser with legally mandated anonymity, while a man accused is demolished through the court of public opinion, prior to any inquiry of evidence. In the event that a case is successfully pursued, he faces prison where he will likely be raped by other inmates, or killed. This is what a woman making a false rape accusation threatens a man she accuses.

Some advocates of feminist jurisprudence argue for presumed guilt in rape accusations, a reversal of the normal onus of evidence on an accuser in western criminal law. Guilty by accusation. From a purely pragmatic view, a prison sentence for the crime of murder is a better outcome for a man, than incarceration for the crime of rape. To date, most men falsely accused of rape have not acted from this pragmatic understanding.

The western system of criminal law, in which individuals can settle disputes without resort to retributive violence is transforming under the influence of radical feminist ideology into a system protecting the rights and privileges of only half the population, based on sex.

How far will this trend progress, before reliance on the law is abandoned by the group no longer protected by it. As an individual socialized to avoid violence, I find the prospect of justice through personal vendetta, including violence and murder abhorrent. But I also recognize that the transformation of the law into a tool of apartheid can lead nowhere except to a much more brutal and violent society.

This is what proponents of radical feminism are ultimately pushing for; a much more brutal, and violent society.

I understand that brutality all too well.

Nun Makes False Rape Accusation- Get's Caught

Paul Elam · 1 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Men, I'm here to bring you the latest story from the You Cannot Make This Shit Up Department.
After a nun, one Mary Turcotte, from a Christian Sect in Brooklyn, New York, reported to police that she had been the victim of a vicious sexual assault – by a black man, of course – she finds herself singing a different hymn – ahem, tune.
Police became a little suspicious when The Lying Nun claimed that she was attacked, choked into unconsciousness, and then dragged eight city blocks – in her habit – to the place she was raped, by a 6' 4" 250 pound African American male.
Despite the top notch police work that detected some improbabilities in her story – not the least of which was a large black man dragging an unconscious nun in full cloth through that much city real estate without someone taking notice, they conducted a manhunt for the proposed perp. One might only speculate how long it would have taken them to find someone to arrest if some Johnny on the Spot detective had not managed to sleuth up the truth.
Details of her coming clean are not available, but I am speculating the conversation went something like this:
Police: Sister, I know this is difficult, but how many attackers were there?
Sister Mary: One.
Police: How many?
Sister Mary: Well, nun.
Sorry, couldn't resist.
Not left up to satirical speculation, however, is the excuse that the wayward Sister gave police for fabricating the rape story. She was banging a bodega worker inside the sects convent and didn't want anyone to find out.
It is one of the terrible triad of reasons that up to an estimated 45% of all rape allegations turn out to be fraudulent. Those reasons are one, to cover up consensual sex, as was the case here. The other two are attention seeking and as a weapon for revenge.
The fact that this particular false rape story, in a culture that produces them as often as it does real ones, happened to involve a woman of the cloth is just an interesting twist. As we are finding out more and more frequently, women lie about being raped all the time. The last one in the news, as you might recall, was WABC weather girl Heidi Jones, also of New York. Her excuse was seeking attention, the second in the terrible triad.
But there is another plot turn in this story that one might speculate is piling another lie on top of too many already told.
Another woman at the convent who answered the door and briefly responded to questions asserted that the bodega boy boffing Bride O' Christ made that story up too; that there was no sex, consensual or otherwise. The woman refused to identify herself.
Imagine that.
Ah, just a little more creativity with the facts and the convent remains pristine. Well, except for all that fucking and lying going on. Those interested in doing clean up after a mess like this have simply taken a play out of the False Rape accusation play book.
No atonement required. Not from the police, who of course are not pressing charges, and not from the "church" either.
Hail Mary, full of shit.

A Brief Comment on Comments

Paul Elam · 2 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

By Paul Elam

For some time I have been considering the comment policy on this site. Actually, I have been rather proud of the fact that we have not really needed one. The regulars here are by and large an educated, intelligent group of what I think are very sophisticated thinkers. Consequently, there has been only a handful of people banned, and the one major flame war was a spillover from another site.

But those events, and some that my be currently developing, have caused me to consider the future of AVfM, both with this site and the upcoming radio show. I think the time has come to consider the shape in which this place will be molded.

So I am amending the largely non existent comment policy based on that consideration. I will say from the beginning, in case anyone has concerns, that our "palatability" for the MSM, or our appeal to mainstream sensibilities, is not in consideration. Indeed, the MSM and mainstream sensibilities are a large part of the enemy we are fighting. To both entities I easily say – Fuck Off and Die.

And the idea that we are trying to find any type of common ground with feminists is similarly inapplicable. I don't want to share ground with people who are up to their nostrils in their own bullshit.

My concerns are more internal to the MM, and more specifically to AVfM.

This is an activist oriented website with the mission to confront feminism, manginism, white knightism and any other mentality that serves as a breeding ground for misandry or that promotes a utilitarian, disposable view of men and boys.

We are a collection of very diverse international voices; male and female, straight and gay. And we cross, even transcend, all traditional political lines.

It is exactly what I had hoped for when we started, and then some.

But we are not like most other "forums." We have a comment section here, and one that is well used, but it is not the free for all that is so common to many places on the internet.

And there is a good reason for that. We, and I know I am speaking for more than just myself when I say this, are on a mission here. This is not a place for mental masturbation or pissing in the wind. And our comments, while often containing the understandably vented frustrations of modern men in a misandric zeitgeist, is not a place for target practice against anyone who contributes here, by fulminating malcontents.

I say this after just having read a comment in the admin from someone who listed their url as a relatively well known MRA type forum, but who came here for the first time to make a statement that was nothing more than a derisive personal attack on one of our writers.

I flicked the comment into the spam folder like it was a booger going out the car window. I never even slowed down.

The people who have dedicated their time, energy and talent to contribute to this site are the one and only reason we are enjoying such success.

They are not above criticism, but they will be treated with respect. And the same goes for the readers who post all these thoughtful comments. Disagree with them all you want, and give it your best shot to debunk their ideas. Most of us love that sort of thing.

But pull a shame trip or just try to stir trouble and you run afoul of the mission.

And I value that mission more than anything else.

I know there will some that cry censorship. And they are right. This is not a free speech zone in the truest sense of the word. There is a great deal of latitude about what is posted, but I am also lacking the interest and time to educate grown men and women about what is helpful to this mission and what is not.

So far, we are talking about a tiny minority. But as time passes the challenge to stay mission specific and constructive will be increased.

It is not going to be a problem I have to address after the damage is done.

Texas Attorney General Can't Cite "Tens of Thousands" of Super Bowl Sex Slaves Figure

Chuck Ross · 2 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In the second meeting of the Texas Human Trafficking Prevention Task Force held November 17, 2010, state Attorney General Greg Abbott said, "Recent Super Bowls provide a sobering picture of what can happen …The Florida Coalition Against Human Trafficking (FCAHT) reported that tens of thousands of women and minors were trafficked in the Miami area during the last Super Bowl."

In response to the "scourge" of human sex trafficking at recent Super Bowls, Texas law enforcement agencies – in conjunction with federal organizations – are "preparing for the worst," according to Texas AG spokesman Jerry Strickland. Strickland said that twelve undercover agents and many others around the periphery are being mobilized to handle the expected influx of pimps, johns, and sex slaves.

While Strickland couldn't comment on the "tens of thousands" figure that Abbott cited in his speech, he did say that "anecdotally thousands came into the area for illegal activity."

Organizers at FCAHT were unsure why their organization was cited as a source for the attorney general's large figure even though both sides had engaged in a "lengthy conversation" regarding the Coalition's work during the Miami and Tampa games the past two years. Founder and CEO Anna Rodriguez, said that she "had no idea" why the Texas Attorney General cited her organization for the "tens of thousands" number, and that "it doesn't matter who said what" in regards to the estimated number of illegally trafficked sex workers.

Besides the twelve undercover agents and other periphery agents, state law enforcement agents have been conducting training for local law enforcement agencies in methods to deal with the sex trafficking threat. The FBI also plans to increase the resources it dedicates to the efforts to fight sex trafficking at the game by sending 10 additional agents, analysts, and supervisors. Five major airline companies are offering training to their flight crews and staff to help them recognize the signs of human sex trafficking and how to deal with it.

Another FCAHT organizer, Giselle Rodriguez, said that Abbott's citation was "possibly a misquote" and that she wouldn't say that it's true that tens of thousands of sex trafficking victims descended in the southern Florida area for last year's big game.

Rodriguez said, "There were sex workers present. In the whole sex industry [including non-trafficked workers], thousands were there. For example, at the Super Bowl in Tampa [in 2009], a strip club that usually had 20 dancers on a typical night had 100 during the [Super Bowl] weekend. On Craigslist, where there were usually 50-80 ads for escorts on a typical weekend, there were 400 during the Super Bowl."

Rodriguez stressed that victims of sex trafficking were rescued by her organization and others during the previous two Super Bowls. Her statement corroborates those made by AG Abbott in his message to the Texas Task Force in which he said that 12 trafficking victims were picked up at both the Tampa and Miami Super Bowls in 2009 and 2010.

But Rodriguez said that it was hard to say how many sex workers were trafficked for those Super Bowls. This measurement difficulty is shared by the U.S. State Department:

> "The data and methodologies for estimating the prevalence of human trafficking globally and nationally are not well developed, and therefore estimates have varied widely and changed significantly over time."

As an example of the difficulty in measuring sex trafficking victims, the State Department initially estimated that 50,000 victims were trafficked into the U.S. for sex each year, but they have since revised the estimate downward to between 14,500 and 17,500.

Domestic estimates are also hard to come by. Richard Estes and Neil Weiner, professors from the University of Pennsylvania, have provided the most widely cited statistics in the field of study. Their research has been included in State Department reports which have also filtered down to various activist and community outreach organizations. Estes and Weiner developed figures for youth "at risk" for sex trafficking. They determined that about 300,000 American youth are at risk for sex trafficking each year based on several "feeder" factors such as poverty, family problems, drug use, and homelessness.

To arrive at their estimate for "at risk" youth, Estes and Weiner used statistical reference guides to add up the number of youth who fit into the various "feeder" categories. This includes categories as wide-ranging as the number of homeless youth – which contributed 90,000 to the "at risk" total – and the number of 13-17 year-olds who live within driving distance of Mexico or Canada; this group contributed 14,000 to the "at risk" tally.
Despite this methodology problem, Attorney General Abbott's estimate seems to have gained traction throughout the media. The Dallas Morning News, The Fort Worth Star Telegram, Fox News, and many blogs and activist websites have cited that figure as a likely scenario for both last year's game in Miami and the one coming up in Dallas.
One particular Texas-based anti-trafficking group called Traffick911 has organized a campaign to spread information about the prevalence of domestic sex trafficking. They have customized information placards and their website to highlight the magnitude of the sex trafficking problem in the nation's second-largest state.
Traffick911 has included two NFL players and two musicians in self-produced public service announcement (PSA) videos to help draw national attention to their effort. One video features Dallas Cowboys defensive end Jay Ratliff. Ratliff, speaking directly to men who are the eventual customers of sex trafficking – whether to their knowledge or not – says:

> "I'm mad. Men, I'm talking to you…Real men don't buy children. Real men don't buy sex."

Traffick 911 PSA 10 from Nate Bernard on Vimeo

In an effort to personalize their message, another PSA features a clean cut young man who begins, "I am the face of human sex trafficking," and characterizes his customers as regular guys – "fathers, husbands, teachers, and lawyers."
In another installment, the video opens with the words "Made in America" and then shows a young middle-class girl with braces blowing out the candles of her 13th birthday cake. The next scene opens with the words "SOLD in America" and shows the same girl, years later, laying in a bed on her side – seemingly having finished a trick.

Traffick 911 PSA 6 from Nate Bernard on Vimeo.

A spokesperson for Traffick911 said that the organization was present at the Attorney General's November meeting, but that the "I'm Not Buying It" campaign had already been formulated and put into action.
Traffick911's campaign has been picked up by national activist website Change.org which linked to news stories citing Attorney General Abbott's November speech. Change.org, which in one article suggested that the men who pay for trafficked individuals are paying "to rape them", has gathered over 68,000 e-signatures for their petition aimed at forcing the North Texas Super Bowl Hosting Committee and the NFL to use its clout to spread the message of sex trafficking in Texas and around the country. In a widely circulated e-mail, Change.org wrote:

> "Local anti-trafficking groups have reportedly offered to help the committee use its influence to educate fans and the public about the dangers of child trafficking which could help to prevent thousands of rapes and abuses at America's biggest sporting event.
> But the Host Committee has refused to take meaningful action. And thousands of children will pay the price."

In an email response, Tony Fay, director of communications for the Host Committee, said that his organization has communicated to activists that they have "absolutely no power or sway over anything that happens in stadium or on TV around the game." The NFL even controls the materials that the committee can pass out around town, Fay said. He also maintains that there seems to be a severe breakdown in communication about what exactly the Host Committee's powers are.
The petitioners at Change.org, Amanda Kloer and Melissa Snow, did not respond to information about the hosting committees limited powers. After writing an article about the Super Bowl petition, pro-feminist website

Jezebel.com corrected their piece to account for Fay's statement (brought to the attention of the Jezebel author by this writer).
The Super Bowl takes place this Sunday in Arlington, Texas.

What is Wrong With These Women?

Izzey · 2 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

First, forgive me because I am feeling loquacious, so this may take a few extra moments of your reading time. Add to the mix that I am annoyed, no, appalled, at what I see and hear in the workplace, home, my own social stratum, and let's not forget the notorious eavesdropping that takes place against your will in a subway, bus, elevator, or even the stinking grocery store, where women are babbling away on their cell phones whilst I am trying to remember if I need olive oil.

I hear women giving their men marching orders, or telling them what they want or need, and what screw-ups they are, because they couldn't manage to do "the one little thing I asked you to do" after they worked two jobs to keep their homes out of foreclosure.

I am sure this has nothing to do with my age. Although one may argue that I am fifty one years old, and "times are different since you were young."

I don't fucking think so.

I had a 'romantic' respect for life and family, in spite of the cards that were dealt me. It was probably because of the hardships I endured that I suddenly had a new appreciation for the lives of men. I had to work like one to support my child, alone. There was an accident that changed my life forever and it would thrust me into a male dominated workplace almost instantly. And before the feminists join in I am going to clarify my position on being in the male workplace as a woman.

I worked long hours, broke my ass, came home usually filthy, hurting, and exhausted, and no man in the workplace helped me do my job. There were no 'allowances' made for me being a woman. I took the job, and did the work. I was proud of myself. But I do have to say, that my grandmother helped me get into this place. She worked there through a war building aircraft, while the men were sent off to war to fight – and die – for our country.

I did it out of necessity, and took on tasks that were dangerous. More danger, more money. My daughter lost one parent already, before she was even born. Then silly me, I took on work that would put a roof over our heads and feed us, but there was always a chance that I could be injured. I did it anyway. Just like a man that loved his family.

I would be asked by other women things like "Why are you doing this sort of work? You are a pretty girl, you could have anyone you want."

That's it?

A pretty girl gets the money man? The guy to support her, worship her, take care of every whim? Just because she is pretty? I was supposed to be 'ugly' to do this sort of work?

I was devastated. The love of my life was hit by a drunk truck driver on his motorcycle. My dreams and heart just died on that day. And other women were telling me to shop around for a sugar daddy?

What planet do these women come from? I wasn't raised that way. Real love mattered. Bling did not. I did not learn entitlement from my mother who raised four children with two jobs, alone. My father was a free spirit; an artist, alcoholic; a gifted and tortured man that needed to be free.

Our mother let him go. She did not nail him to the wall, teach us to hate his guts, or even speak badly of him in front of us. I went to live with him in California for two years when I was just nine years old. I thought he was the coolest dad on Earth. Families worked together, loved each other, and helped each other through hard times. Where did that go to? Where am I? I don't recognize this place anymore. When I see a man with arm candy all I think to myself is 'well-kept prostitute' and thank-you-God, that isn't me.

I learned how to be numb, just like a man. I learned sacrifice, just like a man. I would also learn much later in life, that I made some bad choices for myself. But I still have my pride, and, I might add; integrity. I did not sell myself to the highest bidder.

And all those hard working jobs I held? Men paved the way to them. The union contracts? Yup, men fought to get them for me.

I am grateful.

I want to ask the princess bitches of the world, what the fuck are you?

I already know the answer. Easily replaced.
I hope you like living in constant fear that if you do not pop out a couple of insurance policies – those children that get you the brass ring while destroying a loving father's life, and stripping him bare of his worldly possessions – that the next princess may not need botox yet, and be much more warm and gooey, and fertile.
I could never live like that. I lost an extraordinary man. The one true love of my life. I know it has made me who I am today, and in some small way I am grateful for that as well. I wouldn't trade knowing and having that kind of love for the brief time I had it – for anything.

A Soldier's Story: The Travesty of False Allegation

Anonymous Contributor · 3 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

I am 24 years old and currently a veteran of the armed forces. I have served in Iraq twice in the regular army as a combat engineer (infantry with explosives, basically your a jack of all trades). I got out of the army a couple of months ago and I am currently in college.

My story started last summer when we got back from Iraq. My best friend and I went to a night club and long story short I had sex with a woman. This woman was a female soldier and ended up being late to work the next morning. I was on leave at the time, so I didn't have to go too work. She accused me of raping her, because she was going to show up to work drunk and late. This is a huge issue in the armed forces, where you just can't call off work — it would be considered AWOL (absent without leave) or even more serious in cases of wartime, desertion (we are currently at war).

My friend and I were arrested, he was later released. I had to wait at the mp station until 1pm (this all started around 6:30-7am) until the Criminal Investigation Division (CID) showed up. The CID agent tried to get me to talk to him, which probably would have been the dumbest thing I could ever do. I really wanted to, though. I just wanted to scream it out loud I didn't do this, I didn't rape anybody. I wisely said, "I should probably talk to a lawyer."

I was taken to the post clinic where I had a rape kit performed.

To the unknowing, let me explain what this means. They entered my barracks room found a PT shirt and shorts (army workout clothes — think black short shorts and a gray t shirt with the word "ARMY" written in black on the chest). They, of course, couldn't find PT shoes (running shoes) because all my stuff was still at the bottom of my duffel bag (we had just gotten back from Iraq). So they grabbed a pair of crocs. I was taken to a doctor's waiting room, I was told to completely strip naked. While I was naked the CID agent took pictures of every part of me. The doctor then swabbed my penis 2-3 times, then pulled hair from every part of my body. The CID agent took all my clothes, and gave me my army PT shirt and shorts and my crocs. I was then taken to his car where we went to the CID station.

At the CID station I was fingerprinted and told to sit in a room and wait. An hour later he came for me and took me to my units staff duty office. I was given a protection from abuse paper which said I could not come in contact with her or my best friend. I was told I was no longer on leave and I had to report to work the next day at 6:30 a.m.. This all ended for me that day around 3 p.m.. I will never forget the looks the staff duty NCO (non-commisioned officer) and the officers gave me. Like I was some kind of worm; dog shit on the bottom of there shoes.

In the past I have had problems with alcohol. I fixed it and got some healthy drinking habits. This of course blew the lid off of all of that. No one in my platoon was back from leave yet, so I had nobody to talk to. I just had to take the stares, the talking under the breath I heard as I walked past a group of soldiers. Someone started a rumor that when I was at the MP station, someone asked if I raped her and I said, "yeah I did it." That probably sounds ridiculous to you but soldiers gossip about 10 times more, and harder, than any episode of "Desperate Housewives"/"Sex In The City" you have ever seen.

I would go out alone and not talk too anybody, just drink my ass off. The army lawyer I was given explained to me that I would probably win my court martial when it happened. It was going to happen because army prosecutors in cases of sexual assault/rape must take it too court martial, unless you proved you weren't even there when the rape occurred, or the victim recanted. He told me he had spoken to CID and they aren't sure about her story so they might ask me to take a polygraph.

I was very skeptical about a polygraph.

The reason for that is simple. I was torturing myself. I drank and thought about it constantly, I thought, maybe, "Had I done it? What if she was black-out drunk? What if she had come out of her black-out with me on top of her? Maybe someone actually thought that I raped her?"

I went over and over in my mind about all of it. I am an intelligent person, I know from watching the History Channel and the Discovery Channel as a child what a polygraph is and how it worked. I just thought about it and thought about it over and over.

So basically in the army unless a victim recants, if you were there or had relations with her, it is going to court martial. The army lawyer told me he might as well specialize in this field. He has had 10ish (years) in at the time that he came to that post. He went on to explain every single case he had won. He was trying to convince the prosecutor downstairs to stop taking them to court martial.

I hated women because of this. I went out to bars at night and didn't talk to anybody. I was even propositioned a few times by attractive women. I told them all to go away and leave me alone. I was very rude about it. the women would usually respond that I was a faggot, bla, bla, bla. Like I said, I was very rude and deserved that response. I had a fear, which continues to this day, of it happening again.

My platoon got back from leave and I once again had people to talk to. No one could believe it. My first sergeant, whom I trusted, took me to his car and had me explain the story. He told me he knows I didn't do it and wouldn't tell anyone we spoke, even if CID came calling. The reason for this is, once again, the army rumor mill. My lawyer told me not too talk to anybody about the case. Let's say I told Sergeant so-so, who later on while playing x box and drinking a beer tells Specialist Snuffy, who while at the motor pool the next day tells Private Jack and Private Black and it turns into some crazy story. CID can then use that story in their investigation. There are no secrets in the military.

I was stop-lossed (forced to remain on active duty) for my second deployment to Iraq. I really should have been out of the military over a year prior. I should have been able to waive the waiting 90 days after a deployment and been able to get out in a month. My plan was to do this and get out in time for the summer semester in college. It was then almost October and the investigation had been going on for 3-4 months.

Sometime later, I was at a hospital with my squad leader for a doctor's appointment. He was about to leave and was going to pick me up in an hour or so when he came back. He told me the investigation was over the victim had recanted, my unit had just gotten the call.

It felt like such a weight was off my shoulders.

I mean, when you see someone on the news accused of a crime you either think they're guilty and condemn them or think there innocent and you empathize. If you know the person and they're a friend, you console them. You say stuff like "the truth will come out, bro," and you're shocked if they are found guilty. However, you don't think about it any farther than that. When I started thinking about it, I realized wow, I could be put in jail for 20+ years for something I did not do. I would be in Fort Leavenworth, my life completely over. When I got out I would have to register as a sex offender. I would literally have to move to Mexico to live anything like a normal life.

It wasn't over for me yet, though. My lawyer called my unit and said he needed to speak with me to tell me all the details. As I walked into his office he was screaming at someone on the phone. He was actually yelling expletives into the phone, I was told to wait outside. As I was ushered into the office he told me to sit down and started reading her statement. In a nutshell it basically said, "I was late and I didn't think IT was going to be a big deal." (meaning, it would not be a big deal if I said he raped me so I wouldn't get in trouble).

My lawyer then explained to me that he was screaming into the phone because even after that statement CID wanted to pursue charges of aggravated sexual assault, which is a lesser charge of rape. I believe that is the charge he said, but it's been a few months. He went on to explain it's completely not legal, it's just the army and their policy on sexual assault and rape in the military. Like I said before, every case goes to court martial, and that apparently means the ones they know have been recanted by the "victims".

On a brighter note, he went on to say that he had teamed up with the prosecutor on this and they both told CID that what they were doing was illegal. The prosecutor was extremely angry because this would have been another case he would of had to bring to trial and lose.

Hopefully.

But for me, the words of that women keep echoing in my head.

"I was late and I didn't think it was going to be a big deal."

Not a fucking big deal? I still feel like ripping shit apart. Not a fucking big deal? She nearly ruined my entire fucking life. I drink all the fucking time, habitually now. I can't bring myself to even talk to women. I fear them. I am a complete and total shut-in. I don't even go out anymore. I just sit in my room drinking and listening to music and playing fucking World of Warcraft.

The leadership in my platoon wanted me to get out of the military quickly because I showing up in the morning hungover and smelling like an open bar. Another set up to ruin my record.
[update]
I was honorably discharged from the military in October. I have been out of the military now for almost half a year and currently a college student.

Abuse Industry Paves the Royal Road to the Welfare State

Carey Roberts · 3 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

In a little-publicized move, California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger recently approved a bill that creates a new multi-million dollar entitlement. Signed into law during the waning months of his second term, Senate Bill 782 bans landlords from kicking out scofflaw tenants who are victims of domestic violence.

The law defines a domestic violence victim as any person who "has filed a report alleging that the protected tenant or the household member is a victim of domestic violence, sexual assault, or stalking." Note "alleging." No evidence or proof is necessary. If you declare yourself a victim, under the law you are.

So a single unproven accusation serves to keep a person high and dry for a good long time — at the expense of flummoxed homeowners across the state.

As the new California act reveals, our nation's domestic violence system has become a back-door entitlement program marked by broad definitions, loose eligibility criteria, and open-ended benefits.

Here's how the clunky system works: The abuse victim must procure a restraining order before services can be rendered. Such no-contact orders drive a nearly impenetrable wedge between the parties, leading Harvard law professor Jeannie Suk to opine our current approach represents a "government-imposed de facto divorce" system.

Social scientists note that family disintegration is primarily to blame for chronic inter-generational poverty. And as Table 35 of this Justice Department report reveals (http://bjs.ojp.usdoj.gov/content/pub/pdf/cvus0702.pdf), crimes of family violence are seven times higher among divorced or separated couples than among persons in intact married relationships.

By promoting family break-up, the self-serving domestic violence industry places victims at greater risk of violence. This guarantees a never-ending supply of grisly 11 o'clock news stories and heart-breaking statistics.

Sadly, it gets worse.

Many states have broadened their definition of child abuse to include the mere witnessing of physical aggression between the parents. Mom slaps dad and junior catches a glimpse, that's child abuse.

Now Child and Protective Services gets into the act. Junior is carted off to a foster home for a couple weeks, if not longer. The stories I've heard about children trapped in the CPS maze, removed from the parents they desperately love, sends my blood pressure skyward.

Then there are the inner workings of the 1996 welfare reform law. Tucked into the back of the law, which goes by the unpronounceable acronym PRWORA, a little-known loophole called the Family Violence Option holds that any domestic violence victim is excused from PRWORA's two-year back-to-work requirement.

How does the federal reform act define domestic violence? According to PRWORA, "mental abuse" is tantamount to physical battering. And how does one go about proving he or she is a victim of mental abuse? Don't be ridiculous. You say you're a victim, you are one. No evidence or proof is necessary.

So each year, taxpayers cough up $63 million to coddle Welfare Queens claiming to be incapacitated by – yes, you guessed it — abusive head games.

Not that breaking up families is enough to satisfy the welfare state. After all, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure! So how, the Abuse Mavens ask, can we discourage persons from tying the knot in the first place?

It's simple. First, we launch public awareness campaigns designed to convince women that their beau is a latent axe-murderer. Watch Lifetime TV — you'll probably see a clip about the "cycle of abuse." Pay a visit to the doctor's, the nurse will ask if your boyfriend ever raises his voice. That's considered abuse these days. Go to the office bathroom, you'll see a sticker advertising the local abuse hotline.

Next we pass laws that selectively gut due process and the presumption of innocence. Soon word gets out — get married and the state may plunder your assets, your home, and your children. Marriage, eligible bachelors decide, is not a smart lifestyle option.

Then we slap a $25 abuse shelter fee on marriage licenses, which sends the scary message that you, married person, may end up looking like the back end of a meat grinder!" (No need to remind newlyweds that abuse rates in the intact family are close to zero.)

Finally, we never, EVER admit that women can be abusive, too. (Shhhhh. All the research shows women are just as likely as men to slap, hit, punch, and kick their mates: www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm . But we can't let that out. Keep it under your hat!)

The Census Bureau recently reported that, for the first time, there are more people in the prime marrying age (25-34 years) who have never been married than are wed. The portion of adults who are married—52% compared with 72% in 1960—is the lowest in history.

So there you have it. Fifteen years after passage of the federal Violence Against Women Act, domestic violence programs have become the hulking engine of marital break-down, a galloping entitlement mindset, and institutionalized welfare dependency.

NFL Must Tackle Super Bowl Abuse Myth (Press Release)

Teri Stoddard · 4 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

PRESS RELEASE

WASHINGTON / February 4, 2011 – A victim rights group is calling on the National Football League to denounce the myth that Super Bowl Sunday is a "day of dread" for victims of abuse. Stop Abusive and Violent Environments – SAVE – believes such claims foster hysteria and trivialize the problem of domestic violence.

The myth dates back to 1993 when a group of activists charged Super Bowl Sunday was "biggest day of the year for violence against women." The myth was later refuted by the Washington Post:http://www.snopes.com/crime/statistics/superbowl.asp

Still, groups like the Crisis Control Center in Texas are using the falsehood to promote its fund-raising efforts. According to a recent Crisis Control Center statement, Super Bowl weekend has "one of the highest incidences of domestic violence and sexual assault than any other weekend during the year."

But Christina Hoff Sommers of the American Enterprise Institute doubts that view. "Women who are at risk for domestic violence are going to be helped by state of the art research and good information. They are not going to be helped by hyperbole and manufactured data," she explained in a recent interview with The Daily Caller.

NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell has recently joined the 15th anniversary team of the National Domestic Violence Hotline, along with other sports figures.

"While we appreciate Commissioner Goodell's efforts to bring attention to the issue of domestic violence, he should also refuse to allow this persistent lie to stereotype NFL players as abusers or to tarnish the family appeal of the annual Super Bowl event," according to SAVE spokesman Philip Cook. "We call on Mr. Goodell to repudiate the Super Bowl Myth as a spurious and blatant distortion of the truth."

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments has recently released a video, "Seven Key Facts about Domestic Violence," that documents how partner abuse is an equal opportunity problem of men and women: http://www.saveservices.org/key-facts/ . SAVE sponsors the TEPA (Training, Education, and Public Awareness) Accreditation program, a quality-assurance initiative:http://www.saveservices.org/service-providers/.

And SAVE will be holding a conference February 24 in Washington DC. Persons who wish to attend "Hoax: The Continuing Distortions of Domestic Abuse" should pre-register here:tstoddard@saveservices.org .

SAVE is a 501(c)3 victim advocacy organization working for evidence-based solutions to domestic violence: www.saveservices.org.

Can This Misandric Woman be Reformed?

Paul Elam · 5 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

As I have stated here numerous times, I don't find much value in any sort of prolonged debate with misandrists, except to the extent that they can serve to illustrate to others how ignorant and misguided (read: Futrelle) they are. Recently, I had a brief exchange with a misandric female, username flip. who had a hissy fit after reading John Hembling's piece "On Marriage."

As is typical, she took a highly reasoned and well articulated critique of marriage and responded to it with a mindlessly shaming and sweeping indictment of men in general. I traded posts with her a couple of times and then gave her a swipe with the ban hammer.

Same shit different day, right?

Well, not exactly. While she did act predictably on all fronts, she also just submitted a post under a different username that was significantly more reasoned. She still doesn't get it, mind you, but there does seem to be an actual attempt at intellectual honesty in her latest effort. And she also manages to add something of value to the discussion here (value being in the eye of the beholder).

So I have decided to post the entirety of our exchanges here for your consideration. I am also approving her last comment where posted and lifting the ban – CONDITIONALLY – on flip to allow her to respond with that username if she wishes. The ban hammer is on the table, but within easy reach.

Anyway, here is the exchange, starting with her first response to Hembling re: marriage:

Flip: you must have been rejected by many women, your mother included, to have turned into such a pessimistic misogynist, hope you do not father any kids as it is obvious your parents must have been assholes, go seek therapy and educate yourself, history will explain to you the reasons for female backlash, you guys have dominated the scene for several thousand years, grabbing power and money, ruling women

BIG QUESTION: HOW MANY WARS DID WOMEN START?

Behind all human misery stand MEN!!!!!

Me: Excuse me, Ms. Cuntforbrains, or if you are male, Mr. Cuntforbrains, first, let me answer your really stupid question.

Which part of history shall we address first? Modern times with heads of state like Margaret Thatcher and Golda Mier and Indira Gandhi (It was Mahatma that was the pacifist)?

Or shall we dig further back to Cleopatra and any number of female European monarchs?

History teaches that where women can wage war, they do. The only difference is that they still don't have to fight in them.

You see, this is what makes you a modern feminist. You demand an answer to something, in all caps no less, so self assured that you have just thrust the sword of truth and reason deep into the heart of misogyny.

Only to have it publicly demonstrated that you don't know what the fuck you are talking about. Your complete ignorance of history now paints the entirety of your stupid face like a dripping mess of rotten egg.

Now this is where you slink off, too stupid to know you are intellectually out gunned by any MRA on this site, actually thinking you told someone off.

Flip: I am not a feminist bc I don't believe in "ism" of any kind. I am not cuntforbrains, I am a person. I earn my living, pay my bills and live off noone but my work. Am proud of it.

Margaret Thatcher and Golda Meier were assholes. Cleopatra was put in power by Julius Ceasar and without him she had no power whatsoever.

Elisabeth I ruled England for 40 years and made it peaceful and prosperous.

How about Mr. G.W. – imbecile Bush??? He is the one who deprived you heroic men of civil liberties and right to speak your mind openly. And you hardly peeped. We women opposed the war waged for nothing and eating up billions of dollars and human lives. We argued to protect our right to abortion if we want it and to protect our right to raise our sons so that they do not have to go to Afghanistan and wherever the government likes to attack to exploit other nations.

The anger of men on this website amazes me.
"Anger causes more damage than the situation that caused that anger".
Me: Just so you know why you are a cunt for brains. The point you made was not whether women were assholes. Hell, your presence here settles that one alone.
The point you made was actually a demand to answer your question, and i quote:
" HOW MANY WARS DID WOMEN START?"
And of course you followed that up with the equally stupid and hateful:
Behind all human misery stand MEN!!!!!
So here is your choice, and you only get one chance. Admit that your question was answered with examples of women fostering war, assholes or not.
And admit that you have now just attempted to circumvent that by calling those women assholes. as though that makes them male.
If your next post does not contain at least that much intellectual honesty, your ass is outta here.
Flip: PS to previous: How about all those male heroes of Wall Street, Madoff, the idiot Alan Greenspan, the idiot Bernanke, the almost forgotten Enron???? Was any of them female? Those males caused you males more damage than any woman ever did.
Me: Drops ban hammer as promised.
And then comes her most recent comment submitted under username, here. There is a great deal I have to say about it, including the fact that much of it still stinks. But I did think parts of it were interesting, even if misguided. So I am holding most of my commenting for the comments section. I have only edited her comment only to the extent that I put it in paragraphs so it would not be such an eye killer.
here: Here I am again under a different name. Can't resist. You banned me but…
I digged around and found your website. Interesting and I wholeheartedly agree with you on most points. I am slowly coming over to your side. You declared me intellectually dishonest but you were wrong.
I tried to post a reply that you were technically correct about me not answering your question right. But that is irrelevant now. I tried to say that I came across the website page by an accident while looking for something else. But now it captivates me. Especially your referring to Marxism. I come from a formerly Marxist communist country. I was born in the fifties under a totalitarian communist regime and know extremely well what it did to men and women and family. Noone in US knows the details.
The communist government passed a law that every citizen had to work, man or woman. For a woman to stay at home raising her children and being provided for by a man, was a parasitism punishable by a criminal law by a jail sentence of 2 years. Overnight, every man was stripped of a right to provide for and run his family life his own way. 6 mos later the government created nurseries and daycare centres for children. From then on, women were hauling their crying infants to government nurseries at 7 am and their crying toddlers and preschoolers to government daycare centres at 7 am. The next step? Four months later, the government passed a law that all children belong to the government, they are a state property and parents are just caregivers approved by the state. Anytime the state thinks it necessary, it can remove the children from the family and put them in the government run care. (They did in cases of gifted children, took them away from family and put them in sports/arts etc. oriented institutions and the children could only see their families once every 6 mos until they became totally alienated from their families – most of our athletes grew up in government care).
The government stripped men of their right and ability to protect and provide for their families. It's coming. It is long in coming because of government not having enough money to spend on nurseries and daycares. But when it comes, with the laws associated with it, then men will have no access to their children. The women will be used as tools to put this into motion.
When I came here, I went into a culture shock observing women. Every one of them acted so entitled. Such a high self-esteem. I and my countrymen/women, we used to laugh about women here being so eluded and tricked on the subject of diamond engagement rings. Nobody in Europe wears or has an engagement ring. That is totally American!!!! People only have wedding bands. Ha ha! De Beers TV propaganda. We joke: what if all women decide to sell their 1 carats on the same day? Will anyone buy? Diamonds that have no actual value? American women are full of themselves. Huge egos. Huge shopaholics. Filling some empty void within themselves. Instead of spending money on plastic surgeries, cosmetics etc., why don't you look into poverty in the rest of the world? Poverty quite often caused by US politics. And instead of buying that item to make you look irresistible to men, give something to the impoverished? You can't buy youth, we all have to die!

Back to your main subject. Yes, if I were an American man, I would: never marry my compatriot. If in need of marriage and family, I would look elsewhere.
In closure: yes to your issue. Big yes. But please, only apply it to American females! The rest of us females from other parts of the world, we are quite fine, we work, pay our bills and take care of our kids.
Good day to you and you can ban me again. Just don't call me c-for brains. I am a very ordinary down to earth person. I am also someone's mother.

Understanding the Dumb Choices Women Make

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 6 February 2011 · Archived copy · Original

We need to get some facts straight regarding the way that women make choices, and that's what this article is about. Let's begin with Assanova's reference to Evolutionary Psychology:

> Women are attracted to dominant men because their instincts tell them to be. Instincts don't care whether the guy is abusive of not. Instincts only care what is best for a woman's offspring, and that is a man with power. So what if the man is abusive (or one of the other bad labels that are associated with dominant men) or not? Instincts only recognize power, regardless of what form it comes in. His clear show of dominance over women is also a show of dominance over many men, which guarantees her offspring lots of resources and the best chance of survival.

With due respect to Assanova (and in recognition of his invaluable contributions to Game theory and the workings of the female mind), this evolutionary psychology perspective that women are drawn to dominant men because it "guarantees her offspring lots of resources and the best chance of survival" is a load of EP poppycock. It sheds no light on the primal forces that motivate women. And while being provided for is an important motivator in the psychology of women, it is not primal (first cause).

The "primal forces" that motivate women relate principally to resistance to change, narcissism and fear… for example, fear of being left on the shelf, fear of not finding a provider to provide for her, fear of novelty and fear of the unknown. David DeAngelo tells us that attraction isn't a choice, and on this, we can only concur. The thing that excites women about dominant men does not relate to anything as calculated as guaranteeing offspring with lots of resources. That's nonsense. While women are attracted to power and success, they are never attracted to plodding providers. And you only have to look at women's dumb choices to realize that if we left it up to them, the next generation would be swinging from tree to tree. What excites women about dominant men has less to do with the banal priorities of being provided for than it does with the simple exhilaration of narcissism, novelty and danger. Being provided for is extremely important to women, it is even a priority, but it is not primal. It does not account for when women throw caution to the wind. It does not explain why women's menageries of mediocrity typically include thugs, slobs and losers.

In the longer term, dull, safe, beta providers do feature prominently in women's more calculated choices. But when it comes to primal sex, it is the thrill of the forbidden, with all its attendant risks, that explains women's more impulsive choices, from sports jocks, psychopaths and serial killers, tothugs, rapists and violent criminals

It would appear that Otto Weininger was on the right track when he suggested a relationship between criminality and prostitution (which today, arguably, manifests as raunch culture).

The role of self-esteem

Remember the so-called bell-curve distribution for men and women? Women tend to bunch towards the middle of the bell-curve. They don't like extremes, and prefer conformity and middle-of-the-road to excelling and drawing attention to oneself. Men, by contrast, populate a flatter bell-curve, with larger proportions of men gathering in the tails of the distribution, from the extremely stupid to the extremely smart. The upshot of all of this is that when hypergamous women, typically clustered towards the middle of the bell-curve, select for the best among men at the upper tail of the bell-curve, an unavoidable crisis of confidence emerges. How can someone "average" perceive herself as an equal with someone who excels and stands out from the crowd? At a deeply visceral level, average will always feel itself to be something less than superior. The only tangible thing that a woman has to offer – her "looks" as defined by her biology – can only ever be perceived as something less than the smarts that she so admires in men at the higher levels of the pecking order and the far right tail of the bell-curve. There is no circumventing this cruel fate that awaits women. No amount of affirmative action can remedy this.

It therefore makes sense that while hypergamous women seek out superior men, they really do feel more comfortable with average men who, like they, are clustered around the middle of the bell-curve. There is an obvious conflict here, the basis for a cognitive dissonance that makes it difficult for women to reconcile their hypergamous impulses with their inherent inferiority complex. In this context, we are better placed to explore the breadth of women's choices, from the ridiculous to the extreme.

Let's take a closer look at the sorts of dynamics that account for men's and women's distribution curves.

The gender that provides and protects is constantly exposed to risk and danger. Men are constantly putting their lives on the line, in one form or another. Men are constantly testing their assumptions, constantly developing their strategies and their identities. At the cutting edge of cultural evolution, men's survival depends on logic and rationality.

The gender that is provided for and protected, by contrast, is constantly shielded from risk and danger. Women have assumptions passed on to them from their mothers and their peer groups. As creatures of conformity, they rarely have their assumptions tested. Women prefer to assume and conform than to test or compete. Women subscribe to the laws of relational aggression, where popularity represents the height of personal achievement. Popularity and not logic or rationality provides the basis for personal "esteem".

It is therefore inevitable that the gender that provides and protects will define itself from a perspective of positive self-esteem, while the best that the protected, provided-for gender can hope to achieve is the less resilient self-esteem grounded in popularity. And when you base your sense of worth on the opinions of others, well, that's hardly empowering, is it? It is impossible to establish a robust sense of self-esteem when narcissism is your passion and popularity provides the foundation on which it is built.

But wait! Have women not achieved parity with men in the workplace, thus demonstrating that women are every bit as reliable as men, every bit as capable of providing-for as men? Not at all. But have women not also earned the right to "respect" for their ability to achieve? Absolutely not.

Women's "parity" with men could not have occurred without affirmative action. Affirmative action is the essential ingredient that enables the masquerading of women's supposed "equality" with men. But the reality of the dynamics of men's and women's positive and negative self-esteem always plays out in the fresh air of the sexual marketplace. Thus respect and competition are crucial to a man's identity, while belonging and agreeability are crucial to a woman's. And it is at this juncture that properly deployed Game provides its greatest impact. A man with neither self-respect nor Game will never be attractive to women. If a man cannot project confidence, he may still find utility as a provider, or maybe even an arbitrary hook-up with a drunk or a slut who fails to detect his ruse, but he will never make a woman feel sexy (the way that sexual dynamics work is, in a nutshell, men desire, women are desired, and the idea of men as being "sexy" is a feminist-inspired absurdity).

We are right to have our reservations with mainstream interpretations of Game. However, insofar as Game has a place in dating strategy, implicit in the effective deployment of Game is the essential assumption that the woman's frame of reference is always in submission to the man. Busting on a woman, teasing her, not taking anything she says seriously – all in a good-natured, humorous way, of course – cannot be done without this assumption. And confidence is how you pull it off. Confidence lies at the heart of what makes a man interesting. You cannot "pretend" confidence.

It is the confidence/submission duality that provides the basis for Game.

Women's low self-esteem and the auto-spook response

Getting back to David DeAngelo's view that for women, attraction isn't a choice. Given that a man cannot pretend confidence and a woman cannot pretend desire (we're not talking about faking orgasms), then this inherently places female eroticism in a position of submission to the male. It cannot be any other way. The sex that is protected and provided for can never embrace empowerment as can the sex that protects and provides. This is much more than a matter of degree. It represents a paradigmatic shift in perspective that, especially for women, can never be traversed.

In terms of what motivates female desire towards men, it is respect for the formidable. Women are drawn to formidable men. At a primal level, they are drawn to men that they can respect and look up to. And so while women often find beta providers useful, supplicating betas are not the types of men that women really notice.

"Formidable" covers a broad spectrum of male stereotypes, from successful and charismatic to brooding and mysterious, from cocky sports jock to violent thug. Supplicating betas and omegas are excluded from this spectrum.

Women's more fragile self-esteem has important consequences. At the gut level of attraction is also fear. Hypergamous women in search of the alpha stud will work themselves into a lather of anticipation. Should a woman encounter the man of her dreams, her first impulse is to spook. Seemingly, she will often go out of her way to jeopardize everything that she had ever dreamt of. She will clam up and play hard-to-get. It is important to realize that this is less a strategy than it is an emotional response to emotionally draining anticipation. Nincompoops like the authors of "The Rules" might strategize deception and evasiveness for the typical Oprah Winfrey audience, but at a more visceral level, playing hard-to-get should never be interpreted as a strategy. Irrespective of whether it is implemented as a strategy, being spooked is just what women do.

Remember that just as DeAngelo assures us that attraction isn't a choice, so too, a woman's angst of anticipation isn't a choice. The lower self-esteem implicit in female sexuality places her knight-in-shining armour (KISA) upon a pedestal to reliably thwart any chance of her dream-beau being realized – that is, if it was left entirely to her. Unless her KISA has Game and can harness her auto-spook response (busting on her, cocky-and-funny), she will lose him. An important part of Game is to disarm a woman's auto-spook response, to make her feel comfortable, relaxed and at peace with the world.

As I've mentioned, women are drawn to formidable men. Just because a KISA might fail the initial introductory phase of an approach does not necessarily mean that he's mucked up his Game. It is just as likely that she has mucked up her auto-spook response by over-reacting and heading for the hills.

Arrogance is hot. Supplicating arrogance is not. The very thing that women find attractive in men is the very thing that militates against the realization of their dream KISA. Supplication and arrogance represent a contradiction in terms and it is for this reason that a man needs to implement some version of Game in order to harness most women's auto-spook responses. Western women need to be babied, and this has to be done whilst retaining the mystery that embodies masculine respectability. It goes without saying that this is inherently not an easy task. In the absence of proper training, it is not easy being a KISA, managing that fine line between self-respect and supplication.

In the end, of course, most western women never obtain their dream KISA, and they finish up making compromises. Their rationalization hamster will reassure them that it's not their fault, but that of their KISA. They will conclude either that he is not interested in them, or that he has failed their shit-tests by failing to be persistent enough. They are thus just as likely to rationalize that all men are insensitive, unfeeling brutes. It never occurs to them that perhaps they should learn to tame their rationalization hamster, that they should ignore The Rules and the proliferation of self-styled guruettes advising women how to snare their beau. Typically, they lower their sites, often settling for the first slob that lunges a second grope, and then calling it love.

After years of having their dream of a KISA dashed upon the rocks in the swirling surf below, western women learn to not expect much of men (beyond the superficial characteristics that supposedly identify alphas). KISAs become gay, betas become providers, omegas become manginas, provided-for women get bored, divorced women become cougars, chumps become husbands and slobs get lucky. The system auto-corrects to the wonderful solution to which we bear witness today. Our zeitgeist becomes a vast sea of arbitrariness where we can expect to see our future generations swinging from tree to tree in Bonobo nirvana. The cultural system develops an auto-immune response that attacks things like honor and virtue, establishing cultural destiny as a cesspool of mediocrity.

The power of projection

The differences in the ways in which men and women think call for a very different strategy in interpreting and understanding our opposite sex. We should never take women's logic literally. We should learn to read between the lines. For example if a woman tells you that she does not like something, do not always assume that she does not like that thing. You've got to read between the lines to understand why she notices that thing, what it is about that thing that relates to her experience of it, and so on. In other words, what is the context behind her dislike? Oftentimes shock and disgust over some thing (such as is typical in women's emotive reactions to rape) betray a fascination with that thing that is reflected in their fantasies, the choices that they make, or some other inadvertent manifestation of their innermost impulses. For example, shock and disgust with rape stories can actually project a fascination with rape and an inclination to fantasize about rape.

And when feminists accuse men of taking advantage of their positions of authority to oppress others, they are projecting. They are telling us what*they* would be doing if they were put in the same positions of authority.
And when feminists complain that it's not fair that only men occupy the most powerful positions of authority, they are projecting. They are telling us that men in power are the only ones that matter. Those men at the lowest ranks working as janitors, labourers and factory hands, don't matter. They're invisible. They don't count.
Let's illustrate the importance of projection with some more arbitrary examples. Consider the following quotations that I had taken from A Voice for Men:
Robin Morgan – former president of the National Organization for Women (NOW) and editor of MS magazine:

> I feel that 'man-hating' is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them.

Former Congresswoman Barbara Jordan:

> I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it.

Catherine MacKinnon:

> All sex, even consensual sex between a married couple, is an act of violence perpetrated against a woman.

Marilyn French; The Woman's Room:

> My feelings about men are the result of my experience. I have little sympathy for them. Like a Jew just released from Dachau, I watch the handsome young Nazi soldier fall writhing to the ground with a bullet in his stomach and I look briefly and walk on. I don't even need to shrug. I simply don't care. What he was, as a person, I mean, what his shames and yearnings were, simply don't matter.

Each of these women is projecting. Compare what they are saying, with your own experiences.
Robin Morgan is telling us that she is a vindictive, hate-filled person. By contrast, I have met men who are capable of taking on an opponent respectfully, impartially and in the spirit of competition, without vindictiveness or hatred.
Barbara Jordan is telling us what she notices and values in men. Cold, arrogant and unfeeling is hot, baby. By contrast, I have met many men who are caring and compassionate.
Catherine MacKinnon is letting her rape fantasies get ahead of her. ëNuff said. On the odd occasion, she even borders on graphic:

> I think that sexual desire in women, at least in this culture, is socially constructed as that by which we come to want our own self-annihilation. That is, our subordination is eroticized in and as female; in fact, we get off on it to a degree, if nowhere near as much as men do. This is our stake in this system that is not in our interest, our stake in this system that is killing us.

Mmmm… sounds like the basis for a yummy rape fantasy.
And, saving the best to last, what is it that gets Marilyn French's panties all hot and wet? Well, nothing less than a "handsome young nazi soldier". What is Marilyn French really telling us about her true values and what she expects of men? "My feelings about men are the result of my experience." Indeed. Here she is admitting to the very choices that she has made in men, and her inadvertent candour provides a welcome change.

Of course the reality is that whenever we open our mouths, irrespective of whether we are men or women, we project something of what we value, what we notice. But there's a key difference between men and women as to what can be inferred from the projection. Men focus on the "external" (career, hobbies, interests), while women focus on the "internal" (me, me, me, I, me, I want, I need, I hurt). Projection of a passion for motor sports is thus not quite as insightful as the projection of spiteful contempt.

More on women's dumb choices

The subject of women's dumb choices is a deeply complex one. Questions of double standards abound, not to mention the question of how intelligence is measured. Roissy's takes on the Duke Rejection List and the preference of many women for jerks are compelling, well written and entertaining, and they do indeed resonate with a fundamental truth about women's dumb choices. Roissy's gifted contributions continue to provide us with powerful insights.

But then as a guru of the seduction community, Roissy holds Game in undeserved high esteem, in the implicit assumption that there exists some kind of standard, tending to objectivity, for assessing womanly worth. Thus, according to this golden standard, the 9s and 10s that have been anointed by alphas are the real deal and their alpha choices, in turn, validate alpha reality. But we should be clear that, within the broader context of Game, Roissy writes from the perspective of the cultural ecosystem that he inhabits. Within the ecosystem comprising nightclubs, singles and the seduction community, properly deployed Game can work quite well, if you accept their definitions of alpha dominance, female hypergamy and female attractiveness. But the more brutal truth is that women do not always choose alphas. Women do not always go for "the pick of the bunch". Insofar as one might be tempted to regard frat-boys and jerks as somehow occupying the top of "the" pecking-order, there are other pecking orders, other bunches that do not work well with Roissyesque Game theory. Women choose for a complex of reasons that include security, circles of acquaintances, peer pressure, parental pressure, dumb luck, and so on. Game does not always work. Sometimes it can work against you, if a woman perceives you as a player and she prioritizes security. The bottom line is that Game theory's ranking system itself does not provide a reliable estimator of womanly smarts. Indeed, Roissyesque Game theory works because it is based on the implicit presumption that women are less intelligent than men, and, by inference, that their choices are vulnerable to easy manipulation. There are some men for whom this kind of shallow, cosmetically-masked, narcissistic woman, regardless of her perceived standing as a 9 or a 10, is simply not all that appealing.

Ultimately, neither men nor women have a clue about their opposite sex. This ignorance works mostly against women. How often do "liberated" women feign the licking of lips in their expression of faux-lust for the hot, grease-covered mechanic, or the bare-chested, hose-carrying fireman? Give me a break. These images don't interest women. Their faux-lusting for bare-chested "hunks" just makes women look stupid and deluded. Women don't have a clue either about men or their own sexuality. The ignorance of women is positively dangerous.

In the spirit of the Duke Rejection List, consider the 2009 Cronulla Sharks scandal (transcript here) where a team of Australian Rugby League players participated in group sex with a 19-year-old university student ("Clare" – not her real name) while on a tour in New Zealand. As it turns out, she was naÔve and misguided at the time and apparently, did not fit the profile that we would normally expect of a gang-banger. During the Four Corners interview, Detective Sgt Neville Jenkins of the Christchurch Police said that "she was a nice girl. She was young, um naÔve, not worldly, just a growing up teenager."

From the Four Corners transcript, it would appear that the Cronulla Sharks team members thought their gang-bang in a Christchurch hotel in New Zealand was all great fun and a terrific joke, a boisterous bonding experience replete with banter, hilarity and wholesome groping and masturbation lavished upon a willing participant. By inference, if we read between the lines, it would seem that "Clare" presumably complied in silent confusion, stunned into passive compliance and not comprehending the reality of what was taking place. Hilarious. Whatever she was hoping to experience as fawning attention from a couple of manly men quickly degenerated into something that had more in common with Sharks in a feeding frenzy on a lone, mutilated carcass bobbing up and down with the waves in a vast blue sea.

The impression one gets is of a misguided social outcast who has failed to connect with her peer groups, seeking male attention and romance in all the wrong places. In this, the story appears to have its parallels with The Atlantic article on the Karen Owen story, including Roissy's aforementioned interpretation and TuckerMax's more compassionate interpretation. The common theme that we all appear to agree on is that there is less female empowerment taking place than misguided, impressionable ignorance culminating in considerable psychic harm. Even clinically cool Roissy gets it that, deep down inside, even the raunchiest slut is not a soulless automaton defined by hormonal impulses:

> …even the raunchiest cockgobblers have a heart inside that beats for a man to love and cherish them above all others. The love of a man, true and loyal, is the slut's white whale.

The reality is that sluts are never 100% dumb party whores, and that if you were stuck with one on a deserted island, chances are that she will become your fawning servant, worshipping every one of your footprints on a remote sandy beach – whether you want her or not. Of course we should point out that there are many kinds of sluts, from toxic bitches who only ever fawn over thugs, to misguided teens searching for identity, who have lost their way. Many a slut, as a social outcast who has failed to connect with her peer groups, will readily forgo her cock carousel lifestyle if only she can encounter the good fortune of stumbling upon but one man who can love her above all others. You can count on it.

And Roissy isn't the only PUA who realizes this stuff. Other PUAs also realize that sluts possess a tender side, try as they might to deny it. Essential to success with women is the ability to make them feel comfortable, to entertain their fantasy that it is a boyfriend-girlfriend relationship that they are in, even if it is only for one night. It's an essential part of the confidence/submission dynamic that I refer to above. As Assanova clarifies:

> Make her feel secure. Even the sluttiest of the slutty women like to feel secure before sleeping with a guy.

So much for feminist fantasies of empowerment and the purported insatiability of rancid cockgobblers asserting their sexual appetites.

Getting back to the gang-bangers. What's going on here? What is it that women don't get? Don't women understand when they are being laughed at, mocked, degraded and ridiculed? Don't they understand that these gang-bang experiences have less to do with empowerment and connecting between women and men than it has with misogynistic male bonding rituals in which the woman serves merely as a prop? Of course at some gut level they will apprehend this. But don't expect them to receive support from feminists or from other women whose shallow identities have been cemented securely into "well-adjusted" peer groups. It's the feminists and their ever-supportive manginas who know an opportunity for masquerading female empowerment when they see one. Their hatred of men exceeds the mounting carnage of impressionable, misguided lives that get tossed aside as collateral damage. Feminists do understand that any suggestion that these experiences are anything but empowering for women could be very damaging to the feminist cause. Of course that possibility would never occur to their supplicating manginas, who, understanding neither men nor women, know never to question the feminist orthodoxy.

The feminist/mangina symbiosis is a very powerful one that relies on two key principles:

- Ultimately the success of feminism depends on a systemic kind of prostitution, where the promise of sexual "freedom" is traded for an assortment of freebies for women at the expense of men, from "equality" by way of affirmative action, to the pussy-pass in laws and gubmint incentives;
- Omegas who have failed to secure their place on the male pecking order can exorcise the bitterness in their hatred of men by becoming supplicating manginas.

Interpreting these stories of women's sexual "empowerment" as tragedies of misspent, misguided youth is not really in the interests either of this kind of prostitution or this kind of mangina. Supplicating manginas are unable to relate to women in a sexual kind of way, so Feminism provides them with the opportunity to at least sniff at her panties, if nothing else.

And there is just one small problem with this collateral damage of misguided lives tossed onto the trash-heap of apparently isolated human misery. It is never just collateral. It is an expression of a culture that values lies and deceit above truth and reality. It is a pervasive dumbing down of humanity where everyone is affected. This is what feminism stands for. This is what feminism looks like. Feminism is the standard-bearer for this kind of "collateral damage". It is a form of collateral damage that cannot happen in any other kind of society.

Unconfirmed reports suggest that "Clare" went on to marry a rugby player from a different team. At one level bizarre, at another level understandable. It all depends on whether the groom was an active participant in the aforementioned team bonding traditions that take place around the Land, or an exile from them. Both participant and exile share a history that "Clare" recognizes and is drawn to. One of them just might provide the best therapy that she could possibly receive, the other, sealing off her escape and assuring her descent into hell.

Does a woman's history of bad experiences matter? Maybe women don't think that it matters. If it was all confined to the genetic code, if it was all about evolutionary psychology and the so-called survival of the fittest, with nature red in tooth and claw, it might make some kind of sense. Genetically superior alpha studs mating, spreading their seed… can't complain about that, can we? Where's the problem?

Perhaps we can start by suggesting that sports jocks do not always represent superior genetic material. One study suggests that footballers have much in common with criminals. I can buy that. It presents problems for the evo-psych crowd though, unless they accept that there is such a thing as devolution and reversion to a more primitive state, a throwback to apes swinging from tree to tree.
