As always, whenever stopping or reducing violence is mentioned on their site, it’s with the limiting clause – against women. The imperative isn’t to stop violence, or even to stop domestic violence, just that which is against women. Nevermind that men are much more than half of the victims of violence in general, and according to Stats Canada, roughly half the victims of domestic abuse. Does anybody think that in 2013, this is based on honest error or ignorance? The majority of domestic violence is reciprocal. The fact that this needs to be pointed out, again, and supported by citation of hundreds of peer-reviewed studies – again – illustrates the willful ignorance of this – which MUST be known by anyone working in the field of DV, unless they are totally incompetent. In fact, in the minority of cases of domestic violence where it is non reciprocal, which is to say, one clear aggressor and one clear victim who does not reciprocate the abuse – the aggressors are in most cases women.

So let's stop violence against women. And let's also have the fire department put out the flames on only the south and east facing walls of buildings when they're burning. They could pretend to fight fires, and they'd look heroic as hell doing it as long as nobody noticed they were ignoring half the problem. You might even be justified in saying that a fire department was contributing to the fire damage of buildings by working from a deliberately broken and incoherent methodology which ignored the fact that a structure fire burns everything in its path, not just the south or east walls.

But selling the story of abused women and violent men is the fast track to donations and public support. The more nuanced truth doesn't tap quite so well into everybody's wallets.

And from the website of BWSS "When we launched The Violence Stops Here in 2010, Battered Women's Support Services urged men to own their role in ending violence against women".

Did you catch that? Men, own your role. You are the problem, you are the violent, you are the rapists, and even when you're none of those, you are complicit. You are aiding and abetting rape and abuse.

Own your role in 2010, and now, don't be That Guy.

But I have my own reading of that message, Don't be that guy. Remember that these posters trade on the natural protective instincts of men. Just because you helped her get safely home, doesn't mean you get to help yourself. The producers of these campaigns are counting on the fact that you're already a good guy, even as they try to convince you that you're basically rotten: in fact, a you're rapist needing a reminder to not rape.

So you helped her get safely home. Don't be that guy. And I'm not telling you what to do or not do, I'm just sharing my personal reading – the message I take away from a poster designed to make me hate my own sexual identity. And, it seems that after decades of this kind of hatred and scorn heaped onto men, a lot of them are reading the same message I am. Has anybody heard of the term marriage strike? Has anybody seen any of the mainstream media's coverage of men increasingly disengaging from dating, from career, from that old treadmill of protect, provide, and die when convenient for others?

Just because you helped her get home, doesn't mean you get to help yourself. Well, no shit. And what about "Don't be that guy?" No problem.

Radfem wretches in Toronto

Dan Perrins · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On July 5 – 7, 2013 society's 'sisters of misandry' had plans for an event they called "RadFem Rise Up! 2013 Toronto Conference" to be held at the Beaver Hall Gallery in Toronto Ontario. Unlike previous radfem events, this one had its location and program kept secret. No doubt this is due to the cancellation of their London event earlier this year.

Right now in the wee hours of the morning as I write this the situation currently stands like this; there is the claim that the Beaver Hall Gallery has canceled the booking by the radfem organizers. The radfem organizers are claiming their event is still on. While it is difficult to pinpoint exactly who originally leaked the location of the event, the complaints about radfems were the same as before: 'radfems are anti trans' and 'radfems are anti sexworker.'

I have to say I am disappointed in two ways. First not only are radfems anti-sex-worker and anti-trans, they are extremely anti-male. From their ideology to the comments in their essays they demonstrate the most outspoken form of male hatred hidden behind the neoteny of the female face that I've ever witnessed. The fact that their hatred for half the human race is overlooked in the complaints about the radfems is something that should not, nay can not be ignored anymore.

No society, movement, or activist can truthfully claim to be about equality when they overlook hatred for males. Or any other enumerated group for that matter (Hello SPLC are you paying attention yet?). I am also disappointed to hear that they had their event cancelled. I was actually hoping they would have a venue to speak at because I wanted to go and hand out flyers with some of their classy comments.

For those of you not familiar with those loving radfem quotes, let me provide you with some examples. On October 5, 2011 at 6:33 am a user on the radfem hub named Lilith had this to say about radical feminism entering the 21'st century;

"Even if we killed off 90% of men, the majority of women left over would do their best to keep the oppressive system. I'd dare say we'd have to kill off all the women too and leave the little girls and radfems to create the utopia. Great post. Just what I've needed to read to help clarify what exactly Radical Feminism is today."
From the Agent Orange Files we have a wonderful quote by Luckynkl alluding to biological solution to gendercide;

"So if we can come up with a biological weapon that can be ingested and kill off the Y Chromosome in a man's sperm count, we're almost home. We can all get hired as waitresses or chefs or work at McDonald's and sprinkle it into the food or something… It's not a quick solution. It will take about 2 generations to cull males. But it will work." (Don't worry ladies in the full quote she lets us know she wasn't going to ask your permission to 'cull' off your male children.)
Can't you just feel the love being sprinkled forth by Lucky?

On a blog called twanzphobic.wordpress.com in the comment thread from an article called "Militancy is our only option" we find these gems discussing the killing of males;

survivorthriver says:
25 April, 2011 at 00:19
Hey, thanks BB for sending me over here, and here I am! I do remember feminist discussions in the early 1970's where a conscious choice was made NOT to be militant because the MIC is so over-powerful we'd just be wiped out before any spread of the feminist meme was possible. I heard elsewhere that a good model for targeting militant action was SHAC (Stop Huntington Animal Cruelty) where some individuals researched those responsible, and had a Tor browser protected wiki site where they reported their findings, and other individuals were free to take direct action against those individuals/sites. The researchers must not recommend any actions, nor have any connection to those who would take direct action.I'm thinking that the ancient female wisdom of poisoning is relevant. The elites require 4,000 remoras (think those tiny fish that groom the sharks) for maintenance. A well-connected caterer needs lots of part-time remoras and who would know if a friend sashayed in with a vial of….please let me know if this violates security speech or if there is a better venue for details…"

The reply from FAB LIBBER (site owner)

FAB Libber says:
25 April, 2011 at 00:48
"Hiya ST, welcome.
Many good things to think about. Definitely divvying up roles within the (non-)organisation is a good thing. We also might need things like a pool of funds for bail money and stuff. But, probably best not to talk in too much detail in public. (emphasis mine)The important message that the dudes need to understand – you have pushed us far enough, and we will fight back. Totally sick of your pornsick, dickcentric world. An uprising is coming, it is in the wind."
Then those fun time radfems eventually let their inner child free and coin the term 'menocide play'

joy says:
25 April, 2011 at 21:10
Menocide play, yes, I do think I like that.My tactic right now is to say it in that "joking" tone of voice that I have — the one I've cultivated that confuses men more than usual, "Is she serious, is she joking, or is she just so much cooler than I am that I don't get it? Must be that, so I should play along lest she stop thinking I'm cool." (It's a reversal of a concept in the SCUM Manifesto, actually, and it plays on male insecurity the way they typically play on ours. Also, I really am just a lot cooler than any given dude anyway.)So they laugh, "Haha, menocide! I don't get it. She's just really radical and making a really radical joke that I don't get because I'm square. She wouldn't really ever do anything bad though. I do get that!"Boy, won't they be really surprised someday.But it was all in play, officer. You can't take any of this seriously. After all, when you come right down to it, it's just a man's word against mine, and we all know men lie out their asses all the time."Sargasso Sea says:
25 April, 2011 at 21:21
"Joy is my sister!"
I can certainly see why the SPLC doesn't consider these loving ladies a hate group, what with how they keep on talking about putting a 'special-radfem' dash of love into all our meals. These are the comments and thoughts I would have loved to pass-out on behalf of the radfems around their event. I really and truly wish to be helpful in spreading their words around. They typed them out with full knowledge of what messages the words carried. I want society to be able to decide for themselves about radfems.

Let the radfems be known by their words and actions, I say.

That brings me back to the organizer I spoke of at the beginning of this piece. I think its time to introduce her and for us all to get better acquainted. On twitter she goes by @demonista she runs a site called demonista.wordpress.com and describes herself as a "FREEGAN VEGAN RADICAL FEMINIST, WITH ANARCHIST LEANINGS"

Her real name is Winnie Small.

On her twitter page shortly before midnight last night she tweeted that the radfem event was still on.

"Winnie Small @demonista 6h RadFem Riseup! http://wp.me/p3FqZA-1r via @wordpressdotcom #radfemriseup is still on."
Winnie's tweeted article is a short 7 sentence paragraph. Given she is one of the organizers and tweeted it we can come to the conclusion she knows the contents.

"Despite hundreds of threats of death and violence directed at women and at the venue staff, the RadFem Riseup conference IS GOING FORWARD. We are having a great time with some wonderful women, gearing up for a day of presentations and strategy tomorrow. For every threat of violence we receive, another woman wakes up to the reality of the situation. Every death threat strengthens our resolve. We will not be prevented from meeting. We will not be prevented from organizing. We will not be prevented from rising up."

The author claims there were numerous threats directed at women and venue staff.
Around 1 am last night a tweet by Janelle Flemming informs us that Winnie and the author (lexyjohn) are lying.

Janelle Flemming @janelleflemming
According to a gallery committee member, Beaver Hall Gallery did not receive any death threats #lies #radfem #RadFemRiseUp #sexwork #topoli
As one of the organizers, Winnie would have a history of correspondence with the hosts of the radfem event. Therefore, it would be easy for her to request an email, text a witness statement, or a copy of the evidence to corroborate the claims in the announcement posted by lexyjohn. And if she did have evidence of what is claimed why is it not being broadcast for the world to see? If there were threats made, why haven't the police been notified? If the police were notified why has Winnie or lexy not announced it?

What does this mean? Is the event cancelled, or is it still on?

I find it easy to believe that Winnie and the wonder-womb warriors are still going to have their talks in or around the Toronto area this weekend. I also believe the hashtag #lies used by Janelle in her tweet refuting the claim of threats made by Winnie and the coven of crazy is accurate.

I know that Winnie and the radfem's allegations are without merit and unsubstantiated, and that behind closed doors and left to their own devices the radfems will enjoy discussing and planning their Menocide play.

The case for the family union

Neil Lyndon · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

What follows is the text of the speech given by Neil Lyndon, journalist and author, at the Parity AGM in London on June 1st, 2013.

Let me begin by sucking up to you and say that I honour and admire Parity for its pioneering work; for being resolutely at the forefront of equality between men and women for decades; and for the robust individuality with which Parity has pursued the unfashionable cause of truth and justice on this vital topic.

That's enough of the sucking-up, however. I am hoping today that I might introduce you to a conclusion that you possibly may not have thought about or considered – despite your greatly honoured vanguard position.

As a lifelong, unswerving believer in the cause of parity between men and women, between girls and boys, I am going to argue that, in order to succeed in these adverse times, what that cause most needs is a union like a nationwide trade union to represent the interests of families and everybody who belongs to a family. You could call it The Family Union.

By that I mean a fully established union with branches and a national headquarters that will represent everybody in their place of work and at home, in schools and colleges, in the courts and in Parliament and also act as a pressure group on the political/media establishment and on government at all levels. It could, for a start, be a federation or umbrella group for all the groups and societies that have interests in the field of family life – from the WI to Fathers 4 Justice, from the Mothers' Union to the Grandparents Association.

This pipe-dream (for that is what it is, of course, and most likely to remain) would be the first mass union to be formed since the labour movement rose in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

But instead of representing the interests of one class against others – as did the craft unions – The Family Union would represent the interests of all individuals in families against the interests of government and of capital (those juggernauts which, at present, trundle largely unopposed over the lives of families and are free to stamp upon individuals any demands that suit them).

Over many decades of thinking about gender relations, God help me, I have come to believe that only a body which is constitutionally established to represent the interests of everybody in families – which means about 95% of us – and to represent all those interests equally, can release our age, our society, our culture from the stultifying, calcifying grip of the Marxist-inspired gender ideology and faith that has broadly dominated all interpretation of these issues for the last 150 years and has monopolised it in the last 50 years.

Before we can reach that point, however, we are going to have to trundle ourselves over some familiar ground. We need to fix a point of departure from where we are now in order to reach that desirable – if mirage-like – oasis of arrival.

To that end, I want to begin by asking you to cast your minds back and try to think when did you last hear or read it stated as a matter of fact that one woman in four suffers domestic abuse at the hands of the man she lives with?

Was it this morning on Radio 4's Today programme, while you were eating your breakfast? Or was it in your daily newspaper yesterday? Was it on Coronation St last Tuesday or on the Archers the week before last?

In my own case, this did, in fact, happen just the other day on the Today programme when Sandra Horley, the chief executive of Refuge, was being given the freedom of the airwaves (I don't think the word "interview" should be besmirched in this context) and she came out with that figure yet again – as she has perhaps ten thousand times in the last 30 years – and was not asked, as she never has been in my hearing, "where did you get this figure? what's the evidence? how do we know it's true? What about the gigantic body of reputable research which tells a completely different story?"

We'll come back to that sore and sorry story in a minute but let me take another step and ask you, again, to try to remember when you last read, heard or saw an item of information (whether in the news, an advertisement or a scene in a tv soap) which stated as a matter of fact that, in some way or another, women are routinely paid less than men for the same work?

My most recent brush with this particular canard was last week on Twitter when my feed from the office of the most powerful man on earth told me that, in the USA, women are paid 70 cents for every dollar paid to men.

My reply, by the way, was to ask President Obama if this appalling, indefensible injustice applied to every woman police officer, every female member of the armed forces, every woman teacher or doctor, every female government worker whose pay comes from federal, state or local government budgets? If so, I suggested, all those women should get themselves up a class action and sue the President of the United States from here to kingdom come.

I also asked, incidentally, if profit-minded businesses like Dell, IBM and HP can get away with paying women less than men, why don't they employ only women? Have they overlooked the fact that, if they followed that course of action, they would make 30% more profit? (see editor's note [1] below) Don't they have bean counters? Don't they have spreadsheets? What's wrong with those guys? Are they all stupid?

Turning back reluctantly from the White House after our too-brief sojourn in the Oval Office, can I ask you now to try to remember the last time you heard it declared as a certainty that girls are in a position of general disadvantage and need to be supported – "empowered" is the word favoured by Michelle Obama, Hillary Clinton and other similarly disadvantaged ladies – to make the most of themselves in a hostile and unsympathetic world?

I came across that line yesterday. Truly. I wasn't looking for it. I didn't make a note of it. I only remembered it when I was writing this speech and it popped back into my mind.

It came up in an interview in the Financial Times with a young woman who runs a business marketing beauty products. She and her husband have just overseen a launch of their company on the stock exchange so you might guess they are doing all right. She seems to be a well-known person – though I had never heard of her and can't remember her name – so, again, you might imagine she hasn't got quite so much to complain about as, say, a 17 year-old mother of two living in a council flat in Grimsby. But when she was asked to list her enthusiasms, she answered that she was "passionate about empowering girls and young women."

I have frequently replied on Twitter to Michelle Obama and Hillary Clinton when they come out with this complacent, sisterly guff asking why they seem to care only about girls? I would like to ask the same question of this young woman in the FT. Why do people who ostensibly care so much about equality never notice the position of young males, especially poor young males, especially poor males who happen to be black?

Surprise, surprise, no answer has ever been forthcoming from those Olympian heights. I keep getting up in the middle of the night to check my Twitter timeline but, so far, not a peep, still less a tweet.

Yet, if there is one single social group in the western world whose members are spectacularly, undeniably in positions of disadvantage – if there is one class of people who are hopelessly and permanently crushed by inequality in education, employment opportunities, wealth, health and prospects – it is black males of any age but especially those between the ages of 15-25.

It is impossible to be sentient in the modern world and not be aware of this fact – yet not only does it never get mentioned by the most powerful and influential women in the world: I have never even heard it mentioned by the most powerful man in the world, who happens to be a black man. The only times I have ever heard Barack Obama talk about men have been when he was berating men for being feckless, negligent or absent fathers – that old Uncle Tom jive.

I imagine we can all agree that these statements are the routine stuff of our daily lives, almost as common as the weather forecast or the stock market reports.

We are subjected to them so constantly that we may not even notice their frequency, still less might we bridle at their dubiety, their illogicality or their sheer nasty gormlessness.

As a society, as an age, as a culture we have learned to accept these declarations as articles of an incontestable faith. They must be true because everybody believes them.

In this company, I imagine it will not be necessary to go painstakingly over the fallacies, the contradictions and the implausibilities in these articles of faith.

I imagine that everybody here will, at some point, have asked themselves "If one in four women suffers domestic violence, why do I know so few women (or possibly not even one) of whom this is true?"

Everybody here will probably have wondered why, if the incidence of violent crime is falling in all categories in almost every developed country in the world, the figure for women who suffer domestic violence should have remained unaltered ever since Sandra Horley and her ilk first began to bruit it abroad (they call themselves "the domestic violence sector", by the way, as if they occupy a subdivision of the economy, like retailing). I imagine that most people here will be aware that, while the figure of two women a week murdered by their male partners (a figure which gets retailed every time the subject the of domestic violence comes up) – while that figure has, in fact, been falling slightly over the last 10 years, the figure for men murdered by the women they live with has risen slightly over the same period so that, today, more than one man a week is murdered.

Both figures are reassuringly minute. You are much more likely to die riding a bicycle than at the hands of your spouse or domestic partner but, as I am going to discuss, the true figures have no bearing on the public mind. Even Iain Duncan Smith comes out with the one-in-four figure and the bugaboo about two women murder victims a week.

(At this point you may feel that I may rest my case; but I shall continue.)

You will probably all have asked yourself why, if women are, truly, paid less than men for the same work in our society, why doesn't anybody ever initiate legal proceedings under the provisions of the Equal Pay Act and the Sex Discrimination Act? Those acts have been statute law in this country for 43 and 38 years respectively. They specifically outlaw paying people of different sexes different rates for the same work. If this outrageous and indefensible discrimination is still happening in the 21st century, you have to ask what successive Directors of Public Prosecutions have been doing with their time.

Similarly, we must ask ourselves why, if girls are so uniquely in a position of disadvantage in our culture, why do they so spectacularly out-perform boys at all levels of our education system?

Parity, I know, has devoted considerable thought and research to these questions and I am sure there is no need here to labour over the evidence which demolishes that heap of fallacies.

Not least of the reasons why there is no need is that there is no point.

The evidence – plainly – has no bearing at all on the beliefs. It doesn't make the slightest difference. The creed which underpins these articles of faith is not susceptible or pervious to reason, proof or the rules of evidence. It is not a matter of argument. As it was put to me by the woman with whom I was living in 1970 – and who was an ardent early adopter of the modern feminism that was emerging at that time – "this is an argument you cannot win".

To enlarge and support that civilised observation (whatever happened to the Age of Reason? whatever happened to the rules of evidence?), take a look online at an interview on Israeli tv with Professor Murray Strauss of the University of New Hampshire – one of the world's leading authorities on the subject of domestic violence. Professor Strauss says that more than 230 impartial, peer-reviewed scholarly studies now exist to prove that, where domestic violence occurs, women assault their partners with the same frequency as men.

When asked about the reaction he encountered to this information, he replied "Generally, people simply refuse to believe it. They say it simply can't be true."

That response – surely we must all know and agree – is what we are up against. People refuse to believe the evidence that contradicts the established feminist faith of our age. They will not countenance it. They simply will not have it.

This is not just an argument you cannot win. It's an argument you are not even allowed to start.

Take votes for women. It is such an unquestionable item of faith in our age that the extension of the franchise to women in 1919 resulted from the efforts and the sacrifices of the Suffragettes that it is actually a form of delinquent heresy to question or to doubt that truth. You are allowed – encouraged – to doubt the existence of God; you can question the utility of the monarchy; you can air doubts about the even-handedness and the probity of the police. But you question the role of the Suffragettes at your peril.

It is a truth so universally acknowledged that the Suffragettes won women the vote that you won't find one person in 100,000 who questions it. At my little daughters' primary school, children are indoctrinated in that belief before they have even been introduced to the cardinal articles of faith of the world's leading religions.

So, if you ask people how many men were enfranchised by the 1919 Act, they will look completely bewildered, baffled and reply "none, of course". Do try this at home. I have never known it to fail. If you tell somebody that more men than women got the vote in 1919 and that most of the men who died in the First World War were not entitled to vote, the person you are talking to is likely to look as if the world has slipped violently under their feet. If you ask them what was the majority in the House of Commons in favour of this reform (answer: 10 to one) and ask how many women were sitting on the benches of the House of Commons at that moment, you will witness a whole world of certainty disappearing down the plughole.

The reason for this dismay is obvious.

If it is true that opposition to votes for women was a fringe position by 1919 and if it is true that the extension of the franchise to women had been, throughout the previous decade, the most widely supported reform movement of the last 200 years (and both of those positions are thoroughly tenable), then the whole idea of a system organized by men for the benefit of men and designed to inflict repression and disadvantage on women – that entire notion of patriarchy which dates from Rousseau and Engels and which has underpinned all our thinking on gender issues for the last 50 years– goes for a burton. It's dead in the water.

That's why you can't get this argument started. Because it ends in the ruin of the feminist orthodoxy. That edifice of intolerance and of sexist spite, built on a marsh of shifting half-truths and a miasma of misperceptions, comes crashing down as soon as you rest a finger of scepticism or impartial inquiry upon it.

How can it be a patriarchy when it includes disadvantages for men – or are we going to say that getting a second-rate education, being passed over for employment and being deprived of your own children by legal process is some kind of advantage? How can it be a patriarchy when every major change and reform in the lives of women in the last 150 years has been initiated, supported and encouraged by men – from John Stuart Mill to David Steele? If you look at the record of change for women, it is self-evident, transparent, incontestable that this long history of change has taken place with the active agreement and consent of men who have, on the whole, adapted remarkably easily to the new order that has come into being.

So – our society can only be called a patriarchy through an act of wilful denial of reality. But too many people in our time now owe their positions – their status, their income, their honours. their self-respect – to the feminist orthodoxy to allow it to be demolished. I'm not just talking about Jenni Murray of Woman's Hour or Polly Toynbee of The Guardian. I'm talking about pretty much everybody in the media/political Establishment of the western world – politicians, journalists, editors, current affairs presenters on tv and radio, university teachers, lawyers and judges. doctors and social workers – all are required to bend the knee to this orthodoxy and all do so with uncritical promptitude. From the Huffington Post to Le Monde, from the Old Bailey to our girls' primary school to the pulpit in your local church – all public officials and representatives of public opinion have surrendered to this body of belief and pump it out at the turn of a tap.

To demolish that orthodox faith – that pernicious, poisonous, parasitic creed – now by frontal assault would require an upheaval equal to the Protestant revolution. That simply isn't going to happen – or, as was once famously said, I'm a banana. Change isn't going to be achieved by reason. This is an argument you cannot win, after all. It can't be effected by appeals to justice. It can't be achieved through the protests of those afflicted by manifest injustice. See what has been the fate, over decades, of Families Need Fathers or, more recently, Fathers 4 Justice – scorn, derision, neglect, marginalisation, ostracism.

The only way that I can see to make progress beyond this antique ideology – the last surviving remnant of the totalitarianisms of the twentieth century – is to by-pass it, to outflank it, to go around it, to surround it with the active interests, actively expressed of the majority of people and thus to isolate it, to cut it off, starve it of influence and allow it to wither and die.

That's where The Family Union comes in (at last, you may reasonably sigh). A body which represented the interests of all children, all young people, all parents, all grandparents – and which assumed, as a constitutional obligation, that all of those interests were of equal importance – could not only be impervious, indifferent to the odious feminist orthodoxy. It could actually make a difference.

The most encouraging sign I have seen in recent years came in the unlikely setting of a supermarket car-park in Gateshead. A clean and tidy family estate car was being backed out of a parking space by a smartly dressed old lady and in its rear window I saw the sticker "Justice for fathers in divorce."

It seemed most likely to me that the driver was a mother and grandmother and I guessed that she and her son were being forcibly estranged from their own children and grandchildren through the operations of the family courts. Here, I thought, was a real breakthrough moment.

If grandmothers could get up in arms and start demanding justice in the courts, it might actually come about. If mothers could get together and start insisting on equal treatment for their sons at school – if they started insisting that their boys should not be treated as primitive barbarians, if they started demanding male teachers in equal numbers with female teachers (as is now happening, I believe, in some parts of Germany) – who would resist them? Not David Cameron. Not Michael Gove. Not Ed Miliband. Not even – I bet – Harriet Harman.

The people with the power in our age – as I have argued many times before – are women. In previous ages, the people with power supported the claims of those who were powerless.

Men initiated, encouraged and saw into law the reforms that changed the position of women. White people in the USA dedicated themselves to reforms to make black people better off. The white nations of the world combined to force the apartheid regime of South Africa to abandon its racist rule.

Women ought – I submit – to feel an obligation today to repair the inequalities and the injustices inflicted on boys and men. Western women in the last 50 years since the advent of the Pill changed everything are – surely – the most privileged and the most fortunate human beings ever to have existed on the face of the earth.

The first to be free to enter education and employment on equal or better terms with men, they are also the first ever to be able to control their fertility infallibly and, if they make a mistake, the first to be able to correct it simply and safely. The first to be legally entitled to divorce on preferential terms, they are also the first to be free to choose their own sexual lives without guilt and the first to be free to wear whatever they want – or nothing – without legal consequence.

Women owe it to boys and men, I would say, to use their influence and their power to make males equal in our own time, in our own world.

However, they won't do it, at present, because everybody in every office of state and every position of influence believes, instinctively, that the interests of women are paramount and that, if anybody is suffering disadvantage by reason of gender, it must be women. They will ask: what's in it for women to make things better for men?

Answer: the benefits of The Family Union.

The only way that I can see that change might be initiated by women to benefit men is if they can see those changes, also, to be in their own benefit.

If women can be persuaded that is actively in their own interests to make fathers equal in family law and life, then surely it must happen?

If women could cast off the eye-patch of feminism and acquire a binocular view, they might see that their own careers are being impaired and their earning potential reduced by having to take time off work when their babies are born and their children are still little, while the fathers are expected to remain at work, then – surely – they would use The Family Union to campaign for men and women to have equal time off work (in my view neither mother nor father should be expected to work full time before a child is three)?

Surely, surely, mothers of sons would feel that they were being better mothers if their Family Union insisted on reforming the practices of our national education system and made boys equal with girls at school? Surely grandmothers would feel that they were doing the right thing by their grandchildren if, through their membership of The Family Union, they required the courts to treat their own sons – the fathers of their grandchildren – equally in divorce proceedings?

Those reforms would, decidedly, be in the own interests of those women. Feminists would therefore have nothing to complain about (will any of us ever live to see such a day?). But to achieve those reforms, those equalities, requires a body with power which will act in everybody's interests equally – that is, observing the principles of parity.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I give you The Family Union.

Shall we get it going? Shall we all sign up? Right now?

Some hopes.

***

Editor's note:

[1] Mr. Lyndon's figure of a 30% increase in profits is best viewed as a rhetorical flourish but cannot be established mathematically. The level of profit increase is indeterminate and depends on lots of other factors. Assuming the bogus pay gap had some validity, then if a company went from all male to all female, their labor costs (not profits) would decline by 30%, true, and this cost decrease would improve the profit picture. If they went from some male to all female, the decline in costs would be less than 30%. In terms of profit, though, they might double or triple their profits, or even turn a loss into profitable gain, but the level of those gains cannot be stated as 30% except perhaps by some random accident. In a company with few women employees and massive labor costs relative to sales, the increase in profits seen from changing to an all-female staff could be vast indeed, verifying Mr. Lyndon's insight that the supposed pay gap is a ludicrous notion.

India decides feeding men doesn't matter

Anil Kumar · 7 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]In India, 40% of people earn less than 2 dollars a day. If we normalize it using purchase power parity (PPP), then it would be less than 10 dollars a day in the USA. So, the current center-left Congress Party ruled government started a law called Food Security Bill, which is basically a food stamps act. The government plans to provide free or subsidized food to almost 67% of population of the country. India is not an importer of food as it produces enough food due to its tropical weather, good quality agricultural land, and rivers. Still, the government will spend more than 21 billion dollars in a year to run this Food Stamps program. This is the largest such program in the world. The president of India signed this ordinance, which has to be ratified by the parliament in next 6 months.

The law says that the eldest woman in the household will be the only official recipient of the food for the family. If a poor man wants food, then the eldest female member of his family has to show her biometric- identity card called "Aadhar card" and receive the food on his behalf. She will decide how the food will be shared in the family. As many poor people in villages still live in join family households, this creates a very dangerous situation for elderly men. For example, if a 30-year old woman is the eldest woman in a joint family household, she can easily deny this benefit to the old father-in-law and starve him, as she is the only recipient of this food. Even her 35-year old husband will have no say in it. This form of elder abuse can extend to the younger woman blackmailing the old man to transfer the farm land or house property into her name. Blackmail by women using law and policy designed for their protection is not unprecedented in Indian culture, with the results hitting extended family and even very young children. Last year, 13000 male farmers committed suicide in India, and poverty is not the only reason.

Patriarchy and Matriarchy coexisted in India for ages. Now, the government has officially declared that the Indian Family has to be headed by a Matriarch. When this law gets implemented through the Government's public food distribution system, it will define only women as recipients and one will only see women queuing for food. The woman will also have the freedom to sell the food that she receives and no man in her family can question her.

The law will cost the equivalent of 21 billion US dollars to Indian tax payers. Purchase power parity (PPP) conversion varies widely inside India between urban and rural areas due to huge rich and poor gap. Because of the difference in purchasing power, the ultimate gain for poor people will be disproportionately high. Their collective benefit will be the equivalent of more than 100 billion US dollars, based on the rural India PPP conversion factor of 5. All that food and money will go to women, both young and old.

International feminist economists have already defined women as the predominantly poor in the world, notwithstanding the fact that 13000 farmers have committed suicide in India last year or there are more homeless men than women in India. India's Prime Minister is an Oxford Educated Economist and a feminist ideologue. These feminists do not want the poor men to receive support from government as they have already defined only women as poor. A poor hungry man can't go to a government public distribution agency and ask for food. He has to get a woman from his family or he has to produce detailed government documentation to prove to the corrupt officials that there is no woman in his family and he is a single old man. The semi-literate helpless poor men will not able to cross this big bureaucratic hurdle. Instead, they will starve and die.

The government claims that this food stamp law will improve the country's Human Development Index. Of course, it will. This index is created for the United Nations Development Program by two white knight economists from the Indian Subcontinent. This will also improve India's rank in Global Gender Gap Report by World Economic Forum, which also paints poverty as oppression of women. The life expectancy gap is a major indicator of gender parity in this method of ranking. If 200 million poor elderly Indian men die of hunger much earlier than poor women, then India will celebrate as it gets a better rank in Global Gender Gap report.

References:

1) http://www.dnaindia.com/india/1856669/report-cabinet-clears-ordinance-to-implement-food-security-bill

2) http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Human_Development_Index

3) http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Global_Gender_Gap_Report

[/box]

Debate: is feminism hate?

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 8 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editors' note: Some time back, AVfM published Debate: Is Feminism Hate? At that time, Karen Straughan promised a second response in the debate – and here it is. It is a lengthy piece, but like Karen herself, it just keeps getting better, so hang in there.

To Russ Lindquist:

Way back, you sent me a message with a link to a video you'd done on why feminism isn't hate. The video is over 2 hours long. I hesitate to think that's a rebuttal. That's more like attrition. More about that in a minute.

You've since made at least one video (perhaps more, since the one a friend just sent me was "round 6"). In it, you claim you've won the debate, reasoning that since I hadn't responded to any of your videos, it's obviously because I "can't" refute any of your points. Well, regarding your follow-up videos, I really can't refute points I'm not made aware of, can I?

A handful of friends of mine did watch that first video– remember, the only video of yours on this topic that I was even aware of until just a few days ago. They mentioned a few of the points you make in it (all of which I've rebutted before, in blog posts or other videos, or in general discussions online), but the consensus among them was that it was not worth the time required for me to watch it. Their characterization of it was that it was rambling, unorganized, meandering and largely irrelevant to the topic. Now, I'm a busy person. I have three kids, a job, two other businesses I run. Even though you claim in your video that I'm making a living from Men's Rights stuff, I'm really not. I have other things on the go, and other responsibilities. So I'm not going to devote any time to watching that first video, and I'm going to address specifically some of the things you said in this latest one.

Now, you're welcome to think whatever you want of me for not watching your first video, and you're welcome to feel as dismissed and insulted as you like about it. All I can say is that I get regular complaints about the length of my videos, but one thing I do to alleviate that problem is that I almost always script them. Which is, oddly enough, the part you left out of your criticism –you went so far as to cut a clip of me off mid-sentence to do it– to make my decision to not watch or address your video seem arbitrary or cowardly rather than informed, and my criticism of your video's length seem unfair rather than justifiable.

As an aside, this video is indeed scripted.

Also, what you characterized as me "getting a pass because I'm a woman", in other words, that I have yet to prove the resolution, but am seen to be winning (or a shoo-in) by viewers, is premature at best. Your characterization of me as somehow feeling like I've proved the resolution, and that's both misinformed and uncharitable. I wouldn't call it an ad hominem–I'd call it jumping the gun, going off half-cocked, doing a victory dance when the ball's still at the five yard line.

The truth is, scripting, shooting and editing these videos takes a lot of my time. The research takes time, and I do more edits and rewrites on these things than I ever did in my published fiction. I've been working on this particular script since Wednesday, and it's now the following Monday. "Two hours I spend!" you say, "and all I've gotten is ten seconds back from her!" I've spent over 8 hours on this response alone, probably closer to twelve, and I haven't even shot it yet. I spent at least 6 hours on each of my responses to Danielle (which is why I wasn't sure I was going to address any of her other specific points before concluding). I'm sorry you all had to wait, as I've built my case, but it's just the way it is.

And I found it really bizarre that you repeatedly state that my that my video responses to Danielle were irrelevant to the question. The purpose of me addressing the points I addressed in Danielle's video– building a case. Because feminism describes the system –you know, "The Patriarchy"– both historically and presently, as being based on the subjugation and oppression of women as a class, and as inherently misogynistic. If that's not how the system operated or why it operated the way it did, if women's issues were commonly addressed and women's problems alleviated by that system once women could agree on them and what solutions they wanted, and once that became possible, then it's never been a system based on the oppression and subjugation of women, has it?

And then you go on to characterize my entire body of work as that of a "false mommy idol", and mock the people who follow me. You opine on this at some length. That's awesome.

And given that, I find it curious that you took such a huge issue with the tone I used in my video responses to Danielle Paradis. As in, I sounded condescending and dismissive, which I'm sure I did, because I was. You then appeal to consequences, warning me that Danielle is a moderate, but being so poorly treated by someone like me might compel her to become radicalized.

This seems absurd on its face. If she's a moderate, she's one who belongs to feminist groups that have organized efforts to deface and tear down other groups' posters to keep opposing viewpoints from being seen or heard, and is also the kind of moderate feminist who subscribes to the Femitheist's channel. From that (among other things), I'm almost positive her mind is closed to the ideas I presented in my responses to her as the mind of a creationist is to any argument in favor of evolution.

Given that, my strategy was not to convince Danielle Paradis of anything, especially not to rethink her belief system, but to demonstrate to as many people as possible how simplistic, childish and unsupportable her belief system is.

And what I really find curious is that you took issue with me calling her typical. Because she is typical. She even called herself typical, in so many words, in the sense that she –like pretty much every other feminist she's aware of– believes that women have historically had the short end of the stick.

More than that, explain why it should matter to me or to anyone if my tone sends her stomping off to get herself radicalized? In my view, radical and mainstream feminists differ only in their degree of commitment to acting on their shared belief system, and their ability to be identified by the public as people not to be trusted. It's the belief system and its theoretical model I'm interested in dismantling, I'm not that interested in redeeming individual feminists.

That said, you really don't seem to have a lot of respect for Danielle, if you think she's incapable of prioritizing arguments and reason over delivery. You seem to think that she can't separate herself from her belief system in such a way as to differentiate an attack on feminist theory, or on her beliefs, or her arguments, from an attack on her as a person. She's not a defenceless child, Russ. And you're not a hero for treating her that way, or for suggesting that she's so emotionally frail she's likely suffering from Stockholm Syndrome from a barrage of nasty, trolling comments that she could have easily ignored.

I mean, you even said that what made you want to join her team was that I was mean to her. Not that she was right. Not that what she said was valid. But that she was "respectful" and I was "mean".

Frankly, if you respected her, and you were of the view that she and other feminists were misinformed, misguided or the innocent victims of other people's lies, as you've suggested, repeatedly, you'd have corrected her, rather than defended her. Allowing someone to labor under a misconception because you want to spare their feelings is a dishonor you commit upon them. All you seem to be interested in doing, however, is indulging her ignorance.

You do seem to have a little more respect for me. You're not interested in protecting me from perceived insults–you're actually one of the people flinging them. Thank you for that, sincerely, because at least I know you're not humoring me, or indulging me, or acting out of some assumption that as a woman, I can't handle a little meanness.

The tone argument holds no water with me, nor does any reference by you or anyone to what people say in my comment section. What is below the line is NOT my responsibility. What the individuals who make up my subscribers and viewers do with their own fingers and their own keyboards elsewhere is also NOT my responsibility. I have a pretty strong non-censorship policy at my channel and blog, one that radical feminists like NocturnusLibertus (another buddy of Danielle's) seem happy to take full advantage of. I get regular messages from my subscribers to ban people like them, and I refuse to do it, even when they're being abusive.

Now, are you going to imply that it's Danielle who is responsible for what her friends, viewers and subscribers say on my channel and elsewhere? More than that, are any of the people crapping on each other in the comments interfering with anyone else's ability to view the videos in question, the way a disruptive audience at a live debate would? Why are viewer comments even a thing to be addressed in this context?

On this same topic, was Danielle actually "respectful" in her response?

Her tone was, and she didn't use any slurs or bad language. Her points, however, were glib, hackneyed and lacked any real analysis or investigation–just statements to be taken at face value. And then there's the matter of her clear statement that her video should not be viewed as "opening arguments", but as the entirety of her rebuttal, and all she had to say on the matter. A drive-by, as it were. A way of dismissing off-hand Eric's proposition while absolving herself of any duty to empirically or logically back up her own.

That's not "respectful", Russ. That's actually much more dismissive than I've been toward her, and it shows a lack of regard for the debate question, her opponents and the audience. In light of that, her pleasant tone was quite the manipulation. And you fell for it, didn't you? You're here, fighting her battle for her, and taking any downvotes and criticism of her, on her behalf. For a guy who could write the song, "Let her die", you sure seem willing to jump in front of a bullet for a cute girl with a soft, pleasant voice and hurt feelings.

Moving along: you criticize me for making two longish videos that addressed "nothing to do with the resolution that feminism is hate". But here's the thing. Danielle made several points in her video as, I'm guessing, evidence that feminism is NOT hate (which they really weren't evidence of anything). My FIRST job as a debater was to take those points and demonstrate their lack of validity. Demonstrate that they can't be used to prove or refute anything because they're either missing half the picture, or essentially bunk. As an example: say, a creationist claims that the fact that DNA is made out of cotton candy is obvious proof that God created the universe and all life within it. A debate opponent can't just let the "fact" that DNA is made of cotton candy stand–he got to spend some time disproving the assertion upon which the creationist's argument rests. And the more deeply entrenched that creationist's argument is in the public zeitgeist, the harder the opponent has to work to dismantle it.

See how that works? She says, or implies, that Feminism is not hate because of A, B and C. And then I come in and say, but feminism's analysis of A, B, and C are biased at best, completely invalid at worst, therefore you can't use A, B and C as proof of anything. Do you expect someone in a debate to allow invalid arguments made by an opponent to stand as fact? Really? My refutations of points SHE made are "red herrings"? If that's the case, her entire video was one big red herring.

You seem to be really agitated about it, actually going so far as to intersperse clips of my refutations of specific arguments she made, with the text "therefore feminism is hate"? as if that's ANYTHING like what I was saying. David Futrelle, the king of quote-mining and putting words in people's mouths, would be awfully proud.

And then you go on to do the exact same thing you accused me of doing, but with less excuse, since you're not even rebutting an argument I made. Because the question was not the one you saw fit to repeatedly address in your latest video, and which a friend of mine mentioned was a recurring theme in your first: "Are feminists necessarily hateful?"

You and I and everybody else on the planet is going to know, the answer to that is "no", or at least, "no more hateful than anyone else". But by raising the issue that many feminists are likely misguided or misinformed, and therefore not acting out of hate but out of ignorance, you are simultaneously dodging the REAL question, and essentially necessitating I address the sticky business of exactly what feminism is.

Belief system, or label?

Is feminism a belief system, or is it simply a label? Is it a set of theories, or is it a group of individuals? Is it a pursuit of women's rights, or is it a worldview?

One commenter on this last video of yours suggested that the best way to refute my argument would be to convince people that feminism is a movement, rather than an ideology. He said that if one could define feminism as "the movement for the rights of women" rather than as the ideology associated with it, that would be proof that feminism isn't hate. I suppose because not all feminists hate men.

Unfortunately again, the question was not, "are feminists hateful?" nor was it, "Is the feminist movement hate?" nor was it, "Is advocating for women's rights hate?" nor was it, "Has feminism done anything not hateful?" nor was it even "Are hateful feminists misguided in their hate?"

The question was, "Is feminISM hate?"

According to dictionary.com, an "ism" is a distinctive practice, system or philosophy, typically a political ideology or an artistic movement. Synonyms include "doctrine" and "theory". The Merriam Webster dictionary defines "ism" in two ways: 1) a distinctive doctrine, cause or theory; and 2) an oppressive and especially discriminatory attitude or belief.

OMGoodness! Feminism fits all of those!

Unfortunately for me, "cause" and "practice" are not ideologies, theories or belief systems.

Fortunately for me, however, neither of those definitions is relevant in the case of defining feminism, or differentiating it from non-feminism.

Because feminism is NOT the only platform from which to practice advocacy in the cause of the rights of women–there are several other groups and individuals who lobby on behalf of women's rights.

Phyllis Schlafly and her allies, for instance, were instrumental in blocking the ERA [Equal Rights Amendment to the US Constitution], arguing that the ERA would give women no rights they didn't already have, but would take away rights, exemptions and privileges they enjoyed as women. It would have, in fact, removed rights women had, and conservative women's success in blocking the ERA preserved those rights.

Now correct me if I'm wrong, but I'm almost positive that Phyllis Schlafly and her buddies would never be described as feminist, even though they did as much to protect women's rights as any feminist ever has.

Conversely, it's altogether possible to describe feminists' fairly consistent (at least when people are looking) support for the ERA as advocating an erosion of the rights of women–that is, they are supporting an amendment that would remove rights women currently have, that would make VAWA [Violence Against Women Act], and women-only scholarships and affirmative action unconstitutional. So clearly, they're not simply the movement "for the rights" of women.

Moreover, MRAs [Men's Rights Advocates] also fight for women's rights–most commonly women's right to be fully accountable and responsible for their actions and decisions, women's right to be treated as capable of self-sufficiency, their right to be subject to the same legal status as men, and their right to be not be subject to discrimination under the law.

And again, I'm almost positive the MRM [Men's Rights Movement] is not the same thing as feminism.

Hell, we can't even define feminism as the movement for equal rights for women, since they have a consistent record, in practice if not in rhetoric, of protecting the rights women enjoy that men don't, and interfering with efforts toward equalizing the treatment of men and women under the law.

So what does that leave us with, if not the ideology?

It leaves us with the absurd necessity of considering feminism a label attributable to Phyllis Schlafly since she advocates for women's rights, and anti-feminism a label attributable to the membership of NOW who (claim at least outwardly that they) advocate the removal of rights women currently have. It leaves us with the bizarre necessity of saying Paul Elam of A Voice for Men is a “better feminist” than the feminists who wrote VAWA, because he advocates equal treatment of men and women under the law.

And it leaves us with the strange conundrum that MRAs are the only “true feminists”, as they advocate for full equality of rights between men and women, while feminists themselves focus most of their real-world activism on protecting the rights women have that men don’t, and in maintaining a system that treats men and women unequally socially, politically and legally.

Feminism is not a practice. It’s not a cause. It’s not an idea. It’s not a group of individuals who share an idea in common. It’s not a handful of ideas or concerns or causes.

It’s an ideology, a system of beliefs, a set of theories that includes a model of what society looks like, how it operates, why it operates the way it does, and how men and women coexist within that model. This set of theories is feminism.

By keeping the focus not on feminISM but on individual feminISTS, you’re not just deflecting, you’re rendering the concept of feminism so murky, it can’t even be defined. Even if feminism itself can be defined based on a shared ideology, by framing it in the context of individuals rather than the collective, or the core beliefs, if even one feminist disagrees with one of the primary and widely accepted tenets of feminist ideology, feminism becomes purely ephemeral and unassailable–attacking it becomes, as someone on reddit once observed, like swordfighting a fart.

I’m not interested in swordfighting your fart, Russ. I’m going to assert that feminism is an ideology, based on a set of theories: its foundation being the unifying (false) paradigm of The Patriarchy, and whose theoretical offshoots include Male Privilege, Female Oppression, Patriarchal Domestic Terrorism (otherwise known as the Duluth Model) and Rape Culture.

It really doesn’t matter what any individual calls themselves–I can call myself a Christian and believe in Odin, and I can call myself a Buddhist and take every word of the Bible as gospel. This does not mean that Christianity is a set of beliefs built around the Norse gods, any more than Buddhism is based on the the New Testament. And while different sects of Christianity might differ on certain aspects of faith, a Catholic is just as much a Christian as a Baptist or a Lutheran, because they subscribe to the core tenets of the ideology.

Feminists will also subscribe to the core tenets of their ideology, which I named above. If they don’t, then they’re not the people we’re discussing in this debate.

Feminism is an ISM. And its core tenets are available for pretty much anyone to learn.

All that aside–you know, the question of defining feminism, clarifying and solidifying the debate question, your objections to my tone, the issue of your fallacious appeal to consequences, you have, in your comment section, placed me in something of a bind.

Any debate with YOU on this topic is going to be muddied by your assertion that, what the Nazis did to the Jews and what they believed about the Jews, could not be necessarily used to prove that nazism is hate.

I assume you would consider that line of reasoning to be valid when applied to feminism, and I’m absolutely prepared to grant you that point.

However, I would argue that regardless of how justified a person might believe something like genocide to be, hate is a necessary ingredient to convince psychologically functional human beings to exterminate an entire population of other human beings. One must not only see the target group as subhuman, one must see them as subhuman and a threat deserving of death. Hate, justified or misguided, is kind of a requisite.

A Nazi or a Hutu or an Islamic Jihadist doesn’t kill Jews or Tutsis or Westerners because of policy. They do it because they are driven by psychological conditioning to hate the target group. They have to hate, or be convinced to hate, if they're not going to be overburdened with guilt and trauma by their actions. This is why so much of the rhetoric preceding genocides is designed to dehumanize and vilify the target group–they're scum, they're vermin, they're monsters, they're beasts, they're demons, they're dogs, they're rats, they're a disease. Never does or lambs or kittens, mind you–always something both subhuman, and a threat to humans.

Whether that hate is "righteous" in their minds, based on information they've been exposed to information that's been concealed from them, or whether it's purely rational, a psychologically functional human being does not kill masses and masses of other human beings because it seems like a good idea, or because someone tells them to, or because it will benefit them a little bit, or even because they see the other as inferior. They do it because they've been conditioned to hate the target group, and that hate is based on a combination of the perceived threat posed by the target group, and the learned view that the target group are subhuman.

And here, finally, I'm going to address the debate question: Is feminism hate?

And to do that, I'm going to ask that age-old question: WWHD: "What Would Hitler Do?" Because there IS a way to define Nazism as hate–if you can prove that the set of beliefs and ideas, and the antipathy and acts it engenders, persist in the face of solid contrary evidence.

Hell, one could even argue that it is not UNTIL solid contrary evidence is presented, considered and discarded in favor of the now-debunked belief system, that it even becomes primarily an ideology based on hate.

Let's consider this hypothetical scenario: It is a common belief that black women often murder, cook and eat children. Black men assist or enable their women in this practice. It's an abomination. It's inhuman. And a danger to everyone around them. Research tells us this is not a practice engaged in by ANY other group of humans. It feels right to hate black people for engaging in such barbarity, and to consider them less than human because of it. It's only justifiable to discriminate against them, legally and socially, to preëmptively attack them for their historical and future atrocities, and to protect ourselves at any expense, and our children, from this monstrous practice that is unique to black people.

And then we're presented with evidence. Irrefutable evidence. Empirically sound evidence. And that evidence shows either that A) all people of all ethnicities engage in this practice to a similar degree, or that B) black people do not commonly engage in this practice at all, and that the data behind the misconception was biased, falsified or methodologically unsound. Either way, blackness and baby-eating are not connected in any way.

What Would Hitler Do? I don't know.

What I do know is that when feminists, influential or otherwise, are presented with solid evidence demonstrating that domestic violence is NOT, in fact, a sexually directional behavior, that it is NOT consistent with their unifying theory of The Patriarchy, that women are actually MORE likely to be violent toward their partners than men, that men and women abuse their partners for the exact same reasons, that women are MORE likely, in fact, to engage in coercive control of a partner, that women are NOT much more likely to be injured or killed by a partner, that mothers are MORE likely than fathers to abuse children, that unilateral violence is 50% MORE likely to be female-perpetrated than male…

Well, what those with any power –those most invested in the ideology– did, in response to that solid, contrary evidence was to engage in boycotts, censorship, intimidation, terrorism, death threats, blacklisting, information suppression, denial, dismissal, shaming, false accusations, and cover-ups. And the ones who didn't, who said, "hey, wait a minute. We need to look into this," they were excommunicated.

Case 1) In California, feminist-inspired domestic violence mandatory arrest policies enacted in the 1980s led to a 37% increase in arrests of men and a 446% increase in arrests of women. That's some pretty solid evidence right there, especially when taken in conjunction with the then-multiple studies on DV that showed gender symmetry. Within a few years, however, feminist legal experts had written and successfully implemented predominant aggressor policies which prioritized relative height, weight, strength, AND patriarchal/feminist models of domestic violence (Duluth again), over inconvenient matters such as “who is the abusive party?” They essentially adjusted policy to make outcomes conform to their theory, rather than adjusting their theory to conform to reality. And conform the outcomes did–arrest rates returned to normal: at least 85% male, at least 1/3 of which would have been victims.

Case 2) In Ontario, a recently penned feminist report on domestic violence, cited data from Statistics Canada [hereafter, “StatsCan”]. In her report, the author transformed the data from the StatsCan report to reflect feminist ideology. She reported that about 1.2 million Canadian women had been abused by their partners in the past 5 years, even though the StatsCan report clearly indicates that that 1.2 million refers to “Canadians” including 601k women and 585k men. Not only are this feminist grad student and her feminist supervising professor essentially doubling the number of female victims, they’re erasing male ones–portraying domestic violence as sexually directional when it’s anything but.

Ignorance is no excuse in either of these examples. These feminists weren’t ignorant of the facts–they wanted to keep the public ignorant of them. It’s no excuse for the treatment of Erin Pizzey by the feminist establishment in the UK, who were so angered and threatened by her assertion that women are as violent as men in their relationships that they subjected her to a campaign of bomb threats, death threats to her, her children and her grandchildren, and finally killed her family dog when they couldn’t get to her. It’s no excuse for taking data from tables and not just ignoring the actual numbers, but lying about them, so you can inflate the number of female victims and cast all the perpetrators as male.

Why would feminists do this? And keep in mind, it’s not like they chose to merely persist in their belief system even when evidence proved it wasn’t consistent with reality, they didn’t just ignore the evidence and go on their merry way. They actively suppressed the evidence, misrepresented the evidence, attempted to keep that evidence from public and government scrutiny, threatened and blacklisted researchers to prevent them from finding more evidence, and the moment that evidence began being reflected in arrest rates, they actually changed legal procedures so that arrest rates would conform to their theory.

And while I would agree that lots of people cling to indefensible but dearly held theories despite mountains of contrary evidence, I think it behooves us to examine what specific elements of their theory it was that they went to such arguably criminal lengths to protect from scrutiny or challenge.

Here’s what they theorize: Domestic violence is a microcosmic reflection of a system which is based on female subordination and male dominance. Violence, oppression, coercion, domination and abuse are integral aspects of masculinity, and behaviors not just normalized and reinforced by The Patriarchy, but intrinsic to it.

The negative qualities that make people beat up their partners are not human qualities, they are masculine qualities, and they are an integral part of how masculinity and femininity interact under The Patriarchy, a system where men have always held power.

So as you can see, the element of feminist theory that feminists were driven to death threats, blacklisting and violence to preserve, was the very element that makes hating men morally justifiable.

Robin Morgan said it herself: Man-hating is an honorable and viable political act–the oppressed have a right to class hatred against the class that is oppressing them.

And if men aren’t that way–you know, aren’t violent, oppressive, coercive, dominating and abusive toward women, at least no more so than women are toward men–then all of a sudden it’s no longer justifiable to hate men, is it? Feminists have spent almost 40 years concealing evidence that contradicts the specific misconceptions that give women the right, as a class, to hate men, as a class. They’ve perpetuated stereotypes that violence, aggression, and abuse–especially of women–are “normal” male behaviors, encouraged and abetted by a culture that is shaped by male-dominance, in the face of evidence that men are no more shitty in their behavior toward women than women are in their behavior toward men.

Why would they do that, if they didn't want people to hate men? Or if their hatred of men didn't inform their attachment to the aspects of their theories that expressly justify it? Why is it that the facets of their theory that directly connect the most harmful behaviors of humans to maleness and maleness alone, why is it those are the very ones they're prepared to engage in terrorism to preserve?

Asking which came first, the theory or the hate, is kind of irrelevant. It was the misandry-engendering parts of the theory feminists were willing to maintain, by threatening and blacklisting researchers, and then rewriting law and policy such that actual victims of domestic violence would be sent to prison if they're male, innocent men would be stripped of their homes and children, and violent female perpetrators would walk–with full custody of their kids, no less. Those facets of the theory are the most adamantly defended by those in control of the narrative.

How about another hypothetical scenario:

Hispanics are known to commonly commit serious assault, especially sexual assault. In fact, 99% of the rapes of all women and 99% of the sexual assaults on all men, are known to be committed by Hispanics. Though efforts have been made to integrate Hispanics into the culture, to socialize them away from this violent behavior and instil in them the values important to whites, blacks and Asians –most notably an ethic of empathy– the problem isn't lessening. In fact, more people than ever are victims of Hispanic sexual violence–in the 1970s, 1 in 8 people were victims of Hispanic sexual violence, but now the number is 1 in 3. This must be a problem endemic to Hispanic culture or genetics. It's either inherent or culturally intractable. They're monsters, when you think of it–violent, cruel and sociopathic, begetting more violent, cruel sociopathy with each generation. It's therefore entirely justifiable to mete out harsher penalties when they commit sexual violence, to arrest them anytime a non-Hispanic has ever felt threatened by them, to reverse the burden of proof in sexual assault cases involving Hispanics, and even to propose to confine them to certain areas after 9 at night.

And then we're presented with contrary evidence. Empirically sound contrary evidence. That evidence demonstrates that non-Hispanics are equally likely to engage in sexual aggression–it's just that the victims of non-Hispanics don't report it as often. Hispanics themselves are least likely to report being victimized. We're actually shown that it is non-Hispanics who are most likely to self-report having used physical force, threats, intoxication or coercion to get sex from an unwilling partner. The evidence shows that victimization and perpetration rates are virtually identical among ethnic groups–it's only how we view those assaults that differs, depending on who is the perpetrator and who is the victim.

What would Hitler do? I don't know.

What do feminists do? They continue to perpetuate the lie that sexual aggression is a masculine behavior–even though women are more likely to report engaging in it. They claim that the number of male victims is tiny, and they cite research that describes forced sex perpetrated on a woman as rape and forced sex perpetrated on a man as not rape, to "prove" it. They ignore the findings that a large percentage of women have reported having forced a man into sex, while a smaller percentage of men report they've repeatedly forced a woman into sex–which actually demonstrates that rape is more common a behavior in women, not men.

They continue to frame "rape culture" as a social attitude that normalizes sexual violence by men against women, even though the justice system has bent over backwards to make it easier for women to report rape and easier to convict male rapists, even though black men hung like the song said, "strange fruit" from trees in the deep south based on nothing more than a woman's pointed finger, and even though the first response of society to a man's complaint that he's been forced into sex by a woman is, "was she hot?" They blame the rape of women on Patriarchal norms, masculinity and male dominance, even though it was a male-dominated system that enacted marital rape laws to protect only women from sexually aggressive husbands, while the exact same system will force a man to pay punitive damages to his ex-wife for not putting out enough for her liking, and will consider him withholding sex from her a form of domestic violence.

And they say batshit insane things like this, which I'm quoting from a recent article on Feministing:

> Rape is absolutely a gendered crime, but the act of rape itself doesn't necessarily follow those rules.
>
> We need to be able to hold an understanding of rape as a genderless act at the same time that we recognize it as embedded in a gendered culture of violence. No one said feminism was easy.

What exactly is she saying here? Well, she's saying that even though rape is not gendered, it's intrinsic to masculinity. It is, as Brownmiller once said, the means by which all men control all women. It's not a pathology–it's a Patriarchal tool in all men's hands, a tool men have used since the beginning of humanity to terrorize women into remaining subjugated.

So again, what are the exact aspects of feminist theory that feminists are so desperate to protect by attempting to emulsify the oil of narrative and the water of empirical reality? To hold two completely contradictory ideas in their heads at once, and then bemoan that "no one said feminism was easy"? What motivates them to continue to tie a sexual behavior more common among WOMEN, and more likely to be normalized and endorsed by the culture when women are the aggressors, with masculinity?

Surprise! It's the part that, when attributed to masculinity, makes men hate-worthy. It's the part that makes people see maleness as bad, as evil, as deserving of hate and prejudice.

And you know, as much as feminists lie through their teeth about things like the pay gap and old boys' clubs and sexism in employment and education, I haven't EVER heard of anyone sending death threats to a researcher, or screaming, "YOU ARE FUCKING SCUM!!!!" into the face of someone interested in hearing another point of view, over the pay gap or subtle employment sexism.

The ONLY aspects of feminist theory –you know, the theory that IS feminISM– that feminists have engaged in violence, death and bomb threats, intimidation and false accusations to preserve are the aspects of feminist theory that cast men as uniquely subhuman monsters, and therefore worthy of hate.

The chicken or the egg?

Was feminism borne of the hatred of men, or was the hatred of men merely a natural consequence of the theories central to feminism? Which came first, the chicken or the egg?

The question is immaterial. Whether the theories were based in some women's hate of men, or whether they were based on ignorance and only taught women to perpetuate hateful beliefs about men, the relevant question is: What parts of feminist theory do feminist theorists most vehemently, violently shield from any challenge, doubt or scrutiny? What parts do feminists cling to even when they're proved wrong by sound evidence?

The parts that cast masculinity as a pathological victimization of women. The parts that give us all moral permission to hate men and see them as a threat. The parts that, in the face of mountains of evidence to the contrary, cast women as a monolithic victim class and men as a monolithic perpetrator class, that cast women as universally humane and men as universally subhuman.

If the tenets of feminist theory that feminists defend most adamantly –with sociopathic or criminal behavior, no less– are the very tenets that collectively portray men as inhuman monsters and women, collectively, as their victims, the parts that naturally lead society to hate men for the horrible things they, and only they, are prone to do… then yes, I'd say feminism is hate. Because it's the aspects of the theory that lead people to hate men that feminists seem most interested in protecting.

And you might think those aspects are "radical," and I suppose you're right. "Radical" means "pertaining to the root". It does not describe fringe beliefs, it describes core, fundamental ones. Basic ones. Ones that are foundational to an ideology. The equivalent of, "was Christ the son of god, and did he die for our sins?" It's the radical feminists who are "doing it right". The moderates and coffee shop feminists are nothing more than poseurs and pick-and-choosers–Christmas Christians who engage in premarital sex and swipe office supplies from work, but rationalize it away because they like the idea of a Jesus that loves them no matter what.

And it doesn't matter whether some feminists are acting or believing out of ignorance. The ideology, and those who concocted, perpetuate and control it are not.

Individual feminists might not be primarily motivated by a hatred of men, but feminism is, absolutely, hate. It encourages hate, gives people moral permission to hate, condones and endorses that hate, and incites individuals and governments to act on that hate–and it is the specific elements of feminist theory with the least validity and empirical support, and which serve these very purposes, which are the ones most closely nurtured and guarded by feminists invested in them, and most zealously shielded from scrutiny, refutation or challenge. The ideology, and those in control of the narrative, are at their most vehement when it comes to maintaining feminism's most hateful premises.

It might not be hate if it was supported by valid, empirical evidence, or if it adjusted its tenets in the face of contrary evidence. It would just be reality.

The way to prove that an ideology IS based on hate is to demonstrate that 1) it is false, 2) its falsities engender and promote unjustifiable hate, and 3) those falsities are the most adamantly defended and preserved by its followers.

All the elements of feminist ideology that are most likely to justify and encourage the hate of men rest on lies, half-truths, and censorship of opposing viewpoints and evidence, through a history of boycotts, intimidation and even terrorism. So yes, I'm prepared to say that the ideology of feminism is one of hate. As you quoted in your video, "By their fruits, you shall know the tree."

Your mileage may vary, of course.

Have a nice day.

Monday Roundup for 08 July 2013

Dean Esmay · 8 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

First off, breaking news: We received a confirmation from the Bar Counsel that corrupt and disgraced prosecutor Mary Kellett, who reports to Maine DA Carletta Bossano, is having a disciplinary hearing scheduled to take place on July 15 in Portland Maine before a Supreme Court Justice. If you or anyone you know wishes to attend and witness this historic hearing, here is its shedule and location:

http://www.mebaroverseers.org/discipline/upcoming_hearings.shtml

Rumor is they may try to start the hearing before the 10:00 scheduled time in order to prevent the public and reporters from arriving in time to cover events.

Portland has its own airport and it is also about 1.5 hours away from Boston, which also has a major international airport. It is also over 3 hours from Kellet's home tertitory, the town of Bar Harbor Maine, presumably because this makes it easier for residents and media reporters in the Bar Harbor area to miss the event. We should not let that happen. Look for other stories on AVfM today and in the coming days to discuss this event in more detail, and if you think you can get there in a show of support against corrupt prosecutors, we urge you to attend. Contact John Hembling if you think you can attend.

You are a contemptible slimeball, Mary Kellet. How many innocent men are rotting in jail because of your lies, you loathsome excuse for a human being? If you are barred from ever practicing law again in your life, it is the lightest punishment you should get. Where you really belong is in jail, for a minimum of 3-5 years for every single man you falsely persecuted. Don't think you're going to be forgotten, no matter what type of slimy deal you try to cut your cronies at the Bar. And don't think we're going to forget your boss Carletta and your fellow employees at that corrupt office, either.

Anyway, anyone who can make it to the hearing should. And if they try to reschedule it, don't worry about it: we'll let you all know that so you can make arrangements to appear at the rescheduled hearing.

Now, on to other things you may have missed in the last week:

I've always liked Ally Fogg, but last week Paul indicated he was rather unhappy with Fogg's recent writings on domestic violence. As much as I like Fogg, I have to say, denying that there is a domestic violence industry, and acting as if it isn't Men's Rights Activists who have brought to light the reality that violence against men by women is a serious issue, and it's our fault somehow because our style is somehow what's so problematic when our current style is the only thing historically that's been proven to get attention to massive injustices, is a pretty low blow. I for one hope Ally keeps trying to open minds up in the little intellectual ghetto that is known as "FreeThought" Blogs, but he is after all hanging out with a bunch of hatemongering closed-minded bigots like Ophelia Benson and PZ Myers, so I'm not going to hold my breath.

By the way, speaking of PZ Myers, have we mentioned lately that he likes to tell rape jokes? Well just in case we hadn't mentioned it before, we just thought we'd make sure you knew.

Diana Davison has been gracing our pages a lot of late with her wicked satire. In There can be only one, she amusingly poses a fantasy fight between disgraced former Australian Prime Minster Julia Gillard and Toronto's own Big Red. My money was on Big Red all along, while Gillard can spew venom pretty well she's just nowhere near as good at it as the Terror of Toronto.

Harry Crouch of the National Coalition for Men recently noticed that Phyllis Schlafley got it dead wrong. No shit Harry. A few of us had that figured out all along. You're being entirely too nice to the old girl if you ask me!

We began wondering last week if Mary Kellett would slither her way into a backroom deal. As I think I mentioned earlier, it looks like we were right. Take this as another sign you might want to help do something about it.

Gonzo Historian Robert St. Estephe has returned yet again (hey, it's almost like he's a regular or something) with another entry from history you may have missed: Female serial killer bandits. You know, I recently saw a documentary on Aileen Wuornos, who was portrayed as "history's first female serial killer." The documentary was good, but every time I heard that phrase I wanted to print out the collected works of Robert St. Estephe and beat whoever said that over the head with it mercilessly until they read every word.

The organization known as Human Rights Watch once had a lot of credibility, although they've rarely had much to say about the human rights violations of boys and men in particular. They have a special women's rights department of course, but none for men and boys. Quelle surprise! With all the human rights violations for men and boys in the world, you'd think they'd have some time to think about it, but apparently, they're more concerned about bikini waxing. No, we're not making it up.

Have we found our first teenaged honeybadger? Aimee Nicholls may just be the one. Let's hope she's one of a whole wave of them. Two generations now have grown up under this corrupt, misandrist, child-abusing system in the UK, US, Canada, Australia, and other countries. The younger people are, the more likely they seem to be to notice. In my experience anyway.

So. You're a feminist, and you're "not like that." You aren't one of those haters. You actually hate the haters, the extremists. You aren't part of the hate. OK. I'll believe you. Under one condition: You unconditionally swear you agree with everything in this oath, all of it, parts 1-6. If you will, then welcome, my feminist friend. Otherwise, ask yourself why you never realized before that you believe hateful, ignorant things, and why you're mad at us for pointing it out to you.

Male rites of passage: some cultures do them consciously. Some say we've forgotten them in our culture, but maybe some of us do them subconsciously? I never made naked snow angels, but I remember doing a few other things that didn't seem to make sense at the time but now do.

A Voice for Men's Editor-at-Large, Erin Pizzey, has written many a book. If you haven't yet, you should buy and read her latest, This Way to the Revolution. It's awesome. And after you order your copy of that, to tide you over, you should read her astounding 1982 suppressed book, "Prone to Violence," which was so upsetting to gender ideologues it resulted in death threats, targeted thefts of the book from bookstores, and more. Fortunately, we recovered this classic bit of samizdat, and are presenting it to you now, one chapter at a time. Here is Prone to Violence, Chapter 1.

What happens when a beloved patriarch dies, even one you didn't always have the best relationship with? Dr. F tells one such tale with Our Dad.

Dan Perrins was recently crushed to learn he traveled to Toronto for naught: Radfem hatemongers seem to have run away. Well there's nothing more scary than a guy with a neckbeard and a camera. Especially an epic beard like Dan's! (Think maybe the girls were just jealous they couldn't grow one quite as nice as his?)

Last year one feminist made a half-assed weasely attempt to answer the debate question "Is feminism hate?" (We say it's pretty hard for it not to be, though it might be possible.) Unfortunately the little feminist coward gave only one short statement and then noted that she would have no more to say. Pathetic. People who claim to be about equality should be willing to stand up for their ideas, shouldn't they? In any case, this gave Girl Writes What a chance to explain in excruciating detail everything hateful she's ever seen in feminism, including its most base assumptions. Here is Part 2 of her answer in the affirmative, for those of you who like to read and not watch videos (although the video is there too).

AVfM recently noted more feminists dismissing male victims of violence by the way. You'd almost think… no, it couldn't be a… pattern? Naw, c'mon, it's just a one-off, right?

Finally, remember the story of Judge Lori B. Jackson and the children of Lt. Col. Joel Kirk of West Virginia? Well guess what. Those children were not the only victims of a sadistic, and by the way, criminally incompetent and corrupt West Virginia judiciary. Little Matthew Hallburn is being bludgeoned by a judge seeking revenge. Your Honor, you're not just a disgrace to the bench, you're a disgrace as a human being. And by the way, you can expect to hear more about this case, and this judge, and some of the other members of judiciary in that pretty little state. For all the physical beauty of the Mountaineer state, apparently when a brother and a sister get married in West Virginia they give their progeny a black robe and a gavel. Oh, was that harsh? Well maybe the West Virginia Supreme Court will prove me wrong. Stay tuned.

AVfM Radio has of course continued to go strong. Robert O'Hara's News and Activism show had a Free for all night, while Lucian and Co. looked at Academic Feminism. Erin and I, along with Andy Thomas of the new A Voice for Men UK (the new name for the old MRA London site) had some pretty good conversations, including some readings from and about Dr. Helen Smith's terrific Men On Strike: Why Men Are Boycotting Marriage, Fatherhood, and the American Dream – and Why It Matters (although by the way, UK, Canadian, and other men from outside the US will probably recognize the same phenomena in their own nations). Unfortunately the show with Erin was plagued with technical difficulties during the first half, but there was lots of good discussion anyway.

Also as usual the video section is chock full of goodies, but of particular interest please check out the interview with our own Dr. Greg Canning, Dr. Helen Smith's 6 reasons men don't marry, Victor Zen's Feeling over facts, and Sparky Fister's Five stupid things about feminism videos. Plus of course everything done by JtO. ?

Well that's about it for this week. Hey, just a question: wouldn't it really suck if every member of the West Virginia judiciary and every prosecutor in the state of Maine got angry whenever they heard the words "A Voice for Men?" That would really hurt my feelings. Wouldn't it hurt yours?

See you in 7!

Team Kellett pulls fast one

VFM News and Commentary · 8 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

In a startling last-minute development, AVfM received word that a backroom deal has been struck for Mary Kellett, the corrupt prosecutor in Maine. Giving as little advance notice as possible, a hearing for disgraced Bar Harbor prosecutor Mary Kellett was finally scheduled for the early morning of Monday, July 15th in Portland, Maine. This is some three hours' drive from Kellett's home territory of Bar Harbor. We have been informed by reliable sources within Maine that Kellett has arranged a plea bargain and will be pleading guilty to something, but no one is saying what exactly she will be pleading guilty to. Vladek Filler will be coming in to give a statement on what was done to him but is unavailable for direct comment to the press. In the meantime, it still appears at press time that Kellet's boss, D.A. Carletta Bassano, will not be facing any formal repercussions for allowing a subordinate in her office to behave in such despicably illegal and unethical fashion or whether Bassano's other employees have employed similar tactics and simply not been caught out yet.

At this point we believe it is of interest to everyone in the Men's Human Rights Community to contact Maine officials with their objections; Kellett's behavior is far more than unbecoming of a public official, it is outright corrupt and illegal and has doubtless resulted in more than one man being wrongly imprisoned in Maine. It is also fair to ask about Bossano's competence as administrator and to ask what of Kellett's conduct is typical of Bossano's entire office in Bar Harbor or to Maine prosecutors in general. The fast scheduling of this sudden plea deal is also an affront to justice, giving Filler and others with an interest in the case little notice to appear and/or show support for ousting the corrupt Filler. We further suspect that locating the hearing in Portland and at such notice in the middle of July, when people frequently vacation, was done by design to minimize press presence at the event.

Gordon Smith, who was vindicated from a string of false allegations from his ex- in Delaware late last year, is attempting to attend the hearing in support of Filler and against the corrupt Kellett. We would also encourage others in the men's community to attend the hearing and give a show of support and a report on events to AVfM and the wider men's community. The information is here:

Judge: Maine Supreme Judicial Court Associate Justice Ellen Gorman
Hearing: Monday, July 15, 2013, 10:00 AM (might start earlier)
Location: Courtroom # 10
Cumberland County Courthouse
205 Newbury Street, Portland, Maine

Prosecutor Mary N. Kellett is represented an unnamed Assistant Attorney General. The Board of Overseers of the Bar is represented by Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis.

John Hembling is our AVfM coordinator for anyone who can make it to Portland, Maine in the early morning of July 15th, so people can meet up with each other and help each other to go. He can be contacted at the following phone number: 325-718-4635 and his e-mail address is: john@avoiceformen.com.

We can't let these people get away with this.

We also have a list of several dozen reporters we would like to contact and could use volunteers to help emailing all these reporters/media outlets so they know what's happening making possible a greater chance of mainstream press coverage.

Previous coverage:

Is Mary Kellett cutting a deal?

SAVE challenges media coverage of Kellett scandal

Save calls on Hancock county to remove Kellett

Kellett faces suspension

The curtain closes on justice

Filler's sister speaks to the Bar Panel

Filler jailed, denied attorney by Judge Robert E. Murray

Censorship Alive and Well at Bangor Daily News

Hearing schedule here.

[/box]

West Virginia family court corruption and incompetence

A Voice for Men News · 8 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Journalist Mark Hallburn never intended on being a proponent of the West Virginia family court reform movement

This story starts, as many do, with divorce papers served by Mark Hallburn's ex wife. At the same time Hallburn received a tip from a father who ran afoul of child protective services for rough-housing with his child at a football match. The father ended up in jail despite being cleared of all suspicion of child abuse.

Hallburn did some digging on Judge Watkins–who treated the father harshly regarding unpaid child support while he was in jail–found dirt, and reported on it.

Then our intrepid journalist found himself in front of the very judge he was investigating. Judge Watson was presiding over Hallburn's divorce!

Hallburn now faced bias against fathers, court corruption and judicial retaliation armed only with a burning desire to stay in his son's life.

This is where his story begins. But it doesn't end here.

Mark Hallburn, longtime Publisher of Putnam*LIVE*.com, a local news web site, was content with reporting Putnam County news and information with an occasional editorial.

[image]
Putnam County Family Court Judge William M. "Chip" Watkins, III
Then Putnam County Family Court Judge William M. "Chip" Watkins, III, retaliated against Hallburn for inquiring after Watkins' reason for being listed as "Not In Good Standing" with Watkins' homeowners association.

Now, Watkins is on a four-year suspension from the bench, without pay, and Hallburn is feeling the wrath of the West Virginia court system, including facing a criminal charge for simply trying to review the financial records of the Putnam County Health Department–which is nearly a quarter of a million dollars in debt.

This tangle of judicial malfeasance started with a simple tip from a loyal reader. In November of 2011, (about the same time that Hallburn's wife, Dolores, filed for divorce) Hallburn received a telephone call from another Putnam resident, Troy Sexton, who'd experienced some legal trouble after he picked up one of his triplets by his feet, and swung him around at a football practice. Sexton was busted on a felony for this roughhousing with his child, and pleaded no contest to a misdemeanor to avoid his young children from having to testify in court. This despite Child Protective Services determining that Troy Sexton was not a child abuser.

Then-Putnam County Magistrate Kimberly M. Blair-Caruthers (who recently lost her re-election bid and is no longer Magistrate), threw the book at Sexton with a six-month jail sentence.

The sentence was reduced to 30 days upon appeal. Sexton, who is a comptroller at a local car dealer, was hauled into Watkins' court, and, Sexton claims, treated harshly about child support during his jail sentence for child abuse that he did not commit.

At that time Sexton lived in the same subdivision as Watkins, so when Sexton received a Home Owner's Association[HOA] letter listing Watkins as "Not In Good Standing," Sexton called Hallburn. Sexton told Hallburn that the same judge that tossed dads into jail over owing child support was not in good standing with thie Home Owners Association, a "conflict."

"I told Troy that 'Not In Good Standing' could mean a broken window, an untrimmed shrub, or a campaign sign in the yard that violated HOA rules," recalls Hallburn. "I couldn't simply publish that Watkins didn't pay his bill–without verification."

So Hallburn telephoned Watkins, at his home, and at the courtroom office. The calls were not returned.

“That’s not surprising,” says Hallburn. “Chip has a reputation for not returning calls. So I went to his office. His staff was rude. I was told that his HOA dues weren’t news, and that since I was a litigant that he wouldn’t talk to me. I advised his secretary that I didn’t leave my journalism civil rights in the lobby because I am a respondent in a divorce case that I didn’t want, and that my interview of Watkins wouldn’t talk about the divorce. I also told them that since he was my wife’s lawyer–before we married–that he must recuse himself.”

The secretary’s daughter, Lori Mitchell, is Watkins’ case manager. She threatened to have Hallburn arrested. He left the building and wrote Watkins a letter.

“I told him I wanted his side of the story,” Hallburn recalls. “I also advised Watkins that he was Dolores’ former lawyer (which, admittedly, because she took my name, he would not have known) and that he must recuse himself, so an interview with me would not be a conflict. I also told him his staff was rude.”

[image]

Watkins responded with an infamous letter where he made some mistakes: 1) He admitted being behind on his HOA dues and thanked Hallburn. 2) He invited Hallburn to file a motion for recusal. (Watkins should have automatically recused himself–a mistake) 3) Watkins said his staff reported Hallburn as being rude and called Hallburn “The south end of a north-bound horse.” That’s judge-speak for “Horses ass.” Watkins signed the letter.

A short time later, in a separate incident, Lori Mitchell was accused of being rude in a Writ of Prohibition filed by Terry K. Hamm, a former employee of the new Putnam County Circuit Judge Joseph K. “Joe” Reeder, who was also Hallburn’s lawyer before running for office. (Hallburn reports he has never met Hamm).

Hallburn turned the Watkins letter, which was written in December, over to West Virginia Record free-lance reporter Lawrence J. Smith, who telephoned Watkins a few months later.

[image]
Free-lance reporter Lawrence J. Smith
“I was too close to the story,” says Hallburn. “I wanted Smith to report about the letter from Watkins.”

Hallburn also filed a complaint with the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission about Watkins’ refusal to recuse himself from the case. In addition, Hallburn’s motion to recuse was opposed by Watkins, who was eventually removed from the case by the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. Because Watkins is the only Family Court Judge in Putnam County (population about 60,000) the case was assigned to controversial Kanawha County Judge Michael J. “Mike” Kelly. (Remember Kelly’s name)

Watkins makes another mistake: He threatens Smith on a recorded voice mail, with a lawsuit–something that stunned Hallburn. Smith says, “I’ve been a journalist since I was the only guy at a radio station when the Space Shuttle Challenger exploded. I never thought I’d see the day that a judge–knowing he is being recorded–would threaten a reporter.”

That’s exactly what Watkins did.

“By then, I’d moved to South Carolina, in early March, 2012” says Hallburn. “I’d forgotten about Watkins. But when Lawrence says he was threatened, I told him to take the audio to Troy, who’d become a YouTube sensation (Troy From West Virginia) with a series of home-made videos. I also told Lawrence to take a picture of Watkins’ house, and I published the article about the threat.” It is important to note that the article was published May 22, 2013–six months after Hallburn contacted Watkins about his Home Owners Association predicament.

Enter Hurricane Bible Church Pastor Arthur D. Hage. The quiet old-school preacher was struggling over his divorce from his wife, Lillian, and had several hearings before Watkins. One of those hearings was May 21, 2013. Watkins saw Hage speak with Smith as Hage exited the courtroom. The next day, when Watkins saw the PutnamLIVE.com article, complete with the photo of his home, Watkins went ballistic, and verbally shredded Hage, in a truly astonishing performance recorded on court camera.

"For reasons none of us understand," Hallburn recalls. "Watkins accused Hage of being involved with the publication of the article including the photo of Watkins' home. Keep in mind that Watkins knew I was questioning his HOA dues and contacted Watkins in November of 2012. People have asked how Hage could sit there and take Watkins' abuse. Two reasons: 1) Hage was stunned. 2) Hage literally knew nothing about the article and had no idea of why Watkins was screaming at him."

The video went viral. Watkins was seen on Kelly's Court on Fox News, the Huffington Post, was mentioned in The London Daily Mail, and discussed on The Glenn Beck Show–in addition to local West Virginia news sources that initially ignored it.

During Watkins' rant, he claims that his home was repeatedly vandalized. However, Smith's research failed to turn up any crime reports.

West Virginia Supreme Court Administrator Steven D. Canterbury said he would not press charges against Watkins saying "Everyone can have a bad day."

So Hallburn published more videos. In one, Watkins sends 62-year-old amputee Robert R. "Bob" Harper, Sr., to jail for failing to pay child support. (Harper spent 21 days and contracted tuberculosis behind bars.) There's only one problem: Harper proved that he paid the support. In another, Watkins screams at Tammy Jo Lambert, saying, "Shut up, you stupid woman" and tells her to "Shut her fat face."

In one video, Watkins slanders Hallburn and Sexton, calling Hallburn a "Certified nut case" and Sexton a "Child abuser." Of course, neither are true and Watkins is protected by judicial immunity. Not even West Virginia judges are immune from Watkins' comments: he rips several of them in a session that looks like it came from a corner bar rather than a courtroom. Amazingly, in another video, Watkins slaps Margaret Farmer with a restraining order, while she and her lawyer were absent! That's against court rules. But when Farmer filed a complaint with the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission, it was dismissed.

Eventually Sexton produced a satirical montage video (NSFW) of Watkins screaming at people in his courtroom.[1]

When Watkins came up for a disciplinary hearing, Farmer and Sexton were not allowed to testify because no charges were filed on their behalf by the J.I.C.

However, charges were filed against Watkins on behalf of Harper, Nancy Black, Lambert, and Mary Wysong, who Watkins told, from the bench, to give up eating lunch every day.

While the so-called disciplinary system shut down Farmer and Sexton from speaking in Watkins' hearing, Harper and Hallburn were allowed to talk. What happened made West Virginia history and put Hallburn in the cross-hairs of the legal system.

When Harper spoke, Watkins rudely ignored him–despite being seated just a few feet away.

So when Hallburn spoke, from across the courtroom, he first ripped the JIC, calling it "A supreme failure" for the six-month delay in holding a disciplinary hearing–saying it was "A sham."

Then Hallburn politely asked Watkins to "Turn around and face me like a man." Watkins did, very briefly, then kicked his feet up, rolled his eyes, and crossed his arms like a middle-school punk.

[image]
Disciplinary Committee.
The disciplinary committee sat and watched Watkins melt down in his courtroom chair. However, the committee and hearing judge refused to release Watkins' mental evaluation that was done for this case.

[image]
Special prosecutor Rachel Fletcher Cipoletti
After the hearing concluded, Special prosecutor Rachel Fletcher Cipoletti announced that she and Watkins had previously agreed to a 90-day suspension, a suspension that would be "stayed" or canceled, should Watkins perform well under special supervision during his next 90 days on the bench.

However, the disciplinary hearing board had another idea. Specifically citing Watkins' reaction to Hallburn's testimony, it recommended a four-year suspension without pay, for the remainder of Watkins' term in office, through December 31, 2016.

Despite the testimony of Watkins lawyer, Robert Paul Martin, before the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, in March of 2013, the four-year-suspension was upheld, removing Watkins from the bench, and likely ending his career as a judge.

[image]
West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals
Before that hearing, Fletcher Cipoletti flip-flopped on her 90-day suspension agreement and sided with the committee's recommendation that Watkins be suspended for the remainder of his four-year-term.

Hallburn also revealed that Watkins' lawyer had been arrested for Public Intoxication and Obstruction (misdemeanors) at a West Virginia University football game shortly before the November 27, 2012 hearing.

Meanwhile, Hallburn was feeling the wrath of the judicial system for taking down a judge.

In early 2012, appointed Judge Michael J. Kelly stripped Hallburn of more than 70-percent custody of his five-year-old son, Matthew. There were no allegations of abuse, no accusations of molestation, no accusations of drug use. Kelly simply punished Mark Hallburn's little son Matthew for no reason–except for the obvious, the need to get revenge at his father.The journalist had brought Watkins' admitted misconduct to the attention of the world, and Kelly obviously did not appreciate seeing a fellow judge under scrutiny by the press.

Hallburn says: "Kelly violated our civil rights by refusing to allow Matthew to visit me in South Carolina. [Kelly] even refused to allow Matthew to go to Myrtle Beach on Spring Break. Even worse, Kelly refused to allow me to have Father's Day with my son–because it was Dolores' weekend-despite me giving Matthew to her for Mother's Day on my weekend."

[image]

When Hallburn correctly protested Judge Michael Kelly's misconduct to then West Virginia Supreme Court Chief Justice Menis E. Ketchum, instead of doing the right thing, Ketchum pissed on The First Amendment's "Right to redress government grievances" and issued an Administrative Order that Hallburn not contact the high court to complain about Kelly's misconduct.

[image]

[image]
Hallburn's mother, Nancy Hallburn
But wait, there's more: When Hallburn's mother, Nancy, became terminally ill, in May of 2012, Kelly refused to allow Matthew to have a final visit with his grandmother.

The office of Putnam Circuit Clerk Ronnie Matthews lost the budget that Hallburn provided at Kelly's request. This was Kelly's excuse for denying the final visit. However, in a classic "Gotcha" move, Hallburn had re-submitted the budget in the Father's Day visitation motion that Kelly denied. The lying judge is busted. When Hallburn complained about the "lost" budget, Kelly retaliated by issuing an order telling Hallburn not to contact Matthew's office about Hallburn's case.

Hallburn filed a complaint against Kelly about his malicious refusal of the final visit only to have the JIC refuse to press charges against the bad judge.

"The JIC needs to be disbanded," says Hallburn. "We need an independent Civilian Review Board to replace the JIC."

Because Hallburn was under an 11-month-long “temporary” order when Kelly refused to let Matthew visit his grandmother, and because temporary orders are not appealable under West Virginia Family Court rules, Nancy died, August 5, 2012, without a final visit with her grandson. Matthew’s only visit with her was when he was 10 months old, in 2008. Because of Kelly’s misconduct, little Matthew has no recollection of his grandmother. Yet Kelly has him living with his other grandmother, Dolores’ mother, Margaret, every day.

Incredibly, in this courtroom video, Judge Michael Kelly states that no four-year-old would appreciate a visit with his grandmother. Kelly said it. Hallburn published the video. Unlike West Virginia judges, videotapes don’t lie.

The West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission refuses to release complaints, or even complaint numbers about Mountain State judges–calling the elected officials “employees.” Smith has filed a lawsuit about this issue. However, even he concedes that the odds of a judge ruling that this information must be made public is slim. Judges protect each other.

In addition, reporters are not allowed to cover West Virginia Family Law court hearings, effectively protecting judges.

“Thankfully Hage, Harper, Lambert and Wysong released their videos,” says Hallburn. “These people are heroes. Without them, Canterbury would never have filed any complaints against Watkins and Watkins would still be screaming at people from his bench while waving his Bible.”

A federal civil rights complaint, filed by Hallburn against Kelly, was also rejected.

The West Virginia legislature proved inadequate for redress. Hallburn met with WV Senate Judiciary Chair Corey Palumbo, Senator Chris Walters and Delegates Tim Armstead, Brady Paxton, Josh Stowers (whose uncle handled Hallburn’s appeal) Jeff Eldridge, and Doug Skaff prior to and during the 2013 legislative session. None of them took the necessary action to reform the broken Mountain State Family Law system.

In the final order Kelly retaliated and stripped Hallburn of all overnight visits, continued to hold Matthew hostage in West Virginia by banning out-of-state trips, doubled Hallburn’s child support, and refused to provide him with a single cent of the $65,000 that he put into the marital home over 12 years. Kelly also ordered Hallburn to pay Dolores’ lawyer nearly $8,000 because Hallburn filed motions for Matthew to travel out-of-state and to visit his dying grandmother.

[image]
Putnam Circuit Judge Phillip M. Stowers
Hallburn appealed to Putnam Circuit Judge Phillip M. Stowers, who chipped away at Kelly’s audacious ruling and restored overnight visits (only every-other weekend) and allows Matthew to travel outside of West Virginia–but not overnight.

“The poor kid can’t go to Myrtle Beach, Disney World, or visit his family in California,” says Hallburn. “My niece is getting married in July, near Los Angeles, and Matthew cannot go.” “I was also forced to move back to West Virginia after having left the state, just so I could have my overnight visits with my son,” he added.

Hallburn appealed his case to the West Virginia Supreme Court June 5, 2013. It has been accepted for a hearing, but not until October. Meanwhile Mark and Matthew only get to see each other every other weekend and talk on the telephone for 10 minutes each Thursday night. And Hallburn has had to turn his whole life upside-down, moving back to West Virginia from after having moved to nearby South Carolina, just to have those every-other-weekend overnights.

[image]

One other thing: Judge Kelly wants Hallburn to come into his courtroom for a contempt hearing July 15, 2013, while Hallburn has already informed Kelly that he will be in California for his niece, Melissa’s wedding. In a further show of bias, Kelly moved the hearing from July 1, 2013, simply because Dolores, Hallburn’s ex-, will be on vacation.

Hallburn even filed a lawsuit against Kelly. But West Virginia Chief Justice Brent D. Benjamin refused to recuse Kelly despite this lawsuit. And the court has failed to set a hearing date for that lawsuit.

“If the suit isn’t heard, Kelly wins,” says Hallburn. “By not holding a hearing, the judges are protecting the misconduct of one of their own.”

West Virginia Courts have been called a Judicial Hellhole for years. AVfM’s extensive coverage of judge Lori B. Jackson of West Virginia has already made West Virginia famous for its corrupt Family Court judges. The mistreatment and abuse of Mark and Matthew Hallburn prove that nothing much has changed, and West Virginia appears to be full of corrupt, incompetent judges like Lori Betler Jackson and Michael Kelly.

Please expect further coverage of the case of judicial persecution of Hallburn here on AVfM, as Hallburn attempts to appeal all this and expose judicial misconduct in his home state to the world. Hallburn is working alone, unable to afford legal representation, against a massively corrupt system clearly filled with croneyism and collusion. But we will do our best to provide further updates on his case, including scrutinizing Justice Brent D. Benjamin and his role in all this, as well as quite a bit more about the general hijinx of the West Virginia legal establishment, with the hopes that some brave lawyer in West Virginia will be willing to step up and assist Hallburn against this machine that routinely grinds children and their fathers into hamburger.

AVfM is not done reporting on the persecution of little Matthew and his father Mark. Stay tuned.

Notes:

[1] The video linked insinuates certain things regarding Judge Watkins that the AVfM news team cannot confirm. It’s linked here in order to offer an overview on the Judge’s behavior in court.

Note: Thanks to Della Burton and Asha James for their fact-checking and contributions to this story. –DE

[NEWS]But what about teh wimminz

VFM News and Commentary · 8 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Women's Hour ~~Discusses~~ Dismisses Male Victims of Partner Violence

Host Jane Garvey prefaced the discussion on the issue of male victims of domestic violence by repeating rhetoric which has previously been disproved; the claim that women and girls are statistically more likely to be victims of domestic violence. Her guest, Jane Keeper, provided an explanation of how that rhetoric has been kept alive by women's advocates in the face of statistical evidence against it.

They simply dismiss some types of abuse as irrelevant, not worth counting as abuse.

> What it does is it counts incidents of somebody in the household being abusive or violent to somebody else, so if your stepdad's abusing you, if two brothers have had a fight, or anyone else in your household's had a dispute with anyone else, all of that wrapped up together, together with what most of us would consider to be domestic violence. It then counts what it calls incidents. An incident might be a slap, so somebody might say… uh, a husband might say, "Yes, my wife slapped me last year," just the same as it counts attempted murder…
>
> -Jane Keeper, directer of operations, Refuge

Translation: If we can consider the incident minor, it's not abuse. What if Jane's statement were just a little bit different, say, referring the words "husband" and "wife?" Would abuse victim's advocates still think a slap doesn't count as abuse?

Jane went on to cite the 5 incident standard as flawed, giving the existence of long term abuse as her reason, thus supporting the mantra "women have it worse" as an excuse for ignoring male victims.

The women went on to continue emphasizing attention to female victims, claiming that domestic violence differs from abuse based on context and impact, again using marginalization to excuse abuse that isn't extreme, and indicating by insinuation that this makes women the more common victims.

Only after that marginalizing introduction, was Ian, the male victim, permitted to tell his story, which directly contradicted the women's statements about the nature and scope of violence against men.

> My partner had manipulated and fractured relationships with friends and family which became… resulted in me becoming isolated, and at that precise moment, that's when the violence started, when she knew that she had isolated me from friends and family.

Asked about the first incident, Ian responded,

> The first assault was basically to hit me across the face with a hoover, and my head was like a rounders ball, and she split my cheek up, and there was complete shock, fear, no apology; for her, life just carried on as if it never happened.

That's a hell of a slap in the face!

Ian went on to explain that he'd had no one to turn to for help, and was totally controlled by his partner, his injuries ignored by everyone around him. Isolated and without any resource, he'd endured the abuse until 14 months later, when a neighbor anonymously tipped the police off to his situation. He challenged the statements made by female guests at the beginning of the show.

> The information is out there. I've obtained information from a number of police forces, under freedom of information requests, and it ranges between 1 in 4 and 1 in 5 victims are men.

The women, went on to admit that, due to the difficulty of obtaining assistance, male victimization must be under-reported, yet continued throughout the video to try to downplay female perpetration and male victimization, and turn the conversation back to emphasis on female victims, even in reply to Ian's stated concern that downplaying the experiences of male victims would discourage reporting and hamper the ability of abused men to obtain assistance.

With such a nonchalant display of bias against male victims of intimate partner violence airing on BBC radio, could it be simple coincidence that BBC management's mishandling of a 2012 sexual harassment complaint by BBC Journalist Russel Joslin led to his suicide?

[/box]

Girl Writes What on the Mary Kellett Hearing

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 9 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As you all know the Mary Kellett hearing has been set for the early morning of July 15th, monday of next week in Portland Maine. It's expected she's offering a plea to avoid a lengthy trial that might bring to light uncomfortable truths about the justice system in Maine.

Maine's Bar referred Kellett to the State Supreme Court after the Bar found her guilty of 9 counts of prosecutorial misconduct and conduct unbecoming an attorney. The original complaint that compelled the Bar to make this ruling against Kellett was her 2009 prosecution of Vladek Filler, during which Kellett withheld and concealed evidence in order to obtain a conviction. You can find more information about the Filler case here, here and here. [Need more? Do a search at A Voice For Men on Mary Kellett or Vladek Filler. Don't bother with the MSM, they aren't interested.]

The Violence Against Women Act contains grants to encourage mandatory arrest and prosecution policies, increased convictions, and harsher sentencing in cases where men are accused of violence against women. As a result, federal dollars are being made at the county level by railroading men with false allegations and this kind of prosecutorial misconduct.

When the law contains incentives to increase pursuit of these cases, with no safeguards to discourage malicious prosecution, corruption and tyranny is the inevitable result.

Malicious prosecution is destroying our freedom (actually mostly men's freedoms) and we're footing the bill for it.

But I've said enough, Take it away, Girl Write's What!

Editor's update: you can find info on where the hearing is right here: Hearing schedule.

[NEWS] Your neighbor's keeper

VFM News and Commentary · 9 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]Police in Nevada have apparently decided that domestic violence calls merit extreme measures, including violation of neighbors' constitutional rights.

Police Commandeer Homes, Get Sued

Police investigating a domestic violence call in Henderson, Nevada demanded that Anthony Mitchell vacate and make available his home for police use in the investigation.

When Anthony refused, officers stormed his house using a battering ram, shouted obscenities and pointed firearms at him, ordered him to the floor, shot him with pepperball rounds after he was down, and arrested him for obstruction.

> "Although plaintiff Anthony Mitchell was lying motionless on the ground and posed no threat, officers, including Officer David Cawthorn, then fired multiple 'pepperball' rounds at plaintiff as he lay defenseless on the floor of his living room. Anthony Mitchell was struck at least three times by shots fired from close range, injuring him and causing him severe pain." (Parentheses in complaint.)
> Officers then arrested him for obstructing a police officer, searched the house and moved furniture without his permission and set up a place in his home for a lookout, Mitchell says in the complaint.

Officers also unnecessarily shot his dog with pepperball rounds.

> "Plaintiff Anthony Mitchell's pet, a female dog named 'Sam,' was cowering in the corner when officers smashed through the front door. Although the terrified animal posed no threat to officers, they gratuitously shot it with one or more pepperball rounds. The panicked animal howled in fear and pain and fled from the residence. Sam was subsequently left trapped outside in a fenced alcove without access to water, food, or shelter from the sun for much of the day, while temperatures outside soared to over 100 degrees Fahrenheit."

Officers also approached Mitchell's parents, Michael and Linda Mitchell. Michael was asked to accompany officers to their 'command center' under the guise that the officers wanted his assistance in negotiating the surrender of the neighboring suspect, and then was arrested when he attempted to leave.

Officers entered the home of Michael and Linda Mitchell after being told by Linda that they could not do so without a warrant. They forcibly removed Linda from the home and searched it.

Anthony and Michael Mitchell were booked for obstructing an officer and jailed for 9 hours before being released on bail. All charges were dismissed with prejudice. None of the officers have faced discipline for their actions.

The Mitchell's complaint includes assault and battery, and violation of the 3rd amendment, which prohibits forced quartering of soldiers in citizens' homes during peace time, the 4th amendment's prohibition of unlawful search and seizure, and the 14th amendment's prohibition of the state from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

Law enforcement training on the handling of domestic violence reports is funded and guided by directives laid out in the Violence Against Women act, with further funding included in the Obama administration's stimulus bill, and even Obamacare. These guidelines include funding to encourage departments and counties to adopt mandatory arrest, prosecution, and sentencing policies.

Is this an extreme result of those policies, or have Nevada police gone beyond loose interpretation, and begun making it up as they go along?[/box]

AVFM News and Activism: Captain Capitalism

James Huff · 9 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Curious as to where your taxpayer dollars go? Ever wonder how feminism stimulates markets based on lies and corruption? Wonder what the future might hold for mens' earning power in this misandric society? How much money will feminists demand in ten or twenty years if the status-quot does not change?

Tonight we will feature Captain Capitalism, an economist and MRA. Our discussion will center around the economics of feminism, its effects on the State, and how continued funding of this odious ideology affects your bottom line. We will also discuss methods to pull the teeth out of this money hungry beast.

We will want to take calls during this show. Our number is 310-388-9709.

Show time is at 9pm Eastern time, 6pm Pacific. Which is 2am July 10th London time and 2pm July 10th Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Kellett's dominos need to fall

Editorial Staff · 9 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Word has reached editors of AVfM that a plea deal is forthcoming in the case of corrupt Bar Harbor Maine prosecutor Mary Kellett. We are not pleased by this deal and we urge legal authorities in Maine to reject it in favor of a full public airing of the charges against Kellett.

While a guilty plea might bring some small measure of satisfaction to Vladick Filler, we suspect that Kellett's corruption did not begin and end with his case, and indeed, all of Kellett's cases, regardless of their outcomes, deserve a full public review, and all the guilty pleas and verdicts obtained during and under Kellett's tenure as prosecutor should be thrown out.

We understand that, for the legal system in Maine, this would cause an expensive legal nightmare that could drag on for decades. Real justice, however, is not easy or cheap. A corrupt prosecutor can force the innocent to make otherwise unconscionable plea deals. A corrupt prosecutor can obtain faulty and unjust convictions. A lone defendant, facing the awesome power of the state, is in a bad enough situation already without the evil machinations of an evidence-hiding, man-hating ideologue behind the prosecutor's table.

The legal authorities of Maine have no one to blame except themselves for tolerating Kellett's antics for so long. The trail of unstable dominos built over the years by Kellett and those in her office need to start falling, and falling hard, on camera and in public, to send a clear message that Justice still matters in a culture that seems increasingly content to blame the innocent for the crimes of others.

Additionally, the people of Maine should demand, as the editors of AVfM do, an additional inquiry into the office of Kellett's supervisor, District Attorney Carletta Bassano, to determine her degree of complicity in Mary Kellett's malfeasance. Corruption usually starts at the top, and attempting to shield the District Attorney's office by cauterizing Kellett's crimes should be rejected by the people and authorities of Maine.

The world is watching.

[In October of last year JTO madethis impassioned rant and, in response, Suzanne said this:

> Suz
> JtO, thanks for this; it's perfect.
> My suggestion to every person reading this, is to link and/or copy and paste it in an email, or print it as snail mail, and send it to the Maine state legislature.
>
> http://www.maine.gov/legis/house/hcounty.htm#han
>
> This site has contact information for every member, including home emails, phone numbers, and addresses.
>
> Open it and spend an hour sending emails.

We here at AVfM are asking you to do just that right now. If you're in Maine, contact your state legislature, if you're outside of Maine, Hell, do it too.

And if you can get to Portland Maine, give JTO a shout at:

john@avoiceformen.com

We've managed to push this rock up to the top of the hill and if we manage just one more ounce of effort, it'll finally be over the crown and then there's no stopping it.

Just DO it!–AVfM Editors]

Men's Rights Edmonton under intense media spotlight after "Don't Be That Girl" poster enrages feminists

Robert O'Hara · 10 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

(July 10, 2013 Washington DC)

News outlets all over Canada including the Huffington Post and CBC are on fire covering a recent poster campaign waged by none other than Men's Rights Edmonton. The "Don't Be That Girl" poster (a parody of the now famous "Don't Be That Guy" campaign) was spotted by professor Lise Gotell, chair of the Department of Women's and Gender Studies, on Monday at the University of Alberta. She promptly alerted the campus police, who in an act of brazen censorship are taking down the posters, and contacted the local media. At last count there were over 20 major national and local sources reporting on the issue all just within the last 24 hours. The number of articles is expected to rise.

"What they've done is they've taken four of the posters we created and they've manipulated them," Gotell said reporting to the Edmonton Journal.

"These posters, I think, are quite troubling … What's been done to transform an anti-sexual-assault campaign into a rape-apologist campaign is just deeply offensive."

She did not explain how the poster was "manipulated" in an attempt to create a "rape apologist" campaign or even why the posters were offensive. She did however intimate that the posters could possibly be a violation of copyright laws.

"My position is that this demands some kind of a legal response. There are clear intellectual property issues," Gotell said. "When someone has manipulated our images to disseminate such an offensive message, of course, we should respond to this in a very clear way."

Kristopher Wells, of the University of Alberta's Institute for Sexual Minority Studies and Services, said of the then unknown Men's Rights Edmonton: "They're obviously not supported by any organization,"

Other groups were very quick to make statements to the press as well. "I want to make it clear that that is so inaccurate," said Karen Smith, executive director of the Sexual Assault Centre of Edmonton to CBC news. "It just doesn't happen. Nobody would report sexual assault needlessly because it is a grueling process to go through."

Even Alberta Town Council member and Mayoral Candidate Don Iveson condemned the Don't Be That Girl messages.

"It's not funny and it's cowardly," Iveson said in an interview with The Province. "If there's someone who wants to debate these issues, a real person who wants to debate these issues, they should come out and we should be talking about sexual assault in Edmonton, because it's a real issue. It's one of our crime indicators that's rising, and it's very troubling. The tactics are cowardly and the issue is not a laughing matter" he continued.

Contrary to Ivenson's assertions, Men's Rights Edmonton has been frantically at work talking to news sources hungry for information about the group. A member of the group said in an interview with AVFM News that they had been responding to many requests from the media in the last 24 hours. "Basically we have had media people calling us all day and asking 'what are you guys all about, what are you all doing, what are you hoping to achieve with this campaign?'" he said. "Thus far I have spoken to Global Edmonton, City TV, 630 Ched, C TV, Metro and I've left messages with CBC and we are going to be on 770 Talk Radio's "The Rob Breakenridge Show" When asked about the charge of cowardice and unwillingness to debate in public he responded, "It's interesting that they say that because that's what men's rights groups have been trying to do. But look at what happened at the University of Toronto and that didn't work out so good. It resulted in feminists bringing bludgeons, disrupting the event, and pulling fire alarms. Every time we try to meet these people and have a discussion in public the response is juvenile and idiotic, and they attempt to censor discussion and inhibit free speech."

Karen Straughan, AKA "Girl Writes What", spokesperson for Men's Rights Edmonton and contributing editor of AVfM, plans to produce a video statement and is expected to appear on a local morning radio talk show. All this in addition to a formal statement soon to be published on the Men's Rights Edmonton website.

Editorial note: These events are, by far, the most widely covered men's rights efforts by the media to date. For the next several days members of Men's Rights Edmonton and by extension the broader MHRM will have exposure they have never had before. It is important that those reading this post contact the above mentioned news sources and educate them about our movement in order to strike the iron while hot. Below are links to other articles concerning this issue and their numbers are growing by the hour. Lets keep it going, shall we!!!! [/box] http://globalnews.ca/news/706030/dont-be-that-girl-posters-in-edmonton-spark-outrage/

http://www.calgaryherald.com/news/alberta/Parody+anti+rape+posters+offensive+says+professor/8640266/story.html

http://www.theprovince.com/news/rape+culture+flourishing+Edmonton+Poster+campaign+suggests+women+report+rape+revenge/8638237/story.html

http://www.edmontonjournal.com/news/Parody+anti+rape+posters+offensive+says+professor/8637809/story.html http://oncampus.macleans.ca/education/2013/07/10/edmonton-anti-rape-groups-poster-campaign-co-opted/

http://www.inews880.com/news/edmonton/story.aspx?ID=2001762

http://www.babble.com/mom/dont-be-that-girl-posters-prove-we-need-to-talk-about-coercion-and-consent/http://ca.news.yahoo.com/blogs/dailybrew/edmonton-anti-rape-parody-posters-called-appalling-offensive-190557450.html http://www.huffingtonpost.ca/2013/07/09/dont-be-that-girl-posters_n_3570282.html

http://o.canada.com/2013/07/10/dont-be-that-girl-posters-edmonton-anti-rape/

http://www.leaderpost.com/news/Rape+apologist+parodies+That+posters+Edmonton/8638284/story.

You will be next, then your children

John Hembling (JtO) · 10 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Between 2005 and 2007, the US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales dismissed or reviewed for dismissal more than 26 US Attorneys. To many observers, including me, these firings appeared motivated by desire to install attorneys more loyal to the Republican party or as retribution for actions out of step with the party. Gonzales's actions had the appearance of making supposedly non-political justice branch of government into simply another tool of party politics.

Gonzales was called before the senate judiciary committee, and questioned on his motivations for these dismissals. And this is where government retains it's legitimacy, by demonstrating accountability to the public. The public whose informed choice is the basis for governance in a democratic system. Except that's not what happened. Alberto Gonzales stonewalled the senate judiciary committee, repeating variations of the phrase "I don't recall" hundreds of times, and thereby, flatly refusing to answer any question except with theatrical amnesia. It was an amazing performance. He didn't stutter, he didn't sweat, he was never flustered. As he was grilled for weeks by the chair of the senate judiciary committee, Arlin Spectre, Gonzales just smirked and repeated "I don't recall".

I watched the C-span coverage of these hearings as they proceeded, and they impressed on me a terrible realization. There is no accountability. Then-president G.W. Bush had been pursuing war in Afghanistan and Iraq with an obviously fraudulent mandate. He'd seemed to win his re-election by fraud as well. He'd also succeeded in trashing more of the american bill of rights than any president before him, all while the mainstream sold their criticism of his administration as one coloured by incompetence. Bush appeared to get more done in service of the agenda of his corporate and financial masters than any president in my lifetime. Until the guy who came after him, obviously.

In 2007 I was struck by the fact that the head of the justice branch of government was, rather than a man of law, simply a policy operative of the executive branch of war-president George's government. In fact, he was an untouchable, openly corrupt, smug, unruffled, and apparently taking his fashion sense from Martin Scorsese mobster films.

But in a culture where the highest and the final apparatus of redress of grievance is totally, openly and flagrantly corrupt – where is any pathway of justice? What is the mechanism for a citizen in such a system for redress of crime by the powerful?

The simple answer is that, in such a system there is no legitimate path for justice. This is not a problem for the reason that the everyday citizen will be victimized by the powerful. This is a problem because societies adapt, and redress of grievance will find a pathway with or without a legitimate apparatus of justice.

Realizing this in 2007, I speculated on the possible realization of Thomas Jefferson's apocryphal advice on tree husbandry. Elected representatives dragged by citizens from their offices and executed on the front lawns of legislatures is a future I will do almost anything to prevent. But, I see it coming.

In 2011, a man named Thomas James Ball was so brutalized by the corruption of the family court in New Hampshire that in a final desperate act of protest, he went to the steps of the courthouse, doused himself in gasoline and set himself on fire. It took him several minutes to die.

And besides a few marginal voices on the far fringes, nobody even noticed. BusinessInsider was one of the few places covering Ball's protest which took the form of death by fire.

"Late last week [June 2011], Thomas James Ball reached his breaking point. Driven to desperation by a system that bankrupted him and destroyed his family, Ball walked up to the main door of the Keene County, New Hampshire courthouse, doused himself with gasoline, and lit himself ablaze.
Hardly anyone seems to have noticed."

But Thomas James Ball didn't just burn himself to death in a public protest of the court's corruption. He also wrote a detailed account of his reasons and his grievances. The mainstream media, those few who even bothered to cover an American self immolating in protest of the corrupt court system – dismissed his public letter with the words "rambling and incoherent". You can read it yourself, and judge whether Mr Ball's final statement is coherent or not. But when Paul Elam and I decided to re-publish Thomas James Ball's final letter to the world, we also decided to omit the specific instructions he included of the manufacture of gasoline bombs, and the use of those devices to burn court houses and other government buildings to the ground.

What Ball called for in 2011 what what I saw coming in 2007. But he didn't follow his own call to action, instead, turning his grief and frustration inward onto himself rather than outwards onto the irretrievably corrupt apparatus of his local family court.
But the scant, dismissive coverage Ball received in the mainstream was itself an anomaly. Setting aside his death in the most desperate and earnest act of protest a human can undertake – Thomas Ball's story of abuse by a corrupt system was not unique. It was common. So common that the story of "father chewed up, family destroyed, children abused by the corrupt courts" is almost a constant background noise in our culture's ongoing narrative. How many more men have done exactly what Mr Ball did. That is to say, how many more each year have doused themselves in gasoline and died in self-ignited fires in protest of corrupt courts and family courts. It's more than just Thomas Ball.

In 2007, I speculated that there might be no correction without justice finding a path in the form of public, impromptu executions, or redress of grievance through violent direct action. And I still see it coming. Incidentally, anybody who cites this article as an advocation of such a violent outcome I will now pre-emptively address as a Depraved and Futile, lying idiot-fuck.

The mainstream media is obviously apathetic and complicit. "Journalists" care more about retaining the favour of those who provide them access than anything as obsolete as journalism. For the corrupt and powerful there is no accountability. But this has to change, because the natural consequence of this is worse and more dystopian than anybody is prepared for.

For the corrupt and powerful who prey on the everyday citizen, there is no accountability. But prior to October of 2012, no district attorney or assistant district attorney had ever been recommended for disbarment by a board of overseers of the bar. Enter Bar Harbour Maine's assistant district attorney Mary Kellet.

In October last year she was found by a the state of Maine's board of overseers of the bar to be guilty of prosecutorial misconduct. Among the violations were engaging in conduct unworthy of an attorney, suppressing exculpatory evidence, tampering with witnesses. In its decision, the Bar Panel cited Assistant DA Kellett's failure to turn over at "least two key pieces of exculpatory evidence" which were "critical" to a defendant's case, rampant discovery violations, and efforts to mislead and deceive the jury about facts and evidence. The seriousness of Kellett's misconduct, the Panel of the overseers of the Main Bar wrote, "cannot be overstated". The panel also recommended that Kellett's licence to practice law be suspended.

But since then, Mary Kellet has faced no consequence, she retains her licence to practice law, she is still the assistant district attorney, and her colleagues and superiors are doing a sterling job of circling their wagons to protect her, and themselves from any accountability or additional public oversight.

Last week, with just over a week of notice, the date and location of a hearing was announced where it is rumoured that assistant District attorney Mary Kellett will be making a plea deal. She'll be keeping her law licence, keeping her job, and going back to business as usual, prosecuting the innocent for her own satisfaction and for her office's profit. And it will all likely pass quietly, without the attention of any media, in less than a week.

Now, to be fair, following the public call for citizen-journalism from AVfM, one or two private individuals might attend, and report on it through this site. If they can be bothered to. And when the next family is demolished by an out of control, no-brakes, no accountability court system driven by money and ideology, maybe it will be you, or somebody you love in the grinder.

You can go back to sleep now. Thank you for your kind attention.

Editor's note: Hearing schedule here.–DE

Prone to violence: chapter two

Erin Pizzey · 10 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: We are pleased to have obtained permission to reprint Erin Pizzey's classic book, Prone to Violence*, first published in 1982. This book is a must-read on the subject of domestic violence, and is what people from the former Soviet Union would call "samizdat," as the book was subjected to concerted campaigns to make it unavailable for publication or distribution in the UK or United States. Over 30 years ago, gender ideologues were already trying to hide the truth–that men and women are equally prone to violence. Although parts of this book are dated, what's most shocking is how fresh and timely most of it still is: little has changed in the last 30 years, except that the vast majority of peer-reviewed scientific research done since its publication has only bolstered all of Erin's most salient points. When it comes to domestic violence, women and men are about as violent as each other, just in somewhat different ways, and its primary victims are children.*

We continue our series with the second chapter of "Prone To Violence." Watch for the other chapters to be published here on AVfM. If you have ever been involved in an abusive relationship with a woman (or man for that matter), you owe it to yourself to read this book. And if you know someone who is, or has been, in such a relationship, you owe it to them to get them to read it. –DE

Chapter Two: IS IT LOVE OR IS IT ADDICTION?

Olga sat by the window in the small office* of the Refuge. The prosecution for overcrowding had recently been successful, and though we had won at Acton Magistrates' Court on a technicality, we had lost at the High Court. We were given leave to apply to the House of Lords. The numbers in the Refuge were still well over the limit: most days we averaged seventy to eighty mothers and their children in only nine rooms. The conditions were chaotic, but this chaos, I was beginning to realise, contributed to the feeling of excitement in the community.

As I looked at Olga I thought to myself that if we had closed the door, she would now be one of the ones on the outside. She had a badly scarred face, but must have been a very attractive woman before she had been repeatedly beaten. Now there were ledges of scar-tissue over her eyes, and her nose was a curious shape. But when she smiled, her face lit up with such life that everyone around her relaxed and smiled at each other. She had come to us, she said, because she was in fear of her life from her boyfriend Jim. I soon knew this was no exaggeration, because the day after she arrived I had a phone call from her local police inspector asking if she was there. Jim had yet again reported her missing, and the inspector was worried because he considered Jim so dangerous that he was prepared to order his men to dig up their back garden if she could not be found. "He will kill her," the Inspector warned, "if she doesn't stay away from him."

He sounded genuinely concerned about her. We chatted for a while and I tried to explain to him that Olga did not "like" what was happening to her, nor did she "deserve it", but she was bound to Jim by forces that she could not understand. He listened to me very patiently, then after I had finished he asked if I had any idea how much she had cost the local taxpayers. Apparently, he explained, every social agency in that small city had been channelling its energies into the Olga/Jim relationship for twenty years. I could believe it. Here again was a situation I had come to recognise in most of the families that came to us.

By this time I was beginning to feel sure that behind a woman's attraction to the drama and excitement of a violent lifestyle, there must be an even more compelling need to go back to a particular man. Olga's four children had been taken into care years ago, so that could not be claimed as the reason for her not leaving him. Subsequently I sat down with her, and we talked for two and a half hours. When we finished, I had a much clearer picture of why she put herself in a position to be abused. She had never made the connection for herself, because no one had bothered to delve back far enough into her childhood. To be fair to all the people who had tried to deal with Olga she was capable of putting up such a smokescreen of demands and drama that it would be difficult for anyone to comprehend or handle the situation. Usually, when she demanded help, her unsuspecting helpers would soon find themselves drawn into a life-and-death battle between Olga and Jim.

Olga was born in Scotland. Her grandfather was a Bible-thumping Puritan bigot. The family lived in a small village, and Olga's mother was the only girl in a large family of boys. The beatings, always for religious reasons, did not spare her. The leather strap hung behind the door, both at home and at school. By the time she attended school, she was well used to the pain of it across her legs and buttocks. If Olga's mother was alive today, she would probably be able to describe the moment when she first realised that, on the knife-edge of pain, it is possible to experience the sickly, evil glimmer of pleasure.

When pain and pleasure become inextricably mixed in early childhood, as they did in the case of Olga's mother, the result is a badly abused and abusing human being. By the time Olga's mother was sixteen, she was sexually involved with a local lout who got her pregnant. Olga was the result of that union. The horror and outrage of her family were expressed in a series of beatings, which, though physically crippling, had become by now such a normal pattern of family life that they were the prime method of communication. Olga was born the only illegitimate child in the village. Her grandfather, who raged weekly from the pulpit of the local church, refused to let her be christened. She grew up with no friends: an outcast, a pariah. The only message she received from all corners of her little world was "It would have been better if you were never born". That message, so often repeated by her mother, formed the bedrock of Olga's personality. She should never have existed. Her existence was an offence against her community, her family, her mother and most terrifying of all, her God.

Olga, too, was regularly beaten in this God-fearing family. And she does remember the first moments when pain evolved into pleasure. She was five, she thinks, and her mother removed her knickers and made her bend over her knee. She had not done anything very bad, so she was being smacked by hand, rather than strapped with the tawse. As usual, she felt a tremendous sense of fear and anxiety before bending over, but the difference this time was that as the pain in its crescendo reached its highest pitch, she suddenly felt a warm surge of tingling pleasure suffusing her whole body.

Olga was amazed and dreadfully embarrassed. Soon she began to look for that pleasure in further beatings. So she would definitely provoke her mother, and that was not difficult. She would fight at school until they whipped her and blood ran down her legs. "The Devil's in her," the teachers would tell her mother. Her uncles mostly lived at home. Two, she remembers, were silent and withdrawn. The other three were noisy and violent, and one of them often tried to molest her.

Olga's life was well documented by countless agencies by the time she ended up in my office, but this discussion of her need for pain to find pleasure was not something she had ever talked to anyone about before. That sense of shame and embarrassment had stayed with her all her life. She had not even discussed it with Jim. In our time together, we began to look at her life from a completely different perspective. By this time, I had sat through hundreds of interviews with women who described the same feelings. It was becoming clear to me that the difference between a non-violent woman and a violent woman is that a non-violent woman can get into a relationship with a man who is violent, and love the man but hate his violence. A violence-prone woman will look for a violent man with whom she will hate the man but cling to his violence.

By the time Olga met Jim, she was climaxing in pain. Sexual intercourse was meaningless to her. Jim was, quite simply, the most extreme, the most violent man she had ever met. "He will kill me", she would say to me, and the awful prospect of her death would cause her face to glow. "How will he kill you?" I would ask her. "Like this," she would say, putting her hands round her throat and squeezing her neck until her face became bloated and her eyes bulged.

Usually, Olga would stay with us for just three or four days, and then would go back to her own battleground. Months later she would be back on the doorstep again – thinner, with more bruises, and more stories. Then we would sit together and talk through this terrible addiction. By now, I refused to allow her to use the word "love" in the context of this hideous sexual abuse. Again and again, we would go back to two central issues: her death-wish, a goal set for her by her rejecting family and community; and her addiction to pain, learned from her early childhood.

As I write Olga's story down, I hear from Scotland that she has left Jim again after being stabbed by him. No doubt, we shall see her at some point. She and Jim cannot live with each other, but they cannot live without each other. They are two badly abused and assaulted human beings endlessly acting out their past damage. It won't stop until one or the other of them gets killed. The remaining partner will then look for another violent relationship, and it will all start over again. It was painful to listen to Olga, for I knew that listening was probably all I could do. It was almost too late for her to change.

At least Olga's children were safe, and they no longer lived in the constant torment of her and Jim's life together – they were already in care. I found it far more painful listening to Rose, because she still had her children with her. Her children had no choice but to experience and witness the violence that Rose was addicted to. Violence-prone men and women, though conditioned to need violent relationships, can still choose to leave their abusive relationships. Their children, however, have no say, no choice. They are indeed the innocent victims of violence.

Rose came into the Refuge like a tremendous whirlwind. She was tall and dark, with what we call "adrenalin-high eyes". They were so filled with energy they transfixed anyone who met her. She had two very active little boys in tow (she had left her little girl at her mother's). She launched into details of how her husband had sodomised her in front of the children. As she talked, the boys both nodded like two little old men watching yet another horror movie. I sent them out of the room. "They see it all anyway", she said, uncomprehending. "I know they do," I replied, "but your first lesson from me is that it isn't all right to fight and fuck in front of children."

In our first interview she wanted to show me a picture of her dad. My heart sank. Countless times had I seen those brutal, sexually abusing men, standing proudly in the family photographs. Clustered around him were the children; at the back of the photo was the wispy mouse of her mother, worn and thin. Clutching him by the hand with an unmistakable air of possessiveness was our Rose. Within a few minutes, Rose raised her skirt to show me the faint white scars that latticed her legs. He was a huge handsome man, her father, and something of an expert with a thin cane, which he used on all the children, but mainly on his favourite daughter. Rose explained that when she got out of a hot bath the scars still flared again; and she said it all with such force. The sexual charge she experienced while telling about him now brought her whole body alive.

She did not get married until after her father died. Then she met a man, Ron, who "reminded" her of dad. Of course, that was a disaster: he was not her father, and was not sufficiently violent to satisfy her need for pain. Rose was dreadfully hard work for us because she had been brought up half-saint, half-whore. Yet this happens to so many women, particularly Catholic women: they are beaten and molested at home, then expected to attend church every Sunday. No outsider would ever have guessed that Rose was anything other than a devoted wife and mother. She was always immaculately dressed, and her children were little models in public.

Once they were settled in the Refuge, however, the children soon took over. Rose's method of control had been to beat them into good behaviour, so once her boys discovered that there was no hitting of children permitted in the Refuge, they went wild. Fortunately the play staff already knew well that battered children addicted to pain will provoke and provoke, waiting for the release of tension which a thumping brings. So the staff were trained to reverse the process. They would grasp the shrieking, struggling child firmly but gently until the child calmed down and discovered the, often first-time, pleasure of being held and caressed. Rose was amazed at our concept of child-care; she would beat her children when they were out of line, as a matter of course. I had some American stickers reading "People are not for hitting, and children are people too," which I used to stick on kids' jumpers to remind our battering mothers that they must learn other ways of communication with their children.

We found Rose a model member of the community during the day, but once the staff went home, Rose went out to play. Unfortunately Rose's games were extremely dangerous, particularly if she had a lot to drink. Her pattern was to begin an evening in the pub by attracting men to her table. Then, after a lot of good-natured sexual joking around, she would start drinking shorts which grew larger and larger as the men filled her glass. She usually wore very low-cut dresses and short skirts to display her excellent figure. One of her frequent acts was then to dance her version of the can-can on the table, with no knickers on. Although this was much enjoyed by the attendant men, the manager would inevitably try to stop her. Thereupon a fight ensued, with Rose joining in. The next morning a hung over Rose would sit in the office completely denying any responsibility. It was a totally unprovoked attack by the pub manager upon her innocent person. “Holy Mary, mother of God, would I tell a lie?” she would say to me.

The truth is she was not lying, and I learned that years ago. People from emotionally disabled families have no permanent reality. In order to develop a stable and permanent reality for a central reference point in your relationship to the world about you, you must have permanent and stable parenting, at least until you are five. Rose’s life, like so many others, was a sequence of events that occurred chaotically and made no impression on her memory. Memory can only exist when there is a structure to hang it on. Our problem families have no permanent structures to their lives. Instead their lives are dictated by violent events, and they organise their living around cataclysmic eruptions.

Getting Rose to share our view of what really happened during her binges necessitated seeing that other women were with her to tell her the next day about the event. Though it was painful for her to accept the side of herself she so deeply hated, she came to understand that we loved her anyway. The hours previously spent in social workers’ offices had only succeeded in making her feel more lonely and isolated. She fooled everyone so completely that she had no one to turn to. The only person she did not fool was her husband, who knew both sides of her and was hopelessly addicted to her violence.

Ron’s mother had been a forceful, emotional, ebullient woman. She had died when he was about ten, and Ron went into a children’s home. Her death was an act of betrayal, as far as he was concerned. Like so many other mothers, she had made her son Ron into her fairy prince. Bored with her husband, who was wedded to the television set and to his friends at the pub, she turned to Ron for companionship and spoiled him. Meanwhile his two sisters, who were second-class citizens in their mother’s eyes, were expected to help her clean and cook. It was the sort of family life you could expect to find behind millions of front doors. The boy, gradually taking over the role of head of the family, was encouraged by his mother but resented by his father. Her sudden death left Ron outraged: his grief and fury at her leaving him went deep into his heart. At times his rage was murderous, but he learned to suppress its visible outburst at his children’s home. Instead he learned to channel that rage into controlling his environment. He was fastidiously neat: by keeping everything ordered, he could order his rage. His great fear was that one day he might erupt, and then he would avenge himself for his mother’s death and would totally explode with his rage.

At the children’s home he was not particularly badly treated, but rather largely ignored. Eventually he went on to qualify as an engineer, and proved himself a regular and hard-working man. When he met Rose at a friend’s house, it was love at first sight. What actually happened was that Rose, afraid of her own chaos, was attracted to Ron’s apparent order. She also sensed his potentially murderous rage, and this attracted her sexually. Ron, with his need to order chaos to contain his rage, was attracted to all that Rose flaunted. When he was near her, he felt alive for the first time since his mother died. He was hooked. He could not wait to marry her. For Rose he was a good prospect: he earned good money, and they were able to buy their own house.

Rose was extremely extravagant, and she soon had the place looking like a palace, with most of the buying done on hire-purchase. Ron had to do a lot of overtime to keep up. Sexually he found himself completely enthralled. He had very little experience of sex because his children’s home was for boys only. He was shy anyway with only a few unsatisfactory affairs behind him. For the first two years of marriage, things were not too bad. Rose was sexually very demanding and sometimes this frightened him; occasionally he wondered if she was acting out some dramatic part in a film. She also worried him when they were out drinking with friends, because she would sometimes change and become raucous and suggestive.

The first time they had a serious fight was when Rose told Ron that one of his friends had suggested she run away with him. The pain of that moment linked into the pain of his “betrayal” by his mother. At the time he kept quiet because they were in the pub, but when they got home he was shaking with rage. They were hardly into the hall before he lashed out and sent her sprawling. But Rose had also been drinking, and got to her feet and began to scream at him. A dreadful torrent of filthy abuse poured from her mouth. Then the two of them suddenly stopped: he shocked by his physical attack; she snapped back into her wife-and-mother role. But the honeymoon was over, and everything started to go from bad to worse.

Rose became pregnant soon after this event, which meant she had to give up her job at a betting shop. But while she had the excitement of laughing and teasing with the customers, she could at least channel a lot of her enormous energy into her work. Once tied to home with a small baby, she went into a deeper depression. Actually, it was the fact of being trapped at home with a man who could not understand her or her needs that finally, after her second child, started off the pattern of picking up the children and running.

The children had become used to the fighting and screaming and crying. At times the older boy tried to protect his mother by throwing himself at his father, flailing at him with his little thin arms. He became hyperactive and violent at school. He could not contain the surges of hatred he felt towards his father. He could not understand why his mother would continually leave and run off to friends' houses, only to come back again. Over the six years of his short life he acquired a cynical and hard shell to protect himself from the awful pain of watching her cry. "Why can't we go away?" he would persistently ask her, seeing huge bruises on her face. So they would go, usually after yet another fight, either at night while Ron was in a drunken stupor, or during the day when he was at work.

It became a cat-and-mouse game. After a fight, he would worry that Rose might leave with the children, so he would take time off or suddenly pop home unexpectedly. Leaving became a very tense and dramatic event. It all fell into a pattern of drinking, fighting, Rose running, Ron pursuing with chocolates, flowers and phone-calls; then a reunion. And then it would begin all over again. Ron was mystified when I discussed it with him. "But I love her," he said, while trying to explain the depth of his hatred for himself. "We have everything we need to be happy." That was certainly true. They were a handsome couple with two lovely sons, a daughter and a beautiful house. Ron earned good money and Rose was popular in her neighbourhood. On the surface they were a successful couple, but underneath it all was a hornet's nest.

The fight that first brought her to me was the end of several weeks of bickering and tension. Rose had finally been warned by yet another set of relations that she could no longer expect to burst into their lives, exhaust them with stories of Ron's cruelty, then rush into his arms again and return home, only to come back later for more sympathy. She had joined the hundreds of families who troop through homeless family units and pop in and out of refuges, using these places as an extra dimension in the war against their husbands. Most of the tension here was to do with Rose's need for pain and Ron's need for rage. Making love had long been abandoned, and no wonder. The relationship between them had little to do with loving each other. It was actually to do with hate, fear, rage and violence.

Emotionally disabled people have to be taught love. It requires a great deal of security to be able to give yourself on trust to another human being. These two people were only able to use sex as a relief mechanism when one or other of them felt sexual tension, but that only brought more problems, as the residue of physical relief without tenderness or affection was a bitter sense of loneliness and further isolation. The problem was that Ron, because he had had at least some good parenting, was capable of a fairly healthy sex life, but Rose could only climax in pain.

At this stage Rose had not identified this need in herself. She saw the fighting and the very violent sexual sessions as manifestations of Ron's cruelty to her. It is true that Ron was by now drinking heavily. Rose would drink in bouts. The children knew that when Rose's voice became slow and precise, it was time to get out of the way. There was little they could do to shut out the sounds of the two bodies heaving and thrashing about the bedroom, or the groans and the moans which made it difficult to distinguish between agony and ecstasy. After a particularly violent sexual episode they would both be ashamed of themselves. Ron would tell Rose she was a disgusting old whore. Rose would be genuinely hurt and bewildered. Slowly Rose would need more and more pain as the ability to climax moved further and further away.

There came a time when they had been tormenting each other for days. The taunting and the jeering excited both of them and built up tension until Rose started screaming at Ron in the passage. Finally he threw her on the floor on her face in a rugby tackle, pinned her with his knees on the back of her legs, tore her clothes off, and split her anus with the first thrust. Her screams brought the children downstairs. There was blood everywhere. Ron curled up in a ball and was sick. The climax of the pair was now over, and Rose was in dreadful agony. She dragged herself to the bathroom and attempted to clean herself up. And she arrived at the Refuge the next day.

"Never again…I'll never go near him…never. This time it's finished." I had listened to this whole story, and I felt a tremendous sympathy for a whole family so horribly trapped in their circle of violence, but I felt physically sick – so I had to go out of the office. Mike Dunne, who worked beside me for so many years, sensed what had gone on; God knows, we had seen thousands of families together. So he gave me a big warm hug, and I was able to go back and comfort her, too. I knew this was not the end of her relationship with Ron. "It's finished" – I had heard those words so often before. Battered women who come to a refuge to sincerely get out of their violent relationships will talk about their future. They very quickly give up their pasts. However, women like Rose, who are still locked into these relationships, use the words of leaving for ever…for good…never again…like a litany. In their heads they recognise the danger and degradation of these relationships, but they are addicted to the excitement and drama that go with them.

Predictably she was on the phone to him by that evening. There was a huge bunch of flowers by the morning. She was pleased. The boys looked at me – two pairs of cynical eyes.

They were beginning to hate her now. Already they looked at all the women in the refuge with loathing and contempt. "Slags, whores, cunts," they would scream at the other mothers if anyone upset them. Then Ron was on the doorstep. We talked to him about their problem, about how he and Rose were on a slippery slope which could, at worst, end up with one of them dead – though it was more likely that their lives would slide in a gradual decline to where they would become hopelessly addicted to alcohol, giving them an excuse for the release of their violent needs for each other. Then, after the money ran out, Ron would find himself in prison, and Rose would be relegated to a mental hospital to be treated for drink. The children would go into care. The family might then be briefly reunited for several months of semi-stability, but they would soon degenerate again.

By this time there would be case files and conferences involving their doctor, health visitors, probation officer, social worker, hospital social worker, borough solicitors. All the case workers would have a little information to contribute, mostly reflecting the to's and fro's of the various members of the family. Yet still nothing would be understood about the violent needs of these desperate people. By the time the boys were fourteen or fifteen, they would have girlfriends pregnant – and therefore they would receive accommodation and social security. Two more babies would join the rapidly growing army of the emotionally disabled. Unloved and unloving, they would inherit the mantle of violence that is passed from one generation to another – the mark of Cain.[1]

By now I found that I was more and more drawn to the concept of these violent relationships being actually a form of addiction. Moira once explained to me why she stayed with Mike – Mike, who was so dangerous that he had knifed her between the ribs and put her into an intensive-care unit; Mike, who had so nearly run her down; Mike, who had stubbed out his cigarettes on her breasts and stomach while he pinned her to the ground. But she always went back to him, and each time she conceived another child. I think it must need a lorry by now to cart round all the documents recording the history of this family.

Moira is a wanderer, and in between bouts with Mike she, like so many others, stays in various homeless family hostels or refuges. She then gets allotted a flat in a new town and a grant to furnish it; she installs her kids in school, and orders from her mail-order catalogues. She is such a good hustler that before long she has £3000 to £4000 worth of goods delivered from masses of different catalogues. Then, when it's all in, she sells off the lot to neighbours and second-hand shops, and flits with the kids back to Mike, if she feels like it, or to yet another homeless family unit. When she was with us she became the life and soul of the Refuge, and all the staff loved her. But she liked to taunt Mike over the phone. She would ask him to come over and see the kids, but when he arrived she would be out, taking the kids with her.

On one occasion, when she had made yet another such arrangement which left him raging on our doorstep, I asked him why he did not just forget her. I warned him that they both had a “till-death-us-do-part” relationship, and it looked to me highly likely that one of his onslaughts would eventually finish her off. Then the kids would go into care and he would go to jail. Although he agreed, it was hopeless talking to him. He just kept repeating that he loved her and wanted her back. “How can you say you love someone when you torture her?” I asked. “In the hospital after the last baby, you screwed her on the balcony and split all her stitches”. “She wanted it as well,” he said. There was no getting through to him. Moira eventually came back and found him there, and I saw the confusion on the children’s faces as they struggled to understand the violent and perverted world of their parents. Now Mike was crying and promising to take them home. This was the same Mike who went berserk and smashed their toys and beat their mother to a pulp.

“Why do you do it, Moira?” I persevered in exasperation. “Why do you need to get killed?” If I’ve asked a woman that question once, I’ve asked a thousand times, and each time the answer is roughly the same. In this case Moira thought for a few moments, then said “It’s the moment just before he hits me”.

It is hard to explain this need to people from non-violent backgrounds. The best way to explain it probably is to ask you to imagine a moment in your life when you are in mortal danger. Suddenly you find you are super-human. You deal with the situation perfectly. Maybe you rescue a child from in front of a car. Maybe you pull someone out of a burning house. Then after the event your knees collapse, you are shaking, and you go into a state of shock. What happened to you is that you put yourself on red alert. You perceived danger, and the message flashed from your brain to all the nerve centres of the body. Chemicals in the body alerted the system to a state of high arousal. You rose to the occasion. You were literally high on your own body chemicals. When the danger had passed, your chemical levels dropped dramatically, and the body suffered immediate withdrawal symptoms.

Once the danger is over, most people go back to normal, but not the violence-prone personality. This is the child that became addicted to its own body chemicals from babyhood. Probably it will one day be discovered that such children were addicted even before birth, when they were in the womb. Their entire system is constantly awash with the chemical of high arousal, as scarcely a day goes by without a violent family episode. Soon the body becomes so used to this feeling of the chemical rush that unconsciously the child looks for dangerous situations to provide it.

For Moira her high, the moment when she felt totally alive, was the point when she had so enraged Mike that he was about to hit her. She was only twenty-six, and in time her pain threshold would rise, and she would need more pain just before the blow, and she, too, like the others, might go down that dreadful road to death.

A woman named Gemma described to me how her pain threshold had become so high that she did not even feel the pain of having her finger broken. This is a transcript from one of my tapes, when she had just arrived and put her baby in my arms.

GEMMA: My finger won’t go straight.

ERIN: Why?

GEMMA: Because he bent it right back. He didn’t do it on purpose. I don’t think, mind. Because I couldn’t tell, you see, at the time, of course. He sort of went like that (She demonstrated his pulling the finger back. I cringed, imagining my own pain) and I couldn’t tell whether he broke it or not, because I didn’t go to the hospital.

ERIN: Yes, it is broken. You see, as a battered child, you’ve been used to quite a lot of pain.

GEMMA: Yes.

ERIN: (Seeing a horrible bruise on her thigh) I would scream blue murder if anybody kicked me like that. My God, I’d go to hospital.

GEMMA: Yes, I know. I’m used to it quite. Nothing really hurts anymore. I’ve been through it all, and it just doesn’t hurt anymore.

ERIN: How bad did that kick hurt?

GEMMA: It didn't hardly hurt at all. I went like that, "Aah!" and I, you know, just kept thinking there's something else, and then it just went away.

All the staff at Chiswick had noticed that many of the injuries inflicted on our women coming in would have put most people into hospital for weeks. I think I first realized this many years ago, when a CID officer's wife came in with broken ribs. Not only had he broken her ribs, but he had also made her sit on a chair and poured a kettle of boiling water over her lap. She had huge blisters between her legs. He did all this in front of her six-year-old daughter. She came to us straight from hospital. By the second day she was pushing a broom round the office. "Can't be doing nothing," she explained. "You must be in agony," I said, thinking of the blisters. "Oh, no, I've had so many beatings all my life I don't feel nothing". As soon as she was healed she was off back home, dragging the reluctant six-year-old with her. "She's ever so proud of her dad…He won a medal for danger." I should go now, I thought to myself. Of course when I thought about it later that night, it all made sense. It's like a soldier on a battlefield fighting for his life; there are countless stories on how a soldier can be horribly injured and just not notice until after the battle is over. Our families lived in a permanent state of war with their parents and their children.

We were also fascinated to watch the reactions of the mothers if they heard that a very violent man was on his way to the Refuge. Those who abhorred violence would retreat down into the safety of the basement or up to the top of the house. Those who got high on violence, on the other hand, would all congregate round the front hall and the windows. Some of the children behaved the same way: they would cluster round the front door in spite of repeated attempts to lead them away. It always saddened me to see their little faces light up at the possibility of a violent explosion and of somebody getting hurt. However, those who stayed with us for a sufficiently long time did eventually learn other patterns of behaviour.

At that time I had such a gifted play staff that the children in the Refuge probably had the best care this country could offer. Sarah Gibson was the surrogate mother figure who embraced them kindly and gave them back their childhood. Roger Blades and Michael Taylor were the first truly gentle men the children had ever met. In time I noticed, as I stood on the doorstep with yet another angry man, that some of the children who were beginning to form non-violent relationships in the Refuge would now stay away from the excited group at the doorway.

Another insight emerged from the fact that we seemed able to keep these particular families with us, in contrast to some other refuges who catered for a different type of woman. It was precisely the atmosphere of our huge, chaotic, busy house that seemed to make these families comfortable. That reminded me very much of an experience during the war. I was in Canada when relatives and friends of my mother's were returned from the concentration camps in Singapore. They were all lodged in extremely comfortable hotels, but one by one they left the hotels and moved into a nearby park. They could not, at that stage, cope with the structure and order of normal everyday life.

Once I explained my theory of "positive" overcrowding to Anna Freud. She listened to me, and then she said it reminded her of her own work during the war, when she set up a scheme deep in the heart of peaceful countryside to cater for women and their children who were in danger of losing their lives as the bombs fell on London. They spent a lot of money to set it all up, and as the trains pulled in carrying all these families, they were made welcome and settled in. But gradually they began to return to London – to the danger, to the bombing, to the chance of getting killed. She smiled at me as she recalled this, for she did understand. But certainly the Department of Health and Social Security did not want to know my theory.

Dealing as I did daily with violent men, women, and children, I began to make other observations for myself. Confronted with a human being emotionally and chemically "high" in a violent state, the one thing you must never do is to become aggressive back. That will only escalate an already violent and explosive situation. I have never, in all my ten years, been struck, though there have been two or three occasions in the Refuge when I have had to "floor" a woman who was escalating to such a pitch of aggression that she was liable to do some damage to herself or someone else. This means pushing her gently to the floor, and holding her down until she starts to cry; usually she then cuddles into you and relaxes. Violent people are very frightened people.

I have always taught my staff not to be over wary of the big mouthy woman – it is the little quiet ones at the back that are liable to do most damage. Because the social agencies grew out of an outdated Victorian middle-class notion of philanthropy, there is no proper or practical training in this country, or elsewhere, for dealing with this problem of violence. People who are not trained to deal with violence tend to be terrified of violence, because they only see the physical manifestations of it: the swollen face, the red and purple flesh, the swelling of the neck, and the yelling and the swearing, followed possibly by physical attack. What they do not perceive is that under all that acting out is a great deal of pain. If you have been born into a violent home, you will never have had time to express sorrow or pain in any other way except through rage.

There were only very few occasions when I was seriously in danger, and they taught me a lot. The first occurred when I dropped by the Palm Court Hotel, which housed about sixty mothers and their children, and I was chatting to Anne Ashby, who was then running the place. A very flushed and breath-less Dawn rushed past us, babbling that she had been home to collect some things. Now I am never terribly happy, after a mother has told you horrific stories of what went on at home, and you have seen the files to prove it, to learn that she is just popping back to collect some clothes. Somehow, if someone is out to murder you, clothes seem irrelevant, particularly as Women's Aid always had lots of spare clothes.

Anyway, Dawn proceeded to her room, and I was preparing to leave, when there came a thunderous knock on the door, and a man outside was screaming that he would "fucking kill her". It did not take long to establish that Dawn's husband had followed her, and was about to tear the place apart. This was an Ulster family, and not only were both parents violent, but they had also twice been bombed out of their home. The children were very disturbed, and at this stage were setting light to everything they could lay their hands on. Their only topic of conversation seemed to involve fire, and they constantly acted out the sounds of bombs falling.

For some reason best known to himself, the house's very large Alsatian, who was usually capable of removing portions of innocent passers-by was now lying quietly on the floor looking very occupied with something on the other side of the room. Fortunately, the doorway was small, with an inner porch, and I took up almost all the space, thereby effectively blocking the man out. He was so enraged that he was beside himself. He was quite a large Irishman with drink in him, so he was not liable to listen to anything reasonable. I decided to treat him as I would a badly upset Refuge child, so I threw my arms round him in a bear-hug and held him tight. He was absolutely stunned. There he was, raging and swearing, with people all round scurrying away, and here was this fat middle-aged woman enveloping him in a huge embrace. He collapsed in my arms and sobbed. All the pain and the grief ran out of him, and he became safe. His rage subsided, his body relaxed, and he calmed down.

Apparently what Dawn had done was to go home in his absence and take down all the wedding photographs, and also remove those in the album. But what had really upset him was that she had taken time to sort through his belongings, and had removed his precious insurance card. Without it, he could not get a job. I went and fetched it from Dawn, who looked a little embarrassed. She did not get the exciting smash-up she had expected. For she had already spent hours at the Palm Court boasting about his violence, describing how he would smash all the windows and kill anyone who got in his way. So I'm afraid she felt he had very much let her down. Unfortunately her urge for violence meant that she soon moved on to another relationship that offered an even more exciting level of violence.

Often violent episodes never really got out of hand because the staff were confident in their non-violent approach. Highly trained and very experienced, we would all work as a team. On one occasion Jo, who became the bane of our life because her need to fight meant that she was involved in frequent episodes in the local pubs, decided to continue her war with her current boyfriend from the safety of the Refuge. Jo had spent most of one morning recounting the grim story of how George, a Nigerian student, was promising to kill her, and indeed at that very moment was on his way over. For one about to face imminent death, Jo looked remarkably cheerful. The prospect seemed to fill her with ecstatic excitement.

Now, it is necessary for anyone working with violence to have a good understanding of how violence is expressed in different cultures. English people, on the whole, don't carry knives. West Indians do. An Irishman will respond to religion; not so a Scot. A West Indian man is more likely to attack a male member of staff because he may have little experience of men in a position of power. The West Indian mother is the supreme matriarch, so it is appropriate for a woman to go to the door, and he will not be offended. However, the reverse is true for a Nigerian, who comes from a country where it would be humiliating to be faced with a woman, their society being such a strong patriarchy.

Remembering this, I sent Mike Dunne to speak to George. He was certainly angry, and was determined to get at Jo. She had taken his wallet and car keys. I stood behind Mike, and together we formed a barrier into the house. It did not help matters to have Jo leaning over my shoulder grinning at him. He lunged forward and threw a punch at me, but it was very half-hearted. Mike rugger-tackled him to the floor and held him while the poor man sobbed his heart out.

He had been a student here, and was terribly lonely. The eldest son of a highly successful Nigerian family, he would finish his business studies, and then return to Nigeria to care for the family all his life. Meanwhile he was cut off from the warmth and friendliness of Africa, so he was desolate. As a people, the British are far more at home with the easy-going West Indian community than with the more serious Nigerian community. So he had fallen into Jo's hands, and fortunately ended up in our arms, or he may well have got to her and injured her, and wrecked his life. He told Mike of his struggles to help her, of his need for her warmth and company, of her repeated betrayal of his trust and friendship. We explained to him that Jo behaved like this to all men.

Now was not the time to point out that over the years we had known her she was much improved. In fact, the original Jo had been a vicious animal when she first arrived, festooned with six children. When George calmed down, we let him go, and he went outside. But he asked to see her. Jo was now crouching in a very small corner of the sitting-room. All the excitement, the rush of the chemicals of high arousal had drained away, and she looked grey and shaky. "Don't send me out there . . . he'll kill me." Once the high has gone, the prospect of death becomes the reality it is. "I don't think so, this time," I said, dragging her to her feet. "Consequences, Jo. You made the mess – you clean it up." It was a very shamefaced Jo that went down the steps to speak to George. That episode cured him of his need for Jo, but curiously enough, it also cured Jo of using us as a buffer between herself and the men against whom she warred. She recognised, I think, that we were her safe place, and that we loved her enough to risk ourselves before we would risk her.

I learned from these encounters that, as a general principle, it is better to leave a violent person no physical space in which to organise his rage. Studies on aggression and animal display have suggested that violent people require more social space in order not to become anxious and feel threatened than non-violent people. But when I read these findings I am extremely skeptical. After several years of refuge work, I noticed that whenever the Refuge was packed tight, and there was no choice of personal territory because the families had to sleep in dormitories and share all the available communal space, the aggression level would be low. As soon as our numbers dropped however, and several feet of extra space could be annexed by each woman, then the levels of aggression would rise.

It always amazed me to find that, given the antisocial behaviour and the past records for violence of many of our families, we had virtually no major incidents. In my ten years as Director, I can only recall three or four occasions when a bout of fisticuffs resulted in a black eye. Overcrowding, which began as a necessity due to lack of other refuges in the country, turned out to be of major therapeutic benefit to a community of aggressive and asocial families. So, too, I learned that those men and women most inclined to raise a wall of rage around them responded best to a gentle touch or the offer of a cigarette.

I saw a lot of verbal violence, of course. "I'll fucking knife you, you fat cunt," was Judy Scott's way of saying good-morning. "I love you too," was my stock response. Poor Judy, with such affectionate greetings, had terrified and alienated a whole shoal of well-meaning social agencies.

Then there was Jilly; who came to us from the locked wards of Holloway. She had twice burnt down her house, her children were in care, and she went from one diabolically violent relationship to another. She teamed up with Jane, whose neck was corrugated with scars from the times when she had attempted to hang herself and to slash her throat. “It lets out the pain,” Jane would whisper. Jane came in to us after she had slashed her wrists. For her it was just time out of the nightmare that she lived in. She had finally found a man who, like her, was a middle-class reject. She told me how his rich farming father hated him so much he was forced to sleep in the barn on freezing nights. She told me how once the father broke the boy’s legs with a metal rod when he was six, and his sister carried him over the fields on her back to the hospital, saying it was “an accident”.

Anyway Jane and Jilly became drinking partners, and it was inevitable, given the pecking order of physical power in a community of this kind, that Jane would eventually need to launch a public attack on me. Again, the rooms at the Refuge were always crowded, so she had nowhere to be by herself to work up a state of rage. It is almost impossible to get ready to launch a physical attack if small children are pulling at your skirt or another woman passing by says “Want a cup of tea, love?”

Finally, one afternoon after the pubs were closed, she came in with Jilly and seeing that most of the room was clear, because we were all sitting in a semi circle, she stood in the centre of the group, swinging her handbag and organising her attack. I decided it was best to let it happen and get it out of the way. She flung her handbag first, and then launched herself at me. But I caught her in my arms and gently pulled her to the floor, where I pinned her down for ten minutes while the rage ebbed away. All the time I talked to her as you would to a hurt child. Slowly, she began to curl into that foetal position so often seen. Then I was able to gather her in my arms, and rock her and hum to her. I was aware that this was probably the only time she bad been held close in love. She was calm and happy for the next few hours, but then she departed into the night with Jilly.

She is another woman who may end up sleeping rough under the arches, and probably die from exposure. The hardest part of our work is knowing that it need not end like that. If only we could recognise that you cannot beat people better. You cannot lock them away or keep them drugged in mental hospitals forever. We must create programmes that at least give these families a chance to learn to live in a world which is now so highly complex. If the main part of their childhood lacked adequate training for coping in our society, they are doomed to fill the institutions which are ready and waiting to receive them.

I always remember talking to a very enlightened member of a children’s home board of management. She was telling me of her frustration with a system that created more problems than it solved. We both noticed how as one child was taken into care, another rapidly replaced it in the same emotionally disabled family. It was not uncommon for some of our women to have had ten or eleven pregnancies, of which some would be miscarriages and others cot deaths. The rest of the children would be scattered like confetti across the country, in “care”. Usually these children were abandoned in the aftermath of one violent relationship when a new partner came in and resented their presence, for the children were living reminders of the woman’s past liaisons. They would then be taken in by the local social services on a voluntary basis. Then there would be a new baby to cement the new liaison, followed by further violent episodes, or else the man might abandon the woman. On her own once again, the woman would take her previous children out of care, having increased her family by one or two meanwhile, until she met another man and the whole process began again. It is a highly unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Why, I asked then as now, do we not take whole families into care? After all, if the source of the problem is the parents ignoring their children, merely concentrating on their children completely defeats the object of the exercise. But I discovered that by asking such questions, you are shaking the very foundations of a society that has never questioned its basic assumption that the privileged few should control the lives of everyone else. The class structure and social fabric of our society are so organised that any failure to comply with this assumption is met by a rigid and unyielding bureaucratic offensive. All caring agencies in this country, and in most of Western society, are based on a series of negative reactions: fail and be punished.

Overlying the basic premise that “to punish is to improve” is the massive superstructure of the administration of misery. Millions are paid into its pocket annually to relieve the burden of conscience for the many individuals who can adapt and survive. With the old social orders decaying and crumbling, however, we can no longer afford to ignore our jails bursting at the seams, or our Welfare State being cut to ribbons. We will have to concentrate on an alternative strategy of love and hope for these problem families.

Author's Note:

*The little room referred to throughout the text as the "office" was in fact normally used as a bedroom, and apart from housing the filing systems was never actually used as a formal office in the usual sense of the word.

Editor's Note:

[1] In some parts of the United States, the phrase "the mark of Cain" has racist overtones that a British author like Erin would be unaware of. The phrase is left intact here out of respect for the integrity of the author and her work.

Chivalry Justice in 1921: Anti-misandry female judges

Robert St. Estephe · 10 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.
[image]
FULL TEXT: Every dog has his day and even that of the poor, overburdened, wife-ridden husband appears to have arrived at last. The time-honored combination of a woman's tears and a sympathetic masculine judge has been shattered. A woman is the iconoclast. She is Judge Rhea M. Whitehead, presiding member of the Superior Court of Seattle. "A husband is going to get a square deal in my court," she announced to the world. "Too many men are convicted on sobby tales of wives!" [image] The condition which this learned woman jurist deplores can be seen anywhere in the country in any court where domestic woes are aired, some husbands aver. The scene and the setting are identical, they say. The husband is arraigned before the court. His wife, her relatives and friends occupying the front benches, steps forward. The complaining wife unburdens herself. Occasionally she may punctuate her recital with looks of injured feelings vaguely cast in the direction of her recalcitrant spouse. Then, having skilfully constructed her atmosphere much as a dramatist leads to a climax, she suddenly produces her handkerchief, clutches the railing before her, lets forth a heart rending sob and opens the flood-gates of her tears. Thereupon the Court thunders forth a denunciation of the prisoner at the bar and enters an order of commitment or fine or alimony, as the case may be, and all the men on hand applaud in their hearts and cry out that here is a just judge and a rascally husband.

Since men were first called to sit in judgment of their fellow-men decisions of this kind have been heard of frequently. It is problematical whence the idea came. It may have arisen from a distorted sense of chivalry commingled with sympathy and what might be frankly defined as the hope of favor. It is the thing that kept men and women apart in the business world for centuries. Their association in offices and the breaking down of stern conventions explain the dictum of the woman jurist of Seattle as merely a natural sequence. "In my court," declares Judge Whitehead, "men and women will stand equal. That a woman is a dependent, helpless creature is an outworn notion, and I have absolutely no patience with a woman who comes into my court charging her husband with non-support merely to have the law make him stand and deliver. Some masculine judges are so sentimental that they often enter judgments against husbands without even giving the defendant a chance to be heard."

Judge Whitehead is not the only woman jurist who holds the attitude that "playing the sex" is no business for the courtroom. Judge Florence E. Allen of the Court of Common Pleas, Cleveland, Ohio, speaking before the Women Lawyers' Association, deplored the tendency of men jurors to render verdicts in favor of women litigants on sentimental grounds, whether the woman be the accused or accuser. It recalls the famous instance in New York City where the court ordered a curtain draped in front of the shapely ankles of Betty Inch. Because the men jurors seemed to concentrate their attention on the tears rather than on the testimony. [image] "This fault should be corrected," Judge Allen says. "It is not born of chivalry, but of what men choose to call chivalry, something totally different." "Criminal men take advantage of this condition. They use women to perform acts essential to crime, counting on a woman to serve both as a screen and as a blind. They figure that if she is arrested she will be acquitted and that would weaken the case against them." It is quite true that all men – lawyers, judges, prosecuting attorneys, witnesses and jurors – are inclined to be lenient with a woman on trial or in any way connected with a case. The leniency is not deliberate, but instinctive. Pretty women are all too likely to make men lose their balance."

Max Herzfeld, a lawyer, of New York City, who framed the law by which the famous "Alimony Club" was wiped out of existence by making it lawful for a woman to have her husband arrested and committed to jail as many times as he fell behind in the payment of alimony installments, declared that the views of the women judges were most encouraging. Before Lawyer Herzfeld had the law changed a man became immune to arrest for non-support after he had spent thirty days in the "Alimony Club" in the civil prison. "The attitude of these women jurists is a step forward," he said. "At the present time I am urging Mayor John F. Hylan of New York City to appoint a committee to act as arbiters of domestic difficulties. In my opinion there are many cases of marital discord which could be patched up by keeping them out of court. A court is a court whether it is a domestic relations-tribunal or not. It has the flavor and also the opprobrium. Women go before a judge, become hysterical, permit their imaginations to run riot and the damage is done. Reconciliation becomes remote. And the husband hasn't a chance when the excited wife begins to weep. I advocate that this committee be formed where women's tears would not be effective nor necessary, but where proceedings without publicity could settle the differences and send the quarrelsome couple home together. It is the instinctive prejudice that men feel toward a woman's court that embitters a man against his wife who has him apprehended, because he fears that he cannot even hope for a fair and impartial judgment."

SOURCE: "The Woman Judge Who Gives Husbands A Square Deal – She Is Introducing a Novel Procedure In Seattle Where Tears and Sentiment Carry No Weight and Women Are Not Regarded Today as 'Helpless and Dependent Children,'" syndicated, Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette (In.), Jun. 26, 1921, sec. 4, p. 1

Mary Kellett and Vladek Filler

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 11 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is the transcript for a recent Girl Writes What video. You can watch that video here. We have been granted permission to publish it on A Voice For Men.

Hi, everyone,

I'm just doing a quick video to update everyone on the goings on in Maine regarding assistant district attorney Mary Kellett.

For those of you who don't know, she works in the DAs office in Bar Harbor, and her per capita prosecution rate for domestic violence and sex crimes sits at 40 times that of the general population of the US. She was brought to the attention of NCFM and AVFM by Vladek Filler, a man repeatedly prosecuted–or persecuted–by Kellett on essentially zero evidence, for spousal violence against his immigrant wife, Ligia.

A little about Ligia: she's mentally unstable, has a criminal record, and has a history of violent abuse of her children–this is, in fact, why Vladek had filed for divorce in 2007. Arrested shortly thereafter while wandering half-dressed, drunk and ranting in the street, Ligia was recorded by one of the arresting officers threatening to kill her husband, and to kill the officers themselves, claiming she would dismember their bodies and "disappear" them, with the assistance of her relatives.

It was at this point that the Fillers found themselves in the path of Mary Kellett–not over a justifiable prosecution of Ligia for public drunkenness, indecent exposure, and uttering threats, but over a charge of spousal rape against Vladek Filler.

Ligia's behavior, especially toward her husband and children, was so egregious and erratic, that even after the first charge against Vladek was filed by Kellett, a family court judge not only granted Vladek custody of the children, on the recommendation of the Maine Department of Health and Human Services, but Vladek was granted a restraining order against Ligia to protect himself and the children from her abuse. I think we all must realize how obviously toxic a woman's gotta be for this to be the outcome in a US family court.

Kellett conducted a prosecution for spousal rape against Filler, despite no evidence, despite Ligia's refusal to get a rape kit done after making her allegation, and despite the allegation emerging from an obviously mentally disturbed and violent woman during a highly charged marital break-up.

The case ended in conviction, but Defence Attorney Daniel Pileggi filed a motion for a mistrial, citing several incidences of prosecutorial misconduct (including the concealment of exculpatory evidence) on the part of Kellett, and Filler was granted a second trial.

In response, Kellett filed an appeal in the Supreme Court of Maine, to overturn the decision, quash the new trial, and uphold the conviction.

Filler's attorney in that proceeding, Neil Fishman, described the it as a "Salem witch trial", wherein Kellett repeatedly misrepresented her motions at the earlier trial to the Supreme court, contradicted herself several times, and claimed Filler should have introduced evidence of Ligia's motives in making the accusations, despite the lower court having granted Kellett's motion to exclude that very evidence. During this proceeding, Kellett attempted to have the Supreme court set a precedent that would exclude from spousal assault cases any evidence of the accuser's possible motives to lie, such as bitter custody disputes or contentious divorce cases.

Not only did the Supreme court set precedent upholding the rights of accused men to present such evidence, the Court found that prosecutor Kellett had "improperly encouraged the jury to use the absence of evidence" to convict, and cited a number of instances in which she had engaged in misconduct. The order for a retrial was upheld.

It was at this point that NCFM and SAVE stepped up the issuing of press releases and coverage, and where AVFM began writing extensively about the case. All three organizations, among others groups and individuals, filed complaints of prosecutorial misconduct on the part of Kellett with the Governor of Maine and the Maine Board of Overseers of the Bar.

In response, Kellett attempted to get a gag order placed on AVFM regarding the Filler case, which a judge rightly refused to grant.

Kellett, who absolutely isn't on anything remotely resembling a witch hunt, or a personal vendetta, had her own assistant placed on the new prosecution team, despite ever-growing media attention, and several formal complaints of Kellett's misconduct and calls for disciplinary action against her, specifically in regard to her targeting of this particular man.

Filler was acquitted on the sexual assault charges, but convicted on a charge of minor spousal assault, for pushing Ligia. The evidence? A single bruise. A bruise that police claim did not exist on her arm days after she said Filler had put it there, which was noted by police in their report of her attempted abduction of one of the children.

Prior to the conclusion of that case, a hearing was scheduled by the Board of Overseers of the Bar, to determine whether Kellett should be disciplined for prosecutorial misconduct. And the system circled the wagons. Including assigning Asst Attorney General Ronald Lupton to defend Kellett.

Filler was sentenced to 21 days in jail on the charge of pushing Ligia. And in a bid to prove her lack of prosecutorial bias and her proper conduct as an officer of the court, Kellett arranged to delay his incarceration so that it would run concurrent with her hearing before the overseers. Filler was lucky enough to be allowed to testify against Kellett despite being incarcerated, but was forced to do so dressed in prison orange and shackled at the wrist.

60 days after the hearing, the findings were released: Kellett had failed to turn over at least two key pieces of exculpatory evidence, had engaged in multiple violations of rules and court orders, misled the jury, and engaged in conduct unworthy of an attorney. The state bar panel recommended she be suspended until disciplinary proceedings could be scheduled, but the Attorney General of Maine and the DAs office of Bar Harbor have taken no such action. She has remained free to prosecute crimes in Bar Harbor.

Through all of this bullshit, from Vladek's filing for divorce in 2007, the children have been in either his custody or, when he's been behind bars, in the custody of the foster care system. Ligia has made several attempts to claim custody of the children, from applying through the courts to showing up at their home and demanding the kids be handed over to her, to attempted abductions. Ligia was caught on police video telling a friend subsequent to the initial charge, that she was "fighting for the children," and receiving legal advice to cry more to be more believable.

Ligia has a family court-documented history of verbal and physical abuse of both the children and her husband–a history that has kept the children not only out of her custody, but has resulted in a restraining order against Ligia. To my knowledge, Ligia has not been charged with any crime related to this case.

Now, John the Other has speculated that Kellett is being incentivized by provisions in the Violence Against Women act to maliciously prosecute potentially innocent men for monetary gain. And yes, VAWA does provide financial and immigration incentives to women who make accusations of domestic violence and spousal rape, as well as financial incentives to District Attorney's offices to bring such cases to court.

But these incentives exist whether cases end in conviction or not. Kellett's office gets its money, whether these men are convicted or acquitted. The money doesn't explain why Kellett was so determined to see Filler in prison that she would conceal exculpatory evidence, file motions to exclude evidence of the accuser's motive or state of mind, instruct the police to destroy video tapes rather than hand them over to the defence, or lie outright to the Supreme Court.

Her prosecution rate for domestic violence and sexual assault is, again, 40 times higher per capita than in the general population of the US. She was overheard in the courtroom while the jury was not present, joking about Mr. Filler “running to call his mommy” when his wife had “punched him in the face”, and making racists remarks about how men of Filler’s ethnicity always abuse their women, and Filler’s sons would be raised by him to be abusers.

This is not about the oodles of VAWA money for Mary Kellett. The VAWA money just gives her the funding she needs to do what she REALLY wants–to lock men up, and excuse violent and psychotic women. This is all about the sisterhood, and Kellett seems perfectly prepared to cast the entire criminal justice system of Maine into disrepute to serve her ideological, bigoted and hate-based beliefs.

And the system is now left with an unanswered question: what are they going to do about Mary Kellett?

The investigation into her conduct, and the overseers hearing, indicate something needs to be done. And a disciplinary hearing has been announced to decide exactly that, with one week’s notice. That’s right–July 15th, in Portland Maine, three hours drive from the people of Bar Harbor who have the greatest vested interest in the outcome of this case.

We’re assuming the timing and the short notice are an attempt to have as few interested parties in the courtroom as possible, and as little media coverage as they can get. And it certainly doesn’t help that Paul Elam–who might have been interested in attending personally–is on vacation at the moment.

And that’s why we’re asking if anyone of you guys who happens to be in the vicinity of Portland Maine and might want to engage in some citizen journalism, to please contact John the Other (that’s John Hembling) at John@avoiceformen.com. Even if the mainstream don’t give a whole lot of fucks about this case, or this prosecutor, AVFM sure as hell does. We want to know what exactly is going to go on in this disciplinary hearing.

So, any of you guys want to do this, please let John know.

The Voice of Europe: Prostitution

Lucian Vâlsan · 11 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On July 12, Lucian Vâlsan, Huffnágel Pista and James Huff will be talking about the issue of prostitution and how the presence of feminism has been influencing the debate regarding the phenomenon in Europe.

Only 8 nations of Europe (if we are to consider Turkey as part of Europe) have a legal and regulated prostitution industry – and in some of them (like the Netherlands) there are increasing calls for abolishing it on the grounds of increased possibility of human trafficking. But is the argument factually correct? Or it's just another good ol' feminist lie?

In the news section, we'll talk extensively about the issues discussed on the joint meeting of the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality in the European Parliament. The European Commission is trying now to force all the businesses to impose quotas on all levels and opposing this Soviet-Union style measure was greeted in the committee with accusation of misogyny and with calls for ending the economic freedom altogether in the EU. No jokes! We'll feature MEPs that attended to the meeting and the rapporteur of this new piece of legislation.

The subjects are tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Tell us about the state of prostitution in your country and the general state of economic freedom that the EU is seeking to stamp out.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Seven years in hell

Hannah Wallen · 11 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The U.S. court system is a train wreck of contradictions between legal and moral guidelines. The twisted, damaging nature of it can be readily seen in the way the family court system and the criminal court system get abused by women fighting for child custody, as in the case of my friend *"Rodger's" ordeal at the hands of his ex-wife, a domestic violence victim's advocacy group, police, and Ohio's Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) led court system.

The issues began shortly after Rodger's marriage to his current wife, Bridget. Weeks after the wedding, Rodger was awarded protective custody of their preschool age daughter, Angie. Custody was given to him in light of repeated acts of negligence by his ex-wife, Amy, the violent environment in her home, and an act of abuse by her boyfriend Derrick. There were multiple incidents, including drug-related neglect that was witnessed, but not reported on, by police. Rodger's attempts to resolve the issue were ignored. Child Protective Services (CPS) wouldn't even help him, until one night when Derrick beat Angie (leaving bruises on her face) and then called Rodger to come get her. Derrick was never prosecuted for his actions, because the same department which failed to report Amy's neglect to CPS also failed to properly document their case.

This time, however, there was a report to CPS. Case workers ordered Rodger to keep Angie with him instead of sending her back to Amy's house, pending a custody hearing. Rodger's wife Bridget took photos of the bruising, which were later used as evidence in family court. The court confirmed the CPS decision to place Angie with Rodger. The ruling gave him full custody, and ordered that Amy's visits be supervised. She was given the chance to earn at-home visitation, with the possibility for eventual shared parenting (joint custody) if she met the state's conditions. Among the conditions were the stipulations that she pay child support, that the drug use must end, that Derrick (who she had accused of also beating her, as part of her defense) must be banished from the house, and that she was not to take Angie near him again. That the last stipulation, also part of the original custody judgment ignored by Amy, was one of the judge's stated reasons for ordering supervised visitation.

It seemed like a victory. Custody won, child protected, and the ex-wife ordered, essentially, to grow up and take some responsibility. The family went home, and everything went back to normal.

Things didn't stay that way for long.

From the start, there was trouble with the visitation center. Amy convinced everyone there, including the local police who are there to protect the children using the center, that Rodger was abusive, had wrongfully stolen the child from Amy, and was using withholding of visits to harass and abuse her. As a result, the center's staff was biased, and they bent or even broke rules for Amy on promptness, gift-giving, and bringing up Derrick's name and offering photos of him during visits with Angie in an effort to engage the child in a continuing parent-child type relationship with him. That was inconvenient and annoying, but had it been the only problem Rodger faced, I wouldn't be writing this article.

Amy also began making false allegations against Rodger in the hope of getting him incarcerated so that she could regain custody of Angie.

Warning shot

She started with a claim that there were cult activities occurring in Rodger and Bridget's home, an accusation that sent police to question Rodger about his tattoos, his religion, and his pastimes. She had told them that he was a drug addict, that he was harassing her, that he was dangerous and violent. Primed to view negatively anything they saw, officers questioned him extensively over everything, paying particular attention to one tattoo, a lovable but strange-looking Disney character who they mistook for a demon.

Rodger explained all of his tattoos, showed police his medicines for asthma and diabetes, talked about his divorce and how he ended up with custody of his daughter, and pointed out that it was Amy who was subject to supervised visitation due to conditions in her home. She was guilty of most of the accusations she'd made against him.

Despite a complete lack of evidence for any of Amy's accusations, the visit ended with police offering Rodger a "friendly" warning to refrain from abusing or neglecting his child, abusing Amy, or involving himself in cult activity.

Rules, schmules

Despite her claims of abuse during the custody hearing, Amy married Derrick, making him a full-time member of her household. She refused to pay any of her child support, and began cancelling visits with Angie at the state-provided visitation center, then demanding that Rodger provide make-up visits during his and his representatives' scheduled work days, when he and they were unavailable to do so. She also continued to assail him with false allegations.

Escalation

When police came to Rodger's house again, this time with accusations of assault, those of us who knew the family figured out that this was a tactic Amy was employing to try to regain custody of their child. Evidence would show that the accusation was false. Since she was lying, we all figured that the evidence would be all that was necessary to clear his name and let the family move on with their lives.

We were wrong.

At the visitation center, Amy had been put in contact with a local domestic violence victim's advocacy group. With their help, she had filed for, and received, an emergency Civil Protection Order against Rodger based on her claim. Following that, before he was even served with the order, she called police again and accused him of violating it.

Officers weren't just there to question Rodger this time. They were there to take him into custody. He was not read his rights, but he was handcuffed and taken to police headquarters in a cruiser, where he was questioned, held for hours, then eventually released on bail pending a hearing.

Amy had made the mistake of choosing for her allegation a date and time for which Rodger could easily account. To correct this problem, she changed her story. Then, when it came time for the hearing, she failed to even show up in court. Between those issues, she destroyed her own case. Rodger was acquitted, and the emergency protection order was dropped.

The next accusation rolled out shortly after his acquittal, complete with another frivolous request for a protection order, and the process was repeated. At the same time, Amy began hitting Rodger with an onslaught of family court paperwork, filing motions related to their custody arrangement, her child support obligation, and demands that Rodger submit to drug and psychological testing, all the while refusing to comply with orders the court had given her in the original custody hearing.

A pattern of abuse

After these first accusations failed to get Amy what she wanted, she changed tactics. She would go to the county courthouse first, using false claims of stalking and assault to obtain another emergency Civil Protection Order. A hearing would be set for a date within 30 days to determine whether the order was merited. This hearing would carry two possibilities: either the order would be dropped, or it would be upheld. If the order was dropped, the charge of violating it would also be dropped. If upheld, it would be in effect for 5 years, and Rodger would face limitations and penalties, including the permanent loss of his legal right to keep and bear arms. Any contact he had with Amy after that, even if it was accidental, could result in his being sent to jail.

After requesting the order, Amy would wait until she was informed that the order had been served, and within a day or two, she would accuse Rodger of violating it. Each time, officers would arrive at Rodger's home and take him into custody without reading him his rights. They informed him that they could do this because he was not under arrest – merely "going in for questioning."

However, despite not being under arrest, he would be transported to the station in handcuffs, riding in the back of a cruiser rather than on his own. Officers would place him in a holding cell before and after questioning him. He would be held for hours. The department would not release him without bail. Officers told Rodger's family that they were permitted to do all of this under a combination of the Patriot Act and the Violence Against Women Act, explaining that the Patriot Act allows police to detain citizens suspected of domestic terrorism, and VAWA treats domestic abuse as a form of terrorism. However, VAWA does not treat domestic abuse as a form of "domestic terrorism" as described in the Patriot Act. That assertion was an incorrect interpretation of the two laws, one which is being fed to local departments by the advocacy group from which Amy was receiving assistance, but the fact that it's incorrect has not stopped local police departments from acting on the advocacy group's advice when detaining area men accused of domestic violence.

Amy, her "victim assistant," and her lawyer would then attempt to get the cart before the horse, using motions for delays to try to put off the hearing for the civil protection order to try to get the alleged violation heard first. There would be a hearing on the allegation, in which Rodger would have to prove his innocence. With help from her team, Amy was able to push most of her motions through regardless of evidence and reason, or lack thereof. At one point, she even admitted in her motion that she wanted the alleged violation heard before it was determined whether the protection order was valid because she hadn't accused him of act that would be criminal without the protection order, and she didn't want the charge dropped. Amy knew two things: first, that she didn't have a legitimate case for a civil protection order, and second, that if she could find a time when Rodger didn't have evidence against her accusation, then because the case was a domestic violence case, he'd be convicted even if she couldn't prove his guilt.

Amy employed this pattern of attack repeatedly, using multiple police precincts in two Ohio counties as her personal battering ram against Rodger. She eventually gave up giving legitimate reasons for her protection order requests, and began obtaining them by recounting her earlier complaints as if the dismissals, acquittals, and dropped charges meant nothing. This, essentially, was the argument: "I need a protective order to keep my ex-husband away from me because I have extensively slandered him and filed a multitude of false charges against him."

Laws, schmaws – the damsel gets a pass

Amy's accusations were not just dismissed due to lack of proof – Rodger offered evidence contradicting her each time. Each time, he was able to prove her claims false. Twice, she accused him of physical assault at times when he was incapacitated due to documented medical conditions. In another instance, Amy had accused Rodger of making harassing phone calls to her house. Rodger could prove that he was at home during the time and date Amy gave in her complaint, and phone records proved no phone calls were made to Amy from Rodger's home at that time. Further, Amy provided a tape of the alleged call. Upon listening to the tape and hearing stark, compelling differences between the caller's voice and speech, and Rodger's voice and speech, the prosecuting attorney abandoned that case, and Rodger was acquitted. The tape didn't just fail to prove Amy's case. It showed that once again, she was lying.

That type of revelation occurred in each of Amy's complaints against Rodger; she repeatedly accused him when he could prove his whereabouts, made demonstrably false and often self-contradictory statements, and offered evidence that turned out to be demonstrably false.

In addition, Amy's courtroom behavior directly contradicted her pretense of being intimidated by and fearful of Rodger. During hearings, the tall, broad-shouldered and heavyset woman sat and glared at Rodger, and interrupted testimony and even judges hearing each case, with angry shouts, screaming rants, and exaggerated, wide-flung body motions.

This, we were sure, would lead to charges against Amy, and cause the victim's advocacy group to drop her as a client, as there was significant proof that she had lied to police during an investigation, filed a false charge, committed fraud to obtain services from a domestic violence victim's advocate, and committed perjury during her courtroom testimony.

The advocacy group continued to support her, even after repeatedly seeing her accusations and claims proved false. We learned from this that once the group was engaged with a case, it didn't matter to them whether the accuser was a victim or a confirmed liar: they would continue to support her, regardless. Further, these violations of the law mean nothing to the court when committed by a woman claiming domestic violence with a victim's advocate at her back. The advocate and Amy's lawyer successfully badgered and bullied local police and prosecutors to prevent any charges from being brought in relation to her illegal acts.

Authorities, including judges, visibly tired of Amy's irrational, disrespectful and unruly behavior. Again and again she was verbally warned. Again, we expected a result that never happened. Though there were multiple times when she was threatened with contempt, and even once when she was ejected from the courtroom so that other witnesses could testify without being badgered or intimidated by her antics, her advocate saw to it that Amy was never actually disciplined for her behavior.

In contrast, while awaiting trial, Rodger was ordered to place himself where Amy could see him, in response to her claim that she could "feel" him staring at her from behind. At Amy's request, court bailiffs stood over Rodger, ordering him not to face anywhere near her position in the courtroom, and threatening him with jail if he so much as moved wrong.

After each time Amy's accusations were proved false, she simply abandoned that effort, and went on to a new allegation. When this happened, Rodger and his lawyer found themselves unopposed in court when it came time for the hearing on the emergency order of protection. The order would be thrown out, but within a few weeks or months, police would arrive at his door to deliver notice that another emergency order had been requested, and the process had begun again.

Liar's poker

At the same time, Amy continued to drag Rodger through the legal system over custody of Angie. She filed motions protesting several of the judge's original stipulations, asking a second judge to overrule the first. Rather than attempt to improve living conditions and her parenting as ordered, she moved for more lenient visitation, and a reduction in child support. Rodger's lawyer brought up her refusal to follow any of the judge's orders.

Amy offered statements from the victim's advocate who volunteered at the visitation center, claiming that Rodger had cancelled visits. She damseled for the court, claiming that Rodger was using custody of Angie and withholding of visitation as a method of abuse. She used her history of false charges against Rodger as supporting evidence, trying to insinuate guilt by reason of repeated accusation, and associate the custody battle with that. Upon more direct questioning, the center staff had to admit that they were falsely counting Rodger's refusal to make up visits Amy cancelled as if Rodger had cancelled them, even though he was not required to accommodate her requests. Rodger's lawyer called Amy's bluff, pointing out that Rodger had been acquitted of every accusation Amy had taken to trial, and that Amy herself had dropped the rest.

During this frenzy of unwarranted litigation, Amy also lost custody of her other daughter due to her neglect and unsafe conditions in her home. That child, still an infant, was placed in the custody of a member of Amy's family. That fact was instrumental in supporting Rodger's case against altering his custody arrangement to allow Amy more access and less supervision. Because of that situation; because Amy refused to follow judge's orders, and following significant documentation of her neglect, she was not granted at-home visitation. However, because the domestic violence victim's advocacy group was now supporting her case, though the order remained in place, she was not penalized for her refusal to pay child support.

Following this, she continued to file motions and briefs in an effort to regain custody and reduce her child support obligation without following the judge's orders, and she continued to use false accusations as part of her attack.

To regain custody of her younger daughter, she accused the foster caregiver, a relative, of sexual abuse. Though the caregiver was never officially charged, much less convicted, the younger child was returned to Amy's care. She used the exact same accusation, right down to the exact same wording, in a claim accusing Rodger's brother of abusing Angie.

Though the accusation was disproved, Rodger had to show in court that Angie did not spend time alone with his brother in order to avoid losing custody of her. It didn't matter that the accusation was false. The younger child's case showed that mere allegations of sexual abuse, regardless of evidence or lack thereof, would be enough to persuade authorities to return a child to an environment and a parent previously deemed unfit.

As the case became more and more complex, and Amy continued her malicious prosecution, frivolous motions, and resistance to judge's orders, Rodger's lawyer decided that Amy's actions merited civil action against her. Since Amy filed most of the paperwork herself, the lawyer filed a complaint on Rodger's behalf, accusing Amy of vexatious litigation. At the time of filing, Rodger and Bridget had two thick loose leaf binders full of paperwork from Amy's legal maneuvers. The complaint promptly disappeared in the system, and remained "lost" for over a year.

The wrecking ball attack

At one point, angry over being thwarted in family court, Amy went for the jugular, accusing Rodger of entering her home and raping her.

She offered absolutely no evidence to back up the accusation – no witness, no medical evidence – nothing but her own word.

This accusation was pursued by a female police detective from a larger municipality within the small metro area where we live. We don't have Chicago's crime rate, but the community has enough that the detective should have been experienced in handling cases of actual rape, familiar with victim behavior, and savvy enough to be suspicious when, in the course of her investigation, her "victim" couldn't get her story straight.

After Rodger proved his alibi following the original statement, Amy claimed she'd given the wrong date. When that was debunked as well, she changed it again, along with the time… and then a third time when the second didn't pan out.

Each time she revised her story, Rodger was again rounded up by police and taken in for questioning. At one point, he was questioned for twelve hours without food, water, or access to his medications. Adding insult to injury, police "misplaced" the emergency medical supplies which, when they took him into custody, were placed in their care in case of sudden need. No record of their receipt was recorded.

Rodger, a diabetic with moderate asthma, ended up needing emergency medical treatment following that ordeal. His impoverished family's budget had to be stretched to replace an expensive inhaler and other medications they could not afford, because their insurance didn't cover lost drugs. They ended up having to go to extended family for help.

Those of us around Rodger were shocked and appalled at the way the case was handled. Confused by the detective's interest in a case that was obviously false, we asked him questions about Amy's behavior before the divorce, looking for any possible explanation, however fantastic, that might explain why the detective was still treating Amy as a credible witness. Is it possible that she took and saved some of your hair and is using it as evidence? Is it possible that she took and saved some of your sperm, maybe from a condom?

Of course, the problem had nothing to do with evidence. Amy didn't have evidence. The detective was following protocol laid out in the Violence Against Women act, which dictates the presumption of guilt when a woman levels a rape charge against a man, contains funding for training to teach law enforcement to act on that presumption, contains federal funding incentives for mandatory arrest and prosecution policies. Once a charge is leveled, it sets into motion a federally mandated course of action involving extensive investigation and dogged pursuit of the accused. This process does not stop easily, nor does it occur without causing damage.

Because of the VAWA guidelines, despite the local crime rate, despite the detective's experience, and despite the obvious implications of Amy's constant revision of her rape story, it took a complaint to the local district attorney (the county prosecutor's office) threatening an embarrassing lawsuit against the department and the involved detective to get her to stop harassing Rodger over Amy's false rape allegation. While the case was dropped because the accusation was demonstrably false, no charges were brought against Amy in response. Even now, Amy continues to repeat her accusation with impunity within the community and online.

A call to arms

As Amy's accusations and court actions continued, Rodger and those of us who know him realized that each step in the system was treating him as guilty until proven innocent. Even the wildest lies Amy told were given credence, so that Rodger had to gather evidence to disprove each one. Without the ability to prove his innocence each time she lied, he was completely vulnerable. We knew that if she ever caught him at a time when he couldn't disprove her accusation, that would be it – in court, her word as a domestic violence accuser was worth more than his even though she was a proven liar.

In order to prevent Amy from using the system to have Rodger wrongfully jailed, he was going to be able to prove his activities and whereabouts at every moment of every day. He began regularly visiting businesses we knew kept video footage of people entering and leaving their stores, keeping receipts for everything, randomly checking his account balance at ATMs when he was out – anything to have evidence of his real whereabouts, in order to counter her false claims. His friends and family rallied an effort to keep watch on him so that no matter where he went or what he did, there would be a credible witness. This meant that he had no privacy, no genuine solitude. He could not ever be completely alone, even in his own home.

I became more immediately involved in the case when I was witness to Rodger's whereabouts at the times listed for some of Amy's accusations. One in particular involved a day on which I was visiting not with Rodger, but with his wife Bridget. During the entire visit, I could see and hear Rodger in the next room, and I was able to attest to the fact that he did not perform the actions listed in Amy's complaint on that day at all. On learning that I was the only witness to this alibi outside their family, I prepared to be present to testify on his behalf in the criminal case.

In this specific case, Amy was absolutely determined to have the alleged violation tried first. Rodger's lawyer was equally determined to have the protection order tried first. The two sides played continuance tag with this case for a year, meaning that for a year, Amy had in place a 30-day emergency civil protection order against Rodger.

According to Rodger's attorney, this tactic is one she has seen consistently and frequently employed by local women in divorce/custody cases, with the active assistance and encouragement of the agency which supported Amy. It's actually standard for them, so often used that the attorney specializes in handling cases like this.

Outside obstruction

Each time the case in which I was a witness was rescheduled, I had to request a day off from work to go to court. This entailed writing "Della off – court hearing" on a calendar kept in my boss's office for that purpose. During the year of continuance tag, my employer changed managers three times, ending with a manager who found several instances where my name and reason were listed, then scratched off. On finding the latest request, she asked me why I was going to court, and why my hearing kept getting cancelled.

I briefly explained the way legal harassment in which false charges were being used as a tool in a custody case, and explained that I was a direct witness to events which were central to the case. When she asked why the case continued to drag on, I explained that the false accuser had tricked the local domestic violence victim's advocacy group into helping her. I expected my boss to say something about my needing a subpoena in order to justify the day off, or to express some disbelief in the strangeness of the case, but I was completely blindsided by her actual response.

My boss took me aside for a private, no-witnesses conversation and told me that the group in question knew what they were doing, and therefore, it was impossible for Rodger to be innocent. Knowing nothing about the case, she blatantly accused me of lying to cover for a friend, and ordered me to end my involvement in the case. When I told her she couldn't decide that for me, she pointed out that it was up to her whether or not I received a promotion I'd been promised by a previous manager, that she knew I'd made major sacrifices for that promotion, including my ability to earn income from other sources, and that withdrawing that promotion would put my family in serious financial distress. She stated that if I defied her order to end my involvement in the case, she would withdraw the promotion.

Following that discussion, she scheduled me on the day I was supposed to appear in court. That scheduling turned out to not be a problem, as Amy once again got a continuance for the hearing on the civil protection order, and Rodger's camp had to ask for another continuance on the case in which I was set to testify. However, my boss did follow through with her threat. Right after Rodger won several small victories in family court, my boss hauled me in to inform me that I was no longer being "considered" for the promotion, despite being halfway through my training for the position. This threw my family into a financial emergency which almost made us homeless several times throughout the year after the promotion was stopped, and kept us in a state of poverty for 4 years. I later learned that my boss was a supporting fundraiser for the domestic violence victim's advocacy organization supporting Amy's legal pursuit of Rodger.

Even after that specific incident was over, she continued to badger me about the case. That conflict became the defining factor in my work relationship with my boss, escalating until I eventually was able to leave for another job. Despite her attempted interference, the case – and my continued involvement in it – went on.

I know you are, but what am I

When her pattern of malicious prosecution didn't get her what she wanted, Amy began stalking and harassing Rodger, his family, and his witnesses. Derogatory graffiti with her name in it began showing up painted on the walls in the women's room at my workplace. Rodger's wife began finding empty packs from Amy's favorite brand of cigarettes in the bushes beside their house, burns in the screen door, and poisoned food and toys thrown over the fence into their back yard, presumably for the family's pets.

Amy's most blatant attacks were leveled against Rodger's sister Jessica, pounding nails into the tires of her car, repeatedly trespassing on her property, vandalizing her home, and attacking her family's pets directly. The pet attack turned out to be a step too far, and Jessica requested a civil order of protection against Amy for each member of her household. Amy denied being responsible for any of Jessica's complaints, and argued that the request was being used by Jessica in retaliation for her complaints against Rodger. During testimony in the hearing for the protection order, Amy slipped up.

While Jessica's daughter was testifying, Amy continued her pattern of confrontational outbursts. While Jessica's daughter spoke about an incident involving the pets, Amy loudly denied having attacked the victimized animal, identifying it in her outburst by description. The daughter stopped, looked at the judge, and said, "If she wasn't there, how did she know that? I didn't say which pet I was talking about."

Even the victim's advocate, who accompanied Amy to the hearing in support of her argument, gave her an incredulous, shocked look, knowing she had just inadvertently admitted her crime. No charges were brought against Amy for stalking Rodger's witnesses or her acts of cruelty to animals, but the judge granted Jessica and her daughter protective orders. He excluded the men in Jessica's household, stating that they weren't in any danger from Amy. On one hand, that was ridiculously discriminatory, indicating a belief that men are invulnerable to attack. On the other, it may have stemmed from the judge's opinion that Amy is a coward who only attacks women, children, and small animals.

The first time Amy violated the orders, we learned that not all civil orders of protection are the same. Though they bear the same text, carry the same legal weight, and make the same stipulations, police don't enforce orders against women backed by the local domestic violence victim's advocacy group. They were willing to write up a report, but as soon as the perpetrator's name was added to it, they informed Jessica that they couldn't do anything to enforce the order because of Amy's ongoing litigation against Rodger. They had already received an admonition against doing so, sent to them by Amy's victim's advocate. Once again, due to her damseling, Amy was given a pass.

Here, have some ammunition

During the ordeal, Rodger suffered a terrible deterioration in his health. His blood pressure skyrocketed. His diabetes and asthma symptoms worsened, and his doctor couldn't find the answers needed to get them under control. Late in the ordeal, he was struck with cancer, and had to undergo chemotherapy and radiation treatment. When evidence of Rodger's ill-health was submitted in court, Amy accused him of falsifying his illness to avoid conviction. Given Rodger's haggard appearance, characteristic changes in his hair due to chemotherapy and stress, and presentation of medical documentation from respected doctors and facilities throughout the area, even the judge was shocked at Amy's denial.

After the vexatious litigation complaint was filed, Amy had continued her pattern as before, peppering Rodger and his lawyer with motions in the custody case, leveling accusations against Rodger and his family, and protesting every ruling. She dug up old complaints and recycled them into new requests for protection and submitted paperwork in three ongoing cases in two counties citing her debunked complaints as evidence. This pattern had continued as described above for over a year after the initial filing of the complaint.

Requests from Rodger's lawyer as to the status of the complaint received replies ranging from "it's under consideration, but a decision on going forward with it hasn't been made" to "what vexatious litigation complaint?" During the course of that year, the complaint ended up "lost" in the system, and remained so until Rodger's lawyer threatened to sue the county for discrimination and violating Rodger's right to a speedy trial. Upon receiving that threat, the clerk suddenly discovered Rodger's paperwork, and submitted it for consideration.

When Amy was served with notice of the judge's decision to hear the complaint, she responded by filing another false charge. Hard pressed to come up with anything remotely legitimate sounding, she had Rodger arrested over allegations of a terrifying and dangerous drive by greeting. This time, she tripped herself up by claiming contact at a time when she was supposed to be out of the area.

Amy's child support arrearage was at $7000.00 and rising. After half a decade of dithering, the child support enforcement agency finally went after her for the debt. To delay the inevitable, Amy had requested and been granted a two-week continuance of the case. She had claimed that she was going to be out of state, visiting family. It didn't seem to strike her as a contradiction that after previously arguing in court that she had no money to pay her support obligation, she apparently could afford a trip halfway across the United States.

During that two weeks, when she was supposed to be well over a thousand miles away, she called police and claimed that Rodger had driven past a local bar she frequented and "waved menacingly" at her while she was inside. Because of the way she called in the complaint, in this thriving little metro area where there are drugs and burglaries and rape (oh, my!), addressing it required four police officers from two different precincts: two to show up at his house and transport him to city limits, and two cars from the second precinct to collect him and transport him, as she'd told officers he was combative and dangerous. Officers were a bit surprised to find him compliant, personable, and exhausted from his medical regimen.

Again, the incident was handled poorly by police. The precinct which took him in lost their record of his arrival, but their books show that he had to post bail in order to leave. Apparently he was never there, but he still had to pay to get out.

Following that, Amy addressed the vexatious litigation complaint itself with a flurry of new litigation. She made motions demanding information to which she was not legally entitled, including the private contact information for all of Rodger's witnesses, our online identities, our employer information, and even our vehicle registration information. Included among her various court actions was a list of questions submitted for Rodger to answer, most of which were illegal for her to ask, and many of which were rehashed accusations in the form of questions.

Also included was her old friend, the continuance. Amy spent several months fighting the vexatious litigation complaint against her by offering more proof that she was, in fact, a vexatious litigant. When the case was finally heard, Rodger submitted approximately 8 inches of paperwork from Amy's various maneuvers, involving multiple police departments and both the criminal and family court systems in two different counties, including examples of motions and actions she submitted in one county after having had them denied in the other.

The judge ruled in Rodger's favor, finding that Amy's behavior did constitute vexatious litigation. Amy was barred from taking any legal action at all in relation to Rodger without first obtaining leave from the judge presiding over the vexatious litigation case. The ruling took effect immediately. Following it, Amy petitioned for leave to appeal the ruling, arguing that while she thought her massive amount of legal maneuvering didn't constitute vexatious litigation, Rodger's attempts to answer did.

Following a tense wait while the motion was considered, the judge denied Amy's petition. The ruling stood, labeling Amy a vexatious litigant, and barring her from taking any further legal action against Rodger without a judge's approval.

Rodger still suffers nightmares due to the ordeal. He is jumpy about things related to some aspects of the case, feels compelled to document his whereabouts, and for over a year after the ruling, he avoided answering the phone. He has some other PTSD symptoms that I won't share, but which can be directly traced back to conditions under which he was held for questioning (after being "not arrested" by the police) or to the experience of being subjected to surprise visits by officers. He's really not a conventional therapy kind of person – he's dealing with it in his own way and showing improvement, but after everything he was put through, his recovery is going to be a slow, hard road.

Because Amy was backed by local domestic violence victim's advocates, no charges were ever brought against her for her false allegations, for the perjury she committed in court, for her stalking of the victim, his family, and witnesses, or for her violations of judge's orders in the case. She was even permitted to get away with violating a child support order for years, eventually amassing over $8000.00 in debt from which she was partially released by a judge because of her refusal to work, (an unheard of ruling, had she been a man) all because she had the courtroom support and assistance of case workers from that domestic violence victim's advocacy organization.

Rodger's case is a direct result of discriminatory policy mandated by feminist-lobbied discriminatory law. The writing of the Violence Against Women Act is based on the Duluth model's male-perpetrator / female victim concept of domestic violence. The law contains funding for the training of every step of the legal process in following that model, also embraced by federally funded domestic victim's advocacy groups like the one used by Amy against Rodger.

Prior to the passage of VAWA, the law contained funding for such organizations, but not funding to incentivize the mandatory arrest and prosecution policies which guided law enforcement's response to Amy's accusations. Had VAWA never been passed, it still would have been illegal for men to do to women the things which Amy had alleged (except for the drive-by greeting), but when authorities became aware that Amy was lying, they would not have been led by legal guidelines to ignore common sense and assist in her harassment of Rodger. Amy would have been prosecuted for her crimes, and the state of Ohio would have been spared the expense of handling years of frivolous courtroom maneuvering.

- All of the names in the story have been changed to protect the anonymity of the involved family. Documentation has names redacted. This article has not doxxed either the perpetrator (the vexatious litigant) or the victim (her target.) The information on this case is publicly available and anyone who digs it up is solely responsible for having done so. Neither the reporter nor A Voice For Men is responsible for your actions.

VL_Page 1_redacted

VL_Page 4_redacted

VL_Page 5_redacted

VL_Page 6_redacted

VL_Page 7_redacted

VL_Page 8_redacted

VL_Page 10_redacted

Invite to feminists: come debate with Men's Rights Edmonton

James Huff · 11 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

http://youtu.be/lxZNvj74nBI

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have a very special and urgent radio show response to the events currently unfolding in Canada regarding the massive media coverage of Men's Rights Edmonton's "Don't Be That Girl" campaign. Members of the group will be joining us to discuss the deluge of attention coming from the press and angry feminists across the country.

We invite ALL interested parties especially any feminists who want to weigh in. This is an opportunity to have an open debate with those who oppose Men's Rights Edmonton's actions and we look forward to their participation.

Showtime is 8:00 PM Central Standard Time, 2am on the 12th of July in London, and 11am on the 12th of July in Brisbane.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Let's talk about those rape posters

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 12 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

By now, likely everyone in the Manosphere has heard about the attention MRAEdmonton garnered when they countered the "Don't Be That Guy" rape posters with their own "Don't Be That Girl" ones.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/updates/action-updates/mens-rights-edmonton-under-intense-media-spotlight-after-dont-be-that-girl-poster-enrages-feminists/http://www.huffingtonpost.ca/2013/07/09/dont-be-that-girl-posters_n_3570282.html#slide=1826360

http://www.vancouversun.com/news/Rape+apologist+parodies+That+posters+Edmonton/8638284/story.html

Personally, I love the posters, but what I want to talk about today is the original campaign, designed to teach men not to commit sexual assault.

On the surface, the original posters appear innocuous enough. No, obviously, you should not be having sex with a woman so drunk she is passed out face down on the couch with her ass in the air.

No, you should not even think of having sex with a woman who is staggering around the men's bathroom.

No, you should not be taking off your pants to fuck a chick passed out cold with an empty beer glass at her side and several more stacked on the bedside table.

Obviously, helping a drunk woman home does not entitle you to sex.

And in what is going to come as SHOCKING news to everyone, if someone doesn't want to have sex with you, you should not have sex with them.

I'll give you a while to process that information, because I'm sure that until this clever campaign came along, you were all busy screwing comatose girls at parties and gleefully hailing cabs so you could help ladies home and then rape them.

Tsk tsk.

Bad boys.

I think I have found a way to illustrate just how offensive these campaigns are, and what the real intention behind them happens to be.

Look at this: the bike theft capital of the world is none other than Toronto, Canada.

http://dirtydawgs.livejournal.com/28898.html

Most of the stolen bikes are never recovered, with the bulk of bikes going to China and Jamaica. Jamaica has quite a few black folks, no? So it must be black folks stealing the bikes, right? That right there is what you call LOGIC. Stolen bikes go to Jamaica, Jamaica has a lot of black people, black people must be thieves! Men like to have sex with women, sex with a woman against her will is rape, men must be rapists!

Don't worry. You'll get the hang of it.

Let's say the Toronto Police decide to tackle this epidemic of bike thievery by creating a poster campaign: Don't Be That Black Guy.

Just because you can pick the lock doesn't mean you're allowed to steal the bike. Don't Be That Black Guy.

Just because she left her bike outside the coffee shop for five minutes doesn't mean you can steal it. Don't Be That Black Guy.

Just because it's easy to jump the fence into the backyard doesn't mean you can steal that bike. Don't Be That Black Guy.

And hey, why stop there? There are so many crimes we could address by vilifying an entire group of people!

Just because you found a wallet doesn't mean you get to take all the cash before you return it. Don't Be That Jewish Guy.

Just because you own both a pressure cooker and some ball bearings doesn't mean you can build a bomb and kill people with it. Don't Be That Muslim Guy.

Just because you found a stray cat doesn't mean you can kill it and add it to the menu. Don't Be That Chinese Guy.

Just because you have allergy pills with pseudoephedrine and some hydrogen chloride lying around doesn't mean you should cook a batch of crystal meth. Don't be that Latino Guy.

I could go on, but surely it's clear that posters asking men not to be that guy, you know the rapist guy, will be just as effective as posters asking black guys not to be thieves. And why are these posters not effective?

> MOST MEN AREN'T RAPISTS

> MOST BLACK MEN AREN'T THIEVES
>
> MOST CHINESE MEN DON'T EAT CATS
>
> MOST LATINO MEN ARE NOT DRUG DEALERS
>
> MOST MUSLIMS DON'T BUILD BOMBS

And the ones that DO? They don't give a fuck about your stupid posters. They're risking their lives and freedom and their livelihoods. A police officer with a gun might stop them. Some jackass poster won't.

What the posters accomplish is to teach men they are natural-born rapists. And to teach women to fear and mistrust men. To hate them.

All men.

It's a hate campaign. There is no other word for it.

Does this look familiar?

Posters played a key role in convincing the German population that Jews were evil, scary, bad, some "thing" you should hate. And we know how that turned out, don't we? Don't Be That Guy is hate speech, pure and simple. And the more voices that call it out for what it is, the sooner we can expose the real aims of women's groups that promote these campaigns.

They're the new Nazis.

Sound harsh? Just too much to swallow? Think comparing rape campaigns to anti-Semitic propaganda is a false comparison? You might want to think again. Silence is what makes these campaigns possible. You may have other things to say about these posters, but say them you must.

Don't be that guy.

Lots of love,

JB

CORRECTIONS:

In news that will come as no surprise to my critics, everything you read on this as a first draft. I might go back and correct typos, but I have never gone back and done a re-write on any post. This post has three major errors that I want to correct, with the caveat that the errors were the result of my first draft goes up policy.

1. A commenter who calls himself Black Yoda at AVfM has quite rightly pointed out that I have left out one major group in my play on racial stereotypes: white guys. Allow me to correct that casually racist oversight:

Just because you have a five iron doesn't make the park your green.

Don't Be That White Guy

http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/lets-talk-about-those-rape-posters/#more-44997

2. My list of what people AREN'T has omitted the statement that MOST JEWISH GUYS AREN'T OBSESSED WITH MONEY.

3. My comparison of the posters to Nazism has a glaring error in that I referred to the Nazi era posters as “Jewish propaganda”. The correct words would either be “anti-Jewish” or “Nazi”.

Thanks for keeping me on my toes, readers! Don’t hesitate to call me out on blatant oversights or errors.

JB

A real feminist icon

Jared White · 12 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: The analyses offered in this piece are in reference to fictional characters portrayed in their respective films, not the actors or actresses themselves.

So there's this new movie out called Man of Steel. You may have heard of it and the Superman guy it's about. It's a great film, in my opinion. There are areas that could have been better but all in all, the movie was action packed and gushing with sci-fi comic book goodness. I lost count of the "hell yeah" shout out loud moments while watching because I was too busy shouting hell yeah!

Unfortunately there is one small bit in the film that took away some of my enjoyment if only for a few minutes. That moment came from the new Lois Lane. This version of the character is almost a carbon copy of the Lois from the Christopher Reeve era, save the change in hair color. She's a big mouth, stubborn, and continuously getting herself into situations that are way over her head. That, of course, was not the problem. The problem was the continuation of a trend that has become so standard within the mainstream media that its inclusion in this film is clumsier and more forced than an obligatory sex scene.

Not twenty seconds after Lois is introduced to the audience we get the clichéd verbal challenge to "masculine authority" used by most writers to portray their female leads as Strong Independent Women™ who don't need no man and can go toe to toe with any swinging dicks in the vicinity. This is emphasized by what she actually says: "so, if we're done measuring dicks can you have your people show me what you found?"

Subtle. The line is subtle.

Usually, lines like this have a certain pretense: the stereotypical attitude men are portrayed to harbor towards women. The female lead or support cast will then fire off snarky one-liners, leaving the men dumbfounded, their male privilege sorely checked. But now the trope is so old that writers aren't even bothering with making the male characters those stereotypical assholes. Which, I guess, is a step in the right direction. Neither of the two men that Lois spat her pointless one-liner at said or did anything that would suggest they don't respect her because she is a woman. The scientist standing behind the colonel said nothing and the colonel himself didn't shake Ms. Lane's hand because he obviously has a dislike for reporters, not women. But according to the implicit belief of script writers that women of today have fragile egos, there apparently must be at least one moment when some female character puts the males in their place.

Why was the fact that Lois Lane's entrance was nothing more than female ego-stroking so obvious? Because after said ego-stroking, when she wanders into an alien space ship in true Lois Lane fashion and is saved from that ship's defenses by our beloved man of steel, all of the faux feminist gusto that instilled her to stare down an Air Force colonel was gone, replaced instead with the hot-headed reporter that fans know and love. Oh, and before the feminists that are celebrating their heroine's dick measuring comments scream that Lane's character does not change because she still stands her ground in the face of Perry White, let me point out that being a hot-headed reporter with a chip on your shoulder and a man hating bitch with a chip on your shoulder are two entirely different things. Lois walked onto the excavation site, found the nearest man in charge and went straight for his balls with her dick measuring comment for the sole purpose of giving women in theaters the opportunity to smirk to themselves as the men on screen glanced around like lost children. Throughout the rest of the movie there are no men vs. women stare downs or gender specific insults. That scene was for the fragile female ego and nothing more.

So what, right? It's just a movie, right?

Well movies, along with television and music are a large part of what shapes our culture. Anywhere you go you will hear people trying to emulate what they see on the big and small screen. Characters like Superman and Lois Lane are what preteens aspire to be like. As I said before, those twenty seconds that served as Lane's introduction were the only gripe I had with the film. However, those twenty seconds, as I type this article, represent one of the most talked about portions of the film. So what does that mean? It means yet another young generation of women will grow up believing it is right to see men as the authoritarian enemy that needs to be knocked down a peg or two. Obviously, twenty seconds from one movie aren't going to accomplish that but as I mentioned earlier, scenes like this are now common place. Characters like Man of Steel's Lois Lane are seen by many as feminist icons for all the wrong reasons.

A few decades ago there was this moderately successful film entitled Aliens. Being a rare sequel film that was in many ways better than the original and praised as such, it helped in furthering the screen career of its lead protagonist, Ellen Ripley (played by actress Sigourney Weaver). This character, this woman, is in my opinion the quintessential feminist icon. Ripley represents what a genuinely strong and independent woman is simply because her strength and independence aren't a statement against some overblown masculine authority that wants to keep her barefoot and pregnant in some kitchen.

Ripley's strength came from her perseverance in the face of her own fear of the creature that killed her crew and nearly killed Ripley herself. It came from having the will to even face that fear when she could have just simply faded away into obscurity, which is obviously what she wanted to do after learning about the death of her daughter[1]. Ripley was also hot-headed but leagues more intelligent about it than any incarnation of Lois Lane that I have ever seen. She stood toe to toe with the Weyland-Yutani board of directors, never backing down. The scene could have been so typical of the feminist narrative that has taken over films these days. Thankfully, the writers decided to continue the template set forth from the first Alien film, which originally saw the character of Ripley as a man. That characterization shines through in the sequel as there are practically no gender specific lines spoken by Ripley. She is a great character, not because she is a man or woman, but because she is a great character. Ripley is an average human being just trying to live life and later in the movie, survive.

While Ripley & crew are in transit to LV-426, a scene that mirrors the introduction to Lois Lane is played out beautifully by Ripley. Instead of stomping her way into a space occupied by men (and two badass women, Vasquez and Ferro) and proclaiming herself queen bitch of the U.S.S. Sulaco, Ripley instead just eases her way in and gives the marines time to get used to her and respect her if they so choose. It's kind of humorous when one thinks about it: a Sci-Fi movie from the eighties about killer bug-like aliens has a more realistic scene of a civilian joining a military platoon than one of our more modern "gritty" film adaptations from the Nolan-verse.

Respect isn't owed, it's earned. Lois Lane trotted into that excavation site demanding respect because she happens to be female. Ripley gradually earned the respect of every marine serving on the Sulaco – or, at least, the ones who didn't die first. One of my favorite scenes of the movie is where Ripley instantly snags the approval of Hicks and Apone.

Ripley: "Hi. I feel like kind of a fifth wheel around here. Is there anything I can do?"

Apone: "I don't know, is there anything you can do?"

Ripley: "Well I can drive that loader. I have a class two rating."

Apone: "Be my guest."

And this is where Ripley proves that she can be of use to the group in ways other than telling them how big and scary the monsters are. Do Hicks or Apone give Ripley the typical "she's just a woman" glare? No. They stare at her like most military types do when they have to babysit a civi, like she's in the way. Once she proves otherwise they lighten up and don't give her any grief because unlike the popular belief pushed in the mainstream, men aren't assholes who view women as incapable or useless.

Taking a brief sidestep from Ripley, there are two other female characters worth mentioning: Vasquez and Ferro. Another reason why I enjoyed Aliens so much is because the characters didn't have the "super" affect, meaning they stayed within the realm of reality in regards to their physical capabilities. Vasquez held her own with her male comrades but she wasn't the typical "tough girl" who had to be portrayed as better than her male comrades. Hell, the writers of this movie even got what Man of Steel and just about every other movie gets wrong in regards to gender-specific insults.

Hudson: “Hey, Vasquez. Have you ever been mistaken for a man?”

Vasquez: “No. Have you?”

Pure gold. Was this line used to one-up Hudson because he is some misogynist asshole? No. It was combat buddies doing what combat buddies do when they aren’t in combat: insult the hell out of one another. Drake, another male marine, approved of the comeback, too. Getting back to the physical capabilities of the marines, later in the film Vasquez is held back from running into the alien hive by Hicks. Now, if Hicks were trying to restrain Apone, or Drake, they most likely would have broken free in the place of Vasquez, considering the emotional state they would have been in. But the writers decided to keep the realistic physical limitations of women in comparison to men in place for their story, allowing Hicks to basically throw Vasquez into the troop carrier. Lucky for her, too, considering what was right behind them.

The other female marine is Ferro, whom I only mention because my geek cred would be null and void if I wrote anything about this movie without mentioning the inspiration for a fan favorite character in the StarCraft franchise.

Now, back to Ripley. Proving yet again to be strong and capable, she is the one who drives the troop carrier into the hive. Without her, all of the marines, save Gorman, would have been killed. This act of bravery solidified Ripley’s standing with the surviving marines. The civi knew what she was doing and anyone that didn’t take her advice to heart was not only a fool, but a dead fool. Still, even with this realization, Ripley continued to follow the lead of the commanding officer of the marines and instead worked with him instead of letting her ego take control of the situation. In another great scene from the film, Ripley chooses to learn from the top penis of the bunch instead of continuously challenging him.

Hicks: “I want to introduce you to a personal friend of mine. This is an M-41A pulse rifle, 10 millimeter, with an over and under 30 millimeter pump action grenade launcher. Feel the weight.”

Ripley: “Okay. What do I do?”

There’s no, “are we done measuring dicks” or any other you go girl comments. Ripley is still terrified of being killed by one of the aliens. Noticing this, Hicks feels the need to teach Ripley how to defend herself and he does.

Ripley: “What’s this?”

Hicks: “That’s the grenade launcher – I don’t think you want to mess with that.”

Ripley: “You started this, show me everything. I can handle myself.”

Hicks: “Yeah, I noticed.”

Hicks obviously likes Ripley and men usually become protective of the women they like and a bit of that slipped through when he suggested the grenade launcher might have been a bit too much for Ripley. Did Ripley become smug and suggest Hicks take the ruler away from his dick? No. Even when making a statement that a woman doesn’t have to be a man in order to handle firearms Aliens handles the situations by giving women a small ego-stroke without making men feel as if they are assholes for being protective.

Again, pure gold.

There is even a scene where Ripley, taking on the role of command alongside Hicks, has to calm down one of the more emotionally unstable marines and again the writing is superb. There are more iconic scenes, set pieces, and one-liners in this film than in most film series. Two of the biggest are where the film strays from realism and goes into full on 80s action style badassery. Ripley delves into the hive alone in order to save the lone survivor of the colony, the young girl “Newt”. Ripley is armed only with a pulse rifle, a bandolier of grenades and some flares. This is where belief can be firmly suspended and we can all watch as Ripley rips (pun intended) through a hive swarming with aliens and stares down the queen bitch of LV-426. She then proceeds to murder the queen's babies and makes off with her now emotionally bonded child.

And at the end, where the debatably most iconic line from the film is spoken by our heroine, there is nothing filmgoers can look back on in order to claim that Ripley hadn't earned that moment. No reason to say she hadn't earned her status as one of the most celebrated action stars of her time. Ripley started her journey in this film as a traumatized and broken character and through strength, determination, and perseverance she managed to save the day and win the respect and admiration of female and male moviegoers alike.

Ripley is one female character with qualities that all young women should aspire to. I can say this with certainty even though I am a man simply because Ripley is a female character with qualities that young men should aspire to as well. She isn't some forced badass with super human abilities (even after those abilities are taken away by Wesker) like Alice from Resident Evil. Ripley isn't Aisha from The Losers who should be respected just because she can so very unrealistically beat the crap out of all the male leads, in her underwear no less, because you can't be a role model for women these days unless you have the beauty of a supermodel and can beat any man at anything. And Ripley most certainly isn't Man of Steel's Lois Lane, a character that has fallen victim to the undying trope that women have to humiliate men in some way in order to show they are a strong female character.

Feminists, of course, will eat obvious ego-stroking scenes like this up. Those over at Ms magazine describe it as Lois being "cognizant of hyper-masculine posturing", which basically means because of the way the men in the room were standing their posture was a threat to Lois and women in general. But as I said before the real damage being done here isn't so much giving feminist women with inferiority complexes something to cheer for. Instead, it's the subtle brainwashing of young women into believing men are the enemy or at the very least a threat that must continuously be checked with exaggerated dick measuring nonsense. While most likely the scene is just a tagged on ego-stroke used primarily to sell tickets, that still doesn't lessen nor excuse the damage.

Media propaganda shapes cultures. If that propaganda contains hate or sexism then that hate and sexism will become normalized within those cultures. What we need is a return of characters like Ellen Ripley. A character that can look those who would knowingly push this propaganda to a young girl dead in the eye and say to them, fearlessly,

"Get away from her you bitch!"

———

Editors' Notes:

[1] The death of Ripley's daughter was cut from the original theatrical release of the movie, but was detailed in the book version and other releases of the film.

Jessica Valenti on explaining feminism to men

August Løvenskiolds · 12 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Do you ever try to talk to your brother, your father, or someone in your life about feminism, but you get the sneaking suspicion (or the clear-as-day realization) that they just don't get it?

So begins our old friend Jessica Valenti's second effort at video blogging for her new feminist masters at The Nation magazine. Like a hypergamous woman trading in one husband for another, Valenti has aborted her motherly duties at Feministing in favor of a subordinate position at The Nation, a long-time liberal rag that doesn't like her very much.

As if to underline their intense hatred of Valenti, her new owners insisted that one of her new job's early efforts be #AskJessica: How Do You Get Men to Understand That Feminism Is Important? – which, ironically, is such a fabulous, unexpected gift to the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) that we should all be squealing and queefing with delight, if, in fact, men were permitted to do such things.

Bear with me while I explain.

Have you ever heard of the expression "to talk out of the side of one's mouth"? The idiomatic meaning of this phrase is "to lie", "to say contradictory things" or perhaps, "to speak in a disingenuous fashion". In the video Valenti displays a distracting facial tic wherein her mouth seems to drift to her right side even as she spouts some of the most disingenuous crap ever mouthed by a feminist – and that is saying something. I mention this tic as the elephant in the room that made me determined to deconstruct Valenti's rhetoric for the edification and education of us all – and, as a poorly linked (and edited) entry in Wikipedia asserts, "People are biologically evolved to detect the deceptive intention of other people by observing the asymmetry in the face. When people are lying, their muscle on the face[sic] gets very imbalanced."

So, how does Jessica advise feminists to get hesitant or doubtful men to understand that feminism is important?

Jessica's first point is: "Don't talk to brick walls." At first blush, one might ask, she is surrendering? Could Jessica seriously be telling feminists to NOT talk to men about feminism? Well, not really – a man dubious about feminism is a "real-life troll" to Valenti, and not to be bothered with – or so she says.

What Valenti doesn't say is that, in the gynocentric blue pill world where men define themselves by their utility to women, a woman who is miffed or tearful is placing a lot of pressure on the men in her company to do something – ANYTHING – to ease her discomfort. A woman who suddenly goes silent when discussing feminism sets off alarm bells in blue-pill heads that the Lady is Hurting, and men will quite literally kill themselves and/or each other, if necessary, to appease such women.

How do we know that this is Valenti's real point? The shaming comment about "real-world troll" is all the proof needed – Valenti is instructing feminists, in effect, to insult the living shit out of resistant men in order to beat the resistance out of them. It takes a lot of red pills for men to recognize this tactic for what it is – the men at freethoughtblogs, for example, will never grasp how they have been manipulated by feminism into abandoning their beloved skepticism – but we can see it in all of its painful clarity.

Valenti, of course, can't say "shame men" this explicitly, because that would mean she would have to take responsibility for her emotional brutalization of men, as well as it would prove that her claim of patriarchal men always oppressing women was crap. Her passive-aggressive assault maintains her plausible deniability while being absolutely clear in her message of feminists asserting and maintaining dominance over blue-pill men's emotional lives.

If a feminist called me a "real-world troll", I might reframe the point explicitly, and say something like, "Oh, how lovely – you can't prove your point logically, so maybe inflicting pain on me will help. Try crying instead. Maybe that will work. Waaaa! Waaaaaaaaaa! Nope, maybe not."

If you are lucky, she'll shut up and leave you alone after that.

Jesus, that was fun – and the fun is just starting, since we've got 5 more points to go.

Jessica's point two is "Meet people where they're at." In other words, use the pop culture interests of the men as an entry point to introduce feminism. Jessica uses the HBO network's show Game of Thrones or, alternatively, a feminist musician whose music the guy already likes, as examples of subjects that can be used to inject feminism into an otherwise innocuous conversation. Jessica apparently misses the point that the extreme privileges of pop culture icons make them discordant subjects for a Marxist philosophy that seeks to kill both privilege and those who supposedly have it.

If someone pulled that Game of Thrones crap on me, I'd point out that Game is pure fantasy that pales in comparison to the Starz network's series Spartacus, an adaptation of the historical story of male gladiatorial slaves rebelling and fighting for freedom against the mostly female characters that exploited them cruelly. And, anti-feminist musicians like Woman of the Year winner Katy Perry and Album of the Year winner Taylor Swift are hotter than Helen Reddy any day.

Jessica's point three is "Try not to get angry." Seriously, that is what she says. I fell out of my chair laughing when she first said it, and it still makes me chuckle. Who the fuck does she think she is kidding? A calm, happy feminist is a shitty feminist, and Valenti knows it – moments later she rephrases it as "don't get too angry".

Shut the fuck up, Jessica.

Before I tackle this point 3 in detail, I should note that like point 1, this is (explicitly, at least) not a "way to talk to men", but rather, an excuse for failure in talking to men. Point 2 is the only "actionable" point of the entire video – the only point where women are asked to assume some agency or action. Points 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are all designed to make feminists feel better about their failure and passivity. No people of action would ever tolerate an instruction manual that is more than 80% devoted to explaining why it is okay to fail.

This feminist devotion to passive failure robs women of the very goals of equality that feminism allegedly supports, and it plays out about across women's lives, even in their sexual dysfunctions. Men having sex expect to orgasm, and it they fail to climax, they actively seek to address the situation. Women, by contrast, are told it is okay if they don't orgasm – they can just blame their orgasmic incompetence on their partners.

The only oppression here is feminist Valenti's repeated message that women are failures who can expect to keep on failing, and failing, and failing….

I'd guess that Valenti also knows that women have little to no control over their anger, and that ordering them to control it (as Valenti suggests) only makes the ensuing explosion of anger all the more violent. The more one violently abuses men, the more care men take to "walk on eggshells" and become hyper-vigilant, which Valenti hopes will force men to engage with feminism. Again, saying "don't get angry" is like saying "don't think about pink elephants", and again, Valenti preserves her deniability.

When I speak to people in my life about Men's Rights, I tap into my anger – it gives me a laser-like focus and a demeanor that grabs people's attention. Styles of the expression of male anger include the "pit bull" (loud, red-faced barking, about 3/4 of men) and the "cobra" (cool, deadly focus, about 1/4 of men). My cobra-style has served me well, and if your way of expressing anger trends more pit-bullish – well, I'm not sure if that will work for you in discussions of feminism and men's human rights, but if you can master the focusing of your anger, I'd say, go for it – it works well for me.

As Jessica expands on this point, she says that asking questions can get past men's defenses – questions like "why they believe pay inequity is not a problem" (because the notion that women are paid less for identical work is a bald-faced lie, Jessica – if it were true, then women would be 100% employed, because it would be more cost-effective to hire cheaper women than more expensive men).

Jessica's point four is "Expect pushback." Yes, this is not a way to talk to men, but rather, it is just an excuse to fail.

Another one. “How to deal with pushback” is the obvious and more proactive choice, but feminism and women’s agency are two things that are rarely seen in the same room together.

Jessica’s point five is “Fighting for gender justice is not a zero-sum game.” Of course, Jessica doesn’t include gender justice for men at all – she is talking about fighting for gender justice in the developed world (where things are great for women, comparatively speaking) as opposed to fighting for gender justice in places where female genital mutilation is commonplace. Jessica is suggesting, in essence, that a woman in America with a fading manicure needs as much attention as a young girl facing a rusty razor blade clitoridectomy elsewhere. Of course, men facing genital mutilation only show up on the feminist radar as a point of humor and derision. Nor does she allude to the numerous feminist groups and feminist-influenced agencies that have written the zero-sum game into political and legal policy and promoted it culturally in federally funded campaigns addressing sexual abuse and domestic violence in a one-sided, zero-sum manner.

She also doesn’t seem to realize that conceiving of gender justice as a “non zero-sum game” requires women shutting up and listening to men now and again.

Hmmm. Maybe that’s one way you could sell feminism to men: by listening to them for a change. Jessica encourages feminists to ask questions of men but only as a means to find entry points for her ideology. But listening and engaging with men’s concerns is a surprisingly active activity and we all know feminism’s stance on female agency and men’s real issues – they have time for neither one. Anyway, I digress.

Jessica’s point six is “You’re not going to change everyone’s mind.” Again, we see the culture of female hypoagency – women expect women to fail – and then, have men rush to the rescue.

At the time of this writing the Youtube page for #AskJessica has about 5000 views and the downvotes are outpacing upvotes by about 3 to 1. The comments are being heavily censored but the most highly upvoted comment suggests a debate between Valenti and our own Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat). Of course, Karen would obliterate Jessica in such a contest, but it would be interesting to see an actual test of Valenti’s 6 talking points play out in the real world.

Still, if Valenti loves medieval fantasy worlds, then a debate with GWW is a consummation devoutly to be wished, if only to see a thousand natural shocks play across Jessica’s twisted, mocking maw.

After all, debate is active, and I’d put my money on the woman with agency – who doesn’t pre-excuse her failures – any day of the week.

Pumpski

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 12 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Pumpski lived at the end of my street and he was my good mate in grade seven. He despised ants and would shout down at them when he saw them and you could tell it was personal.

"You bastards are just like idiot humans that go to war!"

He was mostly normal when ants weren't around, and one Sunday he came over to my place excited and exhibited two enormous empty Vegemite jars that were sloped in at the sides.

"We gotta go to Brackett's Creek and catch a thousand bulldog ants and shove them in these."

Bulldog ants were bigger than an inch long and Pumpski showed me something fascinating about them the summer before. He cut one in half and we watched the head grab the tail while the tail was stinging the head and he cleared his throat and spoke in a grave voice.

"That's exactly like humans in wars. The head is one country fighting and the arse is the other country fighting and all the time it's killing itself and doesn't know it."

We spent two hours hiking to Brackett's where the Banksia's and Macadamia trees grew and no matter how much I begged him Pumpski wouldn't explain the plan. We found a cluster of three bulldog ant nests next to a rusty Chevy that had been abandoned by Ben Brackett's dad in 1939. Pumpski looked at them swarming and he snorted.

"Let's get 'em 'cause I need to freeze a shit load of 'em."

We unscrewed our jars and started filling them and by this time I was annoyed.

"Freeze them?"

He laughed and finally let on about his plan.

"I read in a science journal that when you stick 'em in the fridge they stop moving but they always come back to life when you warm them up, and I'm gonna sprinkle 'em all in Mrs. Lanham's desk when they're still frozed."

Mrs. Lanham was our teacher and it all made sense now. Recently she had made Pumpski stand at the front of the class with a dog muzzle on him with a sign underneath that read, "Male Boy. Do Not Feed.", and all because he was asking why sheilas never had to sign up for wars.

On Monday morning he sat next to me and his eyes were popped rounder than I'd ever seen. "I reckon we got nine hundred and sixty and I chucked the lot in her desk and now all we gotta do is sit back and watch and say nothing."

He never took his eyes off her desk and when Mrs. Lanham came into the room and sat down he snickered to me.

"They'll come out the hole of the inkwell slow at first, but when they all warm up it's game over mate."

I was already nervous, and ten minutes later the first bulldog ant wandered out and then I got really scared. Pumpski was right. They did come back to life when they thawed, and when two of them wandered up Mrs. Lanham's sleeve she flicked them off and her voice was quivery.

"Settle down kids. It's just a couple of ants."

When she said that someone shouted, "Look!"

The rim of the inkwell was dark with dozens of the ants escaping and she opened her mouth and squeaked. She flung up the lid of the desk and they poured out over the sides like licorice toffee boiling too hot in a saucepan.

The whole class jumped up from the seats like we were on pins and there was screaming and hooting everywhere. Mrs. Lanham jerked back violently and bonked the back of her head on the chalk-board and Pumpski yelped at me.

"Look at her eyes. They're going strange and that means she's gonna faint. I read about that in medical journals."

She collapsed forwards and her head dipped deep into the open desk before she slipped down the chair to the floor. Her blonde hair held a great clump of ants looking like a mop just used to wipe up molasses, and we stayed way back terrified as we watched them scramble down to her heels. The janitor heard the screaming and threw a bucket of soapy water on her, and a few seconds later Mr. Green the headmaster ran in and sprayed her with a fire extinguisher that covered all of her in foam.

"Stand back clown! Water's no good. The foam will retard the nipping."

Mr. Green only used the word retard when it was for something scientific and never about humans and we were sent home immediately. The next morning when we sat in class there was an announcement over the school loudspeaker system. It told how Mrs. Lanham was recovering and that the school was giving her money for the trauma due to the ants and that the culprits would soon be caught. Pumpski grabbed my arm and stared into the distance.

"Mate that's what we gotta do. We have to faint and they'll listen to us when we make our demands when we come to."

I didn't know what he was talking about. "What demands?"

He ignored me and put up his hand and spoke in a wobbly voice to the replacement teacher. "Excuse me, sir. I am troubled about something and it's affecting me deeply."

The new teacher looked up and frowned and I thought that Pumpski would cave but he didn't. He just mumbled something and made his eyes weird and he slithered down his seat and flopped to the floor pretending his whole body was made of jellyfish parts.

The class was laughing hard and the teacher wasn't buying it. He prodded him with his shoe for two whole minutes while Pumpski did nothing, so he picked him up and flipped him over his shoulder and dumped him on the visitor's couch in Mr. Green's office and informed him that he wasn't coming back.

I didn't see Pumpski for four days, and when he came over he told me that Mr. Green fell for the fainting because he was really polite and gave him peanut brittle and talked about his hobby of breeding dogs and collecting lighthouse blueprints.

"I've stumbled on somethin' powerful Ian. If we use this new power properly we can make demands like longer lunches or no more homework and we might even get sympathy money from the school treasury."

For the next few days he didn't say anything more to me about fainting, but on Friday he told everyone. I saw him handing out small bits of paper to the blokes in our year, and when he handed one to me it read, "Faint For Demands at EXACTLY 11 seconds past 11:11 AM Today."

I told him flat out, "I'm not going to faint nor is anyone else." He looked at me and his eyes got popped again.

"Bloody oath they will! Every bloke I spoke to is going to pretend to drop dead because the ANZACs stopped fighting at eleven o'clock on the eleventh day on the eleventh month and those three elevens are always in our brains reminding us of wars."

He stared at me waiting for my response and he explained, "Humans always remember emotions, and wars are always about emotions."

Pumpski was funny about wars and ants, but he was right about numbers and emotions because when the clock on the wall clicked eleven seconds past eleven minutes past eleven, every bloke including me dropped to the floor as dead as wet sacks of chalk. I had to join in because if I didn't it would have been embarrassing.

Mrs. Andlecott, the new permanent teacher, sighed and hushed all the girls who were giggling. "Young ladies be quiet. Let's wait to see who will be the last boy to get up off the floor and go back to his chair."

My eyes were closed while I heard the boys going back to their seats one by one and Mrs. Andlecott sighed again and this time her words were growled.

"The last boy on the floor will be punished. So who will it be?" and when I heard that I thought bugger the ants and wars and demands. I got up and sat down and saw that Pumpski was the only one still lying on the floor and he wasn't twitching.

Mrs. Andlecott did a slow clap and sneered. "It seems Nathan is the ringleader", and a second later Mr. Green walked in and picked him up and stepped out the door with him flopped over his shoulder like he was a dingo trapper heading for home. I never saw Pumpski again because his dad promptly moved the family to the other side of town and got an unlisted number.

Three years later I read a short story buried on page six in the Courier Mail that told of an entire classroom of grade ten girls who fainted at the same time during the ANZAC minute of silence. It went on to describe how the ringleader was expelled and how he instigated the incident because he was doing a sociological experiment involving wars, ants and gender.

I knew it was Pumpski, and I cheered him when it was casually mentioned that the school was planning to build an undercover netball court.

Original artwork, © Ian Williams. 2013.

Announcing Indian News Director Anil Kumar

Robert O'Hara · 13 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

It is my pleasure to announce Anil Kumar as the new Indian News Director for A Voice for Men. Kumar has been at the forefront of men's issues in India and is considered to be one of the founders of the Men's Rights Movement there. He has been deeply involved in every important initiative involving the rights of men and fathers in his country for years now and his passion for the cause is unassailable.

Kumar brings with him his experience as a citizen lobbyist, having done work in the U.S. as well as India in this capacity, and a leader who meticulously organizes activists in his country who have already made headway in the press and the government. We are ecstatic to have him on our growing news team as India is proving to be a very important front for our movement. Please join AVFM staff in welcoming this very valuable person to our family.

Robert O'Hara

News Director

[/box]

Chivalry to save us from “The Reality”

Jim Muldoon · 13 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Nikki Gemmell wrote an article in The Australian which purported to put Gillard’s tenure in office in context (Gemmell, 2013). Apparently, we Australians should be ashamed. Ashamed of what she ominously calls “The Reality.”

Gemmell’s talent as a fiction writer is is brought to the fore with what is termed stream-of-consciousness. For those who are unfamiliar, it goes something like this:

A thought. Another one. A relation? Between them? Maybe! But then, of course…Hang on! Another thought. God, I get so many. And logic? You decide what it is. For you. Not for me. I have my own, and I’m fine with that.

In theory, this kind of writing allows the author to let you into their inner dialogue. It is an attempt to give the reader the raw person. We get the thoughts before grammar, manners, logic and other filters make the primeval, instinctual emotions more presentable.

In other words, there is no need to write like a mature adult. What it does, in Gemmell’s case, is allow her to make the most childish demands for privilege seem like a sophisticated argument for the betterment of society.

Essentially, Gemmell breaks the Australian population into two distinct groups: The misogynists who marred Gillard’s time in office and those who allowed the misogynists to go unopposed.

Clearly there is an implied third group: Those who speak out against misogyny. This includes Gemmell. They are morally superior enough to speak out, but humble enough to let others point out just how brave they are.

She is ashamed. She spoke out. We didn’t. We should be ashamed. Ashamed that we were not ashamed. Be shamed into shame. Admit our shame. Hold our shame to the world. Be proud of our shame.

And with shame comes sorrow. But then understanding. And healing.

And superiority. After all, whose shame came first?

This shame is because Abbott stood beside a sign saying “Ditch the Witch”; Alan Jones, a radio presenter, questioned Gillard’s sanity; sexist comments from soccer coach Hosiek; A sex scandal in the Army, with the absolute certainty that there is a possibility that some soldiers may get charged with something. It all adds up to a nation that should be ashamed.

Less than 20 people, all judged as wanting by Gemmell, in a country of 23 million and we all should be ashamed.

Please, don’t anyone tell her about the criminal courts. There, everyday, men and women plead guilty to murder, manslaughter, rape, assault, battery, sex trafficking, armed robbery and all kinds of terrible crimes.

And I’ll bet every one of the victims of these crimes, if given the choice, would have preferred to have been called a few names instead. If we were to truly feel some level of guilt for other people’s bad behaviour we would be positively dripping with shame.

But, of course, these are not important people. They’re just plebs. They probably live in the outer suburbs. Grubby lot. No, we’re talking about famous people. Those people who get on the TV and radio:

The People Who Matter.

Gillard’s time in office was supposed to be a “golden era for Australian women.” Why? Says who? Says Gemmell. But what Gemmell really wanted was a golden era for Gillard personally.

We should have been celebrating that the prime minister was female. Nothing else was important. We should have made sure, regardless of how badly she was doing the job, that it was a positive experience for Gillard.

Applause for the great leader. What did she do? Don't ask. Just clap.

That way, apparently, we would attract more female prime ministers.

Throw in some fish and I know a few seals that would do the job.

But no, Gillard was treated badly. Worse than the men have ever been treated, according to Gemmell.

Really? Worse than Abbott, her rival for the top job? Forget that Abbott's nickname, frequently used by various commentators, is the "Mad Monk"? A reference not only to his sanity but his religion. Forget the questions of him having "the balls" to wear those swimming trunks and other comments on his physique? Forget Gillard's accusations of misogyny? Forget that it went viral to the glee of feminists worldwide? Forget that the man has a wife and three daughters and the leader of the country says he hates them?

And if you can't forget, pretend.

Gemmell's answer to "The Reality", if you can wade through the disgrace and humiliation, returns to that old saw of Good Men. Yes, after numerous references to progressiveness, modernity and maturity, it's time to polish up your armour and get back on your charger. Chivalry is "needed more than ever now".

Ah, those good old days. Today, if a woman drops her handkerchief on the ground it might just lay there. What if she faints? Which Good Man will throw himself onto the ground to cushion her fall?

What if she comes to a puddle? Will no Good Man throw down his coat? If he has no coat, can't he just put his head in the puddle for her to stand on? The lady's shoes must not get muddied!

Presumably, when the golden era of Gillard commenced, the Good Men should have taken off their cloth caps, threw them in the air and shouted "Hooray". And then, in celebration, they could ask for another hour's hard labour. And happily pay more taxes.

If only Good Men would stand up to the misogynists.

But a return to chivalry? What does that actually mean?

Should the Good Men challenge Alan Jones to a joust? Put a twelve-foot long, metal tipped lance through his eye? Smash open his armour with a mace and then stick their swords through his belly before beheading him?

No more unpleasant remarks from you, my lad.

Or a duel with Tony Abbott? Slice him with a rapier? Stab his black heart?

Try standing beside a sign now, Mad Monk!

Or would pistols be more noble? More dignified? Let Hosiek bleed to death after being shot in the gut?

These, of course, are not questions one should ask of a lady. The Good Men can simply attend to the details such that the lady is pleased.

The Reality?

Gemmell wouldn't know it if it fell on her.

Notes:

Gemmell, N., 2013. A Nation's Shame. [Online]
Available at: http://www.theaustralian.com.au/news/features/a-nations-shame/story-e6frg8h6-1226671442132
[Accessed 5 July 2013].

Why would Edmonton's Karen Smith lie?

John Hembling (JtO) · 13 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Why would Karen Smith tell such an obvious and stupid lie?

Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton is the organization behind the Don't Be That Guy campaign. Karen Smith is the executive director, and told an interviewer with the CBC that the posters stating "Don't Be That Girl"–a parody done by AVfM affiliate MREdmonton–and which identified the problem of false accusations of rape, were disappointing and inaccurate: "It just doesn't happen. Nobody would report sexual assault needlessly because it is a grueling process to go through."

The posters also say: "Just because you had a one night stand, doesn't mean your sexual encounter was not consensual. Lying about sexual assault = a crime".

According to a major fraction of mainstream commentary, these "Don't Be That Girl" posters are "rape apologetics". This is too stupid to bother refuting, but it merits mention as an illustration of the tone of public commentary. In fact, "Don't Be That Girl" refers to the phenomenon of wilfully fraudulent accusations of rape, the prevalence of such cases, and the near total lack of legal consequences for accusers making such claims. But Karen Smith, the executive director of Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton said in a CBC interview that it just doesn't happen.

It just doesn't happen.

Interestingly, the CBC reporter who wrote the July 9 article entitled "Posters say some women lie about sexual assault" is not named, and the article on CBC.ca has no author attribution or by-line. This means that whatever irresponsible dolt at CBC did write the piece, nobody can criticize them with the observation that on the same website, there is a 2009 article entitled "Edmonton cabbie sues passengers over false assault allegations".

That article documents the story of a veteran Edmonton taxi driver whose female passengers accused him of sexual assault to avoid paying a their cab fare. The cabbie was saved by a camera which recorded what actually happened: the women had refused to refrain from smoking in his cab, and then refused to pay the – wait for it – THIRTEEN DOLLAR fare. To avoid any consequence of not paying that $13, they claimed sexual assault – and the "grueling process" began.

That's what a man's life, freedom, reputation, family, and future livelihood is worth. Thirteen bucks.

But according to Karen Smith, executive director of Sexual Assault Voices, It Just Doesn't Happen. So why would somebody in a position of such public trust, responsibility, and power tell such an idiotic, stupid, and irresponsible lie?

It just doesn't happen.

Crystal Mangum
http://abcnews.go.com/US/woman-accused-duke-lacrosse-team-members-rape-charged/story?id=13295161#.UeC4b_Y6XIw

Elizabeth Jones
http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/uknews/crime/9894588/Compulsive-liar-jailed-after-11-false-rape-claims-in-decade.html

Nafissatou Diallo
http://www.nypost.com/p/news/opinion/editorials/no_longer_welcome_t7suy3KUG6mLTPqfFazVeI

Kirsty Debanks
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2325668/Woman-lied-police-said-ex-boyfriend-raped-jailed-months-moth er-reported-suspicions.html?ito=feeds-newsxml

Katelyn Webster
http://www.wpxi.com/news/news/local/teen-admits-faking-rape-south-park-wave-pool/nW428/

Linsey Attridge
http://www.dailyrecord.co.uk/news/scottish-news/rape-liar-who-picked-victims-1937190

Leanne Black
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2358759/Leanne-Black-finally-jailed-FIVE-false-rape-allegations-ex-boyfriends-years.html

Wanetta Gibson
http://kdvr.com/2013/06/18/woman-who-falsely-accused-football-player-of-rape-ordered-to-pay-2-6m/

And there is also false accuser Ligia Filler.
http://www.fillerfund.com/history.htm

A few journalists are starting to stand up to liars like Smith, including Robyn Urback:
http://fullcomment.nationalpost.com/2013/07/10/robyn-urback-sometimes-assault-accusations-are-false-a-little-awareness-is-ok/

Urback writes, It's shocking, all right. And arguably provocative to a fault. After all, Men's Rights Edmonton could have made the same point without making a parody of an existing anti-rape campaign, a move that will rub salt in the wounds of those already sensitive to the issue. But despite the tactless presentation, the message remains fair: Sometimes, women falsely accuse men of rape.

Despite Urback's distaste for the ungentle tone of the posters, she is at least willing to concede that the concerns they raise are valid.

Maybe somebody ought to tell the executive director of the Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton: Hey Karen, Don't Be That Girl.

Don’t be THAT princess

VFM News and Commentary · 14 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]Meshael Alayban, 42, was arrested and charged Wednesday July 10th, 2013 for allegedly keeping slaves in her Orange county, California residence.

Her arrest followed the complaint of a 30-year-old Kenyan woman who flagged down a bus and asked the driver for help.

The Kenyan woman said that Alayban said that she accepted a job with Alayban in Kenya in 2012, hoping to earn enough money to pay her daughter’s medical bills. Instead, Alayban transported her to the United States, confiscated her passport, held her captive against her will at her home and forced her to work almost round the clock for $200 a month, instead of the promised $1600 a month wage.

Upon investigating, police found four other women living and working in Alayban’s home, all of whom left voluntarily with officers, stating a desire to be free.

Because she confiscated the women’s passports and is accused of refusing to allow her accuser to leave, Alayban is charged with human trafficking.

Alayban, who faces up to 12 years in prison if convicted, is today free on 5 million dollar bail, paid by check, issued by Saudi Arabia officials. She has been ordered to wear a GPS tracking device until her hearing.

Alayban’s lawyer has argued that her bail was too high, and the case is unmerited, labeling the situation a “domestic work hours dispute.”

Meshael Alayban, Saudi Princess, Accused Of Human Trafficking

Saudi princess free on $5 million bail in Calif.

Saudi Arabian princess charged with human trafficking after a domestic slave at her Orange County condo managed to escape

Saudi princess, Meshael Alayban, held in Calif. on human trafficking charges, $5 million bail

[/box]

Don't be THAT prosecutor

Diana Davison · 14 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Putting more men in jail is a feminist issue. Keeping innocent men out of jail is a men's issue. It's no surprise that these two opposing forces have finally met in a public train crash on the railroad of prosecutorial misconduct.

Mary Kellett, a Maine prosecutor, is facing disciplinary hearings for withholding exculpatory evidence to increase her conviction rates regardless of guilt or innocence. In Kellett's predicament, whether it was a personal hatred of men or a distortion of priorities placing her career ambitions above her duty to uphold justice is something only she can understand but this is not an isolated incident of a singular, sick individual.

Prosecutors have more power than judges and less accountability because what they do is mostly hidden from public view. They decide which cases will be pursued, what sort of plea bargaining will be offered, and what sentencing to seek in each case. All of this happens before the accused gets his day in court and, often, prevents the falsely accused from even having a day in court. The prosecutor is both judge and jury in approximately 95% of criminal cases.

"The disproportionate power prosecutors have under our system means it is vital to have some policing mechanism to ensure they do their jobs fairly. Yet, this is where we fall far short. The system protects prosecutors from civil liability even when they knowingly mishandle cases. And the legal concept of "harmless error" allows convictions to stand unless the prosecutor's improper actions affected the outcome of a trial."

The Innocence Project has currently helped exonerate over 300 men who were wrongfully convicted, some of them on death row, for crimes they did not commit. One of the common reasons that innocent men are sent to prison is "government misconduct" which includes both law enforcement officials and prosecutors.

Concern over lack of accountability in the legal system has been ongoing yet the conversation keeps getting waylaid without action. Fifty years after the term "Brady Violation" was introduced, Lawrence S. Goldman notes that "[p]rosecutors who have committed Brady violations, even those which have been later demonstrated to have resulted in wrongful convictions and lengthy terms of imprisonment for persons later proven innocent, are rarely prosecuted." A Brady violation describes cases, such as Kellett's, where exculpatory evidence is suppressed when it may have proven the innocence of the accused. Brady violations occur on a regular basis.

If we were to gather up and put on trial "The Brady Bunch" of prosecutors there wouldn't be a courtroom big enough to fit the guilty family. Such a trial would be most rewarding if the jury was composed of all the people sent to jail for the benefit of the these lawyer's careers. The sentence, instead of just losing their licence to practice law, should be equivalent to the amount of time spent behind bars that their victims had to endure.

But there will be no such trial in the name of justice, and the concern of the media fizzles out every year without effecting an ounce of accountability. In February, 2012, The New York Times pointed out that instead of working towards greater accountability, the Brady law was instead weakened by adding a clause that it only applied to "material" evidence. The Pacific Standard reported in April of this year that "[e]ven when prosecutors engage in strikingly unethical behavior, they are rarely sanctioned for it, much less criminally charged."

These are problems that arise when an industry is created that benefits from putting men in jail. And the prison industry is huge.

The question remains as to what truly motivates lawyers to subvert the justice they vowed to serve.

Just as lawyers, police, and judges have no job without crime, professional feminists have no job without "patriarchy" and "rape culture" theory. The efforts of groups like Edmonton's SS-A with their "Don't Be That Guy" campaign are the type of incentive given to people like Mary Kellett to bypass the law and convict as many men as possible. It impresses the public.

In 2007 The National District Attorneys Association (NDAA) produced a report on whether or not lower conviction rates were an indication of poor performance by a prosecutor. They made many observations including that "[p]ublic accountability has become paramount in a world of social interests competing for limited public resources" and that 90% of the media calls they receive relate to conviction rates as a measure of performance.

"Unfortunately, when the media, legislators, and county/city councils rely solely on conviction and plea bargain rates to define "success," prosecutors may find it difficult to surmount negative public opinion, and worse yet, challenges to their funding needs." The NDAA produced flow charts and guidelines that include recommendations to reduce the public's fear of crime as well as promoting the "fair, impartial, and expeditious pursuit of justice." The report both recognizes the external pressures to increase conviction rates and cautions prosecutors about their methods of collecting performance data.

Given that pressure from special interest groups and the media creates an acknowledged ethical problem for prosecutors, we should be very concerned when "rape culture" advocates create headlines demanding that more rapists go to jail.

In April 2013, The Guardian ran a story that pitted Keir Starmer from the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) against Emily Thornberry, a Labour MP. Thornberry was demanding answers for low conviction rates in rape cases.

"'I am disappointed that the proportion of domestic violence cases where no action at all is taken remains stubbornly high,' Thornberry said. 'Given that the CPS has rightly made violence against women and girls a priority, I would have expected this proportion to fall.'"

When Starmer attempts to explain that "A case may fail for a whole host of evidential reasons" the discussion turned to funding issues. The faulty premise of Thornberry's vehemence about increasing conviction rates is the same error made by Lise Gottell in her outrage at the transformation of her "Don't Be That Guy" message: They assume that false accusations of rape are negligent and that the few who are convicted are always guilty.

In a Global News article on the subject Karen Smith, of Edmonton's SS-A says of rape "people just don't lie about that." She is backed up by Sean Armstrong of the Edmonton Police who assures the public that false rape claims are "extremely rare." Both of these assertions are not only impossible to maintain when proper analysis has never been conducted, they encourage more aggressive prosecution of all rape claims without concern for the presumption of innocence.

Not only are false rape claims a real problem, there are repeat offenders committing this crime. I offer a partial list of the recently guilty who have been in the news just since last June:

Leanne Black July 9th, 2013. Jailed after five false rape allegations.
Astria Berwick July 4th, 2013. Jailed for 16 months.
Sara Ylen trial set for July 9th, 2013. Also accused in another county of lying about having cancer.
Wanetta Gibson June 17th, 2013. In connection to the Brian Banks case was ordered to repay $2.6M of compensation money for a false rape claim.
Philippa Costello June 23rd, 2013. Jailed for false rape allegations against a soldier.
Linsey Attridge June 27th, 2013. Randomly chose her false rape accusation victim on facebook.
Jasmine Levanna Kurre July 5th, 2013. Convicted of assault after filing a false rape report.
Cierra N. Reyes-Benitez July 3rd, 2013. Plead guilty to filing a false rape report.

The problem with quoting a 2% false accusation rate is that more properly conducted studies result in compelling evidence that it's closer to 40-60%. The above listed cases indicate that the higher statistic, based on more thorough investigations, is more accurate than what The Weekly Standard calls "The Noble Lie, Feminist Style."

While the methods and "tone" of men's right groups may be distasteful to some people, being "politically correct" is not going to stop the current boxcar full of innocent men trapped on the Railroad To Prison. Every time the media parrots agenda driven claims of feminists another Mary Kellett turns the men of her town into fodder for a political machine. Every campaign that characterizes men as inherently evil puts another innocent man behind bars. Every poster that claims men are solely responsible for “rape culture” releases another guilty woman from the jail cell to which she was gleefully sending her victim.

The myths perpetuated by campaigns like “Don’t Be That Guy” are demonstrably part of the motivation for prosecutors like Mary Kellett to convict innocent men. It’s not a problem of one woman in one town, it’s prosecutors everywhere who have no safety checks on their potential abuse of power and mostly enjoy immunity for their crimes when caught. The problem has been well known for decades and nothing has been done about it.

Sometimes justice is served by dropping a criminal investigation but a curious condition arises when people’s careers are put in jeopardy by doing their jobs well. While it is reasonable to assume that those who enter into legal professions do so out of a passion for justice, it is also reasonable to assume that they also care about getting promotions and keeping their jobs.

While some lawyers are more concerned with their careers than the ideal of justice, we should also appreciate the type of lawyers who have teamed up with The Innocence Project to help exonerate the wrongly accused. Decades of concern over Brady violations and prosecutorial misconduct hasn’t effected any changes yet but the court system is being given a chance to make a difference every time a Mary Kellett comes before their bench.

Feminists ask the public to presume defendants guilty until proven innocent then scream when such innocence is proven, declaring it to be poor performance of the justice system. Men’s Human Rights Advocates ask the public to presume innocence until proven guilty which is, not surprisingly, a human right.

It’s time for organizations like Edmonton’s SS-A to become socially accountable and show their professed morality by ceasing to persecute an entire gender while failing to hold the other gender responsible for their own crimes. It’s time for prosecutors to get a clear message that their job is not to appease lobbyists or politicians. It’s also time for the media to stop printing spin articles supporting the idea that defending wrongly accused men is somehow supporting the act of rape. You can’t be a “rape apologist” where no rape was actually committed.

Get the story straight.

When The Brady Bunch offers their defense before the courts, asking why they intentionally sent innocent men to prison, those prosecutors might start naming people like Emily Thornberry, Lise Gottell, Karen Smith, Sean Armstrong, and the media as their accomplices.

Don’t be THAT guy

Hannah Wallen · 14 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently Edmonton’s SS-A executed an advertising campaign called “Don’t be that guy,” which, like the “Teach men not to rape” campaign of American feminist origin, paints the crime in a very dishonest light. These campaigns, which treat rape as something men do to women and to each other, but not as something women do at all, take two very specific attitudes toward men and rape: first, that all men and boys are voracious, slavering animals inclined at any time to go on a rampage of wanton despoliation, and second, that rape is something men might commit unknowingly and unintentionally, out of a lack of consideration or understanding.

The posters created for the campaign portray men as libidinous, reckless clods, whose natural tendency is to fuck first, and ask questions later, if at all.

The campaign isn’t any nicer to women, as pointed out by Men’s Rights Edmonton’s parody of one of the posters. Some of Edmonton’s SS-A’s originals imply that mutually drunk sex is male on female rape. One in particular shows an alert, enthusiastic woman holding up a drink, with text calling her drunk, implying that drinking negates a woman’s ability to consent even when she is obviously not impaired. This is female hypoagency in action; in labeling an alert woman engaging the viewer as “drunk,” the campaign treats all degrees of “drunk” from “tipsy” on down as mentally incapacitating to women. By also using images showing men with beer bottles in their hands in other, similar messages, the campaign also employs male hyperagency to elicit a judgmental response. While women are presumed incapacitated at the first sip, men who have been drinking are treated as always competent, cognizant, and in control. Alcohol exempts women from due diligence by transferring that responsibility to their male partners. The posters might as well say, “Sorry ladies. Alcohol kills brain cells. Don’t drink and… well, do anything. You don’t have that level of capability. What do you think you are, a man?”

By design, this part of the campaign treats all drunk sex as rape. While it’s right and reasonable to say that sexual imposition upon an individual who genuinely is incapacitated is rape, it’s irresponsible and dangerous to teach people that alcohol negates female agency regardless of the amount consumed or its actual effect on the drinker’s cognizance. It’s equally irresponsible to teach people that alcohol only affects female agency, or that it never effects male agency when a female is involved, something this campaign teaches both by insinuation and by omission. The combined effect is promotion of the idea that all drunk heterosexual sex, no matter to what degree each participant is drunk, is male-on-female rape.

In promoting that idea, the campaign is harmful in two ways: It treats male consent as presumed, encouraging women to ignore men’s right to refuse sex. It also directly encourages women to make false accusations against men that would be very hard, if not impossible, to counter in today’s legal and social environment, where mere accusation is enough to infer guilt.

The careless and irresponsible nature of a campaign that treats all drunk sex as rape inspired Men’s Rights Edmonton to come up with a counter-statement to its inferences, in the form of parody posters addressing the issue of false allegations. They placed these in the some of the same locations as the originals.

When Edmonton’s SS-A and their feminist supporters discovered Men’s Rights Edmonton’s parodies, they immediately went off the deep end with affronted rage. They frothed at the fingers, tweeted, ranted, and ran to the press with cries of rape culture and rape apology, accusing MREdmonton of blaming rape victims for the crimes of their attackers, while downplaying the incidence of false allegations and male victims of female perpetrators. Some went so far as to call false allegations a myth.

Right.

Contrary to feminist assertions, false accusations of rape have been taken so lightly and tolerated so easily for so long that some women use them as a weapon in custody battles, or to get out of taxi cab fare, or even just for attention. The commonness of the problem is much greater than they’re willing to admit, likely in part due to a legal environment designed to tolerate rather than eliminate false reporting.

The same is true with female perpetration against male victims. It's much more common than critics assert, a fact that is known to and has been deliberately hidden by feminist advocates.

Critics of MREdmonton's parody posters are hiding their encouragement for false rape accusation behind manipulative reference to and use of sympathy for female victims. Exploiting society's protective attitude toward women to try to guilt trip people away from addressing false allegations is demeaning to all rape victims. It treats the experience of being raped, reporting it, and going through the legal process as if that's no different and no more legitimate than the act of making up a lie and reporting that. It's the exact opposite of the kind of support rape victims need and deserve and you can't victim blame someone who was never a victim.

Pitting the plight of the falsely accused against sympathy for actual victims is dishonest, sneaky, and wrong. Feminists who do so choose to ignore the fact that the "falsely" in falsely accused refers to someone who did not commit the crime, not someone who is trying to get away with rape. They must, in order to maintain the attitude that the presumption of guilt and and a system weighted toward conviction are not violations of the rights of accused men…and their attitude is specific to female accusers, and accused men.

The choice to encourage false accusation by diluting the meaning of the term "rape," and demonizing all men by inference, is a dismissive attitude toward the experiences of men, treating them as disposable. In order to willfully ignore the problem of false allegations, one must be willing to accept destroying the accused's life for the sake of maintaining a belief in accuser credibility regardless of whether the accusation has merit. One must be willing to sacrifice accused men for a cause. In this case, that cause is feminist power, and continued funding for feminist initiatives and feminist groups.

That is really what it's all about. Prevention isn't even on the radar. If the "don't be that guy" campaign really were about rape prevention, it would be more accurately designed to address the dynamics and perpetration of rape, rather than to infer guilt upon the entire male sex for the actions of a few, treat consensual sex and rape as the same thing, and ignore the near equal perpetration of rape by women. Instead, its creators stuck to a model through which they could more easily exploit the sympathy of the public; it isn't that groups like Edmonton's SS-A are unaware that they're excluding a significant portion of victims from their advocacy. They only care about the ones they can exploit for power and money. If other women – especially female rape victims – understood that, and recognized the manner in which they are being used, they'd be livid, especially when they also realize that the men targeted by these advocates include their fathers, their brothers, their friends, their partners, and their sons.

We are never going to eliminate either the incidence of innocent people receiving jail time, or guilty people escaping the justice system, because rape cases can be subjective, lawyers can be sneaky, and mistakes can be made with any case.

We are never going to eliminate rape, because there will always be people willing to use force or coercion to get what they want.

What we can do is ensure that the definition of the crime isn't so twisted and stretched that it becomes meaningless enough to leave victims with no voice at all.

We are never going to eliminate all false accusations, because the crime is in many cases committed willfully and with malicious intent.

What we can do is ensure that the reason behind a false allegation is not that the accuser was taught by a poorly thought out, poorly executed information campaign to think of herself as an incapable, helpless child whose decisions are not her own, and whose regrets are always somebody else's fault. We can have enough respect for victims of both rape and false allegations to acknowledge the reality of both, and demand that feminists stop pitting the victims of these two heinous crimes against each other, as if either is responsible for the suffering of the other.

We can have enough consideration for both types of victims to treat false allegations as the criminal act they are, instead of encouraging them by subjecting the public to slanderous, ideological propaganda that demonizes men and boys by falsely accusing them of being perpetrators waiting to happen.

In the final analysis, the real “don’t be that guy” for feminists are the men and boys hurt by the system and female predators. And the real reason why feminists don’t like to talk about men’s vulnerability isn’t because we’d lose sympathy for female rape victims, sympathy is an infinite resource.

They don’t want to talk about vulnerable men because money isn’t.

Don’t be that guy. You know, the guy who needs society’s sympathy. Because that would bite into our marketshare.

Ellen Gorman: conscience of a judge

Dean Esmay · 14 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An open letter to Justice Ellen Gorman of the Maine Supreme Judicial Court

Greetings Justice Gorman.

Not a lot is known publicly about your life in Maine politics, but what is known is quite impressive, at least on the surface.

In fact, I'd say the story of Ellen Gorman's life is at first glance a rather inspiring one. Having graduated from Cornell Law school in 1982, you worked as a private attorney for only a few years until being appointed to your first government post in the state of Maine: a member of the Worker's Compensation Board. It is pretty clear that someone entering such a post so early in her law career probably had politics, and likely the judiciary, as one of her life goals for some time. That's how attorneys usually get to become judges, as you know: they get known by the local political establishment, and work hard to get elected (in some states) or appointed (in states like Maine).

It was probably one of the most thrilling moments of your life when then-Governor Jock McKernan, Jr. reached out and tapped you to become a judge in 1989, only 7 years after you'd graduated from Law School. I don't know how well you knew McKernan, but you were both about the same age; he was an unusually young Governor at the time, and had obviously noticed young Ellen Gorman somehow or other. I suppose some might suggest some sort of croneyism there, but there's no evidence of that that I've seen, and McKernan didn't have a particularly bad reputation in that regard, and anyway you don't get elevated to the bench that young without having been noticed by others in the political establishment, and this particular Republican obviously thought well of you in some fashion.

But Ellen Gorman was obviously not merely a Republican party hack; 11 years later, you got another call, letting you know that the Governor at that time, Angus Stanley King, Jr. (who is today Maine's Junior Senator in Washington DC) reached out and tapped you for the Maine Superior Court, to hear appeals and oversee local courts. Angus King was and is an Independent, although he's generally identified as moderately left of center. Which means you were likely no Republican firebrand or croney. Then, in 2007, in what was quite possibly the culminating moment in your stellar career, you were tapped by Maine Governor John Baldacci, a Democrat, elevating you to the exalted position of Justice of the Maine Supreme Judicial Court.

I imagine that, whether you showed it publicly or not, you cried when you got the news, and you and your loved ones were proud beyond words of all you had achieved to make your way there, hearing countless cases, countless appeals, and successfully earning the respect of Republicans, Democracrats, and Independents through it all. Being sworn in as Justice was probably one of the happiest days of your life, which has doubtless been filled with exciting moments, lots of dreariness, and probably a frustration or three.

And then, in the last year, something dreadful happened. You got word that there was trouble in Carletta Bossano's office in Hancock County. About which I now have a question for you: had you noticed, yet, that a smallish district under your purview, was a sleepy little community of mostly farmers, forestry people, and fishermen, with an awfully large number of of prosecutions for things like domestic violence and rape, making it look like one of the most dangerous places in the whole state?

Although the courts are (in)famous for keeping their inner workings out of the public light, I know Justices are usually assigned to watch over certain specific courts of appeal and certain specific Circuits/Districts underneath that. Now, maybe Bossano's office wasn't under your watch when you were on the Superior Court, but presumably it's been under your areas of responsibility since 2007. Had you ever noticed this incredible mass of prosecutions of allegedly violent men coming out of Hancock County? Did a flag of curiosity ever go up with you? Did you ever call down to the local judges and prosecutors' offices and ask what the heck was happening in down there? Or even wonder why the press hadn't seemed to even notice the unusual number of proseuctions for violence in a rural community with less than 55,000 people in it?

Never mind the question of whether you knew who Mary Kellett in particular was. Maybe you wouldn't necessarily know her name (there are a lot of prosecutors after all), but you'd certainly know who Bossano was, and you'd certainly have some idea what the caseload and appeals looked liked coming out of there, no?

Well maybe not. Maybe you weren't on the Superior court that handled that area, and maybe the people on the Superior Court there never bothered to report upstairs that something weird was happening in Hancock County. Hell, maybe the statistically unusually high rate of prosecutions still wasn't noticeable given how small the county was. Maybe. But I am curious about it.

Or did you maybe know, and just think, "wow, Carletta and her underlings are kicking ass and taking names over there?"

I can't know, Justice Gorman, but I suspect this: I suspect the day you got the news that the Board of Overseers of the Bar was so appalled by the behavior of one of Carletta Bossano's underlings, they referred her case straight to the state Supreme Court. And this storm has now landed in your lap, as in the first time in history someone in your position has to seriously consider removing a Prosecutor. Hell, it's never happened like that before in Maine; I'm pretty sure your stomach dropped to your toes just at the thought of the law books and Maine Constitutional study you'd have to do on something like this. It wouldn't surprise me if Paul LePage has even quietly contacted you about it, if you didn't contact him first; I mean, should impeachment be on the table here, and if so, should it be on the table not just for Kellett, but for her (surprisingly quiet these days) boss, Carletta Bossano? Should the judges who heard these cases be asked questions, for that matter? Should they have noticed something? I imagine you at least made those phone calls too.

And why else would your stomach be fluttery? Not only are you going to be on the bench during a historic hearing, doing something no Justice has ever done before, but at this point you must realize: everyone who knows anything about law in Maine knows what this really says: a rogue prosecutor threw an innocent man in the slammer by cheating so badly that no one in the local political establishment, not the judges, not the bar, not her fellow prosecutors, could cover for her; none of this could even charitably be called a misstep or an oversight or a bungle. And the question, indeed, must now be asked: for one Vladek Filler, how many other men went to prison there in Maine and are rotting in the jails now, or are using up the Maine Parole Department's resources, who never did anything to justify the harshness they were treated with, or never did a damn thing wrong at all?

How many credible victims now look like liars because of Mary Kellett, for that matter?

And the question you really don't want to consider, but really must: was Mary Kellett really all that unusual, except that she was dumb enough to get caught? How many others in Carletta Bossano's office were just as bad, and just not stupid enough to get caught withholding, tampering with, or destroying evidence just to win a case? How many others in other offices, for that matter?

Most people think your job on the Supreme Court is just to hear appeals, but you and I know that's not true: it's also your job to watch over and set behavior and guidelines for all officers of the court underneath you and the state.

So, Justice Gorman, let me put this to you, and to others in Maine: as someone who has rightfully been proud to say she was never a partisan hack, who won the respect and trust of Democrats, Republicans, and Independents alike to rise to one of the highest positions of authority in that great state, how much of this happened under your watch–and how much might still be happening under your watch even now?

Here is what I would do in your shoes Justice Gorman: I wouldn't allow this prosecutor, Mary Kellett, to get away with copping to a plea and walking away quietly. I'd make this woman who represented your court's prosecutorial officers for years now answer for every allegation against her, in public, no matter how long it takes to get the answers out of her and out of her boss and yes, even the judges who presided over cases she was involved in.

But in fact, I'd do more than that. You've had something of a superstar career and are respected around the state, so you have no excuses. You face one of the most pivotal moments of your life: will you sweep this under the rug and get it off your docket as quickly as possible? That's certainly one choice you have, although I hope you don't take it. Or will you go further, and will you really make sure Mary Kellett fully answers not just for Vladek Filler, but for what she may have done to countless other men? That would be better But if you really wanted to earn the respect of the world, and restore some semblance of trust and dignity back to the justice system, or what some are increasingly calling our "truly criminal justice system," I'd take all that political capital I'd gained over the last quarter century in Maine Politics, and use everything within your power to fully investigate Carletta Bossano's office, the judges in that entire District Court, give a green light to fast-tracking any and all appeals that involved men prosecuted by Carletta Bossano's office in the last 10 years, and urge your fellow Justices to do the same to clean house big time throughout the areas of the courts they look at.

Show the people, show the world, that false accusers hurt real victims, victimize innocent people, waste valuable taxpayer money and resources, and violate the fundamental principles of jurisprudence that this nation, and the great state of Maine, were founded upon. Throw the doors wide open, and scream to the world: "from this day forward, no more. Not on my watch. Not while I draw breath and not while I'm on this bench, will I allow this office and this system I have worked in my whole life be so sullied."

Justice Gorman, it's not just Mary Kellett who's in the hot seat on Monday July 15th. And it's not just you. It's the entire system you're an important part of.

Will you do all in your power to make sure justice is really served, not just to Vladek Filler, but to all of the state of Maine? Will you actually show the world that the term "justice system" can potentially mean something positive again? That your own title of "Justice" isn't a sad joke, a relic of a set of ideals that were long ago rendered obsolete by the people who work under you?

Will you try to make that difference? Or will you dispatch of this whole mess as quickly and quietly as you can, and meet your friends on the golf course while you contemplate your next move: the Federal bench perhaps, or maybe just coast for a decade or two longer to an eventual retirement, resting on the laurels of the titles you achieved, rather than the actual accomplishments, the actual difference that you made?

It's not just Mary Kellett that needs to go, Justice Gorman. You know it, I know it, everyone watching knows it. So which side will you be on; The one that's comfortable and easy, or the one that's right?

Don't let her cop a plea, Justice Gorman, and don't let her boss slither away from this. You know you can do better. We know you can do better.

I pray that you do better.

Update: On July 15, 2013, Ellen Gorman demonstrated to the world that her title of "Justice" is indeed, a sad pathetic joke, and that she will likely retire resting on the laurels of her titles, rather than her actual accomplishments. And has proven there is no justice in Maine's justice system, and that it is aptly called a "criminal" system. You are a disgrace to the bench, Ellen Gorman.

Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton: Don't be THAT stupid

Editorial Staff · 14 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On July 11th, A Voice for Men received an email from a law firm claiming to represent a noxious hate group in the Edmonton, Alberta area of Canada calling themselves Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton. They are threatening AVfM with legal action for hosting a thread on our forum entitled "Don't be that girl"; Men's Rights Edmonton's parody posters were uploaded to that thread.

This group, Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton, was founded in 2009, and has no affiliation at all with the respectable Stop Abusive and Violent Environments, a Washington DC-area group founded in 2008 which does good work that we fully support.

It's an interesting coincidence that a group called "SAVE" in Canada that promotes demonizing literature targeted at men's sexuality apparently stole the name of a legitimate group called SAVE that attempts to bring public attention to false accusations in the United States, and to non-sexist treatment under the law for all victims.

In fact, by the same logic they're using to threaten AVfM, Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton are on shaky ground referring to themselves as "SAVE." As such we've decided to rename the Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton. We have dropped the V from their acronym since that group is only a voice for the cash cow sexual abuse survivor and only while she can be milked for moolah. Let's add in an "S" to reference their sociopathic propaganda and, viola! We have Edmonton's Sexual Sociopaths' Assault, or Edmonton's SS-A, for short.

Edmonton's SS-A has hired attorneys to attempt to censor and harass the Men's Human Rights community, and exert control over discourse on the Internet. This is not just our own publication at stake, or even the men's human rights movement itself, but anyone on the Internet who might happen to annoy Gender fascist groups. Or even anyone who just disseminates a witty meme with a photo they haven't copyrighted.

Yes. Edmonton's SS-A has declared war on Grumpy Cat. First they came for Insanity wolf…

The email, with a PDF attachment, is from the offices of Parlee McLaws, LLC drafted by Michael W. Sharp MWS.

In lieu of publishing the entire email received by our mail servers this is the list of angry demands from Edmonton's SS-A:

[image]
Edmonton's SS-A's demand we comply with their attempt to censor… the entire internet.
 The phrase "Don't Be That Guy" is a trademark of the hate group forthwith known as Edmonton's SS-A and any use of it on A Voice for Men violates their Trademark as well as their copyright.*

 Any phrases such as "Don't be THAT girl" or "Don't be THAT [anything]" (like "Don't be that shyster" or "Don't be that false accuser," "don't be that abusive mother," "don't be that hatemongering feminist," etc.) violate their trademark and harm their business and we should cease and desist and forbid any use of the "don't be that" phrasing.*

 Don't print or reprint their photos in any way*

 Deliver up for their inspection all information we have on three of our community members (including one known as "anon," who, as everybody knows, has been a well-known and distinguished writer for many thousands of years).*

 Termination of several of our community members' accounts*

 Undertake never to do or say anything naughty that might cause them discomfort again.*

 Oh, and by the way, don't print this letter either.*

Now still we could have ignored all of this, but then at the bottom of the letter appeared a section so outrageous, we simply could not resist. They demanded that we have someone sign and date the above–although who exactly they are after is never clearly stated–and get it back to them no later than July 16th, 2013.

What follows is the response of the Editorial team at AVfM.

We, the editorial team at AVfM, acting in our capacity as duly authorized representatives of A Voice for Men, hereby refuse to undertake the commitments laid out in your letter dated July 11, 2013 – specifically, we refuse your request to cease mention or discussion or parody or satire of any reference or representation of "don't be that guy." Your claim of copyright or trademark on "Don't be that…" is frivolous at best, as is your claim that it is in any way a threat to your client's disgusting business. Edmonton's SS-A (Formerly Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton, founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008) is in our view a hate group that promotes sexual assault and sexist bigotry. Indeed, as a team we DECREE–EX-CATHEDRA, FOREVERMORE AND HENCEFORTH FOR ALL ETERNITY AMEN! that as matter of policy anyone acting under the authority of AVfM is to refuse to do anything whatsoever requested by or on behalf of the disgusting hate group known as Edmonton's SS-A unless those requests involve things like telling them to go fly a kite or helping them dismantle their entire hatemongering sociopathic operation.

We furthermore solemnly swear and affirm that it shall from this day forward be the editorial policy of A Voice for Men that Edmonton's SS-A shall always be referred to as a vile hate group, and/or a fascist group of censorship-minded thugs who hate freedom of expression and who seek to control discourse on the Internet so as to silence all criticism of their propaganda. We further decree, in response to this pernicious attempt at barratry by Edmonton's SS-A that we believe that Edmonton's SS-A's business operation clearly intends and desires to manufacture more victims of sexual assault for profit and to marginalize unprofitable victims of sexual assault in Canada, and that Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and not in any way affiliated with the praiseworthy group SAVE founded in 2008), is otherwise a bunch of vile thugs who shouldn't be allowed to operate any businesses at all within any respectable community anywhere in the world, and should probably be kept out of reach and out of sight of children if at all possible.

It will also henceforth be A Voice for Men's goal to, at every opportunity, make completely truthful statements with full intent to discredit the business, wares, and services of Edmonton's SS-A, and to bring direct public attention to the hateful, hurtful, damaging, and rape-encouraging and victim-blaming nature of Edmonton's SS-A advertising, services, business, wares, and to use the phrase "Don't be THAT…" as often as humanly possible in our headlines and materials in order to mock, deride, annoy, and otherwise satirize this vile hate group. We very much hope to see them completely change their business model (which we repeat, appears to be to create more victims of sexual assault in Canada), and we frankly hope to see them driven completely out of business, as their ilk has no place whatsoever in a decent, civilized society.

We further pledge to regularly alert the public that Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008) regularly operates its business in a manner contrary to ethical standards of business, commerce, or victims advocacy and in a manner directly antithetical to human rights for men, for children, and even for the women it so dishonestly purports to advocate for.

It shall furthermore be our goal in response to this puerile attempt at bullying and barratry and internet censorship to identify to the public the names and faces of all individuals in leadership positions within the Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008), in order to alert the world to the sort of vile, bigoted, sexist, racist thugs who run hatemongering campaigns like "Don't Be That Guy." Finally, please advise your client that as a direct result of their puerile attempts at censorship, we will be regularly featuring images and articles using the phrases "Don't be that guy," "Don't be that girl," "Don't be that scumsucking shyster crap-weasel," "Don't be that hatemongering feminist bigot," and so on for the direct purposes of satire, parody, and news reporting, and shall otherwise endeavor in any way we can think of to defame, humiliate, tarnish the reputation of, and generally embarrass the hatemongering crapweasels at Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008).

We also pledge to not just make regular use of the images of the despicable hate group known as Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008) for purposes of satire, criticism, political commentary, and news reporting purposes, but also for the purposes of, in any way legally and ethically allowable, driving these scumsucking vermin out of the public square and into the ashbin of history's discarded lies as soon as humanly possible. Their "business," such as it is, is no better than the "business" of Neo-Nazis or the Ku Klux Klan, and, like the neo-Nazis and the Klan, we hope to see them disappear from human civilization forever.

We will otherwise be refusing any and all requests made in this letter dated 11 July 2013, and are fully ready to do whatever it takes to continue to refuse to comply with the wishes of the vile hate group known as Edmonton's SS-A (founded in 2009 and in no way affiliated with the praiseworthy SAVE of the Washington DC area, founded in 2008).

To you, SS-A, and indeed, to anyone who attempts to silence us, we respond: Don't be that stupid.

Also, fuck you.

Thank you very much for your kind attention, and warmest regards.

The Editorial Team,

A Voice for Men

AVfM Update: Welcome to the Twilight Zone

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 15 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

JTO is here with this week's news report for AVfM. From Mary Kellett being given a suspension of her suspension and Edmonton's SS-A (Or as some prefer, Edmonton's ASS) attempt to sue us to prevent our use of the common english phrase "Don't be that…" things have definitely taken a turn for the macabre and zany here at AVfM.

Breaking news: Mary Kellett free to practice law

Robert O'Hara · 15 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

(Washington D.C. July 15th, 2013)

Justice Ellen Gorman has allowed corrupt Assistant District Attorney walk with a slap on the wrist.

Just after 10:00am today the disciplinary hearing for Mary Kellett, Assistant District Attorney for Maine's 7th prosecutorial district, was held in Portland concerning her mishandling of the Vladek Filler case. For those new to the case, Ligia Filler falsely accused her husband Vladek Filler of domestic violence and spousal rape. Kellett in her role as Assistant District attorney withheld exculpatory evidence and made misleading statements to the jury in her closing remarks, leading to Vladek Filler's conviction. The hearing was brief and followed a closed door meeting involving Kellett's attorneys and representatives from the Overseers of the Bar. A plea bargain was submitted to Justice Ellen Gorman, presiding, who suspended Kellett and then promptly suspended her suspension resulting in Kellett facing no consequences for her gross misconduct during the Filler trial. She is still free to practice law and still acting as Assistant DA.

Kellett made a statement of apology before the judgment was handed down saying that she "went too far" and that it "wouldn't happen again." After her apology Filler was given fifteen minutes to speak. AVFM's acting correpsondants said he was very emotional when he spoke as he told the court how Kellett's actions have permanently damaged his life and that of his children's. After the judgment was handed down Kellett exited through a back door leaving our correspondents and reporters from other news sources including Channel 2 News WLBZ from Bangor with no comment.

Acting AVfM Correspondents Scott Soly, Sean Campbell and Chris Caldwell conducted a video interview with Vladek Filler. This will be available later this evening along with other details.

Editorial note:
The entire staff at AVFM and many others to numerous to mention here extend their thanks to Scott Soly, Sean Campbell and Chris Caldwell who all heard the call to attend this hearing. These men did this on their own time and this was the very first time all of them had engaged in any activism of this kind. By each of them taking initiative they have sent a message that we are all watching. Please join us in thanking them in the comments below.

[/box]

Vladek Filler describes his anguish after Kellett hearing concludes

Robert O'Hara · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday AVFM News brought you breaking coverage of Mary Kellett's sentencing hearing in Portland, Maine concerning her misconduct during the Vladek Filler trial. She was found guilty last year by the Overseers of the Bar of the ethical breaches of withholding exculpatory evidence and making misleading statements to a jury. In a plea deal, Kellett agreed to a 30 day suspension on the condition that she complete a 6 hour course in prosecutorial ethics. Judge Ellen Gorman promptly suspended the suspension saying that she intends to impose the recommendation by the end of this week after further review, but for now Kellett is free to practice law and it is still unclear whether she will face any consequences at all for her misconduct.

The justification for the move was there was no one to replace Kellett. Correspondent Chris Caldwell asked one of Kellett's lawyers if, during the closed-door meeting with members of the Bar in which the plea deal was struck, Kellett's punishment was suspended to deter any case re-openings in which Kellett could be found guilty of misconduct resulting in overturned convictions. Caldwell did not receive an answer.

Kellett, who has handled over 10,000 cases in her ten years as a prosecutor, said during a statement of apology during the hearing "I regret the harm my mistakes caused. While I did not intentionally violate the bar rules, my actions did violate the bar rules."

Vladek Filler was given fifteen minutes to speak and read from a prepared impact statement available here.

> "No matter what the evidence showed; no matter what recorded admissions my wife made at the DA office and to law enforcement; no matter what revelations were discovered; no matter what the State crime lab reports said; no matter what I, the older children, or other witnesses reported to investigators–nothing stopped prosecutor Mary Kellett from forcing this case to go forward through abuse of her position of trust and power as a State prosecutor."

This is the first time in the state's history a prosecutor was suspended for misconduct.

Vladek Filler speaks after Kellet's hearing in Portland Maine

Robert O'Hara · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

An emotional and exhausted Vladek Filler takes questions after the hearing on July 16thand tells Scott Solly how he feels about the punishment handed down by Juscice Groman. He tells of the impact Kellett's actions have on his life and his family. He also points out that the public's perceptions of sexual assault prosecution are wrong and that it is actually very easy for prosecutors to secure a conviction.

Vladek Filler's statement to Maine Supreme Court

Dean Esmay · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: the following is the complete statement given by Vladek Filler to "Justice" Ellen Gorman of the Maine Supreme Court on July 15, 2013. –DE

To: Honorable Justice Ellen Gorman

In 2007 my ex-wife and I were in the midst of separation and child custody dispute. She unexpectedly moved out taking my 1 year old son and called police to take my 10 year old son from me by force. When my son refused to go live with her and police allowed him to stay, my ex-wife began making numerous accusations and threats. My 17 year old step daughter called 911 to report her mother was acting crazy and waiting to use criminal complaints against me to regain custody of my 10 year old son. My ex-wife was later apprehended by deputies and involuntarily hospitalized after running on the road barefoot, partially undressed, with child, kicking and screaming that she was going to kill me and cut me in to pieces for abusing the children. The same day those allegations were proven false. Numerous exculpatory statements were recorded by authorities but just one day later my ex-wife was interviewed at the Hancock County DA office alleging spousal rape. She was recorded admitting that this was her fight for the children and of being encouraged to cry so her spousal rape allegations would seem real to police.

The DA's office exploited a crisis situation and rushed to solely use my ex-wife's accusations and ignored, suppressed, and withheld exculpatory evidence that was collected, preserved, and readily available to the prosecutor. I was arrested and charged and the newspapers were alerted to publicize the allegations and attorney Kellett's statements about seeking an indictment. All this happened within a period of only 4 days.

No matter what the evidence showed; no matter what recorded admissions my wife made at the DA office and to law enforcement; no matter what revelations were discovered; no matter what the State crime lab reports said; no matter what I, the older children, or other witnesses reported to investigators—nothing stopped prosecutor Mary Kellett from forcing this case to go forward through abuse of her position of trust and power as a State prosecutor.

All I wanted to do in 2007 was to save my children from a child abuser, but instead I found myself fighting for my life and for my children's lives against a dishonest prosecutor who flagrantly abused my fundamental constitutional rights to due process and a fair trial.

After the first 2 years my attorney withdrew on financial grounds after exhausting all my family's resources trying to fight attorney Kellett's misconduct and violations. Repeatedly my attorney Daniel Pileggi made specific discovery requests, issued subpoenas, and filed motions citing attorney Kellett's non compliance and prosecutorial misconduct. He wrote a letter to attorney Kellett stating "I have been advised by Chad Wilmot of the Ellsworth Police Department that you advised him not to comply with my subpoena in the referenced matter." Attorney Pileggi cited criminal and ethical violations for tampering with witnesses and their compliance with valid subpoenas. Before a Bar Panel, attorney Pileggi testified to Ms. Kellett's misconduct, suppression of evidence, misrepresentation of facts, and non production of vital court Ordered reports, recordings, and video tapes. One available and Court Ordered video tape was denied to defense by Mary Kellett and then destroyed without production. To the trial Court, attorney Pileggi wrote that prosecutor Kellett's "violations, individually and collectively, are so pervasive and significant as to have violated [Mr. Filler's] constitutional rights…Mr. Filler was denied due process." Pileggi further wrote that "The Law Court has held that prosecutors are held to a higher than normal standard, both because they represent the State of Maine, and because their obligation is to secure justice and not merely a conviction. Application of that standard here demonstrates the severe violation of Mr. Filler's rights".

"Severe violations" of Constitution rights is how attorney Daniel Pileggi characterized prosecutor Mary Kellett's misconduct. The trial court agreed finding attorney Kellett's misconduct repeatedly violated the trial Court's ruling.

My court appointed appellate attorney Neil Fishman, who has handled well over 100 high court criminal appeals in Maine, Massachusetts, and New York wrote the following to the Law Court about prosecutor Kellett's misconduct "the prosecution [of Mr. Filler] was something akin to a Salem witch trial…the State [prosecutor] deprived defendant of his due process rights to a fair trial." That aside from the April 6, 2007 spousal sexual assault claim, which District Court said failed to even meeting the more likely than not standard, that "all the other gross-sexual-assault charges were clearly unprovable…according to [accuser's] own testimony it is clear that the State [prosecutor] brought these charges for no other reason than to assassinate defendant's character…A fair trial was quite simply not to be had in such an inflamed environment. U.S. Const., Amend. V; U.S. Const., Amend. XIV. Turning to the prosecutor's closing argument, it is so replete with misconduct, that appellate counsel urges this Court to read through it – and the prosecutor's argument in rebuttal – in its entirety."

After oral arguments before the Law Court, attorney Fishman wrote a 3 page letter to the Law Court citing profound misrepresentations prosecutor Mary Kellett made even to the Law Court at oral arguments concerning the trial record's ruling and her own conduct.

My Bar complaint documented evidence of intentional suppression of truth and evidence by attorney Kellett, instructions to law enforcement not to comply with defense subpoenas for what was exculpatory evidence, and misrepresentation of vital facts to Judges, a jury, and the Law Court. Throughout the Bar Counsel's investigation of my complaint and even during the Disciplinary Hearing attorney Kellett continued to misrepresent profound facts in the case.

A seasoned criminal and domestic violence prosecutor, George "Toby" Dilworth testified before the Bar Panel as an expert witness after reviewing the trial record and the Bar Complaint evidence. His investigation found numerous serious violations by prosecutor Kellett both at trial and pre-trial ranging from nonproduction of exculpatory evidence, to burden shifting, citing facts not in evidence and exploiting exclusion of evidence.

He testified that attorney Kellett understood what was important to defense, had a Constitutional obligation to turn it over, but did not turn over "critical" and "needed" evidence of accuser's "exculpatory" statements and recordings to defense even after Judge Anderson specifically Ordered her to do so. Attorney Dilworth told the Panel prosecutor Kellett was "Rule 16 non compliant…[and acted to] Intentionally violate a rule of court…[and of] advising someone at [her] diretion not to comply." Attorney Dilworth as an expert testified that attorney Kellett not only violated her Constitutional obligations but "intentionally" violated a rule of the court and advised others to engage in violations of the law.

The 3 member Disciplinary Panel chaired by the current Penobscot County Judge M. Ray Bradford substantiated evidence of serious and willful violation of at least 7 bar rules. The Panel's decision specifically cites attorney Kellett's non production of "at least two key pieces of exculpatory evidence" which were repeatedly requested in writing by defense, Court Ordered, and were "critical" and "exculpatory" in a case where my freedom was at stake. The "seriousness" of attorney Kellett's violations, the Panel wrote, "cannot be overstated". Attorney Kellett told the panel she would do nothing differently in the future and that she had a philosophical disagreement with the Trial Court's rulings and the Law Court's decision regarding her misconduct. The Panel concluded that "it appear likely that Ms. Kellett would repeat this unfairly prejudicial conduct."

Despite all the evidence and findings substantiating attorney Kellett's misconduct she continues to maintain her actions were neither willful nor were violations of my constitutional rights.

The Bar Counsel, in the complaint filed with this Court, repeatedly refers to attorney Kellett's misconduct as "inexcusable."

I am respectfully pleading with this Court to hold attorney Kellett fully responsible for her willful and "inexcusable" misconduct and violation of my constitutional rights. I am pleading with this Court to hold prosecutor Kellett to the required higher legal and ethical standards which all prosecutors in Maine are required to abide by.

The Bar Panel's findings and recommendation warrants this Court's use of its authority and knowledge of the criminal rules of conduct to take further needed measures to remove attorney Kellett's license to practice law.

Attorney Kellett was fully aware of Bar Rule 3.83 which requires much higher responsibility and obligations from prosecutors due to their special roles, power, and privileges. Attorney Kellett intentionally engaged in misconduct undermining the administration of justice and my constitutional rights. She must be held to the required higher standards to protect the public and the justice system. Absent disbarment for her "inexcusable" and prolific misconduct, the standards for all prosecutor's in Maine will effectively be lowered and a detrimental message will be sent throughout the legal and law enforcement community in Maine which will affect countless lives.

I have been fighting for 6 years and have risked my freedom and that of my children so attorney Kellett is held fully accountable and so many others are not subjected to such abuse and irreparable harm to their lives as my family and I have. The laws and standards of conduct need to be upheld and enforced in this case by way of attorney Kellett's disbarment. The Court must not allow unjust abuse and human suffering to be valued below any attorney's responsibility or license to continue practicing law. Several witnesses risked their careers to testify against Mary Kellett at the disciplinary hearing. The Disciplinary Panel's decision is unprecedented and was not made lightly. Attorney Kellett's misconduct has touched many lives. 1566 people have signed an advocacy group's petition for her disbarment with the hopes that she is held fully accountable for her violation of our system of justice and our values and beliefs.

Attorney's are routinely disbarred for mere financial misconduct, but no professional misconduct is more egregious than an attorney who resorts to violations, deception and suppression of exculpatory evidence to send an innocent human being to prison and flagrantly justify it with personal philosophical disagreement with the rules.

The Bar Panel found that prosecutor Kellett engaged in conduct unworthy of an attorney.

The best interests of justice in this case require attorney Mary Kellett's disbarment until such time This Court may find it appropriate to reinstate her license to practice law.

I am pleading with this Court for justice. My life, my irreparable suffering, and that of my 2 children over the past 6 years must mean more in our society than one abusive attorney's license.

I thank Your Honor and submit this statement, a copy of my 3 part Bar Complaint, and a petition signed by 1566 individuals.

–Vladek Filler's statement before the Maine Board of Overseers, July 15, 2013

Fuck you, Amanda Marcotte

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Legal Parental Surrender is NOT morally equivalent to an abortion and no amount of bitchy sarcasm will make it so. Yeah, Amanda Marcotte, I'm talking to you.

It was heartening to see the New York Times jump into the reproductive rights fray recently with their editorial questioning whether men actually have any. Answer: Nope. Not really.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/06/15/feminists-agree-at-least-in-theory-that-women-must-face-the-consequences-of-deciding-to-have-sex-no-abortion-no-adoption-no-safe-havens-and-if-you-dont-like-it-then-close-your-legs/

> If a man accidentally conceives a child with a woman, and does not want to raise the child with her, what are his choices? Surprisingly, he has few options in the United States. He can urge her to seek an abortion, but ultimately that decision is hers to make. Should she decide to continue the pregnancy and raise the child, and should she or our government attempt to establish him as the legal father, he can be stuck with years of child support payments.

http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2013/06/12/is-forced-fatherhood-fair/

Predictably, feminist website Jezebel responds with compassion and intelligence to a fairly complex conundrum that seems to be inherently biased against men.

> Boo fucking hoo. At the end of the day, the only thing the government, and society, requires fathers to do is pay money, which is a hell of a lot easier than raising a child alone, as most mothers who have children out-of-wedlock are forced to do.

http://jezebel.com/forced-fatherhood-yeah-okay-whatever-513168822

Mary Elizabeth Williams at Salon is equally concerned when men's freedom to choose to be a parent is curtailed:

> I have to laugh at her question, "Do men now have less reproductive autonomy than women?"

http://www.salon.com/2013/06/13/there_is_no_forced_fatherhood_crisis/

But I really think it's Amanda Marcotte who takes the cake, agreeing that forced fatherhood is indeed unfair, and then summoning her bitchiest bitch tone to claim that for one thing, there are only about three men who have been forced into fatherhood, and men who don't want to become parents are "dead-beat dad" wannabes and refusing to turn your resources over to a woman you explicitly do not wish to parent with is the moral equivalent of killing your child.

It's a hat-trick of idiocy!

http://www.rawstory.com/rs/2013/06/13/fine-would-be-deadbeat-dads-heres-a-suggestion-for-you/

> For fuck's sake, I can't believe the NY Times gave space to the tedious argument that because women have been graciously granted their right to reproductive autonomy (actually, it's not even remotely gracious), it's time to deal with the largely imaginary plague of "forced fatherhood", i.e. women getting pregnant and carrying pregnancies to term against the father's wishes, and then suing him for child support. This happens occasionally, though compared to men trying to force women to get pregnant against their wills, it's so rare that it's comparable to shark attacks in its frequency.

Well, we dealt with the whole birth control sabotage thing a few days ago, and to the surprise of only me, apparently, sabotaging birth control so women can get pregnant against their male partners wishes is not just frequent, it's normal.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/07/08/are-you-having-sex-with-a-fertile-woman-would-you-like-to-avoid-a-little-bundle-of-puking-joy-are-you-trusting-her-with-birth-control-well-im-sorry-but-you-sir-are-an-idiot/

There are a number of ways that paternity can be established when it comes to women who have chosen to have children without the explicit support of the father.

Voluntary acknowledgement – the father acknowledges that he is, in fact, the father

Administrative – child support agencies contact the putative father and the case proceeds from there

Judicial – the courts contact the putative father and the case proceeds from there

Default – the courts accept the word of the woman and simply names the father

The following report goes into the advantages and disadvantages of these different methods, but there is one chart in particular I would like to draw your attention to: 62% of local child support staff perceive there to be a an advantage in using any method OTHER than voluntary acknowledgement of paternity because it ensures that the correct father is identified.

oig.hhs.gov/oei/reports/oei-06-98-00050.pdf

THROUGH METHODS OTHER THAN VOLUNTARY ACKNOWLEDGMENT

Advantages of Other Methods	State CSE Respondents	Local CSE Focus Respondents
Ensures that the Correct Father Was Identified	61% (31 States)	62% (63 Offices)
Reduces the Potential for Rescission	51% (26)	61% (62)
Custody and Visitation May be Handled Also	37% (19)	47% (47)
More Confident Parents Understand the Meaning	33% (17)	62% (62)
Establishment Holds Greater Weight in Court	27% (14)	66% (64)

Now why would that be? Why would the majority of child support workers think identifying the correct father through something other than just "she said it's true, so I guess it must be?".

Could it be because the WRONG MEN are identified as fathers rather routinely? It appears that child support workers deal with the "imaginary plague" of women having children outside of an established relationship and seeking child support from men who may or may not be the biological father ALL THE FUCKING TIME.

Imaginary plague, my ass.

http://oig.hhs.gov/oei/reports/oei-06-98-00050.pdf

Let's move on to Amanda's use of the words "paper abortion".

> Focusing on "paper abortions" is a way to soften up an audience to the demands of men who want to foist all the responsibilities of child-rearing onto their exes while still getting to float in periodically to be the big hero who takes the kids to Disneyland once in a while. If you actually go to "father's rights" forums and websites, you'll find lots of paranoia about sperm-stealing, but the men who are on the forum almost all are divorced and are bitter about writing child support checks while not getting the sexual and house-cleaning benefits of having a wife.

Yeah, that's exactly the topic we are discussing. Amanda has mixed up two very distinct group of men: fathers who are very much interested in being fathers who have been ousted from their children's lives, and men who are confronting an unintended pregnancy only to discover they have absolutely no say in how that pregnancy proceeds.

The use of the words "paper abortion" is unfortunate, and I hope it is not a common phrase uttered by those who are interested in reproductive rights for men, because it strongly implies that refusing to be a parent by disavowing social and financial responsibility is morally equivalent to killing the child outright.

It's not.

To equate refuting responsibility with death is disingenuous at the very least. Men are not asking for the right to "abort" a child. The decision to allow a child to live belongs to women, as it must. Men are asking for the same right that women already have:

LEGAL PARENTAL SURRENDER

A woman who gives birth to a child she does want to accept legal or financial responsibility for has the option to surrender that child to the state and simply walk away. The child will be given to someone who DOES want legal and financial responsibility, and the expense to the state is minimal and of finite duration.

https://www.childwelfare.gov/systemwide/laws_policies/statutes/safehaven.cfm

Men should have the exact same right.

Amanda has some caveats she wants to attach to that right. Let's take them one by one.

> He has to sign away all rights before the baby is born. He does not get his name on the birth certificate. The child's father will be registered as "unknown". If someone else—say his ex's new husband—wishes to adopt and co-parent the child, he cannot interfere.

Agreed. No problem whatsoever.

> The only exception to this is if the mother did not alert the father to the pregnancy beforehand. He should be able to provide witnesses to testify that he hadn't seen her in at least six months prior to the birth.

Uhm, no. SHE should have to provide evidence. Prove that she DID see him. Prove that a relationship DID exist. The burden of proof should be on the woman who has decided to give birth a child without knowing how she is going to support that child, and not on the man who may not even be aware of a birth control sabotage/failure.

> He never contacts the child. As far as his child knows, he's a ghost. No visits, no toys, no pictures, nothing. He should also not be allowed to contact the mother. If he reaches out to the mother, she has full rights to sue him for child support, using that as evidence that he actually does want a relationship with his ex and his biological child.

How are people who may work together or live in a small community or go to the same school together supposed to avoid contact? This is an unreasonable demand.

> This is for life. If you contact the child on her 18th birthday, you owe 18 years of back child support. If you contact the child when she's 30, same thing: All 18 years of child support, with interest.

Bullshit. This is for 18 years, same as in the case of legal parental surrender. At that point the child is an adult and free to pursue his or her biological origins just as any other adoptee. There is no guarantee that the father who has legally surrendered his child wishes to have a relationship, just as there is no guarantee that adopted children will have an adult relationship their biological parents.

> If the court determines you were abusive to your ex, all the above is invalidated and you will pay child support with no visitation rights if the judge so determines.

Oh fuck off. Get out of jail free card, much? Allegations of abuse are routinely lobbed at men, with no basis in fact, other than her word. This caveat invalidates every previous assertion. It's straight up manipulative bullshit.

http://www.saveservices.org/falsely-accused/domestic-violence/tips/how-do-domestic-violence-laws-encourage-false-allegations/

> While we're at it, let's say children who don't have child support get a special stipend from the government, much like the Social Security payments they'd get if you were dead.

Let's say not. In the case of legal parental surrender, the state is on the hook for the costs of placing the child with parents who DO want to accept legal and financial responsibility, which then transfers to those parents. You don't get to make the state your husband because you have made a terrible decision.

It's interesting that a writer as virulently feminist as Marcotte would even lend her voice to this topic. That says a lot about how far reproductive rights for all has come. It needs to go a bit further, though.

It comes down to understanding that rights come with responsibilities. Women have, and must have, the sole jurisdiction over deciding whether their bodies can be used to create a new life. The right to terminate a pregnancy belongs to the person who is pregnant. But it comes with a responsibility. If you are going to create that new life, you are responsible for it. Especially if you are creating that life against the will of the father.

If you are married, you are responsible for maintaining that marriage for the long run. That applies equally to men and women. If you create a union and bring children into it, only the direst of circumstances gives you the right to dismantle that union.

If you are unwed, and have no social resources, you are STILL responsible for that child, because you exercised your right to bear him or her. You can meet those obligations by being a single mother (bad choice) or by surrendering your legal and financial responsibility. And that SHOULD apply to equally to men and women. A legally surrendered child should be offered to the biological father FIRST. He should have the right to claim sole responsibility, should he so desire.

I strongly suspect it is not babies that daddies don't want responsibility for. It's the baby-mama they're not interested in. That's just a suspicion, though. According to the PEW research council, the rate of households headed by single fathers is growing rapidly. One quarter of single family homes are headed by daddy. That strongly suggests men are more than willing to step up to the plate to care for their children.

http://www.pewsocialtrends.org/2013/07/02/the-rise-of-single-fathers/

> I suspect 2-3 men will take this offer a year if it becomes law. Maybe even a dozen!

You keep telling yourself that, Amanda. Bring the law in. Equal rights to legal parental surrender.

Who thinks the birth rates for single mothers will collapse? Who thinks the astonishing number of children born to the rich and famous out-of-wedlock will collapse?

http://sportsillustrated.cnn.com/vault/article/magazine/MAG1012762/

> It's certainly worth taking this hypothetical out of the arsenal of "men's rights" activists.

You won't be taking anything out of the arsenal, honey. You'll just be giving men the same weapons that women take for granted.

The right to force men into fatherhood is a right that women NEED to lose. The sooner, the better.

Lots of love,

JB

AVFM News and Activism: Kellett Coverage

James Huff · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have as our guests Scott Solly and Sean Campbell, two of the three correspondents covering the Mary Kellett disciplinary hearing in Portland Maine yesterday. After hearing pleas from AVFM's Girl Writes What and John the Other, Solly, Campbell and another man, Chris Caldwell, took time out of their daily lives to cover the event for us. They will give us an intimate eye witness account of the proceedings and reactions from Vladek Filler and Mary Kellett.

We hope you can join us in welcoming Solly and Campell as well as in thanking them for answering our call to action on such short notice.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Death on the 'baby farm': part one

Robert St. Estephe · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I am about to lead you, dear reader – should you choose to follow me as I tramp along the long and arduous path I have chosen for us – on a sightseeing tour of the very bowels of fierce and howling Hell. My intended purpose in this endeavor is to provide you with certain striking and little-known facts which, in my view, constitute necessary instruction for all persons who may in the future conceive a child.

Our infernal tour shall, most certainly, be an unpleasant one for you to undergo. Should you elect to join me I can assure that you shall come out of it not only in one piece, but that you shall also come out wiser – with a keener eye for spotting scammers, hoodlums and seductive propagandists, better prepared to defend the lives of those you love.

What you will learn is something you are not supposed to learn. You are about to enter the realm of forbidden knowledge.

Welcome to the world of Gonzo history.

•?•?•?•

Baby farm – 1). a place that houses and takes care of babies for a fee. 2). a residence for unwed pregnant girls or women that also arranges adoptions. Origin: 1865–70 (dictionary.com)

•?•?•?•

The Baby Farmer: A type of serial killer

Psychology Today recently published a short, online-only, article "Life on the Baby Farm: Killing Kids for Cash," by Joni E. Johnston, Psy. D., forensic psychologist and author of the blog "Female Serial Killers" (female-serial-killers.com). In her article Dr. Johnson offers a brief overview of the business of "baby farming" (a 19th-20th century term for fee-based offsite child care), describing the social and economic challenges that gave rise to this practice in Western culture.

Dr. Johnston selects for her discussion four cases of serial killer baby farmers who were prosecuted in England, the United States and Poland for killing children, usually, but not always, young babies, which they were paid to: a) care after temporarily, b) care for and then place in adoptive homes, or, as was common, c) murder the child, having been judged by the parent(s) to be an unmanageable or unwanted burden. Two of these cases resulted in the execution of the baby farmer.

Johnston's "Life on the Baby Farm" article is, in my view, an informative introduction to the subject. I wish, however, to add to her commentary some remarkable details about the cases described which the author chose to leave out. The study of female serial killers by crime historians and criminologists is still in a primitive state. The absence of any systematic historical research of female serial killers has, until now, allowed many inaccurate stereotypes, assumptions and statistics about female serial killers to proliferate.

As I noted, Dr. Johnston's Psychology Today article describes four cases, but the author makes reference to a single method of killing: starvation (or, "neglect"). The reader would naturally assume this single method was used by the four baby farmers under discussion, and implicitly that such a killing method would apply to most baby farmer serial killers. Yet, as you will see, this is most certainly not the case.

The fact is that these four women employed a number of other methods to kill as well: killing methods radically less passive in nature than "neglect." My own research has turned up well over 100 baby farmer cases involving charges of murder (most of them involving series of killings). Those I have researched exhibit a broad range of murder methods, many of them horrible in their violence. Yet Dr. Johnston's overview of the topic gives not the slightest hint that such a range exists.

We should keep in mind that the article appears on a website named “Female Serial Killers,” thus that particular sub-section of the topic of “baby farming” fatality is what is indeed under discussing in that text.

For those who wish to explore the subject of female serial killers, the study of serial killing baby farmers is of great importance. Yet it has not never been given much attention. I would argue that you cannot understand the phenomenon of the female psycho killer who repeatedly murders children, nor even, I would argue, the crime of infanticide in a more general sense, if the details of method and evidence of mentality of the killer are hidden from you.

The presentation that follows is long; it is overloaded with examples. But the overloading considered is, in my opinion, necessary. Most of the cases I introduce into the discussion are completely unknown, therefore I want them to be made available together in one place. The relentlessness of the tales of horror might feel overwhelming. To produce this unpleasant effect is a deliberate choice on my part as well.

The material is brutal and distressing and ought to be brought out into the open in a manner as blatant as possible. I refuse to soften the effect in any way. I will not white-wash.

Two English Baby Farmers Hanged for Murder

In the most thorough published studies of serial killers it is customary for the author to include a few baby farmer cases, typically those from English-speaking countries, specifically those who were found guilty of murders and executed. Among these are two out of the four Dr. Johnston discusses: such as Englishwomen Margaret Waters (“The Brixton Baby Farmer”) and Amelia Dyer (“The Reading Baby Farmer”). They are among the most well-known of all serial killer baby farmer cases.

It was the death of a baby boy which led the 1870 prosecution and ultimate execution of baby farmer Margaret Waters. The child was named John Walter Cowan, illegitimate son of J. T. Cowan. Before he died Little John was found by a police sergeant still inside Waters’ “farm.” Here is what the sergeant saw:

“The child Cowen, such a fine, healthy child three weeks before, had scarcely a bit of flesh on its bones, could not cry, could hardly be wakened when it was asleep, and looked more like a shriveled-up monkey than a human being.”

Waters was hanged October 11, 1870 for the death of John Cowan but she was suspected of having murdered between 16-35 babies by starvation and/or poisoning with narcotics (with laudanum, an opiate) – or other means which were never determined (she had been observed removing living babies at night who were never seen again). Margaret Waters was hanged without having ever admitting to any wrongdoing.

Amelia Dyer, called sometimes “Britain’s worst serial killer ever,” went to the scaffold on June 10, 1896 and is credited with a dozen or so proven murders, yet she was suspected of the murders of hundreds of other babies. Her favored murder method (a detail not disclosed in the Psychology Today article) was to strangle the child with cotton edging tape (which the killer left in place) and afterwards she tossed the wrapped-up tiny corpses into a nearby canal. The murders were typically committed within hours of the murderess having received payment from women she had conned.

In the mid-1880s Dyer had served time for child abuse, but the event which finally brought her down was the murder of a baby whose mother, Evilina Marnon, had been promised would be adopted into a “good home.” After being caught again, this time “red-handed,” with no hope of escaping prosecution for murder, Amelia dryly informed to police – who were in the process of searching the canal waters for dead babies – “You’ll know all mine by the tape around their necks.” Dyer reasonably suspected babies other than those she deposited there herself might turn up as well.

Dr. Johnston’s article notes in discussing the deaths of babies while in the custody of a baby farmer that, in general, “hundreds of these babies died from neglect, either directly from malnutrition or from a secondary disease as a result of a weakened immune system.” Yet poisoning with laudanum and strangling with a thin strip of cotton are methods far from being reasonably categorized as neglect. Yet the Psychology Today article neglects to mention them.

Skull Cracked in Half

The sole US case mentioned in Johnston's article, that of immigrant Helen Geisen-Volk, a former German Red Cross Nurse, operating in New York City, is a case known to some historians specializing in the history of child care, yet the case has never been classified by a crime scholar as a serial killer case (preceding its appearance on The Unknown History of Misandry's ongoing collection and collation of female serial killer cases, the vast majority of which are unknown to criminologists, crime historians and forensic psychologists).

In her article Dr. Johnston observes that newspapers from June 23, 1925 reported that Mrs. Geisen-Volk (who was convicted for "child substitution" but not any homicide) was sentenced to a mere 3 ½ to 7 years in June 1925. Johnston described the callousness of the baby farmer in her trial testimony. Johnston notes that: "According to the prosecutor, she had abused and murdered 53 babies at the time of her arrest; according to Mrs. Geisen-Volk, the death count was 'only twelve or fourteen.'" The baby farmer's dead-pan cynicism shocked everyone.

[image]

Baby farmer Geisen-Volk's arrest was precipitated by her unsuccessful attempt to palm off a substitute baby to a couple who had placed their own son in her care and who had already died. This "substitution," as it was called by the court, was the crime that got her a prison sentence. During sentencing he judge expressed his regret that he could not by law give her a longer term than 3 ½-to-7. No evidence that could meet the state's high evidentiary standard was at hand that could prove the baby farmer had criminal intent in the huge number of deaths of children that had perished, sometimes quite violently, under her care.

Trial testimony did reveal, however, that Geisen-Volk's treatment of children went beyond the common varieties of "neglect" murder used by baby farmers (heavy use of opiates, feeding with non-nutritional, or overtly harmful, formula). One trial witness, a woman, revealed the true cast of this baby farmer's sentiment when she described violence one would ordinarily expect to be carried out only when no witness was present. Another witness, a nurse, reported that she once saw Geisen-Volk grip 18-month-old, Agnes Toohey, by the legs, and dash her against a wall. The child was dead a lay later. The nurse had, according to the District Attorney, "witnessed the assault on the baby, being at the place attending her own child, who also was ill."

This disclosure, resulting from the original investigation of the missing child who had been "substituted," included an examination of the corpses of several children who died under the baby farmer's care. An autopsy of the disinterred corpse of a six-months-old boy, William Winters, who had died in the custody of Geisen-Volk revealed that the baby's skull had been "cracked in half." The fracture, the coroner said, extended from the back of the head to the front and "its suggested cause was violent contact with a flat, hard surface."

This is another detail which did not find its way into the Psychology Today article. Nor was freezing a child to death, as a method, given any mention.

In a probation officer's report submitted to the judge, Mrs. Geisen-Volk was described as a "conscienceless woman" who had "strangled or frozen to death or otherwise had disposed of babies left in her custody in order that she might reap a profit through her acts." Helen Geisen-Volk – never convicted for a single homicide – appears to have been a dangerous sadist who delighted in inflicting physical injuries on the vulnerable in addition to being a prolific serial killer deserving of the attention of criminologists specializing in the study of serial killer psychology.

"Neglect"

In summarizing the serial killing of children in her "baby farmer" article, Dr. Johnson uses the correct, yet vague, almost innocuous, to describe one of the more popular murder methods of baby farmers, noting that "these children were often neglected and given the minimal amount of care." What, we might ask, does such "neglect" really look like?

One possible answer is offered visually in the 1906 photo of baby farm victim Frankie Heath you see here.

[image]

Another answer is offered in the following quote describing the neglect of a two-year-old girl by French midwife/baby farmer Madame Julien, France in 1867:

"On searching a cupboard about six feet long by four feet widow, a little girl about two years old was found lying on a heap of rotten straw covered by filth; the body was one mass of putrid sores; two toes of the left foot had dropped off, and the bones of the rest could be seen exposed through the decomposing flesh. One witness, who had lodged in the house for three days, proved that the child had not been once moved all that time, and that at last it had not sufficient strength to cry out."

Pork Babies in Poland

The fourth, and last, case in Johnston's précis (yet the first case she mentions) is one whose description is taken from a scanty two sentence blurb from an 1890 newspaper that does not give the name of the baby farmer, merely noting that she was located in Warsaw. Her conviction for 76 murders was reported. The sentence of 3 years is justly noted by Dr. Johnston as surprisingly short.

Yet there is much more information on this case available if you go looking for it.

To be fair, it must be said that there is no thoroughly researched academic source available on the history of female serial killers, thus it would be necessary to employ key word searches (such as: "76 murders" + "baby farm" + "Warsaw" + "sentenced to three years" + "1890," in various combinations) to get at the other, more detailed vintage news sources online. Aggressive keyword cross-referencing will indeed turn up the name as well as sensational details of the case.

Three articles on this important 1890 Polish serial killer case are collected on The Unknown History of Misandry. Frustratingly, the name is in different sources given with wildly differing spellings (as is common with eastern European names appearing in English language publications of the period). The varieties include: "Skoblinska," "Skonblinska," "Skublinski," "Stysinski." Out of all the variants I have settled upon as in my writing is Marianne Skoublinska.

Madame Stysinski (or, "Skoublinska") did not operate her business alone. Her partners were her sister, daughter and niece. But what we have here is not actually a baby farming business. The four women were what Germans called "professional murderesses" (Kindermorderin) or in France, Russia and elsewhere "angel-makers" (faiseuses d'anges). They were paid by the parent, or parents, to kill unwanted infants. In today's terminology, the practice, which is being promoted by some bioethicists as a procedure that ought to be legalized with the consent of the female parent, is called "after birth abortion." The practice, once legalized, is recommended for babies up to three years old for women who do not want their discarded child adopted by others. (Alberto Giubilini & Francesca Minerva, "After-birth abortion: why should the baby live?" Journal of Medical Ethics, Feb. 23, 2012)

Marianne Skoublinska was a resourceful businesswoman who discovered how to profit from the infant deaths beyond the initial kill-fee she received for each baby-snuffing transaction. As one newspaper reported:

"Her baby farm, or rather graveyard, became known to the police a month ago through her setting fire to her cottage, containing five little children, in order to obtain the amount of the insurance on her property. At the trial it was proved that not a single child which was entrusted to her care and entered her den ever left her house alive. It was also shown that she made two charges for taking care of children, fifteen roubles for allowing the baby to die in a few weeks, and twenty for procuring its death within a day or two. She frequently threw the bodies of the children to her hogs, and boasted of the fattest hogs in the district on account of the exceptionally good feed she provided for them, in spite of all the evidence, she could not be convicted of murder."

The fact that Skoublinska could be found guilty but given an exceedingly short sentence was noted at the time in a New York City German language newspaper:

"For a young girl who is supposed to have had the intention of attempting the life of the Tzar – the gallows; for the murderess of so many children – three years penal servitude. After that, who can reproach the Nihilists for what they do?"

Yet, when we delve into the depths of the baby killing business, such an outcome will come to be seen as perfectly comprehensible.

Money, recreational sex, and influence

One of the reasons so many baby farmers, from all parts of the world, who committed serial murder managed to avoid harsh penalties after being caught killing infants is that, in many cases, the baby farmer's clients were wealthy and powerful members of the community in which they operated who were paying goodly sums to have their inconvenient offspring terminated, or, in other cases the killers' clients were prostitutes or procurers who serviced such affluent and influential persons.

It is frequently argued, by those writers who discuss the subject, that infanticides committed by baby farmers, midwives or "angel-makers", are motivated by fear that the parents could not afford to raise the child. Yet it was quite common to see in the historical record such cases as the three cases below (Frau Myer, the Przemysi women, and Madame Guzovska) where it appears that the children were murdered with the parents' express permission because the wealthy parent(s) were not able or willing to spend money or risk social standing to save the life of a "love child."

From 1892, Germany: "An aged nurse named Myer, residing at Bockenheim, a suburb of Frankfort, has been arrested and charged with causing the death of fifty-eight infants." The alleged crimes cover a considerable length of time, and it is reputed that several wealthy ladies of Frankfort are to be accused of complicity in the baby farmer's criminal operations.

In 1893, "three Austrian women were arrested in Przemysi after 27 infant corpses were discovered buried in cigar boxes on their property. A further 19 infant deaths were disclosed when babies' skeletons were found indoors. But they felt they could avoid harsh punishment, for although "the women confessed, [they] said that if arraigned they would shake the city with their revelations."

In Warsaw in 1903 "Madame Guzovska murdered over 500 babies in the course of two or three years, and … she received about ?10,000 for her crimes."

There is a hackneyed and politically correct bromide which asserts that "crime is caused by poverty" which is endlessly trotted out by trainers and indoctrinators – all-too-often in the guise of professors and teachers. The purpose of this simplistic claim is to offer up a mindless, nuance-free, formulaic sound-bite equation which serves, in effect, to put the brakes on critical thinking, to erase any temptation on a student's part to start looking deeply into complex and difficult questions of personal morality and character.

Yet the "serial killers of babies for cash" shown in these cases were swimming in money, sharing in the wealth of clients who, it would appear, had a penchant for maintaining a certain life-style of pleasure, amusement, status and luxury that they found quite pleasant; and which they preferred not to disrupt if they could conveniently, and quietly, avoid it.

A gruesome underworld of shadowy sadistic opportunists was developed to satisfy these desires for uninterrupted pleasure and convenience. It was an underworld populated by ruthless killers who were ready to "play God," to decide who might live and who might die, and, at best though of murdering babes as no different from drowning puppies, and quite likely in many cases, gave perverse delight to psychopaths who "got off" on their cruel acts.

Social causation or personal agency?

In the concluding remarks of Dr. Johnston's article, under the heading "The Bottom Line," the author posits the view that it is not possible to determine whether the four baby farmers she discusses might not have become murderesses were it not for the social conditions that shaped their economic environment: "We'll never know whether or not they would have taken some other malevolent path if the one they chose had not been available to them, a path that started with deception and ended in murder."

True. One never can "know" the answer to a "what if" scenario. Yet of when it is our purpose to examine the mind and the behavior of the criminal one elects to abridge one's thinking – through applying simplistic formulae – the resulting assessment cannot but be fatally flawed.

Subsuming the examination of criminal impulses of individuals strictly to the social deterministic formulae – whether such models be centered sex roles or economic influences – results in shallow explanations that lack nuance and which fail to describe reality. A social constructionist analysis all too often interferes with the process of serious inquiry, undermining serious and searching consideration of personal agency.

In order to move closer into looking at the question of agency with respect to female serial killers who specialize in the murders of children, I will present some cases of a type different yet closely related to baby farmer serial killers.

My comparative approach seeks to move beyond the notion that this class of serial killers (baby farmers) presents a "go figure" unsolvable criminological mystery. More than enough evidence exists which allows the question of motive, sociopathic tendency and deliberate personal agency on the part of repeat child-killers to be examined and weighed.

When looking at the numerous cases of child care providers who murdered children, over and over again, and wondering why they did it, I have chosen to invert the question. Instead of merely asking why some baby farmers chose to kill for money I also ask why did other people choose not to make money off of the serial murder of children when such opportunities were commonly available? There is a difference between choosing and choosing not. There is a difference between a conscious human agent who continues a pattern of criminal behavior in series and, conversely, an agent who, at some point, quits that malicious, or impulsive, criminal behavior voluntarily. Let us consider what kind of person can go about killing children over and over and over again.

Burned Alive

Let us look at what the historical record can further teach us about the type of person who murders babies for a living but looking specifically at what they said and how they behaved.

In 1875, Margaret McCloskey, a New York baby farmer, was arrested after neighbors complained of incessant cries. A neighbor, Elizabeth Clifford visited the McCloskey place to find out what was going on. The New York Times reports that "Mrs. Clifford found the youngest child apparently dying from starvation, and was told by one of the women that Mrs. McCloskey had been angry because the other infant had been removed, and had struck the little one, saying: 'Let it die; it's paid for.'" The callousness displayed by this baby farmer is, in the lay opinion of this writer, that of a psychopath.

Several baby farmers have been accused of burning babies alive.

From testimony in a 1907 affidavit regarding homicide accusations against Mrs. Fred West of Des Moines, Iowa:

"Babies have been burned at the West baby farm before they were dead — thrown into the furnace to end their helpless cries" – is a charge which Miss Flora Goble, the chief witness for the prosecution and a former nurse at the home makes. In a sworn affidavit she declares she saw Miss Beattie give ten drops of laudanum [opiate solution] to Baby Jim under the direction of Mrs. West. Mrs. Goble's said that "Mrs. West asked me to give the laudanum to the baby and brought me the poison bottle. I refused. Mrs. West told me not to be foolish – that it was [when] the babies gave any trouble they [put] them out of misery as fast as possible."

According to nurse Flora Goble's declaration, we see that for her own part she chose, of her own free will, to refuse to follow orders despite any economic incentive, and then ended up becoming a "whistleblower."

Mrs. West profited from selling babies she was paid to care after and put up for adoption. The ones who she killed were the left-over merchandise.

Dagmar Overbye, the infamous Copenhagen baby farmer, was convicted in 1920 by the Danish courts of nine child-murders. She was suspected of a great many other baby-slayings beginning in 1916. Wikipedia tells us that "she strangled them, drowned them or burned them to death in her masonry heater. The corpses were either cremated, buried or hidden in the loft."

[image]

Similarly, in the United States Elizabeth Ashmead, baby-farmer and abortionist, who operated – constantly on the run from infamy and the law – successively in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, was repeatedly put on trial during her baby farming and abortion career. She is best known for the Philadelphia prosecution of 1904 which prompted such headlines as "Babies Were Buried Alive – Mothers' Bodies Were Cut Up," and which, unsuccessfully, attempted to put her away for murder.

A news report on this 1904 murder trial showed that "The bodies of the infants brought into the world in these sore-spots on a civilized globe, were often burned in the furnace of the house, so two witnesses testified. One man said he had seen Mrs. Ashmead throw crying infants into a red-hot furnace, and had also seen her dispose of dead bodies in the same way." Ashmead made between $800 and 900 weekly during a period in which the buying power of the dollar was, according to one calculation, 25 times the present rate.

It is clear that certain "baby farmers" were paid, often exceedingly well, to kill babies who were "in the way" and were, in a sense, hired killers whose dirty work was much easier and much less risky than was that of her counterpart, the "hit man" who got his living from murdering adults.

We are already miles away from the notion that serial killer baby farmers somehow let babies fade vaguely away by a process vaguely denoted as "neglect," yet there is more, much more, to be said in reference to the "we'll never know" position.

"Exactly the same as the others."

The testimony of convicted thief, brothel owner and midwife Madame Delpech of Montauban, France at her 1869 trial gives us a lens into the mind of a serial baby killer. Here's a revealing snippet – in her own words:

Judge: "These children were found after they had been dead two or three days?"

Delpech: "Yes, sir; I kept one for two or three days at the foot of my bed!'

Judge: "You killed them by putting their heads in a pail of water. Is it not so?"

Delpech: "Yes sir."

Judge: "You suffocated another?"

Delpech: "Yes; exactly the same as the others."

Outcome: Madame Delpech, a confessed serial killer, was convicted of murder and sentenced to hard labor for life. We are not talking about "neglect" here, we are talking about violence.

•?•?•?•

This concludes part one of Death on the Baby Farm.

Link to PART TWO

NOTE

Photo of rescued baby, Frankie Heath, from: ["New Baby-Farm Horror – Little Frankie Heath Is Found by His Mother Dying of Starvation Amid Most Revolting Conditions." The Sunday Journal (Minneapolis, Mn.), Nov. 11, 1906, p. 1]

•?•?•?•

BIBLIOGRAPHY

• Joni E. Johnston, Psy. D., "Life on the Baby Farm: Killing Kids for Cash," female-serial-killers.com, June 12, 2013

• Dr. Biederman • Bruce E. Levine, "Exposed: Harvard Shrink Gets Rich Labeling Kids Bipolar," AlterNet, Jun, 17, 2008

• Dr. Scarr • William Norman Grigg, "New Century Children," The New American, Vol. 19, No. 18, Sep. 3, 2008; Brian C. Robertson, Day Care Deception (book), Encounter Books, 2004

• "After-Birth Abortion: Why Should the Baby Live?" Journal of Medical Ethics, Feb. 23, 2012

••• Historical Cases:

• Exposure to elements method – a case not cited in the text body, but an excellent example of the type: Christiana Breitschweidt, Jersey City, New Jersey, 1892 – ["Leaving Infants To Die – Mrs. Breitschwert Arrested For Baby Farming In Jersey City." The New York Times (N.Y.), Jan. 15, 1892, p. 10]

• Philanthropy, professionalism & neglect – The Nivison case, not mentioned in my article, provides a bizarre example of apparent incompetence (or, perhaps insanity) on the part of a professionally trained and well-funded nurse who operated a publicly sanctioned baby farm – ["Terrible Revelation – Evidence of Infants Being Murdered by the Score." Daily Evening Bulletin (Mattville, Ky.), Jun. 6, 1884, p. 1] ["Miss Nivison's Denial – Indignant At The Charges Against Her Home. – She Says That the Babies Died From Measles and Pneumonia, and Were Buried With Religious Ceremonies Whose Offspring the Infants Were." The Evening Herald (Syracuse, N. Y.), Jun. 6, 1884, p. 8] [Untitled, The Upper Des Moines (Algona, Io.), Jul. 9, 1884, p. 2]

• Ashmead, Elizabeth – ["New-Jersey 'Baby Farm' Mystery Rivals Gunness Case," syndicated The Waterloo Times-Tribune (Io.), May 21, 1910, p. 8]
["Babies Were Buried Alive – Mothers' Bodies Were Cut Up," The Tacoma Times (Wa.), Apr. 11, 1904, p. 4]
["Given Five Years – Baby Farmer Was Sent to Federal Prison," The Lowell Sun (Ma.), Jul. 1, 1911, p. 7]
• "Christiana Baby Farmers" – ["Christiania The Wickedest Capital in All Europe," The Atlanta Constitution (Ga.), Jul. 6, 1902, p. 16]
• Delpech, Madame –[From "Parisian Gossip." The Southland Times (Invercargill, New Zealand) May 20, 1869, pp. 2-3] ["Wholesale Infanticide." Lloyd's Weekly Newsletter (London, England), Mar. 14, 1869, p. 1]
["Infanticide In France." The Saturday Review (London, England), Mar. 20, 1869, p. 385]
• Dyer, Amelia – ["Hundreds of Victims. – Amelia Dyer, Baby Farmer and Strangler." syndicated, The Logansport Pharos (In.), May 15, 1896, p. 6]
"Hundreds of Victims. – Amelia Dyer, Baby Farmer and Strangler." syndicated, The Logansport Pharos (In.), May 15, 1896, p. 6
["Britain's worst ever serial killer: The Victorian angel of death that murdered 400 babies," Written by 24 Tanzania Reporter, Tanzania.com, Feb. 23, 2013]
• Eckhart, Wilhelmena – ["Murderer of Infants Charge Against Woman – Grave Accusations Against Mother by Her Two Daughters, Who Caused Her Imprisonment in Tombs." The Washington Times (D.C.), Nov. 21, 1906, p. 8] ["Light Sentence For Baby Farmer," The Pensacola Journal (Fl.), Dec. 22, 1906, p. 1]
• Falling, Christine – [Max Haines, Deadly Babysitter," Lethbridge Herald (Alberta, Canada), Jan. 25, 2004, p. A9]
"Christine Falling," from Murderpedia.org
• Geisen-Volk, Helen – Jay Maeder, "Mother's Day; Baby Nest, May 1925 Chapter 34, Daily News (New York, N.Y.), Mar. 15, 2000
• Guzovska, Madame – [Untitled, The Bruce Herald (Tokomairio, New Zealand), Jun. 16, 1903, p. 4]
• Holmen, Mr. & Mrs. – ["A Thousand Babies Murdered – On Huge Baby Farm in Stockholm. Decoy Infants." Syndicated, New Zealand Truth (Wellington, N.Z.), Dec. 22, 1906, p. 8]

• Ishikawa, Miyuki – "Miyuki Ishikawa," on Wikipedia; ["Two New 'Baby Death Suspects Rounded Up," Pacific Stars and Stripes (Tokyo, Japan), Jan. 20, 1948, p. 1]
["On Trial As Baby Murderers," Pacific Stars and Stripes (Tokyo, Japan), Sep. 24, 1948, p. 4]
• Jaspers, Virginia –["Nurse Admits Shaking Three Babies to Death – They Refused to Take Formulas and Got On Her Nerves, She Explains To Police," syndicated (AP), The Milwaukee Journal (Wi.), Aug. 28, 1956, p. 1]
• Julien, Madame – ["Systematic Child Murder." The Atlas (London, England), Sep. 21, 1867, p. 8]
• Kusnezowa, Madame – ["Thousand Murdered Babies. – Russian Woman Charged. – Victims Killed By Poison." Poverty Bay Herald (Gisborne, New Zealand), April 12, 1913, p. 10]
• Makin, Sara Jane – ["Hearts Pierced With Needles. – Bodies of Many Infants Found on Australian Baby Farms." syndicated (AP), The World (Brooklyn, N.Y.), Nov. 14, 1892, p. 2]
• McCloskey, Margaret – ["Baby Farming." New York Tribune (N.Y.), Jun. 28, 1876]
The New York Times report on this case gives the name as"Margaret McClinchy." ("Baby Farming. A Woman Sent To The Penitentiary For Six Months And Fined $250." New York Times (N.Y.), Jul. 2, 1876, p. ?)
• Moore, Helen Patricia – "The Ultimate Female Sentencing Discount: Helen Patricia Moore," Porky's Place, undated
["Babysitter 'was killer,'" The Age (Melbourne, Australia), Apr. 2, 1980, p. 3]
["Woman faces further murder, assault charges – Boy now blind, unable to walk, SM told," The Sydney Morning Herald (Australia), Apr. 10, 1980, p. 2]
[Alison Stewart, "Portrait of a baby killer – A life of agony haunts babysit killer's family," The Sun-Herald (Melbourne, Australia), Dec. 14, 1980, p. 2]
• Noskina, Feige – ["Wholesale Infanticide In Russia. – Shocking Disclosures." The South Australian Chronicle, Adelaide, SA, Australia), Jun. 18, 1892, p. 6]
["Baby Farmers Sentenced." The Sun (New York, N.Y.), May 5, 1892, p. 2]
• "Osaka Baby Farmers" – ["Three Hundred Babies Victims Members of a Japanese Family Arrested at Osaka on Charge of Child Slaughter." (Special By Scripps-McRae.), Dec. 29, 1902, p. 1]
• "Osaka Devil Woman" – ["Wholesale Infanticide – Woman Charged With Murdering Over 100 Babies." The West Australian (Perth, Australia), Aug. 28, 1906, p. 2]
• Ostrovoskafa, Rachel – ["A Murderous Sect." Marlborough Express (Blenheim, Marlborough, New Zealand), Mar. 25, 1885, p. 3]
• Overbye, Dagnmar – [Helle Harbo Sørensen, "Child killer Dagmar Overbye," TV2 Finans, Jun. 22, 2008] Link to Danish original: Helle Harbo Sørensen, "Bardemordersken Dagmar Overbye," TV2 Finans, Jun. 22, 2008]
• Pankow, Sandra K. – [Lee Bergquist, "Appleton sitter gets 40 years for 2 killings," Milwaukee Sentinel (Wi.), Aug. 22, 1986, p. 1]
• "Premysi Baby Farmers" – ["Wholesale Infanticide. – Terrible Revelations of an Austrian Baby-Farm – Dozens of Bodies Found by the Authorities – Social Scandals Threatened." The Toronto Daily Mail (Canada), Mar. 6, 1893, p. 1]
• Roseberry, Edna – ["Woman Convicted of Beating Baby," St. Petersburg Times (Fl.), Feb. 20, 1948, p. 8]
• Schnell, Ida – [Bernard Fischer, "Girl of Thirteen Slays Six Babies – Remarkable Record of Murder Is Confessed by a Child in Munich." Syndicated, The Salt Lake Tribune (Ut.), Nov. 10, 1907, p. 17]
• Scott, Amy Lynn –[Jill Redhage, "Woman convicted of killing three babies decades after their deaths," East Valley Tribune (Tempe, Az.), Mar. 7, 2007 (updated Oct. 7, 2011)]
• Skoublinska, Marianne; "Skublinski," "Stysinski, " etc. – ["Horrible Crimes At Warsaw – Fifty Murdered Babies Found." The Echo (London, England), Feb. 24, 1890, p. 3]
["A Diabolical Crime." Supplement to Evening Post (Wellington, New Zealand), May 17, 1890, p. 1]
["The Polish Baby Murderer Sentenced," The Nelson Evening Mail (New Zealand), May 27, 1890, p. 4] [« Les faiseuses d'anges, » (Chronique Ou Crime) Le Stéphanois (Paris , France), Feb. 28, 1890, p. 2] [Untitled, Free Russia, (The Organ of the English Society of Friends of Russian Freedom, American Edition), (New York, N.Y.), Apr. 1891, p. 6]
• Tanaka, Mrs. Juniki – ["Infants Starved To Death For Dowries – Eight Murders Charged to Tokyo (Japan)

Couple." The Kingston Daily Freeman (N.Y.), Sep. 11, 1924, p. 7]
• Tann, Georgia – "Devil in disguise: Adoption in America," The Buffalo News, May 22, 2007 (book review); Barbara Raymond, The Baby Thief, *The Untold Story of Georgia Tann, the Baby Seller Who Corrupted Adoption,*2007 (book; highly recommended)
• Thorman, Lillian B. –["Fire Used To Kill. – Girls Says She Killed Three Children by Placing Them on the Stove." Plain Dealer (Cleveland, Oh.), Feb. 23, 1906, p. 1]
• Turner, Lise Jane – ["Lise Jane Turner," murderpedia.org] ["Lynn Turner (murderer)," Wikipedia]
• Waters, Margaret – ["Trade Of Murder – Review of the Case of Margaret Waters, the Murderess, Hanged on Oct. 11." (from the London Spectator, Oct. 1), The New York Times (N.Y.), Oct. 15, 1870, p. ?] [Untitled, The Guardian (London, England), Oct. 12, 1870, p. 1191 (p. 7 of issue)] ["Baby Farming," Victorian History, Mar. 14, 2012]
• Weber, Jeanne – ["'The Fatal Woman.' – Mystery Of Seven Infants' Deaths." From Paris Daily Mail, The Daily Mail (London, England), May 11, 1908, p. 5] ["Ogress's Fate – Murderess of Many Children Sent to a Lunatic Asylum." Lloyd's Weekly News (London, England), Nov. 29, 1908, p. 10]
• Wiese, Elizabeth – ["Terrible Charges Against A Berlin Baby Farmer." Daily Mail (London, England), Oct. 6, 1903, p. 5] ["Baby Farmer Must Die. – Notorious German Woman Receives Five Capital Sentences." Syndicated (Bulletin Press Association), Oshkosh Daily Nortwestern (Wi.), Nov. 1, 1904, p. 4]
• West. Mrs. Fred Mr. – ["Babies Instead of Dogs Said to Be Sold in Iowa – Woman Charged With Killing Unsalable Child – Accused of Throwing Noisy Infants Into Furnace." The Washington Times (D.C.), Jun. 4, 1907, p. 4

•?•?•?•

Feminist no-show during AVFM debate

Robert O'Hara · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box](Washington D.C. July 13th, 2013) On Thursday, July 11th, 2013, James Huff and Robert O'Hara arranged a special Blogtalk Radio broadcast in response to the publicity Men's Rights Edmonton (MRE) had been getting regarding its "Don't Be That Girl" poster campaign. The posters, a parody of the now famous, "Don't Be That Guy" poster campaign started by Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton in 2010, were posted on the University of Alberta campus in conjunction with another set of posters intended to promote July 20th event hosted by the Canadian Association For Equality featuring Dr. James S. Brown titled "Our Underachieving Sons." The charges of rape apology and cowardice thrown at MRE demanded a response and the radio show was intended to provide a public venue for feminists to debate with MRE's representatives–Razlo, Judgy Bitch and Girl Writes What–concerning the matter.

It was a record breaking show for AVFM News and Activism and the number of guests in the chat room indicated a large audience of first time listeners. The show was publicized not only by AVFM but by MRE along with help from all of the media attention. Perhaps for the first time, a sizable audience from outside of the Manosphere tuned in to listen to what Men's Right's activists had to say for themselves and MRE as well as AVFM Staff were eager to debate with our opponents.

Dr. Leise Gotell and Edmonton Councilman Don Iveson, two of the most public voices expressing outrage at the posters, were both invited by AVFM to join the debate. They both declined the invitation in short order. The open invitation to all feminists interested in debate remained, however, and it was hoped that at least a few would call in.

With the exception of one caller sympathizing with the feminist camp having little to say about rape culture or false rape accusations, not one feminist chose to speak.

In fact, after taking several calls from supporters of MRE and several prank calls, producer James Huff requested of the audience "Please no more MRAs we only want to take feminist callers" in hopes at least one would call in to discuss the posters and their message. At that very moment no less than 20 people dropped from the chat room associated with the show and all callers left the call-in cue. Whether or not those who chose to leave the chat room and call-in cue were trolls or feminists unwilling to talk after a second thought is unclear. One thing is clear though, the only people left on the stage were men's rights activists.

This was interpreted to mean that feminists had absolutely no desire to publicly defend their positions from MHRAs who had offered an opportunity to engage in a civil discourse concerning sexual assault and rape culture. It seems that feminists, who have spent billions of dollars over the course of several decades to promote their ideas through the media, indoctrinate young people in our education system and pass laws based exclusively on their ideology concerning violence against women and sexual assault were not willing to talk to anyone who disagreed with them.

This did not mean that they have stopped the public assault on MRE. A petition has been started to file a Human Rights Complaint to the Alberta Human Rights and Citizenship Commission in order to have MRE cease and desist their poster campaign. [/box]

Naomi's sweet honey-hole

Jason Gregory · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Naomi Wolf's opus, "Vagina: A New Biography", has been out for a while now. I recommend reading it. I like Naomi. She had me at pounding her sweet Princess honey-hole…you know, the one that bestows consciousness upon humanity, without which we'd all just be empty meat sacks, husks of men. Anywhore, this is not a review of her or her sweet honey-hole. This is a review of the reviews about her sweet honey-hole on Amazon.

Here is a photo of the person behind the sweet honey-hole biography. Notice how she drips with the sweet feminist nectar-of-life. Yeah, admit it. It's OK to fantasize about being her Winnie the Pooh and invading her sweet honey-pot. I'll bet it makes her produce even more feminist nectar-of-life to know that manginas fantasize about stimulating her sweet honey-hole, about blowing a massive load, a 300 million sperm army all up inside her honey-hole. It makes her nectar-of-life flow like the conscious-stream of an artist hyped up on cocaine. Hell, billions of manginas beating off to her all at once will probably bestow upon humanity a unity-consciousness for all. Imagine it. Billions of manginas focused on her, beating off to her, all blowing their loads in unison, all for the sake of bestowing a unity-consciousness upon humanity.

Move over Wi-Fi. Naomi's sweet honey-hole, in conjunction with billions of masturbating manginas, will raise consciousness to such a great degree that humanity will undergo a rapid evolutionary shift, the next great stage of humanity will be achieved—a gynocentric-telepathy. That's right. "Ma Bell" and the old clamshell Nokia phones were a foreshadowing of the stylish new clamshell gynophones. You gotta do it boys. Beat your meat for Naomi—for all humanity.

So now that we've established the importance of mangina masturbation, the "Ma Bell" clamshell "Goddess Array," the gynophone unity-consciousness, and the evolutionary shift, let's have a look at the some of the reviews made by members of the Church-of-Vagina (and other non-denominational vagtheists), as well as some reviews made by anti-vagtheists.

☆☆☆☆☆ a book men and women should read, June 18, 2013

By Deborah Bybee - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

I was pleased by the amount of physical and psychological information and research throughout the book. Unlike so many books about women out there, this is one that has importance for men, too. I think it would greatly help men understand the women they know and love and explain why so often, the women and girls they know react in seemingly inexplicable ways. I would like my sons to read it as they start into dating and relationships and I plan on sharing some of the information with friends and students.

I was pleased by this review. It's the work of a medium-functioning semi-literate. Unlike so many full-blown illiterates, she manages to use written language as a tool to convey the fact that men need to read this book about Naomi's sweet honey-hole in order to understand the "seemingly inexplicable" behavior of women. Ms. Bybee expresses that her sons should read about Naomi's honey-hole, especially since they will start dating. Reading between the lines here, I see that Ms. Bybee is concerned that her sons should know how to read between the legs (if you know what I mean) of the women they will soon be dating. She doesn't want to raise boys into men who don't know how to stimulate the clit. Yep, gotta teach those boys to flick and lick—rock that little man in the boat.

I give this review 3 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ Must Read!!, June 8, 2013

By BooksJJS "BooksJJS" (Brighton, CO) - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

This book is a must read for anyone who is concerned about their sexual sense of self. With a sharp understanding of the deep harm done by the overall glorification of pornography (especially high speed online porn), Wolf delves into so much that is wrong with our culture.
She goes on to discuss in detail the lasting neurologic damage that can be caused by sexual trauma and assault. All of this is supported by references to important and long overdue studies.
The book is deeply and necessarily disturbing, but goes on to elucidate the ways in which we can heal ourselves sexually- and how our partners can join us in thus journey.
I've seen a lot of criticism at the use of the term "Goddess Array" to describe the complexity of every woman's unique sexual wiring- which I don't understand. Why slam the author for giving a beautiful name to a beautiful thing? Some of this has been from "feminists" who seem to take issue with what they perceive as a "New age" take on women's sexuality.
It is enough that the book brings to light the detrimental effects of our culture of porn, denigration of women, and ways to heal these things.
Read it! Women, men, daughters, sons- read this book to begin healing the culture, yourselves, and start to create a more sexually healthy future for everyone.

BooksJJS' review is a must read for any woman gullible enough to believe that society and self can be healed through better stimulation of the clit and through a better understanding of the sexual wiring of women. This review is also important for women who are jealous of "high speed online porn." For any woman who wants to shame her partner about beating it to somebody else, this review is important to you because you will learn how to shame your partner about his sexuality, all the while dragging him into a goddess-cult of beliefs that bolster your own sexuality as some sort of magical "Goddess Array."

I give this review 5 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ Latest scientific research on how women are wired, June 1, 2013

By mack (Ashland, Oregon) - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

There is a lot of new science that shows compelling evidence for a much more complex connection between the vagina and the brain's hormone systems, and how it affects women's state of being. A mind body connection well explained.

This review by mangina "mack" explains that there must be some sort of science behind the goddess-cult that he has been worshipping. This review is important for any mangina who hasn't been able to purge all his patriarchal logic. Shame on him and all his kind.

I give this review 1 limp penis out of 5.

By Debra K. McCall (CLAREMORE, OK, US) - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

Every woman and man who loves women should read this to understand fully dynamics of intimate love and the female body-mind!

Ms. McCall's review is short and sweet and for anybody who loves pussy. If you want to experience "intimate love," get down on your fucking knees and worship the sweet honey-hole goddess.

I give this review 2 limp penises out of 5.

★★☆☆☆ Its a book about vagina., April 11, 2013

By eric - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

Its not really that great. I like sex as much as the next person I suppose, and there were a few good tidbits here and there about the actual body, but all this goddess crap... sounds to me like the author sets us up to believe that we wont get what we want out of lives unless we worship the goddess within both literally and figuritively. All because of a sex organ... c'mon ladies, we've spent the last century trying to prove thats not all there is to a woman, don't let this sweet talker make you feel any different. The notion that there is another self post orgasm bordelines on the religious, and I don't think I will be attending the church of vagina saints and the patron goddess soon. It was a weird combination of science, only it was used to futher the idolitry of vaginas.

Sir "eric" has provided us with a perfect review, flawless—a shining example of coherency, logic, and truth about the goddess-cult. "It's a book about vagina."

I give this review 0 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★☆ Vagina: A New Biography, March 23, 2013

By douglas macnab - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

interesting reading; great inside into women real world. May men go through out life not knowing so may details about women.

This review by "douglas macnab" is a prime example of a practically illiterate mangina. Notice how there are 2 properly placed periods—something that manginas do understand about women, namely filthy vaginas.

I give this review 4 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ Learn about sex helps creativity in woman, March 20, 2013

By Robert S. Blaisdell - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

The book has cutting edges science , but is explained for the lay person. New insights on the complex connections between certain hot spots in the female genitals and the nuerotransmiters in the brain. "The Goddess Array" explains how to really excite woman but much of this is not directly about sex

This review by "Robert S. Blaisdell" appeals to any mangina who wants to make himself a useful tool to a woman's sexuality. Robert is so happy to be able to please a woman that he practically spooged all over his keyboard while gushing about this book. He is such a good little boy and so proud of his learnings about female genitalia, neurotransmitters, and the brain. He can barely stave off an orgasm long enough to write this review. I'm sure mommy would be very proud of him.

I give this review 3 limp penises out of 5.

★★☆☆☆ An elaborate excuse, March 16, 2013

By Zidib - See all my reviews

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

I understand that Naomi may reach a time in her life when she needs the services of a male prostitute/ yoni tapper/ somatic healer... whatever ! I support her. Since she's respected and respectable, She can't just decide to visit her sex worker. Naomi will muster the courage for that venture only after she equips herselve with an elaborate excuse. So we end up with Vagina.

The problem with Vagina, is that the author is too eager to cram in any old half study, survey and anecdotal rumination of random acquaintances in support of her thesis. She takes small studies done on rats to sweeping conclusions about women and their Vagina brains or brain vaginas or the connections to something she call goddess. It gets on the New Age track then gets off on an Eastern trip and high five the Islamic erotic tradition, no kidding. There's also some back slapping of those cool cats singing earthy blues lyrics that the white people don't always get. "Put some suga in my bowl" dig!
There is a lot of jumping around. One minute she is talking about her own Vagina then we're off to the cosmic Vagina or global vagina or western vagina, the porned,hated, beloved, slanged vagina. The Ancient Vagina beat up quiet a bit on the Victorian Vagina.
Naomi blames the feminist, post feminist, the sixties for the Vagina's predicament then hiked it to see her Vagina Whisper.
The yoni tapper touched her in all the right places. She felt a bit oceanic down there. Now Naomi is much more hopeful!

A stellar review by “Zidib” reminds us of the fact that if older women can’t find manginas willing to dedicate 3 or 4 hours per day to foreplay, she can always employ the services of a prostitute or even a gigolo. Excellent points, sir.

I give this review 0 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ Research shows that women are Goddesses, February 28, 2013

By Physics Math (San Diego) - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

"Vagina" is a truly enlightening book based on solid scientific research. Ms. Wolf's clear prose links this research to the experience of many women, including herself. She provides physiological evidence for the value of Tantric and other eastern practices that treat women as "the center of the universe".

“Physics Math” has provided us with a review appealing to manginas and other gynocentric sorts who believe that women are “the center of the universe.” If you worship women as goddesses, you should find this review helpful. If you ever feel like hacking off your balls with a machete because you’re not worthy, this book should compel you to find that last bit of courage to carry through with your self-mutilation and sacrifice fantasy.

I give this review 5 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ All intelligent women and men should read this book!, February 28, 2013

By Ellen E. G. Cusac - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A Cultural History (Kindle Edition)

It may be hard for some to get past the title...but this is an important, even vital read for ALL women, and ALL men who want to truly understand their women. This book covers the most recent, ground-breaking science about the importance of our orgasmic capacity as women. The fact is that this potential in us is critical to our creative abilities, productivity in all aspects of life, relationships (not only with our men), and our wholeness...spiritually, as well. A must-read!

It may be hard for some of you men to render 4 hours of foreplay per day, but if you really love your woman, it’s a sacrifice that you must make to maintain a healthy relationship with your woman. If you don’t make this sacrifice for her, you are personally responsible for her lack of orgasms, for her incompleteness of being and for her diminished spirituality. Shame on you! This review by “Ellen E.G. Cusac” is a good review for any woman looking to blame and shame men for a woman’s own inadequacies in the bedroom, in her personal life, and in her spiritual life.

I give this review 3 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★★ Should be required reading, February 27, 2013

By Laura B - See all my reviews

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

Nothing short of amazing! How is it that we women have been living in the dark for millennia? Even in this sex-driven culture of today, there is little knowledge or true appreciation of who we really are, as women. Thank you Naomi for shining a light. I've gifted this book and recommended it to every woman I love as well as to some spiritually advanced men.

Poor victim-women, nobody acknowledges or appreciates them, except for the few “spiritually advanced” mangina pussy-worshipers who pray to the divine mother-goddess for access to pussy.

I give this review 4 limp penises out of 5.

★★★★☆ Thought-Provoking Work with Valuable Insights, January 6, 2013

By Alton L. Gilbert (Brazil) - See all my reviews

REAL NAME

Amazon Verified Purchase (What's this?)

This review is from: Vagina: A New Biography (Hardcover)

Very readable, the book is organized into chapters addressing various aspects of female sexuality and social treatment of that sexuality. The book relates numerous studies and personal experiences which aid the author in making her case for better understanding and acceptance of the role of sexuality in women. The only criticism I have (as a scientist myself) is that she draws too many universal conclusions from very limited surveys and studies, largely amongst what would generally be her peers.

Yes, most books are organized into chapters. It makes them slightly more readable. “Alton L. Gilbert” gives us a review to be expected of a mangina struggling to purge his innate tendency to oppress women with patriarchal things like science and matters of fact. Notice how he ever so subtly attempts to oppress his goddess for making “universal conclusions.” He has to hide his “criticism” behind his being a “scientist.” Don’t worry Alton, mangina “mack” and “Physics Math” will give you the courage to sever your balls and put aside your oppression tendencies so that you can realize your true nature as a subservient worshipper of goddess-vagina and of Naomi’s honey-hole. Amazon can provide you with a fantastic “Estwing” hatchet for hacking off your balls.

There are many more reviews and I encourage all to check them out. I also encourage all to read more about Naomi’s sweet princess honey-hole. It is important for a man to learn how to muff-dive and please a woman. It makes my cock throb just thinking about getting paid to stimulate a few dozen of Naomi’s multiple orgasms, making her 50 year old flab produce more quivers than a legion of Tolkien’s elves. I can count the money already…god, that money makes me hawt. Being a human-vibrator is so much fun. It’s like being a throbbing, big veined, cock-god.

It’s also important for billions of manginas to masturbate and blow a load in unison over Naomi’s honey-hole. Until this happens, the “Goddess Array” and unity-consciousness cannot be created. Sadly, without the sacrifices made by these billions of manginas, humanity will be unable to make the next evolutionary leap. Hats off to Naomi for inspiring manginas around the world to worship and for encouraging them to spend 3-4 hours per day on foreplay. It’s a sacrifice all men should be willing to make to gain entrance and membership to the Church-of-Vagina or other vagtheist goddess-cults. It’s nothing but a small tithe to be paid for the privilege of a worldwide mangina circle-jerk of unity-consciousness load-blowing.

Special thanks for the musical genius of Frank Zappa. May he rest in peace.

Don’t be that lying feminist

VFM News and Commentary · 16 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM Contributing Editor Girl Writes What (Karen Straughan) weighs in on Postergate. As usual, she knocks it out of the park.

And of course if you haven’t subscribed to her channel you ought to do so right here.

One Decision

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 17 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For those of us who are tired by the relentlessly negative depiction of men in the media, here's something uplifting. Red Castle Productions has created a short film to inform people of the dangers of leaving children unattended in cars on hot days.

This is what they have to say:

> One Decision is a film that we are very passionate about. We made this film in hopes to prevent child injuries or death. Every 10 days a child dies from vehicular heatstroke. Join us in this cause by sharing this film with everyone you know.

The heroes–and the villains–of this film may end up surprising you.

Prisoners on hunger strike for humane treatment

VFM News and Commentary · 17 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Since July 8th, 2013, thousands of California prison inmates have been on hunger strike.

The strike was initiated to draw attention to and protest inhumane treatment and conditions in California prisons.

Central to the protest is the issue of prolonged use of Security Housing Units, a type of solitary confinement. Conditions in these units include spending 23 hours a day inside a tiny, cramped room without even a window to let in the sun, where the inmate is deprived of all human contact except for being awakened by guards every half hour – even at night – and the receipt of meals. Even exercise is done alone in a small space.

In some cases this confinement has lasted more than ten years, and in still others, more than twenty.

After seeing the inside of U.S. Security Housing Units and interviewing prisoners, Shane Bauer, who was kept in Tehran's Evin Prison for 26 months after being apprehended while hiking near the border between Iran and Iraq in 2009, described the special housing unit system as in some ways worse than the solitary confinement he experienced in Iran.

Inmates identified by officials as gang members are placed in Security Housing Units. This determination is made in an administrative hearing in which a minimum of 3 pieces of evidence is required, one of which must be considered a "direct link". Inmates have been deemed gang members based on possessing an item with a disapproved image, reading disapproved (black authored) literature, or having and expressing – even privately, in a journal – unapproved political views.

Use of prolonged solitary confinement has been condemned by the ACLU, and by the U.N. as inhumane. Similar confinement has been ruled "cruel and unusual punishment" by a federal judge hearing an ACLU complaint on behalf of mentally ill prisoners.

This is the third such protest in two years. Previous protests have led to promises, but not to actual reform. This time, prisoners are demanding a legally binding agreement.

Officials have labeled the strike a "mass disturbance," and are blaming it on gang activity, the same accusation that is used to place prisoners in these atrocious conditions.

References:

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/hector-villagra/california-prison-hunger-strike_b_3588989.html

http://www.latimes.com/news/local/la-me-ff-prison-strike-20130712,0,3473468.story http://www.latimes.com/news/local/political/la-me-ff-california-says-12400-inmates-remain-on-hunger-strike-in-5th-day-20130712,0,1432481.story http://www.aclu.org/blog/prisoners-rights-capital-punishment/what-prison-hunger-strikes-mean-architect-there-are-some http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/07/10/solitary-confinement-torture_n_3573320.html

Shane Bauer: Solitary in Iran Nearly Broke Me. Then I Went Inside America's Prisons.

http://www.rollingstone.com/politics/news/the-five-most-important-demands-from-the-california-prison-hunger-strike-20130716

[/box]

How to help a man die well

Phil in Utah · 17 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On June 4 of this year, northern Utah lost one of its finest residents—my paternal grandfather. He died in one of the best ways possible: in his sleep, surrounded by his family.

As much as we here like to focus on preventing male deaths, especially suicides, and as much evidence as there is to show that ideological feminism contributes to male illness and suffering, I'd like to take a bit of a different approach to my grandfather's death. Despite our best efforts, the time always comes for Death to claim somebody, and when we sense that time coming, and it's no longer preventable, we should do whatever we can to make the person's passing easier. So, I wish to give all our readers a guide to helping a man to die well.

Understand his condition

My grandfather was diagnosed in March with Stage IV brain cancer that metastasized from a case of melanoma he'd been treated for fifteen years ago. He didn't go in for regular screenings, and we discovered his condition when he got lost driving three blocks away from his home. At the doctor's recommendation, he underwent radiation therapy in hope of prolonging his life. Unfortunately, the treatment made his passing a lot more agonizing than it needed to be. By the time he was gone, he looked like a skeleton. He literally couldn't do anything on his own. Nobody could understand half the words he said. I helped him change his clothes, use the bathroom, and get to bed.

Despite what many may think, people suffering from memory loss know quite well what's going on. My grandfather was no exception; the frustration in his voice was palpable whenever he was corrected on something. I asked my younger cousins not to correct him on his mistakes unless it was absolutely necessary. And it rarely was; I didn't correct him when he confused me with my father, because I knew that he thought highly of him, and he was projecting both my father's looks and personal traits onto me.

Don't remind him constantly of his impending fate

My grandfather owned several acres of land outside of the city limits. A significant portion of this was devoted to his personal garden, from which he freely gave away potatoes, vegetables, and flowers to his many friends and relatives. My aunt and I would take him out by the field to watch as my cousins and I tilled the soil, planted seeds, bulbs, and sprouts, and covered them back up. When the days were right, I opened and closed the irrigation ditches. His garden was his second greatest joy in life (his greatest one being his grandchildren), and not being able to tend to it himself was a great frustration of his illness. Not having worked a blue collar job for over three years, I found the work exhausting. It was quite remarkable to consider that up until this year, he did absolutely everything all by himself.

Using a handicapped parking permit after getting a hip replacement was the greatest length he went to in admitting that his strength was deteriorating. Western culture today teaches men that their worth as human beings is measured by their utility, and my grandfather took that to heart at an almost depressing level. When he realized that his utility was all but gone, he was both jaded and frightened.

Reassure him of his worth

A property the size of my grandfather's is no small task to maintain. To this end, many people from his congregation came to help. At first, he was embarrassed by this treatment. My aunt and I told him that this was his reward for all the people he'd touched in his life. I'm not sure if he ever accepted this, but I think that, at the very least, knowing how we felt brought him a degree of peace.

Help fulfill his spiritual needs

My grandfather was most likely named after Hyrum Smith, the brother of Joseph Smith, Jr., founder of the LDS church. For a notable portion of his life, he had distanced himself from the church for personal reasons. Because of this, he missed out on performing the baptisms of all but the youngest of his children, which is the highlight of most LDS fathers' lives. After he rejoined, he felt rather unfulfilled. As a compromise, I allowed him to baptize me when I was eight (the age of accountability in LDS theology). I can't remember ever seeing him a happier man than that day. He went on to work in a Family History center, managing genealogy records going as far back as the Thirteenth Century, and organizing family reunions. His grandchildren were the greatest joy in his life, which was compounded by the PhD he held in Child Development. Family was everything to him.

For the past two years, though I still believe the theology and harbor no ill will towards the Church itself, I have not gone to church (for reasons I may go into in another article). Knowing that it would cause him unbearable emotional duress, I never told him about my inactivity. I also assisted in services when other Church members would give him Sacrament, knowing the prayers by heart.

Even if you're not a believer, realize what a man's faith means to him. Do not mock or belittle his self-actualization when he's suffering.

Help meet his everyday needs

Ask anybody in an Oncology ward, and they'll tell you that cancer in and of itself doesn't cause actual pain—it's an overall bad feeling, both of body and mind. During the final month of his life, my grandfather would barely eat or drink anything, aside from the occasional glass of milk or pickled herring. Those were the things that, in those days, he hated the least. He also got quite cold, even though he wore sweaters and the days averaged 72 degrees Fahrenheit. Making sure he had a blanket was essential to his comfort, and moving him whenever he requested was a priority.

Respect his wishes

The freedom of college life compelled me to grow out my hair, both on the top and bottom of my head. Though he rarely complained about it directly to me, my grandfather disliked my grooming choices. At his request, I shaved my face as close as I could and cut my hair down to CEO length. When a man is near the end of his life, he feels like he has very little control over anything happening in it. This is every bit as frightening as the idea that he's losing his worth as a human being.

A man feels compelled, in his final days, to review the legacy he left behind. As a member of the Education faculty at Utah State, he always pushed the Department to make sure its undergraduate and graduate students were not only prepared for their work in the field, but to produce the best results possible. He was one of the first child development experts to doubt the validity of ADHD as a true psychological disorder, and history has borne him out. I read him that article as he lay in his bed, along with a few selected works of Coleridge, his favorite poet.

Respect his dignity

Though he constantly needed my help fulfilling his daily needs, my grandfather didn't want me by him every second of the day. I would help him get into the bathroom and shut the door behind him. Here was a man who had all the ravages of a high-stress, high-activity life catching up to him, and to add insult to injury, he couldn't even answer the call of nature alone. Keeping that fact out of a dying man's mind won't get rid of his maladies, but will help ease his mind.

My grandfather rarely took care of his hygiene in his last month, mainly because he lacked the physical strength to bathe himself. At his insistence, we never enlisted a home care nurse to look after his needs, preferring to do the bulk of it ourselves. Also, though it might have saved him much of the pain that arose in the aftermath of his radiation therapy, he refused any sort of narcotics. Had we force-fed him or given them intravenously, he would have felt no control over his life, and would doubtlessly have resented us all for it.

When he passes on, be there for his family

Those men who choose to build families are tremendously brave. They deserve all the help they can get, even if they're too proud to ask for it. Whether you believe in an afterlife or not, honor a man's memory by providing emotional support and/or a reasonable amount of financial support for his progeny. He wouldn't want his work to be in vain.

Death is never an easy thing to deal with, especially when it happens to a loved one. Empathy works wonders for people, and it is something that we must all embrace, male or female. As a great man once said, "It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us — that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion."

Prone to violence chapter three

Erin Pizzey · 17 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: We are pleased to have obtained permission to reprint Erin Pizzey's classic book, Prone to Violence*, first published in 1982. This book is a must-read on the subject of domestic violence, and is what people from the former Soviet Union would call "samizdat," as the book was subjected to concerted campaigns to make it unavailable for publication or distribution in the UK or United States. Over 30 years ago, gender ideologues were already trying to hide the truth–that men and women are equally prone to violence. Although parts of this book are dated, what's most shocking is how fresh and timely most of it still is: little has changed in the last 30 years, except that the vast majority of peer-reviewed scientific research done since its publication has only bolstered all of Erin's most salient points. When it comes to domestic violence, women and men are about as violent as each other, just in somewhat different ways, and its primary victims are children.*

We continue our series with the second chapter of "Prone To Violence." Watch for the other chapters to be published here on AVfM. If you have ever been involved in an abusive relationship with a woman (or man for that matter), you owe it to yourself to read this book. And if you know someone who is, or has been, in such a relationship, you owe it to them to get them to read it. –DE

Chapter Three: CHILDREN OF VIOLENCE

Violence towards children brings out a passionate reaction in most adults because few of us get through childhood unhurt, either emotionally or physically. We can all remember moments of utter helplessness and impotence at the hands of an enraged adult. For the lucky ones, the angry parent soon reverts to a normal, loving self and promises the child that she or he will control their temper next time. For the others, there is no such hope, and the child is at the mercy of two entirely unpredictable human beings.

I often feel that some middle-class children have a much harder time at the hands of their parents than do working-class children, yet it is a common feeling that violence to children does not happen in 'nice' families – by which most people mean the white middle classes. I remember, in the early days of women's aid, trying to persuade an agency worker that a woman was not only being very violent to her three children but was also neglecting them. The agency worker promised to go round to the house, and I telephoned the next day to see what had happened. She was very hesitant. 'You didn't tell me her husband was a dentist,' she said. 'It's very difficult in these cases., I saw her point. II is very difficult, because middle-class people have professional resources like lawyers, whom they can use to sue anyone who dares suggest they are less than perfect.

It seems harder for a middle-class parent to ask for help. I still painfully recall going to a psychiatrist, when my daughter was little, and asking him to help me with my violent feelings towards her. I remember the shock on his face. He considered my successful husband, a national television reporter. He looked at my two well-fed, well-dressed children, and then he looked at me. 'Mrs Pizzey,' he said, sitting back in his chair, 'the problem is that you are a bad mother.' What he meant was that, firstly, I had everything anyone could want; secondly, violence, he had been trained to believe, results from bad social conditions; therefore if you could not lay claim to social deprivation, then you must be intrinsically evil or bad.

On another occasion I was in a neighbour's house. I had always suspected that it was a violent family, particularly because of the elder child's behaviour. I knew this child was being seen regularly by a child psychiatrist for educational problems. One morning I was in my bedroom, with the window open, when I heard terrible screams coming from a house in the square. The cries of a desperate child. I ran barefoot down the stairs into the street and down the pavement until I stopped outside the door of the house from which the cries were still coming. 'No, mummy! No, mummy! Don't do it . . . Don't . . . ' The screams had such ringing intensity that they must have been heard by at least a dozen of the houses round about, yet no one stirred out of a single door. The people already on the street merely turned their heads and hurried by. I banged on the front door. No answer. I banged so hard that the frame shook. The battered child in me was screaming – it was the battered child in so many people crying out for help.

Sheila finally opened the door. She was panting with rage. She was speechless. Her eyes were bulging, and her hair was sticking out in sweaty strands. She stood in silence, shaking. I pushed past her and ran upstairs. Rodney was standing in the doorway of his bedroom. He was naked, and there were red finger-marks across his chest. It was his shocked little white face that broke my heart – the dreadful acceptance by a child of six that it was his fault, he'd been naughty, and he deserved what had happened. He already knew that if you upset your parents, they beat you. He explained what had happened. His father had gone off yet again with another woman. Rodney had gone into his mother's room to phone his father, but mummy had come in and overheard him. She flew into a blinding rage, tore the telephone off the wall, and then laid into him. I cuddled him gently.

That sort of incident can happen with any parent pushed beyond endurance, but the difference here was that in Sheila's family it was a regular occurrence. The children of this family were often battered, but it was covered up by both parents. Rodney's abnormally violent and psychopathic behaviour at school was explained away as his 'giftedness'. The outpatient clinic he attended never even suspected that he was being battered.

I went downstairs to Sheila, but I felt an enormous rush of sympathy for her. 'What are you going to do?' she asked. 'Nothing,' I said. 'All you must do is to go to the clinic and see Rodney's psychiatrist and tell him the truth. I will phone him myself once you've told him, because I need to be sure you've phoned, for your own protection and for the children. Now we've been through this together, and you know I'm nearby. It will be a measure of control for you.' Poor woman. It must have been hard for her, but at least the clinic, although they had missed the signs before, had a reputation for being good and sympathetic.

But it is a mistake to think of violence as a collection of bruises and broken bones. It is not the physical attacks that do the worst of the damage; it is the slow destruction of a human soul in the hands of people already suffering from their own violent natures. Until it is accepted by everyone that verbal violence can do far more damage than even the most savage physical onslaught, we will continue to react only to stories and pictures of visibly battered children, and comfort ourselves that it only happens among the poor and the feckless.

In my experience of cases which range from one end of the social scale to the other, the truth is that the more primitive the personality, the greater the likelihood that they will lose control of their rage and batter or even kill. You will find these people in all walks of life. Among the middle classes, however, with their highly-developed methods of social control, the violence will, for the most part, be physically restrained but will acquire a mental sophistication that is far more dangerous to the survival of the other members of a family. You can destroy the physical world of other human beings by smashing up the house and beating up the inmates. The home can be mended and the bruises will fade. But in bringing up children, although you may never physically attack them, you may instead slowly decimate any sense of self they have, so that their inner world is destroyed. And then you commit the equivalent of soul murder, and the resulting adults will be the walking dead.

Middle-class violence is still a taboo subject. Because it remains largely untold and is a highly skilled vice, it goes untreated and unchecked. I see it in the eczema, in the migraines, in the epileptic fits, in the asthma. I see the violence in all the stress symptoms of childhood: in the child up the road that constantly has a red ring round his lips because he nervously sucks at them all the time; in the child that blinks furiously when you speak to her; and all the other cases taken to the doctor's surgery for him to recommend treatment for the symptoms. It would probably never cross the doctor's mind that Richard's nightmares about his mother were a result of her incestuous overtures. That Melanie's migraine was a result of the silent battle of a ten-year-old to keep her father out of the bathroom because she recognises that his feelings towards her are more sexual than paternal. Or, in the case of an eight-year-old boy attending the hospital for ulcers – his own father a doctor – that his bleeding stomach was a symptom of the family meal times when everyone round the table sat in terror of the father's moods and continual acid remarks to his son reminding him of his failure at school, on the sportsfield, in life, as a human being.

You have a greater chance of coming to terms with your own violent childhood, which often includes sexual as well as physical attacks, if the events are actualised and visible. If you have parents that act out their damage in front of you, it is all seen, heard and experienced. The most difficult cases to treat, however, are where the violence is never all openly said, seen or heard. This is the case in the majority of middleclass homes. It will continue to be the case until enough middle-class emotionally-disabled people have the courage to get together and work to prevent it.

Just recently I became involved with a grandmother who was extremely worried about her grandson. Her daughter, the child's mother, came to see me as a result of a hideous beating from yet another violent boyfriend. I have seldom seen a face so badly smashed up. Her little boy was three years old, but in his life he had known nothing but drugs and violence. When he was a baby he had even been taken to India on a heroin smuggling operation by his mother and a previous boyfriend. This girl had been a deb of the year, and her godfather was one of the world's richest men. Her mother was frantic with worry about her little grandson; she knew her daughter to be an alcoholic and incapable of coping with a child. She approached her local Social Services for help, and they promised to go round right away. 'Sophia fooled them,' she told me later on the phone. 'She completely fooled them.' Well, Sophia may well have fooled them, but to her own cost. A few weeks later she was found dead on the floor of her kitchen with the little boy sitting beside her watching television. The verdict was death by misadventure, and her death certificate stated that she had died of a combination of alcohol and drug abuse.

In my work I learned, to my horror, how soon children become physically and emotionally addicted to pain. I think the youngest example of this I found in a baby of three to four months old. His mother, Frieda, was well known to us at the Refuge, and was probably one of the most violent women I have ever known – at least I thought so until I met her mother. We despaired of Frieda's behaviour, but she was such a life-force, and such an intelligent, funny human being, that we all persevered with her. With the help of her social worker, Frieda moved out of the Refuge into a New Town. She was pregnant again at the time, and she visited the Refuge to reassure me that, in spite of all my gloomy predictions, all was well. Of course, everything looked wonderful. Frieda was always a spotlessly clean, wonderful home-maker, and a good cook. Baby Joss was all dressed in white, and looked just like his father. He lay on my lap kicking and cooing, and seemed a very contented baby. There was a sudden moist patch on my knee, where Joss had wet through his nappy. Frieda took him back and undid his terry-towelling nappy. The baby lay contentedly on her lap, looking into her face and smiling.

Frieda then began to pinch his fat little cheeks, and he smiled and gurgled. Then as she pinched she began to twist his flesh. Any other baby would have been screaming with pain, but this baby just gurgled happily. I was horrified and glanced round at Anne Ashby, who was looking aghast. 'Stop it, Frieda,' I said, 'you're hurting him.' 'I'm not,' she protested. 'See, he's laughing.' She was right. But realising our disapproval, she turned her attention to changing his nappy. Within a few minutes she was pricking his bottom with a pin. Again he laughed and gurgled. 'Stop, Frieda,' I said again. 'You're being cruel'. Frieda knew that – but mother and child were sharing a moment which excluded people who used words like love, tenderness, and affection. They were bonded in their addiction to giving and receiving pain. We could only tell her social worker of our anxiety. Several years later I heard that Joss was up for adoption. I felt sorry for the uncomprehending family who would take him in and never understand why this beautiful, healthy baby would probably grow up to be a dangerous violence-prone man. But I know why: I saw it for myself.

The observer in me often watches such interactions with fascination even while my human side is outraged and appalled. I clearly remember sitting with a young couple, both of whom were violent, as we talked about how he could alter his need to inflict pain on Jenny and she could perhaps learn to enjoy making love in preference to having a good fight. Their eighteen-month-old toddler, Anthony, on seeing that we were absorbed and ignoring him, decided to put his head on his father's knee. 'See,' said John, pleased with himself, and looking at me. 'See how much he loves me?' (Actually the child was not his, which served as another source of conflict in the family.) Jenny immediately became defensive. 'He loves me better than you. Come here, Anthony, Come here.' She stretched out her arms to him.

Anthony, who at eighteen months had already survived a series of adult fights, and attacks upon himself which would have killed most babies, looked coolly across at his mother and did not move his head. Jenny became more agitated. 'Come here, you little cunt,' she insisted. The child, gauging the situation decided to go over to his mother.

When he moved over to her and sat in her lap, John felt betrayed, and began to swear at Jenny. She then raised her voice, and the situation escalated. The child sat watching, his eyes shining. he found the scene exciting. Soon he would get punched by one or other parent, then he would join in the drama. Other children watch television for excitement; but he had live drama all day and all night in his family. I intervened and put a stop to the quarrel. Yes, they admitted that was sometimes how the rows developed. Shamefaced, they could see what they were doing to the child. They acknowledged their own violence and brutal backgrounds, and they did sincerely wish to change. The last I heard, Jenny had remarried, but still kept Anthony. I pray she has changed it can happen.

It was not only my own observations that led me to believe that pleasure and pain can be crossed in early childhood, but also observations by the staff. Nicky Hay came to see me one day and described how a three-year-old girl had come into the Refuge with a dreadfully burnt hand, encrusted in a filthy bandage. It was necessary to cut the bandage away from the hand which involved tearing away pieces of burnt skin. Nicky had expected the child to scream and struggle. But no, the child sat impassively and patiently while the doctor cut the bandage off. ‘I couldn’t believe it,’ said Nicky. But I could. I had watched for years our children falling off walls, breaking limbs, walking into the Refuge covered in bruises, with black eyes, split lips. They did not feel pain like ordinary children.

Tony and Billy came into the Refuge with their mother. Marge lashed out at anyone and everything, particularly at her two uncontrollable boys. She had just left an extremely violent man – so extreme that he had been locked up in a hospital for the criminally insane. Although recognised as a troublemaker in his youth, he always got off any charges against him because his adopted mother was a middle class Justice of the Peace. Nobody noticed how seriously disturbed he was until it was too late, and then he was sent to the hospital for the criminally insane.

Tony the elder boy spent his time in the Refuge fighting.

He was only really happy and content when he was punching or being punched, preferably by someone bigger. I was opening my house in Bristol at that time, and I needed to take five families with me to begin a new community. I chose Marge because I needed her administrative abilities, her energy and her humour. She could drive, and also I suspected she was not physically and emotionally addicted to violence. I believed that, given a clean break and an opportunity to achieve something in her own right, she would not go back to a violent relationship.

Tony, however, was a different matter. At five he was a bully and a thug. Living with him was a nightmare, since he smashed everything in sight. Marge, so used to years of dreadful violence from the father and then from the son, would sit at the kitchen table and throw her wooden Dr Scholl sandal at him and it would crack him on the head but he wouldn’t even notice. Then Marge and I would fight about it.

‘You can’t beat children better,’ I’d yell.

‘How else can I stop him?’ she’d yell back.

Finally we instituted a daily pocket-money system. Pocket-money belonged to each child by right, and could only be removed for violent behaviour. It worked. We devised a long-term reward system for the children in the house, and slowly they calmed down.

Then Jimmy came into Marge’s life. She could not believe that such a kind good man would ever want her, after all she had been through. The boys adored him. One day you would catch Tony leaning against Jimmy. Then another day he took his hand. They moved out together and set up home. A baby daughter was born. Marge rang up and asked if they could come to the Bristol house to see me. The boys went out into the garden to play. I was delighted as I sat in our sitting-room admiring the baby, thinking how lucky she was to be born in peace. There was a loud howl from the garden and Tony appeared, clutching his knee. It was grazed. ‘Come here, son said Jimmy. Tony flew into his new father’s arms, and buried his head in his chest. Tony was crying. He could now feel pain. He had grazed his knee and it hurt and he cried I cried, too. Those are the little miracles, the times when you know it is all worthwhile. People can change, but the younger you treat violence the faster you can effect the changing.

Amanda was two when her father Francis died. He was knifed by her mother in a moment of rage that even she could barely understand. One or other of that couple was bound to end up dead in their violent relationship, and it turned out to be Francis. Christine, the mother, was distraught. She sat beside me in the office going over and over the dreadful moment when the knife slid into his throat, when he staggered to the bed, and then fell to the floor. Amanda banged around the office, tore at her mother's skirts, sang, walked round and round in circles. 'Are you sure she didn't see what happened?' I asked. 'No. Amanda was asleep next door.'

Two or three days later, I was sitting with Christine when Amanda came banging into the office. She indicated that she wanted to draw on my large drawing-pad. I spread out my coloured pens as I always do, and she chose the red one and handed it to me. 'Draw Francis,' she said, gazing at me very intensely. I know that when a child has that sense of urgency with you, they are about to let go of something which to them is momentous. As soon as I had drawn a not very good cartoon figure of Francis, she took the pen from my hand and drew lines all round the figure, and then began stabbing the paper, over and over again, meanwhile looking at her mother. As I suspected, having encountered so many, many children who were witnesses to killings, she had been there and seen it.

I know Christine did not deliberately lie to me. She would have had no real memory of actual events in that moment of murder, because violence fuses realities. She and Francis would have been in a world of their own. This fusing of realities affected her recounting of the stabbing to the police. By the time she was talking to them she was no longer in that heightened shared reality, but was suddenly in their world. Our police and our courts should remember that when a person describes a crime he has committed, he is often not lying, but is simply speaking from a reality that is totally different from the one he was in when he committed the crime. Each different reality has its own distinct set of memories.

Christine would just not have noticed Amanda in the room at the time. But it was vital for the child to be able to tell someone what had happened, to share what she had seen, and also to he angry with her mother. When the knife pierced her father's carotid artery, the blood hit the ceiling and sprayed around the walls. The last she would have seen of him was lying in a heap on the floor. It was now important for her to see him at peace. I explained to her that Daddy was asleep and would be going away. She listened intently with her head on one side.

Anne Ashby took Christine and Amanda to the funeral parlour where Francis lay quietly at rest in his coffin. Although Christine was hysterical with grief, Amanda looked at him very quietly. Anne took Polaroid photos of Francis in his coffin, and I was waiting for them both when they got back. After comforting Christine, I looked over at Amanda, who was sitting on the bed in the office. I took the photograph and sat down beside her. 'Did you see your Daddy sleeping, your Daddy dead?' I asked her. She slowly nodded her head. She put two fingers into the comfort of her mouth, and two huge tears rolled down her cheeks. She knew. She understood.

It took a year for the mother to come to trial. Christine lived at my Bristol house while she slowly came to terms with the dreadful reality of what had happened. She stayed with us in London during the trial. After three days the jury unanimously declared her not guilty. The relief was enormous, but she will still have to face the day when the children, having repressed their memories, will ask how their father died, and they will know that it was their own mother who killed him. Christine knows that when that day comes, wherever we are, we will have that knowledge of their history, and we will help her.

We will always keep in touch with Christine, and hopefully she will have learned enough about herself to he able to help Amanda come to terms with her father's killing. As she grows up, Amanda will need to work through again and again, with us and with child guidance, her memories of Francis's death. If the memories are not dealt with, they will sink into her unconscious. In later life, picking up a knife could then become a reflex action if she is fighting with a man. We hope that we have caught her young enough and can work with her thoroughly enough, so that she may recognise and understand the murder, and then use that understanding to break the pattern of violence in her own life.

The Richards family arrived at the Refuge in the middle of the night. They had travelled overnight from Yorkshire. Jody, their mother, was distraught. It took some considerable time to sort out the details of what had happened. Steve and Brian took the children off to playschool to let them talk out and draw their grief and confusion. I sat down with Jody. Jody had been living with the father of her youngest child Michael, who was seven months old. There were three other children: Julia who was two, Tyrone who was four, and Peter, aged five.

Jody had adored her own father, who seemed to have been a kind gentleman, but her mother was a monster. She hated Jody, who had been a very pretty, lively and intelligent child. Unfortunately, her father, her only protector, died when she was quite young, so she was left to the mercy of her violent bully of a mother. Jody soon decided that she would only survive if she fought back. Soon she was not only in trouble at home but also at school. The school showed little under-standing, and continually punished the already abused little girl. Slowly she was transformed into a furious, intractable adolescent. Everything she did was in reaction to her mother. She deliberately dated West Indian boys, knowing how racially prejudiced her mother was. She took drugs, she drank herself silly, and soon became pregnant. Her mother fought back. All her life her mother had devoted herself to fooling the neighbours. The image of the little God-fearing woman who went out to work and scrubbed her house clean was a camouflage for an embittered, violent woman. She was one of the few human beings I found it difficult to like.

Jody was always with a new man, continually going back to her mother to scream and yell and demand attention. The first two children were born and she moved into a council flat supplied by the borough. But she could not cope with the two small children, so they were taken into care, and then returned to her, and then received back into care when she broke down again. Her restlessness made it impossible for her to stay indoors at night. She needed to be out and roaming the estate. Sometimes she would come back with men, for money and for company. Sometimes she would come back with a bottle, to drink herself into oblivion. The flat was sparse and the children had very little to wear. It was impossible for her to cope with all her own chaos.

Peter the eldest boy did his best to look after Tyrone and Julia. He learned very early to expect nothing from life and he got on with the business of seeing that they had enough to eat. He would nag and shout at his mother by the time he was three. He was used to being hit so he felt no pain.

Then Jody met Ralph. He was a giant of a man and very kind to Jody and her children. He was already living with another woman with three children, but he spent more and more time at Jody's flat. She became pregnant, and Michael arrived, but she could not bear the nights on her own when Ralph was with the 'other woman. Soon she became obsessed with the images of Ralph somewhere else without her. She would beg and plead for him to stay. Ralph was rarely violent, but if pushed too far, he was known for his ability to explode into violent rage.

No one will ever know what it was that took him over to the other woman's house that night, and caused him to mutilate and then stab the woman to death. According to Jody, he came back to her flat covered with blood. He complained of dreadful stomach pains and told the children to wait for dinner, while he had a bath. He went into the bathroom and locked the door. Jody waited, then, hearing no sounds from the bathroom, and getting no answer to her knocks at the door, she broke it open. Ralph was lying dead in the bath. The children crowded into the room to look at him. Jody called the police, and Ralph's body was taken away. Jody was by now in an incredible state of fear. The neighbours, many of whom were Jamaican, were openly hostile to her. She picked up her children and ran to us. Now it was up to us to make sense of what happened both for her sake and for the children's.

This drawing is by Peter; he was explaining to my colleague Steve the complexity of the family relationships, as it involved four different fathers. He also showed in his drawings how he saw Ralph dead in the bathroom. He was also clearly aware of the other woman's death, but he agreed with Tyrone that they were not there when she died. Peter was a very intense, moody child given to sudden outbursts of rage. Like most small children who have been robbed of the innocence of their childhood, Peter was frighteningly precocious.

Tyrone, however, was a professional charmer. He quietly got what he wanted from life by a mixture of friendly manipulation and cunning. He also was able to describe the sight of Ralph's nose under water, and he remarked on the bottles on the floor. Where as Peter showed grief and sorrow, Tyrone seemed quite cheerful, but he was the one who let me know he had a secret.

At playschool Julia spent hours stabbing at the walls and her drawing paper with a brush dipped in red paint. The play staff were all fairly new and had not worked before with any children who had witnessed murders. They were amazed at the ferocity and intensity of her attacks on the walls. Although Jody insisted that the children had not seen Ralph stabbing the other woman, Julia's behaviour was an accurate acting out of a violent event. When she raised her little hand in a stabbing motion I warned the staff, if she were left untreated, this event would go deep into her subconscious, only to reappear in a moment of crisis when she herself felt attacked. Then there was a very real possibility that she would stab someone.

It was several years before Tyrone was able to tell me that they had all watched the stabbing, as I suspected.

My immediate concern, however, was the baby, Michael. He seemed to be sleeping his little life away. At seven months he had the typical look of a neglected child. As he was unable to sit up or turn himself oyer, he constantly moved his head from side to side, and the friction from the sheets had made him bald. I noticed that his only form of play was to clutch his bottle with his feet which he used as hands for lack of ever being taken out of his cot. If I held him up, his little legs would dangle helplessly. I thought that if we kept him in the main sitting-room, where there were plenty of people to pick him up and cuddle him, he might be stimulated enough to come to life. It was soon apparent, however, that he did not want to join the human race. Life for him was all too painful, so he was sleeping his life away.

I talked it all over with my daughter Cleo, who was at home with a baby of the same age. I then talked to Jody who agreed that something must be done for Michael. Of course, we were in touch with the Social Services in her area, but they had nothing to offer Jody which was realistic in terms of support, so were unable to suggest any solution except to let us cope the best we could. In spite of all her problems, Jody was a woman with many excellent qualities. Because her relationship with her mother was so intense, there was really no room for anyone else. She had never trusted anyone before. Her life had been a kaleidoscope of agency workers who, one by one, gave up on her.

Her mother came by at this point, full of Hail Marys and poison. I listened to a catalogue of Jody's sins, and when the mother sat back, her eyes sparkling with malevolence, I took the wind out of her sails by completely agreeing with her. 'But,' I pointed out, 'here she is much loved. We might not like what she does, but we love her.' The old lady did not feel much like conversation after that. Swearing loudly on the heads of her babies and the graves of various departed relatives, she left the room. I then asked Jody if I could take Michael home each night and bring him back to her during the day. Not only would I have concentrated time to give to him this way, but it would also mean that Jody could have an uninterrupted night's sleep. She agreed and I took him home.

Feeding him in the peace of my own house, I noticed how fierce he was when he was sucking his bottle. I held him close to my breast with my face close to his so that he could hear me talking to him. He would suck furiously at the nipple of the bottle, and stretching out his hands he would pinch and scratch my face. I had noticed at the Refuge that he had a large area round his navel that was constantly sore and covered in half-healed scabs. Our wonderful health visitor Cilia had given us a special cream for it, but now I saw why it would not heal. As he drank from his bottle, he would tear at his skin until it bled. His pain and pleasure were already confused. I took him to the bathroom and gently lowered him into the bath, as I have with hundreds of babies before him. It was sad to watch his face completely dissolve into a pained grimace as the warm water immersed him. It was not fear; he was not afraid. He could not bear the pleasure – it hurt him. Cleo remembers from feeding and changing Michael, that he was incapable of holding food in his system. As soon as food went in one end, it came out the other. His digestive tract was as immature as a new-born child's. Michael had given up on life, so his body refused to develop and take nourishment.

Now the real work began. Cleo and the rest of the community at my house pitched in. We realised that it would take time, but in fact I always forget how wonderfully resilient children are. Given the right climate, like a drooping plant, children revive at a startling rate. My grandson at seven months was sitting up, pulling himself to his feet, and shouting garbled commands at everyone in sight. Every evening Keita and Michael would lie on the carpet together.

Keita was thrilled with him and gave him all the benefit of his advice. Michael suddenly began to smile his funny, painful, crooked smile. I still had to let him pinch and scratch me when he sucked. I did not pull his hands away; I just rocked him on my rocking chair, and sang to him, and stroked his rigid little body.

Gradually he began to pinch less and less, and within a few weeks the change was dramatic. Michael decided that the world was not too bad a place at all. He became a friendly, outgoing baby. He put on weight and smiled at everyone. The day of the inquest arrived, and Anne Ashby took Jody along. It was a long, protracted affair because no one could make sense of what had happened. The coroner gave an open verdict, because they could not decide how anyone with as much alcohol in their system as Ralph could have died without vomiting.

The next hurdle was the funeral. We were very anxious about the event because there were many of Ralph's relatives who felt Jody should not attend. But Jody was determined to go. I felt that it was vital for the children to see both the coffin and the grave. I have treated so many cases of adults who were denied access to their parent's graveside by well-intentioned relatives, and these people grow up to feel forever that the parent has abandoned and betrayed them. I always advise excellent and dedicated people working for the mothers and children. If I asked them to risk themselves, they did. This occasion was no exception. However, the funeral turned out to be fairly uneventful in terms of aggression towards Jody, and it gave us a chance to talk to the children and to explain exactly what was happening to Ralph. Tyrone, in his in-credibly practical way, was fascinated by detail. Peter dealt with it all by changing moods, from racketing around noisily to withdrawing suddenly. Julia was fairly impassive, but the two moments that united the family were when Ralph's coffin was brought in and they all knew that he was in that box; and when the coffin went down out of sight into the grave, and they realised Ralph was truly gone. He had not 'gone shopping,' or run away from the children. He was dead.

Unfortunately, now that the drama was over, the Housing Department began to harass Jody about returning to her flat. Some of her social workers insisted she should return to 'normal' life, but if you are emotionally disabled, you are far too insecure to face such people who argue that you must return to what they regard as real life, and say 'No. I need support. I need a community,' because saying this would be tantamount to recognising and admitting that you are disabled. We had not yet got that far with Jody, to a point where she could feel comfortable and accept herself as a good, warm, loving woman. She still slipped back into her lifetime pattern of feeling bad about herself. So it was in one of those dark moods that she returned to her flat. We heard from her from time to time, and then we learned that all the children had been taken into care.

Jody came in to see me, and explained that she had not been able to cope on her own. I pointed out that very few women could cope on welfare with four children under six. I said that I, for one, would take to the bottle immediately. That made her laugh. I was glad that the children were at least safe for a while, because she needed time and space to herself. It was sad that her borough saw the care that we offered as such a threat to themselves that they preferred to put Jody in a position where she was forced to fail. Their solution was to put her very small children into care in Yorkshire. It must have cost the tax-payers at least four hundred pounds a week to maintain her kids in care. It would have cost only Jody's social security contribution for the whole family to stay with us.

When I went over with Jody, to see the children, it was the usual bleak children's home. The children, mostly black or half-caste, were looked after by sympathetic young girls, but the mountains of rules and standards of hygiene required left the girls little time to play with the children. I asked to see the matron, and discovered that she had been told nothing at all about Jody's children's history. She did not know anything about their traumatic experiences, or about the deaths they had witnessed. Various members of our staff subsequently visited the children, until we got a letter from the matron asking us not to come again, as we were 'disturbing' them. We weren't surprised by this – very few children's homes like or encourage visitors. I did not argue, because I knew that Jody would soon get the children out, and would still need us. So I waited.

The next time she came she had them all with her. They were delighted to be back. Tyrone went straight for Brian and tried to hustle him for money. He got tenpence and a hug, which was what he was really asking for. They had all grown taller, and the only one I was worried about that time was Peter. He still had mood swings, and could rapidly turn from a happy smiling child to a violent and sullen thug.

I was able to spend some time with Tyrone and Peter, and at one point I asked them to draw for me the story of Ralph in the bath. This session took place about eighteen months after the event. Peter, much as I expected, was still confused and angry about the event. Jeff, who was with me at this session, felt as I did: there was great danger for Peter because he could not make coherent sense of his violent past.

Tyrone was quite different. He not only drew his version of what had happened on that night, but he asked for a second piece of paper and drew what happened at the dead woman's place. They had been there and had seen it all; that was the secret he was now willing to share with us. It must have been an awful burden for a little three-year-old to carry. When he had finished drawing the body, he carefully drew Ralph, his mother Jody, Peter and himself. He said that Julia and Michael were left at home. He then drew some bottles rolling on the floor. 'What did your mummy do when Ralph stabbed that lady?' I asked. 'She turned her head away and ran out of the room.' Tyrone had all the events sorted out in his head. There was no confusion and no fantasy. His emotions were appropriate to the event he was remembering. I felt far more concern for Peter, who could well grow up to reach for a knife reflexively in any state of confused rage.

I begged endlessly for these children to receive child guidance. But as it takes much arranging and trudging through red tape, those children who most need child guidance are normally too peripatetic to ever stay in one place long enough to start the process. After this drawing session, Jody took the children home again. After a while they were back in care. She visited me and we talked about her feelings. The good sign was that she was on her own, with no violent men in her life. The last time I saw her, things were looking distinctly hopeful. She came back with another marvellous woman who had been at the Refuge. They brought their children, too, for Jody's kids were now out of care again, and they all looked well. Jody told me that she had met a really nice kind man who loved her and the children. He was a steady worker and she did look relaxed and happy. So far so good. Fortunately I am an optimist.

Drawing with children is an art form in itself. Talking to children is also something that adults have to be re-trained to do. Usually I take the time to get to know children before I ask them to trust me with their secrets, but sometimes I do not have much time.

In Jenny's case, I knew the mother was not going to stay long, so I had to work fast. Jenny was seven, and extremely articulate. The conversation started with me asking her about her father's violence. This is part of the transcript from my taped interview.

ERIN: I've been having a long natter with your Mum about life at home with Dad, and the fact that Dad hits her, doesn't be?'

JENNY: Yes.

ERIN: What do you do?

JENNY: I say 'Stop it'.

ERIN: Does he stop?

JENNY: He still goes on.

ERIN: Why does he hit her?

JENNY: I don't know. Only when he's drunk he hits her.

ERIN: Yes. What starts it?

JENNY: I don't know what starts it.

ERIN: Well, you do, because you're sitting there watching, aren't you?

JENNY: Yes.

ERIN: All right give me an example.

JENNY: He's sitting down on the couch, and my Mum's sitting down, and my Dad comes over and says 'Stand up', and my Mum gets up, and then my Dad gets hold of her arm – and that's what starts it. Because he's drunk.

ERIN: Yes. He's burnt her with a cigarette, hasn't he?

JENNY: Yes.

ERIN: Did you see that happen?

JENNY: I didn't see it happen.

ERIN: How did you know he'd done that? Is it on her hand where you can see it?

JENNY: Yes. It's on my Mum's hand. My Daddy done it.

ERIN: Did you see him do it?

JENNY: Yes.

ERIN: Where were you?

JENNY: I was in Jean's room.

ERIN: Who's Jean?

JENNY: She lives down there (in another room in the house).

ERIN: Oh, wait a minute, yes. You share a room with your Mum and Dad.

JENNY: Yes. And the other lady lives in another room.

ERIN: So you all sleep in the same room. When they start fighting, and you're in bed, what do you do?

JENNY: I just go back to sleep, because I can't hear them sometimes.

ERIN: You do hear them. You're pretending you don't, aren't you?

JENNY: Only sometimes. Sometimes I'm fast asleep, but when he starts shouting I wake up.

ERIN: What does he say when he shouts?

JENNY: He says 'Leave me alone'. My Mum, she knows that he'll do it again (batter her).

ERIN: Are you glad she's left him? Yes? Are you nodding your head or shaking it?

JENNY: Nodding it.

ERIN: You are glad. How do you feel about leaving him?

JENNY: It's all right.

ERIN: Really? Do you miss him at all? No? Because you know your Mum's not been well recently. She's having another baby, isn't she? And she's been in hospital. Now she's been talking to me a lot about your Dad, and she wants to try and sort it out with him – whether they can live together or not. What would you like to happen?

JENNY: I'd like to stay here.

ERIN: And not go back to him? Does he hit you?

JENNY: Sometimes.

ERIN: Hard?

JENNY: Not very hard.

ERIN: What does he hit you for?

JENNY: Once when I was sitting in bed when 'Crossroads' was on, Dad said 'Get into bed.' And I wasn't doing anything, because I was only sitting on the bed with my Mum, and then I got in and my Dad slapped me.

ERIN: On the other hand, he also gives you lots of toys and things, doesn't he? And if your Mum tells you off, he lets you off.

JENNY: Yes. He bought me a monkey, and that went missing.

ERIN: A real monkey?

JENNY: A pretending one. When you squeeze him his arms move.

ERIN: What happened? Why did he go missing?

JENNY: Because we were in this other hostel, where my friend lives, and we stayed there for a day, but then we had to come back to my Dad.

ERIN: Why? Because he found you?

JENNY: No. He never found us. In case something happened to him. And so we went back, and we left our clothes there (at the hostel), but when we came back in the morning there was no monkey, because this boy took it away from me.

ERIN: Do you think your Mum loves your Dad?

JENNY: I don't know.

ERIN: Honest? How many times have you left?

JENNY: Five.

ERIN: How old are you now?

JENNY: Seven. It was my birthday when we got over to Ireland, and then my Dad had to come.

ERIN: So you went to Ireland when it was your birthday? Which birthday was that?

JENNY: That was when we were over in Ireland. But my Mum had no money, so I didn't have my birthday, and I had it in care, because I didn't want to have my birthday, because my Mum didn't have any money.

ERIN: How badly have you seen your Mum hit?

JENNY: Twelve times.

ERIN: What was the worst you've ever seen?

JENNY: When he was punching my Mum.

ERIN: Yes, but where?

JENNY: In the face.

ERIN: Was there blood?

JENNY: No blood.

ERIN: Where did he hit her, then?

JENNY: On the hair.

ERIN: What stopped him?

JENNY: When we was living in this other hostel, my a was fighting my Mum and then I heard them shouting, and then I came up and said ‘Stop it, Daddy’, and he stopped.

ERIN: Your Mum said she fights back, too.

JENNY: Yes, she does fight back, too.

ERIN: What does she do?

JENNY: She tries to calm him down, to stop doing it.

ERIN: She says she throws things.

ERIN: You sound like the grown-up. Do you think sometimes you are more grown-up? I wonder sometimes. I know you’re only seven, but you know alot about it, don’t you?

JENNY: Because I’m always awake. I never go to sleep at all.

ERIN: No? You lie there all night, just pretending, eh?

JENNY: I fall asleep sometimes after the film.

ERIN: What happens when they start fighting?

JENNY: I wake up and get out of bed.

ERIN: And what do you do?

JENNY: I say ‘Stop it, Daddy’, and my Dad stops. But sometimes he doesn’t stop and he says ‘Get out of my way’.

ERIN: Then what do you do?

JENNY: I get out of his way, because he might stop if I get out of his way.

ERIN: Do you ever get frightened he might kill her?

JENNY: Yes.

ERIN: Really? How long have you been frightened he might kiliher?

JENNY: Twelve days.

ERIN: Just recently then? It’s got worse has it?

JENNY: It’s worse.

ERIN: It’s always been bad. So you’ve always been afraid your Mum might die. What do you see happening to you?

JENNY: You mean in my own life?

ERIN: Yes.

JENNY: Nothing.

ERIN: What happens if she dies?

JENNY: My Dad will cry, maybe.

ERIN: What happens to you if she dies?

JENNY: I’ll cry.

ERIN: Where will you go?

JENNY: The two men up in the office, I’ll go and tell them.

ERIN: Yes.

JENNY: Then I'll phone the police.

ERIN: Yes.

JENNY: And then an ambulance will come, because I would have told them that my Mum had died.

ERIN: Yes.

JENNY: And then they'll come up, won't they?

ERIN: What will they do?

JENNY: They'll get her in the ambulance because she

She had another little girl, you know, and she had to give her away.

ERIN: Did she? How old were you when she gave her away?

JENNY: I don't know. She just told me. We have to call her my cousin now because she gave her away. And she's a lot bigger.

After that interview, Jenny produced her drawing of family life. As you can see, it shows two beds and a very wide-awake Jenny. She knew her father had another girlfriend, so I asked a question one does not normally ask a seven-year-old child.

ERIN: How do you feel when they are making love to each other?

JENNY: All right.

ERIN: Don't you feel embarrassed? You're used to it, I suppose.

JENNY: I'm used to it.

To Jenny that is what normal life is about. She has already worked out a contingency plan for her mother's death, as the interview shows. No doubt she will go on to become tomorrow's violence-prone woman unless somewhere, somehow, someone gets her mother in a position where she is able to confront the fact that not only was she herself a battered child, but she was also raped by a bunch of youths when she was fourteen. The baby that came from that crisis in her life, whom Jenny describes as the little girl given away, was passed over to another branch of the family. We couldn't hold Jenny's mother, and she moved back to the husband. However, I know that sometimes all it takes to rescue a child is to give that child a glimpse of a possible alternative. That is why the Women's Aid playgroup staff put so much of themselves into the loving of the children.

This next interview is with five-year-old Curt, talking td me about his mother being beaten by a new boyfriend. We knew for a fact that she encouraged the children to watch her making love.

ERIN: When he hit your mother, what do you do?

CURT: I don't know.

ERIN: Do you cry?

CURT: I was in the bedroom when he done it.

ERIN: How many times does he do it?

CURT: Twelve. (Children often use twelve as the biggest number they can imagine.)

ERIN: What does your mum do? Does she scream?

CURT: No.

ERIN: What does she do?

CURT: She shouts.

ERIN: What does she shout? Go on, what does she shout, Curt?

CURT: What?

ERIN: What does she shout like? Show me.

CURT: A cissy.

ERIN: A cissy?

CURT: Yes.

ERIN: How does a cissy shout? Go on, tell me.

CURT: Like a girl.

ERIN: And what do girls shout?

CURT: Loud.

ERIN: Loud! What words do they say?

CURT: Languages.

ERIN: What languages?

CURT: Don't want to tell you.

ERIN: Oh yes, you do. I've heard your languages before. Go on.

CURT: No.

ERIN: Just once.

CURT: No.

ERIN: You've got your funny secret squirrel face on.

CURT: No, I haven't.

ERIN: Yes you have. I know why you're smiling, too. (meaning his mother and her boyfriend.)

CURT: Why?

ERIN: Why your Daddy and Mummy used to smile at each other – same reason.

CURT: No.

ERIN: Yes.

CURT: No.

ERIN: Do you watch now? (Watch his mother and her boyfriend making love.)

CURT: No.

ERIN: You used to, didn't you?

CURT: No.

ERIN: Oh, oh, oh, that is a lie. Isn't it?

CURT: I do really.

ERIN: You do?

CURT: Yes.

ERIN: You still watch?

CURT: Yes.

ERIN: How do you watch now?

CURT: What?

ERIN: How do you watch now?

CURT: I don't know.

ERIN: Yes you do. Do you creep out of bed and listen? How can you see?

CURT: Because the light's on.

ERIN: Oh, I see. Yes, that's how you see. Well you've worked very hard for today

Curt and his mother were with us for quite a while until, again, the borough saw her problem as a housing problem and gave her a flat. We lost them in spite of endless arguing with the Social Services over the fact that she was not ready to go. It is frightening to see how Curt already reckons it's cissy to cry if you are being battered. The 'secret squirrel' face refers to a certain look on his face which shows a mixture of mirth and sexual perversity. Seeing that expression was like looking at a deviant old man, which is what Curt will probably become.

His four-year-old brother had this to say:

ERIN: Do you want to tell me your secret?

BOBBY: Yes.

ERIN: Why do you watch?

BOBBY: Just feel like it.

ERIN: You just feel like it. How do you feel when you're watching?

BOBBY: It makes me very happy.

Here are two small boys of four and five already taking an active part in violence and sexual abuse. They were violent to each other and to other children, and their perceptions of relationships were totally distorted.

This is Eddie talking to me about his mother. He was wild, and had an obsession with blood. The sight of it excited and stimulated him.

ERIN: What does he hit her with? ('He' here is Eddie's father.)

EDDIE: Er.

ERIN: His fists?

EDDIE: No. Stick.

ERIN: Really?

EDDIE: Mmm.

ERIN: Does she have blood on her face sometimes?

EDDIE: No, she had blood running down her nose.

ERIN: Did she? What did you do?

EDDIE: Nothing.

ERIN: Did you cry?

EDDIE: Yes.

ERIN: How often does that happen?

EDDIE: Er. It kept coming down all the time.

ERIN: What, the blood?

EDDIE: Yes.

ERIN: Do you often see blood?

EDDIE: Yes.

ERIN: Do you like blood?

EDDIE: Yes.

ERIN: Why?

EDDIE: I don't.

ERIN: Eh?

ERIN: I can see you smiling and laughing. Yes?

EDDIE: No. I don't.

ERIN: When you go to playschool you can draw pictures of it.

Even when Eddie decides it is getting unsafe to go on talking about it, he is wriggling on his chair, his face alive with glee. One has to remember that he has just described his mother's face after a beating.

This next little boy, specially asked to talk with me. When he came in he got right down to business.

ERIN: Right. What is it you want to talk about? Why are you here?

FRANK: Because Dad fights.

ERIN: Yes. With who?

FRANK: Mum.

ERIN: Yes.

FRANK: And she bites things. And he won't stop. And Mum wants him to go, and he won't go.

ERIN: Do you love him?

FRANK: Yes.

ERIN: Really?

FRANK: Yes.

ERIN: What's nice about him?

FRANK: Good.

ERIN: He's good to you, is he?

FRANK: Yes.

ERI N: What happened to you? What happened to your eye?

FRANK: Blind.

ERIN: Why?

FRANK: Because Dad picked me up and shook me, and this eye went blind.

ERIN: How do you know that?

FRANK: I'm right.

ERIN: How do you know?

FRANK: Because Dad done it, really.

ERIN: How do you know?

FRANK: I know when

ERIN: Who told you?

FRANK: Dad.

ERIN: Did he?

FRANK: Yes.

ERIN: Why did he tell you?

FRANK: Because I wanted him to.

ERIN: Are you upset?

FRANK: No.

ERIN: Why?

FRANK: Because I'm all right.

ERIN: But don't you mind that he made you blind?

FRANK: Mmm.

ERIN: He didn't mean to do it, did he?

FRANK: No.1 only wanted to be blind.

ERIN: Did you?

FRANK: Yes.

ERIN: Why?

FRANK: Because I like it.

ERIN: What does it feel like?

FRANK: Good. It's lovely.

ERIN: Explain it to me. I'm not blind, so I don't know what it feels like. What does it feel like?

FRANK: It feels like it's nice.

ERIN: What's better about being blind than being not blind?

FRANK: Then you can cry over everything then – when I'm not blind.

ERIN: But you can't when your blind, though. Isn't that true?

FRANK: Mmm.

ERIN: So what's good about being blind?

FRANK: About being blind is that when you can't see – and I can see a little bit.

ERIN: How much can you see? For instance can you see the tape-recorder?

FRANK: Yes. This eye. (Frank had totally lost sight in one eve, and only partial sight remains in the other.)

ERIN: Yes. Perfectly can you?

FRANK: Yes.

ERIN: Not that well. So you can see most things, can't you?

FRANK: Yes. That's with that eye.

ERIN: Yes.

FRAN K: That eye

ERIN: How long are you going to stay here, Frank?

FRANK: About . . Mum said about Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday.

Later on, when the tape-recorder ran out, he suddenly let go of a secret grief. 'I won't be able to drive cars,' he said. He felt so much love for his father, who really did love his son. The blinding was an act the father would regret all his life, so the little boy took it upon himself to remove as much guilt from his father as he could. 'I like it, really.' In the quiet of the office he did not have to pretend. He could allow himself to be a hurt, bewildered, blind child. Fortunately for this boy, he is at a very good special school where people truly care for him. Also, both parents, although they have a destructive addictive need for each other, separately are intelligent, and genuinely do love him. With some pluses in his life, he may just transcend their violence. I hope so.

On the 13 November 1980, I wrote an article for New Society, with Michael Dunne from the Refuge, on the subject of incest. I was amazed by the total silence that greeted it. I have listened over ten years to families in the Refuge pouring out their stories. I have seen the damage done to the children exposed to their parents sexual demands. I have watched adults kissing and caressing their children in a totally sexual manner, and have then realised yet again that the parents' reality shapes the reality of their children. If your father used to kiss you lasciviously on the mouth, then, unless some-where along the line someone points out the inappropriateness of this to you, you will probably do the same to your children. I remember my first moment of shock when I saw one of our mothers lean over her nine-year-old son, who was sprawling on a sofa, and kiss him passionately on his mouth. 'Belinda', I said 'that's your son, not your lover.' She looked at me m surprise and left the room.

Father/daughter incest is a social problem that is now recognised, if not understood. Mother/son incest is still a strictly taboo subject. In fact I continually read books that state quite categorically that mother/son incest is so rare that it is virtually nonexistent. Those of us who see mother-damaged men all round us, and have suffered at their hands, would do well to raise our voices and object. Certainly it is rare for a woman to actually have sexual intercourse with her son. This, I believe, is because women do not want to risk the social stigma of getting caught in what is still a totally unacceptable act. Men seem to have an urgent sexual need to penetrate in order to achieve maximum sexual pleasure. At some point they lose control, and then they may be caught, and the matter is made public. Women get a more diffuse sexual pleasure from just touching and stroking. So many of their incestuous acts with their sons are usually very subtle and very difficult for the son to deal with or describe. A girl can say, 'This is what my father did to me,' and feel outraged at the event. A boy, however) has to say to me, 'This is what I think my mother did to me.'

Furthermore, mothers tend to disguise sexual acts, if they do want to penetrate their children through their role as loving nurses, giving rectal suppositories, rectal thermometers, and enemas.

Naturally, in a healthy family, the parents will kiss, cuddle, touch, and, when necessary, nurse their children. The difference, however, between the normal affection of a healthy family and the unsaid sexual acts of incestuous family is not the outward act itself but the charge behind the act which the parent feels. A kiss may be fine in one family, but in another family, when the parents act with a heavy sexual charge, and the child instinctively picks up on that charge, then the same kiss becomes an incestuous assault. One boy described how his mother had his brothers hold him down when he was as old as twelve, to push an enema tube into his rectum. He was constantly in hospital for constipation. The hospital quite unwittingly encouraged the mother to commit this gross act of indecency upon her child.

The whole subject of incest is so huge that it will be the subject of our next book, but suffice it to say that incest is endemic in our Western society. It has always been said that incest is the last taboo which, once removed, heralds the destruction of a civilisation. The Criminal Law Revision Committee suggested in its October of 1980 Working Paper on Sexual Offences that a father should no longer be prosecuted if he has sexual intercourse with his daughter, provided she is over twenty-one. If society follows this pattern of moral decline, the future for children in this country looks even bleaker than the present.

The major problem is that many of the people who organise this country and make all the major decisions, both morally and financially, do so not out of an altruistic love of mankind, but out of a deep greedy need of self-service. They got where they are by a ruthless driving ambition which is the by-product of a violent personality. Happy, contented human beings seldom seek high office. They prefer the warmth and love of good relationships to long hours spent in meetings or in offices. The people who run our society are the last people to listen to any attempts to organise changes, to improve and to protect the lives of children. Such prospects threaten their lives, their personal power over their own families, and above all, their control over the defenceless and frightened children.

William Evans' rebellion – 1936

Robert St. Estephe · 17 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.
[image]

> "America is suffering now for lack of the red blood of those who rebel": William Evans' Rebellion – 1936

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 3): Stubbornly insisting he never should have been arrested for assertedly stealing his own child, William H. W. Evans, Ojai actor-writer, yesterday completed the twelfth day of a hunger strike launched in the County Jail as a protest against his incarceration.

Evans was arrested Thanksgiving Day on complaint of his divorced wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Evans, who charged him with taking the 6-year-old daughter of the couple, Deirdre, from Mrs. Evans' Brentwood home.

Nothing except water has passed Evan's lips since his arrest.

~ Refuses to eat ~

"I'm not going to eat, either, until they free me," he declared belligerently from his cell in the County Jail. "Mine – is a 'poor man's' stand against the deep corruption that exists in the administration of justice in California.

"I represent the dwindling tribe of rugged American individuals who are willing to fight for their convictions, fight as their forefathers would have done. America is suffering now for lack of the red blood of those who rebel."

While Evans stated emphatically that he will remain adamant in his hunger strike, Chief Jailer Clem Peoples was plotting otherwise yesterday.

~ Feeding threatened ~

"The Sheriff is charged with the keeping of the body of a prisoner," Peoples said. "He is bound by law to keep life in the body of a prisoner and deliver him in a healthy condition for court trial.

"If Evans does not eat soon, we will have to resort to forcible feeding."

Evans already has been in court once, last week when he was held to answer on the child-stealing charges after preliminary hearing before Municipal Judge Chambers.

["Jailed Man in Hunger Strike – Actor-Writer Passes Twelfth Eatless Day in Protest at Arrest," Los Angeles Times (Ca.), Dec. 9, 1936, part I, p. 2; NOTE: The left-hand photo, from this article, was nationally syndicated (AP); Right-hand photo: Oakland Tribune (CA.), Dec. 13, 1936, p. 10-A]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 3): Los Angeles, Dec. 10 – The chief jailer said it might be crackers, but William H. W. Evans, British actor-writer, said it was his "clear conscience" that enabled him to continue his 14-day hunger strike today while looking well fed.

Evans began refusing county jail fare two weeks ago in protest against his arrest on charges of stealing his daughter, Dierdre, 6, from his divorced wife, Elizabeth.

Chief Jailer Clem Peoples said:

“He looks better fed than I do. I wonder if he’s nibbling crackers, or something, at night?”

“I haven’t had anything but water,” replied Evans. “I’m in good physical condition because my conscience is clear.”

[“’No’ to Food – ‘Clear Conscience’ and not Crackers Keeps Him Looking Well Fed,” Syndicated (AP), The Ogden Standard Examiner (Ut.), Dec. 10, 1936, p. 6-A]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 3): Charges of child stealing against William H. W. Evans, 29, British oil salesman [this description of his profession seems to be erroneous], were dismissed yesterday by Superior Judge Valentine when the defendant produced a written agreement between himself and Mrs. Elizabeth Evans, his divorced wife, sharing custody of their 6-year-old daughter Deidre.

~ Represents self ~

Evans, arrested and returned here from Canada after he assertedly took the child last fall, represented himself in the court action.

Judge Valentine gave as his opinion that Superior Judge Heney, who granted the couple a divorce, failed to take the written agreement into account when he gave sole custody of the child to the mother.

~ Terms disclosed ~

Under terms of the agreement Mrs. Evans was to have custody of her daughter for ten months of each year, with Evans caring for the girl the remaining two months.

[“Child Theft Case Dropped – Judge Dismisses Suit When British Oil Man Shows Custody Pact,” Los Angeles Times (L.A.), Feb. 3, 1937, part II, p. 15]

The Voice of Europe: economic freedom

Lucian Vâlsan · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On July 19, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff and whoever shall call in will be talking about the issue of the slow process of stamping out economic freedom in the name of feminism that is taking place right now in the European Union and is bound to affect 28 nations of Europe.

Last show, we covered in the news the "debate" that took place on July 9 in the joint meeting of the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality in the European Parliament. Basically, an overwhelming majority of the Eurocrats agree that by 2017, no private company in the EU should be able to employ whomever it wants, but whomever the EU wants. This Soviet Union-style measure is rooted into a proposal of the European Union.

We'll talk extensively about the proposal and what individual MRAs from Europe could and should start doing in order to stop this madness before it ruins the EU's economy and moves the institutionalized misandry of the EU to a whole new level.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Tell us about the general state of economic freedom in your country that the EU is seeking to stamp out, and, if possible, come with ideas to move things on this issue.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

EU stamps out economic freedom for feminism

Lucian Vâlsan · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On the last edition of The Voice of Europe radio program, we extensively covered the "debate" that took place in the joint meeting of the Committee on Legal Affairs and the Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality in the European Parliament[1].

As one can hear in the news report, or see in the full video of the debate[2], only one individual in the chamber (the only man in there besides the chair) actually said that it is not the job of the politicians to decide who sits or who should sit on a boardroom of a private company. All the others engaged in a pat-each-other on the back competition, which is, in fact, the preferred activity in the EU. It even has a name: "the community method" – in which basically the consensus is forced upon individuals.

The proposal of the European Commission (drafted by our old friend Viviane Reding[3]) basically states that the EU should have the right to sanction private companies if they don't have at least 40% women in their boardrooms. At first, it was only about companies listed in the stock market but, as one can see in the "debate" – it's about literally any company, including Small and Medium Enterprises (SMEs). In other words, if you are a man and have a small company with two other men, you must employ at least one woman and put her in the boardroom, otherwise, the EU may eventually shut you down. That is, of course, provided that the recession generated by the economic prison of the Euro won't shut you down or that she won't file ludicrous sexual harassment charges and make you pay her enough money to lead your small company to bankruptcy.

In Eastern Europe, in late 1940s, the same thing was introduced by the Soviet Union (only it was about "the proletariat" and not women) and soon after the complete nationalization of the economy happened.

Moreover, the initial proposal of the European Commission contained a provision according to which companies that had less than 10% of the underrepresented sex should be exempted from this measure[4], therefore admitting that forcing construction companies to hire more women or nursery homes to hire more men is just not going to work.

However, the aforementioned joint meeting established that this provision should be eliminated through Amendment 8 [5] because heaven forbid someone might be able to avoid being screwed by the Eurocracy. Their justification for this is this:

> Exempting branches just because they are dominated by one gender would consolidate such one-sided gender domination
>
> All companies must comply with the obligation of enhancing gender-balance and therefore, no exemption should be foreseen. Particularly, the Directive offers to all companies flexibility in adopting adequate procedures, fitting the needs of their sector. Finally, non-executive directors usually perform supervisory tasks and give input on general management tasks which are not directly linked to sectoral issues.

See how this goes? Forcing companies to conduct their business according to the feminist principles of equality of outcome is not Soviet-style authoritarianism – but it's "offering flexibility" to the businesses. Up is down. Freedom is slavery. Ignorance is knowledge.

In the documentary Hjernevask (Brainwash), the former Norwegian Commissioner of Equality of Opportunity, Kristin Mile, tasked to try this kind of social engineering in Norway explains clearly that whatever the State tried (including coercion, like the EU wants to try now) only lasted for one or two years, and after that, the businesses either closed down, moved into another country, or just simply started to break the law and allow the natural tendencies of individuals to manifest themselves[6]. The Norwegian "egalitarian" State tried for decades to force more men to enter into nursery and more women to enter into engineering and construction. It didn't work. And it will never work. Men and women are inherently different and will inherently want to work in different fields, regardless of what the gender ideologues or the bureaucrats from Brussels or Oslo believe.

Basically, the final form which will reach to a vote in the European Parliament this fall openly states that women must be preferred over men, even if the objective reality suggests otherwise.

Also, to say that non-executive directors usually perform supervisory tasks and give input on general management tasks which are not directly linked to sectoral issues is simply incorrect. The chief of a construction site, for instance, is a non-executive director. How can someone correctly manage a construction site if that person never actually worked in the field? Well, according to the European Union, it doesn't matter.

The original proposal of the Commission tried to have a little common sense embedded in it, albeit only marginally – but the joint meeting eliminated all that. For instance, the original proposal stated that:

> In order to attain the objective laid down in paragraph 1 [that is to have 40% women on boards – author's note], Member States shall ensure that, in the selection of non-executive directors, priority shall be given to the candidate of the under-represented sex if that candidate is equally qualified as a candidate of the other sex in terms of suitability, competence and professional performance, unless an objective assessment taking account of all criteria specific to the individual candidates tilts the balance in favour of the candidate of the other sex.

However, the part in italic was removed[8] claiming that it's redundant. Well, it might be redundant in the La-La Land in which the MEPs seem to live. But in the real world, if you have to choose between a pregnant woman and a single man, one will choose the latter. And this is for the simple reason that the labor laws in Europe entitle the woman to an up to three years of maternity leave – during which the company must still pay taxes for her, save her job, and the company is also obligated by the law to receive her back after three years, upgrade her salary to the level from that time (but not downgrade it – in case things go wrong during her three year vacation!) and grant her the benefits as if she worked in the past three years (that is paid vacation days) – in other words, another two to three months of vacation paid directly by the company.

For an SME, these kinds of provisions are impossible to meet.

Another provision of the European Commission's proposal, in the Article 4, paragraph 2, states that[9]:

> The number of non-executive director positions necessary to meet the objective laid down in paragraph 1 shall be the number closest to the proportion of 40 per cent, but not exceeding 49 per cent.

By this standard, if the board of an SME has two men and one woman, then the "objective" and the "progress" is attained. However, after this joint meeting, the provision became[10]:

> "The number of non-executive director positions necessary to meet the objective laid down in paragraph 1 shall be at least 40 per cent.

Therefore, by this standard, an SME must fire one of the men and hire a woman otherwise the EU will come and shut the SME down in 2017. Is anyone still in doubt as to whether the EU is up to ruin economies through promoting female superiority?

This measure, if approved by the European Parliament in the next plenary, will hurt the remaining struggling SMEs, take the level of institutionalized misandry to a whole new level and will eventually backfire against competent women as well – for the simple reason that the competence of every single female manager will be put into question when negotiating (both internally and externally), given the likelihood enshrined in the law that they might not have ended up there by virtue of their merit, but by virtue of their sex.

The European Union is already de-industrialized and recession is hitting more and more countries. This measure will just make more companies move their business outside the EU (Ukraine and Serbia are increasingly attractive in this regard) or shut down their operations completely. And, more importantly, the national governments won't be able to do anything to prevent this because if this becomes a directive, the national government is coerced to adopt it in the national law.

This Friday, on the Voice of Europe, we will discuss this measure thoroughly and come up with ideas as to what individual MRAs can do in order to stop this. One might want to check the list of feminist MEPs and prepare to start writing letters.

This is not a joke! The economic freedom of men and women living in the European Union is in serious danger!

[1] http://www.blogtalkradio.com/avoiceformen/2013/07/12/the-voice-of-europe-prostitution – The news report starts from 30:50

[2] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/ep-live/en/committees/video?event=20130709-1115-COMMITTEE-JURI-FEMM – Full video of the joint meeting

[3] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/eus-feminist-crusader-never-stops/

[4] http://eur-lex.europa.eu/LexUriServ/LexUriServ.do?uri=COM:2012:0614:FIN:en:PDF Full text : European Commission's proposal for a Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council on improving the gender balance among non-executive directors of companies listed on stock exchanges and related measures – p. 25, paragraph 6

[5] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/meetdocs/2009_2014/documents/cj02/dt/938/938160/938160en.pdf – Committee on Legal Affairs and the Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality in the European Parliament – Working Document – p. 6

[6] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NiSWqwWbFEg – Hjernevask – Likestillingsparadokset (Brainwash – The Gender Equality Paradox) – Full episode. Kristin Mile's explanations start at 4:20 (in Norwegian)

[7] op. cit. Proposal – p. 24, Article 4, paragraph 3

[8] op. cit. Working Document – p.6, amendment 7

[9] op. cit. Proposal – p. 24, Article 4, paragraph 2

[10] op. cit. Working Document – p.5, amendment 5

Feminists define rape to exclude male victims

Hannah Wallen · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

In 2012, two different communities had similar responses to criminal acts by students in their local schools.

In the first case two intoxicated youths exploited the incapacitated condition of their victim, and they and other students took photos which were shared with still other students following the rape. This crime, and the lack of response to it, were picked up by the internet community and thrust into the international spotlight where both issues received extensive press coverage and were the subjects of extensive public speculation. There was widespread outrage over the crime itself, the students' attitude toward the actions of the perpetrators and toward the victim, and the massive failure by adults in that community, some of whom are now being investigated due to evidence that they assisted in sweeping the crime under the rug. The attention resulted in an investigation into the crime, multiple criminal charges including rape, a trial which also received extensive news coverage, conviction and sentencing of the two youths, and further investigation into the actions of parents and other adult mentors in conjunction with the crime.

In the second case three completely sober youths physically restrained their victim with brute force and duct tape, and committed anal rape using a foreign object. This crime and response was picked up by almost nobody. The earliest story I could find referred to the crime as nothing more than a hazing incident. Later stories didn't do any better until recently, and even those haven't carried the level of outrage seen in reporting on the other case. The community response following the reporting of this crime and the resulting arrests was even more dramatically pro-perpetrator than the other, with students wearing t-shirts with the perpetrators' initials to school, harassing and threatening the victim, and threatening to leave the school if the victim's father wasn't fired from his position there. The difference in legal response is equally and appallingly stark; unlike the main perpetrators in the first case, the perpetrators in this case were allowed to get by with pleading guilty to mere misdemeanor charges.

What difference could there possibly have been between the two cases to cause such a disparity in response to these crimes? Is it less violent, less brutal, less of a violation of one's person to be wrestled into submission, bound, and anally raped than it is to be raped while unconscious?

Of course not.

Is there something terribly unusual about the community where the second case occurred?

Nope – in fact, a recent article about "sodomy hazing" includes the statement that it is surprisingly common, and commonly is not treated with enough seriousness by adult mentors involved with perpetrators and victims.

Is it because the crime isn't being reported?

Nope – that same article also reported that more than 40 similar incidents had been reported in just the last year, and that a 2009 study in the Journal of Youth and Adolescence found significant reporting of similar crimes within the studied demographic.

The gender of that demographic – high school males – seems to be the factor that makes the difference in social and legal response. It's politically incorrect to be seen as not sensitive enough to the experiences of female victims of male rapists. Insensitivity to male rape victims is a social norm.

Much of the response to male victims can be attributed to common misconceptions and myths about them, with consent considered a given, the presumption that when it's not, all he has to do is resist, the treatment of his body's reaction as indicative of his intent, and ignorance of the danger a rapist does or does not present to a male victim.

This contributes to under-reporting by male victims by making it hard for them to think of themselves as victims, much less advocate for themselves, by shaming them into silence, and by shaping the professional response when victims do come forward.

From the Invisible Boy Report, Prepared by: Frederick Mathews, Ph.D., C. Psych

> One problem with trying to understand the true prevalence rate of male victimization is how the present picture has been affected by factors pertaining to professional practice. Here we have to look at the low substantiation rates of all forms of maltreatment, especially in younger children. Substantiation rates are always higher for adolescent populations, typically because teens are easier to interview and are better able to articulate to investigators what happened to them.
>
> This is even more of an issue for male victims. When boys are victimized, they tend to be seen as less in need of care and support (Watkins and Bentovim, 1992). They are also blamed more for their abuse (Burgess, 1985; Broussard and Wagner, 1988; Whatley and Riggio, 1993) and their offenders are held less accountable (Burgess, 1985). In one of the most troubling studies, Pierce and Pierce (1985) found that male victims, despite being subjected to more invasive types of abuse and more types of sexual acts than female victims, were 5 times less likely to be removed from their homes.

Another reason for the double standard male victims face is the expectation of male stoicism; when faced with an adverse condition men are presumed better equipped to withstand adversity than women. From childhood, they're taught that when faced with adversity, in order to be "real men," they should disregard their own suffering and continue offering their contributions to society as if undamaged. This can be seen in everyday attitudes, and as the Invisible Boy Report points out in the section on Media Images of Violence toward Boys and Young men,

> Looking past the more conventional forms of research and other types of information about violence and abuse, it is easy to find media images supporting male victimization. Women have long argued for greater accountability on the part of the media to refrain from using harmful, sexist and objectifying images of females in advertising and entertainment. Males are also now beginning to raise their own concerns. Violence toward males is so normalized in our society that it has become invisible to the average person.

"Tough it out," says society.

"Take it like a man. Shake it off… walk it off… grin and bear it… suck it up and drive on… man up."

Male victims who report sexual assault often face dismissal and ridicule by people who refuse to believe that a man can be overpowered by a woman, who consider admission of having been victimized an unbecoming show of weakness, who question or attack his sexuality in response to his complaint, or who assume that a man's presumed toughness makes the violation he suffered less than a woman would suffer from the same type of attack.

That's the main difference in the wider response to the two incidents described in the beginning of this post.

The first one occurred in 2012 in Steubenville, Ohio. Probably most people reading recognized the story without me naming it, because of the coverage it received and the firestorm it set off.

For everyone who doesn't recognize the second story, it took place in the very small community of Norwood, Colorado, also in 2012, and received only partial coverage by local sources at the time. Notice that the community's response was to defend the perpetrators by citing a perceived tolerance for hazing. The parents weren't angry about the environment to which their children were being subjected. They came forward to argue that being protected from it was a form of special treatment.

The Bloomberg News article which recently revived the story didn't contain the word "rape" in the headline, though it appears several times throughout the article. It seems the media is reluctant to label the specific incident rape, even while acknowledging that's what forced penetration of the anus against the victim's will is.

What was the reaction to any media failure to show sufficient condemnation toward the Steubenville perpetrators?

Feminist websites had a collective ire-gasm, which I've previously contrasted with the response I saw to charges brought against Kaitlyn Hunt for her sexual relationship with a 14 year old… which they would call rape if Kaitlyn were a man. That brings up the next double standard; the response when the perpetrator is female.

In female perpetrator, male victim circumstances, the attitude toward the victim is exacerbated by social attitudes toward the roles of the sexes in the context of a sexual encounter, in which males are presumed interested, and females are presumed reluctant. It's expected that a woman's consent will be sought, while a man's right to consent or deny is ignored. Men are seekers of consent, and women are gatekeepers. The gatekeeper-to-consent concept is so ingrained that it is often not a conscious thought. As a result, the social response to male rape victims is hampered by the idea that it's abnormal for a heterosexual man to not automatically consent to any sexual contact from a woman. While society treats "no" as the default answer for women, until a "yes" is earned and offered, the default answer for men is treated as "yes," leading to a tendency to disbelieve men who report being victimized. This mentality is imposed upon the view of male victims often regardless of their age.

From Female Perpetrators and Male Victims of Sexual Assault: Why They are so Invisible, By Loree Cook-Daniels, > Long before someone becomes an adult protective services worker, law enforcement officer, or judge, he or she has had years of exposure to a whole range of stereotypes about men and women. The stereotypes that even trained abuse professionals bring to their work on sexual assault cases include:

>
> Violence is a male problem.
> Women are only violent in self-defense.
> Men always want sex; they can't be raped.
> Women are hurt more by sexual assault than men are.
>
> The effects of these stereotypes can be seen in a wide variety of statistics and research. First, women are far less likely to be arrested and prosecuted for sexual abuse. "When probable cause exists to charge a juvenile with a sex offense, the offender is 46.5 times more likely to be arrested and charged with a crime if he is male than if she is female," reports Thomas B. James, J.D., in his 2003 book, Domestic Violence: The 12 Things You Aren't Supposed to Know. A 1994 article by Lisa Lipshires, "Female Perpetration of Child Sexual Abuse: An Overview of the Problem," relates many stories of district attorneys and judges dismissing cases against women because "women don't do things like this" or "public sentiment would not allow for such charges to be brought…." Lipshires also reports that a psychologist who trains district attorneys about sexual abuse has found that often, "there will be a female attorney on staff who is trying to prosecute a female perpetrator [of a male victim], and the male attorneys will say, 'Look, we're not going to waste the taxpayers' dollars on this. This is every man's fantasy.'"

Feminist advocates have exploited those social tendencies in order to maintain both their monopoly on perceived victim status, and the illusion that women are less domineering and violent than men. All of feminism's vitriolic condemnation of sex offenders vanishes when the perpetrator is female, to be replaced with arguments they'd call rape apology, victim blaming, marginalizing, minimalizing, and misogyny if they were offered in discussion of male victimization of women. They try to refocus discussion to the "women have it worse" dialogue by downplaying the suffering of male victims in comparison to that of female victims. They deny statistics, falsely claiming that the incidence of female perpetrated rape of male victims is lower than it actually is. Many will go so far as to argue that men can't be raped.

The successful effort by Mary Koss to define male victims of female rapists out of legal existence is a prime example of that argument; in order to forward it, she has to assert that an experience (forced heterosexual sex) which is clearly understood to be rape when a man does it to a woman isn't the same crime when the sexes of the victim and perpetrator are reversed. The Koss effect isn't limited to feminist-led research. The U.S. justice department's updated definition of rape, like the CDC's definition, requires that victim be penetrated, and therefore excludes a sexually intimate attack on a male victim's genitals. This means Justice department statistics on rape will include same sex perpetrators, but not many female rapists of male victims.

A 2008/2009 Bureau of Justice Statistics study on Sexual Victimization in Juvenile Facilities Reported by Youth found that although female staff accounted for a slight minority among adult staffers in the surveyed facilities, 95% of those reporting sexual misconduct by staff said they'd been victimized by female staff. The study also found that males were disproportionately targeted by staff; 10.8% of males were victimized, versus 4.7% of females.

The study and the setting of perpetration don't lend themselves to concrete conclusions about the general population, but they do contradict the belief that perpetration is mostly male, and targets mostly females. In this setting, based on the percentages of the population given by the bureau, despite being in the minority in both staff and inmate populations, females made up approximately 85% of all perpetrators. Males made up approximately 95% of all victims. Given the way feminists argue in favor of creating exclusionary "safe spaces" for women due to stated concerns over male aggression, could it not be reasonably argued that there should be no female staffers permitted in juvenile facilities, in order to reduce sexual victimization of inmates? Yet, were anyone to put forth the idea, is there any doubt that cries of misogyny and discrimination would drown out any discussion on the suggestion?

One stake feminists have in maintaining the male perpetrator/female victim image of rape is that a more balanced and honest view of the crime wouldn't provide them with the same fodder for fundraising efforts. Women as a group are seen as more vulnerable than men. The general public is more sympathetic to women, and perceived threats to women can be more readily exploited as a tool of manipulation. Feminists need to maintain the public perception that women are innocent victims and men are violent and domineering in order to maximize the marketability of protecting women from men, or they risk losing their government, corporate, and public funding meal ticket.

Another stake is that such a view would knock down the vulnerable woman/dangerous man concept upon which feminist advocacy on intimate partner and sexual violence is based. Feminist advocates exploit that concept as much for political power as for money, and they don't want the laws and policies they've used it to advocate for turned around and applied to female perpetrators.

Outside the U.S., feminist advocates have fought to keep some nations' governments from recognizing the crime of rape when perpetrated against men by women. This effort has been successful in India. In the U.K., female perpetration of genital on genital rape against a man would not be called rape, but "sexual assault," for which the sentence span is shorter.

Inside the U.S., advocacy groups and government authorities have denied male victims equal treatment.

Male victims of rape can even be forced to pay child support to their rapists, even when the victim is underage and the perpetrator is not. (ageofconsent.com)

Laws governing authority response to rape allegations compromise the due process rights of the accused. (Stop Abusive and Violent Environments)

> Over the last 40 years, rape laws have undergone a fundamental transformation. In some ways, these changes have removed barriers to rape victims receiving a fair trial and have helped bring many rapists to justice. But in other ways the reforms have gone too far, upending traditional tenets of criminal procedure and removing due process protections for the accused.
>
> The overall effect has been to shift the burden of proof to the defendant, likely resulting in more wrongful convictions. In Washington state, for example, juries receive the following instruction: "The burden is on the defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the sexual intercourse was consensual."
>
> As a result, false allegations have increased, thus diluting the availability of services and protections for > victims, and diminishing the credibility of future victims' claims.

Government policy forced upon post-secondary learning institutions receiving federal funding have trampled due process beyond recognition. (WND Education)

It's no wonder feminists have fought so hard to keep rape laws and sexual misconduct policy from treating male and female perpetration equally. These laws and policies have created an environment wherein women can and do abuse the power of the vulnerable woman/dangerous man concept by using false accusations as weapons in minor disputes and in custody battles, tools of revenge, or an alibi for cheating, or even just for attention. Equal treatment would subject women to the same legal environment now faced by men.

That admission, repeatedly articulated in more politically correct terms by feminists fighting to prevent recognition of male victims of female perpetrators, amounts to an admission of awareness.

Feminists call it rape apology when it's directed at female victims of male perpetrators, whether it's denial that the victim was violated, or denial that the perpetrator did anything wrong, yet when the victim is male, and especially when the perpetrator is female, it's feminists who take the lead in that denial.

Feminists call a community-wide attitude of rape apology "rape culture" when the victim is female, yet by their own definition, they're most guilty of promoting a rape culture that tolerates victimization of boys and men, especially when the perpetrator is female.

After decades of research and theory building, feminist rape apologists know full well the damage they are doing to boys and men. They're aware that their denial is preventing male victims from seeing the same progress in legal response and victim's assistance that has been won for women. They know they are promoting lenience for female rapists.

Feminists came out of every nook and cranny of the world wide web to support – even celebrate as a martyr – Steubenville's female victim. They've deliberately thrown men and boys like the Norwood rape victim under the bus, and it's obvious they intend to continue to do so.

If male victims of sexual violence are ever going to see justice and recovery, it's going to have to come from a better group of advocates.

Zimmerman case: Don't be that bigot

August Løvenskiolds · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Things have been hopping around AVfM, with both Postergate and Kellettgate hitting hotter and heavier than a gold-digger on a rich guy, so we've neglected to comment on the other big news of the month, the acquittal of George Zimmerman in his trial over the death of Trayvon Martin.

Although there are racial dimensions to men's human rights issues – all races of men suffer from injustices generated by our gynocentric culture – the racial issues of the Zimmerman trial were muddled by the truth that Zimmerman identified as Hispanic, so the dialogue of "white-on-black" crime rang a bit off for me. Other sites in the man-o-sphere (most notably, GLPiggy.net) covered the Zimmerman case almost obsessively, but I'd like to add a few points to the discussion as well.

I've been stalked before (in my case, by an ex-girlfriend) so I understand how upsetting that can be. I've also had to defend myself from physical assault, and although my attacker survived, I also understand the impulse to use deadly force to defend oneself.

But setting aside those concerns (which have been covered ad nauseam elsewhere), there are gender-based issues in the Zimmerman case that deserve airing at AVfM. I'll cover 5 of them here:

The 911 White Knight call

Let's review the transcript of part of the 911 call:

Dispatcher: Are you following him?
Zimmerman: Yeah.
Dispatcher: Okay, we don't need you to do that. [Emphasis added]
Zimmerman: Okay.
[…]
Dispatcher: All right, George. We do have them on the way. Do you want to meet with the officer when they get out there?
Zimmerman: Yeah.

During the commentary surrounding the trial, it was alleged that the police had told Zimmerman not to follow Martin. But they didn't say, "STOP – do not follow him" or even "Don't be that guy". What they DID say was the passive-aggressive, responsibility-denying "we don't need you to do that."

Men and women react differently when they hear phrases like that – a woman would usually take it as permission to desist, but a man in a "white knight" state of vigilance would take it as permission to persist, and thereby, distinguish himself as a hero among men.

Such negative suggestions are as clear to savvy men as this: "Honey, you don't need to buy me roses for Valentine's Day" – meaning, of course, "if you know what is good for you, I'd better get flowers AND chocolate AND jewelry AND a nice dinner AND…"

The fact that the dispatcher further expected Zimmerman to meet with officers – drafting Zimmerman into the militia, as it were – made it clear to Zimmerman that his continued pursuit of Martin was expected by the police as well.

The societal expectation of militia service by all able-bodied adult males is certainly a men's human rights issue and an indication of inequality between the genders that needs to be redressed.

The sexual abuse barnacles

About a year ago, feminists like Amanda Marcotte were trying to barnacle charges of rape-y stuff onto the trial to serve their meme of demonizing men by alleging that Zimmerman committed a sex crime – starting when he was 8 years old. Marcotte cackled that Sexual abuse is a form of bullying, a violent crime whose pleasure for the attacker is far more about enjoying their power and dominance over the victim than it is about sexual urges. Subsequently, sexually violent men tend to be more violent generally, particularly against people they believe are lesser or weaker. If you're trying to establish that Zimmerman had it in him to hunt down and murder a teenager who is much smaller than himself, then a history of sexual assault does help demonstrate this.

Of course, Amanda – sexually curious 8-year-old boys are the shock troops critical to the patriarchy. Are those pearls you're clutching new?

Fortunately for Zimmerman, cooler heads prevailed, and the judge (a woman) declined to let this irrelevant and unproven bit of bullshit poison the trial. In the awake of the growing anger over Zimmerman's complete and total acquittal by an all-woman jury, some of the more desperate voices are hoping that the long lost sex abuse allegations (which supposedly ceased a decade ago) can be resurrected as a sort of proxy retaliation against Zimmerman.

Obviously, they won't bring any racial justice, but they would allow feminists to steal the justice narrative to slop their own endlessly needy, victim-mongering wallow.

The gay-bashing rapist revelation

During a post-trial interview with Piers Morgan on CNN, Rachel Jeantel, the reluctant phone witness who was talking to Martin just before Martin assaulted Zimmerman, finally revealed that she had warned Martin that Zimmerman might be gay, or even, a gay rapist preparing to approach Martin. Martin freaked out over the idea that Zimmerman might have sexual designs on him or his family, and this seems to have precipitated the attack on Zimmerman – which, of course, would make the attack a violation of Zimmerman's human rights as a (purportedly) gay man, and make Jeantel the proxy instigator of the attack.

So, Trayvon Martin was killed in the act of gay-bashing (in Jeantel's and his own minds, anyway). The fury of Martin's sudden turnabout attack is now explicable (he had been avoiding being followed up to the point of the introduction of the gay rapist idea) and it indicates the degree of Martin's revulsion that he went from flight to fight mode in so short a time.

The men's human rights issues related to a woman (Jeantel) being held blameless for using gay/rape threats to precipitate man-on-man violence ought to be obvious.

That fabulous all-female jury

In a simpering piece written for CNN weeks before the verdict, What Zimmerman's all-female jury says, Holly McCammon recounted the history of female jury duty and purred that The gender makeup of the jury is not likely to be pivotal in determining the verdict in the Zimmerman trial. The evidence is what matters in the outcome.

Oops – in the wake of the trial's vindication of the heroic white knight (conquistador?) the opinions about the all-chick jury changed radically.

An all-woman jury, steeped in feminist stereotypes about the constant fears and oppression of women, seems like it would be naturally inclined to buy a self-defense claim, even if it were to come from a man. Zimmerman's almost complete passivity during the trial seemed designed to feminize him as the hapless victim of Martin's assault, while at the same time the prosecution's case attempted to paint him as a reckless vigilante. Is it in the nature of women to overcome their fears and repudiate a protective male figure?

The actual decision to seat an all-female jury was likely an accident-by-default – lawyers don't pick juries directly, but rather, they pick the people to strike from the jury. A gun-owning, perhaps conservative man who believes in self-defense would've been struck by the prosecution; a gun-eschewing, liberal-leaning social justice warrior would have been struck by the defense.

None of the jurors are talking yet*, but one of the women, identified only as "B-37", is planning to write a book on the trial. Until that book comes out, we can only speculate as to the nature of their deliberations, as well as the extent of their shoe collections.

Woman of the year, Rachel Jeantel

Witness Rachel Jeantel continues her testimony during George Zimmerman's trial in Seminole circuit court in Sanford, Fla. Thursday, June 27, 2013. (AP Photo / Orlando Sentinel, Jacob Langston, Pool)

The controversy over the disastrous performance of Rachel Jeantel on the stand continues to rock the media. Time Magazine and others bent over backwards to come to the damsel's linguistic rescue.

But what failed worse than Jeantel were the accounts trying to defend Jeantel. These accounts vary in their tactics but are universal in their attempts to deflect from Jeantel any real human responsibility for her shoddy performance.

The Christian Science Monitor juxtaposed the following three quotes about Jeantel: first, "What so much of this really revealed was the gulf between middle-age, middle-class, mainstream codes of behavior and life among youth from poorer, nonwhite neighborhoods … they couldn't have been further apart if Jeantel were born on the moon," writes Eric Deggans in the Tampa Bay Times.

And then, second – "Christina Coleman summarizes in a Global Grind article called Why Black People Understand Rachel Jeantel: 'I … understand why white people wouldn't like Rachel.… But maybe the reason white people don't understand Rachel Jeantel has something more to do with white privilege than what they could call Jeantel's capricious nature,' she wrote.

And finally, J. Christian Adams on the Pajamas Media website: "Coleman sounds like John C. Calhoun, the South's leading defender of slavery and segregation…Calhoun believed that blacks and whites could never live together, and that after any emancipation they'd forever be 'worlds apart.'"

So, in the space of one article, Jeantel's defenders went from lunar-born to underprivileged to interstellar travelers.

But no one seems willing to talk about Jeantel as if she were a responsible adult – her evasions, lies, distortions, dissembling, disinterest in co-operating, or self-absorption were emblematic of her perspective as a childish brat rather than worthy adult woman.

But at least one commenter did sympathize with Jeantel's suffering – not Martin's death, not Zimmerman's continuing persecution, but rather, Jeantel's pain – pain that will explode into fullness when it finally dawns on Jeantel that it was her gay-baiting that led to Martin's death.

You know, because sometimes gay men, and straight man, suffer, too.

===

* Since the drafting of this article, at least one juror (B-37) is now speaking out, and she has canceled plans to write a book.

[Conjecture regarding Trayvon Martin's sexuality has been removed after criticism in the comments. The speculation on Martin's sexuality was to offer a possible explanation for his sudden violence and was not intended to reflect on the sexuality of all black men.–ED]

Queen for a day

Jim Doyle · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I was a little kid there was a show on daytime television called Queen For a Day. The premise was that several contestants, housewives and mothers, would compete for sympathy by telling their tales of woe to the audience – crippled or sick children, disabled husbands, whatever else they could garnish it with – and then after they had all finished their pitches, the audience would applaud each one and an applause meter would register which one had gotten the most sympathy, and could carry off the washing machine and new car and all the other goodies that had been droolingly detailed at the beginning of the show.

It was the Miss America pageant of victimhood.

Our culture, and not just ours, fetishizes victimhood. Victimhood is the ultimate moral weapon, and weaponized victimhood has been the weapon of choice in a lot of really necessary and good social reform movements. But like nukes, it should not fall into the wrong hands. The whole of modern feminism has for the past 20 years at least been predicated on a framework of victimology and all its tropes – patriarchy theory, rape culture, gendered pay gap, the war on women, the form rhetoric around women's reproductive rights takes – all rest on victimology rather than a simple insistence on equal rights and empowerment. It is a very sad, very retrograde development, because it is nothing but a reversion to traditionalist gender assumptions.

An Amazon of ink has been lavished on victimhood in feminism, and then on feminism's addiction to victimhood even in defiance of solid fact. Now Icyx on the MensRights subreddit has contributed this bit to the conversation, quotations for Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick detailing feminism's embrace of and dependence on victimhood as its identity:

> "At least for relatively privileged feminists of my generation, it has been an article of faith, and a deeply educative one, that to conceive of oneself as a woman at all must mean trying to conceive oneself, over and over, as if incarnated in ever more palpably vulnerable situations and embodiments."

She continues with an acknowledgement of the risks of this approach:

> "The costs of this pressure toward mystification — the constant reconflation, as one monolithic act, of identification with/as — are, I believe, high for feminism, though it's rewards have also been considerable.
>
> (Its political efficacy in actually broadening the bases of feminism is still, it seems to me, very much a matter of debate.) Identification with/as has a distinctive resonance for women in the oppressively tidy dovetailing between old ideologies of women's traditional 'selflessness' and a new one of feminist commitment that seems to begin with a self but is legitimated only by willfully obscuring most of its boundaries."

The misogyny inherent as casting women as eternal victims might impose a cost, take a toll? Whoever would have guessed that something so diminishing and derogatory and insulting would come at a cost?

Here's a cost I bet she didn't anticipate – the backlash from black women tired of having their oppression hijacked for white feminists's rhetorical purposes. Starting with their self-serving insistence that misogyny was the ogre of oppression and that racial oppression is subordinate to that(ever noticed how the "wage gap" inevitably refers to the gap in wages between men and women not between black people and white?) And now there's a gathering backlash of gay men finally seeing through all the claims of solidarity in opposition to oppression blah, blah, blah to the rotten core of man-hatred at the core of this ideology.

The bills are coming due and not a decade too soon.

So are there signs of maturation in the culture, hope for the future, some end to this childish, spoiled, pampered, special pleading tide of bullshit that saturates the gender discussion from the feminist side?

> “The format is currently owned by television executive Michael Worstman, who shopped the format around for a revival in 2011, but without success.[8]”

We live in hope. Apparently women out in society are getting tired of it.

Angela Corey: yet another unchecked, corrupt prosecutor

VFM News and Commentary · 18 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Exclusive: Fired employee to file lawsuit against Zimmerman prosecutors

With the ink still drying Mary Kellett's prosecutor pass, another story of the same type of misconduct has come to light, this time from high-profile case.

According to Ben Kruidbos, former director of information technology for state attorney Angela Corey, prosecutors in the George Zimmerman/Trayvon Martin case concealed exculpatory evidence.

Kruidbos testified at a pre-trial hearing on June 6 that prosecutors violated the Brady rule by withholding embarrassing texts from Martin's cell phone from Zimmerman's defense, which requires prosecutors to disclose materially exculpatory evidence in the government's possession to the defense. Zimmerman's defense team has called for sanctions against Corey and her prosecution team based that violation.

After his testimony revealed the prosecution's misconduct, Kruidbos was fired.

Kruidbos has filed a whistleblower action in Florida's Fourth Judicial District Circuit Court. He is currently represented by attorney Wesley White, also formerly in Corey's employ. White is quoted as saying the suit will be filed within the next 30 days.

Ian Tuttle of the National Review writes that Angela Corey has a reputation among her peers for retaliation and overcharging.

Corey's actions involve the the same type of misconduct that led to Mary Kellett's disciplinary hearing before Supreme Court Justice Ellen Gorman after the state's Bar found her guilty of 9 counts of prosecutorial misconduct and conduct unbecoming an attorney. As with Kellett, it appears that this isn't an isolated incident, but is instead representative of her usual methods.

Overcharging, suppressing evidence, retaliation against whistleblowers and critics… is this the new "due process" in America, or is it just the method used by prosecutors against targeted men?

[/box]

Revelations with Erin Pizzey: Glen Poole & Neil Lyndon!

Dean Esmay · 19 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

TODAY on Revelations with Erin Pizzey:

We have shortened the name of "Domestic Violence Revelations with Erin Pizzey" to simply "Revelations with Erin Pizzey," both to make it easier to remember and to broaden the scope of the show's topic.

A special note: We would like to dedicate this episode to our friend Andy Thomas of AVfM-UK, whose father Ray passed away suddenly this week. He had a son to be proud of, and our thoughts and condolences are with you, Andy.

This week we have a very exciting episode of Revelations with Erin Pizzey: a panel discussion on feminism featuring Neil Lyndon, author of "No More Sex War"–and who also once wrote a scathing review of Erin Pizzey's work!–and Glen Poole, formerly of Fathers for Justice and now heading up the 3rd National Conference for Men and Boys in the UK.

The topics we will consider:

- Is feminism a modern-day religion whose dogmas cannot be questioned?
- Is there anything good in modern feminism?
- What are the issues facing men and boys today, and is anything or anyone actually making a positive and measurable difference?

Neil Lyndon's a skeptic; Glen Poole is an optimist; what do Erin and Dean think? You'll have to tune in to find out, and call in to give us your own opinion while you're at it!

Show opening and closing music by Kevin McLeod.

Show starts today at 4:00pm London time, 11:00am Eastern US time. We hope you can join us!

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Cancer, prostates, and heroes

Dan Schneider · 19 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"I woke up this morning and found myself dead."

Just one of the more clever ways I thought to start off this essay about my recent brush with prostate cancer. A close pun to a well known blues and rock song from some decades ago, but, then I thought, no, perhaps go the Woody Allen route:

"A man sticks a finger up your ass and says, 'I feel something.' The temptation is great to respond with the exact same declaration."

This is an allusion to Allen's great 1986 film, Hannah And Her Sisters, wherein Woody's character is a hypochondriac who has possibly been diagnosed with a malignant tumor, and preludes into his typical schtick with an 'Ok, stay calm,' sort of exhortation.

But, the more and longer I thought of writing about prostate cancer, the more it took me away from just that subject matter, and the more things intervened from tangential areas. Three things that struck were 1) the death of Roger Ebert, the popular film critic, from another form of cancer, 2) the decision by actress Angelina Jolie to have a pre-emptive double mastectomy to eliminate breast cancer risk, due to carrying the BRCA-1 gene, and 3) the casual tossing about of the words "hero" and "courage" in the wake of points 1 and 2.

Ok, but, let's go back to the beginning. For females or those in the dark about what a prostate is, here is the Federal government's definition:

The prostate is part of a man's reproductive system. The prostate gland is the size of a walnut. It is found in front of the rectum and just below the bladder, which stores urine. The prostate makes some of the milky fluid (semen) that carries sperm. The prostate wraps around a tube (the urethra) that carries urine from the bladder out through the tip of the penis.

During a man's orgasm (sexual climax), muscles squeeze the prostate's fluid into the urethra. Sperm, which are made in the testicles, also go into the urethra during orgasm. The milky fluid carries the sperm through the penis during orgasm.

Having turned 48 this past February, and having gotten regular annual prostate exams since turning 40 years old, I, later that month, scheduled my annual physical. Fortunately, I have good, solid medical insurance from my employer, which includes totally free annual physicals, which include the usual tests of blood, urine, and what not, along with the annual prostate exam (aka, a "DRE" – digital rectal exam), which includes one's primary physician donning a rubber glove, poking a couple of fingers up one's rectum, and then skooching about for 5-10 seconds, to be followed up, as in years past, with a "feels good" proclamation. Except, this time, there was a slight pause, and my doctor said, "Well….I feel something. It seems like a node. Nothing to panic over, but I recommend a follow up with a urologist." Naturally, one asks if this means cancer has been found, and the physician smiling and stating that, "We don't want to assume things."

Cue the old The Odd Couple classic gag about never wanting to assume something, for "when you ASSUME, you make an ASS of U and ME." But, seriously, my first reaction was indicative of my general demeanor, and that was NOT to panic, but stay calm, get the list of possible urologists to follow up with, make the appointment, then feel the two A's: annoyance, foremost, then anger. Annoyance because, as I told my wife, I have too much to do to die any time soon, and anger over having to even be annoyed. I won't say I felt NO mortal fear, for I did, but that was about 1-2% of my emotional reaction, because, unlike many, I came to grips with my own mortality at the age of 6, when I saw the first of many people murdered. But, my adoptive dad did die of leukemia and chronic lymphatic lymphoma, at the age of 66, and my biological mother died of tongue cancer at the age of 43. Still, having just started a long novel manuscript, a little over a week before, I simply did not have the time to waste in having cancer, getting treatments, or an operation to remove the prostate, etc. Clearly, I would do what I needed, but it was annoying.

After all, a quick online search saw that I did not have any of the ten classic signs of prostate problems associated with cancer:

– frequent urination, especially at night

– difficulty starting or stopping a stream of urine

– weak or interrupted urinary stream

– leaking of urine when laughing or coughing

– pain or burning sensation during urination or ejaculation

– blood in urine

– blood in semen

– swelling in the legs

– discomfort in the pelvic area

– bone pain

So, I went to a urologist, and was quickly disabused of the notion that having none of the above signs was a good sign, as these 'signs' were guidelines from thirty plus years ago, long before 98% of prostate cancers were detected with a DRE or PSA tests. ("PSA" tests are Prostate Specific Antigen tests which screen for a protein made by the prostate.) So, I had a blood test for a PSA screening, as well as another DRE, which confirmed I had a node on my right posterior side of the prostate. The higher the level of PSA in one's blood, the greater the chance of prostate cancer. A rate of 4.0 nanograms of PSA per milliliter (ng/mL) is considered normal. I also had a prostate biopsy scheduled. Now, here comes the fun part, because if you've never had a prostate biopsy, well, you may wanna wince.

So, you strip naked and put on a surgical gown, then the doctor and nurse come in, lay you on your side, and expose your ass. The doctor then puts some K-Y jelly in your rectum to loosen you up. Next, you see a large plastic tube, with a hose attached to some high tech machine that allows the doctor to see inside your rectum, colon, and right to your prostate, which is located on the other side of your colon wall. You ask, 'Is that going up my ass?' and your insight is confirmed. When I say a large plastic tube, I mean it. If you've ever used a vacuum cleaner with a corner extension- that long extension with the tapered end, and about 18 inches long, is about a rough equivalent to this thing.

The doctor asks you to lift one leg up, to grant access to your rectum, and then he shoves the plastic tube up your rectum. It is a jarring experience for any heterosexual male, and while not painful, per say, it is EXTREMELY uncomfortable. The doctor says, "Oh, I guess I should have prepared you more for the entry," and you say, "I think so." But, the party has yet to begin. The doctor, having failed to prepare you for the 18 inch long piece of solid plastic that is sodomizing you, now feels compelled to say what to expect next. He says, "Once we turn the machine on, we will take biopsy samples from 10-12 areas about the prostate, to get a general sense of the prostate health. You may feel a slight scratching or stinging sensation after each sample is taken."

Note – "a slight scratching or stinging sensation." The machine is turned on, and it sounds like a pneumatic compressor. Then you feel and hear a literal BANG!, and you jump on the table. The doctor says, "Oh, I guess I should have prepared you for that, as well." You look at him and say, "Yes, I had no idea that the Battle of Iwo Jima would be replayed in my ass." This World War Two reenactment proceeds in the same manner with each volley until all the requisite areas have yielded samples, and you are allowed to dress, with some trickles of rectal blood staunched by tissues. The doctor says the PSA results will take one to two weeks, and to follow up in that time for the biopsy results.

I drive home, with my wife, feeling fine, until, about a half hour after the biopsy, I start bloating. I feel like a beach ball as I lie on my bed, filled with air not my own, and begin the longest continuous session of farting in my life (which says something, as a heavy milk drinker), most of the gas, though, not being homegrown. Bar none, the plastic tube, Iwo Jima re-enactment, and bloating have, in sum, added up to the most miserable, if not painful, day of my life. Add in the fact that the biopsy can leave blood in your semen and urine for 2-3 months, and it is not a particularly pleasant thing.

Now comes the waiting, which leads me, a walker not talker type, to resolve that my only option, psychologically, is to yank the damn thing if malignant. Wear diapers for a few months, and learn how to re-piss. I'm simply not the type to mess around, have an enemy growing within, or try chemo or radiation therapies. When I war, it's total war. It or me. My wife tells me not to be hasty, but I am a scorpion in this manner. As I wait each night, I just wanna get things going. Fortunately, my health insurance covers prostate removal via the new robotic surgeries, which cost more, long term, but totally remove any chance of a return of the cancer (call this the Jolie option), but significantly shorten physical recovery time, as well as scarring, and the ability to regain urinary bladder control, from 3-4 months down to 4-6 weeks.

A week after the biopsy and blood test, and a week before my follow up, I get a phone call from the doctor's office that my PSA test came back a microscopic 0.42, on a scale where 4.0 is normal, 6.0 to 8.0 is troubling, and over 8.0 highly indicative of prostate cancer. So, this is a very good sign that the node, or tumor, is benign. Of course, there are times when prostate cancer occurs with low PSA scores (about 10-15% of the time) and the urologist also said that the fact he felt the node was 'hard' increased the chances that it was cancer, or, more properly, malignant cancer. This is not a mere semantic difference, but an important point, because almost all bodily growths that are not viral based – like warts, for example – are a form of cancer; it's just the malignant ones that are troublesome, and which are called "cancer," meaning "malignant cancer."

Then, a few days later, and a few days before the follow up, I get a second call – none of the biopsied areas came back as malignant. Whew! But, I still go in for my follow up. Here, the urologist recaps the good news and explains that my "node," which, via the term, I had assumed was sort of a singular pimple on the prostate, was more like a series of wavy ridges. In other words, instead of my prostate being smooth, it was like a scrunched forehead. But, I can live with an ugly, wavy but well functioning and healthy prostate. I go back for a follow up this coming January, with an increased sense and appreciation of my own health.

So, why did I want to write this essay? Simple. Far too often health concerns are shortshrifted in our Lowest Common Denominator and celebrity-obsessed culture, and even more often those concerns are wholly ignored if they concern men's health. As example, according to both government statistics, and those of the American Cancer Society, prostate cancers (and there are a variety of types) are the third most recurrent cancer type in the nation, behind only lung and colon cancers, in terms of frequency, and only lung cancer kills more men. Prostate cancer is more common than breast cancer in women, although it is slightly less deadly. And therein the good news: early detection has made early stage prostate cancer have survivability rates of almost 95% after 15 years. Most of the nearly 30,000 men to die annually from it are men 65 or older who had late stage cancers that went undetected for decades. By contrast, if I had had a malignant early stage prostate cancer, and removed my prostate – as I had planned – the chances are that, within two to three years, my actuarial chances of dying of any other form of cancer would have been virtually identical to that had I never had prostate cancer.

Hence, the key is early detection, and overcoming the latent Puritanism, Victorian mores, and queasy homophobia most men have regarding prostate exams. As example, at work, my near-brush with prostate cancer became the talk of the guys I work with, several of whom are nearing or at the 40 year age mark. The reaction? Not good. Most think it's 'gay' to even get a test, or acknowledge your mortality. Black men, especially, have a higher genetic tendency to get prostate cancer, and my black co-workers showed just as great a disdain toward early detection and prevention as their white counterparts. Add in the unpleasant realities of a biopsy, described above, and the fact that the removal of a prostate can mean a great reduction in achieving and maintaining sexual erections, and also the actual pleasure of the physical act- due to the lack of seminal lubrication, and this is seen as a deal killer in terms of even broaching the subject. Of course, this is FOLLY! Early detection and prevention literally DOES save lives if, as in my case, the digital rectal exam (DRE) is free or, usually, very inexpensive, and there is no reason to NOT get tested annually, save ignorance and fear.

About the only downside to all of this, for me, is that I was born with Hashimoto's disease, an autoimmune genetic condition which basically means that my hypothalamus does not signal my thyroid to signal my testicles to make enough testosterone, which can result in my getting more tired than usual (my wife jokes on how unlivable I'd be if I had normal testosterone rates). I had been taking androgel for a number of years to combat this, but dropped that as, ironically, added testosterone can increase the odds of prostate problems – from cancer to glandular enlargement. I have a layman's hunch that the waviness in my prostate was a result of the higher than normal testosterone levels that my body experienced. It will be interesting to see if next year's follow up exam will show that the discontinuation of androgel has resulted in a better prostate. To compensate for the lower testosterone levels I have changed my diet to more vegetables and higher protein intake, and it seems to compensate nicely and naturally. This was not the first time I had to alter my diet, as, some years back, I had to give up red meat to cope with high blood cholesterol and some colon issues (not cancer).

Now, having detailed the first two points in this essay's title, let me tackle the final one – heroes and heroism. In the few months since this medical scenario played out, I had been wanting to write on it, in order to urge all men (especially those over 40) to follow through on regular prostate and medical exams, but, as I was working on my book, and other issues arose. I had less time. Then, in the last several months, two issues arose. The first was the death of Roger Ebert, from another form of cancer, and the second was Angelina Jolie's odd, but swift, reaction to even the threat of cancer, and how people reacted to both things.

Both celebrities were called heroes. Ebert for speaking of his illness (although its ravages made that unavoidable) and Jolie for supposed bravery. Yet, neither person, nor their actions, fits the definition of hero:

1 a : a mythological or legendary figure often of divine descent endowed with great strength or ability

b : an illustrious warrior

c : a man admired for his achievements and noble qualities

d : one who shows great courage

2 a : the principal male character in a literary or dramatic work

b : the central figure in an event, period, or movement

3 plural usually he·ros : submarine

4: an object of extreme admiration and devotion : idol

Definitions 1a and 1b are clearly out, and 1c is sketchy as neither Ebert nor Jolie had any great achievements. Ebert was a noted critic, but not a great one, and, likewise, Jolie a noted actress, but even less accomplished in that field than Ebert in his. 1d is out because Ebert showed no courage in merely admitting his obvious illness, and Jolie could have kept her matters private, but has reaped a great PR windfall for her supposed "courage." Definitions 2 and 3 are totally out, and definition 4 is possibly barely applicable, in a very loose sense, in that Ebert cultivated a minor cult of personality on his newspaper-based personal blog, and that Jolie is reckoned a sex symbol with millions of male admirers.

But, missing in these definitions of hero is the vital element of risk. It used to be that a hero was someone who did extraordinary things, things above and beyond the norm, with real and considerable risk to himself – his person, reputation, or in some manner. An orphanage is burning, and a passerby runs into it to save some children. That is Heroism 101. This all came to me because, in mentioning my aim to write of my prostate experience, a few people claimed I was “courageous” or “heroic,” and this is simply not the case, and a bastardization of language. Granted, I have a number of incidents in my past that could be claimed to have been genuine acts of heroism, at considerable risk to my person, health, and life, but writing on my health is NOT one of those incidents. This essay is not an example of courage nor heroism, just decency, as I can gain nothing, materially, from its contents – unlike Ms. Jolie’s actions, and I risk nothing by its composition and publication. One might rightly call me a role model for its writing, but certainly not a hero.

Similarly, neither Ebert nor Jolie are/were heroes, but, possibly and arguably, role models. This is an important distinction to make, because the word hero has been bastardized – anyone in a uniform, regardless of their character or actions, is labeled a hero: military personnel, law enforcement officers, firefighters, medical personnel, yet, the risk of death from any of these professions is significantly less, in real numbers, and per capita, than in all industrial-related work accidents in the U.S., and in the world. Doctors and cops and veterans are heroes, yet factory workers, retail workers, and physical laborers are not? Well, the latter half of that equation is correct, and the former wrong. There are hero doctors and cops, but there are also hero production line workers and cashiers. They are all, though, few and far between. Firemen can do great work, about a tenth of a percent of their time on the job, per career. In that moment of crisis, they certainly are more valuable than the guy who fills your produce case. But, the produce worker at the supermarket is ALWAYS providing a needed service (we all need to eat), and he does it, often in pain – with aching joints, swollen feet, or worse. I once worked for almost three weeks with a broken hand, and when examined by a doctor, was told I had incredible pain tolerance, for most people he saw, with far lesser injuries, could barely work. Did that make me a hero? Of course not, just as serving in the military does not make one a hero. Audie Murphy was a genuine hero. Merely getting shot in combat is NOT heroic. It can be, but usually it is just happenstance.

So, to return to the main thrust of this essay, and an obvious non-heroic point: men, go get your prostate examined on an annual basis, to possibly save your life. Despite what we read by pie in the sky Edenists, cancer and other fatal diseases are not going to be cured and eliminated any time soon, so early detection, prevention, and treatment are vital, so that one morning you will not wake up and find yourself dead, nor even headed that way.

Sweden, where man-beating is sport!

RK Hendrick · 19 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to the modern nation of Sweden, where brutally beating an unarmed man without justification or cause (by a female police officer) is permissible and socially acceptable.

In my lifetime, I have been a prosecutor, a defense attorney and a Pro Tem (part-time) Municipal Judge. I have read tens of thousands of police reports, viewed hundreds of police videos, completed many “ride alongs” with on duty police officers, participated in countless criminal trials and hearings, conducted thousands of interviews with police officers, been through hundreds of hours of courtroom police officer testimony, and trained & advised police officers on Search and Seizure. To be candid, I tend to have a very favorable view of police officers, as I know and appreciate how difficult their jobs can be.

Unfortunately, there are exceptions to this perspective.

Take a moment to review (more than once) the YouTube video that accompanies this article. I reviewed this video well over a half-dozen times. Each time I see it, I get completely appalled and outraged! To be candid, the police officer’s conduct in this matter is disgusting, inhumane and amoral!

The video was taken in central Stockholm on Brunnsgatan (Brunns street) on or about the evening of July 11, 2013.

Upon review of the video of this brutal attack, you will note the following:

- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically threatening behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically abusive behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically lewd or profane gestures towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen yell at this female police officer.
- At All Times, this male citizen used open, respectful and compliant body language towards the female police officer. His arms were down at his side and the palms of his hands open.
- At All Times, this male citizen maintained an appropriate physical decorum and respectful distance from the female police. (Police officer safety).
- At All Times, the physical safety of the female police officer was NOT at issue and there was NO immediate and/or imminent physical harm being directed at her by the male citizen.
- At No Time did this male citizen provoke an attack by this female police officer.
- At No Time while being brutally attacked by the female police officer, did this male citizen engage in any type of physical alteration, combative behavior, retaliatory behavior or assaultive behavior towards the female police officer.

Regardless of what verbal exchange may have occurred off camera prior to this brutal attack or during the actual video, there is absolutely NO justification or basis for the officer’s conduct and use of physical force.

This vicious unprovoked attack is completely without cause and/or reason. Under NO (zero) circumstances can the conduct of this police officer be morally justified and/or condoned. Any well-trained, well-adjusted police officer knows that when there is NO physical threat (to you or anyone else) you do NOT have the right to beat a citizen (bloody) to the ground with the aid of a baton and a German Shepherd attack dog! Bottom line: This is blatant misandric bigotry and the use malicious physical abuse on the part of the police officer.

If a male police officer engaged in this type of brutal unprovoked behavior and assaulted an unarmed female citizen in this manner, there would be an international outrage. This officer should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and go to prison with all of the other criminals. There is absolutely no rationale or excuse for this vicious inhumane conduct!

RK Hendrick, Esq.

Creator / Co Admin. of the Facebook Group: “Friend of Protection For Men” … The largest and most active Men’s / Fathers’ / Boys’ Rights & Issues Discussion Group on Facebook with an international membership of some very influential and brilliant people. https://www.facebook.com/groups/protectionformen/

Author of: How To Avoid Getting Screwed When Getting Laid…Available on Amazon.com

Mrs. Drummings

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 20 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I was ten I left hospital with my leg in plaster and it would be that way for six months. It meant I couldn't cut through Jackman's yard to climb the steep dirt path to get home from school any more.

Instead, I had to catch the bus and crutch-walk back and wasn't able to slide down that path with my mate Pumpski in the wet season when the mud mixed with the Bridal Creeper vines. The Bridals scratched us on our way down and one time we bent Mr Dettin's fence but he didn't care. He used to trap us and talk about Rosebud Kitmaster model trains and wooden buttons, but his story's for another time.

Mum made Mrs Drummings the new baby sitter and house cleaner and she was an enormous potato in a floral dress. A big crease went through the middle of her face above her nose, and the two squints above it reminded me of twin moons drowned in a dark pond in an ancient forest. She was twenty eight but I thought she was sixty but really strong. She'd lift my little brother up on her sandal and put him somewhere else when she stomped about.

"Go there bunny. You're in my way."

He was three and when she did that he blinked like a dog that was shoo'd away. He didn't care, but years later he'd get annoyed when we teased him about it.

Mrs Drummings was in our house five times a week when only us kids were there. She called the shots and looked in the storage boxes and drawers and learnt where everything was. I asked her one time why she wanted the key for my dad's desk in the study.

"It's because I have to clean everywhere. You go ask mum and dad and they'll tell you the same.

I never asked mum and dad because later that day her daughter turned up and scared me quiet, and that girl was meaner than a snake cut twice one way and twice the other. She was a nine year old ball of farts and muscle that followed me around the house like I had dynamite strapped to my head and she was trying to light the fuse. I had to face her when she cornered me next to the downstairs freezer.

"Why are you always going where I'm going?"

She jumped at me like there was lightning and snatched my left crutch and banged the freezer with it.

"Going? THAT'S where you're going if you don't like my mum!"

I was happy when she ran and chucked my crutch in the pool because I got the chance to make it up the stairs and push the bed against my bedroom door. That incident was unpleasant enough, but three days later she scared the tripe out of me with her cloaked doll collection.

She unrolled a velvet bundle and I saw fifteen daggers with names scratched on their handles. "Jane" was the biggest one and "Bob" was next to it. She stared at me and said nothing and I knew that if I flinched she was going to grab one and let it talk really close to me.

"Dad got these from the war. He's sad now and doesn't want them so now I got them and they are my new dolls because they killed all the old dolls."

The next day I went to Mrs Drummings and told her about it and she kissed me on the forehead and smiled. I had never seen her teeth and her breath made me think of drains when the wet season flooded the streets.

"She won't be back and she told me the secret of your coins."

[image]

I never remembered telling anyone about my coin collection, but I was so proud of it I didn't care how she knew. I showed her my 1966 silver fifty cent pieces and copper pennies in plastic boxes that had never been touched. She sat on my bed and giggled about stamps and I said I had a collection of those too. For two hours she was my new friend and we talked about how some people liked to keep necklaces and snow-globes. I wasn't wary of her any more but the next day it was different.

The bus dropped me off and I crutch-walked home and saw her sitting in her Mini in our driveway. She rolled down the window and her face was red and wet and I knew she had been crying when nobody was around to see.

"Ian get in. I want to talk."

I got in and she put her head on my shoulder and cried. When she spoke I could feel the adult voice rumble down my whole side and it was weird.

"Hubby died in my arms last night. Agent orange finally got him and now I need you to be the man of the house when I clean."

I got out of the car fast and hobbled to Pumpski's at the end of the street and didn't come back until dark. Dad was at the dinner table and he had a sheet of paper in front of him while mum looked over his shoulder. She was mad too.

"We made a list of the stuff she pinched. We're off to see the police."

Dad kept looking at the list.

"She didn't clean today. She just came and burgled the place." He shook his head. "Dumb bitch."

Dumb? She was smart. She got to keep my coins and stamps, and when she told the cops about her husband that died on her they even gave her a shot of whiskey. I reckon that if it was a bloke who robbed us and his wife had just died then I'd have got my coins back.

~

Original artwork, © Ian Williams. 2013.

The Fraud of Feminism part two

Ernest Belfort Bax · 20 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM is pleased to present one of the seminal works of Men's Human Rights literature on its 100th anniversary of publication. This is the second instalment of this historic document. The first can be found here.

It is a fascinating piece of work. Perhaps most remarkable about it is that as you read, you will not find yourself so much transformed back to a different age with different modes of thought. But rather you will read observations and conclusions that will, word by word and line by line, be largely indistinguishable from what you would see today from any critical thinker when offering a candid review of the essence of feminism. You will see repeated references to the same shaming tactics, lies, distortions, revisions of history, use of proxy violence and methods of manipulating the blue pill masses we continually find ourselves discussing today.

The Fraud of Feminism, by E. Belfort Bax was first published in 1913. Let us hope the next hundred years see more progress than we did in the first, and let us never say that E. Belfort Bax didn't warn us. PE

Chapter IV
Always the "Injured Innocent"!

Ernest B. Bax – 1913

WHILE what we have termed Political Feminism vehemently asserts its favourite dogma, the intellectual and moral equality of the sexes – that the woman is as good as the man if not better – Sentimental Feminism as vehemently seeks to exonerate every female criminal, and protests against any punishment being meted out to her approaching in severity that which would be awarded a man in a similar case. It does so on grounds which presuppose the old theory of the immeasurable inferiority, mental and moral, of woman, which are so indignantly spurned by every Political Feminist – i.e. in his or her capacity as such. We might suppose, therefore, that Political Feminism, with its theory of sex equality based on the assumption of equal sex capacity, would be in strong opposition in this matter with Sentimental Feminism, which seeks, as its name implies, to attenuate female responsibility on grounds which are not distinguishable from the old-fashioned assumption of inferiority. But does Political Feminism consistently adopt this logical position? Not one whit. It is quite true that some Feminists, when hard pressed, may grudgingly concede the untenability on rational grounds of the Sentimental Feminists' claims. But taken as a whole, and in their practical dealings, the Political Feminists are in accord with the Sentimental Feminists in claiming female immunity on the ground of sex. This is shown in every case where a female criminal receives more than a nominal sentence.

We have already given examples of the fact in question, and they could be indefinitely extended. At the end of the year 1911, at Birmingham, in the case of a woman convicted of the murder of her paramour by deliberately pouring inflammable oil over him while he was asleep, and then setting it afire, and afterwards not only exulting in the action but saying she was ready to do it again, the jury brought in recommendation to mercy with their verdict. And, needless to say, the influence of Political and Sentimental Feminism was too strong to allow the capital sentence to be carried out, even with such a fiendish wretch as this. In the case of the Italian woman in Canada, Napolitano, before mentioned, the female franchise societies issued a petition to Mr Borden, the Premier of Canada, in favour of the commutation of sentence. The usual course was adopted in this case, as in most others in which a woman murders a man – to wit, the truly "chivalrous" one of trying to blacken the character of the dead victim in defence of the action of the murderess.

In other cases, more especially, of course, where the man is guilty of a crime against a woman, when mercy is asked for the offender, we are pitifully adjured to "think of the poor victim." As we have seen, Lord Haldane trotted out this exhortation in a case where it was absurdly inappropriate, since the much-commiserated "victim" had only herself to thank for being a "victim," and still more for remaining a "victim." We never hear this plea for the "victim" urged where the "victim" happens to be a man and the offender a woman. Compare this with the case of the boy of nineteen, Beal, whom Mr M'Kenna hanged for the murder of his sweetheart, and that in the teeth of an explanation given in the defence which was at least possible, if not probable, and which certainly, putting it at the very lowest, introduced an element of doubt into the case. Fancy a girl of nineteen being convicted, whatever the evidence, of having poisoned her paramour or even if, per impossible, she were convicted, fancy her being given more than a short term of imprisonment! A man murdered by a woman is always the horrid brute, while the woman murdered by the man is just as surely the angelic victim. Anyone who reads reports of cases with an unbiassed mind must admit the absolute accuracy of this statement. Divine woman is always the "injured innocent," not only in the graver crimes, such as murder, but also in the minor offences coming under the cognisance of the law. At the Ledbury Petty Sessions a woman in the employment of a draper, who had purloined goods to the amount of £150, was acquitted on the ground of "kleptomania," and this notwithstanding the fact that she had been in the employment of the prosecutor for over five years, had never complained of illness and had never been absent from business; also that her landlady gave evidence showing that she was sound in mind and body. At the very same sessions two men were sentenced respectively to eight and twelve months' imprisonment for stealing goods to the value of £5! (John Bull, 12th November 1910).

At this point I may be permitted to quote from the article formerly alluded to (Fortnightly Review, November 1911, case taken from a report in The News of the World of 28th February 1909):

> "A young woman shot at the local postman with a revolver; the bullet grazed his face, she having fired point-blank at his head. Jury returned a verdict of not guilty, although the revolver was found on her when arrested, and the facts were admitted and were as follows: – At noon she left her house, crossing three fields to the house of the victim, who was at home and alone; upon his appearing she fired point-blank at his head; he banged to the door, and thus turned off the bullet, which grazed his face and 'ploughed a furrow through his hair.' She had by her when arrested a revolver cocked and with four chambers undischarged."

Let us now take the crime of violent assault with attempt to do bodily injury. The following cases will serve as illustrative examples: – From The News of the World, 9th May 1909: A nurse in Belfast sued her lost swain for breach of promise. She obtained £100 damages although it was admitted by her counsel that she had thrown vitriol over the defendant, thereby injuring him, and the defendant had not prosecuted her! Also it was admitted that she had been "carrying on" with another man. From The Morning Leader of 8th July 1905 I have taken the following extraordinary facts as to the varied punishment awarded in cases of vitriol-throwing: That of a woman who threw vitriol [acid] over a sergeant at Aldershot, and was sentenced to six months' imprisonment without hard labour while a man who threw it over a woman at Portsmouth was tried and convicted at the Hants Assizes, on 7th July 1905, and sentenced by Mr Justice Bigham to twelve years' penal servitude! As regards the first case it will be observed that, (notwithstanding a crime, which in the case of a man was described by the judge as “cowardly and vile” and meriting twelve years’ penal servitude) the woman was rewarded by damages for £100, to be obtained from the very victim whom she had done her best to maim for life (besides being unfaithful to him) and who had generously abstained from prosecuting.

But it is not merely in cases of murder, attempted murder or serious assault that justice is mocked by the present state of our law and its administration in the interests of the female sex. The same attitude is observed, the same farcical sentences on women, whether the crime be theft, fraud, common assault, criminal slander or other minor offences. We have the same preposterous excuses admitted, the same preposterous pleas allowed, and the same farcical sentences passed – if, indeed, any sentence be passed at all. The following examples I have culled at random: – From John Bull, 26th February 1910: At the London Sessions, Mr Robert Wallace had to deal with the case of a well-dressed woman living at Hampstead, who pleaded guilty to obtaining goods to the amount of £50 by false pretences. In explanation of her crime it was stated that she was under a mistaken impression that her engagement would not lead to marriage, that she became depressed, and that she “did not know what she said or did,” while in mitigation of punishment it was urged that the money had been repaid, that her fiancé could not marry her if she were sent to gaol, and that her life would be irretrievably ruined, and she was discharged! From The Birmingham Post, 4th February 1902: A female clerk (twenty-six) pleaded guilty to embezzling £5, 1s. 9d. on 16th November, £2, 2s. 4d. on 2lst December and £5, 0s. 9d. on a 23rd December last, the moneys of her employer. Prosecuting counsel said prisoner entered prosecutor’s employ in 1900, and in June last her salary was raised to 27s. 6d. a week. The defalcations, which began a month before the increase, amounted to £134. She had falsified the books, and when suspicion fell upon her destroyed two books, in order, as she thought, to prevent detection. Her counsel pleaded for leniency on the ground of her previous good character and because she was engaged! The recorder merely bound her over, stating that her parents and young man were respectable, and so was the house in which she lodged! A correspondent mentions in The Birmingham Post of February 1902 a case where a woman had burned her employer’s outhouses and property, doing £1800 worth of damage, and got off with a month’s imprisonment. On the other hand, the same judge, at the same Quarter Sessions, thus dealt with two male embezzlers: C.C. (twenty-eight), clerk, who pleaded guilty to embezzling two sums of money from his master in August and September of 1901 (amounts not given), was sent to gaol for six calendar months; and S.G. (twenty-four), clerk, pleaded guilty to embezzling 7s. 6d. and 3s. For the defence it was urged that the prisoner had been poorly paid, and the recorder, hearing that a gentleman was prepared to employ the man as soon as released, sentenced him to three months’ hard labour! O merciful recorder!

The “injured innocent” theory usually comes into play with magistrates when a woman is charged with aggravated annoyance and harassing of men in their business or profession, when, as already stated, the administrator of the law will usually tell the prosecutor that he cannot interfere. In the opposite case of a man annoying a woman under like circumstances he invariably has to find substantial sureties for his good behaviour or go to gaol. No injured innocence for him!

There is another case in which it seems probable that, animated by the same fixed idea, those responsible for the framing of laws have flagrantly neglected an obvious measure for public safety. We refer to the unrestricted sale of sulphuric acid (vitriol) which is permitted. Now here we have a substance subserving only very special purposes in industry, none in household economy, or in other departments, save for criminal ends, which is nevertheless procurable without let or hindrance. Is it possible to believe that this would be the case if men were in the habit of using this substance in settling their differences with each other, even still more if they employed it by way of emphasising their disapproval of the jilting of sweethearts? That it should be employed by women in wreaking their vengeance on recalcitrant lovers seems a natural if not precisely a commendable action, in the eyes of a Sentimental Feminist public opinion, and one which, on the mildest hypothesis, “doesn’t matter.” Hence a deadly substance may be freely bought and sold as though it were cod-liver oil. A very nice thing for dastardly viragoes for whom public opinion has only the mildest of censures! In any reasonable society the indiscriminate sale of corrosive substances would in itself be a crime punishable with a heavy term of imprisonment.

It is not only by men, and by a morbid public opinion inflamed by Feminist sentiment in general, that female criminals are surrounded by a halo of injured innocence. The reader can hardly fail to notice that such women have the effrontery to pretend to regard themselves in this light. This is often so in cases of assault, murder or attempted murder of lovers by their sweethearts. Such is, of course, particularly noticeable in the senselessly wicked outrages, of which more anon. The late Otto Weininger, in his book before quoted, Geschlecht und Charakter (Sex and Character), has some noteworthy remarks on this, remarks which, whether we accept his suggested theory or not, might well have been written as a comment on recent cases of suffragette crimes and criminals.

> "The male criminal," says Weininger, "has from his birth the same relation to the idea of value as any other man in whom the criminal tendencies governing himself may be wholly absent. The female on the other hand often claims to be fully justified when she has committed the greatest conceivable infamy. While the genuine criminal is obtusely silent against all reproaches, a woman will express her astonishment and indignation that anyone can doubt her perfect right to act as she has done. Women are convinced of their being in the right without ever having sat in judgment on themselves. The male criminal, it may be true, does not do so either, but then he never maintains that he is in the right. He rather goes hastily out of the way of discussing right and wrong, because it reminds him of his guilt. In this fact we have a proof that he has a relationship to the idea, and that it is unfaithfulness to his better self of which he is unwilling to be reminded. No male criminal has ever really believed that injustice has been done him by punishment. The female criminal on the other hand is convinced of the maliciousness of her accusers, and if she is unwilling no man can persuade her that she has done wrong. Should someone admonish her, it is true that she often bursts into tears, begs for forgiveness and admits her fault; she may even believe indeed that she really feels this fault. Such is only the case, however, when she has felt inclined to do so, for this very dissolving in tears affects her always with a certain voluptuous pleasure. The male criminal is obstinate, he does not allow himself to be turned round in a moment as the apparent defiance of a woman may be converted into an apparent sense of guilt, where, that is, the accuser understands how to handle her "("Geschlecht und Charakter," pp. 253- 254).

Weininger's conclusion is:

> "Not that woman is naturally evil or anti-moral, but rather that she is merely a-moral, in other words that she is destitute of what is commonly called 'moral sense.'"

The cases of female penitents and others which seem to contradict this announcement. Weininger choose to consider them as indicating that the Roman matrons felt sometimes that they were badly treated, that they ought not to endure the bad treatment, and that they ought to take the only means that they possessed of expressing their feelings, and of wreaking vengeance, by employing poison (p.92). Now though it may be said that in this passage we have no direct justification of the atrocious crime attributed to the Roman matrons, yet it can hardly be denied that we have here a distinct condonation of the infamous and dastardly act, such a condonation as the worthy Principal of St Andrews University would hardly have meted out to men under any circumstances. Probably Professor Donaldson, in writing the above, felt that his comments would not be resented very strongly, even if not actually approved, by public opinion, steeped as it is at the present time in Feminism, political and sentimental.

In the present chapter we have given a few typical instances of the practice which constitutes one of the most conspicuous features of Modern Feminism and of the public opinion which it has engendered. We hear and read, ad nauseam, of excuses, and condonation, for every crime committed by a woman, while a crime of precisely similar a character and under precisely similar circumstances, where a man is the perpetrator, meets with nothing but virulent execration from that truculent ass, British public opinion, as manipulated by the Feminist fraternity, male and female. This state of public opinion reacts, of course, upon the tribunals and has the result that women are practically free to commit any offence they please, with always a splendid sporting chance of getting acquitted altogether, and a practical certainty that even if convicted they will receive farcical sentences, or, should the sentence be in any degree adequate to the offence, that such sentence will not be carried out. The way in which criminal law is made a jest and a mockery as regards female prisoners, the treatment of criminal suffragettes, is there in evidence. The excuse of health being endangered by their going without their breakfasts has resulted in the release after a few days of women guilty of the vilest crimes – e.g. the attempt to set fire to the theatre at Dublin. It may be well to recall the outrageous facts of modern female immunity and free defiance of the law as illustrated by one quotation of a description of the merry time of the window-smashers of March 1912 in Holloway prison given by a correspondent of The Daily Telegraph. The correspondent of that journal describes his visit to the aforesaid prison, where he said there appeared to have been no punishment of any kind for any sort of misbehaviour.

> "All over the place," he writes, "is noise – women calling to women everywhere, and the officials seem powerless to preserve even the semblance of discipline. A suffragist will call out her name while in a cell, and another one who knows her will answer, giving her name in return, and a conversation will then be carried on between the two. This chattering obtains all day and far into the night. The 'officials' as the wardresses prefer themselves called, have already given the prison the name of 'the monkey-house.' Certain it is that the prisoners are treated with all deference, the reason being perhaps that the number of officials is insufficient to establish proper order. While I was waiting yesterday one lady drove up in a carriage and pair, in which were two policemen and several bundles of clothes, to enter upon her sentence and this is the note which seems to dominate the whole of the prison. Seventy-six of the prisoners are supposed to be serving sentences with hard labour, but none of them are wearing prison clothes, and in only one or two instances have any tasks of any description been given, those generally being a little sewing or knitting."

Again a member of the Women's Freedom League at a meeting on 19th May 1912 boasted that the suffragettes had a wing of their own at Holloway.

> "They had nice hot water pipes and all the latest improvements and were able to climb up to the window and exchange sentiments with their friends."

She had saved money and enjoyed herself very much!!

Here we have a picture of the way the modern authorities of the law recognise the "injured innocence" of female delinquents who claim the right to wantonly destroy property. Our present society, based as it is on private property-holding, and which usually punishes with the utmost severity any breach of the sanctity of private property, waives its claims where women are concerned. Similarly arson under circumstances directly endangering human life, for which the law prescribes the maximum sentence of penal servitude for life, is considered adequately punished by a week or two's imprisonment when those convicted of the crime are of the female sex. Oh, but they were acting from political motives! Good, but have not terrorist anarchists, Fenians and Irish dynamiters of the Land League days also acted from political motives? The terrorist anarchist, foolish and indefensible though his tactics may be, believes honestly enough that he is paving the way for the abolition of poverty, misery and social injustice, a far more vital thing than the franchise! The Irish Fenians and dynamiters pursued a similar policy and there is no reason to doubt their honest belief that it would further the cause of the freedom and national independence of Ireland. Yet were these "political" offenders dealt with otherwise than as ordinary criminals when convicted of acts qualified by the law as felonies? And their acts, moreover, whatever we may think of them otherwise, were, in most cases at least, politically logical from their own point of view, and not senseless injuries to unoffending persons, as those of the present-day female seekers after the suffrage.

MGTOWN

Diana Davison · 21 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Tumbleweeds rolled lazily across the plain as hooves beat a dusty path towards the hazy horizon. The morning sun kindled a coral flame that crept up the barn walls, settling in a halo over the main road then breaking into a golden blaze with the first crowing of a rooster. Three horses reigned to a restless halt, panting and snorting as the lead rider reached up to wipe the dust from the rim of her hat. She glanced at the wooden sign stuck into the dry earth. MGTOWN. Population 421.

“Second road to the left and straight on till morning.” Wisps of blond hair rustled in the warm breeze as Liz smiled at her companions. “Looks like we made it, girls.” Mel and Raven shifted uncomfortably in their saddles. Mel fluffed up her sweat soaked bangs and shaded her puffy eyes, gauging the remaining distance between her and a bath.

“I’m sure I’ve got a rash,” Raven complained. “Do we even know what kind of bushes we rode through? I heard lyme disease is a problem this year. I think I got a mosquito bite about an hour ago.” She shoved her hand under the layers of travel duds to scratch at her upper arm.

“I think I got a blister from these boots,” Mel sighed as she glanced back at the bulging saddlebags behind her. “And I can’t remember where I put my sunscreen, can I borrow yours, Liz?” Liz whipped her 85 UV blocker out of the holster on her hip belt and tossed it over.

“We don’t want to linger, there’s a probably a woman being raped right now in this two-bit town and she needs our help.” Liz held her hand out for the bottle of sunscreen, misted her own face with a quick spray then shoved it back in her holster with a twirl. She dug her heels in and the bloated gelding beneath her snorted then jumped into a trot.

Inside the Sheriff’s office, Joe Goodman watched his morning coffee drizzle its way into the carafe. He’d often wondered which he liked more, the happy gurgling noises of the machine or the smell of java as it wafted from the counter to fill the room. He kicked his feet up on the desk and leaned back in a lazy stretch. Except for the fundraiser being held that afternoon, his calendar was clear for the day and chances looked good that he’d be able to finish reading his novel. His well-trained ear picked up the approaching patter of horses in the distance. Deciding it was the delivery of whisky arriving for the saloon, Joe rose from his desk, sloshed some fresh brew into his mug and sauntered out onto the veranda.

The three feminists jostled in their saddles as they rode into town. Leading the trio, Liz’s ice blue eyes darted from side to side, sneering at the lack of imagination in the paint colours of the houses. She pulled her horse up a few feet from Joe’s doorstep and sniffed down in disdain at his amused, raised eyebrow. They stared at each other for a moment before he took a sip from his mug and turned back inside.

“Are you the Sheriff around these parts?” Liz’s shrill voice made him wince and Joe slowly swiveled in the doorway, glancing up at the clearly marked sign above his head. Liz shifted in her saddle to dismount. “Well, I need a word with you. Come here and help me down.” Joe took another sip.

“Nope. Don’t think I will.” He shook his head as Liz, Mel, and Raven fumbled about with stiff behinds in their expensive chaps layered over designer jeans that, for Raven, fit a little too tight because she hadn’t wanted to admit her true waist size. Mel cursed as her belt caught on a saddlebag and she clung desperately to her gelding’s neck to avoid falling while Raven hobbled over to unhook her. The horses skittered about until Liz managed to tether them to the hitching post. They collected themselves into a solid line with hands on hips, meaning business. Joe took another sip of his coffee then went back inside. Liz elbowed Mel to grab a binder out of one of the bags and waited impatiently with her hand held out. Brushing the dust from her jacket, she stomped into the Sheriff’s office with her cohorts in tow.

Joe was just putting his feet up again when Liz slammed the binder down on his desk.

“What’s that?” He had a sinking feeling that he wasn’t going to finish his novel.

“That is the damning evidence of your shoddy rape conviction record!” Liz glared at him accusingly.

“I’d imagine it is pretty shoddy, since I’ve never raped anyone. Just hasn’t made it on my ‘to do’ list.” He rested his cowboy boots on the binder and started rolling a cigarette. Liz grabbed the book from under his feet and opened it up to show him a chart. Joe rolled his eyes and squinted at the page as she jabbed a manicured finger at the bolded number circled in red.

“Don’t get smart with me, mister! Did you know that one woman in four suffers from rape and you only had one conviction in Mgtown over the entire last year? ” Liz took off her wide brim hat, shook out her blond locks and threw her hat on his desk in disgust.

Joe put his feet back on the ground, leaned over and flicked her hat onto the floor with the back of his hand. “Who are you clowns? And what will make you go away?”

“You can’t intimidate me, Buster! I chew up rape apologists like you for a living and you’re about to hit my dinner plate.” Liz grabbed her hat from the floor, snarled at the dirt that clung to it, and deftly snapped her binder shut with the other hand. Mel and Raven smiled gleefully in the background. “I want a list with all the names and addresses of the women in this district, I want safe space granted for my interviews, and I want three rooms with running water and a private bath for me and my associates. We’re not leaving here until we get to the bottom of this.” She tossed a business card at Joe’s head and he caught it mid-air.

Liz Fudd, President, Centre for Women’s Advocacy and Protection (CWAP)

“Look here, Ms. Fudd of CWAP, I haven’t let a woman tell me what to do in twenty-five years and I’m not about to start now. We’ve only had one rape in this town and it was a traveller that done it. As a result, we don’t take kindly to strangers so I suggest you turn yourselves around, get back on your neutered horses and ride your diva asses back out of town.” Joe stood up and refilled his coffee mug hoping he’d get a chance to actually enjoy the second cup. Mel shuffled out of his way with a limp. She should have picked boots with a softer leather. Raven was looking nervously at Liz, there was no way she was getting back on a horse until her rash had settled down. Surely they couldn’t make her do it.

Liz nodded reassuringly at her sidekicks. “You are a public servant and I represent the public. I’ve got legal documents here and a mandate to monitor every county until the number of men in jail matches the number of crimes against women!” She waved her binder in the air. Joe put his cup down and strode over to grab the book from her hand. He flipped through the pages and chuckled.

“Justice for wives? We don’t have wives, in Mgtown. And these aren’t legal documents. You wrote them yourself. It’s just CWAP.” He handed it back to Liz dismissively.

“These CWAP documents have just become law in this state. There’s a new sheriff in town, buddy boy.” Liz donned a smug grin and turned on her heel. Mel and Raven fell in behind her and they made their exit. She called back over her shoulder, “Feed our horses and bring me my list. I’ll be in the pub in two hours.”

They grabbed their luggage and headed for the nearest inn.

Closed signs whizzed down over store front windows as the women passed. Liz narrowed her eyes. “Looks like a town that’s got something to hide.” Raven had other things on her mind as she juggled Liz’s bags with her own while trying to dig out some baby powder. Liz whapped her on the back. “We’ve got a lot of work to do, girls.”

Three feminists walked into a saloon. The barkeep looked up. “Wine?” A finger was jabbed at his face.

“You sexist bastard! I haven’t even started talking yet.”

The barkeep raised his palms in the air, slid a full bottle and some glasses down the bar then moved as far away as possible. Liz surveyed the saloon and decided to claim a table in the corner for their interviews. Mel carried their beverages over while Raven squirmed at the idea of sitting and excused herself to find the ladies' room. Liz chose a seat facing the door and started pulling out her questionnaires.

"No time to waste. A woman gets raped every 2 minutes and we've already been here for three hours." Liz arranged her paperwork and looked for a pen.

As Raven returned to join her comrades, a group of ten women threw open the saloon doors and stormed in.

"Where are they?" A robust woman with cropped hair followed the barkeep's pointed finger to Liz's group in the corner. The townswomen, varying in size and shape but not in their anger, closed the distance quickly. Liz's plastic smile quivered for a moment.

"Good afternoon, ladies. My colleagues and I are here to help you." Liz straightened a paper stack in front of her on the table.

"Then fuck off. We don't need you, we don't want you, and you can pack your lies up to peddle your poison somewhere else." A redhead in Doc Martins dutifully documented events on her camcorder.

"I understand your anger," Liz calmly replied, "at least two of your group have probably been raped and never had closure." She picked up a survey and held it out to a brunette who glared and snatched it from her hand.

"Bullshit." Reading from the paper, the brunette laughed. "Have you ever been looked at in a way that made you sexually uncomfortable?"

"Yes," Liz nodded, "you can be raped by someone's eyes. And there's not a damn thing you can do to stop it. Eye rape is real." The ten women fell silent and stood staring at the CWAP table in disbelief. Liz felt a small victory. "That's right, ladies, the men of this town may be raping you every day and you don't even know it."

The saloon doors were flung open as Liz was carried out over a shoulder with her buddies close behind. Her legs kicked as the townswomen transported her back to the hitching post. They strapped the saddlebags back onto the horses, shoved her papers into a side pocket and dumped her at the foot of the watering trough.

Joe sauntered out from his office with his novel in hand and chuckled as Liz sputtered and tried to regain her footing. "I see you've met some of our women folk," he quipped. "How are the interviews going?"

Liz waved a fist in the air. She pulled her business cards out and started shoving them in nearby faces. "I'm a professional, damn you! Damn you all to hell!!"

Joe lifted up his cell phone. "There's about 45 women in Mgtown. Would you like to meet them all at once?" Liz shot him a look intended to kill but the target was impervious. He smiled, "I'm not hearing an enthusiastic 'yes' so I'll take that as a no." He tucked his cell phone back in his pocket, cracked open his book again, and headed back inside. The last chapter was getting really interesting.

As the three visitors eased their asses back on their mounts, Joe waved to them from the doorway. "You can update your statistics when you get back. Our conviction rate is 1 for 1. That's 100%"

"That's impossible!" Liz retorted.

"It's quite easy, actually. You just have to have a town that ain't full of liars and leeches." He tipped his hat as Liz slumped in her saddle and the three feminists rode off into the sunset.

Shame on me

John Hembling (JtO) · 21 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Shame on me?

Nah, how about instead of that, you don't inflict your hateful lies on me, you repulsive creep.

I'm a member of a human rights movement which at present, is unpopular, to say the least. It's so unpopular that the opponents of this movement are rarely even challenged when they make absurd and sickening claims such as Andrea Sands' article for the Vancouver Sun. Andrea asserted in her article that objecting to false criminal accusations equates to excusing and supporting the commission of the violent crime of rape. And nobody, from her copy editor to her publisher challenged such a sadistic accusation. As I said, the human rights movement I'm a part of is not, at present very popular. Of course, this unpopularity correlates closely with the necessity of the movement.

Necessary human rights movements are never popular ones, for obvious reasons.

Over time I've noticed the most common position taken against myself and other men's human rights activist is some variation of the imperative statement "shame on you!"

"Shame on you" is essentially what Andrea Sands was saying in her claim that public rejection of false accusations amounts to the same thing as excusing and endorsing the violent crime of rape. The victims of false accusation, whose lives are destroyed, whose families are torn apart, whose careers are ended and children denied a stable upbringing, in Andrea Sands world, these victims and their advocates are endorsing the commission of rape.

Are you fucking kidding me, Sands?

She's not kidding, obviously, but what she is doing is heaping as much pain as she possibly can on those struggling for recognition of their humanity.

Obviously, Andrea Sands, writing from her home office somewhere between Vancouver and Edmonton wasn't able to built a substantive or rational opposition to the posters of Men's Rights Edmonton. Indeed, if anybody had a substantive argument supporting the use of false accusations as weapons, then they would have made one. Andrea Sands, displeased as she is with the message of a poster, cannot silence the author of that message with a physical beating. So, angered or offended by the message " lying about sexual assault = a crime" and of course "don't be that girl," and Sands without a counter argument or a rod to break over anyone's back did the next best thing. She used the only weapon she could find. Shame.

Nobody, not even Andrea Sands actually thinks opposition to the use of false criminal accusation is actually support of rape. And, even though Sands makes that claim in her article, she isn't trying to convince anybody she's actually that stupid. Invoking of shame as a weapon of course bypasses reason or logic, and taps directly into deeper and older parts of the brain. This is why Sand's characterization is unimportant. Her goal was never to make a convincing case, it was simply to invoke pain by pulling on our ancient social instincts. Implied rejection by the group. Death.

Again, our opponents invariably use shame to attack men's human rights activists. At the U of T, in April of 2013 at the Nathanson and Young lecture, the crowd of angry chanting ideologues chanted "shame on you and U of T, for allowing misogyny". What misogyny? Paul Nathanson is a gay man, and Katherine Young is a woman – these were the ones who the protesters were there to silence. Reason doesn't matter, shame is not a weapon of rational rebuttal. It's simply a tool to inflict pain. Indeed, also at the Nathanson and Young event, one of the more aggressive male feminists made it his business to shout into the faces of those attempting to attend the scheduled lecture "shame on you!! and shame on you!!". This man jabbing his finger into the faces of his targets as he shouted into their faces. He couldn't physically assault them obviously, there were too many cameras rolling and police present. But his point wasn't to field any kind of logical argument, it was simply to trigger ancient hominid instincts, and inflict pain. To silence and shame those arguing for human rights. Is there some motivation for this besides cruelty?

At the Warren Farrell presentation, also at the University of Toronto, the Toronto police interposed themselves between protesters and attendees to prevent assault on those attempting to hear Dr Farrell by those protestors. The protestors, for this part shouted at the police “shame! Shame! Shame!”

So, those Toronto cops should feel shame for preventing violence? Really?

But whether overt or indirect, this repeated use of shame as a weapon to silence is a non-rational attack. Like all weapons used to silence, when an individual employs shame, she is admitting she has no counter argument thus, ironically, her unfounded attack is without merit or legitimacy.

She should be ashamed to use shame.

It sure does wear thin after years of the very same empty attack. But having felt that attack, experienced MRAs understand far better what the reliance on shame means for opposition to a movement seeking human recognition and rights of boys and men. It’s the sublimation of violence.

So, shame on me? The obvious question is what for? But, since that question is never answered with anything except thought-stopping cliche, empty accusations and further repetitions of “shame! Shame!”.

But an answer to “what for” isn’t really necessary anymore, it’s clear that the general point of an appeal to shame isn’t to address any legitimate problem. Well, besides the problem of men failing to comply with the desires of violent sexist bigots and thugs. And indeed, it’s also long past time for men to not simply and quietly discard shame from their own emotional repertoire, but to do so publicly.

The continued attempted use of shame against men pursuing human rights for themselves deserves nothing short of open scorn, contempt and derision. What other possible response could there be to the open sadism, indulged with the support of a corrupt industry profiting by continuation of violence against the victims it purports to protect?

Shame on me? I’m afraid not. In fact, for a growing number of not only men’s human rights activists, but men in a climate of public hate towards males, the continued ability to feel shame becomes ever more obvious as maladaptive. It’s simply a crude tool of psychological violence used to coerce compliance with the desires of sadists of the leisure caste.

Emerging from the still-rising climate of disdain for boy’s and men’s humanity is a broadening path of self realization for men. Shame has no part of it.

So, shame on me? No, I am quite shameless. And you can get lost, creep.

A voice for men: MGTOW-central

Peter Wright · 21 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this week we will be featuring several articles on the topic of Men Going Their Own Way, a philosophical and social movement this publication has promoted since its earliest days. To kick off this series we include this gem from Peter Wright, who's been a MGTOW practically before anyone had heard the term, and is one of three by him we will be featuring exploring the topic, along with pieces by other authors on the same topic. Take it away, Peter!

As the highest traffic website promoting Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) values, AVfM is indisputably MGTOW-central. This site has published several of groundbreaking essays on the topic, and has consistently promoted the lifestyle. In fact if we were to rename this website AVfMGTOW it would not be at odds with the work we do here.

While AVfM promotes MGTOW more vigorously than most, we need to acknowledge that Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRA's) have always promoted it in one form or another. It is no coincidence that the A in MHRA refers to advocacy, particularly self-advocacy by men and boys which is synonymous with the intent of MGTOW. So it should come as no surprise that two men from an early men's rights forum (Ragnar and Meikyo) actively promoted the phrase Men Going Their Own Way.

Ragnar, one of the promoters of the phrase describes the moment as follows:

> "You see all the ideas were floating around on the internet. We were frustrated that we couldn't get men to build an organization, couldn't get men to come to this damned meeting- everybody was going their own damned way, and the fact that men went their own way, we started to use that phrase and we started to talk about what's important for men… who's going to define their masculinity? Well, they actually have to do that themselves, they have to find out what it is for themselves. So, as you have the responsibility for your own actions, well then it's also your responsibility to define who you are as a man." Ragnar [1]

Back in 2010 Paul Elam agreed that MGTOW and MHRAs are one and the same. However there exists a minority who attempt to cleave MGTOW from its synonymy with the MHRM and 'offshore' it into supposedly non-MHRA enclaves. That experiment has succeeded in creating a logically false divide that doesn't stand up to scrutiny; simply put, the self-advocacy that is central to MGTOW is, and has always been, integral to the MHRM message and cannot be separated.

More interesting is the growth of ideas that have attached themselves to the concept that make it all but impossible to define what MGTOW is. So that will be the purpose of this article – to locate a single definition compatible with the variety of descriptions being proposed. This can be achieved by applying Occam's razor to all extraneous ideas and dogmas that have attached themselves to MGTOW – to those pet ideas that have hitched a ride on the core motive so that we end up with a short definition everyone agrees on.

We'll start here with a small sample of ideas and practices that have attached themselves to the MGTOW concept that can be considered superfluous to a limited definition that is going to suit everyone:

MHRAs are not MGTOW:
This claim is easily discounted. According to the core definition of MGTOW, many MHRAs are MGTOW, and claims that these are opposed orientations doesn't prove useful for constructing a definition.

Some claim that the 'A' in MHRA refers to the word activism and so must be about group-based political actions – hence unrelated to men's individual path to liberation. That argument, however, is based on a false premise, because a Google search reveals that the 'A' refers not only to activism but also to advocacy, including self-advocacy – at least for the majority who use the acronym. So the argument that MGTOW are working toward a goal opposite that of MHRAs amounts to a false and divisive proposition.

MGTOW is anti 'traditionalism':
This widespread and increasingly popular stance in the MGTOW movement was elaborated largely by Paul Elam and Barbarossaaa. Traditionalism refers to traditional gender roles for men and women, roles which most everyone in the MHRM/MGTOW movement reject as destructive to a man's wellbeing and freedom. However a small percentage of self-described MHRAs/MGTOW do advocate traditional gender roles, especially men in the earlier MRM who were split on this question with perhaps half endorsing traditionalism and half rejecting it.

Those advocating traditional gender roles claim men can enjoy significant freedom by stipulating what they are willing to accept as a viable and fair 'role-division' in relationships with women – a claim that can be demonstrated, they say, by a study of traditional males who embodied Sinatra's song "I Did It My Way." Whatever freedom these men pretend to enjoy they are still laboring within that narrow and self-limiting paradigm that requires male utility in exchange for a woman's charms, which means he continues to live the 'gynocentric way' even if he feels he is doing it "his way." The man must continue to labor outside the home and bring home the bacon, while his wife occupies herself as a homemaker. In terms of logical categories it's obvious that traditionalism and radical male autonomy are mutually exclusive, meaning that if traditionalists want a full taste of freedom they must, by definition, look for it outside of the traditionalist template.

Since the invention of 'romantic chivalry' in the Middle Ages (and not before), MGTOW men became an exception to the new rule, and those who continued to practice it were held in suspicion, shamed and rejected by society. The new gynocentric mandates viewed free men as recalcitrant, and from that moment in history society would no longer tolerate any man opting out of his gynocentric "duty" toward women. So I find myself in full agreement with Paul Elam and Barbarossaaa that traditionalism constitutes the antithesis of any coherent definition of MGTOW, a fact so blatant it can be considered implicit in the definition without the need state it.

Veto-MGTOW:
For some men MGTOW is demonstrated exclusively by veto power. Veto constitutes a narrow philosophical practice of negating things, which is nevertheless a perfectly acceptable expression of MGTOW. However some MGTOW tend to specialise in veto alone and have no other tool in their toolbox. About veto:

> 'This singular kind of power demonstrates agency dedicated wholly to negation. Its sole strength lies in its ability to frustrate the will of others… its power is wholly prohibitive, as the word originates from the Latin meaning: "I forbid".' [2]

Stating what you don't accept (veto) is a simple task compared with figuring out and articulating what you do want for your life. Living the MGTOW lifestyle usually includes a mixture of positive aspiration – such as figuring out the kind of friendships you might want to cultivate, or the career or hobby you might want to pursue – and is not limited merely to “I don’t want this, and I don’t believe that”. Veto-MGTOW naturally falls well short of a universal law for MGTOW.

MGTOW is anti-relationships with women:
The ‘no relationships’ position is supported by a small but vocal minority of the MGTOW community, and particularly by the veto-MGTOW contingent. Conversely, many MGTOW develop positive criteria for cultivating relationships with women on the basis of friendship or other relationships that may or may not include sexual relations depending on preference. For instance, in his recent discussion with Dean Esmay, Barbarossaaa –a respected MGTOW advocate- indicated that he engages in sexual friendships with women that include going out to dinner and other fun activities. The guiding principle for these men is that relations with women are workable if they can be based on creative agreements outside the usual gynocentric criteria, and can be backed with a determination to reject groupthink and societal pressure to conform to the typical male role.

Briffault’s law:
The 19th Century Marxist thinker Robert Briffault is remembered for this comment; “The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place.” This generalization has since been spun out and declared a “law” by some, though Briffault never proposed it as a law. Since it was first coined, others have added addendums and corollaries to this “law” which amount to little more than personal and unscientific opinions. Further, despite the current attempt in MGTOW blogger circles to revive this “law,” a review of the scientific literature shows no support nor even a reference to “Briffault’s Law” – nor is it mentioned in Google Scholar, not once. If anyone can find any academic sources that take this “law” seriously I would welcome a list of citations and will happily update this article to reflect them if provided.

A careful look at Briffault’s “Law” shows it to be two independent statements, with the second arguably more factual than the first. However both statements are too generalized to be useful as a law; yes it often happens that women can be controlling and, for example, may turn out not to like their man’s friends (because women derive no benefit from the association) and so drive them out, but men do this too, and both sexes are hardly 100% successful in doing so. In the latter cases we are talking about highly pathological behaviors in which case Briffault’s Law might better be characterized as “Briffault’s generalization about dysfunctional relationships.”

The implication of this “law” for men going their own way is that, because women supposedly dictate all relationship moves, the male is better off opting out of that power imbalance. Relationships are simply a bad deal. Understandably this assumption of a biology-based female omnipotence is not something universally subscribed to by the MGTOW community and therefore cannot be considered a basis for an agreed definition.

Male mother love:

This idea suggests that men's relationship aspirations are driven by an unconscious yearning for "mother" love, from which all MGTOW men should attempt to liberate themselves. Oedipus complex, anyone? Whatever the real influence of "mother" love this presents a historically tired argument for male motivation. It is one that no longer appears in the practice of psychology and for good reason; over 100 years of analysis have proven the theory of less value than first suspected, and the man who first theorized it as a "universal complex" is thought to have suffered the complex himself. Behaviorism, psychoanalysis and the long reign of the Oedipus complex have been superseded by contemporary attachment theory which has deepened our understanding and shown that male need for attachment and affection need not be linked to that word "mother".

None of this is to dismiss the pivotal importance of attachment desire in males, and there is much in the so-called "mother love" theory that warrants close and ongoing discussion. In fact the science of attachment is potentially one of the most fruitful paths of investigation for MGTOW there is. The issue here is that whilst promising, the discussion about adult attachment theory in relation to MGTOW is currently underdeveloped and is therefore of limited use as a theoretical base.

Female hypergamy:
This popular theory holds that when it comes to the mating game females can't resist "trading up" and therefore make unreliable mates for the long-term; it is better for men to avoid relationships with women and go their own way. A decisive piece of data confirming the practice of female hypergamy comes from a talk by Roy F. Baumeister who says that "maybe 80% of the women but only 40% of men reproduced" throughout the history of the human race. However according to follow-up research Baumeister's "maybe" turned out to be incorrect and the numbers have been superseded by more recent science.

The estimates on historic male/female population sizes are based on The Most Recent Common Ancestor for both males and females. At the time Baumeister's address where he publicized the 'findings' that 2 women reproduced for every 1 man, TMRCA for males was between 50-100 thousand years ago, and the TMRCA for females was 200,000 years ago; leading to a 2 to 1 split favouring female ancestors. Revised genetic studies have found that TMRCA for males is ~142,000 thousand years ago and the TMRCA for females is ~177,000 years ago. This means that Baumeister's conclusion is void. There is a slight skew towards female ancestors but this may be accounted for by female exogamy and the fact that female generations are shorter than male (women have children earlier then men do). It may also be an artifact of our current level of knowledge into the matter and as our science is refined, the numbers converge.

With the revised figures the importance of the female hypergamy to MGTOW is also revised; we now see a less extreme a picture than the earlier Baumeister figures painted and, one would assume, a somewhat less relevant ideological motivation for MGTOW.

Biological reductionism:
Men are viewed by some MGTOW as eternally groveling trilobites who will not change; they are merely nerve reactions to environmental stimuli with the ultimate aim of sexual reproduction with women.

The typical biological reductionist spends 99% of his conversation promoting human behavior as biologically determined, while meagerly acknowledging (if at all) the role culture plays in inhibiting or encouraging the release of our biological urges. Despite a reluctance to recognize it, cultural control of biology is an undeniable fact; and when a person's behaviour transgresses a social taboo, the transgressing individual stands a high chance of being incarcerated or killed by edict of the body politic. For instance if hypergamous behavior by women is subject to a taboo in a given culture, then if she transgresses it she may be (literally) stoned to death: score zero for the selfish-gene, and one for culture. Such punishment of "anomalous" behavior sends a message to others about how much of their biological compulsions will be tolerated, and people's behavior is adjusted to that threat accordingly. Conversely is it not true that some cultures encourage freedom of biological expression more than others? The point of these examples is that cultural dictates –and their wide fluctuations over time– provide the more powerful factor in determining the inhibition or release of biological imperatives.

We need to be wary, then, of those who would explain human behavior as constistent and relatively changeless over long swathes of time and regardless of cultural contexts. This angle is strongly promoted by MGTOW advocate Stardusk whose primary hypothesis goes like this:

> "This has been going on for millennia if not millions of years- men have always kowtowed and adhered to the desires of women, and have always been what women wanted them to be. Men have always subordinated their desire for freedom to their desire to reproduce." [3]

Stardusk further claims that men (one assumes, aside from himself) will never change from their unconscious kowtowing ways. Not only does this hypothesis ignore the wild fluctuations in culture that saw, for example, men of classical times behave much more freely in relation to women than they did, say, in the Middle Ages, it also promotes a reductionist and patently misandric hypotheses about men that is unlikely to gain traction as an explanatory basis for MGTOW.

Any of these topics can serve legitimate interests for MGTOW; but the question arises of what binds these disparate ideas together? In order to find a definition of MGTOW we must find a degree of general consensus, some shared factor among the variety of perspectives, or otherwise MGTOW will end up talking about entirely different things. And if there were no common consensus here we would merely have debaters talking about different subjects; one would be talking about female hypergamy and the other would be talking about celibacy with no common ground between them.

So we will need a universally applicable definition that will fit everyone's criteria for what MGTOW is in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. This definition must be a limited one since it can encompass only those parts of MGTOW which all broader definitions hold in common. For this essay the definition is this: Male self-determination.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses MGTOW holds in common regarding the concept. Note in this definition there is no reference to the disputed ideas or practices listed above. Some might insist on including those ideas in the base definition – to piggyback it with a whole range of idiosyncratic concepts – but that is of no use here, for beyond this narrow definition people basically disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon as the universally applicable definition.

Self-determination refers simply to the human right to determine the course of one's life, and to apply self-advocacy in that direction. And let's not forget that the 'A' in MHRA can refer to precisely the same advocacy. Self-determination and self-advocacy were always there for men who chose it long before the MGTOW acronym provided another way to say it. We can also state that implicit in this definition is opposition to, and rejection of gynocentrism as being the antithesis of male self-determination. Men who subscribe to gynocentric directives, such as profeminist men, are subscribing to 'other-determination,' or 'determination of self by other' and need not apply for MGTOW status.

This article has aimed at three things. It carves away superfluous ideas from a core definition of MGTOW; it offers a concise definition of MGTOW; and it takes back MGTOW from those who would cleave it from its relevance to the Men's Human Rights Movement.

AVfM has churned out hundreds of articles promoting self-determination for men, and it has done so more vigorously than it has commentaries and articles calling for specific political activism. If one wants to soak themselves in a MGTOW atmosphere they need go no further than this high quality MGTOW community that showcases articles and interviews on every aspect of the subject.

A further development worth mentioning is the notion of Women Going Their Own Way (WGTOW). While the persecution of men by gynocentric culture is unique, there exist solid albeit different reasons for women to reject it, including the infantilizing dogma and gender bigotry it pressures women to adopt. The uncommon woman who chooses to renounce gynocentrism in favor of a different path deserves the 'going their own way' title announcing self-determination. As long as women use the 'W' I take no offence to WGTOW. In fact I applaud it as another slap in the face for gynocentrism.

And remember, folks, you heard it here first – at MGTOW central.*

SOURCES

[1] Dialogue with MGTOW Founders (2012)
[2] Hillman, J., Veto, chapter in 'Kinds of Power' p.196, (1995)
[3] Stardusk On the Men in the Matrix
[4] Elam, Paul., A Voice for Men
[5] Barbarossaaa, YouTube Channel
[6] Davison, Diana., Women Going Her Own Way
[7] Esmay, Dean., Youtube Channel
[8] AVfM Wiki Glossary of terms: MGTOW

[9] References for Hypergamy section:

Is There Anything Good About Men?
Genetic Evidence for Unequal Population Sizes of Human Females and Males
A revised root for the human Y chromosomal phylogenetic tree
"Copernican" Reassessment of the Human Mitochondrial DNA Tree
Estimators of human effective sex ratio detect sex biases on different timescales
Note: In calling AVfM 'MGTOW central' I am not claiming it is more important or authoritative than any other MGTOW website, but merely that it receives more traffic – a testament to the high quality articles found here. MGTOW is a truly decentralised movement that will never be owned by any person or website.

Don’t be that anti-rape campaign

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 21 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor’s Note: This is the transcript of the video by Karen Straughan that AVfM published here a few days ago. We note again that Karen often goes off-page when performing her videos and so there may be small differences between the two versions. Additionally, the editors at AVfM have added some links to the events that Karen describes herein.

Okay, it’s been a crazy week, for sure.

I know I don’t have to inform many people of the frothy-with-outrage turd that hit the media fan middle of last week, when a Women’s Studies professor, among others, took offence to some posters my brothers-in-arms dared to put up on the University of Alberta campus.

The posters were a parody/criticism of the popular “Don’t Be That Guy” poster campaign, which reminds men it’s wrong and a crime to put your penis in girls who are so drunk they’ve passed out or are otherwise unable to resist. Men’s Rights Edmonton’s posters aimed a different message at a different type of criminal–women who make false rape accusations–admonishing women to “Don’t Be That Girl”.

Women’s Studies Professor Lise Gotell claimed that our posters are “rape apology”. I have no idea how a poster raising awareness of some situations where an accusation is made but no rape has occurred is rape apology. If no rape occurred, there is no rape to apologize or make excuses for.

Other feminists, politically correct politicians and slaves to their reptilian brains claimed the campaign “blames victims for their rapes”. Um, guys, in a false accusation, there is no rape victim to blame, only a false accuser. The ACTUAL victim of a false accusation is the person accused.

Karen Smith, a sexual assault advocate/counsellor emphasized how brave a victim has to be to go to strangers and have them physically and mentally probe you about things that happened to the most intimate parts of your body, which is certainly true. What does not follow is her assertion that that’s why people “just don’t lie” about rape.

Well, Ms. Smith, setting aside the fact that according to the police, at least 1-2% of the women who engage the process clearly do lie about rape, well, if nothing bad had happened to the most intimate parts of your body–that is, if there was no rape–the process would be a very different experience, wouldn’t it? Ms. Smith seems so obsessed with the experiences of victims, she is unable to detach the victim experience from that of a non-victim. She actually seems to believe non-victims would feel all the same things when going through the process that victims do, which really makes me wonder.

For a malicious false accuser, the rape kit would be no different from a pap-smear and pelvic exam, something most women submit to on a regular basis. In fact, given the reason for the physical exam, I would hazard to guess a rape kit would be less brusque and more gentle than a yearly physical. For a malicious false accuser, the interviews with police would be little more than an exercise in amateur theater. Seriously, does Ms. Smith think that every actress who portrays a rape victim on Law and Order experiences the simulated “gruelling process” the way a real victim experiences the real thing? If they did, how would producers ever find enough actresses willing to take those roles?

Other types of false accusers would experience the process yet other ways. For the narcissistic accuser who makes a false complaint for attention, she will be experiencing it the way a sufferer of Münchausen syndrome experiences unnecessary medical testing–with a sick thrill. For the false accuser who is covering up an infidelity or explaining away an STD [Sexually Transmitted Disease] or pregnancy, the process will be experienced as the unpleasant but necessary means to solve a bigger problem.

Ms. Smith’s faulty logic is what happens when you spend your entire life looking at only one problem, studying only one phenomenon from only one angle to the exclusion of everything else, until you reach a point where you cram all experiences into one narrow model.

"It just doesn't happen," she insists. Because the process for real victims is so gruelling.

Perhaps Karen Smith needs to talk to Soner Yasa, an Edmonton cab driver falsely accused of sexual assault in 2006 by 4 female passengers out clubbing. Their reason for making the accusation? Yasa had told one of them to put out her cigarette, as smoking in taxi cabs is illegal. They then demanded to be dropped off, and refused to pay the $13 cab fare. When Yasa protested, they called their friends and told them Yasa had sexually assaulted them. The cabbie called police when a mob began to form, and the women repeated their accusation to the responding officer, who filed a report on the incident.

But what do you know? Yasa had a camera installed in his cab, which had recorded the entire trip, and provided incontrovertible evidence that the women had made up the accusation out of whole cloth.

Why would a woman lie about rape to police, wonders Karen Smith? To save $13 bucks, apparently.

Or because a man threw a flower at her; because she was bored; to divert her parents' attention from her failing grades; because a man she'd had a one-off a couple of weeks before forgot her name when they ran into each other; to convince her husband to move to a better neighborhood; because she didn't want to pay for a cab and knew the police would drive her home; so the police wouldn't drop her off at the psychiatric ward again; because she didn't want to admit to her boyfriend that she'd spent the night cheating on him with three men.

A lesbian activist in the U.S. carved Christian symbols into her own body and claimed three white, Christian men had broken into her home, assaulted, tortured and raped her. Irony of ironies, she staged the attack to draw attention to the cause of fighting homophobia and violence against women.

For a woman willing to carve her own body up to make a martyr of herself, is the gruelling nature of the process of reporting really going to be a deterrent? Is it, when a different false accuser is prepared to engage this gruelling process just to get a free lift home, or to get out of paying $13.

One of the ladies who accused Soder Yasa was kind enough to phone police the next morning to apologize for the trouble and to assure them that none of the women were planning on going through the "gruelling process" of pursuing a sexual assault charge against Yasa. Hah!

Cream on the cake? The police refused to pursue charges against the women for making a false accusation, despite Yasa's urging, despite incontrovertible proof they were lying, and despite the fact that that evidence was all that saved HIM from having to go through his own "gruelling process"–the process of defending himself not just to the justice system, but to friends, family, neighbors and present and future employers.

In light of that, I'd be very interested to know how the Edmonton Police Service classifies a false complaint. Would Yasa's case fall into that 1 or 2% of sexual assault complaints where evidence of falsity is so obvious, the police trip over it while looking for evidence of veracity? Or was it not even counted because the women never filed an official complaint of sexual assault, and it was never passed on to a dedicated sex assault investigator?

I wonder, too, how Karen Smith, victim advocate, thinks a rape victim might feel or react if police said to her, "Well, sure we know he raped you. We have air-tight evidence on video. But we think pursuing a prosecution would send too troubling a message to victims of other crimes, so yeah. We're just going to let it drop." Because that's exactly the mentality behind the Edmonton Police's refusal to press charges in Yasa's case.

City councillor and mayoral hopeful Don Iveson called the "Don't Be That Girl" posters "morally indefensible". Um…explain how? Please. Because the ONLY reason I can think of that our posters are morally indefensible is the same reason the original ones are–that it associates the behavior of a small percentage of a group of people to the group itself. The only difference being that men are a much higher percentage of rape victims and women a much higher percentage of perpetrators than the original posters would indicate, while false rape accusations are a predominantly female phenomenon. Even if our posters are as morally indefensible as the originals, at least they're accurate.

The Edmonton Police Service said the posters "demeaned and belittled" rape victims. You know what, EPS? I've talked to a few rape victims, and if there's one person they typically hate almost as much as a rapist, it's a false rape accuser. Women who make false accusations–who appropriate the horrible thing that some unfortunate women experience, and exploit that horrible thing to get out of paying $13–THOSE are the people demeaning and belittling the experiences of rape victims. And by extension, a justice system that refuses to punish women who lie about rape is demeaning and belittling the experiences of rape victims, and allowing false accusers to damage the credibility of every legitimate victim without any accountability for the harm they do. And it demeans and belittles a justice system that is supposed to protect ALL victims, including victims of false accusations.

Pretending women never lie about rape is not only dishonest, it sends a despicable message to victims. "Women never lie about rape," tells victims they should always be believed, on the spot, and therefore the normal investigative process is a revictimization rather than a necessary evil. It tells them that when the police ask questions they have to ask, to ferret out details, detect inconsistencies and test the veracity of the claim, it's not because some women lie and investigators are performing due diligence, but because the police are intentionally making the process more difficult than it has to be, and obviously don't want to help them.

As for the real reason everyone involved lost their shit over these posters, I personally think it's a reflection of the age-old double standard. There is no social taboo against attacking men, so it's okay to imply that without constant reminding, ordinary guys will just go around raping left, right and center because they're too stupid to understand what consent is, or they're so sex-obsessed they'll be interested in sex with a woman whose physical state is that of a half-inflated sex-doll, only with the bonus feature of being able to puke all over him.

In fact, because of the double standard, this message is lauded high and low as a positive one.

But apply the exact same reasoning and method to remind women that making a false rape accusation is a crime, and people act like you've just tossed a kitten in a blender and hit frappe. You are not allowed to even acknowledge the small percentage of women who dishonestly and callously exploit society's justifiable contempt for men who rape, for revenge, an alibi or attention. Any acknowledgement that some small percentage of women are shitty enough to lie about rape is translated as an attack on all women, especially rape victims. The very fact that some people have interpreted the posters as saying that all rape accusations are false is a silent condemnation of the originals as saying that all men would rape if you only just forget to remind them not to every 15 minutes.

As for the legitimacy of our campaign–it's a legitimate criticism of that double standard, and has hopefully led to a lot more public criticism of another double standard–how the system treats crime depending on the sex of the victim. I mean, heck, what's the problem with sacrificing a cab driver or some other penis-bearing schmuck here and there by denying them justice and refusing to hold false accusers accountable (or even acknowledge they exist), if there's even the tiniest chance it might convince more women to report their rapes? It might destroy a few men's lives, but if there's any chance at all that it will help a few women, then it's all evened out.

And frankly, while it may arguably be that people differ on what they think of as sexual assault, EVERYONE knows that the thing called sexual assault, however defined, is a crime. But judging by the outcome of the Soder Yasa case, even the police don't know making a false complaint of rape is a crime. And judging by the female passengers' very generous decision to not charge the cab driver with sexual assault after video evidence exonerated him and IMPLICATED THEM, there are plenty of women who apparently don't realize it's a crime, either.

Anyway. This entire kerfuffle has got me thinking more about the "don't be that guy" campaign, and all the reasons I believe it's not the "positive message" its proponents believe it is. Not even for women.

People who are familiar with me will know why "don't be that guy" is a negative message for men. It paints all men as potential sexual predators. It smears all men with the stain of a behavior confined to a small percentage of men and women, and associates masculinity, rather than narcissism and sociopathy, with rape.

It does nothing to address the responsibility of women for keeping themselves safe, especially when they're drinking, but instead pretends that if we just bludgeon men long enough with this particular message women will eventually just BE safe. It portrays women as toddlers who can't be trusted to drink responsibly or plan ahead, and portrays men as rapists or rapists-in-waiting.

Like nearly every feminist-spearheaded awareness campaign regarding sexual assault, it ignores the problem of sexual assaults against men, as well as those committed by women. In the kabuki play of sexual assault discourse, the only role available for men is perpetrator, and the only role available for women is victim.

This is really all just the same old bullshit that MRAs have been talking about for god only knows how long, despite all the efforts by feminists to scream us out of the discussion.

But I also wanted to get into a few of the reasons that "don't be that guy" is, in my opinion, a misleading, misguided and potentially harmful message to send to women.

First, it assumes that there exists some vast number of men who just don't understand consent. Who don't realize that molesting a passed out woman, or that getting a woman so drunk she can't physically resist when you hold her down and fuck her is morally wrong, and a crime. It also assumes there is a vast number of men who, when an enthusiastically consenting woman is unavailable to them, will go ahead and have sex with one who is borderline comatose, drooling and possibly covered in her own vomit. This can only generate a fear in women that is very much misplaced.

Even setting aside question of how well men understand or don't understand consent, or whether they do or don't think sex with an incapacitated woman is rape (or a different crime, or wrong, or gross, or mean–something feminists never seem to ask in their surveys), the concept behind the "don't be that guy" posters depends on the assumption that there is this huge population of men who are interested enough in sex with an unconscious woman, or one who is not enjoying herself but unable to fend off his advances, that lots of them might be willing to give it a try, at least once.

And this is simply not the case.

Researcher Dr. David Lisak, who has done extensive study on "undetected rapists" on campuses, says schools put too much faith in "teachable moments", and too much stock in the idea that a rapist is a man who just "made a terrible mistake or error in judgment, and can learn to be a better person out of it." According to Lisak's analysis of the self-reported rapes of college men, the one-time offender who learned his lesson, at best, represents 1/3 of offenders, 2% of all men, and is responsible for only 10% of college rapes.

Now maybe these guys, this 2% of men, are guys who don't understand consent, or don't know it's a crime, or who can learn a lesson and go on to be a better person after realizing they hurt someone. I say maybe, because to my knowledge, Lisak hasn't portrayed them this way. Regardless, they are responsible for only 10% of college rapes.

The other 90% of college rapes are perpetrated by repeat offenders. 2/3 of offenders–just 4% of the general population of men–commit nearly all the rapes on campus.

Not just that, this 4% of the men in the sample committed 28% of all the other self-reported violence, such as slapping an intimate partner, minor sexual assaults like groping, general assault, or abusing children.

These are men who hurt people, who know they're hurting people, and who do it anyway.

And while Lisak acknowledges these men do not typically describe what they do as rape, they seem very, very aware that their victims are not consenting. They brag about how clever they are in circumventing a victim's ability to refuse consent. They talk about targeting the most vulnerable women, and maneuvering and manipulating them in ways that make them even more immediately vulnerable, and about the measures they take afterward to discourage their victims from reporting the sex as an assault.

How do they convince victims not to tell? Emotionally manipulating the victim to self-blame is a common one noted by Lisak. Or hey, maybe he convinces her he thought she wanted it (was confused about consent), or maybe he even guilts her into not reporting by claiming to be a regular guy who just made a single terrible error in judgement but he can learn from it and become a better person?

I would find it absolutely ironic if the myth these posters are perpetuating–that lots of guys just don't realize what they're doing is hurting someone and a crime–came from accounts victims made to rape counsellors after being lied to by their rapists. The rapist lies to his victim, and then the victim repeats the lie as if it's true, and then all of a sudden we have people thinking rapists rape women because they just don't know any better, but with enough education they can figure it out.

And then you have a feedback loop, where these posters essentially confirm to a woman that the narcissistic, sociopathic, piece of shit who raped her really might be what he says–just a regular guy who made one mistake, and not a guy who's probably done it before and will again–because hey, these posters imply that this kind of thing happens all the time.

That's the "positive message" sent by these posters: that the small percentage of men who rape over and over and are responsible for almost all campus rapes, is actually a large population of regular guys who make one mistake and are capable of learning from it, or capable of being educated into not making that mistake in the first place.

These posters do nothing to tell women what actual rapists are like, do nothing to inform them of the cluster of behavioral and personality traits associated with the recidivist responsible for nearly all campus rapes–narcissism, entitlement, superficial charm, and general aggression and violence. These posters, in fact, imply to women that the man who raped them might not be the repeat offender responsible for 90% of rapes, that maybe he hasn't done it before and maybe he won't do it again.

And that's a dangerous message in a culture where, according to many, only 10% of rape victims report their rapes. Because honestly, if I'd been raped, and my rapist had convinced me that it was all just a big misunderstanding, and that he could learn from it and wouldn't do it again, and I had heard tons of public rhetoric implying, "well, yeah, that kind of thing happens all the time," I might not be willing to put myself through the "gruelling process" of reporting just for my own sake, or to destroy a regular guy's life over one error.

But if I knew that 90% of the time, he's done it before and will do it again to someone else, you can be damn sure I'd be thinking about all his past and future victims, and schlepping myself down to the police station to report.

As for the stated target of these posters–the rapists themselves–well, that 4% of men responsible for 90% of rapes, who are recidivist predators and perpetrate a hugely disproportionate percentage of all other violence? Does anyone think a poster campaign like this is going to change their behavior?

Hell, Elton Yarborough, a student at Texas A&M who was linked to five rapes before he was finally put in prison, still insists he never broke the law, despite describing in detail the very acts that got him convicted of rape. One of the most disturbing things about this case is that he allegedly did it again to another woman after he was charged with rape.

If a criminal conviction isn't enough to convince a rapist that having sex with a woman while she's drunk and unconscious, something he did four times to four different women, and allegedly a fifth time after he'd been charged with rape–if a rape conviction isn't enough to convince him what he did was a crime, what good does anyone think posters telling rapists it's a crime are gonna do?

The "don't be that guy" campaign does nothing to prevent rape. All it does is perpetuate a potentially dangerous myth about rapists, and point an accusing finger at the 94% of men–the only men this message will have any effect on–who don't rape women.

You want to decrease rape? Get the recidivist rapists out of the population. Best way to do that with a poster campaign? Target it at women, and educate THEM. The message should be, "He's probably lying to you. 90% of rapes are committed by a man who's done it before and will do it again. Speak up."

"Don't be that guy" needs to go, because 94% of guys aren't that guy, and the few who are that guy are sociopathic pieces of shit who don't give a fuck about hurting others, and who like being that way.

The effect campaigns like this have on public sentiment about men, and men's feelings about themselves is that rape is just something men do, rather than something sociopaths do. That's just one of the many lies feminists tell to convince everyone men are the problem. And those lies sure seem to convince a lot of people, including a lot of men, that what's wrong with society has a male face.

I have no doubt these dishonest posters will stay up, no matter how bigoted and potentially harmful they are. Because, what's one more campaign pinning yet another human evil on masculinity, even if it might be inadvertently harming women as well as men? It's just a drop in the bucket.

Links:

http://www.ctvnews.ca/video?playlistId=1.1361457

'Men's rights' group defends posters claiming women lie about rape

http://www.cbc.ca/player/News/Canada/Edmonton/ID/2396322522/

Monday Roundup for 22 July 2013

Dean Esmay · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Howdy y'all. This week we're going to be exploring a subject that's been important to A Voice for Men since it began: Men Going Their Own Way. There has developed a perception in the last couple of years of a big divide between Men's Human Rights Activists and Men Going Their Own Way, but from our perspective that has always been a strong and artificial divide, especially since MGTOW grew straight out of old-school MRA circles and was considered an MRA point of view! We'll be publishing a lot on that this week, so stay tuned.

Now, before I even get you a full TWO WEEKS of cool stuff you may have missed here on AVfM, I thought I'd mention, as we did earlier today, that there is to be a planned outage–repeat, planned outage–of AVfM tomorrow morning (that would be, Wednesday morning) at 5:30am Central Time. AVfM should be down for an hour or less on the front page and forums. Do not panic. It shall return. There's just a problem with the hard drive and some other things that require minor surgery and some updates that require a restart. With any luck most of you will never even notice.

So it also happened that in the craziness last week a Monday Roundup was canceled. But that's OK, this just means you get two, two, TWO weeks in just ONE update! How much more can you ask for?

But wait, there's more! Before we get to some cool stuff right here on AVfM, there's a few things going on off of AVfM you might want to check out. AVfM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan (aka Girl Writes What) recently was asked by Men's Rights Edmonton to reply to a public piece trashing the recent "Don't Be That Girl." She did so, in Troy Media, and a thorough trashing of those who didn't see the truth in Men's Rights Edmonton's satire it was. She might have placed more emphasis on the reality of female sex predators but hey, whaddya want for nothing?

Also, we've been continuing to follow the story of Mark Halburn in Putnam Count West Virginia, where the court system seems to regularly make a mockery of the very idea of "rule of law" and much more about "rule of crony judges." We'll be printing a longer piece on Halburn's victimization by both the family courts and the West Virginia Supreme Court, but there are ongoing updates about it on PutnamLive, and it appears that the legal journal West Virginia Record has noticed some of the same things we have. I once joked that when cousins marry in West Virginia they issue the progeny a robe and gavel. I am increasingly wondering if that's really too cruel to say to the offspring of cousins.

Finally, in other off-site news, AVfM's respected forum and front page contributor Victor Zen has new web site full of geeky MHRA-friendly goodness. Go check it out.

Here's materials on AVfM itself you don't want to miss:

First off, kicking off our Men Going Their Own Way theme this week is a must-read article by Peter Wright entitled A Voice for Men: MGTOW-Central. Note that Peter's been MGTOW for more than 10 years. Has he noticed something some newer MGTOWs haven't?

Also, Andy Thomas asks Why are men opting out of relationships?. Like many, Andy used to think there was an MHRA/MGTOW divide. He came to realize it's really two sides of the same coin: a rejection of gynocentrism and a rational rejection of a mindset and culture that treats men and boys like disposable sub-humans. While in a much more humorous vein, Diana Davison has a highly witty piece about what happened when a group of Feminists went to MGTOWN.

But that's not all, so stay tuned, there's a LOT more on MGTOW–in history, in science, in philosophy–to come to our pages this week.

In the last two weeks we also saw tragedy, as despite the best efforts of countless MHRAs including Girl Writes What, JTO, myself, Typhonblue, Robert O'Hara and the news team, and step-up volunteers Scott Kelly, Scott Stoley, and Sean Campbell, the vile Mary Kellett was let off the hook and given a ridiculous wrist-slap by gutless "Justice" Ellen Gorman of Maine. Vladek Filler, who is likely only one of Mary Kellett's victims, gave an impassioned statement about it and then spoke to A Voice for Men About this tragedy.

We pledge not to let Mary Kellett be forgotten, nor her obviously incompetent and almost certainly corrupt boss Carletta Bossano.

Diana Davison was not surprised by the result given how the system works. But you know what? We've only just begin shedding light on these things. For example:

Hi there Angela Corey! We just noticed you, and aren't you just the cutest little thing? We can't wait to get to know you better. This is going to be so much fun!

Speaking of legal fun, a hate group in Edmonton calling itself SAVE tried to threaten us. Our answer was to tell them and their legal team to go fuck themselves.

Also in legal news, AVfM took little notice of the George Zimmerman/Trayvon Martin saga while it was ongoing but the unstoppable August Løvenskiolds noticed some unstated prejudices in that saga that he opts to state plainly. It may make some people uncomfortable but it looks to have more truth to it than a lot of people would like to admit. And attorney RK Hendrick (author of How to Avoid Getting Screwed While Getting Laid, was recently aghast as a retired prosecutor, defense attorney, and judge at indefensible behavior by a female police officer.

In the middle of all this, you may have missed that we recently brought on board Anil Kumar as our Indian news director.

As if all that weren't enough, the crew over at Men's Rights Edmonton have been very, very naughty boys. So shameful, so awful. They actually had the temerity to attack misandrist, bigoted, hateful "anti-rape" posters (from a group that's pretty obviously pro-rape since it's where they make their money) with satire posters that parodied them. I mentioned telling some of the critics to fuck off, but I think nobody gave a better tear-apart and breakdown of the rape hysterics' bigotry than that judgy, bitchy Janet Bloomfield: Let's talk about those rape posters is probably the definitive defense of the satire and flaying of the original hate-posters they were put up in response to you'll ever read.

For a more scholarly take on the false rape culture (and the destruction it causes), you should also not miss Della Burton's analysis of just how bad feminist double-standards on rape really is. Or her analysis of how those parodied rape posters really were are all about the money and marginalizing male victims–and that's not hyperbole. Although, not to be outdone, Girl Writes What had her own masterful jiu-jitsu takedown of the hateful hysterics. Oh, does anyone but me notice just how many women have come out of the woodwork to speak eloquently, passionately, and knowledgeably on this issue? Yeah. The monopoly of the Gender Ideologues on things like this isn't over just because of men, it's because of women like this.

Della also helps remind the rape hysteria set just how serious false allegations can be by recounting Seven years in hell. Do these people have no humanity, no souls?

These are women who, as Jim Doyle notes, appear to be a part of a growing trend of women who are tired of Damseling as a lifestyle choice.

But of course it's not just women's voices speaking out. We sure wish more men would have their balls. In fact, JTO rips us all a new one for our indifference in the face of systemic corruption, both political and legal. It seems we're all content to wait for someone else to fix it while we chow down on our cheese covered wacky fries watching the big game. When will men wake up and understand, that when the guy next to you on the firing line goes down, you're next.

Nationally noted American poet and critic Dan Schneider recently joined our roster of contributors with Cancer, prostates, and heroes: and by the way, have you bitten the bullet and gotten yours checked? I have. Meanwhile, sportswriter Ty Henry has noticed the selective silence of sports media on violent women.

JTO, as usual, rocks the house by examining how shame is used as a weapon of compliance, and how to stop letting it be used against you, while Lucian Vâlsan says the European Union is stamping out economic freedom by giving in to Gender Ideologues.

In more personal matters, Phil in Utah recently helped his grandfather to die with dignity, and has thoughts on how to help a man do just that.

Gonzo Historian Robert St. Estephe has been working overtime lately and has returned with a story that will seem very familiar to many fathers today: in 1936 William H. W. Evans was jailed for kidnapping his daughter based on accusations by his ex-wife; he went on a hunger strike to protest as he had a written agreement to share custody. The only difference to today? That written agreement actually mattered to the Judge. Gosh, you mean family court judges once actually enforced written contracts and orders in men's favor? What a wonderful era that must have been.

Robert also notes the reality that there have been women who acted honorably and with courage all along. Why does history forget them? No matter, Robert won't let it.

Robert also continues his project to educate people away from the myth that female serial killers are particularly odd. Although it's chilling and sickening, Death on the baby farm will help us keep the evil that women are capable of in the public conscience. (By the way did you know women commit the majority of everyday child abuse? Yeah you'd never know it to read the headlines these days would you?)

But it's all different now, isn't it? I mean, only some women keep slaves, right?

By the way, with all the other craziness was going around us, we also missed this little feast of pleasure by Janet Bloomfield, so please don't miss Fuck you, Amanda Marcotte. (Just a side note, can you say "fuck you" to Amanda Marcotte often enough? I don't think you can, but I suppose it's possible. I think we should all endeavor to test that hypothesis, don't you?)

Speaking of that postering campaign by those very bad wicked boys and girls at Men's Rights Edmonton, Robert O'Hara and James Huff held a radio show inviting feminists to come and give their perspective on it in an open and robust debate where they would have ample room to make their points. They didn't appear to show but, Robert O'Hara noticed something peculiar that leads us to believe a whole lot of them were there, and just didn't have the guts to say anything useful. That would be such a surprise.

John Hembling also wondered why Edmonton's Karen Smith would lie. I think maybe if you read some of what Della wrote about that I linked above, you'd have some clue why Edmonton's Karen Smith might lie her ass off… for a living.

So much has happened in the last two weeks it's hard to remember that Australia's vile Prime Minister, Julia GIllard, was fired. You know things are hopping when in barely a month's time you've forgotten the thrilling news that a hatemongering ideologue and idiot who led one of the world's greatest countries got ousted. So just to help you remember to keep celebrating, and to remind you that some of the paint-by-numbers responses were predictable, Jim Muldoon absolutely skewered those who find Julia Gillard's ousting was ominous. No it wasn't, you hateful ideologues, it was auspicious.

If you're tired of politics, Jared White had some great observations on on Superman, Lois Lane, Ripley from the Alien series, and more. As someone who was actually around in the 1980s, I'm astonished by how far we've gone downhill since back then.

By the way, did I mention that we might want to test the hypothesis that it's impossible to say "fuck you" to Amanda Marcotte too often? I think we might want to test it on Jessica Valenti too. August Løvenskiolds didn't exactly say it, but he skewered the dumbass sellout dimwit pretty damned well anyway.

Well this roundup's getting long enough, so I'm going to close it out by telling you not to forget our terrific video section chock full of goodies, note once again that there's always plenty of interesting listening on A Voice for Men

Radio, and oh, by the way, after that whole two weeks? welcome home Paul Elam. With two weeks this damned exciting, maybe you should vacation more often.

See you all in 7!

5,000,000 thank yous

Paul Elam · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Some words of thanks, some thoughts on recent events and, oh yeah, 5,000,000 visits to this website.

After several years with no vacations (even the trips I took in the past were marked by looking for internet hot spots and letting my partner know I would be ready to go do things with her "in just a bit"). I finally took two weeks off and almost completely unplugged from AVFM.

Of course, all hell broke loose when I did.

I am going to offer some of my belated impressions of these events, but first some thanks, many actually, are in order.

The only reason I was able to take some extended – and badly needed – time off is because of people who anteed in to make sure that this site ran smoothly, perfectly, without so much as my lifting a finger while I was gone. With that a tip of the hat and thanks to TyphonBlue, who began organizing things in the admin weeks before I left and who has ensured a copious amount of quality content has flowed through these pages, all of it accented with great artwork.

And that is just the part of her work that you actually got to see. There was a lot more going on from her than just scheduling articles and making cool images.

She was also joined in the graphics wizardry by Europa from our forums who added his own style to the visual presentation.

Line editing for articles was churned out like a ma-cheen from Peter Write (Tawil), August Lovenskiolds and Della Burton.

Just for those of you who don't know, line editing is one of the most mentally arduous, thankless tasks that must be done in any online publication.

And if it is not done, everything looks like shit, regardless of how good everything else is. It is one of the most important functions here, and we are all grateful beyond words for those that are willing to carry the load.

Della Burton also stepped up to join the news team and has been doing a fantastic job posting her work under "AVFM News and Commentary" so that you can have more straight news reporting on what is happening in the world that impacts the things we care about. Della, please take a bow.

Dean Esmay was hard at work the whole time with our new server administrator (yes, we finally have a real server admin!) David King. David and Dean have been busy ensuring that site security and performance will be operating on a level consistent with an online publication this well-traveled. There is more to come on that, but suffice it to say for now that David is manna from heaven in some areas that are badly needed but terribly expensive to address.

It is the stuff you don't see that can be so costly on websites, and David is graciously stepping up to handle much of that for us.

Tip of the hat to both of these fine gents.

Oh, and by the way, their work could not have come at a better time since Alek Novy and team are now at work on AVFM 3.0! Yes, you heard that correctly, another major facelift is on the way for A Voice for Men, courtesy of Alek, et al, who first put us on the map with the fine design you are currently enjoying. That will not be happening this week, but the work is underway and I will keep you posted as things develop.

Also, shortly before I left for vacation, we were gifted with another major step up with the addition of The Man on the Street (TMOTS), who now does not give a damn if you know his name is Al Martin, a long time MHRA with a great reputation, as the administrator of our forums. Al has extensive experience in this area, both on the technical side of things and on matters of moderation and management.

He has joined our weekly staff meetings and will be working hard to improve the forum and to enhance the interrelationship between the forums and the main site. Kudos to our brother TMOTS for bringing our forums exactly what is needed.

I hope these thank yous have covered everyone (and I apologize profusely to anyone I missed). I worry about that especially given how many quality people are now involved in making AVFM a success well into the future. More on that in a bit, but first some thoughts on recent events.

As most of you undoubtedly know at this point, while I was gone Mary Kellett got a slap on the wrist for egregious and wanton prosecutorial malfeasance, and then had the slap suspended by Supreme Court Judge Ellen Gorman, who has obviously lost sight of any idea of justice in favor of cronyism and criminality. She did this with the helpful assistance of Bar Counsel Scott Davis who was supposed to represent the interests of the people of Maine, not enable their legal abuse by rogue prosecutors.

To be clear, it was a bad day, and a great disappointment. But I refuse to see this as a defeat. For the first time in history a prosecutor in Maine at least had to go through a trial, both by The Bar and by the public. It was a trial that she, and the Ellsworth prosecutors office lost, miserably. They are permanently stained and it is now a matter of public record.

We are early in this effort to take prosecutors to task. It is new ground for a new mentality that we are working hard to foment in the minds of the public. We may have lost a significant part of this one battle, but the war is far from over.

Much of this is because of you. Your letters to politicians and media outlets; your comments at Bangor Daily News. Your persistence forced more of this story into public view than it would ever have seen without you. You gave us a foothold on fighting the larger battle, and we will not squander it.

Then there is Vladek Filler. Fuck, I wish I had this man's courage. Can you imagine having the corrupt machine of Ellsworth justice hanging over your head every day for years like the Sword of Damocles, and still fighting? And still being defiant, every day, year after year?

It is like standing naked in a hurricane.

They went after this man with everything they had. In my mind, he beat them, on sheer guts. He fought to the bitter end, and today he stands a free man, a loving father with his children by his side. The exact opposite of what they wanted and what those horrible people had planned for him.

If we ever get around to activism awards here, and we should, my vote is for the Filler Award.

Thank you Vladek, I am proud and humbled to know you.

And of course the other big deal around here has been postergate. There is not a great deal to say about that except to issue a thank you to Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton for sparking renewed interest in meme posters that discredit feminism – for making them more powerful than they were before. Suckers.

We will be making parodies of all your future work and have them available for download at this site. If you don't like it you can sue us instead of just strutting like banty roosters and making empty threats.

Not likely to happen though, bullies and thugs prefer to have targets who don't stand up for themselves.

And with that I want to return to the thanks I was making for a moment. Actually, I want to offer that tip of the hat also to James Huff, Robert O'Hara, Lucian Valsan and others who reacted to the threats and some of the more sloppy handling of the story by mainstream media, where swill has become salt and subpar is now par.

All the people at AVFM Radio and many on the main site, reacted with speed and precision to rebut the mainstream fallacies, bring the story to you with clarity, and did so as one humming unit.

And that says a lot more about AVFM in general these days than it does just the last two weeks of my vacation. AVFM, thanks to the many talented people running it with nothing more than grit and heart, is becoming.

And so the men's human rights movement is similarly chiseling out its features and taking shape on the horizon of western consciousness.

This is the most exciting time ever for us.

A little more than a year and a half ago, on November 1 of 2011, our little globe that tracks visits hit the magical 1,000,000 mark. It took a while to get there, and a lot of work. Here is part what I had to say about it at the time.

> After 15 months online we are rapidly approaching our first million visits to AVfM. And if current traffic holds or continues to grow we will have at least twice that much after another 15 months. I am betting we do even better than that thanks to the dedicated efforts of all the people who contribute quality additions to the growing library of MRA literature, and the increasing number of men and women who are stepping up to rattle the worlds cage with FTSU.

Now, did I say we would have "at least" twice that much after another 15 months? It appears I was at least a little right. After 20 more months we have four times that much. That globe will hit the 5 mil mark in less than 48 hours.

I won't bother with prognostication about where we will be in the next year and a half, but I am betting it will be just as surprising.

There will be many rocks in the road. We are used to that and have developed calloused feet. There will be other attempts to censor, demonize, misrepresent and spin us according to feminist desires. Again, we are all used to it. But as most of you know, things are slowly starting to change. And we will continue to feed from and exploit the unfair coverage wherever it comes up.

Because in the end, we know what is going to happen. Here is an article that focuses on an interview with Typhon, in which she not only slammed one ball after another over the fence, the reporter actually printed what she said, in context and fairly characterized.

Read here.

Groundbreaking stuff, this, and along with what we have seen in the National Post and from Canadian Television, the worst nightmare for feminists, a fair hearing, is starting to trend.

Make no mistake about it, you and AVFM are driving it. And we are going to continue to well into the future.

With that, I am back and ready to get back to my work.

CAFE announces establishment of first Men's Centre

Robert O'Hara · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

MEDIA ADVISORY – FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Campaign to Establish Toronto's First Men's Centre Receives Leading Donation

Canadian Association for Equality Announces "Founder's Club" for $5,000 Level Donors.

TORONTO, ONTARIO — (July 22, 2013) The fundraising campaign to establish the Canadian Centre for Men and Families – Toronto's first space focused on the status and well-being of boys and men – has received a leading donation of $5,000, bringing its total funds raised to $9,500 in its first month of fundraising.

"While modest by the standard of large and powerful charities, this donation to a unique project in support of a cause some dismiss as unnecessary, or even hateful, demonstrates an awareness of the crisis facing boys and men and is an important step toward the acknowledgement of the value of this Campaign," said Michael Cavanaugh, Communications Director for the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), the nonprofit leading the project.

In recognition of this donation and to encourage matching support, CAFE has launched the Founder's Club for donors at the $5,000 level.

"Founder's Club members will play a critical role in the creation, sustainability and success of the Canadian Centre for Men and Families," said Cavanaugh. "Through financial contributions, consultative support and networking opportunities, our Founders Club will help us increase our public education, social services, advocacy, research and outreach capabilities on behalf of boys, men, fathers and their families." Founder's Club members will enjoy special recognition and engagement.

Information on the Campaign to Establish the Canadian Centre for Men and Families and the Founder's Club is available at:

http://www.tinyurl.com/CAFE-Centre

CONTACT
Amber Taylor
Canadian Association for Equality
info@equalitycanada.com
416-479-0718

[/box]

Selective silence: sports media mum on violent women

Ty Henry · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the National Football League star Jovan Belcher's murder-suicide last fall, the ESPN sports network's Jemele Hill urged us to End The Silence on Domestic Violence. It should come as no surprise that the title verbiage of her piece is lifted word for word from Dr. Phil, who instructs that when your female partner strikes you, it's not domestic violence. In sports media, the female abuse evasion is even more ensconced, the feminist/traditionalist symmetry even more pronounced. Nonetheless, I would agree with Ms. Hill, Dr. Phil and others that it is time for the silence to end. Indeed, recent events prove that the silence is indeed real, damning and intentional.

As I pointed out in a piece on my blog, last November a high-profile athlete, considered one of the best ever, followed an ex-girlfriend in her SUV and cut her off in traffic. The basketball player then exited the vehicle, smashed the girlfriend's Range Rover window with a bat, and fired into the vehicle with a pistol. By February a true bill for aggravated assault was issued, with the athlete facing 65 years incarceration in the Georgia Dept. of Corrections. Shortly thereafter, a famous champion tennis player was cited for stalking and assaulting an ex on Valentine's Day in North Palm Beach Florida, even going so far as to show up at their work and pound on the window. The victim sought an order of protection last fall, which was denied, likely emboldening the abuser to escalate their behavior.

There has been scant coverage of either incident, and what coverage there was did not use the term "domestic violence."

The tennis star's May hearing was continued to July 12. According to local reporter Marc Freeman, no one from the tennis or sports media showed up to the first hearing. To date, there have been no published interviews with the victim, or the witnesses interviewed by police. In the case of the basketball player, no one has interviewed, or really profiled, the victim.

The athletes' names are Chamique Holdsclaw and Jennifer Capriati.

A Hall Of Famer, Jennifer Capriati is the former top player in the world, a three-time champion of tennis' signature Grand Slam events. A tennis prodigy, she made the cover of Sports Illustrated as the youngest player to win a tour event. Holdsclaw is a three-time National Champion, having played during the Golden Era of Women's College Basketball as part of the Tennessee-Connecticut rivalry, which for about ten years was as popular a rivalry on TV as any men's college basketball matchup.

To add a little more sugar to the Kool-Aid, Ms. Holdsclaw was put in the Criminal Justice Express Lane, and offered a plea by the Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard on June 14.

She will indeed pay for act of violent domestic terror as follows. Three years of probation, with a chaser of community service, with no outrage, and indeed no coverage, from Ms. Hill, ESPN's women's sports page, nor anyone else. In the same state where a child (high school football star Genarlow Wilson) lost his shot at Division I football glory and served prison time as a "child molester" for sex with classmates, a 35-year-old all-time great female athlete gets 65 years of (potential) prison time peremptorily purged.

For some perspective, aggravated domestic terror and assault (Holdsclaw) and escalated batterer behavior (Capriati) committed by two all-time female greats warrants less coverage than a marginal NFL cornerback smacking a woman who is assaulting him, or comments by a tennis player about a crime.

This pattern is alarmingly consistent. In 2009 Sahel Kazeemi shot the great Steve McNair 4 times, killing him as he slept, and no one dared call it by its proper name, except Glenn Sacks. There were even suggestions he "deserved it." Contrast that to the murder-suicide of Kasandra Perkins by her beau, Kansas City linebacker Jovan Belcher, which triggered a national moral panic, amplified first in feminist circles, and then over several weeks by all major media outlets and framed as a "wake-up call" to the epidemic of Domestic Violence. In February, former University of Pennsylvania and Final Four basketball star Matthew White was stabbed to death by wife Maria Pellon-White as he slept, with his killer alleging that he was looking at porn. No memorials, no calls to arms. Contrast that to a murder of a University Of Virginia lacrosse player by her boyfriend on the men's team, which made national headlines, topped the morning broadcasts, and was the subject of many investigative reports on ESPN. Credit goes to Jemele Hill for being the only sports journalist of note to venture a true apology to the Duke Lacrosse players, but there was no call for the arrest of Crystal Mangum, who went on to abuse two children and, not altogether surprisingly, murder her boyfriend Reginald Daye. Oh, and she got bond.

The Holdsclaw case gave us just the chance to see if preventing violence against women was at the top of the priority list. It backed the feminist, and feminist supplicants in sports media, into a corner. We have a woman followed – pro basketball player Jennifer Lacy – cut off in broad daylight and terrorized, the perp having gone both Mark McGwire and Annie Oakley on her Range Rover windows. This time, though, The Menace was not male, and thus got the pass without even a shrug, and has recently gotten the windfall of a 1-on-1 interview with an ESPN reporter (yet to air).

The variable was isolated, and they've been exposed. They care not about partner violence, nor violence against women. They care about patriarchal perpetrators with penises. Exposing the alarming rate of violence in the lesbian community would throw the train off the rails.

They talk a grand game about how athletes (mis)treat women, yet here is a woman only alive due to poor aim, the assailant with a judicial mosquito bite, and…crickets?

The only mention of the Holdsclaw case on the ESPNW network (the platform focused on women's sports) is this bit by Jane McManus arguing that women pay a steeper price for transgressions than male athletes (feel free to laugh out loud). Of her examples is the case of a domestic abuse call involving women's soccer star Hope Solo and husband, NFL tight end Jeramy Stevens. She does a Heisman-worthy stiff arm on the facts, failing to point out that Stevens, not Solo, was arrested. If it spookily echoes the Hillary Clinton sentiment that "women are the true victims of war," that's not likely a coincidence. It seems even some women sportswriters are given to delusional self-damseling victim-speak. (She did not respond to my tweet to her on the inconsistency)

New York Times writer and ESPN tennis commentator LZ Granderson deserves credit for responding to my tweet to him on the matter during Wimbledon, and I have no doubt his response was earnest and sincere. However, I have a hard time believing the standard is "current stars." If so, why were all of ESPN's platforms saturated with coverage of a high school rape case in a town few people can spell, even fewer can pronounce, where the local justice system did everything right by a girl who was obviously rag-dolled by two meatheads as she was passed out? Indeed, on the eve of a tournament she was the prohibitive favorite to win for a sixth time, Serena Williams was swiftly cut to pieces by the blogosphere and sports media for her comments on the matter.

Let me run that by y'all one mo' 'gin.

Famous female athlete busts bats AND caps into multiple car windows with ex-girlfriend still inside, gets off, and mum's the word.

Famous female athlete makes comments on rape case, and pearl-clutching goes viral, faster than the zombie disease in 28 Days Later.

In the tradition of Progressive activist Jim Hightower, I'm encouraging my fellow sports fans to join me in making some calls . . .and emails and tweets. Call the Fulton County DA Public Affairs unit, and ask how many people have received probation for aggravated domestic assault with two deadly weapons, and no jail as a condition. Contact ESPN Content Executives such as Craig Bengtson, Dwayne Bray and Steve Anderson, and ask why an anonymous town's rape case saw in-depth coverage on all their platforms while the actions of Holdsclaw, Mangum, Capriati and others have been blacked out, and why the first full discussion of Holdsclaw's case was an interview with her, post-traves…err, sentencing. Moreover, email and tweet both the brass and reporters of ESPNW and ask why searches of “Holdsclaw” and “Capriati” reveal scarcely anything on their cases, while a search of Steubenville reveals several entries. Contact the editors of magazines like TENNIS, and ask them why there were no national media at the May 17th Capriati preliminary hearing, and if they’ll attend the one on July 12th, or at least do some cursory investigation. Email or tweet such prominent women’s sports advocates as Dave Zirin, Jemele Hill, Christine Brennan and Sally Jenkins as to their silence, and Jane McManus as to how a journalist can come to a conclusion that does such violence to reality. Tweet Josina Anderson, who recently interviewed Holdsclaw, and let her know our community will be watching, and if she will seek to interview the victim, or discuss partner violence in the lesbian community.

Let’s show them what “ending the silence” truly means, MHRA style.

Planned outage for AVfM

Dean Esmay · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Just a short note to let you all know A Voice for Men's entire site (front page, forums, and all the rest) will be going down starting at about 5:30 AM Central Time (US) on Tuesday July 23rd–tomorrow morning at this writing.

A Voice for Men's servers will be undergoing scheduled maintenance for approximately 1 hour, or, with any luck, less than that (small chance of longer but doubtful). All is well, remain calm, no need to send us panicked emails or worry about hackers or anything else, there's a hard drive issue and a few other minor things that just have to be done and are being handled by competent professionals who know what they're doing.

With any luck we'll be down and back quick enough most of you will never even notice it happened.

Nothing more to see here, move along. ?

Update: There was an unplanned outage that lasted about two minutes at approximately 1225 CDT today (July 22) which appeared to be a network issue with our hosting company. This had nothing to do with the scheduled maintenance due for tomorrow, which we expect to go ahead as planned.

[/box]

Why are men opting out of relationships?

Andy Thomas · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Everywhere, men are stepping back when it comes to romantic commitment. Many young men are simply indifferent to the idea, some are afraid, while others are angry and have this bitter message for the opposite sex — "We don't know you; we don't need you, and we don't want you."

* * *

In 1970, more than 94 percent of women in the UK were either married or had been married by the time they were 40 years old. Since then, marriage rates have plummeted, and over all age groups, married couples are now in the minority. The decline of marriage is a popular topic of discussion in the media with many commentators putting it down to changing lifestyles and freedoms for women. Indeed, there is a general consensus that young women are putting careers ahead of relationships, and as a result, the number of marriages taking place per year has almost halved over recent decades.

For much of the last 40 years or so, it is undeniably true that women have been postponing both marriage and childbirth. I would argue, however, that there is now a new phenomenon taking place, one that is a harbinger of radical change for the relationship between men and women. In the years to come, it will be men, not women, who will be the ones driving down marriage and birth rates.

Men are beginning to recognise their appalling vulnerability when it comes to dealing with the opposite sex, and they are individually waking up to the ridiculous risks they face. Almost 70 per cent of divorces are now initiated by women, and typically it is the man who stands to lose everything — his children, his home, his future income and his reputation. With suicide being the biggest killer of young men in the UK, and with those experiencing relationship breakdown being at the highest risk, he also stands to lose his life. In response, many men are now avoiding long-term commitment, or are simply turning their backs on relationships with women altogether.

Recent national crime surveys show that men account for 40 per cent of those who suffer domestic abuse. Many believe the true figure to be higher because men under-report the abuse against them. Male victims know that they face not just ridicule, but the risk of being falsely labelled as the perpetrator by both the police and female support agencies.

Young men, especially, have internalised the appalling message that whenever two drunken people have sex, one of them is a rapist.

American psychologist, Dr Helen Smith, agrees and argues that men in the west are both consciously and unconsciously "going on strike". In her recent book, "Men on Strike", she describes how young men have internalised society's negativity towards them, and are not only avoiding marriage and fatherhood, but are also dropping out of higher education and leaving the workforce at astonishing rates.

Where married men and father figures where once viewed with respect, they are now presented as buffoons in the media, and new generations of males are simply refusing to relate to such negative stereotyping. As a result, young men are rejecting traditional gender roles, giving rise to the metrosexual male — urban heterosexual men who prioritise themselves and their lifestyle above other commitments. Such men are decidedly single.

If we want a glimpse of what the future may hold, we only need to look to Japan where those who reject their traditional masculine role are referred to as "grass eaters" or "herbivore men". These men are not just decidedly single, but they show little or no interest in sexual relations. With a staggering 70% of young Japanese men identifying themselves in this way, they have become a cultural and economic phenomenon, not to mention, a major target for advertisers. They are also considered the significant factor in the plummeting Japanese birth rate, and are blamed for many a single woman's solitude.

Irrespective of whether men are reacting consciously, having become aware of their own vulnerability in adulthood, or unconsciously, having already internalised the negativity towards them by adolescence, most are doing so on an individual basis. There is, however, a growing counter-culture of males who collectively define themselves to be "Men Going Their Own Way," or "mig-tow," a pronunciation of the acronym "MGTOW." These are men who positively identify in their refusal to commit romantically to women. Many MGTOWs would disagree with Helen Smith's metaphor of men "being on strike," but would prefer to claim that they have simply "left the building" and are not coming back.

Geoff is a typical young man who identifies himself as a MGTOW. At the age of 23, he tells me that he was trapped in an abusive relationship with someone who was, in his words, out to destroy him. He explains that what really affected him was how he had believed, all along, that it was his role as a man to make his girlfriend happy. Therefore, he had always felt that whatever was wrong in the relationship was, somehow, his fault.

Several years later, however, he began to find websites where other men had similar stories to tell and he realised, for the first time, that he wasn't alone in his feelings or experiences. Looking back, he recalls how amazed he felt to see the things he had been secretly wondering openly voiced by other men. "It was if all those tiny nuggets of dissent that I'd carefully tucked away for fear of being seen as a sexist were suddenly validated," he says. He adds, "I realised that I didn't have to apologise for being male."

MGTOWs can be seen as an off-shoot of a wider men's movement, which also encompasses egalitarian and traditionalist sub-groups. Whereas traditionalists argue for a return to family values, egalitarians accept that the profound cultural changes of recent times mark an end for the traditional sex roles. For egalitarians, the toothpaste is already out of the tube and there is no putting it back. Indeed, many would not want to. Members of all groups claim that, contrary to popular perception, it is men who are the ones being disadvantaged and marginalised in society, not women.

Now, I'm going to let you into a big secret here, one that hasn't yet reached mainstream consciousness — outside of the MGTOW groups, a significant proportion of those in the men's human rights movement are, in fact, women. I would estimate that women account for around 20% of those active in the movement, falling evenly between traditionalist and egalitarian camps.

MGTOWs are separatists, however. They represent a collective rejection by men of the traditional relationship with women and, in some cases, of women themselves. While they typically claim to be indifferent towards women, I personally sense a strong under-current of anger (they regard "nice guys" and "good men" as fools). Outsiders typically see them as misogynistic. I, myself, used feel this way toward them, but my view has changed somewhat over time.

I now recognise that our tendency to see male dissent as misogynistic is nothing other than a symptom of our cultural inability to acknowledge the pain and suffering of adult men, even when it is laid out bare before our eyes. It might seem appropriate to dismiss MGTOWs as a bunch of angry misfits, but to do so would be a grave injustice. If, instead, you are willing to look through their anger, you will see men who have had their children stripped from them by the family courts, or men who have had their lives ruined by abusive partners and false allegations. Among their number, you will also find the children abused by their mothers who, knowing nothing except what it means to be rejected and disbelieved, have now grown up into damaged adults.

These are men who have long since given up waiting for somebody to care about them.

Moreover, I have come to appreciate that MGTOW-ism embodies a coherent ideology — one which is diametrically opposed to that of the radical feminists of the 1960s and one which will be extremely compelling to many a disenfranchised male. Their philosophy is based largely on the writings of Esther Vilar (yes, a woman) and her 1971 book, The Manipulated Man. In this, she describes how women coldly manipulate men for their own ends, and while some of it may be patent nonsense, I sense that many a man will find profound identification within its pages. Those who read it, having first been suitably broken at the hands of a woman, may forever look upon all women with dark eyes.

Just like an iceberg, most of which lies hidden beneath, there is a great body of disenfranchised males out there. With no voice, and no one to represent their interests, they lie invisible just beneath the surface of society. If you were to put Esther Vilar's book into their hands, I surmise that it may cause many to radically re-evaluate their world and their place in it.

No one controls MGTOWs. There is no central website, no leader and no particular plan. In any case, men are individually "going their own way" whether they realise it or not, and whether women like it or not.

Men never retaliated in the gender war that was declared upon them on behalf of all women, everywhere, by the radical feminists of the 1960s. Instead, slowly at first, they simply began to walk away. One of the few rays of hope is that it will be women themselves who, in increasing numbers, give their support to the wider men's human rights movement, thus providing an alternative to "men going their own way."

If allowed to continue to its miserable end-game, however, I solemnly predict that the gender war will be a war that all women, everywhere, will eventually come to bitterly regret.

* * *

Follow Me: @AndyManMRA

This article was first published on A Voice for Men UK — your friends in Blighty! Also on Andy's Man personal blog.

Sources

1. Marriages in England and Wales, 2010. Office for National Statistics
2. http://www.thecalmzone.net/help/issues/suicide/
3. http://www.guardian.co.uk/society/2010/sep/05/men-victims-domestic-violence
4. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Herbivore_men

Men not marrying

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 22 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

…how deep does "the problem" go?

Editor's note: AVfM is pleased to reprint the transcript of the classic Karen Straughan (GWW) video. As usual, Karen likes to go "off-page" during her performances, so significant differences exist between the text and the video.

Okay, so, an online friend of mine was spitting mad after reading this recent effort on the part of I can only assume to be a traditionalist woman, in trying to figure out what the heck is wrong with men these days. As so many traditionalists and feminists before her, she missed the mark by a freaking mile, even though she did dance dangerously close (within 100 miles or so) of a few of the core issues that currently discourage men from being good little married drones like they're supposed to be, dammit.

Despite being critical of feminist attitudes that she rightly sees as anti-male, the article was absurdly gynocentric. It was very much about what women want, and there was a lot of expectation that men should do what women want when they want it–that is, get married and have babies on HER schedule as decided by her. One has to wonder if she even bothered to ask any actual unmarried males WHY they are refusing or not bothering to "man up" before writing her article.

But as I said, it did at least poke at the surface of the festering boil that is the systemic nature of "the problem", even if it didn't give it the lancing it truly deserved. Her conclusion was "why buy the cow when you can get the milk for free? And why get a good job when women are so independent they can just give the milk away for nothing?" Both are backhanded criticisms of women's behavior (yay, for someone brave enough to blame women for their own troubles), but they fall far short of any sort of true examination of the issues.

So I'm going to give it the old college try, and give a bit of an overview of what I believe has become a multifaceted problem.

A recent examination from Heartiste said a very great deal, and with some serious literary flair (pearls of wisdom from that pit of social nihilism that is the pick-up artist community). I'm just going to quote some of the relevant bits and leave a link to the article below:

> If you want to know why men are running away from marriage, children and beta provisioning, one major reason is that the women available to these working class men are flat out disgusting. Take a look for yourself. What man of normal mental health and active libido wants to romantically woo and date, let alone marry, a beastly, waddling tatted mountain of pustulence with the issue of three other men barking and nipping at her cankles?
>
> And let's not forget that economically empowered and government-assisted women, slaves to their hypergamous impulse for higher status mates than themselves, can't help but winnow the pool of men deemed acceptable marriage material. When women say "there are no good men left", what the astute observer hears is "there are no good men left thanks to a combination of my increased expectations and decreased attractiveness."

He goes on to say:

> to the factory-farmed ivory tower sociologists studying marriage trends and turning out paper after paper of half-assed hogwash: there's a whole other world out there. It's the world of men, and in that world, men's desires matter. You should think about incorporating that ugly reality into your theories.

Hey, Heartiste–why don't you tell us how you really feel. As blistering as that little snippet was, it raises some very important points, I think the most important of which is that MEN'S DESIRES MATTER. When men cannot find women THEY desire who are willing to partner with them, why would they partner?

And I think it's important to note that the reality of divorce and family law in our culture plays a HUGE part in men's growing contempt for marriage as an institution. It's not that men are commitment-phobes. It's that women seem increasingly commitment-incompatible. The word "commitment" has in fact, in female parlance, come to mean, "up until the moment I'm no longer 100% satisfied with the person I married". And that attitude is only going to lead to more and more divorces as more and more successful women effectively set their sights higher than they reasonably should while their youth and attractiveness wanes, leading to a growing number of them feeling like they settled even if they didn't–even if they scored someone 2 points above them on the overall attractiveness scale.

And oddly enough, no one, least of all women, seem to really give a shit what MEN desire in a partner. Why can't men just be happy with what's available? Well, let's look at what's available to the average man in his 30s: a 35 year old woman who hollers yes over the jangling of her biological clock while unable to keep the grimace from her face because he's a bigger loser than the 5 guys she dumped in her 20s and now she has to settle, a divorcée who's already financially annihilated and emotionally crippled at least one man, and a single mother who's collecting reams of child support from one poor schmuck while her other baby daddy manages to duck his obligations because he's a drug dealer and his income's off the books.

And yes, I'm exaggerating, but you see my point.

And no, not all women are like that. But frankly, the consensus among today's women seems to be that this state of affairs is the new normal, and even responsible women will often frame such destructive choices on the part of other women as somehow valid and defensible. The sentiment in the mainstream is that men should just man up and go along with Pairing Up 2.0: Who Cares What Men Want?, that essentially, a given woman's behavior and life choices should have no effect on whether she is able to attract a good, reliable man…this does not speak well of the principles of even those women who are more well-situated. In fact, I think it's safe to say that the fewer female voices of reason there are out there the more men are likely to wash their hands of the entire idea of partnering.

But I honestly think it goes deeper than even the baggage the average unattached woman now carries, or the danger of ending up an emotionally and financially devastated statistic with "generous" every-other-weekend access to one's children that is keeping men from "manning up".

I've been thinking of the White Feather Girls. For those who don't know, it was a group of young women in the UK during WWI who bestowed a white feather of cowardice on any man they saw in civilian clothes, to shame them into enlisting.

And when I consider how vulnerable so many men were to those kinds of shaming tactics, vulnerable enough to enlist in a war that killed 10 million to preserve their manhood in the eyes of women they'd never met, I simply can't believe that it's only the risks of marriage, as onerous as they are, that have rendered men impervious to the kinds of shaming tactics employed by traditionalists and feminists who seem increasingly desperate to strong-arm men into their old roles.

I think at the very core of it, it's about a positive male identity. Male identity almost always revolves around doing, rather than being. Most of that doing has always revolved around being of use in a uniquely male context. Most of men's usefulness through history has derived from learning "male" skills and performing them well, embodying a male role in the service of women or society. In the more turbulent past, those roles needed to perform a valuable service to women or the community that women could not–or should not be expected to–perform for themselves.

This is the most common path to a positive male identity because men lack a mechanism for automatic own-group preference.

Simply put, they do not relate to other men automatically, just because they're men.

Women have this bias, which provides them a natural ability to form cooperatives, relate to other women, and seek consensus though their strong mechanism for own-group preference based on gender alone. Given their gender roles through most of human history, this mechanism makes sense. Their individual value as, to put it bluntly, breeders, meant that in a survivalist environment, you didn't throw a woman on the trash pile without a pressing reason. Adjustments were made when possible to keep as many women as you could within the sisterhood. This is where you find a ton of attention in female spaces given to things like "tone" and "being nice" and "getting along" even when there are disagreements. It's all about comfort level and feelings of acceptance.

Men, however, lack the hard wiring to form a preference for maleness based merely on maleness. And that only makes sense when you think about men's roles for the last couple million years or so–roles that involved things like beating the guys down the valley to a pulp when they threatened his women and children, and competing against other males within his community for a shot at the mating game. Given those roles, automatically siding with one's own gender over the other is…well, it just doesn't work.

And it's not that men cannot manifest a form of own-group preference, it's just that when own-group preference manifests in males, it can't be based on maleness alone. There must be a common purpose, a common set of ideals, a common duty or cause, a common doing or a common position in the status hierarchy.

Men can indeed identify with each other and be team players among other men–you see it in churches, military units, fraternities, sports teams and even sports fans, political parties, movements, project teams. While they will often form hierarchies within those contexts, those realms can be sources of a sense of loyalty and brotherhood among men.

The myth among feminists that men will insult each other for displaying feminine traits because they see women as inferior is just that–a myth. Men do this because women have a trump card that bestows intrinsic value on them–their uteruses–and they retain that value even when they gender-bend a little. A woman who acts like a woman is not seen as inferior. A man who acts like a woman has always been seen not as a woman, but as a "woman without a womb". He has no female value, and he has no male value. Therefore, he has NO value at all. And unlike women, men who were not "useful" did–and still do–get thrown on the trash heap of society.

In the currency of reproduction, an ovum goes for a thousand bucks, a uterus is worth a cool mill, and an ejaculation about 10 cents. To be acceptable mating material, and worth keeping around, a man had to do more than generate sperm. And when the only thing keeping you from becoming completely disposable as an individual lies in differentiating yourself from the feminine, well, guys gonna enforce that shit.

This is why men have always tended to define themselves by their roles. Father, husband, working man, soldier, career man, family man, middle class man, politician, activist, etc…in other words, roles to exist in which allow them to relate to other men who also occupy those roles, and to derive a positive and meaningful identity from performing their masculinity through those roles.

And I think this may be why suicide rates for men skyrocket after divorce–you have not just taken away his kids, his wife, his assets and a chunk of his income. You've effectively stripped him of a huge part of the male identity he's built around himself.

So I'm thinking that for most men, forming a positive male identity in relation to other males requires a couple of things–a male role that is differentiated from the female one (or at the very least, a male-oriented environment) and, well, positivity.

Men used to be able to derive a positive male identity from marriage. That is, through the respected and uniquely male role of husband and father. When that identity is increasingly characterized by society as superfluous, obsolete, or in the words of Harriet Harman, unnecessary to social cohesion, it is no longer a way for a man to defer his disposability, is it? Moreover, when that identity can be unilaterally stripped from him on the whim of the increasingly fickle and hard to please female even when he does everything right, marriage ceases to be a positive way for men to define themselves as men. It becomes a way for men to define themselves as chumps and idiots, and who wants to define themselves that way? Moreover, from sitcoms to romcoms to TV commercials, to billboard ads, the role of husband/father is increasingly one of playing the incompetent buffoon to sassy, smart, together wife or even child. In the mass media there is nothing noble or respectable about husbandhood or fatherhood anymore. Further, when the roles within marriage become virtually indistinguishable and interchangeable, a man's role becomes less and less…well, uniquely male. It's just a role. It can be a path to meaning and fulfillment (if he's lucky), and it may be something he desires to do and become, but it's not necessarily a path to defining himself AS A MAN.

So we can scratch that one off the list–even for men who've been living under a rock when it comes to divorce law. Marriage and children no longer offer a reliable path to a positive male identity. It is no longer positive, nor is it significantly differentiated from the feminine.

The workplace is yet another milieu that has largely lost its maleness. And that's not to say that women ruined everything. It is not so much the presence of women but rather the alterations in environment and interaction many women demand when they want to engage the world through the paid workforce. A male space that leads to a positive male identity need not be free of women, but it still needs to be male–men need an environment that suits their psychology, not one in which they must be metaphorically castrated in order to steer clear of trouble with HR ["Human Resources"]. And I'm not even talking about vulgarity or expressions of sexuality, but aggression, ambition, ribbing, competition, passion, authority, and plain speech–all of these are often discouraged when women are present, in order to spare feelings and prevent discomfort. Outspokenness is replaced with drawing-room rules of discourse and ingenuity with protocol, all of which render a feminized workplace, though tolerable to men, no longer a path to a positive MALE identity.

Because it is no longer a male space, and no longer appeals to the psychology of men, the workplace has become a ladder fewer men feel driven to climb in order to construct their identities. Combine this with the fact that we handicap men through quotas and affirmative action for women, well… a large number of men are not only becoming disenchanted with the expectation to perform in an environment that does not feed their natures and has set them up to fail–in the absence of those uniquely male-centered psychological rewards and motivators, a growing number are finally opening their eyes and waking up to the negative aspects of wage-slavery. And that is a pill that, once taken, cannot be unswallowed.

In every space males congregate where women have elbowed their way in and demanded changes, you seem to find large numbers of men giving ground and eventually losing their drive to perform there. And again, I don't think it's the presence of women that does this–it's the enforced necessity to change one's behavior in order to maintain a proper decorum around them, and the changes in how those places function that women often demand. It's the expectation that the environment and the men in it adjust to suit women's needs, rather than expecting women to adjust themselves to the environment.

A few bastions of maleness remain, places where women are often welcome right up until they begin to demand the environment change to suit them, at which point the male protests begin. Hell, you can even see this tolerance on the part of men when women sneak into the men's room when the line-up is too long for the women's bathroom. It's all good unless she takes offence at men behaving the way men do in a restroom by farting and pissing in her presence.

So where are men retreating to? The internet, and the few men's spaces that have not tailored their rules of conduct to suit women's easily offended natures and need for comfort. The MRM, where a common set of ideals and values bonds the community and allows them to define their maleness irrespective of society's or women's approval. A place where words and ideas are more important than the tone or the smiles that may or may not lie behind them.

The hierarchy and uniquely male objectives of the pick-up artist community, where competition and scorekeeping are indeed still allowed, where there are men for others to admire or to mentor, and where they thumb their noses at what women say they want. Society wasn't working for them, so they invented their own society and they're running with by their own rules.

Video games and related forums. Online venues where refusals to police speech are deemed misogyny and the men there don't give much of a fuck.

Men going their own way, who've taken a stand based on a realistic assessment of what's in it for them, and maintain their self-respect not by complying with society's expectations but by disregarding them.

Beer and buddies, hook-up culture, and part time jobs men tolerate but don't care about.

Gynocentrism–the manginas and white knights who supplicate and pander to the feminine even when it's ugly or amoral, differentiating themselves from the feminine through their blind worship of it.

And why? Because all of the "approved" paths to a positive male identity, the paths society both endorses and depends on, are gone. And even when men don't consciously realize this, they know it somewhere in the backs of their brains. Men have always worked and sacrificed and sweated and bled if they were rewarded with a means through which to see themselves as worthy of respect. But when every role society wants to cram you into is no longer a way to respect yourself, then it's time to throw those roles away.

And one thing the apexuals at the top, like Bill Bennett and Obama, feminists like Kaye Hymowitz and Katie Roiphe, and traditionalists like Suzanne Venker, will never realize is that using shame to try to coerce men to do what is expected of them isn't going to work this time, because while it's possible to shame a man into giving his life for his country if there's a promise of respect in it, it's impossible to shame someone into working his ass off and risking his future just for the joy of looking in the mirror and seeing Homer Simpson or Ray Barone looking back at him.

When the cost of society's approval is the self-respect you derive from a positive identity, it ceases to be worth it to a lot of men.

—

Links:

http://www.nationalreview.com/home-front/291473/why-men-are-slackers-and-women-are-single/suzanne-venker http://heartiste.wordpress.com/2012/02/21/its-time-for-women-to-woman-up/http://www.genderratic.com/p/1140/patriarchy-1-0-and-the-apexual/

The right to be left alone

Geoffrey James · 23 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

People on the Internet spend a lot of time talking about rights.

Reading some of the more active social media sites can set your head swimming with discussions about women's rights, gay rights, digital rights, privacy rights and whole other host of uses and abuses of the term "rights". Me, I'll settle for being left alone. I don't want to build some kind of masculine utopia. I don't want to see a white picket fence out the front of every house. I don't want to see women have their right to vote taken away or be forced to cover their faces in public – no matter how much feminists scream hysterically about what will become of them should masculinity begin to re-assert itself publicly.

All I want, and I suspect, all most men want, is the right to be left alone.

The book Men On Strike by Dr. Helen Smith talks about how men are walking away from society – dropping out of college, leaving the workforce, and avoiding marriage – due to the lack of incentives to contribute. I believe it's more than that, though. We've been hounded out of every place we used to gather. Young guys have retreated into video games and internet porn, and even there it can be hard to find solace now.

It would be one thing if this departure were met with stony silence, yet still we find hordes of shrieking harpies chasing men down, eager to continue the flogging. For example, the disgusting "Don't Be That Guy" campaign in Edmonton, Canada, which portrays all men as being somehow prone to accidentally-on-purpose slipping their penises into unconscious women is exactly the kind of thing I'm talking about. Not content that men are simply refusing to take on the risk of dating and marriage, Canada's "Battered Women Support Services" has to poster the entire town of Edmonton to remind men wherever they go that they are, in fact, to be considered sexual predators in waiting.

Women, meanwhile, are aghast that their continual temper tantrums aren't having the desired effect of motivating men to stick to their so-called "responsibilities". Women will happily moan and complain about men and their habits, and a media geared towards female consumers feeds their preconceptions voraciously. Then, they'll spend a good portion of their time trying to figure out how to get one of these awful creatures to go on a date with them.

Yet it still doesn't stop. If a man does find himself in a relationship with a woman in America, he'll be constantly critiqued, tested and (looking at the divorce rate) ultimately tossed aside. If he opts not to engage in the dating scene, he'll be constantly harangued about his lack of ability to "commit". Possibly because he can't "handle a strong woman". Of course.

If the nascent Men's Human Rights Movement sets out to achieve only one thing, it should be the right for men, and indeed everyone, simply to be left alone. We desire little more than to remain unmolested by people with fancy-sounding titles and lots of government funding (like the instigators of the squalid "Don't Be That Guy" campaign) or by other people's notions of what our obligations to everyone else are.

The absurdity of running somebody out of town only to demand they stand still just outside the town border so you can continue to scream at them, however, makes me want to pick up a bottle of scotch and look for an explanation at the bottom.

"Of all tyrannies, a tyranny exercised for the good of its victims may be the most oppressive. It may be better to live under robber barons than under omnipotent moral busybodies. The robber baron's cruelty may sometimes sleep, his cupidity may at some point be satiated; but those who torment us for our own good will torment us without end, for they do so with the approval of their own conscience." — C. S. Lewis

Article reprinted from NiceGuy's Site. The original can be found here.

I'll decide if you were raped, not you

Paul Elam · 23 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Please be forewarned that many people will find this article highly offensive. That being the case, a disclaimer is in order, particularly for those easily offended.

This article was written with the intent of offending. In fact, that is pretty much its primary purpose.

Unfortunately, when addressing instances of male disadvantage or female power in this society, offence is a necessary evil. We are a culture blinded and brainwashed by decades (arguably millenia) of disinformation and propaganda about men and women. We are also a species of animal more or less hardwired to take a dim view of compassion for men and boys. This leaves us with few tools to rattle people out of complacency and into a thoughtful discussion of those issues.

Intentional offence is one of them, and it is one proven to work as this website has repeatedly demonstrated.

This disclaimer is not an apology for, nor a retraction of, any of the points in the article. It is simply a clarification of context regarding the articles' style, content and delivery. When society evolves to the point where we can have real discussions about issues facing men and boys, then the need for this kind of provocation will end, at which point the editorial staff of this website may consider removing this article from its archives.

This particular article is dedicated to Mary P. Koss, an influential researcher who has demonstrated over and over how the crime of rape permeates our culture and results in a living nightmare for women across the western world. Sort of. –PE

Second note: Male victims of sexual assault by women who are frequently told that what happened to them is funny or something they should be proud of, by cops, the popular culture, even so-called friends, will understand the exact intent of this article. –DE

Look, ladies, I get it. I really do. You think you were raped. At least that is your claim. And even if we take for granted that you are telling the truth about some asshole that ignored your insistence that you did not want to have sex; who even ignored your repeated, tearful pleas to be left alone, and instead forced himself on you sexually, violating your personal boundaries and bodily integrity in order to penetrate you in one orifice or another, that is still a far cry from justifying the use of a word as strong as rape.

In fact, you may be so emotional about the matter that you are not going to be the most reliable informant of the facts. As an alleged victim, you are certainly not the most qualified arbiter of what constitutes rape to begin with. It is undoubtedly better that you just shut up about the matter – go somewhere where we don't have to look at you or listen to you complain — and let someone more capable gather the facts and make a mature sensible decision about what happened.

Like me, for instance.

Actually, I can't think of anyone better qualified to make a rational determination of the facts; who can avoid the hysterics often associated with the claim of rape, or things that might be misinterpreted as rape, and who can make a sound, considered decision about what happened to you and what to call it. So please, give the rape crisis line and everyone else a break while I sort things out.

You can just tell me what happened, then go off and cry, or go on Oprah, or do whatever it is women do when they think that someone has raped them. I will sort through all the details and then come back to you later, after I have had some time to make a considered and complete evaluation.

I will be the one to decide if you were raped, or just someone who was temporarily inconvenienced.

I have to tell you, though, that I am not one to just go around calling every claim a rape on behalf of women just because they drum up a few tears, or have a few bruises to show off.

Like that girl at Steubenville; the one who partied a little too hearty and then just happened to be penetrated by some of the guys she was partying with. Opportunistic sex? Yeah. Rape? No, not rape. Not even close.

All the outrage I read about the sympathy for the "perpetrators" was way off the mark. These guys needed alcohol and drug education, perhaps a good talking to, but not prison. Prison is for rapists, real rapists, not a couple of kids that got carried away at a party.

Then there was that woman, whatever her name was, in India that made worldwide headlines just a few months ago; the one that was murdered and allegedly raped on a bus in Delhi. The facts on that one don't wash, either. Sure, she was beaten. There is evidence to support that, particularly in that she died from her injuries. Without a doubt, she was murdered.

But not raped, so let's try not to get carried away with the righteous indignation, mmkay?

The fact that she was allegedly penetrated sexually during the course of her attack does not prove anything. Contrary to modern social fantasy, rape is not about penetration. Not in the least. I know, we have some slanted legislation and a few haughty pundits that state otherwise, but we will get to more of that in a minute.

I mentioned Oprah earlier. She's another one of those "rape" victims that seem to crawl out of the woodwork when there is a camera around. Her contention is that she came from a really bad family and that on top of poverty and a lot of other problems, she was raped when she was nine years old.

Assuming she is alleging that she was sexually penetrated (and that she was even telling the truth to begin with), she gets crossed off the list of real victims, even if her story makes good fodder for building a TV empire. It's still not rape. It is still not even close.

As a matter of fact, it simply can't be rape. None of these fanciful stories are legitimate rapes. I have looked at the facts and made a clear, totally supportable conclusion. The girl in Steubenville wasn't raped. The woman in India wasn't raped and Oprah Winfrey sure as hell wasn't raped.

And the reason for it is as simple as it is irrefutably factual.

Only women can rape.

Only men can be victims. Rape is not even a crime of which men are capable. Well, sure, they are physically capable, in the abstract I suppose, but only if you define rape to a narrow and archaic view like forced penetration. When it comes to real rape, which is when men are forced to penetrate, it is only women who can do it.

I understand — you have doubts. You have likely been ill informed and misled your whole life about what rape is and who it really affects.

Need I remind you that no so long ago anyone you know would have pointed to the horizon and told you just how obvious it was that the earth was flat? It is still right there for you to see, is it not? Look around you! Isn't the earth flat?

Fortunately, through the informative use of science and a bird's eye view of the planet, we moved past myopic conclusions drawn from the tunnel vision of surface impressions and ignorance.

The world is not flat, or the center of the universe, and men cannot rape. It is a crime exclusively perpetrated by women.

???

Is your blood boiling yet? Do you want to put a fist through sheet rock? Is my heartless and insensitive handling of the above "victims" making you see red? Do you want my head on a stick in the town square for the sheer depravity and sickness in what I am writing?

Well, let me tell you, I feel your outrage. I get where it comes from; which is to say that you are driven by decency and humanity to instinctively recoil from gratuitous and malicious indifference to the suffering of innocent victims.

You are, after all, a person of compassion, right? You would never ignore the suffering of a victim or minimize the pain and crippling isolation of someone so traumatized. Well, wait, not so fast. You are probably not near as compassionate as you think.

I will explain, but allow me to preface that by saying that if you finish reading this and you are still outraged at me instead of Mary Koss, then your compassion is about as real as a Crystal Gail Mangum rape claim, which is to say it is complete bullshit.

If, in the end, you still think I am the problem. I'll do more than just proclaim that you are a hypocrite, I'll prove it. The only question remaining will be whether or not you have the moral integrity and courage to admit it. Decent human beings will.

The deliberately blind with no right to be angry about anything won't.

First, a little recent history on the study of rape in this culture. Mary P. Koss is a widely-quoted and highly influential feminist writer on the subject. Indeed, so influential is the University of Arizona scholar that she has long been considered a "go to" authority on the subject of rape by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) in Atlanta, Georgia. This is not of little gravity given the CDCs influence on government policy. With thanks to Tamen of Genderratic, here is a brief overview of her relationship with the CDC.

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- 1996: Expert Panel Member, "Definitions of Sexual Assault," Centers for Disease Control and Prevention;
- 2003 : Selected to direct the Sexual Violence Applied Research Advisory Group, VAWNET.org, the national online resource on violence against women funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention;
- 2003 : Member, team of expert advisors, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on teen partner violence;
- 2003 : Panel of Experts, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control on scales to measure intimate partner violence, resulted in the publication of CDC Intimate Partner Violence compendium, 2005;
- 2003-4: Consultant, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, CDC Intimate Partner Violence compendium, 2005 IPV Compendium on assessment of sexual violence and inclusion as recommended standard assessments in the field of two Koss-authored assessments (Sexual Experiences Survey-victimization, and Sexual Experiences Survey-perpetration)

[/unordered_list]

That is quite an impressive track record, especially for someone who has been caught red-handed exaggerating the number of female rape victims to ridiculous proportions while simultaneously making similar efforts to erase the incidence of male rape victims, including children, from public view.

Mary P Koss has been doing the same thing with victims and perpetrators of rape as I did in the first few paragraphs of Juvenalian satire in this article, with two key differences. One, she denies the victimization of male victims instead of females. And two, her work is not satire; it is research done in the public trust for an agency that sets government policy and plays a highly influential role in forming public opinion.

Have you heard anywhere that 1 in 4 women will be raped in their lifetime? You can thank Mary P. Koss for that statistical sound bite, and for the fact that it is totally and completely bogus. She was so anxious to create that kind of ideological ear candy that she drove her own train off the tracks on research methods.

There were numerous, rookie-league errors with the data gathered in Koss' study, but for the sake of brevity we'll just address the basics here. Koss threw in a ringer of a question in her survey of three thousand college women:

"Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man gave you alcohol or drugs?"

Given the frequency of college age women who party and end up having sex with someone and later regretting it, and given the social pressure still on men to provide alcohol and other party materials for women's pleasure, Koss' question was a set of brass knuckles hidden inside a boxing glove. It got her just the result she was looking for.

Two follow-up statistics demonstrate the point well enough. One, 42% of these "rape victims" went on to later date and have additional sexual relations with their "rapists," and, get this, only 25% of the women surveyed that Koss counted as victims agreed that they had been raped.

At this point an honest scholar would just acknowledge their methodological errors, write off their study and start from scratch again in an attempt to obtain some valid conclusions — which explains why Koss went full steam ahead with the results.

It did not take long for Koss to come up with a 1 in 4 number like that. In fact, if men were asked the same questions as qualifiers for being a rape victim, the same exact number, 1 in 4, would emerge from the research. With Koss' methodology, twenty–five percent of the men you know, your fathers, brothers, uncles, husbands and sons are rape victims. One fourth of the males in this culture have been egregiously violated in the very worst of ways. I can just see Dr. Phil staging group hugs on TV. Well, if anyone gave a damn about those men.

Do you think 1 in 4 men have been raped?

Are you outraged that I am treating the idea like a joke?

Not being satisfied with simply manufacturing victims that do not exist, Koss takes the next logical step for any ideologue who wants to show that only women can be victims of rape, and only men can be perpetrators. She produces a paper that erases the idea that men and boys can be victims in any way.

In her paper, "Sexual Victimization in College Men in Chile: Prevalence, Contexts and Risk Factors," co-authored with Evelyn Lehrer, Ph. D., and Jocelyn Lehrer, Sc. D., once you pass by the obligatory acknowledgements, Koss and crew get to the meat of their intent:

> "It would also be desirable to conduct further quantitative inquiry using the revised SES (Koss et al. 2007), which contains items that have been crafted with behavior-specific wording to elicit information on a range of SV experiences. This will make it possible to base men's rape prevalence estimates with more specificity on acts that involve sustaining forced penetration, leaving less leeway for men's individual perceptions of what constitutes 'forced sex.'"

There is much more available from Koss that ensures her intentions are being taken accurately. With credit to Tamen from the Generratic blog, the following observation:

> But let's take a look at the revised SES Koss et al would like to use instead on the Chilean dataset:
>
> Here is a quote from the 2007 paper by Koss et al: Revising the SES: A Collaborative Process to Improve Assessment of Sexual Aggression and Victimization
>
> "We acknowledge the inappropriateness of female verbal coercion and the legitimacy of male perceptions that they have had unwanted sex. Although men may sometimes sexually penetrate women when ambivalent about their own desires, these acts fail to meet legal definitions of rape that are based on penetration of the body of the victim. Furthermore, the data indicate that men's experiences of pressured sex are qualitatively different from women's experiences of rape. Specifically, the acts experienced by men lacked the level of force and psychologically distressing impact that women reported. (Struckman-Johnson, 1988; Struckman-Johnson & Struckman-Johnson, 1994).

> We worked diligently to develop item wording that captured men's sense of pressure to have sex and draw their responses into an appropriate category of coercion instead of to rape items. The revised wording is discussed in more detail later in the article.

Cut to the chase. What Koss is saying, through the unblinking text of two very different studies, is that when women say they weren't raped, they really were, and when men say they were raped, they really weren't.

That, uh, "revised wording"? Men who are forced to penetrate under physical or any other kind of duress are not raped. That perception clearly has had an impact on matters at the CDC and other entities charged with the dissemination of information on rape and sexual assault.

In a recent media interview of TyphonBlue, she pointed out clearly how males who are raped get classified as "made to penetrate" (Read: NOT RAPED) in figures from the 2010 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NIPSVS) by the CDC, the same organization where Koss has had so much influence.

Table 2.2

Lifetime and 12 Month Prevalence of Sexual Violence — U.S. Men, NISVS 2010

	Lifetime		12 Month
	Weighted %	Estimated Number of Victims[1]	Weighted %	Estimated Number of Victims[1]
Rape	1.4	1,581,000	*	*
Completed forced penetration	0.9	970,000	*	*
Attempted forced penetration	0.4	499,000	*	*
Completed alcohol/drug facilitated penetration	0.6	685,000	*	*
Other Sexual Violence	22.2	25,130,000	5.3	6,027,000
Made to penetrate	4.8	5,451,000	1.1	1,267,000
Sexual coercion	6.0	6,806,000	1.5	1,669,000
Unwanted sexual contact	11.7	13,296,000	2.3	2,565,000
Non-contact unwanted sexual experiences	12.8	14,450,000	2.7	3,037,000

[1]Rounded to the nearest thousand.
*Estimate is not reported; relative standard error >30% or cell size ≤ 20.

Now, let's compare that to the same number of female victims that fell into the "Completed Forced Penetration" category.

Table 2.1

Lifetime and 12 Month Prevalence of Sexual Violence — U.S. Women, NISVS 2010

	Lifetime		12 Month
	Weighted %	Estimated Number of Victims[1]	Weighted %	Estimated Number of Victims[1]
Rape	18.3	21,840,000	1.1	1,270,000
Completed forced penetration	12.3	14,617,000	0.5	620,000
Attempted forced penetration	5.2	6,199,000	0.4	519,000
Completed alcohol/drug facilitated penetration	8.0	9,524,000	0.7	781,000
Other Sexual Violence	44.6	53,174,000	5.6	6,646,000
Made to penetrate	*	*	*	*
Sexual coercion	13.0	15,492,000	2.0	2,410,000
Unwanted sexual contact	27.2	32,447,000	2.2	2,600,000
Non-contact unwanted sexual experiences	33.7	40,193,000	3.0	3,532,000

[1]Rounded to the nearest thousand.
*Estimate is not reported; relative standard error >30% or cell size ≤ 20.

And let us not forget that neither of these graphs include males who are raped in prison.

Tamen goes on to articulate more in his review of the subject:

> "[The] CDC apparently found it inappropriate to call it rape – or rather they think it's a unique male victimization that is separate from rape. The Crime Survey of England and Wales (CSEW) does not even bother to include it in the survey even if it under Sexual Offenses Act of 2003 Section 4 is punishable with a sentence up to life (SOA 2003 doesn't call it rape either). The latest CSEW did a split-sample experiment to test a new set of questions. The new questions had an option that male victims who had been made to penetrate could answer yes. The analysts classified those who answered yes to that question as NON-VICTIMS."

At this point it would probably good to remind you that this kind of hegemony over and shaping of descriptive language produces much more than just an imbalance in empathy between male and female victims of rape. As with most ideological objectives, it invariably leads to money, power and ultimately legislation that affects all victims.

The FBI, in January of 2012 redefined rape from a standard that had been applied since 1929. It now defines rape as, "[T]he penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim." This is according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

In other words, to be a rape, it must involve penetration, which makes male rape victims legally invisible. It also ensures that whatever slight awareness of them actually existed is further eroded.

If you still think I am the problem, and not the legacy of Koss' work, then you are part of this deprivation.

Addressing victims of rape is a federally and privately funded industry of significant proportions. It provides not only employment and organizational underwriting, it also serves as the academic raison d'être for ideologues like Mary P Koss. Entire careers are carved out of the institutional bedrock on theories, and often ideologies, as we see in the case of academic feminism.

Koss has a vested ideological, professional and financial interest in the idea that men cannot be raped, and even in the idea that whatever they may experience at the hands of female rapists, it does not impact them with the same intensity, or need for assistance (cha-ching), as when the same thing happens to women.

The short and sorry version of Koss' take on male rape by forced envelopment is that it does not happen, and even if it did, men aren't bothered by it. They have no pain that needs to be addressed, nor is the female rapist a problem we need to recognize.

In fact, this is woven into the progression of language we see from Koss as it morphs though the body of her work. She goes from not wanting to label women raping men as rape, then not wanting to label it "forced sex," and then changes it to "unwanted" sex and ultimately to "ambivalent" sex.

Let's see, even anecdotally, how that holds up. The following is another excerpt from the Genderratic Blog, and was originally posted to r/mensrights. Be advised, it is very graphic and may be disturbing for some.

First time I've told this story, other than to my doctor, therefore – throw away account. Also, I'm Swedish, so I'm sorry for all the grammar faults.

I was at a friend's party and got a few beers. I believe I was the least drunk there. One gal started to talk to me and coming on to me. I had a girlfriend at the time and I wasn't even attracted to her (big as a hippo), so I tried to ignore her.

A few hours later I was feeling very fuzzy in my head so I had to lie down for a bit. This struck me as odd, since the few beers were all I had to drink. Later on I understood that there were something else other than beers in one of the cans.

I woke up several hours later in my friend's bed which were on another floor than the party was held. I was still feeling fuzzy in my head, so I didn't really get what was going on. My hands and my feet were tied to the bed – each part in each corner. My dick hurt like crazy and I wanted to see what was going on down there. Someone was naked and riding my dick. It took me about five seconds until I understood that I was naked and was raped. It was the same girl who hit on me.

I screamed, but no one heard me. I tried to get away, but I couldn't move, both because I was tied down and also because of her weight.

Fifteen horrible minutes later she decided she was done with me and let me loose. I collapsed and couldn't move. She got dressed and went downstairs. I cried.

Apparently she couldn't get my dick hard, so she had shuffed[sic] a Q-tip without the cotton up my urethra so it would keep straight. Four years later, it still hasn't recovered.

Actually, this victim may be qualified under Koss' personal criteria as a rape victim, not because he was drugged and restrained and forced to penetrate his attacker, not because he was assaulted while unconscious but because she penetrated his urethra with an object in order to produce a simulated erection.

The difference between this man being raped and just having "ambivalent" sex is a Q-tip. And unless it was the Q-tip that made him shed tears, then his pain wasn't real either.

We have another case that was brought to the pages of this website. Former marine James Landrith met a woman in a night club through a friend and ended up having drinks with her. According to him, after agreeing to give the woman, who was pregnant, a ride home he wound up in a hotel, having been drugged, and woke up to find the woman on top of him with his penis inside her.

During the course of raping him, she threatened him with a rape allegation if he resisted, and also told him that any attempt to throw her off could harm her unborn child.

The rape happened before the young marine was 20 years old, and his response to the experience was typical for many victims of sexual trauma.

He embarked on a path of sexual recklessness and lost his trust in women, generally speaking. After 20 years of a dysfunctional reaction to the traumatic stress, he finally sought help and got it from a psychotherapist.

No thanks to Mary Koss. And likely no thanks to many readers of this article.

This attitude, so prevalent in modern culture, results in insensitivity that can only be described as mind boggling. From a report on the abuse of soldiers in Uganda. Eunice Owiny worked for Makerere University's Refugee Law Project (RLP) to help displaced people from all over Africa work through their traumas. Here is a sample of what she discovered there:

> "Men aren't simply raped, they are forced to penetrate holes in banana trees that run with acidic sap, to sit with their genitals over a fire, to drag rocks tied to their penis, to give oral sex to queues of soldiers, to be penetrated with screwdrivers and sticks."

Owiny may want to consult with Koss, as according to her worldview those men likely weren't raped, but the banana trees were.

The social mechanics of this imbalance in empathy and concern is simple. Misandry, the hatred of men and boys and the indifference to their pain, is a social norm. Koss uses the natural human tendency to be blind to the pain and suffering of men in order to shroud her agenda and her ethical failings in research.

She doesn't even have to work at it. The average human being will read the first few paragraphs of this article and indulge themselves in reflexive hatred for whoever wrote it. They will sputter out words like "despicable" and "horrible" like they had Tourette's.

But move them down the column and their emotions change. The spontaneous outbursts calm down. They may even scratch their heads and mutter something weak about how we need to look more into this. They may even have a moment where they are forced to feel some compassion for male victims (though no outrage for how we treat them).

And then they will shrug that off and go right back to being angry with me for treating women victims with such egregious insensitivity.

All because I wrote a few paragraphs of harsh satire, metaphorically putting shoes on women that we force men to walk in every day of their lives…for real.

That is, as a rule, what we think of the pain of men.

Oh, and for those of you who think Mary Koss is wrong but I am still shameless and disgusting for saying what I did, I suggest a trip to the mirror because you are more disgusting than either of us.

I know what Koss is like. I can deal with her. She is an ideologue with an agenda and it is plastered all over everything she does. She doesn't have empathy for men and she doesn't pretend to.

In that way I understand Black men who say they would rather deal with an open redneck than a closet racist. At least they know what they are getting.

But for those prone to convulse with repugnance over some satire but who ultimately feel nothing over the suffering of men and boys, no matter how horrible or unfair, I really do hope you are angry.

And I invite you choke on it.

You, not Mary Koss, are the reason this kind of writing is necessary in the first place.

CDC Report: http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/nisvs_report2010-a.pdf

Sex and attachment

Peter Wright · 23 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Did the image above get your attention?

Male motivation is tied to sexual reproduction and men are motivated primarily by sexual urges to mate with a female, right?

Wrong… it's more complex than that.

As far back as 1941 Scottish psychiatrist Ronald Fairbairn found that the desire for attachment in human beings, in terms of the overall psychobiological economy, is a more important necessity than the desire for sexual pleasure and reproduction.

This scientific finding, not controversial in the field of psychology, presents something of a heretical view to some of today's Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) who, by contrast, seem to have come in recent years to believe that males are chasing sexual reproduction only — which, oddly enough, seems similar to the stereotype of the "all men want is sex" misandrist paradigm we've all come to find so annoying.

Fairbairn's proposition is now many decades old, but his findings heralded a Copernican revolution within the world of scientific research that would culminate in today's attachment sciences; it moved the discussion beyond the reductionist sexual theories of Darwin and Freud and into new areas–more complex, more subtle, more nuanced, and ultimately more human.

The question attachment scientists explored is: why do couples continue to stay with each other years after producing offspring, and indeed sometimes for decades after all sexual activity has ceased in relationships? The answer is because human beings are pair bonders who get more out of attachment than they do out of fucking.

Since Fairbairn, studies have confirmed that humans possess an array of distinct motivational systems each in communication with the surrounding environment. Of those systems two are singled out as particularly powerful in motivating humans to form relationships – the sexual urge (eros), and -separately- the urge to attach. Of these, attachment is quite simply the most important to the continued survival of the individual. This cannot be overstated: attachment is the more important to individual survival.

As studies reveal, an absence of close and consistent human attachment causes children to literally wither and die, refusing to thrive even when being provided with clothing, food and an adequate number of toys. Children need reliable and consistent relationships in order to thrive. Likewise adults literally sicken both physically and mentally, and often commit suicide, to escape feelings of isolation and loneliness, especially after a relationship separation.

A lack of sexual contact on the contrary is not as life threatening; you will never see someone die simply because they didn't get to fuck with the opposite sex and reproduce. I would think that seals the case about what is really important to both men and women. Survival of the species depends on sex; survival of the individual depends on the vital bonds of attachment.

What does all this mean to Men Going Their Own Way?

Well, it means that we need to evaluate separately our attachment needs and our sexual needs, and avoid the common mistake of conflating them; especially if that conflation sees us rejecting both when in fact it may be only one of these causing most of our relationship angst. It may turn out that attachment and sex both need to be rejected, however that cannot be determined until we consider each factor separately and thoroughly.

In our psychobiological economy, various desires come into conflict with one another, each jostling for momentary supremacy where one imperative will usurp the claims of another. That game has reached a problematical impasse during the last 800 years because, during that (historically relatively short) time span, human culture has thrown the weight of its patronage into developing, intensifying and enforcing sexual gamesmanship (yes, including hypergamy) to the degree that our sexual compulsions appear pumped up on steroids and taken to extremes never before seen in the human animal (myths about widespread Roman orgies notwithstanding).

If we lived back in Ancient Greece, Rome or anywhere else we would view sex as little more than a bodily function akin to eating, shitting and sleeping – a basic bodily function without the hype. After the Middle Ages however it developed into a commodity to pimp and trade, and the new cult of sexualized romance that arose resulted in a frustration of our basic need for attachment – a frustration aided and abetted by social institutions placing sexual manipulation at the centre of human interactions.

During these fairly recent centuries of increased hypergamy and sexual focus, our drive to pair-bond continues to shout its demands even while being neglected. Observe for example the not-infrequent feelings of disillusionment and loneliness of serial partner upgraders (hypergamy) or of promiscuous gamers, or consider a beautiful young woman living in her mansion with an aged but wealthy husband to whom she has little or no emotional attachment; even if she is getting sex on the side her loneliness can eat away at her sense of contentment. These examples reveal an urgency surrounding attachment when it is neglected for the sake of secondary sexual or power gains.

Like men, women desire secure attachment beyond whatever sexual advantages they can and do exploit. However their hypergamous compulsions tend to get in the way and frustrate their powerful need to pair-bond. From the Middle Ages all the way to today we read of men and women bitterly disillusioned by the interference of hypergamy in the desire to form stable pair-bonds. Read for instance the bitter, antifeminist complaints of 12th century Andreas Capellanus or those of 14th century Christine de Pizan, or the disillusionment and ultimate rejection of the benefits of hypergamy in later works like Madam Bovary. These authors knew full well that sexualized romantic love had upset the balance of attachment security for both men and women alike.

The question those of us who consider ourselves MGTOW must ask ourselves is this: can our human need for attachment be indulged without men and women succumbing to the destructive manipulations of the modern sex code? As we stand atop our MGTOW mountains of freedom, rightly rejecting women and culture as bastions of exploitation, have we intellectually thrown out the attachment baby with the exploitation bathwater?

Sexual games need not get in the way of healthy attachment, so why should we live without relationships? Well no one ever said we had to, but in recent years I've sensed a trend both within and without the MGTOW community (which I've long been part of) that foregoing "relationships" is a necessary part of the deal.

This does not seem a prudent attitude to be cultivating, especially in young men who may now be reading about MGTOW philosophy and making extreme decisions about their lives; refusing to marry, cohabit, or procreate does not require a cutting off from human society. Even if we don't suicide from loneliness (as so many men do) we need to question if the absence of an intimate relationship in our lives can leave us limping, or somehow unfulfilled. Some will say no, and some of these naysayers may well be what are known as 'avoidant attachers.' Of those who would say yes, some might recommend we fill our intimacy void with friendships, which is I think a very good starting point. But this leads to a further question of whether there is an adequate formulation of friendship that can satisfy our needs in a modern context – a relationship that doesn't rely on the usual corruption at the core of sexualized romantic love.

These questions lead to an exploration of adult human attachment, and modern studies on the subject are abundant from psychological, biological and behavioural points of view. For those interested in following this subject further the Wikipedia entry on Attachment in Adults would be a good place to start, and to branch out from there. Of particular interest is the existence of four basic attachment styles in human beings, indicating that there must also be four main ways of doing MGTOW:

secure attachment (64% of the population)
anxious–preoccupied attachment (17% of the population) fearful–avoidant attachment (12% of the population) dismissive–avoidant attachment (7% of the population)

Only one of these styles (dismissive avoidant) involves a lack of desire for emotionally close relationships (relationships with minimal emotional intimacy may be tolerable to them), while the other three involve a desire to form emotionally intimate attachments. These are biologically-based traits appearing in each man before he elects to GHOW, and they help to account for the behavioral and ideological variability we see among MGTOW – for the most part we are working creatively with what's already in our make up rather than changing our core attachment style. Based on this taxonomy we can safely say there are four irreducible kinds of MGTOW:

Secure MGTOW
Anxious–preoccupied MGTOW
Fearful–avoidant MGTOW
Dismissive–avoidant MGTOW ('ghosts')

The four attachment styles and their implications for "ways of doing MGTOW" deserve a follow up article. While some MGTOW claim men do not need attachment at all, evidence is not in their favour. Thus, for most of us, constructing new ways to form secure relationships with our fellow humans in a rich and rewarding way is an important long-term question, even if we cannot pretend to have all the answers now; we start by knowing what we don't want: relationships of enslavement and entrapment to the opposite sex (or anyone else for that matter) in an environment that makes healthy attachment difficult. But how do we forge a more positive model for human relationships and attachment for ourselves?

We started this essay with an important question: are sex and attachment two relatively different motivations? The answer is a resounding yes! Yes, despite all the pop culture bombardment of sex, sex, sex, the sexual shaming of men, and all the rest, the answer is yes: sex and attachment are not the same. People can live their lives avoiding sexual games but they will not end their lives happily unless they meet their attachment requirements. And while this journey will be different for each man going his own way, we must not flinch from seeing the problem for what it is: not "overcoming our urge to procreate," but rather, how to be healthy human beings able to recognize and fulfill our natural need for human intimacy.

Sources

– Frederico Pereira, David E. Scharff, M. D. Fairbairn and Relational Theory (2002)
– Fairbairn, W.R.D., 'Psychoanalytic Studies of the Personality'. (2013)
– Shaver, P.R., Handbook of attachment – Second Edition (2008)
– Shaver, P.R., Attachment in Adulthood: Structure, Dynamics and Change (2010)

Cosmo doesn't support domestic violence anymore!

Mark Trueblood · 23 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I am one of many who feels that 2013 is shaping up to be a big year for the Men's Human Rights Movement. Here's some happy news I thought I'd share. Apparently Cosmopolitan no longer encourages women to commit domestic violence against their significant others. Let's give them a big round of applause! Yay!

In this article, Anna Breslaw writes a strong and compassionate message about the reality of female-on-male domestic violence. After reporting on the abuse Evan Peters suffered, allegedly at the hands of Emma Roberts, Breslaw asks:

> So just how prevalent is domestic violence against a male partner? Many people are of the opinion that men "can't be physically abused" the way men "can't be raped," because men are generally stronger than and can subsequently overpower women. Incidentally, neither of these are true.

She goes on to cite two studies that note various statistics on male victims of domestic violence. Her sources seem solid, but it would have been even more awesome if she had shared this study as well. Still, I give Breslaw a lot of credit. She's speaking out about something that few people are willing to. And she concludes her article with this wonderful message:

> So don't forget to pay mind: This does happen, and it needs just as much awareness and prevention as male-on-female domestic assault.

Seriously, three cheers for Anna Breslaw. You seem to be a person who has genuine, heartfelt compassion for victims of DV.

I say this article represents a big step forward for Cosmopolitan, because a couple of years ago they published "10 Things to Do if You Think Your Man Is Cheating." This article offers modern, empowered women a convenient list of iniquities they can heap upon a man they "think" is cheating. Here's some choice tips:

> 7. Invite your friends to a backyard bonfire using his clothes and prized sports equipment as kindling.

Awesome! Theft and property damage! You go girl!

> 9. Serve up Ex-Lax brownies to give him puh-lenty of time to sit and think about what he's done.

Poisoning with an OTC medication! Totally fair punishment for a man you think might have cheated on you!

> 10. Challenge him to a naked wrestling match and whip out your signature move, the Ten-Fingered Ball-Crusher.

Great idea! After all, you're pretty sure those balls may have gotten busy with someone else. Go ahead and viciously attack your lover based on an intuition. He had it coming, because Patriarchy or something.

But I digress. Let's hope Cosmopolitan can move forward with this new "Domestic Violence Is Bad" policy.

We believe in you!

The past ain't through with us

Jason Gregory · 23 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There are stories of coincidence and chance and intersections and strange things told and which is which and who only knows… and so it goes and so it goes and the book says, we may be through with the past, but the past ain't through with us.–Magnolia

If the "past ain't through with us," what's the point of deliberating about going our own way and of outright making the choice to go our own way? If the "past ain't through with us," are MGTOWs and other men "choosing" to go their own way, or are they simply passive actors, soldiers on the battlefield possessed by thoughts of helplessness, caught within a storm, too close to observe its beauty, wrenched with fear and immobilized by their fate?

I've been asking this question for a good while now and when I hear statements from various MGTOWs describing Briffault's Law as the inherent nature of women, when I hear statements like "men will not change," I suspect there may be a strand of fatalism that runs deep within some MGTOWs' personal philosophies. MGTOWs should be careful and would be wise to not fall into the trap of invincible fatalism and, by extension, other sorts of various determinisms. Doing so makes all the deliberation about going our own way and opting out of marriage and similar relationships unintelligible.

Even though there may be a sense of comfort, a solace to be got from embracing fatalism, doing so undermines the deliberation and subsequent choices made by men who go their own way. The problem here is that deliberation is an unintelligible and useless endeavor for the fatalist.

At first glance, it would seem that men who are going their own way may have deliberated and made their choice. However, it may well be the case that some MGTOWs are simply fatalists who sit back like passive observers and take comfort in knowing that things are the way they are because things simply could not be otherwise. Consider this statement from Stardusk:

I've come to the conclusion that men, generally speaking, are just that and that's all they want to be. They do not wish to be anything else, nor can they envision themselves being anything else.

This statement seems to fit nicely within the framework of a fatalism—of men's prior and continuing facticity as tools—as men whose "past ain't through" with them . Men are "fossils," as Stardusk says. They are what they are and they will not be otherwise. It's almost as if a place of solace is being created within a position of stoicism, wrapped in a shell of deliberation and choice. Consider this description of fatalism from Richard Taylor.

We are all, at certain moments of pain, threat, or bereavement, apt to entertain the idea of fatalism, the thought that what is happening at a particular moment is unavoidable, that we are powerless to prevent it. Sometimes we find ourselves in circumstances not of our own making, in which our very being and destinies are so thoroughly anchored that the thought of fatalism can be quite overwhelming, and sometimes consoling. One feels that whatever then happens, however good or ill, will be what those circumstances yield, and we are helpless. Soldiers, it is said, are sometimes possessed by such thoughts. Perhaps everyone would feel more inclined to them if they paused once in a while to think of how little they ever had to do with bringing themselves to wherever they have arrived in life, how much of their fortunes and destinies were decided for them by sheer circumstance, and how the entire course of their lives is often set, once and for all, by the most trivial incidents, which they did not produce and could not even have foreseen. If we are free to work out our destinies at all, which is doubtful, we have a freedom that is at best exercised within exceedingly narrow paths. All the important things—when we are born, of what parents, into what culture, whether we are loved or rejected, whether we are male or female, our temperament, our intelligence or stupidity, indeed everything that makes for the bulk of our happiness and misery —all these are decided for us by the most casual and indifferent circumstances, by sheer coincidences, chance encounters, and seemingly insignificant fortuities. One can see this in retrospect if he searches, but few search. The fate that has given us our very being has given us also our pride and conceit, and has thereby formed us so that, being human, we congratulate ourselves on our blessings, which we call our achievements; blame the world for our blunders, which we call our misfortunes; and scarcely give a thought to that impersonal fate that arbitrarily dispenses both. –Richard Taylor, Metaphysics 3rd Edition.

The above passage from Taylor's classic is a compelling description of and introduction to fatalism. It's the opening passage in his chapter on fatalism and these sorts of passages, with their soothing style and humble attitude, permeate his book and other writings. Even when I disagree with him, there is a kind of soothing solace to be got from his words.

I believe there are similarities between fatalists like Richard Taylor and some of the men who are going their own way. For Taylor, fatalism is the belief that whatever happens is and always was unavoidable. Although this may sound a bit like determinism, Taylor is careful to make a distinction between determinism and fatalism. Determinism, for Taylor, is the theory that all events are rendered unavoidable by their causes. Fatalism, simply put, is the belief that whatever happens is unavoidable. It may seem like a minor distinction, but Taylor is quick to point out that determinists, if being consistent, should very well also be fatalists. Determinists simply wrap a layer of theory about causality around fatalism. As such, the fatalist can deliver a rather humbling blow to the pride of determinists who do not consider themselves to be fatalists.

Could it be that some in the MGTOW community are simply adding a wrapper of deliberation and choice to their fatalist philosophy? Perhaps some in the MGTOW community are fatalists first and MGTOWs second? If this is the case, what happens to the foundations of a fundamentally deliberative philosophy like going our own way? A fatalist philosophy is antithetical to a deliberative philosophy. If there is no liberation to be got from deliberating about going our own way, then there is no point to deliberation, and by extension, there is no point in going our own way. In other words, a fatalist who "chooses" to go his own way makes no sense. The fatalists and the deliberative MGTOW are mutually exclusive. Trying to be both at the same time is fallacious incoherent gibberish. Care should be taken to make a clear distinction between a MGTOW and a fatalist who wraps his fatalism in MGTOW skin. It's a trap.

Taylor mentions a number of possible reasons for believing in fatalism. The primary reason for believing in fatalism is a matter of truth. Taylor argues that there is a body of truth concerning the past and that it is natural to suppose that there is a body of truth concerning the future. As such, Taylor says that "there existed a set of true statements about his life, both past and future…[and that]…each of us has but one possible future, described by that totality of statements about oneself in the future tense, each of which happens to be true (Metaphysics 67)." As such, there are two mutually exclusive, but exhaustive classes of statements—all those that are true, and the class of all that are false. Nobody has ever changed the truth-value of any of these statements and nobody ever will. That is all and there are no others. The totality of these statements constitutes a person's biography.

Notice the similarities between such beliefs about a person's biography and the biographies of women as hypergamous and as inherently abusive to men via Briffault's Law. A person does not deviate from these statements that coincide with their actions. To do so would be to render a false statement true or a true statement false—something that would be a logical fallacy and violate the Law of Excluded Middle.

Taylor extrapolates by writing that "there is nothing anybody can do about [the past, and]…by the same token, of the future of everything under the sun. Whatever the future might hold, there is nothing anybody can do about it now. What will happen cannot be altered. The mere fact that it is going to happen guarantees this (Metaphysics 67,68)." Taylor writes that he must "assume certain things are true," if he is to deliberate, because he finds himself making "certain presuppositions" without which "it would be impossible to deliberate at all (Metaphysics 42)."

For fatalists like Taylor (and some self-proclaimed MGTOWs), the "past ain't through with" us and neither is the future.

Taylor lays out some important distinctions about deliberation. I largely agree with most of his distinctions.

However, two of his distinctions are problematic for the fatalist. Firstly, deliberation is only possible about future things, never about past or present things. Secondly, Taylor writes that "I cannot deliberate about what to do, even though I may not know what I am going to do, unless I believe that it is up to me what I am going to do." So, for Taylor, if a fatalist is to deliberate, it must be about future things and it must be about things that he believes are up to him.

For men going their own way, marriage is about a future thing and whether or not a man marries is something that is "up to him."

"If I am within the power of another person, or at the mercy of circumstances over which I have no control…I cannot deliberate about it. I can only wait and see (Taylor, Metaphysics 43)." As such, a fatalist thinks of the future in the way we all think of the past but "…the future is still obscure to us, and we are therefore tempted to invest it, in our imagination, with all sorts of 'possibilities' (Taylor, Metaphysics 60)." However, Taylor writes in the same paragraph that the "fatalist resists this temptation, knowing that mere ignorance can hardly give rise to any genuine possibility in things (Metaphysics 60)." Taylor goes on to describe the fatalist as one who views the past and future "the way God is supposed to view them [the past and future] (Metaphysics 60)."

Fatalists think of the future in the way we all think of the past and I'd say that some MGTOWs think of the future in the same way. I'd say that this sort of MGTOW isn't really a MGTOW. Perhaps a more fitting description would be a fatalist-wrapped-in-MGTOW-skin (FWMGTOW). These FWMGTOWs believe that they are at the mercy of circumstances over which they have no control—the "inherent nature" of women and men, the abusive nature of society towards men as objects of utility, and etc. Perhaps these FWMGTOWs resist the "temptation" to imagine a possible future in which men are not at the mercy of such circumstance because they believe such possibility isn't genuine. Perhaps such FWMGTOWs believe they have a "God's-eye point-of-view" and believe that imagined possibility is a sort of sin, a transgression of fallacy.

According to Taylor, the fatalist is smart enough to resist this temptation. The fatalist is supposed to have the truth because the fatalist is supposed to have the "God's-eye point-of-view." It is as though Taylor subscribes to the Platonic realm of ideas, saying that to believe the ideal truth is a matter of having the God's-eye point-of-view. An imagination about possibilities is simply a step removed from the ideal truth, for imagined possibilities are not genuine possibilities. They are a sin of sorts to be cast out of Plato's Republic.

The "God's-eye point-of-view" is itself an imagined possibility, but I'll let that slide, for there isn't enough room to get into that—at least not in this paper.

Here is the problem for fatalists (and FWMGTOWs). It seems that the first distinction (deliberation being about future things) allows Taylor (and FWMGTOWs) to say that he deliberates about future things, but at the same time, say that this deliberation is merely imaginative ignorance and self-deception about future things—things that are not "up to him." It is difficult to see how Taylor (if being consistent) would ever be able to say that there is any utility in deliberating about future things. If deliberating is simply a matter of imaginative ignorance—an elaborate self-deception, then Taylor seems committed to saying that deliberation is itself confusion between genuine and imagined possibilities. In fact, deliberating about the utility of possible future things would be mere futility.

The whole process of weighing options in regards to marriage and other similar relationships would be nothing but a sham—an elaborate self-deception. For a man who takes pride in his logic and clear-thinking, the man who goes his own way via fate, rather than choice, has deceived himself about his options and all the work he may have put into deliberating about marriage and other options.

As such, their deliberation about what to do makes no sense. Deliberation is reduced to a sort of routine of motions. Fatalists (and FWMGTOWs) would simply be going through motions, like a machine outputting widgets—making deliberation itself unavoidable. Deliberating about something that one has no ability to change seems like unintelligible deliberation to me. It removes the instrumentality from deliberation. If the result of an elaborate deliberation process nets the same result as not deliberating at all, because whatever happens is unavoidable, then deliberation is useless…and so is the process of weighing and making a cost-benefit analysis of marriage. As such, fatalists (and FWMGTOWs) have to admit that they are either incoherent about deliberation, or that deliberation is useless.

I'm not at all denigrating MGTOWs. I suppose I am one. I simply don't fall into the trap of invincible fatalism. I don't take solace in believing that things will not change. I don't believe that things simply are the way they are because things cannot be otherwise. Care should be taken to not fall into this fatalist trap, for if you do fall into the trap, much of what you say becomes incoherent gibberish. If you decided to go your own way because you are at the mercy of circumstances beyond your control, then what did you deliberate about? What did you choose? Nothing. You yourself would be a circumstance out of your own control. Therefore, any deliberation you may have done to make a decision about going your own way makes no sense.

If the past ain't through with us, then what the hell is this thing that we are doing–going our own way?

This cannot be one of those things. This, please, cannot be that. This was not just a matter of chance. These strange things happen all the time. –Magnolia

Misandry in psychology: reproductive coercion

Tom Golden · 24 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

This is the third part of a four-part series of articles about the bias against men and boys in psychological research. There is a video companion to this series that summarizes the contents of these articles. A link to this video will appear at the end of this article.

I was browsing on the web and happened to read an article about a study on "Reproductive Coercion." As I read it, I was amazed at the statistics. One article said that 53% of women surveyed had experienced violence in relationships. "Wow" I thought, that's over half of the respondents. That's quite a few. I read on and read other stats that were equally shocking. I began to wonder about how the researchers had come up with such alarming statistics.

My interest stimulated, I started searching for articles on this particular study. There were plenty. One from Newsweek, one from Science News Daily, one from Medical News Today, one from EScience News, one from the LA Times and so on. All made similar claims about the study and often used the same quotations and the same statistics. I kept looking for more articles, thinking that statistics as strong as these must originate in some unusual phenomenon. I wondered if their sample was biased in some way. Perhaps, I thought, the way that they had defined their terms had inflated the numbers. Finally, I found one from the lead researcher's college newspaper. The Aggie was a student paper at the University of California, Davis. This article included something that the others had omitted: that the survey had been done on an "impoverished" population of African American and Hispanic women. It went on to warn that the study should not be generalized: "The five clinics surveyed were in impoverished neighborhoods with Latinas and African Americans comprising two-thirds of the respondents. The results are expected to be applicable to reproductive health clinics in demographically poor areas. Researchers cannot estimate if surveys at private gynecologists would produce similar results."

Suddenly, the results started to make sense. We know that lower socio-economic levels tend to show much higher levels of interpersonal violence (IPV). One Department of Justice report shows that women with lower income levels are almost three times as likely to experience relationship violence as those with higher incomes. We know that women in rental housing are three times as likely to experience IPV, moreover, as those who own houses. This sample of impoverished women, therefore, dramatically increased the likelihood of finding higher rates of IPV.

Then, I started to wonder. Why did all of the articles that millions of people had read, miss important information about the sample? Clearly, the journalists were not doing their homework. Consequently, they were distributing misinformation.

I needed a copy of the study. I found it online at Contraception,the journal that had published the original article. After reading it, I was shocked. It contained no mention at all of the sample's socio-economic context. No mention, in other words, of whether they were rich or poor. I had earlier assumed that lazy journalists had not done their homework by taking the time to read the original report on this study.. But I now realized that something else entirely had been going on. The information had been omitted from that original report. No fewer than seven researchers had written it, which means that at least seven people had read and edited it. How could all seven have left out anything so basic as a description of the sample?

I decided to ask the lead researcher, Dr. Elizabeth Miller, about this. Had the Aggie made a mistake? She replied very pleasantly a few days later, apologizing for the delay. Yes, she said, the Aggie was indeed correct; the sample had included mostly disadvantaged African American and Hispanic women. I wrote her back very quickly, asking why the article in Contraception had omitted that information. Was she not worried that journalists for the mass media were already implying that the study could generalize to the population at large? She wrote me back once but never offered any answers to those questions.

At that point, I contacted Gabrielle Grow, who had written the Aggie article and congratulated her on a job well done. I asked her how she had found out about the sample being "impoverished." She told me that it was merely one of the questions that she had asked the researchers in an interview. I wrote her back, congratulated her again, and explained that journalists for every major national outlet had all missed that important bit of information. Only she had asked the important question.

UCD study shows abusive partners sabotage birth control

But precisely why had the big-time journalists not asked the same question? We don't yet know the answer to that question. All we do know is that the researchers issued a press release about their findings and never mentioned the sample. As a direct result, they never mentioned the fact, which they note in their own study, that poor people report much higher rates of IPV than other people do and thus inflates the incidence when conflated with reports from the general population. The research refers, in short, only to those who live in poor neighborhoods. Here are some of the points that the press release (as distinct from the original study) made:

1. Young women and teenage girls often face efforts by male partners to sabotage their birth control by damaging condoms and destroying contraceptives. Sometimes, these men resort to emotional pressure or even coercion..

1. Fifty-three percent of respondents said that they had experienced physical or sexual violence from an intimate partner.

No wonder readers got the impression that this study applies to the general population–even though the researchers, when Grow asked them, admitted that the study applies only to the poor. One must assume that the researchers failed to mention this important information not only in their press release but also in their interviews. Actually, they said very little that might have discouraged journalists from playing this as a study about men and women in general.

This is obvious when you look at the headlines and quotes from various news articles. Here is a sampling:

NEWSWEEK

"What we're seeing is that, in the larger scheme of violence against women and girls, it is another way to maintain control," says Miller."

"The man is taking away a woman's power to decide she's not going to have a child."

LA Times

"Reproductive coercion is a factor in unintended pregnancies"

"Young women even report that their boyfriends sabotage birth control to get them pregnant."

ScienceDaily

"Over half the respondents — 53 percent — said they had experienced physical or sexual violence from an intimate partner."

"The study also highlights the importance of working with young men to prevent both violence against female partners and coercion around pregnancy."

Physorg

"Approximately one in five young women said they experienced pregnancy coercion"

ESCIENCE NEWS

"Young women and teenage girls often face efforts by male partners to sabotage birth control or coerce pregnancy — including damaging condoms and destroying contraceptives"

INSCIENCES

"This study highlights an under-recognized phenomenon where male partners actively attempt to promote pregnancy against the will of their female partners," said lead study author Elizabeth Miller.

MEDICAL NEWS TODAY

Headline – Physical or Sexual Violence Often Accompanies Reproductive Coercion

END ABUSE .org

"It finds that young women and teenage girls often face efforts by male partners to sabotage their birth control or coerce or pressure them to become pregnant – including by damaging condoms and destroying contraceptives."

What do all of these headlines and quotations have in common? They all sound as if the study in question applies to the general population of men and women, boys and girls. The circulation of Newsweek is 2.7 million, so that source alone gave many people the impression that men in general coerce women in general into pregnancy.

The first level is that of the research paper itself. Many specialists surely read Contraception. The next level is that of the mass media, in which journalists misrepresented the original research. But the third level, that of follow-ups on blogs, went even further. Here are just a few examples of what happens in the blogosphere:

Here's a headline from a blog:

Crazy, Condom-Puncturing Control Freaks Are Often Men

So we have gone from omitting the nature of the sample to the printing of articles in the national media that implicate men in general and once this happens the end users at the blogs take that information and exaggerate it much farther. Here's another example:

"There is a new study which discusses a horribly prevalent but rarely discussed form of intimate partner violence: reproductive coercion."

So, we have gone from low-income black and Hispanic women claiming that they are victims of coercion by their sexual partners to global pronouncements about reproductive coercion being "horribly prevalent." Right. Those crazy condom puncturing control freaks are part of a horribly prevalent pattern.

It doesn't take much imagination to see the next step as dinner table conversation. The daughter announces over dessert that men puncture condoms and force women into pregnancy. Mom tells her that this can't be true, The daughter pulls up the article in Newsweek and then to the accompanying blog. Dad is still unimpressed–until she pulls up a link to the study, which partially verifies her false claim. Everyone at table is convinced now that men in general are coercing women in general into pregnancy.

This is the way in which "memes" get started. A "research" article tells half the story, and journalists not only misinterpret it but also pass on their misinterpretation to unwitting millions. This is precisely what happened in connection with research on domestic violence. Early feminist researchers only told half the story, that women were victims of domestic violence and men were perpetrators. Journalists simply reported on that story. By now, millions of people—both women and men—believe that only women are the victims of domestic violence and only men the perps.

The scientific method is very clear. You create a hypothesis and find a way to test it. You then carefully sift through the test data and account for the data that affirm your hypothesis and explain away data that conflict with it. Over and over again, feminist researchers have simply ignored data that conflict with their ideologically influenced hypotheses, (male victims) and focused solely on data that confirm it (female victims). In this study, the researchers failed even to interview the accused men to get their side of the story or ask the accusing women if they, too, had resorted to some form of coercion. Instead, the researchers asked only questions that were likely to provide them with the "acceptable" answers and asked only those who were likely to provide them with these answers.

In the case, the researchers “forgot” to remind journalists that their sample was very limited. As in the first study about teen violence, a press release has steered the data. Could this have been an honest mistake? If so, I would have expected Miller to answer my questions about the sample. But she did not. One could easily conclude that the mistake was a politically motivated one, not an honest one.

Perhaps we will never know. But I know what my guess is. What’s yours?

Notes:

1. Many thanks to Typhonblue for pointing out to me that the CDC has statistics on reproductive coercion. And guess what. Their data indicate that men are more likely to be victims than women. Of the men, 8.7% were victims; of the women, 4.8%. This figure excludes conflict over the use a condom, which could be due to sensation and not necessarily to reproductive control.

http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/nisvs_report2010-a.pdf

1. I inquired about the issues examined in this article to the editors of the Journal Contraception. Their response? “So sorry, not able to comment. This article was handled by the previous editor.” Pretty much an expected denial and refusal to take any responsibility.

3. A 2013 USA Today article gives you a sense of how people have spun this idea. They refrain from mentioning that men are the victims of reproductive coercion more often than women are, from asking male victims of this abuse to seek help at DV hotlines and from defining reproductive coercion as follows; “Reproductive coercion occurs whenever a partner tries to prevent a woman from making her own choices about pregnancy … thus ignoring male victims and female perps.

Judge Michael J. Kelly Conflict of Interest

VFM News and Commentary · 24 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Family judge/board member orders defendant to take classes at his own nonprofit organization

Public defender challenges judge's use of Magistrate Express

Kanawha County, West Virginia Family Law judge Michael J. Kelly has been previously noted for his retaliatory bias against Mark Hallburn for Hallburn's part in the Judicial Investigation Commission hearing of judge William M. "Chip" Watkins, III.

Recently, judge Kelly has been accused of violating the Code of Judicial Conduct in another case.

According to Assistant Kanawha County Public Defender Sara Whitaker, Kelly's displayed bias by using Magistrate Express, a database for prosecutors, public defenders and courthouse personnel, to dig into the criminal history of defendants in his courtroom.

Whitaker filed a writ of prohibition asking that Kelly be prohibited from doing the same in the case of her client Thomas J. Cobb III. Shortly after, Kelly ordered Cobb to take classes taught by the Kanawha Institute for Social Research and Action, a faith-based nonprofit organization. Cobb will also have to pay a $160.80 monitoring fee.

Kelly is listed on the organization's website as a member of its board of directors.

No statement has been made by either Judge Kelly or the KISRA board regarding this conflict of interest.

MGTOW in 1929

Robert St. Estephe · 24 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

…

[image]

MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) is a term coined in the 2000s to describe the deliberate retrenchment of men who recognize that cultural misandry has rendered the romantic landscape a legal and financial minefield. Yet the abuses of out-of-control female privilege as exploited by the all-too-common predators, narcissists and sociopaths of the fair sex has long been recognized as is evidenced from the 1929 article presented below.

NOTE: Author Dorothy Dix was the Oprah of the 1920s-1930s. She was the most widely read advice columnist of her day, with her writings syndicated in newspapers across the globe.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT: I often wonder that the modern woman does not perceive that she is killing the goose that lays the golden egg by her attitude toward men. By which I mean to say that it is women themselves who are destroying the things that they value most in life. It is women's hands that are tearing to tatters the chiffons of romance and sentiment and idealism in which men have always clothed them. It is women who are stifling tenderness and slaying chivalry in the hearts of men. It is women who are doing away with all the graces and sweetnesses that made charm in the relationship between men and women and that incidentally lured men into matrimony.

For women are making men afraid of them and what they will do to them and that makes men cold and cautious in dealing with the fair sex. Even Romeo watches his step and counts the calories in his sweet talk when he keeps a date with Juliet nowadays.

Women don't like this. They complain bitterly that there are no impassioned lovers. They say that young men are so afraid they may compromise themselves by their attentions to a girl that ten minutes alter meeting her they serve notice on her that they have no intention of marrying and that even one's fiance's letters read like a communication about the state of the stock market instead of being an outpouring of burning affection.

And women don't seem to see that they are to blind for this state of affairs and that the reason for it is because they have taken love and lovemaking and even marriage out of the realm of sentiment and pinned a price tag on them and commercialized them. They have made men pay through the nose for romantic dalliance and idle words said on a moonlight night, and that is why Dan Cupid, who is no bill collector, has packed up his arrows and fled the scene.

Thus have many women been cut out of the pleasure and excitement of playing the love game, for no man dares take a hand in that now unless he is ready to pay up if the lady calls his bluff.

In our mother's time it is doubtful if there was any woman so unattractive that some man at some time didn't whisper soft nothing in her ear and tell her what beautiful eyes she had and how different she was from all other women and how the first time he ever saw her he felt that she was the only woman who ever really understood him and how sweet life would be if he could have such a woman as the by his side and who didn't send her gooey songs and slushy poetry.

[image]

But now it is a common thing to have an attractive woman in her 30s or 40s tell you that she never had a beau in her life and that the nearest approach to sentiment she has never had a beau in her life and that the nearest approach to sentiment she has ever heard from any man is when her boss said: “Miss Pothooks, you certainly are a peach of a stenographer and I don’t know how I would get along without you.”

The reason for this is, of course, that men are afraid to make love to a girl unless they are prepared to lead her to the altar. For over their heads dangles the sword of the breach-of-promise suit. They have seen Juliet cashing in too often on Romeo’s unguarded vows to take any chances themselves.

Now, of course, every woman yearns to be deeply and truly loved and to feel that some man is mad about her, but synthetic love is better than no love at all, and every woman would rather have been philandered with than to have been passed over entirely. The flirtations give her a tag end of romance at least to tuck away in her memory and to keep her from feeling that she was wholly lacking in attraction to men.

Also, man, women who have good jobs with fat pay envelopes and who are interested in their business or professions don’t want to marry, but they do enjoy the society of men, which they might have if the predatory women hadn’t made feminine companionship such a hazardous and expensive luxury for men to indulge themselves in.

And there is the matter of love letters. Men used to pour forth their souls to their lady loves in beautiful poetic letters that were like the beating of a heart in one’s hand. There are love letters that have come down through the ages to us as gems of literature, and in the old days every woman had packets of love letters, tied with blue ribbon, hidden away among her treasures that she took out and read when she was old and that brought her girlhood flooding back upon her once more. Grandma wore grandpa’s love letters under her laces on her breast.

But the love letter has become as extinct as the Dodo. The modern youth when, away from his sweetie, communicates with her by radio or wireless or telegraph or he dictates it to a stenographer, and if the modern girl should put her steady’s letter above her Heart she would think she had an ice pack on and get a chill.

Why? Because women have made men afraid to write love letters. They have seen too many people snickering as they read some man’s impassioned maunderings in the newspapers and they know none but the foolhardy put down in black and white on paper the sentiments that seem so sweet and noble when they are written and that sound such idiotic twaddle when they are read aloud in court or appear in print.

Worse still, women are keeping men from marrying by demanding so much alimony that it makes matrimony not only a gamble in happiness but the most risky financial speculation they can engage in.

Under the present laws a man can marry a girl who makes no effort in any way to be a good wife. She can refuse to keep house, refuse to bear children. She can be lazy, extravagant, high-tempered, nagging and make his life a torment to him, yet she can force him to support her as long as he lives. And, such being the case, it is not strange that prudent men are shying away more and more from the altar.

These are facts which I respectfully submit to my sister women. And I would also call their attention to what happened to the greedy woman who killed the goose that laid the golden egg.

DOROTHY DIX.

[Dorothy Dix, “Why Can’t The Modern Woman See That She Is Killing the Goose That Lays the Golden Eggs When She Places a Commercial Value on Every Endearment a Man Utters, Cries Dorothy Dix,” syndicated, The Bee (Danville, W. Va.), Dec. 6, 1929, p. 12]

***

Editor’s note: feature image by 401kcalculator. –DE

The Voice of Europe: Historical myths

Lucian Vâlsan · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On July 26, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff and whoever shall call in will be talking about the constant process of rewriting history in which various gender ideologues (and, frankly, ideologues in general) engage constantly in order to suppress facts and make it all look like the reality is fitting to their ideology.

To make things worse, some of their lies and their misleading interpretations of history have now become quite mainstream and, in some countries (like Sweden), are quite close to be deemed State truths – like in the University of Uppsala from Sweden where the "gender power structure perspective" (könskraft perspektiv) was deemed as absolute binding truth and contesting it would mean the end of one's academic career.

There are many myths that people believe. For instance, it's still a common belief that Columbus was the first European to go to America – in spite of the fact that it is already a matter of historical fact that the Norwegian exploratory Leiv Eiriksson did that almost 500 years earlier and established the first settlement there – Vinland (today, Newfoundland, Canada).

But what are the historical myths constantly advanced with regards to relationships between men and women? We will try to analyze and debunk as many as possible, this Friday, on The Voice of Europe!

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Tell us about the lies about your country's history that are being advanced by gender ideologues!

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

MGTOW: 12th century style

Peter Wright · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Middle Ages Europe is widely considered the birthplace of 'protofeminism' – the forerunner to modern feminism. At that time a chaplain named Andreas Capellanus, whom we might consider the first antifeminist and 'MGTOW' of the period, wrote a book describing the escalating problem of female avarice, manipulativeness, narcissism, underserved sense of entitlement, and hypergamy. Interestingly, Andreas links all these problems with the birth of courtly love – the subject of his book – and recommends all men learn to reject romantic relationships with women and "trample under your foot all of its rules."

While the piece is written in anger at the emerging gynocentric culture, it contains truths that echo much of what MGTOW are reacting to today – in particular the world's encouragement, protection and enforcement of female hypergamy. The following is an excerpt from Capellanus' amazing work. PW

The Art of Courtly Love
By Andreas Capellanus (1174)

The mutual love which you seek in women you cannot find, for no woman ever loved a man or could bind herself to a lover in the mutual bonds of love. For a woman's desire is to get rich through love, but not to give her lover the solaces that please him. Nobody ought to wonder at this, because it is natural. According to the nature of their sex all women are spotted with the vice of a grasping and avaricious disposition, and they are always alert and devoted to the search for money or profit. I have travelled through a great many parts of the world, and although I made careful inquiries I could never find a man who would say that he had discovered a woman who, if a thing was not offered to her, would not demand it insistently and would not hold off from falling in love unless she got rich gifts in one way or another. But even though you have given a woman innumerable presents, if she discovers that you are less attentive about giving her things than you used to be, or if she learns that you have lost your money, she will treat like a perfect stranger who has come from some other country, and everything you do will bore her or annoy her. You cannot find a woman who will love you so much or be so constant to you that if somebody else comes to her and offers her presents she will be faithful to her love.

Women have so much avarice that generous gifts break down all the barriers of their virtue. If you come with open hands, no women will let you go away without that which you seek; while if you don't promise to give them a great deal, you needn't come to them and ask for anything. Even if you are distinguished by royal honors, but bring no gifts with you, you will get absolutely nothing from them; you will be turned away from their doors in shame.

Because of their avarice all women are thieves, and we say they carry purses. You cannot find a woman of such lofty station or blessed with such honor or wealth that an offer of money will not break down her virtue, and there is no man, no matter how disgraced and low-born he is, who cannot seduce her if he has great wealth. This is so because no woman ever has enough money – just as no drunkard ever thinks he has had enough to drink. Even if the whole earth and sea were turned to gold, they could hardly satisfy that avarice of a woman.

Furthermore, not only is every woman by nature a miser, but she is also envious and a slanderer of other women, greedy, a slave to her belly, inconstant, fickle in her speech, disobedient and impatient of restraint, spotted with the sin of pride and desirous of vainglory, a liar, a drunkard, a babbler, no keeper of secrets, too much given to wantonness, prone to every evil, and never loving any man in her heart.

Now woman is a miser, because there isn't a wickedness in the world that men can think of that she will not boldly indulge in for the sake of money, and, even if she has an abundance she will not help anyone who is in need. You can more easily scratch a diamond with your fingernail than you can by any human ingenuity get a woman to consent to giving you any of her savings. Just as Epicurus believed that the highest good lay in serving the belly, so a woman thinks that the only things worth while in this world are riches and holding on to what she has. You can't find any woman so simple and foolish that she is unable to look out for her own property with a greedy tenacity, and with great mental subtlety get hold of the possessions of someone else. Indeed, even a simple woman is more careful about selling a single hen than the wisest lawyer is in deeding away a great castle. Furthermore, no woman is ever so violently in love with a man that she will not devote all her efforts to using up his property. You will find that this rule never fails and admits of no exceptions.

That every woman is envious is also found to be a general rule, because a woman is always consumed with jealousy over another woman's beauty, and she loses all her pleasure in what she has. Even if she knows that it is the beauty of her own daughter that is being praised, she can hardly avoid being tortured by hidden envy. Even the neediness and the great poverty of the neighbour women seem to her abundant in wealth and riches, so that we think of the old proverb which says, "the crop in the neighbour's field is always more fertile, and your neighbour's cow has a larger udder," seems to refer to the female sex without question. It can hardly come to pass that one woman will praise the good character or the beauty of another, and if she should happen to do so, the next minute she adds some qualification that undoes all she has said in her praise.

And so it follows that woman is a slanderer, because slander can only spring from envy and hate. That is a rule that women do not want to break; she prefers to keep it unbroken. It is not easy to find a woman whose tongue can ever spare anybody or who can keep from words of detraction. Every woman thinks that by running down others she adds to her own praise and increases her own reputation – a fact which shows very clearly to everybody that women have very little sense. For all men agree to hold it as a general rule that words of dispraise only hurt the person who utters them, and they detract from the esteem in which he is held; but no woman on this account keeps from speaking evil and attacking the reputation of good people, and so I think we can insist that no woman is really wise. Qualities that a wise man has are wholly foreign to a woman, because she believes, without thinking, everything she hears, and she is very free about insisting on being praised, and she does a great many other unwise things which it would be tedious for me to enumerate.

…

The feminine sex is also commonly tainted by arrogance, for a woman, when incited by that, cannot keep her keep her tongue or her hands from crimes or abuse, but in her anger she commits all sorts of outrages. Moreover, if anybody tries to restrain an angry woman, he will tire himself out with a vain labor, for you cannot keep her from her evil designs or soften her arrogance of soul. Any woman is incited to wrath by a mild enough remark of little significance and indeed at times by nothing at all; and her arrogance grows to tremendous proportions; and as far as I can recall no one ever saw a woman who could restrain it.

Furthermore every woman seems to despise all other women – a thing which we know comes from pride. No person could despise another unless he looked down upon him because of pride. Besides, every woman, not only a young one but even the old and decrepit, strives with all her might to exalt her own beauty; this can come only from pride, as the wise man said very clearly when he said, “There is arrogance in everybody and pride follows beauty.” Therefore it is perfectly clear that women can never have perfectly good characters, because, as they say, “A remarkable character is soiled by an admixture of pride.”

Every woman is also loud-mouthed, since no one of them can keep her tongue from abuses, and even if she loses a single egg she will keep up a clamor all day like a barking dog, and she will disturb the whole neighbourhood over a trifle. When she is with other women, no one of them will give the others a chance to speak, but each always tries to be the one to say whatever is to be said and to keep on talking longer than the rest; and neither her tongue nor her spirit ever gets tired of talking. A woman will boldly contradict everything you say, and she can never agree with anything, but she always tries to give her opinion on every subject.

No woman is attached to her lover or bound to her husband with such pure devotion that she will not accept another lover, especially if a rich one comes along, which shows the wantonness as well as the great avarice of a woman. There isn’t a woman in this world so constant and so bound by pledges that, if a lover of pleasures comes along and with skill and persistence invites her to the joys of love, she will reject his entreaties – at any rate if he does a good deal of urging. No woman is an exception to this rule either. So you can see what we ought to think of a woman who is in fortunate circumstances and is blessed with an honourable lover or the finest of husbands, and yet lusts after some other man. But that is precisely what women do who are too much troubled with wantonness.

Indeed, a woman does not love a man with her whole heart, because there is not one of them who keeps faith with her husband or her lover; when another man comes along, you will find that her faithfulness wavers. For a woman cannot refuse gold or silver or any other gifts that are offered her, nor can she on that account deny the solaces of her body when they are asked for. But since the woman knows that nothing so distresses her lover as to have her grant these to some other man, you can see how much affection she has for a man when, out of greed for gold or silver, she will give herself to a stranger or a foreigner and has no shame about upsetting her lover so completely and shattering the jewel of her own good faith. Moreover, no woman has such strong bond of affection for a lover that if he ceases to woo her with presents she will not become luke-warm about her customary solaces and quickly become like a stranger to him.

…

Avoid love and trample under foot all of its rules:

It doesn’t seem proper, therefore, for any prudent man to fall in love with any woman, because she never keeps faith with any man. Everybody knows that she ought to be spurned for the innumerable weighty reasons already given. Therefore it is not advisable, my respected friend, for you to waste your days on love, which for all the reasons already given we agree ought to be condemned. For if it deprives you of the grace of the Heavenly King, and costs you every real friend, and it takes away all the honors of this world as well as every breath of praiseworthy reputation, and greedily swallows up all your wealth, and is followed by every sort of evil. As has already been said, why should you, like a fool, seek for love, or what good can you get from it that will repay you for all these disadvantages? That which above all you seek in love – the joy of having your love returned – you can never obtain, as we have already shown, no matter how hard you try, because no woman ever returns a man's love. Therefore if you will examine carefully all the things that go to make up love, you will see clearly that there are conclusive reasons why a man is bound to avoid it with all his might and to trample under foot all its rules.

If you will study carefully this little treatise of ours and understand it completely and practice what it teaches, you will see clearly that no man ought to mis-spend his days in the pleasures of love. If you abstain from it, the Heavenly King will be more favorably disposed toward you in every respect, and you will be worthy to have all prosperous success in this world and to fulfill all praiseworthy deeds and the honorable desires of your heart, and in the world to come to have glory and life everlasting.

Source

The Art of Courtly Love, by Andreas Capellanus, written in 1174, Translated by John Parry in 1941; Excerpt is from pp. 200-211

? Image at top of this article shows a golden casket from the Middle Ages depicting scenes of servile male behaviour typical of the emerging culture of courtly love. Such objects were given to women as gifts by men seeking to impress. (Note the woman standing with hands on hips in a position of authority, and the man in blue being led around by a yoke or leash in a position of subservience).

Proof: The cut is mutilation

VFM News and Commentary · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Study Confirms Male Circumcision is Genital Mutilation

A new study in the British Journal of Urology International shows that men with normal, intact penises enjoy more sexual sensitivity — as much as four times more — than those who have been circumcised. Circumcising slices off more of a male's sensitivity than is normally present in all ten fingertips.

In every site tested, intact men have as much or more fine-touch skin sensitivity on their penis and foreskin than a man who has been circumcised. Circumcision removes the most sensitive portions of the penis.

This new study demonstrates what we have suspected for decades, that circumcision's result — if not its intent — is reduced sexual pleasure for men. As such, it is a violation of a male's right to bodily integrity. In large part, female circumcision does the same; even the mildest forms remove the most sensitive portions of the female genitalia. Females in the USA and many other countries are protected by law from all forms of genital cutting.

The mistaken belief behind circumcision is that it is cleaner, healthier, protects against disease, and will make males more tractable in a society.

Because circumcision has such a drastic effect on sexuality later in life, no infant or child should ever experience a non-therapeutic circumcision.

Parents should not be allowed to control their son's level of sexual sensitivity because of personal bias or prejudice, just as no parent should be allowed to request for their son or daughter any other sensitivity-reducing surgery; for example, eye surgery that would limit vision from color to black-and-white.

In addition, circumcised men, with one-fourth the sensitivity of intact men, might decline to wear further-desensitizing condoms. Some may consider themselves "safe" because of circumcision, adding to their determination to have sex without a condom.

Adult men who want circumcision for themselves should be advised per proper informed consent that penile sensitivity will be reduced on average by a factor of four. Men should also be advised that circumcision will not prevent the transmission of sexually transmitted diseases, including HIV/AIDS.

[image]

?

This graph indicates a 75% loss of sensitivity reflected in the area of the two penises shown. The lost sensitivity is comparable to the sensitivity that would be lost if all the skin was sliced off all ten fingertips. This graphic is available copyright free to media reporting on the "Fine-touch Pressure Thresholds in the Adult Penis" article by Sorrells et al. published in the BJUi provided credit is given and they are not altered or used in such a fashion as to misrepresent the data or conclusions in the article. Credit: www.icgi.org

Contact:

DAN BOLLINGER
International Coalition for Genital Integrity
765-427-7012

JTO goes under bus

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Finally, a more skilled opponent.

For years, Men's human Rights Activists have been asking for some opposition beyond the boringly predictable shaming and accusatory rhetoric of the feminist public sphere. A Voice for Men's founder and publisher Paul Elam and I have both written several articles each attempting to provide guidance to oppositional writers in fielding a more effective attack against the movement for male human rights.

We really do hope for those opposing this movement to sharpen their pencils, as the exercise of repeatedly swatting aside empty accusation and ineffective attempts to invoke shame do little to develop our own skills, or advance the public discourse. Sadly, until the present, all such advice has gone unheeded.

In 2011, despairing of the flaccid character of the opposition's rhetoric, I wrote an article originally titled "Where is the Counter Argument". It's conclusion was that in the continued light of no substantive effort at any honest opposition from either the mainstream or feminist spheres, I was no longer interested in the apparently futile project to cultivate honest debate.

From that article:

> "I don't mind telling you, I am no longer here to debate, or to reason, or to converse, or to hope you may be reached by logic or evidence.
>
> I AM HERE TO FUCK YOUR SHIT UP.
>
> And in that, I am not alone. Now I don't mean to stoop to the use of lies or violence. You are practiced at those tactics, and frankly, I don't need them."

But finally, it appears the Men's Human Rights Movement has raised enough eyebrows that somebody other than a complete dunce is willing to bestir themselves to do more than copy-paste "rape apologist" from their clipboard of thought-stopping cliches.

Enter R Tod Kelly, a journalist presently writing for Newsweek. He interviewed me via Skype this morning for an upcoming article to be published by Newsweek/The Daily Beast. As I expected him to do, he questioned me very politely. I also expect him to savage me mercilessly from his keyboard. Well, not just mercilessly, I expect him to do so effectively, with a minimal reliance on regurgitated cliches like rape-apologetics, misogyny and small-penis/mother's basement and other insults so common in the writing of those typically opposing the Men's Human Rights Movement.

Kelly, for his part, is not an idiot, and he's going to get a few things right, probably. I mentioned the workplace death rate at least a few times in our call. Here it is again: 93% of those killed on the job in north America are men. And even after years of talking about this number it still shocks me. I mentioned the male-weighted rate of suicide. 4 male corpses for every woman dead by her own hand. I also mentioned the devastating impact of false accusations on men, and the flippancy with which such accusations are delivered in a social climate where being female maps to the public perception of victimhood, particularly at the perceived hands of a male offender.

I spent a little over an hour in my Skype call with Mr Kelly, and we had what I think is a most productive discussion. The conversation ranged from the utility and power of even informal false accusations to the long term economic and social consequences of feminism in a big-government society. Kelly asked me about the origins of my own interest in men's human rights issues, and we even plumbed some speculative theories connecting central banking, the funding of early feminist organizations and the complicit silence of mainstream journalism during feminism's rise to pre-eminence. (Tin-foil hats and all)

However, although R Tod Kelly will likely mention some of these issues, he's still going to try to mow me down from the driver's seat of the number 10 express to downtown. Wait, what? Didn't I just say we had a productive and friendly discussion lasting over an hour? Well sure, but Kelly asked me for the interview by email, in the following terms. It's a long swath of text to include in this discussion, but still only part of what Mr Kelly covered in his email.

> "The editors and I agree that the both the need for a men's rights movement and the uphill challenges the movement faces might be better communicated by focusing on a single person's battles.
>
> A few weeks ago I think I might have considered other people, but right now I think the perfect person to focus on would be you.
>
> You are, if I may say so, probably the most intriguing person in the movement today. You are, I believe, one of the only (if not the only) paid staff person in the entire movement. You are young and passionate, articulate, and most of the movement regards you as a leader. I have seen a number of your videos, including a local TV interview you did, and was dutifully impressed. Most of the people I have spoken with are happy to write on the internet and let it be; none of the other younger members of the movement I have encountered other than you has gone the extra step to begin work on starting a non-profit to advocate formally. I know that folks like Paul have had a lot to do with what the movement is today, but I believe that you more than anyone else might help sculpt what the movement becomes in the next 10-20 years.
>
> So you know, my thought would be for the article to focus on your story – how you got involved, where you've had successes and failures in bringing about change – and then use your personal story to springboard to the larger movement."

Admittedly, some readers might, in a fugue of naiveté, view this torrent of naked flattery as positive indication that Kelly would give this movement, or myself as an actor in the movement some sort of favorable treatment.

LOL.

I was young and stupid once, too. The bottom of the bus is where I'm about to be, in whatever treatment Newsweek or The Beast offers up — despite Mr. Kelly's assumption of my pathological narcissism and his over-the-pathetic-top attempt to manipulate me.

Some possible spin:

I'm a conspiracy theorist. The straps on my tinfoil hat are too tight. It's the Bilderbergs, the Rockefeller group, the new world order, Alex Jones and David Icke's lizard-man overlords from planet X.

No?

I'm paranoid that all sexual encounters carry the potential of entrapment, all rape accusations are false, women's sexual organs are sinister, and all the wimmin-folk wants to steal my sperms!

No?

I'm a sexual loser, a professional failure – and barely one step from living in my mother's basement – addling myself with porn because no real woman will step within 100 meters of me.

O wait. No, it cant be that one, that's straight out of the shaming tactics catalog.

How about: "Money for nothin'. Chicks for free"?

Possibly, I'm a swindler, scamming the general public with the pretense of human rights activism while pocketing all the loot to fund addictions and disgusting sexual habits. After all, the paypal account associated with Vancouver's local men's rights activist group is listed as the grandiose sounding American Human Right's Education Foundation. And despite that official sounding name, there is no 401c charity or nonprofit group with any legal recognition whatsoever. And hey, I'm also one of the only activists in this movement taking home a paycheque (if I am generous enough to call it that). Surely that can be spun into a story that we're all in it just for the dollars. Or maybe only I'm in it for the dollars.

I'm actually hoping this might be included in the attack, simply for its novelty value.

Another approach might be the standard dismissal of evolutionary psychology. It's my opinion that general public indifference to male-impacting pain has its roots far deeper in our brains than simply an ideology of gender popularized and mainstreamed in the last half century. That ideology trades heavily on some natural tendencies shared by our hominid ancestors. That's one of the factors making the public recognition of issues affecting male human rights so challenging.

I can hardly wait to meet my doom under Tod Kelly's keyboard. But at the end of our discussion, he mentioned that he'd be in my town within the next few days, and we're all buddies for the moment, scheduled to meet for beers some time this weekend. I'm looking forward to it, but I'm scheming to make Tod cover the tab.

Feature image public domain, wiki commons.

[box]

AMMENDMENT: [Sunday 20 October 2013] R Tod Kelly, writing for the Daily Beast has finally delivered, and published his article. After waiting for months for his attack – he did what none of us expected. He wrote a thorough, well researched and comprehensive summary of the entire Men's human rights movement, including Paul, who Kelly calls a rock star, and myself he calls a superstar. Admittedly, he also offers some criticism of the movement and of me – but Kelly's article is inarguably the best addressing this movement ever published in the mainstream. The Superstar characterization was obviously over the top. But clearly, I'm not the only writer occasionally indulging in hyperbole. And I was wrong in my prediction of the same old attack. Well done Mr Kelly, very well done indeed.

To everyone besides Mr Kelly, go read it. Seriously.

http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2013/10/20/the-masculine-mystique-inside-the-men-s-rights-movement-mrm.html

[box]

MGTOW: elective de-attachment

August Løvenskiolds · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In my buddy Peter Wright's (Tawil) recent article entitled "Sex and attachment", Peter seems to urge us throw in the Tawil on the idea that Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) can or should seek to achieve the more radical ideals of MGTOW – those ideals being, complete separation, from not only their sexual and personal relationships with women, but from the entire gynocentric culture.

In addition to his great insight into untangling the notion of sexual relations from human attachment and throwing both into sharp relief, Tawil built a good case that human connection in the form of pair-bonding and emotional attachments is a fundamental part of the human experience and that those deprived of it are in trouble: "attachment is quite simply the most important to the continued survival of the individual…adults literally sicken both physically and mentally, and often commit suicide, to escape feelings of isolation and loneliness, especially after a relationship separation."

Tawil's article seems to advocate for continued male-female friendships and bonding: "People can live their lives avoiding sexual games but they will not end their lives happily unless they meet their attachment requirements…be healthy human beings able to recognize and fulfill our natural need for human intimacy."

I can appreciate Tawil's genuine concern of the emotional well-being of MGTOW. Tawil is a long-term MGTOW himself and as one of us, his validation of human emotional needs some or even most MGTOW feel keenly should be welcomed.

If there is a weakness in Tawil's article, it is that it oversells the need for human intimacy and thereby underserves the needs of men who have been so badly burned by the cultural exploitation of men that they seek to opt out. I was left with the impression – perhaps unjustified – that the reluctance to attach is a sort of pathology to be avoided.

In honor of the newborn royal baby BOY, (nicely done, mummy Kate, no matter how much feminists obscenely shit on your childbirth travails) and the hope that comes from the birth of each beloved child, I'm going to restore a bit of hope to wannabe MGTOW ghosts – like me, for instance – who have made, or will make, a principled decision to Go Their Own Way – and far, far away, at that.

For the last several years, when I daydream, it is not about sex or women or even taking a vacation. My dreams are about my escape – my total escape – from the gynocentric culture that seeks my enslavement at almost every turn. Like Bigfoot in the mountain forest, I want to be gone. And it is not just feminists that are driving me away, but the whole feminized culture.

My business is a heavily regulated one and every regulator has their hand out for my money – money from taxes, penalties, fees and fines. I can't play any live music in my venue any more because music companies demand ruinous fees for me to do so. If someone dances, walks off with a beer, starts a fight, lights up a cigarette or even brings in a puppy, I get to pay the fine. If they complain when I ask them to leave, that is a fine, too. I can't put an ashtray outside my door (I pay a fine if I do) and when people, lacking an ashtray, throw their cigarette butts on the sidewalk in front of my place, I get fined for that, too.

All those fines and taxes feed a gynocentric machine that hates me for no other reason than because I am a man and I work for a living. The only reason my business has survived as long as it has is that I am single, so there is no woman in my life to suck my assets out of my wallet to feed her shoe fetish – I can save that money for the regulators to suck, instead.

I've derived a lot of satisfaction out of running a successful business but as the years go on and the pressures mount I have begun growing more and more sick of this horde of deadbeat bitches leeching off of it. I still love my business, my job in it, my employees and my customers, but I know that someday I will want to de-attach from it and run the fuck away.

Will doing that damage me as an individual – turn me into some sort of hockey-mask wearing, serial-killing Jason Voorhees of the Friday the 13th fame?

(Photo from http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jason_Voorhees)

The answer is, not necessarily, and to understand why, let's consider the way in which human bonds are broken or avoided.

Three Ways of Bond-Breaking

Detachment is the inability or lack of interest in forming a bond. In infants, children and adults detachment is a pathological state that destroys people – kills them as certainly and swiftly as asteroid strikes cause mass extinctions.

Involuntary separation is the loss of one's bonds with others in a way that is out of one's control. Abortion (according to the fetus), the loss of a loved one to death, enduring a divorce or break-up that one does not want, incarceration, rejection, job termination – these are all involuntary separations that carry with them heavy risks of damage and death.

But what I'm talking about is neither detachment nor involuntary separation but rather elective de-attachment – the voluntary withdrawal from human bonding. My point is that elective de-attachment is as different from involuntary separation as enthusiastically consensual sex is from jump-out-of-the-bushes rape. My thesis is that, indeed, elective de-attachment is a life-affirming act of rebellion.

It is much better, emotionally and spiritually, to walk away from an evil group than to be forced out of a group for the false accusation of being evil.

A man forcibly ejected from his once-loving wife and children is a man bereft, and a man at great risk of suicide and other maladies. His life has been raped away from him by a culture that revels in his agony. This is a very different stage from a man who has grown to a point in his life when he takes control of his destiny and decides, for good or ill, to just walk away from everything, and deny this man-rape culture their vampiric feast of blood.

Where bonding failure creates a painful loneliness, bonding de-attachment fosters a joyful solitude. De-attachment from human bonding is not a suicidal insanity – it is the only sane reaction to an insane culture.

Allowing for the notion of a positive vision of elective de-attachment, we are forced to ask, when is it appropriate in a man's life to consider elective de-attachment as a workable choice of MGTOW (or anyone)? Our physical and emotional needs change throughout our lives, and there are lots of ways to approach this question. For me, a helpful framework can be found in considering a theory called Fowler's Stages of Faith.

Fowler's Stages of Faith.

In 1981, James Fowler published Stages of Faith, a book exploring how people's worldviews grow and change through their lives. A useful chart summarizing Fowler's 6 stages of faith (and how they relate to Peck's 4 stages) can be seen here.

Missing from the chart is Fowler's faith stage 0, the infantile faith, wherein a newborn's worldview is shaped by the degree of presence and touch of his mother and father. Attachment to loving parents is critical to the infant's life, survival, and health and obviously, no elective de-attachment is possible – even mythical Romulus and Remus, after their abandonment, had to suck the teats of a she-wolf for survival.

Elective de-attaching from society can be equally unthinkable or extremely difficult at some of the other stages of faith. In stage three, for example, wherein one becomes obsessed with peer-pressure, fitting in and exploring pair-bonding and sexuality, the idea of casting that off to become a castaway can be literally unthinkable – avoiding potential sex-partners and love interests would be seen as the height of lunacy to a young man awash in hormones and whorish young women.

But in some people, faith/worldview can continue to change. Notice that I didn't say "grow" or "improve", because no stage of faith is better or superior to any other – the only reason to number them at all to indicate their temporal progression. Indeed, there is wisdom to be learned at every stage, wisdom that is essential for building one's understanding of life. The young girl who told her mom not to get on the Space Shuttle Challenger before it exploded was in retrospect making a better call than all the "advanced" flight engineers who said "go" – and it was that explosion that occurred on day two of my first study of Fowler's work.

But if one's faith/worldview continues to change, eventually one might reach stage 6 – universalizing faith. The chart describes this stage as follows: "Few people reach this stage. Those who do live their lives to the full in service of others without any real worries or doubts." This is a poor summary of the real meat of this stage – those in this stage seek to find meaning in ways reflected in stories like the freedom struggles of Moses; the selflessness of Jesus; the serenity and wisdom of Buddha; the surrender to the will of Allah of Mohammad – and all four men are recorded as seeking or finding wisdom in solitude.

As an agnostic/atheist, the best I can hope for is perhaps whatever peace comes to me through living apart from the cacophony of a society that seeks to brutalize and exploit me. I don't seek religious revelation but rather, a struggle to gain in understanding of myself – only by becoming a brute of the veldt, savanna, swamp, forest, desert, isle or tundra can one bond with the universal – and that is the one real bond that can bring healing to the world, and the self.

Thoreau, another seeker of solitude, said it better:

> THIS IS A delicious evening, when the whole body is one sense, and imbibes delight through every pore. I go and come with a strange liberty in Nature, a part of herself. As I walk along the stony shore of the pond in my shirt-sleeves, though it is cool as well as cloudy and windy, and I see nothing special to attract me, all the elements are unusually congenial to me. The bullfrogs trump to usher in the night, and the note of the whip-poor-will is borne on the rippling wind from over the water. Sympathy with the fluttering alder and poplar leaves almost takes away my breath; yet, like the lake, my serenity is rippled but not ruffled.

In a one-on-one conversation I had with Tawil about an earlier draft of this article, he expressed his own revulsion at gynocentric culture and his agreement that solitude is "extremely healthy in the context of the gynocentric man- hating culture in which we live. Even in a healthy culture and in healthy relationships one still needs solitude…it's good for you."

So, don't give up on solitude yet, my MGTOW brethren. I haven't and Tawil hasn't, and who knows, we might even get to build a MGTOWN some day.

You asked for it, ladies

Hannah Wallen · 25 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

No, this isn't a post about rape. In fact, it's about the opposite. It's about walking away, maybe running away. Specifically, it's about the right to run–specifically, men's right to decline to trust, to eschew focus on relationships, and to refuse to open themselves to women beyond anything but the most superficial levels of interaction.

Why?

Because the same folks who dismiss, or outright advocate for false accusers, the same folks who rail against due process for men in criminal and family court, who claim both moral superiority and their own right to turpitude with impunity, who push men around, knock them to the ground, step on them, and kick them when they're down – those same folks have the screaming audacity to act shocked and appalled when men feel maligned, get fed up, pick themselves up, turn their backs, and walk away.

My opinion of your sniffing response at men who don't want any part of you anymore is simple: Kwitcherbitchen, ladies. It's your own damned fault. You have no business complaining.

In recent weeks, there have been more than a few volatile discussions on the topic of the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) movement. I've been part of similar discussions in the past, and what I learned is that other women with any real understanding of the evolution of Men Going Their Own Way, and women who are willing to acknowledge why we women may not be justified in complaining about it, are few and far between.

At best, what I've heard from other women on this topic is often hypocritical, considering the decades we've had of feminists teaching women to hate and fear all men on the chance that some might be dangerous. Admonitions like "not all women are like that," and "don't let a few bad eggs spoil your opinion," are empty when offered to male survivors of habitual or chronic abuse by women, or on women's behalf.

At worst, there is a hurling of denial, accusation, and resentment, with complex versions of "how dare you withdraw respect," "how dare you reject our judgement" and "how dare you deny our control," all of which are nothing more than a demand that men not learn from experience. Most of these responses stem from a sense of ownership–an ownership which feminist advocacy seems to feel it is entitled to in the realm of relationships, social interaction between sexes, and most emphatically, over sexual interaction.

The general social and legal treatment of males has begun to remind me of a book I studied in a high school literature class: Richard Wright's Black Boy. The passage that comes to mind as a highlighting parallel is the recounting of Wright's first job interview.

> "Do you want the job?" the woman asked.
>
> "Yes, ma'am," I said, afraid to trust my own judgment.
>
> "Now, boy, I want to ask you one question and I want you to tell me the truth," she said.
>
> "Yes, ma'am," I said, all attention.
>
> "Do you steal?" she asked me seriously.
>
> I burst into a laugh, then checked myself… I had made a mistake during my first five minutes in the white world. I hung my head.
>
> "No, ma'am." I mumbled. "I don't steal."
>
> She stared at me, trying to make up her mind.
>
> "Now, look, we don't want a sassy nigger around here."
>
> "No, ma'am." I assured her. "I'm not sassy."

Wright goes on to describe his incredulity at the senselessness of the woman's expectation that he would honestly answer such a question, but I remember at the time that I read the story feeling outraged at the woman's implied assumptions in asking. The question suggested that being black meant he was suspect. The rest of the discussion demonstrated that sense of superiority among racist whites which lead to the treatment of all blacks as children, as mentioned in the text following the conversation. Further, the candid presentation of the insult represented by the initial question, "Do you steal?" struck me in its callousness, cruelty, and elitism. This woman felt entitled to treat Wright as an inferior being simply because of the darkness of his skin. To her, his ability to form and adhere to a moral code was questionable, and his emotional response to mistreatment and misjudgment irrelevant, all for no better reason than because he was black. After reading Wright's recounting of the discussion, I felt a sense of impotent disgust and anger at the folks who chose to embrace such a heartless, barbaric outlook. I wondered: what the hell was wrong with these people, that they could live this way, think this way, talk this way, right to the faces of their fellow human beings?

In the past, the treatment of our fellow human beings in this manner was widespread and overt, supported in society by political writing full of made-up reasoning and lame excuses, well exemplified in a quote from John C. Calhoun's February 6, 1837 Senate Speech.

> I may say with truth, that in few countries so much is left to the share of the laborer, and so little exacted from him, or where there is more kind attention paid to him in sickness or infirmities of age. Compare his condition with the tenants of the poor houses in the more civilized portions of Europe—look at the sick, and the old and infirm slave, on one hand, in the midst of his family and friends, under the kind superintending care of his master and mistress, and compare it with the forlorn and wretched condition of the pauper in the poorhouse…

The statement overflows with condescension. The hypocrisy of a politician in the service of a nation begun with one group's quest for freedom from the control of others who viewed them as inferior, arguing for the control of others he views as inferior, shines a glaring light on the arrogance and pomposity of the culture of supremacy. One must assume oneself to be grand before one may consider one's acts of aggression against and oppression of others to be a kindness. One must fully immerse oneself in the murky bog of intellectual bigotry before one may presume to hold others with such falsely "benevolent" contempt.

I see the same thing in today's feminist attitude toward men, shown by the treatment of them as borderline animals with violent tendencies and barely contained sexual impulses, instead of as fully established human beings. Wright's white employer treated him as dishonest, stupid, and lacking in either the emotional makeup to be offended at the assumption, or the right to act on it. Despite their frequent denials, Feminism almost universally paints men with equally sweeping, bigoted generalities. Males are treated as potential criminals: batterers, muggers, mashers, molesters, rapists, murderers; portrayed as inept, as deadbeats, as lacking emotional maturity and sensitivity, and as intellectually inferior, all to excuse subjecting them to the very same disdainful and authoritarian treatment from which the civil rights movement has actively sought to relieve minorities throughout history. Even those feminists who don't talk this way overtly still fervently deny the existence of, obfuscate, and/or give cover to the ones who do.

Feminist advocacy has pushed men into a corner, restricting them to narrowly defined, impossible to fulfill roles. In conflicts between men and women, men are designated by various laws as perpetrators, presumed guilty until proven innocent. In family court, men have become nonpersons, nonparents, interlopers begging for any share in the existence of their children – for crumbs from the table of parental involvement – seen as undeserving of regard or relationship, yet fully responsible for the well-being of the families from which they have been expelled. In education and the workplace, males of all ages are targets for both harassment and persecution, using female-centered human resource and behavioral policy to give women control over even the most minute aspects of interaction. Literally, everything men say, and everything they do not say, can and will be held against them. In daily life, men are subjected to disparaging humor of a type which women need not tolerate, and men are routinely treated with suspicion which women would not abide. Men are treated to shaming of natural behavior in ways which women have fought to escape, objectification which women refuse to accept, and pressure to conform to standards of instinct-control and self-denial which women have been protesting for generations. Every exposure to female scrutiny and behavior, from the simplest everyday interaction to the complexities of various relationships, presents men with the threat of unwarranted censure under the feminist rules of intersex engagement.

The widespread female attitude of superior contempt, combined with activism which has successfully advocated the bypassing of human rights for men in the pursuit of female interests, and the application of double standards in every aspect of male-female interaction, has pushed some men beyond the point of reasonable tolerance. In response, they (and they are growing in number) have chosen to withdraw from the arena of male-female relationships in every way, opting out of collaborative personal investment in any woman. Such vulnerability could result in being used, abused, accused, adjudged, and enslaved. Why face the risk?

Now, after heaping pressure, resentment, bitterness, anger, hatred, blame, shame, and lies upon men as a group, after bawling first for equality, then for preferential treatment, now for absolute power, after shoving men to the side in the pursuit of self-interest, the femosphere has the gall to be offended at the rejection represented by MGTOW.

The basis for protest seems to be the assertion that, just by virtue of our existence, men owe women some level of regard. It's not supposed to matter that women are currently abusing feminist-won power, successfully using various false allegations as a weapon in disputes as a means of shutting down fathers who seek to maintain family relationships following divorce or separation, and even absent these gross abuses still routinely, even unthinkingly, use it as a tool to control every minor interaction with men—even, most ironically of all, using it as a means of garnering attention and sympathy from other women.

Men are expected to ignore not just the very real danger of being subjected to anything from public censure to prosecution and imprisonment with no recourse, but to everyday maligning of their character and unthinking, axiomatic expectation that they must "prove" themselves to be "good" men in the face of possible lies and other misconduct toward them.

Even though men are treated as perpetual suspects, and despite abuses they may have encountered in past interactions, they're supposed to presume innocence for every woman they meet. Even though men have collectively been objectified, marginalized, and devalued, they're expected to offer social respect for our sex, acting on the assumption of altruistic nurturing and higher moral disposition, with no supporting evidence other than the difference in genitalia. After decades of feminist protest against traditional relationship roles and demands for sexual equality, men are required to accept a set of rules of engagement imposed for the purpose of treating female sexuality as a commodity, while simultaneously ignoring the mercenary, exploitative motive behind the hoops through which they're being ordered to jump.

Somehow, despite feminist assertion that women are entitled to pursue sexual gratification with the same enthusiasm and indifference they've attributed to men, men are still expected to make all of the effort, leaving women free to approach interaction with the attitude of, "What's in it for me?" While feminist advocacy has fought to free women from the presumption of female sexual consent within a relationship, the same group continues to assert the demand for male consent to sexual interaction–if he doesn't want it he's inferior and if you push it on him he was, what, asking for it?

The choice of men to ignore these expectations, to refuse to cater to the rapacious nature of female dating criteria, flies in the face of the existing entitlement franchise women have seized. Far from acknowledging the iniquitous degree to which women, under modern social norms, have taken all this as if it were their birthright, feminist advocates treat this resistance by men as a form of insubordination, claiming that by withdrawing their much-abused trust and intimacy men are somehow denying women control over our own sexuality. The argument, reduced to its basest level, is that in order to ensure female sexual freedom, men cannot be allowed equal right to say no. Feminists claim total, uncompromisable proprietary ownership and control of consent agency.

This, broken down to its simplest form, is a demand that straight men submit to women's will and become nothing more than slaves.

Ladies, what honest, compelling reason can you offer to counter the existing circumstances which provoked this defensive movement? Would you seriously advise anyone to place his heart back into the meat grinder that human courtship has become under the management and regulation of modern feminism? What reward potential can you possibly offer which has not been previously ruined by other women? What protection can you assure which has not been eradicated by feminist activism? What comfort do you have that is more than lip service?

My answer to all of the above, the only honest answer I can form, is: none.

This is a bed women made, not a circumstance inflicted upon us by men. If women's concern over the growing distance between the sexes is genuine; if they have any motivation at all to regain the regard and interest of men; hell, if women want even the honest respect of men (as opposed to the genuflecting respect of sycophantic men who, if we were honest with ourselves, we'd admit we can't stand)–if women want any of that, what women first need to realize that it's not men's job to address any of it. It's on women.

If women don't want men going their own way, women should quit pushing men around. If women can't quit pushing men around, they're going to have to accept that eventually, "around" rightfully evolves into "away."

That's the choice: Make the effort to earn back the regard, the trust, and the consideration to which past generations of women were accustomed… or accept the adversarial role into which feminists have unceremoniously shoved us, but expect to give up the privileges previously associated with being "the fair sex."

Husbands go on strike: Tibet, 1928

Robert St. Estephe · 26 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.
[image]
"Men on Strike" is the title of the 2013 book by Dr. Helen Smith ("Dr. Helen") that explains why men are, in ever-increasing numbers, refusing to submit to the out-of-control "gender" system that continues to strip the male of fundamental rights and which reduces so many men to a lifetime of slavery.

Dr. Helen uses the phase "men on strike" as a metaphor for what is going on now, yet there have been instances in history where men have literally gone on strike, and called it a "strike," and did it for the very same reasons that motivate today's strikers. Here is one such instance, which took place in 1928 in Tibet.

It is recommended that another post be read in conjunction with this one. "'A Dictatorship of the Eternal Woman Has Been Declared': The Soviet Alimony Racket – 1927," describes a situation, similar in some respects, as regards to de facto system of polyandry, but arrived to on a different path, namely Communism.

Here are two articles on the Tibetan Men's Rights revolt of 1928:

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): That persistent underground rumbling you've been hearing lately is undoubtedly caused by the turning of millions of worms down on the underside of the world, the worms in this case being the patient long-suffering husbands of the haughty ladies of Tibet.

According to news that has seeped out through the tall ring of Tibetan mountains, the gentlemen of the yak country have organized a men's rights campaign that recently culminated in a parade of striking husbands. Accompanied by charm boxes, prayer wheels and fluttering pennants that read "Down With Tyrannical Women!" numbers of married men paraded the streets of Lhasa, demanding more respect for their sex and a kind word now and then from the head of the house.

At the risk of becoming what Tibet considers unmasculine, some of the brave ones have even gone so far as to draw up a set of demands. They ask, among other things, for financial independence, a single standard of morality, only one husband to a wife, the right of widowers to remarry and equal privileges of divorce.

[image]

"Too long have we suffered in silence, my fellow Tibetans!" cries out, in effect this bold manifestant "We, able-bodied men seven feet tall, natural protectors of the so-called gentler sex, are made their slaves. We have to earn our own keep as well as supply our wives with luxuries, and they don't even provide enough children to go around. It has got so than an ambitious woman expects a flock of husbands, just like so many sheep or yaks. Must such things go on forever? Or shall we not rather assert our manhood, even at the risk of appearing unmanlike, and protest against this irksome feminine control?"

Apparently being seven feet tall is not much of a help to the harried husbands of Tibet. For countless centuries the little women of Lhasa and the way stations have kept the masculine world firmly fixed under their yellow thumbs. The trouble is that husbands so often come in wholesale lots, few indeed being the women who haven't more than one husband. Four is said to be a highly popular number, which is fortunate if the wife happens to be fond of the Tibetan equivalent of “Sweet Adeline,” sung as a quartet.

The institution of plural husbands and the feminism seem to be due in a considerable manner to a considerable shortage of women. Percival Landon, who accompanied Younghusband’s expedition, reports that practically all commerce of the country is in the hands of the women, the men serving chiefly as errand runners, bundle carriers and bits of local color. No man is allowed to sell any of the family possessions without his wife’s permission, though, of course, no such restrictions apply to her.

[image]

Nor do the women confine their ruling to the little troop of Boy Scouts given to them by holy matrimony. Nu Kuo, a state of eastern Tibet, has always had a woman ruler, and in many of the other provinces the wife of the prince in charge is the real mainspring of the works.

One of the most powerful of the Tibetan divinities is a dark blue with three eyes who rides a mule, has live snakes for veins and drinks her cocktails out of a skull. Some 30 years ago the functionaries of Tibet announced that the current incarnation of the dreadful lady was none other than Queen Victoria. After her death they prophesied that the revered ruler would have the happiness of being reborn a Tibetan. If so, the change in home life must be rather starling to the dear English queen.

Of course, no high-spirited Tibetan girl would marry a whole group if she disapproved of any of the members. If one of the younger brothers happens to lack charm, he is black balled out of the wedding party. This, in a young man, is as severe a calamity as the blizzard of 1888, and his usual reaction is to save himself from social ostracism by becoming a monk.

[image]

There is a chance, in southern Tibet, at least, that he can make a career of a sort by signing on as a magpa. In this section of the country ladies bored with their current group of husbands sometimes add to the ménage an unhappy younger brother who has been vetoed by someone else.

The magpa’s importance is close to the absolute zero of physics. He can leave his wife only in case she possibly mistreats him, but she, on the other hand, can give him the cutting mountain air whenever such a procedure strikes her fancy.

Polyandry is not universal in Tibet. Up near the high brim of China it is comparatively rare, and even in the midst of the many husband belt there are occasional only sons whose interest in their wives is of the shareholders type.

Yet the life of these monopolists is hardly cheery enough to justify green looks of envy among the married men of America. It is the duty of the Tibetan husband, whether singular or plural, to make all the clothes for the family, including the wife. Any man who has ever imagined being a Louise-boulanger [a famous fashion designer] in his own house can picture the anguish of the fitting hour and the horrid strain of the day when the little woman goes out to compare her costume with those made by the husbands across the valley.

But, as the entomologists say, it’s a long worm that has no turning. Under the leadership of one Amouki, who seems to be the Susan B. Anthony of the movement, the husbands of Tibet have risen to demand an improvement in their status.

[“Husbands of Thibet Demand Equal Rights – In Mysterious Land Where Every Wife Has a Harem, Downtrodden Male Sex Organizes an Anti-feminine Movement,” The Sunday Magazine of the Milwaukee Journal (Wi.), May 20, 1928, p. 5]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2):

“Fathers and brothers:

“For many years we have been subjected to feminine domination. They look upon us as cattle and horses. Their impositions are so many that it is impossible to mention them all, but here are some:

“1. A wife is provided with many husbands. If they do not please her she abandons them. Husbands dare not resist.

~ CALL THEMSELVES SLAVES. ~

“2. under feminine control we work day and night in a different section of the country. We gain money by the sweat of our brow, of which we may keep nothing, being compelled to turn over all to the woman who rules us.

If we have not lucrative employment we are evicted and abandoned. What slaves we are!

“3. women are free to remarry when any of their husbands die, but we are obliged to remain widowers if our wife dies. Even if his fiancée dies before marriage

~ RESOLUTIONS IN TIBET. ~

No, this is not taken from some crazy quilt, futuristic farce, nor does it describe a man-hating woman’s dream of heaven. It is surely part of the resolutions offered secretly by striking husbands of Tibet, to be exact, of the province of Ezetchouan.

This is only one of the many communities in Asia where polyandry is the existing system, where every woman has at least three husbands plus one bronze image of a Buddhist priest.

All husbands except of the favorite work for the wife, who is absolute despot over the seven-foot males. They are her playthings. If she likes them, she keeps them; if not she casts them aside. And a husband so discarded is an outcast from society.

~ DECIDED TO REBEL. ~

Well, the downtrodden husbands of that one particular province decided to rebel, formed a union and marched five hundred strong on the holy city of Lhasa, appealing for “Men’s Rights.” Banners calling for “Financial Independence for Men” and demanding that “One Husband Should Suffice For Any One Woman” were in evidence.

Doesn’t it remind you of the not-so remote effects of our own downtrodden women? Yet today it is said that the only country in the world where women enjoy greater privileges than in America is in polygamous Tibet!

[Jean Newton, “What Slaves We Are, Cry Husbands – Men Of Ezetchouan, Tibet, Where Polyandry Exists, Rebel and Adopt Resolutions. – Situation Is Like Reversal Of Recent Conditions In America, Suggests Writer.” The Sunday Sun (Baltimore, Md.), May 13, 1928, Sec. 2, p. 13]

***

If you are interested in some background information on Tibetan polyandry, see the longer version of this post on The Unknown History of MISANDRY.

***

QUESTION: Is there a single person anywhere alive in the world who has learned about this event — which from any perspective, must be seen as significant to our understanding of the history of “gender” relations — in school or the media?

If so, please let us know.

[image]

The Fraud of Feminism part three

Ernest Belfort Bax · 26 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM is pleased to present one of the seminal works of Men's Human Rights literature on its 100th anniversary of publication. This is the third and final instalment of this historic work. The second can be found here.

It is a fascinating piece of work. Perhaps most remarkable about it is that as you read, you will not find yourself so much transformed back to a different age with different modes of thought. But rather you will read observations and conclusions that will, word by word and line by line, be largely indistinguishable from what what you would see today from any critical thinker when offering a candid review of the essence of feminism. You will see repeated references to the same shaming tactics, lies, distortions, revisions of history, use of proxy violence and methods of manipulating the blue pill masses we continually find ourselves discussing today.

The Fraud of Feminism, by E. Belfort Bax was first published in 1913. Let us hope the next hundred years see more progress than we did in the first, and let us never say that E. Belfort Bax didn't warn us. PE

Chapter V
The "Chivalry" Fake

Ernest B. Bax – 1913

It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward. The etymology of the word chivalry is well known and obvious enough.

The term meant originally the virtues associated with knighthood considered as a whole, bravery even to the extent of reckless daring, loyalty to the chief or feudal superior, generosity to a fallen foe, general open-handedness, and open-heartedness, including, of course, the succour of the weak and the oppressed generally, inter alia, the female sex when in difficulties.

It would be idle, of course, to insist upon the historical definition of the term.

Language develops and words in course of time depart widely from their original connotation, so that etymology alone is seldom of much value in practically determining the definition of words in their application at the present day. But the fact is none the less worthy of note that only a fragment of the original connotation of the word chivalry is covered by the term as used in our time, and that even that fragment is torn from its original connection and is made to serve as a scarecrow in the field of public opinion to intimidate all who refuse to act upon, or who protest against, the privileges and immunities of the female sex. [1]

I have said that even that subsidiary element in the old original notion of chivalry which is now well-nigh the only surviving remnant of its original connotation is torn from its connection and hence has necessarily become radically changed in its meaning. From being part of a general code of manners enjoined upon a particular guild or profession it has been degraded to mean the exclusive right in one sex guaranteed by law and custom to certain advantages and exemptions without any corresponding responsibility.

Let us make no mistake about this. When the limelight of a little plain but critical common-sense is turned upon this notion of chivalry hitherto regarded as so sacrosanct, it is seen to be but a poor thing after all; and when men have acquired the habit of habitually turning the light of such criticism upon it, the accusation, so terrible in the present state of public opinion, of being “unchivalrous” will lose its terrors for them.

In the so-called ages of chivalry themselves it never meant, as it does to-day, the woman right or wrong. It never meant as it does to-day the general legal and social privilege of sex. It never meant a social defence or a legal exoneration for the bad and even the criminal woman, simply because she is a woman. It meant none of these things. All it meant was a voluntary or gratuitous personal service to the forlorn women which the members of the Knights’ guild among other such services, many of them taking precedence of this one, were supposed to perform.

So far as courage is concerned, which was perhaps the first of the chivalric virtues in the old days, it certainly requires more courage in our days to deal severely with a woman when she deserves it (as a man would be dealt with in like circumstances) than it does to back up a woman against her wicked male opponent.

It is a cheap thing, for example, in the case of a man and woman quarrelling in the street, to play out the stage rôle of the bold and gallant Englishman “who won’t see a woman maltreated and put upon, not he!” and this, of course, without any inquiry into the merits of the quarrel. To swim with the stream, to make a pretence of boldness and bravery, when all the time you know you have the backing of conventional public opinion and mob-force behind you, is the cheapest of mock heroics.

Chivalry today means the woman, right or wrong, just as patriotism today means “my country right or wrong.” In other words, chivalry today is only another name for Sentimental Feminism. Every outrageous pretension of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, “manliness.”

It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist in public opinion and shed a little of this sort of “manliness.” The plucky Welshmen at Llandystwmdwy in their dealings with the suffragette rowdies on memorable occasion showed themselves capable of doing this. In fact one good effect generally of militant suffragetteism seems to be the weakening of the notion of chivalry – i.e. in its modern sense of Sentimental Feminism – amongst the populace of this country.

The combination of Sentimental Feminism with its invocation of the old-world sentiment of chivalry which was based essentially on the assumption of the mental, moral and physical inferiority of woman to man, for its justification, with the pretensions of modern Political Feminism, is simply grotesque in its inconsistent absurdity. In this way Modern Feminism would fain achieve the feat of eating its cake and having it too. When political and economic rights are in question, bien entendu, such as involve gain and social standing, the assumption of inferiority magically disappears before the strident assertion of the dogma of the equality of woman with man – her mental and moral equality certainly!

When, however, the question is of a different character – for example, for the relieving of some vile female criminal of the penalty of her misdeeds – then Sentimental Feminism comes into play, then the whole plaidoyer is based on the chivalric sentiment of deference and consideration for poor, weak woman. I may point out that here, if it be in the least degree logical, the plea for mercy or immunity can hardly be based on any other consideration than that of an intrinsic moral weakness in view of which the offence is to be condoned.

The plea of physical weakness, if such be entertained, is here in most cases purely irrelevant. Thus, as regards the commutation of the death sentence, the question of the muscular strength or weakness of the condemned person does not come in at all. The same applies, mutatis mutandis, to many other forms of criminal punishment. But it must not be forgotten that there are two aspects of physical strength or weakness. There is, as we have already pointed out, the muscular aspect and the constitutional aspect.

If we concede the female sex as essentially and inherently weaker in muscular power and development than the male, this by no means involves the assumption that woman is constitutionally weaker than man. On the contrary, it is a known fact attested, as far as I am aware, by all physiologists, no less than by common observation, that the constitutional toughness and power of endurance of woman in general far exceeds that of man, as explained in an earlier chapter.

Be this as it may, however, the existence of this greater constitutional strength or resistant power in the female than in the male organic system – as crucially instanced by the markedly greater death-rate of boys than of girls in infancy and early childhood – should, in respect of severity of punishment, prison treatment, etc., be a strong counter-argument against the plea for leniency, or immunity in the case of female criminals, made by the advocates of Sentimental Feminism.

But these considerations afford only one more illustration of the utter irrationality of the whole movement of Sentimental Feminism identified with the notion of “chivalry.” For the rest, we may find illustrations of this galore. A very flagrant case is that infamous “rule of the sea” which came so much into prominence at the time of the Titanic disaster. According to this preposterous “chivalric” Feminism, in the case of a ship foundering, it is the unwritten law of the seas, not that the passengers shall leave the ship and be rescued in their order as they come, but that the whole female portion shall have the right of being rescued before any man is allowed to leave the ship. Now this abominable piece of sex favouritism, on the face of it, cries aloud in its irrational injustice.

Here is no question of bodily strength or weakness, either muscular or constitutional. In this respect, for the nonce, all are on a level. But it is a case of life itself. A number of poor wretches are doomed to a watery grave, simply and solely because they have not had the luck to be born of the privileged female sex.

Such is “chivalry” as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men. During the ages of chivalry and for long after it was not so. Law and custom then was the same for men as for women in its incidence. To quote the familiar proverb in a slightly altered form, then – “what was sauce for the gander was sauce for the goose.” Not until the nineteenth century did this state of things change. Then for the first time the law began to respect persons and to distinguish in favour of sex.

Even taking the matter on the conventional ground of weakness and granting, for the sake of argument, the relative muscular weakness of the female as ground for her being allowed the immunity claimed by Modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive.

Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength. Woman at the present day has been encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration.

Footnote

1. One among many apposite cases, which has occurred recently, was protested against in a letter to The Daily Telegraph, 21st March 1913, in which it was pointed out that while a suffragette got a few months' imprisonment in the second division for wilfully setting fire to the pavilion in Kew Gardens, a few days previously, at the Lewes Assizes, a man had been sentenced to five years' penal servitude for burning a rick!!

Wrongfully convicted man left destitute

VFM News and Commentary · 26 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Wrongfully convicted man is grateful but faces uphill battle to survive outside prison

In 1994, Joseph Frey was wrongly convicted of the 1991 rape of a University of Wisconsin-Oshkosh student, in a case which had multiple issues. Evidence in the case had been destroyed by an Oshkosh police detective. Authorities had solicited false testimony from a jailhouse informant. The victim, unsure of the identity of her rapist, was prompted by police to implicate Frey.

His conviction was overturned after new DNA evidence linked another man to the crime. On July 12th, he was released from prison after serving two decades of the 102-year sentence imposed for that conviction.

Unlike someone released on a mandatory release date at the end of a served sentence, Frey has not been provided with any social services by the state. He has no health coverage and no income. He was released with less than a week's supply of the medications needed for his many health problems, including a degenerative bone disease and blood clots, and no way to obtain further treatment or supplies.

The compensation Frey may receive for his wrongful conviction is scant. The maximum payment of $5,000 a year for 5 years would place him at less than half of the federal poverty level. If he received that maximum, it would amount to $250 in compensation for each year between his wrongful conviction and his release.

Had Frey been guilty of a crime, and released after serving a 19 year sentence, he would have been provided with transitional housing and assistance in obtaining employment. Instead, he is living in a homeless shelter, with no means to support himself or obtain needed medical treatment. He wasn't provided with clothing upon his release.

[/box]

DOJ disregards McCain, McCain fails to react

Robert O'Hara · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box] (July 25th, 2013 Washington D.C.) As reported by AVFM News on June 28th, Arizona Senator John McCain sent a letter to Attorney General Eric Holder concerning the May 9th "blueprint" letter, sent to the University of Montana as a settlement agreement to what can only be described as a hysterical witch hunt by the DOJ. McCain pointed out several serious concerns regarding expanding the definition for sexual harassment, the virtual re-writing of law without involvement of the legislative branch and the erosion of due process for those accused of sexual harassment. McCain's letter, sent out on June 26th, imposed a deadline of July 17th for Holder to respond.

It has now been over a week past that deadline and the DOJ has yet to respond in any way to McCain's letter.

AVFM News made several calls and email inquiries to both the DOJ and John McCain's office for comment regarding the letter and the past deadline but was unable to receive a statement from either. However, Chris Thompson, Montana State University's Men's Issues Group founder, did receive a letter from Dr. Sandra Stover from the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights in response to his request that the DOE "expediently respond to Senator McCain's query dated June 26, 2013 concerning apparent improper proceedings of the Department of Justice."

She stated in her reply:

> "OCR and DOJ's May 9 resolution agreement and letter to the University of Montana require that the University take steps to prevent sexual harassment from creating a hostile environment for any student, and to eliminate and redress any hostile environment that arises. The agreement and letter are entirely consistent with the First Amendment, and did not create any new or broader definition of unlawful sexual harassment under Title IX or Title IV."

This is not true. The May 9th resolution agreement broadly defined sexual harassment as "any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature" including "verbal conduct." And that this "need not be subject to objective definitions."

Thompson sent the following counter response to Dr. Stover's email which includes McCain's exact questions posed to the DOJ in his June 28th letter:

> "Ms. Stover;
>
> To begin, thank you for addressing the queries I have as a father of four sons who will enter the Montana University System in coming years. As concisely as possible, I respectfully resubmit Senator John McCain's queries as the July 17, 2013 date has passed and, to my knowledge, there has been no formal response from the DOE.
> Therefore:
>
> 1. From what source does DOJ claim its authority to revise Court-approved Title IX jurisprudence through the settlement with the University of Montana rather than by judicial, regulatory, or legislative means?
>
> 2. How do you specifically define "unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature"? Having promulgated a new regulatory standard regarding the definition of sexual harassment, how does DOJ plan to ensure consistent application of that standard to avoid undesirable outcomes, including vexatious litigation?
>
> 3. To what extent does the broad nature of the new and judicially untested "unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature" standard, increase the risk of a wrongful conviction.
>
> 4. Could the following scenarios constitute "unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature" and demonstrate reasonable grounds for filing a sexual harassment complaint under the new definition:
> a. A professor assigning a book or showing a movie that contains content of a sexual nature.

> b. A student who makes a joke of a sexual nature to a friend and is overheard by another student.
> c. A student asking another student on a date.
> d. A student listening to music that contains content of a sexual nature overheard by others.
> e. A student giving another student a Valentine's Day card.
> f. A student or professor using masculine terms for generic pronouns (e.g., "Each student must bring his own laptop to the exam.")
>
> 5. What safe harbors are available to students and teachers so that they can be assured that innocent behavior is not investigated and punished?

His email, dated July 21st, has yet to receive a reply.

A broad coalition of groups led by The Foundation for Individual Rights in Education is exerting greater pressure for action against the May 9th blueprint. In an open letter dated July 16th including numerous signatories from the ranks of civil libertarians, attorneys, and academics FIRE charged:

> "The blueprint mandates a shockingly broad definition of sexual harassment—"any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature," including "verbal conduct"—and rejects the inclusion of a "reasonable person" standard, endangering academic freedom and freedom of expression on campus. The blueprint also requires university employees to report protected speech for mandatory investigation, allows for punishment before the completion of an investigation, and instructs UMT to keep records of the names of all students and faculty accused of "sexual harassment," even if no wrongdoing is found."

It is unclear why McCain, in light of increasing controversy, has uncharacteristically failed to respond to the DOJ's delinquency in answering his inquiry regarding the basic protection of constitutional rights on U.S. campuses. AVFM will continue to cover this story.

[/box]

Prone to violence chapter four

Erin Pizzey · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: We are pleased to have obtained permission to reprint Erin Pizzey's classic book, Prone to Violence*, first published in 1982. This book is a must-read on the subject of domestic violence, and is what people from the former Soviet Union would call "samizdat," as the book was subjected to concerted campaigns to make it unavailable for publication or distribution in the UK or United States. Over 30 years ago, gender ideologues were already trying to hide the truth–that men and women are equally prone to violence. Although parts of this book are dated, what's most shocking is how fresh and timely most of it still is: little has changed in the last 30 years, except that the vast majority of peer-reviewed scientific research done since its publication has only bolstered all of Erin's most salient points. When it comes to domestic violence, women and men are about as violent as each other, just in somewhat different ways, and its primary victims are children.*

We continue our series with the second chapter of "Prone To Violence." Watch for the other chapters to be published here on AVfM. If you have ever been involved in an abusive relationship with a woman (or man for that matter), you owe it to yourself to read this book. And if you know someone who is, or has been, in such a relationship, you owe it to them to get them to read it. –DE

Chapter Four: TILL DEATH US DO PART

'You will be the death of me.' I always thought this an ordinary, everyday expression of no significance until I began to realise how accurate a description it was of some of the relationships our families experienced. In violent families, one or other of the parents may easily die, some times the whole family. In middle-class households, where the violence is intellectual rather than physical, the chances are that various members may 'go mad'. I dread seeing middle-class women come in to see me who have been literally driven mad by the men they live with. It is an awful living death for them. In some cases, they would be better off really dead than end up pacing the streets muttering to themselves.

'My husband's a bank manager,' said one thin, shaken woman. 'He comes home and moves things about, so I can't find anything. Then he tells me that everything is just where it always was, and I must be going mad.' She sat waiting for me to look sceptical. I reassured her. 'I know,' I said. 'I've heard other women tell me the same story.' She looked so relieved, and her eyes were filled with tears. 'You believe me?' she said, still incredulous. 'Yes, I do,' I said, for this is a well-known sadistic pastime for the violent active partner to set about a calculated campaign to drive another member of the family mad. 'The Fanny by Gaslight syndrome', I call it. The terrible thing is that it works, and in most cases the perpetrator gets away with it because no one is properly trained to see into other people's inner worlds.

Many such women, having endured years of sexual, mental or physical sadism, go over the edge never to return. They haunt solicitors' offices with huge bags of files. They go everywhere looking for justice, but there is none for them to find. Eventually they end up in the back wards of our larger mental hospitals, or on the road – becoming one of the huge crowd of the dispossessed.

Talking to Sarah first concentrated my attention on the subject of choosing to die. She had come to us straight from hospital, with her little boy, and described the way her husband used to go completely berserk. 'He doesn't know what he's doing when he's like that,' she said. This remark reminded me very forcibly of a conversation during the early days in Women's Aid, when I was lecturing at Rhode Island in America. I was talking to Richard Gelles, a sociologist who had studied violence in the family, and made a similar remark suggesting that men were completely out of control when they battered their wives. No they aren't, said Richard firmly. 'They are very much in control. Otherwise you would have many more deaths.'

Now, listening to Sarah, and looking at her legs, I was still prepared to acknowledge the general truth of that comment. But this time Sarah's husband had gone too far: he had pushed her out of the window of their flat, to fall thirty feet to the ground, and left her lying there. She dragged herself along the ground to the nearest flat, where they called an ambulance. Both legs were broken, and one required a big operation to put a steel pin to hold the ankle together. It was that leg that we were both staring at. 'Do you think he'll kill you?' I asked. 'Yes,' she said, with a huge smile on her face, her eyes alight at the prospect. 'Yes, he will.' I knew then that she was yet another woman who would go back for more.

We talked for a long time. She said she reckoned she had a ninety per cent chance of being killed. She needed murder games to feel alive. And she probably will lose one such game, because this particular man will kill her. He is one of the men whose rage does exceed all boundaries. She knows that, and that is why she stays with him. No other man is as deadly for her. I kissed her goodbye a few days later, and subsequently I had a phone-call from her. 'They've taken my boy into care,' she said. 'Will you tell them I'm a good mother?' 'I can't, Sarah. If you can't come to terms with your own need for violence, he's safer away from you. But you don't want to give it up. I'm sorry, love.'

It was a painful conversation because, in a way, I was the last human contact in the strange lunar inner world that had dictated and directed her course through life since she had been a little girl – and her violent father's little princess. Her father the prince had kissed his daughter, thereby infecting her for the rest of her life. She had become addicted to her father and to his violence. But she could never have him to herself, because her mother had too strong a grip, so her husband now served to keep the addiction alive.

Eleanor was in the Refuge at the same time as Sarah, and I have always been particularly fond of her. She worked the 'rough trade', the bottom end of the prostitution business, where the prostitute knows she is paid to abuse or to be sexually abused. She was another one who predicted her own death with cheerful certainty. 'Cut up in little bits,' she would say, 'That's how they'll find me.' Several of her friends had already been found dismembered. She had even been asked to identify one of them who had been on ice for months because there were not enough bits to put together to allow recognition. Eleanor knew it was her friend by the tattoo on her upper arm, and she was very proud of herself for helping the coppers for a change.

Eleanor and her brother and sister had been abandoned by their mother on a doorstep in North London when she was seven. Her mother was a prostitute, and Caroline had been molested and beaten as a child. The three children were taken into care, and so passed from one mini concentration camp to another. She was on the game by the time she was fourteen. Yet she was such a lovable woman. On one occasion I had not seen her for several months, when she arrived puffing and panting through the front door. 'I've legged it from the nick,' she said. 'Oh, Eleanor, that's stupid,' I said. 'I'm not picking fucking Brussels sprouts on a prison farm in this weather,' she said. 'How would you feel about picking sprouts?' 'You have to pick sprouts because you did a robbery,' I explained. 'I can choose whether or not to pick sprouts because I don't commit robberies.' This piece of moralising floated straight over her head, and we grinned at each other, and I hugged her.

Everyone around her was sure she was going to kill someone sometime. She was one of those people who give off the promise of a huge and potentially catastrophic violent explosion. Certainly those over-controlled violent people can, if they ever do blow, cause incredible damage. For the most part, they internalise all their rage and look for another violent relationship to ventilate it. Eleanor did not have to choose the rough trade. She was young and attractive, and could well have chosen the Gloucester Road area, where there is a flourishing trade of sex in cars, and plenty of money to be made. Instead Eleanor insisted on concentrating on the King's Cross area where the rough trade thrives. She knew she needed pain. She was really one of the first women I met who understood her own need to reach the ultimate orgasm at the moment just before death, and then to slide into a womb-like oblivion.

Talking to her, I was reminded of the sampan girls in Hong Kong, where I lived twenty-five years ago. Although illegal, it was still a practice for rich young men to take prostitutes out to sea in those Chinese boats and then bend backwards over the sides so that their heads were submerged in the water. The goal was for the man to ejaculate and for the girl to survive the ordeal to collect a very large sum of money. In this terminal struggle, if the man was slow in ejaculating, the woman would drown. I found it very puzzling that so many of the Chinese girls who chose to do this were young, attractive, and not in need of money. It puzzled me then, but now I understand it. Like a heroin addict tenderly describing his love object, the needle, so Eleanor would describe the atrocities that were performed on her. She talked like a young girl describing a first romance. She would flush with sexual excitement at the memory of whips and chains, though she preferred to inflict pain rather than receive it.

Some women who have their pain and pleasure crossed in this way do find prostitution an acceptable way of fulfilling their needs. But the myth of the happy hooker is pernicious, as it totally denies the misery and the horror of that grim, lurid business, to say nothing of the effect prostitution has on their children. Eleanor's life will probably end up some back alley, with fancy knife-work round her vagina and breasts – the well-known trademark of a lethal mother-damaged man.

On this particular visit from Eleanor, I persuaded her she would be better off giving herself up and finishing her sentence. She said she wanted to go back to Holloway Prison where she knew everybody and felt safe, instead of having to work on the Brussels sprout farm. So I wrote a letter to Holloway explaining why I was sending her back to them, and to her delight I sent her back in style, in a taxi with a member of staff. I gather Holloway is quite unused to convicts arriving back in taxis and giving themselves up.

Brenda was not a prostitute. She came to us with a very large black eye and a small baby. She had raven-black hair and olive skin from her Jewish ancestry. Her mother and father had both been very violent to each other and to the children. Her father was confusing for her because he both spoiled her and beat her. He also molested her, I could see an old familiar pattern again. The following is an extract from a taped conversation with Brenda when I was trying to get her to look at what was happening to her. She started by telling me how her father used to take her out to the pub when she was young.

ERIN: Oh, right. And how old were you when he took you?

BRENDA: When I started going there I was thirteen.

ERIN: So he started taking you out to the darts when you were thirteen. That was what really pissed them all off (meaning her brothers).

BRENDA: Every Wednesday we used to go over there, and we used to play darts.

ERIN: Did he get heavy with your boyfriends? Did he not want you . . .

BRENDA: No. Because I never had boyfriends.

ERIN: You had him instead.

BRENDA: Yes. I used to go out with my Dad on the Wednesday. Every Wednesday I'd just go over.

ERIN: Didn't you know at thirteen that it was pissing your mother off?

BRENDA: No. All I used to see was the fighting and the shouting.

ERIN: Did he ever beat you up?

BRENDA: My Dad?

ERIN: Yes.

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: Really? And did he molest you at all, or not? He never touched you up?

BRENDA: No. I got beat up by my Dad, and then the same night I got beat up by my Mum.

ERIN: You got battered by both?

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: And emotionally, really. He used you like…

BRENDA: But the funny part about it was one day, it was Summer, you know – you sit in the garden to catch the sun. I walked in. . . .The night before I was supposed to be in at eleven and I got in half-past eleven, and my Dad really hit me hard, and I had a great big black eye. And I walked into the pub to tell my Dad that. . . He was in the garden and there was a crowd of blokes sitting with him, and I was going to tell him to tell my Mum that I wasn't going to be in for dinner. I was going out for the day. And as I walked in there, Charles he was sitting with turned round and said 'That's a nice shiner. How did you get that?' And my Dad actually had the cheek to tell him 'I done that one'; and he was really proud of it.

ERIN: Yes. He brought you back here, didn't he, the other day? Your Dad.

BRENDA: Yes. My Dad came down on Saturday.

ERIN: What's he like with you now?

BRENDA: He's okay. But he's very sort of off. It's weird. I mean, it will probably sound funny but instead of like 'look at my handsome grandchild'. It's 'Look at me, I'm a grandad'. In other words, you're supposed to say to him 'You don't look like a grandad.' Not 'Look at my handsome grandson'.

ERIN: Yes. He's a narcissus, isn't he?

BRENDA: Yes. he's very ego . . . you know.

ERIN: Yes.

BRENDA: That's why he used to get a kick out of these pregnant women knocking on the door.

ERIN: Yes. And then he laughed when he hurt them.

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: He must have hated women you know.

BRENDA: He gets a kick out of them.

ERIN: What happened in his family? Do you know?

BRENDA: He's got lots of brothers and sisters, and he's the black sheep of the family now. Because of how he treated my Mum.

ERIN: Was his family violent, though?

BRENDA: His Mum and Dad, no.

ERIN: Where did he learn all that violence?

BRENDA: He used to fight a lot. He was always in trouble at school. And he used to go round with a gang. He used to like do nasty things to people just for the kick of it, you know, like they'd knock someone's walking-stick and laugh.

ERIN: Yes, and laugh. Yes.

BRENDA: It's . . . you know it's evil the things he used to do. He'd just sit and tell you about it all, and think it's funny. His sister is very violent, though.

ERIN: There must have been some violence, though, in the family if. . . Because you don't get born like that. You learn it.

BRENDA: From the other children?

ERIN: Yes.

BRENDA: He still fights with his favourite sister.

ERIN: Really! Physically?

BRENDA: To this day.

ERIN: What about your brothers? Do you fight with them still?

BRENDA: I don't fight with my brothers now. Because of the fact that when I do see them it's such a long time in between that it's nice to see them.

ERIN: Yes. Were you the favourite once? Were there any favourites?

BRENDA: Well. In the family, my big brother Stan. He's my favourite because he was the first-born, and when he was born he had to have . . . He's got a scar from there to there (all around the abdomen). He had to have all his insides unblocked. He was supposed to die, and he was christened because he was supposed to die. They worried about him so much. They really loved him. And then I came ten months later, so I was an accident and then my little brother, came. And my Mum was sterilised at the age of nineteen, so she couldn't have any more. Nick, the little one, was loved because he was the last child that she'd ever have.

ERIN: She was nineteen when she was sterilised. So how old when she started having babies? Fifteen?

BRENDA: Yes. They were forced to get married.

ERIN: Why? Because she was pregnant?

BRENDA: My Mum's dad went after my Dad.

ERIN: Went after him?

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: Made him marry her?

BRENDA: Because she was pregnant.

ERIN: Yes.

BRENDA: With me . . . She had my brother. But when she got married she was pregnant with me.

ERIN: Yes. So they were forced to marry, and then she had you, and in a way she could blame you for that as well. Was she ever good to you?

BRENDA: Sometimes we'd get on. But I couldn't sit in the same room. I mean if I sat down in the same room as my Mum, she'd find something to start on me about like 'Go and do the washing-up'.

ERIN: She'd pick on you.

BRENDA: She's got to pick on something, my Mum. We could not sit in the same room. You know, you wouldn't see us together. I mean I've had fights with her and. . .

ERIN: Well, she beat you a lot as a child, didn't she?

BRENDA: One day the police were called about her being stupid. One night my Mum was doing the washing – you know the tongs that you move by . . . All I did was walk through the back door, and she said, 'Get off the grass, I've just cut it', or something stupid. And I walked off the grass, and as I went into the kitchen she had the tongs in her hand, and she hit me with them. So I ran out into the back garden. I just thought 'Right, that's it', and I just ran out . . . and it really hurt, it got me right on the shoulder, and she ran after me. To stop her from getting me, I held her hand. But she went on her knees and her arm twisted back. My brothers came running out and they started to hit me for hitting my Mum. My Mum told them that I attacked her, and really all I was doing was trying to stop her from hitting me again.

ERIN: Yes, I know.

BRENDA: And so my brothers beat me up for hitting my Mum.

ERIN: Terrible jealousies in that family, there, really?

BRENDA: Yes. They're both living there now.

ERIN: They live with her now? (The brothers.) Haven't left her?

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: How old are they?

BRENDA: One's twenty-one and one's nineteen.

ERIN: And they're probably violent.

BRENDA: Nick's not. He's very quiet. He's very deceiving.

ERIN: Yes. But you never know. You see

BRENDA: Because when . . . He's a bastard. He really is a imbecile.

ERIN: Yes?

BRENDA: But he's very quiet. He's nice. Really nice. Do anything for anybody.

ERIN: What's he doing about your mother? What do you think he'll do?

BRENDA: He'll kill her.

ERIN: Yes. If I asked you what chance you thought you had of dying, what chance would you give yourself of living or dying in the next few years?

BRENDA: Dying?

ERIN: Dying. What chance are you going to give? Ellen (also in the Refuge) told me she'd give herself eighty per cent chance of being killed.

BRENDA: I'd say ninety.

ERIN: Why do you want to die? Do you know?

BRENDA: No. Not that I want to die, but I just think I will.

ERIN: Behind it is a need. While you're slagging a man down, you don't really know him very well, but at any moment he could take out a knife.

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: How do you think it will happen?

BRENDA: Yes, that's how I'm looking at it. I know someone's going to kill me.

ERIN: How are they going to kill you?

BRENDA: I don't know actually. As. . .

ERIN: Have you thought? Have you got any imagination of how it would happen?

BRENDA: Yes. I think I'm going to . . . I think what's going to happen is like – all the times I used to come home when I'd hopped off school. So I'd go home and say like 'The dinner was really horrible today, Mum', or something like that. Just the sense of guilt knowing that I hadn't been to school. I'd say something about school – what happened. And yet they've known that I hadn't been to school; and they'd turn round and say 'Well, you haven't been to school. Why are you lying?' You know. But I had this sense of guilt. But I know that one day I'm going to say something. I'm going to tell a lie to somebody. They're going to find out and it's going to be telling the wrong person the wrong lie. And they're going to get me for it.

ERIN: How are they going to kill you?

BRENDA: Well. I just know that I'm going to tell a lie to somebody and.. .

ERIN: Yes. I can see that, but what I'm saying is: how? With a knife, or strangling, or hitting, or what?

BRENDA: Knife.

ERIN: A knife.

BRENDA: I've got a feeling, an axe.

ERIN: An axeman. Right. So where will he actually axe you? Your head off, or what? Which way will you die?

BRENDA: I don't know. I've always had a feeling of an axeman, the last three years. I've had this fear that someone's going to break in with an axe.

ERIN: Axe?

BRENDA: And hack me.

ERIN: And where?

BRENDA: Well across there (pointing to her neck).

ERIN: Across your neck?

BRENDA: Yes.

ERIN: Yes. It's interesting, because people who think they're going to die have usually worked out how it's going to happen.

BRENDA: Because when I was living with Harry (her violent boyfriend and Ned's father) the house was not a very safe house; the back doors were faulty. And the week we moved in there, was the week that five girls had been murdered; and where the Brixton Road is, it was all in there, and that was at the back of my garden; and I was really frightened. And Harry said he was going to the pub and you know sort of. . . And I used to literally take my blankets down to the front door and sleep next to the front door. And every bit of noise I heard. . .I used to stand on the doorstep sometimes, just stand on the doorstep, and yet that's more dangerous than actually being behind the door.

ERIN: Now, that's something you've picked up about yourself. How to explain it is very simple. When you were born, there are two parts of your brain, if you like. There's pain and there's pleasure. Now if you're loved and cuddled you learn that love – a pleasure comes from being loved and cuddled. You feel pleasure from being loved and cuddled. If you're battered, the only time you feel real pleasure is when you're in pain. I don't expect you to understand, but it's true. Now, I've talked to thousands of women about this. What's happening to you is… when you were standing on that step, with the possibility of an axeman somewhere around you, your adrenalin must have been so high that you were probably higher than you could ever be on heroin. Because of partly fear…

BRENDA: So what you're more or less saying is that I actually stood on the doorstep and I was saying 'Do it. Get it over and done with.'

ERIN: Yes, probably. And you're looking – and, I mean, I know Ellen's going down dark alleys.

BRENDA: Yes. But I wouldn't. I mean even in the daytime I would walk down Chiswick High Road. . .

ERIN: Yes. But you look at it differently. She actually goes out on the streets and will fight. You are quite different.

The axeman will be somebody – as you say, you will get drunk; you'll pick him out. He'll know that that's what you want and then you'll end up dead. Or he'll end up dead.

BRENDA: It's a really stupid thing to have, is the fear of an axeman. I mean why an axeman? And why couldn't I pick a knife maniac? But an axeman – why an axe?

ERIN: Well, I think that's what we're going to work on. Shall we try and work that out? I'll finish today because we've both worked very hard. We've got down to what it is, and now I've got to start right back at the beginning, and we'll have to work out why an axe, and why do you have to die. Why is that the end that you see?

BRENDA: Because I know my mouth will get me into trouble.

ERIN: Yes. That's right.

BRENDA: It won't be me or what I do; it's my mouth and what I say.

ERIN: Yes. Well, do you know what you actually say when you start slagging down?

BRENDA: No, I mean, when I'm lying, it just comes so natural – I even convince myself.

ERIN: Oh, I know. That's why I believe you. I mean, I know you believe yourself so you're not lying in your eyes.

BRENDA: I mean, I can say 'Yes, I was there at school', and I've really convinced myself that I was at school.

ERIN: No. But the other things, too, love, is this is what happens. There's another side of you that doesn't want to admit what you do. You bunk off school, you come home, and you set it up. You know your parents know you weren't at school. So you tell a lie which is 'We had a good dinner'. They have the right then to beat you. For you being battered is pleasure – in a way, if you think about it. Because that's all you've ever known as love. At least when they were beating you, you were feeling something.

BRENDA: Because they were touching me.

ERIN: They were touching you, and so were the men touching you, and you start to slag, and the trouble is that you get your black eye, like you did the other day, one way or another, because you get driven to it. You're all right for a little while, then suddenly that need comes again, and that's when you go looking for it. And that's the work we've got to do.

BRENDA: Well, Harry once told me that I . . . Like the night that he bust them couple of ribs and he literally smashed the whole flat up; the television went; everything went. And he still swears to this day I begged for it.

ERIN: You probably did.

BRENDA: He said I really begged for it. He said no way would he ever have done it, and he hit me right in the face, and hit my head against the wall.

ERIN: You know what's interesting about that, though. We were talking about this another time – this is another whole discussion, this whole thing of pain and pleasure. And many women can't climax normally, because it's when they're in pain, when they're actually being battered, that is a climax for them; and that's why they keep going back to look for pain. For quite a lot of women, it's the moment before the man loses control. That's the moment – the exciting element for them. Women whose pleasure and pain haven't been confused can have ordinary sexual climaxes. But the trouble with that game, where it's pain and pleasure confused, is that pain has to get worse, and worse, and worse for the pleasure to increase and increase and increase. And that's where you end up with the axe-man. For that's the ultimate. It's almost like the ultimate orgasm, isn't it? Frightening, but it's true.

BRENDA: And yet I still would like to be loved.

ERIN: You see, there's two sides of Brenda. There's the side that . . . and her head knows all this and knows that she wants love and comfort. But there's the other side, which is the side we have to work on. I have to work on it with you – which in fact's dragging you off the other way, to a certain death.

BRENDA: But there's no two ways it can go, though. I mean, it's not knowing how to give love. I don't know how to receive it.

ERIN: No. Right. Oh, it's very frightening for someone, being loved. . .

BRENDA: I mean, someone could say that they loved me, and I wouldn't know.

ERIN: Because you wouldn't know what they meant.

Since that conversation, Brenda has left the Refuge. I heard from her only once subsequently. She sounded happy, and said that she and Ned were no longer living with Harry, but now with a man who apparently was not violent. In all honesty I cannot say how happy she became in that relationship, or how long it lasted, for Brenda did not keep in touch afterwards. I worry that her addiction to pain and her need to die are so strong and deepseated that she may well find her axeman one day.

Brenda was able to understand much of what I said. It was with her that I fully realised the damage often done to children by the grandmother laying claim to a favourite grandchild. Brenda had been brought up by her grandmother, who had virtually seduced her away from her mother. The grandmother (on her father's side) then used the little girl against her daughter-in-law. When the grandmother grew bored with the game (usually when the girl is around six or seven) she was sent back to the family. By that time the child was already at war with her mother, who hated her. The mother saw her daughter as a betrayer. From then on the little girl was at her mercy.

Brenda's ability to start fights in the local pubs was legendary. On one occasion a very violent woman received a batch of stolen watches and shared them with Brenda. They agreed to sell the watches for six pounds each in the pub that night. Brenda got into the pub before this woman, and sold all her watches for four pounds each. By the time the woman arrived, there were almost no takers, and she was forced to drop her price. In the ensuing fight, Brenda got very badly beaten. When she presented her woebegone face to me I refused to discuss her plans to prosecute the other woman. 'You needed a fix, a dose of pain. You set it up, and you got it. No one else would risk upsetting a lady as violent as that one, but you did. Learn from it,' I said. She took the point.

I think it might be interesting here to look at a drawing [p.107, omitted from web] done by Ellen, referred to in my talk with Brenda as the woman who walked down dark alleys at night. When she came in she was 'high' with the excitement of getting away from Max, her very dangerous husband. There was something about Ellen that did not fit into my checklist of ingredients that make up a profile of a woman who is so addicted to violence that it will be a long-term project to help her change herself. Like Brenda she was taken hostage by her grandmother. Again, her grandmother used her in a war against her own daughter, Ellen's mother. None of this came up in conversation, because she was locked into complaining about her husband, who was indeed a very violent, explosive bully. It was when she had completed the following drawing that I was able to grasp the origin of the problem.

Firstly we discussed the figure of her kneeling at her grandmother's grave. She even remembered her grandmother's moment of death, and her feelings of being isolated from her mother and father, and fenced off from their happy and loving relationship with each other. The grandmother had always lived with the family and spoiled Ellen. Ellen realised very soon that there was a family war on, and she was to be on her grandmother's side. Soon her mother shut her out. Ellen learned to provoke her mother and to rebel against her parents, egged on by her grandmother. The poor child was in a no-win situation. Finally her grandmother died, but the pattern of provoking, for a violent reaction from her mother, was set and continued.

Ellen had since found an even more exciting person to provoke: her husband Max. After their marriage, Ellen continued down the path that could have lead to her own destruction. She did have a bonus though: her parents were essentially good ones, in that they did love and care for her even if they could not cope with her. They were not aware of the relationship between Ellen and the grandmother. They saw Ellen as the problem, not the grandmother.

After we worked our way through that, we looked at the object in the corner of the drawing. 'It looks like a bottle to me,' I said. 'Yes,' she agreed. 'You provoke him when you're drunk?' I inquired. She nodded. Then I explained our concept of addiction to her. ‘I can see what you’re driving at’ she said, ‘because I knew every time that he was going to end up hitting me, but I still used to keep on pushing him.’ She really did understand, and because there had been some good parenting from her mother and father, she was able to work hard on herself. As I write this down, she is still with us. She has left her violent relationship with Max and has settled with her two boys. She is not at all the same person who first came into the Refuge and would be out all night drinking and fighting with the hard-nuts of the community. She has met a very kind and gentle man, and is contemplating a future with him. She has transcended. She has come to terms with her own violent needs.

Ellen’s goal was life. Brenda, however, taught me that violent families set death as a goal for their children. In emotionally able families, parents give their children life-giving goals. They are realistic about their children’s gifts, and they help their children to achieve their ambitions with love and patience. They talk of their children being a success in life, and the children experience a feeling of a happy, warm future stretching ahead of them. The position is totally reversed in a violent family. In a physically violent family, the language is also violent. ‘I’ll fucking kill you,’ is heard all the time. The children grow up with death as a real possibility, as the parents fight and smash each other up. From a very early age the child has a feeling of urgency, and has to consider his survival as a risky and dangerous prospect. In these families many deaths occur: cot-deaths, miscarriages, still-births, accidents, murder and suicide. Unlike in happy families, where the goals internalised by the children are happy goals, children from violent families internalise deadly goals.

In emotionally-violent families, however, which are more likely to be middle-class, the goals can be just as deadly, but the children will not hear the language of violence; instead they will be given totally unrealistic goals to achieve. Then the screaming and the mockery that meets the failure to achieve will last with them all their lives. The guilt will line their internal world, so they may never be able to express any of their real gifts. They will literally believe they are nothing – No thing – and they will form relationships expressing that same message. They often finally commit suicide. Occasionally a child from such a family will turn and kill its parents, bringing out a rush of newspaper articles simply because it is a middle-class child from a privileged background. No one will look behind the murderous event. The child will be locked away, and the middle-class fortress will close its gates, secure in the knowledge that it is only ‘those people out there’ who suffer the problem of violence.

The trouble is that it is the middle-class emotionally disabled, not able to ask for help because of their position in society, who often become social workers and probation officers, and join agencies involved in the care of human beings. Unfortunately, as they have done nothing about their own damage, they are a menace to the very people they are paid to help. Working from their own damage, they create havoc in social-work teams and elsewhere, as they collude with and manipulate the clients. There is no better training in my opinion than life-experience, but experience is useless if it is seen only as ‘bad experience’. It must be put to work and turned into wisdom.

There are many excellent people working in this field of family violence who would relate to and understand Brenda, but unfortunately, due to lack of understanding, there are also too many emotionally disabled people let loose with the label of ‘agency workers’. Of course, they were the ones who did not see Brenda’s bruises as a child, or did not recognise that her repeated running away was not just a naughty act. In their own childhoods, they shared the emotionally or physically violent reality, and grew to accept violence as normal. If you grow up seeing bruises, you do not find bruising abnormal. If you are molested, you will not find other people molesting children as abnormal.

A young girl of fourteen complained to me that her father was insisting on bathing and drying her. She had run away to us because she wanted this to stop. He claimed that he was only performing his rights as a father. The social worker who followed hot on the heels of the girl tried to argue with us that it was perfectly normal for a father to behave this way. We gently pointed out that he was speaking from his own damaged and molested childhood.

There is a dangerous assumption commonly held by those who have never known real violence. It is expressed by people saying, ‘But surely if someone is born into a violent family, they will learn from that experience and spend the rest of their lives avoiding violence like the plague?' I wish this was true. The fact is, if you are born into a violent family, the chances are that you will become emotionally, physically, and chemically addicted to violence.

Stephen, a boy of eleven, came to us with his mother. She was a very beautiful, childlike woman who drifted from one violent man to another, dragging Stephen with her. Poor Stephen was totally confused by her attitude towards him. One moment, when she was manless, he was the most important thing in her life, 'the man of the family,' her protector, her friend, and also the 'lover'. Then, just as suddenly, he would be pitchforked into yet another of her violent relationships, and be expected to stand between her and her new man. Stephen was hopelessly addicted to his mother. I could rarely lure him away from her side. He stole for her, and brought her jewellery, clothes, sweets, anything to keep her. 'Stephen's so wonderful to his mother,' unsuspecting visitors would say. I knew it was not like that at all.

One day Stephen came running in to me, obviously very pleased with himself. He held out his hand and showed me a drawing he had just done that made him so proud. It depicted a skeleton pointing its bony finger to an arched doorway labelled 'The Door to Hell'. The skeleton, marked 'Dead Wife' grinned horribly as she showed the way to the door over which hung the sign 'Wives Only'. This is the terrifying attitude to women with which Stephen will grow as he makes his future relationships. The light in his eyes was unmistakable. Unless he receives extensive treatment it is likely that this boy may well grown up to torture other women. He has been storing away his violence and his pain, and, given a certain type of woman, he may well act out all his confused rage on her.

This brings me to the well-documented case of Eunice and Gerald. During the ten years I have spent listening to people in pain, I have often had occasions when they related to me events such as occurred between these two human beings. Most of the time they are left in a fantasy world, largely ignored by doctors and psychiatrists, until as for Peter Sutcliffe, the fantasy becomes a reality and they begin to act it all out. As long as the mutilator and the mutilated meet in the dark sea of the criminal underworld, a body in a black plastic bag attracts little attention.

Our society's schizophrenic attitude to violence was well illustrated during the Yorkshire Ripper trial. The whole country expressed outrage at what he had done. He was called a monster, a beast, inhuman, but there seemed absolutely no attempt to understand why he did what he did. Who should really be standing in the dock with him? In my time I have warned agencies of other potential rippers, and got precious little response. Who failed to spot the troubled child? Soon after the trial, the opera Lulu was staged in London, and people flocked to buy expensive tickets to watch a prostitute die by sexual misadventure. A month later the film Pandora's Box was shown on television. As the main character feels the knife sliding into her, she smiles ecstatically at the camera over the shoulder of her murderer. How can we condemn a murderer when we finance opera and film which celebrate identical events?

Eunice came into the Refuge asking to see me. She was a big woman; handsome is probably how one would describe her. She carried herself well, and if you did not know her, you would never suspect she was anything other than a successful business woman. As we talked around the problem she had come to discuss, I realised that she was yet another woman in the grip of such a serious addiction to pain that she could eventually die from it. Her confusion was enormous, and even her recital of events could raise her emotional and chemical levels to a point where she slipped into that reality shared only by herself and by the man, Gerald, who mutilated her.

Most of this work I shared with my colleague Tina Wood. The first thing we had to do was to gain entry into that reality, which meant interviewing Gerald, once I had Eunice's trust. I asked her to draw 'the Beast', as she called him. To draw him she sat in a chair outside the office. When she had finished, she lay slumped over the drawing pad; and I reminded myself that people in love recall their sexual pleasure with love, but people who know only pain must recall their sexual pleasure with pain. I comforted her, and we began our first session. The following is the first recorded interview with Eunice:

ERIN: (looking over the drawing) Yep! It's very good, actually. Look, everything you've told me.

EUNICE: Normally, this is what's taking a hell of a lot out of me. It's taking me apart – the fact that I've had to. I've even let anybody know what I feel about it. You know – that drawing. [p.112, omitted]

ERIN: That's right, I knew that would do it. Now I'm going to put you back together again. Yes? Fine. Well, there you have – what made me cry, or makes me want to cry, we speak about, is not him, but that's your father, isn't it? (pointing to the face on the right of the drawing).

EUNICE: No.

ERIN: No? Isn't it?

EUNICE: No.

ERIN: Who is it?

EUNICE: That's the other him (Gerald).

ERIN: Funny.

EUNICE: That's the small image I see of the person that was the one that I thought was him.

ERIN: It was him?

EUNICE: That took me in, and you can see I've linked it up with the person that he was. Because that part of him was such a small part of it.

ERIN: Isn't it extraordinary, but you also told me, at the same time that your father had a beautiful voice and sang.

EUNICE: Oh, yes.

ERIN: To me, that's the microphone, and then you've written the word 'voice'.

EUNICE: Perhaps I thought it without realising that's so.

ERIN: It's your subconscious.

EUNICE: Yes.

ERIN: Because you've been looking for your father through men. Every relationship, you're looking for someone, because you loved him.

EUNICE: I like the person he was.

ERIN: He's lovely?

EUNICE: That he was happy and genuine, straightforward, and he gave a lot of pleasure to people, by entertaining, and he was an intelligent man and he had a. . .

ERIN: And yet what he (Gerald) should have been, was like him – instead you've got this very, very sick man. Now, explain – I don't understand that. (Pointing to the rectangular shape in the upper corner of the drawing.)

EUNICE: That's that room. (In the house where Eunice lived with her mutilating partner.)

ERIN: Explain this now. Just go through the room again for me.

EUNICE: That's what should have been the, umm, like you've got a big living-room, right. This is a massive house, and you come along the passage and then there's the room off to the left hand, and that room was the breakfast room, where there was a hatchway.

ERIN: That's right.

EUNICE: The hatchway was about, maybe the size of this book, or maybe that, like that. Umm, on the left-hand side of the room there's some French windows – French doors. Wood at the bottom and the glass halfway down. Well, what he done with a week or two, or a week. I can't remember the question to that extent – we moved in. He went round and he nailed . . .

ERIN: Did you choose this house together?

EUNICE: Yes.

ERIN: You didn't know what he was going to use that room for?

EUNICE: Oh no. No, I got no idea. I had to go out and buy furniture, thinking we'd got plenty of bedrooms – putting furniture upstairs, planned it as a home you know. Oh, yes, I looked on it, you know, as a home. And after two weeks he went out the back and he got some wooden planks and nailed the French doors from outside with six inch nails, and he said that was because, umm, in case, you look, when we're out and things, with people being able to burgle and that – it makes the place more secure. And I'd got no reason not to think that.

He had some heavy curtains put up at the French window, er, thick velvet ones, and it wasn't till some weeks later, that . . . what he used to do. He used to get a piece of hardboard – because – through the archway was the kitchen part with the big steel cabinets, and he'd either get a cabinet and move that along so the hatchway was blocked. Or, he'd get a piece of hardboard and shove that. So in that room there was only the lamp and that was an orange lamp. There was no main light.

ERIN: With an orange bulb?

EUNICE: Yes. He wouldn't have no main light on. And using that as a bedroom. But of course, later on I realised that, that wasn't just a bedroom. That was a room which made an isolated chamber. And when I was in there and he'd got a wireless, and he used to put the wireless through from the kitchen. He'd got a hole where the wire came through, and he would bring it into the bedroom, so that he could turn it up. One of them old box wirelesses – turn the volume up. And for me, when it was getting bad or, when at that time. . . the place was the place where quite a lot of things happened.

ERIN: Most of them really.

EUNICE: Most of them – but also in the living-room.

ERIN: This is when you've been tied up?

EUNICE: Yes.

ERIN: And that, umm – what are the marks?

EUNICE: They're the ones that I was smothered in after the cutting, or with marks from sticks, or whips and that.

ERIN: When you see him like this – remember you called him the Beast. (Pointing to the large face in the centre of the drawing.)

EUNICE: Yes. Well, there were times when he used to get so het up that he – it was like he couldn't destroy me enough. He'd get hold of me and he'd rip me down with his nails. And the first year when I was with him, he'd got all rotten teeth, absolutely terrible teeth; they were all jagged. And he fright to death about going to the dentist, but that wasn't it. They looked really horrible. And when he used to go into this thing and he used to bite me and try to gnaw at my head, and he'd growl like a dog, and he'd get his teeth like this and he'd drag them all down like that. That was long before he started doing the cutting, and I used to have ridges down my back like that with his jagged teeth, and they used to go bad, you know. And that's when I think about whether he's a dog. This bit here is the amount of punching I took which always began. . .

ERIN: He'd say 'It's eight o'clock.'

EUNICE: He'd say 'It's time, it's time,' or some remark like that, and then he'd sort of come across and he'd sort of – we could sometimes be, say, in the living-room. The telly could be on, and, er, he'd put the record-player on and the telly at the same time, and he'd say 'It's time.' And he'd just come over to me and he'd start taking my dress off, or my skirts, and my jumpers and everything off, and he'd just literally fold them; he'd fold everything. This is at certain times when he folded them up, and I never used to look to see where he was putting my things or anything, you know.

ERIN: You used to shut your eyes once it was time.

EUNICE: Oh, yes.

ERIN: Then, you just never opened your eyes?

EUNICE: I only ever opened my eyes when I was forced to stand at the wall, or to get down on the couch, or to make any movement. Then I'd got to open my eyes to do that. But the minute I was down, or whatever how I was doing, I didn't open my eyes at all.

ERIN: Who is this then? (Pointing to the drawing.)

EUNICE: That's me there the same, er, that, er, upstairs later on there was – I brought the single bed down as well, because I had single furniture with me. And there's one room at the back that looked out onto open space at the balcony part, where he put that single bed in there, and he made up some reason about he was going to have the plumber in and he was going to let the rooms out, which never did occur, you know. It never happened. But there were times, especially – sometimes it used to be on a Saturday – a Saturday morning, and he would take me upstairs. Only very rarely, so this is why I don't remember a lot about it. Sometimes he would say it's time to go in the bathroom, you know, which is that. And whenever that happened, umm, he used to take me in there and he used to get me down in a kneeling position, and he'd hold my hair, and, as I say, he's an expert, this is what he kept digging into me. He's an expert in how to do a hell of a lot of pain without, you know – not that it don't show, but he can do – you know. And then he would start slapping my face backwards and forwards like that, anything up to fifty or sixty times, which seems bloody impossible, but it can happen.

ERIN: He's got all night.

EUNICE: No. He did this in the morning, and he used to run the taps. What he used to do – what he used to do. He used to turn the taps on in the bath, and the taps on in the sink, so that the slapping wouldn't be heard. And then sometimes he used to chop down on my face like that, so he chopped on it like that. Sometimes after that, and after he'd perhaps tired himself out and everything, then I used to go back downstairs, because I'm sad about that bedroom and that, and I knew that I'd got to go out, but I'd have to be ready to be out by 4.30 that day, no matter what. So, what I used to do – I used to go to the fridge and I used to get ice and I used to get the towel, get the ice and put it in it, and have it on my face. But my face used to come up. Funny thing is, it never bruised, but it used to bloat up like a balloon and inside of my mouth was swollen. But he'd got a way of doing it, so it didn't bruise – but it did. It come out like that, and the ice was the only thing that would make the swelling go down. But unless – the terrific pain you can get was forcing the swelling down, and the pounding, it's like having a terrific burning on your tooth like that, all the time.

ERIN: Did he ever try putting you in the bath?

EUNICE: No, No. The funny thing, he never did, and in fact he that's another strange thing. He never used that bath in that house. Never once did he use our own bath. He used to go to a public bath. And when he used to come back, he used to undo his – that's where he used to go Saturday mornings after he'd either beaten me up in bed and done the slapping and everything else. Then he'd just go out. He'd say 'I'll see you later. I'll be back for lunch at whatever time'. He always went out that Saturday morning, always. I never knew, only for the fact he went to the baths. And when he came back, he used to walk in and he used to pull his jumper up like that and he'd have one of the corporation bath towels wrapped round his waist, and he used to laugh and he used to say 'That's done them one. I might have had my bath, but I got a new towel as well.'

ERIN: He obviously hates society, doesn't he?

EUNICE: I think he hates everything going. And when the police raided the house, they found over, I don't know whether it's forty or forty-odd towels, different towels, what he collected every Saturday morning.

ERIN: If something about the Ripper came on the telly, what would happen to him?

EUNICE: He would get very excited and very agitated, and, I know, once when I was with him and there was some write-up, some bloke decided to do a write-up about the Ripper and he never bought newspapers, but he'd heard about this because he used to get papers from work, off the blokes he worked with. But he heard about they're going to do a three-day series on the Ripper, and when, er – the only time I've known him to go out and spend his own money to get a paper, and he'd have it open like that, and he'd be reading and reading, and whenever that happened, I was bloody shaking. I was getting sick, because I knew, knew that when he'd read anything like that it excited him. It would excite him to such an extent, he couldn't wait to get going. He couldn't wait to get hold of me and just sling me around.

ERIN: What about violent films?

EUNICE: Umm, I don't know. Anything to do with Germans.

ERIN: War films?

EUNICE: Yes, and things like that, you know, tortures. I couldn't watch them. In fact even now, even now today, I hate anything to do with violence, you know. I don't like it. But, umm, he used to . . . I forget what I was talking about, now.

ERIN: You were telling me about we got as far as, he got back from the corporation bath Saturday morning and got a towel round him.

EUNICE: That's right, yes. And then, say, about 4.30. This is winter-time, because summertime we go out for the day. That's one thing I used to think, that thank God it was a sunny day. Because if it's a sunny day, we'd go right over the market. We'd go off round the East End. This is how I know the East End so well. I know every Pub and every place and every walk, and sometimes he used to walk me around for hours. You know, I'd be in terrific pain from Friday night, my back, my legs and everything. And he'd walk and walk and walk, and we'd go in the pubs and that. But say it's like a winter day, and I hadn't been out for the day. By 5 o'clock I knew I'd got to be ready – no matter what. My face would have to be okay, or whatever I could do with it. I always used to dress everything covered up, and he used to look and say, 'nobody would know, would they? ' And so I used to have to mentally make myself. .

ERIN: I want you to talk to an Irish lady who was in yesterday evening, because she told me about a man, nothing like as bad as yours, but she's just been in hospital because he put beer bottles up inside her. He ripped her vagina, her bladder and everything else. But he did this sort of thing to you didn't he?

EUNICE: Yes, I had bottles inside me. But the thing that he used to mostly, was the whip handle. And that was a solid handle; it was that length.

ERIN: Didn't it tear you up?

EUNICE: Yes, that's right. He caused me terrific pain. He used to make me bleed.

ERIN: This is the thing, yes? (Pointing to the whip in the drawing.)

EUNICE: And he used to put it in, and then he used to wrap it, put it round and round and round, like that inside, to cause as much pain. And another thing, he used to get me in a position with my wrist and tie me down, so that I was in a squat position down, so that he could ram it up more, and he'd order me to come. He'd say 'You've got to come. I'm giving you two minutes to come. You're going to have an orgasm. You've got to.' And he would literally, you know, satisfy himself that you were doing it.

ERIN: What, he'd have to wank off?

EUNICE: No, he'd be telling me, he'd be ordering me, I'd got to come.

ERIN: So you'd come and then you were safe.

EUNICE: Well, I don't know whether I come, or whether I didn't, as long as he thought in himself that I was coming, and he'd sometimes, you can imagine how he then understand a woman, he'd demand about fourteen or fifteen times, I think. You got to come, you got to come, and all the time there he was nearly taking me apart with the bloody thing.

ERIN: But in fact, there's a very, very close line between pain and pleasure, and the trouble is he could actually make you come that way, isn't it?

EUNICE: I can't think about whether I came or not. All I know is that he'd be doing me inside, and between everything else you know it's . . .

ERIN: That's you drowning, isn't it? Help!' Is it? (Pointing to the drawing of water.)

EUNICE: It could be. There are times when I feel like it.

ERIN: Look at that. It's your coffin with your name on it, and the only freedom you feel is when you die.

EUNICE: Yes, I suppose I felt that way, yes.

ERIN: What worries me, is that he is going to draw you back to him, and draw you back, and draw you back.

EUNICE: No way, no way, will I ever go near him. I might want to kill him. I might want to. . .

ERIN: Yes. You're also obsessed by him. That is the trouble.

EUNICE: I don't think I've ever been free from the time when he came into my life, because the things that he put into me, the things that he, that he brainwashed and talked to me, and the – I can't, I couldn't even put into words.

ERIN: I want to ask you a question that's worrying me. We'll talk about pain another time. What I am worried about is this. He's lost you, he's trained you, you are specially trained by him now. So you could satisfy him, right? You've gone. He's back by Euston Station. Who's he going to find next? (Eunice and Gerald met outside Euston Station)

EUNICE: I don't know. This is the reason I put my life on the line. I knew, I knew, that when a man's like this, he won't change. He can't alter. There was times when he used to get very agitated as well, because – when he used to want me to wear a blonde wig. He got this wig, he got this wig; I don't know where the hell he got it from. But, as I say, he used to have several wigs, when he done certain things, and first of all I had to put this blonde wig on. Then he used to go really, really mad.

ERIN: What colour was his Mum's hair, do you know?

EUNICE: I don't know.

ERIN: Never saw a picture of her?

EUNICE: No.

ERIN: You knew little about his private life, did you?

EUNICE: He would never talk to me about it.

ERIN: Give me an example. I mean, as a kid, everybody gets smacked, right? Or in trouble. I mean, you came, as you say, from a home where you're all right, but you must have been smacked occasionally . . .

EUNICE: Yes, I suppose so, but our Mum, if she said something, we knew if we were playing her up, how far we'd go, and then, you know – and knew that she meant it if she said it.

ERIN: So, until you met your first husband and he went bad – he was all right in the beginning. Just describe the worst smack you ever had in your happy life.

EUNICE: I can't remember.

ERIN: Mine was when I was caught stealing as a kid. My mum got the ironing cord and let me have it. I mean, I remember that, that I'd been caught stealing. You must be able to think of one like that. You can't be perfect.

EUNICE: No, I don't think it's a matter of perfect. I think, you see, Mum had got so many of us, and I suppose when we were playing her up she got tired and everything else. We were all in the bedroom, you know, because then you had about three or four kids in a bedroom in them days. And she used to shout upstairs, you know, and of course if we were still banging pillows around, swinging on to one thing or another, all of a sudden we'd hear her running upstairs, you know, and then we would dive under the covers – but I can't really remember anybody really hurting me at all.

ERIN: So she was powerful enough to control you with her voice.

EUNICE: Yes, just with her talking, her authority.

ERIN: How many of you were there?

EUNICE: Pardon?

ERIN: How many of you were there?

EUNICE: There were seven of us, besides my Mum and Dad.

ERIN: And all those seven are happy except you?

EUNICE: Yes. Yes.

ERIN: Poor you. You've had a hell of a time.

EUNICE: These numbers round here (Pointing to the numbers on the drawing) are the amount of, um, he'd actually talk it over with me, and discuss about how many strokes I was going to get, and one of the things that used to bring a lot of dreading. About say my husband said, 'You're going to get twenty-five, right' of the whip, and he'd say, 'two of them, two out of them strokes are going to be really hard, the rest are going to be medium', and you'd never know. I'd never know. I'd never know when that really hard two were going to come. And when they come, they'd come down with all the bloody force he could put in them.

ERIN: I would imagine that he would actually save the two for when he was trying to force you to come.

EUNICE: No, no. He'd just do the whipping – was a completely separate thing.

ERIN: Completely? Nothing to do with coming?

EUNICE: Oh, no, no. He'd just do that. He'd do that because he wanted to. He'd tie me down on the bed and then…

ERIN: It wouldn't actually make him come. What were the things that made him come? The blood?

EUNICE: I never had to be involved in whatever he were coming, because it wasn't like that. The things he was doing or whatever the hell he was doing to me was the things that made him come. He'd come and come all in me hair, or up me face, you know.

ERIN: But he wouldn't let you touch him?

EUNICE: No I can't ever remember, no. Not sort of rub him up.

ERIN: No, or suck him off?

EUNICE: No. He'd do it himself, or put it in me. Or he'd get my . . . when he went on to the blood thing like, he'd get my blood and he'd put it all over his own private parts.

ERIN: Incredible, isn't it?

EUNICE: Yes. It was damn terrifying, especially when I realised he'd gone blood crazy.

ERIN: And this all came out in court?

EUNICE: I don't know what came out in court, Erin. I wasn't there.

ERIN: Well we do know that several judges thought he was so dangerous, he had to be kept on remand for eight months.

EUNICE: That's right. Two judges remanded him.

ERIN: And one judge decided to let him go.

Eunice was quite right to feel outraged with the law, because again she was confused about what the law can do in a situation like this. I had to explain to her that courts are not there to treat people. The good judge had to decide whether a crime had been committed. Having listened to the case brought by the police, and having considered that Eunice was free to leave Gerald's house at any moment, he decided that, as Gerald had been in remand already for eight months, he would wash his hands of the matter. This immediately put Eunice in an awful situation. While Gerald was locked up, she could control her addiction to a certain extent, but when he was out and available, the urge to go back was overpowering, and she was terrified of it. When she was emotionally and chemically calm, she could see all the dangers that lay in that relationship. She could admit that Gerald was merely an expression of her own needs. Remove Gerald and she would continue to roam in a desperate search for the same sort of relationship. She put herself in danger in such episodes, as well as endangering anyone she met because she was aware of her volcanic rage, which felt as if it could erupt and destroy the whole planet. Indeed, when she was upset, her power could be felt throughout the room. Yet there was such a gentle, lovable person trapped in that nightmare. Other people who had dealings with her all commented on how much they liked her. She had many talents, and as we worked together, she was able to draw her feelings. Often when they were too painful, she would draw a set piece, like a picture of some houses; then on the back of the paper would be drawn the broken-hearted child – the real drawing.

I knew she was working her way back to Gerald. I also knew it was important we let her go with our love. If we had insisted she stay away from him, we would have created a barrier between her and ourselves. She had unfinished business with Gerald, and we recognised that.

Eunice had never really intended to leave Gerald. She had begun to tell her next-door neighbour of the happenings in the house, and to show her the marks. Now, in my experience, it is an essential part of a relationship of this kind that the participants feel compelled to share what is happening to them with a third party. I believe Peter Sutcliffe would have told someone else about his exploits, because between intense bursts of activity, the addicted parties can only keep themselves 'high' by recounting the events to someone else. Eunice had no one to talk to during the day, because Gerald was at work, so the next-door neighbour became her confidante. After several months of listening, the neighbour became so upset that she got in touch with a local refuge which, on being told of a woman kept in such a state of fear that she was unable to leave a man who might well kill her, quite understandably swept in to Eunice's rescue. Eunice could recount the moment when her able-side knew she must go with these good women who were flinging her possessions into a suitcase, but her disabled-side was furiously trying to put the clothes back into the cupboard. Finally, the women bundled her into the car and took her away.

As soon as she told her story to a sympathetic woman, she was taken to see a psychiatrist. He heard her out and said that in his opinion a man like Gerald should be in Broadmoor for life, so he called in the police. Eunice was asked to give evidence for a police prosecution against Gerald.

Her evidence filled fifty pages. Gerald was arrested and the bloodstained implements were found in the house, just as Eunice had described. Gerald spent eight months in jail, and the psychiatrist there said he was not insane.

During the time Gerald was locked away, Eunice was seen by various members of the medical profession, all of whom tended to feel there was little they could do for her. When the matter came to court, the police were feeling more than a little embarrassed. What they had mounted as a huge prosecution against Gerald had turned into a nightmare, for it was obvious from the evidence before them that this was not a case of an innocent victim of aggression. This was a case of two people in the grip of a hopelessly complicated addiction to each other, and the matter had no business in a court of law. It should have been properly referred to experts working in the field of human behaviour.

Thus Gerald suffered eight months in jail, where he had no chance of anyone helping him. He was finally allowed to go free, carrying the stigma of being labelled a bloodthirsty monster, when he really was a frightened man in the hold of something he really did not understand. People prefer to think of child-molesters and sexually disturbed people as monsters; that way they can suspend human feeling and compassion, and righteously hate them. I have never truly met a monster, only vulnerable, confused, grief-stricken people expressing their pain in rage and despair.

Eunice came to us, as she had to so many other agencies beforehand, for help. 'Keep him away from me,' is what she said, but what she meant was 'Keep me away from him.' We did so for a while, and I began work with her that was to spread over seven months. It was hard work because Eunice was a highly intelligent woman, and had built a solid wall around herself. Gradually she learned that we could be trusted, and she began to paint and to draw her feelings. I bought her an excellent set of paints and lots of pads. Every week I worked through the material with her. She began to put the story of her childhood into some sort of realistic perspective, rather than maintaining her original statement that it had all been perfect.

Every time I sit with someone who says 'It was all perfect', I groan inwardly. It is a sure sign of an emotionally disabled adult defending the hurt child in himself. There is no such thing as a perfect childhood. Emotionally able people are secure enough to acknowledge the bits that were not too good, but they agree that, on balance, their upbringing had more pluses than minuses. People like Eunice either totally deny their past, thereby sitting on huge piles of conflicting emotion; or they go the other way, and a sympathetic glance is enough to set them off with a veritable diarrhoea of stories which shock and horrify the listener. These latter are often the people who love the story, and have no intention of creating a happy ending for themselves. They very much see themselves as Hamlet or Ophelia, and the rest of the world as a huge stage. Most helpers of mankind are not trained to realise that in such cases they become merely part of the cast of characters. Agency workers often think they represent the directors in the plays of their clients' lives; actually, they are walk-ons, used as props by the main characters.

This is what happened to Eunice. An awful lot of good people got fed up with helping her, because they were working on the generally-accepted view that 'If a man treats you like that, surely you must want to get away, and stay away.' We at least were able to say, 'We know why you need to go back to him, but we have got to find out why you need him at all.' Eunice's second drawing was a complete history of her family life. Her father is drawn in the parlour, which he kept locked until Sunday afternoons. She remembers the room as a treasure-house stuffed full of all the pretty things that he loved, and his gramophone. He had a beautiful voice and he used to sing for her. The poverty of the rest of the house was reflected in the drawing. [p.129, omitted on web]

Gradually Eunice was able to describe her bitter, angry mother, who saw her husband as weak and ineffectual. They had many children, far too many to cope with on so little money. There was also a grandmother dying of stomach cancer in an upstairs bedroom. In those days she would have died in agony. Somewhere there was a lodger, an unremembered man. What was coming clear at this point was that someone, when Eunice was under the age of three, must have molested her sexually. Certainly she was battered by her mother. She could never gain her mother's love, even though all her life she strived for it. I suspect Eunice was a gifted child, and those children are always difficult to rear, because although intellectually way beyond their years, emotionally they take far longer to mature than normal children, and the risk of damaging them is much greater.

Her first happy memory was her first day at school. It was probably her first experience of sanity, and her first recognition that there was a good world outside the nightmare at home. She remembered sitting in the dark on the top stairs of her house, crying for hours. Her drawings began to give hints. Stairs appeared, a little figure, a door with a cord tying the door-handle to the banisters. 'What was that?' I asked. 'That's the room my grandmother was in,' she remembered. How much screaming and moaning must have gone on behind that door. Her memories of her father included times when he would take her to the pub in the evening, and she would sit in the audience and listen to him sing. How much did her mother's anger against her reflect her relationship with her father? Her mother was never able to acknowledge his singing. He made all the clothes for the family himself. He told Eunice about his mother, an ardent Salvation Army follower; one day Eunice opened the door of a cupboard in her parents' bedroom and found a picture of her grand-mother's face inside. There were constant visits to the hospital with a sick sister who demanded all the mother's time. The memories were mostly grim.

When we got close to the central question of who it was who sexually abused her and beat her as a child, she would close up, and I would see the anxiety surrounding that question cause her face and neck to flush. You could see the emotional reaction trigger off a chemical charge, and she would become restless and shift about in her chair.

I know that at some point in her life she must be allowed to come to terms with that deeply felt pain and hurt. Sitting before me was yet another betrayed child, crippled by events before the age of five. However, I also knew that the Refuge did not have the facilities to offer a safe place for her to let go of all those years of damage. It would be dangerous for us and disastrous for her to open her up without being in a position to put her back together again. At this point I realised that she had a problem with hypertension, and I was able to refer her to a very gifted specialist, who took her into hospital and put her on sleep therapy. Not only did it cure her hypertension, but it also gave us a chance to be with her when she was relaxed and unflustered by the trivia of everyday life.

Tina and I visited her every day, and let her talk about her first marriage, which was a disaster; about her beloved only son, who died in a motor accident; about her childhood, about her mother who never loved her, about the crying, the fear, the empty blackness. Before she went into hospital she drew her rage for me; it was frightening. I hoped that the time in hospital would give us time to get closer to the truth, but the hospital was not the right place. She had already been in most of the mental hospitals, and she had seen psychiatrists. By now most women in Eunice's position would be dead, either from the hours of beating, or from the pills she took to keep her calm. But Eunice had the most amazing stamina.

She also recognised the moments in the torture sessions with Gerald when she was near to death, and would draw back from it. 'All of a sudden there was a sound that came from in me, and yet where the hell it came from . . . I suppose you'd call it basic primitive,' she said.

ERIN: Yes.

EUNICE: The thing that, you know, I felt so much: I was like a bloody animal, that was, you know. . .

ERIN: Roaring?

EUNICE: Yes. And I made this noise, terrific noise, and at any time I did say at this particular time if I'd have been able to, I would have done something . . . but it only lasted five minutes.

ERIN: Done what?

EUNICE: I just wanted to finish with it.

ERIN: Why is that? . . . Do you ever hear that noise again? Have you ever heard it again?

EUNICE: No, it's the only one time when it . . . and the funny thing was. . .

ERIN: Did you feel you were very near death then? Or were you very much alive?

Gerald stopped the mutilation when he heard her roar. He turned his head and walked away. In that moment he could have taken her life. But he gave it back to her. In these relationships the balance goes back and forth – death is on the side-lines waiting.

While Eunice was in hospital, Tina and I agreed that we would visit Gerald, so wrote and asked if we could see him. He wrote back and said he would be pleased to see us, and said he hoped Eunice was well. On the appointed day we drove to his house: a beautifully kept terraced house in a middle-class suburban area. We knocked on the door and were ushered into the narrow hall, and Gerald showed us into his warm, comfortable kitchen. Before me stood a powerfully built man, immaculately dressed, and very nervous. He made us a cup of coffee each and we got on with the talking. He seemed completely isolated in his house, and expressed a very real affection for Eunice. The most amazing thing about talking to both Eunice and Gerald was that the bits of their personalities which did function normally really enjoyed each other's company immensely. She would describe the times they would laugh and joke. He would make a cup of tea for her, or she would cook a special dinner for him. I felt that here were two really nice people with plenty of good potential.

He was a good worker and respected among his colleagues. Looking round the room, I could see he was able to create a very warm and organised environment round him. He was a great reader and knowledgeable to talk to. Both Tina and I liked him very much. He was very concerned about Eunice, and we both pointed out the dangers of her returning to him. He might either kill her by accident, or her heart might give out. He agreed, but complained that after a hard day's work she used to demand that he beat her for hours, and that used to exhaust him, because he had to put in a hard day's work the next day. He made it sound such a normal complaint that Tina and I had to look at each other to restore our own sense of reality.

He, like Eunice, both wanted and did not want this relationship. He described how Eunice would fall on the floor in a totally passive state during these sessions, and she would seem to be in a world of her own. Actually, they were both in a world of their own. Gerald himself, Eunice eventually told me, had come from a very violent family, in which he was savagely battered. Apart from the violence in the family, his task as a child during the war years was to loot the bombed-out houses in his area. He would tell Eunice about the broken and maimed bodies strewn around the rooms he visited, the raw lumps of flesh that were once human beings. He had been given very little chance to find love or happiness in his early years.

We finished our coffee and left. We both felt that we had a clear picture of why Gerald needed his relationship with Eunice, but no clear picture of what more could be done. Certainly, Gerald was not unusual in our case histories of women coming to the Refuge telling us about this kind of abusive sexual practice. What was different was that her description of their practices together could not be dismissed as merely 'fantasy'. There was solid police evidence to prove it. I telephoned various people for advice, but the net result of hours of talking was that no one really wanted to take her on. 'These are difficult cases,' they would say. We were faced with the prospect of Eunice coming out of hospital and going back to him, which she did.

Eunice phoned me to describe how she had met him and spent the day with him. 'How did you feel when you saw him?' I asked. 'Before I went in, I felt like I'd got twenty butterflies in my stomach.' 'You must have been very frightened,' I said. 'I was coming out in such a heat I felt I'd got a temperature.' There it was again – that accurate description of an addiction. You hear it said by an alcoholic as he reaches for his bottle. You hear it said by a heroin addict reaching for his needle. The buzz, the click, and then the intense warmth.

So they were together again. After a few weeks Eunice came back to see me. It was all happening again. 'I want to leave him,' she said. 'I really do want to leave him.' 'All right,' I said. 'This time I'll arrange for you to leave England, and you won't know where you're going till you come to say goodbye to me.' I made the arrangements, and when she came along she brought with her a roll of drawings. 'Don't open them until I've gone,' she said. 'I won't,' I promised, and kissed her goodbye, before sending her off to a refuge abroad. 'If you filter back to him from there, you will have to acknowledge your need for his violence, won't you?' I said. She smiled and left. I unrolled the drawings, and saw we were one step closer to the pain. She could now at least draw what happened in her childhood. But it would take time for her to draw who did it. As I write, she has returned to this country, and is in touch with me. She is in yet another hospital and I only hope they can help her. Gerald will be waiting for her, unless he meets another woman like her, and unless he kills or gets killed. Only then will the matter rest.

One day, I will have a place that will specialise in caring for the Geralds and Eunices of this world – hopefully, finding them before they are adults.

Death on the 'baby farm': part two

Robert St. Estephe · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

For part one of this article, read "Death on the 'baby farm': part one".

Ritual child sacrifice & the Ukrainian "Angelmakers"

Throughout Europe in the 19th and 20th centuries the term "angel-making" was a commonly used euphemism for infanticide. The term has, in at least in one case, a horrifyingly literal denotation. Here is an excerpt from a news report describing a Ukrainian cult, or "sect," said to be "infamous under the denomination of 'Angelmakers,'" located in Odessa. This ultra-creepy serial baby-killing case dates from 1885.

The sect members "profess their mission is to murder for the assured salvation of the souls of their innocent victims, and at the same time to earn for themselves eternal glory. It is difficult, however, to obtain any exact account of the origin and organisation of this sect, whose members, it would appear, were under some vow of secrecy. The prisoner tried yesterday was charged under the name of Rachel Ostrovoskafa, but is known to the police by several aliases. She is a married woman, 28 years of age; one of her known victims being her own and only child. Three cases of child murder, one by strangulation, were proved against the prisoner, who was too leniently condemned to 15 years' hard labour. The woman appeared unaffected, and when called upon by the judge, replied simply, and with the utmost composure, 'Do with me what you will; I am in your hands.'"

A global business model

Baby farming scandals peppered the English language newspapers for many, many decades. But reports of sensational baby farming murder cases were not restricted to the English-speaking world. They ranged across the globe: Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, France, Portugal, Italy, Russia, Hungary, Ukraine and Japan.

In Christiania, Norway [now called Oslo] in 1902 "the remains of a small army of tiny corpses were dug up" by police from the "private cemeteries in gardens and fields" on the properties of a consortium of twenty baby farmers.

The sheer scale of some baby farmer "death camp" operations from the early 1900s is astonishing. In 1913, Madame Kusnezowa of Archangel, Russia, was accused of murdering 1,012. In 1906, Mr. and Mrs. Holmen's baby farm in Stockholm, Sweden, the death count was over 1,000.

The Holmens, proprietors of the National Children's Sanitorium in Stockholm, were sophisticated con artists as well as merciless serial killers. The international news of the day revealed that "It appears that the alleged Sanitorium was simply a baby farm on an immense scale, and that wholesale murders of babies were committed. The authorities are trying to trace Gustav Holmen and the woman who passed as his wife. He posed as a minister and she as a trained nurse and specialist in children and their bringing up. They secured numerous contributions, and especially handsome amounts were subscribed to the building fund. It is calculated, that in the three years the institution had been running, over a thousand babies have been received. Yet only thirteen babies are alive and well. These are the healthiest, fattest and prettiest of those received, and they were used as decoy, or show babies. They were shown to mothers and to all visitors and their pictures were sent out on the literature used."

Across the globe, in Japan, baby farmers thrived – and many of their charges died. Japan's adoption practice, a "dowry" system, created a formally sanctioned incentive that attracted those ready to make an easy kill for easy money. An English-language newspaper explained that "according to the Japanese institution of adoption, parents who cannot afford to give their children the best opportunities may offer them to more affluent families who are childless or lacking in a male heir. It is frequently customary for the family to pay a dowry to the family adopting the child." (quote from the Tanaka case, below)

In 1902, in Osaka, a family whose name was not given in the English-language reports and described as "an elderly woman, her married daughter, husband and two other persons" was arrested and charged with the murder of 300 children within a single year of operations. In 1906, also in Osaka, a woman, un-named (whom I have labeled the "Osaka 'Devil Woman,'" based on the pejorative given her by her community), was "charged with having murdered over 100 babies. On the way to the Public Prosecutor's office from the police station, she was greeted, it was reported, by large crowds, with shouts of "'human devil,' 'kill the devilish woman,' and similar execrations."

In 1924, in a suburb of Tokyo, the closet of Mr. and Mrs. Tanaka, dowry-takers, were found to contain bones of child victims following their arrest on a complaint that the couple were thought to be in the process of deliberately starving two babies to death at their home.

In 1948, a sensational Japanese serial baby-killing case erupted into the international news involving the Kotobuki Maternity Hospital in Shinjuku, operated by Mrs. Miyuki Ishikawa and her husband Takeshi Ishikawa. Dramatic photos were published showing victim children packed like sardines into a baby farm bunk. Another picture shows a troop of nurses removing the surviving children from a death house. The five surviving babies removed from the Ishikawas were all found by doctors to be in "critical condition, suffering from malnutrition, pneumonia, bronchitis and skin diseases." Wikipedia notes that "it is estimated that her victims numbered between 85 to 169, however the general estimate is 103. When she was finally apprehended, the Tokyo High Court's four-year sentence Mrs. Ishikawa received was remarkably light considering her actions resulted in a death toll so high that it remains unrivaled by any other serial killer in Japan."

Starvation – which would frequently lead to disease – was a common method of murder used by killer baby farmers all across the world, yet my research on these serial killers reveals that the diversity of heartless murder methods employed by baby farmers is dizzying in its variety.

Feige Noskina, of Vilnius, Lithuania (" Vilna, Russia" in the papers), was apprehended in 1885, seems to have found a certain pleasure in inventing new ways to snuff out tiny lives. For her, variety was the spice of death.

"Many of [her victims] were allowed to die of cold and hunger and neglect, and others were poisoned with a decoction of poppy seed; but a large number were violently put to death, being suffocated by means of pillows, or packages of wadding or linen, while others again were strangled by the accused, or drowned in cesspools."

Massacre of the Innocents, Memphis style

Here is a case that ought to be regarded as one of the most notorious serial killer cases in world history, yet it has never appeared on even a single list of serial killers (apart from my online publication).

Georgia Tann of Memphis, Tennessee, is credited with having created modern adoption practice – as it is still conducted – in the United States. We can thank Tann, the once-famed philanthropist, for having established the practice of falsifying birth records that is still standard practice in the adoption industry today. In her day, the 1930s-1940s, this Tennessee baby farmer was a nationally recognized expert on child-rearing. First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt corresponded with her seeking her authoritative opinion when crafting child welfare policy. She was invited to lecture in Washington, New York and other cities on how to care after children. Portly pleasant-looking Miss Georgia Tann was a successful entrepreneur who raked in substantial profits and enjoyed the perks of social recognition during her nefarious operation's heyday.

Miss Georgia Tann was also a fraudster, a sadistic child sexual molester, a serial child kidnapper and the murderer of many hundred – perhaps over a thousand – children.

In her criminal racket Tann was assisted by a respected writer on children's welfare, a female Memphis judge who took bribes from Tann, Judge Camille Kelly. Kelly, like Tann, had a high public profile as a philanthropic benefactor of children. Kelly authored books such as A Friend in Court (1942) and Delinquent Angels (1947) published by major New York houses.

[image]

Wikipedia's brief article on Kelly describes her involvement in Tann's human trafficking scheme:

"Hallmark Productions was producing a movie based on her book, Delinquent Angels, but suspended production after her resignation from the bench in November 1950, in a storm of controversy and charges after the results of a special investigation ordered by governor Gordon Browning was released. The investigation surrounded illegal adoptions-for-profit by Georgia Tann and the Tennessee Children's Home Society. It charged that approximately 20% of the illegal adoptions at the home were funnelled through Kelly's court, where she would remove parental rights and provide Tann with documents to place the children as she deemed appropriate."

According to one surviving victim (interviewed by Tann's biographer), Georgia and her same-sex companion would hit the children "on the scalp so no one could see the bruises." Favored forms of child torture at the Home included "tying a rope around a child's wrists and hang[ing] it up on a coat rack and dangling a child from a rope down the laundry chute."

The story of Mommie Dearest (bestselling book and cult film starring Faye Dunaway), the tortured saga of control-freak movie star Joan Crawford's adopted daughter, was the story of one of the many children Georgia Tann had sold for big money to Hollywood purchasers.

During Tann's tenure (during the 1930s and 1940s) as head of the Tennessee Children's Home Society in Memphis, the city was noted as producing the highest infant mortality rate in the nation. This fact, observed by a government researcher in Washington, D.C., led eventually to the exposure of Tann's crimes, but she died before she could be prosecuted. Georgia Tann's practice was to rid herself of those babies put in her charge – or kidnapped by her with official sanction with the collaboration of a corrupt judge – she deemed unsaleable by leaving them unattended out in the sun until they broiled to death. She and her lover (her adopted daughter) and male sexual deviants she employed would beat and torture children for the perverse sexual thrill of it.

"But she also literally stole many young children from their birth families – taking them away in her big car, or through social workers – and sold them. Tann disposed of more than 5,000 babies and children in this way" notes Charity Vogel in her review of the well-researched and superbly written 2007 book on Georgia Tann titled The Baby Thief : The Untold Story of Georgia Tann, the Baby Seller Who Corrupted Adoption, by Barbara Raymond.

Georgia Tann passed away in 1950 just at the moment her brutal crimes were being exposed to the public by a Congressional investigation. She had been a wholesale murderess who had mesmerized people into looking to her as some kind of social work saint.

Most serial killing child care providers, however, were obscure criminals who operated on a small scale.

By 1948, the term "baby farm" was for the most part obsolete. "Boarding house for babies" was a newer way of expressing the same thing (in the US). Of the two-bit con woman Edna Roseberry of Atlanta, Georgia, the operator of such a "boarding house", the newspapers tell us, a "motherly-looking operator of a boarding house for babies was portrayed in criminal court today as a cruel woman who played the radio loud to drown out the screams of infants when she beat them. She was arrested for torturing children, but there were no homicide accusations. At her trial one witness testified that the 52-year-old care provider 'beat a nine-year-old senseless and left another with the outline of her open hand plainly outlined on its body.'"

Before passing sentence after having been found guilty of beating one-year-old Charlene Stallings until she had blood running from her mouth, the trial judge asked "Mrs. Roseberry, have you any previous record?" The child care provider frankly replied, "Yes, sir, for hijacking, bootleg liquor in Kansas back in 1934," she replied, adding that she was given from 10 to 21 years on a charge of armed robbery and served six years of this term.

Edna Roseberry had the classic profile of a criminal. Had present-day information technology been available in her day she might have been prevented from getting her hands on her victims. Yet Georgia Tann was a sophisticated white collar criminal, with brains and connections within the court system, protected by the political machine of Memphis. She was a famous philanthropist who had in her pocket a respected female judge who herself was an expert on the welfare of children. Two radically different socioeconomic profiles: the one was an obvious, sleazy, two-bit "blue collar" sociopath, the other was a successful, sophisticated pillar of society, a "respectable" sociopath who could get away with the most hideous sorts of crimes on an epic scale.

Baby-Sitter Serial Killers

There is, I would argue, evidence in the data on female serial killer cases that point to a type of mania for murdering helpless children. It is known that many run-of-the-mill female serial killers (hundreds of them) have murdered their own children during their killing careers – along with other family members, parents, siblings, husbands. The list of women who are known to have serially murdered their own newborns is as long as it is depressing.

There is another category of female serial killer who murdered children – other people's children – that must be looked at if we are to seriously ponder what type of person might become a serial killing baby farmer. This category is the baby-sitter serial killer.

Unlike male serial killers of children, females (with some rare exceptions, such as Guadalupe Martinez de Bejarano) do not kill to cover up sexual molestation as do so many male serial killers of children. Their perversion is different. They do not do it for the money, or to save expenses (from food, bathing and linen costs), as do the baby farmers, that is certain. Yet the baby-sitter serial killers clearly do have a mania for killing. Why should we assume that murderous baby farmers are so very different, merely because of the financial aspect of their criminal activity? More likely, many of them were attracted to their occupation by the thrill of killing helpless victims just like the serial killer nurses and baby-sitters of recent decades whose cases are much better known to the public..

Here are nine examples of baby-sitter serial killers dating (and one baby farmer for comparison) from 1906-1989:

1906 – Ida Schnell – Munich, Germany – teenage child-care provider who had a special technique for murdering babies, "plunging a hairpin into the lower part of the back of their heads till they ceased to cry."

(I must add that in Schnell's method there is a similarity to Australian baby farmer Sarah Jane Makin's manner of executing infants. In 1892, at two different locations near Sydney, "the bodies of thirteen infants were found and to-day, two more bodies were found in the yard of a house at Chippendale. The mothers of some of the murdered babies have been traced. The theory of the doctors is that the babies were killed by having their hearts or spines pierced with needles." Sarah Jane and her husband, John, were sentenced to death. John was hanged; Sarah Jane had her sentence commuted to life. She served 18 years and was paroled in 1911.)

1906 – Lillian B. Thorman – York, Pennsylvania – A 15-year-old servant girl murdered a child whom she "roasted from head to toe" by placing the youngster on the stove. After her arrest it was learned she had previously murdered three other children in the same manner, getting away with the crimes by having concocting stories of unfortunate accidents.

1908 – Jeanne Weber – Paris, France – She was obsessed with strangling children of various ages, and murdered at least ten. Among her victims were three children of her own; the rest were mostly the children of relatives. She was caught in the act several times, but got away with murder with the help of the brilliant and famous men of science and law who defended her in court on two separate occasions. Having been found innocent once, she was free to kill again. She was caught again, found innocent again and continued her strangling career, until finally she was caught in such a flagrant act of violent child-strangling that even the "experts" could not be able to employ their sophisticated and erroneous theories to save her. After being declared insane and sent to prison, Jeanne strangled herself to death.

[image]

1956 – Virginia Jaspers – New Haven, Connecticut – A retired head pediatric nurse killed three babies by shaking them to death because "children sometimes get on her nerves." Other of her victims lived through their ordeals. Among these Nurse Jaspers had broken the leg of one and caused a serious head injury to yet another. After her arrest Mrs. Jaspers said: "How will I ever face people again?" This highly trained professional child care provider explained her actions thus: "It was all uncontrollable. I didn't know why I did it. Children sometimes get on my nerves."

1980 – Helen Patricia Moore – Claymore, NSW, Australia – She smothered 3 children and 3 additional children survived her abuse, one of them being rendered blind and unable to walk.

1982 – Christine Laverne Falling – Calhoun & Taylor Counties, Florida – She murdered at least 5 children. According to her testimony, she had heard voices that ordered her to kill the babies by placing a blanket over their faces.

1984 – Lise Jane Turner – Christchurch, New Zealand – She murdered two of her own babies plus one other baby, and attempted to kill four other babies she had been looking after.

1986 – Sandra K. Pankow – Appleton, Wisconsin – Accused of murdering three babies she "sat" for, she was convicted of murdering two.

1989 – Amy Lynn Scott – Phoenix, Arizona – She murdered three babies in 1989. The parents of the victims were all met by the baby-sitter murderess at the same church. She was not convicted until 2007.

"I didn't know why I did it." (Virginia Jaspers, retired head nurse, 1956)

Regarding the moral hazard inherent in the baby farming business model Dr. Johnston, in her Psychology Today article on baby farmer serial killers, properly observes that "the financial arrangement itself was partially the problem. On the one hand, women who paid for their child's care by the month gave the child care provider a reason to keep the child alive but by the cheapest means possible. … As such, hundreds of these babies died from neglect, either directly from malnutrition or from a secondary disease as a result of a weakened immune system."

Yet "the bottom line" should, I would argue, not be concluded to be merely a matter of economics, of weakness in the face of temptation, or of greed, or of fear of poverty. Such agency-discounting arguments as that fail to address the question of why so many other persons, many quite poor, chose not to become murderous baby farmers.

It is Dr. Johnston's conclusion that "we'll never know whether or not [the baby farmers discussed in her article] would have taken some other malevolent path if the one they chose had not been available to them, a path that started with deception and ended in murder." Strictly speaking, this is perfectly true, for we lack the definitive documentary evidence that might offer deep insight into the personalities of these individuals. But that does not mean one must avoid making an earnest probe to try to comprehend the character and psyche of such a serial baby killer. We should, I suggest, try our best to know as much as we can.

This "we'll never know" conclusion is not much different from nipping the inquiry in the bud and asserting that "some things are better left unsaid."

When one constructs a hypothetical question that cannot have an answer and that is in its essence an irrelevant one – whether the criminal might have not committed the crime if the victim and the booty had not been within reach – the construct is no more than a straw man argument. We are reminded of the exclamation of Virginia Jaspers, professional head nurse and obsessive child killer, made by her to investigators in 1956: "I didn't know why I did it." Yet investigators working in 2013 to uncover the psychology of serial killers cannot get away with failing to seriously make an effort to find out why they did it.

[image]

The fact remains that insight into the murderous personality type of the baby farmer serial killer is available in abundance should one to choose to conscientiously look at it. Rather than give up trying to comprehend the mindset of a woman who would incinerate babies alive in a deliberately set house fire, or throw murdered babies to the hogs (Skoublinska, of Warsaw) or batter a child so that its skull is cracked in half (Geisen-Volk), we ought to make our very best effort to attempt to comprehend and expose that mindset.

Dr. Johnston's Psychology Today article on baby farms, however, glaringly avoids discussing the gory details of the murder methods of the women she writes about. Instead her article employs the unspecific and innocuous catch-all term “neglect,” a rather benign-sounding method, leaving her reader with the false impression that the little victims of violent death at the hands of the serial killing baby farmers the article cites – Dyer, the Warsaw baby farmer and Mrs. Geisen-Volk – just faded away painlessly into the ether like cloudy cherubs.

Allowing the cause of death to be seen as simply “neglect” (unspecific, without details given) allows the discussion to completely sidestep the disturbing fact that huge numbers of infants have, by these frequently pathologically sadistic serial killers, been strangled, stabbed, smothered, burned alive, frozen to death, drowned, killed by having their necks twisted, crushed to death with furniture, poisoned, drugged to death and battered to death. No: “neglect” is not an adequate term to describe these acts; nor is “weakened immune system” adequate to identify the “mass of putrid sores” on the two-year-old victim of Madame Julien (1867, France) or the “pneumonia, bronchitis and skin diseases” of the five children rescued from the care of Mrs. Ishikawa (1948, Japan).

[image]

It is imperative that we consider the possibility that some women (as well as some men too, but in fewer numbers) get a sick addictive kick from cruelly snuffing out the life of a defenseless child.

Beyond the “bottom line”

The issue of baby farmers who kill, how they kill, and why they choose to kill, is germane today: crucially germane to all of us, I would assert.

In addition to the recent proffering of a mother’s right to kill in the form of “after birth abortion,” being promoted by specialists in the burgeoning field of “bioethics,” we have other eminent experts attempting to turn back the clock to the druggy days of laudanum for babes.

Dr. Sandra Scarr – former President of the Society for Research in Child Development, the Association for Psychological Science, the Council of Graduate Departments of Psychology, and the Behavior Genetics Association, and CEO of Kindercare corporation, the biggest day care franchise – claims that a baby’s strong maternal attachment – resulting from having put into the care of “professional” strangers – ought to be seen as a mental disorder that can be, in Dr. Scarr’s ominous philosophy, “treated.”

“Treated!”

Another major child expert has big, and highly lucrative, plans for transforming infanthood into a “scientific” industry. Dr. Joseph Biederman, “a world renowned Harvard child psychiatrist,” a hugely influential producer of studies that assist pharmaceutical corporations (who underwrite the studies) to market their products – claims that a small child as young as three can be “diagnosed” with bipolar disorder, which, as you might guess, can be “treated” by placing the infant on a lifelong, permanently mind-altering and expensive regimen of powerful psychotropic drugs. His experiments, or “studies,” were conducted with the babies of poor, presumably single, mothers who profited from making their children available to Dr. B.

The Psychology Today article on baby farmers which prompted me to write this piece cited, you will recall, four important serial murder cases by way of illustrating the general subject of repeated deaths of infants on baby farms. It was the author’s decision to forgo informing her readers the crucial and telling details of those four cited cases – namely such details as a building containing children having been set deliberately afire, the throwing of babies’ corpses to hogs, a child’s “skull cracked in half,” a girl having been grabbed up by its ankles and dashed with force against a wall, the drugging of babies with opiates, and the brutal strangling of babies with cotton edging tape followed by disposal of the lifeless victim in a canal – that compelled me to offer my somewhat different thoughts, speculations, and interpretations from those expressed by Dr. Johnston and prompted me to pose difficult questions she did not elect to take up.

The issue of serial homicide and abuse by hired child care providers in days gone by is not merely an academic one. The subject has significant import today as we face a fiercely metastasizing (albeit cautiously incremental and seemingly benign) combined state/corporation central planning agenda that aims, like all great human total-management schemes, to control the minds and bodies of children – and to control them absolutely. In this period we are now living in we have finally passed the threshold into the full scale Orwellian Zone where the health of an infant – whether about-to-be-born or "after birth," whether female or male – has become subsumed under the innocuous "human resource management" rubric of "women's health." Oh, but we can surely trust the experts, can't we?

Let us be reminded that government-regulated foster child programs in the United States are well-known for their monumental, excruciating failures. Children in these programs die in rates many times higher than is the case in the general population. Further, these children are also sexually abused at a much higher rate. The children are heavily drugged with cocktails of multiple powerful psychotropic drugs – to the great profit of those businesses that worked so hard, investing huge sums to purchase the best experts money can buy, in order to design public policy after their own image. It is all done under protocols created, and heavily subsidized, by a distant centralized federal government.

It is with good reason that the history of serial abuses by child care providers – and the battalions of miscreants such a business can be proven to have attracted – continues to get the white-wash treatment. This serial child care provider infanticide business is a bit of history which many interested parties would rather see sanitized and swept under the rug (along with so much other portions of history that are either politically inconvenient or ideologically outré).

Forgotten baby farming practices of days gone by, and the kinds of people this type of business repeatedly draws, are topics which more than deserve an incisive looking into. If we choose to turn our gaze away from the sordid "uncomfortable" facts we are engaging in a shameful act of self-censorship. Averting one's gaze – as a self-protection strategy – is a manifestation of magical thinking, a psychological state of denial. Moreover, such denial further promulgates a blinding normalcy bias that favors simplistic, easy, and reassuring explanations. It dumbs us down. It gets us used to uncritical acceptance, cowardice and moral numbness.

Let us not deploy the banal and hackneyed professorial formula of causes described as "social stressors" or other methods of social determinist interpretation for the purpose of erasing all serious consideration of free will and personal agency, in our examination of such subjects as serial killers who fatally abuse displaced children. Let us neither justify nor excuse future crimes by invoking facile and mechanical explanations for deeds committed by individualized criminals long gone. Let us not concoct, in our mythological narrative constructions, freshly absolved tribes of "justified sinners."

Not trying to know as much as we can possibly manage about the subject of deadly child care providers – whether they be malevolent or merely incompetent – as a pervasive criminal and psychological phenomenon (one which has been relentlessly and painfully exposed to light within this article), can indeed numb our minds to what is, in fact, a continuously pertinent issue of life and death.

If you, dear reader, have been patient and brave enough to read this essay along from beginning to end, you will have, if you are a normal person with a human heart, read it and wept.

Our tears are not shed in vain. Great changes are upon us in this our rapidly moving age. It is incumbent that we go forth daily with eyes wide open and for us to marshal our will – to master our minds and souls and ready ourselves to blaze new trails of escape from the cloudy maze of baffles and falsehoods – fake history, twisted ideologies, amoral imperatives – that has been constructed by our overseers expressly designed to imprison our individual minds – and, more importantly – the minds and bodies of our fresh and sparkling innocent little children.

We must reject sound-bite explanations which serve to lull us into indifference. We must go beyond tidy and ideology-tainted generalizations and look deeper, for "the Devil is in the details."

•?•?•?•

NOTE

Photo of rescued baby, Frankie Heath, from: ["New Baby-Farm Horror – Little Frankie Heath Is Found by His Mother Dying of Starvation Amid Most Revolting Conditions." The Sunday Journal (Minneapolis, Mn.), Nov. 11, 1906, p. 1]

•?•?•?•

BIBLIOGRAPHY

• Joni E. Johnston, Psy. D., "Life on the Baby Farm: Killing Kids for Cash," female-serial-killers.com, June 12, 2013

• Dr. Biederman • Bruce E. Levine, "Exposed: Harvard Shrink Gets Rich Labeling Kids Bipolar," AlterNet, Jun, 17, 2008

• Dr. Scarr • William Norman Grigg, "New Century Children," The New American, Vol. 19, No. 18, Sep. 3, 2008; Brian C. Robertson, Day Care Deception (book), Encounter Books, 2004

• "After-Birth Abortion: Why Should the Baby Live?" Journal of Medical Ethics, Feb. 23, 2012

••• Historical Cases:

• Exposure to elements method – a case not cited in the text body, but an excellent example of the type: Christiana Breitschweidt, Jersey City, New Jersey, 1892 – ["Leaving Infants To Die – Mrs. Breitschwert Arrested For Baby Farming In Jersey City." The New York Times (N.Y.), Jan. 15, 1892, p. 10]

• Philanthropy, professionalism & neglect – The Nivison case, not mentioned in my article, provides a bizarre example of apparent incompetence (or, perhaps insanity) on the part of a professionally trained and well-funded nurse who operated a publicly sanctioned baby farm – ["Terrible Revelation – Evidence of Infants Being Murdered by the Score." Daily Evening Bulletin (Mattville, Ky.), Jun. 6, 1884, p. 1] ["Miss Nivison's Denial – Indignant At The Charges Against Her Home. – She Says That the Babies Died From Measles and Pneumonia, and Were Buried With Religious Ceremonies Whose Offspring the Infants Were." The Evening Herald (Syracuse, N. Y.), Jun. 6, 1884, p. 8] [Untitled, The Upper Des Moines (Algona, Io.), Jul. 9, 1884, p. 2]

• Ashmead, Elizabeth – ["New-Jersey 'Baby Farm' Mystery Rivals Gunness Case," syndicated The Waterloo Times-Tribune (Io.), May 21, 1910, p. 8]
["Babies Were Buried Alive – Mothers' Bodies Were Cut Up," The Tacoma Times (Wa.), Apr. 11, 1904, p. 4]
["Given Five Years – Baby Farmer Was Sent to Federal Prison," The Lowell Sun (Ma.), Jul. 1, 1911, p. 7]
• "Christiana Baby Farmers" – ["Christiania The Wickedest Capital in All Europe," The Atlanta Constitution (Ga.), Jul. 6, 1902, p. 16]
• Delpech, Madame –[From "Parisian Gossip." The Southland Times (Invercargill, New Zealand) May 20, 1869, pp. 2-3] ["Wholesale Infanticide." Lloyd's Weekly Newsletter (London, England), Mar. 14, 1869, p. 1]
["Infanticide In France." The Saturday Review (London, England), Mar. 20, 1869, p. 385]
• Dyer, Amelia – ["Hundreds of Victims. – Amelia Dyer, Baby Farmer and Strangler." syndicated, The Logansport Pharos (In.), May 15, 1896, p. 6]
"Hundreds of Victims. – Amelia Dyer, Baby Farmer and Strangler." syndicated, The Logansport Pharos (In.), May 15, 1896, p. 6
["Britain's worst ever serial killer: The Victorian angel of death that murdered 400 babies," Written by 24 Tanzania Reporter, Tanzania.com, Feb. 23, 2013]
• Eckhart, Wilhelmena – ["Murderer of Infants Charge Against Woman – Grave Accusations Against Mother by Her Two Daughters, Who Caused Her Imprisonment in Tombs." The Washington Times (D.C.), Nov. 21, 1906, p. 8] ["Light Sentence For Baby Farmer," The Pensacola Journal (Fl.), Dec. 22, 1906, p. 1]
• Falling, Christine – [Max Haines, Deadly Babysitter," Lethbridge Herald (Alberta, Canada), Jan. 25, 2004, p. A9]
"Christine Falling," from Murderpedia.org

• Geisen-Volk, Helen – Jay Maeder, "Mother's Day; Baby Nest, May 1925 Chapter 34, Daily News (New York, N.Y.), Mar. 15, 2000
• Guzovska, Madame – [Untitled, The Bruce Herald (Tokomairio, New Zealand), Jun. 16, 1903, p. 4]
• Holmen, Mr. & Mrs. – ["A Thousand Babies Murdered – On Huge Baby Farm in Stockholm. Decoy Infants." Syndicated, New Zealand Truth (Wellington, N.Z.), Dec. 22, 1906, p. 8]
• Ishikawa, Miyuki – "Miyuki Ishikawa," on Wikipedia; ["Two New 'Baby Death Suspects Rounded Up," Pacific Stars and Stripes (Tokyo, Japan), Jan. 20, 1948, p. 1]
["On Trial As Baby Murderers," Pacific Stars and Stripes (Tokyo, Japan), Sep. 24, 1948, p. 4]
• Jaspers, Virginia –["Nurse Admits Shaking Three Babies to Death – They Refused to Take Formulas and Got On Her Nerves, She Explains To Police," syndicated (AP), The Milwaukee Journal (Wi.), Aug. 28, 1956, p. 1]
• Julien, Madame – ["Systematic Child Murder." The Atlas (London, England), Sep. 21, 1867, p. 8]
• Kusnezowa, Madame – ["Thousand Murdered Babies. – Russian Woman Charged. – Victims Killed By Poison." Poverty Bay Herald (Gisborne, New Zealand), April 12, 1913, p. 10]
• Makin, Sara Jane – ["Hearts Pierced With Needles. – Bodies of Many Infants Found on Australian Baby Farms." syndicated (AP), The World (Brooklyn, N.Y.), Nov. 14, 1892, p. 2]
• McCloskey, Margaret – ["Baby Farming." New York Tribune (N.Y.), Jun. 28, 1876]
The New York Times report on this case gives the name as"Margaret McClinchy." ("Baby Farming. A Woman Sent To The Penitentiary For Six Months And Fined $250." New York Times (N.Y.), Jul. 2, 1876, p. ?)
• Moore, Helen Patricia – "The Ultimate Female Sentencing Discount: Helen Patricia Moore," Porky's Place, undated
["Babysitter 'was killer,'" The Age (Melbourne, Australia), Apr. 2, 1980, p. 3]
["Woman faces further murder, assault charges – Boy now blind, unable to walk, SM told," The Sydney Morning Herald (Australia), Apr. 10, 1980, p. 2]
[Alison Stewart, "Portrait of a baby killer – A life of agony haunts babysit killer's family," The Sun-Herald (Melbourne, Australia), Dec. 14, 1980, p. 2]
• Noskina, Feige – [:Wholesale Infanticide In Russia. – Shocking Disclosures.: The South Australian Chronicle, Adelaide, SA, Australia), Jun. 18, 1892, p. 6]
["Baby Farmers Sentenced." The Sun (New York, N.Y.), May 5, 1892, p. 2]
• "Osaka Baby Farmers" – ["Three Hundred Babies Victims Members of a Japanese Family Arrested at Osaka on Charge of Child Slaughter." (Special By Scripps-McRae.), Dec. 29, 1902, p. 1]
• "Osaka Devil Woman" – ["Wholesale Infanticide – Woman Charged With Murdering Over 100 Babies." The West Australian (Perth, Australia), Aug. 28, 1906, p. 2]
• Ostrovoskafa, Rachel – ["A Murderous Sect." Marlborough Express (Blenheim, Marlborough, New Zealand), Mar. 25, 1885, p. 3]
• Overbye, Dagnmar – [Helle Harbo Sørensen, "Child killer Dagmar Overbye," TV2 Finans, Jun. 22, 2008] Link to Danish original: Helle Harbo Sørensen, "Bardemordersken Dagmar Overbye," TV2 Finans, Jun. 22, 2008]
• Pankow, Sandra K. – [Lee Bergquist, "Appleton sitter gets 40 years for 2 killings," Milwaukee Sentinel (Wi.), Aug. 22, 1986, p. 1]
• "Premysi Baby Farmers" – ["Wholesale Infanticide. – Terrible Revelations of an Austrian Baby-Farm – Dozens of Bodies Found by the Authorities – Social Scandals Threatened." The Toronto Daily Mail (Canada), Mar. 6, 1893, p. 1]
• Roseberry, Edna – ["Woman Convicted of Beating Baby," St. Petersburg Times (Fl.), Feb. 20, 1948, p. 8]
• Schnell, Ida – [Bernard Fischer, "Girl of Thirteen Slays Six Babies – Remarkable Record of Murder Is Confessed by a Child in Munich." Syndicated, The Salt Lake Tribune (Ut.), Nov. 10, 1907, p. 17]
• Scott, Amy Lynn –[Jill Redhage, "Woman convicted of killing three babies decades after their deaths," East Valley Tribune (Tempe, Az.), Mar. 7, 2007 (updated Oct. 7, 2011)]
• Skoublinska, Marianne; "Skublinski," "Stysinski, " etc. – ["Horrible Crimes At Warsaw – Fifty Murdered Babies Found." The Echo (London, England), Feb. 24, 1890, p. 3]
["A Diabolical Crime." Supplement to Evening Post (Wellington, New Zealand), May 17, 1890, p. 1]

["The Polish Baby Murderer Sentenced," The Nelson Evening Mail (New Zealand), May 27, 1890, p. 4] [« Les faiseuses d'anges, » (Chronique Ou Crime) Le Stéphanois (Paris , France), Feb. 28, 1890, p. 2] [Untitled, Free Russia, (The Organ of the English Society of Friends of Russian Freedom, American Edition), (New York, N.Y.), Apr. 1891, p. 6]
• Tanaka, Mrs. Juniki – ["Infants Starved To Death For Dowries – Eight Murders Charged to Tokyo (Japan) Couple." The Kingston Daily Freeman (N.Y.), Sep. 11, 1924, p. 7]
• Tann, Georgia – "Devil in disguise: Adoption in America," The Buffalo News, May 22, 2007 (book review); Barbara Raymond, The Baby Thief, *The Untold Story of Georgia Tann, the Baby Seller Who Corrupted Adoption,*2007 (book; highly recommended)
• Thorman, Lillian B. –["Fire Used To Kill. – Girls Says She Killed Three Children by Placing Them on the Stove." Plain Dealer (Cleveland, Oh.), Feb. 23, 1906, p. 1]
• Turner, Lise Jane – ["Lise Jane Turner," murderpedia.org] ["Lynn Turner (murderer)," Wikipedia]
• Waters, Margaret – ["Trade Of Murder – Review of the Case of Margaret Waters, the Murderess, Hanged on Oct. 11." (from the London Spectator, Oct. 1), The New York Times (N.Y.), Oct. 15, 1870, p. ?] [Untitled, The Guardian (London, England), Oct. 12, 1870, p. 1191 (p. 7 of issue)] ["Baby Farming," Victorian History, Mar. 14, 2012]
• Weber, Jeanne – ["'The Fatal Woman.' – Mystery Of Seven Infants' Deaths." From Paris Daily Mail, The Daily Mail (London, England), May 11, 1908, p. 5] ["Ogress's Fate – Murderess of Many Children Sent to a Lunatic Asylum." Lloyd's Weekly News (London, England), Nov. 29, 1908, p. 10]
• Wiese, Elizabeth – ["Terrible Charges Against A Berlin Baby Farmer." Daily Mail (London, England), Oct. 6, 1903, p. 5] ["Baby Farmer Must Die. – Notorious German Woman Receives Five Capital Sentences." Syndicated (Bulletin Press Association), Oshkosh Daily Northwestern (Wi.), Nov. 1, 1904, p. 4]
• West. Mrs. Fred Mr. – ["Babies Instead of Dogs Said to Be Sold in Iowa – Woman Charged With Killing Unsalable Child – Accused of Throwing Noisy Infants Into Furnace." The Washington Times (D.C.), Jun. 4, 1907, p. 4

•?•?•?•

Mr. Soloman. 1977

Dr. F (Ian Williams) · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

In 1977 Mr Soloman was fifty two and he came into our lives really fast and he went out even faster. Rumour said that the American government sent him out here to invent secret technology involving propulsion in wars. All the adults fell for that malarkey because gossip was the bush-telegraph and the bush-telegraph was the real news. "Apparently".

The parents told stories to their kids about Soloman and the kids ate up every word and added more words about him, but I thought anything from gossip was dumb like ears of corn or eyes of potatoes. So while I never listened to the rumours or watched the lips that kept them alive and growing, I heard the stories anyway.

My mate Pumpski said his dad had said, "Mr Soloman told me he is designing a special fuel for a rocket that can make a submarine fly in orbit." and my red-headed mate Bluey said, "Mr Soloman had tea and two scones with mum and he told her that he's cracking atoms for secret levitation technology." I reckoned it was all bunk because I knew for a fact that Mr Soloman never spoke to anyone because he was paranoid and had a fence that hummed.

Behind our place on the steep hill in the thick bush he'd built an electric fence right around his house and I discovered it when I was hunting for ticks. The Queensland government paid five cents for every tick you brought them because they wanted to study the Rickettsial fever, and I was about to grab a cattle tick on a blue gum twig when I first heard an American voice call out to me.

"A high voltage fence is almost touching you so you better walk backwards real slow sir."

I didn't see him for the dense bush, and I froze even more when he said the next bit without a single comma or full stop.

"I only turn it off when there's rain and we haven't had rain for a month and it'll kill you if you touch it and can you hear the hum now kid can you hear it now just listen?"

Low under the cicadas I heard the hum and I put my hands up and dropped my tick jar and called out into the bush.

"How do I get out? I'm really scared."

For a few seconds all I heard was a frilly lizard scampering near my foot and a bush stone-curlew wailing far away, but when the fence switched off I could hear a Christmas beetle scratching on bark and then adult footsteps that were getting closer. Mr Soloman dressed in olive drab fatigues popped out from the bush only twenty feet away and he came right up to me.

"So. You want to get out you say? You're real scared and you want to get out?" He squinted while he waited for my answer but I had none, so he crouched down and grabbed a stick on the ground. "I'll show you how to get out."

Soloman carved a circle the size of a Frisbee in the dirt between us.

"This is the radar of your life, and here…" he gouged a hole inside the circle, "…is state education and here…", he gouged another hole, "…is your marriage and here…" another hole, "…are other people's dreams and here…" another hole, "…is the government that wants you dead!"

As he stood up and there was a tremble in his whisper. "My government sent me here because it didn't want anyone noticing me working on their secret war toy."

Mr. Soloman kept staring at me and he stepped backwards against a gumtree sapling and spoke like he was somebody else. "Yeah, send him to Australia and make sure he doesn't mix with the locals." The sapling bent, "Keep an eye on our golden-boy!", and it cracked sharply, "You got your orders!".

I was too terrified to move while I waited for him to go normal, but I knew I had to wait a bit longer when he threw his arms up in the air and nodded at the glue gum next to me like there were three of us there.

"Ah Mr President. I made the toy too good didn't I?" His face twitched and he jabbed a finger at the tree and snarled. "And now you want it, and when you get it how will you dispose of me?"

A small breeze pressed the back of my shirt coldly against the sweat.

"Well Mr. President, you're not getting it. I'm going to take it far away and destroy it." He sagged and said nothing for a minute while he gathered himself before he lifted his head up again.

"Son you have to get rid of the blips." He pointed at the circle in the dirt and looked up sadly at the lantana vines that were strangling the Candle Nut trees and the Sandpaper Figs.

"And then you can be a man going your own way out of this tangled mess."

When he took his eyes away from me I ran as fast as I could and made it to the road in twenty seconds instead of two minutes. Three days later I heard there was talk of him going insane and constable Crellin's wife said her husband thought that the army might do a raid on his property.

[image]

A week later Pumpski and I were on our street after dinner with a golf club batting cane toads that came out for the Cup Moths. He swung the eight iron that sent one over to Mawson's paddock and he frowned at me.

"Did he explain anything more about that dirt-radar? Did you leave anything out? Think!"

I grabbed the club and swung it hard sending another toad to the paddock. Pumpski was pissing me off now.

"Stop asking me about the bloody radar. I've already told you ten times everything that happened."

Pumpski snatched the club out of my hands and he looked hurt. He was about to say something when we heard the loud noise from Mr Solomon's property. It sounded like the burner of a hot-air balloon was firing up combined with a high pitched tone and a deep rumble. The thick bush lit up with green flashes that chucked shadows on to the road, and when it stopped a few moments later everything went quiet again.

Ten long seconds passed while we looked up into the dark bush and Pumpski sucked in air and grabbed my sleeve. Under the orange street light I could see his eyes were popped and that meant he was going to jabber at me.

"Ian! I bet the Yank has made a UFO! I read about 'em and they suck 'lectricity from the…"

When he said "'lectricity", every sodium vapour lamp over the road switched off and the quarter moon jumped out with the stars. Mrs. Baiden's Persian shot out from under her Fiat into a flood drain, and the air went still and thick like cool honey as we watched Mr Soloman wearing a jet-pack silently rise up over the tree line and hover a hundred feet above us.

He was inside a wobbling red haze and he glowed as he hung in the black sky gripping two handles like he was ready to ski. It was so quiet all around us that we could hear Mr's Purnell's Chihuahua yapping four blocks away, and he just stared down at us and waved like nothing was unusual. We could see his teeth. He was smiling

The rubber grip of the eight iron fell to the road and Mr Soloman moved over our heads without a sound before making a fast beeline for the peak at Bungle's cliff four miles to the east. We watched him shrink to a tiny red speck that shot up the cliff wall and disappear behind it where the ocean was. Pumpski whispered to me and he sounded dead serious.

"We didn't lick any toads tonight did we?"

For the next two weeks some friendly Americans in suits knocked on doors in the neighbourhood and they were keen to hear the gossip about Mr Soloman. People who were already very curious about Soloman invited them in for dinner just so they could ask questions, but some people got annoyed at the Yanks snooping about and told them to piss off just like Mr. Kreyton did. Everyone listened to everybody, but no one said anything interesting because nobody seemed to know anything. Not the neighbours, not the cops or the even the yanks themselves.

It took a while for the gossip about the Americans and the disappearance of Soloman to die down, but Pumpski and I talked about it for months. Eventually I got sick of it, but Pumpski wouldn't let it drop and he kept asking me about the dirt-radar.

"Here", He handed me a piece of paper and a Biro."Draw it exactly like you saw it and tell me every single word he said about blokes going away."

"No mate." I shook my head. "I've drawn it for you twenty times already, and he never said blokes going 'away'. He said blokes going 'their own way'."

Pumpski let the paper fall to the carpet and he sat on his bed and bit the plastic tip of the pen. He looked out of the window at the top of Mount Table in the distance and he spoke softly.

"Mr Soloman proved that governments have inventions that are secret, so what else are they hiding?" He was barely audible and he looked like he was a hundred miles away.

I indulged him a bit, "Computers. They got really big computers and they're hiding them?"

The cap of the pen dropped from his mouth and he snorted. "One day everybody around the world will have a computer and they won't be big either. They'll be as small as a fridge and we'll use 'em to play records and project movies and newspapers and they'll be connected together like phones."

I smiled, "Yeah sure."

He turned from the window and stared at the blank piece of paper on the floor. "Why did he hate those blips on that radar he drew? Marriage and state education and other people's dreams are all normal things." He shook his head and looked out the window again.

"All the jig-saw pieces are here but I just can't put 'em all together."

Pumpski was a great mate, so when he talked nonsense I listened to him. "Apparently."

~

Original artwork, © Ian Williams. 2013.

Feminists target lecture on boys' education

Hannah Wallen · 27 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

MR-E hosting lecture on boys in education.

Men's Rights Edmonton has arranged a lecture event to be held on July 29th at 7pm at the Edmonton Public Library (Stanley A. Milner branch) with Dr. James Brown, author of Rescuing our Underachieving Sons.

The Stanley A. Milner Library is located downtown at 7 Sir Winston Churchill Square.

Dr. Brown, a career educator with a doctorate in education and post doctoral diplomas in Educational Administration and in Curriculum and Instructional Leadership, will be discussing the challenge of improving boys' education.

Due to opposition by local feminists, promoting the event has been a challenge.

According to Eric Duckman, posters advertising the event have been vandalized with paint or torn down almost instantly after being put up.

This leads to the question, why would feminists be so opposed to a lecture by a highly respected and credentialed educator on improving boys' performance in school?

There may be an opportunity to get an answer to that question at the event, as *a counter-event has been organized to take place at the site. The event, titled "Feministing at 'Rescuing Our Underachieving Sons'" is described by its organizer Brittany Kustra as a chance to confront attending men's rights activists over their "Don't be that girl" poster campaign, and to "see who is behind the group."

In other words, she plans to protest a scheduled lecture on an unquestionably positive topic with demands to discuss another, unrelated topic, and she will be mining for group member identities.

MREdmonton and AVoiceforMen invited live debate on blog talk radio following news coverage of the posters, and feminists everywhere, including the most vehement critics of the campaign, lined up to not take them up on it. In light of that, it's odd that Brittany should think it necessary to disrupt an unrelated event to revisit the controversy.

Rather than take the offered chance to have all of their questions answered, this feminist group has decided to disrupt an event held for the benefit of boys who are underserved by their education system. One cannot reasonably argue that after disregarding such an open opportunity, the goal of feminists planning to converge on Dr. Brown's lecture is merely to ask questions. Without that as a possible motive for the protest, that leaves their other goal of identity mining.

However, a group with that goal in mind would have been more sneaky than to alert the very people they seek to identify. The Facebook event page for Feministing at "Rescuing Our Underachieving Sons" is public, and they've made sure that the MREdmonton group would be aware ahead of time that they were planning to crash the lecture. That seems counterproductive, unless there is a different goal.

Could it be that Brittany and her friends just absolutely hate little boys, and want to deny them any effort that might be made to improve their circumstance within the education system, or are they maybe planning to hijack Dr. Brown's lecture and distract from its intended purpose just to draw attention to themselves?

*Update – the facebook page for the planned counter-event has been removed. Link updated to show the google cache of the page.

Men's suicidal life

Tom Golden · 28 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]T[/dropcap]his video offers a great description of a basic thread of the MHRM and it does so in a very polished, eye catching and professional manner. We have numerous youtube channels such as my own that have been doing videos on men's issues for some time but this one stands out as being remarkably…well, you watch it and add your own adjectives. I think it is perfect to send to people who are completely unaware of men's issues in any way.

If they have an ounce of compassion they will be moved by what they see.

The vidoeographer of this wonderful piece is a man from India named Jerald Santhosh. He works in motiongraphics, kinetic typography, and does posters, artwork and more. He is a part of the men's movement in India and we welcome him to AVFM. He is planning to open a web site and to do more videos so stay tuned and please do subscribe to his Youtube channel after you watch the video. –TG

–
–
Transcript of video:
Married men commit suicide at a higher rate in our society.
A married man lives his life supporting his wife and children.
When he faces abuse, we as society are indifferent to him.
A man is severely assaulted by his wife or girlfriend every 14.6 seconds.
When a man is battered by his spouse there is no shelter which would take him.
The government which should protect him, will imprison him even if he is falsely accused by his wife.
He will lose his job, and will be subjected to social shame.
Family courts incentivises his abuser by extorting money from him.
Divorce alienates him from his children, takes away his house, and his money. A man who has lost his children, house, and social image receives no help from the same government which he pays tax to.
All this helplessness leads to drug and alcohol abuse which also makes him depressed and suicidal.
This is a global phenomenon.Lists of various suicide statistics per year of men, which far exceeds women's rates:
[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- America 24,672 – 5950
- India 63,343 – 31,921
- Canada 2,989 – 901
- Australia 1,727 – 546
- UK 4,552 – 1,493
- Russia 35,608 – 7,247
- Lithuania 952 – 186

[/unordered_list]

So many men are killing themselves every year..

What are we doing about it?

Men’s rights are Human Rights

Brought to you by cyber saint

Spiritual materialism, ego and self-deception

Diana Davison · 28 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is nothing in this world that the ego can not co-opt for its own glorification. Even the act of killing your ego can become ego fulfilling.

"Ego is constantly attempting to acquire and apply the teachings of spirituality for its own benefit."
~Chogyam Trungpa

The Spiritual Materialist uses every conquest in meditation to feel more spiritual than those around them just as some MGTOWs brag that their method is the best form of Going Their Own Way. The only benefit to making such claims is to feed the "Three Lords of Materialism": the "Lord of Form," the "Lord of Speech," and the "Lord of Mind."

As master Kudi, The Mystical Rodent Activist, said "I'm aware that there is plenty of controversy within the Men's Rights Movement, especially when it comes to minor details, but I've also noticed there is a modest consensus emerging at the heart of the Men's Rights Movement."

The consensus is the Middle Way.

Discussing MGTOW approaches to relationships, recent articles on AVfM have presented sex vs attachment, as Tawil's study of basic human needs and the importance of understanding attachment, and "elective de-attachment", as August Løvenskiolds' rebuttal. What makes AVfM so great is that they encourage such debate.

Non attachment has a surface appeal that makes it sound easy. Some MGTOWs will advise you to "just say no" and your independence will become some sort of magical Bodhi tree under which you can sit until you become enlightened. Perhaps watching a few youtube videos while you wait.

A few years ago I emailed the office of the Dalai Llama with some questions about non attachment and why they can't detach from the land of Tibet. The non reply that I got was a brief message saying I should read up on how mean the Chinese are. If the Dalai Lama can't answer questions about non attachment honestly how can MGTOWs?

August calls his isolation prescription "elective de-attachment" but is that different from non attachment? He offers you religious figures as examples so I think he is just giving it a new name that means the same thing. Does August understand it better than the Dalai Lama? Probably not.

Freedom from attachment is not the veto power of saying "I reject this." That path of suffering is called asceticism and it usually involves self mortification. It isn't pretty and hasn't produced a single icon. In spiritual terms, the only way to truly avoid attachment need is to stop seeing yourself as a separate entity. You become one with everything and everyone so there is no means of attaching because it is you. You give up your personality and all sense of self. You can't separate yourself from that screaming feminist because she is also a part of you and you love her as you love yourself. Still sounding like a good idea?

MGTOWs are, generally, not doing this.

Most MGTOWs are separating themselves quite distinctly and focusing on setting boundaries between themselves and the world around them. They seek to assess other people skeptically based on lessons from their past and/or observations of their present environment. They increase the value placed on defining themselves in their own way and those definitions have strong boundaries. That MGTOWs are doing the opposite of spiritual non attachment doesn't make it bad unless you're also a Buddhist trying to become enlightened, but if you're just a human being trying to create a sustainable environment it's a perfectly acceptable and supportable step on the road.

Feeling safe is an important part of mental health and MGTOWs have recognized that traditional relationships are not safe.

Tawil's article on sexuality and attachment raises a very important consideration for those of us who do not fashion ourselves to be religious icons ready to face a life of asceticism. He asks people to consider what their human emotional needs are so that they do not neglect those needs in the same way so many of us refuse to see a doctor when we are ill. Not all of us have the same social needs. There is no right way to be, but you can certainly do it wrong by neglecting yourself. Those are the folks that die young.

Do you need physical contact?

I am not big on hugging and kissing. I went for about two years without letting another human physically touch me in any way. I didn't even know I was doing it until a friend put his hand on my arm to ask me a question and it literally shocked me. Human contact is powerful. It is an exchange.

That contact is important doesn't mean I have to go around fucking everyone I meet. "All things in moderation" is the saying, and moderation is the key: self moderation. Maybe you don't need to get laid, you just need a good massage, or a game of rugby, or a pet, but you do need physical contact or your body will suffer.

I sometimes look around and am awed by the reality that every single person surrounding me in a crowd woke up that morning filled with a completely different subjective world view that sometimes aligns us and sometimes pits us against each other. We share the same world with so many people yet rarely feel that anyone will ever truly know us but strive every day to express ourselves in a way that will attain that one thing we want so badly: to connect with someone else in a meaningful way.

Humans are social animals. The evidence that we need each other is in our cities and our inventions, like the internet, that let us reach out and connect with each other despite the fact that we are trained to be in direct competition with each other in every aspect of our lives. This competition both invigorates us and tears us apart. It inspires us to create and it inspires us to destroy.

While you don't need someone to complete you, you do need someone to confirm that you have value. You can't do that by yourself. Men don't need women but they do need human contact and validation. When I read Tawil's article about attachment it resonated with my own concerns that the amount of time it might take to fix the social injustices may be longer than some men can endure. Not everyone is cut out for isolation and men already have a high suicide rate. Those of you who can be happy in isolation shouldn't assume that everyone can.

Admitting that most people have attachment needs isn't an issue of shaming, it's an issue of survival. You can lie to yourself all the way up to pulling the trigger.

Insinuations that MGTOW happens in levels of which all should strive for some apex is not only like a shady pyramid scheme, it is a destructive and dangerous form of Spiritual Materialism. There is no God of the MGTOWs and attempts for anyone to fashion themselves as such is sheer egotism that might liberate some but will drive others to suicide. All religious comparisons fall flat and should stir suspicion.

Buddha ate his own feces for a good many years. At the time, Buddha thought he was likely to be enlightened at any moment.

Moses never achieved enlightenment, he actually spent a lot of time complaining to God that he was a poor choice of spokesperson. Jesus let himself be crucified because he only lived to serve. In fact, all iconic religious figures weren't "going their own way," they always served God. They were willing to sacrifice their own needs to serve something more powerful than them and were never on their own because they believed they were the servants of God.

Then there are those of us that live in the real world. The one where, like it or not, you have feelings and needs.

You can fool your mind but you can't fool your soul.

Honesty is a tricky thing. So many people are being honest with you but not with themselves. So it's true with MGTOW as well. I'm not MGTOW, I'm a WGHOW who rejects lies. I'm tougher on myself than anyone else and I expect the same vigilance from others.

We count on our friends to tell us when we're being self destructive or chasing some dragon down a rabbit hole and we owe it to each other to help keep each other on the Middle Path.

You can't save the world but you can save yourself. If you do it well you can share your technique with others so they might benefit, but anyone claiming to know how to fix everyone else is a person who needs to assess whether or not they've got their ego under control.

Men don't need to marry women and they don't even need sex but they do have needs that should be taken seriously. It could be a long time before relationships are redefined in a way that makes attachment safe. Women have been taught to manipulate the human need for attachment like they're holding a winning lottery ticket just by being female and most haven't read the fine print that says "all winnings will be paid with your future happiness."

While we wait for the rest of the world to catch up, the important thing is to survive going your own way long enough to see the day when feminism falls into its own fetid footprint. Men aren't actually alone in this fight. You may need to stand alone in your battle position to keep your strength but you aren't actually alone.

You say there's a marriage strike?

John Hembling (JtO) · 28 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

So you say there's a marriage strike? Apparently, men in increasing numbers are refusing to be the good little appliances society demands of them, and are not settling down to their traditional roles of protector, provider and general disposable human. Indeed, this has been a well know secret, talked about in mainstream media for at least a decade, and shows no signs of abating or slowing.

Some within the men's human rights movement have even coined terms to describe men choosing such a self preservative path in life. Men going their own way, or zeta males. The publisher of this web-site is one such man, as is the author of this article.

In July of 2011, AVfM published an article of mine[1] in which women's penis-wanted advertisements were examined. Since then, a growing focus has emerged in public social commentary from sources such as The Huffington Post, slate.com, NYMag and elsewhere, evidencing a flavor of growing concern that men are opting out of marriage 2.0. "A growing concern" being polite language for the reek of panic.

My follow-up to that 2011 piece has been sitting on my hard drive for more than 2 years.

And here we go.

You must be at least as tall as this sign to ride.

I'm a physically fit, workaholic, non romantic, non spiritual, tattooed opinionated middle aged nice guy.

That "nice guy" part at the end is the kiss of death, I know. If you prefer bad-boys skip to the next meet-and-greet ad, and go find somebody to treat you like crap. I have NO interest in participating in an abusive relationship.

I have no kids, and no debt, and I own the company I work for. I don't play emotional games or engage in manipulation of the people I care about. I similarly have no patience whatsoever for women who engage in mind games. Sadly, this will rule out most of the readers of this ad. Too bad.

What am I looking for?

A woman who is:
Physically fit (or at least, not a slovenly fat-ass)
Responsible, without being boring
Single, without kids
Open to adventure (read that however you like)
Emotionally available

What am I not looking for? Which is to say, what qualities are deal breakers? What characteristics are so repellent that they will disqualify you from any consideration as even an acquaintance with which to have a drink? In short, for women who've read at least this far –anything you find in the next paragraph describing you is your signal to leave this conversation without delay.

Of course, I don't mean anything in the next few lines makes you a bad person. It just makes you somebody I don't want to meet, or see, or talk to. And please, don't let my disinterest cloud your optimism, I'm probably a bad man. Maybe even a libertarian.

Deal breakers: If you find yourself described below, this is not the ad for you.

Too young (under 30)
Party girl, or heavy drug user
Married or attached
A religious fundamentalist

A husband seeker

That wasn't so bad, was it? Just a short list of disqualifies.

Of course, if you're still reading, you can win bonus points if you are any of the following:

A pervert.

Oh, I see some people scrunching up their faces and making the "eeeeewww" noise. Get over yourselves Pollyannas. Everyone looking for a prospective partner for going on picnics, and playing penuckle also wants to get laid too. Perverts are simply more creative and enthusiastic about it.

Further bonus points awarded if you are a Happy Camper. This shouldn't be difficult to understand. I prefer being happy, and so, I find myself entertained by most of what I experience in life. Entertained rather than, say, indignant, outraged, bitter, or complaining. Happy campers know something that other people apparently don't know. I wont bother explaining what that something is, only that happy campers go to the front of my queue.

Bonus points if you pursue a scientific hobby. It demonstrates interest in the world beyond the study of one's own navel.

Bonus points if you commute by bike. Oh, and this isn't some hippy save-the-planet motivated item. It's simply more fun.

Bonus points if are a lover of zombie-cinema.

Super extra bonus points for ninjas and pirates.

Lastly, my ad includes a picture, your reply should do the same.

The last of the deal breakers in my ad was "A husband seeker". I trust nobody reading this actually needs an explanation of the repellant character of modern marriage for self determined men. Marriage strike anyone?

But recalling that I wrote this meet and greet ad over two years ago, my thoughts have evolved in the intervening couple of years. That ad of mine, written as a hypothetical posting to meet-and-greet reflects a hypothetical desire to date, or have some sort of a girlfriend. Ha!

This brings to mind a conversation I had with a friend. I ran into him at a cafe near my home, where he joined me at my table with the following question. Asked in a trinidadian accent : so man, how many women you got?

The question was posed to me based on my demeanour as my friend perceives it. Relaxed, cheerful and imperturbable. His logic being, one must assume that I am as cheerful and relaxed as I am either because I have one or more girlfriends, or that such demeanour attracts women. It probably does, but I don't really know. My answer to his question surprised him.

Him: "So man, how many women you got?"

Me: "what? I don't have any women"

Him: "but you always so relaxed"

Me: " and why do you think that is?"

At this point, he laughed, and several other men who had been covertly listening to the conversation gathered in obvious interest in our exchange. As my friend questioned me, I explained myself as well as I could.

I talked about the gun in the room[2], which is to say, the ever present social menace of proxy violence toward every man in a relationship with a woman.

I talked about my own view of "dating" as an ongoing job evaluation, where nothing is ever good enough, and for a man, the socially normal climate is that he's done something wrong, somewhere, and that she's not happy, and he'd better atone. I think I even mentioned the cultural zeitgeist in which shame is what every man is supposed to feel about his own sexual identity. I might have mentioned my utter disinterest in that too.

I talked about sex, and it's easy availability outside of any "relationships" or "marriage" – and why that is no incentive to sacrifice peace in your own life just to get an occasional leg over.

I talked about reproductive rights, specifically the total lack of such for men in our culture.

I don't have a "girl friend", I don't date, and I have no interest in changing that state of affairs, ever.

And my friend, who knows nothing of "John the Other" or this site, or the men's rights movement – he agreed with me on every point and announced to all in attendance that I was a very smart man.

He also noted that we'd better not tell his wife any of this, or he'd be in deep sheep dip. He was not joking.

I'm not any smarter than my friend. I have simply evaluated what I'm constantly told I should do, what I should think and what I should be, and decided it's all a bad bet, and a transparent scam. I'm a man going his own way, and all those dating ads, and admonitions to do X , or Y, or Z to attract the attentions and affections of a date or a girlfriend or a wife have just become the noise of mosquitoes. I can hear them, but they wont be ruining my camping trip. And of course, if you want to come along, you'd better measure yourself by the height of the sign before calling.

[1] http://www.avoiceformen.com/miscellaneous/meet-and-greet-ads/

TB on TV

VFM News and Commentary · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

As AVFM and the Men's Human Rights Movement continue to make inroads into the mainstream media, particularly in Canada, one name keeps popping up over and over: TyphonBlue.

Typhon, whom we all know as someone with highly incisive views on sexual politics and gender roles, has been spearheading contact with Canadian media and representing us with competence and elegance.

As you may have seen, here is one example of an interview with her hitting one home run after another.

That article was taken directly from this video.

As you can see, we got lucky and actually got a journalist who did an objective job of mirroring what Typhon actually said, instead of putting blue pill spin on it. And of course, when they are objective, we shine.

And more recently she made a TV appearance, fielding questions about postergate and the MRHM in general.

We would like to have posted that for your direct viewing here, but are were unable to. You can, however view it by going here.

Great job, TyphonBlue! From PE and the gang. And many thanks to the good people at Men's Rights Edmonton, for doing such a great job at getting the medias attention.

India's "Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage Law"

Burt Phoenix · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Recently there has been a spate of discussions in the media on the upcoming Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage Law (IrBM). Some important highlights of the proposed bill are:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Divorce can now be filed as a 'No-fault Divorce' stating that marriage has broken down irretrievably;
- Husbands do not have the right to oppose the divorce petition filed by their wives, whereas the wives can oppose the divorce petition filed by the husbands. Hence, the irretrievable break down of marriage can only be claimed by a wife and not the husband as husband's petition can be challenged by the wife;
- All the property of the husband that he currently owns and his ancestral property (inherited or inheritable) will be divided between the husband and the wife.

[/unordered_list]

Some arguments that have been promulgated for supporting this bill during media debates are:

1) Poverty is a gender issue and it is primarily women who are poor in India: This is a baseless argument as the data shows just the opposite. Two most important features of poverty are malnutrition and substandard healthcare due to which the life expectancy reduces and deaths due to diseases increase respectively.

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Average Life Expectancy of women in India is higher than males at 65, compared to males at 62. This implies that women live longer and healthier, hence have lower malnutrition[i];
- Health care facilities are better for women than compared to males. WHO data shows that deaths due to diseases and injuries for males is 883.2 as compared to women as 788.7 (per 100,000). Hence, women have better access to healthcare as compared to the male counterparts[ii].

[/unordered_list]

Therefore based on the above facts it is the men who live a substandard life as compared to women.

2) Stigma of Single women- they cannot rent a house in cities: How does inability to rent a house have anything to do with property rights and divorce laws. If housing societies do not allow single women to buy/rent flats then an amendment in Co-operative Housing Society Act is required and not the passing of IrBM. These two points and issues are completely unrelated.

3) Price of Love and Price of Care that women invest in a relationship should be paid: This point has come in various debates and in various forms. Treating marriage like an economic relationship is completely incorrect. Even if we assume that the feminists are treating marriage as an economic relationship, then the wife's due was paid by her husband during the marriage by way of providing love and care to his wife. The husband also provided for necessities like food, clothing, shelter, vacations etc… Post-divorce, there is no love or care given by the wife hence, no payment is required by the man. Any payment to wife post marriage is an 'unjust enrichment' to the wife.

4) It is important for the woman to have a home as 80% of women keep children: Some important questions brought up in this point are:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- No source has been quoted of this 80% number;

- Why is it only important for the woman to have a home? Why is it not important for a man to have a home? Are men disposable or are they second citizens?
- Why can't the women work are create their own home? Are they not able bodied?

[/unordered_list]

Baseless reasoning such as this promotes parasitism, which is not healthy for any living organism or society.

5) For the past 5000 years women were treated as second class citizens and hence taking into account their increased development and literacy rates (etc) over the past 15 years is deemed invalid: We should all note that laws are passed keeping in mind the situation as of the present date – not 5000 years back. As of the current date women are empowered, and their status 5000 years back (which we do not know much about) has no bearing on the present situation. Therefore this argument does not hold water.

6) Parents do not give any property to their daughter: If parents don't give a share of their property to their daughters then a law should be passed to enforce women's share at their maternal homes. Why pass IrBM for that? If is akin to saying that if company 'A' does not pay salary to their employees then company 'B' is liable to pay it. This is an illogical and unfair argument in support of this bill.

7) Women give birth to babies therefore they should get the property: Every female mammal on this earth gives birth to a baby, which is how nature has made them. Asking for property rights because women give birth to babies is preposterous. Such arguments should not even be entertained by the debate show hosts.

8) In the past women were treated like chattels (property): In the past laws were not as well developed as they are today. There were no human rights or any such thing. We had crude laws and property laws were the only laws that were more or less enforceable. Hence, women might have been treated like chattels to protect them in the society. Further, men were not even treated like chattel. In case of any contingency they were supposed to lay down their lives to protect their property ie. Men were SECOND to chattel. Feminists have not been able to provide any evidence to support any claim that in stable societies women were treated badly. Further, again we are discussing things of the past, today we have well established human rights and personal laws and no person is treated as chattel. Laws are to be made taking into account today's situations and not the situation which existed 5000 years back.

9) India is a male dominated society: This argument has many different versions such as patriarchy, no representation and oppression. How do we define domination? One method of defining domination is by looking at the political representation of the group. A group with a higher political representation controls the making of laws and is the dominant group in a democracy. This is because the elected representatives need to do as directed by electorate. As per the Election Commission of India, the voters of India were:

Year	Men (% votes)	Women (% votes)	Source
1999	40.01%	59.99%	[iii]
2004	41.93%	58.07%	[iv]
2009	45.8%	54.2%	[v]

The dominant group from the above data is clearly the women of India, as they are nearly 60% of the voters, and not the men. Therefore stating that India is a male dominated society is incorrect, as the data speaks otherwise.

The bill is unfair, unjust, and gender biased because:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- Only women have been given a right to oppose a divorce. Men cannot oppose a divorce petition filed by women. This clause seems to clearly discriminate against men;

- Only property (ancestral or owned) of men is to be divided. Property of women is not to be considered;
- In case of a no-fault divorce, other cases such as domestic violence and 498A can continue. If it is no-fault divorce then how can other cases based on fault continue?
- Men are still liable to pay maintenance and alimony to women under other sections of various acts;
- The bill seems to be against gender equality promised by the Indian Constitution under article 15;
- Liabilities of men are not considered in the case of division of property. Assume a house was bought on a bank loan, and in case of divorce, 50% of the house will be given to the woman but the man is still liable to pay the entire loan amount. This tantamount to taking away the future assets of the husband. Further, it is yet to be seen how the banking sector would react to this as it is a risk to their security (ie. house) which is mortgaged against the loan.

[/unordered_list]

In other developed countries laws are gender neutral and have the word 'spouse' in their language and not 'wife' as the case in India. In developed nations each spouse shall be responsible for his or her own support. This has been kept to deter parasitism in their culture.

For example in Sweden maintenance is given when a spouse has difficulty in supporting himself or herself for a transitional period following the divorce. Such transitional maintenance provides the needy spouse with opportunities to seek gainful employment or retraining. Section 7 of Chapter 6 (Maintenance) of the Swedish Marriage Code (Aktenskapsbalken) is: "Following a divorce, each spouse shall be responsible for his or her own support. If a contribution towards the maintenance of either spouse is needed for a transitional period, that spouse shall be entitled to receive maintenance payments from the other spouse on the basis of what is reasonable in view of the latter's ability and other circumstances."

Further, Sweden has a concept of personal property and marital property. Property jointly acquired by the spouses is treated as marital property. An exception is there, if only one spouse acquires property, then his/her personal property may be treated as marital property.

Further, post the division of marital property, the maintenance and alimony is reduced. (ie. the clauses are not mutually exclusive) [vi].

For example in Germany: A spouse must provide for their own maintenance after divorce (Sections 1569, 1577 BGB). Maintenance may only be granted for an intermittent period till the other spouse retrains so as to be employable. Further, the net worth of the spouses at the time of marriage and after the marriage is calculated. The difference is treated as marital property and property of both spouses is equally divided. An exception is there that if a spouse does not contribute in promoting the economic gain in marital property, he/she is not eligible for anything. Further, adultery and cruelty is given weightage.

In essence, both developed nations treat the property of husband and wife separately and only joint contributed property as marital property. This comes from the tenet that all able bodied persons should be liable for their own upkeep[vii].

---

[i] WHO: http://unstats.un.org/unsd/demographic/products/indwm/ww2005/tab3a.htm

[ii] WHO: http://www.who.int/entity/gho/mortality_burden_disease/global_burden_disease_death_estimates_sex_2008.xls

[iii] http://eci.nic.in/eci_main/StatisticalReports/LS_1999/Vol_I_LS_99.pdf page 144

[iv] http://eci.nic.in/eci_main/StatisticalReports/LS_2004/Vol_I_LS_2004.pdf page 167

[v] http://eci.nic.in/eci_main/archiveofge2009/Stats/VOLI/08_VotersInformation.pdf

[vi] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Divorce_law_in_Sweden#Division_of_assets

[vii] http://www.ejcl.org/123/art123-4.pdf

Please Note: If you have any concerns with any part of this article, do feel free to comment. Your concerns will be appropriately addressed and/or modifications to the article will be made.

Monday Roundup for 29 July 2013

Dean Esmay · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Howdy y'all. Is it Monday again already? So it is. So here's a handy roundup of everything you may have missed in the last week, or may just want to go check out again.

Last week we featured a lot of heavy stuff on the theme of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). A number of men in the movement have noticed the rise of a genetic reductionism and even fatalism in some thinkers, both outside the men's movement and within it. A number of Men Going Their Own Way take serious issue with this. Perhaps no one does so more effectively than Peter Wright, who has five pieces that should be considered must-reading on this topic. Although he arguably began writing on this topic before last week; I suggest starting with The rise of Chivalric Love: the power of shame, which was his first foray into explaining why a lot of what we think of as "natural" behavior of human males towrds females is indeed more cultural than many believe, and he believes it can be distinctly traced to within the last 1,000 years.

He further expounds on that in Love and MGTOW, where he notes that much of what we call "romance" today is a historical abberation for the human species. Then last week he began going still deeper and more detailed on where we often confuse biology (which is real enough) with culture (which is also real) in A Voice for Men: MGTOW-Central, reaching a smashing climax in Sex and attachment, noting the dangers of confusing "romance," cultural pressures, and rejecting cultural bullshit expectations with believing human beings have no biological need for attachment (which we do). In MGTOW: 12th Century Style, he gives us a lovely denouement, noting that the rise of proto-feminism about 800 years ago already had its detractors.

Speaking of history, our own Gonzo Historian Robert St. Estephe returns once again with unearthed arcana that show that much of what we talk about in the men's movement today was commonly understood in the past, and recounts how the once world-famous Dorothy Dix ripped into women of her day for selfish gynocentrism and treating men like disposable utilities and dogs. We hereby posthumously declare Dorothy Dix a Proto-Honeybadger and hope to continue to help preserve history like this. Robert also brought us the history of husbands on strike in Tibet back in 1928.

Also speaking of history, in the 100th anniversary of its original publication, AVfM reprinted The Fraud of Feminism part 3 of 3 by E. Belfort Bax, which is often spooky reading because it often sounds so much like he could have written that book today.

What relevance all this ancient history? Because it's probably forgetting a lot of this history that's doomed so many of us to repeat it!

Another MGTOW taking issue with genetic reductionism/fatalism this week was Jason Gregory, who questions the notion that the past ain't through with us, asking why, if that were true, any of us would bother trying finding our own path in life outside of gynocentric bullshit? Good question.

Meanwhile, the redoubtable August Løvenskiolds took some issue with Peter Wright, and in response to the notion that most men need emotional attachment, made a stirring defense of his own and other men's choice of elective de-attachment, an answer that seems to have worked great for him–and finding what works for you is the very essence of being a Man Going Your Own Way, is it not? We've all got to find our way through this misandrist culture, and while what works for some may not work for all, no one should be shamed for finding whatever helps them survive an thrive. And Geoffrey James (also known as Solaris, proprietor of NiceGuy's American Women (Mostly) Suck) page and forum, graces our front page for the first time in The right to be left alone, which also contains a ringing endorsement (which I echo) of Dr. Helen Smith's already-classic book, Men On Strike. And in You say there's a marriage strike?, AVfM's own John Hembling, aka John the Other, makes it clear why he's a man going his own way and recounts a humorous story of answering questions for a blue pill man who at first found him incomprehensible then found him amazing.

Dr. F gave us a short story of childhood wonder at the whole idea of going your own way, and in a cracking capper to all of this, Della Burton weighed in on the growing Men Going Their Own Way phenomenon, showing little but contempt for women who treat the subject with contempt: in You asked for it ladies, Della lays waste the idea that men who make a rational choice of self-preservation are doing something wrong, and lays the blame squarely at the feet of those who have made that a necessary choice for so many men and asks them to do something women these days are too rarely asked to do: act like fucking adults and own their own shit.

That particular essay by Della seems to have drawn the most attention from outside the site, and was heavily linked by other sites after publication. It looks to me like women who get it may be a rarity, but I suspect they're growing, and I further suspect that other women don't like women like Della who do get it. Well it's tough titty for them, because Della's right–and I suspect they know she's right.

Hey, did we talk about anything other than Men Going Their Own Way this week? Well of course we did. We had terrific news and terrible news. For example, Mark Trueblood noticed that Cosmopolitan no longer supports domestic violence against men. Mark's a bit cynical about it but me, I'll take progress where I can get it.

The AVfM news team has also been staying on the case of West Virginia's corrupt judicial branch. This time Judge Michael J. Kelly of West Virginia is exposed for having a conflict of interest. This is a judge who's apparently used his own seat on the bench to dispense his own vigilante justice on people he doesn't like in West Virginia. We'll have more on this judge and some of his cronies, just stay tuned.

Also, it's always cause to celebrate when an innocent man is vindicated and let out of prison, right? Well, yes and no, because as AVfM news reports, at least one man who was found innocent after all got less assistance putting his life back together than most men who are guilty. His life all but completely destroyed by a false accuser, he found himself without jobs, without prospects, without needed medication, and without a place to live. Surely compassion and justice call for more than that for a man who wound up having to prove his own innocence?

Our news department also reported a few weeks ago that Senator John McCain apparently did something right. Unfortunately, as Bob O'Hara sadly notes, Senator McCain failed to follow up with any effective action or even statement that would have made his seemingly bold stance meaningful. Disappointing, Senator, disappointing.

Also, while you'd think that by 2013 we should not still be debating this, but apparently it's necessary, so: a new peer reviewed study has once again proven that circumcision of male infants is cruel and damaging mutilation, period. No, it doesn't matter if you don't mind your own circumcision. I mind mine, and I'm not alone in that, so if you want your dick chopped, gentleman, do it when you turn 18, and you women can just shut the fuck up because you have no right to a say in it at all.

Paul Elam notes that Men's Human Rights Activist Sung Jae-gi is dead, and his compatriots have shamed him. When I first read the story I thought to excuse this because of S0uth Korean culture. But I wouldn't let my own culture get away with that bullshit, so why would I let anyone else's? Rest in peace, Sung Jae-gi.

In Misandry in psychology part 3, psychotherapist Tom Golden dissects how an entire industry that's supposed to be devoted to helping people often only helps women and demonizes, derides, dismisses, or victim-blames males. Reproductive coercion is something only men do to women right? No actually it's more often the other way around, but why let facts get in the way of a good narrative? Tom Golden also obtained and drew special attention to the work of Indian Men's Human Rights Activist Jerald Santhosh, providing us an introduction and transcript to Men's Suicidal Life. Don't miss that one.

After a long hiatus, AVfM's publisher and evil overlord Paul Elam returns with a barnburner called I'll decide if you were raped, not you. This of course caused a firestorm of anger and rage in a lot of people, but do you think any of those who were angry ever read this or this? Yeah. One of the things we've consistently found on A Voice for Men, which is why we do things the way we do, is that sipmly analyzing the facts doesn't make a dent with people, so, if they won't hear men's pain we'll make sure they feel men's anger. It would be nice to live in a world where that wasn't the necessary course of action but until then, FTSU FTW!

AVfM Editor-At-Large and Domestic Violence Policy Advisor Erin Pizzey returns with a reprint of Chapter 4 of her classic suppressed book Prone to Violence. It's extremely difficult reading but it should not surprise anybody that it was suppressed; the Gender Ideologue-dominated Domestic Violence industry doesn't want you reading it, it would be a threat to their livelihoods. I mean, it shouldn't be, but the idea that they might have to help male victims and do something about female perpetrators on a wide scale is really threatening, and they'd rather shut people like Erin up. Good thing we aren't letting them, huh?

Angry feminists appear to be targeting a lecture on boys education up in the city of Edmonton in Canada. We expect members of Men's Rights Edmonton to be there on the lookout for any violence from the feminists, and we hope you can make it too. Della Burton will likely be helping us to provide coverage of the event in cooperation and solidarity with Men's Rights Edmonton.

Speaking of Della Burton, we're starting to think she just may be all right. She's been doing terrific work, and that includes her latest, Gender disparity in criminal court. What, you mean it's not just men who've noticed that women get off lightly in our criminal justice system–in a way that looks suspiciously like what some might call female privilege?

By the way, in off-site news, Angry Harry has an interesting project he's working on. If you're into video work, you might want to check it out.

As usual, our radio station has all sorts of current and upcoming shows you'll want to check out (I hope you'll join me and Erin this Saturday, for example), and our video section always has something going on in it.

So happy trials pardners, have yourself some good reading there, and I'll see you in 7!

Gender disparity in criminal court

Hannah Wallen · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A study by Sonja Starr, an assistant law professor at the University of Michigan found that within the United States' justice system, women generally receive much more lenient treatment over the same crimes.

> This study finds dramatic unexplained gender gaps in federal criminal cases. Conditional on arrest offense, criminal history, and other pre-charge observables, men receive 63% longer sentences on average than women do. Women are also significantly likelier to avoid charges and convictions, and twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted. There are large unexplained gaps across the sentence distribution, and across a wide variety of specifications, subsamples, and estimation strategies. The data cannot disentangle all possible causes of these gaps, but they do suggest that certain factors (such as childcare and offense roles) are partial but not complete explanations, even combined.

Other research has confirmed Starr's findings. Jill K Donner stated in her report, Explaining the Gender Gap in Sentencing Outcomes: An Investigation of Differential Treatment in U.S. Federal Courts

> Overall, the findings of the current study are consistent with those of past research on gender and sentencing in dictating that female defendants are sentenced to less severe sentence outcomes than similarly situated male defendants, even after controlling for legal, extralegal, and contextual factors. In addition, the current study found that gender weighed differently across offense type, type of sentencing departure, and racial/ethnic category. Also, extralegal factors were found to influence defendants differently when the sample was partitioned into individual gender groups.

In the course of investigating explanations previously offered to justify the disparity, Starr found that even combined, the factors described couldn't account for the majority of the difference. She noted that the most prevalent arguments weren't solid, and even treating them as such, each only accounted for small percentages of cases, and each had exclusions.

She looked at criminal reports, including the use of specific criminal codes and officer descriptions. Her research showed that unobserved differences in severity, while not completely ruled out, aren't supported by evidence as a major cause for the disparity.

She found that criminal history, attitude, and cooperativeness couldn't explain the gap, citing a 2004 study which found that "other factors equal, reported crimes with female offenders are substantially less likely to lead to arrests, results that they interpret to show police leniency toward women."

Challenges to culpability on the basis that women were charged as accessories to male crimes also couldn't explain away a significant portion of the gap, and Starr noted that the "girlfriend argument" explains nothing about single-perpetrator crimes.

Looking into the argument of family hardship, she found evidence of gender-discrimination that favors women, and harms men.

> In short, the family status-gender interaction appears to be more substantial than the one formal legal mechanism for accommodating family hardship can explain. Prosecutors and/or judges seem to use their discretion to accommodate family circumstances in sub rosa ways—but not for male defendants. Among single men, conditional on observables, having children significantly increases sentences, and among married men, children make no significant difference.

She also looked at arguments citing life circumstances such as addiction, mental illness, or abusive environments.

> Together, all such cited bases for departures explain only between 1 and 2% of the otherwise-unexplained gap in sentence length; they are too rare too explain more. If prosecutors or judges take such factors into account in informal ways (as they seem to with family hardship, above), it would be unobservable.

If factors related to crimes and their perpetrators are not the main causes of the gender gap in sentencing, why does it exist? One clue to this is in Starr's explanation for differences between her study, and studies which showed a narrower gap. She wrote in her report that previous studies may not have shown such a sharp difference because they had not looked at the role of plea bargains and other pre-sentencing steps in the criminal justice system. The difference this makes is in the role of prosecutorial influence.

> The United States in effect has a system of negotiated justice, and prosecutors hold most of the chips. They have broad discretion to choose charges from numerous overlapping criminal statutes, and then to determine the terms of plea deals. Plea-bargaining does not necessarily focus mainly on dropping of charges—indeed, the lead charge was dropped only 17% of the time in this study's sample. The parties also often negotiate stipulations to key "sentencing facts"—for instance, the quantity of drugs trafficked or the defendant's major or minor role in a conspiracy. The prosecutor also may make non-binding sentencing recommendations or request special leniency to reward cooperators.

She also points out that prosecutors' gender bias can stem from the importance of public relations.

> Prosecutors have a variety of incentives to balance, including career incentives that push toward maximizing sentences and resource constraints that discourage going to trial (see, for example, Baker and Mezzetti 2001; Easterbrook 1983). In addition, prosecutors may be affected by sympathy or a sense of fairness. Schulhofer and Nagel (1997) review federal prosecutors' case files and find evidence of deliberate charge manipulation to avoid excessive sentences. Prosecutorial discretion is often described as the power not to seek to maximize punishment—to be selectively lenient (see Stith 2008). Although there may be good policy reasons for allowing such discretion, it is a potential source of unwarranted disparity if it is influenced by legally irrelevant factors such as gender.

To put it simply, putting a woman on trial can be a public relations nightmare for a prosecutor, who is faced with a defendant who may damsel for both jury and public sympathy, painting herself as a victim of prosecutorial bullying. Not only can prosecuting a vulnerable seeming woman backfire by leading to acquittal due to sympathy, it can also come back to haunt the prosecutor during an election.

Why would only prosecuting female criminals create bad PR and not male criminals? Doesn't the public want to be protected regardless of with whom the criminal activity originates?

That depends on which public you're asking.

The National Organization for Women has actively promoted some of the myths surrounding gender disparity in sentencing, as shown in in this summer 2001 blog post about population increases in women's prisons. The article mixes description of real issues (prison rape) with claims that women commit crimes only as accessories to male criminals, and uses an anecdotal description to suggest that female criminal behavior is a result of abuse by a man. The article goes on to lament that incarceration separates mothers from their children, a concern NOW hasn't shown for imprisoned fathers in their advocacy for increases in prosecution of men unable to keep up with child support obligations, and against shared custody proposals made by fathers' rights groups. Feminist logic: female drug dealers are good and valuable parents, but fathers are disposable… except for their wallets.

Guidelines handed down in the UK in 2010 admonished judges to go easier on female offenders. In 2011 a UK Women's Justice Task Force report offered the suggestion that women's prisons in the UK be replaced with community service and mental health treatment. While the research done by the group making the suggestion is of interest, there is nothing in it to suggest that it is applicable only to women… yet the suggestion has not been extended to apply to male offenders.

In contrast, feminist activism in the U.S. led to the enactment of the Violence Against Women act, a law written to address a gender-neutral problem as if women were the only victims, and men the only perpetrators. VAWA contains federal financial incentives for policies to promote mandatory arrest, prosecution, conviction, sentencing, and sentence enforcement. The same group that thinks punitive imprisonment for female offenders is unfair and cruel has no problem with a law that incentivize false accusations against men, and places them at risk for wrongful conviction and false imprisonment.

Feminists claim that an anti-discrimination clause added in 2012 makes the law gender-neutral despite its overwhelming prevalence of female-specific language for victims, and male-specific language for perpetrators. However, from 1994 through 2012, the wording and the law's enforcement followed a male-perpetrator, female victim model that led to greatly increased arrests and incarceration of men without demonstrably affecting the prevalence of partner violence in the United States. In addition, the theory that the non-discrimination clause applies to enforcement and not just services has yet to be demonstrated.

If, as feminists argue, harsh, long sentences for men are right because the point of the penal system is to protect the public by deterring would-be criminals and containing those who are not deterred, what does the gender disparity say about female criminals and their victims?

Are experiences of crime victims less important if their perpetrators are women?

Does society think women less possessed of the self-control necessary to keep their behavior within the bounds of the law? Isn't women having less culpability an indication of less capability?

If that's what it means, but it isn't right, why aren't feminists actively lobbying for reform? Where is the letter-writing campaign demanding more lenient handling of male criminals, or more harsh handling of female criminals? Where is the massive, heavily attended perp-walk to protest unequal treatment by law enforcement, prosecutors, judges, and juries?

Given that feminist advocates have argued for lenient treatment for female convicts, it's unlikely that they'll also advocate that all convicts should be treated equally if it means women would face the same heavy sentences as men.

If, as feminists argue, harsh, long sentences for women are wrong because they're cruel punishment that is undeserved and doesn't achieve rehabilitation, what does this gender disparity say about the way we treat male criminals?

Are they less valuable than women… so much that society can accept treating them like trash when women who do the same things are considered redeemable?

Is it that men are considered so much smarter, more reliable, and generally better than women that society must hold them to a higher standard, and require greater retribution when they fall from it?

If criminal sentencing is a human rights issue when dealing with female convicts, why can't the same be recognized when the convicts are men?

Are some humans more human than others?

MHRA Sung Jae-gi dead

Paul Elam · 29 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sung Jae-gi, the head of a men's human rights advocacy group in Seoul, South Korea is apparently dead after an attempt to raise money gone wrong.

Sung went missing after jumping (or possibly falling) from the Mapo Bridge into the Han River. According to other members of his group, the jump was a stunt designed to encourage people to donate 100 million won to his group (about $10,000 American Dollars).

His wife reportedly knew of the plan in advance, as did a Seoul news reporter who filmed the incident.

That is a summary of the facts that are on hand right now. You can read the news account here.

While all the facts of this story are yet to be gathered, and may well be buried after the standard treatment from the mainstream media, this solemn moment does provoke some thoughts in me that I am not going to wait to share.

First, Sung's death, while tragic, is not out of the ordinary save for the circumstances of how it happened. This is the corner men are in because our voices are deemed savagely "privileged". Our voices are laughed at and derided and ignored until it gives us the likes of Thomas James Ball; until it gives us Earl Silverman.

Though it appears from all aspects of this story that Sung Jae-gi did not intend to take his life, it is clear that he must have known there was a risk. He was willing to take that risk for the cause in which he believed.

It may count for little. They have dragged the river for three days, failing to find his remains. The society in which he lived will similarly turn up empty nets in its pursuit of understanding why he died. That is the tragedy that we bleed for every day here. It is the social sickness we try to correct; to give meaning to the likes of Ball, Silverman and Sung.

Sadly, we also find that we struggle within ourselves. In that is our shame.

An official of Sung's group who was present at the incident, Han Seung-oh, disgraced his fellows and the cause for which Sung gave his life by apologizing after it happened.

"We are very sorry for causing such a fuss," said Han, "but his jump was not a suicide but a stunt to draw public attention."

I read that and my heart sank. How sad that Sung spent his final moments in the company of such a coward.

Do I think that his idea to jump from that bridge was advisable? No. Is it something that I would recommend to any MHRA in order to draw attention to the cause or raise money? Again, no, I would not. Never put your life at risk. I think too many men have already risked, and too many have lost to expend even one more life on any of this.

But the only apology due anyone in this godforsaken mess is Sung Jae-gi, the man driven to desperate means to call attention to problems in a society so depraved and ignorant that they will not know of or care about what he died for.

He deserves an apology from our society. And he deserves an apology from Han Seung-oh, who could have, and should have, seized that moment to demand that his culture to look directly and fearlessly into why his friend lost his life. Instead he failed him, and everything he stood for.

Sung Jae-gi took a risk, perhaps an excessive one, for what he believed. But at least he was willing to risk. It is a heartbreaking loss, made meaningless by those around him who crumbled like paper tigers when it counted. This is not a movement with a border, though. We won't even be dissuaded by the imaginary barrier of language. We can stand up where others let him down.

And we will.

I am not a praying man, but if I was I would surely hit my knees and plead with God that Sung's wife, who knew of his plans, does a better job in honoring what he believed in. Just as we will honor him in the days ahead.

Tip of the hat to Diana Davison for assistance with this story.

Help me stop Mary Kellett

Henry Ross · 30 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The war against men will only stop if we stand up and fight. We must make our collective voices heard by politicians and the legal community so they know we are aware of their blatant and disgusting agenda to destroy men. They must know that if it's a fight they want, it's a fight they will get. We will send the clear message that boys and men matter, and we will resist any loss of constitutional rights based on misandric policies. It is time, for the future of our sons and grandsons, for us to make a difference.

Everyone is well aware that Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett admitted her guilt in one of the worst displays of play-acting I have ever seen. Giving her the Golden Raspberry Award and a high-five was Justice Ellen Gorman, who suspended her 30 day sentence so that she could take some continuing education classes to address her ethical lapses. "Let the Golden Raspberry Award serve as a lesson and a motive for you to learn to hide your agenda better," should have been what Justice Ellen Gorman told Mary Kellett behind closed doors.

There is a very clear agenda and in a future post I will explain the how, what, when, and why. But now, we need your help. We need everyone to make your voices heard: we are watching and won't take it any more. I emailed the following letter to the Cumberland County Supreme Court Justice, Ellen A. Gorman (ellen.a.gorman@courts.maine.gov). It is imperative that we flood this email box with complaint letters. I am hoping you will all fight for the cause and help put an end to the misandric secret court practices.

[box]Justice Gorman,

It is imperative that you look at the Mary Kellett plea deal with suspicion. Neither Bar Counsel Scott Davis nor Ronald Lupton has provided you with the full story. In fact, you have been downright deceived. The truth of the matter is that the current legal system in Maine is corrupt right down to its core, the Maine State Bar Association. Maine already has a very long and storied reputation for corrupt public officials as documented in StateIntegrity.Org and Centerforethics.Org.

Vladek Filler is not the first victim of Mary Kellett, nor has he been the last. I have personally investigated hundreds of cases that Mary Kellett has dealt with, including grievances filed with the Maine State Bar Association against Mary Kellett that Scott Davis has tossed out as irrelevant. There is also a pending lawsuit against the Hancock County DA's office and Mary Kellett for the wrongful death of a man falsely accused of domestic violence which resulted in his suicide. Unfortunately, most attorneys fear political repercussions and sanctions that come from challenging the Maine State Bar Association – the hand that feeds them – so, the lawsuit has stalled.

There are many victims of Mary Kellett that have left the state of Maine in fear of being dragged through the mud again on trumped-up charges that are both baseless and defective. Even if these victims were able to find the courage to challenge her and the status quo in the Maine legal system, would Scott Davis even entertain the idea of putting on his big boy pants, standing up to the obvious cronyism that exists in the Maine legal system, and ending the misandric practices that have been hidden from the Maine public for decades?

Domestic violence advocates constantly argue that there are countless silent victims of sexual assault perpetrated by men against women who will never receive justice unless every case can go forward by the State, using only the accusation by the women to prosecute men. This essentially is Mary Kellett's philosophy as well. By doing this, innocent men's lives are purposely and irrevocably destroyed for the sake of an agenda contrary to every citizen's fundamental constitutional right to due process and the presumption of innocence.

By allowing Mary Kellett to continue to practice law, you allow her to continue targeting the countless silent male victims of prosecutorial misconduct for the sake of the alleged countless silent victims of sexual assault. Can you explain to me how this isn't trading one for the other?

As Mary Kellett read her prepared speech, monotone and lacking remorse, she apologized to the court to save her job but never once did she turn around and acknowledge her mistakes to Vladek Filler. It was you who, out-of-place, apologized to Vladek Filler. This does not show that Mary Kellett has indeed learned from her mistakes and doesn't intend to target men in the future. These mistakes include but are not limited to:

Stephen Kane http://bangordailynews.com/2012/06/22/news/bucksport-man-acquitted-of-sex-charges-against-young-girl/

Mark Colantonio http://bangordailynews.com/2012/06/20/news/pennsylvania-man-acquitted-of-sexual-assault-charges-against-teen-in-bar-harbor/

Joseph Audette http://bangordailynews.com/2011/11/18/news/hancock/state-court-lifts-restrictions-on-ex-deer-isle-stonington-school-employee-accused-of-child-porn/

Keovilaisack Sayasane: Not only did Mary Kellett fabricate a story that he killed his ex-wife so that his current wife would testify against him, according to Michelle Sayasane (current wife), Mary Kellett threatened to have her children placed in child protective services custody unless she did testify. http://bangordailynews.com/2011/08/18/news/hancock/blue-hill-man-seeks-case-dismissal-over-bad-information-from-prosecutors/ and http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/my-ordeal-with-mary-kellett/

Joshua Busby http://bangordailynews.com/2009/12/10/news/mdi-man-acquitted-of-rape/

Raymond Currier http://bangordailynews.com/2009/05/15/news/jury-clears-man-of-abuse-charges/

Attorney Jeff Toothaker defended and won many of these cases. In response to losing too many cases against Toothaker, the Hancock County D.A.'s office hired Mr. Toothaker's wife to work in their office. This is a clear and repulsive conflict of interest. It is just another example of the judicial corruption that is plaguing the state of Maine.

These are just some of the many victims of Mary Kellett. There are many more. In court, you stated that since the Vladek Filler case was just one isolated incident and Mary Kellett's only mark on her record, you were going to approve the recommendation for the 30 days suspended sentence. However, if there were more grievances brought against her, then you would reconsider her bar license.

I plan to assist 2 other victims in filing grievances against Mary Kellett within the next 60 days. I am hoping that since your words are on record, you were serious in rectifying the current problems of the legal system instead of making them worse. I also hope that Mr. Scott Davis will take action against future grievances against Mary Kellett instead of merely discarding them.

To quote Judge Edith Jones, U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals, "American Legal System is corrupt beyond recognition."

Justice Gorman, which side of history do you want to be on?

Sincerely,

A concerned citizen who is also worried about political repercussions from fighting a corrupt system.[/box]

Feel free to contact me at HenryRoss2012@yahoo.com

Editor's note: feature image by James Cridland. –PW

AVFM News & Activism: Free-for-All 3

James Huff · 30 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we will not be have a guest, but Robert O'Hara and James Huff will be bringing you the latest news and commentary. We will be taking calls as well from those who want to air a variety of topics or discuss the news stories we will be covering.

Join us for tonight's free for all.

The call in number is 310-388-9709. Show time is at 9pm Eastern time, 6pm Pacific. Which is 2am July 31st London time.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

West Virginia harassing father & publisher

VFM News and Commentary · 30 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hallburn Convicted, Files Appeal

Lawrence Allows State To Violate Subpoena

Mark Hallburn

Putnam*LIVE*.com Publisher Mark Hallburn is appealing his misdemeanor conviction of Interfering with a Government Agency after his July 19, 2013 trial in front of Putnam County Magistrate Scot A. Lawrence. (Editorial Update: The Appeal hearing now set for Aug 7)

"This is a travesty," says Hallburn. "In Putnam County, 'Prior Restraint' has replaced The First Amendment as the law of our land. Reporters are allowed to be harassed by government officials who do not want to be exposed. This is a blatant attack on Freedom of the Press and the public's right to know about government spending and conduct."

Hallburn says he knew he was in trouble with Lawrence from the beginning.

"First he banned cameras from the courtroom," recalls Hallburn. "Judges that are fair and believe in transparency and Freedom of the Press don't ban cameras. Then he refused to dismiss the case despite the health department's failure to produce a single document that was legally subpoenaed. As I said, this is a travesty. I was railroaded."

Joel M. McKinney
Hallburn was arrested April 2nd, 2013, after he appeared for a confirmed appointment at the Putnam County Health Department to review financial documents showing that the department is hundreds of thousands of dollars in debt.

PutnamL*IVE*.com's Freedom of Information Act Request was emailed to the department March 18th, 2013 after then Administrator Joel M. McKinney failed to return calls.

> Mr. McKinney:
>
> This is an official Freedom of Information Act request to review ALL of the Putnam County Health Department's financial records dating back to 2010. These include invoices, receipts, building lease agreements, contracts, payments to attorney Karen Miller, payroll records, bills, past due notices, and all other financial documents not specified here. We have heard that PCHD is behind in rent, payroll, and other bills. I also request to review all PCHD vehicle mileage logs and maintenance records and gasoline payments/bills, etc., et al.
>
> You have failed to return multiple telephone calls and your staff (needlessly) called the Putnam County Sheriff's Department when I have VIDEO RECORDINGS of me POLITELY asking to speak to you while seated inside my car. This video was shown to the deputy who quickly realized that I HAD NOT committed a crime or threatened your staff as was FALSELY alleged.
>
> You have five business days to respond to this request. Please respond to me at this email address to mutually set up the time for me and my associate to come and view these records.
>
> Mark Halburn
> Publisher
> PutnamLIVE.com
> 304-415-6397
>
> cc: Steve Deweese, Putnam County Sheriff

Lawrence sentenced Hallburn to 45 days in jail, all of which is stayed by the De Novo appeal of the case. No hearing date has been set as of this publication.

Putnam County Magistrate Scot A. Lawrence.

“Magistrates take oaths of office to uphold the law,” says Hallburn. “The United States Constitution is the highest law of our land. Lawrence and Sorsaia know better than to rule against or take action against the press and the Constitution.” Hallburn plans to file a complaint with the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission against Lawrence and Sorsaia with the West Virginia Office of Disciplinary Counsel.

McKinney has yet to comply with the Freedom of Information Act Request, Lawrence has yet to order McKinney to comply, and Putnam County Prosecutor Mark A. Sorsaia has refused to prosecute McKinney for failing to comply which is no surprise as Sorsaia has a long history of allowing Putnam County officials to break West Virginia’s Freedom of Information Act law.

Like the Judge Watkins fiasco, this court case is gaining national attention

“This is another example of big brother and big government,” says Robert M. Werner, of Fathers For Justice.com of Florida and New York. “Mark Hallburn is being persecuted and falsely imprisoned. These actions are unacceptable by our government when they are not conforming to rules. The Fathers For Justice organization is gearing up to bring light to the very negative situation and to make the people aware of the corruption. We cannot tolerate Big Brother falsely imprisoning a fellow citizen who is solely doing its job. This government needs to understand that this will not be tolerated.”

“Based upon my review of the information in my possession, it appears to me that the sanctions imposed are excessive and clearly disproportionate to the alleged offense. The thought that comes to mind is there are retaliatory elements comprising the sanctions that have been imposed,” says R.K. Hendrick of Friends of Protection for Men, Portland, Oregon.

“It’s pretty clear to me from our investigations not just in the Hallburn case but in other cases we’ve covered that the West Virginia judicial system is full of people who routinely abuse their power, especially if someone makes the mistake of giving them a gavel and a robe,” says Dean Esmay, of AVoiceForMen.com. “The persecution of Hallburn is egregious, but it’s symptomatic of a wider problem of lack of respect for basic civil rights, especially for men, that seems to permeate the entire state.”

Lawrence, Sorsaia, Putnam County Commissioner/Former Putnam County Health Board Member Raymond “Joe” Haynes, and Watkins are all Republicans. “Is that a coincidence?” asks Hallburn, “Are they sticking together for political reasons? I don’t think that’s a coincidence.”

Hallburn stated in court that the Putnam County Health Department “self-reported” $216,000 in debt. “We still haven’t seen those documents. How do we know that the debt isn’t double the $216,000. Do we simply trust the department to be honest with the taxpayers? I don’t. I want to see the real documents. But Deputy Savilla and Magistrate Lawrence got suckered by McKinney and are keeping the people from knowing the truth.”

Meanwhile, Hallburn is filing a 18-point Motion for Reconsideration with Lawrence. “Once he looks at the facts and points, a reversal is obviously the only fair and just option,” says Hallburn.

The points are:

1. The state failed to comply with a single element of the subpoena. McKinney failed to supply any documentation from the Health Department’s IT employee and/or contractor or anyone else to back up his obviously false testimony that he has no ability to acquire any emails, notes, memos, et al, etc. If such documents have since been destroyed (because the health department closed) then the department is guilty of destroying evidence that was legally and properly subpoenaed. The case should have been dismissed on this issue alone.
2. McKinney’s comments, including, “I just wanted him out of my hair” indicate that he had no intention of ever cooperating with Mark Halburn and the Freedom of Information Act. His body language and tone of voice strongly indicated his contempt for Mark Halburn and the duties of the press.
3. McKinney’s testimony that Mark was in the building “for hours” contradicts all other witness statements of a 10-15 minute time frame. (Sheriff Steve Deweese and the West Virginia State Police have been asked to arrest McKinney on a perjury charge).

4. Trena Smith indicated that Mark was told that he could call for his appointment to review records and contradicted McKinney's testimony.
5. Halburn wasn't in the building long enough to be a disruption to anyone.
6. Halburn never entered a restricted area and was only in front of the reception desk or in the waiting area or elevator. These are clearly public areas.
7. The court failed to acknowledge that Halburn attempted to communicate with McKinney by email but that McKinney's email system failed to work properly.
8. Halburn was told that appointments could be made by telephone and properly complied-after it was discovered that McKinney's email failed to work properly.
9. Halburn was arrested for trespassing. The charge was later changed to cover up a false arrest. The state is making up the rules as it goes along.
10. The First Amendment of the United States Constitution makes no requirement that appointments be made to review government documents-let alone by email. Code 29(b) does not require that appointments be made by email.
11. The April 1 document the McKinney refers to, the discusses email, only states that FOIA "Requests" are required to be made by email or letter. It says NOTHING about the appointment time to review documents which is what is in question here.
12. Trena Smith testified that Mark Halburn showed up at a time other than what was designated during the appointment times stated by McKinney. However, she indicated that he was there at a time that was within those time frames. She contradicted herself and is a witness with no credibility.
13. The state failed to provide a single customer witness to backup the false claims that customers could not do business while Halburn was in the office.
14. Other than to state that Halburn was "loud" the state failed to testify that he used abusive or vulgar language. The only statement that was made was that he repeated Cary Eden's first name. Nothing that Mark Halburn said or did was illegal in any way, shape or form.
15. Mr. Halburn was leaving the building when he was arrested and planned to file the appropriate paperwork. However, he was intercepted before he could file his appeal of the FOIA violation in circuit court.
16. The court ignored testimony that Mark Halburn is deaf in one ear and has a naturally loud voice. Having a loud voice is not illegal. At no point did anyone testify that Mark Halburn screamed at anyone.
17. Every state witness contradicted themselves and each other. As such, all testimony should be discounted and dismissed completely.
18. It is obvious that Putnam County Health Department officials have no respect for the press and are guilty of Prior Restraint to cover up the mismanagement of the department and its finances that have resulted in the closure of the department.

Hallburn's Putnam County Magistrate Court case number is: 13C, 607.
Related:

PCHD Harasses Publisher
Publisher's note: All defendants are presumed innocent unless proven guilty in a court of law.

A criminal complaint is a legal document that is usually filled out by a law enforcement officer presenting evidence to a judge or magistrate. The judicial official determines if the officer has provided enough evidence to issue a complaint or a warrant for a suspect arrest.

Mug shots are provided courtesy of the West Virginia Regional Jail Authority.

Not all feminists are like that

John Hembling (JtO) · 30 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

NAFALT! However, feminism is a movement seeking equality. We know this because we've been told by feminists, over and over and over. Also, not all feminists are like that

Lake tantrum: James Mongiat is wrong

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 31 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger Warning: If you are married to a mentally unstable, emotionally immature woman who abuses alcohol, the following video may induce acute anxiety, flashbacks and/or a feeling of unease and foreboding. On the other hand, if you have broken up with or divorced a woman who exhibits the following behavior, you may feel a great sense of relief that you got the hell out. If so, good on you!

In the tantrum seen 'round the world, James Mongiat told his wife, Whitney Mongiat, that she was behaving like an 11-year old who didn't get the toy she wanted at Wal-Mart.

James Mongiat is wrong.

Based on Whitney's temper tantrum, she seems more like a 4-year old than an 11-year old emotional maturity wise.

In case you haven't seen the video yet, here it is (if you're at work you may want to lower the volume or pop in some ear buds*):

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=PEPoO08IMog#at=14

To drive home the point of what you just witnessed, please watch this:

And this:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=player_embedded&v=WjA_EBHsfzI

And this:

Whitney's behavior is no different than the behavior of the children in the above videos except that Whitney is a 30-year old woman.

James Mongiat's video has generated quite the hullabaloo in the court of public opinion. Even though I should know better by now, I have been astonished at the number of women and some men who are rationalizing and excusing Whitney's behavior and excoriating James for filming her temper tantrum. Comments defending Whitney boil down to:

1. James set her up.
2. James provoked her.
3. James was bullying Whitney and the tantrum was her reaction to being bullied.
4. James is a passive-aggressive narcissist.
5. James is a monster for ridiculing her while she was having an anxiety attack.
6. James is wrong for posting her private behavior publicly.

It is unlikely James set Whitney up. If this tantrum behavior was an anomaly for Whitney there would be no video because James could not have anticipated her behavior. The fact that he was ready to record her full-on brat attack tells me her tantrum is nothing out of the ordinary.

In fact, what James did is a great example of ABR (always be recording), which I recommend every man do who is married to or dating an abusive woman. With someone who behaves like Whitney, it's usually not a matter of if she's going to go off, but when she's going to go off.

James did not provoke Whitney. He told her, "No." The only people who are "provoked" by being told, "No," are typically spoiled children, the personality disordered, bullies and/or sociopaths. Reasonably healthy adults don't lose our shit when we're told, "No." We may feel disappointed, frustrated or even angry, but we don't resort to nursery school tactics to get our way.

By the way, for those of you in the dating pool, this is a classic red flag. If a woman or man acts like this when you tell them, "No," hit the eject button. Adults do not have histrionic meltdowns because they have to do chores instead of getting to lake and bake.

James did not bully Whitney. Whitney and her mother claim Whitney acted that way because she felt "bullied" by James. Again, telling someone, "No," is not a form of bullying. Unless, of course, the bullying takes the form if, "No!!! I will not stop screaming and carrying on until you do what I want!!!!"

Additionally, if Whitney had truly been consistently bullied by James and was afraid of him, she would not have pulled that crap. Not once, not ever.

James is probably not a passive-aggressive narcissist. James did not lose his cool at any time during the entire incident. He told Whitney, "No," maintained his boundary and very directly called her out on her nonsense. She did not negotiate with James by saying, for example, "If I help you get the chores done on the list today, can we go to the lake after?" or "Okay, let's get everything done today so we can enjoy the lake together tomorrow."

Instead Whitney kept escalating the volume of her temper tantrum. This is what bullies and abusers do. They increase the pressure and noxious behaviors until you submit. James did not act like a passive-aggressive narcissist. He stood his ground and told Whitney exactly what he was going to do and why. If anything, James seemed like a half-exasperated/half-amused parent watching his toddler pitch a fit, which is precisely what Whitney was doing.

Whitney was not having an anxiety attack. I have worked with people who genuinely suffer from Generalized Anxiety Disorder and panic attacks. When they're in the midst of an attack they're typically in no condition to be slurping down a Starbucks Refresher drink and texting and Facebooking what mean a-holes their husbands are for not taking them out for a day on the lake.

At the 1:00 mark in the video when she says, "I'm gettin' ank-shuss!" it sounds as if she's trying to suppress laughter. I don't buy for one second that she was having anxiety. The tantrum was nothing more than a manipulation tactic. Some kids know full well if they carry on long enough their parents will relent and let them have their way just to get some peace and quiet — just like Whitney.

James is not wrong for posting her private behavior publicly, but it may land him in hot water in divorce court. Even a half-witted divorce attorney will probably be able to flip this around and make him look like the bad guy. Never mind that Whitney seems to have a habit of complaining about her husband to her friends on Facebook – a public forum. Seems only fair that James gets to have his say.

From the interviews I've read with Whitney and her mother, they both claim to be embarrassed — not by her behavior, but that it was exposed publicly. [Insert extreme eye roll.] As Kevin K so succinctly stated on the Shrink4Men Facebook page, "As usual, these people are more concerned about getting caught than being concerned about how they're acting." Bingo, Kev.

More men should document this kind of behavior. Oftentimes, it's the only way people will believe them that their wife or girlfriend really is that bad. Yes, it would have been better for them to resolve their issues privately, but therein lies the problem. If Whitney's behavior in the video is a regular occurrence, then throwing tantrums, having rage-outs and trash talking her husband are how she "solves" problems. In other words, problems don't get resolved and the bad behavior continues to escalate.

In fact, if enough men document their girlfriends and wives behaving like this, it could become a spin-off of the Girls Gone Wild! franchise — maybe Women Gone Child!

Nah. Who the hell would enjoy watching that?

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

Addendum: Dr. T and Paul Elam will be broadcasting a special episode of Man, Woman, Truth Radio tomorrow at 8 pm Central time on Blog Talk Radio where we will interview James Mongiat about the video and about his marriage to Whitney. Watch for the announcement.

Cathy Young clutches pearls at AVFM

Paul Elam · 31 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Cathy Young is an opinion writer of some notoriety. Among other subjects over the years she has written often on the issues faced by men and boys, and from a decidedly empathetic angle. As such I have seen her name mentioned, as I have done myself, frequently and favorably in the men's rights community.

Given the recent uptick in mainstream media attention to men's issues it is hardly surprising that she would be addressing the subject again. It is not even surprising that she would reference A Voice for Men.

In an opinion piece today for the Boston Globe, Young summarizes many of the problems faced by men, calls out feminist inattention and denial of those problems and reiterates the need for more a thoughtful approach than society has yet to muster. She then addresses the efforts of A Voice for Men:

> Unfortunately, any movement championing one gender seems doomed to devolve into victim politics and demonization of the other sex. Some leading men's rights websites such as A Voice for Men offer a steady diet of vulgar woman-bashing that discredits any valid points they may make.

First, allow me to make use of my copy and paste function to assert, yet again, that A Voice for Men does not offer a steady diet, or even a reduced calorie version, of woman-bashing, which partly explains why Young relied on the allegation of such rather than providing an example, or, better yet, linking her readers to such an example so they could see what she had a problem with in context.

After years of condemning feminism's hypocrisies and eloquently stating men's issues, Young just played the misogyny card, true to the feminist playbook.

A Voice for Men has a longstanding tradition of offering unapologetic, but thoughtful critique of men and women, and what has become of them in modern culture. It is a subject that would appear almost obligatory given the current climate in sexual politics. That critique is delivered about both sexes, and by both sexes, from many different walks of life, something Young also fails to mention. Reducing the opinions of those men and women to just another example of online misogyny is not only shallow and thoughtless, it is dishonest.

It leaves one to only speculate about Young's motives for such an assessment, which does not interest me personally enough to pursue. What I am interested in, however, is the hypocrisy.

As a writer on men's issues, Young has addressed essentially the same subjects as this website over the past several years: father's rights, false accusations, male reproductive rights, workplace mortality, male suicide, legal discrimination, educational disenfranchisement and other issues. She lends legitimacy to most or all of them, even in the same article in which she dismisses A Voice for Men as misogynistic. She equally laments the social ignorance surrounding these issues, and the feminist ideologues whose raison d'être it is to perpetuate that ignorance.

It appears that Cathy Young is all well and good about protesting the treatment of men and looking for solutions.

Unless we forget our place and get all uppity about it.

This is the kind of arm's length, insincere social justice that Young has just shown herself to practice to every man and woman out there who are actually hurt by these problems. She is fine with men's issues over latte and scones and polite conversation. But the moment we start to offend with our anger; the moment we start to react to these issues for what they really are: men being bled out on the streets as the general public, annoyed at the inconvenience, steps over their bodies, Cathy Young has a problem with it and wants us to shut the fuck up.

I'm sorry, was that vulgar?

I am afraid you will have to get used to it. I am also quite certain that sending people to A Voice for Men for the first time, some of which will actually figure out they have been lied to, is not a very good way to prove you have a reason to be haughty. A Voice for Men has grown exponentially on just that sort of irrational, false allegation. We are accustomed to it coming from feminist ideologues, but will happily accept it from those whose interest in men and boys is positive, but restricted to a paycheck and a pat on the back.

Here's the deal, for the likes and Cathy Young and others who claim to support positive changes for men and boys, but who then clutch pearls and pinch their noses closed in fake fits of nobility over straight talk, harsh language and defiant rhetoric:

You have had your chance to draw attention to these problems, and failed.

Miserably.

This society has made the evisceration of men and boys business as usual. Polite social pontificators, well-meaning, well-paid public speakers and the like are sometimes a refreshing respite from the onslaught of misandry and the overt demonization of men and boys. But are they changing the social climate in any way? What change has Cathy Young fostered? And, to be blunt, what has she accomplished other than enhancing her career?

If you want to point the finger at people about discrediting their own valid points, it is best not to do so while standing on a foundation of opportunism, empty rhetoric and hypocrisy.

At A Voice for Men we serve a community of men already bleeding, with knives already in their backs. We serve the women and children who love them and care about them enough that they want more than fluff and Pablum from social commentators who ultimately don't give a damn about the outcome.

If we are a little, uh, provocative and rude, then you have a choice. You can ridicule us for not using the back entrance and the correct water fountain as instructed – which Cathy Young has just done. Or, you can attack the fact that marginalized, ignored victims of social and legal discrimination have always had a way of becoming annoying to the comfortable masses. That is what they are supposed to do, in case you never deigned to notice.

If you think you can stop that with name-calling and manufactured allegations, you better go back and crack a few history books. They should be very instructive in precisely predicting the worst of scenarios, which you are now helping to foment.

Don't be THAT bitch

Jason Gregory · 31 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

"Misandry isn't a real thing. Misandry is an empty word that doesn't refer to any real thing or any real experiences of men-in-general. Sure. There may be one-off examples of individual women who hate a particular man or men-in-general, but that's not misandry. Unlike misogyny, there are no widely exercised cultural norms that perpetuate misandry, not of the sort that men-in-general would experience. Misandry is simply a made-up word and may as well be the present king of France or the bald emperor of Kentucky." ~Some Douche

If there is any doubt about the existence of misandry within our popular culture, consider some of the blatantly misandric things said by the pop-culture icon, Nicki Minaj. In this article by Gordon Smart, she says that men want to be treated like dogs and that there is nothing wrong with being a bitch to men.

Nicki Minaj: Treat men like dogs

By GORDON SMART, Showbiz Editor

Published: 12th July 2013

NICKI MINAJ thinks men should be treated like dogs.

The rapper said: "Men love independent women. You don't have to be a b*h, but there's nothing wrong with it at times. They want to be nourished and pet like a dog."

But she admits she needs a fella as she wants to be a mum.

Nicki added: "I was praying, 'You know what, Lord? I want to be a mom one day, and I want to start becoming the woman who I want to parent my child'."

Dating tips ... Nicki Minaj

Also consider that in one of Nicki's music videos she had this to say about men.

> Find me da best ass-eater…kiss my ass and my anus 'cos I'm finally famous. Give me all of yo money and all of yo residuals…now suck on my ass!

The prurient talk doesn't bother me. I'm no prude. However, the blatant misandry is troublesome. Her comments are representative of speech that normalizes the dehumanization of men.

If Nicki Minaj wasn't a significant contributor to popular culture, she'd just be a "one-off" example as described above by Some Douche. However, Nicki Minaj is a pop icon with a large fan base of "barbz," as she calls them—her 16+ million twitter followers. Her "ass-eating" video (the one quoted above) has almost 60 million views. She has sold millions of albums and was the first female solo artist to have 7 singles on the Billboard Hot 100, all at the same time. She recently finished up the 12th season of American Idol, serving as a judge.

Clearly, Nicki Minaj is a cultural influence. As such, there are a lot of people who listen to her and there are a lot of people who practically worship her, as if she bestows upon them great misandric words of ass-eating wisdom.

The illiteracy of her fans is irrelevant. They love her and she is "insperation" to many of them as their "Queen Bitch" and Nicki loves her "bad bitches." That's her "fuckin problem," as she barks below in one of her tweets.

Regardless of what you think about her "ass-eating" music, her misandric comments, or her cultural influence, referring to women as "bad bitches" seems dehumanizing to women. Notice how one of the commenters on the Instagram photo below wrote that Nicki is a "horrible example for young kids." However, her bad bitch fans quickly jump in to defend the Queen Bitch, saying that she is an example of success for other bitches…because ass-eating is the pinnacle of success for a Queen Bitch and all her bad bitch followers.

Perhaps I'm simply anthropomorphizing the Queen Bitch and all her bad bitches. Perhaps Queen Bitch Nicki and all her bad bitches really are just a pack of ass-eating dogs?

If that's the case, then I suppose it's my bad for projecting human characteristics on the Queen Bitch Nicki and her bad bitches. Yes, bitches will be bitches, not humans-being. Apologies to the Queen Bitch and her bad bitches for thinking that they might actually be humans-being. I won't make that mistake again, even if the Queen Bitch asserts her humanity and claims to be a "genuine human being," as she does when asked about her role as judge on "American Idol."

> The perception that people had of me completely changed because there are no cue cards, there's no scripts, it wasn't me performing a song…My core is a genuine human being who roots for other people. I didn't want to blow smoke up their ass. I wanted every contestant to leave with something that they could remember.

Funny how she believes that at her core is a "genuine human being" who doesn't want to "blow smoke up" the asses of other people, yet, at the same time, the Queen Bitch takes great pride in being a Queen Bitch who wants others to find for her "da best ass eater." She has moral problems with blowing smoke up somebody's ass, but no problem at all with dehumanizing men as ass-eating dogs—too incompetent to "touch the dishes or wash the clothes," as barked in the tweet below.

Yup, “cleaning is 50/50,” but men shouldn’t be doing dishes or washing clothes. Nope. They should only be cleaning out the Queen Bitch’s asshole, like a good dog, getting every last “cornball” and dingle-berry—paying her with “residuals.” It’s a privilege bestowed upon them by the Queen Bitch. This seems more a 99/1 split against the guy, but Queen Bitch isn’t known for doing math, so I’ll let that math problem slide like a turd off the tongue of an ass-eating dog.

Here are some more misandric turd nugget barkings of ass-eating wisdom from the Queen Bitch’s Twitter account.

Even though it might be "cute," men shouldn't bother with cooking either. Their hands might smell of seasoning. The Queen Bitch prefers her dogs to smell of ass. The smell of seasoning isn't nearly as sexy as the smell of ass, not for the Queen Bitch who prefers the butthole pleasures of "da best ass-eater." Even though these ass-eating dogs may look "cute" while trying to cook, the Queen Bitch's dogs have to learn their boundaries.

The Queen Bitch can't have her dogs straying far from home.

It's important for the Queen Bitch and her bad bitches to train their dogs right, giving them a treat or a scolding accordingly.

Bitches can't have their dogs wandering about, off the leash—eating another bitch's ass. Nope. Ass-eating dogs must learn to crave the Queen Bitch's treats, a mash-up of some ass with some Queen Bitch cooking; keep that cute little doggie confused about sex and food and ass-eating.

Another lesson that the Queen Bitch bestows upon her bad bitches—the importance of extending that confusion on to her children.

The Queen Bitch barks that she wants to be a mom one day and that she wants to "start becoming the woman who I want to parent my child." I've already apologized for anthropomorphizing the Queen Bitch, so I won't make that same mistake here and again. I can only assume that when she barks of having a child that she actually means having an ass-eating puppy.

Given all the above examples, it's clear that the Queen Bitch has very little regard (if any at all) for the humanity of men. The initial misandric barks made by the Queen Bitch—the ones that dehumanized men as dogs who want to be treated like pets, those are "widely exercised cultural norms," as Some Douche would say. If they were not cultural norms, then they wouldn't be part of our popular culture. As Madonna and other celebrities from years past brought forward into popular culture the humanity of folks within LGBT communities, this Queen Bitch does the inverse. She brings forward into popular culture the normalization of dehumanized men.

I am a man. I am not a dog and I do not want to be treated like a pet. I certainly do not want to be "da best ass-eater" for a solipsistic narcissist like Nicki Minaj…and neither would anybody who values their own humanity. If you're a man and you value your humanity, realize that this Queen Bitch and her pack of bad bitches are nothing but ass-eating dogs and that is all.

Editor's note: feature image by Christopher Macsurak. –PW

Affirmative action – a historical perspective

Lucian Vâlsan · 31 July 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in German, Romanian and Portuguese.

The concept of affirmative action comes, at least in modern developed world, in the same package with the wider concept of political correctness – or more precisely, the part of political correctness that deals with identity politics[1] as it was called in the '80s in the UK and is still called in academic circles in present-day Europe. The problem with the implementation of the concept of affirmative action is that it invariably becomes a system of expropriation[2] and a tool of ideological control.

This is all too obvious in present-day Europe in academia, in the institutions run by the State, and it might become the norm in the private sector soon enough[3], unless some finally wake up.[4]

"He who forgets the past is doomed to repeat it."

For those that haven't seen totalitarianism first hand or for those with very little interest in history outside of what's being taught in schools, this idea of affirmative action seems rather new, innovative and even progressive. Regardless of one's opinion about the concept, most Western Europeans seem to think that it's a rather new concept, no older than the '70s. That's all fine and well except that the concept of affirmative action is in fact much older.

After World War II, several countries disappeared altogether from the map (such as Ukraine, Estonia, Lithuania, etc.) and several others were placed behind the Iron Curtain and were named The Eastern Block. The Eastern Block then became the theater for a reign of terror that lasted 45 years.

The concept of healthy origin

Right after August 23, 1944, King Michael I of Romania was deposed and the first Communist government was installed, headed by Dr. Petru Groza. Once in power, the regime realized that it needed legitimacy from the intellectual elite as the Party did not have an identity that could be propagated in a positive manner for the masses. This need for legitimacy was hard to fulfill among the intellectual elite considering the fact that most of the intellectuals were „part of the bourgeoisie and land owner's elite" and, consequently, reluctant to embrace the ideals of the New Man. Moreover, most of the intellectuals belonged to schools of thought that were aimed at promoting cultural pluralism[5] as opposed to the ever-increasing ideological barriers imposed by the new regime almost everywhere, including and especially in the academic discourse[6].

The options for the members of the academia were clear: obedience or disappearance through various silencing processes, starting with expulsion and ending with house arrest and even physical elimination.

Among the very first institutions targeted by the new regime for ideological reorganization was Academia. The Romanian universities (of Bucureşti, Cluj, Iaşi) were subject to a process of administrative purification[7].

Long story short, after the new Education Act of 1948, the principles that would lie at the basis of the selection process for higher education would be "the file" and the student's politically healthy origin[8].

Through special regulation, starting in 1948, 30% of openings in universities were set aside for the offspring of peasants and workers. This led to a change in the social structure of students, as the number of students coming from very poor social strata increased, coupled by a decrease in the number of students coming from the bourgeois milieu[9][10]. Moreover, as time went by the quotas grew and toward the end of the communist regime in the '80s, the decision was left to each university who chose to admit only students with a healthy origin so as to avoid any conflict with the Party officials or with the State-controlled press. This is the result of naming and shaming the organizations which stepped even mildly outside of the "ideals of the multilaterally developed socialist society".

In late '50s and early '60s the concept of healthy origin was extended to almost all aspects of life. The principles that were aggressively promoted included State truths like collectivism being superior to individualism, collective possession being superior to private property and that all people are absolutely equal.

To be fair, the original Communist ideology included what was called "materialism," in which facts were deemed more important than feelings. That sounded great, until the Party started manufacturing its own facts to fit the Party line (sound familiar?).

Also, in those times (late '40s) it became the State's official position that the behaviors of each person are not determined by the individual's own thoughts or feelings but by the social class to which that individual belonged. Using this "truth" – those that had an "unhealthy" origin were subjected to a re-education process (see The Pitești Experiment[11]) whilst those that had a healthy origin were promoted into high administrative and political positions regardless of their education or training, thus instituting the practice of total reversal of values at the societal level[12].

Is today's affirmative action really so different?

We've already seen how people can and are being denied promotion for having the wrong sex and the wrong skin color[13]. One cannot choose his sex or skin color, just like one cannot choose the family to which he or she is born. But, just like the old Bolsheviks in late '40s Romania, the new PC-oriented elites are driven by the idea that an individual's behavior is dictated by the class to which that individual belongs.

Courts routinely rule that State-sponsored misandry and racism against Asians in the name of "diversity" is OK[14] and it doesn't constitute anything immoral[15].

Just like an "all capitalist school" or even a "liberal-democratic school" was unimaginable in communist Romania – the same seems to be true in today's progressive worldview where an "all boys school" would be seen as inherently "oppressive" and "exclusionary" – while at the same time, nobody seems to have a problem with the all-girls schools, women's hours and other similar concepts. Just like in late 1940s Romania, the establishment is now openly promoting a conflicting dichotomy of values and behaviors.

The Bolsheviks told us that the "bourgeoisie-oriented majority is the problem" and sought to change that by force. The PC-oriented regime also tells us that the majority culture is the problem[16] and are seeking to change that by social coercion and economic bullying. Can you imagine the uproar if a Sudanese politician would have said that Sudan's problem is the black majority?

The European Union has a "zero tolerance" policy for violence against women[17] and urges men to "speak out" against violence[18] – but only against the violence perpetrated against the least affected demographic. The same European Union couldn't care less about the violence against men and whenever it bothers to mention it, it explicitly blames it on "hegemonic masculinity"[19] or other similar feminist-oriented claptrap which has little to no connection with factual reality.

History repeats itself on a wider scale and many seem to think that these ideas are new and not really so dangerous. Well, history shows that not only these ideas are alarming, but can ultimately be deadly.

Sources:

[1] http://www.ippr.org/images/media/files/publication/2011/05/Identity%20Politics%20and%20Public%20Policy_1765.pdf – Rick Muir, Margaret Wetherell – Identity, Politics and Public Policy – p. 9

[2] http://www.academia.org/the-origins-of-political-correctness/ – Bill Lind – The origins of Political Correctness: „When a white student with superior qualifications is denied admittance to a college in favor of a black or Hispanic who isn't as well qualified, the white student is expropriated. And indeed, affirmative action, in our whole society today, is a system of expropriation."

[3]

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/eu-to-stamp-out-economic-freedom-in-the-name-of-feminism/

[4] http://www.welt.de/wirtschaft/article118412204/Frauenquote-in-der-EU-steht-vor-dem-Aus.html (in German) – News report regarding several EU nations gathering to oppose the European Commission's proposal regarding forced gender quotas in private companies' boardrooms.

[5] http://www.inter-disciplinary.net/wp-content/uploads/2009/04/ikp2asandului.pdf – Gabriel Asandului, Teodora Ghiviriga, Laura Asandului – The condition of the intellectual élite in communist Romania. A historical perspective – p.2

[6] Cătănuş, D., Regimul comunist din România şi problema intelectualităţii. 1956-1965. Intelectualii români în arhivele comunismului, Nemira publishing, Bucharest. 2006, p. 45-73.

[7] ibidem 5

[8] Cioroianu A., Pe umerii lui Marx. O introducere în istoria comunismului românesc. Curtea Veche publishing, Bucharest, 2007, p. 289

[9] idem 5, p. 3

[10] Anton, M., „Progresişti" versus „reacţionari". Subordonarea intelectualilor. 1944-1955. Intelectualii români în arhivele comunismului, Nemira publishing, Bucharest, 2006, p. 23

[11] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pite%C8%99ti_prison

[12] http://www.ijhssnet.com/journals/Vol_1_No_13_Special_Issue_September_2011/5.pdf – International Journal of Humanities and Social Science Vol. 1 No. 13 [Special Issue – September 2011], Falls Irina, PhD (Assistant Professor University of North Carolina at Pembroke School of Education) – Family and Child Education in Communist Romania: Consequences of the Duality of Values and Behaviors

[13] http://www.campusreform.org/blog/?ID=4759

[14] http://www.amren.com/features/2013/06/what-the-supreme-court-just-did/

[15] http://www.nytimes.com/1997/11/12/world/european-union-court-upholds-affirmative-action-for-women.html – EDMUND L. ANDREWS – European Union Court Upholds Affirmative Action for Women, The New York Times, Published: November 12, 1997

[16] http://youtu.be/1HNcLKj_USE – Sweden: Leading Social Democrat "The White Majority is the Problem.

[17] http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/gender-violence/

[18] http://www.euronews.com/2013/04/15/men-urged-to-speak-out-against-violence/

[19] http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/files/gender_pay_gap/130424_final_report_role_of_men_en.pdf – The Role of Men in Gender Equality – European Strategies & Insights (EU report) – p. 10

Canadian Commission criticizes Supreme Court

Robert O'Hara · 1 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Canadian Commission for Public Complaints criticizes Supreme Court on handling of Doucet case

Equality group applauds RCMP watchdog findings suggesting Supreme Court failure in Nicole Doucet case
TORONTO, ONTARIO — (July 30, 2013)

The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) applauds the outcome from the Commission for Public Complaints Against the RCMP (Royal Canadian Mounted Police) that fully exonerated the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in their handling of the Nicole Doucet case.

“The findings discredit Nicole Doucet’s wholly unfounded claims of abuse by her ex-husband and suggest the Supreme Court committed an historic blunder in allowing her to go free after attempting to have her husband murdered,” said Malcolm Johnston, CAFE Director of Public Policy. CAFE sympathizes with demands that the Supreme Court reexamine this case, as well as with a call by Dalhousie Schulich School of Law Professor Archibald Kaiser for a public inquiry. “The courts lost their vision of the nature of Canadian society and the function of the criminal law,” said Kaiser in describing the case.

CAFE’s primary concern however is on legislative change that ensures gender equality in law, by properly protecting victims and adequately punishing criminals, regardless of gender.

“Nicole Doucet got away with a heinous crime by fabricating sudden abuse allegations that went entirely unchallenged at every step,” said Johnston. “This precedent can not stand. Legal traditions which privilege testimony of women over men and lead to outcomes that pervert basic justice must be reformed immediately.”

For CAFE’s previous Letter to the Commission for Public Complaints Against the RCMP, please visit our website at http://equalitycanada.com/2013/06/25/supreme-court-sexism-lets-woman-off-for-counseling-to-murder/

CONTACT
Amber Taylor
Canadian Association for Equality
info@equalitycanada.com
416-479-0718

MWT Radio: Lake tantrum special

AVfM Radio · 1 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

James Mongiat became so accustomed to his wife Whitney's childish fits that he decided to video one of them in order to show people just how out of control and immature she really is. He posted the video on YouTube and it went viral.

It also sent Whitney to an attorney, and set the "guys are always wrong" media machine into full overdrive. James has been lambasted by white knights and other elements in the media about as mature as Whitney since the video made such a splash.

As we all know that is not an unusual turn of events for men dealing with abusive women.

We welcome you to join Paul Elam and Dr. Tara Palmatier for a special episode of Man, Woman, Truth Radio, where we will interview James Mongiat, to get what the mainstream won't ever give him, a fair chance to tell his side of the story in full. Needless to say, there is a whole lot more to this story than what you saw on the video.

The show airs tonight (Thursday, August 1st) on BTR at 8:00 PM Central Time. The call in number is 310-388-9709.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Feminists fizzle at lecture on boys' education

VFM News and Commentary · 1 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Back story:

Feminists target lecture on boys' education

[box]On the evening of Monday, July 29th, Men's Rights Edmonton hosted a lecture by Dr. James Brown discussing boys' underachievement in education.

Last week a feminist group calling itself Feministing at 'Rescuing Our Underachieving Sons' made plans to crash the lecture. They started a Facebook group event by that title, with a subtitle "Tired of slut shaming sexism racism." They claimed, among other things, to wish to confront the members of MREdmonton about the unrelated "Don't be that girl" poster campaign, and to seek their identities.

They further noted that "This event could be a good opportunity to ask questions and engage in face-to-face discussion…We need to go into this event prepared with researched questions and facts, so I'd like to meet up with anyone interested in attending the event next the Sunday before the event at Roast. Please feel free to add discussion and ideas below. Please also share this event and invite others. Thanks everyone!"

A few days before the event, various Men's Human Rights Activists joined the Facebook event group, including members of Men's Rights Edmonton like Eric Duckman and Karen Straughan (who have often shown their faces in the media). These members of Men's Rights Edmonton left comments on the invitation page to engage the feminists in the discussion the description claimed that they wanted.

The MREdmonton folks reported that a day or two before the event the invitation page seemed to disappear, but other activists, including A Voice for Men (AVfM) Managing Editor Dean Esmay, along with a number of other Men's Human Rights Advocates, report that they were still in the group participating in discussions a full day after the event was over, indicating that the feminists actually went out of their way to block Men's Rights Edmonton members and spokespersons. The day after the event the group appears to have been closed for real, but AVfM did capture a screen shot for posterity; click the below image to see a full screen capture of one page:

[image]

Click image for full-size screen capture!

Although a full record of the conversations was not captured, the Facebook group discussion was notable for how often factual claims made by Men's Human Rights Activists were ignored, while instead aspersions were cast at their character with sexist bigotry and name-calling by the feminists.

Now, back-tracking a bit to see how well the plans of the feminists matched up with what happened at the lecture:

According to group event coordinator Brittany Kustra, the purpose of the counter-event had nothing to do with Dr. Brown or the topic of his lecture, but to confront the members of MREdmonton about the unrelated "Don't be that girl" poster campaign, and to seek their identities.

> This event could be a good opportunity to ask questions and engage in face-to-face discussion. I also think it would be important to attend so that we can see who is behind this group, because they refuse to show their faces to the media.

The group had seemed poised to go into the event with verbal guns blazing.

> We need to go into this event prepared with researched questions and facts, so I'd like to meet up with anyone interested in attending the event next the Sunday before the event at Roast.

They didn't even switch off the safety.

At the lecture itself, the feminist group that arrived did not do any of the things described by Kustra on the invitation page. Rather than confront the Men's Human Rights Activists as per their stated plan, they sat silently through the filmed lecture and question/answer session. The majority of them waited until the session was over and the camera was off, and then they fired questions at Dr. Brown, challenging his assertions, after the event was over and while he was packing up to leave.

According to Eric Duckman, not a single question was asked of the Men's Rights Edmonton members about the posters, nor did the group make good on the threat to identify them. Once it was clear that they weren't hiding, the feminist group seemed to lose interest. As Duckman remarked, For people who hate non-consensual stuff, they only seem to want our names when we don't give 'em up willingly.

Feminist attendees did ask their hosts whether or not the film footage from the event would end up online. They were unconcerned when they received an affirmative answer. The lack of upset indicates that the answer was satisfactory, rather than worrisome; they want video of themselves at the lecture to be shared online in order to prove they attended the event.

That gives them their gutsy feminist activist cred. They've faced the MRA beast, and emerged unscathed.

The fact that the MRAs turned out to not be beastly doesn't matter. They'll still look good to their peers, even though they achieved nothing.

The group didn't pursue a single one of their stated goals, and actively avoided the goal of discussing the "Don't be that girl" posters with the MRAs. They met the one goal that really mattered to them:

They drew attention to themselves.[/box]

Unscheduled AVfM outage–but some good news

Dean Esmay · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If you're a regular at A Voice for Men, you may have noticed we were unavailable late last night (August 1) and most of today (Friday, August 2). A long string of events caused this, first a malfunction in a recently-added WordPress plugin and then, adding to further confusion, a major outage occurred at our web hosting provider, Hostgator. The crash of the AVfM server had us down for a few hours and is unlikely to be repeated; it first looked like a Denial of Service attack to us but subsequent postmortem investigation has made that look unlikely and that it was just a more mundane sort of crash. But adding to our confusion was the fact that a few hours after we thought we'd solved the crash, AVfM was periodically unavailable and we only eventually figured out that a whole bunch of people on Hostgator were offline, not just us.

So far as we're concerned Hostgator has not given sufficient explanation for this unacceptably long service outage but we will be having further words with them about it. In the meantime, as a result of frantically trying everything we could, we wound up somewhat prematurely rolling out changes to the AVfM server we thought we'd be doing slowly in the next few weeks.

So assuming that Hostgator does not screw the pooch again, and our connection to the internet remains solid (be assured, if it does not, then Hostgator will be losing our business and we will be looking elsewhere for reliable service) you should notice some pretty cool changes. Without going into boring technical details involving geeky acronyms like PHP-FPM, MySQL, XRLQ, MXYZPTLK, and other words that are as bizarre-sounding to the normal human ear as Amanda Marcotte's voice, you should find that A Voice for Men is now suddenly quite noticeably snappier and more responsive. The scheduled maintenance we had a few weeks ago started the improvements, and the rush to fix the crash wound up having us install even more improvements along the way.

The interesting part of that being, while the site will now seem snappier by far, we aren't done, and it's going to get faster and more responsive still… and the long-awaited new design of AVfM will, we hope, be part of that continually improving experience, soon.

What may also interest you is that we have also finally added another frightening and bizarre technical term called "SSL." Only the most sharp-eyed among you will have even noticed this, but if you log in to your AVfM commenting account, you will notice up above where it used to say http://www.avoiceformen.com it now says:

https://www.avoiceformen.com

Along with the little "s" on the end of "http" you may notice a little "lock" icon.

What this means is that it has now become massively more difficult for anyone to break into our systems using your account or anyone else's, causing mischief or destruction or stealing confidential information. Although we fully encourage as many Men's Human Rights Activists as possible to fully publicly self-identify–the more of us who do, the less they can hurt all of us–we fully understand why you can't all do that. Well this new, practically invisible security system makes it even harder for anyone to be able to get into our systems and and get to crap that's none of their damned business or monkey around where they don't belong. We take your security and your privacy seriously here, and your donation money does not go to waste.

So, to summarize: middlin' level server crashed followed by a (really, truly) unrelated catastrophic failure of network connectivity from our service provider which, should we not get sufficient explanation and reassurance that it won't happen again, will cause us to find a new hosting provider. But bonus: AVfM is now faster and more secure than ever. We'll call it a net plus, even if it made Friday pretty much suck for the whole team here.

(An editorial team that's grown, by the way, and expect an announcement about that, and about some more openings we'll be having in the near future, also very soon.)

Thanks all for your patience. This Managing Editor is going to bed. Massive thanks to Strix, Victor Zen, Asha, Peter, Della, August, James, Lucian, and everyone else who offered to pitch in and/or was inconvenienced in trying to get stuff done today but patiently sat through it.

Onward and upward.

Is Climate Change a Man?

Jon Gunnarsson · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Morality is pretty clear-cut in German classrooms. There's an approved list of evil, which includes racism, xenophobia, right-wing politics, sexism (i.e. sexism against women), pollution, and climate change. There's an approved list of good, which includes egalitarianism, democracy, tolerance (except for support of anything in the above list or criticism of anything in this list), moderate left-wing politics, and environmentalism.

And now, increasingly, pupils are taught to associate men with the first list and women with the second. The latest in a long list of attempts to demonize men is an article by Barbara Morawec entitled "Ist der Klimawandel ein Mann?" ("Is Climate Change a Man?")[1]. Responsible for this text is the German State Institute for School Quality and Education Research. The text is not intended for critical discussion, but is just supposed to be used to test reading comprehension. Pupils read the text and then have to answer questions about it[2].

> Steaks and cars, both as large as possible. That is – you guessed it – typically male. "That's why climate change is a man." This is the provocative thesis advanced in a study by Ines Weller, a professor in Bremen. Her arguments: men eat more meat on average and drive showy, gas-guzzling cars, preferably fast. Both increase the world-wide CO2 emission. According to Weller, this is further exacerbated by the fact that men do not want to change their behaviour. Thus, the Professor argues, they contribute more to global climate change than women.

This is how the article opens and it doesn't get better after that. Using Ines Weller's aforementioned study, as well as "research" done by environmental expert and physicist Gotelind Alber, the article asserts that women are affected more severely by climate change and that meat consumption "is another area where man seems to be the climate sinner."

After briefly considering that "women also contribute their mite to climate change" through consuming more dairy products, cosmetics, and clothing, the article concludes as follows:

> Nevertheless, the climate calculation seems to favour woman. Besides: women think differently about climate change than men; they are more willing to do something for the public good. "Women, who are usually more involved with children and family than men, are used to thinking of others," Alber says. Men, on the other hand, are obviously only ecology-minded when they don't have to pay for it.

The intent of this monstrosity is quite clear. Men are collectively at fault for climate change (which is evil and any opinion that questions this must therefore also be evil), of which women are the innocent victims. Once again, the evil men are oppressing the poor, helpless women. The text is quite remarkable in its consistent collectivism. It's not just men who drive SUVs and eat steak every other day who are causing global warming. No, the clearly identified villain is man, and woman is his victim.

There is no differentiation between individuals, no acknowledgement that there are also many men who don't have a large carbon footprint and women who do. All that is conveniently ignored to better construct a threat narrative. Man is out to get you! He'll melt the polar icecaps if you don't stop him!

At the Schiller Gymnasium in Hof (a town in the North East of Bavaria), this text was served up to 8th grade pupils[3]. What message does this send to 13 or 14-year-old boys? They are quite openly told that they are lesser, that they share the collective guilt of their gender. They are taught to be ashamed of being male. They are taught to hate themselves. This is today's version of original sin.

It's no accident that the article talks about climate sinners. This type of language is quite common in public discourse in Germany. Everything must be sorted neatly into good and evil; good must only be associated with women, evil only with men. Individual men may occasionally be praised, but that is the one time they are treated as individuals. At best, individual men are praiseworthy and good in spite of their sex.

Given all this, it's no wonder that boys are doing much worse than girls in school. While every new generation of women in Germany does better in schools and universities than the previous generation, for men the reverse is true[4]. With the school system becoming ever more feminist, boys are increasingly unmotivated to do well in school. A 2007 study by the Federal Ministry for Education and Research shows that boys and girls do about equally well given the same degree of interest[5]. But seeing how hostile schools have become toward boys, their lower level of interest is hardly surprising.

More damningly, the same study also revealed that given the same degree of competency, boys received worse grades than girls. Over five years have passed since this study, and nothing has been done about it. Tellingly, the Education Ministry released the embarrassing study without any press release and without drawing any attention to it. During the 2007 Christmas season, they even tried taking down the study from their webpage, hoping that nobody would notice. Thanks to some inquiring German Men's Rights Activists (MRAs), this attempt at censorship failed and they had to put up the study once again[6].

But even though the education deck is so stacked against them, men still do better on the job market. But for how long? Nowadays the internet can make up for much of the flaws in the state-run education system, but it is usually only those who are already intelligent and educated who make full use of this resource. Immigrant and lower class men are becoming increasingly marginalized. How long the German society can keep this up is anyone's guess. No society that wastes male potential to such a degree can sustain itself in the long run. For all of our sakes, let's hope that Germany—along with all of Western civilization—reverses its course before it is too late.

This article is also available in German and Romanian.

References:

[1] http://sciencefiles.files.wordpress.com/2013/07/klimawandel-ein-mann.pdf, quoted excerpts are my translation

[2] http://sciencefiles.org/2013/07/19/bedeutet-weiblicher-professor-gleich-depp/

[3] http://sciencefiles.org/2013/07/20/erziehung-zum-selbst-hass-das-neue-curriculum-an-deutschen-schulen/

[4] https://www.destatis.de/DE/Publikationen/Thematisch/BildungForschungKultur/Bildungsstand/BildungDeutschland5210001129004.pdf?__blob=publicationFile, page 43

[5] http://www.bmbf.de/pubRD/Bildungsmisserfolg.pdf, page 16

[6] http://www.wgvdl.com/forum2/Info/Politik/BMBF/StudieBildungsmisserfolg.htm

Divorce by murder: France 1930

Robert St. Estephe · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•◊•

For a look at the same phenomenon – chivalrous men who just loved to let a woman get away with murder, especially when the victim was an adult male – as it was experienced in the United States, see on this website: "Woman and Her Right to Kill" – 1922

•◊•

FULL TEXT: A Paris divorce costs £60, a gun costs £1. Europe is in a state of excitement, husbands are worried. The International League for the Protection of Human Rights [Liga für Menschenrechte] is planning to do something. France is the centre of a righteous moral volcano and her entire manhood is going into conference.

Frenchwomen have turned the trick; they have found a substitute for divorce. Cheaper, easier, far more amusing than the antiquated process of legal proceedings, with its hazardous outcome, the new French vogue has taken a firm hold on womanhood in that land of liberty, equality and fraternity.

"If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out", reads the Scriptures and Madame la Franchaise, with the directness of intuition which her sex boasts, has modernised and applied the lesson; "If thine husband offend thee, snuff him out."

A simple formula and easy to remember.

Marital freedom a la française is, we repeat, an easily acquired status. The popular method costs only 126 francs or about £1, a little publicity which is invariably gratis, a few hours of good play acting before a jury, and at the very most a brief period of time as a guest of the government.

~ Bright Reading for Husbands. ~

The 126 francs will purchase a small but efficient automatic [weapon]. This be taken to bed and carefully concealed under a pillow. When the offending spouse is quite asleep (preferably from an excessive use of alcohol) a steady hand can do the business in a second. Even the frailest and most timid of the sex can put the tyrant out of commission permanently by using up the contents of the gun. Variation can be obtained by choosing a more dramatic moment, and this is considered preferable, for it makes an acquittal easy for the jury. The procedure which is recommended as ideal is to catch the brute in the act of beating a child or in the company of a friend's wife. This naturally assures a quick trial, favourable publicity and a speedy release. It is highly approved by the criminal courts and gives a jury an opportunity to enjoy the full pathos and sentimentality of the affair.

The facts are these: In 1920 no less than forty-seven Frenchwomen shot, poisoned or gassed their husbands into oblivion with virtual impunity. During the present year, up to July 1, a total of thirty-eight have taken advantage of the new liberation scheme, and indications are that all records will be broken before the New Year's bells ring out.

~ Deliriously Spectacular. ~

Reviewing a few of the cases, some are deliciously spectacular. Notable is that of Mme. Desotrat who secured her freedom last December. Her husband was the common or garden variety of drunkard. He beat her, starved, harassed and brutalised her and was generally disagreeable. Knowing that the divorce courts in France are costly and nearly inaccessible since they had been overcrowded by Americans seeking solitary bliss, and that French legislation had made the old-fashioned divorce a difficult business, Mme. Desotrat formed her campaign along the sure and methodical lines outlined above.

She bought herself a gun – a neat, powerful automatic. She applied to a professor of firearms and took seven lessons. With the confidence that comes of familiarity with a weapon she bided her time until one night Desotrat came home in a particularly villainous mood. In the room with the couple was her mother-in-law who was – perhaps fortunately—blind. With this perfect setting for a crime prepared, she allowed his natural disagreeableness to assert itself until she should reach a high point of righteous indignation. Then she fired seven shots, one for each lesson, into the midriff of the cruel man. It was over in a trice. There she was free – save for the short legal formality which must follow.

~ Simple – Efficient – Easy. ~

At the trial her mother-in-law was a witness. She had heard quarrelling but had seen nothing. Mme. Desotrat shed tears in the court. The jury also shed a few tears in sympathy. Her lawyer pleaded crime passionel, the justifiable elimination of a brute. She was forced to pay damages amounting to a few pounds and to meditate a few months in a state hotel of justice. That was that: Simple, efficient, easy.

The International. League for the Protection of Human Rights [Liga für Menschenrechte] with its headquarters in Vienna, is being deluged with letters from French male citizens who are genuinely convinced that it is no longer a matter of protecting the fragile sex against masculine intrusion, but quite the reverse. It is pointed out that not even beauty is necessary to soften the hearts of judges and juries when a woman who kills for love or for her happiness is in the dock. Editorial writers call this new conception of a “right to kill” a menace to civilisation which must at all costs be overcome.

[George Seldes, “Divorce By Murder.” Favoured By Frenchwomen – Sentimental Juries’ Leniency Menace To Civilisation,” syndicated (A.A.N.S.), The Auckland Star (New Zealand), Nov. 10, 1930, p. 18]

Schwyzer bows out

Paul Elam · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hugo Schwyzer, an iconic gender ideologue who is arguably representative of a good many men proudly flying that flag, has been caught with his pants down, again.

This time (there are oh-so-many times) the married father and Pasadena Community College professor was busted in a long distance affair with 27 year old Christina Parreira. Parreira, a recent dropout of the psychology program at Hartford University, is also into sex worker activism using the name Christina Page. Additionally, she gets around webcam/amateur porn circles as Gabriela "Ela" Stone.

She got around Hugo Schwyzer in a digital dalliance that she eventually took public.

There is no real surprise here. Hugo has an illustrious history of doing everything he can to bend women over (especially his impressionable young students), when he is not claiming to be an advocate for them. One of his main pitches is to call out older men as "creepy" for being attracted to younger women, of course when he is not being an older man doing everything he can to fuck younger women.

His predilections for power and poontang are legendary. And the resultant problems from that are squarely of his own making. Despite the destruction his actions have visited on his public image, and the animus he has generated from his contemporaries, it seems the attention rush from having his wang front and center in the public view in the most humiliating and disgraceful way possible has always proven too tempting to resist.

This presents a dilemma. One, I don't care who Schwyzer bangs. And I remain opposed to the practice of shaming men by playing gotcha with their sexuality, no matter who it is.

To be completely honest, for the first time I actually feel sympathy for this troubled soul. His unchecked sociopathy and childlike lack of governance over his base impulses have led him to a place few gender ideologues will ever go: To simultaneous personal and professional destruction.

Schwyzer has just shit-canned his life. That he has it coming does not even give me a hint of schadenfreude. Well, more honestly, it didn't for more than a moment.

The temptation here is to post the images of Schwyzer's message exchanges with Parreira, and to his other communications with her, which include images of him masturbating. I'd rather spare you things you can't unsee, and him another reminder of things he can't undo. For those with the interest, it can all be viewed here. (NSFW)

What is most telling in this story, as is always the case with Schwyzer, is not what he shows intentionally, but the things that come out of his mouth which reveal much more about his character and his personality than he would ever want you to know. But he just can't help it. He never could.

It starts with him making offhanded, casual statements to Parreira, like, "I'm off to my next bakery then picking up my daughter. Just know I am hard for you."

Call me crazy, even prudish if you will, but I find this combination of statements troubling. Discussing your erections with the woman you are cheating on your wife with while talking about your daughter, well, it does seem kind of "creepy," though I am not so fond of that adjective, even for men like Schwyzer.

Still more troubling were the tidbits from his interview with The Cut. When they queried about his immediate plans, he responded that he was going to "Work on getting mentally healthy. I need to get my meds right. Second, I need to get my marriage right. There's some bad shit that went down. I had an affair, which is very off-brand for me."

Off-brand? While I really don't want to rush headlong into reading too much into that expression, it strikes me as particularly meaningful given what we already know about Schwyzer's personality and history.

One, sexual impropriety is hardly an unusual event in his life. Indeed, it is more his “brand” than not. He’s been very public about the fact that having sex with women he should not be having sex with is something he does without remorse or reflection. His chief regrets, even about having sex with his students, have been getting caught and suffering consequences.

I take the reference to branding literally. I think Hugo has always seen himself more as a product, a particular brand of product, than a human being. I think it is possible, likely even, that what he was actually revealing was that he had committed bad PR, ultimately cutting his market value as a known feminist icon.

He had more to say to a follow-up question, seeking clarification on what he meant by “brand.”

“In that I’m supposed to be reformed,” he says. “The affair was with someone in the same circles you and I move in, so I have to protect her. But there is a lot of gossiping. It may reach you. Don’t be surprised.”

Make of that what you will, but to me this is the dialog of someone protecting a cultivated, commoditized image. Hugo Schwyzer, the now reformed womanizer who advocates for women, always first and foremost concerned about his marketability.

Does anyone think he would have “protected” that woman if she was not part of the club? Didn’t he just about say he wouldn’t?

I might be more generous with my interpretation were it not for Hugo’s history. In each of his previous catastrophes, which include having sex with several of his female students and a botched attempt to murder an ex-girlfriend, he has expressed little else but concern for his image and openly acknowledges his desire to avoid any consequences.

That is the Hugo Schwyzer we have all come to know. And at his age, it is likely not going change.

In the truest sense, this post is not about Schwyzer’s dick, though if Schwyzer reads it, it will mark its place as one of the few things in his life so distinguished. What it is about is how his being a tragic example fully illustrates much of what you can read on this site, in articles and comments, on the psyche of extremist feminist ideologues who happen to be male.

When all is said and done, it is about primacy with women, which is to say it is all about themselves.

You can file 13 all the obsequious drivel and ostentatious rhetoric about the struggles of women. The only struggle most of these men are genuinely concerned with is the struggle for the power gained through women’s approval.

If that approval is expressed sexually, all the better. David Futrelle is little more than an unattractive Hugo Schwyzer with fewer opportunities to turn his pandering into panty-time. At the core, and I truly believe this, they are virtually the same man.

I don’t have any ill wishes for Schwyzer. And I really hope that he does not do anything even more self-destructive. Recent events in the MHRM drive home the cold reality that this realm can take lives. In a circumstance like this I don’t see Schwyzer having an exemption card.

It does not take a rocket scientist to see that Hugo is a deeply troubled man in a very stressful and painful situation. Even if his pain is over the loss of image instead of the harm inflicted on those who love him, it is still pain.

I am personally glad he has decided to bow out of public life. He was in it for the wrong reasons, which I believe is true of his peers. And with no intent to worsen his pain, I know the world is better off with one less active hypocrite creating fear and distrust for a living.

I hope whatever path he takes to rebuilding his life, it will include his children being more than a mention in a sexting message. They probably need him now more than they ever have.

The Voice of Europe: Ethical relativism

Lucian Vâlsan · 2 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]TODAY, August 2, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the constant process of redefining ethics to fit a certain ideology.

Through the process of redefining ethics, killing half of the human race, killing "undesired" children[1] or passing legislation that enshrines double standards suddenly becomes acceptable.

When everything becomes relative and the objective truth is thrown out on the window, those that hold immutable values can be and are labeled as "extremists," and when the truth becomes "incorrect" – the society at large is one step closer to totalitarianism.

It is already "extremist" in Sweden to believe that men and women are essentially different. It is already "extremist" amongst the fans of the European Union to believe that one should have the right to employ whomever s/he wants in the company s/he created. It will soon become "extremist" in the UK to believe that one should get an Internet connection free of governmental censorship and it has already been affirmed in France that it is "extremist" to believe that a man should have the right to know whether the child he is raising is indeed his or not.

Our ethics are being twisted through the coercive force of the legislative apparatus every day and what used to be common-sense is now "extremist." Why is this happening? Why is it so important to have clear-cut ethics? We will try to analyze the process of bending common sense that is taking place right now in Europe and assert several "extremist" ideas, such as the fact that due process for men is still necessary or the fact that no social engineering will ever achieve "substantive equality" (equality of outcome).

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Tell us about the process of changing the ethics that's taking place in your country!

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

And for the listeners from North America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and North America).

SHOW PAGE

[1] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/health/healthnews/9113394/Killing-babies-no-different-from-abortion-experts-say.html [/box]

The profits of love: early 1900's

Robert St. Estephe · 3 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.•?•

[image]

Serial bride from Hell – 1906

If only the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) had been in place in the early 1900s then Allie Patterson's serial marrying career might have brought her increased emotional satisfaction and better profits.

•?•

FULL TEXT: The journal entry was made in the probate court case [in Mansfield, Ohio] of Allie Patterson vs. William G. Patterson, which came on for hearing yesterday before Judge Bricker, who granted the defendant a divorce on his answer and cross petition. The plaintiff failed to appear. It was learned from the defendant's attorney, C. H. Workman, that this is the fourth husband who has secured a divorce from her. At the hearing yesterday Henry Boader, her first husband, was present and testified that she tried to shoot him a couple of times, besides trying to poison him before he got a divorce. Plaintiff and Mr. Patterson were married only last December and it appears that she told him that her first husband died 18 years ago and that she had never been married except once before. July 14 last Mrs. Patterson brought action against Mr. Patterson for divorce, alleging various things against him, which the court by the testimony of the witness found to be untrue. She is debarred from an interest in defendant's property.

["In the Courts," Mansfield Daily Shield (Oh.), Sep. 21, 1906, p. 6]

•?•

[image]

The "Badger Game" – 1922

Badger game – "Badger game" is slang for a deception whereby a woman lures a male victim into a compromising position whereupon they are caught by her accomplice who pretends to be the husband. The couple then blackmail or demand money from the victim. [The Probert Encyclopedia]
The Badger Game is a term no longer in use, but once it was in the vocabulary of everyone who had some inkling of the operations of the female predator. It describes a specific racket perpetrated by gold-diggers and was in the 19th and 20th centuries widely practiced by female predators upon men (as were The Heart Balm Racket, paternity fraud, The Alimony Racket and, military service allotment check bigamy rackets, and Black Widow insurance murders). Following is a newspaper article from 1922 which discusses a specialized variety of the badger game.

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: London – blackmail has ousted card-sharping from its place at the top of the list of indoor sports arranged by the versatile crooks on the great trans-Atlantic liners for their moneyed victims.

Still hardy despite its old age, the "badger gamer" is the most popular and most profitable.

"We know the 'badger game' is being worked on every great liner," said a steamship official. "Often it is worked half a dozen times a trip on one ship. But no passenger has ever complained. We know most of the card-sharpers. We know many of the blackmailers but we have no proof as to their activities aboard ship."

"Many women, easily recognized as too smartly gowned, a little too well-complexioned at night and a little too frequent in their journeys across the Atlantic – are known to us. Their 'husbands' – most of them carry them, though a few work alone along simple holdup lines – are of their own type, expensively dressed and superficially polished but always lacking the something that would make them gentlemen.

~ She Works Alone ~

The women who work alone permit themselves to be made love to by ardent young men – or men who feel young, anyway – with too much money, and after they have succumbed to their lovers' persuasion, merely threaten to call for help or to sue for breach of promise.

It is the couples who work the badger game, however, who have the best of it. They usually pick a man to whom exposure would be serious, preferably a rich business man, with a family. The victim meets the wife; the husband is introduced and faithfully plays the role of colorless uninteresting spouse.

The wife complains that he does not treat her well; she detests him. If the victim falls – and he usually gallops to it – he is seen about with the wife frequently. She is always afraid her husband will suspect something. The victim believes himself a Lothario and probably starts wearing flowers in his buttonhole.

[image]

~ Then, One Night ~

Then, one night, he sweeps the wife off her feet. The husband finds them together. The horrified recoil towards the door; the look of pained amazement; the outraged husband's just anger; the clenched hands reaching out for the housewrecker's throat; the tearful, terrified wife; the penitent "mug," pop-eyed with fright and thoughts of home and Alice and the three children, the wife's plea for forgiveness; the husband's frenzied "No! not for $10,000!" The "mug's" sudden thought: "Twenty thousand dollars maybe?"

So far there has not been a case in which the wronged husband has not consented to try to plaster his wounds with a few thousand-dollar bills.

["'Badger Game' Again Popular," Journal (Milwaukee, W.), Sep. 11, 1922, p. 1]

•?•

[image]

•?•?•

"The Great Woman's Industry": Alimony – 1931

The censorship of historical knowledge of the huge and long-lived national scandal surrounding The Alimony Racket during the 1920s and 1930s in the United States is one of the most pernicious violations of historical truth that has been perpetrated by the university-based "gender studies" industry. Women writers in great numbers were among the racket's most vociferous critics. It is no wonder that students are not permitted to know about this history when such historical voices of women as Ruth Brown Reed's might, if allowed to be heard, undermine the false (and now orthodox) narrative that is "herstory."

[image]

Following is the full text of a brief newspaper article from 1931 that quotes from a longer magazine article on alimony by Ruth Brown Reed.

***

MEN'S RIGHTS.

Quoted from an article by Ruth Brown Reed in the Outlook:

[image]

"The alimony racket has become the great woman's industry. A sobbing pretty woman before the court — and what chance has the husband? In many cases the amount of alimony is so large in proportion to the man's earnings that it completely nullifies any chance of happiness or of another marriage. And why—one cannot help but ask—should a divorced man be denied the right to a normal family life?

"Under the present system the man must keep his nose the grindstone for the rest of his life, so that a woman who "no longer" contributes one iota to his comfort and well-being can lead a soft and unharassed life. Where there are children or where the woman is old or physically incapacitated for work, there is no question of the man's 'obligation.'"

•?•?•

So here is a new matrimonial problem, and a new note in the gospel of feminism. If there is anything in the principle of eternal rights between the sexes, they seem patently violated in many cases. The best assurance of ultimate justice to men is that women themselves are beginning to plead for men's rights, as men formerly did for women's rights.

["Men's Rights." The Titusville Herald (Pa.), Jun. 4, 1931, p. 4]

***

NOTE: The Outlook and The Independent were major New York weekly magazines founded in the 19th century which eventually consolidated.

Source of this Titusville Herald article: Ruth Brown Reed, "Alimony for Men!" The Outlook and The Independent, Vol. 158, No. 1, May 6, 1931, p. 14]

***

Amanda Marcotte: make me your whore

August Løvenskiolds · 3 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Nearly every woman I know has a hair-curling story of a guy approaching her by gushing about how beautiful/awesome/beddable he thinks she is and leaving his entire "pitch" at that, without even considering the idea that perhaps he should offer some reasons that she might want a reasons[sic] to be interested beyond the ever so rare opportunity to please a bona fide man. – Amanda Marcotte

Yes, Amanda, women hate it so much when men get all talky-n-stuff, because we all know women really only care about one thing…

Yes, friends, it is true. Amanda Marcotte, the man-hater extraordinaire, the one who believes that misandry is a nonsense word and that women don't owe men even the slightest courtesy (even though women require that men act first with the romantic overtures), has transformed herself, seemingly overnight, into a stalwart of the PUA (pickup artist) community.

This breathtaking change occurred in her delicate lady-brain when rapper DJ Khaled proposed marriage to another man-hater, Nicki Minaj. Despite the fact that Khaled offered Minaj at ring valued at US$500,000, and Minaj was later spotted wearing a massive engagement ring, Marcotte's panties were all in a bunch because "Men [are] constructing the 'marry me/be my girlfriend/go on a date with me' request as something a woman should consider for no other reason than it would please him greatly if she would do that."

Um, so, Amanda, the bringing of gifts symbolic of a commitment to care for, and provide for, a woman doesn't even show up on feminist radar any more as a reason a woman might like a guy?

Oops – sorry – "radar" is heteronormative. I meant, gaydar, of course.

Marcotte's wise and two-fold instruction to amorous and/or randy young feminist-leaning men is decidedly practical and indeed, mercenary – if you want a girl's attention, Marcotte says, first, offer her money to fuck you, and then, show her your dick.

Well, of course, Marcotte can't really say that so explicitly, because offering money for sex, or sex for money, is called "prostitution" and is generally frowned upon by legal authorities in the US. But here's how Sex in the City girl Marcotte would have men launch cupid's arrow: Very few products are marketed, "Buy this, because we would like your money!" Politicians don't really say, "Vote for me, because I'd love to be elected!" Generally, when we ask someone to do something, we try to highlight what they get out of it.

"Highlight what they get out of it" – what great advice! All this time we clueless men have treated women as competent enough to evaluate a man based on her own standards, when what we should have done is just crassly open our wallets, bank statements and zippers for inspection and evaluation by the demure slatterns of our dreams.

Because, of course, to Marcotte and other feminist twits like her, men are only useful to women by how much they cater to women's every need, whim, whine, or fetish – even as they ask for legal and social equality with men, men are still their draft animals. God forbid in Marcotte-land that any women ever be inconvenienced by the desires of a man-slave – we are supposed to act as if we can read their minds, take all the initiative, and offer all of our assets for the pleasure of milady.

But perhaps I'm being too reductive here. Marcotte says "If you actually put your qualities out there to be assessed as you're assessing hers, then she's free to decide that's not what she wants and you have to accept it".

Hmmmm. "Put your qualities out there" – like what, Amanda? – the size/image of my sexual organs?

Yes, that is exactly what she has in mind – "Sending a dick pic, figuring that the message 'thinking of you gives me an erection' naturally leads to her feeling obliged to do something to relieve you of that stiff situation."

I couldn't believe it, either – Marcotte, man-hating Marcotte, in her own words, says women are obliged to offer men sexual release if only men would display their erections. Holy shit – maybe there is something for men in this "feminism" thing after all.

Am I exaggerating? Did she mean that ironically, or am I quoting her out of context? The previous sentence to that amazing revelation was this one: Telling a woman she's the hottest thing in the bar and being shocked that this, in and of itself, is not a convincing argument for why she should let you see her naked. But flashing your man-meat will seal the deal, if you are Marcotte, anyway, and if we take her word as pair-bond.

In a world where one of the top candidates for the mayor of Amanda's home, New York City, is the sex-scandal-plagued Anthony Weiner, and he has a wife named Huma Weiner, and a girlfriend named Miss Leathers, and a (former) campaign manager whose name rhymes with "Pet'em", it is not surprising that Marcotte craves the sausage fest so much that she is advising lovelorn lads to lay them out for her inspection.

Of course, this entire post has all been an effort in quote-mining and other disingenuous bullshit that the enemies of the Men's Human Rights Movement abuse all the time. Marcotte is an idiot who needs to hire a copy-editor, of course, and her lust for exposed dick was an understandable misspeaking. Consider yourself lucky, Amanda, that no one takes you seriously any more.

Editor's note: feature image by James G. Milles . –PW

Revelations with Erin Pizzey

Dean Esmay · 3 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our guest today is known as Geoffrey James but is also known to many of our listeners as “Solaris.” Solaris is an Australian writer and well known member of the Men Going Their Own Way community. He runs NiceGuy’s forum and web site, one of the oldest and most respected MGTOW web sites in the world. Solaris is also a vocational trainer in Australia and works with teenage males and young men.

Solaris will be joining Erin and I to examine the attitudes and experiences of young men and to discuss how they differ from previous generations.

We will be keen to receive calls and invite anyone with a view or questions to call in to the show.

Show opening and closing music by Kevin McLeod.

Show starts today at 4:00pm London time, 11:00am Eastern US time. We hope you can join us!

CLICK HERE TO LISTEN TO THE SHOW!

Victim Nation

Diana Davison · 4 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: This article is based on the work of Dr. Ofer Zur and his attempt to draw attention to the need of studying victim-hood in order to help both victims and perpetrators. All quotes are from his paper on the subject, linked both above and at the end of the article. His work on the subject is available on his website and offers an excellent list of suggested further reading.

Culture has always tried to define its advancement on scales of morality. Superior morality has an unfortunate need for inferiors against which to measure and so we love to both judge and condemn in the personal pursuit of happiness. Such games have reached the status of entertainment in the modern world.

With each generation's goal of raising the 'quality' of society by removing identified immoral elements the Western world in particular has 'advanced' to a point where more than 100% of society are deemed victims and we all want justice. We have become a Victim Nation scouring under rocks to find more people to blame.

Everybody wants to be a victim because if you're not the victim you're the bad guy.

Social justice organizations pop up daily like rodents in a carnival Whac-A-Mole. Every right they fight for assumes that right was denied through oppression and, invariably, requires a cloak of victimhood to gain sympathy. The inequality that victimhood claims to fight becomes an essential element of the movement to the point of embrace.

"Ironically, the rights movement often victimizes one group while liberating another. What seems to be a noble, justified, long overdue act of protecting a victim can easily turn to blame and warfare. When this happens, conflict, injustice, and victimization are perpetuated, and the possibility of resolution and healing is destroyed."

Equality has become the focus of social justice for the last two decades. We are no longer content to accept that people are born with different characteristics and skill sets which make some stand out as leaders and others remain followers. While leadership is a desired quality, anything that makes someone different is no longer seen as good, it has become a source of evil. "In this Western worldview, inequalities and differences are often associated with injustice and victimization."

It doesn't require an act of injustice to make some people more or less fortunate. All it takes is birth. Inequality has always existed in many forms and will continue to exist. The social justice presumption is that inequality can be eliminated by somehow training or forcing people to become blind to nature. By removing some words from the dictionary we can make the concepts they represent disappear along with the descriptive tool.

We all know quality when we see it but we can't say what causes quality to exist or exactly what makes one thing better than another. But we do know it when we see it. We also know that some ice cream is better than others but we haven't asked Häagen-Dazs® to cease and desist.

If you carry the social justice principles to their conclusion we end up with some hilarious and disturbing results.

As long as someone in the world can't read no one should write books. As long as there is someone without footwear none of us should go shoe shopping. As long as there is someone who can't get a $200 haircut we should all use a Flowbee® or, as long as there is a bald man, we should all shave our heads.

When feminism fought against victim blaming they had some things right but they got the solution wrong. Dr. Zur describes this second approach as one which "also concentrates on blame; however it lays all blame entirely on men. This approach has been promoted by a brand of feminism, which holds the male dominated patriarchal system responsible for all the evils in the world. Whether the issue is wars and politics, domestic violence and sexual abuse, toxic dumps and the corporations, or nuclear weapons and the military industrial complex, the finger is pointed at men as the culprits. At the heart of this approach is the split between men's aggressive and violent nature and women's inherent goodness."

Where there is good there must be evil. To feminists, women are good and men are the only convenient target to label as the evil enemy. The characterization of men as inherently violent and beastly is essential to maintaining the victim class of all women. While they insist that it's not men they are fighting it's the "patriarchy," their plight is reduced unless the perpetrator is tangible. Patriarchy can't be put in jail.

The insubstantial nature of the feminist foe makes feminism weak so every male crime with a female victim is hauled into the public media court to make the enemy flesh and blood. Patriarchy is the name but individual men are the bodies to be held accountable. To feminists, every man who commits a crime is an example of male oppression of women, while female criminals are called bizzarities and declarations ensue that "that never happens."

"These two approaches of blame have not only failed to resolve the violence and suffering but in fact, as Zur's paper explains, have tended to perpetuate and exacerbate them."

If victimhood mentality doesn't help women or society, why does it continue?

Personal benefit. Aside from the sense of moral superiority that they glean by being victims, feminists need resolution for a bigger problem: they have no justification to exist unless they have victims to save, a foe to blame, and a cause to write about. Feminists want to exist. They may be obnoxious but their stupidity is calculated.

"The culture of victimization is closely tied to what Amitai Etzioni (1987), a sociologist at Georgetown University, called the 'rights industry.'" Among other service industries, psychotherapists and lawyers also stand to benefit from perpetual victimhood. They are the cheerleaders in an un-winnable game and as long as the game goes on they keep getting paid.

"In claiming the status of victim and by assigning all blame to others, a person can achieve moral superiority while simultaneously disowning any responsibility for one's behavior and its outcome. The victims 'merely' seek justice and fairness. If they become violent, it is only as a last resort, in self-defense. The victim stance is a powerful one. The victim is always morally right, neither responsible nor accountable, and forever entitled to sympathy."

Responsibility takes a lot of hard work and strength of character. It is not an innate skill, it's learned… but not in Women's Studies classes. Women are not born in a glass box, it is built around them by misguided ideology. Where feminists claim to liberate women by convincing them they are oppressed, all they've done is to teach women how to blame their personal failures on external sources. While it sells many books, blame has never built a house.

As unhelpful as feminism has been with their obsession over externalizing personal failure and inadequacy, they have successfully intimidated others into supporting their ill-conceived ideas. They've turned it into a fad. It's the new black.

"The blame-victim approach is not confined to the rights or recovery movement. It is also at the heart of the legal system's approach, which attempts to respond to injustice and violations by identifying and prosecuting the perpetrators and compensating the victims (Sykes, 1992; Hughes, 1993). The faulty part of this legal approach is the focus on simplistic, linear, short term, and face-value justice."

Dr. Ofer Zur took a chance with his research. He notes that "[v]ery few writers have warned against the unrealistic and ultimately patronizing portrayal of victims of crime as total innocents" and admonishes that is it is a grave error to continue down the road that's being paved.

"We have become a nation of victims, where everyone is leapfrogging over each other, publicly competing for the status of victim, and where everyone is defined as some sort of survivor."

When victimhood is rewarded there will be no incentive for people to heal. While victims do exist and victimizers should be punished, the definition of what constitutes a crime expands exponentially to keep up with the number of self-identified victims. We now measure our status by how oppressed we are and can take a test to find out if our "privilege" is low enough to give us a voice.

The reason people only hear men's anger and not their pain is that men's pain competes with the pain of women. It's harder to be taken seriously as a victim when your supposed victimizer is crying. Meanwhile, anger sounds oppressive and violent which lends to the promise of reinforcing the victim status of women as long as people only listen to the "tone" and not the content. That's why A Voice For Men is constantly being criticized for tone instead of content.

As Zur says, "To understand better the dynamics of violent systems, we must first free ourselves from the binds of politically correct thinking." Violence exists in both male and female form and as long as women continue their role in the cycle immune from criticism the entire system will endure. It's not the tone that is the problem.

The MHRM is not engaged in a battle for victimhood champion, we are fighting to eliminate that victimhood mentality which is blocking true, positive social change. The MHRM is seeking to end the proliferation of false victimhood so that people can go about living truly empowered and healthy lives.

"An individual or group can win the battle, become the victim of the year, yet lose the war."

Men have traditionally fought all the wars and taken on the main burdens of survival. They have built structured societies and put the very systems of government and justice in place to which feminists have turned to play their victim cards. Men have shouldered the responsibility of doing all those things and been so gracious about their possible mistakes they've allowed themselves to be turned into the enemy. Until now.

Feminism made a mistake when they picked a war with men. If someone saves you from a burning building you don't accuse him of grabbing your ass while he carried you over his shoulder. What you might do is to hope you can save him right back if he ever needs your assistance.

But the victims of the world are all too busy feeling sorry for themselves to have thought of that.

Source: Rethinking 'Don't Blame the Victim': The Psychology of Victimhood, by Ofer Zur, Ph.D.

To be a decent human being

Lucian Vâlsan · 4 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

69 ways for feminists to be decent human beings

This is a response to Michael Urbina's "list" that attracted a lot of attention[1] while very few noticed that his list is borderline Orwellian in many respects.

Whilst I have always disliked feminist ideology because of its inherent lies and corruption, I still think that feminist individuals can be decent human beings if they try hard enough. Unlike Michael Urbina, I won't conflate feminism (which is a cult-leaning political ideology) with women (which is a huge and diverse group of people of roughly 3.6 billion individuals). When I took my first red pill, long before the Internet existed, little did I know that it would take me down an unsuspecting, beautiful, and transformative path towards being a decent human being. So below, I've complied a list of 69 everyday ways for feminists to be decent and compassionate human beings.

I must acknowledge that this post was written towards feminists who already smell that something's rotten in the Kingdom of Denmark; this is a possible target audience due to lack of support from this group. However, I feel that many of these points are applicable on a broader scale. If you have suggestions or additions to this list, my e-mail is at the end of this post. I'm totally open to dialogue.

1. Recognize your privileges

Despite the constant claims that feminism is a grass-roots movement, in fact, it is not. In Europe, Australia, India, North America and several other places, feminism is the system. Consequently, the feminist ideology almost always gets the privilege of being the only one heard when discussing public policy in the aforementioned areas whilst other positions that include genuine compassion for men and consideration to logic and factual reality get little to no coverage.

2. Make a daily effort to acknowledge and then challenge your privilege.

In order to be successful in your quest to be a decent human being, you must make a daily effort to understand the privilege your ideology has. As a supporter of the powers that be, it is your social responsibility to be conscious of your privileges. Use this consciousness to explore different situations. For example, how would a situation been different if it were a man in this position[2]? Would you object if a woman would be ordered to pay child support to her rapist?

3. Recognize that your privilege may in fact blind you to others' experiences.

Feminism comes with the privilege of being ignorant to factual reality and common sense. So being a decent human being and a feminist is not perfect by any means. You will make mistakes. What you choose to do after making a mistake is what will determine your effectiveness in being a decent human being. Therefore, it is very important to come to terms with the fact that you do not know everything! Because of our privilege, you are going to be blinded to situations that only more qualified would be able to speak to. So please, recognize this blind spot and don't take it personally when someone corrects you for overlooking something.

4. Laughing at male mutilation… Really? Stop that.

If you are serious in becoming a decent human being, I think this point is somewhat obvious. We've seen Sharon Osbourne laughing at a man being permanently sexually mutilated by his wife for daring to ask for a divorce. Guess what? Mutilation of men is not funny. Don't be that feminist!

5. Stop infantilizing women

Seriously. Women aren't children. They are grown up people and grown-ups have flaws, just like everyone else and have strengths, just like everyone else. Consequently, they don't need you to tell them what to do. They don't need you to issue fatwas regarding porn, makeup, shaving or any other behavior. They are big girls and can handle the issues themselves as they see fit. By telling them what to do, you are promoting a sexist culture. You are not giving women the right to feel empowered and comfortable with their lives and choices, you are taking away their right to stand on their own merit. Stop now.

6. Stop assuming that random people hate you just because they disagree with you

This may be a surprise to you, but disagreement isn't always a sign of potential hatred. Sometimes, it just means the person is nice and wants you to acknowledge that you may be mistaken in your views. (I hope you're picking up my tone)

7. Stop being a sexist asshole

Asking all men to cross the street if it's only them and a woman-queen on the same sidewalk late at night is not only sexist, stupid and totalitarian, but it's also completely parallel with factual reality, considering that women are the least likely demographic to be a victim of a violent attack by a stranger. Also, most people are decent human beings, just like you are aspiring to be by reading this list.

8. If someone is chivalrous towards you, say "thank you"

In my country, children are taught at a very young age to say "thank you" when someone gives them something or helps them with something. It's part of being a decent person. You should try it more often.

9. Treat people with respect

As a feminist, you are probably sucked into the oppressor-oppressed mentality or worse, that all men are rapists and are just waiting around the corner to kill or rape a woman. However, as stated on #7, most people are decent human beings and, this might come as a surprise to you, that includes men. Yes, men are good. I know this is shocking to you, but please bear with me and try to grasp how the real world works.

10. Enjoy popular culture with equitable circumspection

Yes, there are a lot of nasty things in pop culture but this is why nature gave you a brain – to use it. Whilst in no way should you take for granted what the popular culture gives you, at the same time you should make an effort not to view everything through an ideological lens. Yes, there are sexist commercials (e.g. see the Misandry in the media series[3]) but going ballistic on a commercial that shows a girl in a bikini on a car whilst ignoring the hundreds of thousands of commercials that depict and glorify violence against men won't solve the problem. Moreover, these issues can be solved a lot easier if you just stop buying the product, encourage others to do the same and write a letter to the company. You know… like a grown up decent human being. All you need to do if you choose to pay attention to these issues is to do it in an equitable manner.

11. Be comfortable with being uncomfortable.

This point is extremely important AND vital. The only way to acquire compassion is to put yourself out there, especially in situations that make you uncomfortable. For instance, try to read blogs like the Community of the Wrongly Accused, participate in dialogues about the over 40% disparity in sentencing between men and women and seek out spaces with a lot of people to talk about compassion. Often times, these articles and dialogues consists of difficult conversations surrounding male and female nature that could make you fell targeted and singled out as a member of that group whose behavior is being generalized. But if you want to be a decent human being, it is your social responsibility to stay and understand these issues, despite discomfort.

12. Listen

Other people's experiences and knowledge are the core of being a decent human being. While nobody is asking to take other people's experiences for granted without fact-checking and judging it for yourself, there are a lot of things you could learn about in this day and age if you properly listen.

13. Never force your opinions on other people.

Learn to step back. Stop leading conversations, especially in feminist settings where most of your ideological colleagues tend to think that arguing means spouting “shut the fuck up”[4] and listening means singing “cry me a river” when the issue of men committing suicide 4 to 7 times more than women is brought up. Collaboration and communication requires that all people be heard and respected. I know it can be hard to grasp that women aren’t angels and men aren’t monsters, but it’s a nice thing to try to listen and come to terms with the fact that your ideology is rarely consistent with factual reality.

14. Be pro-choice, not pro-entitlement.

Whilst very few people disagree that a woman should have the right to decide on her own body, you have to understand that the science of the “clump of cells” argument is still shady[5] and under the “abortion” label, infanticide is being advocated by feminist-influenced “ethicists”[6]. That’s one thing. Another thing is that being pro-choice doesn’t imply that the State should foot the bill for that choice (as is the case in most European nations), nor that the State should foot the bill for birth control pills. Pro-choice means exactly that: being able to make a choice. Anything above that is pro-entitlement and the entitlement mentality is what ruins the Western culture. If you want to be pro-choice, please, by all means, be that. But please, cut the entitlement thing.

15. Pick up some good books from the store to start off

One major aspect of being a decent human being is education. Put in the work and seek the appropriate resources. Here are some great books that I would suggest starting out with!

1. Everything George Orwell wrote (particularly “1984” and “Animal farm”)
2. Dr. Helen Smith – Men on Strike: Why Men Are Boycotting Marriage, Fatherhood, and the American Dream – and Why It Matters – it applies to the letter for the US, Canada, Europe, India, Australia, NZ and increasingly some countries of Africa (such as Nigeria).
3. Dr. Warren Farrell – The Myth of Male power.

4. Women, gender and fascism in Europe – 1919-1945. An absolutely fascinating collection of stories. I recommend those dealing with the Hungarian dictator Bella Kun which was the first one to bring concepts and ideas now known as “women’s studies” in late 30s Hungary.

16. Get involved with school programs and events.

In the Western world, a lot of school programs (particularly those dealing with sexual education) have been entirely taken over by ideologues preoccupied with teaching 12 year old children that all men are rapists[8], to simply demonize male sexuality[9] or to teach 11 year old boys that they are at fault for the natural process of climate change[10]. This has to stop. And, as a decent human being, you should involve, if you have the time and energy, in countering this damaging narrative that will screw the next generation.

17. Support compassionate non-profit organizations

I will not tell you that you must support A Voice for Men, since this article was written for the feminists out there who aspire to be decent human beings – albeit we definitely wouldn’t mind if you’d eventually end up doing so. But, as a decent human being, if you have some extra cash, you could support some Domestic Violence shelters that welcome both men and women or those that welcome only men. The ones that are women-only are already funded through the money that the State takes from you through taxation and most of them are run in a poor manner anyway. You will find out that whilst men comprise half of the victims of Domestic Violence, most nations have few or no shelters for these men. In fact, many male victims of DV are arrested themselves and considered a priori to be the abuser until proven otherwise – and once proven otherwise, they are released into the streets with nothing and subjected to increased risk of falling into another severe male problem – homelessness. That’s right, among the homeless, men are the great majority. So as a decent human being, you could also support homeless shelters and the compassionate organizations that give free meals to homeless people. They need those money more than the billion dollar industry of your ideology.

18. Don't just talk the talk. Walk your talk.

Being a decent human being isn't a 9-5 job. You can't choose when and when not to be a decent human being. If you're brave enough to do this, you must do it all the way. Be a decent human being in your daily life. Calling yourself a decent human being is not a label, but a lifestyle. Immerse yourself and do the best you can down to your very core.

19. Stop telling everyone you're "different than other feminists." Don't speak. Do.

Actions speak louder than words. Actually be different.

20. Challenge other feminists to do the same.

This information is useless if you keep it to yourself. Influence the feminists in your life in a positive way. It is your responsibility as a member of the ideology of feminism to get other feminists to see their privilege and care about fighting for what's right. If all of us would work even a little to be more of a decent human being, this culture would heal itself faster than one could imagine.

21. Reflect on how you were raised.

We know that some of you have been socialized to hate men[11] or your parents' extreme feminism tore apart your family and encouraged you to engage in risky behavior[12] under the guise of empowerment. If you are in this situation, use your decent-human-being consciousness, examine your upbringing and release yourself from the heavy baggage of nonsense instilled by your feminist parents or teachers.

22. Strengthen your relationships with other men.

Male friendship is highly important for everyone and particularly for men. Men and women are different – no matter how much your teacher tried to tell you otherwise. If you are a young man, strengthen your relationship with older men and with your father. They will be able to help you and understand your issues far better than your female feminist professor – and this works in many cases for women as well. In fact, for teenage girls, having a male role model is vital for their upbringing and for them to avoid engaging in risky behavior.

23. Take parental leave

Whilst the notion of having a stay-at-home parent can seem outdated to you, it is a matter of fact that a balanced intact family produces far better outcomes than any other combination. The decision regarding who is going to take parental leave should be an economic one but it's highly important for your child's future, particularly in the first years of life, to have a biological stay-at-home parent (and not a nanny!) and the other parent to be around as much as possible. I know it can be hard in many instances but being a single parent by choice will harm your child more than you realize now!

24. Put yourself in situations for self-growth through activism.

The moment you become a decent human being, you will notice that most of your feminist friends will hate your guts and you will have to come to terms with the fact that feminism is not against the system – it is the system. So if you have an opportunity to engage in activism for decent human beings, don't miss it.

25. Never seek recognition or affirmation.

Being a decent human being should more or less be the state of normality, but unfortunately it isn't anymore. While some people are made fun of for caring about men's rights and women's rights and acknowledge that feminism is hate, it has unfortunately become somewhat alluring to become an ideological bigot and not actual care for what's right. There aren't many who resist the allure, therefore it may seem tempting to let this temptation get in your head. Also, it may seem tempting to seek validation and verbal recognition from men and other people you know for caring about these issues and being different. Well, why should you receive special recognition when other people don't? Stand on your merit and earn a place at the table. I suggest you follow Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) to get this point better. The less you seek recognition and affirmation – the more it comes. If you actively seek it, you'll come across as rude, fake, and completely disrespectful. Do the work and let the results speak for you.

26. Recognize that you contribute to suppression of common sense by NOT acting.

The only way evil can prevail is for good people to do nothing. Every single day is an opportunity to prove your commitment to be a decent human being. Historically, people have done little to truly support what's right. Therefore, if you choose to ignore these issues, you are directly contributing to the perpetuation of a culture that infantilizes women, subordinates men and ultimately subordinates society to the whims of the State. So take action.

27. Claim the "decent human being" label.

I am not going to tell you to claim the MRA label. That's a decision that many de facto MRAs haven't done and I don't blame them. But if you really want to claim a label, claim the "decent human being" label. A decent human being doesn't hate men or ignore their pain, and doesn't think women are children or that women are oppressed in Europe and North America.

28. Blogs. Online Communities. Find spaces to dialogue with other like-minded people.

Seek out online and offline resources and communities to dialogue and be surrounded by other like-minded people. Being around other decent human beings is a very empowering experience; it replenishes your energy level, confidence, and your level of comfort in doing this work. It makes you feel not-so-alone. While dialoguing with bigots can sometimes have rewarding results, it's highly important that you share your thoughts and experiences with other decent human beings.

29. Attend a women's rights protest.

There is nothing else like it! You're going to love it – particularly if you use facts, logic and common sense with attendees there. This usually brings two results – a group of people that will lash out in temper tantrums and cry "oppression" (those are the kinds of people with whom it isn't really worth talking) and another group of people that are, in fact, decent human beings who thought that feminism is what the dictionary says, and not what feminism actually does.

30. Strengthen the relationships with the women in your life.

Most women, just like most men, are decent human beings with flaws and strengths, just like everyone else. However, since women were subjected to almost half a century of propaganda that they're princesses and that society owes them everything by virtue of their sex and claiming that's "oppression" – you will have to work a little harder to explain to them that this is not how the real life works. Older women might prove to be a great ally in this endeavor. Since most women are decent human beings, strengthening your relationships with them will be very successful in talking some sense into them.

31. Work with your partner or spouse on how to share responsibilities.

Whilst the idea of egalitarian relationships might sound noble, once you come back with your feet on the ground, you will soon find out that individuals are different, not equal. Consequently, you might find out that your husband or wife is quite content with an unequal settling. Don't look at things through ideological lenses – look at them through practical lenses. If a particular unequal arrangement suits both you and your partner, then leave it that way. Relationships are rarely fully consistent with the so-called "gender roles" or fully consistent with the egalitarian model. They're usually somewhere in between. And that's because individuals are different in capacities and desires, not equal. And it's the difference that makes our lives more fulfilling!

32. Judge everything for yourself!

You were probably told that you shouldn't judge certain people or certain behaviors. In fact, any decent human being with brain capacity judges everything. Those that claim they don't are either neurologically incapable or hypocrites, the latter being the most common. Judge everything for yourself! That's why nature gave you brain – to use it! The key is, however, to avoid imposing it on others. You may disagree with certain behaviors (I sure do) but as long as they don't hurt anyone else, leave it like that!

33. Watch Jagten (The Hunt) and Guilty Until Proven Innocent

The first is a Danish movie about a divorced man falsely accused of pedophilia and the second one is about a man who was sentenced to prison for a murder he did not commit. These will give you some perspective about how men that are accused of wrongdoing to females are being perceived by everyone and basically convicted and regarded as being guilty until proven innocent and sometimes even after. We call this misandry. Others call it the result of male vilification. You can call it whatever you like, but this is still a constant erosion of due process for men and it's happening all over the "free" world.

34. Make time out of your day to call your parents and catch up with them

If your parents are still alive and are not guilty of horrible abuses (like raising you to believe that all men are rapists), you should try to talk to them as often as possible. They brought you into this world and are responsible, in part, for what you are today as a person. If you were more close to one parent than the other one – call the one to which you were least close the first. Trust me, it'll do a lot of good.

35. Learn about your own familial roots and culture.

If you don't know where you came from, it's going to be difficult to see where you're going. Explore! Culture and diversity is beautiful, and being able to appreciate and respect culture will make you a better person. However, don't transform this into a tool of advancing further identity politics claptrap and victim mentality. It's harmful both to you and for the people around you. You are not a victim! You are a decent human being!

36. Treat women as you would treat men.

The leaders of your ideology constantly forget to tell you that being equal to men means that you are no longer an angel, but a human being, just like everyone else. That includes being accountable for your actions to the same extent as men, have obligations to others to the same extent, being able to face criticism and politically incorrect speech, no more special treatment (i.e. affirmative action) and, more importantly, having the responsibility to use your own agency.

37. Stop being so entitled.

This is more or less a continuation of the 14th point. You need to come to terms with the fact that in order to exist, you need to breath drink and eat. That is it – shelter is optional. Consequently, you have the right to work towards achieving these necessities, but you are not entitled to have them handed to you. Be grateful when someone shares theirs with you and be doubly grateful if it's out of pure kindness. You need to understand that you are owed nothing until you've worked towards it; assess your abilities, hone your skills, and earn your upkeep.

38. Be trustworthy

A decent human being is someone that people can trust with their secrets, provided that those secrets do no harm. So if during a school event, for instance, a boy comes to you and tells you how he was raped by his teacher (which happens much more often than the leaders of your ideology care to admit[13]), don't go to the nearest tabloid. Seek for evidence, and stand up for him whilst protecting his confidentiality. In other words, be a decent person.

39. Be willing to listen and know when to refer people to other resources.

As stated on the 3rd point, you don't know everything about everything. So if you get a cry for help from someone in another area about which you had no idea about, be willing to refer that person to another decent human being you know that is located closer to that individual. Some issues may be way over your head and you can do more harm than good if you are trying to intervene in an area you have no idea about.

40. Use your privilege to promote the decent human being approach

If you are a decent human being working in a University that has a Gender Studies program, openly challenge their assertions. Which one of them? Well, you can start with "men's violence against women" (it's "people's violence against each other"), "men rape, women are raped" (men are far more often victims of female sexual assault than your ideology recognizes), "men can't be discriminated against" or "women never lie about rape" and then go from there. No decent human being should tolerate such a degree of hateful indoctrination in a University.

41. Never give up.

As you become more and more immersed in the numerous ways feminism hurts society and you become more of a decent human being, there may be times where you feel like giving up or taking a break. Trust me, the work you are or will be doing is making a difference. This work may not yield immediate results or instant gratification, but I promise you that it leads to a better life. Go forth.

42. Always seek evidence

If you think something doesn't add up, don't believe just because someone you trust told you so. Just as you can be wrong, other decent human beings can also be wrong. Therefore, always seek for evidence instead of emotional claptrap. The leaders of your ideology are willing to lie through their teeth just to further their own agenda. You can start with the "1 in 4" lie. If 1 in 4 women will be raped during their lifetime, it means that if you talk to 100 random women over the age 40, you will have to find at least 20 cases. Moreover, if "1 in 4" nonsense is true, then definitely a significant proportion of the your and your friends' older female acquaintances have been victimized. Is that true? Can that really be true in Europe and North America? Always use common sense, facts and logic. The leaders of your ideology scream a lot, but this doesn't mean they are correct.

43. Read the work of Christina Hoff Sommers

As a feminist aspiring to be a decent human being, one of the ways to understand how the real world works is to read the work of Christina Hoff Sommers, herself a feminist, but a feminist who actually tried to be a decent human being and followed the advice from the 42nd point and used common sense, facts and logic when examining the claims made by the leaders of your ideology in Gender Studies classes. She started by noticing that men are a drastically decreasing demographic in almost all campuses in the developed world and went from there. You'll like her. She is a good role model for a feminist trying to be a decent human being.

44. Stop trying to look sophisticated or appeal to sophistication

You are not smarter if you use buzzwords like "patriarchy" to explain anything at any given moment, or if you use "intersectionality" as a code word for the good old Bolshevik class struggle. "Intersectionality," as you call it, is what brought principles like healthy origin[14] and enslaved millions of people in the name of absolute equality. Learn the roots of your ideology and the results those roots brought to places like Eastern Europe, Vietnam, Maoist China or North Korea. Any decent human being, once learning these roots, should quickly understand that this is not a way forward by any means.

45. Advocate for less totalitarian policies, rules, or procedures in your school or workplace.

Things like the Dear Colleague Letter, The Istanbul Convention, or policies requiring individuals to spy and report other people to the Authorities[15] are things that no decent human being should accept. Due process, free speech and equitable accountability are a given to any decent human being – but they need to be protected because the leaders of your ideology are trying, and in some cases are succeeding, in stamping them out, but only for half of the population.

46. Challenge entitlement.

Expanding on the 37th point, contrary to what the leaders of your ideology tell you, men don't owe anyone anything. They don't owe women money, respect, time, acknowledgment, putting up with tantrums, protection, sex, children, or a house. Nothing. So next time when you hear an adherent to your ideology urging men to “man up” and do the dirty jobs whilst feminists bash them, challenge that adherent.

47. Familiarize yourself with this book. You’ll thank me later.

Ernest Belfort Bax – The fraud of feminism[16]. It’s your ideology explained and taken to its logical conclusions in a very politically correct manner. You will find out that most of what other decent human beings are saying about your ideology is not something new and that your ideology has rarely (if ever) been a force of good and equity. You do not have to accept every argument he makes (very few today would agree that only men should vote) but in writing over 100 years ago he makes very good points that are still valid today.

48. Embrace the haters. You can learn a lot from them.

As a feminist aspiring to be a decent human being you’ll find out that suddenly you have a lot of haters. Watching how people that you considered friends or “sisters” suddenly talk bat shit crazy stuff at you for simply pointing out their failing logic is interesting. It gives you a lot of perspective about trustworthiness. Some of them might be willing to listen and concede some points but, most of them, despite their claims to the contrary, are not interested in debate and being decent human beings – they’re only interested to lecture others and shout “you fucking scum” if you dare to disagree with them[17]. Pick you battles carefully though as you might end up wasting your time. Since individuals are not equal, the same goes with your haters.

49. Travel a lot

A decent human being tries to expand his or her perspectives. A good, efficient and fun way to do that is by traveling – preferably to as many countries as possible, preferably countries that are extremely different from yours. This will give you a perspective that will surely change your views of what you thought to be the world. And it will also make you understand better that some issues are, in fact, first world problems that don’t really matter elsewhere.

50. Learn several foreign languages

The leaders of your ideology try hard to tell you that the West is oppressive to women. By learning several foreign languages you can get to read information by yourself. For instance, in Spain, feminists have installed what is now openly called Gender Stalinism[18]. Very few people knew about it until a feminist that aspired to be a decent human being reached out to other decent human beings and exposed what’s happening there. You didn’t hear that in the news, didn’t you? How could you if you speak only English?

51. Ask as many questions as possible

The leaders of your ideology will require you to ask as few questions as possible and if you insist on asking too many questions, they’ll call you “mansplaining” or “derailing” or “gaslighting” or “a traitor to your gender” – depending on your sex. But any decent human being should always ask questions and demand evidence. The more questions you ask, the more you’ll notice how very few decent human beings are in the feminist movement. Don’t be that feminist!

52. Start a blog!

There is a huge need for more decent human beings to start speaking up for what’s right. I love hearing different perspectives and connecting to other decent human beings. If your blog is in a language that I speak or understand thoroughly (Romanian, English, French, Swedish, Norwegian, Russian or Danish) don’t hesitate to write me. If not, write to another decent human being you know and go from there.

53. Seek out role models and pick their brains.

Whether it be a favorite author/blogger or activist, do your best to get into contact with that person and ask them questions. Take their advice and look for opportunities to collaborate. You don’t have to reinvent the wheel. Learn! You could start with Christina Hoff Sommers, as I mentioned earlier, or with Karen Straughan, Typhon Blue, Paul Elam, Warren Farrell, Dr. Paul Nathanson, Dr. Katherine Young, Erin Pizzey (the founder of the first Domestic Violence refuges in the United Kingdom) and so many other decent human beings which could offer you valuable insight when it comes to being a decent human being.

54. Respect other's spaces for dialogue

The leaders of your ideology will demand you respect women's spaces for dialogue. That's sensible, if that space is a private one, but the same leaders always go ballistic if one attempts to create a men's space for dialogue. As a decent human being, you should respect everyone's spaces for dialogue. Men are people, just like women. And sometimes they need to gather in a male-only space. Learn to respect that. And if you know someone that disagrees that men should have a space for dialogue, then you should know that that person is not a decent human being.

55. Work to improve yourself physically

The leaders of your ideology will tell you that you are beautiful the way you are and whoever disagrees is a sexist pig. But the real world doesn't work that way. There are a few little things called evolution, biology and the unalienable right to personal preference. No matter how many "acceptance" movements you'll start, the onus is on you, not on everyone else. When it comes to sexual relationships, people will have standards, just like you have your own. And the physique will play a role, no matter how much rhetoric you spew that it shouldn't. And it's you who needs to deal with this like an adult and a decent human being.

56. Don't be a criminal

I know this might seem weird, but many leaders of your ideology will advise you to mess with other people's property (like turning around magazines in stores) or harass people on their own property (like making noise in a store that sells Hustler). This is criminal behavior. Don't be that feminist! Also, some adherents to your ideology engage in harassment, intimidation and vandalism (see the incident with box cutters in Vancouver, Canada). This is also criminal behavior. If you have to resort to criminal behavior and censorship to prove your point, then you are not a decent human being. Don't be that feminist!

57. Be careful not to burn out.

Being a decent human being is, in many instances, an individualistic thing, even when you engage with other people. But if you engage with other people and/or in activism for decent human beings, at times, you are going to feel a decrease in motivation, stressed, and tired from this work. There may come a time where you come close to, or actually experience, complete burnout. And it's normal to feel that way once you pick up a newspaper and see that another married teacher walks Scot free after banging 12 year old boys and the media calls this "an affair" instead of rape because the victim happens to have a penis. But, think about it this way – 10 years ago this subject was a complete taboo. 15 years ago the leaders of your ideology were laughing in the decent human beings' faces and were saying that women are incapable of raping. Think of all those achievements, take a deep breath and you'll be able to come back faster than you thought.

58. Treat people as individuals

The leaders of your ideology will tell you that it's your duty to listen to other people tell you and judge your response according to the group to which they belong a group established by some randomly chosen criterion. As a decent human being, you treat people as individuals. If you are a man, the leaders of your ideology will tell you that you should listen and accept without any question what a feminist woman tells you about women because she knows better by virtue of her sex. If you are a woman, the leaders of your ideology will tell you that you should listen and accept without any question what an indoctrinated gay person tells you because that person knows better by virtue of his or her sexual behavior. This is nonsense! That's why nature gave you a brain – to use it. People can be wrong all the time and arguments stay on their merit, not on the person's sex or sexual orientation.

59. Drop the doublethink

Expanding on the 58th point, the leaders of your ideology will tell you that it's not your job to question a gay person unless you're gay but, in the same time, you should treat everyone equally regardless of sexual orientation, sex, race or whatever. But how can you treat everyone equally if you can challenge a straight man who is wrong but you can't challenge a gay woman who is wrong? Any decent human being knows that doublethink is a totalitarian practice. Drop it. You don't need it.

60. Stop playing the blame game.

Most of your problems are your problems. And it's up to you stand up for yourself. Slowly, even adherents to your ideology admit that your ideology is basically encouraging a toxic perpetual victim mentality[19]. It's not the fault of the "patriarchy" that you don't make as much as Bill Gates does, nor is the fault of the "rape culture" that you feel harassed when someone makes a joke in a conversation you weren't even part of (see Adria Richards and the "donglegate" scandal). Grow up!

61. Drop the "protected groups" mentality

The leaders of your ideology will tell you to treat everyone equally regardless of the group they belong to but, at the same time, will tell you to advance only the cause of women, gay people (usually only gay women), transgenders, racial minorities and other groups deemed to be "protected groups" by the powers that be – basically everyone except your average white man. Like I said in the 58th point, treat people as individuals. Yes, there are bad white men. We know it, the leaders of your ideology know it, everyone knows it. What the leaders of your ideology don't want you to know is that there are also a lot of bad women and a lot of bad gay people and they are bad because they are not decent human beings, not because of "patriarchy" or because they have been oppressed somehow. Nobody oppressed Christine Gail Magnum or Jodi Arias – but the leaders of your ideology still defend them in complete defiance of the factual reality. Don't be that feminist! Be a decent human being and acknowledge the reality.

62. Stop going against nature

Some leaders of your ideology will tell you that with enough social engineering and propaganda, human nature can be changed and gender utopia will be achieved. They are lying to you. Humans still have the appendix even though it's basically useless and we have been cooking food or several millennia (at least). Do you think a hundred years (which is the maximum amount of time your ideology will hold in the most optimistic view) of social engineering will in fact change human nature and the dynamics between the sexes in an irreversible manner? There will probably never be more women on oil rigs or more men in childcare or kindergartens no matter how much you try to convince yourself otherwise. It's called human nature and because of that, certain things will be more appealing to certain people than others. Sure, some women might enjoy working on oil rigs and some men might enjoy working in kindergartens but those are the exceptions. It's not "patriarchy", "heteronormativity" or "outdated" notions of masculinity or femininity that's keeping women outside of the oil rigs – it's personal preference.

63. Acknowledge that gender is not a social construct

Some leaders of your ideology will argue that gender should have no meaning because males and females aren't just equal; they're no different from one another. Other leaders of your ideology will argue that gender identity is rather fluid but still agree that it's a social construct. The reality is that "gender" is an ideological construct, more precisely a feminist construct. Men and women are different and some sex roles evolved because of the differences – not in spite of them (see the 62nd point). The word "gender" is for grammar issues for languages like French, Norwegian or Russian. "Sex" actually specifies male and female.

64. Challenge the demonizing

Most of the leaders of your ideology engage daily in demonizing the male sex. Some of them go so far to say that men are poisoned with testosterone and that if we could somehow drain the testosterone out of men everyone would have a great time. The drop of testosterone levels in men is linked to Parkinson's disease[20]. That in itself should alert any decent human being whose best interest the feminists have in mind. But besides this aspect, your ideology claims to be inclusive to transgender people. Well, considering that female to male transgenders need a good chunk of testosterone as part of their transitioning, the logical conclusion is that they are poisoning themselves with the root of all evil and you have to accept them, however. Does this make any sense to you? Because for me surely it doesn't. And I think it doesn't make any sense for any decent human being.

65. Call out false accusers

The leaders of your ideology will tell you that women never lie about rape or that it happens so rarely that you should ignore it. The reality however is that women do lie about rape and it happens far more often than your leaders want you to think. The false accusers are not only hurting innocent people (mostly men) but are also hurting real victims of rape or other violent crimes. Any decent human being should call out all false accusers and demand they be punished in a harsher manner.

66. Don't engage in censorship

Any decent human being believes in free speech. Engaging in censorship, like demanding a certain magazine be taken out of the market because it doesn't fit your views not only means you are not a decent human being, but it also means you are acknowledging that your arguments are poor and can't stand on their own merits in a free market of ideas. If your arguments are so good and convincing, then the opponent ideas will eventually go out.

67. Sexual objectification happens. Deal with it.

The leaders of your ideology will want you to know that women and girls are the only one subjected to sexual objectification and that sexual objectification is very harmful thing that harms women and only women. Well, the reality is that most sexual objectification harms nobody and it is a two-way street. Just go to Google Images and type "male sexual objectification" and you will find a tremendous number of commercials that do to men exactly the same thing that feminists whine it happens to women. But guess what? Nobody is hurt. In fact, this process is beneficial for the men and women involved in the process of making those commercials. A person posing for a "sexually objectifying" commercial sometimes earns for a picture more than your average white Russian man in a year. So no decent human being would actually consider that an issue. Moreover, the mating dynamics in humans (which stem from human nature) are more or less based on the process of sexual objectification. And it is again a two-way street. Don't tell me you've never heard women talking about a man's performance in bed or making assumptions about a man's sexual capabilities. These things happen amongst sexually healthy adults. In fact, it seems that cognitive sexual objectification of women is something that almost all people do – including women[21]. If you don't like it, don't practice it yourself – but stop claiming that it's a misogynistic thing or that it is an issue at all. It isn't.

68. Acknowledge that the Universe doesn't revolve around your feelings

The leaders of your ideology will try to argue that men should get out from the elevator and avoid being alone with a woman if she "feels" threatened. The same goes with other issues in which the leaders of your ideology argue that the outcomes of situations should be first and foremost determined by the woman's "feelings." As a decent human being, you should know that your feelings don't matter at all for at least 99.999% of the planet. As long as you don't hurt anyone, what you feel is of little to no importance for the rest of the universe. As a decent human being, you must acknowledge that there is a reason why a public space is called a public space – because all the public has the right to be there. Therefore, the elevator is not your personal space and no one should be subjected to exclusion because you "feel" in a certain way. If you really feel threatened, use your agency and get out of there. It's not every man's job to babysit your feelings.

69. Add more elements to this list

If you applied the first 68 points, then you are very decent human being, and if you are feminist aspiring to be a decent human being you should be able to add more elements to this list. Please feel free to do so in the comment section or by e-mail. I would love to know what you think. Thanks!

Sources:

[1] http://michaelurbina.com/101-everyday-ways-for-men-to-be-allies-to-women/

[2] http://livewirereview.com/pay-child-support/

[3] http://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PL9AB8387A4AB3EEC5

[4] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nvYyGTmcP80

[5] http://www.lifesitenews.com/news/unborn-child-just-a-parasite-cutting-edge-science-shows-fetal-cells-heal-mo/

[6] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/health/healthnews/9113394/Killing-babies-no-different-from-abortion-experts-say.html

[7] http://books.google.ro/books?id=luwQ2I6K…en&f=false

[8] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/is-croatia-the-balkans-sweden/

[9] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/mass-demonizing-of-male-sexuality-in-schools/

[10] http://www.avoiceformen.com/education/is-climate-change-a-man/

[11] http://www.xojane.com/family/i-was-raised-to-hate-men-and-now-i-dont-know-what-to-think-about-feminism

[12] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-1021293/How-mothers-fanatical-feminist-views-tore-apart-daughter-The-Color-Purple-author.html

[13] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2342105/Boy-11-fathers-child-36-year-old-mother-schoolfriend-prompting-calls-reform-New-Zealands-rape-laws.html

[14] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-governance-feminism/affirmative-action-a-historical-perspective/

[15] http://www.forbes.com/sites/realspin/2013/06/12/reporting-your-neighbors-speech-dont-laugh-its-coming-to-a-college-campus-near-you/

[16] http://archive.org/details/fraudoffeminism00baxerich

[17] http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iARHCxAMAO0

[18] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/spanish-gender-stalinism-part-i/

[19] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2381061/Todays-young-women-think-theyre-victims–Do-stop-whining-sisters-Weve-WON-sex-war.html

[20] http://www.medicalnewstoday.com/articles/264067.php

[21] http://www.theatlantic.com/health/archive/2012/07/study-proof-that-we-sexually-objectify-women/260339/

Schrödinger's feminist...

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 5 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

...Or How I Learned to Stop Worrying and Love the Box

Diana Davison's recent article, Victim Nation, at AVFM posed an interesting hypothesis that warrants further analysis. She stated:

> Where there is good there must be evil. To feminists, women are good and men are the only convenient target to label as the evil enemy. The characterization of men as inherently violent and beastly is essential to maintaining the victim class of all women. While they insist that it's not men they are fighting it's the "patriarchy," their plight is reduced unless the perpetrator is tangible. Patriarchy can't be put in jail.

Yes, they are fighting an intangible construct, "patriarchy." But as is the nature of constructs, they aren't real and as you say "can't be put in jail." But this is the power of fighting a construct as opposed to a tangible enemy. It can be redefined at will. "Patriarchy" is like God. Like religious fanatics who see God in everything, feminists see Patriarchy in everything. It is proof of its own existence.

I recently read an essay by T. J. M. Holden published in Food and Culture: A Reader (Counihan & Van Esterik, 2013). The subject was hegemonic masculinity in Japanese food programming on television. Holden asserted that there are many forms of masculinity in Japan, but only a hegemonic form is presented on food shows. He points to the shows holding "food battles" as the prime example. Most of these shows feature two or more chefs (almost always male) battling for kitchen supremacy. By emphasizing competition, victory, dominance, and defeat these shows promote hegemonic masculinity. This holds true, according to Holden, even if the two opponents are female. Yes, hegemonic masculinity can be exhibited by women. And of course it is hegemonic masculinity that forms the very foundation of Patriarchy. Taken to its logical conclusion, Holden is arguing that Patriarchy might exist even if men did not, because women can exhibit hegemonic masculinity.[1]

A war on a construct can go on forever. However, a war must be winnable and to win a war, there must be a tangible enemy. The war on drugs has its dealers. The war on terror has its Muslim extremists. The war on communism had Vietnam. The war on Patriarchy has men and as in any war, that enemy must be portrayed as evil. The result is "rape culture," men being portrayed as violent wife beaters, child abusers, and molesters, fathers become "deadbeat dads," or stumbling, bumbling oafs who can do nothing right, and so on. War can then be fought against such men. It can be won by either eliminating men, or by eliminating masculinity.

Constructivist philosophy suggests that reality is nothing more than a construct. Multiple realities, and therefore more than one Truth can exist. When truth becomes relative or a matter of perspective, it can be adopted or disregarded as a matter of convenience.

Schrödinger's cat is a prime example. The cat in the box is either alive or dead. But in the thought experiment it must be both because the psi-function requires both conditions co-exist. As Einstein put it, there is an assumption of reality that is independent of observation and it is "a risky game [to think of] reality as something independent of what is experimentally established." In other words, multiple realities exist until an observation can be made. Only when reality is observed will these multiple realities collapse into a single reality. The cat is both alive and dead until the box is opened and the reality can be observed.

If one views feminism as the box, men and women as the cat, and feminists as the physicists standing outside looking at the box, but refusing to open it to look inside, then one gets an idea of feminist discourse. It is a system of ethics based on utilitarianism and a pragmatist approach to science.[2] Ethics and truth are subjectively based on happiness and utility. Utilitarian morality is based upon outcome of actions, not the actions themselves; creating a subjective ethical system where the end justifies the means. The subjective nature of utilitarian ethics permits the feminist to characterize men as either good or evil as it suits the purpose. For instance, if there is no difference between men and women, men must be good by nature (because women are). Therefore the evil of masculinity can be eliminated by re-socializing men to make them act more like women.

The utility in this feminist belief is that it can be used to sell feminism to men and create male feminists. At the same time, feminists can argue that men are inherently evil (all men are rapists) and call for their elimination. The utility here is that the elimination of men would create the greatest amount of happiness for the greatest number of women. The end (happiness) justifies the means (gendercide). It is why an entire audience of otherwise "good" women can laugh and scream in joy when Sharon Osborne said it was fabulous that a man had his penis severed by his wife for wanting a divorce. It eliminates cognitive dissonance.

It can also be seen in feminist science. Mary Koss gets away with her 1 in 4 rape statistic by dismissing the views of those women who answered "yes" to her rape questionnaire but indicated that they had not been sexually assaulted in personal interviews because the result of the interview was not useful. Qualitative research methods have become increasingly popular in social science research because of the subjective nature of the data analysis used in those methods. Pragmatist philosophy considers the purpose of science to be one of determining action and problem solving rather than one of describing reality or seeking truth.

The position is that science should be evaluated in terms of its usefulness, not its accuracy. It allows the use of an interpretive lens to analyze data, thereby biasing the results according to the bias inherent in the lens. Confirmation bias enters into the research through the interpretive lens. In feminist research, the lens confirms that any discovered disadvantage of women relative to men must be the result of discrimination that can be attributed to Patriarchy or hegemonic masculinity.[3] Research can then be conducted in order to "give voice to" underrepresented groups or to drive a political agenda, using subjective realities in place of objective fact.

This is precisely what we see in feminist research when it is used to influence public policy. Objective Truth is unimportant. Subject truth is all that matters. The American Association of University Women can continue to deny the objective Truth that the educational system disadvantages boys and men relative to girls and women and claim the opposite by emphasizing the few areas that remain where girls and women are still at a disadvantage. The relative importance of these areas of disadvantage is unimportant. What matters is that areas of disadvantage remain of girls and women and those areas are what should be addressed.

Patriarchy can't be put in jail. But it doesn't need to be. Since Patriarchy is a feminist construct, it can be killed by opening the box; for when the box is opened, the true nature of men and women (as human beings) can be seen and will be shown to be in conflict with the subjective reality of feminism. If a goal of the MHRM is to dispel the victim nation, all it need do is open the feminist box and encourage people to look inside.

---

[1] However, it would likely be called by a different name. If men did not exist, there would be no masculinity. The entire range of human behavior would be feminine, so women exhibiting that behavior would likely be dubbed hegemonic feminists.

[2] It is the opposite of positivism which is derived from empiricism and the scientific method which would suggest that knowledge can be acquired through sensory experience (observation). Positivism would demand that the box be opened so that the objective reality can be known.

[3] The scientific method's requirement that the researcher account for alternate explanations for causality can be disregarded. Thus Koss can assert that the women's denial of being sexually assaulted was because they didn't understand the meaning of sexual assault without examining alternate hypotheses such as the possibility that her questionnaire was not a valid measure of sexual assault and many of the responses were false positives.

The broken dialogue of Cathy Young

August Løvenskiolds · 5 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I'm not sure I like your tone, Young Lady. In fact, I am sick of it. Keep it up, and I'm gonna get the paddle.

Scary, right?

When you dismiss men's rights in 734 words with a "tone" argument, you disprove your own thesis that those who support men's human rights need to be nicer in order to get their message across. You know, like those Nice Guys that never get laid while the Mean Guys score all the action from the hot chicks. Awesome work bashing those uppity man-slaves, oh-so-sensitive Cathy, but your feminine prejudices have blinded you to the reality of those who struggle daily in support of men's human rights.

So, to bring the rhetoric of both feminism and men's human rights together in one elegant sentence: "Check your privilege, blue piller."

You do remember writing Men and women, we're all in this together. Let's act like we know that, don't you? But it is not that simple.

Gender issues have never been a dialogue – they are a monologue, and a Vagina Monologue at that. The penis enters the picture only through the cackles of harpies like those on The Talk, tittering at its mutilation and disposal.

Screaming "WHY WON'T YOU TAKE ME TO THE LAKE!" is fine for those poor women, I guess, but "STOP KILLING ME" is disgusting to you and others when men say it. A man begging for mercy only gets mercy if he claims "I have wife and kids who need me!" – men are only seen as valuable for their service to women, whereas women are seen as valuable because Vagina. When has a feminist ever said "you are valuable because you are a man. Don't let anyone tell you any differently. Men built civilization, and so, men as a class have nothing to apologize for."

I say that almost every day to the angry or depressed men who seek my counsel. What would you say to them? Shut the fuck up, you angry men?

Have you ever even considered that men's human rights advocates are angry and vulgar because we have to be in order to be heard?

When it comes to listening to people in pain, we prioritize women's pain over men's pain – in fact, men's expression of pain is viewed as cowardly and unmanly. There are sound evolutionary reasons to prioritize women's pain, of course – dismissing the pain of a woman in labor is not a good plan for ensuring that your genetic offspring survive. That's why men's concerns, expressed politely, are so easily dismissed – like Amanda Marcotte dismisses men's pain – because women demand men's strength and hyperagency, and the expression of a man's pain equals weakness.

But when it comes to listening to people in anger, we prioritize men's anger over women's. Men are BIG and STRONG and an angry man is DANGEROUS – more dangerous than an angry woman, anyway, in terms of the perception of immediate threat. In fact, we men are all branded as potential rapists and pedophiles – we only get attention because of the supposed threats we represent. We humans pay attention to potential threats and hence people cannot afford to ignore angry men in the same way they dismiss men in pain (weak, so who cares?) or women in anger (weaker than men, so who cares?).

Why, Cathy, are you demonizing men for using the only way we have left to make our voices matter?

You even acknowledge the validity of some of our concerns – the massive differential in workplace death rates (almost 92% male in 2011), suicide rates, and the ways men are raped for child support, etc. – but you find our rhetoric to be "toxic" and "vulgar" (like, um, the naked lesbian pedophilia in the original version of the Vagina Monologues, perhaps?) but even when you hear and supposedly understand men's legitimate needs and concerns, you still don't get it.

We listen to women's expressions of pain and need because we're programmed to, both by our genes and our socialization. We need only listen to men when men are "vulgar" and "angry" and hence, are a threat. So, inevitably, if I have to call someone a stupid, fucked-up bitch to get some attention – MEANINGFUL attention – then that is what I'll do. And you can bite me, Cathy Young, if you can't grasp that.

That's my allotment of 734 words to counter yours. We're equal. I feel better now; do you?

Men's human rights & supposed "hate speech"

Erin Pizzey · 6 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Just recently there has been a concerted effort by radical feminists to attack any man who dares question their rule of law over all areas of our lives. This domination takes in all social media: television, newspapers, websites and magazines. I have seen screeds of radical feminist rhetoric on the internet that talk about castrating men, killing baby boys and make outrageous threats against transsexuals. Yet, when men finally begin to stand up and talk about the international violence against them at the hands of these radical feminists and the agencies and courts they control, these very same women are able to deem anything they say as a "hate crime." There is, in fact, a largely invisible war raging as men and men's groups gather together to oppose the whole radical feminist movement and its own 'hate speech.'

But first I want to give you some history that will hopefully explain why we are here at this point in time.

In the late sixties a new movement was born out of many of the frustrations women were experiencing at the time. I remember the humiliation of having to prove that I intended to get married before my doctor would agree to give me the pill. In the fifties, I became aware of the numbers of women who were pregnant and were victims of illegal abortions. I lost a friend to a raging infection she had contracted because she was too frightened to go to hospital, fearing she had committed an illegal act and could end up in prison. A woman had to have a father or husband sign to guarantee a mortgage. Yes, there were reasons to embrace this new movement that promised women their voices would be heard and also said that women would no longer compete against each other, but would join together to make a new and better world for all of us. All my friends were as excited as I was to hear everything they could about this new movement.

I was a close friend of a woman journalist called Jill Tweedie and she was writing articles for The Guardian, and every morning I awoke fired up by her rhetoric on the new future of women in the world. I, like so many other women at home with children, was feeling lonely and isolated. My husband was away for long periods of time and effectively I was a single parent family.

So I went along to my first Women's Liberation meeting (as it was called in the early days) held at a private home near by, only to find that it was chaired by a rather hostile woman. Nevertheless, we paid three pounds ten shillings to join and were told that the next step was so organise 'consciousness raising' groups in our own homes and to consider ourselves a 'collective' and call each other comrades. I recall being appalled by the huge posters of Chairman Mao on her sitting room wall. I actually knew a lot about Chairman Mao because my family were captured by the Communist in Tien Sien in 1949 and were put under house arrest, while my twin sister and I were in a convent in England. I heard first-hand from my father, a diplomat, about the atrocities that were happening in China, so I feared then that this whole so-called new women's movement might be just another undercover attempt to coerce women into supporting Marxism.

My involvement ended at a conference where the old Marxist slogans were wheeled out and fed to an audience of bewildered women who had come to talk about equity feminism, but instead were given instructions to ditch their husbands and partners and to put their children into twenty-four-hour nurseries so they could become part of the work force. We were told that the family was a dangerous place for women and children, so the new family must comprise women and children, with men being disenfranchised as fathers. In the end, I found myself on a platform facing a screaming mob of fanatics, while I attempted to shout over the noise that this was not a women's movement and had never been intended to be a women's movement.

Most normal women fled the movement, but there were sufficient numbers of troubled women who had anger issues of their own to embrace this new religion. They followed their sister's instructions to the letter, refusing any game, toy, or book which pertained to masculinity. The sisterhood assured their captive audience that their husbands or partners had oppressed them and that men were the enemy. Their role as mothers was to see that their boy children were to be treated as girls and obliged to play with kitchen sets and dolls. Masculinity was a social construct, so it was up to all women to eradicate any traces of this damaging behaviour from their boys so that the world would become a much safer place.

I was furious and frustrated because no one would listen. I warned as many people as I could that Women's Liberation was probably the most dangerous movement of the century. I warned that if it was not stopped, it would undermine the family and destroy men and boys. It would force women out to work whether they wanted it or not, and it would create such a division between men and women so that relationships would become impossible.

For a very long time men were silent. Men were not used to supporting each other emotionally. Unlike women, who have a built-in biological mechanism that enables them to network with each other to achieve their goals, men are used to cooperating only to create things and join in with each other over physical activities. Men also channel their emotional life through women, so when women began to turn on their partners, they had no idea how to deal with the fact that they were now being booted out of their homes and denied their children.

Men's initial response was to see the emerging women's movement as a joke, but as the years went by, more and more men became aware that their own situations were not just personal but were internationally epidemic. Very slowly and quietly men began to get together on the newly emerging internet. There, anonymously, and sometimes in great pain, men were beginning to share their sorrow and indignation. A fierce undercurrent was being born as men who had always loved their families and paid their taxes discovered that they now could no longer shelter under the umbrella of their human rights.

Any woman in the western world could now pick up the telephone and, without any evidence, have her partner removed. He would simply be deemed guilty and banned from the family until he was able to prove otherwise. Wherever I travelled, I saw with my own eyes the evidence that men are now deprived of their passports and driving licenses for not paying maintenance. Their cars were repossessed and, unable to drive, they were often unable to work.

Within twenty years, without any opposition, this evil empire quietly moved into positions of power. The governments of the western world said nothing. In England, our House of Commons said nothing. Everyone knew that it is women who often get out to vote, so why would Barrack Obama or David Cameron risk the wrath of prominent radical feminists in their midst if it would mean losing votes?

In the twenty-first century we now have a situation were women are almost in a position of total power in relationships. Of course there are many normal happy women who love their husbands and their partners and children. However, as single parenthood was a necessary part of the radical feminist agenda, we now have millions of single parent families (usually women). Some are in this position because they have been abandoned by their partner, but far more have booted out the fathers of their children and have turned to the State for support. We have millions of children across the world who have no fathers and no male role models since men had left the education system in droves.

Today in England, mothers who wish to stay at home and look after their children are not going to be able to apply for the £1200 grant that is to be given to couples who are in full time work to help them pay to put their children into nurseries. Women have lost their right to be home with their children. There are no choices now. By denying mothers the right to be at home with their children our Conservative government, once the bastion of family values, also denies the importance of the role of parents in the family.

The traditional family is all but extinct.

Here in England, there are discussions about removing the word 'husband' from our vocabulary. Harriet Harman, the Women's Minister of the last Labour government, is still driving women out to work with the full approval of our Tory Prime Minister. Fathers are banished from their homes and their children. Men are killing themselves in unprecedented numbers and nobody cares. We have millions of young men deprived of an education thanks to the institutionalised misandry running like a virulent virus through our schools.

I have for so long been wringing my hands in despair, so I was delighted when I first read about “Fathers for Families.” They, at least, seemed to have the courage to come out in the open and bring attention to the sufferings of men. There were howls of rage of course from the radical feminists, but this was the beginning as far as I am concerned of men beginning to fight back.

More recently, I found a home in an organisation called A Voice for Men. They are radical, brash and unapologetic, but they are also a broad church where both men and women can work together to make the necessary changes to eradicate the radical feminist movement. A Voice for Men was founded by Paul Elam, who is a straight-talking, no-nonsense leader and he is quite clear that he and his colleagues will not be deterred from getting justice for men. For my part I have finally found a group of people who have no time for radical feminists. At last men are standing to be counted and hopefully, if more are willing to join us, we can turn this vicious movement of women around.

Of course, there are women who are innocent victims of men’s violence, but there are just as many men who are victims of female aggression. The whole monstrous lie that it is “patriarchy,” i.e. all men who oppress women, is a lie. Why did this lie ever become held up as the truth? Because Marxist women across the world were looking for a just cause to fund their politics.

In 1971, I opened the first ever shelter for battered women and their children. My cause was soon hijacked because, as far as the radical part of the women’s movement were concerned they had found their Trojan horse. By deeming all men as guilty of violence and oppression and all women victims of men’s violence and oppression they had the tools and the machine that could create a billion dollar industry that could be rolled out across the western world. The feminized media, the judiciary, all the caring agencies and governments bowed to this persuasive argument. The movement was ring fenced against men who were banned from working in refuges and boys were also banned from refuges by the age of nine or twelve.

I think that now we are going to see an upsurge in this war against men. Radical feminists know that sufficient politically sophisticated men and women have rumbled the big lie. Valid research makes nonsense of the radical feminists own attempts at publishing their massaged figures. Domestic violence is not a gender issue, it is a generational issue. Children born into toxic families are marinated in violence, and it makes no difference whether they are male or female.

It is now possible to use MRI scans see the damage caused to the young brains of children by exposure to violence in early life. This is what I have always believed. As honest trustworthy men and women’s voices get louder, the radical feminists will have to fight harder to defend their billion dollar funding allocations. Eventually governments across the world will have to take steps to undo some of the legislation that targets men as the enemy. Hopefully, some men who have unjustly been thrown out of the homes and their children’s lives will have the course to take a class action to the courts. Maybe they will be able approach the Court of Human Rights in Brussels to have their human rights restored and to claim compensation from the courts of law that illegally denied them their rights.

Perhaps other men will take the shelter/refuge movement to court for denying them their equal right to allow them to work alongside women in the refuges. The first money donated to my refuge was voted by the mothers to be spent on a good gentle man to work with the children. How can the shelter movement ban men when, not only is it vital for children to experience good gentle men, but so many of the women have never had access to normal kind, sensitive men?

For the first time I have hope.

I work in London with Andy Thomas who is the director of A Voice for Men‘s operation here in the UK. I also work with Dean Esmay who is in the US, and share a radio programme with him called “Revelations with Erin Pizzey,” a bi-monthly show where we can talk to men and women about a wide range of issues that affect them.

There is, however, a systematic effort by feminists to label A Voice for Men and our efforts as “hate.” These are the kinds of bullying tactics that radical feminists have always used. A Voice for Men is not “hate,” but a voice of hope, concern and justice for many lonely, isolated and suicidal men out there.

Editor's note: the original version of this piece was published earlier today on A Voice for Men-UK. –DE

This article is also available in Hebrew and Romanian.

Can’t we all just get along?

The Honeybadger Brigade · 6 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

“Can’t we all just get along?”

It’s an argument we’ve heard over and over from sources critical of the men’s human rights movement. It gets handed to us by individuals who think of feminism and the MHRM as two opposite ends of an activism spectrum, with feminists representing women, and the MHRM representing men.

The latest version of it, a Boston Globe editorial by Cathy Young, is a sugar-coated rehash of the same tone argument feminists have been using to try to shame MHRAs into silence for years; shaming language, claims that MHRAs are too loud, too brash, too rude, and talk too much about the problems the movement exists to address. She could have snatched the last few paragraphs of her article almost directly from the plethora of feminist commenters who have made the same argument in men’s forums all over the internet. The writing doesn’t reflect an epiphany or even an original idea.

It’s the feminist company line.

The article is dishonest and self-contradicting. After describing all of the reasons why a men’s movement is needed, she went on to try to use a vague, unsupported accusations to shame into silence those responsible for bringing men’s issues into the public view.

Let’s take a closer look at them.

> Unfortunately, any movement championing one gender seems doomed to devolve into victim politics and demonization of the other sex.

This generalization is a direct contradiction to her previous statements. Up to the paragraph containing this sentence, Young did a pretty decent job of explaining why the men’s human rights movement exists, listing off several important issues. Her writing discussed some areas in which men are victims of discrimination and in which female abuse of men is facilitated by discriminatory law. After prefacing her personal version of “shut the fuck up” with a conciliatory description of issues the movement exists to address, she went on to hypocritically deny their impact by referring to discussion about them and efforts to address them as “victim politics,” and “demonizing of the other sex.”

What she has said there, in the context of the whole article, is “Yes, I know men can be victimized by women, and I know that society and the law are structured to make it easy for women to victimize men, and I know that there are women who take advantage of that… but shame on you for talking about it.”

> Some leading men’s rights websites such as A Voice for Men offer a steady diet of vulgar woman-bashing that discredits any valid points they may make.

At first glance, the statement looks like an attack only on A Voice For Men.

It isn’t. Though the sentence mentions the site, it’s an inclusive statement, referencing leading websites. It’s an attack not only on this site, but on every site where men’s rights advocates dare to gather. It’s an attack on all of us – every men’s rights advocate who has the nerve to speak out about men’s issues.

It also isn’t an honest statement. Discussion on leading men’s rights websites centers on highlighting the issues men face, the causes of those issues, and changes in law, policy, and social norms which would be necessary to fix those issues. Among the issues noted in Young’s article, many involve ways in which women benefit from laws that discriminate against men, and as she noted, feminists have opposed men’s efforts to remedy that. Discussing those issues is naturally going to include pointing out the abuse itself, which in turn means pointing the finger at its female perpetrators and their feminist defenders. It will also naturally include challenging popular opinion on aspects of those issues, and challenging popular opinion on related women's issues.

In labeling such discussion "a steady diet of vulgar woman-bashing," Young is really saying two things; first, that women must be exempt from criticism, even when discussing issues that are a result of female dysfunction… and second, that feminist ownership of women's issues must not be challenged by alternative viewpoints. This is simultaneously an incredibly tight control to place on gender-issues discussion, and a leash that can be placed on those unruly female MHRAs who fail to toe the feminist line.

Between the lines, she's saying a third thing that most people won't pick up – the same thing feminists everywhere say between the lines when they invade men's issues forums with the "Can't we all just get along?" argument. To pick up on it, you have to realize that criticism of feminism and female dysfunction can't be vulgar woman-bashing unless one assumes that all women are feminist, and all women are dysfunctional.

MHRAs cannot discuss women. Women are the proprietary territory of feminist writers. Discussion on women's behavior and women's issues must always be shaped by feminist ideology, or anything you say will be considered misogyny.

The sentiment goes beyond male discussion. It's not just a statement of ownership of the topic, "women." It's ownership of women. It's also the use of castigation of men's speech to shame women who support the MHRM. That can be further seen in Young's subtle claim that the MHRM is not a gender equality movement.

> Perhaps what the 21st century needs is not a women's movement (which was once essential to secure basic rights) or a men's movement, but a gender equality movement.

That paragraph isn't the invitation to inclusion it's intended to appear to be. It's "shut the fuck up, MHRAs." Strip off the nice intro, read that paragraph by itself, and what you have left is the same thing we see in this type of argument all the time. Her point isn't "we should be working together," but "I want to convince you the MHRM has no legitimacy as a stand-alone movement."

A women's movement 'was once essential to secure basic rights," but when men's basic rights have been attacked and compromised, a men's movement is not needed to remedy that. Feminism has gone too far, as she pointed out in an earlier paragraph, but apparently a men's movement isn't needed to remedy that, either. Contrary to Young's insinuation, it can be acknowledged that feminism is not a gender equality movement, because there are demonstrable examples of feminist efforts to create or maintain discrimination against men and boys in law, policy, and social conditions. That's not gender equality advocacy.

What Young fails to understand is that the MHRM is a gender equality movement. The movement doesn't attack women or women's rights, but instead treats women with a respect that feminism has tried to kill – the application of standards. We don't have to be identical to men to be equally valued, and we don't have to damsel to get them to listen to our opinions, even those with which they disagree… but we do have to live up to the same expectations of character that men are accustomed to being expected to display.

Feminism is degrading. Feminist advocacy strives to normalize and excuse female dysfunction, and the expectation of special treatment. Feminist theory imposes helplessness on women to support an agenda. Feminist leadership uses the concept of total female vulnerability for political fodder, and in doing so, unnecessarily pits us against men. That is not empowering. It's disturbing and creepy.

Feminists reserve a special hatred for female MHRAs, because we refuse their exploitative advances. That reduces the size of their stable of proxy victims to whore out for public sympathy, in three ways:

We deny them the ability to use us directly.
We show how dishonest they are in imposing perpetual victimhood on others.
We call them out on it when they do that.

That kills their monopoly on the female end of the gender-issues dialogue, a tool they've been using to wrangle funds and political power for decades. When we buck the self-perceived authority of feminist leadership, we threaten their income and status. Bad honeybadgers. No snake guts for you.

The hidden message for female MHRAs in the "Can't we all just get along" argument is get your ass back in line, bitches! How dare you!

How dare you side with the enemy!
How dare you call the enemy a human rights movement!
How dare you contradict your feminist overlords!
Don't you realize if you do that, we'll make you look mean, and ugly, and nobody will like you?

What women like Cathy Young don't understand is that this particular method of attack – the "can't we all just get along" tone argument – does not work on either the men or the women of the MHRM.

You're not going to shut men up by castigating them over the tone of their speech.

You're not going to shut female MHRAs up by treating the movement as an outrage.

We are not withering violets, afraid that our words won't be accepted, our opinions not liked, and our methods not approved.

We're not here for a popularity contest. We're here to draw attention to issues people want to ignore.

We're here because we're not your political property.

We're here because fuck perpetual victimhood.

We're here because feminism hurts women, too.

We're here because men's rights are human rights.

Sincerely, the Honeybadger Brigade

Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat)
Alison "Asha" Tieman (Typhon Blue)
Hannah Wallen, aka Della Burton
Suzanne McCarley
Janet Bloomfield (Judgy Bitch)
Amy Dee (Correctrix)
Diana Davison
Elena Rider
Magdelyn Prossii
Dr. Helen Smith
Dr. Tara Palmatier
Brenda Donovan
Susie Parker (100% Cotton)
Stacey Allison
Aimee McGee
Nicky Lawrence
Jennifer Hast

Hatcher dismisses Kelly suit

VFM News and Commentary · 6 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: this item originally published on Putnam*LIVE*. For further updates on this story of an out-of-control judiciary seeking to silence journalists exposing corrupt and incompetent judges in West Virginia see Chris Dickerson's reporting in the West Virginia Record, and earlier stories on AVfM including the story West Virginia Family Court corruption and incompetence, the story Judge Michael J. Kelly conflict of interest, and the story West Virginia harassing father & publisher. Expect to hear more updates on this story as one father with virtually no resources fearlessly takes on the entire West Virginia judiciary by himself, all for his son's right to have a father.

On June 28, 2013, counsel for the above-named Defendant filed a pleading captioned "Motion to Dismiss on Behalf of Defendant Michael J. Kelly," with an attached Memorandum of Law and exhibit. The Plaintiff has filed no written response to said motion.

By a letter dated July 15, 2013, the Court notified the Plaintiff, Mark V. Halburn, and counsel for the Defendant that it could and would rule on the aforementioned motion to dismiss without the necessity of a hearing. The Court, in said letter, directed Mr. Halburn, the Plaintiff, and counsel for the Defendant to submit to the Court proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law no later than Wednesday, July 24, 2013, at 4:00 p.m. Counsel for the Defendant timely filed her proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law and the Plaintiff, as of 12:00 Noon, Friday, July 26, 2013, has failed to submit any proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Hatcher Dismisses Kelly Suit

Falsely Says Critical Legal Filing Wasn't Made

In the latest case of the corrupt West Virginia court system protecting bad judges, a lawsuit against Kanawha County Family Court Judge filed by Putnam*LIVE*.com's Publisher, Mark Hallburn, has been dismissed by specially appointed Circuit Judge John Hatcher, Jr.

[image]

Michael J. Kelly

"First every Kanawha County Judge recused themselves from the case, delaying justice and protecting Kelly," says Hallburn. "Then Hatcher refused to hold a hearing-further protecting Kelly."

Finally, Hatcher dismissed the case falsely stating that Hallburn failed to file Points of Law in response to a Motion To Dismiss on Behalf of Defendant Michael J. Kelly.

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF KANAWHA COUNTY, WEST VIRGINIA

(HALLBURN), HALLBURN
Plaintiff (s)

Civil Action No.: 13-C-1057

KELLY
Defendant (s)

RESPONSE TO MOTION

SEE ATTACHED

However, as you can see by the document above, Hallburn clearly filed the response on July 23rd, 2013, in Kanawha Circuit Court, one day prior to Hatcher's self-imposed deadline.

"Hatcher is a liar that is abusing his authority to protect Kelly," says Hallburn, who has sent a complaint to Supreme Court Administrator Steven D. Canterbury. "The document was filed in the court and mailed to Hatcher's office. He and Kelly need to be removed from the bench. Judgment in my favor. Close the case and send these judges to prison. West Virginians deserve a clean and ethical court system. They don't have that now."

Hallburn filed the lawsuit because Kelly refused to let his son, Matthew, visit Mark's mother, Nancy, when she became terminally ill, in 2012.

Kelly lied and said Hallburn didn't file a required budget, and medical documents, then admitted that he'd received them in an August order, including this Hospice admission form.

ADMISSION

NOTICE TO CONSUMERS

"Kelly lied and the courts are protecting him," says Hallburn. "They lost the budget, but it was re-filed. He lied about it. Now Hatcher is saying I didn't file the document. It's in the court file, we have it stamped 'received' in black and white."

Manhood 101 for feminists

Paul Elam · 6 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are at it again, demonstrating they are equal to men in strength and independence — by damseling themselves, threatening to cry and faint and never step up to prove their equalness again if men don't start protecting them from harsh words typed from behind anonymous screen names on the interwebs.

You can get a sample of that kind of thinking in this video.

Once again, they need men to clear the way, not of wild beasts or indigenous savages or foreign attackers, but of misfits and teenagers with laptops and low social IQs. Only when this scurrilous plague is extirpated can this brand of woman prove she can do anything men can do, and do it better, and do it in heels.

Feminist woman has so much to say; so many emotions to emote, and she will stand behind it all like Joan of Arc, as long as there are men around to shut anyone up who gives her a hard time. Or who disagrees with her. Or who might look a little creepy.

Her censorship target célèbre this time is the social media website Twitter, where, like everywhere else online, there is no shortage of under-socialized, and likely underage incorrigibles who get a rise out of getting under people's skins. The thinner the skin, methinks, the better.

Nothing gets under the wafer-thin porcelain epidermis of a feminist quicker than rapey-tweets, which apparently have been coming in abundance.

Mind you, the feminists have reframed these comments into rape "threats," which almost none of them are. But don't worry, I won't bore you long with such realities. The fact is that many of these comments do have a kind of rapey aura to them, which is by design since everyone knows that use of the "R" word outside PSAs for the sexual grievance industry makes feminists wilt like cheap flowers and put 911 on speed dial.

There are actually two phenomena at play here. One is the comments themselves, which we will get to in a minute, but the first one is what I like to call Watson's Law. This is the principle that social power and dominance for feminist women as a class is roughly equal to a manufactured crisis multiplied by the energy expended by obsequious men to charge in and fix it.

We saw this law's namesake, Rebecca Watson, pave the way for her sisters by taking a few internet comments and turning them into a security crisis for secular conferences, thereby thrusting her (with her enthusiastic consent) into the public limelight. Since then she can giggle and smile while complaining that she can't make it through the parking lot at a secular gathering without being raped, or maybe even being invited to coffee.

Anita Sarkeesian was a quick study in Watson's Law. She took the basic principles and put them to work for profit. Sarkeesian posted some pro-feminist drivel in an online community where she knew it would not be popular, then took the predictable rapey-beaty reactions, parlayed them into a threat narrative and used that to damsel herself in a Kickstarter. She shrewdly manipulated her way into 150 grand, with which she has made a couple of Youtube vids aimed at ultimately asserting feminist hegemony in the gaming world.

Not bad work if you can get it, and these women can.

Since then more has happened. Adria Richards used Twitter to target two guys telling risqué jokes, to each other, at a tech conference and got one of them fired. Her execution was poor, though (she just claimed to be offended when what she needed was a threat), and she ended up with her own pink slip.

[image]
This is what a feminist looks like.
From there Watson's Law was played out on Facebook, where feminists sought and got a great deal of control of public discussion by putting feminists in charge of turning over every rock to find online misogyny. It even affected

AVFM. Some of our memes were removed for violating ~~community~~ feminist standards. Not for being rapey-beaty, or even misogynistic, but for dissenting from the feminist narrative.

Such is where this kind of thing always, always ends up. Expect more of Watson's Law to govern a website or public organization near you.

These stories have been covered incessantly, in the feminist blogging community and in the mainstream. The counter-theory has been brought to you by this website and others like it. But as we pick and bicker over the relative worth of feminist women's demands that men make them feel more equal by using force on other men they don't like, the comments themselves have suffered a severe lack of analysis.

Oh, we have covered the basics. Certainly, "Someone should tie you to a shitter and rape you," isn't the kindest thing that someone could say. But a real, bona fide call the police and start an investigation threat?

Feminist please.

And this is what almost all of the so called threats were like. There were a few comments, very few, that could be considered actual threats. That stands in direct contrast to what has been shoveled like fertilizer by feminist bloggers and the mainstream media, who have interpreted every unkind word as a rape threat, and better yet, have asserted they are all coming from the Men's Human Rights Movement.

We got that on the loud and clear from Maclean Magazine's Mika Rakai, who recently did a horrifically misquoted and poorly researched piece on the MHRM. In it she cited AVFM's posting of videos about feminist violence in Toronto. Some of them featured a woman known now as Big Red. Rakai reported that "hundreds of comments flooded in from men's rights activists, threatening to beat, rape and murder the woman in the video."

She never identified a single commenter, provided an example of a single threat, or, and this might just be a tad important, proved that any of it came from men's human rights activists. She just magically decided that every nasty comment on YouTube was a threat, and that they all came from MHRAs.

I won't allow myself to digress into what has become of journalism, nor do I think you need me to do that.

But again, the real question here is what these comments, many of them in very bad taste and indicative of underdeveloped minds, actually represent. I think I have the answer to that.

It is Watson's Other Law.

Watson's Other Law is loosely related to its predecessor. Fifty years of bashing and marginalizing men plus eradicating healthy masculine influence in the lives of our boys equals a class of feral, directionless young men with no moral compass to guide them away from telling obnoxious, sociopathic women like Big Red that they would like to see a horse's cock shoved up her ass by force.

The males produced by Watson's Other Law are somewhat of a problem faced by feminists, which is ironic since it was feminism that created them.

It is what happens when fathers are taken out of the picture. It is what happens when you marginalize and intellectually, emotionally, legally and politically savage young men who have had the masculine values of self-control and composure gutted from the society in which they live.

Why do you think these ignorant bitches are screaming for men to fix this shit? It is because they know, despite the mush that indoctrination has made of their minds, that like it or not, men are the only ones who can.

Men can fix it, but not because masculinity is the problem. It is because masculinity is the solution. This, of course, means these women are fucked. In dumping masculinity they removed the authority for men to do anything about their problems, and the incentive for men to give a shit if they could.

Feminists, with the utter compliance and support of very stupid men, have liberated their culture from the very things that offered them the protection they are now throwing tantrums to get. It is far too late for any of them, even if they figure out that it was masculinity that had their sorry asses covered to begin with.

Their chickens are coming home to roost.

It does not just affect boys. Take a look at where girls are headed these days and you can see the result.

Watson's Law is a bitch. Watson's Other Law is heartless and cruel. Trash men and you trash your own culture.

I am not saying that the resultant culture is a good thing. And I am not saying that society needs this screwed up world. Just that it deserves it.

If feminists were smart, which they are not, they would understand that the MHRM is the only way out of this. By giving women accountability and agency – that is real agency, not the make believe kind that you call on men to enforce when things get rough, then feminists can stop looking like housewives standing on chairs and shrieking at their husbands to kill the mouse. They can start looking like adults that can get past some nasty comments like everyone else in the world with a spine has to.

After all, MHRAs put up with the same thing, even from the same kinds of feral, fatherless lost causes that are making all these "threats" to feminist women. We just move on with our work without pause because that is what grownups do.

Like I said, masculinity is the solution. Only now these women will have to find their own and internalize it, because the freeware has expired. Blue pill men are too weak, and red pill men are too apathetic. Time to make like a real feminist and man up, ladies.

And of course, a healthy dose of agency and accountability would give these women a greatly improved view of masculinity, mainly because they would be living it. This is, in and of itself, curative for these sick individuals as well as for the society in which they live.

What happened to the Earl Silverman Center?

Paul Elam · 7 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Update*: Please see further information on this story here.–DE*

I have to say, if someone had told me last week that I would be making a post about Kristina Hansen, I would have scoffed at the idea. Life delivers twists, though, and this is one of them.

One of the reasons I tried, though unsuccessfully, to make AVFMs parting with Hansen as copacetic as possible was because she was purportedly continuing with men's advocacy in the form of founding The Earl Silverman Center. It was to be a shelter for abused men dedicated to the memory of Earl Silverman, a Canadian man who struggled for years to establish such a resource and ultimately committed suicide in frustration over the lack of support he encountered.

In these last few months I have quietly hoped news of progress on that front, and more recently I have become concerned with not hearing of any. After all, Hansen raised over $5,000.00, most or all of it directly from the men's rights community. AVFM donated $250.00, a move we rarely make due to budgetary consideration. Also, Managing Editor Dean Esmay coughed up $500.00 (which he could not really afford) out of his own pocket.

I had just about reached the point where I was going to make some inquiries about what, if anything, Hansen has accomplished with those funds, when a Twitter exchange between her and Agent Orange was transmitted to me.

This brings up some serious questions that require me not only to make mention of Kristina Hansen again on this site, but to insist that we have some answers forthcoming about the use of funds she solicited in the name of one of our fallen.

I want to know what, precisely, "on hold" means, regarding her work on the Earl Silverman Center. I also want to know what important matters have arisen that require her not to pursue the project for which she accepted monetary donations, because simply taking the money and not doing the work promised for it could constitute a criminal fraud.

As much as dedicating any more column space on this site to this person troubles me, there are some moral imperatives here that I don't think can be ignored. One, not only did AVFM part with badly needed funds to support this project, I personally encouraged readers of this site to do the same, apparently to good effect. I owe those readers and donors follow through with this project.

Even more importantly to me, though, Earl Silverman took his life hoping to inspire people to step up and continue his work. When Kristina Hansen announced to the public and said she was going to do that, and asked for financial backing, it appeared that Earl's dream might be realized. It appeared that we did not have to worry about it.

The idea that someone may have stood on his grave to raise money with ill intent is unconscionable to me. Indeed, the idea makes me bitterly angry.

Kristina Hansen owes a full explanation of why the project she asked for money to complete is "on hold." She owes an accounting of what she has done with those funds, what work she has done toward making the Earl Silverman Center a reality and when we can expect to see that work come to fruition.

And she needs to provide these things to us, publicly, or more privately to the authorities.

This is not an accusation. I have no direct knowledge what Hansen meant in her exchange with AO. I have no idea how she spent the $5,000.00 that she raised for the Earl Silverman Center. And I have no idea what she intends or does not intend to do in the future regarding the project. But enough time has passed, and given the things she said in her Tweet, the time to demand some answers is here, and to keep pushing by whatever means are necessary until they are obtained.

I have no intention of letting this matter fall by the wayside, or of remaining silent if Earl Silverman's death has been used for personal financial gain.

KFC slaps men to sell chicken

NCFM · 7 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

KFC uses stereotypical slapstick advertising to sell spicy chicken.

But all this KFC advertising does is promote violence, violence against men.

Considering the world we live in it is hard to understand how a huge conglomerate like Yum! Brands, owner of KFC, fell prey to such immature and archaic marketing. Watch the video. It is showing at www.KFC.com, too! We guess KFC is proud of it, though it probably makes their chickens blush with shame. Below the video is a copy of the letter we sent asking them to stop the ads. We're asking you to go to their website and ask them the same. We're also asking the you stop buying KFC until they stop running the ad campaign.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LeUqAWDgIAQ

Letter to KFC demanding this ad be removed.

NCFM invites you to join them and A Voice for Men in contacting KFC to register your protest over this unfortunate choice in advertising.

Tell KFC to stop promoting violence! Be nice, but go to their website and leave a comment. Send them emails. Take the Customer Satisfaction Survey and tell them you won't buy their products until the get rid of the ad campaign. Help them understand why what they are doing is wrong. Write letters.

Download and print this PDF of the letter above and include it in or as your letter: https://ncfm.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/08/130805-KFC-letter.pdf .There's a complete list of addressed on the PDF letter.

Mr. John Cywinski
President, KFC USA
Yum! Brands RSC
1900 Colonel Sanders Lane
Louisville, KY 40213
email: johncywinski@yumyum.com

Javier Benito
Executive Vice President of Marketing & Food Innovation
KFC Corporate Office & Headquarters
1441 Gardiner Ln.
Louisville KY 40213

Claudia Nicholls-Magielsen
Director of New Concepts
KFC Corporate Office & Headquarters
1441 Gardiner Ln.
Louisville KY 40213

Jennelle Tilling
Vice President Marketing
KFC Corporate Office & Headquarters
1441 Gardiner Ln.
Louisville KY 40213

Barry Westrum
Chief Marketing Officer K
KFC Corporate Office & Headquarters
1441 Gardiner Ln.
Louisville KY 40213

Meg Farren
Marketing Director of New Concepts and Strategy
KFC Corporate Office & Headquarters
1441 Gardiner Ln.
Louisville KY 40213

On behalf of AVFM I also urge all MRHAs to visit NCFM's Facebook page. Please give them a like and provide a comment to their post protesting the KFC advertisement. Your voice is needed there. Thank you. PE

“Nice” feminists: grassroots of a hate movement

Hannah Wallen · 7 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

NAFALT – not all feminists are like that – is a frequently offered counter to discussion about the hatred and bigotry that permeates modern feminist activism. It’s used to hold up people who identify as feminist, subscribe to feminist ideology, and support mainstream feminist organizations, but don’t consider themselves misandrist, as a shield to protect the movement from scrutiny. “Nice” feminists are offered as evidence that activist attacks on men’s human rights are not characteristic of feminism itself, but instead the actions of radical extremists. That argument is in turn used to admonish against any criticism of feminist actions, no matter how legitimate or relevant the criticism may be.

To understand the role of the “nice” feminist, one has to first understand some things about the Men’s Human Rights Advocate (MHRA) / Feminist conflict within the area of gender issues as they relate to human rights activism.

- Gender issues are not as cut and dried as feminist advocates make them out to be. Both sides of the gender conflict perceive and accuse issue causes within the other side’s influence on overall society. It is therefore vital for an individual to seek out the facts behind these claims before judging their validity.

Feminists blame the existing power structure, which they see as male-dominated, for issues related to both sexes. They accuse men’s human rights activists of undermining feminist efforts to “fight the patriarchy.”

However, history shows that certain aspects of discrimination faced by men in modern society are the result of feminist influence on the very power structure they’re trying to blame. Decades of feminist efforts have led to denial of assistance for male victims of female intimate partner and sexual violence. It was women’s activism which led to the use of the Tender Years Doctrine in family court to limit fathers’ custody rights over young children. Feminists have opposed the efforts of father’s rights groups to seek a more even-handed method of handling child custody following divorce. In fact, they used efforts to demonize fathers as abusers and deadbeats in order to make their arguments.

- Gender issues between the sexes are intimately connected to (but not entirely caused by) the effects of entitlement politics on overall society. Feminist involvement has created a subset of entitlement politics specific to women.

One area where this can be seen is in Obamacare’s extensive coverage of elective drugs and procedures for women, while denying similar coverage to men. Another is the way rape laws have changed during the last century, going beyond the reasonable goal of preventing social attitudes and irrelevant factors from affecting rape cases, and becoming an attack on due process, so that an accused defendant is left with the burden of proving his innocence even in the absence of evidence of his guilt, yet may be denied the tools to do so. At the same time, the feminist effort to exclude male victims from the legal definition of rape has left men raped by women with less recourse than women raped by men had before society’s attitude toward rape was ever addressed. This is also an example of the next factor to understand:

- Based on their specific entitlement politics mentality, feminist leadership is willing to advocate for the sacrifice of the human/civil rights of the opposite gender (men) in order to further the agenda of feminism.

This can be seen in every area of feminist advocacy, as they scramble to exclude men from any consideration, any benefit, any recognition of humanity which they demand that society offer women. One of the most disgusting examples of this is the way feminist debaters scramble to differentiate between infant genital mutilation committed against boys, and childhood genital mutilation committed against girls. First world feminists are so bent on their predatory exploitation of proxy victim status related to the issue of female genital mutilation that they’re willing to actively hold back the movement to protect baby boys from the same abuse, lest their pilfered spotlight be diminished when the focus is widened to include all of the victims.

- There is a gaping chasm of disconnect between current and historical influential feminists (leadership, academics,) and the current grassroots of the movement, wherein the hands and feet of the body have little knowledge of what the head is doing.

Feminists in media and education spoon feed their young charges false statistics, unsupported theory, and political rhetoric. Students get the edited version of feminist history, with emphasis on male society as an oppressive force and female society as the helpless victim. They aren't taught about the destructive and controlling behavior of early feminists, including suffragette violence, early female activist bigotry, and their involvement in the temperance movement. Resentment toward men is presented as a rational response to the way society evolved before women began changing their social roles.

The combination of these factors has caused the movement to become a living propaganda machine, where those influential few at the top push their agenda, and the response goes through the ranks to the grassroots, who react with little understanding and less concern for the effects of their actions.

The other effect of the disconnect, which supports the machine, is that at the grassroots level, loyalty outweighs logic. This is due to that tendency to want more to perceive oneself as right rather than to be right. It's a loyalty you see in politics all the time, treating an ideology the same way one treats one's favorite university's athletic clubs. They're not feminists – they're supporters of team feminist, many of whom don't have any real grasp on the mechanics or method of the game.

When exposed to information that contradicts their blind devotion to their movement, these loyalists start riding the Change Curve: Shock, Denial, Anger, with the insertion of Bargaining (that being the attempt to rationalize compatibility of the movements) as the 4th step. There, they stop, and instead of going through the rest of the ride (Depression, Acceptance, Integration) they return to an earlier stage, or get stuck in a Bargaining loop, because the desire to not have integrated into their lives a wrong ideology is stronger than the desire to progress intellectually and socially. They're so loyal to 'team feminist' that they cannot accept reality, but must instead try to impose their perception where reality does not suit them.

This apparently willful ignorance is not an individual trait. It's not a character flaw. It's an experience common to the grassroots segment of the movement, and there's a reason for it. It's the same reason for the "willful" ignorance that led other hate based political movements throughout history to remain cohesive and determined in the face of contradictory evidence, and in the face of evidence that their overt behaviors were abusive toward their fellow humans.

The tendency occurs in response to dehumanization campaigns; efforts by a political movement's influential members and leadership to reduce the perception (by the target audience) of the humanity of a target population segment, not based on exhibited behavior, but based on generalized flaws insinuated upon that segment defined by a common trait or common traits. At the same time, these movements make a concurrent effort to increase the perception of their own humanity and that of their similarly defined allied segment of the population using the exact opposite of the dehumanization effort – the application of positively viewed characteristics, often combined with an unsubstantiated or ideologically (but not factually) substantiated claim by the leadership that the promoted population has been or is being helplessly victimized by the supposedly malicious target population.

This isn't simply the "these people do these things with which we disagree, and we oppose those behaviors because (reasons related to behavioral effects)" kind of rivalry seen in political disagreements. Describing this phenomenon of politics does not justify characterizing all forms of dissent as dehumanization efforts. Dissent is justified where the practical application of an ideological push causes damage to a group's ability to freely exercise their human rights. Dehumanization efforts occur when the target group's free exercise of their human rights interferes or would interfere with the perpetrator group's ideological push for or hold on political or social power.

The method exercised in dehumanization efforts is more "members of this group are inherently (insert negative characteristic here) and (insert type of power here,) while we are inherently (insert positive characteristic here) and (insert related vulnerability here), and therefore we have the right and responsibility to treat them as lower life forms because our traits are nicer than theirs, and their traits have led them to victimize us." This is a direct play on the human team-loyalty and self-loyalty tendencies – exploitation of an us-vs-them mentality, and natural human sympathy for anyone perceived as having been wronged.

That treatment begins with taking a bigoted attitude toward the group, then progresses into villainization, discrimination, degradation, subjugation, exploitation, and sometimes eventually targeted efforts at extermination. The pattern has repeated itself throughout human history.

Ethnicity has been the common characteristic of groups most famously targeted (using characterization of blacks as childlike and unable to take care of themselves to excuse the slavery system, characterization of American Natives as "dangerous savages" by white immigrants to justify their eviction from their lands, and the near extermination of their race… demonization of ethnic Jews and Gypsies prior to and during the Holocaust) but such targeting is not unique to ethnic populations. Other groups have suffered similarly (as in the targeting of homosexuals throughout modern history including the Holocaust, the use of the label "Witch" to justify all manner of human atrocities in Europe during what today's neopagans refer to as "the burning times," or the use of the label "Kulak" to facilitate Stalin's murder of anyone he viewed as an enemy, or the treatment of "Christian" and "bigot" or "Muslim" and "terrorist" as synonymous by certain modern groups to justify hatred of and discrimination against either.) Each of these targeted groups were dehumanized using the insinuation of disapproved traits as character traits universal to the group.

This same technique can be seen in the anti-male campaign within feminism, in messages such as "men are inherently predatory," "men are inherently violent," and "male society has dominated female society throughout history."

These messages are fundamentally identical to the propaganda of ethnic and religious bigotry movements. They contain the population-wide application of characteristics, the nature of which provide a rationale for purportedly respondent discrimination against that population. If men are inherently predatory and violent, then it's acceptable to compromise on men's freedoms to protect women and children from being victimized by predatory male violence. Combining the three promoted factors (predation, violence, and dominance), feminist ideology and advocacy can rationalize claiming that women are at a disadvantage, and damseling for preferential treatment to make up for it.

Treating destructive traits as inherently male traits allows influential feminists and feminist leaders to level a perpetual, consistent and ever-escalating attack on male society. No matter what women achieve, because they're claiming to have achieved it in the shadow of a predatory, violent, domineering segment of society, they can still also claim a disadvantage. This is how every political hate movement throughout history has justified the slow descent from animosity to atrocity. It's also how feminism is able to survive its own successes. Even as feminist activists achieve victory after victory, as long as they can claim that men naturally oppress women just by being men, they can rationalize continuing to damsel and push no matter how much power and privilege they've won.

The influence of a dehumanization campaign on the target audience – those in whose view they want to dehumanize the target group – molds both intellect and attitude. The target audience is slowly trained to view the target group only as a group and a set of characteristics, rather than as individuals with unique and broadly varied personal traits. This leads to a subtly and eventually overtly bigoted perception of and response to members of the target group. The result is a combination of 'team' loyalty, an unsupported us-vs-them mentality, and a distorted view and growing hatred and fear of the targeted group. That, in turn, leads to being disposed to accept legal, political, and social treatment of anyone perceived to be part of that group in ways the individual would otherwise consider unfair, unjust, immoral, unethical, and inhumane.

Once mistreatment of members of the target group becomes accepted, the grassroots of the perpetrator group becomes the vehicle of the group's own dehumanization, using language, display of attitude, and discriminatory rules to attack the target group's sense of equal status within society. The loyalty tendency lends itself to unquestioning rationalizing of dehumanizing and discriminatory treatment of the target group on the basis of the perpetrator group's claims about them.

This is seen in various aspects of feminist discourse, advocacy, and activism. The language aspect manifests in labeling, such as calling men "male oppressors," and "potential rapists." The attitude manifests in double standards, such as attributing gender specificity to genderless behaviors like objectification, partner-violence, and rape, in dismissal of value by treating men's well being and welfare as less important, and men's experiences as having less personal and social impact than those of women. The application of discriminatory rules manifests in agitation for legal and social privilege, including impositions of the aforementioned double standards, such as combining the inference of perversion on male sexuality and predation on men's sexual behaviors, while celebrating female sexuality and encouraging women to exhibit the same behaviors condemned in men.

In law, this translates into gender-specific criminalization of some behaviors, and to gender-specific amplification of the criminalization of some behaviors. One example is the double standard applied to rape. It can also be seen in unequal treatment in the criminal court system, where male convicts are punished more severely and for longer periods than female convicts with the same case factors. It's also seen in social responses to crimes such as statutory rape, where there is outrage over male perpetration, but many people balk at the suggestion that female offenders should even be considered offenders, much less face the same level of penalty as male offenders.

One role played by the grassroots in this involves being the mouthpiece for the propaganda and mentality of the leadership by repeating terms, catchphrases, and other rhetoric, citing essay writing and published reports based on biased and otherwise flawed research, responding to leadership initiatives. Another is the use of shaming language to try to silence anyone who disagrees. It also includes providing false credibility to the movement's leadership by virtue of numbers – the more people call themselves "feminist," and assert feminist theory, ideology, and goals, the more people will think of established feminist leadership as a benevolent entity which guides and advocates for a good cause. This leads to people in authority positions treating feminist leaders as experts as well as activists. The result of this combined promotion of ideology and credibility is the increased ability of feminist lobbyists and other advocates to persuade individuals and groups in positions of authority to accept their counsel and enact their ideological perspective into practical application through law and policy.

Additionally, the grassroots of the movement acts as a social cushion between the public's view of the movement, and the activism of its leadership; a wide-eyed innocent mask to hide the movement's malignant soul. By presenting a "nice" face attached to the label, grassroots feminists draw attention away from the practical application of the movement's ideology, and create the false impression that they are representative of the movement, rather than the movement being about the real-world actions taken in its name. This is a reason for the leadership to use advocacy and propagandized "education" initiatives (like Women's Studies courses, and the insertion of political rhetoric into other areas of study) to cultivate a grassroots movement well armed with rhetoric and resentment, but low on detailed knowledge of the issues presented to them in their training.

This creates a population of brainwashed twits whose attachment to the label "feminist" is based on fluff and feelings. Being in agreement with each other in the belief that feminism is about fighting for equality, they view themselves as the movement's mainstream even though their overt participation in the movement is mostly limited to providing it with free marketing for its name. As long as activist groups make effective use of the grassroots without becoming so overzealous as to make obvious the exploitative nature of the leadership's relationship to the them, feminists will be able to continue to use their grassroots to filter otherwise socially unacceptable dogma, rhetoric, and terms into public discourse. They'll be able to continue to point to that as evidence of their credibility when lobbying for discriminatory law and policy. In this way, leadership influence over the grassroots may be one of feminism's strongest weapons:

"Nice" feminists are feminism's propaganda drones – mindless of purpose and careless of the carnage they cause.

Alimony slaves can do it!

Robert St. Estephe · 7 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•◊•

In the roaring 1920s, when men in the US began to create formal associations to combat the alimony racket, it was a universally accepted fact that women had the opportunity to support themselves outside marriage. The nation's leading divorce judges spoke this truth openly and frequently in the 1920s.

The currently believed myth – of women's economic oppression before Marxist-feminists arrived on the scene in the 1960s with the express aim to initiate a "gender" utopia – is merely a fictional 1980s concoction that has been deliberately spread by the education industry (in both K-12 and college) and is still widely assumed to be true. (see Newsweek, March 3, 1986)

Judge Joseph Sabath of Chicago, who by 1939 had heard more divorce cases than any other judge in the world, called alimony an "easy money racket" which makes men "slaves." Yet the eminent judge was bound by standing law and he made his rulings in according with statue even though it was against his conscience.

It should be remembered however that the institution of debtor's prison in the US has been used in most cases for alimony-owing ex-husbands. In other countries and in earlier times few women have ever been thrown in debtor's prison but many men have been incarcerated for their wives' debts.

Following is newspaper article describing a variation on the theme of alimony slavery in cases before Judge Sabath and other Chicago judges in late 1942 which, to the knowledge of the Gonzo Historian, has been completely forgotten.

•◊•

FULL TEXT: Chicago, Jul 3 – The fight for freedom today had six seasoned campaigners on its side, all having a definite appreciation of the word, liberty.

The sextet of warriors was released from alimony row in Cook County Jail by Superior Court Judge Joseph Sabath on their promises to enlist in the armed services.

Their wives agreed to suspend domestic warfare for the duration of the real thing.

One woman donated her former husband in lieu of war bonds.

The donation was Joseph Patrovsky, 32, a butcher, who was in jail since April trying to figure out a way of stopping the little woman's spring offensive.

"My client," said the attorney for Mrs. Anna Patrovsky, "feels that since she cannot afford to buy bonds, it is only patriotic to release her husband."

Judge Thomas J. Lynch agreed, and so it went with other alimony grapples.

"My client wishes to have her husband, Joseph Michalezwsky, 28, released if he will join the service immediately propounded the attorney for Mrs. Anne Michalezwsky, "but we want to be sure he enlists."

"As, I already enlisted in the Coast Guard several days before she had me thrown in the clink," the prisoner interrupted.

Judge Lynch concluded: “We’ll release you. I’m beginning to feel like a recruiting officer.”

[“Alimony Jail Opens for Six As Wives Send Them To War – Chicago Judge Says He’s Beginning to Feel Like A Recruiting Officer as He Gets Promise Of Sextet to Serve Uncle Sam.” syndicated (INS), Toledo Blade (Oh.), Jul. 3, 1942, p. 1]

•◊•

A related topic, that of the marriage racket practiced by predatory women in order to exploit men preparing to go into military service, should be of interest. During World War II these wives were known as “Allotment Annies.” See: Marriage Scams Against Servicemen in WW II – 1944
•◊•

The Voice of Europe: Chivalry

Lucian Vâlsan · 8 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
On August 9, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the issue of chivalry, whether it is still necessary and how it is being enforced through the violence of the State.

While very few would object if one would choose to be chivalrous in his own life, it becomes an issue if chivalry becomes the State policy. It not only leads to gynocentrism and unfair treatment within the law, but it also reinforces a toxic entitlement mentality and generates toxic behaviors for the society at large.

So, what do you think?

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means August 10, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America).

SHOW PAGE
[/box]

David Duchovny opens mouth, ruins “X-Files”

Jason Gregory · 8 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Women’s fashion is a subtle form of bondage. It’s men’s way of binding them. We put them in these tight, high-heeled shoes, we make them wear these tight clothes and we say they look sexy. But they’re actually tied up. –David Asshat Duchovny

I usually don’t care about the dumb shit that oozes out the mouths of celebrities, but this vomit needs to be cleaned.

It’s not typically men who buy all the imbecilic fashion magazines and it’s not men who typically obsess about shoes. I couldn’t (and neither do most men) give a damn about such things. It wasn’t typically men who watched (or gave a damn whatsoever about) that vapid show describing the entrails of women who live in the city—“Sex and the City.” And neither is it typically men who buy and read the “50 Shades” trilogy that infantilizes women and is literally about binding women.

[image]By Duchovny’s vomit-logic, I suppose it is the fault of men for shoving food down the throats of obese women. By this logic, these poor and helpless women are at the mercy of and bound to the food industry. As such, men are to blame for women who suffer with all sorts of eating disorders because men also rule the fashion industry. Clearly, this must be true because men care so much about fashion.

The truth? The fashion industry is a way for masochistic women to bind themselves. If women want to spank themselves by wearing the latest imbecilic fashions and shoes, don’t blame men. That’s women’s own materialistic behavior, if they choose it.

Nobody, especially men, “forces” that on them. All I (and most men) ask of women is that they get reasonable exercise and exercise some self-control over their carbohydrate intake. Nothing about that entails imbecilic fashion or ridiculous shoes or absurdist expectations about beauty. The expectation is that women be humans, moral agents in charge of making their own decisions about their health, diet, and physical fitness.

Men, on the other hand, are expected to not only do all the cardio work, but they are also expected to do all the anaerobic weight-lifting so they build mass and look like a physically useful G.I.Joe/human-tool. On top of that, men also are expected to regulate their diet and look ripped with no fashion at all—just their shirtless chest protruding out from their human-body-tool, being a symbol of their alpha-male virility and utility. “Yeah, I’m your man ‘cause I can lift heavy shit for you and ‘cause I can beat up other beta-males, baby.”

It doesn’t end there. Oh no. Men are also expected to earn a living and have a well-developed mind—a mind that is marked with a science degree that earns him at least 6 figures of income. Even more, that income is expected to bring security to a wife and kids because that income is expected to be rendered to a wife and kids—without which, he is not really a man, probably just a loser or a homo or a child-man who refuses to “grow-up.”

So who exactly is “bound” here, asshat?

Editor’s note: feature image by Alan Levine. –PW

To Penny Hicks, Maclean's Magazine

Paul Elam · 8 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

To: Penny Hicks, publisher, Maclean's Magazine:

Greetings,

Recently, one of your writers, Mika Rekai, wrote an article, Men's Rights Attracts Angry Young Men, focusing on the Men's Human Rights Movement and in part on my website avoiceformen.com (AVFM).

There were numerous factual errors that demand a retraction on your part, which I would like to share with you now. Please understand that I am aware that it is common in the media to selectively use the most hyperbolic and inflammatory quotes that it is possible to find, as though they represent the mainstay of a targeted group's thought, but I am not complaining about that.

My concerns are strictly over the misquoted, misattributed and misrepresented content that permeated Rekai's article and resulting in a piece that was misleading and journalistically unsound.

First there is this, regarding some content at AVFM:

> "…one of the most prominent features of the blog are the pictures of dangerous "bigots"—most of whom are young, female university students who have protested at men's rights events on campuses."

This is factually untrue, as at the time most of the pictures in that area of the site were not of college students. Also of concern is that Rekai neglected to mention AVFM's rationale for why the students images were there, which was because they were known to have engaged in illegal efforts to harass, abuse and abridge the free speech of other students at a university lecture on the issues for which we advocate.

Rekai, I believe, attempts to leave an impression in the mind of the reader that these women were targeted for simply protesting against a men's rights event, which is inaccurate and which was meticulously covered in my interview with her.

Next Rekai says the following:

> "…Elam says that being able to talk about being angry at women, hating women and even beating women on sites like A Voice for Men provides a lot of hurt men the ability to vent emotionally in a supportive environment, so they don't have to express their anger physically."

This is completely untrue. As I said more than once in my (recorded) interview with Rekai, men being able to express anger about what has happened to them, regarding false allegations, family courts and the like, is needed and healthy, but as I also stressed to Rekai, we work diligently with anyone whose anger appears inappropriate and draw the line more rigidly than any other internet venue I know of at any speech that glorifies or justifies physical violence.

This mischaracterization of my words is deeply concerning to me and very misleading to your readers.

Next, Rekai references YouTube videos that were embedded on AVFM after an event in Toronto where feminists harassed attendees and otherwise attempted to disrupt another lecture on men's issues:

> "After a similar men's rights event, organized by CAFE in April, there was a similar clash of protesters, and afterwards A Voice for Men posted a video from the event. In the clip, a red-haired woman is reading an article about the shared goals of feminism and men's rights, while swearing at those who interrupted her. The video quickly reached over 100,000 views; hundreds of comments flooded in from men's rights activists, threatening to beat, rape and murder the woman in the video."

I trust Ms. Rekai is not actually convinced that every anonymous, malicious person on the internet is a men's activist. While there were some (far from hundreds) of comments that might be construed as threats, is it the position of Mika Rekai and Maclean's Magazine that they can identify the gender ideology of the people making them? Where is the supporting documentation, the identity of the commenters and the evidence that they indeed are activists?

Isn't it journalistically irresponsible to gather anonymous comments from an internet website and directly attribute them to an identified group with no proof whatsoever to back it up? Was there no editor at Maclean's to oversee fact-checking before this went to print?

It is clear to me that assigning culpability to the Men's Human Rights Movement for anonymous threats made on the internet is more than just a misleading error in judgment. It is an intentional bit of smoke and mirrors designed to mischaracterize a group of social activists as violent and abusive in the absence of evidence to support it.

There were several other issues with the piece. For instance, I found it troubling that Rekai made numerous references to the protests at the University of Toronto, and attempted to detail the angry reaction of men's activists to events, but for some reason Rekai failed to mention that at those events there was an organized, self-identified feminist presence that was vandalizing posters, tripping fire alarms, harassing attendees by screaming epithets at them, physically blocking doors so that attendees could not enter and engaging in violence on a level that required police intervention.

This was a piece of agenda journalism at its worst.

I would appreciate your consideration of the contents of this message and your taking the time to fact-check what I have said. I hope that you will subsequently issue a retraction of the multiple mistakes in this article.

I also hope that you will speak with Ms. Rekai about some basics in journalistic principles, as so many of them were not observed in her work.

Thank you

Paul Elam, publisher, avoiceformen.com

Manhood Academy, selling social incompetence

John Hembling (JtO) · 9 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I have been told on several occasions that I am “a leader” within the loose collection of individuals around the world that is described as the Men’s Human Rights Movement. And, apparently, as some people will characterize me, I have further been informed that I have a responsibility to exclude the worst of the crazy and the most reprehensible of the dirtbags from this movement.

I am also reminded that my friend and colleague Paul Elam has also publicly rejected the notion that he is “a leader” or “the” leader of the men’s rights movement. I understand much better now how he feels. I’m not responsible for you people; the idea that I’m somehow in charge of you is absurd. Although AVfM has on multiple occasions criticized and disavowed people calling themselves MRAs and saying crazy things, I don’t view it as my job to constantly seek out and find all potential crazies.

However, recognizing all that, it’s also true that within the large and growing sphere of the men’s human rights movement, the writings and opinions of a handful of individuals are sometimes given significant attention and weight within the movement, and to some degree, outside the sphere of the MHRM. Returning to the admonition, most recently from a non-MHRM friend, that I as some sort of leader must police the crazies and the bad actors at the fringe, I will offer an opinion on one small group of bad actors.

Enter from stage right, a group of people calling themselves Manhood Academy. A reading through their website suggests that rather than being a part of what we think of as a human rights movement, the members of Manhood Academy are a part of the pickup artist (PUA) community. This is first among the reasons why I have never previously bothered to pay Manhood Academy any attention. This is also why commenters from Manhood Academy find themselves banned in some MHRM forums, including AVfM. Repeatedly spamming links to your own (seemingly) PUA-themed site is an off-topic distraction in a community attempting to address workplace death, corruption in the family courts or systemic male-targeted abuse within the educational system. However, they are apparently not PUAs. At least, this is what they insist.

Last week, I returned home from work and found a message waiting for me in my Skype window. One of the rolling meetings I participate in had been discussing a post made on the website Reddit, from a member of Manhood Academy. The post included the following:

> “You cowardly pieces of shit would never DARE to make these false claims face to face in a live debate because you know you would finally get called out on your lies!”

The obvious question springing from this outburst is, what false accusations? Indeed, whether false or otherwise, what accusations? And this question leads us to the center of an understanding of the people calling themselves Manhood Academy. But it’s not the answer to “what accusations” which shines the light, rather it’s the lack of an answer.

On seeing the rather snotty accusation of cowardice and fear of engaging in debate, I responded almost by spinal reflex. And yes, I typed it in all caps.

“CHALLENGE ACCEPTED. NAME THE TOPIC, NAME THE TIME. I LIVE IN VANCOUVER BC, I WILL DEBATE IN PERSON, FACE TO FACE, OR ONLINE BY VIDEO.”

Of course, what followed was not a debate. The farce which followed my acceptance of a debate challenge revealed just what Manhood Academy and its members are, as well as informed the title of this article. “Manhood Academy: selling social incompetence”.

The same night, after posting my acceptance of the challenge, I spent over an hour in the Manhood Academy website’s chat room, trying to convince the individual who had challenged me to actually join a debate. This guy called himself “the professor”, and after about an hour, he finally joined me in a video conference.

And then we had our debate. Well, not so much. What we had began was a civil conversation, but when I made it clear I perceived Manhood Academy as a PUA site, the professor, a 20-something man wearing a hoodie, devolved to a patient with an unending and monotonous repetition of elementary school yard insults like “you pussy”, “you’re my bitch”, “you’re a faggot”, “you’re a moron”, and so on. Remember, these are the guys claiming their mandate is to teach social competence. From the front page of their website:

“You are drowning in a sea of confusing advice, prescription meds and chronic insecurity. You’re obsessed with your appearance and ruled by your unstable emotions. You dread talking to women, resent your peers and couldn’t care less about the world.

“In short, you feel stuck and unable to do anything about it. Your frustration is understandable. We’re here to cut through the bullshit. Manhood Academy is the only accredited worldwide social education center in existence today. It is specifically designed to train men like you in social competence.”

The site provides a link to a free ebook, encapsulating the syllabus provided by Manhood Academy.

Section 1 is a fairly straightforward trashing of the gender ideology of feminism. It’s here that most men’s human rights activists will find agreement with the ideas proposed by Manhood Academy proponents. The first section addresses feminism with the following chapter headings:

The neurotic Mind
What is Feminism?
Feminism Deforms society
Damages Women
Feminism Emasculates Men
Feminism Ruins Social Interaction
Why Feminism Persists
However, the following sections of the site’s free ebook propose what can only be described as a traditionalist and authoritarian doctrine of male control of women in all social interactions.

How to approach social interaction
Authority, the proper male form.
Creating and maintaining order
Rewarding and punishing
How to punish Refusing to punish Torture
The effects of punishment
How to reward
Types of reward
Examples of Managing expectations
The emphasis appears to focus primarily on dating, relationships, and sex from a male-authoritarian point of view. The only real difference between standard PUA rhetoric and Manhood Academy appears to be an infatuation with patriarchy, as it is cartoonishly described by radical feminists. Prior to meeting these individuals, I always thought feminist rhetoric on the topic of patriarchy was delusional. But these guys really exist. And they’re apparently teaching what they call social competence. However, I call what was demonstrated in our so-called debate social incompetence.

During that so-called debate, I really did try to ask questions, such as “what is your goal in this debate”. However, despite repetition and rephrasing of that question, the only response was iterations of “to teach you that you’re my bitch.” And these guys claim to be teaching social competence. But they also, in their own free ebook, espouse a doctrine of male-only leadership, but also, male utility, provision and caretaking of everyone else through that so-called leadership. This appears to be nothing except pick-up artistry wrapped up with an entrenched trad-con ideology. However, if that's all Manhood Academy was, we could simply and politely disagree with them. As both PUA and traditional conservationism in a patriarchal view of relationships are both, in the view of many MHRAs, uninteresting and wrongheaded. But everyone is entitled to their own opinions, and ideas live or die based on their currency in the marketplace.

[image]

So what's with the endless and tedious recitation of childish insults by our hoodie-wearing friend, Manhood Academy's professor? In fact, one of the repeated insults from the professor was that I was crying, in his words, "like a little bitch". The only explanation for this I can think of is that our professor, working from an adolescent view of what he imagines an alpha male behaviour to be. Possibly, in the household where professor Manhood is still growing up, being childishly insulting is what passes for the exercise of authority. Unfortunately, attempting to dominate by a string of schoolyard insults, he placed himself into the role of child, and forced me into the role of a too patient parental figure.

On the other hand, the social incompetence demonstrated was so far over the top, the entire Manhood 101 enterprise may simply be a parody, indistinguishable from the cartoonish accusations of what the men's rights movement is, common from radical feminists. Whichever is the case, whether truly incompetent PUAs and trad-cons, or whether Manhood Academy is an excessively foolish parody, they're no part of the men's human rights movement.

Editor's note: feature image by Dustin moore. –PW

Indian MHRAs organize national meet

Anil Kumar · 9 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Indian Men's Rights NGOs is organizing the 5th Annual National Men's Rights meet at Nagpur, Central India, August 16-18, 2013. More than 100 prominent male and female Men's Human Rights Activists representing 40,000 activists from across India are expected to converge at a resort in Pench National Park, 50 miles outside Nagpur to attend the event.

The first National Meet was held at the western sea side beach resort of Goa in 2008. These were followed by National Meets held at Hill Stations Shimla in Himalayas and Yercaud in South India. The last National Meet was held at a resort a few miles outside the historic city of Kolkata in the east. There was no National Meet In 2012.

Images from previous Men's Rights National Meets: http://www.flickr.com/photos/41332575@N02/)

"The choice of the dates August 16-18 is no coincidence", says Rajesh Vakharia of NGO Save Indian Family Foundation in Nagpur, who is organizing the meet. "India became independent on August 15, 1947 after M.K. Gandhi carried out decades of non-violent struggle." Rajesh says, "Since last couple of years, we have stopped celebrating India's Independence Day and instead we conduct a National Meet because we do not think men have freedom or democratic rights in India. So, we are fighting for our independence and freedom from Government and feminist atrocities which are perpetrated through gender biased laws and an anti-male judiciary."

Famous Men's Activist Virag Dhulia writes, "Men do not have freedom of choices and choice of freedom. Hence, for men, the Independence Day is meaningless. Until and unless men are freed from the tyranny of manhood, false patriarchy and stereotypical notions of gender, it's a mere customary practice to observe Independence Day." (link: http://www.merinews.com/article/mens-rights-activists-say-no-to-independence-day-celebrations/15888931.shml)

This National Meet is held at a very difficult time for Indian Men. The bill amending divorce laws to give a husband's property to his wife upon divorce is getting listed in parliament's upper house every single day as I write this article. Our activists are sending thousands of emails and text messages to Parliament Members urging them not to pass this bill.

Another set of activists are meeting Parliament Members. Yesterday, they had an opportunity to get inside the parliament and had a 30 minute meeting with the main opposition party leaders. If this law is passed, then a woman who chooses to divorce her husband will walk away with a part of his property acquired before or after marriage and also a part of his inherited or inheritable property. A man can not oppose her divorce petition and he will not have any claim to property that she owns during marriage. We are afraid that given the anti-male nature of Indian judiciary, many men may end up losing all their property to his wife and to legal fees.

Today about a dozen protesting activists were arrested outside the residence of Sonia Gandhi, chairperson of ruling United Progressive Alliance (UPA) and president of the Congress Party at New Delhi. They were eventually released. India is only 6 months away from National Elections. The ruling party is desperately trying to pass this bill before its tenure ends. The opinion polls suggest the ruling coalition will lose badly in elections in 2014, though no other coalition may also get complete majority in lower house of parliament. The majority party or coalition in lower house forms Govt and elects Prime Minister.

International Men's Rights Activists can get the details about the this National Meet through facebook, twitter and some of you may be able to connect to activists via Skype, provided the wireless internet inside the National Park performs reliably.

References:

1) http://ibnlive.in.com/news/harassed-husbands-want-freedom-on-aug-15/98556-19.html

2) http://indiatoday.intoday.in/story/Unhappily+harried/1/57739.html

3) http://articles.timesofindia.indiatimes.com/2013-08-08/nagpur/41201129_1_rights-activists-marriage-law-proposed-bill

[/box]

The morality of punishing the innocent

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 9 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is a current movement with the expressed intent of reducing or eliminating sexual assault against women by changing current law to make it easier to convict those accused of committing sexual assaults.

The proposed changes would reduce and/or eliminate due process protections currently afforded to the accused in the United States. The war to change these laws is primarily being waged on college campuses by forcing these institutions to eliminate due process when handling cases alleging sexual assault. On many campuses the accused does not have the right to counsel, may not have the right to present evidence on his own behalf, to call witnesses, or to cross-examine witnesses including his accuser, may only be given limited access to evidence against him, and guilt may be determined by a preponderance of evidence (instead of clear and convincing or beyond reasonable doubt), or simply because the evidence of guilt has the greater probability of being true.

This denial of due process almost assures a conviction that can result in anything from reprimand, to sensitivity classes, to expulsion.

To most of us, the "guilty until proved innocent" attitude towards those accused of any crime is reprehensible. The American system of jurisprudence is founded on the idea that allowing the guilty to go free is preferable to jailing the innocent. But to some, the greater good of stopping violent crime (particularly sex crimes against women) supersedes the rights of the accused to due process. For these persons, the unintended consequence of jailing the innocent, while it may be unfortunate, is perfectly acceptable and morally correct. The moral justification for this can be traced to none other than St. Thomas Aquinas and his justification of killing in self-defense.

Aquinas writes "Nothing hinders one act from having two effects, only one of which is intended, while the other is beside the intention. … Accordingly, the act of self-defense may have two effects: one, the saving of one's life; the other, the slaying of the aggressor." He further explains that killing in self-defense is morally acceptable only if there was no intent to kill. In other words, if the killing was an unintentional consequence of defending oneself, even if the killing was foreseeable. He qualifies this by stating that the act of self-defense must be in proportion to the act of aggression. However, if the killing was intentional or disproportionate, even if done in self-defense, it is morally unjustifiable.

The Doctrine (or Principle) of Double Effect requires four conditions described in the New Catholic Encyclopedia (p. 1021):

1. The act itself must be morally good or at least indifferent.
2. The agent may not positively will the bad effect but may permit it. If he could attain the good effect without the bad effect he should do so. The bad effect is sometimes said to be indirectly voluntary.
3. The good effect must flow from the action at least as immediately (in the order of causality, though not necessarily in the order of time) as the bad effect. In other words the good effect must be produced directly by the action, not by the bad effect. Otherwise the agent would be using a bad means to a good end, which is never allowed.
4. The good effect must be sufficiently desirable to compensate for the allowing of the bad effect.

Thus it becomes permissible under this doctrine to strengthen the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to convict and imprison accused perpetrators even if that means that more innocent persons will be convicted and jailed. The intent of this action is to reduce harm to women by reducing the number of sexual assaults by creating an effective deterrent: increasing the likelihood of going to prison.

On the surface, most reasonable persons would likely agree that the conditions are met. In fact, they may well be. It is certainly not immoral to make it easier to gain convictions in order to protect members of society. Provided the intent is not to imprison innocent people, and remains only a by-product, condition two is met. Condition three is met if the imprisonment of innocent men is not the direct cause of the reduction of the number of sexual assaults. The increased likelihood of imprisonment of offenders must be the cause of the reduction. Finally, it must be more desirable to protect women from sexual assault than to imprison innocent men. Whether or not this condition is met may be dependent on perspective and the perception of how many women will be protected vs. the number of innocent men imprisoned.

However, what this doctrine does not address is whether or not the proposed action will be effective in producing the desired outcome. Does increasing the likelihood of prison serve as an effective deterrent to sexual assault? In other words, will this actually reduce sexual assault? The doctrine only addresses the intent of the act, not the effectiveness.

For instance, it is acceptable under this doctrine for a physician to administer a potentially lethal dose of pain medication to a dying patient in order to alleviate the pain, even if the physician knows the medication might kill the patient. But what if the medication does not alleviate pain because the patient has developed a tolerance to its pain-relieving effects? The doctor has now increased the risk of death without producing the desired effect; pain relief. Is that moral? By the same token, if increasing the likelihood on imprisonment of offenders does not decrease the number of sexual assaults, but only increases the likelihood of incarcerating the innocent, is it moral? More to the point, is it moral to institute such a policy without being reasonably assured that the policy will produce the intended result, especially when the harm done is almost assured?

It could further be argued that because the consequence of imprisoning the innocent can be foreseen, the intent cannot be denied. The knowledge that a harmful effect will occur as a result of committing an act is tantamount to intentionally bringing about the harmful effect. The Doctrine of Double Effect flows from another Catholic doctrine of doing vs. allowing harm. This can be expanded through a discussion of deontological ethics.[1]

Agent-centered deontology draws a distinction between causing, preventing, and allowing. It is impermissible to cause an evil act, but generally permissible to fail to act to prevent one. It would be morally wrong to push a child into the street in front of a car (causing). There may or may not be a moral obligation to stop that same child from running into the street (preventing). Allowings occur when the action taken involves removing a defense that would have otherwise been in place to prevent evil from occurring, and when the removal of the defense is not the direct cause of harm. Allowings are permitted only when the defense removed had previously been provided and when the removal of that defense allows another good to occur.

When one removes legal defenses that protect the accused in order to allow increased convictions intended to deter sexual assault, one is removing a defense previously provided by law in order to do good and since the removal of that defense is not a direct assault upon the innocent (although it allows the direct assault to occur), it would be permitted under this deontological ethic.

A somewhat weaker defense of changing the laws that protect the innocent is that the change does not cause the evil, it merely enables others to commit the evil (send the innocent to prison). Therefore those who change the law are not morally responsible for sending the innocent to prison. That this statement would be seen by many as morally reprehensible is a criticism of agent-centered deontology as well as the Doctrine of Double Effects.

A second type of deontology is patient-centered and concerned with rights, not duties. At its very foundation, the fundamental right is the right not to be “used only as a means for producing good consequences without consent… It is a right against being used by another for the user’s or others’ benefit.” (Alexander & Moore, 2012). Ethical dilemmas handled one way under agent-centered deontology might be handled differently under patient-centered deontology. The difference is the forbidden practice of using a person without that person’s consent.

In agent-centered deontology, rightness is derived from the mental state of the agent or the agent’s actions in causing the harm. In patient-centered deontology the justification of the results rests on whether or not the victim (the harmed person) is the means of producing the results. Further, in patient-centered deontology, providing aid to another is not required, nor is there a right to receive aid from another. This is derived from the concept of using.

Using can only be viewed as a positive act, not an inaction.

So in the example above, the child who runs into the street has no right to be saved, nor does the person who sees the child have an obligation to save it. Consequentialist ethics operate in both versions of deontology. Consequences help to define right and wrong actions in agent-centered deontology and define the moral norms used to guide action in patient-centered deontology.

An agent-centered deontology could be used to justify a change in laws to permit increased likelihood of conviction for sexual assault, including the likelihood of wrongful convictions, if it also reduces the number of sexual assaults. But under a system of patient-centered deontology, it could be argued that this is not justified. First, the goal of reducing the number of sexual assaults could be described as aiding potential victims. Under this system, no one has a right to aid. Second, it could be argued that the wrongfully convicted are being used without their consent to aid potential victims. Consequentialist ethics might intervene in the first case, but not in the second.

The consequence of sexual assault could be said to be so abhorrent that a moral norm be established that it in the interest of all to deter sexual assault. However, that norm would be overruled by using the innocent without their consent to prevent sexual assault. Thus a patient-centered approach would not permit this type of change in the law and those arguing for such a change would be arguing from the standpoint of agent-center deontology.

However, there is a case in which a patient-based ethic might permit such a change in the law. That is if it could be shown that more sexual assaults are prevented than innocents incarcerated or that sexual assault is a less desirable outcome than incarceration of innocents. Take the example of a trolley running loose down a mine shaft towards five workers trapped on the tracks. The trolley cannot be stopped and if left alone will kill all five workers. It is possible to pull a switch and divert the trolley onto a different track, but doing so would kill one worker who would not otherwise be killed.

Pulling the switch could be viewed as permissible if the five lives are considered more valuable than the one. However, because it is a positive act pulling the switch is not obligatory, simply because it is permissible does not relieve culpability. A person has the right not to act and cannot be held culpable for inaction under the patient-center ethic. But once a person acts, the person becomes culpable. So while a change to the law might be permissible, that permission does not relieve culpability. The actor is culpable for killing the one, but would not have been culpable for allowing the five to die. This is based on the separateness of persons.

Each person is a separate entity and wrongs (or rights) cannot be added together to form a greater wrong (or right). It follows that the rights of the majority do not supersede the rights of the minority which is the basis for constitutional law. Simply because the majority vote for a law, that law cannot be enacted if it violates the rights guaranteed under the constitution.

Interestingly, those who argue against sexual assault, argue from the standpoint of patient-centered deontology. No one has the right to use another person without that person's consent. This is the very foundation for the argument against sexual assault when one uses rights as the basis for the argument. It would seem a contradiction that these same persons would switch their ethical stance from patient-centered to agent-based when the context suits them.

Consequentialist questions remain whether one approaches the issue from the standpoint of the Doctrine of Double Effect and/or agent-based deontology or patient-centered deontology. Will making it easier to gain convictions provide a sufficient deterrent to sexual assault to justify the inevitable increase in wrongful convictions? Without answering this question, the entire argument is moot. Good intentions is simply not enough. As they say, the road to Hell is paved with them.

The Doctrine of Double Effect uses intent as the basis for morality of action and does not appear to consider actions where the outcome is uncertain. Agent-based deontology at least uses consequence as a standard in defining right and wrong. Patient-centered deontology uses moral norms to help define rights. But what happens when we don't know what the outcome of an action will be?

There are two likely outcomes (consequences) of strengthening the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to obtain convictions. One is that there is a reduction in sexual assaults committed due to the imprisonment of more offenders, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The other is that there is no change in the number of sexual assaults committed although more offenders are imprisoned, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The latter would likely be seen as unethical and immoral when held up to nearly any ethical philosophy.

There is little evidence to support that the first will occur. Many of the arguments against the death penalty are based on evidence that fails to support the reasoning that stiffer penalties results in effective deterrents. That would make the former outcome unethical as well. Therefore, the only truly ethical position is to not change these laws in any manner that would result in a greater number of convictions of the wrongly accused. Any law designed to reduce the number of sexual assaults should be evidence-based and include provisions designed to prevent wrongful convictions.

Alexander, Larry and Moore, Michael, “Deontological Ethics”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Winter 2012 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2012/entries/ethics-deontological/.

McIntyre, Alison, “Doctrine of Double Effect”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Fall 2011 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/fall2011/entries/double-effect/.

---

[1] Deontological ethics is a system of ethics that holds that some choices cannot be justified by their consequences. What makes a choice right is its conformity to moral norms. In agent-centered deontology, agents have permissions and obligations. Obligations may be positive (parents are obliged to protect their own children), while others are negative (doctors take an oath to do no harm). Permissions are acts permitted to certain agents, but not others (a parent would be permitted to save its own child even at the cost of death to more children than could otherwise have been saved while another agent would be required to save as many children as possible). Agent-centered deontology is duty-based, while patient-centered deontology is rights-based.

The morality of punishing the innocent

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 9 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

There is a current movement with the expressed intent of reducing or eliminating sexual assault against women by changing current law to make it easier to convict those accused of committing sexual assaults.

The proposed changes would reduce and/or eliminate due process protections currently afforded to the accused in the United States. The war to change these laws is primarily being waged on college campuses by forcing these institutions to eliminate due process when handling cases alleging sexual assault. On many campuses the accused does not have the right to counsel, may not have the right to present evidence on his own behalf, to call witnesses, or to cross-examine witnesses including his accuser, may only be given limited access to evidence against him, and guilt may be determined by a preponderance of evidence (instead of clear and convincing or beyond reasonable doubt), or simply because the evidence of guilt has the greater probability of being true.

This denial of due process almost assures a conviction that can result in anything from reprimand, to sensitivity classes, to expulsion.

To most of us, the "guilty until proved innocent" attitude towards those accused of any crime is reprehensible. The American system of jurisprudence is founded on the idea that allowing the guilty to go free is preferable to jailing the innocent. But to some, the greater good of stopping violent crime (particularly sex crimes against women) supersedes the rights of the accused to due process. For these persons, the unintended consequence of jailing the innocent, while it may be unfortunate, is perfectly acceptable and morally correct. The moral justification for this can be traced to none other than St. Thomas Aquinas and his justification of killing in self-defense.

Aquinas writes "Nothing hinders one act from having two effects, only one of which is intended, while the other is beside the intention. … Accordingly, the act of self-defense may have two effects: one, the saving of one's life; the other, the slaying of the aggressor." He further explains that killing in self-defense is morally acceptable only if there was no intent to kill. In other words, if the killing was an unintentional consequence of defending oneself, even if the killing was foreseeable. He qualifies this by stating that the act of self-defense must be in proportion to the act of aggression. However, if the killing was intentional or disproportionate, even if done in self-defense, it is morally unjustifiable.

The Doctrine (or Principle) of Double Effect requires four conditions described in the New Catholic Encyclopedia (p. 1021):

1. The act itself must be morally good or at least indifferent.
2. The agent may not positively will the bad effect but may permit it. If he could attain the good effect without the bad effect he should do so. The bad effect is sometimes said to be indirectly voluntary.
3. The good effect must flow from the action at least as immediately (in the order of causality, though not necessarily in the order of time) as the bad effect. In other words the good effect must be produced directly by the action, not by the bad effect. Otherwise the agent would be using a bad means to a good end, which is never allowed.
4. The good effect must be sufficiently desirable to compensate for the allowing of the bad effect.

Thus it becomes permissible under this doctrine to strengthen the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to convict and imprison accused perpetrators even if that means that more innocent persons will be convicted and jailed. The intent of this action is to reduce harm to women by reducing the number of sexual assaults by creating an effective deterrent: increasing the likelihood of going to prison.

On the surface, most reasonable persons would likely agree that the conditions are met. In fact, they may well be. It is certainly not immoral to make it easier to gain convictions in order to protect members of society. Provided the intent is not to imprison innocent people, and remains only a by-product, condition two is met. Condition three is met if the imprisonment of innocent men is not the direct cause of the reduction of the number of sexual assaults. The increased likelihood of imprisonment of offenders must be the cause of the reduction. Finally, it must be more desirable to protect women from sexual assault than to imprison innocent men. Whether or not this condition is met may be dependent on perspective and the perception of how many women will be protected vs. the number of innocent men imprisoned.

However, what this doctrine does not address is whether or not the proposed action will be effective in producing the desired outcome. Does increasing the likelihood of prison serve as an effective deterrent to sexual assault? In other words, will this actually reduce sexual assault? The doctrine only addresses the intent of the act, not the effectiveness.

For instance, it is acceptable under this doctrine for a physician to administer a potentially lethal dose of pain medication to a dying patient in order to alleviate the pain, even if the physician knows the medication might kill the patient. But what if the medication does not alleviate pain because the patient has developed a tolerance to its pain-relieving effects? The doctor has now increased the risk of death without producing the desired effect; pain relief. Is that moral? By the same token, if increasing the likelihood on imprisonment of offenders does not decrease the number of sexual assaults, but only increases the likelihood of incarcerating the innocent, is it moral? More to the point, is it moral to institute such a policy without being reasonably assured that the policy will produce the intended result, especially when the harm done is almost assured?

It could further be argued that because the consequence of imprisoning the innocent can be foreseen, the intent cannot be denied. The knowledge that a harmful effect will occur as a result of committing an act is tantamount to intentionally bringing about the harmful effect. The Doctrine of Double Effect flows from another Catholic doctrine of doing vs. allowing harm. This can be expanded through a discussion of deontological ethics.[1]

Agent-centered deontology draws a distinction between causing, preventing, and allowing. It is impermissible to cause an evil act, but generally permissible to fail to act to prevent one. It would be morally wrong to push a child into the street in front of a car (causing). There may or may not be a moral obligation to stop that same child from running into the street (preventing). Allowings occur when the action taken involves removing a defense that would have otherwise been in place to prevent evil from occurring, and when the removal of the defense is not the direct cause of harm. Allowings are permitted only when the defense removed had previously been provided and when the removal of that defense allows another good to occur.

When one removes legal defenses that protect the accused in order to allow increased convictions intended to deter sexual assault, one is removing a defense previously provided by law in order to do good and since the removal of that defense is not a direct assault upon the innocent (although it allows the direct assault to occur), it would be permitted under this deontological ethic.

A somewhat weaker defense of changing the laws that protect the innocent is that the change does not cause the evil, it merely enables others to commit the evil (send the innocent to prison). Therefore those who change the law are not morally responsible for sending the innocent to prison. That this statement would be seen by many as morally reprehensible is a criticism of agent-centered deontology as well as the Doctrine of Double Effects.

A second type of deontology is patient-centered and concerned with rights, not duties. At its very foundation, the fundamental right is the right not to be “used only as a means for producing good consequences without consent… It is a right against being used by another for the user’s or others’ benefit.” (Alexander & Moore, 2012). Ethical dilemmas handled one way under agent-centered deontology might be handled differently under patient-centered deontology. The difference is the forbidden practice of using a person without that person’s consent.

In agent-centered deontology, rightness is derived from the mental state of the agent or the agent’s actions in causing the harm. In patient-centered deontology the justification of the results rests on whether or not the victim (the harmed person) is the means of producing the results. Further, in patient-centered deontology, providing aid to another is not required, nor is there a right to receive aid from another. This is derived from the concept of using.

Using can only be viewed as a positive act, not an inaction.

So in the example above, the child who runs into the street has no right to be saved, nor does the person who sees the child have an obligation to save it. Consequentialist ethics operate in both versions of deontology. Consequences help to define right and wrong actions in agent-centered deontology and define the moral norms used to guide action in patient-centered deontology.

An agent-centered deontology could be used to justify a change in laws to permit increased likelihood of conviction for sexual assault, including the likelihood of wrongful convictions, if it also reduces the number of sexual assaults. But under a system of patient-centered deontology, it could be argued that this is not justified. First, the goal of reducing the number of sexual assaults could be described as aiding potential victims. Under this system, no one has a right to aid. Second, it could be argued that the wrongfully convicted are being used without their consent to aid potential victims. Consequentialist ethics might intervene in the first case, but not in the second.

The consequence of sexual assault could be said to be so abhorrent that a moral norm be established that it in the interest of all to deter sexual assault. However, that norm would be overruled by using the innocent without their consent to prevent sexual assault. Thus a patient-centered approach would not permit this type of change in the law and those arguing for such a change would be arguing from the standpoint of agent-center deontology.

However, there is a case in which a patient-based ethic might permit such a change in the law. That is if it could be shown that more sexual assaults are prevented than innocents incarcerated or that sexual assault is a less desirable outcome than incarceration of innocents. Take the example of a trolley running loose down a mine shaft towards five workers trapped on the tracks. The trolley cannot be stopped and if left alone will kill all five workers. It is possible to pull a switch and divert the trolley onto a different track, but doing so would kill one worker who would not otherwise be killed.

Pulling the switch could be viewed as permissible if the five lives are considered more valuable than the one. However, because it is a positive act pulling the switch is not obligatory, simply because it is permissible does not relieve culpability. A person has the right not to act and cannot be held culpable for inaction under the patient-center ethic. But once a person acts, the person becomes culpable. So while a change to the law might be permissible, that permission does not relieve culpability. The actor is culpable for killing the one, but would not have been culpable for allowing the five to die. This is based on the separateness of persons.

Each person is a separate entity and wrongs (or rights) cannot be added together to form a greater wrong (or right). It follows that the rights of the majority do not supersede the rights of the minority which is the basis for constitutional law. Simply because the majority vote for a law, that law cannot be enacted if it violates the rights guaranteed under the constitution.

Interestingly, those who argue against sexual assault, argue from the standpoint of patient-centered deontology. No one has the right to use another person without that person's consent. This is the very foundation for the argument against sexual assault when one uses rights as the basis for the argument. It would seem a contradiction that these same persons would switch their ethical stance from patient-centered to agent-based when the context suits them.

Consequentialist questions remain whether one approaches the issue from the standpoint of the Doctrine of Double Effect and/or agent-based deontology or patient-centered deontology. Will making it easier to gain convictions provide a sufficient deterrent to sexual assault to justify the inevitable increase in wrongful convictions? Without answering this question, the entire argument is moot. Good intentions is simply not enough. As they say, the road to Hell is paved with them.

The Doctrine of Double Effect uses intent as the basis for morality of action and does not appear to consider actions where the outcome is uncertain. Agent-based deontology at least uses consequence as a standard in defining right and wrong. Patient-centered deontology uses moral norms to help define rights. But what happens when we don't know what the outcome of an action will be?

There are two likely outcomes (consequences) of strengthening the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to obtain convictions. One is that there is a reduction in sexual assaults committed due to the imprisonment of more offenders, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The other is that there is no change in the number of sexual assaults committed although more offenders are imprisoned, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The latter would likely be seen as unethical and immoral when held up to nearly any ethical philosophy.

There is little evidence to support that the first will occur. Many of the arguments against the death penalty are based on evidence that fails to support the reasoning that stiffer penalties results in effective deterrents. That would make the former outcome unethical as well. Therefore, the only truly ethical position is to not change these laws in any manner that would result in a greater number of convictions of the wrongly accused. Any law designed to reduce the number of sexual assaults should be evidence-based and include provisions designed to prevent wrongful convictions.

Alexander, Larry and Moore, Michael, “Deontological Ethics”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Winter 2012 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2012/entries/ethics-deontological/.

McIntyre, Alison, “Doctrine of Double Effect”, The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Fall 2011 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/fall2011/entries/double-effect/.

---

[1] Deontological ethics is a system of ethics that holds that some choices cannot be justified by their consequences. What makes a choice right is its conformity to moral norms. In agent-centered deontology, agents have permissions and obligations. Obligations may be positive (parents are obliged to protect their own children), while others are negative (doctors take an oath to do no harm). Permissions are acts permitted to certain agents, but not others (a parent would be permitted to save its own child even at the cost of death to more children than could otherwise have been saved while another agent would be required to save as many children as possible). Agent-centered deontology is duty-based, while patient-centered deontology is rights-based.

Book review: Uneasy Males

Robert St. Estephe · 10 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I've got good news to share. I've come across a superb – yet virtually unknown – book, written by a professional historian, which traces in detail the complex development of the "men's movement" (a category which includes the men's rights movement) in the United States from 1970 to 2000. The author, Edward L. Gambill, was professor of history at St. Cloud State University, St. Cloud, Minnesota. He wrote the book after retirement and passed away at the age of 77 in 2010, five years after its publication.

I'm going to cut to the chase: If you are a serious Men's Human Rights activist or advocate, you need this book.

[image]

Edward L. Gambill

Uneasy Males: The American Men's Movement 1970-2000

2005, iUniverse publisher

***

History is one of the most important weapons of tyrants and propagandists – fake history, half-truths history, cherry-picked history, and censored history (or to be specific, the Orwellian false narrative called "herstory"). The only weapon that can undo the damage done by fake history is real history. The only way to become a truly successful activist is to be informed about the efforts, successes, failures, struggles and mistakes of those who have previously traversed the same (or similar) difficult path. Gambill's book, Uneasy Males, is the product of years of research and years of meditation on the subject. The book provides the only convenient way to get a rich and full picture of the struggle to mobilize a men's movement in any nation in any period. It deals only with post-1960s America, but many of the experiences and ideas of those who worked in the movement in the U.S. will apply to MHRAs in other parts of the world.

Not surprisingly, though the book is written by a professional scholar, with a full biography, containing rare documentation and bearing a nuanced analysis of its subject, the book was not picked up by any publisher. Uneasy Males is a self-published book that would have been published by a university press had the subject matter been other than it is, or had it been an attack on men's rights. Instead it is a sober and balanced treatment of an ongoing movement that the intellectual and policy establishment wants to pretend is marginal and unimportant.

The book is available as print-on-demand so there is no problem of the supply drying up. It can be ordered on amazon.com and abe.com and other outlets. Amazon also offers a Kindle edition.

****

The promotional text from the book's back cover is presented here:

"During the last three decades of the twentieth century there has been widespread controversy over, and alteration of, gender roles in the United States. To a large extent the ferment originated in, and was influenced by, the general social upheaval of the sixties. A major result has been a well-publicized transformation in the options, social status, and perception of American women. But what affected women also affected men, and a similar movement among American males therefore accompanied the feminist movement.

"In Uneasy Males, Edward Gambill provides an historical overview of the American "men's movement". The book covers pro-feminist and anti-feminist responses, and the organization and activities of men's rights, father's rights, 'mythopoetic', religious, and black male groups. While much of the focus is on the development and operation of formal organizations, there is also coverage of changes apart from these structures. Uneasy Males thus provides readers with an understanding of, and thought-provoking question about, gender roles in the United States."

***

[image]

Here is the first paragraph of the preface to Uneasy Males:

"Intellectual inquiry often begins as the result of problems we face in our personal lives. This is especially the case when the problems are related to sex and gender. In my own instance, it was the direct result of the death of two parents and two divorces within a six-year period. Until that time, genders were inseparable, immutable, and therefore a given. Personal crisis, combined with growing social controversy over gender issues, wrenched me from my myopia. While my first exposure to gender analysis was through women, I finally found their point of view harsh, threatening and not necessarily addressed to my concerns as a male. I then stumbled across the men's movement, at the time mainly confined to metropolitan areas and virtually unheard of out in the heartland. I began readings on the movement probably as much out of a need for therapy as a scholarly endeavor. Eventually, however, the inquiry took on a life of its own and deemed worthy of doing on its own merits."

***

Professor Gambill seems to have been one of the few professors to date who have seriously considered the radical notion that Men's Rights Are Human Rights. The times they are a changin' and Prof. Gambill's efforts to give us our history will – despite the passive censorship undertaken by publishers that typically undermines such efforts – most surely have a beneficial on many men and women – for a great many years to come. Uneasy Males is destined to become a standard reference.

Iyanla Vanzant, Oprah, & daddyless daughter reality

Michael Sharron · 10 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Iyanla Vanzant is a “relationship expert” who uses the Oprah Winfrey network to teach daddyless daughters how their lives have been affected by not having a father in their life. In this article I am going to connect many of the dots that Iyanla and Oprah do not discuss in their series because I think it’s important that fathers have a say in this matter, and by “fathers” I do not mean the puppets Oprah uses on her show to promote her agenda.

I urge you to view the video linked in the opening of this article, as well as the others embedded in this article, to understand the complexity of the issues.

Both Iyanla and Oprah hit the mark dead center as it relates to the many problems women face as daddyless daughters, whether in relations with boyfriends and husbands, self-esteem, confidence, or self perception. For that, I thank Iyanla and Oprah for their truthfulness. However, what neither addresses is how we got to the point of so many women experiencing difficulties and sorrow as the result of not having fathers in their lives. In their series, both Iyanla and Oprah have no problems bringing countless women up to talk about their fear of abandonment, how they seek and find men like their fathers, or who live in abusive relationships with men like their fathers because they are desperately seeking the approval from dad that they did not get as young girls.

To the casual viewer, you are left with a very consistent and disturbing message that we at AVfM know all too well, and that is the message that fathers are bad people who abandon, hurt, and cause irreparable damage to their children when they choose to leave their kids.

But I am not the casual viewer – I am an enlightened father who wants to set the record straight about the culture of daddyless daughters that neither Iyanla Vanzant nor Oprah Winfrey seem inclined to tell the truth about because it does not fit in well with the audience, ideology, and ratings of the show that both Iyanla and Oprah use to make a living.

What neither seem inclined to tell their audience and the world is that the problem of daddyless daughters is twofold:

- There is very much a need for daughters without fathers because that is what feminism uses to lay the groundwork for the notion that women are victims of men, and that men are by nature bad people. How exactly are Iyanla and Oprah going to drive ratings, sell books, and appear on countless TV shows if men and fathers are not bad people? Feminist have NO problem with filling an audience full of crying women longing for the approval of their fathers, but what they won’t tell you is that feminism benefits from that happening.
- Oprah and Iyanla will have you believe that daddyless daughters are ONLY the result of selfish fathers who abandoned their families and children, but what they won’t tell you is that women and the courts are actually driving these fathers from their lives in greater numbers.

In discussing daughters who are experiencing difficulties in life as the result of not having a father, OWN TV is all too happy to have a token father (and a likely scripted one at that) on the show to explain why he abandoned his children, but they dare not have one on who will tell the entire story.

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YpJ5aKUCFEE]

Why aren’t Iyanla and Oprah telling their audience and guests about:

- The culture of daughters who are daddyless because the family courts usually bankrupt a father seeking his children after mom leaves a marriage and disappears – assuming he even has the money to start the process in the first place?
- The culture of the courts pushing fathers to the outermost margins of their daughters lives: 2-4 days a month, assuming fathers can adhere to that visitation schedule from vast distances?

- The culture (now represented by 40% of children born in the United States) where unmarried moms have children and many never tell the fathers about their children? How many of the daddyless daughters in Oprah's show are fatherless because dad does not even know he has a child – yet the daughters were told he abandoned them?
- The culture that puts fathers in prison because they cannot pay child support due to illness, forced unemployment, bankruptcy, or inability to pay support arrearages numbering perhaps in the tens of thousands of dollars because mom sought child support from fathers ten years after birth? Iyanla and Oprah are surely aware that mothers get financial assistance, housing assistance, educational assistance, job assistance, food assistance, daycare assistance, dental/medical assistance, and tax credits to avoid hardship while fathers are carted off to prison for the same circumstances, right?
- The culture of women committing paternity fraud in the hopes of duping a man into believing he is a father for financial gain?

At the end of the day, if you remove all the obstacles listed above that fathers have to negotiate, you will find that the number of deadbeat and unprepared fathers equals about the number of women having abortions, giving children up for adoptions, and handing children over to safe haven facilities.

I appreciate that Iyanla Vanzant and Oprah Winfrey are bringing attention to the issue of daddyless daughters because it is a very big deal for them to have a father to help set the stage for success in life, but they really need to tell the story of how mothers create this environment for many. And, if both want to be honest, they will stop using scripted and token fathers on their shows to further denigrate men while lining up sponsors and advertising for their shows and books.

How Iyanla and Oprah Are Hurting Women In Their Audience
[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=lCxtVRqp2TQ]

As I watched most of the daddyless daughters segments on the OWN TV Youtube site, I noticed a common theme. Oprah did a great job preparing the women in the audience to cry on cue, to use the scripted narratives of naturally protective mothers versus bad fathers, and the usual suspects of expert psychologists trained in the feminist narrative ready to sell their books and new theories to the government. In reality, every mother in the audience enjoys the fact that she is a daddyless daughter (and likely the fact that their daughters are daddyless) because if men were good fathers, then mothers couldn't be victims and the sole winners in custody battles. Feminism has a real dilemma on its hands: how are feminists going to continue to beg "bad" fathers to change so these daughters can have successful and happy lives, but then, prevent that change so that mothers can continue to benefit solely from the dismissal of those same fathers?

Why aren't Iyanla and Oprah talking about how the daddyless daughters in their shows are one day going to be the ones advocating for this article when their sons get hit by the system and they become grandmothers deprived of their grandchildren?

Why aren't Iyanla and Oprah talking to women in paternal families to learn the other side of this issue? Do both women actually believe that they are pulling the wool over everyone's eyes by advancing the theory that dads are the SOLE reason that women are having problems in life?

In short, there is good information in the daddyless daughters segments Iyanla and Oprah are producing to draw attention and dollars to themselves, but if we are going to get real about absent fathers we need to start looking at mothers who dismiss their daughters' fathers as disposable and unfit so that the mothers can maintain control.
[box]Activism Needed To Send the Message to Oprah Winfrey and Iyanla Vanzant That Fathers Are Not The Sole Reason For The Daddyless Daughter Epidemic

To help send the message in this article to Iyanla and Oprah, please complete the following:

- Follow the directions in THIS FILE to add code to your website or blog.

- Share this blog on Facebook, Reddit, Google+, and other social networks.
- Share this article on Twitter by copying and pasting the following into a tweet: Help AVfM educate @IyanlaVanzant and @OwnTV about #daddylessdaughters http://www.avoiceformen.com/women/girls/iyanla-vanzant-oprah-and-daddyless-daughter-reality #lifeclass
- Comment on this article and continue the conversation with friends and families in your community.
- Consider becoming an author with AVfM to share your knowledge and expertise on the MHRM and other issues that affect men and their families.
- Encourage OWN TV via Twitter (@OwnTV) to have Paul Elam on their show to speak on these issues.

[/box]

Editor's note: feature image by josette. –PW

Paul on Radio 3Fourteen

VFM News and Commentary · 10 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

From the Radio 3Fourteen show page:
Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com discusses the biggest issues men currently face, namely feminist ideologies and the psychological war against men. Paul explains how he woke up to anti male sentiments in politics. He points out areas where men are victims of discrimination and in which female abuse of men is facilitated by law. We converse on egalitarianism and the notion that government should resolve our conflicts.

We'll also discuss the early days of feminism and what they were after verses the feminists of today. He talks about feminist ideological agendas that are contradictory. In early human survival it was considered that men were disposable and women were a rare resource, due to their reproductive ability. This old view of gender roles is still in play today and men are considered disposable. We address male (and female) violence, rape accusations, and the idea that the patriarchy has been responsible for all evils against women.

We discuss more areas where men are demonized by feminist propaganda, including within academia, which is at the root of the problem. We'll continue on violent feminist groups and how consumer society is catering to please women. Later, we'll discuss healthy relationships, the family unit and individual responsibility. What is real and what is an artificial construct in our male/female relationships?

Paul explains how the lack of male role models in young children's lives is leading to an extraordinary level of psychological problems. Also, we address circumcision, the mutilation of male genitalia. We end the hour on violent patriarchal Gods.

It's a woman problem

Diana Davison · 11 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Women are facing a very real and grave problem in our culture: They are obnoxious cunts.

We don't know exactly how long this has been going on but we do know that no one is doing anything about it. By the tender age of four, girls begin to show symptoms of this affliction which is technically referred to as relational aggression. By the age of fourteen they are guaranteed to have been affected in some way as it is contagious. Young boys are thankfully spared from this disorder by something commonly called "cooties".

There is good news and bad news: Relational aggression appears to be a learned behaviour. That's both the good and bad news. Because it's not innate, it can be fixed, but because it's being taught to them by their mothers we can't just fix the toddlers we need to fix their role models as well. We all know it's hard to teach an old dog a new way of being a bitch.

Much attention was drawn to this enduring problem with the release of the film Mean Girls. (If you haven't seen the movie The Intern Extraodinaire can recite it, word for word, in less than thirty minutes.) The obvious resulting concern over our darling female toddlers was to conduct more studies until it was shown that boys are guilty too. To accomplish this feat of avoidance, researchers studied young adults and by the time our kids reach their twenties boys have also started learning these techniques.

"As males and females enter adolescence and adulthood, cross-sex interactions become increasingly common. As a result, the relationally aggressive behaviors more characteristic of elementary school girls may become more common among males as mixed-sex interactions increase."*

The wikipedia entry, and many others, deceivingly imply that relational aggression occurs equally between males and females and, though they are stuck with the results of empirical evidence, they do their best to mingle discussions of male violence in with the subject of what is indisputably the preferred female form of aggression. Feminism is not interested in fixing it.

The pioneer of relational aggression studies, Nicki Crick, continued the research into more detail when it was discovered that men start to pick up this behaviour and, with a team of experts, took it one step further to study what's going on with adults. The findings show that, while men start to use relational aggression equally by adulthood, women predominantly turn their abuse on romantic partners as men, behind in the game, are busy practicing it on their peers.*

Relational aggression involves manipulating social hierarchies through exclusion, gossip, reputation damage, visible displays of disgust in the target's presence, and various forms of humiliation or degradation.

Is this a serious problem? Absolutely. After two decades, the problem is still under-examined and largely ignored.

Gone unchecked, Queen Bee syndrome leads to murder. A prime example, Kelly Ellard, was finally convicted of the second-degree murder of Reena Virk, in Saanich BC, in 2005. The crime took place in 1997 but it took four trials and eight years to finally get a guilty verdict that wasn't overturned. Wikipedia, unsurprisingly, names Ellard's boyfriend first as a perpetrator but the murder went like this:

Ellard organized an outside party and had Virk invited. Virk was keen to be "in" with the popular girls so she keenly attended, hopeful that it was a good sign for her social life. When she arrived, the girls (most of whom were not named in the criminal case) swarmed the unsuspecting Virk and beat her until one of the girls told them to stop. Virk managed to stumble away but Ellard told her boyfriend to follow her. Ellard smashed Virk's head into a tree, knocking her unconscious, and the two of them dragged Reena under a bridge where they continued to beat her and then drown her in the water. Reena Virk was fourteen years old, Ellard was fifteen.

This event is dated but significant. It caused a moral panic: Girls aren't supposed to do that. We can toss boys in jail but when girls go bad we need to find a way to blame it once more on boys. In this case the boy, unlike Ellard, expressed remorse and responsibility for his actions choosing to communicate with Reena's parents to help them heal. Ellard has never publicly admitted that she did anything wrong. In the girl world of relational aggression, she hasn't – she just went a little bit too far.

Unfortunately, the moral panic did not persist in finding a solution and, as long as we hold female aggression as taboo, women will continue to author their own misfortune as well as that of others. There isn't a man alive who has been meaner to a woman than women are.

The "patriarchy" that feminists are so fond of referring to is not a male construct, it is part of the female hierarchical social aggression scheme. It is created by women, maintained by women, and used by women for their own advantage. It's exactly what women designed it to be. Girls use boys to compete with each other. Women, when losing a verbal argument, will quite often revert to bragging about the greatness of their boyfriend or spouse. Men are objects to women by which they gain social status and it is not something men have orchestrated, it is just an easy and convenient measure on "the scale of cunthood."

In fact, all the things that feminists blame on men are results of the peer oriented relational bullying games they learned to play so well as children. Beauty, fancy clothes, foot mutilating shoes, cosmetic surgery, all body image disorders, slut-shaming, ridicule over poverty conditions, and even purported female ignorance are all daggers that women use and throw at each other from the time they are four years old. It's how we make "friends".

We know that feminists care about the results, they just don't seem to care about finding and treating the actual cause. They are too busy staring at their surface reflections in the mirror to bother with what's inside.

When Toronto Constable Michael Sanguinetti told university students they should "avoid dressing like sluts" it was a generalization of a term he'd probably heard other women use quite often. If you think that's a wild guess, I direct you to recent events in a matter less ambiguous.

Two teenage girls, aged fifteen and sixteen, were convicted in June 2013 of simultaneously slut-shaming thirty-eight peers in their Swedish school. Alright, feminists, we've caught your culprits and they've confessed. It's certainly a crime: They broke the rules and went after too many targets at once, causing a school riot but giving us a face to put to the name of slut-shaming. Only girls could do it so well. Go get 'em.

Feminists are also very concerned about men bailing out of relationships. Kaye Hymowitz didn't bother to read Crick's later work showing that "initial work indicates that relational aggression enacted against romantic partners is associated with romantic relationships of relatively low quality."*

Feminists are deeply concerned with the amount of hostility men hold towards women while intentionally ignoring that "findings also suggest that as females get older, they may transfer relationally aggressive behaviors learned in the peer context to interactions with romantic partners." and that men are more prone to reactive relational aggression in response (which, incidentally, is also more connected with prior abuse history than the other types).*

All evidence indicates that Women's Studies from early childhood education is a great idea. They just need to change the focus from women whining about their victimhood to women learning about how they victimize each other and teaching them to stop being cunts.

As cyber-bullying becomes the new tool for assisted suicide, I think it's time feminists admit that girls are92% more likely to engage in online bullying. Along with their mothers.

Instead of #twittersilence they should focus on the real problem with #don'tbethatcunt.

I suggest the following course titles as options for future consideration:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- How to enjoy life without wrecking someone else's;

- How to share friends and be happy;
- Don’t be defined by the number of gifts you get;
- How to openly and honestly fight your own battles;
- Popularity isn’t worth killing or dying for and, ultimately,
- How to stop being a cunt.

[/unordered_list]

Source: * Proactive, reactive, and romantic aggression in adulthood: Measurement, predictive validity, gender differences, and association with Intermittent Explosive Disorder, Dianna Murray-Close, Jamie M. Ostrov, David A. Nelson, Nicki R. Crick, Emil F. Coccaro, 2009

Don’t be that wannabe male feminist

August Løvenskiolds · 11 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Did you hear the alarm cock, guy feminists?

No, I didn’t mean “clock”. I meant male feminist Hugo Schwyzer’s recent dick-sexting meltdown (link NSFW), failed 2nd suicide attempt, and self-ejection from the grrl-o-sphere after a career that lasted about the same length of time as the two and a half-year stint of the last lady Governor of Alaska.

Because Sarah Palin thought she could be a feminist, too.

A male feminist faces a difficult task – licking the feces off of the Birkenstocks of hirsute female feminists while walking on eggshells and pretending that he is still, somehow, more man than cockroach. Sure, some men are into that – some see any attention from a woman as better than no attention. For those men who define their worth through the moistened lenses of their vaginal idolatry, becoming a male feminist might seem like a great idea, but as they continue to follow that road, gnawing away at the back of their minds will be a growing unease – a certain feeling of cognitive dissonance.

Let’s name that dissonance for what it is: the awareness by feminist men that feminists hate men who identify as feminists.

A movement that seeks equality should practice it, don’t you think? Some feminists would not even grant men in their movement the equality of the title of feminist, preferring to call such men “male allies of feminism” or “pro-feminists.” That’s right – the movement that espouses “equality” is unwilling to grant it to the men in its own ranks, not even through something as trivial as allowing their manslaves the title of “feminist”. Cognitive dissonance.

Sure, feminist supremacist slights like this roll off the backs of feminist men like the tears they dare not show any woman – we’re men, they think, *and we’re not supposed to express what we feel because “patriarchy” (men like us), and feminists are working to tear down patriarchy (men like us), and we should help the feminists rip down men like us, because…Cognitive dissonance.

More and more feminists are expressing skepticism and rejection of male feminists even as they claim they want men in their hate movement – Meghan Murphy writes in xoJane that “It’s not that I don’t think men can be feminist. I know many men who clearly align themselves with the feminist movement. The problem seems to be with men who self-identify as ‘feminist’ as a means of gaining credibility or avoiding accountability. The problem is that many men who claim to be ‘good men’ or to respect women, don’t actually… well… respect women.”

You see the eggshells, don’t you? Be careful, guys – your nominal, scare-quote “feminism” will not protect you from the wrath of women – it will make you their primary targets. Men who self-identify as “feminist” don’t gain credibility with women (they lose it) and they sure as hell don’t dodge their accountability as patriarchal assholes – feminists expect them to shut up, empty their wallets and destroy their own lives just like all men will be forced to do as feminism expands. Like Hugo Schwyzer did, and will, until the day he dies.

Murphy knows that to keep men in line, feminists must first, and always, shame and dehumanize them – treat them like dogs. She writes when men claim feminism as their own either to gain legitimacy in feminist spaces and conversations or as a way to excuse their misogynist behaviour, it makes me wonder whether men might be better off staying away from the title completely. “I’m a feminist,” when coming from a man, always feels to me like demanding a pat on the head. Cognitive dissonance.

Shame is a normal human emotion – properly used it can guide us away from unethical, unjust and unsafe actions. Feeling shame is unpleasant and seeking to avoid shame, or gain relief from shame, can be healthy. But there is no relief from shame in feminism, especially for men, and men who seek to address their shame and improve their self-image by becoming male feminists are going to be less successful than someone drinking molten lead to relieve heartburn.

Now, in addition to seeking to become feminists to relieve the shame feminists have instilled in them, some men think that achieving the feminist title will gain them sexual access to women. When they are not shaming men, feminists shamelessly exploit men's normal and natural sexual desires. In a remarkable article that exposed the entire feminist sexual playbook for exploiting men, Anthony Weiner groupie and feminist Sydney Leathers cackled out her 10 tips "for seducing politicians", although these tips would reduce any blue-pill pussy-beggar to mush.

Leather dehumanized Weiner by describing him as "a weird science experiment. I wanted to see how far it could go. How far could I push it? How long could it go on?" Leathers' feminist seduction tips include indulging his ego, playing coy, avoiding aggression, resisting being sexual ("It will drive him crazy!"), exploiting his weaknesses ("If he's insecure, you've hit gold"), alternating between making him feel jealous/secure, finding out his fetish, giving him detailed attention, telling him he's sexy, painting a picture of herself in his brain, and so on.

Sure, it is all fun and games with feminists until they turn on you and publish your penis for all the world to see – and back we go to the shaming, and, you guessed it, Cognitive Dissonance.

The feminists would kill you like a lab rat when they tire of playing with your feelings and dignity but they lack the depth of feeling for even that measure of mercy. They will drive you to attempt suicide but your identity as a man will be so damaged that you will fail at it and wind up damseling just like feminists do.

But damseling only works if you are a woman. "Manseling" – asking for help as a man – will only make feminists sing "Cry me a river".

The only hope for you, male feminists, is in places that hold some compassion for men. Places like A Voice for Men, where Paul Elam admits his compassion for men like Hugo: "To be completely honest, for the first time I actually feel sympathy for this troubled soul."

There were other men who offered their solace – commenter Dragnet at The-Spearhead was strongly up-voted when he wrote "I actually kind of feel bad for the guy. He is obviously in some serious psychological distress and is a danger to himself and, quite likely, others around him."

Even purple pill, not-a-feminist Ally Fogg of the Guardian wrote "Although I disagree(d) with him on just about everything, and we had more of our share of cross words, I wish Schwyzer nothing less than a full recovery and the chance to find the peace of mind that has obviously long eluded him."

So, if you are a man who believes in equality for both women and men, and grasps how ludicrous it is for feminists to assert that they merely want equality with the people they are trying to destroy, then there is one place to be.

Nowhere near a feminist.

Another feminist attack on male sexuality

Peter Lloyd · 12 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The demonization of "lad's mags" isn't about equality or respect. It's a sexist assault on healthy masculinity.

For the past few months Britain's feminist community have taken affront with men's magazines.

According to their Lose The Lads Mags campaign, publications such as Nuts, Loaded and Zoo objectify women while green-lighting domestic violence in a nation of misogynistic men.

In a bid to have these titles banned, activists are using equality legislation to scare retailers into submission, arguing they'll face legal action if they disobey their orders.

So far, they've had some success. Earlier this month, it was revealed that The Co-Op have removed weekly title Nuts from their shelves because it refused to be bullied into a modesty bag, even though their covers have consciously been more conservative in recent weeks.

The magazine's publisher, IPC Inspire, eloquently described the supermarket's ultimatum as 'an unreasonable attempt to prevent shoppers from freely browsing a legal magazine that is already displayed according to Home Office guidelines'.

Meanwhile, IPC's managing Director, Paul Williams, added: 'The objection that niche lobby groups have against certain sectors of the media should not mean that the right to purchase a perfectly legal product is restricted for the over half a million readers.

'This is no longer a question of whether you like men's magazines, it's a question of how far you can restrict the public's ability to consume free and legal media before it becomes censorship.'

And he's right. Because this campaign has nothing to do with equality – it's simply another fashionable attack on our young men.

In the same week that The Guardian's Suzanne Moore wrote a creepy, cruel, boy-bashing guide on how males should manage their penises – printed in what is supposedly our country's most progressive and big-hearted newspaper – we're told that only women need protection from sexism in the big, bad media. Clearly not.

Despite the fact we live in a post-sexual revolution society, where people can enjoy the human body without shame, here we have women taking a moral standpoint on men's free choice as adults.

Yes people, it may be 2013, but we've swapped the repression of women for the repression of men.

Ironically, what these women fail to realise is that it's their actions that are sexist, not the magazines they despise.

When Stephen Fry made a throw-away comment about female sexuality in 2010, he was attacked by countless women who said he had no right to voice an opinion.

Apparently, female sexuality is sacred and not up for discussion – especially by men. After all, that would be patriarchal oppression.

Yet, in a blatant example of hypocrisy and double-standards, here we have women telling men how and when they should consume their own sexual pleasures.

Fortunately, anybody with a brain appreciates that lads mags are a celebration of male sexuality, not a chauvinistic plot against women.

In fact, these magazines are much more about men than they are the opposite sex, which is probably why they're being targeted in the first place. Anything enjoyed by men is now considered sexist.

To be fair, the most compelling part of this movement's argument is that children should be guarded from explicit images, which is of course true – but their defence is incomplete.

Because if children need protecting from inappropriate material, shouldn't this also include posters for Hollywood movie Magic Mike? David Beckham in his pants? Men casually being obliterated in computer games?

They should probably also be shielded by pop stars who promote girl power whilst standing in their pants.

And if so-called 'lads mags' are the building block for domestic violence, how do these campaigners explain the rates of spousal abuse in lesbian relationships?

LGBT charity Broken Rainbow show that rates of abuse between gay females are the same as heterosexual couples. Yet they don't have a lads mag in sight.

This abuse is often non-physical too. More than 40 per cent of women who took part in the Broken Rainbow study confessed that that they'd been humiliated, degraded, insulted or verbally harassed by their female partner. Worse still, 12 per cent had been pressured into sexual activity.

Disturbingly, the women at LoseTheLadsMags.com overlooked this.

Quite frankly, these feminists – both male and female – need to get their priorities in order. If they're really so dedicated to gender equality and fairness, they should be addressing the bigger, more pernicious issues that underline society: the fact that three million UK men have no access to their children, the worrying trend of schools nationally failing boys and the painful reality that young men's suicide rates are at a ten-year high (for a reason: misandry).

Last month, women gathered at London's Trafalgar Square to protest the current feminist hot-topic of female circumcision – commonly referred to as FGM.

There they demanded an end to the genital mutilation of girls, and only girls, despite the fact that millions of baby boys are routinely circumcised across the world each year. Many of whom suffer infections, damage to the penis and even death.

Only this week the media obsessed over the worrying case of barrister Robert Colover, who described a 13 year-old sex attack victim as 'predatory', but earlier this year a judge allowed a female paedophile to walk free from court saying: 'it was a one-off…and your [male] victims have largely recovered.'

Unsurprisingly, there was no CPS review and no backlash – especially from veterans of the gender war.

Which begs a very important question: if feminism is such a benevolent force for good, as lads mags protesters say, why has it done nothing to change men's disadvantages in the 40 years it has been the political and social status quo?

The life expectancy gap rages while the pay gap closes, even though they are manifestations of the same thing. Home Office statistics prove that men are at least 40 per cent victims of domestic violence, but not one UK shelter exists for men.

There is also a huge sentencing disparity in criminal courts, which sees men get longer sentences for exactly the same crimes.

And while it may be true that women suffer most when it comes to being sex objects, the world equally objectifies men as success objects – just look at WAG culture. The divorce courts are no better: men are constantly objectified as walking cash points and sperm donors.

Quite frankly, I'm more concerned that our young people will see this rather than a woman with no clothes on.

We are perilously close to becoming a society that wants women treated equally – except when they're treated better. But if we're ever going to achieve equality, this approach is never going to work.

Lads mags may not be tasteful or even sexy, but their existence must be tolerated. If only to reiterate that male sexuality is perfectly fine exactly how it is.

This article was originally posted at MailOnline and is reposted here with permission of Mr. Lloyd

What Pay Gap?

Jon Gunnarsson · 12 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most persistent talking points of feminists and politicians alike is the gender pay gap. You constantly hear things like, “Women only make 80 cents on the dollar,” and “Women are paid 23 per cent less for the same work.” Feminists demand equal pay for equal work, and they even have the UN’s Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) on their side: article 23, paragraph 2 says,

> “Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

But what does that even mean? What is equal work? Equality without any qualifiers doesn’t make any sense. Two things can only be equal in some particular attribute. For example, a rock and a bottle of water may both weigh one kilogram and therefore be equal in regard to mass, but they are also different in many other regards and hence aren’t equal with general. Since neither the feminists nor the UDHR specify what kind of equality they’re talking about, I’m going to assume they mean equality of value.

Does “equal pay for equally valuable work” make sense? The problem here is that value is subjective. Just because Alice regards two things as equally valuable, doesn’t mean that Bob has to agree. In fact, people differ a great deal in what they value how highly. Thus, there is no objective way to say that two particular labour services are of equal value.

The question then is: whose valuation matters? The answer should be quite clear. Since the employer is the one who buys labour services, he is the one who decides how valuable they are to him. The employer is the consumer of labour, so it should be he, and no one else, who decides how much he is willing to pay. An outside observer isn’t able to assess the value of a particular employee to the employer because no third-party knows as much about the employer’s preferences as the employer himself.

Thus, no one can ever reasonably accuse an employer of paying unequal wages for equal work. If Carl the Capitalist pays Alice less than Bob, then that must mean he values Bob’s work more highly (or else that Bob did a better job negotiating his wages, but then the fault for being paid less lies squarely on Alice and she has no grounds for complaint). Maybe Carl’s assessment is faulty. Maybe his assessment of Bob’s work being more valuable is just due to ignorance or fallacious reasoning and if he knew and understood all the relevant facts, he would actually prefer Alice’s work. But an outside observer can’t know that. An outside observer who suspects that Carl isn’t taking into account all of the facts can of course go to Carl and point this out to him, but in the end Carl is the only one who can properly assess the value of his employees to him.

But the proponents of equal pay insist that there are objective criteria by which the value of workers can be measured, such as education, previous work experience, and seniority. It’s true that these factors can be objectively measured, but they do not directly determine value. They will influence the value of an employee to any reasonable employer, but no outside observer can determine by how much. They are also merely crude statistical tools. It’s entirely possible, for example, that a highschool dropout is smarter and better educated than someone with a university degree. Most university graduates are better educated than most highschool dropouts, but not all. An employer who knows his employees well can make this evaluation; an outside observer using only objective and easily quantifiable data cannot.

There are also many other considerations for how valuable a worker is to an employer. Maybe Carl just likes Bob better and enjoys his company. Maybe Bob gets along better with his colleagues and superiors. Maybe Carl judges Bob to be more competent at his job. Maybe Bob is good about helping out his colleagues. Maybe Bob is more reliable. There are a hundred possibilities here. No outside observer could ever hope to recognize, let alone objectively quantify, all relevant factors.

To illustrate the absurdity of the position that value can or should be judged by outsiders based on objective criteria, let's consider a different market. Suppose Alice wants to buy a laptop computer. After some deliberation, she decides on an Apple MacBook Air. At this point, Olivia the Outside Observer comes in to stop Alice. After all, there is a product from a different brand that has the same specs but is cheaper than the MacBook. This, Olivia says, is discrimination, and Alice shouldn't pay unequal money for an equal product.

Of course the two different laptops are not equal in value to Alice. She prefers the Apple product, even though it is more expensive. Maybe all her friends also own Apple products and she doesn't want to stand out, or maybe she regards it as a status symbol. Maybe she prefers the design, or maybe she thinks that the MacBook will be easier or more comfortable to use. I don't think anyone would want to forbid her from buying the product she prefers, but if the "equal pay for equal work" advocates were consistent, they would have to condemn Alice's decision. If this principle should apply to the sale of labour services, then why not to all other goods and services?

Another possibility to determine whether work is equal is to interpret "equal" as "equal in regard to market prices." But this avenue of attack doesn't work at all for the equal pay crusaders. The wage a worker is paid is the market price. Thus, under this interpretation of equality, there is always equal pay for equal work.

If Alice feels her wage is below the market value of her work, she can always find work elsewhere, working for someone who values her services more highly. If she can't find anyone else who's willing to hire her at a higher wage, then she was wrong and Carl did not in fact pay her less than her market value.

No matter from what angle you come at it, it's impossible to determine what equal work is, using objective criteria. Legislation that forbids unequal pay for equal work is an abomination, spawned by economically illiterate demagogues trying to appeal to ignorant, irrational voters. All these laws do is to intimidate and bully businesses and strip away property rights from business owners.

Feminists keep touting the wage gap, but it's a meaningless statistic when it comes to determining whether there is unfair discrimination. Men do earn more money than women on average, both in terms of yearly income and in terms of hourly wages. According to a 2009 report by the U.S. Department of Labor, women working full-time had a 20.4% lower median annual income than men working full-time [1]. In the EU, the pay gap is measured as the difference in mean hourly wages and was estimated to be 16.2% for 2011 [2].

This is an interesting piece of trivia, but nothing more. There are fundamental differences between men and women, so no one (except reality-denying gender ideologues) should be the least bit surprised to see a difference in average wages. When you adjust for a few statistical factors such as choice of industry, number of hours worked, and number of years on the job, you get what is called the adjusted wage gap.

The U.S. Department of Labor has calculated the adjusted wage gap to be between 4.8% and 7.1% for the U.S.A. [1]. The German Institut für Wirtschaftsforschung (Institute for Economic Research) has concluded that the adjusted wage gap for Germany is less than 2%, while the raw wage gap is 25% [3]. But these figures do not show anything about unjust discrimination. No matter how many factors you take into account and how many statistical regressions you run, there still isn't any objective way of measuring value.

Thus, all the blabber about wage discrimination against women is baseless speculation. I'm sorry feminists, but hurt feelings, indignation, and defunct sociological theories are not admissible as evidence.

Given the wide-spread belief in and condemnation of wage discrimination against women and given the many laws against discrimination which are almost exclusively applied in favour of women, there is no reason at all to believe that women are getting the short end of the stick when it comes to wages. On the contrary, it's even quite likely that there is in fact unjust discrimination against men.

Companies have to be very careful not to be accused of wage discrimination. Even if an allegation isn't proved in court, the allegation alone can do damage to the company's image. Since there will never be any lawsuits for wage discrimination against men in the current climate, companies are incentivized to err on the side of caution, i.e. on the side of discriminating against men.

There is a simple solution for this whole mess: get rid of laws requiring equal pay. Get rid of all laws which prohibit discrimination in the use of private property. Get the government out of private businesses and allow free individuals to make voluntary agreements. Then we can be certain that whatever the differences between the wages of men and women may be, these differences will be the result of the freely expressed preferences of the individuals involved, rather than the whims of feminist bureaucrats.

References:

[1] http://www.consad.com/content/reports/Gender%20Wage%20Gap%20Final%20Report.pdf

[2] http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/gender-pay-gap/situation-europe/index_en.htm

[3] http://www.iwkoeln.de/de/presse/veranstaltungen/beitrag/pressekonferenz-beschaeftigungs-und-karriereperspektiven-von-frauen-102502, please note that the methodology used is different from the U.S. report, so the numbers are not directly comparable

Corrupt Judge Michael J. Kelly Is Retiring

VFM News and Commentary · 12 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to West Virginia's Bureau of Child Support Enforcement: Kelly Is Retiring

Controversial Judge Is Calling It Quits

Soon West Virginia families will be safe from abusive Kanawha County Family Court Judge Michael J. Kelly-who presides over some Putnam County cases.

The man that refused to let a dying grandmother from a final visit with her grandson, and held the same child hostage, in West Virginia, banning him from the beach, will be retiring at the end of 2013.

That's the word from sources with the West Virginia Bureau of Child Support Enforcement.

Kelly can read the writing on the wall. Parents and children, who have had their civil rights trampled on by the Cretin in a Black Dress, were lining up to trash Kelly at campaign stops had he been stupid enough to run for re-election, in 2016. And he would never be able to explain his mental instability about denying the grandmother's visit with her grandson. Instead, Kelly's chickening out and retiring.

Soon, but not soon enough.

Facebook followers posted the following comments when they read the news:

- [image]
  Sabrina Leighann Ledford I hope this means good things for you and Matthew 23 minutes ago via mobile ·
- [image]
  Denise Adams Miller Bout time, don't you think?
  22 minutes ago via mobile ·
- [image]
  Kimberly Smith Case I hope you see some justice from his replacement, and sleep better at night…LoL

Editor's note: this item originally appeared on PutnamLIVE. For previous entries on this corrupt judge, see West

Virginia family court corruption and incompetence –DE

Not all feminists are like that

John Hembling (JtO) · 12 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

You've probably heard that not all feminists are like that.

It's one of the boilerplate responses, thrown out flippantly whenever anybody points to the difference between what feminism claims to be, and what that ideological gender movement demonstrates it is by its organized actions. For example, when feminists attempted to shut down a 2013 lecture in Toronto by Drs. Nathanson and Young, some of those "protesters" were challenged on the fact that men comprise 80% of suicides. The response? A sarcastic recital of the song "Cry Me a River". Organized to silence and censor, and sneering at those whose pain drives them to suicide – this is just a recent demonstration of what the gender ideology of feminism really is. But of course, not all feminists are like that.

In fact, although organized, connected and influential feminists including social workers, lawyers, teachers and childcare workers participated in a blog regularly endorsing male exterminating eugenics, and sex-selective child abuse – it's important to remember that not all feminists are like that. Indeed, those same feminists, whose annual conference lost it's venue due to the insistence by the organizers that only chromosomal female participants qualified as fully human – we should remember that not all feminists are like that.

Of course, we should also read as typical the examples of feminists in opposing by direct violence any opinions differing from their own. No matter how often feminists may attend, armed with knives or bludgeons, other people's speaking engagements – we should never forget that all such violent and sociopathic feminists are a tiny minority, and that the vast majority of feminists are not like that.

Obviously, all these examples are recent. When Lorena Bobbitt sexually mutilated her husband, thousands of feminists united to declare that if she were found guilty for this violent crime – they would murder thousands of men in retribution. When, 18 years later, Catherine Kieu Becker did the same thing to her husband, the hosts of The Talk and the all-female audience cheered and giggled over this sexual mutilation. One of the hosts, Sharon Osborne, drew the connection between these two events herself. Osborne claimed in the episode that she maintained a shrine to Lorena Bobbitt in her home. But again, it's important to remember that not all feminists are like that.

Also, feminist-run domestic violence shelters and grievance organizations promote in their public messaging the idea that all domestic violence is male on female. This is contradicted by practically all the legitimate research on domestic violence, which shows reciprocity of abuse in the vast majority of cases, and in the minority of cases of DV where it really is one-sided, the majority of that small fraction is violence committed against nonreciprocating male partners.

Whoops.

But that appears to not matter. In fact, the phrase "violence against women" is now replacing the term domestic violence in public service messaging on the issue. It's not even that this one-sided lie seems designed to promote fear and hatred, it's that by using and promoting a false model, grievance organizations seem determined to prevent anyone with good intent from actually reducing domestic violence. After all, there's money to be made in the form of grants and donations, as long as there's ongoing human carnage. But again, we are to be reminded, not all feminists are like that.

We also have the rising trend on university campuses that new male students be required to attend a "she fears you" lecture. These lectures putting them all on notice that rather than students, rather than paying customers of the school, dropping 300 to 500 dollars per course per semester – that these young men are to think of themselves as potential sexual predators. But this campus-wide cultivation of fear and hatred shouldn't be taken as indicative of the character of feminist ideology, because as we must all remember, not all feminists are like that.

We should also not take the phenomenon of the hate rallies called “slut walks” as a measure of the character of anyone attending such a rally. After all, hundreds of signs reading “teach men to not rape”, implying that without special education men are all sexual predators – that’s something only a tiny insane minority of feminists would support. And while a few prominent, vocal and highly visible feminists really are that insane and hateful, not all feminists are like that. If it seems otherwise, just keep repeating – that not all feminists are like that.

Similarly, we shouldn’t jump to conclusions about feminism from public messaging from organizations like Riverview whose public service announcement claimed a 6 month old male toddler was a future rapist, or the Canadian Federation of Women whose PSA depicted a not yet born infant girl being given a rape whistle as for a gift. The deterministic idea that all women are victims and all men are predators – that grotesque hatred and insanity shouldn’t inform what we think of the nature of the gender ideology calling itself feminism, because not all feminists are like that.

How do we know they’re not? Well, that’s obvious: every time some published, tenured or politically-connected feminist individual or major feminist organization demonstrates not by rhetoric, but by action, their agenda of hatred, violence, censorship and profiteering off real human carnage they manoeuvre to maintain the conditions of, some nobody claiming to be a feminist will show up in the commentary and point out that not all feminists are like that. They might even remind everybody that the dictionary definition of feminism is that it’s a movement for equality, and the real world indicators of produced outcomes, lobbying, changes to law, censorship, intimidation and violence are all non-typical, and non-indicative. The dictionary says feminism is equality, thus is must be so.

But this leaves us with just one niggling question. Now, admitting the absolute and irrefutable truth that feminism, the movement and the ideology is nothing more or less than the pursuit of social, political and economic equality, where are the “not like that” feminists? By “not like that”, of course, what I mean is, the ones not advocating eugenics, promoting violence, apologetics for false accusation, child abuse along with censorship and intimidation of any differing view. Where are the rest, indeed, where are the vast majority of feminists, you know, the ones conforming to the dictionary definition that feminism is a movement seeking equality?

For example, it seems obvious admitting that feminism really is about equality, that the workplace death rate, presently 93% male is right at the top of every real feminist’s major problems to solve right away. Bloomberg’s online business journal recently posted an updated list for 2013 of the lowest paying and most dangerous jobs. Unsurprisingly, every single one of them is a field populated almost totally by male workers. Obviously, feminists are lobbying and canvassing to reduce the death rates in these jobs, and to get women into these dangerous and unrewarding professions. After all, feminism is definitionally a movement for equality and for the benefit of all. This is especially pressing because these dangerous and unrewarding jobs – including taxi driving, logging, commercial fishing, construction, and truck driving are the basic work on which the entirety of the rest of our society relies on.

It would be unconscionable if the pre-eminent movement for equality just sat quietly and allowed men to act as disposable utilities, dying at rates as high as 120 per 100,000 workers annually, while women were elevated only into safe, high status, high comfort, and high relative pay, roles within the workforce. So obviously, this is a major feminist issue. The only question is where are the major feminist campaigns on this issue? Are they operating in secret?

Additionally, as it’s obviously true that feminism is a beneficent movement, and seeking nothing except equality, it’s somewhat puzzling that the efforts by feminist organizations to seek equal sentencing outcomes for female criminals are not more prominent in our popular media. After adjusting for severity of criminal offence, a number of studies have shown that on average, men are sentenced as much as 60% more harshly for the same crime for which women receive a sentencing discount. Truly, there could never be even an illusion of equality if feminists did not vigorously demand women receive the same degree of legal and criminal accountability men enjoy. However, since feminism definitionally is THE movement for equality, this is obviously right at the top of the list of problems to be solved. Real feminists are obviously lobbying and raising awareness of this issue. My question is, where are they, as they seem to be pursuing this goal well below the radar of public awareness too.

If women are to be thought of as fully adult, self-owning and empowered citizens, they must obviously enjoy the same justice men do, and I'm thankful that feminism is pushing so hard on this issue. I'm just not sure who, or where, or how it's being pursued in feminist circles, because it's also being done, apparently, quietly, and in secret.

However, feminism is a movement seeking equality. We know this because we've been told so by feminists, over and over and over. That's why I know feminist anti-violence organizations are so strong on addressing the violent criminal victimization of our society's most affected sexual demographic. Almost 75% of criminal violence targets men, obviously, a fact which even the most cursory glance at criminal victimization statistics will reveal. We also know that feminist efforts to reduce or stop violence altogether are powerful, well-funded, and persistent. The Stop Violence against Women campaign is so pervasive that the United Nations have devoted an entire branch of that international organization to stopping violence against women.

The larger, and more pervasive problem of violence against men is therefore bigger, better funded and even better organized. So well-organized that they don't even need public messaging on the topic. In fact, under the influence of feminist public rhetoric the phrase "violence against women" has come to mean all domestic violence, including the HALF of domestic violent committed against men. My only serious question on this issue is how can I help feminists in their activism. I want to help stop violence too, but their obviously highly effective, well-funded and organized campaigns to end violence against the most affected victims (men) appear also to operate below any threshold of public detection. But those efforts obviously exist, and billions of dollars are spent on them, because feminism is in its own self-definition, a movement seeking equality.

But I'm just the slightest bit puzzled, because when we talk about the feminists pursuing violence, lying about domestic abuse, employing censorship and intimidation, and mocking male homeless or male suicides, it's obvious that the overwhelming vast majority of feminists "aren't like that". Indeed, those who self-identify as feminists, but whose behaviour is openly sociopathic, psychotic, insane, violent and totalitarian – they are NOT REAL FEMINISTS. But I still have my slightly puzzled question. The (majority of) feminists who are, um, not like that – where are they?

Earl's final thoughts

VFM News and Commentary · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following is from the website that was run by Earl Silverman, familyofmen.com. It is reportedly his suicide note, handwritten just prior to taking his own life. AVFM has no confirmation that this is the actual letter from Earl, but it was posted by whoever was left with administrative access.

[image]
Earl Silverman
With hopes that its authenticity will eventually be established, we hope this may provide clarity for those, like us, who are still seeking answers for this loss. It is posted as it was found, with only minor corrections for spelling.

Out of respect for Earl, I will not offer any commentary or speculation on this letter at this time. This note, if real, was for all of us to reflect upon in our own way. PE

???

These are the final words from Earl Silverman, written on 3 sheets of recycled paper in the late night hours before his body was found early in the morning of April 26th, 2013. (This text has been typed by a friend who did their best to decipher and honour punctuation.)

[box]

I am a male victim of female perpetrated domestic violence.

For the last 20+ years I attempted to find support services & make the gov. of Alberta aware of the lack of support services for men.

I failed in both goals: nothing for me and nothing for men. Alberta failed to take my submissions serious for 20+ years – the only time they took me serious was based on a rhetorical comment to [unintelligible].

Today started & continued to be a great day but that changed with [redacted]'s attempt to extort an additional $1200.00 which he knows I paid to [redacted]. Due to his greed to line his pockets I spent time away from the move. The time lost created a series of events that has caused additional stress that put me over the edge.

The last time I looked to support was with James at the Sheldon Chumir Centre: Rather than acknowledge that I suffered from PTSD due to female perpetrated domestic violence he called me Narcissistic Personality Disorder with no treatment because he does not believe that men are victims of female perpetrated domestic violence.

Blair Mason dismissed my human rights complaint on the basis of no substantiated need.

Maybe my death will create a need.

One death on the basis of preventable issue is one too many. LGBT are less of a population than victims but there is funding for research & services but not for men.

Alberta considers men less than dogs, cats & cows as demo in NOV 2012 Diverse Voices Family Violence Conference men are perpetrators & pets & livestock are [unintelligible] victims.

There are numerous storms happening in my head.

These storms are in a combined storm. I cannot think straight I cannot reason well. I cannot hold onto a thought long enough to work through it. A thought just gets picked up by the storm & swept away without being dealt with.

Lack of focus creates all sorts of problems – like not being able to hold onto a job. Thinking things through to an end result before everything gets mixed up & blow away.

I hope Hemi has a good home. He is a good cat.

I hope a review of my death creates services for men.

Men similar to me self-medicate with drugs or/and alcohol & end up destitute & homeless or they take their own life. Why do I have to go so far to get the proper services of support? I don't understand. The storm in my head is severe I can't take it any longer

[redacted] are appreciated as my lawyers

No one knew about my choice. I hid it well.

It was a good day but the storm in my head is too severe. I hope it is [unintelligible] with my efforts for personal as well as general support for male victims of female perpetrated violence

My death is due to not being taken serious on the issue lack of services. Alberta Spends $60 million for women and nothing for men. Where is the equality? Where is my dignity as a victim who could not reach the point of survivor?

I am tired & can't deal with it any more.

I appoint [redacted] and [redacted] to handle my estate and create a Family of Men educational Scholarship for male victims of female perpetrated domestic violence

I hope Allison Redford is advised of my demise and Devinder Shory.

If this is the only way to get attention of the issue – so be it. Sorry everybody for your pain – my choice nothing you could do. Only Alberta & services for men.

[/box]

#BJ4Equality

Dan Perrins · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Now that I have your attention, let me explain. Its not what it looks like.

I suspect, if some feminists read the title and little else (a distinct possibility as far as feminists go), their first reaction will be to fire-up the 'male sexual beast' rhetorical ray gun and open fire with a novella's worth of outrage accusing AVFM and the MHRM of sexually objectifying women, promoting rape culture, supporting women's oppression and being generally creepy — via two letters of the alphabet.

Hell, some will probably do it anyway, but those feminists will be wrong about the letters "B' and "J".

Feminists are also wrong in their constantly regurgitated claim that the MHRM is homophobic and racist. You are about to help me prove them wrong, again, and also to provide all the 'nice feminists' to 'sign up' or 'stfu' about men's issues.

Folks, it is time to Boycott Jamaica, and to do so for the sake of Equality. And to create an eye-catching 'hashtag' in one move '#BJ4Equality'.

Right now in Jamaica lesbian sex is legal while male homosexual sex acts can get you up to 10 years in prison at hard labor.

In other words, homosexual women are accepted as a normal part of society. Homosexual men are criminals, for just existing. This is serious stuff, laws which take away a person's liberty for 10 years under harsh conditions should never be taken lightly. And laws like that never are taken lightly, of course unless they are targeted at men only.

Jamaica's legal system is in serious need of redress. And folks, since the feminist community, you know, the one that keeps telling us to shut the fuck up because they have teh menz covered, is apparently too busy slut walking to notice this injustice, we need to take up the slack.

These particularly sexist laws are found under the Offences Against the Person Act.

Unnatural Offences

76. Whosoever shall be convicted of the abominable crime of buggery, committed either with' mankind or with any animal, shall be liable to be imprisoned &Kept to hard labour for a term not exceeding ten years.

77. Whosoever shall attempt to commit the said abominable crime, or shall be guilty of any assault with intent to commit the same, or of any indecent assault upon any male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding seven years, with or without hard labour.

Proof of Carnal Knowledge

78. Whenever upon the trial of any offence punishable under this Act, it may be necessary to prove carnal knowledge, it shall not be necessary to prove the actual emission of seed in order to constitute a carnal knowledge, but the carnal knowledge shall be deemed complete upon proof of penetration only.

Outrages on Decency

79. Any male person who, in public or private, commits, or is a party to the commission of, or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person of, any act of gross indecency with another male person, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour.

(Note: The animal portion of the law should also be changed to sex neutral, for example;

'Coercing an animal into a sexual act.')

This is discrimination on two fronts;

1) sex because the law wording is aimed at males.
2) sexual orientation because it is applies to a common homosexual male sex / activity.

This is a misandric problem that should be unacceptable to citizens throughout the world. Moral, ethical people who travel and don't believe in criminalizing sex between consenting adults should be given the opportunity to express their dissent by not traveling to Jamaica. The MHRM can help expose these sexist laws and also apply pressure to have them changed.

Jamaica is an island whose economy is heavily dependent on tourist dollars. A recent article in CaribbeanCurrent.com puts it this way;

> The economic benefits of tourism to Jamaica are unquestioned. In fact, each year the sector posts the highest levels of foreign exchange receipts (aprox. US$2B). From expensive five star hotels to the orange vendor on the street, the impact of foreign dollars exalts tourism attractions as national treasures.

Since Jamaica's economy is heavily dependent on the tourist trade there are obvious solutions. We hit their government where it hurts, at the bottom line, in the tourist trade until they repeal the laws targeting male homosexuals.

AVFM would like to ask your help in this very easy bit of activism in a few ways.

First sign and spread this petition around.

{The change.com petition is ready to go and addressed to: Clerk to the Houses Houses of Parliament Gordon House 81 Duke Street Kingston Jamaica, West Indies Tel: (876) 922-0200-7 Fax: (876) 967-0064/967-1708

Sign petition here.

Then use hashtag #BJ4Equality to spread it around.

And lastly educate yourself a little about the gay community in Jamaica and their fight to be treated as human beings by reading this article from GBMNews. Its about two current legal challenges fighting for the civil rights of gay men in Jamaica.

None of this will take very long, maybe ten minutes of your day, a small price to pay to save someone 10 years of their life.

After writing this article I have a couple of thoughts I think I'll share.

We hear constantly from feminists that 'feminism is working on men's issues', sometimes with the verbal acid of 'so stfu'. I am wondering if those very same feminists will join in this Boycott Jamaica aka #BJ4Equality or will they just remain silent about it, keep telling us they are 'friends of men', 'they're working on it' and to kindly 'stfu' while in prison for being a man.

And, a note to Jamaica:

"Don't Be That Country™"

Shame on feminism

Neil Westlake · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Shame is a double-edged lightsaber. A prominent 'counter-feminist' reminded me last week that feminists are not inured to this emotion. Yes, they feel shame; what is more, I wager that it is precisely this emotion that lubricates the mechanism of what passes for their minds. Their perpetual revolution – their unending scorched earth policy seeking the unfettered denigration of the male of the species is likely born of a compound mixture of maladaptive emotions (including shame.) You only have to peek into the personal lives of many of the second wave luminaries to grasp just how badly damaged they were.

Betty Freidan, a self-proclaimed "bad tempered bitch" who was subject to 'screaming fits of temperament,' frequently enacted acts of physical violence on her husband, Carl.

Valerie Solanas – sexual abuse survivor, paranoid schizophrenic and one time prostitute. She acted out in fits of retributive violence while still in school (whereupon she even struck a nun.) It is notable that her mental illness eventually segued into a series of attempts at murder.

Andrea Dworkin, a one time prostitute and victim of an incident of sexual molestation and repeated domestic violence, grew up in a household 'in may ways dominated by the memory of the holocaust'. She became so embittered by her life's experiences that she famously exclaimed that she wanted: "to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig."

Gloria Steinhem, while still a child, witnessed her mother descend into complete psychosis and alienation, before her parents divorced at the age of ten years old.

What we see here is a thread of trauma and pain running through the lives of each these women. Where there is dysfunction, shame is not far behind. It comes in a myriad of forms: 'I am not good enough to stop Mommy getting sick;' 'I must have been bad for him to do that to me;' 'Turning tricks is not who I really am.'

Without therapeutic intervention, the need to take another human-being as a hostage into the parentheses of our personal pain is great. Indeed, to share this pain is to feel relief from the isolation that any such trauma induces. Inevitably, this turns into a cycle of abuse; it is when 'hurt people begin hurting people' as the old maxim goes.

It is my belief that this shame is at the root of all feminism. In addition, I feel that feminism is a mechanism whereby women are able to avoid recognition of their core shame through the conduit of a diversion away from its kernel, it's real tap-root. By taking up 'women's issues,' women are not addressing their core human pain. Feminism came as a signpost that said, effectively, 'your pain is over in this corner, in this nice sunlit corner we have furnished especially for you.' However, the essential, real truth, is that true human healing comes from effectively addressing the source of suffering. In a Jungian framework, this is pain hidden in the realm of shadow.

In that Jungian sense, feminism (and feminists) have not approached the shadow archetype in any meaningful sense. It has not passed through the regions of what Saint John of the Cross called 'the dark night of the soul;' it has not resided one moment in the belly of the proverbial whale.

Aided and abetted by gender ideologues within the field of psychiatry, that were encouraged to examine false narratives that explained their trauma. Esoteric reasons were given to assuage their souls; all the while the esoteric reality of their true pain was not expunged in any meaningful way. They could increasingly blame male hegemony, the patriarchy and maintain an outward focus for their anger. By doing so, they became encumbered within a sarcophagus of retributive righteousness that seemed 'almost restorative.' As such, feminism is an ersatz healing modality; it does not address the wounds in the female psyche one iota; for if it did take women back to that authentic, crepuscular night, back to the crime scene of their individual psychical trauma, they would surely individualize and heal. By extension, they would not be calling for selective male eugenics and a reduction of the human population to that of 10%. They would not hate and despise men. No, a healthy human being is not compelled to hurt anyone or anything.

I say ‘shame on feminism’ for betraying women and turning them away from their pain, for offering them a ‘get out of jail free’ card whereby they were able to bypass the true hard work of authentic healing. I say ‘shame on you’ for holding out a promise to an entire generation of women and then reneging on that deal.

AVFM News and Activism: Free4All 4

James Huff · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we will not be have a guest, but Robert O'Hara and James Huff will be bringing you the latest news and commentary. We will be taking calls as well from those who want to air a variety of topics or discuss the news stories we will be covering.

Join us for tonight's free for all.

The call in number is 310-388-9709. Show time is at 9pm Eastern time, 6pm Pacific. Which is 2am August 14th London time.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Buying the cow & other bullshit

Mark Trueblood · 13 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When some conservative "defenders of marriage" types deign to notice that young men are souring on marriage, a very common reaction is "Why buy the cow when you can get the milk for free?" The social acceptance of premarital sex, casual sex, and cohabitation, as well as the availability of effective birth control, has certainly contributed to many people delaying marriage. But the savvy ladies and gentleman who frequent A Voice for Men know it's much more complicated than that. The "buying the cow" reaction is a yet another strong piece of evidence that conservative "defenders of marriage" aren't cut out for the job.

Women aren't cows

Men who marry aren't buying possessions. Human beings are not possessions. They are individuals capable of original thought and personal agency. Getting married does not obligate anyone to engage in sex, though one can make the case that sex should probably be part of the deal.

Some thinkers in the manosphere consider marriage to be a ritualized financial contract, wherein a woman agrees to be sexually available to a man in return for protection and provision. I somewhat see where they are coming from. But isn't it odd for the conservative "defenders of marriage" to say essentially the same thing about marriage? I suspect they are completely clueless as to what they are actually saying when they refer to "buying the cow." More on that later.

The vast majority of men do not get married for sex

They get married with the hopes of forming a lasting intimate bond with a woman, and perhaps having a family with her. Is sex a motivation? Sure, and there's nothing wrong with that. Is sex the only motivation? Hell no, and assuming that it is insults both men and women.

Sex is not readily available to all single men

Many people seem to think the life of a bachelor involves easy sexual access with multiple willing partners. This is probably an example of apex fallacy, where the most noteworthy members of a particular group are thought to be representative of the whole group. In reality, sex is not abundant for the average heterosexual bachelor, unless he visits sex workers.

Though it is not empirically proven, I believe the "80/20 rule" has some truth to it. The 80/20 rule posits that 80% of women hunting for a mate are only interested in the top 20% of men. Men who are in that top group have a lot of options. The average man does not. Average men have the choice of improving their market value, settling for less, dropping out of the mating market, or visiting sex workers. Hardly the bonanza of female affection that many seem to think goes down.

On top of that, quite a few men aren't even into casual sex. Shocking, I know! So the availability of hookups isn't a compelling reason to stay single.

"Buying the cow" reveals conservative cluelessness of the reality on the ground

As noted above, "buying the cow" portrays marriage as a ritualized exchange of sex for resources. Is it surprising that conservative "defenders of marriage" are so unconscious, they regurgitate this phrase without even thinking about its meaning? No. Not at all. For decades marriage has been rapidly disintegrating as a social institution while this crowd acted holier-than-thou and obsessed over gay marriage. The "defenders of marriage" have failed.

Men aren't refusing to "buy cows." We're refusing marriage for good reason. Will conservative "defenders of marriage" ever get it? Highly doubtful. Marriage will continue to decline, and unfortunately this will increase a whole bunch of social ills. It's only going to get worse, thou "defenders of marriage." Thanks for nothing.

Note: Not all conservative “defenders of marriage” are like that. NACDOMALT!

Email notifications and comment editing

David King · 14 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A quick update on two issues that have been bugging our loyal readership for the last week or so.

Email notifications (following this site)

Some of those readers who receive notification of new posts to AVfM via email have had their subscriptions inadvertently rerouted to a pre-deployment site called mockup.avoiceformen.com. The problem was caused by another instance of the same issue that broke comment posting about a month ago. That test site no longer exists, and the test sites that have replaced it have been treated in a way that should prevent a recurrence of the problem.

In theory, the problem has been fixed, those who got incorrectly moved over to follow the test site should now be back set to follow the main site and, to the extent that we're able to check, nobody is now following the test site. No further action need be taken by you, but if you've noticed that such emails have stopped arriving, you can check the state of your blog subscriptions at subscribe.wordpress.com.

Any problems, comment below and we'll try to get to the bottom of the problem.

Comment editing

This is a real pain for everybody and we apologise that we still have not found a permanent solution.

For those who are interested in the technical explanation: the problem is that when you log in securely, your authentication token is only available in secured requests. Editing is something that normally requires administrative privileges, therefore the authentication token has to be available for it to work.

We're in touch with the edit plugin's author and, having identified the problem, we hope a fix will soon be forthcoming. In the meantime, there is a fairly simple work-around that at least will allow you to edit your comments as desired: reload the page over secure HTTP. Here's how to do that.

[image]

1. The first of these screen shots is what you will normally see when browsing AVfM.
2. Click in the location bar and insert (or otherwise edit) https:// in front of the www.
3. In Firefox, at least, this will probably bring up a URL from your history, most likely the page that you are currently on (ie, the non-secured version). Tap the left or right key to dismiss history.
4. When you press Enter, the page will reload (showing https:// in the location bar). Find and edit your comment.

A shortcut for Firefox users: to quickly find stuff in a page, tap the / key (forward slash), and begin typing what you're looking for (eg your name). Press Ctrl-G (PC, at least) to find the next instance of it.

Caveat: For reasons that I've not (yet) investigated, when reading the secured version of an article, the comment voting system appears not to work. Doing the reverse of the above will fix that.

Again, any problems with this, raise them in the comments section below.

If this all seems too much hassle, remember, the bug has been identified and a fix is forthcoming. We feel that secure logins to the site are very important to our future as the movement grows and attacks on us all increase. The plugin developer is on it and we'll do whatever it takes to see a real fix put in place. And, again, if your email notifications have not restored themselves, just resubscribe to AVfM next time you post a comment.

Italian gynocentric dictatorship doesn't stop

Lucian Vâlsan · 14 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Do you plan to visit Italy? Be aware that since August 8, 2013, any man in Italy can be jailed, without preliminary due process, if an anonymous allegation of violence is filed against him[1].

This was decided in one night, behind closed doors, while most Italians are on vacation. This nonsense was passed without any approval or discussion in the Parliament, in the good old "bi-partisan" style with the two parties that are in power in Italy – Partito Democratico ("PD", the Democratic Party), with many avowed communists and Popolo della Libertà ("PdL", the People of Freedom) with several avowed national-socialists of feminist orientation (such as Alessandra Mussolini[2]).

Feminists have a strong lobby influencing these kinds of politicians, who usually speak kindly when it comes to presumption of innocence and due process rights, but only when it's necessary for themselves.

But since in this case it's not their necks on the line, they decided that real criminals presently in jail will get a discount of 3 years (this will save the embattled Mr. Berlusconi, albeit to be fair, the discount for offenders with prison sentences smaller than 3 years applies to almost everyone), and that innocent men can instead go to jail according to their new "femicide" law.

So, basically, under this "femicide" law, Italy comes one step closer to being a de facto feminist dictatorship considering that the law has provisions like:

- illegal immigrants will get a residence permit if they make allegations of violence
- the State will pay for a lawyer for anybody who makes allegations of violence. (Such lawyers are usually feminists and the police already recognize that 80% of such allegations are false).
- women will no longer have the right to stop cases created through their own allegations. (This secures the economical gain of feminist lawyers for about 10 years, given that the Italian judiciary system is so slow).
- such allegations will have a "preferential path in courts" and the person who makes allegations will be "protected". Thus lawyers can be denied of the right to normally interrogate the accuser to establish the truth. In particular, the allegation can be anonymous.
- As immediate action, men can be thrown away from their homes if there is "a risk of danger" for a woman. In other words, men will go to jail before a trial even gets to take place.

These are the first goodies of the Istanbul Convention[4] and they go even beyond the US "Violence Against Women Act" (VAWA) law. In line with the principles of this law, an Italian feminist lawyer can falsely accuse a man and get funds from the state to hound him for 10 years. The official position of the association of lawyers is[5]:

> this pushes back the country compared to elementary standards of legal culture that we thought ensured. Such laws overturn the constitutional principle of presumption of innocence, in a matter, that of family relationships, which lends itself to instrumental accusations that will lead people directly to jail without any preliminary filter: a worrying scenario that satisfies the instances of fanatics of hanging

The most worrying part is that not only this law provides incentives for illegal female immigrants to throw innocent men in jail, but it also allows the State to imprison innocent men just because a feminist lawyer wants that and the woman under whose name this whole thing is being made will have no say in the matter. And this comes after the Italian State already took the right to take the kids away from the father regardless of what the mother of the kids has to say about it.

The Italian State is in an open war with the Italian men[6] and this piece of legislation only serves as yet another nail in the coffin of a nation that used to be a proud and free one.

Italy may be the first European nation to make these kinds of practices legal, but it's not the first European nation that engages in these kinds of malicious practices. In the United Kingdom, Keith Vaz, the chairman of the Commons Home Affairs Committee, is urging the government to probe hundreds of bogus migrant brides crying rape in order to get a UK visa[7]. Similar practices were encouraged during the Spanish Gender Stalinist regime of the "Ley Contra la Violencia de Género" (the Gender Violence Act)[8], and Sweden is not that far off either.

At this point, there is a serious competition as to what will ultimately bring the demise of Europe: the economics, the European Union or the feminist tyranny. And since the economics are addressed through the tyrannical feminist European Union, we can expect at a very sad series of events to occur in the next years in Europe.

Special thanks go to one of the Italian correspondents of the European News department – Pasquale Binelli.
Sources:

[1] http://www.ilfattoquotidiano.it/2013/08/09/decreto-contro-violenza-di-genere-ecco-punti-principali-e-criticita/680998/ (in Italian)
[2] http://www.avoiceformen.com/updates/feminism-has-a-mussolini-flavor

[3] http://www.repubblica.it/politica/2013/06/24/news/josefa_idem_si_dimessa-61777727/ (in Italian)
[4] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/the-great-danger-of-the-istambul-convention/

[5] http://www.liberoquotidiano.it/news/italia/1292912/-Demagogica-e-inquietante—i-penalisti-bocciano-la-legge-sul-femminicidio.html (in Italian)

[6] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/italy-declares-war-against-italian-men/

[7] http://www.express.co.uk/news/uk/421170/EXCLUSIVE-Government-urged-to-probe-bogus-migrant-brides-crying-rape-just-to-get-UK-visas
[8] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/spanish-gender-stalinism-part-i/

Shame, what is it good for?

John Hembling (JtO) · 14 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Shame, it's the most common and most powerful weapon of control and coercion used against men in a culture driven by archaic traditions, as well as the modern mirror, gender ideology.

It was used successfully to coerce men of urban 1914 England to die and to kill in the frozen, bloody trenches of the first world war. Women handed out white feathers to men who were not in uniform; a public humiliation proving you were not a real man unless you enlisted and put your survival and well being a very distant second, after the interests of your community and king.

That's how powerful shame is. Men chose to die, and suffer by the millions, rather than endure it.

It's used successfully today to coerce men by women handing them an updated white feather. The white ribbon campaign: prodding men, with shame, to admit they belong to a class of abusers, rapists, predators and subhumans, and to wear that admission as a pledge to be something better than they are without it.

So, what else is shame good for? When men find themselves experiencing failure or suffering, shame keeps them from seeking help. In fact, shame is used to justify preventing them from demanding the help afforded to anyone else in pain.

As the problem solvers of the human race, shame helps men who have fallen on hard times to man up, swallow their pain and just kill themselves. Four out of five suicides in Canada are men.

Shame is useful as a weapon to force compliance and silence. What is a real man? It's a man who does what his social betters require of him. He does what he's supposed to — to hell with his own needs. Pain? Real men don't feel it. Grief? REAL Men don't feel it, or any other emotion that does not serve the fancy of others. And, of course, after they've died by their own hands, nobody needs to regard them as humans. Defective appliances don't merit any sympathy. Take that broken equipment to the curb for pick-up.

Almost all men have an innate sense of justice. However, by application of shame, this can be completely suppressed and silenced. They endure violence, censorship, intimidation, and harassment in the name of social-justice. Social-justice — which should not be confused with actual justice.

Shame, and the pressure to conform is also a great tool to retard progress toward a more humane and compassionate society. Real men, subject to coercion through shame, are pushed to deny their own humanity, their own need for humaneness and compassion, thus stalling society from dispensing those things to half the human beings that need them.

> "I believe that women have a capacity for understanding and compassion which man structurally does not have, does not have it because he cannot have it. He's just incapable of it."

The quote is from former US Senator Barbara Jordan. She should have looked into a mirror. But what about men who prove Jordan's statement and the ideology behind it are nothing except evil lies? Men who demonstrate great compassion and empathy, for themselves or their fellow men have their manhood called into question. They're rewarded for their courage to feel with loss of their status as men. They are shamed. Thus, for men who have not yet identified their capacity for shame as a maladaptive product of a feminized culture, shame serves very well to stifle and suppress that which might make them great, The qualities of justice and compassion, two fundamental elements of their identity, are corrupted and usurped for the use of others, specifically women.

How about affection, attraction, desire and love? How about expressing any of these basic human emotions without the permission of whoever might be the object of those feelings? How about the expression of those things without the permission of the consensus arbiters of public identity?

Attraction? Desire? If expressed without a permission which must ultimately be guessed at, a man is a creep. Shame, in this case, is the weapon to extinguish what some writers through history have called the noblest of human impulses. Love. Of course shame is the weapon to extinguish affection, attraction, desire, love, and trust as well.

Of course, all this assumes that a man subjected to control and coercion of purposefully applied shame has not made a choice to abandon it, to just dump it. Obviously, this is not something done trivially or easily, but self ownership includes ownership of your own emotions.

Is there an argument buried in the previous statement for men having no emotions? Is there a whiff of that old, toxic idea that men have none, or that they possess the emotional inner lives of a class of stunted, regressive, domineering and woman-oppressing subhumans? Sure, even a half-arsed attempt at spin could present such an argument. In fact, wrapped up within such an opinion is the same old weapon used to silence, to marginalize and dismiss men who do what we all keep hearing that real men shouldn't do; namely, to express desire, experience grief, or give voice to love of their fellows with the very foolish hope that it be reciprocated.

However, informed self-ownership within a gender ideological culture inevitably includes the recognition that shame, kept within a man's emotional repertoire, is dysfunctional. Conforming to the group was a good survival strategy in the resource-scarce hunter gatherer communities of our ancient ancestors, and shame is one of the tools of enforced conformity. However, in a modern setting in which the ideology of the group is often irrational, shame remains the go-to tactic of coercing conformity for the benefit of parasites.

Shame on you for recognizing your own humanity. Shame on you for not putting yourself in harm's way for the convenience of others. Shame on you for attempting to help anyone other than members the leisure caste. Shame on you for exercising moral discrimination which does not conform to the convenience of privileged children. Shame on you for not submitting to your allotted role of disposable appliance. Shame on you for rejecting violence against your person. Shame on you for refusing to dispense violence for the convenience of your social superiors. Shame on you for daring to think you are not guilty, simply by virtue of your biology. Shame on you for not agreeing you are sexual predator. Shame on you for having emotions, almost as if you thought you were a human being. You're not, you are a wooden robot, and if you've been damaged beyond your continued utility, we'll use you for firewood. So man up, and get back onto the goddamn treadmill of protect, provide, serve, die, and kill when it is convenient for others.

Shame and it's continued place within a man's emotional repertoire, when recognized as maladaptive, can be discarded.

And once discarded, what can a man do without it? How about exercise personal judgement and discrimination, and act on that judgement. Without shame, there is no reason to quietly accept bigotry practiced by a majority in public. There is no reason to accept the idea that sexually mutilating infants is anything except monstrous, even when that mutilation is widely accepted as normal. There is no reason to excuse violent crime even if it is committed by members of our culture's leisure caste.

An inclusive list of what is possible without the encumbrance of shame could fill pages. But such an attempt is unnecessary.

There ceases to be any reason, when shame is gone, to fail to recognize violence for what it is, even if practiced by the superficially pretty. There is no reason, without shame not to express affection, desire or love. And when the weapon of shame is predictably used in an effort to silence that expression, there remains no reason to not respond to such aggression with sharp and condemning rebuke.

For men it is time to abandon shame. It is long past time to become completely shameless.

JudgyBitch's advice for feminist men

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 14 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Our friend Hugo Schwyzer has ignited quite the little debate with his departure from internet feminism, and the mantle of Numero Uno Male Feminist is now up for grabs! Surely there are some ambitious lads here who might want to take a shot at the Crown?

Meghan Murphy at xoJane has laid out for you just how to go about it. Ready?

Feminism is for everyone, but why does it seem as though those who insist they are "good guys" or self-identify as feminist grate on me?

First up, you need to understand that no matter what you do, you are going to irritate the shit out of all the ladies who call themselves feminists. You will grate. Once you understand that little chestnut, you will be much more likely to succeed as a Male Feminist.

Repeat after me: No matter what you do, you are wrong. And irritating.

Meghan: It's not that I don't think men can be feminist. I know many men who clearly align themselves with the feminist movement. The problem seems to be with men who self-identify as "feminist" as a means of gaining credibility or avoiding accountability. The problem is that many men who claim to be "good men" or to respect women, don't actually… well… respect women.

You hear that? It's not enough to just claim the word. You are going to need to be credible and accountable. Those are important virtues to feminists.

Credible.
Accountable.

We'll keep that in mind.

Meghan: After his video "Blurred Lines," was called misogynist and "rapey," Robin Thicke responded by arguing that OH BUT it's ok for him to objectify women because he respects them so much! "We're the perfect guys to make fun of this," Thicke said. Because HAHA you guys! Isn't misogyny hilarious?

"Blurred Lines" was called misogynist and rapey by whom, Meghan? Oh, some whiny feminists, who don't like the line "I know you want it".

Okay, let's put our credibility on the line and look at the lyrics, and not just one line.

> And that's why I'm gon' take a good girl
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> You're a good girl
> Can't let it get past me
> You're far from plastic
> Talk about getting blasted
> I hate these blurred lines
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> I know you want it
> But you're a good girl
> The way you grab me

> Must wanna get nasty
> Go ahead, get at me

Hmmm. She's not plastic. A good girl acting bad. What is Robin to do? Ooh, then SHE grabs HIM. My, my, my. She wants to get nasty, apparently. Now what does Robin do?

He invites her to make the next move. Go ahead, get at me.

Yep, pretty rapey.

Credibility score: 0

"When we made the song, we had nothing but the most respect for women," he said on The Today Show. He even went so far as to say the song is a "feminist movement in itself."

Well, as long as if by feminist you mean that women have the right to grab men on the dance floor, I guess it IS a feminist song. I wonder what the response would be if it were Robin grabbing the women? Isn't that technically assault?

Former New York Governor Eliot Spitzer was forced to resign after it was revealed that he'd been buying sex from prostitutes. Yet he insists he's actually a feminist.

Let's see. Spitzer believes that women have the right to control their own sexuality, the right to determine how their bodies will be used, the right to attach commercial value to themselves, and he paid women fair market value for their services.

The misogynist.

Prostitution is incompatible with feminism because women CANNOT possibly understand the implications of attaching commercial value to their bodies. Unless they are soccer players. Or models. Or anything other than prostitutes. Silly women. It's only your body and your choice when it comes to killing babies.

Accountability score: 0

Meghan: The deal is, apparently, that you can behave however you like so long as you plead feminism. "But you abuse women, sir…" "Impossible! I love women!" I've heard it time and time again in my own life. Men believe they love women and that that simple belief or declaration erases their sexist behaviour.

I can only assume Meghan is referring to her previous paragraphs as examples of abuse and or/sexist behavior? Not quite certain, but let's go with that. Letting sexually aggressive women decide how far they would like to take their actions and allowing women to determine how they will use their bodies is abusing women/behaving in a sexist manner.

Gotcha.

Credibility: still 0

Meghan: Walter Madison, lawyer for the young men convicted in the Steubenville rape trial, painted the victim as "a party girl" and essentially accused her of being "embarrassed;" choosing to claim rape in order to avoid being labeled a "slut." Despite his victim-blamey arguments, he told Ariel Levy that he considers himself "very much a feminist."

A lawyer suggests that a young woman might try to avoid being held accountable for her behavior by casting the blame on the men. I wonder if the "victim" would have liked Robin's song? Something tells me yes.

Proposing that perhaps women are in some teeny, tiny way responsible for their own actions is clearly sexist.

Accountability: still 0

Meghan: And then, of course, there's Hugo Schwyzer, who recently left the internet due to not only personal struggles but, according to an interview in New York magazine, because of vitriol from the feminist internet.

Schwyzer is clearly struggling with some very serious mental health issues and has a lot of personal work to do away from the feminist internet. But you'd think a self-described male feminist would know better than to blame "women's anger" for his troubles. "Men are afraid of women's anger," he said. Hmm mmm. Women and their scary, scary feelings and opinions. Note all the men of the world cowering in the corner because women gasp feel angry. Man, I wish that worked.

Pay attention here, men. Women's anger is equivalent to feelings and opinions. When you hear "I feel" or "I think", and it is coming from the mouth of a woman, you can take that to mean "I'm angry". That's a key element of how to communicate with feminists.

Assume they are all angry bitches. Meghan says they are!

And keep in mind that she would really love it if men would cower in the corner when faced with women's anger. She wishes that would happen.

You can make it happen! But be aware, that won't make her any happier. She will still be angry.

Now, no fistfights over who gets to take on this job.

Meghan: The interviewer said: "One reason you became a punching bag is that there just are not many men writing feminist columns online," prompting Schwyzer to complain: "If you look at the men who are writing about feminism, they toe the line very carefully. It's almost like they take their cues from the women around them."

Toe the line – carefully! Take your cues from women. And only women.

Meghan: Well yes. That's the idea. While feminism is a movement that can include and benefit men and women alike, at the end of the day it's also a movement to end patriarchy and has always been led by women. To say that "It's very hard for men to stand up to women's anger" is to imply that, somehow, white men in feminist spaces are being persecuted or silenced.

Your persecution complex will have to go, gents. It's true that feminists want you to cower in the corner, toe that line carefully and prepare to be led by and take your cues from angry women, but there is NO PERSECUTION INVOLVED IN THAT.

Just shut up already.

Credibility? Crap. Still 0.

Meghan: Women have long been silenced by being told they are hysterical or aggressive or out of control or "too angry" when they stand up for themselves or speak out. To call in such a sexist stereotype in order to gain sympathy displays the same kind of entitlement expressed by all these baffled men who say "But, but… I RESPECT WOMEN" when called out on their anti-feminist behaviour.

Wait. I'm confused. Meghan just SAID that when feminists think or feel, it's the same as anger. But no calling them angry! And no being baffled!

Meghan: "I'm a feminist," when coming from a man, always feels to me like demanding a pat on the head. "I love my mother," they say, puffing out their chests, as though it excuses their visit to the strip club the previous night.

What the hell does loving your mother have to do with making sure strippers can put food on the table? I'm not sure, but I think you either have to hate your mother or let those bitches dancing in clubs starve.

Accountability? Hovering right at 0.

Meghan: An evil man I was in a relationship with once told me I was being "cunty." I looked at him with shock and disgust. "You realize it's not ok to call women 'cunts' or 'bitches' or 'sluts' or any of those other gendered words used to degrade women, right?" I responded. "Oh, well some women I know say it and they think it's fine," he mansplained. "It isn't. Especially when it's coming from a man. Especially when you're saying it as an insult," I said. (As though being called "cunty" could be anything but insulting). CONTEXT PLEASE. This man insisted he was both progressive and feminist. He, therefore, was free to use sexist language against women. It wasn't sexist when he said it!

It's perfectly acceptable to call men evil, and you should probably prepare to have that accusation lobbed at you, kind sir applying as Male Feminist, but do NOT refer to any woman as "cunt", "bitch" or "slut".

Even if the woman really IS "cunty". Which Meghan definitely IS.

Meghan: "Oh do I seem mad? Too bad. You still can't call me 'cunty'"

The point here is that women, and only women will define what terms are and are NOT acceptable and you will toe the fucking line, you evil creep!

Meghan: Similarly, Thicke tries to pin his creepshow video on women. Supposedly he preferred the clothed version of the video, but then said: "I showed it to my wife and all of her friends and everyone's immediate response seemed to be 'This is amazing. You have to put this out.'"

That's like saying: "But that feminist just called herself a slut! Therefore, it's ok for me to call my girlfriend a slut." Or, like: "But all those women are posting porny photos on Instagram! So it's ok for me to creep their accounts." Nope! Or, I suppose you can but don't do it while simultaneously pretending to be feminist. Pro tip: We can all see when you "like" those #sxy #babe #hot #girls #asss shots on Instagram and we are all judging you.

Women: yes, you CAN post porny ass shots on Instagram. You may NOT sell that ass for actual cash (see above) and you may not shake that ass on a stage (see above). You may call yourself a "slut" or any other word you prefer.

Men: you will not look at Instagram or use the same language as women.

Didn't we just cover this?

WOMEN DEFINE THE TERMS OF DEBATE, TOE THE LINE, FUCKER!

Meghan: "I don't want to be sleazy, I'm a gentleman," Robin Thicke insisted on BBC's Radio 1. Well, too bad bud. If you don't want to be "sleazy" then don't make a video that's essentially a celebration of male power and rape culture.

Oh, oops. My bad. I thought feminists just defined the actual language as acceptable or not. Turns out they will also be in charge of policing music and videos, too.

This is looking like a lot of fun!

Meghan: Men who insist they are the "good guys" without actually changing their behavior or interrogating their beliefs about women and what gender equality really means do more harm than good. It's manipulative more than supportive. It's silencing. And if you're silencing feminists or objectifying women while claiming to respect us, you're doing it wrong.

I think it will take duct tape and possibly several tubes of crazy glue and probably some well-placed sutures to silence Meghan, but that doesn't mean you can't at least TRY, guys. You will NOT be considered a "good guy" until you have ceded all language and music to feminist determination, until you pick up that line and toe it, subject yourself to interrogation about gender and equality, and while you're at it, would you mind cowering in the corner?

Thanks ever so much.

Credibility: I think we're gonna have go with negative integers at this point. -1

Meghan: Men need to do much more than call themselves "feminist" in order to be allies, which is why, generally, when men claim the label "feminist" I feel more irritated than elated.

Yes, honey, we know. You're angry and irritated all the time.

Meghan: I want men in this movement and there are men in this movement. But the men who I see doing the work and changing their own behavior both in their personal and public lives to support women aren't going around advertising their feminist status and demanding we all recognize. They're just doing it.

So, addendum to toe the line: TOE THE LINE SILENTLY

And don't silence anyone else with your silency silence.

Credibility just took a severe nosedive. -20

Meghan: So you want to be one of the good guys. You want to join team feminism. You want to respect women and be an ally. Awesome. Now stop telling everybody how much of a feminist you are and start acting like one.

I'll recap what that requires just in case you got lost:

1. You are grating
2. You are irritating
3. You must be credible
4. You must be accountable
5. Women are allowed to grab you
6. You are a rapey rapist under all conditions
7. Women are not accountable for their behavior and you will not expect them to be
8. When feminists think or feel, it means they are angry. Deal with it.
9. You will cower in the corner
10. You will toe the line
11. Carefully!
12. You will be led by women
13. You will take your cues from women
14. You will accept persecution without any stupid complex
15. You will not call women angry
16. You will not be baffled
17. No baffling!
18. If you love your mother, you can't help strippers feed their kids
19. If you hate your mother, go ahead
20. You are evil and creepy
21. You will not use language that has not been approved by feminists
22. You will not look at asses on Instagram. Twitter might be okay. I'll have to get back to you.
23. You will be interrogated
24. You will shut up

All righty then! Taking applications for Male Feminist in three – two – one ……..

Guys? Hey guys? Where did you go?

Oh right. You're cowering in the corner, holding fast to your line, and being silent. Awwww. Good dog! Here's a cookie.

See? Sometimes, feminists LOVE cookies!

And obviously, they love men.

Me too!

Lots of love,

JB

Editor's note: this post was originally published on JudgyBitch.com here.

The Voice of Europe: Internet anonymity

Lucian Vâlsan · 15 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On August 16, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista, the special guest and whoever shall call in will be talking about the issue of anonymity online and how you can secure your privacy and why you should care.

We will talk about the little things one should do in order to maintain anonymity and avoid the ever increasing surveillance mechanisms that the State is trying to put in place in Europe and elsewhere on the Internet.

Some avoid taking minimal steps in this direction out of fear that the technical steps are too complicated, others simply don't know that it can be done whilst some don't do it because it's not convenient. We will address all these reasons and others and provide deep insight on the topic.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the interview. Our guest will take questions and this is a unique opportunity to talk to an expert on these issues.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

For the listeners in Australia, this means August 10, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST.

SHOW PAGE

Debut of Honey Badger Radio: Cathy Young

James Huff · 15 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

"Why can't we all get along?" is the war cry of the immoderate moderate. You know the one, she tries to sell a softened extremism and chastises us for not adopting it.

She's existed throughout the ages. Always trying to keep the peace by selling out someone's civil rights and saying, "Wow, how ungrateful, how rude, how outrageous" when they catch on to the immoderate moderate's schtick.

"Don't they understand that they have to behave themselves before they get to speak?"

The immoderate moderate loves the idea of "behaving yourself". Who decides what "behaving yourself" entails? They do, of course.

What gave them the privileged position of deciding acceptable discourse? Well… the very control the oppressed group is fighting to end.

Which is why the immoderate moderate isn't a moderate at all. They're extremists with an agenda to silence.

Join us tonight for the debut of Honey Badger Radio and our discussion of the immoderate moderate.

Showtime is at 8pm Central Time.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Hugo, we hardly knew ye

August Løvenskiolds · 15 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

They're rolling out the guns again, hurroo, hurroo
They're rolling out the guns again, hurroo, hurroo
They're rolling out the guns again,
But they never will take our sons again
No, they never will take our sons again
Hugo, I'm swearing to ye

The mournful ode, about a limbless, broken soldier returning home to a shattered wife, and sung to the same melody as the American Civil War song "When Johnny Comes Marching Home", seems like a fitting coda to the career of the iconic, ironic male feminist, mental patient and porn Professor Hugo Schwyzer.

The manic self-expulsion of Mr. Schwyzer from the femme-o-sphere triggered nuclear levels of rage, shame and destruction to the people and edifices of that already blighted, benighted realm. As Mr. Schwyzer's painful tweets spiraled out, Jill Filipovictim, the hoary proprietrix of Feministe, made a critical mistake: she tried to silence Mr. Schwyzer (in full accord with standard feminist supremacist practice), but she did so in such a way that her act of dominance was misinterpreted by the uncharitable to seem like she might possibly have some genuine human compassion for a feminist man.

Specifically, Filipovictim tweeted:
[box]
Jill Filipovic@JillFilipovic 9 Aug

@hugoschwyzer @jessicavalenti Hugo, if this is really you and not a hack, please, close your laptop and call your therapist. Please.
[/box]

Oh, no, you didn't! This huge breach of feminist etiquette, saying "please" to a man, twice in one tweet, touched off a huge negative reaction among the so-called "WOC" ("Women of Color") who forever haunt the fringes of the white-feminist-industrial-complex.

Blogger Mikki Kendall was credited by the Washington Post as being the first to attempt to co-opt the victim narrative by shaming Filipovictim for appearing to have compassion for a man instead of WOC feminists. Other feminists joined the scrum, and the hashtag #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen was created to whip privileged white pudenda to the back of the bus.

In a video for Huffpost, Kendall makes no secret of her hatred for white feminists of both genders: http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/08/13/solidarityisforwhitewomen-creator-mikki-kendal-women-of-color-feminism-_n_3749589.html

The tartly named Red Light Politics tumblr made the seemingly non-germane case for the furor over a kindness being a race thing: This IS about race when the white editors that published him either did not bother to do basic background research to see how he had systematically picked on non white women or, if they did the background research they decided that these women were disposable and a fair price to pay in exchange of the click bait and page views he brought.

Filipovictim, caught with her privileged, shit-stained thong around her cankles, gleefully admitted her compassionate error: Understandably, that was taken as my showing concern for Hugo when, for the past year and a half, I had been silent about him even as many women repeatedly expressed their need for feminists to collectively stand up and push back against him.

Arch your back, Jill.

Hugo, of course, was so appalled that the victim narrative he had so carefully cultivated was snatched away from him that he sought out the man-o-sphere blog GLPiggy.NET to reveal that he was the only male feminist to use Game (a form of pickup artistry) to seduce feminists:

> He said that other male feminists merely took all their cues from women. “They weren’t doing anything, they were too chickenshit.” They only talked about violence against women, he said. Hugo tended to focus on female sexual empowerment or on belittling men. The latter worked and was vetted by prominent outlets, and that’s one part of the story here. The prominent male feminists “weren’t edgy; they weren’t sexy” he said. And then the bombshell for me: “It’s about having Game.” “I took Game to the feminist world,” he said at one point. Hugo said he made fun of Game as presented in the “Manosphere” because he was a natural at it.

So, Hugo is now spinning himself as some sort of Agent Creamsicle, penetrating deep into the monologues of feminism to foment a civil racial jello (jelly) fight.

He did this by turning the privilege narrative against itself, and the white feminists are livid that our Agent Creamsicle has undone their hegemony over the perpetual victim status that lines their purses and pads their backfat at the expense of the race-based civil rights movement that was overwhelmed in the feminist quest for Plan B, mani-pedi’s and abortions.

SHHHH! Don’t tell the feminists about our evil plans to insert more male feminists into their ranks, because our undercover operatives at FreeThoughtBlogs are beginning their stealth campaign to undermine the credibility of false rape claims. Fortunately, other prominent man-sites are providing cover stories that we all hate Hugo and all those like him, too.

But if you are reading this, feminists, just remember: just because you regret going to bed with Hugo Schwyzer doesn’t mean it wasn’t consensual. You’re the ones who spread your page views open wide for his two-fingered click bait. And, since you’re already up, could you score us another bag of popcorn, please?

The Patriarchy™ and Marble Cake

Jason Gregory · 15 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I admit it. I have a guilty pleasure—feminist-philosophers. No, feminist-philosophers are not necessarily oxymoronic, though some of them are morons. Take, for example, Iris M. Young.

Young studied philosophy and earned a doctorate in philosophy from Pennsylvania State University. She became a professor of political science and was well known for her work in "theories of justice, democratic theory and feminist theory." Sadly, Young lost a battle with cancer in 2006 and the world was deprived of "one of the most important feminist thinkers in the world…one of the most important political philosophers of the past quarter century."

While researching this much respected philosopher, I discovered one of her papers, "Humanism, Gynocentrism, and Feminist Politics." It is a brilliant and fascinating paper. It is a must read for anybody interested in The Patriarchy™, gender politics, and philosophy.

In this paper, Young presents two remarkably different versions of feminism—humanist-feminism and gynocentric-feminism. Young admits that these two types of feminisms are often contrary to and sometimes contradictory with each other. She also admits that both feminisms share the common narrative thread of male-as-antagonist. The overarching antagonist to both narratives is the male dominated culture that oppresses women—The Patriarchy™.

This antagonist represents weak and lazy writing. It's a tired, uninspiring, and one-dimensional villain. This antagonist no longer has a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes poetic faith. The Patriarchy™ is the Snidely Whiplash of feminist narratives—a cartoonish caricature of evil, the archenemy of all women, humanity, and civilization. It is not an artifact of "poetic faith."

As such, The Patriarchy™ is not a real thing. It is only an imagined thing—a fetishized object of imagination that exists in the minds of feminists and other morons. It exists to perpetuate a shallow and one-dimensional narrative that presents women as objects-of-victimization. It is the sort of thing that feminists love to hate. It is loved because it can be blamed for everything. It is hated because it is the villain. Without The Patriarchy™, there would be no feminist narratives. Without Snidely Whiplash, there would be no Dudley Do-Right. The Patriarchy™ is one half of a shallow and one-dimensional dichotomy of good vs. evil that exists in feminist narratives. It's not any real thing of lived-experience. It is only an imaginary thing of imagined-experience.

To better understand this shallow dichotomy and the silliness of feminist narratives, let's look at two of the most significant and influential feminist narratives as presented by Iris M. Young. Both narratives present women as victims of The Patriarchy™. Both narratives present The Patriarchy™ as an antagonist, a villain like Snidely Whiplash who twiddles his moustache and has no human depth beyond a sadistic lust for the devaluing and disempowerment of women.

Humanist-feminism

Humanist-feminism, according to Young, is best described in the works of Simone de Beauvoir. At its core is a revolt against being imprisoned in femininity. For them The Patriarchy™ "has ascribed to women a distinct feminine nature by which it has justified the exclusion of women from most of the important and creative activity of society—science, politics, invention, industry, commerce, the arts." By rejecting such femininity, humanist-feminism delivered a revolt against The Patriarchy™ itself.

What makes this Beauvoirian revolt so fascinating is the fact that it is founded theoretically on the philosophical distinction between immanence and transcendence. Immanence roughly designates being an object. Transcendence roughly designates being a free-subject that defines its own nature and "makes projects that bring new entities into the world."

It is argued by humanist-feminists that The Patriarchy™ does not allow women to become such transcendent and free-subjects. Instead, women are relegated to being objects of domestic and sexual service to men and for the benefit of men. As such, the full humanity of women is restricted by The Patriarchy™. This is, according to humanist-feminists, a brutalization of the personhood of half the human race for benefit to the other half. The Patriarchy™ mutilates and deforms women into objects—the non-human Other. Young writes that this "distinction between transcendence and immanence ensnares Beauvoir in the very definition of woman as a non-human Other…"

By defining humanity as transcendence, as a free-subjectivity above mere life and the processes of nature that repeat in endless cycles, women can only exist as victims—"maimed, mutilated, dependent, confined to a life of immanence and forced to be an object." In short, humanity transcends, but women are imprisoned to a life of immanence. Humanist-feminism was a revolt against this sort of immanence, reproductive biology, domestic concerns, and motherhood—the things Beauvoir found most oppressive to women.

As such, Beauvoirians devalue women…just like The Patriarchy™ devalues women. The humanist-feminist revolt against The Patriarchy™ is patriarchal. As such, humanist-feminism is The Patriarchy™. They smash The Patriarchy™ by being it.

Gynocentric-feminism

According to Young, "gynocentric feminism defines the oppression of women very differently from humanist feminism. Women's oppression consists not of being prevented from participating in full humanity, but of the denial and devaluation of specifically feminine virtues and activities by an overly instrumentalized and authoritarian masculinist culture." Gynocentric-feminism is not a revolt against femininity. It is a revolt against the devaluation of femininity. It is a revolt against The Patriarchy™ by embracing what The Patriarchy™ always "ascribed" to women. As such, gynocentric-feminism is The Patriarchy™.

For gynocentric-feminists, femininity is "not the problem, not the source of women's oppression, but indeed within traditional femininity lie the values that we should promote for a better society. Women's oppression consists of the devaluation and repression of women's nature and female activity by the patriarchal culture." Again, The Patriarchy™ is still to blame because it "threaten[s] the survival of the planet and the human race. [Patriarchal] values exalt death, violence, competition, selfishness, a repression of the body, sexuality, and affectivity."

According to Young, The Patriarchy™ produces "phallogocentric categorization," a moral rationality and language of sharp distinctions, of abstract rights and justice. However, the feminine is supposed to produce loose categories, a flowing of language that envelops and folds in on itself, reflects itself in a continuous and particularistic ethics of care—a continuous flowing of garbled gibberish. The feminine virtue is supposed to place the particular over the abstract and universal, all the while denying the "nature/culture dichotomy held by humanists… [asserting] the connection of women and nature," rooting the feminine in the body-experience, rather than in some sort of abstract transcendence.

Gynocentric-feminism places a high value on the woman's reproductive processes. It is supposed that these processes give women a "living continuity with their offspring that it does not give men. Women thus have a temporal consciousness that is continuous, whereas male temporal consciousness is discontinuous." As such, males are said to be more alienated from their children, but more connected to their work and other endeavors of artifact creation. In this way, being woman is not being an object. Bringing forth life into this world is one of the most important endeavors-of-creation…and only women can do that.

Gynocentric-feminism inverts humanist-feminism—completely upending prior notions of women's oppression. Yet, smashing The Patriarchy™ remains a goal of gynocentric-feminism. They smash The Patriarchy™ by embracing it.

Implications

Where humanist-feminism destroyed the value of the feminine, gynocentric-feminism restores it. There is dignity for women within their bodies and within their uniquely female body-experiences. Gynocentric-feminism shows that this connection with the body produces uniquely feminine virtues, language, and experiences of which men are not privy. In fact, men are not privileged at all in this way. Men are alienated from these experiences, from a "living continuity" with their children, and relegated to such experiences by proxy—through intellectual creations, hierarchal competition, and through functioning as an object-of-utility for a woman, for women, and for society-in-general.

This reality requires a reassessment of what male privilege means. Young writes, "If we claim that masculinity distorts men more than it contributes to their self-development and capacities, again, the claim that women are the victims of injustice loses considerable force." She eventually questions, "what warrants the claim that women need liberating…of what does male privilege consist?" She has difficulty swallowing that bitter red pill. She has difficulty being straight and saying that we've been wrong about The Patriarchy™ and male privilege.

Although, she never disavows patriarchy theory, she does put forth a clever analogy as a way to try and change the subject, to escape responsibility, yet still fetishize and blame The Patriarchy™. In regards to gender, Young states that "we need a conception of difference that is less like the icing bordering the layers of cake and more like a marble cake, in which the flavors remain recognizably different but thoroughly insinuated in one another. [And this]… social change requires changing the subject, which in turn means developing new ways of speaking, writing, and imagining."

Translation

Young wants her cake and eat it too. She wants to change the subject and direct attention away from the wrongheaded notions about male privilege and female oppression. She wants to create a narrative in which female oppression and privilege simultaneously exist in one swirl of garbled gibberish—a marble cake. She does not come forward to clearly say, "Oops, we were wrong about male privilege and The Patriarchy™." She does not apologize for the decades of bashing and shaming men about their so-called privilege. She makes no apologies for the centuries of oppression men have endured as objects-of-utility for women and for society-in-general. She does not make any apologies for wanting her cake and eating it too.

Young is playing a game, essentially saying "it's the fault of The Patriarchy™ that we were wrong…even though we weren't really wrong. The Patriarchy™ forced feminists to make distinct icing and borders on their narrative-cake. It's the fault of The Patriarchy™ that feminists didn't create a marble-cake-narrative in which women could be simultaneously oppressed and liberated, thoroughly insinuated in one another. It's the fault of The Patriarchy™ that The Patriarchy™ was allowed to be the primary antagonist of any feminist narrative." This is Young's elaborate game of victim-blaming.

Why did you men allow us to blame you? It's your fault that we falsely accused you. Had you men simply valued us women, we would never have falsely accused you men of oppressing us. Never mind the countless bodies of men who sacrificed their lives for women and for society-in-general; that's oppression of women too. Valuing us is not-valuing us. Oppressing us is not-oppressing us. No matter what men do, it's the fault of men that women are simultaneously liberated and oppressed, valued and not-valued, empowered and not-empowered. Men and by extension, The Patriarchy™, are to blame for everything.

Conclusion

Young, like most feminists, clings to her fetish—her imagined-experience of The Patriarchy™. She refuses to develop a more comprehensive narrative. She refuses to create a narrative that gives depth to the lived-experiences of men. She refuses to relinquish her hatred of men. She prefers blaming men for everything. This is her love, her hatred, and her fetish. She clung to these until death.

Sadly, this is what makes Young's paper so brilliant and fascinating. It illustrates the grasp of this fetish—The Patriarchy™. A philosopher as clever as Young fails to relinquish her fetish. Even after clearly making the case that prior notions of The Patriarchy™ and male privilege were wrong, she maintains that men are still to blame. Even when she knows that it's not the fault of men, she still blames men—The Patriarchy™.

By painting men as The Patriarchy™, men can be made a cartoonish caricature of evil. Men become as shallow and one-dimensional as Snidely Whiplash—the archenemy of women, humanity, civilization, and all things good. Men become The Patriarchy™, the non-human Other.

This is the narrative of feminisms. This is the common thread that binds together feminist narratives. This is the dehumanization of men as the antagonist. It is the fetishizing of men as The Patriarchy™–an imagined thing, a fetishized object of imagination, a villain.

This villain no longer inspires the "willing suspension of disbelief." This villain is not an artifact of "poetic faith." This villain represents weak and lazy writing. The Patriarchy™ is bad literature…and so are feminist narratives.

The way forward may be some sort of "marble cake," as Young describes, where gender differences are distinct, yet thoroughly insinuated within each other. However, before that can happen, a narrative granting multi-dimensionality and depth to men is needed. A narrative consisting of compassion and consideration for the lived-experiences of men and boys is needed. That will never happen as a feminist narrative. So long as men are written as the antagonist, as The Patriarchy™, men will always be the Other–the icing on the outside, apart from the cake, apart from humanity.

Revelations: Suzanne Venker!

AVfM Radio · 16 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Join us TODAY, Saturday 17 August 2013, for Revelations with Erin Pizzey. This week our special guest is noted conservative traditionalist author Suzanne Venker. Her current book, How to Choose a Husband, is sure to cause some sparks with many members of the men's community, although Venker has often shown genuine understanding of at least some of the issues faced by men and boys in today's misandrist times, including in her book The War On Men.

Joining Erin and myself this week will be A Voice for Men's News Director, Bob O'Hara. We've warned Suzanne to expect some pointed and frank questions, not least of which is, why should men accept the contract of marriage at all, given that men frequently have everything to lose and nothing to gain from entering into it? We expect a lively discussion and we hope you will join us with your own questions and comments.

Show time is 4pm London time, 11am Eastern US, 10am Central. Please join us!

CLICK HERE FOR SHOW PAGE.

[/box]

Men's rights conference in India

Dean Esmay · 16 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Do you know what the opponents of the Men's Human Rights Movement hate most? The reality, slowly dawning on many of them, that they are on the opposite side of decency, civil rights, and fundamental human rights, and are instead on the side of prejudice, bigotry, racism, and sexism.

Today our opponents, primarily and most visibly ideological feminists who consider themselves liberal, but also frequently gynocentric conservative traditionalists, are facing a growing and irritating cognitive dissonance: they are on the wrong side of humanity, compassion, basic decency, civil rights, and equal rights under the law. And probably on the wrong side of history. They're also on the wrong side of logic and common sense, and in denial about those annoying things called facts.

It must be really uncomfortable for them, having run on presumptions and prejudice in the area of men's human rights, including those of themselves and/or those they love. One can almost feel sorry for them, if it weren't for the fact that many remain willfully, aggressively ignorant and as such are still contributing directly to mass human suffering, not to mention participating in, or at least excusing and giving cover to, censorship and violent tactics.

Out of their mouths spews ridiculously ignorant foolishness, when they aren't outright making things up. Indeed, one of their favorite, grossly cliche'd lies is that the men's human rights movement is all about "white men," even, occasionally, "white Christian men." This last lie is particularly pernicious, for it also contains an implicit attempt to racially and religiously polarize issues that have little or nothing to do with race, creed, color, or national origin.

But it also exposes what's at the core of most criticisms of the Men's Human Rights Movement: not just gross sexism, but an appalling racism, as well as no small dose of religious bigotry and intolerance. Our enemies are the same as the enemies of Nelson Mandela, the same as the enemies of Mahatma Gandhi, the same as the enemies of Martin Luther King and Malcolm X, the same as the enemies of those who wish to free Tibet from totalitarian Chinese rule. They are the people who make excuses for violent criminals, for child abusers, for financial abusers, for involuntary servitude, and for rapists. That's who they are, even though they struggle desperately to believe they are the opposite of all that.

Again, one is tempted to feel sorry for them. When it finally hits them what they've done, whose side they've really been on… when they realize they've been on the side of fascism, repression, censorship, thuggery, racial and sexual and religious discrimination, it's going to hurt. It's going to hurt a lot. Some will have the courage to admit all this eventually and maybe try to redeem themselves for their past misdeeds. Others, I predict, will say it was our fault all along because we were not very nice in our tone–never mind that we're talking about issues that have gone fundamentally unchanged for many decades only to be ignored or laughed at or marginalized or treated with contempt, and never mind and the overwhelming proof that being loud about it is the only thing that brings attention to it.

I mention all this in passing to also let you all know that our brothers in India are holding a national level conference to discuss men's human rights in Nagpur, India. Among the attendees will be two contributors to A Voice for Men. It started about 12 hours ago and will be running through the weekend. There you will find Sikh men, Hindu men, Muslim men, and probably the odd Christian or non-religious type there. I can't prove it but I doubt very much there will be many pale-skinned men there, not that it should matter much. Our Indian News Director will be there. From Korea to India, Australia to the United Kingdom, South America to Asia to Africa, the Men's Human Rights Movement is spreading, and it's got nothing to do with irrelevant bullshit like skin color.

We wish our brothers in India well and reach out our hands to offer whatever assistance we can. In the meantime our prayers and well-wishes are with them. And if any members of the A Voice for Men community wish to follow what these brave men are up to, you can follow on twitter at #EventMRA, or check out their Facebook Page. Both will be giving live regular updates.

Solidarity, brothers.

Divorce court corruption in 1805 America

Robert St. Estephe · 16 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive." Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

The following article, whose text was in 1805 excerpted from a longer article ("The Rutland Letters, Letter X – and Last,"") originally published on Aug. 6, 1805 in The Post-Boy and Vermont & New Hampshire Federal Courier (Windsor, Vermont), was widely reprinted throughout the nation. Although this piece is of great importance in aiding us to understand the development of family law in the United States, it does not appear to have been discussed by any legal historian.

The practice of filing out-of-state divorces by one spouse without honestly giving notice to the other became epidemic by the mid-nineteenth century, providing great revenue to judges, lawyers and hotel-keepers. This in turn led to an increase in alimony scams and parental kidnapping. The article reveals corruption in the courts rather than any specific bias against either sex.

***

FULL TEXT:

~ VERMONT DIVORCES. ~

It cannot denied that the facility of obtaining bills of divorce, has greatly tended to render us contemptible in the eyes of our neighbours; and the little respect our Judges entertain for the sacred institution of marriage, has encouraged the dissolute of both sexes in every quarter of the union, to repair to our state, and make our laws subserve their wicked and immoral purposes.

[image]

Every libertine who is tired of his wife, or who from base and corrupt motives, is desirous to transfer his property and worthless affections to another woman; and every woman, who is infamous enough to abandon her husband and children, may fly to Vermont; and by circulating a libel in the form of a Petition, as far as a country paper will convey the notice, and paying the necessary fees (which constituted a very considerable emolument to our judges) can obtain a decree of our court, dissolving the bands of matrimony. The statute indeed requires that one of the parties should have resided in this State, at least one year; previous to granting a divorce; but there are several instances on record, of bills without even requiring proof to establish any previous residence. We shall soon have business enough of this kind in our courts, when it is known to the people of Carolina or any other, remote State, that a short visit of two months from home, will be quite sufficient to free a man from a disagreeable companion, and the incumbrance of a family, during the remainder of his life.

"Do we not publish a citation say our judges in some of our news-papers; and afford an opportunity to the other party, to appear and resist any improper attempt to impose on our Courts." Pretty reasoning this! – How shall an innocent wife, five hundred miles distant, living perhaps in the interior of the country, become acquainted with every advertisement in every one of our Village papers? The first sight of the advertisement is perhaps accompanied with a copy of the record of that decree, which strips her of property; deprives her of a husband; and separates her from her children? – On this solemn, this awful subject, it is impossible for a wise or virtuous man to reflect without being agitated by alternate emotions of horror and indignation.

It is really opening Pandora's Box, and giving wings to every evil that can poison the felicity and morals of society. It casts a ridicule on the sacred institution of marriages; produces a confusion of progeny; creates discord in families; corrupts public and private decency; and introduces a depravity of manners, which every man of feeling and sense, ought to repel as an enemy to the honour and happiness of his wife and daughters. In such a state of things where shall we look for that faithful and dutiful devotion of the heart, which is the most powerful inducement to a state of wedlock? – where find that perfect confidence and security, which are inspired by a belief, that, death only can sever that religious bond which reunites individuals of different sexes together, and impels them by the irresistible influence of affection, and the consciousness of a common indivisible interest, to maintain all the tender relations of father, son and brother?

[“Vermont Divorces,” New England Palladium (Boston, Ma.), Aug. 16, 1805, p. 2]

AFVM Radio Special: Paul Elam

AVfM Radio · 17 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

A Voice for Men Radio debuted on March 1, 2011 with Paul Elam sitting alone at the microphone. Two and a half years and well over a half-million downloads later, AVFM Radio is still going strong and has great promise for the future.

James Huff has recently taken over radio operations with the intent to further widen our audience and to improve the quality of what we do. We are changing in the days ahead, as is the scope of the Men's Human Rights Movement. We are entering exciting times.

Paul Elam will once again be flying solo for a special radio program this Monday, August 19 at 8:00 pm Central Time, where he will be discussing the past, present and future of the men's movement as well as aspects of his personal journey from writing a standalone blog to holding the rudder of the most visible men's rights entity in our age.

You will hear his personal story of becoming an MHRA, to the early days with Men's News Daily — to the growth of AVFM, with the participation of many, into a compelling force that is changing the dialogue on gender politics right in front of our eyes.

Paul will be discussing his upcoming appearance on ABC News 20/20, the documentary that is being made about AVFM and the MHRM and the plan for growth into the future. He will also update you on the efforts with NCFM to foster men's issues groups in institutions of higher learning.

Lastly, Paul will be presenting a detailed explanation of all of AVFMs strategies and techniques for stimulating public discourse on men's issues and why they are necessary. And he will be taking your calls to discuss how you can help and to offer your own ideas.

When: Monday, August 19 at 8:00 pm Central Time.

The call in number is 310-388-9709

VISIT SHOW PAGE HERE.

[/box]

Lows in victim mentality – 17 floors down

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 17 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Well, it's official. The Associated Press (AP) hates women and thinks the slutty, old women who smoke deserve to die. It's all right here in their report on the tragic death of Jennifer Rosoff:

> NEW YORK (AP) — A 35-year-old media executive on a first date plunged to her death Thursday after the railing on her 17th-floor New York City balcony gave way, police said.
>
> Jennifer Rosoff went outside for a cigarette around 12:50 a.m. when she either sat on the railing or leaned on it. Her date told her that she probably shouldn't do it, and then moments later, she apparently fell backward and landed on construction scaffolding at the first floor, authorities said. Police spoke to the man and no foul play was suspected.

While we can take it for a given that misogyny is pervasive in our culture, it's rare to see it expressed so clearly and blatantly. The AP is shameless! Utterly shameless, and they deserve to have the full wrath of Feminist Victims Everywhere™ brought down on their heads!

How dare the AP report that

1. She was 35 and single.
2. She was a smoker.
3. She invited a man back to her apartment late at night on a first date.
4. The man warned her not to lean against the balcony, but she did it anyway.

The lamentation of feminists at Slate's XX Factor were quick to cry foul over such sexism – L.V. Anderson, a Slate assistant editor who edits Slate's food and drink sections and writes Brow Beat's recipe column, You're Doing It Wrong, wrote:

> The implication being that this smoking slut totally had it coming. A reader is left with the distinct impression that if Rosoff hadn't invited her date inside, hadn't gone outside to smoke a cigarette, and hadn't defied the advice of the wise and logical man she was with, she would still be alive. According to the AP story's subtext, the problem wasn't that Rosoff's balcony railing was shoddy and unsafe—it was that Rosoff defied gender norms by being unmarried at 35, by being sexually liberal, and by insisting on making her own decisions instead of deferring to men's logic.

http://www.slate.com/blogs/xx_factor/2013/08/02/jennifer_rosoff_s_death_and_the_associated_press_s_sexist_reporting_of_it.html#

Now, for all those tempted to bang their heads off the nearest balcony railing, please put out your Marlboro first, make sure you have procreated and married (order not important), try not to be a slut and for the love of god, if some guy tells you maybe you SHOULDN'T do that, give him a parting shot in the kidneys as you plunge towards your death.

You can rest assured that we will never hold you responsible for your own death and we will make certain everyone knows that guy who cautioned you is a big, mean, logical asshole who should just shut the hell up already.

Just to show you how much the AP hates women, let's look at some reports about dead men. Do they include the man's age? Do they imply he might have done something a teeny bit stupid or risky to contribute to his own death? Do they follow any kind of, oh, you know, routine format?

> BURKE, Vt. (AP) — Vermont State Police say a man died after he broke into a home by smashing a glass > window and was severely cut as he climbed through it.

>
> Police responded to a report on Wednesday of a dead man on the kitchen floor of the unoccupied home in Burke.
>
> They identified the man as 73-year-old Duwayne Masure, of Sutton.

http://bigstory.ap.org/article/man-breaks-vt-home-cut-self-window-dies

Well this one doesn't. Score one point for Team AP Hates Women! No mention of age or contributing factors at all. Absolutely no implication that smashing windows is perhaps not the cleverest strategy for preserving one's life.

Right?

> YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK, Calif. (AP) — A Montana man died in a rock climbing accident as he tried to climb to the top of El Capitan in Yosemite National Park, authorities said.
>
> Mason Robison, 38, of Columbia Falls, Mont., was killed after a rock dislodged and severed his rope as he and a partner were about 2,300 feet above the Yosemite Valley floor, Yosemite spokeswoman Kari Cobb said Monday.

http://bigstory.ap.org/article/montana-man-dies-yosemite-climbing-accident

Another point for Team AP Hates Women! No mention of anyone's age here, nor is there the tiniest hint that people who dangle 2,300 feet above a canyon floor might be risking their lives.

> ILWACO, Wash. (AP) — A 55-year-old Seattle area man has died after his inflatable raft capsized in the ocean in southwest Washington.
>
> Pacific County Sheriff Scott Johnson said Sunday that John Beaumeir of Woodinville was rafting with a friend in the surf off of Benson Beach at Cape Disappointment State Park when their raft capsized several times in the rough waters.

http://bigstory.ap.org/article/man-dies-when-raft-capsizes-washington-coast

It's a hat trick and Team AP Hates Women definitely wins this one! No mention of anyone's age and no implication that "rough waters" may have been a contributing factor.

L.V. Anderson herself, who wrote the screed at Slate, wonders if she might be overreacting just a tiny bit?

> You may accuse me of overreacting, but the minor details that journalists choose to include or exclude from their reporting are one of many subtle ways that oppressive gender norms are perpetuated. Do I think the AP reporter assigned to this piece (incidentally, a woman) intended to undermine the reader's sympathy for Rosoff and suggest she was asking for it? Of course not. But the fact that totally irrelevant details about Rosoff's love life and cigarette habit made it into the lede and nut graf of an ostensibly unbiased news article—and that no editor stopped to ask, "Hmm, why is this information here?"—just goes to show how deeply ingrained sexist attitudes can be, even among professionals who pride themselves on their objectivity.

Overreacting? This is not overreacting. This is straightforward MAKING SHIT UP ON THE SPOT. And oppressive gender norms? The idea that Jennifer's date suggested she might want to be careful around the railing is an OPPRESSIVE GENDER NORM?

Jennifer would be alive had she given her male companion's words any weight. That's pretty oppressive right there. Lends new meaning to "give me liberty or give me death", no?

Feminist doctrine: TAKE DEATH! Death is way better than listening to any stupid man and his oppressive cautioning. Fuck him! Die righteous!

In a way, it's kind of beautiful. Could it be more clear? Feminists would rather women die than take the advice of a man. Especially a man you barely know. A man with his mouth open can only mean one thing: "oppressive gender norm". He was "mansplaining" the potential dangers of balconies, and of course you should never, ever listen to a mansplainer, even if he's right.

> Ever notice how the feminists' use of the term mansplaining is inversely proportionate to their willingness to participate in logical debate?

Yes, sir, I have noticed that. But it's tough to even broach the subject of logic when you are dealing with straight up fantasy. The Associated Press does not hate women. In the alternative, the Associated Press hates men and women equally.

Every time I think to myself, they cannot possibly get one more knot in those panties, the feminist brigade proves me wrong. Hmmm. That could explain why Lindy West continues to have her drivel published.

You can get a lot of knots in panties that big.

Lots of love,

JB

Editor's note: a version of this post first appeared on Janet Bloomfield's blog here. – A.L.

Image from Robert C. Wiles, 1947; Life Magazine's Picture of the Week on May 12, 1947.

The first gender warrior: Christine de Pizan

Diana Davison · 18 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A long time ago (15th century) in a land not too far away (France) a protofeminist named Christine de Pizan initiated a public debate later named La Querelle de la Rose. Simone de Beauvoir honours Pizan as the first woman to "take up her pen in defence of her sex"[1] but Christine was not fighting for new rights, she was strictly defending the chivalry-based gynocentric culture that she saw crumbling away before her eyes.

Though some feminists deny Christine's status as a member of the gang, she did seem to have set the standard for how women change the public narrative; lies, elitism, deception and manipulation of history bordering on fraud.

Like all feminists who followed in her footprints, she set a Machiavellian example. The end justifies the means and, while you re-write "herstory", make sure to claim you are meek and helpless the whole time.

But let us go back to the start of this adventure. We shall travel to c1275 when a man of some talent took up an incomplete poem called La Roman de La Rose and added a whopping 18,824 additional lines to the original 4,000 to create what would become one of the most widely read works of medieval times. Not only did the second author, Jean de Meun, create a cult following, his work was mimicked by Chaucer and Dante. Overall, a charmingly good chap for literary culture.

For over a hundred years this poem proliferated, was translated, adored, and revered as a work of genius. It outlined the troubles and challenges a youth may face when trying to woo a young lady in the world of chivalry. As in most good stories, the goal was not attained easily.

Presented in a dreamlike setting, our hero is guided by personified attributes such as Reason and Genius who help him to bypass all the lady's defences and capture her "castle." The language is considered quite risque for the times.

Around 1401 a gentleman named Jean de Montreuil, who served as secretary in the king's chancery of France, was convinced to read the poem and wrote a glowing review which circulated about the land. It crossed the path of a woman named Christine de Pizan.

Christine was in a unique position compared to other women of her time. She had been raised in the court where her father, despite her mother's disapproval, urged her to learn how to read and write. These skills came in handy after both her father and husband died quite young leaving Christine with debt and children. She was not overly pleased with her reduction of social status but managed to secure some work as a copyist instead of having to work at spinning or other demeaning trades.

[image]She had begun by writing romantic poetry and secured some patrons who paid her for the work she sent them. She was a clever mimic and was able to write in whatever style her patrons preferred. She would likely have continued to meet survival needs as things were but decided, upon seeing Montreuil's treatise, to take a chance and use her pen in defence of her desire to improve her career.

Thus began an exchange of letters between Christine and defenders of the poem La Roman de La Rose.

These letters became public because Christine de Pizan decided to publish them. She was quite creative in her publishing by arranging them out of chronological order and removing the best arguments that her opponents had offered. Just like a feminist.

Some of the missing letters have since been recovered.

Christine's main problem with the famous poem amounts to censorship. She takes exception to the naming of genitals and with advice being given as to how to trick women into having sex. Christine was a very conservative Christian. As such, you might think that she really did find the whole storyline repulsive if she hadn't stated in a letter that the debate was "good-humored, an example of a difference of opinion between worthy persons"[2] and mentioned in another letter that a reply made her laugh.

The Romance of the Rose is rather bawdy and, at times, obscene: kind of like The Vagina Monologues.

Christine intitiated the debate by replying to a letter she acknowledged was not addressed to her. She bypassed that fact by publishing the letters out of order to make her "reply" look solicited.

[image]She begins by stating that her opponents are very learned and that she is very ignorant, which she hopes will not taint their reading of her correspondence. She claims to be weak and timid. Of course, only timid people publish private letters and send copies of it to the Queen.

Speaking of the Queen, who was one of Christine's patrons, one of Pizan's approaches was to link female virtue directly to Queen Isabeau of Bavaria "to the point at which the Queen becomes synonymous with virtue, Christine essentially lays the Queen under an obligation to accept her position; not to do so would be to reject her very self."[3]

Nice trick.

Despite feminist claims that Christine tackled this monumental task alone, she was abetted by Jean Gerson, a long time family friend from her courtly days. Gerson was a strange bedfellow but he and Christine shared some religious ideals and were united both on the misogyny front and in speaking out about the "body politic" in other works. He's not always mentioned in the discussions of the Querelle because feminists would like you to think Christine didn't have a white knight helping her out.

The problem faced by both Pizan and Gerson was that de Meun's poem was, and is, a work of art. When his characters speak they speak as that character would and do not represent the thinking of either the author or God. That is often the problem of censorship fanatics. The other big problem is that they have to admit they actually read the cursed thing.

When you read something distasteful, it is hard to blame anyone but yourself for the fact that you read it. If you didn't read it or look at it, you can hardly have an opinion. Christine claims to have skim read over the worst of the worst but still approaches it as if she can fully assess the artistic merits of the work.

The accusations against her, which she deletes from her version of events, are that she is a novice who can't comprehend advanced works and that she is speaking out of turn because she got a lot of recent praise and is suddenly full of her own ego:

> "Yet what do we make of Pierre Col's contention, suppressed by Christine, that her actions have resulted from her envy of 'la tres elevee haultesse du liver' [the very loftiness of the book], and that she had better be careful so as not to suffer the fate of the crow who, when 'someone praised his song, began to sing louder than usual and let his mouthful fall.'"[4]

Christine responds with continued claims to humility and simplicity which, ironically and with calculation, guarantee her fame.

While feminists praise Pizan as a defender of women, only a third of what she wrote in the debate is devoted to perceptions of women. The majority of her complaint is pure Christian objection to obscenity.[5] The purpose of her diatribe can be discerned in the writings that followed, after winning the prestige to write full fledged books.

So what did she write next?

The iconic work in the list of some feminist "must read" resources is Christine de Pizan's City of Ladies. This is the first book that she published after the Querelle which took up the cause of women.

The City of Ladies copies the format of previous male writers, like de Muen, who present a story in allegorical dream sequence. As a character in her own book Pizan is ordered by her ficitonal ladies of Reason, Rectitude, and Justice, to construct an city with her pen in which women can take shelter. Not all women, only "virtuous" women of her discernment. Christine doesn't actually believe that all women are good and pure and worthy of men's love, she just wants to build really solid walls behind which some women can hide so that they can continue to be treated as godly creatures while the other women burn in fucking hell. It was a form of alchemy: Burn off the undesirables.

"Only ladies who are of good reputation and worthy of praise will be admitted into this city. To those lacking in virtue, its gates will remain forever closed" [6]

Those whores are giving women a bad name. Slut-shaming Central.

[image]The gates of Pizan's City are locked tight to adulteresses, lustful women of any sort, and those who don't uphold Christine's religious ideals. She has built this city on the foundations of mythical women, appointed the Virgin Mary as queen (who she alludes to herself as representing), and predicts that her city of imaginary wonder will never fall. It can't because it's not real.

If we had any doubt about Christine's intentional trickery, we need look no further than the pages of this debut novel which, unlike the letters of the Querelle, are unmolested. She takes examples of awesome women from the Bible and pagan mythologies and leaves out all the bad parts of the stories so that they all look virtuous.

For example, Abraham's wife, Sarah, becomes a woman who was so lusted after that King Pharaoh forcibly stole her from her husband. For those who actually read the bible, you'll find out that Sarah and Abraham tricked Pharaoh by telling him they were siblings so that he might fall in love and give her many riches. When God punished Pharaoh for seducing a married woman Pharaoh was flabbergasted and gave them whatever they wanted just to get the fuck out of town. They pulled this trick twice. And it turns out they actually were brother and sister. God didn't seem to care about that.

Christine laments that one of her heroines, Semaramis, married her son to avoid having to share her kingdom with another woman but excuses her because it wasn't a law at the time that she shouldn't do that. That Semaramis managed to defend her kingdom after the death of her husband was more important than the laws of nature. The laws of nature are somewhat mutable in Christine's world, when it suits her purpose.

"As for those men who are slanderous by nature, it's not surprising if they criticize women, given that they attack everyone indiscriminately. You can take it from me that any man who wilfully slanders the female sex does so because he has an evil mind, since he's going against both reason and nature." [7]

So it's in man's nature to go against nature? It's not hard to argue against logic like that.

In the final reading, we are left to wonder what it is Christine was really trying to accomplish. Did she think women were strong, capable people or objects to be fawned over and worshipped like children or gods? Christine answers that upon seeing the perfect dream ladies of her vision who arrive to show her the path of truth:

"I didn't know which of my senses was the more struck by what she said: whether it was my ears as I took in her stirring words, or my eyes as I admired her great beauty and dress, her noble bearing and face." [8]

Christine! You misogynist!!
How dare you objectify these women with your gaze?

Christine's "city" presents and shelters women as goddesses. Like Pygmalion, who was uninterested in real women, she sculpts the perfect female so that men can worship the illusion. Christine was a traditionalist attempting to uphold and entrench all the privileges enjoyed by her gender since chivalric love had been introduced.

As a pioneer of feminism, she taught those who followed that every female flaw which can't be excused can be erased from herstory.

Sources:

1. Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex, p105
2. Heather Bamford, Remember the giver(s): the creation of the Querelle and notions of sender and recipient in University of California, Berkeley, MS 109, 2009

3. ibid
4. David F. Hult, Words and Deeds: Jean de Meun's "Romance of the Rose" and the Hermeneutics of Censorship, New Literary History, Vo. 28, No. 2, Medieval Studies (Spring, 1997)
5. Ibid
6. Christine de Pizan, City of Ladies, p11
7. ibid, p19-20
8. ibid, p9

Editor's note: feature image by Hans Splinter. –PW

Greg Simms: GMP respect guru

Paul Elam · 18 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes people ask me why I have such a case of the red-ass over the Good Men Project (GMP). It is easy enough for someone like me to come up with reasons to not care for a "men's" publication that only attracts female readers, but I usually explain my distaste for GMP more obviously.

"Zack Rosenberg" is good start. There are others, but a quick view of his wares will give you the general idea. GMP is the barely polished turd of modern gender discourse. Throwing men under the bus, and/or encouraging their acceptance of a narrative that sees them as deserving to be there is an editorial necessity at GMP because their bread and butter is appealing to vindictive, embittered women who want a good (read: servile) man, but who are hopelessly incapable of a functional relationship with any kind of man at all.

[image]
Women dig my T-shirt more than yours!
GMP offers them the only viable alternative, the vicarious and vengeful enjoyment of seeing men demeaned en masse.

Greg Simms has stepped up to help them with that mission. I knew it as soon as I saw the title to his third and most recent offering on the site, "You want women? You need to LIKE women." Ostensibly, it is a message for young men in the "Bro and hip-hop culture[s]," about women.

In reality it is a derogatory barrage, including attacks on young men's body image, music and fashion trends, but focusing mainly on sexual shame aimed at making them feel morally lacking and worthless. All of this is conducted, of course, not with an audience of young men in mind, but with GMPs demographic of women seeking articles that satisfy their need to validate their hatred of men.

You can smell the shame sandwich in this one even in the title, and Simms does not disappoint as he gets into the meat of it.

> "In both Bro and hip-hop culture," he says, "there seems to be a…contempt for women. It almost seems like girls are seen as appliances by guys of your generation. To be up kept, updated, polished, cleaned, used, and then thrown away."

Oh my, imagine that, all these women out there, evaluating these young men purely by the quality of their moral standing, their intrinsic character as men; their values – nary a thought as to what utility or service these dirty appliance shoppers may bring them or even a second look at the size of their wallets. Those treacherous brigands return that wholesome appraisal by evaluating the women like they were toaster ovens to be trashed after a few uses.

That is, after all, the only view of women "their generation," is capable of holding.

These young men know nothing of betrayal, broken hearts, rejection, being used, discarded or anything of the sort. Right, Greg?

Of course they don't. They are assholes who only know privilege and power. Only women know heartache and grief at the hands of people they love. Those anguishes are never in the life experience of this over muscled, over tanned generation of hip-hop listening, Red Bull chugging punks. And the best solution is to publicly humiliate them; to dress them down as you mock their interests and reduce their lives to an over-simplified cartoon at which a hateful female audience can sneer.

Because it is all about love and honor and seeing other human beings as they are. Right, Greg? Isn't that the lesson you are trying to teach?

Yes, of course. That describes things perfectly. 40 year old Greg Simms is here to set these smug little bastards straight. All the better that he can do it in full view of a few thousand emotionally unhealthy women that are drawn to GMP by design, hoping for, needing, just this kind of article to justify their sick worldview.

Simms delivers without stopping. He goes on with the charade by asking the young men he pretends to believe will be reading this article a few questions:

> "But, do you LIKE the women?"
>
> "Seriously? When was the last time either of you [Bros and hip-hops] actually looked at and a woman and got lost in her eyes, and complement her on them? When was the last time you noticed and were knocked out by her smoky voice, her hot new haircut, or her new perfume? How long has it been since you told a lady friend you loved her new sexy tattoo, or you loved her knockout curves, in a RESPECTFUL way?"

In other words, when was the last time you got on your knees and worshipped her? When was the last time you made a dog and pony show of how perfect your woman was, telling her that she's the shizizzle, covered in awesome sauce and other contrived flattery to let her know just how lucky and undeserving you know yourself to be for her willingness to even speak to you?

[image]
Ima teach all you punks to respect women!
Also, and I beg your indulgence for the digression but I have to say this. Greg defines himself in the article as a writer/media professional. I guess as a writer he missed the part in writing class when they tell you that using all caps (which he even does in the title) is a bombastic cheap trick used by amateur hacks who can't make a point with their command of the language alone.

Second, and I have to say this, too, when I read this kind of transparent pandering my eyes roll so hard that they have to do a windup first. This is preening for poontang ala Hugo Fucking Schwyzer, only Simms' writing skills barely rate a crayon and scrap paper.

Given the amount of female traffic at GMP, which is to say nearly all of it, it also reflects the numbers of perilously sick women being hoodwinked by the publishers.

GMP wants the cha-ching. Simms just wants an audience – some attention and cheap adulation. Most revealing into his mind is the following:

> You two can go now. But, "Tapout" man, please cut down on the Red Bulls and protein shakes. And your friend has to take off that damn "YOLO" shirt. Worst. Trend. Ever.

You hear that young men? You have been dissed and dismissed. Run along now and change clothes. Watch what comes out of your mouth and what you put into it. Take your whole fucking generation of unmanly losers with you. These are your instructions from a real man, one that knows all about how to show respect.

Way to go again, "Good Men" Project. Shit, I swear even my keyboard is starting to laugh at those words.

I will spare you any more analysis of this asshat's banal ideas and hackneyed showboating for emotionally challenged women. Indeed, the only reason I am writing about Simms at all is because he provided me another opportunity to appeal to people of good reason (and good values) with an image of GMP as it really is.

It is a predatory website, attracting women who desperately need someone to help them validate their sanctimonious fantasies about being superior to men. They dwell in illusions that keep them lonely and miserable, which GMP happily exploits in order to draw those women to pages stuffed with pop up advertising and bullshit.

These women actually need a clean mirror and a healthy dose of personal accountability; at least enough to help them figure out the long list of things they won't or can't bring to the table in a relationship. That might actually help them, but it is just not on the menu.

It is not GMP alone. Our society has been breeding this sickness in women (and men) for at least two generations. We have industrialized the demonization of everything male, painting men in such a way that they can be easily saddled with all of women's frustrations, failures and personal shortcomings. By pushing the contempt and hostility to toxic levels, industrialized misandry has laid waste to the aspirations of countless women. It left them only with failure and resentment, and the bottomless need for someone to blame.

I suppose that is the cost of a free market. After all, there is still a demand for cigarettes, high fructose corn syrup and various other kinds of poison. Emotional carcinogens should not be too much of a surprise.

Still, I reserve the right to hope that the people at GMP some day figure out what it is to be a good human being. Maybe if they can work their way into that, they may have something meaningful to say about men.

Einstein's Theory of Relationships

Robert St. Estephe · 18 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

Trigger alert:

Dear Reader: If you happen to member of either of the following communities – Toy Dog, Type 1 (mangina) or a Toy Dog Type 2 (white knight) – you should not read the rest of this post.

No Toy Dogs need apply – Big Dogs only!

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: Berlin, July 7. – Dr. Albert Einstein, the famous scientist, made an amazing discovery relative to America on his trip which he recently explained to a sympathetic-looking Hollander as follows:

"The excessive enthusiasm for me in America appears to be typically American. And if I grasp it correctly the reason is that the people in America are as colossally bored, very much more than is the case with us. After all, there is so little for them there!" he exclaimed.

Dr. Einstein said this with vibrant sympathy. He continued:

"New York, Boston, Chicago and other cities have their theatres and concerts, but for the rest? There are cities with 1,000,000 inhabitants. Despite which what poverty, intellectual poverty! The people are, therefore, glad when something is given them with which they can play and over which they can enthuse. And that they do, then, with monstrous intensity.

"Above all things there are the women who, as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in a most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is the vogue and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

"You ask whether it makes a ludicrous impression on me to observe the excitement of the crowd for my teaching and my theory, of which it, after all, understandable nothing? I find it funny and at the same time interesting to observe the game.

"I believe quite positively that it is the mysteriousness of what they cannot conceive which places them under a magic spell. One tells them of something big which will influence all future life, of a theory which only a small group, highly learned, can comprehend. Big names are mentioned of men who made discoveries, of which the crowd grasps nothing. But it impresses them, takes on color and the magic power of mystery, and thus one becomes enthusiastic and excited.

"My impressions of scientific life in America? Well, I met with great interest several extraordinary meritorious professors, like Professor Milliken[sic]*. I unfortunately missed Professor Michelson in Chicago, but to compare the general scientific life in America with Europe is nonsense.

["Einstein Declares Women Rule Here – Scientist Says He Found American Men the Toy Dogs of the Other Sex. – People Colossally Bored – Showed Excessive Enthusiasm Over Him for Lack of Other Thinks, He Thinks." The New York Times (N.Y.), Jul. 8, 1921, Section (?), p. 9]

* Editor's notes: "Professor Milliken" is most likely the Nobel Prize-winning Dr. Robert Andrews Millikan, a full professor at the University of Chicago. Among his other discoveries, Dr. Millikan proved experimentally the photoelectric effect postulated by Dr. Einstein, and he coined the term "cosmic rays" to describe radiation from outer space.

 "Professor Michelson" is most likely the Nobel Prize-winning Dr. Albert Abraham Michelson, a Department Head at the University of Chicago. Dr. Michelson is credited with one of the earliest accurate measurements of the speed of light, and also with the Michelson-Morley experiment that helped establish Einstein's theory of Special Relativity. – AL

•?•

[image]

Einstein's words were powerful, but the story doesn't end there. A lot of feminists took exception to Einstein's observations, and The New York Times published their retorts that next day:

"Chicago Women Resent Einstein's Opinions"

Men, However, Seem to Agree on "Toy Dogs" and Dominance of Wives

Chicago, July 8. – Professor Einstein's opinion of America, and of American women in particular, as expressed in an interview cabled from Berlin to THE NEW YORK TIMES yesterday and reprinted in Chicago this morning, brought forth indignant protests from Chicago women today. They took particular exception to Professor Einstein's characterization of American men as the "toy dogs" of American women.

Chicago men, however, seemed to agree with Professor Einstein on the dominance of women and the "toy dog" charge, while professors at the University of Chicago contented themselves with a few nervous tut-tuts and the comment that the German scientist had obtained a warped view of America because of the short time he spent here.

"Perfectly ridiculous," said Mrs. Frederick D. Countess, 1,534 Lake Shore Drive. "The professor must have met a bunch of movie actors when he was over here. If the American men make more money than the other men to spend on their wives, that's American luck. I think the right kind of American is the strongest character in the world."

"I cannot agree with Professor Einstein," said Mrs. Jacob Bauer, 1,100 Lake Shore Drive. "Women have the vote and men are women's equals."

Domination of women over men in America is not a national phase, but a world-wide one, believes William Wrigley Jr. "It is just as true in Germany as it is here." he says. "Einstein is right on the women, and I'm proud of the fact. Aren't the women behind everything a man does? Maybe not openly, but they're there just the same. What else can a man do with his money but spend it on his wife?"

Professor W.P. Evans of the chemistry department at Northwestern University said: "It seems incredible that a man of Dr. Einstein's attainments should make the statements credited to him. If these statements are correct, they go far to prove the fact that, although he understands thoroughly, we hope (don't forget to put in the "we hope"), the theory of relativity, he has not the essential qualities for judging the scientific and industrial achievements of a great nation."

"Dr. Einstein saw America under very unfavorable conditions," and Professor Millikan of the physics department of the University of Chicago, who was spoken of favorably by Dr. Einstein as a "meritorious" professor, "due to the popular furore [sic] over his discovery. I might say that he had a hectic time."

["Chicago Women Resent Einstein's Opinions – Men, However, Seem to Agree on "Toy Dogs" and Dominance of Wives." New York Times (N.Y.), Jul. 9, 1921, "Amusements, Hotels and Restaurants" section, p. 12]

AVFM News week in review – 19-Aug-2013

Robert O'Hara · 19 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to our first edition of AVfM News Week In Review.

From now on every week the AVFM News Department will be publishing a review of the week's top news stories titled "News Week In Review." It will simply highlight the news stories that we feel are the most pertinent to men's rights and our movement. If readers ever want to submit a story to AVFM News for consideration please contact us at avfmnews@avoiceformen.com, and of course you may always leave comments here to add other stories you think would be of interest to your fellow Men's Human Rights Activists.

Item: Men's rights conference in India

Our friends in India held their fifth annual meet in Nagpur this past weekend with over 100 prominent activists attending. It was followed on Twitter and Facebook extensively and was reported to be a great success.

Item: Male students accused of rape and sexual harassment sue administrators

As expected, men who were unjustly accused of sexual misconduct are suing college administrators for their mistreatment justified by recently introduced policies from the DOJ and DOE. They claim sexual discrimination, but also as expected, feminist legal experts downplay their claims.

Item: Man in his 30's convicted on criminal charge for staring at 55-year-old woman on a train

Yep you read that right. A man in Italy who did not even lay a hand on anyone was given a suspended sentence for simply looking at a woman who was decades older than him. Maybe she is suffering from wishful thinking.

Item: Teacher allegedly had sex with underage students for performing well at sports events

Yes, she is just giving these young studs their due reward for performing well at athletic events. Apparently she has a thing for basketball players. She is also adamant that she didn't do anything wrong.

Item: The Amazing Atheist becomes target of YouTube censorship

Yes, that's right, just today the Amazing Atheist uploaded an "emergency video" calling for help in curbing the onslaught of censorship. YouTube administrators have removed some of his most popular videos concerning Feminism and feminists, among other things. Keep in mind that many of these vids had upwards of 600,000 views! It seems that eloquence is what they are really scared of.

Item: Recent study: Men want women to split dating costs but are afraid to ask

The paper, which was presented at the American Sociological Association's 108th Annual Meeting, is called "Who Pays for Dates? Following versus Challenging Conventional Gender Norms," Gee I wonder why! Could it be about shame?

Item: P Z Meyers Accuses Shermer of rape, Thunderf00t covers story with scathing logic

Another YouTube atheist famous for entering the fray about feminism, and specifically the Atheism +, weighs in on the controversy surrounding PZ Meyers accusation that Michael Shermer, founding publisher of Skeptic Magazine, is a serial rapist. Definitely watch this one – it's good!

Item: Woman who sent a man to jail for four years on a false rape claim gets two months jail time to be served on weekends

A woman, who at the age of 17, falsely accused a man of rape in order to get her parents off her back for being caught looking at online porn. She waited four years before confessing and only gets a slap on the wrist.

Item: Founder of A Voice for Men has special edition of AVfM Radio.

Since starting in early 2011, A Voice for Men and its radio show have reached places many could not have imagined even 5 years ago. Don't miss the recording of this special episode, it has some amazing stories from the past you may never have heard, and a breathtaking view of the future of the men's movement.

Thanks for reading our first News week in review. See you next week!

“Marriage for alimony only” – 1928

Robert St. Estephe · 19 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

The anti-alimony movement was in high gear when popular novelist Faith Baldwin decided to write a novel exposing the Alimony Racket. The case of California’s “Alimony Sam” was nationally known; prominent judges Selah B. Strong of New York and Harry A. Lewis of Chicago were publicly excoriating the alimony racketeering epidemic practiced by an army of callous and predatory women. The first formal men’s rights organizations focused on fighting the racket across the nation. Faith Baldwin was inspired to expose the scamming activities of the “alimony heiresses” in fictional form.

•?•

FULL TEXT: “THE rising tide of divorce has brought us a new industry, the ultimate refinement of golddigging, the perfection of blackmail within the law – marriage for alimony,” said Faith Baldwin, the well-known writer. “Women who do not want husbands or children have found a joker in our marriage laws by which they can establish themselves comfortably for life – free, respectable, rich, safe – without personal cost or sacrifice.

[image]

“There are thousands and thousands of women who are being supported by men to whom they are no longer wives. There is no doubt that this business of alimony is getting to be a serious menace, it may be all right when a man has plenty of money. To pay a former wife a few thousand dollars in alimony may mean nothing to him. But, on the other hand, just consider how many men are forced to pay alimony who cannot afford it. You will find in the majority of cases that there is no good reason why they should pay it, either. The women are well able to take care of themselves. If they did not lack pride and self-respect, they would not accept money from men who no longer mean anything to them,” said the writer, with a flash of her deep-blue eyes.

Faith Baldwin is a charming woman whose most striking possessions are her sense of humor and her genuineness. She is as four-square [“marked by boldness and conviction” – ed] as a man and she does not hesitate to speak her mind frankly on any topic that absorbs her.

She was educated at private schools both here and abroad, and at the age of 6 she wrote a play entitled “The Deserted Wife.” It is still extant and covers about two newspaper columns. During the war she worked with the War Camp Community Service, organizing girls’ clubs and military dances, and it was solely for relaxation that she wrote her first novel, “Mavis of Green Hill.” It was immediately accepted and, greatly encouraged, she turned to novel-writing as a career. Or, to be more exact, one of her careers, as she considers her husband and her children as two very important careers.

It is in her recent novel, “Alimony,” that she turns the searchlight on this most engrossing problem of the day. She shows what alimony does, what it does not do, the moral effect upon the women and children it roofs, clothes and feeds, and the burden it places on the man who pays it. Perhaps no writer is better qualified to deal with the subject than she. As the daughter of the late Stephen C. Baldwin, the famous New York trial lawyer, she was forever hearing him discuss the menace of alimony.

“I REMEMBER him telling my mother,” Miss Baldwin related, “that some day he was going to write a book on alimony. He wanted to awaken people to the unfair advantage that many women were taking of the alimony laws. Well, he never did. For a good many years I entertained the idea of getting to work on it. I studied the question in all its phases and discussed it with judges and lawyers. I realized that it was certainly serious enough to deserve consideration.

[image]

“The particular phase that interested me, as a writer, is the fact that there are many women who will marry merely with the idea of getting alimony. They know that marriage can be painlessly dissolved and they take their marriage vows with no intention at all of keeping them.

“Chorus girls are the most frequent offenders in this respect. Any number of them will get married with that end in view. They don’t even wait for a year to pass before seeking a divorce and demanding their alimony. They find it easier to do that than to earn the money for the luxuries they crave. In other words, they get a salary every week for having been the man’s wife.

“Judges are most wary of this practice on the part of women and they try to see to it that they do not take advantage of their husbands. But let a woman—particularly a pretty one—get a clever lawyer and she’ll usually get what she wants.”

“I know of one young blond woman who wanted an increase in her alimony. She came to court in her shabbiest frock and told the judge some sad tale of not being able to work because of ill-health. She looked very blond, very childlike and most appealing. The Judge being susceptible to childlike and appealing blondes and the lawyer being quite clever, she got the increase she wanted.” Her former husband, who knew she was nothing but a parasite, stormed at the injustice of it, but he was given the privilege of paying it or going to jail. He paid it. Since he was contemplating a second marriage at that time, it made it particularly difficult for him.”

[image]

“There are numerous instances where alimony can even be an incentive to immorality. I remember one case of which my father spoke which epitomizes the whole. A woman who had divorced her husband received alimony of $25,000 a year. She was accustomed to luxury and naturally demanded a sum that would keep her in the same state of comfort. Since her husband could afford it, he willingly gave it to her. But, this woman soon fell in love with another man who was poor in comparison to her former husband. She wanted him, yet she did not want to forgo her alimony. What did she do? She kept her alimony and entered into an illicit relationship with the man. It was that kind of woman for which my father had intense hatred. There are ever so many cases where a woman loves a man desperately enough to desire him and yet not enough to accept less financial comfort than she has always had, and it’s on the cards that she will have it both ways. She will take her cake and she will eat it, too.

“This naturally works a great hardship on the salaried man. He is never freed of his burden. If his salary should be increased, things aren’t any easier for him, for his former wife then has the right to demand an increase in her alimony.

“ONE might think, though, that a woman would be willing to relinquish the alimony if she could be fortunate enough to get a second husband to support her in comfort. But that isn’t always true. You will find, more often, that she prefers to have the independence and the freedom that the alimony gives her to marrying again. Why adjust herself to another marriage and try to make a go of it? Marriage entails too much self-sacrifice. Who knows whether it will be worth exchanging it for the alimony? She can have the man’s love, anyway.”

The writer paused for a moment and then continued thoughtfully:

“I feel that instead of alimony being paid out every week so long as the woman remains unmarried, it would be far better to settle an outright sum on her. At least this procedure would not encourage immorality in any way. The woman could be free to marry again and there would not be the temptation of the alimony to lure her into an illicit relationship.

“Do you believe,” Miss Baldwin was asked, “that alimony should be done away with altogether?”

“Oh, no,” she quickly replied, “I would be the last one to suggest that. There are many, many cases where women are entitled to it. They may have small children, or they may be untrained for any kind of work, or, again, their health may have suffered. And we all know cases of wives who have struggled through poverty with their husbands. Then when these men have attained financial success they divorce their wives in order to marry younger or prettier girls. Such wives certainly deserve alimony.

“However, I do think that if a woman is able-bodied and has no children or any shadow of claim on the man from whom she’s separated, she is not entitled to alimony. Perhaps for a year or so, until she looks around for something to do, she should get it. But after that she should be the last person – even, to want to accept money from a man for whom she no longer feels any affection. And to go on endlessly driving him when he can ill afford it, then depriving him of his chances of remarrying, seems criminal to me. Personally, I would rather scrub floors for a living than take alimony from such a man.

“The whole pitiful part of it is that the women who are badly in need of the alimony are just the ones who don’t get it. One woman for a long time did not want to divorce her husband because of her religious scruples. Finally things became so bad that she secured a divorce. The judge awarded her alimony for her and her two children. The man left the State and the woman is absolutely in poverty.

“Time and again you will find men adopting various tactics to evade paying alimony. Some of them will even prefer to languish in jail. I know one man who’s been in jail for years, and there’s no saying when he’ll ever come out. He simply will not pay his wife alimony.

“It isn’t at all unusual for a man to get a fake mortgage on his property, transfer all his holdings to friends or form a dummy corporation. A friend will go through the form of foreclosing a mortgage, taking over the property and leaving the husband apparently stranded. Then the wife will have to agree to accept a smaller amount than the Court awarded to her.

“One man owns some unimproved real estate which is valued at a good price. But he persists in keeping it nonproductive and is living in poverty rather than risk paying his former wire share of what might be a good income. And that woman is really quite poor.”

Lawyers claim that there is no other class of litigation in which men will go to so muck trouble and take so serious risks as in the alimony cases. An alimony judgment seems to stir up more stubborn resistance and stimulate more resourcefulness than any other kind of conflict that gets people into the courts.

Some old and seasoned alimony-payers of the Alimony Payers Protective Association are pledged to “break up the partnership between the vindictive wife and the shyster lawyer; prevent the misuse of children for the purpose of securing excessive alimony; prevent unwarranted persecution,” and a number of other things.

[image]

IN THIS day of numerous divorces it was interesting to learn what Faith Baldwin considers the essential basis of a happy marriage.

“It is important,” she said, “that a man and wife be physically well mated. Of course, no marriage can last on that alone. But if on that basis one can build a community of interests and an intellectual ground of meeting, you can have a happy marriage.

“I have never felt that children make a real difference in the real relationship between husband and wife. They may make the marriage more interesting. But they do not change that inner relationship in any way. That is why I believe that children are not sufficient to hold husband and wife together.

“One of the chief causes of trouble is the ease with which people can get married and divorced. A young couple will go off on a joyride and suddenly decide to get married. Or they will return home from a party quite drunk and think it would be a novel idea to marry. There have been any number of cases where people have even married on a bet. In former days, when one married, no matter what the marriage turned out to be, one had to grin and bear it. But today, if one is at any time bored or dissatisfied, one can take bag and baggage and clear out with very little trouble.

“Here’s a story of one couple I know which is actually true and which illustrates the way some people marry.

“This couple met one Friday at a house party. The man liked the girl and suggested that they get married. ‘I always said I’d never get married on a Friday. Try another time,’ she told him.

”The following week he asked her again. ‘It’s too cold,’ she said.

“Well, the third week he asked her once more, and since it was neither Friday nor too cold, they got married. Incidentally, while the wedding banquet was on it started to rain quite hard. A few months later, when they were divorced, the girl said to me: ‘I always knew our marriage wouldn’t pan out, because is rained the day we were married.’

“She’s been married twice since then, and I often wonder what other reasons she’s been giving for the break-up of her marriages.

“This story may sound far-fetched and exaggerated, and if it were a solitary instance I would not have told it. But it is only one of many which typify the light, frivolous attitude that people have toward marriage today.”

[Genn, Lillian G, “Marriage for Alimony Only a Public Menace Says Faith Baldwin,” syndicated (Public Register), Modesto Bee (Ca.), Sep. 25, 1928]

•?•

“As strong as a man”

August Løvenskiolds · 19 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Strength means more than raw physical power – at which men mostly excel over women – it can also mean endurance, determination, skill, character, intellectual prowess, and emotional fortitude, other areas in which both men and women can excel. Even a child can be strong in their potential to contribute to the success of human community.

Do those who seek equality between men and women believe that women can be strong, too? Let’s take a look.

Well, the question of women’s strength is where things start to diverge. As a Men’s Human Rights Advocate, I believe that a woman can be as strong as a man. Every day at A Voice for Men I interact with women who are exemplars of these traits – endurance, determination, skill, character, intellectual prowess, and emotional fortitude. It is challenging and even humbling at times for me, a man, to try to keep up with the worthy woman I work with. Diana Davison and Della Burton can write circles around me. Alison Tieman’s depth of understanding of gender issues and leadership skills can leave me gasping for air. Karen Straughan is a godless godsend to men’s human rights and our understanding of how to spread the word – I wouldn’t relish debating her about anything.

I’m often glad for my manly muscles as my last, fading refuge of my manly dominance.

But Not All Women – and particularly, Feminists – are strong like our sweet cete of Honey Badgers. Not at all – in fact, some women revel in their weakness, stupidity, and worthlessness when it comes to excelling in human community, and worse, they seek to drag all people, men and women alike, down into a cesspool of failure.

Consider, say, professional victim Rebecca Watson, who lacks the strength of character to shrug off the invitation from a guy in an elevator asking her to share some time over coffee with him. Instead, she touched off a firestorm of conflict within the atheist community by begging for protection from such polite, admiring men. “Elevatorgate” remains as an enduring symbol of why some women like Watson are unsuited for leadership positions in business, boardrooms, government, academia, politics, or other institutions where character, intellectual prowess, and emotional fortitude are essential to the success of the organization – any person who crumbles and whines about such an inconsequential interaction is certainly not equal to those tasks or the people who handle them as routine.

Or consider, say, Adria Richards, who was so lacking in humor and grace that a random joking comment she overheard about “dongles” sent her into a tizzy that resulted in a family man and colleague losing his job. Richards was fired herself because her lack of character and discretion indicated that she is a liability to anyone who dares to employ her – no company needs the firestorm of hate she unleashed because she fancied herself a modern-day man-killing Joan of Arc, and no company can operate smoothly and effectively with employees who might, on a whim, ham-handedly betray the core mission of their business.

Or consider Jessica Valenti, whose video about how to talk to men about feminism included one actual suggestion (a poor one) and five excuses for failure. If I wanted to hire someone to succeed at a job, why in the name of the Blessed Vagina would I hire someone who is more than 80% focused on failure?

Or how about any woman who takes seriously the idea of Schrödinger’s Rapist: You may or may not be a man who would commit rape. I won’t know for sure unless you start sexually assaulting me. I can’t see inside your head, and I don’t know your intentions. If you expect me to trust you—to accept you at face value as a nice sort of guy—you are not only failing to respect my reasonable caution, you are being cavalier about my personal safety.

A woman who is so overwhelmed by her fears can be pitied, and protected, and maybe men should even cross the street to avoid her in order to spare her delicate feelings, but should she be hired for any sort of important, challenging position where she might face conflict, or have to make critical decisions under pressure? Would she excel as, say, a CEO when she sees every man she meets as a potential rapist first and an asset to her enterprise as a secondary concern, if at all? Would she even make a reliable housewife and mother when the idea of talking to a male pediatrician, or a lesbian teacher, freaks her out, because raaaayyype? Oh, yes – lesbians commit a lot of violence in their intimate relationships, and the sexual preferences of a random woman are not always obvious, so if you fear Schrödinger's Rapist, you'd better fear everyone.

Right or wrong, a man paralyzed with baseless fears (or even justifiable fear) is shunned as a worthless coward by women as well as men. If women are to be equal to men, then, women should be held to the same standards of courage and fortitude that women demand from men. As soon as those cowardly men are accepted as worthy men, so also should we be happy to coddle and accept cowardly women as worthy, too.

Or, how about a woman who was so frail and fragile that she demands that the messaging service Twitter make it even easier for her to report a tweet that she thinks might hint of a threat or misogyny? Such women exist, and we can and do spend billions of dollars to placate their fears, but are such women capable of excelling in areas of employment or achievement that involve danger, strife, or just modest unpleasantness? Clearly not, and such a woman is of marginal utility anywhere – even as an object of sexual desire – except perhaps in fetish communities or wymyn's studies departments, both arenas where submissive, fearful victim girls are prized.

A man or woman with even a modicum of intelligence and determination can find existing ways within Twitter to report violations such a threats – just go to the main page at twitter.com, hit "help", and then select "How to report violations." That's it – I found it in less than 5 seconds, and I've never even had a twitter account, or looked for the "report violations" option before writing this paragraph. A woman (or man) who is so lazy or inept at using technology that they need it streamlined for them is a poor candidate for any job at all, much less the difficult, dangerous jobs where men currently dominate.

Or, how about a man or woman who uses the intellectually flawed concept of "privilege" to silence individuals who happen to be members of certain social groups or classes that he or she hates? Silencing any one person based on their gender privileges is as stupid, wrong-headed and immoral as hiring them based solely on their race – skill, attitude, education, and aptitude are far better measures of worth. Someone who uses a perception of privilege as a bludgeon against an individual is a privilege bigot, and a privilege bigot is as ill-suited to leadership and trust as a racist. The worth of an idea should be evaluated on its own intrinsic merit and not the relative privilege, or lack thereof, of the person who presents the idea.

Or how about those who hold to the feminist notion of "patriarchy" itself – a notion that men have always dominated and oppressed women. The intense stupidity of the idea that women had no roll in establishing the putative patriarchal aspects of society is exceeded only in scabrous effect by the underlying message that women have never been worthy of seeking or holding equality with men. "Patriarchy theory" is nothing more than a pitiable excuse by self-proclaimed losers to explain why they are losers – in their reckoning it is not the faults and limitations of women, it is those mean old boys who are always at fault for the ills of society – even the men who die in the trenches of wars, or starve from poverty, or freeze to death from homelessness are still held culpable by patriarchy theorists whenever some woman breaks a nail.

Employing, trusting or otherwise promoting someone who uses the weak notion of "the patriarchy" to excuse their failings is folly.

The only thing I find contemptible about the strength of women is that some women – some feminists – do not have the strength to own their responsibility for their own shit.

They may have my pity, but not my respect.

Pwning men's human rights critics

Dean Esmay · 19 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We already featured this in our video section but we liked it so much we wanted to put it on the front page. If you haven't watched the above video yet, you really need to do so, and enjoy every minute of its glory.

Some hopelessly confused, fact-deprived dorks at CIActivist recently made one of the dumbest videos on men's human rights issues we've ever seen. After literally decades of this work, that is no small feat–it was genuinely impressive in its thundering stupidity and monumentally willful, Titanic ignorance. It was so dumb it was not even annoying, it was pretty much laugh-out-loud funny it was so stupid. CIActivist looked about as smart as the people in this parody video.

My own personal message to Ryjin Vander Hoek: as someone who fully supports the legalization of marijuana, I understand you're also a pro-legalization advocate. Great. Please keep doing that, it's insane that we put people in jail for pot. But I have to tell you: you need to lay off the bong, dude. Oh my God you were so stupid you literally made everyone watching your video dumber.

Wait, maybe I need to take it back and tell you to suck on the bong harder, because with critics like you we're only going to do better and better in our mission. And the truth is? You were better than our average critic. So you've got that going for you. Well done!

Anyway, the guys at Men's Rights Edmonton have put up the perfect response (see above) to your thunderingly clodfooted video. Since you unsurprisingly disabled all ratings and comment on your own silly video (and it wouldn't surprise me a bit if you eventually just plain remove your video critical of the Men's Human Rights Movement because you're so embarrassed by it), we'll invite you and anyone else who wants to comment on it here.

Oh, and to the Men's Rights Edmonton guys? Solidarity brothers, this is your finest work to date. You just keep getting better. More, more!

Update I would like to indulge myself with my own, much shorter, response to Ryjin Vander Hoek and most of our other critics:

Illinois DV laws closer to gender neutral

Paul Elam · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
On August 6, the Governor of the state of Illinois signed four new domestic violence laws into effect. What I looked for, and did not find, was misandry encoded into the new laws.

I am not a lawyer. If you need legal advice, hire a lawyer. I am offering here my lay opinion on four new laws passed in Illinois:

- HB 958 – defines domestic violence and escalates a second conviction to a felony.
- HB3379 – mandates that schools teach on dating violence and "age appropriate" sex education (amends health code)
- HB 3300 – mandates use of alternate paths of communication when the patient requests it and it's suspected to be domestic-violence related.
- HB 3236 – provides for education on dating violence in schools (amends school code)

Note that where the terms appear, the text does not say, "domestic violence against women" or "violence against women" but "domestic violence." It appears (in my non-lawyer opinion) to stick to a gender-neutral paradigm, at least on paper. I'd call this a successful step away from the woman-as-victim paradigm. I'm just block-quoting the relevant passages here, though; someone more fluent in legalese may shoot my theory all to bits.

HB 958

6 (720 ILCS 5/12-3.2) (from Ch. 38, par. 12-3.2)
7 Sec. 12-3.2. Domestic battery.
8 (a) A person commits domestic battery if he or she 9 knowingly without legal justification by any means:
10 (1) Causes bodily harm to any family or household
11 member;
12 (2) Makes physical contact of an insulting or provoking
13 nature with any family or household member.

HB3379

defines "Teen dating violence" in relation to training teens about health, family concerns, and sex-ed

11 "Teen dating violence" means either of the following:
12 (1) A pattern of behavior in which a person uses or 13 threatens to use physical, mental, or emotional abuse to 14 control another person who is in a dating relationship with 15 the person, where one or both persons are 13 to 19 years of 16 age.
17 (2) Behavior by which a person uses or threatens to use
18 sexual violence against another person who is in a dating 19 relationship with the person, where one or both persons are 20 13 to 19 years of age.

HB 3300

Sec. 355b. Claim-related information; alternative means of 17 communication.
18 (a) For the purposes of this Section, “claim-related 19 information” means all claim or billing information relating 20 specifically to an insured, subscriber, or person covered by an 21 individual or group policy of accident and health insurance
22 issued, delivered, amended, or renewed by a company doing
23 business in this State.
24 (b) A company that issues, delivers, amends, or renews an

HB3300 Enrolled – 6 – LRB098 07664 RPM 37737 b

1 individual or group policy of accident and health insurance on
2 or after the effective date of this amendatory Act of the 98th
3 General Assembly shall accommodate a reasonable request by a
4 person covered by a policy issued by the company to receive
5 communications of claim-related information from the company
6 by alternative means or at alternative locations if the person
7 clearly states that disclosure of all or part of the 8 information could endanger the person.
9 (c) If a child is covered by a policy issued by a company,
10 then the child’s parent or guardian may make a request to the 11 company pursuant to subsection (b) of this Section.
12 (d) A company may require (1) a person making a request
13 pursuant to subsection (b) of this Section to do so in writing,
14 (2) the request to contain a statement that disclosure of all
15 or part of the claim-related information to which the request
16 pertains could endanger the person or child, and (3) the 17 specification of an alternative address, telephone number, or 18 other method of contact.
19 (e) Except with the express consent of the person making a 20 request pursuant to subsection (b) of this Section, a company
21 may not disclose to the policyholder (1) the address, telephone 22 number, or any other personally identifying information of the 23 person who made the request or child for whose benefit a 24 request was made, (2) the nature of the health care services
25 provided, or (3) the name or address of the provider of the 26 health care services.

HB3300 Enrolled – 7 – LRB098 07664 RPM 37737 b

1 (f) A company that makes reasonable and good faith efforts
2 to comply with this Section shall not be subject to civil or 3 criminal liability on the grounds of noncompliance with this 4 Section.
5 (g) The Director shall adopt rules to guide companies in 6 guarding against the disclosure of the information protected
7 pursuant to this Section.

8 (h) Nothing in this Section shall prevent, hinder, or 9 otherwise affect the entry of an appropriate order made in the 10 best interests of a child by a court of competent jurisdiction
11 adjudicating disputed issues of child welfare or custody.

It does make mention of mandating post-mastectomy care in another section, but that's a different subject. It would be nice to also have, for instance, an equally valuable follow-up care after certain male urological procedures, but I don't know what the standard of care is, where it's stated, and actually it's a different rabbit trail.

HB 3236

(b) The Eradicate Domestic Violence Task Force shall do the 17 following:
18 (1) Conduct meetings to evaluate the effectiveness and 19 feasibility of statewide implementation of the curricula
20 of the Step Back Program at Oak Park and River Forest High 21 School, located in Cook County, Illinois, for the 22 prevention of domestic violence.
23 (2) Invite the testimony of and confer with experts on

HB3236 Enrolled – 2 – LRB098 10742 NHT 41087 b

1 relevant topics as needed.
2 (3) Propose content for integration into school
3 curricula aimed at preventing domestic violence.
4 (4) Propose a method of training facilitators on the 5 school curricula aimed at preventing domestic violence.

…

(d) The following underlying purposes should be liberally
5 construed by the task force convened under this Section:
6 (1) Recognize that, according to the Centers for 7 Disease Control and Prevention, National Intimate Partner
8 and Sexual Violence Survey, December 2010 Summary Report,
9 on average 24 people per minute are victims of rape,
10 physical violence, or stalking by an intimate partner in 11 the United States, equaling more than 12 million women and 12 men.

Thanks to @chicagoreport and @bernardchapin for spreading word that these passed.

[/box]

> @BernardChapin check out this article on Quinn signing new DV laws. http://t.co/M23bSXixUB
> — Chicago Crime Report (@chiraqreport) August 7, 2013

Shaming male High School students, Aussie style

Greg Canning · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Shaming Male High School Students: Aussie Style

This is a true story, it happened recently at a government high school in an Australian state capital city, and similar scenarios play out across the country on a regular basis.

Good morning class, today we have invited Ms. Hatesmenalot from the local Violence Against Women Service to host a discussion with you about "Healthy Relationships."

But first whilst you (pure pristine) girls stay in this room, we want all you (bad nasty) boys to move into the next room and we will all fill in this questionnaire highlighting the ways men abuse women in relationships. We will then meet together again to discuss your answers (shame the boys), how's that sound!

heterosexual relationships because of the clear recognition that most domestic violence occurs by men to women. Abusive behavior can occur in heterosexual or homosexual relationships and women can act abusively to men and other women in relationships.

Questionnaire

Is a man acting abusively if……	Tick the appropriate space.
	definitely abusive	maybe abusive	not abusive
He punches pushes or scares his partner?	I……I……I
He insults his partner?	I……I……I
He ignores his partner?	I……I……I
He gets really angry over small things?	I……I……I
He refuses to share housework or childcare?	I……I……I
He is jealous or possessive of her?	I……I……I
He doesn't like his partner seeing her family or friends?	I……I……I
He doesn't pay his fair share?	I……I……I
Is disrespectful of her possessions i.e. phone, car etc.?	I……I……I
Tells his partner what she can and can't wear?	I……I……I
He calls, messages, or inboxes his partner all the time?	I……I……I

You can see images of the survey here (CLICK HERE FOR ORIGINAL IMAGE)

Whilst reading the questionnaire may engender a feeling of disbelief, in reality this is just another example of the pervasive ideological feminist governance that saturates our education and social service systems, part of the ongoing narrative of gender stereotyping intended to shame and further marginalize our boys and young men.

Unlike the false and misleading disclaimer in the box at the top of the questionnaire "that most domestic violence occurs by men to women" the professional literature on dating violence in teens is clear:

In teen dating relationships females are as physically abusive or more physically abusive than males.

As Ms. Misogyny Gillard would say, let that sink in!

In teen dating relationships females are as physically abusive or more physically abusive than males.

The Australian National Crime Prevention Survey (2001) [1] reported on a sample of 5000 Australian teens. The key findings were that one in three females and males say they have experienced at least one type of physically violent behavior from a girlfriend or boyfriend – this includes children as young as 12. Although both boys and girls reported similar rates of victimization, girls were more likely to slap, kick or bite, compared to boys who were more likely to push, grab, shove, threaten, physically control and try to force their partner to have sex.

In 2008 renowned violence researcher Murray Straus published the results of the International Dating Violence Study (Dominance and symmetry in partner violence by male and female university students in 32 nations. Children and Youth Services Review 30 (2008) 252–275.) The key finding of this study was that that almost one-third of the female as well as male students reported physically assaulting a dating partner in the previous 12 months, and that the most frequent pattern was bidirectional, i.e., both were violent, followed by "female-only" violence. Violence by only the male partner was the least frequent pattern according to both male and female participants. For the Australian cohort the violence rate was 20% overall and of these cases, in 14 % of the violence was male only perpetrated, in 21% female only perpetrated and bidirectional in 65%.

Critically the paper concluded that prevention and treatment of partner violence (PV) could become more effective if the programs recognize that most PV is bidirectional and act on the high rate of perpetration by women and the fact that dominance by the female partner is as strongly related to PV as dominance by the male partner.

University of Georgia researcher Pamela Orpinas has overseen a large ongoing longitudinal study that found that nearly one in three middle and high school students who date say their relationships include violence. Girls were more likely to perpetrate violence than boys but were also more likely to be the victims of sexual violence or incur injuries.[2]

Several papers on Teen Dating Violence were presented at the recent American Psychological Association's annual convention.

A new study, by Michele Ybarra at the Centre for Innovative Public Health Research in San Clemente, reported on a survey of 1,058 young people aged 14 to 20. She found that 35 % of girls reported perpetrating abuse, 41 % said they were victims, and 29 % said they were both victims and perpetrators. For boys and men, the numbers were 29%, 37% and 24%, respectively. Females were more likely to say they were victims of sexual violence and perpetrators of physical violence. Males reported committing more sexual violence.

In another study of 635 students interviewed 5 times over 6 years from middle school to high school, Low and Espelage found that bullying at a younger age can increase dating violence among young Americans in later years. Those who reported higher levels of bullying in the earlier surveys were seven times more likely to report being physically violent in relationships at the conclusion of the study.

The remarkable thing about the research on partner abuse is the consistency of the findings of bi-directionality and gender symmetry of perpetration across the demographic spectrum. This had been confirmed as well by conclusions drawn from the largest domestic violence research data base?with summarizes some 1,700 peer-reviewed studies the Partner Abuse State of Knowledge project (PASK).

Returning to the Australian High School incident, the school at which the incident occurred (as indeed most Australian schools), gives a commitment to stamping out bullying and promoting an environment of equality and non-discrimination. They proudly promote a zero tolerance of bullying and link to the Australian Government Anti-Bullying Takeastandtogether website.

On the "Take a stand together website" you will find this definition of harassment:

"Harassment is behaviour that targets an individual or group that offends, humiliates, intimidates or creates a hostile environment. This could be because they belong to a specific race, religion, gender or gender-orientation group or have a disability, for example."

There is no doubt that some of the boys in the class felt targeted, offended and intimidated simply because of their male sex. Indeed when objections were voiced the hostility of the environment became clear, they were silenced, accused of being disruptive and threatened with disciplinary action.

The research on bullying and the approach to remedying it does not single out males because it is well known that females bully each other and males and vice versa, albeit that the preferred techniques differ. Boys being more likely to physically bully and girls more likely to emotionally bully. A link between bullying and partner violence has been established and the partner violence literature conclusively demonstrates gender symmetry in perpetration.

Given these facts why would a school allow gender ideologues to breach their own policies on non-discrimination by peddling false and counterproductive feminist propaganda to impressionable students? By doing so they not only breach their duty of care to their students male and female, but miss an important opportunity to significantly impact on actually reducing future incidents of partner violence.

Relationships are exactly that a 2 way street with give and take, regardless of whether they be family, work, school, dating or initiate relationships. Helping our young people negotiate the joys and pitfalls of relationships is a valid endeavor for our schools. But we do our girls no favors by suggesting to them that within dating and intimate relationships they represent passive individuals lacking in agency, simply waiting to be abused by a violent male, and instructing them as to best place to seek assistance if this prophecy comes to past – your local feminist violence against women service of course.

We do our boys no favors by falsely telling them that all relationship problems will be averted if they can simply control a mythical but supposedly ubiquitous tendency to abuse.

We do our future generations no favors by not alerting our boys and girls to the tyranny of false allegations of abuse, family breakdown, biased family law courts and parental alienation.

Of course this is exactly what the DV grievance industry wants, an ongoing source of female victims, ensuring ongoing funding for their services and ongoing employment for their graduate gender ideologues.

Until our boys and girls are treated as true individuals, in a sex and sexual orientation inclusive way, without gender profiling the partner abuse merry go round with continue to wreck it's havoc on all, just as planned.[3]

---

[1] National Crime Prevention 2001, Young people and domestic violence: national research on young people's attitudes to and experiences of domestic violence, Crime Prevention Branch, Commonwealth Attorney-General's Department, Canberra. As reported in the Australian Domestic Violence Clearinghouse Thematic Review 4 available at http://www.adfvc.unsw.edu.au/PDF%20files/Thematic%20Review_4.pdf

[2] *Dating Norms and Dating Violence Among Ninth Graders in Northeast Georgia : Reports From Student Surveys and Focus Groups?Patricia M. Reeves and Pamela Orpinas?J Interpers Violence 2012 27: 1677 originally published online 26 December

2011?DOI: 10.1177/0886260511430386 The online version of this article can be found at: http://jiv.sagepub.com/content/27/9/1677

[3] At the time of writing 2 written requests to the school for further information regarding the identity of the organization providing the "Healthy Relationships" instruction and a request for an interview had been ignored.

AVFM News and Activism: Terrence Popp

James Huff · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we have as our guest men and fathers rights activist Terrence Popp. Popp, a veteran of both Persian Gulf wars was, like so many servicemen, a victim of the family courts. After his own experience and observing what happened to his many fellow returning soldiers he decided to start Second Class Citizen. He, along with an outfit called Lightcraft Productions made some of the most poignant and moving videos in the manosphere the theme of which were usually, but not exclusively, centered around the plight of divorced military fathers. He has since gone on to host a you tube channel called Redonkulas.com which provides a more humorous perspective on gender issues.
Join us at 8pm Central Time.
SHOW PAGE
[/box]

“Why are you an MRA?”

Alex Hunt · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A feminist-identified partner of mine once asked me: “Why are you an MRA?”

A great number of answers fluttered before my eyes. I thought of my initial attraction to the Men’s Human Rights Movement (MHRM); the redressal of the legal inequalities facing me and my gender and that woman may compel us to support children we have no choice in having. I thought of mentioning the real red-pill moments; becoming aware of the sentencing disparity, of the meat-grinder that is family law, of my growing empathy for the oft-ignored male victims of sexual assault, of the sheer weight of men who die, or are killed, or take their own lives, and the callous manner that this is “business as normal”. I even thought of launching from how my own anti-feminist inclinations came into being.

I mentioned none of this. I simply said:

“Because the truth is sacred.

“Because you, dear heart, subscribe to an ideology that has taught you that you are victims of a vast, overarching conspiracy – or perhaps a condition. That your gender ‘had it worse’. And no, I’m afraid it is not an impersonal matter to me. Your ideology insists that my father, my gentle, good-natured, wise father, is an oppressor, a thug, a brutish, rutting beast, and my mother, strong, hard-nosed, and ever-cynical, is his victim. That is an insult I will not stand.”

But, in hindsight, I think I need to add to that.

Because feminism takes history, a subject I love and treasure, and takes a knife to it, carves and maims and circumcises it to feminism’s preferred shape and form, and sets it to walk the streets of public opinion, to tell us that the entirety of human history, women have been oppressed, by men, as slaves and serfs were oppressed by their owners. As free-associating trade unionists were oppressed by gangsters, SA men and the rich and powerful. As Kulaks and Chechens were herded into railway carts and sent to freeze in Siberia. Such was the oppression of women.

I do not seek to deny the unequal treatment of men and women in the past – or even the present. The past was a harsh, brutal foreign country. Merely that unequal treatment – especially when such inequality brutally maimed and killed men by the millions – does not constitute oppression of women alone. That calling such of societies where women were home-makers and baby-producers, and men were heavy-lifters and dog-soldiers, which churned through male bodies in their bloody-handed wars, their nascent industrialization, in the daily struggle to just survive, is an utter insult.

That to address the war dead, the maimed, the miners buried beneath the earth, the limb-ripped workers, the dead the sea will never give up, and every other hideous fate meted out – predominantly to men – in the name of keeping human society functioning, with the mewl of “Patriarchy hurts men too”, is as monstrous an insult to both truth and compassion as to fall beyond my capabilities of description.

Traditional society hurt men. Traditional society hurt women. Traditional society can stay in the harsh, foreign country where it belongs.

The core of the MHRM, of its human rights advocacy, of its essence, is a struggle for truth. It is a struggle for the truth of men’s humanity – that we are people, worthy of respect, worthy of compassion, worthy of trust. That we deserve to have our consent, and rights respected and protected by law and society, just as every woman does.

It is a fight for the acknowledgement of male victims of domestic violence, of sexual assault, of a murderous court-system, and more.

It is to strive, that it be recognized the difficulties, travails and problems that face men are worth time and attention.

That our worth is not in our utility. That our humanity is not negotiable. That we are more likely to be killed, more likely to be struck down by illness and injury, more likely to die on the job, more likely to kill ourselves, to be made homeless, to be made unemployed, to be compelled into supporting children we may have never wanted, or else never see due to the group psychopathy of family law practice.

It is land war in Asia against bad statistics, urban legend, and a gynocentric culture fueled by chivalry and the natural impulse to protect the weak. It is a campaign to move people from the easy, no-thought-required instinct logic of a pack animal to “protect the female!”, to a genuine, considered and rational egalitarianism, where attitudes, and policy, are shaped by the science and logic. Where unbiased enquiry into human behaviour is the norm, and debate is not shaped by a religious code of “female victim, male perpetrator”.

This is a battle for the truth. Truth in history. Truth about law. Truth regarding inequity and indignity forced upon men. Above all, it is a battle for the truth of the humanity of men.

Where's the money, Kristina?

Dean Esmay · 20 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Those of us who have in the past been trapped in the cycle of abuse often find ourselves unwittingly entering into relationships with abusers. Even those of us fairly well-educated on the matter sometimes fall for the tricks of a personality-disordered person when we really ought to have known better.

When Kristina Hansen (now apparently going by the name Kristina Mendez online) was elevated to the position of Senior Editor and Canadian News Director of A Voice for Men, I must admit I had some trepidation. Actually, it appears several people had reservations, although to be fair to Paul they were mostly only expressed in hindsight.

Although I considered Kristina a friend, her elevation seemed like a really quick and sudden move to me. But I had defended Kristina in the past from other things she'd said that I considered ill-worded but coming from the right place, and I always did believe she had her heart in the right place. "She's more a doer than a thinker" was my standard excuse for some of her (apparently) ill-considered words and behaviors. And hey, this is a team and Paul's the coach and that's all there is to it. (And yes, now the coach also knows he made a mistake–well every coach makes mistakes, even the mighty Ditka.)

Fast forward to earlier this year, and we got into an argument with Kristina; while we tried to make it abundantly clear that we don't agree with everything that comes out of everybody in the MRA and MGTOW community, and in fact strongly disagree with certain high-profile members of the community on various issues (which we have laid out in any number of articles and videos), we felt that some of the shaming language and confrontational tone she was using toward some of them was toxic to the mission and stated values of AVfM, which is to show compassion to men and boys who are hurt and damaged by our toxically misandrist culture.

We tried to negotiate something in good faith with her, and when she decided to open something called the Earl Silverman Center, even after we were agreed she would no longer officially affiliate with AVfM, we offered to give her full support, including free unpaid advertising and our endorsement for donations, for her supposed effort to start a shelter for abused men, without any more discussion of the editorial areas where we could not agree.

Our efforts to reconcile and simply agree that we had a difference of opinion on how to handle some of the more pungent opinions we sometimes see among some in the community (our goal is usually to avoid shaming language and rely on dialogue with those who have been wounded and hurt) went nowhere with Kristina. Our offers to continue to support her publicly with free advertising and privately with our own money so long as she got the Earl Silverman Center up and running went nowhere, even though we repeatedly offered to just agree to disagree.

Despite our best efforts at goodwill, she and her husband, Joel "Joe" Mendez (aka Iconografer on YouTube) went on what looked to us like a drunken and/or drug-addled rampage, with a barrage of hours-long video tirades over a period of a few days viciously attacking most of the AVfM community. She took most of the ranting, irrational videos offline (although at least one remained last I looked, and multiple people got copies of it all in case she did try to cover it up), and they have continued in the months since then with periodic outbursts of vicious attacks on AVfM and various members the men's community.

Still we said nothing much, as we waited to see what would happen with the Earl Silverman Center. As time went on we increasingly lost hope that she had the character, integrity, or even ability to open up a center to help abused men, and it started to look likely that even if she did open a center for men she would likely wind up abusing the people she was supposedly going to help, though we couldn't prove that. What seemed even more likely was that she might try to find some excuse to not go forward at all, likely putting the project "on hold" in some public way and then wait for everybody to go away and forget that she'd taken our money and made multiple promises, public and private, on the matter. But we couldn't prove she'd do that until she did it.

And then she did it.

People from AVfM who gave Kristina money for the Silverman Center include myself, Paul Elam, Peter Wright/Tawil, Dr. Greg Canning. AVfM moderator Kimski, members of Men's Rights Edmonton and some other individuals who we don't even know by name. In private conversation with me, wherein I was still trying to remain in some sort of friendly contact with Kristina, hoping beyond hope that she would become a responsible person, she confessed to me that since her vicious public attacks on AVfM she was now receiving donations from what she called "equity feminists." Even then, I thought, "Well, if the money's going to help men somehow, I guess that's good."

Some weeks ago I noticed she defriended me on Facebook and changed her name there to "Kristina Mendez." She also removed me from her Skype contacts, as her husband had some time previously. Subsequent checking also confirmed that she had deleted from her Facebook wall a conversation we had wherein I asked for an accounting for the money and the possibility of a refund or sending the money to another group, but she subjected me to obfuscating, evasive responses–now all lost, because I foolishly did not make copies.

Also while all this was going on, we have seen a continuing pattern of what Dr. Tara Palmatier calls DARVO: Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender behavior. She publicly acknowledged collecting over $6,000 from our community and continues to accept donations, yet continually attacks or blocks or ignores anyone who inquires about the money or what's being done with it.

Indeed, even though she gave me (and presumably others) personal promises that receipts would be issued for donations, and that there would be a full accounting of how the money would be spent, we have noticed that the pages of the Earl Silverman Center web site have been changed to state that they are not a non-profit, and that no receipts will be issued to anyone who donates–which was not ever stated when they were first accepting money from the men's rights community and which is directly contrary to what she explicitly stated to us.

And then in a recent series of public tweets (see below), she did what a lot of us suspected she would, and claimed the Silverman Center was "on hold" because she had personally more important things to do, and gave some sideways excuses about problems her friend Murray Pearson has with what she and he say are false allegations. Well they might be false allegations Kristina, and you may have other things going on (like being pregnant with a 5th child), but if you are not capable of going forward with the project then it is incumbent upon you to turn the project over to someone else who can move forward–there are multiple persons who could be found to do that in Canada, as you well know.

I might also mention here in passing that even though Kristina now refers to Murray as "co-founder" of the Earl Silverman Center, privately she told me repeatedly that Murray was not a person in authority in the center and had no control whatsoever over the money and he was merely an assistant. It's hard to know where the truth lies, but I thought I'd mention this in passing; my suspicion is that Murray Pearson is being used just like the rest of us have been used by Kristina, but I just don't know.

What I do know is that she has declared she has stalled the project to help abused men because it's inconvenient to her right now, and she absolutely refuses to give receipts or give any real accounting of where the money is… although, as we already know from this video (which she, astonishingly, has monetized on YouTube, still apparently taking in money from a dead man's legacy, a man she never knew), she at least got a van out of the deal so far:

(And yes we grabbed copies of that video too, in case she takes it down).

Where else has she put the money? She won't say, and just engages in DARVO for anyone who asks her for transparency.

Directly below this article you will find a number of screen shots showing some of her more hateful and outrageous public comments, along with documentation of what's been on the Earl Silverman Society web page recently.

So here's where we stand at A Voice for Men now:

[unordered_list style="arrow"]

- We fully and completely withdraw all support from the Earl Silverman Society/Center so long as Kristina Hansen/Mendez and her husband Joel Mendez are in any way involved in it;
- We demand a full public accounting of where all the money went that came from myself, Paul Elam, and other members of the men's rights community. Where's the money and what did you do with it Kristina?
- We demand that whatever monies that cannot be proven to have been directly expended on the project to date be turned over to an entity who can responsibly make use of it for its intended purposes;
- We urge all persons who gave any money at all to Kristina and her husband Joe to open the Earl Silverman Center to make reports to the appropriate legal and private authorities, including both your local and national police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Revenue Agency, your financial institution and, because she is or was at one time a welfare recipient, the Canadian welfare fraud office.

[/unordered_list]

Note that if you're in the US or Canada, you must file reports both with your local police and with Federal police, you can't just file with the Feds. Yes, if that means even if you don't live in Quebec, you file with your local police wherever you are anyway, in addition to the Canadian Feds. If you're in the US, you file with your local police, the FBI, and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as well as other Canadian authorities.

While Kristina, in true DARVO fashion, is highly likely to claim that all of this is a "doxxing" incident, the facts I can tell you are all public information:

She goes by both Kristina Hansen and Kristina Mendez.

She and her husband live in Ile Perrot, Quebec.

Any legitimate authority (police or credit card investigation company) who contacts me will also get her full address, phone number, and date of birth (as I have all this information but will not give it out publicly, to those other than legitimate legal authorities I will only give out what is publicly known about her on the public internet).

So to repeat, if you gave this person money, you need to:

[unordered_list style="bullet"]

- Contact your credit card company or bank and report possible fraud;
- Contact your local police (do not skip this step);
- Contact your national government police;
- Contact the Royal Canadian Mounted Police;
- Contact the Canadian Revenue Agency;
- Contact the Canadian Welfare Fraud Group.

[/unordered_list]

Since AVfM has an international audience we cannot know every country she may have gotten money from, but, here are appropriate link resources that our US, Canadian, Australian, and UK readers can use, and if people wish to share links to who they can also reach in other countries here in the comments, that would be appreciated.

I'm done myself playing nice. Hansen-Mendez needs to give a full and complete accounting for every penny she spent or we can safely presume she collected that money under false pretenses for her own personal use, buying a car and goodness knows what else. Legal authorities should be notified and should be urged to investigate. I will, again, provide not just the information I have given here but her complete street address, phone number, and date of birth to any legitimate authority who requests it.

Agencies you should open inquiries with: First off start with your bank and/or credit card company, whatever you used to donate to her. Then:

In Canada:

Canadian Revenue Agency:
http://www.cra-arc.gc.ca/gncy/nvstgtns/lds/menu-eng.html

Canadian welfare fraud group:
http://www.mcss.gov.on.ca/en/mcss/programs/social/fraud.aspx

Royal Canadian Mounted Police anti-fraud center:
http://www.antifraudcentre-centreantifraude.ca/english/reportit_howtoreportfraud.html

If you are Canadian and you gave money you will also need to contact your local police. Please do not skip the step of informing your local police–even if you don't live in Quebec, the RCMP likely will do nothing without a local police report anyway. Just let the local police know you've also filed with RCMP, or, file with the local police and then tell the RCMP you filed with your local police.

In the USA:

If you are in the United States, you need to contact both the FBI and your local police, as well as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police:

Federal Bureau of Investigation internet crime reporting:
http://www.ic3.gov/default.aspx

Once again, you must also contact your local police and let them know you've also reported to the FBI.

I do not know where to start in the UK or Australia but I suspect it follows a similar trajectory; contact the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Revenue Agency, and the Canadian Welfare Fraud group mentioned above. Also, your credit card or bank. And then also use these links as a starting point for getting your own legal authorities involved:

UK:
http://www.actionfraud.police.uk/

Australia:
http://www.afp.gov.au/policing/cybercrime/internet-fraud-and-scams.aspx

My reports have already been filed. I encourage anyone else who gave Hansen/Mendez any money at all to report to all the above that are relevant to Canada and your own home country.

I expect much screaming from Kristina and her cronies that she's been "doxxed" (she's a liar, no she hasn't, every bit of this is public information) or that she's being somehow legally harassed (bullshit, she collected money for specific purposes, then changed the rules after the fact and now refuses to account for thousands she took from this community).

Below, again, are some screen shots if you have any questions about whether anything I've said here is public information, or if you suspect I'm exaggerating in any way.

This can all stop of course: Hansen can just return the money and/or provide clear public transparency and turn it over to a legitimate entity who will do what Earl would want done in his name: spend it on efforts to help men and boys. Not buy personal vehicles and sit around making excuses for inaction.

Harry Woodape
@WoolyBumblebee @eseldbosustow you should account for the money you collected for ESC and refund to those that donated, Kristina.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@HWoodape @eseldbosustow That man just loves the drama. I am not playing his game. Only scammers think everyone else is out to scam others.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @HWoodape This is exactly why no one takes MRAs seriously. Bitter people.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@eseldbosustow @HWoodape Which is why I am fed-up with the on-line MRM community. They just knee-jerk way too much.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @HWoodape They're basically the KKK for gender issues. "Race war", "gender war", they're the only ones actually at war.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@eseldbosustow @HWoodape MEH! We (Murray and I) have our reasons for needing to put the center on hold right now. They just want drama.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @hwoodape They always want drama. They should ask for money back from Elam. I don't need donations to blog, why does he?
Home
Connect Discover Me
The Wooly Bumblebee
Following

ESC, it's just on hold for a while due to some personal issues on both my & Murray's ends.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@HWoodape @eseldbosustow Love the way Paul jumped to conclusions when I clearly NEVER said the ESC was finished, but only on hold. LOL!!
The Wooly Bumblebee
@HWoodape @eseldbosustow That man just loves the drama. I am not playing his game. Only scammers think everyone else is out to scam others.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @HWoodape I'm a feminist and I've donated for men's issues, you big baby. MRAs don't have a monopoly on caring about men.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @HWoodape This is exactly why no one takes MRAs seriously. Bitter people.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@HWoodape @eseldbosustow Think about it. If I were scamming people, would I announce that I was running off with the money publically? ROFL!
The Wooly Bumblebee
@eseldbosustow @HWoodape Which is why I am fed-up with the on-line MRM community. They just knee-jerk way too much.
Eseld
@WoolyBumblebee @HWoodape They're basically the KKK for gender issues. "Race war", "gender war", they're the only ones actually at war.
The Wooly Bumblebee
@eseldbosustow @HWoodape MEH! We (Murray and I)

Mens Rights Montreal

Home | Members | Sponsors | Photos | Discussions | More | Join us!

L'Ile-Perrot, QC
Founded Mar 21, 2013

About us...

Mens Rights Supporters 18
Group reviews 1
Past Meetups 6
Our calendar

We're about:
Men's Health · Men's Social Networking · Family Law · Being a Man · Men's Rights · Empowerment for Men ·

BACK TO ALL PHOTO ALBUMS

Meetup Group Photo Album

2 of 2 | PLAY SLIDESHOW | ALL SIZES

1 of 1 pages

See all photos »

Our calendar

We're about:
Men's Health · Men's Social Networking · Family Law · Being a Man · Men's Rights · Empowerment for Men · Men's Group · Men's Support Groups · Masculinity · Child Support Reform · Men's Issues · Child Visitation · Family Court Unfair Rulings · Male

Organizers:
Kristina Hansen, joel mendez, Murray Pearson

Contact

Our Sponsors

A Voice for Men
Support, Educational Resources

People in this Meetup are also in:

See all photos »

SHARE

In this photo:
There are no tags for this photo

Added by Kristina Hansen on May 24, 2013.

Want to comment on this photo?

Sign in, if you're already a member of this group or Join Mens Rights Montreal

Other photo albums

Bumblebee Report

men who had been domestically abused in Calgary, Alberta. The Men's Alternative Safe house, otherwise known as MASH4077, had never been granted any government funding, even after numerous attempts by Earl to file for funding, because the government refused to recognize that there was a need for such a shelter.

Earl decided to fund MASH4077 by himself with his own finances, as well as meager private donations. He worked on the MASH4077 project from 2003 and ran the shelter for 3 years out of his own home with private rooms and beds which accommodated the men who sought refuge from domestic violence.

In March of 2013, after only three years, MASH4077 was forced to close because of the lack of funding. Earl was forced to sell his home, and on the 26th of April, 2013 Earl suddenly, and without warning, took his own life.

Earl was a pioneer and had dedicated over 20 years of his life to helping male victims of domestic abuse. His death will not be in vain as we, the members of Men's Rights Montreal have decided to take up the flag that Earl has left behind and create the Earl Silverman Center for make victims of domestic abuse here in Montreal in his honor.

Our first goal is to raise $5000.00 (Goal reached in June 2013) which we will use in order to file for non-profit status, set up a temporary head office, printing materials and other promotional items, and for locating an appropriate property for the center.

Donate

Where your donations go.

View Larger Map

For men who experience domestic violence

Home | Donate | Join the journey | Get Involved | Who We Are | Photo Gallery | Videos | News

Donations - 2013

We have raised a total of $6909.23 CAD to date for the ESC. Thank you to all those who have kindly donated to this great cause.

Your donations will be used for various ESC expenses such as:

- Government NFP and grant application fees/associated expenses
- Transportation costs and related expenses
- Promotional and informational costs
- Website maintenance and site hosting services
- Office supplies, printing services, mailing supplies, etc...
- Miscellanious expenses related to the ESC

With your help we are able to move that much closer to realizing our goal of opening the ESC by the fall of 2014.

If you have any questions regarding our financials, please feel free to contact our treasurer any time.

Thank you.
Joel Mendez – ESC Treasurer

EarlSilvermanCenter– 2013

I am writing to you in the hopes that you may be able to offer some advice and possibly assist our organization.

We are currently in the process of opening a center for male victims of domestic violence in Montreal - www.earlsivermancenter.org

As we are new to the process of opening a service such as this for men, we would like to ask if we could speak with someone from Maison Oxygene about setting up a domestic violence shelter for men and how to obtain government funding, as well as public support.

We need all the help we can get, and we admire all the work that Maison Oxygene has done in Quebec for men. We feel your services are very important to men and their children, and we would love it if you could share some of your expertise with us as we begin our journey towards opening the Earl Silverman Center.

Please feel free to contact me any time via e-mail about our project. We look forward to hearing from you soon.

Thank you

Kristina Hansen
A Voice for Men - Canadian News Director / Senior Editor
Founder - Earl Silverman Center Montreal

To visit Maison Oxygene's website: http://www.maisonoxygene.com

Update – 5/3/2013

Posted by webbee on May 3, 2013 at 5:55 PM

comments (2)

Morray, our co-founder, has been working tirelessley for the Center this week. He has designed the new logo which is now featured on our site header, as well as in the photo gallery if you would like to see a larger version of it.
He has also been working on getting lawyers to volunteer their time for the Center as we need advice on the opening of the Center, as well as getting at least one family law lawyer to volunteer their time for our clients if they should require any legal representation when they come to

For men who experience domestic violence

Home | Donate | Join the journey | Get Involved | Who We Are | Photo Gallery | Videos | News

Coming soon.

Mens Rights Montreal
Meetup
Join Us!

EarlSilvermanCenter- 2013

For men who experience domestic violence

Home | Donate | Join the journey | Get Involved | Who We Are | Photo Gallery | Videos | News

Kristina Hansen – Founder

Murray Pearson – Co-founder, Spokesperson and Events Coordinator

Joel Mendez – Board of Directors, Treasurer and Senior Editor

EarlSilvermanCenter– 2013

For men who experience domestic violence

Home | Donate | Join the journey | Get Involved | Who We Are | Photo Gallery | Videos | News

Photo Gallery

Sign In or Register to add photos

Search Photos...

0 Albums

Recently Added | Most Commented

No Albums Found.

EarlSilvermanCenter– 2013

Update* Please note that any donations you did send would have been on or after April 29th 2013, and would have gone to something marked as "Hansen Soap Company," which Hansen at the time claimed was just a temporarily holding account for the to-be-created non-profit that she also promised to issue receipts for. –DE

MHRM calling the world

Paul Elam · 21 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Hello everyone. I just wanted to give you a brief update on some significant events and to make an appeal to all MHRAs internationally. In a few hours I am boarding a plane for New York to tape a segment of ABC News 20/20. Word has it that the episode should air within a couple of weeks. Also, and about the same time, a very lengthy feature article on the MHRM and AVFM will be in Newsweek Magazine and their online publication The Daily Beast.

What this means is that over the next few weeks that tens of millions of people who have never been exposed to AVFM or the MHRM will hear about us. We are making preparations for that behind the scenes as I write this.

More relevant to the title of this post is that in September I will be going to San Francisco to start filming on the documentary about AVFM and the MHRM, another potentially massive source of exposure for us.

In my recent communications with the movie's director, the idea was brought up of including MHRAs from across the globe via skype or other video platform, so that more of the voices that comprise our movement can be heard. The idea was an instant "no-brainer." Of course we need more than just Americans and a few Canadians.

I cannot urge you strongly enough to participate. Whether you are from Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom, other parts of Europe (yeah, Kimski, YOU, LOL) India, South Korea, Japan, Ecuador or other points on the globe, this is your chance to be a part of something historic and vitally important to this movement.

We suggest that you have skype (an HD camera is nice but not necessary) and a willingness to tell your story, anonymously if you prefer, to let people know the whys and whens and hows on your red pill journey.

If you have always wanted to see the MHRM gain a lot more traction, you can now not only watch it happen, you can play a vital role in making it happen.

Shoot me (figuratively, Futrelle, figuratively) an email to paul@avoiceformen.com and let us know you want to join us and I will make sure it goes directly to the production company. Be sure to tell me where you are from!

This is clearly an international movement and this documentary will not be complete unless it reflects the stories of those involved from across all international lines.

[/box]

Pictures of National Meet of Indian MHRAs

Anil Kumar · 21 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Indian Men's Rights Movement had a good start in 2004. (Note: See AVfM's message of support and solidarity here–DE) We never wanted to centralize it into one organization. We made it mandatory for men's rights activists in every city to start their own NGOs. As a result, today there are more than 40 men's rights NGOs in India. In Bangalore itself, there are 7 men's rights NGOs. The central theme of most of these men's rights NGOs is the support group meetings, which almost always focus on supporting men going through marital problems, courts case or facing domestic violence. The value that a man often gets by attending these support group meetings is immense. He gets clarity, peace and learns laws, which actually cuts his lawyer fees in half. The fundamental principle of Indian Men's Movement is, "No matter what happens to you or your life, enjoy life; enjoy every moment of it".

Today, Indian MRAs are actually among some of the happiest people in India. The bad circumstances of life have no impact at all on them. That is what is reflected in the annual National Meets that Indian MRAs conduct every year.

This year, 114 MRAs from all corners of India converged at a resort at Pench National Park, to attend the Men's Rights National Meet. This national park is actually a tiger reserve with at least two dozen Bengal tigers roaming in this forest. In the day time, they had hectic schedule of presentations and in the evenings they danced and partied together.

Most guys met each other for the first time, though they have known each other through social media. The presentations this year focused on a variety of topics from lobbying at parliament, future of the movement to topics like, how to manage your own fear. On the first day, MRAs from different cities shared their success stories. Most of them wore Men's Rights T-Shirts.

Fifth National Conference
[image]
Happy MRAs
[image]
Lunch time
[image]
MRAs from different cities meet again
[image]
Party Time
[image]
The Dias
[image]
Well Known Fathers Rights Activists
[image]

Well Known Old Timers

Where does the truth lie?

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 21 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

According to the CBC, two men charged with child porn were in court last Thursday, four months after the death of Rehtaeh Parsons. One 18-year-old man faces two counts of distributing child pornography, while another 18-year-old man faces charges of making and distributing child pornography.

According to Rehtaeh's parents, the teenager was gang-raped at a house party by four boys. An online petition was launched demanding that the case revolving around these allegations be reopened. The RCMP said earlier this year that they looked into the allegations of sexual assault and an inappropriate photo but after consulting with the province's Public Prosecution Service, they concluded there weren't enough grounds to lay charges.

Friends of the alleged suspects launched a poster campaign defending the boys, which sparked a public outcry. The Facebook site by one of the supporters has since been closed down.

A week after Rehtaeh's death, police reopened their probe with a new team of investigators, saying they received new and credible information from someone who was willing to co-operate.

The Nova Scotia Public Prosecution Service said Thursday evening that Ontario's Ministry of the Attorney General was asked to get involved in the case at the time it was reopened.

Spokeswoman Chris Hansen said because Nova Scotia's prosecution service provided advice to police during the initial investigation, it asked Ontario Crown attorneys to take over to avoid any "real or perceived" conflict. Hansen said the Ontario ministry would now assume the prosecution of the two teens charged.

After all the public outrage and calls for vigilantism this case has sparked, there are still some unanswered questions:

- First of all, what is this "new credible information" and where is it coming from?
- Why do I get the feeling these charges are nothing more than a political cop-out meant to appease the demands of a bloodthirsty public?
- Remember when people are declaring with no uncertainty that she was gang-raped by four boys?
- Now they still don't have grounds to file rape charges, and what about the other two alleged boys that were supposedly involved?
- Why do the stories keep changing?
- Why are there only two boys being charged with child porn, when it was initially reported that four were involved in a gang-rape?
- How come the RCMP didn't have grounds to lay charges for child pornography until now?
- If these pictures supposedly went "viral on the internet, as was reported multiple times, how is it that there could be no traces of it at all, when you can still find pictures of Amanda Todd – the young girl who also killed herself and became an unwitting martyr for the "rape culture" movement?

Certainly, if an inappropriate photo were distributed without the victim's consent, the offenders should be punished. However, I question the morality of labeling two young men as "child pornographers" when they were minors themselves when this allegedly took place. Why does this feel like a trumped-up charge? In the aftermath of Rehateh's death, the media did an impeccable job of making an angel out of the alleged victim, while vilifying the alleged offenders who still weren't even yet identified. Pictures of Rehtaeh Parsons allegedly smoking cannabis are still online. When Rehtaeh passed, her mother went on her daughter's social media accounts and deleted things off her wall – including posts and pictures about coke, mdma, and e (ecstasy). There was even allegedly a video of her snorting lines of coke.

Certainly, there is a lot of reasonable doubt surrounding the credibility of these rape allegations. If these offenders are to be condemned, let it be for something real.

The toddler wage gap erased

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 21 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most cherished beliefs of feminists is that women get paid less than men for doing the exact same job and that's because the whole world hates women and thinks they're stupid and worthless. It's called the "wage gap".

The very first clue that the wage gap is complete and utter bullshit lies in the logic of capitalism itself. If any given industry could pay women less than men for doing the exact same job, THEY WOULD ONLY HIRE WOMEN! Think about this way: if you were in the business of making packing tape, and you could buy the exact same adhesive for 10% less from supplier A than supplier B, which supplier would you buy from?

In arguing for a wage gap, feminists are in effect saying that businesses are choosing to pay more for labor because…. why? It makes no sense. I suppose you could attempt an argument that business hates women so much it is willing to forgo profit for the simple pleasures of misogyny, but that is even more pathetic. Business doesn't care about ideological bullshit.

Profit or die. It's that simple.

Why do men make more money than women, even in the same occupational categories?

- They work longer hours
- They get more advanced training
- They are more likely to specialize

Nursing is a great example. A traditionally feminine occupation, the super highly specialized, technically complex and very well remunerated positions are going to men. Ergo, male nurses make more than female ones. Not because: sexism but because: TRAINING, SKILL AND HOURS WORKED.

Men work more paid hours than women – full stop – end of fucking story. For all OECD countries collectively, men work 309 216 hours per year, while women are putting in 243 311 hours per year. In just the G7, men are pulling 184 733 hours while women clock in at 155 285.

Okay, so the OECD data was a bit more complex that I realized. Rather than tease out the methodology, how about we rely on the United States Census Bureau to give us some data on how many hours men and women work?

[image]

It appears that on average, NO men work less than 40 hours a week, and on average no women work MORE than 40 hours a week.

[image]

There are more men working than women, and that has been the case since at least 1967.

[image]

And lo and behold, men tend to earn more money than women.

It's fraudulent to report only that men earn more than women without also reporting that men work more hours than women. If the "wage gap" is going to be a topic of conversation, than the "time gap" should be discussed right alongside it, no?

Even doing the exact same job at the exact same rate of pay, men will earn more than women simply because they work more. There are lots of reasons women don't work as many hours as men, but whatever spin you want to put on it, the simple fact that women work fewer hours at paid labor than men remains.

There is no wage gap.

Jon Gunnarson gives it a more thorough treatment here, if you are interested.

Women also tend to work at cushy, indoor, pansy-assed occupations that require little in the way of effort or physical exertion. Those nasty, dirty, outdoor, dangerous jobs? Yeah, they tend to be filled by men. Who get paid to take on the dirty work.

The Ten Most Dangerous Jobs in 2013:

10.	Taxi drivers	(85.6% men)
9.	Electrical power line installers	(99.6% men)
8.	Truck drivers	(95.4% men)
7.	Farmers	(76.5% men)
6.	Structural/Iron and Steel workers	(97.3% men)
5.	Roofers	(99% men)
4.	Recycling collectors	(92.1% men)
3.	Aircraft pilots	(94.8% men)
2.	Logging workers	(76.5% men)
1.	Fishing	(76.5% men)

Note: This 2010 census report lumps fishing, farming and logging all into one category. Even so, it is overwhelmingly men who work in these occupations.

And just for shits and giggles, what do women do?

- 71% of all waitstaff are women
- 89% of all maids and housekeepers are women
- 91% of all hairdressers and cosmetologists are women
- 92% of all billing and posting clerks are women
- 90% of all bookkeeping and accounting clerks are women
- 90% of all time keeping and payroll clerks are women
- 92% of all receptionists are women
- 96% of all secretaries are women
- 97% of all preschool teachers are women
- 98% of all dental hygienists are women

So, basically, women serve food, clean up, keep organized, look after small children and tell everyone to remember to floss! Yay! Good job ladies. I'm so glad we spent our GDP on educating women to do shit they would be doing anyways. Except for their own families.

Does any of this come as a surprise to anyone at all? Men work longer, harder and in more dangerous occupations than women do, and for this they are rewarded, as they should be. And it turns out that the same conditions apply even in childhood! Boys get the crappy, yucky, dirty jobs and girls get the soft, cushy, easy jobs and guess who gets a bigger allowance?

Boys have to take out the garbage (Ew! Gross!), mow the lawn and shovel the driveway. Girls fold the laundry and unload the dishwasher. I have a super awesome dishwasher with a turbo setting so that little blade thingy that sprays water will spin like mad, but I have yet to experience any injury from unloading the dishwasher. It's so safe, I let the baby help!

The little blade thingy that spins and cuts the grass underneath the lawnmower is a little more efficient at removing wayward limbs:

> In a multicenter study of pediatric lawn-mower injuries (push or riding gas-powered machines), we reviewed 144 children at an average age of injury of 7.0 years; 77% were boys. Amputations occurred in 67 children; 63 were unilateral and four bilateral; the most common level was the toes (63%). Blood transfusions were given to 35 children.

You shouldn't pay boys more than girls when they run the risk of amputation?

Fuck you, Soraya.

In fact, I think I'm gonna pay my son NOT to mow the lawn. I don't want him to get used to the idea that his life is worth less than my girls. Because that is essentially what Soraya is saying. NOT that girls should be given the shit work. Oh, no. That will never do.

> The bad news is that gender inequities in lifetime wages and time allocation have roots in how we reward children for work they do at home. Childhood scripts continue to lay the groundwork for making domestic work less valued, for prioritizing men's careers over women's, for a persistent workforce sex segregation, and for an enduring wage gap. All because of who dries the dishes and takes out the trash.

Nope. Girls should be paid the same as boys no matter what the chores, so we can go on teaching boys that their lives are essentially disposable, their bodies are tools we can all use and that bullshit jobs like folding towels are equally worthwhile.

You know what happens if you don't cut the grass? Your house is overtaken by weeds and eventually the natural landscape will take over and engulf your house, break the foundations and make it impossible for you to inhabit it. The World Without Us lays it all out. It's a fascinating book!

You know what happens if you don't fold the towels?

Not one fucking thing!

Trust me.

Lots of love,

JB

The Voice of Europe: Tabloid feminism

Lucian Vâlsan · 22 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

On August 23, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista, and whoever shall call in will be pointing their fingers at feminists and feminism and laugh at them, ridicule them and mock their cult-leaning belief system.

Whilst we contend that feminism is no joke (unfortunately), we also think that we should also have fun. And what moment could be better than this episode, when we reach the milestone of 20 episodes broadcasted in over 5 months and in a day in which women in Eastern Europe were gathered and fed with feminist propaganda back in the days before 1989.

We will make jokes about feminism and point out to stupid and batshit crazy stuff that feminists say.

So, we're basically celebrating live and we plan to have a lot of fun with our listeners. So please, feel free to join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, and join the party. A few jokes about feminism are required.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

For the listeners in Australia, this means August 24, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

MRAs: be quiet, be more polite

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently, the issues addressed by the men's rights movement are legitimate issues.

The rate of workplace death – somewhere around 93 percent male – is a real issue. The rate of male suicide – where 4 out of 5 who die by their own hand are men – that's real, too. The overwhelming majority of the homeless who are male – real. The fact that men are sentenced more harshly in the criminal courts, and that fathers are grossly mistreated and abused by the family courts – real. And indirectly, children mistreated by those same family courts, who are denying them healthy relationships with their fathers, is a real issue as well.

These are real issues – and feminists have even deigned to acknowledge that they are real issues. I'm not being sarcastic at all.

There are also a few issues not agreed on by the self-appointed public arbiters of truth or fiction, those gender ideologues calling themselves "feminist" and claiming that all they ever wanted was equality, that most slippery of political goals.

Consider routine male infant genital mutilation – that's not a real issue, apparently. Never mind that hundreds of children die every year from the shock and trauma of having the most sensitive part of their anatomy severed with no anaesthetic, and that the practice was normalized specifically to desensitize the sexual organs of boys by a medical quack in the 19th century. In spite of the fact that the sexual mutilation of girls is almost universally condemned – doing the exact same things to infant boys is no problem, and as an ongoing outrage and abomination – it's not a real issue, and those objecting should sit down, shut up, and stop whining. Stop whining already.

Similarly, just as feminists and other fascists agree that mutilating male infants is routine but don't see any particular problem with the continuation of the practice – men and boys are increasingly disenfranchised by the education system. Female graduation outcomes account for more than 65% of all graduation from institutions of higher education. This is not debated by feminists, but rather than recognizing the growing inequality produced by a systematically biased education system, they celebrate this as a positive outcome. Feminism is all about equality, and if feminist policies in education produce a growing inequality, then obviously, we need more feminism – to – ah, fix the problem.

Human rights activists who might become angry when their brothers, sons, fathers and friends are systematically marginalized by all this, ahem, equality, should pipe down, don't get so angry, be more polite, wait your turn, and can you just be quiet, because the feminists are busy taking care of your issues, or they would be, if only you'd be silent, go away, and stop inconveniencing them by illuminating the human damage their policies produce.

The sadists informing public policy don't like it when you point out that they are sadists.

But the fact is that the men and women in the men's rights movement recognize human harm done directly to men and boys, and harm done indirectly to women and girls by feminist driven policies, are outraged by the decades of fucking indifference from the public when this human damage is pointed out.

Ill say that again. The human damage produced in full knowledge by feminist driven domestic policy is met with almost total indifference. It has been the case for decades, and those of us who actually give a shit about addressing these problems are just a little bit goddamn tired of that indifference.

Out of every 100 suicides, 80 are male. Oh well, yawn, who cares. Oh yeah, and in a world where men die earlier, when men kill themselves more, when men die violent deaths more than anybody else, where men comprise the majority of the homeless, and are increasingly disenfranchised by the education system – we are treated to an apparently never-ending narrative about how the whole world is a male-advantaging patriarchy in which being male means getting a cruise through life with the difficulty setting at easy.

Well, that's not really all of it, even. There's also rape culture. That's a populist narrative in which it is claimed that the rape of women and girls is a central feature of our culture. It is claimed that the rape of women and girls is normalized, that we are socialized to accept rape as if it is acceptable.

However, the reality is that rape has no sex, and that if we are to throw out the politicized definition in most dictionaries and look only at violent sexual victimization – it's men and boys who are the predominant victims across our culture. This is not to suggest that women don't get raped, and that they are not also victimized, but we are living in a culture where the rape of men and boys, while it occurs with greater frequency, has been defined in the dictionary to not exist. It happens in the real world, but the dictionary says that's not rape, and besides – boys raped by their teachers are lucky to get some – because they don't get to say no, they are sex machines, not human beings, and certainly not children sexually abused by those they should have been able to trust.

Yeah, this rape culture is one where only the rape of women is treated as acceptable.

And for those of us who recognize the humanity of more human beings than just the members of our culture's leisure caste – when faced with indifference at human harm, and sometimes the sadistic glee flaunted by abusers, sociopaths, criminals, and gender ideologues with political power – we get a little bit angry.

That's not quite fair. We don't get a little bit angry at the injustice, abuse, indifference, and the gleeful sadistic mockery and scorn heaped those most wounded, who are silenced by the prevailing zeitgeist – it is deserving of a deep and white hot rage which drives any real human rights movement.

But what we keep hearing is that, oh yes, the issues of this movement are real and legitimate*, oh yes*. But we're too angry. In fact, if only we weren't so angry, if only we weren't so loud, then they – those people who have deigned to acknowledge that the concerns of the movement are real – they would have been willing to address these issues, if only we were less angry, not so loud and not so insistent. In fact, if men's human rights advocates would just be polite, just be quiet, and just learn to shut up and sit down, feminists would be solving the problem's we've been so vocal about. So seriously guys, why can't you just be quiet and go away – because honestly, you're really holding the whole class back.

That's the message. It's a bargain, isn't it? Just be quiet and go away, and feminists will solve the problems we've been talking, or in some cases, shouting about. The issues are real, so say even the feminists, but doggone it, those darned MRAs are so angry and nasty – they're the ones stopping anyone from addressing issues like 80% of suicides who are male or the fact that 90% of the homeless are men.

If only MRAs weren't so loud, obnoxious and angry, these problems would be solved. Well, that's the bargain being offered.

Time for a reality check.

MRAs were polite. Men's human rights activists were polite, and did not express their anger, and played by the rules for decades. Oh yes, this movement is over a century old, and for most of that time, almost all the principal activists and writers within the movement stuck strictly to the facts, keep their tone civil, and hardly offended or upset anyone.

And you know how much notice anybody took of the issues, such as suicide, homelessness, joblessness, predatory and corrupt courts, violent death and so on?

The public took no notice whatsoever. Oh yes, the issues addressed by the men's rights movement are real, and we'll get right on that – hey, look – The Real Housewives of Las Vegas is on, oooooh shiny bullshit on my TV screen.

If the violent deaths of women were treated with the same total contempt and disinterest that the deaths of men and boys earn, there would be not feminists, but actual female rights organizations executing public officials in the town square, and putting whole cities to the torch.

However, the bargain being offered now is that if only we would just politely quiet down, fold our hands in our laps and go obediently away – well, by golly, all the issues we're so inappropriately angry about would be solved almost right away.

And like just about everything else from the propaganda machine of the cult of hate and human damage calling itself feminism, this is a fraud. What they're really saying when they tell us we're too loud, and too angry, is that it would be awfully nice if we would just shut up, and go back to quietly and conveniently killing ourselves, or dying on the job of keeping everything else running for the benefit of the members of the leisure caste.

Get back to work for the benefit of those who disregard the humanity of men in preference for the utility of men. Go back to quietly and conveniently absorbing and dispensing violence for the benefit of your social betters. And when you're broken beyond your continued utility to the leisure caste of our society, kindly be so good as to quietly and uncomplainingly kill yourself, so nobody who matters is troubled by the unsightly spectacle of a human being in pain.

That is the bargain being offered by those who say, in public, or in print, that the anger demonstrated by this human rights movement is inappropriate and counter productive, and that we should all just be more polite.

Here's the counter offer.

To those acknowledging the reality of this movement's complaints, workplace death, infant mutilation, corrupt courts, a systematic and abusive bias in the education system: Keep telling us to be quiet and polite. We'll come for each of you. And we'll target you with the spotlight, and put your indifference and contempt for the suffering of human beings on public display. Because we recognize that what you're trying to do is coerce men to go quietly to their deaths, for your own convenience. We recognize that you know your continued exploitation of the disposability of human beings other than yourself is what you fear losing. We also know that without this movement, without the public discomfort created by a loud, angry and in many cases obnoxious men's rights movement, what you'd have instead would be the redress of these grievances in the oldest and most basic format used by upright apes through the history of the human species.

Honey Badger Radio: A Witch Hunt in Atheism?

James Huff · 22 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

The people of Salem, Massachusetts in the 1600s lived in a culture that accepted the existence of the devil, assorted demons and other evil spirits, including witches, and which encouraged them to blame all misfortune and conflict in the community on these supernatural causes.

The people of the modern day West live in a culture that largely accepts the existence the Patriarchy, Rape Culture, and Cultural Misogyny, and which encourages them to blame all misfortune and conflict in the community–from rape to domestic violence to the pay gap to male-only conscription–on these ethereal and unfalsifiable "social constructs".

The Salem witch trials began with accusations against an opposing camp–a rival family in the community engaged in a long-standing feud with the family of the accused.

The flurry of recent sexual misconduct accusations in the Atheist/sceptic community essentially began with an invitation to continue a conversation over coffee, proffered by an unnamed man in an elevator. That invitation was ground zero for the splintering of that community into two rival camps–one which embraced scepticism and the rejection of any notion of an invisible, unmeasurable superior power that rules all our lives, and one which embraced dogmatism.

A witch hunt has begun in the sceptic community–one side asking for evidence, and the other demanding blind faith. Who will prevail? God knows…

Join us at 8PM Central Time

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Toronto's "Men's Centre" nears halfway point

Robert O'Hara · 22 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

MEDIA ADVISORY – FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Fundraising for Toronto's First "Men's Centre" Nears Halfway Point
Canadian Association for Equality Secures $20K, Announces Additional $10K Matching Drive

TORONTO, ONTARIO — (August 19, 2013) The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) has secured $20,000 in donations for the Campaign to Establish the Canadian Centre for Men and Families, nearing the halfway point milestone of its $50,000 goal.

Additionally, a donor has pledged $10,000 in matching funds toward a membership drive for the organization.

"The Canadian Association for Equality today launches a membership drive that, if successful, will bring us into the home stretch of the Campaign," said Malcolm Johnston, CAFE Spokesperson. For the next 4 weeks, until September 15, all membership funds will count as double.

"Now is the perfect time to join an organization that is willing to speak out in critical but marginalized areas like violence against men, the declining educational performance of boys, and the bias against fathers in our family courts," said Johnston.

The mission of the Canadian Centre for Men and Families is to establish the first space in Toronto for services, research, advocacy, outreach and public education on all aspects of issues related to boys, fathers, men and families.

Information on the Campaign is available at http://www.tinyurl.com/CAFE-Centre

CONTACT
Amber Taylor
Canadian Association for Equality
info@equalitycanada.com
416-479-0718

-30-

—

Amber Taylor
Media and Public Relations Officer, Canadian Association for Equality

PO Box 73076 Wood Street PO
465 Yonge St., Toronto, ON, M4Y 2W5
416-479-0718

Back from 20/20 in New York

Paul Elam · 23 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hello everyone. I wanted to give you an update from my trip to New York yesterday, and offer some predictions on what will be happening with the interview I did with ABC News 20/20.

First, let me say it was a very tiring day. I am amazed at times by the possibilities of the age I live in. Still, waking up in Houston, flying to New York City, taping an interview and then being back in Houston in time to sleep in my bed is one hell of a whirlwind day.

The interview itself was, how do I put this, every bit as skewed as I expected. I spoke first with ABCs Elizabeth Vargas, a seasoned, tough, no nonsense anchor that managed to conjure up a fair amount of nonsense for the interview nonetheless.

She did pretty much as I expected. She dwelled, obsessively so, on cherry picked bits of my most provocative writing, insisting that it was not satire (by her own edict I suppose), even as I informed her repeatedly that it was satire, and pointed to the fact that I had also said that in the articles. Those few examples were all she wanted to talk about, which I know surprises you to no end.

When we did discuss the issues faced by men and boys, she either dismissed them as trivial or acted like I was crazy for having brought them up in the first place.

She just kept insisting that I was promoting or inciting violence, that I hated women and supported rape.

To be fair to her, there were portions of the interview where she asked some very intelligent questions and allowed me more than sufficient space to answer them. How much of that winds up on the cutting room floor is anyone's guess.

I will also say that she did not appear to take any of this personally. Outside what was taped she was affable and professional, as was producer Steven Schnee and the camera crew doing the shoot.

Perhaps most interesting was that after the interview with Vargas, they placed me in a hotel café with feminist activist Jaclyn Friedman, one of the people responsible for the Facebook "anti-misogyny" campaign that quickly devolved into the Facebook anti-free speech campaign targeting people who dissent from feminist dogma.

This woman was a piece of work. After seating us at a table together, with cameras rolling, I was treated to a string of false accusations. Friedman claimed that I was responsible for mass shootings, for women fleeing their homes in fear for their lives under the direction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and of course for rape apologia, violence against women and all other social maladies. I don't recall whether she blamed me for 9/11, but things got kind of blurry after the first few accusations.

She of course offered no proof of any of this. Go figure.

At one point during the "discussion," after Friedman had said (for the third or forth time) that she was done talking to me, I wished her luck and suggested that she and those of her ilk would need it in the future.

She said something to the effect, 'I can't believe you just made a threat on camera.'

Well, at least we know they sent a real feminist to confront me on my evil ways.

The bottom line is this. I am betting that the interview with Vargas will be reduced to her bravely and admirably standing up to my hateful calls for violence, rape, pillaging, killing kittens and seeking to relegate women to the sammich mines for eternity. The numerous points I made will not fit their time constraints for the piece and will thus be excluded. Either that, or they will kill the segment entirely.

Now again, I am only guessing here, but it is an informed guess based on what is now a good bit of experience talking with people in the media. If I am wrong I will waste no time in issuing a highly visible apology to Vargas and to 20/20.

As I have said before, this is the unfortunate reality of what we have to deal with. Since we live in a culture that finds the pain and struggles of men both inconvenient and repugnant, we are left to draw attention to that pain and those struggles in ways that sometimes offend those who top the list of those who do not want to hear it. As I tried to impart to Vargas several times, without the harsh satire, the acerbic commentary, she and I would not be talking. AVFM would be just another blog addressing problems that the world doesn't give a damn about.

So, we take those lemons and make lemonade around here. We are prepared to handle the visitors that come from this bit of modern journalism and provide them the opportunity to investigate who we are and why we do what we do. As it already has in the past, it will result in growth and support. It will enable us to continue to carry the message that men are human beings, and that men's rights are human rights.

I don't know, but if you ask me that is some pretty good lemonade.

Dysfunctional law for a dysfunctional agenda

Hannah Wallen · 23 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A newly passed Illinois law provides an example of how feminist advocacy based on predatory exploitation of female victim status and emphasis of male perpetration leads to law and policy which discriminates against men and creates an oppressive legal environment.

Termination of Parental Rights of Perpetrators of Sexual Assault Act

At first glance, the law seems intended to protect rape victims from further victimization. Most people are shocked to learn that convicted rapists can sue for visitation with children conceived during the crime. The idea calls up images of violent offenders forcing their recovering victims to face them a second time in family court, and maybe even over and over again in a more personal setting if visitation is awarded. Feminists have been campaigning for years for politicians to address this issue, but only for the protection of female victims.

Sympathy for victims naturally elicits outrage at such an idea if one thinks about it through the narrow filter of feminist theory. Feminist theory treats rape as a male against female act, one which is never about sex, but always about domination; displaying power and imposing control. Feminist theory treats fathers' interest in involvement with their children as a weapon used against the mother. Ignoring the father-child relationship, feminist groups discuss paternal concern and interest as fathers' attempts to impose their will on mothers. Through this filter, any effort a father convicted of rape might make at securing any parental rights would be seen as an abuse. Most people will read about this law, see it through that narrow filter, and consider it a positive measure taken to protect rape victims from further imposition by their attackers.

Let's broaden the view a bit.

The most obvious problem with the law is in its gender-specificity.

It looks like the text of the original bill was specifically re-worded to change it from the overly broad but gender-neutral use of "sex offender" to "men who father through sexual assault or sexual abuse." An entire paragraph is dedicated to listing the various types of sex offenses which would make a father subject to this law. While using the general term "sex offender" is problematic in that it wouldn't have limited the law's application to only those whose children were conceived during a rape, the use of gendered terms is discriminatory, limiting the application to only those rapists who are men, and the law's protection to only female victims.

Rape isn't a gendered crime. The CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence survey found that male victims of female rapists are not uncommon. That makes the issue of conception-by-rape as much a potential issue for male victims as female victims.

One major difference between male victims and female victims in the circumstance addressed by the law is where custody begins. It's the woman who gives birth, and after birth the default custody, if uncontested, remains with her. In the case of female victims of male rapists, the woman at least has choices. She doesn't have to settle for the circumstance she's in. What does it mean when the rapist is a woman, and the victim is male?

Being female, the rapist still has a plethora of options aside from custodial parenthood. She can terminate or carry to term and give birth. She can relinquish custody to the victim – the baby's father. Barring that, she can relinquish custody to family, either the victim's, or her own. She can allow the baby to be placed in foster care, or put up for adoption. She can leave the baby with a safe-haven abandonment center. At no point, and under no logic, can the rapist who becomes pregnant in any way be reasonably considered a victim. Parenthood is not inflicted on her. It is her privilege, and her choice.

Being male, the victim has zero options. Given that he is a rape victim, he was not even given the chance to refuse sexual intercourse. He cannot abort. He must fight in court if he wants custody, and he has to prove the mother an unfit parent to obtain that. If he is too young to raise a baby, he won't be given that opportunity. If he did not want to become a father, he has no option to sever his parental responsibilities along with his rights, as the mother can do with hers. Under current law, if a male rape victim fathers a child during the act, he is out of luck, and on the hook.

The victim can be ordered to pay support to his rapist, even if he's underage, and even if he's so far underage that he cannot legally hold a job.

This law should be gender neutral. If our society is going to provide a protection for rape victims, that protection must be provided for victims of both sexes. If perpetrators of rape are going to be barred from having custody of children conceived by their criminal actions, that stipulation should apply to perpetrators of both sexes, not just men.

Another issue with the law is how it will be affected by the Illinois age of consent law.

The age of consent in Illinois is 17, and there's no exemption when a couple is close in age.

This means that boy who has passed his 17th birthday can be convicted of statutory rape for having sex with a girl who hasn't passed hers, even if their ages are only a few months or even just days apart. If conception were to occur in such a case, the father shouldn't be considered a predator. He hasn't victimized anyone. His actions are illegal due to the passing of a date akin to a deadline. The difference between himself and his female partner in age and maturity would not be any greater a day after his birthday than a week or a month before it – and his actions are no more malicious or careless than his partner's actions are… yet he would be subject to the Termination of Parental Rights of Perpetrators of Sexual Assault Act. Even if the law's gender specificity were to be remedied, the potential effect on teen parents would not be. Instead, it would simply go both ways. A girl who became pregnant following her 17th birthday could see her parental rights severed if her partner had not yet passed his.

To avoid victimizing teen parents this way, the law should be tempered with a Romeo and Juliet clause stipulating that an of-age teen is not guilty of statutory rape when the younger partner is within two years of the older partner's age.

The law leaves the determination of whether a convicted rapist's parental rights should be revoked up to the the other parent, or the child's legal guardian. No exception is offered for this stipulation, and no means of contesting the decision is included. Instead of the court making the determination based on the best interests of the child, this stipulation caters to the victim's feelings. Either association with a criminally convicted rapist is or is not in the child's best interest. Allowing the victim's feelings to override the best interests of the child is ridiculous. It also creates an incentive for vindictive parents to use false accusation as a weapon in custody battles.

There is nothing within the act to prevent that.

It provides for the termination of parental rights. It doesn't provide for them to be reinstated upon learning that the accusation was a lie, and the conviction was a mistake. Even if the liar is found out, and the conviction overturned, that won't reverse the termination of the wrongfully convicted parent's custody rights. There should be a clause within the law which stipulates that overturning a conviction also overturns that termination.

Considering the potential consequences of rape conviction, and the legal environment surrounding rape, leveling a provably false accusation should carry equally serious consequences. An accuser found to have lied in an attempt to abuse this law to wrongfully sever a parent's relationship with his or her child should be considered guilty of emotional abuse, both of the child and the parent. In circumstances of not just unprovable but demonstrably false accusations, prosecution of the accuser should be mandatory.

The same standard of proof that is used in criminal court should apply to the determination of whether the accuser is guilty of making a false accusation. Maintaining that standard of evidence would prevent legitimate accusers from fearing legal reprisal, but would provide a deterrent against abusing the law, and a legal remedy for the victims of undeterred liars.

This law is so discriminatory and dysfunctional it's almost designed to fail. As written, and as it would interact with the current legal environment faced by men accused of rape, it won't simply protect rape victims from further abuse. It provides for any woman willing to use it a weapon which can be deployed in any custody battle. All she has to do is accuse her child's father of rape, and the burden of proof will be on him. At the same time, it denies male victims equal protection, leaving them vulnerable to extortion by their rapists, endorsed and facilitated by the legal system. It appears as though this law was written to be abused, instead of to protect.

This is what the results of feminist advocacy look like.

Men Going Their Own Way in 1919

Robert St. Estephe · 23 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

This is quite an unusually revelatory post. The present-day trend called MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) is completely expressed in the second article you will see below, a "letter to the editor," which was written in response to a preceding editorial discussing the common and scandalous phenomenon of male juries' overwhelming tendency to sympathize with murderesses. What we see in the criminal case in question and the public response to it is the early glimmerings of MGTOW in 1919.

Following the editorial and the letter, in which the particular case under discussion is not named, are news reports on the specific case that inspired these reactions, involving Emma Simpson.

The case is iconic for its encapsulation of so many of the issues of the men's rights movement: chivalry, female sentencing discount, female privilege, a woman's "right to kill," the misuse of psychology in legal defense, predatory use of alimony law, the abuse of the courts for revenge purposes, attention whoring, and infantilizing of women (neglecting to hold them accountable because of their sex).

On top of that the murderess in the case was defended by America's most famous trial lawyer, Clarence Darrow, whose defense of Mrs. Simpson was a simplified form of that which he deployed in his cynical and perverted sophistry in the notorious trial of the cynical and perverted Leopold and Loeb five years later in 1924.

***

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 5): The popular and inexpensive American sport, Killing Your Husband, seems to be as popular and probably will continue as inexpensive as ever. The latest case is not yet complete. The husband, at this writing, is still alive, but whichever way it turns out we have no doubt the lady is quite justified in her smiling confidence. Her picture, snapped after the shooting, is a social document which ought to be preserved, but it should be carefully labeled and supported by affidavits or future civilized generations will take it for the portrait of a lady on her way to a wedding.

She waved and smiled at the Tribune staff photographer. "When I go to court for this I will defend myself. I will need no attorney; the new unwritten law, which does not permit a married man to love another woman, will be my defense. I will tell my whole story to the jury and they will free me."

They probably will. What is the law, what is a human life, to the sloppy sentimentality of the juries which sit in these cases? A long succession of acquittals has given good basis for confidence that any woman can murder her husband if she is not too old or unsightly. Our juries have made killing a minor offense whenever a woman can tell a story of wrongs, whether the wrongs justify the wiping out of a human life or not.

The law establishes in calmness and justice what excuses or justifies the taking of life. But the sexual sentimentality of male juries has made mockery of law and of reasoned justice, so that any woman whose wrongs are real or fancied may try, convict, and execute according to her own notion of right or her own impulses of pride or jealousy.

This is to place woman not in a shrine, but on the plane of irresponsible childhood or idiocy. Juries which ignore their oath to apply the law, and by their inane verdicts encourage the inflamed egotism of women to destroy life, should be made to feel the condemnation of the courts and of their fellow citizens. Killing has got to be the safest of exercises in this community.

["Killing Husbands" (editorial), Chicago Tribune (Il.), Apr. 28, 1919, p. 8]

***

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 5):

"Voice of the People" (letters to the editor section)

WHY MEN DON'T MARRY

Evansville, Wis., May 26. [Editor of The Tribune]—

The Tribune hit the nail squarely on the head in the masterly editorial "Killing Husbands." Let us hope that the good work may continue until this mighty evil, sex discrimination in the courts, is abated or eliminated.

The court has never measured up to its responsibility in the matter of domestic relations. For centuries mothers were robbed of their children with as little compunction as when the mother cat is deprived of its kittens [This is inaccurate. Divorces were very rare "for centuries" until the mid 1800s].

Then came a revulsion of feeling and the courts swung around to other extreme and singled the father out as the goat. The man who remains single until he is thirty seldom marries, because by that time he has ceased to be foolhardy and knows from his daily observations that the man who marries and undertakes to maintain a home and rear a family frequently has insurmountable obstacles to overcome.

The hostile attitude of the courts, the busy divorce lawyer, and the meddlesome mother-in-law loom upon the horizon of the man of thirty when he for a moment contemplates matrimony, and he regards approvingly the motto on the wall of the den, "SAFETY FIRST."

– A. V. Lyle.

***

[image]
FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 5): Hate is a delicate institution. Like an old music box, it may be dormant for several years, and then suddenly jarred, burst into sound –
Mrs. Emma D. Simpson, niece of John M. Roach, traction magnate, will be the next woman Cook county will try for attempted murder – possibly murder. For over three years a jealous hate lay closely guarded in Mrs. Simpson's heart. The jar came yesterday afternoon – and Mrs. Simpson shot to kill.

Sitting, apparently calm, in the crowded courtroom of Judge David M. Brothers, Mrs. Simpson drew a revolver from the folds of her dress, pointed it at her husband, Elmer E. Simpson, and pulled the trigger six times. When she fired she was in a chair directly across the table from her husband.

It transpired that two of the gun's chambers were empty. The remaining four were loaded. Two bullets struck Mr. Simpson in the face, one in the shoulder, while the fourth went wild, narrowly missing Gus Wedemeier, clerk of the court.

Mrs. Simpson tossed the revolver on the table and rose. Bailiff August Villwock, rushing from the judge's chambers, immediately pinned her arms to her side.

~ Hopes He Is Dead. ~

"Now I am vindicated!" cried Mrs. Simpson.

"You've killed him!" screamed Miss Bertha Fisher, a court reporter.

“I hope so,” replied Mrs. Simpson quietly as she saw the body of her husband clump and fall to the floor. “He tortured me every minute of the last four years and he deserved it.”

Mrs. Simpson submitted calmly to deputy and was taken to the office of Sheriff Peters. There she refused – on advice of her attorney – to talk.

Shortly afterwards, accompanied by two deputy sheriffs, she started for the county jail. On the way thither – and still entirely composed – she talked freely to a Tribune reporter of her husband.

[image]
~ Wife Tells Her Story. ~

“That man has lived by my permission since July 12, 1915,” she said. “On that date I found him in a hotel with Mrs. Jean Webster. Her husband was with me and we had them arrested.

“Since that time he has repeatedly called on this woman.

“Of course I took the gun to court with me, but I didn’t expect to shoot. He said something to me – something nasty, indicative of his whole nature. It made me boil – I couldn’t stand it any longer.”

She waved and smiled at a Tribune staff photographer who snapped her picture as she walked.

“When I go to court for this I will defend myself,” Mrs. Simpson continued. “I will need no attorney – the new unwritten law, which does not permit a married man to love another woman, will be my defense. It will save me.”

“I will tell my whole story to the jury and they will free me. I am perfectly confident of that.”

Mrs. Simpson refused to talk after she entered the jail. But she went to her cell with the matron apparently happy. Mrs. Simpson is 37 years old. Her home is at 1712 North La Salle street. Since their separation her husband has been living with his mother at 136 East Garfield boulevard.

Late last night Dr. J. Whitney Hall worked at the bedside of Simpson to save the man’s life.

“I believe he will die,” said the doctor, who was in the courtroom at the time of shooting and who took Simpson to St. Luke’s hospital.

The events leading up to the attempted murder are taken upon the records of the Circuit court.

Mr. and Mrs. Simpson were married July 4, 1902, and lived together until May 18, 1912, at which time Mrs. Simpson left her husband, a telegraph operator, because “he was associating with other women.” Two years ago a divorce suit was filed in the court by Mrs. Simpson, charging her husband with infidelity and naming Mrs. Jeanne Webster, 5624 Indiana avenue, as correspondent.

~ Did Not Want Divorce. ~

The bill was heard five minutes ago by Judge Brothers. The testimony brought out the fact that Mrs. Simpson and Mrs. Webster’s husband had found Simpson and Mrs. Webster in a hotel together.

Judge Brothers indicated he would grant a divorce – but Mrs. Simpson refused.

“I don’t want my husband free to marry her,” she said, and the case was dismissed.

Last February Mrs. Simpson filed a bill asking separate maintenance and charging her husband with infidelity, naming the same woman. Shortly after the filing of the bill Judge Brothers granted Mrs. Simpson $7.50 a week alimony until the case could be heard.

[image]
Yesterday with her attorney she went to court and asked that the alimony be increased.
“Why – this woman makes $200 a month as secretary for J. M. Roach,” said Simpson to the court. “She has ample means of support.”

Mrs. Simpson and her attorney objected. Mrs. Simpson's objections were loud.

"Madame, you will have to be quiet," ordered Judge Brothers.

Attorneys continued their arguments and finally Judge Brothers entered an order providing for $9 a week alimony. Then the judge stepped down from the bench into his chambers.

~ Husband Asks Reconciliation. ~

"Emma – let's go back and be happy again," said her husband.

"I will not – and when you get anything on me you can get a divorce.

"Why – right now you are – "

The sentence was never finished. Mrs. Simpson pulled her revolver and started shooting.

Several women screamed, one fainted, and Bailiff Villwock, 2824 Southport Avenue, rushed from the jurist's chambers to grab the revolver.

Immediately after quiet was restored Judge Brothers ascended the bench and held Mrs. Simpson to the grand jury without bond for attempted murder. Judge Brothers has just returned from a vacation forced by heart trouble. The excitement caused a slight relapse and he was ordered home by his physician.

Attorney T. J. Symmes, legal representative for Mrs. Roach, went to the county building and asked of First Deputy H. C. W. Laubenheimer permission to visit Mrs. Simpson in the county jail.

"It is possible that I may represent her at the trial," the attorney said.

Efforts to talk with Mrs. Webster last night proved futile. She is sister-in-law of Simpson's brother, Arthur.

"My sister-in-law had nothing to do with breaking up the home," said Arthur Simpson last night.

Neighbors of Mrs. Simpson described her as a hard working, faithful wife. They asserted she had nursed her husband back to health from tuberculosis.

Miss Bertha Fisher, 18 years old, 2629 Evergreen avenue, a court reporter, stood immediately behind Mrs. Simpson just before the shooting occurred. She said:

"I heard him say that he wanted her to come back and live with him. She replied that is was impossible, and then he started to insult her. He did not finish the sentence. After she had fired the shots she rose coolly and asserted that she was 'vindicated.'"

Miss Lucille Ver Hoeven, a court reporter told a Tribune reporter last night that Mrs. Simpson had threatened her husband's life months ago.

["Taunted Wife Shoots Husband In Courtroom – 'Hope He's Dead,' Says Niece of J. M. Roach." Chicago Tribune (Il.), Apr. 26, 1919, p. 1]

***

NOTE: Elmer Simpson, shot by his wife on April 11, 1919, died May 18.

***

[image]
FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 5): The court room was filled with chatting groups. The audience back of the railing, where the judge, jury and prisoner sit, held their seats impatiently. For the jury was out, deliberating upon the sentence to be passed on a woman who had killed her husband – Mrs. Emma Simpson.

The jury had been out for half an hour, the prosecuting attorney had retired to his chambers, and Attorney Clarence Darrow for the defense gathered up his papers, for it was expected the jury would spend some hours deciding on the verdict.

Just as Mr. Darrow reached the door, however, a knock was heard at the jury room door.

~ “Insanity” Is Verdict. ~

The jury filed in, and the prisoner, who had changed her spotless white costume of the morning for a black velvet dress, was brought back. She stood between two guards to hear her sentence – facing the entire assemblage.

“You have the verdict, gentlemen?” inquired Judge George Kersten. “Let it be read.”

The quiet of the room was oppressive. The prisoner shifted her feet nervously. The verdict was read:

“We, the jury, find the defendant, Emma Simpson, committed the act charged in the indictment, but at the time of the commission of the said act she was a lunatic or insane person, and that she was not permanently recovered from such lunacy or insanity.”

Mrs. Simpson turned to disappear into the jail with her guards.

~ Two Ballots Taken. ~

“It is hard to realize she isn’t coming home,” said her aunt. Mrs. Sweet, “but —-“

A sigh was the finish of her sentence.

Max Leviton, a member of the jury, said a little later: “We had been undecided until this morning as to whether she was insane – but when Mrs. Simpson interrupted the prosecuting attorney twice, we figured a sane person would have acted differently.”

Two ballots were taken, and at one time the jury stood six to six on the question of sanity.

~ Now Faces Asylum. ~

After the trial was over and Mrs. Simpson was back in her cell, from where she probably will be taken to Elgin for treatment, she was asked whether she was satisfied with the verdict. She burst into tears.

“Yes, but that won’t bring my husband back —-”

Her tears ceased abruptly.

“Do you know that before last Monday I had not realized the terrible thing I had done. Relatives and friends told me repeatedly I was going insane – and lately I have known something was wrong.

“I know I would make a bad impression on the jury if I broke down, but I just couldn’t help it when they started to say things about Elmer, because Elmer and I were happy together for a long, long time and I couldn’t hear ill spoken of him.”

And she began to weep. Outside the cell Miss Margaret Leithamin, 17, awaiting trial for murder, was industriously mopping the jail floor.

Mr. Darrow expressed himself as pleased with the verdict even though his client was sent to an asylum. The verdict is taken to mean Mrs. Simpson will be placed in an asylum until such time as she is declared to have recovered. Then application can be made for her release.

~ Pleads Woman’s Cause. ~

In his final plea to the jury Attorney Darrow begged that more consideration should be shown for a woman than a man, and cited the domestic troubles Mrs. Simpson had had for seven years.

“I’m not arguing there was a justification for murder,” said he. “The act in itself was a crazy act. This woman was insane at the time and is insane now.”

And then, to show that a man and a woman must be judged differently: “Women will take a bunch of old love letters, tied with faded ribbon, and relive an early romance; to men an old romance would be dust and ashes, if not forgotten.

“You’ve been asked to treat a man and a woman the same – but you can’t.”

~ Asks for a Conviction. ~

Prosecutor Murphy in his closing plea thundered:

“The state of Illinois asks you, gentlemen, to put an end to killings by these women wild with jealousy. We have shown there is no insanity in this case.”

“This paragon of virtue in her own mind was always right and her husband Elmer all wrong —- ”

Mrs. Simpson electrified the court by standing and interrupting dramatically: “Mr. Murphy, he was not all wrong – he was all right until that woman Jean Weber got hold of him!”

Bailiffs pulled her back into her seat. Later, when Mr. Murphy was telling that she, the prisoner claimed to be insane, had been earning her own living she cried out: “I did not.”

Mr. Murphy demanded that she be sent to the penitentiary.

[Maude Martin Evers, “Mrs. Simpson Found Insane; Faces-Asylum – Jury Verdict Stirs Husband Slayer to Tears and Smiles.” Chicago Tribune (Il.), Sep. 26, 1919, p. 1]

***

[image]
FULL TEXT (Article 5 of 5): Mrs. Emma D. Simpson, who shot her husband in court last April, was adjudged insane by a jury, September 26, and was thereafter sent to the Elgin State Hospital for the Insane. On Friday she was adjudged sane by a jury of experts and released. “The Elgin city court was packed with a sympathetic crowd,” says the report.

She was fifty-one days at the institution. Her remark on regaining her liberty is significant. “I did not do the right thing—absolutely not,” she said. “I could not have done such a thing had I been in my right mind. But until the last hour of my life I’ll believe my husband wanted to kill me and marry a bad woman.”

After the shooting she buoyantly said to the Tribune staff photographer, “When I go to court for this, I will defend myself. I will need no attorney; the new unwritten law, which does not permit a married man to love another woman, will be my defense. I will tell my whole story to the jury and they will free me.”

The Tribune, in comment on this breezy announcement, said, “They probably will. What is law, what is a human life to the sloppy sentimentality of the juries which sit in these cases?”

Mrs. Simpson’s optimism and our prediction have been essentially justified. She did not try her own case. The unwritten law she relied on was not formally pleaded. But the conventional plea of temporary insanity was, and there were learned experts to support it. The jury did not set her free. It compromised by setting her on the road to freedom. She was solemnly adjudged insane and sent for treatment.

Foreseeing the outcome, the Tribune at the time of the trial said:

“Pity is at work for Mrs. Simpson, but we hear of little for the husband she slew in a public courtroom. She is said to be nervous. Nervous women should not carry firearms. Mrs. Simpson may be demented; if so, she should be placed in an asylum for life; not only until she makes a surprising recovery.”

The recovery is made, but it is not surprising. This tragicomedy, beginning with the slaying of a human being by an infuriated woman, proceeding through the elaborate drama of the American criminal trial, and ending with the solemn farce at Elgin, develops as inevitably as an Ibsen play.

Sentimentality is lawless. The disease in America is endemic. We need some drastic moral therapy.

[“Fifty-One Days For Killing,” Chicago Tribune (Il.), Nov. 24, 1919, p. 8]

[image]
***

The new N-word

Natasha Douglas · 24 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Update: This classic essay, read by its author, was flagged as "Hate Speech" on YouTube within hours of it being uploaded. A revised version of that video noting the censorship effort was then uploaded, and those who wished to fight the censors copied it to dozens of other channels on YouTUbe. It was eventually restored by YouTube management, who apparently grew a conscience. –DE

There was a time in the history of my country, when an entire demographic group was regularly pushed aside and disregarded – legally and socially. That group had some but not all of the rights that were granted to the rest of society and the rights they did have were ignored and denied with shocking regularity. Each member of the lower class was socially valued by how well they were liked and how useful the were to their superiors, the privileged class.

Members of the lower class were best advised to mind their manners around their betters. It was best not to say things their superiors wouldn't like and in some cases it was advisable to avoid looking directly at them.

The lower class of people were expected to accept their treatment and some of them seemed to. It seems odd that anyone would accept their systemic mistreatment and abuse, but who could blame them, it was the safest thing to do. Those who fell in line and did their part to keep the superiors happy suffered less abuse than those who did not. It was easier to keep your head down and if asked a question or spoken to, it was safest to smile and say whatever the superior wanted to hear.

As is the case with any oppressed people the lower class became angry. Some of the lower class people became disobedient. They had the very laughable goal of equality. Those of the lower class who complained were troublemakers. Any member of the privileged class who supported those troublemakers were traitors.

There were words the upper class used to keep those lower beings in line, and check those who'd forgotten their place. One of these words seemed more effective than the others.

Nigger.

That was what they were, after all.

Niggers weren't the same as human beings. They were legally and socially less than the privileged class. Niggers could be harmed and the police probably wouldn't help them. Niggers were subject to vigilante justice.

I don't know if it happened on a conscious level but I do not doubt that when a nigger was reminded that he was in fact a nigger, he realized he had stepped out of bounds and if a privileged citizen decided to punish him, there would be no help for him. That little reminder must have done wonders to shut an uppity nigger up.

The word was used so often that, it seems, it lost its effectiveness. Niggers learned to ignore the word, it didn't hurt as much and sometimes it simply made them angry. The magic was gone and it was just another word, like stupid, or ugly.

In that time of social unrest there was a member of that lower class named Melvin B. Tolson. If you don't know who that is, look up the 'Forensic Society Debaters of Wiley College' and you will learn that he was a troublemaker who dared to think that lower class people should be allowed to hold civil debate with the privileged class.

It was a rather unpopular idea which met great opposition. However when he did succeed in arranging for the oppressed to debate their superiors, the lower class people won. Looking back that is not surprising, the lower class were morally correct. What I find most interesting about their victory is the amount of struggle it took for the matter to reach debate.

The privileged class seemed to believe that the lower class were just dumb niggers, but I believe that was an excuse.

I think that the privileged people knew that the societal norms were wrong and that everyone would realize it if the lower class people were ever allowed to show their intelligence. If the lower class showed the public that they were not dumb and dangerous, the injustices against them would be unnecessary and cruel.

It would be revealed that the privileged upper class were the ignorant, dangerous fools.

The opposition to a simple debate came from a fear of exposure.

You may believe that such societal norms and treatment are a thing of the past. That sort of thing could never go unchallenged today. People are more enlightened now… Right?

But I see it.

I see an entire class of people who can be harmed by a member of a privileged class and there is no help for them. They can be legally abused and everyone looks the other way. There are those members of the lower class who try to make themselves as useful to their superiors as possible or keep their heads down unless spoken to and then he'd better say what ever pleases his superior, that is the safest way to behave.

I hear the privileged use a few words to try and keep the troublemakers in line. One seems to be a particular favorite.

Misogynist.

Misogynists aren't the same as other human beings. You don't have to listen to anything a misogynist says. They aren't allowed the same rights as everyone else. Debate with the superiors? Pfft, what for? They are just a bunch of angry misogynists after all.

Don't talk to me because you hate women…Nigger.

Their misogynistic posters got torn down? Serves the niggers right!

Debate? No, they are dangerous nig- oops, I mean, misogynists.

Of course this refusal and opposition to the very idea of debate has NOTHING at all to do with the knowledge that the people they call misogynists really do have something to complain about. This opposition isn't fear this time… right? It's legitimate concern that the people you so flagrantly antagonize, openly taunt and yet who have done nothing at all to harm you, will suddenly go ape-shit and assault a helpless innocent member of the privileged class.

It's okay to wave weapons at them, because they're misogynists.

Its okay to silence them. They are just misogynists.

It's totally cool to disregard them cause you know… they're misogynists, and everyone knows it.

You don't have to treat the misogynists like human beings, so it isn't bigotry. Everyone knows misogynists don't get rights.

I can only hope that using this word to silence and shame someone you disagree with someday reaches the same public regard as coming right out and calling your opponent "nigger."

Child abusing judge Kelly continues rampage

VFM News and Commentary · 24 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

Kelly Bans Halburn From First Day Of Child's School

Judge Loses Case In Court Of Public Opinion

The case of Halburn vs. Halburn got brutal on the first day of school.

[image]

Mark Halburn, the Publisher of Putnam*LIVE*.com simply wanted what all normal parents want: To share his first day of school memories with his son, Matthew.

[image]

However, Halburn's ex-wife, Dolores MartinDolores Martin, accused Mark Halburn of wanting to "Make a scene" and asked controversial Kanawha County Family Court Judge Michael J. Kelly to keep Halburn from Winfield Elementary School, where Matthew was transferred-at her request, because she says Forest Burdette Memorial United Methodist Church would not enroll him in their day care-which Pastor Dan Hogan never said happened, and the day care's director, Terry, said "never happened."

"Judge Kelly is domestic violence," says Mark Halburn. "He divides families and creates anger with his maniacal decisions. This is the same psychopath that refused to let my son visit his grandmother before she died. The West Virginia Supreme Court should have removed Kelly from the bench years ago. How will they restore the first day of school memories with my son? How will they restore his memory of a final visit with his grandmother? The Court's misbehavior is obscene! Kelly is a power-hungry, mentally demented judicial thug!”

As for Dolores Martin’s mental state, that hasn’t been officially assessed. She failed to take the court-ordered parental psych exam. Instead of Kelly forcing her to comply with the court order and taking custody of Matthew from her, Kelly only fined her $100, (for contempt of court) a fraction of what Halburn paid for his exam ($800) and less than what it cost him to take a day off work as a substitute teacher in the Kanawha County Schools.

“It would have been cheaper for me to cut the $100 check,” says Halburn. “Instead, I complied with the order and Kelly blew Dolores a kiss.”

In the Court of Public Opinion, Kelly has lost. Facebook and other comments clearly back Halburn and are putting West Virginia’s family law system back on the national stage where the misbehavior of Putnam County Family Law Judge William M. “Chip” Watkins had The Mountain State last year- the judge that Halburn exposed, internationally, for screaming in court. The videos, published first by Putnam*LIVE*.com, went viral, and led to Watkins downfall.

Halburn believes Kelly and the court system are abusing Mark and Matthew in retaliation for getting Watkins suspended for the remaining four years of his term.

"Obviously this is payback from the Courts," says Halburn. "Their motives and misbehavior is transparent retaliation. But to take it out on a dying grandmother and a five-year-old boy? Judge Kelly and his colleagues take unprofessionalism and mental cruelty to a new high."

"Appalling behavior," says Dean Esmay, of AVoiceForMen.com, via Facebook. "Child abuse, honestly no better term for it."

"This Ex Parte Order eviscerates Mark Halburn's rights as a father to participate in his 8 year-old son, Matthew's school academic and scholastic activities," says Bruce Eden of Dads Against Discrimination." This Ex Parte Order was obtained unfairly and unjustly by Dolores Halburn (k/n/a Dolores Martin) by using unfair procedural and tactical advantage. Judge Kelly has sided with Ms. Martin continuously throughout the history of this case because of Mr. Halburn's public media website wherein Mr. Halburn has taken Judge Kelly to task for constitutional rights violations of Mr. Halburn and his son."

"Mark, I am soooo sorry," says Pam Hein, via Facebook. "I wish I could help in some way. My husband had to deal with some of this kind of junk (even though his kids were late teens) when I married him. I sure wish I knew why some folks have such hate in them. We had to deal with stuff like this with his kids and his ex-wife for 14 years. It is mind-boggling how some people think. I believe that they are so very bitter and it could be because of something in their past. I truly can empathize with your situation."

"Mark just keep doing what u are doing file out the paper work u need to cause when he is old enough to check things out for himself no matter what she has told him the proof of your love for him will be there he will know that you fought for him every step of the way," says Kathy Cuzzort Presley, via Facebook. "Like someone else posted to u it is going to come back and bite her in the butt big time. He will find out that she has lied to him all these years."

"That's so sad," says Sabrina Leighann Ledford, via Facebook. "Hang in there. Something has got to give soon. Bad judges will go down. Look at Watkins and now the judge in Mingo county. If Kelly continues it looks like he may be next. Every courtroom needs an honest judge like David Born of Marion county. He is everything a judge should be. WV should be proud to have at least one honest judge on the bench. Praying for you."

"It's going to come back and bite her in the butt!!" says Vickie Hart Sharpe, via Facebook.

Finally, one of Dolores Martin's family members has this to say: "She is a witch!! Great story!," says Kimberly Smith Case.

Later it was revealed that Martin wrote Kelly a letter saying that she feared Mark might "make a scene" at Matthew's first day. She was responding to his Facebook comments, the day before, that he was concerned that she would try to stop him from seeing Matthew on his first day. He was right. She did exactly that.

[image]

In fact, Mark has never been accused of such conduct at any Putnam County Schools-and, in fact, went to Winfield Police Chief John J. Perrine with a request that an officer accompany him to visit Matthew in order to handle everything properly. Later, Perrine served Mark with the order in the street outside of the school.

"For a judge to issue an order based on someone saying that I might "make a scene" is an abuse of authority," says Halburn. "Should I write a letter saying that I fear Matthew will be harmed by Dolores and get an order banning her from having contact with her son? Where is her evidence?"

Earlier this year, Halburn filed a lawsuit against Kelly for violating his civil rights over Kelly's ban on Matthew visiting his grandmother. In a visible show of the West Virginia court corruption that's similar to that making headlines in Mingo County, Fayette Circuit Judge John Hatcher, Jr., tossed the lawsuit saying Halburn didn't file "Points of Law" by July 26th, 2013. However, Halburn filed them July 23rd, 2013. Hatcher then refused to reverse his corrupt order and Halburn filed an appeal with the West Virginia Supreme Court.

"I was looking forward to telling the justices about Kelly's cruelty in refusing to let Matthew have a final visit with his grandmother," says Halburn. "Now I get to add Kelly's refusal to let me share Matthew's first day of school. How are they going to fix Kelly's epic screwups? Removing him from the bench isn't enough. These are priceless moments that no family should be forced to go without. I hold the West Virginia Supreme Court, which has refused many requests, from me and other people, to remove Kelly from the bench, professionally responsible for his misbehavior. Real justices don't allow judges like Kelly to terrorize families and little children."

Brent D. Benjamin

Halburn is planning an emergency appeal to the West Virginia Supreme Court regarding being able to visit Matthew at school. He already filed another Motion for Recusal and Disqualification. So far, Chief Justice Brent D. Benjamin has refused to recuse Kelly, showing that bad judges stick together. We will let you know if the West Virginia Supreme Cour of Appeals suddenly shows respect for families, common sense and common decency or continues to back lunatic Kelly's misbehavior.

Meanwhile, Kelly has announced that he is retiring at the end of 2013. "He doesn't want to face all the fathers that are lining up to trash him at the candidate forums," says Halburn. "He throws his power around from his bench. Deep down he's a coward."

Editor's note: this is a reprint from Putnam*LIVE*.com*. For previous stories on the antics of the kangaroo court judges of West Virginia, see West Virginia family court corruption and incompetence, Judge Michael J. Kelly Conflict of Interest, and, for related stories of other West Virginia child-abusers-from-the-bench, see our previous coverage of cases like that of Child-abusing judge Lori Betler Jackson. –DE*

India's new "Sexual Harassment at Workplace" law

Burt Phoenix · 24 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The Protection of Women Against Sexual Harassment at Work Place Bill ("Act") has been passed in the Rajya Sabha (Upper House of the Parliament of India) recently and has become law. This Act deals with protecting women from harassment in the workplace and providing a safe environment.

Let us now analyze the provisions of the Act in detail –

1. This Act is not gender neutral as only women can file a complaint. No man can file a sexual harassment complaint. Are men not harassed sexually? Do refer to the links here, here, here and here.
2. As per section 2(o), the definition of "workplace" includes any place visited by the employee arising out of or during the course of employment including transportation provided by the employer for undertaking such journey. Therefore as per this definition even areas outside the control of the employer such as office of clients, taxis, hotels etc… become a workplace. Therefore, during an official tour the place of stay (ie hotel), travel mode (ie. taxi) and office of customers / clients are all included as workplace and the employer is liable if any incident happens with the woman employee . Quite a strange provision as the employer is not responsible and in control of any of these places.
3. Section 3 defines sexual harassment containing clauses such as 'implied or explicit threat about her present or future employment status' and 'interferes with her work or creating an intimidating or offensive or hostile work environment for her'. Therefore bringing out quality issues with the woman's work or providing / enforcing deadlines may be construed as threatening her future employment status or creating an offensive work environment.
4. A committee needs to be formed which will look at all sexual harassment cases. The committee needs to have "A woman Presiding officer committed to the cause of women[i]" and minimum 2 other employees "committed to the cause of women". What does it mean by "committed to the cause of women". Further, a member has to be from a women NGO and a majority of the members of the committee must be women. By defining the constitution of the committee in such a way, at the very first step itself bias has been introduced. Having a committee which is specifically formed to promote women specific-causes is coloured. How do we expect justice to be served by such a committee?
5. Section 10 discusses the complaint handling provisions. First, a settlement with the offender would be tried to be achieved. A question: if the woman was sexually harassed, why does she need to reconcile with the offender? This is a point to ponder.
6. Section 11 states that the committees shall have the same powers as vested in a civil court. A point to be noted here is that none of the members of the committee are required to have legal knowledge or be legal professionals. Providing powers of a court to persons having no legal knowledge is strange.
7. As per section 12, during the pendency of the complaint the aggrieved woman may request for –
   - transfer to another workplace
   - a paid leave, further, this leave is over and above the 'Privilege Leave' grated by the organization. On the face of it, the provisions seem logical, but there are no misuse clauses mentioned in the Act, which will be discussed further.

   Therefore, without a misuse clause this provision is unjust on the employer as the organization may need to give paid leave if a complaint is made.

8. As per section 13, in case sexual harassment is proved any one of the following provisions may apply –
   - Organization may take action for sexual harassment as per the service rules
   - Deduct a compensation from the salary of the accused employee and the compensation may be recovered as land revenue from the accused employee.

Quite a strange way to penalize sexual misconduct by providing "Compensation" to the alleged victim… It does not gel well with my senses.

9. Section 14 states that in case of false complaints (which are backed by forged documents submitted by the complainant or a malicious intent, which needs to be proved) an action will be taken as per the service rules of the organization. Further, it states, if the complaint cannot be substantiated, it will not attract any action. This is an unfair provision as only such false cases which are coupled with forged documents or proving malicious intent attracts penalties. With just one complaint the whole life of the man is ruined, the woman gets immediate relief as mentioned in paragraph 6 above but no particular penalty is prescribed for false complaints. Non-proving of complaint may imply that a frivolous compliant was filed. How is this provision 'Just and Fair'?
10. Section 15 determines the level of compensation to be paid to the woman which depends on –
    - The mental trauma, pain, suffering and emotional distress caused to her
    - The loss in the career opportunity due to the incident of sexual harassment
    - Medical expenses incurred by the victim for physical or psychiatric treatment
    - The income and financial status of the respondent (Respondent is the person who supposedly commits the harassment)
    - Feasibility of such payment in lump sum or in installments

    The fourth point above means that if the harasser is a wealthy person, then the compensation level will be higher… In other words, compensation level is determined by the income level of the accused. Something does not seem right, does it give an incentive to a accuse wealthy / senior level employees?

11. As per section 16, the complaints handled by this Act is specifically kept outside the purview of Right to Information (RTI) Act. Therefore, details of false / fabricated cases will not be available. Further, even in case of false complaints, the identity of the woman will be not be disclosed but the man is open to media trials and his information may be made public. Further, in case of genuine cases, the details may be made public provided the identity of the woman is protected.

There are many issues here, keeping it out of the purview of the RTI Act will not provide information on the misuse of this Act. Further, only successful cases will be reported thus proving a 100% success rate. The identity of women, even in false cases, is kept confidential. As there are no penalties for false cases (we have discussed this is paragraph 8 above) and identity is protected, there is no disincentive to file a false cases. Just an accusation by the woman will destroy a man's life with no consequences whatsoever for fabricated complaints.

---

[i] The Chairperson (Woman Presiding officer) to be committed to the cause of woman only in case of Local Complaints Committee. (Section 7)

Hey mate, fuck your white ribbon

Jim Muldoon · 25 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Australia's White Ribbon Campaign wants to take Australia to a new dark age in our civilisation. With a breathtaking combination of bigotry, sanctimony and stupidity they have found a new way to encourage men to join in on their own demonization and marginalisation.

It's called "Hey mate, let the world know where you stand (White Ribbon Campaign, 2013)." To do this men are asked to make an oath to not stand silent about violence against women. The oath is made more solemn because men must supply their email addresses when they take the oath.

For the hard of thinking, the email addresses not only allow the White Ribbon Campaign to bombard the gullible with their propaganda; but the longer the list, the more money they can get from the government.

The general idea is that those who have taking the oath should intervene wherever misogyny rears its ugly head. Apparently, it's important that this intervention begins with the words "Hey mate…"

Perhaps it's to identify the intervener as a White Ribbon approved intervener. Maybe, one day, the White Ribbon campaign will get enough funding to supply some brown shirts.

We've also just recently had "The four most powerful men in Victoria" make a call for the same thing (Whinnett & Minear, 2013). The Herald Sun, with their "Take a Stand" promotion say this about our top cop:

"Chief Commissioner Ken Lay has put violent men who attack their wives and partners on notice: you will be vilified by the community."

Yes, it is our civic duty as good men to find, challenge, and ultimately ostracise those who are not good men.

How much is wrong with this "Hitler Youth Comes Of Age" story? Let me count the ways:

First of all, don't be thinking that when they are talking about "men who commit domestic violence" that they are talking about some other men somewhere else.

They mean you. They mean your father, your brother, your son and you.

According to Michael Flood, of the White Ribbon Campaign, "the research highlights that most violence against women is perpetrated by 'normal' men. (Flood, 2011)" This research is done, Flood repeatedly explains, by "Feminist advocates".

Yes, normal men have become "normal" men. And a "normal" man can be detected by his lack of Feminist training.

Ken Lay adds to the moral panic by explaining "Some men are very good at hiding their violence from those outside the home."

How good at hiding it? Lay tells us they are so clever that, "…it's not surprising to me from time to time quite intelligent people will be fooled into thinking that particular behaviour hasn't occurred. (Whinnett, 2013)"

So what if you are an ordinary family man who is never seen to be violent? So what if your wife says you are not violent? Who cares if your children say you are not violent? That's precisely the cover story these "normal" men have.

The only men who are in the clear are the men swearing the oath, wearing the ribbon, and pointing the finger at some poor schmuck who was either too dumb or too slow to do the same.

Secondly, there is no need to wait to see actual violence before you get say "Hey Mate…" The idea in "normal" people's minds that violence is knuckles on face, a boot in ribs, or a brick to the head is simply wrong.

Flood explains "feminist work has identified a continuum [emphasis his] of violence" from unkind words to murder. But, "normal" guy, don't be fooled into thinking that unfair criticism is not as bad as bashing with a steel pipe. "[A]ll forms are serious and all have effects."

Also, according to Lay, we should be, "…calling men to account, not just for that outrageous, criminal behaviour but also the inappropriate behaviour." Lay explains, "Bit by bit our standards are lowered until this kind of behaviour becomes a form of endorsement of violence towards women (Lay, 2013)."

So how about the "normal" man who today farts out loud and thinks it's funny? Is he the serial killer of tomorrow?

Does it begin with criticising the White Ribbon Campaign?

Thirdly, how many men saying "Hey Mate…" will have some other connection to the accused? How many will have just happened to have missed out on the promotion that the alleged wife-beater got? How many will just coincidentally be harbouring a crush on the damsel in alleged distress?

How many will be saying "Hey Mate…" to the bastard who said "Hey Mate…" to them last month?

How many will try to get the most knotches on their belt to climb the feminist ladder? Ken Lay ought to know – Police history is littered with those arresting people for minor incidents simply to get their arrest rates up.

Perhaps we could ask retiring Judge David Collier of the Australian Federal Family Court who recently spoke out against mothers levelling false accusations of abuse at their ex-partners (Ninemsn staff, 2013). Not only does this happen on a regular basis, he stated, but the rate is increasing.

The White Ribbon Campaign and Ken Lay will give these vengeful harridans another avenue for retribution.

Similarly, how many will mishear, misunderstand or misinterpret conversations in their zealotry to be good men. How many will say "Hey Mate…" to someone who was just re-enacting to his girlfriend what happened in a movie, or some other perfectly innocent circumstance?

Fourthly, despite good intentions, these things can go wrong. After all, we are supposed to be challenging violent men who have been trained by the Patriarchy to believe they are entitled to behave badly.

The campaign is designed to give you confidence by telling you "Don't be afraid to stand up" and "thousands of good people have your back."

However, the White Ribbon crew are at pains to tell us to "safely" challenge these men. It sounds to me like adivce to "safely" defuse the bomb, or "safely" put the tiger back in his cage. I can't help but notice that the White Ribbon Comittee won't actually be there if the shit should "safely" hit the fan.

The best indicator of this is the heroic stance by Ken Lay himself. Only two paragraphs after "you will be vilified by the community" he informs us:

"I know of some very high-profile people, some very well-respected people that bash their wives."

Did he name, shame and vilify them?

No.

My guess is that high-profile, well-respected people can sue.

So when they call for volunteers to take one step forward, make sure you take one step back with all the other good men.

Lastly, why are we hearing the chief of police tell us to dispense with "due process" and ostracise our fellow citizens based on unproven allegations? Why is he recommending bypassing the courts?

Why is our government funding the White Ribbon mob to organise their own group of men to control the behaviour of other men in our community? Why are our own tax dollars being given to those who will monitor and correct any thoughts and attitudes that don't conform to their ideology?

This campaign is nothing more than an attempt to suck up to the feminist bureaucrats who hand out government funding.

Incidentally, again for the hard of thinking, a not-for-profit company doesn't mean that they don't make money. They just don't have to give the profits to the shareholders. Management can give the profits to themselves as wages. Year, after year, after year.

Lay portrays himself as Victoria's Chivalrous White Knight (capitals intended), but the phrase, "We just have to keep committing resources to it," keeps popping up. More resources for the Victorian Police makes Lay a bigger fish in the pond. And a bigger fish needs a bigger salary.

Yes, there's gold in them thar violence against women campaigns.

Anyone who joins in on this campaign is not only complicit in any and all witch hunts this nonsense brings into our community, and it will; but they are ultimately feeding a monster that will eventually turn on themselves and their own family.

And, a personal warning for Ken Lay: when Michael Flood talks about feminist theory and Patriarchy, he means you, Ken. He means men in authority.

Yes, they will use you as a useful idiot to promote their ideology for a while. But feminist theory, Ken, means that you can't be left in charge. It is Feminist 101 that as long as there are men in charge, women will be oppressed.

Wait a minute, you might say. What about all of the good work I've done? The sacrifices I've made. The years I've spent. I've never hurt women. I've helped them. Supported them. Put my body on the line for them.

Geez, Ken. That would sound like a "normal" man, wouldn't it?

And Michael? Ditto, I'm afraid.

Bibliography

Flood, M., 2011. Men Speak Up: A toolkit for action in men's daily lives. [Online]
Available at:
http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/uploads/media/450%20White%20Ribbon%20-%20Policy%20Report%20Flood%20(web)%20-%20111220.pdf
[Accessed 24 August 2013].

Lay, K., 2013. CCP Ken Lay on re-thinking violence against women. [Online]
Available at:
http://www.vicpolicenews.com.au/blogs/93-oursay/975-our-say-ccp-ken-lay-on-re-thinking-violence-against-women.html
[Accessed 31 July 2013].

Ninemsn staff, 2013. Mothers making false child abuse claims: judge. [Online]
Available at:
http://news.ninemsn.com.au/national/2013/07/06/08/23/mother-s-increasingly-making-false-claims-of-child-abuse-judge
[Accessed 24 August 2013].

Whinnett, E., 2013. Chief Commissioner Ken Lay says more men need to stand up against domestic violence. [Online]
Available at:
http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/law-order/chief-commissioner-ken-lay-says-more-men-need-to-stand-up-agains t-domestic-violence/story-fni0fee2-1226682705782

[Accessed 30 July 2013].

Whinnett, E. & Minear, T., 2013. Victoria's most powerful men declare war on family violence. [Online]
Available at:
http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/law-order/victorias-most-powerful-men-declare-war-on-family-violence/story-fni0fee2-1226682821588
[Accessed 26 July 2013].

White Ribbon Campaign, 2013. Hey mate, let the world know where you stand. [Online]
Available at: http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/heymate
[Accessed 24 August 2013].

Community Organized Compassion and Kindness

Diana Davison · 25 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

I have a dream.

I'd like to present to you the foundation of Community Organized Compassion and Kindness (COCK) for which I am the current spokesperson. Erected in Victoria, BC we expect it to grow quite quickly across the globe.

I am an enthusiastic supporter of COCK. I have been boning up on history and am ready to penetrate the dark depths of deception that have led society to our current state of disrepair. I am confident that COCK will become a massive appendage of the Men's Human Rights Movement. It will be the philosophical meat of the movement and encourage activism on the individual level.

COCK isn't a single member, it is a state of mind.

Some may argue that COCK is merely trying to fuck TWAT (The Women's Activism Tyranny) but this simply is not the case. COCK takes a hard stance on personal responsibility. TWAT keeps telling us they are fixing everyone's problems, but are too focused on blame to achieve anything productive. COCK will cause some friction but, as our members swell, we believe we can fill the gap in social cohesion.

The MHRM has thus far been given the shaft and we must keep our heads to plunge forward with renewed vigour. COCK has been waiting for its time to come. That time is now.

The world needs COCK. Our governments have proven to be impotent in meeting the needs of the masses. They have milked our personal resources and wasted the seed money on useless TWAT propaganda. COCK doesn't need artificial stimulation, it grows naturally and, in the right hands, is capable of achieving climactic change.

COCK does not take a soft approach to interaction within the community. Stereotypical female compassion tries to unite people in victimhood instead of the unyielding and sometimes forceful approach that is required. Instead of filling the empty hole, they have focused on excessively selfish surface demands.

Too much time has been wasted pussyfooting around trying to placate TWAT under the premise that they have some sort of map to a hidden utopia. Nevertheless, there is a way that women can fit with COCK that is unique and exciting if they are willing to meet COCK on an equal level of participation.

COCK may be particularly overwhelming for some women but, if they are open and willing to accept responsibility, they will find it intensely rewarding. While we don't want to ram it down anyone's throat, it is time for a change in the status quo and COCK is up for the challenge.

There is no magic trick or deft move that can guarantee a wad of results and COCK doesn't claim to have all the solutions but we do believe that when you take matters into your own hands and participate in your own fulfilment, the results will be more explosive. Where society typically shames people as self-indulgent when they seek self-satisfaction, COCK promotes personal involvement and believes that empowerment of the individual will not only take a load off of society but will result in a healthier community.

COCK knows no boundaries and isn't focused on a single source of relief. We will forage every cavern, explore every chasm, and traverse every niche in our search for prosperity. We consider happiness a matter of self direction and responsibility. The only path to contentment is to act as an agent in your own satisfaction and COCK will not entertain freeloaders.

You can not just lie back and expect great things to happen to you without reciprocating.

There is a special note that needs to be addressed to women who think they can handle COCK. The modern woman has been raised to believe that she embodies compassion by virtue of her nature and has been taught to manipulate others into pleasing her then claiming that success as her own accomplishment. COCK will not be fooled by such games.

Out of compassion and kindness, COCK demands that women cease to be TWATs and take responsibility for their own lives. Whilst COCK would like you to come, we won't bend over backwards to make it happen. We expect women to participate in their own liberation without any special attention.

Because women have been historically coddled and catered to, they require special screening rituals. If you are honest with us and yourself you won't care how closely you are examined because you know you are clean of TWAT infection. If you are a true supporter of COCK you will be willing to suck it up.

TWAT has convinced women that everyone should like them. That simply isn't the case. Respect in society must be earned or it becomes arbitrary. Women care an awful lot about being liked. Get over it fast because, despite the best efforts of social justice warriors, we live in a merit based society and your actions speak louder than words. If you speak hypocritically COCK has no use for you.

Women don't need to worship COCK because it's not a religion. TWAT will claim that COCK is trying to suppress it but, if they let go of their inhibitions, women will find that COCK sets them free. Where TWAT claims that women are objects which men act upon, COCK asks you to meet on an equal level of participation.

If you've arrived at the MHRM and COCK as a woman, you are being challenged to interact as one who finds her femaleness irrelevant. There are only a couple of things in which being female helps the MHRM and they are the only reasons COCK is interested in your vagina:

1) You can say things about women and feminists in public that men can't get away with saying. Say them as loudly and as often as possible. Your freedom depends upon it.

2) You can divulge the secrets of women that they don't want men to know: Their ways of manipulating and controlling dialogue. We were raised in the world of women and we know exactly how women operate. Men quite often have no clue what conversation just happened after they talk to a woman but women listening will hear every nuance of the information-dig or set up. Women can teach men how to see it, hear it, and call it out. Though many of the men in the MHRM are quite good at catching this in comparison to other males, women know there is always another devious layer going on. That's why women will go over and over a single conversation for days – we know there was something we might have missed.

Unless you are doing one of those two things we don't care that you are female.

COCK does not support "cliques". No one in particular will back you up in an argument when you get in trouble. Just as women like to travel in packs to the bathroom, women like to have a group of friends with them when they pick a fight. That is not going to happen here. You are on your own and we expect you to hold your own when the going gets tough. COCK demands personal accountability.

The women of the MHRM, called "Honey Badgers," are women who don't act like "normal" chicks. We are happy and surprised to find other women who don't have their heads up their asses but we won't be your BFF just because we have the same genitals. In fact, I'd wager most Honey Badgers are less likely to find you either interesting or enchanting than the men are and we are far more likely to warn men when they are getting sucked in by a woman who can't swallow the truth.

The touchiest area for women in the MHRM seems to be how they feel about MGTOWs (Men Going Their Own Way) who reject marriage or long term relationships with women. COCK supports Going Your Own Way as not only a powerful form of activism, but an amazing tool for social change. We show compassion and kindness to those who are capable of withdrawing from unsupportable institutions.

For women who think they love COCK, there are a few phrases you'll hear that are important: "NAWALT" (not all women are like that) and "NAFALT" (not all feminists are like that). You won't get a good reception if you pull either of those.

All feminists ARE like that- if they believe in patriarchy they are “like that.” If they don’t believe in patriarchy they aren’t a feminist. Patriarchy is a fabricated external scapegoat for personal failure.

All women ARE like that- some just choose to not act “that way” but we were all raised to be that way either by parents or peers. I wrote an article that shows what “that way” is fairly well and it simultaneously explains why women will have a bigger challenge meeting COCK on an equal level.

Ultimately, for women who think they want to join with COCK, just being here doesn’t mean anything, it only matters what you contribute. This is a “show, don’t tell” kind of organization. We will empower you to find your own solutions and rescue yourself from victim mentality.

Women in the movement are good to have but only if you’re here for COCK and not for your own ego. This is a place where everyone takes personal responsibility for their own actions. Get used to it. Where TWAT tries to legislate compassion and manipulate resources to bail out only half the population, COCK puts your future under your own personal control.

COCK isn’t trying to fuck the world, we are saving it from the hell hole of TWAT ideologies and giving victims the chance to be heroes. Don’t wait for someone to save you, choose to be virile. COCK won’t pander to you any more.

Editor’s note: feature image by Terry Robinson. –PW

How “sexting epidemic” exposes our hypocrisy

Ty Henry · 26 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

WRITER'S NOTE: a heavily edited version of the following piece was published in the Tucson Weekly in 2010. In the wake of the events in Nova Scotia, and others, I decided to update the full text and publish it here.–TH

In March of 2009, Pennsylvania Federal Judge James Munley took the near unprecedented step of preventing local prosecutors from bringing state child porn charges against six teenage girls who took and sent pictures of themselves and each other in states of undress. The girls are just the latest example of the sexting epidemic, which has been addressed kind of like termites in the house – you've heard the creaking for years, but have turned away until the bottom falls out of your kitchen floor.

Too bad there was no Judge Munley for Keimond Brown, and the millions of boys like him

Mr. Brown was charged with Aggravated Molestation of a 13-year-old girl, and now has to register as a sex offender. Before your chorus of “They should have shot him” reaches critical mass, consider that he was 15. Oh, she also consented. The same applies to Ben Wood, the Middletown, Ohio 7th grader arrested and charged with felony child porn, and the thousands of other teen boys whose lives are ruined after being ensnared in this web, such as Phil Alpert. Some, like William Elliot and Gary Blanton, are murdered.

Nothing in our current zeitgeist illustrates the dichotomy of how differently we treat boys and girls when it comes to punishment. Sex Crime jurisprudence is the A-Bomb in The War Against Male Sexuality; indiscriminate, unmerciful, inexorable, and oblivious to the Law of Unintended Consequences. Only now that the cloud threatens to envelop and swallow whole the population these laws were drafted to protect–white girls—are we looking to the underground shelters. The Chickens have indeed Come Home to Roost, in 8 megapixel resolution, brought to you by Olympus and Kodak.

Radical feminism and social conservatism long ago saw their one mutuality – The Deadly Penis – and happily wed. For the better part of 30 years, we've seen their progeny wreak havoc, from the false Satanist molestation scares of the 80s, to the White Girl Memorialization fad of the last 15 years, from Meghan to Dru to Jessica. Whether boys with raging hormones, or men obeying 10,000 years of evolutionary biology, we've put them in the soup with Ted Bundy and Joseph Duncan. In the meantime, our girls are taught they're allowed to play House with House Money. If you enjoy it, have fun. If you have regrets or the boy/man pisses you off, run to the cops.

It has been the catalyst for the lack of any police modesty, as cops no longer know their place, and now actively lobby for more laws to enforce. Is it any wonder schools are hemorrhaging staff while at every Job Fair, who's hiring? The State and Federal prisons. Just have a look at law, which says about 95% of boys and men are sex offenders. Don't believe me? Any of you men who touched a 14yo breast, regardless of whether you yourself were 13, is a guilty of sexual abuse.

Of course, irony never takes a holiday. In 2007, 18-year-old Joshua Lunsford, older brother of Jessica of “Jessica's Law” was charged with a sexual felony after being seen at a mall groping a 14-year-old girl – his girlfriend. The hue and cry from Mark Lunsford eventually led to reduced counts and no registration. Attribute that not to enlightenment but utility. Can't have the martyr's brother sacrificed at the same altar as his fellow boys

The Sexual Hysteria Industrial Complex (SHIC) is a dissonance-free zone. I hear mothers like my aunt comment all the time about how “the girls are worse than the boys these days.” And yet, the angle the mainstream press almost invariably takes is The Boy (predator) coercing the Innocent Girl (victim). We don't call Miley Cyrus a victim, nor Brad Pitt and Wilmer Valderrama predators, even though both dated teens when they were in their mid-20s.

America is now compelled to come to grips with some Inconvenient Truths. We now have a sex crime whose primary perpetrators are 11-18-year-old women. The production of minor porn is being driven by Chelsea and Heather, not balding white Physics professors. Yes, Mrs. Robinson, your daughter and her naughty bits are on 40

Thumbnail Gallery Posts in Europe, and she put them there.

The upside of this is that we have an opportunity to re-evaluate our sex-crime laws, and hopefully shutter the SHIC. First, we must rethink how leisurely we throw around words such as “dangerous,” “predator,” and “victim.” The flasher is not dangerous; he is a creep, to be laughed at and shunned. Jessica Lunsford was a victim. The 16-year-olds who go to adult Spring Break and flash for Joe Francis are not. Michael Devlin, 40-something who befriended and abducted Shawn Hornbeck, is a predator, regardless of what Bill O’Reilly says. The guys in Adult chat rooms lured by geeks and actors pretending to be kids are not; they’re often just losers, and often just typical men. If you want to catch real predators, make the fake child nine, not 15. Next, we must acknowledge that for most Sex Offenders, treatment is the magic bullet. They have the lowest recidivism rate. Finally, understand that puberty makes one a sexual being. If John Walsh can date his future wife when he was 21 and she 16 [1], then why can’t anyone else?

Any of these laws that don’t target molesters of actual children (read: 12 and under), rapists, and sex traffickers should be scaled back, changed to misdemeanors, or expunged. Keep the felonies for all in positions of power like teachers and coaches, and stop letting female teachers like Traci Tapp, Sarah Jones and Pamela Rogers off easy if the male teachers get 25 years, like Charles Robson, whom I served time with. Believe it or not girls are better equipped to handle relationships with older men than boys are with women. See Vili Fulau and Jason Eickmeyer.

All boys who had sexual contact with girls that was not rape should have their convictions expunged. Stop rousing the sheep with Pavlovian “public notification” regimes and goofy residency restrictions that rupture families and make someone more desperate and thus likely to offend. Keep offender data with police, and notify school teachers and administrators of what local molesters, and only molesters, look like. Accept that 14 is not 9, that most relationships that cross age boundaries are welcome, that for teen girls an older boyfriend has often been a trophy (tell the truth, we ALL knew girls with older guys when we were in school), and that age of consent laws were enacted to keep girls out of prostitution. Give parents veto power via restraining order, put in more community service, and implement more sensible penalties, like lifetime computer monitoring for those convicted of looking at child porn but not trafficking, and felony charges for molesters who apply at day care centers and schools. Eliminate prison time for victimless crimes like failure to register.

Look around us. The prison and jail system has been playing hot potato with inmate populations for about 20 years, and based on edicts like those of the Supreme Court to California, many have reached a dead end. In the meantime, school systems are collapsing (my local, Tucson Unified School District, laid off a staggering 622 people in a single day back in 2009), and the Universities are dying. I wonder if they saw the disconnect before their ox was gored.

These laws are eating the young in myriad ways, and irony is merciless. How many more Keimonds, Bens, Phils and Garys do there need to be before we heed its warning?

1. “The Dark World Of John Walsh,” Men’s Journal, June 2002

Indian men treated as Collateral Damage

Amit Deshpande · 26 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Collateral Damage is what I begin to feel can best describe the situation for treatment of men in India, after watching a discussion by parliamentarians. The Indian parliament passed a bill that would amend the Hindu Marriage Law introducing new grounds of divorce under a situation described as “Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage.” Needless to say it is heavily loaded against men and is being passed on as “social justice.”

India had a hierarchical caste system, wherein the lower castes were denied certain opportunities, while the higher castes carried certain responsibilities and enjoyed liberties. In some ways, when the question of emancipation of the neglected came, it was found justifiable that sharing the limited resources by denying rights to one section and handing it over to another was social justice.

Later another form of social justice came up. This time with the baggage of a false notion of “patriarchy,” India was convinced that women have been deprived of rights and they need empowerment. Although, the definition of women remained, and even now remains only restricted to, being a wife. Any other role of woman in a household - mothers and sisters of a husband- does not evoke the same emotions due to some convoluted perception of a marital set-up by feminists and their backers.

Laws after laws are being created, which are being called pro-women, but in reality are only anti-men. When the flaws in these laws are highlighted the arguments usually end-up with mentioning of the historical disadvantage that women have had in India. Misandry like a hydra-headed monster rises in all of its forms. Somehow, it has become acceptable to unnecessarily punish the men of today to try to salvage the situation of women.

The men of my generation have begun to wonder if they are being used as fodder, so that the proponents of social justice could counter the sense of guilt in their hearts. Every politician we meet says he understands we are being discriminated against. Every person agreed that the law being framed for Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage was biased against men. Most tried to explain to us how the society in general is going through a transitional phase and ‘some’ men will suffer until equilibrium is attained. Never mind that they want to dismiss the facts about the ‘some’ men being a humungous number of 65000 married men committing suicide every year in India. The urge for the soothsayers to live in denial, makes them forget that the figure means every 7 minutes a married man commits suicide in India.

They can continue to become reason for someone’s death. But we refuse to become ‘Collateral Damage’ in their process of attaining self-satisfaction to achieve some irrational form of social justice. The Men’s rights movement in India is only getting stronger and it reflects in today’s discussion on the amendment to the marriage law in Rajya Sabha – the upper house of parliament. The discussion on this law has been another landmark for men’s rights in India, with many members from opposition regional political parties voicing the agenda of men’s rights in parliament which will go on record in the annals of history. The Law Minister had to misinform the house, at certain points to gain support, for e.g. he said the bill is gender neutral, when he knows it is not – a husband cannot oppose a petition filed by a wife, property(self-acquired before or after marriage, inherited and also inheritable) of only the husband is considered for division. The statements will be well documented in the records. History will judge that the people who brought this law were on the wrong side of justice.

The discussion has been storified here http://storify.com/antidespondent/irretrievable-breakdown-of-marriage-discussion-in

The only fear is the passage of this law, should not accelerate the numbers of suicides by men, who might feel there is no hope of help from the society. Thereby lies, the next challenge for the men’s rights activists in India, to continue reaching out to a populace of 500 million men.

Lucian Valsan on Radio 3 Fourteen

Robert O'Hara · 26 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Following Paul Elam's appearance on Radio 3 Fourteen producers of the show researched and contacted AVFM's European News Director, Lucian Valsan, for an interview. Radio 3 Fourteen is known for their anti-statist and anarco-capitalist bent. Just the perfect venue for Lucian! Please take a listen to the always informative and enlightening Valsan as he talks about what he likes to talk about most-the correlation of feminism and statism.

“Foe of the Gold-Diggers”

Robert St. Estephe · 26 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

In the American men’s rights movement of the 1920s-1930s some of the most eloquent voices in support of men’s rights – and against female privilege and misandry – were female journalists, such as Dorothy Dix, Doris Blake, Faith Baldwin, and Kathleen Norris. Likewise, some of the more prominent activists advocating for men’s rights were women. Following is a newspaper article from 1932, about one of these activists, Mrs. Samuel Gompers. The reforms Mrs. Gompers assisted in promoting were quite modest in scope, focusing on alimony, yet she was derided as “a traitor to her sex” by those women who saw the Alimony Racket as an attractive was of getting ahead by “marriage for alimony,” as the predatory practice was called back then.

Note: Samuel Gompers (1850-1924) was an English-born American cigar maker who became a labor union leader and a key figure in American labor history.

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: New York – When Samuel Gompers was alive, his wife was just a good wife who believed that the most important job she possibly could hold lay in making a comfortable and attractive home for the crusading leader of America’s organized labor.

But he died in 1924, and now Mrs. Samuel Gompers has begun to carve her own niche in the reformation corner of the hall of fame. More able hands than hers, she knew, had taken of labor where her left it. So she cast about for some other social problem to work on, and decided on divorce. So now you’ll find her championing the principles of the National Divorce Reform League, an organization if about 1,000 members which recently absorbed the National Sociological League in a drive for liberalized divorce and alimony laws.

Touched by Unhappiness

Out of a long and serene domestic life, Mrs. Gompers has launched herself into the scene of other people’s marital bickering, penury, acrimony and alimony. She doesn’t know just why she first espoused “the cause,” except that she was touched by stories she heard here and there of unhappiness and injustice.

She believes that all states should have divorce laws as closely unified as possible. And that new laws should be aimed at “alimony swindlers” and the indefinite confinement of men in “alimony jails.”

“I get letters from women all over the country charging me with being a traitor to my sex,” Mrs. Gompers said. Her young face, under a cloud of snow-white hair, into a smile. “Well, I’m certainly an enemy of gold-diggers, if what that’s what they mean.”

Pities Men’s Plight

“I’m of the also in sympathy with many men whose business careers and private lives now are being ruined by the alimony jail system.”

“Under the present law in New York State, for instance, a woman can jail a man for non-payment of alimony, whether or not he is able to pay. While he is in jail his indebtedness continues to pile up."

"When his sentence is served, if he still has no money, he can be rearrested."

The National Divorce Reform League is working on a definite program of introducing reform bills in the state legislatures. Those for New York State, which may be voted on this fall, provide:

1. That no alimony shall accrue while a man is serving time in prison for not paying alimony.

2. That no alimony shall be awarded, until the litigants have had a trial in Supreme Court, or a hearing before a referee named by the court. (Alimony now is awarded on the basis of evidence submitted in affidavits.)

3. No alimony shall be awarded to any childless wife below the age of 25. (This is intended to prevent gold-digging by ambitious young women who may be planning on alimony even before they are married.)

4. Legal separation of a man and wife for five years shall constitute ground for divorce. (Adultery is the only cause now recognized by law in New York.)

Seeks More Liberal Laws

"You can see" explained Mrs. Gompers, "that the league is really not reactionary, but only wants to effect some of the most needed reforms. I'm personally in favor of more liberal laws, and I think mere incompatibility is just cause for divorce."

"When two people learn that they just can't bear the sight of each other, they ought not have to. There should be an amicable settlement, with reasonable protection for the wife and child."

["She is a Foe of the Gold-Diggers – Samuel Gompers' Widow Turns from a Life Of Domesticity To Champion Divorce Reform," syndicated (NEA), Jul. 24, 1932, Clubs & Parties section, p. 1]

•?•

For more revelations of this suppressed history, see The Alimony Racket: Checklist of Posts

•?•

Roberta West Nicholson: MHRA 1935

Robert St. Estephe · 27 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT: It looks as if I've become the standard bearer of a crusade to make the world safe for men – Mrs. Roberta West Nicholson, author of "anti-heart balm" bill.

["They Say" column, The Pittsburgh Press (Pa.), Apr. 8, 1935, Editorial Page, p. 10]

•?•

FULL TEXT: Indianapolis — Having jousted the Hoosier "gold diggers" of her own sex off the gold standard by successfully championing her now celebrated "heart balm" bill through the Indiana legislature, Mrs. Roberta West Nicholson, crusading "lady legislator" of Indianapolis now is planning to extend to the remainder of the nation her efforts for the cause of "love for love alone."

Since Mrs. Nicholson introduced her measure in the Indiana house she has received many letters from men and women in nearly every state of the union congratulating her on initiating a "move in the. Right direction," and expressing the hope that the movement will spread to other states.

~ Other States Act. ~

She has mailed out more than 300 copies of her bill to persons; who requested them. As a result, "lady legislators" in Ohio, Maryland, Missouri and California have trotted out similar measures. In Illinois and New York similar St laws have been passed.

In Ohio such a bill was introduced in the lower house by Mrs. Blanche E. Hower. Mrs. Hower frankly said in an interview that her bill was to protect the men, "particularly those grown a bit; old but who still loved to play around.

"In my city of Akron." Mrs. Hower related, "there was a refined young woman, a graduate of Wellesley, who had a cocktail party. You men know what cocktail parties are. Anyway, when this delightful little hostess was in the butler's pantry a guest hugged her and gave her a light little kiss. Well, the husband saw it and sued the man and that family had to pay $20,000."

In Maryland a similar bill was introduced in the state senate by Miss Mary E. W. Risteau, Democrat, Maryland's only woman senator. Her bill not only would abolish the so-called "shakedown" suits, but would make filing of such suits unlawful. This provision, Miss Risteau explained, was intended to protect the "victim" from paying to avoid the "public disgrace" of being named in such a suit.

~ Overwhelmingly Passed. ~

Mrs. Nicholson's bill was passed by the Indiana house 87 to 7 and by the senate 31 to 5.

When Gov. Paul V. McNutt signed the bill. Mrs. Nicholson stood at his side.

"It was the biggest thrill of my political career," she said. "When the governor finished the signature she turned to me and said, 'Here's the pen, do you want it?' I was so excited now it's one of my most treasured mementos."

During the course in the Indiana legislature Mrs. Nicholson's bill found ardent supporters among the masculine salons. Senator Jesse Wade of Mt. Vernon, speaking on behalf of the bill, said.

"Thousands and thousands of dollars are being taken by unscrupulous packleg lawyers in such cases and it's up to us to give a woman a chance to see how it will work. It is a start in the right direction and it will overcome the filchers."

Senator Leo N. Smith of Indianapolis asserted that 999 out of 1,000 breach of promise and alienation of affection suits were nothing but "shakedowns."

"Let's eliminate this evil from the good old state of Indiana," he thundered.

~ Big Figures Cited ~

Others dipped into recent history to refresh the minds of the legislators of famous heart balm cases. The all-time high heart balm ever collected was said to have been $450,000 by Mrs. Bertha Cleavenger of Detroit. Mrs. Rhoda Tanner Doubleday, who sued Harold F. McCormick of Chicago for $1,500,000 for breach of promise, was said to have settled out of court for a fancy sum. Ann Caldwell, a Pittsburgh actress, was said to have settled her $500,000 breach of promise suit against a Pittsburgh Millionaire for $50,000. In recent years only one millionaire, Cornelius Vanderbilt Whitney, has successfully fought a million-dollar "balm" suit. It was brought against him by Evan Burrows Fontaine, the dancer. Whitney elected to contest the suit and won complete vindication, after sensational trials.

Support came to Mrs. Nicholson from an unexpected quarter during the period when her bill was bobbing around in the legislative sea Mrs. Virginia Cogswell, 28, of Chicago, who has divorced seven husbands since her first marriage at the age of 16, applauded Mrs. Nicholson's heart balm bill. Mrs. Cogswell in an interview in Chicago said she had never accepted one cent of alimony from the man who loved her, although some of them were wealthy.

~ Opinion of Muchly-Wed Woman ~

Mrs. Cogswill was quoted as saying:

"I don't believe marriage should end in financial hangover. Breach of promise and alienation of affection suits are just rackets. I've never sued anyone, except for divorce."

Mrs. Cogswell declared that outlawing of heart balm suits was a stop in the right direction. She added:

"Alimony should be added to the list of outlawed love rackets."

So Indiana is enacting Mrs. Nicholson's trail-blazing bill in the realm of affairs of the heart, has set up the principle that there is no property rights to love. For one who loves and suffers the loss of love, there is no sum in human finance to ease the heart. Love should exist for love alone and he who loses should remember that it is better to have love and lost than to have never loved at all.

[(Jack Cejnar), "Foe of Heart Balm to Make U. S. Fight – Seeks Law In Each State To Protect – Indiana 'Lady Legislator' to Extend Her War on 'Gold Diggers.' Syndicated (Central Press), Mansfield News-Journal (Oh.), Mar. 22, 1935, p. 4]

Twitter-Rage: Jane Austen made me do it!

Steve Brulé · 27 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When I first heard of the "Jane Austen twitter-rape-threat arrest" I did not think I would write about it because, I thought, he should be arrested, he deserved it. Threatening someone is a crime, so this seems like a straight forward, uncontroversial case. Make a threat, get arrested. Nothing to write about there. A threat is a threat, right?

I started thinking more about this because I saw "rape threat" comments when I posted a video of Feminist protests at the University of Toronto. I did not want to get into censoring comments, but I deleted the "I want to rape her" and "she should be raped" comments as I saw them. Not only are these comments abusive and offensive but they add nothing to any conversation. At best these comments shut down conversation, and inflame tensions.

So why do some people make these comments? I doubt that the commentators were serious, people say so much nonsense when they are in an anonymous on-line forum, but it does indicate that there is repressed anger in some men.

If a child were acting out in anger, of course we would ask "why?" If a dog bites someone, we assume it was provoked, or that it was maltreated in the past. So, what's going on with these men? Were they born angry?

The same month that ushered in the first arrest of a man for a threat on Twitter also saw the Supreme Court of Canada set free Nicole Doucet Ryan, the woman who tried to hire an undercover RCMP officer to murder her ex-husband, Michael Ryan. It was caught on video and the prosecutor believed he had an open-shut case.

After separation, Nicole Ryan asked her husband, Michael Ryan, if he wanted to get back together, but Michael wanted a divorce. This did not sit well with Nicole, so she decided to murder him. She made repeated attempts to hire a hit man for 7 months in 2008.

During trial Nicole claimed to be a battered wife whose only option to escape abuse was to murder her ex-husband, who lived 200 km away from her. And the court accepted her story without any corroborating evidence, or testimony from her ex-husband. The fact that he wanted the divorce, and moved far away, should undermine any claim that he is a threat to her. But the court accused the RCMP of neglecting Nicole Ryan and set her free. Why? So she can complete her task? Women's groups are hailing this as a victory for justice even though the RCMP was found to have behaved properly throughout all investigations, contrary to the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The pressure to grant women immunity from punishment for crimes they commit is ever present in our culture. Somehow being killed or injured by a woman is not as bad as being killed or injured by a man. That's bizarre logic, but it is promoted by tax-payer funded organizations like NOW, SOW, and the Elizabeth Fry Societies.

The "E-Fryers" believe that women cannot be criminals, but that they are "criminalized," a term that clearly dresses up the female perpetrator in victims clothes. E-Fryers go even further, stating that "women who are criminalized should not be imprisoned; all efforts will be made to prevent women from being incarcerated." Mission accomplished for Nicole Doucet Ryan!

Native American man from James Bay. Confined to a wheel chair and lives on the street in Kingston, ON

You might be tempted to think that this is an aberration; that it is not indicative of contempt for men in our culture. But there are just too many indications to ignore. We celebrate divorce when a woman gets the house, children, and paycheck. We ignore the huge numbers of male suicides, many of which are triggered by divorce. We walk past the growing crowd of mostly men living and begging on the street. We laugh when a woman cuts off a man's penis because he filed for divorce. We celebrate as "heroic" when a woman becomes a single mother. We celebrate the falling numbers of male University students as a victory for women, and then, in the next breath, chant "more needs to be done for women," for example at NASA, in business, engineering, in Scotland, the US, everywhere in every way. We also spend far more on female specific health and medical research even though men die much younger than women.

Spending on research for women's health has yielded tremendous benefits for women in breast cancer detection, treatment, and even preemptive treatment, "just in case," and there was furious outrage in the US when a task force recommended against mammograms for women under 50. The recommendation was based on science that determined the risks of testing outweighed the benefits. However, public outrage ensured that the test remained available and fully-funded.

How about widespread Prostrate cancer screening? Apparently it's not needed, in part because men are "much more likely to die of something else". To put it another way: men don't live long enough to die from prostate cancer. Hell, if all men could be persuaded to die by middle-age on the job or in war, we wouldn't need to fund any research on Men's Health. We could simply conclude that "Men don't die from heart attacks," "Men don't die from lung cancer," and even that "prostate cancer doesn't exist," because it is almost non-existent in men under 60. If they hang themselves, we won't talk about that.

But that is the point. You have to live long in order to get prostate cancer, and you have to live even longer to die from it. Perhaps you have to live as long as women live. The fact that men die younger than women may be the entire reason that more men don't die from prostate cancer. Almost all deaths from prostate cancer are men over the age of 65, furthermore, after 65 there are more deaths due to prostate cancer than from breast cancer. It would be exponentially worse if men lived as long as women. If the genders were reversed there would be multiple global movements, protests, funding sources, etc, etc.

The HPV vaccine is another interesting case. HPV was known to cause genital warts, and the following cancers from the beginning: cervical, head and neck, anal and penile cancer. However the vaccine was reserved for girls until the vaccination rate slowed in 2012. Now health professionals are promoting the treatment of boys, but it is still not funded.

Selling the importance of protecting boys from HPV is not as easy as selling protection for girls, so they point out that "It would also cut the risk of girls becoming infected through sexual contact" with boys. The justification for protecting boys must include that it will help protect the girls, whereas the girls were deemed worthy on their own. Presumably this will override the problem that "the cost effectiveness factor is not that great for boys."

The over-arching message everyday in our culture is that women are sacred. Google "Women are sacred" and you will get results like "Women are sacred 2013 conference," books on the Sacred Woman, and "Our sacred duty to honor women" conference.

Google "Men are sacred" and you will find a punk rock band.

Women are sacred. Men, on the other hand, are disposable, and the evidence is ubiquitous. Dr. Warren Farrell identified this problem 20 years ago in his book "The Myth of Male Power," and more recently Michael Gilbert explores the evolutionary reasons for this in "The Disposable Male," three very powerful words that summarize the status of men in our culture.

Dr. Farrell points out that there once was a reason for men to sacrifice and risk their lives. There once was a reward: a family, status in society, a home, grandchildren bouncing on your knee … a future. These rewards are mostly gone for many men, and replaced with ridicule, homelessness, and alienation from family life. A growing army of men face crippling, life-long support payments to the women who now block access to their children. Most of these men would have died protecting their families, without being asked.

The message that men are disposable is so common that it is invisible; it is part of the background noise of our culture, and we automatically filter it from conscious awareness, like the sound of a furnace fan. It's there all day, every day, and almost everyone has internalized it's right to be there, it's "truth." It isn't until the fan noise is gone that we may realize it was ever there.
So when a man one day thinks that he matters, not as a resource, but as a person, that his own personal fulfillment should mean something to someone, that he should not be disposable, that there is sacredness about him too, he may get angry at his past mistreatment.

To the words of Jane Austen, "Angry people are not always wise," we might add "and they make stupid threats on Twitter."

Editor's note: Be sure to check out Steve's blog and especially to watch everything on his StudioBrulé YouTube Channel. –DE

AVFM News and Activism: Men's Rights Edmonton

James Huff · 27 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight on AVFM News and Activism members of Men's Rights Edmonton will be sharing their experiences at that cities recent Slutwalk. The video turned out as expected. Our friends from MRE being approached by slutwalkers and asked about their relationship status as well as anything else that might deflect attention from the intellectual bankruptcy that is Slutwalk. Of course we will be talking about what wasn't seen on camera too.

Always a good time with the guys with Men's Rights Edmonton so please do join us!

Show starts at 8PM Central Time.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Well-intended Affirmative Insanity

Jon Gunnarsson · 27 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: this article is also available in Romanian.

Suppose you were working in a chemical lab, doing some experiment. You get careless and by accident you spill some acid into your eye. What do you do? The way I see it you have three options. Option 1: Do nothing, except blink a bit and rub your eye and hope it will get better. Option 2: Pour water into your eye to dilute the acid. Option 3: Pour a base into your eye, hoping to neutralize the acid.

Obviously, option 2 is the correct choice. Option 1 doesn't actually solve the problem and you'll experience unnecessary pain and damage to your eye. Option 3 is clearly insane. For this plan to work, you need to know exactly how much acid is in your eye and how potent it is and you need to be able to pour just the right amount of base into your eye. But even if you were able to do that, there's still the problem that the acid and the base will not necessarily spread evenly on the surface of your eye so you will have parts that have more acid than base and vice versa. It's clear that option 3 will do more harm than good.

Now consider a different scenario. You're running some sort of big organization. It could be a firm, a charity, a social club, a school, a hospital, etc. This organization has many members. Suppose these members belonged to two disjoint and clearly distinguishable groups A and B. Further suppose that you have received information that the Bs are disadvantaged and are being unfairly discriminated against. Despite there not being any official rules favouring one group over the other, almost all the positions of leadership within the organization are filled up with As and the Bs have lower status on average. You are a fair-minded person and want everyone to have the same opportunities and rights within your organization. What do you do?

Option 1: Do nothing and hope the problem goes away on its own. Option 2: Try to reduce discrimination through measures such as awareness campaigns or analyzing enforcement of rules to see if there is discrimination. Option 3: Implement official rules that favour Bs over As, such as a minimum quota of Bs in all leadership positions or a programme specifically designed to help Bs.

As in the previous example, option 1 doesn't solve the problem and option 2 is clearly reasonable. Option 3 in this case is what is commonly called affirmative action and it is just as insane and detrimental as option 3 in the first example.

First of all, there's a question we have to consider here which we did not in the first example and that is whether there is actually any discrimination. What if your information about discrimination were false? In the first example it's immediately obvious that you have acid in your eye because it burns, but with discrimination in a large organization things aren't so easy. The social sciences are notoriously inaccurate and unreliable. What if there were no acid and you poured in base anyway? What if there were no discrimination and you just introduced discrimination through affirmative action?

Maybe the reason As are doing better is due to different characteristics between As and Bs that are not due to discrimination. Maybe As are more intelligent or better educated, maybe they care more about your organization, maybe they care more about status, maybe they are more willing to make sacrifices to attain high positions, maybe they have more assertive and dominant personalities, maybe As or Bs or both are more comfortable with A leadership.

But even if there is indeed discrimination, it's not possible to accurately assess its precise nature and severity. If you introduce too little affirmative action, you're not solving the problem, only ameliorating it slightly. If you introduce too much affirmative action, you create a new problem. If you don't distribute the affirmative action properly, you will overshoot your goal in certain areas and not do enough in others.

Suppose for instance that we could subdivide the two demographics. Group A is actually made up of groups A1 and

A2. A1 is actually the only group that's privileged, while A2 is not. So even though when we regard group A as a whole, A is privileged, it is actually just because of the A1s pulling up the average. Then suppose we can do the same thing with B. B1 is not actually discriminated against, it's only B2s who actually face discrimination.

So at the start we have one group that's unfairly privileged, one group that's unfairly discriminated against and two groups that are being treated fairly. Then we introduce affirmative action and let's suppose that we magically know exactly what sorts of measures we need to take to make groups A and B even. But then we look at the subgroups and see that we now haven't actually made anything more fair. A1 is now no longer privileged and B2 is now no longer discriminated against, but the two groups that were being treated fairly before have now merely switched places. A2 now faces unfair discrimination through the affirmative action measures while B1 now has unfair privilege. So even in this idealized world where we can precisely assess the exact right measures to bring about equality between the two groups, we haven't actually gained any ground. As and Bs collectively are now even, but when we look at the actual individuals, we haven't improved the situation. Groups have no existence of their own beyond the individuals who make them up. Only individuals think, act, and feel, so the only thing that matters is our treatment of individuals.

A further problem of affirmative action is that it is coercive and violates the principles of meritocracy. Because of that, people will try to resist it and you are likely to experience a good amount of conflict within your organization. You'll need to constantly apply pressure to push through and sustain your reforms, which costs a great deal of money and angers people. You also create resentment against Bs. Bs in leadership positions are going to be taken less seriously and command less respect because people will suspect that they got their jobs through affirmative action instead of merit. It also creates a lot of divisiveness between As and Bs and separates them firmly into two different camps.

Things get even worse if the government gets involved. Even if the government officials have the best intentions, they do not know the details of the industries they're regulating. They just impose some rule from up high that everyone must follow. Because the government does not have to pay for the costs of affirmative action legislation, it is more eager to pass such laws.

More troubling yet is that forcing private companies to comply with so called anti-discrimination legislation is a gross violation of property rights. One of the fundamental aspects of property is the right to include or exclude people from the use of your property. If I own a piece of land, I can forbid you from trespassing. But if I own a company, I no longer get to decide freely who to hire or fire. This erosion of property rights not only hurts the economy, but also infringes on basic economic freedoms.

But the worst thing of all is that the vast majority of politicians are not wise and benevolent leaders who only wish to serve their country. Rather, they act in their own self-interest, often at the detriment of everyone else. Modern democracy does not reward wise leadership and prudent management. After all, most of the voters have neither the inclination nor the knowledge to fully assess most of the decisions that a politician makes. Thus, politicians are more interested in signalling than in effective policies.

Advocating for affirmative action may be very detrimental to society as a whole, and a politician may even be aware of this, but the point is to be seen by the public as doing something against discrimination. It is about signalling opposition to sexism, racism, xenophobia, or other undesirable views. It then becomes difficult for political opponents to oppose proposals for affirmative action without signalling support for discrimination.

It's impossible to legislate away bigotry through affirmative action. You cannot stop unfair discrimination through further unfair discrimination. Fighting fire with fire is highly dangerous, usually not successful, and people are likely to get burnt in the process. In the end, the only effective way of stopping discrimination is through awareness and through economic self-interest.

In a free market, bigotry doesn't pay. If for instance an entrepreneur were a true misogynist and didn't want to hire women, no matter how qualified they are, then he is passing up opportunities for making profit. His competitors who do hire women will do better than him, making it difficult for him to keep up. If he doesn't relent, his market share will decrease and eventually he may go out of business.

This process may take a while, but in the end it's the only way to achieve a just and meritocratic society.

News week in review Aug. 19-26

Robert O'Hara · 27 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to another Week in Review, brought to you by AVFM.

Item: The Vile Tweet Dr. Phil Deleted.

This first tidbit comes from our old friend Dr. Phil who is now on the run from a feminist lynching simply because he asked the question: "If a girl is drunk, is it OK to have sex with her?" It makes one wonder how many hypocrites answered no to that when almost every man has had consensual sex with a woman who has been drinking of her own volition.

Item: Man grabs girl's arm, now he's a sex offender.

That's right, if you are an adult male and you grab a girl's arm in an attempt to admonish her for running out in front of a moving car that you were driving you will end up on the sex offenders list. Perhaps he should have just run her over. He likely would not even have gotten a ticket as she was jaywalking.

Item: Woman inspector 'humiliated' by failing riot test wins up to £30K.

Millions of men throughout history have failed to pass certain physical tests that their employment depends upon. It has always been met with acceptance because, lets face it, there are some jobs you simply should not be allowed to perform if you do not pass the physical requirements. Of course if you are a woman you don't have to take failing a test sitting down. You can simply say you were humiliated and earn 30,000 pounds in a UK court for feeling 'humiliated' because you were 51 years old and could not pass a test that many men could not pass if they were 30.

Item: AVFM secured an interview with T.J. Kirk, AKA The Amazing Atheist regarding his recent brush with YouTube censorship of some of his anti-feminist videos.

Item: Trapped in trauma: Male victims confront sexual assault in the military.

In a rare instance, a major media outlet actually published a story about male victims of sexual assault in the military. They even broke the age-old taboo of acknowledging that over half of all sexual assault victims in the military were male. Kudos to Leonora LaPeter Anton of the Tampa Bay Times.

Item: Ten-year-old girl charged with raping 4-year-old boy.

"I've never dealt with a child this young being accused of a crime," said Quanell X, who is working with Ashley's family.

"In fact this was nothing more than inappropriate horseplay that has now led to a child that is ten years old being charged with aggravated rape."

One wonders what Quanell X would say if it were a 10-year-old boy who was charged with raping a 4-year-old girl.

Item: New discovery of a matriarchal society unearthed.

Amazingly, it was brutal and murderous. But we thought women were the nurturing loving ones, and weren't brutal and domineering like Patriarchy?

Item: Feminists plan major Wikipedia censorship/propaganda campaign.

Apparently, the fact that most Wikipedia contributors are male is just too much for these folks. Their answer to the problem? Just mob Wikipedia with a major campaign of editing and contributing until Wikipedia says what they want it to say.

Item: MRA Edmonton covers Edmonton Slut Walk.

Wonderful coverage of Slutwalk from our friends at MRA Edmonton. To be featured on AVFM News and Activism radio show Tuesday night. Tune in!

Item: Grass eating man speaks out for the first time in western media.

Youtuber LifeAfterWomen (LAW) gives us, for the first time ever, an interview with a self-identified grass-eater from Japan. MGTOW is definitely a worldwide phenomenon.

Item: August 26th was U.S. National Women's Equality Day.

National Women's Equality Day commemorates the day in 1920 when women's suffrage became law.

Perhaps someday American men will have an "equality day" as well – you know, to commemorate that day in the far, far future when women are compelled to sign up for Selective Service (the military draft) in order to get those same voting rights, too.

India's sexually repressive society and gangrapes

Anil Kumar · 28 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Today, in Indian cities you can find McDonalds, Subway and KFC. On Indian roads, you see people driving Audi and Mercedes cars. You can watch Hollywood movies in HBO at any time of the day. However, the entire Indian subcontinent's cultures are sexually repressive even today. It's very difficult to imagine for a Western man, hence I will give some examples.

If a guy brings his girlfriend to his rented house during the weekend, his land lord's family will most likely create a big fuss and he may be even told to vacate the house at the earliest. The whole street will gossip about this issue. If a young guy takes his girlfriend to a hotel to stay, the man at the reception will certainly demand the identity cards of the guy and the girl to find about their relationship. You will get suspicious looks unless you check in with a woman who is your wife. The only way for a young man to check in to a hotel with a young woman is to claim that she is his sister, which the receptionist will try to verify by checking the surnames in the identity cards.

Indian police can beat up young couples if they kiss on a park bench. During Valentine's Day, there were instances of goons roaming in the streets to beat up young couples walking hand in hand. Some male and female goons even force the young couple to get married by forcing the guy to tie a symbolic necklace around the woman's neck.

So, where do young couples in love have sex? Often, they have sex in office toilets, parking lots, elevator lifts, ATM Machine rooms, in cars in lonely areas, or even in the jungles at the outskirts of a city. It is not unnatural for these young men and women to head to lonely places to have sex. Some go to a dilapidated building or closed industrial buildings to have sex. Some give a few bucks to a bus driver in a parking area to have a quickie in the bus in the evening or at night.

The sexual repression enforced by our culture sometimes puts young couples in dangerous situations. If they go to a jungle or a lonely dilapidated industrial complex to have sex, there is always a chance that there may be some criminals or drug addicts around. If someone decides to have sex in a bus by paying few bucks to the driver, what if the bus driver turns out to be criminal and decides to call couple of other criminals? It happens.

Now, feminists are not criminologists. They have no clue why crimes happen in any society, and they are the people least interested in solving crimes anyway. At best, they claim using their giant brains that all crimes happen due to patriarchy. So, on one hand they claim women's right to venture into any criminal-infested area, and then they raise a hue and cry if there is an incident of gang rape. Today, Indian women venture into some dangerous areas in the evenings or night, which a man would be afraid of going even in the day time. Sometimes, these women drag their male friends or male colleagues with them to dangerous areas using shaming language to question their manhood if they are afraid.

On the other hand, questioning a woman's decision to venture into a nearby jungle in evening is not acceptable for feminists, or the media. They claim it is victim-blaming. So, no one educates the young women to avoid criminal-infested lonely areas. The sexual repression in our society forces the young couples to venture into lonely areas to have sex.

As the media sensationalizes rape cases, the repressive society responds by calling for more sexual repression. The Indian Supreme Court recently called for banning pornography, and others called for covering store mannequins in lingerie. Some went a few steps ahead and called for even covering the naked copulating statues in ancient temples at Khajuraho and Konark.

Finally, the Western Feminists and Media play their part. They laud the bravery of raped women and convince the U.S. State Ddepartment to give awards to a few victims of gang rapes in India. They all work to pressurize the Indian Government to enact extremely draconian, undemocratic rape laws, which are useless when women keep going and dragging their boyfriends to criminally infested areas for having sex or for private or professional reasons. It is a country of 1.25 billion people and in any country there will always be small percentage of criminals.

Of course, after an incident of alleged gang rape, sometimes a nice packaging is done to the story to hide the actual facts.

A young woman was allegedly raped by five men in a dilapidated industrial mill, in Mumbai. Why did she force her male friend to accompany her into it in the evening, when working men around the area do not dare to venture into it even during the day time?

http://www.dnaindia.com/mumbai/1879066/report-mumbai-gang-rape-dilapidated-isolated-and-eerie-shakti-mills-is-a-spooky-fortress

> Inside is a sprawling and dense overgrowth, where drug addicts roll and snort and smoke, and alcoholics sprawl, dead to their surroundings. People working and living around the compound don't venture into it. They know what lies inside. Nishar Ahmed is one of them. He owns a shop next to the mill. "I have been living and working here for 15 years and not once have I dared enter the mill. I was here when the gang rape took place but got to know of it only after the sudden arrival of the police. A dense forest is what I call the mill compound."

Video related to this post:

References:

Goons beat up young couples for holding hands on Valentine's Day:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=TlOqJYTYHy4

I guess I'll go my own way

Jared White · 28 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Ah shit he back!

Yo J they thought you was gone man

Oh they thought I was gone

Should know by now I ain't goin' nowhere but to the top

They don't know

Shhhit

Well they gon' learn today boy

(Heh heh) let's go

The world's changin'

People drawin' lines in the sand

Got a target on yo wallet and yo back if you's a man

Bewildered women askin' bout where all the good men gone

The ones who die to fuel the world and make their pussies feel strong

Why the fuck I gotta buy you drinks and pay for yo dinners

From initiation onwards gotta work to be a winner

While you sit up on yo ass and judge which dick will get the pass

But I don't need a ho so I think I'm just gon' hold on to my cash

Pay close attention bitch cause this man bout to tell you where you fell off

You can take these tips to all your little friends after you step-off

Keep your grimey gold-diggin' apsirations to yourself

Trade your affections for affections not money not wealth

Find another chump that'll let you use yo pussy for a free ride

Suck him dry wit child support the court is always on your side

Debtors prison ain't my future strivin' towards a brighter day

(Shhhit) Well hey…

—

I guess I'll go my own way

And the world can stay lost in confusion

Keep yo shame about a good man

Cause I ain't got no use for it

I'm done given of myself

So you can have no worries

Time to step up out the office

And get yo hands dirty

No escapin' this phenomenom

It's goin international

Grass eatin' mutha fuckas

Got you all irrational

Cry, stomp yo feet, laugh at me

I don't give a fuck

Just one thing left to say bitch

Sayonara and good luck

—

Verse two gotta a little somethin' for the men too

All those sacrifice for women types

Yeah this one's for you

I don't need to step up for women to prove that I'm a man

You hear that Mr. President

Ya'll really need to understand

My money and protection go to those that I deem worthy

Can't shame me to submit

My will is far too sturdy

What the fuck you think would happen

When you run these bullshit PSAs

Male feminist bgiotry

cloggin' up the airwaves

Tellin' me my dick gives me the sole obligation

End the violence and the rape against women

In my nation

Just ignore the male victims of these crimes focus on the women

One question for you dumb fucks

Are you trippin'

Run back to your masters

Cause this slave done broke free

And don't forget your piece of shit hate filled ideology

Embrace freedom till the bigotry has seen it's final day

Till then…shit…

—

I guess I'll go my own way

And the world can stay lost in confusion

Keep yo shame about a good man

Cause I ain't got no use for it

I'm done given of myself

So you can have no worries

Time to step up out the office

And get yo hands dirty

No escapin' this phenomenom

It's goin international

Grass eatin' mutha fuckas

Got you all irrational

Cry, stomp yo feet, laugh at me

I don't give a fuck

Just one thing left to say bitch

Sayonara and good luck!

—

Available for download right here, y'all.

The Voice of Europe: Sexual harassment

AVfM Radio · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

On August 30, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the issue of sexual harassment, whether it's just another tool of feminist establishment or a well-intended policy that went severely wrong and how individual men can protect their property and liberty from the very harsh, vague and misandric sexual harassment policies.

Sexual harassment is usually defined as "bullying or coercion of a sexual nature, or the unwelcome or inappropriate promise of rewards in exchange for sexual favors." Now you can already see that by this definition, almost any innocent behavior can be deemed as sexual harassment.

And since we live in a culture modeled by feminist-oriented line of thinking, the actual application of the sexual harassment policies ends up screwing men's lives because they are men.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PM Moscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means August 31, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Site performance and other notifications

David King · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]

Site performance

Today, I enabled the final major set of site performance improvements (as, hopefully, you'll have noticed). You'll get the very best possible load times when logged out, but it should still be much improved even when logged in and commenting.

One side effect of these changes is that in browsers that block non-secured sources on pages loaded via https://, certain page elements (including style sheets) won't be loaded and the site will look decidedly odd. This won't affect most users because https:// access is not the default (HTTPS is only used for logins) but I'm aware that some users force HTTPS access.

I don't expect any problems arising from this, but please let me know of any issues or strangeness in the comments.

Email notifications (new articles and comments)

As of August 27th, Automattic (publishers of wordpress.com and Jetpack) finally fixed the broken link problem in email notifications for new articles and comments. So far, so good but, as ever, let us know if you see any problems.

Comment editing

~~I'm sorry to say that I've heard nothing more beyond our initial contact with the comment edit plugin author, and so have nothing new to report. We'll keep at it.~~

In the meantime, use the https:// work-around if you need to fix up a typo.

Update: The plugin author has come back with a fix, and comment editing now appears to be working again. Post any problems in the comments below.

As the team continues to make enhancements to the site in the buildup to the long-awaited AVfM 3.0, watch for more updates from us. Cheers everybody!
[/box]

Feminists are obnoxious bigots

VFM News and Commentary · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

At least one Member of the British Parliament has the guts to tell the truth. Feminists are obnoxious bigots.

When they aren't outright hatemongers.

Honey Badger Radio: Dr. Phil and the Feminist Inquisition

James Huff · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Don't be that guy. My strength is not for hurting. Men can stop rape. Hear what she's really saying. She fears you. No means no. Teach men not to rape. Yes doesn't always mean yes.

According to the people responsible for these slogans and catchphrases, one of the primary purposes behind them is this:

People need educating. What is consent? How is it conveyed? When is it vitiated, by circumstance, by morality or by law? How do you tell when it has been given? How do you tell when it has not?

These are pressing questions, according to feminists. Questions that require not only answers, but an ongoing "conversation" and campaigns of public education so as to affix those answers in the psyche of the average man…I mean person.

And what does this conversation sound like? It sounds like Dr Phil tweeting "if a girl is drunk, is it okay to have sex with her?" A simple question devoid of even the hint of an opinion, requesting honest responses from the general twitter-going public. A way to get a feel for where average people stand on this apparently contentious issue. Why did he ask the question? To research an upcoming show.

And what response did Dr Phil get from feminists? They collectively took up their pitchforks and torches, and barraged him with accusations of rape apology and misogyny, insinuations that he himself is a rapist trying to defend his behavior, and a change dot org petition demanding that he not only apologize for the tweet, but also devote a show to the topic. Um… okaaaayyyy…

They're feminists, people. They don't have to make sense. Especially since in their minds, Dr Phil is guilty of the gravest of sins. He is a man, and he dared to talk about something that might possibly have something to do with rape. What he didn't realize is that Feminists own that word and that issue, and for a non-feminist, let alone a non-female, to speak about, or even have an opinion about, rape is blasphemy.

Join the three of us–that is, Karen Straughan, Alison Tieman and Della Burton–this week on honey badger radio, as we discuss Dr. Phil and the feminist inquisition, 6 pacific, 7 mountain, 8 central, 9 eastern daylight saving time.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Erin Pizzey recovering after stroke

Andy Thomas · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
Erin Pizzey, patron of A Voice for Men UK and long standing campaigner against domestic violence, suffered a mild stroke several days ago, causing her to lose mobility on her right side. Undaunted, she simply continued her work helping men and boys, and indeed all those who suffer injustice, using only one hand to type at her computer.

She was finally admitted to hospital on Tuesday evening.

She is currently recovering and undergoing tests. She sends her love to well wishers and I'm sure she will be back with us soon.

This Saturday's show, "Revelations with Erin Pizzey," will be canceled, but Erin is in good spirits and hopes to resume the show by September 7th.

Watch for further updates on A Voice for Men UK.
[/box]

Citizen Order issued against child-abusing judge

VFM News and Commentary · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

A formal complaint has been made against Judge Michael Kelly of West Virginia.

CITIZEN ORDER OF RECUSAL AND DISQUALIFICATION AND IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE MICHAEL J. KELLY

Putnam County Family Court

Halburn

Vs.

Halburn

11 -D- 516 (Putnam)
13-0651 (West Virginia Supreme Court)

August 25, 2013

The following is federal Constitution protected free speech under The First Amendment's guarantee of the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances:

This Citizen Order of Recusal and Disqualification of Judge Michael J. Kelly is made necessary by the outrageous behavior and misconduct of Judge Kelly who has made a career out of abusing fine West Virginia fathers and their children. This order is a lesson in how West Virginians should be treated and how Judge Kelly has significantly abused and terrorized family members of Mark Halburn. This citizen regrets having to issue this lawful order. However, the West Virginia Supreme Court, including Chief Justice Brent D. Benjamin and former Chief Justice Menis Ketchum failed to stop Kelly's blatant and gross misconduct when they had the opportunities to do so. Therefore, this citizen is stepping up to the plate and doing the right thing and ordering Kelly's Recusal and Disqualification from this case. In addition, this citizen is doing the right and humane thing of permanently ordering Kelly off the bench and into the mental ward of a West Virginia prison. The man is sick and needs serious mental therapy and intervention not available on an outpatient basis anywhere in our great Mountain State.

Child-abusing Kangaroo Court judge Michael J. Kelly

"Send the child-abusing judge to prison." That's the demand made to the West Virginia Supreme Court and legislature about Kanawha County Family Court Judge Michael J. Kelly by Putnam*LIVE*.com Publisher Mark Hallburn who says he's had enough of "The cretin in the black dress."

Monday, August 26th, 2013, Hallburn filed a Citizen Order of Recusal, Disqualification and Impeachment against Kelly with the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals, Putnam Circuit Court, and e-mailed copies to every West Virginia legislator.

"It's time to stand up for West Virginia families," says Hallburn. "I'm calling on the West Virginia Supreme Court to show some ethics and family values and toss Kelly from the bench straight into a mental institution in state prison. And the legislature needs to impeach him so that he can't collect a pension or run for another office. Kelly is an egomaniac and a disgrace to the judiciary. He is evil."

Over the past 18 months Kelly has refused to let Hallburn's son, Matthew, visit his dying grandmother, Nancy, take spring break trips, visit Disneyland, visit zoos, attend his cousin's weddings, in California, and share his first day of school with his father.

Kelly is coming under fire from national groups as well. Dean Esmay, of AVoiceForMen.com ripped Kelly's misconduct.

"Appalling behavior," says Esmay, of via Facebook. "Child abuse, honestly no better term for it."

"Judge Kelly has turned his hearings into Nazi Show Trials," says Bruce Eden of Dads Against Discrimination. "Fathers are treated like Jews, in Berlin, in 1938."

The West Virginia Supreme Court has let Kelly get away with it-so far. Chief Justice Brent Benjamin has proved that protecting the child abusing judge is a priority in Benjamin's administration by refusing to recuse Kelly from the case-multiple times. Benjamin has refused several interview requests by Putnam*LIVE*.com-making it obvious that he has no excuse for his appalling actions.

Will the legislature and supreme court enforce the Citizen's Order and punish Kelly? "Highly doubtful," says Hallburn. "They can't spell ethics if you spot them the vowels, consonants, and bring in Vanna White to flip the letters. Shame on them! When Judge Kelly violates their children's civil rights they will feel the pain that other fathers feel every day, in West Virginia."

Meanwhile, Kelly sees the writing on the wall. Rather than face the music for abusing West Virginia children and fathers, he has announced that he is retiring at the end of the year.

"He can become the national spokesperson for Chick fil A," says Hallburn. "He'll fit in well with all the chickens."

Note: this item reprinted from Putnam*LIVE*.com.

Germany's quota politicians

Jon Gunnarsson · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If you're a woman in Germany, you should consider a career as a politician. As in most First World countries, gynocentrism is ubiquitous in German politics.

Unsurprisingly, the feminists tell a different story. According to them, men are in charge and women are being kept out of political leadership by some insidious cadre of evil old men. And it is indeed the case that women are under-represented in political office compared to the general population. Even though women make up 50.9% of the population[1], only 32.9% of the members of the Bundestag (the most important legislative body in Germany) are women[2].

But such comparisons are silly. You don't suddenly get voted into the Bundestag willy-nilly, but have to go through a career as a politician where you climb the ranks of the party hierarchy. While it is theoretically possible for independents to be voted in, this almost never happens in practice. So with some very rare exceptions, being a member of one of the big parties is a necessary condition for getting into the Bundestag.

Thus, it makes a lot more sense to look at the representation of women in the Bundestag compared to the ratio of women within the major parties. This gives us a very different picture. There are six major parties in Germany. The two conservative parties CDU and CSU have a permanent alliance and act as one faction within the Bundestag. Along with the classical liberal FDP, they form the current government. The opposition is made up of the social democratic SPD, The Left, and The Greens.

The proportion of women within the parties as a whole ranges from 19.5% for the CSU to 37.8% for the Greens[3]. Here we see the reason why "only" 32.9% of the Bundestag is female: women quite simply aren't as interested in politics. And not only are they less interested in pursuing political careers, women all over the world also tend to be less knowledgeable about politics[4].
CDU and CSU have a ratio of female members of 25.6% and 19.5% respectively, while 20% of their members of the Bundestag are female. This makes them the only Bundestag faction in which women are under-represented compared to the party members. In the FDP, women are slightly over-represented with 23% party members versus 24.7% Bundestag members. On the left side of the political spectrum, the gap is much wider with 31.5% versus 38.3% for the SPD, 37.7% versus 52.6% for The Left, and 37.8% versus 54.4% for The Greens.

The over-representation of women is even more pronounced within the top ranks of government. Angela Merkel's cabinet consists of herself and fifteen federal ministers. There are a total of ten men and six women, a female ratio of 37.5%[5], much higher than among both members of the Bundestag and among the parties as a whole.

And while this should give the women's crusaders pause, this of course does not prove discrimination against men. There are many possible explanations that do not involve any discrimination. Maybe women are better able to judge their own abilities and talents and there is a self-filtering aspect where only those women who are especially talented politicians enter into politics, which would also explain the lower numbers among the rank and file membership. Possibly women are just better politicians in general. Maybe they have better people skills and are therefore preferred by party leaders.

All these and many more scenarios are possible and cannot be ruled out, however little evidence we may find for them. After all, we don't know as much about the inner workings of the parties as do the people directly involved, so we can only speculate. However, what we do know for certain is that most parties openly favour women. Except for the FDP, all major parties have some sort of quota system.

The most extreme case is The Greens, where at least 50% of all election lists and committees must be filled by women. At party meetings, female and male speakers alternate. If there's more female than male speakers, then that's no problem. If the reverse is true, a vote is taken whether those remaining men also get to speak. During party meetings, women may call a women's vote at any time. In this case, all men have to leave the room. The remaining women then vote on whether to exercise their veto right. If they veto a proposed resolution, it is rejected (but may be brought up again at the next assembly)[6].

Remember that all of this takes place in a party with just 37.8% female members. If we assume for the sake of argument that men and women within The Greens are equally competent, this would mean that a randomly selected woman within the party has a 44% higher chance of getting into the Bundestag than the average, while a randomly selected man has a 27% lower chance. Taken together, that means the woman has a 96% higher chance of making it into the Bundestag than the man.

And while The Greens are most extreme in their discrimination, the other parties on the left are not far off. The Left also has a 50% quota while having just 37.7% female members. Here the female advantage to get into the Bundestag is 110%, even higher than for The Greens. The SPD has a 40% quota and reaches a comparatively moderate value of 35% female advantage.

On the right side of the political spectrum, things look more even, with the FDP not having a quota and a female Bundestag advantage of just 9.8%. CDU and CSU have a 40% quota, but one that isn't as rigid as in the other parties. The main reason why the female ratio for the conservative parties is so much lower than 40% are the peculiarities of the German electoral system. For the biggest parties (CDU/CSU and SPD), most or all of their Bundestag seats are won by regional direct candidates, rather than election lists, so these parties have less control over exactly who makes it into the Bundestag. In the conservative parties, men actually have a slight statistical advantage when it comes to the Bundestag. (And a huge disadvantage when it comes to federal ministries, with five out of nine conservative cabinet members being female.)

But these numbers do not tell the whole story. In fact, the situation is probably stacked even further against men. In basically any field and any discipline where there is relatively free competition, men dominate the top ranks. This is most evident with physical sports like football or tennis, but even in chess and poker, practically all the top players are men. The business world presents a similar picture, with almost all highly successful businesses started and run by men. Even in traditionally female pursuits such as cooking, all the world's best chefs are male.

Where ever men and women are left to compete with each other, men do much better at the highest levels. We should expect the same pattern to hold in politics, and until only a few decades ago, this was the case. The reversal of that situation today may be due to increased ambition, education, and self-confidence in women, but this is unlikely. If that were the driving force behind the rise of women in politics, we would see the same pattern in all competitive fields.

What this suggests is that women are much more advantaged than the above numbers indicate. If both sexes were treated equally, most likely we would see an ever smaller ratio of women the higher we go up in the political hierarchy. The fact that we see the reverse points to massive discrimination against men.

The pertinent question then is: Why do parties promote and nominate women who are less competent than their male competitors? This question can be answered in one word: feminism. Feminism has spread the notion that there is widespread discrimination against women and that equal representation of men and women is desirable and just.

Feminists have never made any coherent arguments for these positions. They've merely appealed to widespread egalitarian sentiment which absurdly regards equality as a good in itself, and made some baseless assertions about the superiority of female leadership. The latter is occasionally backed up by some terribly flawed study, but more often relies purely on a general pro-female sentiment that is innate to the human species and driven to extreme by our gynocentric culture.

A secondary reason is that promoting quota-women is beneficial for the leader of a party, because it will stabilize his power base. Women who were escorted to the top by the leader are less likely to challenge his rule, because they tend to be less competent and less ambitious than politicians who made their way to the top through hard work and backstabbing.

In this way, quota-feminism starkly illustrates many of the weaknesses of parliamentary democracy. The belief that the people are sovereign is an illusion. The real power lies in the hands of the parties. Which politicians get into the Bundestag and into the cabinet is decided by the parties, not the people. The people can only vote for one of the handful of programmes the parties offer them (which they may or may not follow once they're elected). And in a country where you can only vote for different shades of misandry, that's not much of a choice.

References:

[1] http://www.bpb.de/nachschlagen/zahlen-und-fakten/soziale-situation-in-deutschland/61538/altersgruppen
[2] http://www.bundestag.de/bundestag/abgeordnete17/mdb_zahlen/frauen_maenner.html
[3] http://de.statista.com/statistik/daten/studie/192247/umfrage/frauenanteil-in-den-politischen-parteien/
[4] http://www.esrc.ac.uk/news-and-events/press-releases/26789/women-worldwide-know-less-about-politics-than-men.aspx
[5] http://www.bundesregierung.de/Webs/Breg/DE/Bundesregierung/Bundeskabinett/bundeskabinett.html
[6] http://www.gruene.de/fileadmin/user_upload/Dokumente/Frauenstatut.pdf

KFC takes down “Hot Shot” ads, SAVE takes credit

Robert O'Hara · 29 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box](Washington D.C. August, 28 2013) Stop Violent and Abusive Environments (SAVE) announced today that Kentucky Fried Chicken has ceased their “Hot Shot Bites” Youtube ad campaign. While KFC has made no official statement regarding the ads, it appears that they took them down in response to a swell of outcry concerning their capricious depiction of violence directed at men. SAVE is taking credit for the development.

The ads, depicting a woman slapping a man in the face and then taking his “Hot Shot Bites,” which were introduced several months ago, sparked outrage in the men’s rights community. SAVE responded with a petition as well as sending activists to KFC restaurants to complain. Facebook ads were placed in and around Louisville KY., the location of KFC Headquarters, and several radio interviews with SAVE operatives were held concerning the ad campaign. An email sent to SAVE supporters stated “the horrible ads were removed due to the efforts of thousands of individuals” and that the “removal occurred right after a week of intensive publicity and advocacy efforts, including radio interviews, emails, and restaurant visits around the country.”

However, SAVE is still not satisfied with the results.

“But, our work is not done. We believe that KFC needs to apologize. We think they should acknowledge their mistake, and make a good-will effort on behalf of domestic violence victims,” said Terri Stoddard, Program Director of SAVE in an E-Alert sent out today. She asked supporters to contact KFC and ask that they make a public apology and a donation to any organization working to help all persons affected by domestic violence. “Save comes to mind” Stoddard said of donations.

KFC Contact Info:

Email: johncywinski@yumyum.com
Call: 800-225-5532,extension 1, 1, then 4[/box]

Racketeering lawsuit against family courts

NCFM · 30 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

CaliforniParents File Federal Racketeering Lawsuit against Family Court Judges; Charge Criminal Extortion, Bribery, Abuse of Office

PRESS RELEASE

August 20, 2013 — San Diego, CA – In its continuing campaign to end the harassment, fraud, and abuse rampant in California State Family Courts, a parents' rights group, the California Coalition for Families and Children, has filed a lawsuit today in federal court charging the San Diego County courts, social workers, divorce attorneys, and psychologists with federal criminal racketeering.

"The abuses of parents and children by Family Courts, social workers, and family law attorneys have harmed parents and children for far too long. We intend to end that abuse." says CCFC President Colbern Stuart. "Family court is designed by its makers to be probably the most dangerous life event parents and children can endure. It enables and profits from every inhumane instinct known to man—greed, hate, resentment, fear—resulting in abundant cash flow for the divorce industry and a fallout of parent and children's misery."

"And behind the curtain of this machine of misery we've uncovered its cause—the multi-billion dollar divorce industry, populated by judges, attorneys, and a machinery of tax-dollar fed "judicial administrators," social workers that George Orwell would marvel at." "We've been delivering that message kindly for years now, yet the tide keeps rising on families in crisis. We've appealed to the county courts, state and local politicians, state judicial oversight bodies, United States Representatives, and just plain old human dignity, but the harassment and abuse of parents and children has only increased. A resort to federal court intervention in the widespread criminal collusion in state government was the next logical step."

"It's time to recognize Family Court for what it is—a corporate crime ring raiding parents and children of financial and psychological well-being, and devouring our children's futures. And its not just divorce lawyers—its judges, "judicial administrators," psychologists, cops and prosecutors—people we should be able to trust—in a modern day criminal cabal using county courtrooms and sheriff's deputies as the machinery of organized crime." Say Stuart. "Since state officials' hands are too deep into the cookie jar to stop their own abuse, we're seeking the assistance of federal oversight."

CCFC has been active in past years uncovering fraud and abuse of families and children in state courts, including the consumer fraud case of Dr. Stephen Doyne, the most notable child custody elevator in San Diego. "They not only let Doyne run wild for years, they actively protected his abuse of parents and children. In my mind, the industry is a godless abomination" says Stuart. "One of our parents who challenged Doyne and lost was ordered—by the same court that employs Doyne—to pay Doyne's attorneys fees—over $380,000—for calling out his undisputed fraud. It's outrageous, and its going to stop."

CCFC's Complaint details both civil and criminal charges. "We've alleged over 34 specific federal crimes in the complaint, and we're turning our evidence over to the F.B.I. and U.S. Attorney for further investigation." Says Stuart.

The Complaint is available online through its facebook page at www.facebook.com/ccfconline details.

Quotes:

"The present-day suffering of so many parents and children has and is being wrought within a larger system characterized by a widespread institutional failure of—indeed contempt for—the rule of law.""California legal institutions such as family courts and the legal community, professional institutions such as the state bar and psychology boards, and criminal justice institutions have in the recent decade gradually combined to cultivate a joint enterprise forum in which widespread “family practice” exceptions to the rule of law are not only tolerated, but increasingly encouraged. Professional behavior that would only a few years ago be recognized as unethical, illegal, or otherwise intolerable by American legal, psychological, law enforcement, or social work professionals has increasingly achieved acceptance—indeed applause—from institutional interests which benefit from a joint enterprise enforcing the unwritten law of “who you know is more important than what you know.” “In this lawless behavior’s most crass infestation, California Superior Court Family Division judges are regularly heard to announce, in open court, “I am the law” and proceed to act accordingly with impunity, indifference, and without shame.”

“The effect on parents and children seeking social support within this coalescing “family law” forum has not been as advertised by courts and professionals—a new healing—but instead a new affliction: an ‘imposed disability’ of de rigueur deprivation of fundamental rights in the name of ‘therapeutic jurisprudence’ funded by converting college funds into a bloated ministry of the bar leaving families and their children with mere crumbs of their own success.”

The case centers on the April 15, 2010 assault of CCFC’s President, Cole Stuart, at the San Diego County Bar Association meeting of family court judges and attorneys. Stuart was attending the meeting of family court judges and attorneys on behalf of CCFC. SDCBA recognized Stuart as the President of the Parents’ Rights group and ordered fifteen armed bar association security to tackle him, handcuff him, and throw him out.

According to Stuart, around ten CCFC parents and children attended the seminar to advance their reform efforts and send a message of “doctor, heal thyself.” The San Diego County Bar Association meeting of judges and attorneys chose a theme critical of their own clients: calling them “Litigants Behaving Badly.” CCFC chose a counter-theme: CCFC parents and children carried signs stating “JUDGES BEHAVING BADLY; if YOU don’t follow the law, why would WE?”

“Judge Judy may be entertaining daytime television for some, but that indignity has no place in our justice system—even in what they consider to be “low-brow” family court. Yet many family court judges regularly administer such obnoxious ‘renegade’ justice every day, in open defiance of the rule of law. ‘Sober as a judge’ these days has a whole new meaning.” Says Stuart—“I’ve been a successful lawyer for 18 years and seen both excellence and failure, but I’ve never been ashamed of my profession until the days I walked out of family court.” “I decided then that this lawless rolling train wreck of shame to my profession and harm to my community must stop. And for that inspiration, they sent me to jail.”

CCFC and Stuart are suing SDCBA and the dozen judges and lawyers who organized the seminar. “They were well aware of our intent to be present at the Seminar–and had fifteen Sheriff’s Deputies and a paddy wagon waiting to welcome us when we arrived. We had been in court to seek sanctions against them in the morning, then they assault me that very evening.

According to the CCFC Complaint: “Family Courts, including judges, blame “Litigants Behaving Badly” for harms enabled—indeed largely manufactured—by the Domestic Dispute Industry’s own longstanding predatory commercial practices. CCFC saw the “Litigants Behaving Badly” theme as part of the self-delusional propaganda engaged in by so many [divorce industry] members who, rather than recognizing the harm their industry enables and “healing themselves”, instead blame their own clients, who, quite true, do regularly abuse process, their loved ones, and even themselves—in perfect compliance with [divorce industry] instructions.”

The lawsuit alleges that divorce lawyers illegally conspire with judges to steal from parents as part of a racketeering criminal enterprise—and brings over 30 claims of federally-indictable crime. “Civil rights violations, fraud, and obstruction of justice are federal crimes—even for judges.”

The lawsuit seeks to hold judges and courts personally responsible for overseeing the crime committed by the attorneys and social workers in their courtroom. “Judges have a legal and ethical duty to ‘ensure rights’ under the judicial canons of conduct. It’s just not possible that intelligent lawyers like judges don’t understand exactly what goes on in their courtrooms, yet they allow it to continue. In CCFC’s opinion, this judicial collusion is far more serious crime than even the fraud of divorce attorneys themselves" says Stuart.

CCFC has filed a motion for a protective order preventing the San Diego Defendants from harassing them "Since they've known about CCFC and its reform toward the more humane family dispute resolution solutions we offer, they've treated us as enemies of the state. When we thought we'd be welcomed, or at least heard, we've instead become targets of prosecution and terrorist threats–They assaulted me, harassed our members including threatening "gun cock" and death threat late night phone calls, attacked our businesses, professional licenses, and threatened to jail and extort us with further crime. It's outrageous that our own government allows this to happen, and we're asking the federal court to protect our members as we pursue the civil and criminal charges against the courts."

A complete set of filings and exhibits is available from CCFC's Facebook page at www.Facebook.com/ccfconline

About: CCFC is a nonprofit organization of parents-both men and women-who have experienced marital dissolution proceeding in San Diego, Orange, or Los Angeles Counties, Our members are professionals or others who are highly motivated to improving governmental and justice system process addressing domestic relations, parentage, custody, and abuse.

CCFC seeks to promote the health and success of all families–parents and children equally and alike. We perceive that parents and children presently lack effective and independent advocates within government and the civil and criminal justice system, and as such their rights and interests are regularly compromised in favor of the institutionalized interests of others, including government, private attorneys and professional service providers, and the enormous domestic dispute industry. CCFC organizers, officers, and affiliates are professionals dedicated to improving social, governmental, and justice system processes concerning domestic relations, child rearing, parenting, constitutional law, child custody, and domestic violence. Many of CCFC's members are mothers, fathers, and children who have withstood abundant hardship resulting from the current practices of what is generally described as the "Family Law Community." These injuries and insults include fraudulent, inefficient, harmful, and even dangerous services; an institutionalized culture of indifference to "clearly-established" liberties; insults to the autonomy and dignity of parents and children; extortion, robbery, abuse, and more, delivered at the hands of eager operators within the divorce industry.

Click here to read the entire complaint: CCFC V SDCBA VERIFIED COMPLAINT AND COVER SHEET FOR FILING-signed-redacted 2

A dethroned tyrant – 1902

Peter Wright · 30 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The following article was discovered buried in an old newspaper and is reproduced here for your entertainment. It details the growing practice of women entering all areas of society, not only to work alongside men, but to replace them – a trend that has prevailed and increased to this day. The author of the article asks whether the marginalising of males, if continued, might lead to men becoming isolated upon reservations and a form of "gynocracy" being instituted. I'm sure readers at AVfM have some easy answers for this 110 year old question. – PW

[image]

A DETHRONED TYRANT

Ample Evidence that Man's Position is growing Precarious

The position of the dethroned tyrant, Man, is growing precarious, reports the New York Sun. "Woman's Spear," which Prof. Artemus Ward asked the strong-minded woman not to spear him with, is becoming more and more dangerous. The poor devil is being crowded out. Doubtless he is getting what he deserves. Still, the giant woman should not be tyrannous in using her strength.

Every day the head of the ridiculous Samson is shaved a little nearer to the hide. A woman relieves her husband of $1,000. He has no redress, says the courts. A woman has a right to search her husband's pockets and snap up such sums as she chooses, says the Missouri Solomon, Judge George B. Sidener. Day by day the law prunes something from man's already beggarly status. Day by day his employment is taken from him. Most of the novels and magazines are written and read by women. A few struggling men still keep their hold upon the typewriter's keys, but they fight in vain against Fate, who is a woman herself. Many men who could write novels if they had a chance are now the pilots of elevators. But the elevator girl has sprung up in Chicago. The woman office holders are numerous in the west. The Missouri woman suffragists have fixed their commanding eyes upon the supreme court of that state. They say that women are eligible to be judges of that court. We foresee the triumph of the gown, and man, petty man, thrust from the bench.

The physical exploits of the women folks are as brilliant as their Intellectual successes. Women play foot ball. Women belong to fire companies. In St. Louis the other day three factory girls had a fist fight, described as highly scientific. Last week Mrs. Ernest F. Burmeister, wife of the sheriff of Dane county Wisconsin, took "two burly convicts" to the state prison, her "38-caliber revolver handy in her pocket." The country is full of athletic women, trained in many exercises and tall of their hands. Hear this plaint of weak man ruled by a muscle of iron; the plaint of Hon. George R. Conover of Chicago against the wife of his bosom:

"I married a woman who was a physical culture teacher. She amused herself by throwing me across the room, smashing me with both hands, throwing me down and sitting on me until I was almost suffocated. We are the same weight, but I couldn't do anything with her. She made a punching bag of me. Once, when she hurt her hands on me, she took a club and put me out."

The gradual exclusion of man from his former vocations and avocations may be compared to the retreat of the red Indian before white civilization. As the fringe of white settlements widened so does the range of feminine activities widen. In time will man be isolated upon reservations and gynocracy prevail? Who knows? Women can do what they will. Man is feeble. In our ears still rings an awful voice, the voice of that vindictive Kansas woman who proclaimed a year or two ago that men must be annihilated.

SOURCE: Omaha Daily Bee, Monday December 29, 1902

FreeThoughtBlogs' Jason Thibeault, confessed rapist

Birric Forcella · 30 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

If feminists define rape, Thibeault is guilty as sin.

The FreeThoughtBlogger Jason Thibeault, also known as the Lousy Canuck, is, by his own feminist standards, a confessed rapist.

Unless you live under a tight rock formation you have probably heard that the feminist and skeptic/atheist communities are in an uproar over a recent accusation by PZ Myers on his FreeThoughtBlog(s). In short, he is accusing Michael Shermer, one of the very big names in skepticism/atheism, of being a rapist. The accusation is based on the story told by a friend of a friend. Names must remain anonymous because, as we all know, women are afraid to come forward because they are not believed, feel threatened, and the police never do anything.

In essence, PZ Myers' position is that since women have reason(s) to be afraid, they should be allowed to make their accusations anonymously by "Chinese Telephone" (hearsay in the nth degree), no questions asked – and the rapists must be tried and punished in the Court of Pub(l)ic opinion. Not to make these accusations known is, according to PZ, extremely harmful since it shields the rapists and allows them to rape forever with abandon. For this reason Myers' accusation appears under the heading of "ethics." As we all know, Myers is the most ethical guy bestriding this narrow earth.

So Myers outed Shermer as a rapist on third-hand anonymous evidence. The ensuing shitstorm dwarfs the kerfuffle of Elevatorgate.

This has extreme implications for the Men's Human Rights Movement. Few seem to notice that Myers' claims go far beyond this one case. The feminists are ready to apply this principle universally. Even if in this case the accuser should come forward and Shermer were to be proven a rapist, it would not stop there. Accusations like this would spring up like mushrooms, all covered by the new PZ "ethics." Of course all would be directed at men. If this new ethics gains traction we will all be in deep trouble.

In this context, a friend of ours was approached by an ardent feminist friend who had evidence that one of the FTB guys – The Lousy Canuck, Jason Thibeault – was a rapist himself, by feminist standards, hiding in plain sight there for years and possibly mocking victims and feminists with his unctuous faux feminist concerns. This feminist friend of our friend had evidence (the written statements of the perpetrator himself) and airtight arguments. No feminist could possibly dismiss her.

However, this feminist friend of our friend is well aware that FTB and PZ Myers play hardball. She is afraid that nobody will believe her warning. She is scared to death because she has good reasons that going public will result in threats and severe retaliation. She is very much afraid for her life. FTB doesn't deal kindly with dissenters. Obviously, she is also afraid to publish on any other feminist website.

So, in her desperation she approached our friend and gave him the story. It was a whopper of a story. However, our friend saw that it was all based on pure facts that Jason Thibeault had disclosed himself right there on FTB. Her arguments are standard feminist arguments and should convince anybody on the feminist side.

So, while it may seem odd for us giving voice to a feminist, this one had no other outlet for her rage and dismay. So we decided to have compassion and do the ethical thing. She mostly dictated this piece to our friend, and it is all in her words with minor edits.

She fervently wishes that her words be heard and that you don't hold it against her that she is breaking her silence on this website. She is afraid that on any feminist blog her voice will simply be erased. She is also deathly afraid that her silence may endanger many other women with whom Jason Thibeault may come in contact. She thinks that for ethical reasons she must warn other women.

The following piece was – with slight variations – submitted as a comment to the Lousy Canuck blog. Needless to say, it never made it through his "moderation." Jason Thibeault had every chance to answer it. He chose silence.

Update: In the meantime 5 other women have come forward to accuse Jason Thibeault. They also have good reason to assert that he is a rapist, given the evidence. They demand that accusers be believed. Surely, more women will come forward.

Trigger Warning: Truth

I was reading the Lousy Canuck's (Jason Thibeault's) blog from August 10, 2013 "The web of trust: Why I believe Shermer's accusers." One passage made me sit up with alarm.

http://freethoughtblogs.com/lousycanuck/2013/08/10/the-web-of-trust-why-i-believe-shermers-accusers/

Here is what he stated a bit down in the text:

"When I was 16, my first girlfriend accused me of rape in order to preempt any acrimony over her sleeping with someone else, and the only things that saved me — unpopular kid as I was — were the facts that she'd repeatedly and demonstrably lied to a lot of people about a lot of things very often, eroding anyone's trust in her, and because she happened to tell a lie integral to her accusation that I could disprove.

"Her accusation ruined her own reputation amongst her then circle of friends, but she moved on, built new trusts, violated them as well, and generally made a wreck of her life as far as I cared to follow."

Jason details the whole incident in an earlier post from May 22, 2009.

http://freethoughtblogs.com/lousycanuck/2009/05/22/this-ones-gonna-be-raw-lots-of-naked-jason-and-not-the-good-kind-you-are-warned/

That post doesn't add much to his current description, but it differs in some crucial details which I will explain later. At this point let us only mention that the "lie" concerns the claim by the girl that she defended herself with a screwdriver stabbing his chest. He feels exonerated by the fact that he showed his chest unwounded apparently many weeks later (by his own statement) to his friends. Not only is it possible that the young girl misjudged how deeply she had stabbed, but it is equally likely that the wound had completely healed by the time he bared his chest. Also, in his earlier post he openly states that he is a serial liar. More about that below.

Please follow me in this very real scenario:

So, we know that he was accused of rape. That is a fact he admits. Now what about his response/excuse? Here's why it won't/can't fly among feminists:

First, a simple statistical consideration. Feminists believe that less than six percent of rape accusations are false. Also, 1, 2, or 3 out of 4 women are raped in their lifetime, depending on the (supposed) research you quote. In his earlier post Canuck says that she made one more rape accusation about another guy. Now, the chance that she was REALLY raped at some point in her life is huge (according to the above statistics) and she would certainly have made an accusation in that case – she isn't shy about these things. From the above numbers it is clear that there is a 50/50 chance that the encounter with the Canuck was the real rape. We only have his word for it that it wasn't. Do we trust him? That's the crux of his post. From his own words and contradictions we can't trust him.

Well, from a feminist point, his excuse doesn't/can't fly in any case. He's lucky it was more than 15 years ago. If it went to a real courtroom today, he wouldn't have a prayer. Even in a REAL courtroom his defense that she is a serial liar won't be admitted due to shield laws that serve women well. Her accusation would stand on its own. We hear it was a well-rehearsed story (if it was a story). So it would probably be credible. She's also under-age. Even in a real courtroom Jason would have a better than 50/50 chance to come away with 25+ years in prison and a permanent spot on the sex offender registry. He would likely be tried as an adult. Let's remember that these rules exist to protect women.

Ironically, his best hope would be the cops investigating her claim. Cops are agents of the patriarchy. Like typical cops they may imagine that they see through her story and not charge him. Cops often fancy themselves rational. We know they rarely believe victims. Of course, feminists are rightly outraged about that. However, once it gets into court, only those facts would be heard that get filtered though shield laws and similar laws. These filters were put in to benefit victims and to make rape convictions easier.

But let's look at a court venue that has been largely shaped by modern feminist thinking – if this comes up on a college/university campus, Jason's chances would be practically 100% for conviction. His career and his life would be ruined, as it should be for a rapist.

The standard here is "preponderance of evidence." So it only needs to look like more than 50 percent likely that he did it. Now, everybody in higher education has read the numerous studies that prove that false accusations are (much) less than 6%. From the bat, the evidence preponders against Jason at 94%.

Like in real court, he can forget about bringing up her history. Even the attempt would count as a negative. In these courts, fortunately, you won't be allowed to smear women.

Next, he can forget about legal representation. Lawyers don't try to find the truth. Lawyers work to get perpetrators and rapists off. These hearings also don't have a jury, since juries can easily be swayed by the smug lies of a rapist. He can also forget about cross-examining his accuser. Fortunately, in these hearings it is not allowed for the victim to be re-victimized by the rapist's badgering. There is also no need for physical evidence. We know that most rapes don't leave physical evidence. Finally, and most fortunately, the judges will be versed in feminist literature and theory. Most of these judges are wise women who have their own ways of knowing. A rapist can't pull the wool over their eyes.

So much for Jason's chances in legal proceedings. Now, what should WE on the internet make of the story? We only have Jason's word for it that he is innocent. Can we believe him? He is a man, so he belongs to the group that is extremely likely to offend sexually. It is also a vital part of our basic feminist worldview that we must always believe accusers.

Here on the internet, we can judge by different standards – and the outcome is not very pleasant for Jason. So, let us explore how that plays out:

First, let's unpack Jason's excuse. He actually tells us (probably unwittingly) a lot more than is good for him.

There's this surprising tidbit:

"Throughout our relationship, that first girlfriend had been a compulsive liar. I covered for her — I became extremely adept at explaining why what she had said wasn't so much a lie as it was a misinterpretation of facts, or a misspeaking of the truth, even to the point where I was lying to cover for her lies…"

So, we learn that Jason started out as a serial liar, lying for exactly the girl that later accused him. He became "extremely adept" and he probably still is.

Then there is something very fishy about this sentence:

"…the only things that saved me — unpopular kid as I was — were the facts that she'd repeatedly and demonstrably lied to a lot of people about a lot of things very often, eroding anyone's trust in her…"

Funny, in his earlier post it seems rather clear that "everybody's trust" had been built, at least in large part, on his own lies, covering up for her. But we only hear that people's trust in HER was eroded. Nobody took him to task for his own lies!

Note the guarded way in which this sentence is put. It does NOT say that she made up other rapes – neither then nor later. She lied about "a lot of things." From that we can infer that this was probably her ONLY rape accusation. She was raped again later – but since Jason has no info about that, feminists MUST assume that that was a real rape, too.

What about that “eroding anyone’s trust in her.” Well, we only have Jason’s word for that, but we have to remember that this was a long time ago, when all kinds of women’s claims were not believed or belittled. From Jason’s earlier story it is quite clear that it was HE, Jason, who started the eroding. His current post says nothing about it. However, it goes on an on how Jason now gained lots of friends and circles of trust, basically by beating a rape charge. I would bet that in those times the menz all were just too eager (and relieved) to believe him.

This becomes even more plausible when we remember that Jason had lied in harmony with her all along. How come she was so easily disbelieved while he was lionized? There is the scent of a whole fishpile here.

This ties in with Jason’s paragraph relating how the woman fared later in life, in sharp contrast to our hero Jason:

“Her accusation ruined her own reputation amongst her then circle of friends, but she moved on, built new trusts, violated them as well, and generally made a wreck of her life as far as I cared to follow.”

Why did HIS lies not ruin HIS reputation? For any feminist, the answer is easy: it seems quite likely that the menz would have believed him even if he had had a scar on his chest from the screwdriver. It’s obvious they WANTED to believe him and disbelieve her.

The last sentence of his August 10, 2013 post reads like sheer mockery.

“Sure, it’s not photographic evidence, but you know how well even THAT works amongst those primed to deny any rape allegations ever brought forward.”

There you have it – straight out of Jason’s mouth. For “those” kinds of men even photographic evidence isn’t enough. But it’s exactly “those” kinds of men he uses as witnesses for his innocence. Jason himself asserts that they would see what they wanted to see, scar or no scar. Jason shits on his own witnesses and still wants us to believe him.

What’s even funnier is the fact that nowhere Jason mentions girls. He only talks about the guys and how they believed him. What about her girlfriends? Didn’t they believe her? Or doesn’t that count? Besides his girlfriend, no women appear in his story at all. Maybe women don’t rate.

Now, every feminist should immediately grasp the meaning of the quoted paragraph about her later life. HE IS ERASING THAT WOMAN. She’s a no-good bitch. She gets what she deserves – only, in the earlier post it says nothing about that. In one of the comments Jason lets us know that she was raped again and that her current boyfriend is in jail. Is that her fault? How did that make a wreck of her life?

What’s more, I simply don’t buy Jason’s whole 2009 post. It’s a Just-So story. It tells a wonderful yarn about a nerd overcoming odds to become a “manly” man. All the things in his path seem to be wonderfully arranged so that the outcome is foreordained, just like in a Grimm tale. His father is the right “Cajun” father who can beat gangs of ruffians. The hero quits boxing just when he has success – because he doesn’t like hurting people (yeah, right!). There is that girl that accuses him of rape and everybody believes her. But whaddaya know, she tells exactly the right lie that’s a cinch for him to “disprove.” When he gets jumped, helpers just happen to pop up and out of stopped cars. He gets just the right cape jacket to make him look “sharp” for the dance. The tropes go on and on.

The post isn’t really about the rape, or any of the other stuff. The post is about him feeling “most ‘manly'” – it says so literally at the end of the story. And, WOW, now he even has a small coterie of drinking buddies (I kid you not – those are HIS words).

Manly? Wait a minute. Callous would be the better word. 15 years later he is still erasing her. She is reaching out to him, but he is proud to rebuff her. That seems odd for a feminist. After all, he goes to great lengths to describe that she, herself was a very damaged child. He also tells how he himself was emotionally unavailable to her and damaged her even more. In his own words:

“I mean, that’s what manly men are about, right? Sex all the time? Even though I really wasn’t feeling any particular draw toward having sex, any more than I was feeling any particular draw toward jacking off all the time, the very idea that I was capable of getting sex suggested to me that I was better than the bullies had convinced me that I was."

and

"The relationship lasted about a year, though it wasn't really built on much of anything except for teenage hormones and being in love with the idea of having a girl/boyfriend. Yes, hormones, and we had a good deal of consensual sex throughout the relationship, making me feel at least a little bit manly for the first time in my life…"

It's all about him. Not a word about how she may have felt. He was using her to make himself feel better. It's excusable for a teen. It's probably also excusable that when she found a more emotionally suitable man she had no good way to handle the conflict (how could she?) – and came up with a rape story (Assuming this was a false accusation). I mean, really, as a feminist, doesn't Jason at least have some charity for her?

And now they are in their thirties. The woman reaches out to him via Facebook. Wouldn't any empathetic person want to try to find out what really happened? Maybe she is hurting. Maybe she is in despair over that affair. Maybe she deeply regrets the incident. There is always more to any story. Jason himself even gives an explanation in his earlier post: "… my first girlfriend accused me of rape in order to preempt any acrimony over her sleeping with someone else…" Why is Jason so callous? (Always assuming the accusation was false – if he is the rapist, though, then callousness makes eminent sense.)

But no! Jason objectifies her as the evil bitch. I could understand it if Jason had suffered trauma from the accusation, but apparently it left him unscathed and helped build and confirm his manhood. According to him, he gained and grew from it. What would he have to lose to reach out to her? This seems like a strange reaction for an empathetic feminist (Always assuming the accusation was false).

In his earlier post:

"I told her no, then said goodbye and hung up despite her protests. Not hearing her out, not letting her convince me it's worth another try — that was a pretty man-like thing to do in retrospect. Out of all of the above, it's the part that feels most "manly". [sic]"

And in a comment he writes:

"Oh, and she tried to add me to Facebook last year. One of the many reasons I left."

The whole tenor of this earlier post is: "Behold the manly hero who prevailed through adversities posed by females! AND Behold the vanquished woman, she is ERASED." And he repeats that pattern exactly in his new post. That poor woman gets objectified in the service of Jason's narcissism.

Can we trust Jason? Here it gets tricky. First, let me quote a current comment from the "Atheist Experience" blog on FreeThougtBlogs about the same issues:

"A quick glance at the facts will tell you that someone being a "good guy" is practically useless as an indicator of whether they're really a good guy. Why? Because the bad guys know how to stay hidden."

Comment by LykeX on August 10, 2013 at 12:33am ln FTB Blogs, "The Atheist Experience" Title "Right ways and wrong ways"

Sure, Jason has a history of being a good guy and fighting for women's issues and morality and all this splendid stuff. How much should that count? According to Jason's post, it's a matter of the trust he has built up. According to most other feminist writers, it shouldn't count at all – it's just a smokescreen.

Maybe his buildup of trust was only a cover. Maybe now more victims of his will come forward – possibly having friends of friends finger him. Maybe a number of women will now reassess acts he has done in the past. Maybe those things don't look so innocent any more. Maybe we need to encourage women to come forward. Maybe we need to tell all the women in his circle(s). After all, the facts of the accusation have been established. He disclosed them himself. It would be unethical not to warn other women.

Why would Jason mention this affair in his current post where it serves no discernible purpose? Why did Jason post his original 2009 post? What would drive a man like Jason to brag that he has beaten a rape charge? Let's face it, that's what it is, basically – narcissistic bragging.

Most males need to brag about their accomplishments in this area. It's often the reason for doing it in the first place. What greater thrill for a rapist than to discuss his rape in plain sight – and nobody picking up on it? It's all about male ego. It's about mocking the victim(s).

Maybe all his moral writings were merely meant to make him feel better about his rape. Maybe he thinks they will be a defense when the circumstances of his (alleged) rape have been bared – the way I am doing it right now – or even worse.

On the internet we can point out that this meets all the criteria of victim blaming, rape culture and, indeed, privilege. Without his enormous privilege Jason could never have gotten away with his disclosure for so long.

Women need to be outraged and take the strongest possible action.

Consider this: Among his supporters Michael Shermer and many others have built up a record of trust and circles of trust far superior to Jason's. Jason is a nobody compared to Shermer. Yet, it is clear that Shermer's good record and reputation can be no defense in the eyes of feminists.

And then consider this: Let's not forget that the case against Jason is much stronger than the case against Shermer. By Jason's own admission, there is a real accuser with an actual rape story (all self-disclosed by Jason). In the case of Shermer we merely have some accusations via Chinese Telephone made by PZ Myers. "Friends of friends have told me and I believe it…" The evidence against Jason is in plain sight. And he is a self-confessed "extremely adept" liar.

Let me say it again: Women need to be outraged and take the strongest possible action!

So, is Jason a rapist? It's hard to say. Possibly not, just as Shermer may not be – we may never find out. But the fact is, he was accused, and the fact is also that according to his own arguments and position, his excuses don't fly, not in criminal court, not in a university disciplinary procedure, and certainly not in cyberspace among feminists. The fact is, he's a self-professed liar.

To quote Jason himself:

"What do skeptics do when presented with evidence that they don't like? Assume the person made it all up, of course!"

This leaves one more question, and it's a serious one for FreeThoughtBlogs and PZ Myers. What will you do with someone who is a self-proclaimed rapist by feminist standards? Will you shield him? Will you throw overboard your feminist principles just because "he's one of us"? Will you use a double standard for people on your side vs. people on the other side? Will you treat the matter with silence and re-victimize and erase Jason's accuser in the process? Will you believe a self-professed liar?

PZ – what are you going to do?

Birric Forcella (Editor for friend of friend)
Proudly using both heads.
birricforcella@gmail.com

This piece is a slight revision of a comment I made to Jason's (Lousy Canuck) post on FTB. Needless to say, it didn't make it through his "moderation" – which is why I am publishing it here. He had every opportunity to address this issue – he preferred silence.

Update: On August 19th Jason wrote a post addressing related issues. Apparently some people didn't catch on to the real meaning of his “false rape” disclosure and came at him with lines like: “See, you admit there are false accusations.” His answer is strictly to “double up” on his stance- he says, in essence, there are extremely few false accusations, but I, Jason, in my charmed life, had one and beat it. It sounds like he won the lottery. Shermer’s life appears to be much less charmed.

Again, he did not address any of the evidence, concerns, or arguments in my writing above. It should drive any woman into a white rage.

2nd Update: Whaddaya know, a second FTB blogger is currently being accused of sexual assault.

He, too has a handy-dandy excuse. As feminists, we must believe accusers. Surely, something must be behind this.

http://freethoughtblogs.com/amilliongods/2013/08/28/faux-rape-accusations-and-richard-sanderson/

But in any case, we shouldn’t make too much of his excuse. Let’s remember this quote from an eminent feminist:

“Men who are unjustly accused of rape can gain from the experience.”
– Catherine Comins, Assistant Dean of Students, Vassar College.

Silly brown women, feminists NEED you

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 30 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Now run along and take care of those little white babies.

I've been following the #solidarityisforwhitewomen hashtag on twitter and chortling rather gleefully every time someone tweets a total burn!

https://twitter.com/search?q=%23SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen&src=hash

I've argued before that feminism as a political ideology only caters to white women who work outside the home for wages, and that white women have approximately zero interest in seeing life get any better for the women who do all the shit work white ladies are too precious to submit to.

http://judgybitch.com/2013/01/30/feminism-is-a-voice-that-speaks-for-all-women-as-long-as-youre-white-and-rich-and-you-work-outside-the-home-the-rest-of-you-bitches-can-step-off/

What I find really, really interesting is that not only are feminists unwilling to look at how their cushy lives are made possible by all the work that women of color do, they don't even seem willing to reach out to those women who have broken through the cultural barriers to achieve the feminist white lady version of success. How many writers at Jezebel, Slate, the HuffPo Women, the Frisky, xoJane and any other number of feminist blogs have nannies and housekeepers who work, most likely, without standard labor force protections and benefits that white ladies pretty much take for granted?

How many white feminists writers stop in the middle of their oh-so-important work to text the nanny not to forget about Imogen's dentist appointment and the bus fare is on the table?

If feminists were the exceptions, the wonderful employers who provided fair wages and benefits and working conditions to THEIR black women, don't you think they would trumpet that from the rooftops?

crickets

Yeah, not so much, huh?

http://www.domesticworkers.org/pdfs/HomeEconomicsEnglish.pdf

I find it a little sad that black women are still trying to find some way to have a conversation with white women about how they can be included in the whole feminist discussion. Here is Mikki Kendall, the woman who started the whole hastag, reflecting on the experience.

> Even now, in my conversations with other women of color it has come up often, how White the narrative around feminism is, and how that Whiteness lends itself to the erasure of the problems specifically facing women of color. Early #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen tweets were an expression of my personal frustrations with an ongoing problem in digital feminist communities. However, the conversation rapidly moved beyond the personal into the structural problems that have kept this divide in feminism alive.

http://www.ebony.com/news-views/on-feminist-solidarity-and-community-453/2#axzz2d2EB4o50

Ah, the structural problems. There's the rub. And here's the truth: white women cannot participate in the labor force without having an exploitable source of domestic labor, and the culture of entrenched poverty and single motherhood in the black community continuously creates a workforce for white women to use and abuse.

It might be ugly to read, but there you have it. There are two things white feminists do NOT want to encourage or examine in any meaningful way: solidarity between men and women of color, and women of color who are closing the gap with white lady accomplishments. Both of those things threaten women's exploitable pool of poor workers, and if those workers disappear, so do market opportunities for white women.

Someone MUST do the dirty work. Someone MUST cook and clean and tend to the very old and the very young. And that someone is NOT going to be a fancy feminist with her Women's Studies degree and ambitions to get the top salary at that not for profit agency she works for providing services based on whatever ideological bullshit the agency has been able to spin to Big Daddy government.

And we're talking a lot of money. One day, I will have to track down all the grants and funding directed specifically towards women, and unpack just how much cash is at stake for the professional feminist brigade. It didn't take me long to find this site:

http://www.americasgotgrants.com/grants-for-women.php

Raise your hand now if you are SHOCKED that I cannot find a grants for men mirror site. The America's Got Grants homepage explicitly offers "women" as a category. But not men. There are no grants specifically for men. Men have to qualify under some condition other than "genitals".

http://www.americasgotgrants.com/

American white women get a lot of assistance in the form of cash from the Federal Government, but it's not enough to cover all the expenses. White women still need a helping hand. Successful white women are successful because they have women of color to stand on.

Awww. That's so sweet. I love that women of color are willing to leave their own children all day to go and take care of white babies. Makes me wanna go buy Aunt Jemima pancake syrup right now.

[image]

http://www.returnofkings.com/12753/successful-women-use-poor-women-to-advance

You know what's really funny? That stereotype about black women being really sassy and loudmouthed and sarcastic and caustic and angry? Where is it now? Latina women have kind of the same caricature applied to them, no? If EVER there was a time to get mouthy and rude, this is it. White women have built an entire political ideology on the backs of women of color and the best women of color can do is call them out gently and respectfully?

Y'all need to get your bitch on, if you ask me.

These two tweets in particular caught my attention:

I would personally think these idea through really carefully. White feminists have a vested interest in making sure that relations between men and women of color are deeply fractured and hostile. Marriage is one of the best ways to build wealth and transmit it to the next generation, in effect becoming "economically white". I'll add the disclaimer that not all white people are married and wealthy, and those who aren't have the same shitty choices as any other poor person, but of all the families that are rich, most of them are white, heterosexual couples with children.

[image]

http://www.pewsocialtrends.org/2012/08/27/yes-the-rich-are-different/

And they have their own colored folks to pick up the slack and keep life ticking along smoothly.

It really sucks that whenever we talk in the media about women of color, it's usually along the lines of poor, illiterate, uneducated, exploited, blah blah blah and here I am doing the exact same thing. That's not to say we shouldn't be discussing the social and cultural aspects of race and gender, but when that's ALL we discuss, it's a problem.

[image]So let's end today talking about the enormous strides women of color have been making in the managerial and professional occupational categories. It ain't great news, but it's good.

> The employment of women of color increased dramatically in the period between 1990 and 2001. The rate of change for African American women is the lowest increase at 43 percent and the rate of change for Hispanic women is the highest at 104 percent.
>
> Although women of color still remain a relatively small percentage of all officials and managers, their increase in the decade between 1990 and 2001 is dramatic. Their rates of changes range from 75 percent for African American women to 135 percent for Asian women.

http://www.eeoc.gov/eeoc/statistics/reports/womenofcolor/womenofcolor.pdf

Women of color continue to push their way to the top of the economic ladder, and in one sense that's really great. Our entire economy and society is built on the assumption that the cream rises to the top. The barriers we put in place against the truly smart and capable and intelligent and ambitious for spurious reasons like race or ability or class or gender hurts our whole society.

We need our human capital. But all that human capital starts out in the same form.

Women of color scrambling their way to the top still need their toilets scrubbed and their kids fed and the laundry done.

It comes back to the same question: who is doing the grunt work?

If women of color think feminism is going to help them untangle the web of domestic labor and race and social conditions, they are sadly mistaken. White women have no incentive to do so, and don't even want to have the conversation.

They can't afford to. How are white ladies supposed to storm the barricades without colored women to man the fort?

http://impactofilms.com/maidinamerica/

> Some of the biggest advocates for feminism seem to believe that in order to feel powerful you have to make another woman subservient, and that is not what feminism is about at all. – Tori Amos Tori Amos?? Oh really, Tori?

I wonder what your housekeeper thinks about that?

Lots of love,

JB

Hunting the suicide claim

caimis.vudnaus. · 31 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

> Women are 3 times more likely to attempt suicide.

For the longest time this factoid has bothered me, it's usually stated anytime someone brings up that men commit suicide at much greater rate than women. The problem is (as usual for many feminist assertions) it's most often not presented with any actual sources. This makes tracking down the facts time consuming and annoying. But after hearing this factoid one too many times I decided to go looking, this is what I found.

I decided to start my search at Wikipedia on the page about suicide gender differences[1] and lo and behold you get the factoid right there in the beginning.

> Gender differences in suicide have been shown to be significant; there are highly asymmetric rates of attempted and completed suicide between males and females.[1] The gap, also called the gender paradox of suicidal behavior, can vary significantly between different countries.[2] Statistics indicate that males die much more often by means of suicide than do females; however, reported suicide attempts are 3 times more common among females than males.[3]

Following the foot note we get to the suicide statistics page[2] at www.suicide.org where we find what Wikipedia must be using as a source, as nothing else on the page deals with attempted suicide and women.

> Note the significant difference in the rates between males and females – there are about 4 male deaths by suicide for each female death by suicide. But keep in mind that there are about 3 female attempts for every male attempt.

And

> There are approximately 750,000 suicide attempts each year.
>
> An estimated 5 million living Americans have attempted suicide.
>
> More females attempt suicide than males.
>
> (3 female attempts for each male attempt.)

Unfortunately there is very poor sourcing for the entire webpage with the only information being the following:

> Data Source: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC)

Going to the CDC suicide page[3] there are only two documents that deal with attempted suicide neither of which deal with year 2001 Suicide: At a Glance[4] and New Report: Suicidal Thoughts and Behavior[5]

The first only mentions the following that has to deal with female attempted suicide:

> Females are more likely than males to have had suicidal thoughts.

The source for the above however references the report: Suicidal Thoughts and Behavior.

This report is rather thorough and does show females having a greater prevalence for attempting suicide, however, at no where near the rate claimed in the original factoid. The report found rates in the US (per 1000) were 0.4 for men and 0.5 for women, a ratio of 4:5.

A reported ratio not even reasonably close to a 1:3.

Obviously this wasn't the factoid I was looking for. The only other method I could think of to find the 2001 data from the CDC website was to search for the following string on Google.

> 'attempted suicide' CDC 2001

After doing this search the only thing at the CDC that Google showed that had to deal with attempted suicide was a report on China.[6] Curiously the report itself doesn't talk about male or female suicide attempts, what did was an editorial note attached to the report.

> Similar to other countries, suicide attempts in China are more common among women than men [(6)]…

Possibly there was our factoid again… But if so it was definitely in woozle territory now.

So after some hunting it seems this intrepid woozle hunter has indeed tracked down one of the grand woozles of the feminist herd.

Author's Notes:

When I transferred this to AVFM I made a mistake in the original line and wrote "Women are 3 times more likely to commit suicide". It was supposed to be "attempt suicide" this caused a great deal of confusion I sincerely apologize.

Also of note, the original Wikipedia article has been altered since my research. You can still find the original text by looking through the page history on the article at Wikipedia.

Sources:

[1] http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Gender_differences_in_suicide

[2]http://www.suicide.org/suicide-statistics.html

[3] http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/suicide/index.html

[4] http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/suicide-datasheet-a.PDF

[5] http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/preview/mmwrhtml/ss6013a1.htm

[6] http://www.cdc.gov/mmwr/PDF/wk/mm5322.pdf

The father who wouldn't give up – 1930

Robert St. Estephe · 31 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

This is one of the most remarkable child custody cases on record. It involves the earliest instance (known to this writer) of a public demonstration campaign on the part of a father seeking to enforce his parental rights. James Welch of New Orleans not only had a flair for public display but he even published a newsletter promoting his cause. His plea for assistance from the Department of State was entered into the Congressional Record. James Welch was persistent and, against all odds, gained custody of his Venezuelan-born daughter, whom the Venezuelan dictator's government wished to see remain with the maternal grandmother.

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 5): Washington D. C. – After a steady stream of congressional denunciation heaped upon it for two months the state department has finally decided to act to restore to her American father Irma Francisco Welch, 18 months old, taken by Venezuelan authorities one year ago.

A telegram requesting Venezuelan government to guarantee safe conduct for James E. Welch, the baby's father, to visit Venezuela and obtain his daughter has just been dispatched, state department officials informed Welch Tuesday.

Action was not taken until Representative Gasque (Dem., S. C.) had publicly charged the state department with supporting the Gomez regime in Venezuela, until Senator Ransdell (Dem., La.) had charged the department with flouting the right of American citizens, until Mr. Welch had declared that the Gomez government would be out of office in a few months were it not for the barking it receives from Andrew W. Mellon's oil companies, and until several thousand dollars worth of unfavorable publicity in the form of books and statements by Venezuelan exiles regarding the Gomez government had been circulated on Capitol hill.

~ Story by Father ~

Welch's story of a year's effort to recover the custody of his baby is one which has aroused considerable sympathy among members of the senate foreign relations committee.

In a sworn statement published in the Congressional Record, Welch tells of going to Venezuela and engaging in business there.

"I lived in Venezuela unmarried until 1926," Welch said, "when I met Anna Salazar, daughter of a prominent citizen of Spanish descent. I am of Protestant faith and Anna of Catholic, and while I desired to contract a marriage with her through religious ceremony, it could not be satisfactorily arranged. Following a generally accepted custom of that country, I regularly set her up in my home as my wife and openly lived with her as such. In October, 1928, there was born to me and Anna Salazar a daughter, whom we named Irma Francisco Welch.

"It was necessary for me to be away from home for a large part of my time. During one of these absences I learned that Anna had become a victim of the Gomez regime, who prey upon the women of Venezuela."

Welch said that his wife had abandoned the daughter to him and that after consulting one of the ablest lawyers in Venezuela he got custody of the child, obtained a trained nurse and left her for Ciudad Bolivia ["the city of Bolivia", a town in Venezuela], taking the baby with him.

~ Is Finally Released ~

"I had proceeded about 300 miles by automobile when I was arrested upon a telegraphic order from officials in the state of Bolivar."

Welch said he was thrown in a "filthy jail" and the child "forcibly taken" from him.

After 43 days, Welch said, he was ordered released by a judge. After trying in vain to gain custody of his child Welch declared, he decided to come to the United States and obtain from the state department the same assistance it had given the oil companies.

Meanwhile the infant remains neither with her father nor her mother, Welch said.

["U. S. Will Act to Aid Father Recover Child, syndicated, The Milwaukee Journal (Wi.), Jul. 9, 1930, p. 25]

•?•

[image]

PHOTO CAPTION (standalone) (Article 2 of 5): SHACKLED IN PRISON – J. E. Welch demonstrates in Washington shackles he was forced to wear in Venezuela jail. He has been trying to get aid for a small daughter still held in Venezuela.

["Shackled in Prison," syndicated, Syracuse Herald (N.Y.), Sep. 2, 1930, p. 32]

•?•

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 5): Washington, Sept. 21.—By far the most persistent and active lobbyist to appear here this generation is the redheaded, blue-eyed James E. Welch, Shreveport, La.

Welch lobbied for 22 months for the custody of his child who was held in Venezuela, S. A., and has just been notified that the child will be turned over to him by Venezuelan state officials.

The child was in Venezuela, and among Welch's plans was one for the overthrow of the Venezuelan government. And if he did not succeed in that, he said he would campaign against the administration at Washington in the hope of electing an American President who would give him what he insisted was mere justice.

[image]

Soft-spoken and unobtrusive in manner, not highly cultured, Welch has camped the State Department steps. He has interviewed dozens of members of Congress and caused introduction of legislation for investigation of his case and of our relations with Venezuela. He knew every newspaperman in town. He helped Venezuelan exiles get hundreds of columns of publicity adverse to the Gomez dictatorship and they have helped him get evidence.

Governor Huey Long of Louisiana enlisted and promised to raise cain about the Welch case, used as important ammunition in his campaign last year. Welch charges that Joseph E. Ransdell, U. S. Senator from Louisiana, hadn't been active on his behalf. Welch bombarded the country's most prominent citizens with letters requesting aid. Lately he issued at his own expense large, illustrated four-page monthly bulletins containing all the latest news and opinions about the Welch case. Recently he picketed the White House steps, wearing 100-pound leg irons such as are attached to Venezuelan political prisoners.

Welch attracted so much publicity and sympathy everywhere that the Venezuelan minister advertised in the New York Spanish press that Venezuelans who helped Welch were subject to long imprisonment at home. The State Department issued a detailed publication denying that it had refused Welch justice and protection because Venezuela had been so nice to our big oil companies. It asserted that Welch had due process of law.

[image]

Whatever the technical points of Venezuelan and international law may be, here is, briefly, the story of Welch, the champion lobbyist:

Welch was in the oil business in Mexico and Colombia and went to Venezuela as Standard Oil superintendent in 1922. Then he began to drill oil and water wells and made $50,000 a year. In 1926 he met Anita Salazar, daughter of a judge at Maracay, where he had been called by President Gomez to drill water wells. Their religions differed and they entered a common law marriage. In October, 1928, arrived Irma Francisca Welch, the child for whom Welch has been fighting all this time.

Welch went on business to Caracas, a military official purloined the beautiful Anita and baby Irma was left with her Venezuelan grandmother. Welch returned, seized the child and went away from there. He was arrested en route, charged with kidnapping on the grandmother's instance, returned to the state of Bolivar and imprisoned there. Welch says the governor of Bolivar was his enemy and the grandmother sought to keep Irma as a meal ticket. The chief of police and 14 soldiers removed Irma from Welch by force.

[image]

Welch languished 43 days in one of those Venezuelan prisons which by common repute are so horrible, watching men starve and go insane. Friends brought him food and saved him from starvation. He says the American vice-consul advised him to buy his freedom by paying off his accusers. The head of a British oil combine finally obtained his release. The charge d'affaires at the American legation in Caracas advised him to appeal to the British oil interests if he wanted the child, as they "had more influence." Court proceedings followed which are too complicated to describe here, but Welch went to the State Department. In one way or another most department officials have since told him to go to the devil. Welch retaliated by charging American oil influence and publicizing the horrors of the Gomez regime. He has long since spent nearly all of his money and seeks compensation from Venezuela for business losses and false imprisonment.

Welch claims recently to have discovered a forged document in the file of his case which had enabled a Venezuelan attorney to double-cross him by withdrawing his case at a critical point. His lawyers and the State Department argued whether the document is unquestionably a forgery, until Welch was informed he would get the baby.

[Rodney Dutcher, Washington Letter (column, syndicated (NEA Service), The Frederick Post (Md.), Sep. 22, 1931, p. 5]

[image]

PHOTO CAPTION (Article 4 of 5): Five-year-old Irma Francesca Welch in arms of her American father, James E. Welch, Shrevesport, La., who plans to file $1,000-a-day claim against Venezuelan government for their four-year separation.

FULL TEXT: Center of more attention than she has ever known, 5-year-old Irma Francesca Salazar Welch is ready to settle down to normal existence in the home town of her father, James E. Welch, in Shrevesport, La.

Yesterday Welch and his daughter, a Venezuelan beauty, called at the State Department to thank officials for intercession in a case that attracted attention.

Born in Venezuela, with no knowledge of English, the little girl has not the slightest idea of what all the excitement is about.

~ Dr. Arcaya Explains. ~

Yet, Dr. Pedro M. Aracaya, Venezuelan Minister, saw fit to issue a formal statement on the case. He said:

"There is not and never has been any diplomatic controversy between the government of Venezuela and that of the United States regarding Irma, the daughter of James E. Welch.

“There has been in the courts of the State of Bolivar, Venezuela, several criminal and civil suits between Welch and the grandmother of his daughter on the question of the custody of his child.”

All this, the minister said, is Welch’s private affair.

Private or not, the Welch case become public property in the more than four years’ struggle by Welch. In that time he has played the role of kidnapper of his own child for which, under Venezuelan laws, he was subjected to 43 days in the police barracks at Bolivar.

~ State Department Aids. ~

Unable to enter the country where his romance began, Welch succeeded in having State Department officials arrange for landing of his daughter on British territory – Trinidad. There the reunion was effected. Welch and the girl flew to Miami. They came to Washington primarily to thank William Phillips and Harry F. Payer of the State Department.

The girl’s mother disappeared shortly after the child was born, but there is an American grandmother waiting for Irma in Shreveport.

Today Welch plans to visit the Senate and House Office Buildings to thank senators and representatives who interested themselves in his case.

It is understood Welch intends to file suit against the Venezuelan government, asking $1,000 a day for the four years the child was kept from him. This totals $1,460,000.

[“Seeks $1,000 a Day for 4-Year Separation – Girl Freed by U. S. Aid Here With Father to Thank Officials. – Diplomatic Controversy Over Case Denied by Venezuela Convoy,” The Washington Post (D.C.), Oct. 10, 1933, p. 22]

[image]

PHOTO CAPTION (standalone) (Article 5 of 5): Diplomatic aid brought about the reunion of little five-year-old Irma Francesca Welch and her father, James E. Welch (center), after a separation of more than four years while Irma was in custody of a guardian in Venezuela and her father was jailed for kidnaping in an attempt to recover his child. They are shown thanking Assistant Secretary of State Payer in Washington. Welch and his daughter will live in Shreveport, La. (Associated Press Photo)

[“Diplomacy Aids Family Reunion,” syndicated (AP), Beatrice Daily Sun (Ne.), Oct. 12, 1933, p. 1]

[image]

? LINK to more photos of Fathers’ Rights Pickets & Protests on The Unknown History of MISANDRY

Drama Avoidance Points

VFM News and Commentary · 31 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Why do so many guys put up with gold diggers, female body builders, and confrontational super-whores? Because they didn't listen to Popp. Here's some pointers for avoiding drama.

http://www.Redonkulas.com produced in association with LightcraftEntertainment.com

Teach men not to rape, ignore women?

Dean Esmay · 31 August 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Female pedophiles, female incest perpetrators, female statutory rape, female rape of adult males and adult females: it's "very rare," right? No. Try again. The reality is that society is just blind to it, or, when society sees it at all, they excuses it, even laugh at it, or rush to tell themselves and everyone else that it's "unusual." It isn't.

We suggest you watch this entire film and think it through, then contemplate that there is much reason to question the statistics. There'll be a few links below for you to explore.

Although there is a wealth of data to explore, more than we can list here, here are some starting points to further research in this area.

Philip W. Cook: When Women Sexually Abuse Men (note: we hope to be interviewing Cook on the next episode of Revelations with Erin Pizzey, after Erin recovers from her stroke).

Social Work Today: Male survivors of childhood sexual abuse need different treatment from females.

A Marine's story.

Keith: When sexual predators are a bonus.

Curve Magazine: Lesbian-on-Lesbian Rape.

Sexual violence and gay, lesbian, bisexual, trans, intersex, and queer communities.

Alison Tieman: Manufacturing female victims, marginalizing vulnerable men.

Walter Roman (TDOM): Paying child support to your rapist.

Toy Soldiers: Are there women pedophiles?.

Sherianne Kramera & Brett Bowmana: Accounting for the 'invisibility' of the female paedophile.

Canadian Children's Rights Council: 86% of the victims of female sexual predators aren't believed.

There's more than that. Last year I appeared with a few others on Huffington Post Live to discuss that, and even there it was still hard to get at least two of the show participants that this problem is anything other than rare.

The fact is that the vast majority of victims of female sex predators report not being believed, and copious research suggests they are considerably more prevalent than almost anyone wants to believe. But why should any of that surprise us? No one wants to believe women are just as violent and abusive as men, either.

The Men's Human Rights Movement: dedicated to the radical notion that women are human beings–and thus just as likely to be violent, lying, raping, beating, and otherwise nasty as men are.

Feminism & Gynocentrism: the real rape apologists and victim-blamers.

Or so it appears from my standpoint.

You might want to subscribe to Bane666 on YouTube by the way. Lots of good stuff there, even if I don't always agree with all of it.

Jaclyn Friedman: clit big as the world

Diana Davison · 1 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

When Jaclyn Friedman told Paul Elam upon first meeting that she couldn't be civil to him it was unsurprising. It was unsurprising because Friedman is a very unpleasant woman who brags about her membership in "a shady cabal" where not-being civil is Jaclyn Friedman's way of life.

To avoid sounding like a conspiracy theorist let me explain.

The internet that Friedman is so happily making a living from is also a record keeper. While people may change their ideas and beliefs over time, the internet actually still keeps us accountable for our contradictions. For most honest people our changes will take place over years, not within the same article. But for Friedman one need not look that far back.

I love when Jaclyn blesses the world with her voice because no one does so much to show feminist hypocrisy and lunacy as well as she does.

In 2011, re:publica gave Jaclyn Friedman the stage to perform a skit which she called "How Feminist Digital Activism Is Like the Clitoris." Friedman describes herself as a performer so I'm confident she won't take objection to me characterizing her public appearances in that way.

Friedman claims that the title of the seminar arose from her perceived similarity between men having trouble finding the clitoris and people having trouble finding active feminists but that they are both very easy to find. Friedman seems to have confused the clitoris with the g-spot.

She later clarifies that men actually find the surface part of the clit quite easily but fail to understand that the "flashy part" is just the surface and there is a bulbous layer underneath – just as every feminist activist online is part of a bigger, deeper body of thugs who you need to suck up to.

I support Jaclyn's idea of exposing and teaching us about the hidden layers of the massive internet clit. Let us take a closer look because, as Jaclyn has allowed, women are comparable to anatomical drawings and can be reduced to body parts for the purpose of entertainment or discussion. Unless you are Naomi Wolf.

Naomi Wolf made one big mistake: she defended Julian Assange against politically motivated sex crime charges at the same time she was publishing a book called Vagina: A New Biography. Wolf and Friedman had a debate on Democracy Now and we are asked to believe that is not connected to why so many feminists decided to trash Wolf's new book at the same time Friedman explains why it is intensely connected. Jaclyn's seminar about the clitoris tries to explain why the resulting attack on Wolf is both hilarious and a result of not understand how the clit works.

First we must understand that Jaclyn's clitoris is the size of the entire internet but that her part of the internet is is just a fraction of a bigger system that is, presumably, the size of the universe. Though she has only recently decided to incorporate men into her sex life, Jaclyn is an expert on what men do and do not know about the clit and she is ready to explain to us how big a clit can be. My clit, in comparison, is quite small so I was quite intrigued with her explanation.

Like the clit, online feminists are not just a button you press. Friedman happily explains that they won't sign your petition just because it's a good idea, you have to spend time becoming friends with them first. You have to earn their support by "snarking" about your day and swapping recipes or telling them what you had for lunch long enough that they feel like they know you.

Once you've put in the time and effort to be their BFFs they will assign you a place in their hierarchy and invite you to fun events like their "hate-read" of Naomi Wolf's book. The whole feminist circle of influence has a map. They first co-ordinate hate reviews of your work, then they start Twitter campaigns against you, they tag team to make sure someone is watching the results in every time zone of the globe, then they revel in the mass media attention their bullying achieves.

If you doubt her sequence of events, The Millions website published the evidence online for all to see. Why would they allow their bullying to be published online? Because they are proud of it and because they want to warn everyone what happens if you cross their path.

That's what they do to friends.

At this point we might offer an explanation to Friedman as to why no one was laughing at her presentation. It's not because they were German and have learned from the past, it's because it's not fucking funny. Naomi Wolf was one of their peers and they destroyed her, so an outsider like Paul Elam would just be fresh meat in the lion den.

In the roundtable hate-read Wolf is accused of being a misogynist and a narcissist, and the accusation is justified by one of the hate-spewers because Gloria Steinem gave her a hug when they met and Wolf did not.

Girls just want to get hugs… and never be challenged to defend their opinions.

While Jaclyn Friedman waxes poetic about how emotionally traumatizing it is to receive troll threats online, which she acknowledges have never been followed through on, she fails to address the trauma caused by having "the sisterhood" turn against you. She is quite confident that will never happen even though the statistics show it to be a more likely event than getting raped by a Tweeter.

Jaclyn Friedman doesn't protest A Voice For Men and Paul Elam because he's a threat to her. She met with him because he's less threatening to her than her own social group. Paul has no power in her world, the power is where it historically has been kept: the opinion of women and their decision as to whether or not they accept you in their group.

Jaclyn does not fear hypocrisy. She eagerly campaigns to force media site Clear Channel to advertise what their policies object to right after campaigning to force media site Facebook to eliminate what they don't object to.

Jaclyn does not fear encouraging misery amongst her fellow women. She eagerly announced herself a slut and begged women to support sluttiness and become slutty themselves whilst explaining how unhappy she is with her own life as a result. What she really wants is for other women to encourage her poor choices and celebrate their freedom to be miserable together and blame it all on men… with whom she's hardly slept.

Of course, when the psychology of her misery was spelled out, all of Jaclyn's friends arrived in the comment section to rescue her from responsibility. Meanwhile, Friedman was free to go about explaining how to lower personal standards to get laid and still be a feminist. She now has a podcast called "Fucking While Feminist" which is rather strange since she admittedly has a hard time getting satisfactorily laid.

[image]While Jaclyn Friedman looks like the sister of Andrea Dworkin, Dworkin was the poster child for sex-negative feminism and Friedman is the billboard girl of sex-positive sisterhood. How different are they? Dworkin said all hetero sex is rapey. Friedman wants to brand male sexuality as evil but encourage female sexual liberation. With whom does she think these girls are going to have sex? One of these things only pretends to not be like the other but they both look the same to me.

When Jaclyn and her BFF Jessica Valenti published the book Yes means Yes!: Visions of Female Sexual Power and A World Without Rape they were met with reactions from women claiming that they couldn't give enthusiastic consent because they didn't know what they wanted.

To a normal person this would mean that girls who regretted sexual encounters after experimentation weren't actually raped, they just tried something new and didn't like it. To Friedman it meant that women needed to know what they wanted sexually before they'd ever tried it. She has, as a result of feedback, made it her life goal to introduce "pleasure based" sex education for girls in public school so that they can be in complete control of every sexual experience they might have in life. Again, with whom? And who is telling the boys what they might enjoy?

Although these questions burn for an answer, Friedman has enough to worry about with the clitoris cabal at her heels. I'm trying to avoid writing something nasty about her because she's got enough trouble already.

Watch your back, Jaclyn. Paul Elam is the least of your worries; he actually speaks his mind consistently, doesn't play head games, or create rigged social ladders. Neither does he try to take what he hasn't earned or make a living off other people's tears.

Paul Elam and the MHRM are something you've never understood because you didn't have to. Men aren't the ones who pose a threat in this world, it's your girlfriends who do–and you know it.

Editor's note: feature image by re:publica 2013. –PW

An open letter to Judge Baugh protesters

Ty Henry · 1 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Dear MoveOn.org and Judge Baugh protestors,

This letter is to extend my support to you, and NOW! chapter president Marian Bradley, and the rest of your colleagues and citizens in Montana as you bring public outrage to bear on Judge Todd Baugh. Indeed, when news came across the wire that Judge Baugh had handed Stacey Rambold a sentence of 15 years, then suspended all but 30 days because "it wasn't all THAT bad," I was disturbed at his cavalier attitude, especially in light of the suicide death of 17-year-old victim Cherice (14 at the time of the crime) in 2010 as the case worked its way through the judicial system.

I can imagine the cutting sensation felt by her family as the following words "she was as much in control of the situation [as her 49-year-old teacher]" worked like surgery with hedge shears, hold the anesthesia. You are properly exercising your right to petition your government for redress as you urge the governor and attorney general to review the policies and laws in place, specifically the latitude given to Montana judges in cases of sex with minors. Indeed, contrary to what you may have been told, we in the Men's Human Rights Movement do not subscribe to a false binary/zero sum outlook on gender relations. When 50-year-old teachers in positions of trust are carnally coupling with students they are responsible for nourishing through knowledge, and get to skate, NOBODY wins.

As a show of solidarity, for myself and only myself, I signed the MoveOn.org petition. Mr. Rambold took advantage of what appears to have been an at-risk, troubled girl. That alone should be an aggravator, not a mitigator. By finding otherwise, Judge Baugh set a dumpster fire and evacuated the contents on her grave. For him, there is a special place in hell.

My request to you is not to relent in your vigor to see Judge Baugh removed and laws changed in Montana, but rather, to quicken your colleagues to take up similar causes against commensurate recent outrages that may have escaped your attention.

A good place to start is in California. Why, you ask. Because just this past month, San Bernardino Superior Court Judge Arthur Harrison sentenced teacher Laura Whitehurst to a year in prison and 5 years probation for her sexual exploitation of three different boys. She faced 41 felony counts and 29 years in prison.

One rationale for most pleas is that the victims would prefer to move on with their lives, and not go through a trial. However, according to Redlands Daily Facts newspaper, even one of Whitehurst's victims pleaded for him to reject the plea, calling it unjust. A letter from the teen's relative states his deteriorating social status and increasing withdrawal after relentless teasing that he is "not a victim." A lawyer for one of the victims, Heather Cullen, opined that she only got the sentence because "they are boys and she is a woman."

Just as recent was Judge Elizabeth Foley sentencing 37-year-old teacher Erin Sayar to 10 years probation for plying a 16-year-old boy with pot, and having sex with him.

What concerns me is that disproportionate outrage has more to do with the gender of the child and teacher, rather than the behavior of the judge. If so, why no invective heaped upon Judge Donna Gallucio, Justice Elizabeth Foley, or whomever sentenced Allena Ward to probation for sex with multiple 7th graders? I could go on and on, for the list is staggering of women who get mosquito bites for sex with students, and the trend continues unabated.

As a progressive myself, some questions come to mind as I view the current imbalance in the distribution of anger. Is the protest regarding Judge Baugh about the protection of children from exploitation, or is it about the relative elevated sanctity of girls? After all, society often excuses and dismisses the sexual aggression of female teachers toward boys with canards like "if he was erect, he must have wanted it." To combat this rape apologia, I'm asking MoveOn.org, as a progressive organization that I'm certain favors the human rights of all children, to allow us to start a petition on your page to publicize the plight of sexually abused boys all around the country – boys who weekly watch their predatory manipulators walk free without incarceration, nor even the stain of sex offender public notification that tarnishes boys who may have had consensual sex. We will start with one to the San Bernardino Superior Court and District Attorney.

Thank you all in advance for your attention to these words, and your empathy with all victims of sexual exploitation by trusted adults.

Sincerely,

Ty Henry

Citizen, Blogger and AVFM contributor

Fingering the gynarchy

Peter Wright · 1 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Patriarchy, patriarchy, patriarchy, we've had the story shoved down our throats for decades, ad nauseum. But what about the gynarchy?

To give a recent account of the matter, a self-described "tall blonde psychologist" named Sharon Lawson sends out the following rallying call to increase the power of the gynarchy:

[image]

How refreshing it is to see a feminist admission that gynarchy has come of age. I particularly love the way she uses miniscule font when writing 'men' to emphasise how the gynarchy thinks. Sharon has written other gems of feminine wisdom on her blog including this astute distillation called 10 Reasons why Women are Superior:

"While women have traditionally been oppressed, this does not make us weaker, in fact, as history progresses forward it makes us – and I realize this is a bit insensitive – but still, it needs to be said: the superior sex. Here's why:
1. For a man, peeing is a messy and inconvenient affair. Urine splashing outside of the bowl? Eugh! Animals. Women never splash because we have the good sense to sit down on the seat. Uh, hello? They invented toilet seats for a reasons, guys.

2. We get to experience the awesome power of growing life within our own bodies. The beauty, the understanding and appreciation of life this gives us is unparalleled. Moreover, the experience of childbirth makes women more in tune with all of life.

3. Sexual dimorphism is becoming less and less of a thing as humans advance, and this will eventually put the performance of traditionally male tricks of brute force and superficial showmanship at a disadvantage. Evolution is about grace, intelligence, and compassion now.

4. Heteronormative males miss out on the fun and pleasure that is makeup application and dressing up in cute skirts, dresses and heels. Sure, we get to wear jeans and sneakers and cool casual clothes, but we have the option of a whole extra wardrobe section – and we get to cover up our pimples and highlight our cheekbones.

5. Our sexuality is oft considered a beautiful mystery. Everyone expects boys to begin whacking off as soon as their little curly hairs begin to sprout down south, but girls have an allure, a mystique that we can use as a special tool to our advantage pretty much forever.

6. Politicizing academia is the highest calling of education. You go spend your time doing math puzzles or reading Moby Dick, while we change the world.

7. Woman are wanted, craved, lusted after. Men drop dollars just to get a woman to take off her top in front of him. Men, listen up: I'll pay you to keep that shirt on your bloated chest, you gross beast.

8. Men have too much testosterone and conditioned to be violent by society. That's perhaps why they are, statistically speaking, more criminally violent than women. Oh, and boobs > balls.

9. While women have historically been opressed, this actually makes us more powerful in the long run because we have a more nuanced and reealsitc understanding of the world, power, and everything.

10. Men are keys. Women are locks. Are you kidding me? Women, at least this woman, is smart enough to know human sexuality can't be reduced to a simple and stupid metaphor. Or even a silly article like this."

Man, that is my kind of psychologist – smart, insightful, and ready to help me understand how to value myself should I have any problems like, er, wanting to kill myself due to cultural misandry. The 10 commandments of gynocracy are sure to provide a boon to the helping profession she has just spent years at university preparing to enter, and clearly she has been listening closely in class. For those of you who are interested in receiving counselling from Sharon she happens to be a self-employed psychologist working out of Montana; just be sure to practice how to genuflect on arrival to her sessions.

While 'gynarchy' is a relatively unheard of term, most by now would have heard the related word gynocentrism — a versatile term applied to literally anything we consider female dominated, from cultural institutions to gender relations – one that has proven a useful addition to the MHRM lexicon.

Gynarchy more specifically than gynocentrism refers to government by or for female interests, including any establishment of laws and bureaucracies that serve them. In this sense gynarchy is a simpler and more historically rooted term for what we have been calling "feminist governance."

Fortunately gynarchy has a long history of consistent application and isn't an awkward neologism requiring introduction into the language. To get a taste of its usefulness let's look at some of the historical uses of gynarchy (and its variants gunarchy, gunarchie, gynæcocracy, ginæcocratie, gynecocracy, gynocracy) starting in the 16th century:

1577: The gunarchie of Queene Cordeilla. [Holinshed Chron. I. 13/2]
1660: That in Gynarchy the wife is not subject, but superior to her husband [R. Coke Power & Subj.]
1737: Gynæcocracy is feminine rule; petticoat government [Universal English Dictionary]
1755: Gynæcocracy: petticoat government; female power [Dictionary English Language]
1758: I have always some hopes of a change under a Gunarchy; where whim and humour commonly prevail. [Chesterfield Letter. (1792) IV. cccl. 159]
1763: Denotes the government of women, or a state where women are capable of supreme command. Such are Britain and Spain. [Dictionary Of Arts & Sciences]
1816: In the fishing villages on the Firths of Forth and Tay?the government is gynecocracy. [Scott Antiq. xxvi.

Note]
1838: [Under gynocracy] women enjoy a greater influence… Mr. Hoskins says they seem to lord it over their husbands, and all mercantile transactions are confided to their hands. [Gentl. Magazine]
1886: That social gynæcocracy for which France is famous. [Temple Bar LXXVIII. 509]
1890: So will you best help to maintain?the true gynarchy [Blackw. Mag. CXLVII. 264/2]
Note the gender hierarchy alluded to in the year 1660 which claims that under gynarchy the wife is not subject to, but superior to her husband, or the 1838 mention of wives being superior to husbands, indicating that gynarchy requires servitude and inferiority of men toward women. These examples explain why males, over the centuries, have been consistently trained to serve the gynarchy with chivalrous servitude that reinforces the superiority of individual women. We see this chivalrous reinforcement of the gynarchy from the Middle Ages through to the time of Ernst B. Bax and continuing forward to today's "feminist governance". Evidence of the latter is all around us; in female-serving male politicians (the vast majority), government funding and entitlement programs, education, and popular culture. We definitely need a word for this broad societal governance that we can unsheath at quick notice – and this word (gynarchy) has been with us for around 500 years.

Matriarchy (rule by moms) is an inaccurate term for political hegemony enjoyed by the female gender, much as patriarchy is an inaccurate term as applied to all males – not that accuracy ever worried feminists who continue to refer to patriarchy (rule by actual dads) when andrarchy would be far more descriptive of their imaginary construct. Unlike the mythic patriarchy of feminists that lacks evidentiary backing, historical gynarchy is supported by an embarrassing mountain of empirical evidence. If we define gynarchy as government by or for women's interests the evidence shows that today's social institutions are thoroughly gynarchic.

Modern dictionaries usually define gynarchy as a political system governed by women or a woman. For a more nuanced understanding it's important to recognise that "the political system" that women govern may actually be staffed by male servants called prime ministers, presidents, or politicians who work on behalf of the ruling female gender.[1] In her book What's Right With Feminism Cassandra Langer gives a concise definition that accounts for the proxy role of male leaders: "Gynarchy refers to government by women, or women-centered government."

Make no mistake, women all the way from Christine de Pizan with her City of Ladies to today's feminists like Sharon Lawson have had a desire to perpetuate and expand the centuries-old gynarchy. If we can do one thing to raise awareness of this insidious tradition it will be to point a finger at The Gynarchy and call it by its proper name.

[1] Alison Tieman's YouTube video When Slaves Ruled explains this theme incisively

Comment editing fixed

David King · 2 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box]
Great news: we've just received a fix from the comment editor plugin author, and comment editing now appears to be working again.

Sorry it took so long to get sorted, folks, but we're there now. Feel free to test comment here as you like, and let us know of any problems you find, if any.
[/box]

A Voice for Male Students

Jonathan Taylor · 2 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

We are at an interesting point in men's advocacy.

We are growing by leaps and bounds. It used to be that there were only a small handful of websites and blogs shouting into the wilderness. That is no longer the case. We are now an online community bustling with energy and traffic, and commanding an increasingly formidable presence. A Voice for Men, for example, now has ~5.5 million views to its name, the Men's Rights subreddit has ~80,000 subscribers [1], and Karen Straughan, aka GirlWritesWhat, now has ~43,000 subs on YouTube [2].

We have more people starting up blogs about men's issues than ever before. While many have become defunct, many more have taken their place. Most of them fall into two main categories. First are what I would call "generalist sites" which focus on a wide array of men's issues. Next are what I call "specialist sites," like Community of the Wrongly Accused, which dig deep into one particular area and provide substantial and easily-accessible resources for those interested in one particular topic.

I would like to encourage MHRAs to develop more professional "specialist sites." Find a topic you like and research the hell out of it, or a topic you know a lot about. Learn a bit of Photoshop to develop some iconic symbols and branding for your site, learn a bit of web design, and you're mostly there.

These specialist sites could link and feed back to generalist sites like AVFM, NCFM, and so forth. Perhaps they could even create end-of-month or quarterly reports of news or new developments in their specific area of advocacy and submit them to these generalist sites.

If you've followed some of my activism in the past, you may notice that I don't usually like suggesting to other MHRAs how to conduct advocacy unless I have done it myself [3]. That's why I'm announcing a new website which focuses on men and boys in education. Some of you have already seen it. It's called A Voice for Male Students [4]. It is the product of a lot of labor and research.

If you'd like a good rundown of what the site is about, the first post features a rather thorough introduction to the site, its mission and values, focus, and so forth [5]. Perhaps the two most important pages are the Summary of Issues page [6], which contains a lot of resources, data, and references to education policies, and the Mission and Values page [7], which will give you an idea of how resolution of those issues will be advocated by the website.

I launched the website on the 20th of August, although – as seen on the AVFM forums – it was in the works as far back as November of last year [8], when I registered the domain. In the first half of 2013 the site served largely as a placeholder for future content and a launchpad and reference for activism I was still conducting at my alma mater A&M-Commerce [9]. While most of my online activism has been in the form of making YouTube videos on education issues (especially misandry in education), there is so much work to be done in academia that the time has come for me to move on to a full-fledged website.

This site is more than just a blog featuring (and critiquing) what goes on in academia. It also features activism tools such as a guide to recording devices and the state laws governing them [10], posters of my own design and others' [11], links to videos concerning men and boys in academia [12], an overview of the men's human rights movement [13] and its core issues [14] to provide a quick reference for up-coming campus men's issues groups, a network of pro-male groups in academia [15], and more.

If you are currently a student or employed in academia, have a relative or friend who is, or are simply concerned about men and boys in our education system, I encourage you to take a look around the website, as well as subscribe to the AVFMS Facebook page [16] and YouTube channel [17].

This is not a fly-by-night project by any means. I'd like to thank the A Voice for Men staff for the support they have given me, and look forward to what will come in the future.

Thank you.

– Jonathan Taylor

avoiceformalestudents.com

Sources:

1. http://www.reddit.com/r/MensRights/
2. http://www.youtube.com/user/girlwriteswhat
3. http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/dear-alumni-time-to-go-back-to-school/
4. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/
5. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/welcome-to-avfms/
6. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/know-the-issues/issues/
7. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/about/mission-and-values/
8. http://forums.avoiceformen.com/showthread.php?tid=905
9. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/am-university-commerce/
10. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/recording/
11. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/get-involved/posters-etc/
12. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/know-the-issues/equality-for-male-students/
13. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/know-the-issues/mens-movement/
14. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/know-the-issues/mens-movement/the-mens-movement-core-issues/
15. http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/get-involved/pro-male-groups-in-academia/
16. https://www.facebook.com/avoiceformalestudents
17. http://www.youtube.com/user/Gogonostop

Unsubstantiated sex abuse claims backfire

Dan Perrins · 2 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On August 15, 2013 Justice Andrew Goodman from the Superior Court of Ontario handed down an unheard-of decision awarding a man, accused of child sexual abuse, an amount of $125,000.00 in damages, plus costs.

And it looks like a debunked bit of feminist-inspired literature could be the cause of this situation.

Before we get into that book, a quick walk through the events and people involved that lead up to this ruling are in order. (Much of what follows comes directly from the text of the ruling.)

Jack and Jim Vanderkooy are brothers from a large family with 10 other living siblings. In 1970 Jim married Christine (Chris) VanderBoom and shortly thereafter in 1973 Jack married Chris' sister Margaret.

Jim and Chris have four children: Sheldon, Michelle, Patricia (Tricia) and Sarah. Jack and Margret also have 4 children, Steven, Tim, Rachel and Leisha. The children of both families are close in age.

In 1975 brothers Jack and Jim go into business together running the family farm. The 2 families live together for a short time at the farmhouse and in 1976 Jim and Chris' family move across the road from the farm into a new house.

In 1981, there was breakup of the farming partnership between Jim and Jack, which caused the relationship between them to be strained. Jack started the breakup, wanting to farm on his own. Jim requested Jack buy him out, so that he could return to teaching full-time.

The families continue to live across from one another until 1986, at which point Jim and family move to the Hamilton, Ontario area.

During the time from 1975 to 1986 the two daughters Tricia and Sarah are frequently over at Jack and Margret's house. At paragraph 12;

"…Tricia and Sarah slept over at Jack and Margaret's house quite often. Although Margaret was primarily responsible for babysitting Tricia and Sarah, Jack would, on occasion, be left alone with the children at the farmhouse when Margaret had to leave the house to run errands or tend to other activities."

Fast forward to March 2002.

Jim and Chris with daughters Sarah and Tricia travel to the Dominican Republic on holidays, given the time of year it appears this was spring-break vacation. During the vacation Sarah alleges she was sexually assaulted on a date with an employee at the resort where they were staying.

From the court report it is not clear whether Sarah informs her family of the events that happened in the Dominican. She does however assert that, from the alleged sexual assault, she began having 'flashbacks' which led her to believe she was sexually abused by her uncle Jack.

According to the report, at paragraph 56 ;

Sarah: " …that since her near-rape experience in the Dominican Republic, she was having flashbacks of Jack abusing her in the upstairs bedroom of the farmhouse."

The next event of importance is Sarah seeks therapy for panic attacks. We find this at paragraph 57 of the court report. The therapist she chooses is one Jessie Cooper.

"Sarah sought therapy from Jessie Cooper in early May 2005. Sarah testified that she did so because she had been experiencing panic attacks. Sarah testified it was not her intention to talk with Jessie about the abuse."

Jessie Cooper is somewhat of an unknown to me thus far but I do know she wasn't at the trial, even though her patient was on trial. In the footnotes the Honourable Justice Goodman does refer to Cooper as having a practice but does not indicate her credentials.

"[20] Jessie Cooper's notes, transcripts and related materials were entered into evidence on consent, without the necessity of calling this individual as a witness. I am mindful that I can only conduct a limited evaluation of this evidence."

I did find one article on the matter from Law Times where Cooper is called a psychologist.

There are a few things I find troubling about the Law Times article and I believe they are worth mention. For their feminist-inspired article on the situation the Law Times turns to three lawyers, two of whom appear to have a vested interest in keeping false accusers shielded from legal repercussions. I am not sure of the position of the third on shielding false accusers, but she is in tight with feminist dogma.

The first lawyer is Elizabeth Grace who according to the article and is quoted as saying; "Grace, who represents victims of sexual abuse in personal injury matters at Lerners LLP, says the decision is concerning."

I have one question for Grace: how concerned are you, Grace, for the innocent men who are on the receiving end of a false claim of sexual abuse / assault?

The second lawyer is Susan Vella of Rochon Genova LLP, who states the ruling may have "unintentionally perpetuated a conspiracy of silence." I somewhat agree with Vella. Where we differ is on what conspiracy of silence. The "conspiracy of silence" I see is the lack of legal remedy afforded to the falsely accused and legally wronged in cases involving sexual assault. The inability to mount a full answer and defense, in criminal cases, for those alleged to have engaged in sexual crimes is another 'conspiracy of silence', doubly heinous as this happens not only in the court of public opinion but in the courts that are accused of upholding of the rule of law. The lack of cross examination in those types of matters is a 'conspiracy of silence' as well, Vella. And the last 'conspiracy of silence', Vella, is the response from the Crown prosecutors holding people responsible for false abuse claims. (Sexual and domestic, in case you are wondering, folks.)

But from Vella's statements in the article it looks like she is fine with those examples of a 'conspiracy of silence.'

And last is lawyer Loretta Merritt whose cases involve civil sexual assault caseload at Torkin Manes LLP. No vested for her in this at all. Merritt's take on the decision is "decisions like this one could encourage defendants of sexual assault allegations to make a defamation counterclaim."

To which I reply: shouldn't those wronged by malicious prosecution be afforded the right to legal remedy? But I digress, back to the case.

While in therapy with Cooper it appears Sarah starts to read a book. It s not clear from the court report how she came into possession of the book. The book is the piece of literature I mentioned in the beginning of this piece. It's called "The Courage To Heal," and again I'll get to more on that feminist filth later on.

In January of 2006, Tricia's marriage falls apart. Allegations of her husband being abusive are mentioned. At the end of January Tricia comes home and it is at this time that Sarah tells her sister that she was abused as a child, and asks if Tricia was abused, too.

In a letter dated the February 5 of 2006, Sarah writes to Cooper also in her 'courage to heal' workbook.

From the letter to Cooper we have her stating;

"So I told her I have been sexually abused as a child by Uncle Jack. I told her I wondered if it had happened to her and if that was why she was where she was. She looked at me and I don't know if I will ever forget that look…She looked at me and said she has no distinct memory but always wondered if something had happened, if there was a way it was possible….I told her [Patricia] that I don't have vivid memories but that God has given me enough. When I told Trish and she shared her dislike of this uncle, it gave me confirmation in my spirit that I have not made up a lie and that together we will heal….On Thursday (the day she went back to Miami) it became clear to me that Trish was turning a corner in her perception of the events. She told me she was having some memories (not of abuse specifically) that helped point her in the belief that something has happened."

And from her workbook entry from the same day we have:

> "I don't have vivid memories"

Let that phrase sink in for a moment.

And then think about accusing someone of rape or sexual assault without vivid memories.

What are those memories that Sarah and Tricia have?

For the answer to that we have to go back a bit and give a brief description of the sleeping arrangements on the nights the two slept over.

They would be sleeping on the floor of a bedroom, between two twin beds, which would have Jack's children sleeping in them. In the first incident Tricia claims that, "She remembers waking up but not being fully awake." She remember Jack's face and a feeling of being 'pinned' down. She claims to remember protesting to Jack, "don't do this to me." She also claims she had some pain either in her legs or vaginal area. She also states that in her memory 'the pain did not make sense to her.'

She denies that the pain was related to a bed-wetting problem she had at the time.

Her second "memory" is as follows and found at paragraph 48;
" In Patricia's second distinct memory, she recalled being on the floor in the same boys' bedroom. She remembers Jack sitting on Tim's bed and pulling her up by an arm. She remembers a sensation of something soft in her mouth which she asserted "may have been his penis". She recalls the specific feeling. In cross-examination, she admitted that there is a degree of "speculation now looking back at the incident" and her believing that the soft object was a penis. She testified that she could only relate to the feeling of something soft in her mouth. As with the first memory, it was night-time and she had been sleeping on the floor. Patricia admitted that other children were likely in the room but doesn't know how Tim would not have been woken up by Jack's actions. Patricia testified that she has always remembered this incident as sexual and she does not know if the two memories are part of the same event or different."

So she doesn't know if the two 'memories' are the same, or how Jack's son Tim could have stayed asleep. She can't be sure what the soft thing was in her mouth. Was it possibly her thumb? She is about 6 years old at the time.

Sarah's first memory is described like this at paragraph 51;

"Sarah admitted that she has no recollection of sleeping anywhere else but the boys' bedroom in the farmhouse and has no recollection of sleeping alone in the boys' room. Sarah testified that she has two memories of being sexually abused by Jack. In the first one, she remembers herself as a very young girl, in the boys' bedroom. Sarah described the memory as a static image, like "a snapshot", "an out-of-body experience". It is dark and she sees the dark shape of a man lying on top of a small child. Sarah described looking down on herself, as if from the upper corner of the bedroom ceiling near the door, and seeing herself as a child on the floor with the dark shape of a grown man on top of her. She cannot see the child's face or distinguish any features. Sarah also could not see the man's face, or any other identifying features however, Sarah testified, "I know it is Jack". She explained that in the memory, it is as if she is the little girl she sees and she knows where she is and the man on top of her. Sarah does not know if there are other children in the room. She does not know if the man had his clothes on or off or if she had her own clothes on or off. Sarah testified that she does not know if there was penetration, as there was no action to this memory and she does not recall experiencing anything."

Sarah's second memory happens when she is getting intimate with a partner in the Fall of 2006. According to her she would have a 'sensation or feeling of Jack being on top of her.' And that when her partner touched her vagina

"she would have a flashback and suddenly in the 'snapshot,' Jack was on top of her. Sarah testified that she would see Jack on top of her. Sarah testified that she does not see Jack's face but, as with the first memory, she knows it is Jack.

She described the memory as a sensation and she feels the weight of a grown man on top of her. Sarah does not know if there was penetration or fondling. Sarah added that the man on top of her is not the man she is being intimate with."

Sarah's testimony and sessions with Cooper come under more fire. At paragraph 116 we are informed that;

Sarah later admitted that throughout her therapy she advised Jessie Cooper that she had doubts and, at one point, she was worried that she might have identified the wrong perpetrator. Sarah admitted in cross-examination that through her therapy she acknowledged "there was a very real possibility that I was wrong, however the memory stayed the same". She agreed that she told Jessie Cooper over the course of therapy that "I have lots and lots of doubts" [bolding mine]

Now if you are wondering how all this ended up in court, the answer is, Tricia and Sarah sent out emails to the extended family in August claiming Jack abused them and they did not want anyone else to be abused. This leads to Jack filing a civil suit, which in turn causes Tricia, Sarah and family to file a counter-suit claiming sexual battery.

Something interesting about the standard of proof required for the sexual assault battery claim. It was tried on the lowest standard of proof in the courts – on a balance of probabilities.

And even then it was found to be lacking.

Now, if I've managed to keep your attention it's book time.

The book 'The Courage To Heal' has been the ruin of many innocent men and families. It is about recovered memories of childhood sexual abuse. And from one of the authors' website we discover how the writers composed the book;

> We chose to avoid academic language, psychological theories, and statistics. The Courage to Heal grew out of the women's movement, with its focus on empowering women both personally and politically.

No statistics, no psychological theories, and a focus on empowering women. Has your brain hit a dead-end wall built from feminist fuzzy bricks of logic after reading that?

Mine sure as hell did.

AVFM News and Activism: Free4All 5

AVfM Radio · 3 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Tonight we will not be having a guest, but Robert O'Hara and James Huff will be bringing you the latest news and commentary. We will be taking calls as well from those who want to air a variety of topics or discuss the news stories we will be covering.

Join us for tonight's free for all.

The call in number is 310-388-9709. Show time is at 9pm Eastern time, 6pm Pacific

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Tom Matty appeal update from MRE

Men's Rights Edmonton · 3 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Hi everybody. We thought you'd be interested in this update from Raz, which first appeared on our Men's Rights Edmonton site. You may remember Tom from this episode of AVfM Radio. –DE

Due to the recent controversy surrounding the Earl Silverman Center, we feel it would be best to voluntarily update everybody (especially those that donated) as to the latest news regarding the Tom Matty appeal. Since submitting the required $5000 legal surety, Tom's lawyers have been hard at work gathering evidence and preparing the case. They will be appearing before the appeal court next week on Sept. 3. (yes, the legal system works very slowly).

As a reminder, if this appeal is successful, it will essentially set a legal precedence of proven bias against men in the lower courts of Canada. This means that every man henceforth who is trying to retain access to his kids following a separation will have at least a fighting chance (which is huge).

Also, one more bonus for us if this appeal is successful is, we get back that 5 thousand dollar surety which was so graciously donated to us by you kind folks. In the event that we get the 5 thousand dollars refunded to us, we will be true to our word and refund the donations to all those who request it returned to them. Otherwise, we will keep that money and put it towards other forms of activism (& we got some big plans). That choice will be yours.

So anyways, that's pretty much it for now. We have been waiting for a long time for this appeal date, and now that it is nearly upon us, do keep checking in for the latest news surrounding this matter.
Once again, thank you all for helping to make this thing happen. Without a doubt, if this community didn't pitch in like it did, none of this would have been possible.

This is OUR movement.
FTSU!!!
~Raz

Canadian Federation of Students: equal-er than others

NCFM · 4 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Canadian Student Union wants to ban men's rights groups! So much for free speech and equal treatment...

The mainstream news media article you should not have missed has to be Robyn Urback: Student union brands men's rights groups as 'hateful' clubs that 'justify sexual assault'. The first thing you will see is a picture of a young well dressed women holding a sign saying "Men of Quality Support Women's Equality."

Whatever happened to the struggle for "Human Rights?" The struggle for all men and women to be treated fairly and with respect. It somehow got devoured by feminism, that is radical feminism; or, better yet supremacist feminism and the disenfranchisement of men.

So pronounced is this absurd pogrom that we have allowed our educational system to become rooted in its destructive nonsense. By inaction we are complicit in submitting generations of children to educational systems disrespectful toward men, their accomplishments, and contributions to our history, societies, and cultures. Even though westernized women are the most accomplished, educated, protected, well paid, and safest of all women our schools instill notions of female oppression. We have apparently educated untold numbers of young adults who believe whatever they are taught, question very little, believe the worse of man-kind, cannot think for themselves or see the goodness in people regardless of gender.

The National Post article along with many others show a misandric ideology grounded in not much more than pure fantasy. The fantasy of the mentally ill if not deranged. No sane and critically thinking person could make the horrific misandric statements reported in these articles. Such statements are absurd on their face.

Representatives of the Canadian Association of Students supporting such anti-male nonsense have no grasp of reality. Their website lists their National Executives including a "Women's Representative." There is no "Men's Representative" as if men don't even exist or are lower than pond scum. Clearly some CAS representatives have been brainwashed to such an extent they can't even hear their own hate speech. Hate speech to which they fervently hold title by way of perceived victim-hood. After all, they are oppressed. Oppressed by a man, men, anything associated with maleness, and inevitably patriarchy and the horrific thing called penis. They are, in large part, young, pampered, goosestepping idiots of a very dangerous kind. We need to reinvent our educational systems and do it now… We need to recruit and support students of quality who support human rights, including the rights of men.

The National Post's Robin Urback notes:

> It is that sort of hyperbolic misrepresentation that perpetually stunts efforts to create resources for male students on campus, and gives fodder to CFS to pull out their favourite oppression lexicons in drafting motions. Suffice to say that a group for men doesn't necessarily equate to a group against women, just as a group for Christian students on campus doesn't amount an assembly against Jews or Muslims. I don't doubt there may be a member or two with some less-than-politically-correct views on the roles of men and women, but to paint all men's rights groups with the same broad brush (never mind to unabashedly label them all as assault-apologists) is to unfairly characterize an entire group of students. Not to mention half the human race. According to my lexicon, it's incredibly prejudicial

You can read the entirety of Urback's fact-filled report here in the National Post.

“Bitcoin” and the downfall of feminism?

Andy Thomas · 4 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Could “Bitcoin” bring about the downfall of feminism?

Feminism is the dominant ideology of our age. Its strangle-hold over our culture, media and institutions is such that it is difficult to imagine how things could ever be different. Certainly, I think it unlikely that the current hegemony will ever be brought down by men, or women, in organised revolt when so few understand its true significance.

Nevertheless, if we look at history, there is cause for optimism. If history has but one lesson to teach us, it is this — nothing lasts for ever.

Allow me to introduce you to the “Black Swan”, humanity’s equivalent of the forest fire which clears the ground of well established norms and, in doing so, allows the seeds of new ideas to take root. History is littered with examples.

Here’s one…

Over much of the second half of the 20th century, we in the west worried ourselves half to death over a possible nuclear strike or European invasion from the east. I can vividly remember our primary school teacher telling our class that each and every one of us had a nuclear missile pointing at our heads and, at any moment, we could all be dead. (Those were her actual words to a class of seven year-olds, and I was sick with fear for days after.)

No one saw then how the status quo could ever be different. Yet, after the fall of the Berlin Wall and the Soviet coup of 1991, it suddenly became apparent that a new age was dawning and news commentators everywhere began to conclude that the Soviet Union could never have competed economically with the US. While experts everywhere deluded themselves with the idea that we had known all along that the Soviet Union was destined to fall, the plain truth was that almost no one saw the revolutionary crisis coming.

Black Swan events seemingly come out of nowhere, bringing profound consequences that are impossible to foresee. Black Swan theory, as proposed by Nassim Nicholas Taleb, describes how human beings consistently fail to expect the unexpected, but instead rationalise past events as being entirely predictable and inevitable when, in reality, the opposite was true.

Recently, I have been looking on the horizon for signs of the next major Black Swan event, and found myself on an admittedly rather speculative journey into the future — one in which the pre-occupations of our age have been washed away by forces beyond the control of any ideologue.

I’d like to share it with you.

Bitcoin is a new form of electronic money. Nothing like it has ever existed before. To use technical jargon — Bitcoin is an example of a cryptographic currency, or “cryptocurrency”.

I very much believe that cryptocurrency is the next step in the evolution of money. But why is this so important?

Whether we like it or not, money is how human society has organised itself for thousands of years, and the arrival of a radically new way of using money has the potential to change everything.

Before we go there, what exactly is cryptocurrency and how is it different form “ordinary money”?

Currently, the money we use is based on trust — trust in government and banks. Cryptocurrency, on the other hand, is digital money made out of the trust we are willing to place in modern cryptography. Forget what you already know about debit cards or internet banking, because with Bitcoin you will not even need a bank. In fact, Bitcoin has more in common with gold than the number you see as your online bank balance.

Actually, gold is a good place to begin if we want to understand what crypto-money actually is and why it may prove to be such a desirable way to conduct monetary transactions.

Traditionally, “fiat currency”, that is money printed by governments, was redeemable against gold. On the British £10 note are still the words, “I promise to pay the bearer on demand the sum of ten pounds.” The note itself was always exactly that — a promissory note which could be redeemed on request against gold. In other words, paper money was simply a proxy for gold. It’s all about trust, and as our trust in paper money increased, the need to redeem it against gold vanished — or at least until the bailouts of recent times that is.

So what is it about gold that made it such a desirable form of money in the first place? What is that makes gold so trustworthy? Why did we ever use gold and not, say, iron as a means of storing value? After all, iron ingots would be so much cheaper than gold ones.

But that’s precisely the point.

Here are some highly desirable qualities that money must have in order for people to trust and use it:

1. Scarcity. Precious metals are “precious” for a reason. Unlike iron, gold is not available in abundance in the Earth’s crust. If it were possible to mine it in huge quantities and dump it on the market, the relative worth of gold would plummet — along with the wealth of everyone who holds their savings as gold. Indeed, a bitter criticism made against western governments and their policy of “quantitative easing” is that, by issuing large quantities of new money, they are not only reducing the relative worth of government debt, but are also destroying the value of ordinary people’s wages and life-savings.

2. Divisibility. If your lunch costs you a gram of gold, but all you have is a 12 kg gold bar and no means of breaking off a small amount, then your lunch is going to prove very expensive indeed. Gold, however, is almost infinitely divisible, and small denominations can simply be held as coins.

3. Durability. Money must not easily corrode or decompose, otherwise nobody would want to hold on it. As we all know, however, gold is highly durable.

4. Transportability. Gold coinage was easily transportable by the measure of times gone by. In today’s world, gold has been superseded by more transportable forms of money — first by promissory notes (paper money), and then by electronic transactions.

5. Non-counterfeitability. Money must not be easy to duplicate otherwise its worth would be destroyed by counterfeiters. Over the centuries, many a budding alchemist has been frustrated by their inability to turn common base metals into precious gold.

Common arguments against Bitcoin include the point that it is not “backed by anything”, or that it cannot possess intrinsic value because it has no physical form. However, gold is not “backed” by anything other than trust — trust made possible because it possesses the necessary qualities that make “good money”. And we are all use to handling non-physical money in the form of credit cards and direct debits which are, in effect, nothing other than a way of changing numbers stored on our behalf by a bank.

It’s all about trust, not physical tangibility, and with today’s money we simply put our trust in banks to accurately keep the tally of our account. Bitcoins, on the other hand, are not tallies of an account run by some trusted third-party on our behalf — they are unique mathematical entities that exist in their own right. You can, if you really wish, print out Bitcoin money as QR codes on paper and store them in a traditional safe.

What’s important in this discussion is simply that crypto-money does, indeed, possess all the above desirable qualities of money, plus several profoundly significant new ones. Let’s take non-counterfeitability for example — what is there to stop you making multiple digital copies of a single bitcoin and spending them all?

At the heart of the Bitcoin currency is a public ledger system called the “block chain”. A transaction takes place when it is recorded on this ledger, so that all legitimate Bitcoin transactions can easily be verified by anybody and everybody for all time. Crucially, no one person, organisation, bank or state body controls this ledger — it is distributed across computing networks the world over. Furthermore, it is designed in such a way that to falsify a Bitcoin transaction on the block chain would require more computing power than that available to the block chain itself. The block chain is both distributed and scalable, and as technology improves, so does the computing power available to the block chain which, today, already far exceeds that of the world's top 500 supercomputers combined.

However, it is not just the non-counterfeitability of cryptocurrency that make it such a radical proposition. Just as there is a finite amount of gold waiting to be mined from the Earth's crust, there is a finite number of bitcoins waiting to be discovered. Now, what if I were to tell you that there are 21 million bitcoins in existence, and only around 11 million of these have so far been discovered?

In fact, the process of discovering new bitcoins is referred to as "mining", and in principle, anyone can mine for new bitcoins using their computer. The days when you could generate your own Bitcoin wealth simply by having your laptop crunch numbers overnight are long gone however, and dedicated hardware must now be brought to bear in order to stand any chance of mining new bitcoins.

And the significance of this is what exactly?

Well, new bitcoins, just like gold itself, cannot be issued by any state bank and, in the future, national governments will no longer have a license to bailout investors of schemes "too big to fail" simply by "printing" new money at the expense of ordinary people.

What's more, despite a reliance on a very public ledger system, Bitcoin transactions are potentially anonymous. This anonymity is made possible because, in principle at least, there is nothing linking a transaction on the block chain to a real-world individual. Bitcoin transactions are made to a "receiving address", not a named person.

Critically, you will not need a bank or government agency to assign you a receiving address — you can generate as many as you like yourself. In fact, receiving parties will typically generate a new address for each transaction they make, so in this way receiving addresses are not only anonymous — they are disposable.

Put simply, pure Bitcoin transactions will present a very challenging proposition for any government to tax.

Are you starting to get the picture now?

Once we accept that Bitcoin not only has all the necessary requirements for good money, but also has some pretty compelling new features (such as a anonymity and a built-in escrow-like capability), it becomes entirely plausible that Bitcoin, or some other cryptographic currency, is destined to succeed the fiat currencies in the 21st century.

Crypto-money can be used by anyone in anonymity, without the requirement for a bank to store or facilitate transactions other than in servicing the conversion from or back to fiat currency. By the time state machinery starts to wake up to the tsunami that threatens to wash away its ability to tax and to "quantitatively ease" itself out of debt, devaluing the wages of ordinary people in the process, cryptocurrency will be too big to fail. Indeed, I would argue that whatever action governments take, cryptocurrency is one of those inventions which once invented, can never be uninvented.

So what does all this have to do with feminism?

Anyone who knows my writing will also know that I do not regard feminism as a benign philosophy of equality, but an ideological parasite that has ridden upon the back of the changing relationship between men and women — change brought about, not by feminism as we have been told, but by industrialisation, urbanisation and contraception.

What has really enabled feminism to flourish, however, is how its stated aim of destroying the family has so suited the interests of both capitalism and errant governments. By forcing women into the workplace (whether they wanted it or not), feminism has helped to facilitate a near doubling of both the workforce and consumer base. More consumers mean more profit for big business, and more workers mean more tax revenue for burgeoning public sectors.

If you've ever wondered why the mortgage on a modest house now requires two full-time incomes to pay it — there's your answer. Women have been imprisoned by a false idea of liberation, and children farmed out to "nurseries" so that the public school boys and girls* who make up today's political and social elite can benefit.

Whether you share or oppose my perspective on feminism is irrelevant. The prospect remains that as more transactions take place using crypto-money, people will quietly cease to use their bank accounts, and a "black market" will emerge that will be beyond the state's ability to criminalise.

However, I warn against any notion that a Libertarian utopia is just around the corner, or that such thing would be desirable. Public sector bodies are not going to downsize to accommodate lower tax revenues in acquiescence, but in outright resistance. Established financial institutions will not quietly fade into obscurity simply because their business models are irrelevant, but will fight to maintain the status-quo — no matter what the perversion. And faced with an inability to inspect and tax financial transactions, governments may adopt draconian measures and simply confiscate people's wealth.

Do not doubt that these will be times of economic struggle and ordinary people will suffer. In all of this, however, the luxury pre-occupations of upper and middle-class feminists will cease to be anyone's priority. More significantly perhaps, today's public sectors — the great employers that finance today's gender ideologues — will be face upheaval.

In truth, I've no idea whether the social and economic landscape of the mid-21st century will be better or worse than the one today. Potentially, our children may live in a dystopia — one in which the state manages to solve its tax revenue crisis only by appropriating draconian powers over the lives of ordinary people. At the other extreme lies the possibility of an anarcho-captialist nightmare, where the weak are quite literally allowed to fall by the wayside.

However, I like to be an optimist and here's my alternative vision of a post-feminist world.

The gender ideology of the late 20th century will be washed by the changing times, and social commentators of the future, in rationalising past events, will delude themselves with the idea that the fall of feminism had always been inevitable and obvious to all.

Our children will not have to fight for daily survival in some anarcho-capitalist future world, but a form of stable government, along with a social safety net for those experiencing genuine misfortune will remain. However, a reduced ability to plunder the pockets of working people will mean that the state will be forced to address the real-world needs of families, not fund its own ideological based machinations.

Just perhaps, closer economic integration brought about by a single world currency, will make possible a 20 hour working week — not only providing full employment and a living wage for a workforce of both men and women, but allowing both working mothers and fathers to be real parents to their children. Children would no longer have to be farmed out to the care of strangers, and women would not be forced to choose between their careers and motherhood.

Most of all, fathers would no longer be made to fight for "access", but would be important members of the family once more.

*Note. Somewhat counter-intuitively, the term "public school" in the UK refers to a private education.

This article was first published on Andy's personal blog at andy-man.net. You can also follow @AndyManMRA on Twitter.

Holiday in debtor's prison – 1930

Robert St. Estephe · 4 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•◊•

The term "alimony club," dating from the late 19th century, was an ironic reference denoting jail, often a special section of same reserved for alimony debtors. As the early Men's Rights movement developed in the 1920s, the term was sometimes used to describe formal anti-alimony organizations, some which opened offices and published periodicals.

•◊•

►• Thanksgiving 1930 •◄

FULL TEXT: New York, Dec. 12 — Stocks may decline, husbands may lose their jobs and take their place on the bread line, but like the brook, alimony goes on forever. Despite repeated efforts of the famous Alimony Club, through its lawyers to protect the rights of the male, when married, the moan is still "alimony" and it looks as though it would stay there forever.

Thanksgiving Day was celebrated in the Alimony Club, known as the little Big House on West 37th Street, New York City, by 33 members – inmates. These men who are unable to pay alimony were truly thankful on the day set apart for universal thanksgiving. They have nice warm beds, plenty of good food and congenial company. They have a yard in which to play the national game. For indoor recreation, all the comforts of modern times— radio included — good time as there was much talent to entertain them.

The gay company consisted of George Walsh, the debonair, devil-may-care pianist of Broadway who held the key to Myrna Darb's heart for so long. He is a "member" because he couldn't pay his estranged wife, Josephine Davis, the $5,828 she claims he owes her.

This is the second time George has taken a suite in the "Hotel de Alimony.' The first time was in 1929, but Josephine relented then and let George out.

He is not the only celebrity gracing Alimony Retreat. There is Luigi Bambosschek, a Metropolitan conductor whose wife stepped in as he was about to start a 20-weeks' contract with the Met and compelled him to take up his residence in the Alimony "hotel."

Rather than pay his former wife, Lililan, $3,600 back alimony, Al St. Johns, for 17 years famous as a movie comedian, went to jail in August of 1929 in Los Angeles. The judge said St. Johns could stay on the rockpile until he pays, even if it's the rest of his natural life. So far as we know he's still there.

To escape compulsory residence in the famous "hotel" Ned Jacobs, well-known Broadway producer, had to disappear, which made it impossible to serve him with an order to compel an increase of a bond guaranteeing that his wife's $35 a week alimony is paid. If this bond is not executed Mr. Jacob's wife can send him to the Alimony Club.

He has married another woman, which makes the former wife still more anxious to collect. Wives have the legal power to make love so expensive that only a very wealthy man can afford to indulge in more than one marital experience. Still there are few wives who will not soften toward their mates if they are willing to hand out a little soft soap.

A few days ago, William P. Ferguson, whose wife had sued him for divorce, found himself in jail for non-payment of alimony.

When she went to see him, Ferguson made love through the jail bars so effectively that her heart melted. She fell in love with him all over again and the divorce motion was dismissed. They are now on a second honeymoon. This is one solution of alimony evil—when the wife isn't really a gold digger.

But unfortunately there doesn't seem to be any redress for the husband whose wife determines to profit to the full extent of the law, for him nothing remains but "membership" in the Alimony Club until financial conditions permit his meeting the demands imposed on him.

["Alimony Club Members Give Thanks – Although Residence in "Hotel de Alimony" Is Forced by Wives Seeking Financial Balm, Arduous Love Making Through Bars Brings "Member" Freedom." Logansport Pharos Tribune (In.), Dec. 23, 1930, p. 9]

***

►● Christmas 1930 ●◄

FULL TEXT: Chicago — Alimony row in Cook county's Bridewell, the meticulously guarded gathering place for matrimony's bad boys, faces a bleak Christmas. In addition, its president, the small, dark, neat Jimmy Kalcerzzity, was checking out. However, Jimmie had a substitute.

Today's arrival was Daniel S. Beebe, former president of the Vitrolite company, in for the usual six months because he was $24,800 in arrears in alimony payments. Despite his plea for holiday clemency Mrs. Etta Marker Beebe, his divorced wife, insisted that he be locked up because he had given her but $300 in the last three years.

As a president, Jimmie Kalcerzzity has no place in jail. His environment prohibited his acts from having much effect. For Mr. Kalcerzzity's administrative duties have to do with the incorporated alimony club, an organization interested in reforming the state laws on that subject.

President Jimmie didn't have much time to outline the progress of the club today.

"But you might stick around a while," he said. "My wife could have me sent back right away while I've been penned up, my alimony kept climbing. That makes me eligible for another six months.'

~ SHAKE HEADS SADLY ~

Christmas in the county hoosegow is a bleak prospect for all of President Jimmie's clubmates. Made half-bitter, half-careless by their imprisonment, they shake their heads sadly, not because of themselves, they say, but because of their children. The 40 fathers counted 100 children among them.

"I'm an engineer on the B & O ," explained Steven Wasilewski. "I've got two children by my first wife, and two by my second. The four live with my second wife, and my first wife had me thrown in here because I owed her $600. I can't pay her off when I'm not earning anything — and here I got four kids and a second wife starving."

Julius Turowetzky, auto tire dealer, is just starting his six months. "And my wife," said he, "never did love my three children by my first wife. She has none of her own. And because she wouldn't care for mine like she promised, I don't speak to her two years; and even I gave her deeds to my property. But what difference? Rosey had me locked up. Can you imagine it?"

~ NO VISITORS ~

Sign painters, carpenters, clerks, and chefs scrub floors daily, make beds and serve food. During the last year there were 525 additions to the Alimony club. Sometimes they serve out all six months, sometimes less.

Christmas in jail? Yes, and there'll be the ordinary prison fare — and no visitors.

The prospect is almost too much for Wallie Hendricks, who is very black ["black" refers to "black mood"] and also $400 behind on his ex-wife's upkeep.

"Christmas in jail?" he murmurs gently. "Oh, I guess I might as well get used to it. I tell you what's wrong with this alimony business — we shouldn't 'a' got married in the first place."

["Bleak Holiday For Bad Boys In Alimony Row – Members of Club in Cook County's Bridewell Shake Heads Sadly Because of Hundred Children, syndicated (AP), The Daily Northwestern (Oshkosh, Wi.), Dec. 20, 1930, p. 17]

***

The Voice of Europe: Stealing children

Lucian Vâlsan · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

On September 6, Lucian Vâlsan, James Huff, Huffnágel Pista and whoever shall call in will be talking about the issue of kids being literally stolen from their families and taken to wherever the feminist-driven State deems appropriate. Though this issue occurs more often in the format of the child being taken by the mother and alienated from the father using the force of the State – an increasingly worrying trend is emerging in Europe: The State coming and taking the children because the parents are deemed politically incorrect.

In the UK children lost their families for several weeks because their parents were members of the wrong political party, in Italy children can be taken away because a feminist lawyer needs some more cash, in Germany children can loose their families because they don't want to go through the indoctrination camps called "public schools" and in Sweden things are even worse.

The subject is tricky so please join us and call in at (001) 310 388 9709, or Skype in, after the news. Let's pop solutions as to how individual parents (fathers in particular) can stay away from having their child legally abducted by the increasingly totalitarian systems that are now in place in Europe.

The show will commence at 7 PM GMT (London, Reykjavik and Lisbon time).

That is 8 PM CET (Madrid, Paris, Brussels, Rome, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Budapest, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw, Amsterdam, Bern, Bratislava, Prague, Belgrade, Tirana, Ljubljana, Zagreb, Sarajevo and Skopje time)

That is 9 PM EET (Helsinki, Tallinn, Riga, Vilnius, Kiev, Chisinau, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Ankara and Nicosia time)

That is 10 PM FEET (Minsk time)

And, finally, 11 PMMoscow time.

For the listeners in America this means 2 PM EST, 1 PM CST, 12 PM MST and 11 AM PST.

For the listeners in Australia, this means September 7, 2 AM (AWST) in West Australia and 4 AM AEST. (times adjusted in accordance with DST both for Europe and America)

SHOW PAGE

News Week in Review Aug 27 – Sept 3, 2013

Robert O'Hara · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Item: Colleges offer credit for spewing feminist bullshit all over Wikipedia

In the latest blatant attempt to censor and otherwise control the entire public discourse about gender issues and other things involving, gee I don't know….everything else, Gender Studies programs all over the U.S. have begun awarding college credit to anyone who expresses "A woman's point of view or feminist point of view" in Wikipedia posts. Don't think for one second these are small fry colleges doing this. Yale University, Brown University, and Pennsylvania State University top the list of over fifteen colleges nation wide.

Item: First one in four, then one in three, now 63% of all college aged women have been sexualy assaulted!

Yup, that's right. According to student unions in Canada when talking about female students in that country. Oh and don't forget to give them your money too! The article speaks for itself.

Item: Epidemic of women selling positive pregnancy tests on Craigslist and other internet platforms

Scary stuff. Apparently both buyers and sellers of positive pregnancy tests are converging on Craigslist and other internet markets like Ebay in order to capitalize on the growing market for women who want their man-folk to "pop the question." All legal and no recourse if you are defrauded into marriage. Guys be ware!

Item: False rape accusers attorney says that 18 month sentence is too harsh for false rape claims. Cites impact on children.

That's right, whenever a woman does something egregiously wrong she can always use the fact that she is a mother as her defense. Does anyone ever ask the question: "what effect the absence of a father would do to a child?"

Item: Naval Academy cadet gets drunk of her own volition, has sex of her own volition then regrets it finishes up testimony at hearing

In a fortuitous case involving accusations of sexual assault involving alcohol at the U.S. Naval Academy following so much public debate about the role of drinking in sexual assault a hearing involving an accuser who got drunk and, by the eyewitness accounts of several midshipman, initiated in sexual conduct with the accused concludes. The hearing held at the Navy Yard in Washington D.C. will determine if the accused will face court marshal. Under military code they will be facing a life time sentence if found guilty of allowing a girl to give them a blow job.

Item: Take a look at the lawyer who is representing the accused in above mentioned case

This woman worked as a corporate lawyer and then all of the sudden found her true calling: helping victims of military mistreatment including those tortured at Guantanamo and Abu Garib and making a ton of money doing it.

Lawyers for the defense are actually using this article as a counter argument item.

Item: Happier news to report: According to Managing Editor Dean Esmay, Erin Pizzey is home from the hospital and in good cheer and good spirits and moving around on her own and looking forward to doing a show on Saturday?

Great show Ms. Pizzy! Best of wishes from all here at AVfM and may you make a speedy recovery!

[/box]

Honey Badger Radio: Rape as Political Currency

AVfM Radio · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

[box icon=""]

Feminists own the word rape.

They own it, it's their property. And so are rape victims.

Their property, to dispose of as they see fit. To use in whatever manner they deem most advantageous for feminism.

They will deny the existence of those victims they find inconvenient to their political narrative or minimize the extent of their victimization. They will even go so far as to strip those inconvenient victims of their legal protections.

And what they do to feminist approved victims? They keep them in a cultivated state of dependency and non-agency so they can use their pain as a bludgeon.

Feminists own the word rape. And if you were raped, they own you.

SHOW PAGE

[/box]

Maine: Epicenter of false allegations

Paul Elam · 5 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

The legal, judicial priorities in the State of Maine continue to shock. Please note the following news story regarding the second conviction of Octavia Faustini for the crime of making a false allegation of sexual assault.

http://bangordailynews.com/2013/08/28/news/midcoast/rockland-woman-gets-60-days-in-jail-for-false-sexual-assault-report/?ref=polbeat

She has been sentenced to 60 days in jail, despite this being her second offense for the same crime (the first one earned her a $100.00 fine), and despite a criminal history that includes assaulting an officer, assault, criminal mischief and telephone harassment.

Especially relevant to this case is that her victim actually has a sexual assault conviction on his record, making him particularly vulnerable to the kind of false accusation being levied by Faustini.

The Judge in this case, Jeffrey Hjelm, is the same judge Vladek Filler had to face when he was first arrested and charged by corrupt prosecutor Mary Kellett. He ordered Filler held on $50,000 bail (despite his having no criminal record) and later refused to grant key defense motions that called out Kellett's discovery violations and lack of probable cause.

Hjelm is also the same judge who suspended Amber Cummings' entire jail sentence for murdering her husband in his sleep, and letting her proceed to inherit his massive fortune and get immediate full custody of their daughter.

Interestingly, Faustini's defense attorney, Joseph Steinberger, requested that sentencing be delayed for a year to allow the false accuser to perform community service – in order to demonstrate to the court that she can be a "productive citizen." He suggested she could volunteer, among other places, at New Hope for Women, an organization that, get this, offers help to female (only) abuse victims. A representative of New Hope for Woman was kind enough to offer testimony supporting the chronic false accuser.

Perhaps she would fit in quite well with their staff, and could offer pointers to the women for whom they provide services.

The Bangor Daily News, forsaking its civic responsibility, did not run a photograph of Faustini for the benefit of Maine citizens who might encounter her in the future.

[image]
Octavia Faustini – False Rape Liar
The State of Maine continues to offer itself up as the poster child for the need for judicial reform and a Department of Justice investigation into the gender bias that permeates our criminal justice system.

Recent research indicates that men receive 63% longer sentences on average than women do for the same crimes, and that men are twice as likely to be jailed for the same crimes as women. This gender gap is about six times as large as the racial disparity. [1]

[1] http://www.law.umich.edu/newsandinfo/features/Pages/starr_gender_disparities.aspx

Dr. Vernon P. Cooley: MHRA 1927

Robert St. Estephe · 6 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. "Gonzo journalism" is characterized as tending "to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy." Yet history – especially "social history" – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. "Gonzo" writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new "transgressive."

Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.

•?•

[image]

The Alimony Club of Illinois, founded by Dr. and Mrs. Vernon P. Cooley, represents the second formally established anti-alimony organization in the US. The first, American Alimony Payers Protective Association, was founded a month earler (May 1927) in New York City by Robert Ecob. The office of the Alimony Club of Illinois opened on August 2, 1927 at 189 West Madison Street in Chicago.

As Dr. Cooley fought against his gold-digging wife in Chicago court he was inspired to organize the men sitting in jail for non-payment of alimony into a formal lobby for reform. Shortly after announcing his plan to the newspapers he received a letter threatening to bomb his home if he did not drop his court actions against his ex-wife.

It is important to note that anti-alimony was not regarded as anti-child support (even though many jurisdictions used "alimony" judgments to cover child support as well as gold-digger support). The Alimony Club of Illinois did indeed extend assistance to ex-wives who were attempting to collect child support from ex-husbands.

The early months of the Alimony Club of Illinois are well-documented. Following are two articles of particular note, the second of them penned by Dr. Cooley himself.

•?•

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 2): Chicago, Aug. 12. – Why the alimony club?

To stop the indiscriminate awarding of alimony to gold-digging parasitic women.

The Alimony club of Illinois was created for the purpose of preserving the American home from disintegration, the abolition of legalized white slavery, the prevention of fraud and perjury and to eliminate forever the imprisonment of men for non-payment of alimony to conscienceless, vindictive wives who apparently delight in the prosecution an humiliation of "The goose that laid the golden egg."

Because there apparently exists in Chicago no organization founded for humanitarian purposes, to which those wishing help and advice might turn with some assurance of immediate and concrete help, the creation of such an organization as this was imperative.

Primarily the intent of the law with reference to alimony was to reward a faithful, loving wife who had done her duty to her home and family.

How far we have retrograded from the original purpose of this beneficent law may be gleaned from the fact that today the securing of alimony is a highly specialized, vicious industry, made possible by an alliance between perjurers, unscrupulous attorneys and politicians.

Does a man, after divorce, owe his wife a greater duty than while the marital relations existed, in that she may commit with impunity low and degraded, be guilty of improper friendship with other men, and still receive alimony? You cannot reconcile these two ideas.

This club is to save ex-husbands from the persecution of such women.

[Dr. Vernon P. Cooley, “Purpose of Alimony Club Is Outlined by Dr. Cooley,” St. Petersburg (Fl.), Aug. 13, 1927, p. 9]

•?•

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 2): With the alimony problem becoming a question of the hour among judges, the clergy, and many citizens, a new sensation developed yesterday when Dr. Vernon P. Cooley, whose alimony case started the discussion, received an anonymous letter, printed in a feminine head, threatening to bomb his home.

Dr. Cooley has announced a finish a finish fight in the courts against “gold-digger” wives, who view marriage simply as an aid to alimony. Frank Johnston Jr., until recently a judge of the Appellate court, has promised to present the case for Dr. Cooley to the Illinois Supreme court.

~ Letter Threatens Bombing. ~

“You and Johnston better let well enough alone unless you and your present wife want to be exposed,” the letter stated. “And what’s more your home will be bombed when you least expect it. Take warning. One Who Knows. Johnston will get his share too.” The letter was given to federal authorities.

While Dr. Cooley and his present wife, Mrs. Bessie Cooley, expressed a determination to proceed with their plans to form an association of alimony victims, and to present a strong demand for consideration in the courts. Chief Justice Joseph Sabath of the Superior court, who has heard 25,000 divorce cases – more than any other judge in the world – revealed his knowledge of the women he labeled the “alimony adventuress.”

“I have known women to come into my court who were receiving alimony from three husbands, Judge Sabath said. “There have been many cases where two husbands were paying.”

~ Tells of Deception. ~

“Of course, the laws specifies that when a divorced woman remarries, her alimony from the former husband ceases at once. But these women deceived their former mates, and continued to collect – extort would be a better word – from them. When we learn of such cases, the courts make short shrift of these adventuresses.

“This same type of woman lures men into marriage often just for the purpose of making them pay alimony. Bringing all their attractions into play, the trap the fat and jolly and prospering gentry into marriage, and immediately their attractions fade into cold disdain. Soon the husband sees his mistake, and then he’s compelled to pay alimony.

~ Stay Single to Collect. ~

“Unless they set a better prospect, these women – I have had any number of them before me demanding alimony – stay single, and for years they live, riotously and often immorality, on this deliberately gotten bounty.

“And our upper courts have held that no matter how depraved these women become, the alimony must go on, with the ex-husband paying for the liquor, the gigolos, and the love nest.”

Superior Judge Harry A. Lewis had an alimony seeking women before him yesterday and urged her to free her husband with a divorce or become reconciled with him. The wife, Mrs. Belle Glicksman, had sued for separate maintenance, demanding support from Aaron Glicksman, who owns a leather shop at 2223 Montrose boulevard.

~ Leading Men to Sin. ~

“Why should you hang on this man’s neck the rest of his life?” the judge demanded. “You want his money, but you don’t want to live with him. Man’s natural instincts move him to mate, and you are deliberately heading him to sin by your refusal to free him. Court can’t make a man virtuous.”

["Doctor Battling Alimony Gets Bomb Threat," Chicago Tribune (Il.), Jun. 28, 1927, p. 1]

•?•

Some photos of the second earliest known formal Men's Rights organization in the U.S.

JULY 21, 1927.

VICTIMS OF ALIMONY LAWS FORM CLUB

Husbands who pay and wives who work to help husbands pay former wives listening to Dr. Vernon P. Cooley, who was one of the first to protest against laws, at meeting held in the rooms of the High Noon club at 18 South Michigan avenue last night. (TRIBUNE Photo.)

***

[image]

***

[image]

•?•

Missing Anya

Gary Trieste · 6 September 2013 · Archived copy · Original

My daughter, Anya, was born in December of 2003.

My partner, Suzanne, and I were living together as husband and wife, and we raised Anya as a family in our home in the Catskills of upstate New York.

My relationship with Suzanne began to deteriorate when our daughter was around 3; although I did everything I could to maintain familial harmony, eventually vitriol, instability and arguing became the major theme of our relationship, and after 8 years of living together, we planned to separate, although we agreed it would be as amicable as possible for sake of our daughter.

