[image]If there were not such incontrovertible evidence of systemic abuses, these drastic measures would not be necessary. Sadly, the criminal justice system has fallen to the depths of being "Star Struck." The system has lost its impartiality and ethical foundation. Justice is supposed to be blind, but we have seen in "Hollywood" that justice sometimes depends on your net worth and celebrity status.

Mr. Shivers is scheduled to be sentenced on April 24th in Los Angeles Superior Court, Airport Branch in the court of Judge Kathryn Solorzano. What should occur is for Judge Solorzano to delay any sentencing and make a formal request on the record for the Los Angeles County Criminal Grand Jury to convene a panel to investigate not only this case, but the entire system and procedure of the restraining order process.

When we have failures in the system, and when individuals who are in decision making positions fail to exercise common sense, good judgment, ethics and integrity, they must be held accountable, just as we would hold accountable a plumber who fails to properly repair a leaky faucet, or a dentist who causes an injury due to incompetence, or an insurance company that fails to cover a paid auto policy. There should be no difference, but the severity here is magnified by the fact that the entire life of a man or woman can be so greatly and negatively affected by the exploitation of this powerful and unaccountable procedure.

I would ask that readers of A Voice for Men who have intimate knowledge of this case or who have been affected in similar ways write to those entities mentioned in the letter to the L.A. County Criminal Grand Jury and voice their concerns. Letters should be cordial and professional.

It is suggested that any individual who has had similar experiences; when faced with a false restraining order, to prepare a written sworn declaration and submit the declaration to the presiding court in which your case is assigned and include the facts of your case.

You can download forms at http://www.courts.ca.gov/documents/mc030.pdf, the California Court Forms website, use Form MC-030 and MC-031. You do not need an attorney to do this, and your declaration can also be used and sent to any one of the agencies listed. You have the right to free speech; use it.

We have already reached the threshold of "RESTRAINING ORDER TERRORISM" and those who have been victimized are in fact crime victims and should be afforded the same rights as any other crime victim, as dictated by Proposition 9, the California Victims Bill of Rights Act of 2008, otherwise known as "Marsy's Law" http://oag.ca.gov/victimservices/marsys_law.

California Commission on Judicial Performance

http://www.lapdonline.org/police_commission/content_basic_view/1076

This watchdog group should be contacted in lieu of the Internal Affairs Unit as the reality of internal affairs units is that in a great many instances their primary concern is not with the determination of the truth, but rather the reduction to exposure from civil liability.

In smaller agencies, any law enforcement complaint should be directed to the U.S. Department of Justice, Office for Civil Rights, as history has dictated that individual agencies simply cannot be trusted with policing their own, and that an impartial and fair investigation is virtually non-existent.

Additionally; provisions of the California Government Code give immunity to public officers for their acts, even if those acts are illegal, and the Peace Officer Procedural Bill of Rights makes it virtually impossible for the discovery of the results of any internal investigation. It is recommended that if you are the victim of a false restraining order and it involves a law enforcement agency with a correlating family law or criminal case, that you make the complaint in the form of a public court declaration and file it with the court as well as the agency if it so applies. This way, your complaint is a matter of public record, and can be used in other cases involving the same agency or officers.

U.S. Department of Justice, Office for Civil Rights, Office of Justice Programs

http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/about/offices/ocr.htm

This office should be contacted when there is discrimination, First Amendment, or a criminal or civil rights violation involving any agency who operates any domestic violence or sexual assault program who has received federal grant assistance under the Violence Against Women Act. As an example; if your rights have been violated by a fraudulent and perjured restraining order and a particular agency is complicit, then you can file a complaint and request an audit of their federal grant status.

California State Auditor, Bureau of State Audits

http://www.bsa.ca.gov/stimulus/report_fraud

This agency is to be contacted if there has been fraud or discrimination in any domestic violence or sexual assault program that is the recipient of state or federal grant funds that includes private organizations; example, if a private domestic violence shelter receives state or federal funding, and they exclude an individual based on gender, they are in violation of the provisions of their grant, and an audit can be requested.

California Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board

http://www.vcgcb.ca.gov/

This agency should be contacted when you are the victim of a crime to learn the requirements for victim compensation under the California Victim Compensation Program, (CalVCP). Additionally, your local office of the District Attorney should also be contacted to learn additional information on victim compensation. Each state has a version of these agencies and would have to be checked on a state by state basis.

CONCLUSION

It is universally agreed and it is the opinion of this author that the current restraining order system in the State of California as well as in all parts of the country are in a total state of chaos: the exploitation and manipulation of the system is the norm rather than the exception. This abuse hurts true victims of domestic violence and denies them the services that are truly needed. The devastation and trauma to our children caused by this is ongoing and unaddressed.

The case of Francis “Coyote” Shivers and Pauley Perrette is just one of thousands that happen in courtrooms across this country every day. This case is such an outlandish and egregious example of how this system is abused that it must be used as an example in order to give some hope to the tens of thousands who have been forever adversely affected. Thousands of children every year are separated from a parent because of malicious, vindictive campaigns and a system that encourages them to happen.

It is the opinion of this author that this egregious injustice is well beyond the point of any sense of civility and logic. Affected individuals should and must file the appropriate complaints as crime victims to insure the protection of their civil and constitutional rights and due process guarantees.

The abuse of the civil restraining order process is a crime. When information provided to authorities is false or when any person offers perjured testimony while under oath, either in person or in writing, it is the responsibility of the criminal justice system to prosecute them. This applies to any person who conspires with any other person when one of these orders is obtained.

The time has come for the thousands of those falsely accused to speak up, file the appropriate complaints and to make those complaints public. The case of Mr. Shivers and Ms. Perrette has received an enormous amount of media attention and is an outrageous example of the abuses of the system. Those in positions of decision making and responsibility must be pressured to perform their duties free of influence from any special interest group.

Those decision makers are bound by an oath to carry out their duties in a fair and unbiased manner, employing the highest standards of ethics and integrity, and to maintain the public trust in those institutions. It is time for the foundational mindset of the myth of man – bad / woman – victim to be broken and that the entire paradigm, training program, policies, procedure and regime changed to reflect the reality of everyday occurrences in our family, civil and criminal courts.

The definitions of what constitutes domestic violence need to be brought back into the realm of logic and common sense.

Here's a hint folks, turning on a cell phone camera and making dumb comments is not an act of violence. To the mainstream and entertainment media, pull your head out of Pauley Perrette's ass and try accurate reporting for a change. To the members of the judiciary and the law enforcement community, just try doing your jobs, for the people, all of them, not just the celebrities that have you on a leash.

Human rights violations: the price of Oprah's vanity

Dan Perrins · 15 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

April 13, 2013 Oprah Winfrey, the media mogul, made her way into Hamilton on the backs of suffering of children.

My backyard, Hamilton Ontario Canada, that is.

It also brought to town someone we already know and support Can-Fap and Glen Callender. Along with other Intactivists. All of whom I found to be extremely rational and ethical people.

Some video of Callender in Hamilton here More of AVFM coverage and the Intactivists here, here, here, and here, none of it video circumcised. (more to follow later on in the article)

This brought about a serendipitous opportunity for me to beat feet on the pavement and raise my voice, a MHRM voice, out in front of Copps Coliseum in protest of Oprah's promotion and usage of a facial cream made from cells harvested from male genital mutilation.

Genital mutilation is a human rights violation and is in direct conflict of article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Sort of but, not exactly. Genital mutilation is a direct violation of article 3 if you are a girl, if you are a boy your genitals are a valuable and not so secret ingredient for Oprah's skin cream.

The product is called TNS Recovery Complex is was created and is produced by a company called SkinMedica. They claim the facial cream is made from a single foreskin harvested 20 yrs ago. I have a difficult time believing that. Regardless if this claim is true or not, it is still a product, made to profit off of women's vanity, created from a human rights violation. And Oprah is willing to endorse and use it.

I think we need to examine the foreskin before we go any further.

First the foreskin is also known as a prepuce.

I think we need to reproduce the verbatim definition. To help expose bigotry and hypocritical actions engaged in by the general population to Oprah all the way up to the U.N.

Medical Definition of PREPUCE

: foreskin; also : a similar fold investing the clitoris

Something missed by Big Red and the feminist writer Lindy West who red magically forgot to credit for her menopausal diatribe despite it being posted on Red's tumblr on March 29,2013.

If you're like me, as old as me, I believe you will not have paid much attention to that little known part of the body that you were missing from before you could consciously remember. However according to the literature handed out by the intactivists who were out there it is not such a minor body part to be casually cut off.

A man's foreskin will eventually become about 15 square inches of skin with about 4 feet of blood vessels 240 feet of nerves, about 20,ooo specialized nerve endings and is about 1/3 to 1/2 of the total skin that comprises a man's penis.

Here is there is some Intactivist literature, fair warning the last one is graphic and I found to be horrifying: (click images to enlarge)

[image][image]

From the above literature you can see there are a substantial health risks as well as life endangering complications that can and do arise from male genital mutilation.

I have to say the last picture is particularly abhorrent. How anyone could do this to their child is beyond me in these times of information sharing.

The Intactivists, braving the nasty frigid last blast of winter, and jeers from hypocritical, ignorant people, were handing out literature similar to the ones above.

Some of Oprah's fan replies in my video footage were far colder than what the weather was throwing at the Intactivsts. Comments made by Oprah's fawning fans, which are mostly comprised of women and feminists; fans whom she holds sway over in the formation of their opinions.

Oprah Winfrey supports male genital mutilation.

Oprah's endorsement of this product has lead to her fans being supportive of it too, for the sake of female vanity.

You can see this in some of the responses from my footage of the protest. One woman gleefully walks by stating 'its working' funny she wasn't so keen on donating the female version of foreskin called the clitoral hood so she could keep her youthful features. Another tries to shame me by stating 'She (Oprah Winfrey) has done more for this world than you ever will.' Maybe she has, she also endorses a product made from genital mutilation.

Still they came on with comments that made me give my head a shake. One woman says "you guys (protesters) are sick." While the next woman going to the show says "you guys are crazy".

Umm. do you ladies wanna donate your prepuce for some men's grease and grime remover hand cream? It will make our hands really soft and younger looking so you won't have to complain about them feeling rough due to the harsh treatment we put them through to make a living and give you a fair chunk of our wages.

Perhaps Oprah or those woman would like to donate their clitoral hood for the next line of skin rejuvenating cream? They want to look young don't they? No, they want to encourage their inner vanity in the form of outward 'beauty,' and they have no problem hacking off a male body part to get the job done.

Don't even think of going to the well of patriarchy for an excuse. The problem is the vain and callous competition of women for men with resources. The proof of what I claim can be found on any magazine bookshelf.

Still, there are probably a few feminists who are going to say its because those women are brainwashed by the patriarchy. My reply to them is how pathetic is it that feminism considers women to be that mentally weak.

The real problem is that Oprah, a media and social cultivation giant, is profiting from male genital mutilation. Feminists as well are fine with this. It doesn't affect them. It's not 'their body, their choice.' It's a males body and he has no choice.

Radfem 2013 at the London Irish Centre

Radfem has found a new home in 2013—at the London Irish Centre in Camdem.

Recall that last year, "Agent Orange" went undercover to expose Radfem as a hate movement? Following this, Conway Hall (a London convention centre) publicly announced that they had decided not to host a conference for the pro-violence Radfem organisation.

As a quick reminder, here are a couple of the sentiments that were being openly expressed on Radfem Hub:

> "I needs [sic] to be so unfashionable to have boys and then they would be aborted before seeing the light of day just like millions of girls who are aborted every year and no one sees the harm in that. I think secretly many womon [sic] already abort boys they just keep quiet because of the outcry it would initiate!
> ***…
> "I agree with the remark that feminist [sic] have a greater chance of bringing up boys in the 'sisterhood model' but from my own experience that does not work…anymore [sic] than trying to raise your daugthers as out and out feminists…all children are deeply subjected to mainstream patriarchy at a very early age..from the moment they are dressed in pink or blue…you are your hue from birth it seems!!!!!
> "As a RFem….violent revolution is the only answer…"
> Laila Namdarkhan
> (A well known feminist activist who was instrumental in passing legislation in the U.K. regarding the mental health of women in prisons)

And this delightful little gem from a Radfem childcare worker:

> I have honestly have been reassessing the fact that I am giving care to these little future rapists, and what that says about me about me and my separatism. I know it is kinda going against my principle to support and care for these little fuckers.
> Danielle Pynnonen

This year's Radfem event is scheduled for 8th and 9th June 2013, with tickets restricted to females only. As well as being anti-male, Radfem itself is distinctly anti-transgender with many Radfems describing themselves as trans-exclusionary radical feminists. Last year, attendance at Conway Hall was to be strictly limited to "women born women and living as women", as reported by an article in the Guardian newspaper at the time.

Recently, MRA London was contacted by an Irish citizen who had been expressing his concerns to the London Irish Centre venue manager, Tarah Cunynghame, but had got nowhere. He shared with us his email exchange, but requested we do not publish his identity. So for want of a better pseudonym, let's call him Agent Kildare.

Here is the exchange:

From "Agent Kildare":

> Date: 10 April 2013 14:42
> Subject: Query re: RadFem 2013

> Dear London Irish Centre,
> I am writing to you to share my concerns regarding the Centre's hosting of an event in June entitled 'RadFem 2013', a 'gathering of radical feminists'.

> As you may know, Conway Hall declined to host this event last year, citing concerns about equality and the nature of the group itself.
> The radical feminism espoused by those organising this event, has been described as a 'hate ideology'. For example, they do not recognise male-to-female transgender individuals as being women, and this event is open only to what they describe as 'women-born women'. Some argue that transgender women should be 'exterminated', others admittedly do not go that far, but all continue to insist that they are not women at all.
> Some also argue that the male population should be 'reduced' to around 10%. Others campaign against any funding or recognition for male victims of domestic violence and abuse, insisting that domestic violence in the home is suffered exclusively by women. Almost all argue that children should have no rights to a relationship with their father. Over the last few months, radical feminists have violently demonstrated in Toronto, Melbourne and Paris, in one case abusing attendees and threatening speakers at a conference on tackling male suicide. They espouse a fascist, sexist and violent ideology akin to that of the most extreme groups on the far-right. The vast majority of feminists disown and distance themselves from them completely.
> As a Londoner and an Irish citizen, I'm shocked and saddened that the Centre would even consider hosting such a group. It's like waking up one morning and finding out you're hosting the EDL or BNP. I'm amazed that you accepted this booking – and can only assume it's because you were unaware of this group's recent history. If this goes ahead, I can assure you that the centre will be the subject of extensive criticism and perhaps even protests in opposition.
> I would urge you to re-consider this booking.

London Irish Centre reply:

It's a question of this group's views being grossly offensive to many within the Irish community in London. The London Irish Centre is supposed to be a lot more culturally sensitive than this.
> Can you let me have the contact details for your Director please?

> Direct Line. 020 7428 2083

Now, Agent Kildare specifically asked the venue manager for the name of director of the London Irish Centre, but this information was not forthcoming. We also note that while Tarah Cunynghame describes herself as the "London Irish Centre Venue Manager", it appears that she is also working for a separate outfit called "Sliced Events". Interestingly, while there is an email and telephone number for venue hire, the London Irish Centre website fails to give any details of its legal status or its representatives. Although the About Us – Our Team page shows an official looking group photograph, at the time of writing, there is no information on this page—only the statement, "We're currently updating this page."

According to its website, the London Irish Centre is supported by: The Irish Department of Education and Skills, The Irish Youth Foundation, The Amy Winehouse Foundation, Camdem County Council, and The Irish Episcopal Commission for Emigrants.

Now, we cannot and should not attempt to shut-down every event held by some group we disagree with. However, we do intend to send the clear message that the time when men and boys can be attacked with impunity is over. Furthermore, here is a message to The London Irish Centre and to anyone else who feels able to support and provide credibility to Radfem:

We will publicly manacle you to their hateful ideology.

For a case in point, try this: Pamela O'Shaughnessy exposed.

Men's issues on campus: the time has arrived

Paul Elam · 15 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Watching the President of Kappa Sigma initially supporting NCFM's message, then flipping hours after … it became clear the Montana University System is teaching students what to think; no longer instructing these emerging professionals how to do so," ~ NCFM Montana State University Chapter President, Nevada Thompson[/quote]

Kappa Sigma President Aaron Adamski was for an NCFM campus group at the University of Montana before he was against it.

In a sudden and complete reversal of opinion about the formation of an NCFM group, Adamski first said that he had been in touch with Nevada Thompson about NCFM because it sounded like a chance to redefine fraternities in the community.

Said Adamski, "My fraternity wants to fight this image of frats, that we're all womanizing date rapists."

Ah, but that appears to just be the knee-jerk, honest kind of proclamation that could only come from a young man who had not been told how to toe the line, and for whom. But oh what a difference a couple of hours can make. His original statement was published by The Montana Kaimin on March 28.

On the very same day, with who knows what transpiring in the meantime, Adamski fired off a letter to the editor of The Kaimin, obviously written with someone's stiletto lodged in his backside:

> Like many Kaimin readers I was shocked and disheartened by the National Coalition for Men's attempts to set up a chapter at the University of Montana and their attempts to reach out to the fraternities on campus. The brothers of Kappa Sigma feel that the NCFM has no place on this campus and their misguided views will only hinder the progress that has been made in dealing with the issue of rape and abuse at UM. We were founded in 2007 by a diverse group committed to work hard every single day to combat greek [sic] stereotypes. Kappa Sigma was founded specifically with service as the primary purpose, specifically the purpose of protecting women from all forms of violence and abuse. We are proud to participate in causes such as Take Back the Night and Walk A Mile in her shoes. We strongly urge our fellow fraternities to reject the NCFM and their backwards views about women. There is still a lot of work to be done to eliminate rape and abuse in our community and we will continue to be a partner in that effort.

The poor boy was clearly shaken, and nervous. But no bother, he redeemed himself by mentioning all the appropriate campus feminist's causes célèbre, and reassured everyone that his fraternity's raison d'être was to protect women. I can only assume young Aaron is back in good graces with whomever he is afraid of, and is back to being well-behaved.

On April 10, he was continuing to sing for The Kaimin, even if someone else was clearly holding the sheet music up for him (or pulling the cord in the back of his neck). He reported on the sudden and coincidental vote of the Interfraternity Council (IFC) to reject any affiliation with NCFM.

"The general consensus of the IFC and the general consensus of fraternities in general was against this group, because we don't believe that it would help us in anyway," Adamski said, with newfound missionary zeal. "We don't want to build walls when we could build bridges."

Of course, one has to wonder if the walls Adamski is so worried about are those between his fraternity and the community at large, or the potential walls between himself and whoever was telling him his opinion.

Well, we can pretend to wonder if we want to.

At first blush these are disappointing developments. They are reminiscent of Ryerson University in Toronto, Ontario, where two young women and one young man, disturbed by the "hate and intolerance" of violent protests against a lecture on the Boy Crisis by Dr. Warren Farrell at the University of Toronto, decided to push for the formation of a men's issues group at their school.

They were summarily blocked in a kangaroo proceeding by the Ryerson Student's Union, who went as far as to proclaim that any attempt to address the needs of male students on campus would be regarded on its face value as misogyny.

And this is the way this will go, for a while.

As AVFM and NCFM are now working together for the formation of men's issues groups on university campuses, we see this as little more than instructions for how we are to proceed. They are not a roadblock as much as a detour on the road that will eventually enable us to circumvent the obstacles.

And it should come as no surprise. The feminist narrative is the most powerful force on college campuses today. We have seen it at the University of Toronto, where violent protests begin in part with groups sent by that school's women's studies department.

We saw it at Ryerson, where even the idea of men having issues is summarily dismissed as hate. We saw it at Simon Fraser University, where the idea of a men's group was met with equally virulent hostility.

And now we see it at the University of Montana, where a young man naïve enough to imagine that a men's group that actually addressed some of the challenges faced by young men was a good idea, found himself in hot water so quickly that his life has been one big, fat mea culpa ever since.

In the end, though, it won't make any difference. If anyone thinks that the idea of men's issues groups, or the desire for them to be established is going to just go away, they need to crack a few history books. As history shows time and time again, where there is a need, people act, and they do not quit easily.

The need for men's issues groups outside the purview of hateful gender ideologues has never been greater.

The good news is that cooperation from fraternities and student's unions is nice, but hardly necessary. These groups can and will form with or without the approval of organizations already under feminist ideological control. NCFM Montana State University Chapter President, Nevada Thompson told The Kaimin that she is disappointed that NCFM didn't have the support of the fraternities, but that the group is still working to starting a UM chapter next fall.

"We've got a couple of students who really seem interested so we'll be coming down to meet with them," she said. She also said that the group is reaching out to University of Montana professors for support.

On our end here, as we enter more substantive stages of this work, we are charged with developing the infrastructure for guiding and supporting these young people through the maze of bigotry and distortion of their mission that they will face at the average college campus. This is going to take some time, but we are meeting weekly and hope to have the foundation for that infrastructure built within a reasonable amount of time. Personally, I am hoping to have something in place by Fall, but cannot make any promises. It is a mountain of work that must be done correctly the first time.

But it will happen, regardless of how long it takes. There have already been a lot of contacts from interested parties, and we anticipate that will increase with time. Like I said, the need is there, and the resistance and fear of speaking up is beginning to wane. It is no longer if, but when.

Men's issues groups are coming. And I am proud to say that you will be witnessing the documentation of that here, in as much detail as sensible strategy allows me to bring to these pages.

We are winning the PR war

Paul Elam · 16 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

They did not get everything right, but they did something that will strike fear into the heart of every hateful ideologue out there.

They approached balance, and they started addressing the issues.

Everyone, keep doing what you are doing. Never relent!

Zach Rosenberg's son is a rapist

Paul Elam · 16 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The title is not something I just made up for attention. It is straight from the child abusing mouth of Zach Rosenberg, to and about his four year old son, now gracing the pages of the post-Matlack version of the Good Men Project. The unfortunate youngster had informed his father that he had tried to kiss a girl at school, and that the girl didn't like it.

Rosenberg told him that the attempted kiss was rape.

As most of you who follow my writing know, I am a pacifist. I can think of very, very few situations in life, almost none, where I think violence is an answer.

Zach Rosenberg almost tested that today.

What kind of father tells his four year old son that trying to kiss a girl is rape? Take that back, what kind of human being does it? I have literally hundreds of adjectives that come to mind, none of which I will bother sharing here. Besides, I hope that I cannot compete with what you are now thinking yourself.

The real question here is not what kind of human being Zach Rosenberg is. We don't even need to ask because he tells us himself in the article, when he discloses that he is more comfortable talking to his son about rape than he is sex.

There was a twenty minute pause before I starting typing this part of my commentary. That is a rarity for me. I typically form what I want to say in my head it flows out pretty evenly. I have spent more time mentally stuttering on this one than writing. I am simply at a loss on what to say.

I will start with the obvious. Zach Rosenberg is a child abuser. Let me say that again in a headline tag so it will Google all the better.

Zach Rosenberg is a child abuser.

And the abuse he is delivering is sexual, because the sexual shaming of children is sexual abuse. He is so ideologically driven that he is uncomfortable talking with his son about healthy sexuality, but has no problem calling him a rapist as he sits at the dinner table. He has taken the innocence of childhood and criminalized it in the mind of his own child. He has taken his son's normal sense of curiosity and desire to express affection and twisted it into a sex crime.

His son, courtesy of a really fucked-up father, has now internalized the word rape into his personal identity.

That is the thing about childhood, especially at that age. Children see their parents in the light of gods. They are the providers and protectors. They are the teachers and the all-important mirrors of their children's identity. This is why what parents say to children about who and what they are is so goddam important. They internalize it. They become it.

To a four year old, parents are often infallible. If Dad says you raped someone, you did. Even if you don't know what the word really means.

In Zach Rosenberg's narcissistic need to create a Mini-Me of gender ideology, or perhaps just a cheap and base desire to appeal to female readers whose approval he craves, he has sacrificed his four year old boy. Rosenberg has taken what at worst is a common opportunity to teach a boundaries lesson to a child, and turned it into something vile.

OK, I have just spent a few more moments stuttering again, struggling for what else to say. I find that I have nothing. I never want to think about this motherfucking child abusing asshole again for as long as I live.

I will instead close with a note to Lisa Hickey. You know this shit is wrong. Shame on you.

Oh, and one more thing. Some day Zach Rosenberg's son will get old enough to read this. Hopefully by then he will have figured out that it was his father, not him, that is so fucked up.

Memo to my geek guy employees: Avoid these words

August Løvenskiolds · 16 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Gentlemen:

I know that a lot of you have reacted with ~~fear and revulsion~~ concern over the "donglegate" feminist ~~imbroglio~~ empowerment exercise. I know you are looking askance at the female geeks in your midst, the ones you used to enjoy working with, the ones you used to trust, the ones who told you they just wanted to be treated like one of the guys, the ones who you thought just wanted to succeed on their own merits, the ones who covered your ~~ass~~ faults when you needed it, the ones you did all that work for when she was ~~on her period~~ so oppressed by the patriarchy that she didn't feel like working for ~~a week~~ a culture that promotes ~~rape~~ crimes against ~~the vagina-born~~ wimminz, and the ones you once counted as friends.

Most of you are ~~clamming up around~~ disassociating yourselves from your female coworkers and while it is permissible for a woman to retreat from a hostile environment created by men, when the ~~hostile~~ environment created by women is discomfitting to backwards men, your departure is ~~a premature ejaculation & withdrawal~~ a rude, abusive and unacceptable response to ~~an impossible~~ a difficult but manageable situation, and we urge you to "man up" ~~or face the consequences~~.

There is a technique to deal with these feelings and you need to learn it so that you can ~~keep your fucking jobs~~ protect your employment and keep your ~~marriage~~ domestic partnerships and your ~~children~~ putative or nominal offspring alive: its called, ~~walking on eggshells~~ respecting a woman's comfort and feelings about certain words and technical terms spoken in our industry and in her presence.

As part of our commitment to ~~bend over and take it up the ass from every dildo-strap-on-wielding feminist bitch who wakes up in a bad mood~~ our valued and ~~vulnerable~~ liberated female employees, our ~~feminist slavemaster Adria Richards~~ Human Resources Department has compiled a list of troublesome micro computer aggressions and a description of how ~~some crazed harpies~~ reasonable women might find them ~~a vicious chance for worldwide shaming and attention-whoring~~ objectionable.

Some examples from the list:

"computer" – a woman's ~~stupidity~~ sensitive ears and deep womanly understanding render this as "come-put-her", as is in "hey, guys! come-put-her down while we whip out our large dongles!" From now on, the correct term will be "Ada Machine".

"cable" – this is a sexist term that suggests the male sexual organ and so it is always hurtful to women and their beautiful lady parts. From now on, the correct term will be "umbilicus", except in the case where some sort of severing or cutting is contemplated: it is okay to chop off a cable, but one can only attach an umbilicus.

"RAM" – filling a come-put-her with extra RAM denotes a violent act used to hurt and oppress women. From now on, the correct term will be "anniversary reminders".

"ROM" – see "RAM".

"forking" – the delicate ears of women hear this as a portmanteau of "foreplay" and "fucking". From now on, the correct term will be "adopting", and the evil phrase "forking his repo" should be rendered as "adopting her ideology".

"hardware" – the delicate ears of women hear this as an erect penis in a war on women. From now on, the correct female-friendly term will be "happy shoes".

"software" – the delicate ears of women hear this as an flaccid penis disobeying a ravenously horny woman's demands for penetrative sex. From now on, the correct female-friendly term will be "new shoes".

"freeware" – the delicate ears of women hear this as a sale at DSW. This term should only be whispered to a woman so she can get there first.

"monitor" – a monitor is a type of lizard, which is suggestive of the male sex organ, which is oppressive to women. From now on, the correct term will be "bright eye thingy".

"thingy" – a woman's-only term for the penis. Men should instead say "ummmmmm".

"mouse" – eek! Kill it!

"Python" – a Python is a snake, which is oppressive to woman. Don't use this for anything.

"Java" – a Java is a drink served by oppressed secretaries to their male bosses, AND a reminder of the elevator assault on Rebecca Watson. Don't use this for anything.

"C++" – C++ means "Cunt plus Oral plus Anal", a brutal evaluation of women's utility in programming. Don't use this for anything.

"Motherboard" – this term implies that women are only valued when they give birth. From now on, the correct term will be "empoweredbroad", except when it has problems, and then "manboard" is acceptable: "Oops, this manboard is fried. Let's ask a woman to replace it with an empoweredbroad."

"term" – the word "term" is related to pregnancy ("carried to term"), which is a process the patriarchy uses to suppress both women's wages and her access to free abortions. From now on, the correct term for "term" will be "word".

"compiler" – delicate lady ears hear this as a threat to "come pile [on] her". From now on, the correct word will be "interpreter".

"interpreter" – delicate lady ears hear this as a threat to "enter pretty her". From now on, the correct words will be "make it go".

"laptop" – delicate lady ears hear "lap" as a reference to the vaginal area, and "top" as dominant sexual partner. Taken together, these terms oppress women. From now on, the correct word will be "baby Ada Machine" unless the lady is experiencing fertility issues, in which case the words "re-sized Ada Machine" may be used instead.

"Spreadsheet" – delicate lady ears hear this as a vile sexual position on a well-made bed, both of which are oppressive to women. From now on, the correct words will be "math is oppressive for everyone".

"Systems analyst" – delicate lady ears hear this as a threat to sista's in STEM fields to be anally raped. From now on, the correct word will be "smarty".

"worms" and "virus" – delicate lady ears can't handle the fears these words create in their lady brains. Don't say them at all.

"rights" – this is a ~~term~~ word that only ladies are allowed to use. Men have no rights to "rights".

The full list of 113,000 entries is available in corporate headquarters. All male employees will be expected to have mastered this list at birth.

What if you're wrong?

What if you're wrong?

On Thursday 4 April, 2013, that's a question I asked individuals wearing masks, dressed in all black, swatting at me with placards, and shouting through bullhorns.

"MRAs telling lies! We won't fall for your disguise!"

On the campus of the University of Toronto, this was chanted by self-styled feminists wearing masks. Do I need to point out the obvious stupidity of chanting "we wont fall for your disguise" while wearing masks? Their purpose in attending a scheduled presentation was to intimidate, to threaten, to silence and to attempt to prevent anyone from hearing the scheduled presentation by Drs Nathanson and Young. Those two being co-authors of the books Spreading Misandry, Sanctifying Misandry, and Legalizing Misandry.

Although I chose my moments, I asked this question repeatedly, and in answer, got a limited number of responses. The most popular would be that whoever had a megaphone would point it directly into my face, from inches away, to screech one of several chants with renewed volume and force.

"MRAs telling lies! We won't fall for your disguise".

"Shame on you and U of T, for allowing misogyny!"

"Women coming under attack! What do we do? Fight back!"

In one instance of asking this question, a large, masked individual bearing a wooden bludgeon and carrying a placard with my name on it, stepped between me and the feminists protesters. This was a man hiding his face as he threatened violence against anyone who might ask difficult questions, a white knight ready to dispense or absorb violence on behalf of his social betters; those who confer on him his identity as a good, compliant and obedient male.

He wasn't quite stupid enough to actually strike me, even though his accompanying comrades had come masked and armed, the Bad People (myself and about a dozen other Men's Human Rights Activists) were all armed with cameras. While I was expecting to be assaulted and was prepared not to raise my own hand in self-defense, I wasn't clubbed to the ground – despite the published promise of violence from a subset of the U of T student's union calling themselves by the exciting moniker "The Revolutionary Student's Movement".

"What if you're wrong?" I asked the masked and bludgeon-carrying "protestors" chanting about disguises while beating the floor of the hallway, outside the lecture hall. They responded with the butt-ends of their clubs. "What if you're wrong?" I repeated. Several of the bludgeons were re-positioned from spear-end floor drumming to hockey-stick blade-style floor beating, directly towards me. I expect this was intended to intimidate me. It didn't work, not because I'm any kind of brave or tough, it failed to work because I expected it.

I asked yet again: What if you're wrong?

The answer? Threatening gestures with contrived weapons from the masked members of an angry, shouting mob.

These are the same people who ironically claim, usually without smirking, that their ideology is simply the belief in "equality". Elevated screaming the preferred response — to drown out the question, or in that question's persistent asking, the direct and unmistakable threat of extreme violence?

Apparently incoherent screaming and violence is the sum and total of the argument fielded by gender ideologues against anyone addressing the human rights concerns of men and boys – from outside the camp of modem mainstream gender ideology because if there was a coherent argument from the camp of gender ideology, wouldn't we have heard it by now?

“Patriarchy, Fuckface!!” and “Shut the fuck up!!”. That was offered repeatedly in response and with enthusiasm by the individual given the nickname “Big Red” although this is not, I’m sorry to say, a coherent argument.

“What if you’re wrong?” was asked of the members of an “equality” movement whose response to criticism and to differing opinion was censorship, intimidation and the threat of violence. To be clear, I am not making an argument that these ideologues and protesters are wrong in their characterizations of those of us who disagree. Rather, it is simply a real question. What if, in their enthusiasm to silence, to threaten, and to condemn – these social justice warriors have picked the wrong side of an actual human rights movement?

What if (in spite of their screeching insistence that anyone not conforming to their own narrow conception of “correct” thinking – academics, educators, human rights activists and even non-conforming feminists like Christina Hoff Sommers) all these people they are opposing do not advocate the legalization of rape? What if Dr Warren Farrell, a world-renowned educator and senior academic, is not an advocate of incest, and what if he further does not think rape is exciting? Those two claims were made repeatedly by gender ideologues, based on a single out-of-context quote by Dr Farrell.

What if the activists at AVfM, which include men, women, gays, lesbians, of every continent and ethnicity, are not actually a clan of woman-hating, rape-enabling violent terrorists and ingesters of kittens? What if the consistent message of the writing at AVfM is the humanity of men and boys, and the equivalent humanity, as well as adult responsibility of women? What if we actually mean what we say in more than 1900 feature-length articles so far published on the site?

What if the female principals at AVFM, including Karen Straughan, Kristina Hansen, Asha James, Dr Tara Palmatier, Dr Elly Tams, Suzanne McCarley, and Erin Pizzey – what if these are self-determined women and NOT puppets of the evil patriarch Paul (Male) Elam? What if these women have not simply internalized their own misogyny?

What if the Men’s Human Rights Movement is exactly what it says it is, a grass-roots human rights movement?

I’m not claiming in this article that the M(H)RM is this, I’m just asking: what if?

Consider the most recent and splashy actions of those who oppose this movement: the attempts to silence; the attempts in Toronto to bring violence to the conversation; the published intention to use violence against any identified Men’s Human Rights Activists followed by the carrying of wooden bludgeons by the “protesters” of the Nathanson and Young lecture at the U of T.

What if, reading this right now, you are one of those masked, bludgeon-carrying individuals? Was it the cameras that stopped you from going any farther? Without a durable video record of your behavior, would you have bashed in some heads in that hallway?

Indeed, there is video on the web now of the gender ideologues “protesting” that event, claiming that the speaker at that event supports rape. Notwithstanding that Dr Farrell supports no such thing, you protesters didn’t even know who you were protesting. When challenged on the context of the quote, mined from Dr Farrell’s writing and stripped of Dr Farrell’s intended meaning, most of you admitted you had read nothing of his work.

You admitted a nearly total ignorance of the nature of his writing and work. When corrected on just who was speaking that you were so eager to protest, did you re-asses your absolute condemnation of the event? Nope. In video recorded by independent film-maker Stephen Brule, at least two of you said “anyway” or “whatever” and changed the topic. You didn’t even know who was speaking or what you were so eager to silence. You didn’t even want to know who or what you were silencing.

So. What if you’re wrong?

Hell. What if you’re right? What if all the outrageous claims, the rape apologetics, the incest support, the internalized misogyny by every female MHRA and the deep down evil of every male MHRA – what if all that is true?

What if the evidence of all this malice-claimed-by-you was right inside the doors? What if Dr Paul Nathanson hates women and homosexuals? Nevermind that he is gay. What if Dr Katherine Young hates women and supports the rape of children? What if Dr Warren Farrell really does support incest and rape? What if AVfM's Dan Perrins and John the Other are violent, woman hating monsters?

You did your level best to erase the evidence of this claimed-by-you misogyny. Why? Shouldn't exposing these monsters be at the top of your to-do list? How do you expect to succeed in your great social justice project by suppressing the "evidence" of your own claims?

For that matter, how do you imagine bringing a bludgeon will help your cause when those you oppose bring cameras? How can censorship help you at an event which had the explicit purpose of open communication and dialog?

Considering that is, if you're right.

What if it turns out that you are on the wrong side of history? What if you are fighting against a valid human rights movement? You know, fighting against a valid human rights movement with bull horns, threats of violence and bludgeons?

What if you're wrong?

Fuck you, Judith Grossman

[quote]I am a feminist. I have marched at the barricades, subscribed to Ms. Magazine, and knocked on many a door in support of progressive candidates committed to women's rights. ~ Judith Grossman, Wall Street Journal, 04/16/2013[/quote]

The above quote contains the opening lines of a current Wall Street Journal article titled, Judith Grossman: A Mother, a Feminist, Aghast. They are the last positive things she had to say about feminism.

The rest of the article was dedicated to how her son, who she understandably did not mention by name, was railroaded by his liberal arts college in New England on the basis of a sexual assault allegation that his former girlfriend decided to report years after it allegedly happened.

Grossman details what happened to him with appropriate outrage. She tells us his story, which begins with him sending her a panicked text message, and walks us through how the school made a mockery of due process and the presumption of innocence. She even refers us to Title IX and alludes to the "Dear Colleague" directive from the Obama Administration, which instructs schools to reduce the standard of proof in sexual assault cases from the time honored standard of "reasonable doubt," to the much more lax and slippery "preponderance of evidence."

She complains that there was no evidence against her son at all, save the word of his ex-girlfriend. She even asks a question aloud, as though no one before her ever bothered to ask it:

> Who knew that American college students are required to surrender the Bill of Rights at the campus gates?

She closes her article, which simmered and seethed from start to finish, in a state of bewilderment, lamenting that the pursuit of women's rights combined with politically motivated government policy is turning our schools into a "snake pit of injustice."

That is a very strong condemnation – coming from a fucking snake.

Judith Grossman is just now finding out about one, and just one, of the many tertiary stage products of a narcissistic ideology that has run amok with her blind enabling for her entire adult life. She, rather her son, is paying the price for a half century of hatred disguised as women's rights advocacy, and so suddenly she is filled with indignation and outrage. She wonders aloud how all this could have happened. She wonders what possibly have gone so wrong, right under her nose.

Fuck you, Judith Grossman. Fuck you right where you stand.

Before being rattled from your solipsistic coma, there were countless other outrages happening to young men in this culture. Did you notice them? Or did you figure it was all a good thing for the sisterhood till your baby boy wound up with his entire future on the line in a system that was designed by those of your ilk to chew him up and spit him out?

Have you noticed the other students, Judith? Or more accurately, have you noticed how many of them are male? Your son is the minority now, as more and more young men are falling from the ranks of education thanks to your feminism.

But I am betting, Judith, that even if you did notice, you did not give a damn. Not as long as YOUR boy was getting HIS degree. Right?

That is the problem with your remarkably successful campaign of wanton self-interest. It feels great until the bill comes due. Unfortunately for your son, Mommy is not the one that has to cough up the tab.

He is. And the world you built is not done with him yet.

I take that he is not married, yet. Chances are he will be, and if that is the case you, no, he, will also get another dose of your medicine if and when he ends up in a family court, stripped of his rights and under an ax that will make his school's "honor" court look like a vacation in the Bahamas.

He will have you to thank for it, just like so many other sons of single mothers and feminists who have exploited chivalry and pushed for misandric treatment of men in the judicial system.

And if it happens; if they take his home, his children, his income, his freedom and leave him to an impoverished life, as they have so many other sons of women like you, you will be back at WSJ, moaning and gnashing teeth and shouting into a compassionless void about what has happened to your son.

No one will care, Judith. The world will grease its gears with his guts and keep on humming along, like he was never even there.

Your only hope now, if it is indeed not too late, is to vociferously reject the ideology you embraced as long as it served your selfish needs. Your only redemption is to attack it with all the might you have at your disposal, and shine the light on every hypocrisy you have ever fostered, every lie you have ever told and every self-serving agenda you once lauded as the answer for humanity. And you need to do it till your dying breath.

I get the distinct feeling that you won't, however. I think all that has happened here is that you have had your little entitled hissy fit because Junior got bent over by the system you helped push on the world around you.

Once he is in the clear, and the pieces of his nearly destroyed life have been put back together, I am thinking you will have your unseeing eyes right back on the pages of Ms. Magazine, spending the remainder of your disgust on "patriarchy" or bemoaning a fabricated "rape culture," and ignoring the rape hysteria that almost put an end to your son's future.

I am betting you will be back to supporting those "progressive candidates" that were the architects of your son's near destruction.

I could be wrong. It would not be the first or last time. If so, I am sure many people who are actually waking up to the destruction of feminism will be happy to see it. I know I will.

But until then, as I have already said, fuck you.

The London Irish Center—Win or Lose

Andy Thomas · 17 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

MRA London descended on the London Irish Center yesterday for a rather impromptu protest over the planned Radfem 2013 conference in June. In fact, we arrived just as the Irish Centre management were holding a project meeting in the bar area of their venue—rather considerate of them, we felt. They did seem to mind a little, however, when we decided to join in their meeting.

The London Irish Center

During the ensuring commotion, I kindly presented them with a copy of "Protecting Charities from Harm, Guidelines for trusties from the UK Charities Commission", and as politely I could manage (not my strong point to be honest) suggested that they read it with regard to Radfem.

Our protest happened after I got all fired up after discovering that Radfem, the pro-violence radical feminist group who advocate eugenics for male population control and much much worse, had booked the conference center for their annual event. (Last year's Radfem conference planned at Conway Hall was aborted after the conference center declined the booking when they realized what they were taking on.) In the space of a couple of hours, I had knocked out some very fiery articles on MRA London and A Voice for Men, and as an after-thought, I rang one of our guys to see what he thought. To my surprise, he suggested a protest the very next day with who ever we could get to turn up at such short notice.

"Why don't we talk outside?"

That morning, with little in the way of a plan, I ran off a some documents from the printer along with some leaflets I had hurriedly threw together the night before, and set off for London armed with a camera. By 11:00 AM I was sitting in the Irish Center, drinking latte and praying that I wouldn't be the only one to turn up. I wasn't—I needn't have worried.

One of the documents I printed included the Protecting Charities from Harm Compliance Toolkit Guildelines and it was a last minute decision to hand it to them. Yes, this was a highly impromtu protest, but it is so important that we stop standing on the sidelines and begin to…

> Speak the truth, even if your voice shakes
> —Maggie Kuhn

Protecting Charities from Harm

Personally, I found I was actually quite good at that bit.

But thing is, doing something, doing anything is better than doing nothing. We are starting from scratch, and we not experienced campaigners or political agitators. Rather, we are simply men and women who have woken up and are willing to stand up and take the first steps necessary in effecting direct action over issues that are of extreme importance for our society. With each protest we do, we develop the skills, strategies and numbers needed to be more effective. We know that we are giving heart to countless people who have never had their concerns listened to, having always been shouted down or dismissed. We represent a nascent ability to respond and have our voice heard, and we can only grow stronger.

For what it's worth, I don't actually believe we have any right to shut-down an event, such as Radfem 2013, simply because we disagree with certain views, even if such views are extreme. We would actually prefer for the Radfem conference to go ahead and to attend the damn thing! That way we could take notes and record video, and publish what was went on there so that everyone can see judge for themselves. I would suggest that it should be a matter of concern that the organizers of Radfem 2013 regard such openness as a threat. (In any case, issues of personal safety aside, I could not attend the Radfem conference — they exclude me because of my sex.)

It is not lost on me that the London Irish Center must be wondering what kind of polarized alien landscape they have blindly wandered into with this. But then, the UK Charities Commission did provide a little guidebook for them which would have come in very handy, had they read it.

And for anyone reading about MRA London for the first time, contrary to any misconceptions, our group comprises both men and women and we are mixed race. In fact, I would judge that between 10% and 30% of the wider men's human rights movement are women, some of whom are quite vocal. We are not homophobic—again, our own group contains two gay men, including the founder of MRA London who attended the protest.

We are entirely inclusive, unlike Radfem which is open only to women (although they no longer seem to publicly state that members must be "women born and living as women.") We are not "a bunch of misogynists", we don't want to "turn the clock back" or to "rape women" or to "put women behind any kitchen sink" or any other such nonsense.

We are people who are prepared to stand up for the human worth of all human beings, irrespective of sex, and we do this simply because we have come to the conclusion that somebody must.

There is a personal upside to all this, however. I became involved in men's human rights, not knowing what to expect, and with nothing to gain other than the experience of engaging in life again.

And by God, this is living!

MRA London finds a new recruit on the way home!

Over the last year or so, after dispensing with my former existence, I have never felt so fulfilled and engaged. It has been a privilege to find such colorful friends amongst those who have the necessary integrity to reject society's bullshit and are willing to put their neck on the line for the things that really matter.

Win or lose, I have made my choice.

Georgetown University, a cover-up?

Paul Elam · 18 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Attention. Critical elements of this story, including the identity of the story's subject have been redacted and retracted.

Please read here.

At the time I am writing this a scandal is erupting across the internet involving prestigious Georgetown University and tied to one of their former employees, [redacted], a Georgetown grad student who says she was hired to read and process applications for admissions to the school.

She claims she had a very interesting system for screening applicants. The applications from white males were trashed, regardless of qualifications.

And now it appears that Georgetown University may be trying to cover it up.

The background of this story is pretty disturbing. [redacted], who clearly has issues with sexual and racial bigotry, decided she would not only trash the applications of white males on sight, she also decided to blog about her activities under what she assumed was anonymous conditions. Writing for a web blog called The Feminist Conservative, [redacted] laid out precisely what she was doing in very clear terms:

> …I can't tell you how many applications I saw that were just dripping with white male privelege[sic]. Any of those that I saw basically went straight to the garbage can regardless of how good their qualifactions [sic] were. If I saw an application from a white male that basically was just good test scores, and activities like chess club or math club or what not then it shows me this person is not interested in a diverse environment. Obviously he made no effort in integrating with minorities or to sympathize with them and is counting on male privilege to get in. So that kind of application should get ignored. In their place I admitted a female student. This goes double especially for math/science majors.

Apparently the prejudicial screening criteria she employed were not limited to just white males who played chess and were interested in mathematics. She also targeted a man of Arab descent because of his stand on Israel.

> Another time this I had an application for what sounded like an arab male who wanted to study computer science. On paper he looked good enough, decent above average scores, and such. But I checked facebook and sure enough on his wall I came came [sic] upon a particularly hateful post about Israel supposedly not having a right to exist. I promptly trashed the application and sent out a rejection letter.

She followed these statements with another; a bizarrely contradictory explanation for her actions. First, she says:

> We can't boil people down to numbers or statistics, or reject people based on the color of their skin.

But then she follows that statement immediately with this:

> I'm happy to say that I approved nearly 90% of all female minority and 80% of all (white female applicants especially if the girls want to study math or science) while rejecting over 50% of white males this week and hope this trend holds out.

Clearly this is a person not only warped by ideology, but who also holds deep seated prejudices that guided her unscrupulous actions. Her targets were selected by sex, race, political beliefs and perhaps even religion. Her identity was traced after she referenced the subject of her master's thesis at Georgetown in some of her writing, including the "about" page at the Feminist Conservative.

Here are three of the main documents that led to her being identified.

About Feminist Conservative

Thesis defense is TODAY! feministconservative

My first week of work — feministconservative

It is unknown precisely how many qualified applicants were sabotaged by this woman, and it may be difficult to find out as it now appears almost certain that individuals at Georgetown, perhaps even university officials, are purging their online records of that thesis, and her identity, in order to protect the interest of the school against what will almost certainly result in a massive amount of litigation.

AVFM has obtained copies, a before and after record of Georgetown's list of master's theses from 2012. If you had examined their website before this scandal broke, you would have found [redacted]name on the list with a link to her thesis. You can download the previous version of the page

However now, if you go to the page you will find no trace of her name, and naturally no link to her thesis.

[redacted]

We have a copy of that thesis available for download.

There has been much in the news lately, particularly in Canada at the University of Toronto, about the illegal, even violent actions of feminist ideologues in the university setting. Events intended to address issues concerning men and boys have been met with virulent hostility.

It appears that [redacted] plan was even simpler. Just rid the school of males, particularly white ones, to begin with. And as we see this blow up into a full-fledged scandal and embarrassment to Georgetown University, it appears that a person or persons at the school are going to compound those problems with a cover-up.

One would assume that they will be depending on a complete denial from [redacted], who is now reportedly in [redacted]. Without any evidence tying that blog to [redacted] identity, namely the reference to her thesis, it may make it more difficult for plaintiffs to prove their case against the school.

If this proves to have university officials behind it, it would be a very, very bad move.

AVFM will update readers regularly as information becomes available.

Zach Rosenberg sells his son out — again

Paul Elam · 18 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In my recent article about Zach Rosenberg, I took him to task for telling his four year old son that he was a rapist because the boy tried to steal a kiss from a girl and she did not like it.

I realize, in a sane world, I would not need to write a follow up to that article. Zach Rosenberg is a nut case, emotionally abusing his child. End of story; no more needs to be said. Right?

Wrong.

After tweeting this article to Zach I got an email from him. It seems he knows enough to be concerned with labels, as long as they have an impact on him instead of his four year old.

I present you the email, unedited, in its entirety:

Name: Zach Rosenberg

Email: XXXXXX

Message: Hello Paul –

I'm not here to fight. I read your article about me, and in the spirit of men speaking about men's issues, I appreciate your opinion. I don't want to argue about what I said or meant. I don't even want you to take your piece down. The only thing I'm asking is that you take out the lines about me being a child abuser. I know that you feel that way, but you mention that you'd like for that line to "Google better" and that's my issue. I'm a writer. I've written about all sorts of men's and father's issues. And yes, one of my outlets is the Good Men Project, which I realize isn't popular with the MRM.

But man to man, I'd like for you to consider this. Regardless of any other issue, I still need to feed my family, and as you know, if something like "Zach Rosenberg is a child abuser" is out there, it's not necessarily bringing a conversation about men's rights or issues forward – it's simply damaging my character. Your readers are calling for Child Protective Services to take my child away, and I think that's extreme. I understand your stance and opinion – but I think if your readers knew more about me, they'd see I'm not a child abuser. I work hard to support my family, I spend tons of time with my son, reading to him, playing with him and teaching him about life. It's not logical that simply mentioning the word "rape", not even drilling it into him, but simply mentioning it – with clarifications and a conversation attached – can outweigh the four years of other time I\'ve spent with him. (Sorry, I just realized I said I wasn't here to fight – and I'm not, I'm just standing up against the claims that my child should be taken away, which are admittedly not your claims).

If you'd like to continue a conversation about this – or even on your site about the issue, I'm open to that. I read A Voice for Men from time to time, and though I don't always agree with the sentiments, I feel like it's a necessary voice in the MRM. If we could explore the topic more in a constructive way, I'd appreciate that.

I also have a piece going up soon about how boys and men are victims of rape and sexual assault too – stemming from the larger conversation I'd had with my son involving boundaries, standing up for himself, and talking to teachers if another child is touching him inappropriately. I hope that you'll return to read that one when it's up.

In the meantime, please contact me and let's talk – [email redacted]

Thank you.

So there you have it. Zach is concerned about his image. He does not much like being called a child abuser in a high profile venue. It's a pretty strange concern, in my book, for a man that had no problem calling his little boy a rapist and then blogging about it on a major website.

Oh but of course, Zach is not really so concerned about his own image. He is concerned that being called an abuser of his four year old son, which he clearly is, is "…not necessarily bringing a conversation about men's rights or issues forward…"

Oh yeah, I hear ya, Zach, it's all about teh menz.

I'll be honest here. I know sociopathy when I see it. It is the little details that give it away; like calling your preschool son a rapist and using that to gain favor with an audience of misandric scumbags. Like objecting to being called on what you are doing and refusing to acknowledge how obviously wrong it is. Like thinking that being called a child abuser is damaging to your character, but abusing your child isn't. Like using the son you just fucked over as a bargaining chip to get people to feel sorry for you and back down from the truth.

The devil, and in this case, the douche bag, is in the details.

Even though I find Rosenberg to be nauseatingly transparent, I was willing to cut a deal with him, for the sake of his son. But it had to be about the boy, and not about Zach.

I wrote him back almost immediately with an offer:

Hello Zach

First, let me say that this is not personal toward you. But you did, whether intentionally or not, cross a line of abuse, both with your son and with all boys. It was truly wrong, and needs to be corrected.

Still, I think that everyone deserves chances to correct mistakes. Have GMP remove that post and issue a a public statement that you made a mistake as a father in what you did. If you do that I will remove that post. But as long as you stand by those words I am going to stand by mine. I was a counselor for two decades. I have seen the results of all forms of abuse in the wrecked lives of people that came into my office strung out on drugs and/or drinking their way into an early grave. I can tell you that this kind of treatment of a child is, in my professional opinion, highly abusive.

Again, that may not have been your intent, but that is, in your own words, what you did.

The choice here is up to you.

Regards,

Paul Elam

I would have honored this, even if it had pissed off my own readers, if he was willing to do it. I figured that if Zach and GMP were willing to admit, even if just by removing the article, that calling little boys who try to get a kiss from little girls "rapists," was a really fucked up thing to do, then everyone would win. Zach could learn from his mistakes. Lisa Hickey would end her promotion of child abuse, and a few thousand man hating bitches would have one less piece of misandric filth to post on their Facebook pages. I never heard back from him and the post remains up.

My offer is irrevocably withdrawn.

There is a temptation here to put this matter to rest with some sort of armchair analysis of Zach Rosenberg. Perhaps we could explore, as TyphonBlue would, how he is treating his son like an adult sexual competitor instead of a little boy. We could discuss the possibility that Zach is projecting his own self-loathing form of gender politics into the psyche of his young child. Or, we could assess the continually deteriorating state of The Good Men Project and speculate that even Tom Matlack is cringing at the bilious garbage that is now staining the pages of that website.

None of that stuff, true as it all may be, matters though. I saw everything I needed to see the moment I read that a father had called his four year old son a rapist for the simple, innocent pursuit of some acceptance.

And now I have watched that same father plead for the sake of his own image, holding up that same son like a pawn, while he stands fully behind the abuse he has already committed.

I can't think of anything else I need, or even want, to say.

London Irish Centre Says No to Radfems

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE: April 20th, 2013

London Irish Centre Says No to Radfem 2013 Conference

Radfem, the radical feminist group whose members espouse a fascist, sexist and violent ideology have been ousted, yet again, from their planned convention centre. Last year, Conway Hall banned Radfem 2012 by citing that their exclusionary policy was at odds with UK legal obligations. This year, it was the London Irish Centre's turn to reject Radfem after they were awoken to the reality of inviting the pro-violence group into their venue when MRA London, a male human rights activist group and part of "A Voice for Men", mounted a protest on their doorstep.

MRA London is a peaceful group comprising both male and female members who stand up for the human worth of men and boys. It is also mixed race and includes gay members.

When hearing of Radfem's rejection, the group's co-founder, Andy Thomas said, "We don't believe in shutting down debate. However, it is vital that there is someone speaking up on behalf of men and boys. And for the first time ever, they now have a voice."

He adds, "This is a victory for men and boys everywhere because the message is clear—the time when their human rights can be trampled on with impunity is now over."

The Radfem 2013 conference was to feature Cathy Brennan, a prominent radical feminist and a US attorney in Maryland. Until February, 2013, she was also the owner of the now defunct website, Radical Hub—a site which featured calls for child murder, extermination, and male eugenics.

In 2011, A Voice for Men in the United States offered a $1,000 reward for the real identity of a Radical Hub contributor "Vliet Tiptree", who was duly identified as Pamela O'Shaughnessy from California—an author of crime novels published by Simon and Schuster. O'Shaughnessy had written a lengthy piece detailing a plan for the "extirpation" of half the human race—the male half.

Sheila Jeffreys, who was to be a keynote speaker at the event, was also regular contributor to the "male eugenics discussion group" on the Radical Hub website. Jeffreys teaches sexual politics at the University of Melbourne, Australia, and has been accused by Dr. Greg Canning of A Voice for Men in Australia, of teaching "hate" across Australian universities.

All prejudice is seen as fashionable and virtuous in its time, and we've had 40 years or so of anti-male sentiment in the media and wider culture, so much so that it has become normalised. However, MRA London and A Voice for Men believe that we are witnessing the start of a sea change were, for the first time, radical feminist rhetoric will become universally recognised for the toxic bigotry that it is.

On terrorism, feminism and A Voice for Men

Robert Franklin · 19 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I write this, Boston police and others are scouring the Watertown area for a second suspect in the horrific bombing of the Boston Marathon that left three dead and over 100 injured. Last night they shot one of the suspects and are reported to be closing in on the other.

What's most noteworthy at this point is that the two are brothers who seem to be of Chechen origin. Now, what we don't know about the two far surpasses what we do. We don't know if these two young men planted the bombs at the marathon or, if they did, why. We're not certain that they're even from Chechnya and we certainly don't know if they're members of a Chechen separatist group. After all, exactly what do Russia, Chechnya and the independence movement there have to do with the Boston Marathon?

What intrigues me though is that the backpack bombing of a public gathering place is very much the modus operandi of Chechen separatism. That movement, that combats with terrorism the overwhelming force and brutality of the Russian military, long ago took its fight into Russia sending suicide bombers into cafes, airports, schools and the like.

Whether or not the young man sought by the Boston police is a Chechen separatist, the unfolding drama put me in mind of a piece I did for Glenn Sacks' blog back in 2010. (1) It was occasioned by the report by three researchers at the University of Chicago who'd just completed years of research into every single terrorist incident perpetrated by Chechen separatists since 2000. There were 42 such incidents involving 63 perpetrators studied by Robert Pape, Lindsey O'Rourke and Jenna McDermit, and they revealed some interesting things that bear directly on some of A Voice for Men's primary messages.

First, female terrorists turn out to be "deadlier than the male" variety. Second, that's because people generally see women as harmless and therefore allow them far greater freedom of movement than they do men, a fact that benefits any woman bent on mayhem. Third, female terrorists and their families use shaming tactics against men to goad them into becoming terrorists.

Pape, et al have studied far more than just Chechen terrorism. They've also studied terrorism in Lebanon, Iraq, Afghanistan, the West Bank, Sri Lanka and elsewhere. Among Chechen terrorists, some 40% of the perpetrators were women. Here's what I wrote back in 2010.

> [A]ttacks by women are deadlier than those carried out by men. Female terrorists kill an average of 21 people per attack versus only 13 for men. The bloodiest attack ever in the Chechen's terrorist war against Russia – the coordinated bombing of two passenger flights that killed 90 people- was carried out by women. Plus, their deeds seem to be more effective at inspiring others. Pape, et al show that female terrorists use their femininity to shame males into participating in terrorist acts. They've also started a group called the "black widows," in which women who've had a husband or other loved one killed or injured goad others to join the fight.

That people's sexist attitude toward women – they're harmless – allows female terrorists to be far more deadly than males was graphically illustrated by a Russian newspaper and reported by Pape, O'Rourke and McDermit. In 2003 a Chechen suicide bomber walked into a Moscow café at peak hours with a bomb-laden pack strapped to her back. Her attempt to detonate the device failed, the police were called and she was arrested. So the Russian newspaper carried out a little experiment, described by Pape in the pages of the New York Times as follows:

> [F]emale suicide attackers have one more advantage: They can often travel inconspicuously to their targets. A July 2003 investigative report by the Russian news magazine Kommersant-Vlast found that a potential female suicide bomber could easily avoid public suspicion. Just days after a Chechen > suicide bomber, Zarema Muzhakhoyeva, tried but failed to blow up a Moscow cafe in 2003, one of the magazine's journalists — wearing a niqab, tightly clutching a black satchel to her chest, and behaving in a nervous manner — was able to get a table at the same cafe without ever being questioned. Perhaps not surprisingly, Chechen women have carried out 8 of the 10 suicide attacks in Moscow.

Each new act of terrorism in this country renews public debate about the phenomenon. We're led to believe by the establishment that combats terrorism that we're doing everything we can to keep Americans safe from those who would destroy innocent life to attempt to advance a political ideal. But the research done by Pape, O'Rourke and McDermit show that we've overlooked one important aspect of the problem. As long as we see only men as society's violent actors, we open ourselves up to the violence and destruction committed by the half of the population who've proven themselves men's equals in violence. We've known this in the context of domestic abuse for decades; now we know it about terrorist violence.

Perhaps less important but still worthy of note, the researchers also show that the shaming tactics used by women in all walks of life to manipulate men to act in accordance with their wishes are used by women to recruit male terrorists. "C'mon, be a man! Blow yourself up and a café too!"

In short, the type of gender awareness promoted by A Voice for Men must be adopted wholesale if we're to truly combat terrorism. Women must be seen for what they are – just as violent and deadly as men. Men must adopt methods for blunting the shaming tactics employed against them by women.

As a postscript, my original piece about the Pape/O'Rourke/McDermit study came with a bit of luck attached. You see, a mere six days before my article about their work, an Israeli researcher, one Anat Berko, was reported by the newspaper Ha'aretz as entirely exempting female Palestinian terrorists from any responsibility for their murderous ways. Here's what I wrote back then:

Amazing as it may seem, Israeli researcher, Anat Berko has managed to ascertain that female suicide bombers aren't responsible for their acts of terrorism. Indeed, the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz quoted Berko as saying,

[W]omen are pushed to carry out a terrorist attack and never choose to do so out of their own free will. There are always personal problems hidden in the background."

You read that right. Women who blow up others never do so of their own free will. That's because they have "personal problems." What are some of those personal problems? Well, divorce is one. A Palestinian woman who's gotten divorced because she's unable to bear children has no free will and, according to Berko, has no power to resist the clarion call of terrorism. What Berko thinks about the fact that countless Palestinian women resist that quite nicely, we're left to guess. For that matter, what she thinks of the Palestinian terrorist woman who's briefly profiled in the Ha'aretz piece and who clearly has a very strong will, also goes unexplored.

Given her opinions about female terrorists, it must be only a matter of time before Berko's called as an expert witness in a criminal case against a female terrorist. I can hardly wait. I mean, imagine the scene; a Palestinian woman attempts to detonate a bomb at a crowded bus station in Tel Aviv, but fails. She's arrested on a variety of charges, but her defense attorney calls Dr. Berko to the witness stand and elicits testimony that the woman had no free will and is therefore innocent of the crime charged. I wonder what the Israeli jury would do with that handy-dandy bit of information. Would they kill her or laugh her out of court? As I say, I can't wait to find out.

But if that's her opinion about female killers, what's her take on the male variety? We didn't have to ask. Berko is ready with the answer:

"When men become terrorists, the ideological motive is dominant."

No problem with free will there. Men who do wrong have it; women who do wrong don't. Simple as that. (2)

Do I have to tell you that Berko's a feminist? I thought not.

Remember, this woman's an Israeli. She and her countrymen have been subjected to decades of terrorism. To say the least, it's a very touchy topic in Israel. For Berko to pretend, against all that recent history that women, but not men, who kill Israeli civilians in terrorist acts should be given a free pass because they're upset about their divorce gives an all-new meaning to the term chutzpah.

To be clear, feminists like Berko promote terrorism. They ask us to understand women in exactly the way Pape, O'Rourke and McDermit show to an absolute certainty we shouldn't. They tell us that women aren't the agents of their own behavior. They encourage us to believe that women are harmless, not to be feared, not to be suspected. And it is exactly that mindset that allows female terrorists to kill and maim more effectively than do males.

Aside from the disgraceful dishonesty of that mindset, does it get any worse than that?

Peter Lloyd sues over sexist policies

Peter Lloyd · 19 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I became a member of my local gym, it was to exercise my body – not my human rights. But that's exactly what I'm doing with the Kentish Town Sports Centre in north London.

The venue, owned by fitness company Better in association with Camden Council, attracts hundreds of people from all sections of society: religious, atheist, male, female, young and old. There is no dominant demographic. Everybody is welcome and everybody gets on.

But not everybody is equal.

Because, in an age of political over-correctness, they ban all men and boys for 442 hours every year – simply because they are male.

Adding insult to injury, they still charge them the same full-price membership fee as women, but refuse to offer the equivalent option of male-only sessions.

Not only is this an outrageous business model, but it's also sexist. Especially given that council officials base it almost solely on women's needs.

Fair? I think not. But, because we live in an age of acceptable misandry, most people are too polite to say anything.

Not me.

Several weeks ago, I formally complained to the general manager, asking him to change the policy with one of three alternatives: A) maintain a women's hour but introduce a men's alternative for fairness, B) keep women's hour (and only women's hour) but annually charge men less, or C) scrap single-gender sessions altogether.

Hardly controversial.

After all, if demand for women-only sessions is so great then the gym should put their money where their mouth is and fund it themselves.

Unsurprisingly, they declined.

'A report by the Women Sport and Fitness Foundation showed that a significant proportion of women (26 per cent) "hate the way they look when they exercise".' they replied in an email.

'This takes on an even greater significance when you consider that women feel even more self-conscious when taking part in sport and physical activity when men are present. If you are wondering who or what [we are] it's a charity that specialises in increasing women's physical activity levels.'

Translated into plain English, this means that a group of agenda-driven feminists say a minority of women 'feel' bad about their bodies. And because heterosexual men are naturally attracted to women, their very existence makes it worse, so they should be banned.

No, seriously.

That's like trying to clean a dirty face by rubbing a mirror.

It also assumes that all men in the gym are straight, when many of them are gay and have no interest in the female aesthetic. In fact, if they really wanted to, these men could be voyeuristic in the showers. So what next – gay and straight hours? And what about lesbians – can they attend women-only sessions, or would it make their straight sisters uncomfortable? Gimme a break.

If these women have issues with their bodies, I truly sympathise – but it's their problem, not mine. Nor is it any other man's.

And who's to say we don't have our own body hang-ups? We know for a fact that increasing numbers of men suffer from anorexia and bulimia as well as 'bigorexia' – the need to be as muscular as possible. Rates of men having cosmetic surgery are also increasing year-on-year, so the facts speak for themselves.

Interestingly, women's hour also has little to do with religion. The gym have scarcely used faith to justify their policy, but – even if they did – it still wouldn't excuse their unequal price structure.

Want women-only sessions for religious reasons? Fine – more power to you. But don't ask men to pay for 442 hours they can't possibly use. No God would approve of that.

Furthermore, when I explained that men typically die before women, thus have a greater need to access fitness services – something based on cold, hard fact rather than feelings – they had no convincing answer.

Tellingly, the gym's policy also assumes that only men can objectify the opposite sex. But if TV shows like Sex and the City taught us anything, it's that women can be just as forthright. In fact, only two weeks later, I was forced to complain when four teenage girls were wolf-whistling at boys in the weights area – jeering and laughing, while ranking them by size.

This wouldn't be acceptable if the sexes were reversed, so why is it tolerated here?

This is precisely why I'm suing them for gender bias. Not simply because their policy is unfair, but because it pathologises masculinity while simultaneously repressing it.

As far as I'm concerned it also breaks the law.

So far, the legal team at Camden Borough Council have simply made me laugh. They've spent hours quoting Harriet Harman's Equality Act, but continue to miss the point. No customer, male or female, should pay for gym time they're not allowed to use. It's that simple.

Ultimately, however, it has nothing to do with money. At best, I want a 10 per cent refund; something I would donate to men's charity CALM (Campaign Against Living Miserably), but, like the test case of mis-sold PPI, it would empower other men to demand the same compensation – hitting the gym where it hurts.

But, finances aside, the Kentish Town Sports Centre has a social responsibility to encourage equality as well as physical health. Forcing men – whether 70 year-old pensioners or 13 year-old boys who attend with their mothers – to leave a room because of their gender, rather than their behaviour, is degrading. It's also eerily reminiscent of when African Americans were separated from their caucasian peers in 1940s America.

Not least because the underlying maxim is the same. In this instance, that all men are inherently bad. This is a toxic message to send out, especially when those affected are frequently young boys in crucial stages of puberty and self-development.

Such messages are pernicious. They criminalise men for being male, while telling women that they have less responsibility to contribute to functional gender relations.

Interestingly, it's not just patrons who are angered. Last week I spoke with two of the gym's male fitness instructors who expressed their frustration with the ban – not least because, in the middle of a double-dip recession, neither can work during female-only sessions. It's insane.

Fortunately, I have other helpful supporters who want to liberate them. Erin Pizzey, the woman who established the world's first-ever domestic violence shelter in 1972 before becoming a men's rights activist, has offered her backing. 'This discrimination has no place in modern society', she said.

Meanwhile, equality charity Parity and human rights campaigner Peter Tatchell have described my fight as 'sensible and fair'.

Stateside, the U.S. website AVoiceForMen.com has recently added their weight to my case.

Now, I ask common sense and British law to do the same.

Being a test case, my claim has sparked global interest because of its potential impact. If I win, gyms all over the country could be forced to update their policies. And rightly so.

Not only would this be physically healthy for people who want to exercise without restriction, but it would also be socially healthy for those who understand the toxicity of sexism, whether directed at men or women.

For some, this might be a revelation in itself, but trust me: it comes from a place of genuine fairness.

Yes, my case may raise some eyebrows, but hopefully it will also raise some consciousness. Because, currently, the staff at my gym are telling our young men they're dangerous by default.

And that's a weight no man should learn to carry.

Was David Ainsworth driven to suicide?

MRA London · 19 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Did DVPO supremo, Brian Moore, allow his deputy to be hounded to suicide?

MRA London has a new member – Agent Kildare! Here, in his debut article, he uncovers the shocking story behind the suicide of David Ainsworth, the UK Police Deputy of Wiltshire. This man had so little human worth, that even at the inquest of his death, police union officials were concerned only with congratulating themselves over their hard work in protecting the "real victims" in this tragedy. Ed (MRAL)

A recent article on MRA London highlighted a 2009 report by ACPO – the UK Association of Chief Police Officers, 'Tackling Violence against Women and Girls' (1).

The report outlines the strategy which resulted in the current trials in the UK of Domestic Violence Protection Orders.

The report's author was Brian Moore, at the time the Chief Constable of Wiltshire Police. He was supported by a steering group weighted towards women (75%) and representatives from women's support projects such as Refuge and Women's Aid.

Among the recommendations in the report is that a new crime be established of 'Causing Suicide by Abuse'. The report states that this offence should be targeted exclusively at 'abusive men' who initiate 'a course of action which played a significant and causal role in the suicide".

In 2011, while Moore was Chief Executive of Wiltshire Police, his deputy David Ainsworth committed suicide.

A widely-respected expert on vehicle crime, Ainsworth had spent several months under investigation after official complaints had been made in late 2010 about a number of what his girlfriend, Joanna Howes, described as 'petty' allegations of sexist remarks to female colleagues.

This consisted of Mr Ainsworth looking at a woman in a tailored blouse and saying 'nice buttons'.

The report of the investigation into the alleged remarks has never been publically released. However the police authority confirmed there were a total of 26 complaints, from 13 women, seven of whom are on one team. The latter group are believed to have made a joint complaint about a single remark by Mr Ainsworth. This consisted of Mr Ainsworth looking at a woman in a tailored blouse and saying 'nice buttons'. All the remarks were described as 'minor'.

Over time Ainsworth, who was initially 'bullish' about the 'absurd' allegations, became increasingly despondent and distressed, telling friends that the force had 'abandoned' him and that he was the victim of a 'witch-hunt'.

Ms Howes said the force "systematically poisoned" everyone against her partner and denied he was guilty of sexual harassment of women (2).

After the Coroner's inquest in June 2012, Mr Ainsworth's father Stanley spoke to reporters: "I don't feel he was treated well," Mr Ainsworth said.

"I don't think anyone seemed to notice his physical deterioration. When I saw him 10 days before he died, I was shocked by how he had changed in his attitude and his appearance. If nobody on the police side could see that they must have been looking in a different place. If someone is that ill, mentally and physically, and showing all the signs, somebody on the police side should have done more about it."

No claims against Mr Ainsworth were ever substantiated. Despite this, two women; Susan Leffers, head of justice, and Zoe Durrant, head of human resources, received substantial payouts from the force following his death.

A UNISON spokesperson, Ben Priestley, described them as the real victims of the affair: "the women who were subjected to sexual harassment by Mr Ainsworth were badly let down by the police service and the way it responds to unacceptable behaviour in the workplace.

"We are calling for all parties involved in the case to explore ways to ensure that the police service becomes a more welcoming and inclusive place to work. The service is currently male dominated with 75% of police officers being male, while women make up 65% of police staff…inappropriate behaviour and sexual harassment from whatever quarter [should be] dealt with seriously and speedily. The service cannot afford to deter talented women from joining." (3)

Ms Howes described the UNISON remarks as 'disrespectful' and 'inaccurate'. However at the inquest into Mr Ainsworth's death, the Coroner refused to extend the remit of the trial to examine the causes of Mr Ainsworth's suicide, saying he was satisfied the cause was simply that Mr Ainsworth was 'depressed'.

> "a number of women we interviewed felt they had wrongly been categorised as complainants, when they didn't in fact wish to make a complaint at all."
> HM Inspectorate of Constabulary

Wiltshire is now a pilot area for Mr Moore's DVPOs. Mr Moore left the force in March 2012 to run the UK Border Force on an interim basis. A report into the affair by HM Inspectorate of Constabulary in September 2012 noted that "a number of women we interviewed felt they had wrongly been categorised as complainants, when they didn't in fact wish to make a complaint at all."

Mr Ainsworth said his son did not know until five months after the investigation started the detail of the allegations he faced; "He didn't know until his very last moments what people were saying about him. When he told the force he was thinking of suicide, he was told not to be silly.

"My David wasn't a man who would commit sexual harassment, he wouldn't do that.

"He was a good man."

A widow's message to Big Red

Dan Perrins · 20 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You may remember this girl I was trying to talk to a few weeks ago up at University of Toronto. I was trying very calm to keep my voice even and reasonable. Here's part of our conversation, and you may notice what I'm trying to talk to her about while she's sneering and singing:

I've been talking about this incident with Brenda lately. Who's Brenda? She is a close friend of mine. I have spent many, many hours talking with her.

She is also the widow of Paul Donovan and a Men's Human Rights Advocate. I admit, I had problems stringing together some words about this. But she had something she wanted to say, so I'm gonna let her say it right here in this video:

Since I'm having trouble saying more, I am going to reproduce some of Barbra Kay's article about Paul's suicide.

> Bills mounted, but Paul's livelihood remained blocked. He couldn't afford a lawyer, and when he acted for himself a judge told him she couldn't help him. The Family Responsibilities Office (FRO, a Canadian version of what's better known as Friend of the Court in most of the U.S.) took him to court, petitioning for $10,000 or 188 days in jail. Appalled, Paul confided to Ms. Higgins he would rather die than serve such a sentence. Famous last words……At the time of his death Paul Donovan owed a measly $4,000 in child support.

I tried to tell Big Red about Paul, but she and her feminist clan are already addressing the issues males face, or so she tells us. And if we would just Shut The Fuck Up (STFU) and let her and her feminist friends deal with it things would be fine.

I'd say you have them so "addressed" that they are covered with about 6 feet of dirt, buried in graveyards across the western civilized world.

Guess what Big Red? I agree with Brenda.

Its about time you and your feminist friends Shut The Fuck Up and actually listen instead of dictating what is affecting males these days or claiming that it's you who's working on fixing these things. Because if you are, you've done a pretty fucking shitty job so far.

Roseanne Barr, her son Jake, homophobia,...

Paul Elam · 20 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

...feminist fucktardery and a whole slew of other reasons why no one in that family has a clue.

Someone recently linked me to an article by Jake Pentland, son of Roseanne Barr, a feminist nut farmer in Hawaii who used to be a celebrity.

In the piece titled, "The Smoldering Forest of Man," Jake lamented what happened to John Wayne at the hands of feminists, then lauded feminism for reconstructing men into something better than they were in the days of, well, John Wayne. Then he set about, in a fashion muddier than Mississippi River bottom water, to tell feminists it was time for them to shut up, but in the next breath he was pondering on how we can be strong men without offending any of them, and most importantly, while being the kind of men feminists say they want us to be.

It is one of the most bizarre examples of cognitive dissonance I have seen in quite a while. I set out to comment on the piece, and did, but by the time I was through writing I knew I would be doing this article. And while I am at it, I do need to acknowledge that I was pretty hard on him, maybe too hard. After all, he was trying, right? He was at least trying to figure out how to hang on to his balls while still allowing his mother to have a grip on his scrotum.

Tough job.

And it is easy to understand how he got there. The conflicts with his mother over this topic are not new. In an article dating back two years on Jezebel.com, he got into a heated Twitter exchange with Barr on the "point of feminism." It was an exchange in which Pentland actually did very well. He held his ground pretty calmly in the face of his mother's repeated public, highly personal insults. In the spirit of Toronto he qualified for some real red pill kudos for handling himself admirably in the face of bald hatred. Maybe it was the fact that it was his mother that helped. I don't know, though. If she were my mother I would pen a Mommy Dearest and make it available for free download.

The sparring between them continued a year later on his Blog Talk Radio Show. If you think her Tweets were vile, get a load of this.

And here I have to side track for just a moment to point something out. Barr is no exception to all the schmaltz and hot air feminists have always generated about being inclusive and supporting the issues faced by gay men. She was so outraged by the Chic Fil-A gay marriage controversy that she Tweeted, "anyone who eats Shit Fil-A deserves to get the cancer that is sure to come from eating antibiotic filled tortured chickens 4Christ."

She later sorta-kinda apologized for the remark.

She is also a big supporter of the GLBT community in Hollywood. She was named The Advocate's "Person of the Year" in 1994 and included in its "Heroes" list for pushing producers and network executives to start employing realistic portrayals of gay characters on television.

But what was the insult of choice Barr threw at her son when he wasn't being of service to her ideology?

That's right, you are one faggot motherfucker. True to feminist form, Barr talks a lot of shit about social justice and equality for gay human beings, only to prove with the kind of honesty that only spontaneous anger can produce, that she is one hypocritical sack of macadamia nuts.

But that is enough about Barr. She is, after all, par for the course for feminists.

The real point of this, believe it or not, is that it leaves me with at least some empathy for her son, and perhaps how he ended up on his currently courageous but confused path.

If you read his article, available here, what you will see is a man struggling hard, and failing, to divorce himself of a lifetime of spoon fed feminist bullshit, about men, but more importantly about himself.

Between the lines of his defiance against feminism is apologia for that defiance; the telltale pleading for acceptance from the very source that has poisoned his mind for his entire life. He seeks to dismiss feminism, while seeking to comply with its dictates. He seeks to defend men, while accepting the canard of their innate danger and inherent need to be re-engineered into something better.

He is trying to reject his mother's teaching, while still hanging on to her love. And he does so even though that love is and always has been contingent on his compliance with her twisted worldview.

Got news for you Jake, the only way you can please a feminist is by cutting your own nuts off. There is no middle ground, and the quicker you quit looking for it the better off you will be. John Wayne gave us feminism on crack by coddling people like your mother; by regarding her as an incompetent child with which a real man does not argue – he just gives her whatever she wants with a wink and a nudge and with the willingness to sell out any other man to do it.

John Wayne is not your answer any more than Homer Simpson. They are just two punching bags, one of them with a cowboy hat.

The way to rise above all this is by rejecting both of them. That does not mean rejecting the care of people you love, or forsaking your strength. In fact, it means calling on a form of strength you never knew was possible; through a path to manhood that rejects your being demeaned as as a bumbling fool – or exploited as a sacrificial hero. It means tossing feminism overboard, your mother with it if necessary, and rejecting all the traditional programming that leaves you undermining that rejection with apologies and excuses for yourself that are not needed.

It means claiming manhood in your own eyes and no others. And by recognizing that the only thing wrong with you at all is that you are still not over the self-hatred that your mother made sure was stuck in your gut.

You are on the right path, but you have not figured out yet that there is no room on it for you, and your shame. That shame has to go. All it will ever do is confuse you and slow you down.

A man can love his mother and still tell her to shut the fuck up.

MHRA offers to salvage Radfem conference

Paul Elam · 20 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Offer for free room and board in Italy stands, even as Radfems vow to push on in complete denial of reality.

A men's advocate from Italy had an unexpected reaction to hearing that the Radfem conference scheduled to be held at the London Irish Centre in the UK had been cancelled because they are a bunch of bigoted, violence advocating douche bags and The Centre did not want to take the public heat.

He offered them a new venue in suburban Rome, complete with lodging, famously superior Italian wine, home pressed olive oil and "Free Italian cuisine at it's best."

It is an incredible offer, especially for lovers of Italian food fare who have likely never had the real deal.

Lest anyone think that the offer is a lark, napocapo69, a regular contributor to the AVFM comments who is known for a level headed approach in all matters, made it clear that it was not a joke.

> This is a serious last minute offer for radical feminists looking for a place to gather.
> I offer my home, placed over a beautiful hill in a residential area near Rome.
> Sun and nature, a free bed, wine and olive oil self produced. Free Italian cuisine at its best.
> Everything for free, but you have to pay for your travel.
> It is a serious offer.
> Only one condition. I do not want to participate, but my wife and sisters have to.
> Take it or leave it.

Yo, napocapo69, if they don't accept your offer, I sure as hell will.

One might also think that this offer is precisely what the Radfems need, given the trauma they are currently experiencing. In a victim impact statement just released by Cathy "Bug" Brennan, she outlines the severe psychological trauma being endured by those who had planned on attending the event.

> Some women have spent a lot of time, money and energy booking flights and accommodation from the US, Finland, South Africa, France, Australia, Canada and all over the UK.

Oh, the horror.

I have been there myself. Once I booked a flight, which was time and energy and money consuming enough. But then my plans changed. I had to get back on the phone, spending more time and energy and money undoing all the torturous amounts of work I did booking the flight to begin with. Then, God help me, I had to book another flight. I was re-victimized, facing the complete nightmare all over again.

The loss of time and energy and money on all that left me in a state of near catatonic depression. And no one offered me bruschetta and a glass of Vino da Tavola for my troubles. The whole thing felt kind of rapey.

So, in case any of the violence promoting, child abusing shrews from Radfem missed the offer in the comments, I wanted to give it more prominent placement here. Here you are grrls. Free hots and a cot — a stones throw from the center of one of the most historical cities on the planet.

All you have to do is tolerate the fact that there will be women in attendance who might think throwing children out of windows and genetically altering their husbands, fathers, brothers and sons is a bad idea. Pretty good deal, I'd say, especially if no one else wants you around.

On that note, our radical sisters seem to have a little bit of cheese sliding off their crackers where it concerns reality. Bug Brennan also included in her recounting of all the flight cancellation trauma a pledge to have their conference whether the hosts wanted them to or not:

> We do not accept the London Irish Centre's unjustifiable rejection of our booking. We have done nothing wrong and we will not accept being punished because of MRA's using terror tactics…
> …We will have our conference. It will be at the London Irish Centre from the 8th – 9th of June. We are standing strong with our sisters around the world for our liberation. We will not be moved.

Fine then, Bugs, have your little gyno-hate fest on the sidewalk in front of the facility that just gave you the boot. That way, members of MRA London can show up and attend. Personally, I would take Italy. I'd slutwalk a mile for homemade pasta.

If you do, please RSVP. Because if you don't take the Italian deal, I will.

Beware the Rapetard Society

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 21 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]Telling men they can end rape is like telling minorities they can end stealing. Feminism is a whole new level of hate. ~ Paul Elam[/quote]

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] couple of days ago I was sent a petition through the e-mail alleging that a woman named Rehtaeh Parsons was gang-raped by four boys when she was fifteen. A photo of the alleged rape was spread to her peers at school and went viral on the internet. She suffered at the hands of bullies until she took her own life at seventeen. A tragedy. The petition was urging the Nova Scotia government to reexamine the case. I'm all for taking a second look with allegations as serious as this. I signed the petition.

The next day, I happened to see that it was being hyped in the media. The RCMP claimed that there was an investigation, but they concluded that there wasn't enough evidence to press charges. Many questions surged through my mind as I processed what little information I was being fed.

What about these supposed pictures that went "viral?" Had the RCMP seen these pictures? What was on these pictures? Did they actually depict a rape, as alleged? Where did these pictures go? Did they truly disappear, off the internet? Why the conflicting stories from people who claim to have seen these pictures? I feel like I have a right to know the truth since I am part of the public being moved to support the posthumous allegations of a girl I knew nothing about. I am sensing an understandable, but still very disturbing vigilante mentality among the supporters of this dead teenage girl.

I wouldn't be surprised if it turned out that the Canadian RCMP in Nova Scotia were just that incompetent, but maybe there really wasn't enough evidence to support rape or child porn charges, like they said. If I were a member of a jury, I wouldn't convict someone based on the flimsy hearsay evidence I've been fed.

Why are so many people convinced that these alleged perpetrators are already guilty before they have even been identified or charged? The way this tragedy is being exploited by the feminist "Rape Culture" fear-mongering brigade doesn't sit well with me, either.

I learned a new word today: "rapetard." A rapetard describes an individual who, for reasons related to intellectual, emotional or moral deficits, cannot distinguish between questioning "rape culture" and supporting rape.

I feel we're starting to live in a "rapetard society" where misandry and fear-mongering have overridden our common sense.

Once more we hear the rallying cry, "Instead of teaching our daughters to be careful, we should be teaching our sons not to rape."

What a load of bigoted nonsense.

A historic gathering of Rapetards in their traditional dress

I am also troubled by the lack of dissenting voices in the media; failure to scrutinize the hype of gender idelogues. Whatever happened to unbiased journalism? Daniel Bates of the Daily Mail, for example, frequently omits the word "alleged" and reports the story as if these allegations are uncontested fact.

James Callsen of Metro Calgary writes: "I'm angry that a 17-year-old girl committed suicide in Nova Scotia after her school, community and protective services did nothing to help her. I'm angry that the hacker group Anonymous dug up more evidence in that case in two days than the RCMP investigators did in two years. "

The title of that article is "It Starts With Men: It's Time To Stand Up And Stop The Culture of Rape." In it he claims that Anonymous did more than the police, even though this so-called evidence hasn't been proven yet, and no charges have as-of-yet been laid. The rest of the article is a lot of pretentious yammering calling for the behavioral reprogramming of men and boys:

> Something is fundamentally broken within our culture and it's time for us to step up and put it to an end… Personally, I think it starts with men. It's how we talk to each other. It's not staying silent when friends or coworkers make off-colour jokes about rape. It's being frank about what constitutes consent. And it can start with something as simple as saying something when you're outraged.

Oh, it's because some men make off-color jokes (as though women don't) and the way they talk to each other that's responsible for this "rape culture" that we supposedly live in? Yeah, right, so the answer to this slanted idea of a problem is to let a bunch of alarmist pigs exploit a tragedy in order to fuel their anti-male "rape hysteria" agenda. The solution is to condemn all men and boys as rapists in the eyes of the public, with little regard for the obvious bigotry of such an act?

Already, I'm hearing the same stupid buzzwords and slogan that were being used at the Slutwalk events.

"Instead of teaching women responsibility, we should be teaching men not to rape."

Women don't enjoy being generalized. In fact, generalizing anything, anything negative rather, about women, earns a default social condemnation these days. So how can so many find it so easy to make broad assumptions about men and rape?

How would this sound for a slogan?

"Instead of teaching men to use condoms, we should teach women not to throw babies in dumpsters."

Or how about this?

"Instead of teaching men bullshit like "Rape Culture," we should teach women to quit lying about being raped."

If "teach men not to rape," is a public service announcement, then so are my two offerings. And we have not even begun to address the fact that it is not only men who rape and not only women who are victims.

How to Stop Rape

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 21 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'll tell you first how you don't stop rape.

Seeing a poster that says "My strength is not for hurting" or "don't be that guy" won't do anything that a law doesn't.

You see an anti-rape law is sorta like an anti-rape poster except with a punishment attached for not following what the poster says.

So how is saying "men, don't rape" going to be more effective than saying "men, don't rape" and then adding "if you do, you go to jail?"

Because this is what these feminist inspired posters essentially are. They are a law, against rape, but without the actual criminal punishment. If the law isn't an effective deterrent, than how is a poster going to be an effective deterrent?

Men who rape are not raping because they've been told it's cool or fun or awesome, or because they heard an off color joke, saw a naked ankle or watched porn… they rape because they have a powerful emotional compulsion to do so.

Let's get something clear. Human beings—barring the congenitally emotionally disabled such as sociopaths—don't want to rape. They don't like rape. Rape is the exact opposite of what a human being wants when they engage in sex. Men, who happen to be human beings just like women, want to feel desirable.

Most men are devastated after being rejected by a woman. What makes anyone think that the average man is going to enjoy enduring the most profound rejection one human being can muster for another—which is exactly what the rapist endures in order to rape.

If you saw someone eating broken glass, would you assume the glass is tasty or conclude there's something seriously wrong with the person chowing down?

What the current crop of male targeted anti-rape posters will do is normalize rape. It won't normalize rape for men who aren't compelled to rape in the first place. Nope. It'll just shame them. But it will normalize rape for men who are rapists.

Instead of seeing themselves as damaged individuals who are engaging not just in harm to others, but harm to themselves, rapists—male ones at least—will see themselves as the guys who do what every other guy really wants to do, but doesn't have the balls.

They aren't hurting, they're edgy.

Rapists are in the business of rationalizing their compulsion to repeat, rationalizing their sense of powerlessness, and current anti-rape posters help them do just that. Rape is normal male behaviour, dontchaknow? Something men teach each other to do when feminists aren't there to stop them.

But if jokes, naked ankles and porn don't cause men to rape women, what does?

Being raped.

That's right. In fact, h*aving been sexually abused by a woman[1]* is a stronger risk factor for becoming a future sexual abuser in boys than having been sexually abused by a man.

[image]This is where the emotional compulsion to abuse comes from. This is the motivation. This is the manufacture process for adult male rapists.

Yet despite being sexually violated, only a fraction of these boys go on to abuse! That's how resistant to raping the average male human is; even the most effective method of training a boy to become a rapist—by raping him–is only effective for one out of every ten boys.

The idea that a bad joke, a naked ankle or porn will cause men to rape is demonizing. The idea that there exists a "rape culture" teaching men to rape in any way but by raping them and then ignoring their subsequent emotional disorder is depraved.

And here's the thing. Right now, in the US, there is an epidemic of institutionalized sexual abuse that is being ignored in favor of manufactured statistics about sex trafficking of girls and other juicy sexualized and sensationalized threat narratives designed to push our buttons.

In fact this epidemic of sexual abuse makes the Catholic Church scandal pale in comparison.

Since the 1950s approximately 12,000 men have come forward to admit abuse in the Catholic Church sex scandal.

10,000 boys a year are being sexually abused by female staff in juvenile detention facilities in the US. A YEAR.

So here's the equation. Boys learn to be rapists by having been raped(even if only a fraction of them go on to enact their abuse), and we're turning a blind eye to women raping boys in juvenile facilities—better termed "boy rape camps"—and then we're ignoring, denying and minimizing female-on-male sexual abuse in order to prop up a morally bankrupt feminist empire built on the backs of rape victims—both victims of actual rapists and victims terrorized by rape hysteria itself.

And then we normalize rape with posters that suggest rape is not the abnormal behavior of the emotionally damaged, but a manifestation of masculinity or male culture. Men will rape for trivial reasons because they saw a naked ankle, or porn or hear a rape joke. (Or are dope fiends or black or Jewish or…)

[image]By normalizing rape, these posters do the opposite of what they intend. They empower rapists and disempower emotionally healthy men who would never rape. They promote a distorted, simplistic view of rape as an emergent property of maleness rather than an emergent property of sexual abuse.

As for male victims of female rapists, they never see themselves in these posters. They are never acknowledged at all. This forces the problem of female perpetrated sexual abuse underground; in fact we could see the existence of male-perpetuated sexual abuse as a symptom of our society's absolute inability to recognize male victims and give them timely help.

So how do we stop rape?

We acknowledge female rapists. We acknowledge why boys grow up to be rapists. We provide services for male survivors of sexual abuse so they have a place to heal. Not just to stop the cycle of abuse but because men and boys who are sexual abuse survivors deserve as much compassion as women and girls. We kick the ideologs out of our institutions of healing because what matters is helping people, not perpetuating feminist pseudoscience.

We start by telling the feminists to shut the fuck up.

There is no 'rape culture' and if there is—if the idea of "rape culture" really is 'a culture which enables rape'–you better start backpedaling because it's looking like you're the biggest purveyors of it.

[1] Salter D., McMillan D., Richards M., Talbot T., Hodges J., Bentovim A., Hastings R., Stevenson J., Skuse D., Development of sexually abusive behaviour in sexually victimized males: a longitudinal study, The Lancet, Vol. 361, February 8, 2003

(While we're on the subject of female-perpetuated sexual abuse, most surveys that ask college age women about the sexual abuse they perpetrate find a shocking levels of female-perpetrated sexual abuse. Other surveys find that men who perpetuate sexual abuse are also sexually abused, suggesting a cycle of sexual abuse on college campuses. Perhaps rather than being victims of an indifferent system these silent female rape victims–who are ALSO part of a culture of cyclical sexual abuse–fail to come forward to the authorities about their abuse because it would mean admitting that they also are rapists? So the constant drumbeat of feminist agitprop about making these women “comfortable” never will, unless feminists invent a ray gun that neutralizes cognitive dissonance.)

Mary P. Koss, Feminist Rape Apologist

Jim Doyle · 21 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Koss influences a government entity to erase male victims of rape.

SUMMARY:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Mary P. Koss insists on a definition of rape that conceals the incidence of female-on-male rape;
- The center for disease control (CDC) is a government entity charged with serving the entire public and all citizens of the United States equally;
- There is an appearance that Mary P. Koss has by her association with the CDC influenced it to formulate findings in a way that favors one group of citizens over another, that in fact significantly disadvantages the second group of citizens;
- Anyone in a position of public trust, including any position supported by public funds, has a responsibility to prevent her or his private opinions from compromising the mission of the organization she or he serves to serve all citizens equally;
- There is an appearance that rather than preventing her personal opinions from compromising the mission of the organization she is associated with, she has allowed those personal opinions to influence the function of that public entity.

DISCUSSION:

Mary P. Koss is a widely-quoted feminist writer on the incidence of rape. Her methods and her claims have been controversial. In 2009 a controversy developed around a paper of hers – articles and threads here, here, and here.

She is an influential writer on the subject and her methods and results deserve scrutiny.

In a post earlier this year commenter Tamen noted a tendency in Koss to minimize the scope and incidence of rape of males, especially by women. He said at the time:

"However, Victory_Disease on Reddit made me aware of this paper by Mary P Koss: Detecting the Scope of Rape : A Review of Prevalence Research Methods which show that it's not simply a matter of focusing on female victims, but rather a conscious effort to exclude male victims of rape from the term rape."

He specifically noted a section in that paper where she says:

> "Although consideration of male victims is within the scope of the legal statutes, it is important to restrict the term rape to instances where male victims were penetrated by offenders. It is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman. p. 206"

He goes on to point how she chooses terms that emphasize or exaggerate male agency and minimize or trivialize female agency. He finishes by noting a paragraph in which she recommends a formulation of "rape" that is gynonormative, such that if the crime does not involve penetration of the victim, it is not rape. The effect if not the intent is to erase the crime of rape by envelopment.

Later Tamen noted a similarity between Koss' position and the one reflected in the CDC's formulation of rape in its NISVS 2010 Report. In the course of pursuing the matter with the CDC (the text of his correspondence with the CDC is at the end of this post.), and getting a dismissively tautological and circular answer, he stumbled across a piece of information that may bear on the similarity in positions he had noted.

This is the history of association between Mary P. Koss and the CDC he found:

1996: Expert Panel Member, "Definitions of Sexual Assault," Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

2003- : Selected to direct the Sexual Violence Applied Research Advisory Group, VAWNET.org, the national online resource on violence against women funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

2003- : Member, team of expert advisors, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on teen partner violence

2003- : Panel of Experts, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control on scales to measure intimate partner violence, resulted in the publication of CDC Intimate Partner Violence compendium, 2005

2003-4: Consultant, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, CDC Intimate Partner Violence compendium, 2005 IPV Compendium on assessment of sexual violence and inclusion as recommended standard assessments in the field of two Koss-authored assessments (Sexual Experiences Survey-victimization, and Sexual Experiences Survey-perpetration)

Again, Mary P. Koss is entitled to hold any personal opinions she chooses, however odious. She has, however, no right to use her position of trust to impose these personal and private opinions on public policy or results of research intended to form that public policy. Furthermore, public entities with which she or anyone is associated have a responsibility also to ensure that the barrier between private and personal opinion and public policy is maintained and safeguarded.

If this were simply an isolated instance of one person misusing her position, it would be a small matter and simple to correct. It is however part of a larger consensus and pattern of distortion of evidence and erasure when it concerns male victims of rape in general and especially male victims of female rapists.

The problem is quite structural and goes to the local level where evidence is distorted by either a failure or a refusal to report and record even quite clear cases of rape as rape, as in the case of this mother who sodomized her two-year-old son so forcibly with a vibrator that surgery was necessary to remove it. Note how the incident is being charged: as child abuse and sexual misconduct with a minor rather than child rape. If sodomizing an infant so severely that it requires surgery to remove the rape device is not child rape, then nothing is.

Absolutely vile.

Tamen's correspondence with the CDC as posted on Reddit Men's Rights:

CDC's response to whether they will categorize "being made to penetrate someone else" in future reports (self.MensRights)

submitted 2 days ago* by Tamen_

I had a mail account failure and forgot/missed that I a year ago sent this mail to the CDC:

Hi,

One finding of the NISVS 2010 Report which was not reported anywhere in press releases and media (as far as I could see) was that 1.1% of men reported being made to penetrate someone else the last 12 months. That 1.1% of women reported being raped the last 12 months puts this into a perspective which goes very much against common beliefs about male victimization.

Was this finding not interesting or conclusive enough to at least mention in press releases?

The lifetime numbers differs more. Did CDC look into why there was such a difference in lifetime prevalency numbers and numbers for the last 12 months for male victims of "being made to penetrate someone else"?

Will future CDC Reports continue to keep "being made to penetrate someone else" as a category separate from rape or will they be put together/seen as the same as in the new FBI definition of rape?

Best regards, Xxxxxx Yyyyyy

A week later I got the response (my emphasis):

Mr. Yyyyy,

Thank you for your interest in the NISVS Survey. The NISVS subject matters experts have provided the following information in response to your inquiry:

We understand your concern that the 12 month prevalence for Made to Penetrate was not included in the press release. Unfortunately, due to space limitation in a press release, we were not able to highlight many of the important findings. This information, however, was included in main summary report. In addition, we are currently working on preparing a number of more in-depth reports to follow our first summary report, including one that focuses specifically on sexual violence.

With regards to the definitional issues you mentioned, Made to Penetrate is a form of sexual violence that is distinguished from rape. Being made to penetrate represents times when the victim was made to, or there was an attempt to make them, sexually penetrate someone else (i.e., the perpetrator) without the victim's consent. In contrast, rape represents times when the victim, herself or himself, was sexually penetrated or there was an attempt to do so. In both rape and made to penetrate situations, this may have happened through the use of physical force (such as being pinned or held down, or by the use of violence) or threats to physically harm; it also includes times when the victim was drunk, high, drugged, or passed out and unable to consent.

In summary, rape victimization constitutes times when the victim is penetrated. Made to penetrate are incidents where the victim is forced to penetrate their perpetrator, so does not meet the definition of rape.

Appendix C on page 106 of the report lists the victimization questions. As you will see, the questions were asked in such a way that the perpetrator was the one being penetrated by the victim in made to penetrate cases, not a third party. For example, "how many people have ever used physical force or threats of physical harm to make you have vaginal sex with them?" Or "how many people have ever used physical force or threats of physical harm to make you perform anal sex, meaning they made you put your penis into their anus?" Or "when you were drunk, high, drugged or passed out and unable to consent, how many people ever made you receive oral sex, meaning that they put their mouth on your {if male: penis}?"

The FBI definition of rape does not apply here – made to penetrate as we have defined it is distinct from rape and should not be included in a definition of rape.

Until the special reports are available and/or the data set is ready for public use, if there are additional specific questions we can answer, we would be happy to do so. We appreciate your interest in these data.

Sincerely, CDC NISVS Team

Apparently they thought my question about whether "being made to penetrate someone else" would be categorized as rape as per the FBI definition which was revealed shortly after the NISVS 2010 Report was published was due to my inability to read the definitions of rape and "being amde to penetrate someone else" in the report itself.

Apparently it is self-evident for them that it's not rape and hence they are perfectly aligned with Mary P Koss recommendations ("It is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman" page 206 in the full article) also in future surveys and doesn't plan to align the definition with the "new" FBI definition of rape – which can and in my view should be interpreted to include rape by envelopment.

I know that that paper on how to measure rape prevalency by Mary P Koss has been cited by CDC in other contexts (Reference 7).

I decided to look at Mary P. Koss' CV:

1996: Expert Panel Member, "Definitions of Sexual Assault," Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

2003- : Selected to direct the Sexual Violence Applied Research Advisory Group, VAWNET.org, the national online resource on violence against women funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

No wonder it's self-evident for the CDC that it is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman.

Edited again: The title of course should be: CDC's response to whether they will categorize "being made to penetrate someone else" as rape in future reports

Munib Sajjad, it's your turn in the barrel

John Hembling (JtO) · 21 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Avery Haines: You're feeling is that this group [a newly formed men's awareness group] should be banned from being on campus.

After a pause, Munib Sajjad the VP of University Affairs for UTSU answers, "Yes."

Haines asks, "And why are you hesitant to say yes?"

Sajjad replied: "I feel I'm going to be targeted afterwards."

I don't like using military metaphors in my writing like "targeted," as they can imply a violent intention which is inappropriate. But Munib Sajjad was right. If I were a religious man, maybe I'd pray for him. Welcome to A Voice for Men, Mr Sajjad.

Of course Munib, when I say we're "targeting" you I mean we're going to write about your actions. Sans your disingenuous military slang, "targeting," it is simply called "journalism." I'm sure you like that less, though, than the implied violence of being "targeted." For starters, journalism doesn't give you a threat narrative to work with, like your claim that the women on the University of Toronto's campus are frightened by a men's issues group, or a men's human rights movement. Men (and women) seeking solutions to issues like the male 80% domination of suicide, marginalization in education, and so on.

From this you're constructing a narrative of fear for the female students at the University of Toronto: a threat narrative, the political purposes of which I'll return to later in this article. So yes, we'll be "targeting" you and your comrades. Another way of saying that is that we'll be exposing you. This exposure will, I hope, give you a very small taste of accountability. Certainly, it's less exposure than you deserve.

Now, prior to this article's publication, we "targeted" (reported on) the violent and criminal actions of some of the female protestors at previous University of Toronto speaking events organized by the Canadian Association for Equality. Censorship, intimidation, harassment and violence by these individuals was written about at AVfM. Barring the recent reportage by City TV News, this was something the mainstream media has not had the courage to do.

They're cute, sweet-faced girls, so their initiation of violence in public is somehow less destructive than the same actions would be if committed by young men? That appears to be the inhibition. This is a toxic double standard enabling the promotion of hate, the suppression of free speech, and the engagement in violence by those sweet-faced young female students. Violent bigots with tits and vaginas are just as toxic as their male counterparts. So guess what? We reported on them.

And we will continue to do so.

Now it's your turn in the spotlight Mr Sajjad. You've advocated for the suppression of free speech, and against freedom of association. You're either a hopelessly confused child lacking the most basic understanding of human rights, or you're a bigoted, violence supporting thug. I lean towards ignorance on your part, thus my pains in this article to explain these simple issues to you. You may dismiss all this with another expression common to your ilk, "mansplaining."

As a side-note, one of my other writing projects is a lexicon of feminist terminology. The entry for that term reads as follows:

Mansplain.

A sexist term used by misandrist individuals to disrespect, belittle and devalue the opinion any argument or expression from a male.

This is a pejorative characterization and dismissal of any expressed opinion based on the sex of the speaker. It is equivalent to dismissing the opinion of an ethnically identified speaker with the term “niggersplaining.”

During her reporting on the Nathanson and Young lecture in Toronto, Avery Haines of City TV News relayed a claim from Student Union at the University of Toronto claimed that “women are scared.”

Was Vanja Krajina “scared” when she relentless goaded a young man she knew nothing about at the Warren Farrell lecture in November? No, she was not scared. She was absolutely confident of her power to inflict accusations on her male contemporaries with no consequence to herself. In fact, her language and posture telegraphed the unmistakable intention to provoke. Even a defensive gesture from one of her victims would have been transmuted into aggression in the feminist threat narrative.

At the Nathanson and Young presentation, the individual earning the nickname Little-Red-Frothing-Fornication-Mouth demonstrated a similar strategy. She demonstrated aggression and contempt for men, including those vulnerable to suicide – so that a negative emotional reaction could be provoked and exploited. She wanted to use the pain of men as “proof” of the feminist threat narrative; a narrative in which women are under threat, and men and MHRAs are the aggressors. Neither Vanja Krajina nor “Big Red” are frightened now – even after being “targeted”. If anything, they are delighted to continue selling a fabricated narrative of their own victimhood.

The problem, for them is that feminism no longer controls a monopoly of the public discourse on gender. The story told by the splashy, feminine silencers of dissenting opinion – that they are the victims — doesn’t hold together when seen outside the gender ideological lens.

And now, Mr Sajjad, it’s your turn in the barrel.

What is it about men working to address male-impacting human rights issues that has you so exercised? Why are the feminists on your campus so frightened of a male human rights movement? And where are your concerns over a subset of the members of the U of T Student’s Union that dramatically re-branded themselves as the “Revolutionary Students Movement” for the purpose of issuing public threats of violence?

“At worst, they [the men’s human rights movement] represent the most reactive, backward voices within the masses. As such, they need to be verbally condemned as well as physically challenged.” (emphasis mine).

Were you one of the authors of that nugget of stupid, Mr Sajjad? If so, you’ve been a very naughty little doggie; silencing free expression, suppressing the right of peaceful association, opposing the human rights of men and boys, and now promising and excusing violence. And if I’m reading that incorrectly as a promise of physical mayhem, why did the, ahem, protesters of the Nathanson and Young lecture come armed with bludgeons?

As those bludgeons were beaten by a mob of masked angry thugs on the floor in the hallway outside the lecture hall where the two authors were speaking, I walked into that crowd and asked the simple question: “what if you’re wrong.”

When I asked that question, the spear-point style floor pounding was modified to a forward slashing hockey-stick style bashing of the hallway – directed at me, in answer.

When Munib Sajjad claims that “women are scared”, he is conflating the proponents of an ideology of gender with the members of the sex that ideology pretends to care about. Women are a group of people. Feminism, by contrast, is a construct formed from ideas. The claim that they are the same thing is easily demolished by realizing that the disposable bodies of conformist males are the enforcers of feminist-initiated violence. Those stupid male lapdogs with bludgeons are feminism’s muscle.

These ideologues are scared, however, but what scares them is exposure. It is the public exposure of their hatred and the violence that these gender ideologues fear. The proponents of the mainstream-on-campus flavor of gender ideology are terrified of loss of their power to silence, to threaten, and command obedience from all other parties. That’s what Munib really means when he says “women are scared”. Women, for him, is a code word.

What Munib Sajjad and his male and female comrades opposing the human rights of men and boys have not yet realized is that his attempts to censor, to silence, and to intimidate are providing Men's Human Rights Activists with the most effective and convincing public demonstration of the truth of this cause we've ever had.

In fact, "Little-Red-Fornication-Mouth" will be offered free air travel to our next public event, because she is so effective at demonstrating the bankruptcy of the ideology we oppose. We aren't making the same offer to Munib Sajjad, as he's nowhere near as effective a public presence. However, he shouldn't feel too bad, he's certainly worth discussing in an article on the site. With some practice as a public speaker, and perhaps some acting lessons, he might eventually become as obnoxious and illustrative of feminism's moral failings as his red-headed, lipstick-wearing colleague.

The M.E.U. never stops

Lucian Vâlsan · 22 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We should no longer abbreviate the European Union with the EU but rather with M.E.U. standing for the Misandric European Union. It has come to a point that not even a week goes by without ~~the Supreme Soviet~~ the European Parliament rubber stamping another misandric law proposed by ~~the Politburo~~ the European Commission.

This time, we're talking about a law written in 2004 but rejected several times because enough individual nations dared to say "NO" and the matter was kept out of the powers of the Eurocracy. However, nowadays the European Parliament can basically make laws about literally anything and the EU now has powers without any kind of limits[1].

The law is called "Council Directive 2004/113/EC of 13 December 2004 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods and services"[2] and it's due to enter into force starting next year according to Minodora Cliveti, Romanian Socialist MEP[3].

Like any other EU law, the title and the introduction of the law seems quite harmless. I mean,… what's wrong with men and women having equal treatment in the access to and supply of goods and services, right? Well, just like any other EU law, particularly when it comes to sexual matters, the (feminist) Devil is in the details.

The article 2 in the "Whereas" section reads as follows:

> (2) The right to equality before the law and protection against discrimination for all persons constitutes a universal right recognised by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination Against Women, the International Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Racial Discrimination and the United Nations Covenants on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, to which all Member States are signatories.

So, right from the get-go, despite the appearance of being about "men and women" we see that this has nothing to do with that at all, but only with women. The logical conclusion of this law article is that discrimination against men is ok. And it's the correct conclusion since the European Court of Justice stated 16 yeas ago that discrimination against men is ok[4].

Then we have the article 20 which says the following:

> (20) Less favourable treatment of women for reasons of pregnancy and maternity should be considered a form of direct discrimination based on sex and therefore prohibited in insurance and related financial services. Costs related to risks of pregnancy and maternity should therefore not be attributed to the members of one sex only.

And here we have again the Eurocracy attempting to mitigate natural consequences. Basically, what this article is saying is that men should pay more because women get pregnant. I never had any children, nor do I ever intend to have any, so why should I pay more because other women get pregnant? Why am I supposed to contribute to someone else's offspring? Why shouldn't the costs related to risks of pregnancy and maternity be attributed to members of one sex only? Are the costs related to risks of prostate or testicular cancer attributed to women, too? The point is that this law is extending the powers of the Eurocracy even more into mitigating natural consequences and, besides that, it throws even more of the individual freedom of men and boys out on the window.

Further into the document, we have article 4.3 that goes like this:

> Harassment and sexual harassment within the meaning of this Directive shall be deemed to be discrimination on the grounds of sex and therefore prohibited. A person's rejection of, or submission to, such conduct may not be used as a basis for a decision affecting that person.

Translated into plain English, this means that the State gets to decide what happened, regardless of the actual reality. This is particularly true when it comes to crimes like sexual harassment. A concrete example would be from one of my former jobs where we had a female colleague who would come and hug all the guys and kiss them on the cheek each time she came to work and sometimes right before leaving the office. None of the guys were particularly thrilled with this but also nobody had a particular issue with it since she was generally a nice person so we all took it as a personal caprice of hers that we tolerated, just like we were tolerating one of the guys' vulgar language and another woman's weird accent.

However, under this law, the State could now come and punish our colleague – even though none of us had a problem with it.

But perhaps the most abhorrent provision of this document, that shows exactly how the doublespeak and doublethink process is entrenched into EU politics is the article 4.5 which goes like this:

> This Directive shall not preclude differences in treatment, if the provision of the goods and services exclusively or primarily to members of one sex is justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary.

So we want to end discrimination, but if we have to discriminate in order to do our job, we will do it. In other words, the ends justifies the means. We've heard that before, back in the days of USSR. The current Marxist-Feminist establishment within the EU cares exactly about the same things that the former Marxist-Leninist establishment used to care about: Equality of outcome.

Given the misandric history of the EU, Article 4.5 will be used to implement even more misandric policies all over the EU, then package them nicely and sell them as "progressive policies" to non-EU countries like Macedonia, Moldova, Serbia, Ukraine or Albania, countries that seem to swallow every bit of bullshit that has the "Euro" stamp on it.

For those of you that still think the European Union is a good idea, or that it used to be a good idea until feminism hit the fan, I wish to remind you that the creation of Yugoslavia used to be perceived as a good idea and countless millions of men (and almost exclusively men!) died because of it. In fact, Communism itself was the "great idea" of the twentieth century. Countries like Romania had to have several thousands of its men dying in order to realize how bad the idea was in the first place.

We would need at least two years, providing that the EU stops for two years, just to read and document all of the misandric legislation that was pushed through the European Parliament in the last decade. At least one misandric law goes through the parliament every week. In some weeks, however, there are three, four or even more misandric laws being passed. At this rate, the individual freedom of men and boys will be practically nonexistent by the end of 2020.

Ladies and gentlemen, this is war. And you'd better be prepared for it. The first step is to remember the list of feminist MEPs when you go to vote next time.

AVFM Retraction

[box]

It is expected in publishing news stories that you are occasionally going to get something wrong. In that case, a retraction is a necessary and responsible follow-up.

That is the case now with my coverage of the story on Georgetown University and a woman who allegedly worked in the admissions office and who self-disclosed on a blog that she had disposed of applications based on sex and race.

In hindsight it is apparent that I was too fast on the trigger in establishing a connection between the blogger who claimed to have sabotaged the applications and that of a former student at Georgetown. While there is circumstantial evidence that does connect the two, and many unanswered questions, there is nothing that makes that connection a verifiable certainty.

It was a mistake on my part for which I apologize to the woman in question, and to any readers who felt they were misled. The original article naming her has been updated with a link to this retraction and her name has been redacted from the article. I am also removing all comments to the article and closing them to make sure no references to her are made.

I also want to make it clear that this retraction does not mean that AVFM is abandoning its investigation into the validity of the claims made about trashing university applications based on sex and race. Additionally, we are not done with concerns about the university itself, whose unusual and somewhat cryptic manner of responding to this story leaves more questions than answers.

In fact, while this story had already been posted to several high traffic areas of the internet, we did not take an interest in it until it became apparent that Georgetown University was moving, without explanation, to remove all references to her from their websites. That sparked interest here because they did so without any attempt to refute the claims of the internet story.

More updates on this will be provided as they become available.

Restraining Order Terrorism – The Continuing Saga

Michael Conzachi · 22 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[quote]The fight for justice against corruption is never easy. It never has been and never will be. It exacts a toll on our self, our families, our friends, and especially our children. In the end, I believe, as in my case, the price we pay is well worth holding on to our dignity. ~ Frank Serpico[/quote]

The emerging shift leans towards others besides Perrette.

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]f you have been following the various posts on A Voice for Men and the other sites, you are well versed in the case of Coyote Shivers and Pauley Perrette. The comments, phone calls, emails, and a plethora of social media getting their two cents in have gone viral. For all who have emailed and called, please try to understand that we will address each of your concerns as time permits.

As any responsible and professional reporter or journalist would do, the information has to be vetted and logically reviewed to insure a somewhat accurate picture of the events can be determined. Public and court records continue to be reviewed and a host of individuals have been and will continue to be interviewed in depth. A common sense, scientific, forensic and logical approach has been applied to insure clear objectivity.

What has been learned thus far is disturbing.

We have revealed in greater depth is the dirty, scandalous, and dangerous subculture and underworld of "Hollywood." A couple of words that have been thrown around are "collusion" and "corruption" and whether or not that is the case will ultimately be determined in due time. It is truly disturbing in that a number of individuals have raised concerns for their safety and for the safety of the many who have been writing, reporting, and publicly commenting on this case.

What is also becoming increasingly clear is that the antics of Ms. Perrette have taken somewhat of back seat to the bigger problem and issue; to those private and governmental decision makers that have catered, encouraged, or facilitated this debacle.

Let's face it; every clue, red flag and warning sign has been on display by Perrette, and Clinical Psychologist Dr. Tara Palmatier PsyD hit the nail right on the head with her assessment in her article. Perrette is a dupe, a stooge, and just one of the circus clowns in this, for lack of a better term, circus. Contrary to the brilliant, fictional forensic scientist Perrette plays on television, brilliance is not the term I would use. Nor would I use the term "forensic." In fact, forensics will be one of the primary factors that will lead to the downfall of this case, and most likely a host of others.

If in the event Mr. Shivers, upon sentencing this week, is remanded into custody, he can have some solace that he may have some company in the form of a cellmate.

This organization as well as many others have been writing, researching, compiling information, and have performed activism at a variety of levels for years espousing how incredibly horrid the restraining order system is in this country, and how it is getting much worse. The restraining order system is perhaps the most widely abused and manipulated court process this nation has ever seen.

According to Mr. R.K. Hendrick, Esq., an attorney and author who has served as a prosecutor, defense attorney, judge pro tem, and family law attorney has this to say; "Restraining orders bring out the absolute best and the absolute worst of what our legal system has to offer. They are a microcosm of the dynamics that permeate our society. Unfortunately they are one of the most misused and abused tools in our modern-day legal system."

Former U.S. Marine Captain, Naval Academy graduate and Gulf War veteran Ron Lasorsa links the divorce and restraining order system to a "cottage industry."

The reason is that with each new legislative year and with each new reauthorization of the Violence Against Women Act, the definitions of what constitutes intimate partner violence have expanded to the point where logic and common sense are virtually non-existent. Opponents of the act; labeled as "woman haters" and of waging a war on women simply wanted to end the gender biased and entrenched discrimination along with the restoration of constitutional rights and due process guarantees. Many women's organizations were opposed to the act.

The primary reason for such abuse is the complete lack of accountability and the fact that virtually no one is ever prosecuted for perjury or any other crime that is committed in the procurement of one of these orders. They are rubber stamped by judges, and despite the noble assertions by the judiciary that they are acting in the best interests of the alleged victim, they are actually acting in their own best interests; their own careers. A 1995 New Jersey law journal article covering a judge's conference reinforced and confirmed that perception.

Further complicating this process; which is unique to the Los Angeles area, is the entertainment industry and the attorneys, PR companies, groupies and hangers-on, and governmental institutions that enable, assist, facilitate, and in some cases are complicit — ethically and quite possibly criminally — in the aggressive procurement of these orders.

The case of Shivers vs Perrette is both unique and quite common. The exception of course is the intense celebrity media attention being given; and the exception is the fact that a host of dedicated professionals have and continue to microscopically examine every facet.

That is making some sweat; making some nervous. Some have not experienced this kind of close scrutiny; no one has been looking over their shoulder.

It will be interesting to see who will be the first to "crack," who will be the first to become a "snitch." I have seen it time and again with many much more hardened individuals.

Imagine, living a fairly affluent life style, rubbing elbows with the "A-Listers," nice offices, parties, a level of financial security, politicking for that lucrative position. Now suddenly the gig is up, the career seems doomed, the future is derailed and facing public and family scorn and ridicule. The loss of assets and the prospect of a stint in an 8 by 10 cell can make anybody nervous; you know; kind of like what Mr. Shivers has experienced.

This leads me to the current and latest developments.

Upon further review and close inspection, some of the court documents already in the public case file have unequivocally revealed serious and egregious ethical misconduct that is sufficient for the filing of a complaint that involves at least one and possibly more individuals who are members of the state bar.

A Voice for Men, the contributors, researchers, and others will remain diligent and persistent in the pursuit of the truth and to insure justice is served, wherever it is required.

This story is a work in progress, literally. Stay tuned to this site for additional revealing information and the release of additional facts and documents.

Everything and everyone who has spoken out and advocated on the catastrophic abuse and misuse of the restraining order system, will come out in this case; with a little goofy-nutty "Hollywood" thrown in simply for entertainment purposes.

To all of those actual and true victims of intimate partner violence, women, men, and children; all I can say is that I am truly sorry. I am sorry that you could not get the services you needed because of the waste and fraud. I am sorry that you could not get your day in court caused by the backlog of cases from false accusers. I am sorry for your suffering while cases like Francis Shivers and his dangerous cell phone camera and big mouth on social media is aggressively pursued to the ends of the galaxy. As a decent, logical, and compassionate human being, I am sorry and I am trying to do a small part to correct that.

On a personal level, I am saddened, disappointed and embarrassed by the career profession that I served for three decades and the private and governmental legal professions; the judicial institutions of which I was intrinsically a part. I am embarrassed by the void of ethics, integrity, and honesty that has been on display in this case.

I am also confident and inspired by the fact that not all in those institutions have trampled on their oath to serve the public, and we shall see who steps up to the plate to help restore the public trust.

Stay tuned and stock up on popcorn.

Radfem 2013 Cancelled, Cathy Brennan Explodes

Andy Thomas · 22 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A Voice for Male Students, a student group based in the US, has reached out to us at MRA London with a warning about our personal safety, and possible reprisals, after we mounted an impromptu protest at the London Irish Centre over the planned Radfem 2013 conference.

Thank you guys for your genuine concern! Personal safety is an aspect which is not lost on me.

For myself, I made a personal decision sometime ago to get involved and to get out there, no matter what the consequences. Most of the people in our own group, both men and women alike, have personal experiences beyond belief, and what we realise is that we have nothing to lose — but so much to gain.

We are not professionals when it comes to undertaking direct action. In fact, Rod (bless!) the original founder of our group, even began blurting out a profuse apology to the guys at the Irish Centre over "the interruption" — until I stood on his toe to shut him up. Nevertheless, because of our action, the Radfem's pro-violence ideology is now out in the open and, if we can do this — anybody can!

The Radfem booking was subsequently cancelled by the venue centre and feminist overlord and "Radical Hub" website (ex-)owner, Cathy Brennan, is now raging at her spit-flecked computer screen. In fact, she rants on her personal blog that she intends to go ahead with the planned Radfem conference at the London Irish Centre anyway, cancellation or no cancellation. My mind boggles — presumably this would be a bit like being rejected at a job interview, but turning up at the company for "work" and demanding a desk!

But, nevertheless, this is what Brennan says she is going to do…

> We do not accept the London Irish Centre's unjustifiable rejection of our booking. … We will have our conference. It will be at the London Irish Centre from the 8th – 9th of June.
> Cathy Brennan – Radfem 2013

Whatever you say "Jill", you're the master race!

(The full contents of Brennan's spleen can be found on her personal blog.)

Here is a women who is obviously not used to being told "No!" In fact, I seriously suspect that she has absolutely no idea what it means. So, I thought I would write a quick refresher for her:

> NO MEANS NO!
> No – "A negative response; a denial or refusal."

As this saga rumbles on, I'm finding that I have a great deal of sympathy of the London Irish Centre. Possibly they thought they were hosting an event concerned with "equality" or something. Who knows? This must be a very painful lesson for them, but it's one that people everywhere must learn.

In 2011 James Huff, operating under the pseudonym "Agent Orange," did an exposé on the radical feminist collective blog, Radical Hub (aka "Radfem Hub"). His findings — which uncovered discussions on child murder, gendercide, transgender extermination, castration and eugenics — must be difficult to comprehend for anyone used to only associating feminism with liberation and equality. At the time, A Voice for Men put out a press release which links to a large downloadable dump of past Radical Hub postings assembled by guys at the antimisandry.com forum.

Thanks Chonky! She's improving so much in the game.

And best of all, she's made wonderful friendships with the other girls.

I hate little boys, as much as I hate grown men. Even baby boys. It makes me all pissy to know they have a life to look forward to filled with privilege and entitlement, for no other reason than being born with a dangly thing.

Yep the sense of entitlement amongst the tiniest boyz is a sickening sight to endure as a mum of the true inheritors of the earth, girls....boyz are little shites most of the time and lazy with inferior egos that have to be massaged at the expense of girls..mums just adore their boyz??????????
You just gotta make sure you raise your girls with an even greater sense of entitlement to make up for all the gazzillion years girls and womon have had to endure less.....

(The Radical Hub website was taken down in February 2013, prior to the announcement of the Radfem 2013 conference.)

For too long, the likes of Brennan and Sheila Jeffreys — an academic who teaches that "Men are the enemy" across Australian academia and contributor to the male eugenics discussion group on Radical Hub — have been allowed to hide under a rock. For the first time, we are now lifting that rock and shining a torch onto what's lurking underneath.

It wouldn't matter so much if radical feminists were just a bunch of harmless crazies who nobody listens to — if only this was true! They are a powerful group of women with influence throughout academia, media and law. Cathy Brennan is a US attorney in Maryland, and Professor Sheila Jeffreys is a prominent academician in Australia.

But as Martin Luther King once wrote:

> "There comes a time when one must take a position that is neither safe, nor politic, nor popular, but he must take it because conscience tells him it is right."

We in MRA London, and the wider men's human rights movement, are men and women willing stand up for males everywhere — adult men, old men, and boys of all ages. We have put everything we have into this — our time, effort, financial resources, heart and soul. We have nothing to gain other than our self-respect and self-worth, plus the experience of engaging life to its fullest extent. We are sick of sitting on the sidelines while the likes of Brennan and Jeffreys trample all over our human worth.

So, you see, this is everything to us and we are here to stay.

Discourse.

Discourse was one of the topics under discussion at the Nathanson and Young lecture at the University of Toronto on April 4 of this year. It has always been one of my goals as a Men's Human Rights Activist. It is to the proponents of our culture's major ideology of gender that my efforts at discourse have been directed. However, a seemingly monolithic and persistent refusal by gender ideologues, to allow that discourse has informed many of my expectations of feminists. That refusal led, in 2011 to an article called "Where is the Counter Argument". It is now hosted on AVFM under the heading "Why we don't try to reason with Feminists".

There is a persistent refusal by gender ideologues to respond to any argument for the basic human rights of men and boys–except with accusations of everything from rape apologetics to genital hypotrophy. The gender-ideological response to any address of male human rights has been irrelevant, unfounded and gleefully sadistic narratives of the malevolent evil, and the sheer rapy-ness of any male daring to define himself or his brothers as humans with human rights.

And when even that is apparently too complex or nuanced, just : "Shut the fuck up!" and "Patriarchy! Fuckface!"

And this long standing trend, familiar to anyone who has argued for the recognition of basic human rights for men and boys – is what informs a certain attitude among Men's Human Rights Activists toward the cult of false humanism known as feminism, based on real violence and hatred.

In June of 2011, I wrote words which resonated with men and women around the world. Men and women weary of the lies and double-standards of gender ideologues.

> I don't mind telling you, I am no longer here to debate, or to reason, or to converse, or to hope you may be reached by logic or evidence. I am here to fuck your shit up.

My friends, it has been a busy couple of years.

What should be obvious to anyone with at least a few years of experience in this movement is that as the MHRM has grown, the tenor of gender ideological discourse has shifted rapidly.

On December 13, 2012, the Jezebel contributor Kate Harding wrote a public lament that Men's Human Rights Activists, in their stubborn refusal to shut the fuck up for the benefit of feminists – are preventing them from solving the problems and human rights issues facing men. Yes, according to Harding, feminists have been trying all along to address men's human rights issues, and (according to her) it is us preventing the solution.

Says Harding:

> Fuck you [men's rights activists], first of all, for making it nearly impossible for decent men struggling with abusive partners or unfair custody arrangements to get the help they need and deserve. You have forever tainted those issues with your rage-filled, obsessively anti-woman horseshit, to the point where it's become difficult for any rational, compassionate person to trust a man who claims he's been screwed over in family court or abused by a female partner, even if he has.

According to Harding, and apparently many of her comrades – if only we'd all shut up and go away, the femmies would have our human rights concerns sorted out and solved by next week.

Indeed.

In other news, the endless repackaging of the second-wave feminist talking point "all men are rapists and that's all they are" continues apace. Obviously, nobody taken seriously still uses that old, false and obviously hateful slogan. Rather, gender ideologues re-frame it to make the core message of hatred palatable to modern sensibilities. "Rape culture" is a re-packaging of the same message, as is "men can stop rape" and "teach men to not rape". The implication is that without special education, the default state for the male half of the human race is a complete willingness and desire to commit the violent crime of rape.

One of the most recent re-framings of this nugget of hate takes the form of "consent is sexy". Let's set aside the puerile and simplistic conception of sex as a transaction practiced in clear unambiguous language of agreement, notarized with witnessed receipts and professional bureaucrats to approval stamp every step of the way. This "consent is sexy" rhetoric does just what gender ideologues like Harding have done, in her ham-fisted attempt to claim ownership of male human rights advocacy.

Rather than attempting to dictate their false reality to the world: "all men are rapists" or "men run the world for the purpose of oppressing women" – gender ideologues have changed their rhetoric.

The feminist rhetoric "Consent is sexy" is an attempt to bargain; to negotiate their way into acceptance that "all men are rapists," by framing it in different language, with the promise of some pussy attached.

They did this because the idea that "all men are rapists" is so incredibly, patently ridiculous on its face that it needed to be peddled more softly, even adding a poontang reward into the mix to make it palatable. This helps enlist the services of male sycophants and quislings when needed to block doors or strong-arm people into being quiet.

Similarly, the claim by gender ideologues that they are thwarted by MRAs in their efforts to address the human rights issues of men and boys is an attempt by them to clamor for lost ground. They know that with the enormous growth of the MHRM, and also with the explosion of people who are not MHRAs but are just sick of feminist lies and victim mongering, that the days of them owning the podium are over. And so now they come, with promises of their dedication to actual human rights issues, not to mention their available vaginae, in an attempt to negotiate their way back into an authoritative position.

Gentlemen and ladies (and others) of the MHRM, return the podium to the gender ideologues! They have our best interests at heart, really, really. Agree with the most recent reframing of the second-wave's claim that you are, if male, automatically a rapist. Just give in, and if you do, there's approval and maybe even some sex in the deal for you.

"Consent is sexy".

Ooh, what a deal! I can hardly wait to have feminists carrying their share of this human rights movement forward.

Well, except for a minor hitch. Just the fact that like everything else from gender ideologues before now, it's all a sham. I'm also not the only person in this conversation to carry a sharp awareness that feminism's long-standing operational mode has been the infiltration and corruption of other social movements (civil rights, anyone?). I mention those complaints only in passing, however.

What's most interesting is that for the first time, in part thanks to AVFM, gender ideologues have found it necessary to attempt to bargain, rather than dictate. And this brings us back to the topic of this discussion.

What is necessary for honest discourse?

And, for the gender-ideologues who might be reading this: So you want to come to the table to talk, do you?

Earlier in this piece, I mentioned the concluding paragraph of an article published on this site in 2011.

> The fact that shutting me up, and shutting up other MRAs is a major goal is illustrative of just what we oppose. The truth does not require state funded enforcers. Now, in addition to not shutting up, and in light of my, and other's increased understanding of just who and what you are who oppose the men's > movement – namely that you are violent, lying hypocrites lacking interest in truth, and consumed with a self serving philosophy which relies on escalating harm to those you pretend to protect. I don't mind telling you, I am no longer here to debate, or to reason, or to converse, or to hope you may be reached by logic or evidence.

> I am here to fuck your shit up.

In other words, if you come to this conversation with a gun in your hand, or a box-cutter, a bludgeon (as those feminists I've recently faced have done), or screaming "Shut up, fuckface!" at others in the conversation – DON'T expect to be treated as anything except a stupid, armed and dangerous thug.

Expect instead to have your shit fucked up.

I have been saying for years that the gender ideology calling itself feminism was violent and hateful, and what did its proponents do to prove me wrong? They came in force, bringing bludgeons in Toronto and knives in Vancouver to silence opinions they disagreed with, all while screaming their narrative of threat through megaphones, to justify the weapons in their hands. They even advertised on blogs and websites that they were coming with violence on their minds.

Lets be clear in our expectations, although the threats of violence and the menace of a masked, armed mob failed to silence the members of the Men's Human Rights Movement, I expect the use of force to be dialed further upward by gender ideologues. And that won't work either. Remember, we didn't come carrying weapons – we kept our calm, and we carried cameras.

And that, combined with what appears to be a congenital incapability for rational discourse among gender ideologues, was precisely what fucked their shit up so effectively. That has now resulted in transparent efforts to attract pussy beggars and idiots for support as anyone rational distances themselves from your ranks.

So what is required for actual discourse to occur? What is it going to take, for gender ideologues to become a useful part of the conversation?

- Recognize and repudiate the initiation of violence in your feminist rhetoric and policies. This needs no explanation. Killing or brutalizing children, based on their sex, promoting the extermination of men, publicly fantasizing about forced castration and so on – these are fantasies which would have embarrassed Joseph Goebbels;
- Abandon and repudiate the constructed narrative of rape culture. It's a transparent re-framing of the second-wave feminist talking point "all men are rapists". It's not simply a vile nugget of distilled hatred, it's also demonstrably false, based on uniform criminal victimization data collected by the FBI and law enforcement agencies around the western world;
- Abandon censorship. It's a totalitarian urge, and has no place in a movement pretending to advocate anyone's human rights, even the subset of humanity identifiable as women;
- Repudiate and abandon the tactic of othering through identity politics. This tactic demonstrates that your movement is at present, the antithesis of a human rights movement.

In short, abandon most of the major tenets of your ideology in it's current form. Then we can talk.

Now, it's worth noting that I am not attempting to bargain here. I want nothing from feminists, and I expect nothing other than more of the same abuse, hatred and escalating violence in rhetoric and action from their camp. The list provided here is a ticket price for admission to the conversation. There is nothing offered nor promised in exchange for these points.

I am simply saying that these four points are what are required from you, feminists, to be even considered to be allowed to join any serious discourse. Your continued failure to even address this list, or any version of it from other authors demonstrates in mile high neon lettering that you are the members of a violent hate movement, and your public posture of humanism is a false veneer for a masked, armed ideologue with evil intention.

If you still cleave to any of the four listed tactics, while trying to convince anybody of the validity of your cause, you are simply bringing violence or its threat to what would otherwise have been a civil conversation. Right now feminists, you are, stated simply, toxic to any civil conversation or society.

It's a simple list, and indeed, something already accomplished by every adult with a credible grasp of basic decency. And I don't believe you are capable of even entertaining any political will to accomplish the goals of that short list.

But those four items are what I recommend for everybody in this human rights movement, that current gender ideologues must satisfy, before being allowed into the conversation.

Prove me wrong about you, feminists.

I will not be waiting, or holding my breath. I will simply continue my work, to push your hatred, your violence, and all your proponents into the trash-bin of history; to fuck your shit up. And I thank you for your kind attention.

If you really want to help us...

Phil in Utah · 23 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Internet Feminists,

It has come to my attention as of late that a lot of you are insisting, quite loudly, that men should support feminism because it helps us, too. Unlike Big Red, some of you have insisted this so thoroughly and sometimes passionately that it has led me to believe that a handful of you genuinely believe this. I'm not saying you're right, I'm just saying that you truly believe it.

The fact is, feminism really does not help men. Many of you insist that it does because it dismantles the Patriarchy, which apparently hurts men, too. Feminism would be helping men if the Patriarchy really DID exist in the form that you claim it does. Still, I genuinely believe that some of you have good intentions, but are just carrying them out in completely the wrong way.

If you really want to help us and not want us to confuse you with loud, angry hate-mongers like Big Red up there, then you should try listening to US for a change instead of assuming that you know better than us what we need. To assist you in that, I have decided to prepare a list for you of what you should or should not be doing in your approach to men.

Yes, I know what you really mean when you accuse a dude of "mansplaining". You're not saying you have a problem with a man explaining something, you have a problem with men using anecdotes of their own experiences to invalidate yours. And when this happens, yes, you are perfectly right to complain. Even so, physician, heal thyself.

Anytime I tell about my very real experience with being physically abused by women in my life, I'm accused of lying, or told to shut up, because apparently what I went through is nothing compared to what women have had to endure for centuries. "Women have been oppressed," goes the narrative, "So men shouldn't ever complain about anything because it's just not the same." Really? How would you know what men are going through so much better than we do? How do you know that we don't struggle every bit as much as you? Until you've actually spent a decent amount of time as a man, stop trying to invalidate what we say based on your experiences.

Stop peddling false statistics.

I have previously explored the falsehoods that are purveyed in the arena of rape reporting. Your insistence that 1 in every 3 women will be raped in her lifetime carries with it the implication that 1 out of every 3 men is a rapist. This is flat-out false, and continuing to tout it as fact without any real evidence can only be misandry.

Also, the pay gap is the most common go-to answer for your attempt to address our claim that men and women have achieved equality. We have offered a wide array of factors for why women earn less than men, from the fact that women on average work fewer hours per week than men, to seniority and the pursuing of skills relevant to the field of study. On top of all this, we have also offered, from a capitalist perspective, a logical argument that I have yet to see a decent rebuttal to: "If corporations only care about making money, and they pay men more than women, why does anybody hire men anymore instead of saving money by hiring only women?"

Oust your movement's sexists instead of supporting them.

Whenever I show a clear example of anti-male hatred from a feminist spokeswoman to another feminist, the response I get is the same: "She's not a feminist, she's a sexist who calls herself a feminist. She's not one of us." To this, I have only one response: "What are you doing about these faux feminists?"

Feminists who make anti-male statements are given a free pass by their supposedly more reasonable contemporaries. Men's Rights Activists who display actual bigotry (including but not limited to misogyny) are shown the door by the mainstream. Tempting as it may be to pull examples from RadFemHub, I think I'll reach into feminism's self-proclaimed "mainstream"; Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte are still considered leaders for the 3rd wave, despite the fact that the former has proposed removing presumption of innocence for men accused of rape, and the latter considers anyone who dares question a woman making an accusation of rape, no matter how shoddy her testimony, to be "rape-loving scum". Get rid of your misandrists, then we'll talk about going easy on you.

Stop being such flaming hypocrites.

Jezebel's own Lindy West published an article recently in which she put forth, point by point, the case that feminists really are helping men, and that everything Men's Rights Activists complain about is the result of Patriarchy. Well, I've already stated that I doubt the very existence of Patriarchy, but I'll address this anyway.

Take, for instance, when Lindy argues that people presuming that men are pedophiles because of the Patriarchy saying that only women should be involved in child-rearing. Writers at Jezebel have shown little hesitation blaming men for the actions of female child abusers.

Then we have the incident of Warren Farrell's speech at the University of Toronto. To refresh your memories, here's what happened: U of T booked the Mr. Rogers of the Men's Rights Movement to speak on the issues of high dropout and suicide rates among boys. Dr. Farrell did not blame women at all for either of these phenomena, nor did he call for any of women's rights to be curbed in order to make things easier for men (another thing that separates the men's rights movement from feminism, but I digress).

All Dr. Farrell wanted to do was discuss why these young boys found the world so unbearable that they would cut themselves off from a means to get by in it, or why they would cut themselves out from it entirely, and how did your cronies react? They blocked the doors to the event (which constitutes a fire hazard, yet they had the audacity to complain about the police merely removing them from the doors instead of arresting their asses like they deserved), berated men who were seeking answers about their friends' deaths by calling them "fucking thcum", and screamed at attendees. Does that sound to you like people who want to help men?

A number of the protesters who had been breaking the law bragged about it in public forums such as Twitter. They had been endangering other people's lives, taking away their freedom of speech by tearing down posters promoting the events, and making jokes about killing men. And no, I'm not going to buy the excuse that they were just joking. Threatening men alongside censoring events designed to help them suggests an attitude far different from satire.

A group of men's rights activists identified the lawbreakers, took what they had posted in public forums, and just made them…a little more public. Then Kate Harding took a quote from Warren Farrell from over twenty years ago (from a time during which, by the way, he still identified as a feminist,) and pretended that this represented all of his views. In the same article, she called us out for identifying people who, again, had endangered the lives of others in their campaign against free speech, and accused us of encouraging violence against them, even though we did no such thing. These women that we exposed were all over the age of 18. In Canada, that's old enough to vote, marry, and own property. It goes without saying that it's old enough to own your shit.

Then, you went along and targeted a bunch of kids, most of them under 18, for making racist tweets about President Obama. You were targeting kids who broke no laws, who have probably had their lives threatened, while we targeted "adults" who endangered people with their anti-free speech antics, and you still had the audacity to assume the moral high ground?

Stop pushing for sexist laws, especially under the guise of equality.

I've mentioned previously how your very own Jessica Valenti tried to pass a law to take away the presumption of innocence for men accused of rape. But what a lot of you don't seem to realize (or willfully ignore) is that the Violence Against Women Act, despite your protests otherwise, does NOT contain gender-neutral language. Even the title is an insinuation that only women are victims of domestic violence. One of its provisions explicitly states that the authors of the act have no interest in helping male victims of domestic violence.

The VAWA also has a mandatory arrest provision that is a blatant violation of Constitutional rights. I never heard a feminist advocate for this provision to be removed, but I have heard of countless cases of a man getting assaulted repeatedly by his wife, getting hit in the back of a neck with an object, calling the police, his wife admitting to what she did, and him getting arrested even though his wife is completely unharmed and he is FUCKING BLEEDING. There is also a man in my family who throughout his entire marriage was physically and emotionally abused by his wife.

He never once so much as hit her, but she hit him, demeaned him in front of his children, and came up with endless ways to remind him of the fact that she made more than him. He went to his pastor, who told him that he wasn't being abused and didn't know what abuse was. He tried to stay at an abuse shelter, but was turned away because he was a man. He sought help from Catholic Social Services, and they accused him of being the perpetrator. All of this was justified to him on the grounds of his "white male privilege". These things happen because of laws that your ilk have passed. Either help us take them down, or stop pretending that our hating them makes us anti-woman.

Stop defending women who do wrong.

You want to be taken seriously on the job, right? Well, so do we. We want you to have successful careers in whatever field you feel you're best at. That's why it's in your best interest not to defend people like Adria Richards, whose eavesdropping and tattling over a small joke destroyed a man's career. You see, Adria is ruining it for women with IT ambitions. Her message, whether she worded it that way or not, was that the only way a woman can get ahead in the industry is to sabotage any men who outperform her.

She is also telling men in IT that they can't trust women, because they'll constantly be looking for ways to frame them for sexual harassment, and they'll create a hostile work environment by policing men's private conversations, and forbid them from using terms necessary to the field just because they could possibly have a sexual connotation. What's next, forbidding men from mentioning hard drives or hardware just because they could link that to an erection?

Stop demonizing male sexuality.

Have you ever heard of those horrible camps that religious fundamentalists send their kids to if they suspect they're gay? You know, the ones where kids often commit suicide? Well, being a male under feminist rule is kind of like being a kid at Exodus International.

What is it that Exodus does that is so deplorable? Well, any reasonable person would say it begins with their approach: they tell kids that they are inherently evil and sinful, and that they must reject a part of their identity that they have no control over in order to be "clean". I think we can agree that this is a horrid practice, one that would in many ways constitute child abuse. So why, then, are you doing the same thing to men?

Yes, you heard me. You're shaming men about their sexuality, urges that are beyond their control. You call it "denouncing rape culture", but I call it "trying to police men's thoughts". There is a feminist online who has compiled a list of behaviors that she say makes a man a rape-supporter. In it she lists such benign things as "He watches pornography in which women are depicted," "He argues that people have sexual 'needs'," "He sexually objectifies lesbians or lesbian sexual activity," or, goddess forbid, "He discusses the types of women he finds sexually appealing and/or attempts to demean women by telling them he does not find them sexually appealing." So basically, when it comes to our sexuality, we men are damned if we do, and damned if we don't. In what world is that fair?

Then there's your ridiculous laundry lists of behaviors that could "trigger" a woman, and that a man should go out of his way to avoid. These include but aren't limited to looking at a woman the wrong way, talking about grapes, or whistling. You also host people on your websites who insist that all men should be presumed rapsists…is that a pattern I'm seeing?

Also, you keep accusing us of turning women into objects if we so much as state that we find their bodies attractive, which is just as insulting. Here's the way it works: I'm bisexual, but I find myself far more attracted to women than men most of the time. Does that mean that I hate men? No, of course not. I am also more attracted to women with large breasts than women with small breasts.

Does that mean that I evaluate a woman's whole being based on the size of her breasts? Of course not. I know plenty of women with big breasts who I think are quite frankly stupid, horrible people (such as Laci Green), and plenty of flat-chested women who are wonderful human beings that I'd love to spend time with. Stop pretending that you know how the male mind works, because you're every bit as clueless about it as we are about the female mind.

Stop poisoning the minds of children.

When it comes down to it, I can take it when you insult me for being a man. I'm an adult, and I won't let stupid remarks get under my skin. But don't you dare try and fill the heads of my future children up with your ideas. If you tell my son that he is inherently evil simply for having a penis, or that he's somehow privileged when girls get to hit him all the time and he's strictly forbidden from hitting back, then you are abusing him. That is what really brings out my dark side. I had a friend in Elementary School who so internalized the bile that the teachers poured into his ears that he attempted to castrate himself with a pair of safety scissors. That is flat-out wrong no matter how you try to spin it.

And finally…

Stop calling us misogynists.

Honestly, we don't hate women. We hate the system that enables those women with malicious intent to so thoroughly destroy the lives of men and their loved ones. The primary reason that anybody thinks we're misogynists is because you keep screaming about how we are, and because your cohorts take what we say out of context and hold up disturbed people like Marc Lépine and Anders Behring-Breivik as somehow representative of us, just because they agree with us on a couple things. That's a false equivalency. Hitler was a vegetarian who passed some of the world's first animal rights laws…does that mean that all vegetarians and animal rights activists are genocidal, totalitarian maniacs? No, of course not.

You may be wondering why I'm writing this. I'm sure you're thinking it's because the MRM is desperate for allies. Actually, you couldn't be further from the truth. We'd like you to join us, but we don't need it. I wrote this because I care about you as people. I want you to be on the winning side when the feminist juggernaut comes tumbling down, because the consequences of associating yourselves with such a clearly hateful movement will be dire indeed. Please, do yourselves a favor and see the error of your ways. If you forsake feminism, we will forgive you unconditionally.

The choice is yours.

Men's issues wiki needs your help

Dean Esmay · 23 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the more frustrating things about discussing men's issues, and lies about men, is that you get constantly asked the same questions over and over again, and challenged for sources. This problem is only increasing as the number of people flocking to the men's movement looking for answers to questions that have troubled them their whole lives. Furthermore, the amount of misandric misinformation, or solid information that's been freely available for decades but buried in clouds of academic and government bureaucratic fog, is just huge.

You start trying to educate someone about male victims of domestic violence, and in passing the subject of male victims of sexual assault comes up, and you don't have any handy references to work with or to give the genuinely curious a starting point.

Maybe you yourself know a lot already about one area, for example the huge male suicide rate, but then someone asks you a question about domestic violence and you haven't got a clue where to begin.

Indeed, even if you're thoroughly educated on all men's issues (and who is?) can you always remember off the top of your head where references are if people challenge you? I can tell you that I know men are at least as likely as women to experience sexual assault (if not more likely) but I know if I get asked about this I have to dig through the archives here on AVfM and other places just to find it if someone says "bullshit, prove it!"

Creating your own list of references and resources is daunting enough, publishing one and keeping it up to date is even more daunting and can fall by the wayside if other things in your life take over. So what's the solution? What men have always done better: collaborate to build something great, and collaborate to maintain it.

It is thus with some pride that I announce a project I've been wanting to create for more than a year now: the Men's Rights Reference Wiki, a collaborative effort between AVfM and The Nice Guy forum.

How do you use a wiki? Well the wonderful think about it is you only have to learn whatever interests you. You can edit any page to add or correct information. Not good at grammar or spelling? Who cares? Put up what you know to be true and someone else who's better at that can come in behind you and sort out the grammar. Have some references that are useful but don't know how to format them correctly? That's fine, if you haven't the time to learn, put them up in whatever format you have and someone else will help with the formatting. It is the ultimate collaboration tool, all you need is a free account and a willingness to contribute. If you still don't get it, go sign up for an account and start playing with it.

If you think it's too simple to work the way it seems, you're mistaken. Yes, it really is that simple to edit any page that anyone else has worked on. There are even pages to discuss with others what should and should not go on a page.

The purpose of the AVfM Reference Wiki, it should be said, is purely for providing solid references and useful data. It is not for editorializing, ranting, recommending services, or even for advice. It is there to provide that thing that most men love best: cold, hard fact, information you can use and share and tell others about, and point them to if they have questions.

There's not much in that wiki now, but that's the other beauty of a wiki: the more people add, the bigger it grows, and all it does is grow and grow and grow with time. Right now there's only a little there. So did you want to see more? Well what are you waiting for, go check out and add information to our wiki. This is a community endeavor to help us sort the bullshit from the reality, to help sort out what we know to be true from what we think to be true from what may be true and what may not be true.

Much thanks to those who made creation of this possible. Now get out there and help us turn this into a resource all men's advocates, and the world in general, can use. If you ever wanted to do something to help the movement but weren't sure what, here's a new way you can do more than just bitch. Go check it out!

Update: For anyone wondering, our main Wiki admin is Strix, who absolutely knows what he's doing and did huge work setting this up. Thank you Strix!

A hard-on for the Good Men Project

I love Mexican food. A plate of cheese enchiladas and arroz con frijoles, with some fresh, homemade tortillas de harina, really gets me all hot and bothered.

Of course, I love Indian fare as well. I have been known to go all cave man over properly done saag paneer with a stack of garlic naan. I could live on those two items together for the rest of my life.

I guess you can tell between the tortillas and the naan that I am a carbohydrate freak. Carbs are an addiction that have haunted me most of my adult life.

Well, but wait a second. I have to admit that all this is not quite accurate. I do love Mexican food, but the fact is that a plate of cheese enchiladas, no matter how expertly prepared, doesn't actually raise my body temperature, even a little. And they certainly don't "bother" me.

It is the same with Indian food. I have been happy, very happy, to enjoy that creamy spiced spinach with delicate, cubed paneer, but I have not actually ever turned into a cave man over the sight of it. And I am not really a "freak" over carbohydrates, or even "addicted" to them, and certainly could not live on two food items without getting very bored. I just tend to favor those sorts of things over other foods. And I swear, visions of baked, wheat-based ethnic breads have never "haunted" me, not even when I was a little kid and I thought there was a monster under my bed.

Now, I am sure at this point you must be wondering what the hell this has to do with men's rights, feminism or the MHRM. I can answer that in two words.

Joanna Schroeder.

Schroeder is serving as a senior editor of the Good Men Project, where in her bio she is described as the "type of working mom who opens her car door and junk spills out all over the ground."

It is probably an apt description. The same thing happens when she opens her mouth.

Or logs in to Twitter.

That fact came up recently when she posted the following tweet.

That is right. She proclaims with utter certainty that I am "aroused" by violence against women. In one context, she could be right. I certainly have feelings aroused related to violence against anyone, namely anger and sadness, but it is pretty clear to me that this is not what she meant. She supported her false allegation only with a link to an article at feministcurrent.com, a bilge offering of agitprop about the MRHM, and AVFM in particular, that was filled with as much strawmen, conjecture and obfuscation as, well, as any other article written by feminists about the MHRM.

Laughably, they were even portraying Big Red, the garish and unruly feminist idiot who was recently caught on camera screaming abusive obscenities and epithets at anyone who challenged her ideas, as the helpless victim of evil men's activists.

In short, they damseled her. She put herself on public display as an out of control, personality disordered moron, right in front of several video cameras. Then, when it was posted to YouTube it went viral, unleashing a different bunch of morons – the kind of morons that really hate the Big Red kind of moron. They came out of the woodwork to say the kinds of things that morons typically say in these kinds of circumstances. Of course Current declared all the other morons to be MHRAs. Typical. Anyway, it was not pretty, but the virulent hostility toward Big Red is exactly what anyone with two brain cells to rub together would expect to happen.

It is also the exact position that Schroeder is shooting for here.

More on that in a moment, but first let's take a look at what Schroeder was actually referring to when she made her false allegation. It is a quote from something I wrote in an article addressing feminists who thought they would shut me or AVFM up back in June of 2011.

To be clear, here is the quote:

> I find you [feminist bullies] so pernicious and repugnant that the idea of fucking your shit up gives me an erection.

And let me state for the record again, it is true. Fucking their shit up gives me an erection. Oh, and I get all hot and bothered over Mexican food, and I can turn all ape man over….well, I think you get the picture, unless you are a feminist.

Briefly explaining the mechanics here, and dumbing things down so that even a rapetard could understand it, please bear with these slight details.

First, in conflict with Schroeder's understanding, and as we have endlessly pointed out on this website, feminists and women are two entirely different things. Feminism is an ideology of sexual politics. Women are the female part of the human race, the counterparts to men. Feminism does not have a vagina, or even tits. It has adherents who possess both kinds of human genitalia, but almost always one or the other.

Getting these two things confused is kinda stupid. Mmmkay?

Now, as to "fucking their shit up." I realize that this may be even more challenging for the likes of Schroeder. As a gender ideologue, a feminist to be more exact, she is prone to see violence everywhere it does and doesn't exist, especially if she thinks it might be violence against women. Conversely, she likely could not see violence against men if she were close enough to get blood on her Louis Vuitton blouse. But, I digress.

The point here is that she obviously assumed that "fuck their shit up," endearingly known here as FTSU, was meant to imply physical violence. Or, like a lot of other feminists, she knew it did not imply violence and decided to play the DV card, anyway. I would say that given her position that the latter must be true. But being a senior editor at GMP isn't an endorsement of intelligence, so I will just write this one up as a toss-up. She is either ignorant, or dishonest, or both, which doesn't really matter. I could have said, you're going "down," or some other equally obvious dysphemism, and she would still have clutched her pearls and headed for Twitter (two years later when she had an agenda).

That brings us finally to “gives me an erection.” Do I have to explain this, or would it be better to say that I have also never had a foodgasm? I have never “cum in my pants” or “gotten hard when the wind blew.” I have never seen a car that I would “kill for,” or even seen a movie that was “better than sex.”

Take that back, I have seen some movies that were better than some of the sex I have had.

But of course I am wasting keystrokes here. Whether Schroeder’s false accusation is intentional or just the blind stupidity of someone who works for a “men’s publication” that endorses fathers calling their four year old boys rapists isn’t the point.

The point is the damseling. It is just another in many very, very stupid plans, which all eventually benefit the cause they are trying to undermine.

As we saw with Anita Sarkeesian, Rebecca Watson, and the now infamous Big Bad Borderline Red, Schroeder is trying here to elicit some really nasty reactions from anonymous people on the internet so she can play the damsel in distress; so white knights and sycophants will ride out on their white horses to protect her from all the meanies in the world, while not taking a moment to consider that she is an obfuscating, scumbag of spin, playing on the ignorance of the masses by quote mining her way into a public limelight that is now only accessible through attacking the Men’s Human Rights Movement and this website.

Their ideology is failing, so they are going on the attack to maintain the appearance of relevance.

Maybe she will have a kickstarter, and other feminists will cough up some big bucks for a study on sexual sadism by people that won’t shut the fuck up when told by their betters.

And it may work for her. Who knows? But the part about this that is not so good for the likes of Schroeder, or the opponents of this human rights movement for men and boys, is that we are fortunately the ones in a “no lose” situation.

Every time one these Einsteins jumps a shark in full public view, we grow. It sends people to the site, either out of outrage or curiosity. And when people come to AVFM they have been treated, time after time, to the needed information to inform them that the unprincipled hacks that sent them here lied to them about what we were about.

Each time it happens, we pick up new readers and even new activists. That is why right now GMP is trailing us in traffic, despite having spent wads of cash to play in the big leagues while we beat their asses patching things together with spit and bailing wire.

In the end, reasonable people will see that Schroeder is a false accuser, that I am against violence in any form, and that her tweet was a load of absolute bullshit.

And we will push them further behind us as a result.

That is it for now for the most part. Well, I do have one other thing to say. A shout out to GMP CEO Lisa Hickey.

The thought of fucking GMPs shit up gives me an erection. ?

Radfem and the Irish Navvies who built London

MRA London · 24 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Agent Kildare, the man who first brought attention to the Radfem 2013 conference to be held at the London Irish Centre, now writes this short but incredibly poignant piece about the Irish men who built London, including the very hall that was to be used by Radfem themselves. Ed (MRAL)

As an Irish Citizen living in London, I am personally delighted that the London Irish Centre came quickly to its senses and booted the Radfem bigots out of its venue after protests by men's human rights activists, MRA London. Many have suggested that the fact that the Radfem 2013 event may have been contrary to UK equality law was the primary reason for its cancellation, but this misses the point entirely.

Irish Navvies Built London

The real issue is that the Radfem 2013 event would have been held at a centre which regularly hosts 'family' music and arts workshops. This is a centre which has a history of supporting both women and men in finding their feet in London; a city which quite literally was built by the Irish – the 'navvies' who also built the canals and underground, the labourers who still maintain and build its roads and buildings, sewers and water pipes (and Olympic Parks).

To host an event by bigots who describe men like these – who still disproportionately account for some of the capital's highest rates of homelessness, mental illness, suicide, workplace injury, work-related disease and poverty; as "dominant oppressors" and "rapists" who need to have their families "destroyed", isn't simply grossly offensive, it's contrary to the values of the community the London Irish Centre serves.

The organisers of Radfem are fortunate that it was men's human rights advocates who caught them out, because if it had been the Catholic Women's League who had first learned that these bigots were proposing to "castrate" their sons, and were going to use the London Irish Centre as their venue, then they would have really been the ones on the receiving end of anger for a change.

It could happen to any young man . . .

Pierce Harlan · 24 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Chances are, you've never heard of Katelyn Webster or Matthew Folino, but their story is one that needs to be told. It is the story of a terrible injustice that is sadly typical of hundreds we've related over the past five years. That this injustice could happen in the United States of America is truly horrifying; that few people have heard about it is downright depressing.

Matt Folino, a 20-something guy living in Western Pennsylvania, was literally hauled out of bed in the middle of the night by police who had come banging on his door with guns drawn and flashlights shining through his windows.

Exactly why was Matt being treated like Tamerlan Tsarnaev? Because a young woman named Katelyn Webster, 18, with whom Matt previously had a brief fling, had told police that Matt stalked, choked, and raped her, and she showed them neck bruises to prove it. Webster claimed that all this occurred in — of all places — the parking lot of a wave pool, and that Matt stopped assaulting her only when her two girlfriends came along.

Matt spent four days in jail and nine months on house arrest, and he faced the possibility of spending five to ten years in an awful place where young men falsely accused of rape often become victims of the very crime they did not commit. All on account of a he said/she said rape allegation.

Now police say that Webster lied. It turns out that the parties weren't together that day after all, and none of them were at the wave pool. Webster and the two girlfriends had been at a dance club, and then they spent the night at Webster's new boyfriend's place. Webster concocted the rape claim so she wouldn't get in trouble with her father because her new boyfriend gave her "sucker bites."

For his part, Matt was home with his parents at the time he was supposedly raping Webster. I suppose their alibis weren't enough for police.

How did police figure out the truth? Good old fashioned police work, right? Well, no, not really. Matt's family shelled out $20,000 in attorney's fees, and they retained a superstar criminal defense attorney in Western Pennsylvania. A few weeks before Matt's criminal trial was supposed to start, the attorney's investigator contacted Webster's two girlfriends—the ones who supposedly interrupted the sexual assault. The attorney explained that the two women refuted the whole story, that they ratted out Webster about her new boyfriend and explained that she didn't want her father to know. They said the "sucker bites" on Webster's neck were courtesy of the new boyfriend. After interviewing the two girlfriends, County Police dropped the charges against Matt and arrested Webster.

The County Police Superintendent, whose name is Charles Moffatt, defended his detectives' work on the case. "We had a girl at the hospital saying she was raped, she had marks around her neck," he said. But wait, Moffatt's explanation is about to enter the Twilight Zone. Moffatt said the detectives did try to corroborate Webster's account, but she said she didn't know the last names of the two other girls and couldn't provide their phone numbers.

Excuse me while I bang my head against the wall.

That explanation wasn't a red flag, Superintendent Moffatt? You allowed a young man to twist in a false rape hell for nine months on the basis of a story that doesn't just strain credulity but breaks it into a thousand pieces?

Matt's superstar defense counsel Bill Difenderfer correctly summed up Webster's motivation: "Get out of trouble with my dad and let a kid go to jail for five or ten years." He added this: "When it's his word against her word, you have to pause: you need more."

Amen, Mr. Difenderfer. You have to pause — not to protect rapists. No one cares about protecting rapists. You have to pause because the accused might just be Matt Folino or some other innocent, maybe even your son who was home with you at the time he was "raping" his accuser. You have to pause because it is "better that ten guilty persons escape than that one innocent suffer." (Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765.)

http://www.cotwa.info/2012/05/barbaric-it-is-worth-risk-to-punish.html

Webster is scheduled to be arraigned June 10. She faces one count of perjury, one count of false reports to law enforcement authorities, and one count of false swearing.

As if Matt hadn't suffered enough, the following comment appeared under the KDKA-TV Web site story about Matt's ordeal: "While I sympathize with this young man plight, I find it disturbing that KDKA chose to run with this story in light of the recent events in nearby Steubenville." The writer went on to cite the usual statistics about the prevalence of rape; the fact that false rape claims are supposedly rare; and that hardly any rapists spend any time in jail.

A lot of readers, me included, took offense at the suggestion that Matt's story was not worth telling. I addressed the person who made the vile comment:

> You have excluded yourself from the public discourse on a very serious issue with your shrill odium. Matt's family and friends are reading these comments, as is Matt, I am sure, and your insistence that his story should be censored the way the Soviet Union used to censor news stories is hateful. Moreover, it smacks of "patriarchy"-smashing gender get-even-ism. Mature adults have no room for such silliness in 2013. Matt can't help that he was born male, and that someone chose to victimize him in this fashion. Get over it.
> Instead of sweeping problems like this, and Brian Banks' false rape claim and a thousand others, under the rug, you would do well to tell young women not to make false rape claims. They destroy innocent young men and do a disservice to rape victims.
> This story isn't about "rape" or Steubenville or you. It's about a young man who suffered a grievous wrong. So nice of you to have compassion!

Welcome to the Good Ship Fuck Their Shit Up

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 25 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

The first time I read one of Paul's articles I cringed. Fuck, did I cringe.

In fact I submitted work at A Voice For Men in spite of Paul's participation and because the site is billed as a place where people interested in compassion for men and boys can be heard. I submitted work because Paul has said, repeatedly, that he wants these voices to be heard, not just voices that agree with him or his own voice, but all voices who sing in the "we care about men" chorus.

Over time I got to know Paul. I realized that he is blunt; he is crude. His articles are, well, rather razor sharp and deliberately offensive.

But Paul's articles are also like a magic eye.

If you focus on imagining that men deserve to be cared about and then re-read his articles, out of all the offensive language a bland, bald truth—and it is bland—reveals itself.

The article on Andrea Dworkin's rape obsession becomes:

Bigots who are fixated on the violent sexuality of the group they're targeting, may just have prurient sexual motives themselves.

To illustrate I'll use an example that's less charged with moral outrage.

The KKK are also obsessed with the violent sexuality of a target group. To the point where one really must ask "do doth protest too much about gigantic black cocks invading pert lily-white orifices?"

The article on "women begging for it" becomes:

Sexually abusive people who engage in abusive behavior invite aggression back. They do not deserve it; they invite it.

To illustrate I'll again use an example that's less charged with moral outrage.

Let's imagine we have a very popular boy in high school and this very popular jock has a habit of asking unpopular girls to dances and then—as these outcasts are at just at the threshold of getting to be seen in public with the most popular boy in school, trembling with excitement at the thought of sharing their first dance—this jock says "fuck no, why did you ever think I'd be seen in public with you?"

This is taunting.

Now for those who balk at drawing a parallel between the popular high school jock taunting unpopular boys and women taunting men sexually… consider that sexuality is almost always more about social approval and acceptance than pure nerve ending stimulation.

When a woman taunts a man sexually, she's taunting him with social acceptance. Just like the jock taunting the unpopular girl with social acceptance.

Now if that unpopular girl punches the jock, how do we feel? How about if she pulls out a knife and rapes him?

I'm sure we all agree that the smug asshole jock didn't deserve to be raped; but he sure was inviting it and by taunting enough unpopular girls, he'd eventually find one that wasn't going to just walk home and cry herself to sleep. He'd eventually find himself a psycho.

The only difference between these two scenarios is how much you care about the people being taunted and the people doing the taunting.

Again, magic eye. Focus on the idea that men deserve to be cared about, and the intent becomes clear.

Paul's articles are also a red flag for people who are going around trying to find things to be offended about. They will find offense aplenty in his articles, not because what his articles are actually saying is anything but bland and inoffensive, but because these people are in the business of manufacturing offense.

Not just manufacturing it, cooking offense up in a metal spoon and injecting it right into the vein.

Paul has created the perfect formula: insert enough offense that the druggies are attracted to it like flies to shit—they'll spread it faster than a gram of heroin—and enough reason that might spark those still capable of critical thought to say "hm, he's a fucking asshole, but he has a point. Or might have a point."

But here's where you come in Mr. or Ms. Keeper-of-the-Middle-Ground, if these offense-junkies weren't targeting Paul for their hit, they'd be targeting you.

Yes, you. Mr. or Ms. Keeper-of-the-Middle-Ground.

Have you noticed the pattern yet? The Social Justice Crack House Squad descends on a hapless person; sometimes making their life miserable for saying the word "bitch" or having a supposedly "objectifying" webcomic; or using the word "dongle"; or doing, saying or being anything the Squad doesn't approve of.

The Social Justice Crack House Squad then proceeds to destroy their target's life in pursuit of their hit of self-righteousness.

It's not about reason or logic or "making the world safe for kitties and puppies", it's not even about hate, it's about the hit. It's about the outrage and the addict's unending hunger for it. The Social Justice Crack House Squad has a craving that'll never get fed. Which means when they drink and drug their way through your neighbours, they're coming for you.

Yes, you. Mr. or Ms. Keeper-of-the-Middle-Ground.

To be honest, you can ether turtle up against these marauding druggies or you can be their next victim, or you can join the chorus against them. Because these people will not stop until the whole world smells of vomit, feces, open sores, sweaty, unwashed bodies and the sweet-sour stench of burnt out smug superiority.

Our moral landscape is being dictated by drug addicts and the cure is critical thinking.

That's why we say Fuck Their Shit Up. Those that freebase outrage will spred the drug far and wide; those capable of critical thinking and good faith will say "hmm, two meanings and everyone on the ship says it's the non-violent one and they'll make anyone who engages in violence walk the (proverbial, hypothetical, metaphorical) plank."

If you get it, come aboard. And bring your good faith arguments! Bring your unfashionable opinions! Bring your sanity! Bring your willingness to engage rationally! Bring your critical thought!

And welcome to the good ship, the SS-FTSU01. Meet Paul, your crusty naval Captain; JTO, your salty sea dog of a Chief Mate; Dean, the Boatswain; Girl Writes What, wench-at-arms; Dr. T, head-shrinker and surgeon; Susan, Chief Steward and sammichmaker; Dr. F, Master of Ceremonies; Danny, Crowsnest; Communication Chief Robert; James, Engineer; and Jared, Gunner; Erin Pizzey, the obligatory cool old lady.

And myself, Navigator.

Now let's go forth and Fuck Their Shit Up.

Ever seen a bear with a coffee pot?

MRA London · 25 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

MRA London operative, Agent Kildare, is right back. This time he shares his thoughts on Glen Poole, Ally Fog and James Gates. (MRA London also have a "News Flash" and "Call to Arms" — presented at the end of this article.) Ed (MRAL)

Have you ever seen a bear with a coffeepot? It's a terrible business. The bear doesn't really know what the coffeepot is. It paws it around, picks it up by the spout, drops the lid. Unable to get its tiny mind around the purpose of this strange object, it becomes bewildered, then irate, then flies into a rage. This is why, when entertaining bears, you should always pour the coffee yourself.

If you think it's unlikely you'll ever be in this position, let's have a look at a similar situation: the desperate struggle of feminists and mainstream commentators to understand men's human rights activists.

This week we've seen Glen Poole who, when Julie Burchill or Suzanne Moore are busy, is occasionally allowed to write about men's issues by The Guardian, and to attack Peter Lloyd of the Daily Mail.

Peter is taking legal action against the operators of his gym, because they discriminate against men by having several hundred hours each year which are 'women only,' while charging men the same membership fees.

Glen can't believe Peter's affront. What on Earth is he thinking? It's quite right that women receive preferential treatment; after all giving them what they want saves us all a lot of bother. Anyway, he should have better things to do, like raise cash for charities that run helplines for suicidal young men.

Last year, Glen wrote that The Guardian published 'stereotyping dross' about men. He's also written about the problem of 'invisible men', and of public services being 'proudly pro-male'.

"Is your service welcoming, positive about men?" he asks. "Does it have a high opinion of men? Or is the way that you and your colleagues think about men in general different, and does that different what [sic] of thinking promote equality for men, or inequality?"

Ah the difference a cheque for £350 from Guardian Media Ltd. makes to one's principles, eh Glen? Maybe you can walk the walk and use the money to run a workshop for the good folk at Peter's gym?

Then there's Ally Fogg. Ally wrote on Twitter that Peter Lloyd was 'a knob'. Ally's bestest mates with a lot of feminists, such as Helen Lewis at the New Statesman. Helen ran a series on men's rights activists a while back. She didn't invite any to contribute anything, oh no. Instead she got some teenage girls to write articles mocking MRAs as losers and virgins who lived with their mums.

Ally thought this was great, and just what MRAs deserve. On Twitter he exchanged wearying sighs with Helen; 'they're still at it on the comments section aren't they?" he said. Helen patted him on the head; "yes dear, yes they are." Good Ally, good boy.

It's easy to see what's going on here. Both Glen and Ally are propelled by the memory of very nearly getting off with that sexy short-haired girl from Luton who ran the FemSoc at Uni by acting all 'new man' (remember him?). They think that by distancing themselves from the naughty, 'misogynist' boys, they can earn women's approval. She may have ended up fucking that Brazilian art student, but it was a close run thing.

Then there's James Gates at Sabotage Times, the online hobby project of the former editor of 90s lad's magazine 'Loaded'. James is in his twenties. He lives in North London, and plays in a hipster indie band that gigs at some local pubs. Thankfully, his parents have enabled him to not sacrifice his principles by having to find a job, which is just as well, because Sabotage Times doesn't pay contributors. Instead they fish for young media graduates able to string some inflamatory text together for free which will spark controversy, retweets and comments and thus attract syndication interest.

James recently wrote about MRAs: 'When I heard about them, I did a double-take, as I had difficulty believing that such a thing could possibly exist.' He then goes on to have a pop at Fathers 4 Justice, a group of 'dads who skip child support payments or have been charged with domestic violence.' James also knows why boys are falling behind at school, it's because 'boys are a bit thick'.

Thanks James!

Then over the U.S. we've got online women's 'zine' Jezebel. A cesspit of lies, bitching and anger, this is a 'linkbait' site, designed by its owners Gawker Media to attract eyeballs by pitching inflammatory and provocative headlines across the internet.

Jezebel's Katie Baker describes mens rights activists as 'scum', and publishes the home addresses, employer's details and personal information of feminist women who even dare suggest speaking to them.

Also in the U.S is the flailing 'Good Men Project', in which Glen Poole has recently accepted the position of "Men's Rights Editor". GMP is a slowly-dying website which believes men are a problem to be fixed. Contributor Zach Rosenberg recently wrote a piece for them about how he'd had to challenge his four-year old son for being a 'rapist', after he'd kissed a girl in the playground.

Yes. You read that right. He told his four-year old son he was a rapist.

What do all these writers have in common? Bewilderment, lies and anger. It's hard to take such pathetic, yellow journalism seriously. These are men who quite happily throw men and boys aside, in their desperate need for women's approval. They'll quite happily stigmatise children, mock men experiencing the worst pain in their lives, and piss on the vulnerable, the dispossessed and desperate.

Back to where we started, with the analogy of the bear. When you do think about it, having a bear over for coffee would be a ridiculous waste of time and effort. The bear's not going to enjoy itself, it's just going to get bewildered, testy and irate. It doesn't know what 'having coffee' means. You're just going to wear yourself out, and the neighbours will probably complain. The conversation's shit anyway, bears don't know what the fuck they are talking about.

Similarly, it's pointless arguing with these people. They're not our enemies, they're barely even obstacles, they're just thoughtless, blundering, ill-willed and uncaring.

Annoying but, like bears, best left alone to do their shit in the woods.

NEWS FLASH from MRA LONDON

Honey Badger Alert
Female MRA Battles Radfems on Mumsnet

One of our female MRA members felt so incensed after seeing radical feminists on mumsnet.com call us "dysfunctional violent misogynist men" that she signed up and joined in the debate herself.

Feminists are aghast! They are desperately trying to "explain" to her that males are actually "privileged" and that MRAs simply want to "maintain power over the women of their class and resort to the age old violence of either actual &/or threats to rape and violence against women."

They cannot comprehend why she would want to care for boys when, as a woman, it's only the rights of other women she should be fighting for. However, I wonder how long before they give up on this, switch tactics and begin attacking her personally?

Our member is going under the name "Elohim", and her first post can be found here:

http://www.mumsnet.com/Talk/womens_rights/1738600-Radfem-2013-and-the-MRAs?pg=7

This is the first time she has done anything like this, and we never would have guessed that she had so much fight in her!

Personally, I think that what she is doing is vital! This is not about an argument with a few radical feminists. Rather, it's about getting mothers on Mumsnet to see the true nature of the bigots hiding amongst while wearing a badge of "equality".

> "Females don't have to kill baby boys. Just not nurture them." – Mary Sunshine

This and other quotes that were originally published on the now defunct Radfem collective blog, Radical Hub, can be found here.

It would be a major victory for the human rights of boys if we could move the discussion out of the niche "activism" area on Mumsnet to other areas where all mothers could see it. Female MRAs wanting to help our "lone wolfess" in doing this are urged to join the fight on Mumsnet!

Let's hear it for the boys!

Fuck you, you bigoted assholes at Feministing and you two-bit two-faced "let's shame men into being what we think is good while we shovel men's issues under the carpet and lie about men's advocates" over at The Good Men Project.

Fuck you, you conservative traditionalists, who are probably mostly shaking your heads and looking the other way, just like the hypocritical jerks who say nice things about manhood but don't actually do a god damned thing for men and boys that most of you really are.

Earl Silverman, founder of the only abused men's shelter in all of Canada, finally had enough, gave up, closed his shelter, and killed himself. After 20 years of fighting for the forgotten, the overlooked, the marginalized, and the sneered at, he closed his shelter due to lack of resources, and today closed out his life, because no one gives a damn about men and boys.

The last I spoke to Earl, he'd just managed to get some mainstream media attention in the face of a sneering feminist media whore lawyer there to "debate" him and who tried his best to minimize anything Earl had to say. Earl did great, but still, nobody cared enough to do anything. Earl privately outlined a strategy for me for finally getting someone in the government to pay attention, after decades of futility, and I didn't think it would work. I tried to be encouraging and supportive, but I probably wasn't encouraging enough.

Today he hung himself and I'm pingponging between crying and shrieking rage.

If you're a male, you're disposable motherfucker. If you're abused, it's your fault. If you're poor, it's your fault. If you're out of a job, it's your fault. If you're desperate, it's your fault. If you've had your children and most your income and assets taken from you and been reduced to "Uncle Dad"–or a total nonentity, or even being put in prison for being broke–by a family court system and a vindictive and abusive ex, it's your fault. You're "privileged," don't you know.

I cheerfully await the feminists who will be dancing on his grave and/or giving their usual stupid bullcrap song and dance about how what caused the indifference was their phantasmagoric lie of "The Patriarchy" or "toxic masculinity" when they've lifted not a god damned finger for 40 years to help men and boys and spread lie after lie about how most of the victims of abuse are women and hardly any are men. I also look forward to the conservative traditionalists shaking their heads and looking the other way, just like the hypocritical jerks who say nice things about manhood but don't actually do a god damned thing for men and boys that most of them are.

If you're male in this society, you are a disposable utility, and that's all you are. Earl recognized it, tried to do something about it, and finally gave up.

And here's my prediction: almost no one in the mainstream media will bother writing one word about this. Because Earl was a man, and nobody cares about men and boys.

He gave up, because none of you feminists OR you conservative traditionalists gave a flying fuck when it came right down to it.

But one more time I'm gonna say it: all you stinking lying fuck scumbags I mentioned above by name? Fuck every single one of you pieces of shit, and all your friends and supporters and sycophants too.

FUCK. YOU.

Editor's note:

Admittedly, many, if not most of the people listed in this article will take delight at provoking the anger of the "very bad men over at AVfM". Let's be really clear about what this article says. The evil, self satisfied indifference of the major actors and proponents of a dominant ideology of gender in the face of a male rate of suicide FOUR TIMES HIGHER than corresponding female suicide is laid squarely at your feet. We are not simply going to yell "fuck you" and go away. We're coming for each of you. We will never stop until you and your indifference to human harm relegated to the same trash-bin of history the Ku Klux Klan, and the third reich now occupy. Giggle if you like, or just go back to eating cheese coated wacky fries. Your indifference to human damage, as you pretend to humanism or some "greater good" is why you are named here, and why we are coming for you.

~JtO

Publisher's note. Obviously, we could not think of every name off the top of our heads that deserve to be on this list. Please add them in the comments and we will update. Thanks. PE

A man's way of healing

I recently read a piece on fatherhood and attachment parenting (AP). I read and participated in the comments as well. Since then the aftereffects have been bouncing around in my head like a pinball (yes, there is that much room in there) and it just won't leave me alone.

It has nothing to do really with AP or any other kind of parenting. It was more about the emotional reaction I had to the discussion of men and their feelings.

It has reminded me of my father. Not him as a parent, or even a man, but actually the emotional aftermath of his death.

About a month after my father passed I was with a friend in a tavern. It was one of those rare places suited for someone like me. It had walls paneled in dark wood, oversized leather seating strewn across a carpet thick enough to keep the room near soundless, even when it was busy. And it had the look of never having been busy. The memory of quiet conversations hung in the air like the secret history of a thousand friendships. A single, gentleman barkeep polished glasses; on the ready to pour your choice of poison or listen to a joke.

We were just there making quiet small talk, probably poking a little fun at politics or maybe discussing the latest in movies. I don't exactly remember what we were talking about that day. It was over twenty years ago.

At some point, in the middle of a short lull, he asked me, almost as though it were an afterthought. "So, how are you doing now…since your Dad?"

And I told him, you know, pretty much in the way of small talk between two friends in a bar.

"Oh, you know. It's a process. It goes up and down. Pretty normal path of grief, actually. But I am getting along with it. Doing well. It happens to all of us, you know?"

My friend listened to me, nodded his head and downed the last of his beer without saying anything. Then he hopped up from his chair, took a step away, then turned back toward me and leaned down. He spoke, almost whispering, "Another beer?"

And as he spoke he rested his hand on my shoulder. He gave me a gentle, almost non-existent squeeze; just enough pressure, just barely enough, to register, and in it I could feel the most profound love of my friend. It was a touch that made words useless; that transcended any crazy notion that there was something that needed to be said, and indeed proved just how empty and useless the human mouth can be at times.

With that touch, a tear instantly slid from my eye and mercifully tracked down the other side of my face, away from his view.

And before you decide to butcher that moment by observing that I should not be ashamed of my tears, or that I think they should be hidden, please don't do that. I am not ashamed of my tears, nor would my friend have ever harbored any such thought.

The thing is that he did not need to hear the admission of my pain, or see my tears, to know my grief. He knew me. He knew my father had died. So, he knew what he needed to know. He did not require anything from me to offer his love in a way that my heart could take in, like water on a dry sponge. I did not need to lay my grief at his feet or satisfy his need to pull my feelings about the loss of my father out through my lips.

He honored my privacy. He did not dig and scrape and invade underneath my platitudes to get at the rawness of my loss. Nor was he fooled by the shallowness of my answers. He simply walked around all those things and offered me what only another man could. The silent, undemanding love of a brother.

In his touch was the compassion of a thousand therapists. And in his honor of my private way of grieving was the skill so few therapists ever learn. He, in that brief but timeless moment, was the protector of my broken heart; standing as a sentry guarding my wounds and allowing me to lean on him in the way of men.

These days, when I hear the prattle of the allegedly enlightened about the hearts of men, I almost always laugh at their lack of understanding; about their desperation to prove competence and expertise in matters on which they are truly clueless.

I listen to them talk about men's need to be ok with sharing their feelings, about being emotionally open, but most often this is all framed in the most disrespectful and ignorant tone of someone asserting that men would be better off if they were more like women.

As always, a bushel of foolishness usually contains a kernel of truth. Certainly men do need to give themselves more permission to feel, and to express it. But as I look past all the sneering condescension of those who think men would benefit from sitting in circles and passing Kleenex, satisfying the sick and outrageous egos of book hucksters and Oprah aficionados, I am reminded of my friend and his healing love.

I am reminded that emotional pain is not a dog and pony show, that love is not a brass band or a group hug, and that friendship is defined and proven by the people in it. With all respect for women, and in honor of their ways to handle their own hearts, this is all especially true for men.

I am not pretending you can meet all of a man's needs with such a simple expression. But I received healing that day; a kind of healing that I carry with me and always will. It did not require an emotional breakthrough, or some vast cathartic moment or rounds of counseling, insurance forms and the dissection of my childhood. All that was needed was the company of a friend who chose to see my pain, and who chose to offer comfort, not with his ego and false wisdom, but with his love and grounded respect.

This is the way of men, when we get out of their way and choose not to force them into the mold of ideologues. Look as hard as I may, I can find nothing in it to fault.

AVFM Radio Tonight: RIP Earl Silverman

VFM News and Commentary · 27 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Tomorrow night, Saturday, April 27, we will be airing a special episode of AVFM Radio, commemorating the life and work of Earl Silverman, the man who founded and operated the only refuge for battered men in Canada. Mr. Silverman committed suicide after the shelter, which was completely ignored by the Canadian Government, fell into hard economic times.

While the circumstances and precise reasons for his decision are not known at this time, we do know that Earl had struggled for years to provide services to men who needed to escape violent relationships. He was first exposed to that violence when he was married to an abusive woman. He sought out help for that and found there was none. Against all odds and in spite of the fact that the Canadian government summarily rejected all of his requests for funding, he pushed ahead with plans and provided services to battered men out of his own pocket and with meager contributions from a largely uncaring society.

Said one advocate today:

"The fellow I was staying with in Calgary hung himself this morning. He had spent 20 years fighting the courts and agencies of government to have men recognized as victims of domestic abuse worthy of equal treatment by the courts and government. He was frustrated because no one seemed to care or do anything about it. In his own case, he was victimized first by his ex and later by a system that didn't care to hear him. No [one] wanted to help the battle."

His death has just been confirmed by the medical examiner to James Huff.

AVFM Founder Paul Elam will be co-hosting the show with Operations Director James Huff. We will also be trying to bring you someone who knew Earl on a personal level who can give us much better insights into his work and his experiences in his final days.

The call in number for the show is 310-388-9709. All MRHAs are invited to call the show in order to pay their respects to Earl Silverman. The show airs tonight at 8 PM Central time US.

Erin Pizzey · 27 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hi. I've been invited to do another Ask Me Anything on Reddit, and we're starting in about an hour (11am Eastern US time, 4pm London time, running about 3 hours). These are the photos that the "redditors" need to prove it's really me answering question. Dean Esmay will be helping me with the typing. I hope to see you all there–and that you feel free to ask me anything!

We will be dedicating the session to dear Earl Silverman, and while I still care as much as I ever did about abused women I hope men especially come forward with stories and questions, for men have been ignored and forgotten in this conversation (when they aren't portrayed as thugs) for far to long. We will also be announcing a new radio show I'll be doing for AVfM there.

This is the link to where the Ask Me Anything session will be: http://www.reddit.com/r/IAmA/. The thread itself has not opened yet but there will be an update here when it's created and availaable.

You will need a Reddit account to ask questions but it's free to set up and I hope if you're not already on it you'll sign up and come and say hello!

Once again, here's the link! http://www.reddit.com/r/IAmA/ and we'll have a more direct link shortly.

Update: The entire conversation is here: Hi I'm Erin Pizzey, founder of the first Women's Refuge in the UK. Ask me anything! As usual there was far too much to respond to but we did all we could and we invite everybody to come to our first radio show two weeks from today.

SAVE Cites Excessive Delays, Bias with Hancock County Prosecutors

WASHINGTON / April 25, 2013 – A Hancock County prosecutor, found guilty in December on multiple counts of unethical conduct, has yet to be sanctioned for her misconduct. Assistant district attorney Mary Kellett's unethical actions harm the credibility of real victims and represent a threat to innocent citizens, charges SAVE, a victim-advocacy group.

After a two-year investigation, a three-member panel of the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar ruled on December 5, 2012 that ADA Kellett engaged in multiple incidents of prosecutorial misconduct. The Bar Panel found Kellett did not act as a truth seeker, misled the jury, and engaged in conduct unworthy of an attorney (1).

The Panel cited Kellett's failure to turn over "at least two key pieces of exculpatory evidence" which were critical to the defense of Vladek Filler, who had been charged with sexual assault. The seriousness of Kellett's misconduct, the Panel emphasized, "cannot be overstated."

More than four months later, the Maine Judicial Supreme Court has yet to decide on Kellett's punishment. Despite the Bar Panel's recommendation for suspension of her law license, Kellett has been allowed to continue her prosecutorial work.

Prosecutor bias has been documented in other domestic violence cases in Hancock County.

Cynthia Boucher had violated the bail conditions for a previous domestic incident against her husband Michael, an Ellsworth city councilman. He ended up in the hospital with facial lacerations.

Despite being a repeat offender, Mrs. Boucher was offered a plea deal that removed the domestic violence and bail violation charges, replacing them with a charge of simple assault. Boucher was ordered to spend only a weekend in jail and pay a $300 fine. Her victim was forced to flee the area with his daughter and resign his city council seat (2).

"This 4-month delay in sanctioning Mary Kellett is unconscionable and outrageous," notes SAVE spokesman Howard Goldman. "Dozens of innocent men may risk similar prosecution without probable cause, while female repeat offenders are being given sweet-heart deals by Hancock County prosecutors."

SAVE calls for DA Carletta Bassano to immediately remove Mary Kellett from her prosecutorial duties, and urges the Maine Supreme Court to act promptly on the Bar panel's recommendation to restore integrity and credibility to Maine's criminal justice system.

Mary Elizabeth Williams killed Earl Silverman

Paul Elam · 29 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism did not kill Earl Silverman. Feminists are so completely sure of this that one of them, Mary Elizabeth Williams, over at salon.com, penned an article establishing feminism's complete lack of culpability — in the title.

Feminism Didn't Kill Men's Rights Advocate Earl Silverman.

There you go. And it has to be true because feminists are working on men's issues, too. Right?

We have been hearing for months now, since the MHRM has found some legs, that men have nothing to worry about; that feminists have our backs, really, really. We just need to help them dismantle patriarchy; help them reengineer men into non-raping, non-violent, non-patriarchal non-entities and our problems as sometimes suffering human beings will be addressed. We need to be patient, some say (and be willing to be humiliated). Others take the more direct approach and say we need to just shut the fuck up.

And if we would do those things, either be patient or shut the fuck up, then those equity valuing social saints we call feminists will make sure it is a better society for all, including men and boys.

I suppose that's why after twenty years of dedicated research, meticulous documentation and tenacious, relentless pursuit for support for a single men's shelter, from a feminist dominated domestic violence apparatus in Canada, Earl Silverman found himself marginalized, ignored and utterly, completely hopeless.

I suppose that is why he found himself hanging by the neck, dead, after reportedly having written a suicide note saying that he hoped his untimely death would help draw attention to the problems that 20 years of his heartfelt work could not.

In all candor, I do not find Williams' article to be particularly surprising. In fact, if someone would have asked, I would have said you could set your watch the moment Earl was declared dead and counted ticks aloud until some feminist, on some feminist website wrote an article directed at a feminist audience assuring them that it was not their fault.

I would have predicted the article would find that in no way did feminist driven policies ignoring and burying the reality of male victimization and female perpetration have anything to do with this man's despondency, much less his death. And I would have stated for sure that the writer would have made the case that a man who fought desperately and futilely for the humanity of men was in no way driven to the brink and over it by a culture and a feminist establishment that just did not give a damn.

I was not surprised that Williams stood on Earl's carcass, cherry picking one highly biased source of domestic violence statistics (which were also conflated with sexual assault) to make him look dishonest and/or uninformed, while ignoring the massive body of evidence that demonstrates he was right on the money; that men are just about as likely as women to be the victims of domestic violence.

I was not even bothered by the fact that even if we accepted Williams' single, slanted source for statistics that it does not explain the failure to have a single shelter for men in a country that is literally crawling with them for women.

I am not shocked, or even disappointed, that she took a cheap stab at MHRAs, linking to an episode of AVFM Radio and cherry picking quotes from callers, many of whom were overcome with shock and grief from the very recent news of Earl's suicide.

I could have easily predicted that she would fail to mention the twenty years Earl Silverman spent being ridiculed and rejected by a feminist establishment that controls the DV service purse strings and has no intention whatsoever of seeing men and their children find help when their lives have been put in turmoil by violent women.

I am not even taken aback by the smarmy, phony pretense to compassion for Earl Silverman's death that Williams performed as well as a former stripper in a B movie from the 1950's.

No, none of this is surprising at all, especially the fact that a feminist would quickly come out and declare with a smug air of moral superiority that feminism had nothing to do with his death. I find that Williams' take on all of this is only par for the course for an ideology of depraved indifference and solipsism practiced on a level that defies articulation.

But where I do, must, take a step back and reel in disgust is in Williams' offering of an explanation for Earl Silverman's demise.

> But feminism wasn't the cause of Silverman's death. Instead, his story seems to be that of a man whose demons had long plagued him. Last month, as he prepared to shutter his shelter, he said that when he'd left his marriage two decades earlier, he was frustrated not merely by the lack of services for men, but the default narrative of male-as-abuser. "When I went into the community looking for some support services, I couldn't find any," he said. "There were a lot for women, and the only programs for men were for anger management. As a victim, I was re-victimized by having these services telling me that I wasn't a victim, but I was a perpetrator … I basically tried to commit suicide," he said, "because I couldn't do anything."

And in this, William sinks to a level that I had not even thought possible. She takes the words of Earl, as he recounts the despair of being a victim in a world that insisted, at the behest of feminists, that he could only be regarded as a perpetrator. She takes his deep pain of unthinkable betrayal, from twenty years past, and uses it to make him look like he was a fucking write-off before any of this came to be.

She essentially tells us how feminism did, in fact, kill Earl Silverman, while deflecting the blame to him as just another man with "demons." Yes, he did have demons. He had demons that had "long plagued him," just as Williams said. The only thing she forgot the mention is that the demons were her and those of her repugnant ilk.

Yeah, but that was then...

wa·ter·shed (wô'ter-shed)

n.

1. A ridge of high land dividing two areas that are drained by different river systems. Also called water parting.

2. The region draining into a river, river system, or other body of water.

3. A critical point that marks a division or a change of course; a turning point: "a watershed in modern American history, a time that … forever changed American social attitudes" (Robert Reinhold).

Life, or at least one that is lived with the aim of learning and growing, should be marked by watershed moments that are separated by periods of time spent chasing ideals and dreams, or excellence in life's pursuits. In fact, I would argue that any life spent in the absence of those ambitions will have few, if any, watersheds.

I suppose that saying that is my own way of trying to convince myself that my own life is not just a straight line, marked by nothing and going nowhere, relegated to the ranks of those who might as well not have existed. While the jury is still out on that one, I do believe I had what I would call a watershed moment.

It was the moment I found out that Earl Silverman had hung himself.

I did not know that it was a pivotal moment at the time. It was, on my first reaction, just a gut wrenching punch that took my breath away. I am still reeling, truth tell, and I may be for a while. Earl was one of the few that spent more time acting than talking and his loss is significant.

The question then becomes what to do with this tragedy.

As I have managed to digest some of the loss; sifting through my anger at an establishment, and a culture, that marginalized and dismissed Earl till he ended his frustration at the end of a rope, I have actually come up not with what I am going to do so much as what I am not going to do any more.

Actually, with one thing I am not going to do any more. I am not going to waste my time. Just as importantly, I am not going to waste yours.

Whether by fate or coincidence, Earl's death came at a time of unprecedented growth in the M(H)RM. Even as twenty years of frustrated efforts on his part to provide services for male victims of domestic violence ended disastrously, we have also witnessed a groundswell of men and women who are adamantly rejecting the falsehoods of gender feminism and taking a stand against the corruption and tyranny endemic to the ideology.

The growth has brought with it some growing pains, as well, and some other unfortunate complications. Left unchecked, these problems will only sap the finite resources of time and energy available to us that need to be expended on matters that further our mission.

The first problem, as is characteristic for our ranks, comes from within. I have been literally inundated of late with attempts at backstabbing, mostly in the name of furthering personal and political agendas.

Someone in the comments here made the assertion that one of our top tier editors had a hidden political agenda. It is not only baseless, as far as I can tell, but it is also cowardly and destructive. How, pray tell, does a man defend himself against this? How does he prove that he does not have a secret agenda? Well, of course he can't, which was the point of making the accusation in the first place as far as I am concerned.

It was a conniving and disingenuous attempt to undermine, for, as you might have guessed, the sake of the accuser's own political agenda.

In another case, one of our senior editors has been accused of being a feminist plant. Again, there is no proof offered; none, just the attempt to slide a shiv into this persons back for the sake of doing it.

First, let me say this. If the editor in question is a feminist plant, PLEASE for the love of god, send me some more feminist plants. The accused in this case has done a great deal more work directly on behalf of men and boys, including some serious FTSU, than the accuser. So if that is what having feminist plants gets AVFM, I want them lining up.

Sadly, in both of these cases there is not a shred of evidence. Even sadder, in both these cases the accusers were known M(H)RAs.

When I said I knew what I was not going to be doing any more in the future, putting up with this kind of pointless, juvenile, time wasting crap is one of them.

So here is a rule going into effect immediately. I invite all conspiracy theorists, would-be snitches and witch hunters to offer clear, irrefutable proof – the beyond a reasonable doubt variety – of their allegations toward fellow M(H)RAs. And I want that proof immediately upon receipt of your accusation. If said theorists, snitches and witch hunters fail to provide said proof, whether the accusation is posted to the comments here, or is received in any other fashion, your affiliation with AVFM and your ability to comment here will be immediately and irrevocably terminated.

This rule applies to all AVFM staff as well. The days when we enable any sort of circular firing squad at this website are done.

Henceforth I am asking all editors and site mods, if you see any comments on this site that amount to an unsubstantiated allegation against any known M(H)RA, please put the comment in moderation for review and advise me of it, regardless of who posted it. Whether it comes from a brand new commenter, or from JTO or myself, put it in moderation till we get it sorted out.

I am also going to take this opportunity to address the subject of partisan politics with readers. It is my estimation, and I think it is a fair one, that AVFM overall takes a fairly balanced view toward politics. That is to say I get complaints all the time that AVFM leans too heavily to the right, usually followed by a complaint that we lean too heavily to the left.

That is our sweet spot. As long as AVFM is pissing off polemicists across the board, I figure we are doing well.

As a matter of complete self-disclosure here, I myself am right of center in the general neighborhood of the small "l" libertarian camp, which of course means that my political beliefs are better than your political beliefs. Or so I think when I am washing down blue pills with mainstream Kool-Aid and fighting with others according to the script provided by the mainstream media.

I also have the general feeling that most but not all of AVFM readers generally lean toward conservative political values.

It does not mean those, or any other political values are going to guide editorial policy. I have shown a couple or three right wingers the door and I will do the same for as many as it takes to keep us safe from political co-opting. And yes, for those of you about to whine, "Hey man! What about left wingers. Are you showing any of them the door, too?"

Uh, yes. I have. And I will do it again if there are here to push politics instead of support activism.

The reason for this is purely practical. We already cut ourselves off from those that would dilute the message by refusing to budge on overtly defying gender ideology. By insisting on a politically neutral stand that simply opposes the violent ideology known as feminism, as well as the utilitarian ideology of many social conservatives, we cast a much wider net into the arena of public opinion.

That leaves people here on the right and the left to each work against misandry in their own way, without allowing them to dictate the activities of the site or the management team.

It is purely practical.

Political divisions and bickering are a stupid blood sport, and usually constitute little more than a blue pill, masturbatory pastime for those hopelessly ensconced in a left-right paradigm that sold them down the river ages ago.

Even if you disagree with this, it is the position we take in relation to trying to accomplishing activism on behalf of men and boys.

And there is little more to say about that. I know there are people on the AVFM team whose political views are different than mine. As long as they are not pushing their personal politics here, and as long as they are doing advocacy (and they ARE), then I will have their back against all comers. Period.

I do ask and insist that everyone recognize that this is not a website for partisan political squabbles, and that I will not allow it to be turned in to one.

There are a couple of other “distractions” that I also intend to put into the rear view mirror today. Effective immediately, I am asking all site editors and mods to immediately remove and/or reject approval on comments from feminists with the standard “patriarchy-penis, feminism helps men, fake wage gap, fake oppression, fake rape epidemic, blah, blah, bullshit” that come to the site to derail threads.

There is a thousand places on the internet to spend time arguing with people who neither want nor care about the truth. I respectfully submit to AVFM readers and contributors that this is not one of them.

I am asking all the editors and mods to handle seagull comments in the same fashion. For those of you that don’t know what a seagull comment is, that is where someone from the outside flies in, flaps around a lot, squawks, and then shits on everything before flying out again. This includes those who register to share their “concerns” about our tone, or with advice on how they would be doing things differently than us if and when they ever actually got off their lazy asses and did anything. Just spam those comments right out of existence.

We will never lose site of the need for critique, but we have ample diversity and actual experience here to provide it without relying on the flimsy ideas of someone doing a drive-by.

I know, for some this will reduce the entertainment value of the comments a bit. To that I can only say that I found the idea of Earl Silverman, dead, hanging from the rafters of a garage, less than entertaining.

We are an activist site, and we are more and more in the future going to be hard-nosed about acting like one. If that bothers anyone, we have plenty we can give you to do to help take your mind off of it.

I am pretty sure Earl would be happy to know you are doing your part.

Rape farming: the original series

August Løvenskiolds · 29 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hundreds of years ago, a "rape" was a term given to a subdivision of a county's land that appears to be unique to Sussex county in England, and is controversially linked to defenses against those Viking invaders that I count among my kin. So yes, a case can be made that rape was not about Sex, but rather, Sussex, and Power, as in, a defensive force against marauders.

Rape, Sex and Power. Power and Sex and Rape.

The dawn of the modern rape farmer can well be traced the Susan Brownmiller's 1975 book, Against Our Will, which expanded the crime of rape into "a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear". Out of this one piece of blustering bullshit has grown almost all of today's feminism boilerplate as holy scripture, and a litany of lies:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- All men do this as a conscious process. (Cursed be the penis.)
- All women are kept in a state of fear. (Blessed are the meek.)
- All men are guilty. (For all are sinners.)
- All women are helpless. (Except for radfem grace.)
- Lions and tigers and bears. (Oh, my.)

[/unordered_list]

The irony that after 38 years of this publication, feminism still asserts an unchanging narrative that women are terrified, helpless, and therefore, worthless, should not be lost on anyone, but it completely blows past feminists just like the Oz story of the evil Dorothy killing two witches in order to keep their shiny red shoes.

You can think of this politicization as the exploitation of rape, or even the rape of rape, but when it grows into an institutionalized industry that depends on the collective guilt and enslavement of men, I call it rape farming.

Rape farming, in the context of this article, can be summarized as "the drive to increase the amounts, varieties, and severity of rape in order to feed narratives to further either the sexual power of women, or the subjugation and enslavement of men and boys, or both." Those unfamiliar with my first post on this subject, "Rape farming: the next generation" ("RF:TNG") may wish to read it before proceeding.

Women, through their sexual and reproductive capabilities, have always had a vast amount of power and influence over men, but this power cloaks itself in denials and subtleties in order to preserve itself. Cunt-power is cunning but every now and then, it peeks through the veil to expose a fetid maw of endless hunger and hatred.

I can see you now

I still remember the very moment when I coined the term "rape farmer". It was closing time, and a newly formed, boozy, late-20's yuppie couple (neither of whom had I seen before) was standing on the sidewalk just outside my business, "closing the deal" on their hookup. The woman had been particularly loud, aggressive and brash earlier in the evening, so I was monitoring her activities as such women are often the vocal focal point of trouble.

Out of nowhere, the woman scooted around behind her new guy and pulled his pants down to the ground. The man stood there bemused and confused as she cackled at him; he was naked from his waist to his ankles.

"Excuse me," I said to the guy in as pleasant a tone as I could muster, "you might want to cover yourself – there is a school a block away from here, and a police substation 2 blocks away, and exposing yourself in a school zone can land you on a sex offender registry for the rest of your life."

At this point Miss Brash started laughing and yelling: "I want him to be a sex offender! I WANT HIM TO BE A SEX OFFENDER!"

I saw them off, and as I walked back into my business, my bartender, a single dad, was shaking his head. "She is a handful", he said.

"Bullshit", I replied, "She is a rape farmer." It was Thursday, March 28, 2013, 2:23 am, and the convoluted pattern of exploiting rape narratives to further feminist causes had found a new name.

More sprouts, more doubts

A few days after AVfM published RF:TNG, another new and dramatic form of rape farming exploded onto the world: 4-year-old kiss rape. A feminist father, one Zach Rosenberg, found a unique way to melt the hearts of feminist shrews everywhere when he accused his young son of rape after the boy kissed a girl without first gaining her enthusiastic consent. The story is well documented on AVfM so I won't recount the details here except to note that in one fell swoop, this darling of the Good Men Project managed to:

(1) create a new delusion and dilution of rape,
(2) further damage the image of fatherhood in society, and
(3) out himself as a wretched, child-abusing asshole.

But even as Rosenberg sacrificed his son to Moloch he was appeasing the rape farmer: even 4-year-old boys, it seems, use a conscious process to keep all women in fear.

Here in Dallas, another new form of rape farming is emerging: the extortion faux rape. After a rape charge by a 16-year-old girl against an affluent 19-year-old boy was no-billed by a grand jury (an amazing outcome in and of itself, since grand juries hear from neither defense lawyers nor defense witnesses and are notorious for indicting anyone for anything), the family of the supposed rapist is suing the family of the alleged victim for pimping out the daughter in hopes of using her as a pawn in a get-rich-quick scheme.

Something similar is also happening in the Brian Banks case now that he has been exonerated – the school district that paid the faux victim over a million US Dollars is suing to get their money back – plus, another million US Dollars in punitive damages.

Note the environmental damage from rape farming highlighted by these cases:

(1) awareness of faux rape charges is making even rubber-stamp grand juries balk at bringing charges,
(2) the recognition of rape as commodity is starting to undermine feminist abuses of rape laws, and
(3) the falsely accused are becoming so emboldened that they are now turning the tables on the rape farmers.

This is a critical and necessary response to rape farming because if we are to preserve the treatment of actual rape as an actual crime, then delegitimizing and scorning rape farmers is essential – and, of course, the feminists are furious and frustrated, particularly at M(H)RAs.

Now, the women-as-victim meme is a powerful tool of feminists and won't die any time soon, but the lengths that they will go to in order to create these narratives – and the lies they will tell along the way – are still astonishing.

Slate's Double X recently reported that talent scouts were stalking patients at a 1700 bed anorexia clinic in Sweden, looking for fresh clothing models. Oh, the horrors of getting a lucrative modeling job! The crimes of the scouts (if they happened at all) occurred over a year ago and consisted of the reckless giving out of business cards. And those "1700 beds" are actually "eight beds in the ward, primarily for severely ill patients with anorexia nervosa, and two emergency beds for patients from the mobile unit."

The rape farmers have become so greedy, so corrupted by the heady odor of the rape harvest, so jaded by their boilerplate and so lazy in their tactics that they are now waking up to find their carefully manicured rape culture is falling apart, only not in the way that they had imagined.

A pile of corpses is no place to make love

Any man who criticizes the Feminist movement or speaks on issues affecting men and boys will assuredly be accused of turning off women. The shaming tactic ranges from “You must be a bitter virgin who can’t get laid” to “No woman is ever going to sleep with you with an attitude like that.” This tactic pimps female affection as an incentive for ideological compliance. Laughably, these jerks claim to respect women.

However, we shouldn’t congratulate ourselves too much for seeing through that howler. I recently had a conversation with an associate, with whom I’ve had many conversations on gender issues. In short, she said “Now that you’re aware of these issues, it’s probably best if you just keep your head down. You’ll be smart enough to avoid the risks and continue to build on your success, and you’ll stand out above other men.”

While this is certainly somewhat coldblooded, I can’t heap too much scorn. Because it is really no different from the programming that has driven humanity since long before we were human.

Competition is vital to survival, innovation, and personal growth. We refine our ideas, our creations, and ourselves through healthy competition. And it is only natural that as a man competes, grows, and becomes more successful, he will be more attractive to women. I would suggest that our focus as men should be to achieve fulfilling and meaningful goals rather than simply chasing women. But desiring companionship and bonding with women is a healthy desire when kept in balance. It is natural to want to feel desirable. Just check yourself on your way up the ladder in pursuit of whatever goals you’re after.

On the other hand, idealizing success with the ladies at all costs is unhealthy competition. If you’re committing crimes for resources and to seek female approval, you’re a violent jerk and deserve what’s coming to you. If you’re stepping on other people’s heads to achieve success with the ladies, you’re an asshole. And if you perceive human rights activism as counterproductive to attracting females, you’re a loser.

Consider these social ills, which affect both men and women and are the result of unhealthy competition: Perceiving people as resources to be exploited. Unnecessary wars and occupations around the world. Fatherlessness and the breakdown of the family, which is very damaging to children and is a root cause of crime. Suicide. Workplace deaths. Cultural denial of victims of rape and domestic violence. Lack of respect for human life. And that’s just scratching the surface.

Any woman who will reject you for helping people or furthering a worthy cause isn’t worth getting to know. And if you’re willing to step on people’s heads (or worse) to build status, it’s time to seriously re-examine priorities. Maybe none of these bad things are happening to you. Maybe you even profit from some of it. But then it happens to a man you care about, or it happens to you. Was it worth it?

If there are any gender ideologues reading this, they’re probably nodding and thinking “See? Patriarchy hurts men too! It’s the fault of men!” I would kindly request that you stop denying women personal agency. Remember, “women hold up half the sky.”

Women are also extremely competitive in the pursuit of wealth and status. And this has it’s own healthy and unhealthy sides, as the above. Some women are violent, some are con artists, some are bullies and tyrants. Women also play a part in the perpetuation of unhealthy male competition. Some women purposefully egg on men to be violent and corrupt on their behalf. Others enjoy getting together with dysfunctional men, as long as he’s exciting and/or keeps bringing in the cheddar. And many others use manipulative tactics to keep men’s focus on pleasing women (especially themselves.)

Men and women need to ask themselves: Are you engaged in healthy competition? Or are you adding to the misery in the hopes of some sweet stuff? (Whatever that may be.) And if you’re neglecting suffering in your society because it might interfere with your selfish status climbing, just remember that you could be the next to fall on hard times.

Humans are animals, driven by the same instincts. But we are also human, and can aspire to better. We have come a long way from our primitive natures in many ways. Maybe it's time to take the next step. Let's engage each other in healthy competition, and eschew its unhealthy forms. Let's protect each other's human rights. Let's not seek love on top of a pile of corpses.

Justice for Men and Boys Party Arrives

Justice for Men and Boys (and the women who love them)[1] plans to contest the top 30 Conservative marginal seats at the 2015 general election, if the funding is in place to do so. One of these seats is Wolverhampton South West, which the Conservatives won with a margin of just 691 votes in 2010. A gentleman who lives in the constituency contested the seat in 2010 for his own political party, and in 2015 he'll be standing as our candidate.

Ray Barry is the leader of the political party Equal Parenting Alliance[2]. He lives in the constituency, and he's campaigned against anti-male bias in legislation for the last 13 years. He assumed when he and his wife divorced 13 years ago that he'd experience fair and equal treatment in the family court, but he found anti-male prejudice and bigotry, and was removed from the lives of his three children, to whom he was devoted. Fathers rarely qualify for Legal Aid, and he now works in family courts helping fathers apply for contact with their children.

Ray is going to contest the Wolverhampton South West seat in 2015 for our party, because he believes the unfairness which he encountered now extends beyond fathers. Men and boys encounter injustices and discriminations in many aspects of their lives solely on account of their gender. British laws and institutions treat men and boys with ever less justice than women and girls – with less fairness, kindness, understanding, and forgiveness. Our party has outlined in a public consultation document[3] 18 areas where men typically have poorer life outcomes, or face disadvantages and discriminations solely on account of their gender. Ray Barry contributed the material on parental access to children (pp 10,11). Most of the assaults on men's interests are attributable to the actions and/or inactions of the state, although 72% of the income tax paid by British citizens is paid collectively by men while women pay only 28%.

In this climate it should come as no surprise that men and boys commit suicide at three times the rate of women and girls. Ray asks voters to reflect on their own experiences, and those of their family members, friends, and acquaintances, and cast their votes for him if they agree that restoring justice to men and boys is a priority in twenty first century Britain.

Branding the feminist reptilian brain

August Løvenskiolds · 30 April 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When our unwitting ally Big Red (god, I hate that name – it impugns a fine Texas soft drink product, much like "drinking the Kool-Aid" did. And those in Jonestown actually drank cyanide and Flavoraid, not Kool-Aid, oh, yeah) was plagiarizing part 4 of Lindy West's article during Red's menstrual show in Toronto, she ~~said~~ quoted this:

"Feminists do not want you to commit suicide. Any pressures and expectations that lower the quality of life of any gender are part of patriarchy. The fact that depression is characterized as an effeminate weakness, making men less likely to seek treatment, is part of patriarchy."

Mere moments later, when confronted with the reality of male suicide, she sang, famously, "Cry me a River".

In addition to outing herself as a liar and plagiarist, Big Red's rapid cycling of feelings (caring about men's lives…and then, not so much) can be called many things – disingenuous. Mercurial. Bi-polar. Incoherent. Blathering. Gaslighting. In this case, another term suggests itself – Reptilian.

A common female tactic for shaming men involves an appeal to men to share their feelings of weakness or vulnerability, and then, reacting with revulsion and rejection of those men who are actually trusting enough, or gullible enough, to take a woman who does this sort of thing at her word.

In an article in the Atlantic, author Andy Hines relates a discussion with Brené Brown regarding the gender politics of shame:

> "Most women pledge allegiance to this idea that women can explore their emotions, break down, fall apart—and it's healthy," Brown said. "But guys are not allowed to fall apart." Ironically, she explained, men are often pressured to open up and talk about their feelings, and they are criticized for being emotionally walled-off; but if they get too real, they are met with revulsion. She recalled the first time she realized that she had been complicit in the shaming: "Holy Shit!" she said. "I am the patriarchy!"

Brown is describing the same cycle as Red demonstrated: ask about men's concerns, and then, shame them for it. What fabulous allies such women are: clearly, we can trust them to handle our issues for us with all the effectiveness and sensitivity they are so well-known for.

If we want to lose men's rights, that is. Attention, femmies: we don't, and we won't.

In the current vernacular, the revulsion against male weakness is said to originate in the human female's reptilian brain – an unconscious, primitive instinct so powerful that it overrides higher, more rational desires. A putatively rational woman might genuinely want her man to open up about his feelings (Brown claims we should embrace vulnerability in order to live wholeheartedly) but if that happens, that silly lizard in her head won't stand for it…and the lizard scares her rationalization hamster so much that the hot guy she knows from the gym is about to replace her husband in her vagina.

This notion – that we are somehow not responsible for our emotional (reptilian) urges – is yet another facet of how feminists shirk their obligations to adulthood, and their agency. Rather than seeking to understand why they behaved in such an unflattering way so as to shame a man she offered trust and understanding to, the feminist, whose only worship is to her own feelings, rejects her own promises of support and shuffles away, scuttling her pretense of human worthiness.

Men hate such women for the same reason that everyone hates traitors: they cannot be trusted and they will inevitably betray and destroy everyone and everything they claim that they love.

A real person – a real human, worthy of building and supporting human community – keeps their promises. They self-examine and fight feelings that conflict with their commitments. When they fail – and we all inevitably do – they own their failures and strive to make recompense to those they have hurt or wronged. They apologize, and feel gratitude when they are forgiven.

Unlike feminists.

A recent poll by the feminist Huffington Post found that only 20% of Americans identify as feminists – but that 82% of Americans identify with "men and women should be social, political, and economic equals," which is the supposed definition of feminism. Only 9% of Americans explicitly reject gender equality.

Let that sink in for a moment – feminist ideals are more popular than self-identified Christians (78.4%) in America, and yet feminists themselves are so detested that only 20% of people (23% of women) identify with them.

Feministing writes this off as a "branding" problem – as in, "oh, my, these shoes aren't Jimmy Choo's at all" – rather than an indictment of their abusive reptilian desires run visibly and obviously amok.

It has been a decade now since the Onion declared: Women Now Empowered By Everything A Woman Does and yet still the feminists don't grasp what a brutal joke they have become – and everyone is now in on the joke except for them.

Since you STILL don't get it, feminists, here is why you have become such a joke: victims generate compassion, but perpetual victimhood is loathsome. Equality of opportunity is worthy; equality of outcomes is bullshit. Your privations were worthy of addressing but your comforts are your own responsibility. Rape farming with the intent of the casual destruction of men and dilution of the needs of real rape victims is scabrous.

Now, whatever rhetorical value the notion of a reptilian brain in humans might have, in scientific terms the notion is outdated and something of a barrier in current studies of the brain and human psychology.

A barrier just like feminism and gynocentrism have become when seeking human equality, justice, and compassion.

Brands are for the slaves of feminism. Freedom is better.

If you are a mangina (16% of men identify as feminists) who is starting to have doubts about feminism, try an experiment – go to your nearest feminist slavemaster and tearfully confess your weaknesses to her – I mean, let it all out, just like they claim they support. When she curls her lip, laughs at you, and tries to shame you, it is okay for you to rise up like a man and walk away from her without a backward glance. Do that, and for the first time since you became a feminist, she might even begin to respect you a little bit.

And that odd feeling you will get will be you, learning to respect yourself, and other men like you.

Help request: AVfM Reference Wiki

Dean Esmay · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A number of people have approached me privately, or asked in the comments section here on AVfM, how exactly they can help with the AVfM Reference Wiki. We view this as a vital resource that can benefit the entire men's movement, but a lot of people struggle with understanding how wikis work and, as such, how they can help with this one. You can give five minutes or five months or five years effort to help it; anything is appreciated, and it only takes as much time as you want to give it. One minute of help is potentially useful. To understand why, you just need to understand how it works.

So let me explain in this article what a wiki is, what the difference is between a wiki and Wikipedia, what the primary goal of this particular wiki is, and then, explain the wiki philosophy and the many many ways you can help with this project.

What is a wiki?

A lot of people seem confused and they do not know the difference between Wikipedia and a wiki in general. So let's get this straight:

A wiki is a reference tool for compiling information. Wikipedia is just one such wiki. Wikipedia was one of the first wikis, and it is by far the best known wiki. However, it is not the wiki. Is is a wiki, one among probably hundreds of thousands in the world.

Wikipedia runs a particular type of wiki software called MediaWiki. The MediaWiki software is used by all sorts of other sites and groups besides the Wikipedia people. Here is an Orthodox Christian wiki. It is a web site on its own servers run by Orthodox Christians to organize information of interest and use to that community. It is not in any way affiliated with or tied to Wikipedia. Here is Ballotpedia, an independent wiki run by people who track U.S. politics, on their own servers and their own web site (and which, by the way, many MHRAs may find useful for political activism projects). Ballotpedia is also not tied to or affiliated with Wikipedia, although if you look closely it is using the same basic software. Here is Encyclopedia Dramatica, still another wiki run by still another completely separate group, whose purpose is basically internet satire. Here is RationalWiki, a once-useful wiki set up to debunk pseudoscience but has sadly become polluted by pseudoscientific gender ideology.

Like almost all wikis, these are all completely separate from, unaffiliated with, and not tied in any way to Wikipedia.

In short: Wikipedia does not equal wiki. Wikipedia is one wiki. It is just the largest and best known wiki, and one focused on general knowledge (if you can call general knowledge "focused.")

And now, on A Voice for Men, we have our own wiki, for our purposes. And what we want it to be is a reference tool for useful, hard, documentable data to help Men's Human Rights Advocates make their case to the world about the general need for more attention to men's and boys' issues.

A wiki is a piece of software that you put information into so other people can see it, read it, reference it, etc. And the main purpose of a wiki is to be collaborative: multiple people can add to and change its content. If you have access to a wiki, then in most cases you can go to any page on that wiki and add content, remove content, or change whatever you find whenever you want to.

This sounds like a recipe for chaos, but, as counter-intuitive as it sounds, having a bunch of people who barely even know each other, who may not even always like each other, able to edit the same document usually works shockingly well. Theories as to why it works vary somewhat, but, for a bunch of group psychology and other reasons I won't go into here, it has been shown in countless cases to work very well, as long as most participants (not even all participants, just most of them) are relatively sane and share the same basic goals, and there are at least a few responsible people riding herd to quell any catfights and oust any trolls.

What is the goal of the AVfM Reference Wiki?

To educate, to learn, and to serve as a reference for men's activists on issues that matter to us: data on domestic violence perpetrated against men and boys; data on sexual assault by women; data on circumcision; data on paternity fraud; data on the suicide rate; data on school performance for males; data on anything else that may be of use to men's boys' advocates making their case for where men need compassion and assistance and recognition, or where bad things are overreported on men and/or underreported on women. It's there to sharpen our knowledge, our ability to understand, discuss and debate, to give you confidence that you know fact from factoid from outright falsehood–or, when the truth is nebulous, to help you at least understand why it's nebulous and the boundaries of what's well established from what's only somewhat established, and what's not established at all.

As it happens, there are other existing Men's Rights wikis currently in existence, or planned to be created, to focus on other things: biographies of significant figures to the movement, varying opinions and controversies within the movement and without, history of the movement, direct policy advocacy, or other specific issues. At some point we plan on pointing to those other wikis to help create a sort of web of related wikis, but for now our goal with this specific AVfM Reference Wiki is to be the go-to source for hard information on issues affecting all or almost all men and boys' issues.

What is the rate of domestic violence against men, in various parts of the world? This wiki will be intended to answer that question, and point you to hard sources that you can go and verify for yourself. What is the rate of male suicides in India? The goal will be to tell you what it is, and point you to hard sources which answer that question. What are the consequences of male genital mutilation? This wiki should answer that question, and provide you with hard sources you can use to document that. What is the number of males incarcerated without due process or legal representation by the family courts in the United States? This wiki is intended to help people find the answer to that question.

As just one example, it is a frequent assertion that only 2% of all male-on-female rape cases are false allegations. Now the fact is, that is a bullshit number. It is a number pulled out of someone's ass, based on nothing much at all. So what is the real rate of false rape allegations? Well actually, we don't know what the real number is, and even of what we do know, the answer tends to depend on how you define rape and what you call a false allegation. But we do have better information on that subject than the completely fictional 2% figure.

So, let's say someone throws the 2% figure at you. What would you rather do? Just say "bullshit!" and walk away? Or would you rather say, "That's a false number, but here's some more realistic information on what it really looks like?" I know which I'd rather do, most of the time. And oh, look here: Here's a great page we've started which goes into substantial detail on the topic of rape. Is that page complete? By no means, but it's got some great and useful info and references. And guess what? You can help make it even better, if this is a subject area that interests you.

And, that's just an example. All topics that relate to reliable, independent, and peer reviewed sources that relate to issues we discuss as men's and boys' advocates can potentially go in there. The rape page is just one page among many potential pages.

So the hope is this wiki can help you explain to the best of your ability what more reasonable figures look like–and, just as important, to point you to references outside the site where you can go check for yourself, and whoever you're talking to can do the same. Neither you nor your debate opponent should have to rely on the wiki exclusively; rather, the wiki will say "here's what we know," and give you external links to verifiable independent sources that you or anybody else can look up for themselves.

And if some information becomes out of date, or new information comes up, we can note the out of date information or the new information.

How do you help on the wiki?

The fundamental wiki philosophy is that, with rare exceptions, mostly anyone with access can change any page any time for any reason they want to. As a rule, nobody "owns" a page, and no page has "an author." Instead, everybody is an author, editor, proofreader, and format stylist. Everybody (including you) is, or can be, any one of those, or all of those at any given moment.

Let's describe a realistic potential scenario: Paul Elam decides he wants to put in some references about the rates of domestic violence against men. He's compiled a list of 100 references over the years, and he wants to contribute it to the wiki. So Paul can go into the wiki, find the page on domestic violence, and just paste his entire list of references in there, and walk way.

Now, John Hembling comes by a day later and looks and says, "oh, Paul forgot these three," and he edits the page and throws his three in there.

Dean Esmay comes in behind them both two weeks later because he's bored and he notices that Paul still doesn't know the difference between it's and its, one of Dean's pet peeves. Paul also misspelled Murray Straus' name. Dean runs through that list of references and fixes those things. He thinks maybe he could add more but he's busy, so he just fixes what he's got time for and moves on.

Asha James wanders in one night because she's bored, and notices at least three of the references are duplicates of each other, and one of them actually says something completely different from what Paul said it did. So she eliminates the duplicate, and corrects the faulty attribution.

Ian Williams emerges from bed the next day, sits down and gets curious, finds this page and says, "This thing is great, but it's formatted for shit. It just looks ugly and it's not very well organized. I'm going to pretty up the formatting to make it consistent and uniform and easier to scan through." So without changing the content, he reformats it so it all looks better.

Dean Esmay comes back and noticed that someone's misusing "their" and "there." So he runs through and fixes that, and also adds eight new references that he just found.

August Løvenskiolds checks the page three days later because he just got into an argument with someone, and notices how great this looks now, but notices two of Dean's "new" references were already in there, Dean just wasn't paying attention. So he takes out Dean's duplicates. Also he notices someone (probably Dean) "fixed" a "their" to "there" and got it wrong, so fixes it back.

Kristina Hansen comes in and decides a couple of graphs would be useful here, makes them, and puts them in there, and also thinks this should be broken into sections. So she jumps to the Talk page (almost all articles have a Talk page) and suggests changing the formatting to break it up differently. Suzanne, who has never even added to the document, is still paying attention to it and hates Kristina's idea, and says so. But five other people who've never even added to the document before either come in and say "Suzanne you're nuts, Kristina's right!" and so Kristina goes ahead and breaks up the list the way everybody thought was better, and Suzanne says "OK fine," and pitches in and helps with the reorganization of the page, and comes up with a new idea in the middle of it that everybody likes even better than the original idea. None of these people added any content, they all just came up with a better way to present it.

Notice here in all this, none of this was formally planned. It all happened as ad hoc collaboration between people who just saw a need and did what they thought was right when they had the time to do it. Furthermore, the document has no real author. Instead it has multiple authors, editors, proofreaders, and commenters. Everyone just collaborated spontaneously to make a document.

That's the wiki way. Everybody is an author, editor, proofreader, designer, and organizer. And if your brain is screaming "that has to be total chaos!" the only thing I can tell you is try it. It's amazing how well it can work, as long as most people involved are sincerely interested in the truth and in making it better, and keep their egos in check. Even hot disagreements (which can happen) can usually be mediated by people going back and forth until the product is more or less acceptable to all or at least most contributors.

What if someone comes through and vandalizes? Well anyone else can come back in and undo their vandalism, and administrators can, at their discretion, lock down a page or limit who has access to edit it, or throw an abuser off the system. But otherwise, most of the time, it's a free-for-all: if you have information and you want to add it, just add it. If you put it in the wrong place, someone else will eventually notice and move it for you. If you can't figure out the formatting, put it up the way you can and someone else will likely come in behind you and fix the formatting.

So how can you help? Well, how do you want to help? Personally, I've got literally thousands of edits on the famous Wikipedia, going back about 10 years. Do you know what most of those edits are? Little stupid things: whenever I see a typo on Wikipedia, I fix that typo. That's probably 80% of my contributions: fix spelling and grammar errors. Once in a while I'll spot a reference that isn't on an article, so I'll paste it in there. Sometimes I'll know a pertinent fact so I'll scribble a line or two into the document. I'm not very good at formatting, so sometimes if I do throw in a reference I'll just put it wherever it seems to make sense and I'll let someone else figure out how to make it look pretty.

You can be the same. Do you have expertise and a lot of references you've accumulated on a particular subject? Great! Go put it in the AVfM Reference Wiki. You don't have any references? That's OK, maybe you're good at spotting typos. Or maybe you're good at making hyperlinks look better. Or maybe you don't mind fixing someone's mangled grammar. Or maybe you see two people arguing on a Talk page about how to improve it, and you have an idea you want to suggest to them. Or maybe you're reading an article and you just notice someone used a comma when they meant to use a period. Or maybe you just found one reference to something that no one else had, and the only contribution you ever made was you shared that one reference: hey, you made that difference.

You can make one punctuation correction in under a minute, and that can be the only thing you've ever done on the whole project: you fixed a misplaced period. So what? You'll have made a contribution, easy as that. Ten people making ten small corrections is just as good as one person making ten corrections, isn't it? Either way, the wiki gets better.

On the other hand, you could plunge your head completely into this thing and spend all your free time for the next year finding references, creating and editing pages, finding graphs and references and links. Sky's the limit really. Give it five minutes or five years, whatever time and energy you've got, whenever you've got it, and the wiki will slowly evolve over time, getting better and better as more information accumulates and more people come and go and add their work to yours, and you add your work to theirs.

How do you become part of this magic?

Easy. Go here, sign up, and jump in. Then, go here and request Activist access. Do not be shy. Do not worry that you don't know what's going on. Do not apologize if you make a mistake. Do not think "I can't write, I don't know what I'm doing." What do you mean? Do you know a good link? Go put it in there, and let someone else figure out how to write up what it's about. You have trouble with spelling and grammar? So what? Write it the best you can and as long as it's factual, someone else can come in behind you and correct your grammar. Nobody cares. We just want more and more useful information in there. So go find that dangling comma, that misspelled word, that missing reference no one else noticed, or just hit a talk page and say "wouldn't that look better if you organized it alphabetically?" Or whatever. Just jump in, the whole spirit of it is this:

Here's the hammer and nails and the paint and the brushes and the board: do what you got time for, leave the rest to everybody else.

And by the way, we are looking for people with either technical or editorial experience who are committed to getting truthful, factual, empirical data into the public eye to help administer the wiki. We need supervisors, organizers, and administrators to watch out for trolls, spammers, vandalism attempts, etc. Believe it or not, we've already gotten some of those. But at minimum you'll start as an activist/editor and can immediately start adding to or modifying documents. And if you want better access, let us know: we'll have a bit of a screening process to make sure only people who need it and have proven trustworthy can do things like create pages and whatnot, but ultimately this depends on as many people as possible pitching in to whatever extent they can.

It's going to be like watching a community garden grow, it's awesome.

Some wikis get created and never prosper and thrive because there's not quite a big enough community to keep it active, and not enough administrators to keep a handle on it. MHRM's Newest Recruit: Catherine Deveny – Rapetard andybob · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Men's Human Rights Movement has a new advocate – and isn't she lovely?

Following in the footsteps of Big Red Bozo's size 18 clown shoes, Australian media leech, newspaper columnist, social commenter and self-described comedienne, Catherine Deveny, has hitched her wagon to the AVfM juggernaut. She accomplished this feat using nothing more than (to coin a Dr F.-ism) her big gob – possibly a circus trick she picked up from her Canadian counterpart.

On 25 April 25, 2013, Australia and New Zealand commemorated A.N.Z.A.C. Day, our day of remembrance for those who served and died in all wars, conflicts and peace-keeping operations. It takes its name from the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps which suffered devastating losses during the Battle for Gallipoli in 1915. For nations with small populations, the massive loss of life (8,709 from Australia; 2,721 from New Zealand) in a single campaign seared itself on our national psyches as a tragic reminder of the wasteful carnage of war.

Catherine Deveny chose to demonstrate her respect for the men who died on her behalf with this:

Here are some of her other insights:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- "Refuse to celebrate a glorification of war that ignores the suffering and carnage of (mostly female) civilians."
- "Anzac Day IS a glorification of war. They didn't die for us but because they were risk-taking testosterone fuelled men with a pack mentality.'
- "I adore men. I hate bullies, homophobes, thugs, racists, misogynists and rapists in the name of war.'
- "Men only enlisted to fight for the money, for the adventure or because they were racist.'

[/unordered_list]

Australians have reacted with outrage and revulsion at Ms Deveny's comments – especially the part about rapists – with a backlash that will likely cause irreparable damage to her cozy career as a celebrated 'social pest' (her own description) and attention-seeking media whore.

Boycotts have begun (http://www.abc.net.au/local/stories/2013/04/29/3747506.htm). Mildura residents have made it clear that she is not welcome to broadcast her show from their local brewery which is scheduled for early May. Like all major country towns, Mildura has a war memorial that stands as a mournful reminder of the decimation of their male population after every major conflict.

A petition has been organized by the On-line Hate Prevention Institute to notify the Veteran's Affairs Ministers of both nations of the public disgust over Catherine Deveny's comments, and to express support for the commemoration of A.N.Z.A.C Day. It does not seek to silence Ms Deveny's freedom of speech.

Sign here.

Catherine Deveny did not Twitter these comments because she is anti-war. She did it because she is a rapetard. She called these men 'rapists', not because they fought in wars, but because they are men – and all men are rapists. The Rape Culture narrative demands that she reaches this conclusion. It is in the script.

Catherine Deveny exposed the toxicity of her radical feminist world view, just as Big Red Bozo did the moment she decided to warble 'Cry Me a River' in response to the issue of male suicide. Both acts have given the public at large a taste of the misandric bigotry that festers in the black hearts of gender ideologues, and it has made the public at large extremely nauseous.

Any doubts concerning Catherine Deveny's bitter hatred of men are dispelled by a perusal of her readily-accessible commentary. She has three children, all boys. This is her idea of exemplary feminist mothering skills:

http://wheelercentre.com/dailies/post/b81546c47fef/

'Home with a 9 year old who has severe breathing and speaking difficulties. Closed in throat, assuming asthma/hayfever induced croup. My question is – do I get him to unpack the dishwasher or put washing on the line?'

Suddenly I was inundated by all these well-meaning do gooder busy bodies suggesting I take him to a hospital. A HOSPITAL!

I tweeted back:

'I'm not taking a kid who's wheezing a bit to the doctor. He's the third of three boys. I only had him for spare parts. I'm spending the day teaching him how to blow smoke rings. After he's finished mowing the lawn.'

Charming.

A dedicated slut walker, she clearly adheres to the Zach Rosenberg school of burdening boys with rape-guilt:

http://www.abc.net.au/unleashed/2733556.html

"I'll be at Slutwalk with my three sons aged eight, nine and 13. They'll be wearing tee shirts that read 'YOU'RE NOT ALLOWED TO RAPE SLUTS EITHER'."

Just in case you thought Ms Deveny had compassion for girls, she was actually fired from her job as a columnist at 'The Age' newspaper in 2010, for making inappropriate comments about 12 year-old Bindi Irwin, daughter of the late crocodile hunter, Steve Irwin.

http://www.theage.com.au/entertainment/tv-and-radio/deveny-dropped-as-columnist-for-the-age-20100504-u6si.html

She wrote: "I do so hope Bindi Irwin gets laid." At least she didn't say 'raped', which is probably what she really wanted to write – feminists hated Steve Irwin. Remember Germaine Greer's comment that he 'deserved' to die?

In a textbook example of Western middle-class, feminist superiority, Ms Deveny is comfortable expressing her distaste for the lower orders. This is her opinion of working-class people living in the outer suburbs:

http://www.abc.net.au/rampup/articles/2011/04/04/3181739.htm

"The reality is that it is impossible to watch these brainless retards belt the crap out of each other without enjoying it just a little."

The Australian government showed its disapproval for referring to its citizens as 'retards' by (get ready for this) appointing her 'Disability Ambassador for International Day for People with Disability'.

Needless to say, the 'retards' weren't pleased. Apparently, Ms Deveny qualifies as disabled because she is dyslexic, a condition she passed on to her sons. No doubt, she assumes they will grow up unable to read the hateful crap she writes about men.

Perhaps most revealing of all is the interview she gave to the feminist website, 'Mamamia', in which we she desperately attempts to hide her self-loathing behind a lot of predicable blather about 'my curves'.

http://www.mamamia.com.au/news/love-my-body-catherine-deveny-im-80kg-and-still-happy/

"There will always be men who love big, voluptuous, buxom, ba-boom ba-boom women. They always have and always will…Any suggestion otherwise is people manipulating the world to make women feel NOT GOOD ENOUGH."

"If women look at any of the stats or any of the scientific research about sexual attraction, men will always find the slightly overweight woman more attractive than the slightly underweight woman."

"I went into Babka's the other day and a woman I sort of knew came up and said hello. Then another woman I sort of knew joined us. The both admitted they were checking out my 'awesome curves' and then realised it was me."

"You are not good enough. That's the only message girls get from the media."

Here is Catherine Deveny and her 'awesome curves'.

Catherine Deveny is a deluded rapetard who has, until very recently, been allowed to flaunt her obscene belief in Rape Culture unchallenged. Making false allegations about dead men, whose lives were stolen by war, has been universally rejected. Now, all we have to do is make the general public care as much about civilian men who are actually living.

Welcome aboard Catherine Deveny. You have contributed to the public distrust of feminist demagoguery as only a rapetard can. We salute you.

Feminists lose elections in Iceland

Lucian Vâlsan · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The feminist understanding of the world is, at least for the moment, rejected in the Icelandic State.

On April 27 the Icelandic voting population was called to the ballot box to decide who is going to lead the tiny North-Western European nation for the next 4 years. In the last elections, only 7 parties participated in the competition but now, following a deep financial collapse and strong attempts by the feminists from the leading Green Left Movement (the most vocal party from the leftist coalition that formed the government in 2009) to suppress free speech and attempt to place the Internet under the control of the State[1], 15 parties participated in the elections, most of them with an euro-skeptic and anti-Statist platform.

Our Icelandic correspondent, Sigurdur Jonsson, predicted on the AVFM Voice of Europe Radio Show at the end of March that the feminist dominated Left Green Movement would be rejected — as the resentment of the population for their "incompetence" was increasing[2].

It seems he was right.

The party that got the most votes was the libertarian euro-skeptic Sjálfstæðisflokkurinn (The Independence Party) with 26.70% of the votes, translating into 19 seats in the Parliament. Placing second was liberal euro-skeptic Framsóknarflokkurinn (The Progressive Party) with 24.43% of the votes, also resulting 19 seats in the Parliament. Both of the first two parties went through an increase in votes with 3% and respectively 9.63% in comparison with the previous elections.

The 3rd and the 4th parties in the final table are the former parties that used to lead the country. The third party in the final table is Samfylkingin (The Social Democratic Alliance) with 12.85% of the votes (down almost 17% from the previous elections) and the fourth party is Vinstrihreyfingin – grænt framboð (The Left Green Movement) with only 10.87% (down almost 12% from the previous elections). There are also two new parties that have entered into the new Parliament and these are Björt Framtíð (The Bright Future Party – left leaning liberals) and Píratar (The Pirate Party of Iceland) which is basically a party based on the idea that the Internet should remain just like it is now[3][4].

What does this mean?

For starters, the presence of the Pirate Party in the Parliament will mean that the freedom of the online environment will have a defender in a country that just tried to pass regulations similar to those enforced in Iran and China.

Secondly, the spectacular debacle of the Left Green Movement, which is essentially the Feminist Party in Iceland, shows that the overwhelming majority of Icelanders may be veering away from their ideology.

There is no doubt that the debacle of the moderate leftists from the Social Democrats happened for many reasons, but feminism is likely one of them given that feminist ideology has dominated their rhetoric for at least the last 12 months.

This is the second time

In November 2011, the Spaniards cast away the party that gave power to the feminists in an unprecedented debacle for PSOE[5]. Now, at the end of April 2013, the Icelanders are casting away the party that gave power to the feminists and the government led by the lesbian feminist Jóhanna Sigurðardóttir.

This trend may continue to gain pace. You can track events to come using this list of feminist MEPs.

Michael Coren on Earl Silverman

VFM News and Commentary · 1 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Kudos to Michael Coren for doing this spot in such a sensitive and informed manner, but with all respect to Rick Goodwin, you are wrong. There is a men's movement. It is as real as men who are abused. All you have to do open your eyes and speak up about it. If you are as concerned as you appear to be, support us. Don't write us off.

We're the radicals now

Andy Thomas · 2 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I groan inwardly whenever somebody pushes a book at me, and insists: "You must read this!"

The thing is, after reading Steve Moxon's "The Woman Racket", I was smashed as a going human concern. It isn't healthy to keep focusing on "the problem" without sight of "the solution", and I now feel a little reluctant to expose myself to further crushing analysis of how bad "the problem" is.

With that in mind, I'd like to introduce a particular book, and urge you to read this! But trust me; this one speaks of the "the solution", rather than "the problem".

Rules for Radicals, by Saul D. Alinsky, was first published in 1972. Having been extensively used as activist handbook by various left-wing and environmental groups, the impact of this book has been far reaching, although many outside political and PR circles may not have heard of it. Unsurprisingly, perhaps, the sheer bloody effectiveness of Alinsky's counsel has made him an unpopular figure to those on the Right.

Alinsky began his professional life as an organiser for the Congress of Industrial Relations in the US. What he learned about union strategies in industrial disputes, he applied later in his work as a community organiser in the black ghettoes of Chicago and Oakland. Shortly before his death in 1972, he distilled his experiences and insights into a relatively short and accessible book. While not quite a step-by-step instruction manual, Rules for Radicals provides inspiration and, more usefully, strategy and tactics for anyone involved in direct, but non-violent, activism.

The opening page of the book begins…

> "What follows is for those who want to change the world from what it is to what they believe it should be."

Alinsky goes on to present a distinctly Marxist approach that is rooted in a world-view of perpetual conflict between the "Haves" and the "Have-Nots" of life. The book's overriding purpose is to empower the Have-Nots, and when I first read it, I was struck by its potential applicability to our own struggle. For example, when contemplating injustice and the often perplexing lack of male response to egregious attacks upon their identity and human worth, I am often reminded of some of Alinsky's observations, including these two:

> "…if people feel they don't have power to change a bad situation, then they do not think about it."

And:

> "Remember, too, that a powerless people will not be purposefully curious about life, and they then cease being alive."

For anyone who has attempted to communicate the male human rights issue to those who prefer to turn away, these sentiments must feel rather apt.

I grew up in a working town in the time of its transition from a centre of coal mining and manufacturing to one of unemployment and welfare dependency. My father was a union representative who stood in picket lines as they were charged by police (or as he claims, by soldiers in police uniforms without identity numbers). While my early memories of politics were coloured by TV news of "Militant", the extreme wing of the labour party in the 1980s, I sometimes wonder if I had been a young man in the early 20th century, would I have been an active member in the British Labour Movement back then? I also contemplate the parallel between that thought and the here and now of the early 21st century — a time in which I have somehow found myself to be a member of the Men's Human Rights Movement. It seems that I have always been a bit of a radical, and somewhat unfashionable.

This is the thing — the landscape in which we live out our lives has always been in flux. Our universe is one of perpetual change and conflict between opposing forces. Perhaps the single attribute that has made Marxism so enduring is that, by teaching its followers to view life through a prism of eternal conflict, it embraces change.

As described by Alinsky, the Haves of life fear change because they have nowhere to go but down. Whereas life's Have-Nots, with nowhere to go but up, have no such fear. If we see his words in the context of own movement as being a harbinger of change, I think he describes our experiences rather well:

> "Religious, economic, social, political, and legal tracts endlessly attack all revolutionary ideas and action for change as immoral, fallacious and against God, country, and mother. These literary sedations by the status quo include the threat that, since all such movements are unpatriotic, subversive, spawned in hell and reptilian in their creeping insidiousness, dire punishments will be meted out to their supporters. All great revolutions, including Christianity, the various reformations, democracy, capitalism, and socialism, have suffered these epithets in the times of their birth."

Today's feminist revolutionaries may think they are radical, but they are nothing of the sort — they are simply fashionable. They represent more of the same; it is we who represent meaningful change.

Because effective organisation of people is essential to bring about change, the key player in Rules for Radicals is what Alinsky refers to as "the organiser". An organiser is not so much a local leader, but more a creative thinker who's initial task is to "stir up dissatisfaction and discontent", and to "provide a channel into which the people can angrily pour their frustrations." The organiser's job description does not, in fact, appear to be a particularly appealing one, especially in the early days, as Alinsky explains:

> "In the early days the organizer moves out front in any situation of risk where the power of the establishment can get someone's job, call in an overdue payment, or any other form of retaliation, partly because these dangers would cause many local people to back off from conflict. Here the organizer serves as a protective shield: if anything goes wrong it is all his fault, he has the responsibility. If they are successful all credit goes to the local people."

And:

> "The job of the organizer is to maneuver and bait the establishment so that it will publicly attack him as a "dangerous enemy."

Nevertheless, reward comes if the organiser is successful…

> "The organizer's job is to begin to build confidence and hope in the idea of organization and thus in the people themselves: to win limited victories, each which will build confidence and the feeling that 'if we can do so much with what we have now just think what we will be able to do when we get big and strong.'"

However, I do wonder if Alinsky saw the construction of mass power organisations more of an end in its own right, rather than simply a means to advance a just cause. He, himself, says:

> "One of the great problems in the beginning of an organization is, often, that the people do not know what they want."

Thus, one of the key roles of the organiser is help the people to know what they want by identifying the "enemy" for them. Or, as he puts things:

> "Before men can act an issue must be polarized. Men will act only when they are convinced that their cause > is 100 per cent on the side of the angels and that the opposition are 100 per cent on the side of the devil."

Many of us in the Men's Human Rights Movement, myself included, have no previous background in activism, protest or social politics. Most of us have started out from nowhere and are here simply because we have woken up to the tide of injustice that threatens to engulf us. But what to do? How often have we seen wounded men on forums complain bitterly of injustice, as if simply talking about the problem is actually doing something about the problem? Nobody is going to read their comments, recognise their plight, and put things right for them.

Nobody is coming to save them.

Endless rhetorical debate about "the problem", without reference to "the solution", is nothing other than emotional masturbation. What I am suggesting to anyone who might consider themselves an activist is that a good place to go for inspiration would be Alinsky specifically because he counsels on how to be a "realistic radical", rather than a "rhetorical one".

I warn, however, that with Rules for Radicals there also comes a sickening awareness of how its tactics have been deployed against the men and boys from the 1960s onwards, and I found the sheer bloody cynicism of it all overwhelming. As I turned its pages, it dawned on me that the entire male gender had, in effect, been identified as "the enemy" in order to "polarize the issue" and, thus, create conflict were none existed previously.

You see, back in the 1960s, those subscribing to Marxist ideology had a problem — the lives of the working classes were being transformed by higher wages and property ownership, and the old Marxist model of an oppressed proletariat and a wealthy bourgeoisie was in danger of breaking down. A possible solution, at least to some women on the left, was to re-purpose Marxist theory in the context of a gender war rather than a conflict between social classes defined by property ownership. The players were thus changed, but game went on. In fact, patriarchy theory was never anything other than a pseudo-scientific construct manufactured by Kate Millet and her ilk to give a veneer of credibility to the idea that men and women were, and have always been, at war with each other.

In the hour when I first understood, the sense of betrayal was profound.

Nevertheless, it proves nothing if not how Marxist thinking embraces change. The irony now, of course, is that it is men and boys who are the Have-Nots of western society, both in terms of social empowerment and wealth ownership. However, I'm not so sure that I would go as far as to claim that all women represent the Haves. Instead, I would argue that feminism has not universally benefited women at all, especially when you start to consider the hidden implications for them (a modest home in the UK now requires two full-time incomes to pay the mortgage). However, there are a subset of women with disproportionate influence who have been feminism's prime benefactors — they are the feminist academics and public sector elite — the bourgeoisie of our age.

Times have changed since Alinsky's penned his influential work, and some of the more hands-on tactics he suggests may not be so appropriate today. For example, one particularly delightful tactic is, what he lovingly refers to as, a "shit-in" (as opposed to a "sit-in"). This is where a handful of protesters occupy all available toilet cubicles at crowded public event and absolutely refuse to come out. The resulting distress of the crowd is a great cause of mayhem, apparently.

The sky turns darker, however, when Alinksy tackles ethics and how "the end justifies the use of almost any means." On this issue, I can't help but wonder whether his use of the word "almost" was a conscious addition to keep his book on the right-side of the line that separates riot from direct action. I doubt he cared that much for the distinction himself and, because of this, I think that we in the Men's Human Rights Movement would do well to remember the following instead:

> "He who fights with monsters might take care lest he thereby become a monster." – Friedrich Nietzsche

I recommend Alinsky, not for ethical guidance, but for pragmatic inspiration. His book is, after all, mostly about communication, strategy and tactics. It's also a book about change — not only how to effect change, but how to live with and thrive in a climate of change. In the end, we must follow our own moral compass. It is our prerogative to take from Rules for Radicals what we find useful, and disregard what we find unacceptable.

Human society has rested on the back of male disposability ever since the time of *Lucy, and what we in the Men's Human Rights Movement represent is the beginning of the end of that and the start of a new era for our species. We are not just radical, we are in every sense the most radical thinking movement in the history of human society.

Notes. Summary of Alinsky's Tactics

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

- Power is not only what you have, but what the enemy thinks you have;
- Never go outside the expertise of your people;
- Whenever possible, go outside the expertise of the enemy;
- Make the enemy live up to its own book of rules;
- Ridicule is man's most potent weapon;
- A good tactic is one your people enjoy;
- A tactic that drags on too long becomes a drag;
- Keep the pressure on. Never let up;
- The threat is usually more terrifying than the thing itself;
- The major premise for tactics is the development of operations that will maintain a constant pressure upon the opposition;
- If you push a negative hard enough, it will push through and become a positive;
- The price of a successful attack is a constructive alternative;
- Pick the target, freeze it, personalize it, and polarize it.

The cunning evil of men

Alex Hunt · 2 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It seems there's a lot of surprise going about the internet-feminism community at the moment. Mostly surrounding everyone's favorite headliners for Men's Human Rights Activism: the Radfems, whose blatant, misandry-inspired transphobia seems to have come as a shock to the more delicate souls of the feminist movement, who appear to have been laboring under the delusion they were members of a human rights movement.

Oh, my sides.

Now, it has already been pointed out that, in fact, the Radfem behavior is the most eminently logical behavior seen of all feminists.

That, given the presumption that women are oppressed, and have always been oppressed, men are clearly an enemy. Men are incapable of empathy and therefore a present and maleficent danger to women everywhere. If we take this as a given: that the entirety of human history has been the systemic oppression of women, by men; as opposed to, say, a mixture of societal adaptations to environmental factors to maximize the survival quotient of the group, primarily through maximizing the survival of females, then Radfem behavior is still, and remains still, perfectly logical.

Man – the Enemy, has, throughout recorded history engineered a societal system specifically designed to oppress women. He has shown to be a cunning, incredibly powerful, brilliant enemy, willing to go to almost any lengths, including sacrificing his own kind to homelessness, suicide, war, starvation and exposure, icy water, inimical working conditions and almost infinite other permutations of hardship, sacrifice and death, just to oppress women, even if it should mean men (his own) should die protecting those they oppress. He has engineered a situation where, despite equal and indeed preferential treatment under law, and an electorate that is a 54% female, he maintains almost-hegemony over the economic and political spheres.

We, men, are malevolence of such force, cunning, and intellect as to insofar present no adequate pop-culture metaphors to liken us to.

Thus, it is hardly unreasonable of Radfems: when faced with an enemy of such resource, such cunning, such depth of strategy, such ruthlessness and general ability, as to defy any reasonable attempt at description, to presume that trans women are not, in fact, people afflicted with an unfortunate biological condition which causes female-type brain activity in an otherwise male body, but rather, infiltrators.

Remember: they face a foe who has been willing to kill billions of his own, who is still willing to kill, and to permit the deaths of, millions of men solely for the purpose of maintaining his oppressive hold over womankind. The loss of a few more to violence, suicide and general societal indifference will not bother him, so long as his Patriarchy stands. (The haunting similarities between the treatment of trans women, and men, in our culture, of course, will go unnoticed to the mainstream feminists.)

He will, likewise, be capable of fabricating whatever evidence is required as to provide an effective cover story for these 'infiltrators', just as he is capable of fabricating evidence debunking the gender wage gap, evaporating myths about rape and utterly shattering the oppressed/oppressor model of gender relations, despite the manifest truth of these things.

As it is not unreasonable, faced with the MechaSauron that is The Male, to presume infiltrators will be used, disguising themselves as women to ~~contaminate our precious bodily fluids~~ undermine and further the subjugation of womankind, it is also not unreasonable that some of the Beloved Oppressed will, faced with the monster that is Patriarchy, "bargain with the patriarchy" for their own preferential treatment, choosing a lifetime of comfortable servitude, as opposed to the hideous, wrenching challenges presented by slutwalking, shaming, reblogging on tumblr and the other hardships of a feminist lifestyle.

Indeed, some will even go so far as to disguise themselves as the oppressor, sacrificing their beloved womynhood (and thus all humanity) to become one with the hated oppressor. Of course, the notion that these individuals are simply afflicted with an awkward biological disposition to male-type brain activity while still possessing a phenotypical female body is merely another patriarchal cover story, concocted by the same evil that created Uruk-Hai paternity testing.

In fact, the acceptance of trans people (traitors and spies they are), by mainstream feminism, shows just how effective the infiltration has been in confusing the debate from the purity of “woman oppressed, man oppressor!”, to a muddied state of affairs where the patriarchal myth that, perhaps, traditionalism was eminently shitty from pretty much every end of the spectrum that wasn’t in charge (which oddly, tended to have a fairly even gender split); that women are just as responsible for shaping the society in which we live; that perhaps men have problems, and issues, and inequalities to face; that it is once again time for our social structure to adapt to our environment.

That men’s rights are human rights.

Restraining order terrorism: the circus continues

Michael Conzachi · 2 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The saga continues of the case of the People vs. Francis "Coyote" Shivers, on his recent conviction for violating a restraining order obtained or procured by his ex-wife, "NCIS" actress Pauley Perrette. Shivers was convicted of calling her his "false accuser" on Facebook, which the evidence clearly demonstrates she is, and for using his cell phone to record a confrontation with her boyfriend which the record also proves he did not provoke.

Some of the latest developments can be now put into the "circus" category, and some others can be described as fair and logical.

Mr. Shivers originally was scheduled to be sentenced on April 24 at the Airport Branch of the Los Angeles County Superior Court, in the courtroom of Judge Kathryn Solorzano. Sentencing has been rescheduled for May 31, so we will not know until that time what his punishment will be.

There may not even be a sentencing as Mr. Shiver's legal counsel, Anthony Brooklier, a temporary replacement for Shivers' attorney of record, announced his intention to petition for a retrial.

According to the court, the required paperwork has to be submitted by May 8. When that request will be addressed is anybody's guess, but requests for retrials are routine in L.A. County Courts. The reasons for the request for a retrial are not known, but I'm sure we will find out soon enough.

The most obvious possibility is of course that the prosecution of Shivers is just another typical false allegation scenario (which the record in this case bears out) that has resulted in the issuance of a bogus restraining order on behalf of an emotionally disturbed and vindictive plaintiff, in this case Pauley Perrette.

Perrette has been further facilitated by a legal system that rubber stamps restraining orders and a city attorney suffering from "Mike Nifong" syndrome. It has escalated into a legal apocalypse for Shivers by public servants who drool over the opportunity to rub elbows with "Hollywood A-Lister's" and the potential for six figure retirement jobs.

Pardon me for calling it like it is. If you don't believe or understand it, take a few moments and review recent Los Angeles history. Have I said anything that a bunch of people don't already know?

From our courtroom sources, it appears that Judge Solorzano exercised a level of fairness in the proceedings with no display of bias or favoritism towards one side or the other. That is of course a good thing as that is what a judge is supposed to do; to judge fairly and competently, relying on facts and evidence, not on conjecture, rumor, or speculation, and not for the opportunity to have a "Dancing Ito" moment.

The circus components came in the form of Ms. Perrette offering her victim impact statement, and the dozen or so of her entourage that included various attorneys, assistants, hangers-on, groupies, yes men, yes women; various Hollywood losers; essentially a combination of all of the above, all there to lend credence to Perrette's over the top dramatics. Really? Does anyone, with more than five grams of functioning brain matter think this is just a bit odd? What every day individual has the financial resources to employ an entourage of obsequious maladroits?

Perrette is permitted by law to make a victim impact statement, and she also has the right to free speech, just as anyone else does. What is peculiar here is that she offered this statement even though it had already been decided that Mr. Shivers sentencing had been continued to a later date. Apparently, this was facilitated by the prosecutor, Los Angeles Deputy City Attorney Elizabeth Gertz.

Since I am unaware of her reasons for doing this at the time, I won't speculate or guess as to her motives. I can only say that in my experience, statements from victims are usually done at the time of sentencing. Was this another in a long list of special considerations afforded to celebrity individuals in our criminal justice system? I won't offer an opinion; I will let the individual reader make up their own mind.

The more clownish part of the circus act came from the mouth of Perrette herself. From what witnesses have reported, Perrette went into a rambling and convoluted diatribe that continually deviated from the purpose describing victim impact to the court. Once the transcripts and her written statement entered in the record become available, it will be presented here at AVFM in its entirety.

Apparently there was some attempt by a member or members of her entourage, possibly a member of her legal team, to enter into the record the declarations of others, slamming Mr. Shivers. This was denied by Judge Solorzano as irrelevant. In this situation, Solorzano was not only correct but exercised some common sense; something that has been sorely missing in this circus to date.

I have seen these types of convoluted, confusing, even delusional victim impact statements before. It is perfectly legal though pretty embarrassing. I can just imagine the eyes rolling and cringing on the part of some in her personally employed cadre and the concern they must have shared as she turned her victim's impact statement into a scene from a B-movie.

I make a reference now to the recent bombing in Boston, though by no means does this compare to what those unfortunate victims, their families, and the heroic first responders and public safety personnel experienced.

Since that tragedy, however, there have been a host of experts offering their opinions on understanding the nature of that tragedy and the mentality of people that could do something so horrific. One of the opinions I heard offered, and I'm paraphrasing here, was this:

> "If you want to get into the mind of a terrorist, all you need to do is listen to his words."

That is assuming, of course, that the terrorist is male, which would be a bad assumption if you were talking about those that use restraining orders to terrorize.

This is how it works the criminal justice system. It can apply to defendants, victims, prosecutors, law enforcement, or even judges. The words of Pauley Perrette speak volumes as to what is going on inside that head.

AVFM Contributing writer, Clinical Psychologist, Dr. Tara Palmatier, in her article on this case (an assessment of the psychological profile of false accusers), and the information in her article and her professional opinion have come full circle. We have all seen this many times before. This is not our first rodeo.

The point here that is the bigger issue is not to focus on Pauley Perrette. I think she has already confirmed by her own behavior and words that something is not quite right upstairs. Who knows, maybe the target of her next restraining order will be the aliens who crash-landed at Roswell.

Or Elvis.

The bigger and more important issue is the law enforcement, prosecutorial, and judicial officials who bought into this nonsense, and then who took it upon themselves to skew and spin the information and facts to accommodate the wishes and desires of a clearly disingenuous individual, because of her celebrity status coupled with the mindset to discriminate based on sex.

We can, and must, deal with the facts and evidence in this case, and rely on professional experience to form a logical, and common sense assessment of what has actually occurred.

Unfortunately, the fact is that this case reflects the severe misuse, abuse, and manipulation of the restraining order system in this country. It happens in every city, county and state. It is also a fact that there are virtually no sanctions against false accusers, no contempt or perjury sanctions, or any other criminal penalties when lies have been discovered. From a practical and tactical perspective, there is simply no downside to lying to a judge to get and use a restraining order as a weapon, something Pauley Perrette is documented to be quite knowledgeable about.

What is fact is the inherent and foundational mindset that is pervasive in these types of scenarios, of man-bad / woman-victim. This predisposed mindset is rampant in the very institutions where it should be strictly verboten; our criminal justice system.

I take a very realistic view of the various components of the criminal justice system, and provide those components with a benefit of a doubt, taking into consideration the stresses that are involved, the tragedy that is encountered, and the realization that sometimes professionals working within the system sometimes do make mistakes.

On the flip side of the coin, I will be first to speak out when a component of this system conducts themselves with self-serving interests, biases, prejudices, poor judgment, or outright corruption; when the public trust has been violated.

The professionals of the criminal justice system are servants of the public, all of the public, not just those of a certain social or economic status. Public servants are beholden to the public trust and are duty bound by oath to protect Constitutional rights and due process. When those clear and district lines become blurred, the public is placed at risk, and thus entitled to an explanation. Those who violate that oath must be removed from those positions of authority and decision making.

In this case, it has been discovered and is explicitly clear and can be proven that at least one member of the state bar who is part of this case has not acted in accordance with the California State Bar and American Bar Association, Rules of Professional Conduct.

The information as it currently exists supports the filing of a complaint and the sustaining of the imposition of sanctions with the appropriate oversight body.

What is required here is the system correcting and policing itself. The American Bar Association Rules of Professional Conduct; Rule 8.3 (a) states:

> "A lawyer who knows that another lawyer has committed a violation of the Rules of Professional Conduct that raises a substantial question as to that lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects, shall inform the appropriate professional authority."

So the question of the day is who will step up to the plate?

Let's take a look at a couple of examples of the lunacy of the current restraining order system in this country. One is funny and the other will make you mad.

In 2005, New Mexico Judge Daniel Sanchez signed a request for a temporary restraining order written by Colleen Nestler. In her handwritten petition, Nestler asked for a restraining order against TV Talk Show Host David Letterman, claiming that Mr. Letterman was transmitting secret coded words to her indicating his desire to marry her among other bizarre claims. Judge Sanchez signed the order and defended his actions stating that Nestler had filled out the form correctly. When asked later if he had done anything wrong, Sanchez claimed that he did not.

Really?

In April of 2012, Foxborough Massachusetts volunteer Firefighter Dan Iagatta passed away as a result of serious injuries sustained while training for a triathlon, after being struck by a motorist. Dan, a loving father of two, a businessman, and active and popular member of his community had a restraining order served on him that was signed by Judge Beverly Boorstein. This occurred a couple of months after his accident which had left him in a wheelchair and a quadriplegic with just enough movement in one arm to operate a motorized wheelchair. The restraining order petition by his wife, after she filed for divorce, claimed that she was, "afraid."

Exactly what Mrs. Iagatta was afraid of, I don't know, but it was argued and ignored that Dan Iagatta could not move without help and had to make costly modifications to his childhood home to accommodate his complete disability status. What was Dan going to do, chase his wife at 1 MPH and terrorize her in his motorized wheel chair?

It gets worse; this wonderful compassionate; Judge Boorstein then later ordered the sale of Dan's childhood home, with all of modifications to accommodate his disability supplied by friends and family, to pay off his wife's lawyers. Dan was evicted and literally wheeled out to the curb like trash. The wonderful compassionate Judge Boorstein retired shortly thereafter when private investigators had her on videotape doing personal errands and shopping at malls during work hours. She now operates some type of consulting business while receiving a lucrative public employee retirement. Why this woman is not turning big rocks into little rocks in some god awful rat infested federal penitentiary someplace is beyond me.

This is how bad this restraining order system has become. It makes Pauley Perrette look like a minor issue. Well, unless you are Francis Shivers, facing time in jail.

The sad and tragic thing is that these are really not unusual examples. They are the rule rather than the exception. Not everybody has the financial resources of David Letterman to make these things go away, nor do these cases, with the exception of a handful, make any kind of news.

We are posed with several opportunities here. The first is that this case should be a wake-up call to those in positions of authority and decision making. After years and years of hearing the same thing, they need to take the responsibility upon themselves to institute changes.

Why is it always left to the advocacy groups, the victims groups, the Constitutional rights groups, the due process groups to do the research, to produce the facts, to suggest legislative changes, to correct a process which contains the most egregious violations of civil, Constitutional, and due process rights in this country's history since Jim Crow? Why do our public servants have to be embarrassed and humiliated into doing the right thing before they act? Why do people have to file all kinds of complaints and lawsuits to get officials to admit their mistakes, and to get the oversight bodies to do their jobs? Let's get real folks; does it take a rock to fall on someone's head?

This case presents a host of opportunities. This example is so blatant, so obvious, and so egregious that the blame of this must fall upon the shoulders of those in positions of authority and decision making. In the case of those who are in the service of the public, we need to remove those individuals from those positions and to impose strict and severe sanctions as required to send a message that this type of buffoonery and corruption is not acceptable.

An opportunity exists to undo a wrong to a man whose only crime appears to be his big mouth and poor taste in women; and to give a sense of blind justice to the tens of thousands of others similarly affected.

The issue in this case is not Pauley Perrette and her telepathic communications with space aliens; the issue is the persons and institutions that allow for, encourage, and facilitate these kinds of injustices in the first place. They should and do know better, and if they don't, then they can go flip burgers.

Everyone who has done work on this case from A Voice for Men and the other groups are watching this case. A host of folks are using their knowledge and expertise to dissect every dotted I and every crossed T, are on the job. And wouldn't you know, lots of really bad mistakes have been revealed.

Hubris happens, especially when no one looks over your shoulder and checks your work, and no one calls you on the carpet for your misdeeds. That sort of neglect is like laying a magnet beside your ethical compass. You get sloppy, just like plumbers, or building contractors, auto mechanics, and even judges. Boorstein, who I am sure never imagined that she would be videotaped on a work day shopping spree at Saks, is living proof.

So let's see what will happen here. I have already pointed out the responsibility of those members of the state bar to report misconduct among their ranks. I guess if they don't they will be in the same position as at least one, and possibly more, who are already in violation.

For Mr. Shiver's, let's hope that he will be granted a retrial, and that the criminal justice system will work as it is supposed to.

For Ms. Perrette who is nothing more than a prop in this circus; well, I guess the only logical thing that can be said is that all of that money she spent on lawyers, flunkies, losers, and groupies would have been better spent on psychiatrists, psychologists, neurologists, brain scans, and maybe a voodoo priest thrown in for good measure. (I wonder if that toy doll and pin thing actually works?)

For those dedicated professionals investigating and reporting on this circus as well as those commenting; thanks are given for the right to free speech.

I am proud and honored to be in the association and company of all of these honorable and dedicated folks who are trying to make a difference in a system that is completely broken and needs to be fixed.

I am going to throw in a Hollywood reference of my own that symbolizes the determination and dedication of those fighting the good fight. I'll use a line from the movie Tombstone, when Kurt Russell as Wyatt Earp tells Ike Clanton at the train station right after he smokes his pal,

"You tell 'em I'm coming, and Hell's coming with me. You hear?! Hell's coming with me!"

Stay tuned, we're just getting warmed up.

Equality cupcakes

Greg Canning · 2 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Although I probably should know better I cannot help being dumbfounded by the ongoing hypocritical and childish antics of gender feminist students in our universities, most notably the motley crew down at the Monash Student Association, Women's Department.

While they have a ways to go to match their contemporaries at the University of Toronto, their largely unchallenged bigotry no doubt slowly infuses into the higher education culture of increasing female privilege.

This week they are celebrating "Blue Stockings Week" which is described as a celebration of "the achievements of women past and present, as well as encouraging future (female) academics and scholars!"

In one of the most extreme examples of cognitive dissonance and hypocrisy I have seen these student ideologues have hosted an "Equality Cupcake" event. It appears however that not all cupcakes are created equal.

From the Blue Stockings Facebook page :

"TUESDAY
Equality Cupcakes!
The MSA will be selling equality cupcakes to raise awareness of the gender pay gap that exists in society. Cupcakes will be 70c for trans* and sex & gender diverse folk, 80c for women and $1 for men! Campus centre/ menzies (sic)[1] lawn (depending on weather) from 10-12."

The decision to highlight wage discrimination by price discrimination is akin to being violent to protest against violence, or raping to protest against rape. But why stop at gender as the only factor in statistical pay gaps? Why not add age, ability, race, religion, sexual orientation etc. into the mix? What should an elderly, disabled, Muslim, female to male transgender, homosexual, non English speaking, Afghan refugee, first year Arts student pay for a cupcake; 10 cents, 20 perhaps?

What you can be sure of in Australia, is that all work covered by Fair Work Australia award conditions is gender neutral. The same position, in the same industry at the same level is paid at the same rate. Most students do it tough, often haveing to work to support their studies and will almost certainly work under such award conditions. Is there a gender pay gap for university students? I don't know but if there is it is NOT because they are not being paid equally for equal work, so to discriminate against your fellow students is in my view simply abhorrent.

Surprisingly some Monash students both male and female rather then ignoring this over sexism got onto a private Monash Students Blog with some 19,000 members and started complaining about the sexism. The Facebook post according to Herald Sun Community Leader News Paper attracted nearly 1,500 likes and more than 900 comments.

One of the MSA women's department feminists felt the way to respond to this criticism, which she referred to as "trolling" was as follows:

"- Send an email out to as many lecturers as you can. Target lecturers who you know teach the students who have been the most vocal on the stalkerspace discussion.

– Explain the situation to them.

– Explain the wage gap to them.

– Explain to them that it is their duty as tertiary educators to discuss the wage gap with their students.

– Explain that given that this is happening, they have an obligation as professionals who are preparing students to work in their chosen fields to spend the first five minutes of their next lecture explaining what the wage gap is in their field and why it is important that we are all aware of it."

So there you have it, lecturers should take up time scheduled to teach their subjects to spread feminist propaganda to non-conformist students!

But even getting local mainstream media coverage for their “awareness” campaign, they are not happy. The women’s department Facebook page contains an unhappy discussion that one of them (law student Louisa Ashton) was mentioned by name in the Community Leader article, and whilst she “stands by her comments”, apparently not so much as to have them reported publicly. Indeed the group is considering writing to the paper requesting to have the article removed. How’s that for standing by your convictions!

The reason for the average statistical gender pay gap has been comprehensively explained time and time again. Still when the meme of a “gender pay gap” is repeatedly conflated and blamed on sex discrimination by the current Australian Prime Minister and President of the United States of America, it’s not surprising that sheepish students take this at face value, rather then “unpacking or drilling down” into the statistic to try and understand why it exists. No, that would entail critical thinking and students are doing much less of that these days.

Universities instead, are sticking to their core business of manufacturing politically correct thinking indoctrinated drones for employment in the ever-growing business of big government. Its simpler and less complicated to just toe the feminist ideological line that the pay gap is all due to male privilege promoted by the mythical patriarchy.

But wait there is more; Equality Cupcakes come with the added bonus of raising funds and getting comments to support a submission for “affirmative action policy for course readers.” This means the MSA Women’s Department will petition the Arts Faculty Board, to mandate that 40% of all journal articles used in teaching must be written by women. Not that the journal articles be of high quality and relevant to the course work, just that women write them. Hopefully the Art’s Faculty Board will have more common sense then such students.

Indeed the Faculty Board would be well aware of the university policies that already offer affirmative action for women staff. Further they would be aware of the gender gaps that exist and has existed for years in the student population and the future effect this will have of staffing at universities.

For example they would be cognizant with the trend in sex ratio for enrolled students at Monash University.

[image]

And the disparities at Monash University in student enrollments across faculties for 2013.

[image]

They would also be aware of the sex ratio treads across Monash University staff.

[image]

But where is the MSA Women’s Department cry of discrimination when it comes to addressing the gender gap in education? They firmly focused only on the areas in which women are still below parity, despite the obvious reasons which are proven by research to not be about discrimination. But they remain eerily silent on area’s where women lurch well ahead of parity. Monash provides more proof that modern feminism is not interested in gender equality, but only in advancing women’s interests and power.

That is not a cupcake I can swallow.

Sir Robert Menzies after whom the “menzies lawn” (sic) is named was a longstanding conservative Australian Prime Minister. I am sure the failure to capitalize his surname was just a typographical error on the part of the MSA Women’s Department. This focal point at Monash University (Named after Sir John Monash Australia’s Military Commander in WWI) is a frequent venue for activities and no other promotion ever has made the same error.

Our girl is red hot! Your girl ain't doodeley-squat!

Drew Vox · 3 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the spring of 2002 my life changed drastically. My mother had been fighting cancer for almost a year and in May of 2002, she lost her battle. While my father was not completely absent I would say that my mother was mostly responsible for raising my brother and me. She was the "cool mom" on the block and she was one of my best friends. My friends would come over to hang out with me and often they would end up in the living room or the kitchen striking up a conversation with my mother. At the time, I thought losing my mother when I was only 22 years old was the worst kind of pain I could experience.

I was wrong.

By the time my mother was diagnosed I'd been dating a girl (we'll call her Liz) for a couple of years. Liz was everything you could want in a woman. She had a great sense of humor. She was intelligent, charming, and generous. She was also very beautiful, and seemed honest. We grew up in the same area and of course we were familiar with each other's family. There was no doubt in my mind that she was everything I wanted in a partner. Looking back, I suspect I was also looking for stability in my life given everything I had gone through.

Shortly after my mother's passing I was offered a position in the IT department of a distribution center located in Southern Florida. It offered the opportunity to advance my career as well as the opportunity to (attempt) to run from the pain. I discussed the prospect of moving with Liz and we decided we'd try to make the relationship work in spite of the distance. I decided I'd propose to her upon her first visit and ask her to move to Florida to be with me. I did, she accepted, and two weeks later she was in Florida with me permanently.

Everything was going great for about two months, at which point we received the life-changing news that she was pregnant. After much deliberation we agreed that it would be in our best interests (and the unborn child's) to move back to our home state to live near our families. We were about to be young parents, after all, and we wanted a support system. We also decided that we wanted to wait until after the child was born to get married. We moved back to our home state in late 2002 and in April 2003 our son was born. My family was ecstatic over their first grandchild, and like most families, made the little boy the center of their universe. Liz and I rarely argued and were extremely happy with our little family.

That all changed the day she told me she didn't love me anymore. It caught me completely by surprise and as hard as I tried to get her to reconsider, she refused. I continued to pay for our apartment so that she and my son had a place to live, and took residence on a friend's couch. Over the next few weeks I was able to get an apartment of my own and I continued to pick our son up on weekends. Just as I was adjusting to my new life, the next (and almost fatal) blow was about to be delivered. Liz called one evening and said it was very important that we talk. I made plans to stop by the following day so we could discuss it. At this point I was still blinded by love and had no idea what I was getting into.

The next day as I was driving to Liz's house, my mobile phone rang. It was my Aunt Debbie who had taken over the role of motherly protector after my mom's passing.

"Drew, are you on your way to talk to Liz?" she asked.

"I am….why?" I replied.

"You tell Liz that I spoke to her mother, and I know the truth…and she had BETTER tell you the truth."

At this point in the story I know I sound completely oblivious, but I still honestly had no idea what was going on. I sat down to speak with Liz and she proceeded to tell me that she had cheated on me before moving to Florida and there was a chance our son was not mine. While I had reason to be concerned, I wasn't. After all, our son looked just like me and he was already calling me "dada". There was no way in the world he wasn't mine. As I sat there playing with our little boy, Liz's phone rang. As she got up to answer the phone my phone began ringing too. I answered, and it was my Aunt Debbie.

“Drew, did you talk to Liz?” she inquired.

“I did. She told me that she cheated on me before moving to Florida and there’s a chance our son is not mine.”

There was silence on the other end. Too much silence, in fact. Looking back, I think I knew what was coming.

“Drew…” she replied. “Liz is lying. She’s had the paternity test results for more than 8 weeks and you are not the father.”

It’s hard to imagine two little sentences could bring your entire world crashing down, but they did just that. My jaw dropped open and I dropped my phone as our son was climbing up my leg that very moment asking “dada” to pick him up. I picked him up and held him as closely as I could, and I cried.

The next three months were the worst of my life. Up until that point I wasn’t sure I believed depression was a real thing. As I learned, it is indeed very real. I’m going to step away from my story for a second to tell anyone facing depression to please get help as soon as possible. It is real and it can be very dangerous. I felt abandoned, deceived, and utterly destroyed. Everywhere I went this little black cloud of despair followed me. I cried and sobbed all hours of the day. I even had a recurring nightmare where I was driving with my son in the car and I’d crash into a tree. I was ejected from the vehicle and it became engulfed in flames. No matter what I tried I couldn’t get him out of the vehicle. I had to stand there and watch him burn to death.

I contemplated suicide on multiple occasions going as far as to strap a noose around my neck while standing on a chair. I’m not sure why I didn’t but I can tell you I was very close to not being here today to tell my story. My parents and family were also distraught and of course had to remove photos from the walls and basically erase a beautiful little person from their lives. For all intents and purposes, my son died. I lost him. My parents lost a grandchild. After 3 months of severe depression, my sadness turned to anger. It was all her fault. That bitch!

And so began my search for an attorney. I wasn’t sure how to go about it since I wasn’t even sure what to call it. But surely what she did had to be illegal on some level, right? Naturally there were no resources available for a man in my position so I began randomly calling attorneys and explaining my story. My elaboration over the potential to receive justice soon turned once again to despair as one attorney after another told me they weren’t interested in my case. It’s not illegal, they told me. There’s no case law established for this kind of thing in our state, they told me. After calling every attorney in the yellow pages I threw in the towel and attempted to move on with my life.

Three months later a number I didn’t recognize popped up on my phone. I answered it and man on the other end introduced himself and told me he had heard about my case from one of his colleagues. While he had never handled a case like mine in my state, he had handled similar cases in a neighboring state and he was licensed to practice in my state as well. He sympathized with my situation and offered to take the case on a contingency basis. I hired him on the spot and he explained to me that what she did was, in fact, fraud. There are apparently two types of fraud:

1) Making a statement as though it is true when you know the statement is false. (Example: Selling someone a car after telling them you put a new engine in it, and it turns out the engine had 150,000 miles on it.

2) Making a statement as though it is true when you don’t know whether the statement is true or false. (Example: Telling a man he is the father of your child when, in fact, you don’t know who the father is.)

During the depositions her defense was basically that she got drunk at her going away party and had sex with someone, but didn’t remember it. (Even though all of her friends knew she did, but of course it never occurred to any of them to let me know that my son might not be mine.) What made this argument particularly interesting was that she, by that time, was married to the guy she cheated on me with and they had another child on the way. So in effect, she was saying “I was drunk and never gave consent nor did I remember the sex” and yet she was married to the man who, according to her own statement, raped her.

Over the next two years her attorney dragged the case out using various legal tactics. By that time I had remarried and it was beginning to put a strain on my new marriage. While my now ex-wife supported what I was doing, she felt it was time to cut my losses and move on. My case ended up in mediation and my attorney urged me to take a settlement, and so I did.

My experience was horrific and no man should ever have to go through what I went through. While it was nice to be able to go after her for what she did on a civil basis, let me make this clear: Paternity fraud should be a criminal offense, and a felony offense at that. I decided to share my story in the hopes that it might help someone else in my position. Perhaps it will give them the courage to fight back, or perhaps it will give them the strength to carry on.

John Hembling (JtO) · 4 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some people within the community of the men's human rights movement have referred to the late Earl Silverman as a hero. I regret that their description is accurate, even as those using the term may not understand it from the same perspective. A hero, understood from a men's human rights point of view, is a willing self-sacrifice: a disposable human, buoyed to his own destruction by commitment to a society which disregards his humanity, but which praises his willing participation in his own death.

I don't think Earl was a hero, he was something else; something bigger. But as the news of his suicide has reached the mainstream, commentary from publications like Huffpo and The Atlantic Wire have another flavor entirely. They are gloating over his death.

Alexander Abad-Santos of The Atlantic Wire produced as smug and satisfied a piece of yellow pixels as any journalistic smog I've ever seen.

According to Abad-Santos's headline, (likely written by his editor) Mr Silverman's legacy is one of feminism bashing. Those who insist on calling attention to the ideology informing hard opposition to recognition of men as human beings with rights should expect to continue being called out on their ideology's foundation of hatred and violence, but that wasn't Earl Silverman's work. That's our work, but let's not digress.

Silverman's legacy was one of providing shelter and help to human beings that the rest of out society is content to see abused, homeless, and disregarded to their deaths. The approximately half of the victims of domestic violence who happen to be male. The ones Abad-Santos calls a myth.

The Atlantic Wire contributor takes a stab at defining the Men's Human Rights Moment, scratching the surface with mention of family law, military service, and domestic violence, but then falls on his face, citing attempts by the SPLC to fund-raise in 2011 by pretending the MHRM is a modern equivalent to the racial supremacist organizations Morris Dees made his name opposing in the 1970s.

Contrasting such foolish fear mongering, a small detour into ideological attack on the MRHM, is worth revisiting.

> "It should be mentioned that the SPLC did not label MRAs as members of a hate movement; nor did our article claim that the grievances they air on their websites – false rape accusations, ruinous divorce settlements and the like – are all without merit." [1]

Arthur Goldwag of the SPLC managed to drop this admission in his backpedaling after being pasted by Reason Magazine, Business Insider and the American Spectator for the SPLC's irresponsible fear-mongering about the MRM in late 2011. Isn't it peculiar how "professional journalists" keep referring to the SPLC's incompetent attempts to paint the Men's Human Rights Movement as a malevolent force, while consistently omitting mention of the public spanking that pack of well heeled lawyers took, and Art Goldwag's subsequent admission of the reality of the issues addressed by the MHRM?

Santos next attempts to re-establish the myth of domestic violence as a sexually one-sided issue. He cites a 2010 study by the CDC, in which lifetime victimization rates are compared between men and women. According to the CDC's 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey, 1 in 5 women versus 1 in 71 men are victims of rape in their lifetime. So where's the problem in the CDC's report?

By focusing on lifetime victimization, the CDC report[2] taps into our culture's narrative of victimization. Women's victimization is re-enforced by the prevalent cultural narrative, thus women remember their victimization, and even may escalate the severity of any incident of victimization. Men, by contrast live in a narrative in which they are perpetrators, and never recipients of violence or abuse. Because of this, and the fact that people conform their memory to the cultural narrative they inhabit – it is no surprise at all that a lifetime rate of victimization shows overwhelmingly female weighted incidence. In fact, the choice to describe a lifetime rate, rather than a single year, or a lesser period demonstrates purpose in the CDC report. Even the Stats-Canada report selects a 5 year baseline, rather than a shorter period, and increasing the smog of cultural memory. In spite of this, the report still indicates sexual parity in victimization.

However, the CDC's report does also include single year comparison of male versus female incidence of sexual victimization. For women's victimization in a 12 month reporting period, 1.1% of women reported being raped. By contrast, 1.1% of men reported being "made to penetrate" through violence, or coercion.

But even the male to female parity is hidden in the CDC's report, as table 2.1 on page 18 of the CDC's 2010 survey mentions "made to penetrate" but leaves the number out of the table. To hide this number, coerced and forced sexual encounters involving male victims are broken into smaller categories and samples, making them ignorable. This is purposeful in the report, hiding and erasing male-victimizing rape.

Meanwhile, credible research on domestic and sexual violence continues to show reciprocity[3].

This isn't even the worst fallacy in this whole, sick narrative. What if only 1 in 71 men were victims of sexual violence, while a comparatively huge 1 in 5 women are victimized? Putting these together , and assuming truth in the false claims of gender ideologues, then 7% of sexual violence and rape impacts men. This is a grossly and deliberately low estimate, but even if it's true – why isn't 7% of our culture's effort and resource being directed to that 7% of male victims?

It is because men are not human, and don't matter. The purposeful burying of male impacting sexual or other violence is utterly craven. For those of you male readers subject to past or ongoing domestic violence, take it quietly, because you don't exist. Also, female readers with a male colleague, friend or family member subject to past or ongoing abuse, your male family members don't exist either.

Alexander Abad Santos asks in his Atlantic Wire article "[Earl Silverman] killed himself because a men's abuse shelter shut down?"

And now, as to a slow-witted toddler, this inane question will be answered. No, he killed himself because after 20 years of seeking any public help addressing the real problem of male-impacting domestic violence in the form of shelter or other services, he met almost nothing except obstruction, denial and a callous indifference from an industry with the public slogan "don't ignore it".

The domestic violence shelter industry takes great pains to ignore roughly half the problem, because the female victim/male perpetrator narrative is the one which makes money. In fact, the current model of male-only abusers and female-only victims is so deeply false that continued fidelity to it is guaranteed to keep domestic violence happening, supplying an ongoing stream of damaged bodies and minds.

It keeps the money flowing too, doesn't it Alexander?

Fighting domestic violence by pretending it is sexually one sided is about as useful as fighting a structure fire by spraying water on only the north and east facing walls, and letting the south and west walls burn freely.

What of the grief and exhaustion of a man who tried for two decades to get the funding for one single men's shelter in a nation with hundreds of publicly funded women's shelters? What about his suicide death?

"Well, isn't that a shame?" is the gloating commentary from Abad-Santos and the Atlantic Wire. This recalls the spontaneous and sarcastic recital of "Cry me a river" by the Toronto feminist protester "Big Red" on mention that men commit suicide at a rate four times higher than women in Canada.

Of course, Abad Santos cultivates his own plausible deniability with the benevolent granting that oh! Some men really are abused, and somebody really should do something to raise awareness. But not too much awareness, because as we all know, compared to women, the menz problem is a teeny tiny one.

Citing Salon's Mary Elizabeth Williams he adds: "Yet where Silverman came up short was in perpetuating the Men's Rights movement's fiction that there's any gender equity as far as violence and victims."

So it's right back to not existing for the male half of the victims of domestic violence. Suck it up guys, and if you're going to kill yourselves, don't leave your corpse somewhere inconvenient. If you're male, you're disposable, and nobody gives a rat-fuck. Citing Abad-Santos again:

"Is there still a backlash? Well, MRM advocates and activists are upset with the news."

Well, nobody gives a rat-fuck about a Earl's grief, exhaustion and suicide except Men's Human Rights Activists.

Well, sure, men are subject to DV, but its a lesser problem, despite the research showing reciprocity of abuse.

Well, as long as nobody important is ever allowed to feel a twinge of conscience, 80% male suicide is no big deal.

Well, as long as the money keeps flowing, using a fraudulent model to pretend to combat domestic violence is just fine. Right?

Well, as long as nobody NOTICES that the DV industry preserves the status quo for the money.

And Abad Santos finally points to AVfM which, he claims

"sort of turns on feminism, and turned gender equality into a perpetrator."

No, we don't "sort of" turn on feminism. We identify it clearly as the prevailing ideology of gender in western culture, and further note its core foundations of violence and hatred. Concerning "…turned gender equality into a perpetrator," gender equality is nowhere to be found, except in the equal rates of domestic violence known to everybody from Erin Pizzey, the founder of the first women's shelter – and, all the way to Mary Koss, whose fraud informed the CDC's number-cooking 2010 report.

Abad Santos closes with "Surely, this was a man going through financial hardship, who struggled to keep his passion project afloat, who took his own life. But nobody has to believe that feminism can kill, or facts that aren't true."

"passion project"

Earl took his hobby too seriously. Maybe he should have built model railroads instead, or bonsai. Maybe stamp collecting.

Despite all the lying, denial and obfuscation, what neither Abad Santos not any other gender ideologue can conceal is the panic to prop up a false narrative which doesn't just produce male and female carnage, it makes its proponents money. The innocent-decorative-female victim, and the big-bad-violent-male-aggressor is the public message which grips emotions and opens wallets. That narrative must be preserved, no matter how much human carnage of male and female victims it produces.

The panic among its proponents is that this old, false narrative is increasingly recognized as a fraud, perpetuating human harm for the cash it generates. The domestic violence grievance industry is ever more obvious as an industry of human damage for money. Silverman's corpse was just small change.

But Abad-Santos was at least partly correct. "nobody has to believe that feminism can kill".

Indeed, nobody has to believe it, even while our male friends, our sons, our brothers, and male colleagues die. We can still deny, and all it will cost is a few dead friends and relatives.

For those who, unlike the gender ideologues in the DV industry, somehow manage to give a rat-fuck about the invisible half of the victims, or about addressing the current broken, ineffective, and one-sided non-solution of pretending only half the problem exists: you can help to fund the re-establishment of Earl's shelter as the Earl Silverman Center.

But if that seems like too much effort, you can just gloat over the damaged and the dead, like Alexander Abad-Santos. See if somebody will pay you for it.

Symantec, O2 still censoring/defaming MHRA sites

John Kimble · 5 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In case you weren't aware, Symantec and UK telecoms company O2 are currently still blocking men's human rights sites and labelling them as "hate sites". Previous reports of the cessation of such disgraceful behaviour were based on an erroneous article at The Register and the truth of the matter is that at no time were any of the sites in question unblocked.

It's not just A Voice for Men that is smeared in this way by these companies, even completely uncontroversial resources have been defamed too. Symantec believes that the equal Justice Foundation's dvmen.org site to be hateful, yet all they do is help male victims of domestic abuse. Sites wanting separated dads to have a relationship with their kids are also classed in this ridiculous way, and if you're dedicated to nothing more than drawing attention to the plight of male victims of rape and sexual abuse then even that's "hate" too.

Longevity is no barrier to Symantec denying your site traffic, with The National Coalition for Men subject to the hate smear. Nationality nor language offer much protection either, with UK, Canadian, Irish, Swiss, Portuguese, German sites suffering this most terrible mis-categorisation. In total I've discovered over 80 men's human rights sites which are being defamed and censored, this constitutes a substantial portion of our movement.

These types of technologies can all suffer from the problem of "over blocking" to some extent, indeed media reports show previous cases whereby Symantec wrongly categorised sites and rectified the problem soon thereafter. Our case is completely different, my research and my subsequent complaints resulted in just two sites being taken off the "hate list". Subsequent complaints from actual site owners have completely fallen on deaf ears too, but we aren't simply being ignored, it's much worse than that. In response to my complaint, I was informed by O2's head of complaints that the reason for the "hate site" categorisation was due to sites containing "aggression" and using terms such as "anti-feminist".

The O2 representative informed me that they and Symantec had reviewed the list of sites and they regarded them as being at the "low end of the spectrum" with regards to hate. It is therefore now established as indisputable fact that Symantec and O2 operate their businesses from an openly misandrist and authoritarian political position, whereby any criticism of even the most vile and extreme feminist ideology is not just banned, but also deemed to be "hateful".

You may wonder why all this matters so much, after all it's only the occasional noodle bar using the filter isn't it? Actually no, the system behind this is the most widely used internet filter in the world with 250 million users. The technology in question is called "Rule Space", a company bought out by Symantec in 2010. Major UK mobile telecoms provider O2 has the Rule Space filter enabled by default for its 16 million users, and the noodle bar in question is just one of 15,000 restaurants using the filter in the US alone, so the impact on traffic is likely to be significant.

I can also now for the first time expose a number of further companies who's customers may be subject to blocking and defamation of men's human rights sites, either by default or, in some instances, as an optional "service" These include: Bell Canada, Beeline broadband, AOL, Yahoo and even Intel. Worst of all, a company appropriately named "Censornet" uses the same url filter. They sell systems to hundreds of our schools, hospitals and public libraries, meaning taxpayers are funding systems which take the ridiculous position of human rights for half the population of the planet being "hate". Therefore, students and patrons at the affected institutions are only able to access one side of the story when researching gender issues and are, in effect, now subject to state sponsored propaganda and we have yet another case of feminist brainwashing our children by censoring the truth.

It's hard to be sure of the exact scale of the problem or which institutions are using this disgusting software, perhaps readers can help me out by attempting to access AVFM and other sites on the block list at their local library or school? A few already known examples of Censornet customers include the following:

- Belvedere College
- George Green's School
- Hartford High School
- Launceston College
- Lincoln Castle Academy
- Mowden Hall School
- Northcliffe High School
- Nowra Christian School
- Rock Ferry High School
- Senath Hornersville School
- Swindon Youth First Centre for Health
- West Derby School
- Woodcote High School
- Wyong Christian Community School

[/unordered_list]

In future, things are likely to get worse still, just last week David Cameron promised public wi-fi in the UK would be censored and politicians in Australia have previously sought mandatory internet filtering. Were these proposals to go ahead you can be sure that the Gillards and Harmans of this world will be pushing for a Symantec's misandrist offering to be used. In fact Censornet even tweeted last week, offering their services in response to the announcement.

It's quite clear that Symantec's Rulespace filters are fundamentally broken when it comes to classifying gender equality themed websites, they're not just endorsing feminism, but actually siding with the extremists seen at the University of Toronto "protests" by silencing anyone who tries to speak out. I'm certainly not going to stand for this and have contacted as many owners of the affected sites as possible.

You can help by boycotting the above companies, particularly Symantec, and uninstalling any of their software on your computers (it's not particularly good anyway and there are plenty of free alternatives). O2 is part of the larger Telefonica group so if you're not in the UK you can still boycott them.

It would also nice too see this censorship backfire and for sites to receive more traffic as a result rather than less. If you own a men's rights site why not through the list of banned sites, choose you favourites, and then link to them? Alternatively, you could find a nice article on the sites in question and post it to Reddit, Facebook or your favourite forum.

I'm still investigating the Rulespace system, further research on this issue will appear on The Rights of Man blog next week.

Note – O2 has previously been in touch and wish for me to make it clear that adult customers are able to deactivate the url filter by completing the company's age verification process and then requesting all sites be unblocked. Of course I don't wish to misrepresent them in any way so I'm happy to point this out, though there is a certain hypocrisy in them wishing for me to clarify such a point whilst happily defaming so many great human rights activists in the most extreme manner imaginable.

I've yet to decide if my arrival as a female MRA is due to finding men adorable and long suffering or finding other women insufferably fraudulent. I think it's somewhere between the two.

Don't get me wrong, I've met some women I've loved and I've met some men I've hated, it's just that I discovered, at some point, that it's not because of their gender it's because they are individuals with unique characteristics that I liked or loathed. People are people. They aren't just a sign on the zodiac and they aren't just their gender. Feminism disagrees and they want to taint half the species. It's impossible to embrace feminism, if you're an honest person, because feminism relies on you believing what amounts to an intellectual field of cow patties.

In 1991 I encountered Gloria Steinem's scribblings, and Naomi Wolf's The Beauty Myth. Steinem adeptly explained a thing called Patriarchy. Wolf dealt with anorexia, mass media images that forced a debilitating, self-loathing, sense of inadequacy on the average girl, and she talked about Barbie.

I was never a huge Barbie fan. I preferred dollhouses where I could be God to a miniature world, solving house problems where there were no stairs to the third floor by having them fly as if in an invisible elevator. In my dollhouse world anything could happen. Barbie seemed large and grotesquely clumsy. Smaller was better. In fact, when my best friend and I played dollhouse we always fought over who got to play the baby because small and vulnerable was the best thing to be in our little world.

It's not like the baby got the best speaking parts, it was just preferable to be the thing that got the most attention. Barbie presumably got attention because she had big boobs, perfect teeth, and designer clothing. That was stupid. Dollhouse kids got attention just because they were small and cried; much more in our realm of experience. As to Patriarchy, one thing I'm sure of in our miniature Patriarchal imitation world is that neither of us fought to be the dad.

The only other ongoing debate I had with my seven year old girl friend was over who was the smallest when we were born. Our fertile imaginations got quite microscopic. I think I won but I'm pretty sure she'd insist that she had won.

I can't say why she wanted to be so bloody small but, for me, it was likely due to getting the crap beat out of me by kids of both genders on a fairly regular basis. I thought being small would both make them less likely to find me and would encourage those watching to step in and help me out a little more. Everyone fawned over little people.

Neither Steinem nor Wolf dealt with the actual issues or experiences that I could call to mind but they drew me into their literary bosoms easily because, though they couldn't make me small, they offered me something quite awesome instead: the right to blame all my problems on other people. The only cost for this open licence to demand pity and compensation for declared unfairness was my honesty, integrity, and pride. I'm rather ashamed that it took me two or three years before I realized that cost was too great.

The Patriarchy was an interesting thing. As far as rule making goes, it was my experience that women led the field. Mom was the person I needed to please. She set the standards for behaviour and scholastic expectations and she meted out the punishment. Aside from those basic etiquette issues, it was the girls on my block and in my school that told me how to look, what to wear, how to act, what to feel, and what to be attracted to. Girls are pretty fucking hard to please. You know if you don't please them, too, because the punishment is stiff for failure to comply; humiliation, a potential punch to the stomach, a whack with an umbrella, but the worst was social rejection: Not by one girl, but by them all, after secret meetings and much whispering.

Boys, on the other hand, were much easier to please. They liked it when I played sports, ran fast for the track team, or was willing to barrel down a whitewashed hill of virgin snow on my toboggan into the river they assured me was frozen over. They never lied about that, though they occasionally overestimated how thick the ice was. Pleasing women: An endless, thankless, difficult task. Pleasing men: A lot of fucking fun.

But these are childhood stories. By the time I encountered Steinem and Wolf I was 21 and had been through puberty plus some life experience. I'd moved out of the family home five years earlier, had already had a live in boyfriend in a relationship that led me to the book Men Who Hate Women And The Women Who Love Them, and pretty much given up on my romantic dreams of living a life full of passion and love.

I didn't leave home because I had a bad family. They're actually exactly what they were supposed to be. Sometimes living Leave It To Beaver is the best way to figure out what's wrong with The Beaver. Everyone around me was studying and practising how to be someone everyone else can respect and forgot that self-respect was just as important. I suppose it's natural for teenagers to rebel and I was born at just the right time to be a Vintage Goth. The black hair, heavy crosses made of irony, and Robert Smith with his cereal box octopus and smeared lipstick who was the hero of my disillusionment with the world.

I don't know if you're old enough to remember the octopus. It came in a little plastic bag covered in cereal bits near the bottom of the box and when you threw it at the wall it would slowly climb down. When it got covered in hair and/or dust bunnies you simply washed it in clear water and it was good to go again. Kind of like feminist Patriarchy Theory creates a new wave every time the old one is looking shoddy and not sticking very well.

The things that made me happy were very small. They're still small. I collect finger puppets.

So, what's a Woxan?

Despite the title of my article, I am not Woxan. I mock them because I've learned that you either laugh or you cry. The Woxan is a creature that took form while I wasn't paying attention. After I turned away from the ideology that tried to tell me all the dads and humans with body parts I'd never have are, despite all evidence, more concerned with my destruction than busy worrying about their own lives, I just stopped paying attention. That's near twenty years of festering cow patties.

I noticed when Feminists started calling themselves "womyn" to erase the "man" part. I noticed when The Vagina Monologues became trendy, along with saying the word "vagina" in general. I somehow missed the part where "rape culture" became a thing. And what a thing it is. A big fucking steamer. I've been raped and I can assure you that no one thinks it is okay. No one.

I also somehow missed the moment where it became bad to be a person who was born into a body you learned to like, bad to have all your limbs and organs functional, bad to be heterosexual, bad to be born white, and bad to have a penis. I missed when simple words like "privilege" stopped being something to be thankful and humble about and became the mark of Cain.

The thing about not being surrounded by bullshit is that you smell it really quickly and pungently when it crosses your path. I highly suspect that feminism, which is behind all these new trends, has saturated the world with their bullshit so thoroughly that what seems obvious has become nearly impossible for many people to notice. It's not impossible… just nearly.

So here I am, a Vintage Goth, with not a hope nor a care in the world of fitting in with the mainstream patty whiffers, saying "Holy shit! Can't you smell it?" For the women who have found careers and advantage in pretending the world doesn't need or want men, I give you a new name. For those professional feminists, for those shameless promoters of histrionic victimhood, I give you a name free of any "y" chromosome. I call you Woxan.

I hear you roar and it's fucking pathetic.

Disneyland Dads

Paul Elam · 6 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I talked with a friend who was having problems with his children quite some time ago. Jim was a divorced father of three, the oldest of which was a 16 year old son. He was experiencing more problems at the time with his eldest than he was with the other two children. The situation he described was pretty consistent with those I had heard from a lot of other men in his shoes.

Since the divorce his son had grown more distant from him with each passing year, and more contemptuous. Some of that was the normal and predictable struggle for individuation common to adolescence, where it is typical for teens to emotionally and even physically retreat from the presence of their parents. It is that developmental phase, one that is both painful and necessary, when teens sometimes want as little to do with their family as possible; when their friends or even their friend's parents are just fine; cool, as it were. Yet the idea of being seen publicly with their own parents is mortally embarrassing.

It can be a rough time for everyone in a family, even during the best of times and circumstances.

But toss that normal kind of growing pain into the life of a divorced father, and add in the undermining from the court sanctioned Golden Uterus, and you have an entirely different animal. Such was the case with Jim and son.

The divorce, despite Jim's best efforts, had been nasty. After a small fortune in legal fees he ended up with the standard deal; a stiff amount of child support, visitation on alternating weekends and Wednesday evenings — and a long list of things he no longer had the authority to do.

Like be a father.

All the parental authority he had ever possessed with his children was transferred to the mother along with the bulk of his assets. The court had not restructured his family. It had just, save for the financial obligations, cut him out of it.

He made the best of it that he could. He turned down opportunities for career advancement to remain living as close as possible to his children. He was there for visitation religiously, despite all the times that his ex-wife interfered and disrupted, which was most any time she was displeased. It became her routine, either as a matter of personal convenience, or to punish him with her newfound power.

She warmed up to calling the shots in pretty short order.

Before long, his ex-wife found a new man, remarried, and encouraged Jim's children to call the new husband "Dad." It was one of many forms of abuse she managed to rationalize after she found herself empowered with a legally sanctioned lack of accountability.

And during this time, Jim watched powerlessly as his connection to his kids, as his role as a father, faded. His children, particularly the oldest, figured out pretty quickly that he was a lame duck with no paternal influence. Respect for him, even as a human being, much less a father, became as distant as the memory of an intact family. At some point Jim realized he wasn't even a visitor any more. He was a babysitter who paid money to take care of children that actually belonged to someone else.

He may have been the last one to figure it out.

That was especially so for his children, who had begun to treat their visits with him like they were some sort of punishment. This was true for the oldest son, in particular. He started to act as though seeing his father was something he was forced to endure; something from which he escaped at the prescribed time. His son also started having problems in school about that time (who'da thunk?), a problem for which Jim found himself saddled with blame, but about which there was nothing he could do. There was no practical way left for him to discipline his son.

Eventually, bordering on despondent, Jim went to see a psychotherapist about the problem. Of course, the therapist did what most therapists do with all situations for which they have absolutely no fucking answers. He came up with a stupid idea that was even more destructive.

He suggested that Jim solidify and embrace his new role as an impotent, disenfranchised father, and just spend his time with his kids giving them whatever they want, forsaking all rules and discipline while they are with him. He suggested that Jim become a Disneyland Dad.

Ah, yeah, that's the ticket.

To begin with, let's take a look at what a Disneyland Dad is perceived to be versus what he really is.

According to womansdivorce.com, which bills itself as "Helping women survive divorce and rebuild their lives," A Disneyland Dad is as follows:

"Generally, he's a father who buys his kids whatever they want, taking them out to eat and to all the fun places in town, rarely enforces regular routines, and gives in to their every whim. From a child's point of view, it's like visiting Disneyland."

So, according to Woman's Divorce, Jim has been advised by a mental health professional to further disregard his children's needs; to not bother himself with matters like diet, bedtimes, homework, or any of the measures of psychosocial functioning by which we determine whether or not a child is in or heading toward serious life problems; to sell them out for the convenient path of least resistance. He is to lavish them with materialism and fun, setting them up to go home and face the real life disappointment from the "responsible" mother, who compensates for the enabling, irresponsible father by being the only adult the children have.

It's a load of horseshit from Woman's Divorce — and from Jim's therapist.

For a better understanding, let's take a look at what a Disneyland Dad really is in most cases, maybe all of them.

Disneyland Dad is a Disabled Dad, dysfunctionally compensating for the impossible situation the courts and his ex-wife have worked in concert together to place him and his children in the middle of. I use the word "dysfunctional" because it technically fits. But it has to be clarified that in most of these situations, there is no real "functional" manner of compensating. There is no clear "right thing to do." All opportunity to act in the best interest of the children, by restructuring parental roles as opposed to simply eviscerating one of them, has already been laid to waste, by the courts, and by her.

We are, after all, talking about non-custodial "fathers." Yes, I put "fathers" in scare quotes for a reason. They fit. Scare quotes should be used every time non-custodial is the adjective describing a father, unless his situation is otherwise qualified, which is rare.

A non-custodial "father" is what remains of a male parent after you strip away all his authority, access and ongoing influence in the life of his child. He is not a parent, but a hologram of one, used to house and feed the children long enough to give their custodian a break. His money counts, but not his presence. The same can often sadly be said for his love.

Love is a great thing to give a child. It means quite a bit less when someone is allowed to put a leash on it; to dictate how much and how often it is expressed. This is especially true when loving your children means providing the consistency and discipline of which fathers are so naturally the providers.

And from the first restraining order to the final decree, that loving discipline is the primary casualty of the dissolved marriage. The courts make sure of it.

And so what do men do? They often watch in horror as the custodial mother controls and abuses the father-child relationship with reptilian indifference to the emotional welfare of the children. They watch this time after time, day after day, till horror becomes an almost boring routine; till she achieves in the "father" the correct amount of utilitarian value and compliance, and the correct diminishment of his actual fatherhood.

That is when fathers, as fathers, often go AWOL, though asserting they went somewhere willingly, as opposed to being exiled, isn't altogether fair.

Some make their departure as fathers official by taking the Disney route, especially if they are part of the fortunate few with the money to do it. It is easier, and they get to see their kids smile. Those smiles help them forget that they have become a clown in the mother's circus, and that underneath all the fun lay the dying needs of their children.

Other men, often poorer ones, just lose interest. They plant kids in front of a television, or video games and go busy themselves with other distractions. Some of these men start sliding on visitation. They often are the subject of scorn from their exes, who waste no time in telling anyone who will listen, "The bastard doesn't even want to use the visitation he got to see his own children."

She neglects to mention that she undermined and destroyed everything that his being a father ever really was a long time before he made it official by no longer showing up. He is Distant Dad, just like she wanted, and now she can malign him in front of the world with "proof" of how worthless he is.

Other men, the really stubborn ones, rail for years against being marginalized, blaming themselves in the process for failing. I admire their tenacity, but I am less impressed with their thickness. I am not trying to be cruel, but I have seen this enough to know that their kids don't benefit from it. They wind up just as alienated as the ones who check out.

Disneyland Dads. Distant Dads. Die-hard Dads. All Disabled Dads; Destroyed Dads.

It is what happens when you buy into myths like "visitation" and "child support" as replacements for parenting; as replacements for fatherhood. When you are insane enough to believe that lawyers and courts and embittered exes act in the best interest of children; when you assign not custody, but ownership of children, and when you base that kind of corrupt choice on the even more corrupt standard of genitalia, then you get what those actions have so far gotten us; children who lose everything, starting with Dad.

And you get fathers who compensate for it in whatever way is at their disposal, because that is what is available for them to do.

There is, however, one other option, assuming that we are not ready as a society to stop enabling women to destroy families. You can tell children the truth. You can tell them that you only used to be their father; that while you love them just as much as you ever did, that your real role and the authority to fulfill it, was stolen by their mother and by the court.

You can tell them that what they were told was a divorce was actually a demolition of their lives, sponsored by a system that does not give a fuck about them or about what is right; a system utilized by their custodial "parent" who similarly did not give a fuck.

And that may well be the way to go if you have the finesse to deliver the truth in a way that does not inspire suicide.

I can only wonder what it would be like to look children in the eyes; children who are angry and confused and starting to show the signs of life failure, and just tell them the truth about what happened to them.

Nah, we can't do that. If we did, it would not be fair to their mothers.

The Voice of Europe: Male death

Due to technical difficulties at Blog Talk Radio last week, this show will be rebroadcasted on Friday, 10 May 2013 at the times scheduled at the bottom of this announcement.

On May 3, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the only instance when the society seems to give a damn, at least sometimes, about men's lives – and that is when they are dead. It almost sounds like for this politically correct culture, a good man is a dead man.

After the Earl Silverman tragedy and the recent celebration of the World War II veterans, the Voice of Europe thinks it's time to discuss male death, and particularly the general perception with regards to it.

Please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

The DAHMW needs your help

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 7 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Domestic Abuse Hotline for Men and Women (DAHMW) is a very important and very rare non-profit organization. Why is DAHMW so important and rare?

Because it helps male and female victims of partner violence. It recognizes that all victims of abuse need help, not just women. DAHMW was founded by Jan Brown in October 2000 in Harmony, Maine and has answered thousands of calls from men and women in crisis since that time.

Jan asked me to join the DAHMW Board of Directors in 2012. I officially joined January 2013 and am amazed at how much Ms. Brown, the Board and DAHMW volunteers have accomplished with such limited resources. Unsurprisingly, DAHMW does not get to wantonly feed at the VAWA, federal and state domestic violence monies trough like most women's domestic violence organizations do. Since its inception, DAHMW has operated on an extremely lean budget — and Jan's grit, determination and sheer force of will.

Some of you reading this may be familiar with the Earl Silverman tragedy. For those of you who are not, Mr. Silverman founded and ran the only men's domestic violence shelter (MASH4077) in Canada for years. He recently killed himself in despair after having to close the shelter doors due to lack of funding.

Billions of dollars are spent each year on women's domestic violence shelters, but not a farthing to help male victims and their children. Much like Mr. Silverman, DAHMW doesn't have tens of thousands of dollars to sponsor events in which young college men are shamed into parading across campus in high heels, to dispense white feathers and other such contrived nonsense that doesn't do a damed thing to stop partner violence, but does a great job of painting all men as rapists, pedophiles and wife beaters. DAHMW spends what little funding it receives to keep our hotline up and running for all victims of intimate partner violence regardless of gender, sexual orientation, race and religion.

Jan Brown explains DAHMW's mission:

We collaborate with a number of the established women's domestic violence shelters in the country that also understand that the human capacity for family violence is not limited or dictated by gender. DAHMW offers support and practical services to victims, to the best of our ability given our limited financial resources.

Our trained volunteer advocates cover our toll free abuse helpline in shifts throughout the day and night. They take calls from victims, their family members and friends who are concerned about them, as well as social services agencies looking for referrals and supportive services for their male clients. 100% of our volunteers (and staff) are compassionate, caring people who want to make a difference in the lives of victims of domestic violence.

DAHMW is an organization with a lotta heart (say that with a down east accent!) that could use some helping hands and some spare change if you've got it.

Passing the Hat and Reaching Out for a Helping Hand

If you would like to help DAHMW to keep their hotlines open and to continue to provide resources, very badly needed resources, for male victims of domestic violence, please consider making a donation. DAHMW is also in need of volunteers to operate our hotline.

To better understand the volunteer program, I asked Jan a few questions and here they are along with her replies:

1) What are the responsibilities and requirements of becoming a DAHMW volunteer?

Those interested in volunteering on our helpline must fill out a volunteer application and then set up a time to meet with our Intake Coordinator and Training Coordinator by teleconference. We do a reference and criminal background check. If the applicant is approved we invite them to our training group.

Before joining the training group, we ask potential volunteers to make a $45.00 tax deductible contribution to DAHMW (via our paypal link on our website) to help us defray the costs of the criminal background check, etc. If the $45.00 is a hardship, we may reduce or waive the donation.

Once in the training group, the trainee has up to six weeks to finish the reading, quizzes and assignments (we may extend the training time if there is good cause). Once the trainee successfully completes training, he or she will schedule a time to participate in a mock call session (more than one if needed). Once the trainee feels comfortable about taking helpline calls, he or she will choose an available shift (shifts are 4, 6, and 8 hours long). The line is then forwarded to the trainee's cell phone or landline for that shift weekly. The Intake and Training Coordinators are always available by phone or email if the trainee has any further questions.

We require that our helpline advocates be "violence free," IOW, not in an abusive relationship for at least one year prior to commencing our training. We ask volunteer helpline advocates to commit to one shift a week for one year. They must also attend monthly volunteer teleconferences, usually held on the 2nd or 3rd Sunday night of the month. These meetings are usually between 45 minutes and 2 hrs long depending on the subject being discussed and/or whether or not we have a guest speaker.

In addition we require helpline advocates to submit their volunteer hours weekly at a site that keeps track of our volunteer hours for us and to submit "call logs" (explained in more detail in our training) for each helpline call they take online at the end of each shift.

2) DAHMW is located in Maine. Can you be a volunteer if you don't live in Maine? How does that work?

Those interested in volunteering with us can live anywhere in the country. Our agency is set up "virtually." We use a call forwarding program to send the toll free helpline to helpline advocates phone for their shift, we communicate with each other via teleconference, email, group lists and chat. All a potential volunteer would need is a computer with an internet connection and a cell phone/landline with unlimited long distance. Of course, being a good listener and comfortable working with people in crisis is a must also.

3) You mentioned that all DAHMW volunteers take a training course. What does that entail?

The training course is made up of ten sections. Here is a sampling of the material covered: History of the Battered Women's Movement, Dynamics of Intimate Partner Violence and Legal Issues for Victims of Intimate Partner Violence.

4) If men and women are interested in volunteering, how do they begin the process?

Send an email stating their interest in volunteering to Theresa Chow at: theresachow75@yahoo.com or Jan Brown at: dahmwagency@gmail.com

Thank you, Jan!

If you have been a victim of domestic violence, have found your way out of the abuse FOG (fear-obligation-guilt) and would like help others to escape that hell, becoming a volunteer would be a great place to begin.

If you are a Men's Human Rights Activist and don't know where to direct your efforts, volunteering with DAHMW is definitely a worthwhile cause.

Hope to hear from you!

Tonight, co hosts James Huff and Robert O'Hara will again be taking a spin without a guest. That means that you are the guest and as such should call in and discuss the current trends in the movement. And the indications are good! More and more attention is being paid to our movement and rightfully so. Feminists are becoming scared of our growing presence in the public eye, courts and legislatures all around the U.S, Canada and the U.K. They are reacting to the success of our activism and the predictable result is confusion and denial.

The show starts at 8pm Central Time on May 7th.
That's 2am in London on May 8th.

Filler case nearing conclusion, perhaps

Bar Counsel to Supreme Court: Mary Kellett's misconduct "inexcusable"

Mary Kellett, the Bar Harbor Maine prosecutor accused of conducting Salem style Witch Trials of dozens of innocent men for sex crimes[1] will go before a single Maine Supreme Court Judge for misconduct charges in the Vladek Filler case. On April 24, 2013 Bar Counsel Scott Davis filed a formal complaint with the Maine Supreme Judicial Court charging Mary Kellett engaged in prosecutorial misconduct through "multiple serious violations" which were "inexcusable" in her prosecution of Vladek Filler.

Bar Counsel's complaint followed a two year investigation and a two day formal disciplinary hearing before a Bar Panel during which Kellett's office had Filler held in custody. In December 2012 the Bar Panel issued a decision finding Kellett failed to turn over "at least two key pieces" of evidence of Filler's innocence, engaged in violation of rules and court orders, did not act as a truth seeker, misled the jury, and engaged in conduct unworthy of an attorney.[2]

Kellett's prosecution of Filler began when he was engaged in a bitter child custody dispute with his then wife Ligia Filler–a substantiated child abuser. Ligia Filler characterized her criminal complaints as her way of fighting for the custody of the Filler children[3]. Mary Kellett intervened with Child Protective Services and rushed to immediately arrest and charge Vladek with spousal rape based solely on his wife's accusations.

During his prosecution Vladek maintained and won sole custody of his children, but Kellett's rampant prosecutorial misconduct resulted in him being falsely convicted for sexual assault of his wife. Kellet suppressed and withheld court ordered exculpatory evidence, and obtained rulings to bar extensive evidence of his accuser's motives and conduct form trial.

Even evidence that Vladek was involved in a bitter divorce and child custody dispute with his wife and evidence of her numerous strategic, malicious, and frivolous actions against him aimed at regaining custody of their children were barred due to Kellett's objections. She repeatedly suggested to the jury that there was not a child custody dispute and that evidence of such didn't even exist. Kellett told the jury about domestic violence statistics and about her own personal experiences, and that Filler failed to prove that he didn't rape his wife.

As a result of Kellet's prosecutorial misconduct the trial court set aside the conviction and ordered a new trial. Kellett appealed, seeking to reinstate the conviction and to set a new legal precedent barring prosecuted men in Maine from being able to present evidence of their bitter divorces and child custody disputes with their false accusers as a defense.

The Supreme Court upheld the mistrial due to Kellett's misconduct and violations of Filler's constitutional rights. By that time the Divorce Court Judge ruled that Ligia Filler lacked credibility, abused the children, and in review of the same evidence the Judge ruled that the criminal charges of spousal rape against Vladek did not even pass the lowest — more likely than not — standard of proof. But Kellett ignored the District Court ruling and announced she would still re-prosecute Vladek for the same false charges. Several bar complaints were filed against Kellett alleging serious violations and suppression of evidence and she was forced to step aside due to the pending disciplinary investigation in to her conduct in the case.

Filler then became a major political target for malicious prosecution. Kellett's associate Paul F. Cavanaugh was assigned to pull all the stops and was allowed to run wild in Judge Robert E. Murray's kangaroo court to gain a conviction by any means possible.[1]

Miraculously, Vladek was still acquitted of all but one misdemeanor assault charge. The misdemeanor charge alleged Vladek had unclear physical contact with his wife which caused a bruise to magically appear on her upper arm 4 days after they last saw each other. Judge Murray denied all defense motions and allowed a clearly unrelated bruise claim and photograph to be used to convict Filler even after police found his wife making conflicting claims to officers and their examination finding absolutely no bruises on her arm — 2 days after the alleged contact.

The prosecutorial misconduct of Mary Kellett involved other Maine officials.

ADA Paul Cavanaugh repeatedly complained to the court that Vladek filed a Bar Complaint against Mary Kellett and caused public attention. At sentencing Cavanaugh sought up to a year in jail punishment/retribution — not for any magic bruise — but to punish Filler for engaging in his own vigorous defense against the corruption in Cavenaugh's office.

Judge Robert E. Murray sentenced Vladek to an unheard of 21 days in jail and then forced him to serve that sentence precisely during the time he was required to appear to testify against Mary Kellett at her disciplinary hearing.[2]

Vladek was brought to testify against Kellett as a prisoner, in shackles, under guard and under strict rules of no communications.

The case presented by the Bar Counsel did not try to address examples of Kellet's criminal misconduct. By day two of the hearing it became apparent that Kellett was being given a pass and an obvious effort to allow her to white wash her misconduct was in progress. Vladek, while under guard, demanded to retake the stand in final minutes of the hearing and managed to get his entire 3 part complaint with documents admitted on the record in rebuttal to Kellett's testimony. As news began to spread of a white wash, A Voice For Men activists from around the world took action to make their voices heard, and heard they were.[3]

In its decision, the Bar Panel cited Kellett's failure to turn over at "least two key pieces of exculpatory evidence" which were "critical" to Vladek's defense, rampant discovery violations, and efforts to mislead and deceive the jury about facts and evidence. The seriousness of Kellett's misconduct, the Panel wrote, "cannot be overstated". Despite court and Bar Panel findings and recommendation and despite numerous calls by A Voice For Men, SAVE, National Coalition for Men, and the National Parents Organization (formerly Father's and Families) for Kellett to be removed from her position, she has been allowed by state and county officials to continue prosecuting innocent men.

Officials like district attorney Carletta Bassano, the Hancock County Commissioners, and the Attorney General's office have decided to look the other way as Kellett continues to be unleashed on the public. They have chosen to completely ignore substantiated evidence of Kellett's egregious misconduct. Not only does Kellett to continue to destroy innocent men's lives, she is allowed to continue to provide extraordinary protection and plea deals to female offenders, hence undermining the administration of justice against both the innocent and the guilty.[1]

During the past 2 years, since the Board of Overseers of the Bar found probable cause to conduct and investigation and take disciplinary action, Kellett has continued to prosecute numerous innocent men. Even after the Bar Panel's decision to suspend her law license 4 months ago, she has continued to charge men with sex crimes with at least 3 men having such charges already dismissed. Kellett continues to give female criminals extraordinary plea deals. It's business as usual in Hancock County because Mary Kellett and DA Carletta Bassano are not worried. The corrupt structure in place continues to protect Kellett from accountability for acts which any private attorney would have been criminally prosecuted and jailed long ago.

No one in Hancock County or State government, or the mainstream press for that matter, has shown any concern for Kellett's misconduct or the harm she has caused in her 1100 prosecutions during some 10 years in office. No one in Maine's government seems concerned for the victims of the devastating abuse which Kellett continues to inflict.

Joseph Digenova, a former United States Attorney, discussed the problem of prosecutorial misconduct with PBS stating "This is serious business. These career prosecutors believe that nobody can touch them. Nobody! That's a very dangerous thing in a free society".[2]

Here indeed we have an example of career prosecutors in Hancock County Maine who are engaged in a very serious business of ruining people's lives with the arrogance of knowing nobody can or will punish them–not the courts, not the state, not the justice department–no matter how egregious or criminal their misconduct may be.

If an abusive medical surgeon withholds and misrepresents facts in order to perform unnecessary surgeries on healthy people, he is stopped, stripped of his medical license, and criminally prosecuted by authorities. Yet Mary Kellett, a Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar substantiated violator of rules and civil rights of the innocent is not even slowed down. She is just allowed to continue to hold and use the power of the state against the public with no real oversight or intervention from her superiors or State of Maine officials.

For years A Voice for Men has reported about a crime spree of misconduct and civil rights abuse by Mary Kellett and her 7th District Attorney's office in Maine. We have called for intervention from the Governor and State ofMaine officials who are legally responsible with protecting the public from abusive officials acting under the color of law. The justice system which the public is expected to trust has become a mockery of our values and ideals. Maine officials must be held to their duty and oath of office and must protect the public by removing Mary Kellett from her position.

We will not stop calling for accountability and will continue to investigate and report the misconduct of any public officials in Maine who fails in their duties to hold corrupt prosecutor Mary Kellett fully accountable for her crimes.

UNC Chapel Hill Women's Hospital and misandry?

Michael Sharron · 7 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last week my daughter and I went to the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Women's Hospital so that she could have some tests completed. A specialist ordered them in hopes of discovering what is keeping her sick.

As a custodial father, it usually falls on me to take my daughter to all doctors visits. As the father of a daughter, I am thankful that girls and women have specialized healthcare, but as I walked up to this hospital I had to wonder, where do men and boys go to get specialized healthcare at the University of North Carolina?

Where do mothers and fathers take young boys who have a need for healthcare for issues that just affect them? After leaving the Women's Hospital, I decided to take some time and seek out information that could answer these questions. As you can imagine, there is not one single facility at UNC-Chapel Hill that deals with healthcare for men and boys. So, I had more questions.

As an older father of a young child, I will likely begin to have significant healthcare issues when my daughter is relatively young. If I need specialized care, where will she take me if a doctor orders specialized test at the University of NC system? Then I wondered, where did all the money come from to build this enormous Women's Hospital that is much larger than 70% of the general hospitals in North Carolina?

In looking at the University of North Carolina and it's nursing school, I had some better insight on where this funding came from given that every single Ph.D level researcher at the Nursing School has a specialty in women's health. Not one single researcher devotes their career to either Men's health or conditions related to just men. Undoubtedly, this level of research is driving huge amounts of money back to the University of North Carolina which justified them building a Women's Hospital.

University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Women's Hospital and the Future of Men, Boys, and the Women that Love Them

As my daughter and I drove home I had some time to reflect. On one hand, I am thankful that my daughter can get world class healthcare that is clearly given at the University of North Carolina Health System.

But, then I thought about her children. What if she has a son?

What if she has a son who is sick? Have we reached a level in North Carolina and elsewhere that we have given so much money, resources, and infrastructure to women's healthcare — to equalize an alleged but obviously non-existent disparity — that we actually ended up increasing the real disparity, the one men and boys have already historically faced?

Does anyone expect that this multi-million dollar hospital will be torn down the day that everyone realizes that the only healthcare disparity that ever existed favors women? And, does anyone think that when that day comes, there will suddenly be a multi-million dollar hospital built for men and boys, or that suddenly medical providers and researchers will start shaping their careers around men's healthcare?

Will they open a wing for men and boys? A clinic? Put up some posters? Or will we just see something like this?

We know where this is heading, I think.

Modern day feminism/misandry clearly has a hand in everything my daughter and I just witnessed. What sickens me about it is that when this women's hospital was being built, no doubt there were feminists who applauded the construction in the name of women's rights, and who never thought about the men in their lives that they love, or their future sons who may one day need specialized medical care.

This is why I hate feminism. Feminists largely center everything around women, and to a much more superficial degree around their children. They do not take into account what happens to those children, their sons, when they turn 18 and feminism needs them to be a marginalized father, an assumed rapist, an assumed domestic violence offender, or just dead from prostate cancer, so that the narrative of feminism and the elitist focus on women can be furthered.

If you do not live in North Carolina, or have no interest in the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, this article still pertains to you. If you look closely within your own university system or in an average medical center, it is very likely that this system has it's own women's hospital and numerous specialized programs for women's health. For boys and men — nothing.

I hope that this article will start the wheels spinning and cause you to look within your own community so that you can become a contributor and writer for A Voice For Men.

If you are a woman, a mother, or grandmother, you are probably the only hope your sons and grandsons have.

An interview with Peter Lloyd

Claire-Louise Meadows · 8 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Journalist Peter Lloyd recently hit the headlines when he revealed he was suing his local gym, the Kentish Town Sports Centre in North London, on the grounds of gender bias.

Lloyd was incensed that the venue, owned by the fitness company Better, in association with Camden Council – was banning men and boys for 442 hours every year to make way for 'women-only' sessions.

'To add insult to injury' says Lloyd, in a heartfelt article in the Daily Mail last month, 'they still charge full-price membership without offering men the equivalent option of a 'male-only' session.'

I have been watching the case develop with interest, as a journalist and blogger with special research interests in the rights of men and boys.

And I am not the only one. Prominent human-rights campaigner Peter Tatchell has described Lloyd's campaign as 'sensible and fair'.

Erin Pizzey, domestic violence shelter founder turned men's right campaigner has also pledged her support 'this discrimination has no place in modern society' she says.

I interviewed Peter Lloyd last week to find out more about the thinking behind his case, and what progress he felt he had made so far.

Claire-Louise Meadows: Peter, take us back a little – what made you decide to take action on this issue?

Peter Lloyd: Primarily, I took action because the gym's policy is discriminatory, but also because I wanted to wake people up – men, women, council staff and gym bosses.

Men and boys constantly suffer sexism, and a small issue like this is a building block for other male discriminations such as father's rights, circumcision and the life expectancy gap. I want to help change that.

CLM: Have you found that you have had a lot of support? Mostly from men, women or a mix?

PL: I've had an incredible amount of support – from both genders. I've also had backing from gym staff at the Kentish Town Sports Centre, who oppose their employer's sexist policies.

Even a poll on the Huffington Post is 80% in my favour. The public aren't stupid – they know I'm right and that charging customers for hours they can't use, while simultaneously vilifying their sexuality, is wrong.

CLM: How are you gauging your success? What, in your opinion, is the ideal outcome of your case?

PL: I already consider the case successful because it exposed the gym's unfair, out-dated practice. But it's also successful because it galvanised male thinking, especially around gender politics – an area they've traditionally been locked out of.

CLM: You have been described to me, by people familiar with your work, as an excellent writer, but not usually a particularly political writer.

Have you yourself been galvanized into exploring more areas of the men's rights movement as a result of your own experiences?

PL: I've always been interested in men's issues, but my writing focused on other things. I even worked on a women's magazine for three years. It was only when I left that and went freelance that I could focus on my own passions. It amazed me that men had no real voice in mainstream media – despite the scale of their modern issues. Editors have simply just given them sports pages.

CLM: Feminism – a driver for necessary change, or making problems with gender equality worse?

PL: Both and neither. Equality is wonderful – it's definition is clear and inflexible. Feminism is different. While many feminists are fair and balanced, much of the feminist ideology has been hijacked, corrupted and bastardised by misandrists.

Just look at how the male victims of domestic violence – a staggering 40% of ALL reported incidents – are deliberately ignored for financial and political motives. This, we are told, is a fruit of feminism. I think it's disgusting and a form of abuse in itself.

In this week's Grazia there's a feature about female genital mutilation. They're rightly outraged, but men are routinely circumcised all over the world every day. Many die or grow up to feel violated. And, unlike FGM, it's legal in the UK and America.

Perhaps when these women have sons or grandsons they'll realise that we're all connected

Currently, the world is focusing on women's issues while happily ignoring men's. That's like flying a plane with one wing. The ending will inevitably be disastrous.

CLM: How would you respond to Glen Poole's criticism of your campaign in the Guardian?

PL: Of course, Glen Poole is entitled to his own opinion on this matter. For my part, I have no comment on his views.

CLM: And how would you respond to the accusation on Adweek that your 'overly-aggressive' rhetoric was doing more harm than good to the serious issues behind your campaign?

PL: It's quite clear that the author behind that article has fallen victim to bias. Trying to imply that my unapologetic approach to tackling discrimination had aggressive undertones because I'm a man was sad. But I understand. It's all part of the general malaise facing anyone that challenges the status quo on these issues.

CLM: There is a twitter divide on your campaign, depending on whether he matter is perceived as an issue of negative gender bias, or unfair business practice – is it possible that people are missing the point of what you're trying to achieve?

PL: Totally – so many people have missed the point. This isn't about the Equality Act or whether my gym is acting lawfully. It's not even about justifying a women's hour. It's about fairness. It's about telling men not to accept – or expect – sexism because they are male. It's ultimately about empowerment.

CLM: Where are you at with the case at the moment? When can we expect a decision?

PL: The case has been filed at the small claims court. A decision can be expected this summer.

CLM: How do you plan to build on the issues your case has raised?

PL: I will always be vocal about men's issues. It's a difficult calling, but it's a calling all the same. It feels like I was always meant to be doing this.

MMA fighter Phil Davis' most dangerous battle

Ty Henry · 8 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By all metrics, Phil Davis is an elite fighter.

At Penn State, he won a national championship and was a 4-time All-American. Davis is now a Mixed Martial Artist, a Top 10 fighter in the UFC, the sport's top promotion. On April 27, he defeated Vinny Magalhaes at UFC 159 to continue his ascent to championship contention.

Rarely do fighters schedule contests two weeks apart. Nonetheless, Davis is slated to take on his most daunting opponent to date, an opponent bereft of the physical talents Davis possesses, but favored nonetheless by a wide, almost 9-1 margin. Unlike his opponents in the Octagon, this opponent has no code of ethics, and the rules are stacked in its favor.

The opponent is family court. He and his child's mom, Vantris Patterson, are scheduled in court May 10 to determine custody of his young daughter, and he has already got the first metaphorical rabbit punch to the brain stem in the form of the false, uncorroborated domestic violence allegation as well as charges of angry sexual techniques that would make a lion blush.

Ms. Patterson's mendacity is not a matter of conjecture. She filed documents with close up images of what she says are facial injuries (although no police report has been filed). When celebrity site TMZ and others reported the filing, she vigorously protested on social media that the images were not of her.

This playbook is all too familiar to dads nationwide who seek custody, shared parenting, or otherwise refuse to be quiescent in their marginalization.The Oregon legislature passed an amendment in 1997 meant to increased shared parenting. The unintended consequence? Not only did it result in less shared custody, but claims of domestic violence during custody dispute skyrocketed. Researchers Doug Allen and Brinig found that courts were unlikely to substantiate claims made by moms.

Or take the case of Bradley Howe. His wife walked out on the marriage. Despite no evidence, his wife then promptly filed for a protective order, which was dismissed. After Howe provided video evidence that the second allegation was false (for which Correna paid no penalty), she was granted the protective order because he came to her house to get his court ordered time with his daughter, and protested when she insisted the child was going to daycare, putting her "in fear of imminent bodily injury and in fear of continued harassment that rises to such a level as to inflict substantial emotional distress." At the trial, when asked why she was in fear, she testified it was due to the motions he was filing. . . to see his daughter. That's not my interpretation-it's from the minutes. No allegation of violence, or the threat of violence.

Of course, even if a dad wins a 50/50 arrangement, he is not out of the woods, as elite male model Gabriel Aubry found out last Thanksgiving. A dutiful and doting dad, Aubry had the temerity to not go quietly when mega-star Halle Berry decided to break the bond by moving to France, the home of the new beau. Coincidentally, two weeks after the custodial arrangement was upheld, Mr. Aubry found himself on the business end of a few choice words and punches from Berry's White Knight Olivier Martinez, who coincidentally was present for the first time during a transfer.The kick to the gut came within 12 hours in the form of a restraining order and criminal charges, the latter thankfully dropped with a veiled threat.

Ms Patterson is not content to stop at mere lies. The gravamen of her claim is his profession has made him more violent outside the ring. That's right, in the cruelest of ironies, she is using the profession that feeds her daughter against their father, the same profession from which she will attempt to extract wages for child support.

This is the bizarro-world Phil Davis is courageously traversing, a duplicitous culture that shames men who aren't present in their children's lives, yet rewards the men who demand meaningful contact with the risk of scurrilous violent and sexual allegations, at worst, or gut-wrenching, tortuous long-term alienation at best.

I wish Mr. Davis all the best, and will be following closely. Hopefully, his story ends more like Miami Heat star Dwyane Wade than deceased former Philadelphia Eagles safety Andre Watters. Wade weathered four years divorce resistance, attempted alienation and then abuse allegations before being awarded custody of his sons and granted his divorce. Like Wade, Davis has the benefit of a well-paying job (read=good attorneys) and an employer who publicly stands by him.

That, of course, is no guarantee of success, but still affords him a fighting chance.

Update: On April 16, Capriati's attorney waived her appearance and entered a plea of not guilty to all charges. Her next date is July 12. Not surprisingly, I could only find one link to the story in a Google search .

AVFM on Jake Pentland Show

Last month I penned a short article about Jake Pentland, a blogger and internet radio show personality who also happens to be the son of Roseanne Barr. I was writing in response to a blog post from Pentland on feminism and masculinity that struck me as well intentioned but myopic. Or, myopic but well intentioned, depending on where you want to put the emphasis.

I wasn't exactly brutal, but I wasn't exactly sprinkling sugar on doughnuts either. I liked Pentland's intent, but wasn't so impressed with where his intentions took him.

To this date I don't know exactly how Mr. Pentland received the critique, but I am guessing that we will find out Saturday, May 11, 2013 at 1 PM Pacific Time when I am a guest on his show on BlogTalk Radio.

I have no idea where this is going. I have had no direct communication with Pentland except a very brief email exchange, which makes this a lot more fun to anticipate. Will Jake and I find common ground on which to talk about the state of modern men? Is he angry and looking for some payback? Is it a combination of the two, or something else that even an evil, kitten blending misogynist like me cannot imagine?

Well, you will have to tune in to the show to find out.

I will also be joined by AVFM contributor Patrick Doran, also known as The Mad Shangi, which I am sure will add to the flavor of this particular event.

Here is the link to Pentland's blog, which should hook you up to the radio show. As a direct link to the show page becomes available we will get it updated here. PE

J4MB, Buchanan moving forward

Mike Buchanan declares the seat he'll be contesting in the 2015 British general election

Two months ago, on behalf of Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) – henceforth 'J4MB' – I declared our intention to contest the top 30 Conservative marginal seats (at the 2010 general election) at the next general election, scheduled for May 2015. I declared that intention in a letter sent to David Cameron, the relentlessly anti-male and pro-feminist Conservative party leader and prime minister:

http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-open-letter-to-david-cameron-march-2013/

We recently announced that Ray Barry, leader of The Equal Parenting Alliance – another political party – will be contesting a Tory marginal, Wolverhampton South-West, on our behalf in 2015.

With two years still remaining before the election, donations to fund 30 deposits and related campaign materials are on course. We plan to announce seats we'll be contesting as and when adequate funding is in place. I can now announce I'll personally be contesting the Bedford seat in 2015. It's generally been a Labour seat over the years, albeit one surrounded by safe Conservative seats. I lived in Bedford for many years after 1995, and it's a town for which I remain very fond. I still spend some time in the town, and I'm looking forward to engaging with local issues, in particular men's human rights issues, to raise local awareness of how discriminations originating from both central and local government adversely affect the lives and prospects of men and boys in the constituency.

In 2010 the Bedford seat was won by Richard Fuller for the Conservatives, as a result of an anti-Labour swing. His majority was just 1,353 votes over his Labour rival – the seat is #25 on our list of 30 target seats – and his prospects of re-election in 2015 are already slim, given that UKIP is picking up so much support from traditional Conservative voters.

People sometime ask me why J4MB is targeting only Conservative marginal seats in 2015. The reason's simple. The Conservatives have moved so far to the left under David Cameron they've left a huge vacuum on the centre-right, which is potentially fertile ground for both J4MB and UKIP (UKIP took almost 25% of the national vote in the recent local elections). The Conservatives have been, under Cameron's stewardship, as anti-male and pro-feminist as the Labour administrations of 1997-2010.

J4MB intends in future elections to secure enough support in the marginal seats of whichever party is in power to reduce significantly the prospects of a second term in office for the party in question. If we're successful, we'll get men's human rights firmly onto the political radar in the UK for the first time, and the main parties will be forced to become less anti-male over time. We're going to do all we can to make that vision a reality.

We're planning to launch the local campaign in Bedford with a presentation at the Harpur Suite Bar, Bedford, 18 May, 15:00 – 17:00 (doors open 14:45). Admission £5.00, any surplus will go towards party funds. Attendance is strictly limited – just 25 people – so if people want to contact me beforehand to reserve a place, I invite them to contact me at mb1957@hotmail.co.uk.

The venue and time of the talk are being revealed in the local paper, The Times and Citizen, whose Hayley O'Keeffe recently interviewed me. I have no idea if the event will attract demonstrators, but I sincerely hope so. We'll be photographing and filming anyone trying to disrupt the event, or trying to dissuade people from attending it, and putting the images and footage on the blogs.

A small number of newspaper journalists and photographers will also be covering the event. Militant feminist demonstrations outside venues where men's human rights activists are scheduled to speak are proving to be PR disasters – the demonstration outside Warren Farrell's recent talk at the University of Toronto springs inevitably to mind – so the more militant feminists (along with their male puppets) who demonstrate outside this event, and future such events, the better. The more angry and vocal they are, the better. The good citizens of Bedford will soon learn that militant feminists are driven by misandry, and they have no evidence base to support their claims and arguments. They'll also learn that J4MB is driven solely by an interest in human rights, and our claims and arguments are underpinned by a rock-solid evidence base.

Onwards and upwards…

Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey: Episode 1

Dean Esmay · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Saturday 11 May 2013 marks the first episode of a new show to premiere here on A Voice for Men Radio: Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey (and her co-host Dean Esmay). The show airs Saturday May 11th at 4:00 pm (1600) London, England time, 11am Eastern US time. This show will be live and will include call-ins. Erin will be available to answer your questions about domestic violence and abuse, child abuse, shelter/refuge programs, feminism and its influence on the domestic violence industry, and more. We will also feature a guest reading by Girl Writes What.

We invite anyone with an interest in, or experience with, this subject to call in. Although the suggested theme for this week's show is "The Family Terrorist" (i.e. emotionally abusive and manipulative women, or men, who can terrorize and control an entire family), the format is pretty much open mic: if you want to talk about the subject of family abuse and violence, the mic will be open. We'll be talking and taking as many questions as we can, and we hope you can make it.

Erin will be the show host, I'll be her co-host/facilitator, James Huff will be producing and doing the back end, and we may have a guest caller or two. But what mostly will make this show happen is you and your calls.

Show musical tunes are Eternal Hope and Sunshine by Kevin McLeod, used under Creative Commons attribution license.

We dedicate this show to the memory of the late Earl Silverman.

Our current plan is to have this show every other Saturday in this same time slot.

We hope to see you there!

Jake Pentland, Alpha Dogstud, to Kick Elam's Ass

VFM News and Commentary · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Just a show reminder for tomorrow, for those interested. I will be appearing, along with Patrick Doran, aka, Mad Shangi, on the Jake Pentland show. It airs tomorrow at 1PM Pacific time.

Jake, son of the warm and fuzzy Roseanne Barr, has been strangely silent in the run up to the show, but has now proclaimed himself the "Supreme Alpha Male," who is going to "kick my ass" on the show.

He even put it on his show announcement.

Not to worry, after having a breakfast of Supreme Alpha Males (you can get them at Jack in the Box for 99 cents, you know), I will arrive at Jake's show so that his real education may begin. I will even bring a step ladder for him as that is the only way he is going to ever reach my ass.

What can I say, except that is how I roll.

Be there. This ought to be fun.

#rapeallwomen

Paul Elam · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

OK, do I have you attention now?

I am sure some of our readers quickly caught the pun in the title of this article. Others may be confused. Hint: It is not a hashtag related to mobilizing rapey-beaty guys to forcibly penetrate feminist clams on Twatter with anti-feminist, rapey-beaty twatty-tweets. No, no, no, I would not do such a thing, even if I had enthusiastic consent. And no David, it is not an endorsement of rape or "rape culture," though we both know that won't stop you from lying to your readers about it – all three of them if we count the ones who can read.

Pardon my ableist digression. I'll continue that at #rapetard.

What the title is mocking is the twending on Twatter of the hashtag #killallmen by a bunch of feminist twits who wanted to twat out their objections to patriarchy, capitalism, mud wrestling, page 3 girls and any other area where your average feminist can't compete.

It does deserve to be mocked, which means that I don't take it very seriously. Clarification. Do I think that some of these women want men dead? Oh sure. But I also think that their figuring out how to use a hashtag to say it was at the upper limits their abilities. I am betting most of them needed help from men to learn how to use a laptop or smart phone to begin with.

Taking that skill and saying something stupid with it is as far as most of them will ever get.

What is really entertaining here is the reaction from some feminists who are expressing their distaste for their sister twatter twins as proof they are fair and balanced. I don't believe it with Fox News and I don't believe it with them, either.

Our best example comes from Mary Elizabeth Williams over at Salon.com, who gives us the most Tweedledee-fucking-dumb analysis of the matter available on the net.

First, after the title to her piece advised us that tweeting about killing half the human race was "unfunny," her subtitle immediately took us to the wrong side of common sense:

> "A satire turns into a serious conversation — but mostly it's an excuse for both sexes to be obnoxious"

I love it. She is figuring out how to include men in the blame for this shit before the reader can even get to the first paragraph of her article. She figures this is both sexes being obnoxious? No, but she needed to in order to maintain some semblance of allegiance to the narrative that informs us that women are never solely accountable for what they think, say or do. Somewhere, even if you have to fabricate it, there is a man to blame. And Williams wastes no time in fabricating.

She is quick to point to the similar behavior in men who twatted out not so nice things about women. That is, after she went digging for it to find an example.

Let's take a look at this from the stats. Here is an image of the brief, slightly vigorous trending of #killallmen.

OK, so between 35 and 40 tweets an hour can't exactly compete with #Reddit, but it was still enough to capture the attention of Salon and other feminist blogs. In fact, it was their attention to it, not the hashtag itself that led to the article you are reading.

Now, let's take a look the same "trending" for one of the examples she cited as making this a sexually symmetric affair. In this case, #agoodwoman.

That is actually the trending for the same period as #killallmen. It only looks like Futrelle's EEG.

I would show you the rest of the results for Williams' examples, but I will save the trouble and the bandwidth and just ask you to imagine the same straight line a few more times.

It is no wonder that Williams's examples are so lame. She had to go back to a two and a half year old blog post to find them. Checking into the hashtag myself, I found a couple, actually one, really unsavory tweet on the first page of returns. It was was the distasteful utterance of #agoodwoman "lays down and takes it. LMFAO." Dumb and insulting for sure, though in my rapey-beaty mind it somehow does not rise to the level of killing everyone who isn't female. Call me cwazy.

Mostly the thread I read was replete with expressions like #agoodwoman "stays when the money goes," and "knows how to give a man space," and "is priceless." Should I have issued a trigger warning?

So, to summarize, a bunch of stupid asshat feminists on Twatter started a short term trend of vomiting out their hatred in such a blatant way that even slightly less stupid (perhaps) feminist asshats like Mary Elizabeth Williams knew they had to make some sort of at least feeble objection. She did so, making sure she watered down her admonishments sufficiently with a completely concocted frame job on men which she extracted pretty much out of thin air – or pulled out of her twatter if you prefer.

And she then imagines she has put icing on her cake of straw by pointing to what can only be described as a sane and rational response to this kind of blind hatred, as though it supports the idea that men have responded in kind to the hate:

It is reminiscent of Williams' last episode of fucktardery, where she actually listed the ways that feminists have undermined the amelioration of men's issues as proof that they hadn't.

I really do wish this is where it ended. I wish we could just close with how Williams is asserting how wrong all this hashtag business is, even while she acts like she is the only one allowed to complain about it.

However, Williams closes her article with an attempt to be poignant. She might even sound erudite and wise if you are completely clueless:

> Yeah, it's just a hashtag. But what happens when you reduce human communication to a microscopic number of characters is that you're not just going to oversimplify the bejesus out everything. You're also going to get a sometimes chillingly boiled down view into the human heart and mind. And in a world of institutionalized violence, casual sexism and daily micro-aggressions, creating a better, kinder world doesn't start with empowering women to be jerks.

Jerry Springer could not have said it any better, even if he were choking back forced tears and faking nobility after hosting and hour of trailer trash taking swings at each other for a howling audience of losers.

No, Mary Elizabeth, it isn't just about hashtags. If you have any interest at all in not empowering women to be jerks, then maybe you should start by not empowering them to be evil.

Instead of writing about a crew of nutcases that can barely handle a Twitter account without saying something stupid, why don't you write about Pamela O'Shaughnessy, the Ivy League educated attorney and Simon and Shuster novelist that blogs about reengineering men like they were "corn."

Why don't you write about Danielle Pynnonen, a child care worker who refers to the six year old boys in her care as "Mr. Rape Threat" and promises that if she had her way there would be hell for those boys to pay?

Why don't you write about Kat Pinder, a community development coordinator for the City of Perth in Australia and former U.K. Game show Big Brother contestant who writes that we need a national day for men to stay at home and be raped and beaten?

Why don't you write about Isabelle Moreira, a web developer in Curitiba, Brazil, who after wondering aloud if anyone really thinks hating men is a "bad thing," is reassured by one of her sisters with the words, "I am one of those bad, shameful feminists, who wish we just kill the fuckers (whether it's a practical tack to take or not)."?

Why don't you write about Mary Syrett, aka Mary Sunshine, a writer and member of the City of Kingston Arts Council in Ontario, Canada, who opines, well, shit, lemme just show you:

[image]

Is that fucking "unfunny" enough for you to write about it?

Why don't you write about Julie LeComte, a communications assistant for the French-Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Australia who wants, "violent social, political and military revolution," on a global scale, with the aim of exterminating men?

Why don't you try to answer even one of these fucking questions, Mary Elizabeth? You see, while you try to make your little splash at Salon, trying to show the world you're all Fox News fair and balanced and shit; that you will even rile the sistahs when decency is on the line, the real and true evil that festers in the underbelly of your ideology is alive and well and neglected – especially by people like you. You are doing it now, even as you put on the pretense of someone with a moral compass.

Please, spare us the false indignation over a handful of morons. Quit stepping up on their silly backs so you can act like you have had an attack of human dignity. You are not fooling anyone.

If you want a "better, kinder world," quit enabling those who are trying to create the exact opposite of that.

Quit trashing that world up with your lies.

Quit being one of them.

On May 10, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the only instance when the society seems to give a damn, at least sometimes, about men's lives – and that is when they are dead. It almost sounds like for this politically correct culture, a good man is a dead man.

After the Earl Silverman tragedy and the recent celebration of the World War II veterans, the Voice of Europe thinks it's time to discuss male death, and particularly the general perception with regards to it.

Please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

Men's rights are human rights, got that?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Rights are Human Rights –Got That?

Katie J.M. Baker, of Jezebel.com, has recently posted the following piece of threat-narrative propaganda:

http://jezebel.com/rape-and-death-threats-what-mens-rights-activists-rea-476882099

This article, as you will note, concerns the recent anti-male demonstrations at the University of Toronto. Please read the article carefully, and note the pattern, or rather sequence, which plays itself out.

First, an unabashed feminist acted like a dreadful pig. This feminist was captured on video and the video went viral on the internet, where the general population was exposed to it. A load of abusive and threatening comments were then directed at the feminist in question, or so we are told — but not all of this is clearly substantiated, let alone vetted for authenticity.

A number of feminist supporters claim that the senders of the abusive material were something called "MRAs", yet proof is never given. For example, it is not known how many, if any, of the senders actually called themselves "MRAs" as opposed to merely being deemed such.

Furthermore, the term "MRA" is never properly defined in such a way that we could know if the terminological application is appropriate. If we were told precisely what an "MRA" supposedly is in the first place, we might hazard a guess whether the abusive commenters were actually in that class of people.

But Katie J.M. Baker offers no definition of terms. Therefore, all we've got to go on, is what the phrase itself plainly intones. The acronym "MRA" is said to mean "men's rights advocate", namely, one who is outspoken upon the subject of men's rights. The phrase contains nothing more than that, which means we are not entitled to conclude that an "MRA" is "a person who makes abusive statements or threats". Nor are we entitled to conclude that an "MRA" is a "stalker" or anything else of that nature.

Nothing in the phrase "men's rights advocate" even faintly hints at abusing, threatening, or stalking. I trust that I have made this point clear. If you impute anything further to the phrase "men's rights advocate", then you are reading more than the plain intention of the text will allow.

Very well, I would submit that Katie J.M. Baker is simply attacking the idea of men's rights in itself. For whatever reason, the idea that men (and boys) might have "rights" just like other people, does not sit well with her. But of course, she does not care to pronounce this openly because it wouldn't sound very nice to say "I don't think that men and boys have rights." So as feminists typically do, Ms. Baker conveys this feeling circumspectly, through the use of doubletalk. Yes, when Ms. Baker conflates men's rights advocacy with abuse and harrassment, it is the worst kind of doubletalk I can imagine.

Let me put it simply. Either you believe that men have rights just like other people — namely, human rights — or you do not. It is just that simple. Even if you stuck the "MRA" tag to every abuser or misogynist on Earth, it would detract nothing at all from the stand-alone premise that men's rights are human rights. Yet Katie J.M. Baker is attempting something quite along this line — her logic (if you can call it that) comports perfectly with such a motivation, and scarcely at all with any other.

Although few if any of the abusive commenters were self-described "MRAs", it wouldn't matter one jot if ALL of them were. Even if every self-described "MRA" on earth were as bad as Ted Bundy, it would still make no difference. All that counts in the present discussion is the issue of "men's rights", and whether men are entitled to such. Everything else is extraneous baggage that needs to be thrown off the wagon.

Yes, if you agree that men's rights are human rights, it doesn't matter who says it. So if Ted Bundy said it, it would be no less true than if Jesus Christ said it.

But I would conclude that everything in Katie J.M. Baker's article is designed to mystify this point by use of an irrelevant diatribe. The impression I get is that Ms. Baker doesn't want men to have human rights, so if I am mistaken about that Ms. Baker had better speak up and make it clear to all the world.

Oh wait…..does this mean that I am harassing her?

Something else.The viral video has gotten over 300,000 views, only some of which generated comments. I mean, we are told only that "thousands" of comments arrived. However, of that number, not all would have been threatening or abusive. No doubt some of them were merely critical or insulting — which seems about right in view of the redhaired feminist's appalling behavior. I mean, she needed to get some flack, in the same way that a local peer group might apply corrective social pressure to one of its misbehaving members. After all, such things are right and proper, and the cyber-age plays this timeless game by a whole new set of rules. By the end of the day, redhaired feminist is not such a special snowflake that she can't take peer correction from the human community — she can jolly well suck it up and experience shame.

Bear in mind that the video would have gotten many views which generated no comments at all. So we are left to guess which percentage of those viewers were male human rights advocates. Remember, these viewers wrote nothing whatsoever — which hardly makes them threatening abusers. And yet they too could be described as "MRAs". Couldn't they? You bet they could.

Not that it matters. The principle that men's rights are human rights is axiomatic, eternal and uncorruptible. Isn't it? You bet it is.

So Katie J.M. Baker, please get busy and explain why you feel that men's rights are not human rights.

And no, this is not harrassment. It is peer correction from a fellow member of the human community. You owe us an answer, Katie. And for your own sake, I'd think that you would want to clear up any possible misconceptions. I mean, if we non-feminist men and women are wrong, this is your chance to tell us why we are wrong.

So let us hear from you.

Your opinion needed

VFM News and Commentary · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

After encountering some site management problems I have met with Alek Novy and team regarding the future, technically speaking, of this website. It is clear that after two years of using this particular theme it is rapidly approaching the time for a general overhaul. Quite simply, we have outgrown what the site is capable of and need to engage in some rebuilding. That will mean some cosmetic changes to the site's appearance, but much of the work will be internal.

For example, our commenting system is bulky and antiquated at this point, but we have had difficulty changing that in our current theme.

In looking ahead to the changes it also provides us an opportunity to make some adjustments to the way we approach some issues. Commenting is one of them. Your input on this is requested.

We have always walked a thin (and sometimes blurry) line between closing ranks among MHRAs in the comments — while we remain cognizant that fostering as much open discussion as possible not only provides a great way to vet ideas, but it also helps spread the message of this site, which is why we are here.

It has not always been an easy call, and I have to admit a strong bias toward making this a strictly MHRA friendly environment and a place where people, particularly men, can come without having to wade through a ton of "man up" and "eww, you hateful misogynist" comments, in order to read and exchange ideas with fellow MHRAs.

I am sure at times I have leaned too heavily in that direction, but to each his own on judging that one.

I bring this up now because with the upcoming changes to the site, one possible direction we may go is with a much more inclusive commenting system that allows features like direct, unregistered commenting from social network sites like facebook.

That is a two edged sword. On one hand, doing that has great potential for the viral marketing of AVFM. On the other hand, it will open the door to trolls, idiots and their hybrid children, feminists.

I am sure you see the dilemma.

So, we have a decision to make here, and I don't think it is appropriate to make it without your input. I am committed to setting aside my own thoughts on this one and going with a clear majority, should one emerge, from the people that have already bothered to register with the site an invest in commenting here. It is, after all, the house you built. You should have, as much as I am able to ascertain your collective wishes, the final say in how this goes.

So what shall it be, gents and ladies, open, come what may commenting, fostering an open environment complete with Einsteins and Frankensteins? Or the more predictable, safe, and perhaps less dynamic environment of the past?

We are going to start with the changes in a few weeks, so your input now will help a great deal in how we proceed.

Please take this opportunity to state your opinions. Even if a clear majority does not present itself, I intend to make a decision on this in a way that reflects the desires of those who chose to speak up as closely as I can.

Thanks for your considered opinions. PE

I am my father's daughter

Aimee McGee · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I am not a Daddy's girl.

I do quite literally owe him my life twice over – beyond the reproductive contribution of his gamete cells. Firstly, he was there at my delivery and realised this limp blue baby needed oxygen fast – so he removed the cord from my neck and gave me the kiss of life. Secondly, he saved me from a drowning accident at age 5, diving into the water with a suit and fancy shoes, as we were at a wedding.

My father is a flawed human being.

None of us realised how flawed until my parents separated just shy of their 40th wedding anniversary. We got the story of my father's infidelities from him, as there was a real risk that other family members would tell us, out of moral outrage. Over a decade later, we are still trying to work out how to live with the dynamic of our divorced parents – made harder by their clear and ongoing affection for each other, despite the hurt of the past and Dad being with "the other woman".

I treasure the times with my father now – which are infrequent as we live in different countries – as he gets older and more frail. I have to count each time potentially as the last we will spend together.

My Dad is a gentle soul. Being partially-sighted and ill-coordinated meant he did not fit a culture which venerates physical prowess. Along with this, he was wise from a young age to his father's drinking and mood swings (only identified as combat-related stress after his early death from alcoholism). His own childhood in England spanned the duration of the second world war, with his father serving away from home for much of the duration. He did have his grandfather present in his life, but this was a man of a different time – a man who was a harsh disciplinarian and who did not encourage physical affection. During my childhood, I seldom remember Dad's anger and know he fully supported my mother in the radical notion of raising children without physical discipline – my parents used "time out" well before it was a mainstream method for correcting bad behaviour.

Dad wanted us to know what he did for a job, and I have memories of walking through long echoing corridors of hospitals hand in hand with him. Him greeting the porters with the same polite and respectful tone he used speaking to the senior medics. He took us into the research areas and let us look in the windows of the operating theatres. We knew he worked hard, but he also made sure we understood our mother's work to run the home was equally valuable. Once I was well established at school he encouraged and supported Mum back into her professional field of work and was her biggest fan during the 20 years she used her professional qualifications.

Dad believed in his children and their ability to succeed, but was certain that we had to chose our own path. Many of his surgeon colleagues were horrified that my brother became a physician, yet Dad is immeasurably proud of his son's professional journey. With me, when he knew I had the ability to get the grades for medical school and was aware of the immense pressures I was getting to follow that path, he said "You must do what is right for you, but I worry that of all my children you need your sleep." Giving me his blessings, but seeing me with a clear insight as to what might be in my best interest. When we talk now about the work I undertake in a profession allied to medicine, he reflects that my career has been much more interesting and varied that medicine would have permitted me.

Despite my father's infidelities, I have no doubt he loved my mother. Human beings are complex, and I don't even try to understand what happened in their marriage – but I do know that there was genuine love and respect, because I saw it again and again in my childhood. I remember one of the first weekends Mum was away from home with work, and Dad getting us up really early so we could paint the dinning room in time for Mum coming back to surprise her. I don't think Mum would have chosen the warm butter yellow we decided on, but we got it done (with remarkably little paint spilled given it was an 10 year old and a 14 year old assisting), and that colour remained for the whole time we lived in the house.

Dad is aware of both his mortality and his disposability as an older man. His failing body frustrates him, and I was mindful to balance my need to look after him alongside his need for independence during our recent adventure together to Scotland to look into family history. I certainly enjoyed moderating my usual frenetic pace of life to more gentle one to allow him time to rest his body, while stimulating his mind in our efforts to track records of elusive ancestors.

Many feminists appear to have stories of fathers being abusive, oppressive or absent. My father is none of these. He was both a product of his generation and one of those who forged a path of true equality in marriage. His was the role model I have for loving men. For this gift, I can not thank him enough.

On our last evening in Edinburgh, we were walking to the theatre, my hand tucked into the crook of his elbow, walking in step with him standing tall and straight dressed in a long dark coat. I was there as the newborn, as the child rescued from drowning, as the daughter learning about equality from how he spoke to everyone. I was with him as the painting assistant, the student deciding a career, as the daughter seeing her parent's love and their marriage breakdown. I was there feeling both protected and cherished, and being the one to protect and support.

I am my father's daughter.

Feminist Tropes vs Monty Python's Flying Circus

August Løvenskiolds · 10 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Bit by bit, feminists seem to be waking up to the fact that without the support of men, their efforts to maintain their supremacy over those same men are doomed. A few of them, in their own feeble and febrile ways, are even, sort of, kinda, reaching out to men in general and M(H)RAs in particular.

So, in the hope of finding a common dialogue, I ventured out of my usual research haunts to see what issues are burning hot in the feminist world, and sure enough, they are sort of, kinda, silly: whereas men want to see our children, feminists want to ban Jello (jelly) wrestling. Whereas men want see reductions in the harmful effects of hypergamy, feminists want to ban Page 3 Girls, because God knows what will happen if we fail to demonize normal male sexual desire, and scantily dressed women who enjoy that desire.

Sometimes, in the face of feminist anger and anxiety against men, you've just got to back off and laugh in order to keep your sanity. The cool part about that is that humorless feminists cannot follow you since the silliness of their concerns doesn't translate well into manspeak.

So, I figured, perhaps we should sort of, kinda, reach back to feminists and adopt a silliness of thought in order to try to create a common language of communication – screaming at each other isn't cutting it, so maybe in silliness we can find common ground. The venerable Monty Python's Flying Circus put a silly spin on gender relations years before the arrival of second wave feminism, so here is my first crude attempt to engage feminism with metaphors and examples that they can understand.

The Fish Slap Dance

Let's dive right in, shall we?

Type "fish slap" into Google and the iconic, hilarious sketch pops right into view. What might not be obvious to newcomers to the MHRM are the undertones of domestic violence clearly displayed: after a series of weak but annoying fish-slap provocations from the smaller and sillier of the two performers, the larger, stoic performer retaliates in grand fashion.

The performers, John Cleese and Michael Palin, likely hugged and laughed their asses off after this brief sketch, which has been copied and reiterated many times, including a Swedish version where an old woman continues the chain of "violence":

But through the lens of feminism we can imagine a much grimmer, grimier outcome – the earlier provocations are ignored and the final definitive fish slap becomes an abusive act towards women. An arrest of the male "aggressor" (who was defending himself), protective orders, divorce, and loss of child custody rapidly ensue. In the feminist world, the small slaps continue indefinitely and the larger man is just supposed to take those assaults silently, and never counter them – even walking away would be characterized as abusive and childish, since the man would be rejecting the woman's weak attempts to use violence to bargain with patriarchy.

And yet, in less than 20 seconds, the video lays waste to the idiotic feminist trope that violence against women occurs unprovoked.

The Dead Parrot

The abdication of responsibility, and the shifting of agency onto men, is a hallmark of female/feminist strategy. An illustration of these themes can be found in the famed Dead Parrot sketch , which begins with the customer (played again by John Cleese) referring to the clerk (again, Michael Palin) as "Miss" instead of "Sir" – alerting us that even though the clerk is male, the behaviour being mocked is feminine.

Here's the sketch, in all its horrible, hilarious glory:

Here is a list of twenty of the clerk's (and other's) denials, evasions, and other refusals of responsibilities:

- No, No, it's resting, LOOK!
- No, it's not dead, it's resting.
- Remarkable bird, the Norwegian Blue. Beautiful plumage.
- No, No, it's resting.
- [Shoves cage] There! It moved!
- I did not [push the cage]!
- No, no, it's stunned!
- It's gotta be pining for the fjords.
- The Norwegian Blue preferred keeping on its back.
- Of course it was nailed [to the perch] or else it would've muscled up to those bars and BOOM.
- It's not, it's pining.
- Well, I'd better replace it, then…sorry, Gov, we're right out of parrots.
- I've got a slug.
- If you go to my brother's pet shop in Bolton, he'll replace your parrot for you.
- I don't have to do this, you know. I'm a qualified brain surgeon.
- It was a pun.
- No, not a pun, it was that other thing that reads the same, backwards and forwards.
- So, what do you want?
- [Finally, a policeman intervenes…]
- And now, frontal nudity.

Notice that when the clerk's own evasions fail, then family members, outsiders, and finally, the police and the media are brought to bear upon the defrauded dead parrot owner Cleese, who never finds satisfaction in his quest to right a wrong. He is disposed of as casually as feminists have always disposed of men they find troublesome – hell, this sketch could have been used as a training video for them except for the fact that their crude and cruel methods are being exposed for all the world to see.

The Marriage Counselor

Hypergamy, anyone? Combine that with blue pill disposability, and the you get the Marriage Counselor sketch, with the superb bombshell Carol Cleveland joining Palin and Eric Idle:

The hapless husband Arthur is oblivious to the betrayals of his wife and his counselor – his trust in them, and openness with his feelings has become so pathetic that the coupling of Counselor and Deirdre becomes inevitable. Notice that as Deirdre disrobes behind the screen, the amount of clothing she removes vastly exceeds the amount of clothing she was actually wearing – women of that era must have taken to carrying extra garments around in case a feminist jumped out of the bushes and screamed "burn your bra!"

Deirdre's panties (knickers) initially appear to be white (0:09), but are black when removed (2:34), indicating that her innocent status as wife was a ruse from the beginning.

Arthur becomes complicit in his wife's infidelities when he departs the room, only to be confronted by a Traditionalist telling him to Man Up. Unfortunately, his resolve fails him yet again, and he meets a gruesome death by giant cock.

The Funniest Joke

Well, feminists, what do you think – can we talk, or must this silliness continue?

Because more and more, it seems to me, that feminism has become the deadliest joke the world has ever known.

Robert Franklin · 11 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The extent to which the enormous power of the state can be used in the service of false allegations of domestic abuse made for the purpose of gaining an advantage in custody cases is on full display in the complaints by the Maine State Bar against Ellsworth prosecutor Mary Kellett. The case had been reported on numerous times by numerous sites, but seems to be coming to a head. The latest is that the Overseers of the State Bar have filed a complaint against Kellett seeking discipline against her by the Bar. She will file her response and the case will be heard and decided by a single member of the State Supreme Court.

As exhaustively detailed in the past, Kellett took allegations by Ligia Filler, wife of Vladek Filler, that he had sexually abused her and sought a conviction despite the fact that (a) the charges had been made in the course of child custody litigation, (b) the charges were unsubstantiated by any evidence apart from Ligia's word, (c) Ligia Filler was at the time mentally and emotionally unstable and (d) Ligia Filler had previously made unsubstantiated claims against Vladek.

Now, the canons of ethics for prosecutors demand that they assess all allegations of criminal wrongdoing for probable cause and decline to charge if there is none. Kellett ignored that canon and others. She took the case to trial and initially won a conviction, but was able to do so only by recourse to plainly unethical actions and others that violated the Maine Rules of Evidence. Most of that is detailed in the Bar Counsel's complaint. Despite the fact that gaining the upper hand in the custody case was Ligia's motive for making up the charges in the first place, Kellett objected to the introduction of any evidence regarding the custody case, and the judge agreed. Nevertheless, Kellett argued to the jury that there'd been no custody case and therefore that couldn't have been Ligia's motive. In short, she lied to the jury and violated the court's order.

Perhaps worse, Kellett refused to turn over important and possibly exculpatory evidence to Vladek's defense counsel. Attorney Daniel Pileggi requested numerous documents, audio and video recordings, statements by Ligia and Vladek Filler, police statements and the like as part of his preparation for trial. He requested these by letter on several different occasions, but Kellett simply ignored him, neither providing the requested information nor even acknowledging the request. Pileggi persisted. He filed motions. They were granted. Kellett ignored the court's order to produce the material. Finally, Pileggi simply subpoenaed the documents from the police. Amazingly, instead of simply complying with the subpoena (which is, after all, a court order, failure to comply with which constituted contempt of court) the police officer asked Kellett what he should do. Her response? Ignore it. And so he did.

All of that of course is the most egregious misconduct. When brought to light, the trial judge declared a mistrial which was upheld by an appellate court. Tried a second time, this time armed with the information Kellett had intentionally withheld, Vladek was acquitted of all the serious charges and only convicted of the misdemeanor of pouring a glass of water on his wife. Of course there was no evidence that he'd done so apart from her say-so, but as usual, that's sufficient. Amazingly, he was sentenced to serve 21 days in jail.

In the mean time, the family court had seen the obvious – that Ligia Filler was an unstable and abusive mother, whose allegations against Vladek were entirely without substance and made for the sole purpose of trying to separate a decent, loving father from his children. That attempt failed and Vladek was granted sole custody that he happily maintains to this day.

But Vladek Filler was never going to be satisfied with just a misdemeanor on his record and custody of his kids. He filed ethics charges against Kellett, something someone should have done long ago. Now, state bar associations are charged with maintaining discipline over their members which amounts to the fox judging other foxes. Unsurprisingly, a lawyer has to behave outrageously to be disciplined by a state bar. And that desire to protect their own was on full display at the first hearing into Vladek's charges against Kellett.

To begin with, the judge who sentenced Vladek to serve 21 days in jail, just so happened to schedule his jail time for the exact period in which the Kellett hearing would be held. What a coincidence! That meant that Vladek couldn't communicate with the state Bar Counsel and had to show up for the hearing in jail garb and fully manacled. To top it off, when he attempted to introduce into evidence a huge stack of information demonstrating a long pattern of prosecutorial abuse by Kellett, the Bar attempted to prevent it. Carletta Bossano, Kellett's boss, was present and attempted to have a guard physically remove Vladek from the witness stand before he could introduce his evidence. The attempt failed and the evidence was introduced, but the pro-attorney/anti-complainant nature of the affair was clear for all to see.

Eventually however, the Bar Counsel recommended that Kellett be disciplined for her multiple and severe violations of the canons of ethics, the rules of evidence and court orders. We'll soon find out if she will be.

To read the allegations against Kellett by the Overseers of the Maine State Bar is to receive one message loudly and clearly: for Mary Kellett, this was business as usual. Most obviously, time and again, over the course of a year, she simply ignored the requests for information from Vladek's attorney. She didn't call him, didn't write him a letter, didn't file a response in court. Nothing. When he got a court order, she ignored that too. Once he'd been convicted, Vladek himself asked the police for the same documents, audio and video tapes, etc. and they gave it all to him. In other words, Kellett could have turned the information over to Pileggi easily, but she chose not to.

More outrageously still, she actively intervened to stop them from doing so when the police asked if they should turn the material over. The former is a clear violation of the code of ethics governing prosecutors, but the latter is a crime. It's tampering with a witness and Kellett should go to prison for it.

But whatever happens with that matter, it's all too plain that what Mary Kellett did in Vladek Filler's case, she's done countless times before and gotten away with it. She's received no discipline from either courts or her superior, Carla Bassano. Nothing else explains her cavalier dismissal of every one of Pileggi's requests. Nothing else explains her ignoring of the court's order. And nothing else explains (a) why a police officer would ask her whether to comply with a subpoena and (b) her casual instructions to him to ignore it.

And sure enough, she's managed to take to trial allegations of sexual impropriety against men that were every bit as flimsy as those against Vladek Filler. The courts' records are replete with Kellett cases in which a man was tried when there was either no evidence against him or what there was was so patently weak that the charges were dismissed.

Mary Kellett is a woman who will take any charge to trial as long as it's a charge of sexual wrongdoing and it's against a man. The website A Voice for Men reports here that at least three such charges have been dismissed in this year alone, with more doubtless to come. Mary Kellett needs to find a new job. The judge hearing her case should disbar her. Mary Kellett is not a prosecutor, she's a political operative. She's a feminist who never met an innocent man. She's a serial abuser of the power the State of Maine places in her hands.

Finally, it must be noted that Kellett's history of wrongdoing comes against a backdrop of prosecutorial abuse that seems to have reached epidemic proportions. Just last year, documentary filmmaker Ken Burns' piece on the "Central Park Five" roiled the waters of public opinion, and rightly so. There, five minors who were entirely innocent of the brutal crime – the rape and beating of a female jogger in New York's Central Park – were coerced into pleading guilty to the crime. No DNA evidence connected them to the crime and their confessions bore little resemblance to the objective facts of the offense. All this was known to prosecutor Elizabeth Lederer, but she went ahead anyway. Meanwhile, the real perpetrator, a serial rapist, walked around free as a bird.

More recently, Brian Banks was released from prison after serving five years for a crime that he not only didn't commit, but that never occurred. A young woman claimed he'd raped her and again, without any evidence, a prosecutor was able to browbeat a young man into pleading guilty. His false accuser was handed almost $1 million as compensation for her "trauma" and, now that she's admitted she made the whole thing up, no one has lifted a finger to get her to pay it back.

Then there was the infamous Duke Lacrosse case. What happened to prosecutor Mike Nifong should happen to Mary Kellett. He did just what she's done – withhold exculpatory evidence and proceed against a defendant on charges for which there's no evidence. Into the bargain, Nifong's complainant bears some resemblance to Ligia Filler in that both are mentally unstable and had clear ulterior motives for leveling the charges they did.

The epidemic of prosecutorial misconduct is far too vast to describe in detail. But suffice it to say that allegations of sex crimes and those of domestic violence play a leading role in it. Those are almost invariably aimed at men, usually fathers. They're often done to gain the upper hand in custody cases and the entire process is enthusiastically supported by feminist organizations and feminist ideology that hold that women rarely lie about abuse and that men are genetically and culturally programmed to abuse. My guess is that Mary Kellett is a true believer of both.

That unholy alliance of state power and feminist ideology constitutes a grave danger to the men of this country, particularly fathers. As such, it likewise constitutes a grave danger to the children of this country because one of its major aims is the removal of children from those fathers. It's a bullet aimed directly at the heart of this society and culture. It barely missed Vladek Filler. Most targeted men aren't so lucky.

...and why it's nothing To Be Proud Of

I would like to praise Liz Hodgkinson for her article in the Daily Mail today entitled 'We Fought for Equality. So Why Do Greedy Wives Still Sponge Off Their Ex-Husbands?'

It's a question I've often wondered about, in spite of my own experiences. You see, when my father left my mother back in 1995, with three children to support and a mortgage to pay, he withdrew every single penny from the family savings, meaning my mother could not pay our mortgage, meaning we eventually had to move into corporation housing.

Not content with this level of douche-baggery, he dropped completely out of sight, and changed his name to avoid paying child-support. My mother never saw a penny of support from him because no-one could pin him down – he moved like quicksilver.

Now you would have thought seeing my own mother struggle for years, I would be up on my chair, screaming 'YOU GO GIRL' every time someone screwed a huge settlement out of their ex-husband.

Wrong.

I think it's disgusting. Because I'm a sensible human being who realises no other man has to be punished for my father's behaviour. Whats more, I feel that there is a significant moral degradation present in anyone who takes more than what they are actually entitled to. I'm talking about those 'I'm entitled to a percentage of your future earnings FOREVER AND EVER' women.

That's right – forever and ever. Even if you had nothing to do with setting up his successful business enterprise. Even if you didn't work a goddamn day to help him make that money for 25 years.

You are entitled to earn off his future earnings. Even if you are no longer together? Even if you don't have children?

How can those women look at themselves in the mirror in the morning? What's more how is this possible by law?

I told my own husband just the other evening during a debate on this very issue:

'Even if there was a point where I hated you so much that I could barely bear to look at you, if I took more than I'd put in, more than was actually mine, I would consider that I had failed as a human being.

And how on earth could I justify grabbing at your future earnings? In that situation, if I didn't want you, I wouldn't want your money either.'

And I mean it.

'These men are just giving us what they owe us – you take what you can get'. Oh do me a favour – is this equality we're talking about?

Because it seems like damned greed to me.

And it's nothing to be proud of.

Here's Liz Hodgkinson's article in full. It's worth a read:

Becoming radical Nazi: On Jewish violence

Lucian Vâlsan · 12 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is a modified version of the article published by Louise Pennington in the Huffington Post UK on April 30.

We just replaced the words "women, feminism and male" with the respective "Aryans, Nazism/National-socialism and Jews/Jewish" and made some other contextual arrangements to sound exactly as the original.

I take that Carla Buzasi's response to my letter is to just get more bigoted, hateful misandric individuals to write articles in the pages of the Huffington Post UK.

I have always been a Nazi. It is a label I chose for myself as a teenager, back before Aryan power was invented and when New Kids on the Block were cool. My original Nazism was about equality: Aryans were equal to Jews and all we needed was the laws to force Jews to stop being Jews. The older I get, the more I believe that 'equality' is nothing more than a smokescreen to prevent the true liberation of Aryans. Equality before the law means nothing when violence is endemic; when Aryans are most likely to live in poverty; when no one bothers to actually enforce the existing equality legislation. I grew up in an area of Canada where Jews, race and class should have been impossible to miss but I did. We grew up with serious cases of cognitive dissonance; where Orthodox Jewish was the norm and Nazism didn't exist. It was a great place to learn that as a middle class white Aryan my chances of being a victim of sexual violence were a lot lower than working class Aryans but that was seen as normal, not something to be upset about. I may have labelled myself a Nazi but I wasn't a real Nazi.

I was a Nazi who lacked any kind of analysis of Aryans as a class. I didn't understand that Nazism was a political theory. I knew I couldn't have gotten through university as a teenage single mother without the benefit of a, still flawed, welfare system but I didn't realise just how privileged I was; even with a student loan debt that would make British students cry! It wasn't until the Canadian federal and provincial governments started slashing these programs that I started thinking about Nazism as a political theory. I started self-defining as a national-socialist, but I still didn't think about Aryans in terms of an oppressed class. Instead, I focused on the idea of class, in Marxist terms, as a barrier for 'some' Aryans. I assumed that equal access to education and equality before the law would solve all Aryans' problems.

I was wrong.

Nazism requires more than equality. It requires liberation. It requires the liberation of ALL Aryans from Jewish violence.

Until two years ago, I would have still identified as a national-socialist, although my awareness of the structural oppression of Aryans was growing. The unrelenting Judaism and Jewish apologism on the left made me reconsider my political stance as did the creation of the National-Socialist/Aryans' Rights board on Mumsnet. The more I read on Mumsnet, the more radical my Nazism became. I started reading Andrea Dworkin, Natasha Walters, Kate Millett, Susan Faludi, Susan Maushart, Ariel Levy, Gail Dines, Germaine Greer, and Audre Lorde. I learned about cultural Aryancide and I started reading only fiction books written by Aryans: Isabel Allende, Alice Walker, Maya Angelou, Kate Mosse, Margaret Atwood, Kris Radish, Barbara Kingsolver, and Andrea Levy amongst many others. I started reading about Aryans' lives and the power of real Aryan collectivist bond.

My Nazism, both the definition and activism, has changed dramatically over the past 18 years. Now, I self-define as an anti-capitalist, pro-national socialist as I believe that the source of Aryans' oppression is Jewish violence which is perpetuated by the structures of our capitalist economy. The Jewish Oligarchy may predate capitalism but we cannot destroy it without destroying capitalism too. I don't always feel a 'real Nazi' or a 'good enough' Nazi. All I know is that I am a Nazi who truly believes that Aryans have the power to liberate all Aryans from Jewish violence; that national-socialism is fundamentally about the power of the Aryan collective.

My national-socialist activism involves privileging Aryans' voices over Jewish voices. I now only read books written by Aryans. I try to get my main news from Aryans' news sites and Aryan journalists like Soraya Chemaly, Samira Ahmed, Bidisha, Helen Lewis, Bim Adewunmi, and Sarah Smith. I follow only Aryan journalists on Twitter and Facebook. I support organisations which are placing Aryans' experiences at the centre of public debate: Aryans Under Siege, The Everyday Judaism Project, and The Aryans' Room UK.

My national socialism acknowledges the realities of intersectionality and, whilst I'm not perfect, I am more aware now of how disparate Aryans' experiences are from one another. I still believe that Aryans, as a political class, have the ability to liberate ourselves from the Capitalist-Jewish Oligarchic system but I do so with the knowledge that I do not yet fully understand the full impact of the multiple oppressions in Aryans' lives. My Nazism is a journey. The destination is the full liberation of Aryans but we are all on different paths and at different points. My Nazism requires I listen to my fellow Aryans and support them in the ways they deem best. My Nazism is Aryan-centered.

National-socialists have the power to change the world. It requires listening and respect but we have the power to save each other; after all the largest study on global violence against Aryans has conclusively proved that national-socialists hold the key to positive change for Aryans.

Open Letter to Symantec/Norton/O2 on Censorship

Tom Golden · 13 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It has been brought to my attention that my web site, Men Are Good, has been listed as a hate site by internet corporate giants Symantec and O2. This is a preposterous claim.

I have been working with men for many years as a mental health professional. During that time I have specialized in learning, and then teaching other mental health professionals, about the uniqueness of a man's way of processing emotions. I have written three books on the topic and have appeared on CNN, the CBS Evening News, the Washington Post, the New York Times, and many others. I have presented workshops in the United States, Europe, Canada, and Australia teaching mental health professionals about men's uniqueness. When NFL Films chose to do a documentary on the America's National Football League and Grief, they called me in as their expert. The show ran on both ESPN and the NFL Network.

It was through this work in understanding men that I first began learning of the places where men face discrimination and hardship for simply being men. It was crystal clear that men in emotional pain were routinely ignored and expected to figure it out on their own, while women were instantly offered support and understanding by men and women alike. The emotional pain of men was a taboo subject, while a woman's pain was a call to action for everybody. I started bringing these discrepancies to the attention of the public and found out very quickly that people simply didn't want to hear about it. Not only was there very little interest, the media was complicit in their stories to be sure to focus on females in need and not males.

As the years went on I started seeing other areas where men faced discrimination and hardship. Places like family courts, domestic violence treatment, false accusations, health care, and many more. Again, it was clear that the public was allergic to these issues when it came to the needs of men, no matter how true they might be. They were supported by a media that stuck to the politically correct theme of women as victims in need of help and men as the problem.

Then along came the internet and suddenly there was a voice for men that came alive. Sites were popping up daily to bring awareness to the discrimination and hardship of men and boys. Now, even without the help of the media the word was getting out, no matter how much people didn't want to hear about it.

Then along comes Norton/Symantec, and O2, who decide that those sites that are voicing the needs of men aren't really voicing the needs of men, they are hateful, dangerous even!

We have seen this before. It's the same turning of the head we have seen from the media for years, now it's just a little different–and much more lethal. The free speech of humanitarian activists is being silenced by a group that is hidden from view and exercises control over the lives of others from behind a screen. No voting about this, no discussion about this, no notes sent to site owners about this, no rules that map out what can and can't be done. No. Just a silent and invisible group that imposes their will and judgements upon millions. I will avoid drawing the obvious comparison.

I am asking you to please remove my site from this list immediately. If you choose to not do so I think it is only fair that you let me know what violations I have committed that justify classifying a humanitarian effort as hatefulness.

I would also ask that you do the same for the other men's sites listed below that you have dubbed hateful. Either take them off the list or explain exactly why they are there.

Pardon our dust!

VFM News and Commentary · 13 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Good morning, afternoon or evening, as the case may be, depending on where you are on the globe. As you may have noticed over the last few days there has been a slight slowdown in the number of articles. Please pardon the inconvenience but in the long run there will be a payoff for it.

We have just contracted a web development firm out of New York, at considerable expense I might add, to rebuild the AVFM theme from the inside out. I hate to spend a dollar that I don't have to, especially your dollars, but this is a necessary move up for us. And it will be worth it.

What you will see at the end will address many of the concerns we get about site functionality. After the job is done, which is estimated to take 12-14 days, you will see things like deeper embedding of comments that allow you to have longer exchanges on the site, along with more functional, enhanced comment editing and other improvements.

The site will also be faster and more responsive.

You may already be seeing some of the changes taking place.

We could have gone a much cheaper route, but this is one of those things that needs to be done right the first time, so we secured a tested, well established firm to do the work.

There will also be some aesthetic changes to the site that I am very excited about. Those changes will be made after the upgrading is complete.

As we continue to work on the development of the men's issues groups with our associates at NCFM while we are overseeing this project, along with other activism that is in the works for the Filler case, this will mean a general slowdown of content for a short period of time. Your patience while this is happening is most appreciated.

We will try to make at least one post a day.

When all is said and done, you will be proud of the results. The best men's rights website on the net will be that much better, and so will your experience using it.

On an unrelated side note here, please be advised that a women's organization, unitedwomen.org, on Facebook has become upset by one of the AVFM memes that has made its way around the internet. They are responding with the usual ignorance, hatred and hysteria over the idea that we might take false allegations of rape as a serious issue.

If you have a moment today, you might want to stop by and register your thoughtful comments with them, here.

And don't forget to LIKE AND SHARE their post. This is great advertising for us.

Again, thanks to all for your patience. And a special thank you to all those who contribute some of your hard earned money to A Voice for Men. We are putting that money to work right now to make this an even better place to be. PE

SAVE challenges media coverage of Kellett scandal

How Well is the Media Covering the Kellett Prosecutor Scandal?, SAVE Asks

WASHINGTON / May 14, 2013 – Three weeks ago a state ethics board issued a long-awaited report highly critical of Hancock Co. prosecutor Mary Kellett. Now a victim advocacy group is asking, Why have only two local media outlets covered the historic story?

Following a two-year investigation, the report is viewed as historic because the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar, charged with enforcing legal ethics codes, has never previously recommended the disbarment of a standing prosecutor.

On April 24, 2013 the ethics panel released a report showing assistant district attorney Mary N. Kellett ignored a court order, suppressed evidence, misled the jury, and engaged in "conduct unworthy of an attorney." The report petitions the Maine Supreme Judicial Board to impose "appropriate disciplinary sanction" on ADA Kellett (1).

But three weeks later, only two media outlets, WABI TV and the Bangor Daily News, have provided coverage of the milestone story (2, 3).

SAVE notes the Kellett investigation has garnered extensive national media attention. Following release of the April 24 ethics report, two lengthy editorials appeared in national venues: "Discipline Case Against Prosecutor Mary Kellett Heating Up" (4) and "Filler Case Nearing Conclusion, Perhaps" (5). Over 10,000 persons have viewed accounts of the story on social media pages, as well.

SAVE invites reporters, editors, producers, and other media representatives to review the timeline of events (6), which raises the worrisome question of whether ADA Kellett charged the wrong person with the crime.

"When a Hancock County man was charged with spousal assault, media outlets provided wall-to-wall coverage," notes SAVE spokesman Howard Goldman. "But when an overly zealous prosecutor is found guilty on multiple counts of unethical conduct, local media outlets seem to dawdle."

SAVE filed a 9-page ethics complaint in 2011 alleging numerous instances of prosecutor misconduct (7). Over 1,400 persons have signed a petition calling for the disbarment of the prosecutor (8).

AVFM News and Activism: Gary Costanza

James Huff · 14 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have as our guest intactivist Gary Costanza. Gary has done work with Intaction, a group that has done good work to bring to the public's attention the atrocities being committed in Africa. In March of this year they gained notoriety when they disrupted an event being attended by both Bill and Chelsea Clinton in which there was a heated exchange. We will also be talking about the recently formed African Circumcision Advisory Committee and the launching of it's new website. Things are about to heat up around the circumcision issue as we take action and do ever more to bring much needed scrutiny to the circumcision campaign in Africa

The show starts at 8pm Central Time on May 14th.
That's 2am in London on May 15th.

Time to ditch the rape advocates

Paul Elam · 14 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Unitewomen.org, with the obligatory but disingenuous subtitle "Equality for all," is still in the middle of a hysterical fit on Facebook over an A Voice for Men meme that targets false rape allegations.

To clarify, no one to my knowledge associated directly with A Voice for Men created the meme, but it is a fine piece of work and I wholly support the message it carries. Whoever did it has my thanks:

Click to enlarge
This image recently came under attack by the Facebook group affiliated with unitewomen.org. Over the past 24 hours there has been a veritable conniption fit of collective outrage by feminists there who see the meme as victim blaming. How they actually decided that speaking out against falsely accusing men of sexual assault was blaming the actual victims of rape is never explained. I put in an inquiry to that effect and my question was deleted and I was banned from the page.

Subsequently I witnessed many, many individuals show up to the page and pose similar questions, only to see those questions also disappear as the orgy of irrational anger and emotional reasoning from the women continued.

Their comments in reaction to the meme run a progression from mild delusion to, well, false allegations. There was some initial anger from members there directed at the pages admin, because they apparently did not bother to read the "trigger warning" and figure out that the meme was posted in order to condemn A Voice for Men.

"Why would UniteWomen share this??? We all know that false rape claims rarely happen," asked Debi Boggs.

Lauren Sullivan asked, "[A]nd…what's the point? Why is this out there-sponsored by UNITE WOMEN?"

"I really don't think this is the problem we need to focus on. I thought this campaign was about empowering woman, this is NOT a positive message," lamented Karen Tyler Boelts.

The admin to the page had to do a lot of corrective work to get their members to actually read the page's message that was posted with the meme. Once they made sure everyone knew who to be mad at, comments replete with neurotic energy amped up quite a bit.

Diane Blake Harper harrumphed, ""A voice for men" as if they don't already control nearly all of the voices we ever hear. Sick," generated 95 "likes". Inspired by Harper's razor wit and cultural acumen, others joined the fray.

Opportunistic sycophant Brian Exclamation Marx Duff, drew 65 likes and initiated a 44 comment sub-thread with the rhetorical slam dunk," If it was "advoiceformen"[sic] why doesn't the voice ever say "don't rape"?

Ba da da bump!

Not to be outdone in obsequiousness by his male competition on the page, Phil DeKane wanted to establish himself as senior servile by proclaiming, "Sorry, ladies. Many of my fellow men are dumb. (But you probably knew that already)"

Oh Phil, you silver tongued devil. I bet you get all the girls.

From there, things continued to escalate, as those who were allowed to express an opinion escalated themselves up the histrionic ladder all the way to the top rung.

Heather Lewis decried, ""Don't be THAT girl." Word choice makes it clear this is misogynistic bullshit."

The message from Tanya Hadlock-Piltz was even more ominous. "Don't be that girl = a message of silence. This as is slap in the face to all the women who have dared to speak out against the men who assaulted them."

Not only is the meme victim blaming, it slaps women in the face! It commands the silence of (female) rape victims!

That is what being concerned about false allegations really is!

Nelli Korzhenkova added another stinger at AVFM. “The people on avoiceformen.com really hate women, feminism isn’t about hating or putting men down.”

Whoa Nelli!

And then it got really toxic. Jen Larkin said, in response to a woman who actually offered a bit of a challenge that was allowed to remain up,” Not only are you pretending that the number of false reports is significant because “it happens,” you use misogynist dog whistles to gaslight anyone who says otherwise. How much energy do you typically spend protecting rapists from their victims?”

Who can beat logic like that? After all, just because something “happens” doesn’t mean you should try to do anything about it. Right, Jen? Surely anyone who wants to do anything about something that happens must be a protector of rapists.

Kari Briggs even found a way to blame victims of false allegations. “Here’s some advice for men; if you are so worried about being falsely accused of rape, don’t invite women that are “drunk, wearing very little clothing, and slathered in pheromones” into your bedroom.”

Guess that rules out your girlfriend after drinking a glass of wine and putting on a negligee.

There are several hundred comments on the thread, and dealing with any more of them would only risk a case of rage redundancy, but I do want to address one more comment in particular. It comes from Rachel Jonitis, who has the following to say:

> This is ridiculous. I 100% acknowledge that there are women out there that have consensual sex and then cry rape. However, in the military, this is the exact kind of thing men say to shut women up, and for those that know, rape and sexual assault is a HUGE issue in the military, but very well covered up and swept under the rug.

Oh yes, Rachel. Rape and sexual assault are huge issues in the military. MASSIVE. In fact, the Washington Times just did an article on it. The headline reads, “False reports outpace sex assaults in the military.”

Before the fur (and accusations) start to fly, let me state for the record that we used up all of our misogynistic, gas lighting dog whistles over on Facebook. And we do not have the resources to implant women hating, silencing rapist protectors in the mainstream media.

The problem here though is actually the same problem that unitewomen.org has with the meme. It addresses something that is “happening.” And it is supported, not with fits of pearl clutching and endless OMGs, but with this other little pesky set of items. Around here we call them facts.

From the Washington Times article:

> From 2009 to 2012, the number of sexual abuse reports rose from 3,244 to 3,374 — a 4 percent increase.
> During the same period, the number of what the Pentagon calls “unfounded allegations” based on completed investigations of those reports rose from 331 to 444 — a 35 percent increase.

It doesn’t stop there. “In the course of conducting interviews with commanders, I heard time and again complaints about female service members making sex-related allegations which proved unfounded,” said Robert Maginnis, a retired military analyst at the Family Research Council. “Not only do some women abuse the truth, but it also robs their commanders from more important, mission-related tasks.

The Times quoted him even more extensively. “Female service members told me that some women invite problems which lead men on and then result in advances the woman can't turn off. Too often, such female culpability leads to allegations of sexual contact, assault and then the women feign innocence."

And how is the military handling this? Well, just like our new best friend Rachel Jonitis said they were; by the problems being "very well covered up and swept under the rug." Only we are talking about rape lies here, not rapes.

Elaine Donnelly of the Center for Military Readiness came out and pointed a finger directly at the Pentagon.

"Unsubstantiated accusations remain a significant problem, but the SAPRO (Sexual Assault Response and Prevention Office) is doing nothing about it," she said. "I went through both volumes and found no evidence of concern about the significant 17 percent of 'unfounded accusations.' Something should be done to reduce the numbers of false accusations, the first step being an admission that the problem exists."

Don't count on unitewomen.org to help you, Ms. Donnelly. Or anyone else for that matter except A Voice for Men and Pierce Harlan.

And therein lies the problem. The dialogue about sex crimes in western culture is still controlled by gender ideologues with absolutely no investment in ameliorating the problem of sexual assault. In fact, a sensible examination of their tactics bears out the reality that they are invested more in perpetuating rape than ending it.

With the use of social hysterics, misandry, denial and demonization of those who attempt to address the false rape problem, they maintain a paradigm that defines any concerns about false allegations as misogyny and rape culture apologia.

And this presents a problem significant enough that it mandates I refrain from any snarky shots at the type of individuals we are talking about, no matter how tempting. These people are a serious social malignancy.

Assuming (erroneously) for a moment that rape is something that only happens to women at the hands of men, false allegations present one of the biggest obstacles to efforts to serve victims. False allegations squander investigative and other police resources on wild goose chases, both in military and civilian life. In another event that the ideologues at womeunite.org would dismiss as irrelevant at best, rape support at worst, the Orlando, Florida Police Department had to issue a public plea for women in that community to stop the false reporting of sexual assaults. It was becoming such a drain on police services that the police force took their concerns directly to the public.

False allegations undermine the credibility of real victims. In an age where ideological advocates for addressing the problem of rape can be counted on chant incessantly about the issue of women failing to come forward for fear of not being believed, the most certain way to perpetuate that problem is by forcing society's head in the sand about the problem of rape liars.

The fear of not being believed is a rational one when people are forced to act like they believe all victims whether they do or not; and whether the alleged victim is credible or not. Anyone who has ever acquainted themselves with the details of the Vladek Filler case, or any one of hundreds, perhaps thousands of others, and who knows just how bad the systemic handling of false allegations really is, is going to be more likely to take the next "victim" they hear about with a grain of salt.

The only way to prevent these lies is to provide consequences for telling them. But all the threats to punish in the world are meaningless in a society that cannot acknowledge that the lies are being told in the first place. We can't fix problems that are being swept under the rug in order to appease the irrational squeaky wheels that infest the rape advocacy movement.

Accepting the narrative of organizations like womenunite.org and a host of other groups is like accepting the narrative of a flat earth or a moon made of cheese. They are failing the victims they purport to serve, and failing them miserably, because they have reduced a complex social issue, one that demands sound analytical skills and matured reasoning, reducing the matter to a grab bag of emotional sound bites that are force fed with bullying and censorship.

As I alluded to briefly before, we have not even begun to address the largely ignored problem of male victims and children that are the targets of female pedophiles.

There is a great deal yet to do in order to address the problem of sexual assault and abuse in this culture. We will likely never end all of it, but we certainly could make much greater strides than we have so far.

The sad reality, however, is that if we want to address the problem of rape the first thing we need to do is get the rape advocates out of the way.

Houston, we have a solution

Paul Elam · 15 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I wanted to present a link here to an article that is running my hometown newspaper, the Houston Chronicle. Ken Chitwood, a Houston journalist with the apparently quirky and uncommon trait of wanting to present balanced information, wrote a piece about women in the secular movement.

http://blog.chron.com/sacredduty/2013/05/female-atheists-fight-for-equality-in-freethought-movement/

To be clear there were a lot of deficits in the story he told, so I made a comment and suggested that there was a bigger picture happening than the one he was telling.

His response was to thank me for the input and include a link to AVFM in the article, as well as in the tags.

PZ Myers showed up later in the comments doing his regular ad hom shtick, trying to make sure that Chitwood felt a sting for including diverse opinions, or anything else that PZ would disagree with, in his story. The journalist handled Myers with deftness and clarity.

A rep of the slymepit.com, which had already been mentioned in the article, showed up via email to clarify their position, and do a little PZish name calling of his own – like Myers he dropped insinuation and opinion about AVFM like it was known fact.

I post this here because it is important. We stay very occupied around here with what is happening on college campuses and in courtrooms across the western world. But the fact is that a battle continues to rage in the online secular community. On one hand, you have rational thinkers that want to keep their communities free of ideology and open to discourse from a variety of voices. And then you have PZ Myers, Rebecca Watson and their ilk, bent on establishing an orthodoxy of disinformation and agitprop, silencing anyone who gets in the way. Well, where they can silence people, anyway.

Their influence is shrinking as time goes by, much to the dismay of those who want everyone in the secular community to feed in to the feminist hysteria of victimhood and damseling – looking for special considerations.

Comments are open on this article. And PZ has already made a post calling in the flying monkeys of FTB to go in and harass Chitwood.

Please make your comments courteous and to the point. Thanks! PE

In defence of Patton Oswalt

Elly Tams · 15 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Earlier this week I watched (for the first time) American TV Show Justified, about a cop working in small town Kentucky, amidst gangsters, drug dealers and evangelical Christians. The episode I watched featured a great guest performance from well known American comic Patton Oswalt. He and his co-star played a lovely Stan and Olly routine as they bungled their way through some dodgy moonlighting police work, destined to go wrong.

The next thing I knew Oswalt was the subject of a Salon article by Molly Knefel chastising him for failing to speak out against rape and violence against women. Oswalt had previously defended Daniel Tosh against a feminist blogger who slammed him for making rape jokes. Feminists are angry with him for showing empathy for the victims of the Boston bombings, but not for women who are raped or assaulted (- only by men of course. I don't think this row is about lesbian rape). Knefel wrote in Salon:

[image]"What is challenging, though, is speaking out against the normalization of sexual violence, the degradation of women, and the role and responsibility that men have in either perpetuating or combating rape culture."

Then over on twitter Oswalt got more stick for what? Not getting down on his knees and confessing his sins to the Good Lady of Feminism?

I am annoyed about how the feminists have picked on an individual man in the public eye, and seem to be taking him to task for a complex socio-cultural set of issues in society. He's just a guy who makes jokes. He's not Obama or Bono – he hasn't set himself up as a spokesman or a moral crusader. But more so I am annoyed that feminist writers are peddling a narrative – again- about men, those dirty dogs, and women those poor innocent damsels. It's very Mills and Boon in a funny kind of way. As I said in what became a rather "controversial' article" – Rape Culture and Other Feminist Myths:

"My instinct is that holding onto special victim status has some pay offs for feminists. They can continue to present gender politics as a binary opposition between men (potential rapists) and women (perpetual potential victims of rape). Basically, the concept of rape culture is misandrist, and it does not allow for the fact that women are sometimes perpetrators of sexual assault, and men are sometimes on the receiving end."

I am glad Patton Oswalt stood up for himself to a degree, and didn't let the feminist mob walk all over him. But I hope that one day, a high profile man (or indeed woman, or anyone who identifies however) actually takes on the myth of "rape culture" and challenges the nasty misandry that underpins it. Women rape too. Men can be victims of rape. Violence in our culture has more men victims as a whole than women. More men commit suicide and suffer injuries at work than women. The "rape culture" schtick is WRONG.

I of course say this often. But when I speak out against feminist rape culture fantasies, many people attempt to "silence" me. I had my Rape Culture myths piece taken down from The Good Men Project, and when I questioned feminist versions of rape culture over at cyborgology blog, my comments were deleted and I was chastised for being "unscholarly." But it's the dodgy statistics, misandry and – yes – hysterical premises of feminism's precious "rape culture" that is unscholarly.

Yes Patton Oswalt has a "platform." But so does feminism. And when it comes to gender issues any man is at risk of being sent to the wolves if he speaks out of line. I believe any subject should be fair game for comedy. And I'll be taking suggestions for jokes about feminists at the usual address. We could start with this lovely lady as inspiration:

So long, Arty Goldwag

Arthur Goldwag of the Southern Poverty Law Center has, somewhat belatedly, jumped on the most recent bandwagon of feminist disgraces by stepping over the dead body of Earl Silverman to carry water for rent-seeking gender ideologues.

In doing so, he blatantly mischaracterizes and misrepresents Earl's life and experiences. He quotes individuals who were frustrated by Earl's efforts at every turn as though they were reliable informants about the man's state of mind and his intentions. Goldwag quotes Maria David-Evans, the deputy minister of Alberta Children's Services, a target of one of Earl's lawsuits, as a person who "knew Silverman." And he uses her words to paint a picture of Earl as a man wearing a tinfoil hat and talking to Elvis.

Using Maria David-Evans as an assessor of Earl Silverman's state of mind is like depending on Denise Richards for a clear picture of Charlie Sheen. Or for those of you unfamiliar with Hollywood, it is like asking the snake to tell you about the mongoose.

That is how Goldwag rolls. A degree in law is the only thing separating him from a plaid suit, a cheap cigar and a lot full of shitty used cars.

What else we should expect from someone who participated fully in converting a legitimate civil rights activism organization into a band of thugs that would smear their own grandmothers as Nazis if there was a buck in it?

Goldwag's latest round of playing step and fetch for his feminist cohorts is no different than what he has been up to for a long time now. And given the fact that he has few real battles to fight — and still a need to justify his share of the SPLC take, I fully expect his disingenuous, yet thankfully impotent attacks on the men's movement to continue. Even if it gets people killed.

Like I said, that is how people like Goldwag roll.

Let's face it, though. If the best target you can come up with is AVFM, then you aren't a social activist, you are just desperate for something to do.

That leaves us with a simple question. Why should we care? The answer is just as simple. We shouldn't. Arty Goldwag is now to human rights activism the equivalent of the guy in the night club full of young people who is just too fucking old to be there but too fucking stupid to go drink at home. He just sort of sits there at the end of the bar with his scotch, trying and failing over and over to get someone to listen to him. You will see him there from time to time talking to himself.

No one is going to listen to him, or the SPLC. They lost all credibility some time ago when they made it clear they were more interested in attacking political enemies than hate groups. They have become a joke in most circles that used to respect them, which leaves Goldwag as a low end flunky in a group of has-beens. They still make money, mind you; largely by fundraising on the irrational fears of aging, senility-prone liberals. But it has left Arty with the need to make busy on his own. He has chosen to do so by playing step and fetch for cutting edge think tanks like Reddit/SRS. Imagine that. The organization that brought down the Klan is now struggling for relevance by attacking a three year old website that supports men's issues.

Way to go, Arthur. You're an impressive guy.

But what was I saying? Oh yes, there is not much point in caring. And henceforth, we won't.

I have to admit that when Arthur and tagged us as a hate group, and then later ate his own words, I was pretty impressed. The SPLC was a well-known entity. The hubbub he caused drew a ton of traffic to the site and increased our financial contributors. Arty is part of the reason why we now outperform most feminist websites in terms of traffic and content.

However, that was largely because of what we did with his bullshit, not because of the bullshit itself. We cashed in on his fear-mongering. We showed a lot of people a close-up of Goldwag's foot, directly embedded in his shopworn mouth, and made good of it.

Unlike the modern SPLC, we are not a one trick pony.

The fact is that at this point in time, the SPLC and Arthur Goldwag are of little use to us. We have bigger fish to fry and the law of diminishing returns dictates that the benefit of giving them the attention they are seeking is pretty much at an end.

In the early days of this site, we used to write a fair amount about David Futrelle. He was a nice, soft target; pudgy actually. He talked about us so incessantly that even some of his regular readers questioned whether he had some kind of weird fixation. He sent a few visitors our way.

I even had a debate with him that so frustrated the poor boy that he ran off crying. As I say sometimes, though, that was then and this is now. We don't mention David anymore except as a passing joke. He is just another low-end blogger with a small audience of neurotic women who talk more about cats in his comments than what he writes. It is as close to physical intimacy as the guy will ever get. And he still sends us traffic because he can't help himself.

This is where Arthur Goldwag and the SPLC belong; not with credible targets for activism, but with with people of wannabe importance whose only real use is sending people our way. Some of those people, as they always do, will figure out they've been lied to and will stick around to help. Arty is also of utility for a joke. It helps us and fits with the joke he has become in the eyes of the sane world.

At this point, if Art and crew want more attention, they will have to earn it by actually upping the ante. They will need to do something bigger and better than exploiting a man's suicide or just spinning bigger lies. I am betting they are not that creative.

So Arthur, your time here being taken as even remotely serious has come to an end. I am sure given the reality of your life, the value of what you do in the world, that is hardly unexpected. You may see your name from time to time, though…

…when we need a laugh.

A video for Brad Casey

Well, it was not actually made specifically for Brad, but it did just show up in my inbox at a very auspicious time. Tell you what Brad, since you are writing an “article” about why women become men’s advocates, and you want to ask them some questions, you can cut a couple of corners (you’re used to that) and just take a look at this.

And for Karra Burrell, the person who produced this video, please accept my thanks and consider this an invitation to write for A Voice for Men should that interest you. PE

Brad Casey wants to mind-rape our women!

Dean Esmay · 16 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our overlord Paul Elam, busy as he usually is with his glorious plans to righteously put women back in their place (barefoot, pregnant, in the kitchen, with their mouths taped shut) has recently given to me, his humble servant, the task of checking his emails for him.

We here in the AVfM compound in Houston, surrounded by barbed wire fences, sequestered in the tinfoil-lined inner sanctum, designed to block the secret mind-rays shot out at us from the space-lizard orbital craft; protected by special cloth filters to strain out the chemtrails left by overhead aircraft run by Feminist government officials, have to be constantly on the lookout. And when Paul is busy whipping our women into shape, he has humpbacked neckbearded basement-dwellers like me to manage the little things for him, such as his email.

The following email recently came into Paul's mailbox from one Brad Casey, which I dutifully printed out and took to Overlord Elam's chambers. As he sat upon the throne, I kneeled and offered up this missive. While stroking a purring kitten, he gently picked the printout up, in his delicate way, with tongs, and read from it. It said:

> Hey all at AVFM. My name is Brad Casey, I write for a publication called VICE. You might know me from an article I wrote a few weeks back about the CAFE protests in Toronto at UofT. Here's a link to that article:
> http://www.vice.com/en_ca/read/we-went-to-a-mens-rights-lecture-in-toronto
> I'm writing an article currently where I profile several female MRAs and ask them why they chose to become activists for men's rights. I feel that being a male feminist is something that is generally accepted but being a female MRA is confusing for most. That in mind, I have a 10 question survey which I hope will clarify why a woman would choose to identify as an MRA, what issues they find important, what they think of feminists and their men's rights community.
> I'm wondering if some of the female staff at AVFM might be interested in taking part in this survey or if you might be able to connect me with some female MRAs.
> I understand that you might be reluctant in answering this email or taking part in this request judging by what I wrote in my previous article. While I don't agree with the philosophy behind AVFM I do think that men's rights are important and some of the issues brought up within the community are worthy of study and attention. In regards to this article I'm hoping to gain an understanding of a side of the debate which is confusing for me and our readership.
> Let me know what you think. Thanks!

With a bellow of rage, Overlord Elam stood from his throne, and roared, "How dare you Esmay?! This man asks for permission to speak to MY women, and you don't know better than to send him packing? Does he think they have minds of their own? Does he think I would so much as allow him in their presence, to touch them and to mindrape them with his Feminist Truth?" He then strangled the kitten he had been stroking, bit off its head, swallowed, and then with kitten blood drooling down his lips said, "You should know better than to waste my time with this trash! You know perfectly well he shall never be allowed near my women! They are mine! My property! Mine! You know better Esmay, you insolent fool. Why don't I just kill you where you stand?"

"But master!" I cried, cringing and putting my forehead to the ground to show him my submission. "Perhaps if we tell the women what they must say, they can help us spread your message for compassion for boys and men, for the fundamental civil and human rights for men and boys… I mean, our plans to dominate and subjugate women!"

His face turning purple with fury, he took out his Toledo Salamanca Broadsword and lunged at me as I screamed in terror and backed away, caught up against the wall, struggling to escape. "Forgive me master, forgive meeeee!" I shrieked.

With his blade pressed against my throat, he hissed his next words out. “These women are mine, Esmay, mine, mine!” With each terrifying word the sword pressed harder into my neck, and I knew if I even swallowed I would bleed to death then and there. In terror, I stood still and allowed my lord to speak.

“They know their place and they know it is not to speak but only to be spoken to! Now get from my sight and be lucky I spared your life for even suggesting such a thing.”

With a kick to my buttocks, which I surely deserved, he sent me scurrying from his chamber as he called upon his harem to service him sexually and help him calm his Mighty Rage.

Thinking the matter ended, I rushed through the hallways in our underground labyrinth back towards the upstairs bunker where we keep watch out for the black helicopters. But on my way, Kristina Hansen rushed out and grabbed me. “Deacon Dean! Deacon Dean!” she cried. “I have heard some wicked man with terrible thoughts of freedom for women wishes to speak to me. What shall I do? What shall I do? I know it is my job to obey men in all things, but Master Paul, what will he want me to say?”

Finding my manhood I said, “No Kristina. We must not speak of this. Put away from your tiny mind all ideas we have not given you. We will protect you from the Bad Men and their Bad Thoughts.”

“Oh thank you Dean, thank you! I feel so safe with you!”

“I’ll bet you do,” I said, and sent her away with a swat to her perky ass. Master Elam does not allow me to have sexual congress with women without his permission, but we are otherwise free to stroke the hair and squeeze the bottoms and breasts of His Women at will, which is a nice perk to this job.

Having proven my innate superiority to women, even if it is lower than Master Elam’s, I walked on, regaining some of my macho confidence, only to be stopped by yet another woman in the compound. Girl Writes What (aka Karen Straughan) stumbled out of her assigned chamber with a just-been-fucked hairdo and scratching her ass. “Dean,” she said drearily, “I just got an email from this Brad Casey jackass.”

Master Elam allows Karen more freedom to communicate with the outside world than the other women; he even lets her say whatever she wants on her YouTube channel, as long as she clears it through him first. (Kristina and our other women must submit all their scripts to him in advance for rewrites.)

“Brad Casey wants to mind-rape you,” I said. “Don’t talk to him.”

“I wasn’t going to, I was going to tell him to go fuck himself,” she snorted.

“Yeah well, that’s probably good, but Master Paul would prefer you not speak to him at all.”

“Pfft,” she said, languidly lighting up one of her trademark cigarettes (because we can’t seem to get her to switch to that electronic cigarette no matter what we do). “As if I wanted to.” She snorted again and turned, walking back into her assigned quarters. I heard said something about, “another blowjob Mike?” as she shut the door. I heard a man grunt as I walked away.

She pretends independence of thought so well.

Finally I made my way back upstairs to the above-ground bunker, made a quick check for Feminist Black Helicopter presence and noted we were all clear… for now. I thought hard about how to respond to rapist-wannabe Brad Casey of VICE. Where to begin, where to begin?

So. To be a bit more serious:

Brad Casey appears not to understand that the Men’s Human Rights Movement is, you know, a movement, with a whole lot of scholars and research and publications to back up its many many claims and arguments, with an enormous amount of research behind our advocacy–research which, you know, he never bothered to ask about before slamming us.

Brad Casey seems not to understand that one of the missions of A Voice for Men is to cover news stories, like recent stories of feminist violence, intolerance, and fascist thuggery in Toronto. Brad Casey is also content to smear Warren Farrell without actually, y'know, addressing those smears and making it clear that they're smears. He thinks men's advocates are losers, but the angry mob screaming and calling people names and pulling fire alarms and making threats were just doing their jobs: I guess when it comes to violent women, Brad just doesn't take them seriously, because in his eyes women aren't adults to be held as accountable as men for bad behavior.

I also guess Brad thinks that just because we, as a publication, cover events in Canada (as well as, you know, around the United States, Spain, the UK, Australia, Sweden, India, and much of the rest of the globe), we must be in sinister cahoots with groups in Canada who are trying to speak about men's issues. He even thinks that if men kill themselves at 4 times the rate of women, it's somehow significant that women threaten to kill themselves more often, because, you know, a woman saying "I want to kill myself" and a man actually killing himself, why that's just the same fucking thing and should be given equal prominence.

And that's just scratching the surface of his aggressively ignorant "journalism." His ridiculously stupid and ill-informed piece about fascist feminist thuggery in Toronto tells me he's someone no men's advocate with a brain would get within a mile of; he's pretty clearly an ambush journalist who makes his money and reputation smearing his fellow man and playing white knight to women who act like 12 year olds throwing temper tantrums. I could only read that shit agog when it was first published; I am serious, and not in the least bit sarcastic, when I say that I am entirely confident that a High School Senior working for her school paper could have done a better job of covering events in Toronto than this ill-informed, aggressively ignorant, bigotry-spouting dipshit.

Still, a quick informal survey of the female men's advocates I know–and I certainly did not and could not ask them all–had them all thinking the same thing. They looked at this shit-for-brains article by Brad Casey and thought, "why would I talk to a dishonest ambush journalist who's only going to quote-mine me and spin whatever I say into bullshit, just like he did at the Toronto protests?"

I have no good answer for them. I think someone like Sean Hannity or Michael Savage might have done a better job of covering that shit, Brad, and I view their journalistic skills and integrity as lower than your average High School newspaper editor's, too.

Now the fact is, Brad, I don't care how many female MRAs you talk to. The ones I work with are all strong, intelligent, independent woman who can handle their shit.The real question isn't whether I want them to talk to you or not. That's up to them. The real question is, why should I even bother asking them on your behalf? Why should I play the role of your secretary, you aggressively ignorant asshole?

We are a non-violent, volunteer, dedicated civil rights organization and publication, Mr. Casey, and we don't hate anybody but bigots. That's nothing more and nothing less than what we are. And we're used to being stereotyped, pigeonholed, misquoted, quote-mined, distorted, attacked, misrepresented and outright lied about by your ilk. We are used to it happening while we're busy trying to get innocent men out of jail, help children escape abusers, help domestic violence victims recover, and call out corrupt public officials. If you spent much of any time on this site (instead of randomly Googling shit you can quote out of context) you'd know we do all those things, regularly, and we do it all on nothing but a crew of volunteers and a few donations.

So why would we do anything but DIScourage any of our people to waste their precious time to talk to you when we are virtually certain you'll twist their shit and make them look crazy and stupid and ill-informed, when most of them are probably a lot smarter and more knowledgeable than you are? Especially on the topic of feminism, which you obviously don't know much about and on which you haven't done much to educate yourself.

On the flip side, now that I've actually published that you're looking for female MRAs to talk to–after having, you know, savaged them and their comrades-in-arms in an incredibly deceitful and malicious fashion there on VICE–how do I know you won't go and make up some fake MRAs to talk to, or accept anything from anyone self-describing as an MRA, whether they really are or not, and run with that? Answer: I don't. We don't.

You've already shown yourself to be an irresponsible shitty excuse of a journalist. So maybe if they talk to you you'll make shit up or twist their shit up to make them look bad, but maybe if they don't, you'll make a bunch of shit up, or one of David Futrelle's minions will show up in your inbox and say "yeah I'm a female MRA and I support taking rights away from women and I hate women too because we women suck, put women who have abortions in prison praise jesus blargh!" and so on and so forth, because that's just what a whole lot of people who oppose compassion and fundamental human rights for boys and men do: pretend to be MRAs or to be quoting MRAs just to make us look bad. We've seen it in action more than once. At least one asshole we know of pretty much does it as a full-time gig.

So here's the favor I'll do for you, Brad Casey: I'll go ahead and recommend to some of our female MRAs that they answer your questionnaire. But you know what I'll also recommend? That they CC me their responses, so I can publish them, unedited and in full, right here on A Voice for Men. And if I'm wrong about you, and your journalistic ethics and abilities are above those of pond scum, you'll actually make sure to link those in-full, unedited responses when we publish them.

Female MRAs don't have to respond to you at all–that's their choice–but if you want my help contacting them, that's what I'm gonna do as a service to them.

So Brad: e-mail Paul again and tell him that's all fine with you, and I'll encourage the little women to talk. But please do him the courtesy to put "Trigger Alert: Lying Asshole" in the subject line.

And if you disagree with this precaution, go fuck yourself you lying asshole, we're not going to help you, and we're making it clear exactly what kind of dishonest shit we expect you to do.

Prove us wrong. Paul will await your email.

To Coach John Wolfgram, Portland, Maine

Dear Coach Wolfgram, Cheverus High School football team.

Your young players recently visited with Governor Paul LePage after winning your state's football championship. He gave your young men a lecture about men and domestic violence. He told them that domestic violence was men's problem to solve. He told them that their masculinity and their ideas of manhood were the problem. He told them, in so many words, that they were not just the solution, but that they were also the problem.

Nearly everything he told them was a lie.

I realize this may be a bit of a shock, as I am sure you can't imagine why a state governor would stand before a group of impressionable young men and attempt to poison their minds with disinformation. Nonetheless, that's what happened.

His motives were purely political, and it is very important for you to understand those motives because what the governor did was not a one-time stunt. He was forecasting an oncoming assault on the budding masculinity and the self-image of your players and all future young men in Maine schools. His lecture was also an attempt to manipulate you into helping with that agenda.

So far, it is entirely plausible that you stood back with nothing to say while Governor LePage deceived your players, simply because you did not know any better. It is my hopes that by the time you finish reading this article that you are able to see what is going on, and that in your position of trust with those students you will not let it happen again.

Allow me to start helping you to understand by taking a look at this as presented by the media in your state.

There are several recent op-ed pieces and interviews published by the Bangor Daily News that attack boys and heterosexual masculinity. In one piece, titled "When will men stand up to violence?"[1] a man named Drew Wing openly echoes and expands upon the sentiments conveyed to your players by Governor LePage; that there is something inherently wrong with masculinity; that boys are innately defective, and that they need to somehow be fixed, re-engineered into something more socially acceptable and less dangerous to the society around them.

Mind you, he is ignoring the ways we, though fathers and men such as yourself, have historically encouraged and mentored young men to be productive members of society. He is pointing directly at men like you as part of the problem, because it is masculinity itself that is the problem. That includes you, sir, though you may not have even paused to consider it.

What is worse is that if you examine the plans Wing already has in place, they are much more far reaching than simply telling boys they are born bad and need to be fixed. A more thorough examination of his work reveals an unthinkable agenda. He actually promotes a program of bullying and emotionally abusing boys in order to get them to become enforcers of his political ideas about men against their smaller, weaker male peers.

If that seems unlikely to you, please finish reading and investigate the all the links provided.

Drew Wing and his "Boys to Men" organization are actively engaged in promoting programs to re-define boys "masculinity in terms of violence, harassment, apathy and sexual conquest."[1] In his Bangor Daily News piece he defines rape as a "men's issue" and demands men help stop "rape culture" by changing the "male culture" which he says "degrades women and supports sexual violence."

Of course, all decent human beings condemn rape, and want to put an end to it. However, let me stop for a moment here, Coach. There is much more to come but I cannot move on without asking you some questions, with the hope that you will stop for a moment and answer them for yourself.

How many men do you know who belong to a "male culture that degrades women and supports sexual violence"?

Please take a moment to answer that. Does this statement apply to your father? Your brothers? Your sons? Your players? The other male coaches on your team? The male teachers at Cheverus High School? How about to the fathers and brothers of your players? How about to Governor LePage?

Do we have a criminal minority of people who commit sexual assaults, or do we have a culture that is responsible for this, including you and your football team?

Again, do you really see an entire culture of men around you that support rape and the abuse of women? Because if you don't sir, then how can you stand by while a state official creates such a destructive and patently false notion in the young minds under your care?

But let us get back to the work of Drew Wing for now.

He further declares that:

"men are conditioned to believe that women are inferior and exist solely as sexual objects for the pleasure of men [and] that sexual violence is a legitimate means of establishing power – a highly coveted commodity in male culture."

In case you missed it, Coach, Drew Wing and the Bangor Daily News just openly declared that the basis of male culture 'covets' power through rape which he says men consider as "legitimate means". He wants men to stop "rape culture" and "speak and act in a way that reinforces our respect for women…[and by] modeling respect for girls and women, working for full equality, challenging elements of male culture and holding perpetrators accountable."

He wants men and boys to "model respect" for women and punish other men and boys who are deemed to do otherwise — in the name of "full equality" of all things. He ends his op-ed with "Will the "real men" please stand up?"

Coach, are you able to see how the demonization of young men is wrapped around ideals that are designed to be unassailable? Are you, like so many, going to be blinded by the righteousness of "holding perpetrators accountable" to the point that you cannot see or hear that men, as a class, as in you, are being accused of supporting rape?

You may wonder at this point (and I surely hope you are) what makes Drew Wing an authority on masculinity, psychology, early childhood development, human sexuality and/or causes of violence to issue such open declarations against men and masculinity.

Well, he did do some real estate development consulting and studied theology — which apparently qualified him to be the best new front "man" for the already well-established and feminist governed "Boys to Men" organization. It started out as a "community coalition" against domestic violence in 1998 and is now in the business of re-enginering programs for male children designed to correct their masculine condition.

Boys to Men administers a "treatment program" which is apparently a variation of the Ludovico Technique. They are not kidding about "reshaping" boys. In Maine they are spending community dollars on what they term "preventative programs" which they are refining for nationwide promotion.

The program, as we soon shall see, is designed to "eliminate" and replace boys' "masculinity" and self-confidence with what they call "Gender Justice"[2].

Again, Coach, I have to stop and ask you to consider a question. This time a single one. What do you think about an effort to take impressionable young men, already going through the painful process of self-discovery and individuation and attempt to replace their sense of masculinity with someone else's political ideals?

It is just one question, Coach, but I really hope you don't neglect to answer it, if only for yourself.

Moving on we get a clearer idea of some of the male re-engineering programs through yet another recent article at Bangor Daily News, which states:

> "[…]Boys to Men Executive Director Drew Wing says the same male athletes who take the field or ice in violent sports can be key to reshaping what he thinks have become destructive preconceptions of manhood in today's society[…]In a nutshell, the most masculine in what Wing called the "culture of masculinity" are often also the most self-confident, and they have more social currency with which to reject domineering or violent social behaviors. There's some research that men who live in those masculine worlds [of sports] are in the best positions to defy those worlds," Wing said."

What Wing and his front organization is actually engaging in and promoting is a program of accessing schools to shame, bully, and indoctrinate aggressive and violent leaning Alpha-male jocks to serve as muscle to coerce and abuse other boys into compliance with their pro-feminist political worldview.

Wing calls these groomed Alpha-male boys "positive bystanders" and specifically seeks to exploit their Alpha-male "social currency" to bully the rest of the young boys to accept and conform to feminist doctrine.

Wing rationalizes this orchestration of abuse by stating "Really this is about empowering them, giving them tools to stand up and be leaders in tough situations, be the activists that change the culture on campus."

"… activists that change the culture on campus."

Coach, we have an ideological feminist group gaining access to schools and campuses to indoctrinate the most confident, outgoing, and socially influential young males to serve as enforcers and "activists that change the culture." To change it to radical feminist core values. It is a program specifically aimed at oppressing all boys. I am sure, Coach, as you are also likely a teacher, that you are familiar with historical efforts to indoctrinate and use young Alpha-males to enforce ideology on school campuses?

On their website, Men to Boys' mission statement lists a core value belief that the responsibility of raising healthy boys falls on the community—a core value explicitly against family and parental rights and responsibilities concerning their own children. By "community" they are asserting new rights and responsibilities to public institutions such as the education system, where Boys to Men is now coincidentally gaining a foothold.

They go on to state another, more familiar core belief — that boys and men are responsible for preventing violence. Again, one has to stop and consider what they are saying. Their position is that violence begins and ends with boys and men. This is their claim despite the fact that it is patently untrue, and in a way that disparages them and every male in their life.

If that is not radical enough, then consider their core values concerning "Gender Justice":

> "Gender Justice:• Traditional media and cultural representations of masculinity and femininity are too narrowly defined and contribute to destructive and damaging behavior towards individuals of all genders and ages. We are committed to eliminating the inequalities and institutional injustices that result from these traditional media and cultural representations of masculinity."[2]

In other words they have essentially declared war on masculinity as it is, Coach; the same masculinity with which you coached your team to a state football championship, the masculinity that your players played through pain with, and the masculinity that lent them to working together as a team. They want to subvert that masculinity and make them political enforcers, leaning on their brothers to effect the cause of "inequalities and institutional injustices" which they "are committed to eliminating". And they are shrouding all this in a term as misleading and disingenuous as "healthy masculinity,"[2]

How ironic that while Boys to Men is "committed to eliminating" masculinity, and programming bullies, their slogan is "Building True Strength".

For all the doublespeak and euphemisms, it is an open program of human rights abuse and violence against generations of young men and boys through threatening, shaming, bullying, and terrorizing tactics. One has to wonder what the fully informed parents would say about an organization such as “Boys to Men” being allowed access to their children in order to make political alterations to their masculine identity? Does that really sound like “building true strength,” to you, Coach? Or does it sound like political operatives maliciously tinkering with the minds of impressionable children?

Does Governor LePage’s lecture to your players sound the same now as it did then? If it does, your players are in deep trouble.

Coach, this is child abuse hiding behind the banner of domestic violence prevention. It is a program aimed at targeting and preemptively shaming only male children for gender profiled crimes of which “Boys to Men” say all men are guilty; all men are responsible. There’s your “Gender Justice”.

We now see ideology, not concern for children, driving school policies across the country which attack natural male development, terrorizing and punishing boys for crimes such as “sexual harassment” — for telling someone they think their teacher is “cute.”[3]

When we see 7 year old boys being terrorized, harassed and harshly punished by their schools for pointing pencils at each other and making shooting sounds, we are witnessing an attack on their healthy development and their self esteem.[4]

“Boys to Men” in Maine is a program of interrupting and attacking boys and it is being continuously promoted by the likes of Bangor Daily News—one of the largest newspapers in Maine, while the governor parrots their propaganda to the children.

For his part Maine Governor LePage has made “domestic violence” the central part of his administration with initiatives to force accused men to be held without bail, to force accused men who have unsubstantiated protection orders filed against them to wear ankle bracelets, to creating a domestic violence offender registry, to passing out 911 panic alarms to women, and to shame and blame school boys and their masculinity and for not putting women ahead of their own interests.

In his first State of the State address, LePage called domestic violence “a men’s problem”.

And let me be clear coach, just in case nothing like the truth has every reached your ears. Domestic violence is a complex problem with a wide range of causes. Domestic violence is an alcohol and drug abuse related problem. Domestic violence is a poverty related problem. Domestic violence is a family dysfunction related problem. Domestic violence is a problem committed by both sexes, against both sexes with children being the primary true victims in almost all cases. Domestic violence is NOT a problem rooted in masculinity. The idea that it is nothing more than political fabrication.

You can drag a thousand champion football players into a room with a lying governor and nothing will change that.

Paul LePage will travel to other schools in Maine to address groups of boys, blaming them for domestic violence, blaming them for not doing more to stop it, and teaching the boys to get confrontational and perhaps even violent with other boys to keep them in line. He weakly admonishes violence, but then leaves the door open for it when he counsels young boys about intervening on abusive men.

> “I’m not advocating to use violence, but you do what you’ve got to do to resolve the issue,”

Coach, as someone who spent 20+ years counseling people with life problems, I relied on a saying regularly to address this kind of doublespeak and denial in my clients:

Everything behind a “but” is bullshit.

When Governor LePage says “I’m not advocating to use violence, but…” he is knowingly and intentionally leaving the door open to that very thing. He even waxes nostalgically about getting into trouble with law enforcement for intervening physically in the affairs of others, and states emphatically that he would do it again. He is glorifying his role as a physical enforcer and passing that message along to the students most likely to emulate it.

How much sense does it make to you, Coach, that we would identify violence as a male specific problem to be fixed, and then advocate its use to address it?

Governor LaPage is following in lockstep with the intentions of groups like “Boys to Men,” which is to turn young athletes into political enforcers, rather than hold responsible adults to account for the problems we face as a society, or to find solutions that can so seldom translate into sound bites and votes.

Coach, this is the most disgraceful exhibit of its kind that I have ever heard of from a state governor. And I remind you, without blaming you, that you are now a part of it, either as the problem or the solution.

And just a couple of more items for your consideration.

The Maine Domestic Violence Coalition in a related program gets promising male athletes to stand in front of a camera for public service announcements and recite as if they were confessing that domestic violence is a “huge issue” on college campuses and that it’s up to them to stop it:

Coach, In Maine the war on boys is very much mainstream with radical programs by organizations such as “Boys to Men” being tested for national expansion. In future articles, I will continue to examine the unfolding society of hate where male human rights are being abolished by radical feminists and their sycophants in elected office.

But for now, I just wanted you to know what is happening, and why there is a need to do something about it. If you value those young men in your charge, you will.

Drew Wing is the executive director of Boys to Men, a Portland-based nonprofit that seeks to reduce interpersonal violence. He is a former business developer and holds a theology degree. He may be reached at drewwing7@gmail.com.

Perrette setting up Shivers again?

NCFM · 17 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Do people set other people up just for spite? Create situations to entrap others just because it's doable? Maybe even manipulate events to cause an arrest for a restraining order violation? Are they really that smart; or really that stupid?

For those of you following the ex-husband Francis "Coyote" Shivers/Pauley Perrette ex-wife wrongful conviction, false accusations, trumped up restraining order, murder for hire soap opera, we've learned from independent investigators working for the various civil rights groups that one of precious Pauley's boyfriends may have landed a bar-tending job at a cocktail lounge in Hollywood serving up Cucumber Dilettantes with muddled cucumbers and pink swizzle.

Mr. Shivers frequents the place where Boyfriend will be pouring drinks, popping beer caps, and flirting with movie star wannabees. Shivers and friends have frequented this area for over 15 years. He has worked at businesses within 100 yards of Boyfriend's new job. And, tonight, Shivers is scheduled to work at the opening of an art gallery within a false accusation throw of Boyfriend's swizzles. There are hundreds if not thousands of cocktail lounges (bars) in Los Angeles County and Boyfriend ends at this one. My bookie says, "20 to one against coincidence…putz."

Network reruns watch out. This life size drama has all the telltale signs of another episode of NCIS with lab tech Precious Pauley discovering a restraining order violation in her very own laboratory, a laboratory wherein unknown to the show's producers, copious quantities of designer drug consumption morphed into toe sucking bondage. Yikes!

Will Precious Pauley be sucking down Cucumber Dilettantes with bartending Boyfriend? Will she proposition little Ms. Mary showing way to much leg on at the bar three stools down. After laying in wait for hours at Boyfriend's bar, will Precious Pauley miraculously discover that Shivers is working an art show down the street! OH MY GOD! Aghast, shocked, shaking she'll spill muddled cucumbers in her lap fumbling her cell-phone dialing 911. "Shit, it's a new skirt. He'll pay for that too," she's blurts. Who knew sweet innocence? He's supposed to stay 100 yards away! Or maybe, LAPD Hollywood Division Detectives and Swat Team will chow down way to many stale doughnuts waiting to arrest unsuspecting Shivers?

As my trusted shrink Dr. T wrote,

"There is already an established pattern. Sociopathic borderlines/narcs are like Wile E. Coyote in that they use the same cockamamie tactics over and over again. I find that when you shame and expose the transparent behaviors of these types before they act, you can head them off at the pass. When you shine a light on cockroaches, they usually scurry back under the baseboard. What you need here is the disinfectant properties of full exposure."

I'm thinking Dr. T may have been suggesting shining a light on Precious Pauley, maybe even bartending Boyfriend with pink swizzle. Who knows, could be anyone, even an Assistant District Attorney or conjoined at the hip LAPD Threat Management Unit investigators whose jobs entail protecting celebrities from the good citizens of Los Angeles County, including the likes of harmless Mr. Shivers– could happen, cucumbers and all…after all, IT"S HOLLYWOOD, the land of make them believe you…

Will duct taped Suzy Q find peace at her daughter's new S&M club… How did Trevor find his stolen bicep hidden in Johnny's steroid closet… Is a trap being set for Mr. Shivers… smells that way, doesn't it? Are they really that smart; or really that stupid? It's doable…

Hopefully, this small article let's the cast know that thousands of others now know entrapment may be afoot… Best would be for everyone to get along, Boyfriend to pour his drinks, Precious Pauley to hook up with Mary To Much Leg Showing, and for Mr. Shivers to go to work without fear of being arrested.

The pulpit of poon

Diana Davison · 17 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

How do I love thee? Let me count the dead things.

When Elisabeth Barrett Browning penned the words "… if God choose, I shall but love thee better after death," I'm pretty sure she didn't intend that you should kill things for her. I can see how that might have been misinterpreted given that courtship is more like Goddess worship and we all know that divine beings love dead things. As a classic poem capturing the nature of love, only the last line, taken out of context, describes the rites and expectations of romantic culture.

The problem in a dinner date isn't about who is going to pay for it, I believe the real issue is that you didn't go out and kill the fucking thing yourself to lay it at her feet. Now that independent women can buy their own food the ante has been raised. The purchase of slaughter by proxy has lost its value and the standards of worship have increased.

The consumerism of modern dating is conspicuous. A woman requires evidence that you have resources and are willing to expend large sums of them, preferably on items with no intrinsic value — with which to decorate her person as proof that you will honor no other Gods before her. It's a pantheon out there with other Deities who may steal your worship away, and she is a jealous God.

There are two divine battles being waged; acquiring the adoration of numerous worshippers whilst making sure they follow her covenant of rules, and the battle to defeat other rivals who might offer a better harvest. Hence the importance of rule number one: Worship no other Gods before me or, as the Highlander would say: "There can be only One."

So here I sit in meditation, preparing myself to approach her altar. Cold sweat trickles down my side and over my belly as I run through the checklist of my offering. Mistakes can be deadly. I've learned the rules of approach so well I can recite them by heart. Avert your eyes; It is foolish to stare directly into the sun for too long and her beauty will overwhelm me if I try.

Only enter her presence in a state of purity; anoint myself in pleasant oils before entering the temple and think only clean thoughts because she is omnipotent and reads minds. Not only are my thoughts bare before her, she knows them better than I do. If I break a rule, I'm smote. If it's a bad day she'll have the whole tribe wiped out. I shall keep no false idols (titty pics) and shall never worship at the shrine of a lesser divinity. I will offer regular sacrifices of the approved sort, preferably flowers which have been severed from their life giving stems so that they may sit and decay on her kitchen table. This is an important ritual, as it reminds us not only that beauty exists to serve her but that she enjoys watching life wither away before her eyes.

The flowers should accurately represent her own perfection and remind us that, whilst they rot in a vase she survives, immortal, to throw their corpses in the trash. She is not a God to be fucked with.

Why am I enduring such uncertainty and cowering to please such a cruel being? How can such a malevolent, narcissistic creature be called a loving god? Certainly these queries have been made, but the questioner is quickly brim-stoned and cast from the sight of others. These outcasts now find their numbers growing because she is such a wrathful and vengeful god and we are mere humans. They have left the Temple of Twat, abandoned the Altar of Arse, shunned the Shrine of Snatch, and have formed the Coven of Cloven Foot Soldiers called the MHRM.

I scratched out the following words in a moment of inspiration. It's simple as poems should be and proposes a change to the meaningless sacrificial rituals of servitude to which we've become so accustomed. This is my soliloquy to the value of life over death.

Please Don’t Bring Me Dead Things Anymore

A fire burned smouldering embers
Of lost amour; your sweet whispers
As you placed dead things at my door
Like the mouse my cat left so
Lovingly in the old shoe on my porch.

I felt guilty.
I thought I should put it in a jar.
That’s what one is supposed to do with Such things.

Those blossoms that once dripped dew
And offered their beauty to
The morning light.
Now severed and decaying on my stoop
Because you thought me pretty.

I waited until you left before
I cremated them.
The embers glowed greedily for Pretty things.

I wiped off the rot from their stems residing
On the tips of my fingers.
At least it wasn’t a mouse.
Perhaps the next one will bring me
A plant.

Diane Abbott: creating a crisis of solipsism

'Viagra & Jack Daniels Culture Creating A Crisis of Masculinity'

My first instinct, on reading this article in the Daily Mail today, was to praise Diane Abbott for having the courage to raise the issue of problems men face in contemporary Britain.

But then I actually read the article and found myself astounded at how superficial, unfocused and watered-down her argument actually is.

For a start, why the emphasis on sexual performance anxiety? Oh yes…I remember…all men ever think about is sex. Silly me. I forgot that. So you guys are feeling disenfranchised because there is too much pressure on you to perform sexually.

According to Abbott this is creating a generation of men who 'find themselves locked into a transitional phase at home, or find themselves voluntarily creating an extended adolescence, sometimes resentful of family life'.

And, because we can't resist bringing it back to what's actually best for the ladies, this resentment at not being able to sexually perform, feeling useless because they are living with their parents (lets not say anything about the ladies that are living with their parents – it ruins the flow) creates a 'hypermasculinity' that:

'At its worst, it's a celebration of heartlessness; a lack of respect for women's autonomy; I fear it's often crude individualism dressed up as modern manhood.'

Ok…newsflash Abbott – 'modern British manhood' is a product of a Labour government that shifted everything so far into the favour of 'modern woman' that it completely raped 'modern man' of his self-worth (yes, I mean you Harriet Harman).

He's not important anymore. He doesn't know his role anymore. Does he hold a door open or not? Does he look at you, or will he be accused of sexually assaulting you? Should he feel happy that he is able to provide for you, or is he a repressive patriarch?

Should he bother at all, or should he go and live up a mountain in the Himalayas until someone starts talking sense?

He's still not important in your argument – you have to bring it back to 'a lack of respect for women's autonomy'.

She goes on 'This generation no longer asks itself what it means to be a man.'

Yes, because we live in a society that will not let him be a man. Viagra, sexual performance……I'll tell you something – I hear from many men every week, telling me their concerns, issues and experiences…and not one of them has ever mentioned his penis, or the fact that he thinks his iPhone makes him more of a man.

Which makes me wonder just how much research Abbott put into finding out what the real problems actually are before coming out with this half-formulated nonsense theory.

Still, I am at least heartened at the fact that the article goes onto say Labour is looking at a raft of ideas based around men's concerns, and that Jon Cruddas seems to be talking sense.

But I am not holding my breath.

Kudos to AVFM News Director Robert O'Hara, who conducted an excellent interview with the free thinking Justin Vacula, an activist in the secular movement. Vacula came under fire for questioning the threat narrative of secular ideologues like Rebecca Watson and PZ Myers, who are furthering the idea that secular conferences are not safe spaces for women.

He was subjected to further attacks after allowing one of his articles to be reposted to AVFM. PE

Infantriarchy

Gordon Wadsworth · 19 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If our species were observed by an alien race for any length of time, two profound defects in the human condition would rapidly become apparent to them. One is a defect in the female character, and the other is a defect in the male character. Although they weren't always defects, they have become such because they are fundamentally at odds with both legal equality and self-actualization.

The female defect is her desire to infantilize herself; to project a facade of weakness and victimhood. The female does this because part of her identity is contingent on compelling males to act on her behalf. This is a mechanism which allows the female to feel desirable, important, and powerful. The female often mistakes this behavior as personal empowerment, when in reality it is quite the opposite. Taking personal responsibility is something she will inherently resist, because as soon as she takes personal responsibility and stops infantilizing herself, her identity can no longer command others to act on her behalf. Thus, the female defect keeps her from assuming personal responsibility, which presents a barrier to her self-actualization.

This is why the self-actualized female finds playing the victim so repugnant; she is shunning part of her old identity.

The male defect is his desire to compensate for the infantilized female. He does this because part of his identity is contingent on earning female validation. He thus demonstrates his ability to protect, provision and inform. This is a mechanism for feeling useful, powerful, knowledgeable, and important. The male defect leads him to compete with other males to demonstrate his primacy to females, and it ultimately turns him into a guardian, which keeps him from relinquishing responsibility. This becomes his own barrier to self-actualization.

This is why the self-actualized male sees competing for female validation as idiotic; he is shunning part of his old identity.

These defects mean that the female path of self-actualization is one of taking responsibility, and the male path of self-actualization is one of relinquishing responsibility.

It is vitally important to recognize that the majority of males and females in our culture enjoy their dysfunction. The female has a puerile sexual identity validated by compelling a man to act on her behalf, and the male has a similarly puerile sexual identity validated by demonstrating his ability to act on her behalf. This is a drug that our species has been addicted to for millennia, and it is one we desperately need to cast aside. Moving past this behavior is the next step humanity must make to realize equality.

We already have a name for this drug. It's the blue pill. Those in the blue pill paradigm aren't conscious of this behavior, they're merely stuck engaging in it. Consciously recognizing this defective behavior is, in my opinion, the source of red pill wisdom. Once this behavior is seen for what it is, the blue pill paradigm becomes observable, and the transition to the red pill paradigm is made.

An understanding of the male defect is vital for contextualizing feminist criticism of men. Our defect, for example, is why many feminists are partially correct when they point to demonstrating power as a male motivation. We display power to demonstrate our readiness to compensate for the infantilized female. Our defect is also the source of feminist complaints about "mansplaining." Men engaging in "mansplaining" are largely attempting to demonstrate their knowledge and value in order to demonstrate their capability to compensate for the infantilized female. Additionally, the "fatherly" guardian status that results from our defect is why the feminists are superficially correct about patriarchy, but why they are also leaving out half the picture.

Where the feminist is completely wrong is where she believes that pre-feminist Western culture was in its totality a patriarchy. Since the traditional paradigm of pre-feminist Western culture was an expression of both the male and the female defects, patriarchy was only half the picture.

Let's clarify what patriarchy means.

For the most part, patriarchy is simply a word to describe the male defect. On its own, however, patriarchy says exactly nothing about the female defect. If we're to have a fair and balanced discussion on sex and gender, we need a word to address both defects. Let us therefore add the word infantriarchy to describe the female defect.

Patriarchy and infantriarchy are simple concepts that reflect a relationship of codependency between the male and female defects. If the male defect is over expressed in society, female infantilization is compelled, and patriarchy results. If the female defect is over expressed in society, male compensation is compelled, and infantriarchy results.

Thus, the traditional paradigm of pre-feminist Western culture wasn't in its totality a patriarchy, because it was built around the expression of both the male and the female defects. The fact that there exist both males and females who wish to return to traditionalism proves this. The traditionalist female was thus perfectly happy to infantilize herself, and infantriarchy was a part of traditionalism that cannot be ignored.

The feminist response to this, of course, will be to claim that patriarchy infantilizes women and that the second concept is therefore unnecessary. To clarify this response, the feminist will essentially be claiming that the male defect is wholly to blame. This line of reasoning is problematic because it denies the existence of the female defect, and in doing so it assumes women are perfect and asserts that the defect necessarily exists solely within men.

This can only be described as hate.

Because feminism doesn't acknowledge the existence of the female defect, it denies female complicity in traditionalism, and thus distorts the male defect of compensating into one of oppressing. Thus, feminists mistakenly believe that women were uniquely oppressed because they're using half of a theoretical model to examine traditionalism.

The notion of female oppression becomes highly dubious when one considers the female defect. The female defect, for example, becomes apparent when a woman claims that women have always been the primary victims of war, despite the countless millions of men who have died. The female defect has led a woman to cry about being victimized over a t-shirt, and it has led a journalist to claim that MHRM efforts are based on "victim envy." So it isn't terribly surprising that the female defect might lead certain women to claim that human history was one long story of female oppression. It is simply an expression of the female defect. It is the female projecting her victimhood.

What then, is feminism?

To be fair, I have met a handful of feminists whose goals I thought were legitimate. To a significant extent, however, feminism is merely a sociopolitical platform for these defects, an arena for them to play in, and the cultural force which is expanding infantriarchy. Feminists claim their movement is about female equality, but I disagree. Being an expression of the female defect, feminism is merely a movement to express female victimhood; more specifically, it is an expression of female victimhood to compel sociopolitical male compensation with the humorous goal of preventing female victimhood.

This results in a merry-go-round to hell, wherein feminism actively entrenches the same value it seeks to fight.

Because feminism is essentially an expression of female victimhood working to end female victimhood, most feminists are stuck in the destructive convulsions of an individual fighting against a victim identity she has chosen for herself.

The nail in the coffin for our society is that the male defect supports and encourages this female behavior. The majority of feminists are fighting an identity they've chosen for themselves, one that makes them feel deeply unhappy and traumatized, and the majority of males, instead of criticizing them, are simply trying to compensate for them. The male's drive to compensate for the infantilized female knows no bounds. If the female is expressing her oppression the male will seek to compensate. If the female is ruthlessly attacking the male's identity and stripping him of his rights, the male will still seek to compensate.

It is important to understand that both defects must disappear, or neither one will. These two defects are codependent. Females must stop infantilizing themselves, and males must stop compensating for infantilized females. If the female defect isn't addressed, then no matter how savagely the male defect is attacked, directly or indirectly, the problems with these defects will never be solved. One behavior compels the other, since men and women are and will always be two sides of the same coin. Men and women will evolve their consciousness together, or their consciousness will not evolve.

With this in mind, "patriarchal" expression of the male defect doesn't disappear in an infantriarchy, it merely changes forms. Remember, in infantriarchy, male compensation is compelled. "White knights" and "manginas" are the expressions of patriarchy, because they are the expressions of the compelled male defect, and often this expression is so pathetic as to beggar belief.

This patriarchal behavior goes largely unnoticed by feminists because they don't see the male defect directly for what it is. They arbitrarily define patriarchal behavior as authoritative, but they're mistaken in this regard. Patriarchal behavior is any expression of the male defect. White knights and manginas are thus expressing patriarchal behavior because their behavior seeks to compensate for the female, and it thus encourages the female to continue expressing her victimhood and self-infantilization.

This is the reason some feminists are beginning to recognize and reject men like Hugo Schwyzer for what they are. Men like Schwyzer will never criticize women on any level, simply because men like Schwyzer aren't remotely interested in equality. They are merely interested in validating their own puerile sexual identities by demonstrating their compensatory capacity. They are cowards, content to ignore real world suffering as they continue taking hits off the blue pill crack pipe. And they are ironically the very agents of patriarchy feminists denounce.

The profound irony of this is that feminism claims to oppose patriarchy while fiercely upholding it, and the MHRM hates the concept of patriarchy, but is currently the only cultural force actually fighting it.

Finally, an infantriarchy will be built around male blame. This is because the female defect leads her to project all authority on to the male, and this forms the basis for blaming him for all wrongdoing. In order to project victimhood, it is necessary for the female to cast the responsibility for her problems elsewhere. Thus, the more infantriarchal a society, the more male blame can be expected.

In our society, this blame is expressed in the feminist's belief that equality can be achieved by examining "masculinities," and by deconstructing "patriarchy." It is also why the feminist believes men just need to shut up and listen to women in order for equality to happen; inequality, after all, was "men's fault," and men should shut up and let women fix it.

In late stage infantriarchy, men even become blamed for a woman's feelings.

If a joke offends a woman, men are blamed. If a man says hello in an elevator in a way a woman dislikes, he is blamed for making her feel victimized. If a man approaches a woman in a bar and she doesn't like it, he is blamed for making her feel bad, and society responds by prohibiting men from talking to women in this way. If a man looks at a woman who is half naked and it makes her feel bad, he is blamed for looking.

Since the purpose of feminism is largely to express victimhood, "victim blaming" becomes one of its tools. "Victim blaming" is simply another expression of male blame. It is a tool designed to protect female victimhood by savagely casting blame at any male who ever dares to question it.

Feminism does not seek to address either defect, it seeks to criticize male behavior while upholding the male defect and openly expressing the female one. Feminism thus upholds both patriarchy and infantriarchy. Since directly deconstructing and understanding both defects is a minimum prerequisite to promote equality between the sexes, feminism will never achieve equality on its own, however viciously it attacks men.

In my opinion, the MHRM sees these two defects for what they are, and criticizes both of them directly. The MHRM opposes feminism as an unrestrained expression of the female defect, and it opposes "white knights," "manginas," and the forces of chivalry as expressions of the male defect and enablers of the female defect. The MHRM opposes both patriarchy and infantriarchy.

For all its claims, feminism is not a progressive movement. Whatever its stated goals, feminism binds humanity to an archaic sexual identity. The MHRM is the socially progressive movement because it is spearheading a move toward greater self actualization for both men and women.

Since directly deconstructing and understanding both defects is a minimum prerequisite to promote equality between the sexes, feminism will never achieve equality on its own, however viciously it attacks men.

In my opinion, the MHRM sees these two defects for what they are, and criticizes both of them directly. The MHRM opposes feminism as an unrestrained expression of the female defect, and it opposes "white knights," "manginas," and the forces of chivalry as expressions of the male defect and enablers of the female defect. The MHRM opposes both patriarchy and infantriarchy.

For all its claims, feminism is not a progressive movement. Whatever its stated goals, feminism binds humanity to an archaic sexual identity. The MHRM is the socially progressive movement because it is spearheading a move toward greater self actualization for both men and women.

My evolution from Feminism to the MHRM

Deborah Kendrick · 20 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Those of you who know me also know that I used to identify as a feminist – not a radfem, but nevertheless, a feminist.

Here's just a few of the things that made me change the philosophy that would direct my life and encourage other women to do the same.

My friend Oliver Bingham said to me: "It is not very pro-female of radical feminists to convince and cajole these women that they have no agency and therefore no power." Very true, dearest Oliver. They try to make you think that you have power – but in reality you are only allowing yourself to be ruled according to their constraints. They don't really want you to think for yourself – they want you to memorize their dogma and live by it. If you dare to disagree or criticize or question, then you come up against the most aggressive, vile, and deadly, dangerous creatures on earth: the angry female. If there are women reading this and I have disconcerted you with my description of some of our debauched attributes, don't think too harshly of me, for I truly love being a woman and I wouldn't change that for anything. I love women – I just don't like the choices that many of us have chosen, or brainwashed/indoctrinated to accept as truth.

My journey away from the feminist programming actually began as a child – with my father, no less. He taught me to think for myself and to follow my own instincts as to where and what I should do with my life – regardless of what anyone else should try to persuade or compel me to do or think – and that included him. My dad was the most wonderful, intelligent, strong, loving and giving man I have ever had the honor and privilege to know. Even as a child, if I disagreed with him or his rules, I was encouraged to respectfully but aggressively argue my point. If I did a good job – then the rules were either changed or relaxed. I suppose it was his influence that also caused me to be more comfortable around men than I am around women. (And no – I am not a lesbian.)

I first became suspicious of the feminist movement way back in the 80's when I decided to have a child. I was promptly and unceremoniously alerted that this was the first step in becoming a slave to my husband and a deserter to the cause of advancing the position of women in the world. WHAT??!!! I just wanted to have a child!!! Even then, identifying as a feminist, I felt that having a child was the epitome of womanhood – the ultimate accomplishment.

Then, many years later, and still partly under the influence of the feminist persuasion, I became interested in prisoner advocacy. Of course, as you are all well aware, how many men versus women are in our criminal (in)justice system. So it came to be that most of my advocacy fell upon me helping the very fiends that my feminist "friends" had been warning me about for over a decade. ("Lions and tigers and bears, oh my!") Unacceptable! I was going to be working to help men who were abusers and rapists!!

This is where my dad's teachings once again kicked in: "Yes – this is what I am going to do – whether you chickies like it or not! See ya around sister."

In 2002 I officially became a Prisoner Advocate and soon afterwards, an Anti-Death Penalty Activist. I learned a lot of things about men through these incarcerated men with whom I work and try to help. From an essay I wrote previously:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- I learned that I was not always the final word.
- I learned that I could have had a much harder life.
- I learned that each scar I have is an extension of a lesson I was destined to learn.

- I learned that blood was not always thicker than water – but in the end the liquid didn't matter.
- I learned that it is never smart to chase a rabbit down a rabbit hole.
- I realized that I was a woman not many could identify with.
- I realized that I was a mother to more than those I birthed.
- I realized if the world had just a little more love in it things might actually get better.
- I realized I was not the only nut in the Cracker Jack box, but I would not have it any other way.
- I started to accept myself for who I am and realize that's what I have to want to be.
- I started to move past the "what ifs" and focus on the "now's."

These men were NOT monsters! They were human beings who had fallen into misfortune either by being misled by others or themselves.

Skip ahead a few years, and still somewhat under the influence–January of 2012, to be most precise–I ran across a comment on a Facebook page that offended me. (How dare this man speak such lies about women!) So, me being me, I sent him a private message and told him that I did not like what he was saying and that I would like to discuss it with him. And thus began my introduction to the Pro-Male Movement – Masculinism, to be more precise. He and I had a LONG discussion about why he was saying these things about feminism, i.e.: oppression of men, domestic violence initiated by females, male rape, alimony, child support, parental alienation, false allegations by women, etc.

I listened. I opened my mind – and he opened my eyes.

Unfortunately, this man and I have parted ways due to a disagreement – not having anything to do with feminism. I did not, however, let our disagreement come between my continuing to learn about the true damage that feminism has done to the relationships between men and women.

I am still learning – still absorbing – still making my own decisions on what I think about it all. None of you in the Pro-Male Movement have tried to force me into making these changes in my way of thinking. Indeed – many of you have been understandably suspicious – and still are. That's fine with me – I have nothing to prove to anyone. I have chosen, on my own, how I feel about what I am doing. And I fully admit that I am not, by any means, the perfect, faultless Pro-Male Advocate/Activist. I am still, after all (and unashamedly) a woman.

So feminists – I do love one thing that you taught me: "I am woman – hear me roar" – against you and the destruction that you have brought and still continue to bring along with the hatred, lies, and filth that you propagate! You lied to me (to us) and now the joke is on you because even without feminism, I am empowered – thanks to the men in my life.

And guys – like me or not – trust me or not, I'm here and I like what I am doing and I plan to be around for a long, long time.

Statement from Erin Pizzey on Behalf of MRA London

Greetings to all at AVFM,

I have accepted an invitation from Andy Thomas to become the first Patron of MRA London. It is several months now since I began to work with A Voice for Men and it pleases me immensely to see that they support Andy unequivocally as their representative in the UK. With both organisations now in place I feel as if I have come home. It is very important that men and women can join together to halt the damage that has been done across all Western countries to destroy the family, men and boys.

We recognize that there is an enormous job ahead of us — for so many years now feminists have been able to demonize men under an artificial argument that would have people believe that the so called 'patriarchy' is responsible for all the violence in our societies. Now there is sufficient evidence that both men and women can be equally violent in their personal relationships and for years men and boys have been held to ransom and lived in the knowledge that they are dispensable and shamed.

With new scanning techniques it is now possible to see the damage done to small children who are marinated in violence while still in the womb, only to be born into a violent and dysfunctional home. The scans show the obvious damage to the child's brain and we know now that those children are doomed to grow up and repeat their parents anti-social behaviour, unless therapeutic help is put in place for them. I have always said that the feminists lied about the roots of violence because they were looking for a 'just cause' and funding. So far they have been successful and they have created a billion dollar industry that has circled the globe.

My hope is now that I am in my seventies, the twenty first century will see men and women standing shoulder to shoulder to work together to actively take on the feminists and to prove that domestic violence had never been a gender issue. For forty years this evil empire has had their way, but no longer. I believe that MRA London and A Voice for Men are ready to make international changes and my wish is that we find other people who are willing to join us.

Study: 91% of mothers abuse children, fathers 7%

I will get to the results of that disturbing study in just a bit, but first I want to tell you a related story that has to do with another group of studies regarding women and rape.

On June 19 of 2011 I wrote a piece here at AVFM, titled "Study Reveals Female Rape Victims Enjoyed the Experience." I cited several studies and some articles from Psychology Today that supported the idea that many rape victims actually enjoyed being raped and secretly yearned for it to happen.

The article drew a lot of traffic, and still occasionally goes viral somewhere. It did so yesterday to the tune of 11,000 hits.

The only glitch in the article was that none of it was true. I simply made up a conclusion that women actually enjoyed being raped and then went to find anecdotal evidence in magazine articles that would superficially support that completely insane idea. The "studies" I backed it up with were either non-existent, as in I fabricated them out of thin air – or they were studies that in no way made the conclusions that I claimed they did.

The whole thing was a bunch of malarkey designed to create a destructive and unfair characterization of the average woman's sexual psyche in the most misleading way that I could. Well, misleading up to the last paragraph where I explained to readers that they had "been had," and that the entire piece was a ruse.

At the end of that article, along with my explanation, I linked them to an article by esteemed social researcher Dr. Murray Straus. Unlike me, Straus wasn't kidding. His paper, entitled, "Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence," is an accurate and highly disturbing overview of how feminist academicians and researchers coerce, fabricate, mislead and even attack their way into ensuring that a feminist narrative on domestic violence – one of female only victims and male only perpetrators – is the only thing that sees the light of day in the academic world and subsequently the world at large.

In that reference to Straus' article, which is also now available on this site, I also explained to readers the purpose of my little ruse; to provide an example of how this kind of demagogic deception can harm.

Here's the rub. As Straus eloquently and courageously illustrated in his article, we live in a culture drowning in feminist deceptions. And they are not just limited to lies about the nature of domestic violence. Every time you see a headline about 1 in 4 women being raped[1], about a gender wage gap[2], about a billion women on Earth being beaten and abused[3] or about many other feminist canards that are the stock-in-trade of feminist fundraising and ideological expansion, you are seeing something no different than what you see in the headline of this article, or the one I concocted on women and rape.

It is exactly the same thing.

Well, there is actually one difference. Feminists will not try to grab you at the last moment and tell you, "just kidding." They won't let you know they are lying. They will, in fact, seek to silence you, demonize you, and even destroy you if you do not accept their false propaganda or do a very good job convincing them that you believe.

They will use false conclusions, "evidence" by citation, obstruction and harassment to generate funds, gain political clout, suppress opposing views and further their ideology with depraved indifference to the serious damage they are inflicting on the society around them.

Here is another excellent overview of how the problems manifest. It is well worth watching. (source 1menaregood1)

My Rape Study Reveals article has drawn a great deal of criticism. Most of it is from feminists who, without reading and/or comprehending the entire article, wigged out at my purported conclusions and either commented or emailed me to rage about it. A few of the feminists who have contacted me actually did read the entire piece, understood it, and raged at me anyway because they feared that potential rapists (read: all men) might misunderstand the intent and get the idea that it was permission to sexually violate women.

These, I must assume, would be the same feminists who have no concern whatsoever that the feminist narrative on rape and domestic violence might encourage some women to think they can get away with being abusive. Of course, in their defense, if your worldview does not even acknowledge that women rape or physically abuse men, children and other women, then I suppose it is reasonable that this concern would not enter your mind.

I have to wonder though, how many of them will ever have the light turn on, and come to realize that their outrage only proves the bias that I was pointing at to begin with? I wonder how many will stop to think that the only thing that separates my one article from the overwhelming body of feminist literature and research is that I actually yelled "April Fools!" at the end to let everyone know it was a joke?

I am betting very few.

At any rate, the article remains one of my personal favorites. It averages over 200 hits a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year, with a viral spike here and there that gives our traffic a big boost. Also, and even more importantly, it illustrates very well the nature of the double standard we are up against.

You can sell a long debunked bit of wage gap fluff directly through the mainstream media without having so much as one TV producer or newspaper editor ask for a fact check or an opposing view. At the same time, if you try to push a piece on the real and outrageous death gap where it concerns sex and suicide, you can hold your breath and not run out of air before someone pipes up to point out that you must include that women actually "attempt" suicide more than men, so they are still more affected by the problem.

That prejudicial bias is what you are seeing in all the outrage about my article from 2011. After two years the outrage keeps on coming, and it will for years to come because the plain fact of the matter is that it is perceived as a problem for women. If I were peddling lies that might be construed as harming men, I would not be hearing from any of these people.

Now, I don't, even in my wildest imagination, think that I can make these people care about men. It is just not going to happen. But I can point out their hypocrisy and make them pull their fucking hair out while I do it.

Some days that's good enough.

A Very British Coup

MRA London · 20 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Official Statement from MRA London

What follows is an official statement by Andy Thomas on behalf of MRA London.

On May 4th, 2013, a bizarre coup was attempted within the MRA London. While I was travelling and out of regular contact, a certain member of the group announced to the world that he had been ejected from MRA London by me personally, and put out a widespread appeal to have me “deposed”, “overthrown”, or whatever. He also made a series of even more bizarre allegations against me and several others. Unforgivably, he did not confine his communications to within the group, but reached out to prominent figures outside of MRA London.

All this occurred entirely without my knowledge for several days.

His “reverse coup” failed, ending in farce and bitter recrimination at a meeting in London on May 11th. Although being away from London meant that I could not attend myself, I was reliably informed that, after some disruption, another individual announced that he no longer wished to have any further association with MRA London, and promptly left the meeting.

Now that this sorry state of affairs has died down, as the member who has, by far, invested the most in MRA London, I have decided to take all those who contributed to disunity at their word, and accept their resignations. Their door cards to the building have been cancelled, and their car parking spaces have already been re-allocated.

The simple truth is that MRA London never had a “leader” and, as such, it was never anything other than a loose collection of activists. None of the original accusations were even remotely true, but the irony now, of course, is that the prophecy was a self-fulfilling one, and the original member who made it is now among those who has no association with MRA London.

Far from being a “sad day” for MRA London, I have since come to appreciate that these events were an inevitable and entirely positive step on the road to the grown-up world. After recent weeks, what is left of MRA London is a smaller, but more focused group of clear thinking people — men and women who are serious about why they are here and who are willing to put the higher cause above their own interests and egos. It is a solid foundation on which to move up to the next step.

MRA London exists to smash the schemes of the gender ideologues. We must never forget that boys today are growing up in what is, for them, a dystopia. This, I believe, is where our focus needs to be. If we allow the personal agendas of today’s “wounded warriors” to take precedence, we will loose entire generations tomorrow. I will be making no apology for putting the wider interests of males above those who prefer cultivating their own grievances and self-pity.

In the future, MRA London will be under my control as CEO, with Erin Pizzey as a patron. Erin and I will be working closely together over the coming years to ensure that MRA London develops into a serious player and a force for good in the men’s human rights struggle.

Watch AVFM for a further announcement from Erin herself, shortly.

That is all.

Who are you, man?

John Hembling (JtO) · 21 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hey man, who are you?

I recently called-in to the radio show[1] of a guy whose online bio claims he is a "Cult leader, podcaster, benevolent bully, deep thinker, cat lady, progressive NRA member, huge penis, Thor of Truth hammering and your mentor".

Now, given that list, you might assume, as I did, that the individual who wrote his own bio in such terms was engaging in satire or parody.

"cat lady" ? "huge penis" ? "your [my] mentor" ?

A more detailed reading of his site[2] convinced me that while he might have been joking, he wasn't kidding. I won't bore readers with a comprehensive rebuttal, but it's worth noting a few of the inconsistencies. My reason is not to deride the author. Rather I am motivated that inconsistencies typify a certain popular set of mind, shared widely in what passes for mainstream culture. In addition, the individual also called himself a "supreme alpha male", which I'll return to later.

Later, not because we'll spend any time deconstructing the author, podcaster and cat lady in question, but because although that individual correctly estimates the current social landscape in western culture.

"What has happened to the American male?

Simply put, he has been deconstructed, vetted, redefined, insulted, and in essence, burned to the ground. Prescribed burning at the hands of feminism, in an effort to control, manage, and for all intents and purposes reset him, has forever changed the state of the American man."

These observations will appear self-evident to most within, and even outside the MHRM.

However, his proposed solutions appear to skip entirely past any analysis of causes, shifting economics, technological advance, communications and connectivity, all of which have transformed our world in the last half century. Our friend, the cat lady and Thor of truth takes almost no account of such detail, but proposes a solution. However, he is merely one example of what appears all too common as his conclusions are replicated by others of similar mind.

What conclusions? Here are a few, borrowed again from our friend the benevolent bully and deep thinker.

"So herein lies the terrifying truth… real men are almost extinct."

Admittedly, this is one of his observations, rather than a proposed solution, but alert readers should already have spotted the problem: "real men".

There is no such thing. The phrase "real men" is a term of art, used to shame and control men not complying to an external pattern of behavior or thought. If you aren't a male of sufficient utility to your social betters, disposability and stoic silence in the face of your own injury or marginalization, well son, you're not a real man.

That our Hammer of Truth, Mentor and Alpha Cat Lady uses this term without apparent irony suggests his self identification as a deep thinker may be somewhat premature. Like "good man" the phrase "real man" is an external shackle, placed on the minds of children, and used to yoke them through adulthood to the service of a culture which devalues their humanity in preference to disposable utility and compliance.

There is no such thing as a "good man", or a "real man" except where those terms are used against men and boys, to coerce male compliance with a mode of behavior best described with words like appliance, or slave.

Now, to be fair to the individual whose radio show I called, his webpage, from which I've selected some quotes with which to disagree, also includes points which seem obviously true.

"Whether or not they are aware of it, feminists have created a culture in which a boy born today is medicated for having normal energy. He is left behind in school because teachers feel he does not need extra help, the world is already easy enough for him. Before he is 16 he has been programmed to believe that everything about him is wrong, and that everything wrong with the world is about him. He causes wars, he creates a rape culture, he is stupid, and he is concerned with little more than his continuous participation in various pissing contests.

Boys are assailed by messages on television and in every modern advertisement that man is a dummy, incapable of doing anything right, who instead must wait for his wife to finish rolling her eyes so she can fix whatever mess he's gotten into."

And, a few lines farther on :

"To the modern feminist, boys are a dangerous wildfire that needs to be controlled at all costs."

And what's the solution? Or more precisely, what is Jake Pentland's solution?

"When I think about everything I do, everything for which I have fought and overcome, I try to pinpoint what really drives me as a man. Is it money, recognition, fame? Sure those are part of it, but those motivators don't explain why it is I care so much.

The reason why I care is simple. It's because I want to be a good father.

To me there is no higher goal, no more important quest.

That is what a real man is.

And that is the real reason why America is in the toilet. It is because men are not good fathers anymore."

There it is again, the real man, this time offered as a self definition. And if Jake wants to define his own purpose in life as a good father, good for him. The world needs good fathers. But that's where we find ourselves back in slippery territory. This real man – as offered up by one who self identifies as such is still a definition based on utility to others.

The "real man" – whether conforming to a feminist definition, or to a traditionalist model, is still a referential identity.

The real man is dependent on approval by others, and by utility to others for a positive social identity. If he pauses, for whatever reason, in the job of being a good appliance, and the real man becomes a bad man, or no man at all.

So what about the guy writing this article. Am I a good man?

It depends who you ask. Some within the MHRM would probably say I am. Many outside this movement might disagree. How about an easier question. Am I a real man?

Nope. At least, not according to anybody, whether traditionalist or feminist who entertains the idea of "real man" as anything other than a tool of shame and manipulation.

But I'm not an imaginary man. Which is to say, I exist. It's a feature shared in common with our self defined alpha male, and with every reader of this article, even those who aren't men at all.

A remarkable thing about some people, particularly those who aren't men, is that they are "people" in the sense of having positive social identity, without reference to their utility to others. Their identities are innate, rather than referential.

And this is where we come to a question of male identity. Who are you, man?

That question is more than simple rhetoric, and it's not one I have any illusions about being capable of supplying an answer to, other than for myself.

Jake Pentland asks this question too, although he also limits the scope of his answer, returning to a potential male identity limited to that which must not offend who Jake recognizes as the real owners of whatever identity he might claim.

"So what is a man to do? How do we redefine ourselves so as not to be threatening to women, yet still honor our genuine essence?"

I have no idea what "genuine essence" is, but I do know that however I might define myself, whether that definition is threatening, appealing, appalling or even of interest to anyone else is far far down the list of priorities.

"How do we redefine ourselves so as not to be threatening to women…"

Why is any question of male self identity or self definition framed with the added and superfluous baggage of anyone else's feelings?

"… so as not to be threatening to women.."?!!

It seems fairly obvious that as a member of a species of social animal, the opinions and attitudes, and even emotions of others, including women, do feature prominently in matters of personal conduct, behavior and so on. I am not, and most of the readers of this site are not sociopaths.

But.

In the question of self definition as a man, who gives a fuck what somebody else thinks?

In self determination of identity; in defining oneself as a man, who gives a fuck what women think?

Well, "real men" apparently place that consideration before all others. And that consideration, in turn, supplies us all the answer to Jake Pentland's question:

"How do we redefine ourselves so as not to be threatening to women"?

By being men whose identity does not exist without referential and deferential dependence on the emotions and the approval of others. There's your alpha male. There's your Thor of truth, hammering.

And this leaves only my relatively simple question to answer.

So, who are you, man?

On AVFM and MRA London

Paul Elam · 21 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In keeping with yesterday's announcements I want to offer a clarification of AVFM's position on recent events at MRA London.

As most of you who follow things here know, there has been a shake-up within that UK men's rights group which has resulted in disputes between members over who is in charge, and even if there ever was a group over which anyone was ever in charge.

Being situated in Texas and having had conflicting accounts with different members of the group has added even more to the confusion, but I have been provided with enough information to make a decision on what AVFM policy will be regarding the entity MRA London.

Before I go into the details of that decision there are some things I want to make clear. First, neither I nor AVFM as a whole were in any way involved in the internal problems of MRA London. I received sketchy reports from different people involved as to their take on problems, but the problems themselves were entirely internal to that organization. I doubt seriously that anyone on either side of this would dispute that.

I have no position at all on who was "right or wrong" in terms of their internal dispute. My decision to continue to recognize Andy Thomas as the AVFM connection to MRA London was not based on a determination that he was right and his opponents were wrong, but on our established history and other factors that I will expand on later in this statement.

I am not in the least interested in trying to ascertain who was more or less at fault in MRA London's internal conflicts. It is not that I am indifferent to right and wrong in this case, but simply as a pragmatic matter I cannot and won't try to wade through several weeks/months of infighting, insinuation and accusations between people in conflict 8,000 miles from here and even pretend that I can come up with an informed judgment.

Anyone and everyone is welcome to cast blame on me for my choices all they want, but any suggestion that I had a hand in MRA London's implosion are in error. I am simply trying to pick up the pieces here in a way that benefits the mission of this website.

That means I am not picking sides, but instead picking what looks to me to be the best path for AVFM and for the MHRM, generally speaking.

My experience here is with Andy Thomas as the official liaison between MRA London and AVFM. That has been on our masthead for months. All my official dealings with the organization have been with Andy. Andy is the owner and webmaster of mralondon.org. Andy was the individual from MRA London that spearheaded all the activism I was aware of, including the confrontation with officials of the Irish London Center which eventually led to the Radfems being locked out of that venue.

Andy remains, in my view, the one individual who has led activism efforts from that group. The only other person affiliated with MRA London that I had any regular dealings with is Erin Pizzey.

Speaking of Erin, she has already come out in support of Andy in this dustup.

The question now becomes one of simply dealing with realities on the ground as they are at this moment, and remembering that aside from all the drama and theatrics, my obligation is to foster and follow the activism.

Implosions like this are messy. People get hurt, on all sides. Betrayal is felt, on all sides. Fingers are pointed in all directions, and no matter where you land your support, you are going to pay a price with someone.

If it is like every other situation like this I have encountered, there is blame enough to go around for everyone. Like I said, though, it is not my position, nor am I interested in it being my position, to attempt to sort out and pass judgment on someone else's mess. My only job here is to protect AVFM and to ally with individuals and groups that have the potential to enhance our efforts.

So to cut to the chase, several factors become clear.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- At best, MRA London in its previous form was a loose amalgamation of individuals with a shared interest in men's activism;
- There was no central authority for the group that we know of;
- The only actual activists that we had any formal relationship with out of MRA London were Andy Thomas and Erin Pizzey;
- Andy Thomas is the owner and webmaster of mralondon.org and is the only one that has ever acted in that capacity;
- Andy Thomas is asserting ownership of the name MRA London while this is in conflict with others in the organization;
- Andy Thomas is asserting that he is the official leader of that group, which is also in dispute by other members;
- Andy presents as the most compelling and credible candidate to actually use the MRA London group, in whatever form it ultimately takes, as a platform to launch organized and directed forms of men's rights activism;
- Current rumor (unconfirmed) is that the previous members of MRA London have already formed a new group, under a new banner. So, the decision here is a relatively simple one.

AVFM recognizes Andy Thomas, as it always has, as the official liaison between AVFM and MRA London. And since he now singularly asserts his authority over the name and infrastructure of the group, we recognize that as well.

There are other factors, having to do with the best interests of AVFM and the MHRM, that lend more support to our decision to maintain the historical relationship we have had with Andy Thomas of MRA London. I am not at liberty to discuss them, but they are compelling.

That being said, in my mind any additional reasons are not necessary. The case is made quite clear without relying on the other reasons.

I understand fully that there will be dissent to this action. Anyone who likes, including other members or former members of MRA London and other interested parties are welcome to voice that dissent in the comments to this announcement.

What will not be allowed is for any conflicts or residual resentments about this to infect this site as a whole. This is the thread for bickering, if people want it, but I won't allow the disagreements to spill over into subsequent posts to this website.

The AVFM position has been established on this, and now we intend to move on back to our mission. What happened to MRA London won't be repeated here.

As a footnote to these events, there was some criticism that dirty laundry was being hung out. I understand the distaste for that. I have learned some of those lessons the hard way. But the fact is that this shakeup was not going to go unnoticed. If anyone concerned about the public nature of the dispute feels they could have handled it more effectively than getting it out and done, the comments here are also a good place to detail your plans.

In time, this affair will pass. I am fully confident that most, if not all the members and former members of MRA London will move on to better days, having learned from the experience.

Tonight we have as our guest Justin Vacula, atheist and blogger who is famous for his criticism of Athiesm+, a movement that purports to be about social justice coming from an atheist perspective, but in actuality is a feminist co-option scheme. AVFM News interviewed Justin on Saturday the 18th during the Women in Secularism2 conference held in Washington D.C. which hosted many speakers Justin had criticized for their dogmatic views on gender and sexism in the atheist community. We will be talking about the conference and the fallout from a highly controversial speech given by Ronald Lindsay, CEO of the Center for Inquiry, the organization that hosted the event

Tonight is going to be a fun opportunity for atheists from both within and outside of the MRM to call in and discuss Atheism+, feminism and Vacula's treatment of both.

The show starts at 8pm Central Time on May 21st.
That's 2am in London on May 22nd.

Spanish Gender Stalinism – Part I

Lucian Vâlsan · 21 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Over two months ago, I wrote a comprehensive story about the Gender Stalinist regime instituted in Spain, following the election of José Louis Zapatero (Partido Socialista Obrero Español – The Spanish Socialist Workers' Party) as prime minister and the enactment of the Law nr. 1/2004, also known as Ley Contra la Violencia de Género (Organic Act of Integrated Protection Measures against Gender Violence).

Last Friday, on the Voice of Europe Radio program, we had Antonia Carrasco as our guest[1]. She is the president of Asociación de Víctimas de la Ley de Violencia de Género Madrid (The Association of the Victims of the Gender Violence Law – Madrid) and what she had to say about the long years of the Gender Law makes the term "Gender Stalinism" seem rather mild and incomplete when it comes to describing the brutal misandric tyranny that this Law has furthered.

So now, for the first time in the English language, we will be publishing a comprehensive report about what happened in Spain between 2004 and 2012, a report issued by the aforementioned association alongside with another association called Feminist Association for Equality (FEMII). The report is lengthy and we will publish it in a two part article.

Part 1

ANALYSIS OF THE FIRST 8-YEARS OF THE SPANISH LAW OF "GENDER VIOLENCE"

2004 – 2012

January 2013

This past December marked the eighth anniversary of the implementation of Spain's rather infamous Law 1/2004, a law that aimed to "guarantee integrated protection measures against Gender Violence".

The General Council of Judicial Power (CGPJ) has now published the official statistics for this period, allowing an in-depth analysis of the legal effects of the law in regards to: a) women, as beneficiaries of the law, b) men, as subjects of the law, and c) police forces: responsible for implementing the law and its policies.

Due to the widespread controversy created in Spanish society by the adoption of the law, during these eight years many groups have been formed in its support, yet equally, many others arose to questioned it's very legality, many of which have been formed by citizens directly affected by the law itself. It is undeniable that this topic has been one of the most hotly debated issues due to the intense interest it has generated amongst members of various professional institutions, equally as much as in the associations of affected citizens and general detractors of the law of "Gender Violence".

Questionable Constitutionality

In our opinion, the law of "Gender Violence", that is to say a law defined as violence against women originating exclusively from male partners, is in itself, unconstitutional and should never have been approved. The pre-approval reports issued by the General Council of the Judiciary, the State Council and the Attorney General, were extremely negative and warned of serious legal and constitutional consequences. The question we ask ourselves is why was it approved despite the negative reports issued by important advisory bodies?

This law is fundamentally sexist (protecting only female partners), legally asymmetric and unidirectional. The law interprets lesser acts of violence committed by a woman against a man as a misdemeanor, whereas if the perpetrator is a man, it is interpreted as a crime. It also disregards the right that a Spanish citizen may not suffer discrimination on the grounds of sex. But what is most alarming is that the constitutional principle of presumption of innocence becomes, in the case of a man, a presumption of guilt, reversing the burden of proof, forcing the accused to prove his innocence beyond doubt, directly violating several international laws ratified by Spain, which guarantee the presumption of innocence, as for example, article 14.2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 6.2 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

After the board of Spain´s Constitutional Court had been "reorganized" by the past government, it declared the law of "Gender Violence" constitutional by just one vote, basing the judgment on the fact that the perpetrators of the majority of domestic violence are overwhelmingly male, and as such allowing the imposition of heavier penalties against men. Following this reasoning, as a renowned jurist mentioned at the time, given that the majority of the prison population is foreign, the legislature could just as well amend the Criminal Code to set a higher penalty on crimes committed by foreigners, as opposed to those committed by nationals!

With the law in vigor, numerous Spanish feminist associations began to make recommendations to women seeking assistance that instead of going to a family therapist – that existed for the very purpose – that they applied to a court of "gender violence" to resolve their marital or family issues. There are sites such as www.infomaltrato.com, where they recommend making a complaint to the police for numerous types of issues.

Obviously, there are many instances that relate to serious abuse, thus reporting the matter and requesting protection measures are reasonable, but a substantial number of cases have been based on trivial complaints, such as not letting the female partner watch a certain TV program, or not letting them finish a crossword, or even criticizing the partners clothes.

If we visit this site and read all the cases in which the recommendation is to make a police report, almost all men should be reported for abuse, as it is difficult if not impossible for a couple to never suffer one of these type of minor squabbles at some moment during their relationship.

Apart from these issues, economic motivations have been created in which a woman becomes automatically entitled with just simple certificate of "bad treatment" issued by a women's association (and without even a court judgment), to receive aid of several thousand euros or more having reported their male partner. The complaint only has to be within any of the many cases defined in this link.

Once a female partner has filed a complaint, the steps that the police and Women's Court can take are often emotionally scarring for many of the men involved. Without trial, and often without evidence or any sign of physical violence, men of all positions are often arrested by police, even at their place of work, and taken into custody. Sometimes this is done on a Friday, with the result that the man may have to spend the entire weekend in a cell if he does not "fully cooperate". Judges at the Women's Courts usually give an immediate "distance order", which can result in the man being unable to attend his work if his partner is also working at the same location.

Obviously there are no statistics about collateral victims, but we cannot forget that behind every unfairly accused man, there are family, friends and many others that can be affected watching the suffering caused by an ordeal of this nature that may last years until they are finally acquitted.

In the accompanying article from 2009, a judge of a Madrid Court for "Gender Violence" stated that in 2007 he handled some 5000 cases, and that with such a saturation of cases for all types of petty complaints, many real cases of domestic violence were left unprotected having devoted resources to those that in reality needed little more than family counseling, which is the case in the vast majority of allegations, as shown below.

This same judge, exhausted from all the cases, freed a man in error, who had been imprisoned temporarily for gender violence, who later broke a restraining order for assault, breaking into the home of his former partner with a 12-gauge shotgun and, after physically and sexually assaulting her, held a 6 hour siege at her home with shotgun in hand, tying up a police negotiator team in the process.

In domestic violence, as it is called in Europe, or gender violence in Spain (which excludes violence against male, homosexual partners, or children), Spain is the only country in the European Union and developed countries, where the law differentiates between men and women in the same crime or misdemeanor, and the only country in which Courts exist dedicate to the exclusive prosecution of men; with 106 "Gender Violence" Courts in total.

Actual statistics: In the seven years since the law was implemented, the Women's Courts have processed 963,471 criminal cases against men, of which just 10% (101,900) related to cases where signs of violence could be seen. A total of 520,839 sentences where handed down against men where no physical signs of violence could be found, and where in many cases, the only evidence was that of the ex partner.

Of nearly one million cases against men, just 33,473 related to serious violence.

IS EVERY CASE MACHO-BASED VIOLENCE?

In most European countries the cause of domestic aggression is investigated and fully reported. In Spain, this has not been the case: the Spanish judiciary have assumed that all aggression against women has a sexist basis. For example, when it comes to aggression caused by jealousy following infidelity, if the aggressor is male, it is automatically considered "macho" violence, or "violencia de género", exclusively from male perpetrators aimed at women for being women.

However, when the aggressor is a jealous woman, or when a woman is under the influence of alcohol, drugs, or diseases such as schizophrenia, the cause is not considered to be feminist violence against men. Machismo, or violence against women, is a very distinct concept in Spain, and is used to push the statistics that justify the vast economic and media barrage aimed at so-called gender violence. Regardless of the propaganda in Spain, the statistics on "gender violence" murders in Spain are the lowest in Europe.

The aggressive national campaigns against gender violence since the law was implemented, where, as mentioned earlier, women were strongly encouraged to report any and all types of relationship problems to the Police, including, for example, where a man had simply raised his voice against his partner, have created a collective paranoia that has led many women to report their partner, with many subsequent arrests and prosecutions, with many men being condemned and forced to take rehabilitation courses.

However, far from rehabilitating these hundreds of thousands of men, it seems that in some cases more violence has occurred, by men embittered by unjust and often ruthless treatment in Women's Courts that only serve the interests of women. Given the actual statistics, it seems that the gender violence campaigns of "Zero Tolerance" would have us believe that a molehill is a mountain and a mountain a molehill.

How has social propaganda in Spain achieved to paint all domestic violence as macho? In our view, the strategy used was, in short, very similar to the 11 principles of propaganda created by Goebbels and used by the Nazis to raise awareness among German citizens of the "Jewish problem".

In his book Mein Kampf, Adolf Hitler explains how the media is essential in the indoctrination of the public. What is truly sad is that history shows us that these techniques work perfectly time and again.

> Whatever definition we may give to the term 'public opinion', only a very small part of it originates from personal experience or individual insight. The greater portion of it results from the manner in which public matters have been presented to the people through an overwhelmingly impressive and persistent system of 'information'.
> In the religious sphere the profession of a denominational belief is largely the result of education, while the religious yearning itself slumbers in the soul; so too the political opinions of the masses are the final result of influences systematically operating on human sentiment and intelligence in virtue of a method which is > applied sometimes with almost-incredible thoroughness and perseverance.

> By far the most effective branch of political education, which in this connection is best expressed by the word 'propaganda', is carried on by the Press. The Press is the chief means employed in the process of political 'enlightenment'. It represents a kind of school for adults. This educational activity, however, is not in the hands of the State but in the clutches of powers that are partly of a very inferior character. While still a young man in Vienna I had excellent opportunities for coming to know the men who owned this machine for mass instruction, as well as those who supplied it with the ideas it distributed. At first I was quite surprised when I realized how little time was necessary for this dangerous Great Power within the State to produce a certain belief among the public; and in doing so the genuine will and convictions of the public were often completely misconstrued. It took the Press only a few days to transform some ridiculously trivial matter into an issue of national importance, while vital problems were completely ignored or filched and hidden away from public attention.

STATISTICS FOR DECEASED GENDER VIOLENCE

Figures shown below are from the French authorities, and relate to deaths within the scope of couples, produced by a variety of causes rather than the "sole and indisputable" one that is promoted in Spain, namely macho violence. As we can see below, the motives and circumstances of domestic violence resulting in death, are: discussion, alcohol, separation, jealousy, depression, drugs, medication, mental illness. Source: French National Assembly.

In a 2006 study by the Centro Reina Sofia, that excluded countries whose population were very small, such as Monaco and Andorra, Spain holds sixth place from bottom, with a rate of 2 people per million murdered (81) through domestic violence, this being just below Bulgaria, Ireland, the Netherlands, Slovakia and Scotland. All other European countries are above this rate. 12.37 Cyprus, Austria 9.40, Finland 9.35, Czech Republic 8.15, 7.14 Croatia, Estonia 6.38, Hungary 5.95, France 5.22, 5.09 Luxembourg, England 4, 20, Norway 3.67, Italy 3.66, Slovenia 3.99, 2.81 SPAIN.

Based on these figures, the European average is 3.94 deaths per million people. It should be noted that the implementation of law 1/2004 of Gender Violence in Spain did not result in this reduced level of female deaths, in contrary, death rates increased following the law.

CUSTODY AND GENDER VIOLENCE

At this time, the government is expected to approve the joint custody law nationally. Will this affect the number of cases of domestic violence?

The Civil Code, Article 92.7, states that joint custody will not be allowed if either parent is the subject of criminal proceedings or when a Judge finds evidence of domestic violence. This opens the door to an increase in the number of reports by women of "bad treatment", to ensure that child custody will be awarded to the mother exclusively. This is nothing new, in Aragon the joint custody law was passed in late 2010, following which in 2011 complaints increased by 25.40%. What will happen nationwide on adoption of the Joint Custody law?

GENDER VIOLENCE LAW AND MALE POLICE OFFICERS

Male member of the Spanish police forces have not been strangers to this problem. A lot of our associations have come from different bodies at all levels. Police officers (Guardia Civil, local and national Police) have been reported from the constables to high-ranking officers, the vast majority in divorce and without any form of aggression or physical injuries.

In some cases, the fear of being expelled from the Police for a sentence exceeding two years, has led many policemen to accept lesser convictions for crimes they had not committed, including those who had been arrested and charged without evidence against them, simply to avoid long and costly court cases and heavy penalties that would affect their careers. Take the case of an officer who was reported for psychological abuse by his ex-wife. The simple existence of the complaint of gender violence gave his ex-wife guaranteed Court support against her former husband, who immediately not only lost shared custody, by also lost the chance for promotion, international missions, and future decorations.

As far as he's concerned, he lost sole custody and a future in the service, yet his ex-wide continued to collect a government allowance and kept the family home, whose mortgage was half paid, in addition to receiving economic benefits as a "battered woman", although there had been absolutely no evidence of any physical violence, and the psychological violence had only one witness, the ex-wife herself. Finally, this officer was prosecuted for serious misconduct by a Police disciplinary committee, and received a fine.

We call attention to two issues: the first is the lack of monitoring of complaints of psychological abuse by social services, and the other is disciplinary action taken following such complaints. The quick response from Police authorities to take disciplinary action violates, in our judgment, the right under national and international law, ratified by Spain, to not punish the same crime twice. The inability to access official figures of officials accused in this type of offense or the circumstances surrounding them, as in other countries, i.e. unpublished statistics, leaves us unable to consider the scale of the problem.

We believe, therefore, that the Secretary of State for Security should make public the detailed statistics of the agents involved in gender violence complaints and create a protocol for psychological assessment to allow officers some level of protection from false complaints.

The second part will be published by the end of this week.

Jake Pentland on AVFM Radio

Recently I appeared on the Jake Pentland Show on Blog Talk Radio to discuss feminism and masculinity. It was an interesting discussion where Jake and I found a few points we agreed on, but was often interrupted by the shrill and irrational vomiting of bad ideas from the female nincompoops associated with his show.

Still, I really enjoyed the experience, and it got me to thinking. What would it be like to talk to Jake Pentland 1 on 1 about feminism and manhood without the rude and ill-informed party crashing by the local femistasi?

You can find out tomorrow, in a special episode of AVFM Radio. It will be Jake and I, no mute button, no high-pitched wailing and no Roseanne Barr.

But we will be taking your calls, right after I get through kicking Pentland's ass.

The time will be 8:00 pm Central, tomorrow, May 23, 2013

Male suicide is funny! Marketing gone wrong

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 22 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hyundai once said male suicide is funny. No really, they did.

For those of you who have not seen the ad, a minute is dedicated to a sad looking man running a hose from his car tailpipe to his cab and trying to go to sleep while the emissions flow onto his face. The ad then cuts to a shot of the garage from the outside, where the man opens the garage door and the following text appears on screen:

"The new ix35 with 100% water emissions"

This was supposed to be a joke. Are you laughing?

This ad serves as an example of systemic misandry because it was approved by a marketing agency that would never consider the same ad with a woman in place of the solemn senior. Now, Hyundai removed the ad with their apologies.

Thank you for the apology Hyundai, but you are merely a symptom of the disease.

Kindly look to the comments of the linked story above. They hover around defense of free speech and positive evaluations of the ad. Look at these sick contributions, for example:

- Quote*: I've been in broadcast marketing for 25 years. Basically, this is a good ad. If they had put a positive spin on the end with the guy realizing how blessed he was and being glad the the auto manufacture gave him a second chance….it would have been effective.*

Hear that, gents? If your granddad was filmed shooting himself with a chocolate gun, his perceived idiocy can be used as a path to brand loyalty!

- Quote*: Grow some skin? People today are offended at everything, I am tired of these thin skinned tyrants making a huge deal out of every little thing.*
- Quote: I see nothing wrong… People are too sensitive. It's a joke, get over it.

Just so we are clear, you can tell me any offensive joke in the world, and I might laugh. I have heard racist jokes, sexist jokes, Holocaust jokes and worse, and I have laughed at examples of each. Why? Because I can tell they are jokes, they are not serious, and I can tell the joker is not serious either. Hell, I'm sure you could also tell me a joke about suicide and get laughs. I just need to know that the joke is actually a joke, otherwise I will know it is a genuine expression of hatred. I would never laugh at a racist joke told by a Klan member, or a sexist joke told by a living, breathing misogynist or misandrist. Because I know their mouths speak not jokes, but apologetic expressions of horrendous ideologies.

So, I don't care if people say whatever they want. That's not the issue, so no calls of censorship will ever leave my throat. I will, however, talk back.

The Hyundai ad paints a sinister picture, since it is used for the ultimate goal of profit, and a marketing agency's job is to make ads based on an understanding of the culture it's talking to. What is so offensive is that they assumed male suicide was not a "hot button" issue, and was therefore an asset. Hyundai tried to profit from this assumption, and people who liked the ad still stand in support today!

So should you be offended? Absolutely, especially if you have a loved one who passed on by his own hand. Comedy should be used a tool to lighten moods and brighten days, not as a tool to marginalize others. People pretend that this distinction is purely subjective, but it isn't. Who says what is a joke, and what isn't? Here's how you can tell:

Does the person or agency telling the joke genuinely believe the hateful statements being said? If the answer is "yes," then he isn't actually joking.

The Hyundai ad in isolation is not offensive. It's the fact that the ad is culturally approved. Hyundai spoke to a culture, and in order for this nightmare of an ad to get past the filter of risk management, they had to feel that we would approve of it. This ad aired because people thought the concept of male suicide alone was funny, joke or no joke. Male suicide is a source of comedy, as opposed to a potential topic for your politically incorrect barmate to twist in the name of good fun.

So, Hyundai should not take all the blame. It was merely a puppet to market forces. But when UK copywriter Holly Brockwell wrote an open letter to both Hyundai and their marketing agency Innocean on her blog, only then did things go south for Hyundai. I wonder if the ad would have even been taken down if she had not written that post. I would go so far as to say that if no woman cried as a result of this ad, nothing would have be done about it.

So, Hyundai and Innocean are rightfully ashamed, but our culture is not. The same people who defend this ad are the same people who would carry torches and pitchforks if the man in this video was actually a woman. The real crime here is blatant misandry, and the fact that a large budget was allocated to a quality production of male suicide for comedic purposes churns my stomach.

I don't care what reckless punks have to say about comedy: This ad was not a joke. It was an expression of culture. Our culture. The same culture that looks at itself and this ad and somehow thinks its a better idea to talk about an imaginary "rape" culture.

If you needed any proof of how fucked up the zeitgeist is, look no farther than the concept of your father jumping off a cliff being witnessed for someone else's enjoyment and profit.

News Release: DV is not “men only”

Unprecedented Domestic Violence Study Affirms Need to Recognize Male Victims

New York, NY (PRWEB) May 21, 2013

The most comprehensive review of the scholarly domestic violence research literature ever conducted concludes, among other things, that women perpetrate physical and emotional abuse, as well as engage in control behaviors, at comparable rates to men. The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project, or PASK, whose final installment was just published in the journal Partner Abuse, is an unparalleled three-year research project, conducted by 42 scholars at 20 universities and research centers, and including information on 17 areas of domestic violence research.

“Over the years, research on partner abuse has become unnecessarily fragmented and politicized,” commented John Hamel, Editor-in-Chief of Partner Abuse and PASK Director. “The purpose of this project is to bring together, in a rigorously evidence-based, transparent and methodical manner, existing knowledge about partner abuse, with reliable, up-to-date research that can easily be accessed by anyone. PASK is grounded in the premises that everyone is entitled to their opinion, but not to their own facts; that these facts should be available to everyone, and that domestic violence intervention and policy ought to be based upon these facts rather than ideology and special interests.”

Among PASK’s findings are that, except for sexual coercion, men and women perpetrate physical and non-physical forms of abuse at comparable rates, most domestic violence is mutual, women are as controlling as men, domestic violence by men and women is correlated with essentially the same risk factors, and male and female perpetrators are motivated for similar reasons.

“Although research confirms that women are more impacted by domestic violence,” stated Hamel, “these findings recommend important intervention and policy changes, including a need to pay more attention to female-perpetrated violence, mutual abuse, and the needs of male victims.”

Hamel also argues that men are not only disproportionately arrested in domestic violence cases, but sometimes arrested for arbitrary reasons, citing, for example, that police often arrest the bigger and stronger party in cases where the perpetrator is unclear. “Such policies are not only ineffective but violate people’s civil rights,” Hamel concludes.

> “People in the domestic violence field say that ‘it’s all about the victims.’ Well, the victim is not always the one hit, but sometimes the one arrested.”

Welcome to the Femtriarchy

Patriarchy is real.

That's right. That thing on which feminists continuously blame all of the world's problems is real. Except as anyone who speaks up for the rights of men and boys knows, when spoken through the feminist ideology, "patriarchy" is just a not-so-clever smokescreen word for "men." There was a time when feminists held no fear of this fact, vehemently proclaiming that men were the cause of women's problems and all of the problems of the world. Men start the wars, men murder, men beat, and men rape. Fathers and their sons and their friends: they're all just a bunch of "fucking men." That is what many feminists used to shout with not one worry of who might be listening. There was no worry because there were no repercussions. No social stigma for proclaiming half the human race to be pigs.

Instead society cheered them on. So feminists amped up their hatred unimpeded until finally the fathers, sons, brothers, and uncles who marched alongside these people, believing their goal to be one of equality, grew tired of being told they are a detriment to the human race. Men finally stopped absorbing hateful statements such as "men are pigs" after realizing that their fathers, sons, and brothers weren't the horrible monsters feminists claimed.

And this is when feminists changed their tactics. To this day, men are still blamed for the problems women face and for the problems of the world by feminists. Yet rarely is the word "men" used within the public sphere. Instead, we are told "patriarchy" is the reason why so many suffer injustice and inequality. When men are blamed, feminists take care not to directly proclaim men as the problem. We are told that "violence against women" is among one of the most pressing issues that need to be addressed (even though men are the majority of victims of violence, but never mind that). But we're told that there's violence against women not because of men, oh no, it's because of "patriarchy" that men beat women.

You see? Feminists don't blame "men," they blame "patriarchy." It's the fault of "the patriarchy" that men start wars, men murder, men beat, and men rape. "Men aren't pigs. That's so second wave." Instead they say men are just misguided by our "patriarchal" society and need feminism in order to become decent human beings.

With all of the sarcastic ridiculing of a feminist theory that I obviously feel when I do my music and my advocacy work–and I ridicule it because it is ludicrous and hateful–why did I start this article off with huge letters acknowledging the existence of patriarchy? Well, because it's real. No, really, it is. You see back before I or any of the feminists screaming about injustices faced by women of the past were born; long before iPhones and Samsung Galaxies; before washers, dryers, dishwashers, cars, airplanes, and all of the technologies that have given human beings the time and ability to become pop culture critics making a living talking about stuff instead of working a field for three quarters of a day, men and women fell into what are known by many as "gender roles." Men built things and women cooked things. Men invented things and women looked after children. Contrary to popular feminist propagation, men didn't force women into these roles, and women didn't force men into them. They were just what made sense for most people.

Men also were never solely given "privileges" over women through these roles, although belief in their "privilege" is the main focal point of the feminist ideology from which all other theories and mantras of hate produced by feminism are derived. Feminism took just half of the story and ran with that. Men also had crushing obligation and had no freedom to refuse that obligation in most cases. And females had privilege too, matriarchal privilege, to go along with their own obligations. The reason why it has taken so long for feminist bigotry to be challenged in the mainstream is simple: the half of the story they took was true, to some extent. While women weren't the slaves of their husbands, doomed to be beaten and raped throughout their lives with no legal recourse, women were mostly relegated to their roles as caregivers in the home because that was the only thing that made sense unless they never had children. So it was easy for western societies to grant women freedom from these roles when it wasn't necessary to leave it all to them and leave most of the providing and self-sacrifice to the men.

There was resistance, from both men and women because as I said: patriarchy, it be real. Although we forgot matriarchal privilege was always real under that. It always had matriarchy with it too, you didn't disobey your mother or grandmother or disrespect her or treat her like property or beat on women, that was always looked down on or very strongly limited (but with nowhere near as many limits on women if they got violent).

And change is a slow, and most of the time unwanted, process. People just don't like change, it's uncomfortable. But that change did happen (faster than it should have in my opinion thanks to the boost feminists got from jumping on the backs of an actual civil rights struggle–but I digress). The good thing is women were freed from their roles, due in small part to feminist shouting, and in large part to average women who just said she wanted change, and men went along with it because mostly, men have always done whatever women ask them to do. Most women just didn't make it a point to remind the public that all men were pigs, and most men welcomed the change for women once they had a little time to get used to it.

And Teh menz?

Oh, well what about 'em? Feminists didn't forget about men. Ask Erin Pizzey. The mere suggestion that men might have it almost as bad as women when it comes to domestic violence got a pretty significant reaction from feminists. Death threats, bomb threats, harassment, shooting her dog; you name it. You see back in that time before electricity and the internet, men weren't just expected to provide for and protect women, they were obligated to. This obligation is still deeply embedded into the social consciousness of all nations on the planet. Why? Well the answer is simple:

Patriarchy hurts men too.

It's true. No, for really reals it is true. Put the stones down, MRAs. Stop creaming your pants, feminists. I'm not done yet.

Obviously this system of living is dated. The only thing men and women need in order to have a roof over their head, food, and even entertainment, is money. There is an old saying that money makes the world go round. I happen to think that technology is also what makes the world go round; money is just the fuel. So with no need of a man, a woman can basically do whatever she wants. I won't go so far as to say there are no expectations placed on women — but obligations? I can't think of any. Women are no longer obligated to bear or care for children. They are no longer obligated to be homemakers. Women are free to choose.

And Teh Menz?

Well, this part of the article is where feminists stop creaming their pants and start pissing them. Male obligations still exist, all of the most detrimental ones anyway. The male obligation to protect women from physical harm at the cost of his own life still exists. The male obligation to finance a woman's well-being still exists. The male obligation to ensure the survival of women over men, made blatantly apparent by the lopsided amount of medical care created special for women, still exists. The male is still obligated to respect the female and her feelings no matter what. That's your matriarchal privilege right there, that women are still holding onto for all it's worth, especially feminist women.

That's why I call it Femtriarchy.

Ok. I'll admit some of those old obligations are now just high expectations. Men aren't being imprisoned for not jumping in front of bullets for women anymore, although we still shame a man and call him a man a coward if he says "no." The financial obligation is, however, still alive and well in our highly advanced twenty-first century society. Broke and can't pay alimony or child support? Welcome to Debtor's Prison, the prison so resilient it exists even when our laws say it shouldn't.

Why, you ask, would barbaric obligations and expectations such as these still exist today in our society? Well, there are an assortment of reasons, stubbornness being one. That old resistance to change we humans have ingrained in our psyches. Traditionalist men and women are another reason. It is those women who crave to be stripped of their agency, to be completely dependent on the men in their lives. And it is the men with no sense of self-worth compared to that of women who contribute greatly to the acceptance and enforcement of the above-mentioned obligation and expectation. These are women who want men to take all the burden of adult responsibility off of them, which is why they're the flip side of the feminist coin: feminists demand traditional female privilege, but don't want any of the traditional obligation; traditionalist women want to keep the old female tradition, and to leave all responsibility to the men, which is all "submission" really means; when it's an adult choosing to "submit" it's just an adult giving up responsibility. It's win/win for women, see how that works? Either way, everything's left on the teh menz.

Take away the old female matriarchal roles of the patriarchy and only enforce the male obligations and presto, instant governmental funding. Like I said at the start of this article; patriarchy is real.

And patriarchy today has a new name: Its name is Feminism. Or Femtriarchy, if you will.

When those who don't follow the feminist ideology voice concerns about the number of male victims of domestic abuse; when they voice concerns about how there are virtually no domestic violence shelters for men compared to the thousands made for women (and they rub it in with the false accusations of misogyny and claims of trying to tear down said women's shelters, which no one's doing); when they ignore female perpetrators of violence and sex crimes; when they call it "more equality" when women are the majority of college graduates and often make more money than men do for the same hours worked; when the stigma of violence is placed on men and women's violence is downplayed; and on a whole bunch of other things where men have the short end of the stick and women have the upper hand, when women can just accuse a man of rape and ruin his life, we who care about men and boys are still told it's the fault of "patriarchy." And we know what you really mean: you mean it's men's fault period.

So what do feminists, the heroic champions of equality blessed with hammers fit for smashing patriarchy do? They dismiss and suppress any and all evidence that shows violence between men and women is roughly equal, women just get away with it easier. When they can't dodge the fact that violence between men and women is equal, they scoff at the idea of men being able to suffer on any scale comparable to women and state that because "men can do more damage with their bare hands" violence against women is the more severe problem, deserving of more (read: all) attention. They create a legal act, the Violence Against Women Act, which pretends to be gender-neutral, but which in reality happens to be the reason why it is perfectly legal to arrest men who are suffering at the hands of abusive women using the bullshit "Duluth Model." They run an advocacy campaign through all forms of social media, which portrays only men as violent abusers and only women as victims, spreading this message all over the Western world.

Meanwhile, old school Patriarchy tells us the same thing: women are weak, men are obliged to protect them and bow to their sensitivities any time they demand. That was the old female privilege–and Feminism tells us the same thing. They don't say women are weak, they say women are strong, but men are obligated to bend over backwards for them anyway. That's why I call it Femtriarchy.

The old school Patriarchy gives society the perception that the only thing men want is sex and women need to be protected from it; that women should always be fearful of men they don't know and even the men they do know because all of those men are potential rapists. Feminism tells us the same damn thing–just ask the fellows who run the "men can stop rape" campaign.

Legally, it isn't a man's obligation to defend random women he doesn't know, but if you ask feminists they'll say it damn well should be. It is every man's obligation to "end rape," because even if a woman raping a man is possible, the numbers of male victims of rape and female perpetrators are so insignificant they fail to require much mentioning. Except for the fact that they aren't insignificant, which is something the CDC proved, those who conducted the study don't want the public to have that knowledge and the feminists, they don't talk about it unless you make ’em and then they get mad or they ridicule.

Ask Zerlina Maxwell about how men and boys should be perceived in regards to rape. According to her, men are born rapists. According to her, young boys need to be trained like dogs by feminists on how to be decent human beings. If boys don’t receive this training then they will grow up to be violent rapists. The only way to prevent rape is to “teach men not to rape.” This sentiment is echoed across the feminist movement from posters to the slut walks to CNN. There are those who would claim that feminists don’t literally mean that men need to be trained as boys not to rape women; that the sound bite is just a response to the idea that women dressing provocatively have increased chances of being raped. Well to those who cling to that belief I only need to once again direct your attention to Zerlina Maxwell. Listen to her hatemongering and then try to tell me with a straight face that she isn’t being literal and that she isn’t endorsing a deep-seated ideological belief, born of feminism. Not to mention they have set up classes and programs that are literally designed for teaching men not to rape. As if young men need it drilled into their heads that rape is bad.

These are the people who sugarcoat their bigotry with “patriarchy hurts men too.” Not because the old gender roles bore painful and a lot of times lethal disadvantages for men, but solely because the realization hit that men and women were growing tired of hearing chants of why men were pigs in the streets.

These people spouting about “patriarchy” aren’t really against patriarchy. They ARE the Patriarchy. Patriarchy 2.0: Femtriarchy.

Patriarchy does indeed hurt men too and feminism just helps it along. All of the negative perceptions and archaic obligations placed upon men because of the restrictive gender roles of the past are upheld and propagated through the feminist ideology. Male victims of violence and rape are ignored, their plights minimized through the twisted, one sided rhetoric feminists have stamped on their bullshit theory of “rape culture” and the real system of life men and women once lived; patriarchy, which included matriarchal privilege that women still want to hold onto but won’t admit. They also talk about “toxic masculinity,” a term upheld by feminists, which to them is any form of action men take that doesn’t appease those who subscribe to the feminist ideology.

Feminism is an ideology of hate and I propose the best way to combat this bigotry is to speak out against it. The best way to combat this bigotry is to teach feminists not to hate. Providing proof to a feminist that their ideology is one of hate is pointless, but most men and women are not feminists and don’t particularly want to be, and educating the populace about the misrepresentation and flat out falsification of statistics by feminists concerning victims of rape and violence and the bullshit “wage gap” and all that is the key to victory.

In fact it is already working. Article after article about how feminists really do care about men’s issues are sprouting up over the internet. “Feminism is the answer to male issues” they say. They do this because they are scared. They want to pretend they gave a damn about men and boys all along. But we’re not going to let them get away with it.

Because just like in the past, when shouting about how evil men are these bigots are finally getting challenged. People are starting to challenge the bigots who sing “cry me a river!” in the faces of men and women speaking out about male suicide. People are beginning to tell the bigots that say “teach men not to rape” that men are human beings, not animals. People are starting to cry out that we’re making young boys hate themselves and they’re falling behind in schools. People are starting to cry out because the prisons are filled with men, not women, and because we don’t have anywhere near as many dads who leave their children, we have far more dads who are thrown out of the house and not allowed to see their children.

Feminists are scared because groups are gathering on college campuses; groups concerned about male issues that want no part of the feminist ideology in relation to formulating ideas to bring about positive solutions to those issues. Feminism is losing its stranglehold on gender politics because people are starting to realize it was never about equality. Compassion for men and boys is spreading, and those who continue to propagate lies how men are violent abusers are losing their audience.

So now feminism wants to help with male issues? We see through your smokescreen.

We–the Men's Human Rights Movement–are the reason the general public can see through that smokescreen, and that's the real reason feminists are scared. No longer are they laughing at us. Now they are attempting to fight back the only way bigots know how, with lies. Bigotry can only hold up against the truth for so long.

Feminism has had over fifty years to run wild with lies. But its days are numbered.

On May 24, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the issue of abortion and legal parental surrender (also known as financial abortion). A fetus is a life or not depending on what the mother wants, whilst the father is not even considered until the child is born and at that time, the man has only responsibilities and virtually no rights. Is this indeed fair to men? Let's talk.

Considering the recent case in Tampa[1] and also the horrific experiment of Decreței[2], The Voice of Europe considers that there is a need for a sincere talk about reproductive rights for men and about Legal Parental Surrender.

Michael Kimmel's mendacious men's "advocacy"

Peter Allemano · 23 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: Serious academics and Men's Human Rights Advocates alike were taken aback this week upon learning that the incredible academic incompetent Michael Kimmel had received a major grant from a large private American foundation to start a Center for the Study of Men and Masculinities at Stony Brook University. Were this not a topsy-turvy world where black is white and up is down when it comes to understanding boys and men, the news that a university is getting interested in this area would be good news. Men and boys cry out for attention and greater study and understanding. Unfortunately, this particular news is almost certainly is not good news for anyone but Michael Kimmel, who is a horrific bully and charlatan who peddles the same old ideological feminist bullshit about oppressive violent rapey men and toxic masculinity and all the other misandrist crap we've come to know so well over the last few decades. For those of you who don't know who Kimmel is, this reprint of a review of Kimmel's book "Guyland" will help you learn about him. This man is a mendacious manipulator, a violence- and rape-enabling sycophant, and an abusive bully who just got a bunch of money to lend more respectability to his hateful, deceitful garbage. –DE

Review: Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men/Understanding the Critical Years Between 16 and 26, by Michael Kimmel. New York: HarperCollins, 2008. 332 pp. US$25.95. www.harpercollins.com

Michael Kimmel's Guyland is a masterpiece — of manipulation and deceit.

Ostensibly a concerned but kindly portrait of young American males, the book is actually a scathing, unforgiving indictment. Indeed, an in-depth analysis of how adroitly Kimmel has crafted his monumental insult of young American males and impugned their dignity — while patting himself on the back for being simultaneously insightful and avuncular — is the stuff of a doctor's thesis with potential to run for more pages than the book itself. This review constitutes but a brief glance at a few of the salient points that such a thesis would highlight.

It is through a combination of neatly interwoven tacks that Kimmel navigates the tricky process of passing off a brutal — and very shallow — portrait of young males as a thoughtful assessment.

The overall structure of the book, in and of itself, constitutes Kimmel's primary tack. Focusing, in sequence, upon various unseemly aspects of Guyland — the term Kimmel has coined to demark the social and psychological world of males approximately 16 to 26 years in age — he carefully cushions his words with polite disclaimers.

The basic gist of what Kimmel initially tell us is this: The wonderful young man you care about probably is not like what you'll be reading here. But you should know about the "disturbing undercurrent" (p. 9) of the realm in which he spends much of his time.

Then, as the book progresses, Kimmel's disclaimers become less cautious. Eventually they are mere passing mentions and finally they all but completely disappear. In this manner, slowly over dozens of pages, Kimmel stealthily escalates his unwary readers' ire as he heats up his criticism. At last — without our consciously realizing that the concerned analysis has turned into an excoriating diatribe — we have come to understand that our beloved young man, at heart, is actually a scoundrel.

Kimmel saves his best for last, launching into a fevered discussion of the harassment and rape of women. At this point, unless we have been paying attention to the tack and putting up psychological defenses, we find ourselves maneuvered into the passive position of uncomplaining (and perhaps by now even supportive) witness to Kimmel's most impassioned passages — collectively, an orgiastic thrashing of his subjects' now-unconscious bodies. Indeed, our blood may boil so indignantly that it may escape our notice that Kimmel does not even mention how young men, too, get victimized by the opposite sex — with far-reaching consequences and, unlike victimized women, with no sympathy from the media or the criminal justice system (for one thought-provoking depiction of the phenomenon, I recommend It's Not About the Truth: The Untold Story of the Duke Lacrosse Rape Case and the Lives It Shattered, by Don Yaeger with Mike Pressler).

Embedded within the structure of this screed of intellectual terrorism lie several additional tacks for seducing readers to agree with Kimmel's woeful conclusions.

One insidious tack for imbuing his writing with an apocryphal aura of credibility — and thereby deflecting potential criticism that he is nothing but a pompous, finger-wagging scold — is to state, every now and then, positive things about young males. But Kimmel artfully makes these concessions about their good qualities with extreme care — backhandedly placing his upbeat statements within the chapter, paragraph or sentence structure to ensure that they are tinged with doubt, or, offset by some assessment or other of ignominy. Either way, Kimmel essentially wants us to understand that if we wish to praise young males for any reason, then doing so ought to leave a bad taste in our mouths.

Another tack — that imparts to Kimmel's writing a simulacrum of broad-mindedness and simultaneously helps to protect him against accusations that his views are rigid or ideological — is to acknowledge that, yes, alternative perspectives about young men do exist. Impliedly, Kimmel has been willing to give these other views his serious consideration while arriving at his own conclusions.

Indeed, the casual reader might think, what more broad-mindedness could Kimmel possibly reveal about himself than to include some of these alternative perspectives — as expressed by the very young males that Kimmel interviewed and about whom he draws such scornful judgments? According to Kimmel, many of them feel browbeaten and violated in ways that makes it very difficult to live in comity with society at large — a society that seems out to get them at every turn. "[A]ngy right-wing radio personalities," according to Kimmel, constitute a key source of "permission" for young men's "aggrieved entitlement." (pp. 161-63) Therefore, we are to understand, most of them are rash, selfish and unreasonable.

However, the careful reader will note, if a young man successfully expresses his angst in a cogent way about "substantive issues" (p. 162), Kimmel pays him no heed.

One such fellow, a 22-year-old named Matt, does exactly that and is quoted at length. (p. 161) Kimmel's response is to ignore the issues completely and to carry on about "unacceptable" rhetoric instead. Kimmel apparently assumes that his smooth side-stepping of some meaty topics of discussion will go unnoticed. And, indeed, perhaps the casual reader, caught up in Kimmel's drama-by-distortion, will regard Matt's words simply as transitory, distracting static midst Kimmel's titillatingly hair-raising narrative.

But the issues that young Matt raises, along with many more, deserve very much to be pondered — and there are some noteworthy writers doing so.

To be sure, Kimmel does not pretend to be the sole published author who writes about gender issues, and he makes approving reference to several writers, ranging from the famous (e.g., Susan Faludi and Carol Gilligan) to the obscure (Norah Vincent). Therefore, it is inconceivable that Kimmel is unfamiliar with writers whose perspectives differ markedly from his and, at their core, have sympathetic understanding for young males' feelings. But he will discuss only one such author — Christina Hoff Sommers — and it is for the sole purpose of trying to discredit her widely-praised book The War Against Boys: How Misguided Feminism is Harming Our Young Men. Kimmel pooh-poohs Sommers's concerns, maintains silence about the successful programs she describes for improving boys' academic performance, and dismisses her out of hand with a jaw-droppingly ludicrous mischaracterization of her conclusion.

Here is how Kimmel does it. The old chestnut, "boys will be boys," according to Kimmel, gets invoked mindlessly by society at large to excuse young males' wrongdoing. Sommers invokes the phrase too. Therefore, Kimmel tells us through innuendo, this means she believes that bad behavior is acceptable and normal. Obviously, then, with this bit of perversity as Sommers's salient point, the woman must be a nutjob.

But Sommers makes no such barbaric claim, and she means something totally different by writing "boys will be boys": young males' unique personal energy and joie de vivre deserve to be acknowledged and honored — so these qualities can be channeled productively.

With his below-the-belt strike at Sommers, Kimmel takes an audacious gamble with his credibility — because some readers may actually have read The War Against Boys too. Whether or not they agree with the thesis of Sommers's book, Kimmel's willfully duplicitous re-framing of Sommers's writing will be instantly recognizable — and they would have to be nutjobs to believe that Kimmel is being forthright.

But Kimmel dares not risk even passing mention of certain other writers with perspectives different from his own — and it is for good reason. Inadvertently prodding unfamiliar readers' curiosity about them could not only make him look dishonest and foolish but could prove catastrophic for him. Specifically, Warren Farrell's seven books present a wealth of data and statistics that would prove the majority of Kimmel's specious contentions to be embarrassingly inaccurate — especially his repetitious carping about male "entitlement." Additionally, two books by McGill University professors Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young (part of an ongoing development of a series about misandry) not only express views very different from Kimmel's but embody the highest standards of probity and intellectual rigor. Guyland, in contrast, would seem as nothing but a bundle of sanctimonious rodomontade and flapdoodle suited, at best, as source material (especially its catchy title) for a sensationalistic miniseries on Lifetime TV.

Kimmel is far too smart to tell very many outright lies in Guyland. Instead, he cherry-picks facts in support of his contentions while ignoring, trivializing, or mischaracterizing facts that militate against the book's disheartening conclusions. Kimmel follows this tack with such wild abandon that, for any reader who possesses a full-spectrum education on gender issues, it is blatantly obvious. But for the less-informed reader, Kimmel's writing may seem very convincing. And, in these readers' minds, why should Kimmel be perceived as proffering anything besides clear-minded truth? After all, Kimmel is the father of a young son himself (a fact repeatedly affirmed throughout the book). Would such an author not have his own scion's best interests at heart?

But, as explained above, Kimmel does not content himself with arousing readers' concern. For Kimmel, concern is merely the launching platform from which he seeks to propel us into stratospheric realms of outrage. Alas for Kimmel, sometimes he ham-handedly contradicts himself in the process.

To cite one example, Kimmel bashes males first by invoking a stereotypical view of masculinity that he calls "The Guy Code," lamenting its notion that men should "show no emotions at all." (pp. 49-50) The fact that suppression of emotions is necessary for the self-sacrificing role that society expects males to fulfill — as providers and protectors — does not warrant mention in Kimmel's analysis.

Next Kimmel tells a personal story in which he ridicules young men who do show emotion (specifically, anger) — by describing them as "angry white males." (p. 60) Kimmel even puts the phrasal epithet in quotation marks, ensuring that readers will recognize the derisive insult for what it is and enhancing his chances of provoking readers' deepest contempt too.

But why should we feel appalled by young men's anger, and why are they wrong for feeling the way they do?

According to Kimmel, the emotion is unjustified — and utterly inexplicable — except to the degree that it arrogantly arises out of frustrated "entitlement." Kimmel uses a fascinating rhetorical sleight of hand to try to prove his point.

In this specific instance, Kimmel was a featured panelist on a TV talk show with the inflammatory title, "A Black Woman Stole My Job." On the air, Kimmel mocked and taunted the men by asking: "Where did they get the idea it was 'their' job? Why wasn't the show called 'A Black Woman Got a Job,' . . . ?" (p. 60)

But a far more honest — and compassionate — line of questioning would have been: Where did they get the idea that, by putting loaded language in their mouths, the show's producer had any intention of hosting a rational debate on affirmative action? Why couldn't the guests have foreseen that the show might as well have been called 'Let's Have Fun Tricking and Skewering Naïve Young Men'?"

Apparently oblivious to the irony, Kimmel begins the section of his book wherein he relates his smug, self-satisfied anecdote with the statement, “Many young men today have a shockingly strong sense of male superiority and a diminished capacity for empathy.” (p. 59)

So who is Kimmel and why does he present such an outrageously slanted, calculatedly awful portrait of young males?

Kimmel answers the first part of this question himself: he is “a sociologist” specializing in “the study of men and masculinity,” which is “a relatively new subfield of the study of ‘gender.’” (p. 22)

There is a long explanation behind what Kimmel is telling his readers about his place in the academic world, and it is provided in detail by Professors Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge in Professing Feminism: Education and Indoctrination in Women’s Studies. According to these authors, gender studies — a.k.a. feminist studies — is not so much a field of serious scholarship and learning as a highly politicized “academic arm” for the women’s movement. Like Kimmel, these authors consider gender to be a legitimate basis for research into numerous aspects of the human experience. But in the postmodern academe, these authors regretfully report, research and analysis in gender issues seldom get undertaken with any regard for scholarly integrity. Even the most basic standards of objective writing — like substantiating conclusions with concrete evidence — all too often get set aside in favor of more subjective “ways of knowing,” which are supposedly superior. But, again, the primary purpose of feminist studies is not so much education as persuasion — for the espousing of a specific worldview as well as for unquestioning acceptance of feminism’s pre-determined prescriptions for correcting human flaws. Guyland is a book very much in this vein and is remarkable for its excellence in disguising its monumental deficits so readers will think that it is something it is not.

Indeed, it is more than passing interest to note, near the end of Guyland, that Kimmel openly acknowledges he is a feminist. And he affirms how sweet life would be for the recalcitrant young males of Guyland if only they would become feminists too: “Feminism loves men enough to expect them to act more honorably and actually believes them capable of doing so.” (p. 264)

But what kind of richness in life does Kimmel believe men will experience when they embrace the “love” that feminism extends so generously to them?

Strangely enough — judging from the tone of Kimmel’s writing — it apparently means that males’ greatest fulfillment and self-actualization is to be found in a state of shame and embarrassment that arises out of stoop-shouldered self-abnegation and hand-wringing obeisance to their betters, i.e., to females.

Writing of feminism’s “love” for men in a book about 16-to-26-year-old males seems downright bizarre when we consider that one of the most vicious feminism-inspired slogans of the last decade — a multi-million-dollar blockbuster for the company that coined it — was directed at the subjects of Guyland when they were children: “BOYS ARE STUPID, THROW ROCKS AT THEM!”

At its outset, Guyland purports to try to “enable guys” to “steer a course with greater integrity and honesty, so they can be true not to some artificial code, but to themselves.” (p. 8) But feminism itself — at least Kimmel’s version of it — constitutes an “artificial code.” In one of his most blatant misstatements of reality, Kimmel claims feminism is about “equality.” (p. 263) Ironically, one of the most dramatic aspects of inequality that exists between the sexes — with which feminism refuses to grapple and Kimmel does not even acknowledge — manifests itself during the very period of males’ lives that is the specific focus of Guyland: males’ obligation to register for Selective Service and to live thenceforward knowing that, if called upon, they must subject themselves to the draft. No woman in American history has ever experienced the phenomenon, nor would any sane one want to, whether in the idealistic spirit of fostering “equality” or for any other reason. Would it not make sense, in at least a few of the hundreds of interviews Kimmel claims he conducted, to ask how “the guys” face and then carry through on fulfilling their extraordinary burden? If feminism really wanted gender equity — and not just privileges for women unaccompanied by obligations — then Kimmel would not have done his subjects this highhanded disservice.

Another area of inequality that feminism fails to address is in the realm of male/female personal relationships.

Despite females' supposedly "liberated" status, the male is expected, as in the days of yore, to handle all the difficult work of initiating relationships as well as to finance their progression into something long-lasting. Maybe the enormous amount of casual "hooking up" on college campuses — which Kimmel disparages — arises not so much out of males' sexism as males' brass-tacks level inability to afford dating. Especially because unprecedented numbers of women earn substantial paychecks nowadays, why shouldn't equality — in the form of shared responsibility — be promoted in this realm?

But feminism does not teach women that they should even think that new — and sometimes very considerable — burdens might exist as inherent accompaniments to women's expanding lifestyle options. Instead, feminism teaches women that their lives should in every respect be enjoyable and personally fulfilling, and it is not part of the deal to perform any of the onerous duties traditionally belonging to males.

So if it is true, as Kimmel claims, that many young male denizens of Guyland do not respect young females, perhaps to some degree it is because "the guys," like any normal person, find it very hard to feel respect for someone who relates to them in ways that are hypocritical. Maybe, despite all the "minuses" that Kimmel describes about Guyland, young men tend to bond with their male peers instead of their female peers because their relationships among themselves tend to be inherently more honest.

But even if males accept the fact that they must do all the initiating and paying in relationships with females — because females simply will not do it — males' chariness in the face of potential long-term commitment is perfectly understandable in light of the recent track record of females' behavior. In divorces where both husband and wife have college degrees — the vast majority of potential marriages among the population under Kimmel's discussion — 90% are initiated by the woman. With an overall divorce rate of 50%, this basically means that, for the males of Guyland, investing one's life in a marriage is akin to investing all one's savings in a speculative "flyer" on the stock market. Maybe young males' reluctance to marry is not a sign of "aversion to adulthood" (p. 205), as Kimmel claims, but, instead, a sign of intelligence.

Selective Service registration and responsibility for initiating and financing male/female personal relationships are but two of many important issues for young males that Kimmel will not touch with a ten-foot pole. So it is utterly preposterous to state that he advocates on behalf of "equality" and wishes to "steer guys" in a helpful way.

So, returning to the second part of the question above and rephrasing it: Why, then, is Kimmel — to put it bluntly — so mean?

I have no idea and can only speculate that Kimmel's motives may have something to do with the glory that he experiences as one of America's foremost voices in public discourse on gender issues. For better or for worse, the discourse is presently dominated — with uncompromising ferociousness — by dogmatic feminist perspectives.

The words of author/philosopher Francis Baumli come to mind:

"These feminist men — the squalling hysterical type — for all their protests against male power actually garner a great deal of power for themselves by thus setting themselves up as the archetypal protectors of women and feminism. They are, in their own minds at least, and in the ranks of their (relatively few, we hope) cohorts, the alpha males. It is a parasitic status, of course, and a pathetic power. But it is real, nonetheless, and they pride and preen themselves with it, although they would be the first to deny that they are feeling power, even as they glory in it."

If Baumli is correct, then perhaps another way to characterize Guyland is to say it constitutes a pseudosensitive man's personal form of chest-pounding.

The power that Kimmel experiences as a thoroughgoing feminist evidently feels so rapturously intoxicating that he is even willing, in Guyland, to sacrifice his own son at feminism's altar. "Nine years ago," Kimmel reports, "at Zachary's naming ceremony, we each offered a wish for our newborn son. When it was my turn, I quoted the poet Adrienne Rich, who wrote 'If I could have one wish for my own sons, it is that they should have the courage of women.'" (p. xvii)

Although the story, by early 21st century standards, might seem like a sweet-little-nothing, in the context of a book about gender issues, it deserves to be examined carefully and objectively.

Although human nature is universal, we nevertheless traditionally associate certain qualities more with one sex than the other. Sometimes it is because of stereotyping, and sometimes it is because our culture tends to provide one sex with more dramatic ways to manifest certain virtues than it provides to the other sex. Kimmel himself acknowledges these differences in Guyland. (p. 270)

In our culture, for a variety of reasons, courage is a virtue we traditionally associate with the male sex. Zachary is male. But by quoting Adrienne Rich, Kimmel is cruelly denying for his son a strength that society affirms for Zachary, and Kimmel is claiming that to develop courage, the boy should look to the opposite sex for inspiration.

If this somehow feels "all right" for us, then it is worthwhile to pause and apply the gold standard for determining the presence or absence of gender bias: reversal. Let us imagine that, instead of naming a baby boy, Kimmel and those close to him were naming a baby girl. Imagine the reaction had Kimmel found some corresponding quotation from a male poet and invoked it on the baby's behalf: "If I could have one wish for my own daughters, it is that they should have the nurturing ability of men."

If Kimmel dared repeat the story in writing, indignant cries of "bigotry!" and "sexism!" would be heard far and wide across the land.

Indeed, in American culture today, especially in academia and among those entrusted with the formation of public policy, feminism occupies an unassailable position — supreme and inviolate — akin to an officially-sanctioned religion. Dissidents and would-be reformers are either coerced into silence or shown the way to society's periphery. There, any criticism they may publish about feminism — regardless of how constructive — more often than not gets ignored. And if some of the heretical blasphemy does wind up getting widespread attention (like Sommers's The War Against Boys) and feminists must acknowledge its existence, they could hardly be more scoffing than if they were commenting on Unabomber rants.

Kimmel — by toeing feminism's ideological line with a zeal that exceeds even that of many female acolytes — guarantees his continuing occupancy of an exalted position in the pantheon of the feminist establishment. So, for the foreseeable future, Kimmel can safely write whatever atrocious folderol he wants with impunity — no matter how much hurt he perpetrates against males or how much animosity and mistrust he fosters between the sexes. Indeed, the higher the barriers that Kimmel and his fellow mainstream "gender experts" construct to forefend genuine understanding in the realm of discussion that they control, the more in demand these venal rogues can assuredly find themselves in the future. Whether as status-building talking heads on TV talk shows, fee-generating members of blue-ribbon assessment panels, or authors of additional misleading books and articles — as long as we remain in their thrall, there will be no end to their tsk-tsk-ing.

But the insanity of the present, of course, is unsustainable. To quote Martin Luther King, Jr., "Life cannot be fooled."

Someday — maybe several generations hence — male-bashing will inevitably cease to be considered "enlightened" behavior and people will look back with aghast bewilderment at the taken-for-granted anti-male Zeitgeist of our era, of which Kimmel is a guiding light. If, at that time, someone establishes a Museum of Misandry with which to document the phenomenon, then a copy of Guyland will deserve to sit in its own glass display case, at the center of one of the institution's exhibit halls.

Reason for cheer about the men's movement

Glen Poole · 23 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last month I stumbled into a bit of a storm over women-only sessions at a gym in the UK.

Peter Lloyd, writing in the right-wing Daily Mail, said that this was a men's issue that needed to be tackled head on. I challenged him via in the left-wing Guardian newspaper saying that a better way to tackle the serious issues that men and boys face would be to fight for more men-only services.

I'm not going to revisit the argument here. Peter's position is clearly closer to the heartbeat of the men's rights movement right now and as far as this constituency is concerned he has won the debate.

But if you had told me on New Year's day that we'd have commentators in left-wing and right-wing newspapers arguing with each other about the best way to tackle men's issues, I'd have said you were still drugged up from the night before and clearly hallucinating.

And yet before I could find a way to celebrate this fact, the moment had been surpassed by a deluge of public debate about men and boys in the UK that was sparked by one politician asserting that masculinity is in crisis.

One minute we had Tony Parsons, the ex-husband of feminist commentator Julie Burchill, leaping to the defense of British manhood in GQ saying "men have never been better than they are today" — the next minute we had one of the founders of the pro-feminist fatherhood movement, Jack O'Sullivan, writing in The Guardian— which is often considered to be the mouthpiece of feminism—that the main problems that men face are matriarchy and misandry.

We are seeing a spectacular shift in the way commentators across the political spectrum are talking about men's issues and if we don't seize the moment, our opportunity to make our mark may pass us by.

I've personally traveled too many miles fighting for men and boys to get overly excited by a bit of press coverage. Next month, it will be 10 years since I made my first national media appearance as PR Director for the Fathers 4 Justice campaign which ambitiously set out to change the law on fathers' rights in the UK in just three years.

In terms of newspaper column inches it remains, as far as I can tell, the most successful men's campaign ever—and yet the separated fathers who come to the local support group I run are still getting screwed by a sexist, discriminatory system that grabs dads by the balls and drags them through a mangle of prejudice and inequality in the name of the "best interests of the child."

Having played a lead role in a campaign that was exciting but ultimately failed (so far) to change our unfair system of family law, I still help individual dads to find a way to navigate the legal minefield and stay involved in their children's lives.

Separated dads are like proverbial starfish washed up on beaches in their millions and left on the shore to slowly suffocate. It may seem pointless to throw one back in the sea, but for the starfish you help, it's a matter of life and death. To paraphrase a famous Scottish football manager: For the dads I work with, seeing their kids isn't a matter of life and death – it's far more important than that.

Personally, I'd much rather we'd found a way to save the millions of separated dads who get shipwrecked by family breakdown and are suffocated by a system which is designed to help "women and children first" but fails everyone save those who make a living from the industrial processing of broken families.

I don't know of a single modern country that's resolved the problem of fatherlessness yet—but things can and do change.

One of my biggest influences growing up was Ian Dury, a great British singer-songwriter whose homage to his father "My Old Man" is a poetic celebration of working class manhood that still brings a tear to my eye and sends a shiver down my spine.

Dury's body was twisted by polio in an outbreak of the disease in 1949. British kids don't get polio these days and maybe in the future millions of kids won't be separated from their dads.

We might not live to see this change happen, but we can at least die trying. If we want to ensure that we end male suicide; stop violence against men and boys; secure equal rights for dads; give boys (and girls!) the best possible start in life; and treat the health and wellbeing of men and boys with the same urgency and importance as the health and wellbeing of women and girls—then it's time for us to get interested in what will make a difference for men and boys.

I don't profess to have all the answers and my experience tells me that none of us is smarter than all of us. What I do know is that many of the solutions we need are political and while publicity alone doesn't create policy it's hard to make policy without it.

Every argument that every men's advocate has ever made is helping to build a momentum that, after several decades of hard work, will make the arrival of the international men's movement seem like an overnight media success. The conditions are now ripe for men's issues to rise up the political agenda in the developed world and if we can learn to play the media game then we can keep on keeping men's issues in the headlines.

But if we only rely on making noise then our campaigns for fairness and equal treatment for men and boys will end up filled with sound and fury and signify nothing (for those of you who like a little bit of Shakespeare in your polemic).

Campaigning is more than complaining. Successful campaigns bring both problems and solutions to the table and keep them there until the solution we want is delivered.

We can't control who sits at the top tables in politics but we can influence what they bring to the table. We will know that our men's movements are a political success when politicians and newspapers are arguing with each other about who has the best solutions to the problems men face. We can achieve that end goal, but not merely by talking amongst ourselves. Yes, privately networking with each other behind the scenes is a crucial part of any movement, but when we fight on public battlegrounds like the University of Toronto campus, then the world starts to listen.

Arguing publicly on high profile platforms in a way that allows the public and politicians to decide which policies on men's issues they prefer: now that is a sign of progress.

I've only ever had one short conversation with Jack O'Sullivan, and that was nine years ago when I congratulated him for another Guardian article that highlighted what a huge difference fathers make to children's lives and bemoaned the lack of politicians who were able to develop policies that respond to the way that modern men live their lives.

I told Jack I was surprised to see a positive article about dads in The Guardian – or "that anti-father rag" as the founder of Fathers 4 Justice, Matt O'Connor, likes to call it.

Jack simply said to me "no media outlet is a monolith," and he was right. And the same is also true of political parties.

No political party or media outlet is a monolith and so if we want to create the smartest men's movement the world has ever seen, we will want to find our way inside the tent where we can piss on the policies and viewpoints that don't support our end goals, rather than being outside the tent pissing on each other.

The way the wind is blowing suggests that something spectacular is beginning to happen in relation to men's issues and so we need to seize the moment—again and again and again and again.

It takes patience and persistence to make a difference politically, but rather than let them ignore the millions of problems that men and boys face, if we can influence the media and politicians to start picking up these problems like proverbial starfish, one issue at a time, then we can start to make a bigger difference for men and boys.

There are still enough men's issues in the world for us all to bring our own unique approach to making change happen. Solutions may come from the left or the right, from professionals or volunteers, from aggressive campaigners or nurturing frontline workers. Every approach is potentially valid and our movement is “big enough and ugly enough” now to allow each other the space to take different approaches to solving men’s issues.

The task of making the world work for men and boys is so big that there is no one single way to get the job done. Yet now, more than ever before, is the time when we need more people, taking more action, to make more things happen.

It has been inspiring to see, in tragic circumstances, so many men’s rights’ activists supporting the Earl Silverman Centre – that will help us save a few starfish. It’s small actions with huge potential like these that show the men’s movement can be about delivering solutions to some of the big problems we face.

And I have no doubt that between us we will keep finding new ways to throw many more proverbial starfish back into the sea, but how do we create a big enough wave to do it for us?

As a man, I consider it a blessing that I wasn’t born in an age or country where I could be conscripted to fight for my country—and I’m grateful that our ancestors fought for me to grow up in relatively peaceful times.

Our generation of men has a different war to fight. It’s a war against injustice and inequality and if we fight it well then future generations will thank us.

We may argue over which battles to fight but whether it’s changing family law, getting men’s groups on campus, funding men’s shelters or any other battle you can imagine, people who give a shit about men and boys, have got to keep fighting. To misquote the great Bill Shankly one more time, it’s not a matter of life and death, it’s far more important than that!

Join us on Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey, episode 2: Men, anger, and grief. Discussion will center around how men react to abuse and pain and grief, and how men process their emotions. Our special guest this week is noted men's scholar and psychotherapist Tom Golden, author of Swallowed by a Snake: the Gift of the Masculine Side of Healing and its followup The Way Men Heal. He is also proprietor of http://thewaymenheal.com and the YouTube channel Men Are Good at https://www.youtube.com/user/1menaregood1

Tom brings a unique perspective that shouldn't be unique: men process emotions, including things like anguish and grief, differently from women, and instead of being shamed for it or told they're doing it wrong, the healing professions and society as a whole should explore how men are different from women and how they deal with and express their emotions, including emotions like anger, grief, and anguish–and how they heal from it.

Featured also of course will be your calls. Anyone who would like to call in and talk to Erin or Tom about their questions or their experiences with violence and abuse is welcome to join us. We'll look forward to seeing you. Show starts at 4:00pm London Time, 11am Eastern Time, May 25, 2013 in the US.

Jodi Arias: turning murder into T-shirt sales

Michael Sharron · 24 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jodi Arias butchers her boyfriend, then becomes DV advocate while awaiting possible death sentence.

Jodi Arias is very busy these days designing T-shirts that have the word “survivor” written on them and is making it well known that 100% of the proceeds from these sales will go to Domestic Violence organizations. Jodi Arias is also now a convicted first degree murderess and death qualified convict after she slashed her boyfriend Travis Alexander’s throat from ear to ear, stabbed him 29 times, and shot him in the face.

Her defense was one clearly designed by feminists who cry “domestic violence” whenever women kill, not just to get murderesses a pass, but so their organizations can continue to get more and more VAWA money.

*V*oilà, we give you Jodi Arias, a poor victim of domestic violence who was just defending herself.

As her T-shirt campaign suggests, Jodi is a victim and survivor of abuse and even despite her conviction, she seems content in continuing this narrative. On May 21 of 2013, Jodi had the opportunity to have her life spared in the Death Penalty phase of her trial where she gave a 19 minute appeal to jurors on why she should live. In this appeal, Jodi asked jurors to let her live so that she could continue to sell her survivor T-shirts (which she held up for the world to see) and drive money to Domestic Violence organizations.

If you find this amazing, consider that four sentences before that, Jodi told jurors that she is “still amazed that she was capable of such violence.”

When I watched this video, especially at the end where Jodi pimped out her survivor T-shirt, I envisioned millions of feminist around the world standing up and cheering for who I imagine will be their poster girl for decades to come.

Arias will be their newest, bestest reason why governments around the world should revamp the judicial system to make sure that when a woman says she is a victim of domestic violence, even a murderous butcher of a woman with no evidence that she was ever harmed, that her word alone should be taken as gold.

Jodi is the future poster child for why every man on the planet should be put into prison, neutralizing them so that women and girls can prosper. In fact, I do believe that feminists right now are developing a media campaign where Jodi Arias and her blood stained T-shirts will be used to agitate the growing base of people who believe that men and boys are natural abusers, and that women are victims even when they murder people during psychotic rages.

I also believe that the Jodi Arias saga will renew calls from feminist leaders to ramp up talks with government officials around the world that women’s rights are still under seige.

To be honest, I know that Paul Elam stated that he believed Jodi Arias had a chance to be acquitted and walk out of the court room a free woman. I believed this as well because we have a long history of evidence from the courts that allow women to do unspeakable things, blame it on men, and then walk on whatever they were charged with.

Jodi’s defense team used Alyce Laviolette’s “expert” opinion to prove that Jodi being a victim and survivor of abuse from both Travis Alexander (the dead guy) and her father, made her a killer. But what Alyce didn’t say is that Jodi mentioned in court that she suffered abuse from her Mother as well. That conveniently got left out of Ms. LaViolette’s testimony.

In her world, Ms. LaViolette has read the feminist manifesto that teaches the notion that only men beat women. It should also be noted that she made short work of blaming Travis for the fact that he is dead. I suppose she missed the victim blaming course in college.

Does anyone want to bet that Alyce LaViolette is a customer of Jodi Arias and bought one of her survivor T-Shirts? How long do you think it will be before we see women and white knights all over the world wearing these T-shirts in the name of feminism? And who wants to bet that the domestic violence industry will gladly rake in the money from these sales so they can continue to manufacture more drones that wear the hat of lobbyist? It should also be noted that Alyce LaViolette has a book out and there is little doubt in my mind that sales of her book skyrocketed because of the Jodi Arias murder trial.

If you are new to A Voice For Men, I wrote an article on this website about the Domestic Violence Industry that I believe every man and woman who has a male in their family should read.

So where is this teachable moment?

Jodi Arias' Survivor T-Shirt Campaign Proves Domestic Violence Experts Are Insane And Unhealthy To Society

I want to make it very clear, I do believe that Jodi Arias is a victim, and it does relate to Domestic Violence, but not as a victim of violence. Professional feminists have done just a great job of conning Law Enforcement, Judges, Politicians, and a the general public into believing that "Domestic Violence," one automatically means male on female violence.

So certain of this are we that even a psycho killer can hawk T-shirts without raising too many eyebrows.

All women have taught that they can do anything they want as a victim. They have been told, in effect, that they can harm people and then put out their hand begging for help, and expect it to be delivered.

It is much like using "best interest of the child" in order to push 85% of fathers to the outer margins of their children's lives. Like "there is no excuse to hit a woman," it is a statement designed to prevent an agenda, any agenda, can be pursued without interference. And, if you do attempt to rebut, you are immediately labeled as a person who wants to do harm to women and/or children.

I believe that Jodi Arias was thinking along those lines when she planned Travis Alexander's death, knowing that she could use this claim, even after her first lies were uncovered, because she has seen many women successfully use violence as a tactical tool.

In short, feminist driven Domestic Violence theory led Jodi Arias into a false sense of security when she assumed that by using the violence card everyone in the courtroom would be so aghast that this gorgeous woman was a victim of horrible sexual and physical abuse that they would then let her walk out of court a free and famous woman that could make hundreds of millions of dollars selling her story and survivor T-Shirts.

Signs that Jodi Arias is an Insane Feminist and Unhealthy

- When you are convicted of premeditated murder and facing the death penalty after a jury has discounted your claims of being a victim, you have to be insane to stand before them and bring your attention to a domestic violence survivor T-Shirt you are selling on the Internet, especially when you are a domestic offender;
- If you are found guilty of premeditated murder and just minutes after that conviction find yourself giving media interviews trying to bring attention to domestic violence, you are both insane and unhealthy;
- If as a domestic violence expert and known feminist (Alyce LaViolette) you use expert testimony to blame Travis Alexander for his death (victim blaming) knowing that "victim blaming" is something feminist fight tooth and nail, you are probably a unhealthy and insane person;
- If you are still able to read from radical feminism's manifesto that only Men are capable of domestic violence after the Jodi Arias murder conviction, then you are likely insane.

Protecting The Real Victims Of Jodi Arias

Travis Alexander and his entire family are the true victims in this case despite many attempts by feminist Domestic Violence experts to make Jodi Arias a poster child for why women kill. Let's hope someone with more knowledge of the Son of Sam laws finds some way to prevent these organizations from benefiting from Travis Alexander's death and the need for Jodi Arias to capitalize on her survivor T-Shirt campaign.

A Voice For Men extends condolences to the surviving family of Travis Alexander and we want them to know that our organization is fighting people like Alyce LaViolette — and the professional radical feminists who were very much prepared to help Jodi Arias go free so that they could use Travis' murder to drive their agenda. If any of the family members read this article and want to contact us, we are open 24 hrs a day to talk.

In an effort to help get the message out about misguided feminist governance and domestic violence laws, and to bring attention to Travis Alexander and his family, we hope that you will extensively share this article on sites like Facebook, Google+, Twitter, and other networks. Additionally, using the comment system below, our goal is to gain 400 comments focusing on your thoughts of Jodi Arias, her murder conviction, and decision to sell domestic violence survivor T-shirts as a Woman who killed her boyfriend.

Spanish Gender Stalinism – Part II

Lucian Vâlsan · 24 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Today we continue our tale about the ordeal that Spanish men face under the Gender Stalinist regime of Ley Contra la Violencia de Género (Organic Act of Integrated Protection Measures against Gender Violence) and the radical feminists supporting it. These are the same radical feminists who have quite literally occupied almost all institutions in Spain (both State institutions and private ones – particularly the media).

Part II of the report is about what happened in Spain between 2004 and 2012, a report issued by the Asociación de Víctimas de la Ley de Violencia de Género Madrid (The Association of the Victims of the Gender Violence Law – Madrid) along with another association called Feminist Association for Equality (FEMII).

Part II

ANALYSIS OF THE RECENTLY FIGURES PUBLISHED

On 21 November 2012, Ms. Inmaculada Montalbán, Chairperson of the Observatory against Gender Violence of the CGPJ, presented figures following nearly eight years of implementation of the gender violence law.

In the report, Ms. Montalbán states that the figures raise great cause for alarm. She addresses the work of courts specializing in gender violence and their aim to end impunity of male culprits by achieving an 80% conviction rate. If we analyze the figures carefully, we see a heavy bias in the manner the information is presented.

For example, her report shows the number of reported domestic violence related crimes as 1,034,613 (alleged crimes 963,471 and alleged misdemeanors 71,142). She repeatedly refers to “crimes” rather than “alleged crimes”, assuming that these allegations have all been substantiated. She then provides the number of convictions at 207,997, mixing crimes with misdemeanors, which constitutes just 20.1% of the total cases reported leading to conviction.

So what happened to the remaining 826,616 cases? 706,568 of the cases were dismissed. 120,048 end in acquittal. If we add this to the number of complaints that were retracted, the result is that from all the reported cases, 79,90% of the men reported to the police suffered: arrest (most of them), loss of home, loss of access to children and home, financial ruin, loss of property/pension, as well as having to pay the mortgage on their own home in which they could no longer live, marginalization and social stigma to be called and considered abusers even before judgment, resulting in psychological strain that can result in depression and suicide in some cases. There is no public official way to know how many men have finished with their lives because of this situation. Then these men, after suffering all this terrible chain of events following the report by their ex partner, are found not guilty or innocent, but the damage has already been done, and no compensation is offered, as official, “false complaints” do not exist.

Note that in the Courts of Violence against Women, 100% of the convictions are under compliance, that is to say that the accused is given a choice, for example, 30 days of social work and a course of rehabilitation, or a jail term of between six months and two years, and the accused men have accepted the lesser sentence rather than to continue to defend their innocence. Given this situation, not knowing that their compliance carries a criminal record and a hypothetical new complaint involving a jail sentence, the accused detainee accepted social work with the aim of ending the case.

WHAT TYPE OF CRIME IS REPORTED?

Given the data issued by Ms. Montalbán, it is noteworthy that nearly 80% are for offences related to Article 153 of the criminal code relating to causing mental suffering, or mistreatment without causing physical injury. This means that a simple argument involving harsh language, even where the man says something like “you’ll find out!”, etc., is reason enough to report a gender crime, but only if the complainant is a woman. Only 5% of complaints are made under Article 148 of the Criminal Code, which provide for severe cases of abuse. What is occurring in Spain is the criminalizing of men for trivial conflicts in the home.

In our association we come across cases where men have been convicted for flatulence during a discussion, or of causing the partner abuse via “telepathic” means, or simple by the man losing patience and reverting to the use of the “f” word. Although it seems utterly ridiculous, we assure you that in the case of gender violence, truth is stranger than fiction. You can find a wide range of these examples at www.projusticia.com.

CONCLUSIONS

An analysis of the official Spanish government figures raises two issues: first, in 826,616 cases between 2005 and 2012, the accused, all men, were found to be innocent. And, second, the vast majority of the complaints were based on Article 153 of the Criminal Code, namely that the woman reporting had not suffered any physical harm. For these and other reasons most of the arrests made, almost a million, during these 7 years, could be considered illegal:

Article 104 of Spain’s Constitution requires the Police to act as guarantor of the rights and freedoms of citizens and, in particular, to protect victims of crime, and article 24.2 that guarantees the presumption of innocence. Also, as previously pointed out, international law also guarantees the presumption of innocence, as article 14.2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and Article 6.2 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

A large number of risk assessments conducted after allegations of gender violence resulted in “Undeterminable risk”. In Instruction 5/2008 of the SES, it says that “in this case the Police will act with the same measures, operational and care, as for any other type of complaint “. So, acting on a complaint without basis or foundation would not be justified and would contravene Instruction 12/2007 of the SES, the technical regulation No. 1/2008 issued by the DAO on Procedures for the Civil Guard units on Gender Violence, which specifies, that to act, there must be a serious risk to the victim.

Complaints must be substantiated by the Protocol for security and Police forces, including coordination with the courts to protect victims of gender violence. Furthermore, the law and the above instructions do require an investigation of the victim, in order to provide accurate and sufficient evidence of the alleged abuse, since the mere word of the complainant, without supporting evidence, is insufficient. Acting with the excuse of protecting the complainant, without signs of abuse or an accompanying risk assessment, is illegal, unfair and unjustified and could lead to accusations of illegal detention under Article 167 of the Penal Code.

Obviously, to this must be added the provisions of the Judicial Police Manual .

We recall that all of this legislation is available on the Police intranet, so that in case of a complaint to the Police, no one can claim ignorance or lack of information.

POSSIBLE CAUSES OF ERRONEOUS INTERPRETATION AND APPLICATION OF THE LAW BY SOME MEMBERS OF SECURITY FORCES

Some agents acted illegally for several reasons: misinformation and fear of being responsible if the accused later assaulted the alleged victim.

The Secretary of State for Security should issue a Technical Instruction to clarify to agents when it is appropriate, when not to arrest and to clarify the legal foundations of those situations. In addition, officers and NCOs should be trained more rigorously, to ensure that agents know correct procedure.

In an official document of the Ministry of Interior, an Action Protocol for the Coordination of Security Forces, advocates that in reviewing cases relating to the Gender Violence Law 1/2004, Integral Protection Measures against Violence Gender, they did not find a single reference to the word “alleged”, thereby assuming the presumption of guilt on all the men that had been reported. These suspects were often called “criminals” in the absence of conviction or official judgments.

Remembering the statistics given earlier, all the men reported were considered to be guilty first, yet only 10% of cases resulted in criminal convictions.

COMPREHENSIVE MONITORING SYSTEM IN CASES OF DOMESTIC VIOLENCE

In the Bibliography section of the report there are so-called professionals listed that should not have been involved in national domestic violence programs. Two of these are recognized Radical feminists Beauvoir and Firestone. This is a duo whose books, far from promoting peace and equality between men and women, support a form of social engineering, promote female superiority and push hatred between men and women.

We also find listed the author Jorge Corsi, who has supported Spanish radical feminism to implement gender ideology in society, and who has been convicted in his home country, Argentina, for pedophilia. It is inappropriate that this "author" remains as recommended reading for Police agents.

The criminal record as a pederast, and methodology to capture victims of Jorge Corsi is available on Google.

Finally, there is a strong political root to Spain´s Gender Violence law, one based on the pre-election campaign of José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, who came to power earlier in the same year that law came into force.

There are many reports from the Spanish Press of Mr Zapatero visiting many women´s groups and giving favourable support to their aim of having their "own Court for Women", and given that in Spain there are more women than men, feminist groups held a special appeal for Zapatero in his aim to raise votes.

Melissa Kite hates men, wants father

Peter Lloyd · 25 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, journalist Melissa Kite became the latest woman to publicly trash men in a sexist, undeserving rant – this time, by saying those exercising a human right not to become fathers were 'selfish'.

Just days after champagne socialist Diane Abbott claimed that modern masculinity is Viagra-chomping, whiskey-swigging homophobia – even for the millions of men who are gay, Kite jumped on the bandwagon with her own sweeping statements.

In a finger-pointing, foot-stamping article for MailOnline she said men 'do not always play fair in matters of fertility', adding that they 'increasingly behave with terrible selfishness when it comes to giving up their bachelor lifestyles'.

She then added that men who date women without immediately signing up for parenthood are committing some sort of 'fraud'.

The outrageous comments follow the launch of the Get Britain Fertile campaign, which actively discourages women from delaying pregnancy for health reasons.

But, instead of making a balanced, rational point, Kite's comments simply revealed a sad, out-dated philosophy in contemporary gender relations. Namely, that a woman's desire to have a child is greater than a man's desire not to.

She's wrong.

In her article, she makes several references to former boyfriends who made the responsible decision not to become fathers half-heartedly – then scolds them for being 'cowardly'. Here's a woman who assumes that a man's sperm – his lineage, his DNA, his family – is somehow hers for the taking.

This couldn't be further from the truth.

Father my child, you selfish loser!
Yes, I sympathize that her many life choices never produced children, it's not men who are to blame. For years feminism has declared that women don't need us – that we are redundant. OK, fine. But guess what – we don't need women either. And it's trending.

In Asia there's a new tendency for men to go their own way – with thousands shunning marriage and kids for a life of independence and control, which no family court can destroy. The same thing is happening across America and Canada.

In fact, author Helen Smith Ph.D., recently published a book entitled Men on Strike, where she notes that: 'America has become anti-male. Men are sensing the backlash and are consciously and unconsciously going on strike. They are dropping out of college, leaving the workforce and avoiding marriage and fatherhood at alarming rates.'

Now, it's happening here in Britain.

This isn't because men are 'selfish' or commitment-phobic pigs (as women frequently like to suggest). Rather, it's because they're tired of being ousted from families, of being shafted by sexist divorce rulings and being denied the most basic paternal rights.

These guys know that any child they have with a woman would be her baby, not their baby. In 2013, a so-called era of equality, three million UK fathers are still denied access to their children – simply because their bitter ex partners can manipulate the law.

So where's the incentive? Quite frankly, men's reticence to enter fatherhood is justified. And long may it continue.

Melissa Kite said men who didn't want children were being 'selfish'

But Kite, and many women like her, still can't see these broader issues. Hilariously, she says: 'to suggest that somehow the age at which women conceive is within their control is naive and misleading.'

Are we living on the same planet? By and large women have complete and utter control in the reproduction process – unlike men, who have none. Women have the full spectrum of contraceptive control, while men only have the condom – which isn't always practical – and a vasectomy.

Women have the option to terminate or adopt a pregnancy, relinquishing responsibilities for whatever reason (and so they should), but men can't (yet they should).

And if women don't manage to find an ideal 'babydaddy' they can use a sperm donor and go it alone. Anytime. So I find it pretty offensive that she's blaming men for a path she consciously chose.

Quite frankly, she's a big girl who made her own decisions.

Besides, men are not – and never should be – on stand-by for when a broody woman calls. Becoming a parent is a meeting of minds. It is a mutual, life-changing decision. The maxim 'my body, my choice' applies to both genders, no matter how much it may inconvenience certain women.

But that's equality – it cuts right down the middle. It is inflexible.

It's also a basic human right to make your own decisions on parenthood. If we switched the genders in Kite's story and had a man saying 'Women are selfish because they won't give me the child I deserve' there'd be uproar. But, once again, we have stiletto sexism telling us that female-on-male chauvinism is acceptable.

Yet, while her sense of entitlement astounds me, I do respect Kite for not trapping men – something she comes perilously close to recommending.

'Recently, a girlfriend in her 20s told me she was feeling broody but felt it was too early to ask her new husband to have kids,' she writes. 'I wanted to yell: 'Then don't ask him!'… I felt a shameful urge to tell her to secretly stop taking the Pill.'

But this is raping a man's choice and must never be accepted. In fact, it should be enforced by law. Particularly as it happens all the time – which is precisely why the culture of having children needs to be less about women and more about both parents. While Harriet Harman is worrying about old women on TV, fathers in families are the much bigger priority.

Fortunately, Kite retains control of her maternal destiny. She could still adopt, foster or conceive and be a wonderful mother. But I'd still worry if she ever had a son.Not because I doubt her potential for raising another human being, but – if she's happy to trash men for making their own decisions – what else would she encourage her son to compromise?
As a man, I'm sick and tired of such things. Fortunately, I'm not the only one. Only last week I bumped into actor Jude Law and we chatted about Diane Abbott's recent criticisms of male identity.

Right there, being the wonderful father he is, he summed up the reality in an instant by saying: 'Peter, men are no more in crisis than women.'

Judging by the opinions of women like Melissa Kite, he's spot-on.

Finly issues ultimatum to AVFM

Publisher's note: Two days ago I got an email from someone identifying themselves as Cathy Brennan. Yes, as in "Bug" Brennan, the Aussie Radfem of the Radfem Hub variety. I am not kidding. There is no punch line here. I really got the email. And of all things, she wanted to write an article for AVFM. Rather than try to make sense of that, I will just share the email with you.

Name: Cathy Brennan

Email: bugbrennan@icloud.com

Message: Hi,

My name is Cathy Brennan. I run a blog (http://pretendbians.com/author/bugbrennan/) about how some men are hurting other men through so -called "trans activism". I would be interested in writing a guest article. Please get back to me.

Now, while I was deeply touched by Bug Brennan's compassion and concern for men being hurt, giving her nasty ass a platform to spread hate at AVFM is still not quite on my daily "to do" list.

It did, however, cause me to think that perhaps we have been too exclusive around here. I started thinking that we are past due to give some equal time to the opposition. And no sooner did that thought enter my mind that I received an actual submission, this time from Loy Finley, inventor of the Loy 9000 and living proof that bathing in ethanol will not really clean you up.

I don't agree with Loy, but I wanted him to have his chance at his say, and at entertaining you all. PE

Mr Pelam.

I am making an announcement and you will no doubt not publish my words on your web-slight. Be as that may, here is my whisper to the ether regardless as I know at least one more Y-Chromo has heard me.

Before I speak of a new Wrongarian called *Tad Henderson I am going to let you hear my thoughts beyond the thin and truncated message that is best left for "comments" on your repellant threads. Your articles that call cloyingly to the scrabble that have oozed as spent lava at your feet.

Know this, you fully encased in a simian bearded oomph, that I see you have been breathing into your great balloon again as always. And such a sight it is to see your flatulance filled dirigible wander drunkenly as it scours the sky,

If that were all it was then so be it. We are used to the ugly ways of the MHRA when they pass us by just as we are with all garish billboards glanced at from passenger windows. But there is more to your itinerant ship than a merely curious freak show that lives to tear the clouds away.

You Mr. Pelam are that great sky ship. The heavy chain that tapers from your bottom is tethered to what seems to be some sort of enormous anchor. It's no anchor however; it is a wrecking ball that bounces behind you and cuts wide swathes of hatred as its wake.

We watch it aghast as it bursts against our softly tilled soils. Our wimmin tendered gardens that house flowers and vegetables and small species you would perhaps wish to gobble down when you first spy it as a pate or sliced delicacy on a cracker.

No, Mr. Pelam. We Wrongarians demand you deflate your horrid Zepplin and recapture your chain. Collapse this site and tell everyone goodnight as you are erasing this domain. Do it, and do not over think it. Like a robot that you are and the puppet with no agency, I demand you do the said same and do as I say right now.

Mr. Tad Henderson has recently joined my Wrongarian fold and he and I are as one. He speaks as a corrected Y-

Chromo and his knees have found the cement in the presence of our golden-wombed betters. He has ripped the scales from his male eyes and sees the beauty around him for the first time. I implore you to be as him to see as him.

He says this in part:

> I acknowledge my white male privilege, and accept that my voice should be secondary to those of women, people of color and all else who have been enslaved by Patriarchy.
> I am a bi-sexual, a lover of social justice, an avant-garde artist and a person who has awoken to the horror that is the "Men's Rights Movement."
> This wretched bunch of knuckle dragging halfwits, rape apologists and filth of the Earth, are a threat to the security of women everywhere. We must act. We must destroy this movement in the crib before it grows into raping, hetero-normative, dimwitted privileged man-boys out to set Feminism back 200 years.
> I ask for you to join me!

Mr. Pelam. Your sun-dial has long shadows and another inch of time is tapping on your shoulders. When you look behind you now you see nothing but a great expanse of Wrongarians with arms out imploring you to do as I, Loy Finly, have demanded unto you.

Mr. Tad Henderson understands this directive and has said the following;

[box]

"PAUL ELAM WE DEMAND YOU END THIS WEBSITE NOW.

YOU HAVE 48 HOURS UNTIL OUR BOYCOTT OF YOU AND ANYONE ON YOUR SHOW. I WOULD BE HAPPY TO DISCUSS THE TERMS OF YOUR CLOSING OF YOUR WEBSITE IF YOU SO DESIRE. I DO NOT FEAR YOU."

[/box]

I suggest you do indeed heed his warning before your Men's Human Rights Movement wanders without food and water into a sandstorm that skirts the desert of your future direction.

You disgust me.

Loy Finly.

Snr Wrongarian.

The boardroom bitches

Diana Davison · 26 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There are a few things women adore quoting until it's not convenient. "Ginger Rogers did everything Fred Astaire did, backwards and in high heels." Another favourite is the idea that "behind every great man is a great woman." Women just love to brag about how easily they manipulate men but don't let that concept interfere with their brutal theory of Patriarchy.

Honesty just isn't convenient sometimes. If you consider it both briefly and in depth, it is much more pleasing to control events from the background while letting men place themselves at public risk. According to women, they have historically pulled the strings of men while men took all the responsibility for the consequences of those actions. If you look closely at a woman's blank face when the shit hits the fan you will usually find a subtle half hidden smile behind a look of innocence while she feigns shock and disdain. Like a child with her hollow, practiced eyes asking "Who? Me?"

So, Ms. Rogers, what about your uncanny ability to do everything backwards? Women have demanded the right to enter the classic domain of men: the workplace.

Feminists insist that we are capable of doing everything a man can do and we can do it better. When we don't do it better it's because men had the environment rigged to our disadvantage. Where did those high heels go? Remember dear Woxan, you can do everything backwards and in your sleep. Don't like the crude jokes? Don't like kissing ass to get ahead? Don't like being ordered around like a toddler? So then, at what point did you find evidence that men never navigated the same odorous oceans just to put lard in you larder and a new SIM card in your iPhone?

Alice Schwarzer debated with Esther Vilar, and made her case for the oppressive life of the housewife. If the husband comes home exhausted and drained, worried about his career not going anywhere, she then has the onerous task of having to give him courage again, saying "Oh Darling! But you are so brave!"

To Schwarzer, and her feminist posse, this expectation stands out as a subtle abuse of the female psyche. Oddly, when a woman asserts her workplace is asking too much of her, she totters back on her high heels as society grinds to a halt. With a smirk on her powdered face she claps her hands as the government raids their coffers to bail her out. Then of course, the entire workplace is forced to change to support her emotional needs.

So how have women improved our workplace? Sure, they can do it all but they can't do it without crying, hugging, bullying each other, or suing their workmates until "sensitivity training" became an industry unto itself. Feminists have proudly developed and grown a wide range of employment sectors based solely on catering to their emotional workplace requirements while simultaneously claiming they can do everything a man can do. That is some fancy footwork indeed, and I agree it is quite backwards.

Of course, the argument goes that making the workplace a blubbering emotional roller coaster with the occasional twist of sociopathic bling has somehow improved productivity. Recently I watched a battery of these gynaecological wonders ejecting their target male out of a position of management. They were busy self-congratulating when I asked the awkward question:

"What are you going to do if they replace him with a woman?"

A sudden, fearful silence resulted. Ahhh, they hadn't planned that far ahead.

I don't claim to be the voice of reason here, I only pay attention to the circus because it's highly entertaining. Despite cries of unfair stereotyping, we women are the first to admit amongst ourselves that working for men is a much easier task. Women are high maintenance, trust me.

I have no doubt that women aspire to be seen as compassionate, life giving, creative, and nurturing by virtue of their nature. We care a great deal about how we are viewed. However, there is a big difference to how you are perceived and how you really are. If you believe what Schwarzer said, then that means being supportive of others, including your life partner, is a lot of hard work for women. Thus, it's not our nature after all is it?

Feminists thrive on presenting women as the helpless child. They cheerlead their own methods of making life easier for women by blaming it all on men because, with infantile ineptitude, they believe all of our flaws stem from an outside source.

To believe the droll quotes they are so fond of, you must forget that men are controlled by the women in their lives. Only then can we see that feminists are hiding behind their myth of "Patriarchy" to explain their own shortcomings. They can't work in the same building with a man unless the man has completed a "sensitivity" training course on how women expect him to behave. Women don't want to learn how to use wit and savvy to stand their ground when it's more convenient to eliminate all social challenges. Why have a sense of humour when it's so much easier to just get someone else fired?

Women ask for your indulgence and special attention, but indulgence usually comes at a cost. Sometimes that price tag reflects the value, but sometimes it would have been better spent in a condom dispenser. A woman claiming she can handle the workplace is often as deceiving as her assertion that she is on the pill while strategically forgetting to take her daily dose. While feminists struggle to expand ownership of their sexuality they insist on punishing those who view them sexually. While they insist they are tough enough to stand high-heel to workboot, they want the workplace to adapt to their feminine needs.

Might we dare to ask ourselves if they are serving the greater good or just fucking with us?

If women want to dance in the boardroom they don't need high heels, they don't need a fluffer for their crying pillows, and they don't need a donut shaped conch to pass from bitch to bitch; they need to get a backbone and stop expecting to be treated like vulnerable children playing at being grown-ups.

In the dystopian boardroom of the Woxan world everyone joins the circle and holds hands. They take a moment to affirm the beauty of their inner spiritual selves. "Repeat after me," their metronome leader conducts, "I am divine. People like me. I radiate perfection and bring a unique light to the world around me." This mantra fills the room in a self-reverent chant until it reaches a crescendo and shudders to a quiet sigh.

The clock ticks, but they have learned that time robs. That clock on the wall is an evil man-device used by "the Patriarchy" to control the creative energy of the female. The circle collapses because they seat their royal behinds and whip out a tit. Those with present offspring suckle the infant served to their laps by male attendants. These men display the appropriate reverence for this basic life-giving task and acknowledge their inability to produce the required mammalian bodily fluids while averting their eyes in shame.

Before reviewing the quarterly stats the Woxen take a moment to complete any unfinished tasks that might disrupt their ability to multi-task. Once the phone calls are completed and their make-up repaired in ever-handy compact mirrors stashed within purses, it is announced that business is hovering at a happy medium somewhere between "good" and "fulfilling." In celebration they pass around a tray full of unfertilized eggs and ceremoniously hurl them at a new male intern who dutifully steps forward to receive their blessings. The ritual is complete, the roses hit the stage and the lights dim. The meeting is proclaimed to be a success for the mere fact that it happened.

Surely I jest? I wish it were the case. While the modern Woxan waxes poetic and moans about the growing "Peter Pan" epidemic, the concern is that young men are spending their time playing video games while women buckle down and do the hard work of shopping. Men are simply slacking off with their duty to marry a woman who will strip them of their dreams and laden them with guilt for not placing her materialistic goals above his own happiness.

Feminism has staked its claim: It wants women to have greater access to more stuff. It wants to improve the purchasing power of women under the guise that owning shit makes you happy. In order to accomplish this, women didn't tackle the job of competing for resources, they have simply demanded the resources lay themselves at their pedicured feet. Women haven't gotten bored of pleasing men, they got bored of waiting for men to please them.

We now live in a world in which if you take the time to actually ask a man what his dreams are he will probably speak to you of his fractured sleeping pattern. He has long since forgotten what it means to have a dream.

It's time for us to meet in a different boardroom. We need to stop being in the business of shutting down dreams for the sake of trying to dance backwards and sideways in six inch stilettos.

My dream keeps me awake at night. How well do you sleep?

Many of you are aware that our critics claim the Men's Human Rights Movement does nothing but troll around the internet and complain or whine about the state men and boys find themselves in today.

WRONG!

This is just another of the increasingly feeble lies feminists put out there along with saying we hate women, support rape, eat kitten sammiches with a side of fried baby otter, etc. Case in point:

There was a comment made on a recent article the other day / night, depending on which part of the world you're in, and it set off alarm bells for many of us.

I am not going to reproduce the comment as I wish to protect the individual and his children from feminist wrath. I am however going to paraphrase it:

> "I want the sound of my suicide to scream out at the justice system and my government about the wrongs it has done to me and my children."

This commenter as well gave some background about himself. Divorced, ex wife alienating his children from him, false allegations, about to lose his residence. The same list of heinous experiences so many men go through when run over by the male meat grinder commonly known as the family courts.

Our own Suzanne McCarley and I discovered this comment recently. Sue was first on scene, she commented, encouraged the gentleman to seek help and emailed him. I was next.

I also commented, showing support for this man from my keyboard just like Sue had done. I looked up the man's local suicide hotline, put that in my comment, and emailed him too.

I know many of you activists out there get the same feelings Sue and I had in a situation like this: sadness, anger and helplessness.

My own internal dialogue was full of expletives and cursing of the man-killing family courts. I've read of far too many men who have left this world due to the injustices inflicted upon them by those family courts at the behest of feminism dogma and false allegations made by vindictive nasty ex-wives / girlfriends.

"Curse them fuckers to hell," I think to myself.

Another emotion I myself felt was one of anxiousness. I kept thinking to myself, "reply to our emails damn it! Come on you got it in you to hang on just a little bit more, random commenter whom I really know very little about except for that you are one of the top candidates for suicide and are having your life and your children's lives destroyed by the corrupt misandric family courts."

"REPLY TO ME DAMN IT!"

I began to run a Google search for this person and discovered his phone number. I called it and let them know who I was and why I was calling and would he please call me back to let me know he had not committed suicide.

The person did not reply. I thought there must be more that Sue and I could do. So I called the suicide hotline and passed on the information that I could gather as part of the administrative team her at A Voice For Men. I explained the situation to the person on the other end, reading off the full quote from the commenter.

The worker on the other end of the phone was also concerned with the quote. It motivated that person to try to contact the individual over the phone. I told them I would wait on hold until they got an answer. Unfortunately this was not allowed due to the medical nature of a suicide and confidentiality issues.

“Damn,” I said to my self. I understand these things but it put me back to feeling helpless again. I was however able to get the hotline worker to agree to call me back if they could not get in touch with the commenter.

While this was going on I was also giving Sue updates, and asking her if she had received a reply from this unfortunate soul whose only fault was having been born with a penis and having been been rammed through the family courts.

I hung up the phone with the hotline operator and conversed with Sue over Skype a little bit about the situation. Some small talk, a few off-topic jokes to try and keep our spirits up.

Sue and I have seen too many stories like this gentleman’s end with nothing more than a silent statistic which screams out about the man-killing misandry endorsed by the family courts.

Time ticks by sooooo slooooowwwllllyy in situations like this. What was most likely not more than 5 minutes seemed like a few hours.

My phone rang. I answered it with dread. It meant that the suicide hotline worker was not able to reach the commenter. I discussed with the hotline operator what else I could do. They asked their supervisor and told me that I could call the local police establishment and tell them about the situation. The hotline operator also agreed that the whole event was one for concern and did warrant calling them. For legal reasons the hotline operator could not do this. The hotline operator was helpful and gave me the local police force’s number. (Thank you for the help hotline operator, if you ever read this piece.)

So it fell back to the MHRM activists to do something about the situation.

“Well,” I said to myself, “its only long distance charges on my phone bill.” And off my digits went dialing the local police establishment’s number.

I again relayed all the information about the commenter, this time to the man’s local police dispatcher. A cruiser was sent over to the man’s home.

More waiting.

And then a call came thorough that took all those shitty emotions I was feeling away. I actually shed a few tears over this. And immediately informed Sue that the commenter who had cried for help was alive. But there was a little bit of a mix up.

What had happened is that the comment was about what he was thinking in his “recent” past. Unfortunately he did not put that in his comment.

An honest mistake most of us who tell our stories or part of our stories here can understand. Our comments bring up the darkest times in our lives. They bring up the darkest times in our female Men’s Human Rights Activists’ loved one’s lives. (No, this is not me White Knighting or any such thing. It is me respecting those honeybadgers whose sons and husbands and brothers are casualties of this man-killing feminist dogma times we find ourselves surrounded by today.)

I know damn near all of us do more than just sit behind our keyboards and troll the internet whining. Discussions are had, the word is spread. Ideas are shared. And action is taken. All of this is more than just sitting behind a keyboard whining.

What this event is irrefutable proof of is just one small slice of MHRM activism.

A small bit of the hands-on activism that the MHRM does.

So the next time you hear some feminist twit claim all we do is sit behind the keyboard and whine, point them to this article. Point them to the tons of other articles we have on AVfM that call out and challenge public officials, letter- and phone-writing campaigns, fundraising initiatives for various causes, the new Earl Silverman Society, the innocent men like Gordon Smith we've helped get out of jail, the corrupt scumbag prosecutors like Mary Kellett whom we've worked so hard to expose and hold accountable, and more.

And then tell them to Shut The Fuck Up (STFU). Because we're here to Fuck Their Shit Up (FTSU).

My relationship with evil

John Hembling (JtO) · 27 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Evil is a troublesome word. It is both emotionally charged, as well as intractably linked to concepts of religion and other supernatural belief systems. However, it is also a word descriptive of the very worst elements of human motivation and conduct through history. Loading gypsies, dissenters, and Jews onto trains to be shipped to death camps was, in the early 20th century, a singular example of evil's human face. The mass enslavement and extermination of human beings between 1939 and 1945 is so prominent in memory it is regarded as "The" Holocaust, despite being only one of many mass exterminations.

What motivates humans to do this is seldom publicly examined, due I suspect to the discomfort we feel at the answers. How easily intelligent, and "normal" people fall into the cognitive traps of ideology and atavistic group-think. Those modes of thought leading to the construction of ghettos, to lynchings and to racial cleansing. It's easier to blame episodes of culture-wide malevolence, violence or murderous insanity on an external, or supernatural agent. It's easier to blame "the other". Another demographic; another religion. Even a fictional devil of this or that bronze age fable. The truth, however, is harder and more subtle.

Whatever its causes, whether mass psychosis, or popular rise of ideological thought, evil exists. And I do not mean the supernatural. I mean the mundane, banal human element; that which has become fashionable to ignore, or explain, as mental disorders, chemical imbalances, or in modern instances past abuse resulting in a monstrous cycle of behavior.

I enjoy the hatred of those who practice evil. That is not to say those who are ill informed, or honest adherents to differing point of view. To suggest mere disagreement or misunderstanding is evil would be cowardly and dishonest.

In April of 2013, I attended a scheduled presentation by the co-authors of a series of books on cultural misandry in Toronto. That event was protested by the University of Toronto's campus ideologues. In a discussion with several of these protesters, the fact that men commit suicide at 400% greater rate than women was pointed out as being a real human rights concern affecting men and boys. This protester did not debate the number. Rather, she spontaneously sang a mocking rendition of "cry me a river".

This was not mere difference of opinion, it was a demonstration of a will to do further emotional harm to those already in pain. It was a chosen and intentional mocking of human suffering.

In 2011, the US Department of Education issued new guidelines to universities, with which they had to comply to continue receiving federal funding. In cases of female accusation of male sexual misconduct, standards of evidence would be reduced from "clear and convincing evidence" for culpability, or "reasonable doubt" for establishment of innocence, to a "preponderance of the evidence." That change, sufficient to be called extreme, was just part of the new paradigm. Along with the new standards of proof, came new rules of procedure. Gone was the presumption of innocence, the right for the accused to face their accuser, to ask questions of them, to have an attorney represent them at school "honor courts" that would determine their future academic life.

Not content to just remove the presumption of innocence and the right to a fair trial – both foundations of justice throughout the western world, the ideology behind the DoE's guideline removes these sacred rights selectively based on sex.

There is no honest way to describe this without identifying it as evil.

Domestic violence is an area of human interaction which receives great public attention. In fact there is an entire industry of shelters, advocates, lobbyists, fund-raisers and public educators all focused on it. Billions of dollars are spent yearly on conferences, publications, university and community outreach, public messaging and salaries of the grievance industry's employees. Unfortunately, although domestic violence is real, the theoretical model used almost universally in the grievance industry is a false model.

The Duluth Model of domestic violence realistically describes only one-sided, male-aggressor and female-victim instances of DV, the smallest and least common pattern of domestic violence. However, almost all public messaging portrays this as a representation of all domestic violence. Language popularized by the grievance industry refers to domestic violence as “violence against women”, furthering the myth of a sexually directional, mass-epidemic of male-perpetrated abuse of totally innocent and helpless women.

The obvious objection to this is the plain fact that domestic violence is initiated and maintained equally by men and women, and their sex has nothing to do with it. Some women abuse their male partners, just as some men abuse their wives, girlfriends and so on. “..women are as violent as men in domestic relationships.”[1]

“The most comprehensive review of the scholarly domestic violence research literature ever conducted concludes, among other things, that women perpetrate physical and emotional abuse, as well as engage in control behaviors, at comparable rates to men.”[2]

The Duluth Model denies this, of course, because the one-sided fiction portrayed of evil men and innocent helpless female victims makes an easier, more compelling story for raising money. Male victims are a harder sell, and don’t resonate with our natural impulse to protect women. But the one-sided fiction sold by Duluth Model advocates is false, and that means efforts to diminish domestic violence built around that model are guaranteed to fail. The failure is purposeful, because continuing human damage, especially to those for which we have sympathy (women) is what makes money for the DV grievance industry.

The collateral damage to men of being told they are naturally violent, that male identity is the problem is just incidental, collateral damage. The same for the children who are victims of violent mothers. Since according to Duluth, those children do not exist, there is no need to take them into account when providing services. Continuing this false public narrative, so assured to cultivate human harm, because it pays well, is evil.

No more examples. I could list dozens more, but the point should be clear.

Formerly, I struggled to distinguish motives. Some, I believed, who were earnest, if misinformed could be reached by better evidence, or by clearer communication. Some might simply be mentally ill, and best left to mental health professionals. Some very few, I thought, might be consciously, cynically fostering human harm for purpose of malice or profit. I tried to reach and to communicate with those whose actions were doing harm. I was rebuffed and dismissed at every turn, and that is the milder cases. Often I was demonized and attacked for even raising the questions.

And the end result was the same; continued and escalating human damage.

As mentioned near the top of this article, I enjoy the hatred of those who practice evil. This is not a polite euphemism. I derive satisfaction from the hatred of the practitioners of human harm. Those who justify the sexual mutilation of infants. Those who wrap real world violence in excuses, or sanctify the brutalization of men as a disposable sex with witless comedy. The violence and human harm practiced by such people is clearly visible. And seeing that damage done, their hatred directed at me provides satisfaction.

It also provides us examples to point to as we make our appeals to the uninformed, who still hold the erroneous belief that the domestic violence industry is inhabited by well meaning people who are working to ameliorate the problem of intimate partner violence across the society as a whole.

By showing the world, one evil example at a time, what is really going on, we are gaining the momentum to correct the problem.

Evil cannot remain in residence without the approval of the masses.

Monday Roundup

Dean Esmay · 27 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If you're our average reader you're just returning from a weekend away. If so here's a roundup of some great stories you may have missed on AVfM in the last week, plus a link or three from outside the site.

First off I'm going to indulge in a shameless bit of somewhat-self-promotion: Saturday May 25th's episode of Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey was the single best two hours of radio I've ever been involved in. If you listen to one episode this month or, hell, this year, listen to this one. Erin, Tom Golden, and the callers created something you'll want to even play for your Blue Pill friends. No, really.

Anyway: Feminists are fond of saying we live in a world they call "Patriarchy," a pseudoscientific concept without about as much validity to it as Nazi Eugenics theory. Some nowadays make a dodge on that and say "no not Patriarchy, but Kyriarchy," which is just a more complicated, and more overtly racist, version of their same "Patriarchy" concept. Gordon Wadsworth penned a must-read essay challenging this nonsense and noting what the state of affairs might actually look like to an outsider to the human race: he calls it Infantriarchy.

Secular activist Justin Vacula had an interview last week with A Voice for Men you might want to check out. Vacula has been demonized and bullied for over a year by a number of parties for the crime of simply being skeptical and offering intellectual challenges to some feminist claims. He recently had fun at a Women in Secularism conference and the interview was fun to listen to. (Plus, it turns out that there's a batshit crazy paranoid squirrel lady who used to be considered a rationalist saying he's stalking her because, well, he shows up at conferences. Watching squirrel ladies get steadily nuttier just makes watching him work even more fun. I threw a couple bucks his way just for the fun of it, and a few over at Dogmatic Nutland had a field day with that alone.) We also did a whole radio show with Justin that you might also enjoy listening to. That gender ideologues take outrage and offense at this mild-mannered, sensible, decent man is rather illustrative of just how far some people will go to avoid confronting their own cognitive dissonance.

A couple of years ago, Paul Elam penned an article that was intentionally full of mis-statements, fabrications, and misquotes of scientific literature in order to demonstrate how often sloppy interpretations of research, and outright fabrications of research, are used to give society a picture of men that's outright demonic and one of women as helpless victims of pretty much everything. Ever since he penned it, it has periodically been linked by other sites, causing a shitstorm of controversy from people who invariably do not bother reading to the end of the article where it states plainly that the whole thing is lies and is given as an example of the bullshit that's said about men practically every day in the press. Paul has a chuckle over this article, which goes into how despite the fact that it's clearly stated as a parody of "research" that's been endlessly debunked and that competent researchers have confirmed over and over is debunked, they still can't see the parody. Ah well, any publicity is good publicity, or so they say, and in any case it appears impossible to overestimate the depths of human stupidity that's out there.

The honeybadger contingent continues to expand. Deborah Kendrick shares how she found the red pill. Welcome aboard, Gender Traitor Deborah! Now shut up and make me a sammich!

In the last decade Spain became an almost literal hellhole for fathers and their children, or really just about any man foolish enough to have relations with even a somewhat selfish or irresponsible woman. Lucian Vâlsan has part I of a devastating report on what's been done en-masse to Spanish men, and has Part II here. Anyone who thinks this sort of thing can't happen in a modern liberal democratic society is out of his mind.

What makes a real man? John the Other notes there's a problem inherent in the very nature of that question.

Jared White penned a rather controversial article for us last week, wherein he says Patriarchy is real. But you may want to hold onto your response until you read it, because it looks to our eyes like what he's really done is go back to an understanding of what that word meant before it got twisted and turned into unrecognizable pseudoscientific ideology. Agree with him or don't, to me it's a note of sanity in a discussion that's usually anything but sane.

The vast majority of men's advocates have known for decades–yes, decades–that domestic violence is not a problem of man-on-woman and man-on-child violence, but that gender ideologues calling themselves feminists have been lying about it for a long time. The problem is that the accumulated weight of scientific evidence can't be held at bey forever (at least we hope not) and here's some exciting news on that front you may want to check out.

Hyundai recently pulled an ad that made a joke of a man committing suicide. Victor Zen accepts their apology for it but notes the cultural sickness that underlies finding that funny in the first place. Before you start arguing, you might want to read what he has to say first.

After having creating something of a stir a couple of months ago, veteran men's and father's activist Glen Poole recently graced our page with a thoughtful look at the massive silver lining around that particular little dark cloud. It's good to see Poole back on our pages.

Domestic abuser and murderer Jodi Arias is selling t-shirts. Fuck you to anyone who buys one.

Peter Lloyd returns to our page to note that British feminists are still self-centered, self-entitled misandrists who demand that men live up to their standards without giving a fig what men's wants or needs are. Now apparently men are bad if they don't want to make babies and be providers at the demand of women. Apparently, some men are wary of being a disposable utility for women. Wonder why that would be?

We're a little tired of being told all Men's Human Rights Activists do is whine. Whether it's little things or big things, we're actually activists around here, and not just talkers. Sorry, dumbasses, but we are.

Did I mention the honeybadger ranks are still swelling? Well yeah they are. And Diana Davison is a working woman who openly wonders who a lot of her fellow females in the workplace think they're fooling. Man I can't wait to read more from this chick.

There's also been a ton of stuff added to our video section, so if you're looking for something to watch or listen to instead of just read, be sure to check that out on top of our radio shows.

In a bit of good news outside of A Voice for Men, the Times of India notes that judges are increasingly raising complaints about women abusing rape laws. You know, you'd think that those most concerned with the rape of women (let alone men, who of course don't count even though they're far more often victims than generally acknowledged) would be infuriated at false accusers who abuse the system as tools of revenge and gaining legal advantage in various ways. I wonder why they so rarely are willing to say much about it in more than vague generalizations? And speaking of sexual assault, not to mention non-sexual assault, to our shock, there was recently an article in the Daily Mail that almost looks like it just might indicate that the mainstream press is getting a clue on what reality looks like. As I live and breathe, are bits of the Red Pill slowly leaking out into the atmosphere?

Also, has someone been reading Robert St. Estephe's "Unknown History of Misandry" series? A newspaper has published some little-known history. Doubtless some fool somewhere will think by linking that that we think women shouldn't have the vote, rather than the real reason it's interesting: the picture of history we get is often ridiculously slanted toward the "male brute/brave female victim" narrative that condescends to women and demonizes men. The real history is almost always more interesting and less simple than that.

Oh, and as a "known hate site" we have received an ultimatum from Loy Finley. Actually it looks like we got two, but one of them disappeared. Oh it's such a nice web site we have here, it would be such a shame if something were to "happen" to it. Tremble in fear of the Loy 9000!

OK that's it for this week. I'm going to do my best to come back to writing our Monday Roundups every week again from now on. I hope you enjoyed this one, it should give you hours of worthwhile reading, watching, and listening. Git along doggies, and enjoy!

Booze: the weapon of sluts

Dan Perrins · 28 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Slutwalk, a feminist protest event and excuse to get half-nekkid and compare cellulite is in Hamilton on June 1, 2013.

I am going to be there to call them on the horse shit. After all, Hamilton is my backyard.

I did some looking into Slutwalk Hamilton. Their website has the usual trivialities; what they claim to be up to and who is coming out to support them, etc; things any person who reports on events or an organization would say.

I started by looking around their facebook page I discovered one of their supporters is a group called 'Hollaback Hamilton'. Curious, I decided I would look at Hollaback's twitter feed.

This is what I discovered:

> You think slut shaming = flirting? Well, then my drink in your face = a hug. #unslut

Now I have to admit this re-tweeted statement by Hollaback from an organization called the 'UnSlutProject' got me fairly irate and a little confused.

Are these women sluts or un-unsluts?

No time to ponder that one, nor do I care to ponder it. They're women, some like sex a lot some don't, just like, you know, men. Some humans like sex a lot some don't.

I wondered if these two feminist organizations realized how the advice they were tweeting was going to help increase hostility and violence toward women, rather than reduce it.

I decided to engage them, realizing the futility but wanting to try. The reason; what these feminists are advocating for is going to get some women hurt, and land some men in jail with a pending court date.

Slut-shaming is just that, shaming someone. It does not involve laying your hands on someone, or threatening them. It certainly doesn't warrant Hollaback's suggested response, which is a crime as defined under 265 of the Criminal Code of Canada — assault.

However in the minds of the Hollaback feminists a verbal insult entitles them to commit a physical response.

And feminist say males have 'privilege.'

I tweeted Hollaback informing them of their irrational reaction to verbal insult.

Here is that exchange.

Click to enlarge

From the screen grab I took you can see I first point out the error in their thought process. And they immediately became confused. Just like 1,2,3. One, they promoted the idea of throwing a drink in someone's face as a response to being verbally insulted. Two, I pointed out that this was violence advocacy. Three, they said. "Uh, what?"

Gender studies, anyone?

Anyway, I pointed them to the law which codifies the crime they were advocating women to engage in.

Then the feminist follies began, conflating the topic of verbal slut-shaming with a person being actually being attacked. Hollabck claimed we have to look at the context.

What context? An insult is just that, an insult, nothing more.

I again informed them of the situation, but true to form the Hollaback folks wanted to maintain their privilege of escalating an embarrassing comment into a physical one by changing it from an insult to a threat.

The two literally have nothing to do with each other.

Either some person said something that pointed out you are dressed rather poorly and called you something you found to be shamful, or they made a threat against you. And while I admit that there is a possibility the two events can be tied together, shaming language combined with a threat, common sense tells us that unless you are drinking hydrochloric acid, throwing your drink in a criminal's face is not going to stop them.

In fact there is a very strong probability that it will increase their hostility and make matters worse for the victim.

But that's not what their tweet indicates in plain English. Their tweet put forth the idea that when a woman is insulted (slut-shaming) and it involves their outward appearance, a valid response is to increase things by engaging in a crime.

So, Hollaback feminists, if that is the way you want to engage in equality, how do you feel about every man you call a creep throwing a drink in your face?

It is pretty shameful for a man to be called creep, among other male shaming language employed by women.

How about calling a man who displeased you a dick? Would it be OK for that male to then throw his drink in your face?

What do you think any woman today would do after having a drink thrown in her face?

I can tell what happened to a friend of mine who after being slapped in the face by a woman and his response was to employ the drink in the face tactic. He got to enjoy 3 hots and a cot at the local jail. And then got to go through about a years worth of probation. And he didn't even initiate the situation.

What that also illustrates is that throwing your drink in someones face is a crime. And if you're a male the self-defense claim, even when it is real, doesn't matter.

So, Hollaback Feminists, I have a question for you.

If I see you at Slutwalk Hamilton and I say something to displease you or shame you can I expect to be assaulted? Or for that matter can any man expected to be assaulted for simply insulting your slatternly ways and attire?

Italy declares war against Italian men

Lucian Vâlsan · 28 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The rights of men and boys are under attack in Italy: media is running a violent defamatory anti-male press campaign with the goal of passing new feminist laws (such as the Istanbul Convention[1]) and 85 million € in public funds for those feminist organizations that attack men by pretending to protect women from what they call "gender violence." Sound familiar?

Media keeps on repeating that the so-called "male violence is the first cause of death for women". The truth is that all violence is that the rate of female deaths is only 0.056% (that is 0.56 per 100,000 inhabitants) and women represent only 23% of the Italians who get killed. Long story short, both men and women mostly kill men[2].

The Media keeps repeating that 7 millions of Italian women are victims of male violence. This false claim is based on a phone survey, where Italian women receive questions such as "does your partner criticize your dressing?" Women who answered "yes" have been counted as a victim, without even knowing it. The statistical fraud became evident when the researchers asked the same questions to men, getting the same rate of "yes" answers. Do the Italian feminists care about inconvenient things like facts? Of course not.

Media then goes on and repeats endlessly that Italy is the country of "femicide" and lobby for a "femicide" law. They want that killing a woman be considered a more serious crime than killing a man. The truth is that almost 50% of these acts are committed by desperate men who follow their actions with suicide. Even so, Italy is one of the safest countries in the world for women: 5 women killed per million inhabitants each year[2].

This "femicide" thing is not a new one. The global feminist lobby succeeded in passing this in Argentina[3] – where murdering a woman (but only if the perpetrator is male) carries a life sentence, whilst any other murder (woman versus man or man versus man) carries a sentence of 8 up to 25 years of imprisonment. Basically, the law literally states that a man's life is less relevant for the society.

The Italian media also ignores much bigger problems, such as the suicide rate among separated fathers which is 284 per year per million. The suicide rate gets 4 times higher with separation, when men and children have to deal with a sexist judiciary system and with false accusations[4].

How can things be so bad, given that sexist laws which are more explicit in various European countries, do not exist in Italy because Article 3 of the Constitution has so far been successful in blocking them? The article in questions reads that all citizens are equal in front of the law without any distinction of sex, race, language, religion….[5]

Italy is a strange country where what you see is not what you get.

Feminism never got popular among Italians. However, it has become politically powerful. Indeed, the main feminist organizations, like UDI (Union of Italian Women), were founded by PCI (The Italian Communist Party) and still have a strong power, mainly in left-leaning parties. Through politics, Italian feminism got a strong artificial influence on the media and in the State. Still doesn't sound familiar?

Almost all Italian newspapers are funded by the State and host a feminist blog. For example, the communist journal "il Manifesto" (The Manifest) hosts the blog caked "women and female children first" with similar ones being in the main Italian newspapers. Comments from readers are often censored, and even those that get past the censorship are still mostly negative. Anyhow, almost nobody in Italy believes in the official media, and the Internet allows free information to flow. Men's rights, attract interest among real people: for example hundreds of thousands of people follow a Facebook group that speaks for the rights of everybody. There is one father who managed to get into the official media. He opened a fake feminist web-site, publishing extreme versions of the usual anti-male rants, with the goal of exposing them. Journalists believed that it was real feminism, so now "she" is on the official media (for the moment "her" name is a secret).

Political power, however, is the bigger problem. Italians can vote for parties, but not for politicians. Once elected, politicians can do whatever they want. One government decided that the State should give money to employers who hire women. Meanwhile, 400 unemployed men commit suicide every year. That government then fell as they got only 10% of the votes in the new elections. But the situation got worse: politicians have decided to put in the third most important position in the state a feminist from an extreme left party that got only 3% of the votes. One should also remember that up until recently, Italy was led by the Mario Monti government, a government that has been literally imposed by the bully-boys from Brussels (that is the EU) who went on to sack the previous government and placed a puppet for which nobody voted.

Like all countries, Italian men work and earn more because many women prefer the traditional female role rather than becoming workers.

Unfortunately, or should we say – not so surprisingly – there is one moment when many Italian women go on and accept feminism and the institutionalized misandry: That is the moment of divorce.

Under this demand, Italian feminism became a sort of "mummy-ism" which goes against even the international feminism. This shows once again that feminism is strictly about political power and that they will throw ideological consistency they might have had out the window if that brings them closer to more political power.

For example, Swedish feminists support child-care for working mothers, support joint custody such that women can pursue careers (or at least they claim to and try to maintain certain appearances). Italian feminism, however, does exactly the opposite and is the enemy of fathers who take care of children: they argue that children must stay with the mother until they are 3 or 6 (… or 18) years old. The rationale behind this is clear from the words of a feminist lawyer:

> The situation is not so bad until the woman has the "cover" of children; when they grow, the women lose the family house, lose the alimony…

Basically, we have an exaggerated (but very real) form of the tender years doctrine.

When the Parliament approved a joint custody law in 2006, feminism took the only possible road in a country where laws are good but respecting them is optional: Illegality.

False accusations are very effective in the country with one of the slowest judiciary system of Europe.

The results of these criminal acts have been described by many judges. Judge Carmen Pugliese said[5]

> "Only 2 out of 10 accusations of violence are true. The others are used as blackmail against husbands in divorces".

Gian Ettore Gassani, president of AMI (one of the main lawyer associations) says:

> "It is an emergency, the judges of Rome established that 75% of accusations against ex-spouses are false, done with the purpose of getting advantages".

Judge Barbara Bresci added:

> "Very often accusations are used to obtain children and alimonies".

Judge Jacqueline Monica Magi said:

> "It might seem unbelievable that false accusations of sexual and child abuse are used … almost always done by women that try to remove the fathers".

The psychologist Sara Pezzuolo says:

> "False accusations of violence, sexual abuse build to eliminate the ex-partner range between 70% and 95%".

Luca Steffenoni, expert of crime, computed in a book that accusations are used in 86% of the divorces. A research by Prof. Camerini et al. showed that in Italy 80% of persons accused of child abuse are fathers, and they turn out to be innocent in 92.4% of the cases.

Even when false allegations are not used, Italian fathers suffer hard times, as described by the New York Times[6]:

> Even though a 2006 law made joint custody of children the norm when parents split, Italian courts continue to make mothers the primary caregivers while fathers bear the financial brunt of the separation. Critics say the law, as it is applied, favors women […]
> When Umberto Vaghi, a sales manager in Milan who was divorced last year, split from his wife in 2004, for example, he was ordered to pay her 2,000 euros, or about $2,440, each month for upkeep on their home and support for their children, then 10 and 8. Each month, Mr. Vaghi was earning 2,200 euros, or about $2,680.
> In Italy, charities say that a growing number of those using soup kitchens and dormitories of churches and other agencies are separated parents. "An uncomfortable reality but easy to believe, considering that 80 percent of separated fathers cannot live on what remains of their salary," Ms. Saso, the researcher, wrote.
> The Rev. Clemente Moriggi, who oversees the Brothers of St. Francis of Assisi, a Milanese Catholic charity, said that in the past year separated fathers, ages 28 to 60, occupied 80 of the 700 beds in the foundation's dormitories, which do not house children. That is more than twice the number of just a few years ago. "These men earned average salaries that only left them tears to cry once they paid their alimony and mortgages," Father Moriggi said.

The democratically voted joint custody law is not applied by judges: ADIANTUM (association for children rights) launched a class action against the Italian judiciary system, with an on-going collective proceeding at the European Court for Human Rights, a court that has already sanctioned Italy in many individual cases[7].

Meanwhile the judges do the contrary and sometimes apply a principle (that has never been democratically voted, mind you) adopted by Cassazione (the Italian Supreme Court). In order for them to quantify alimonies, they invented the "right to keep the life-style adopted during wedding". The result has been described by the New York Times: men become slaves who work with a good salary, but still need to ask charities for a bedroom and for food.

Still doesn't sound familiar?

Two recent rulings exemplify how judiciary system works. On March 8, 2013, the Cassazione ruled that children must be protected from the parental alienation syndrome (PAS): the alienator was a father. On March 20, 2013, basically in the same month, the Court ruled in a case where the alienator was a mother: the same Cassazione decided instead that PAS has not enough scientific support. So basically, according to the Italian Supreme Court, PAS exists only when the mother can benefit.

The President of Cassazione was in both cases Maria Gabriella Luccioli, already criticized in the past for other sentences. The main Italian newspaper Corriere della Sera, wrote in 2008[8]:

> She rewrote family law. Everything and always in favor of women.

The second main newspaper, la Repubblica, wrote in 1997[9]:

> Somebody tells that Cassazione is becoming feminist.

Just as I am writing these lines, the Italian Parliament has unanimously ratified the Istanbul Convention[10]. I don't want to sound grim but it's almost game over. With the Istanbul Convention ratified, the Constitution is worth nothing if female interest are at stake.

Gentlemen of Italy, you are in a state of war with the State and with the gender ideology commonly known as feminism. The stake of this war is no longer just some legal rights, but your life, literally.

Objects of utility vs. objects of sexuality

Jason Gregory · 28 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So, if it's wrong to pay money for sex, then why isn't it wrong to receive money for sex? That's an excellent point made by a good friend of mine and it's a point rarely ever discussed by feminists. Feminists typically focus on the dehumanization of the prostitute and her exploitation by men who pay her for her services and who view her as an object of sexuality. Rarely is the inverse discussed. Is not the john exploited? Is he not dehumanized and seen only as an object of utility? Whether a person is viewed as an object of utility or as an object of sexuality, it makes no difference. Both persons are made objects and the fullness of their humanity is not realized and experienced.

I recall a discussion with an anarcha-feminist who was also a high-class hooker. She said there is no objective difference between a back massage and a penis massage. The only difference was one of subjective social stigma. That's a fine and valid point. However, when the boyfriend buys the engagement ring, several months worth of dinner and drinks, flowers, and all that other romantic bullshit, the underlying business transaction is obfuscated from the relationship by psychological dependency, self-deception, tradition, and other sorts of social constructs that prevent both parties involved from ever acting in "Good Faith," as Sartre would call it.

For Sartre, it's all about the responsibility to strike a balance between the oscillations of the facticity of the underlying transactional nature and the transcendental nature of love. If the woman focuses on the transcendental nature of love in order to obfuscate the facticity of the transactional nature of the relationship, she is without moral balance between facticity and transcendence. She is deceived, self-deceived, acting in "Bad Faith," as Sartre would say. How is it that she gets a moral pass? Feminists, traditionalists, and society-in-general give her a moral pass for her "moral purity," for focusing on the transcendental notions of romance in order to obfuscate her dehumanization of men as objects of utility. However, the man who focuses on the facticity of transactional sex… he is a pig, a moral pervert and generally despised, shamed, and ridiculed as an exploiter–a degenerate, a predator, a man who reduces women to objects of sexuality. The man and woman are both neglecting their responsibilities to strike a balance between the oscillations of facticity and transcendence. It's not morally better to be unbalanced one way or the other. This is why I respect the hooker far more than I respect the traditional woman. The hooker acts in "Good Faith." There is no deception regarding the transaction. Balance is maintained and she does not obfuscate the underlying facticity with some transcendental romantic bullshit.

Why do women get this moral pass? Men. It is because men do not speak up. Men have been conditioned to deny their emotions. Men have been trained to focus on the logical analysis of facticity. Men are trained to "suck it up, Buttercup." It is women and society-in-general that exploit men as objects of utility, but it is men who allow this to continue. It is men who need to focus on developing their emotional intelligence and become better equipped to balance the facticity of their sexual drives with transcendence of their emotional lives.

Men need to tell their stories. The story of man's exploitation is muffled by our shame. For men, it is better to be dead than useless. We hide in the facticity of sex to obfuscate the fact that mother/woman only values us insofar as we are useful to her. We are manipulated by the shame of our utility. Our entire identity and meaning is bestowed upon us by mother/woman. We await her approval or disapproval, like a dog awaiting its treat or scolding. For men, this is angst. We are afraid to confront the reality that she doesn't love us, that she doesn't value us, that she only values our utility to her. We are afraid of her for what she makes us–her toy, her object of utility. It is men who are dehumanized by women. It is men who are made objects, reduced to things that have done something for her lately. It is her "moral purity" that perpetuates our enslavement to her whims. The depths of her cruelty is matched only by the depths of his cowardice. This is our story. This is our oppression. It is not our privilege.

Listen to a passionate speech by Andrea Dworkin on prostitution. Listen to the passion as she talks about the women who work in prostitution. Put aside logical analysis of the bullshit for a moment and gauge what she says based on her passion. Those kinds of stories are the passionate stories that men must learn to tell about their lived experiences as objects of utility to a woman, to women, and to society in general. It's difficult for men to gain a moral high-ground from statistics alone. Even though 80% of the homeless are men, the statistic doesn't matter. The statistic makes men a caricature of a number, not a full human being with a lived experience, desperate for love, desperate for dignity, desperate for a meaningful existence that is callously denied to them by women who bestow upon them the title of loser, creep, hobo, scum, and whatever other demeaning and dehumanizing language can be used to shame men for failing to climb the dominance hierarchy, for failing to become satisfactory providers/protectors, for being men. It is time for men to speak, to find their voice, to find their self, their identity and their own meaning.

As men find this voice it is important to remember that one cannot develop a deep understanding of men without simultaneously developing an even deeper compassion for men. Compassion for each other precludes competition against each other and entails cooperation with each other. In the old narrative told about men there is much misunderstanding, callousness, and competition. The new narrative that we must develop is one of understanding, compassion, and cooperation. We are no longer like the brothers, Cain and Abel, fighting for divine approval, proving our worth with sacrifices and offerings. We don't need to sacrifice ourselves as offerings to the divine. We don't need to prove ourselves worthy. In fact, we don't need her God Damn approval at all.

Samsung insults us all with new ad

Suzanne McCarley · 28 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Shh. Don't tell Paul, but I managed to get away from the deepest darkest recesses of the sammich mines for a while today. Of course I couldn't slip away entirely, as the compound is quite secure, but I had a bit of time to myself. Kittens were all nicely minced and the faulty beer thermometer has been replaced, so I headed for the red velvet appointed Honey Badgers' lounge to plop down in front of the TV for a while. I never watch the thing (it's old anyway – the men always get the new equipment so we Honey Badgers make do with their rejects) and I thought it might make for a relaxing change of pace. Big Mistake. What is the first thing that I saw? O. M. G.

This commercial:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=u9HMhSvnbmk

Nasty, isn't it? All joking aside, and at least it wasn't mocking male suicide, but that was appalling. It has caused quite a stir around the 'sphere, and I decided to join the chorus. Samsung clearly has no shame whatsoever, and certainly won't be getting any of my money anytime soon.

Apparently a "fantasy" husband is a slave to his wife's every whim. He is handsome and well dressed, and he does not only his chores, but his wife's chores as well. While a "fantasy" wife files her nails, waiting to be waited upon. A "Real life" husband, on the other hand, is a useless, filthy, empty eyed pig, an utterly defective sub-human being whose "real life" wife is cute, clever, long suffering, and of course the one who is tech-savvy. You just friggin' GO GRRL!

So to further trash the notion that all we do is whine, I spent about ten minutes doing some impromptu activism. I sent an email to Samsung. Here it is:

> Dear Sir,
> I am disgusted by your recent misandrist commercial. To whom are you pandering by showing a smug "superior" woman who fantasizes about using a male-invented product (which operates in conjunction with other male-invented products, using still other male-invented technologies) to transform a stereotypically "defective" man into a slave-like servant? Let me guess. You are trying to sell your product to useless "empowered" women who consider themselves naturally entitled to pampering and unqualified dominion over the men in their lives.
> May I suggest that this is a misguided marketing strategy? The purchasing power of your targeted demographic will soon be dwindling, as the tightening economy will eventually result in drastically reduced monies to fund their cushy careers in HR, Non-Profits, and as do-nothing government clerks. If you were to hire an adverting agency that has the foresight to reject the current cultural trend of man-bashing (good luck with that, but it's worth a try) you might be pleasantly surprised by the public response from millions of real live men and women who don't find that crap *cute.
> In the meantime I refuse to spend even a dime on Samsung products. I will also use my platforms in the Men's Human Rights Movement to recommend that males and the women who respect males boycott your company.
> Sincerely,

Facebook hates women?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Facebook, we need to talk.

Apparently Woman Action Media (WAM!) has you looking out for gender-based hate speech. That's good to hear, but why focus so strongly on hate speech against women and not men? Does "hate speech" include speech regarding glorification of violence against men?

For those of you who have not seen the news today, Facebook gave in to pressure from a collection of women's groups to do three things. Their message has been copied verbatim from the WAM! Open Letter to Facebook, signed by over one hundred organizations and individuals.

> 1. Recognize speech that trivializes or glorifies violence against girls and women as hate speech and make a commitment that you will not tolerate this content.

If you are an anti-feminist (or if you think that a girl who got drunk and regretted sleeping with a guy was not actually raped), does this mean you are trivializing violence against girls and women? If so, your words are not to be tolerated, because your thoughts are not allowed.

> 2. Effectively train moderators to recognize and remove gender-based hate speech.

Why does this remind me of a book about a farm that had animals that could talk?

> 3. Effectively train moderators to understand how online harassment differently affects women and men, in part due to the real-world pandemic of violence against women.

Harassment for men and women on the Internet is defined by the groups who support this letter. This is their answer and I have questions for that answer.

I will not dismiss concerns of hate speech, but shouldn't men's groups have a say? Shouldn't the women's groups show us what they have done to prevent hate speech against men? And Facebook, what specific changes to your policy do you envision? Specifically, will your policies be just as vague as the language in this letter?

The offensive content feminists intend to get rid of concerns media glorifying or trivializing violence against women or rape. Feminists are also accusing Facebook of biased moderation.

> These pages and images are approved by your moderators, while you regularly remove content such as pictures of women breastfeeding, women post-mastectomy and artistic representations of women's bodies. In addition, women's political speech, involving the use of their bodies in non-sexualized ways for protest, is regularly banned as pornographic, while pornographic content – prohibited by your own guidelines – remains.

I can't find porn on Facebook and believe me I looked. However, what I did discover are models who reveal cleavage and bikini butts. I can only believe in the absence of feminist citation, that what I am observing is the normal interaction of both sexes interacting in a social environment doing as humans do. If cave-people had the Internet would they not show a bit of leg peeking through their Mastodon skin coat? I dug and now I'm confused even more. I need more data!

Rape, it's glorification? My experience has been that people who post images, videos and text that promote rape and violence are doing it because they know the value of shock. If you conflate their intention to deceive with their presentation of an untruthful reality you rob yourself of the truth. It is tempting for some to believe as they say, but in the end those that do are denied what is actually real. I doubt real rapists are publicly announcing their desire to rape. I want numbers because I am curious.

How many examples of hate speech that WAM! and affiliates moan about lead to proven incidences of rape or domestic violence? Is this project making the world a better place for you and me? Ask Facebook.

Indeed, Facebook's ad revenue was attacked and it was attacked by the cluster bomb that WAM! deployed.

> To this end, we are calling on Facebook users to contact advertisers whose ads on Facebook appear next to content that targets women for violence, to ask these companies to withdraw from advertising on Facebook until you take the above actions to ban gender-based hate speech on your site. (We will be raising awareness and contacting advertisers on Twitter using the hashtag #FBrape.)

Facebook's revenue is being cut off by people who are only out to help the "fairer" sex. After all, the fairer sex outnumber men on Facebook, so of course they are going to listen.

This is a call to action to all MHRAs and women's organizations to allow men to speak in this discussion without "appropriate editing." Why do we deserve what the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states, well you know the answer already.

I want you to look at this experiment that took me thirty seconds. Here are the results for "I hate men," "men are evil" or "men suck" when I searched for them in Facebook.

1. http://www.facebook.com/photo.php?fbid=660529757307186&set=a.111990072161160.15768.111962042163963&type=1&relevant_count=1

7. http://www.facebook.com/pages/Men-are-Evil/388676584573526

Facebook moderators do not remove this content even though the hatred is overt. WAM! and company currently number over one hundred, so where is our mainstream media coverage? Oh that's right, like all oppressed groups that have a tiny membership, the "fairer sex" has it.

Choose one or be lit up under a spotlight shining on your theater of bigotry. Hate speech against either sex is not allowed, or, hate speech against both sexes is allowed.

I can put up with this but I'm not going to.

The following links are not safe for work, so do not click them if you are below legal age to view them in your jurisdiction, or are uncomfortable viewing such material. Feminists complain about this material when it targets women, but do not mention content like this in their crackdown on hate speech.*

Men Going Their Own Way. Are they a movement? Are they just a reaction to modern realities faced by men? Are they a bunch of losers that don't want to grow up? Are they the smartest of men because they are taking the path of wisdom?

Can they even be defined in monolithic terms?

And importantly, where to most MGTOWs stand on relationships with women?

Tomorrow, in a special episode of AVFM Radio, Paul Elam will have a discussion with YouTuber and MGHOW Stardusk. We will spend an hour putting our fingers on the pulse of the growing MGTOW phenomenon. And of course, you are welcome to call in with your questions and comments.

Tell us your story in your own voice

Neil Westlake · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On the 28th of this month, AVfM contributor Jason Gregory wrote an article which included the following imperative:

> "Put aside logical analysis of the bullshit for a moment and gauge what she says based on her passion. Those kinds of stories are the passionate stories that men must learn to tell about their lived experiences as objects of utility to a woman, to women, and to society in general. […] Even though 80% of the homeless are men, the statistic doesn't matter.
> The statistic makes men a caricature of a number, not a full human being with a lived experience, desperate for love, desperate for dignity, desperate for a meaningful existence that is callously denied to them by women who bestow upon them the title of loser, creep, hobo, scum, and whatever other demeaning and dehumanizing language can be used to shame men for failing to climb the dominance hierarchy, for failing to become satisfactory providers/protectors, for being men. It is time for men to speak, to find their voice, to find their self, their identity and their own meaning."

Gregory is correct. Facts, as encapsulated by statistics of the workplace dead, or the homeless, or the male dominance in suicide – these will not move public opinion. People are moved by human connection. They are moved by human experience and emotion. Men need to tell their stories in thier own voices.

This leads us directly to a project started by my friend and colleague Neil Westlake. He and I will be collecting, curating and publishing a series of stories of male experience, in the voices of the men and boys whose stories these are. I am following Neil's lead on this project, and he will outline it directly:

I found men's human rights activism in 1991. My 'discovery' came ironically through the gift of a book from a feminist. Perceiving that I had 'certain issues,' she gave it to me as a gift, in the hope that it would; using the language of the mythopoetic movement – 'heal my male wound.'

It was an anthology of male experience, edited by Francis Baumli of the National Coalition for Men (NCFM), entitled 'Men Freeing Men.' Written a half decade before 'Iron John,' * Baumli brought together a variety of male voices, encompassing concerns which had not been heard before. These were testimonies which had been drowned out by the deadening noise of second wave feminism.

Subjects ranged from divorce mediation to the military draft; from penis size to the perils of the dating game, an entirely new terrain of male experience was now open to interpretation. For the first time, men's inner realities were expressed in public.

Project Hermitage is a new initiative picking up Francis Baumli's baton. Using his initial project as an inspiration, JtO and I will collect and showcase what we call 'a new male voice'. As men, we are at a watershed period in the gender-relations tug-of-war. Ours is an environment populated by differing ideas and pitfalls. We are acutely aware of the disingenuous masquerade of popular gender ideology. Men are awakening to a red-pill view of reality in ever greater numbers. It is time for a new, authentic record of male experience to be a part of the sociological and cultural ecology. To this end John and I are soliciting personal stories from men, of all ages, sexual orientations and ethnicity as contributors.

The only firm requirement is that you convey your story in the first person. We request that you include a name or pseudonym, your age and your country of residence. In addition, it would be helpful if you could tailor your story so as to highlight one aspect of the ‘male experience’ whether it is suffering from prostate cancer (Health), or duking it out in the family court system (Law.)

Some ideas for subjects are: Addiction, Bereavement, Fatherhood, Law, Marriage, Sexuality, Health, Infertility, Workplace and Career Issues, Domestic Violence, Cultural Misandry, Parental Relationships, Pornography, Prostitution, Inter-male Bonding/Relationships, Political activism, Emotional and Psychological Issues, Feminism, Relationships with Women, War and Veteran Issues, Homosexuality and Transgenderism, Politics and Philosophy.

You are invited to write on a myriad of topics using separate submissions. All submissions will be held as copyright of Project Hermitage.

We all have a voice. Let’s make it be heard.

Open Letter: Radfem 2013 at the Camden Centre

MRA London · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What follows is an open letter and enquiry under the UK Freedom of Information Act to the Camden Centre Events Manager, on behalf of MRA London, concerning Radfem 2013 which is to be held at the Camden Centre in London.

The only contact information we currently have for the Camden Centre is this:

May 29th, 2013.

Dear Camden Centre Events Manager,

THIS IS AN OPEN LETTER AND ENQUIRY UNDER THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT 2000

On the 8th and 9th of June, 2013, the Camden Centre will be hosting the annual conference of Radfem, a pro-violence group whose members have a documented history of advocating harm to male infants, gendercide of half the human race, not to mention, hate toward transgender women.

The event is restricted to female attendees only.

I am writing to you on behalf of MRA London, therefore, to enquire under the Freedom of Information Act 2000, the following information from you:

1. On what grounds did the Camden Centre conclude that this event, which specifically excludes people on the grounds of sex, does not breach the UK Equality Act 2010?

2. How was this decision reached, and who made it?

3. Why did the Camden Centre not require the organisers to observe the Equality Act?

With regard to the exclusionary nature of the event, the official Radfem event website states the following:

“We welcome radical feminists and those women who want to learn more about radical feminism. It is women-only because we believe that we need to organise autonomously in order to fight for our freedom from patriarchy.” [1]

Last year, the Conway Hall convention centre rejected Radfem’s 2012 booking citing the UK equality law. The London Irish Centre, the original planned venue for 2013, also rejected Radfem’s booking earlier this year. While it can be argued that certain services and events may be applicable only to one sex, the official Radfem 2013 website also states:

“We are revolutionaries, fighting for social change, and overthrowing current patriarchal systems. … Radical feminism goes to the heart of female oppression by naming male domination and violence as being responsible for women’s subordination. … Gender only exists for the benefit of men, as a class, at the expense of women, as a class.” [2]

I do not consider myself an “oppressor” and regard the implication that I am responsible for violence, domination and subordination because I was born male as egregiously offensive and a denial of my humanity. Certainly, I have never benefited at the expense of women, either as a class or individually. I, therefore, do not accept that Radfem is a legitimate female-only event because the ideology espoused by its members affects me directly and personally, along with all males, not to mention every mother of a son. These are questions for everybody, not just one sex.

I have previously attended pro-female events, such as the Women of the World Festival in 2013, which did not seek to exclude males. In fact, I found certain aspects of the experience extremely rewarding and established positive contacts with groups representing female interests. MRA London has an inclusive membership, also, and we not discriminate based on sex or gender. I put it to you, therefore, that there is no legitimate reason why Radfem should be allowed to do so. Furthermore, as a public entity that is meant to serve all members of the community, the Camden Centre should not be facilitating any agenda of ideological exclusion.

Finally, I would like to draw your attention to the “No Delegation” clause of the Public Sector Equality Duty [3], in connection with third question of my enquiry under the Freedom of Information Act. The Camden Centre, as a facility provided by Camden Council, had a duty to ensure that the event organisers complied with the law. You could have, for example, required Radfem to open the attendance criteria to all human beings. Why was the Public Sector Equality Duty not observed in this case?

I look forward to receiving your reply.

Yours faithfully

Andy Thomas

Genital modification... dissected

Patrice Stanton · 29 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As I was shoveling off my computer desk earlier today, I came across the following essay. It was a direct response to both Greg Canning's "Designer Vaginas"[1] and his cited article, "The Large Labia Project." No women appear to be dropping dead from the procedure, but now that Labioplasty has been cast as "body-shaming" it'll likely continue to make the mainstream news. (I just confirmed this by checking the Huffington Post and sure enough: women are threatening to do-it-to-themselves[2].)

Back on March 8th I sent the following e-mail to The Large Labia Project's author and got no response. I so hate for a witty, insightful rant to sit on the shelf. Besides, I believe AVfM's readers will find its points effectively further the case that Feminists Are Hypocrites.

> Dear Ms. Ford:
> By the time I read your Feb. 13th, 2013 article[3] it was Mar. 6th, 2013 and the comments were closed. Since your news-site says, "We love comments that articulate a different point of view, a witty insight, some humour or a shared experience" I wanted to offer a 1500-word response that sort of poured out in the middle of the night. You see, I "came of age" before the Internet, therefore before online genital photo-galleries were even dreamt of – so I had more challenges than you can imagine when it came to concluding whether or not I was "normal."
> This essay then, is from a very personal place and hence a passionate place. The opening section below (I included the first 4 paragraphs) will give you a sense of my writing style and yes, I know it's pretty abrasive at times, but like I said, I'm passionate about this.
> Thanks for your time,
> Patrice Stanton

Where's the Beef?

Seriously, ladies, I fail to see what the problem is.

Since time immemorial (well, at least since the early 1960's) females have been paying men (mostly) to break their noses and realign them; to cut their faces off, hoist them up, and stitch 'em back on; to shove medical vacuum-cleaners into sundry fatty-deposits to suck them skinny; and lastly, they've paid through that now-perfect nose of theirs to have men (mostly) slash open their chests and shove various bags of squooshy stuff into those previously "inadequate" boob-cavities.

So now surgical "beautification" has gone where men (mostly) have never gone before: to the female Nether Regions. Honestly, can you think of a better example of being "Pro-Choice" on the planet? If any of you liberated female fuddy-duddies are so opposed to these body-modification practices it's pretty damn simple: don't (pay anybody to) do them…

But if you merely want to continue controlling the debate – along with other women's lives by shaming their choices – please, as you play your perennial Blame-Game, consider the following:

False Parallels

Comparing forced Female-Genital-Mutilation (fFGM) to what I'll call elective Female-Genital-Modification (eFGM) is a false parallel. [NOTE: forced Male-Genital-Mutilation (fMGM), a.k.a. routine infant circumcision, is just as evil as fFGM.]

Sliced-up children, regardless of their sex, are VICTIMS. Individual females – whether 13 or 30 – who walk into surgical consults are CONSUMERS. [O.K. I'm willing to argue against laws prohibiting medical practitioners from contacting parents in the case of minors seeking invasive/life threatening procedures, but that's a separate discussion.]

Blame vs. Accepting Responsibility

As seems to be the case so often in all things Feminine, outspoken defenders-of-That-Sex seem to confuse the diametrically opposed concepts of Blame and Responsibility. Women falling "victim" to later-lamented eFGM might very well be pitiable, however, readers grounded in reality won't be so quick to join that chorus. Not that they're hard-hearted…but because they get it: in life, bad choices (a.k.a. mistakes) happen.

What an individual does after they've made that mistaken choice, though, is crucial. Will they act like an adult? If so, they accept the consequences and suck-it-up. They accept their "stupid" or fix what they've broken and/or make amends where possible. In short they learn from their error and thereby grow in maturity (which means they possess increased personal integrity).

They are, in the eyes of anyone who sees their acceptance and responsible handling of the situation, all the more honorable for having worked through it.

If an individual is immature, therefore not grounded in reality, they are in for more than the average number of "mistakes." And they won't even see most of 'em coming. For these types, male or female, living under the pretense that reality is simply what "one perceives in their own mind" (or in that collective, enlightened, hive-mind they merged with, in college) will make for a steady stream of disappointments. Some potentially lethal.

They'll wander around zombie-like in the school of hard-knocks, perhaps perpetually…always studying, never graduating.

Maybe it's Maybelline® but probably it's Photoshop®

Please don't whine that you're being manipulated, like some zombie consumer, controlled by the evil corporate-capitalists that drive the current culture. (See? Here's the eXit and Off buttons.) In the West, at a certain point in our lives we all learn that what's on TV or in a magazine or catalog "may have been enhanced to show details." And we usually learn it by the age of 7. (Or else continue to go la-la-la-la to avoid that lesson.)

Of course not all of us pined for a Barbie® dreamhouse; not all of us got that 3-story pink molded plastic cultural reality-check. But those who did had their tiny hearts broken by believing it would be "as shown on TV." And… by recovering from that disappointment (that the elevator didn't move as smoothly – or on its own – because the human-hands were hidden off camera) we few, we fortunate few, grew up. Just a little. Until the next ad campaign at least.

But everyone – in the West – has, beyond a shadow of a doubt, had the fast-food hamburger reality-check. We know there are no actual burgers at any fast-food restaurant, that when served, look that pristine, that fresh, that juicy-moist. So it is with magazine cover-girls, cosmetic spokes-actresses, centerfold play-girlz, or TV and movie icons of pulchritude.

The days of Something/Something/and the American Way are gone. Surveys say that's the way we want it now. That's the new truth. It's the new reality. Sorry. Oh, and more bad news (read: more reality): even your average hum-drum fashion shoot doesn't remain untouched by the "miracle performing pixies inside every box" of Photoshop®[4].

Women Reject Equality

So now, these girls (who refused to grow-up) have become defenders-of-the-female-Sex… and continue to prove Equality was never their goal. Their lack of civil discourse in so many venues, on so many subjects, seems more than adequate proof "equality" wasn't even part of their philosophical ancestresses original vision.

The sudden volatility in discussions of voluntary female genital modification was inevitable. It's just one more example of a collective howl of foul arising against men and it happens every full moon for every conceivable wrong-against-women "detected" in Western society. It's the Patriarchy, don't ya know.

All along, though, the matriarchs wanted to act like men – or at least like the fictitious ones their college hive-mind feminist profs fabricated for them – well, at least when it suited them. They wanted to "have at" life just like those Frankenstein men of theirs: with "no regrets" and seemingly "no consequences."

So now they watch and read "porn" – and other more mainstream yet increasingly explicit materials. And once again too many women-acting-like-men just can't handle it… like men. They seek to be released from the responsibility that inevitably follows: of letting such imagery grow on them. These deluded broads refuse to be held accountable for not thinking outside the box. For not "getting it," for not getting that it's fiction for heaven's sake. So what do they do? Why, they play the Blame-Game. After they or their sisters have rushed off to a surgeon to get this or that bit "fixed" (raised up to a fictional standard) they turn around and blame their mistake on the men they so stupidly claimed they were just like.

It would take a stand-alone article to fully analyze the women who "wear whatever they want" (read: dress like sluts, uber-provocatively) but get offended when men look at what's exposed or – heaven forbid – treat them like actual sluts.

But it's time to reveal the winner of the whole naughty-bits Blame-Game, so listen up, ladies. (Particularly those of you who see a Patriarch-ist around every corner, under every bed, and repairing every imagined glass-ceiling your sisters finally managed to "break through."

The Missing Lynx

The "player" I contend you need to be blaming – or at least dialoging with – is a lot closer to home. In fact she's in your apartment, or, if you're on your own, she's back home. Where you supposedly grew up. It's your dear old (probably strong, independent, and single…) Mother. Sure, now she might be acting like a "cougar," but for sure she's no lioness. Because if she had been, you'd be smarter about the real world. Mother lions, after all, do more than just feed and protect their offspring. Equally importantly, they recognize the value and necessity of their lion. Modern human females (like your mother?) on the other hand… not-so-much.

("Traditionalism" Alert) If you had grown up with a more hands-on mother and an in-home father you'd have learned something that can't be gotten on a college campus, or by reading Sex-Relationship-Health columns in your favorite magazines, or by getting naked and leaping astride anything & everything on two legs you found momentarily appealing.

That is: Everyday men love everyday women.

Then, if your parents had done the hard thing (and stayed together) at some point you might have been shocked to discover your father watches and reads all those same kinds of racy things you now do – but he stayed with your mom, an actual un-Photoshopped® female! For better and, perhaps, through an awful lot of worse.

Maybe your brother would have learned something, too, if he'd been allowed to grow up with his father in his life. That everyday men can be entertained by fictions but don't honestly expect their women to look like lifesize plastic dolls: top-heavy and smooth-everywhere-save-their-skull.

Going, Going, Gone

So, ladies (and gents), be honest. Do you really need to look at a book of naughty "mugshots" to understand there's a wide world of variation out there? Ever heard that every single person has a different looking set of fingerprints? I'd bet it's got something to do with everyone's unique DNA.

If your mother (or father) isn't available or you're unwilling to ask one of them to give you the skinny on the matter, allow me. The dirty "little" secret is this: once a female has successfully hit and survived women-o-pause they'll have next-to-nothing left to worry about. ⍰

A female monster and a hidden sufferer?

Andy Thomas · 30 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I want you to watch the footage below and make a mental note of what you see taking place. Stop reading here, until after you have watched the video.

There are a number of things happening in this. Did you spot them all?

The woman in the video is clearly a monster. Her behaviour is disgusting and violent; the issue of where the young man should or should not put the refuse is irrelevant. What's more, if he were to lift a finger to defend himself and she picked up the phone to the police as a result, the consequences for him could be severe.

That was the obvious bit.

Then there's the guy with the camera, who thinks it's amusing — until she comes after him that is, at which point the footage ends abruptly. The original up-loader put the video under the "comedy" category and describes it in the low-bar as "highly funny." This says a lot about society's perceptions of male targeted aggression.

But did you spot who is, potentially, the real victim in all of this?

The guy in the blue top — his role in trying to restrain and calm the woman was largely incidental, but he is almost certainly her husband or partner.

While it's not possible to know for certain on the strength of this video alone, I would strongly suspect that he has, in fact, endured a living hell for decades at her hands. Look again at how delicately he attempts to intervene — he is afraid to antagonise her.

A man like this could be in a dire position. His only options would be live in misery or try to escape and lose his home. But at his age, with his parents gone, where would he go and how would he live?

Moreover, wider society will not easily recognise him as the victim in this — did you? For him, there are few options, and they are dwindling…

Recent UK trials with Domestic Violence Protection Orders (DVPOs) have facilitated the immediate removal of those accused of abusive behaviour without need of evidence. An accusation alone suffices, and police are trained to see men only as abusers, not suffers. For example, the title of the 2011 UK government policy paper, "A Call to end violence against women and girls" says it all.

It is an incarnation of the Duluth Model of domestic violence, if ever there was one.

The Duluth Model is a standard intervention approach used throughout the world and is based directly on feminist "patriarchy theory," i.e. that men, such as the man with the blue shirt in video, oppress women. As such, it focuses solely on teaching men not to be batterers.

If that wasn't enough, men, especially those of older generations, are culturally conditioned to believe that should be able to sort out their own problems, thus isolating themselves.

In reality, an innocent man trapped in a relationship with a manipulative and malicious woman would be uniquely powerless. His life would be lived on the edge of a knife in which the threat of a phone call to the police over some perceived wrong or slight would be an ever present reality. If he attempted to flee, the police could be weaponised against him, especially if past allegations had established a track record of his purported behaviour. If, having been abused for years, he snapped and resorted to physical violence himself — that would only condemn him.

If you heap abuse on a man, while denying him the ability to respond, then you are killing that man.

I wonder just how many men, who are primary abuse sufferers, are made to undergo Duluth based "education" programmes each year in order to "teach them not to batter?" In such cases, the effect would be utterly dehumanising — the state would be perpetrating psychological abuse against the abused.

‘Cuckoo’s Nest’ an allegory of gender feminism

Robert Franklin · 30 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]A[/dropcap] few nights ago, my wife and I watched the 1975 movie “One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest.” It had been years since I’d seen it even though I love the film and think it’s perhaps Jack Nicholson’s best role. But what struck me most this time was that the movie is an astonishingly accurate allegory of what gender feminism has done/is doing/wants to do to this culture and society.

Remember the movie? It takes place in a mental institution, a ward really that’s under the control and supervision of the Big Nurse, Nurse Ratched, wonderfully played by Louise Fletcher who won an academy award for her performance. It’s a men’s ward and the inmates are utterly cowed by Nurse Ratched. The very first scene is of them lining up to take their medicine. Nurse Ratched is all about control. She’s either taken their masculinity or they’ve given it to her without being asked.

Enter Randall Patrick McMurphy (Nicholson) who’s spent time in prison but has been sent to the mental ward to be evaluated. Is he crazy or is he just unwilling to walk society’s walk and talk its talk? He’s brought in in handcuffs and as soon as they’re removed he breaks into one of Nicholson’s patented madman laughs, the eyebrows jump, the eyes sparkle and he grabs one of the guards and plants a huge wet kiss on his cheek. Dr. Spivey, the institution’s resident psychiatrist, asks McMurphy why he thinks he’s been brought there to which McMurphy answers “Well, doc, as near as I can judge it’s because I fight and fuck too much.” Here’s an unabashed man in a world that fears and loathes men.

Nicholson’s McMurphy is the soul of anarchy, the untamed free spirit and the polar opposite of Nurse Ratched. One look at Louise Fletcher’s face, her icy hauteur, her smug sense of being in complete control, her malignant hatred of the men in her charge, and we know that these two will clash. If McMurphy likes to fight and fuck too much, Nurse Ratched is all about order. As to fucking, can anyone imagine her exhibiting the slightest sexual passion? McMurphy announces his intention, to the delight of the other men, to “put a bug so far up her ass she won’t know whether to shit or wind her watch.”

Lasser as Ratched
He sets out to do exactly that and ends up getting enforced electroshock therapy for his troubles. But he’s undeterred, believing that once his criminal sentence is complete, he’s a free man. Not so. One of the aides sets him straight. He’s in the mental ward until they decide to let him go and “they” means Nurse Ratched. We know for certain that she’ll never release him until he’s become like the other men in the ward, feckless and feminized.

It’s a fight to the death between McMurphy and Nurse Ratched. One will not escape alive. Ultimately, one of the men on the ward (Brad Douriff) for whom McMurphy has developed tender feelings commits suicide, humiliated and emasculated by Nurse Ratched. McMurphy attacks her and in one of the most powerful scenes in the movie, attempts to strangle the life out of her. (Fletcher later said that when she attended a screening of the movie in Chicago, the audience stood and cheered throughout the strangulation scene.) He’s restrained by the aides on the ward and sent to the Shock Shop for a session that leaves him in a vegetative state. Nurse Ratched has won although she almost paid for the victory with her life.

But Chief Broom, an enormous, silent Indian on the ward understands that a lobotomized McMurphy is no McMurphy at all. The man’s body, bereft of its power, its spirit of joy, fun and disrespect for authority, is worthless. He suffocates the helpless man and, in a feat of inhuman strength, breaks out of the ward and lopes off into the night, headed for Canada.

All is as it was on the ward before McMurphy’s arrival, but the Chief is free, released from his self-imposed inertia by McMurphy’s vitality.

That’s a hasty sketch of the movie. If you’ve never seen it, I urge you to do so. If you haven’t seen it in a while, watch it again. To me, it's THE movie for the men's rights movement.

Ken Kesey's book is pretty frank about what it's saying. It was first published in 1962, too early to be a condemnation of gender feminism, but amazingly, it's perfect for the job. Kesey's view was that the march of civilization ultimately tramples the masculine spirit, that the demands of good order are finally incompatible with the anarchic strength, the creativity, the risk-taking spirit that so defines what it means to be a man. Kesey was clear that that quality of civilization is itself feminine and at odds with the male.

Whatever one may think of Kesey's view of humanity, his book and this extraordinarily fine film are directly applicable to present-day gender feminism, the bastard child that has entirely shanghaied that movement. Put simply, to watch the movie is to be smacked in the gob by what gender feminism seeks for this society. Nothing better shows the frank misandry of today's gender feminism than one look at Nurse Ratched's face. She is a weak woman in a position of great power and her visceral need is to destroy masculinity in the form of Randall P. McMurphy. Nurse Ratched's face, her body language, everything she is and stands for are the very soul of gender feminism.

At one point Dr. Spivey has another talk with McMurphy and asks him why he doesn't like Nurse Ratched. McMurphy says "She doesn't play fair. She likes a stacked deck." Is there a truer statement about gender feminism today than "it likes a stacked deck?" The phrase speaks volumes.

And what about the men on the ward? They knew all along that Nurse Ratched held the keys to McMurphy's freedom, that in order for him to get out of there, he had to toe the line that she had drawn. McMurphy didn't know that and crucially, they didn't tell him. The allowed him to go on putting "a bug up her ass" and digging his own grave in the process. They were thrilled by his power, but acted to make him one of them rather than the other way around. They were traitors to him, to themselves and to their sex. Sound like anyone you know? The Michael Kimmels and David Futrelles of the world who proudly and dishonestly attempt to sell out their sex in exchange for a few kind words from their gender feminist overlords? Like them, the men on the ward beg for scraps of approval from the Big Nurse.

And finally there's Chief Broom, the one who uses McMurphy's energy to finally understand the insanity of the world (the ward) he lives in and, alone among all the men there, escapes it. It's not in the movie, but in the book, Kesey describes the Chief's patient loping away from the institution as resembling a dog with his nose to the ground, on a long journey seeking something "like he had a mission." MGTOWs anyone?

I tell you, the movie's uncanny. From forty years ago, it speaks to us today as vividly as anything I've ever seen or read about what we've become today and warns us about what gender feminists hope to have in store.

Happy viewing!

Paul Elam · 30 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is probably the most important article I have ever written, and it addresses what I believe is the greatest challenge the M(H)RM has faced so far.

Victor Zen just brought us an important bit of news that I have also known about for several hours, and about which I am already getting emails. Facebook has just bowed to public pressure from feminists to start policing its pages and removing what is ostensibly called hate speech and the glorification of violence toward women.

Please don't make the mistake of believing that this is the real agenda.

Let's dispense with the basics first. As Zen has already pointed out, the sexism that Facebook has agreed to root out is that which is identified and defined by ideological feminists only. No MHRA perspective on the subject, or any other perspective for that matter, is relevant. Consequently the hundreds and maybe thousands of male bashing pages on the social network giant will remain, and only those pages identified as a problem by moderators "trained" by feminist ideologues will be targeted.

Unfortunately, that is not near the worst of the news.

What is happening, and it is going to happen more swiftly than you can imagine, is that just as we have seen in academia, in the military, in many workplaces and more recently in the secular community, feminists are using whatever tools are at their disposal to ensure that their narrative is the only one allowed.

To put it more bluntly, feminist ideologues are co-opting Facebook, and they will root out any and all opposition to their worldview. That will include, at some point, the AVFM Facebook page and its nearly 3,500 fans (2,000 of which have come in the past two months).

How important this is? In a word, very.

Facebook accounts for roughly 10-13% of our traffic on most days, and with a rapidly growing fan base that promises to represent a continually increasing number of actual visitors to the site.

To be honest, this does not mean that the loss of our Facebook fan page would result in a complete loss of traffic from Facebook. Many individuals post our articles on their pages, so that resultant traffic does not come directly from the fan page. But that is a minor detail when you consider the actual agenda here and its potential for harm to our community.

The machinations of these ideologues do not begin or end with Facebook. Still, as a battle ground in the ever increasing conflict between radical feminists and their opposition, it is of massive importance.

Have you ever known an ideologue to be satisfied with a victory? Where do you imagine, if they are successful at eliminating men's rights discussion from Facebook, they will go next? Reddit? YouTube?

How about Google?

Do you think they are above trying to have men's rights websites de-listed from Google search returns? Why don't you ask them at Norton Symantec or O2, who have already blocked nearly ALL men's rights related websites?

If you believe that these ideologues would not seek to wipe out all opposition to their worldview from the internet, then you likely believe that the current campaign on Facebook is to simply address sexism and sexual violence against women. You will probably believe that till the day you come here and find an error message instead of a website.

This is not the somewhat comical antics of the SPLC. It is not the even more comedic histrionics of the University of Toronto Student Union. This is actually a well-planned agenda that that could ultimately deal very harsh blows to the Men's Human Rights Movement just as it is beginning to emerge.

And we need to do something about it.

With that in mind, I am respectfully calling on all men's organizations, father's rights groups, men's issues bloggers, secular organizations and anyone else concerned with free speech and evidence based solutions to social problems to take a stand on this issue and to demand that Facebook make a public commitment to the free speech of men's rights organizations.

Facebook should also include a non-feminist anti-sexist perspective to be given equal weight when evaluating what is and is not hate speech as well as what constitutes the glorification or condoning of violence against women.

Facebook should also make a public commitment to take precisely the same measures against online misandry that they take against alleged misogyny. That commitment should include addressing the promotion of violence against men. And they should follow through with this commitment in a verifiable and measurable way. At AVFM we support free speech for all, but if it is to be abridged in any way, that abridgment should not be driven by sexism.

We are entering very, very dangerous times. Ideological feminists are witnessing the deconstruction and debunking of their theories. They are watching a once stagnant and ineffectual men's rights movement start to gain momentum. The hegemony they have enjoyed for 50 years is under direct and long overdue attack.

They are not just going to let it happen.

So far, we have witnessed only bumbling attempts to paint us as a hate movement. Most of their efforts have simply blown up in their face. We have had more than our share of good laughs, and have been thrilled to see their hateful, disingenuous efforts result only in more growth for us.

It has been enjoyable, but it has also had the potential to make us soft. We can hardly afford that.

From this day forward, we need a directed and organized response to this problem. As we are just initiating this response, there is but a few details available now on what our efforts will be, but I will share them with you and advise you as more information becomes available.

One, I will be conducting outreach to NCFM, of which I am a member, and other similar organizations to initiate a coordinated response, and more importantly to make contact with other mainstream entities about this problem. If there ever was a time to think "the enemy of my enemy" this is it.

AVFM will establish monitoring of Facebook, to see what kinds of pages are deleted and for what reasons under the new Facebook guidelines.

This is also as good a time as any, though I wish it were under better circumstances, to announce that thanks to your donations to AVFM we have finally been able to hire Editor-in-Chief John Hembling (JTO) into a salaried position for AVFM. He is scheduled to start working for us full time on June 1, and not a day too soon. I am sure his dedicated efforts on this important matter will be invaluable.

While it is obvious that nowhere near all our plans are set, or even envisioned at this early stage of the game, it is just as clear that this is going to be a fight. It is also where you will be able to see, in clear public view, which "men's organizations" will take a stand when it absolutely counts, or whether they have feet of clay.

Finally, as always, we have to ask you to make the real difference. When we initiate email campaigns, which we surely will, please participate, regardless of where you live. Post this article to your Facebook page and other social media. If you are on Facebook, this article is also posted right here. Come and leave a comment encouraging others to take action. If you have not "liked" our page, please do so. If you are not on Facebook, please join, and then see the previous two sentences.

Go to the Facebook page about these events now and make your opinion known, respectfully, firmly and briefly. Be prepared to give some of your time and effort more than once. More than ten times.

Dig in, folks. This is going to be a long one. If you want a men's movement, YOU are going to have to fight for it.

WTF Fatigue: Jodi Arias

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 31 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It was inevitable. The constant news coverage of America's ~~sweetheart~~ psychopath Jodi Arias, her lack of remorse, her claims of being a "survivor" while ex-boyfriend, Travis Alexander, lies 6-feet under and her list of "mitigating factors" for why she should not receive the death penalty for the brutal and pre-meditated murder of Alexander has induced a heretofore-unknown mental health condition in me.

WTF Fatigue

I have WTF Fatigue and am certain I'm not the only one.

In case you've been on a media blackout, Jodi Arias stabbed her ex-boyfriend, Travis Alexander, 27 times, shot him in the head and slit his throat almost to the point of decapitation with malice and forethought after having sex with him in May 2008. Guess she wanted to hit it before she quit it. Whatta reptile.

I will not detail the history of her relationship with Alexander, the grisly murder, her numerous lies, her "amnesia" about the details of the murder (while being able to remember the minutia of her sex acts with Alexander), her preposterous claims of being a domestic violence victim (while there is ample evidence she stalked and terrorized Alexander) and her equally preposterous claims that she felt degraded and abused by sex with Alexander when her sexts, voicemails, etc., to Alexander give new meaning to "enthusiastic consent."

Rant tangent: If women don't want to be "used for sex" then they shouldn't use sex to try to get men (or women) to be in a relationship with them. These are usually the same women who serve the freaky deaky sex up on a platter straight from the get-go. That's like being a drug dealer who complains the only time someone calls is when they want dope. If that's what you're peddling, don't blame the customers.

And please spare me the happy horseshit about having low self-esteem and men "taking advantage." There are women who do the same thing to men for money and status. If you don't want to be "used for sex" then don't use sex. If you decide to roll the dice and have sex without love and commitment, then be grown-up enough to live with the consequences of your choices should you not get the pay-off you want.

If you believe you have nothing more to offer than sex then stop watching reality shows, stop the mall-hopping, the bar-hopping and the endless navel-gazing, get some therapy, take some adult enrichment classes and become a more interesting person that has more to offer than 3-minutes in "heaven" and a lifetime of endless bitching. The same goes for men who believe women are only interested in you for money. If you don't want to be used for your money or for sex, then don't go fishing with it. Are there predatory women and men in the world who will take advantage of you? Yes, so don't paint a bulls eye on your back. Arias is no victim. Sex was a tool to manipulate and control.

There's also a red flag here, folks. Women who feel "used for sex" — especially when they're quick to jump into bed — are telling you that they're TRANSACTIONAL. They only give with an expectation of getting and sex is currency to them. If you have sex with this kind of woman, she believes you "owe" her. Arias didn't get what she wanted in return for sex from Alexander and he paid for it with his life. End rant tangent.

[image]Psychopath TV – All Jodi! All the time!

When I first read about the Arias case, I thought to myself, "Oh, another sociopathic borderline. Wonder if she'll claim to be the real victim and manage to get off?" Miraculously, the Arizona jury didn't pull a Casey Anthony and found Arias guilty of first-degree murder – even though she's a woman and card carrying member of the Sisterhood of Professional Victimhood. Shocking, I know.

Even Arias was surprised by the guilty verdict and said she felt "betrayed" by the jury. WTF #1. (There were multiple previous WTFs. This WTF is when I officially began counting).

Specifically, Arias said, “It felt like a huge sense of unreality. I felt betrayed, actually, by the jury. I was hoping they would see things for what they are.”

Unreality? You mean like when Alexander’s family and friends learned their loved one was butchered and left for dead in a pool of blood? In true BPD-sociopath fashion, Arias shows no compassion for her victims and their feelings and reserves compassion exclusively for herself. Furthermore, last time I checked, murder is a crime. Seems to me, the jury would have betrayed U.S. law by acquitting her. This was not a crime of passion nor was it self-defense. It was pre-meditated murder.

“See things for what they are” = “Believe my persuasive blaming and victim-speak and let me get away with murder.” Arias seems to have expected the jury to believe her contradictory, hole-ridden testimony as opposed to the evidence.

She banked on jurors believing her emotionally charged bullshit instead of the facts. But why shouldn’t she?

Lots of women get away with murder (sometimes literally) in Family Court and Criminal Court every single day. Just look at male vs. female conviction rates for similar crimes and who the winners are in the majority of Divorce-Custody Lotto cases. In that respect, I suspect Arias does feel like she’s getting a raw deal for being convicted of a crime she admitted committing because she’s a woman and should, therefore, be exempt from the consequences of her aberrant behaviors.

Arias told Fox affiliate KSAZ, “I would prefer to die sooner than later. Longevity runs in my family, and I don’t want to spend the rest of my natural life in one place. I believe death is the ultimate freedom and I’d rather have my freedom as soon as I can get it.” Textbook Borderline all-or-nothing maneuver. “If you don’t give me what I want, then get out! Wait, no, I didn’t mean it! Please don’t go!”

Sure enough, on May 21, 2013, two weeks after her conviction, Arias back-peddled like Lance Armstrong on steroids and pled for her life at the sentencing hearing. Her attorneys must’ve clued her into the possibility of appellate court and being released after 10 years give or take for “good behavior.”

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fGJA0zlrkZ0

Arias wasn’t under oath while she made these statements — not that being under oath stopped her from lying during the trial. She has yet to apologize to Alexander’s family. She said SHE feels bad for hurting them. SHE feels “destroyed” knowing her actions might have contributed to Travis’ grandmother’s recent death. She said she did not mean to hurt them. No, she meant to hurt Travis. Intention does not negate consequence. Her feelings for herself are irrelevant, but that is her only point of reference — like most sociopaths, psychopaths, malignant narcissists and borderlines.

Arias said she avoided looking at Travis’ family during the trial for “a variety reasons [she] won’t go in to.” Many of my clients’ former spouses cannot or will not make eye contact with them after making false allegations and destroying them with the help of Family Court. I think this is because on some level they know what they’re doing is wrong and can’t bear to see their twisted selves reflected back to them. Again, this is about Arias not wanting to feel bad and has nothing to do with empathy for the Alexanders.

Arias claimed she has contemplated suicide since being imprisoned and wrote numerous goodbye letters to her family. She said she didn’t go through with it because she wanted to spare her family the same pain the Alexander family is experiencing. What a sensitive, caring person she is — much like some mothers who, when faced with losing a custody dispute because of their crazy and abusive behavior, murder their kids and bungle their own half-assed suicides.

Arias then confirmed my earlier hypothesis about her attorneys cluing her in to the possibility that a life sentence doesn’t necessarily mean life — especially if you’re an attractive, young woman.

"If you elect me your junior high student body president, I promise to . . ."

This is when the WTFs started coming fast and furious complete with an overhead projector (WTF). Arias argued that she should not be put to death because of "all the good" she could do if she's allowed to live like:

1. Let her hair grow and donate it to a wig charity for cancer patients. Why, she's already done this three times since her incarceration in 2008! She's a real philanthropist as far as psychopathic, borderline personality disordered killers go. WTF. Frankly, I'd rather go bald than have her hair on my pate.

2. Teach her fellow inmates Spanish. Arias claims that since she's been in jail, she's received scads and scads of emails and letters from women asking her to teach them Spanish (guess they never heard of Berlitz and, by the way, WTF). Due to the trial keeping her soooooo busy, she just hasn't had the time for bilingual pursuits. If she's allowed to live, she promises to teach her fellow inmates in the "general population" Spanish. ¡Ay, caramba!

3. Start a prison recycling program. And this wouldn't just help the women's prison. "It is one small thing that could have a far-reaching positive impact on the community and the planet." Ah, the grandiosity. Jodi saves the world one aluminum can at a time! WTF.

4. Teach fellow inmates to read. "I know reading has enriched my life by expanding my knowledge base and opening my eyes to new worlds and different cultures. I, too, can help other women, so they can add that dimension to their lives." Guess she must have missed the books on her summer reading list about how murder is wrong. And really? Arias as an educator and mentor? Am I the only one who sees something incredibly perverse about this? WTF.

[image]5. Start a book club "to stimulate discussions of a higher nature." Look out, Oprah! Your book club is about to get an ass pounding! Here comes Jodi! I recommend Arias start with Crime and Punishment and follow it up with *The C*nt of Monte Cristo*.

6. Sell "Survivor" t-shirts to help "other victims of domestic violence." This is the one that pisses me off the most. I try not to drop too many F-bombs in print, and if I were going to do it, this would certainly be the time for it. Arias is not a survivor. Arias is a murderer. She is a perpetrator. Abso-freaking-lutely shameless right to the bitter end. I cannot believe her lawyers allowed her to do this. Big shameless balls on this one. Any domestic violence shelter that accepts money from this psycho-killer should automatically forfeit any and all state and federal funding.

7. Do a lot more good stuff (*if the prison lets her). Although, Arias doesn't know what the other good stuff is at the moment, she promises she'll find many more ways to help fellow inmates, and you know, humanity. Speaking of humanity, oh, the humanity.

"A few things about Me, Me and ME."

After making her junior high case about all the good things she will do ~~once she is elected class president~~ in prison, Arias began a slideshow complete with baby pictures, toddler pictures of herself playing in the sprinkler, toddler pictures of herself playing dress-up, pictures of her childhood trips to Sea World and Hawaii and high school pictures of herself smiling for the camera. Her argument seemed to be, "Please don't put me to death for my crimes because I was a cute baby." Guess what, Ted Bundy was every bit as cute as Jodi.

Childhood cuteness being used as a legitimate legal argument for not receiving the death penalty for a heinous, pre-meditated murder? WTF.

Arias then claimed her bestie from high school was harassed and threatened, which is why she wasn't there speaking on her behalf — lest we forget who the real victim is in all this. Then, she made some vague references about her relationship with her father improving after she moved out, not having enough money to pay for heat in her first apartment she shared with her first boyfriend and it getting so cold they could see their breath, quoted Charles Dickens, talked about how her first boyfriend will always be "special to [her]" and more pictures of other ex-boyfriends. Then Arias talked about her different hairstyles over the years – all with corresponding photos.

"Here I am in my redhead stage. Here I am in my blond stage. Here I am skiing. Here I am in Palm Springs. Here I am on a terrace — it's on the ocean, but you can't see it very well on this screen. Look at me, look at me! Look at meeeeeeeeeeeee!"

Is this a court of law or her Facebook page? Her Internet dating profile? WTF does any of this have to do with anything?

Then Arias showed some more ex-boyfriend pictures, talked about going on dates to live reggae and blues performances in Monterey and how the band dedicated songs to her and her then boyfriend, how she went on summer camping trips, hung out with colleagues after work, rode the aerial tram in Palm Springs and went to Chuck E. Cheese. What, no moonlit walks on the beach? Again, WTF?

Arias sniffled and seemed to choke up about how she will not be able to take photos at her sister's wedding next year and won't be able to hold her nieces and nephews. Every now and again she would make a cursory reference that Travis won't be able to do these things with his family either and then quickly resumed talking about herself. It seemed like one of her attorneys had her edit those things in after reading her first draft in an effort to feign some semblance of empathy.

Then she threw a pity party about how she will never be a mother — unless some freak out there marries her, has conjugal visits and knocks her up. You know there's more than one freak that would marry and have kids with this psycho, which she would undoubtedly try to parlay into a reduced sentence. Arias' plea was essentially about how murdering Travis has caused her to suffer. From start to finish, she made it all about her.

"As some of you may know, I'm an Artist."

Just ask Travis Alexander about her handiwork and Dexter-like photog skills. She's a regular blood spatter Jackson Pollack. Yes, this narcissistic monster included a slideshow of her crappy paintings and etchings in her plea and bemoaned the fact that she won't be able to do oil paintings in the pokey. Among her oeuvre are portraits of Frank Sinatra, Elizabeth Taylor and Elvis. WTF. Then Arias sniffled about how she will no longer be in family Christmas portraits. Narcissistic much? Heaven forbid she miss a photo-op.

"I was hoping to avoid trial, not the outcome (although, that would have been nice) and go quietly into the night. Are you getting my good side? Be sure to get my good side! Wanna see me do a handstand?"

Go quietly into the night? Avoid exposure? This woman is on every news channel, YouTube and all over print media — if there's a camera and a mic, she's there. This piece of work has yet to shut up. At one point, she was running a Twatter feed from jail ferchrissakes — she may still be, don't know.

The defense's fatal mistake was putting her on the stand and in front of media cameras. Had she kept her mouth shut and looked pitiful from the defense table, her cockamamie defense might have worked. Instead, they allowed Arias to bask in the limelight and the media has given her a platform. I'm waiting for ABC to announce Arias as the next Bachelorette. There's already a Lifetime movie scheduled to air next month. Let's hope "lifetime" is also the length of Arias' sentence – without parole.

"It was never my goal to malign Travis' character. It was my goal to preserve his reputation."

Bullshit and WTF, WTF, WTF, WTF. She recounted their sexual relationship in graphic detail and in unadulterated predatory braggadocio. She tried to put him on trial for liking what some people consider to be kinky sex.

"I wouldn't even harm a fly (or a spider.)"

This is one of the last lines from the Hitchcock thriller, Psycho. You would think someone on the defense team would have mentioned this to her. Too bad she didn't show Travis the same compassion she shows spiders.

"Please spare my life. Not for me, of course, but for my family."

This part left me especially incredulous. "In many ways, my family has suffered a loss, too . . . their hopes of welcoming me home someday were forever dashed [when I was convicted].” Unless Arias’ family lives in the same self-centered, unreality bubble she does, how could they even think that was possible? Again, this was all about Arias and her suffering with cursory mentions of the Alexanders’ suffering.

Much like Steven Alexander who, in his victim impact statement said he doesn’t want to see Arias anymore, neither do I. If the next jury gives her life instead of the death penalty, let’s hope part of the sentence is NO MORE MEDIA INTERVIEWS. NO INTERNET ACCESS. No intermediaries giving interviews on her behalf and no intermediaries blogging, tweeting and selling Arias’ outrageous tee-shirts and crappy “art.” If the jury really wants to punish Arias, they will put her away for life and prohibit her from any media attention with no chance for parole. No Geraldo interviews. No interviews of any kind. Nothing.

Here is a synopsis of the “mitigating factors” to not give Arias the death penalty:

I just don’t see how any of this is relevant. If Travis had murdered Jodi, would these points be considered compelling arguments? Of course they wouldn’t. If her defense team had any integrity, they would not have let her share her personal scrapbook and natter on about herself for 30 minutes.

Arias should have said, “I am both deeply ashamed and sorry for what I have done. Even saying this, I know there is nothing I can do to make amends for the pain and harm I have caused Travis, his family and my family. Even though I don’t deserve it, I beg this court for mercy. If you give me life instead of death, I promise I will be a model prisoner, stay out of the public eye and do nothing to cause Travis’ loved ones further pain. I am profoundly sorry and will regret what I have done until the day I die.”

Jodi Arias isn’t sorry for killing Travis Alexander. She is sorry she got caught and is suffering the consequences. Again, she feels bad about the consequences of her behavior, not her behavior. She believes she was justified in killing him, that he deserved it. If she were truly sorry for murdering Travis and for the pain she’s caused his family, she would not have tried to justify her actions and blamed the victim for her having killed him. She would not have dragged his name through the mud and put his sexual proclivities on trial. She’s not sorry for committing murder. She is pissed she didn’t get away with it and feels betrayed by the jury that they didn’t let her get away with it.

If I were a juror, I don’t know if I’d be able to sentence someone to death, even someone as richly deserving as Jodi Arias. I wouldn’t want anyone’s blood on my hands and cannot imagine being charged with that task. However, if anyone were deserving of the death penalty, Arias is it.

Why I do wiki and what's a woozle!

Isaac T. Quill · 31 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dean Esmay has been prodding, poking and asking (read: demanded) that I put this here! Happy now Dean? I've to introduce myself – My name is Isaac T. Quill, also known ironically as "ImNotMraBut…". My motto in life is "Life is far too serious to be taken seriously." I've also been told I have to play nice with the other kids. Huh! I'm persnickety, crotchety, I like digging to find the truth. Some people really don't like that, so I'm not sure the other kids will like how I play with them. (Evil Grin)

When you have found truths (and the evidence that proves them) you need a place to keep them safe. A Wiki is a great way to do it. That's why "I Do Wiki", recording and storing verifiable truths. AVfM now has its own reference Wiki, a place to keep and reference truths. Over the last weeks, there have been a few teething problems, some tinkering and technical tantrums, but now the AVfM Wiki is "Cooking With Gas". Building and maintaining a Wiki is an endless task, but all red pill munchers know you have to keep maintaining the verifiable truth anyway.

(And for those of you who are lost, you must sign up for an account here, and then, if you wish to edit pages, you must click here and say you wish to be allowed to edit pages. Yes, this is more cumbersome than Wikipedia, but that's to help us prevent sabotage so we hope you understand why we're requiring a two-step process. –DE.)

I've been working on a Wiki entry that is close to my heart: "The Woozle Effect," and I also think it's a technical term people really need to start using. I know that some people hear the word Woozle and think of mythical animals and Winnie-the pooh, but that says more about your bed time habits and stories.

It's not a joke. "The Woozle Effect" is a serious scientific term that was coined in 1979 by Beverly D Houghton; a paper showing how data and information about domestic violence was being distorted – how false realities were being created. "The Woozle Effect" was quickly picked up by other experts, but it's usage didn't catch on. It seems that feminist-leaning and -focused research has so many Woozles it was scientific suicide to say you had found one. Just ask Richard Gelles, Murray Straus, and Suzanne Steinmetz:

> The response to our finding that the rate of female-to-male family violence was equal to the rate of male-to-female violence not only produced heated scholarly criticism, but intense and long-lasting personal attacks. All three of us received death threats. Bomb threats were phoned in to conference centers and buildings where we were scheduled to present.
> The Missing Persons of Domestic Violence, by Richard J. Gelles,
> The Women's Quarterly, September 1999, pp. 18-20

There is nothing funny in finding The truth that wipes out many Woozles and then having your life threatened and your very existence attacked. You hold a Truth that others want to kill. Woozles are not just lies, they incite hatred and violence against the truth.

Many have had to deal with Backlash, Bullying and even Bombs when they have said anything that threatened feminist propaganda. Science and Social Sciences has been no different. Woozles seem to have the capacity to burrow deep into the most interesting places, including the US Congress. Finding Woozles and naming them "Woozle" are dangerous pastimes.

I've been asked to put some of the Wiki content here to show folks what they are missing and also what they can help create. In fact by the time you read this the Wiki content is likely to have been expanded and changed, so you will probably need to check it out over on the AVfM Wiki.

But first I'd like you to see some massive wild Woozles running amok and how they get tamed by Truths. I present to you Julia Gillard, Prime Minister of Australia spouting Woozles. It seems that Politicians and Celebrities love spouting them – they just can't stop themselves.

Woozle Effect

The Woozle effect, also known as evidence by citation[1] or a Woozle, occurs when evidence from earlier sources, academic studies or publications are misused, often applying an improper weight. This misleads individuals, groups such as governments and the public in general into accepting claims made using the woozled evidence.

> "Results of a weak study may be repeated so many times in different sources (e.g., professional journals) that they (undeservedly) achieve the status of a law.".
> Eileen Gambrill, Propaganda in the Helping Professions[2]

Woozles become accepted as real often becoming "Urban Myth"[3] and "Factoids".[4] "..fiction is converted into scientific evidence that will be cited over and over."[1] The woozle effect has also been linked to "Confirmation Bias", "Groupthink", "Belief Perseverance" and "False Paradigm".[5]

> "Red flags for hiding competing well-argued views include phrases such as "Every one knows …" "It is clear that …" "It is obvious that …" "It is generally agreed that …" This kind of unchallenged repetition encourages the woozle effect; if we hear something enough times we assume that it is true."[6]
> Eileen Gambrill, Amanda Reiman 2011 "A Propaganda Index for Reviewing Problem Framing in Articles and Manuscripts"

Woozles are often created by changing language to express a level of certainty that an original source does not contain. Changing Language from "The evidence may show.." to "The evidence shows.." would result in a woozle.[7]

Gelles has observed conflict between standard scientific methodology and advocacy; "Advocacy efforts are often governed by the ends justifying the means. Many advocates have little patience with the timetable of research or social policy – they see the harm inflicted at ground level and strongly feel the need to do something."[8] Gelles has linked this to the pattern of basic rules being changed and rules of the fictional game TEGWAR[a] used instead. It has also been observed "Results are routinely miscited in a direction favoring activist ideology,..".[9]

The terms woozle and woozle effect are most frequently found and used in the field of interpersonal violence (IPV) and domestic violence, where the term originated. Other academic papers and publications have used the woozle as a motif and to show the presence of the woozle effect in many areas, such as school management,[10] nursing and gerentology,[11][12] public sector-governmental decision making[13] and construction industry.[14]

1 Origin & Usage

Woozle effect is a term coined by Beverly Houghton in 1979.[b][15][16][17][18][19]

Woozle is the name of an imaginary creature in the A.A. Milne Winnie-the-Pooh books.

> "Tracks," said Piglet. "Paw-marks." he gave a little squeak of excitement. "Oh, Pooh! Do you think it's a – a – Woozle?"
> "It may be," said Pooh "sometimes it is and sometimes it isn't. You can never tell with paw-marks."[20]

Winnie-the-Pooh and Piglet start following tracks left in snow believing they are the tracks of a Woozle. The tracks keep multiplying with Pooh and Piglet becoming more and more excited, convinced that they are now tracking many Woozles. Christopher Robin then explains that they have been following their own tracks.

> "When going round a spinney of larch trees tracking something, be sure it isn't your own footprints you are following."[21]
> Pooh's Little Instruction Book

In 1979 Houghton[15] illustrated the Woozle effect showing how work by Gelles 1974, Published in the book "The violent home"[22] had been transferred from applying to a small sample to a universal sample from a group of less than 100 couples to all US Wives.[23][24]

- Gelles conducted a study using police domestic disturbance reports as the source. He explained this very specifically as a way to locate clear examples of domestic abuse. he was not looking for a national or global sample. Gelles reported that this sample showed 55% conjugal violence. The evidence is for a small group, selected only due to police reports and known incidents. The 55% also referred to both men and women as victims.
- Straus writing the forward to the book "The violent home"[23] used the 55% figure but without qualifying it.
- Langley & levy then cited Gelles & Straus claiming "Estimates that 50 percent of all American wives are battered women are not uncommon".[24] Gelles & Straus made no such claim or inference in their work.
- Langley & levy then applied the Woozle to the general population arriving at the figure of 28 million American Wives being battered annually.[16]
- The 28 Million figure, published in the book "Wife beating: the silent crisis",[24] then received extensive media coverage, including claims that at least 7 other studies showed the same 28 Million figure to be valid. In accounting for the lack of previous knowledge of what was called "A conspiracy of silence by men"[25] the US Government, Congress, The American Bar Association, police and FBI, were all referred to as having "Culpable Ignorance".[26][27][25]

In 1982, Professor Walter R Schumm of Kansas State University School of Family Studies and Human Services, warned of the danger of the Woozle effect when he said of it that it could be used to mistakenly "set policy in the prevention and treatment of family violence".[28]

In 1991 Prof Murray Straus noted:

> "In contemporary American society, statistics are used to inform, guide, and justify social policy. The belief in statistics is so great that when the public or a legislature wishes to act and there are no statistics, statistics must somehow be created to fill the vacuum. Unfortunately, these statistics are often biased toward supporting the proposed policy."[29]

In 2007, Gelles further emphasised the nature of woozles when he likened them to the fictional game TEGWAR (The Exciting Game Without Any Rules).[a] Gelles also traces the issues of woozles and TEGWAR around the field of domestic violence back in time to the 1990s and refers to "Nine Factoids and a Mantra"[8],showing how the woozle had taken precedence and facts were not relevant.

> The compelling research evidence solidified around a series of statements that captured the problem of violence toward women. The most common, oft-spoken, and published factoids are as follows:
> - According to the FBI, a woman is beaten every (fill in the blank) seconds in the United States.
> - There are four million women beaten and abused each year in the United States.
> - Domestic violence is the leading cause of injury to women between the ages of 15 and 44 in the > United States—greater than car accidents, muggings, and rapes combined.

> - The March of Dimes reports that battering during pregnancy is the leading cause of birth defects and infant mortality [in the United States].
> - Sixty-three percent of young men between the ages of 11 and 20, who are serving time for homicide have killed their mother's abuser.
> - Seventy-five percent of women who are killed by intimate partners are killed after they attempt to leave their batterers.
> - Women who kill their batterers receive longer prison sentences than men who kill their partners.
> - There are nearly three times as many animal shelters in the United States as there are shelters for battered women and their children.
> - Violence toward women crosses racial and income barriers—battering knows no color other than black and blue.
> Richard J. Gelles THE POLITICS OF RESEARCH: THE USE, ABUSE, AND MISUSE OF SOCIAL SCIENCE DATA—THE CASES OF INTIMATE PARTNER VIOLENCE

Gelles analyses each factoid and shows how they are false. For example, the FBI do not collect, collate or publish statistics on battery. The number is derived by making a calculation based upon a study which does not support the claim.[8] Whilst any claim may sound convincing, valid and authoritative it is always false.

Gelles also shows how those outside of a field of study or expertise lack the knowledge and insight to recognise woozles. The woozles simply become accepted in the general population. Until you know the rules you can only assume that the game is being played the right way.

Many have expressed concern that Woozles are not simply accidental:

> Propagandists are aware that simply hearing, seeing, or thinking about a statement many times may increase belief in the statement. As Thouless (1974)[c] notes, we tend to think that what goes through our mind must be important. Simply repeating a position increases the likelihood of its acceptance, especially if the statement is offered in a confident manner by a person of prestige and has a slogan quality that plays on our emotions. Results of a weak study may be repeated so many times in different sources (eg. professional journals) that they (undeservedly) achieve the status of a law. Gelles (1982)[d] calls this the Woozle Effect.[30]
> Eileen Gambrill (2012) Propaganda in the Helping Professions

In the book "Rethinking Domestic Violence", Donald G Dutton raises concerns as to gender bias and potential political bias. He states:

> "Woozles are usually not simply a matter of authentic misreporting. They also reveal a desire to read into the data an a priori position that is really not there, what Bacon calls "idols of the theatre". … All the data reporting mistakes I have found in the literature, without exception, were made in the direction of supporting feminist preconceptions."[31]
> Dutton (2006) Rethinking Domestic Violence

As far back as 1995 similar concerns were being expressed by Dr Christina Hoff Sommers, when she said:

> "More often than not, a closer look at the supporting evidence the studies and statistics on eating disorders, domestic battery, rape, sexual harassment, bias against girls in school, wage differentials, or the demise of the nuclear family – will raise grave questions about credibility, not to speak of objectivity.
> When they engage in exaggeration, oversimplification, and obfuscation, the feminist researchers may be no different from such other advocacy groups as the National Rifle Association or the tobacco industry. But when the NRA does a "study that shows . . . ," or the tobacco industry finds "data that suggest. . . ," journalists are on their guard. They check sources and seek dissenting opinions."[32]

Some readers may have an inkling that they have come across something similar to this before. Well you have – the issue of "Evidence by Citation" and how it distorts reality keeps being raised. The Woozle is a Pesky Critter that hides so well people don't even know what to call it when they see it. They recognise the footprints, but the real monster is always just out of sight.

If you spot any wild Woozles please let me know. Both my Keyboard and Quill are just waiting for the little blighters.

Big blighters are even better.

Following Julia Gillard's amazing video performance with multiple Woozles, she has been nominated for the inaugural "Massive, Arrant & Disingenuous Citation Occasioning Woozle" Award.

Ms Gillard has yet to acknowledge her nomination for the inaugural M.A.D.C.O.W. award, but it is hoped that she can receive it soon.

The Voice of Europe: Drugging kids

James Huff · 31 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On May 31, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the issue of kids being drugged (sometimes using force by the State – under the threat of having the kid taken away from parents) in Europe.

Europeans tend to talk less about the drugs that doctors pour into their kids, drugs that aren't always necessary for the wellbeing of the child.

Can 6 year olds be correctly diagnosed with diseases like OCD or ADHD and put on highly addictive psycho-active drugs? How did the 1940s generation survived in such big numbers without these all-too-caring doctors?

Why are the kids now more than ever in need of more and more drugs? Why is the society drugging boys into submission?

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news and the featured interview with Robert O'Hara.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

You’re a pill, Shona Sibary

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 31 May 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Don’t want to have sex with your emotionless robot drone husband? There’s a pill for that!

Trigger warning: images of Shona Sibary

Hey, have you guys heard about this little blue pill men can take to produce instant raging boner?

Apparently, the ladies version will be hitting the shelves soon, and boy, has that ever stimulated some interesting conversation! Kelly Rose Bradford and my favorite little cross-eyed child beater, Shona Sibary had separate takes on the issue over at theDaily Mail, and let me tell you, they both suck.

[image]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2332601/Women-libidos-high-Female-Viagra-debate-This-Morning-Kelly-Rose-Bradford-Shona-Sibary.html

Shona, she of the “I would rather mop the floor than fuck my husband” school of matrimony, says the pill will never work because women are so much more emotionally complicated than men.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2212493/Id-mop-floor-sex-husband-Why-Brits-sex-just-chore.html

> Sibary said women are more complicated sexually than men, and that the pill would not stimulate females emotionally.
> She said: ‘If you’re a man and you want to have sex for the sake of having it, fine, pop a pill and have sex in the mechanical way.
> ‘But women are different. I’m the type of woman this drug is targeting, and we want to feel desirable and desired: it’s not a chemical thing, it’s an emotional thing.’

[image]

Yikes! Perhaps a reality check is in order on the desirability front. Honey, you’re ugly. You simply cannot afford to be overweight and have a shitty haircut, too. Now, now, don’t get mad at me, gentle readers. The fact that Shona is ugly is not news to her.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2317973/Shona-Sibary-Im-ugly-I-crack-mirrors-happier-pretty-friends.html

Let’s hope Mr. Sibary is blessed with very poor eyesight. What I really want to talk about is Shona’s argument that for men, sex is mechanical, while for women, it’s emotional.

V?tsy?yana strongly disagrees.

[image]

Probably the most famous book on sex ever written. Kama Sutra means “Aphorisms of Love”. You will note the absence of the word “jackhammer” in that translation.

John Donne thinks Shona is full of shit, too. The greatest love poet in the English language.

[image]

Love’s mysteries in souls do grow,

But yet the body is his book.

http://www.poetryfoundation.org/poem/173355

George Herbert, too.

You must sit down, says Love, and taste my meat:

So I did sit and eat.

http://www.poetryoutloud.org/poem/173632

Basically the entire worlds of art and literature are against Shona's assertion that men are rutting pigs who will stick their dicks in anything that moves, incapable of feeling love or profound emotional connection.

Rodin says Fuck You, Shona. The most beautiful sculpture ever created, in my opinion.

[image]

Leaving aside her lack of physical assets, compounded terribly by being overweight, dreadful hair and absolutely no sense of fashion whatsoever, is it possible that the lack of desire Shona complains about is the result of her being a fucking bitch? I mean really, after a busy day of slapping her toddler so hard she leaves welts behind, humiliating her teenage daughter by inviting people to call her a slut and looking upon her husband with disgust and the mop pail with lust, what exactly is there to desire about this woman?

[image]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2274725/In-Tuesdays-Mail-Shona-Sibary-admitted-slaps-14-year-old-daughter-Here-furious-Flo-hits-Mum-doesnt-smack-love-She-does-loses-control.html

What kind of emotional connection is possible with a woman who admits she terrorizes her children regularly with physical violence?

> I was talking to a friend the other day, and she admitted — in a guilty whisper — that she had, very occasionally, smacked her two sons. She refrained from doing so more often because she couldn't bear the thought of them 'flinching' when she went near them.
> I refrained from telling her that my children not only flinch — they duck, dive and even, on occasion, lock themselves in another room to avoid being on the receiving end of my hand.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2273565/SHONA-SIBARY-I-know-horrified-But-I-slap-14-year-old-daughter.html

Charming. God, I hate this woman. The only pill she should consider taking is cyanide.

So let's move on to Bradford. Does she make a better argument for why women should take the lady viagara?

> Speaking to Dr Dawn Harper and married presenters Eamonn Holmes and Ruth Langsford, Bradford said the pill could help women suffering from a low sex drive to stop their husbands straying.

Now, we've discussed before how a lack of sex does indeed push husbands to stray, but unspoken in Bradford's argument is the exact same assumption as Sibary.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/04/19/would-you-take-marital-advice-from-a-hooker-hell-yeah/

That men just want to fuck. No emotional commitment or engagement is necessary. Pop the pill, roll over, and have at 'er.

So romantic.

What both these women are doing is assuming a moral superiority over men when it comes to the experience of emotion. The ladies are not just assuming their own feelings trump any feelings men might have, but point blank denying that men have any feelings at all! It's astonishing that women making those kinds of claim illicit no reaction whatsoever, even from the man sitting in the room with them!

Really?!?!

Sex is just mechanics for men. Men don't feel love. Love isn't an important determinant of how satisfying sex is for men. Men don't care WHY their wives are having sex with them, they just want sex.

Hmmm. Such a mystery why these particular women don't find sex all that satisfying, huh?

Check out this column from Maggie McNeill at the Honest Courtesan (a woman who knows a thing or two about male desire). The idea that "duty sex" is unappealing to men is taken for granted. The exact opposite of what the ladies at the Daily Mail argue.

http://maggiemcneill.wordpress.com/2013/04/17/dry-run/

Loss of libido in women, excepting rare medical conditions, in my opinion, is a direct result of not seeing men as emotionally complex beings. If you're married, at some point, your husband probably stood in front of you and promised to love you forever. Rejecting him physically is a very wounding thing to do. It hurts. Sex is one of the most important, intimate ways married couples show that they love one another. Refusing to have sex with your husband is telling him, in a very painful way, that you don't love him. That you don't care for him or about him.

I guess the only way to justify that is to think of men as emotionless. It doesn't hurt men to be rejected because they don't feel anything to begin with.

That's the ugly little reality behind female viagara. Will it actually boost women's libido? Who knows. What difference will it make, though, if women are going to continue to see men as less than completely human? That's the real problem.

i carry your heart with me(i carry it in i fear

and whatever a sun will always sing is you here is the deepest secret nobody knows

International Men's Health Week 2013

Greg Canning · 1 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Australia joins other countries in celebrating International Men's Health Week every year in the second week of June.

This year between the 10th and 16th of June many health and community organizations will be joining the campaign to try and highlight the dismal state of male health in Australia, to encourage individuals to be more proactive in protecting their health and to lobby government and non-government organizations to expand policies and funding for men's health.

Longtime leaders in promotion of men's health the University of Western Sydney Men's Health Information and Resource Centre are again at the forefront of this years efforts and a browse through their Men's Health Week Website is highly recommended.

Importantly the Men's Health Information and Resource Centre are again focusing more on the social determinants of male health, education, social connection, secure employment, positive role models, male friendly services and mutual respect, rather then the orthodox fixation on the medical model and specific disease risk factors such as smoking, cholesterol, blood pressure etc.

This is in recognition that existing health services are pretty good at dealing with specific risk factors but it is necessary to firstly get men to seek advice and to do so they need to understand and value their health. This of value derives from their male identity and is embedded in their family, social, employment and community environments. Part of that environment for some involves one or more of the many misandirc and male-devaluing elements repeated highlighted here on AVFM. The devaluation of family, fatherhood and the gender biased treatment of men during separation, divorce and by the child support system being linked with a 10-fold increase in the male suicide rate in this group is but one well-known example.

The Men's Health Information and Resource Centre website also has some posters and fact sheets to download and print and might I suggest you do so, hang them in your workplaces and use them to start a discussion around men's health.

Andrology Australia is our nations peak organization focused on promoting men's reproductive and sexual health, and longtime supporters of Men's Health Week. Impairment of sexual function may be the first warning of a more serious problem, for example declining libido may precede overt depression and erectile dysfunction often alerts the physician to occult vascular disease and the risk of heart attach or stroke.

Whilst fewer men then women experience disabling symptoms due to age related hormonal deficiency, those men that do (about 1 in 200) can benefit greatly from hormone (testosterone) replacement. Information and education regarding prostate cancer and prostate conditions should be as available and accessible as that for breast cancer. Andrology Australia has been instrumental in spreading this information is a simplified form to men helping them to make informed decisions regarding an often complex and confusing area. The are many valuable resources on their website including comprehensive downloadable booklets on common reproductive health issues.

Regrettably one of the most curable of all cancers, testicular cancer, which predominantly affects adolescent and young males, is still hardly spoken of. This coupled with the demonization of male sexuality and genitalia leads to unnecessary deaths of young men too embarrassed to seek advice, such as this recent tragic example.

This year the Australian Men's Shed Association is also promoting men's health week with their "Spanner in the works" campaign. Expanding on the convenient stereotype of men's interest in machines and tinkering with them, key male health issues are linked by analogy to a motor vehicle's systems and components.

The men's sheds team have collected together a selection of screening tools suitable for screening to identify potential problems in these systems, and will be providing free health checks at selected locations and times. Many Men's Shed's are also organizing men's health week educational events and presentations.

The Men's Sheds organization is a uniquely Australian institution that has garnered widespread community and government support since it's humble beginnings more than a decade ago. Initially aimed at maintaining male friendship and connectedness for post retirement men, the organization is increasingly attracting young men and boys who can benefit from the experience and wisdom of the older ones and visa versa. The local groups then often become involved in diverse ways in supporting other community initiatives. Their brief introductory video is worth viewing and if you can tolerate it their there is a long version replete with Prime Minister Julia Gillard and her partner Tim Mathieson spruiking how wonderful her misandric EMILY's list dominant government is in supporting men.

One of the great voids of men's health promotion involves the all too prevalent area of mental health. The health consequences of overt and subliminal society wide misandry should not be underestimated and are reflected most clearly in the male suicide rates across the globe. Nothing signifies more the present-day inculcated worthlessness and disposability men feel, than the frequency with which their struggle for identity and purpose in life ends in a decision to no longer exist.

Although more prominent males are coming forward and publically sharing their experience with depression, suicide often does not occur in the context of established mental health disorders but is reactive to situational crises. In Australia the Beyond Blue campaign and a growing number of youth mental health services established under the Headspace program are dealing with the consequences of mental ill health. However more male friendly crisis intervention services are required along with a concerted effort to address the root causes which are overwhelming social.

Whilst of course all men are different I believe it to be generally true that men often neglect their own health, especially in the area of preventative activities. This is likely to be a predominantly socially constructed trait that persists and worsens in a contemporary environment that devalues maleness except is so far as it relates to utility to others. Even attempts to entice men into better self-care are framed in such a way as to enhance such utility rather than as recognition of their humanity and inalienable right to a rich, full and healthy life in it's own right.

So this International Men's Health Week I call upon my fellow advocates for men and boys to spread the word and also to reflect on your own health. If needed take the time to have a check up or make a lifestyle change. We need you each and every one helping to continue to turn the tide toward compassion for men and boys. That's one utility I am privileged to freely undertake and I hold worthy of remaining healthy for.

PZ Myers jokes about rape

How many hypocritical feminist scumbag ideologues does it take to joke about rape while complaining about other people joking about rape?
The answer is, of course, one. Any number of hypocritical feminist scumbag ideologues could do it, but FTB's PZ Myers beat them all to the punchline.

Cult-ivating Feminism

Diana Davison · 2 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The concept of Women's Studies for the benefit of women has always amused me. I don't need to research what it means to be a woman. I've got a pretty good grip on that subject and I've always been completely content defining it for myself.

When I was nine my mother brought home two books by an author named Judy Blume. I got the story about girls on the cusp of puberty and my brother got the one for boys. Gee, Mom, thanks. Half an hour after lights out I heard "pssst" and saw my brother at the other end of the hall.
"When you're done with your book can we swap?"
Fucking right dude. We both powered our way to a trade off by the end of the next day. I've always been more keenly interested in what it's like to be a man for the simple reason that I'm not one. It's a more natural curiosity. To grasp what men experience I would actually need lessons. If I'd been offered Men's Studies as an option I would have camped out all night so I could be the first to sign up. What kind of a racket is this to offer courses on how to be your own gender? Anyone with a strong sense of personality who would choose to specialize in the curriculum of themselves should be tested for narcissism. It's a matter of having true interest in the world around you or being trapped in the universe of yourself, so let's drop the ruse.
Women's Studies is a cult developed by feminism and as such is not a legitimate academic field. Women who can't pass by a mirror without looking at their reflection soon find themselves in a classroom full of other self absorbed recruits ready to be brainwashed into vile and angry advocates of victimhood.
Let the lessons begin.
Students straggle slowly into the lecture hall milling about long enough to assess each others wardrobes. They show off their designer pumps and waggle their backsides before perching on a seat.
Two hundred dollars of luscious hair is flipped over a shoulder and fluorescent teeth smugly flash in contrast to a spray-on tan. Across the aisle from Barbie Girl, Hippy Nature Chick plops down with her make-up free face and thrift store threads. They smile at each other and both think "Bitch."
As rumours circulate within idle brains the murmuring of loose lips is silenced by metallic caster wheels scraping against the hardwood floor at the front of the room. The professor arrives and directs her assistants as they roll in a large tarp-covered curiosity. There are strange, frightfully feral sounds coming from under the canvas and the wheels grind to a halt at centre stage. Dramatic entrance accomplished. The curtains quiver. Our master of ceremonies launches into her prologue.
"Today marks a new phase in your life. Never again will you see the world in the same way. Unlike the typical platform of the Patriarchal educational system, this course interactively breaks from tradition by encouraging women to become active knowers instead of passive recipients of knowledge." Her heels click confidently as she strides from one side of the hidden display to the other. The students shift uncomfortably as a guttural growl emanates from beneath the cover.
"Behold!" With great flourish and bravado the professor whisks away the tarp to reveal a naked, snarling woman in a cage. The students gasp. The she-beast rattles the bars and with ferocious untamed eyes issues a primal roar. Even Nature Girl is afraid.
"This, my innocent and naive friends, is Woman as the male Patriarchy would have us. Caged and oppressed without a shred of dignity or refinement. If not for the efforts of our Feminist foremothers, all of us would be this degraded thing you see before you."
Spray tan girl starts to cry.
The professor breaks the teacher/student boundaries, reaching out to solidify the sisterhood. She pats the poor child's shoulder and acknowledges their shared trauma. Instructions follow to gather in fours and conduct a healing group hug. The wild thing in the cage skitters from side to side and tilts her head with bewilderment.
"Men have put this woman in her cage!" The professor proclaims, drawing attention back to the problem at hand as the class returns to their chairs. Her converts nod, damp eyed and supple from their group touch experience.

“Thankfully we, as mirrors for each other, can regain our self-respect and choose a better life.” A hand-mirror is produced from inner lab coat pocket and presented to the now whimpering creature behind the bars. Tears roll silently down cheeks as the she-beast screams at the sight of herself and she retreats to the far corner of her cage to shiver in shame. The professor sighs and beckons reassuringly with an outstretched palm. The creature sidles back to the bars and nuzzles against the loving hand that strokes her mussed-up hair into a semblance of order.
As the cooing and petting proceeds a singular penis burdened student who’d been hiding in a dark corner of the classroom tentatively raises his hand. The tender eyes of the professor turn to ice as she whips her gaze around as a spotlight until it settles on his vile imperfection. His hand trembles mid-air and he clears his throat awkwardly.
“Um, excuse me but, didn’t you…”
He falters at the sights of daggers shooting from her eyes but presses on, “…didn’t you put her in the cage?”
Jaws drop as the entire class turns in his direction. The professor raises a finger in case anyone wasn’t sure where they were supposed to be looking and points it directly at the boy’s forehead in a laser beam of loathing.
“That is exactly what the Patriarchy wants you to believe! Haven’t you taken the prerequisite courses?!” Her lab coat flutters as she strides over to stand towering above the young man’s cowering body. “Let me see your transcripts.”
He pats the empty pockets of his jacket unable to comply and begins to question the line of reasoning that led him to enroll in this course. It had seemed like a good idea at the time.
“Just as I suspected. Remove yourself from my classroom this instant!” The professor spins on her heel and dismissively clacks her way back to front stage. The boy quickly fumbles books into his backpack and stumbles his way to the exit. He pauses, trying to make sense of his circumstances.
“But, I mean, how long has she been in that cage? Surely just since this morning.” The words trail from his lips as he realizes his mistake too late.
A hundred rage-filled women pull out their cell phones with a flurry of clicks and whirs. The Twitterverse thrums in anticipation. Digital death drums at his doorstep with each tapping of painted fingernails on touch screen displays. Within seconds his first day of learning about the world of women becomes his last and he slumps away in defeat.
The mood has lifted as the professor restores order to the lecture hall. “This has been an extraordinarily emotional day for us all. Let us spend the rest of the class discussing how to help this poor creature regain her natural environment. Next week I will be giving her a credit card, an IKEA catalogue, and we’ll help her do some online shopping at Macy’s.” The professor beams approvingly at the relieved sighs and uplifted spirits of her new recruits. End class.
Cults don’t just prey on the weak. They have slick campaigns and convincing literature. They begin with generalizations and constructed scenarios which start within the range of the believable and take you somewhere you’d never have gone had you seen the end goal in advance. Each year of study takes you a heavier footstep down the pink bricked road to radicalization.
Women’s Studies is not a career path. For the same cost as a degree in something that might provide you with an income, they will sell you a point of view. It doesn’t teach you a trade, it indoctrinates you into the feminist world agenda of ensuring it’s own future existence.
You don’t need them, they need you.
These courses do not come at a reduced price for lack of usefulness and the first year of Women’s Studies is designed to ensure you will never question the high fees you are paying to learn nothing.
“The first problem for all of us, men and women, is not to learn, but to unlearn.” ~ Gloria Steinem
Brainwashing works best on an empty mind.

Shivers vs the restraining order mafia

Michael Conzachi · 2 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well as the readers of AVFM and NCFM have been anxiously awaiting, we have some news on the sentencing of Francis "Coyote" Shivers for the diabolical crime of using his cell phone to protect himself.

I have seen some very strange things in my time, but I cannot recall a situation or scenario where I have seen such a miscarriage, rather abortion of justice, as I have seen in this scenario.

Judge Katherine ("thanks for appointing me Gov Arnold & Marty, did I do good, did I did I?") Solorzano, sentenced Francis Shivers yesterday to about 9 months in jail, a fine, and he is prohibited from using twitter (hmm, I thought we had a thing called the first amendment; silly me).

Shiver's request for a retrial was denied but an appeal is forthcoming so bail was set at $250K. Imagine that; a quarter mil for using a cell phone camera. If the City of LA keeps this up and fines everybody who uses a cell phone camera a quarter mil, they will be financially secure in a week. Maybe they could fix those potholes and clean up the graffiti that appear on city streets every 12 feet.; maybe even steam clean the downtown streets of the staph infections and TB that have made a resurgence.

Heck, since Ms. Pauley has taken thousands of cell phone pictures of her ex while following him around, and of her with her new lump, (I guess that thing could be called a boyfriend), at places just a few minutes before, where she knows Coyote and Mayra are about to arrive. OH MY GOD, CALL THE COPS, CALL TMZ, CALL THE PAPRAZZI, CALL THE WHALES.

Since the series of articles have appeared on these pages and the NCFM, the response has been viral. What is becoming more common place in Hollywood is that the misuse of the restraining order is not limited to just divorce cases; it's being used in business disputes, to denigrate whistleblowers, and to get media attention to some low class wannabe celebrity trying to elevate their worthless career, in addition to providing utility to the personality disordered and psychologically dysfunctional. Grease ball entertainment lawyers couldn't be happier. Wow, a court order that we can get with no proof and little effort. And hey, the Respondent doesn't even have to be there. This is the legal Lotto ticket.

In addition to this being restraining order terrorism, the emergence of a RESTRAINING ORDER MAFIA has evolved in Hollywood. Let's spell out a scenario; follow along now. It's a comical scenario; with maybe just a little fiction thrown in for entertainment purposes.

First; psychologically disturbed and personality disordered celebrity, hell bent on revenge with blood pouring from his or her eyes, with a boatload of cash, or loser untalented celebrity with a going nowhere career, decide they want to make life hell for their ex's or maybe just pull a name out of their ass and claim abuse or stalking. That will get them some camera time.

Next; they drop a bushel of cash on the desk of slime ball entertainment attorney and equally slime ball PR flunkie, and demand, I WANT REVENGE, I WANT TO REVITALIZE MY USELESS CAREER, HERE'S MONEY, MAKE IT HAPPEN. WHILE YOU MAKE IT HAPPEN, I'LL GO SAVE THE LITTLE CHILDREN IN RWANDA.

By this time the slime ball entertainment attorney, still tingling in his or her shorts, awe struck, star struck; maybe even going to the extreme of putting an autographed picture of said celebrity on their desk instead of their kids, says OK, let's first get a restraining order. Disturbed or loser celebrity says, how do we do that? While the awe struck lawyer is putting the picture of their kids back in their desk, he or she says, "Don't worry, you can lie on these things and no one is ever questioned; plus we have an army of judges and prosecutors on the same page. Hey, they want to get in with the A-Listers, too."

The poor victim gets hit with a restraining order with special conditions like, Respondent can't breathe, Respondent can't pee more than twice a day, Respondent can only eat ToFu — little things like that. Low and behold, the Respondent pees more than twice a day, and the surveillance army swoops down and voila, he or she has violated the restraining order, and goes to jail. Since this is a horrible terrible crime of peeing more than the order says, and because the disordered celebrity needs something to talk about to the entertainment reporters at his or her next SAVE THE MONKEYS AT THE ZOO charity event, the court sets bail at infinity plus one of their kidneys. Poor, poor victimized celebrity; cameo by slime ball lawyer.

The apparatus then swings into action; the ethical-less, integrity-deficient cops who are buddies with the slime ball attorneys, and who hope they can secure six figure retirement jobs, use taxpayer dollars — lots of taxpayer dollars — to go off on a wild goose chase, looking for evidence; sometimes thousands of miles away. If it's not there, then we'll just make it up. Then we'll write reports and only put in what we need to convict. We don't need to put in that silly stuff about his or her innocence. Not all the cops get six figure retirement jobs. Some get huge payouts through bullshit sexual harassment or worker's comp claims, usually in the form of a golden uterus award. I heard though that they are now looking at some of those bullshit worker's comp claims and videotaping some scamming cops, and some are going to jail.
Next; the case goes to the prosecutor for filing, who finds the time between Botox sessions, hair salons, and liposuctions to remove that "frumpy" appearance (because Hollywood doesn't like frumpies) looks at it and goes, OH BOY HERE'S MY CHANCE, MAYBE I WILL GET TO TALK TO ANGELINA AND GET MY PICTURE WITH HER AT THE NEXT STAR STUDDED EFFORT TO ENCOURAGE CELL PHONE RECYCLING. BOY WILL MY BOSS BE HAPPY WITH ME! WHAT? HE PICKED HIS NOSE DURING THE ALLEGED SET-UP CRIME; LET'S CHARGE HIM WITH THAT, TOO!
One set-up crime turns into 137. Great lawyering if you ask me. By the way boys and gals, make sure you go down there and make sure any witnesses in his or her favor don't show up to the trial. You know what I mean, threaten to shut down their bar by making 20 bar checks a night. Yeah that will scare the customers away and he'll go out of business soon. Oh, you didn't do all of that. Maybe it was one of those self-proclaimed, couldn't make it as a real cop, PRIVATE DICK TO THE STARZ.
The case then goes to the court and in most cases to one of the judges appointed by the ex governator, and Marty and Ron, or one of the others in the restraining order cottage industry. The actual decision gets made the night before with a nod of the head and a tip of the martini glass at happy hour at power-broker places like Morton's or the Pacific Dining Car. Dry and two olives please, big tip waiting.
Now we'll pile it on. Disturbed celebrity along with ambulance chasing slip and fall lawyer come up with a brilliant plan. I know, let's get nut-case loser junkie here and pay them big bucks to make up all kinds of sicko things, like maybe scamming unsuspecting men out of cash over the internet in an S&M kidnap scheme; yeah that will work, being the victim of numerous kidnappings, rape and torture then we can blame that on the Respondent and sue him or her too. We have to be careful on that one because there is no evidence; just shit we made up. We can keep that going just until loser junkie gets put under oath, then we drop everything, because junkie boy or girl will fold like a paper napkin in a deposition with a competent lawyer. Let's avoid a perjury situation that will make us look bad, we can just say the poor-poor victim could not put herself through that again. She has already been victimated once, the poor thing, give her some survival space.
Now the PR loser gets in the act for some big greenbacks. PR Loser says we need to get you involved in all kinds of save the children, save the whales, save the monkees, greenhouse gases, global warming, breast/sexual organ cancer charities, then we'll get you on the View and Oprah. Don't forget to bring tissue. Can you shed tears on cue? Here's a small piece of onion; hide it in the tissue. That'll work. Wait for the OOOH's and AAAAH's from the studio audience. Timing, acting, just like on the set.
The Respondent begins the endless stream of court appearances, thousands of dollars in bail and legal fees, jobs lost, kids lost, friends lost, negative publicity, people won't hire him or her because he or she has been labeled by the celebrity accommodating press to be a MONSTER, a lumpapaloozer.
The witnesses get up on the stand, and oops, their story starts to unravel, but fear not, A-Lister wannabe prosecutor will fix that; the judge will help. Respondent is convicted for a crime that under normal circumstances wouldn't get a second look in San Bernadino.
After a lengthy, convoluted and expensive trial with many twists and turns, the Respondent/Defendant goes through a host of lawyers. Most are incompetent, others don't care, and many others refuse to take the case; guess what, they are scared of this restraining order mafia as well. They don't dare oppose some of the restraining order mafia lawyers because they will never work again. It's better to blow the case for your client, let the vultures send him or her to jail for a crime they didn't commit, because, hell, I got to eat, at Morton's or the Pacific Dining Car, and feed my family, too.

Finally Respondent/Defendant gets convicted for animal cruelty for feeding peanuts to the squirrels in the park across the street from the courthouse. Wait, that wasn't in the criminal filing, oh yeah they just added it in at lunchtime. We got em, let's all celebrate tonight at the star studded party at celebrity dysfunctional's estate, it's being catered by the same guy who catered Titanic; great baked Alaska. Will the photog's be there? Should I wear my new DKNY dress that shows a lot of my boobies?
A stream of victims appear at sentencing, tears stream, angry outbursts, and one gets into a 90 minute convoluted, and confusing (PD Behavior) Theodore Kaczynski Unabomber Manifesto Diatribe. They gavel falls, "100" the judicial officer shouts between bangs of his gavel while the crowd begins to erupt, order, order I say, bang, bang, bang.
And all the borderline celebrity had to drop was about 5 mil, but had to go to a bunch of bullshit animal rights charity events and actually had to hold those smelly rodents like he or she loved them. Now I got ticks and fleas. My whole entourage of shyster lawyers, assistants, hangers-on, groupies and flunkies came with me everywhere I went. 8 men and 9 women, oops I mean 7 men and 10 women, one converted last week. All the taxpayers had to shell out was about 10 mil for this circus.
I hope you enjoyed my comical rant; comical but not entirely inaccurate. I am going to ask some questions. WTF just happened? WTF is wrong with this? Is it just me? Are any of you taxpayers pissed off that this extravagance has been spent on celebrities and the components of the criminal justice system so they can get in with the right crowd and get the right retirement job?
I told you what was what is happening and what it is, is corruption plain and simple. This brings to mind the word I mentioned, "MAFIA."
The Mafia as we know has been taken down by a thing commonly called "R.I.C.O." Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which is a United States federal law that provides for extended criminal penalties and a civil cause of action for acts performed as part of an ongoing criminal organization. The RICO Act focuses specifically on racketeering, and it allows the leaders of a syndicate to be tried for the crimes which they ordered others to do or assisted them.
RICO was enacted by section 901(a) of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (Pub.L. 91–452, 84 Stat. 922, enacted October 15, 1970). RICO is codified as Chapter 96 of Title 18 of the United States Code, 18 U.S.C. § 1961–1968. While its original use in the 1970s was to prosecute the Mafia as well as others who were actively engaged in organized crime, its later application has been more widespread. Some of the predicate offenses include murder, drug trafficking, bribery, fraud, murder for hire.
In 1984, the Key West Florida Police Department was declared a criminal enterprise under the RICO Act for cocaine trafficking.
On February 18, 2011, A federal grand jury in the Middle District of Pennsylvania handed down a 48-count indictment against former Luzerne County Court of Common Pleas Judges Michael Conahan and Mark Ciavarella. The judges were charged with RICO after allegedly committing acts of Wire fraud, Mail Fraud, Tax Evasion, Money Laundering, and honest services fraud. The judges were accused of taking kickbacks for housing juveniles that the judges convicted of mostly petty crimes, at a private detention center.
The incident was dubbed by many local and national newspapers as the "Kids for cash scandal." On February 18, 2011, a federal jury found Michael Ciavarella guilty of racketeering because of his involvement in accepting illegal payments from Robert Mericle, the developer of PA Child Care, and Attorney Robert Powell, a co-owner of the facility. Ciavarella is facing 38 other counts in federal court. One juvenile who had been wrongly imprisoned hanged himself.
Anti-SLAPP (strategic lawsuit against public participation) laws can be applied in an attempt to curb alleged abuses of the legal system by individuals or corporations who utilize the courts as a weapon to retaliate against whistle blowers, victims, or to silence another's speech. RICO could be alleged if it can be shown that lawyers and/or their clients conspired and collaborated to concoct fictitious legal complaints solely in retribution and retaliation for themselves having been brought before the courts.
From what I described here, is there anyone who does not now believe what is going on in the restraining order Mafia in Hollywood.

A Voice for Men sent a letter to the Los Angeles County Grand Jury on April 12 that can be found here and have received a reply. A response to that letter is underway.
Just as in the cases of corrupt Maine prosecutor Marry Kellett, corrupt West Virginia Family Law Judge Lori B. Jackson who unsuccessfully attempted to get an injunction to silence A Voice for Men, and lest we not forget former prosecutor and now prison inmate Mike Nifong whose malignant narcissistic desire to be elected district attorney was willing to violate every principle of ethics to send innocent men to prison, possibly for life.
Oh let's not forget Massachusetts Judge Beverly Boorstein, now retired after getting videotaped shopping on the taxpayer dime for issuing a restraining order to a severely injured Dan Iagatta, a quadriplegic fireman, who has now died and who has left his two young sons behind. In September 2010, Jefferson County Missouri, 32 year old Lisa Cochranm who got a restraining order against her extranged boyfriend, murdered her three young children, 11-year-old Alyssa Cochran, 10-year-old Autumn Cochran and 22-month-old Faith Ehlen. Lisa Cochran's estranged boyfriend, Christopher Ehlen, is the father of the youngest child. And the gruesome firebombing death of Lisa Williamson, a former friend of Perrette's whose demise came just as she began to reveal Perrette's diabolical plan of revenge to ruin her ex and to recruit police and prosecutors in the process.
These are just a few of the thousands of stories like this. All of this death and destruction and chaos coming at the hands of restraining orders, and corrupt public officials. Does this bother anybody?
Judge Solorzano, shame on you, I really thought you had more integrity, or did the decision come from up above? If it did, you still have time to do the right thing. Is that loser, liar, nut case of a woman really worth it?
Judge Solorzano, shame on you again as the games began with all of those silly little mistakes, like Mr. Shivers bail listed as NO BAIL on the initial sheriff's booking and as indicated on the website; then the bail was raised another 100K to 350K, then after numerous hours of phone calls, the proper bail amount of 250K, still an astronomical amount for the use of a cell phone was finally corrected.
Judge Solorzano; people have asked my why there was such an astronomical amount of confusion with Mr. Shivers bail situation. My only response was that the games are being played, phones get made; things get taken care of a certain way, under the radar.
Judge Solorzano; that is wrong; you know it, and now, so does everybody else. Nobody wants to hear a lame ass excuse about a glitch here and a glitch there. Sorry, you know as well as I do, that the fraction of a second that bail amount comes out of your mouth, the clerk enters that information in the computer system; unless of course little silly games are being played to inflict the maximum amount of damage to Mr. Shivers as is humanly possible.
Judge Solorzano; and what about Mr. Shivers being classified as a violent felon in the jail, requiring him to be handcuffed everywhere he goes. You can stutter and stammer all you want but the responsibility is yours. What if Judge Solorzano, just what if, this little dirty trick, a little unknown to the general public little dirty trick; the classification process in the jail, resulted in Mr. Shivers being injured or killed inside of the LA County Jail. Funny huh? Yeah it's all fun and games until somebody loses an eye.
Judge Solorzano, I'm letting you know here on this site, that this is your responsibility.
Deputy City Attorney Elizabeth Gertz; I only have one question for you; Really? C'mon, really; is this loon of a person, this liar, worth your job, your career, you law license? Okay fine.
The bottom line is that Mr. Shivers was sentenced to approximately nine months in the county jail, a fine, and he can't use twitter anymore, somewhat of a free speech issue.
The bottom line is that despite a mountain of evidence and facts, public officials, Judge Solarzano, Deputy City Attorney Gertz STILL continue to defend their ridiculous decision making. Mind Boggling.
Judge Solorzano and Deputy City Attorney Gertz have done one very important thing; they have re-energized those folks all over the country to get back in the game with this whole restraining order nonsense, especially in the circus called Hollywood. It is unfortunate that you don't possess a sufficient level of insight to realize that you are wrong. The good thing is that your level of corruption has re-energized the country. Maybe you will realize that, come to your senses, do the right thing and tell the truth. I doubt that you will, so I can only say I told you so. Also, just a friendly reminder, there is a thing called the constitution.
So gear up readers; like the famous boxing announce says "ARE YOU READY TO RUMMMMBLE????"

Women, Action, Media (WAM!) is in a relationship with the Feds, and it's complicated. After WAM! issued its ultimatum to Facebook, something smelled something fishy outside of the blatant double standard evident in WAM!'s language. I asked the AVFM forum to help me profile the signatories of WAM!'s open letter to Facebook. I could not have asked for better activists. The members picked up the same rotten scent and volunteered to venture deep down the rabbit hole. We cannot possibly tell you everything we found in one article. More information will be revealed as research continues. For the time being, give our members thanks for being the passionate MHRAs that they are. I would not have seen much evidence without their help. That said, you may want to mentally prepare yourself for their discovery.

But first, some context. WAM! is an initiative of New Words Live Inc, which also goes by "Center for New Words (CNW)."

> Our major programs include: – This Is What Women Want, a national speak-out for women to reframe the media and political landscape of the 2008 campaign season and address issues that really matter. -The Women, Action & the Media initiative, which brings together national and international journalists, activists, academics, and others with an interest in amplifying women's voices in the public media; […]

In FY 2009, New Words Live filed a 990-EZ. Supplemental information on page 13 reads:

> "Jaclyn Friedman, Program Director of New Worlds Life, INC at the time of closing, has become the executive director for Women, Action & the Media(WAM!) While the tax exempt application is in process, the fiscal sponsponsor [sic] for WAM! is Peace development Fund.

Jaclyn Friedman is well respected feminist in Looneyville. She praises women for the positive aspects of female sexuality, while passively shaming men for their male sexuality. From her blog Yes means Yes!:

> Yes Means Yes is a groundbreaking new look at rape, edited by writer and activist Jaclyn Friedman and Feministing.com founder Jessica Valenti. Through the anthology — and now this blog — we're trying to move beyond "no means no" to connect the dots between the shaming and co-option of female sexuality in our culture(s) and some of the ways rape is allowed and encouraged to function.

It should come as no surprise that Friedman's mindset is exactly what would endorse female hate speech as "empowerment" but demonize male speech as "glorification of violence against women." This is the exact philosophy backing WAM!'s ultimatum.

Jaclyn Friedman is a name you will become much more familiar with, but for now, let's get back on track to look at Peace Development Fund. In 2010, 2011 and 2012, Peace Development Fund gave WAM! money. Proof of this comes straight from the horse's mouth on Peace Development Fund's annual reports. Grantees are one thing, but looking back at the 2012 report, you can also see donors to the fund. On page 10 of the PDF, you will see donors categorized under "Combined Federal Campaign (CFC)/United Way." The four organizations listed under here are Human and Civil Rights Organizations of America, Partners for a Better World, Peace and Reconciliation Charities and United Way California Capital Region.

This categorization is important. The CFC is a campaign in the U.S. Office of Personnel Management that solicits money from workplaces all across the nation. This includes federal agencies.

> In 1964, the first "combined" campaigns, officially called "Combined Federal Campaigns, or CFC" were conducted as experiments in six cities, consolidating all drives into one. The result was a > substantial increase in contributions, ranging from 20% to 125%, and a highly favorable response within the federal community: agency managers were pleased with having to deal only with a once-a-year effort; federal employees responded with favor to the single solicitation.

> By 1971 all campaigns had become "combined." President Nixon announced on March 3, 1971, that the CFC would be the uniform fundraising method for the federal service. Another major change at the time was the introduction of payroll deduction as a form of charitable contribution. This was made possible only by a truly combined, once-a-year campaign, and greatly increased the size of contributions.

Taxpayer money has been flowing through the veins of government, and a network of feminist organizations, like mosquitoes, suckled for the sisterhood. The paper trail shows WAM! as a recipient of funding from Peace Development Fund, who in turn accepts federal funding. Interestingly, WAM! claims it is independently funded. I suppose this is true if you don't care about looking beyond WAM!'s immediate friends, and if you are willing to ignore the fact that they have not released a donor list when I asked.

The evidence shows that Uncle "Sugar Daddy" Sam is enabling a network of bigots. These bigots think you hate women because you respect men and boys, and they are taking your money while lying to your face about what good people they are. A cut of your income funds organizations that have the net capacity to scare a large private company like Facebook into sheepishly agreeing with a double standard that is right in front of them. If Facebook can be put in that position, Google can too. It doesn't matter where you go on the Internet, feminists will follow you, and the giants will hold the door for them. Come next fiscal year, another semi full of Benjamins will dump a bukkake of bucks onto a fund willing to keep the cauldron of hate bubbling. So far the forum has dug up no less than eleven government funded agencies that backed WAM!'s letter, and as I write this, they might have found a few more.

If you are not already pissed off enough to crumble your computer mouse in your quivering grip, you will be when you understand that feminists don't need to have seats in government to run the country. All feminists need is a culture that is willing to look the other way while they ruffle through the pockets of the people and terrorize the private sector by attacking the revenue streams of even the largest companies. Feminists have TV, and now they want the Internet. Don't just take my word for it. One of the signatories, Take Back the Tech!, will actually tell you that to your face.

Either do what they say, or they will use your money to keep you from earning more money for them to take.

I have to stop writing. I am going to be sick.

Addendum for clarification: On the statement "The paper trail shows WAM! as a recipient of funding from Peace Development Fund, who in turn accepts federal funding," it should be noted that I am not talking about direct federal grants to PDF. For the purposes of this article, I am talking about indirect funding from individuals who may be paid by federal agencies (tax dollars) donating out of their own free will. The article is meant to question the ethics of such transactions. Even so, the original statement was stronger than it should have been, so apologies to Peace Development Fund for that error. However, there is still evidence to show that there are signatories like the Chicago Alliance Against Sexual Exploitation that receive government grants. Additional financial connections to WAM! are to be determined.

Monday Roundup

Hi kids! Did you have a fun weekend? Have you been away lately? We've had just a whole barrel of goodies since last Monday that you ought to check out:

John Hembling, well-known atheist, nevertheless finds himself considering the problem of human evil, and ruminates on some of his recent experiences dealing with it face-to-face. Facing down dragons is the stuff of fantasy, but in such fairy tales are often a grain of truth: having the courage to face something destructive and wicked in human form is probably often harder than any non-human monster.

Speaking of having the courage to face monsters, if you want to see what a "real man" (by which I mean a genuine human being) does when he's got the strength to tell his story rather than stay silent out of fear of being mocked and shamed, don't miss She Beats Me. If you watch only one video this week, share only one video with people you know, make sure it's that one.

Evil may take on overt, manifest, obvious forms in the face of violence and a system that enables it, but sometimes it shows up in more subtle ways. Suzanne McCarley notes how it percolates even into recent advertisements. This time Samsung is the culprit. Philosophical question: is that sort of thing a driving force for misandry, a symptom of it, or a little of both? My guess is "symptomatic" but you tell me.

By the way, for all those women who complain that life sucks when your value is based on your physical attractiveness, Jason Gregory wonders if you've ever pondered what life is like as a utility object. I get so tired of people who roll their eyes at that question, as if it's just inherently obvious that being sexually desired for your body is such a greater hardship than being sexually desired for how much cash you can produce, not just now but for the rest of your life.

The seemingly neverending (and ever-pointless) "war" between MGTOWs and MHRAs recently reared up again. I find most such discussions tedious and pointless but maybe they do have a point. Robert O'Hara (MGTOW himself) and James Huff had a long and passionate show on the subject recently, and Paul Elam also had an interesting conversation with MGTOW thinker Stardusk about it on another show.

Returning to the topic of evil, however, we shouldn't forget that all throughout history the Stalinist urge to silence dissent is ever-present in human affairs, and we see this ugly dragon rearing its head again, this time by Gender Ideologues who seek to censor what they call "misogyny" on Facebook–but can't think of anything to say about misandry, natch. This story is being updated nearly daily with more breaking all the time, but be sure to see Facebook hates women, It's on, and Evaluation of WAM! signatures. The last one is particularly interesting as it reveals the mounting evidence that people receiving government funding are behind the effort to censor the largest social media portals in the world. Is it hyperbole to call this the most identifying feature of fascism? Well, I guess if you don't count fashion accessories, what's left? And why would you think these people wouldn't actually start using violence to get their way if they had the power to? Because they're "just women?"

Pauley Perette of NCIS fame is a rich psycho stalking and abusing her ex-husband and using the legal system to do it. Pauley Perette of NCIS fame is a rich psycho stalking and abusing her ex-husband and using the legal system to do it. Pauley Perette of NCIS fame is a rich psycho stalking and abusing her ex-husband and using the legal system to do it. Pauley Perette of NCIS fame is a rich psycho stalking and abusing her ex-husband and using the legal system to do it.. Oh, and in case I didn't mention it, Pauley Perette of NCIS fame is a rich psycho starlet stalking and abusing her ex-husband and using the legal system to do it. Or so a mountain of evidence suggests. In case you hadn't heard.

Ass-kicker honeybadger Diana Davison has returned with yet another rumination on the value of "women's studies" and notes the great narcissism inherent in the very term, and the cultishness that inevitably underlies such self-obsession. Not to be missed.

Dr. Tara Palmatier has WTF fatigue regarding Jodi Arias. Me too.

JudgyBitch is sick of women who harass men for not putting out but demand sex for themselves. Apparently viagra is great thing for men but is oppressive for women, too. Follow the logic? I can't.

Andy from MRA London notices a video people think is funny but isn't, and notes at least one probable victim most people probably don't even notice.
Hey, Italian men: your government hates you. No, seriously, they do.
Also, in case you missed it, PZ Myers likes to tell rape jokes. No, really, he does. He thinks they're funny. So do all his feminist friends, as long as they're told by themselves or one of their bootlicking toadies like PZ. Has anyone but me ever noticed that PZ isn't a skeptic, and barely even qualifies as a scientist? I've known people personally who'd had more actual scientific accomplishments by the time they were 25 years younger than he is now. Apparently spewing semi-coherent hate and rage that he can't back up with anything but dogma about Social Justice are going to be his entire legacy. Oh My Science! Is there any doubting anymore that PZ Myers is the Charles Coughlin of our age?
Hey, wherever you stand on our culture's modern day "vaccine wars," isn't it fascinating that almost no one ever even remarks on the risk of certain cancer-associated viruses when it comes to men. Oh gosh, who cares about men when you have women to worry about, right? Why even mention men, except in an offhand, back-of-the-bus way?
For video fun, there's always new and interesting stuff appearing in our video section, but some special standouts at the moment include a terrific video featuring AVFM Editor At Large Erin Pizzey uncovered from the vaults, a knockout skewering of the Patriarchy Bullshit by the indomitable Sparky Fister, a great interview with Paul Elam and Victor Zen on starting men's groups on campus, and Tom Golden's bias against men and boys in psychological research.
Also, here's a couple of links from outside AVfM in case you're getting tired of us: is this article in Slate one of the most wretched bits of self-flagellating misandry you've ever seen or what? The interesting thing is, even the feministy Slate readership had problems with it, to look at at least some of the commenters. In other news, here is still more evidence that men instinctively like each other and are instinctively cooperative with each other, and that this is on a biological level not just "socialization." There's more evidence than that one little thing, maybe we'll have to have a whole article on "why men instinctively liking each other is part of our natural makeup." We'd just need someone to write it. (Do you smell an invitation there?)
And finally, we still want your help on our wiki. Which, thanks to Strix and a whole bunch of great people doing everything from mundane little tasks to staggeringly huge contributions, is turning into a thing of beauty and utility that's just awe-inspiring. As an example, please read Why I do wiki and what's a woozle by I.T. Quill. And after you read this, please sign up for the wiki here and then, just to prove you're serious, click here to request access to edit pages.
And that'll do it for this week. See ya in 7!

HPV: A women's issue that kills men

Peter Lloyd · 3 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Like thousands of men, Michael Douglas contracted the cancer-causing HPV virus through oral sex. So why, in 2013, are only teenage girls immunized against it?

Yesterday, Hollywood actor Michael Douglas announced that his battle with thyroid cancer was caused by oral sex – or more specifically, the HPV virus frequently contracted through oral sex.

The 68 year-old, who fought a six month battle with the disease from August 2010 until January 2011, initially blamed an indulgent lifestyle of cigarettes and alcohol.

But, in a rare example of modern male candor, the veteran performer revealed that his cancer was actually caused by the Human Papilloma Virus – a symptom-free virus that lives in the lining of the body's cavities and can be passed on through sex or even the briefest physical touch.

'Without wanting to get too specific, this particular cancer is caused by HPV, which comes from cunnilingus,' he said.

However, in the same breath that Angelina Jolie has been lionised for her public honesty, Douglas has been criticised for it. Namely, because it may embarrass his wife, Catherine Zeta-Jones.

Yet, given the fact that Britain's men are living with a ticking HPV time-bomb – and, unlike girls, aren't immunised against it – her pride shouldn't even be a consideration.

Especially as they both have a son. A son who, like every boy in this country, will be ignored when it comes to HPV.

Currently, girls aged 12 and 13 are routinely vaccinated against the virus because of its link to cervical cancer. They also receive a top-up injection at 18. Great stuff. But for men, there's no approved screening test and no immunisation.

Recently, medical bible The Lancet published a study which revealed that 50% of the world's male population are carrying the virus. The research, conducted by scientists at the Cancer Centre and Research Institute in Florida analysed 1,159 men aged 18-70 from the USA, Brazil and Mexico. It found that those with a total of fifty or more sexual partners were 2.4 more likely to develop cancer than those with just one.

For gay or bisexual men who had three or more male partners, the risk was 2.6 times higher than those with none. Thanks to a lack of immunisation, they're also 17 times more likely to develop anal cancer than exclusively straight men.

To put all this into perspective, it means that 2 million men contract the cancer-causing strand of HPV every year – and, currently, nobody's doing anything about it.

Even if a man walks into a clinic and demands to get tested, he can't be helped. In fact, he won't know he's infected until a lesion shows up on his penis, mouth or anus.

That's not all: oral cancer – a tumour which is frequently caused by HPV – has risen by 50% among UK men since 1989 and now accounts for almost 2,000 deaths per year. Worryingly, the figure is rising. HPV infections also remain common in men as they get older, whereas it tends to become less prevalent in their female counterparts. This may be because men are less likely than women to develop immunity, even after repeated exposure.

Together, this begs one very important question: why does the Health Protection Agency think we deserve less care than women?

After all, this is just one example of inequality for men's health. Aside from the life expectancy gap, men are four times more likely to develop and die from cancer than women, yet – despite this – far more money is routinely pumped into female cancer programmes.

Of the top fifteen leading causes of death, men lead in 12 categories, are tied in two and trail in one.

Infant boys are routinely circumcised, risking death, infection and a latter sense of violation, without a single eyebrow being raised. Meanwhile, female genital mutilation is the current hot topic in mainstream feminism.

So while the world is busy demanding a female quota for street names (no, seriously! This was trending on Twitter yesterday), the world is allowing our young men to suffer because it's politically incorrect to intervene. In other words, we've taken the women-and-children-first philosophy of Titantic-era Britain and transplanted it into the NHS. National Health Service? More like national health disservice.

Funny how women like Caitlin Moran fail to mention these issues in their criticisms of the so-called patriarchy.
Fortunately, grassroots organisation T Cell – a group which demands fairer health services around HPV and HIV – is at the forefront of calls to change the system. 'Essentially, we find the current program sexist,' their manifesto reads. 'Presently, the UK government has committed to a vaccination service for girls which uses a product called Cervarix.'
Although this works, T Cell's beef is that most countries use Gardasil, which does exactly the same job, but also has several preventative properties to protect men.
According to Terrence Higgins Trust's head of policy, Lisa Power, Britain's flat-out refusal to use Gardasil is a big mistake: 'The decision was made on a cost benefit analysis, but I don't think they took all the costs into account,' she said.
'Notoriously, the minister at the time sad 'You die of cervical cancer, you don't die of HPV', but HPV can lead to other things that you die of, and that's a serious issue. Every other western European country took the decision to use Gardisil. The UK didn't. The majority isn't always right, but when you have ten different countries doing cost benefit analysis and only one goes in another direction, you have to ask: who was doing the maths?'
My own research proved similar inconsistencies. When I contacted the Department of Health, I was given very short shrift. 'The aim of the [HPV immunisation programme] is to prevent cervical cancer in women,' they said.
'The vaccination of boys was not recommended because once 80% of women are treated, it's not necessary to vaccinate boys…to prevent cervical cancer.'
'Currently, girls aged 12 and 13 are routinely vaccinated against the virus because of its link to cervical cancer. But for men, there's no approved screening test and no immunisation'
Err, except we're not just talking about cervical cancer! We're also talking about every other manifestation. You know, the cancers which affect both genders.
Even now, the UK's biggest cancer fundraiser – Cancer Research UK's Race for Life – bans men and boys from participating. The reason? According to spokesperson Luke Brand, it's all about 'sisterhood'.
Silly me for thinking it was about charity.
'Three years ago, we seriously investigated the possibility of including men in Race for Life,' he said.
'However our research showed that our supporters would strongly prefer to keep it a female-only event as it's a unique opportunity for women to come together in a non-competitive activity within an atmosphere of sisterhood.'
Charming! So forget that men are universally dying from cancer more frequently than women – instead we should be worrying about women's feelings when they're running around a field.
It's absurd.
Which is precisely why men like Michael Douglas should be up there with Angelina Jolie in the hero stakes.
If cancer can nearly kill someone like him, with all his money and private medicine, what will it do to your average man who's relying on the NHS?
Let's face it, it could be me one day.
Both of my parents have had – and thankfully survived – cancer, so I'm perfectly qualified to know exactly how difficult it can be. That's a battle I'm willing to take on – and win, if necessary.
But my odds shouldn't be slashed because being male isn't politically fashionable.
That's a terminal cancer in itself.

WHAT IS HUMAN PAPILLOMA VIRUS?

Human papilloma virus (HPV) is spread through sexual contact and is more usually associated with cervical cancer in women. It is the most commonly sexually transmitted infection in the U.S.
HPV can be passed between men and women by genital contact, most often during vaginal and anal sex.
It may also be passed on during oral sex and genital-to-genital contact. It can be passed on between straight and same-sex partners—even when the infected person has no signs or symptoms.

The cervical cancer jab given to 12 and 13-year-old schoolgirls aims to cut their odds of the cancer by protecting them against the virus.
Although most mouth and throat cancers are normally blamed on drinking and smoking an increasing number of cases that occur around the tonsils and back of the tongue are due to HPV.
Although the cancer is not contagious, the virus is.
In the US, HPV is blamed for up to 80 per cent of these tumours of the tonsils and the back of the tongue, which experts say could be due to increasing popularity of oral sex.
The typical patient is described as an otherwise healthy man in his late 40s or early 50s who has never smoked or smoked very little.
In Britain, the number of mouth and throat cancers have increased by 40 per cent in just a decade, to 6,200 cases a year.
Cancer Research UK says the HPV virus may be key to the 'rapid rise'.
Symptoms include persistent mouth ulcers, pain, discoloured patches and difficulty chewing and swallowing.
Men are advised to check their neck for lumps when shaving and both sexes to look at the back of their throat while brushing their teeth.
Treatments such as chemotherapy, radiotherapy and surgery are often more successful in mouth and throat cancers caused by the virus than those caused by tobacco and alcohol.
Although mouth cancer can be caused by HPV passed on by oral sex, doctors say Michael Douglas's claim that oral sex is also a cure doesn't make any medical sense.

The identifying feature of fascism

John Hembling (JtO) · 3 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What is the hallmark of fascism? I Googled this, locating several lists of identifying features. The authors of such lists appeared educated and earnest, but they all approached the problem from a defined political binary. Consequently, the resulting discussions fit into a model of "what does fascism on that side of the political aisle look like from this side?"

Because of this, the descriptive writing I found about the identifying characteristics of fascist governance all seems to have not only a directional bias, it's over-complicated. Many authors, whether purposefully or not, find it necessary to couch their preferred identifiers of fascism in long lists of qualifiers. Of course, all of this is unnecessary.

I have a simple criterion. The reliance on censorship is the strongest signifier of fascism. I don't much care whether anybody spells it with a big or a small letter F. Nor do I care whether it finds a home in the conventionally recognized corridors of government, nor an academic environment, or even within the realm of social media. It further does not matter one whit whether censorship is practiced openly, or behind the obfuscation of Orwellian word games.

"Hate speech" is an example of this. So what is hate speech? You can Google a definition if you want, but my definition will be more honest. It's any form of expression given a label so that it can conveniently be silenced.

For example, the writing of an individual, novelist Pam O'Shaughnessy, advocating for the genetic modification of the male half of the human race into a more pliable and feminism-friendly model of masculinity was not, even from my MHRA point of view "hate speech". Of course, it was never the intent of the editors at AVFM to silence or censor Perilous Pam or her comrades on the now-underground RadFemHub.

Hello Pamela.

Rather than employ censorship, we did our level best to expose the writing of those eugenics and child-murder enthusiasts on RadicalFemHub to the widest possible audience.

Now, however, three gender ideologues have launched an apparently-successful campaign to coerce facebook into censoring anyone or anything on that site deemed by ideological fiat as "hate speech".

Three individuals are listed as the principal authors of an "open letter" to facebook, demanding the company tow their ideological line. A craven, and naked dismissal of the most basic principal of free expression, as well as willful dismissal of the humanity of half the human race.

Laura Bates, Soraya Chemaly, Jaclyn Friedman began their letter as follows.

An Open Letter to Facebook:

We, the undersigned, are writing to demand swift, comprehensive and effective action addressing the representation of rape and domestic violence on Facebook. Specifically, we call on you, Facebook, to take three actions:

1. Recognize speech that trivializes or glorifies violence against girls and women as hate speech and make a commitment that you will not tolerate this content."

The limiting clause; " against girls and women" in this demand informs almost every statement within the open letter. Only violence impacting women is objectionable. That is to say, the minority of violence in the world. Violence, or its ideations against men, boys, or children not clearly identified as female gets a pass. The only people who matter are women. Indeed, one of the most basic and fundamental of all human rights, that of free speech can be tossed right out the window as long as the ideologue's label of sex-selective "hate speech" can be pasted to any commentary or utterance.

2. Effectively train moderators to recognize and remove gender-based hate speech. In other words, train moderators to devalue free expression, and to recognize the superior right of one group to protection from unkind words. Indeed, treat the members of that group as mental and emotional toddlers who cannot deal with such things as trolls, assholes and the occasional genuinely violent misanthrope. Now, there certainly is ugly, violent, and threatening commentary and content on face book which specifically targets women.

But guess what, the same statement is true for men. In fact, there is violent, ugly, and threatening commentary against every single identifiable demographic, whether it be religious, ethnic, or otherwise. This is the price free expression in a society borne out of the enlightenment. It is a small small price to pay, compared to a totalitarian, fascist society without a social contract including a high value attached to free expression.

3. Effectively train moderators to understand how online harassment differently affects women and men, in part due to the real-world pandemic of violence against women.

Lets all be clear on the difference between reality and fantasy. Violence, both within the area of domestic relationships, and in the wider criminal context – is tracked by law enforcement agencies around the world. If the rates of victimization are examined by sex, women and girls are the LEAST targeted demographic in comparison to men and boys.

The most recent US DOJ's Bureau of Justice Statistics criminal victimization survey confirms what every previous BJS CVS report shows.[1] Women are the minority of the victims of violence. Even limiting the discussion to domestic violence shows a parity of victimization between men and women.[2][3] The claim by Bates, Chemaly and Friedman of a "real-world pandemic of violence against women" is fraud. It's nothing more dignified than a disgusting lie, cultivated to justify censorship and the continued abrogation of human rights of men and women.

Bates, Chemaly and Friedman further claim, without even a citation of advocacy research to support it that domestic violence is a leading cause of death to women world wide. This is more fantasy and threat-narrative fabrication.

The top ten causes of death are all diseases. According to the World Health Organization[4][5], death from Violent causes is the 16th most most common cause of death, listed after 15 more common causes all of which are diseases. For women, the rate is 14.9 deaths per 100,000 women, per year attributable to intentional injuries, including "suicide, violence, war, etc". For men, the death rate attributed to the same causes is 37 per 100,000 men. That's 2.5 times higher.

The claim by Bates, Chemaly and Friedman that "that domestic violence is a leading cause of death to women world wide " is not just fantasy and threat-narrative fabrication. It is the polar opposite of the truth, and a disgusting lie, calculated to cultivate hatred and fear of half the human race.

However, rather than make any move towards censorship, I would shine a light onto the public claims by Laura Bates, Soraya Chemaly, Jaclyn Friedman, and every their signatory to their open letter.

It is a letter calling on the largest social networking site in the world to institute a program of demographically selective censorship; to institute the practice that is the strongest signifier of fascism.

Bates, Chemaly, and Friedman are not merely endorsing violence against those most impacted by it. They are not merely ignorant or indifferent to the foundational nature of free speech to the establishment of all other human rights. They are not merely content to propagate false, fraudulent models of domestic violence which continue the conditions and causes of domestic violence. They are not simply adherents of an ideology of hatred and violence, wrapping itself in the increasingly transparent veneer of false and pious humanism. Laura Bates, Soraya Chemaly, Jaclyn Friedman are successfully promoting the signifying feature of fascism. They are fascists, and if you support their cause, that of censorship, you may be a fascist as well.

Thank you for your kind attention.

Rape, politics and military injustice

Michael Conzachi · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Today, in a hearing on Capitol Hill, lawmakers grilled the top brass of each branch of the military regarding the alleged problem of sexual assault in the military. While I don't deny that sexual assaults do occur in to our people in uniform, the recent figure being thrown around of 26,000 occurring last year is suspect. First of all, this figure was arrived at through an anonymous survey and constituted less than two percent of active duty military members. The actual numbers reported are less than 3,400, and those who actually were disciplined in some form were around 1,100.

What also gets lost in the translation is that a significant level of these alleged sexual assaults involves male victims. Another missing fact is that alleged sexual assaults involving military members don't always occur on military bases, thus subjecting the local authorities' primary responsibility for the investigation. The definition of sexual assault in the Uniform Code of Military Justice includes everything from rape to unwanted fondling. Again, the decision is that of the victim to make. Just as in the recent example of the Department of Education's definition of what constitutes sexual harassment, the definitions keep getting expanded.

New York Senator Kirsten Gillibrand has proposed a bill that would effectively remove commanding officers from the decision making process, and turn over this responsibility to the Judge Advocate with additional civilian participation. She made a claim to Fox News how traumatizing it is for females to have to salute their attackers. That would be true if it actually happened. Please Ms. Gillibrand; give me one, just one example.

It is standard military policy in any sexual assault that the alleged victim is removed from that unit, and usually is moved to a different base altogether — in most cases to a base near their home of record. So Ms. Gillibrand's claim of this part of the process simply does not exist. It might behoove her to actually learn of this policy before spewing this nonsense.

In a recent military.com survey of 53,000 Camp Pendleton Marines revealed that one of their primary concerns of bringing women into the combat ranks is being falsely accused of some type of sexual assault or sexual harassment. Of the many in the military with whom I served and who currently serve, many state that they refuse to work with or be placed in a scenario with a female member of the military, where they might be alone and where the possibility of a false allegation might occur.

Check the websites of any military base, and there are scores of resources for sex assault victims. Some bases even list that victims don't have to report incidents to commanders; they can have an advocate do it for them. There are specially trained military police, investigators, medical facilities, religious support, advocates of various types, response coordinators, and virtually every type of resource that can be thought of.

Evans Georgia Attorney Michael Waddington, who specializes in military criminal defense cases, states on his website that of all cases he has defended sexual assault cases are the ones that the military goes all out to convict, regardless of evidence or validity. Politically correct commanders, when faced with a he-said she-said case, simply send the case to the Judge Advocate for court martial, not wanting to fall into that pit and being labeled some type of enabler. I am not going to claim that the system is entirely foolproof; mistakes happen, bad decisions are made, and we will have examples of bad judgment. But for the legislators in today's hearing to make blanket statements like they did is simply wrong and another example of pandering to extremist feminist dogma.

Here is another little fact that gets lost in this discussion and that is the false allegation. It is common knowledge among the "ground pounders" that the easiest way for a female to get out of being deployed, or to get out of a deployment area is to make a claim of sexual assault. Ask any rank and file guy; especially those who have been deployed in combat zones like Iraq and Afghanistan.

The experiences they will report to you are backed up by the facts. The Washington Times recently reported that the increase in false accusations is now outpacing the increase in reported sexual assaults in the military.

Another reason for the filing of false sexual assault claims is the problem of fraternization and adultery. Recently, militarycorruption.com reported on a female non-commissioned officer at Camp Pendleton who had an affair with a male non-commissioned officer, while her warrant officer husband was away. Well her husband found out about the affair, turned his wife in, and she resorted to making a claim of sexual assault. When her story began to unravel, she attempted to impede the investigation, lied to investigators and other transgressions, and was found guilty but received a slap on the wrist for punishment.

The male non-com was cleared as it was proved that he did not know the female was married and cooperated fully with all parts of the investigation. In this case, the false allegation was discovered and the false accuser punished, but the weakness of the punishment will only invite more incidents of the same.

Some time back there was a national hysteria about the prevalence about rape at the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs. Congress got involved and screamed and yelled and demanded changes and all kinds of accountability. The way Congress made it sound was that every Air Force cadet was drooling and lurking in the bushes with a butcher knife, leaping at the first female who walked by. A Congressionally ordered 2004 Air Force Office of Inspector General investigation was launched and of 142 incidents reported over 10 years between 1993 and 2003, revealed that not one claim of sexual assault was intentionally mishandled. All were investigated properly.

During that inquiry, the Air Force Academy found sufficient evidence to investigate 56 out of those 142 incidents. Of those, six resulted in Courts-Martial with one cadet being acquitted. In about 11 other cases cadets were expelled or received Non-Judicial Punishment (Article 15). This should put to rest the claim the AFA never punished a male cadet for sexual offenses, or intentionally mishandled a claim of sexual assault; and that was a decade ago.

During the course of the Inspector General's inquiry, many of the alleged victims changed their stories over time and could not be corroborated by witnesses, making prosecution difficult. At least one soaked topless in a hot tub with her alleged rapist after the alleged rape. Others wrote e-mails indicating the sex was consensual. Others when faced with potential lie detector tests recanted or claimed they didn't remember. The questions that arose suggested that some female cadets may have filed false charges to cover up their own misconduct, to manipulate cadets or to leave the Academy without having to pay for their Ivy League education.

One member of a Board of Regents of a California university, and an attorney who wished to remain anonymous spoke about the issue of false claims of sexual assault on college campuses. In some cases, part of the recovery process involves offers by the university to pay for the alleged victims tuition and expenses. He indicated that this expenditure is discussed routinely at all colleges across the country in the context of finances and budgeting concerns. He also indicated that false claims of sexual assault are being more commonly used, and in subsequent claims by victims against the school, a free tuition is part of the settlement package.

Neither I nor anyone else I know is going to deny that sexual assaults in the military do occur. When actual assaults occur and the evidence is present, then the appropriate measures are to taken, and the appropriate punishment is levied. By all accounts, that is what has been happening and what continues to happen. In the times that it doesn't, it is rare, not common.

What we are seeing; just as in the scenario of the whole rape hysteria at the Air Force Academy more than a decade ago is another hysteria, using controversial statistics, and claiming that there is an epidemic, and that the brass is sitting on their hands. Senator Gillibrand's assertion that a rape victim has to salute her attacker is just plain false. Any alleged victim is immediately removed from the unit and usually the base. In a combat deployment area, female victims are always, and sometimes males are immediately removed from the deployment area. Females are usually deployed back to a base near their home, and males are usually deployed back to their original unit. There may be exceptions based on the circumstances.

We also forget that a great many of the victims are male. Also missing are the numbers of female perpetrators. And of course with the expanded definitions of what constitutes a sexual assault, and the incidence of false allegations, what is the actual number?

There are approximately 1.3 million active duty military members. Even if we use this fantasy figure of 26,000 sexual assaults, that constitutes a .02 percentage of the military population. If we go by the actual reported incidents of approximately 3,400, then that drops to .0026 percentage of the military population. And if we figure in the actual number of disciplinary actions of approximately 1,100, that number drops again to .000084 percent of the military population. These are hardly numbers that justify hysteria and a drastic change in policy and drastic reduction of morale.

I watched some of the hearings today, but had to turn it off when I had to listen to this drivel by legislators with comments like “it’s not about sex, it’s about power and dominance,” “women have to salute their attackers” and the entire line of agitprop about hormones and testosterone.

Well folks, I want our fighting men, our combat troops, our warriors, our brave who are willing to go out there putting their lives on the line to have that level of hormones and testosterone to kick ass and take names against those who want to do our country harm; those who want to kill us. I want them to have whatever it takes to survive that environment and return home safe to their families.

Rather than having know-nothing feminists legislators (male and female) spewing all kinds of anonymous statistics and proposing legislation to remove commanders from these important decisions, they should get realistic and remind the troops that although we will not tolerate sexual assaults, we will not become so blind or politicized in that pursuit that we trample on rights, violate constitutional protections and forsake due process as outlined in the Constitution; that little piece of paper for which our soldiers now stand ready to give their lives.

Tonight we have as our guest Dr Tara Palmatier, Psychologist and MRA, who will talk with us about misandry in the field of Psychology, the politics of the DSM and men in abusive relationships. Dr. Palmatier has been active in the AVFM community for some time now hosting her own radio show for a time and has been featured on other AVFM radio shows. We haven't heard from her in a while though so we thought we would invite her to join us here at AVFM News and Activism.

Facebook censors political infographic

Paul Elam · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I recently posted an article advising AVFM readers that Facebook had capitulated to feminist bullying under the auspices of "fighting sexism and the glorification of rape and violence against women."

I also warned you to not believe their cited examples of tasteless memes that portrayed female victims of rape and violence because the real reason for the initiative was, in fact, to assert feminist hegemony over thought and expression at the social networking giant. I warned you that their "anti-sexism" campaign was, in fact, a sexist power grab; that their real intention was to silence the growing amount of dissent against feminist ideology and feminist lies.

They wasted no time in proving me right.

As I went to log in to the AVFM Facebook page I landed on an (un)expected page. It was a reproduction of a graphic I had produced challenging the notion of rape culture, citing statistics from three major universities. As you can see on the graphic there was no glorification of rape or violence against women, just a cold examination of the oft touted 1 in 4 rape statistic and the proclamation that it, and rape culture, are bullshit…which is true.

See it here for yourself.

This is what facebook now dictates is against "community standards." That is, dissent from feminist propaganda, no matter how misleading. I think that is worth saying again. Facebook has now declared that feminist dogma is the prevailing and unquestionable community standard by which now hundreds of millions of Facebook users musts abide.

They have also banned me from posting to the Facebook page for 12 hours. I suppose this is designed to give me time to reflect on my failure to comply with their desire that I agree with false information, or at least have the good sense to not believe I can object to falsehoods in their community.

Having no choice but to comply with their lockout, I will wait out the time and then post this article to the AVFM Facebook page, for as long as they allow it to exist. At this point I do not expect it to be too long.

Like I said in my earlier article: It's on now. And frankly, that does not mean a great deal. Facebook is one of the largest websites in the world, worth billions of dollars. If they are choosing to adopt a policy of banning the truth, which they clearly are, then there is little any of us can do to stop them.

Just the same, I do invite as many of you as possible to post this article to your personal blogs and yes, your Facebook pages.

Folks, as is obvious their intent all along has been to silence YOU. Now, the only question that remains is whether you so value Facebook in your life that you will let it happen without something of a fight.

What's under the mini-skirt of "SheZow?"

Patrice Stanton · 4 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

(Hint: it starts with "Feminist" and ends with "Agitprop")

If the "every-guy" doesn't dream of becoming a super-girl, he should

If Feminists designed, then crafted a training-bra of a Saturday morning cartoon it couldn't end up much better than Discovery Communications and Hasbro Inc's, new "SheZow," which premiered June 1, 2013 on kids' cable channel, The Hub.[1]

It's the story of an every boy, you know, say one with the totally asexual non-name, Guy, yet who's described as an "extreme dude." Guy's so extreme perhaps even he gets the name-slight, and so right off the bat he usurps the rightful heir to his dead-aunt's super-girl-power + famous-villain fighting legacy: his twin sister, Kelly.

It needs a down-graded TV-rating

Though the SheZow network's primary market is "2 to 11," the new show's rated TV-7-FV for the Fantasy Violence content. An online sidebar poll at The Hub clearly indicates the program is intended for still impressionable girls (and probably their mothers), therefore I strongly suggest it be given a new cautionary note in its TV-rating. Though I'm confident the show will fail, nevertheless it warrants a rating of, "FVaM." For Fantasy-Violence-*AGAINST MALES, for reasons I will clearly detail in this essay.

Every week from now on, hilarity, no doubt, will ensue

Of course The Hub should try new ideas. Of course they should strive to make money…it's what keeps them on-air and pays all those staff salaries. After all, according to Joe Flint in the L.A. Times, in the last 2 ½ years Hasbro has sunk 2/3's of a BILLION DOLLARS into this children's TV venture.[2]Private money. Earned money. NOT gimme/government handout money.
Damn straight they have the right to make and market toys and other show peripherals. And though in that recent Times article "kids' networks" sound like they're caving to political-correctness by curtailing food-related advertising, they shouldn't. They shouldn't feel pressured to parent their viewers in any arena, even nutritional. TV shows in general, and The Hub in particular, aren't making kids fat. Well, until kids hold the purse strings. They're just mimicking their disengaged, out-of-control, fat parents (or fat single-moms).
It's a good thing that entertainment corporations are perceived as "selling" stuff. We taxpayers can't afford a bunch of networks wallowing at the Government trough: PBS's mooching is already too much. Sure, execs like Hub CEO, Margaret Loesch probably earn golden parachutes from those ad-revenues; I'm convinced, though, hands on animating creatives in the industry are building up some nice golden umbrellas for themselves, as well. They're having a hell of a fun-time at work, too, I'd bet.

Cartoons have always incorporated "adult elements"

I get that. And it's not necessarily a bad thing. For example in the Dark Ages, when I was a kid, Rocky & Bullwinkle's nemesis was actually a duo. Cold-war Soviet spies, named Boris and Natasha. (Wait a minute…so that's where I got brainwashed into thinking I should be tall and unnaturally slender. No wonder I'm so depressed.) Anyway, the R & B show's weekly medley of cartoons was jam-packed with kartoon-Kremlin-directed plots against the unsuspecting headliners, and their various allies & associates, who were mostly bumbling military generals and bombastic government know-it-alls. So sure, the politics went far over the heads of the "intended" audience (me), but it of course supplied plenty of laughs for our parents and whatever other adult viewers were out there.

It doesn't mean, though, that we didn't absorb any of those underlying messages: I mean, to this day I don't just love flying squirrels, I also despise government (especially the statist/totalitarian/Commie-flavored ones) and government-bombasts of all kinds.

Perpetuating a meme

In what I've seen online of SheZow, from a 12 minute Episode 1[3] along with the cast of characters & villains, there isn't one single player that doesn't act culturally-subversive. Meaning they perpetuate and proliferate the sexist/feminist meme, "See, Males-and-Masculinity are bad."
Within the first two minutes of the, perhaps shortened, online version of SheZow, Episode 1, the 12-year-old twins are demonstrating who's the boss in this brave new parent-free world. Budding feminist Kelly quickly puts the kibosh on Guy's front-yard rough-housing, i.e. skateboarding, with friend, Raz (I'm assuming; not positively ID'd); she then menacingly "glares" her brother into leaving that friend behind. Guy then follows her into the house like a whipped puppy, eyes deferentially downcast.
Next, and in stereotypically reckless-male fashion, Guy misbehaves at his sister-assigned task. But…in doing so the boy uncovers the dead aunt's hidden talisman-of-superpower. How? By carelessly tossing Auntie's antiques about the basement where the two undirected kids are working. But, Lordy-Lordy, then he compounds this sin with a single reckless grab. Merely by snatching the just found magical ring from the hands of the Every (you-go-) Girl, Kelly, and mocking the ring's power (hence, mocking comic book character SheZow) he upsets countless generations of (innocent, trusting, unprotected) hereditary female power and collective-glory. Going even beyond upsetting, he overturns it; suddenly embodies it, literally.
[And isn't that just what the Patriarchy supposedly did to the Matriarchy, so long ago? Snatched away millennia of peaceful, orderly, empathetic leadership?]

But now the male-bashing can get even "funnier"

With a SWOOSH! Guy's-a-gal. Or, rather, a pinky-purple drag-hooker: from his skunk-striped long locks and opera length gloves above the waist, to his mini-skirt, leopard leggings, and thigh-high boots down below. After all, it's just what every "Guy's" sister dreams of turning a brother into, isn't it!
[Let's not even go to the in-between, under that mini… Oh, and don't think about pink elephants, either.]
Once the so-called "extreme dude" is transmogrified – and, hence, in his place – sister Kelly begins to take almost sadistic pleasure in his every misstep as a "super-girl." Whether it's allowing him to leap from a great height, knowing all along the SheZow character can't fly, gleefully laughing as he smacks to the pavement several stories below, or as he goes wildly out of control and crashes through a brick wall.

Proof that Hub "creatives" & Feminists agree: Males are Bad

Check out the SheZow pages for yourself. You'll note that the heroine's opponents/villains total 10…a full eight are male; that's 80%. So what happened to Equal Opportunity (to be "bad") on the way to all that Workplace/Personal Empowerment, eh? Not only is the male-female split skewed, but all eight males embody stereotypically "patriarchal" qualities, as I'll briefly show below.
Male #1 "Boxter," the twins' father: he's an opponent, not a "villain" per se; but consider his bio. It states he literally hates SheZow because she routinely interferes with his police work (read: men's work).

[Compare this male character's blatant stupidity – he is after all supposed to be a "crime-stopper"-slash-public safety officer – to his (ex-?) wife "Droosha." Her bio reads like a heroine named, Single-Mother: "loving, hilarious, mom…poetic artist who supports HER kids in their endeavors and she loves SheZow."]

Male #2 "Mega Monkey": he's "very condescending" and "wants to be worshipped."

[I mean, what male doesn't want to be worshipped, right?]

Male # 3 "Cold Finger": though Timmy Burr's a kid-villain, they make a point of saying he lives at home with his mother (as if most kids either live on their own, or perhaps to differentiate him from the twins inferred two-parent home); "something happened" between him and SheZow so now he "has it in for (her)."

[It's possible that since the twins' aunt was SheZow for many years, the "lives at home with his mother" (in the basement, right?) reference is a failure-to-launch barb. Besides, don't all boys – and men – have it in for strong, independent women? I hafta wonder why, though, he doesn't blame his mother for everything that's wrong in his life, or for not trying to stop what would appear to have been something the previous SheZow did (creepy!) to the even tinier-Timmy?]

Male #4 "Mocktopus": he's annoying, condescending (in that he mocks "what people say"), and he has a high-pitched voice (of all things). He's also self-defeating and "more dangerous to himself than…to others." These latter two traits don't really make for a very good villain, so in fact he seems more like a wuss-puss, a mere speedbump, or a feminist's wet-dream, rather than a true opponent.

[You'll notice the writers have a "thing" for males with high-pitched voices. To make them more girl-friendly, or just plain "girly," I wonder?]

Male #5 "Major Attitude": Since he's "ex-military" he's pretty much all starched-uniform, no substance. He still dreams of "taking over (back?) the world," though, but like the wuss-puss, above, the Major is never successful, and is "actually a softy…self-conscious about his (wait for it…) high-pitched voice."

[Hm-m-m…again with the unmanly voice. And is a male, who's "never successful" in his attempt to take back the world just a bit too cocky on the part of Feminism? I mean, we hear the I-Am Woman roaring every day, but who, pray tell, is it that keeps the lights on and the store shelves stocked to this day, ladies?]

Male #6 "Tatoozala" (like Methuselah, I presume): he's this world's oldest tattooed White male. But he's also some kind of magician, since he brings his inked creatures to life to attack our "heroine."

[Isn't that just like an old White guy? Getting something else – or somebody else – like tattoos or armed drones, say, to do their bidding, to do their down & dirty work…remotely.]

Male #7 "Brouhaha" (perhaps, Bro-ha-ha): he's a quote-unquote trickster, from the Happy Days all feminists love-to-hate…the 1950's. This male also has a very annoying vocal shortcoming: his laugh. But we're told he, personally, likes it that way. (Typical insensitive male that he is.) He's pictured holding a pie, which he's presumably about to toss at some innocent girl, super-girl, or cross-dresser.

[Who knows, perhaps by tossing said sugary bomb this anthropomorphized character will become immortalized in a fictional public service campaign. To protect cartoon girls from cartoon violence perpetrated by mythological male cartoon-creatures or cartoon-cretins.]

Male #8 Le Pigeon: this last villainous creature embodies and therefore takes a jab at several key "conservative" (read: Patriarchal, White, male) concepts: Capitalism, the Founders & their Founding Principles, along with a guns/weaponry bonus. Since the competitive, decidedly masculine profit-motivated economic system that spawned "genetically modified" Western agriculture products is evil (not to mention they make feeding ourselves and a large portion of the rest of the world possible), so too are those products. By extension, Le (genetically-modified) Pigeon is also evil to his core.
The bird looks distinctly like a bald eagle, with its heavy raptor beak and outstretched/iconically posed wings (the grey tones notwithstanding); it's wearing "Ben Franklin-esque" glasses. It sports some sort of a gun (or other weapon) which may also be a play on both WWII French resistance fighters, or it may reference the more recent 21st century American-conservative allusions to military passivity on the part of France during the early years of the Iraq war. (Remember the re-naming of French fries, to Freedom fries?)

Finally, the female "baddies"

The two female "villains" are described benignly, if not apologetically. The first in silly terms; the second in somewhat pathetic terms:

Female #1 "SheZap": she's a "clone and shadow side" of the super-girl character. The worst thing about her? She calls SheZow "toots."

[Wow. That'll give the viewers non-stop nightmares and provide endless plot-twisting opportunities for the writers, I'm sure.]

Female #2 "Tara" (clearly no relation to a AVfM's "Dr. Tara"): this old broad is a former friend of the twins' dead aunt. She resented the other's popularity and now feels "forgotten and bitter." Tara once was a super-heroine, though now she's "intent on destroying SheZow."

[I'm rather surprised the feminist-overlords let this stereotypical "liberated" broad character slide under the radar. Tara wasted her youth chasing career-fame and failed. Now what's she got besides wrinkles, dull greying hair, and a grand delusion? Oh, I forgot: a WASP waist. But as to the delusion, she doesn't seem to realize her rival, old auntie, is already dead…which means there's actually nothing left for her to do. Except to maybe consider lipo for those thighs, girl-fren!]

Much ado about a failure

With Hasbro feeling the heat for merchandising too much on The Hub, SheZow is destined to fail financially (and that's all that matters in a real business). After all, it won't attract little boys. Though they certainly would play with a gun-toting bird, or a pie-throwing fox, sorry Charlie, those violent "action figures" just won't happen.
And how many little girls want super-She dolls that they know are boys, "underneath?" Not to mention the 8-out-of-10 villain "dolls" would only come with one outfit (hence one pair of shoes).
But even if this blatant poke-fun-at-the-everyguy show flops, the moustache-twirling Feminist apparatchiks will be ba-a-a-ack. Like Snidley Whiplash before them, they, too, will happily tie the little Nells – and the little Neils – to the train tracks, sacrificing even "the children's" Saturday mornings to their loco-female supremacist-motives.

—Now you've gotten a whiff of the deep dark agenda that's under the mini-skirt of "SheZow"–

Open Letter To Facebook – re #FBrape campaign

Diana Davison · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The recent Twitter campaign by WAM! to tell Facebook how to operate your social media site has caused great concern for a group of people at least as large as those who presented their complaint to you. WAM! does not speak for all women.

Do not let it fall aside that WAM! essentially used your competition to attack you. They did not spend their precious time scouring Twitter for evidence of equal violations or, if they did, made a choice of which site there were going to attack. No one doubts that any sexism occurring on Facebook is mirrored on Twitter, they are just being asked to ignore it for political purposes. Their campaign has a hashtag, not a "like" button.

The late Aaron Swartz said:

> There is a battle going on right now. A battle to define everything that happens on the internet in terms of traditional things that the law understands… is the freedom to connect like freedom of speech or the freedom to murder? The way we answer these questions will shape the next era of our society. No, the next era of our entire planet. They'll determine whether new technology will enhance and entrench our civil liberties or whether it will simply gut them. Will these computers we have all around us be a tool for human liberty or the most powerful tools for social control? The answers are up to us.

It is well known and indisputable that current guidelines on rating content allow violence in abundance compared to the exposure of sexually oriented flesh. I see no evidence that Facebook is taking on different guidelines than the government sanctioned censorship boards. Kicking a man in the groin or outright threatening to castrate him is currently acceptable comedy to today's standards. It's not even called "edgy." Jennifer Aniston recently kicked a guy in the nutsack just to get more "hits" for a Smartwater ad and not only does #Fbrape not care, they helped deliver the predicted "likes." It is selective tunnel vision on the part of this campaign.

If WAM! dislikes the current definitions of what is PG rated vs R they need to take that up with the censorship boards who can then announce a change in guidelines to Facebook, Twitter, the film and television industries and all other concerned parties. To claim that Facebook is the generator of censorship standards is more than intellectually dishonest, it smells like a hashtag funded way make the newspapers with an easier target. Now let's focus on their method.

Their method of complaining to your advertisers is even more obtuse. The only reason those adverts appeared on the page is because the person screen-capping it clicked on the link and went looking for the objectionable content. The FBrape campaign, like so many other ill constructed feminist protests that seek to make a spectacle of themselves, failed to recognize their own agency in their problem. They seem to not understand how the internet works. They present women as if we are helpless creatures that can't resist clicking on a link or can't get over the emotional trauma of having seen something we didn't like. They presume women are incapable of figuring out how to block someone from our news feed.

When you click on things you give them power. When you write about things you don't like you give them power they didn't have prior to your words and attention. When they went looking for bad jokes about beating women up they took the advertisers with them. The corporations complained to should actually be angry with the complainers for being so stupid as to cause their adverts appear on the page they clicked.

Facebook has a choice to make.

#FBrape (don't forget the hashtag) is singling you out as the only social media site they worry about and telling you that they want you to censor your site in a way not demanded of anyone else and in a way that only worries about one gender. If you believe them, women should only be allowed to use Facebook while supervised.

They aren't worried about the page that declares all Facebook executives should be castrated (presumably they'd cut off Sandberg's tits if they thought about it long enough) because they are actually not worried about your future, they are only worried about justifying their own future. They are a business. This is how they pay their bills. WAM! is out of a job if they don't find someone to pick on. Right now they've aimed their desperate arrow at you. That the very campaigns they launch result in the backlash postings they find so offensive is not an issue for them because it keeps them in business.

What do you think will happen if you let them dictate who is allowed to say, what is funny and what isn't and simultaneously kowtow to the twitter campaign? This is not about social justice, this is about politics and there is a lot at stake.

I don't envy anyone at Facebook right now. We know that when women set their sights on a target they strap on their biggest asset and wield their voting power. The issue at hand is not about whether Facebook approves of misogyny, it's about whether or not Facebook will do what feminists tell them to do. That choice is ultimately yours but you need to know that feminists are not the only women watching to see how you run your company.

Facebook continues political censorship

Paul Elam · 5 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Facebook, who recently made the announcement that it was going to tighten up its standards of removing material posted to their website determined to be “hate speech” or that trivialized or glorified violence or hatred based on sex, has now more clearly demonstrated their actual intentions.

Just yesterday the social media platform removed an image posted to the Facebook fan page for A Voice for Men. It was an infographic that addressed the notion of “rape culture” and the “1 in 4” rape statistic, in part by citing the actual number of reported rapes at three major United States universities. There was nothing about the image that violated the site’s terms of service, but nonetheless it was removed, I was informed, due to violating “community standards.”

Today, another image was removed. This time a meme that called attention to the fact that in many cases where women kill, ideologues from the domestic violence grievance industry attach themselves to the case and move to alter public opinion and judicial outcome to paint the perpetrator as a victim.

It is a matter worthy of public discussion, as the Jodi Arias case amply demonstrated, which I initiated on the fan page with a meme. It was just removed for violating community standards.

See here.

As you can see, the meme is purely a matter of critiquing feminism. It in no way violates Facebook community standards, nor does it fall under the kinds of expression that Facebook claimed it was going to be addressing in their new campaign against hate speech and violence against women.

What it is, in fact, is a meme calling attention to one of the ways in society we mishandle violence in the legal system.

Here is the rub, folks. We are going to continue to address this matter in the ways that we can. We will remain a voice that will point to Facebook’s now obviously organized effort to silence dissent against feminism.

Victor Zen is working with a team of many in our forums on other aspects of this case involving the government funding of some of these ideologues. Additionally, I am asking you now, as I did yesterday, to make a copy of this image and post it to your Facebook accounts and fan pages. (note: be sure to change the image name, as it appears they are tracking the stuff by filename).

But there is another matter I want to address, though it may agitate a few in this crowd.

My political leanings are generally libertarian, with some exceptions. I am a small government, pro-accountability anti-statist, even as I don’t discuss it much within the pages of this site. I figure we don’t need the divisions of me injecting my political views into the discussion.

But right now by everything holy I just want to grab the next person who thinks “collectivism” is the only evil we are facing and shove them off the nearest cliff. I hope when they hit bottom they will land next to a left-wing ideologue that deserves to be there with them.

In a world governed more by a corporatocracy than anything else, Facebook is like a small country. Companies like Google and Yahoo and Youtube have the power of political regimes; the power to preserve free speech, or to end it. They have the platform to give the MHRM robust, ever growing momentum as a part of the free and open exchange of ideas, or to simply kill it.

You are witnessing now, as Facebook morphs toward a dictatorship in the online world, the potential for our future silencing.

How long before WAM announces their concerns for all the “misogyny” happening on YouTube, and our own GWW finds a muzzle being fitted over her mouth?

After she is gone, will the last pathetic whimper we hear from right wing MRAs on YouTube be “It’s the collectivists!” just before they, too, find concerns about “community standards” where their channels used to be?

Folks, we got a hell of a battle ahead of us; one that is on enough fronts to be discouraging and more than a little daunting.

What we are fighting here is the pernicious, multi-headed beast of gynocentrism. It is not JUST a left wing enemy.

It can't be summed up with easy to interpret sound bites like "statist" and "collectivist" and if you think it can you are being simple-minded enough to feed the fucking beast.
I know, I am preaching; something I spend time criticizing others for doing. You will have to forgive me for the transgression in this case and even if you don't I am not going to stop.
The fight that AVFM has been picking for four years is now at our door. Now is not the time to argue politics or to divide ourselves up over religion or any other set of ideas. The only hope we have is to fight the enemy wherever we find it; with whatever tools we have; in any way that we can; and to do it together.
I urge everyone interested to contact anyone they can think of who might be interested in this case, up to and including the ACLU. Contact political blogs on both sides. Contact social liberals and conservatives. After all, in one way or another everyone is on the list that will eventually be considered under "community standards," the in war to protect feminist thought from scrutiny.
If you have ever written me a "thank you" for doing the work I do, then help us get this done. If you have ever posted a comment that you are angry about what is happening with men and boys, then help us get this done. Don't ask what you can do, just get busy. If you are interested in helping you should be able to compose your own mail list in less than 20 minutes and get busy contacting people. It will take you even less time to copy and paste your efforts to the comments here.
Spread this article like it was free candy. Make your voice heard because if you don't do it now, there literally may not be a tomorrow.

Mark Zuckerberg needs to read more

Isaac T. Quill · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So, Mark Zuckerberg has bowed to a pressure group and his minions are removing criticism of feminist ideas and dogma?
I know Mark is rich, but he's also a geek and may not have had that much time to find out about the real world. That's what happens when you are Young, Dumb and Full of Diodes. It may be that Mark just lacks real world experience and the sort of perspective that comes with time and some quality study materials.
I'm "NOT" going to assume that Mark is without the capacity to reason, or that he is happy to be ignorant. I would like to help Mark learn, so I've bought him a copy of "Who Stole Feminism?: How Women Have Betrayed Women" by Dr. Christina Hoff Sommers – 1994.

> Philosophy professor Christina Sommers has exposed a disturbing development: how a group of zealots, claiming to speak for all women, are promoting a dangerous new agenda that threatens our most cherished ideals and sets women against men in all spheres of life. In case after case, Sommers shows how these extremists have propped up their arguments with highly questionable but well-funded research, presenting inflamma tory and often inaccurate information and stifling any semblance of free and open scrutiny.

Dr. Sommers has for many decades been highlighting the false claims made by feminists, along with the tactics they use. Tactics ranging from feigned ignorance, to the batting of eyelashes and claiming it was all just an honest mistake; whoopsie! Unfortunately the mistakes, false claims, hyper-inflated realities from anorexia to rape all run in a single direction. So, maybe they have not just been honest mistakes. Whoopsie! In fact, the "mistakes" in feminist dogma have been very controlling and have been about expressing power over others. It's all very patriarchal.
You can get a taster of what is in store for Mr. Z by reading chapter 10 of the book "Researching the "Rape Culture" of America". In it, Dr. Sommers details a great deal of the deception and propaganda.

> Koss and her colleagues concluded that 15.4 percent of respondents had been raped, and that 12.1 percent had been victims of attempted rape. Thus, a total of 27.5 percent of the respondents were determined to have been victims of rape or attempted rape because they gave answers that fit Koss's criteria for rape ….
>
> Only about a quarter of the women Koss refers to as rape victims called what happened to them rape. According to Koss, the answers to the follow-up questions revealed that "only 27 percent" of the women she counted as having been raped labeled themselves as rape victims. Of the remainder, 49 percent said it was "miscommunication," 14 percent said it was a "crime but not rape," and 11 percent said they "don't feel victimized."
> The Koss study, released in 1988, became known as the Ms. Report. Here is how the Ms. Foundation characterizes the results: "The *Ms.*project-the largest scientific investigation ever undertaken on the subject-revealed some disquieting statistics, including this astonishing fact: one in four female respondents had an experience that met the legal definition of rape or attempted rape."

Similar views were expressed 14 years later The Campus Rape Myth The reality: bogus statistics, feminist victimology, and university-approved sex toys – Heather Mac Donald – City Journal Winter – 2008.

> The campus rape industry's central tenet is that one-quarter of all college girls will be raped or be the targets of attempted rape by the end of their college years (completed rapes outnumbering attempted rapes by a ratio of about three to two). The girls' assailants are not terrifying strangers grabbing them in dark alleys but the guys sitting next to them in class or at the cafeteria.
> If the one-in-four statistic is correct—it is sometimes modified to "one-in-five to one-in-four"—campus rape > represents a crime wave of unprecedented proportions. No crime, much less one as serious as rape, has a victimization rate remotely approaching 20 or 25 percent, even over many years. The 2006 violent crime rate in Detroit, one of the most violent cities in America, was 2,400 murders, rapes, robberies, and aggravated assaults per 100,000 inhabitants, a rate of 2.4 percent. The one-in-four statistic would mean that every year, millions of young women graduate, having suffered the most terrifying assault, short of murder, that a woman can experience.

So, Mark had better get himself up to speed. You see, I'm an old school teacher type and I know the value of book learning over the Googlearchy. Mark will be tested, and I'm sorry, but I do issue penalties for each wrong answer. I'm sure that so many parents will be interested to see how well Mark does at some book learning, and if Mark fails he may find many parents not wanting his Ignorance to spread to their children.
$2.73 – such a small investment for the education of a Billionaire, and such a cheap way to test for Ignorance In Action.

Facebook is feminism's admission of failure

John Hembling (JtO) · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If you criticize feminism, or any of that ideology's major dogmas, you will be silenced.

That appears to be the message conveyed by the recent campaign to co-opt Facebook's moderation policies. It is now against Facebook's community standards to criticize the religion of gender-hatred and violence. The ideology which pretends to humanism, but which is even named by a contraction, using an expression for sexually selective supremacism.

On the largest social networking site in the world, if you criticize feminism, you will be silenced.

This is the work, obviously of more than some small handful of ideologues on the fringe. This is the will of a major segment of public, activist adherents to that ideology.

Many individuals in the non-feminist public have already objected to the imposition of censorship into their communications, their relationships, and their friendships. Their objections are justified and correct. Although critics of social media have appropriately used the term "antisocial media," it's also true that social media has become one of the significant environments through which people maintain friendships and relationships. Now, with the advent of overt censorship of any criticism of the popular ideology of gender, the adherents of that violent cult apparently want to do more than just silence any differing point of view. The goal appears to be social isolation for anyone who dares to criticize their ideology.

For the record, that's an ideology the principal tenets of which are lies and thought-stopping cliches. It's an ideology built on hatred and violence by proxy, and one which insists that women are inferior–in need of constant propping up, artificial advantage, coddling, and endless condescending affirmation. In fact, it's an ideology of gender which informs public policies which purposefully ignore peer-reviewed research on domestic violence. Thus, gender-ideologically driven policy opposes Domestic Violence (DV) in its public rhetoric, but maintains the conditions which perpetuate that violence. That's right, feminist-driven policy on DV purposefully perpetuates domestic violence.

Qui bono? Who benefits?

That's simple: follow the money.

But what are the adherents of an ideology to do when their claims, dogmas and foundational myths are repeatedly and exhaustively shown to be false? Not just incorrect, but willfully fraudulent? What are such ideologues to do when personal smears against their critics have ever diminishing effect? What do the hard-core proponents of such ideology to do when their own long-standing policy of using ad-hominem attacks and other logical fallacies to marginalize their rational critics is identified in public, and laughed at with deserved and undiluted scorn?

Lacking an evidence-based argument, lacking the ability to formulate a rational defense of feminism's hatred and violence, publicly exposed in maintenance of naked falsehood and fraud, feminists have abandoned any pretense of credibility or legitimacy. Now it's just censorship. If you criticize feminism, you will be silenced. And when that fails to work, as it is already failing, there will be direct and brutal violence for those who dare to object. For individuals with the integrity to oppose that cult of hatred and lies, feminism's only remaining options are enforced silencing, and brutal violence. That's all the gender ideology of feminism has left. And that won't work either.

On red pills, blue skies and tits

Paul Elam · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

See, I am having this imaginary conversation with a couple of blue pill men. I mean, it is not real at all. I am totally making it up. I know exactly how it goes, too. Word for word. It is not because I am all that creative. It's just that the last thing you need to imagine a blue pill conversation is imagination.

We are sitting at a table in a sports bar (of course). The conversation goes like this.

"So man, how 'bout them Cowboys?" says blue pill guy number one. "Can you believe they gave Romo all that fuckin' money? The son of a bitch chokes in the clutch every year! It is like he is allergic to winning playoff games!"

Just then a woman walks by, just out of earshot. Blue pill guy number one stops talking and suddenly tilts his head toward her. He is looking at me but his eyebrows are popping up and down sharply, aimed at the woman, like he is trying to point at her with them. Then he talks again.

"Man, get a load of those TITS! Sweet fucking Jesus!" The look on his face is pained, like he has heartburn.

"Ohhhhhhhhhh!" chimes in blue pill guy number two in agreement, and he has a similar grimace on his face, like he just stepped on a nail. I admit to myself that the woman has nice tits, but I am also thinking that it has been a long time since the sight of someone's tits made me grunt and wrinkle my face up like I was visiting the proctologist.

"Yeah, they're just…great," I say. I feel stupid.

"Anyhow," says blue pill one, "Romo's a fuckin loser, and still gets 140 mil and a career contract. Is this a great country or is Jerry Jones just fuckin nuts?" He laughs at his own joke and then looks back over his shoulder to see if the tits are still there.

"Another round?" asks blue pill two. "I'm buyin'. Hell, I might as well buy. My money's not worth piss anyway. This fucking Obamaconomy."

Blue one turns angry in an instant. "You gonna start in with that shit again? Yeah, like he screwed the economy! It was shit the day he walked into office thanks to Bush. What a moron that guy was."

"At least he didn't sell us out for the nanny state!" two barks back.

At this point, I want to kill both of them. Blue pill two slides me a beer and I find myself drinking it, quickly, as blue pill one explains why Obama is a better president because "At least he speaks English better than Bush, or probably even Romney."

I know I am fucked at this point. But I set down my beer and find myself enjoying a brief, Obamaless, Bushless, titless silence. It has fallen over the table like a shadow. Then, just about the time I was getting marginally comfortable, number two asks me The Question.

And no, he does not ask me which side of their stupid political divide I have decided to invest my heart and soul. That is not The Question.

The Question is what all blue pill men ask each other sooner or later. It is critical information, more important than which generic, undifferentiated political candidate you favor over the other relatively identical one. It is more important than whether you can believe that a quarterback that can't win a playoff game gets paid like The Donald. It is even more important than whether you "got a load of those TITS!"

Two leans forward, putting on his most convincing, serious, I really want to get to know you face, and asks, "So, Paul, what do you do?"

There is a special inflection on the second instance of the word "do." Now, in proper English, not the kind that George Bush would speak, it would not even be a complete question. But when a man asks you what you do, then you, as a man, fill in the rest in your mind. "What do you do, for a living?"

Of course, plenty of women ask the same question using the exact same verbiage, but for men it is different. When a man asks another man what he does, he is really asking him who he is. He is getting to the core of your supposed identity. Because men are their jobs. A man's work is every measure of his worth; his relative value to other men, and too often, to himself.

So, in that situation, it is not an inquiry about employment; it is a window into a man's soul and he is not allowed to have curtains. That is just the way it is.

This is a kind of a difficult situation for a guy like me. How do I explain to two anesthetized zombies who are arguing mainstream politics and marveling over tits like they have never seen a pair, what I do?

It is not like I get to say "stock broker" or "engineer" or "I.T.," any of which would quickly and mercifully put me in a labeled box that both of my imaginary clowns could wrap their heads around and move on to more sports and politics and tits.

Oh no, answering The Question, explaining what I do, is a whole different conversation. I could try to cop out and say something like, "I'm a writer." The damned thing is that being a writer is interesting. I have told people that before and it takes almost no time for the follow up question. "Oh, yeah, what do you write about?"

And there you see the dilemma. I might as well say, "I am a men's rights activist and I spend most of my days fucking people's shit up," as to tell them I am a writer. We are going to end up there anyway, right?

So, going back into my imaginary conversation, I get myself another imaginary beer and take an imaginary sip as blue pill one and two sit patiently and wait for me to tell them the sum total of my worth as a human being.

"I tell people the sky is blue," I say.

"Beg your pardon?" asks one of them. I am not sure which one.

"The sky," I say again. "I tell people it is blue."

Both one and two now look equally nonplussed. It is like they are waiting for a punch line but something sneaky in the back of their minds tells them there is not one coming, so they just sit there and look at me.

"I tell people that the world is not flat, too."

"And that up is up and down is down."

"And that granite is heavier than balsawood," I say. "And you know what? They don't fucking believe me so I have to tell them over and over and over and they still don't believe me."

Now, blue pill one and blue pill two are looking at me really funny at this point. Both their heads are cocked to the side a little and they look really confused, sort of like a couple of dogs watching TV. I start to feel sorry for them and decide to take the conversation toward its close.

"And I tell people that regret is not rape; that being cared for is not oppression; that being a slave to work is not freedom or power; that paying a surgeon more than a babysitter is not unfair discrimination; that a small number of criminals don't define an entire culture; that disagreeing with an ideology is not hating a class of people. And I tell them that men are human beings."

"And they don't believe me no matter how much I say it. So I say it pretty loud and pretty rude at times. And of course they still don't believe me. But what does happen is that while I am being loud and rude and telling people who don't want to listen that the sky is fucking blue, somehow, some way, other people who already know the sky is blue start joining in; saying the same thing, and at times they get loud and rude, too. But that feels pretty good."

"And that is what I do."

Number one and number two both have pained looks on their faces again, but not the good kind of pain you get from looking at someone's tits. It is a bad, confused, scary kind of pain. It is the kind of pain that looks like it is not going to go away on its own. It is the kind of pain that people who don't know that the sky is blue are likely to take out on someone if you are not careful.

So there I am, even in my imaginary conversation, feeling a little nervous. I need a plan, and I need it quick. Luckily, I know just the trick.

I point across the sports bar at a far corner of the room and make my eyes big and wide with wonderment. And then I say, with all the excitement I can muster, "Man, get a load of those TITS!"

Blue one and blue two have heads that turn on a swivel, and they spin around like Linda Blair, giving me just enough time to sneak away from my imaginary companions.

Now, I don't want to give the wrong impression. I love what I do. I cannot imagine doing anything else. But some days, I have to tell you, I think I would just about give anything if my mind could be filled, and my world defined, by some lying politicians and a nice set of tits.

Want to murder your husband? Join the club!

Robert St. Estephe · 6 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I wrote "Exciting careers in serial widowhood" for AVfM back in September 2012 my research had turned up a count of 108 cases of black widow serial killers: women who murdered two or more husbands or paramours (dozens of men in some cases). Currently the count is 165 – and growing – as I sift through databases of old newspapers.

Eastern Europe figures prominently in the history of husbandicide by virtue of the long-standing tradition of organized murder rings – led usually by midwives, herbalists or known more crudely under the label "witches." From the mid 19th century to the 1930s newspapers were constantly sporting headlines about murders in Hungary, Serbia, Croatia, Russia such as "Husband Poisoning by Wholesale" (1882), "Ten Husband Poisoners" (1890), "A New Business; Husband Poisoning on the Scale of a Commercial Enterprise" (1891), "Killing Off Husbands" (1895), "Epidemic of Poisoning in Hungary; Eighteen Men Killed" (1901), "Women Formed Club to Murder Husbands" (1903), "Woman Kills 300 At Wives' Behest" (1909), "Exterminating Husbands" (1911), "Wanted to Be Widows So They Hanged Their Husbands" (1933), "Used Fly Paper to Kill Husbands" (1935), "How Wives Gained Power by Mass Murder of Husbands" (1937). (Husband-Killing Syndicates provides a checklist and links to the articles).

Mass slaughter of in-the-way husbands, by means of arsenic usually, were a dime a dozen in those days. Yet one story stands apart from all others in the sheer audacity of its "having it all" "girl-power" capriciousness.

This is the story of Yugoslavia's "Club St. Lucretia," a formally registered women's charity in Nagy Kikinda, Yugoslavia which operated in the mid-1920s. Not all the details of the case have been dug out of the English language archives I use as my sources yet. But a new newspaper report has just come to my attention which fills out the scant narrative disclosed in the reports I had first comer across.

I reproduce here two stories in full. You will see they need no comments from me to show why such old news is new news in the present age, with its piped-in sewage of fake history, cherry-picked censored documentation and cooked statistics. We recognize in this musty old account a localized mid-1920s example of a phenomenon which is now international, namely MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way).

Be assured, the husband-killing syndicates, of which Club St. Lucretia is but one example among dozens, are unknown to 99.99% of all criminologists and to 100% of all gender studies experts. Documentation of the "disposable male" in philosophy and practice is very much regarded by today's professional historians as nothing but disposable history.

But I remain optimistic. A new generation of criminologists, predominantly women (Joni Johnson, Katherine Ramsland and Deborah Schurman-Kauflin and others), are rejecting the old practice of naïve reliance on social theories and chivalrous stereotypes and are now focusing on facts – including the fact that female serial killers are far, far more common than what the experts have hitherto supposed.

Headline: Club Of Women Poisoners Is Unearthed In Belgrade

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): Belgrade, Jugoslavia — A club of women poisoners under the guise of a charitable organization with the significant name of "Lucretia" has been raided by the police.

Police asserted that at secret meetings the club members were taught the medieval art of mixing and administering poisons. Six women who were unhappily married were declared thus to have found means of ridding themselves of their husbands. The remains of these were exhumed and in two cases toxicologists have found traces of poison. Five women of the club were charged with being the ringleaders of the organization and arrested.

Headline: Woman's Murder Society Forces Husbands From Town in Terror – Police in Jugoslavian Village Hold Modern Borgias on Charge of poisoning Rich Mates; News Causes Men to Break Engagements and Leave Families

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): Everybody in the little Jugoslavian town of Nagy Kikinda thought the women's club of Saint Lucretia was a very respectable society and above suspicion, until the number of deaths among the male population showed a striking increase which nobody could explain. Rumors arose. It was found that many of the men who died had been married to or were friends of women who were members of the Saint Lucretia club, that their deaths had been more or less unexpected and that there was a striking resemblance of the circumstances under which they took place.

Every one of the dead men had been wealthy and respected in the little community. Some of the widows spent more money than they had ever done before, purchased costly clothes, automobiles, and led the lives of grandes dames. When things had developed so far, somebody remembered that Saint Lucretia had a namesake who was one of the worst poisoners in history, namely Lucretia Borgia, the daughter of Pope Alexander VI [note: the name "Lucretia Borgia" had been synonymous with "female serial killer" until research in the mid-20th century showed that her homicidal reputation was based on legend, not fact] This stirred the suspicion that the women's club was not named after the saint, but after Lucretia Borgia, and that it really was a league of poisoners.

At first there was no absolute proof of these dreadful suspicions, but the police considered them sufficiently grave to arrest several of the members of the club, among them the ringleader, who disappeared when she smelled danger, but was so imprudent as to return to Nagy Kikinda because she believed her social position and that of her friends would be sufficient protection. Her husband was among the persons who died recently from a sudden illness.

The police had meanwhile found out that one of the women made frequent excursions abroad and supplied the necessary poison, which she obtained from chemists under some pretext or other. Naturally, the little town is in seething excitement and the scandal is great.

The unprecedented criminal affair had a tragic-comical result. The men of Nagy Kalinda have been caught by a general panic. None of them had ever thought of the faint possibility of an organization for the purpose of their removal by poison. Certainly not in their social circles. Who could still trust his wife or fiancée in such a depraved milieu? Thus it happened that numerous men left their families because they were not certain whether their wives were secret members of the Lucretia club. Engagements were dissolved, and new arrests are hourly expected. It will take women in Nagy Kikinda a long time to win back the confidence of the male part of the population.

Mark Zuckerberg, have you seen Rape Culture?

Isaac T. Quill · 7 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Mr Zuckerberg, can the film Rape Culture have it's own page please, or is Kiss My Ass a better option?

I don't do Farcebook(sic). I used to use it as part of project and community work, but myself and many others stopped due to Farcebook having negative attitudes to client groups. That was 2008. I have created a new Farcebook account to carry out system and "Absurdity Testing".
"Absurdity Testing" is when a dumb human believes that a dumb machine can be programmed to be intelligent, and through basic assessment skills (the sort a that a 5-year-old child has) the Machine can be shown to be Dumb and the Human even Dumber!
As #FBrape has been such an issue, I had a look at one of my favourite terms "Rape Culture". There are so many Facebook pages with it in their title – from EndRapeCulture, Rape-Culture Opinion, and even Grapplers Against RapeCulture. I'm not at all sure what a "Grappler" is, but I get the impression it's Wrestlers being physically violent. They seem to think of it as some form of anti-oppressive practice believed to stop rape via threat and actual violence – which simply is not allowed under Facebook Community Standards. It is odd.
As I looked I spotted something – It's the opening credits for a film I know well: "Rape Culture"™ The Movie. The big red arrow is a hint.

So I Clicked and found that apparently "Rape Culture"™ The Movie is acceptable on facebook – they are using the Wikipedia page on the subject.

Quick as a flash, I went to the bottom of the page and clicked on Create Page – selected me options and typed in "Rape Culture"!

I was then advised in red letters that the name "Rape Culture" is not allowed. The automated systems have been programmed to reject it.

I had a think and decided it was just "Rape Culture" that was the issue so tried again with "Rape Culture The Movie" but that also resulted in more red letters. I tried multiple permutations including I despise rape and want to save Virgins – but it soon became clear that any new page with the word rape in it is BANNED.

I had so hoped to be able to bring accurate knowledge to facebook, and was even wondering about a facebook page for the film, linking to people who were there – people such as Lorretta Ross – amazing lady who spoke about her involvement during extensive interviews. Wouldn't that be something, for students to be able to see the connections and deal with real history, to talk to people who were there and not get some crsurty and even false tale from a textbook and bad tutor. Even the film makers are on facebook Cambridge Documentary Films, Inc. They even have the film on their own facebook page.

So you can imagine my frustration and being of celtic blood I swore in Gaelic – and as I swore I typed it out only to find that I can have a facebook page called Kiss My Ass – or Pog ma thoin!

So that got me wondering about Kiss My Ass in English, but apparently that's fine too!

At this point it was clear that the Absurdity testing could progress to a higher level at which point I was told that having a page title "Screw Me With A Six Inch Wang" was fine too.

So it's clear that Facebook have decided to simply ban rape.
Violence to prevent rape is fine, as is multicultural swearing and Kissing Of Ass. You can even get Porno with a Six Inch Wang… but Farce-book no longer allows Legitimate Knowledge and networking of anything that deals with the word rape. Even History is not allowed due to Herstory having precedence.
If I was CEO at Farce-book I'd fire the humans who can't program reality, only fantasy and stupidity that can be uncovered by a prank that a five year old can pull.
Farce-book pass "Absurdity Testing" at grade A++ when really the only grade you want for that is the Biggest F-you ever seen.

Finding some feminists annoying = kitten killer

Glen Poole · 7 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm sure I'm not the only one around these parts who finds some "violence against women" campaigners deeply annoying.

It's an odd thing to confess to the uninitiated listener. Try telling someone who isn't familiar with the world of men's issues that you find people who campaign to stop violence against women annoying and they'll look at you like you just said "I kill kittens".

So, for fear of being labelled an "evil kitty killer" I'm going to explain exactly why I find some violence against women campaigners deeply annoying as if you're completely new to the subject.

I was very kindly reminded of just how annoying I find some "violence against women" campaigners by a couple of twitterers who decided to shove their unwanted opinions up my twitter feed without my consent this week. I'll share the exchange in a moment but first let's get a few things straight for anyone who's in any doubt about whether or not I kill kittens.

First things first, when I say I find some "violence against women" campaigners annoying, please note the very purposeful use of the word "some". I don't find them all annoying. I haven't met them all and I am prepared to gamble that there are some that I wouldn't find annoying at all.

However, from personal experience, I do find some of them deeply annoying.

Secondly, I'm not opposed to people working to end violence against women – I think ending violence against all people, including women, is a highly desirable objective. I'd love to live in a world free from violence and clearly we can't reach that visionary end-goal without ending violence against women. So I'm not saying that campaigning to end violence against women – as an objective – is in any way wrong, bad or annoying.

Thirdly, I'm not even saying that some people who campaign against violence against women ARE annoying. You can't objectively measure how annoying someone is, as the annoyance lives outside of them; it's in other people's subjective worlds. So I take full responsibility for the fact that my emotional response to some people who campaign to stop violence against women is the temporary and fleeting feeling of being annoyed.

It's a bit like the experience you have when a fly buzzes in your ear – you experience a momentary feeling of annoyance – you may even try and swat the fly – and then the feeling of annoyance passes and you get on with your life. This may make you a fly swatter, but it certainly doesn't make you a kitten killer.

So in summary, I'm all for ending violence against everyone (including women) and there are some people who campaign against violence against women whom I find annoying in the way that most people find a fly buzzing in their ear annoying and, for the avoidance of doubt, I've never killed a kitten in my life.

So why do I find people who have such a desirable objective annoying? It's really simple if you look at it like this: Imagine if someone set up a campaign to "end violence against kittens" and then insisted that the only way to stop this cruelty was for everyone to view the world from a Roman Catholic perspective, and to minimize and deny cruelty to any other cute animals, and in particular ignore or excuse any kind of violence committed by cats against other animals.

If you did pretend to be all about ending violence against kittens, but in reality you were on a mission to convert the world to Roman Catholicism, I think I'd find that a bit annoying, particularly if you argued against anyone else trying to approach the issue of violence against animals from a non Roman Catholic perspective.

And this is why I find some "violence against women" campaigners annoying: it's because in reality, they seem to be more interested in pushing a feminist worldview in my face and arguing against people who would like to tackle violence in all its forms from a non-feminist perspective.

It's my considered view that if we want to tackle violence, which is a problem as old as humanity, then it's going to take lots of people from lots of different viewpoints to work together to do it. The act of religiously pushing your own personal viewpoint on others mirrors the forceful aggression of violence and so learning that there's more than one way of looking at the world seems to me to be an essential lesson to learn for anyone committed to tackling violence.

Having said all that, I'd like to share with you how one "violence against women" campaigner forced his views on me via twitter this week.
It all started when I tweeted a link to an article by a man who co-founded a pro-feminist fatherhood think tank in the UK in the 1990s. His name is Jack O'Sullivan and he wrote a comment piece in The Guardian, a left-wing newspaper that probably references "patriarchy" and "misogyny" more than any other UK media outlet. What made this article worthy of retweeting is that it highlighted the problem with misandry and matriarchy, and so I sent this comment out into the twittersphere:

- Latest installment in the masculinity debate @guardian it's all about matriarchy and misandry – great article –http://tinyurl.com/nja9zd4

What came back over the The Atlantic and across the social web was a tweet by a man called Jacob Oppenheimer who it turns out is the co-ordinator at something called The Men's Anti-Violence Council (MAC). MAC is a is a volunteer group at the University of Iowa housed in the Women's Resource and Action Center.
He tweeted:

- i disagree. power paradox is a real experience for men but it's from patriarchal concepts of power. Not matriarchal.

I didn't know who Jacob was at this point but it was clear from his language that he was a pro-feminist and if he wasn't going to consider a fellow pro-feminist's writings about matriarchy and misandry, then I decided there was no point a non-feminist like me even trying to have a conversation with him. So I decided to reject his advances.
I tweeted back:

- I'm not interested in people who disagree with other men's lived experiences of misandry and matriarchy thank you

If you don't know, "lived experience" is a feminist concept that validates the subjective experience of those who belong to a minority or oppressed group – unless of course that subjective experience goes against the party line. So if I say for example that as a member of a minority group in conversations about violence against women my subjective "lived experienced" is one of being suffocated by ideology and hated as a man and as an advocate for men, that "lived experience" wouldn't be validated, it would be denied and argued against. As such, it's not a phrase I generally use unless I'm challenging a feminist thinker to treat men equally and validate men's subjective experience of inequality, unfairness, discrimination and oppression.
At this stage in the conversation another man called Robert Fuller, an atheist campaigner from Omaha tweeting as @aparticularA, joined in, saying:

- At best, you had an experience not typical of trend. More likely you've severely misjudged reality.

Which was kind of amusing because Robert was himself misjudging reality as I hadn't said anything about my own experience, just shared someone else's article. I tend not to bother sharing stuff with people who don't validate men's personal experience if it contradicts their gender politics, it's one of the reasons "men don't talk." So I tweeted back:

- it's written by co-founder of pro-fem thinktank. u know his lived experience better than he does?

To which Robert responded:

- If he thinks matriarchy is a real problem, then yeah, I know better than he.

And Jacob backed him up saying:

- Agreed w @aparticularA, @HelpingMen I'm sorry you & author had bad exp with wmn, but we may have to agre to dsgre about def of oppression……..further, systemic oppression and privilege exists whether you experience them or not.

Which again was very bizarre as I hadn't said anything about women, systemic oppression or privilege. So having spent no time finding out about my supposedly all-important "lived experience," Jacob the "violence against women" campaigner was now telling me what my "lived experience" was.
Again, as this was a man who clearly wasn't interesting in listening to the experiences of other men he didn't agree with, but desperately wanted to be heard, I gave him the opportunity to consider why his viewpoint wasn't getting through to me, saying:

- Who should I listen to. An expert who set up a Fatherhood Think Tank or 2 twitter trolls. Gee, tough decision!

Robert came back with:

- Anyone can found something and call it a 'think tank'"

…a comment which comes straight from the "you smell" school of intelligent debate, while Jacob did that weird thing when people pretend to apologize but aren't actually saying sorry for something that they've said or done, but are in fact telling you that they're upset about something that you've done. He said:

- I'm sorry you think Im a troll.

There it is. Watch out for that little linguistic trick if you're ever caught in an argument with someone who's pretending to be reasonable but in fact telling you that your opinion is completely invalid and you are 100% wrong. He wasn't sorry for being a troll or reflecting on his behaviour and acknowledging how I had the experience of being trolled by him, no he was personally upset by my assessment of his behaviour. I continued:

- I think #healthymasculinities convos have multpl POVs that are liberatory 4 all….. I have seen too many men attack other men for talking about their own #masculinities as well to not speak out

Now personally, as nobody would dare say that conversations about "healthy femininities" or "healthy homosexualities" or "healthy blacknesses" were "liberatory" for women, gay people and black people—I personally find the idea of "healthy masculinities" conversations facilitated by pro-feminists with a political agenda to be oppressive and discriminatory. So I simply said:

- This isn't a conversation it's u pushing ideology & invalidating other men's personal experiences. Go away

At which point, having thrust his unwanted views into my twitter feed, Jacob turned himself into a victim and me into a perpetrator, with this tweet:

- Again, we shall agree to disagree. Our goals of @healthymasculinities are similar but I refused to be bullied…..

Wow, so now Jacob's "lived experience" is that I am a big, mean, kitten killing perpetrator who is bullying him and he's the plucky survivor who is refusing to be oppressed by my bullying behaviour. So I turned the tables and decided that in my "lived experience" it was me who was the poor victim and Jacob the evil perpetrator, saying:

- Go away you are forcing your opinion on me and it's not wanted – no means no Jacob – STOP!

And then Rupert concluded the exchange with three magical words of twitter gold:

- Boo Fucking Hoo.

While none of this pointless exchange is worth taking seriously it does reveal something: Jacob runs an organisation that claims to promote healthy masculinity and appropriate male behaviour with the aim of preventing violence. And yet Jacob wasn't interested to find out if I was beaten by an auntie or sexually abused by a female teacher or falsely accused by a girlfriend or emotionally abused by a female partner or institutionally abused by the sexist system of family law.
He had no interest in my "lived experience" and sought only to force his ideological viewpoint on me, invalidate the experience of other men, make up stories about my own experience and label me a perpetrator.

I didn't invite Jacob to enter into dialogue as from his opening salvo he didn't seem to be ready to have an adult conversation with me. When he is ready, I'd ask if he'd like to talk about ways to end violence against men, women (and kittens) by allowing space for people of lots of different perspectives to work towards the common goal of ending violence, without us all having to convert to feminism in the process.

What I find annoying about some people who say they are campaigning to end violence against women is that whenever I enter their world I am in a minority as a non-feminist thinker and my "lived experience" as they say, as a member of a minority group that dares to think differently, is one of being oppressed and opposed by people who say they are all about ending violence when in reality it seems, they're more concerned with converting people to feminist thinking.

I find this behaviour deeply annoying, this is my "lived experience" and saying so doesn't make me a kitten killer.

GWW at New York Libertarian Convention

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 7 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

With permission we are pleased to bring you the transcript of the speech delivered by Karen Straughan to the New York State Libertarian Convention of 2013. It should be noted, however, that the publishing of this article does not reflect an endorsement of Libertarian politics or the Libertarian Party., PE

Hi, everyone. Firstly, I want to thank Gary for inviting me to speak here, and thank all of you for being open to the different perspective I'm hoping to present to you.

Some of you–maybe all of you–might be asking yourselves, what on earth is an anti-feminist gender theorist doing speaking at a libertarian party convention. What the heck does gender, or feminism, have to do with libertarian politics and philosophies? The answer to that question is at once extremely complex, and very, very simple.

The simple answer is this: Gender influences everything. Including the size, scope and decisions of government.

And now, to complicate things a little.

On the microscale, gender affects the way men and women think, how they feel, how they process their interactions with the world, what motivates them, what influences them, what is important to them, what incentives are going to affect their behavior, and how. It affects how we perceive other people depending on whether they are male or female. It impacts on what we feel is appropriate, regarding both the behaviors, responsibilities and roles we expect of others, and the behaviors, responsibilities and roles we feel are appropriate for ourselves. It affects what roles and vocations, on average, a given person will find themselves suited to or interested in.

On the macroscale, gender affects the way society feels about people, depending on whether they're male or female, what expectations society has of them, what obligations society is prepared to place on them, how, and how much, society cares about them. It influences whose voices society is prepared to trust on what issues and in what situations. It affects society's willingness to punish or forgive, who society is interested in holding responsible and accountable for wrongs done, who society is prepared to devote resources to help or protect, and who society is prepared to cut loose.

So gender is kind of a shortcut societies and governments use when sorting priorities. Who is deserving of our help, support and protection–socially, legally and governmentally–and who is less deserving, or perhaps not deserving at all? How should that help be implemented, and how should it not, how much are we willing to spend, and how much institutional power and scope should government have to involve itself in the lives of citizens?

To demonstrate these effects of gender I'm talking about, I'm going to make a few statements, and I want you all to pay attention to how you feel when I say them. They're statements I've culled from published books, newspapers, or the speeches of politicians, though you'll notice I've flipped the genders for effect:

Men can do anything women can. And do it better. And do it with one hand tied behind their backs. –Barack Obama

When a woman strikes a man, she strikes all of society. –Hillary Clinton said exactly that about violence against women.

Women CAN stop false allegations of abuse and rape. –The "Men can stop rape" poster campaign is making an appearance on campuses across the US and Canada.

It cannot be assumed that women are bound to be an asset to family life, or that the presence of mothers in families is necessarily a means to social cohesion. –This gem, about how unnecessary fathers are, is from UK equalities minister Harriet Harman. She might be forgiven this sentiment if it wasn't grossly inaccurate.

A mall roof caved in yesterday, killing 23 people and injuring more than 100. Tragically 4 men and one child were among the dead. –all right, that's from any newspaper story about any tragedy. We hear about women and children because that makes a tragedy more tragic.

I want to see a woman beaten to a bloody pulp with a workboot shoved into her mouth like an apple in the mouth of a pig. –Change woman to man and workboot to high heel, and you've got second wave feminist Andrea Dworkin's attitude.

Or even this: "It is an amazing thing to see in our city the husband of a laundress, or a fishwife, or a housemaid dressed in velvet with chains of gold at the throat, with silver buckles and boots of good value….and then in contrast to see his wife washing the clothes, chapped and bedraggled from the day's labor, poorly dressed…. but whosoever considers this carefully will find it reasonable, because it is necessary that the gentleman, even if low born and humble, be arrayed in such fine form for his natural excellence and dignity, and the woman be less adorned as if a slave, or a little ass, born to his service." –And this is perhaps the most interesting of all, since a gender-flipped version of it was written by Lucrezia Marinella, and published in her book "The nobility and excellence of woman and the defects and vices of men" in the year 1600.

Feels kind of weird, doesn't it? These are statements you would NEVER hear or read in mainstream culture as I changed them–not even in the year 1600–some of them because they'd be repulsive to us, and others because it would just never occur to us to think or feel in those ways. All because of the way we as humans perceive, and have always perceived, men and women.

And while feminism claims to have worked very hard to dismantle all of these individual and society-wide assumptions about men and women, if you scratch the surface of their ideologies and their efforts, what you find is all of those assumptions human societies have always held, dialed up to 11. Not only has feminist activism manipulated and exploited all of these age-old perceptions about gender, for political, legal, economic and social gain, it has only amplified them in the cultural zeitgeist.

It is very much a case of, "Say hello to the new boss, even more sexist than the old boss."

I've been asked before to describe what exactly I'm doing with my blogging and video lectures and it's a difficult question to answer. I'm an advocate for the issues of men and boys, certainly, but first and foremost, I'm an anti-feminist. My task, as I see it, is to try to uncover the nature of things, and then deprogram as many people as I can. To encourage people to think from a different angle, to entertain thoughts that are forbidden in our politically correct culture, to educate as many as I can about the hidden nature of society, gender and ideological feminism. Among those of us who talk about these issues, it's called "taking the red pill".

As for why I'm here, hoping to convince libertarians to think from that different angle? Well, there's a strong libertarian streak that runs right through the center of the men's movement, and there's definitely a reason for that. Canadian libertarian philosopher Stefan Molyneux once described feminism as "socialism in panties."

As I'm sure any of the men here will attest to, anything, no matter how destructive or unprincipled, is probably going to look more appealing and less sinister if it has a female face and you put it in a pair of panties.

I'm not going to bore you with a detailed history of the marriage of feminism and marxism. For that, I'll refer any who are interested to a lengthy but fascinating lecture by Soviet ex-patriot Valdas Anelauskas, who describes a courtship between two ideologies that began in the mid-1800s and has now become the foundation of feminist thought. I will simply note that Karl Marx, in his communist manifesto, emphasized how very important women would be to any communist revolution, and that the best way to secure the support of women would be to convince them of the plural nature of their oppression–as workers, they were oppressed by the elites, and as women, they were oppressed by their husbands, fathers and even sons. In essence, he posited that if a system that respected the concept of property rights oppressed the male worker, this same system that placed economic authority in the hands of men doubly oppressed the wives and daughters of those male workers.

Though radical feminism has never severed its ties with communism, as early as the 1920s, feminism had essentially co-opted and repurposed Marxist theory to describe the structure of society relating to the interaction of the sexes. The intellectual backlash against feminism that began within the marxist community around the turn of the 20th century, with E Belfort Bax and Robert Briffault, was quashed through intimidation, censorship and skilful use of emotionally charged propaganda.

By the 1960s, when the western world's love affair with communism had begun to fizzle, communism's red-headed stepdaughter, feminism, was only growing in popularity. The sexier, less threatening, more benign-seeming Trojan Mare upon which Marxists had relied to sneak their ideology past the gates of the western world had outgrown its help meet role, and taken on a life of its own.

By this era, a discrete and quintessentially Marxist theoretical model of gender had become entrenched in the intellectual sphere, a model based on class conflict theory and postmodern discourse. While communist thought was confined to a small pocket of what the mainstream mostly thought of as misguided weirdos, feminist thought, slapped together from the exact same bricks and mortar, became not only fashionable, but had spawned its own branch of academia, sponsored and enabled by unwitting democratic governments across the west.

While historical views on the sexes had maintained that men and women were distinctly different but complementary partners–role mates, as Dr Warren Farrell has described it–this new feminist model cast all aspects of society as oppressive and exploitative systems wherein men embodied the Bourgeoisie, and women the Proletariat.
Most of this model–The Patriarchy–and its sub-theories are little more than post hoc rationalizations based on emotional reasoning, easily swallowed by the well-meaning public because of the evidence that stands out most starkly to us given our natural, evolved views of gender. Humans have always been more emotionally reactive to the harms, injuries, injustices, complaints and perils affecting women, and more likely to see women as nurturing, benign, kind, well-meaning and deserving of protection. We have always been more likely to see men as strong, sturdy, capable of self-sufficiency, potent and potentially threatening, and these perceptions inform our reactions when men suffer harms, injuries, injustices and dangers, and when they dare to complain about them.
Because of these innate perceptions, when feminists pointed up toward the top of society and showed us mostly men, we didn't bother to direct our attention down to the bottom of society so we could see the mostly men there, as well. We all saw a glass ceiling, but not a glass cellar, and allowed feminists to convince us that all aspects of society, the formalized and the informal, were male-dominated and male-controlled, and that women, as a class, were utterly powerless and subjugated under this system.
Marriage was redefined under this model, from a partnership where both parties contributed and benefitted, to a form of sexual slavery and unpaid drudgery for women where wives were subjugated and exploited for their husbands' express benefit. Under second wave feminism, family was reinterpreted as an institution based on exploitation–instead of all members working together for the benefit and shared success of all members, women were recast as powerless subordinates, providing unreciprocated labor toward the raising of HIS children, and the keeping of HIS house, labor that freed husbands to pursue economic and social power outside the home.
It didn't matter that most men had little more access to economic and social power than most women, or that what power men achieved they were expected to share equitably with their families. Feminists were too busy pointing upward at the congressmen, bank managers and CEOs and crying injustice, to show us the taxi drivers, garbage men, plumbers, loggers, fishermen, miners, construction workers, factory laborers, field workers, roughnecks and janitors. They envied the power of generals and statesmen, but spared no thought for the thousands of young footsoldiers dead in the trenches. They were jealous of the self-determination that made an industrialist rich beyond dreaming, but when that self-determination produced a different outcome for the mostly male population of tramps, beggars and hobos it was invisible to them.
They focus solely on the men above and don't even notice the men below.
The 23 cent average, apples to oranges, annual wage gap is STILL, in their minds, the height of sexist injustice, but the greater than 90% workplace death gap is…well, who cares?
Traditional ways of providing for and protecting women that were necessary in the pre-industrial past, were reinterpreted by feminism as male oppressors keeping women down all through history, for men's benefit.
Domestic violence–a social problem that has ALWAYS been gender-symmetrical–became synonymous with violence against women. A husband's historical right to conjugal relations was redefined as marital rape, while a wife's identical right–one that for centuries if denied was legal grounds for divorce and could even get a man excommunicated from his church–that part of history was essentially erased from modern scholarship, even as it is upheld and reinforced by feminist activism. In fact, according to current feminist theories on domestic violence, a man withholding sex or affection from his female partner, whatever the reason, is a form of domestic abuse, and a man in France was recently required by a judge to pay his ex-wife over $10,000 in punitive damages because he didn't give her enough sex during the marriage.
The traditional obligation of a woman to defer to her husband's authority was defined as "oppression", but her husband's obligation to die in a trench to protect his country and family…that became "male privilege" and when enough people protested the hubris of that assertion, it became "Patriarchy hurts men too."
Under The Patriarchy, all men are privileged by their maleness, and all women oppressed by their femaleness. And if men are, as a class, the privileged Bourgeoisie, if men hold collective power over society, then all men are culpable for the oppression and exploitation of all members of the female Proletariat, and any discrimination a man might face in society is just his own privilege backfiring on him.

According to radical feminists, the drastic technological and economic changes that occurred during the last century–medical advances that virtually eliminated deaths in childbirth and drastically decreased infant and child mortality rates, changes that rendered the workplace as comfortable and safe as your living room, safe and reliable birth control, industrialization, automation, prosperity, plenty and an unprecedented level of individual security–none of this has anything to do with anything. Even prior to those changes, during a history in which a woman might spend half her adult life pregnant or nursing children, where most labor was gruelling, dangerous and simply beyond the physical capabilities of women, where life was often brutal and brief, and where men bore a legally enforceable obligation to provide for the material needs of all family members, the fact that men bore the economic authority as well as all the economic burdens of a family was a system specifically designed to disempower women.

According to radical feminists, your grandfathers and great grandfathers were rapists and slave-masters who exploited, subjugated and violated the women who were nearest and dearest to them–their own mothers, sisters, wives and daughters. According to radical feminists, every atrocity ever committed throughout all of history can be laid at the door of normative masculinity, but every male-generated advance–calculus, alternating current, the telegraph, the transistor, radio, penicillin, the number system, hydro-electricity, microwaves, fiberglass, the theory of relativity, the periodic table, trigonometry, insulin, canned foods, vaccines, fire retardant, teflon, wireless communications, the microchip, the birth control pill and even tampons–is a result of men intentionally holding women back, keeping women down, refusing to allow women to achieve, and hogging all the power and glory.

You see how this all works? All the evils of history, admittedly committed mostly by men are evidence of men's oppressive natures. And all the advances of civilization, because they were generated almost exclusively by men, are equally evidence of men's oppressive natures. Even the exceptional and wonderful things men achieved that have benefitted all of us, are not evidence that men embody anything good. In fact, they demonstrate the opposite. They are evidence that the "old boys' club" modern feminists complain about today dates all the way back to the pleistocene, when women would have eagerly hunted mastodon with babies strapped to their breasts, and carved back a jungle filled with leopards and bears, if only men had not enslaved them and thereby deprived them of the opportunity to do so.

This is what they believe. This is what ideological feminism IS. It describes women's experience through all of history as identical to the experience of blacks under slavery. You know, actual oppression, subordination and exploitation without any compensatory benefit.

To clarify, what were the "upsides" to being black in America during slavery? Can anyone here name a single white slave owner who ever died to save the lives of his black slaves? Who ever gave up a space in a lifeboat to his black slave and chose himself to go down with a ship? Who ever stood with a rifle between his black slaves and an enemy to defend their lives, rather than his right to own them?

Can anyone even imagine a white slave owner working 16 hours in a field while his black slave stayed inside most of the day and kept his house tidy, then coming home and sharing the fruits of his labors with his black slave?

Did a black woman who was the sexual partner of a white slave owner have any expectation of respect, lifelong provision or shelter, or of sharing the benefits of his quality of life and his social status? Or was she just an object of the moment, free to be used and cast aside at will? Did a black man who was obligated to obey his owner's wife have any legal right or recourse when she pointed a finger and claimed he raped her? Or was he swinging from a tree within hours?

Can anyone imagine a reality where a white slave owner would perform physically grueling or dangerous work because his black slave was incapable of it? Or would he simply set more slaves to the task, or work his slave to his death, or discard his used-up slave and buy a better one? If women were truly oppressed by men, would they have been spared the most onerous and dangerous work because they were less physically capable of it, or would men have simply assigned more women to the task?

Can anyone here name a single black person, man or woman, who rose to a state-sanctioned position of serious political power during slavery? Off the top of my head, I can name a ton of women who have been heads of state, going as far back as Ancient Egypt. The greatest and most notable black leaders emerging from Jim Crow America and apartheid South Africa rose to influence by opposing the government, not rising within it, because they had no avenue to power within a system that oppressed them.

Slavery and oppression are defined as obligation and disadvantage without compensatory benefit. Does anyone here think women, who were a tiny minority, tenths of a percent, among the 10 million military personnel who died during WWI, derived no benefit from the traditional system? Heck, one of the few ways a man could duck conscription was to be married–a man could literally avoid mandatory military service if his wife would be inconvenienced by it. And yet this system existed to benefit men at the expense of women?A system of top-down oppression, according to feminists, that is no different from the experience of blacks under slavery?

If you perceive the history of gender relations as being remotely similar to the history of slavery in the US, it's no shock to hear feminist Robin Morgan, editor of Ms. Magazine, claim, "Man-hating is an honorable and viable political act. The oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them."

Yet as childish, simplistic and absurd as this model was, it wasn't long before it had become firmly entrenched in academia, in the humanities and the arts–in sociology, anthropology, psychology, history, women's studies and gender studies, the very faculties and programs associated with education, social work, journalism, the law and political science. The very branches of society most able to influence public perception. And because of all those things I was talking about at the beginning of this presentation, public perception was vulnerable to the half-truths presented to it, disguised as the whole picture.

And the really awesome thing about this model is that as long as enough people believe it, even just a little, as long as enough people can be convinced to see men as the Bourgeoisie who have always unjustly benefitted from their exploitation of women, and women as the Proletariat who have always been forced to toil and slave without benefit under the boot-heel of those privileged men, you can justify anything.

If men are believed to have always collectively held power and economic privilege through the enslavement of women, if all of men's authority since the dawn of time was ill-gotten through the unreciprocated exploitation and violation of women, then women are entirely justified in stealing it back, and the state is justified in assisting them. It becomes acceptable, justified and appropriate for women to expropriate men's undeserved and unearned power by any means necessary, including state coercion.

And this attitude is not confined to family law, domestic violence law and sexual assault law–the primary areas where men's interests conflict with women's interests, and where the state has been quietly at work, eroding due process protections and equal treatment under the law, and building bloated and ravenous mechanisms that suck up dollars and power while curtailing civil liberties. It's everywhere. It informs economic and employment policy, health spending, criminal law, everything.

According to Dr Warren Farrell, the government has passed more laws to protect women in the workplace from dirty jokes than it has to protect men from injury and death due to faulty rafters on construction sites. And nearly everyone in society, especially women, seems to feel this is an appropriate allocation of resources.

One need only watch the Life of Julia, Obama's most naked and blatant appeal to the natures of women–especially young, single women. Julia has no father, and no husband–she needs neither of those things. The state will take care of her needs from birth to death, and will support her when she decides to have a child of her own–a child that, in Obama's narrative, is also fatherless. The man in Julia's life, the one who will perform the roles–provision, protection, support–historically performed by husbands, brothers and fathers, is more powerful than any man she'll ever meet, more able to provide for her, and one she need make no compromises with.

Julia will never have to pick up this man's dirty socks, or put up with him snoring or farting in bed, or consider his needs, or provide him with respect, love or affection. He is the ultimate provider and the ultimate protector, and he will ask nothing of her in return but her vote.

And he'll give her all those benefits through a system that coerces net taxpayers and net tax-generators, of whom a disproportionate number are men, to surrender their productivity while offering them neither mutual benefit nor voluntary association. This feels right and just to feminists, because the state is merely assisting Julia in stealing back what was wrongfully taken from women, as a class, by men, as a class. This feels like a great deal to Julia, since all she has done is replace a man with whom she would be required to bargain freely, with a state that provides her all the same benefits without the messy business of having to trade anything valuable for them.

If women today in the west can be said to be married to the state, in a very real sense, men are married to it as well, and the obligations expected of them are the same as they always have been. In this marriage, men pay at least 75% of the tax revenue into the system, and reap a disproportionately tiny percentage of its protections and benefits. In this marriage, the state enforces the obligations of husbandhood after divorce, and the obligations of fatherhood even when men did not consent to become fathers, and even when they are allowed no meaningful role in the lives of their children.
In this marriage, the resources men put in are diverted toward the additional protection of women through the erosion of men's legal protections and civil rights. In this marriage, men are expected to pay for a system that not only does not serve them, that not only offers nothing back to them, that has not only made a mockery of due process protections for them, but one that even handicaps their ability to perform these obligations by favoring women in the prioritization of education and employment, and by facilitating the removal of fathers from the lives of children who need them.
The state is, essentially, forcing men to finance a system that disenfranchises them. And the state is, essentially, paying women to disenfranchise men, and handicap their own children. Social responsibility is enforced on men through penalty of imprisonment, while for women, social irresponsibility means a check in the mail every month.
A lot of people have wondered aloud why there aren't more female libertarians. If there's a reason, it might lie in a lack of incentive. Big government costs the vast majority of men–their wealth, their civil liberties, their autonomy, sometimes their freedom–but for most women, big government represents an insurance policy and a perpetual subsidy of their personal choices, good or bad. Men pay, women benefit.
If women sprinted down the aisle to offer their hands in marriage to the state, for men, it was a shotgun wedding, coercive by its very nature. And the influence of radical ideological feminism on government and legal policy has ensured that this marriage is as abusive as they come.
When Gary told me about his experiences with family court and its affiliated agencies, I told him, "If you weren't a libertarian before all of this, I can certainly see why you're one now." What used to be a voluntarily accepted obligation on the part of men, is now extracted from them at the point of a gun, and often there is no way for them, no matter how well they comply, to avoid being shot.
One example of what men's tax dollars disproportionately support, which lies in direct opposition to the interests and rights of men, would be the institutionalization of the Duluth Model of Domestic Violence.
This model is the feminist conceptual framework of family violence, and it is one that has been discredited by hundreds of studies across cultures–from the most modern western democracies to countries like Jordan and Namibia. According to Duluth, family violence is overwhelmingly male-perpetrated, and is motivated by men's and women's relative positions in society–by male social and political dominance and the expectation of female subordination. A man who batters his wife is not just asserting his dominance over her, he is expressing normalized masculinity. Abuse and coercive control of women, according to this model, is a not a pathology, but a natural function of male identity within a Patriarchal culture. Simply put, it's just what men do.
Every piece of legislation, every government policy and every publicly funded treatment program in the US regarding family violence, and the vast majority of them worldwide, employs this conceptual model.
Too bad it's bunk. As hundreds of studies demonstrate, in at least half of cases, partner violence is reciprocal. It involves men and women hitting each other, and what motivates men and women is pretty much the same: anger, poor conflict resolution skills, jealousy, a desire to control or discipline a partner, drug and alcohol problems, and external stress such as poverty. Women are as likely as men to report abusing their partners for all these reasons, and are more likely to engage in coercive control of a partner. More than that, they are more likely to be the one to initiate physical violence, and in cases of severe unilateral abuse against a non-violent partner, women are the perpetrators up to 70% of the time.
For every 8 women seriously injured by domestic violence, at least 5 men are also seriously injured. And perhaps most damningly, considering feminism's unwillingness to address women's perpetration of violence, the number one predictor of serious domestic violence injury in women is their own initiation of violence. It is when men are hitting them BACK that women are most likely to be hurt.

What all this means is that patriarchal terrorism–the Duluth model of intimate partner violence–is the most rare form of all–and yet the patriarchal terrorism paradigm informs all of our government funded mechanisms for intervention and treatment.
But it doesn't end there.
At least 35% of spousal murders are men murdered by their female partners. I say at least, because if a woman engages a hitman, boyfriend or relative to assist her in murdering her male partner, it is classified statistically not as spousal homicide, but as multiple-perpetrator homicide. Because of this, there is no way to know how many men are killed by their female partners each year.
More than this, women are the most likely demographic to perpetrate child abuse and neglect, even controlling for time spent with children, and the majority of young children murdered are murdered by their mothers. Biological fathers are, in contrast, the least likely demographic to abuse or kill young children, less likely than both biological mothers and stepfathers.
Statistically, the environment in which a woman is MOST safe from violence is in a stable marriage, and the environment in which children are the MOST safe from violence is one in which their parents are in a stable marriage.
Yet our entire system of family law, and our entire response to domestic violence, from the VAWA to local police department policies, is designed to encourage and facilitate divorce, to favor sole maternal custody arrangements, and to protect children from the very people least likely to abuse them.
Mandatory arrest policies coupled with predominant aggressor policies based on Duluth, ensure that 1) somebody gets arrested in any domestic violence incident, and 2) that regardless of who was assaulting whom, the person arrested will almost always be the larger, stronger, male partner.
A judge in Florida recently estimated that 80% of all temporary restraining orders granted in the context of divorce or child custody cases, requested almost entirely by women, are either fraudulent or unfounded. Divorce lawyers have called false allegations of domestic violence and sexual abuse of children, and the abuse of TROs merely part of the "gamesmanship" of divorce–a method by which a wife can secure automatic custody of both the children and the marital home, and leave an ex-partner scrambling to defend himself often without access to necessary documents or even a change of clothes. The average length of time it takes for a woman to obtain a TRO in an ex parte hearing is under 3 minutes. She need provide no evidence of prior abuse. All she has to tell the judge is that she feels afraid of her husband. The first any man might hear that such an order has been issued is when the police arrive to remove him from his home.
The advantages to a woman of abusing the system are many and myriad, and the disadvantages virtually nil. By the time a man has cleared his name, the children are often completely alienated from him. Family court judges will go so far as to admit that a mother has abused her own children through her abuse of process, but will hesitate to penalize her in any way. She will almost always retain custody because it would harm the children to place them in the care of a man they've been wrongly taught to hate and fear. Because she retains custody, if she's prosecuted, the children will suffer. If she's financially penalized in the divorce settlement, the children will suffer. If she's forced to pay him damages, the children will suffer. In some extreme cases, judges have completely, permanently stripped a man's rights and access to his children, explaining that the mother's persistent combativeness, false accusations and abuse of process had made it so that upholding that man's parental rights would only subject the children to more of their mother's abuse.
And while not every woman is going to take advantage of a system weaponized specifically for her use, the ex-wife of a friend of mine recently told him she was proud that she'd never availed herself of such measures during their divorce, despite three court-appointed officials encouraging her to make a false claim of domestic violence and thereby gain the upper hand in the process.
Feminist models of gender and domestic violence have institutionalized the assumption that all men are batterers or potential batterers, that dominating, controlling and abusing their female partners and their children is just part of what it means to be a man. They've institutionalized an assumption of non-culpability on the part of women even when they openly abuse their husbands, ex-husbands and children, and even when they use the court system to do it.

In 85% of divorce cases in the US, mothers receive primary physical custody. The remaining 15% represent sole paternal, and shared physical custody arrangements. The average cost to a man in a contested custody battle in the US is over $200, 000. It can take up to six years of expensive court battles for a man to secure even regular access or shared custody, let alone primary physical custody. He may be required to pay his ex-partner's legal bills in addition to his own, and pay for the court-ordered assessments and services required for his case. Through this battle, he will also be required to pay maintenance to his ex-partner in the form of alimony and/or child support, and in some cases, even pay the fees of the third party required for supervised visitation with his children.
Is it any wonder that in the year following a family break-up, men are 11 times more likely to commit suicide than women?
According to the Michigan chapter of NOW, fathers' rights groups are an "abuser's lobby", and the official stance of the chapter is to oppose reforms that would normalize equal or near-equal shared custody after divorce if neither parent is unfit. They oppose these measures in part because it would put women and children in danger from abusive and controlling former spouses, and in part because it would have an unintended negative impact on child support awards. This, despite the oft-stated feminist claim that cultural assumptions that women are automatically better caregivers are sexist against women, and despite the fact that the environment in which a child is at the highest risk of suffering abuse is in the care of a single mother.
This is the influence of politicized ideological feminism in the areas of domestic violence and family law. And while society has always placed a greater priority on protecting women than men from violence and abuse, feminists have managed to rewrite history and public perception of human interaction, in order to justify ever more intrusive government mechanisms that protect women from even their own criminal behavior, and curtail the rights and civil liberties of the men who find themselves at the mercy of the system after having done nothing wrong.
Over the last 40 years, a growing number of researchers have challenged feminism's theory of gender conflict and the conceptual framework of Duluth. These researchers have been subjected to blacklisting, career sabotage, intimidation, professional shunning and even death threats. Family violence researcher Suzanne Steinmetz had a bomb threat called into her daughter's wedding. Erin Pizzey, the woman who established the first battered women's refuge in the world, lived for years under police protection due to threats to herself, her children and grandchildren, and finally fled the UK after her family dog was killed. All for daring to say that women are as violent as men within relationships, and that partner abuse is not a natural function of masculine identity, but a gender neutral social problem primarily caused by experience of abuse during childhood.
To prove women are not violent, feminists have engaged in campaigns of violence and threats, and to prove society is male-dominated, feminists have engaged in a pattern of malfeasance that has silenced all other voices, allowing feminism to remain the dominant authority in all gendered issues. And they evidently see no irony in any of that.
The fiscal, social and human costs of these policies are staggering. We treat every domestic violence accusation, indeed even the hint that a woman is afraid of her partner, with a better safe than sorry strategy that engages multiple bureaucracies. Taxpayers and beleaguered men pay thousands upon thousands of dollars for investigations, assessments, psychiatric evaluations, lawyers, expensive legal proceedings, incarcerations and prosecutions, a growing number of which end with the discovery that a woman was lying for revenge or for personal gain. Children are mercilessly fragged by combative mothers, deprived, often permanently, of what may be their only stable parent. Fathers are ground into the dust.
Intervention programs, run by government funded agencies, apply a single, ideologically tainted treatment to a multifaceted problem, "curing" citizens of diseases they don't have, while allowing their actual problems to fester untreated. Cumbersome legal procedures, no-drop policies, predominant aggressor policies, institutional, legal and informal biases, all contribute to a bill that is increasingly impossible for taxpayers to afford, and that is handicapping the ability of children–those future taxpayers who will be stuck with the growing mass of red ink generated by this system–to shoulder the debt.
Fatherless children–an epidemic of whom we are creating with these policies–are more prone to a whole host of social maladies. They are at two to ten times the risk of being physically or sexually abused, becoming teenage parents, dropping out of school, being behaviorally disordered, becoming involved in gangs, being addicted to alcohol or drugs, being expelled from school, committing suicide, not going to college, committing crimes, being incarcerated, requiring welfare or food stamps, contracting sexually transmitted diseases, and being victims of violence. In fact, if you control for fatherlessness, the race disparity in the US prison system all but vanishes.

If we're expecting our children to bail us out of the fiscal and human mess we're creating, we're in for a nasty surprise.
This is a problem of snowballing costs that will only worsen with each generation, as government gets more bloated and top-heavy while simultaneously crippling the ability of future generations to support it. It is a system where we examine the reading scores of 8 year old boys not to determine how to help boys stop falling behind in education, but to determine how many new prisons we need to build. It is a system wherein a man who is laid off and temporarily unable to pay his child support is systematically stripped of his driver's license and professional licenses, thrown in debtors' prison and saddled with a criminal record, rendering him permanently unable to pay it. Where we will metaphorically chop a man's arms off, and then tell him he'd better still shovel for all he's worth or he'll be sorry.
And behind all of this, you will find radical feminist lobbyists pushing for further "reforms" for women to undo millennia of oppression of women that never existed as they believe it did, and regardless of the collateral damage to other members of society. They do this in the name of "liberating" women from the oppression of their historical dependence on men, by constructing enormous government bureaucracies, ever-growing in power and scope, funded disproportionately by men, and upon which women in general have become just as dependent a they ever were on any man.
All for the purpose of "ending oppression", because, as we all know, no government anywhere has ever oppressed anyone.

So you think the age of heroes is over?

With a tip of the hat to James Huff, this is a must watch for anyone interested in a textbook example of non-violent resistance to coercion and tyranny. The video is lengthy and the sound is lacking in places, due to the nature of the recording. External speakers and some patience are suggested, but it is more than worth it to watch every second. From the video description:

This video was recorded on Sunday, May 26, 2013. It is completely unedited. I (Caleb Leverett) uploaded the video to YouTube the very same day, but kept it set to private until June 6, 2013.

I am Parker's dad, father, biological father, Daddy and guy who cut his umbilical cord. This video was recorded, posted and released with the permission and request of my son, Parker. We only decided to release it after the step-dad in this video (Jason May) admitted to repeatedly trespassing on my land, when confronted by Parker and myself. Neither of us appreciated the harassment.

I am a subscriber to the non-aggression principle (NAP) which basically says that the initiation of force is always immoral. I raise all four of my children in a non-violent manner, i.e., I never spank my kids… EVER. All four of my kids are very familiar with the NAP are extremely well behaved; anyone who knows them personally will testify that this is true.

Until today (Saturday, June 8, 2013) there was no description to the video. I am adding it to help others understand the broader picture. Parker has lived with me full time since the day this was filmed. I picked up my other three kids from their mom and step-dad's house yesterday for my first week of summer vacation with them. The pick up was text book perfect and without incident, of which I am thankful.

I bought Parker his very own iPhone 5 and gave the number to his mom. He is free to call or text her (or anyone in her family) any time he wishes (something I was never granted). He is also free to visit her or her family or friends any time he wishes.

On this day, he is with his cousins in Gardendale, TX playing and working on the family farm. He is excited to have a job this summer. My son and I are very close and are very open. We have a full summer planned and I am excited.

I thank many of you for your kind, encouraging words. I even thank the critics, for your words are teaching Parker and I to hone our skills, and yes, Parker and I read every single word. Have a peaceful day and remember, you own yourself. No one else owns you.

Publisher's note: Caleb and Parker Levette are heroes and nothing less. Thank you both. You stood up publicly and righteously for many thousands of other men and their sons.

Readers, please sub to Caleb's channel here, and send Caleb and Parker your support. PE

The inconvenient truth about manning up

Neil Westlake · 8 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A good friend of mine went to a job interview yesterday. While waiting to go in, he took a picture of a poster on the wall, the latest advertising campaign for the Battered Women's Support Services. It is a picture of a pugnacious little boy, fists raised, with a smear of blood trickling from his nose.

The copy at the bottom of the poster is a lot of bullshit about 'manning up.' The fact that the copywriters (working on behalf of their ideological driven client) have decided to chew on this phrase – this particular bone – is bothersome precisely because, as a Male Human Rights Activist, I find this particular epithet of male shaming especially loathsome. Indeed, it is precisely because of my aversion to these two particular words that makes it crucial (in my mind) that I should unravel their agenda in their use of this phrase.

The copy posits that 'manning up' is, "a crisis in masculinity that causes violence against women and girls."

The logic here – one of unquestioned causality – is extremely misleading. How does this societal shaming of men and boys lead inexorably to acting out in violence? How does this mechanism work, precisely? The poster does not attempt to answer this in any way shape or form; it merely offers up a statement as a de facto truism. It is lamentable that the folks back at the ad agency do not feel it necessary to look at the wider implications of this message: the way that it may addle and impinge on the psyches of young boys.

A major proportion of the people admonishing boys to grow a pair are mothers. Indeed, I distinctly remember my own mother informing me, after delivering a flurry of hand slaps, that 'big boy's don't cry.' The fact that I never once heard my father say this is notable. Working out from my subjective experience, it does not take a great leap of the imagination to posit that a significant percentage of these questionable messages are handed down to young boys from a female parent.

The statistics are unequivocal: according the US Census Bureau, of 12.2 million single parent families in the US, more than 85% have a female parent at the helm. Startlingly, 4 out of 10 children are born to unwed mothers. The undeniable fact that women have the greater access to young boys is suggestive that they have the main sway over their emotional and psychological development, and that they have the greater opportunity to divulge what their idea of a "real man" should, or should not be.

The pernicious 'man up' narrative is, essentially, verbally abusive. It is the ram-rodding of a triangular peg; it is an insistence that it has to fit into a square hole, irrespective of its differing shape or form. The fact that women visit this type of abuse on their children is also a matter of record. Mothers are, by a long measure, the majority of child abusers: a survey done by the Federal Association for Children and Families found that 58% of the perpetrators of 'childhood abuse and neglect' were women[2].

Greater access to children offers greater opportunity for abuse.

Back to the poster: underneath the nonsense about 'manning up' is a startling statement that needs evisceration. It reads, "We are helping men own their role."

This gem obviously stems from the non sequitur, the assertion that male shaming verbal abuse inevitably makes a wife beater. Casting these aspersions aside, I would like to look at the precise use of the word 'role.'

The Oxford English Dictionary defines role as being "the function assumed or part played by a person or thing in a particular situation." This suggests that we adopt roles in response to outside stimuli. This is further clarified by tracing the origin of the seventeenth century French word, roule. A roule was the paper on to which an actor's part was written. A script. In this light, we can now see how gender ideologues want to give young boys a new "roule". Namely that of a violent abuser. But let's not forget that this 'abuser' script is being handed down, assigned to young males by a third party. Moreover, let us not forget that those with the greater access to those tabulae rasae,- those blank young mental chalkboards – have the majority of the aforementioned scripts, and the time to ensure that those monologues are learned by rote and taken to heart.

The Women's movement lamented, precisely, on the roles that they felt as though were impinging on them from without. The fact that they resisted these messages and sought to find a new identity for themselves was (and is) a good thing. However, it is clear from this piece of advertising that any such emancipation is a one-way street. The creative minds behind this poster are entirely content to place the plaster cast of socio-psychological immobility on men. Regardless of whether the gender ideologues maintain that the imbibing of certain words or phrases make boys violently abusive, we are being given scripts that do not emanate from within ourselves.

We are being handed our part regardless of what role we may actually want to play in life. In essence, every time a boy is told 'to suck it up' he is being bound and gagged. He is like Gulliver, staked to the ground, unable to move, amid teeming Lilliputiennes. Every time a radical feminist pronounces that all men are rapists, she is intimating that men are predestined, in a Calvinistic sense, to enact harm; she is placing duct-tape over his mouth and across his genitals, without even a cursory glance towards the human heart beating in his chest.

Let us look back at the image. I will let you know what I see. I see a young man who has been the recipient of violence, of physical abuse handed down to him – quite possibly from a woman. I see a whole world of pain in his eyes – pain that is reflective of a dissipating and crumbling emotions. I see the joy being sucked from a young spirit. I see a little boy that needs help, a kid that needs to be reassured and told that he is loved more than the moon and the stars.

I know this, you see, because, back in the mists of time, I was that little boy.

All advocates need to face the music on rape lies

Peter Lloyd · 9 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is no time for sisterhood: Women need to get angry with rape liars like Linsey Attridge, she's abusing them as well as the system.

Earlier this week, MailOnline reported on the case of Linsey Attridge – the latest woman to evade jail after making a false rape claim.

The 31 year-old from Aberdeen, Scotland, falsely accused two strangers of sexual assault in a twisted bid to trap her boyfriend into their ailing relationship.

The single mother-of-one claimed that two men broke into her home and committed the violent attack while her partner was away playing football.

2 horrible, dangerous lies = 200 hours of community service

She then punched herself in the face and ripped her clothes to make the story appear more credible, before spending three days trawling social networking site Facebook to find innocent users she could 'identify' as responsible.

Her victims were then detained by police, questioned and forced to undergo intrusive forensic and medical examinations.

Then, following two months of police investigations, Attridge confessed that the claim was a malicious lie – purposely designed to emotionally manipulate one man by legally manipulating two others

Not to mention the real victims of rape, both male and female.

Last Wednesday, she appeared in Aberdeen Sheriff Court where she publicly admitted wasting police time.

But, in another gender-biased outcome for female offenders, Attridge was spared jail in favour of 200 hours unpaid community service. Something that's neither a fitting punishment, nor a deterrent.

Gender pay gap? Let's sort the gender sentencing gap too.

Even her ex-boyfriend, primary victim Nick Smith, said: 'I think the sentence was ridiculous. I actually walked out of the court as soon as I heard it. I think the justice system has let us all down.'

And he's right.

Because, although it's clear that men are the only victims in this particular case, Attridge has also betrayed the sisterhood.

Not only has she embarrassed her gender with her lies, but she has also made the process of convicting real rapists even harder for other women. Women who have already endured unimaginable pain. Girls who, sadly, will be subjected to the same horrors in the future.

And she's not the only one. In April last year, Kent's Kirsty Sowden – a former John Lewis shop assistant – cried rape over a fully consensual encounter with a man she'd met online. He was arrested at his workplace in front of colleagues and detained in a cell, wasting 376 hours of police time and costing £14,000.

In May 2012, 20 year-old Hanna Byron was spared jail after falsely accusing her ex-boyfriend of rape in revenge for breaking up with her.

In August, Sheffield's Emma Saxon made a second false rape allegation against her boyfriend, Martin Blood. He was held in police custody for 14 hours and subjected to an intrusive medical examination – all because he'd stood her up.

Southampton's Elizabeth Jones was finally jailed in February – but only after making her ELEVENTH false allegation.
Yet, despite this, not one person or rape charity has ever come forward and distanced themselves from such behaviour. Not one.
Which, by default, is yet another disservice to the real victims of rape – both the men and women who are attacked, and the men named and shamed, regardless of conviction.
Sadly, it's not just women like Attridge who lie. I'm also talking about women in positions of power. Women like Harriet Harman.
'Too many people assume that there is a party line when it comes to gender issues – that women must support each other, no matter what. But such misplaced loyalty is insane'
In 2010, an official enquiry report led by Baroness Stern – a prison reform campaigner – ordered Harman to stop misleading the public about rape statistics. For years she'd been pumping misinformation that only six per cent of rapists are brought to justice, when the reality is actually very different.
Actually, the rate is more like two in three – a figure which is much higher than comparable numbers for other violent crimes. Yet still we are told that only 4 per cent of rape attacks go to court.
But where was the outrage from women about this? Quite frankly, it was nowhere to be seen. Just like it was missing this week. Which amazes me.

Emma Saxon made a false claim of rape against Martin Blood, a man she had met online, after he failed to show up for a liaison (left). Elizabeth Jones, 22, has made 11 false rape claims since 2004 (right).

After all, when Lee Rigby was killed in Woolwich, representatives from Britain's Muslim community publicly distanced themselves from the actions of Michael Adebolajo in a bid to align with what's right. They did this by highlight what was wrong.
But I never see this with our country's feminists, which begs a very sad question: are women galvanising over gender, rather than justice?
Too many people assume that there is a party line when it comes to gender issues – that women must support each other, no matter what. But such misplaced loyalty is insane.

In our best-ever age of equality, women should not stand by somebody simply because they share matching XX chromosomes – if they're crying rape. They should be raging against them, like the crime of rape itself.
Instead, their apathy reeks.
Unfortunately, women also suffer when judges pass laughable sentences – like the one imposed on Attridge.
Because if rape is such a terrible crime, and it clearly is, why isn't defrauding rape with false allegations also bad?
And why is it less bad if you're a woman?
It's patronising. It tells the world that women are not strong enough, not independent enough, not responsible enough to be equally culpable as their male counterparts in a court of law. And, whether they like it or not, they are.
Equality means equal. The same.
Ironically, Attridge's sentence comes just days after a man was imprisoned for sending his son a birthday message via the same website which Attridge used to identify her victims.
The very multi-million pound platform which now censors anything which may be deemed offensive to women, but doesn't extend the same courtesy to men and boys.
These inconsistencies, just like the inconsistencies in criminal sentencing, do the entire female population a disservice when they favor them.
Why? Because they make it about men vs. women, rather than right vs. wrong. And that's what so many people fail to recognize.
This is not the path to justice. In fact, when women fail to publicly criticize these liars, along with their unbelievably light sentences, they're not being objective or even ignorant – they're condoning them.

The Duluth model cultivates violence against women

John Hembling (JtO) · 9 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Domestic violence is not a woman's problem. It's not a men's problem, and not even a children's problem. It's everybody's.

Up to this point, the professionals and actors and ideologues running the grievance industry will be agreeing with me. Well, they might, if this article was posted somewhere other than AVfM, and the author was somebody besides John the Other. Ha.

But they hardly ever use the term Domestic Violence anymore. Instead, what was once domestic violence now called "violence against women". The actors in the grievance industry use this phrase to imply, falsely, that domestic violence encompasses only male abusers and only female victims. The grievance industry even has a theoretical model for domestic violence called the Duluth Model[1]. It's a conceptual framework used to inform almost all the policies and public rhetoric of the domestic violence grievance industry.

The Duluth Model posits that violence and abuse between intimate partners is definitionally male violence, and that victimization in domestic abuse is definitionally female victimization.

In the Duluth Model, all violence and abuse is male-sourced, even that which is perpetrated by women. Female-initiated violence and abuse does not exist, because all such violence or abuse must, in the framework of the Duthuth model, be either in self defense from a male aggressor, or in response to pre-existing male-initiated abuse and violence. Indeed, the Duluth Model posits a psychological framework of domination, control and aggression onto the male psyche, as if masculinity itself is a malignant, violent mental disorder.

All violence is male. All victimization is female. Female abusers don't exist, male victims don't exist. In fact, the causes of violence within intimate relationships, such as poverty, mental illness, drug addiction, alcoholism, poor communication or coping skills, childhood trauma, PTSD and other causes, none of these things exist either. Or, if they exist, they do so separate from, and with no causal relationship to domestic violence or abuse. In Duluth, all abuse is male, and masculinity is a synonym for "abusive", "aggressive" and "violent".

In short, the Duluth Model is a pseudo-intellectual justification for cultivating hatred and fear of men.

It is obviously unacceptable to nakedly and deliberately promote hatred of an entire biological demographic based on a character of shared innate identity. Unless that group is the male sex. They're the humans for whom it is politically correct to treat as wholly disposable; to treat as not even human, to kill in vast numbers while enacting our nation's foreign policy and to imprison and murder in vast numbers while enacting domestic policies. Our children, when they happen to be male, are entirely disposable.

And this is why the Duluth Model, which cultivates hatred and fear towards men and boys is so widely accepted. If the Duluth Model had targeted Jews, or blacks, or christians, listed just as examples – it would never have flown. However, when hatred of men is cultivated, nobody looses their minds. That's just part of the plan.

That the Duluth Model is a quasi intellectualized wrapper for hatred isn't it's only problem.

The Duluth Model and all programs informed by it promote, maintain, and escalate violence against women. That's right, the Duluth model is a framework for addressing domestic violence which escalates and cultivates the violence it pretends to oppose – that's violence which victimizes women.

This is obviously an incomplete description of the problem. But because most people don't actually give a flying rat fuck about violence impacting men or children in violent relationships, we'll limit this discussion to the fact that the Duluth Model serves to preserve the conditions of violence it's public cheer-leaders pretend to oppose. Women are, after all, the only people whose injury or death really matters to anybody. Don't believe me? Just turn on the evening news, and listen for the phrase women and children. That's your cue to know when a tragedy involving the deaths of groups of people should really tug on your heart strings.

As a framework to inform effective measures against domestic violence, the Duluth Model is completely useless. However, as a narrative to appeal to our natural desire to protect women, it is almost perfect. This is particularly true because it's emotional appeal bypasses reason, tapping directly into instinct. It's also a superb narrative to use in fundraising. By totally ignoring the actual causes of partner abuse, (such as drug addiction, poverty and mental illness) and by focusing on a fictional violent boogeyman as the claimed principal feature of male identity, the Duluth Model ensures the continuation of domestic violence, and it's attendant utilization of real world violence in fund-seeking storytelling.

And that's what it's really all about. But what about women actually victimized within single-directional violent relationships? Collateral damage? No. Their damage is not merely collateral, it is the desired outcome. Women brutalized or otherwise harmed within violent relationships are marketing material for Duluth Model fundraising. The remaining greater fraction of dysfunctional, abusive and violent relationships, where those victimized are men, women and children? Those people, who constitute the overwhelming majority of people suffering within violent relationships are the collateral damage, and they can go pound sand. Actually reducing violence within such dysfunctional relationships doesn't make money for Duluth Model ideologues and profiteers. So, in the framework of the Duluth Model, fuck those people. They don't count, they don't exist, and if they suffer, or die, nobody gives a damn.

Well, almost nobody.

But we're the ones commonly called rape apologists, misogynists, and incest supporters. Cute, hey?

Obviously, you needn't let any of this trouble you. Go back to sleep, make a donation to your local women's crisis center, wear a white ribbon, and take your view of "violence against women" from the people whose salaries depend on maintaining the popular, cultivated narrative.

Thank you for your kind attention.

The Battle Of The Beavers

Diana Davison · 9 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism comes in different sexual positions.
One feminist, Deborah Tolman, converted the moment she discovered that the missionary position is least likely to give a woman an orgasm. (1) As it turns out, your literal sexual position can actually result in feminism. Never in history has there been a better argument for doing it doggy style.
After decades of clashing, sex-positive and sex-negative feminist battle-axes have given birth to the sex-confused. For such a mechanically straightforward human act, the amount of carnal confusion surrounding sex is quite astounding. Let's look at the ins and outs.
In order to spare folks the visual of our anti-porn queen, Andrea Dworkin, let us imagine instead a rotund puppet with a clump of frizzy dark hair glued to it. The face is a frowny mouth under two lumps of coal and that's all you need to know.
Doozy Dworkin, the sex-negative guru, had some strong opinions about how impossible it is for women to legitimately enjoy sex. Ever. Period. Regardless of position. Though she protested that her book Intercourse never actually stated all heterosexual sex is rape, she is quite clear that to her "[t]he normal fuck by a normal man is taken to be an act of invasion and ownership undertaken in a mode of predation." To paraphrase, Dworkin's irreparable problem involved the equipment. Women get stuck with a baseball glove while men get to wield a bat.

> "In the experience of intercourse, she loses the capacity for integrity because her body—the basis of privacy and freedom in the material world for all human beings—is entered and occupied; the boundaries of her physical body are—neutrally speaking— violated." (2)

I remember playing baseball in grade seven and a fly ball was headed straight towards me in the outfield. I lined up, stuck my glove in the air and closed my eyes. I can't tell you how satisfying it was when I felt a hard solid thunk. I looked down with amazement to find that I'd actually caught the damned thing. To this day I still enjoy the memory of the first time that ball hit my hand.
A new branch of study arose for those women who remain uncomfortable with their anatomical role in the game-of-grind. Women can now take classes teaching them how to "actively receive" during intercourse to make it feel a little less rapey.
I've heard about these women before. We normally call them dead fucks. Starfish on sticks. (I don't mind pounding home this point.) If there's a course available, get their arses in there because I shudder to think of how disappointing these chicks have been to their wannabe lovers.
What does one talk about in these classes? How does one practice actively receiving? They might close the blinds and start out lightly by doing things like answering the phone. Then they progress to throwing Nerf balls at each other; if it hits you in the head you did it wrong. Advanced classes incorporate eating various fruits and vegetables; if you wait for the banana to come to you it's a fail.
The super secret levels teach her how to tone the muff muscles until she can grab him by the cock and throw him to the ground with her twat.
Thus we arrive at the problem created by the founding mother of this school of thought:

> "A commitment to sexual equality with males is a commitment to becoming the rich instead of the poor, the rapist instead of the raped, the murderer instead of the murdered."
> ~Andrea Dworkin (3)

Yikes. Attack of the nookie ninjas!
Next to enter this vacuous hole is the opposing sex-positive feminist view, creating The Civil War Of Snatch. This new brand of grrrl power encourages women to be brazen bitches. They'll get that double D surgery under the fib that these sisters are doing it for themselves. They parade their sexual hunger in the public all-you-can-eat buffet. It's all progressive goodness until men put their grubby hands in to foul the merchandise. The sexual power of these creatures is easily ruptured by the first prick.

Foolish men who dare to drool at their pushed up, tummy tucked divinity soon find themselves on the wrong end of a lawsuit. These sex-positive women gorging themselves on their own lustful behaviours are deeply disturbed by the side effect of men getting aroused. Hands off the sushi train.

Jaclyn Friedman of WAM! and Jill Filipovic of Feministe had a delightful conversation about female masturbation and how great it would be if women could admit to self-pleasuring without it getting warped into feeding male pleasure. (4) This is a serious problem for them. They want you nasty ass men to stop getting turned on when women talk about fucking themselves. You're screwing it up for the sexpo divas. These hot heathens declare that men need to stop sexualizing women's sexuality. Wrap your face around that one.

They demand the freedom to talk about flicking their beans without finding some dude winding his trouser crank. That's a reasonable request if you don't mind thought police.

These sexually liberated viragos are easily spotted. En masse, a great shrew of feminists strut with signs on Slutwalks. They do this to reclaim the word slut while competing to look the sluttiest among sluts in a pre-Halloween excuse to flaunt their flesh in daylight. You can find out what they think a slut looks like by attending one of these events, but it becomes sadly obvious that they haven't watched enough porn.

A real slut looks like a librarian. She tells you to "shhh" then puts that finger between her luscious lips and closes her eyes while she moistens and suckles at it. Whatever version of whore, the grand delusion of the Slutwalk premise remains: Guys don't have a problem with sluts. Women have the problem.

Never once has a man called me a slut in a bad way.

It's a cat-scratch jungle out there. The competition is fierce and it's vicious. Nobody treats a woman's body like an object as meticulously as a woman does. We paint it, tweeze it, wax it, surgically enhance it, bake it, fill it, bleach it, steam it, tousle it, fluff and fold it, and dress it up like Barbie on barbiturates. All of that just so we can put it in a window and wait for men to steam up the glass with their hot bestial breath while they check the balance in their bank accounts.

Doesn't that sound positive to you?

Despite encouraging women to feel secure and confident with their sexuality, Friedman is a champion of the concept of "rape culture." Be confident but be afraid. She claims our culture trivializes rape then goes on to call her political attack on a social media site #FBrape. It's confusing but it's not her fault. It's an academic issue that you'd only understand if you've taken Women's Studies. (5)

A note to Friedman: If you're going to attack facebook for violence then revoke the poke. I think we all hate getting poked because what the fuck is that anyway?

Now we've arrived at the sex-confused group and it's hard to be in the middle of a war zone.

Protests run rampant demanding we rid the world of rape and sexist objectification of women. A"Lose The Lads' Mags" campaign (6) encourages retail employees to sue their bosses for making them sell Hustler and Playboy. No one forced these workers to take the job in the first place.

Meanwhile, the biggest advance towards mainstreaming porn was accomplished by a woman. Fifty Shades Of Grey, by E.L James, is unashamedly read on subway trains and in lunch rooms by middle aged women without the slightest blush. This is a book that resulted from a fifty year old woman turning the Twilight stories into a kinky erotic fantasy. This woman created adult porn while thinking about teenagers. 70 million women worldwide now have a choir of cash registers singing "Oh Cum All Ye Faithful". I guarantee you the patriarchy wasn't behind this one.

Men are a lot less confused about sex than women and they seem to have a better grasp of what constitutes rape. The only debate about easing off statutory rape laws was amongst feminists after The Vagina Monologue's "The Little Coochie Snorcher That Could" ruffled some feathers. Some feminists decided that young children are perfectly capable of making sexual choices and, most particularly, when the older seducer is a woman. Rape is a hypersensitive subject until it interferes with female entertainment. (7)

Sex isn't a Rubik's Cube. Things run smoother when people who don't like to fuck stay away from partners with high libidos. It also helps if women who want to be seen as sexual creatures stop blaming other people for noticing their sexuality. If you think the female body is beautiful, then don't get upset when you see it on page 3. Sexuality is not a disease, don't turn it into one. We don't need an antidote.

The question at hand is whether feminism has managed to fuck up the enjoyable act of fucking. The answer is an "enthusiastic yes."

Monday Roundup for 10 June 2013

Dean Esmay · 10 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Have a good weekend? Hope so. Whether you did or not, here's some great stuff you may have missed.

I'm going to go a little out of bounds here and note a story you may have missed more than a week ago. I think it got buried in a flurry of other stories and I missed it in my last roundup, which is a shame because it's a terrific thing: Tell us your story in your own voice. We think this is a powerful thing, especially because a lot of men are deeply uncomfortable verbalizing their own pain, but find writing an easier way to share their stories.

Indeed, in the latest episode of Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey, after the show Erin and I realized that many men may be uncomfortable calling and talking about their experiences. Although a number of men have called in to talk to Erin about what they've gone through in every episode of our show on domestic abuse, we know that psychologically some men have serious trouble talking about painful things and would prefer to write. A question: would anyone be interested in writing their stories of abuse and their questions to Erin, instead of calling, either because you can't make the scheduled showtime or because you just aren't comfortable on the phone? We may need to create an email address for that very purpose.

Facebook has allowed itself to become the world's biggest censor when it comes to sexual politics and ideology. There's so much to talk about Facebook's attrocious behavior, and so much dirtiness we've uncovered, and so much to embarrass Mark Zuckerburg, WAM, and other with, I can't possibly do it justice in an update, so I'm just gonna say, read this and this and this and this and this and this and finally, for at least one laugh, this. And then contemplate how freedoms sometimes aren't stripped, they're just slowly eroded. Do something about it, fight back! There's numerous ideas on how to do so in those links, so get going!

Dudes! Check it out! There's a cool new TV network just for girls! Wow! Modern girls are so disadvantaged, what could help them more than their very own TV network? Now in a sane world, TV networks aimed at young boys or young girls wouldn't be necessarily a bad thing but Patrice Stanton has a rather dim view of SheZow.

Hey, YouTuber Razorbladekandy finally found the Emperor of the Black People. I was always wondering where to find him. Although Jose Fraser is rather disdainful of His Imperial Majesty, impertinent cur that he is, and has the audacity to respond with a Tommy Sotomayor video. Two weeks in the Tower of London for him!

Now, with all that humor–and there's been plenty to laugh about–I have to say that on a personal level the story that made me angry and prone to cry this last week was the inconvenient truth about manning up. I don't think I've ever seen child abuse taken to such a frightening level; a publicity campaign that goes right to abusing boys as its primary tool to spread a hateful lie. Can you get more disgusting? Watch the front page of A Voice for Men in the next week or so for more on these disgusting ideologues and their hateful child-abusing publicity campaign.

Speaking of women in media: have you checked out our recent interviews with Dr. Tara Palmatier and Karen Straughan? Well what's stopping you? Methinks if you put those ladies in charge of SheZow you might actually have a network worth having your daughters watch, although a few delicate flower moms might get their petals singed.

The Husband Murdering Club: it's a cultural institution with a very old pedigree, as Robert St. Estephe demonstrates in his latest installment of documented history they almost never teach you in school. Robert's a scholar who in a sane world would be a tenured history professor at an Ivy League university by now.

Retired cop and private investigator Michael Conzachi is not particularly impressed with recent stories of rapey rapiness all over the US military. If you know someone in uniform, maybe you want to steer them toward this article. Just tell them to be careful who they allow to see them reading it.

By the way, I mentioned this once before but I just wanted to mention again that Charles Coughlin… I mean, PZ Myers likes to tell rape jokes. The guy's a never-ending inspiration isn't he?

Did you know the sky is blue? Hey, the sky is blue. No really, it's blue. For some reason it annoys people when you say this. As odd as it sounds, apparently you can spend your entire life telling people the sky's blue, and they won't know what you're talking about. Although I'm starting to wonder: is it starting to become more politically acceptable to say that it's blue?

Glen Poole returned to tell us an amusing story about male feminists on Twitter. I notice that the slippery Poole, however, conspicuously denies eating cats, only denies killing them. What are you hiding Mr. Poole, hmmm?
In case you hadn't ever realized it, the Duluth Model of Domestic Violence isn't just broken, it creates more victims of violence. Oh, and while we're busy killing sacred cows, Peter Lloyd joins in and notes that it's time for women to face the music on rape liars. I'd also like more of them to face the music on female rapists, but "baby steps, baby steps" as they say.
AVfM also welcomes new contributor JD Fraser to our pages. His first article will startle you, as he directly compares one government experiment on black men with another… and finds the more modern "enlightened" experiment far more damaging. I've had a few talks with Jose and he has a hell of a lot more to say on this and related subjects that certain gender ideologues are not going to like one bit.
After you scrub the evil from your brain from reading about that, you may need something to cheer you up. I know I did. Here's a few that may help:
The ages of heroes does not appear to be over. It's a lengthy video but worth your time if you want to realize that things can and do change. Also, Diana Davison shows that feminists even fuck up fucking, in one of the funniest skewerings of idiotic ideology you'll read this year.
For some interesting news on other sites, here's a few tidbits: Divorced dads get a gift from fired up moms, a German man may be vindicated on what he says were false charges, but Australian Prime Minister is planning a shamelessly bigoted gynocentric campaign for the next elections. Well there's always a mix of good and bad news. Let's keep fighting the good fight and keep our sense of humor as best we can, eh?
See you in 7!

The Black community, Tuskegee and feminism

JD Fraser · 10 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The title sounds like there is no commonality, but if you look closely you will see that from 1932 to 1972 the US Public Health Service conducted an "investigative study" of the natural progression of syphilis using 600 impoverished sharecroppers in Marion County, Alabama. This was a controversial study because ethical standards were ignored. The government identified 201 Black men infected with the disease while intentionally withholding diagnostic information, treatment and knowledge of treatment from another 399 men.

The government's actions resulted in many Black men dying from the disease, in their wives being infected with syphilis, and many children being born with congenital syphilis.

The study continued for forty years and was conducted under the supervision of numerous US Public Health Service officials before finally being exposed by a whistle blower.

Incentives for participating in the study were offered to the participants such as free burial insurance, free medical care, and free meals. This was a gold mine in the black community at a time and in a geographic location with extremely high poverty levels and plenty of mouths to feed. It was fool's gold, though, as the participants were misled about what was actually happening in their bodies and to those they loved.

The incentives offered by the government then were much the same as the inducements offered today (welfare, section 8, and food stamps for single mothers).

Today's inducement toward unintended ill effects is promoted through single Black mothers (and the feminist strong Black woman) now revered by most Black women. These government subsidies aforementioned are not allowed if there is a father or male figure present in the household. The government is, in the most literal way imaginable, introducing a disease into the American Black family, feeding it, misleading the victims of that disease, and distracting them from the consequences with financial incentives and disinformation.

The government is fostering propaganda that mislabels a symptom, e.g. family breakdown, as something curative, e.g. so-called "women's empowerment."

Let's examine the mid 70s, when feminism began to really take a grip on the American society and reared its head. It took the idea of Black power from the Black woman and replaced it with "woman power," only rather than result in the Black community moving out of poverty and into empowerment, it destroyed the most potent weapon that Blacks had to fight for their community: the Black family.

Feminism is another forty-year experiment that is just as disastrous as the Tuskegee syphilis experiment, but even more complete in the destruction of the Black American family. Rather than just target 600 men, their wives and their children, it has jailed and killed Black men across the culture through Black on Black crimes. It has destroyed the Black community and the last 3 generations of Black children.

The first experiment allowed the government to understand that destroying a relatively small group of Black men is not effective in the demise of an entire culture. It was at that point the government realized the destruction would focus on the Black woman first. Feminism has been very useful tool at this, because it was a complete brainwashing used to tell the Black woman that she was oppressed by the Black male. The Black women didn't realize that there was no way for a Black man to oppress her (the Black man was not in charge of anything that could oppress her, i.e., jobs, bank loans, education, etc.). Feminism successfully conned Black women to quit viewing racism as their enemy, start seeing their own Black men as the oppressor — and to destroy their own families as a solution.

And they have performed that duty on behalf of feminists admirably.

If we, as Black men and women, don't begin to put it in check and take back our families we are all doomed. If we don't blow the whistle on this organized and coordinated destruction of our community, no one else will.

syphilis, when the evidence is that they merely identified the infected without telling them they were infected or helping them with any form of treatment.–DE

NCDV's Steve Conner — "Drag him away"

Andy Thomas · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Last year, a small UK non-governmental outfit launched a particularly distasteful attack on half the human population. Their campaign took the form of a huge interactive billboard at Euston Station. It was called “Drag Him Away”, and here it is:

The billboard showed looped footage of a man hectoring a passive woman. Although no actual crime was depicted, passers-by were invited to interact with the billboard using their mobile phone in order to see the man “dragged away”. The organisation behind it, the National Centre for Domestic Violence (NCDV), is headed by a barrister called Steve Conner.

As a teenager, I recall how I was filled with so much shame after learning about how “men rape and abuse women”, that I wrote into a women’s magazine to apologise on behalf of my entire gender. I believed myself to be the “one good man”, and felt an overwhelming obligation to stand up to these “other men”, thus letting the world know that I wasn’t one of them. While I watched the video of NCDV’s stunt, I was reminded of this as I contemplated how dehumanising it it must be for a young boy or teenager to look up and behold himself through this prism of shame and guilt. Like I once did, many will simply disassociate themselves from their gender, rather than to see “Drag Him Away” for what it is — an opportunistic attack on their human identity by a professional NGO keen to raise its profile in a misandric state culture.

A “Drag Her Away” campaign, one in which people are invited to dispense justice to a female abuser, would never fly of course. It would widely be perceived as an unacceptable attack on women in general and would come in for fierce criticism (no funding would ever be made available for such a campaign in any case). However, NCDV’s campaign was not targeted women, but at men — and this in today’s society makes it acceptable, normal, even virtuous. What could possibly be wrong with protecting women from abusive men, many would ask?

By the late 1930s, having for years been painted as devious money lenders who were unclean and sub-human, German society reached the stage that social hostility against Jewish people had become normalised. We like to delude ourselves that we have consigned such things to history and, today, a billboard featuring a “Drag the Jew Away” campaign, one in which an archetypal Jewish figure is shown hectoring a passive Aryan, would be seen exactly for what it is — disgusting propaganda belonging in a 1930s Nazi film reel, not 21st century Britain. The lesson we have utterly failed to learn, however, is that in the time of its happening, all prejudice is seen as acceptable, normal, even virtuous.

In the here and now of today’s “enlightened” society, after years of ideologically motivated campaigning, it is males who have been painted as perpetrators of sexual and domestic violence, and dominant oppressors.[1]

In reality, long standing cultural reasons and the legitimate fear of being wrongly identified as an abuser have always inhibited men in reporting domestic violence against them. However, government crime surveys, such as the BCS in the UK,[2] and its equivalent CDC Intimate Partner Violence Survey in the US,[3] are now presenting a picture of approximate parity between the sexes. Additionally, research increasingly shows that the majority of inter-partner violence is mutual, i.e. the violence and verbal abuse goes both ways, and where it is unilateral, the initiators of such violence are overwhelmingly women.[4] Within the government and non-governmental agencies of the west, however, domestic violence has been defined as “gender violence” or, increasingly, “violence against women and girls”. (See the 2011 UK government policy paper, A call to end violence against women and girls.)

This is the great delusion of our age, and to continue to define inter-partner violence as “gender based” is to propagate the myth that one gender is responsible for perpetrating violence against the other, while disregarding and rendering invisible the suffering of millions of boys and adult men. Whether it be physical, verbal or sexual, the origins of abuse lie in early childhood, not in any intrinsic deficiency in males.

Both men and women can be equally abusive in their relationships, and the environments they create for their children is the significant factor in understanding abusive behaviour — for behaviour learned in early childhood, when the child’s brain is in flux and the personality in formation, is carried forward into adult relationships.[5] As an abused child grows up, early emotional damage goes to define his or her default emotional responses and thinking patterns in adulthood. It is a cycle stretching back generations, and the reality is so simple that it should be self-evident. Only now, however, are MRI scans being used for the first time to reveal the damage in the brains of abused children.[6]

The problem is not gender-based — it is inter-generational. And the solution to it lies, not in curing some intrinsic male defect, but in our treatment of children. There is no reason why men and boys, therefore, should continue to wear society’s garland of shame.

Now, to be fair, NCDV’s stated aim is to provide a free legal service, both to the police and to individual “clients”, in order to obtain emergency injunctions against alleged perpetrators of abuse. I do not condemn NCDV in this, but recognise that in those cases where domestic violence is uni-directional, or largely so, such a facility would be invaluable. Nor is it lost me that the language used throughout the NCDV website is gender-neutral, and NCDV states that its service is open to “anyone”, not just women. Their use of visual communication on the other hand, as expressed by their website imagery and past campaign videos, is strongly stereotyped and hard-hitting. Previous NCDV campaign videos, which include this and this, exclusively depict men as abusers and women as victims.

It is with the sheer ugliness of “Drag Him Away”, however, that I take particular issue. I have to question the commitment to due process on display here, when NCDV’s own media campaign so clearly gives the message that any man can now be “dragged away” on the basis of a mobile phone text or mobile app. It represents more than NCDV’s contribution to the negative stereotyping of males — it takes the whole thing to the next level.

I solemnly predict that the day will come when the accumulative fallout of years of anti-male propaganda won’t stay confined to “other men”, but will be felt by your son, your brother and your father. Every mother of a son should realise that when he grows up, society will increasingly view him with suspicion and contempt, and in a culture where guilt is assumed by default, virtue of his gender, the only thing preventing any man from being “dragged away” is the absence of an allegation. Many men would have some legitimacy in claiming that we have reached such a point already. One day perhaps, even NCDV’s Steve Conner may realise that for himself when society fails to make sufficient distinction between him, or someone he cares about, and the “other man” in his interactive billboard.

Additional Information. NCDV ceased being a UK national charity in February 2012, and became a private limited company, “The Centre For Domestic Violence Ltd”, registered no. 07917926. At the time of writing, Companies House lists this company as active but with a “proposal to strike off”. The company’s annual return appears to be four months overdue.

AVFM News and Activism: Anill Kumar

James Huff · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we are especially excited to have as our guest Anill Kumar, one of the principal founders of the Men's Rights Movement in India.

India has proven to be a pivotal battleground in the struggle for men's rights. In recent years both the legislature and judiciary in that country have dealt serious blows to due process and presumption of innocence to men accused of domestic violence and sexual assault. Dowry laws have seen men and their families thrown in jail over marital break up. Men have literally been thrown off of moving trains simply for being in a car designated for women.

We will be talking about all of these things as well as the organizations fighting for men's rights in India on tonight's show. This is an important episode on the very important topic of global men's rights activism so please join us tonight.

Busting Bill's Balls

Paul Elam · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Comedian Bill Burr is a favorite with many in this crowd, including myself. His shtick is straight up red pill, and he tackles really tough subjects from an unpopular (read: honest) angle, like domestic violence. He does it with intelligence and balls; even showing enough smarts to fully anticipate the anxiety in his audience over the subject matter. He pushes them into a state of dissonance and then smacks them in the face with it. You just have to love that.

He's the closest living thing we have to George Carlin, only he hasn't sold out to getting cheap laughs by bashing men. When he does take shots at men, it is usually for the right reasons, not to placate the "clams" in his audience.

I was listening to one of his podcasts yesterday, where he takes on the mentality behind Carrie Underwood's song, "Before He Cheats," an ode to excusing vandalism and criminality over a broken heart. In typical Burr style, he tears into the song, and the mentality of women that can rationalize pretty much any kind of behavior if they feel emotionally provoked, especially if a man cheats on them. If you have not heard it, it is well worth the listen.

Like I said, Bill does his thing with this and does it right. We have an entire culture of women that are absolutely convinced they have a right to do anything they want to do, and a culture of men ready to give them more than just a pass. Burr points out in text at the end of his vid that this bit of cuntry music was written by two dudes.

Still, there was something that bugged me about Burr's monologue. I almost hate to bring it up as much as I respect the guy, and I know what it is like. I have had more than my share of people that come in behind my work with their critiques du jour. Some of it is valid, helpful analysis. Some of it is whiny, nit picking bullshit. I am hoping that my take on this doesn't fall into the latter.

But here's the deal. At straight up 9:00 minutes into the video, after ripping these women a complete new asshole for being unrepentant criminals, he challenges women who have been cheated on to find a more functional way handle the situation. And he encourages them to take some responsibility, saying, "You know, rather than looking inward going, you know, maybe I'm a bad judge of character. What sort of qualities am I looking for in somebody, and I'll date that. I mean, didn't the fact that the guy had a souped-up four wheel drive truck, didn't that give it away on any fucking level?"

And I am like, what?

Did I just hear Bill Burr counsel women who justify fucking vandalism as form of petty vengeance that the problem was that they chose men with bad character? What about her character? I mean, how much good is it doing to suggest to scumbag women that they need to pick principled men to date? And by what standard, their cars?

This is where I think Bill, who was on a hell of a roll, skidded right off the tracks into the ditch. It is consistent with the Sugar and Spice mentality about women that even a guy like Bill can default to, and even when he is talking about some disaster of a cunt who slashes tires when she is upset. Did he imagine that before she was cheated on that this woman was some sort of fucking saint?

Look, I get that cheating when in a committed relationship sucks. It never looks good on the person who does it. But that is not to say that I don't understand it.

If we are talking about a woman capable of feeling justified and righteous in slashing up the leather seats in your car out of anger; of dragging a key full length down the side of a custom paint job and of smashing out your windshield and headlights because you hurt her, what do you think she was like in the day to day life of the relationship before the guy cheated?

Let me answer it for you. She was an insufferable bitch. She was an irresponsible child that justified doing a ton of other outrageous shit whenever her precious feelings steered her in that direction. And she did not have a fucking ounce of remorse for any of it at any time. She was a punishing, emotional terrorist that used payback for every slight or mistake, real or imagined.

She was just the kind of useless bitch that gets cheated on and eventually gets kicked to the curb.

And she needs to find a man of good principle? Uh, no Bill, the loser with the single lightning bolt earring is as good as it gets for her, and yes, he is going to cheat on her. It is his version of smashing up a car, but you won't likely hear any songs high-fiving that shit on the radio.

She does not need worry about picking a better man until she grows the fuck up and becomes worthy of one – if that is even possible. And even if it is it won't matter. This kind of woman can pick a really nice, sensible guy, with a sensible car and a sensible job, wearing sensible clothes and that treats her quite well, and it will still only be a matter of time before she figures out that he deserves her doing some really nasty shit to him. And it is only a matter of time before Mr. Sensible leaves, or cheats on her sorry ass, or both.
That is the only understanding of Underwood's song that there is to be had.
Men, by and large, are completely brainwashed when it comes to women. That is why the crazy shit some women do, instead of being shunned, ends up topping the music charts. Bill Burr makes a living challenging this bullshit and even he went the route of assuming that her problem was that she picked a scumbag, instead of just sticking to the fact that she is one.
I guess that proves the pussy pass lives in all of us, like some sort of recessive trait in men that can make them turn red pills blue if they are not utterly fucking conscious all the time about what, and who, they are dealing with.
There are good women in the world; ones that we can hold to much higher standards than whether or not they smash shit up when they are mad. But it is hard for men to find them and it is not only because they are rare. Mostly it is because most men are too quick with an excuse for what women do. If a guy like Bill Burr can lose focus, any of us can.

Strong and Independent: A Brief Guide

Mark Trueblood · 11 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So, you've decided to be strong and independent. I am happy for you, because becoming a strong, independent, self-actualized individual is the most positive thing we can do for ourselves and for others. Sadly, I find there is much conflicting information on how one demonstrates strength and independence. So, I've written up some suggestions. Also, feel free to suggest anything in the comments you feel are missing.

It is: Demonstrating civil behavior towards your fellow men and women, unless they show disrespect for your rights, in which case you should act in reasonable self-defense.

It is not: Treating a person with disrespect or malevolent intent.

It is: Taking ownership of your decisions, both good and bad.

It is not: Blaming your mistakes and poor decisions on another person or group of people.

It is: Perceiving fellow men and women as individuals.

It is not: Projecting fantasies, assumptions, or malevolent intent onto a person because of their race, gender, social class, or sexual orientation.

It is: In cases where social assistance is desired, this should be on the basis of real need.

It is not: Expecting handouts when you do not need them and/or because you insist you belong to an oppressed class.

It is: Engaging in relationships keeping your needs in mind, as well as your partner's needs in mind. Demonstrate reciprocity to your partner, and expect the same out of him/her.

It is not: Expecting to be given resources and cared for because of your gender or the traditions of a bygone era.

It is: Desiring to make one's way in the world through one's work ethic, skills, and attributes.

It is not: Demanding an express lane to success based on your gender and manufactured social grievances.

It is: Desiring to achieve success in physical or intellectual pursuits through skill, effort, and healthy competition.

It is not: Expecting other people to let you win because of the shape of your genitals or the traditions of a bygone era.

It is: Showing loyalty to partners, friends, and allies who have stood by you.

It is not: Engaging in relationships with "what can I get out of this person" at the forefront of your mind.

It is: Making a reasonable effort to solve your problems through your own efforts or through mutually-beneficial arrangements.

It is not: Insisting that the problems you face are the responsibility of others to fix for you.

There is no doubt that being strong and independent is a tough row to hoe. I can point to numerous instances of my adult life when I've failed to live up to these standards. But the rewards of pursuing it are great. We develop character through overcoming challenges, owning our decisions, and holding ourselves to a code of conduct.

I believe in you.

Moral Turpitude: An Open Letter to Facebook

Jason Gregory · 12 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note* This article has been redacted. See updates at the bottom. –DE*

Feminists are pissed. According to WAM, Facebook has completely failed to produce an adequate response to feminist's demands regarding censorship of "hate-speech" against women. WAM's contention is that Facebook's "inadequate" response contributes to violence against women, catering to a culture where violence against women is normalized. How could Facebook be so callous to the plight of women? What are the demands of these feminists?

1. Recognize speech that trivializes or glorifies violence against girls and women as hate speech and make a commitment that you will not tolerate this content.
2. Effectively train moderators to recognize and remove gender-based hate speech.
3. Effectively train moderators to understand how online harassment differently affects women and men, in part due to the real-world pandemic of violence against women.

On the surface, such demands seem reasonable. No moral person would deliberately support speech that trivializes and glorifies violence. No moral person acting as a moderator would deliberately tolerate gender-based hate-speech. No moral person would deliberately misunderstand how violence affects women and men. Any failure to comply with these demands is proof of Facebook's callous attitude and contribution to the normalization of violence. In fact, failure to acquiesce to these demands is proof of Facebook's moral depravity. As such, corporate businesses should pull sponsorship from Facebook on the grounds of moral turpitude.

As a moral lesson for Facebook and as an attempt to instill at least a bit of virtue into this vile corporation, let us walk the grounds of moral turpitude for a moment. Let us deliberately support speech that trivializes violence, tolerates gender-based hate-speech and misunderstands how violence affects men and women. What would that speech be? Who would support that speech? What would be misunderstood about the effects of violence?

As we walk the grounds of moral turpitude for a moment, try typing into a search engine the phrase "violence against men." You will get scores of pages linking to articles and information regarding violence against women. That's right. Searching for violence against men leads to information about violence against women. Try it. Even though the overwhelming amount of violence in this world is violence against men, feminists have monopolized the narrative of violence as violence against women. The normalization of violence against men permeates society. We don't even notice it. However, violence against women receives special status and notice. So much so, that search engines don't even link to violence against men. This elevation of violence against women is de facto discrimination against men. This focus on violence against women minimizes and trivializes the savage violence that men experience everyday in this world. It is men who are overwhelmingly brutalized by a "justice" system that throws them into cages for non-violent drug crimes. It is men who are overwhelmingly slaughtered on battlefields and glorified for being great at slaughtering other men. It is men who are overwhelmingly homeless. It is men who are glorified for their brutality against other men in the ring as "sportsmen." It is men who suffer overwhelmingly from sports related head trauma. It is men who juice their bodies in order to be glorified as objects of utility for a sports team. It is men who suffer the trivialization of violence done to them by society, by women, and by other men. Nobody notices. Nobody cares. We are too busy elevating the violence against women to some sort of superior status, some sort of slight against the divine, in some ridiculous feminist pissing-match about which gender is the longest suffering long-sufferer in the history of long-suffering. That is a walk along the grounds of moral turpitude.

Those are the grounds of moral turpitude and along those grounds we see the lack of care, understanding, and compassion for the lived experiences of men. If feminists gave a damn about equality, they would be screaming about violence against men. They remain silent. The more they scream about violence against women, the louder is their silence about violence against men. This silence is hate. This silence is ignorance. This silence is bigotry. This silence trivializes and glorifies violence against men. This silence distorts the "real-world pandemic" of violence against men. This silence is violence. Nobody notices. Nobody cares.

Feminists are pissed and that's all that matters.

[Editorial update: Google results now show violence against men as their top results for searches on "violence against men". Before press we witnessed the same behavior out of Google that Jason describes here. Google et. al. change their search algorithms constantly, and it does not require a conspiracy on Google's part or anyone else for the search results to improve–and AVfM's own entries on violence against men are among the results. It's great that this is a small victory in getting violence against men recognized in search engine results. The fact that people are now agreeing that ignoring violence against men is very bad is also a small victory. Now all we have to do is get it recognized by international aid organizations and governments! –DE]

*[Editorial Update 2 It turns out we do have the screen shots on this, and the editorial team, specifically Dean Esmay, owes Josh an apology. So do a lot of other people. Look for an updated article on this in the near future. Dave Futrelle's been caught out as a liar. Again. What a shock! Stay tuned. –DE]*

*[Editorial Update 3 My thanks to Dave Futrelle of Manboobz. In his increasing efforts to remain relevant, he's published multiple stories on this one little article already. In a way it's pretty cool; we need people to hold us to high standards, after all, and even dishonest people can help others to stay honest. Futrelle is holding us to standards as high as the mainstream media, which is pretty awesome, although we want to be held to even higher standards than that. So in that sense, he's being useful: if we publish something we can't back up, we need to admit it. Thank you, Dave.*

I also want to thank Dave for tacitly admitting we're as important as a mainstream news organ by giving this much attention to one small story–a small part of a much bigger story of internet censorship, one that I somehow think the Dave Futrelle of the 1990s would have been on our side of.

So I thank Dave Futrelle for helping me catch an error I should have caught in the first place. I also thank him for unwittingly helping expose just how lopsided the content on "violence against women" is versus "violence against men" when you look online, even though men are demonstrably more often the victim of violence than women are.

The fact is that I did witness the Google behavior I mentioned in Update 2. However, Jason emailed us a screen shot after publication (not before) that has been wrongly declared a forgery. It is not a forgery. It was made after this confusion began, to show us what Jason's post-publication results looked like and to express Jason's own confusion privately, to us. That screenshot shows an artifact caused by Jason's slow internet connection, his screen shot software, and his browser, which he was able to demonstrate to my satisfaction is in fact a glitch and is not reasonably declared a forgery. I rushed when I first saw it to assume it was the pre-publication screen shot when it wasn't and promised an update on that here. An editor new to the process here at AVfM rushed in behind me and linked that post-publication screen shot to my words saying "We witnessed this behavior" above, effectively putting words in my mouth. That is bumble #2 and #3 on our part.

Dave Futrelle has been on the internet long enough to know that search engine results on uncommon phrases (like "violence against men") can change daily, and that a site as big as A Voice for Men will, in fact, alter search results on Google within hours. He also almost certainly knows that companies like Google have huge teams of people who work daily to test and improve results, thus causing search results on uncommon phrases like "violence against men" to change pretty quickly. As the old phrase goes, "the elephant squeezed mightly to give birth to the mouse." It's pathetic, really, to make this much out of this little. But Dave Futrelle has been given this opportunity because I personally failed to take and include a screen shot before publication, I rushed an update, and a green editor added a link she shouldn't have post-production. It's a mistake we have discussed among the editorial team and we will not repeat it.

I may still go ahead and publish an article schooling Futrelle's misguided readers on exactly how things like Google work, although at this point our screwup on this matter has resulted in so much work and so much pointless confusion it may not be worth it. I stand by Jason Gregory, but I regret my error in not taking the screen shot before publication. We do not and will never have the screen shot Futrelle demands. It would be nice if he would retract the claim of forgery, but that's up to him; I don't believe it is one and have ample reason to believe otherwise. We do, however, withdraw this story by Jason because of the lack of an available screen shot to demonstrate the pre-publication search results. This is my screwup ultimately folks. Sorry about that.

I'd especially like to thank AVfM regular TallWheel for bringing all this to our attention and not letting us ignore it.

Happy Father's Day, MOM!

Clayton Craddock · 12 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Father's Day cards for mothers. Yes you read this correctly. At first I thought it was a joke, but I learned that it was all too real.

This line of cards was inducted into the Greeting Card Hall-of-Shame by Hallmark in 2011. Their target audience is unmarried black women and the line is sold through their Mahogany brand. Unfortunately, it appears that their Father's Day cards for single mothers have turned out to be wildly successful. I feel this is a clear example of corporations endorsing black dysfunction.

When I heard about these cards, I was baffled by the fact that they would even introduce this incredibly foolish and ridiculously offensive idea. It appears they are either geniuses or they are capitalizing from one of our greatest social ills.

Maybe I should be on the creative team at Hallmark. I have a great new idea for them; why not create a line of cards specifically for single fathers celebrating their accomplishments on Mother's Day. Oh wait, Hallmark beat me to it last month. Not a line of cards for single fathers, though, just cards for anyone who is "like a mother." Talk about gender bending.

Arguments have been made in support of Father's Day cards for mothers. Some feel it is needed because in the black community single mothers are "both the mommy and the daddy."

The problem I have with that line of thinking, is that it contributes to the devaluing of the role of the father within the family. The perpetual disdain for fathers, and the continuous reinforcement of this poisonous mindset exacerbates the epidemic of fatherlessness. I think a better choice would be a show of appreciation for a kids next closest positive male role model—an uncle, coach, pastor, or neighbor. This would help restore the value of men in the black community and begin building a stronger community for future generations.

Tell me, where did the idea of mothers and fathers being interchangeable come from? A female parent is a mother. A male parent is a father. The definitions are clear. A woman can never be a father and a man can never be a mother. Both the mother and father have unique and invaluable roles in raising children.

At what point did we forget what the difference was between fathers and mothers? Did the push towards total equality between the sexes blur the lines of the natural roles we play as male and female? If so, it's time to set the record straight and make sure the distinctions are clear.

Here is a dose of reality. According to 2011 U.S. Census Bureau data, over 24 million children are being raised without fathers. That is 1 out of every 3 (33%) children in America. Nearly 2 in 3 (64%) African American children live in father-absent homes. One in three (34%) Hispanic children, and 1 in 4 (25%) white children live in father-absent homes. The most revealing statistic is that in 1960, only 11% of children lived in father-absent homes.

Recent studies have shown that children who live absent their biological fathers are, on average, at least two to three times more likely to be poor, be connected to the criminal justice system, live in poverty, fail in school, use drugs, experience educational, health, emotional and behavioral problems, be victims of child abuse, and to engage in more criminal behavior than their peers who live with their married, biological (or adoptive) parents.

These problems are visible and widespread in the African-American community. Just take a look at the death count in a city like Chicago. At the time of the writing of this post, the Associated Press reported that at least six people have been killed in weekend violence and at least another 11 wounded.

Maybe it is our culture's move towards "gender equality." Maybe some people really believe we are all the same. It is clear to me that there is a need for a re-education of the general public. The facts are out for everyone to see. Some may choose to ignore them, but the differences between mothers and fathers are as clear as night and day. Mothers tend to interact in more caregiving ways, while fathers tend to be involved in rough play and more physical interactions. Mothers tend to be more repetitive and explain what things are to her child in simpler terms. Fathers speak to their children using more adult language, expanding their vocabulary and understanding. Fathers also challenge their children more than mothers. Fathers enforce rules more sternly, which teach children the consequences of right and wrong. Mothers tend toward empathy, which provides a sense of optimism. These differences create a healthy, proper balance with raising well-adjusted children.

Times may have changed with regard to the economic contributions in the family within our culture, but the roles of mother and father have not. We are naturally wired for parenthood to bring different and equally vital qualities to child rearing.

If you think these cards are meaningless and don't really matter, you are fooling yourself. They may be a small segment of the total share of greeting card revenue but they are a symptom of a larger problem. The more reinforcement of disdain for family and fatherhood and encouragement or approval of the choice of single motherhood that come from major corporations like Hallmark, the bigger the problem of widespread fatherlessness gets. This problem isn't going to be kept in the ghetto. It's going to affect us all sooner or later.

It's no badge of honor to be a single mother. Children fare better with both their biological mother and father. A father is not simply a woman who has no man around. It is time to take companies to task that are complicit in the epidemic of widespread fatherlessness.

Save Kaitlyn Hunt... but not our sons?

Ty Henry · 13 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jeremy, a small town boy from the Lake Havasu, AZ area, was 16 when he met his girlfriend. They were friends first, and started dating when she entered high school. The parents disapproved, and went to the police shortly after Jeremy turned 18. With no fanfare, he was sentenced to 5 years in prison after pleading to sexual conduct with a minor. No petition drive was started for him.

Brad was also a young man of 19 in love when he got ensnared on the "Predator Panic" web. Brad was so out of place in prison, our mutual friend "Lefty," in year 22 of 29 for various burglaries, drug crimes and a sex assault, once remarked to Brad, "What are you doing in Prison? You don't even have a rap sheet?

Five years later, his career as a paramedic was down the toilet, and he was even the subject of a suspiciously "abbreviated" Amber Alert after being seen in his car with a 1-year old child who was just reported missing. . .his daughter. The story was short on details , but we in the MHRM know this bait and switch all too well.

Fernando had an encounter with a young woman of 17 (age of consent in 41 of 50 states) he described thusly-"She said yes, her mom said no." Next verse, same as the first.

These are just a few of the people I knew personally in the Arizona Correctional System, and even some child safety advocacy organizations are waking up to this insanity, with kids as young as 11 on the registry. No, check that, BOYS as young as 11. As admirable as these reports, like those of Human Right Watch, are, they are afflicted with the same malady as workplace deaths or homelessness; they conceal gender with titles (veterans, construction workers, youth). Indeed, (p.39) even the study concedes data is not actively kept on the gender of youthful offenders.

Enter Ms. Kaitlyn Hunt.

A young woman of 18 facing 15 years in prison due to sexual conduct with a 14 year old classmate, she is the current cause-celebre LGBT community, with a Change.org petition that has garnered nearly 300,000 signatures. The debate has largely been framed fallaciously, as a disproportionate potential penalty because she is a lesbian, with her lawyer (wrongly) decrying all the boys who "get off easy." Her story has been on all the major networks, and she has appeared on the TODAY show among others to tell her story. The parents have been mercilessly portrayed as homophobes with no evidence. Indeed, public record points to the contrary, as it suggests she is quite the miscreant and hellraiser.

If Kaitlyn Hunt is the conduit to a broader discussion of statutory laws used disproportionately to pathologize male sexuality, I'm all for it. Color me skeptical based on the initial coverage. The media have largely defaulted to Damseling, the coin of the realm in matters of amour where the scythe of justice is poised to strike down someone not born with deadly weapon known as the penis. Against the backdrop of the Gay Marriage battle, the added element of her being an attractive lesbian adds a little more sugar to the Kool-Aid. A CNN video piece on Friday began with images of Ms. Hunt walking hand in hand with her parents, child-like, to a microphone, as sympathetic as Bambi cornered by cougar, the reporter's voiceover restraining indignation like a covered crock pot muting the sound and steam of boiling water. "Prosecutors would have you believe that THIS is the face of a sexual predator." This is where my instinct to introduce tea kettle to TV screen was successfully suppressed. Barely.

I wondered how many of these pearl clutchers wrote message posts cheering on Patrick Drum as a vigilante hero for murdering Gary Blanton in cold blood. Oh, the names not familiar? Probably because Blanton was a MALE who essentially did the same thing Hunt did while he was a juvenile. Gary Blanton's face was not that of a sexual predator, either. It was that of a son, teenager, and now, dead father and husband to two orphaned children and widowed wife. Where was his TODAY show interview?

As I wrote in the Tucson Weekly several years ago, where was sympathy for Keimond Brown? He was charged with molestation for having sex with another teen of 13. He was 15, and the charge follows him to this day. Did the ACLU file a letter on HIS behalf? (To be fair, the ACLU opposes all these registries).

The howl of the LGBT community notwithstanding, no one has a constitutional entitlement to Carnal Knowledge with anyone's 14 year old. Otherwise the title of "parent" is only symbolic. That said, there is a better solution, one that protects the interests of young people while keeping their futures out of the clutches of those walking bureaucratic hammers whose mandate it is to treat everything like a nail.

Let's call it "Juvenile Relations Court." The model of course is Drug Court, which has quite successful in relieving the criminal justice bottleneck by taking first time, non-violent offenders and determining which of them is eligible for the treatment model and not grist for the Prison Industrial Complex Mill. Have a judge order counselors meet with the principals individually and as a group, and maybe come up with compromise solutions such as some form of supervised visitation, and reserve some penalty in the form of, say, a restraining order for the violating older partner in the relationship. I don't have all the answers, but people far more experienced than I in this space can certainly work out the details. This would certainly be a good time for those MRAs and MGTOWS to strike while the iron is hot, writing your local legislators and gathering your neighbors to rally around this cause and address it. But until we are ready to discuss this issue with the human face of criminally tarnished young men like Jeremy, Brad, Fernando and Gary Blanton front and center with the miniscule number of Kaitlyn Hunts, you will not see me signing any Change.Org petitions, nor shedding any tears for girls facing "predator" labels.

Comic Blasphemy Vs. Divine Feminism

Jason Gregory · 14 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I watched a video the other day of a debate between the comedian Jim Norton and the feminist Lindy West. Here is the video. This discussion between comedians and feminists regarding "rape culture" has been raging for the past year. Type "Daniel Tosh rape joke" into a search engine to learn the backstory. Much has been said on both sides, discussions about free speech, censorship, comedy-as-catharsis, the trivialization of suffering, and the contributions made by comics to rape culture and violence against women. Those are all perfectly fine discussions and I'm glad that our society is having this discourse about such things. One thing that is not being discussed in this realm of discourse is the economic concept of "consideration."

We don't have to be economists or legal analysts to understand this. It's not some obscure jargon used only by economists and lawyers. It's an old concept that has been around for centuries and most people understand it without even knowing that they understand it. Consideration is roughly the idea of fair trade. If I give you money, you give me an equivalent value of your services or products. It's not complicated. Most people know when they have been ripped off. If somebody steals your car, they didn't provide an equitable amount of consideration to you. Most people know this and generally expect to give and receive consideration for all sorts of things in their daily lives. Well, reasonable people have this expectation.

Enter Lindy West. If we view the discourse between a comedian and the audience as a sort of economic exchange of ideas, thoughts, and feelings, Lindy West is demanding that this discourse provide consideration to her without her providing an equitable amount of consideration in return. She is demanding that the discourse between a comedian and audience provide to her a consideration in the form of sensitivity to her (and others like her) regarding what she labels offensive to her delicate sensibilities. The only consideration she offers in return is the absence of her feeling offended. That is literally nothing–the absence of something. In economic terms, she is a confidence trickster and ripping us off. Most reasonable people know this, but feminists are not typically known for being reasonable. They sometimes argue that reason is a violent assertion of patriarchal oppression. In reality, feminists like Lindy West assert a gender supremacist ideology that does violence to our reasonable sensibilities. One example of violence-doing to our reasonable sensibilities is hypocrisy. Most reasonable people understand hypocrisy. Perhaps Ms. West understands it, but simply feels some sort of divine feminist entitlement to being hypocritical. Notice at about the 5 minute mark in the aforementioned video that Ms. West actually performs a rape joke about audience members in the club rallying to rape a girl because they aren't doing anything better and have the free time. The joke gets a laugh and Ms. West chuckles and smugly continues with her moral correction and shaming of comedians who make rape jokes. Notice that she gives no consideration in regards to offending the audience members who have been cast as rapists in the butt of her joke. Their offence is of no consequence. In this confidence scam, the only offence of consequence is an offence done to the divine entitlement and delicate sensibilities of the hypocritical feminist.

Hypocrisy is offensive because it is a sort of violence to our reasonable sensibilities. Being morally excused from saying one thing and doing another is that which the divine Law-Giver does and this is what feminists like Lindy West often do. She is clearly an inconsiderate hypocrite. She does not give consideration in exchange for a comedian's sensitivity. She does not practice what she preaches. She gives nothing in exchange for her demands. She simply asserts a sort of divine right to control the narrative in exchange for literally nothing–the absence of something, her offence. Lindy West, you are a bigot, a hypocrite, a gender supremacist, barely distinguishable from a racial supremacists. In the words of the great comedian, Bill Burr, "go fuck yourself."

The Voice of Europe: PC and MRM

On June 14, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the ever increasing demand of „toning down" or „moderation" as if being polite, or politically correct, actually helps. There is little to no doubt that our approach of FTSU has proven to be a better one than just being polite and kindly ask for the feminist establishment to respect the principles of individual rights, or even their own principles for that matter. Nonetheless, these "appeals to moderation" keep appearing. We, in Europe, have been living under a politically correct culture longer than North America – maybe even longer for those in Eastern Europe where "mandates of truth" from the establishment where all too often encountered on many issues.
The debate on what you ("you" being a general term) can't say is long but a discussion in our show is worth having. We recommend the listeners to read this essay[1] as we'll base our talk on that one.
What is political correctness? Should we tone down? Why (not)?

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.
The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).
That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Starting today, Paul will no longer be accepting content submissions for AVfM. Now, before anybody's brain explodes, that doesn't mean you can't post your writing on the site, simply that Paul will no longer be your point of contact to do so. He is, as you might imagine, a busy fellow.
Our managing editor, Dean Esmay, Asha James (Typhon Blue) and myself have been for the past few weeks, the working editorial board at AVfM, and, starting now, we are the interface for contributors and writers on the site. Actually, unless you are already regularly contributing content to Dean or Typhon directly, I will be your contact for all future content submissions.
What do these changes mean for you?
Writers on the site who already have a contributor account, and who use that account to post articles directly into the site's back-end will continue to do exactly what they're doing already.
Writers who have been sending content by other methods, such as emailing word docs, or skyping walls of text to either Dean, Typhon, to Paul or to me will be set up with contributor accounts, and I will be your contact for all issues regarding the wordpress interface: "how do I log in?", "how do I submit an article", "how do I edit my author's bio" and so on.
Where do you send your articles now? Send them to:
editors@avoiceformen.com
And address them to "John the Other" or "JTO".
A tutorial on using the site's content control panel will be upcoming this week, and I will address all other questions by email. Thank you.

Steroids, Rape, and Toxic Anonymity

Jason Gregory · 15 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are pissed. Jose Canseco has outed his accuser.

I grew up watching Canseco and his "Bash Brother," Mark McGwire. They hit the long-ball a lot and they struck out…a lot. Canseco's nickname was "Jose Can-strikeout." He was as bad at striking out as he was good at hitting home-runs.

Even though Canseco's career was plagued with injuries, I remained a fan throughout the 90s and was glad when he outed his story of steroids in baseball. People knew that steroid use and abuse was rampant among baseball players, but rarely was anything said about the issue. So long as the fans were happy, so long as records were being broken, so long as attendance soared, the media, the owners, and the trainers mostly looked the other way. Even the drunken fans like me knew that something was wrong, but we didn't care. Long-ball was in. Small-ball was out and baseball players had the relative freedom of anonymity to juice their bodies as they pleased.

In an age of slut-walks and post women's sexual liberation, why do we care about anonymity for the rape accuser?

The whole point of granting the privilege of anonymity to the presumptive rape victim is to minimize the shame of being accused of possibly having had consensual sex. Do we still need to grant the protection of anonymity to rape accusers? Do women really need a white knight to ride in and protect them from shame? Are women such delicate flowers of moral purity that they cannot be strong enough to endure the publicity of their sex life? I think not. Anonymity is a special privilege granted to women and often denied to the accused men. Strong women shouldn't have to suffer alone and anonymously. Anonymity is for the weak. Strong women should come forward and be public about their sexual history. Strong women should have no shame about their sexuality, being raped, or talking publicly about their victimization. Taking refuge in anonymity perpetuates their victimization. After all what's shameful about being called a slut?

The occurrence of steroid abuse in baseball was perpetuated, in part, by the refuge of anonymity. Countless players were made victims, in part, by this anonymity. Home runs were not the only things to soar during the steroid era. The rates of ligament, tendon and other steroid-specific and related injuries to professional baseball players also soared throughout the steroid era. (Here is a link to more information about this correlation.) Had there been more transparency about the abuse of these performance enhancing drugs, steps could have been taken to ameliorate the problems. Instead, many of us cared more about the long-ball than we cared about the bodies and spirits of these men.

The anonymity perpetuated the disposable nature of these men, making them victims of their own utility, valuable primarily insofar as they perform and so long as their performance can be enhanced by the anonymous abuse of these drugs, rarely did anybody express care. Enter Jose Canseco. He came forward from the refuge of anonymity, shedding light on and making more transparent the proliferation and abuse of these drugs. He deserves much credit and respect for coming forward to make the story public. He also deserves credit for coming forward to make public the name of his accuser.

This is the 21st century. Although remnants of sexual shame may still exist in some areas within the bible-belt of America, I doubt they ever existed as a major influence in Las Vegas. Given the state of women's sexual liberation, the old reasons for rape-accuser anonymity carry less weight today.

As the anonymity of steroid abuse made men into victims, so too does the anonymity of the rape-accuser make men into victims, destroying their reputations, livelihoods, and lives. It's time to end the special privileges granted to women. Rape-accuser anonymity is a special privilege rooted in the antiquated idea that women are morally pure and that sex and sexuality is base and immoral. Again, this is the 21st century.

Jose Canseco is still a hero and he has hit another homerun, but this time he did it on Twitter.

Why I REFUSE to pay child support

Clayton Craddock · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When people ask me how can I be divorced with two children and pay no child support, I tell them I took a cue from Nancy Reagan; I "just said no."

I took the road less traveled. One that more men should be allowed to travel.

For the past 13 years, I have been fortunate to be a full-time musician. Since the time of our daughter's birth in 2003, I was at home with her during the day and working at night. Three years before my marriage ended, my wife and I agreed to switch roles. In order to make this arrangement work, I was extremely ambitious and found a way to work a 9-5 job as well as teach, perform in an Off-Broadway show and perform in weddings and corporate events. I paid all the bills while she took care of our daughter.

After two years of trying to fit back into the corporate world, I noticed a lack of communication between my wife and I. My focus was on our family; her attention appeared to be on the social calendar. My frustration with what seemed to be a lop-sided allocation of duties in our home-made for several stress filled months. Not only was I the sole breadwinner, I took care of many of the duties at home. The birth of our second child only intensified the tension in our home.

Working a full time job, gigs and doing much of the house work burnt me out so I quit my corporate job. Meanwhile my wife was unwilling to continue the therapy sessions we'd set up to find a way to repair our marriage. She hired an attorney and filed for divorce.

Our custody battle began in Family Court. During our first hearing, I received a court order for spousal support, which stated I was to continue paying all the bills until our case went to Supreme Court. On top of paying the household expenses, I had to pay my ex an additional $500 cash each month. I was furious. I questioned why I was responsible for everything and my wife was only responsible for being with the children.

Soon after filing, my wife began using the children as pawns. She filled the kid's day with play dates, and after one of our many heated arguments, took the kids to her mother's home in another state for two weeks so I could not see them. In addition to the attempts at alienating me from my children, my wife called the police after several arguments in futile attempts to have me vacate the marital residence and be thrown in jail. Luckily for me she was never psychotic enough to hurt herself or abuse the criminal justice system's bias against men.

When our case was transferred to New York State Supreme Court, things began to change. A few months into our dispute I received an unlikely source of inspiration. My family had given me a father's day gift certificate to a men's spa. Here is where I received life-changing advice from a female staff member who'd gone through a divorce several years before. She and her former spouse had mutually agreed that their son be raised by his father. She informed me that in New York State, couples had the option to "opt out" of paying child support upon dissolution of marriage. I immediately called my attorney and told him I wanted to do just that: opt out.

I must acknowledge one piece of the puzzle that gave me a slight advantage that no one has today. At the time of my lawsuit, New York was the last state who hadn't adopted no-fault laws. This gave me leverage that no one can use in court today. Now, everyone is at the mercy of their spouse and can't contest their divorce. In fact, most people have no idea that your spouse can file for divorce for any reason and not have to prove why they want out of the marriage. This is a real disadvantage for the monied spouse in my state because the custodial parent gains an advantage with the child support guidelines. The spouse who makes more money is ordered to pay the non-custodial parent.

At the time, my attorney and I decided to contest my ex's grounds for divorce. We were willing to compel her to tell the truth under oath. My ex would have perjured herself in court since there were several inconsistencies in her sworn deposition. Her attorney decided it would be unwise for her to proceed in that manner. This was the turning point that forced a settlement.

After 11 months in and out of court, we agreed that my parenting time would take place during the day; hers at night and that no one would pay child support. I wouldn't have it any other way. I walked out of the courtroom secure in the knowledge that I could financially support our two children in a way that made much more sense to me. I did not succumb to the societal pressure to pay an ex-wife, child or spousal support because men have historically done so.

I'm not sure many men have the testicular fortitude to endure the pain it takes to achieve this goal today. Particularly since the avenue I pursued is now closed off to men in the family court's crusade against fatherhood. I certainly thought of giving up but never did. I was also determined to get the court to understand the seriousness of my desire to be a fully committed parent and I was willing to go through the financial expense of seeing it through.
During my custody battle, I came to a deeper understanding how the courts system works and how the law applied in my particular case. I persevered by demonstrating that I was rational, reasonable, and always focused on the best interest of my children. Instead of relying solely on my attorney's advice and historical precedent, I saw the bigger picture and thought long term.
I used several tactics to my advantage. I never left or was forced out of our marital residence, I managed to avoid physical altercations by keeping my emotions in check as much as possible, avoided being taken to jail by the NYPD by calmly explaining my side of the story and kept my focus by remaining totally devoted to my two children. I always took the high road and never talked badly about my ex to our children, no matter how tempting. I still don't-she is the mother of our kids. They love her just as much as they love me.
I know all too well the stories of men who get taken advantage of by unscrupulous attorneys who don't offer alternatives and other potential options their clients can pursue. State ordered child support should only be enforced when a spouse chooses to abdicate the responsibility of raising their children. There is no excuse for a parent to abandon their children. In my subsequent research, I have discovered that many fathers do not want to leave their children. Many times they are FORCED out.
Mandatory arrests laws that were written to protect women over the years have often been abused and are at times used to force fathers from the home straight into jail. This, in conjunction with punitive child support orders and the threat of imprisonment if it isn't paid have been just a few of the reasons for the increase of widespread fatherlessness over the past 40 years.
The threat of divorce, child support orders or jail should ever stop a devoted father from having a healthy relationship with his children. No one should have the right to deny that important relationship unless there are serious criminal matters and there is due process.
Today it seems that many women intentionally abuse a system that was set up in the 1950's and 1960's to assist with the necessary expenses of child rearing for children that both parents gave consent to have. Now that women have joined the workforce in unprecedented numbers–and birth control frees them from the constraints they were otherwise under–it makes little sense to keep men stuck back in an era that has long passed. Women don't want to go back to that era-men don't either. If times have progressed for women, why are men forced to stay in the past?
I have seen many cases where spousal and/or child support is automatically assumed to be part of divorce even though it may be unwarranted, and most attorneys don't even discuss potential options for their clients. I truly feel that men who desire to be a part of their children's lives need not pay their future ex-wife at all.
My ex wife and I, more often than not, peacefully co-exist without a state ordered child or spousal support. I must emphasize this particular point: if anyone chooses the road I took, it requires a lifelong commitment of taking care of your children – something that unfortunately, most men today are not even given an opportunity to do.
I feel the default option in custody cases should be joint legal and physical custody with no court ordered child support absent a strong reason. Start with a 50/50 split of parenting time with the children. If that can't happen and money needs to be transferred, the person receiving the funds needs to be held accountable for how the money is being spent. As it stand now, there is no way to account for how the funds are being used for the children.
The more often we keep the filthy claws of state and federal government out of our lives, the better. Once they get in, they never let go. The formation of the family court system, the state and federal offices of child support enforcement and all of the affiliated positions associated with it, has resulted in the creation of a massive state controlled Industry whose sole function is to affect the massive transfer of wealth from the father to the mother.
The increase in state intrusion in our personal lives coupled with the culture of entitlement and unreasonable expectations currently embedded in our public consciousness, creates a system that feeds upon itself. It appears that this former government safety net has turned into a spider web. Eventually it will bleed fathers dry and the real victims will be their children.

When there are two loving parents that want to be actively involved in their children's lives after divorce, there is no need to travel down the expected path of family court and mandatory child and/or spousal support. Women can learn from my story and understand that just because you may no longer love the father of your kids, your children do. Children need their mother AND father. Find a way to stay out of that hell hole they loosely call "Family Court." I am living proof that there is another way.
For father's day, give your ex the gift of letting him be a father.

Leaving the man-desert

Neil Westlake · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The decline of the father in modern family life continues apace. Also, happy father's day.
According to a new report by the British think tank, the Centre for Social Justice, the rate of single parent families (most of which have a female as the sole parent) are growing by 200,000 a year. Referring to what he termed 'men deserts,' Christian Guy, director of the CSJ, said: "For children growing up in some of the poorest parts of the country, men are rarely encountered in the home or in the classroom. This is an ignored form of deprivation that can have profoundly damaging consequences on social and mental development. There are 'men deserts' in many parts of our towns and cities and we urgently need to wake up to what is going wrong." (1.)
The fact that many young children do not have access to a single male role model is alarming. The benefits of a father figure on the well-being of children have been documented for several decades, yet we continue on with the marginalization of men in the home and workplace. The 'you go grrll' culture of unbridled female agency and unaccountability, along with a zeitgeist that portrays men as bumbling idiots, anti-social creeps, violent abusers and sexual predators, means that men, everywhere, live under permanent psychological assault. As a result of this cultural warfare, male teachers and mentors are in increasing decline. One only has to look at the ordeal suffered by the science teacher, Christopher Hird, earlier this week, to appreciate the perils facing those who remain. (2.)
Children with little or no fatherly guidance in their homes are being denied male-mediation / intervention (and thus are unable to avail themselves of it's attendant, restorative healing) in our schools.
This scant access to male energy and wisdom translates into tragedy. The wholeness of the male and female principles, working together, is abated. More pertinently, any of the limit-setting strictures that are traditionally associated with paternalistic concern, completely disappear from children's worlds as such limits are most needed. Consequently, the rates of adolescent depression, delinquency, sexual promiscuity or substance abuse rise accordingly.
So I am compelled to ask: as Father's Day approaches, are we going to get yet another malignant tirade; yet another round of projectile-vomit-cum-hatred from the podium in the rose garden? Are we to be regaled with with yet more bile about the spurious 'epidemic' of dead-beat dads?
I would ask Mr Obama himself. Have you not already flogged that beast to death? Surely, you can, finally, drop this daddy-is-the-boogeyman rhetoric. Can we not all fast-forward to a more realistic rendering of the truth? Sing a different song, if you will?
One which may actually speak of fathers being kind and loving beings – playful, respectful and even dutiful?
No, no, of course not.
The disposability of the father figure has been underscored, all too trenchantly, in my own life. Like a 'whack-a-mole,' it pops up when I am in the park, when a female stranger comes up and asks, inquisitorially, "are these really your children?" It pokes it's head out of it's hidey-hole every time I am asked to sign a parental consent form and the only fields printed on the paper are 'Mother,' 'Grandparent' or 'Guardian.' Like many men, I am continually given the covert message from certain quarters, that, as a father, I do not really matter.
However, this father and male human rights activist, knows different. I know that other song, see? I wager that you know it, too: the melody is fast becoming an ear-worm and, in no time at all, we will know all the goddamn words.
To dads everywhere: Happy Father's Day.

Bible Of The Bearded Clam

Diana Davison · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Cultists of the Bearded Clam come in two varieties, women who think they can do everything better than men and men who think women are worthy of worship. This is the Canon of Cunt, the Dogma of Douche, the Gospel of Gash, and the Tenet of Twats. The holy grail they seek will be served by men, filled with male blood and a tray of crumpets on the side.
A cunning stunt has been performed in which a class of people strive to “have it all”(1) while simultaneously insisting they are oppressed. This is their bible.

Genesis Of The Emasculated Man

Chapter 1

In the beginning the Holy Harpy created the feminist universe. She looked about and saw nothing of value. (2) The waters of this nothingness swirled about Her and was filled only with Her own reflection. Seeing that Her reflection was dark and murky She set Her bra on fire to create more light then quickly replaced it with a padded three way push-up version.
Next, the Harpy divided the light into masculine and feminine qualities putting a great divide between the two thus declaring one to be good and the other evil. So ended the first day.
Then the Harpy said, Let there be a firmament separating the waters and placing Women’s Studies between the two. Below the firmament was the Patriarchy and above it was Enlightenment. She looked down on Her creation and smiled. Thus ended the second day.
And the Harpy caused dry land to appear so that She might spread the seed of Her ideas amongst the arid cuntry. Feminist tablets were carved and groups gathered around them and soon those seeds took root. Trees grew and their fruits were self-propagating so that new seeds would spread into the wind. The Harpy saw that it was good and so ended the third day.
And the Harpy said, Let laws be enshrined to preserve the separation of masculine from feminine.
And so battered wife syndrome, rape culture, sexual harassment lawsuits, educational reforms, and special grants offered only to women were adopted by the governments. And the laws flourished and multiplied and the prisons were filled and the politicians cowered at the foot of the female vote. The Harpy saw that it was good and so ended the fourth day.
Then the Harpy said, Let the evil waters fill with bloated creatures and She called them Manginas. She taught them to satisfy the whims of the female and the Harpy instilled shame upon them so that they would be repelled by the Sea of Patriarchy in which they swam. Then the Harpy said, Let the arid cuntry fill with spindly creatures who can fly overhead. She called them White Knights and they protected the female from above picking off the belligerent sea creatures who evaded the Manginas and dared to raise their slimy heads from the evil waters. The Harpy was pleased and thus ended the fifth day.
And the Harpy said, Let all women control reproduction so that no man be they from sea or air may wilfully cause or prevent a pregnancy. She created laws to strip all men of their reproductive rights forcing them into homelessness or banishing them to the Land of Prison if they resisted these laws. And the Harpy gave woman dominion over all the heathen male creatures before her. So ended the sixth day.
Seeing all that She had created, the Holy Harpy laughed and blessed all of Her creation and on the seventh day She rested.

Chapter 2

When the Holy Harpy awoke She heard woman crying that she was lonely and had no suitable mate with which to breed. (3) The Harpy caused woman to fall into a deep sleep while She took men from the air and sea and ingrained female qualities into them so that they might be allowed to walk the dry land of the female. And when all of the things that made him masculine were flogged out of him, then woman did awake. She cleaved unto her spouse so they became as one flesh and they were not ashamed.

Chapter 3

For a brief time woman and her crafted version of man lived a happy but stunted libidinal life. But the serpent of masculinity slithered into her garden one day and dangled his manhood before her. He told her how sumptuous the apples of the sea were and so woman gave into temptation. While the Harpy was busy engraving a new magazine that spoke of sins, woman followed the snake into the ocean and they copulated with abandon. And so the Harpy discovered that many of Her blessed creatures had been sneaking off into the evil waters to lay with the slimy sea dwellers. (4) In a fit of rage, the Harpy then decreed that the definition of rape be expanded until all acts of fornication could be defined as criminal. She turned woman against woman until the lush garden was ripped asunder with frivolousness and suspicion. Women turned away from the Harpy and the Harpy sent them from her sight and they scattered into fractured houses.
And here ends the chronicles of the Garden of Feminism.

The Great Flood

And it came to pass that women busied themselves with industry causing them to spend increasingly more time in the domain of men. The Holy Harpy looked down upon them and became enraged at all the women who had wandered astray. Women had let men believe that the men owned the homes they lived in and unleashed a baby boom after many men had been smote in a great war. Some of them did speak fondly of housewifery as a career. The Harpy appeared to Her prophet, Betty Friedan, and instructed her to build an ark. A great wave would be caused to wash over the world flooding all that there was and only those that Betty brought upon her boat would survive. And so Betty set about the task of crafting the sailing vessel and named it The Feminine Mystique.
Though charged with saving all of the female species, the ark was only big enough to fit a select group of first class women. (5)
As the whole world was flooded, this elitist problem was pushed aside and those few who had been spared heralded the ark as a miraculous achievement. The men who were saved for breeding and for hoisting the sails and emptying chamber pots were kept busy fixing leaks that sprang in the boat lest it sink with them and all those aboard. After forty days and forty nights Betty sent out a male dove to search for dry land and it did return brandishing a twig of poison ivy and she had it slaughtered. She sent then a female dove which dutifully brought back an olive branch, thereby making her the symbol of peace.
When the ark struck land, the Harpy reiterated Her command to go forth and multiply. They did so, resulting in the epoch of The Sex Wars (6) The Harpy promised to never flood the world in wrath again and next time would merely make a rainbow. It seemed all was innocent and so time did pass once more.

Tower of Babble

Women began to begat as never before. Teenagers swollen with child filled the land acquiring their own network shows. (7) Women took control of sexuality and men slaved to keep up with their demands. (8) The female lust for cock so enraged the Holy Harpy that she confounded their language until it became impossible for them to communicate. Words and phrases such as “privilege” and “phallocentric hegemony” became entwined with “intersectionality” (9) until feminists found themselves warring with each other as well as with men who identified as female. The rainbow that the Harpy did promise became a curse. (10) Gender bent until it broke and young children were put on hormone blockers. (11)
The communication faculties of all genders were brought to a grinding halt and every generation stared woefully at its own destruction. The Harpy assured them that the end of men was a good thing. (12)

Sodom, Femdom and The City of Porn

The tribes gave birth to heirs and they fought many territorial battles. As time came and went the Holy Harpy no longer walked with them or let them see Her face. They had many leaders who became oracles of the Harpy, and they passed along the commandments and the laws laid down so that they might appease Her. But women continued to stray into the evil waters to seek out their old false gods and the forbidden alpha men. The prophets warned the women of the Holy Harpy's wrath but their vanity and their weakness caused them not to shy from the call of the sea of testosterone. Despite numerous magazine articles and self-help tablets, they had been unable to turn their blessed land males into the thing they desired. This caused a terrible rift among women until they were split into two sides which have remained at war to this day.

For the men, they worshipped by proxy watching for scarce and subtle signs of their own worthiness. Every time they got lucky it was a sign that the Harpy was pleased. When one tribesman sinned all were punished and so they watched each other closely offering regular sacrifices to their resident priestess. These men served woman faithfully and in fear. (13)

The warring tribes followed two different sets of commandments, and the men were now beholden to both versions of the holy book. They slaved to make more jails and as the lists of commandments grew so did the prison system. (14) On occasion they would cry out in despair and the Holy Harpy heard them.

The men of the land were allowed to drink beer and watch violent games contained within arenas where some of the water dwellers were permitted to play sports. Women monitored their men closely during these times because they knew that the men would be vulnerable to reverting to the old ways of the Alpha. (15) Some of the women took pleasure in the elevated excitement that would result from their men's brief exposure but would quickly destroy any lingering testosterone brought home from the games. (16)

And so they continued in this manner, waiting for the Promised Land.

Thus ends Genesis of the emasculated man.

Death Before Dishonor

Paul Elam · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Except in really exceptional circumstances with really exceptional people, father-son relationships can be complicated, difficult and even bloody. Sure, there are some "Hallmark" father-son teams, and a lot more good fathers than most people usually recognize these days. However, the stress of individuation, autonomy, father-son competition and the ever present generation gap can make for a mess of difficulties with the best of people – and often do.

My relationship with my father wasn't exempt from such problems. It was one fraught with conflict, resentment and distance. It ended well, but it took a long, very hard road to get there. It is not a story I can tell with any justice in one sitting. Still, it seems that this is a good a day is any to tell you what I can in a single serving.

Dad was a hard a man as they come. He was rigid, unyielding and not one for compromise with anyone, including his sons. A tattoo was etched into his forearm; a skull skewered by a dagger from the top. A single strand of ribbon was wrapped back and forth, starting at the handle, crossing the dead, bony face, and ending at the base. There were three words on it, one at each pass of the ribbon.

Death Before Dishonor.

It was a sentiment that at different times in my young life seemed either cool in an old school sort of way, or crazy, which is about the interpretation I would expect from a snot-nosed kid whose experience with hardship was being forced to mow the yard and occasionally hearing the word "no."

But it was, as I look back fifty years to the first I remember of that tattoo, a sentiment that was much more to him than skin and ink. And now it is much more to me.

Born in the shock wave of the great stock market crash, he spent his early years on a farm in depression era Texas with 12, yes 12 brothers and sisters. He signed up for the military when he was 16, an act he later described without ever really explaining as escaping his family. He barely missed the carnage of WWII. It did not save him from Korea, though, where he completed two combat tours, leaving his blood, bits of flesh and whatever innocence he had on the battlefield.

[image]He had been awarded two Purple Hearts, a Silver Star and a string of other commendations that I know of. I did not learn about this from my parents. I might have never known about them but for stumbling upon the evidence. I found them one day when I was 15 and poking through his old effects in the bottom of a box in the garage. I asked him what they were for.

"Nothing," he said, and in the next moment he was walking away. I asked my mother later that day and, after a lot of pressing, she told me. Most of the recognition he got was for being shot, twice; for taking a back full of shrapnel from a mortar round that killed two other men that were standing with him. One of them was a close friend. The damage to his back caused pain for the rest of his life.

Then there was the scar on his leg from a phosphorous grenade that burned him, white hot, to the bones of his ankle and calf.

The Silver Star was for doing damage to others. The story, near as I can remember it, was that his platoon was stranded on a hilltop at a fuel depot. They were low on ammunition and out of food. The base of the hill was packed with North Koreans and Chinese, leaving them effectively trapped and starving. During the night my father and four other men improvised the best weapon they had, diesel fuel, and used it to make fire bombs. They used them effectively, and burned a good many enemy soldiers alive. That was in 1950. He was 21 years old.

He got a nice, shiny medal for it. My mother also told me that he woke up screaming and soaked in sweat every night for nearly five years after he got home. Dreams of burning men.

"Nothing," he said, and now I knew why – at least as much as a snot-nosed kid could know.

In 1965 he went to Vietnam as an advisor. In Vietnam, "advisor" was the English word for "primary target" to the NVA and Viet Cong. And of course, he got shot there, too. He was also exposed to Agent Orange, which was like a ticking time bomb planted in his battered body. Later, in his mid-fifties, when he first started showing signs of brain impairment which was later diagnosed as early onset Alzheimer's Disease, the military was quick to respond with their typical support. They turned down his request to increase his disability and informed him rather abruptly that any connection between Agent Orange and Alzheimer's Disease was purely speculative – probably the ranting of quacks and lawyers.

They reversed that position and recognized the connection in 2010, 19 years after he (and a lot of other vets) were dead. I am sure if they had known they would have gladly compensated him for his troubles.

I did not set out to write about the military's shortcomings, even though those shortcomings are still shortchanging a world full of fathers. I just wanted to acknowledge what killed him. As Warren Farrell quoted a Vietnam Vet as saying in his book, The Myth of Male Power, "I got killed in Vietnam. I just didn't know it at the time."

What I really wanted to tell you was how my Dad got hardened; how he became the man he was, and yes, the father that he was – every distant, harsh, sometimes cruel and overbearing part of him. It was all these things, I think. It was old school, blue-pill manhood, the unspeakable nightmare of wars, the quiet, unsung weight of endless obligation to a wife and children, to country and comrade; to many things other than himself.

Or maybe it is just me, still looking for an answer, for the ten thousandth time. These questions never fail to haunt the mind of a son.

What could make a man live by such ironclad convictions and dedication, to a job, event to a country, but have seemingly so little to invest in his own flesh and blood? What made him so blind to the idea that providing meant more than clothing and beans on a plate? What could make a man willing to catch bullets, but not a baseball?

Those are the questions the son in me always wants to ask. And the son in me is never satisfied with the answers. Perhaps that is because the son in me is not a man, but a child.

The man in me sees something different. Like the fact that those plates of beans never quit coming. Like the clothes that were always on my back, and the roof that was always over my head. Like that fact that I could afford to be pissed off about having to mow a yard. And like the fact that he spared me the burden of knowing how it was all paid for.

The son in me spent a lot of years raking my father over the coals. I excoriated him time and again in my mind, for failing to give things he did not have to give. I spent years blaming whatever failures I had in life on him. Geez, if he had just had a better father I would probably be president by now.

And the fact is, my father probably did prevent me from becoming president, or any kind of politician, or a personal injury lawyer, or a scumbag academician peddling victim theory for a buck and a shot at tenure.

Remember that tattoo? Like I said, it wasn't a fashion statement. If there was one thing my father would take me to task for, and sometimes brutally, it was to act without honor. Those three words, "Death Before Dishonor"? Well, I am pretty convinced that he would have been willing to apply that standard to me as well.

My Dad made early and fast progress in the military. On the battlefield he was a dynamo. He went from Private E-2 to Sergeant First Class, E-7, in just ten months from quick, battlefield promotions.

He never got promoted again.

His tendency to tell the truth, even in the face of power, did not do wonders for his career. It was a career that was more than once threatened to be terminated due to insubordination. My father wasn't going to compromise, not with anyone. He was never willing to kiss an ass to get a stripe. As I found out in my own stint in the military, one that was also graced with the same lack of promotions, the apple did not fall that far from the tree.

Sometimes we learn because people take time to teach us and spell things out. Sometimes we learn because we have a living example of what we need to learn in front of us all the time. My father, covered in scars and the weight of more horrors than I could ever imagine, was my lesson. He was hard, and he made me hard. He was principled, and he made me principled. He was willing to pay a price for what he believed in, and he would not tolerate a son without a spine or who lived without honor.

I still don't like the way I got all the lessons. The child in me probably never will. And I cannot honestly say that he didn't also teach me what I did not want to be in some ways. There was some of him I am glad I did not become, and some of him I wish I had not become, but I have.

Still, it seems my spine, the one he gave me, has come in handy in the life I have chosen. And so has my honor. I would rather be dead than to be without it.

My father and me

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 16 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

My father was born in 1938 during WWII in a small town outside a large city in Germany. He was the only son in a family of ten children. He was six years old when the war ended in 1944, and his earliest memories are of houses burning, being painfully hungry and soldiers marching.

Dad and his sisters suffered through extreme food deprivation, as did countless others. Indeed, he experienced such severe malnutrition that his growth was permanently stunted and he reached an adult height of only 5'4, despite the fact that his father and grandfather and uncles were all well over 6'. He has huge hands and incredible upper body strength, a testament to the physical man he might have been.

He witnessed horrors we can barely comprehend, including the deaths of four of his sisters. They did not just die, they died in front of him. Dad is not forthcoming with war stories, and I have never heard the exact circumstances under which he lost his sisters. It is simply too painful, all these years later, to recount. One story he will tell is watching a Russian tank burn, and seeing desperate soldiers escape through the hatch, only to be beaten to death at the roadside by old women with shovels and hammers.

Those experiences made him a profoundly religious man, and sadly, his views of pain and suffering were always ones of comparison. Dad was offered a place at the gymnasium in Stuggart (a university preparatory), but his father, a former SS officer, forbade it. He would learn a useful skill, and he was sent to agricultural college. His father didn't see the Green Revolution coming, and by the time Dad graduated, industrial farming was well under way.

Dad married in Germany, and had two sons. Like many others, he turned his face towards the New World, seeking opportunity and greener pastures. When his children were ten and eight, he set forth for North America, leaving his sons and his wife in the care of his mother and sisters, promising to return for them when he had secured a job and a home for them.

He never went back. He abandoned them.

He met my mother when she was just nineteen years old and he was considerably older. He never told her about his family back in Germany, and they married and had four children by the time my mother was 25 years old. My three brothers, and me.

And they were fucking horrible parents. There is no nice way to spin it. They embraced a religion that encouraged extreme violence against children. Their philosophy was that a child's will must be completely broken so that the child will then accept the will of God. My mother was ecstatically violent, and my father less so, but they were both culpable. Their particular brand of religious violence continues in America to this day.

http://www.examiner.com/article/another-child-s-death-linked-to-pearls-and-to-train-up-a-child
To compound our suffering, my parents also believed that any demonstration of physical affection would "spoil" a child, and I have not one single memory of my mother or father kissing or hugging us, or showing any sign whatsoever that they loved us.
When my father came towards me, as a child, all I felt was … fear. I wondered what pain was in store. And no matter what it was, I knew it would pale in comparison to the pain he had suffered. I was supposed to feel grateful for that.
I didn't.

We lived on a farm, growing our own food, making our own bread, with chickens and cows and bees (for honey) and pigs and endless fields of potatoes. Whatever money my parents managed to earn, they turned over to the crazy church. It was an interesting childhood, to say the least.
And then….my mother discovered feminism. She exchanged one violent, irrational, dehumanizing ideology for another, and she soon decided that she needed a man like a fish needed a bicycle. After countless physically violent arguments with my father, including one episode where she hit him in the head with a cast iron frying pan and left him for dead on the front porch, he turned his back and walked away from us, just like his first family.
One day we woke up and he was gone. My mother was quick to inform us that he simply walked away, and left us to starve in the streets, and that she alone would be the sole reason we survived and prospered. She never missed an opportunity to curse him. She told us about his first family, and how she did not need to divorce him, because they were never married in the first place. She hated him and hated all men and our daily lives were filled with her anger and vitriol and violence. She never gave a moment's thought to what her hatred of men and our father was doing to her sons. She gave us daily rations of rage and blame and every bad thing that happened was always his fault.
Being a child, I believed it. So did my brothers.
And we loathed him for it. How could he leave us with such an evil woman? My mother once held a knife to my throat and made me beg for my life. When I was eleven. And I remember going to bed, thinking not how much I hated her, but how much I hated HIM for leaving us to her devices.
Needless to say, coming in to my own as a person was a difficult and very fraught process. When I finally made it to university, I had literally no idea what a loving, affectionate, decent relationship looked like. I was lucky enough to meet Pixie almost immediately, and although her material circumstances were much more comfortable than mine, she too had experienced a horrifically traumatic and abusive childhood. I will leave it to Pixie to reveal any details. Suffice to say, at our posh university, we were definitely outsiders.
Interestingly enough, I was never attracted to men who behaved badly. I never sought to enmesh myself in relationships that replicated the worst of my father. Quite the opposite. I didn't seek out pain in an effort to work through what I had suffered. I had a lovely boyfriend who was all kindness and sympathy. He was the gentlest man I have ever known. And I cannot adequately articulate how his gentleness and caring healed me.
He proposed marriage, but ultimately, he was far too compliant and mild, and I was disconcerted by his willingness to acquiesce to what I wanted, even though I never wanted anything bad. I could trust him to treat me with the utmost kindness and care, but I could not lean on him. That was impossible. I declined his proposal and moved on.
I eventually landed at graduate school, in an MBA program, where I met my husband. From the time my father left and all throughout my twenties, I never saw him. I knew he was working overseas and only landed stateside a couple of times a year, but I never sought him out and he never looked for me. I married and went overseas myself, and after a year in Australia and another year in China came back to North America with a young daughter and my son only months away from being born.

http://judgybitch.com/2012/11/03/i-went-to-mba-school-to-get-my-mrs-degree-and-it-worked/
And then I received a phone call. It was my father, calling to tell me that my mother's mother had passed away, and that I should let her know. So much of the pain had seeped away that I felt confident confronting my father, and I asked him why he had done it.
Why did you just turn your back and walk away?
And then the truth came to light. He hadn't walked away. He certainly had not left us to starve. My mother had filed for an annulment and requested a restraining order, which she was granted. When I finally saw my father again, he had two boxes with him. One was filled with income tax returns showing that he had never missed a child support payment, and court orders preventing him from seeing us based on his violence towards my mother, along with supervised visitations that were all scheduled for when he was overseas, working to meet his child support payments.

The other box contained cards and letters. Birthday cards and so many letters. All returned. By my mother. He never stopped sending them, hoping one of us would one day get the key and fetch the mail, but my mother was always adamant that the mail was her business. It was one of those community mailboxes, where you had to go and fetch your mail, and since I never got any mail, it never occurred to me that there was anything untoward about my mother's insistence that only she would have access to it.

As an adult, it makes so much sense. How did we continue to live in our house? How was my mother able to afford food and clothing and YMCA memberships for four children without my father's support? Of course she had his support. But she hid it from us, and poisoned our minds against our father. It's called parental alienation, and she is not the first, nor the last woman to destroy her children in this way.
http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Parental_alienation
It's a special kind of evil.
It has been many years since I have had any contact with my mother. She hated Mr. JB with a passion, and saw that she could not control him. She forbid me to marry him. I told her to go fuck herself. With the birth of my own children, I have truly come to grasp the depths of her depravity. It is unthinkable for me to hurt my children. I would die before I ever whipped them unconscious with a wet leather belt. I would kill anyone who tried to do such a thing.

It was not just my mother who was violent during my childhood, though, and a huge part of the reason I have a relationship with my father is owing to the heart-felt, tear-soaked apology he offered me. My father does not cry. It was an intensely emotional experience, to listen to him express his regrets for what he had done.

"If I could do my life again, I would have showered you with love, and never lifted a hand against you".

He gave no excuses, no justifications, no defenses. My father looked at me and apologized for being wrong. So very wrong.

And I forgave him. I cannot turn back the hands of time and restore his children to him, but I have three beautiful children of my own, and he is a wonderful grandfather to them. He gives them all the love and attention he denied his own children. And I understand profoundly how important that is. In being the mother to my children that I wished I had, I have erased so much of the damage she inflicted. In being a loving, perfect grandfather, my father is able to forgive himself for being a terrible father.

The most amazing relationship has blossomed between my Dad and my husband, too. Mr. JB is the son my Dad wishes he had. They go fishing and do home improvement projects together and sit in the sun and have cold beer and talk about football. My Dad holds forth on his crackpot conspiracy theories and my husband laughs at him and tells Dad he's nuts and they laugh and watch the kids race up and down the street.

Today is Father's Day. Millions of fathers will wake up to pancakes and glitter covered construction paper cards and new socks and ties. Millions more will wake up to a quiet house, their children only ghosts that haunt the corners of the room. This post is for those fathers. I am a living testament to the fact that children grow up, and they look back and see truth that they could not see when they were only children. Estrangement from your children is the most unbearable pain, and to see your children twisted against you is pure agony.

But there is hope. Children are not children forever. The brutal reality is that the women who injure their children in this way will never face any punishment from the law. Their own children may not be so forgiving.

My mother stole my father from me and blighted my childhood in so many ways. My revenge has been to refuse to allow her to influence my life, to refuse to carry out a cycle of abuse and to be a good mother to my own children. My revenge has been to marry a good man, and be a good wife. My revenge has been to find my father, forgive him, and be a good daughter. I cannot give him back the days past, but I can give him this day, and all the days to come.

Never lose hope. The future could be so different.
Happy Father's Day.
Lots of love,
JB

Monday Roundup

Dean Esmay · 17 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Howdy y'all. Have a good weekend? I hope you did, and whether you did or didn't, I hope this roundup of everything interesting that's happened on AVfM the last week will give you a stimulating start to your week!
Ever the rationalist, Mark Trueblood has returned to our pages to note what being strong and independent means. We know a lot of ladies at places like Feministing and Jezebel who ought to read that. Think they'd ever bother? Well hope springs eternal and all that.
In the meantime, Paul Elam viciously and ruthlessly savages helpless comedian Bill Burr. OK, no, actually, he loves Bill Burr and agrees with everything Burr says in a recent classic rant, but points out one important thing he thinks Burr missed. But you know, when it comes to A Voice for Men, a lot of people can't tell the difference between irrational ranting and making a good point to a respected colleague. So you know, condolences to Bill for his cyber-raping at the hands of Paul. Or something. (Nah, just read it, it's pretty good, even Bill will like it I'll bet.)
India is a country that's growing not just in population, but is also a hotbed of a growing Men's Human Rights Movement. As one example, check out Bob O'Hara and James Huff's terrific interview with Anill Kumar. If you thought the problems of misandry and gynocentrism were just a problem in the so-called "West," think again.
Andy Thomas of MRA London continues to kick ass and takes name, and makes note of a completely irresponsible misandrist ad campaign in the UK. Every time as an American when I look around at the deplorable state of human rights for men and boys in this country, I thank God I don't live in the UK, Australia, or Canada. And note to my Canadian, British, and UK friends: I hope you realize that's nothing personal, just a painful observation about reality. Oh, and saying the US seems a bit better off than you guys is a pretty fucking low bar. "Solidarity brothers" is all I can say.
Hey, have I ever mentioned that our very own 21st century Charles Coughlin, PZ Myers, likes to tell rape jokes? Well in case, I haven't, he does. And if I did mention it, just assume I didn't want you to forget. Oh, and also, Jason Gregory has noticed that so does feminist comedienne Lindy West. But I guess in her case it's okay because: vagina.
We just got through Father's Day. It was a pretty good day for me. I'm hoping for some of you it was excellent. I know for many of you it was a day of pain and heartbreak. But take heart, people realize it and the pushback is growing. So take it for what it's worth: Clayton Cramer is calling bullshit on some crap being pulled by Hallmark. And if you think that misandrist crap is going to be contained to America's black community, you're crazy. Just be sure to check your blood pressure before you read Clayton's article.
Jason Gregory had a fascinating article this week that is turning more fascinating over time. In a piece on Facebook's moral stupidity, we wound up issuing a slight retraction about Google returns. Then a day or two later we found the evidence that we thought we had lost. Joshua was 100% correct–and David Futrelle is caught out as a dishonest weasel once again. Joshua was right about everything including the Google search results, although the fact that he looked wrong is actually good news. Look for an updated article on this in the near future penned by yours truly, with the appropriate screen shots.
Ty Henry returns to grace our pages with yet another tale of the double standards wherein girls and women are given a free pass for things that would land any boy or man in jail with almost no sympathy for anyone. Save Kaitlyn Hunt… but not our sons? Apparently, Ty, apparently. Now a few people made the case that we should want boys treated the same as Kaitlyn treated as bad as boys. You know what? I don't care which side of that you're on. Just pick one or the other. The double standards and hypocrisy need to end.
A survivor of Nicolae Ceaușescu's Romania, Lucian Vâlsan has never thought much of socialism, collectivism, or statism. Whether you like his politics or not, his views on things like Political Correctness are things spoiled Westerners, who've never known the horrors of a full-on communist regime, are views you should not casually dismiss… especially when he starts saying in all seriousness that much of what we're seeing today isn't much better than what he saw in Communist Romania. Be sure to check out his episode of AVfM radio with Huffnágel Pista and James Huff, Political Correctness and the Men's Rights Movement.
Oh, and do you still think the ages of sports heroes is over? Well I have to say that as much as I don't much follow professional sports, and as much as anyone may have other bad or good things to say about Jose Canseco, Jose Canseco will always be a hero to me for this. More men need to speak out, and fucking loudly. And they need to name names exactly as he did. Thanks for bringing that one to our attention too, Jason.

The lat few weeks you may have noticed some serious technical glitches on A Voice for Men. During that transition we've also been rearranging the editorial team to better handle the increased volume of traffic and submissions to A Voice for Men. More and more people, male and female alike, are coming out of the closet as Men's Human Rights Advocates, and writing just terrific stuff, without apology. To keep up with this ever-increasing firehose of pressure, we're modifying the rules for submission a bit. John Hembling has some information of interest to contributors, which may seem more complicated than what you're used to but once you get the hang of it actually will make things a lot smoother and more easy for everybody to understand when they submit work to us.

There is a persistent myth that most Men's Human Rights Advocates are right-of-center. Well there may be a slight right tilt here, a slight left tilt there, a streak of libertarianism runs through a lot of us, but in the end your politics don't matter as much as the results. A few months ago we had an absolutely stinging rebuke of Congressional Republicans, and Republicans in general. Well this time President Obama is being taken to the woodshed for his utterly abysmal record to date on men's and boys' issues by Neil Westlake. Kick him a few more times for me, would ya Neil?

Have you heard that Clayton Cramer refuses to pay child support? Yeah, he does. And he "gets away with it" because it's the right thing for his children, and his ex-. You'll have to read it to find out more, but by the time you're done reading you'll be asking yourself why something like this isn't the default arrangement everybody should be living under.

In another Father's Day missive, Paul Elam peels back the curtain just a little about his own father. We don't all have great relationships with our fathers, but they're always important relationships that should never be denied us. Paul looks at the good and bad in his father and himself, and I think you can glimpse from that essay just how big an influence a father, even one you don't always like, can be.

Also on the theme of Father's Day: I remember well the first time I spotted an article by JudgyBitch. It was on her own blog. I didn't like everything she said but I liked how she said it, and some of her insights were brilliant and I said, "we have got to get this bitch on AVfM." And we did. And usually she's a fun read, but this time she's outdone herself. If you can read My father and me and not be misty-eyed and swallowing hard by the end of it, you're made out of stone. I still have no words for it. Thank you, JB.

Speaking of talented honeybadgers who keep popping out of the woodwork, Diana Davison has turned into one of the most talented short essayists I've ever seen. Please note that I did not qualify that by saying "on A Voice for Men." I suppose her subtle and devastating wit and keen intellect will get past some people (especially stupid people and feminists) but the Bible of the Bearded Clam is one of the funniest damned things I've ever read. Maybe you have to be up on Biblical scholarship a bit to get it, but boy if you get it, you'll get it. Diana may be going to Hell for that one, but she'll be laughing all the way down.

For some reason, the mythical "rift between Men Going Their Own Way and Men's Rights Activists" keeps showing up even though it generally has no rational basis. MGTOWs have always been viewed as comrades-in-arms here at A Voice for Men, and we don't see that changing any time soon. If you doubt it, check out why 11 billion dollars won't save your marriage. On the flip side, there's more than one MGTOW out there who doubts some of the biological determinism found among some thinkers, and Peter Wright is no exception: his historical look at the origins of our modern ideas about love and courtship is must-reading.

Although I guess I'm pretty much making this all up. OK, I am. Barbarossaa and his hordes of MGTOW minions must be made to submit or die! There, I said it. And you can quote me. So there!

And finally, guess what guess what? We're gonna be in the movies! Yay! I can't wait to see John the Other's star on the Hollywood walk of fame.

As always, cool stuff keeps popping up in our video section. On the other hand, I didn't get around to collecting many off-site links this week, so please feel free to leave any off-topic, off-site links you'd like in the comments to this article.

I hope you enjoyed this week's roundup. I'll see you in 7!

Eleven billion US$ won't save your marriage

August Løvenskiolds · 17 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

…but your marriage will cost you a lot more than that.

There is a lot of current pushback against MGTOW (men going their own way) like me these days, especially on youtube. The MGTOW Slapdown includes some of my (now formerly) favorite video-makers like TheWoolyBumbleBee, mykeru, and TheCriticalG. The Slapdown is threatening to fracture the M(H)RM and has already dismasted the masthead of AVfM.

"Don't run away"; "Don't give up on women" they chant – their own version of NAWALT. Wooly has just published part one of a vicious seven-part assault on MGTOW and their supporters (like Karen Straughan / GirlWritesWhat), wherein Wooly shits on the idea that MHRM and MGTOW can get along, ironically proving her own toxicity to men while still urging men to see women like her as toxin-free.

"All you have to do is find the right kind of woman" or "maybe you've just been attracting the wrong sort of woman" or "maybe you're not cut out for marriage" or "YOU are what is wrong with the MGTOW" – I got statements like all that from TheCriticalG.

Now, what could possibly be wrong with urging men to get past their anger, and find a nice girl, um, woman, er, stripper to build a life with? (My own cohabitations with strippers were relatively pleasant compared to the "nice" girls – but those are stories for other times.)

Many of the MGTOW have been through hell, and many have lost everything by associating with women. What critics of MGTOW (MGCritters, I call them) seem to fail to grasp is how badly those critics are hurting – hell, torturing – MGTOW by suggesting that we just jump back into relationships with, and thus, slavery to, the women who made our lives hell. There are still countries where women are forced to marry their rapists – that's a pain the MGCritters might understand, because it is women who are being coerced, but because MGCritters refuse to allow men the space and time to process our anger, pain, and the resulting decisions about what we want in our lives, MGCritters think it is just fine to keep hitting us and hitting us with our own biological drives.

Noted author Stephen Donaldson, writing in The Wounded Land claimed, "There's only one way to hurt a man who's lost everything. Give him back something broken."

And Women are Broken.

They are broken utterly beyond all repair, and it shouldn't be our fucking job to try to fix them, too – we're still fighting to save our kids and indeed, ourselves.

They are broken by a culture and technology that flaunt hundreds of successful men and women in front of them every day – images of a wealth and power that maybe one in a million men can attain.

They are broken by victim feminism that never pushes them to do anything other than increase their whining for help and their shaming of men for never giving them enough cookies.

They are broken by a government that promises to Julia them to happiness, rather than making them pursue happiness through their own hard work, like men have to.

They are broken by their own fears to the point where even imagined slights and slight discomforts overwhelm them…

But let's suppose for a moment that the MGCritters like "theCriticalG" are right – let's say that somehow men can benefit from relationships (such as marriage) to these women. (It should be noted that I've asked "G" repeatedly for one concrete example of a unique benefit that men get from marriage, and his failure to provide one speaks volumes – the best he can do is say things like "she'll make you a better person" and "it doesn't have to be an actual marriage".)

Let's say a man did everything right.

Let's say a man became vastly wealthy – so wealthy that he could spend millions of dollars – thousands of millions (billions, by the US reckoning), if necessary, to find, vet, and fall in love with the perfect woman.

"Money pressures" (in the form of hypergamy, I would guess) supposedly cause a lot of marriages to fail, so that should help.

Let's say that using his resources he managed to find a beautiful, healthy young woman willing to become his wife. Let's say the couple agreed to an ironclad prenuptial agreement, married and had two fine young children together, and that she was a great mother and wife.
Infertility, poor parenting, sexual incompatibility – other barriers to successful relationships – not a problem here.
Let's say that she was loyal and loving, and, unlike 99% of women, she had such a vast degree of agency that she was even willing to put her own life at risk to protect her husband from the slightest humiliation.
Let's say that the man continued to be vastly successful in life, business, love, and family – and then, that his beloved, loyal, perfect wife had an affair.
That man might be Rupert Murdock, net worth 11 Billion dollars or more – for a few more days, anyway. He filed for divorce on Friday, 14 June 2013.
His prenup will be broken; his family will be broken; his media empire will be broken up – and all because he dared to marry a broken woman.
But that's just anecdotal, one might say – surely it wouldn't happen again – to another man worth over US$10 Billion – and be reported on the very same day?
Oops.
If men with that much savvy and that much money can't find a worthy woman to marry, what the hell hope is there for ANY man? Please, MGCritters, please stop hitting us and let us go our own way in peace – the new billionaire ex-wives are counting on you to keep other wannabe gold-diggers busy with your inestimable, if relatively impoverished, charms.
Marriage is for woman and idiots. Through bitter experience, some of the rest of us are going our own way.
"When you've tried all the salves in the world and they don't work, you start thinking about fire" – The Wounded Land

MHRAs vs MGTOWs: the ULTIMATE showdown!!!

Dean Esmay · 17 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was startled from my light doze in the above-ground observation bunker in the Houston compound in the cool predawn. “Esmay” the deep voice whispered in my headset ears.
I snapped to alert. “Yes Overlord Elam!”
“You were asleep again weren’t you Esmay.” It was not a question.
“No master, no! I was merely meditating to clear my mind and allowing the automated systems to alert me to black helicopter presence! I am alert, see see!”
“Don’t lie to me, worm,” said Elam. To my relief I could tell he was merely annoyed and not really angry. He probably had a task for me. We had both agreed my presence in the observation shelter was a backup for the automated systems anyway. Apparently he had something else in mind.
“Deacon Esmay,” said Overlord Elam, “I have a plan. The insidious Woman Whose Name Shall Never Be Uttered Again uncovered our plot for world domination and has revealed our Libertarian Infiltration plan. We must now put our plans to overtake the MGTOW community and destroy all opposition into high overdrive. You must contain or kill someone for me.”
“Chapin?” I asked hopefully.
My lord paused momentarily and said, “Who?”
“Sorry m’lord, nobody important” I simpered. “Who did you have in mind?”
“You must find and mind-rape… the mighty Barbarrrrossssssssaaaaaaaaa. If necessary you must kill him.”
Fear and pride pushed adrenaline into my arteries, and I quivered with a thrill that was almost sexual. I had taken a pledge to kill upon demand with no questions asked whenever Overlord Elam demanded, but he had never actually asked me fulfill that oath directly. Already formulating a plan, I asked, “Should it be a covert assassination from afar? I have been practicing my sniper skills.”
“Fool! I said mind-rape him, and kill him only if necessary!” he bellowed. I winced and pulled the headset away from my ears a bit. That Texas drawl of his is a bitch when he starts shouting. But then his mighty rage calmed, and he said in a more even voice, “No, you are to make contact and instruct him that he must join our cause and pledge fealty to me, and only if he refuses are you to liquidate him.”
“How shall I proceed M’lord?”
“I have arranged a meeting in Istanbul. Plane tickets are already on your bunk, along with a passport, cyanide tablets, and a ceramic sword and gun you can get past customs. You are to meet him in Istanbul, in an abandoned dockside warehouse along the Bosphorus. And he has agreed you are to meet alone. You will of course be recording. Also, Agent McCarley will be observing, although you will have no direct visual or audio contact. She will be observer and backup.” (And sure to kill me if I failed, although I knew better than to acknowledge this.)
The flight to Turkey was a long one but the cyanide tablets were easy to conceal in my electronic cigarette kit and the ceramic gun and folding katana Overlord Elam supplied me with got right past the airport scanners exactly as Lord Elam had said they would. The taxi driver who took me from Atatürk International Airport to the warehouse had no trouble using the printout I’d made from Mapquest. Eerily, he looked, acted, spoke, and drove in the exact same manner as the cabbie who’d shuttled me to LaGuardia Airport in New York. Is there an international union of Swarthy Angry Yelling Men Who Become Cab Drivers who take lessons in accelerating and braking at 5-10 Gs and whose whole mission is to terrorize passengers with Near Death Experiences at least 3 times per trip with their crazy driving? It seems to work out somehow, as when I finally arrived at the abandoned warehouse I massively overtipped him just for managing not to get us killed before arrival.
The smell of water and brine filled my nostrils as I entered the dusty warehouse. Sunlight threw spears of light through the otherwise dark huge empty space, bits of dust dancing like thousands of microscopic faeries in the shafts of light. A rustling noise, probably rats, caught at the corners of my ears. Although I had never been in this building, the 3-D images Overlord Elam had provided let me know exactly where everything should be. But still the mysterious Barbarossaa was nowhere to be seen. Calmly I walked to the middle of the massive mostly-empty floorway and, coughing a bit, cleared my voice and yelled, “Barbarossaa? Are you here sir?”

A deep low rumbling chuckle came from behind me. I whirled and saw a massive figure casually turn from behind a pillar. I choked back a startled cry. He looked nothing like I’d been led to believe. He was at least 8 feet tall, with bluish-green skin, massive braided dreadlocks falling to his waist, bloodshot eyes with yellow pupils and, to my shock, having not just one but two pairs of arms, three of these massive arms holding swords and one with an Uzi. I whipped out my gun in my left hand and snapped open the folding sword in my right. Pointing the gun at his barrel-sized chest, I said, “I came in peace motherfucker but these are cyanide-coated bullets. Don’t fuck with the Elam crew.”
“Ha! MHRA scum! You don’t scare me!” He leapt into the air, arcing at least 20 feet above the floor in a direct line for me. I dodged and tumbled 90 degrees to my left, coming up and nailing him with five shots directly to his chest as he landed and whirled to face me. He barely even flinched. It was only then that I realized he was wearing the legendary MGTOW body armor that I had only read about, and my bullets probably could not pierce. Quickly putting another clip into my gun, I aimed for his face, although to my surprise he did not move toward me.
“Hahahahahaha! I just wanted to see if you had any spirit. If I’d wanted you dead you would have been a cinder the moment you stepped in here. ManWomanMyth has the entire building rigged with explosives anyway. Which he will use at my signal, by the way.”
I heard a faint crackle in my ear. Overlord Elam had implanted a special subdermal microchip in my skull before the trip, although he had refused to tell me what it was for. Now I realized as Suzanne McCarley’s voice whispered to me, “I already took M-W-M out. He’s dead. I have control of the detonator, you’re safe. Don’t tell Barbarossaa but do whatever you need. I’ve got your back, Deacon.”
I smiled to myself. “Well Bar Bar, you’re impressive enough I’ll grant you. But you came when my master summoned you, didn’t you?”
“Summoned me? I asked to speak to you.”
I paused. “What?”
“Yeah dude, I wanted to talk. I kind of like your videos.”
I felt a brief bit of confusion. As I opened my mouth he screamed “PSCYH!!! COMMUNIST FEMINIST THUG ATTACK, HO!!!” and charged at me, swords whirling and Uzi firing. Fortunately he didn’t know about the experimental blue forcefield technology that Alison Tieman had wired up for me. I was able to shunt away his bullets but it wasn’t clear how well the new field technology would work against his swords. As he came toward me, I did my best to stay steady as I put my sword in a block position and took aim with my gun at his face…

OK, so the actual conversation was a little calmer than that. Feel free to listen.–DE

Documentary to be filmed on MHRM, AVFM

Paul Elam · 17 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
We are now approaching the halfway mark of the year that I promised you would bring unprecedented growth to the MHRM. So far, that is exactly what is happening. I am tempted to give you a review of the last six months, but I really don't have time for it.
Besides, the future still holds enough goodies that we don't have time to reminisce.
I have been contacted by a film production company. They intend to produce a documentary on the men's human rights movement, focusing on A Voice for Men, key contributors to the site, and you, the readers, should you want to participate.
I can already hear a lot of people screaming "Watch out! Hit piece!" I don't think this is one, and we are moving forward – which we would do anyway for the standard reasons.
An email has just been sent out to the production company introducing them to JTO, Dean Esmay, NCFM President Harry Crouch, Tom Golden, TyphonBlue, GWW and Erin Pizzey, all of whom have agreed to participate in the film.
We are not releasing any information on the production company for obvious reasons. So, not to put too fine a point on it, don't ask.
This announcement is also a call out to you. A film crew will be traveling the United States for this and filming in various locations. They have requested that site followers, those who identify as MHRAs, also participate to tell their stories of why they became involved with AVFM and the MHRM.
We have discussed the issue of anonymity and they have agreed to protect the identity of those who wish to appear in the film anonymously.
If you read and participate regularly or semi-regularly at this site, live in the US, and want to participate please shoot me an email to paul@avoiceformen.com.
This is a very exciting development potentially exposing a great many more people to the MHRM. It could be a very powerful agent for positive change in our society in the struggle to secure justice as it relates to the sexes.

John Birmingham's big, white dick

Paul Elam · 18 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

John Birmingham is ashamed for having a dick. At least that what he is saying over at the theage.com.au. Birmingham, who describes himself as a "blunt instrument" (blush on cue, ladies) who "tells stories, most of them true," sets out to prove that in spades, apparently after he read, get this, some unkind comments from "communters" on the internet!

Wow. He must have had to do a lot of research.

Anyway, it set him off on a rant, where he rage-wrote about how reading some YouTube comments made him ashamed to have a dick, and assumedly balls, a Y chromosome, facial hair, upper body strength and whatever level of testosterone might still be detected in his system after his completely stupid rant on men.

[image]

Go ahead, make my day!

He even threw in the sideways hint that he gets how privileged he is because he has a pecker, and especially because it is of the Caucasian persuasion. Then he proceeds to insult everyone else on the planet that he suspects has a dick, mainly by implying that they don't have one.

I don't really get the logic. People, but only ones with dicks, are a problem. Those that have a problem are dickless. I have to ask, Mr. Blunt, are white people who are a problem whiteless? Or is that blunt you like to reference the kind stuffed with purple kush?

Anyway, I decided to leave a comment to Birmingham's typical little puddle of white knight vomitus, but was not at all sure it would be approved. I just had that feeling, you know? Then I remembered, "Hey, Paul, you do have this nifty little website!"

OK, so it is not a revelation that makes me near as smart as someone who can find rude assholes on YouTube, but I felt pretty smug just the same. I wanted to share it with you, and perhaps encourage a few of you to go share your thoughts with John Birmingham, who is a really nice human being, despite having a big, white dick.

Comment:

Don't apologize for having a dick. Don't even apologize for being one.

Apologize for being a weak willed, candy-ass of a skirt chaser posing as a journalist.

Here is how it works, ladies. And how easy it is for you to be played like a cheap violin.

[image]

My Y is bigger and whiter than your Y!

Male journalist sees what we have always been able to see on the internet. The results of what assumed anonymity can do to human behavior. With everyone from 5 years old and up able to comment on YouTube, you get every kind of imaginable moron in the world, some male, some female, making all sorts of comments, some of them quite despicable.

Then you have two kinds of internet "writers" that exploit this for two different reasons. Feminists point to this and say, "See! See! Masculinity has to change! It's the patriarchy! It's hegemonic, phallocentric, linear thinking, oppressive evil masculinity on display! Pass out the white ribbons! Let's all walk a mile in her shoes! Someone write me a damned check!"

Then there are the even less credible, similarly opportunistic sycophants like John Birmingham, who look at those comments, which again you would find being made in most kindergarten classes if the teacher left the room long enough, and who hawk a different, arguably more pathetic spin on the matter. They say, "Look at me ladies! I am a GOOD man! I am not like all the BAD, BAD men! See how special and sensitive I am? See how aware of all your ISSUES I am? Lord God Almighty, someone write me a damn check! Or in the absence of money, I will settle for some fawning female approval!"

Really, people. The internet is full of idiots. Don't become one yourself by falling for this claptrap.

End of comment.
I probably should have added that the main thing that the feminists and the sycophants have in common is that somehow neither can see any of the female assholes that are right in there with the men. Well, maybe it is best I didn't. No need to tax John any more than he already is.
It is really interesting to me, as a side note, to think about what is happening in the world of print media and the internet. First there was print media. They owned the world of news, opinion and disinformation, mainly because they were the only ones that had a voice. They could say what they wanted and no one else could say shit about it. Then the internet came along, and opened up the world to anyone with an opinion.
It took the mainstream print media down like Mike Tyson's first 10 opponents.
You lookin' at me, Communter?

So then the media started to wise up. They began moving their operations online, and establishing their presence there. But instead of figuring out that any bullshit they posted could and would be challenged by their own audience (and anyone else with a keyboard and the urge) they continue to inflict assholes like Birmingham on the world without considering the fact that he is full of shit.
Personally, I thank the god I don't believe in every day for that. The internet, as long as it lasts, is the first true level media playing field, or at least as close as we will ever see.
It is nice to see that finally a guy like me, or anyone for that matter, has a shot at capturing the imagination of the public if they are willing to work hard at it. And it is nicer to see that rags like The Age still can't quite get a grip on the new paradigm. It is dog eat dog out here, and I need all the help I can get.

Freedom from Gynocentrism in 12 Steps

August Løvenskiolds · 18 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Are you sick of seeing good men destroyed? Tired of being assaulted by women? Sick at craziness and brutality being tolerated when they come from women but swiftly punished when a man even hints at them? Worried at the prospect of your young children being taken from you, and turned against you, by a woman who wants to rape your wallet?

Disgusted at the thought of showing chivalry and deference to foul-mouthed, thieving, drunken, sloppy and disrespectful harlots[1]? Enraged at the thought that newborn baby boys are sexually mutilated in order to tart up ladies' cosmetics?

These are but a few of the many paths that might've brought you to this red door, and many wounds and diseases can be treated with the red pill, but your recovery will take conscious effort and patience on all of our parts – I know, because mine sure did, and I still struggle with it every day.

[Author's note: The following passage mentions a now banned former AVfM "author" (plagiarist, caught red-handed). The link to his comment is broken. I spiked this article myself for 3 months because of my distaste for such thieves. The editors of AVfM asked if it could be published anyway, so I'm in the process of reviving it.]

AVfM Commenter Stephen O'Brian suggested recently that a 12 Step program for recovering feminists might be necessary. I've been kicking around a similar idea for a while now, but my version is for any blue or purple pill person interested in taking the red pill.

What are the red, blue, and purple pills? They are metaphors for your worldview. I'll be using a lot of MHRM buzzwords in this article, and part of your recovery will center around your taking responsibility for researching them for yourself.

Now, 12 Step Programs have been around for a while (I even helped found one back in the mid 1980's) and have mixed records of success, but since they are well-known they can serve as a helpful framework to map out what you can expect once you start breaking the chains of gynocentrism. So, stealing shamelessly from those who have blazed the trail, I give you an overview of:

The 12 Steps of Liberation from Gynocentrism

Step 1: Honesty

After many years of denial, recovery can begin with one simple realization – that whether from feminism or traditionalism, Gynocentrism means more than equal rights: it is about securing unearned and undeserved comforts, security, money and power for women and women alone, at the expense and often destruction of men, their lives, and their families.

Step 2: Faith in oneself

It seems to be a spiritual truth that before we can break the chains of the expectations that gynocentrism places on men, we must accept that men are worthy creatures undeserving of the shame, self-loathing and lies that are told about us. Men, and the happiness of men, matter. They are critical to the survival of both humankind and human civilization. When enough men give up on it, society dies.

Step 3: Self-liberation

A lifetime of deference to the whims of whining women will come to a screeching halt, and change forever, by making a simple decision to turn it all over to a higher power – one's own good judgment that men's needs matter, too. The only true liberation is self-liberation – a slave forced into freedom by others will remain enslaved until he embraces his freedom as his own.

Step 4: Soul-searching

Change is a process, not just an event. Recognizing how our previous attachment to gynocentrism damaged ourselves, the men around us, and yes, the women, too, requires a lot of thought into often unpleasant memories and past experiences. This soul-searching, though painful, will build our strengths and understandings for when we face future conflicts with those still committed to pedestalizing women.

Step 5: Commitment to Personal Integrity and Truth

A most difficult step to face, but also the one that provides the great opportunity for growth. When you commit to personal integrity and truth you will find the courage to face down your fears and stand up for the rights of men where no one else seems willing to make the first objection to male disposability.

Step 6: Acceptance of our Defects

Everyone has personal character faults but such faults are no reason for us to accept unjust treatment. A man with flaws can still be a good father, a hard worker, and a worthy person. No one has the right to shame us for our sexual desires, the choices or flaws in our physical appearance, our accomplishments, our failures, or our infirmities.

Step 7: Confidence and Humility

As we discover and embrace the newfound power that comes with liberation from gynocentrism, we must be cognizant of the need to balance our confidence with humility – not the false humility from shame, but rather, a knowledge that our strength has real limits and that personal growth can be a frustrating process at times. We must learn to be confident enough in our worth and skills that we can accept new challenges – challenges we are humble enough to understand that we might fail at achieving.

Step 8: Willingness to make amends

Making a list of those we harmed before coming into recovery from gynocentrism can be daunting – long-term feminists in particular may find they have numerous abortions, falsely accused boyfriends, amputated foreskins and penises, stolen job opportunities, and massive shoe collections hanging over their newly heightened consciences. Becoming willing to actually start the struggle to make amends to those we have wronged can be the most difficult part of recovery and many falter on this step.

Step 9: Forgiveness

Being willing to forgive others as well as asking for forgiveness for ourselves may seem like a bitter red pill to swallow, but for those serious about recovery it can be great medicine for the spirit and soul. Even the failure of gynocentrists to embrace forgiveness will help us in that it will throw their sociopathy into sharper relief.

Step 10: Maintenance

Nobody likes to dwell on past wrongs but continuing study into men's human rights issues is necessary to maintain progress and vigilance in recovery from gynocentrism, lest we fall back into old habits and long-held, toxic beliefs about men.

Step 11: Making Contact

There is value and strength in contacting others in recovery to share our stories and plan our futures, whether as a group or on our own. In recovering from gynocentrism, the insights of one man or woman can and do enrich all our lives. Additionally, building a community of men who recognize the value in each other is a rare and powerful weapon against gynocentrism. Men don't bond (in general) as quickly or seamlessly as women do, and whenever men build a space for themselves, women try to bully their way in.

Step 12: Service to Humankind

It is not uncommon for those in gynocentrism recovery programs to experience anger over the pain of our long enslavement to the Golden Uterus. Male anger is a good thing – it is how we heal; it is how we grieve; it is the motivation the drives us to help others. Reaching out to others caught in the violent abattoirs of gynocentric privilege can provide the rare gift of saving and enriching men's lives rather than gratuitously destroying them. Even a lone MGTOW like me can add to the fight by cutting back and resisting the forces that feed gynocentrism's ever growing need for power, money, and resources.

Misandry in Psychology Part One

Tom Golden · 18 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is the first part of a four-part series of articles about the bias against men and boys in psychological research. There is a video companion to this series that summarizes the contents of these articles. A link to this video will appear at the end of the article.
This article is also available in Portuguese.

Most of us are familiar with the male bashing we see on television. Men are portrayed as buffoons and helpless ne'er do wells who consistently need others (women and sometimes children) to problem solve and do the right thing. Most people are tired of this ridiculous bias yet it continues unabated. What most don't realize is that a very similar male bashing exists in mental health research. The past 40 years has brought us a powerful respect and admiration of women and girls. The problem is that we seem unable to hold both men and women in the highest esteem. As we hold our women up we seem to tear our men down. It's as if we can only see women as "good" and men as considerably less than good. This binary vision of the sexes gets played out in the male bashing we see on television. It also gets played out in numerous other venues including mental health research.

This collection of articles will offer you an inside glimpse into the workings of several studies and show how the anti-male bias plays out. We have all grown to trust "research" and when we hear that a study shows that "X is correct" we tend to automatically believe that "X" is correct. Research has taken on an almost divine ethos that carries the seal of approval of correctness. If science says it, it must be so. The problem of course is that science, especially social science, is less than concrete and is much more slippery than measuring a distance or the tensile strength of a bar of steel. Mental health research is much more vulnerable to values and the ideologies of the researchers. If a scientist believes a certain thing it usually has little impact on his measurements of the tensile strength of the bar of steel. No matter what he believes the measurement will likely be the same.

But what about issues in social sciences where researchers come to the table with a large amount of preconceived ideas, allegiances to ideologies that espouse strong opinions about those being studied or have traumatic life histories that bias them against certain groups? Can those sorts of things influence the "findings" of a social science study? You bet they can. Gone is the impartial judge weighing the evidence and sifting through the data to find the truth. In today's world of social science research the opposite is happening: researchers are starting at their pre-conceived bias's and then designing research to prove that bias. As bizarre as that sounds it is demonstrably true in some social science research. You will see some of that within this group of articles.

This sort of bias is not new to social science research. In the early 20th century social science researchers claimed blacks were the perpetrators and creators of social pathology. (see Death of White Sociology) There was something wrong with blacks and because they were "the problem" they were not seen as "worthy" victims. Numerous studies were done that "proved" blacks inferiority and this influenced the media and the general public reinforcing the prevailing stereotypes. Since blacks were seen as the problem it was a simple step to suspend any inclination to provide them with services. Why offer compassion and assistance for a group that so obviously simply needed to change their ways? In today's world it seems that men have replaced blacks as the group that are blamed for social problems and then not expected to be deserving of services not unlike the way Blacks were portrayed in years prior.

We will see this negative framing of men and boys in all three of the studies we will be examining. Each of the three studies portrays men or boys as the source of the problem. They go on to simply omit any opportunity for men to be in need of, or recipients of, services. The third inventory actually takes a more aggressive approach and labels men as "normally" violent, seeking power over women and a couple of other doozies. A few years ago Paul Elam did a related article on the similarity between social science research on black people and now on men.

In the next section we start off with a short summary of a very important paper by Murray Straus titled "Processes explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence." Straus leads us through seven ways that feminist researchers hid or distorted the data of their studies in order to insure their results would reflect the pre-conceived ideology of females being the victims of domestic violence and men being the perpetrators. Straus's explanations make very clear how an ideological bias can impact the results of social science research. He describes in detail exactly how they accomplished this. One technique he describes is simply ignoring your own data that contradicts your ideology. Another is to simply not ask questions that might risk obtaining answers that would contradict your thesis. After reading this piece you will have a better understanding of the ways this subterfuge has been accomplished.

The next section describes a 2009 study from Great Britain on teen violence. You will see how the researchers follow Straus's descriptions by ignoring their own data. The original survey showed that boys were about 40% of the victims of violence but by the time the research was done and the recommendations made the ad campaign that followed was designed to help only girls and to teach the boys how to better treat the girls. Boys were the problem, girls deserved the services.

The following section features a study on "reproductive coercion." It will show how the omission of the details about the sample of those surveyed had huge repercussions down stream. In a nutshell the study was done on impoverished African American and Hispanic females. This fact was not reported in the research article, nor reported in the press release, and never showed up in any of the national media articles that followed. It is well known that interpersonal violence is about three times as likely in an impoverished population. By omitting that little bit of data, that the sample was largely impoverished women of color, the ramifications of their study changed drastically from one that applied only to a poor population of women of color to a study that applied to the population at large. This shift resulted in millions of people reading about the study in the national media and being led to believe a message that simply wasn't justified by the study itself.

The last section looks at the Conformity to Masculine Norms Inventory (CMNI). This inventory claims to measure men's degree of conforming to what it calls "masculine norms." There are multiple problems with this inventory but the most obvious is its choice of very negative descriptions for what masculine norms are in this culture. The norms include such descriptors as "violence" "disdain for homosexuality" "power over women" and "playboy." Simply choosing these words to describe men in this country is misandry. This is male bashing. There's more.

It's important to see the ways these studies try to influence the public and promote their own ideological biases. Each of these studies was done by researchers who appeared to have strong ideas about men and women and their research conveniently harmonized with their pre-conceived notions. With "science" holding so much power and ability to sway opinions it is critical that we watch carefully how the social sciences use their studies to proliferate their own ideological viewpoints.

The spreading of misinformation has a very negative effect on the population at large but there is no place in more danger of this than in the halls of congress. Our legislators are easily influenced by studies such as those described herein and the likelihood of laws being written based on one sided viewpoints becomes alarmingly high. To make matters even worse our legislators are largely unaware of their own unconscious chivalry and combine that with hysterical research that claims damsels in distress need funding and what you see is billions of taxpayers dollars being spent in a very questionable manner.

Combine these studies with the media, and then the blogs and you get a system that is fed by erroneous data that accepts it as fact and acts on it. One needs to only notice the fact that great majority of people in the US are convinced that women are the sole victims of domestic violence to understand the power of the media and particularly the media in combination with "studies" that are used more for propaganda than for gaining an understanding of the truth. The next section will explain exactly how feminist researchers told only half the story about domestic violence and in doing so have left the majority of people in the U.S. believing only women are victims of domestic violence.

STRAUS

There are millions of compassionate and loving people in the United States who have been given erroneous information about domestic violence. Over the years the media and academia have offered a steady stream of information that indicates that women are the only victims of domestic violence and men the only perpetrators. We have all been deceived. What most don't know is that a part of that deception has been intentional and has come from the scientific community. As hard as it is to believe it is indisputable. Most of us had no idea of this deception until recently. More and more is now coming out about the symmetry of victimization in domestic violence. Men and women are both victims of domestic violence and also perpetrators.

One of the breakthroughs that have helped us identify this deception was the journal response of Murray Straus Ph.D. Straus has been an acclaimed researcher of family and interpersonal violence for many years. In his article he unveils the ways that this misinformation has been intentionally spread via "research." He shows the seven ways that the truth has been distorted. It is a fascinating yet sobering article that shows how, without actually lying, the researchers were able to distort things and make it appear that it was something that is was not. We all know that once a research study is published the media will latch on and print the results as gospel truth so the media became the megaphone to spread the misinformation once it was inked in the scientific journal. I would highly recommend your reading the full report by Straus.

Let's go through the seven ways one by one.

1. Suppress evidence. The first type of deceit that Straus describes is suppressing evidence. The researchers would ask questions about both men and women but only report on the answers from women. The half-story would leave readers with the impression that it was only women who were victims even though the researcher had the surveys of male victims on hand they simply didn't report it. The data on male victims was simply buried while the data on female victims was reported. Straus discusses the Status on Women report from Kentucky in the late 1970's that was the first to use this strategy.

They collected data on both male and female victims but only the female victims were discussed in the publications. Scientific method is dependent upon creating a hypothesis and testing it. If you get data from your test that is contrary to your original hypothesis this is just as important as getting data that affirms the hypothesis and can be used to adjust your original hypothesis. To ignore ones own data that contradicts the hypothesis is the epitome of disregard to the foundations of scientific inquiry. It leaves the realms of research and enters the realms of propaganda and shaping the outcome to mislead.

2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent With the Patriarchal Dominance Theory. The second method described by Straus was that of simply not asking the questions when you didn't want to hear the answers. The surveys would ask the women about their victimhood and ask men about their perpetration but failed to inquire about women's violence or men's victimhood. If you ask questions that address only half the problem you are certain to conclude with only half the answers. Straus highlights a talk he gave in Canada where he evaluated 12 studies on domestic violence. Ten out of the twelve only asked questions about female victims and male perpetrators. If you don't ask the questions you will never get the answers. Publishing half the truth is intentionally misleading.

3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration Straus reveals a number of situations where studies or official documents would cite only studies that showed female victims and male perpetrators. He uses the Department of Justice press release as just one example where they only cite the "life- time prevalence" data because it showed primarily male perpetration. They omitted referencing the "past-year" data even though it was more accurate since it showed females perpetrated 40% of the partner assaults. Straus shows journal articles and names organizations such as the United Nations, World Health Organization, the US Department of Justice and others who used this tactic to make it appear that women were the primary victims of domestic violence and men the primary perpetrators.

4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not Straus showed an example of a study by Kernsmith (2005) where the author claimed that women's violence was more likely to be in self defense but data to support the claim didn't exist. Apparently he had made the claim even without any supporting evidence. Straus shows that the self defense category was primarily about anger and coercion and not about self-defense at all but this didn't stop the researcher from claiming the erroneous results which of course could be quoted by later studies as proof that such data does indeed exist.

5. Create "Evidence" By Citation The "woozle" effect is described by Straus as when "frequent citation of previous publications that lack evidence mislead us into thinking there is evidence." He lists the Kernsmaith study and a report from the World Health Organization as examples. Both made claims (without evidence to back it up) that women's violence was largely in self-defense. The claims were quoted repeatedly and people eventually started to believe that the claims were correct.

6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research that Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance is the Cause of Personal Violence Straus mentions two incidents that illustrate this claim. One was a call for papers on the topic of partner violence in December of 2005 from the National Institute of Justice where it was stated that "proposals to investigate male victimization would not be eligible." Another was an objection raised by a reviewer of one of his proposals due to its having said that "violence in relationships was a human problem." He also stated that the "more frequent pattern is self-censorship by authors fearing that it will happen or that publication of such a study will undermine their reputation, and, in the case of graduate students, the ability to obtain a job."

7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs Straus provides details of a number of incidents where researchers who found evidence of gender symmetry (that both men and women were victims and perpetrators) in domestic violence were harassed or threatened. He described a number of instances such as bomb scares at personal events, being denied tenure and promotions, or "shouts and stomping" meant to drown out an oral presentation. He relates being called a "wife-beater" as a means to denigrate both himself and his previous research findings.

[image]Straus concludes that a "climate of fear has inhibited research and publication on gender symmetry in personal violence." His words help us to understand the reasons that our public is so convinced that women are the sole victims of domestic violence and men the only perpetrators. It has been years and years of researchers telling only half the story and when we get only half the story and consider it the whole truth we are likely to defend our limited version of the truth and ostracize those who may offer differing explanations.

The matter is further complicated due to the media having acted as a megaphone for the half story that has emerged so the "common knowledge" that has emerged from the media for many years has been half the story and due to its not telling both sides of the story, it is basically misinformation.

What this tells us is that we need to stay on our toes when it comes to social science research. Straus's paper has helped us immensely in seeing how research can be set up to appear to tell the truth but fail miserably in doing so. While the researchers are not technically lying, the end product is similar since it produces only a partial image of the reality of domestic violence and leaves people without the details to fill in the reality of the situation. It is likely a good idea to have a look at the way each study gets its data, the exact nature of the people being used as subjects, and the conclusion drawn and if they are congruous with the data that was gathered. Next, in Part Two we will look at a study that uses Straus's first example, ignoring ones own data.

The Canadian Federation of Students held their annual meeting in Ottawa three weeks ago. Its a 4 day annual event and this year ran from May 30 – June 2, 2013 .
No matter how much I want to make a trip to that 'show' and ensure that feminist inspired censorship does not ensue, it just ain't going to happen. The best I can do is to report on it and attend events in my own community. (I attended the Slutwalk in Hamilton; bringing a bit of perspective to all the sluts.)
Those are the facts of the case. Now lets move onto the U of T Grad Student's lies, I mean assertions.
No I was right the first time, lies.
Their motion with the designated title of Motion 2013/05:N16 at first glance, like most feminist inspired writing of policies, laws, and legislation looks innocuous enough. But do not let the title of the motion fool you. If you are a student and male it is poison.
In fact if you are a human who enjoys pure uncensored free speech and the freedom to explore the discussing of ideas it is absolute intellectual cyanide mixed with the feel good veneer of feminism.
So lets reproduce that piece of feminist inspired fascism.
[image]

First I agree there is an increase of men's issues awareness groups, the reason U of T Grad Union; males have serious issues they face starting from birth and ending with death. Sometimes that death comes tragically early at their own hands.
With their next statement they come right out and lie about men's rights activists providing environments for misogyny.
Do we attract males who have been hurt and abused by a corrupt misandric society?
I'd have to agree we sometimes do have a disturbed individual or two come by and try to join but they are ousted from our ranks and urged to seek the medical help they desperately need. This is NOT accomplished by feminists, or feminist dogma but by the moral and ethical people within the Men's Human Rights Activists ranks.
I do have an observation though, well a point of contention. If the MHRM can attract individuals who engage in sexism and misogyny then is it not equally possible that women's campus groups attract people who encourage sexism against males, and, wait for it, misandry?
Its a fact misandrists just like misogynists exist.
All one need do is look at some of the articles here on A Voice For Men for the proof. This one article in particular, but don't stop at that single article for there are many more dear reader.
Remember feminist groups you claim that women are equal to men, and therefore are equally capable of the evil you claim only men do.
Or is that only true when feminism isn't being scrutinized for its actions and positions. At which time feminism falls back on 'we are poor oppressed victims' of a one sided, shallow, definition of the alleged patriarchy.
The Toronto Students Union next claims are that we, the MHRM, 'promote misogyny', 'hateful views towards women', and 'ideologies that promote equality', 'challenges women's bodily autonomy',' justifies sexual assault.'
(Note we are not alleged to enjoy kitten sammiches something they forgot to add in their list of lies.)
Now I vehemently disagree with all that is claimed in that clause from the Toronto Students Union. We do not promote misogyny but do promote true equality, where an individual is held to the same standard regardless if they are male or female. We are not hateful towards women and welcome those women who see feminism for its true nature, a violence endorsing dogma. Their claim feminism is an ideology that fosters equality is laughable at best for any who have seen the actions taken by the feminists and their male enforcers at the recent CAFE events. I am a loss as to where the claim we challenge women's bodily autonomy comes from. Most likely they are confused due to the fact that we advocate for men's bodily autonomy and you know if a man said it, the subject matter must be against women. The MHRM also doesn't justify sexual assault, we do however stipulate that the burden of proof in sexual assault cases stay at beyond a reasonable doubt and not on a balance of probabilities just like any other crime feminists.

And in the next clause from their politician like lying mouths are as follows:

we[MRAs] endorse misogyny, sexist, cissexist, heterosexist, and homophobic cis-male-privilege in society.

Good grief cis is getting monotonous, but for all their claims they have as yet to produce a shred of evidence supporting their lies, erm I mean allegations.
I would suggest the University of Toronto read some of the articles from our own Andy Bob, a homosexual and extremely well respected contributor to the MHRM (love you for what you do brother) and Correctrix, a transsexual (I don't know you as well as I do Andy, Correctrix but love and respect what you do just the same.) And of course Karen Straughan, who freely admits to her bi-sexuality.
Those facts and people apparently escaped the U of T students union myopic university educated, gender studies indoctrinated observations.
They at least get the next part right, and I do have a sliver of sympathy for them. I also have a ton more sympathy and concern for their male children. Being raised by gaslighting liars is a terrible way to grow up.
But still they are correct men's rights organizations are springing up all over the place and the reason is due to feminism's toxic rhetoric and dogma. Nature abhors a vacuum U of T feminists and right now masculinity and all the great and honorable qualities that are linked to it is in a vacuum. This vacuum was created by your ideology, YOU are the reason the MHRM exists. You created this mess society is in from the last 50 years of horse-shit lies.
How a movement like feminism could be so naive is beyond me. To assume that feminism could throw half the population under the bus, vilify and demonize said half of the population and think there would be no sane ethical and moral individuals who would call them on their crap is crazy. I'd say that qualifies as feminist privilege, assuming nothing will be done while engaging in misnadry.
Their last bit is interesting. They bring out the already dis-proved claim that women from the last CAFE lecture given by Professors Nathanson and Young were threatened by the MHRM. Even some of our non-calorically challenged detractors could not prove that claim, but that ain't stopping the U of T students union.
Why let a little thing like truth stop you right feminists?
I would like to see some of these threats the U of T Students Union claims that some of the female protesters may have had some trolls look them up and make some nasty comments. Comments which I do not endorse or condone.
That unfortunately is something that happens to people who are vocal about their views.
News flash there are moronic individuals out there who do engage in those types of activities.
Threats happen to males they happen to females.
And sometimes feminists manufacture those threats themselves like in the Meg Lanker-Simons situation.
Am I saying that all those threats against those protesters are manufactured? No I am saying that feminists are known for doing this.
One last observation about that the U of T students union may wish to consider. It is known as Section 2 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Words so important they are enshrined in Canada's Constitution. Words that I am going to reproduce in their entirety below.
Fundamental freedoms
2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
(a) freedom of conscience and religion;
(b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
(c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and
(d) freedom of association.
Considering this is the highest law in Canada University of Toronto Students Union what makes you think you are above it?
What makes you think you are above the laws of nature and its abhorrence of a vacuum?

Dissecting Michael Kimmel

Paul Elam · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Michael Kimmel, famed for his seminal, man-hating opus, "Guyland," has managed to drum up a suitcase full of cash so that he can fund the start-up of a center for men and "masculinities."

Before I go on it must be noted that this is the absolute highlight of Kimmel's life. After decades of floating redundant conferences (mostly on papers from grad students and even some undergraduates), as a part of a cadre of post middle-age, insulated academicians, Kimmel has finally convinced someone with a wallet to take him seriously enough to fund his attacks on men and masculinity.

True to his distorted understanding of "men," his board of advisors for the Center includes such experts on human males as Gloria Steinem, Jane Fonda, Carol Gilligan and Eve Enslar.

Do you need a moment? Do you need a smelling salt?

Yes, the crew that doesn't need men (unless they are marrying rich ones), women who need men "like a bicycle needs a fish," is now set to advise a university on the study of said fish.

Kimmel is just giddy imagining the academic glory.

If you want a good read on just how funny this particular bit of feminist insanity really is, take a quick trip here. I promise you will laugh till you cry. And then you will cry some more.

As for the treatment I want to give this matter of the foxes governing the henhouse, I think a good bit can be revealed with a dissection of their press release. Plain text: Kimmel – italics: me.

STONY BROOK, NY, May 20, 2013 – Stony Brook University will receive a two-year $300,000 start-up grant from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation to establish a new Center for the Study of Men and Masculinities.

This means Stony Brook will get $150K each year, but the foundation might decide against funding the second year if anyone important actually figures out what Kimmel is up to.

Led by Michael Kimmel, PhD, a Distinguished Professor…

Let's stop, shall we? "Distinguished" is not a title or any other designation of Kimmel's academic credibility. It means nothing. It is a sales pitch, and a cheap one, likely written into the press release at Kimmel's distinguished insistence.

…of Sociology…

Stop, again. What is a sociologist doing heading an interdisciplinary field? I am just asking, because, you know, someone should.

…at Stony Brook University and one of the leading researchers and writers on men and masculinity in the world today the Center will focus on the emerging and integral discipline of men and masculinities…

Excuse me? Emerging? That is news, directly from Kimmel himself. He sent me a snotty email three years ago after I made an inquiry of him and his fellow ideologues at the National Organization of Men Against Sexism, another group that addresses the issues of men as long as the feminists who hate them approve.

In his email, he seems to think that he has already made men's studies all the rage:

"I should point out, though that the national Conference on Men and Masculinity includes a Men's Studies Conference, which, together with the American Men's Studies Association's annual conference – both of which have been taking place for about two decades — provides ample evidence that a robust and healthy field of Masculinity Studies already exists and is well institutionalized in the U.S. and abroad."

Well, I suppose a discipline could still be "emerging" after two decades, especially since all those conferences Kimmel is resting his laurels on were one in the same with the conferences mentioned at the start of this article; conferences that were held, not on the work of accomplished academicians, but on papers done by students in areas like queer studies and "black masculinities."

In other words, they got together for a few drinks and slapped each other on the back for doing largely nothing, then, down the road, crowed about two decades of "Masculinity Studies" that existed nowhere but the scheming mind of Michael Kimmel.

…but an important component of gender studies. The Center will open in the fall of 2013.

Supplemented by additional funding from Stony Brook University…
That would be taxpayer money.
…and additional foundation and private support…
And what might these be? A State university would be required to reveal this,
…the grant will be used to establish the Center, as well as the first international conference on Men and Masculinities in 2015…
This is where Kimmel just plain lies. Miles Groth of Wagner College has already hosted two of these, in 2011 and 2012. Kimmel is breaking first ground on the study of men in the same way Columbus "discovered" America.
It will also fund the development of a new Master of Arts program in Masculinity Studies scheduled to begin in fall 2017 – the first of its kind in the world…
More bullshit. A program at University of South Australia will be the first in the Fall of 2014, offering a graduate certificate, an MA and then in a few years more the PhD. It will also study males without consulting Gloria Steinem and Jane Fonda, which is precisely why Michael Kimmel will not even acknowledge it exists.
…and enable the University to solidify long-term funding for the ongoing operations of the Center.
The degree program means tuition dollars for the University, which all they care about and what Kimmel has undoubtedly promised them.
Finally, it will enable Stony Brook to begin external fundraising and identify the areas and personnel…
This means hiring people that Kimmel wants hired and grant writers he will oversee that can best "facilitate the conversations." This is jargon, which means getting professionals in psychobabble in on the act.
…between researchers and practitioners that are envisioned as central to the Center's mission.
To begin, the Center will host a series of monthly seminars and two to three large forums per year, which will build and gather a community of academics and activists…
Now we see the critical phrase: "academics and activists". This has been the collaboration of Gender Studies people that turned the university into a place to promote feminism. Activists on campuses? Well, what else can one do when you don't have a legitimate interest in the scholarly pursuit of knowledge?
…in the local area.
That means New York City.
The forums called "Challenging Conversations" will focus on politically divisive issues, such as prostitution, sex trafficking, the pornography debate, the boy crisis in schools, and more, noted Kimmel.
Only the last item has anything to do with boys, men and masculinity. Even the "boy crisis" is a direct rip off of Warren Farrell, and is there for effect, not practice. All the rest is feminism; see next paragraph.
Members of the Center's advisory board include Gloria Steinem, Martin Duberman, Jane Fonda, Eve Ensler, Carol Gilligan, James Gilligan, Frank Ochberg, Gov. Madeleine Kunin (Vermont), Catharine Stimpson and Hampden-Sydney College President Chris Howard.
[image]
Michael Kimmel's advisers on masculinity.

"This emerging field is international and interdisciplinary," said Professor Kimmel. "Much work on masculinities uses the prisms…
Prisms:This is his nod to the LGBT rainbow which is central to Women's Studies, led almost entirely by radical lesbian feminists.
…of feminist theory, multiculturalism and queer theory…
All buzzwords for what has ruined academe.
…and discussions of differences among men (by race, class, sexuality, age, religion, region and the like)…
This is a sociological perspective entirely, not multidisciplinary. And it begs the question again, why is a sociologist heading a supposedly multidisciplinary endeavor?
…are just as salient as discussions of similarities and differences between women and men."
But here he is slipping in his eagerness. He does not admit differences between women and men! Michael, what were you thinking? But thank you for the quote!

Kimmel envisions the Center as being an umbrella
Let's make that a circus tent.
…for the research that is being done globally…
There is none being done outside western countries and the USA, which is still the center of feminism; Many European universities laugh at thiswhole feminist academic scene.
…as well as a place for dialogue with activists and practitioners…
Again, activism? Professionals in psychobabble?
…who are engaged in programs to engage men…
To engage men in what? More nonsense and rhetoric?
…all over the world.

> "I intend it to be a place where that dialogue between researchers and practitioners, between academics and activists, will be the central defining feature," he said. "It is a conversation that I find too rare on both sides of that divide: academics who know little about what is happening on the ground, and activists who think they are inventing the wheel each time they develop a new program."

Activism! Activism! Nothing here about serious academic work!
Stony Brook University is also the home of the field's most visible and prestigious scholarly journal, Men and Masculinities, for which Professor Kimmel is the founder and editor. The journal publishes four times per year with one special thematic edition. Academic conferences, scholarly journals, and collaborative research projects are proliferating in both social sciences and humanities, noted Kimmel, with eight scholarly journals in the field of Masculinity Studies, and most gender studies journals now welcoming work by and about men, including Signs, the flagship journal in Women's Studies that offered a special issue on Masculinities in 2010.

The 2015 International Conference
The 2015 International Conference on Men and Masculinities will gather many of the world's foremost researchers in their respective fields, as well as people engaged in policy-oriented initiatives and direct service projects all over the world.
Notice how he names no one? He cannot name anyone because he is not in contact with those who are not allied with feminists. What he has in mind is "advisers" who will attract crowds.
"The conference will do more than merely inaugurate the Center; it will establish it as the single most visible institutional arena for furthering this urgent dialogue," said Professor Kimmel. "These conversations will produce new research projects, deepen programs already in existence, and suggest the sorts of collaborative work that can generate local, national and regional policies."
Bullshit rhetoric and nothing more.
The conference is scheduled to take place at Stony Brook Manhattan and will be open to graduate students and personnel from non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and United Nation (UN) agencies. The Center will partner with various UN-based organizations as well as national and global NGOs to provide scholarship opportunities for their personnel engaged in projects around the world.
This connection with political organizations is ominous–and what does it have to do with scholarly work?
Kimmel anticipates 400 attendees…
Mostly supporters and "stars."
…from all over the world during the three-day conference. "It will be the first conference devoted specifically to the dialogue between researchers and practitioners, which will be reflected in the session organizations eschewing traditional formal paper delivery in favor of specific global dialogues…
S*itting around cheering, chatting, waving banners.*
…about 'What do we know?' and 'What do we need to know?'" he said.
No papers? No formal presentations? This is not an academic enterprise. Do I need to repeat that?
The conference will also inaugurate the Master of Arts program in Masculinity Studies, a free-standing program associated with the Department of Sociology and Women's and Gender Studies at Stony Brook. The Center will welcome the first classes to the MA program in the fall of 2017. "The MA program will be an important ongoing activity of the Center – vitally tied to its mission of bringing together researchers and practitioners…

Training more activists.

…and also promoting the field," said Professor Kimmel.

Kimmel earned his BA (sociology and philosophy) with distinction from Vassar College, an MA (sociology) from Brown University and a PhD (sociology) from the University of California at Berkeley. He has authored nearly 200 peer-reviewed scholarly articles and numerous books on gender and masculinities including Men's Lives (2010), The Gendered Society (2011), Manhood: a Cultural History (2012), and Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men (2008). He has co-edited The Handbook of Studies on Men and Masculinities (2005) and Men and Masculinities: a Social, Cultural and Historical Encyclopedia (2004) which was named "Best of Reference 2004" by the New York Public Library. Professor Kimmel's current research, a comparative study of the extreme right, white supremacists and neo-Nazis in the United States, Germany and Scandinavia, will be published in a new book, Angry White Men, in late 2013.

UK Feminists: Let's Keep Women out of Prison

Michael Reed · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Lady Justice wears a blindfold to indicate that she cares not about a person's race, sex or social class. Shockingly, British feminists are arguing in favor of removing that blindfold when it comes to a criminal's sex. They're arguing for changes that would offer women a greater chance of community-based rehabilitation rather than prison. It's an idea that has been floating around in the femisphere for a while, and the flagship British project, which is funded by the government, is called Inspire.

The project, which was started in Brighton on the south coast of Britain, runs a set of centers that organize community rehabilitation facilities for female offenders. The lobbying carried out by this group is in favor of this approach being employed on a wide scale, as they claim it has proven very effective.

"A significant proportion have also experienced serious and sustained violence or sexual violence either as adults or as children." – Inspire Women's Project, Executive Summary.

So, what could the argument for prison avoidance for women actually be? This article published in The Independent last year sums up the feminist argument very well. Even the title, "Mothers & Prison: The alternatives", is wrong-footed from the start as it's a bit unfair to claim that mothers deserve special status in a society in which men don't have equal rights of custody.

And it's all downhill from there. Like a lot of feminism, the arguments of Inspire use a trick of omission when attempting to justify unequal treatment for male and female criminals. The supporters of this policy say that female offenders are typically from disadvantaged and abusive backgrounds. They are probably right, but what they leave out is that this is that this sums up the background of practically every man in prison. A history of abuse and neglect is often characterizes the early life of a repeat criminal offender. In the same way, a huge proportion of men in prison have suffered from or currently suffer from mental illness, a point that Inspire makes about female offenders.

To mull these issues is to touch upon a question that has tasked philosophers and commentators throughout time. What is the purpose of punishment? Is it to reform the individual, or to mete out a punishment that evokes a sense of satisfaction within the wider society? Is its purpose to provide a deterrent to the criminal, and by example, other citizens?

It's worth noting that most of the case histories that are presented in order to bolster the feminist argument are the product of self reporting on the part of the offender. It's a well known cliché that every criminal is an expert at manufacturing a believable sob story. Practically every man in prison would, given a chance, argue that he is a victim and that his case deserves sympathy. Women making this argument have the advantage that it's difficult to walk down a city street without seeing a poster of a woman suffering an unfair plight, the product of a society that is very quick to see women as victims.

"It costs £45,000 to keep a woman in prison for one year – while almost 45 per cent of all women released from custody in 2010 re-offended within 12 months." – Ministry of Justice website.

It's hard to see how any of the examples that Inspire and its like-minded supporters offer can, in any way, be used to justify unequal treatment for men and women. Whatever you say about female offenders and the treatment that they deserve is typically true of male offenders.

Were there a universal set of rules to exclude some offenders from normal treatment, what might they be? If the criminal has a hard luck story, should they be able to avoid prison? Or a history of mental illness? What if they had a really good excuse and won't do it again? If so, prepare to release about 90% of the male prison population back onto the streets. It would certainly save some money, in the short term. That too, pointing out the high cost of keeping women in prison, is used as a justification for special treatment. It also fails the same basic test that all arguments for unequal treatment do because whatever you say about female prisoners is typically true of male prisoners.

Some may debate whether community sentencing as opposed to imprisonment is a "soft option" after all, and much of the rhetoric employs phraseology such as "tough community scheme". A simple test would be to offer each sentenced criminal a choice between going to prison or doing a community sentence. Bear in mind that by the time a criminal is facing imprisonment, they are usually sufficiently familiar with the justice system to make an informed decision. According to the backers of female-specific schemes, criminals would show no preference for community sentencing over prison.

Even if there there are found to be differences in the effectiveness of community sentences for male and female offenders, it makes no real difference. If it were proved that recidivism amongst male offenders given community sentences was higher, feminists would claim that it was evidence that community sentences were not the correct approach for male offenders. However, if it were found that recidivism amongst female offenders on community sentences was higher, feminists would claim that this proved that female offenders needed greater support. You can't win on that one.

A basic thought experiment can be used to clarify the matter further. Let us say that it was discovered that in 1970s South Africa, the Government had declared that white people would receive different treatment to black people when they committed a criminal offense. It might have argued that white people were less likely to be involved in crime and that the minority that did commit crimes were typically victims of hardship and deprivation. Further more, measures such as education and community service seemed to be more effective than prison with white criminals. Could you live with that?

“Woman and Her Right to Kill” – 1922

Robert St. Estephe · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

DAILY EDITORIAL DIGEST APRIL 19, 1922

[FULL TEXT]: Whether it is not wasting the money of the taxpayers trying women for murder in cases where the so-called unwritten law can be evoked is the subject of comment throughout the country. The discussion centers upon the recent acquittal of Miss Olivia Stone, the Cincinnati nurse, who shot a former corporation counsel of that city because she alleged he had failed to keep his promise to marry her.

[image]“If women who commit crimes of passion are always to go free,” suggests the NEW YORK WORLD, “why bother to try them? Why not provide an immunity procedure, based on the unwritten law and including recognition of the tender susceptibilities of sympathetic jurors, whereby the process of exculpation may be shortened and cheapened? The plan would do away with considerable hypocrisy and humbug in the name of justice,” which leads the Syracuse, N. Y. HERALD, to remark:—”Why not? Why should the money of taxpayers be wasted in the prosecution of women who kill their comrades in illicit relationship?

If the law making deliberate murder a capital offense is to be suspended in the discretion of juries, when the assassin is a woman, it would be better for the cause of justice, and it would make law more respectable, specifically to exempt from any punishment women who murder their paramours. Such travesties of justice as this help to give fresh impetus to the crime wave.”

It is pointed out by the BROOKLYN EAGLE that “we no longer stage a purely judicial proceeding for the trial of a woman accused of murdering a man from whom she has suffered real or fancied wrong. Instead we stage a melodrama, with the defendant as the persecuted heroine and the dead men as the villain.” The EAGLE points out that while the judge may try to hold the scales of justice even, acquittal is certain, and adds:—”Perhaps one of the earmarks of our civilization is our frank recognition of the fact that law can be made to mean one thing for a man and an entirely different thing for a woman,” Which brings from the Worcester TELEGRAM the suggestion that “juries of normally hardboiled males continue to view crimes through a glamor of romance, chivalry and sympathy, set the seal of their approval upon homicidal endeavor and bid the law, instead of the defendant, go hang,” while the Columbus, Ohio, STATE JOURNAL, sarcastically remarks that “the acquittal is in strict accordance with the exact terms of the unwritten law and we trust will give added impetus to the movement among our girls in their pursuit of happiness to arrange to be deceived and then shoot.”

The fact that the verdict, like all of its kind was, after all, “against society,” is pointed out by the Pittsburgh, Pa., GAZETTE TIMES, which feels convinced that “Americans do not believe in the unwritten law, as commonly defined; they do not believe in private vengeance, the forgiveness of which by a jury amounts to usurpation of authority by twelve men whose sole duty is to determine the facts of a case. Justice for society demands that the criminal courts function legitimately.” And in this specific case, the Danville, Va., REGISTER, points nut. there was no evidence only by Miss Stone herself that she had been wronged by Kinkead and adds: “even if he had deceived the woman as she claims, does that justify her in shooting him down?" And acquittals of this character naturally will have the effect of encouraging women to slay the Lafayette, Ind., JOURNAL-COURIER believes, and "thus is murder in a "love nest given a place among the favorite indoor "ports of the day."

The jurors may have had some justification for their verdict in the opinion of the Richmond, Va., TIMES DISPATCH, which points out that "the evidence in this case had revealed to them a defenseless young woman, her betrayal and subsequent relentless hounding by a man who led a Jekyll-Hyde existence, her humiliation and desperation—then the fatal meeting.

That was the picture impressed upon the minds of the jurors, and, right or wrong, the verdict they gave is the verdict we may expect to continue hearing in eases of this sort."

Which prompts the Savannah, Ga., NEWS to suggest that in view of the imposition of a seven and a half years imprisonment on Gussia Human in a New York court for perjury at her lover's trial for murder and the acquittal of Miss Stone "the truth may be that the greater the crime the less likelihood of punishing, the woman in the case." And the Richmond, Ind., ITEM, feels convinced that "it has got to a point where almost any woman can be sure of acquittal for killing a man. All she has to do is to throw hysterics and shed tears in court and her conviction is seemingly impossible."

The Port Huron, Mich., TIMES HERALD, feel that "one may have unlimited sympathy for the wife who kills the woman who steals) her husband, and may find plenty of excuses for the man who shoots his friend for violating the honor of his wife, but (here is considerable question whether it is a wise method of administering justice, although too often the punishment may ho well deserved."

The economic phase of the situation furnishes a strong appeal to the editor of the Worcester, Mass., GAZETTE, who sarcastically declares that "taxes are high; government is expensive, let's save hundreds of dollars and much nerve force. When a lady pulls her trusty gat and perforates her sweetheart don't arrest her. Save time and money and wear and tear. Besides, this plan would enable the killer to get on the stage or in the movies within a day or two after the killing." The very fact that there are so few, by comparison, killings by women leads the Cleveland NEWS to call attention to the fact that "it may be said the nature of American women is demonstrated as being generally and notably kind, patient and peaceable by the fact that murderesses are not more numerous in a country where it always is an open season for man hunting by women."

Prone to Violence, Introduction and Preface

Erin Pizzey · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: We are pleased to have obtained permission to reprint Erin Pizzey's classic book, Prone to Violence, first published in 1982. This book is a must-read on the subject of domestic violence, and is what people from the former Soviet Union would call "samizdat," as the book was subjected to concerted campaigns to make it unavailable for publication or distribution in the UK or United States. Over 30 years ago, gender ideologues were already trying to hide the truth–that men and women are equally prone to violence. Although parts of this book are dated, what's most shocking is how fresh and timely most of it still is: little has changed in the last 30 years, except that the vast majority of peer reviewed scientific research done since its publication has only bolstered all of Erin's most salient points. When it comes to domestic violence, women and men are about as violent as each other, just in somewhat different ways, and its primary victims are children.

We begin our series with the preface of "Prone To Violence." Watch for the other chapters to be published here on AVfM. If you have ever been involved in an abusive relationship with a woman (or man for that matter), you owe it to yourself to read this book. And if you know someone who is, or has been, in such a relationship, you owe it to them to get them to read it. –DE

PREFACE TO "PRONE TO VIOLENCE"

The premise of our work is that every baby needs to feel love and happiness. A baby will bond these instinctive feelings to whatever people and situations are available. It is the birth-right of every child to be surrounded by nurturing and loving parents in an atmosphere of peace. In a non-violent family, a child grows up in such an atmosphere, and then, working from the secure base of being loved, will develop an independent and choosing self that is able to recreate happy love both in future relationships and with its own children. In a violent family, however, this birthright to love and peace is betrayed, because from the moment of conception the child lives in a world where emotional and physical pain and danger are always present. The child then bonds to pain. This bonding becomes an addiction to pain. The child then cannot grow to form an independent self, because he or she is slave to this addiction. Throughout life, the person then recreates situations of violence and pain, for those situations stir the only feelings of love and satisfaction the person has ever known.

Whether the children of violent families learn to find satisfaction through the inflicting or the receiving of emotional and physical pain, the violence that these people live on is merely an expression of pain. The role of the caring community is to undo this fundamental betrayal of people who have been emotionally disabled by their violent childhoods. By creating a loving environment in which deep internal work can be done to help violence-prone people to understand and to overcome their addiction to pain, these people can then learn to trust and be happy in love instead of pain.

This book records ten years of work in such a community, along with the techniques and insights gained through these years.

The work now continues in Britain through Women's Aid Ltd., which runs a house in Bristol.

The Author 19 February 1982

INTRODUCTION TO "PRONE TO VIOLENCE"

The idea of a meeting place for women and their children grew out of my disastrous brush with a local group of the newly emergent Women's Movement in 1971. I was then feeling lonely and isolated, with two small children to care for, and a husband frequently away. When I first began to read the articles that other women were writing, I felt they were writing about me. It was certainly a liberation to find I was not the only woman who could not knit or sew, and that there were other women out there who shared my pathological hatred of housework. I began to look out for our nearest group.

Unfortunately that group, in particular, seemed to be more concerned with world politics than with my day-to4ay problems, like how to cope on my own with two children, two dogs and a cat – for the loneliness was sometimes dreadful. Luckily I did meet some women like myself who wanted not only to bring up their children properly at home, but also to use their energies and talents in improving our community life, so that we would no longer feel so cut off and isolated that we lived our lives on valium. Therefore we left it to the women's group to decide the solution for world problems, and got on with the more immediate task of finding a place where mothers could meet each other and bring their children.

So with two of my friends I began to scout round Hounslow for a little house to use as a women's centre. Eventually Hounslow Council wrote to me about No.2 Belmont Terrace, and I collected the keys. When I first opened the door, I burst into tears – it was derelict. But it was ours! By now our group had grown quite large, and we determinedly got on with the work. Harry Ferrer, our plumber, showed us how to fit pipes and mend washers, and we completely renovated the building until one day it was ready for occupation.

Mothers living locally began to call by on their way to and from school. They would stop in for a chat or to share a problem with us. Gradually we all pooled our knowledge and began to learn the complex Social Security laws. We discovered that many women would come to see us who could not face anything as authoritarian-seeming as a town-hall or a Social Services department. We had created a very happy little community of people from all walks of life, who knew that any time they were lonely or in need of company they just had to go down to No.2 Belmont Terrace, and someone was almost sure to be there to talk to. And even when no one was there, it was still a warm, welcoming place to take your kids. Then home did not seem so much like a prison.

All this changed the day the first battered woman walked through the front door and showed me her bruises. 'No one will help me,' she said. Those words took me back to a time in my own childhood when no one would help me – as I begged them to bury my mother because my father refused to. 'I will help you,' I promised her, and refuge was born.

Within weeks there were at least forty mothers and children packed into four tiny rooms. Fortunately for me, our predicament was high-lighted in a small piece written by a journalist for the Observer. After that a man called by one day and, sitting himself down on a mattress, asked me what I most needed. 'A new house,' I told him. 'Go and find it,' he said. I did. This man was Neville Vincent, the Managing Director of Bovis Ltd. In November 1974 we acquired a much larger house in Chiswick High Road. However, we were still not out of the woods. Even as we moved in, our numbers were already too great. We were still officially overcrowded. Because at that time there was nowhere else for women to run to, I insisted that no one should ever be turned away. As a result, although we were legally allowed to house only thirty-six residents, our numbers sometimes went as high as one hundred and fifty mothers and children. My colleague Anne Ashby agreed with me over the 'open door' principle, and we enshrined it in our policy that the door would remain open day and night. This, of course, created an unbearable tension between ourselves and our local Borough, who quite rightly were worried by the overcrowding, the ensuing health hazard, and the possibility of fire. On 29 April 1976 the Borough first took me to court for overcrowding.

Just before I was to appear in the Acton Magistrates' Court, I was invited to tour America with Tina, Nikki, and Annie, who were working with me at the time. I was genuinely startled and moved that anyone should consider that we had anything valuable to offer, so I accepted at once. We flew into New York on 12 March 1976, and visited sixteen other cities to raise funds for new refuges springing up all over the USA. I remember that I was particularly interested in finding if anyone else had come to similar conclusions on why some people actually choose violent relationships – which is the major theme of this book. But in response I mostly met again the hostility of those people who insisted that all women were simply victims of male oppression.

It seems to me that America's Women's Movement is much more broadly based than its British counterpart. It was with members of the National Organization of Women that we had the best dialogues – at seminars and meetings where people wanted to share a sense of bewilderment arising from the fact that now there were established refuges, so many women seemed to be merely using them like revolving doors. They would come to the refuges when the level of violence got too much, only to return to their violent men for another few weeks, and then come back to the refuges again for help.

Some of the refuges dealt with this problem by allowing such women three visits only. As they explained to me, this rule meant that the staff could concentrate their efforts on the women who genuinely wanted to get out of violent relation-ships. But they knew, just as we did, that if you wanted to do effective work in a refuge, the problems attached to women who seemed unable to stay away from violence would have to be fully explored sooner or later.

Our trip ended with a lunch of honour in Washington DC, sponsored by Congresswoman Lindy Boggs and Congressman Newton Steer. As I stood to give my speech in a lovely room surrounded by members of Congress on Capitol Hill, it was bard not to feel bitter that back home, within a few weeks, I would be facing charges in an English court for carrying out the refuge work I was now describing to a supportive audience.
Thanks to a brilliant manoeuvre on the part of our barrister Stephen Sedly and David Ormondy, a public health adviser, the Acton Magistrates' Court found me not guilty of overcrowding. The good news was followed immediately by bad news. Hounslow appealed, and got ready to take me to the High Court in the Strand.
During this time, through a series of fortuitous events, we managed to persuade the reluctant civil servants to give us a grant of £2,000 a month. This generosity could have had something to do with the threat of our group arranging a sit-in outside 10 Downing Street. We numbered about one hundred and twenty mothers and children, and we were already well known for our immediate ability to get on the streets with our placards and demand action where necessary. We had received a reassuring letter saying that our application for a grant would be considered. However, we heard nothing for several months, and it was not until October 1974, the day before the publication of my book Scream Quietly or the Neighbours Will Hear, that a cheque arrived by taxi, with a letter from the Department of Health and Social Security.
Meanwhile, during the Conservatives' period in office, I had been encouraged by Sir Keith Joseph to apply for an Urban Aid Grant of £10,000 a year. The Urban Aid scheme was a very new idea in those days. Hounslow had many other schemes to put forward to the Government, but due to local pressure and the continued support of a local Labour councillor, Jim Duffy, they did put my scheme in. To their surprise and my amusement, it was granted. By this time, help came from another direction. David Astor had resigned from the Observer and offered me his services. He brought with him the kindly and powerful figure of Lord Goodman. Now, at least, Anne Ashby and I were no longer on our own.
We had a curious mixture of dedicated staff and volunteers. We scoured London, taking possession of empty houses belonging to other boroughs which refused to take financial responsibility for their own families, who turned up on our doorstep. We took these houses over by night, to create new communities for such additional families. By the time of the court cases, Chiswick Women's Aid had established twenty-two squats, and had also acquired the Palm Court Hotel (forty-five private suites), three Greater London Council properties, and a large vicarage in Bristol. Even so, at our main refuge we had to erect large garden sheds in the backyard to cope with the overflow of one hundred and fifty mothers and children living in the house.
As the case in the High Court approached, the battle lines were set, but I was no longer powerless, or fighting in a vacuum. We had Lord Gordon on our side, and I felt very much more confident. In the late spring of 1976, Hounslow took me to the High Court, where I was found guilty of the charge of overcrowding. We appealed this decision, and the matter went to the House of Lords in March 1977. There the five Law Lords reluctantly found me guilty, and I returned to Acton Magistrates' Court for sentencing.
During this time, and responding to so much publicity, other groups had formed to take up the idea of refuge for women and children. Many comprised good, loving people, both men and women, who sincerely wanted to help, but there were also the usual faces seen around all social movements, and I was wary enough to stay clear of their politics. I never saw Women's Aid as a movement that was hostile to men, but The National Federation, which quickly formed, made it quite clear that men were the enemy. This view totally rejected our own philosophy – which cannot be encapsulated in a political theory, but which recognises that the basis of the problem is a human one: violence occurs in both men and women. That is not a politically fashionable view in certain quarters, and, indeed, for them we were outcasts from the very beginning because we had always employed male workers at our Refuge – and we also ran a special house for the men of the problem families who sought our help.
The civil servants, who hated our open-door policy as much as they hated our evidence of the mistreatment of problem families by the various State-run agencies saw their opportunity to get rid of us. They removed our grant on the grounds that we were not a national organisation, even though we had been officially declared so by the Charity Commissioners and our mothers and children came from all over Britain. They handed the grant to the National Federation instead. At about the same time, Hounslow Council voted to remove our Urban Aid Grant, thus hoping to starve us into submission. Fortunately, they did not know that I had been given a sum of £50,000 by an anonymous well-wisher, which I had tucked away in bonds for just such an occasion. Those staff that could afford to all gave up their meagre salaries. Most of us were volunteers, so that presented little problem, and we soldiered on.

The final court case was my sentencing at the Acton Magistrates' Court on 6 October 1977. The following February, in response to a letter from one of our mothers, the Queen intervened and saved the Refuge.* The war was over, and the rest is history. This book is not about the politics of survival for pressure groups, because that is a whole book in itself. This book is about the problem families and my (and later Jeff's) work with them. Scream Quietly or the Neighbours Will Hear is about how people are violent. Infernal Child, my autobiography, is about how a violent childhood affects children. Prone to Violence is a book about why people are violent. In these pages we can all recognise parts of ourselves, and hopefully, in gaining understanding, we can learn compassion, and in turn help to persuade our society to refrain from further brutalising already brutalised people.

NOTES

The events and incidents referred to in this book are based on the authors' personal experience and information given to them. The names of the persons referred to in the text work have been altered and all reasonable steps have been taken to ensure that they are not identifiable.

This book is dedicated to all the staff who were working with Erin in 1976, in particular to Anne Ashby who has been her friend and colleague for ten years and who is now the Director of Chiswick Family Rescue. With her capable hands she will guide this new project according to her own ideals and vision. We both wish her every success. Also to David Astor and Lord Goodman who have done so much for battered women and their children. Our thanks go, too, to John Pontin, and to the J.T. Group in Bristol, who have made it possible for our work to continue in this country.

Last but not least we would like to express with this Dedication our appreciation for all the hours of work put into Women's Aid by David Morris and Alan Cohen.

Separately we would like to give our thanks to our publisher's editor Peter Lavery for all his help.

*The Court sentencing and the letter from Buckingham Palace (quoted in full) are described in Chapter Five.

Why Gillard won't go

Jim Muldoon · 19 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In June 2010, the Liberals and Nationals Coalition under Tony Abbott were given a 53% national preference over the Australian Labor Party (ALP), which caused the leadership change to bring Julia Gillard to power (Harcher, 2010). The latest Newspoll on June 4, 2013 with Gillard at the helm puts Tony Abbott's coalition in front at 58% (The Australian, 2013). Elections are only a few months away, scheduled for 14 September 2013.

Yet, although all political pundits are predicting a landslide defeat in the next election, Gillard refuses to budge from the leadership. Since earlier this year, individual ALP luminaries have called for her resignation (Scarr, 2013) but she has resolutely refused the whole time (Atkins, 2013).

The next obvious step in the process, as Gillard did to Rudd in 2010, is if she won't jump then someone has to push her. Yet, it seems that the ALP are reluctant to do just that. The Australian newspaper states, "We cannot fathom why the Labor caucus has, for so long, stuck by a leader who will almost certainly lead it to its worst ever electoral defeat (The Australian, 2013)."

The difficulty here for all of the above confusion is that they are continually and desperately trying to avoid the elephant in the room: Feminism.

The closest that anyone seems to get is Janet Albrechtsen of The Australian who says that Labor's quotas for women MPs is largely responsible for the downturn of the party (Albrechtsen, 2013). Not only does it make for poorer female candidates, she claims, but it also encourages factional deals which allows for poor male candidates as well.

To quote her directly: "…until genuine merit becomes the determining factor for preselection, Labor is destined to be populated by the wrong people, chosen for the wrong reasons." And she calls the Gillard a "Quota PM" to let us know exactly who at least one of the "wrong people" is.

However, it is ideology that got Gillard the job in the first place. In 1996 Gillard, with other feminist Labor party workers, started an organisation called Emily's List (Emily's List, 2013). This organisation was set up to fund and mentor female candidates to represent Labor in both state and federal elections.

The doublespeak of this organisation should be enough to show its dishonest intent. They have a "mantra" (the less New Age would call it a slogan), "When women support women, women win".

By "women", Emily's Listers are not just refering to any women, or even feminist women, but feminist women who "absolutely" believe in the cause. Only the fervent need apply.

And, when these women win, who gets beat? Can you think who the losers might be?

A hint might be gleaned from one of the justifications for the Emily's List organisation: "For many women, the cost of running an election campaign can be prohibitive to their involvement in politics."

Of course, by "election campaign" the girls are not talking here about a bare-bones, seat-of-the-pants effort for a seat on a local city council. They are talking about candidates being able to take on the might of Abbott's Coalition in seriously contested state and federal elections.

How many male bricklayers or plumbers could afford such an indulgence? How many men, even in jobs that require a suit, are so well off that they can put their career on hold to try their luck, and many tens of thousands of dollars of their own money, in a campaign that, if they lose, has a return of nothing?

This is why most men who want to run for parliament join a political party. In the Labor camp, the men get funded by party; the women get funded by the party–plus what they get from Emily's List.

Equality! What a shame we all can't get some.

One of the things the Emily's Listers pushed for was Labor taking on a policy of providing 40% female candidates for electable seats. That means if it's a Liberal safe seat, there is no chance of getting elected, so a man can have it. [Editorial note: the Liberal Party is the Labor Party's primary opposition in the upcoming elections. Yet the Emily's List people appear unwilling to help Liberal women. Interesting, no? –DE]

In other words, before they beat the Liberal men, the Emily's Listers first beat the men in their own party.

However the thing to note here is not just that Gillard's rise lacks merit. Her source of power, therefore, is Emily's

List, and not the ALP, and not the ballot box.
In her "Blue Tie" speech, she declared that Labor is the party for women, and that September 14 will decide "…whether, once again, we will banish women's voices from our political life (Gillard, 2013)." Again, with references to Abbott and misogyny, Gillard turns to the language of the Feminist faithful and not to Australian Labor Party policy.
This speech resulted in some 500,000 men dropping the ALP as their preferred government in a poll taken shortly thereafter (Atkins, 2013). How's that for an inclusive Prime Minister who will bring consensus as only females can do?
It doesn't matter to Gillard, or the Listers, if the ALP remains in government or how badly they might lose. As long as Emily's List remains, Gillard and her ilk will have access to power.
But if Gillard resigns, then she is admitting that she is not up to the job. It means that not only is Gillard a failure, but so, too, is the unstated but always implied premise behind Emily's List: quota-empowered women will do a better job than men ever could.
Therefore, Gillard's resignation would also bring in to question the legitimacy of the other Emily's Listers currently enjoying positions they could never earn on their own account.
What Gillard also knows is that the Sisterhood, benevolent in its support, never forgives and never forgets. If Gillard resigns they will disown and disempower her in a heartbeat.
A recent example of this was Gillard's own dismissal of Trish Crossin, an ALP Senator who favoured Rudd in a failed comeback attempt (Maiden, 2013). The dumping was characterised as "brutality" by Crossin, who received "nothing" for her many years of service to the ALP cause.
As to why the men in the Labor party don't remove her, have a look at Tony Abbott's non-rebuttal rebuttals to Gillard's claims of misogyny. He will not take Gillard on over any feminist issue because he is afraid of the feminists. He knows that any argument with feminists just leaps from one unsupported accusation to the other. In the end, he will sound just as mad as they are with no real benefit for his cause.
For example, try arguing with a feminist that Patriarchy as they describe it never existed and see how long it takes before you are accused of racism and homophobia.
Instead he parades his wife and daughters to deflect accusations of misogyny while he tries to look "women friendly" in the background.
If Abbott is afraid of them, you can imagine how the men in the Labor party are. Some of them, by now, are there because of their feminist friendly position. They depend, to a certain extent, on Emily's List too. Others are there because they were prepared to swap deals with the Listers. None remain who might have opposed them.
Having allowed the feminists to push their way in to their leadership, the ALP is now between a rock and a hard place. To lose the feminists, they fear, would mean losing a large part of their voter base and certainly many of their most ardent activists.
To keep the feminists, it seems, they will probably need to lose everybody else.

Forgetting to be shamed

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Andy Hind wrote an article for Slate.com on May 30 called "I'm a stay-at-home dad. I'm a feminist. I have erotic thoughts about random women I pass on the street. How can I stop that?"[1].

I won't dissect Hind's ideologically-induced self hatred in any detail, as numerous other writers have already done that. However, it's worth noting that shaming human beings for expressing their natural sexual inclinations seems, in the gender ideological zeitgeist like just one more point of fatal hypocrisy. Just sayin'.

Maureen O'Connor, who writes for NYMag has posted a few words on Hind's article too. The title: I'm a Woman. I Read Slate. I Have Violent Thoughts About a Guy Who Writes About Being Horny. How Can I Stop That?[2]

However, before any examination of O'Connor's article, the most glaring question in my mind is what were Slate's editors thinking when they okayed this piece?

O'Connor's rant begins with a paragraph including the following: "As I read Hinds's lustily imagined paean to penis, I struggled to overcome a powerful animal feeling within. Violence. Female violence. How can I stop my desire to rend limb from limb the innocent men featured in this article?".

Two items jump out from this introduction, the first is female violence. Normally I would not take notice of this phrase. However, its compliment, male violence has become a standard rhetorical point in the writing of gender ideologues. The same ideologues who oppose human rights, who promote violence, and who appear to be fixed on the goal of a hierarchy of designated people and lesser livestock, organized along the lines of sexual identity. Violence doesn't have a sex or a gender. That means its initiation is no more, and no less vile, and it's ideation no more, and no less shameful when conducted by members of the gentler sex; which is to say, men.

The second item of note from O'Connor's NYMag article is her question: "How can I stop my desire to rend limb from limb the innocent men featured in this article"? MAUREEN O'CONNOR admits in the introduction of her own article that her desire is to commit violence on a man she designates as innocent.

But that question from O'Connor leads to a question of my own. Why would anyone write a feature length article for NYMag, announcing to the entire world that they are a violent sociopath? For that matter, why would the editors at NYMag publish any such self indictment, lending the name of NYMag to such ideations of murder?

Apparently, I have entirely missed the author's main point. According to a colleague I consulted while I wrote this criticism, O'Connor's claims "Andy Hinds does not deserve to be torn limb from limb" and "He's not a misogynist" is constructed plausible deniability. This is also evident in O'Connor's second pararaph, which concludes as follows: "He knows not what he does — but I, oh, I know exactly what I am doing. I am fantasizing about snapping Andy Hinds's fingers, one by one. And I am indulging this fantasy in a very long article on the Internet, because my exhibitionist desire to parody Andy Hinds is greater than my respect for Andy Hinds."

So, O'Connor's "very long" 695 words constitute PARODY of Mr Hinds, apparently. The guy whose most significant public failing seems to be writing about his sexual daydreams. I work with a few women, some of whom I've had a fantasy or two about. In fact, asking a few of my closer female friends, they too have fantasies about some of the men they encounter at work and elsewhere. People have sexual fantasies, and many of those fantasies are lurid and quite impractical. Andrew Hinds wrote an article mentioning this, and O'Connor decided her own fantasy to publicize would be, among other things, to snap all his fingers.

But as mentioned, until speaking to a colleague about her piece, I had entirely missed the point. Despite identifying Hinds as "innocent", and having done nothing wrong – her point which had to be pointed out to me was to shame him. Well, not just Andy Hinds, also any male reader with sexual fantasies.

You get the message, guys? If you have any naughty thoughts about your kid's female swimming coach, or the woman who drives the UPS truck, or the blonde with the big knockers in HR, or that valkyrie you keep noticing down at the gym, keep those thoughts bottled up and never never never express them. Because YOUR sexuality is dirty, depraved and to be ashamed of.

You should know this, because your social better, in the person of one Maureen O'Conner has told you. The existence of sexual fantasies belonging to men drives her into a murderous rage. In fact, according to our Maureen:

“Violent rage is the background music every time you read a troll-baiting article on the Internet.”
Is it? Perhaps if you’re not an adult, and lack any ability to chose your own state of mind. But O’conner, whether she is the emotional toddler she claims or not is putting us all on notice that if we own a Y chromosome, our sexuality is dirt, bad and our sexual fantasies, whether they might be, should appropriately be a source of shame.
“And don’t feel bad about being horny, Andy Hinds. It happens. Just keep it to yourself.”
That’s what I totally missed. It flew right past me. In fact, It did not even occur to me that Andy should feel any shame at all about his lust for a Valkyrie on an elliptical. Nor did it cross my mind that I should feel shame for any of my own lustings. As the thesis of O’Connor’s article, that men should feel ashamed of their own sexuality, it simply did not occur to me.
Of course, it’s not like this is a new message either. The prevalent use of the word “creep” to describe any male whose sexuality can be plausibly drawn into the narrative is nothing new.
But aren’t we all lucky then to find a new bludgeon for our identities in the form of O’Connor’s publicly violent rage. But remember, she’s not just the violent sociopath she portrays in the following 695 words, she’s a woman. That means she’s our arbiter of decency and the judge of what is or isn’t acceptable sexuality. Of course, before it was pointed out to me, while I was still so puzzled over why anyone would make a public and literal claim of their own violent urges, I thought qualifying an opening opinion with “I’m a woman” was merely the solipsism of an emotional child and a bad writer.
The first words in the title of her article are her statement of authority. “I’m a Woman. I Read Slate. I Have Violent Thoughts About a Guy Who Writes About Being Horny. How Can I Stop That?”
Maureen O’Conner is clearly not a bad writer, and it turns out, not an emotionally arrested toddler either. She’s a member of the special people, particularly those who determine whose sexuality is appropriate, and whose is not. Men like Andy Hind. Maybe even men like me, whose sexuality, although intellectually we all know exists, will not be considered a natural aspect of our human identity. Indeed, as male sexuality should be for men, rightly a subject of shame.
But as mentioned previously in this article, this had to be pointed out. I quite missed it when I read Maureen’s rant about her own violent inclinations. I had to be told my sexuality should be a source of shame, and a topic on which to remain silent.
And now, It appears that I have already forgotten that lesson again.

CAFE to open Centre For Men and Families

Dan Perrins · 20 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On Wednesday June 12, 2013 the Canadian Association For Equality (CAFE) held an event at the Screen Lounge. This event was different from all the other CAFE events in that it was held off campus and it involves a fund drive to open a centre for men and their families, the first of its kind in Toronto if not Ontario.
I fully endorse CAFE's efforts to open the Centre For Men and Families and would ask for those of you who can make a donation to do so. Help ensure men and their families have this resource(s) available to them in Toronto.
Here are the goals for the Canadian Centre for Men and Families:
The CCMF will distinguish itself in three critical ways:
1. The CCMF will be dedicated to boys' and men's issues on their own terms and not approached through a particular ideological lens.
2. The CCMF will focus on the breadth of boys' and men's issues, including:
-The "Boys' Crisis" (education, bullying, suicide) – Creating a new sense of purpose for our sons
-Workplace Issues (e.g. workplace safety)
-Educational and other resources to improve the mental and physical health of boys and men
-Family Law and Fathers Issues
-Empowering boys and men with communication skills rather than violence
-Crime and Punishment/Legal Issues
-Media, Social and Cultural Misandry
-Academic Misandry (e.g. in Gender Studies and Culture Studies programs)
3. The CCMF will work on these issues in depth by engaging in a wide variety of actions and activities all with a Canadian outlook and focus, including:
-Large public educational events and conferences
-Evidence-based research, policy writing, and engagement with the press
-Multimedia, such as blogs, social media, and the broadcast of podcasts and videos
-Social service provision
-campus outreach to a growing network of university student groups
-lending library
-political action: meetings with politicians, protests, rallies
The donation link is here.

Man, Woman, Truth Radio: Emotional Incest

AVfM Radio · 20 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
A women divorces after many years of marriage. Realizing she is now without another adult in the home, she turns to her 12 year old son and says, “You are all I have now.”
In another scenario, a father prepares to go on a business trip. Just before hopping a cab to the airport, he looks at his 7 year old boy and says, “You’re the man of the house while I am away. Take care of your mother.”
In still another home, 15 year old boy’s mother spends a lot of time telling him she is unhappy with his father; that she is always lonely and left to care for everything on her own. She is so thankful for her son, her “secret confidant.” He feels important and does what he can to make her feel better. He also learns to hate his father.
“Parentification” and emotional incest is a common theme in many dysfunctional homes. It often begins when a mother, who is supposed to be the caretaker of her child, reverses the roles and makes the child responsible for her emotional needs. It is a subtle and often overlooked form of child abuse.
Tonight, at 8:00 pm Central Time, please join Dr. Tara Palmatier and co host Paul Elam for a special episode of Man, Woman, Truth Radio where they will address this subject in a general discussion that uses real life reports of emotional incest.
The call in number is 310-388-9709.

The feminist advocacy "research" scam

Hannah Wallen · 20 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist legislative advocacy is a self-defined, self-perpetuating cycle.

Step 1, Assume Victimization of Women, begins with a general supposition, such as "There exists an epidemic of sexual violence against women in the United States, perpetrated mainly by men." The less detailed base-assumption for this supposition would be the general concept of female victims and male violence.

Step 2, Use Bias Tailored "Research" to Support Victimization Premise, involves designing a method of research specifically to return "data" which appears to support the initial supposition. Feminist organizations have pressured government agencies to adopt their biased methods, and with some success such as with the feminist-influenced CDC's 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey, in which researchers used questions with broad or poorly defined applications, interpreting the respondent's recall of having felt harassed in a public place as an incident of sexual violence, and placing drunk sex and sex under false pretenses in the same category as being subjected to physical force or threats of physical force by counting sexual activity taking place under those circumstances as an act of forced penetration (rape.) The survey combines discussion of ambiguously distasteful acts (the subject being exposed to someone else's nudity, without including in the survey the stipulation that the act was deliberate) with discussion of imposition (made you show your sexual body parts to them) to justify attributing personal violation to answers not necessarily indicative of it. This treats accidentally walking in on an individual's nudity the same as being forced to strip, pose nude, or perform for pornographic video.

This pattern is continued throughout the survey: Questions on stalking including questions which could count telemarketing and collections calls as stalking behavior, as well as awareness of an unwanted person's presence in public places as stalking behavior (regardless of the person's reason for being there)… and the giving of unwanted gifts. Questions on coercive control treat concern for a partner's whereabouts as coercion if ever expressed, not just if pursued excessively. Under that definition, most teens in nurturing families are subjected to stalking by their parents. Partners in families with tight schedules may also be guilty of stalking each other. Under Control of reproductive health, the survey asks if a partner "refused to use a condom when you wanted them to use one" but doesn't ask whether that was followed by nonconsensual sex, leaving the implication that if one chooses to have sex with a partner who refuses to wear a condom, the refusing partner is guilty of sexual violence (control of reproductive health) even when the decision to continue the act is a choice made by the "victim."

The researchers didn't ask the respondents to define their experiences, but instead made the definitions themselves, greatly padding their numbers in a way which would demonstrate an epidemic of sexual violence in the United States. Upon completion of the survey, which produced "evidence" of violence perpetrated by both sexes, and of victims of both sexes, the CDC published a report. In it, the authors directly mentioned lifetime rape findings for both sexes, as this showed a gap between male and female experiences, but only mentioned the figure for women during the last 12 months… with no numbers for men. The inconsistency of this omission becomes even more glaring considering that in every instance where men's numbers were lower, the report mentions both.

Reading the description for the researchers' definition of rape explains the gap in numbers between men and women, as they used a definition of rape which omitted victims who were forced to penetrate the perpetrator, limiting the male experience to being penetrated, the same as a female. This effectively excludes the victim's sex organ from the definition of rape, where the victim is a man. Consequently, in the report, the authors make the claim that the majority of male rape victims reported male perpetrators. According to the report, excluding (report-defined) rape, non-contact sexual violence, and stalking, perpetrators of every (other) type of sexual violence (which would include being forced to penetrate) were mostly female. Were the researchers to include the category "forced to penetrate," in their definition of rape, the 2010 rape numbers would even out between the genders of victim, and the percentage of female perpetrators of rape would greatly increase.

The report also emphasizes male perpetration where it is not merited, with statements like "Nearly half of male stalking victims also reported perpetration by a male," the correction of which would be "More than half of all male stalking victims reported perpetration by a female." Instead of pointing out the prevalence of female perpetrators in that finding, they emphasized the presence of male perpetrators, masking the majority by mentioning the minority.

The "Discussion" section of the report focuses primarily on female victims, citing violence as a health risk to both sexes but specifying that women are heavily effected, and repeating the emphasis on male perpetrators of stalking. Then there is this:

> Other features of NISVS also are designed to reduce underreporting, such as use of only female interviewers…

Question: If victims of sexual violence perpetrated by males would be too intimidated to give honest answers to a male interviewer, wouldn't victims of sexual violence perpetrated by females be too intimidated to give honest answers to a female interviewer?

Step 3, Create Panic and Call for Action, involves disseminating the findings to the general public, beginning with publication of the initial results, release of them to news organizations with dramatic claims which support the original supposition. Continuing on with the same example, the Implications for Prevention section of NISVS, while much of the assertions made are gender-neutral, the authors specifically cite "beliefs and social norms" that "reinforce negative stereotypes about masculinity, or that objectify and degrade women" as contributing factors to partner and sexual violence within society, but make no mention of the reverse; negative stereotypes about femininity, or objectification and degradation of men. Apparently, Playboy contributes to "rape culture," but Playgirl does not?

Less than 2 hours after the initial data was released, the National Resource Center on Violence Against Women went into action, engaging its online network in a Tweet Up to promote the study's claims, and releasing talking points on the study, emphasizing female victims, that same day. Interestingly, one response to the Tweet campaign involved participants asking "How might the measured impacts studied in NISVS be useful in supporting positive outcomes in child custody cases?" For the significance of this question, read Restraining Order Abuse and Vexatious Litigation, part two.

The release of the study and report was followed by articles from various outlets. The New York Times introduced the report with the headline, "Nearly 1 in 5 Women in U.S. Survey Say They Have Been Sexually Assaulted," followed by a story which emphasized the survey's findings on female victimization, the stated experiences of women, and the consequences to women… with only a brief mention of violence against men. CNN did just about the same, with the headline "Survey: 1 in 3 women affected by partner's violent behavior," and another story focused on female victims, though there is more mention of males than in the Times. Consultant360.com, which describes itself in its "about" page as "the No. 1 independent clinical journal among office-based primary care physicians," published a February 2012 article Intimate Partner Violence: The Silent Epidemic which was largely a reiteration of the CDC's NISVS claims and conclusions… for only female victims.

The report was similarly shared on college campuses, as with the presentation at Slippery Rock University using graphics which combined images suggestive of male-on-female violence with statistics from the report, and with the campus website's article, which focuses entirely on victimization of females, ending with the claim that men are the perpetrators of 95 percent of cases of sexual violence, which is not actually supported by the study's results.

Step 4, Lobby for Legislative and Policy "Fix," involves activist campaigns as well as continued writing and advocacy calling for lawmakers and organization administrators to respond to the "research" claims with changes to law and policy.

In January 2012, the official website of the National Organization of Women posted an activism initiative asking members to urge their legislators to reauthorize the Violence Against Women Act, citing the NISVS claims about female victims as evidence that "violence is prevalent."

Further encouragement from lobbying came from media sources. Debora Tucker, executive director of the National Center on Domestic and Sexual Violence cited NISVS in her post Violence Against Women Act is Working, published in US News's Debate Club forum under the question "Should the Violence Against Women Act Be Reauthorized?"

Bloomberg News article U.S. Senate Passes Aid to Victims of Domestic Violence quoted the white house citing NISVS in support of reauthorizing VAWA.

Citation of NISVS in support of reauthorization of VAWA shows up in a variety of sources – publishing a full list of them would take hours, and fill pages – but here are a few examples:

Senators Patrick Leahy (D) and Mike Crapo (R)

The Daily Nebraskan
Jewish Women International

United Methodist Women

Step 5, Use False Labels and Personal Slander to Silence Those Presenting Evidence Against Claim, is an ongoing effort which began well before the current controversy. One only has to read about the experiences of Warren Farrel as his feminist colleagues learned that he was more interested in facts, rather than propaganda, and reality than ideology. Erin Pizzey, founder of the Chiswick Women's Aid, one of the first women's shelters in the modern world, could tell you much about feminist harassment of advocates who contradict feminist ideology and stand in the way of feminist goals… as could Richard J. Gelles, along with, Murray A. Straus, and Suzanne K. Steinmetz. In addition to harassing researchers with whom they disagree, feminists use six other methods to suppress information that does not support their claims.

Step 6, Use Existing Claims and Existing Law as Evidence for Further Research and Legislation. This is often done during the research phase. The text of the official report on NISVS calls for further research more than once:

> Ongoing data collection and monitoring of these problems through NISVS and other data sources at the local, > state, and national level must lead to further research to develop and evaluate strategies to effectively prevent first-time perpetration of sexual violence, stalking, and intimate partner violence.

The report calls for "(research) to provide information on which to base the development and evaluation of prevention and intervention programs," "research that addresses the social and economic conditions," and "Research examining risk and protective factors, including inequities in the distribution of and access to resources and opportunities"
The World health Organization's publication, Preventing intimate partner and sexual violence against women cites "pressing need for evidence and further research" in multiple areas of the subject.
…which leads us back to step one, beginning with assumptions about violence based on the findings of NISVS.

Domestic Violence Revelations: Episode 4

[box icon=""]
Join us today, Saturday 22 June 2013, at 4:00pm London time, 11am Eastern US time, 8am Pacific US time, for Episode Four of Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey. This episode will feature selected readings from Chapter 3 of her classic suppressed book, Prone to Violence, read by Diana Davison. We will be discussing in particular the issue of the effect on children of violence and abuse, and how their experiences of violence and abuse often carry forward to lead them to become abusive and dangerous people themselves.
As usual the work is hated by gender ideologues who deny the reality that domestic violence and abuse are a human issue, not a gendered issue. But the reality is that this affects everyone, at all levels of society.
We also invite you to call in with your questions, your comments, and your personal stories if you would like to share them.

Feminism has a Mussolini flavor

Lucian Vâlsan · 21 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The French newspaper Le Monde called us “extremists” when we dared to compare feminist ideology with the KKK’s worldview or with National-Socialist ideology[1].

But the problem is that the comparison between national-socialism and feminism – and between the individuals who adhere to (any of) these two ideologies – is rooted in factual reality. Not a week goes by without seeing some feminists expressing eugenic policies as something desirable to be conducted against the human male population and rarely a day goes by without seeing an egregiously misandric message being promoted through a mainstream media channel. This state of affairs is quite similar to the ones described by people that lived in Germany in the 1930s.

But besides this general state of affairs almost throughout the world (as it’s increasingly hard to find a place on the map that has not been affected), Italian men and boys, after being declared a war against by their own government[2], can see it even closer.

Laws that make crimes punished more strongly if the alleged victim is a woman and laws that allow feminist lawyers to start court cases that cannot be stopped by the alleged female victims – are being proposed in Italy right now after the two major parties have lost the elections due to their corruption and were compelled into a forming a joint government in order to avoid seeing Beppe Grillo’s 5 star movement getting anywhere close to the power.

In this political environment, a misandric law is proposed and likely to be passed. The law states, amongst other things, an egregiously misandric principle:[3]

> The punishment is increased by 33% up to 50% if the crime […] is committed against women …

This law proposal belongs to Alessandra Mussolini. In 2006 she defined her political ideas as follows:

> I am proud of being a fascist … better fascist than gay.

Her grandfather was the national-socialist dictator Benito Mussolini (former member of the Italian Socialist Party) who imposed racist laws in 1938 and was executed in 1945[4].

[image]After some stripper activity for PlayBoy and other media, thanks to her name, Alessandra Mussolini entered in politics in 1992 with MSI (Movimento Sociale Italiano – The Italian Social Movement). MSI was essentially the national-socialist party – although the name “fascist” or “national-socialist” was not used because it was forbidden. MSI later changed its name into AN (Alleanza Nazionale – the National Alliance).

She abandoned AN in 2003 when its leader, Gianfranco Fini, went to Israel begging pardon for the race laws passed in Italy in the year 1938. Then, Alessandra Mussolini founded her new fascist party, remaining irrelevant until finally she joined the Berlusconi’s populist party, PdL(Popolo della Libertà – The People of Freedom) in the year 2008.

Her relations with feminism have not always been good. In 2001, in a TV program, Mussolini kicked the minister for Equal Opportunities. In 2010, another minister for Equal Opportunities told that Mussolini is a “Vajassa” (referring in Napoletan dialect to her intellectual level). But when Berlusconi made her the president of the commission for children (!!), she started helping alienating mothers coming closer to feminism.

In a TV program in 2012 she went on to say:

> I am not sure that I would allow a child to have contact with the father

The other laws, proposed by the left component of the feminist/fascist alliance, are even more dangerous because the racket of false “gender violence” accusations is controlled by leftoid feminists.

According to their laws, they want 85 million € (113.5 million US$) to make shelters for women only. Since many women refuse to go to their shelters, feminists consider that women are idiots who are not able to choose wisely what to do. So they propose a law according to which proceedings against men can be started by third parties (in practice by feminist lawyers that gain over the conflicts), without the consent of the alleged victim, and cannot be stopped. In other words, you don’t have to do anything – it’s enough for the State to decide to intervene into your family and they’ll soon be able to do it with impunity.

Furthermore, they propose a law that allows non-EU women to get a residence permit by just making a false claim of “gender violence”, presumably against Italian men [5].

In other words, if you are a woman and want to live in Italy – just go there, make a random allegation of “gender violence” and the problem is solved as no-one will dare anytime soon to question what are you talking about or even express mild skepticism to your claims.

So, next time you have doubts that feminism has no place in the same sentence with words like “equality” – just look into the laws of Italy, Spain, Sweden, the UK, France, Croatia, Denmark, Norway, Moldova, Romania and so many other European nations.

Feminism is, and has always been, about money, political power and statist control.

Welcome to the Brave New World!

The Voice of Europe: Scandinavian feminism

AVfM Radio · 21 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On June 21, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and Paul Elam will be talking about the general trends within the Scandinavian world, a distinct portion of Europe formed from rather tiny societies that are rarely placed under any form of scrutiny.

Sweden is more and more misandric, with politicians having the nerve to openly suggest emasculation programs or tax increases for men only. Norway imprisons non-feminist men and changes the legislation to become increasingly harder to escape jail for daring to question the feminist orthodoxy. Iceland recently attempted to censor the Internet and joined Saudi Arabia and Iran on the list of countries that banned lap dancing.

Denmark? Well, Denmark seems to be moving away from this, but is it really a correct impression? Or is it just another false impression that the non-Scandinavians tend to have? It wouldn't be the first time, considering that most of the non-Scandinavians still seem to think that Sweden is somehow an "equality heaven" – instead of the misandric hell that it is.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. The Scandinavian listeners are particularly invited to join the talk and correct any aspect that we might have it wrong.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

Broken women on men and fatherhood

D.D.Harper · 22 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I was in the AVFM forums and one of the members posted an article by Michele Weldon, "When Children Are Better off Fatherless." It was one of a series of articles in the New York Times addressing the question "What Are Fathers For?" with titles like "Valuable, but not Indispensable," and "Fathers Need Their Children." And yes, these two articles are as insidious as they sound, Happy Father's Day.

I proceeded to read the article without seeing who this author was or what her background is but it did not take me long to develop a profile in my mind.

Somewhere in her history she was abused or disaffected. This resonates throughout her writing and her tone toward fathers and men in general. She spent the entire article surreptitiously defending her own situation as a single mother who raised three children.

Ironically, I happened to talk to my wife about this paradigm; one in which broken human beings have an inordinate influence in our politics, media and lives. The analysis I gave my wife was that the vast majority of people are functional, and then we have this minority of men and women who are not. What I find incredibly disconcerting is that in most cases we pander to broken women like children without actually addressing the underlying dysfunction and often alienate the men to the point they end up committing suicide or land in jail.

Lately it seems every time I read women's writings on domestic violence, rape, parenting — and particularly men and fatherhood — the reality hits home that many of these women are not in it to solve the real problems that impact our lives and families, but to perpetuate their original violation and victimhood or to gain recompense for it. Often this centers around men.

Now back to that article; empty your bladder, move all wet materials away from your chair and swallow anything you may have in your mouth.

Right out of the block Ms. Weldon gives us the stats of 24 million fatherless children and conjectures caution that these children are not "doomed," then after a bit of detail she proceeds to caution our society not to assume these children are "damned."

WTF?

> "The 24 million American sons and daughters growing up without fathers are not all doomed. Nor are the children of lesbian parents. Nor the children whose fathers were killed in the line of duty as policemen, firemen, soldiers. Nor the children who have lost fathers to disease, accidents or suicide. Our society must be careful not to assume these sons and daughters are damned."

Well that pretty much sums up her perspective on society and how they view these children, but please keep in mind she is contributing to a series of articles on what men are good for. I view this as some ground work for further dastardly deeds directed towards men and fathers and she does not disappoint.

> "In the cases where the father is far from heroic – even abusive – his absence is also the absence of the chaos, anger, pain and disruption he would bring to his family. Americans encourage women to leave abusive partners, but mothers who do this end up in a class we shame and pity. The government itself sends the message that children are better off with a father. The reality is, many children are better off without their fathers."

What on earth is the standard for a father being heroic, let alone relating a less than heroic father to abuse? Obviously an abusive father or mother should not be parenting. Further, I won't speculate on why or what her motive may be to cite a positive government program which provides resources to fathers http://www.fatherhood.gov/ — and then implicitly dismisses it in the next sentence.

Then there is the final gem that "many" children are better off without their fathers. How many exactly is "many?"

Is it a few, some, most? This whole statement sounds like fathers should just pack their bags and head for the coal mines.
Paul Elam wrote an article two years ago that continues to get a great deal of attention. It is about "evidence" by citation and other tactics that feminist ideologues use to control and corrupt the flow of information and data from research. If you have not read it, please check it out because it certainly did not reach Ms. Weldon, who cited Michael Lamb, a Cambridge psychologist, and Joseph Pleck of the University of Illinois to support her assertion that "many" children are better off without fathers.

> "Michael Lamb, a Cambridge psychologist, wrote in 2010, "We think it is misguided to see increased paternal involvement as a universally desirable goal."
> "In the 2013 book "Fathers in Cultural Context," Joseph Pleck of the University of Illinois writes: "The notion that fathering is essential to children's social and personality development seems to be a uniquely American preoccupation. Current research actually provides little support for … this popular conception of paternal essentiality."

It just so happens one of her readers (Brian) may have read the piece by Elam and corrected her in the comments section with a well-articulated response:

> "Some of us have read Lamb AND Pleck; and this is a highly partial, even distorting use of their research conclusions. I wonder if the Times ought not to go to them to ask for their contribution to see if they agree with the way they are being characterized and over-read by journalists to provide the indifferent conception of fathers here."

I have not read these two individual's writings but you can find the rest of Brian's response in the comments section of the article linked bellow.
Then my intuition noted in the beginning of this article is confirmed when Ms. Weldon tells us a little about her story

> "The myth is personal to my family, because I raised my sons as a single mother. And they are not doomed because of that."

So now it is a myth that children need their fathers because Ms. Weldon has "successfully" raised her three sons without one.
She continues her theme of fathers-are-not-needed when she quotes Will Smith in a scene from "The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air".

> "In time for Father's Day movie bonding, Will Smith stars in "After Earth" with his real-life son, Jaden. But a 1994 episode of "Fresh Prince of Bel-Air" shows a much younger Will Smith in a scene that is more real to many American boys. The Smith character's father runs out on a promise to take his son on a trip, and Smith shouts: "I'm gonna get through college without him. I'm gonna get a great job without him and marry me a beautiful honey and have me a whole bunch of kids. And I'm gonna be a better father than he ever was." And then he chokes, "How come he don't want me, man?"

Then she goes on to write this:

> "I know there is no possible answer to that question. But I also know it is time to stop damning the children who need to ask."

Do you see a little projection going on here? This article has nothing to do with "what are fathers for" or what is in the best interest of children but a lot to do with Ms. Weldon's need to solidify her own situation and maybe, just maybe, dish out some payback to the menz because of her failed relationship with her children's father.

Herein is a classic case in which a woman who has experienced a broken marriage chooses to express her circumstance as litmus of fatherhood and provides examples from a sitcom to support her case that fathers are neither good nor needed.
What is even more disturbing is the New York Times lets this pass as legitimate commentary in their newspaper.

A note from my future: Thanks for the meme-ories

Things are bad, brothers.

The war drags on, digital and analog. My daily upgrades have been blocked for a month now on the basis of my "insufficient commitment to gynocentrism", so I'm not sure how much time I have left to get this message out, so here goes…

Although I am an old man now and badly in need of an upgrade and reboot, I still remember back in the early twenty-teens when, regardless of your sympathies in gender-based conflicts, entering the gender war meant that one was treated to an alphabetic stew of terms like MRM, MHRM, TWRA, PIV, CAMAB, CAFAB, MGTOW, Blue/Purple/Red Piller, Alpha/Beta/Omega/Zeta man/woman, Mangina, Mansplainer, White Knight, Trigger Warning, Rape Apologist, Gender Feminist, Gender Queer…if you know all these buzzwords, then congratulations, my brothers, this article is for you, AND, you know a lot more than I do even now, so many decades later.

Using a time machine of my own poor construction (which has damaged both my verbal skills and my grasp on reality), I have managed leap forward (backward?) and obtain the merest glimpse into the upcoming long-past terminology of this war, and from the tiny shreds I salvaged, I've compiled a few of the relevant future (past? crap, language wasn't built to handle this time flux I'm caught up in) terms and definitions and I'm trying to share this knowledge with you, my beloved younger brothers, before innate temporal paradoxes and feminist droogies ban my dying electronic brains from mAk!g co7ernt w0rs…

Ma'amsplaining – explanations and rhetoric from TWRA's (traditional women's rights activists) detailing why both feminists and men's right's activists suck: because women are entitled to lives of luxury at the expense of both male service and male disposability. Example: "Woman, from birth, are entitled to a man's deference and servitude."

Ma'ambo – After "Limbo", the storage area for censored speech and related data that is considered to be insufficiently worshipful of women.

Mizsplaining – also, Ms Splaining: unoriginal and widespread feminist talking points (such as "wage gap", "rape culture", "patriarchy", "1 in 4", "gendered domestic violence", etc.) that, despite being throughly debunked and ignorant of the massive sacrifices of men's lives necessary to sustain such brutal lies, have become so entrenched that MHRA regulars have to spend their scant remaining resources repeatedly re-debunking them.

Min – after the term "rapesticks" fell into disfavor, feminists changed the terms "Man" and "Men" into "Min" and "Minz", respectively, but not respectfully. This reduced the cumbersome "trigger warnings" to more minigible levels. I still have trouble with these, which is why my upgrades are still in ma'ambo.

Vaginohedonic – also, Vagodonic, the sexual ideology that all vaginally-related sexual pleasure and activities are morally and legally acceptable (including the rape of underage girls by feminists) only whenever feminists decree that they are, and then, only for women, and only if the women don't change their minds at any point ex post facto. Example: "Heather's vaginohedonic bliss with Raoul was dispelled the next day when she discovered lifts in his shoes, and so enraged, she filed rape-by-deception charges against him 30 months after he dumped her."

Femitheist – any feminist who seeks a massive, worldwide, act of Goddess slaughter of men, often while denying that she is, in fact, a feminist.

Victim Cred – the ultimately self-defeating power and influence that women (and rarely, men) gain from publicizing, exaggerating and even cynically manufacturing their status as aggrieved victims of some real or imagined slight. Whereas real victims seek to overcome and grow beyond their temporary plight, the victim cred set become voluntarily mired in their victim narrative in perpetuity.

Slutspamming – the process of annoying society and promoting the power-grabbing through victimization by organizing massive rallies of scantily clad women to protest against men who seek to protect said women from being raped.

Grape-rape – using a bout of consensual drunken sex to extort a monetary benefit from a privileged man. Example: “Score! Not only did Jessica enjoy having drunken sex with David, but later that week she grape-raped him for a cool 200 grand.”
Anti-tokenism – resistance from feminism to the successful advancement of feminists into positions of power, under the theory that such advancements undermine the victim cred of other feminists. The near defeat of President Rodham in the elections of 2016 was credited to anti-tokenism.
Challengaging – a derisive term for the process wherein some people (men, predominantly) grow in strength and competence through engaging in open conflicts, whereas others (woman, predominantly) are deeply emotionally damaged by the expectation that they prove themselves worthy of further advancement by engaging in the same tests of character as men are expected to do.
AtheismPuss – see also Tokyo Rose, Benedict Arnold, Judas, Rebecca Watson– the short-lived effort in the early decades of the 21st century by feminists to destroy the otherwise rapidly growing, loosely knit groups espousing rationalism, skepticism, agnosticism, and atheism, by imposing the ideological doctrines of feminism and victim cred on a largely oblivious but still keenly intellectual, anti-supernatural cohort. The infighting and starvation that drove AtheismPuss to extinction are still studied as models of other primate extinctions, of which the decline of the Neandertals is the most noteworthy.
The VAWAnkers Rebellion – a violent slave revolt of 2028 wherein the incarcerated 38% of the male college-age population ~~reBE!!!~~d JOSFSOFPs…
Damn – the time machine is overheating, blushing and oozing feminist ejaculate. I’ll try to repair it as time and my failing health permits, and if interest in these revelations warrants such efforts.
Until our liberation sets us all free, I remain your humble mgtowai, lost in time.

Lorena Bobbitt and the politics of hate

Pierce Harlan · 23 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

The mutilation of John Wayne Bobbitt by his wife, Lorena, twenty years ago today — June 23, 1993, to be exact — marks one of the most shocking chapters in the modern annals of gender relations. The story is well known: Lorena Bobbitt said her husband abused her over a prolonged period of time and that, on the night in question, he raped her. In a moment of what she claimed was temporary insanity, while her husband slept, she went to the kitchen of their apartment, grabbed a knife, returned to the bedroom, and proceeded to cut off most of his penis. She then hopped in her car, penis in hand, and drove off. As she sped by a field, she tossed the severed appendage out the window. The organ was later recovered and, miraculously, reattached to its owner.

The Bobbitt affair was appalling and reprehensible, and not just because of the gruesome act of mayhem at the heart of it. It was all the more despicable because of the inexplicable glee expressed by large segments of the American population, mostly women, who luxuriated in the vile mutilation of a lower class nobody — a man who had difficulty even holding onto a job as a manual laborer. Media pundits, looking to advance a narrative, ignored the grays in the story and treated it as a bright line morality play, a watershed moment in the battle of the sexes — even a justifiable assault on maleness.

In the immediate aftermath of the incident, the perpetrator was branded "the victim," and the victim "the perpetrator," strictly along gender lines, despite the fact that she mutilated him while he slept. Mrs. Bobbitt's defenders insisted her act was justifiable because allegedly he had raped her, but the "rape" was a classic "he said, she said" claim. The public reaction wasn't just a rush to judgment; it was a 60-meter sprint completed in record time. Before a single scrap of evidence was considered by a jury, the trial was over even before it had begun. Lorena's devotees arrogated to any woman the right to exact the most gruesome vigilante justice on any "member" of any member of the opposite sex – and due process be damned.

John Bobbitt: Oppressor or False Rape Claim Victim?

The mutilation couldn't then, and can't now, be rationally justified on any level. It was not self-defense. Ample evidence showed that both Mr. and Mrs. Bobbitt abused each other during their marriage. There is no evidence that anything stopped either of them from leaving the other. By any measure, Mrs. Bobbitt's vigilante "justice" didn't fit the crime, even if Mr. Bobbitt had raped her earlier in the evening, as she claims.

But did Mr. Bobbitt rape his wife? When the legend becomes fact, old cowboys and gender warriors alike insist on printing the legend. In the Bobbitt case, the legend quickly took hold that of course John Bobbitt raped his wife! The only problem is, the facts don't support the legend. Mrs. Bobbitt's version of the facts was the evolving narrative of a woman groping for victimhood. At the time of her arrest, according to the New York Times, she told police: "He always have orgasm and he doesn't wait for me to have orgasm. He's selfish. I don't think it's fair, so I pulled back the sheets then and I did it." That was the reason she gave for severing his penis.

Later, however, she claimed she cut her husband in anger after he raped her, and she told a psychiatrist that she cut him "really fast."

Later, at her own trial, she claimed she couldn't even remember doing it.

"This was all contrived to strike back at him after he said he was going to leave her," said Mr. Bobbitt's counsel, Gregory L. Murphy. "She was acting out a fantasy . . . ." Mel Feit, executive director of the National Center for Men in Brooklyn, might have hit the nail on the head with his explanation for the mutilation. It was the result of teaching "that men are natural oppressors."

As befits a case where the accuser's story is a moving target, at his trial for marital sexual abuse, John Bobbitt was acquitted. But that didn't end the hysteria.

Lorena Bobbitt: 'National Folk Heroine,' and 'Symbol of Innovative Resistance Against Gender Oppression'

From the outset, Lorena Bobbitt was widely regarded in some quarters as a hero. Time Magazine said there was a "ripple of glee that passed through the female population when Lorena Bobbitt struck back."

Vanity Fair ran a sultry photo spread of Lorena Bobbitt and branded her a "national folk heroine."
A woman wrote the following to the New York Times:

> Prof. Catharine MacKinnon of the University of Michigan and the writer Andrea Dworkin long ago pointed to the institution of marriage as a legal cover for the act of rape and the permanent humiliation of women. Lorena Bobbitt's life has been a poignant instance of that nightmare, which elicited a bold and courageous act of feminist self-defense. As one who recently returned from a conference of feminist activists in Europe, I can assure readers that the Lorena Bobbitt case has galvanized the women's movement worldwide in a way the Anita Hill case never did. No feminist is advocating emasculation as the weapon of first choice. And some women question the political prudence of 'sociosexual vigilantism.' But whatever the judgment of America's patriarchal legal system, Lorena Bobbitt is for most feminists no criminal. She is instead a symbol of innovative resistance against gender oppression everywhere.

Another woman said simply: "Every woman I've talked to about this says, 'Way to go!'"
A sexual assault counselor said she didn't condone the maiming but could "understand it," and "could sympathize." The severance of this 26-year-old loser's penis somehow became, in the words of that sexual assault counselor, "a critical event in the history of women." Why? Because "violence is done to women continuously and pervasively. And this is a retaliatory act of great dramatic value . . . ." John Bobbitt was Everyman, and John Bobbitt's severed penis was, in some weird sense, a sacrificial offering for the collective guilt of all men on the altar of political correctness.
The mainstream media mirrored the glee with scarcely any more restraint. Some writers dubbed the affair a "cautionary tale" for men. The lesson wasn't that mutilating another human being is never justified; the lesson was that men had better wise up when it comes to how they treat women or they'll rightly lose their dicks.
One columnist wrote: "Personally, I'm for both feminism and nonviolence. I admire the male body and prefer to find the penis attached to it rather than having to root around in vacant lots with Ziploc bag in hand. But I'm not willing to wait another decade or two for gender peace to prevail. And if a fellow insists on using his penis as a weapon, I say that, one way or another, he ought to be swiftly disarmed." (That comment is all the more chilling since we are at the two decade mark referenced by the writer.)
Then there was celebrated columnist Ellen Goodman, Radcliffe grad and Pulitzer Prize winner, one of the darlings of the media whose column appeared in hundreds newspapers across the nation and who, on the the entitlement and privilege scale, was a "ten" to John Bobbitt's "one." Ellen Goodman took time out from polishing the awards on her mantel to make this working class putz her personal piñata.
Ms. Goodman, of course, refused to come out and condone the mutilation, but she certainly could "explain" both the mutilation and the celebratory reaction to it. Ms. Goodman concluded that this story became a national sensation only because a woman finally fought back. "Last year," she declared, "the police blotter was full of abused and battered wives — an almost unilateral massacre." Now, Ms. Goodman gushed, men "see a dangerous enemy where there was once a victim." And the men squirming at the thought of being Bobbittized? "If women smile at men who squirm, maybe it's at that recognition of power."
Goodman apparently belonged to the Church of Gender Get-Even-ism: in April 1997, the late Michael Kennedy's 16-year marriage publicly collapsed amid accusations that he had had an affair with the family baby sitter, allegedly beginning when she was just 14. It was never proven he had sex with her before she was 16, the age of consent in his jurisdiction, and criminal charges were not pressed for statutory rape. Here was Ellen Goodman's take: "So far the most widespread fallout of the so-called Baby Sitter Affair has been a nervousness on the part of perfectly respectable men. With lechery all across the media, they don't even want to get in the car with the sitter. Assorted fathers in my sample have concluded (1) that every 15-year-old regards him as a potential predator or (2) that if his hand lingers too long while passing out the money, he'll be accused of making a pass." Goodman concluded, in words a little too reminiscent of Catherine Comins' "men unjustly accused can sometimes gain from the experience": "I don't mind men getting a little nervous," Goodman bubbled. "It kind of balances things out." That's Ellen Goodman.

It is well to note that none of the writers applauding penile mutilation would applaud any other type of brutal vigilante justice, for any other type of crime. Yet vigilante justice directed at the penis of some below average guy was heralded with a giddy exultation. The fact that purportedly enlightened publications were quietly, and sometimes not so quietly, rooting for Mrs. Bobbitt even before a single fact was adjudicated or a scrap of evidence admitted at trial is nothing short of astounding, puzzling, and frightening, all at once.
Why did Mr. Bobbitt deserve this rush to judgment? Thomas Sowell didn't have Mr. Bobbitt in mind when he wrote the following, but he should have: "Information or allegations reflecting negatively on individuals or groups seen less sympathetically by the intelligentsia pass rapidly into the public domain with little scrutiny and much publicity." Sowell cited two of the more prominent hoaxes in recent history as evidence for this point: the alleged gang rapes of black women by white men in the Tawana Brawley and Duke lacrosse cases.

The Politics of Hate

But some columnists couldn't accept that women in general embraced the glee over the mutilation. Syndicated columnist Mona Charen explained that the case gripped the media because "they [media pundits] really believe that most women feel that way deep down." But Ms. Charen recognized how utterly twisted all of it was. If they "are seething with such hatred for men, that is evidence of a politics bordering on pathology." She continued: "To see the mutilation of a man's body as a political act and to signal secret approval and a vicarious thrill . . . truly deserves the label 'the politics of hate.'"
Charen found the nation's obsession with the mutilation "bizarre, abnormal and sexist to boot." It would be impossible to disagree with Ms. Charen's observation about reversing the genders: "If a woman were similarly wounded by a man, no one would treat it with ghoulish humor. Men are evidently fair game."
Dr. Charles Krauthammer, the intellectual firepower of American conservatism (even Bill Clinton once called him a "brilliant man"), chimed in and noted that the hypothetical where the genders were reversed "would not have the weight of feminist rage behind it."
Newsweek said, tongue in cheek: "Feminists have a cutting-edge sense of humor…but only if it's directed at men."
Even when Mr. Bobbitt was found not guilty of marital rape, that didn't change the view of Lorena's devotees that, of course, he was really guilty. Kim Gandy of NOW said the verdict "discourages women and gives men a free ride in marital rape cases." It never occurred to Gandy that John Bobbitt might not have raped his wife.

The Lorena Bobbitt Trial: Things Get Really Nutty

Finally, it was time for Mrs. Bobbitt's trial for maliciously wounding her husband. Much of the nation, and beyond, watched intently with sympathies split largely along gender lines. In Ecuador, Lorena Bobbitt's home country, the National Feminist Association called several news organizations to announce that if Mrs. Bobbitt went to prison for mutilating her husband, 100 innocent American men would be castrated (it is not clear if they really meant "castration," which generally means removal of the testicles, or if they meant they would slice off 100 innocent penises). The organization also staged a large protest outside the U.S. consulate. This was kooky, outlier stuff, for sure, but what was going on in the mainstream was nutty enough even without it.
The Lorena Bobbitt trial was a mini-feminist Woodstock. A carnival atmosphere swept over Manassas, where it was conducted. A woman sold homemade, penis-shaped white chocolates outside the courthouse. T-shirts were hawked that said "Revenge — how sweet it is," and "Manassas: A Cut Above." Some feminists sold buttons that read: "LORENA BOBBITT FOR SURGEON GENERAL." Disc jockeys handed out "Slice" soda pop and cocktail wieners "with lots of ketchup."
Hundreds of Lorena Bobbitt supporters cheered their champion outside the courthouse. When the man she mutilated — the real victim — walked outside, he was greeted with boos and whistles, but he stoically showed no reaction. He took it like a man.
Mrs. Bobbitt's self-defense claim — that she was justified in maiming a sleeping man — would be laughable in any context outside feminist jurisprudence. Here's what Newsweek said about it:
". . . the traditional definition of self-defense wasn't enough for radical feminists. And so in the 1970s, feminist psychologist Lenore Walker conceived the 'battered-woman syndrome.' Women beaten by their mates, she claimed, are so demoralized that they become too helpless to leave or to take steps to help themselves. They become convinced their only option to stop the abuse is to kill the abuser. So even if the woman is in no physical danger at the time of the killing, she's defending herself against future beatings. Get it? Because men supposedly have so much power over women in our society, women should be given the powers of judge, jury and executioner.

"Ideas–especially seminal ideas such as these–have consequences. In 1991, the governors of Ohio and Maryland commuted the sentences of a number of jailed women who had killed or assaulted their mates because they claimed to have been victims of battered-woman syndrome. But reporters turned up embarrassing evidence indicating that 15 of the 25 women freed in Ohio had not been physically abused. Six, they said, had talked about killing their boyfriends or husbands, in some cases months before doing so; two had tracked down and killed husbands from whom they were separated. If they were capable of that much premeditation, they were certainly capable of picking up and leaving."
The female prosecutor kicked off the trial by telling the jurors, apparently with a straight face, that it was "his penis versus her life." Charles Krauthammer called that characterization a "stark summation of feminist victimization theory." Dr. Krauthammer added that the Bobbitt case wasn't one of self-defense but of revenge. He noted that evidence of self-defense, improper though it was, came in quite handy for Lorena Bobbitt because it allowed her to introduce "the most lurid allegations of sexual abuse." The trial made the Bobbitt marriage "one of the most highly publicized and minutely scrutinized ever," said the New York Times.
One of Lorena's former co-workers testified that Lorena once said she would chop off her husband's dick if he cheated on her. Witnesses testified that Lorena was mean, violent, and subject to jealous, unpredictable physical attacks.
In the end, the jury found Lorena Bobbitt not guilty of malicious wounding — not because she didn't do, and not because she had a right to do — but by reason of insanity. They committed her to a mental health facility for 45 days for observation. The New York Times reported that "a gasp went up among her supporters in the courtroom."
It is well to note that until relatively recently, many states punished rape with the death penalty. While many men and boys have been put to death for rape, a woman who sliced off her sleeping husband's penis got 45 days of observation in a nice, clean hospital.
Whatever this was, it was not justice.
The verdict elicited the predictable response. Self-described feminists cheered and gave each other high fives that a woman was permitted to get away with what now literally, and officially, could be called an insane act. Kim Gandy, executive vice president of the National Organization for Women, summed up the position for the lunatic fringe, which in this case seemed to comprise a regrettably large segment of the nation's population: "We're glad the jury rejected the twisted argument that a battered woman should be locked up in a prison cell." Ms. Gandy used the verdict as the occasion to push one of her pet projects: ". . . this whole saga drives home the need for swift passage of a comprehensive version of the Violence Against Women Act . . . ."
In Lorena Bobbitt's hometown of Bucay, Ecuador, hundreds took to the streets, cheering and firing shots into the air the way joyous fans do when their team wins the World Cup or the Super Bowl.
The New York Times chimed in, ever so delicately: "[I]n this case," the Times pontificated, "the jury can be forgiven for finding a reason to excuse Mrs. Bobbitt's brutality . . . ." It also noted: ". . . perhaps the verdict will indeed make some abusive men think twice before they strike again." But, the Times refused to go so far as to invite every self-anointed victim to resort to retaliation: ". . . violence cannot be the standard answer to violence." If violence can't be the "standard" answer, this suggests that, sometimes, violence is OK, and presumably that "sometimes" includes any time it is done to a penis by a self-anointed wronged woman.
But Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, the voice of reason, said violence is not OK. Mrs. Bobbitt "pulled the wool over the jury's eyes," Prof. Dershowitz said, by claiming that abuse left her unable to take responsibility for her actions. He called her a "feminist Dirty Harry." The "abuse excuse," Dershowitz explained, "is dangerous to the very tenets of democracy, which presuppose personal accountability for choices and actions."
Mona Charen, likewise, was in no mood to celebrate. She knew that the reaction of feminists, and of too many women, was as wrong as can be: "Rarely have I been as ashamed of my sex as I have been in the aftermath of the Lorena Bobbitt verdict."
The brilliant Charles Krauthammer, a Harvard educated psychiatrist before becoming a political pundit, said it best:

this verdict took “political correctness to its ultimate extreme, to the point where for those who claim politically correct victimization, the laws no longer apply.”
“Politically correct victimization” sums up the entire affair.

Legacy

The Bobbitt affair ripped off an ugly scab and exposed an oozing pus on gender relations in America. The principal legacy of the Bobbitt affair might have been to “empower” women by insisting that they are so powerless that they are entitled to ignore the law. But the more the gender warriors insisted that women are powerless, the more they underscored that women aren’t men’s equals.
A more immediate impact was that copycat crimes cropped up and continue to crop up to this day, including the crime that led to the Brigitte Harris trial, where a young woman admitted to researching the Bobbitt case before severing her allegedly abusive father’s penis. Ms. Harris made sure to burn the purportedly offending appendage to avoid Mrs. Bobbitt’s mistake that allowed John Bobbitt to be reunited with his organ. Ms. Harris’ father died in the ordeal, so his side of the story will never be known. (At the young woman’s trial, the jurors convicted her of second degree manslaughter and not murder, which prompted the judge to chide the jurors for elevating their sympathies over the law.)
John Bobbitt was no saint, and there was plenty of evidence that he abused his wife during the course of their marriage – just as there was ample evidence that she abused him. That changes nothing. The brutal act of mutilation, and the depraved reaction of gender warriors, the mainstream media, and, frankly, too many others, cannot be justified, or respected, on any reasonable, logical, moral, or other level. The celebratory reaction and tolerance for this most vicious act of vengeance was morally grotesque and seemed largely the product of fear-mongering about men as natural oppressors. It was an all too predictable response to the systematic maligning of a gender over the course of several decades.
Following the mutilation, men, as a class, were exposed to a disdain many had not even known existed, and they didn’t know how to react to it. But men’s bewilderment was understandable. They didn’t realize that they were “all” rapists. Nor did anyone bother to explain to them that they were the beneficiaries of a “patriarchy” that made them undeservedly privileged. That included men who, by any rational standard, were not privileged, like Mr. Bobbitt. You see, most men were too busy working to make ends meet, often to support the very people who actually believed those loony things. So when women shamefully applauded the vile mutilation of another human being — a man who was not privileged, or smart, or wealthy, or lucky — all that men could muster in the face of this fusillade of misandry was a muffled and chivalrous grumble.
In the years since the Bobbitt affair, it has become even more common for gender warriors to reduce masculinity to vile caricature and to pass off outlier attributes as “cultural norms” of maleness. By the same token, since that awful June night in 1993, the Internet has exposed countless men and women to an ongoing battle of the sexes that they didn’t even know was being waged. If something like the Bobbitt case happened today, would it be met with a different reaction? Would it bring to the front burner the issues of female-on-male domestic violence and false rape claims? No one can say for certain, but my guess is it would. If it happened today, the debate would be far more heated, and men would actually answer the bell instead of sitting on a stool in a corner of the ring, allowing the maleness-is-broken crowd to win by default.

8 reasons straight men don't want to get married

Dr. Helen Smith · 23 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This piece is also available in Romanian and Spanish.

It seems that fewer and fewer people in general are getting married these days, and even fewer men seem interested. Men no longer see marriage as being as important as they did even 15 years ago. "According to Pew Research Center, the share of women ages eighteen to thirty-four that say having a successful marriage is one of the most important things in their lives rose nine percentage points since 1997–from 28 percent to 37%. For men, the opposite occurred. The share voicing this opinion dropped, from 35 percent to 29 percent." Why?

In the course of researching my new book, Men On Strike: Why Men Are Boycotting Marriage, Fatherhood, and the American Dream – And Why It Matters, I talked with men all over America about why they're avoiding marriage. It turns out that the problem isn't that men are immature, or lazy. Instead, they're responding rationally to the incentives in today's society. Here are some of the answers I found.

1. You'll lose respect. A couple of generations ago, a man wasn't considered fully adult until he was married with kids. But today, fathers are figures of fun more than figures of respect: The schlubby guy with the flowered diaper bag at the mall, or one of the endless array of buffoonish TV dads in sitcoms and commercials. In today's culture, father never knows best. It's no better in the news media. As communications professor James Macnamara reports, "by volume, 69 percent of mass media reporting and commentary on men was unfavorable, compared with just 12 percent favorable and 19 percent neutral or balanced."

2. You'll lose out on sex. Married men have more sex than single men, on average – but much less than men who are cohabiting with their partners outside of marriage, especially as time goes on. Research even suggests that married women are more likely to gain weight than women who are cohabiting without marriage. A Men's Health article mentioned one study that followed 2,737 people for six years and found that cohabiters said they were happier and more confident than married couples and singles.

3. You'll lose friends. "Those wedding bells are breaking up that old gang of mine." That's an old song, but it's true. When married, men's ties with friends from school and work tend to fade. Although both men and women lose friends after marriage, it tends to affect men's self-esteem more, perhaps because men tend to be less social in general.

4. You'll lose space. We hear a lot about men retreating to their "man caves," but why do they retreat? Because they've lost the battle for the rest of the house. The Art of Manliness blog mourns "The Decline of Male Space," and notes that the development of suburban lifestyles, intended to bring the family together, resulted in the elimination of male spaces in the main part of the house, and the exile of men to attics, garages, basements – the least desirable part of the home. As a commenter to the post observes: "There was no sadder scene to a movie than in 'Juno' when married guy Jason Bateman realized that in his entire huge, house, he had only a large closet to keep all the stuff he loved in. That hit me like a punch in the face."

5. You could lose your kids, and your money. And they may not even be your kids. Lots of men I spoke with were keenly aware of the dangers of divorce, and worried that if they were married and it went sour, the woman might take everything, including the kids. Other men were concerned that they might wind up paying child support for kids who aren't even theirs – a very real possibility in many states. On my blog, I polled over 3200 men to ask how they would react to finding out that a child wasn't theirs after all. 32 percent said they would feel "anger and fury at the mother," 6 percent said they would feel "depression," 18 percent said "anger and depression," 2 percent said "none of the above," 32 percent said "angry at the system that forced them to pay," and only 2 percent "didn't care." One man commented that his ex-wife had taunted him with the knowledge that his 11-year old son wasn't actually his: "I was angry at the mother…I severed all ties to the boy. Some may see this as a failing. I see it as self-preservation, and to those that ask the question of whether or not the courts will make a non-biological parent pay child support, pay attention: YES THEY WILL! They see you as nothing more than a source of cash for the child. It seems that a person in these situations should be able to sue the real father for child support."

6. You'll lose in court. Men often complain that the family court legal system is stacked against them, and in fact it seems to be. Women gain custody and child support the majority of the time, as pointed out in this ABC News article: "Despite the increases in men seeking and receiving alimony, advocates warn against linking the trend to equality in the courtroom. Family court judges still tend to favor women, said Ned Holstein, the founder of Fathers & Families, a group advocating family court reform. "'Family court still gives custody overwhelmingly to mothers, child support overwhelmingly to mothers, and courts still give almony overwhelmingly to mothers and women,' he said. 'The family courts came into existence years ago in order to give things to mothers that mothers needed," he said. 'The times have changed and the courts have not.'"

7. You'll lose your freedom. At least, if you're charged with child support that you can't pay, you can be put in jail – and if you can't afford a lawyer, you don't have the right to have one appointed because, according to the Supreme Court, it's technically a civil matter, never mind the jail time. Fathers and Families found that it's the men who are jailed rather than women: "A new report concludes that between 95% and 98.5% of all incarcerations in Massachusetts sentenced from the Massachusetts Probate and Family Courts from 2001 through 2011 have been men. Moreover, this percentage may be increasing, with an average of 94.5% from 2001 to 2008, and 96.2% from 2009 through 2011. It is likely that most of these incarcerations are for incomplete payment of child support. Further analysis suggests that women who fail to pay all of their child support are incarcerated only one-eighth as often as men with similar violations."

8. Single life is better than ever. While the value of marriage to men has declined, the quality of single life has improved. Single men were once looked on with suspicion, passed over for promotion for important jobs, which usually valued "stable family men," and often subjected to social opprobrium. It was hard to have a love life that wasn't aimed at marriage, and premarital sex was risky and frowned upon. Now, no one looks askance at the single lifestyle, dating is easy, and employers probably prefer employees with no conflicting family responsibilities. Plus, video games, cable TV, and the Internet provide entertainment that didn't used to be available. Is this good for society? Probably not, as falling birth rates and increasing single-motherhood demonstrate. But people respond to incentives. If you want more men to marry, it needs to be a more attractive proposition.

Monday Roundup for 24 June 2013

Howdy y'all.
Do you want to help the largest organization that's ever worked for the cause of compassion for men and boys, and goes after those who spit on, mock, and marginalize your sons, brothers, uncles, boyfriends, fathers, and grandfathers? You can do that here. We hope you'll help. You'd be shocked by how much we get done with how little around here.
For example, did you see Dan Perrins' report on the hijinx of the University of Toronto's Student Union? It's with a mixture of nausea tinged with amusement that we watch these little Stalinist thugs in action. "Free speech for me, but not for thee" should be their motto.
Are you interested in the field of psychology and/or social work? Tom Golden, one of the best men's and boys' advocates in the United States, has a devastating look at sexism against males in psychological research. It's astonishing how even when you know things are bad, someone who's really looked into it can show you how much worse it is than you might have imagined. And yeah, it really is that bad. If you're ever thinking about joining one of the so-called "helping professions," you owe it to yourself to read everything Tom Golden's ever written, including this. As a bonus, it's part of a series, and we're proud to publish not just this installment, but future installments. Tom's one of the good guys, and I mean one of the really really good guys, in a field that hasn't been good to boys or men in a long time.
Are you committed to thinking always of the interests of women first, damn whatever happens to men and boys? A lot of people in today's culture are, even when it makes no sense at all. In fact, it is eerily reminiscent of the insanity of addiction. As a recovering addict who feels for those who are still suffering in the grip of insanity, I recommend following August Løvenskiolds 12 Steps for Freedom from Gynocentrism.
Attention world: John Birmingham has a big white dick. That is all.
If you're Australian, or just a political junkie who's interested in the horserace of election campaigning, don't miss Why Gillard won't go by Jim Muldoon. You don't even have to really understand the Australian political system to get what's going on here and why it's fascinating. Hint: hateful ideological feminist groups are corrupting Australian politics. Will Australians keep falling for it in September's elections?
Erin Pizzey's classic samizdat, "Prone to Violence," is and was one of the best texts on the realities of how abuse really works and what the most effective strategies for identifying it and coping with it are. It's no wonder it's unpopular with gender ideologues, for it lays bare how most of what they do isn't just wrongheaded, it's destructful. We are proud to reprint this suppressed classic book here on A Voice for Men, starting with the introduction. Watch for the entire book to be published her in the coming weeks, one installment at a time.
What is a Gonzo Historian? It's one who actually sticks to verifiable facts and eschews subjectivity as much as possible. In these strange days where fact and reality are routinely ignored, there's nothing more gonzo and crazy than actually sticking to the verifiable truth as much as possible, no matter its political implications. And our very own Gonzo Historian, Robert St. Estephe, does just that with Woman and her right to kill — from 1922.
Have you ever noticed that ideological feminists say that they're about equality, but when they're in political power, they demand special privileges and treatment for women? Yeah, you aren't alone on that.
Did you know that Michael Kimmel is a disgusting human being and a disgrace as an academic? Well, he is. But if you'd like to be a disgusting human being and make money out of doing it, Della Burton will show you how it's done.
Hey, if you're male, did you forget to be ashamed of your sexuality? If you're a woman have you remembered to shame the men you know for it? John the Other will help remind you?
Survivor of Ceaușescu's Romania Lucian Vâlsan has been busy lately, and this time he's taking on both Italian and Swedish feminists for that thing they most often deny doing: hating and oppressing men and boys.
Michele Weldon recently managed to publish a cringeworthy misandrist and self-serving piece on why fathers may not be all that important after all, and Grumpy Old Man notes how ironic it is that damaged women seem to hold an inordinate sway over our politics. Damaged men on the other hand? The cause of all the world's problems, apparently. Rationalization hamster, anyone?

Dr. Helen Smith has written an absolutely terrific book on why men are going their own way–not that she uses that term, but it absolutely suffuses her book, which I plan on writing a review of soon. I also had the pleasure of interviewing her recently, and that should be appearing here on AVfM shortly as well. In the meantime, she's graced our pages with 8 reasons straight men don't want to get married. Which much of what she has to say will not be news to regulars to this establishment, anyone who's new here may want to read it, and for anyone who's wondering what you're on about when you talk about these things, it's a good start. I guess the Red Pill is seeping further and further into the mainstream isn't it?

Remember Lorena Bobbit? Pierce Harlan does.

Can there be such a thing as a Woman Going Her Own Way? Diana Davison says yes, and before you say "no" you might want to read it all the way through.

August Løvenskiolds looks at today through the lens of the future. You are a strange man August, but I like the way your brain works anyway.

P.J. Reilly of Forbes was recently a patsy for someone no better than a Stalinist or a neo-Nazi. God what an idiot. "I don't know what you're really all about but you're just a girl who says she wants equality so you can't be evil or anything." Will our culture ever be able to see women as rational adults culpable for their actions and as capable of evil as men?

Feminists ignoring, underplaying (hell, even celebrating) female sexual predators is nothing new. So why should we be surprised when the hatemongering bigots at Feministing get in on the act? We shouldn't be, but Nicolai Rublev makes sure we don't forget Feministing's still out their acting as rape-enablers.

"Proof by repeated assertion of shoddy, dodgy, or outright false documentation" is also known as a "woozle." Isaac Quill is the master of finding some of the more common Woozles, and returns to tell us about still more feminist woozles on violence and other assorted stupdities.

As usual our video section is regularly updated with cool stuff to watch or listen to. Of special note this last week would be Paul Elam apologizes to Stardusk, and that was nice to see after his otherwise sterling take on the recent MGTOW wars. Also don't miss the video you should show anyone who gives you the old "women were oppressed by men until the brave women who won the vote for women" line: Pankhurst – the White Feather betrayal of history. Not that anyone thinks "wow let's take the vote away from women," the point is, the history we're all fed on this is bullshit, and that one short video helps demolish it. Also, Robert O'Hara had a great radio appearance in Uganda, Kudi returns for some ancient mystical rodent advice, and the video that will make your heart swell with hope: see The children are coming.

In off-site news, Don Draper was raped and someone finally noticed. Also, a couple of weeks ago there was a kerfuffle involving some stupid mistakes of the editorial team, an article I promised to write on Google and search engines and the whole thing probably isn't going to get written because I'm sick of the whole drama, but in case anyone's still wondering about this, Jason Gregory is completely innocent of all wrongdoing, and has proven his innocence to false accusers, and we look forward to proudly featuring his work in the future. And I think we've otherwise had enough of this silliness and will take it all as a lesson learned during our current technical and editorial transition.

Finally, I'll mention again that our fundraiser is serious business. The budget we operate on is ridiculously small for the amount we accomplish; indeed, if you think the cultural zeitgeist is that easy to change, you're fooling yourself. If you want to help us keep doing this, there's a good way to do it. Of course we could use your help in other ways too, and I'll have an article up this week (I hope) on a few projects we could still use your help with.

So that's it for this week's roundup. See you in 7!

Woozle Hunter: Lies, damned lies and DV

Isaac T. Quill · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Woozles are wily critters. They exist somewhere in the pages of academic journals, leaving a trail of references to references. When the intrepid woozle hunter has followed those swirling citations and footnotes, slashed through pages upon pages of scientific "research" and finally cornered the woozle between fact and fiction, the beast turns to roar its defiance… and disappears into a sour puff of bad science.
Isaac T. Quill, woozle hunter extraordinaire, ventures into the wilds where woozles wander, tracks them down, bags them and displays them here at A Voice for Men for your edification.
It's nearly 60 years since one of the most influential books on statistics was published. "How To Lie With Statistics" 1954, and it's still in print today. The book was both humour and truth and it's reported to have "sold more copies than any other statistical text".[1] The authors did a good job of showing how to milk the false statistics, but also why it didn't matter what happened after the false statistics were uncovered. People "believe" and keep on believing even when doing so makes them look foolish. So many people, it seems, have problems dealing with numbers and statistics in their heads. It's easy to bamboozle and razzle dazzle people, and by using emotive messages and the right numbers, hypnotize them into believing anything.
Woozles are "False Evidence by Citation", and it's hard to go and find where false citations and evidence come from. But, thankfully the internet and the growing access of sources is making it easier. It's getting easier to catch pesky woozles and put them out of OUR Misery. Woozles turn into factoids, urban myths – they are propelled forward and fed by "White Hat Bias"[2] where the ends justify the means, and a little bit of distortion ends up being bad for everyone. Some even argue that wozzles should be left alone, just in case the truth makes it harder for the woozle owners and maintainers to get support and money out of people.
So I've been dealing with some very British woozles, and I have to say that the "genteel" excuses I have come across have left me staggered, amazed and wondering where I should stick the cucumber sammiches! One of the biggest issues is that there are so many woozles out there, but people just don't know what to call them.
I was given the heads up on a BBC Radio 4 program "More or Less" from 2009. Tim Harford, "The Undercover Economist" at the Financial Times, has a chat with some experts and slaughters a woozle or two. He refers to them as "Rouge Statistics".
I strongly recommend everyone listen to the program.[3] You can hear the strain of the horse carriage of "politics" being dragged by wild woozles and people not sure how to stop it. There are so many carefully chosen comments so as to not upset those who benefit most from the woozles, or to invite criticism, or worse. The careful breadcrumb trail of comments has allowed me to track the woozles ever so easily.
In early 2009, the BBC 10 O'Clock News suddenly spluttered out the following:

> "The Government says incidents of domestic violence have fallen substantially, but it still affects 1 in 4 women. Indeed for women aged between 15 and 44 it's the biggest cause of mortality."

The old chestnut of women 15 to 44 … Blah Blah Blah. …and levels have fallen, too, but they never seem to drop below that magical 1 in 4 number.
That "15 to 44" woozle was debunked for the USA by Richard Gelles back in 2007 when he only half-jokingly referred to feminist views of Domestic Violence existing on "Nine Factoids And A Mantra".[4] But evidently Gelles forget to send the BBC and the British government a memo, so there is the claim surfacing again 2 years later but with a very British twist – in fact it turns out the woozle has been circulating since the 1990's. By the time Tim Harford was looking at the woozle it was being fed and spread by The Guardian newspaper,[5] and many others including Women's Aid UK.[6] It had been "mutated" to be about Morbidity and not Mortality; it was claiming to be national or global with the new strain of infectious woozle embedded heavily in the Government. The viral views were turning up in Parliament itself,[7] The Home Office,[8]The Crown Prosecution Service, The Ministry of Justice and the list goes on. Them woozles are pesky and burrow to infest everywhere. But he also found that woozles mutate like a virus and so claims at the woozle applying internationally and globally also come up.

Of course, when you do some basic things, like asking the UK Office Of National Statistics about mortality for women 15 to 44, you get some quick and simple answers. Tim Harford happily reports:

> "In the year 2007 nearly 6000 women aged between 15 and 44 died. What you claim as the largest cause of death depends on how broad your categories are, but over 2000 of those deaths were from cancer and other tumors. 1100 women were killed by external causes which would include domestic violence but also includes other assaults, suicide and all kinds of accidents."

It's simply not possible to make the real data fit the woozle in any way, so that's one slaughtered woozle, and well done BBC for fumigating your own news department. What a pity that Civil Servants couldn't be bothered to do the same inside the government.

But then Harford goes further; he deals with that International woozle and the claims of mortality and morbidity. He turns to Colin Mathers of the World Health Organisation. Colin deals in global data and I was also left with the impression that he's one hell of a Tap Dancer too. Again I strongly recommend everyone listen to the original program, because the way Mr. Mathers has to dance around the data and speak so carefully to not upset "Interested parties" that it's worthy of an award, and even a standing ovation on Broadway.
Even with all the dancing he's able to confirm that the largest single cause of death globally is AIDS/HIV – and followed by tuberculosis and then suicide. In fact, the claims of domestic violence can't even be fitted into the top 10 causes of death globally. Then Colin even pulls up the data for the UK and points out that the second largest cause of death in the UK is suicide. No. 1 is cancer, No. 2 is suicide – and Colin confirms that domestic violence can't even make it into the top 5 in the UK charts.
It got me thinking about some other numbers. It's worth remembering those claims being made about 2 UK women per week dying due to domestic violence – which makes 104 per year. How can the people spreading the woozle think that 104 is bigger than 2000 deaths from cancer? Can't they do basic maths?
On top of that, the claim of 2 deaths per week has been questioned over and over, and in 2011 the British Crime Survey showed 88 deaths and not 104.[9] It seems that the number 2 is more emotive than 1.69. The 2 per week figure just looks good in media campaigns such as this one from Women's Aide, 2009 and ongoing, where they use every woozle imaginable so they can to get people to hand over money.

I even went as far as to look up Section 2 of the UK Fraud Act 2006, which does make it clear that knowingly making false claims to get money out of people is called Fraud, and it's quite illegal! It only has to be shown that the person or persons making the claim may suspect or reasonably suspect the claims are false for it to be fraud. It's definitely not the way for a professionally run charity to behave – knowingly making multiple false claims to get money.
But back to Radio 4 and "More or Less": After Tim Harford has left the tap dancing Colin, he asks the UK Home Office if they can explain why the woozle is being used by government. Then we get my favourite line of all time:

> "Since the Home Office confidently asserted it in the Ministerial Forward to their 2005 Document – 'Domestic Violence: A National Review', we asked them where they got it from. They gave us a statement in which they said that the statistic was used for 'Illustrative Purposes'. Now there is some fine print for you.**"

So there you have it – all UK government statistics are used only for "Illustrative Purposes" – and they are like window dressing and should never be taken seriously! Whichever civil servant came up with that little wheeze should get a promotion to the Ministry of Silly Walks and Chocolate Teapots. But it gets better ….

> "Leaving the difficulties aside in collecting that statistic, morbidity then mutated into mortality. Global figures were used in the UK without any mention that they were global figures. Rape was dropped from the category without making any adjustments, and the whole lot was booted up the league table from 6th place to 1st place. Thank goodness for illustrative purposes, otherwise I'd be worried that a bogus statistic had echoes around the world, copied apparently without question into official reports, news bulletins and policy documents."

I think Tim Harford may have been speaking tongue in cheek when he summed it all up that way! But what is most interesting is how people run for cover and only bother to look where woozles come from when they need to cover their backsides. The "Illustrative Purposes" claim dates all the way back to 1994 and the source even states that it uses homicide and rape only for "Illustrative purposes".[10] Some poor civil servant was made to work hard to find that one and try to pass it all off to the BBC via a no doubt bemused, confused and badly used press officer. Oh what a tangled web we weave….
So anyone using the woozle of "Illustrative purposes" and knowing that it's such a poor illustration either likes its cartoon nature, or they think the people hearing it need to be treated like children.
There is a name in the field of Domestic Violence that keeps on coming up everywhere you go in the UK. It's Prof. Sylvia Wallby, holder of the UNESCO Chair in Gender Research at the University of Lancaster. Whenever the government needs an expert Sylvia is the one they call. It's fascinating too, because when you listen to her it's clear she is also an expert tap dancer.
She makes a most interesting and pointed comment about the British Crime Survey and Questions about Domestic Violence being asked. Now that little bread crumb led to pay dirt in the form of the Home Office Research Study 191 Domestic Violence: Findings from a new British Crime Survey self-completion questionnaire 1999.[11] It's a hard document to locate; in fact I noticed that a great many documents from the UK government dealing with domestic violence are suddenly getting hard to find on-line. Hyperlinks are broken all over the place and the backups in The National Archive are in total disarray, with links to one document inexplicably going to the wrong place. But I'm persistent. So you get to page one of what is referred to as "HORS191″[11] and you find this:

> Current levels of domestic violence
> • 4.2% of women and 4.2% of men said they had been physically assaulted by a current or former partner in the last year.

Prof Wallby's comments about surveys are that they are very useful, and whilst the original survey was very detailed, now a far less detailed survey is used. She was asked why and politically responds "It's said because it's too expensive to ask the longer set of questions …".
Forgive me if I'm cynical, suspicious and even slack-jawed at the idea that it's only cost that is the issue. Could it by any chance be linked to groups who hate reality and the very idea that men are being abused and attacked by women at home in statistical equality? If there are that many domestically violent women out there it simply can't be blamed on the patriarchy without people asking how the patriarchy is making the women do it!
It gets very funny at the end of the program, when Tim Harford explains what happened when he spoke to some "Interest Groups" about the woozles. He asks Sylvia Wallby:

> Some of the people we have talked to in the course of doing this piece have suggested that we shouldn't be questioning this rouge statistic even though it isn't true – we shouldn't be questioning it because domestic violence is such a serious problem. Do you have sympathy with that view?

And her response:

> I understand the view. It is difficult to be critical of something on such an important area, but I think that we have gone beyond the basics. Everybody now knows that domestic violence is a serious problem and now we need to know exactly the scale and shape of that problem, so we do need to be querying the figures but we do need to be improving them and the means collecting new and better data.

I do love it when people use every trick in the book to show where the skeletons are buried, and then even hand you a spade fitted with GPS to go and dig them up. But, I still have to wonder why – if quality statistics can help identify and address a problem – why the British Government decided after 1999 to collect lower quality statistics about domestic violence?
So having had it made so easy to see one woozle slaughtered, I was left wondering about that claim of 1 in 4 women will suffer DV in her lifetime. It's so emotive and all over the place, but no one seems to know where it comes from. So I just had to dig and go back to places where there was any paw print left by a woozle connected to the 1 in 4… and then, Hallelujah.
It turns out that the mystery 1 in 4 figure also comes from the closing days of the 1990's, and it's cited as being handed out by the Council Of Europe (COE) Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence – 2002. It seems that after the UN decided in 1993 to have Global treaties to protect women, and after the Fourth UN World Conference on Women, Beijing 1995, everyone went research mad and figures on DV against women were being thrown about all over the place. And some incontinently kept on finding that women were also perpetrating domestic violence against men and their own children, too. Women were even battering and beating up other women.
The problem was each time I looked for any trace of this 1 in 4 claim in the readily available COE papers from 2002 there simply wasn't any trace of it. I also spotted that a number of links to this document from 2002 were diverting to a newer document dated April 2011 – or that they led to copies of Just the Recommendation Rec(2002)5 with the evidence behind the recommendations removed and missing.[12] I kept finding copies of Explanations and Memorandums from any year by 2002 and not one of these later documents held the mystical 1 in 4 figure.
I worked the problem again and again. It was odd because it seemed that some folks didn't want the old documents to be found …. But I found them. Rec(2002)5 April 2002 with "Explanatory Memorandum".[13]

The 1 in 4 figure is admitted to be doubtful in the original document, based on only 10 studies where there are doubts about methodology and so much more. It's just that so many copies of the publicly available Rec(2005)5 have had whole sections removed – the "Memorandum" where the 1 in 4 figure is lurking along with so many doubts. Notes are also removed, and I found Supra not 14 most fascinating. In fact here it is word for word:

> In particular, the authors examined reports according to which, for the past thirty years, discussions on domestic violence have tended to cast men in the role of aggressors and women in the role of victims with the result that today, in the United Kingdom, male victims receive scant attention from both government policy-makers and the community at large. According to these reports, there are over forty-five homes for battered women and their children in England and Wales, but not a single government-funded facility for men, who have no one to turn to, even just for information. It would seem that the great majority of male victims of violence feel that, on the whole, the police and social welfare agencies are unsupportive and, in some cases, downright hostile. On 7 January 1999, a Channel 4 programme ("Dispatches") featuring a report on a hundred men who had suffered domestic violence revealed how 25% of these men – and not the female partner who had attacked them – had been arrested by the police when they sought help.
> Only seven of the women had been arrested and of these, none were convicted. See Home Office Research Study 191 on "Domestic Violence: Findings from a new British Crime Survey self-completion questionnaire" by Catriona Mirrles-Black and "The physical aggression of women and men to their partners: A quantitative analysis" by John Archer, University of Central Lancashire, United Kingdom.

OH My – the Council of Europe in 2002 pointing to the UK government for not taking male victims of DV seriously?
And the Council of Europe point everyone to HORS191 published 1999 where on page one it reports parity 4.3% between male and female DV victims?
It also points to Channel 4 Dispatches, 7 January 1999 – the program titled "Male Victims Of Domestic Violence". When the program was broadcast Channel 4 had carried out the largest single survey ever in the UK of DV against men. In one chilling line (which some would find comical), a male victim says how he and his partner were well known at a national retail chain because they "…went at least once or twice a month to buy a new set of saucepans". The Channel 4 program features many people and experts such as Prof Kevin Brown, presently Head of Institute and Chair of Forensic Psychology and Child Health Nottingham University. Prof. Brown reviewed and analysed all of the data collected by Dispatches and made his own reports.[14][15] He found some interesting facts:

> "Interestingly, the research shows that one third of the victims were attacked while they were asleep in bed, which is very different to wife abuse. However, the kinds of mental abuse suffered are the same for all victims, male or female, involving social and emotional isolation. Nevertheless, there does seem an increase in the use of the children as an object of threat especially in relation to custody disputes."

But maybe the most pointed reference is not for either HORS191 or the largest survey of male victims ever in the UK by Channel 4, it's that last entry mentioning John Archer, University of Central Lancashire. The paper referred to may seem innocuous but it was and remains revolutionary because it says things some people really don't like: the main issue being that Archer keeps finding in Domestic Violence research from across the globe that women are as aggressive as men, and in many societies they are more aggressive and violent behind closed doors. "The physical aggression of women and men to their partners: A quantitative analysis".[16] He says:

> The limited data from other western nations indicate that the pattern of more women than men showing physical aggression was not restricted to the United States. Indeed, the effect size was significantly higher for three other western nations than for the United States.

So you have parity in numbers, media coverage of the issues and data showing that women are more frequently aggressive than men. No wonder Archer also points out that his findings undermine the feminist ideals and views:

> One may ask whether it is possible to explain the considerable number of women using physical aggression toward their partners from the background of coercive male power, which is crucial to both > feminist and evolutionary explanations. It is certainly a finding that is predicted by neither approach and at first sight is more consistent with gender-free explanations emphasizing individual differences and relationship problems.

Archer keeps pointing out that the data analysed across multiple studies from across the globe keeps on showing that in western European societies the claims of male aggression were wrong and beyond that the claims of patriarchy as the cause of male aggression are an invalid view that couldn't be supported.
No wonder the full Counsel Of Europe documents, notes and memoranda were so hard to find – because when you found out that the 1 in 4 claim was from limited and doubtful sources, you also found that the European Commission was wondering exactly what the UK government under Mr Blair was getting up to, and why male DV victims were being ignored.
But the 1 in 4 claim is still not fully de-woozled, and then it gets interesting because as the Council of Europe moved forward from 2002 and monitored and implemented treaties about violence and women they seem to forget the 1 in 4 claim. They even kept changing their language until they couldn't say "domestic violence" any more and just use the term "domestic abuse".[12] So in April 2011 The Counsel Of Europe were saying that "Secondary data analysis support a conservative estimate that about 12% to 15% of all women have been in a relationship of domestic abuse after the age of 16."
So given that domestic abuse has domestic violence inside it and the figures provided show that domestic abuse is between 1 in 8 and 1 in 7, its clear that by April 2011 they know that the Jig was up with the 1 in 4 claim. It's just fascinating that the Council of Europe suddenly can't put a figure on the levels of Domestic Violence in Europe after so much work has been done to find out the real levels over more than a decade. It does make you wonder if the Eurocrats are up to doing basic work and delivering basic reports in consistent language.
So I had to turn to the British Crime Survey and found someone had been doing some homework at the ManKind Initiative here in the UK. They have been reading the 2011/12 statistic from the Office of National Statistics Focus on: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences, 2011/12.[12] It gets interesting:

- 40% of domestic abuse victims are male: for every five victims, three will be female, two will be male.
- 7% of women and 5% of men were estimated to have experienced any domestic abuse in the last year, equivalent to an estimated 1.2 million female and 800,000 male victims

The truly interesting thing is that the language has been changed, so now there are no references to Domestic Violence – only grades of Domestic Abuse. So that's how they have been getting away with making the claims – the last time the Council of Europe gave a figure for Domestic Violence was back in 2002, and as they haven't given a new figure and NEVER will, the woozled claim of 1 in 4 can be used and used until the cows come home.
But still, language isn't everything and you find these sort of statistics:

- In 2011/12, 4% of women (675,000) and 3% of men (491,000) experienced partner abuse: a split of 57%/43% (for every seven victims –four will be female, three will be male).
- 1.1% of men and 1.3% of women were victims of severe force at the hands of their partner during 2011/12. Over a lifetime the figures are 6.1% and 13.2% respectively.

Apparently "severe force" is the new meaning of domestic violence – you have to go to different documents[17] to find that:

- "Minor force" is classified as an affirmative response to the statement 'pushed you, held you down or slapped you'.
- "Severe force" involves being kicked, hit, bitten, choked, strangled, threatened with a weapon, threats to kill, use of a weapon or some other kind of force.

So now it's clear that the new lifetime prevalence figures from the office of national Statistics in the UK are 100/13 = 7.69, or 1 in 8.

At last, after so many years, so many oddly lost and untraceable documents, and so many changes of words and meanings, the 1 in 4 is no more.

Ain't hunting woozles fun? – you never know what you will dig up. One thing that is becoming very clear: woozles don't just produce flashy and false statistics to razzle-dazzle people. They also work very hard to bury and hide real facts and statistics. It can also get very political when an embarrassment of politicians is involved: they have not been elder statesmen, they've just been playing white knight to a woozle in a frock claiming distress.

Feministing erases female sexual predators

Nicolai Rublev · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feministing.com is the brainchild of noted modern feminist mouthpiece Jessica Valenti and since it was conceived in 2004 it has been an important feminist outlet on the Internet, particularly for young feminists. It exemplifies everything about modern feminism: from rape culture through to abortion they have it covered. And just recently they have graced the world with what is a perfect example of reporting on an issue with either willful and malicious ignorance, or first class indoctrination.
Either way, no-one will know unless they read the fine print.
Screenshot: Study shows an alarming rate of young inmates are sexually assaulted http://feministing.com/2013/06/12/study-shows-an-alarming-rate-of-young-inmates-are-sexually-assaulted/

> "The US department of Justice released a survey that suggests that about 20% of juvenile inmates experience sexual assault while doing time in juvenile detention centers and group homes."

It's entirely unsurprising as to why this study of more than 8500 youths would attract feminist attention. Beyond being an important report about troubled youths and their experiences in the justice system this is a potential goldmine for victimization with a feminist stamp of approval. At least after the data's been selectively mined that is.

> "I think it is also worth reminding folks that the criminal "justice" system in the US disproportionately targets and affects people of color, undocumented, and queer people."

Author Sesali Bowen left men and boys out of that sentence. Over 85% of US juveniles in residential placement are male, and that statistic only increases to 93% when taking into account all US prisoners. Somehow though, this is not considered disproportionate enough for Sesali to care. The widespread systematic discrimination against men in the justice system is not relevant to feminist approved victimization.
She goes on to tell us that "these crimes are usually committed by adult staff" and that "reveals how most sexual assaults (across age and gender lines) occur at the hands of those that we already know." She tells us that these young "people" are being victimized by "adults," and even goes so far as to say "sexual assault might represent a strong deterrent from ever reemerging within that system." A rather flippant remark for a feminist to make given a gendered prison rape epidemic they don't care to focus on.
But failing to mention that the majority of juvenile inmates in this report are male is small fish compared to what she is carefully hiding from readers. It turns out that most of those molesting hands are lacquered in nail polish and most of those sexually victimized young "people" are male. Here is the link to the report and relevant quotes from it:
http://www.propublica.org/documents/item/709100-svjfry12-emb-052813

> "An estimated 92.4% of all youth who reported staff sexual misconduct said they were victimized by female facility staff."
> "Among the estimated 1,390 youth who reported victimization by staff, 89.1% were males reporting sexual activity with female staff and 3.0% were males reporting sexual activity with both male and female staff. In comparison, males comprised 91% of adjudicated youth in the survey and female staff accounted for 44% of staff in the sampled facilities."

Majority female perpetrators and majority male victims? This is an absolute affront to the feminist approved victim narrative. These statistics are not hidden in an obscure corner of this report, one is featured in the highlights. I encourage you to look for yourself. Feministing's article goes beyond the normal ignorance of the rape of men in the US prison system, it is a deliberate obfuscation of statistics that show women use their positions of power to abuse at risk young men and boys. There is no way you can take an honest look this study and miss this. Sesali herself tells us she gave the survey “further inspection” to check for disproportionate victims.

None of the young feminists who read Sesali’s article are ever going to know her erasure of abused boys and female abusers. “Staff” will become men. Young “people” will become young “women.” Everything will slot neatly into an unchallenged victim narrative and Jessica Valenti’s victim machine will churn out another group of people who care more for the narrative than the reality.

Why does this erasure happen?

As they’ve made it quite clear misandry doesn’t exist in their theory. Through their prism of gender blindness, misandry becomes misanthropy, and “men” are relegated to “people.” No matter how heinous the atrocity, no matter how disproportionate the ratio, men are expected to bear the burden of this gender invisibility for the inclusion of women. Men are simply not allowed to suffer as men.

Of course its in their own interest for the greatest peddlers of misandry to deny its existence!

This is of course a deeply traditional gender dynamic. Feminists will often discuss the effect of viewing men as the default, for example this feministing.com interview with decidedly anti-male sociologist Michael Kimmel. But these feminists will only stand up and cry for change when there is direct benefit to be gained for women. In the many remaining cases, they are entirely happy to use traditional gender constructs to forward their heavily customized “damsels in distress” narrative. This is the great duality of feminism that renders it a movement solely for the benefit of women, and ineffectual for tackling issues facing men.

Whether or not feminists like Sesali Bowen are cognizant of their deeply anti-male behavior is not relevant. What matters is that they are held accountable for attempting to erase the victimization of men and boys, and the women who have abused them.

Swedish feminists called out

Lucian Vâlsan · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

At the beginning of this month, Danish public television launched a show about "Blachman", who is a jazz musician and a judge on the Danish X-factor (imagine a bald Simon Cowell). The show goes like this: Blachman and another male celebrity sit down on a leather couch in a dark lighted room. Then a woman, who is not allowed to talk, walks into the room and stands in from of them. She drops all of her clothes, and the idea of the show is that the two men now comment on her body[1].

It's best interpreted as art. The introduction basically says that it's about "poetry" about the female body, but what they mostly talk about is the diminishing masculine role in modern society. I think most MRA's would definitely enjoy the discussion, because what they talk about is not only really relatable, but also quite interesting in terms of male gender identity.

This is a huge difference between Europe and North America. In most countries of Europe (including Denmark), people are traditionally very free spirited when it comes to sexuality. Consequently, in countries like Portugal, Denmark, Poland, Serbia, Romania, Ukraine, Bulgaria, Latvia, the Netherlands or even Germany, this kind of show seems significantly less odd than it does for people in the US, the UK or… Sweden.

Long story short, by Swedish standards, this show is "significantly demeaning to women" at best and "OMG! Pure objectification and oppression and patriarchy and rape-apologetic and fucking scum!!!!" at worst. By the aforementioned countries' standards, on the other hand, this show is "meh" at worst and "might be interesting" at best.

But since Sweden and Denmark are significantly closer to one another culturally, the Swedish feminists thought that it is in their right to mock the entire Danish culture and announced that they don't "tolerate the Danish sexism" (as if anyone outside of Sweden really cared what the Swedish feminists thought about that). The debate became heated and it culminated with an exchange of articles between a Danish anthropologist and a Swedish feminist – the exchange being published in the pages of the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter[2][3].

In the following lines, we will present a translation of the Danish anthropologist's letter, Dennis Nørmark, a letter called Kære svenskere (Dear Swedes). We won't bother with the feminist response, as there is little to no doubt that anyone reading this site can compile a feminist response for the Kære svenskere letter. (a translation of the feminist response title Vi tolerar inte dansk sexism (We don't tolerate Danish sexism) can be listened starting from the 97th minute of this episode of The Voice of Europe) The letter in itself is not necessarily impressive, but it is important because it has been published in a Swedish mainstream media venue – a place where non-feminist points of view get little to no exposure thanks to the Swedish government's authoritarian way of controlling the press.

So the letter goes like this:

Dear Swedes,

At this moment, we regard you with amazement. We regard you as if you are no longer our culturally close related sister country, but rather a country that finds itself on another planet. And you obviously do the same.

"The Danes see themselves as European anarchists, and much of the culture celebrates norm looseness" claimed the "half Dane" Expressen's deputy cultural editor Jens Liljestrand, when half of the Swedes were apparently furious over the musician Thomas Blachman's latest invention: a talk show where two men sit on a couch for over 30 minutes and offer their thoughts in the presence of an undressed woman.

This is a program that, according to Tom Jensen from Berlingske Tidende, basically brings two rather hopeless men hanging out who, in the face of the naked female body, are groping in their uncertainty, their giggling and their tribal instinct. Also, according to him, the "Blachman" stands out as a program that is made "to gloss over the hysterical surface of sexism against women. Once you see it, it is however the man who has been made the “paralyzed victim” to the extent that he is lost. He is portrayed as if he is on the receiving end of the woman’s violence, albeit she must constantly blow him up, or otherwise he falls altogether.”

Dear Swedes, how is it that this analysis has not occurred to you? Why aren’t you offering angry resistance to the remarkable remake of the program on Swedish TV 4 where two women comment on naked men? You work with the assumption that two wrongs make a right and sell it as a bitter battle of the sexes – but it does not have to be a battle of the sexes. The battle of the sexes, which I will illustrate, is the gender debate, the pestilence, and the basis for Sweden’s superficial and “progressive” New Feminism, and are both unsympathetic and doomed to fail. Denmark’s softer variant has, however, a future.

In Denmark we watch your outlandish reactions and hateful posts in the gender debate and we shake our heads. The reaction to Blachman is just one example. But when we are told the following week that Systembolaget prohibits a beer because the label is adorned with a busty girl, we shake our heads again. Or why not earlier in the year, when a story with half-naked women and fish in the Danish journal “Fisk & Fri” (which is generally not published in Sweden) gave rise to protests, including threats to hack the journal’s website.

However, for a large number of Swedes the world appears quite different. Jens Liljestrand’s analysis of Danish sexism from Expressen reads as follows: “There is a kind of Danish sex or porn liberalism that makes that place seem to have no limits in the name of freedom.”

But there is also another analysis. Namely that Sweden has moved away from sexual liberalism and openness to what Julian Assange – polemically but also rightly – called the “feminist response to Saudi Arabia.” And then his sexual intercourse with two Swedish women suddenly became rape in a deal that sounds to me like the culmination of a persecution complex and an environment that is aggressive and hostile to men, an attitude that Swedish feminism has inculcated in huge numbers of the nation’s women. I’m talking about the way in which women are taught to think that their sexuality is characterized by a special and vulnerable “chastity” as opposed to men’s destructive and primitive libido.

In this sense, Assange’s comparison with the culturally undeveloped Saudi Arabia is actually fitting. There is something fundamentally strange about the Swedish New Feminism–as it is also expressed in Lilje Strands reactionary “norm looseness” in the Danish culture–and the Swedish feminists in the 1800s whom expressed total adherence to the idea that women are sexual victims only.

Here in Denmark, many will ask if this is a constructive way to deal with the necessary and relevant gender debate.

Gender roles may very well seem more traditional in Denmark, and in many ways this may be the case. But maybe it’s because the Danes are more comfortable with the gender gap and do not have the absolute regimentation as a goal. Here we see the carefree humorous television program about the “little difference” because we enjoy watching and relate it to our own lives. Here at home, the Swedish experiment in pre-schools with gender-neutral terms has largely been met with derisive laughter and disgust, and often with the addition that the gender differences are actually something we should value. The Danes are not trying to suppress them either linguistically or in other ways.

It is possible that we are more relaxed in Denmark, but there is also the clear advantage that the Danes have, and which I think means that in the long run will prevail, in getting a far more constructive access to equality than you have.

The difference is that there are more of us who do not perceive that there is a war between the sexes and do not want to declare war. Therefore most of us do not want a zero-sum game, where men should be deprived of their lawfully obtained rights and privileges and they instead be handed over to women. And we do not generally compete for title of which sex that is felt most sorry for. We know that men are overrepresented in terms of alcohol and drug abuse and that women are a minority in high positions. These problems are social problems, not an isolated problem in the queue.

In Denmark it’s okay to think that there is a fundamental gender difference and that it benefits both sexes.

I perceive that most people here think that you should talk to people about equality, not an annoyed, angry and not understanding how the other party works rant – and a worldview containing understanding and sympathy for plurality and diversity and that it means, amongst other things, having two different sexes.

I believe that we, in Denmark, are on our way there to affirmation of difference and a constructive dialogue about it. I think that's why we got a female prime minister before you. We did not make a big deal out of it, it just happened. In Sweden, however, where the tone is aggressive, where you are missing out a lot of good things by using "positive discrimination" and where you hunt men based on their sexuality, well, that will keep leaving you with a half-bald male prime minister.

I would actually argue that we are a little ahead of you in gender equality since you have gone the opposite way and gradually created a society on women's premises and not men's. That way, you have just given the oppression a female voice instead of a male.

When the Dutch sociologist Geert Hofstede in the 1980s, measured the global differences between the values that people hold – he discovered that men, no matter where in the world, exhibited more extreme behavior than women and that they generally ranged far more than women's behaviors. From this, he created a metric that also held the extreme, the competitive and dominant in high regards. He called this the value of "masculinity" and found that nations that placed high on this index put value on dignity, honor, the ability to provide for themselves and have the courage to dominate and take charge.

The place in the world as measured lowest on this scale was Sweden. Sweden has five points, where Denmark has 16. The scale goes up to Japan, which peaks with 95. Based on Hofstede's studies, one might conclude that these figures only underscore Sweden's leading position as the most equal country in the world. But you could also draw a different conclusion. Namely that Sweden simply has chosen the other extreme and introduced feminine values such as cultural norms and actively suppressed men's values.

Because of the Scandinavian tradition of consensus–which is the strongest in Sweden–in which domination had been deemed as the enemy, both Danish and Swedish men and boys have been suffocated by squabbling, emotional detritus and leveling. The mischievous boys in kindergarten learn that they must sit down and do as they are told, just like the girls. Climb down from the tree and do something civilized and sensible!

The Scandinavian society is also lost in many ways. Public security, supportive educational activities and victim mentality devalues individual pride and declares pride to be something you should ignore – for there is no reason to be ashamed to be last.

But maybe it's good to be ashamed of being unable to support yourself or your family, perhaps honor and shame are not just primitive macho notions. Could it be that the premise of strong individuals that face the world being proud and having self-respect is better instead of looking for a victim category that they fit into and which one can generate more government grants?

So the desire for competition and ambitions are more male than female, and the same is true in rationality. Fewer men than women believe in astrology and astral healing or put faith in tarot cards to guess their future. Generally, there are fewer religious men because they prefer a logical argument over arguments based on emotion.

Generally, also more men than women are oriented toward sexual quantity rather than quality, and react more strongly to visual stimuli than women. This also confirms anthropological studies and experiments worldwide. So the new feminist chastity, the New Puritanism and the "image ban" is also in favor of women, not men.

One can also look for the research made by Hofstede, who concluded that the Scandinavian people, and the Swedes in particular, have learned to downgrade the values that are typically dominant in men, whilst doing nothing or championing the ones in women. If these differences are of biological or cultural origin is meaningless as it only serves to shift the focus from the facts: namely, that there are values that are more male than female.

I believe that the future of gender equality will be about accepting those differences and understanding how a balance can benefit society as a whole. Today we know through research that diversity leads to innovation, progress and results. But it also requires that we affirm those differences and make room for them.

If men are to waive privilege, status and positions, it is the condition that they may see it as an advantage for themselves. Otherwise, they will see it as a conflict of interest and a struggle for resources and power. Here I think that the Danes have an advantage because we both structurally and legally support equality while recognizing differences and not attempting to deconstruct them in any way.

If one can see the advantage of diversification, then one can also refrain from disdain and ridicule of cultures, communities and genders that do not match with what a dominant group in society has managed to install as the norm.

In Sweden you have installed a standard to suit women and you initiated an active subjugation of what does not fit into this standard. This way you will never be able to achieve equality. Unfortunately, you are obviously far from being able to detect it and instead you direct your self-contemplation and project your intolerant and narrow logic against Denmark. It is sad to see. But it's mostly sad for yourselves.

Dear Swedish women, you've won and today it is you who are the oppressors. You have managed to define men's sexuality as dangerous, poorer and more primitive than women by reducing men to the prehistoric Neanderthal – and to the point that you yourself believe in it. We do this also here in Denmark, and Blachman's program is an excellent example of this: the man who follows the dominant discourse is basically the primitive barbarian, he plays the role to perfection, and thus undermines his own authority. It's an act! And it's a good one!

Unfortunately, you have lost the ability to act, to analyze the program, because you see, you are blinded by a pair of naked breasts and forget about everything else.

You have started a war against men by promoting women and thereby discriminating against men much more than we do in Denmark. Take for example the recent gimmickry to impose a higher tax for men. (He is talking about the Umeå Municipality's proposal to have a gender tax[4]) Of course, those men are cursed because it is a lowercase thievery. It only creates new victims, even if you believe in the idea that men arguably have such a great moral debt that they indeed should tolerate being disadvantaged in this.

In addition, if men had behaved in the same way as they are now being attacked through the discriminations and oppressions through behavior and language in the public debate to this point, it would have immediately been perceived and called out as sexist.

By doing all this, you have begun a bitter, vicious and unjust war against the other sex. Aside from the fact that you have nothing to gain from it, then it will also lead to a total setback. For sooner or later, the men will no longer want to be part of a so-called gender war, which means that they are a priori doomed. They are now being ridiculed, and their values and sexuality is being dumped down. Therefore, they will eventually turn against you – and all will lose. The pendulum will just swing back again.

We have chosen a slightly different path in Denmark, and I think we're going to do it better. Here we are going step by step to understand that we all, men and women, have something to gain from equality. Because if you put the war in the equation and punish men because they are men you will never achieve the one thing that can create equality – namely – that men may see it as an advantage for themselves.

Dear Swedes. This is why not only the women will lose this gender war. No! All Swedes will lose.

And this is why Denmark has come further in the issue of gender than you – whatever you have imagined by that.

An open letter to Peter J. Reilly

Andy Thomas · 24 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Peter J. Reilly is a US accountant who claims to have extensive experience of taxation and dealings with "high net worth individuals". He is a regular contributor to Forbes.com, and believing himself to be a white knight in shining armour, has just stepped up to defend the honour of Radfem organiser, Cathy Brennan. He is also a man who has very suddenly become aware that he is standing in the middle of a minefield, and doesn't know what to say or do next. Let's help him to decide!

Dear Mr. Reilly,

I am writing to you about your article on Forbes.com in which you describe your recent interview with Cathy Brennan, one of the organisers of Radfem 2013.

In your article, you openly admit that you don't really understand the issues involved, but step up to offer Cathy Brennan your support by claiming that radical feminists deserve respect. You also state that MRAs are the only people who refuse to acknowledge that radical feminists "have a worthwhile viewpoint" because they don't like to have "nasty things said about them." Furthermore, you say yourself that your analysis of the situation is that of an idiot. I suspect you were attempting to be disingenuous here, however, I am going to agree with you on your last point.

Last year, the Conway Hall convention centre in London rejected Radfem's 2012 booking citing the UK equality law after protest by transgender activists. Radfems typically refer to themselves as "TERFs", or trans-exclusionary radical feminists. In other words, they do not recognise male-to-female transgender individuals as women, and their 2012 event was advertised as being open only to "women-born women". Cathy Brennan, herself, has a documented history of espousing hate toward transgender women; see below.

Until February 2013, Cathy Brennan owned and ran a website called the "Radical Hub" (aka "Radfem Hub"). This served as a collective blog for her cause, and the articles it carried discussed gendercide and the genetic modification of males, as exemplified by Vliet Tiptree (aka. Pamela O'Shaughnessy, a Californian author of crime novels) in her article titled, Radical Feminism Enters the 21st Century. Other posters called for the killing of baby boys at birth (see below) while still others argued that they should be deliberately denied care or nurture.

as vliet suggested, i think a biological solution would be a radical solution. such as dispatching male babies at birth. as for the status quo, and whether some action legitimately challenges it, i guess its a question of how narrowly you are framing/identifying the status quo? for example, the status quo in the workplace in the 1950s could be described in many ways. men touched womens breasts and buttocks. men were sexually entitled to womens bodies in the workplace and everywhere. mens sexual entitlement to womens bodies in the workplace and everywhere was backed up by the threat of violence and male institutional power, including legal power.

catharine macknnon's solution to the problem of workplace sexual harassment challenged one of those, for sure. it didnt challenge the others, at all, nor could it. and women would be incarcerated and executed by the legal system for dispatching male babies at birth, if we even tried this as a solution. and its very likely that this is the only solution that would work. this is not a coincidence.

> radical ACTION: what is it?

this is a good question. lets discuss it.

Men's human rights activists kept a dossier of articles, posts and screen-shots. They are too numerous to include here, but allow me to provide a quote, below, by Danielle Pynnonen, a child care worker who identifies herself as a Radfem organiser on Mumsnet under the handle "allectoTauniallectospoison".

Post subject: Re: "I'll just rape you" Posted: Sat Feb 14, 2009 4:11 am

Thanks for the supportive comments sisters. I honestly have been reassessing the fact that I am giving care to these little future rapists, and what that says about me and my separatism. I know it is kinda going against my principles to support and care for these little fuckers. The women I feel most sorry for are their mothers. The way that these boys treat their mothers is really shocking, all the while the mothers are trying to be perfect and loving and all that shit. If these kids were mine there would be hell to pay.

The worst of it is that about six months ago Mr. Rape Threat was holed up in a corner with this same girl, Ms. Harrassment Victim, and another two children were trying to pressure her into kissing Mr. Rape Threat. I brought this up at a staff meeting and said that we need to protect Ms. Harrassment Victim from Mr. Rape Threat. I was told in no uncertain terms that Ms. Harrassment Victim was sexually precocious and like to draw attention to herself and it was her fault the this was happening to her and that she was in the early stages of being experimental with her sexual power over boys. Fuck that for fucked up shit!!!!!

"They said: 'You are a savage and dangerous woman.' I said: 'I tell the truth and the truth is savage and dangerous.'"
-Nawal El Saadawi

Most radfems campaign against any funding or recognition for male victims of domestic violence and abuse, insisting that domestic violence is suffered exclusively by women. Almost all argue that children should have no rights to a relationship with their father. Over the last few months, radical feminists have violently demonstrated in Toronto, Melbourne and Paris, in one case abusing attendees and threatening speakers at a conference on tackling male suicide.

The London Irish Centre, the original planned venue for 2013, rejected Radfem's booking earlier this year after a protest by MRA London. As the organiser of this protest, I can attest to the fact that it was peaceful, without incident and ended with a cordial conversation with the centre's director. As you are aware, Radfem 2013 found a new home at the Camden Centre, who chose to ignore UK equality law and flout their obligation under the "No Delegation" clause of the Public Sector Equality Duty.

Mr. Reilly, you accuse us of trying to shut-down Radfem 2013 so that, as you put it, "our ears won't burn while they say nasty things about us." On the contrary, we have used the controversy as a means of exposing these bigots and their ideology, and we make no apology for this.

At the time, I discussed the merits of trying to insist that I attend the Radfem 2013 event myself with Erin Pizzey, patron of MRA London and founder of the first ever women's domestic violence refuge in 1971. We decided that it would not be safe to do so even if, in the unlikely event, we were granted admission. Erin had previously been the subject of death threats and had fled the country in 1980s after being forced out of her organisation by radical feminists. Furthermore, shortly after the London Irish Centre protest, which took place months before the event itself, MRA London members were subject of an anonymous complaint to the police over alleged violent behaviour, an allegation even the director of the centre refuted.
You may believe yourself to be chivalrous and virtuous in your support for Cathy Brennan. You should not, however, expect anybody to respect you for this. Radfem members are, in fact, fully-fledged human beings, not weak, helpless women in need of your protection. As such, they should be accountable for their own views and actions, just like everybody else. Furthermore, I can tell you now that they don't regard chivalrous men, such as yourself, as noble or virtuous — but only as useful "idiots".
It angers me immensely, when wealthy male "idiots", confusing their social privilege (or entrepreneurism) with feminist notions of gender privilege, believe that their sense of guilt can be relieved by "stepping up" in order to push down those under-privileged males beneath them. (Erin, herself, notes that she had no difficulty in soliciting donations from wealthy men to support women's refuges, but when she tried to open one for male victims, they suddenly stopped caring.)
Outside your circle of "high net worth individuals", there is a sea of broken men out there. Certain outdated notions of chivalry, combined with years of negative stereotyping by gender ideologues, means that society is utterly blind to their suffering. Indeed, I could fill a book with it, but let me say that while society refuses to let women fail, the choice facing many men today is often one of suicide or homelessness.
Here in the UK, according to the charity CALM, it is suicide that is the biggest killer of young men, not accidents or illness. Likewise, it is men who make up the overwhelming majority of the homeless and rough sleepers. And yet, when do you hear the issue of "homeless men" ever being addressed? Whenever male suffering is at issue, men are hidden behind gender-neutral terms such "the homeless", "homeless people" and "rough sleepers".
Mr. Reilly, let me ask you, how do you think such men end up being homeless? I'll give you a clue — the primary cause is not recession, but domestic violence. Homeless men are the dirty secret that society refuses to acknowledge, they are the human overflow of male targeted abuse and childhood neglect — the little boys who were once denied care and nurture.
What people are now starting realise is that, when their little boys grow up, society will no longer see them as human beings, but as "just men" — utilitarian providers lacking in human worth and legitimate targets for social hostility and discrimination. While your wealth may protect you, if the wheels ever came off your own life, you will discover just how little intrinsic human value you have in this society as a male. For example, when a man is physically attacked, abused, and even horrifically mutilated, he is not seen as a human being in need of care, but as a source of fun and ridicule. Where do you think this will end if people like you continue to give credence to the ideologies of people like Brennan?
We in the men's human rights movement are not a bunch of angry misogynists, but are simply trying to improve society's negative stereotypical view of males, so that boys growing up today won't have to face a dystopian future.
Mr Reilly, you have no idea what have blundered into, have you? Maybe you should just close your eyes and go back to helping "high net worth individuals" avoid paying tax.
Yours sincerely
Andy Thomas

Taranto takes on the twitstorm

Diana Davison · 25 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

James Taranto is an experienced columnist with a healthy sense of humor. When feminists attack he welcomes it because, like hecklers to a comedian, they only make his show better. On June 17, 2013 Taranto's op-ed (1) about a war on men was published in The Wall Street Journal. The next day he had roused enough frothy bile from rabid feminists that he followed up with a response (2) on June 19th that exceeded the excellence of his original article. Since his critics do such a sloppy job of summarizing what Taranto's article is about I'll give you his more accurate version from the reply.

> "To recap briefly: Sen. Claire McCaskill has placed a "permanent hold" on the nomination of Gen. Susan Helms to be vice commander of the Air Force Space Command. McCaskill is punishing Helms for having granted clemency to an officer under her command, Capt. Matthew Herrera, who was convicted of aggravated sexual assault.
> We reviewed the facts and concluded that Helms was correct in holding that the prosecution case was so weak as to make the conviction unjust. (Herrera did not escape punishment: He pleaded guilty to an "indecent act" and was involuntarily discharged from the service.)"

While Taranto's wit needs no choir for backup there are some wonderful muffs he failed to penetrate. I'll go diving in.

Jezebel's Katie J.M. Baker offers an extravaganza of lunacy (3) faithfully cheered on by her devoted disciples in the comments section who are too obtuse to see the inconsistency of her hastily chosen words. Most likely they just don't care if it makes sense. The day after Mr. Taranto's article was published, Baker declares to her fans that she is definitely not "freaking out." All evidence suggests otherwise.

In addition to writing "HE IS THE WORST" in all caps, Baker is unable to control the urge to use phrases like "slimy," "woman-hating troll," and "overwhelmingly horrible." She's not freaked out, she's just overwhelmed. She is, in fact, so frenzied that she complains she hasn't gotten a reply from WSJ editors to an email she sent just that morning. Take a deep breath Katie and remember they have real jobs. As she points out, "Wall Street Journal, [is] the best-selling newspaper in the country" but she fails to imagine that they got there by choosing good editors. When Katie calms down she may figure out that reminding people of how successful they are is not a good prelude to effectively questioning their ability to manage their own affairs.

Calm people don't start campaigns to get someone fired, that's what vindictive people do.

It's hysterical to write "I'm not interested in engaging with Taranto" in an article all about him and his work. She probably didn't get a response from the editors because by the time they read her email stating that Taranto's piece "doesn't foster discussion or present an interesting viewpoint" they could see that it had fostered her article. Bloggers worth speaking to don't write articles about uninteresting people. Baker is either not worth replying to or she is lying.

I find Katie Baker's viewpoint very interesting. I wonder how someone whose article discredits its own assertions manages to get published. Fascinating. She is a gruesome form of entertainment — if you like watching people repeatedly hit themselves in their own face.

June 18 was a busy day for Katies. Over at Salon, Katie McDonough published her bizarre response (4) that begins with calling Taranto a "well-practiced troll" and attempting to prove it by linking to one of her own articles published in WSJ. Trolling happens when you put your fishing line in someone else's pool. When he's writing on his own site and you are going there to read it, you're actually in his pool.

These feminists do love to redefine words.

In explaining the art of becoming a rape apologist, the “five easy steps” that McDonough lists are actually lazy leaps of illogic on the part of the writer. Step one involves quoting her own article (5) that asserts rape in the military is increasing instead of linking to one by a third party that debunks (6) that assertion.

There is little doubt that McDonough is happy deferring to her own authority when rushed for time. In conclusion Katie 2 is outraged Taranto won’t accept that a guy not even accused of rape committed the act of rape. This glitch in her reasoning happened because feminists like her are proffering the myth that all men are rapists who just haven’t raped yet. That’s actually not true, Katie.

Now we move onward to “recklessness.” When Taranto described Capt. Herrara’s behaviour as reckless, even if not rape or sexual assault, and stated that his accuser was also acting recklessly, McDonough claims he was implying the girl asked to be raped. Katie, there was no rape.

Step three involves not using a dictionary.

The next screwball stride can only be accomplished if you forget the testimony which showed the accuser to be unreliable came from a woman. Lt. Michelle Dickinson, who was present and the only one sober at the time of the incident, contradicted all evidence given by the accuser. It was not a case, as McDonough asserts, of “he said/she said” in which what “he” said was given more weight. It came down to “she said/she said” and weight was given to the sober one.

The final farce is that she faults Taranto for not asking what happened to the accuser. The reason we keep calling this woman “the accuser” is because no one knows her name. We’re legally not allowed to know who she is.

Katie McDonough has a very interesting viewpoint. I wonder how someone whose article discredits her own ability to reason manages to get published.

Archy, New York Tribune, September 11, 1922

James Taranto has not only written a great article and a respectable reply to the furious flurry of feminist wrath, he’s managed to prove that Wall Street Journal editors are incredibly smart. I think Taranto deserves a raise. I’d like to hear more from him on the subject of gender wars. He seems like a clever bloke to know.

If Taranto is a cockroach he is the free verse poet from Archy and Mehitabel.(7) Though I share his sentiment that the underlying destruction of men’s lives is extremely serious, I’ll leave you with his thoughts on why the twitstorm didn’t scare him:

“We can take the abuse. In fact, in this instance we delight in it, not only because we see the humor but because it proves us right.”

Facebook censorship update: Mapping the money

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 25 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Almost two weeks ago I posted a call to action for MHRAs to assist me in gathering information on the signatories of WAM!'s ultimatum, issued to Facebook regarding alleged misogyny on the social network site. A crack team of fifteen compassionate people formed out of their own free will, and the result is a forty-three page PDF that is still a work in progress. You can review the latest PDF snapshot and see what we are working with. The AVFM editorial staff and the NCFM are going to review the report for accuracy. It is important that we report facts, and only facts.

The PDF was a living document distributed in time-stamped snapshots (with superfluous content removed), which is obviously inefficient when a wiki is available. We are porting the document to a format the wiki can work with. Needless to say, no new PDF snapshots will be generated because of this.

Going forward, you can help by:

1. Fact checking the PDF and leaving feedback in the comments on this article.
2. Add new content to the gathered information on the Wiki once the existent content is ported.

Please do not suggest new content in the comments. We will worry about that when the wiki pages are up.

You will need permission to be able to work on the Wiki, which you can get by following instructions on the AVFM Reference permissions page.

Let this be an exercise in peer review. As insinuated, this is an organic process with a lot of uncertainties. Mistakes are expected, so take nothing here at face value. Start with the assumption that the PDF, the budding Wiki page and the comments on this article are suspect.

Our ultimate goal is map out the flow of money in feminist organizations. The signatories are a gateway into a massive project where we can measure the scale of our opposition. Knowing where the money goes gives us new insights into the inner workings of misandric culture, and we need you to help open our eyes.

Misandry in psychology: Ignoring abused boys

Tom Golden · 25 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is the second part of a four-part series of articles about the bias against men and boys in psychological research. There is a video companion to this series that summarizes the contents of these articles. A link to this video will appear at the end of the article.

[image]

The first project we will examine is a study on teen relationship violence from Great Britain. The study consisted of both a written survey and subjective interviews of selected teens. The survey portion of the study was fairly conclusive in finding that teen relationship violence was experienced by both boys and girls. An "ad campaign" was created as a result of this work. Surprisingly, the ad campaign is designed to help only girls who were victims of teen relationship violence while focusing on boys only as perpetrators. This stunning neglect of male victims and female perpetrators is in stark contrast to the numbers of the research survey of this study which showed males to be victims of teen relationship violence and girls to be perpetrators. Let's start at the beginning of the story when this issue first caught my attention.

A friend emailed me a link to an article from Great Britain about teen violence. The friend was worried that the article was biased against boys. Here's how it started:

- Teenage boys were urged not to violently abuse their girlfriends in a new Government campaign launched today.
- TV, radio, internet and poster ads will target young males aged 13 to 18 in an attempt to show the consequences of abusive relationships.
- It is part of a wider effort by ministers to cut domestic violence against both women and younger girls.
- Research published last year by the NSPCC found a quarter of teenage girls said they had been physically abused by their boyfriends.
- One in six said they had been pressured into sex and one in three said they had gone further sexually than they had wanted to.

I was a bit taken back by the article considering the recent research on teen violence which has been finding that relationship violence in teens is fairly symmetrical with both boys and girls being perpetrators and victims. This article was offering a very different perspective from the studies I had been seeing. It was clearly assuming that the girls were the primary victims and the boys the primary perpetrators which reflects an archaic and outdated stereotype about domestic violence. It made me wonder exactly what was happening. I read several more articles online about the ad campaign mentioned in the first article and was shocked to see that the focus of the campaign was indeed solely to help girls and to "teach" boys about not abusing their girlfriends.

In each of the articles there was a reference to the research findings that drove the ad campaign. I decided to go back to the source and see what the original research had found.

The original study was sponsored by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children (NSPCC) of Great Britain and was in two parts. The first part was the "full report" and was a detailed 209 page research report explaining methodology, results, implications and conclusions. The next was the Executive Summary which was a 10 page summation of the findings of the full report. It was a quick read and was .meant to give people the essence of the larger document. I read through the "full report" and then the executive summary. It was striking to me that the data in the full report actually showed that boys were victims of teen violence. The original news article I had read had mentioned that the research had found that 25% of girls said they had been physically abused by their boyfriends. What the news article omitted saying was that the same research had also found that 18% of boys had said that they had been physically abused by their girlfriends. This meant that this research found that almost half of the victims of teen relationship violence were boys! Somehow this important fact had been omitted from the news report.

There were plenty of other headlines that could have been drawn from the data of the full report that showed the boys to have been victims and the girls perpetrators but they were nowhere to be seen in any of the news articles. Here are a couple of examples of headlines that could be written from the data of the full report:

- 25% of those reporting physically forcing their partners into having sexual intercourse were girls. – Table 15 page 82 full report
- Nearly three times as many girls reported using SEVERE violence in relationships. – Table 11 page 75 full report
- Over three times as many girls reported using partner violence in their relationships. – Table 10 page 74 full report
- Over 1/3 of those reporting being pressured into kissing, touching or something else were boys. – Table 6 page 66 full report
- Nearly half (42%) of the victims of teen relationship violence were boys. – Table 3 page 44 full report
- Nearly one third of the victims of severe violence were boys. – Table 4 page 45 full report
- Twice as many girls reported physically forcing their partners into "kissing, touching, or something else" more than a few times. – Table 13 page 82 full report

This is just a sampling of the sorts of findings in the full report. It is obvious that their survey clearly indicated that teen relationship violence was not gender based and both the victims and the perpetrators were both boys and girls. However, what I found after reading both the full report and the executive summary was that the full report had data that showed boys to be victims and girls to be perpetrators but the executive summary seemed to have considerably less information about male victims and female perpetrators. In fact the executive summary seemed to focus more on female victims and male perpetrators.
I found myself wondering how this transition could take place. Boys were shown to be victims in the original study, often not in as great a number as the girls but victims all the same. Generally the boys comprised about 25-42% of the victims. Certainly not the majority but also not a small number that could be ignored. But ignore them they did!
The NSPCC introduced this research to the media via a press release. We can see the same tendency of moving away from focusing on boys when looking at the words in the press release. What started in the full report as an apparently egalitarian look into teen relationship violence progressively looked less so in the Executive Summary and now with the press release it looks to have moved one more step towards focusing solely on girls. Here's the opening of the press release. Note the focus on "girls only" in both the headline and the first paragraphs:

Teen girls abused by boyfriends warns NSPCC Press releases
01 September 2009

A third of teenage girls in a relationship suffer unwanted sexual acts and a quarter physical violence, reveals new research(1) launched today (01 September 2009) by the NSPCC(2) and the University of Bristol(3).

The survey of 13 to 17-year-olds found that nearly nine out of ten girls had been in an intimate relationship. Of these, one in six said they had been pressured into sexual intercourse and 1 in 16 said they had been raped. Others had been pressured or forced to kiss or sexually touch.

A quarter of girls had suffered physical violence such as being slapped, punched, or beaten by their boyfriends.

Girls are highlighted repeatedly in the press release. If one only read the press release you might assume that the boys were incidental and that the girls were clearly the identified victims of teen relationship violence. The boys actually did get mentioned in one paragraph (one out of 18 paragraphs, eleven of which were about girls). Here it is:

Nearly nine out of ten boys also said they had been in a relationship. A smaller number reported pressure or violence from girls. (Only one in seventeen boys in a relationship reported being pressured or forced into sexual activity and almost one in five suffered physical violence in a relationship).

Note how the boys victimization is minimized with words like "a smaller number" and "only one in seventeen."

Keep in mind that the "smaller number" referred to in the second sentence was 18% versus 25% which had been the figure for girls. While 18 is smaller than 25, it is not that much smaller. Another important difference is that the girls 25% stat was mentioned in the opening sentence of the document (and indirectly in the headline) while the boys 18% stat was mentioned as an afterthought in parentheses. Yes, the boys percentage was smaller but it seems very obvious that this press release is trying to marginalize the victimization of boys.
Note that the press release mentions that one in 17 girls had been raped. This works out to about 5.8% of the females surveyed. What they don't mention is that the same table in the full report that showed that 5.8% of girls were raped also showed that 3.3% of the boys were also raped. This stat never made it beyond the full report. The press release mentions the rape of girls but is completely silent on the shocking statistic that 3.3% of the boys were raped. The fact is that their data from the full report shows boys comprised over one third of the rape victims. Not a word about this.
It now seems easy to understand how the media articles focused so exclusively on girls and ignored the needs of boys. They likely only read the press release and maybe a part of the executive summary. The press release might very well have been the only document they read about the study and it clearly focused almost exclusively on girls while ignoring the needs of boys. How bad did it get in focusing on just girls? Here is a sampling of typical headlines from actual news articles on this research and ad campaign:

Many Girls' Abused by Boyfriends
http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/8230844.stm
Third of teenage girls forced into sex, NSPCC survey finds http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2009/sep/01/teenage-sexual-abuse-nspcc-report

Teen Girls Abused by Boyfriends Warns NSPCC
http://www.bris.ac.uk/news/2009/6524.html
Almost every headline I found focused on girls as victims. I never found one headline that focused on boys. The articles would occasionally mention that boys were vulnerable but the main thrust was surely the girls vulnerability and victimhood.
The ad campaign is the real world response to the findings of this research using TV, radio, internet and poster ads in attempts to change behaviours of teen relationship violence. It is where the theoretical ends and the actual support and tax dollars begin. Inexplicably, the focus of the ad campaign is entirely on girls as victims of relationship violence while boys are seen as the problem and are taught to not abuse their girlfriends. Somehow the original research had shown that both boys and girls were victims of relationship violence and by the time we made our way to the media articles and then to the ad campaign we find that the original data is all but forgotten.
How did this happen?

The Full Report and then boys disappear
The full report offers an abundance of data that shows that boys are victims of teen partner violence but somehow the recommendations of both the full report and the executive summary seem to focus primarily on girls. Here's a quick summary extrapolated from the full report:
According to their survey:
72% girls reported experiencing emotional violence
51% of boys reported emotional violence
BOYS WERE 41% of the victims of emotional violence in teen relationships
25% of girls experienced physical partner violence
18% of the boys experienced physical partner violence
BOYS WERE 42% of the victims of physical partner violence in teen relationships
31% of girls experienced sexual partner violence
16% of boys experienced sexual partner violence

BOYS WERE 34% of the victims of sexual partner violence in teen relationships.
So the boys ranged between 34-42% of the victims as recorded in the survey, The full report states this loud and clear in the data but then with the recommendations of both the full report and the executive summary and then the press release the boys seem to simply disappear. Why could that be? The researchers fail to explain fully the reasons for this but if you read between the lines you can find that they offer two reasons. The first is that the survey responses indicate that girls are more "impacted" by relationship violence than the boys. There is a question on the survey that asks about emotional reactions to the violence and the girls were much more likely to check the boxes that indicated they were scared/upset/humiliated. The boys were more likely to check boxes that said they were angry/annoyed or the box that said there was no effect on them. The researchers seem to have taken this difference and decided that since the girls were more "impacted" from the experience of violence that they should be the ones to get the attention and services. There are a number of places in the full report where this is implied. Here is one:

This research has demonstrated that a fundamental divide exists in relation to how girls and boys are affected by partner violence, and this divide needs to be a central component in the development of professional responses to this issue.

Just what does "professional responses to this issue" mean? They don't say but we can only assume that they are suggesting that girls receive more attention and services due to their being more impacted by the violence. Considering the recommendations focus on girls and ignore the needs of boys I think the above assumption is a good one. I would be happy to be corrected on this assumption if I am incorrect.
The researchers seem willing to basically ignore their own substantial evidence that boys are victims of violence simply because the girls have a greater emotional reaction. Here's another quote:

These findings are further elaborated on in the interview data where girls consistently described the harmful impact that the violence had on their welfare, often long term, while boy victims routinely stated they were unaffected or, at the very worst, annoyed. These results provide the wider context in which teenage partner violence needs to be viewed.

Let's keep in mind that the above quoted interview data, which we will examine later, included only 62 hand-selected girls and 29 similarly selected boys. Importantly, only one of the 29 boys was a victim of non-reciprocal violence so making generalizations based on the interview data is likely unreliable especially considering the survey data was collected from over 1300 teens. Note also that by saying "the wider context in which teenage partner violence needs to be viewed" we can only assume the researchers are again suggesting that girls be given preference in services and aid. What we do know is that the data on violence against boys is ignored in the recommendation sections and also in the ad campaign. The following quote gives us a bit more clarity regarding the views of the researchers:

"Intervention programmes need to reflect this fundamental difference by ensuring that the significant impact of violence on girls' wellbeing is recognised and responded to, while enabling boys to recognise the implications of partner violence for their partners and themselves."

This statement clearly shows that the researchers believe that the girls should be treated differently and intervention programs need to "reflect" the difference that girls are more impacted by the violence.
But are girls more impacted? I am not so sure. Let's start by looking at the actual question on the survey:

3 How did it make you feel when force was used against you?

scared/frightened angry/annoyed humiliated upset/unhappy loved/protected thought it was funny
no effect

The researchers stated that the answers to this question showed a big difference in boys and girls responses about the impact that the violence had on them. They don't give the raw data about the responses and don't offer the numbers each sex chose for each answer but they give us the summary saying that girls were much more "impacted." There are very good reasons for that. This question is a set up since boys and girls will naturally answer it very differently. The creators of this question seem to fail to understand the hierarchical nature of boys and their strong natural reluctance to show any lack of independence. If the boys had checked "scared/ frightened", "humiliated" or "upset/unhappy" they would be admitting that they were less than independent. This is usually avoided while a choice such as "no effect" or "angry/annoyed" would be much more likely in order to maintain their image. As Warren Farrell would say "The weakness of men is the facade of strength: the strength of women is the facade of weakness."

The men and boys are much more likely to choose a response that will portray them as strong. If this is correct it is easy to understand how boys' responses might not accurately convey their degree of hurt or upset. It is very possible that the boys who checked the "no effect" box were just as impacted by the violence as their female counterparts. With these sorts of questions it leaves us simply not knowing. To suggest the direction of future services based on the responses to this question would be very risky and likely give very poor results.

I wonder if the researchers would think that a rape victim who claimed there there was no impact on her would not need support services? Would clinicians simply ignore her? No, I would bet they wouldn't. If a group of domestic violence victims claimed that the violence had no impact on them would they quickly assume that group did not need support services? No. Then why would they dismiss the trauma of boys simply because they have marked a survey question differently and reported to be less upset? They would realize that people have very unique responses to trauma and that not having an immediate or verbal emotional reaction to a trauma does not in any way indicate that that person should be ignored. That is simply ridiculous.

Having worked with trauma victims for many years I know very well that some people will sometimes not even begin to feel the negative impact of a trauma for months and others for years. Restricting services for victims of trauma due to their response seeming to show less emotional impact is one of the zaniest ideas I have heard for some time. Denying services to a birth group for this reason seems to simply be bigoted.

Are the researchers biased against boys?

There are numerous indications, in addition to what has already been described, that the researchers have an anti-boy bias. There are the obvious dismissals of the survey data that shows boys to be victims of partner violence and the complete focus on girls as victims. But there are a number of more subtle clues in the study that seem to indicate a disdain for boys.

When they did mention boys as victims the report tended to minimize their experience. Here is a quote:

Boys' experiences of violence

Little evidence existed to support the possibility that boys, although they were negatively affected by their partner's violence, felt unable either to voice or to recognise their vulnerability. Boys minimised their own use of violence as "messing around". Boys also reported the violence as mutual, although they often used disproportionate force compared to their female partners.

Rather than comment on the experience of the boys to violence the researchers focus on whether they could "give voice" to the negative affects of their partners violence. This seems to be a weak attempt to show that boys could indeed voice their concerns about being victims of violence and since they were able to voice that response they must not be "held back" by traditional masculinity from being able to express their vulnerability. The unspoken assumption seems to be that since they can voice the pain they are not holding back due to traditional masculinity and simply aren't impacted by the violence.

It just doesn't matter while for the girls it really does matter. These seem to be distractions from the reality that the boys have been victimized. Reading the above paragraph will give the reader a sense of how the boys were treated differently in this study. Their pain was minimized and rationalized by claiming the were really not so impacted. The thrust is to say that boys do experience violence from their female partners but they aren't so negatively impacted! They are able to voice or recognize their vulnerability. It is well known that men and boys will try to minimize any sort of hurt or injury and try to maintain an independent stance. This by no means indicates they are not impacted, it just means that will try to not let you know it. It is for this very reason that we need to take a different approach with boys who may be victimized but this study seems to prefer to simply ignore the pain of boys and focus just on the girls.

Messing Around

The quote above states that "Boys minimised their own use of violence as "messing around." The full report affirms that boys label their own violence as "messing around" 56% of the time. This is given later in the recommendations section as a reason that boys should be taught about being aware of their violence. (see below) But what about the girls? When you see that boys are singled out for this perception of "messing around" you would think that the girls would not explain their own violence in that manner. Not in the Alice in Wonderland environment of this study. Actually by the researchers own numbers the girls labelled their own violence as "messing around" 43% of the time. Just 13% points below the boys. You would think that both boys and girls would need to learn about their own violence but somehow the only ones that need to learn are the boys! That is an anti-boy bias.

Here is the quote:

"However, although intervention programmes should ensure that the needs of both girls and boys are recognised, it is important that the wider experiences of girls remain a focus. In addition, boys' minimisation of their own use of violence – by dismissing it as "messing around" and justifications based on mutual aggression – needs to be challenged."

Why would the boys need to be challenged about this and the girls not? The boys said their violence was "messing around" 56% of the time and the girls said their violence was a slightly lower "messing around" 43% of the time. Clearly a strong bias in favor of girls and anti-boys.

The researchers went a step farther than just recommending that girls victimisation should be the focus. The researchers made the claim that boys lower scores on the impact question actually made them more dangerous to their female partners. Here is a quote:

If boys view the impact of their victimisation as negligible, they may also apply this understanding to their own actions. Thus, they may believe that their partners are also unaffected by their use of violence.

The implication here is that the boys ignorance/insensitivity of the impact of violence against them shows that they would be less than sensitive to their own violence used against a partner. I don't believe that for a second considering almost every boy has had it drilled into their brains that they are never to hit a girl. Let's use the same sort of reasoning but apply it instead to girls. According to the survey the girls suffer a much greater emotional impact from being victims of violence. Yet by the girls report, they use violence three times MORE in relationships than boys even though they know it's negative impact and is hurtful. This would lead us to believe that girls are aware of the power to hurt others with violence and choose to do so far more often than boys. This doesn't put the girls in a particularly good light now does it?

Thus, from these findings it seems conclusive that partner sexual violence represents a problem for girls, while boys report being unaffected.

That pretty much sums it up, doesn't it?

Boys are more violent! When the subjective trumps the objective

The survey was supposed to be the main source of data but in some ways the researchers seem to put much more stock in the subjective information they had obtained via the interviews. While the survey in the full report showed clearly that the girls were three times more likely to report using violence in relationship suddenly the researchers are exclaiming that there was a clear consensus from the girls that boys used physical violence in relationship more often than girls. Here's the quote:

"There was a clear consensus within girls' accounts that boys used physical violence in relationships more often than girls. This common understanding regarding the gendered nature of physical violence was reported by almost all girls, whether they themselves had experienced violence or not."

This is from page 94 of the full report and shows the researchers evaluations of the girls interviews. The most glaring part of this is that the survey portion of the study showed clearly that girls were 3-6 times more likely to report being violent in relationships and yet the subjective data drawn from the interviews claims that there was a "common understanding regarding the gendered nature of physical violence" for "almost all girls" that "boys used physical violence in relationships more often than girls." This is a huge discrepancy when one half of the study shows girls to report being much more inclined to be violent than the boys and the other half claiming that "boys used physical violence in relationship more often than girls." This demands an explanation but there was little to be found. The closest the researchers come is to use the hackneyed claim that girls high rates of violence in relationships is due to their using violence as self defense. But if you look at the numbers this claim falls flat on its face. The facts are that 25% of the girls reported being violent in relationship compared to 8% of the boys. When you subtract the percentages of violence claimed to be in self defense from both boys (30%) and girls (44%) you find that 14% of girls were violent in relationship and 5.6% of the boys for reasons other than self defense. That's nearly three times more girls than boys. (-30% of 8%= 5.6% and -44% of 25%= 14%) Not making this an important point in this research is very suspect. This difference is huge. Girls reported almost three times as often that they perpetrated violence in their relationships and yet there is a claim that almost all girls believed boys used "physical violence in relationship more often" and this leads us to the idea that girls are in need of services and boys in need of changing their behaviors? Baffling. Clearly misandry.
One partial explanation of this is shown in the following quote:

Only 6 per cent of boys, compared to a third of girls, claimed that they were negatively affected by the emotional violence they experienced. This gendered impact disparity upholds Stark's (2007) contention that coercive control, which many of our components of emotional violence reflect, is made meaningful only when placed within a gendered power understanding of intimate violence. Thus, although girls had used emotional violence, without it being underpinned by other forms of inequality and power, their attempts were rendered largely ineffectual.

Incredibly, this section seems to be giving girls a pass for their emotional violence. The pattern continues: When girls are perpetrators they are given excuses, when boys are victims they are ignored and minimized.
Reporting oddities When you look closely at the section about girls reporting more frequent perpetration of violence in relationship you notice something very odd. Look at the following paragraph and note the researchers choice of words. Note that girls "report" and boys*"admit" (emphasis mine):*

Page 74 More girls reported using physical violence against their partner than did boys; this represented a significant difference (x2 (1) = 60.804, p<.001). A quarter (n=148) of girls compared to 8 per cent (n=44) of boys stated that they had used some form of physical violence against their partner. Looking first at less severe physical violence (see table 10), the vast majority of girls (89 per cent) reporting the use of physical violence had used it once or a few times. Only a few (11 per cent) used it more frequently. Similarly, the small proportion of boys who admitted using physical violence also generally used it infrequently (83 per cent).

Perhaps the words "report" and "admit" have different meanings in Great Britain but here in the US they aren't usually the same. Report generally means to make a statement or announcement. The word admit however has a different spin. Often it has more to do with conceding or confessing. One assumption from the wording the researchers have chosen would be to think that they simply didn't believe what the boys reported. In other words they would only concede or admit to a certain amount of violence. Basically, implying that they are not telling the entire story. This is of course conjecture on my part but it simply seems like more anti-boy bias.

The Interview Section
As was previously explained the research had both a quantitative section and qualitative section. The qualitative section consisted of semi-structured interviews which included the utilization of five vignettes. The vignettes were stories that were told to the participant and then the stories relevance was discussed as a part of the interview. The stated goals of the researchers was to use the quantitative survey to gain data and use the interviews to enhance their understanding.

The researchers claimed that they had problems in getting participants for the interviews in the manner they had originally planned so they switched mid-stream to a different approach described below:

"We therefore moved to a system whereby researchers observed which young people seemed to be engaging with the survey. They then asked those young people if they would like to take part in the interview stage."

So they hand picked the interview participants based on their own subjective impression of whether the young person was "engaging with the survey." This sounds to me to be a direct invitation to a very biased sample. Then you find out that the choices they made of those who were "engaging in the survey" were 62 girls but only 29 boys. You also find that of the 29 boys only one had experienced being a victim of non reciprocal violence in relationship! Makes you wonder about their ideas of "engaging in the survey." Needless to say the boys section describing the interviews was only 22 pages long while the section about the girls was over 60 pages. Even with such a short section for the boys most of the writing was about boys violence not their reaction to being victims of violence. Girls victimization was highlighted as was boys violence. Even in the section on boys as victims.

The Vignettes

When I first started looking at the issue of this survey I emailed the folks at NSPCC and asked for a copy of the original questionnaire and copies of the vignettes. They were kind enough to email me both. I had suspected that the vignettes would be slanted towards the girls and so I was not surprised to see that the stories were mostly about boys possessiveness, shouting, name calling, violence, and sexual pressuring. Only one story of the five portrayed the female as the perpetrator and in that story the perpetrated act was very mild. The girl (and her cronies) stole the boys cell phone, made unkind comments the next day and then apologized. In the other vignettes we see boys being violent or pushing girls into sexual behaviors that they don't want. In one we see the girls using violence, but in self defense. To the researchers credit the first three vignettes have questions following the story which ask if this sort of behavior might also exist in the opposite sex. Inexplicably they omit that important question on the final two vignettes which focus on sexual demands. This is highly suspect and leads one to guess that their ideological bias may have disallowed them to see boys as sexual victims and/or the girls as perpetrators. Interestingly their data from the full report shows that girls freely admit to sexually pressuring their male boyfriends so this again leaves us wondering why they would avoid the question in the interview section.
Would the researchers tolerate a set of vignettes that showed 80% of the perpetrators to be female and the only male perpetrator was portrayed as having stolen a cell phone and then apologized? I would bet we would hear loud rants about inclusiveness and marginalization and they would be correct! It seems to me that these vignettes seriously marginalized the boys in this survey and likely left them feeling misunderstood and left out since their situations were simply not portrayed, acknowledged or included.
I was thinking that an alternative to these five stories could have easily been to keep the five stories as is but for the girls tell the story with female victims and male perpetrators and for the boys use the same stories but do the opposite and tell it from the boys perspective. It would take a little bit of editing but I think it would have been much more effective and would have left both boys and girls with a sense that their side of the story was heard and understood to exist. Victims are much more likely to come forward when they see that their plight is acknowledged. Maybe a possibility would have been to use neutral names for all parties in the stories and therefore not even know the sex of the offender or victim! Another option might have been to have six stories with three being male perpetrators and three being female perpetrators. One story each for the three categories of violence. I think any of the above would have been an improvement over what they used.
The fact that girls were portrayed in four of five vignettes more as victims and boys more as perpetrators and that any suggestion about girls perpetration of sexual pressuring was absent seems to be more evidence that the project has been impacted by an ideology that prefers to see women/girls as victims and men/boys as perpetrators. If we allow this sort of bias to continue in our midst we are failing both our boys and our girls. If we allow it to continue in social science research literature then we are surely in trouble.

Recommendation Section

Here's a brief look at the recommendations section of the executive summary. There is only one paragraph in the recommendation section that mentions boys. Here it is:

Impact of teenage partner violence – the gender divide

The impact of partner violence is indisputably differentiated by gender; girl victims report much higher levels of negative impact than do boys. This is not to imply that boys' experiences of victimisation should be ignored. It may be that boys minimise the impact of the violence due to the need to portray a certain form of masculinity. However, although intervention programmes should ensure that the needs of both girls and boys are recognised, it is important that the wider experiences of girls remain a focus. In addition, boys' minimisation of their own use of violence – by dismissing it as "messing around" and justifications based on mutual aggression – needs to be challenged.

This paragraph is baffling. Let's break it down. Here is the first section:

The impact of partner violence is indisputably differentiated by gender; girl victims report much higher levels of negative impact than do boys. This is not to imply that boys' experiences of victimisation should be ignored.

It first makes a claim that partner violence is differentiated by gender and that girls experience more negative impact, implying that boys should be ignored. Then they deny that they mean to ignore boys.

It may be that boys minimise the impact of the violence due to the need to portray a certain form of masculinity.

They offer a possibility for an explanation.

However, although intervention programmes should ensure that the needs of both girls and boys are recognised, it is important that the wider experiences of girls remain a focus

Then they ignore their own explanation and aver that the "wider experiences of girls" (whatever that means) should take precedence.

In addition, boys' minimisation of their own use of violence – by dismissing it as "messing around" and justifications based on mutual aggression – needs to be challenged.

Then they finalize things by saying that the emphasis on boys should be their violence and especially their minimization of their own violence as has been previously discussed.
I find this paragraph to be very vague and unclear. I am guessing this is intentional since what they really want to say is likely girls are worthy victims and boys are not is hard for them to put into words since it would clearly leave them looking bigoted. Being vague and obfuscating is a much safer strategy and it still gets the job done! One thing is clear after reading it: The reader is sure that for whatever reasons, girls need to get the lions share of services and help and boys need to shape up!

Is the ideology of the researchers driving their focus on girls?

If you look at this from purely a marketing standpoint these researchers have accomplished a remarkable feat. They have been able to create a document that has been labelled a "study" which has found objective data and then made conclusions and recommendations that ignore their own data. They took it a step farther and got the conclusions and recommendations printed in a vast number of media articles which established to millions of viewers, listeners and readers that their "half-stories" were actually facts. Truly amazing when you think about it.
One can only assume that the researchers are aging feminists who are addicted to the outdated and disproven idea that domestic violence is simply dominated by males who batter and women who are victims. We have seen from the Straus article how grossly inaccurate that ideology has been and the extent to which its adherents would go to propagate such mis-information.
I have always thought that science was designed to gather data and then use that data to adjust your theory and ideology based on the new discoveries and information. It seems to me in this case that rather than science being used to shift ones ideology it is the ideology that is governing science and determining which data should come forward and which not. This is very dangerous ground for humanitarians and those who want the best for all.
In the case of this study it seems likely that the researchers had a pre-conceived idea that girls were victims and boys the perpetrators. When their own data didn't affirm such stereotypical assumptions they strained to find a way to convert their data into a message that was harmonious with their pre-conceived ideas about violence (girls are worthy victims and boys are perpetrators). This was done by making the repeated claims that girls are more impacted by the violence and because of this the girls needed to be the focus of attention and services. This claim is hollow and anemic. Most any thinking person can look at that idea and see that because one group gets more upset by a problem that in itself should not negate some victims from getting services and attention.

There were so many parts of this study that seemed misandrist to me that I literally could have written another twenty or thirty pages. I will spare the reader such a burden and leave it to others to have a detailed look and make their own comments. Leave it to say that this study is a shining example of the evils of letting an ideology steer research and the resulting public services and the manner in which the general public is brainwashed by hearing only half the story.

I think that this study also shows the dangers involved in allowing ideological zealots a platform to intentionally mold public opinion to their own version of what is real. We need to use caution when accepting studies as being "scientific" and have a much finer net to discover which studies may be biased due to the ideological underpinnings of its authors. Frankly, any high school science student should be able to read this study and explain clearly how it is lacking. Our media and our governments are sorely failing to do just that.

Men's human rights Australia: Barry Williams

Dean Esmay · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the wonderful news that misandrist Prime Minister Julia Gillard has been fired from her job as head of the Australian government, it seems a perfect time to introduce you all to the most amazing Australian you never heard of: Barry Williams.

A few weeks ago I interviewed Barry for the Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey show. However the interview ran far longer than I intended–he was just that fascinating–and we have not wound up using it in Erin's show yet. I instead put it on my YouTube channel with the intention of writing up an article and putting it here on A Voice for Men instead, whenever I managed to have time to write it, so I could explain to everybody why you should find this man interesting.

Why should you find Barry Williams interesting? Well listen to this interview and you'll see. We talk about his history of being a victim of domestic violence, a single father raising multiple children without any support from the government or his violent alcoholic wife, supporting those kids by himself even after sustaining a crippling injury, his improved relationships later on in life with his children's mother, his history of doing a hunger strike in front of Parliament House in Canberra there in the Australian Capital Territory, his interactions with multiple Australian Prime Ministers and other government ministers and opposition leaders over the last 40 years, the organization he built called the Lone Fathers Association, his lifelong efforts to help battered men, his being the only registered Federal lobbyist in Australia who speaks to men's issues, how the Australian government treats men and boys today versus decades ago, his work with various government ministers and opposition party leaders, his work with various court magistrates and officials, and more. His Lone Fathers Association may just be the largest and most successful men's aid society in the world, even though they continue to struggle to find any recognition or support.

But here, listen to our interview and see for yourself:

The funny thing about Barry is just how disarming he is. When you talk to him, he sort of comes off as a genial, slightly rambly, moderately incoherent guy who's just a little out of his depth.

I said he comes off that way.

In reality, once you actually start listening to the man, he's as smart as anyone you'll ever come across who works on men's and boys' issues, and he has accomplished more in this area than anyone I have ever met. When you start listening to his story, and what he's accomplished over the last four decades, and what he's still doing, you'll be completely humbled: it is entirely possible that no one in the world has done more to help men and boys than this one man. And no, I'm not exaggerating in the slightest.

Barry is so disarming and so offhand in his manner of speaking, I did not even notice just how much he was saying while I was talking to him. It was only in going back and editing the interview for clarity and reviewing it a second time that I noticed his amazing habit of making seemingly offhand comments, when he was actually rattling off four or five absolutely fascinating bits of history and factual information at once, in a virtual blizzard of information and insights. You could write a book about everything he says in this interview. Indeed, I recommend listening to this interview once, then, thinking about it a bit, and going back to listen to it again. You may even want to take notes.

This is a man who's known multiple Australian Prime Ministers, has received awards and recognition from the President of the United States and the heads of other governments, and he talks to you like he's just some bloke having a beer and discussing the latest football match on television.

It is arguable that today's men's movement stands on the shoulders of giants like Barry Williams, and it is important that we recognize, honor, and yes, even revere them.

I post this interview today in celebration of the ousting of one of the most hateful politicians of our time, former Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard. May she keep her promise to resign from government entirely, and may she never come back. In response to this great news, I called Barry early this morning American time (late last evening Australian time) for his reaction to Gillard's ousting, and while Barry is strictly nonpartisan and tries hard to work with members of any and all government officials regardless of party, he has some blunt assessments of the Gillard government's treatment of men and boys, and how her Labour Party has stacked up next to their primary opposition, the Liberals. You'll want to listen to this interview too; Labour politicians should note that Barry may be telling you why your party's in trouble, and Liberal politicians may want to listen and notice what can happen to you if you allow hateful feminist ideology to bully and intimidate your party:

Beyond that, all I have to say is:
Aussie Aussie Aussie! Oy! Oy! Oy!

Fusk You SRS!

Hannah Wallen · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Max Read was the first Gawker writer to point out reddit's big fusking problem.
What is fusking? Well, Fusking is extracting images from a webpage, usually a free photoserver.
What is Reddit? It is currently the biggest news sharing social media site on the web where users submit content and discuss it. Think coffee shop with a bulletin board posted over with news clippings.
What is Gawker? It's a tabloid news site. Think rest room stall graphiti except more insane.

Wow, 8000… that's like, .0001% of the world's estimated population!

Gawker broke the nude-photo-fusking-on-Reddit on August 8, 2012, explaining how the crafty fuskers in one particular "subreddit" (an area of reddit devoted to a particular topic) were harvesting nude images which women had posted of themselves on Photobucket, where they assumed the images would be private. Of course, if the user actually set her album to private, the image will not show on Reddit, and the subreddit's fusking users would not be able to see it–but that is beside the point apparently.
Photobucket's administrators did not put up with the association of their name with this shady fusking practice. A takedown notice was sent, and the subreddit was removed. Problem solved, right?
Well, no. Not exactly. The users figured out that the effective objection was the use of Photobucket's name. The sub returned, with a new name excluding the word Photobucket, and the practice of surreptitious posting from photobucket albums continued, though now with a new rule dictating the posters go the "no fusking" way. The difference? Well, possibly none, really. How would the moderators actually know, unless they are told?

What an interesting and catchy headline!

While many individuals may immediately shake their heads and point out that anyone who cares whether nude images of themselves might leak onto the open web and be seen by others could and should simply refrain from creating them and sharing them online, for a short time, Gawker's writers decided the practice was a big fusking deal… at least enough for a second story, within which the CEO of Photobucket is quoted as stating that some 50 private accounts had been fusking violated. While Reddit isn't directly blamed for that, the statement is placed in conjunction with the only mention the new sub's No Fusking rule.
Needless to say, the outrage against this fusking invasion of privacy was huge, with Reddit's feminist activists taking… uh…project… uh…
Nothing. Nada. Kaput. There was no specific project, little effort, bare outrage. In a conspicuous inaction I think I'll call Fusk You, Photobuckettes, the femosphere seems to have gone strangely silent on the sub… and nothing was done about its existence.
So what were the Feminist Thought Police of Reddit working on that was more important than addressing the surreptitious pilfering of private nude photos for public display? What was a bigger deal than that? What idea was more upsetting to the denizens of the "fempire?"

Here's a New, Totally Legal Reddit Hub Devoted to Creep Shots

Katie J.M. Baker

A new Reddit hub, r/creepshots, celebrates the right to secretly snap photos of unsuspecting women — many of whom are obviously underage — and post them on the internet for all to see. Disgusting? Obviously. But it's also 100% legal.

FOLLOW JEZEBEL

For that we have to go back in time a bit… to an article posted by Jezebel's Katie J.M. Baker.
(Don't know what Jezebel is? It's tabloid Gawker's feminist Armada.)
The article laments the ability of individuals with camera phones to photograph (clothed) people in public places and share those photos on reddit without anyone's permission. While it is grudgingly acknowledged in the fifth paragraph that the activities of the subreddit's photographers weren't illegal, Baker spends the rest of the article decrying the practice with emphasis on images focusing on body parts, and shots from "strategic angles" which show undergarments… kinda like those shown in Gawker writer Maureen O'Connor's Upskirt post chronicling the deliberate and accidental nudity of Lindsay Lohan… because apparently, it's only okay when Gawker does it.
Since r/creepshots is down, there is no way to judge for yourself how benign or pervy these photos are, right? I mean, you can't see any of them, so how would you know? Well, you can see one. Jezebel was kind enough to highlight teen_in_grocery_store in a post, and clicking on it still leads to the imgur file..

Oh, the horror, that one's exposed legs might be seen by people when one wanders through areas open to the public while wearing shorts! Such an abuse must not be tolerated. To arms! To arms! Er, or legs. Whatever.

While this is not the most offensive image r/creepshots had to offer (or even offensive at all,) it is fairly representative of what I found upon checking out the thread to see what the big deal was. I learned that apparently, the big deal is that feminists treat looking at people as a form of sexual assault.
Inspired by Jezebel's feminist myth-making, the subreddit Shit Reddit Says(r/srs) created Project Panda to target subreddits that post shots of women in public.

If Jezebel is Gawker's feminist Armada, r/srs is Jezebel's Marines. Except replace honor, integrity and duty with self-righteousness, double standards and white-knighting. Plus a fat bird for a symbol. Apt, since all they do is drop flying turds. They also title themselves the "fempire."

Shit Redit Says' list of disapproved subs was fairly long, including everything from subreddits dedicated to candid shots in public areas to subreddits dedicated to specific sports (because women should be encouraged to participate in sports, but dear God, no one should ever watch us compete!). On the list was the subreddit dedicated to the secret harvesting of nude photos from unsuspecting Photobucket users. Also included was the notorious (due to much exaggeration) /r/creepshots. Conspicuously absent from that list was any subreddit dedicated to female voyeurism of males.

In other words, guys… the "fempire" says you can't look at us, but we're allowed to creep on you all we want. Nya, nya, nya, dudes. And that's not sexist at all, right?

Included in the lament was the complaint that some forums "are hidden and invite only which makes it impossible to know how many actually exist." Oh, poor ShitRedditSays – so disheartened by the knowledge that something you abhor might exist online and you don't have the opportunity to seek it out whine about seeing it.

Project Panda continued, with SRS (ShitRedditSays) members and the rest of reddit's self-titled "fempire" compiling lists of disapproved redditors and subreddits, and generally raising a huge fuss over their offense at the knowledge that some people guys might be looking at other people gals without permission. Much attention was garnered by the effort within the gender-attentive parts of the reddit community… so why wasn't this huge movement mentioned in Jezebel's initial article?

Simple. The article predates the outrage at r/shitredditsays. The majority of members hadn't even noticed the voyeur subreddits until after Jezebel ran an article about it. In fact, you can see from Andy Manly's comment that the first attempt to even address the issue occurred on the same day as the first Jezebel article was published.

Reddit's administrators did not cater to the whims of the "fempire" by bringing the ban hammer down on everything they wanted gone. In response, r/shitredditsays went into overdrive with a little noticed and highly ineffective campaign against their parent site, complete with efforts to contact media outlets and even Reddit's advertisers. Another article appeared on Jezabel, this time praising the efforts of r/shitredditsays with the headline "Reddit Users Go Rogue, Revolt Against Sick Child Porn Forums."

The first half of the post is dedicated to ridiculing reddit in general, followed by a list of the offending subreddits, and a description of the Project Panda effort to bring them all down. Highlighted in the story is a quote from one redditor encouraging others to contact and manipulate the members of churches and local parent-teacher associations, as well as administrators at universities, and to contact media outlets with the story. The quote finishes with an excited tone, "Do you know how BORING local news is? Can you imagine if your local news could run a "IS YOUR CHILD POSTING IN A PEDOPHILE WEBSITE? STATISTICALLY THERE'S AN 80% CHANCE!" story? Holy shitballs they'd be all over it."

Here, we have our first taste of ego-centric sensationalism in the story: redditors planning to use exaggerated to fictional scare tactics on parents and teachers as a means of attacking disapproved posting by fellow redditors.

Up to this point, the effort was largely about censorship. The SRS outcry over voyeur subreddits included a mix of legitimate complaints and hyperbole. Images of teens in school were protested side by side with photographs of adults. The group tossed around descriptive words in discussion to associate negative connotations with the subreddits they disapprove. Subjective terms and phrases like creepy, sexualized, quazi-pornographic, predatory, and sexually suggestive were applied to photos of clothed people in ordinary circumstances, like this image from one of the demonized subs:

Reality check: Is it illegal for an adult to look at an ordinary, clothed photo of a teen? No. Was posting photos like the above illegal? No. Was the choice by some redditors to take photos at school and post them online something that should have been addressed in this manner? No. That is an issue for school administrators to address with the students directly, an action which would have followed a properly executed awareness campaign, had one been used.
Were there aspects of these subs which deserved Project Panda's attention?
Absolutely.

> Case 3: Weagleweaglewde
> Now we come to the most disturbing case of all. This user has submitted a picture of a girl 13 days ago entitled, [24] "Hot senior chick in one of my classes". Notice the perspective of the picture. This person is sitting in front of the class, right where the teacher is usually located. Strange, huh?
> But maybe Weagleweaglewde is just another student? [25] Nope, he's [26] definitely not a student.

This was actually worth addressing. As the originator of this post, SpencerTracyMorgan (creep shamer extraordinaire, according to the flair that shows up on r/shitredditsays) says in the text, Weagleweaglewde was in position of power – a teacher, in charge of classrooms. Publishing photos of his students online was an abuse of that power. Those involved in Project Panda were right to hone in on that lead and pursue it.
The situation came to a head when a student at a Georgia high school recognized fellow students, figured out who was posting, and alerted school administrators, leading to the teacher's subsequent firing as well as a criminal investigation. A rule on r/creepshots was posted stating that no photos of minors were to be posted; only images of adults were acceptable, and violentacrez, an experienced moderator of similar subs, was brought in to ensure the content was limited to legal images which fit within that rule.
That sounds like a victory. The concerned citizens of Reddit addressed a legitimate issue within the community and inspired a shady subreddit to clean up its act. Time to move on to the next target, possibly to address Reddit's serious fusking problem, right?

Well, no. Not exactly.
Jezebel's post on the successful removal of the creep-shot teacher was more of a complaint about the continued existence of the forum. As if the distinction of legality were irrelevant, author Erin Gloria Ryan blazed past the victory into a feminist rant insinuating that the admonition that public places are public equals an assertion that women are public property.
And what was the response of reddit's feminist population to the change at r/creepshots? Was there a decision to celebrate the victory and move on to another subreddit, where further attention may be needed?
No.

The "fempire's" next step was doxxing, or the publication of one's personal or identifying information online. A tumbler thread was launched for the purpose of compiling and publicizing information on posting members of Reddit's most hated forums, including their real names, other social network profile information, where they live, and any other information the thread's creator could obtain. Also included on the thread is one of Paypal's donate buttons. Doxxing for dollars – sounds like a great name for a new game show.
And of course, on October 10, another Jezebel post was published to cheer "Samantha," (not her real name) guaranteed to steer traffic to her thread.

Shut down creepshots… because now, it was no longer about real predatory behavior, no longer about images of underage girls. It was about control, and about punishing redditors for publishing content which "Samantha" and other reddit feminists do not approve, regardless of whether or not it was actually criminal. Baker's post also introduced a new element to the story – a direct threat to one of the subreddit's moderators – in a link to what appears to be a forwarded message containing a threat and demands.

I'm going to have to bow to their requests. Sorry, not worth the trouble
It's over.

Hello
Please don't go to the trouble of denying your identity. We have archived a great deal of evidence to confirm it.
Today you have a choice between two options.
Option 1
*Shut down r/creepshots. *Unmod all the other moderators. *Delete every submission. *Delete your own creepshots from Imgur. *Leave only one post up: a public apology from you to the women of Toronto and to women in general for what you've been doing. The apology should acknowledge that r/creepshots is a vile subreddit because it normalizes perverted behavior. *After a day or so, make this account moderator. Make the subreddit private. Remove yourself and delete the CreeperComforts account. *Never post creepy pictures online again. *Just don't take creepy pictures anymore.
Option 2.
Use your imagination.
We advise you to choose option 1. Clean up your mess, change your behaviour, and move on with your life.
You have 48 hours to decide.

Also linked in the article was a shitredditsays meta post reminding users that doxxing is bad and lamenting their sub's bad public relations problem.
Coincidentally, that same day, SRS celebrated the takeover of r/violentacrez, calling it "the Fempire's new sub dedicated to calling out reddit's many pedos and pedo apologists."
This combination made it very difficult for other redditors to accept the story that r/shitredditsays had nothing to do with the doxxing threat, or later the doxxing of violentacrez, even after we learned that the blackmail image was from a message sent to another mod, not violentacrez.

On October 12, Adrian Chen published a post on Gawker disclosing violentacrez's real name, the type of business for which he worked, and the state in which he lives. The post sensationalized and expanded every negative characteristic Chen could attribute to violentacrez, even going so far as to pair the image of his face in a red monotone alongside the zombified version of the reddit alien which violentacrez has been selling on t-shirts. The post was a combined biography and indictment of the persona and history of Reddit's violentacrez, with potshots taken at not just him, but also at reddit's administrators, and the overall moderation system.
Chen also described knowing the effect his decision was going to have on the life of the man behind violentacrez, stating that Brutsch told him that he'd lose his job, and that his wife was disabled. He pointed out that his enemies would "start attaching lies to his name because they simply don't like his views." Chen admits in the article that the conversation shook him up. However, it didn't stop him from going through with the dox. Buried in the depths of the article, near the end, he excuses his damaging, personal attack on Brutsch with references to creepshots and a questionable age reference, as if claiming an altruistic motive for the act.
Given Gawker's propensity for similar behavior, I highly doubt that is the case.
On October 15th, Chen published another post, in which he briefly reiterated his assertions about Brutsch, gloated over the fact that his original post had, in fact, resulted in job loss for Brutsch, and then went on to whine about the choice of a number of subreddit moderators to boycott Gawker over the dox.
On October 16th, Chen published another post containing a statement to reddit's moderators and administrators from Reddit CEO Yishan Wong, interspersed with some of Chen's own thoughts.

The New Thought Police

According to the post, Wong's entire take on the issue revolves around the use of the term "free speech" to justify inaction on all points in the controversy (outside of that which keeps Reddit on the acceptable side of the law.) The administrators are expected to not ban what Wong refers to as "distasteful content," meaning that regardless of the stated motives of Gawker's writers and Reddit's "fempire," in the long run, their efforts (and in particular, the choice to dox) have accomplished nothing. Even with the violentacrez persona gone, there will continue to be content on reddit which the "fempire" finds offensive.
Except, well, that isn't entirely the case. The administrators have banned some distasteful content. Subreddits begun to replace r/creepshots have all disappeared within days of their creation, even though the content is not illegal, but merely distasteful. It appears that contrary to Wong's statement, at least some content is being censored on that basis. However, voyeur and porn subs with women as the target audience are still all up and running.
Chen also quotes Wong as coming out against the multi-mod boycott of Gawker, with reasons ranging from warning of bad public relations ("gawker exposes creepster; reddit engages in personal vendetta to defend pedophile," an assessment which glosses over the fact that while creepster may have accurate connotations, pedophile is not a fair description of violentacrez) to the assertion that the ban would have little impact on Gawker's traffic. Finally, Wong is quoted as further stating reddit's commitment to free speech, pointing out that "opponents have the right to write about us." He goes on to say that while reddit's administrators do consider doxxing a form of violence, and reddit enforces an anti-dox policy on site, "we can only affect the opinion of others outside of reddit via moral suasion and setting an example." He names journalism as a form of speech that reddit will not ban, and asks that mods explain if they disagree.
I disagree, not that journalism is a form of speech that deserves to be protected, but that Gawker's content can in any way be defined as journalism following this incident.
This occurred after Gawker hosted feminist blog Jezebel stirred up outrage by falsely inflating and demonizing the nature of subreddits which the writers and their feminist readers disapproved because they involved men looking at women and because women as a group were not in control of that behavior. The resulting brouhaha was rooted in a serious, compelling, and frequently discussed men's rights issue: The denigration of male sexuality. While not everything within the controversy can apply to every man, the pared down, unvarnished reality is that the basis for targeting creepshots and by extension violentacrez was that the target audience for the sub was men. There was no equal outrage (or any, that I saw) over similar subs with a female target-audience… and while some women of reddit may rationalize with statements as to how the lady-voyeur subreddits are nicer about it, when broken down to the bare truth those subreddits are still voyeur subs… which didn't even register on Gawker's radar.

The creepshots controversy was exacerbated and further escalated by feminist redditors both contributing and reacting to the initial posturing, largely within the context of their own sexist attitudes toward men.
Then, Gawker's Adrian Chen capitalized on that artificially inspired, Gawker-influinced, falsely inflated outrage by deliberately mischaracterizing the content of several of the subs VA modded (including those he did not even create) and associating that mischaracterization with VA's real name – simultaneously assassinating VA's reputation and personal privacy and by association, his family's financial welfare for nothing more than page views, (1,393,135, a paltry sum compared to Max Read's 7,251,262 views from his voyeuristic exploitation of Kate Middleton's boobs) and the only reason Chen got any support for his actions is that his target was a man. The site used reddit's true sexism against its own members. The "fempire" and its fans got played big time by Gawker.
Baker and Chen used the core ideology of feminism to fuel manufactured indignation over an inflated issue, manipulated them into an outraged frenzy of calls for doxxing. Gawker dramatized that, and then delivered… all to garner page views for ad revenue. And those pharisaical, fractious twits fell for it because they were more eager to be victorious than virtuous.
And while all of the creepshots-themed subreddits with their clothed photos of people in public are down… the "no-fusking" fusking sub is still there.
Whether intended to be so or not, the doxxing of violentacrez and several creepshots subscribers was a direct attack on the speech of redditors by Gawker's writers. In building, stoking, inflating, and exploiting the controversy over r/creepshots, violentacrez, and the other subs he moderated, culminating with the doxxing articles, Gawker's writers have communicated to other internet users some very specific threats.
They have told us that they can manipulate public opinion unchecked by fact, because their readers do not bother to look for themselves. They have told us that they can lie about us and be believed, because those among our own fellow redditors who may disagree with us will repeat those lies until the lies become common "knowledge." They have told us that they can create distorted characterizations of us, and through promotion on their blogs, enforce those characterizations upon our reputations. They have told us they can raise lynch mobs against individuals they do not like.
They have told us that they're willing to use those capabilities to control our online activity. They have shown us they will use those methods to censor our speech to suit their approval.
Essentially, they have told us that Gawker will now be your content editors; don't post anything the writers of Gawker disapprove, or you will be attacked, slandered, and publicly sacrificed, just like violentacrez. The site is now in position to act as an Inquisitor Haereticae Pravitatis with Chen waiting to jump into action at the behest of the "fempire's" hysterical finger-pointing… or the promise of web traffic… whichever comes first.
(Oh, and if you're wondering, "Shitlord" is what srs calls anyone who disagrees with them or their methods.)

Mr Whippy

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Mr. Whippy was the ice-cream man and when I heard the sounds of Green Sleeves in the air all the clocks froze. I would pluck the rubber plug from beneath the paper mache elephant that kept the loose change and shake it like I was using a jackhammer.

I knew the best way to cut him off at the pass was to run diagonally through the park and meet him at the corner where the big tree dropped gumnuts around Mrs Purnell's tin pink flamingo. She despised that and scolded you for it when you saw her, but that story is for a different time.

When he rounded the corner the wake of kids dancing on the street behind him reminded me that god never lived in church because he lived on wheels. His van always stopped exactly where I stood. It was a wheezy metal horse painted in pink and blue with hand painted illustrations of five sorts of ice-creams and I swear I could almost hear angels sing when that roller door clattered open. The smell of the vanilla and the diesel would weld me to the shimmering bitumen and he'd lean over the speckled bench with a smile.

"Whadda ya want mate?"

It was not easy glancing at the face of god so I'd look at his hairy arms instead and read the tattoo that said, "Annie".

"I'll have vanilla please."

Watching him pull back the lever to see the contents fill the cone was hypnotic. The fantasy remains with me to this day where I'd squat beneath the nozzle of that machine and open my mouth to gorge from it.

Every Saturday afternoon it was the same. The kids would wander off with their prize, the roller door would shut and the music would start again as he wound his way down the streets whooping up his little disciples. He knew they'd come to him in swathes that the Pied Piper could never match and he was right. Then it all changed one Saturday.

I waited for Green Sleeves, and when the sun went crimson and dipped behind Mount Table I knew something was wrong. The next week I walked through the park and waited for him in the usual spot and Mrs Purnell came out of the house and cackled from behind her fly screen door.

"He's gawn. They got 'im so you better get yer ice-creams from the shops instead."

For the next three Saturdays I waited at that corner for him. I ached to hear the sound of his van and I waited while the heat surrendered to longer shadows before it was time to leave. Dinner would be waiting for me at home and I asked about him.

"What happened to Mr. Whippy?"

Dad said, "He's come a gutser mate. The papers say he's been bad." [1]

I heard Green Sleeves again and ran to my usual place but he was not there. I listened and knew he'd be at the end of the street around the corner at the top of the hill and I rushed there to make it in time to see the roller door open up.

A young woman looked down at me and asked me what I wanted. Who was this person who had flung god from the world?

"Where's Mr Whippy?"

"Mate. He's not coming back because I'm doing the rounds now."

The van had new words on it that said, "Under new management" and the illustrations had been replaced with glossy enamel paint. They looked good but they were my traitors. I wanted no part of this and I stepped back while the other kids crowded around the bench holding up their coins.

A woman with a child in a papoose came to the window and smiled.

"Sorry about what happened Annie. I know it's rubbish what they did."

She looked back at her and her eyes were broken with pain.

"It's rubbish alright, and it's rubbish what they say about dad. He's always got kids around him on the rounds. So how could he ever get one in here without any of them seeing?"

Julia Gillard, feminist hatemonger: YOU'RE FIRED!!

Paul Elam and Dean Esmay · 26 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Jim Muldoon, and quite a few other Australians, are going to be surprised. Pleasantly, we think.
News is breaking this morning (late evening Australian time) that Australia's ruling Labor Party has had a leadership challenge in the lead-up to September's elections and in a fairly rare move in Australian politics, the Prime Minister has been informed that she is no longer Prime Minister by her own party.
Although the news is still breaking and reports are not detailed, you will no doubt find updates on why this professional misandrist, Emily's List puppet and propagandist extraordinaire was given the boot flooding the newswires in the days ahead.
There will likely be a great deal of speculation (and more than a bit of whining) about her ouster. Copious palaver and babble about her being a victim of misogyny are all but assured. In fact, we would be very surprised if Skype pings aren't already sounding little like popcorn machines for the writers of Jezebel and the once relevant feministing.com. Gillard's shit-canning comes just on the heels of her driving male votes away in droves with a week of intense finger-pointing and doing what feminists do best – calling anyone who disagrees with them a misogynist.
Let us repeat that again, just because it sounds so good. and because it is IMPORTANT. Julia Gillard, Australia's first female prime minister, alienates male voters with large doses of feminist victim-speak and man-blaming, and then finds herself out on her ass after a significant drop in support from male voters.
American, Canadian, European men, are we learning something here?
While her ouster is a complicated matter that even involves some measure of political revenge, the connection to a decreasing tolerance for feminist dogma is all but certain.
Nielsen pollster John Stirton as much as said the male-bashing had put a real dent in Gillard's support among men, and he recognizes this as something new on the political landscape.
"It is something I haven't really seen before – one gender has broken against Labor quite dramatically," he told ABC Radio, adding, "I am assuming the events of last week have something to do with that – the various gender speeches, accusations of misogyny, the menus and all that sort of thing have played out negatively among men."
Stirton's reference to "the menus" refers to a Liberal party fundraiser that featured a mock menu which joked about Ms Gillard's "small breasts" and "huge thighs."
Dean Esmay's recent interview with Australia's legendary Barry Williams, recorded and placed on YouTube a couple of weeks ago and scheduled for posting later today, may provide insights into some of what happened.
Gillard's government has been notorious for refusing to even listen to or meet with Australia's only registered family law lobbyist who speaks to men's issues, and her government has been directly responsible for the brutal incarceration and deaths of countless men, as Williams noted.
At press we talked to Williams, and he tells us this is great news for Australian fathers. The Gillard government has been simply horrible for Australian fathers and while he has no confidence that Rudd will be a lot better he hopes this will help him in upcoming meetings he has with the Australian judiciary. He is also convinced that if there is a victory by the Liberal Party in September he will be able to push through major improvements for fathers and families against ideological feminist governance.
Whatever the dynamics are behind this story and no matter what the future impact on Australian politics may be, the fact that is an anti-misandric political first is worth our careful attention. We are not rolling out the "mission accomplished" banner just yet, but it is a start.
We would also like to end this with a simple and sincere message for the departed Gillard.
Good-bye.

Feminist Gay-Bashing

Jim Doyle · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Have you noticed how much hatred feminists direct at MGTOW guys? Is it just because they can't be bothered to distinguish between PUAs, MRAs and MGTOW or is there more to it? I think there is. I think if we look at feminism's record on gay men, the Ultimate MGTOW, we can see what's really going on.

A while ago I found out about the Redstockings, a radical feminist group founded in the late sixties. They had a nasty streak of man-hating gay-bashing and it wasn't incidental, it flowed from their basic premises. So maybe all their good was really no good at all. And they were not some fringe group and they were not the only feminists of their period to use gay-bashing rhetoric and weave man-hating and gay-bashing principles into their work. It turns out all kinds of very prominent feminists in the late '60s and early '70s went in for this kind of bigotry.

John Lauritsen gave a talk back in 1976 that lays this all out in great detail. He cites a widespread pattern of vilification of gay men and gay organizations by feminists of that time. Feminists conducted a campaign of disrupting gay events and undermining gay organizations. As they say, read the whole thing. It is a very ugly history. If you have never heard about it in your courses in Women's Studies, go back and ask why. Bring back the answers; I bet they will be hilarious.

Here he quotes Carol Hanisch where she explicitly enunciates the homophobic claim that male homosexuality and male separatism are misogynist. Oh that's it! It's all about the wimminz!

> "Men's liberationists always bring up 'confronting their own feelings about men' by which they mean homosexuality. Male homosexuality is an extension of the reactionary club (meaning both group and weapon). The growth of gay liberation carries contempt for women to the ultimate: total segregation. The desire of men to 'explore their homosexuality' really means encouraging the possibility of homosexuality as a reaction against feminist demands. This is the reason the movement for "gay rights" received much more support only after women's liberation became a mass movement."

There it is: men ignoring women is contempt. Even when we do nothing we are guilty of harming women, because we owe them attention and it is violence when we "deprive" them of it. Talk about a rape culture – they are entitled to our sexual attention.

So men have a duty to have sex with women and not with men. That is rape culture and it is feminists demanding it. Oh, and forced heterosexuality for men. Can you see the difference between these people and Sarah Palin or Rick Santorum? Me neither.

Or maybe there's no intention of there being any sex – men are just supposed to marry and support women – because they "deserve" it like all the advertising is constantly telling us. Female privilege much?

Lauritsen gives Kate Millett–author of "Sexual Politics" and, ironically, a lesbian separatist–special attention for her hatred of male relationships. She comes across as both stupid and dishonest. For instance she equates homosexuality and Nazism, which is an especially obscene piece of stupidity in view of the actual history, and a transparent piece of dishonesty in view of how well-known that history is.

He also details these feminists' hatred of drag queens, too. That hatred came as no surprise either.

This bigotry is not some little splinter thing in feminism. It is foundational. Millett's Sexual Politics was seminal to the movement and Hanish was a founding member of the radical wing of the movement. She edited the Redstockings Collective's book the Feminist Revolution and coined the phrase "the personal is political". These were not marginal people or marginal views. It's no good whining how feminism is not a monolith when every pebble of it shares this theoretical underpinning.

Speaking of the Redstockings, we are going to look at their manifesto in the next post on this subject. Even if you have never read it or even heard of it, none of it will be unfamiliar. You see it in every feminist space on the net and you hear it in every gender studies class.

Lauritsen says it best:

> "We must recognize our enemies wherever we find them. Nobody's ideas and nobody's actions should be exempted from criticism."

Gay men in solidarity with feminists against hetero men? That may be attractive to someone coming out of high school and all that trauma, but alliances with people who despise you are just sick.

From Stu to you

Stu · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So here we are, over half way through another quarterly fundraiser. For those of you who are regular readers, you probably know who I am, and after my opening sentence, you'll probably guess what this article is going to be about, and cringe.

I've been around in the MHRM, or MRM, whichever you prefer, on and off for many years. I remember reading Warren Farrell's Myth of Male Power a couple of years after it was released. I remember being on men's rights bulletin boards with my 1200/75 baud modem and commodore 64 back in the early 80s.

I've had a vision for over a decade. That vision is a men's movement that consists of a number of huge organisations of men and women, working together to push back against feminism's domination of gender issues, and the resulting legal ramifications for men.

I've watched men's groups come and go. Mostly torn apart by infighting and pissing contests over every conceivable thing from political views, sexuality, race, religion, even which football team one should support. I've watched while men attacked other men, instead of feminism. I've spoken to many MRAs over the years about my vision, only to be told again and again that it is a pipe dream, and that the way to go is many individuals and small groups each peddling their own personal views and opinions.

Well, that has not, and will not work. So if it is true that my vision is a pipe dream, then we shall have to wait until there is enough MGTOW snubbing their nose at the system to cause the collapse of civilisation. And long before that happens, many draconian measures will be enacted to force these lone wolves to prop up the system against their will. Man taxes, forced labor, increasing criminalisation of ordinary activities, all are on the radar, and no man alone, or as part of a small group will be able to successfully oppose these forces.

I have also watched these lone wolves and small groups talk much, and achieve little, and they never will, because they lack three things that are required for success, large numbers, cohesiveness, and money.

For those that feel that any sort of collectivism is the problem, let me ask you if you think a civilisation is a form of collectivism? What about a political party, a company, a military force, a football team? Do you think the members of any of these entities must feel the same way on every issue in order to function for their desired goal? Or do you think the members of these entities put aside certain differences of opinions on many issues for the sake of operating as a team to achieve a particular goal?

Imagine we are being attacked by an army (a collective force). This invading army is made up of many men, with many differing views on many things from political to personal. But for the purposes of achieving their goal, they work together, as a unit. Now imagine one of our politicians telling us that we don't need an army to oppose this invading force because all we need is for each of us to defend our own backyard individually, and only join forces with others that see things the same way as ourselves, everything from political to personal, to which football team is best.

You would say that politician is fucking crazy.

But this is exactly how many in the men's movement behave. We are in the trenches, with the enemy gaining ground, and many of us are calling for all the leftists, or all the libertarians, or all of those who say MHRM instead of MRM, to get the fuck out of the trenches and go away. This is exactly why the men's movement has not grown into a force to be reckoned with in the past.

To all the left leaning individuals who think AVFM is not left enough, therefore will not support it, and to all the right leaning, and libertarian individuals who think likewise, and to all those that will not support it because there are some individuals who have differing views on any particular issue, I ask you, what the fuck is it you want? What is your vision? Do you see a massive movement comprised of enough people to bring about change forming, who all have the same views as yourself?

Now that is a pipe dream.

We only need all our members to be united in one thing, and that is the opposition to feminism, and to fight for the rights of men and boys. Sure it would be nice if we could get a few billion people that all held the same political beliefs and agreed on everything from political to personal, but it is never going to happen.

AVFM has achieved a functional men's rights organisation comprised of individuals with differing political and personal views, more than any other I have been associated with. For all those who just can't resist knocking AVFM for not fully subscribing to all of your personal preferences and political views, or who believe that the model of a huge amount of individuals operating in isolation and doing their own thing is the way to go, just tell me what that has achieved in the past?
Even legends like Stardusk and Barbarossaa can never bring about and legal changes operating on this model. How many of these lone wolves have achieved things like AVFM have? I've watched for years as they come and go, while things like The Plan, VAWA, primary aggressor policies, title IX get enacted and reauthorised. No amount of articles written, or youtube videos recorded have made a dent in the feminism so far. And they never will, unless the fans of those writers and bloggers actually do something apart from read, watch, and give pep talks to each other.
I'll just list some of AVFM's more notable achievements over the past couple of years.
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- AVFM has essentially changed the dialogue about sexual politics. It has forced feminists to superficially acknowledge men's issues and to tone down the misandric rhetoric in their own writings. Feminists everywhere are at least bothering to lie about being concerned about men's issues. That was not happening before AVFM;
- AVFM has been instrumental in drawing media attention to the fact that a men's movement even exists. They are even making a movie about Paul and this website;
- AVFM played a big role in putting pressure on authorities in Maine to refer Mary Kellett for disciplinary action;
- AVFM played a pivotal role in getting Gordon Smith exonerated, ending the state terrorism in his life and his wife at least charged for false allegations;
- AVFM forced corrupt Judge Lori Jackson to recuse herself from a case she was running into the ground;
- AVFM forced the hands of hateful feminists in Toronto on several occasions, resulting in media coverage that sided with us and called the feminists shameful. It also resulted in a National Post article about the campus feminists that looked like it could have been written on this website;
- AVFM has joined forces with NCFM and they are working diligently to build the infrastructure to launch men's issues groups in universities across the US and Canada.

There is more, and of course none of this means that we have won the war. Progress is very slow, and hard fought, but AVFM is the only progress I have ever seen, and I have been watching this play out for a long time.
We aren't a political party, we are a men's rights organisation. Our job is to fight for the restoration of the rights of men and boys, which have been eroded by feminism. Our job, is to oppose anti-male sentiment, legislation, enforced chivalry, misandry, and therefore, feminism. Our job is to oppose legislation like the US VAWA, Australia's The Plan, and all legislation that treats men as second class, less deserving, or default criminals. It does not matter if an individual is left leaning, or right leaning because this is not a political party.
I oppose the political views of leftists, for example. I will vote against them, I will argue against them, in the appropriate forum, and at the ballot box. Here, in this forum, in the MHRM, all that matters is that that individual is opposing the things we are fighting against here. imagine your house is on fire. You call the fire department and a fire truck arrives to put your fire out. You notice that a few of the fire fighters are leftists. Do you scream at them to get off your property because you are a libertarian, or do you not worry about that persons political persuasions, and concern yourself only with whether they can do the job they are here to do. This person may be your political adversary, he may even support the wrong football team, but for the purposes of putting out your house fire, this person is your ally. And so it is with Christian and Atheist, straight and gay, black and white. Do you get it?

Whether you are left or right, straight or gay, black or white, AVFM is your men's rights organisation. We won't fight for your political beliefs, we won't change our sexual preferences to suit you, and we won't change the color of our skin to match yours, or support your preferred football team. But all we should have to do is fight for the rights of men and boys. Your right to your property, your income. Your right to due process. Your right to your children. Your rights in your home, at work etc. That is our job. It is not our job to become ideological clones of each other.

When you donate your money to AVFM it does not go to fight for a particular political party to be elected. It does not go to a gay rights organisation, or to the Black Panthers, or the Atheists, or the Church. And believe it or not, it doesn't get used to buy shoes and handbags for our female staff. It gets used to fund the fight for men's rights.

Time to cut to the chase. The current quarterly fundraiser is running slower than usual. As a blue collar wage slave who works hard and long for my money, and somebody who is one of AVFM's biggest financial contributors, and has also funded many other MRM individuals and projects outside of AVFM, I'm granting myself the right to comment on this issue, and tough shit if you don't like it, and even tougher shit if it strikes a nerve and makes you feel bad.

There are thousands of regular readers of AVFM now. Average daily visitors are well over ten thousand per day, and have been over seventy thousand at times. I realize that there are many MRAs out there who contribute with their work by penning great articles, making great videos, or contributing technical expertise, etc. I also realize there are many who are broke and barely making ends meet. This isn't directed at you. My beef is with the thousands of so called supporters, MRAs, who do bugger all except add commentary, and quite a lot of complaining really.

With the thousands of readers we have, if each of them donated a dollar per week, AVFM would be secure. And make no mistake about it, the reason AVFM hasn't achieved a lot more, is not lack of articles, or lack of comments, or lack of videos.

It is lack of money.

Earl Silverman spent years chasing funding for his shelter. He was telling people what he needed for years. There were plenty of articles being written, plenty of youtube vids being produced, plenty of commentary. No shortage of any of these things. What killed Earl Silverman's Shelter, and Earl Silverman, was lack of money. He was begging for it, and he never got it.

So how many times are you going to let this happen? How long are you going to sit there, waiting for someone else to provide the funding for the movement? And don't even bother giving me any of this "don't shame men" bullshit. Fuck that, men have got quite a bit to be ashamed about for letting things get to the stage they are at, and still sitting on their hands waiting for someone else to bail them out. And lets face it, that is most of us. Every fundraiser is the same, out of the thousands of viewers, there is a tiny fraction who cough up anything. Around half the money from every fundraiser is contributed by a handful of individuals.

So here is what I want all you guys who are not writing those great articles, or producing those magnificent youtube videos, or running a well-read blog, or contributing time and expertise to operations, and aren't already contributing money. And this is most of the readers. Go to the fucking donation button and send in a few bucks. Don't worry about who else is not doing it, don't think about how little difference your $5 or $10 will make, just do it.

It doesn't matter whether Paul Elam subscribes to your political views or not, or even whether you like or dislike him on a personal level. The fact is that AVFM is making the impossible start to be possible. AVFM is putting men's issues on the map.

We are pushing the issues into mainstream consciousness, in universities, and in the MSM. We have an award winning film crew planning a documentary on the MHRM, featuring AVFM. Why, because like it or not AVFM is the only men's movement there is. This documentary will be viewed by millions on TV screens over time, and will reach a massive audience of people who don't even know the MHRM, or MRM, exists.

No matter what your political leanings, or personal views, the first step to making men's rights an issue is to actually get the message out there and on the table being talked about. Once that happens, it will be a lot easier for anybody to talk about men's issues without the automatic ridicule and shouting down that usually goes with mentioning it now.

AVFM is the only thing in existence making that happen. Help us carry on with that work.

Interview with an intactivist in Kenya

Robert O'Hara · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, the African Circumcision Advisory Committee acquired a new member, Kennedy Owino, a Kenyan native. Owino is a member of The Intact Network and helps run its chapter in Kenya. Recently AVFM interviewed him in order to give readers an idea of just what is happening on the ground in Africa. What follows is a transcript of that interview.

Robert O'Hara: Tell us about yourself and the organization you work for, The Intact Network, and its Chapter in Kenya. How did you get involved in it?

Kennedy Owino: I was reading a local daily newspaper, The Standard, last year where the International AIDS conference which took place in the US was covered. It was reported in the paper with pictures of people who called themselves intactivists. The group was against male circumcision as a measure to prevent the spread of HIV/Aids, but instead advocated for condom use.

Robert O'Hara: Ok, so it was the issue of circumcision as a means to prevent the spread of HIV that got you interested? You were skeptical of its application as a preventative measure?

Kennedy Owino: Really, I got interested in the circumcision issue because it's being done to children and adults just in the town where I live. I belong to a Kenyan tribe that doesn't circumcise male children so this got me deeply interested in it

Robert O'Hara: So this is causing cultural tensions? Can you tell us more about different tribal customs and how this program is making things awkward?

Kennedy Owino: The mass male circumcision in Kenya is mostly being promoted to the tribe which was not originally circumcising, even though it's also done countrywide as well. The program makes the culturally circumcising tribes to look superior in that their cultural practice seems to have some sort of medical benefit. The uncircumcised men (LIKE ME) are currently undergoing stigmatization.

Robert O'Hara: I see. Tell us more about the organizations that are promoting the program and their tactics, obviously they are using social coercion and cultural division. What other methods and propaganda do they use?

Kennedy Owino: I know that the organization promoting mass male circumcision in my locality is called Nyanza Reproductive Health Society (NRHS). They have many pick up trucks which they use to ferry men and boys to and fro their clinics. Their campaigns are being taken to schools and some other people they have hired walk through the villages trying to "sell their product." Most of their employees work on a non-renewable contract basis, of around 6 months.

Robert O'Hara: How well compensated are these people? Above average pay for Kenya?

Kennedy Owino: The employees of HRHS are paid a lot of money, really above average. That's why seemingly my online attempt to enlighten Kenyans has hit a solid wall.

Robert O'Hara: So, there is more than ample evidence that the three studies done in Uganda, South Africa and in your country, Kenya, were flawed and there has been a lot of criticism directed at them from very credible sources like the South African Medical Journal and others. Is there any knowledge about this in the general population? When word of this gets out is it suppressed by the NHRS and groups like it?

Kennedy Owino: Really, the truth has to be suppressed. The medical benefit of circumcision is being promoted through the media and whenever the name WHO accompanies such ads you just feel how Africans react by making arrangements and appointments with doctors on how their school-going children can be circumcised.

Robert O'Hara: So the idea that the WHO is an overriding authority on all things medical is, alone, enough to get people flocking to circumcision clinics then?

Kennedy Owino: YES! I don't see any other major factor. People want AIDS out of Africa, and circumcision is the vehicle.

Robert O'Hara: I see, so it is the fear of AIDS that is making people so gullible in your opinion?

Kennedy Owino: Yes, really. The circumcision being promoted by NRHS, Ministry of Health, PEPFFAR, etc is for HIV/Aids to be kicked out of Africa, even some other "benefits" of circumcision like prevention of Human Pampilloma virus hygiene have also been quoted.

Robert O'Hara: To what extent are they saying that this is an effective preventative measure? The Randomized Controlled Studies purport it to provide a 60% reduction in the probability of contracting aids (even though we know that isn't true). Are they telling people that it is a silver bullet, so to speak, that will end the AIDS epidemic in Africa? Are they neglecting to tell people that condoms are still the best way to prevent AIDS if you are going to be sexually active?

Kennedy Owino: They say it does have the 60% protection rate, and also tell the circumcised men to use condoms. What they do not say is whether circumcision prevents male-female or female-male HIV transmission. So many married women do advise and convince their husbands to go for the cut thinking that it will protect them. However, what I've got here on the ground is that circumcised men do not like using condoms, circumcision seemingly is a bullet proof vest to them or others simply forget. Something horrible is already happening, I'm afraid the HIV rate will soon be on the rise.

Robert O'Hara: Information coming from Zimbabwe and Uganda already indicates that is the case. Tell me more about how gender and gender ideology come into play here. They are using the husband/wife dynamic to convince men to get circumcised. What about other gender relations pressures like telling women to shame men who aren't circumcised?

Kennedy Owino: I had a girlfriend in college in 2010.She was from one of the circumcising tribes. The day I told her that I'm not circumcised marked the beginning of the end of that relationship! Today most women, even those from uncircumcising tribes do not want to have a relationship with uncircumcised men.

Robert O'Hara: So you could say that they are targeting young women with their propaganda in to frighten them away from uncircumcised men and this in turn persuades men to get circumcised?

Kennedy Owino: No, they don't target women to persuade their husbands, but most women do say that uncircumcised men are "dirty" even before this WHO propaganda came to Africa. Then there's the cervical cancer issue which make women see the male cut as beneficial.

Robert O'Hara: Can you tell us more about the NHRS, the organization that is getting the most funding for this program? What is their ideology? Is it a strongly feminist one? Are they using their growing funds and influence to spread their ideas about domestic violence and feminist theories such as "Patriarchy Theory" and "Rape Culture Theory?"

Kennedy Owino: In fact what I got from the local media in the recent past is that funding for NRHS was slightly cut for this year. It is the organization which is getting most of the funding for this program. I don't see HRHS as feminist. Their sole work is to get rid of men's foreskins. I've never heard of them promote feminism, or rape culture theory.

Robert O'Hara: Their name suggests that they are interested in reproductive health. Where they around before the money started coming in? If so what were they trying to promote before?

Kennedy Owino: NRHS came into existence only after the random controlled trials were done. It never existed before.

Robert O'Hara: So somehow they are conflating "reproductive health" with circumcision. I will have to do some more research on them. I think this will about do it Kennedy. Thanks so much for you time

Kennedy Owino: You are welcome.

It is important to note that in a report published by the Journal of Public Health in Africa in 2011, surveys were cited indicating that men were actually receiving printed materials telling them they would not have to wear condoms if circumcised. [1] It is also important to note the previous articles published here at AVFM concerning the role of prominent feminists in the program. [2][3][4] It appears, however, that the over riding factor is the distribution of money to organizations on the ground that promote and execute the circumcision campaign. It is difficult to determine whether or not and to what extent feminist ideology plays a secondary role.

Reproductive Slavery

Reproduction is a human right. And by human right, I mean women's right.
At least some people think of reproduction in those terms–as a right–but I'm not one of them, because the phrasing I've used just now implies the right to spam one's environment with very small copies of yourself. And that's a tricky issue about resources and stewardship of another life, and at what point a clump of cells becomes a person and so on, and while these are all interesting questions, they aren't what I want to talk about right here and right now.
Instead, I want to talk about self-determination in reproduction as a human right. As a human right that applies to both men and women.
I'm not talking about what's recognized by scripture or government or social convention, I'm talking about what I recognize as fundamental and self-evident in any human society recognizing the principal of self-ownership:

A woman's body, a woman's choice.

And I'll bet some of you have heard me mention that before. I might even give it a name, like, the lie that launched a million rants. Well, perhaps not a million – about a half-dozen, maybe. But this phrase, a woman's body, a woman's choice, may sound on its surface like a good solid bit of common sense, but it is woefully incomplete in explaining the common ethic surrounding human reproduction. I'm referring here to the ethic assumed by the courts, the law, and used to justify the use of violent force against those who have their own bodies in the race, but neither choice, nor rights, and often, not even a voice.
A woman's body, a woman's choice carries a lot of meaning, and if you're not a woman, one of the things being said is shut up and do what you're told. And pay up, sucker.
Allowing an individual control over their own fertility has two components. The first is technological–those technologies that afford an individual control of their own body's reproductive capability. For women, this comes through a wide array of consumer products and technologies, including birth control pills, diaphragms, foams, subcutaneous implants, injections, creams, jellies, patches, and other technologies. This is the practical technology of control women have access to. And the second component is the legal right to control your reproduction. Women, quite rightly, own the basic human right of self-determination in reproduction under law.
Men, by contrast, enjoy no such legal rights, and when this is pointed out in an effort towards correction, that old mantra is trotted out again: A woman's body, a woman's choice. Men, we are told, do not reproduce, and thus, have no need for the basic human right to control their reproduction which in 2013 is assumed as simple common sense for women.
However, the claim that men do not reproduce – sometimes talked about in terms of pregnancy or child birth – is not true. Human women do not become pregnant by pollination by bees, or through parthenogenesis. A baby's manufacture takes gamete cells from both a woman and a man.
In the discussion of technology versus legal rights in reproduction, there is a political question – why, after 50 years of a female pill, is there no male birth control pill in the western world? It exists; it has been developed and is used in China. Why don't we have it in the West?
In fact, it has been gender ideologues who unilaterally deny men access to basic birth control technology women have enjoyed for a half-century. A male contraceptive pill has existed for at least a decade. According to Dr. Elsimar Coutinho–a Brazilian endocrinologist and a human reproduction scientist–when seeking approval for a male contraceptive pill based on natural substances extracted from cotton seeds, he was denied permission at the Budapest World Population Congress.
During his interview Coutinho explained:

In Budapest, I went to try to get the support of women. I thought, if women support it. The American feminists were all there, including Betty Freidan. It was her, I started to speak and in some ten minutes, she interrupted. She said: Dr., do you think we've fought our whole lives to have in our hands the decision of having children or not? Do you think we're abdicating that? Men say they're on the pill, women believe them? Do you know what you are, what you all deserve? To have credibility, swear you're using pills just to get laid and leave? Leave us with the responsibility and then 'the pill failed' ? I was dazzled, because the women stood up screaming NO MALE PILL!!

Just as women are the mothers of the very small human beings we call children, men are the fathers. Unfortunately, whether men who become fathers do so out of genuine choice and desire, or because that choice is taken out of their hands by deception, violence, theft, or blackmail – men do not enjoy legal reproductive rights. What we do enjoy is the legal requirement to abide by the decision and choice made by a woman exercising her legal rights in matters reproductive.

We are by no means finished with this catalog of grievance – but a discussion of what is usually blurred past by gender ideologues arguing women's reproductive rights is necessary, and that's chromosomal contribution. When seed from a Monsanto crop blows accidentally into a farmer's field, Monsanto sues that farmer into extinction for patent infringement.

The producers of food – who we all depend on for our very existence – are sued into extinction by a corporation (with the full support of government and the legal system) on the basis of seeds blown accidentally by the wind. That is the existing legal precedent over the unlicensed use of genetic material.

And yet, women often decide to reproduce unilaterally, sometimes by lying about their use of the pill or any of the other female technologies for self-control of fertility. There are even a number of stories in the media of theft of semen from condoms for baby making purposes, and of purposeful misattributions of fatherhood–otherwise known as cuckolding–when a prospective mother needs a more financially stable financier than whatever unemployed bad boy was coming in the side door while the soon-to-be "dad" was at work.

And a man named father by said feminine fiat has no legal choice. Ready for another objection? He made his choice to be a daddy when he chose to have sex. Or rather, legally, he made his choice to be a daddy whenever he ejaculated – voluntarily or not. I've heard this objection too many times to count, and to everyone who has given this claim voice without intention to refute it, shame on you.

The choice to have sex is not the choice to produce a baby for women, and nor should it be, because reproductive rights are a subset of basic human rights. That's not even the right to spam the local environment with copies of yourself. It's the right to not reproduce, and under current legal convention, men don't have this right.

But it's worse than just that. Although a man can be co-opted into fatherhood, with his own gamete cells or even with somebody else's – it's worse than that. Men are required by law to finance the exercised reproductive choices of women. If a man finds himself in this un-chosen obligation without the financial means to keep paying for up to 18 years, our society will cheerfully throw him in a prison cell. Debtors prisons, despite being illegal, are still used against men if they don't pay for the baby-making they have no legal right to refuse.

But it's even worse that this. Women, being the only humans who have reproductive rights, also enjoy the ability to eject fathers from the families they are part of, while retaining a significant fraction of the income of these men. The family courts are the instrument of this process, and those courts fund themselves by taking a fraction of the appropriated income of these men.

And if they cannot pay – our media, rather than correctly identifying them as exploited, denied basic human rights, and treated as money and labor dispensing appliances – instead calls these men "deadbeat dads". And once we've labeled men as such, our media, our politicians and celebrity talking heads heap contempt and scorn on a class of humans denied a fundamental human right.

And when all this is pointed out in argument, what is the most common response from those who would deny men a legal right in reproduction?

Ready?

Having and raising a child is difficult and costly, and therefore, the unwilling co-option of another human being's income and life, well, that's perfectly fine because a woman choosing to reproduce is undertaking a big, expensive, and life-consuming project.

That's the argument men claiming their own human rights in reproduction encounter with regularity in this debate. This is a system under which people are treated as property, and are forced to work. These people can be held against their will, and deprived of the right to leave, deprived of the right to choice in their lives or work, robbed of the financial compensation for their work. Historically, the social institution allowing this was recognized by many societies. In more recent times this has been outlawed in most societies, although it continues through the practices of debt bondage, indentured servitude, domestic servants kept in captivity, child soldiers, forced marriage, forced reproduction and forced reproductive financing.

And in order to continue to argue, to deny men legal self-determination in reproduction, those making the oppositional case must either defend the institution of slavery, or deny that men are human beings.

Panthers only: others need not apply

Jason Gregory · 27 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A modern man's online dating profile:

Hello, I don't have any kids and probably will never want any. If you're not capable of hitting the snooze button on your biological clock, I'm not interested in you. I expect dual incomes and no kids (DINKs). If all you have are boobs and booty, move along. Those aren't enough anymore. You better have a science degree, make good money and not be a shallow imbecile who has a fetish for fashion. I don't care about your silly shoes, your clothes, or your entitled attitude. If you want marriage and commitment, you can get down on your fucking knees, humiliate yourself, and beg for it. Where's my ring, bitch? What have you done for me lately?

Finding a 30-something woman who isn't desperately single, divorced-with-children, a single mother, bat-shit crazy, or who doesn't look like bigfoot is about as rare as actually spotting bigfoot. Their rarity, as well as other attributes, is what makes these "panthers" (women who are self-sufficient, uninterested in having kids, and not interested in leeching off of a man) so special. They don't complain about the ticking of their biological clocks.

They are not hysterically desperate to find a man and make babies. They are actually independent, responsible, and have made a life for themselves, a life that isn't dependent upon being a sandwich-maker and/or the victim of patriarchy. They don't blame patriarchy and, by extension, they don't blame men, using them as scapegoats to express a sort of sociopathic lack of empathy, compassion, and care about men. They don't play some silly game about how women are the longest suffering long-sufferers in the history of long-suffering. Oppression Olympics are not sports for the panther. As such, they don't feel entitled to a man or to his provision and protection.

Feminists are supposed to be strong and independent, kind of like the elusive panther. Perhaps we can spot one of these panthers at Jezebel. Take Meher Ahmad as an example. She published this *bit*chypocritical piece of shit last week, a few days before Father's Day. Ahmad's piece of shit was a response to Laurie Shrage's Is Forced Fatherhood Fair?—a balanced and fair look at the lack of men's reproductive rights, from the perspective of a feminist-philosopher. Notice how Ms. Ahmad excoriates Shrage's "sympathetic view of a man who accidentally conceives a child." Ms. Ahmad, in a stereotypically feminist sort of sociopathic way, expresses no compassion, empathy, or care about these forced-fathers. She writes. "Boo fucking hoo. At the end of the day, the only thing the government, and society, requires fathers to do is pay money, which is a hell of a lot easier than raising a child alone, as most mothers who have children out of wedlock are forced to do. Yeah, it's unfair for them, but it's not nearly as unfair as forced motherhood."

Let's unpack this sociopathic and *bitch*ypocritical drivel. Men effectively have only 3 options regarding their reproductive rights—condoms, abstinence, vasectomies. That's it. Ms. Ahmad complains that in some states, "abortion is virtually illegal/impossible to get." That's right. However, unless Ms. Ahmad lives in some bizarre virtual world, it's not even "virtually" possible for men to get abortions. Although a woman can terminate her pregnancy, a man has, so far as I know, no right to terminate his legal obligations to support a child, even if the child was created without his consent. (Consent to sex is not consent to fatherhood.) A man who does not submit to this legal obligation can be thrown into a cage, treated like an animal, and denigrated as a "dead-beat-dad." Perhaps we should refer to mothers who terminate their pregnancies as "dead-beat-mothers," just to be fair. Nah… that's kind of sociopathic. Some people might get the idea that we don't have any compassion, empathy, or care about these mothers.

[image]Ms. Ahmad seems very willing to express compassion, empathy, and care about single mothers. However, and contrary to tripe like this about the virtues of single motherhood, Ms. Ahmad presents the idea that mothers are victims, dependent upon a man and/or father-state, due to their lack of reproductive rights. Ms. Ahmad tries to bury the fact that women have more reproductive rights than men under the narrative that single mothers have a hard time of it—that they are the longest suffering long-sufferers in the history of long-suffering. There is no strength, independence, or responsibility in that sort of sociopathic *bitc*hypocrisy of a narrative. It's rather pathetic and certainly not very panther. Ms. Ahmad, if you want a father's commitment (child support for a child he did not consent to create), you can get down on your fucking knees, humiliate yourself, and beg for it. I don't care for your silly narrative, your imbecilic fetish for victimhood status, or your entitled attitude. I'm sure there are other reasons to disqualify you from panther status, but I'm going to reciprocate your sociopathic expressions and simply not bother to give any shits about them. The elusive panther remains elusive. The modern man remains single. Panthers only and all others need not apply.

NCFM on McCain questions for DOJ

NCFM · 28 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

NCFM NOTE: For those of you following this over the top reach of the DOJ and DOE to install kangaroo court justice on college campuses take heart, Mr. McCain heard the groans and moans of those who still believe in due process and equal treatment. This DOJ/DOE stealthy bank robbery has feminist jurisprudence finger prints all over it. Meaning, it's another in a long seemingly endless list of government policies and rules designed to avoid law review and make it easier to disenfranchise men. It is opportunism for the gender impaired — elitist feminists. Please, take a moment and call Mr. McCain's office at (202) 224-2235 to thank him. Encourage him to investigate the circumstances leading to this debacle. Encourage him not to let this go… to stay with it until the DOJ changes its directive. You might suggest to him that attorneys hired by the Feds should be required to know what "civil rights" means, especially those working in the civil rights divisions of the government.

Senator McCain Demands Answers from DOJ over Campus Censorship "Blueprint"

June 26, 2013

WASHINGTON, June 26, 2013—Arizona Senator John McCain sent a letter to the Department of Justice today challenging its recent settlement with the University of Montana. The Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) has led national criticism of the May 9 settlement, which mandates a breathtakingly broad definition of sexual harassment and rejects the use of a "reasonable person" standard. The Department of Justice (DOJ) and the Department of Education (ED) proclaimed the joint settlement to be a "blueprint" for how colleges across the country must handle sexual misconduct allegations.

[image]"We are grateful to Senator McCain for posing these crucially important questions to the Department of Justice," said FIRE Senior Vice President Robert Shibley. "We urge the DOJ to retract this indefensible and unconstitutional threat to free expression and academic freedom on our nation's college campuses."

In today's letter, Senator McCain writes: "Without congressional authorization or even any formal agency rulemaking, Assistant Attorney General Thomas Perez and a group of lawyers in the DOJ's Civil Rights Division have single-handedly redefined the meaning of sexual harassment at all universities and colleges across the country that receive public funding."

The full text of the letter is included below.

Senator McCain's letter poses a range of questions to Attorney General Eric Holder and the DOJ about the May 9 "blueprint." Specifically, the letter inquires about the source of the DOJ and ED's authority to engage in *de facto*rulemaking; the possibility of wrongful convictions under the new low standard for harassment; and why the DOJ and ED reject the definition of sexual harassment in the educational context provided by the U.S. Supreme Court in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education (1999).

Senator McCain also asks whether everyday expression protected by the First Amendment—including students joking or listening to music that contains sexual content, or a teacher assigning a work which includes sexual content—could now be grounds for filing a sexual harassment complaint. Senator McCain writes: "What safe harbors are available to students and teachers so that they can be assured that innocent behavior is not investigated and punished?"

FIRE has warned that, under the federal blueprint, students engaged in protected speech are indeed potential harassers, should their neighbors find their expression simply "unwelcome" or offensive. FIRE offers a comprehensive FAQ about the mandate on its website.

"FIRE is delighted that Senator McCain is demanding answers from the DOJ," said Joe Cohn, FIRE's legislative and policy director. "We hope that this inquiry leads the Department to reevaluate the legality and wisdom of the blueprint's directives."

FIRE is a nonprofit educational foundation that unites civil rights and civil liberties leaders, scholars, journalists, and public intellectuals from across the political and ideological spectrum on behalf of individual rights, freedom of expression, academic freedom, due process, and rights of conscience at our nation's colleges and universities. FIRE's efforts to preserve liberty on campuses across America can be viewed at thefire.org.

June 26, 2013
The Honorable Eric Holder
Attorney General of the United States
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20530

Dear Attorney General Holder:

I am writing to request more information on the settlement reached between the Department of Justice (DOJ) and the University of Montana-Missoula with regard to the enforcement and application of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 ("Title IX"). Without congressional authorization or even any formal agency rulemaking, Assistant Attorney General Thomas Perez and a group of lawyers in DOJ's Civil Rights Division have single-handedly redefined the meaning of sexual harassment at all universities and colleges across the country that receive public funding.

Given that the interpretation of Title IX has such a widespread impact on the well-being of young students, it is troublesome that significant changes to nationwide sexual harassment policy were unilaterally dictated by DOJ – through a settlement – rather than through congressional or regulatory action. In short, Assistant Attorney General Perez and DOJ have used a settlement to effectively change the law, avoiding public accountability for their actions.

The Civil Rights Division, led by Assistant Attorney General Perez, ignored years of Supreme Court jurisprudence regarding Title IX when it decided to unilaterally make its new standard. Whereas the Supreme Court held in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education that sexual harassment must be "so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive that it effectively bars the victim's access to an educational opportunity or benefit," Assistant Attorney General Perez on his own volition, unauthorized and unchecked by Congress, has issued a much broader definition that may compromise the constitutional rights of students and teachers.

According to the Civil Rights Division's Letter of Findings, DOJ now defines sexual harassment as "any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature." DOJ also requires that universities immediately take actions against students accused of harassment before the completion of any investigation. DOJ's new interpretation of sexual harassment and its suggested disciplinary procedures are direct hindrances to students' and teachers' First Amendment rights as well as their right to due process.

On June 6th Professors Ann Green and Donna Potts, members of the Committee on Women in the Academic Profession of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), wrote a letter to Mr. Perez expressing deep concerns about the broadness of DOJ's new interpretation of sexual harassment. The letter asserted that the new definition "eliminates the critical standard of 'reasonable speech,' and, in doing so, may pose a threat to academic freedom in the classroom."

Given that the new Title IX sexual harassment standards and suggested disciplinary procedures raise great concerns about the security of constitutional rights, please provide the following information by July 17, 2013.

1. From what source does DOJ claim its authority to revise Court-approved Title IX jurisprudence through the settlement with the University of Montana rather than by judicial, regulatory, or legislative means?

2. How do you specifically define "unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature"? Having promulgated a new regulatory standard regarding the definition of sexual harassment, how does DOJ plan to ensure consistent application of that standard to avoid undesirable outcomes, including vexatious litigation?

3. To what extent does the broad nature of the new and judicially untested “unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature” standard, increase the risk of a wrongful conviction?
4. Could the following scenarios constitute “unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature” and demonstrate reasonable grounds for filing a sexual harassment complaint under the new definition:

a. A professor assigning a book or showing a movie that contains content of a sexual nature.
b. A student who makes a joke of a sexual nature to a friend and is overheard by another student.
c. A student asking another student on a date.
d. A student listening to music that contains content of a sexual nature overheard by others.
e. A student giving another student a Valentine’s Day card.
f. A student or professor using masculine terms for generic pronouns (e.g., “Each student must bring his own laptop to the exam.”)
5. What safe harbors are available to students and teachers so that they can be assured that innocent behavior is not investigated and punished?
Thank you for your attention to this important matter.
Sincerely,
John McCain

Greetings everyone.
Well, it is that time of the year again. The season has changed and we must ask readers to help us continue to maintain and improve this website, as well as the activism that continues to result from our efforts.
As I do with each fundraiser, I want to take the opportunity to go over some of our accomplishments since we last asked for your support and let you know what is ahead for us in the future. There is a lot to tell you about.
First, as most of you know, we have attracted the interest of a bona fide, award winning documentary film production company that is making a movie about A Voice for Men, with the intent of giving you a never before seen platform to talk about your road to the Men's Human Rights Movement. The more contact we have with these people, the more I am convinced that they want to make a real documentary, not something like Michael Moore would do. It is literally a never before seen opportunity to get our message out there.
The work we have been doing with the National Coalition for Men to start forming university groups for men's issues has continued, slow but steady. Tom Golden is now in the process of producing the first video call to action to form the groups and it should be out within an estimated two weeks. We will of course bring it to you here first. There has been a lot of support for this long term, very ambitious project, and AVFM, including myself and AVFM News Director Bob O'Hara, have been in the thick of it.
We have future projects coming up as well. I have just rebuilt my office into a video production studio. I will soon start producing a streaming video program on men's issues to be hosted directly on the site. I will be producing other videos for YouTube to redouble efforts there, but we are also contracting a web development company to set us up with a custom video player and subscription function, hosting the program on Amazon S3 servers so that we can direct stream from the site – away from the control of YouTube or anyone else. It will work on a paid subscription, which means that we will auto enroll anyone already contributing to the site on a monthly basis, and of course there will be free passes for activists in a financial fix.
Hopefully through sales of these video programs, which we are taking care to produce professionally, we can help ease the burden on contributors to the site who have been coughing up the large donations to keep us going. It will also provide an extra service to those of you who regularly contribute smaller amounts every month.
I am scheduled to start in late July with a series of programs to be made for YouTube, which should provide some great content, but also help me work out the bugs in making a more polished video program. I hope to be ready to produce that program in earnest, weekly, by September of this year.
But, as I always say around this time a year, this stuff is not happening for free. As we continue to grow, our expenses grow commensurately. And we still have all the same regular operating costs, like a dedicated server, image royalties, Blog Talk Radio fees, legal expenses to keep my big mouth covered, and the endless assorted costs of keeping this operation afloat.
But it appears to be paying off, folks, faster than I could have ever expected. Thanks to your donations AVFM is now certifiably giving traction to a men's movement in the most real sense of the word. With thanks to everyone associated with this site, the editors, contributors, technical experts, readers, donors and fellow activists, I ask you again to help us take a few more big steps in the right direction.
As you can see, there is no paid advertising on this site. The only source of support we have is you.
Please use the donation button at the top right of the page to contribute to this quarter's fundraiser through Paypal. For those of you who want to mail in checks or money orders, please click on the "Other Options" button in the same area.
Thank you in advance to all who help and those that have always helped us achieve our goals.

Goal reached! Total with direct donations and pledged checks:

19,040.00!

Thank you!

False rape accuser Mary Miller – 1896

Robert St. Estephe · 28 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, welcome to the world of Gonzo History.

FULL TEXT: Charles Atkinson, sentenced in the Camden (N. J.) County Court in July of last year to a ten-years' term of imprisonment on the false charge of criminal assault [euphemism used at that time for rape] made by his seventeen-year-old stepdaughter Mary Miller, will leave the Trenton Prison to-day a free man. The Court of Pardons in Jersey City yesterday made this decree.
Atkinson was not only granted a full and free pardon, but he goes back to his friends and relatives with the judicial stamp of innocence on his brow. Mary Miller, his accuser, in a fit of remorse, recently confessed that she had wronged her foster-parent when she swore that he had maltreated her, and, like Barbara Aub [who had retracted a rape charge after the accused had been convicted], she made a complete retraction of her accusation. Her confession was placed in the hands of Gov. Werts and by him laid before the Court of Pardons. The girl acknowledged that she had made the false charge for revenge.
When Atkinson married Mary's mother, three years ago, the girl was in the State Industrial School for Girls, having been sent there as an incorrigible. Although only fourteen years old, she had acquired the habit of remaining away from home at night. At the end of two years, on the promise that she would abandon her habits, she was released from the Institute and returned to her house in Camden.
For a time she carried herself properly, but the life at home was too slow, and she began to frequent the Gloucester race track, just across the river. She became the companion of disreputable women, and the efforts of her stepfather to reclaim her were in vain.
Falling in everything else, he threatened to send her back to the Industrial School. She had an abhorrence for this place, and it was shortly after this threat by her father that she caused his arrest and imprisonment on the false charge.
Alkinson had not been in prison long before Mary committed a breach of the peace that caused her recommittal to the Industrial School. About the time of Barbara Aub's sensational retraction of the charges against Langerman, in this city, Mary Miller was moved to remorse, and one wrote to Atkinson in the Trenton Prison that she was sorry for the wrong she had done him. A day or two afterwards she told her story to one of the women teachers of the school.
Rev. George C. Maddock, chaplain of the State Prison, was sent for and the girl repeated to him the story of her retraction. She said she would never have made the charge had she not been advised to do so by some of her associates at the race tracks. They told her, she said, it would be an easy way to get her troublesome stepfather out of the way, and when he was in prison she could lead the life with which she had become infatuated. It is understood that the girl has given to the authorities the names of the alleged conspirators and that an investigation, that may lead to the indictment of a number of persons, is in progress.
Gov. Werts, after receiving the girl's confession, sent a Supreme Court Commissioner to the school and had it verified. Mary reiterated everything she had said to Chaplain Maddock and then made affidavit as to its accuracy.
TRENTON, Jan. 2 – For seventeen months Atkinson has been confined under his ten years' sentence for assault upon Mary Miller, his stepdaughter, now in the Industrial School for Girls and who recently confessed that Atkinson was innocent.
"I have very little to say about the latter," Atkinson said to-day when called from his cell, "because I think the least said the better. Mary is evidently sorry for what she has done. I knew, and so did my wife, that I was innocent, but Mary's testimony sent me here. I have been watching ever since I came here for her to repent, and now that she has done so, everything is all right. Mary is naturally a good girl, and I believe she could be kept way from her evil companions."

["Atkinson Is A Free Man. – Court of Pardons Acts on His Step-Daughter's Confession that She Falsely Accused Him. – Judges Declare Him Innocent. – Says This Barbara Aub Was Induced by Evil Persons to Send Him to Prison for Ten Years." The World (New York, N.Y.), Jan. 3, 1896, p. 9]

McCain calls out DOJ/DOE on sexual harassment policy

Robert O'Hara · 28 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On Wednesday, June 26, Arizona Senator John McCain issued a press release challenging the Department of Justice on its stance concerning the new sexual harassment definitions on U.S. college campuses. The press release featured a letter addressed to Attorney General Eric Holder in which he expressed grave concerns over the D.O.J's unilateral action to change the laws concerning sexual harassment.
He states in his letter:

> "The Civil Rights Division, led by Assistant Attorney General Perez, ignored years of Supreme Court jurisprudence regarding Title IX when it decided to unilaterally make its new standard. Whereas the Supreme Court held in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education that sexual harassment must be "so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive that it effectively bars the victim's access to an educational opportunity or benefit," Assistant Attorney General Perez on his own volition, unauthorized and unchecked by Congress, has issued a much broader definition that may compromise the constitutional rights of students and teachers.
> According to the Civil Rights Division's Letter of Findings, DOJ now defines sexual harassment as "any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature." DOJ also requires that universities immediately take actions against students accused of harassment before the completion of any investigation. DOJ's new interpretation of sexual harassment and its suggested disciplinary procedures are direct hindrances to students' and teachers' First Amendment rights as well as their right to due process." [1]

He is referring to a recent settlement with the University of Montana in the wake of an investigation into what was purported to be an epidemic of sexual assault and sexual harassment. The investigation failed to substantiate a sexual misconduct problem anywhere near the scope and size of the initial complaints. In spite of this, or perhaps in an attempt to characterize more behavior as unacceptable, a letter sent on May 9th, now called the "blueprint," re-defines the definition of sexual harassment stating that "sexual harassment should be more broadly defined as 'any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature'" including "verbal conduct". [2]
It goes on to explicitly state that allegedly harassing expression does not need be offensive to an "objectively reasonable person of the same gender in the same situation." This essentially opens the door for expulsion of any student who says something that another student finds offensive.
This is a complete turnaround from a guideline set down by the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights in 2003 which stated that harassment "must include something beyond the mere expression of views, words, symbols or thoughts that some person finds offensive" and that "OCR's standards require that the conduct be evaluated from the perspective of a reasonable person in the alleged victim's position, considering all the circumstances, including the alleged victim's age."
In 1999 the Supreme Court ruled in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education the phrase "severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive" is used to set the standard of sexual harassment. But in the May 9th letter the phrase was misquoted the Supreme Court stating:
"While the Supreme Court in Davis v. Monroe Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 526 U.S. 629 (1999), requires deliberate indifference by the recipient to "severe and pervasive" harassment of which a recipient had actual knowledge to establish liability for damages under Title IX, shortly after those decisions were issued, OCR clarified in its 2001 Guidance that a recipient's failure to respond promptly and effectively to severe, persistent, or pervasive harassment of which it knew or should have known could violate Title IX for purposes of administrative enforcement."
Thus conveniently omitting the use of the words "objectively offensive."
This leaves open any topic of discussion about sex, sexuality, any sexual advance no matter how innocuous or even the act of asking someone out on a date punishable. Just as important is the implications for open discussion about gender issues on campus such as events held at the University of Toronto. It is easy to see how this can be misused by campus feminists to shut down debate and have students talking about men's issues expelled.

In his letter Sen. McCain gave the D.O.J. until the 17th of July to answer several specific concerns in his letter. This will mark the first time that an elected official has challenged the recent actions of the D.O.J. in regards to the civil rights of students, administrators and faculty on U.S. campuses. AVFM called McCain's office but no one was available to comment.

The Voice of Europe: the European Union

Lucian Vâlsan · 28 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]
On June 28, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the European Union and its twin correspondent, the Council of Europe, two institutions that have been in the forefront of promoting misandry throughout the peoples of Europe for the last 20 years.
Next Monday, July 1, Croatia will join the European Union, becoming the 28th unfortunate country to be under the thumb of Maoist-lead Union aimed at controlling everything people do.
Some, even within the MRM, still seem to think that the European Union is a great idea, whilst conveniently turning a blind eye to the ever increasing control that the Union gets over men's lives. In a latest attempt, the EU now tries to demand fishermen to get more women on their boats. Why? Because a Spanish woman from the Party of European Socialists says so, and the Maoist leader Jose Barroso seems to agree.
And this is only the beginning! According to a recently issued EU report, men's role in gender equality is to be good feminists. Otherwise, they are deemed supporters of "hegemonic masculinity" (no bullshit!) and will be thrown under the proverbial bus.
Where have we heard this before?
The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Since the EU influences more than 28 countries, the subject is of extreme importance for everyone!
The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).
That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)
That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)
That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)
And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.
And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

A short guide for feminists

John Hembling (JtO) · 29 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

How to not appear as stupid as you do. A guide for feminists.

I must preface this guide with a bit of history: I did not begin to self-identify as a men's rights activist with the intention of attacking our culture's populist gender ideology. In fact, my writing as an M(H)RA evolved out the maintenance of a now dead political blog I began in 2006 to vent my spleen over the apparent insanity of the public political establishment in North America. What mainstream politicians were saying and doing was then, and remains now, so sharply inconsistent that I began looking for alternative motivations for the apparent insanity. In fact, although I was not any kind of feminist, I regarded feminism as simply an ideology I wasn't interested in. However, after I began writing about human rights issues impacting men, I met feminism's activist face. It was enlightening. In fact, it became obvious to me that before the real work towards human rights for men can really be accomplished, the gender ideologues in direct opposition to human rights would have to be addressed.

Professor Janice Fiamengo, who presented a public lecture on modern feminism at the University of Toronto in March 2013, opened her discussion with the following description:

"Academic feminism, as it is practiced and disseminated in our universities, is overwhelmingly intellectually empty, incoherent, and dishonest."

I'd call Fiamengo's comment a good start, but not sufficient. Modern feminism is intellectually empty, incoherent, dishonest, violent, hateful and morally bankrupt. It is a sick, authoritarian cult of hatred and violence, and of sanctified victimhood.

In fact, in almost every instance of men or men's advocates addressing human rights concerns impacting men and boys, the activist proponents of feminism have shown up to silence and disrupt any such male human rights advocacy. But in effect, rather than effectively silencing views other than their own, activist feminists have repeatedly demonstrated themselves to be violent, sadistic, amoral, supremacist, and bigoted totalitarian thugs. Activist gender ideologues have done such a thorough job of monstering themselves that I am now writing this to prevent further self-harm on their part – or such is my hope.

What follows is a list of often repeated behaviours and expressed positions by gender ideologues, along with commentary and suggested alternative tactics. The goal for feminists following the provided advice in this article will be to appear less stupid, less amoral, less sadistic, less petty, and importantly, to appear more adult than they do at present.

NUMBER ONE

Travelling in a large group, wearing masks, carrying weapons, vandalizing private property, and attempting to physically intimidate anyone not in your gang – does this sound familiar to anyone?

It should, as it's a standard trope used in crime action drama films in the 1960's, 70's, 80's and 90's – the bad guys wear masks, commit vandalism, and harass and threaten anyone not in the gang. It's how a lazy script writer establishes a group as enemies, criminals and general villains.

Oh yeah, it's also what academic and activist feminists have demonstrated as their preferred response to anyone speaking publicly on gender issues from a non-feminist perspective. In Vancouver the weapons were box cutters, in Toronto they were bludgeons. And an armed angry mob, screaming through megaphones and physically threatening anyone who tried to speak? Yes, that was the tactic on display, and even the mainstream media got it on video, then broadcast it with the commentary: "shameful".

Are feminists trying to model themselves on the criminals of popular cinema? Or are they just too stupid to help themselves?

Western culture has a long-standing and important framework for the evaluation of ideas: public discourse and debate. When faced with a nonconforming viewpoint, isn't it time for feminists to pick up the mantle and actually field an argument more substantive that thought-stopping clichés or threats and empty accusations? Or maybe they think intelligent debate is just too patriarchal for their tastes?

NUMBER TWO

Rather than continuing to maintain a public image of themselves as sadistic and arguably sociopathic, the laughing and jeering at the rate of male suicide is probably something feminists may want to alter in their public behaviour. Or, laughing and jeering in the face of the rate of male workplace death, or anti-male bias in the family courts, or homelessness, or male infant sexual mutilation, or education – or any of the other major issues addressed by the men's human rights movement.

You see, feminists, what I'm about to explain to you ("man-splain", if you prefer) is something everybody except you already knows. The behaviours of yours I've just catalogued in the previous paragraph are those of amoral sociopaths. That you, feminists, have an established pattern of such behavior in public says that you either ARE amoral sociopaths, or that you wish to project that public image. You've certainly convinced me, along with at least a major fraction of the men's rights movement. In fact, if feminists do manage to convince the public that their public behavior – that a violent, amoral sociopathy represents your ideology's character – then that will be the end of you. Well, unless through sheer brutal force, feminism can colonize the minds and thoughts of every culture and sub-culture on the planet: remake the non-violent into the violent; the loving into the hateful; the will to freedom into your authoritarian impulse.

On the other hand, when faced with the suffering and death of others, mockery is how an individual or a group demonstrates that those being laughed at are not human. That they do not merit the basic compassion of other human beings. This is both a signal to observers that the target group can be brutalized with impunity, and as a reassurance that brutality done to the members of that group by those engaging in the mockery of suffering is acceptable, and not – as would otherwise be the case, monstrous or depraved.

And feminists, you are losing control of the narrative, and the vicious, sadistic and amoral character of your movement is increasingly and glaringly obvious. You might just want to check yourselves in a mirror, dummies.

NUMBER THREE

Unless I'm greatly mistaken, and indeed, feminists want to cement their reputation as sexist bigots, then one item of feminist rhetoric really should be reconsidered, or entirely abandoned. This is use of the word "mansplain" to silence and derail anyone else's expressed opinion.

Opinions, arguments or explanations depend for their validity on being from the right people, right? That is to say, an explanation becomes invalid and void if it is expressed by a member of the wrong demographic: men, for example. Thus, the shorthand for dismissing an opinion or argument, based on the sexual identity of the speaker: mansplain.

If gender ideologues are ever in need of a better, more convincing demonstration of their own sexist bigotry, they will have to work hard to find it. Or, assuming you, the reader, are one such feminist – have I got it all wrong? Does mansplaining have some other reading, besides "your opinion is invalid because of your sex"? Go on, explain to me, and to everybody else, how I got this one wrong.

Oh, silly me, I already covered this earlier. Maybe gender ideologues think intelligent, reasoned dialogue and debate is just too "patriarchal".

NUMBER FOUR

One practice I'd recommend gender ideologues discontinue is that of minimizing, excusing or making light of harm done to male infants in routine ritual genital mutilation.

Hundreds of male infants die every year in the United States from the trauma, blood loss and resulting medical complications following routine, ritual genital mutilation. Apologists for the sexual mutilation of infants have no problem correctly identifying the sexual mutilation of female infants as MUTILATION, but when the victims are male – the much more acceptable, sanitized and politically correct term CIRCUMCISION is used to disguise the mutilation of a newborn infant.

Compounding this monstrosity, the harvested fibroblasts from these mutilated children are used, among other places to produce better, more effective wrinkle cream for post-menopausal members of the leisure caste.

In a feminist culture, mutilating our own infants is only objectionable when those infants are girls, apparently.

But to those feminists still excusing and minimizing this savage brutalization of newborns, for those who can see clearly past the thought-smogging influence of ideology: “circumcision apologists” look exactly like child-mutilating monsters.

NUMBER FIVE

In order to alter the now well-established public perception of gender ideologues that they are depraved, willful and hateful bigots, they might want to discontinue their use the word “rape” to refer exclusively to the female victims of that crime.
“men can stop rape”, “teach men to not rape”, and “rape culture” are just a few iterations of the boringly predictable repetition of “rape” as an item of gender ideological rhetoric. However, glaring in almost all such pronouncements is an assumption that rape is a crime in which one sex are perpetrators and the other sex are victims. This is the narrative, and it’s false. Does the “rape” of feminist rhetoric include the sexual abuse of children by their female caretakers and teachers? Does it include the institutional and systematic support of rape in prison? When feminists talk about “rape culture”, are they ever referring to boys being victims? Of course not, because “rape” in the reality of gender ideologues is only vaguely connected to actual criminal victimization. It is mainly a story element in our culture’s feminist driven threat narrative. The victims are female, the perpetrators are male, and the dictionary is used to define men and boys victimized by that crime as winners on a game show. In other words, unless a victim is a member of the correct sexual caste, they are defined out of existence.
If it isn’t obvious by this point, the use of terms like “contemptibly corrupt”, “vile” and “vicious” will probably throw no additional light on the character of feminist ideology.

NUMBER SIX

To appear less like amoral sociopaths, feminists might also reconsider the continued use of rhetoric in apparent opposition to violence, but with a limiting clause, restricting concern to the least-impacted demographic.
“Stop violence against women” is the most prevalent example of this, and it’s a phrase with a few different interpretations. One recent poster campaign in Canada included this phrase, along with the further limit that in particular, men should attend to the imperative. Men who, just as a matter of reality, constitute the majority of the victims of violence in society. But the call isn’t to stop violence against them, or even, to just generally stop violence within society. Nope, only violence against women is of concern. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius: The expression of one thing is the exclusion of another[1].
Again, if the character of this ideology is not already obvious, explicit description likely won’t help.

NUMBER SEVEN

Avoid the continued practice and reliance on censorship. It is the signature move of fascists. Now, just as a reminder, the items in this list are provided as examples, for feminists, of what not to continue doing, in order to appear less stupid, less amoral, less violent, and less vile than they do at present.

NUMBER EIGHT

We’re almost done here. Just one more thing for feminists to do a bit less of, in order to not look like amoral cretins: excuse violence done against boys and men, or excuse violence done by girls and women.
Now, before addressing the commonplace ideation of violence in feminist rhetoric, I’ll note that this list contained 17 items before being edited for brevity and simplicity. And, although 17 was too many for a single article, I could easily have listed 40 or 50 common practices of feminists to avoid in order to appear less stupid. But such a list would be too long to wade through for most readers. Certainly, even the 8 items remaining in this list are taxing. Not necessarily to readers, but to me as I compiled the list. Stupidity, hatred, violence and publicly accepted sociopathy tire me.
But returning to violence. The problem with excusing violence done to boys and men, in the same public ethic where violence targeting women is condemned, is that the character of violence in a culture doesn’t change based on whose bodies and minds are brutalized. Which demographic takes a beating certainly matters in very direct terms to the members of that brutalized demographic, but everyone else is also submerged in a culture of violence. If we are to pretend violence against only one group is forbidden, then we are all excusing and indeed, promoting the continuation of violence against everyone.

End violence against women? Jesus fuck, how fucking stupid do we all pretend we are here? And feminists, if you really want to pretend to be anything except a violent cult of hatred and brutality, this item should be on the top of your list of immediate problems to fix within your own sick cult.

Of course, these are just a few examples – provided here, I hope, as a guide for gender ideologues and feminists. By following the advice provided in this short discussion, feminists can work towards appearing less stupid, less amoral, and less sadistic, and presenting as not so violent and sociopathic as they are now perceived. After all, we don't want anyone to get the wrong impression, do we?

And, of course, I thank you all for your kind attention.

Superiority in the name of equality

Jim Muldoon · 29 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ignoring that the oppressed are healthier, live longer, work less, do less dangerous work, and spend more money than their oppressors; feminists cite the lack of female representation in parliament and senior management as proof of men's oppression of women.

The truth is the numbers are directly proportional to the number of candidates (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2013). Thus, it is women themselves that are holding back equality. This, we are told, is why we need quotas and Emily's List. Women are not coming forward because Patriarchy has taught them not to.

It is this mentality that informs the latest initiative of the Australian Human Rights Commission with their Toolkit of Strategies to Include Women in "Male Dominated Industries" (Australian Human Rights Commission, 2013). The industries in question are mining, utilities and construction.

In 1842 the British Mines and Collieries Act outlawed the practice of sending the oppressed, i.e. females, down the mines to work (UK Parliament, undated). The terrible conditions were suitable for oppressors only. For decades after this around one thousand men and boys continued to be killed every year in British mining accidents.

Similar rules, laws and norms were instigated throughout Western society to keep the damsels from harm. For this reason, women, generally, do not fall from skyscrapers under construction; women also do not find out the hard way which wires are still live in overhead powerlines; and if there are deaths in a mining accident today, they will almost certainly still be all male.

You could be forgiven, because of the Toolkit's title, for thinking that Elizabeth Broderick, the Sex Discrimination Commissioner, is recommending measures to get girls on the jackhammers again. In reality, of course, she is arguing for women in senior management of these industries.

This is not Human Rights, but social engineering at its most devious. What gives the game away is the Toolkit itself. They are giving advice on Human Resource Management, Industrial Relations, Employee Retention, Supplier Management, Business Joint Venture Management, Corporate websites, Marketing, Client Contract Negotiation, Corporate Citizenship and the list goes on and on?

I don't know how they find the time for Human Rights.

In this case they only find time for some humans to get rights. Broderick cites a Goldman Sachs study which declares that women are under-represented in these male dominated industries (Goldman Sachs JB Were Investment Research, 2009). The same study also tells us the Health Care and Social Assistance industry has only 20% men.

Do the men get a toolkit? We all know they don't.

The toolkit, in amongst all that good advice, is recommending things like better pay and conditions in order for women to take part in these industries. These recommendations are astonishing to say the least. They are the kind of recommendations that anyone can make when they don't have to actually do any of the work themselves.

For example, just how do women, or men for that matter, work from home in these industries? Does Sally build a wall in her backyard and the construction company pays to have the wall transported to site at no extra cost to the customer?

As for more part-time and flexible hours work in the mining sector, how does that work? How many suburban mothers want to fly six hours to Outback Australia so they can get in two hours digging, and fly six hours back again? How much extra does that cost the company?

Of course, for these experts on everything, these are mere details that the minions, i.e. men, as punishment for their oppressive ways, can simply attend to and have ready before the next hard question arises. In reality, they neither know nor care. Where they pay attention to the detail is in senior management.

It is also worthy of note that the current pay and conditions for bricklayers, carpenters, etc. are currently good enough to attract men, but not good enough to attract women. What does that say about the value that men put on themselves and their work? Where is the toolkit for these self-esteem issues?

Goldman Sachs' study also reveals that females are doing better in education from school right through to university. The fact is education is no longer engaging boys as it geared more and more towards girls (Groth, 2012). This is where the ideology really becomes a force for evil. No matter what "progress" is made, there must always be Patriarchy for Feminism to exist. Therefore, no matter how much boys fall behind, women's issues must be a priority. If women are in front then Patriarchy is over; and therefore no need for Emily's List, quotas or Sex Discrimination Commissioners.

That is why, rather than a Toolkit for the education system to give boys a hand, Broderick focuses on "male dominated" industries.

The Goldman Sachs' study has a few highlights of its own.

The document estimates that, should women be introduced into these industries, GDP will increase 11%. To back this up, they provide a bewildering set of estimates of increases in other countries: "US GDP could be boosted by as much as 10%, Eurozone GDP by 14% and Japanese GDP by 21%." Other than showing they can guess a lot, what does it really prove?

The answer might be hidden in the next two gems.

Firstly, the document states that "[W]omen represent…at least 50% of all consumer spending decisions." Now, there isn't a serious marketing book written in the last 50 years that would put that figure at less than 70%.

The reason for the fudge, of course, is because it's hard to complain about oppression when you are spending more money, and presumably therefore have more money, than your oppressor does.

The other nugget is where they come across a statistic that they have to confront in claiming all this increase to GDP. Apparently, the statistics (they don't say which) show that "[m]ale productivity has historically averaged over double that of female productivity over the past 30 years."

Their solution is: "We refuse to believe". How simple is that!

As for Broderick's Utopia, the problems for industry will only begin with the substandard women that quotas will bring into politically correct senior management. As Janet Albrechtsen recently pointed out in the Australian, the quota system leads to wheeling and dealing which leads to all kinds of political appointees, and not just the women (Albrechtsen, 2013).

As merit just gets lower and lower on the criteria list for any job, the standard of appointees, male and female, just gets lower and lower.

The real nightmare will start when the business is going bust and they can't get them out for fear of lawsuits and feminist boycotts.

A loss in our family

Paul Elam · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

It is with great regret that I have to announce the death of AVFM Senior Editor Suzanne McCarley's husband, Mac. He passed away just moments ago after a very short battle with pancreatic cancer. He is survived by his wife Suzanne and his son, who was en route home from Afghanistan to see his ailing father.
As most of you know, Suzanne is one of our more respected activists, often digging in to do much of the behind the scenes trench work that others can't or won't do.
I did not know Mac. Never even spoke to him. But I know he was totally behind what Suzanne wanted to do for men and boys. He took care of her, and she took care of us. Now it is our turn to do what we can to take care of her.
Please join me in extending our deepest sympathies to Suzanne in her time of grief and in the days ahead. Please feel free to leave your best wishes and prayers in the comments.
Mac McCarley was 58 years old. PE
AVFM will be suspending operations till Tuesday morning out of respect for the McCarley Family.

11 more reasons not to marry

August Løvenskiolds · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In her article "8 reasons straight men don't want to get married", Dr. Helen Smith did an excellent job summarizing the popular reasons men say they are postponing or outright declining the many charms and benefits of marriage – well, benefits for gay couples, anyway. With the recent Supreme Court decision dumping the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) in favor of gay marriage, we can expect the argument that gay marriage somehow undermines straight marriage will continue to heat up.

In my opinion, this has things completely backwards – straight marriage is so badly and terminally damaged that the expansion of gay marriage will have little impact on the death of heterosexual nuptials – if anything, successful gay marriages will illuminate the many failures of hetero marriage that are causing men to flee from it.

Why is that? I've compiled my own, personal list of 11 additional reasons why I avoid marriage, and interestingly, my reasons are largely independent of the 8 reasons identified by Dr. Smith. Some of these reasons are deeply personal to me, but in the hopes that they might resonate with men who are conflicted on the subject of their own marital futures, I offer them up as an additional perspective as to why the single life is preferable:

1. Your wife won't be able to manipulate you by withholding sex.

While some people (ok, women mostly) treat marriage vows as loose, conditional suggested guidelines, when I make a vow, I'm going to keep it. If it is within the capability of my mind or body, then I am both loyal and stupid enough to believe that a promise is a promise, and that "integrity" includes keeping one's promises, especially in the face of adversity. So, if I promise fidelity to one woman, by God, the Universe, and Everything, I'm going to keep that promise.

I also have always had a large sex drive – I was hitting on my babysitters when I was 4 years old for goodness sakes. Even now in my mid-50's the fires of passion still burn hot in me.

The combination of these two factors mean that I would be extremely vulnerable to a wife to wanted to manipulate me by denying sex – I'd have no recourse in law or morality. A man who coerces a woman into sex is viewed as a rapist, but a woman who coerces a man by withholding sex is a feminist hero?

You go, grrl. Out of my house. NOW. And no, I am not going to marry you, bitch.

2. You won't have to lose your vintage porn collection.

My first college girlfriend got me a subscription to Playboy magazine for my birthday in 1978, and although we broke up my senior year, I collected issues of the magazine until the spring of 1992, when my cohabiting girlfriend at that time discovered them and had an extreme screaming meltdown. She kept screaming for hours as I hauled them out to a dumpster. Then, she withheld sex for six months as a punishment for my transgression. I loved her dearly but her jealousy never waned, and eventually I had to break with her, as I was unwilling to live my life in a constant state of sexual starvation.

3. You can drive any car that suits your fancy.

Until I became comfortable with the notion of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), I often chose my car with an eye toward the sort of woman it might attract. This left me with several expensive, high-maintenance models that looked pretty but didn't suit me. I didn't like the cars, either.

I now drive the perfect car for me – a 2004 Prius with moderate hail damage. My Prius is now old enough and ugly enough that it is a total chick-repellent. The hail damage increases the gas mileage to the point where I can drive from Dallas to Chicago on one or two tanks of gas, perfect for the day I become a MGTOW ghost – and, it is whisper-quiet at low speeds, so quiet that later models had to add faux engine noises for safety reasons.

Of course, if you get married, your wife will withhold sex until you buy her a gas-guzzling, planet-killing SUV so that she will feel slightly safer when she totals it. She'll hate your car, whatever it is you drive.

4. You won't have to compromise your religious beliefs, or lack thereof.

Although my mixed-up family has deep Catholic/Lutheran roots, I've been an atheist since early childhood. I hear no voices in my head, divine or otherwise. Technically, I think I'm actually a non-coherentist agnostic, in that God-talk is largely nonsensical to me, but when you say "agnostic", many believers (particularly here in the Bible Belt where I live) take that as an invitation to regale you with whatever voodoo is talking in their heads that day. My inaccurate claim to atheism is safer in the sense that it allows me to be written off as a lost cause without having to engage in gobbledygook.

Women, in my experience, are much more "spiritual" than men, in that their overwhelming anxieties drive them to seek comfort and support through faith. I don't fault them (much) for that, but I sure as hell don't want to marry it, or compromise my professed faith to placate hers.

5. You won't have to watch/hold/carry/rebuild her fucking purse.

Dealing with a woman means being subjected to "female redecoration syndrome" – her constant, endless drive to change both her husband and her environment, and her oblivious dismissal of her man's reluctance to do stupid things on her behalf. Reasonable things one might be able to work out with a reasonable woman (if such could be found), maybe, but going shoe-shopping with her when she already has a closet full of shoes? No, thank you.

6. You can undertake risky ventures without being undermined by your wife.

8 years ago an artistic entertainment district that I loved was falling on hard times just as my corporate career reached an impasse. So, I dumped my house and job and started my own entertainment business in that district. No woman would have tolerated a man who was as married to my business as I was (and continue to be) – women love commitment until it becomes slightly inconvenient for them. I know this in part because my live-in girlfriend enthusiastically supported my new business venture right up to the point where she bailed out 4 months in.

Now, I can gloat – the district is now thriving and the NYSE-listed corporation I left died in January, and my work has brought me a bit of respect. The girlfriend found a new man, picked up his meth habit, and was in prison when I last checked.

7. Your vacation time is your own.

I dislike vacationing intensely – maybe I've got a touch of Obsessive-Compulsive tendencies or some such, but I'm happiest when I'm working steadily and routinely. Vacationing with a wife would be agony for me even if we could agree where to go (no chance of that), and letting a wife vacation without you is marital suicide.

8. You won't be humiliated in public by someone you loved and trusted.

When withholding sex fails to move you, or maybe she just nuts out one day, but women cannot seem to resist the urge to humiliate their husbands in public, rat on their sex lives, or whatever. Such behavior is a deep betrayal of the trust one should invest in one's significant other, but I've never seen any woman ever be able to maintain the slightest degree of discretion about her husband's quirks, foibles, or personal secrets.

9. You won't have to serve as your wife's proxy thug.

Women love using and testing their men by having them perform acts of violence at their behest – this gives women protection and deniability in the ensuing physical and legal melées. We see echoes of this whenever some feminist idiot wanders in here and demands we do something – anything – to stop rape, or online harassment, or whatever other bug just crawled up her thigh. This damsel-in-distress trope is nothing more than the bullshit manipulation of men; it criminalizes men and robs women of their agency.

10. You won't suffer the marriage tax penalty – or subsidize her shoe collection.

Marriage is an economic disaster for men – not only in divorce, alimony and child support, but also in a happy marriage. Women rarely deign to marry impoverished men, or even men who earn less than they do. This means that those "lucky" married men suffer double-extra taxation – not only will your wife burn though your money, but the federal tax structure (in the US, anyway) is generally higher for the married than for two single people.

11. You won't have to suffer her physical assaults on you.

The current feminist culture supports the right of women to physically assault men at any time for any reason. There may be good explanations for this from evolutionary psychology – women hit men when men show some emotional weakness as a way to get them to "man up" in the face of the woman's need for a strong protector. Men are shamed and discouraged from reporting these assaults, and state and federal laws driven by the Duluth Model of gender violence often result in the arrest of battered men, rather than the women who attacked them.

Well, that about covers it for now, except for the shaming: Yes, I'm a selfish, mean bastard. I'm so ugly, stupid and nerdy that no woman would want me. I'm missing out on so much love/personal growth/sex/companionship. I'm probably gay. Or, whatever.

Yawn.
Women are going to have to come to terms with the terrifying fact that men are growing beyond their ability to control. We will be exploited and chained no longer – there is nothing positive in slavery to a woman, and endless suffering. One by one, men are waking up and moving on to places where women cannot follow.
If you see a carefree man skipping off into the forest one day, well, that's not Bigfoot. It is me.

Slutwalk Hamilton is Porn Sales

Dan Perrins · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Slutwalk Hamilton happened June 1.
A feminist event where three other people and myself were going to offer a different point of view about rape and rape ~~hysteria~~ culture.
As I understand it, 'slutwalk' is a protest event to stop common sense advice, oops I mean victim blaming, and to stop men from making comments when some women go out looking like they were auditioning for a job with their local pimp. And rape culture.
Where the hell is this alleged rape culture?
I know of no one nor know of anyone who knows someone who thinks rape is ok.
Since this is about what all was happening in Hamilton that day I'll forego delving into rape culture for this article.
Suffice it to say there is no feminist defined rape culture, there is only rape hype created by feminism.
The week before Slutwalk Hamilton, Jeb and I had hit the streets with our (AVFM) Men's Human Rights Movement posters and my other favorite public service announcement tool, common sidewalk chalk. I figure me and Jeb put in about 5 miles worth most nights and on the Friday I checked him in for dog sitting during the day, and went out on my own, covering about 10 miles. Our last run was at 5 am on Saturday morning we did another 5 miles.
I wasn't sure what to expect from this slutwalk crowd. Were they going to be like the University of Toronto feminist protesters with clones of 'Little Red Frothing Fornication Mouth' chomping at the bit ready to screech the latest rendition of 'feminism is your friend.'
Which when analyzed via the common sense lens translates to;
'Cowshit lie for both sexes.'
Or were there going to be Hollaback Un-Sluts armed with liquids and glass hyped up to 'def-con 4,' ready to launch at the slightest insult to a woman's fashion choice?
Protests, in my experience, have a fluid nature. Emotions are usually running high, and crowd mentality for the most part has no conscience. People can and do engage in activities they would never do alone but because the person on either side of them is doing it, they will as well.
Read violence has an increased probability of happening in protest situations.
Given the recent events at the U of T the feminists in Hamilton could get a little testy, and enter into that crowd mentality. So I tried to go over every scenario in my head a few thousands times beforehand and make plans on how best to reduce the probability of getting attacked, for everyone I was going to be attending with.
I realize I just femi-slutwalk-sinned by protester blaming, but in life, if you wish to ensure your personal safety, taking precautions is not victim blaming.
It is advice plain and simple, some call it common sense.
I knew that one of the organizers made a civil response to my announcement of planning to attend.
In Slutwalk Hamilton organizer Ashleigh's video, she did not call us rape apologists, misogynist or any number of childish names commonly used. I must admit I was taken aback by that. In my experiences the MHRM is described as the societal devil himself. She did however spout the same old feminist narrative, which is to say a heavy verbal white wash of blame everything on the feminist defined 'patriarchy'
The lack of name calling and outright lies about the MHRM is something I felt deserved a respectful but firm deceleration of our intentions.
With that in mind, about a day before Slutwalk Hamilton I let Ashleigh know, via email, how we would be protesting their's. I informed her we would be taking up a stretch of sidewalk in front of Hamilton City Hall. The area for their event or 'safe space' located at the front of City Hall was about 2500 square feet, we would only be taking up about 150 square feet outside of their 'safe space' on publicly owned city sidewalk. I also informed her that I would be recording audio at all times and only taking video of overt aggressive behavior or illegal activity and keeping our camera angles down to about 20 feet around us.

And the response put forth by those non 'discriminatory' feminists who claimed they wanted to create an inclusive event, was to write some propaganda and post it on their facebook page; (I am going to reproduce the opening line and where the MHRM is mentioned to keep things honest.)
"Hello all! We've been working hard to put together a great, inclusive event (bold font mine) this year with speakers and info tables from some of the fabulous organizations working in our community to change the conversation and end rape culture."
"There have been some concerns from the community about a counter-presence of anti-feminists at this event. For safety and security of attendees, we ask that you do not engage with these people at the event if at all possible. The goal of this group is to provoke/incite a negative response in order to post videos misrepresenting supporters and organizers of SlutWalk specifically and feminists and survivors of sexual violence and harassment in general. We would like to create as safe a space as possible for our fellow survivors and supporters and will be taking preventative actions to do that. If you witness any behaviour disrupting or distorting the SlutWalk message, please let one of us know (we'll have big Ms on the backs of our shirts) so we can deal with it.
Nikki, and the slutwalk organizers, claimed they want the event to be inclusive and then goes onto prejudge the MHRM. No evidence, no questions, just blatant bigotry and prejudice.
You go Nikki I am sure your friends and family are proud of your prejudicial ways and bigotry.
Open question Nikki;
Do you judge people by the colour of their skin as well as their sex?
There was one interaction between Nikki and our group, it went as follows;
A couple of women interested in our refutations of this feminist dogma broadcast at this event stopped and listened. As soon as Nikki realized this she came over and tried to dissuade the two women from having an open discussion on the subject. The two women followed Nikki for a bit and then one came back to listen to the facts we had with us from various government entities.
We also had interactions with the local feminist flying censor monkeys,
Here they are in action

Bless their ideologically driven brains, they really do need some help with critical thinking skills. That being said it does warm my heart knowing that words and ethical ideas scare these people that much. I would report their threats, which I have audio of, but given how the Hamilton police ignore crimes by feminists, it really is a waste of time around here.

Next up was the co-opting of our protest area by a couple of porn friendly feminists. Here is a picture of them and their signs.
[image]

[image]
[image]

Aren't these two sweet?
Not satisfied with the 2500 square feet they were given the use of by the City of Hamilton they felt entitled to take over our space as well. They should be rewarded for being purveyors of common sense, not to mention how entrepreneurial they are.
At least that is how I am sure this little incident will be explained by feminists.
Next there was some engagement with man holding up an interesting sign.
[image]

"Re-Think Sexual Values" is what his sign said, I thought "great maybe this guy knows what he is talking about."
Perhaps a chance for rational exchange of ideas.
Not really
When dialogue started he immediately launched into feminist rhetoric, to which I replied with government studies and statistics. Completely disregarding the fact I mentioned they were government generated reports he let me know he didn't care about 'my' papers.
My papers?
Somebody please shoot me, twice, for that is the same reply Jason received when he tried to engage the man too.

We did not do the studies, did not tally the questionnaires and reports. We had no hand in that nor did any of the MHRM.
What we do have a hand in is bringing these government statistics and peer reviewed studies to the public's attention. The very same public feminists either forget to mention the facts and figures to, or intentionally hid the facts and figures from.
The last bit of interesting incidents from Slutwalk Hamilton was they had Jeff Perera there as a guest speaker. For those of you who do not know Jeff he is a spokesperson for the White Ribbon Campaign and has a TED-x video out that is fairly popular.
I and some of you may know Jeff a little differently.
My first run in with him was from my article on Steph Guthrie. A Toronto feminist who penned a myopic view of the MHRM about 6 months ago. Part of the article was a recorded call to the White Ribbon folk where I asked a few questions of their employee on the other end.
The replies I received were pure misandric garbage with the stench of feminist propaganda.
When the majority of the festivities were finished I went up and introduced myself to Jeff and had a little chat with him.
Now given the fact that the person who answered the phone at White Ribbon was spreading false information one might think that a promise of 'It will never happen again and we are updating our information" would be expressed by Jeff.
Wrong.
What did happen was Jeff tried to shame me by stating how it was not cool to ambush call the White Ribbon line and record it.
Sorry about your luck Jeff and White Ribbon.
When you put out lies which could potentially cause further harm to a person, I and for the most part moral and ethical humans around the world don't give a shit about how the evidence was discovered.
What if I was in an abusive situation and looking for help? The answers from the White Ribbon employee would have been the same and would have left the caller feeling even more helpless and further victimized by yet another government-funded misandric organization.
One last parting thought about the day, That is what we didn't do. We didn't engage in shouting matches, we didn't follow slutwalk attendees into their event and chant outrageous lies about or disrupt them, we didn't scream STFU, we didn’t sing in a mocking way when told about rape victims, we didn’t censor their posters or quote mine them.

And we didn’t trip any false fire alarms trying to censor this feminist event.
What we did is use common sense in every situation.

Patriarchy debunked by NSW Govt.

Paul Elam · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In a historic move reported in Australia's Sunday Telegraph newspaper, the New South Wales[NSW] State Government and Minister Pru Goward have demonstrated integrity and courage by acknowledging the previously ignored population of male victims of domestic violence and choosing to make services available to them that were, until now, only available to women. (Sunday Telegraph (Sydney), 30 Jun 2013, p32.)
The services will include a time-limited private rental subsidy previously offered by Housing NSW to female victims and their children. Goward said the move followed evidence that around one-third of all domestic violence cases were men.
The reference to the "one-third" statistic is almost certainly related to the work of the One in Three Foundation, an Australian organization that has done a very effective job of raising awareness about male victims of intimate partner violence.
Services to be provided are a part of the Start Safely program, which allows victims to be sheltered temporarily while they work toward finding alternate accommodations.
Men will be able to apply from June 24.
There are two possible caveats and concerns that must be stressed during this very positive move in the right direction:
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Follow up – It will be essential to monitor and publicize the actual follow through with this exciting change in policy. It involves government funding which women's organizations have grown very comfortable distributing to women only.

- Possible backlash – The sexual grievance industry is no different in Australia than in other western countries. Advances in the recognition of men's issues translates to a reduced hegemony over the narrative, public discourse and funding related social problems. AVFM fully expects attempts to undermine these changes.

This is not just a positive news story about men's issues finally being recognized. It could signal a true paradigm shift in the way we view the issue of domestic violence, as well as putting us on the road to ending elitist, gynocentric funding of a corrupt domestic violence industry.
The very existence of government funded services for men who are victims of violent women completely obliterates the feminist narrative that domestic violence is an artifact of patriarchy, and establishes once and for all what all the valid research concludes: Domestic violence is a multifaceted social malady that affects both sexes and extends across every imaginable social demographic.
In other words, the truth about DV is a bullet in the head to ideologues who have long gendered the problem.
I recommend that we all thank the One in Three Foundation for their stellar work in pushing the truth about DV into public discourse, but that we watch the actual execution of the follow-up with a critical and cautionary eye.

Gillard: Three reasons to be cheerful

Jim Muldoon · 30 June 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As previously reported in A Voice for Men, Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard was fired by the Labor party before the people of Australia got the chance to give her the boot in the upcoming election (Elam & Esmay, 2013). Personally, I thought that Labor would stay with her for the various reasons as outlined in a previous article (Muldoon, 2013). That Rudd won 57 votes to 45, thanks to a last minute swap in allegiances by powerbroker Bill Shorten (Packham, 2013), suggests that I wasn't that far wrong in my assessment.

Where I was correct, though, was that Gillard had no intention of placing the Labor party ahead of her own ideology. And, whatever side of politics you may sit, there can be little doubt that Labor has been the worse off for Gillard's leadership. As I also outlined, Gillard's rise to power was financed and facilitated by Australia's own manifestation of Emily's List and in many ways was an example of Feminism in action.

The real question for the MHRM is: What is to be learned from Gillard's time in office?

If there is any doubt on the power of Feminism, we need only look at one example. Bear in mind here that Gillard was leading a minority government and Tony Abbot's Liberal and National Coalition were attacking Gillard at every opportunity. Also remember that Kevin Rudd, who was kicked out of office by Gillard in 2010, was constantly undermining her government from within the Labor ranks (Savva, 2013), (Gordon, 2013).

Also, and try not to laugh, but the main stream media are also supposed to hold our elected officials to account.

On Febuary 7, 2013, Gillard made a video for Eve Ensler's feminist campaign "One Billion Rising" (Gillard, 2013). This video starts with Gillard making the claim "One billion women will be raped or beaten in their lifetimes." She urges us to "Let that sink in," before repeating the claim.

The claim is absurd. The statistic evolved from the WHO 2002 World Report on Violence (World Health Organisation, 2002), that cites an Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) study in 1996 which claims that one in three women will experience some form of violence in their lifetime (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 1996).

Back in 2012, Ensler gave an interview in Australia during which she claimed that one billion women would experience "rape or violence". The interview is a classic, if you consider feminist stupidity entertaining, and was exposed in A Voice for Men at the time (Muldoon, 2012)

These forms of violence do include beatings and rape, but the ABS also count threats, grabbing, pushing, sexual touching, stalking and more as violence.

The study justifies its own definitions of violence by citing that these categories would constitute violence in a legal sense. However, given that the women answering the questions were selected at random, there can be no confidence that these women understood the legal complexities associated with those definitions. Effectively, it was violence because the complainant said so.

Doesn't that sound familiar?

So, how much of this "one in three" were actually raped or beaten? There is nothing in the ABS report which indicates how this violence is broken down for the lifetime figures. There are figures on a 12 month period also used in the study. This indicates that in 1995/96 of all the women in Australia 0.5% (one half of one percent) claimed to have been beaten.

There is no category of rape within its definitions of sexual violence.

Let that sink in.

The national 1996 Women's Safety Study done by the ABS, requested by the Office of the Status for Women, did not get a definitive number of how many women were raped. Perhaps they were afraid that the number would be small. Very small.

In other words, the claim that Gillard made is a wild exaggeration of the result of a feminist driven dodgy study. And yet no one from the Opposition called Gillard out for making claims she couldn't possibly substantiate. Not Abbott, nor anyone from his party, nor the right-wing conservative media pundits. No one.

And Rudd? Not a word.

And let's be clear about this. It's not just that she got the number wrong. This raping and beating is not the work of just one man. Give or take the odd serial offender, this is the work of roughly one third of the male population.

To paraphrase Gillard in the video, the accusation is that your father, your brother, or your son will be beating or raping a woman in their lifetime. Because that's the sort of rotten things men do.
Let that sink in.
One third of the male voting public being falsely accused of rape and serious violence and no one wants to make political capital on it.
Not. One. Bit.
So, on face value, Gillard's demise, at the hands of Rudd, won't really make any difference to the feminist governance in Australia. Even if Abbott wins in the next election, these types of feminist lies will go unchallenged.
Nonetheless there are three reasons, at least, for the MHRM to be cheerful.
The first is that feminism has ventured out into the open and failed.
Whatever your politics may be, you can't deny that Gillard failed as a leader. So dismal was her leadership that the party who subsidised her, supported her and defended her from misogyny everywhere, threw her out because they believed (let that sink in: they, not me, believed) that she would bring the party its worst defeat in decades. Words like "electoral annihilation" and "political suicide" were being used to describe why she should not be leading them to the next election.
This is not to say that women should not be world leaders. It is just that, to have good leaders in the tough world of politics, you need politicians who can rise through the ranks on merit rather than loading the dice.
What failed here was the social engineering inherent in Feminism.
The second and third reasons concern the reactions to Gillard's claims of victimhood when things started to go sour for her in the polls. She sought the cover of victimhood, claiming that any stance against her was misogynistic. This claim reached its pinnacle with the "Misogyny Speech" (ABC News, 2013) in parliament and continued through the "Blue Ties Speech" (Women For Gillard, 2013) until the very end in her "Goodbye Speech" (The Guardian, 2013).
The first speech made her the toast of the Cultural Marxists all over the world. In Australia, the press were more excited that Gillard's speech went viral than they were interested in what she actually said.
However, there were two things to note. The first is that the bounce in the polls that the publicity gave her didn't last for long. The second was that many leftists in the media, and that means against Abbott, could not bring themselves to call Abbott a misogynist. For them it was too step too far (Cox, 2013).
In her "Goodbye Speech", Gillard significantly tones down the misogyny claims after the issues of the "Blue Ties"speech, and tries to imply victimhood rather than make any definitive claims.
In other words, the second reason for cheer is that there are limits to the Feminist rhetoric. The general public will only take so much.
With the "Blue Ties" speech, Gillard was not just crying misogyny and victimhood, but also claiming that a vote for Abbott was a return to Patriarchy. This time the response was not simply a lack of lasting bounce. Pundits were estimating that half a million male voters rejected Gillard as a direct result (Atkins, 2013).
It even led The Australian to give an editorial entitled "Julia Gillard's clumsy and manipulative gender war (The Australian, 2013)." The main stream media outlet felt the need to criticize Gillard for her claim that a vote for Abbott would "banish women's voices from our political life." The Australian had this to say, "Voters looking for facts to substantiate this assertion will search in vain."
The next day, the Australian described Gillard's Feminism as being the opposite of promoting women as independent adults. Instead, for Gillard and those like her "women are a breed apart, susceptible to insult, easily offended and in need of affirmative action. (The Australian, 2013)"
Let that sink in.
Feminism is the opposite of promoting women as independent adults (I'm sure I've read that somewhere else, JtO).
What exactly happened must be examined further, but it is clear that something about the speech and its aftermath caused a significant swing in the voting public. It was enough to cause a mainstream news outlet to not only mention, but criticise Feminism. It also played a major part in Gillard's eventual downfall.
For a brief moment, at least half a million Australian men felt the rage. Understanding what nerve was touched, and how it may be brought into consciousness, would be a significant step forward for the MHRM.

And that has put me in a most excellent mood.

Marriage is obsolete. Are women?

Jason Gregory · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You've got it all backwards. Men invented the technology that liberated us from the parasitic housewife. We invented the washer/dryer, toaster, microwave oven, electric stove, refrigerator, modern plumbing/electricity, and most of the things that have now made the traditional housewife obsolete. We liberated ourselves from you. We don't need you in the house anymore, so get the fuck out. You don't need liberation from patriarchy, and by extension, liberation from men – in reality, you need liberation from your own obsolescence. Perhaps you should consider making yourself useful as something other than a sandwich-maker and create a meaningful existence for yourself, one that doesn't rely on an identity as a victim of patriarchy. Again, you've got it all backwards.

We live in an amazing time. When, in the history of humanity, has there ever been such cultural pressure (and opportunity) for women to create their own identity, meaning, and purpose? Their default position and role within societal structures has typically and historically been one that entails their utility as mother, caregiver, and housewife—all cultural constructs that likely emerged from lower biological drives and that have evolved to exist primarily in the form of relationships to family, to husband, and as part of a marriage.

If we view marriage and the role of the traditional housewife as a form of cultural technology, it is an obsolete piece of technology—no more useful than the vacuum tubes in an old radio from the 1930s. As these vacuum tubes gave way to transistors and those to silicon chips, so too marriage is giving way to other forms of cultural technology. (See the SCOTUS decision on DOMA.)

Our culture is experiencing this transition right now. With the advent and proliferation of those aforementioned modern amenities and technologies, the housewife and marriage itself have become (and are becoming) obsolete pieces of cultural technology. If we view these pieces of cultural technology as extensions of a woman's identity, meaning, and purpose, women have been and are experiencing a loss; it is a loss that exists in the form of their own obsolescence. Prior generations of women, unlike today's generation, did not have to concern themselves with creating an identity, meaning, and purpose, at least not to the extent required today. Such things were built in to the culture for them. They could simply rely on the old cultural technology of marriage, housewifery and reproductive duties to find relevance and a sort of fulfillment. Given that such things as marriage and traditional gender roles are becoming less relevant, women are now confronting this sort of obsolescence.

In this way, the plight of the modern woman can be viewed not as a struggle against patriarchy, but as a struggle against their own obsolescence. It's a struggle to remain relevant, to find identity, meaning, and purpose. It's a struggle for fulfillment given the present absence of a cultural technology that once provided for them, as Heidegger might say, a "ready-to-hand" construct, a prefabricated role as mother, caregiver, and wife. With this "ready-to-hand" obsolescence and malfunctioning of these traditional roles and of marriage, a divide has emerged from within the once great gynocentrisms that enveloped prior cultures. As such, this divide reveals itself in the forms of radical traditionalists and radical feminists.

The traditionalist sort of right-wing feminists (think Phyllis Schlafly and her ilk) are nothing but a hodgepodge of stereotypically grumpy Luddites concerned with a sort of radical conservatism that attempts to maintain the old cultural technology and stubbornly refuses adaptation to and adoption of new cultural technologies—ones that might replace the traditional housewife and marriage. They are like neophobe geeks raging hard for a return to the HD DVD or to Betamax or for the Microsoft Zune.

> Of the more radical leftist feminists and their ilk, we can view them not as Luddites, but as misguided revolutionaries who have created an identity for themselves as antagonists of the patriarchy. They are women compelled to create a narrative (a cultural technology, if you will) within our social-cultural structure—an astonishing attempt to create something that might restore to women an identity, meaning, and purpose.

Sadly, this cultural technology is a disaster loosely analogous to something like Windows ME. It was supposed to be a sort of revolutionary software technology making the home PC more useful and attractive to the home PC buyer. However, it was buggy, prone to crashing, unstable, and poorly constructed, with limited and restricted access to MS-DOS. Though some of the graphics and interfaces were stylish, the real-world user experience was painful, aggravating, and for Microsoft, it was a disaster—having barely one year of shelf-life.

Similarly, the shelf-life of these would-be revolutionaries of modern leftist feminism is also running out. That is to say, their product doesn't perform as it should. It's buggy and slow and prone to crash in the face of real-world experiences. Its logic is unstable and does not hold up under questioning about its foundational underpinnings. In short, their construct exists only in relation to patriarchy and if the narrative of patriarchal oppression of women doesn't hold up under logical scrutiny, so too does their narrative and corresponding construct fail because their construct does not exist apart from its foundation—which is patriarchy. And patriarchy, as an overarching explanation for the oppression of women, is not a true paradigm. Again, it's not patriarchy. It's obsolescence.

If the modern woman wants to overcome this sort of obsolescence and create relevance for herself – if she wants to create identity, meaning, and purpose – perhaps she could take a clue from the philosopher Andy Clark. In Andy Clark's Being There: Putting Brain, Body, and World Together Again, a phrase called the "scaffolded mind" is used to describe the "amazing capacities [of humans] to create and maintain a variety of special external structures (symbolic and social-institutional). [The scaffolded mind helps us structure] our environment so that we can succeed with less intelligence. Our brains make the world smart so that we can be dumb in peace!

Or, to look at it another way, it is the human brain plus these chunks of external scaffolding that finally constitutes the smart, rational inference engine we call mind…[and the boundaries of our mind]… extend further out into the world than we might have initially supposed (179,180)." Clark goes on to describe a "scaffolded action" as one that "relies on some kind of external support. Such support would come from the use of tools or from exploitation of the knowledge and skills of others; that is to say, scaffolding [that denotes] a broad class of physical, cognitive, and social augmentations…that allow us to achieve some goal that would otherwise be beyond us (190)."

If the modern woman has the goal of achieving something that is otherwise beyond her, she'd abandon the entire narrative of patriarchal oppression and create scaffolds for women that extend outward from her "present-at-hand," as Heidegger might say, existence and into an existence of relevance—one that isn't dependent upon being the victim of patriarchy, or some sort of revolutionary slayer of patriarchy.

As the modern woman faces this Heideggerian "ready-to-hand" obsolescence, she must create her own relevance, one that is independent of false narratives about patriarchy. She must create a new sort of "scaffolded" cultural technology for herself—one that extends outward from the "present-at-hand" structure and into relevance. Without this sort of scaffolded mind to bridge the gap between obsolescence and relevance, women may as well leave their minds in a jar by the door and continue screaming like the stereotypical moustache-encrusted and incoherent purveyors of misandry who demand that men provide to them a scaffolded structure into typically male spaces of cultural technology a la Adria Richards and the Donglegate fiasco.

Richard Rorty makes a beautiful and profound statement in his later work—Philosophy and Social Hope: “Everything that can serve as a term of relation can be dissolved into another set of relations, and so on forever.

There are, so to speak, relations all the way down, all the way up, and all the way out in every direction; you never reach something which is not just one more nexus of relations. (54).”If the modern woman wants to build her relational relevance, one that exists apart from the old cultural technology that provided a sort of prefabricated role of existence in relation to her utility as mother, caregiver, housewife, etc., she must not fall in to the trap of trying to build a set of relations and scaffolding from the present absence of something—literally nothing, her Heideggerian “ready-to-hand” obsolete roles of previous generations. She also cannot extend scaffolds and relations from false narratives of patriarchy. These false narratives about patriarchy are a ground in which to try and stabilize such scaffolding and that ground is a sort of quagmire, a swamp that will swallow, envelop, and dissolve those relations and scaffolds, only to prolong the “ready-to-hand” obsolescence.

We do live in an amazing time. Women have the opportunity to create for themselves a new identity, meaning, and purpose. As men have created so many of the amenities and technologies that liberated us from the “ready-to-hand” cultural technologies of marriage and of the traditional parasitic housewife, it is now time that women step up and create something other than lamentations about patriarchy or the waxed poetic words of how great things were under traditionalism.

The burden is on women to create, to remove themselves from the rut of traditionalism, and to remove themselves from the rut of blaming patriarchy. Until the modern woman removes herself from these ruts, she will be stuck in the wrongheaded direction and have within her perspective the kind of backwards thinking that gets her nowhere even close to being liberated from her own obsolescence.

You’re not needed in the house anymore, so get the fuck out.

Dragonslayer Schlafly kills the ERA

Harry Crouch · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Phyllis Schlafly is best known as the dragon-slayer of the Equal Rights Amendment. Unfortunately, the failure of the ERA facilitated radical feminists infiltrating almost every nook and cranny of our institutions with no counterbalance for men.

Had the ERA passed, there's a good chance preferential treatment based on group identity would have rapidly gone the way of the dinosaurs. We, as a society, would have been forced to treat all of us with similar regard, concern, and respect. Men and women would have been treated more fairly with similar or the same benefits, consequences, rights and responsibilities.

Schlafly opposes women registering for Selective Service too. She, like radical feminists, asks special consideration to continue exempting women from registering for Selective Service, even though women can volunteer for military service and are an ever-growing part of our military, with some in combat positions.

Young men who fail to register for Selective Service can be charged, tried, and convicted of a felony. They can be imprisoned, face substantial fines, and be denied government benefits including student loans.

In her recent article, Who is Waging War on Women?, Schlafly says that assigning women to fight in ground combat is the "real war, with real guns, real bullets and real deaths."

Women are now police officers, FBI agents, CIA officers, and other well-armed pistol-packing professionals; a daughter of a good friend of mine is on a major city's SWAT team. All of which is nasty business with real guns, real bullets, and real deaths. We all bleed regardless of gender. Death comes for all of us. There is no valid reason to exempt women for registering with Selective Service.

[image]In 1981, in Rostker v. Goldberg, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that since women were not allowed to hold combat positions they did not have to register for Selective Service because they were not similarly situated with men.

Marc Angelucci, Esq., NCFM Vice President, on behalf of the National Coalition For Men, recently filed suit against the Selective Service System for their refusal to require women to register. The Selective Service System moved to strike, primarily arguing the case is not "ripe" since provisions of the National Defense Authorization Act for 2014 are pending implementation. A court hearing is scheduled in July.

Inexplicably, the Obama administration orders the military to open its doors to women in combat while simultaneously opposing requiring women to register for Selective Service because the issue is not "ripe." Say what?

If that were not enough, Schlafly notes that the Department of Defense recommended establishing a Diversity Czar (officer). Schlafly is concerned that achieving "diversity metrics" (i.e., female quotas) will change all requirements that women pass the same tests required of the men, which will never happen.

No matter what anyone says, "diversity metrics" will embrace weakening of qualifications and standards; similar programs always have and there's no reason to think allowing women to hold combat positions will result in anything different.

Weakening the qualifications and standards is the only way women will be able to pass the same physical endurance and conditioning tests as men. Men generally have more upper body strength than women and are physically stronger overall. So while it is true that women will be required to pass the same tests required of men, over time men will find it less strenuous and demanding to pass the same tests required of women.

The Diversity Czar's allegiance to her feminist political affiliations will strain her sworn oath of allegiance to her county. Her appointment, as noted by Schlafly, may indeed "trump truth, honor, and common sense." She will be the military's chief "political officer" not unlike the one on the Soviet submarine in the movie The Hunt for Red October.

In an early scene Captain Marko Ramius (Sean Connery) enters his cabin where at the Captain's table sits uninvited the Communist Party's Political Officer reading one of the Captain's books. His intrusion into the small private space and personal belongings of Captain Ramius is his assertion of power. "I must oversee the stability of the crew, Comrade," he says to Ramius, "I suggest we open our orders…"

The Diversity Czar is radical feminism's Political Officer; her primary goal will be to ease the promotion of as many like-minded women as possible to the higher ranks, thereby gaining greater control of the military. Once installed, lesser political officers will follow and be attached to every unit in the military, the majority, or all of whom, will be ideologically beholden to radical feminist orthodoxy. The Diversity Officer is an affirmative action officer for women under a different name. There will come a day, like on the Red October, when commanding officers won't be able to open or execute orders without the presence of his or her respective PO.

Regardless, there is no direct relationship between women signing up for Selective Service and reducing the standards for ground combat training, duty assignments, men or women volunteering for military service, or even being drafted! We haven't had a draft since Vietnam!

Unless a draft is reinstituted, registering for Selective Service does not require anyone to join anything, including the military. But requiring women to register for the Selective Service does level the playing field by extending to men and women equal benefits, consequences, rights and responsibilities.

Having a Diversity Czar is something else all together. The DC will adversely impact the military, especially military men who will find themselves open to substantially more false accusations of sexual misconduct, domestic violence, and child abuse. Men will find promotions more difficult to achieve and being drummed out of the military for little of no reason a common occurrence.

A young man's life can be ruined for failing to register for Selective Service; a young women's life is unaffected. By not registering for Selective Service women enjoy more benefits with less risk; they are not faced with the possibility of being fined, denied various government benefits, criminalized, or incarcerated. Yet, they can volunteer for military service with full benefits. Women registering for Selective Service do not change the military in any significant way.

Hundreds of thousands of men have sacrificed life, limb, and family in the military. If anyone has earned special consideration it's men, not women. All we ask is to require both men and women to register for Selective Service; or, end it, one way or the other.

NOTE: Phyllis, no one is waging war on women, not even 18-year-olds. I'm surprised that you muscled in on the tired feminist "war on women" ruse. I guessing you were being cynical. You know very well that if there's a gender-war it's waged against boys and men of all ages.

There can be only one

Diana Davison · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Voices mingled as the crowd found their seats and the arena echoed with the cackles and squawks of geese at a tea party. Excitement bred with tension as last minute bets were placed, tweets were twitted, and statuses updated. A cacophony of heels clattered and scraped as ticket holders rushed back from concession stands with scones and iced lattes in hand. The chittering rose to crescendo – then descended to a hush.

The burly announcer strode to center ring. With cropped black hair, winged eyeliner that would skewer a wild boar, and shoulder padded tuxedo, she extended an arm as the microphone snaked its descent to her sweaty palm.

"Laaadies and Lapdogs! Welcome to the kickboxing match of the year! Brought to you by Arid's new personal care product Winter's Whisper. Don't fight it with flowers, freshen with freedom. This night is sanctioned by the International Feminist Fight Foundation and will be scored on Twitter. This is a 'no holds barred' match so tighten your bra straps and prepare to see blood.

And now…Let's get ready to grumbllllllllllllle!"

The spotlight swept to the side and all attention was riveted as black doors flew open to reveal Julia Gillard. With a royal blue head band and matching silk cape brandishing ALP stars she punched at the air before her with determination. There was a roar from the stands as she worked her way to the ring looking agile with the occasional wave to the crowd that turned into a mean mock uppercut. Ringside attendants stretched the ropes and Gillard paused, turning back to her fans to blow a two-handed kiss before ducking into the fight zone.

"In the big red corner, weighing in at a lean 160 pounds, you all know this feisty redhead. Recently ousted by her own party, she fought the patriarchy and made one of the best last ditch misogyny speeches ever heard in parliament. She attempted the impossible: to deploy accusations of sexism in defence of sexism. A woman who knows no bounds and isn't ready to whimper softly into the night. Born in Wales and with the ass of one, it's the Former Prime Minister of Australia, Juuuliaaa Gillaaard!"

The announcer's voice trailed as Julia whipped her robe from her shoulders, twirled it over her head then tossed it to the ground before spitting on it. The crowd applauded. With her blue blazer and coordinated leggings, Gillard picked up the cape, cradled her ass with it and dramatically wiped her behind with aplomb. As the stands screamed support she nodded vigorously, held the cape high and stomped on it with her Gucci pumps.

"And in the other big red corner, her challenger!" the crowd ooohed, the spotlight swooped, and matching black doors burst open on the other side of the venue as if by mysterious force. Standing with head bent, Ranty Minx slowly raised evil eyes as music filled the stadium. In her bright white suit jacket of fame she stood, wispy flames of red hair flicked around black pencilled eyebrows while her plastic lips curled in a slow smug smile. Arms spread, she bounced her hips to the beat then placed a hand on her cinched waist and swaggered her way in a catwalk towards centre stage. "Patriarchy! Patriarchy!" rang through the ceiling as she pointed her red gloved hands accusingly at those within sight. When attendants rose to lift the ropes she shoved them aside and flung herself onto the mat, rolling to a crouch then springing up with both hands ready.

Thunder erupted from the stands.

"Weighing in at an impressive 185 pounds, she came out of nowhere: the fearless young feminist who, with no wasted years of internship, took Canada by surprise. Often found at rallies fighting religion and the patriarchy at street level. It's the University of Toronto's saint of 'Shut The Fuck Up.' The evangalizer of 'I'm Reading Here.' She's the perfect fucking woman and she's not done! Aaaanyway! I don't know if you're noticing a theme, It's Raaantyyy Miiinx!!"

Ranty plunged both arms above her head with a snarl and pranced around the ring as her theme song faded out. Gillard waved a dismissive hand from her corner and the announcer took the spotlight once again.

“As you can see, gals, we’ve got to two Big Red corners and you know what that means?” She held a sweaty palm to her prominent ear as the crowd joined in the traditional reply:

“THERE CAN BE ONLY ONE!!”

Kicking off their heels and straightening their blazers, the two women sized each other up, stalking in a casual concentric circle.

Ranty curled her upper lip. “I had a music demo on Youtube. I sing.”

Gillard laughed dismissively. “I knit my own boxing gloves.”

“You bitch!” Ranty tried a surprise left hook but Gillard deflected it with ease. The smile disappeared from Minx’s maw as she took three sharp jabs to the ribs before managing to block a fourth. She stumbled back then squared off in a wide stance.

“You print your speeches off the internet,” Gillard scoffed. “You’re an amateur!” She tried a front kick but Ranty was fast.

“Your speeches were written by staff. And some of them were men!” Gillard’s legs flew out from under her and she scrambled to the side as Ranty moved in. Gillard struggled to her feet fending of the blows as she regained her stance. There would be bruises. They both staggered in the direction of their corners and tried to regain their breath. With perspective, Ranty muttered “Germaine Greer was right, you do need a better tailor.”

Gillard levelled her shoulders. “At least my eyebrows are real hair!” Ranty missed a round kick to the head and Julia wasted no time closing in. She dove onto her prey with fingers clutching clumps of over-processed tresses and her knee firmly in Minx’s back. “Two radio jocks were punished for making inappropriate remarks to me!” She smashed Minx’s face into the canvas but Minx managed to flip Gillard from her back with the sheer power of her buttocks. Both women rolled over with a groan.

“I managed to elicit rape and death threats from just one public appearance!” Ranty wiped the blood from her nose and took the power position. “How many years did it take you to get attention, you hack?” Gillard stumbled to her feet but her gloves were unravelling. The crowd rose in expectation. The end was near. Ranty moved in for the kill.

Gillard lunged for a final swing, “I ousted a man as the head of my party!” Her fist met empty air.

Ranty ducked and came in under Gillard’s guard, landing a solid uppercut. “Look what it got you!” As Gillard listed back, Ranty stepped forward, sneering. “You were kicked to the curb! Your Party actually gave a shit about men and their opinions. Who does that? That’s right. You were bargaining with Patriarchy!” Ranty shoved Gillard back: “I,” jab to the nose, “am!” right hook, “A meme!” upper cut.

Gillard slumped to her knees on the ring floor. Ranty caught the back of Gillard’s head and slammed a knee into her jaw. Gillard slid into a heap at her feet. Ranty regarded her with disgust, “And memes live for fucking ever!”

Panting, Ranty turned to the crowd and raised her arms. A deafening roar filled the arena. Pumping fists of encouragement Ranty led the chant. “THERE CAN BE ONLY ONE!!”

Gillard’s head raised from the mat and fell moments later in defeat, briefly wondering if she still had dental coverage.

It was over.

“Aaand there you have it!!” The announcer sprang back into the ring with flushed cheeks. She scooped her arms to the ground and lifted the rising cheers of the crowd as a puppeteer. Pandemonium erupted.

“And the winner by knockout! Raaaantyyyy Miiinx! The new champion Big Red title holder of the world!”

“Yeah! That’s right!!” Ranty fell to her knees and threw her hands wide. “Who won? I did!”

The announcer crouched at Ranty's side. "Tell us, what are your plans now you've won the world title of Big Red?"

Ranty grinned. "First I'd like to send out a big Fuck You to all those misogynists who doubted me! And for my fans… when men are whining about their problems and losing their privilege I'll be there to grab Patriarchy by the balls and give them a final twist! We all know men's problems are a result of their own Patriarchy and all they need to do is shut the fuck up and listen!"

Fans clawed their way into the ring, swarming Ranty and pushing past the Announcer. They hoisted her up above their heads, screaming with joy.

The announcer struggled through the throng to get the microphone close enough to catch Ranty's final words of victory. "Listen to what?"

Ranty's smeared lips spread wide. "My… Feminism… Is fixing it!!"

Ally Fogg: liar's harem

Paul Elam · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago Ally Fogg wrote an article about domestic violence for "Free" Thought Blogs. Save a couple of stupendous blunders betraying his motivation it was a pretty decent piece. It was so good, in fact, that it actually marked a policy shift at FTB, which is to seldom if ever deviate from the feminist narrative of any subject, much less something as incendiary as the subject of intimate partner violence.

Still Fogg did the basics of what he was supposed to do. He laid bare the laughable canard of men being the sole perpetrators of domestic violence, exposed the tip of the iceberg on feminist backlash against research, and researchers, in dissent from the feminist narrative, and proffered the need to revise our approach to the problem of violence with research-based, fact-driven solutions. In other words, Fogg said what MHRAs have been saying since before he could spell DV.

I should be happy, right? A quasi-feminist is admitting some of the facts. His ideas have been published (and remained standing) on a blog known for extirpating all noncompliance with ideological feminist doctrine. A comment section that has almost approached thoughtful has emerged at FTB as a result. So am I happy?

Uh, no. Not even close. Nor should anyone else be if they have even a remote interest in ridding society of the real problems that have prevented us from developing and implementing a sensible model for addressing violence in the home.

Fogg's first fail flops in early, when he attempts to define the root of the misunderstanding by drawing from Kate Millett's 1970 Radfem opus, "Sexual Politics."

> Excepting a social license to physical abuse among certain class and ethnic groups, force is diffuse and generalized in most contemporary patriarchies. Significantly, force itself is restricted to the male who alone is psychologically and technically equipped to perpetrate physical violence. Where differences in physical strength have become immaterial through the use of arms, the female is rendered innocuous by her socialization. Before assault she is almost universally defenceless both by her physical and emotional training. Needless to say, this has the most far-reaching effects on the social and psychological behaviour of both sexes.

Please note Millett's use of the term "patriarchies." Let it sink in, because as you read through Fogg's agenda ridden analysis, you won't see it mentioned again. It is as though he never noticed it in the first place, despite the fact that patriarchy theory forms the critical foundation for the feminist narrative on domestic violence and most of their other ideological talking points.

Opting away from addressing the core issue, Fogg simply regurgitates perspective that has been addressed here and other places for a number of years; that being a look at the work of Murray Straus, Suzanne Steinmetz and Richard Gelles, how their research pointed to gender symmetry in intimate partner violence, and how their findings resulted in death threats and a tsunami of academic backlash – assumedly from feminist ideologues.

I am sure this might have wowed the crowd at FTB, as they are a rather insulated group thanks to their mindless allegiance to the edicts of PZ Myers. But there is nothing new here, and nothing ultimately useful from Fogg's rather lackluster attempt to catch up to, co-opt and modify AVFM successes in changing the public discourse about domestic violence.

Again, what he fails at most miserably, consciously or not, is in understanding that it is feminism's Patriarchy Theory that is at the root of feminist disinformation about domestic violence (and most everything else) in the first place. Patriarchy Theory, which embraces the idea that all social and legal power was conferred upon men, as a class, at the expense of women, as a class, is no more rational or provable than Millett's completely vapid statement that, “Significantly, force itself is restricted to the male who alone is psychologically and technically equipped to perpetrate physical violence.”

This is the incontinent elephant in the living room that Fogg doesn’t notice, and why he instead opts to sing old songs for a new crowd, and attack a few people while he does it. We can call Fogg’s approach “rehash and bash.”

The bashing is just as important to the theme as the rehashing, and ultimately reveals his motives. In Fogg’s penultimate paragraph he links to an article of mine he defines as “violently misogynistic.” To wit:

> My contempt for the feminists who have actively obstructed efforts to help men is matched by my contempt for those men who seek to actively undermine women’s services with sneering, paranoid references to a ‘domestic violence industry’, or violently misogynistic reactions to any perceived provovation[sic]. Two wrongs do not make a right.

Nor do three, Mr. Fogg. Let me explain, even as I sit chuckling at the idea that a man has expressed contempt for me doing something I have never done, and for which he knowingly offers a red herring as proof. Oh yes, it is particularly comical given the fact that he is doing this in the middle of an ostentatious nobility fit intended to dramatize his good character.

Three years ago I wrote a satirical, and somewhat belated response to an article on Jezebel.com in which the staff of that publication and their readers were having a grand old time bragging to each other and backslapping over who had been the most physically abusive with their male partners.

It was the most disgusting display of domestic violence glorification I have seen, before or since.

I wrote a particularly provocative response to it, in order to demonstrate how that sort of mentality might appear in a scenario where the perpetrator was male and the victim was female. In it, I made some overtly graphic references to the violence and proclaimed that we were declaring a “Bash a Violent Bitch Month.”

Now, I knew at the time the possible reaction to this kind of satire. And as the fumbling Fogg has just linked to it again, three years later, it seems my call on the reaction was not far off the mark. So, when I wrote it, I was sure to include a few words which were completely accurate, if not wholly traditional in satire. I said, in reference to the proposed violence and the “Bash a Violent Bitch Month,” the following:

> Now, am I serious about this?
> No.

I know, it is sort of like opening a carton of milk for a kid at recess instead of letting him figure out how to do it on his own. Such are the needs of part of our audience in the realm of gender politics. I will let you decide who needs the extra help, but I might suggest that some of the candidates for said assistance are those “Free” Thought Bloggers who were just shoveled a load of Ally Fogg’s bullshit that my article was a serious, misogynistic call to violence and an attempt to undermine services for women who need them.

Fogg is out here now, “advocating” for men’s issues, complaining vociferously about the antics of disingenuous ideologues, yet falsely painting other advocates as violent misogynists and, quite stunningly, denying that a multi-billion dollar industry is an industry.

Surely there is a reason?

Of course there is. It is the same reason he tacitly takes shots, though much less nasty ones, at Gelles, Steinmetz and Straus, by calling the notion of symmetry “nonsensical,” and generally painting the erudite trio as myopic for even believing in something as silly as domestic violence in the first place.

It is the same reason he has been insulting to Peter Lloyd for suing a gym for the very straightforward issue of charging him the same money as women to work out there, but then forcing him to do what amounts to a perp walk out the front door every day so that women can have the place to themselves, free from his self-esteem deflating view.

Indeed there must be reasons why no one from Paul Elam to Peter Lloyd to Richard Gelles pass muster with Fogg.

My guess is regressive, hierarchical, banty rooster masculinity that could only be made more comical with a codpiece and a chest toupée. A poster boy for biological determinism, Ally Fogg wants a harem, and he intends to get there by being the One Good Man.

He is not the bad, bad man like Peter Lloyd, who would disallow women's special privilege over men at the gym (read: retail sector). He is not like that bad, bad man Paul Elam that would speak the truth to women without considering their feelings first and whether or not it set well with them to hear it (emotional/interpersonal sector).

He is even better and smarter and oh so much more socially conscious than the people who totally (and quite bravely) debunked the patriarchal explanation for domestic violence in the first place. In fact, if you just listen to him, The One Good Man, you will discover that there is not only no such thing as a domestic violence industry, you will indeed find that domestic violence itself is not even a thing.

Yeah, that's the ticket.

What Ally Fogg is counting on is the same thing that male feminists and white knights have been counting on for ages: duping women into believing he is the alpha dawg, for realz. That is same-same speak for The One Good Man.

He wants to show the world, particularly the world of vaginas, that he is The One Man to whom they can safely listen. Like a 3,000,000 year old artifact of a pre-modern climber in the male hierarchy, Fogg is preening for position and stature. And like most men who spend life in craven pursuit of female approval and attention, he requires scapegoats to get the job done.

That is why he chose a male-bashing, ideologically driven pro-feminist forum that panders to the likes of Rebecca Watson, Ophelia Benson and pretty much anyone else peddling a gynocentric threat narrative. He fits with that crowd like Dr. Phil fits with Oprah's girl-audience.

He imagines he is a part of the new paradigm (indeed he apparently fantasizes that he is creating it), all while he is oblivious to the fact that his shtick, including the lies, is ten years behind the learning curve and as old school as a ram looking for a head to butt. He is likely not aware that he is butting heads with his own ghost. Not to worry though, scoring points with pearl-clutching women out of thin air is neither new nor so shopworn that it won't still get some play. Though I do expect we will eventually see a one-up as followup article from PZ not too far down the road. If Fogg gets traction with the FTB crowd, Myers won't long stay silent. He will be there with the "real, real, real" story on intimate partner violence. It will be alpha wars, a secular death match.

Here's the rub. Fogg senses, and quite correctly, that the days of the old feminist narrative are coming to an end. He is betting that even the readers of FTB are starting to smell the coffee, even if it is the pedestrian, cheapo brand from the corner market. He knows that the vacuum left in formerly occupied space of feminist thought must, to one degree or another, correct misguided feminist dogma, thus his pointed but ineffectual attacks on their ideas and tactics.

He wants to be the correction, but his lead-in is just more toxic fakery. He advises us that two wrongs don't make a right, and then proves it in spades.

He is recognizing, as apparently is PZ Myers, Lisa Hickey and every other ideologue slipping market ground because they don't know what the fuck they are talking about when it comes to sexual politics, that a change in direction is needed.

Fogg's biggest mistake is in that he is clueless about how and why things are actually changing. If he had said clue, this website would not be on his target list, and neither would people who actually know the subject matter. He certainly would not be spreading lies about them.

Men like Fogg are typically, however, far less interested in what is actually happening than they are in making themselves appear as though they are in the driver's seat. Thus he is trying to establish himself as an expert on the new phenomenon, as a member of the vanguard — as The One Good Man.

What all this boils down to, as we continue to untether ourselves from 50 years of feminist agitprop, step around the occasional patch of semantic quicksand and bullshit from people like Fogg and begin to clear the rubble from a war of the sexes that was entirely concocted and waged by feminist ideologues, is that the only thing that will pull us out of the miasma of gender hatred will be a new social contract between men and women. It will require women developing a stomach for the truth, and men developing spine enough to speak it, even to women who can't stomach it.

Truth. Critical word, that. And so is spine, Mr. Fogg.

Men like you, subscribing to lies, telling them, and disingenuously fucking other men over for the sake of female approval, are precisely why we are out here now, cleaning up the mess.

Monday Roundup for 2 July 2013

Dean Esmay · 2 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Today's Monday Roundup is being presented to you on a Tuesday, because AVfM suspended operations in memory of Senior Editor Suzanne McCarley's late husband Mac. Suz, I will just echo Paul Elam's words: we are aware that grief is a long process that lasts and lingers far past the initial reaction of support. The people of this community will be here for you for the long haul, Suz. Long after the flowers have wilted away and the the cards stop coming. You have been with us for the duration and we will do the same for you.

Now, life is for the living, and let us speak of other events we have seen here on A Voice for Men in the last week, both wonderful and tragic:

Our Summer 2013 fundraiser was a record-breaking smash. Activism, both direct activism and working hard to change the cultural landscape, takes time, hard work and, yes, money. We deeply thank those of you who appreciate that and who do whatever you can to help. If you think recent political events giving gynocentric attitudes and policies seen in places like Australia, Europe, Canada, and other places have nothing to do with the cultural forces we're working so hard to change, well, we respectfully suggest you're mistaken. But for those of you who get it, all we can do is humbly say thank you. And thank you we do!

Psychotherapist Tom Golden returned with Part 2 of his series on misandry in psychology: Ignoring abused boys. His in-depth review of published research and the attitudes underlying it is eye-popping; I wish I could say it's surprising, but there's so much poorly performed and ideologically driven research these days when it surrounds boys and men it's astounding. It's almost like men and boys aren't even human. You definitely don't want to miss Tom Golden's series, and you'll want to keep an eye out for future installments.

Facebook's obscene kowtowing to a Stalinist mentality with a pretense of "protecting women" (but not men, of course) has been an ongoing problem. Victor Zen has a look at the trail of money leading to the Stalinist groups advocating censorship. It's not pretty, but it's important information. These thugs in skirts and their male enablers need to be exposed for what they are.

James Taranto of the Wall Street Journal (who, fair disclosure, I am Facebook friends and email acquaintances with) recently underwent an attempted cyber-mugging by the professional hate mongers at Jezebel, including Katie J.M. Baker as well as others. To our delight, Taranto refused to kowtow to their hateful bullshit, and put them in their place like the crypto-fascist pissants and liars that they are. On the other hand, we think Taranto, whom the Jezebel crowd dubbed a "cockroach," did not go far enough in noting Jezebel's hateful hypocrisy and stupidity. Diana Davison pulls out a wonderful treasure from history, the New York Tribune's old "Archy the cockroach" character, and notes how as far as sharp social satire goes, Taranto is in very good company.

Oh yeah, and fuck you, Katie McDonough.

By the way, the world became a much better place last week when they fired Australian Prime Minister Julia Gillard. No, really, they fired her! BWAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH THEY FIRED JULIA GILLARD! Oh man. Sure it doesn't fix everything, but with any luck she and her professional hatemonger cronies from Emily's List will never see the light of day again. That's real cockroaches for you.

Artist, poet and essayist Dr. F. returned to grace our pages with the tale of Mr. Whippy, and left this reader, and others, wondering: why are we so fast to believe rumors about men and children, no questions asked?

Della Burton, a veteran social commentator on Reddit and other social media, has penned a rather stunningly complete expose on the Stalinist thugs at the group known as "ShitRedditSays," as well as the thugs at Gawker and, yes, the sleazy scumbags at Jezebel. If you're at all interested in who's trying to control what you're allowed to read and think on the internet, please don't miss Fusk You SRS!, and thank you Della for all your hard work exposing these vermin.

Have you heard of Barry Williams? I'm ashamed to say that up until a month or so ago I never heard of him. I didn't even know I'd never heard of him, or that I should have. Well I fixed that, and to help you fix it for yourself, please check out Men's Human Rights Australia: Barry Williams. Considering just how many Australians read A Voice for Men, and the work of people like Barry, I have to say that between them and the Canadians they're putting us Americans to shame when it comes to working on the human rights of boys and men. Listen up my fellow Yanks, and everybody, make time to listen to Barry speak.

Tired of hearing what men need to do to please women or make them happy? Jason Gregory flips the script and even coins a new term: "Panther," to describe a woman who isn't a dependent dishrag or self-entitled bitch. If you want some dating advice, especially in the online dating area, be sure to check out Jaguars Only: others need not apply. It's nice to see a man actually, you know, saying what he wants in a woman.

We hear constantly about the so-called "war on women" here in the United States because various American politicians (of both sexes) still squabble about abortion. In the meantime, men continue to have no reproductive rights at all, which no one wants to talk about. In reproductive slavery, John Hembling reminds us that by comparison to women, men have no control over their reproduction and, worse, may be enslaved to another person's choices. What was that "my body my choice" stuff again?

The story of circumcision in Africa, on boys and men of all ages, not always voluntarily and often under severe social pressure despite a dearth of scientific data to suggest it, goes deep. AVfM News Director Robert O'Hara has an interview with an anti-circumcision activist in Kenya. Isn't it funny how we can all find great time to think about female genital mutilation over there but no one wants to talk about male genital mutilation?

Feminism and gay rights–they go together, right? Wrong. Feminism has a long dark history of alliances of convenience, at best, with many gay activists, and sometimes it's much uglier than that. Be sure to check out Jim Doyle's great piece on Feminism and gay bashing for more on a sordid part of history a lot of people wish you didn't know about (or wish some of you would forget).

False rape accusations are nothing new. Gonzo historian Robert St. Estephe examines a rape case from 1896 that has all the same patterns as we tend to see today. What was that old line about those who forget history being doomed to repeat it?

In case you were wondering, our Summer 2013 donation drive was a smashing success. Activism of all sorts costs money, and those who say it's wrong to ask for help are foolish. Nothing in this life is free, nothing. Thank you very much for those who understand that.

Former U.S. Presidential candidate and Senator John McCain did something right recently. We noticed. So did the National Coalition for Men. Let's hope the Senator keeps doing the right thing. Civil rights and fundamental human rights in general aren't just for women, last we checked anyway.

A mutilating monster has been given life in prison, although apparently she'll be eligible for parole far too soon for our tastes.

Women have always been oppressed, right? But men haven't, right? Or anyway not near as bad. We all "know" this right? It's not even "feminist" to say so anymore, it's just something "everybody knows." Yet somehow, Jim Muldoon questions what everybody knows. How dare that thoughtless bastard?

The always friendly, gentle-tongued, and endearing John Hembling has a helpful guide for feminists on how not to sound like an idiot. That John, he's our big cuddly teddy bear!

Dan Perrins, the men's movement's most dauntless and dogged boots-on-the-ground, never-say-die activist recently attended a Slutwalk in Hamilton. He found it very educational. Or maybe he was trying to make it educational, but no one there wanted educating. I'm not sure which. But either way, go Danny Boy!

Tired of snark on dumbass worthless men? August has some snarkage in a different direction you might like. What's good for the gander's good for the goose, right?

Meantime, in our video section we've always got something new and interesting. Of particular note this last week has been the latest episode of Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey, a new barnburner on female privilege from Girl Writes What, more funny snark from Sparky Fister, an exceptional look at sexism in contemporary society that all your Blue Pill friends should see, and a video you should show all your friends who say brave suffragist women fought for equality when, in fact, it was nowhere near so simple as that.

As usual, on the radio front, in addition to a fantastic (and gripping) show with Erin, Lucian had a great show on the state of the European Union, while Bob and James had an interview with Harry Crouch, head of NCFM. Don't miss 'em.

By the way, have we mentioned recently that PZ Myers tells rape jokes while bashing other people for telling them? Well just in case we hadn't mentioned it before, we just thought we'd make sure you knew.

And if all that doesn't keep you in reading and listening material to fill your week, just stay tuned, more exciting stuff to come this week, including more video and more radio. C'mon back y'all, ya hear?

When female privilege backfires

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 3 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: The following is the basic transcript of Girl Writes What's video When Female Privilege Backfires. As per usual sometimes she goes a little off-script in the video but this is what she had to say, for those of you who prefer to read rather than listen to videos. Still, here's the video, with a couple of other links to items she references. Translations of this transcript are also available in Spanish and Swedish.–DE

The journalist, a woman named Mika Rekai, and I…we had an interesting discussion. She seemed quite pleasant, though that doesn't mean she's not planning on writing a hit piece. If she isn't planning on writing a hit piece, it's probably a toss-up as to whether her article will make it past the editor's desk, something she admitted could well happen, but that's a whole other story.

Anyway, we'll see. But some of her questions got me thinking. At one point I told her that what was once radical feminist thought is now mainstream–not mainstream feminism but mainstream culture. That if, for instance, you walked up to anyone on the street and said, "Women were historically oppressed," their answer would be "of course". And I've even seen MRAs, and MRM-friendly people such as Christina Hoff Sommers, parrot this line of thinking–that women in the past were oppressed because they were women.

Ms. Rekai responded with something along the lines of, "Wait, so you don't believe women were oppressed?"

I said no. I tried to explain myself, though I don't know if my arguments were as cogent as they could have been. And I mentioned a conversation I'd recently had with my sister, who has some bit of knowledge of the Canadian military and its operations, about certain customs in Afghanistan. Specifically the local custom followed when people sought medical care at free clinics run by the military or NGOs. The tradition there is men first, children second, women last.

Now, I had asked my sister if she could figure out some reason other than "men are privileged" or "because penis" to explain that custom. She said, "Well, yeah, I suppose the reasoning for it is that if the man dies, the whole family is toast. That if the man gets too sick to work, the whole family suffers." At the same time, she attributed that state of affairs to the fact that under Taliban rule, only men were allowed to work outside the home–that men were, in fact, the only ones allowed to even LEAVE the home unaccompanied.

Now, I mentioned to the journalist, Mika, that the Taliban had been very clever in how they forced both genders into very restricted and regimented sets of roles and duties. They restrict the freedoms of those who value safety over freedom (women), and they thereby impose the role of protector/provider–falsely naming it "freedom"–on those who value freedom over safety (men).

That is, if you have two people and one of them is ordered to stay home, and you tell the other he is free to go outside…well, what do you have? You've got two people stuck in their roles, not just one. Is the second person REALLY free to decide what he wants to do? There are only two of them, and one is confined to the home, not allowed to work. Someone has to go out and perform the tasks that require interaction with the world. Neither of these people are free. And one of them is at significantly greater day-to-day risk in a place like Afghanistan. Hint: it's not the one who stays indoors.

It was not always this way in Afghanistan. Prior to the 30 years of proxy warfare that ravaged their country, Afghan society was quite progressive, relatively speaking. Most westerners would probably be surprised by the number of older women confined to their homes by the Taliban, and barred from paid work, who were educated professionals. But people who understand how societies operate understand that safety and prosperity go hand in hand with the relaxing of often stringent cultural and legal standards. When the Soviets invaded, all that progressiveness kind of went out the window. And after thirty years of other societies taking a wrecking ball to Afghanistan, they found themselves back in a Dark Ages of poverty, conflict, subsistence living, and regional warlords interested in grabbing land and power, crushing the poor and the hapless under their boot heels to do it.

The Taliban offered order. A top-down method of controlling the chaotic that was, at least nominally, based on a moral doctrine to which most Afghans already subscribed to one degree or another. It offered to slash back the power-grabbing of warlords, and replace it with a life-path for ordinary people that, while repressive and totalitarian, appeared on the surface to be a safe one, so long as you didn't step off its tightrope breadth.

The Taliban offered a narrow fundamentalist interpretation of the social and moral structure that already existed within the culture. And it represented a codifying of what had previously been random–unlike under the warlord system of regional government, under the Taliban, you at least had some idea as to what behaviors would get you shot in the back of the head.

One thing the Taliban didn't do was completely rewrite Islamic law pertaining to female privilege and male obligation.

And here is the root of things, they way I see it. Afghanistan became a society where leaving your house was taking your life in your hands, and where there were few opportunities to earn money or generate productivity, but where people still need to eat. And under Islamic law, women bear no economic responsibility to anyone. Not even themselves.

I watched a video not too long ago where a Muslim woman named Zara Faris spoke quite persuasively about how Muslim women do not need feminism.

One of her arguments was that Islamic law does not specifically prohibit women from working–on the contrary, Muslim women can not only work under Islamic law, but they need not share their earned income with their families. Basically, if a Muslim woman has a job, the money she earns is hers and hers alone, while her husband remains obligated to provide any and all economic support for the family, including the necessities his working wife requires for her own upkeep.

I work with a man from Lebanon who confirmed this tradition for me. He has a wife and five children, and works two jobs to support them. His wife stays at home, and that's exactly where he wants her. Not because he's being a dominating, repressive, misogynistic man, but because if she CHOSE to work outside the home, he and their children have no right to the smallest share of her income, and yet he is still required to provide for his wife's basic needs. On the other hand, if she were working, daycare would become a "necessity", and it would be my coworker who would be stuck with the bill. In other words, if his wife CHOSE to work outside the home, to pay for luxuries only she had any right to indulge in with that money, he would have to take a third job to make it possible for her to do so.

And this is…well, I suppose it's great for a lot of Muslim women when times are easy. Not so great when things are harsh.

Because when you have a group of people who MUST use their productivity to support themselves and others, and another group who are entitled to be supported by the productivity of others, and no obligation to even be productive… well, when the shit hits the fan, which of these groups is going to be barred from taking the few available jobs? Will it be the group who must use their income to support themselves and other people, or the ones who don't even have to support themselves?

Under Islamic law, a woman with a job can technically allow her own children to starve, even if she has the money to feed them. If those children DO starve, it is her husband who will be considered socially, morally and legally accountable for failing to provide the necessities of life to his children. And while I doubt there are many women who would actually do this, it's how the law is written.

In Afghanistan today, a woman with a job (a job she doesn't need because under Islamic law she has an entitlement to be supported by her husband, father or son) is not just taking that job from a man, she's taking food out of the mouths of that man's family. If she takes a safe, easy job (as women are wont to do), then the man she displaces will have to take a more dangerous one. If he's killed, she's taken the provider away from the woman and children who depended on him.

Likewise, if her daughter takes one of the few available desks in school, someone else's son may be denied an education and the future job he will be obligated to take, to support both himself and the people who are entitled to his support, will be less well-paying, and the quality of life of multiple people will suffer.

And Islamic law and custom is so strict on this set of entitlements and obligations that in Afghanistan, you can find 13 year old boys selling themselves as sex slaves to provide for their mothers and sisters.

Echoes of this set of entitlements and obligations resounded in the western world after feminism had its way with the second half of the 19th century. Prior to that time, a woman's income and property was subsumed by her husband, but depending on where you are, that all changed sometime between the mid 1800s and the turn of the century, at which point women's income and property rights in the west actually became a carbon copy of what exists under Islam.

A story in the Milwaukee Journal from 1912 illustrates this quite well, in its examination of the tactics of British suffragettes who used a loophole in the law to turn their husbands into prison-cell activists by manipulating the exact same legal and cultural standards at play in Afghanistan. To elaborate, a married woman's income and property had been emancipated, by feminist activism, from the institution of family for some time–not just from her husband's influence, mind you, but from anyone's benefit but her own. However, her husband's patriarchal obligations to finance her "necessities" remained intact, and one of those necessities was the burden of taxation on her income. If she earned income, her husband and children had no right to it, but her husband, not herself, was the person obligated to pay tax on that income. If he had no means to pay–after paying for all the material necessities of the entire family, including his wife–it was he who would be imprisoned for tax evasion.

Editor's note: See that 1912 story here. –DE

What I find amusing in all of this, since in the west these circumstances had only emerged due to feminist activism, is that Islamic law had enshrined these particular ideals of women's liberation long before the Declaration of Sentiments was signed at Seneca Falls in 1848, or even Mary Wollstonecraft's Vindication of the Rights of Women was penned in the late 1700s.

This is why the idea of male privilege is so fucking bogus. Privileges are entitlements. What men have had through history wasn't entitlement, because it was a necessary element of their obligations–a tool handed to men because it was needed by men in order to fulfil their legally, economically and socially enforced obligations to women and children, not because penis.

There are duties and there are rights. To have a duty necessarily entails having a right. The rights granted generally facilitate one's ability to perform one's duties. If one has no such duties, the rights required to fulfil them are not only unnecessary, they may actually be detrimental to the ability of others to fulfil their duties to you.

If you have a duty to be productive economically and utilize that productivity to economically provide for yourself and others, you must have a right to engage in activities that result in economic productivity. If you have a duty to make sure you and others have the material necessities of life such as clothing, shelter, and food, then you must have the right to determine that the money is spent on clothing, shelter and food. If you have a duty to protect yourself and others, you must have a right to make decisions for yourself and those you protect, and a right to place yourself in danger.

If you don't have those duties, you do not need the rights attached to them. In fact, you having those rights may actually interfere with the duties of others to provide the entitlements you enjoy through their obligation.

And when everyone's living on the bottom tier of Maslow's hierarchy of needs, you're probably not going to be given those rights, because you having them would interfere with the ability of those who do to perform them, for you or for someone else who is entitled to them.

A husband cannot fulfil his duty provide for a wife if someone else's wife displaces him from the workforce. A husband cannot fulfil his duty to ensure his family has the things they need if he doesn't manage the family purse. A husband cannot fulfil his duty to protect a wife if she is not required to duck when he tells her to duck.

Historically, all of these things–provisioning, protection and support–were FEMALE entitlements. This is female privilege. And, though I hate to borrow a phrase from feminism, what happened in Afghanistan around barring women from work and girls from education, is essentially female privilege backfiring on women and girls. When jobs are scarce, you don't give them to people who have an entitlement to benefit from the obligation of others to work. When education is scarce, you don't give that to people who have an entitlement to benefit from the obligation of others that is facilitated by education. You give those things to the people who have a duty to share the benefits of them with others, not the people who are legally allowed to hog all those benefits for themselves.

Afghanistan is not a society that oppresses women. It's a society where everyone's stuck in the grip of cruel circumstances and Islamic laws that burden men with duties that require rights, and bestow entitlements on women that don't, and coping the best way they can. And the only way you're going to "improve" the situation for women and girls in Afghanistan, you know, get them access to jobs outside the home or to educations and not have a huge backlash, is to remove the entitlement women have to the material support and protection of men, and thereby remove men's obligation to provide those things. Until you do those things, you're just spinning your wheels, and harming the only people who have any obligation to anyone but themselves, while handing unfettered potential to earn money and power to people who don't even have a duty to feed of their own children.

Another example of female privilege backfiring would be the continually skewing sex gap in births in China. Female fetuses are selected for abortion. Female babies are abandoned, drowned or smothered. And feminists would have you believe this is because men in China are privileged and arbitrarily over-valued, and women hated and arbitrarily undervalued.

But you can read any Chinese newspaper and come across stories about this elderly couple or that elderly couple, suing their sons for not taking proper care of them in their old age. You never see any of them suing their daughters, because their daughters have no obligation–legal or social–to take care of them. A girl's parents actually still have an obligation to take care of her, if she doesn't marry and can't (or refuses to) support herself.

For all of Mao's rhetoric about women holding up half the sky, he did nothing to ensure women did so when the sky was full of elderly people who needed economic support, did he? He liberated women by encouraging they exploit their own economic productivity without holding them responsible for even themselves, but oddly enough, kept men chained to their traditional, non-egalitarian obligations.

In China, you have no social safety net to speak of, nothing much in the way of social security or pensions, no one but your son to make sure you don't starve when you're too old to work…and you have a policy that allows you to have only one child.

What do you think is going to happen when you have that situation and couple it with a set of gendered duties and entitlements that mean a family who has a boy is potentially a two-child family (son and daughter in law), and one who has a girl is in the best case scenario a no-child family.

If feminists really cared about what's going on in China, what they'd do is agitate to burden women with a duty of care for their parents, or emancipate men from said duty. That would solve the problem, eventually.

I know there are families in China who want girls, who even favor them, because even given this harsh economic incentive, many families still have girls, and because in rural areas where families can sometimes get away with having more than one child, they'll often have a girl as well as a boy.

But you won't stop people from preferring boys under a one-child policy until you obligate girls to be as useful and exploitable to their families as boys are. You just won't. You especially won't if men's obligations make them useful to their parents while women's entitlements make them a potential burden to those parents in old age.

You certainly won't solve the problem by attributing it to "male privilege" and "lack of equal rights for women".

Because that's not what's causing it. What's causing it is a lack of equal obligation for women. You can give women all the same rights as men, but if they don't have the same obligations as men, they won't be treated equally, and that inequality is going to emerge in extreme forms during extreme circumstances like Afghanistan after 30 years of decimation, and China when people are only allowed one child and circumstances are such that that one child will be either a crutch or a pair of cement shoes when you're too old to work.

Societies don't oppress women or privilege men. They do tend to treat men and women differently and exploit them in different ways. What feminism seems to be about is expanding women's rights without applying obligations, and expanding women's entitlements while freeing them from the restrictions that used to be necessary for men to fulfil them. They're about giving women the advantages of being a man without any of the costs, and removing the costs of being a woman without giving up any of the advantages.

When men got the vote, (and for a long time prior to that) they were obligated to serve their countries if need be, and obligated to serve their communities through civil conscription–bucket brigades, assisting police officers, things like that. When women got the vote, they had no reciprocal obligation placed on them.

When men received automatic custody after divorce, it was because they were solely obligated to support the children. When early feminists pushed through the TYD, that obligation did not shift onto women–mothers got custody, but fathers were still required to provide material support. Incidentally, once this doctrine was in place, the divorce rate, which had been a constant for centuries, increased 15-fold in just 50 years. Huh.

And the bill that was recently vetoed in Florida, that might have ended lifetime alimony? One of the primary justifications for that bill was that more women were finding themselves paying lifetime alimony to former partners due to mass male unemployment during the recession, and those women had just never expected they'd have to and thought it was unfair. By more women, I'm thinking probably 3% of all lifetime alimony payers in Florida. What do you know? Being treated like a man in every way just ain't that great, is it? And contrary to what feminists try to tell people, it never has been.

That bill was put forward because women don't like to be obligated the way men are–to pay their whole lives for the upkeep of a former spouse–and even a tiny percentage of them being forced to do it will get people to rethink a law that has obligated men for decades or even centuries.

Hell, just dare to suggest that a woman who chooses to have a baby without the consent of the biological father should be solely financially responsible for that child, let alone that a woman who chose to leave her husband out of boredom and take the kids with her should finance her own decision, and you'll face vicious opposition from most feminists. Even though that exact situation–getting the kids and the entire job of feeding them–is defined as "historical male privilege" and "patriarchal oppression of women" when it used to happen to men.

Frankly, if women today were forced to bear the burdens that were historically had imposed on men, for which their greater rights were little more than the tools required to do the job, I think 99% of women would consider it a raw deal, and 99% of feminists would call it "oppression of women". The fact that they'd see it that way just shows how privileged in many ways women have always been, and how shallow feminists' view of the world, past and present, really is.

So I have an idea. How about feminists perform a little experiment.

First go to China and try to sell the idea of obligating daughters economically to their parents the way sons are. See if any of these young women will jump at the opportunity to take care of shit like a man is expected to.

Next, go to Afghanistan and tell women they are allowed to do anything their husbands do–work, get an education, even have custody of their children. Hell, tell them they can have all the BEST jobs. All they have to do is give up any and all entitlements to provision and protection, any and all obligation on the part of the men in their lives–fathers, husbands, brothers, sons–to help or support them, and let them know they'll have to single-handedly provide for the material needs of any children they have. You're on your own, honey. Grrl power. Good luck.

How many Afghan women does anyone think would take them up on it? When even in a middle class neighborhood in London–where she enjoys a set of rights similar to men's, and would actually be capable of real economic independence–a Muslim woman can argue against feminism on the basis that Muslim women might have to give up codified female entitlements provided through male obligation?

I hate to tell you this, Zara Faris, but you really don't have to worry about any of that. Feminists aren't going to take away your privileges or remove your husband's obligations to you. They're only interested in taking away his privileges and removing your obligations.

Female serial killer bandits

Robert St. Estephe · 3 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

"The typical female serial killer uses poison and is motivated by greed or revenge."
That is the standard line given in answer to the query, "What gives with those 'rare' female serial killers?"

Most people curious about this (supposedly outré, rare and eccentric) subject, female serial killers, receive these sound-bites with a distracted nod – feeling themselves informed by the authoritative voice of expert consensus.

But there is a problem here. "Typical" cannot tell us the whole story. Knowledge of the "typical" alone, apart from the larger context, is superficial, uninformative and hides too much. The category "typical" might not even represent a majority of cases. To settle for descriptions of the "typical" is to be settling for a sliver of fact.

Fact is, female criminality was largely ignored by crime experts before the rise of feminism-influenced criminology in the 1960s. "Patriarchal" criminologists largely saw female criminality as of marginal importance. After the 1960s it continued to be largely ignored, though feminist criminologists did look into female criminals from the perspective of incarcerated-woman-as-victim-of-society.

For an amusingly illiterate supposed explanation of this "feminist criminology," just take a stroll through this gibberish taken from Wikipedia:

"The feminist school of criminology is a school of criminology developed in the late 1960s and into the 1970s as a reaction to the perceived general disregard and discrimination of women in the traditional study of crime. Proponents assert that the patriarchal domination of the field of criminology has led to the field being inherently biased and androcentric. This, they argue, leads mainstream criminology to either generalise or ignore criminological inquiry relevant to women in an effort to support the male dominated status quo. The feminist theory emphasises that crime is caused by the [sic] hostility in men, but also states that crime is a result of inequalities within society." [Wikipedia, retrieved May 10, 2013]

This is, of course, blathering nonsense. Yet is nonsense which actually influences how crime and violence is researched and studied by professionals. On a positive note, however, I should point out that there is an emerging a core of experts on violence by women, who seem to me, from what I have seen of their work, untouched by the nonsense of "the feminist school of criminology." These are Joni Johnson, Katherine Ramsland and Deborah Schurman-Kauflin, each of whom has written on female serial killers.

As fine as their work is, they are, as are all scholars, reliant on the quality and thoroughness of their predecessors work for them to make any generalizations about change of criminal activity (or at least perceptions of criminal activity). In the case of the subject of female serial killers the performance of the historians is inadequate to the point of abject incompetence. Because of the shoddiness of the methods and the slackness of the work ethic of American criminologist-historians, scholars of recent decades have come up with the most bizarre, improbable, claims about serial killers, such as the ludicrous notion that serial killers are a particularly "white" or "western" (not to mention masculine) type of crime.

My harsh words about the criminologist-historians is not directed to Michael and C. L. Heller, co-authors of the valuable 1998 effort Murder Most Rare: The Female Serial Killer. The book was a sorely needed first effort that began to pull together information from non-English speaking nations and pre-1960s history. But nobody took that ball and ran with it. Fifteen years later and the international criminology-historians have not attempted to put together a complete-as-possible overview of the subject. (Again, Peter Vronsky's 2007 superb effort, *Female Serial Killers: How and Why Women Become Monster*s, is superb, but is not conceived as a project to collect together an exhaustive corpus of cases).

The Kellehers and Vronsky were primarily concerned with forensic psychology. It is regrettable that the profession of criminology was not able to provide these serious authors with the properly searched-out data that might have made their studies even more valuable than they are. Because historical research on female serial killers has never been systematically pursued, these authors' sources contain no cases from Asia, Near East, Africa, Latin America. Likewise they fail to address entire categories of types, such as Ogresses (my term for women who kidnap and murder non-related children serially, sometimes cannibalizing them), Baby Farmers (traditional term for child care providers who murdered children, much more common than is implied in the literature on serial killers), Female Murder-Syndicate leaders who serially murdered, and Female Serial Killer Bandits (frequently gang leaders, frequently with male followers and who were often torturers and mutilators of victims).

My own research has only recently taken me to Female Serial Killer Bandits. It is a category that not only is totally ignored by the experts – despite the existence of recent cases of serial killing robbers who worked solo, in partnerships, or in teams, gangs or cults – but which busts apart many stereotypes (held by male chivalrists and leftist feminists alike) regarding the supposed absence of aggressive, sadistic agency among the females (a biological, chemical and physical construction, not a *cultura*l one).

These newly rediscovered cases should be known to the public. They will serve as another small piece of a large and ongoing effort to shed light on female-perpetrated violence in the effort to reverse the culture of ignorance perpetrated by both the academic criminology status quo and the now mainstream and policy-setting radical/marxist feminist ideology (which to be fair, echoes, in large part, "conservative" chivalric thinking).

Apart from the two Chinese cases that are to follow in the synopses you will see below, all of them were rediscovered using key-word searches of databases of large historical newspaper collections. Each of the cases popped up in a number of different publications, so it can be concluded there is no good reason these cases should not have been previously noted for posterity by scholars of crime and criminality in the professional literature published over the past century and a half.

For those readers who might find my argument a bit too academic, I plead that you be patient. The fact is that there are very few venues that would be interested in getting this sort of information out the public. A Voice for Men is one of them. History matters, and it matters a great deal.

"He who controls history controls the present. He who controls the present controls history." (George Orwell)

I believe this "historical" material is just as up-to-date in its relevance as any to be found on this website. The tyrannical lies about the present are consciously constructed on a foundation of pernicious lies about the past.

In any case, the vignettes below are interesting on their own account purely as stories that are true stories. And they are stories you are not going to see anywhere else.

Following are 15 cases of Female Serial Killer Bandits from the nations of China, Estonia, France, Italy, Mexico, Romania, Russia, Serbia, Spain, all but one of them spanning the same century-plus period: 1807-1924. Each name is linked to a post containing the sources, usually old newspaper articles.

1) 940 – "White-necked Crow" – Chen Zhou, China

A book published in 2013 detailing facts related in the memoirs of a 10th century Chinese historical figure discusses a passage concerning a female bandit leader known as White-necked Crow.

Historian Glen Dudbridge recounts that in mid-10th century China in "Chen Zhou there was a woman bandit leader known as the White-necked Crow. She was some forty years of age, coarse and squat in physique, brown-haired and swarthy-limbed. She presented herself at the barbarian king's court having taken over a man's name, and her costume and ritual deportment were all those of a man."

"When the usurper Prince of Yan, summoned her for questioning she gave an account of her mastery of riding, fighting and leadership. She revealed that "several thousand men under her control were all subservient to her."

"When asked whether she had a husband she said that she had several dozen in the past, and when they gave the slightest satisfaction she knifed them with her own hand. Everyone who heard this cried in anger!"

A count of "several dozen" of these knifed "husbands" would put White-necked Crow at the top of the list of Champion Black Widow Serial Killers, on par with the great copulate-then-kill addiction career of Vera Renczi

2) 1807 – Ching Shih – China

Ching Shih, one of the most powerful pirate captains of world history, with 1800 ships and many thousands of sailors at her command, has recently been adopted by the "girl power" crowd online as a representative of the female capacity for "empowerment" which is, as in so many cases, a value-neutral designation, suitable for those figures of great wisdom and character just as easily as for the most despicable and sadistically vicious of criminals.

3) 1862 – Josepha Perez – Galicia, Spain

An 1862 news clipping reports: "A woman known as the 'She Wolf' has been the terror of Gallicia and the neighboring provinces for the last twenty years. Always on horseback, and followed by a small number of bandits, she was at the head of all the robberies and murders committed in that part of Spain." Josepha was noted for her predilection for torturing her victims. She was arrested after her hide-out was discovered during the search for a different criminal.

4) 1865 – Maria Oliviero – Cattanzaro, Italy

[image]

The photo that heads this article shows Italian bandit queen Maria Oliviero. "At the age of twenty, Maria Oliviero murdered her sister, hacking her 48 times with an axe, for slander and joined her husband's gang. She was arrested in 1864 and went on trial in February, was charged with 32 crimes: kidnapping, violent robberies and thefts, fires, and murders. She confessed to the murder of his sister, but for the rest she claimed she was coerced into participating." [excerpt from Italian Wikipedia]

5) 1867 – La Gizzi – Volturara district, Italy

La Gizzi, famous brigandess of Italy's Volturara district, "was a tall, muscular woman with beetling brows, covered with a thick mass of black shaggy hair that fell over her shoulders and breast, and was so bloodthirsty that she voluntarily performed the office of executioner on every captive doomed to death by her hand."

6) 1884 – Leonarda Martinez – Quetaro, Mexico

Leonarda Martinez was a serial killing thief whose method was to exploit the chivalry of her victims and to exploit the labors of her loyal male followers. At her death in 1884, newspapers recounted her career. Here is a brief excerpt from a New York Times article: "Her operations extended over many year and was of the most daring description. For a long time the authorities found it very difficult to trace or even to explain the crimes which she committed, for no one suspected that a woman was the guilty person. No two of her robberies were committed in the same manner. Sometimes she was a passenger, and other times she was with the bandits, and took part in the shooting, if any was to be done. A woman of some personal charms, when appropriately dressed, she was a fiend when about her business of murder and pillage whom very few cared to encounter. Her male assistants were many and devoted."

And if there be any doubt as to the Senora's qualification to the mantle "Female Serial Killer" the following précis will resolve the question: “If her victim appeared to be well supplied with cash he usually met a violent death within twenty-four hours.”

7) 1887 – Anastaa Rubio de Pascadera – San Antonio, Zacatecas, Mexico

News reports noted the death of a devoted Mexican female serial killer of males in the United States, but there is much more to be learned from Mexican sources, were a scholar to choose to follow the lead. “Senora Anastaa Rubio de Pascadera, a female bandit of renown, was buried by the side of her lover at San Antonio, Zacatecas, Mexico, yesterday [December 17, 1887]. In her early womanhood her intended husband was killed by federal troops, and on his grave she swore vengeance. The oath was to kill five men every year of her life.” One wonders what this number might be

8) 1891 – Mila – Požarevac, Serbia

This brief article on the capture of Mila gives us a pretty good picture of a serial killer of the sort we are told does not exist among females:

“A female brigand named Mila is being tried for some of her crimes at Posezarez [Požarevac], Servia. She has been for a number of years a terror to the people of that region, and her crimes and cruelties far exceed those of ordinary brigands in Turkey and Servia. Mila is accused of fourteen murders and numerous robberies, and a peculiarly unfeminine feature of her deeds of blood was that she horribly mutilated her victims. In audacity and cruelty she had no equal among outlaws. She is not good-looking and has a nose like a hawk.”

9) 1897 – Marie Ret – Paris, France

[image]

Marie Ret, scar-faced Parisian gang leader, known as the Queen of Stranglers “had a gang of eighteen stranglers which she had gathered around her. More than thirty murders were directly found to have been committed by this organisation of trained assassins, which had for chief a woman.”

10) 1902 – “Romanian Bandit Queen of Jassy” – Jassy, Romania

The name of this bandit does not appear in any of the brief English language news reports that have been so far located. I’ve dubbed her “Romanian Bandit Queen of Jassy” for convenience until the time when the name has been discovered. Her brutal career is handily summed up in the following account out of the office of the Vienna press correspondent.

“With a record of eighty-six murders to her account, the female bandit chief recently captured by the Roumanian police, is now facing her trial. This young and beautiful woman has terrorized the country for months at the head of a band of ferocious robbers. All victims who attempted resistance were invariably killed and the chief was in the habit of devising special tortures for persons who refused to give up their valuables.”

11) 1909 – Augustina Mora – Vera Cruz, Mexico

The reports on The Tigress of Cordoba in English are scant and brief (at this point in research, at least), but what the newspapers had to report tells plenty:

“Vera Cruz, Mexico. March 12. – Augustine Mora, referred to as the “tigress of Cordoba,” leader of the worst of the bandit bands of this region, has been taken prisoner after a fight in the mountains between the bandits and the rurales. The battle occurred a number of miles from Cordoba. In the battle Pedro Perez, a rurale captain, and two of his men were killed. Three of the followers of the tigress were captured with her. The woman was wanted for three atrocious murders and many acts of robbery committed by her band. She fought desperately and it required three of the rurales to place her in irons.”

12) 1910 – Marie Semit – Smolensk province, Russia

Ideology intersects with the sociopathic personality in the figure of Russian Female Serial Killer Bandit Marie

Semit. She was captured in 1910 and faced numerous murder charges as the English-language press reported:

"The curious career of a revolutionary Maenad, who interpreted woman's rights in her own peculiar way has just come to a tragic end. Marie Semit was a schoolmistress of pronounced radical tendencies in the province of Smolensk, when her revolutionary fever brought on delirium which became epidemic. She organized a band of dauntless anarchists. These black knights took to highway robbery under the command of Marie, who was attired in male clothing. Once they attacked a monastery near Pskow, leaving several of the monks dead. Eight members of the band were condemned by court martial. Marie Semit has now been sentenced to twenty years' penal servitude, but must next week undergo trial for two other raids and murders in the province of Smolensk."

13) 1912 – Ivanova & Olga Tamarin – Kurdla, Estonia

A mother-daughter serial killer bandit team, with cannibalistic tendencies apparently, were tracked down following the discovery of a number of corpses "mutilated beyond recognition" in Estonia in 1912. Mom was said to be leader of a band of robbers numbering in the dozens. Her 17-year-old daughter served, it would seen, as the lure for the victims.

California newspapers printed the following summary of the case: "A real live ogress with a desperate desire for flesh and blood, having a daughter similarly depraved and numerous cannibal retainers, has just been seized at [Kurdla, Estonia]. People remarked that numerous men and women, decoyed to the house of Ivanova Tamarin and her 17 year old daughter, Olga, were never seen returning.

The discovery in a neighboring wood of corpses, mutilated beyond recognition, led to the house being surrounded by a force of gendarmes under Colonel Vassiteff. Ivanova and her daughter were secured after violent resistance, and a search of the premises resulted in the discovery of 27 corpses in a storehouse, as well as a great number of watches, purses and other articles of value, and a quantity of male and female garments.

The eating room of the house was furnished with a trap door, through which the victims were precipitated into the cellar. In the cellar murderous instruments and fetters of all sorts were found. The women confessed to being at the head of a band which, during recent months, had robbed and murdered 40 people who had been decoyed to the house by Olga, and mentioned thirty other peasants belonging to the band, who were also arrested, while nine others escaped."

14) 1921 – Ekaterina Pishianova – Chita, Russia

Two different transliterations of the subject's name appear in English-language news reports: Ekaterina Pishianova; Catherine Planovsky. She was known to some of those she terrorized as "Catherine the Terrible" and to others as "the Jack the Ripper of the Ural mountains," and was reputed to have killed her victims with an axe. She was sentenced to death twice, having escaped the firing squad in 1921 by trickery, and was the second time sentenced in 1926 in the company of nine of her male followers. They had been charged with over a hundred murders.

15) 1924 – Anastasia Permiakova – Perm, Russia

The full text of the London reports of Anastasia Permiakova will be necessary to convey this particularly complex and particularly disgusting specimen of the female serial killer bandit.

"The 'Daily Express' Moscow correspondent says that Anastasia Permiakova, a gipsy clairvoyant, with her husband and six male and female accomplices, has been sentenced to death for the horrible murders of 20 women and girls. Permiakova escaped from prison during the revolution while serving a murder sentence. She then organised a murder gang, pillaged villages and held up trains. Afterwards she settled down as a clairvoyant at Perm. She had a huge clientele of women, many of whom mysteriously disappeared. The crimes were undetected till Permiakova called at a solicitor's house and told his beautiful daughter her future. She ordered the girl to bare her neck to see if she had a lucky mark and then murdered her with a hatchet. The police found in the woman's flat ten bloodstained hatchets. Thirteen other accomplices received long sentences."

This completes the rundown of the 15 recently uncovered cases.

Not a single one of these cases appears in any publication on serial killers that I have ever seen. My longer list of Female Serial Killer Bandits that includes the 15 cases discussed here has, at this stage of the research, 46 names.

Remember how I cavil and hector on the subject of scholarly shoddiness. Lest I commit the crime I have above condemned I must make note that the research summarized here is merely a first stage effort. All of these cases occurred outside of my home country and the records and sources that exist will be written in a variety of foreign languages and will be tucked away in places the delusional google founders are not going to scare up and store conveniently (properly identified, classified, cross-referenced, translated, interpreted, easily searchable) into the great artificial intelligence "hive mind."

The mind-numbing dogma of political correctness (all evil on earth derives from European heterosexual males) will continue its relentless dumbing-down of the public – as well as the "experts" – and perpetuate blindness to select categories of present-day violence as long as the false history (based on incomplete research and fallacious ideology) produced by, and enshrined by, the hallowed universities remains unchallenged. Most professionals, because of university mis-education, who are engaged in the study of both crime and the design of public policy could never, not in a thousand years, imagine the reality of violence by women against women as it is manifested across the globe (which refuses to conform its actions to the expectations of political correctness dogma) as is exemplified in four recent cases of Female Serial Killer Bandits from Mexico, India, Iran and Russia which took the lives of over 100 women.

2006 – Juana Barraza, "La Mataviejitas" (The Old Lady Killer) – Mexico City, Mexico – murdered at least 29 women, some reports estimate total victims to be up to 49.

2007 – H. D. Kempamma – Bangladore, India – arrested in Bangalore on Dec 30, 2007; murdered an estimated 10 women for their jewelry using cyanide.

2009 – Mahin Qadiri – Qazvin, Iran – murdered 5 women; she gave them an anesthetic-laced fruit drink and then strangled them.

2010 – Irina Gaidamachuk – Yekaterinburg, Russia – murdered 17 women aged 61-86 with hammer or axe

Truly, the female victim of the violent female is not to be discussed out in the open. She is, in our deliberately dumbed-down, mind-engineered world, nothing but a second class crime victim whose story is better left untold (so as to keep the orthodox narrative sanitized).

In the hallowed halls of academe the most beloved of all professional mantras heard, dutifully intoned on a daily basis, is: "more research needs to be conducted." Yet the modest un-grant-funded article that you are reading – and which is a tiny sample from research already published by the author online – shows that more research is being conducted, and it is being conducted outside academe. It ought not to be ignored.

Is Mary Kellet cutting a deal?

Paul Elam · 3 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AND IS SHE THROWING THE WASHINGTON COUNTY SHERIFF UNDER THE BUS TO COVER HER CRIMES?

Most of you who follow this website are familiar with the case of Vladek Filler, formerly of Gouldsboro, Maine. Filler was engaged in a child custody dispute for his two children when he became relentlessly pursued by prosecutor Mary Kellett for allegations of sexual assault made by his estranged wife, Ligia.

Kellett got a conviction in the case but it was set aside and overturned by the State Supreme Court due to prosecutorial misconduct on her part. Subsequently, Filler filed a Bar complaint against Kellett, where a three member bar panel ultimately found her guilty of nine instances of misconduct and conduct unbecoming an attorney. That resulted in the historic move of Kellett being the first prosecutor in the history of Maine to be referred to the State Supreme Court for disciplinary hearings that could result in the suspension of her license to practice law.

One of the matters before the Supreme Court is the fact that Kellett instructed law enforcement officers not to comply with valid subpoenas from Filler's attorney to produce evidence held by the police departments relevant to Ligia Filler's credibility as a witness. Evidence such as a withheld witness statement written by Ligia Filler, 911 tapes of her calls, and video and audio recordings of Ligia Filler making statements and threats against Vladek Filler and police officials. Those records were repeatedly requested and eventually the Court had to Order Kellett to turn them over to defense. To put it nicely, Kellett failed to do so, even after repeated requests from Filler's attorney months after the Court Order. Put directly Kellett ignored the Order and simply refused to turn over the material to defense.

Among other violations, the Disciplinary Panel found Kellett guilty of suppressing and not providing exculpatory evidence. If that finding is not disturbing enough, a crucial video and audio recording that was Court Ordered was later destroyed without any chance of ever being produced to defense after Kellett told Filler's attorney she would not provide it to him.

The recording was of an April 24, 2007 incident where two Washington County Sheriff's Deputies apprehended Ligia Filler and secured her in the back of a cruiser which had a video camera running and recording all her statements and accusations. Filler's Bar complaint alleged that the recording contained exculpatory statements by his accuser. The cruiser recording was not the only one made at the time as the responding Deputy also used his pocket recorder to captured 1 ½ hours of the incident in non-continuous bits and pieces.

Initially, Kellett did not even disclose the April 24, 2007 incident to defense despite her office obtaining the incident report just a few weeks later. In October of 2007 Kellett finally provided a copy of a brief incident report after defense made specific discovery requests. It took over 1 year of further requests, a discovery motion, a Court Order, and several more months of demands and threats of sanctions before Kellett would provide defense with a copy of the incomplete and chopped up audio recording captured by the Deputy's pocket recorder.

The continuous and unedited audio recording which was captured by the video recording system inside the Deputy's cruiser was withheld and denied to defense. Even months after the Court Order was issued for its production, Kellett told Filler's attorney Daniel Pileggi that the video tape didn't really show anything and couldn't be copied for defense (despite a Court Order). Kellett then tried to mislead Filler's defense attorney by claiming the chopped up audio recording she was willing to provide was copied directly from the video tape, hence could not contain anything different than the video tape that was being withheld. She told Filler's attorney that if he still wanted to see the video that "didn't show anything" he should make his own arrangements and "go watch it". As it turned out none of what Kellett represented to Filler's attorney was true.

Kellett's position now is that the Court Ordered 911 tapes and video/audio recordings were not provided because of Washington County Sheriff's Department's insubordination to DA office's requests for all the material. Essentially, Kellett is blaming Washington County Sheriff's Department for mishandling and even destroying crucial evidence in a major felony case months after the Court Ordered its production, after Kellett alleges she tried to obtain it, and after numerous defense subpoenas that were not complied with.

Washington County Sheriff's Deputy Travis Willey testified before the Bar's Disciplinary Panel that almost immediately after the April 24, 2007 incident he quickly acted to preserve all audio and video recordings he made because he knew all this evidence was important in a case where criminal charges were filed. He wrote up his report and made copies of his digital audio recording from his pocket recorder on to a CD.

He then hand delivered his report to Mary Kellett's office where it was stamped "Received May 29, 2007". He testified that his cruiser mounted recording system at the time was a low tech standard VHS taping system. He readily located the VHS recording and had a chance to review the lengthy tape although not all the way to the end. He testified the video tape was eventually destroyed.

Vladek Filler's Bar complaint alleges that months after the criminal trial and during a pending retrial, in a telephone conversation Deputy Willey suggested to Filler that the video recording in question might be made available; that it was not in his physical possession at the time and that everything was provided to Kellett's office. Willey told Filler he needed to direct all his requests to Kellett's office and get their approval even for the deputy's compliance with any future defense subpoenas.

Filler's defense attorney Daniel Pileggi testified that he repeatedly tried to obtain the video tape or even have an opportunity to view it, but it was never made available to him by Mary Kellett's office nor by the Washington County Sheriff's Department.

Pileggi made numerous discovery requests to Kellett, and further issued subpoenas to Kellett's investigator Stephen McFarland, his co-investigator in the case Guy Wycoff, and to Washington County Sheriff's Deputy Travis Willey. After all his requests were ignored, Pileggi was granted a Court Order and sent numerous additional requests demanding Kellett's compliance. Filler's Bar Complaint included copies of several discovery requests and subpoenas. Pileggi subpoenaed Deputy Willey a second time to produce the withheld video tape for Filler's January 2009 trial but again it was not provided. Pileggi told the Disciplinary Panel that eventually he learned the video tape was destroyed which usually happens when prosecution does not request for it to be produced.

It would seem unlikely for Washington County Sheriff's Deputy to take it upon himself to destroy a vital video tape which existed throughout 1 ½ years of repeated requests, several subpoenas, and a Court Order in light of the deputy's clear testimony that he immediately understood the importance of all the evidence he had in his possession and took specific steps to preserve it.

But if Mary Kellett's explanation is true and her office is absolved of responsibility through the upcoming Supreme Court proceedings then the failure to produce all the Court Ordered 911 tapes, audio, and video recordings will fall directly on the Washington County Sheriff's Department. It would be a violation for both, the exculpatory 911 recordings that were withheld from Filler in violation of a Court Order, and for the video tape which was actually destroyed while in custody of the Sheriff's Department despite being:

• Available

• Preserved

• Readily located

• Previewed/viewable

• Low tech VHS tape

• Known to be important/sought after evidence in a major class A Felony case

Despite the seriousness of the Bar Panel's historic decision against Kellett and Bar Counsel's complaint to the Maine Supreme Judicial Court calling Kellett's misconduct "inexcusable", if Kellett's version of events is accepted or not addressed by the Supreme Court judge, then it would leave numerous law enforcement agencies responsible for taking it upon themselves to violate valid defense subpoenas and even violate Kellett's alleged instructions for their compliance.

In the case of Washington County Sheriff's Department, the responsibility would include destroying exculpatory Court Ordered evidence in violation of criminal statutes.

A Voice for Men News Director Robert O'Hara contacted Washington County Sheriff Donny Smith's office for a comment on this. He reached Deputy Willey who refused comment. O'Hara also sent an email to the Washington County Sheriff which went unanswered.

The concerns about this case right now is that after several years of malicious prosecution against Vladek Filler and a number of other men, it appears as though Kellett might be orchestrating a back room deal to avoid responsibility for those abuses.

The only way to prevent this is for there to be a public, comprehensive disciplinary hearing of Kellett's case before Maine Supreme Judicial Court Justice. Additionally, the Bar of Overseers, through Bar Counsel Scott Davis must seek full punishment for the "inexcusable" prosecutorial misconduct that has already been established at the Bar hearing.

There are further ramifications of allowing Kellett off the hook without a full trial and punishment.

She has prosecuted 1100 cases in just 10 years and if not removed she will be allowed to have at least another 25 year remaining career to continue practicing her ideological interpretations of criminal rules, court rulings, orders, and high court decisions.

Kellett has consistently refused to take any responsibility whatsoever for her own conduct which has been substantiated by the Supreme Judicial Court and the Board of Overseers of the Bar. Kellett told the Disciplinary Panel she would not do anything differently in the future as she has a philosophical disagreement with the trial Court and the Supreme Court judgment concerning her conduct.

Through a plea deal with Bar Counsel or through a negotiated and controlled weak case presentation, a Ruling by the Supreme Court Justice could absolve Kellett of all her misconduct and further embolden her to legally terrorize other innocent victims like Vladek Filler.

Her deal, should it happen, will shift the blame for the illegal withholding and disposal of exculpatory evidence onto other law enforcement agencies and police officials who were simply following her orders, as well as onto defense attorneys like Daniel Pileggi.

Kellett is the first prosecutor in Maine's history to face disciplinary proceedings for misconduct, the significance of which cannot be overstated. Allowing her to be absolved or even to continue practicing law as a prosecutor following these proceedings would send the most detrimental message to the entire legal and law enforcement community in Maine and beyond. It would be the ultimate betrayal by the Board of Overseers of the Bar and the Supreme Court of all ethical prosecutors, defense attorneys, police officers, and the citizens who live or visit Maine.

The Voice of Europe: academic feminism

Lucian Vâlsan · 4 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On July 5, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the presence of feminism in the academia throughout Europe.

On the last edition, we featured a feminist whiner who complained about the lack of feminism in Eastern Europe. But the fact is that every single European country (be it in the EU or not) has at least one feminist madrassa camp paid entirely by the taxpayers to teach students new ways to hate men.

Because of the cultural domination of the English language, far more dangerous forms of feminism go unnoticed whilst indoctrinating the next generation into further hate. And yes, there is misandry being taught right now in other languages than English that is significantly more harsh: Swedish feminism, French feminism, Hungarian feminism, Ukrainian feminism (the home of FEMEN), Spanish feminism, Croatian feminism, you name it!

We will try to analyze as many of them as possible, particularly the different levels of misandry in them and, more importantly, start popping out solutions to counteract their toxic influence upon youths and the society at large.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Tell us the level of implementation of academic feminism in your country!

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EDT, 1 PM CDT, 12 PM MDT and 11 AM PDT (times adjusted in accordance with Daylight Savings Time both for Europe and North America).

Abused boys and men: feminism's acceptable losses

Hannah Wallen · 4 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist advocacy capitalizes on society's double standards on intimate partner and sexual violence: the invisibility of damaged men and the belief that the female aggressor is still a victim, no matter how violent she is. These are double standards that, admittedly, precede feminism, as they are rooted in traditional gender roles and expectations–women are damsels; men are villains or heroes. However, information debunking the traditional view of relationship violence has not led to changes in feminist advocacy.

In the U.S., the current lobbying effort began in 1978 during hearings before the House of Representatives subcommittee on select education, 95th congress, 2nd session, on HR 7927 & 8948[Warning – link goes to 400+ page PDF document]. Feminists submitted feminist writing as evidence in order to persuade congress to treat violence in general as a male perpetrated, female suffered behavior, attributable to masculine characteristics, the pressure of traditional gender roles, and social structure.

> Society's treatment of women throughout history has never been one that we can be proud of. As Susan Brownmiller wrote in her book, Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape, "As the first permanent acquisition of man, his first piece of real property, woman was, in fact, the original building block, the cornerstone of the 'House of the Father.' Man's forcible extension of his boundaries to his mate and later to their offspring was the beginning of his concept of ownership."
> In fact, studies have shown that wife abuse has its roots in the very structure of society and the family where the husband is expected to play the role of leader. If this position is threatened, many men fall back on their ultimate resource of physical force.
>
> The widespread existence of wife beating today underscores the fact that these societal expectations are still prevalent.

Brownmiller's claim was that the use of force is a defining characteristic of men, that men own women instead of having relationships, and that men are naturally predisposed to abuse those viewed as subordinates, so if society treats the wife as a subordinate, the wife will be abused.

Advocates also offered a case for ignoring male victims, submitted in the form of a resolution from Sociologists for Women in Society stating support for "the overall concept of these bills," with the position that the funds to be distributed should be reserved for women only:

> SWS adopts the position that, because available scientific evidence strongly indicates that victims of spousal violence are overwhelmingly women and their children, the pseudo issue of battered husbands must not be used to distract from the salience of the issue of battered women. We maintain that the relatively powerless and socially disadvantaged spouses are the ones who are most in need of the services called for in these bills, and we are concerned that the limited funds allocated should not be siphoned from services for female victims and their children, and misplaced into services for a relatively miniscule and questionable number of male victims.

In the very next paragraph, however, advocates admitted that there was not enough information on which to base their assumptions.

> Research to date has been extremely limited and there are very few empirical studies that have done anything > more than scratch the surface. We have almost no concrete statistics to offer because this is a particularly private crime committed behind closed doors. Most statistics quoted and requoted have emanated from a few sources who have tried to estimate the extent and severity of the problem.

Interestingly, this particular submission cites a statement made by Murray Strauss as proof of the lack of concrete evidence. The significance of Murray Strauss' statement is that, while continuing to investigate the issue of lack of evidence, Strauss found that feminist advocates had made and were making deliberate efforts to suppress evidence of gender symmetry in intimate partner violence. In his publication, Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence: Evidence and Implications for Prevention and Treatment, Strauss pointed out that evidence of gender symmetry has been available for more than 25 years.

While the time frame of 25 years doesn't extend back to the period during which arguments would have been prepared for that '78 congressional hearing, it does mean that advocates who have continued to adhere to the male perpetrator/female victim model of partner violence victim's advocacy during the last 25 years have done so with the knowledge that they were presenting a false picture of the issue. This was certainly true by the time feminist groups began pushing for the 1994 Violence Against Women act (which was actually Title IV of the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994), as well as for its 2005 and 2012 renewals. By that second update, there was more than enough evidence to contradict the feminist model, including evidence that male on female violence is often a response to female on male violence, and that success cannot be had in addressing male violence without also addressing female violence.

When Strauss's work could be used in support of their agenda, women's advocates cited it. When it couldn't, they rejected it, and continued to base their advocacy on outdated and biased materials.

The effort to suppress evidence of female perpetration is not limited to partner violence. Feminist-influenced researchers have used creative reporting to do the same with sexual violence, with the CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey being the most recent example of that. As I described in my previous article, The Feminist Advocacy Research Scam, that survey and previous surveys like it have been used to manufacture a false impression of crisis to justify funding. In addition, the reporting in the survey was cleverly worded to emphasize female victimization and male perpetration, but minimizes the impression of male victimization and female perpetration.

One of the most blatant examples of dishonest presentation in the survey's report is in the classification of specific acts. The CDC classified a sexually intimate attack on the genitals of a female victim as rape, but labeled a sexually intimate attack on the genitals of a male victim "other sexual assault." That classification has been used by the CDC and various groups citing statistics based on it to sweep part of the study's findings under the rug in order to maintain the perception that rape is a mostly male-perpetrated, mostly female-suffered crime. The official statement is that 1 in 4 women, and 1 in 71 men have been raped at some time during their lifetime – a grossly dishonest statement.

One might at first suspect that this discrepancy is an error caused by adhering to traditional sex role stereotypes, wherein men are perceived as more violent, and women as more helpless. This is contradicted by evidence presented in Ginko's Genderratic post, Male Disposability – Mary P. Koss, Rape Apologist, Defines Male Rape Victims Out of Existence (and his followup post.)

Typhonblue (Asha James) explains in her Genderratic post Manufacturing Female Victimhood and Marginalizing Vulnerable Men why using numbers from lifetime reporting would return underestimates compared to reporting on events in the year prior to the survey, and why the results would distort even more for men than for women, pointing out that the passage of time reduces the likelihood of an individual disclosing a traumatic event, and that men are far less likely to disclose childhood sexual abuse than women are. This information indicates that the twelve month data will be a more accurate representation of the relative incidence of various sex crimes between men and women than the lifetime data.

Given a more balanced and accurate look at the CDC's numbers, what the NISVS report actually shows is that an assault that forces genital-specific sexual intimacy on the victim (rape) is not only experienced by both sexes, but also with nearly equal frequency, and with a much narrow margin between male and female perpetration than feminist rape apologists claim.

The twelve month NISVS data shows that the CDC's estimates for "forced penetration" of women, and men "forced to penetrate" were very close: 1,270,000 vs 1,267,000. If we assume that the ration of male perpetrators to female perpetrators not different during the year 2010 than for the lifetime numbers, then the percentages given under the heading "Sex of Perpetrator in Lifetime Reports of Sexual Violence" (Page 34 of the PDF file) indicate that around 40% of rape perpetrators are female. That statistic is explained in a graphic that has been floating around the website reddit.com. A good view of it is shown in this discussion.

One area in which the prevalence of female perpetration of intimate and partner violence which couldn't be covered up was the NISVS 2010 Findings on Victimization by Sexual Orientation, though some of the same factors apply to these findings as to the main report. For one thing, if you define rape as only occurring when the perpetrator penetrates the victim, most lesbian sexual assault will not be considered rape. For another, the report oddly combines types of violence together, with category listings such as "Lifetime Prevalence of Rape, Physical Violence, and/or Stalking Victimization by an Intimate Partner by Sexual Orientation" (Page 18 of the report, 24 of the PDF.)

According to the report, a higher percentage of lesbian women experience multiple types of violence perpetrated by an intimate partner than either heterosexual women or any group of men. While the NISVS itself was flawed as I've previously described, the flaws run the risk of overestimating male perpetration and female victimization, while underestimating male victimization, and therefore these flaws are irrelevant to the conclusion that women's female sexual partners are more dangerous to them than their male partners. I note that these findings receive little interest.

The NISVS isn't the only recent study which found a high rate of female perpetration of abuse.

Surveys done among students at the University of Florida found higher perpetration of female abuse of male partners, including stalking. Researchers for the study seem to have assumed the relationships in which the abuse took place were all heterosexual, and have therefore concluded that some of the female violence must have been perpetrated in self-defense or against non-students. While those theories could account for some female violence, so could same-sex relationships, and it's impossible to know the role of any factor without further study. This is a good example of researchers taking data that doesn't fit the feminist agenda and trying to make it fit, rather than looking at it as a reason for further investigation into female behavior.

According to the Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project by the journal Partner Abuse, research has found that rates of female perpetrated violence are higher than male perpetrated (28.3% vs. 21.6%.) Research has found that the majority of partner violence is two-way (both partners are perpetrators) and that when it's not, women are more often perpetrators.

The 1993 report Physical Assaults by Women Partners: A Major Social Problem, by Murray Strauss, contradicts the conventional belief that the prevalence of female perpetration of intimate partner violence is explained by self-defense. In this report, we learn that information on gender symmetry in partner violence was detected and suppressed by researchers as early as 1979.

> Although there may be exceptions that I missed, every study among the more than thirty describing some type of sample that is not self-selective (such as community random samples and samples of college student dating couples) has found a rate of assault by women on male partners that is about the same as the rate of assault by men on female partners. These studies include research by such respected scholars as Scanzoni (1978) and Tyree and Malone (1991) and large-scale studies such as the Los Angeles Epidemiology Catchment Area study

> The Kentucky study also brings out a troublesome question of scientific ethics, because it is one of several in which the data on assaults by women were intentionally suppressed. The existence of those data became known only because Hornung, McCullough, and Sugimoto (1981) obtained the computer tape and found that, among the violent couples, 38 percent of the attacks were by women on men who, as reported by the women themselves, had not attacked them.

That report goes on to describe similar findings on female perpetration from multiple studies conducted during the 1970s, '80s, and '90s, and points out that as in the Kentucky study, the data gathered does not support the claim that female violence can be explained away by attributing most of it to self-defense. This shows that even advocates lobbying for VAWA's predecessor (and the law upon which VAWA originally expanded), the Family Violence Prevention and Services Act of 1984, had evidence of gender symmetry in intimate and partner violence.

What has been the result of the long-term, dishonest approach feminist researchers and advocacy groups have taken to addressing intimate partner and sexual violence?

The primary model used to guide advocates and law enforcement in assisting victims of intimate partner violence assumes that men are perpetrators, and women are victims. Based on that assumption and in response to feminist lobbying, the official response to male victims remains less than helpful.

> Most nations pay considerably more attention to and provide services for male-to-female IPV ("intimate partner violence" – Center for Injury Prevention and Control 2003; World Health Organization 2005) than other types of IPV , even though for 35 years, research has consistently documented that men are often the targets of female-perpetrated IPV (Gelles 1974; Hines and Malley-Morrison 2001; Straus 2004b). Qualitative research of helpseeking among men sustaining IPV indicates that the domestic violence (DV) service system is not always able to provide them services and that many men are actually turned away (Cook 2009;Hines et al. 2007).

In both Canada and the U.S., feminist advocacy has led to withholding of funds from efforts to remedy the lack of resources for abused men. The U.N. has on a worldwide level ignored sexual violence against male victims until recently.

The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project (linked in earlier paragraph) found consistent official bias against males in domestic disputes:

> Males were consistently treated more severely at every stage of the prosecution process, particularly regarding the decision to prosecute, even when controlling for other variables (e.g., the presence of physical injuries) and when examined under different conditions.

This is in part because law and policy intended to address intimate and partner violence has been shaped by feminist bigotry. The Violence Against Women act is one example. This law dictates the availability of shelter, assistance, and advocacy for victims of partner violence, as well as the law enforcement and criminal justice system's approach to perpetrators.

In the ongoing discussion on discrimination against men and boys who are hurt by domestic and sexual violence, feminist groups have attempted to blame everything but themselves. With the information available to them, they've had no excuse for the denial, the minimization and marginalization of male victims, and the hateful, vicious attacks on men's advocacy.

They have argued that "Patriarchy" is to blame for the discrimination abused men and boys face from all angles.

However, if “Patriarchy” is the vehicle of that discrimination, feminist activism is the driver, having played the damsel to “Patriarchy’s” white knight and cast vulnerable men and boys in the role of collateral damage or just plain villain. At first glance, this might seem like simple reckless driving, but it’s not. It’s a cold, calculated sacrifice for a coveted and anticipated reward.

Take away the rhetoric, the buzzwords, the excuses, and the lies, and what you have left is the realization that feminist advocates have deliberately run over men and boys, in order to secure and maintain preferential treatment for women. Why? Because they can get more sympathy for female victims, and exploit female victim status more easily for political influence and government funding. For all of their melodramatic and self-aggrandizing claims, feminist groups have mowed male victims down for power and money.

It’s time to take away their license for good.

Radical Red Stockings

Jim Doyle · 4 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Here's a remedy for some of the generalized feminism-bashing and accusations that feminists as a hive-mind are misandrist. Feminists quite correctly insist that there are many feminisms. It's a request for a little more attention to detail, and it's more than reasonable. So let's look at what is misandrist about radical feminism and see if that is foundational to any other kind of feminism, if other feminists use its terminology, formulations and theoretical assumptions.

When it comes to rebutting the accusation of misandry, counter-feminist and master of rhetorical discipline Fidelbogen has a simple solution – one can simply renounce and abjure the explicitly man-hating aspects of other people's feminism.

Let's see how wide and deep the distinction between radical feminists and other feminists really is. Let's focus on a early founding group. The Redstockings were a radical feminist group formed in New York in 1969. (There was also another independent Redstockings group in San Francisco.) The full text of the manifesto is below at the bottom of the post.

Can we agree that it is a fair statement of the radical feminist position?

If so, can we then also agree that the way to distinguish one's position and one's feminism from those angry man-hating radical feminists is to reject their misandrist positions?

And what are those misandrist positions? Let's lift them from the text of the Redstockings Manifesto[1] itself:

> 1. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives. We are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants, and cheap labor. We are considered inferior beings, whose only purpose is to enhance men's lives. Our humanity is denied.

By describing women's oppression and ignoring men's exactly identical oppression, this formulation erases it, and that is misandrist. That the value of men in this society is based solely on our utility to women is not only so general that it is easy to demonstrate, but also so general that it fades into the background and becomes invisible.

> 2. All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women….
> ….. We call on all men to give up their male privilege

Martha Nussbaum identified denial of autonomy as an indicator of objectification. Borgification of men and women into classes is both misandrist and misogynist. The notion of male privilege proceeds from this borgification of men and is inseparable from it.

> 3. To blame institutions implies that men and women are equally victimized, obscures the fact that men benefit from the subordination of women, and gives men the excuse that they are forced to be oppressors…. We also reject the idea that women consent to or are to blame for their own oppression.

Here the manifesto denies that men are constrained by society and insists that women are. This is not only objectification of women in the form of inertia, the denial of agency, but it is a blatantly discriminatory double standard. The only discernible basis for this discrimination is that men are objects without rights or any claim to judgment under the same standard, rather than human beings.

> 4. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men.

The authority to change others is a claim of ownership. Martha Nussbaum identifies ownership as an indicator of objectification.

> 5. The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men.

Again, Martha Nussbaum identifies violability and denial of subjectivity as indicators of objectification. Denying that women can and do oppress men and boys, harming us in institutional and structural ways, is to excuse the violence and harm that women do men based on the violability of men. And when men come forward and recount how they have been harmed and continue to be harmed, any attempt to deny that or to silence them is a denial of subjectivity.

To summarize, here's a list of what is misandrist in the Redstockings Manifesto:

1. Objectification of men (and women) by means of reductionist class analysis.
2. Demonization of men as the oppressor class.
3. Denial of harms to men as merited to members of an oppressor class.
4. Double standards in analysis biased against men.

So the question is how often do we see this kind of terminolgy and discourse in non-radical feminst spaces, or hear it from one of the "That's Not My Feminism" feminists?

Fidelbogen drew up an oath of abjuration for feminists who did not want to be considered misandrist. I offer my own, which is more detailed. If a feminist doesn't care whether he or she is considered misandrist, that is fine, that is a personal choice. But it is their choice and they can accept the consequences of it.

Oath of Rejection of Misandry

1. I renounce and reject any analysis that objectifies or dehumanizes either men or women by crudely and reductionistically lumping them into classes and that denies their individuality or individual agency.

2. I therefore renounce and reject any analysis that identifies all men as oppressors and all women as victims, or that denies that men can be victims or that women can be oppressors, or that denies that these power differences can be based on gender roles alone.

3. I also renounce and reject formulations or slogans based on accusing men of being oppressors as a class such as "male privilege", and "men can stop rape", in the absence of female equivalents or formulations that include male victims on the same basis as female victims.

4. I renounce and reject gender-based discrimination. I reject analysis that uses false equivalencies to minimize harms to men, such as: equating rape of women to murder of men or insults to women's faithfulness with paternity fraud against men; that seek to explain away harms to men as insignificant because they are done by other men; that seek to exculpate women for blaming men for the violence that women do to them or their children. I condemn any gender-based discrimination before the law, whether intentional or simply resulting in disparate impact – the female sentencing discount, gendered disparities in scholarships, institutional support groups or quality of instruction and educational outcomes in government-run education, disparities in the family court system resulting in disparate rates of child custody and disparate treatment of parental misconduct, and all other forms of governmental and institutional gender discrimination. I condemn gender-based infringements on due process and other Constitutional rights.

5. I renounce and reject the demonization of human sexuality, either as dangerous and creepy or as sluttish and dirty, or as perverted or unnatural. I reject notions such as "rape culture" and "male gaze".

6. I renounce and reject any social or political project that treats one gender as morally inferior to another. I reject calls from women to "fix" men and attempts by women, or their male enablers, to define or decree what constitutes a "good man" a "real man" or masculinity.

So there's the oath a feminist can take before witnesses to remove any doubt she or he is misandrist. Just swear off "male privilege", "male gaze", "rape culture" and all special pleading for either gender. It's simple egalitarianism.

Notes:

[1] REDSTOCKINGS MANIFESTO[FULL TEXT]

I. After centuries of individual and preliminary political struggle, women are uniting to achieve their final liberation from male supremacy. Redstockings is dedicated to building this unity and winning our freedom.

II. Women are an oppressed class. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives. We are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants, and cheap labor. We are considered inferior beings, whose only purpose is to enhance men's lives. Our humanity is denied. Our prescribed behavior is enforced by the threat of physical violence.

Because we have lived so intimately with our oppressors, in isolation from each other, we have been kept from seeing our personal suffering as a political condition. This creates the illusion that a woman's relationship with her man is a matter of interplay between two unique personalities, and can be worked out individually. In reality, every such relationship is a class relationship, and the conflicts between individual men and women are political conflicts that can only be solved collectively.

III. We identify the agents of our oppression as men. Male supremacy is the oldest, most basic form of domination. All other forms of exploitation and oppression (racism, capitalism, imperialism, etc.) are extensions of male supremacy: men dominate women, a few men dominate the rest. All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force. They have used their power to keep women in an inferior position. All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women.

IV. Attempts have been made to shift the burden of responsibility from men to institutions or to women themselves. We condemn these arguments as evasions. Institutions alone do not oppress; they are merely tools of the oppressor. To blame institutions implies that men and women are equally victimized, obscures the fact that men benefit from the subordination of women, and gives men the excuse that they are forced to be oppressors. On the contrary, any man is free to renounce his superior position, provided that he is willing to be treated like a woman by other men.

We also reject the idea that women consent to or are to blame for their own oppression. Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men.

The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men. The basis for this illusion is the isolation of individual relationships from their political context and the tendency of men to see any legitimate challenge to their privileges as persecution.

V. We regard our personal experience, and our feelings about that experience, as the basis for an analysis of our common situation. We cannot rely on existing ideologies as they are all products of male supremacist culture. We question every generalization and accept none that are not confirmed by our experience.

Our chief task at present is to develop female class consciousness through sharing experience and publicly exposing the sexist foundation of all our institutions. Consciousness-raising is not "therapy," which implies the existence of individual solutions and falsely assumes that the male-female relationship is purely personal, but the only method by which we can ensure that our program for liberation is based on the concrete realities of our lives.

The first requirement for raising class consciousness is honesty, in private and in public, with ourselves and other women.

VI. We identify with all women. We define our best interest as that of the poorest, most brutally exploited woman.

We repudiate all economic, racial, educational or status privileges that divide us from other women. We are determined to recognize and eliminate any prejudices we may hold against other women.

We are committed to achieving internal democracy. We will do whatever is necessary to ensure that every woman in our movement has an equal chance to participate, assume responsibility, and develop her political potential.
VII. We call on all our sisters to unite with us in struggle.

We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own.

In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women.

The time for individual skirmishes has passed. This time we are going all the way.

Aimee Nicholls versus the star chamber

Aimee Nicholls · 4 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A message to British Politicians, and the public regarding family law.

Hi there, my name is Aimee Nicholls, I'm 16 years old, and 11 years ago, my parents divorced. It doesn't matter why right now, that's history. But it is important that you know that it wasn't down to my dad. It wasn't something that he wanted, and he couldn't do anything about it. It's certainly not something that I wanted, but I also had no say. My dad is definitely the more natural parent out of my mum and dad, and I've always been closer to him. I do love my mom and dad both the same. But, if I could only live with one of them, it would be my dad, and it's been that way for 11 years. There was no reason for that not to happen. He hadn't harmed me in any way, and he didn't pose any risk, or threaten me. My dad shared my care before my parents split.

He and I were just never given that option. It wasn't even considered, ever. Despite what people want you to think, I've learned that family law is just set up that way. It works exactly how it was designed to work, to keep dads and their kids apart. It makes more money for everyone working in family law, and my situation is only partly resolved after 11 years of fighting. I now live with my dad, but it's not easy. The system doesn't like giving up, unless you're one of the few families it allows to be different to "prove" that it's fair. It clearly isn't fair.

When I voted with my feet at age 15 to go live with my dad again, a family court judge, like all of the other ones before tried to force me to go back to my mum. And he told me I was too young to express my views to him. I was, like, 2 weeks away from being an adult at 16. [In the Uk you are a legal adult at age 16] He said he needed social services to tell him what my views were. Think about that. I was sat in a court room at the age of almost 16, in front of him, and he effectively stuck his fingers in his ears and sang la la la. He ignored that I said that I felt at risk, probably because risk never really comes into it, unless it can be pointed at a dad to split him and his child up. More delay, more work for the system, more income, more funding. That's what it's all about. If you need a good reason to open up the secret family courts to the public, this is one. I bet the judge would not have dared say any of that to me if there were people watching. I was almost an adult, and I understood exactly what he was doing. His game of pretending to not be able to hear my voice was really disheartening.

It was horrible. Why would I want to go back to social services who had always mislead the court about my views? They make it their job to lie, and to twist things, and this judge was just giving them another chance to do that. After 11 years of being involved, I would say it's worse than it's ever been at this point, right now, for kids. They have found more ways than ever to stop kids seeing their dads. Ever since I started speaking out, I've heard from hundreds of families, and it's always the same thing. I don't think that's a coincidence. For the politicians watching, the ones that want to believe all the lies; wake up. It's worse than it's ever been, and it's happening on your watch. For example, the courts are still trying to ruin things for me and my dad. They stripped him of all his income, so that he can't care for me. If they cant force me to live with my mum, they're just going to ruin it for me and my dad. That's fine now, it's fine for me, I go out and work, I'm 16. But why should we not just be left to live peacefully after all of this. It's over. It's gone. Give up on it. And not every other family has that opportunity. Not every other kid my age is like me. They don't speak out. More should, but they don't. And that's why the system can carry on.

And also they banned him for no reason from ever seeing my sister Kitty, who is now aged 7. Which means I can't see her either, and she can't see me. There's absolutely no reason for either of those. There's just no reason. The problem is, you can't keep my generation quiet, and we will remember you. I will find my sister one day, and she will know what was done to us, and by who. And those people will have to answer to us. And on that topic, I'd like to mention a few special people, who deserve to be remembered for making my life hell.

First of all, judges. I say judges [plural], not just one, because my family has been through a lot of different courts and different judges, and they all say the same thing. That's not a coincidence. The only way that could happen is if the system is set up that way, and it's set up wrong. I saw it myself when I made my own application at 15. The application doesn't even cater for someone like a child. It only caters for the [mother], and it's really hard. But I did it, and it can be done. But the judge just slapped me down and ignored everything I said. The final order that was given was only partially what we had gone there to achieve. The judge just couldn't care less, because it's not what he's used to doing, and he's not meant to do that [i.e he is meant to put me, the child, first].

Next, there's teachers and school counsellors that I talked to numerous times when I was in school. Obviously telling them I wanted to live with my dad. Later they told social workers that I had never indicated a problem, or expressed my views. They are probably all still in their jobs abusing kids just like me.

Next, there's the [family courts] expert witness that made my dad sound like he was some kind of psychopath. Clearly he isn't, but that doesn't matter. This guy took a huge fee and wrote some rubbish to ensure that my sister and I would be kept from seeing my dad. And he's still out there as well, destroying families, taking his large fee's. I hope he's enjoying the money that he got from destroying my life, and my sister's life. She's seven.

When they took her away from me, she screamed and cried. I took some precious things from her, her precious things, to promise her that I would see her again, that I would give them back. Ive still got them, you know, it's been two years now, since I've seen her, and a lot longer since my dad has seen her.

And, lastly, a very special mention for the CAFCASS officer from Oxford who did everything in her power to keep me from my dad. From lying in the reports, to "losing" my wishes and feelings report [that said that I wanted to live with my dad and why]. Also, repeated interviews which were not meant to happen. With increasing pressure until I told her that I wanted to live with my mum. I guess she's still out there as well, destroying other children's lives.

The system is completely broken. Almost everyone working in the system has some vested interest in what's going on, and they're making it worse. If it's not money and work, its politics. I found that out when I uploaded videos to YouTube of me speaking about my case, and feminists attacked me at the age of 14, saying I was a whore and an actor, and a liar. These people are just pure evil, and I cant see a reason, or accept why this is all going on. These are the people that the government are listening to, not us [the real] victims. The whole secrecy thing, it just makes it a 100 times worse. I personally think that would be one of the main things that would resolve this. Family law, and the courts, and social services and CAFCASS all just have too much money, and they use it to put pressure on the government to continue doing what they do. Nobody else's voice gets heard. Politicians just need to stop this, and not in a few months, or two years, or a few weeks even. They need to do it now.

I want to see my sister. I want her and my dad to be together. I want us all to be together, why can't that happen? There's no reason for that not to happen. You should explain it to me and Kitty in a way that makes sense to us, because all we know is that we love each other, and we love our dad, and some pensioner in buckle shoes and a wig keeps telling us that it's not in our best interest. I think family law is not in my best interest. And I think it's time for it to go.

I'm Aimee Nicholls. Thank you for listening. Now go out and do something about it.

Human Rights Watch: “Brazilian bikini wax rape”

Robert O'Hara · 4 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

(Washington D.C. July 2, 2013) On Thursday, June 27th, a report commissioned by the Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety Council of the District of Columbia titled “Analysis of Human Rights Watch Report Capitol Offence: Police Mishandling of Sexual Assault Cases in the District of Columbia” was released to the public after the law firm Crowell & Moring was retained to analyze said report from Human Rights Watch (HRW). [1] This followed a tremendous amount of controversy concerning HRW’s very public assault on the credibility of Washington D.C.’s Metropolitan Police Department (MPD) which happened to coincide with the previously un-contested, but then precarious re-authorization, of the Violence Against Women Act. As reported by AVFM previously, HRW accused the MPD of failure to document over 170 allegations of sexual assault and that there was a culture of victim blaming and misconduct in the department. [2] MPD Chief Cathy Lanier promptly responded with a subsequently publicized letter to HRW charging the report was based on critically flawed methodology and placed HRW’s credibility into question.

Crowell and Moring’s report unequivocally concluded that not only did the MPD not fail to document 170 sexual assault cases but that the “assumptions regarding the accuracy of the data it used, as well as the methodology supporting it’s conclusion that MPD failed to document and investigate over 170 allegations of sexual assault were flawed.” Indeed, the report concludes there were in fact only 5 cases which the Sexual Assault Nurse Examiner Program, or SANE, reported to the MPD between 2008 and September 2012 that were not accounted for. This was out of a total of 480 SANE reports and a total MPD case load of over 1500 sexual assault cases handled in that time period.

The flaws cited as to this discrepancy were that many of the cases were outside of the MPD’s jurisdiction and that not every SANE examination resulted in a police report. Also, HRW focused on matching the dates and frequency of SANE examinations without taking into account that they did not have access to the names of the alleged victims, discounting the possibility that there were more than one examination on different days for the same individual.

Most disturbing is the HRW report’s dogged emphasis on only a few cases in which police were accused of misconduct and the omission of facts that would have completely reversed the readers interpretation of events in those cases. Only eight cases out of the 1500 (or less than one half of one percent) handled between 2008 and 2011 by the MPD were mentioned over 100 times in the HRW report. This leaves “the reader with the impression that the number of victims whose complaints are included in the report [are] higher than [they] actually are” according to the Crowell and Moring report.

The omission of facts in several cases borders on criminal. For instance HRW stated that a 2009 case in which a victim was handcuffed, driven to an undisclosed location and sexually assaulted was categorized only as “kidnapping.” However the sexual assault did not occur in MPD’s jurisdiction but in neighboring Prince Georges County where it was indeed classified as a sexual assault. In another case cited by the HRW report an excerpt from a complaint letter to Chief Lanier was quoted as saying that during a call from an investigator a woman’s assault was referred to as an “incident” rather than a sexual assault thus making her very upset. What the HWR report left out was that the same complainant had glowing remarks for the officer who attended to her in the hospital during her “darkest hour.” “To this day I feel indebted to his kindness” stated another omission from her letter in the report.

The most scandalous, yet most comical, instance of factual omission in the HRW report was a case involving an alleged victim accusing the department of ‘victim blaming’ by using language such as “if someone did something to her that she did not like she ‘would tell them to stop’ and ‘if she didn’t want them to do it, why didn’t she stop them.’

What follows below is an excerpt from the Crowell and Moring report that details the exclusion of important facts that pertain to this case. (caution, WTF trigger warning):

> What the HRW Report Doesn't Say:
> • HRW based this account on a complaint made to the Office of Police Complaints(OPC). This complaint was investigated by MPD.
> • The victim reported to MPD that she went to a local business for a Brazilian Bikini wax on two separate occasions. A Brazilian Bikini wax involves the removal of almost all hair from the pubic region.
> • The victim reported that she felt the two technician ns who applied the procedure touched her inappropriately on each separate occasion.
> • The female SAU detectives interviewed the owner of the business and were given a demonstration of the procedure. During the procedure a technician, wearing gloves, applies wax to the area surrounding the genitals; pressure is applied to the area being treated, and the wax is removed. The pressure is applied to reduce the amount of pain associated with the removal of the wax from the area.
> • MPD discussed the case with the U.S. Attorney's office. The U.S. Attorney's office determined that there was not sufficient criminal intent to prove that a crime had been committed.
> • HRW cited this 2009 Complaint three times in the report. The statements of the female SAU detectives, when placed in the context of a Brazilian Bikini wax procedure that occurred on multiple occasions, provides a complete picture which makes the detective's questions during the course of her investigation more reasonable under the circumstances.

The Crowell and Moring report also pointed out that the number of significant changes to the MPD's handling of sexual assault cases since 2008 which were met with great favor from local sexual assault advocacy groups such as SANE. "The HRW Report nonetheless cites numerous examples of police misconduct that predate the 2008 reforms. Specifically, HRW cited pre-reform examples of police misconduct 63 times in the Report. Moreover, HRW frequently used these negative pre-reform examples to suggest that those practices exist today" said the report.

In spite of what is plausibly a deliberately misleading critique of the MPD's handling of sexual assault cases, the Crowell & Moring report is generous to HRW in its analysis calling it a "catalyst for positive change" in its executive summary. It also states that the report is intended to be "forward looking" rather than holding HRW accountable for what is obviously a tragically flawed report the purpose of which was, almost definitely, to impact the outcome of the debate over VAWA raging in Congress at the time.

Snow Angels

D.D.Harper · 5 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Illinois winter. 1999.

There is nothing more rewarding than to see your children come of age and too often, these times are fleeting like sun reflected ripples rolling across the water. As a father I cherish each and every one and here is Gabriel's story.

One morning after a mid winter storm I thought my sons would get a kick out of making snow men in the yard so I ran down the hallway and burst with excitement through the boy's bedroom door.

"Guys time to get up we have things to do."

Gabe and Kevin four and ten shuffled in their beds grumbling a bit and attempted to go back to sleep.

"Hey, I'm serious it snowed last night and we need to get out there and make snow men."

The boys slowly rolled out of bed and when they were able to stand without stumbling I walked over and together we looked out the window. To their amazement they saw three feet of snow covering the yard, in their excitement they didn't take the time to get dressed before they ran down the hall to the kitchen, the boys in their skivvies opened the sliding glass door to the back deck of our house. Kevin had seen snow before so he knew the fun to be had, but this was Gabe's first time and the look of amazement on his face will always remain with me.

Gabe was reveling in his new discovery as Kevin and I decided to have a little adventure. I challenged him to a snow angel contest. Being skeptical for all of ten seconds he agreed to the challenge, as long as I went first.

Down to my boxers now, Kevin looked at me sheepishly with eyes wide open and a quizzical frown on his face. I carefully positioned myself, and with a quick breath I fell backwards with abandon maintaining my composure while I slowly made an angel in the snow. The boys had broad smiles on their faces with a bit of dubiety in their glaze that made it all worth the shock of icy shivers crawling down and up my body.

Once my angel was done I suggested to Kevin he should get a few towels before he made his angel. With towels now in hand Kevin carefully positioned himself next to my angel and slowly fell into the fluffy white layers covering the ground. There he was, lying flat and feeling that first shock I felt only moments before. I encouraged him to start moving his hands and feet to form his angel and like Jumping Jacks he made the fastest snow angel in history before he bounced up and shot like a bolt into the warm comfort of the towel I had waiting for him.

"Pretty good there Mr."

I was drying him off and getting him warm when Gabe insisted he wanted to make his angel next to ours.

"I don't know Gabe. I don't think you'll like it very much."

He looked at me confidently and with sparkles in his eyes he said "I can do it"

With trepidation I positioned him next to our angels and with all the bravery he could muster he fell back into the ground. For what seemed like agonizing minutes he just laid there with a look on his face, a face I had only seen once before when the doctor stitched his forehead after running into a cart at the supermarket.

"Dad what have I done?" Then he started screaming.

"Gabe shhh, it's ok."

The two of us stood there in shock for a moment and Kevin told Gabe to start moving his arms and legs. Gabe just laid there in his underwear, screaming and no doubt waking up the neighborhood. I was about to pull him out of the snow when we heard soft footsteps hurriedly coming our way.

"Kevin we're in big trouble now." I muttered.

We turned around and all I could say was "Hi honey!"

"What on earth are you two doing to Gabriel?"

"Hmmm, we're making snow angels."

"You guys are unbelievable!" She got Gabe out of the snow and bundled him in one of the towels. "What are you guys thinking? He's only four."

I thought to myself "you wouldn't understand."

Kevin was not helpful letting his mother know that Gabe wanted to do it and we told him to shoosh up.

After discussing what not to do we had showers and the breakfast was on me. I had a lot of atonement to do. After we finish eating the littlest guy chimed up and told his mother he wanted to make his own angel. I avoided eye contact and hoped Kevin did not say anything. Mom did everything to discourage Gabe but he was not having any of it.

Finally she looked at me and said quietly "See what you started?"

The only thing I could say with a weak smile was "we'd better get some dry towels."

I tried to convince Gabe that it would be better if he put on some warm cloths and a jacket first, but the little man was firm that doing that wouldn't make a good angel.

He took his clothes off and proclaimed he was ready. I opened the sliding door and he walked out gingerly where the snow was lightest then he carefully positioned himself and made his first snow angel without a squeak.

Gabriel is now one of the boys.

Our Dad

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 6 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The dad is in a hospital and almost all of the world will never know he was born. His three children are hunted away from any moment of comfort as they stand together but alone around his bed. The worst and most noble of their natures are fighting on a battlefield in a war watched only by the cheap walnut striped clock nailed above the door. It ticks like drips of burning plastic twine that fall and hiss tiny screams.

One son, a middle aged man is forever addled from the angry smash of alcohol and drugs. But today there will be no dabbling with those things of privacy and recreation because today is different from all others. After having lifted his head above the diorama of his own scrambled life he stands within the starched walls of a hospital and looks down at dad. He sees nothing in the bed except a thinning sliver of sunset that catches the tip of the flattened pillow. It reminds him of his own mortality.

Later that night his low tolerance for frustration will have him bested by the fleeting charm of intoxication. The soft siren sea-shanty of a neat Irish whiskey with a few codeine-rocks will give him the promise of a loving fog. He is desperate for that velvet body wrap and its warm and freshly tumbled greyness, but more than that he adores it as his closest family. There was something absolutely right about being stoned. It was not unlike an adoring coal miner's wife watching her spent husband gleefully hurling his work-boots at the lounge room wall a minute before a hot dinner.

And that was Scot, lying alone in his bed smiling sweetly at an ant disappearing into a crack in the low plaster ceiling. Being as tiny as the insect he followed it and it turned to him as a well dressed man with an unknown face. Scot watched him removed his hat and tuck it under his arm and whisper.

"Dad might die tonight. So get ready for it."

The daughter, a middle-aged woman stands next to Scot and she is scrambling to wrest control of the situation not knowing that she does so because she's seeking recluse from fear. She's always running towards something soft and warm, never knowing she is running away from something cold and strange at the same time.

"I was frightened" she slowly croaks. A rehearsal of the words she'll mutter when she looks back at a death that has yet to happen.

"This means I cared about dad." And she will say that when she throws the last rose on the coffin roof moments before the petals crush from fat clods of tears and drops of clay.

Those words will be for later, and she assured herself that the rose will not be read because others will see that as selfish drama. No, white is stern and noble with no other message. That will be the tone she will choose, but right now she was an animal freshly peppered with buck-shot spat from the muzzle of fear. The fantasy of her strong and powerful self was well beyond her reach now. It had already scuttled off awkwardly like a crab clattering ridiculously on polished glass seeking purchase. Without the fantasy of her powerful self she was a marooned and blinded soul with a bamboo cane on a tangled island shrinking by the endless cuts of a determined sea.

And that was Sally, too scared to cry or smile and clamped in the vice like grip of ancient adrenaline. It had her fast in flight and it had her rooted where she stood.

The third child there is calm and his name is Mark. He had been walking on a path hewn by his own hand for twenty years. His path began when he told his dad he would never see him again because the old man had lied to him. For Mark a fib was a rotted thing, but a fib from his dad was a carcass that lived and grew and spewed maggots that could never stop multiplying.

At first, the shadow of that lie would catch in the corner of his eye before it darted back to the dark, but as all carnivores do with primal learning they revisit smarter and with a quieter stealth as they approach. He knew in any unguarded moment it would return more fecund with its swollen belly. In time Mark understood that this creature was nothing but a hideous patata that was always with him swaying drunkenly above his head. If he glanced upwards it would split its corruption upon him and the temptation to inspect it was too much.

He chose to walk away from it. With a reborn urgency and with one gathered punch, he bashed a hole right through a wall of the quadrangle in his mind now relaxed that his destiny would reveal itself one day. He was freed in part, but there was another matter that slowed his new stride as can happen in thick dreams. It was the silence.

At first the phone between dad and son sat quiet and dead as stone kite. Soon it hummed and then rose to a flat note that screamed. It became white pitched and it was plasma from a welder's arc that billowed the steam of their blood around their shared incision. Then one evening the son answered a call and heard for the first time years the sound of his father's voice.

"I lied. I'm sorry. Can you hear me?"

Mark cried as he watched the mean touch of the maggots and their cruel house of carcass break to ashes.

"Yes dad I can hear you now. You just set me truly free."

"You have always been free." he chuckled. "I am the one no longer inside a prison."

Their words were rushed but never hurried and the son laid it all out. He spoke of how mindful he was of every step that fell on the track beneath him and the dad listened and he told how he wanted to join him.

"Dad you will walk with me?" Mark slapped the side of the chair. "Be with me in my solitude and we will never be lonely again."

They spoke of birthdays they'd never attended and people the other had never met, and they talked of places never visited and jobs they'd lost and money they'd not saved and they wept, and they laughed and the old man said the doctor said he had six months at best.

Mark was thinking about a joke they had shared a moment ago and he was still smiling.

"What?"

His words were measured but never slow and his father laid it all out. He assured him he would die in six months and Mark listened and he did not say another word for twenty minutes before he said goodbye at the end of the call.

That was three months ago, and in that time the two men put spades to their buried history and asked softer questions at first.

"Son why did you move out of home and leave your room for me to clean out for a lodger?"

"Dad I was rushing to go to college. I had no time."

"Son. You didn't plan ahead and that's what really happened."

"Dad you're right. I slipped up. Sorry."

That moment would always comfort Mark when he drew upon it later. For his dad it was different. He used the moment as a sponge to wipe away the words from an angry young man he could not understand from many years ago. The image of a son drunk with hormones, the picture of him flush with a new body of a strong man that swaggered without responsibility was now dead. He looked at his new boy without a word and Mark put down his fishing rod and smiled as he touched him on his shoulder.

"Ok. Now we have to get this dingy back to the dock before six or they'll charge us for tomorrow", and he turned away and let the tear itch down his cheek as he turned the key and started the engine.

Fourteen hours later and five suburbs away Sally turned a key and opened the door of Scot's apartment. She walked into her brother's lounge room and took the blanket off the window and shouted.

"Get out of bed! The funeral house is going to cash the check today and they need you to tell them it won't BOUNCE this time!"

She put the kettle on and when it rumbled she pulled up a sleeve and swept the bench of dirty dishes to the floor. The sound of the jug was hot rain in her head that couldn't put out a fire and when the plates shattered on the floor she caught her breath.

She walked to Scot's bedroom door and screamed. "Cunt! Get up! Now!"

Eight minutes later he walked into the room and unscrewed the cap of fish food and scattered a pinch of it onto the small tank. He crouched down and looked at the two Angel fish and tapped the glass and whispered.

"She's here. Get ready for the bitch show."

He stood up and scratched his thigh.

"Dads' not dead for another three months. The funeral people aren't busting my balls about it right now and how'd you get a key for my place anyway?"

Sally squinted and Scot scowled and for fifty minutes they got ugly as they got louder. They yelled about family pictures on walls and they screamed about walls in the family. He sucked Vodka and lime from cans and sneered about car registration and she sucked Menthols from the pack and jabbered about French polishing. There was mention of mum and a lucrative job, a Christmas Scot forgot, a neglected stamp collection that Sally let water damage and then a nasty debate about genetics.

For the remaining weeks Sally and Scot bellowed answers to questions they'd never asked while their Dad and their brother gave answers to brave questions.

"Mum told me that you were pissed off when I was born. Is that true"

"Yep. I didn't want a third kid at that time, but you should know that your mother didn't like you as much as the others. Truth is, she played favourites like she was betting on horses and I always loved my kids the same."

"She was shallow?"

"Yeah and she never left because of that offer of some flash job. I tossed her out because she got in with some bloke who was into coke big time. She had to go and I made up that story for you kids."

Mark stood up from the chair and looked at the drip beside the bed. "Yeah, I've known about that for fifteen years dad. I'm glad you told me anyway."

He turned the little plastic wheel under the plastic bag."Hey dad. You haven't been getting any morphine. I opened it up just a bit. The pain should go in a few minutes."

Dad smiled and looked into his garden and saw the Jacaranda tree in full bloom. Its violet flowers were covering most of the lawn and he watched as another fluttered down.

"Yeah I knew it was turned off. I had to tell you that first before any drugs got into me." He laughed. "It's the other type of pain that counts and I reckon we finally got it beat."

Mark took a deep breath and turned to him with his eyes closed.

"Yes we did and we're free now. It's ok to die."

Nine days later he was in the hospital and dead on the tenth. Before he got the news of that, Mark took the letter from the mailbox and there was an old photograph. It showed himself as a child with his father kneeling next to him and they were laughing. In the background was a great oak that held a tree-house.

"Dear Mark.

This photo was in my wallet and it's proof that we got it right from the start. See how happy we are and see the tree in the background? I'm at peace now that I know you always forgave me for poisoning the roots, and I'm sorry I lied to you when I said that god made it sick and that I had to cut it down the next year.

I never liked your uncle and when the two of you spent that summer building the tree-house my jealousy made me insane.

We've said everything we wanted to say and I'm happy and I love you. Take care.

Dad."

Prone to violence: Chapter one

Erin Pizzey · 6 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: We are pleased to have obtained permission to reprint Erin Pizzey's classic book, Prone to Violence*, first published in 1982. This book is a must-read on the subject of domestic violence, and is what people from the former Soviet Union would call "samizdat," as the book was subjected to concerted campaigns to make it unavailable for publication or distribution in the UK or United States. Over 30 years ago, gender ideologues were already trying to hide the truth–that men and women are equally prone to violence. Although parts of this book are dated, what's most shocking is how fresh and timely most of it still is: little has changed in the last 30 years, except that the vast majority of peer reviewed scientific research done since its publication has only bolstered all of Erin's most salient points. When it comes to domestic violence, women and men are about as violent as each other, just in somewhat different ways, and its primary victims are children.*

We continue our series with the first chapter of "Prone To Violence." Watch for the other chapters to be published here on AVfM. If you have ever been involved in an abusive relationship with a woman (or man for that matter), you owe it to yourself to read this book. And if you know someone who is, or has been, in such a relationship, you owe it to them to get them to read it. –DE

Chapter One: THE WAY WE SEE IT

Coming out of the courtroom on to the front steps, after the first trial at Acton Magistrates' Court, I gazed over a sea of well-loved faces – mothers and children I had not seen for years. But what moved me most were the gaps there, which should have been filled by the smiling faces of women I knew who had died. They should have been there with us – there was no justifiable reason for them to be dead. For they, too, had been 'refugees' in our care. But unlike many of our women who, once free, had chosen to leave their violent relationships for ever, these women had chosen to go back, thereby forfeiting their lives.

I could now see Sue beaming at me, holding up her small daughter. She had been married to a very violent man, whose chief boast was that he had bitten off another man's nose in a fight. They were married when she was very young, but once she had come to us for help, she had no further thought of returning to him. She was an enormous help in the refuge, very practical and full of fun. Eventually, she moved to a house we acquired in the south-east of England.

Julia should have been standing next to Sue, as the two had been such good friends. But Julia was dead. She was one of those who went back. In those days I did not know enough about violent relationships to recognise her addiction and to help her as I could now.

In my first book about refuge, Scream Quietly or the Neighbours Will Hear (1974), I wrote about our battered grand-mother, whom we all loved. We called her 'Nan', and she was seventy-eight years old. There I wrote: 'She sits in our chaos of mums and kids, her face covered by wrinkles and a black eye.' She's dead now – as a result of a brutal kicking by her own son, who was himself the casualty of her marriage to her violent stockbroker husband. And I grieved for her, too, that day.

Another gap in the ranks was Sandy, whose face was dreadfully scarred from a car accident. She was left so distraught by her disfiguration that she had to be moved to a mental hospital to recover not only physically but also mentally from her accident. There she met James, her violent lover. After leaving the hospital, they lived together and had a baby. Then James became so cruel and abusive to Sandy that she fled to us for refuge – and he soon went off with another woman. Yet Sandy could not bear to be deprived of this extremely violent man – 'The only man who makes me feel alive,' she would say. She took her own life the night before she was due to move into a brand-new flat.

Rachel, mother of five lively children, insisted on moving back into her own house when she had obtained her injunction against her husband, knowing full well that he became almost a lunatic when he was angry. She died the same night she moved back home – he stabbed her to death. And their children joined the thousands of other kids in care who have little hope of being adopted or fostered, but will sit m children's homes like little time-bombs primed to explode into our streets years later, with the enormous likelihood of recreating the violent living patterns of their parents.

That poses the crucial question, the main theme of this book: why did all these particular women choose to return to their violent and often deadly relationships? We can all chart moments in our lives when suddenly we need to face a truth that we have hitherto been avoiding. In my own case, I had been avoiding this particular question for years. For me that moment, standing on those steps, crystallized a train of thought that had been nagging at me for months previously.

For the first few years, my colleague Anne Ashby and I were the only permanent members of Chiswick Women's Aid who worked full-time. Volunteers and well-meaning people came and went, many disapproving of our policy of never turning women away, because this policy brought about overcrowding and unhygienic conditions. But then, having lived in the Middle East and travelled extensively, Anne and I did not share the normal middle-class repugnance for anything less than suburban standards of tidiness, cleanliness and comfort. In those days we relied very much on each other for moral support; and, of course, some of the mothers coming in for help became close personal friends.

A vivid lesson from those times was to recognise the anger and hostility shown us by certain people who would claim that 'women like to be beaten', or that they somehow 'deserve it'. This simplistic attitude served only to condone the terrible acts of violence committed under the covering excuse of 'You make your bed so you must lie in it'. In other words, that women who were victims of violent partners were largely responsible for their own regrettable situations, and could not deserve much sympathy.

I remember particularly such views being thrown at me one evening when several couples who worked in the caring agencies were gathered together for a barbecue party. The men there seemed determined to argue that many women deserved what they got. There was clearly no room for rational argument. Yet again, I could sense an invisible barrier erected between my own experience – which was then very recent in terms of my work – and their professional frustration with often difficult and recalcitrant clients who had been turning up in their offices for many years complaining about violence, only to go back to it again and again. Those professionals with me that evening could, of course, quote chapter and verse of the dreadful deeds, the unspeakable delinquency, the manipulatory techniques, and the promiscuity of the women they counselled. In those early days I did not have the solid basis of knowledge and experience to answer the challenges so often thrown at me. All I could say was that it just was not that simple. For it was not a case of either liking or not liking violent behaviour; it was much more complicated than that – and some day I hoped to understand it better. But the people there were so frustrated and angry that the evening degenerated into a slanging match.

In those days it was too dangerous to attempt to share my discoveries in this field, because it was hard enough to gain public acceptance even for the idea that battered wives needed refuge. To discuss the notion that some women were actually prone to violence, and returned to violent relationships again and again, would only have served to alienate the public from these women who were in genuine need of help. [1]

By that time I had read a paper entitled 'Wife-Torture in England[2] published in 1878 by Frances Power Cobbe. The paper was an impassioned plea to Parliament to do something to help the women and children of this country. She was promised by Parliament that a select committee would be set up, and further action would be taken. I was depressed to learn that after her select committee sat and reported, the whole subject was swept under the carpet again, to be for-gotten – just as in our case.

I, too, had sat in the House of Commons, when Jack Ashley, MP, was begging consideration for the lives of such women and children. In June 1973 he put forward a Private Member's Bill which asked a minister representing the Department of Health and Social Security what they would do for battered wives. The hour was late and I, sitting with our mothers in the gallery, looked anxiously down to the floor of the House, where Jack Ashley addressed an almost empty room. The only other people there were the ministers from the DHSS and the House officials. Jack Ashley commented that if the discussion had been about dogs instead of about women and children, the House would have been full.

The subject was debated in Parliament on 17 July 1973, and it was decided that a select committee of MPs should be set up to investigate. The select committee met in the House of Commons during the summer of the following year, and one of our wives told her personal story of abuse – the first woman in history to give evidence to a select committee. This committee agreed that one refuge should be established per every 100,000 people living in Britain. A Parliamentary committee, however, has only the power t0 recommend, and no power to enforce its recommendations. Their recommendation was never put into practice.

We faced the terrible certainty that if our Refuge was allowed to go under through legal pressures due to overcrowding, and if the public was conned into believing that something was being done for these families, when it was not, then the whole campaign would sink without trace again.

To my amazement, nobody seemed to genuinely want to find out why violent people treat each other the way they do. Furthermore, I could not give my personal support to the accepted political solutions based on the notion that violence was a strictly working-class problem, and therefore a purely economic issue: the political line maintaining that men hit women because they were frustrated by their jobs, their poor housing, and their lack of money. I had seen enough middle-class women in trouble to convince me that doctors, dentists, solicitors, and Members of Parliament also indulged in bouts of violence against their women and children in sufficient numbers to make that argument invalid. In fact emotional violence is extremely common in middle-class and upper-class families, and just as damaging as physical violence.

Officialdom suggested that the solutions were to be found in other socialist, or communist, countries. But reports from Russia showed otherwise, for marital violence is a major Russian problem. And China dealt with the problem by proclaiming wife-beating a crime punishable with the death penalty. They obviously had no answer for the root causes, either.

Even if it was too inflammatory to hold public discussions on family violence, I did have by this time a large and dedicated staff. Though it included some paid members, the majority of us volunteered our services for nothing. Apart from our daily work at the Refuge, we spent many weekends together sharing our experiences of the families that came to us. We soon realised that we had much more first-hand knowledge of these families than did any of the other social agencies, because the mothers and children lived with us in our Refuge as one large family. Indeed, most of our families had already been involved with social agencies, who very rarely seemed to have fully understood their true background. Time and again, when called to a case-conference to discuss a family, we would find that, although it had been on their books for years, each agency saw only fragmented aspects of the family situation. I was often reminded of the old Chinese story about the sages who all felt bits of a huge animal in a darkened shed. After they came out they began lengthy discussions about a leg or the tail or an ear, but not one of them grasped the fact that the whole was an elephant.

During our staff seminars, we came to realise that we were catering to two very different needs in our Refuge. The first involved women like Sue who, for one reason or another, had married men who turned out to be violent. Once offered an opportunity to escape this situation, they would take it gratefully and leave, never to return to the violence. These we tend to call the genuine ‘battered wives’. The second involved the type of woman unable to stay away from violence, however much she claimed she wanted to. She seemed doomed either to return to her violent partner eventually, or, having given him up, to move rapidly on to another violent man.

Our growing awareness of these two distinct problems culminated in a report that we sent to the Department of Health and Social Security in the summer of 1977. For the first time, I wrote down some of the conclusions I had reached, and the report was based on 377 mothers with 745 children who had passed through the Chiswick Refuge between May 1976 and May 1977. It was a mammoth task to record and chart the details and the origins of all these families. Seven members of staff voluntarily went into seclusion in my house until the job was done.

The introduction to that report reads:

In 1971 Chiswick Women's Aid was originally conceived as a safe refuge for women and children on the run from violent relationships. It was at this point that the phrase 'battered wives' was corned. However, in the course of the last five and a half years one of the conclusions we have come to is that a more apt description of the families involved would be 'violence prone'. That is to say, that the members of these families have a tendency to be attracted to violent relationships or are themselves violent. We see the term 'battered wives' as too simplistic. We do not claim that this description fits all our families or indeed all women who find themselves in a violent relationship. But what we do claim is the majority of families who come to Chiswick are in such a state of confusion and despair, having fallen through the net of all caring social agencies, that to be offered accommodation in homeless family units, bed and breakfast or temporary hostel accommodation is an unrealistic solution. What they need is for society to understand that the chaos, anarchy and drama of the violent relationships which they have lived through has created within them a special urge to continually relive the excitement of what they have left behind. The dramas in their relationships seem endless and in these conflagrations chaos reigns. Children in such a situation feel the ebb and flow of fear and excitement. Soon they grow from terrified unwilling spectators to active manipulators in the family war. These are the violence-prone adults of tomorrow. These families have failed to build the structures necessary to provide the community with law-abiding citizens. Instead we have a percentage of the population whose drive stems from fear, flight and rage which appear to produce puzzling symptoms of addiction.

In everyday life the emotions of fear, rage and flight cause the adrenalin to flow through the body, preparing it urgently for action. Most human beings rarely need this sort of protection. Our families have lived at this level of excitement for many, many years and when deprived of excitement tend to re-create hazardous situations which bring back the thrill of the moment of 'adrenalin high'. Racing drivers, mountaineers, test pilots, occasions of war are acceptable high-adrenalin pursuits, and it is our job to get our families to be aware of their addiction and the catastrophes they create for themselves and their children. It is also our job to realise that these families have largely been abandoned by the caring agencies who have tried valiantly over the years to find solutions to their problems. What we offer is to accept the damage and lack of inner structure that causes them to fail again and again and to try and re-integrate their disordered personalities to where they can leave our care having learned satisfactory methods of maintaining relationships and standards of child care and home-making that enables them to exist happily within the community. Of course, often we fail but we have achieved sufficient success to hopefully attract funds to continue our work. One major hurdle is to get the Government to accept that these families urgently need help of a special nature and using techniques that we have developed over the years that we have been running, based on some 5,000 women and children who have passed through our hands. (This paper is quoted in Appendix A).

We were all naive enough to believe that the powers-that-be would study our evidence carefully, and perhaps accept that we had something to say. But, after weeks of waiting, the first response was merely an acknowledgment that the report had arrived. After that there was silence. It seemed that any money allotted for research by the DHSS would be given to groups prepared to spend it on safe, comfortable solutions. Again no one wanted to hear the uncomfortable truth. And that truth was that there are so many thousands of violence-prone people, born and raised in violence, who know no other lifestyle except to terrorise and mutilate each other or any innocent victim who comes into their circle.

Not only were we dealing with some of the most violent men in the country, on our very doorstep – which we expected would happen as soon as we began to offer refuge -but we had some equally violent women on the inside, too. Other refuges had careful screening measures built into their selection procedures, so that they could avoid these families. Gradually we made constructive links with good refuges who would take our 'battered wives', and in turn would send us their 'violence prone' women. It had become obvious in our struggle that any funding for our operation seemed unlikely to come from the statutory bodies. We had put our finger inadvertently on an official sore spot.

These families we cared so passionately about were truly 'dustbin' families. Their behaviour and lifestyle were so chaotic and derelict that, in the past, the solution had always been to break them up and disperse them. It is extraordinary to think that until the 1940s pregnant women were still giving birth in local workhouses, where their babies were forcibly taken into care. As soon as they were old enough, those children were shipped out to the colonies for farmwork and general labour. They were chiefly sent to Canada, New Zealand and Australia, where there was no black population to be bullied into serving the white man. The unwritten policy was definitely dispersal.

Within the last twenty years such overseas dispersal became more difficult, and therefore institutions were becoming packed with inmates – so another strategy came into being. This brought about the creation of 'ghettoes' where such 'dustbin' families could breed and swarm. For instance the White City Estate was built in London, and still the New Towns are growing all over the country. However, with the advent of mass communication and investigative journalism, embarrassing questions were raised about hungry and ragged children. And the ghettoes were growing so big that their violence threatened to spill over into the other, 'respectable' parts of our cities. Attempts were made to improve housing conditions. Architects and planners built huge estates that would look good from the outside but were sited well away from the cities. The Glasgow Gorbals were torn down. Families were exiled all over England.

The idea was that if you separated these huge and brawling families from each other, you would somehow reduce the level of violence and criminal behaviour in our society. But the planners reckoned without the tenacity of these problem families. For every house in a New Town that a hopeful social worker filled, another was abandoned as a supposedly resettled family quietly packed its bags and fled for the big cities.

By stumbling across the plight of battered wives who were trapped for lack of an escape route and needed support, we had also uncovered the widescale traffic of a far greater number of adults and children who were being continually passed like parcels from one social agency to another. No wonder we received so little cooperation in our efforts. A huge machine seemed to build on the nursery of these helpless people. Traditionally the women took refuge in mental hospitals, the men in prisons, and the children went 'into care'. But some were now coming to Women's Aid, where, for the first time, they were made to feel welcome, and where we recorded the abysmal treatment they had suffered from The very people ostensibly trained and paid to care for them.

All would have been well if we had agreed to stick to the traditional concept of 'battered wives'. Certainly it would have made life a lot easier for myself and the people with me. But those who had worked with me for several years shared the frustrations I felt, and witnessed the often horrific circumstances of the women and children who came in a never-ceasing tide through the door. The frequent newspaper stories about the various attempts to close the Refuge helped to give us a credibility among the women who came to us. They felt that we were 'against' the law and were therefore 'on their side'. Because of this attitude, the women felt it was possible to communicate to us the often unspeakable occurrences in their families – not only the grievous acts of violence, but also the incest and the sexual abuse.

Time and again we would contact a family's social-worker to ask how such abuses could occur for so many years without some constructive and caring intervention from the social services, only to be told that 'the file on that family is closed'. This comfortable euphemism meant that they could no longer cope. Individual social workers would certainly express their own anger at the system that trapped them and rendered them impotent. Many of the most caring of them would leave after a few years, because the strain was telling on them and they found the role of Pontius Pilate unbearable, tired of handing their cases over to be crucified.

I remember once pointing out to a small group from the north of England that though Hitler was internationally condemned for trying to exterminate the Jews, we ourselves had a similar programme being carried out against our 'problem families'. The agencies even used words like 'dispersal' and 'natural wastage' in this context. But here, instead of it being six million Jews seen as a threat to the nation, we had an equally large number of people who were considered antisocial and intractable and were quietly being destroyed. The horrifying fact is that nothing at all was being done to help them. There was absolutely no concept of care involving any auempt to rehabilitate them or to understand why they behaved the way they did.

In most cases, the true crime these people had committed was merely to be born into an emotionally disabled family -taking on damage they would carry with them all their lives. Had these families been physically disabled, the various caring agencies would not only have tried to help but would have succeeded, since the care of the physically disabled is well understood. The tragedy of our time is that we have almost completely ignored the inner world of the emotionally disabled. Particularly in Britain, we prefer to believe that a few pills and a stern warning from a magistrate are all that is required to encourage a recalcitrant teenager to mend his or her ways. The magistrates are oblivious to the fact that most of these disabled families have no understanding of what they are talking about. You do not ask a paraplegic to get up and run a race, but somehow we expect people who have never had a chance to learn even the basic rules of living in our society, still to follow all society's complex rules, both written and unwritten. If they fail, we have jails, mental hospitals, children's homes and borstals set aside to receive them. Apart from a few such institutions run by enlightened people, these places do nothing to help.

Poppy was a classic example of a no-chance child. She was found on a railway station in a carrier-bag when she was two weeks old. I remember looking at her and thinking to myself that this is what actually happens to those little abandoned babies who feature in the newspapers from time to time. Usually the hospital gives the baby a name, and well-wishers send in presents, moved by the infant's plight. Having sent off their donations or a piece of knitting, they assume as I did for many years – that the enormous sums contributed in taxes every year will ensure that this desolate little scrap is cared for and will have a future in which the sorry pattern is not repeated.

Certainly, Poppy was cared for physically. She was taken from the hospital and put into a children's home. She remained there until she was five, and then was fostered. However, by that time she was far too disturbed to settle. She was a very pretty little girl, and the foster-parents tried hard, but she continually screamed and spat and soiled herself. She was used to living in a large group of children, with all the noise and commotion that went on in the daily routine of a children's home. She was absolutely terrified of the physical intimacy of family life, and was particularly frightened by the man of the family. She had never known any men in her little life – and had only seen them as distant figures on visiting day. She was soon returned to the home.

Poppy constantly asked about her mother – and was told differing stories. She received no cards at Christmas. No visits. Nobody. The staff at her children's home were sympathetic, but nothing could make up for the absence of any family contact. Even the most deprived of her friends had some memory – or even some record in a social service office – which gave them a twig of their own history to grasp at.

By the time Poppy was eight, the school said she was out of control. She fought in the school playground, not only with the girls but with the boys, too. This probably brought the only admiration she ever received in those days – that she was as tough as any of them. She began a pattern of being moved every so often, when she had finally driven even the most caring of the staff to distraction. In some of the homes she was beaten, in some molested – once by a milkman. By the time she was thirteen she was having sexual intercourse with boys at school. She was known as an 'easy ride', but that did not worry her. In her unit for disturbed adolescents, intercourse was the normal exchange rate for affection. Most of the children had been sexually abused when very young, and were therefore sexually aware from a very early age.

Poppy was pregnant at fifteen, and had her baby just before her sixteenth birthday. She had the child in hospital, and was sent to a mother-and-baby home that, as a rule, kept its clients for only six weeks. They actually kept her there for three months, because they were so worried about her. She was determined to keep the baby, and treated it like a doll. It was a girl, and she called it Mary. During the day she would push the child round the streets and pass the time by shop-lifting. The pram was a great help in this, and she would come back with a hoard of knick-knacks. She knew this was considered wrong, because all her life she had been pinching things she wanted and was every so often caught and punished. But, then, she had always been supplied with the day-to-day things of life in various children's homes, so having and spending money was just not part of her up-bringing. Thus she was never required to save money for a pair of shoes; if they were needed she was taken to a shop and they were bought for her.

After the mother-and-baby home, yet another social worker arranged a small flat where, with the help of the social security grant, she was set up with the bare essentials. After the birth of her baby, Poppy felt prompted to ask about her own mother yet again, since she noticed her baby had a birth certificate. Admittedly it was the short form, because Poppy could not say for sure who the child's father was, but she realised she had never seen her own birth certificate. The social worker promised to check. For the first twenty-four hours in the flat, Poppy enjoyed herself. She was not a bad mother in that she was not liable to hit Mary, because she was so used to hearing children crying for hours on end that the noise did not irritate her. The problem was that she just blocked it out if she was watching television or had some other distraction. Because this was the first time Poppy had been away from institutional care, she had no inner structures to carry her through the day, and the health visitor became concerned. There was no one to get her up, no compulsion to have breakfast, lunch, tea, or dinner, no rota for cleaning, no time for lights out, nothing. Just undreamed-of, unlimited freedom.

The first freedom was the freedom to sleep all day. Meanwhile the baby was being neglected. She lay all day in her cot unwashed, hungry and screaming. Finally she didn't even bother to cry much any longer. The health visitor called a case conference, and it was decided to send in a home-help. At that juncture, however, Poppy met John outside a pub. Re seemed very understanding, and would hold the baby affectionately. He was living in a hostel after falling out with his father, who was a violent brute. All John wanted was a home and a family – something he'd never properly had. He had spent some time in borstal for stealing cars and such. Poppy felt she had found a kindred castaway, and John moved in by the weekend.

The social worker decided that Poppy now had a supportive relationship, so no home-help was necessary. Also she could now safely tell her about the business of being abandoned in a carrier-bag. She explained it all very thoroughly, unaware that most of what she said was going straight over Poppy's head. Street language consists of very short sentences; anything longer goes unheard. But Poppy did hear the bit about the carrier-bag. The social worker was actually a very kind woman, and she had gone to the trouble of looking up back copies of newspapers and securing a picture of a three-week-old Poppy. Finally she left Poppy and John together, hoping he would comfort her.

That piece of news completely shattered Poppy. She had always imagined that her parents were killed in an accident. Even in her most lonely, punished moments, when all the world seemed united against her, she had kept this golden fantasy that her mother and her father had loved her passionately but, because of the car crash which left her an orphan, she was now alone in the world. After seeing Tarzan, she would even fantasise that she had been born in the jungle, and was stolen away from her parents by wicked white hunters. Never, never had she suspected that she was merely abandoned at a railway station. John did the best he could. He was not very good at sympathy, but he did know about pills which keep you happy. So far, Poppy had kept off drugs and alcohol; she had got most of her kicks stealing and fighting. But as John had a ready supply, and with this dreadful sense of rejection inside her, she blotted out nearly a year of her life.

Most of that year she spent drunk and violent. The health visitor arranged to get the baby into a day nursery, but Mary was now silent and withdrawn. Still Poppy did not hit Mary; she just ignored her. John was really much better in dealing with the child, as he had come from a large family, and he did at least see that Mary was fed and changed. But both of them were unable to refrain from yelling and screaming at each other. Poppy had no idea of how to take care of herself or a baby – and even less of an immature and aggressive man. Their rows were monumental. Soon he began to smash up the flat when he felt pushed beyond endurance. Angry neighbours began to complain.

Then Poppy became pregnant again, and that seemed to calm her down. They promised each other that they would try harder. The health visitor reported that things were looking better. The neighbours even began to talk to Poppy again. John got a job, but Poppy could not cope alone all day. She had never before in her whole life had any time alone. The mere thought of it terrified her. In care, one is occupied all the time, if not by the staff, then by other children. There is no time to develop inner resources. Aloneness is then not a creative time for self-expression; indeed it is a disturbing and fruitless condition when there is no training for it. Poppy doped herself with pills and lager all day, and then staggered back with Mary from the nursery to try and cook an edible meal. This was a difficult task because she had never been expected to cook before. Shopping for food was out of her experience. So they tended to live on tins and packet food, following virtually the same menu as a children's home.

The new baby was a boy. It was an easy birth, with John present. He was thrilled, and wanted Poppy to breast-feed the child. She declined, but she was really very pleased with the baby, and far less uncertain because she had done all this bit before. For the birth, Mary had been taken into care for two weeks, but when Poppy returned to the fiat with baby Sam, her relationship with Mary became very different. In the past Poppy was largely able to ignore her, but Mary was now an active toddler, and Poppy had a new-born child to cope with. With the trial of having to be a mother to two tiny children, Poppy began to crack up. She and John began to have serious fights again. All her rage and frustration would erupt from her, and he had almost no ability to hold his temper. All the men of his family beat their wives as a matter of course. Soon Poppy was seen badly bruised by the health visitor. The baby seemed to thrive. He put on weight and smiled, probably because he knew he was wanted by both parents. Even if they had no conception at all of responsibility, they both still wanted him. Mary did not thrive, however; she grew thinner and more withdrawn. The almost nightly fights outside the bedroom door shook her little heart; and then she ached for her mother, whose sobs and screams she could hear so clearly, followed by the dreadful sounds of crashing and falling. The neighbours starting complaining again and a petition was sent to the local housing department. The Social Services began to think seriously about receiving Mary into care, but unless a child is actually physically harmed, magistrates tend to find in favour of the parents.

The Social Services were so worried about Mary that they did not realise she at least expressed normal feelings of fear. If only they had been trained to recognise the budding psychopath. Already, at nine months, so cut off from any of the emotions roused by the warring couple, Sam would watch furniture fly and blood flow, and clap his little hands, his eyes alight with excitement. The social worker believed Sam to be a happy enough baby, for he had been a wanted child. We have found, however, that in a disturbed and violent household, where screaming and hitting is commonplace, a healthy child will show signs of distress. It is the disturbed child who seems to cope well in such a family – all too well.[3]

In truth Poppy had never much enjoyed sex To her it had always been a means of attracting men. She had tolerated John's sexual demands in the early days because she did enjoy the feeling of his need for her. Then as soon as she was pregnant she had told him to lay off. Once the baby was born, she grudgingly let him make love to her again, but she began to taunt him sexually. This started a disastrous series of rows, in which he accused her of being a whore and a lesbian, and she retaliated by saying that she had no choice but to look elsewhere because he was not enough to satisfy her. It was at this stage that she first arrived at Chiswick Women's Aid, covered in bruises from a violent fight. She also had a torn cervix because he had held her down and thrust a milk bottle up inside her.

It took Poppy about two days to settle in. During her first interview, she played the outraged battered victim. Many of the women in the community, who had not been sexually abused, were appalled at her descriptions. By the time Poppy had enthusiastically described the role of carrots, cucumbers, marrows and various household utensils in her sex life, I could see the brigade of 'heavy' mothers in the room looking at each other. I interviewed Poppy again that afternoon. She was still swearing by the Virgin Mary and on her babies' lives that she would never go near John again -she who only lived for peace.

That night she went out with a few of the other mothers, and the next day she appeared in the house meeting with six stitches in her head. It seemed they had all gone to the Palais for a drink and a dance, and this man had said something unacceptable to Poppy, who was forced to defend her honour in a fight. At some point in the proceedings she was hit over the head.

It was early days yet for Poppy. We needed to give her time to get to know us before we tackled her problem of only being able to express herself violently.

She very soon started a friendship with our house-father, Mike Dunne. She then made an incredibly aggressive approach to him, but we realised it was the only way she knew. I was easy for her to cope with because I represented a mother figure. Even if she had never had a real mother, she had experience of various surrogate mother figures during her life in homes, who had cuddled her occasionally. But Mike was a completely unknown quantity. She only knew how to present herself sexually, and when that failed to elicit a response from him, she was very angry. She had offered herself, all she had to offer, and he was rejecting her. Mike would talk to her about her children, about herself, about anything she wished, but that only confused her. How could you have a relationship with a man who did not fancy you?

She took to getting drunk as a skunk at lunchtime, then rolling into the sitting-room and trying to pick a fight with him. Fortunately, Mike is a big Irish lad and has played a lot of rugby. He would manage to fend off the worst of the attack, and then would hold her gently until she subsided. In the beginning, she would relax for just a few minutes, enjoying the child/parent situation, but then she would push him away and reel over to me. She would bury herself in my arms for a while, and then lurch back to attack him. We both recognized that in these moments she was working out a very deep internal conflict, and that it was necessary for her to be allowed to act out her awful pain.

The staff talked it all through among themselves, and with her, and the play staff took over the care of her children during the day. Several of our older mothers would take care of the children during the nights, because Poppy was so exhausted after these bouts. Soon it became a daily routine. Poppy would burst in, the other mothers would clear out, then she would go for Mike. Mike would patiently defend himself from harm, and hold her when he felt it appropriate, and then she would turn to me and I would hug her hard. The first breakthrough came one day when she collapsed in a heap on a mattress beside the fireplace. (This was where I tended to sit but it was also where sleeping babies were laid.) There she curled up in a foetal position and put her thumb in her mouth. I stroked her head and Mike sat down beside us. As she slept, we looked at her face, and for the first time she seemed peaceful. When she woke up she stretched and smiled, first at me and then at Mike. It was the kind of small miracle that most of our work is based on.

From that time on, she would quarrel with Mike if she felt like it, but she never again needed to physically attack him. She had learned it was perfectly OK merely to argue with him. She soon made her own friends in the community, and became much loved by the play staff.

We had a particularly gifted group of men and women working with us, and they helped young Mary to show her fears in her drawings and paintings. Sam so much enjoyed being kissed and cuddled that he bit and scratched the staff enthusiastically in return, because that was what he had seen the only people in his early life do to each other. He assumed that was how you expressed pleasure. His pleasure and pain were already crossed, so it would take a lot of skilled therapeutic work to help him back to normal.

Meanwhile, although we were pleased with the family's progress we were less happy with the contribution of the Social Services. Poppy needed at least two years of care in a large loving community, where she would not only be emotionally nurtured but also taught physical skills that would enable her to live a useful and happy life in the outside world. The health visitor could see that immediately, but the social worker seemed obsessed with John and his situation. Of course, in those cases where a genuine relationship has been formed between two people, the answer must be to work with both of them. However, the truth here was that Poppy saw John, just as he~ saw her – as an available port in the storm. Neither of them shared anything with each other except their violence, which Poppy was seriously attempting to give up.

We could offer John time with the male staff, but at that point we did not have a residential house for men. John, however, was not willing to make use of any help we had to offer. We were asking him to come to terms with his own violent behaviour, but he far preferred the social worker's strategy, which was to ask the Housing Department to give them a new flat. My heart sank when I heard that the Department were backing John's application. John telephoned Poppy constantly with details of the new property. With the help of the social worker, he put in for a large grant for new furniture.

As much as Poppy recognised that she still needed months of real hard work on herself and her children, she could not resist the temptation to 'play house'. We talked with John a long time, pointing out the very real danger they would both face if she reverted to her past behaviour patterns, and if he continued to drink and became violent. It was no use.

They were like small children playing at Christmas with the social worker acting as Santa Claus – a not unusual role. Poppy's flat allocation came through. She went to see it, and was delighted. As soon as the furniture grant came through and the cooker was connected, they were gone. A few weeks later we had a phone-call from Poppy: predictably, John had been drinking again. She was torn by conflicting emotions. Part of her wanted the reality of our community and the badly needed day-to-day support, but the other side of her had already plugged into a violent lifestyle again. I had one final hysterical phone-call from her. After a particularly violent fight that lasted most of the night, the police were called in. Poppy was taken to hospital, and she lost her children, for they were both taken into permanent care. The last I heard, she had left John, but had moved on to another violent relationship.

Poppy's story is only unusual in that she was found as an infant in a railway station. The rest of her case history is classic, and exemplifies the live traffic in human misery that takes place in all Western countries, where a multimillion pound machinery has been created out of 'caring'. Not only did Women's Aid, for all those years, take in these very damaged and often dangerous families, and learn to understand and to care for them, but also we found that everywhere we turned for help or support, we encountered open hostility. It is easy to obscure the truth with a series of court cases over how many bodies a building should hold, but the reality lies in the hundreds of case histories we have gathered.

Sometimes it seems that nobody wants to hear about these families. There are no votes to be won by supporting or helping them. For they cannot be easily claimed to be innocent victims of others' aggression. They are not grateful or gentle. Their children are usually dirty, often violent, and frequently in trouble with the police. They are what they are because they were born with no chance.

Western societies have failed to understand how to care for a damaged family. This is because 'The Family' has always been seen almost as a religious concept, and therefore sacred and untouchable. In the days of the large extended family, sheer size and numbers gave individual members escape routes. But with the increasing separation of the extended family into nuclear families we have created a dangerous lifestyle for ourselves, because this limited family is the primary socialising agency in a child's life. Emotionally disabled parents create emotionally disabled children.

Notes:

[1] In the course of reading this book, it is essential to understand the differentiation between our use of the words battered and violence-prone. For us, a battered person is the innocent victim of another person's violence; a violence-prone person is the victim of their own addiction to violence

[2] Extracts appear in Appendix D.

[3] We believe that Sam's adjustment to his violent family situation was a result of his growing addiction to pain, as explained in Chapter Six.

Villains and fools

Diana Davison · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In their July/August 2013 issue, The Atlantic published an article entitled "The Masculine Mystique" and quickly toned it down to "Home Economics: The Link Between Work-Life Balance and Income Equality" for the online version. Possibly one of their editors noticed that the author, Stephen Marche, had failed to make a clear point so they built a topic into the new title. Instead of the manly masterpiece that Marche intended we are left with a home-ec student's sunken souffle.

This is not the first time Stephen has screwed up. He has a reputation for being pointless, incoherent, and rambling. He admits that, despite being a former professor of Shakespeare, his book on the Bard is not a scholarly work. His bumbling career annoys men and women equally – so, at least in one aspect, he is an egalitarian.

This pussyfooted promenade careens, prances and bellyflops into a pool of self-pity. Thinking contradiction is an art form, he references "inherently absurd" men's rights groups while claiming that men are silent in the gender dialogue taking place. He coins the intriguing phrase "hollow patriarchy" wherein we are all equally oppressed by a few, evil men at the top while simultaneously asserting that women are oppressed while men merely struggle with their identity. Marche finally reveals the key to unlocking his madness: he's only talking about "good" men who are, of course, exactly like him.

After a quick google search of his other scribblings, it became clear that Marche is a confused and ineffective puttering artiste who will say anything to get attention – preferably female attention.

He tweets: "The women who show their contempt for my piece on the contempt of women prove my point by virtue of their contempt. Does that make sense?"

If you have to ask, Stephen, you should reconsider your career choice.

The only interesting thing about Stephen Marche's meandering musings is that he led me to wonder how many other men were trying to whip the movement into another version of feminism. A softer, fluffier version that lets the feminists keep their fallacious jobs.

Freethoughtblogs posted a summary of the candidates.

Richard Carrier despairs. He'd like to make the hollow patriarchy sound less hollow and flat and the best way to do that is fill it up with Men's Human Rights Advocates. What a hero.

While some criticize AVfM for having too many vocal women, Richard asserts that we are actually woman haters. Richard admits that the MHRM has legitimate concerns but can't endorse MHRAs because they want to silence… me.

As opposed to most MHRAs, Mr. Carrier is unable to distinguish the difference between women and feminists. In my own experience, those MRAs who do hate women roughly equal the number of feminists who think the male population should be reduced to 10%. On the other hand, I find that those who merely distrust women in the current social climate are being wise.

To mesh his compassion for men's issues but distaste for the people who brought them to his attention, Richard offers alternatives to sites like AVfM. These are his choices for "how to do men's rights rightly."

The Good Men Project. When you go there you can discover Mark Green's pride in being a Men's Rights Feminist. Mark Greene's biggest concern with AVfM is that he can only muster "Fuck you, assholes" as a response and, because that's the limit of his vocabulary, he blames the site for trapping him into "intellectual and spiritual death." Feminism 101: when in doubt, blame it on someone else. Greene wants the dialogue to be mainstream but is, unfortunately, offended by the people who have done just that.

Just say “thank you,” Mark. You’re welcome. Now fuck off.

Good Men Project also offers advice on how to be desirable to women. Andy Bodle has read The Feminine Mystique and now, thanks to Marche, he can read the Masculine one to addle his brains even further. With ramblings like “different strokes for different folks, blah di blah” Andy explains how his life was made meaningful by spending a year reading all the feminist literature he could get his hands on, studying up on sexual trivia, and landing a girlfriend that stayed with him for a whole three and a half years.

Bodle will also teach you how to practice womanology on his own site, where you learn valuable things, like why cocaine is bad.

In conclusion, odd choice, Richard.

The next alternative in doing MRA work properly leads to A Men’s Project. AMP’s first mission statement is to “1. No longer [hurt] women and girls, as well as other men and boys.” Words are tricky things, guys. First of all, this either states that men and boys are different versions of women and girls or that only men are doing the hurting. Both versions are wrong.

In case it’s unclear as to their agenda, AMP kindly provides a quote of praise to clarify. “This site is a public resource for anyone – women, men and young people – committed to gender justice and ending violence against women.”

Richard points out himself that by clicking on Men’s/Father’s Rights you will not find help, only a bunch of articles about why to stay away from men’s and father’s rights groups. How is this helping men?

People like Richard Carrier and Stephen Marche think that men should work within the feminist framework. This sets aside that feminism can not admit that men are as equally but differently oppressed as women. Their entire ideology would crumble. They would disappear in a puff of logic. Feminism requires the denial that men face just as many obstacles to happiness as do women. It’s their bread and butter.

Marche (with the help of his editors) asserts that the real concerns are financial, not gendered. He catches on that leading feminists are living in “a capitalist fantasy” but fails to see how that has affected the economy. He thinks affordable day care is the big solution but forgets that it’s subsidized by taxes. Feminism is and always has been a materialistic movement draining the tax system. It’s all about empowering middle class women to get more stuff.

The women who actually suffer survival dilemmas are not helped by professional feminists who are too busy helping themselves. Feminists claim to strive for self-actualization but are obsessed with wage gaps and dollar signs.

Richard, at least, has a clear breakdown of his beef with MHRAs. While Richard is welcome to his personal preferences in who he likes or dislikes, I suspect he cares a lot more about being right. So here’s a response to some of the errors he has made:

MRAs don’t promote pseudoscience and conspiracy theories, we debunk them. We don’t believe in Patriarchy Theory for the same reason Richard doesn’t believe in God.

He claims that we seek to instil a warped narrative or worldview. No, that’s Women’s Studies, and they charge a lot of money for it too. Feminists are more “consistent” because they have training camps and university degrees to teach their narrative to each generation. Women pay thousands of dollars just to learn the feminist point of view.

Richard Carrier claims that other organizations which help men with specific problems are a better cause, ignoring that AVfM encourages and fosters the same organizations: those that aren’t seeking to attack us and divide the movement. AVfM supported Earl Silverman and his shelter for battered men, mourning the loss of both. The links Richard gives to The Fatherhood Institute, Campaign Against Living Miserably, Abused Men In Scotland, and Mankind Initiative are all the precise types of organizations AVfM promotes. They are part of the MHRM with us.

AVfM is the leading voice in getting attention and, therefore, funding to the organizations that are helping men who have been locked out of the social safety net. Feminism, on the other hand, not only has government departments devoted to allocating money for women's causes, they hijack ones started by men.

Richard states that, in regards to excessive breast cancer funding, if the MRM "weren't pissing on women, but actually cooperatively and respectfully working with them, they could make progress on this issue. If, that is, MRAs actually did things like develop campaigns to fight prostate cancer."

In June of this year, feminists took over a mental illness charity that was started by a man to raise money for both genders and turned it into a fundraiser solely for women. They had the gall to give a case example of a girl who was depressed because her brother had killed himself a year earlier. Her brother wouldn't have seen a dime of the money raised.

Feminism cannot be incorporated in the MHRM. Only villains and fools would try.

In an ode to the unscholarly Shakespearean ex-professor who led me to the doorstep of other loathsome creatures like Carrier, I offer this testament to how women like me feel about guys like them:

Oh, cursed blight upon mine eye
Oh, wretched vermin, alas and fie!
The dew full morn hath turned awry
With rueful pen I ask you: Why?

Your ill-bred, mangled boil-brained verse
Leads but to naught. Depraved! Perverse!
A gleeking, rough-hewn, weeping sore
That draws to it the currish whore

Infectious, base and boorish wit
Here wallows in its stinking pit
Harken how he soughs and cries
And see through this thin veiled disguise

Unfettered, foul and festering
The words persist in haunting, pestering
How the villain doth plead his virtue
When motives beg and have been seen through

All flight and fancy is my foe
Yet his vomitous verse clumsy and slow
His rapier dull, his judgement flawed
His poetry a shameful fraud

I pity the lass who may be wooed
By the spleeny spur-galled lines you've spewed
Flaccid, wilted, weak and limp
A talentless nitwitted chimp

Tis not to fear but wary be
The trappings of this wanton flea
His candy-coated chivalry
Obscures true personality

Now lame and woeful ploys aside
Your disgraceful strategies denied
You lewd and knotty-pated lout
It pains us all to hear you spout

A paunchy pox-marked wagtag weasel
A frothy fetid rump-fed measle
Pedal backwards, white-liver'd toad
And proclaimeth not a moral code

For brandishing filth and calling it art
This feckless faker I call a fart
To shame! En garde! Take up your sword!
And make amends to those abhorred.

Don’t be that guy

John Hembling (JtO) · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hey guys? You know that just because you helped her get home, doesn’t mean you get to help yourself, right? That’s right, if a girl is too drunk to get herself to a cab, or too irresponsible to have planned her own ride home – and you do what men have done through history, which is to step in and help her – this is a reminder to you that you don’t get to rape her once she’s home. Got that? Maybe you should write it down, so you don’t forget. In fact, some very kindly folks have spent a lot of money to plaster your city with posters to remind you. Don’t be that guy. Those reminders are necessary, obviously, because without being told, you might just rape somebody by accident. Whoops! Because that’s what men are like, right? Shit, without a constant reminder, that’s what you are like. So remember, don’t be that guy.

Does any of this have a familiar ring to it?

All men are rapists. Rape culture. Men can stop rape. And now, Don’t be that guy. The message is the same, the rhetoric is constantly re-tooled because telling men they’re fundamentally violent, predatory and evil only works as long as it takes men to decode and then reject the hatred and scorn heaped onto them by such messaging. Don’t be that guy is a pretty good one. It sells the idea to men that male sexual identity is fundamentally toxic, except for one or two good men. So don’t be like those other guys, you know, the bad ones; instead, be different from the herd, be better, because you’ve managed to overcome your own natural evil, and you’re one of the good ones. What a good dog you are.

And this helpful reminder postered all over the city I live in, and likely your town soon – brought to you by the same fine folks who claim that violence done to 6-year-old little boys, along with the message to those little boys, to “man up” – is actually violence against women.

Yeah, a funny thing about that poster campaign is that if you actually bother to do the research, and examine who are the predominant abusers of children, by percentage – according to the US Department of Health & Human Services annual Child Maltreatment report – it’s mostly their mothers and other female family members acting in a care-taking role committing the majority of physical and psychological abuse of children. So depicting a small boy with a bloodied face, and then claiming in the rhetoric of your poster that child abuse against male children is actually violence against women surpasses my definition of obscene.

But the fine folks who brought you a small bloodied boy – and claiming this is violence against women – are now telling you to not be that guy. You know, don’t be the guy that by implication, all other guys are. You know, rapists. They don’t exactly come directly out and say all men are rapists, because that old feminist rhetoric from the 1970’s was clumsy, and clearly identifiable as vicious, and insane, and sick. Don’t be that guy is a lot smoother, even if it’s saying the same thing.

And, according to the website of the producers of this public messaging, they have been, as they claim, “working to prevent violence against women for 32 years”. That makes them quite clearly a 2nd wave feminist organization – the second wave being what brought the world such luminaries as Dworkin, MacKinnon and Solanas. “All men are rapists and that’s all they are.” ~ Marilyn French
