> "[The debate] revealed to me the technique of the Left, which is to reduce scope in order to increase simplicity and familiarity."

There is a word for this method of oversimplification: Obviating. The purpose is to increase understanding by reducing the confusion arising from complexity.

> "They always speak to their desired audience: a person lost in life, without much to their name, who cares only about what Government can deliver during the next pay period."

Obviating is necessary for those who are emotionally immature or intellectually inept.

> "Leftist policy entirely amounts to either (1) remove rules and standards, i.e. "liberalizing," and (2) add free stuff subsidies to buy votes. Both are aimed at equality, or reducing the natural advantage of the competent over the incompetent."

The left obviates, just like your elementary school teacher did.

My post on Sexual Authority (2020 September 30) describes how authority is the ability to exercise power, to draw allegiance, to inspire, convince, and seduce.

Finally, Novaseeker shared this article from Mere Orthodoxy (Anthony Bradley): American Evangelicalism isn't patriarchal or feminized. It's matrilineal. (2020 August 26). It cites a research paper and makes a cold case argument that American society and the converged church are indeed matrilineal. It's a change that has taken place throughout American culture. It's most visually obvious in the black community, but it's present everywhere in more camouflage, but with the same impact. For those of us who followed Dalrock, this is old news.

Related

- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review – A Return to Normal (2019 May 27)
- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review – The Escalation of Anarchy (2019 July 8)

Seeking Input on Marriage Licenses

Lexet Blog · 5 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What should be the "right" way to recognize marriage?

Readership: Christians;
Why is this important: An a-historic decline of marriage rates is impacting society. Determining the root cause is important to understand the social change and possibly find/create a solution. Concerns over the institution of marriage can be alleviated with legal changes and novel creativity.

The Dismal State of Marriage

Regular readers are all too familiar with the raw deal that is marriage these days. Anyone who doubts this should read a few of the following posts.

- Dalrock: Marriage strike? (2010 October 19)
- Dalrock: Driving a stake in the heart of the US marriage strike myth. (2010 October 27)
- Dalrock: Clarification on my position on a marriage strike. (2010 October 28)
- Dalrock: Supply and demand in the marriage market. (2011 March 29)
- Dalrock: Evidence of a "marriage strike"? (2018 August 30)
- Rob Says: Marriage (2020 September 23)
- Marriage, Sex, and More: Marriage Has Devolved Into A Temporary Arrangement… (2020 September 25)

In sum, the common advice to young men, even Christian men, is "Don't get married!" But in spite of the inevitable travesty, men continue to be driven into the meat grinder of marriage as it is deemed a fundamental, even necessary element of life itself.

On this point, The Shadowed Knight offered this gem at Spawny's Space.

> "Marriage is all about sex and children. No matter how rich or poor, how dangerous, or any other consideration. If a man can be sure that he will have a woman that will have his and only his children, he will do nearly anything to make it happen. Without that, men go back to the hunter gatherer ways of checking out of society, joining a gang, and meeting only basic survival needs.
>
> Men will create civilization if the only way to get pussy is by building and being civilized. Men will tear civilization apart and raze it to the ground if the only way to get pussy is to be a conqueror. Right now, we are building due to inertia, and that inertia is just about out. Unless men go back to hard paternal control over women, the decay and wear is going to tear this down."

Ed Hurst goes further to explain that the male drive towards marriage, sex, and procreation is an integral part of God's plan for us as human beings.

> "Everything we can talk about regarding human existence in this world begins with the dire necessity of building a covenant existence, a critical element in shalom. It's possible you will be alone in this endeavor locally, but the ostensible goal is to build a covenant community. That is the fundamental nature of your walk in Christ. Everything you do must be tied to that essential task in human life.
>
> Naturally that includes sex. There is only one permissible motive in human sexual activity: building up the marriage covenant as part of a covenant community. All other motives make sex evil. Sex can never be right unless it serves a covenant purpose. And of course, Scripture makes it plain as day that the only legitimate sexual activity is between covenant husband and wife. Period. All those legally married couples out there having marital sex outside of a heart-led covenant endeavor are sinning. It's sin because they are outside the covenant in the first place.
>
> Civil marriage or church weddings are a poor substitute for a genuine heart-led covenant before the Lord. We can stand back and see how they do contribute to civic stability, but in the long run, that is a damned poor substitute for shalom."

Christians are tempted to throw stones at those men who opt out of marriage (MGTOW), or choose to cohabitate in order to avoid the risks of frivorce and alimony. But the social context of a Covenant marriage, and the resulting Shalom has been completely forgotten. This failure to recognize God and His natural ordination has rendered men as a whole, and especially Christian men, stuck in a d@mnable bind. Something must change, and soon. God Himself won't tolerate any more.

How I See It

I have sympathy for non Christian men who desire marriage. If 50% of marriages (or more) end in divorce, and 70% are initiated by women, a man has over 1/3 chance of being blindsided with divorce at some point in his life.

Laws and court rulings only reinforce this ruination. Our government encourages divorce by allowing “no fault” divorces, by allowing partners to lie about the root cause of the divorce, and by enforcing precedent that typically works against the male, regardless of circumstances.

How can you encourage God’s institution when our civil government mocks it by allowing frivolous divorce, and punishing the male regardless of circumstances?

Should we as a society discourage divorce by eliminating the benefits of divorce (alimony, spousal support, child support, division of property)?

In the Christian community, should we suggest that if the couple chooses, they don’t have to file a marriage certificate with the county in order for God to recognize their marriage? Should the Christian community find their manhood and protest/sue States over divorce laws?

As far as I am concerned, I see no requirement in scriptures for a person to be married before the civil government (by filing documents). Referencing OT passages only muddles our understanding of this, as the government and faith were intertwined in ancient Israel. It is not clear in scripture how the surrounding nations and people groups officiated their marriages, but it was clear that marriage did exist, and there were well-defined guidelines for things of a sexual nature.

The challenge we face in implementing scripture is that the society we live in today is nothing like the Ancient Near East social structure. Even so, the intellectual problem of how to approach marriage exists, and this may be largely due to the fact that our society is so vastly different from the one our Fathers of the Faith lived in.

Seeking Input

We have seen an influx of churches demanding to be freed from state restrictions on gatherings due to Covid. Yet we don't see Christians protesting unbiblical family laws that result in inequitable divorce decrees and custody rulings.

I'd like for commenters to share their thoughts on the following approaches towards marriage.

1. Filing/recording their marriage with the government.
2. Common law marriage (legal in fewer than 15 states).
3. Having a wedding ceremony in a church.
4. Any other ideas???

I see several sides, pros and cons to each approach, and I am not entrenched with any one view.

I'll probably be writing on the subject of marriage more as time progresses.

Related

- Σ Frame: Lest we forget, Marriage was once intended to Glorify God (2019 August 8)
- Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020 April 24)
- Σ Frame: The need for Marriage Education (2020 May 15)
- Σ Frame: Only God can grant a successful marriage (2020 May 20)
- Σ Frame: Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14)

How do Women Glorify God?

Jack · 7 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women can be leaders, but only under certain conditions.

Readership: Men;

Female Leadership

In these feminized times, it is common for women to assume a position of leadership in politics, government, social movements, and even the church.

But this arrangement does not follow God's proscribed order, nor does it glorify Him.

> "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence."
>
> 1st Timothy 2:12 (KJV)

We do not need the Bible to tell us that women are generally unfit to lead. We can know this through simple observation.

> "I told him I had been that morning at a meeting of the people called Quakers, where I had heard a woman preach. Johnson replied, "Sir, a woman's preaching is like a dog's walking on his hind legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all.""
>
> *James Boswell, in The Life of Samuel Johnson (1791) Info

Young Housewife, by Lexei Vasilyevich Tyranov (1840)

Yet, the Bible contains stories of women who were leaders, in a sense.

- Deborah was a judge and a prophet. (Judges 4-5)
- Miriam was a leader in worship. (Exodus 15:20; Micah 6:4)

- Rizpah defended the sanctity of human life, and the honor of her tribe by keeping watch over her slain sons and fending away wild animals and birds. Her public mourning, night and day for months, came to be regarded as a civil protest against the senseless massacre of war. (2nd Samuel 21:1-14). Her unrelenting despair won the solidarity of a war-weary people and finally moved King David to grant her sons a proper burial, thereby ending the famine that had swept the land.
- Huldah was a prophetess who had a leading role in the restoration of Israel. (2nd Kings 22)
- Esther risked her own life to save the lives of the Jewish people. (Esther 1-10)
- Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, as well as Joanna and Susanna were leaders in service, submission, adoration, and providing sustenance to Jesus and his disciples. (Luke 8:1-3; Luke 10:38-42)
- Mary Magdalene was the first to see the risen Lord and received the task of proclaiming Jesus' resurrection to the other disciples, specifically the men. (John 20:1-18)
- Lydia, a merchant, was a leader in hospitality to Paul and Silas during their missionary work (Acts 16:14-15). She also hosted one of the first home fellowship assemblies of the early Church (Acts 16:40).
- Phoebe held a special role in the early church on account of her willingness to help anyone in need (Romans 16:1-2).
- Priscilla boldly accompanied her husband Aquila while he joined Paul in his work as a tentmaker and a missionary (Acts 18).
- Rahab was a gentile prostitute who displayed exceptional wisdom and faith by colluding with two Israelite spies. (Joshua 2). In spite of her sins, God honored Rahab's faith and courage by placing her in the lineage of not only Israel's great King David (Matthew 1:6) but also of Jesus, the King of Kings (Matthew 1:1).

Other women who showed extraordinary initiative in their personal relationships with men include Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Tamar, Leah, Ruth, the Shulamite girl in the Song of Songs, Abigail, Bathsheba, and Mary the mother of Jesus.

Three individuals, Junia(s) (Romans 16:7), Chloe (1st Corinthians 1:11), and Nympha(s) (Colossians 4:15), hosted home church fellowships. They are believed to be women, but this is not certain.

A real housewife is joyful in service.

God Glorifies those Women who Help and Serve

Looking through this list, we see that the female leaders in the Bible glorified God through their faithful service to men or to a larger body of people. These women played the role of a helper, a mediator, a prophetic advisor, or one who provided sustenance, and not as a conqueror or teacher. In all cases, it was obvious that God was the power behind their leadership, and not the woman herself. It should also be noted that they all worked in cooperation with other leaders who were men.

The examples of Deborah, Huldah, and Esther are unique, in that they were political leaders. God is glorified when people who fear the Lord follow the leader, not because of the leadership ability of the person, but because they recognize that they don't need a great leader to be obedient to God's authority.

These female leaders in the Bible exercised faith by recognizing that all they needed to do was to speak the Lord's truth, and/or offer a unifying voice of direction to coordinate the people's labor for the Lord.

People are willing to follow such leaders because they fear authority, are intuitively aware of God's purposes, or else they recognize the truth of the prophetic Word, and therefore, they only need a united effort and the willingness to obey in order to carry out His will. Thus, the Lord did the work through the people's obedience, and not through any leadership expertise on behalf of the leader.

A real housewife glorifies God.

God Glorifies the Weak and Helpless

From a larger perspective, we know that God often chooses those who are seemingly unable to do great things for the simple reason that this glorifies Him. Therefore, women, as being the weaker vessel (1st Peter 3:7), may be recruited by God to serve in His purposes and to glorify Him.

But this state of weakness is not necessarily something we should seek out, nor be envious of. The apostle Paul spoke of this as being a "thorn in the flesh".

> [7] And lest I should be exalted above measure by the abundance of the revelations, a thorn in the flesh was given to me, a messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I be exalted above measure. [8] Concerning this thing I pleaded with the Lord three times that it might depart from me. [9] And He said to me, "My grace is sufficient for you, for My strength is made perfect in weakness." Therefore most gladly I will rather boast in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. [10] Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in needs, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake. For when I am weak, then I am strong."

> 2 Corinthians 12:7-10 (NKJV)

A Strong Independent Woman™ (SIW), or one who claims or aspires to be such. is not a Christian woman, nor one who glorifies God.

A Real Housewife™ glorifies God, not just herself.

Conclusions

Now before readers jump to the conclusion that I am defending the rulership of many women in power, I need to emphasize that a woman in a position of leadership can only glorify God if she is dedicated to doing the Lord's work.

- Without God, a female cannot be a leader.
- Without glorifying the power of God through her weakness, a female cannot be a leader.
- Without God-fearing followers, a female cannot be a leader.
- Without followers that are unified in working together to do God's will, a female cannot be a leader.

Let's not forget the reason why God appoints females to be leaders at special times and under unique conditions. It is to glorify Himself.

Only by the power and authority of God can a female serve in a leadership position. The moment she ceases to act as an agent of His will, the moment she fails to glorify God, she will fall from her position, or else the followers will be misled and will fail in their efforts.

Of course, we know that practically 100% of all women in politics today are in it for other reasons.

 H/T: Patriactionary: You, madam 'preacher', are no lady (2020 April 26)*

Related

- Laughing at Feminism: Worshipping the Great Whore (2019 May 18)

- Gynocentrism: Gynocentrism and the Demographic Implosion of Western Civilisation (2019 November 25)
- Gynocentrism: Book Review of Governance Feminism – An Introduction (2019 December 26)

Is the Pendulum Effect caused by Western Individualism?

Jack · 9 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Individualism draws people to separate themselves in order to blend into the masses.

Readership: All
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

The Pendulum Effect is an enduring feature of Western Societies

In the west we are familiar with how seasons turn and times change.

- The economy undergoes “Bear” periods of stagnation followed by “Bull” stimuli.
- Political environments swing wildly from ultra conservative to super liberal.
- Within society, social consciousness movements reach periodic pinnacles of fervor, followed by an era of good feelings.
- Fashion and clothing styles swing from bearded homegrown, to clean-shaven formal attire, to stubbly Punk grunge, and then back home.
- In the Church, religious revivals sweep from laissez-faire licentiousness, to guilt trips, to smart practicality, and then back to hedonism.
- After young people graduate from high school, they soon leave home, often to travel, attend college, or find a job. They also leave the church. They do their own thing for a decade or so. Eventually, they settle down and have children, and then they return to church. This is a stereotypical pattern that has existed in Christian churches of the West. This has gone on for as long as I can remember, at least since the 1970’s, and probably much earlier than that.
- We even have a cycle of generations having the archetypes of Heroes, Prophets, Artists, and Nomads, as researched by Strauss et al. (Click on link for more.) These are more popularly known as successive, self-naming generations, the Boomers, Xers, Millennials, and so on.

This oscillating movement of social trends from one extreme to the other is a phenomenon commonly referred to as the Pendulum Effect.

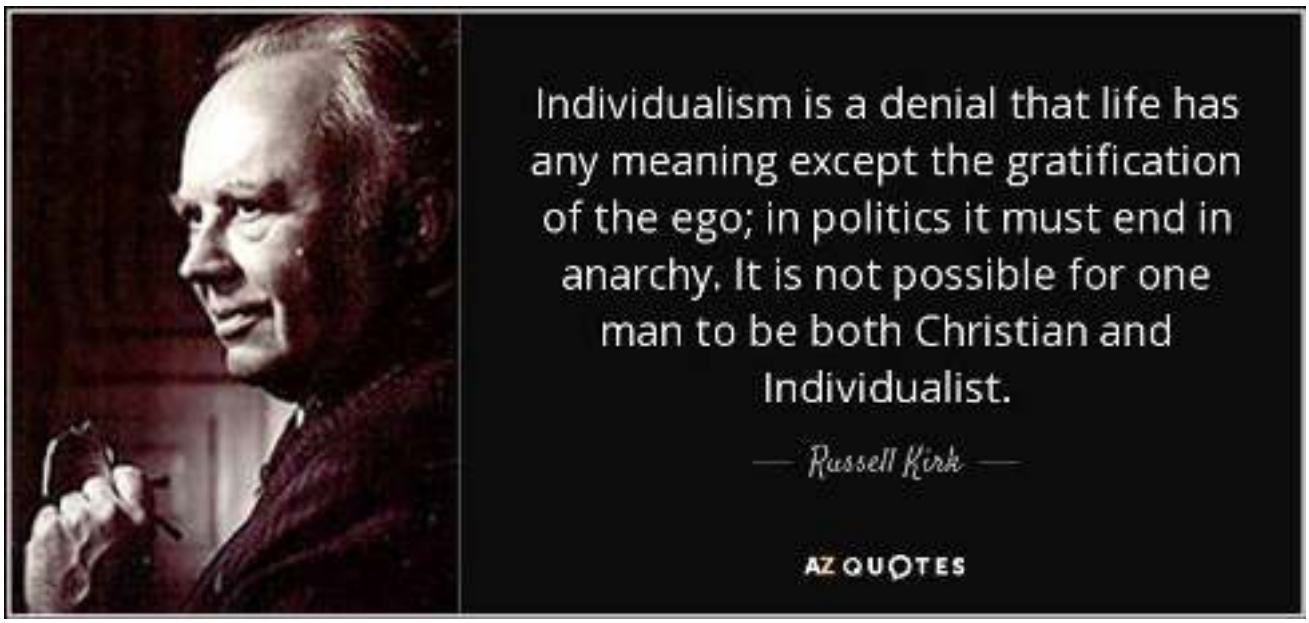
I’ve often wondered why these patterns must exist.

Why is the West so uniquely WEIRD?

Several years ago, I had the notion that the Pendulum Effect was related to Christendom, but I could not identify how.

Over the summer, I studied the topic of Consanguinity in Modern European History (2020 August 28). The authors of the original research concluded that the church had “created” individualism by forbidding consanguineous unions. At the time, I didn’t see strong evidence for this claim, and concluded that it was a conjectured theory. But if it’s true, then it would explain why individuality is associated with Christendom.

But in fact, Individualism is incompatible with traditional Christianity.



After I started traveling around Asia, I found that most young adults accompany their families to go to the temple and to participate in other regular cultural and religious traditions.

After living abroad for many years, I have been amused to discover that there are no such pendulum swings in east Asia as there are in the West. Younger Generations live in harmony with preceding Generations. They share the family wealth and other resources as needed.

Yes, there are social movements, but these all call for a return to Common Sense and the common welfare of everyone, not just a select group. There is seldom any violence.

Yes, there are political movements, but none of it becomes too serious unless there has been an egregious abuse of power and a full Revolution is afoot, but this is a rare moment in history.

Yes, there are fashion trends but they are focused on exuding a fresh, bright newness rather than stunning novelty, and this tends to be confined to the middle class. Furthermore, there is no risqué challenge to the frontier of what would be considered morally appropriate and socially acceptable, as is typical of the West. There are some people who do dress provocatively, but this is associated with their social identity as one who likes to live on the edge, not as a stratagem in the SMP or as an attempt to be popular. Instead, the Eastern version of popularity is largely determined by how capable and responsible one is, and how well one can get along with others.

This is not to say that there is no individuality in the East. In fact, all manner of individuality is tolerated as long as it is the authentic truth of who the person is, deep in the heart. It is thought that everyone's personal uniqueness must be accepted and cannot be argued with nor fought against. But in the West, there are only certain genres of individuality that are considered acceptable, and people are expected to conform to these anti-karyotypes in order to be popular. Actually, this is not true individuality at all, because it requires that everyone's soul be stuffed into a mold of social and psychological conformity that is ominously prescribed by personal philosophy, education, and the media.

After reading RP authors for a while, especially Brett Stevens [1] and Ed Hurst [2], I've let go of the notion that the Pendulum Effect is somehow rooted in Christianity. I've come to see that it's more of an embodiment of Western Individualism.

Why does the West cling so stubbornly to the ~~Religion~~ Rebellion of Individuality?

Brett Stevens wrote an excellent description of Individualism.

> "Individualism states that the natural order is not important, and that the individual should come first before all else. The whims, desires, judgments, feelings and impulses of the individual are more important than any other order, including civilization, nature, or the divine. Individualism became the dogma of the West with The Enlightenment,™ the Renaissance,™ and the rise of egalitarian thought (ideologies dedicated to human equality, which means "no one can be sent away") centuries ago." [3]

The spirit of individualism is that which tempts people to separate themselves, to withdraw from common sense, to fall under the spell of the egotistical self, to chant the party line, and to disrupt longitudinal social stability and order, all done in order for one to blend acceptably into the grey masses as a socially shining star and a spiritually dead cipher – and still feel gooed about it!

Conclusions

The periodic oscillation of political, social, and fashion trends is an evil spiritual influence that upsets both the peace within the human soul and the shalom of a society. The stronghold of this oscillation lies in the western focus on individuality – radical liberalism, egalitarianism, the glorification of the individual, the intense elevation and favor of special interest groups, and the self-perceived triumph of continual self-styled rebellion.

Repent ye therefore, from the witchcraft of Individualism. Pray that your personal oscillation shall come to a standstill, so that your soul may find peace and rest.

References

1. Amerika (Brett Stevens): Solipsism (2020-9-6)
2. Do What's Right: Covenants 02 (2020-9-6)
3. Amerika (Brett Stevens): Understanding Individualism (2017 July 9)

Related

- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Inversion = Equality = Individualism (2016 October 4)
- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Inner Self As The Opposite Of Individualism (2016 October 27)
- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Leftism Is Egalitarianism Which Is Individualism (2019 June 16)
- If Only Even One (Todd Pearson): American Individualism and the Death of Christian Community (2020 April 15)
- Amerika (Edgar Tru): Radical Individualism And The Extremist View Of The Self (2020 August 4)

Frauds in Christ's Name

Lexet Blog · 12 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Shouldn't we vet the leaders of our church fellowship groups?

Readership: Christian men;

There are some sinister elements who are invading the church and the Christian Red Pill arena. Like predators, they come in out of nowhere, focus on a target, get close to them, separate their prey from the prey's group, and go in for the kill. Rather than harming their target, however, these hijackers co-opt their prey, using them to establish themselves.

The most sinister wolves in the church and Christian Manosphere are self-appointed "authorities" who use the labels of "Christian" in order to gain status and wealth in their own communities, and "Red Pill" for the appeal. These men may be the only teaching elder or pastor in their church. If not, they certainly are the shining star of their congregation. Sometimes they obtain the title of Elder as soon as they can, and then run off elsewhere, using their newfound credential to jump start their path to fame.

A funny joke if not for the fraud being perpetrated on men.

George Bruno, another grifter who is bridging the gap between the 21 Convention scam artists and "christians".

Over the last two years, men in the Christian Red Pill sphere may have seen attempts by "Christian" "teachers" try this. Specifically, certain men in the "discernment ministry" at Bible Thumping Wingnut (BTWN) decided to show themselves as fraudulent fools by using George Bruno so they in turn could get in good graces with the 21 Convention, and its leader who goes by the nickname "The Dream." (Just a wee bit of a narcissistic name).

The whole scenario was bizarre. Out of nowhere, BTWN started affiliating with "pastors" with unfriendly theological beliefs (postmillennial theonomists who are Doug Wilson proteges), and then they got into good graces with a YouTube star who was advocating for fornication only weeks earlier. On a normal day, none of the men should have been affiliating with each other. Events only became more strange when certain other "pastors" became cozy with the 21 Convention crowd.

Whenever you see a Christian pastor or ministry invite a fornication advocate to your men's retreat, we have a massive red flag to deal with. There is a good reason why the Christian Manosphere split off from the secular Manosphere.

Famed Manospherian Roosh Valizadeh made a tough decision and unpublished his books on pick-up Game in order to align his ministry with the work of Christ.
Ask yourself these questions about those "leaders" in either your church or the Christian Manosphere:

- Do they yoke themselves with secular figures for recognition/fame/reaching out to a larger audience?
- Do they establish themselves as the one true authority on masculinity?
- Are they trying to establish themselves as an authority figure over you, while isolating you into their camp?
- Do they make you feel guilty or ashamed?
- Have they been elders at their church for less than 2 years?
- Have they changed churches/affiliations more than once?
- Are they accountable to anyone?
- Is their "ministry" focused on something other than the gospel?
- Do they hide their theological opinions or affiliations because they know it will hinder them? Do they operate in the dark?
- Are they trying to help you, or are they trying to draw you into their sect/cult?
- Do they handle scripture faithfully – do they let it speak for itself, or do they add newfound interpretations that have never been made in Christendom's history?
- Do they hate critics to the point they try to doxx them?

If the person or ministry in question scores negatively on many of the above checkpoints, then there's a good chance that their "ministry" is fickle and has no foundation. It is all about the people running the show. That is one giant red flag that should ring false teacher/con-men alarm bells.

Ultimately, it's classic branding and marketing, with roots in narcissism. The personality will do and say whatever they have to in order to stay relevant, grow their audience, and make money. That explains why a person of one theological stripe will engage in ecumenism, or why a fornicator will show up to a Christian men's retreat.

Related

- Full Metal Patriarchy: Bnonn Doubles Down (2019 September 22)

Patheological Weddingsday – When wanton treachery brings shame, not honor.

Jack · 14 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Rules are lightning rods of shame for those seeking after the flesh.

Readership: All
Length: 3,200 words;
Reading Time: 12 minutes;

Introduction

So far, I have covered two posts at Patheos, written by Jackson Wu. This post will cover Wu's third and conclusive article about the Purity Culture at Patheos, When purity brings shame, not honor (2020 August 19). Of note, the title of this post is a gaffe. True sexual purity brings holiness and honor, not shame and ignominy. The shame results from the lack of purity. Let's not skirt the issue.

Wu hits a lot of topics in this post, so my analysis here stretches rather long. However, I urge readers to take the time to go through it because there are some important takeaways.

Guarding Your Heart

The author brings up a catch-phrase that was common in the Purity Movement,
"You have to guard your heart", which is based on the following scripture passage.

> "Guard your [own] heart with all vigilance, for from it flow the springs of life."
>
> Proverbs 4:23

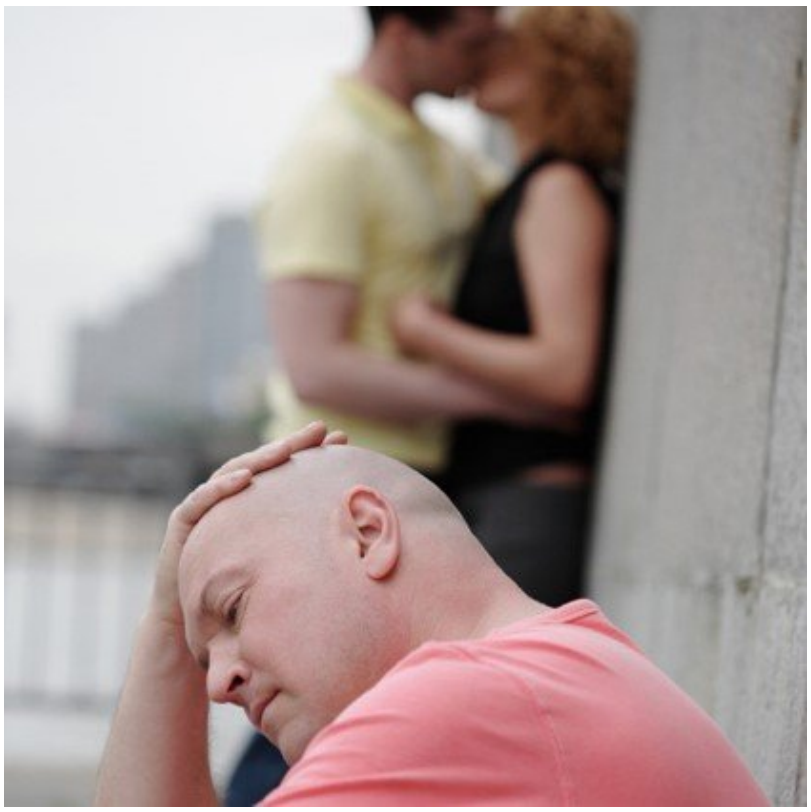
This verse uses "keep" instead of "guard" in most translations (ESV, NASB, NRSV, NRSVA, RSV, et al.), but several other translations use "guard" (CSB, HCSB, NET, NLT, TLV, et al.).

It was presumed that "guarding one's heart" was directed against the possible temptation to sexual sin. But the author notes,

> "Christian subculture sanctioned mass segregation of gender and a guarding of others' hearts not my own. Much of the onus fell on women, who were told that their bodies were "stumbling blocks" for men."

Actually, gender segregation is a common practice in many (if not most) societies, and it has been since before antiquity. There is good reason for doing so. People might think this is oppressive, but temptation and sexual sin is more so. Putting the onus on women is necessary, because if left to their own devices, women will naturally resort to playing games and having fun with their hypergamic sexual proclivities. It is their nature to do so, although they will soundly deny it.



7 "Lies" that Purity Culture Teaches Women

Wu cites an article written by Natalie Collins at CBE International which listed 7 Lies That Purity Culture Teaches Women (2015 September 8). So I had to go check out the CBE International site.

When I read through a few of the articles there, I almost choked on all the stars and horns! To give you the flavor, the banner at the top of the site reads, "Women and men leading together, serving as equals". Note that it's "women and men", not the linguistically favored "men and women".

Wowzers! So now I have to segue into this article before I can go on to address Wu's statements. The seven lies are listed here.

1. Women are responsible for men's sexual sin.
2. Women's bodies are something to be ashamed of.
3. Women shouldn't have sexual desire.
4. Your virginity is the only thing of worth about you.
5. Women don't enjoy sex as much as men.
6. If women have sex before marriage, everything will go wrong.
7. There's no difference between sexual abuse and sex before marriage.

To keep it short, I'll only go over the 7 lies recounted above. My comments are listed in respective order.

1. The claim that this is a lie flat out denies that (1) women are the fundamental gatekeepers of sex, and that (2) men are biologically wired to spread their seed.
2. The claim that this is a lie denies the fact that men are visually oriented, and are easily distracted by the feminine form, which causes them to focus on their fleshly desires. (See Romans 8:5-8.)
3. The claim that this is a lie is obviously true, but the motivation behind rejecting this lie is to assert female sexual independence. The core truth which is never stated (by neither Collins, nor Wu, nor churchianity) is that women should learn to control their bodies (i.e. sexual desire) in a discreet and honorable manner. (See 1st Thessalonians 4:3-8.)

4. The claim that this is a lie denies the fact that men prefer virgins for marriage, and for very good reasons. Actually, "prefer" is an understatement. In fact, bridal virginity is so important that the Bible says that a woman who is not a virgin upon marriage has "played the whore" and has defrauded her husband, and is therefore liable to the death penalty. (See Deuteronomy 22:13-21 and 1st Thessalonians 4:3-8.)
5. At face value, it's true that this is a lie. Women enjoy sex even more than men do. Men just have a greater urge to merge, not to be confused with enjoyment. On a case by case basis, whether this is a lie all depends on whether the man and woman have achieved a mutual sexual authority in their relationship. There are many reasons why many women do not enjoy having sex with their husbands, but the most prevalent cause (in this day and age) is because they have forfeited their sexual authority and marital sanctification by cavorting with other men before marriage (AKA Alpha Widow Syndrome), and by waiting so long to marry that they cannot maximize their potential in their choice of a husband (AKA post-wall "settling"). This further supports the necessity of marrying a virgin. Collins and feminist churchianity make the mistake of thinking that women should prioritize the pursuit of sexual enjoyment, never mentioning that sexual enjoyment is best achieved through being obedient to God (i.e. having sex only within the marriage covenant).
6. The claim that this is a lie is a bald faced lie in itself. Just from my earlier comments, it should be clear why. However, the problem of natural desire combined with the current SMP, the cultural emphasis on the flesh, and the fashionable delay of marriage all contribute to form an environment in which obedience is d@mn near impossible. As a result, hamsterized excuses and solipsistic justifications have grown to run the gamut of psychological dissociations, including the anti-shame narrative, technical virginity, "re-virginization", the fear of sex, hopelessness, and the quirky idea that Coram Deo equals Coram Mundo.
7. The claim that this is a lie is based on converged victimhood naiveté and it is a denial of moral agency. Premarital sex is an abuse of God's gift of sex, so it is not surprising that physical and emotional abuse might be a part of that, because one is excluded from the protection offered by God's covenant. Collins talks about consent. Unmarried women don't have the moral authority to give consent to illicit sex. According to the Bible, it is the young woman's father who has the authority to give consent – NOT the young woman. And not the state either, by way of those "age of consent" laws. Collins states that she felt humiliated and degraded after she had premarital sex and then concluded that it was "wrong" for her to think this was a result of her failure to remain pure. She then blames her then-boyfriend for abusing and exploiting her. But sweety, it is a direct result of your failure to remain pure. This self-abuse is the reason why God forbids premarital sex. There's no way around that. If you claim victimhood status by displacing the responsibility for your own sin onto your ex, then you haven't truly repented. [Note: This is a red flag.] Of course, Collins isn't introspective enough to give her personal reasons why she stayed with a man who was pressuring her to have premarital sex nor why she gave into his demands, but I can guess that she wanted something that wasn't meant to be hers. She ate the forbidden fruit, and now she's crying that it wasn't fair. Adam and Eve 2.0.

In summary, only one of these statements is truly a lie (#5 in red). Six of these seven lies are not lies at all. Collins doesn't address where these lies originated from, nor the core reasons for why the Purity Movement failed. She is merely putting a subjective feminist spin on the obedience, wisdom, modesty, and propriety that were emphasized in Purity Culture, and calling them lies. All this hamsterbation is a result of glorifying the fleshly incarnation, and placing the pursuits of the flesh as a priority.

Going back to Wu's article… Apparently, he agrees with all of Collins' points and this disappoints me.

> "If women's bodies are blamed for lust—if the church claims that they need to be covered up for the sake of men—this inevitably leads to shame."

The shame referred to by Collins and Wu (and many other critics of the Purity Movement) is the natural consequence of being an immodest temptress. This is in alignment with scripture.

> "Indeed, none who wait for you shall be put to shame; they shall be ashamed who are wantonly treacherous."
>
> Psalm 25:3; Romans 10:11 (ESV)

If a person feels ashamed, then it is probably because he/she has violated the most essential requirements of God's order. A refusal to acknowledge guilt or shame and correct one's behavior accordingly is a rebellion against one's own conscience.

> "What does Christian subculture do to combat the threat of impurity? It creates rules to ensure we go nowhere near anything that might possibly resemble or remind us of impurity. But such regulations are extrabiblical and only fuel shame in those who transgress them, even though various behaviors are not sin.

In the first sentence of his answer to the question in bold, Wu is right. Without the broader patrilineal social structure necessary to reinforce the values of purity, cold hard rules of the road for fornication have to be implemented, and this patchwork puppy was ineffective and usually legalistic in the application.

In the second sentence of his answer, Wu is woefully wrong. The Bible contains chapters and chapters of covenantal regulations surrounding sex and marriage. (Leviticus 15; 18; 19:20-22,29; 20:10-21; Numbers 5; Deuteronomy 22:5,13-30; 24:1-5; 25:5-12 The modern Christian subculture ultimately ignores this, yet it is (or should be) a fundamental part of Christianity. But instead, converged churchianity teaches and exemplifies all manner of worldly feminist values.

Wu doesn't name the regulations he speaks of that are extraBiblical, but things like sexual purity before marriage, propriety in dress, and even gender segregation are indeed small fries compared to the Old Testament requirements under Covenant Law. Perhaps he believes the Old Testament is only a historical account that no longer applies.

Imagine how life would be if God were to be so excruciatingly exacting that everyone felt ashamed for violating any and every letter of the Mosaic Law. We fail to appreciate how the common grace of the Lord prevents us from falling into gross anarchy.

The Taiping Rebellion, an illustration of the attack on Canton (1851).

Cultural Comparisons

Instead of comparing our present culture to the Ancient Near East culture of the Bible, the author compares Purity Culture with fundamentalist Islam.

> "In [Muslim] cultures, the honor of a man and a family is closely tied to a women's sexuality. A woman's body is a potential cause for shame. If she is judged promiscuous or even flirty, severe consequences may follow. Modesty, therefore, is a virtue stressed upon girls from a young age."

Yes, Muslims are better acquainted with the truths (and responsibilities) of God's created order than are modern Christians. This is why Muslims consider westerners to be infidels.

Wu never describes how female immodesty can be a source of shame in Muslim culture, nor does he mention any of the real reasons why Muslims have such strict norms surrounding sexuality. But he does mention several ugly manifestations of Islamic culture, such as women wearing hijabs/burkas, female circumcision (AKA genital mutilation), and honor killings. He lumps gender segregation into this mix to build the case that all social regulations surrounding sexuality are offensive and oppressive. He never entertains the question of why Muslims would deem these extreme measures necessary, nor why Muslims would agree about such things. Certainly there must be an understandable reason, or does he believe that Muslims are total barbarians?

How much can I get away with?

Next, Wu brings up an important issue. How do we deal with every teenager's question, "How far can I go?" But instead of addressing this question with a view to determine the bounds of decency, he wants to know how much one can get away with. In today's culture, the answer to the second question is a second mile past the first.

> "One question on the mind of every church boy and girl is this, "How far is too far?" In other words, what can I do physically where I can still be counted as "pure"? The obvious problem with the question is that it overlooks the matter of the heart (the subject of my second post in this series)."

Wu is describing the psychological justification of technical virginity. The problem with this juvenile approach is not only that it ignores the convictions of the heart, but moreso the fact that it represents a mindset that is wholly focused on the flesh and is looking for the optimal way (in the form of rules) to go about satisfying the desires of the flesh.

> [5] "For those who live according to the flesh set their minds on the things of the flesh, but those who live according to the Spirit set their minds on the things of the Spirit. [6] For to set the mind on the flesh is death, but to set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace. [7] For the mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God, for it does not submit to God's law; indeed, it cannot. [8] Those who are in the flesh cannot please God."
>
> Romans 8:5-8 (ESV)

Now, I would expect that Wu might say something about getting in touch with the true meaning and purpose of sexual purity. After all, this was the subject of his last post. But no…

> "In the same way, we need to ask the same question to ourselves. When it comes to teaching about purity, sexuality, among other issues, how far is too far? The various guards our (sub)cultures put in place often go too far."

Instead of setting the record straight, Wu is pressing for an answer to this false question, with an admission that churchianity won't do it. It is a false question because there is no true answer. You can't use a rule to draw a line between sin and holiness.

> "The range of formal and informal rules men used to control women creates an environment that breeds shame. Fear and hypersensitivity to mere social guards push one inward, into hiding, not wanting anyone to see what you might have said or done. A good reputation is quickly lost, only regained at a slug's pace."

Look at this! Now he goes back to discuss the appropriateness of setting rules, and blames the devastation and shame on men's habit of "controlling women" (c.f. feminist boilerplate rhetoric).

Is he actually fearful that illicit sex is incompatible with virtue signaling within intersectional feminism??? Has churchianity sunk this low? Get out!

That sentence in bold is loaded.

First, the idea that "men used rules to control women…" Let's back up. Rules are made to protect good people from those bad people who would otherwise capriciously break those rules. Rules are also for kids who can't understand the reasons why there need to be rules. So in effect, Mr. Wu is admitting that women are like bad kids, and that they have no moral agency, but setting rules is not the right way to handle it, because shame.

Secondly, that "the rules create an environment that breeds shame…" Shame would only result if someone intentionally violated the rules (which IMO, young women feel entitled to do all the time). Concerning the environment, enforcing discipline on one who violates the rules is the purpose for having rules in the first place, that is, to protect the others and give them safety and security.

I guess I need to dumb this down even more. Children, if you don't follow the rules, then you will get into trouble!

But we're not just talking about rules, are we? We're talking about Biblical Law under the Covenant. If we think that Biblical Law is merely a collection of rules, things we have to do if we hope for God to bless our marriage or to earn salvation, then we are immature kids at best, and legalistically self-exonerating Pharisees at worst.

Again, rules are created to preserve the social order, and to protect it from those who don't care about preserving it. We're free to go against that order, we're free to "break the rules", but if we choose to do so, then we should expect to lose out on certain blessings as a result. Doing so only proves that we are incapable of integrating into the covenant social order, and therefore are not deserving of the benefits of said order. If one has inflicted significant damage on the social order, then a punishment is warranted in order to teach one not to continue down that path, and to serve as both a security and a warning to others.

One of the many purposes of the Law was to give us a warning about the consequences of our choices, and a promise of blessing if we obey. The whole idea behind Biblical law is that we are better off if we trust and revere God, and try to live in harmony with His ordained order. The problem is that the order is so debauched by Feminism (i.e. converged Churchianity) that it's impossible to navigate with any confidence or surety.

> "Of the making of many rules… there is no end. We need to be wary of going too far. Otherwise, we not only foster shame in those around us; we allow it fester inside ourselves as well."

Maybe he has a point here. These days, setting rules to reinforce righteousness and to protect the innocent will not work, because the majority have gone astray, even the leaders, and the mountainous task of enforcement would intimidate everyone and sink the whole ship. But on the other hand, maybe this junk should be scuttled.

Destroying Chinese War Junks, by E. Duncan (1843). British ships destroying an enemy fleet in Canton during the first Opium War in China, 1841. (Photo by DeAgostini/Getty Images)

The Church fails to emphasize the joy of Shalom in Christian community

One, Stefan Stackhouse, left a worthy comment,

> "Lost in all of this is any notion of our all being "brothers and sisters in Christ." The scriptural truth is that we are all that first, and remain so regardless of our marital status. This requires more than basic respect for each other, and must go on to kindness, consideration, caring, compassion, and helpfulness.
>
> Of course we all need to maintain proper boundaries, especially young adults. Unfortunately, this so-called "purity culture" has reduced what should be their sisters in Christ to mere potential breeding material or forbidden fruit in the eyes of what should be their brothers in Christ. How is that really any different from pornography? Both, at heart, are just objectifying women – objects for self-gratification, potential or actual. Christ calls us to see each other instead as subjects for our unconditional charitable love.
>
> A real brother in Christ would never want to do anything to harm a sister in Christ, but always to seek what is best for her. This is the true and solid ground for a proper and healthy relationship between young Christians of different genders."

Here here, we have forgotten the blessings of Shalom! Feminism has objectified women to the point of being degrading, and the church tacitly looks away.

However, I do believe it is quite acceptable for a husband to objectify his wife on the marital bed. A good hard rutting is conducive towards marital sanctification.

Related

- Wintery Knight: Don't Dismiss Best Practices For Christian Living As "Legalism" And "Denying Grace" (2020 September 30)

Mood can be Hypnotizing

Jack · 16 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

More insights on the magic of Charisma.

Readership: All; Men;

Freddie Mercury, the lead singer for the classic rock group, Queen (ca. 1982).

The Link between Charisma and Mood

In A Revised Understanding of Game (2020 September 14), I discussed how charisma is an intrinsic element of Game.

> The backbone of solid Game is charisma combined with a steady maintenance of healthy socio-spiritual *boundaries (AKA "detachment"). Everything else about Game can be summed up as a technique, a strategy, or an asset.

So what is it about charisma that makes a man so charming?

Ed Hurst once described charisma as "an ability to draw others into your own world", meaning that others can "read" your personal identity through your self-expression and without a lot of explanations and arguments, and can intuitively know how to blend into your frame of reference. This soul connection is also intriguing and enjoyable for all.

Yet, charisma must be expressed through actions and behavior. Part of it is attitude, part of it is detachment (drawing boundaries), and part of it is in maintaining an upbeat mood. Even the most positive, indomitable attitude is not necessarily attractive, and can even be a turn-off at times. Detachment tends to be rebuffing and isolating. So mood must be the element that draws others in, specifically a mood that is energetic, friendly, patient, and inspiring. I want to add kindhearted to this list of descriptors, but I think this only works with men who have a very high testosterone, and it only appeals to certain kinds of people/women.

James Carr (Jimmy) Stokley, lead singer of the classic rock group, Exile (1979).

Another word used to describe mood in psychology is Affect. Below, I've summarized a few factoids about Affect from Infogalactic: Affect (psychology).

- Affect is the experience of feeling or emotion.
- Affect is a key part of the process of an organism's interaction with stimuli.
- Affect is one of the three main divisions of psychology, namely Affect, Behavior, and Cognition, also known as the ABC's of psychology.
- Affective states are psycho-physiological constructs which vary along three principal dimensions: valence, arousal, and motivational intensity.
- Valence is the subjective positive-to-negative evaluation of an experienced state. Emotional valence refers to the emotion's consequences, emotion-eliciting circumstances, or subjective feelings or attitudes.
- Arousal is objectively measurable as activation of the sympathetic nervous system, but can also be assessed subjectively via self-report. Arousal is a construct that is closely related to motivational intensity but they differ in that motivation necessarily implies action while arousal does not.
- Motivational Intensity refers to the impulsion to act. It is the strength of an urge to move toward or away from a stimulus. Simply moving is not considered approach motivation without a motivational urge present.
- Science has shown that a person having an Affect that is high in motivational intensity also has a narrow cognitive scope, whereas having an Affect low in motivational intensity broadens one's cognitive scope.

Elvis Presley performing Jailhouse Rock (1957).

The Link between Mood and Attraction

Long time readers of the Manosphere have observed that Women are attracted to Jerks. Could it be possible that having a ZFG dramaticized Affect* is seen by other Nice Guys™ as being a jerk, while women only notice the Detachment and the Affect? It has been speculated that women are blind to the motivations of men, and so that leaves Valence, Arousal, and Impulse, which are presumably interpreted as signifiers of health and vitality.

The link to attraction makes sense if you think about it, because a person's Affect is one of the first things we notice, and it makes the biggest impression. It is easy for us to see that wimmin want a guy who can entertain them and give them the Feeelz, but what we cannot see is that a man's Affect is probably the main outward characteristic that the female intuition latches onto when sizing up a man.

All this explains why basement gamers, dreamy geeks, and other low-energy dudes are not attractive, while athletes, performers, h0m0sexuals, and impulsive criminals are.

> "Women are wired to connect on an emotional level. Men could easily regard women's need for the Feeelz as an annoying weakness, but if a man knows how to handle a woman's emotions, then this can become his greatest strength. The problem is that most men have never been taught how to motivate a woman by creating the Feeelz for her. Women, even the best of them, will never teach this skill to men. Men must learn this from other men.
>
> Many women don't seem to understand what men want, and what makes a man happy. So a man needs to clearly state his purpose and express his enthusiasm in order to shift the emotional context into a "clean" state. Otherwise, the woman may feel like her submission is a dry duty, without any joy, purpose, or sense of connectedness."
>
> Σ Frame: Washing Her Clean (2019 October 21)

A younger Elvis Presley with low Affect (1945).

Overall, the influence of the man's mood (or Affect) in a relationship, combined with a supportive Frame, is hypnotizing to the woman. In terms of the Push-Pull dynamic, Detachment is the Push, and a dramaticized Affect* is the Pull. This hypnotic state is conducive to several vehicles, including attraction, submission, obedience, and her willingness to endure the unpleasant aspects of the discipline that is necessary in washing her clean, according to Ephesians 5:25-28.

If a man can *dramaticize his emotional interaction with people/women, then this might be the trick to switch one's charisma on, and induce an increased level of attraction.

 Note: I've invented the word "dramaticize" to emphasize motivation and initiative, and also to be distinguished from the connotation of the typical, annoying, feminine drama that is conveyed in the word "dramatize".*

Related

- Σ Frame: On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar (2018 November 21)
- X-Splat: Every 5 years you are a new person. One of them winds up being a loving grandpa type. (2020 February 6)

The Shepherd and the Crook

Jack · 19 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Giving advice is not as simple or as complex as you might think.

Readership: Men;

The Shepherd, Conrad Eldridge

My father believed that power and knowledge were corrupting. He always refused to give me any advice. He thought it to be better if I made my own decisions and found my own way. He was also afraid that I would blame him if things didn't turn out as I expected. Interestingly, his middle name is Conrad, which means "wise counselor". This is a name that had been used for many generations in his family, but he chose not to give me this name. Instead, I inherited a generational moniker from my maternal grandfather's line.

Looking back on my life, I wish that my father would have been more willing to share the wisdom of his own experience. However, because of his approach, I now have many of my own unique life experiences to draw from. There are pros and cons to any style of shepherding.

At the opposite extreme from my father's style, there are some people who love to give advice because it gives them an ego kick to control or influence the lives of others. The worst sort of advice (or the best within a viciously insolent frame) is motivated by schadenfreude. Of course, people like this seldom give out profoundly wise advice.

The best sort of advice is when someone clearly spells out what the choices are, delineates the pros and cons for each choice, and gives an idea of what the most probable consequences might be for each choice.

A wise counselor will not omit choices, or push for one choice or another, but will instead leave that open to the person's own decision. I believe that one reason why Red Pill truths have been lost over the last couple generations is because our elders correctly assessed that certain embodiments of knowledge are apt to be used for evil and destruction, and they thought they were doing right by either obviating or excluding those options. But that is a choice that each person must make for himself. To be deprived of choice is to be enslaved. Forced altruism crushes the will, and is thus a gateway to ɦə11. Our ignorance of this knowledge has not made us any more righteous nor happy, but instead, it has made us more impotent and imbecilic. We now call this pathetic state, being Blue Pilled.

The Crook, Wayne Scott

The name Wayne originated from the occupation of a wagon driver, and by extension, it means “traveler”. Scott means “wanderer”.

People who seek advice from others are usually people who have the following characteristics.

- They are too young to know how things work, nor what they are doing.
- They are emotionally weak and spiritually immature.
- They don’t have any sense of spiritual discernment to guide them through life.
- They don’t have any higher purpose in life which would reduce the number of options and simplify the choice.
- They are unfamiliar with being Heart Led and instead are trying to reason through all their decisions.

They seek advice because…

- They wish to avoid pain or the negative consequences of bad decisions.
- They want to know the easiest way to obtain their desires.
- They want to avoid shame and censure.

They will always be frustrated if they’re seeking after their desires because God doesn’t work that way. In most cases, you have to go directly to God in prayer, sort out what it is that you want, and why you want it. If it fits within God’s will, then you can ask for it with confidence and faith. If it is not, then your repentance is in order.

Sometimes people who come asking for advice aren’t really looking for advice. They just want to hear themselves, and to be heard by others. Their motivation to do so could range from extremely selfish, to very wise, and even deceptively cunning. Here are a few.

- Some people just want to whine and complain and have someone share in their commiseration.
- Some feel very insecure, and want to be comforted and affirmed.
- Others want to hone the validity of their thoughts and build up their confidence with someone they trust.

- Some are actually people who already know the answer but they just need another person to help them face themselves and get a full grasp of what they're up against, and maybe a little encouragement to boost their morale.
- They want to know where you stand on an issue, so that they know better how to deal with you.

Certain individuals may have other peculiar reasons for seeking advice.

The Shepherd's Crook

In his post, Let me give you some advice (2020 August 31), Adam notes that it is generally unwise to give advice to a person who doesn't know what to do. The underlying attitude behind this approach is that, "If you haven't earned it, you don't deserve it." This is similar to my father's approach, but with different motivations. In general, I agree. But that is not to say that you should never give out advice.

It is important to determine the nature of the person's question.

- If it concerns something that the person may be too young to know anything about, then it might be good to educate him.
- If a person asks for advice on a practical or professional matter, it would be good to tell him whatever you might know. It would be even better to take him along and show him how it's done.
- If you have a vested interest in the person, and/or you are bound to him through contract, blood, or Covenant, then you have the Spiritual Authority and perhaps also the responsibility to give advice.

Often times, it may be better to avoid giving direct advice, and instead take the person under your wing try to figure out what the deeper spiritual issue is about, which may be something that he is not aware of. It will require a good deal of trust between the two of you to dig through this, and this might take some time, maybe even a few years. So actually, this situation is not really giving advice, it's more like mentorship.

If you do not hold the Spiritual Authority to give advice, then it may be wiser just to be a sounding board. That is, listen to the person and let him talk through the issue and find the answer for himself. Bring up what remains unforeseen to him, and correct his logical errors as you see fit.

Reframing the discussion in the style of a debate can often serve as a functional vehicle towards this end. One major benefit of this approach is that it sparks intuitive insight and conviction. Another benefit of this approach is that you can get the person to think through the issue and arrive at a conclusion without you having to assume much responsibility for the outcome. Instead, he will feel like it is his own decision. It may help to inform him that you are taking this approach, so that he doesn't think you are simply being an @$$.

Related

- Σ Frame: Roadblocks in Ministry (2010 June 6)
- Σ Frame: Developing Attitudes That Help You Cope (2015 November 5)
- Σ Frame: Exposing the Truth to Others (2018 January 1)
- Σ Frame: The Dispensation of the Red Pill (2018 April 7)
- Σ Frame: On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar (2018 November 21)
- Σ Frame: Bards, Jesters, and Kings (2019 October 6)
- Σ Frame: How to Develop an Attitude of Detachment (2020 July 10)

Formal attire is making a comeback.

Jack · 21 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Don't be a Grungy Bum.

Readership: All; Men;

The Battle for Dignity and Class

Recently this year, I've seen authentic style begin to make a comeback. Men are wearing dress shirts, belts, and shiny leather shoes. Women are letting their hair grow, and they are wearing dresses and high heels.

I'm as pleased as spiked punch!

Formality comes and goes in waves, according to social trends. In the U.S., formality has been out of style since 1990, and since then, it has been dated with X'ers like myself. I was in college during the Grunge era of the 90's, and I always felt ashamed of (what I considered to be) the low-class attire that was in vogue at the time. I know Millennials don't reflect on the 90's with such distaste, but I didn't like it at all — not because it was tasteless and drab, but because it did nothing to showcase one's personality, nor one's tastes in style. Simply put, it was not inspiring at all! Anybody and everybody could pull on a black T and a pair of stone washed, acid scourged Levi's and blend into the tattered gray masses. The mark of individuality was in showing your baggy boxers!

True to the style of my generation, I always prided myself for wearing a black leather belt, Johnson and Murphy captoes, and a blue, Italian hand-stitched tie — only and always silk, which has a smooth, refined texture.

The reason I was so adamant about my personal presentation is because I always recognized that maintaining a sharp appearance is a show of self-respect, a display of masculine power, and a gift of inspiration to those around me. Why should I become common just to avoid being rejected by those opprobrious rejects of decorum?

A lot of people scolded me for being too formal, and told me to "loosen up". But I dismissed such taunting as juvenile attention from those suffering from a peculiarly acute allergy to class.

Even after I became a professor at a National University, some other professors told me not to wear a tie to the department meetings. After pondering upon the possible reasons for this request, I realized that I was making them look bad, and that they were too lazy to up their game enough to look like a professional. I stopped wearing a tie to the meetings out of deference to my seniors, but I still wore ties to my class lectures and speeches. I also started giving away ties to graduating Ph.D. students as a graduation gift, and I told them to wear it whenever they needed a boost of confidence. They were ecstatic!

Recently, my mother-in-law gave me a bow tie that belonged to my wife's father, who was also a professor before he retired. I've realized that I can wear a bow tie and still look professional without making my colleagues feel insecure. I've also discovered that women find it absolutely adorable, adding to my delight and the chagrin of my wife!

Why Be Formal?

One of the most basic qualities of human nature is the fact that we are full of desires. We desire money, we desire relationships, we desire political freedoms, we desire success, we desire attention, love, honor, respect, and so on.

Desire cannot be separated from the human experience.

But the conflict of our desires is a significant source of disparity, dissonance, and desperation, which makes us resemble brute animals competing for resources and opportunities!

Simultaneously, human beings need a sense of self-worth, dignity, and respect, so we have invented “formality” as a way to glorify our innate human quality of desire with a sense of honor.

Logical reasonability, organization, passion, and order henceforth become valuable in the art of self-expression. Thus, it becomes necessary to display consideration, to observe rules of etiquette, and to discuss topics such as goals, purposes, and processes in a non-subjective manner.

This is the essence of formality.

Those who have a mature view of formality, recognize it as a venue in which their deepest heart-felt desires may be charismatically expressed with honor and determination in a social setting.

Formality glorifies God and inspires your fellow man! Jesus himself wore a garment “without hem”.

Concluding Statements

Formal dress allows one to display the liveliness of one's personality and desire. You would be amazed at how much impact you can achieve, and how much people would love to receive your attention, just by wearing a tie with a bit of flair.

Don't be a common bum. Be a man who creates an impression, who is memorable, who gives life to others. Dressing the part is the first step in developing charisma.

Do what I did. Dedicate $1,000 to buy a high quality wardrobe that fits your style and persona. Choose colors wisely. Pay a tailor to make it fit right. High quality clothing will last for 20 years (for a man). You won't regret it. You may even find it was the best decision you ever made.

Related

- Adam Piggott: 17th trait – The modern man buys the best clothes that he can afford. (2016 March 14)
- Adam Piggott: A good grooming guide for men – part 1 (2020 October 4)
- Dark Brightness: Notes for myself. (2020 October 20)

What is a woman's desire for her husband according to Genesis 3:16?

Jack · 23 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An examination of a woman's desire towards her husband.

Readership: Christians;
Length: 3,900 words;
Reading Time: 13 minutes;
Guide to Imagery: The Mandelbrot set illustrates the seeming complexity of the issue. The apple represents the sinful desire to usurp authority and to control. The banana represents sexual desire. The pear represents fertility. Bread represents provisioning and earning potential.

Introduction

The English Standard Version (ESV) is a revision of the 1971 edition of the Revised Standard Version (RSV) of the Christian Bible that employs an "essentially literal" translation philosophy. The senior editor for the Old Testament is C. John Collins, and Wayne Grudem is one of the editors.

I've only heard good things about the English Standard Version, that it is elegant, yet accurate. Imagine my surprise when I came across this passage.

> To the woman he said,
>
> "I will surely multiply your pain in childbearing;
> in pain you shall bring forth children.
> Your desire shall be contrary to* your husband, > but he shall rule over you."
>
> Genesis 3:16 (ESV) See full chapter.

There is a footnote attached to the phrase "contrary to".

> * Genesis 3:16 Or shall be toward (see 4:7).

How does "shall be toward" translate into "shall be contrary to"?

Approaching the Questions

It would be easy to dismiss this as a confusing passage or even a bad translation, but it would be more difficult to gain a heart understanding of the deeper truth(s) behind these words. If we can apprehend a firm grasp of what this verse is talking about, then we are in a better position to form an opinion about what it means, and the accuracy of the translation.

So here, I pose the following questions to be addressed in the remainder of this essay.

What is the nature of the desire referenced in Genesis 3:16b?

1. That women desire their husbands emotionally and/or sexually.
2. That women desire to control their husbands.

Another hot question concerning the latter part of verse 16 is this: Is a woman's desire toward her husband a consequence of the fall, or is God merely affirming that this will remain unchanged? The first half of the verse suggests that it is a consequence.

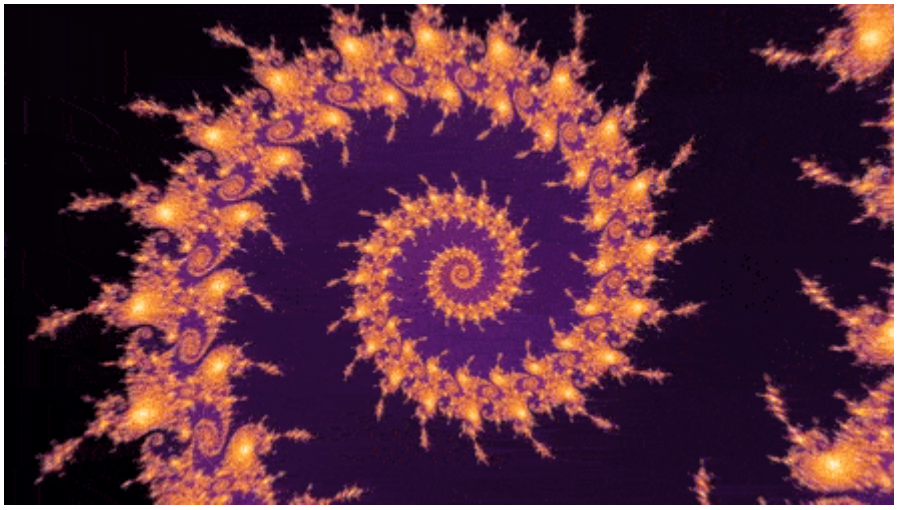
I have noticed a subtle connotation that has appeared (in Protestantism especially, but maybe in other ordinations too), which is that desire itself is wrong, sinful, or a consequence of the fall.

So the final question is this: Is the ESV's account of Genesis 3:16 a complete and accurate translation?



Comparison to Other Translations

I compared this to other translations to get a better feel of the meaning. I found that there are actually two different ideas floating around in the majority of these translations. The word desire is translated as either a sexual desire, or a desire to control. This might explain why there is so much discussion and debate about the applied meaning of these verses within Christendom.

Some translations were poignantly obvious about which of these two interpretations was adopted…

The Living Bible suggests a livid sexual desire.

> Then God said to the woman, "You shall bear children in intense pain and suffering; yet even so, you shall welcome your husband's affections, and he shall be your master."
>
> Genesis 3:16 (TLB)

The Contemporary English Version includes the word "still" suggesting that a woman's desire was present pre-fall.

> Then the Lord said to the woman, "You will suffer terribly when you give birth. But you will still desire your husband, and he will rule over you."
>
> Genesis 3:16 (CEV)

The New English Translation specifically uses the word control.

> To the woman he said, "I will greatly increase your labor pains; with pain you will give birth to children. You will want to control your husband, but he will dominate you."
>
> Genesis 3:16 (NET)

The New Living Translation also uses the word control.

> Then he said to the woman, "I will sharpen the pain of your pregnancy, and in pain you will give birth. And you will desire to control your husband, but he will rule over you."

> Genesis 3:16 (NLT)

The Expanded Bible inserts an inline note to specify that this is a desire for control.

> Then God said to the woman, “I will ·cause you to have much trouble [or increase your pain] ·when you are pregnant [in childbearing], and when you give birth to children, you will have great pain. You will greatly desire [[c]the word implies a desire to control; 4:7] your husband, but he will rule over you.”
>
> Genesis 3:16 (EXB)

Interestingly, I found that the older translations are suggestive of a sexual desire, but the newer translations make it out to be a desire to control the husband.

-

-

Older women prefer bananas for the potassium. Younger women reach for the apple.
A few translations had a different take altogether.

The Message suggests a joyful submission.

> He told the Woman: “I’ll multiply your pains in childbirth; you’ll give birth to your babies in pain. You’ll want to please your husband, but he’ll lord it over you.”
>
> Genesis 3:16 (MSG)

The New International Reader’s Version adopts a poetic stance.

> The Lord God said to the woman, “I will increase your pain when you give birth. You will be in great pain when you have children. You will long for your husband. And he will rule over you.
>
> Genesis 3:16 (NIRV)

Of interesting note, the International Standard Version translates desire as trust!

> He told the woman, “I’ll greatly increase the pain of your labor during childbirth. It will be painful for you to bear children, since your trust is turning toward your husband, and he will dominate you.”
>
> Genesis 3:16 (ISV)

Aside from the few translations that are unique, most of these translations interpret the word desire as either for sex/affection or for control. But the meaning is totally different. Which one is it? Or is it both?

So after surveying all these translations, we are no closer to the answers. However, I realized that I didn’t understand this passage as well as I had assumed. I realized that Genesis 3:15-17 is a very important verse that serves as a foundational of our conceptual understanding of (1) women, (2) the relationship between men and women, and (3) marriage. Therefore, it is imperative for us to get it right. So this pushed me to dig and study further until I could find the answer.

Which one is true?

Answers to Prayer

Because of the obvious variance among the many translations (and because most modern translations are conducted by Protestants), I found that I could no longer trust any English based interpretation of this verse.

Therefore, I turned to the Lord in prayer, and I asked Him these questions. I got three answers.

1. First, I got the idea that (whenever I have any question,) if I study the scriptures inside out and it is still not clear, then it's time to pray about it and find out what it should mean to me personally.
2. Second, I realized that both interpretations have real world validity, so maybe the interpretation could be open to either meaning.
3. Third, I got the idea that the word desire may not be limited to be a transitive verb, but may simply be an intransitive verb or even a noun describing a generalized state of neediness and insecurity. As such, this desire could be expressed in many ways, not just the two I identified. All humans have desire at the root of our nature, but women much more so.

Bananas make women smile!

Examination of the Original Hebrew

I went back to the original Hebrew using BibleHub. The word translated as desire only occurs once in Genesis 3:16. An inflection appears twice in Genesis 4:7 and Song of Solomon 7:10.

In the other two places, it shows up with a contextual meaning that suggests one each of the two meanings. In Genesis 4:7 it clearly refers to sin as a being or a force that desires to control us. In the Song of Solomon 7:10 it is obvious that it refers to a sexual/marital desire.

Several Bible commentators, as well as Grudem, have explored the analogy between Genesis 3:16 and 4:7. One commenter at Dalrock, RPC, summed up this analogy quite succinctly [emphasis mine].

> "Grudem's comments point out something I never realized before. The parallel between Genesis 3:16 and Genesis 4:7 is striking:
>
> 3:16: Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.
>
> 4:7: If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.
>
> Fascinating. The logical parallel is between the woman and sin. The woman is not the victim, she is the usurper.
>
> Now, if only we could get a pastor to preach this passage in front of a congregation, instead of making arguments behind closed doors…"

Men prefer bananas. Women want the bread.

> "I've read some interpretations of Genesis 3:16 that agree that "desire" suggests the woman will be tempted to usurp her husband. However, some go on to say that "he shall rule over thee" means that the husband will be similarly tempted to take his authority to the extreme and become oppressive. In other words, they try to spin the verse so it's not just focused on the woman's rebellion. It also creates an opening for the "sin of being a doormat" theology.
>
> The parallel with 4:7 creates some problems with this interpretation. In 4:7 the desire that sin has for Cain is clearly negative, a desire to conquer and subdue him. But, is Cain "ruling over" sin also negative? Is it wrong for Cain to exercise authority over sin, even in an extreme or oppressive way? Clearly the intent in 4:7 is to describe Cain's rule as being positive, not a result of his sinful nature. The aspiration of that rule is TOTAL.
>
> So, 4:7 seems to reinforce the idea that the main problem described in 3:16 is the wife's rebellious heart, not the husband's oppressive leadership.
>
> Also, if husbands ruling their wives oppressively is such an important sin, why do Jesus, Paul, or any of the early church fathers fail to mention it? Why don't they warn husbands to be careful not to oppress their wives? Instead, we have the opposite. The emphasis is on extreme submission on the part of the wife, in everything. Clearly being a "doormat" was not a significant concern for Paul.
>
> Now, dwelling with your wife in love and understanding likely excludes a domineering approach, but this is a problem for such a small percentage of men, it's not even worth a mention in scripture."
>
> RPC's comments at Dalrock (2016 November 22)

I think a connection could be made between these three verses (Genesis 3:16; 4:7, and Song of Solomon 7:10): Your sin wants to screw you over just like a woman wants to screw her husband (in every connotation imaginable).

During my study of the Hebrew, I snuck over to Google Translate and entered the Hebrew word for desire (תְּשׁוּקָתֵךְ) given in the passage at Biblehub. Lo and behold, look what came up!

This is not a matter of doubt.

The Word of a Jewish Rabbi / Native Speakers of Hebrew

> "The word in question here is t'shookatecha, often translated 'your desire' or 'your longing'. It is a word that stems from the root 'shook', from which we get the Hebrew words for 'market' or 'thigh', also the word for a 'mass movement of horses or locusts'.
>
> And so the idea behind the most basic meaning of this root word for longing or desire, is a 'strong movement in a certain direction'. Thus t'shookah, in this context, is the direction of feeling toward an objective; in other words, a striving or a longing.
>
> I don't see anything that would indicate she will necessarily act contrary to him to oppose him. Although that doesn't mean she won't, but I am not sure this is a proof text that she is destined to. If anything, Adam is chastised for listening to his wife when it was his duty to oppose her concerning the commandment which was first entrusted to him.
>
> As far as the verse in Genesis 4:7 concerning Cain, a close reading is critical and is helpful in elucidating the meaning of the Genesis 3:16 verse, but not in the way the translators of the ESV are thinking.
>
> According to a number of Jewish commentators, the Hebrew word t'shookah does not denote the passion of hostility, but always denotes exalted yearning; the devoted longing of love. For example, "I belong to my beloved, the devoted longing of my love" (Song of Solomon 7:7), where this same Hebrew word is used.
>
> The meaning (concerning Adam and Eve, man and woman) does not indicate that there is to be a constant state of war between them — as if the woman is lying in wait for her husband to oppose him and act contrary to him, to overcome him…
>
> Rather the sense is of a loving wife, who finds completion of her own existence in submission and devotion to the aspirations and agenda of her husband and in accepting and submitting to his guidance – he shall rule over her. She is not her own. Her will is subsumed by that of another, i.e. her husband".

> "In the example with Cain, Cain is being admonished that sensuality does have the power to rule over him and not to underestimate its power. Nevertheless, the Hebrew sense is that it lies quietly at the door and will not enter uninvited. However, the moment he invites it to sit at his table, as it were, it will begin to feel at home with him and eventually become his master.
>
> The Jewish view is that G-d created the power of sensuality, not so that it should control us, but that we should control it. Its whole desire is that you should master it and guide it. Not to suppress or kill it, but rule over it and guide it. That is the purpose and mission.
>
> The idea is that when you master your sensuality, it achieves its purpose, which is why its longing is towards you. The same idea underlies the woman's desire and longing for her husband, who in turn is to rule over her and guide her.
>
> No human quality is intrinsically good or bad – moral use is a key consideration. The idea is that the relationship between man [e.g. Cain] and sensuality resembles the relationship between husband and wife… sensuality waits at the door and its longing and desire is towards you THAT YOU SHOULD MASTER IT AND GUIDE IT. Sensuality and woman both achieve their purpose through subordination to man… I think the editors or translators of the ESV might want to do a little more homework…"
>
> Rabbi B's comment at Dalrock (2016 November 23)

> אליו means "to him" not "against him". Wrong is wrong.
>
> ואליו תשוקתך והוא ימשול בך [translated as] "…and to him [your man or husband] will be your desire and he will rule over you" is not ambiguous.
>
> The simple explanation of the verse ואליו תשוקתך "to him will be your desire" has no implication of being against him. Rather it means the desire of the wife will be towards her husband. אליו "to him" is used thousands of times in the OT and it always means "towards him," never "against him". This is not a matter of doubt.
>
> Avrahan Rosenblum's comments at Dalrock (2016 November 23)

Shopping around is so difficult. A woman can never make up her mind. But a little variety is… drama!

The Word of a Scholarly Elder

I sent an email to Ed Hurst to ask him two questions.

1. What is the original or applied meaning of desire in Genesis 3:16, "Your desire will be for your husband…"? Is it a sexual desire or a desire to control?
2. What is the nature of this desire in Genesis 3:16? Is it a troublesome thing that is part of the curse of the fall, or is it a good thing that existed before the fall?

The next day, I found a response from Ed in my inbox. He wrote,

> "I didn't study Hebrew in the standard sense of a translator. I studied Hebrew culture and thinking. My sense is that the word in Genesis 3:16 is ambiguous, and likely means both. That would be typical of Hebrew thinking, in that there is no reason to distinguish between the two. Further, the broader Hebrew outlook on the nature of women seems to support the idea that there is little difference between either kind of desire. When a woman is righteous, it emphasizes the sexual desire she has, but that same desire can be perverted into a desire to control. Either way, she is not capable of simply ignoring men.
>
> Now for the more technical stuff: This particular word [teshuqah] appears only three times in the Hebrew texts of the Bible…"

Ed recounted most of the information I found earlier on BibleHub. Then he adds,

> "Because of the word's rarity in the Hebrew Scripture, there's no grounds for pinning it down as being itself either good or bad. Rather, I take it as something that was wired in by Creation, but perverted by the Curse. Thus, my suggestion is that it could take a good direction or a bad one. Based on my understanding of psychology, both the academic and clinical background, along with the pastoral experience I've had, I doubt it's easily untangled in women today. A woman with a pure desire is something we understand easily enough, but finding one that doesn't suffer from the temptation to control is nigh impossible. But that a woman is drawn to > manliness is hardly in dispute."

Banana, banana, Copacabaña! Carmen Miranda (1947)

In addition, Ed wrote a post on this question.

> "The Hebrew word for "desire" is translated variously into English, but it seems to go in two different directions: either she will have a sexual lust for him, or a lust to control him.
>
> But that's not how Hebrew language works. One of the biggest flaws in textual analysis and expository writing about the Bible is the failure of Western scholars to embrace the Hebrew outlook. It tends to be what we call "gestalt" thinking, that the meaning of the instance depends entirely on the broader understanding of the whole. You cannot compartmentalize or slice-n-dice anything in Hebrew Scripture. Hebrew language is inherently parabolic and symbolic by nature, and is meant to provoke your heart-led consciousness. You are supposed to weigh things against your convictions and your broader desire for peace with God."

This corresponds with the first answer to my prayers.

> "Is this a case where Eve, symbolizing all womanhood, will have a sexual desire for her man, or is this a case of her desire to control him? There is a lot hanging on this question, since it arises from a very highly debated point of theology for the entirety of Western Church History. Does this suggest something that surprises no one, in that humans are wired with a sexual desire from Creation itself? Or does this imply that the Curse of the Fall will make her wish to control her man? In Hebrew thinking, both are quite true."

This corresponds with the second answer to my prayers.

> "…the word in Genesis 3:16 is intentionally ambiguous because it means both. Eve's natural pure desire for Adam had been perverted in the encounter with Satan to become a desire for control. Adam's failure is part of the gestalt here. His distraction from the fundamental task of moral guardianship encouraged Eve to exercise an authority that was not hers to wield. And her inherent weakness in moral things, being as she is wired to > follow and not lead, was part of the whole downfall of both."

>
> Radix Fidem: Lust for Sex or Control? (2020 October 12)

Ed's post answered my second question very well (i.e. What is the nature of this desire?), and I think this was the aspect that was making me very confused. I had the mindset that it was an either/or answer, but it's both — desire existed pre-fall, but was corrupted by the fall.

I'm tired of bananas. I want to have something different!

Conclusions

In this post, I've discussed several questions. Here, I'll reiterate these questions and provide brief answers.

Question 1: What is the applied meaning of the word "desire" in Genesis 3:16? "Your desire will be for your husband…" Is this a sexual desire or a desire to control him?

Reviewing the sources of opinions…

- Those supporting the idea that it is a desire to control: Wayne Grudem; Novaseeker;
- Those supporting the idea that it is a sexual desire: Editors of older translations; Rabbinical scholars; Several noteworthy Bible commentators;
- Those supporting the idea that both interpretations are valid: Deep Strength; Ed Hurst;

Short Answer: The scriptures are not specific. It suggests a sexual desire, but it could be interpreted according to a specific context, including a desire to control.

Question 2: What is the ontological nature of this desire in Genesis 3:16? Is it a troublesome thing that is part of the curse of the fall, or is it a good thing that existed before the fall?

Short Answer: Both are true. Desire existed pre-fall, but was corrupted by the fall.

Question 3: Is desire itself wrong, sinful, or a consequence of the fall?

Short Answer: No, desire is an inherent part of human nature that was present before the fall. But the nature and the intention of desire were corrupted as a result of the fall.

Question 4: Is the ESV's account of Genesis 3:16 a complete and accurate translation?

Short Answer: The ESV's translation of Genesis 3:16 is extremely specific compared to the original Hebrew, and therefore allows readers to overlook or ignore any other nuances of meaning that might faithfully apply, including the one that native speakers of Hebrew emphatically insist is the correct interpretation.

The specific interpretation used in the ESV paints women as being contentious and disagreeable, and it completely bypasses any suggestion that a woman's desire for her husband could be (or should be) sexual in nature. It also adumbrates any of the wider possibilities.

Verdict: The ESV's interpretation of Genesis 3:16 is not entirely wrong, but it is myopic and therefore incomplete. As it is now worded, it should not be made part of the permanent version.

The ESV has no bananas in Genesis 3:16!

Related

Arguments based on Genesis 3:16 have come up around the blogosphere quite a few times. Here are a few.

- Artisanal Toad's Hall: The Reason Feminists Don't Talk About Eve (2016 May 22)
- Practical Theology for Women (Wendy Alsup and Hannah Anderson): Toward a Better Reading: Reflections on the Permanent Changes to the Text of Genesis 3:16 in the ESV – Part 1 (2016 September 26); Part 2 (2016 September 28); Part 3 (2016 September 30);
  Note: Blogger/lay theologian Wendy Alsup vehemently opposes the Grudem/Foh/ESV interpretation, contending that the woman's "desire" in Gen. 3:16 is an idolatrous desire for her husband to meet all her needs which, when he can't do it, becomes a source of conflict.
- Theological Miscellany (Matt Lynch): Contrary Women: Genesis 3:16b in the (now non-) Permanent ESV (2016 October 3)
- Dalrock: A big win for Grudem. (2016 November 22)
  Note: The comments are rich with insights.
- Full Metal Patriarchy: The DWC Files #2: Wilson vs. Genesis 3:16 (2020 September 26)

- Insanity Bytes: Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary (2020 October 19)

Birds of One Feather Flock Together

Jack · 26 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A theory of attraction based on the spiritual state of the heart.

Readership: All; Christians; Singles;
Reader's Note: In this essay, "soft-hearted" means living in continual communion with the spiritual wisdom and discernment offered by a heart led awareness of the spiritual world. It does not mean wimpy, effeminate, chivalrous, nor "nice". "Hard-hearted" follows the Biblical description of the term, which means being in the habit of relying primarily on one's own reason and sense of personal justice, and thereby ignoring those things which are spiritually discerned.

Introduction

In a previous post, Looking at the Essentials (2020 June 12), I discussed how single Christians have to consider their spiritual constitution as well as their carnal nature in order to know one's self more thoroughly.

One of the higher purposes of this introspection is to better identify a potential spouse who might offer a deeper, more fulfilling, and more sanctifying connection in marriage.

This post goes further into analyzing the spiritual aspects and presents a theory based on my own experience and my observations of others.

The Heart-Based Theory of Attraction

Here, I will assume that people tend to form relationships more easily with those who share similar values and who communicate on the same spiritual wavelength. For proof of this, all you have to do is look at how cliques form within any group. Did you ever wonder why people gravitate into these cliques? People don't make a conscious decision about which clique to join. It just comes out that way. And after cliques form, there's a pecking order that becomes manifested. No one joins a clique thinking that he/she wants to be the AMOG, or the queen bee, or the butt of all the jokes, or whatever his/her role is in the clique. It just comes out that way. There's something deeper and more fundamental that cements these people together and causes them to assert specific roles in the group.

This same phenomenon happens with intersexual attraction too. People tend to be attracted to certain people and not others. Those who are hard hearted tend to be primarily attracted to the evolutionary indicators of health, fitness, and fertility that have been discussed in the Manosphere over the past decade. (For the purposes of discussion, I'll call this a Carnal Attraction.)

Those who are soft-hearted consider these things as well, but they also have a deeper personal awareness of "fit" and overall compatibility. They are more aware of how the other person affects their emotional health and spiritual growth. They may also recognize a larger purpose for being in relationship with a particular person. (I'll refer to this as a Spiritual Attraction.)

A more mature person will prioritize the discernment of these deeper truths of identity in a Spiritual Attraction, and assign greater credence to this kind of relationship. Some people call this type of fit a "true" attraction, or a "true" relationship.

For example, when two married couples first meet, they usually exchange stories of how they met their spouse (viz. their Meet Cute experiences). The underlying motivation for discussing this subject is to ascertain the nature, strength, and purpose of the other couple's relationship. This can often help them understand the couple much faster and better.

Interpreting Some Commonly Heard Terminology

As a praxeology, we often see women size up men based on the table below. A description follows (in green text).

The feminine conception of a man, based on his SMV and the spiritual state of his heart

SMV	Soft Hearted, Humble, Believing, Trusting	Hard Hearted, Proud, Cynical, Distrustful
Low	(Invisible)	Creep
Middle	Nice guy; friend zone;	Cad
High	Hunk	Chad
All	Charming ↔ Charismatic	Careless ↔ Cunning

https://sigmaframe.wordpress.com/

According to this conceptualization, the type of man a particular woman is attracted to depends, in part, on the spiritual state of her own heart.

Soft-hearted women should naturally find soft-hearted men preferable, whereas hard-hearted, fleshly-minded wimmin would be drawn to cads for Tingles.

Granted, this correlation is greatly oversimplified for the sake of clarity. I know many readers will object to the real-world accuracy of these assertions, and I am sure there are exceptions in the real world, but this assessment might explain much of the seemingly bizarre attraction that we often see, as well as why some other couples seem to be perfect together.

When you understand that the respective partners in a relationship choose each other for specific reasons, then you can begin to appreciate how they are (or fail to be) perfect together. If you can't understand what that reason is, or if you disagree about the value of that reason, then you will not be able to understand why certain people get together.

A Speculum in the Mirror

It seems like good, solid marriages are hard to come by these days. When we find one, we might ask ourselves how they got so lucky.

But this is not due to blind luck. These people must have had a deeper sense of self-awareness and they knew themselves and what was of primordial importance to their lives. They were also able to identify something within the soul of the other person which resonated harmoniously with their own soul. Thus, as a result of their discernment of the spiritual implications, they were able to make a better choice. The common term for this approach is wisdom, but wisdom requires a level of discernment that a hard hearted person does not, and cannot have.

For those who find themselves having perpetual bad luck in love, it may very well be a result of the lack of discernment and wisdom. If a man finds that he is continuously attracted to cold, calculating, hard-hearted, sizzling hot wimmin, then this might be an indicator that he is hard core himself.

Likewise, women who are irresistibly drawn to Harvey Wallbangers, even though they know he'll toss them aside the next morning, are relying totally on visceral cues of carnal attraction, and have no awareness that a deeper and more satisfying form of emotional connection is possible.

I experienced this phenomenon myself for many years, and I was always so frustrated that I couldn't attract a woman whom I considered to be marriage worthy. It wasn't until after many years (and a couple marriages) that I realized that I was hard-hearted, and that I was subconsciously attracted to hard-hearted wimmin. This contributed greatly to my difficulties in finding an appropriate person to marry, and building a stable marriage. Since I discovered the Heart-Led Way to interact with life, the nature of these blunders have become more apparent to me.

Like it or not, ex-Prince Harry had his reasons for choosing to marry Meghan Markle. But does he (really) know what those reasons are?

Conclusions

One proposition that has been offered in this post is that people choose their friends, lovers, partners, and spouses for a reason. Unfortunately, it is rather common for people to enter into relationships without any awareness of what that reason is. As a result, people are unaware of the kind of relationship it can possibly become and are likely to become disappointed or frustrated because of the inevitable disconnect between expectations and reality. I will posit that this is a common cause of divorce.

We can safely presume that any relationship formed between two people who are hard-hearted will not yield the maximum spiritual benefits that might be obtained through a relationship, but instead will lead to one (or both) engaging in dysfunctional relationship patterns with the aim of gratifying the desires of the flesh. A profuse dedication to being spiritually obedient to God's Law might ameliorate much of the pain and dysfunction, but this approach is difficult and unlikely to occur, nor will it yield the full cornucopia of marital satisfaction that God intends.

On the other hand, being soft-hearted brings an added dimension of spiritual awareness which can offer one a great deal of wisdom in choosing a relationship partner. This discernment can also help one detect what kind of potential the relationship might have, before one gets too far into it. Choosing a partner who is compatible, not only in the flesh (e.g. personality, habits, socioeconomic level, SMV parity), but also in the spirit (e.g. having mutual values, a similar life purpose, and a shared source of joy), has the potential to produce a satisfying relationship that possesses the vital essentials necessary to weather the years together.

I welcome any thoughts, additional insights, and constructive criticism that the readers may have to offer.

Related

- Σ Frame: Apprehending True Humility (2019 April 7)
- The Orthosphere (J.M. Smith): The Call of the Deep (2020 October 5)
- Spawny's Space (Farm Boy): Young Men – The Cool Kids (2020 October 22)

Patheological Weddingsday – Leithart's Myths of Purity

Jack · 28 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A sampling platter of the Old Testament Levitical Laws.

Readership: Christians;
Reader's Note: For the discerning, Leithart's post has a familiar spirit.

Introduction

In his post, Peter Leithart's Side Effects (2020 October 8), Deep Strength brought to our attention a piece written by Peter Leithart at Theopolis. Of note, our discussion of this article came to the conclusion that Leithart is channeling Boomer Theology, which is essentially Complementarianism.

I also observed that Leithart has a penchant for "sexual mystery" (his words) as something that should not be "dispelled". Not to rant about Boomers, but they have done a grand job at passing that "sexual mystery" down to succeeding generations. Now, our 21st century ignorance of this knowledge has not made us any more righteous nor happy, but instead, it has made us more impotent and imbecilic when it comes to interactions between the sexes. We now call this pathetic state, being Blue Pilled, among other, less polite monikers.

After looking around in my study notes on the Purity Movement, I found that Leithart wrote three articles about the Purity Movement at Patheos. The fact that he wrote for theologically pathetic Patheos makes me even more uneasy about his doctrinal beliefs.

This post will examine the first one, entitled Myths of Purity (2017 October 12). In this post, Leithart kicks around a few Biblical concepts about uncleanness. His references suggest that he is quite well read, but his hermeneutics of these topics are banal.

Reformed Presbyterian Pastor, Dr. Peter Leithart.

Myth #1: Uncleanness is “dirtiness”.

> “Though there is some overlap between “dirt” and “impurity,” the latter has a specific significance. If we take Mary Douglas’s definition of dirt as “matter out of place,” then the overlap is stronger. But Douglas’s definition assumes that impurity is a systemic issue, not a matter of “ickiness”.”

A couple problems already…

- No citation for Douglas’s work was given. I had not heard of Mary Douglas, so I had to look it up. I presume he is referring to Prof. D. M. Douglas’ 1966 opus magnum in anthropology, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo.
- Leithart quoted Douglas’ definition of dirt, but not impurity. Maybe he is assuming that they are the same thing, but they are not.

To add my own comment on this, impurity is a matter of “ickiness”, but it is more than simply physical ickiness. It also includes visceral, social, sexual, and spiritual ickiness. I covered these topics in two previous posts.

- Σ Frame: What does it mean to be Unclean? (2018 December 2)
- Σ Frame: What does it mean to be Defiled? (2018 December 9)

In my studies of these topics, I came to the conclusion that the main difference between being unclean and being defiled, is that being defiled is a rather permanent state of being unclean, meaning that the person or object cannot be made clean again through washing or other rituals.

> “Exodus 30:17-21 might be brought in as evidence to the contrary. Priests had to wash their hands and feet in the laver before they went before the altar or entered the tabernacle. That indeed suggests that dirt in and of itself is a defilement, and that the priests would have been unclean if they had failed to do this. Yet there is nothing in the Levitical law that requires lay Israelites to wash before approaching the tabernacle. Perhaps this was taken for granted, but the omission is significant. It indicates that if uncleanness is dirt, it’s a special type of dirt.”

His argument is still not clear, but I can see that Leithart is schmoozing the two concepts of unclean and defiled as meaning the same thing — only the dirt is different! (Maybe he supports the “magic dirt” hypothesis about immigration.) Not surprising, because this is a common assumption. A lot of people argued with me when I argued that there must be a difference between the two.

I'm no expert in Greek or Hebrew, so I can't get into this much deeper with any certainty. If any knowledgeable reader would care to dig into this any further, here is a list of words on BibleHub to get you started (and there might be more that I missed). All these words are translated into English as unclean, defiled, debased, impure, polluted, unwashed, etc., and I'm sure every one of these words carries a unique nuance or special context that has been lost in the translation. Why else would there be so many different words if it was all the same idea? Are we to believe that these are all synonyms?

Hebrew	Greek
1351. gaal	169. akathartos
1352. goel	449. aniptos
2490c. chalal	2840. koinoó
2610. chaneph	3392. miainó
2930. tame	3435. molunó
2931. tame	4510. rhupoó
2932. tum'ah	4695. spiloó
2936. tanaph	5351. phtheiró
3799. katham
5079. niddah
5953. alal
6031. anah

Anyway, the point of Exodus 30:17-21 is that the priests were not to come into the sanctuary dirty. Washing was necessary because in those days, traveling along the road to the temple invariably made people dusty and dirty. According to my understanding of unclean and defiled, not washing would have left the priests unclean, but would not have made them defiled.

> "Not every type of gross material that we dirty "dirty" [sic] is unclean in the Levitical sense. Deuteronomy 23:9-14 requires the Israelites to dig a latrine outside the war camp, because Yahweh dwells in the camp and moves through it. Israel is not to leave any "thing of nakedness" exposed in the camp (v. 14). Yet a soldier who uses the toilet outside the camp and covers it up, will immediately return to the camp. He hasn't been made unclean by feces or urination."

This is standard protocol for field camps, both military and civilian. Even dogs don't doo doo in the dog house.

Concerning his last sentence, feces does make one unclean. To make my point, stepping in poop might be funny (unclean), but stepping on a used maxipad is never funny (defiled).

Concerning verse 14, I don't know what translation he's using. Only the Young's Literal Translation uses the word "nakedness", but it doesn't say "thing of nakedness". All other translations use the words filthy, indecent, offensive, shameful, or unclean.

But overall, he's making a distinction between unclean and defiled, which contradicts his earlier suggestion, and confirms mine. Actually, I think he has not made any distinction between these terms as I have.

> "Human beings contract uncleanness by emissions from the body (Leviticus 15), but not every emission from the body defiles."

I can agree on that. Leviticus 15 states that the emissions that are defiling are semen, menstruation, and purulence.

This image is incorrect. Turkey is unclean, according to Levitical Law.

Myth #2: God gave purity rules for reasons of health and hygiene.

> "Nothing in the food laws suggests that foods are prohibited because of the dirty or unhealthy habits of the animal, or the unhealthy character of their meat. The pig is off limits because, though it divides the hoof, it doesn't chew the cud. Sheep can be gross too, but they are not only clean but sacrificial animals.
>
> Shrimp and shellfish are not prohibited because they are bottom feeders or because they are scavengers. They're prohibited because they lack scales and fins. After the Maccabean revolt, Jewish tradition, exalted the > pig into the model of the unclean animal but that is an historical “accident”.”

I don’t believe this is totally a myth. Health and hygiene may not have been the express purpose of the Levitical regulations, but health and hygiene did come as a benefit.

> “Nor are other forms of impurity related to health concerns. Lepers are isolated and quarantined, it is said, to prevent the disease from spreading. There are several problems with this. Biblical leprosy is not the same as modern leprosy. It is more like psoriasis than Hanson’s disease.”

I disagree. In ancient times, it may have been difficult to distinguish between a case of dermal lesions and a terminal case of Hanson’s disease, especially in the early stage of infection, so they had to take precautions with all. So all kinds of gross skin diseases were lumped into a general category of leprosy, or rather, suspected leprosy.

> “Further, when a “leper” turns completely white, when he is completely covered with the white swelling of his leprosy, he is declared clean automatically (Leviticus 13:13). If the laws are concerned with contagion, it’s odd that the leper is pronounced healthy when his body is entirely taken over by the disease.”

The text is definitely confusing, and he is not making it any less so. I’m not a medical expert, but I imagine that leprous sores turn white when the infected tissue becomes necrotic and desquamates, indicating a remission of the infection.

Myth #3: Israelites in a state of uncleanness were pariahs and outcasts, excluded from the daily run of social life.

> “Uncleanness prevents a person from approaching the sanctuary. It doesn’t prevent anyone from living a normal life.”

No, uncleanness prevents a person from glorifying God in the sanctuary. Going back to Exodus 30:17-21, if a priest delivered a sermon in his gardening clothes, it would be sacrilegious. A high priest doing this should be dismissed. In the Old Testament, God dismissed him personally, and permanently.

BTW, how many preachers have you seen deliver a message while wearing a T shirt and tattered blue jeans or jogging sweats? The Washington D.C. area has had them for the past 25 years.

-

-

> “A woman wasn’t expelled from her home during her period, nor was she prohibited from contact with others. She and her husband could continue to sleep in the same bed, though they were prohibited from having intercourse.
>
> Her husband would become unclean, as would most of the rest of her family. They would have to go through rites of cleansing, perhaps every night the woman was menstruating. It would be an inconvenience, especially if there were several adult women in the house (think Tevye). But there would be no ostracism, exclusion, or expulsion.”

Maybe it’s not a rejection, but a woman on her period is somewhat of an outcast. Using the analogy, a used maxipad is defiled. A person or thing that touches that maxipad is unclean.

> "There seem to be some exceptions. Lepers are sent out of the camp (Numbers 5:1-3), along with all people with discharges and people contaminated by corpses, But the camp has a certain degree of holiness to it. The ark is in the midst, and Israel is organized around it. This isn't a precedent for exclusion from daily life, but exclusion from the presence of God."

This passage actually goes against his argument. And I'm not buying that last line. God is present everywhere. A person's sin, not geographical location, is what excludes one from the presence of God.

> "What about lepers after Israel entered the land? 2nd Kings 7 indicates that the lepers were put outside the city. And this is perhaps implied by the law: A leprous house was dismantled and taken out of the city, so perhaps we can infer that a leprous person was also removed from the city. Behind that, perhaps, is the notion of a city as holy space."

Leithart's cursory review could be misleading. If we take the time to read Leviticus 13 and 14, which cover the Levitical regulations for leprous people, garments, objects, and homes, we find that razing the building was the very last resort to be rid of a house "plague" (presumably some type of mold or fungus).

> "And, finally, we can't be certain that the treatment of lepers in 2nd Kings 7 is just. After all, they are being excluded from Samaria, not Jerusalem, and Samaria is a city populated by idols. Perhaps the fact that the lepers are put outside the city is a sign of the injustice of the northern kingdom, which would only heighten the irony when the lepers save the city by discovering the abandoned Aramean camp."

Now he's passing retroactive judgment on the social justice of Samaria during the Iron Age, and using this as an excuse as to why #3 is a myth. Overall, it's not convincing. He doesn't tie this little story back to the main topic of uncleanness. The article ends there without any conclusion, leaving the reader confused and dissatisfied.

Conclusions

In summary of this post, Leithart has made several errors.

- His writing style is that of an authority, but the substance of his writing does not carry the power of that authority.
- He took snippets of ideas from several passages about uncleanness, but failed to explain any of them within context.
- He fails to offer specific definitions to the concepts he builds his arguments on.
- He extrapolated certain passages to mean something beyond what is implied in scripture.
- As a result, he ends up making some pretty extreme statements that have little applicable value.
- His arguments flitter across several ideas, and as a whole, fail to explain why the propositions are myths.

Leithart's post is like a rough draft that got published before it was finished. It was painful to read, and difficult to concentrate. Maybe he had some idea of what he was writing about, but he failed to make those ideas clear, and show how they could reinforce his arguments. Thus, it creates more confusion than illumination.

If I could believe that Leithart is cunning enough to have adopted an old media strategy of abusing a topic in order to trivialize it, then my best guess is that this post is intended to convince readers that the Old Testament Law is no longer valid, or even ridiculous, or that maintaining purity is a fool's errand.

<Looks again at Leithart's photo>

No way. Leithart's post was only intended as clickbait, reading fodder, or to fulfill a quota.

Related

- Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – What is Purity Actually About? (2020 September 23)

Data on Marriage and how No Fault Divorce turned marriage into a revolving door.

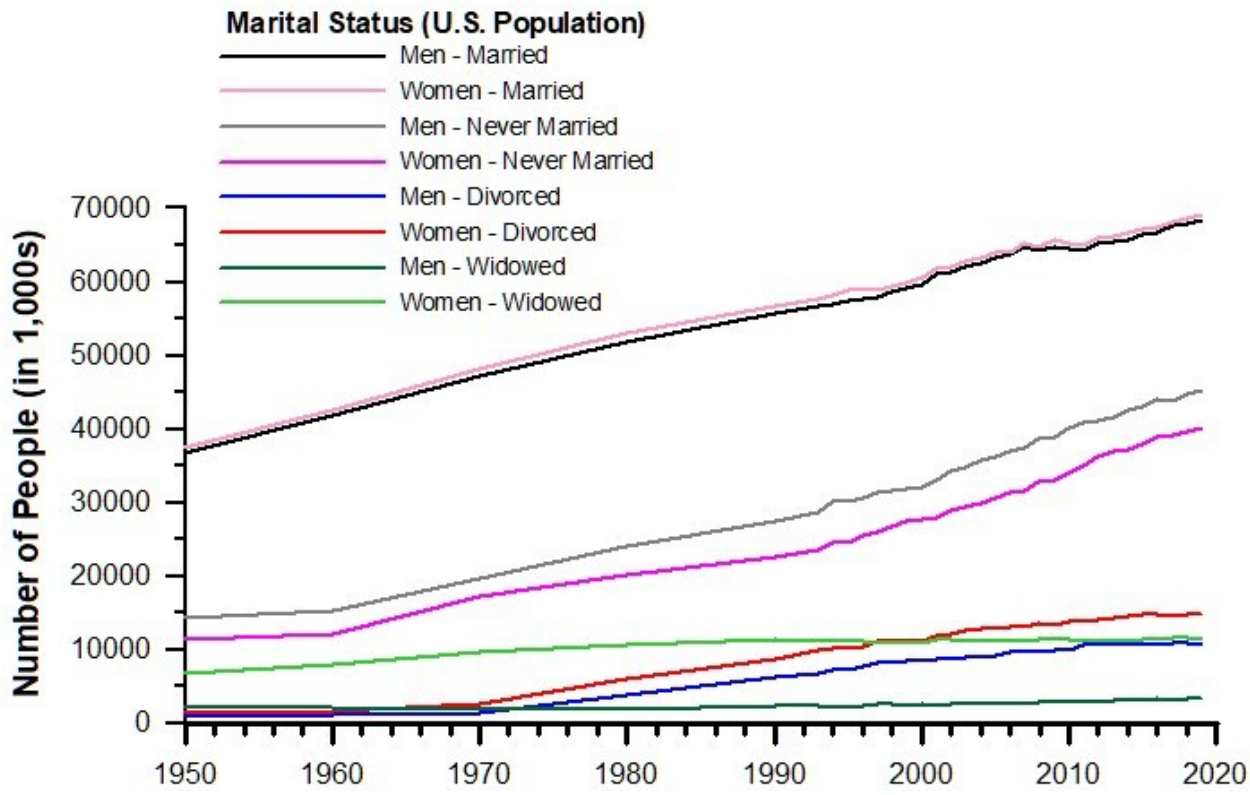
Jack · 30 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Reviewing the effects of the pill (ca. 1960) and No Fault Divorce legislation (ca. 1970) as shown in the data.

Readership: All
Length: 1,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

The Data

I was browsing some data tables for marriage at the U.S. Census website. It's hard to see trends from looking at raw data, so I made a graph showing the marital status of Americans since 1950.

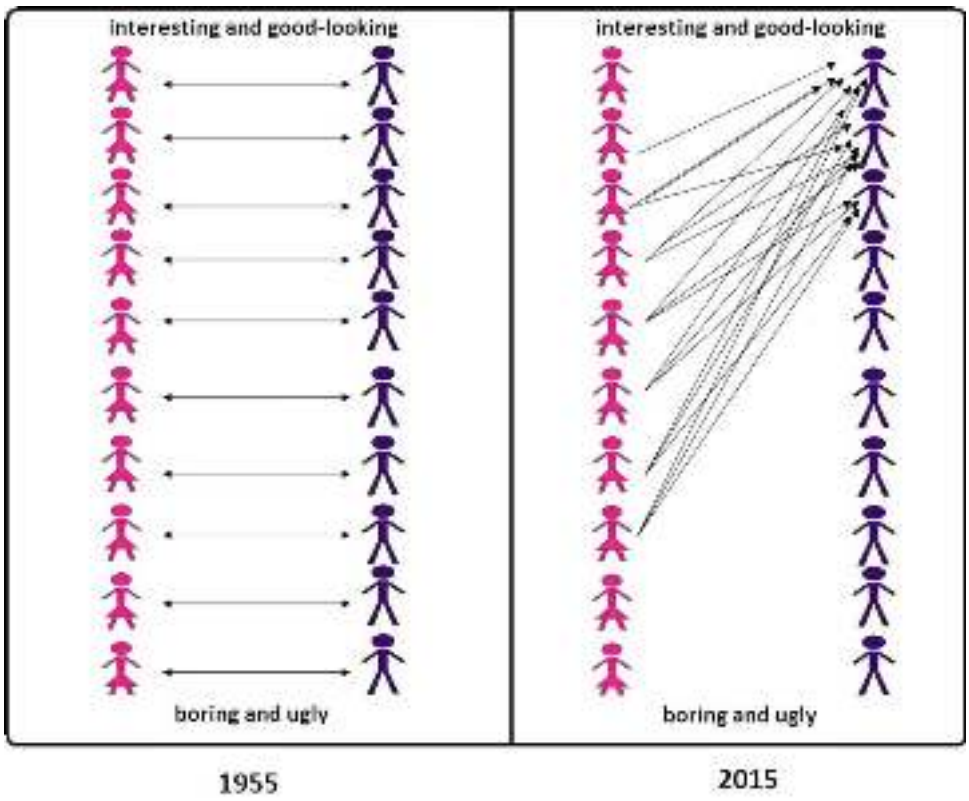


This graph tells us a lot about marriage over the last 70 years.

First of all, marriage has remained fairly steady since 1950. But when we consider that the total population was increasing exponentially, not linearly as the married data shows, it would seem that marriage has been in slow decline.

The decreasing ratio of widows is presumably because of the increasing life span and better living / working conditions, especially for men.

There has always been a larger percentage of never married men than never married women. This outweighs other factors such as the positive female sex ratio in the total population data, and the significantly greater number of widows than widowers. This reveals that women strongly prefer to marry a very small class of high value men. In a word, hypergamy.



The rise of hypergamy.
The unmarried population reached an all-time low around 1960. Right about this time, hormonal contraceptive pills made their debut. After this, the number of unmarried people rose steadily, and increased more drastically during the mid to late 1990s. I presume this is a direct result of introducing the pill, because the pill effectively removed the primary motivation for people to marry before having sex, and transformed sex into a FUNgible commodity. "Free Love", and all that.

No Fault Divorce (NFD, AKA frivolent divorce, or "Frivorce") legislation swept the nation around 1970, and this shows up in the data. Starting in 1970, the proportion of divorced people began to grow. This trend continued until it started to level off somewhat in the mid to late 1990s.

We might question why the number of divorced people leveled off in the mid to late 1990s. This might be understood when we see that the number of never marrieds took a slight uptick around the same period. In essence, people were choosing to remain single, or waiting until later in life, presumably in order to pursue ~~an education~~ a postporniscuous* season of singularity. This phenomenon was explained by Dalrock, More grim news for carousellers hoping to jump at the last minute. (2012/11/24).

What happened in the mid-1990s that would cause this? It is probably because The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model became the norm among young Gen Xers at that time. It was celebrated and inspired by the insanely popular TV sitcom Friends, which debuted on 1994/9/22 and ran for 10 years. This, coupled with the almost total disappearance of wholesome family shows which had been popular since the mid 1950s, reveals that there was a shift in life expectations for young women.

Cast of the TV sitcom, Friends, the archetype of "Free Love", 90s style. Most young adults coveted the glorified lifestyle of cohabitation and promiscuity that was depicted, but few actually attained it.

Never Married vs. Unmarried Divorced

For the unmarried divorced and never married data, there is an ever widening chasm between men and women since 1970.

When we compare never married men and women, the number of never married men is growing faster compared to the number of never married women. In effect, more women got married, and some men married more than once. Again, hypergamy.

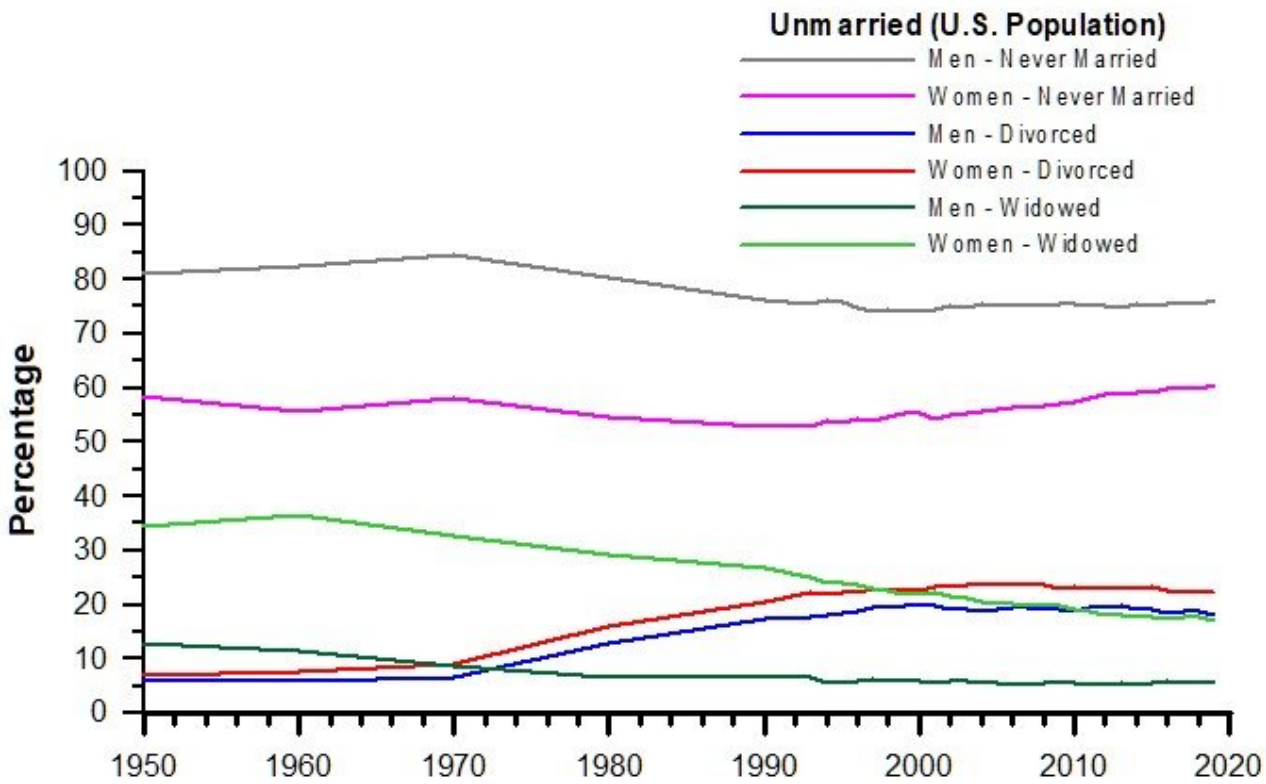
When we compare the unmarried divorced men and women, the number of divorced women is increasing faster than the number of divorced men. This seems to imply that (some) men have a greater likelihood of remaining married. But in reality, this means that men can find another wife after a divorce more easily than women can find a replacement hubby.

So what we see here is that women are postporning* marriage, and are getting divorced, but many of these women are unable to remarry. As a result, there are fewer never married women than men, and more divorced women than men.

Single Women Prefer to be Divorced Women

The numbers of never marrieds and divorced have grown since 1960 and 1970, respectively, but neither of these seemed to take a bite out of the number of marriages. So what is happening here?

To flush out an answer to this question, I've picked out the data on people over the age of 15 who are unmarried, and separated them into 3 categories: never married, divorced, or widowed. Then I compared these groups as a percentage of the total number of unmarried people, as shown in the following graph.



Here, it is sharply obvious that divorce became trendy in 1970 — the same year NFD was introduced. Since then, there have been relatively fewer never marrieds and more divorced people. Keep in mind that the number of married individuals remained steady.

As stated above, we would expect that an increase in the number of divorced would take a bite out of the number of marrieds. But what we see instead is that there was a marked down turn in the percent of never marrieds, both men and women, at exactly the same time (1970).

In effect, the number of divorces has siphoned off the number of singles more than the number of marriages.

This suggests that NFD changed how marriage was viewed by singles. Women who were sitting on the fence regarding marriage decided to take the plunge and then later got a divorce. In effect, NFD turned the collective concept of marriage into one of whimsical romance and perhaps convenience — regarded as little more than a life experience to be had and then passed on.

More recently, the previous graph shows that around 20% of all unmarried people were previously married. That's 1 out of 5! This trend peaked in the mid to late naughts and has declined slightly since then, indicating that singles have begun shying away from marriage, in contrast to their predecessors in the 1970s who got married and then divorced. This is explained by the precipitous rise in cohabitation over the past decade, as more and more men are waking up to how women regard marriage and the risks and consequences of frivorce and are therefore less inclined to marry.

This brings us to the next topic.

Playing House

Children have a game called “playing house”, in which a boy and a girl pretend to be a married couple, and other playmates take on the roles of the children and pets. It’s all for fun, and is largely forgotten before the next day.

This is exactly what happened to marriage after NFD legislation, except that it was (and still is) young adults who were/are playing house!

What we see from the data above is that NFD reduced the initial perceived risk of being stuck in an unhappy marriage until death. As a result, marriage was not taken as seriously as before, so more people were willing to take the chance at getting married.

In effect, NFD transformed marriage from a covenantal institution into a social transaction. It ostensibly reduced the value of marriage while it simultaneously offered the tangible benefits of financial savings, living conveniences, and the self-styled entertainment of “playing house”. Without the sense of permanency offered by a life-time commitment, marriage is essentially playing house with a revolving door.

Really… How many times have you heard a woman say, “If it doesn’t “work out”, we can always get a divorce and “start over.”? We never hear this statement from men.

What women really mean is that they want the affirmation and honor of being married, coupled with access to the man’s resources, followed by a return to the carousel. “The responsibilities of Maawidge are not for me. Mooaarr porniscuity pleez!”* Women want to GET married, but they don’t want to BE married. Essentially, they prefer to be divorced adulteresses with a supplementary income in the form of alimony and child support.

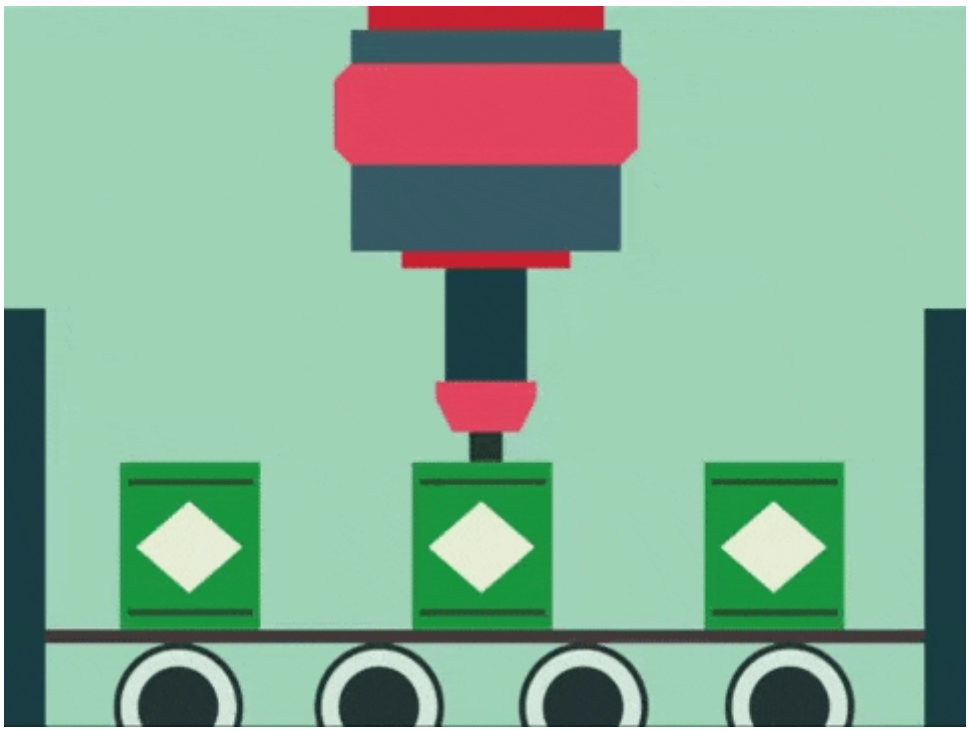
Thus, broken marriages and immorality now abound. Fortunately, most frivorcees at least have the decency to not let their children know that their adulteries are more important to them than their children are. But eventually it will all come out, especially as they age.

A Few Conclusions

1. Since 1950, marriage has increased linearly while the total population has increased exponentially.
2. The percentage of widows is decreasing.
3. The early to mid-1960s saw an increase in those postponing marriage, presumably because the advent of the pill removed the motivation to marry before having sex.
4. In addition to (3), Contraception Correlations (2019/11/29) showed that the pill also had a delayed effect on the rise of divorce.
5. NFD legislation in 1970 led to an immediate increase in both marriage and divorce.
6. Moreover, marriage became a revolving door – More Beckys and Staceys got married and then got divorced.
7. With the rising popularity of the Career Life Script among Gen X in the mid 1990s, marriage became even less of a priority and was further postponed.
8. Upon choosing education and career over starting a family, fewer women are able to "stick the landing" (marry or remarry).
9. More men are staying single (never married).
10. Many more women are becoming divorced.
11. Now, 1 out of 5 unmarried people were previously married.

When more people are getting married, and more people are getting divorced too, this essentially means that people are taking the institution of marriage less seriously. IOW, marriage has been cheapened by the introduction of NFD legislation.

Also, when we consider that the age of first time marriage has been gradually postponed later and later in life, now standing in the late 20s, we see that the pill and NFD has turned the Sexual Marketplace into an automated slore mill, churning out divorced termagants by the millions.



These trends are sure to continue. I anticipate seeing the data in 10 years, after the fallout from InstaWh0ring etc. comes home to roost.

 Note 1: I've invented the words "postporn" (based on postpone + pornography), and "postporniscuity" (based on postpone + pornography + promiscuity) to describe the intentional postponement of marriage (pursuing education, etc.), while at the same time, engaging in sexual promiscuity and idealizing marriage and/or a perfect partner. This behavior seems to be so common that it deserves a name.*

Note 2: Updated on 2023/5/28.*

Related

- Dalrock: Percentage of U.S. women never married, by age, 1980 & 2015 (2017/11/6)
- Dalrock: US Marital Status Data Through 2017 (2018/8/24)
- Dalrock: Percentage of US population over 15 who were married by sex and race, 1950–2017 (2018/8/27)
- Dalrock: 2017 Never Married Data (2018/9/4)

Biden Squared

Jack · 1 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Trump is bad?!? Biden and son say, "Hold my beer!"

Readership: My fellow Americans
Theme: Constructs
Length: 300 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

I guess by now, everybody has heard about the corruption and scandals surrounding the previous Vice President Joe Biden's son, Hunter Biden.

I've put together a short list of links full of links for reference.

- Didactic Mind: Friday T&A: The Jacksonians Edition (2020/10/16)
- The Overman Warrior: Don't Be Scared: The action you can take against massive corruption (2020/10/18)
- Whiskey Tango Texas: Biden's Qualifications For President Begin To Surface (2020/10/18)
- Wintery Knight: New Hunter Biden e-mails reveal deal with Chinese investors and communist party officials (2020/10/19)

A little perspective. These stories about Biden and his son's business dealings have been featured prominently in the local news in Taiwan for years. They've had multimillion-dollar, buttercup deals with Chinese companies and Ukrainian companies, as well as several other relatively minor deals here and there. But I never saw any such reports on this from the Western news stations. The Western news media have done an outstanding job of keeping it all under cover. To me, it's utterly hilarious to see it all come out now, just two weeks before the election.

Ultimately, it's an egregious abuse of power. Those companies and bureaucrats want the benefits, influence, and power that come with shaking hands with the strong arm of the U.S., and that is what makes these deals so corrupt. U.S. politicians are bound by an oath to serve the American people, NOT Chinese and Ukrainian industrialists, and NOT their own retirement funds either. If Biden^2 were smart, they would have kept those contact numbers on their Rolodex and given them a call after they got out of office. But no, they couldn't hold off because of greed, and they know the frying pan won't stay hot forever.

Related

- Σ Frame: You have to leave Murika to get the Real News (2020/11/3)
- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review – Religion, Sex, Politics (2020/11/30)

The elephant in the room is the canary in the coalmine

Jack · 2 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The pen is mightier than the sword, fake news and post-truth notwithstanding.

Readership: All;

"The pen is mightier than the sword" is a metonymic adage, penned by English author Edward Bulwer-Lytton in 1839, indicating that communication (particularly written language), or in some interpretations, administrative power or advocacy of an independent press, is a more effective political and public educational vehicle of influence than direct violence.

Before the late 20th century, political power was largely determined by military force. Nations which had larger armies, more industry, more machinery, and more advanced technology, invariably conquered other nations. But since the advent of the computer and the internet, we now live in the Information Age. Political power no longer rests solely on military forces, and the heads of states which employ them. Instead, the people at large are governed by thoughts and beliefs that occur in their minds through the widespread exchange of ubiquitous information, and how that information tends to strike their conscious awareness within the context of their lives. In this new age we must recalculate the influences of power granted to the producers, conservators, curators, arbiters, and disseminators of information.

All the major Western news sources are syndicated, and are controlled by only six corporations.

A syndicate is a self-organizing group of individuals, companies, corporations, or entities formed to transact some specific business, to pursue or promote a shared interest.

What is their specific business?

In this arena, as with most others, money and power rule. Emotionally charged sensationalism, envy, greed, and illicit sex supply a constant influx of concupiscent energy induced as a suffluent driving force.

What is their shared interest?

These sources are all selectively liberal in their reporting. I say selectively because not only do they refuse to publish matters of interest to conservatives, but they also do not report liberal stories that might undermine public opinion of liberal causes. In essence, they fail to report anything that casts their pet purposes in a negative light, and anything they don't like, or disagree with.

Now even science has jumped into bed with them.

Because of this selectivity, some might even call this propaganda. These omissions have become so egregious that there have been hundreds of independent news sources that have spun off in the last 15 years, all attempting to rebalance the complete truthfulness of the news coverage available to the public.

The latest bungle was made by Twitter when they censored the New York Post's coverage of Hunter Biden's lucrative business transactions with foreign bureaucrats and industrialists. Then two weeks and two days after getting singled out for this, they've reversed their move, thus rendering this faux pas into a monumental transgression.

Most other places around the world have some form of censorship, political propaganda, and so on, but everybody knows about that. People kind of expect it, and it's tacitly accepted as "normal". But in America, the First Amendment declares that such activities are wrong. The fact that this is included in the Constitution suggests that the government should back up those who are censored, and be found reliable in bringing some sort of punishment or repercussion on violators.

In the case described above, the New York Post has been singled out and banned on Twitter. But this issue with Twitter hiding the Biden scoop is the elephant in the room. Besides the NYP, there are many other smaller news sources that would be included as targets of passive censorship (e.g. shadow banning); authors of books and blogs, as well as millions of real people who share and discuss such stories on their social media. For example, this book was a top seller on Amazon before it was yanked.

All the necessary questions follow…

- Will the government back up the New York Post (and other wrongfully slighted authors)?
- Will the government affirm the freedom of speech?
- Have the guarantees of freedom offered by our constitution just become pithy platitudes to be recited in high school, and then forgotten, never to be adjudicated in real life?

I'm waiting to see what will happen, just Biden my time.

If there should be no organized initiative to do what is necessary to preserve the freedom of speech, then it's time for us to revive the oft-overlooked 9th Amendment. Furthermore, it will fall to the common man to exercise his freedom of choice towards securing those freedoms which have been agreed upon by faith through public consensus. In Liberal terminology this is called "canceling".

The 11th Amendment may prove to be advantageous as well.

Americans who wish to see their freedom of speech continue into the future and possibly to the Next Generation, need to act decisively to nip this in the bud. They should not support any news agency or Tech platform that engages in censorship.

In simple language, we need to cancel Twitter, cancel Facebook, cancel CNN, and many more news agencies and social media platforms that engage in any type of political censorship, to any degree. We need to send a strong message to big Nooz and big Tech, in no uncertain terms, that censorship, either active or passive, is a moral compromise that will not be tolerated, that it is un-American, that it is intellectually dishonest, and that it is mortally violent in scope (as we have now seen in Portland, Kenosha, and elsewhere). They have failed to serve the American people in a responsible manner and have committed a great injustice. They will either correct their behavior or they will be replaced by other agencies that are more noble in their purposes of service.

> "…censorship often backfires. If you say to people "Don't read this book," their instinct is to go and read it."
>
> James Perloff: Amazon Censors "Covid-19 And The Agendas To Come, Red-Pilled" (2020 October 17)

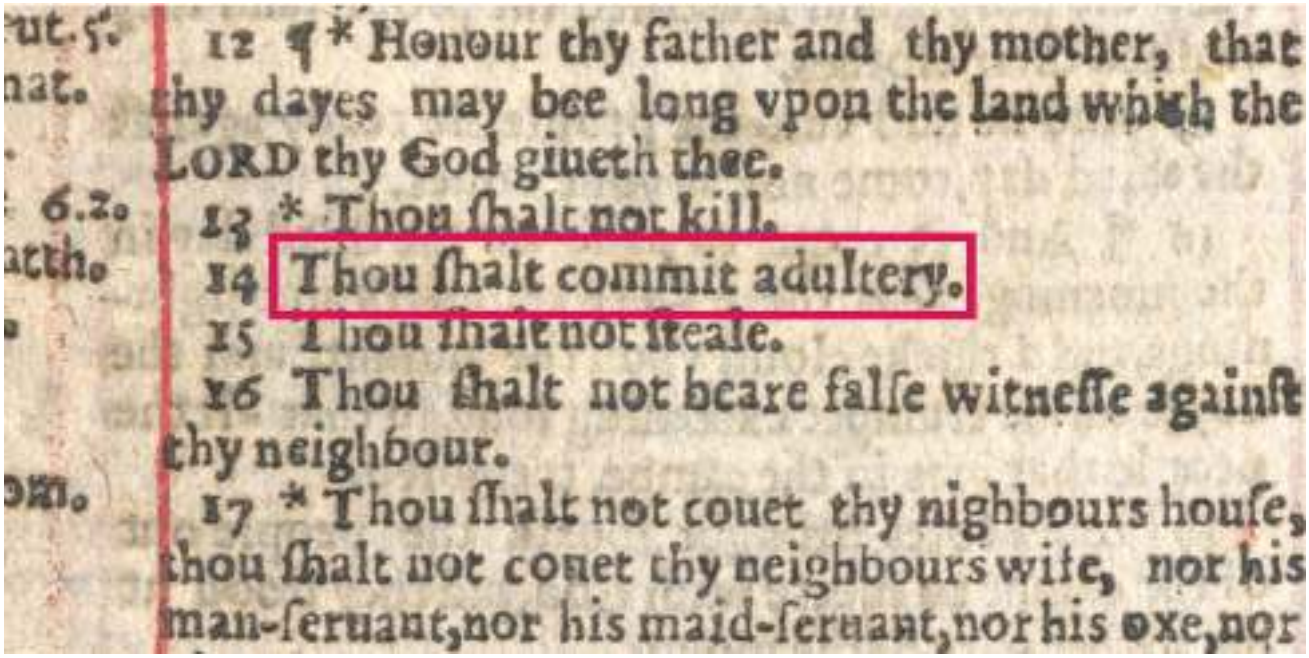
I also propose that the government should regulate media syndicates so that there is no one entity (or six), including the government itself, which monopolizes the control and distribution of information, including scientific research articles.

This is not just a battle for information and being able to speak freely; it is a battle for the erudite access to truth and our ability to make well informed decisions.



The way we choose to deal with the management of information will be the most significant historical event of our age, on the scale of when the Bible was first translated into vernacular tongues, or when the Scientific Method was first employed.

We must not fail to see the significance of a united groundswell.

Related

- Σ Frame: ¡Popcorn Science and the News! (2015 September 15)
- Σ Frame: Censorship of Praise is the Thief of Joy (2018 April 11)
- Σ Frame: RT Spews Competition in the Media Wars (2018 April 25)
- Σ Frame: Cancel my views for what we call the News (2020 July 13)
- The Other McCain: After 16 days of censorship, Twitter unlocks the New York Post's account (2020 October 30)

You have to leave Murika to get the Real News

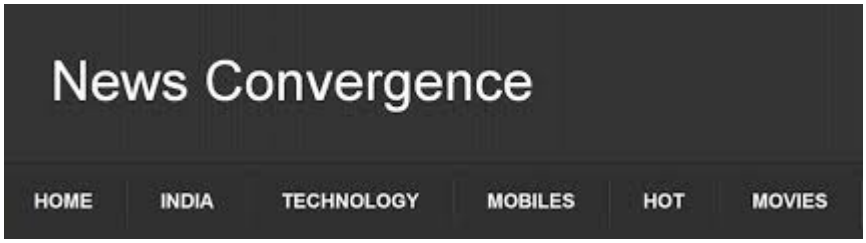
Jack · 3 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The western news media is proficient in propaganda.

Readership: My fellow Americans

It's pretty obvious by now that western news has converged to selective liberalism.

In Biden Squared (2020 November 1), I pointed out the extreme selective bias of the Western news media. News is selected (or concocted) based on how well it matches the liberal agit-prop narrative.



Novaseeker lamented,

> "We have no real news about anything relating to the election in the US right now. I mean the media is talking nonstop about the election but at the same time there is basically a media blackout going on around the election in that it is the most exceptionally one-sided election reporting I have ever seen, much moreso than even in 2016, which was itself the worst until then as well. Literally nothing that could interfere with Biden's coronation is being reported. For example, there were substantial riots last week in Philadelphia that were simply not reported in the media much at all, because the underlying cause for them didn't match the narrative — so they buried the story. The press is activist, not informational. As a result, no-one here knows what will happen on Tuesday. The polls clearly say who is going to win, but very few people trust the polls right now, so it feels kind of like a media blackout in that nothing is really clear."

Western nooz is a travesty. A small country in Asia (or Russia's RT News) has better coverage of the U.S. elections than the American news media. Granted, the news in Taiwan is just as liberal, but they call it like they see it because their biases are limited to Taiwanese national interests.

Here in Taiwan, the U.S. election is getting a whopping 30% of the air time news reporting lately, because the outcome of the election is very important to Taiwan's future diplomacy with China. The Taiwanese don't really like Trump because he is "sudden" and "reckless" and very rude by Taiwanese standards, but they LOVE what Trump has done with China. They think Biden is more polite and professional, but he's a schmoozy "dirty money" man with "liar eyes". It's amazing how clearly they can see Trump's and Biden's natures, while the American people cannot.

I watched the local news last night. They were discussing the debates, and opined that instead of discussing their past accomplishments and future plans, the candidates only recited speculative monologues (what we would call party lines or boilerplate narratives), and railed about the faults and mistakes of the other. They concluded that the 2020 election was an embarrassment to "the great American legacy of democracy".

This combination of pictures shows US President Donald Trump (left) and Democratic Presidential candidate and former US Vice President Joe Biden (right) during the first presidential debate at Case Western Reserve University and Cleveland Clinic in Cleveland, Ohio, on September 29, 2020. (Photos by Saul Loeb, Jim Watson/AFP via Getty Images.)

Having watched the debates myself, I'd say that's a fair assessment.

That's real news.

Related

- Σ Frame: How Social Media Algorithms Fuel Political Division (2018 December 15)
- Σ Frame: As the Worlds Turn… (2019 August 22)

Haidt's Ethical Foundations Theory

Jack · 4 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An explanation of why people vote conservative or liberal.

Readership: All;

Chad Ragsdale: Why your conservative uncle votes differently than you (2020 October 26).

In this article, liberal Christian blogger Chad Ragsdale summarizes Haidt's Moral Foundations Theory (MFT), which helps to explain why people make certain political and ethical decisions.

Here, I've recycled some of what Ragsdale wrote covering Haidt's theory (in green text), "translated" Ragsdale's summary (in blue text), and added commentary on points I disagreed with (in black).

MFT identifies five distinct ethical values that inform our positions, attitudes, and actions.

1. The Care/Harm foundation. This foundation is about our sensitivity towards suffering or those in need. It makes us despise cruelty and care for those who are suffering.
2. The Fairness/Cheating foundation. This foundation is about justice. We want to shun or punish cheaters. On the other hand, we are drawn to those who practice altruism.
3. The Ingroup Loyalty/Betrayal foundation. This foundation is about group identity. We don't trust whose who are vastly different from ourselves, or who betray us or our group. This foundation makes us sensitive to signs that another person is (or is not) loyal to the interests of the in-group.
4. The Authority/Subversion foundation. This foundation is about social hierarchies. We are sensitive to rank or status and are suspicious of those who undermine this order and/or condemn those who are rebellious.
5. The Sanctity (Purity)/Degradation foundation. This foundation is about purity. According to Haidt, "It includes the behavioral immune system, which can make us wary of a diverse array of symbolic objects and threats." In other words, this foundation makes us sensitive to those sacred people, things, and institutions which bind us together.

I disagree that these five dichotomies represent morality. Morality is based on the faithful discernment of what is good, right, best, or most appropriate within a given context. Just because a person hard-headedly sticks to one of these structures is not sufficient to constitute morality. Instead, I would describe MFT as an outline of different psychological sub-ethical values that are unique to individuals.

Haidt and his associates conducted research to determine how these foundations inform our politics. Here is what they discovered.

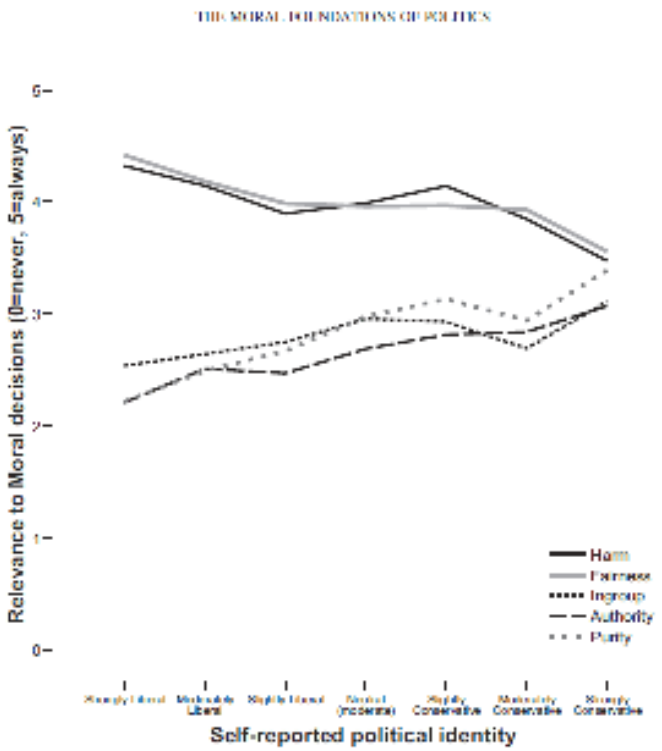


Figure 1. Relevance of moral foundations across political identity, Study 1.

Strongly liberal people put a great deal of weight on the Care and Fairness foundations. The other three foundations are more of an afterthought. OTOH, strongly conservative people place much more weight on the In-group Loyalty, Authority, and Sanctity (Purity) foundations. As you can see from the graph, conservatives do consider Care and Fairness, but the expression of these two ethical values tend to be reserved for family and close friends, and not extended to the general public as liberals are espoused to do. It stands to reason that the ethical decisions made by conservatives are more nuanced, and probably more morally responsible as well.

Ragsdale calls conservative ethics “complicated” and “complex”. He remarks,

> “Do you notice how the foundations converge among strongly conservative people? It turns out that strongly conservative people have a much more complex moral framework than strongly liberal people.”

No surprises there.

Ragsdale goes on to describe three anecdotal examples of how these foundations influence people’s decisions on (1) racial justice, (2) Trump’s border wall, and (3) same sex marriage. If you’re interested in how MFT applies to those issues, then click on the link at the top.

Concluding Statements

Haidt’s theory explains why people lean conservative or liberal by underscoring five sets of ethical values and suggesting that different individuals place a different emphasis or method of expression on each one. I found this theory to be insightful, and probably true.

In addition, agreement on ethical stance is an important consideration when vetting a potential spouse.

The outstanding question in my mind is why liberals would emphasize the Care and Fairness ethics to eclipse the other three. To be generous, I can only guess that they’ve suffered an inordinate degree of cruelty and betrayal, and feel motivated to seek justice. (I suppose this is why they’re called “Bleeding Heart” liberals.) But being realistic, I know this is not entirely true, because many liberals lead very comfortable lives. I tend to believe that liberals are fully convinced that either the world was never broken by sin, or that the sin of the world might somehow be ameliorated through social activism, one person at a time.* If so, then a Calvinist liberal is somewhat of an oxymoron, because such is a denial of Christ.

That's not what the Bible says!

For a liberal blogger, Ragsdale's article is rather moderate. As a professor of Christian apologetics and Biblical interpretation, Ragsdale takes a Christian stance, so it's probably good for liberals to read, and it's digestible for their fastidious tastes.

I'm calling attention to his blog because there is much to be gleaned, despite the liberal flavor. From reading some of his other work, I can sense that he has some prophetic gifting. Of note, his post on Faith and Feelings (2019 January 11) is pretty good.

He has a following of over 2,500. Perhaps he is called to speak truth to liberals.

 Here I am not saying that I don't believe in the value of extending agape love to others. But such efforts need to be undertaken with discernment and wisdom, and backed by personal conviction. It should not just be motivated by a self-righteous desire to feel good and/or to be seen as a good person.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Frenemy Class Warfare? (2020 August 31)

Dissuading Discussion

Jack · 5 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An observer dissuades discussion by subtly changing the subject.

Readership: All
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

The Hot Topic

There has been some talk about the United States splitting up, either formally or informally, into independent or autonomous regions respectively. If we are to accept this as a real possibility, then we begin to question the economic consequences of such a move. But obviously, there are certain people who do not want this particular discussion to continue.

Case Study

For example, under a Reddit post [2], Repli3rd left this comment.

> "Maybe the US should split."
>
> LOL. She does realise the vast majority of American wealth that funds the enormous military budget is generated in "democratic states" (with a couple of exceptions)????
>
> The most dependant states (federal assistance) (bottom ten all republican controlled, bottom 25 all republican except Oregon 25, New York 24, Vermont 22 – 1 = most dependant).
>
> Richest states (medium household income) (bottom 10 all republican controlled, bottom 25 all republican except for Maine 35 – 1 = wealthiest).
>
> The most hawkish Republicans are usually from relatively poor US states and they can often afford to have rather outlandish policy positions because all they have to say is they're anti-abortion and love Jesus and guns to get elected (contrasted with the Mitt Romney types who actually have to think about their policy platform a little more).

Note how the anti-erudite spells "dependent", yet she carries the opinion that the "God, guns, and glory" folks are simple, indigent deplorables. She also spells realize with an s (British English), which indicates that she is not from the U.S.A.

Anyway, Democrats / Liberals were quick to jump on this, plastering it all over social media.

Is it even True?

Why are Democrats / Liberals so excited about this issue? I had to check it out.

The links to WalletHub were blocked, so I started hunting for this information elsewhere.

1. Smart Asset: States Most Dependent on the Federal Government 2020
2. DC City Biz List: 2020s most and least federally dependent states (WalletHub study)
3. Towards Data Science (Bryan Maloney): American states, the Federal government, and dependency (2020/6/19)

The last study by Maloney digs deeper into the data and has a more comprehensive report. It shows that essentially, the Democrats' claim is a concocted, categorical lie via statistical manipulation, and shrouded by the complexity of the underlying causes. (Click on the link to read more.) The Democrat's excitement over this is due to selection bias. Therefore, declaring Republican economics insolvent is an appealing distraction.

Click Bait: Do Republican or Democratic economics attract or foment poverty?

Those who have spread this fake news and instigated this fervor are only stirring up dissention based on partisan politics, most likely to serve as a distraction from the real issues. In the above example, Repli3rd brought up this talking point in response to the suggestion that the U.S. should break up, thereby tamping down the discussion on this idea. This is an intellectually dishonest tactic, namely changing the subject, and protest-too-much.

In other words, TPTB are just toying with us, as if we were gullible, easily provoked kids.

"Oh no! We mustn't let them get into THAT! Quick! Give them some distracting statistical candy!"

"Let the rabble eat abstract economic theories to keep them out of trouble!"

Don't be fooled by interesting, but ultimately useless and time wasting distractions!

Sources

1. Taiwan News (Sophia Yang): Taiwan stands out by favoring Trump, survey shows (2020/10/17)
2. Article (1) was shared on Reddit: Trump's Approval Rating in Taiwan is Higher Than in the Country Where He is President (2020/10/17). It was later deleted by the moderator.

Related

- Σ Frame: Why is Citizenship Unquestionable? (2018/11/10)
- Σ Frame: Yankee Stay Home! (2019/2/12)

Hitting bottom must be necessary.

Jack · 6 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A historical timeline of how humanity has slowly degraded into it's fundamental essence.

Readership: All;
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

There is an old American aphorism regarding the socio-spiritual growth of an individual.

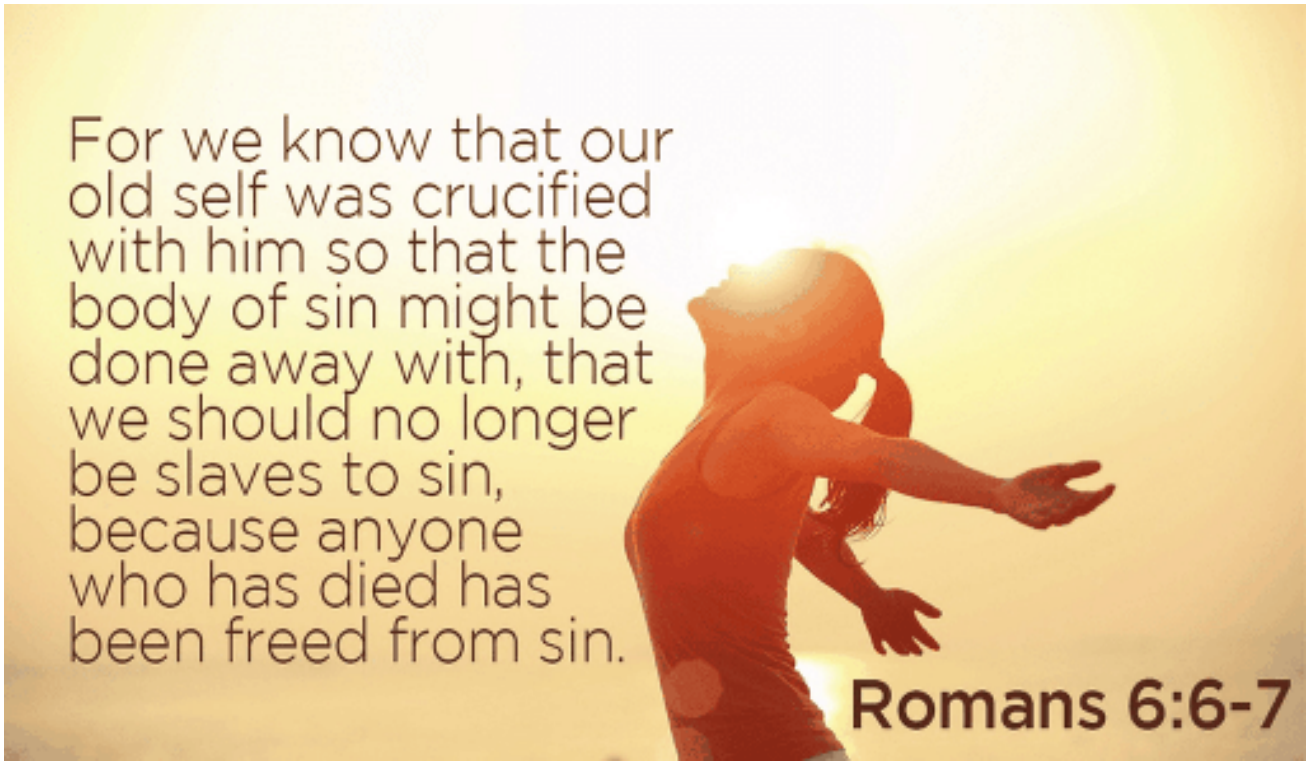
> "Some people have to hit bottom before they know which way is up."

The idea is that a man has to make a total mess of his life before he realizes that what he is doing doesn't work, and that he needs to make a fundamental change.

It has a spiritual corollary as well. A person has to see that all his own understanding is off the mark, and all his best efforts don't make a bit of difference. When he "hits bottom" he realizes that he needs God.

To offer an example, Roosh is an individual who fits this truism well. The reader could probably recount other individuals from his own mental rolodex of acquaintances.

But this phenomenon applies to humanity as a whole.



The Social Structure Hits Bottom

A societal culture changes incrementally over centuries, because there's only so much change that the masses as a whole, or even one generation for that matter, can accept at any one time.

Dave, a commenter at Adam's place, has summarized the structural changes in the political order, based on a

YouTube video, . [Lightly edited for clarity.]

> "In a nutshell, the true order (as understood by all western Europeans) was God – Catholic Church – King – Aristocracy – Middle Class- workers – nature/animals. Almost all wars of consequence since the Protestant Reformation have been won be the wrong side, and each subsequent loss pushed the revolution further down that line of God's order.
>
> The Thirty Years War – An effective loss for the Church. Protestantism survives, and the Church would by default need to compromise increasingly henceforth.
>
> English Civil War – An absolute disaster. The King is executed, Puritanism flourishes (and will later spread to the USA), and although the Monarchy is restored, Parliament (aka the Aristocracy – for the time being at least) is effectively in charge.
>
> French/U.S. revolutions — No pretence. The King is overthrown by the same movement in both nations. Yes the US founders were gentlemen. Yes they were aristocrats, but still they were revolutionaries in rebellion against their somewhat 'tainted' (by Henry VIII forming his own Church and the execution of Charles I during the civil war) but still rightful King. The movement away from God continues.
>
> U.S. Civil War — Now the Aristocrats are overthrown. The Confederate leaders were gentlemen and aristocrats, the North under Lincoln were middle class businessmen. Out with the old and in with the new. The USA ceased to be the land of free born Britons, and is now a money making enterprise importing labour from all the world over.
>
> Post WW1 — Communist and socialist revolutions galore. The workers are now in charge. The Tsar is gone. The last of the old order with him. Germany effectively has two revolutions. The USA has a socialist overthrow of Lincoln's middle class business ruling elite with the New Deal. The Aristocrats of the House of Lords are starting to be replaced, and Parliament is now made up of all classes of people.
>
> Today — Now the workers have been overthrown. Their jobs exported, while their third world replacement populations have been imported and allowed to create anarchy on the streets without opposition. The worship of the environment is promoted as the greatest good.
>
> In 500 years, the actual order of the world has been incrementally degraded to the point where it has been tuned on its head. If we take the above understanding to be a true evaluation of events, the problem is, how is it even possible to reverse it?
>
> The non USA anglosphere retains the trappings of the old order via the Monarchy. Yet its still a watered down version of the pre Henry VIII monarchy. The remnants of the USA cling to their aristocratic constitution and fair play rules, but that is laughable considering the demographics of the union. If the confederates couldn't make a case for states rights in the 1860's, good luck making that case in clown world today.
>
> Meanwhile, the Catholic Church has itself been white anted, and we have that fool of Pope sitting in the Chair of St Peter."
>
> A comment from Dave on Pushing Rubber Downhill: The Friday hawt chicks & links – The middle class imploding edition. (2020 June 6)

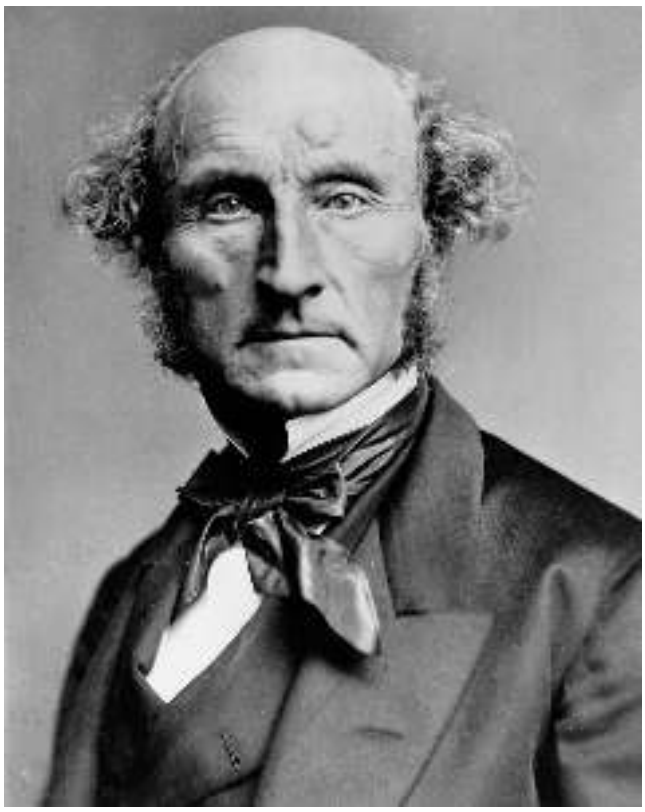
When wimmin, rainbow fluffs, and foreigners who become politicians call the shots, rest assured, we can go no lower.

The Anglo culture's socio-political structure has hit rock bottom.



John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), noted for his treatises in classical liberalism, utilitarianism, and feminism; heralded as “the most influential English-speaking philosopher of the nineteenth century”.

Christianity Hits Bottom

64 AD — Peter and Paul were executed.

The second and third century AD — Christians persecuted and martyred on a large scale.

The third and fourth century AD — Authentic Christianity was lost largely due to hellenization.

325-787 AD –The Seven Ecumenical Councils universalize Christian doctrine.

394 AD — Christianity was institutionalized as a state sanctioned religion. Christian doctrine and liturgical practices were subsequently adulterated by Germanic paganism.

1054 AD — The Great Schism. Roman popes break away from the Orthodox Church, and form the Catholic Church.

1095-1251 AD — The Great Crusades pitted Christianity against Islam.

The 11th and 12th centuries AD — The church was further adulterated by chivalry and was then swallowed whole over the next few centuries.

1453 AD — The Turks conquer Constantinople and change Christendom’s greatest church into a mosque.

1517 AD — Martin Luther posts the 95 Theses, kick starting Lutheranism and the beginning of the Radical Reformation and Protestantism.

The 16th through 18th centuries — Further schisms and reform movements within the Anglican Communion, with influence from the Radical Reformation, produced the Puritans and Separatists, giving us today’s Baptists, Congregationalists, Quakers, and eventually Unitarian Universalism.

1532 AD — King Henry VIII forms the Church of England in order to pursue a marriage forbidden by the church.

1610-1650 AD — The Scientific Revolution defies Church authority and forms independent ontological models of the physical world.

1620, 1632 AD — Puritans seek religious freedom and colonize North America.

1637-1789 AD — The Age of Enlightenment leads to liberalism and reductionism in politics, religion, science, and the church.

1717 AD — Freemasonry was founded in England.

1729 AD — The Methodist church was formed.

1776; 1789 AD — The American and French revolutions install democracy as a societal structure, eroding social hierarchies and tribal identities.

1764-1850 AD — Gothicism, the fascination with dark romance, horror, and the macabre sweeps literature and the arts.

Early 19th century — Social, political, and economic liberalism take root.

19th century — Industrialization breaks down the patriarchal social structure of western nations.

1845 AD — The Southern Baptist church was formed.

1870 AD — The Dogma of Papal Infallibility led to the split of the Old Catholic Church.

1870-1890 AD — Freemasons infiltrate church and government institutions.

1890-1930 AD — Occultism creeps into western societies.

20th century — Ecumenism forms. Progressive Christianity, Liberal Christianity, and Liberation Theology, grow exponentially. Protestant churches diverge and then converge along the lines of social liberalism. This is the greatest spiritual adultery of our age.

1914-1918 AD — World War 1 transforms western society and destroys the last remnants of an agrarian, patrilineal social structure.

1916 AD — The Pentecostal church was formed.

1919 AD — Women's Suffrage erodes patrilineal authority.

1929 AD — The stock market crash leading to the Great Depression destroyed the Gold Standard, consolidated the stranglehold of corporate capitalism, instituted social security, and led many to fear social cataclysm and suffering.

1945 AD — Democratic liberalism reigns supreme. Nationalism vanishes and the Nuclear Age begins.

1950-1980 AD — The sexual revolution grows to envelop western society.

1960 AD — The hormonal contraception pill was introduced, leading to the debasement of marriage.

1970 AD — No Fault Divorce legislation turned marriage into a revolving door.

1973 AD — Roe vs. Wade ruling legalizes abortion, heralding the domination of hedonistic materialism over the sanctity of life.

1980s — Divorce rocks the west, eliminating the common knowledge of God from the younger generations consciousness.

1990s — Revival of occultism.

21st century — Intersectional Feminism destroys the last vestiges of patrilineal authority and leads to widespread nihilism and apostasy.

Christianity has hit rock bottom. What we have today is but a shadow of the real thing.

Conciliar Fundamentalism – The Church of Man

Conclusion

We've hit bottom in every appreciable way. It's time for the American people, and western culture, to discover a new base of existence.

Many of the faithful can sense the dissolution of Christian norms. Since 1995, Orthodoxy has become the fastest growing Church in America.

Take heart! Find your new found faith in our Creator, and His Son, Jesus Christ!

> I cry out to the Lord with my voice;
> With my voice to the Lord I make my supplication.
> [2] I pour out my complaint before Him;
> I declare before Him my trouble.
>
> Psalm 142:1-2 (NKJV)

Rise up, O ye people! Find your voice, the voice of a new generation, a new paradigm of reality, and a new hope. The future awaits you now. Take hold of it, for it is yours!

Related

- Roosh V: Cultural Collapse Theory (2014 April 28)
- Cane Caldo: Do Church Doors Erase Bibles? (2016 September 19)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Roosh's Christian Conversion (2019 June 12)
- A Father's Journey: Redemption (2020 June 8)
- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Arc of History? Cycle of History (2020 October 27)

Dissemination and Dissolution

Novaseeker · 7 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What will become of Christianity in America?

Readership: Christians;

Introduction

In his post, Hitting bottom must be necessary. (2020 November 6), Jack wrote an excellent, comprehensive timeline of major events that have led us to modern Christianity. I agree that Christianity finds itself in a crisis situation. I have my own ideas about what comes next, which I will describe below.

First, though, a couple of quibbles about the generally very helpful timeline.

First, Jack wrote that the Methodist church started in 1729. This was the time that the Methodist movement got started, but the Methodists didn't become a "church" until at least the 1780s in North America, and later, after John Wesley's death, in Britain.

Wesley started promoting his ideas, through preaching in CofE churches, mostly in the 1730s, and it took off from there as a movement within the Anglican Church, and was carried to America that way, which is why, for a very long time, the Methodists in the US were called the "Methodist Episcopal Church". They only became the current "United Methodist Church" in the 1960s as a result of a merger with the Evangelical United Brethren, a German/Dutch-heritage but subsequently Wesleyan influenced denomination in the US that was similarly one of the so-called "Holiness Churches".

Wesley himself never promoted the Methodist church in Britain itself, remaining a faithful Anglican priest his entire long life. But after the American revolution, he supported the development of a new Methodist Church in the US, since the "state church" no longer applied there, and he created a slightly modified (edited) Book of Common Prayer for their use. I think that's the earliest you can say there was a Methodist "Church".

A Camp Meeting revival, early 1800s

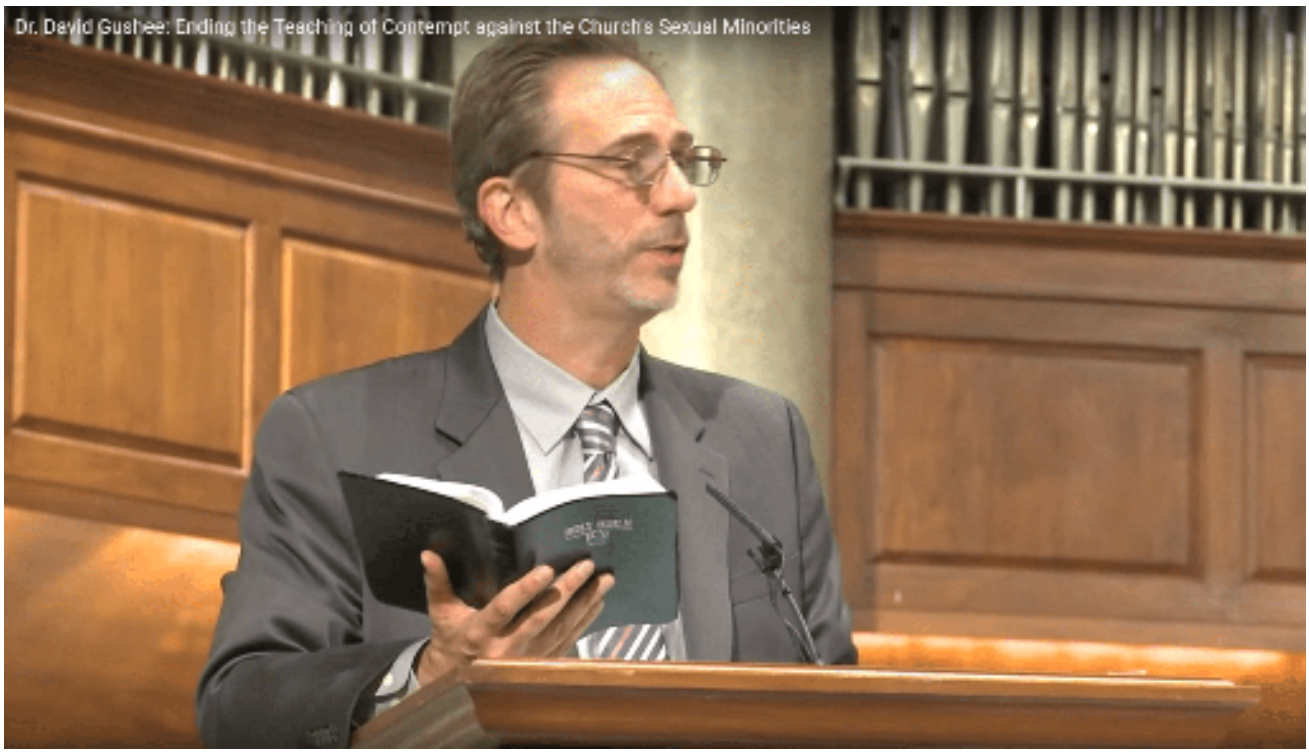
The second point is a larger one than that quibble. Basically, in my view, you can't understand the current state of American Protestantism, which is largely what American Christianity consists of, without taking into account the impact of the Second Great Awakening (1790-1850) and the revivalist mindset that it created. That "revivalist" model quickly became the dominant model in American Christianity, and it led to the wildfire growth of both the Baptists and the Methodists in the US during the immediate period after the Second Great Awakening (in fact, in large part this growth is why the Baptists, followed by the Methodists, are, among "denominational Protestants", the first and second largest Protestant denominations in the United States). The methods and means promoted by Charles Grandison Finney in particular continue to be central to much of American Protestantism today, 200 or so years later. The highlights of the revivalist model include,

1. An emphasis on growth at the expense of everything else, and therefore light (often very light) on doctrine so as to draw people in.
2. A great emphasis on contemporary forms of everything (music, worship, preaching, organization, dress, everything) to draw people in.
3. An emphasis on personal agency (decision for Christ).
4. An emphasis thereafter on practical benefits in daily life (continuing the "sell" of Christianity to the believer) coupled with redirecting the new Christian to replicate the same process through involvement in further evangelization along similar revival-type lines.

As you can see from this list, the central feature of this model is about growing membership, based on enhancing the social relevancy of evangelism in order to make the church more attractive to the targets of these evangelical efforts in any one specific time and place.

This "model" is now taken for granted in much of American Christianity, but in fact, it only dates to Charles Finney and the Second Great Awakening. Obviously not all Protestant Churches follow it (the mainlines don't, for the most part, nor do the generally theologically conservative "confessional Protestants" like the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod or the Orthodox Presbyterian Church or what have you), but the vast swathes of American Protestantism that are represented by much of Baptists, the conservative side of the Methodists, and most non-denominational churches explicitly follow this model.

It's an important point, I think, because that model greatly facilitates the apostasy we have seen in American Christianity, precisely because it focuses on de-emphasizing everything that interferes with continued growth in numbers. This creates tremendous pressure to be culturally relevant, and to compromise with the culture in order to achieve that, so that evangelism remains lively in a cultural context that has largely moved on from Christianity. The form that these compromises take varies, and often involves creative justifications using scriptural exegesis or, commonly, eisegesis, but the pressure is there because the more "out of step with the culture" that these churches become, the harder it is for the Finney model to work.



David Gushee, formerly a leading Evangelical ethicist and now an ex-Evangelical who left Evangelicalism over the gay sex and marriage issues

The Finney model works best when the culture at large is mostly influenced by Christian values, even if many people in it are spiritually backslid or worse, because Christian evangelical efforts can reach people in culturally "relevant" ways in such a context without compromising Christian values and teaching, because the culture generally accords with those values. It works much less well in a culture that has walked away from Christian values, and we are seeing that problem today … unless, of course, the Church finds a way to "deprioritize" those values which conflict, like it did with women for the most part, through the rise of evangelical feminism in the form of "complementarianism" — an approach that was itself specifically formulated to preserve the cultural relevance of evangelicalism in the context of a broader culture that had definitively become feminist.

That leads me to where I see things going next. The gay sex and marriage issues have basically torn apart the mainline Churches in the last few decades, leading to various schisms in the Episcopal world (most recently the formation of the ACNA, which appears likely to be the main successor for traditionalist ex-Episcopalians), and the migration of a steady stream of remaining "orthodox" mainliners from rainbow mainline denominations like the PCUSA and ELCA to the non-mainline confessional versions like the PCA/OPC and LCMS/WELS. The Methodist warring parties had agreed to a split before COVID hit, and this year's general meeting was canceled — assuming that the split is approved eventually, we will have a schism in the huge Methodist Church, finally. (It will be interesting to see what the conservative Methodists actually look like, because I have never actually met a conservative Wesleyan, although to be fair, former U.S. President George W. Bush is one.)

Nadia Bolz-Weber, former self-described “dyke” (yet married to a man) and “Pastrix” in the mainline “Evangelical Lutheran Church of America”

Keep in mind, these schisms about the gay sex and marriage issues are happening in churches that are already overwhelmingly socially liberal.

It won’t end there. The same issues are going to rip apart the remainder of non-denominational churches, and it will play out differently, of course, because unlike the mainline, the non-denominational churches do not have the kind of church polity where a central assembly passes rules above the level of the congregation. The issue will instead ripple through congregation after congregation, causing massive generational schism, rival church plants, and a lot of public recrimination about the issue, all arguing about whether a compromise on the gay sex and marriage issues (similar to the complementarian compromise on feminism) is needed in order to avoid greatly damaging evangelization in a culture that has largely moved on from Christian teaching regarding homosexuality.

It’s already happening, of course, here and there. It will happen more, year after year, as the cultural pressure increases, and the desire to continue a Finney/Revival approach faces hard decisions in a culture where being on the “wrong side” of gay issues is increasingly viewed as akin to being a member of the KKK.

In summary, the fundamental elements of the revivalist model, which led to the phenomenal growth of evangelism in the United States and which are ingrained into American Christian culture, are likely to work against the church in the years ahead, in the context of a culture that becomes decisively anti-Christian, and which therefore is very hard for any Christian church to remain “culturally relevant” towards without compromising its own identity and core teachings and values. In fact, it appears likely that the deep-seated tendency of American Christians to think in terms of cultural relevancy will be deployed very effectively against the moral orthodoxy of American Christian churches in the years ahead.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Elimination of the Church (2020 May 29)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Frauds in Christ’s Name (2020 October 12)

The Sirach on Women

Jack · 8 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A good wife is the best thing a man can have in life. But evil women are conducive to ħəll.

Readership: Men; Married women; Women who are serious about marriage;
Length: 2,480 words;
Reading Time: 9 minutes;

Introduction

Σ Frame: What is a woman's desire for her husband according to Genesis 3:16? (2020 October 23)

Back when the comments were pouring in on this post, I decided to look up other books of wisdom from antiquity, to find out what they have to say about women, and whether we might gain any further understanding of the ancient Hebrew beliefs about creation, the fall, and the nature of men and women in relationship.

One book I found was the Sirach, also called Ecclesiasticus. Interestingly, the Sirach was translated as part of the KJV, and was included in the Bible for 274 years until it was removed in 1885 A.D.

The following excerpts cover all that the Sirach has to say about women. (…except about raising daughters. I want to save this topic for a separate post. &) The Sirach draws a sharp contrast between the good wife and evil wimmin, and gives specific admonitions about how to deal with women. So I've separated these passages into three sections, respectively.

The Good Wife

> [19] Forego not a wise and good woman: for her grace is above gold.
>
> Sirach 7:19 (KJV)

Forego not has a couple possible meanings. One is that you should be considerate and courteous. The other is that you shouldn't ignore her or disregard her.

> [1] In three things I was beautified, and stood up beautiful both before God and men: the unity of brethren, the love of neighbours, a man and a wife that agree together.
>
> Sirach 25:1 (KJV)

Find an agreeable woman to wife, duly noted.

> [7] There be nine things which I have judged in mine heart to be happy, and the tenth I will utter with my tongue: A man that hath joy of his children; and he that liveth to see the fall of his enemy.
> [8] Well is him that dwelleth with a wife of understanding, and that hath not slipped with his tongue, and that hath not served a man more unworthy than himself.
>
> Sirach 25:7-8 (KJV)

Click on the link to read the remaining five sources of happiness.

> [1] Blessed is the man that hath a virtuous wife, for the number of his days shall be double.
> [2] A virtuous woman rejoiceth her husband, and he shall fulfil the years of his life in peace.
> [3] A good wife is a good portion, which shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord.
>
> Sirach: 26:1-3 (KJV)

> [13] The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fatten his bones.
> [14] A silent and loving woman is a gift of the Lord; and there is nothing so much worth as a mind well instructed.
> [15] A shamefaced and faithful woman is a double grace, and her continent mind cannot be valued.
> [16] As the sun when it ariseth in the high heaven; so is the beauty of a good wife in the ordering of her house.
> [17] As the clear light is upon the holy candlestick; so is the beauty of the face in ripe age.
> [18] As the golden pillars are upon the sockets of silver; so are the fair feet with a constant heart.
>
> Sirach: 26:13-18 (KJV)

> [21] A woman will receive every man, yet is one daughter better than another.
> [22] The beauty of a woman cheereth the countenance, and a man loveth nothing better.
> [23] If there be kindness, meekness, and comfort, in her tongue, then is not her husband like other men.
> [24] He that getteth a wife beginneth a possession, a help like unto himself, and a pillar of rest.
> [25] Where no hedge is, there the possession is spoiled: and he that hath no wife will wander up and down mourning.

> Sirach 36:21-25 (KJV)

> [19] Children and the building of a city continue a man's name: but a blameless wife is counted above them both.
>
> Sirach 40:19 (KJV)

> [23] A friend and companion never meet amiss: but above both is a wife with her husband.
>
> Sirach 40:23 (KJV)

Evil Wimmin

> [26] Hast thou a wife after thy mind? forsake her not: but give not thyself over to a light woman.
>
> Sirach 7:26 (KJV)

Here, the word light is apparently entendre with multiple meanings. I reviewed some common definitions, and found some revealing metaphorical descriptions which may apply. These are summarized/paraphrased here in order of increasing relevancy.

1. She is glorified – spiritual illumination or awareness; enlightenment.
2. She's physically bright and emotionally buoyant – to cause (the face, surroundings, etc.) to brighten, especially with joy, animation, or the like; a gleam or sparkle in the eyes; the sensation produced by stimulating the organs of sight; something that makes things visible or affords illumination.
3. She's educated – mental insight; understanding.
4. She tries to assert/impose Frame – The aspect in which a thing appears or is regarded.

5. She's dominant – a person who is an outstanding leader, celebrity, or example; luminary.
6. She draws attention to herself – Revealing; the state of being visible, exposed to view, or revealed to public notice or knowledge; limelight.
7. She's sexually alluring – to turn on; to set burning.
8. She's flaky – avoiding serious thought; eschewing respectable behavior.
9. She's disrespectful – to make light is to insult, mock, taunt, or tease.

> [22] Thus shall it go also with the wife that leaveth her husband, and bringeth in an heir by another.
> [23] For first, she hath disobeyed the law of the most High; and secondly, she hath trespassed against her own husband; and thirdly, she hath played the whore in adultery, and brought children by another man.
> [24] She shall be brought out into the congregation, and inquisition shall be made of her children.
> [25] Her children shall not take root, and her branches shall bring forth no fruit.
> [26] She shall leave her memory to be cursed, and her reproach shall not be blotted out.
> [27] And they that remain shall know that there is nothing better than the fear of the Lord, and that there is nothing sweeter than to take heed unto the commandments of the Lord.
>
> Sirach 23:22-27 (KJV)

> [6] But a grief of heart and sorrow is a woman that is jealous over another woman, and a scourge of the tongue which communicateth with all.
> [7] An evil wife is a yoke shaken to and fro: he that hath hold of her is as though he held a scorpion.
> [8] A drunken woman and a gadder abroad [1] causeth great anger, and she will not cover her own shame.
> [9] The whoredom of a woman may be known in her haughty [2] looks and eyelids [3].
> [10] If thy daughter be shameless, keep her in straitly, lest she abuse herself through overmuch liberty.
> [11] Watch over an impudent [4] eye: and marvel not if she trespass [5] against thee.
> [12] She will open her mouth, as a thirsty traveller when he hath found a fountain, and drink of every water near her: by every hedge will she sit down, and open her quiver against every arrow [6].
>
> Sirach: 26:6-12 (KJV)

[1] Gad is an old word that means to move restlessly or aimlessly from one place to another. Gadfly is a related word that the reader may have heard before. In a modern context, a gadder abroad could be construed to mean a woman who travels frequently and/or extensively.
[2] Haughty is an old word that means disdainfully proud; snobbish; scornfully arrogant; supercilious.
[3] I am sure that the reference to eyelids means that she mockingly exaggerates her expressions with her eyelids. We've all seen women do this. This is a red flag I've never heard of before.
[4] I would interpret impudent as being essentially the same thing as the Manospherian descriptor, indignant.
[5] In addition to what is spelled out in verse 12, I also interpret trespass to mean that she feels entitled to rifle through your stuff (e.g. take things that she wants, trashes things she doesn't like, etc.), and go digging into your private matters (e.g. reading your e-mail, text messages, private diary, financial documents, etc.).
[6] The language in verse 12 are metaphors for sexual promiscuity.

-
-

How to Deal with Women

> [1] Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thyself.
> [2] Give not thy soul unto a woman to set her foot upon thy substance.
> [3] Meet not with an harlot, lest thou fall into her snares.
> [4] Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts.

> [5] Gaze not on a maid, that thou fall not by those things that are precious in her.
> [6] Give not thy soul unto harlots, that thou lose not thine inheritance.
> [7] Look not round about thee in the streets of the city, neither wander thou in the solitary place thereof.
> [8] Turn away thine eye from a beautiful woman, and look not upon another's beauty; for many have been deceived by the beauty of a woman; for herewith love is kindled as a fire.
> [9] Sit not at all with another man's wife, nor sit down with her in thine arms, and spend not thy money with her at the wine; lest thine heart incline unto her, and so through thy desire thou fall into destruction.
>
> Sirach 9:1-9 (KJV)

> [13] Give me any plague, but the plague of the heart: and any wickedness, but the wickedness of a woman:
> [14] And any affliction, but the affliction from them that hate me: and any revenge, but the revenge of enemies.
> [15] There is no head above the head of a serpent; and there is no wrath above the wrath of an enemy.
> [16] I had rather dwell with a lion and a dragon, than to keep house with a wicked woman.
> [17] The wickedness of a woman changeth her face, and darkeneth her countenance like sackcloth.
> [18] Her husband shall sit among his neighbours; and when he heareth it [7] shall sigh bitterly.
> [19] All wickedness is but little to the wickedness of a woman: let the portion of a sinner fall upon her.
> [20] As the climbing up a sandy way is to the feet of the aged, so is a wife full of words to a quiet man.
> [21] Stumble not at the beauty of a woman, and desire her not for pleasure.
> [22] A woman, if she maintain [8] her husband, is full of anger, impudence, and much reproach.
> [23] A wicked woman abateth the courage, maketh an heavy countenance and a wounded heart: a woman that will not comfort her husband in distress maketh weak hands and feeble knees.
> [24] Of the woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die.
> [25] Give the water no passage [9]; neither a wicked woman liberty to gad abroad [1].
> [26] If she go not as thou wouldest have her, cut her off from thy flesh, and give her a bill of divorce, and let her go.
>
> Sirach 25:13-26 (KJV)

[7] Presumably her voice, or any other characteristic sound of her presence.
[8] I presume the word maintain means to assert; declare; stubbornly defend one's argument. In other words, she's being a contentious termagant.
[9] By a mythical/prophetic interpretation, I sense this would mean that you shouldn't admit her argument, and not let her rant and rave without constraints being imposed.

Verse 26 – Wow! An admonition in favor of divorce! Presumably for her distrust or unsubmissiveness. And this is in the Catholic Bible!

> [19] My son, keep the flower of thine age sound; and give not thy strength to strangers.
> [20] When thou hast gotten a fruitful possession through all the field, sow it with thine own seed, trusting in the goodness of thy stock.
> [21] So thy race which thou leavest shall be magnified, having the confidence of their good descent.
>
> Sirach: 26:19-21 (KJV)

I interpret this passage as meaning that a successful man should be confident in his genetic superiority, and should not hesitate to have children.

> [6] Sure keeping is good, where an evil wife is; and shut up, where many hands are.
>
> Sirach 42:6 (KJV)

In other words, if you have a wife with an evil will, then you'll have to constantly watch your back and hide everything important or of value.

Conclusions

The Sirach has a few verses that compare good and evil women.

> [22] An harlot shall be accounted as spittle; but a married woman is a tower against death to her husband.
> [23] A wicked woman is given as a portion to a wicked man: but a godly woman is given to him that feareth the Lord.
> [24] A dishonest woman contemneth shame: but an honest woman will reverence her husband.
> [25] A shameless woman shall be counted as a dog; but she that is shamefaced will fear the Lord.
> [26] A woman that honoureth her husband shall be judged wise of all; but she that dishonoureth him in her pride shall be counted ungodly of all.
> [27] A loud crying woman and a scold shall be sought out to drive away the enemies.
>
> Sirach: 26:22-27 (KJV)

Verse 27 is hilarious!

Overall, almost half of the verses about women describe them as good. Of the other half, about 2/3 describe women as evil, and 1/3 that compares those that are good and evil. That is 20, 14, and 7 verses, respectively. That's probably a healthy balance to maintain one's attitude towards women in general.

Finally, I'll compile all of this into two concise lists of green flags and red flags.

Good women are described as…

- a friend and companion
- a hedge of protection and resource conservation
- a pillar of rest
- a prized possession
- agreeable
- beautiful
- blameless
- discreet
- godly
- good
- graceful
- helpful
- honest
- one who honors her husband
- one who possesses a tongue that is kind, meek, and gives comfort
- peaceful
- quiet
- shamefaced
- understanding
- virtuous
- wise

Evil women are described as…

- a drunkard
- angry
- barren
- being full of words
- being hated by others
- being like a scorpion
- churlish
- defiled
- haughty (disdainfully proud; snobbish; scornfully arrogant; supercilious)
- impudent (indignant)
- jealous
- light (annoyingly and disrespectfully honest; unwilling to suffer or sacrifice)
- misbehaving
- one who abandons her husband
- one who has a scourging tongue
- one who has children out of wedlock, or by more than one man
- one who moves restlessly or aimlessly from one place to another, or one who travels abroad frequently

- promiscuous in her youth, and adulterous as an adult
- one who rouses anger
- one who spoils or wastes possessions
- one who uses her eye lids over expressively
- one who will not comfort others
- shameful
- the laughingstock of the community
- the subject of gossip and reproach
- trespassing
- wicked, and thinking nothing of it

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: The Sirach on Women (2018 May 20)
- Cornerstone: How to be a good wife (2020 November 5)

Complementarians are Effeminate!

Jack · 9 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

…and married men who tolerate unsubmissive, disrespectful wives are going to ɦəl1 in a handjob.

Readership: Christian men;

Fellow blogger Lexet sent me some screenshots he took about a year ago from It's Good To Be A Man's Faceb00k page. He said they went on a spree of posting bizarre interpretations of scripture, and then deleted some posts and comments, and started blocking anyone who raised any questions.

This one caught my attention.

> "You're being far more precious with language than Scripture is. "Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, no effeminate, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor the covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers, will inherit the kingdom of God" (1st Corinthians 6:9-10). It is effeminate to unrepentantly fail to rule your family."

Here, the author (presumably either Tim Bayly or Bnonn Tennant) cites 1st Corinthians 6:9-10 from the NASB…

> "Do not be deceived; neither… nor effeminate, nor homosexuals, …will inherit the Kingdom of God."

In this passage, both the effeminate and h0m0sexuals are mentioned specifically, which implies that there is a distinction between the two. The original Greek for effeminate (μαλακοὶ) suggests perversion of some sort, cross-dressing, a tr@nsvestite, or a catamite, whereas the subsequent term, h0m0sexual (ἀρσενοκοῖται) is synonymous with sodomite. I suppose that the difference between the two is that h0m0sexuals are shucking in the corn hole, while effeminates might be those who refrain from the impalement exercises but who dress up in drag and/or play the social role of the part. Another wild but somewhat plausible interpretation is that sodomites are the dominant drivers, or "ones", and effeminates are their receptive targets, or "zeros", but I kinda doubt that St. Paul would be so exacting about the particular positions.

But then Bnonn concludes,

> "It is effeminate to unrepentantly fail to rule your family."

I did a double take when I read this. Bnonn is essentially saying (in PC approved language) that every married man who is not in a Headship structured relationship is literally a ph@gg! LMAO!!!

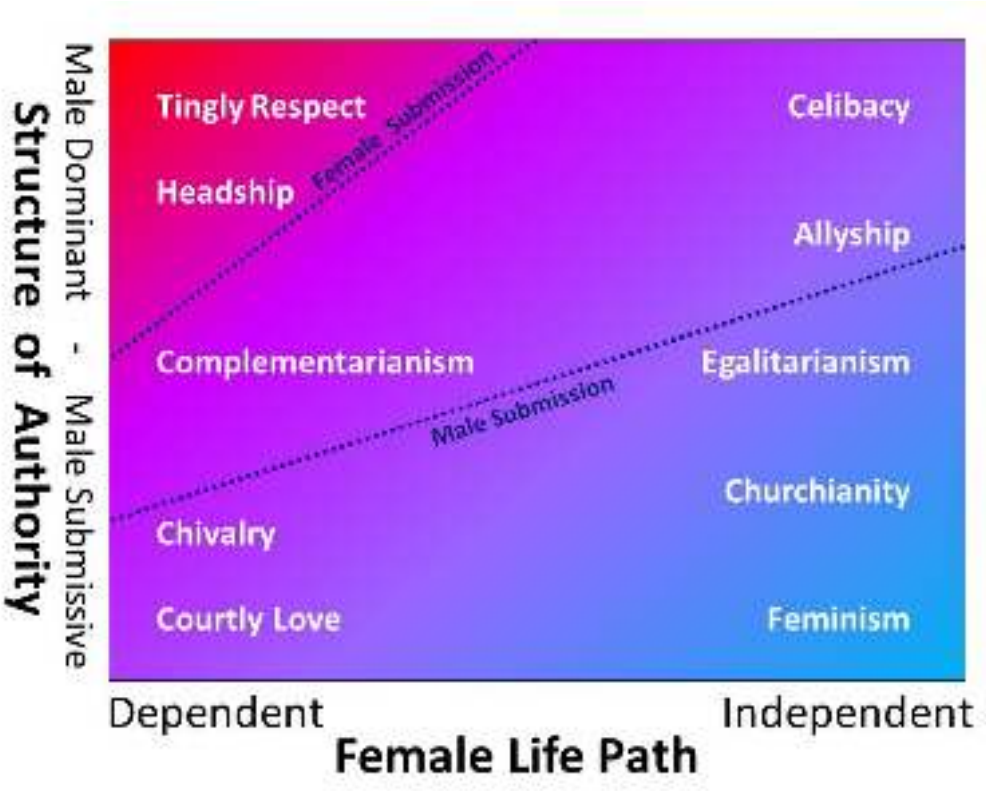
I had to go take a look at the article cited at Warhorn Media (Tim Bayly): Confessions of a Repenting Effeminate (2019 August 22). The gist of his message is somewhat obscured behind the Greek terms, μαλακοὶ and ἀρσενοκοῖται, which mean effeminate and h0m0sexual, respectively. But sure enough, that's what he was saying.

After discussing the difference between effeminate and h0m0sexuality, he offers a long testimony leading to the following epiphany.

> "What made this a harder pill to swallow than it otherwise would have been was that I was doing a lot of things that I know to be good—disciplining and catechizing our children, leading family worship, making sure we were serving in church. And while it was not all a sham, it was certainly a bargain I had made with my sinful flesh to go so far in the way of leading my family and no farther; I would do the things I liked and not the things I did not.
>
> Certainly, there was more sin involved in my failures than just effeminacy, but I have come to understand that effeminacy was at the root of it all. Fundamentally, effeminacy is a refusal by a man to occupy the place and role he should in a given relationship. I stepped back when I could, only did difficult things when my unwillingness to do so would have made plain what I sought to keep hidden about myself. I complained loudly of work at home because I had the sense to keep such complaints out of my friend groups, church family, and workplace."

Look at how Bayly defines effeminacy (in boldface). He is adapting the word effeminate to mean wimpy or spineless, which is truly a part of what effeminacy is, but being a püssy whipped husband is different from being a limp wristed drag queen. St. Paul doesn't say that pusillanimous men would not inherit the Kingdom of God, but Bayly makes this claim by implying that effeminate means mousy, or that being wimpy is a form of faithlessness. Granted, I'm sure the latter is true in most cases.

According to my earlier study of Marriage Structures and Archetypical Models (2020 September 28), the proper place and role a man should hold in marriage is one of dominant authority. So Bayly's description of effeminate husbands would include Complementarians!



Going further, according to Bayly's interpretation of 1st Corinthians 6:9-10, this essentially means that every married man who willingly subscribes to the servant leadership bit, every husband who tolerates his wife's disrespect and insubordination, is an effeminate, and is therefore excluded from the Kingdom of God!

Therefore, if we applied Bayly's eisegesis to all married men in general, then that would condemn about 80-90% of all churchgoing men today!

Bayly's honesty is laudable, but actually, this was his own personal lesson, which may not be applied to every married man in general. Even so, I have the opinion that the gist of Bayly's main point is more or less correct, in spite of his technical error.

I'm sure some chivalrous Complementarians and Egalitarians will cringe at this.

Related

- Do What's Right: Sexual Identity and the Big Picture (2014 December 17)

Progressive

Jack · 10 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Progressive Christianity is neither Progressive nor Christian. It's more like Conservative Hereticism.

Readership: Red Pilled Christians;

Introduction

In early September, I was honored to find that Dark Brightness dedicated a post, The state of things (Thanks Jack) (2020 September 5), to review what I had written about what has been happening in the Manosphere, as reported in the post, Moon Day Review – The Manosphere Reshuffles its Deck (2020 September 2).

In this post, DB reiterated a few statements I've made in previous posts about the Red Pill schism that has occurred this year, resulting in a philosophical divergence between secular RP and Christian RP.

> "In many of my past posts, I (as well as Deep Strength) have alluded to these differences between the secular Red Pill, and the Christianized Red Pill…
>
> The separation and distinction of the Christian Covenant structure from the Red Pill praxeology is an important and pivotal development. The Red Pill is largely an amoral description of human psychology and behavior, whereas the Christian Covenant recognizes human psychology and behavior, but adds to this awareness an aspiration to a God-ordained ideal.
>
> I propose that the Christian exegesis of Red Pill precepts should be called something else, just to be more specific and to avoid confusion in future discussions."

This post will address one such precept – what is meant by "progressive"?

The Confusion surrounding the word "Progressive"

> "The whole modern world has divided itself into Conservatives and Progressives. The business of Progressives is to go on making mistakes. The business of Conservatives is to prevent mistakes from being corrected."
>
> G. K. Chesterton

Descent of the Modernists, by E. J. Pace (1922)

In the same post linked above, DB highlighted a page on Σ Frame, Red Pill Clique Bate, in which I described Dark Brightness and other blogs like Adam Piggott (Pushing Rubber Downhill), Cane Caldo (Things That We Have Heard and Known), Dalrock, Larry Kummer (Fabius Maximus), and Vox Popoli as being "Progressive Protestant". Here, I defined "progressive" as "favoring or advocating progress, change, improvement, or reform, as opposed to wishing to maintain things as they are – not to be confused with the "Left" or "Liberal"." On this, DB wrote,

> "Jack [assessed my blog] correctly, when he noted that I am aiming for reform of the church and ourselves. We should always promote such. Despair leads to sloth, an abandonment of effort."

Dark Brightness added a personal message to me in a footnote.

> "Jack, progressive == socialist == satanic. You need to change your vocabulary."

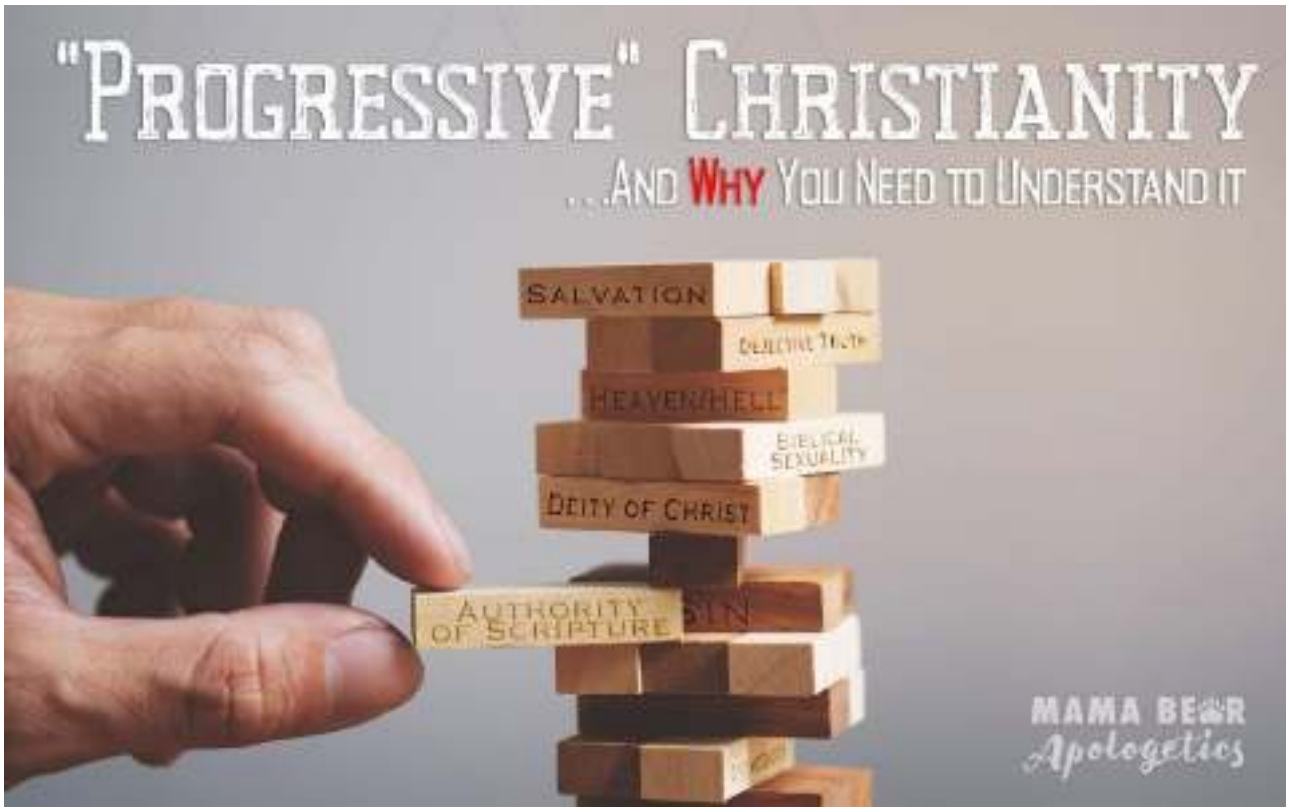
I agree with DB that the word progressive has been adulterated by Leftism. Progressive Christianity has a connotation of including theological convergence, Critical Race Theory, Feminism, and Intersectional fluff, among other things.

To make this distinction clear to the reader, I'll offer a few cases of contusion.

- The website Patheos describes itself as Progressive Christian. Enuff sed.
- The website Progressive Christianity lists 8 Points of Progressive Christianity. Point 3 says, "Seek and create community that is inclusive of ALL people, including but not limited to: …agnostics, Those of all sexual orientations and all gender identities… Those historically marginalized..."
- The page on Progressive Christianity at Wikipedia states,

> "Progressive Christianity represents a post-modern theological approach, and is not necessarily synonymous with progressive politics. It developed out of the Liberal Christianity of the modern era, which was rooted in enlightenment thinking. As such, Progressive Christianity is a "post-liberal movement" within Christianity

> "that seeks to reform the faith via the insights of post-modernism and a reclaiming of the truth beyond the verifiable historicity and factuality of the passages in the Bible by affirming the truths within the stories that may not have actually happened"."



Not much has changed since 1922. Is this truly Progressivism? It seems more like Conservative Modernism.

> "Progressive Christianity is characterized by a willingness to question tradition, acceptance of human diversity, a strong emphasis on social justice and care for the poor and the oppressed, and environmental stewardship of the earth. Progressive Christians have a deep belief in the centrality of the instruction to "love one another" (John 15:17) within the teachings of Jesus Christ. This leads to a focus on promoting values such as compassion, justice, mercy, and tolerance, often through political activism. Though prominent, the movement is by no means the only significant movement of progressive thought among Christians.
>
> Progressive Christianity draws on the insights of multiple theological streams including evangelicalism, liberalism, neo-orthodoxy, pragmatism, postmodernism, Progressive Reconstructionism, and liberation theology. The concerns of feminism are also a major influence on the movement, as expressed in feminist and womanist theologies."

According to this description, Progressive Christianity is little more than cherry picking certain Christian teachings and coopting them to support the purposes of the wider post-modern Intersectional Feminist movement. If we leave out the word Christian and the references to Christianity, and add in some socio-political-economic rhetoric from Kant and J. S. Mill, then this wouldn't read much differently from a description of Progressivism! (Click on the link if you don't believe me.)

Obviously, the word progressive cannot be used to refer to a return to Covenant theology, Biblical Law, and the Natural Order described by the Christian Red Pill. This word needs to be revised or replaced in order to avoid unnecessary confusion (and offence).

Exit Questions:

1. What are your thoughts about Christian progressivism?

2. What is a better word that we can use to describe “favoring or advocating progress, change, improvement, or reform, as opposed to wishing to maintain things as they are”?

Related

- Alisa Childers: 5 Ways Progressive Christianity and New Age Spirituality Are Kind of the Same Thing (2018 March 6)
- Decision Magazine (Jerry Pierce): The Lie of ‘Progressive Christianity’ (2019 June 1)
- The Gospel Coalition (Ian Harber): ‘Progressive’ Christianity: Even Shallower Than the Evangelical Faith I Left (2020 March 7)

Patheological Weddingsday – Leithart on Purity and Holiness

Jack · 11 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Leithart's first article about Purity and Holiness was deleted from Patheos!

Readership: Christians;

A few weeks ago, I found that Dr. Peter Leithart wrote three articles about Purity at Patheos. These are listed below.

1. Patheos (Peter Leithart): Myths of Purity (2017 October 12)
2. Patheos (Peter Leithart): Purity and Holiness 1 (2017 October)
3. Patheos (Peter Leithart): Purity and Holiness 2 (2017 October 7)

I had planned to critique these three articles as a series, but since I published the first one, Leithart's Myths of Purity (2020 October 28), something interesting has happened.

The second article above was wiped clean from Patheos!

Leithart's Purity and Holiness doesn't exist!

I didn't bother to copy the text or take any screenshots, but the third article seems different from when I read it earlier. I remember that it was written in an editorial format. But now it is a rigorous exegesis of Old Testament passages about purity. It's actually pretty well written, so I won't bother to review it.

However, I can't help but wonder… Whatever happened to the second post?

I can only suppose that Leithart or someone at Patheos had read my critique and decided to revise these articles. Anyway, I'm glad to see that there has been a responsible response.

What is the Authority of the Bible, and why is this Important?

Novaseeker · 12 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How much authority you grant the Bible, determines how the Bible will affect your understanding of God and human nature.

Readership: Christians;
Author's Note: This essay was coauthored by Nova Seeker and Jack.

Introduction

Concerning the authority of the Bible, there are basically four positions, summarized in the following four truth statements.

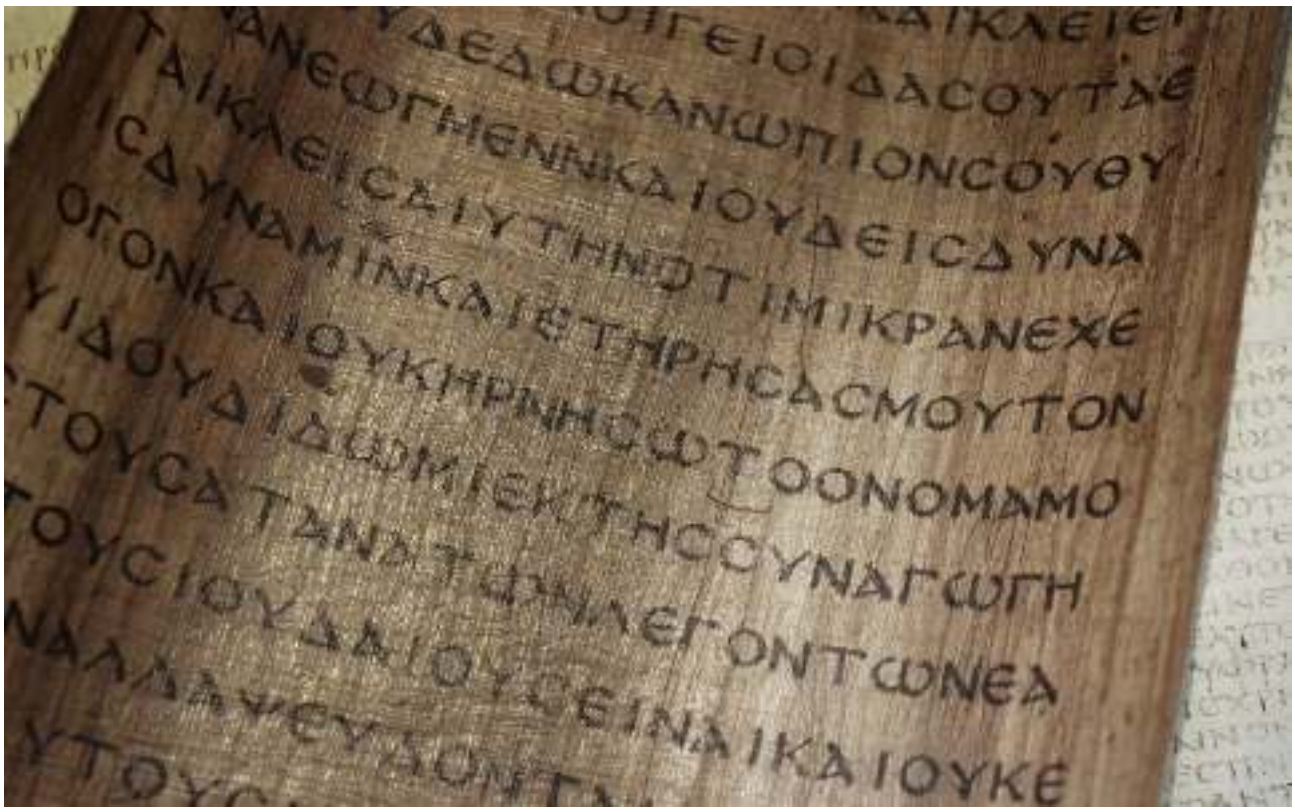
1. The Bible is a book of wisdom, written in figurative language, and rich in allusion, metaphor, and hyperbole, among many other rhetorical devices.
2. The Bible is an anthropological artifact – a historical record of Ancient Near East (ANE) Hebrew literature.
3. The scriptures are God breathed! The Bible was written by great men of faith, inspired by the Holy Spirit.
4. God spoke, men wrote! The Bible is the infallible Word of God.

These views are listed in order of increasing authority being ascribed to the scriptures.

1. Most people can readily accept the first, in conceding that the Bible has philosophical and literary value.
2. The second point is a little harder, as it requires one to accept the assertion that the Bible is true and historically accurate.
3. The third point is where we begin to separate the true believers — those who recognize the power of faith and the work of the Holy Spirit.
4. The fourth point ascribes all authority of the Holy Scriptures to God Himself. This is where people begin to stumble, and are therefore hesitant to accept this as last statement as truth.

The question is, how far down the list will we venture to accept as truth?

For the remainder of this essay, I'm going to focus on the differences between (2), (3), and (4), because this is actually the source of the Dissemination and Dissolution behind the current day church.



How Differences in the Recognition of Biblical Authority Play Out

First, we note that (3) is only different from (2) in that the former recognizes the power and authority of the Holy Spirit. But if we consider the relative similarities and differences between two human writings, one of which is 3,000 years old and one of which is 10 years old, and both are written through inspiration by men of faith, then we are left to treat these two writings as more or less equal in authority. At this point, many humans will have many reasons to test the value of each one according to the applicable relevancy.

About the difference between (3) and (4), if the Bible is only considered to be the faith-inspired religious writings of religious humans who were living a long time ago — to be revered in some ways, but not to be considered binding, and to be considered fallible in places, contradictory in others, and certainly nothing God spoke or specifically instructed – then the Bible becomes "ancient human written words about God", albeit written by men of faith, rather than the "revealed eternal Word of God".

These are two very different things, obviously.

1. The former is fallible, contradictory, and not binding.
2. The latter is infallible and doesn't contradict itself, and is binding eternally.

Once you engage in that shift, the entire game changes. If the Bible is simply "ancient, human-written words about God", then it is not inherently more truthful or accurate than any contemporary, human-written words about God.

Comparing the Conservative vs. Progressive Views of Scripture

The conservative view accepts that the source that is 3,000 years old is very likely to have an accurate understanding of any number of things, as compared to the more recent writing. This is because the older source has weathered the test of time, and still continues to speak to the human soul. It has also survived through all the human strife and warfare over the millennia, which suggests that God must have had a hand in preserving it. So from this perspective, these ancient human writings which were sincerely inspired by the genuine faith of people who lived 2000 years ago and longer, carry a weighty authority. Those who read the ancient texts with an eye to discern what in them is still "relevant" today, 2000 years later, tend to come to the conclusion that human nature is the same, and that God has never changed. Thus, the conservative view embraces the eternal, infallible aspects of point (4).

The "Progressive" view postulates that the source that is 3,000 years old is invariably considered to be much more likely to have an inaccurate understanding of any number of things, as compared to the more recent writing, due to lower levels of human knowledge about any number of things at the time. So if we're really just dealing with ancient human writings which were sincerely inspired by the genuine faith of people who lived 2000 years ago and longer, most people will approach them with a more skeptical eye so as to discern what in them is still "relevant" today, 2000 years later, and what is, by comparison, "out of date". Thus, the "Progressive" view stops at point (3).

How Differences in the Recognition of Biblical Authority Undermine the Church

This regression from (4) to (3), and even to (2) is, in fact, precisely what we have seen done in the church over the past few decades. This is especially true when it comes to what Paul has written about various matters of Christian moral behavior and church discipline, most recently concerning the ordination of women to ministry, and then the status of homosexual sex and the permissibility of homosexual "marriages".

What is being done in these cases is that the Pauline epistles are being regarded as a human writing from an era long past, and therefore "out of date" in many ways. Instead of scrutinizing any contextual differences that might affect the exegesis, these are routinely ignored. Disregarding the cultural context is fine, because Paul's "ancient words about God", are still intact in their "spiritual" content. But the more "human" aspects of them are "updated" by ignoring the central underlying truths about God and human nature, all in favor of a more recent, post-modern interpretation, which St. Paul could not have had. The principle behind this approach is that it is immaterial what Paul "intended", because Paul was writing his own religious ideas, inspired by his faith in God, which were based on the context in which he lived — so we can ignore the matters he writes about that we think are different from the context in which we live, such as matters pertaining to women, marriage, sex and so on.

The whole thing is fallacious (and arrogant), of course, but it's based on a demotion of the status of the Bible from the infallible Word of God to a collection of fallible "ancient writings about God".

Related

- Empathologism: The words don't add up to nuthin (2015 July 5)
- Christianity and Masculinity: The Scriptures, Tradition, and Canon (2016 September 23)

The Parable of the Bonsai

Jack · 13 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Moulding a wife is like trimming a shrub.

Readership: Men;

When I was much younger, my grandfather often paid me some money to do some odd jobs for him. He would always help me get started. For example, when I painted his garage, he showed me how to open the paint can without damaging the seal, how to stir the paint thoroughly without spilling a drop, how to hold the brush, and how to apply the paint so that it would be smooth and glossy after it dried. Then he would sit in a lawn chair and watch me work to make sure I was doing the job properly. He always paid me really well, and I was thankful for the experience and his instruction.

One time, when I was about 10 years old, my grandfather paid me some money to trim the shrubs in front of his house. But this time was different. He just gave me the electric trimmers and went into the house. He didn't watch me work as was his custom. This was my first time trimming shrubs so I really didn't know anything about it, and he hadn't given me much instruction. I worked on it a long time. I didn't think I should cut any of the larger branches, so the overall shape of the shrub turned out to be asymmetrical, lumpy, and misshapen, based on the natural structure of the branches. I simply trimmed the shrubs to be smooth and round. But after I was finished, he was unhappy with my work because I did not cut the shrubs into a square shape as he had wanted.

Now that I have my own shrubs, I understand what he wanted and how he felt. What my grandfather failed to teach me in this instance is that before I begin trimming, I should have an idea of what the shrub should look like when I'm finished.

In The Karate Kid, Mr. Miyagi teaches Daniel how to trim a bonsai tree.

Daniel: I don't know how to do this stuff. I don't want to mess it up.

Mr. Miyagi: Close eye. Trust. Concentrate. Think only tree. Think about a picture down to trunk to pine needle. Wipe the mind clean, except for tree. Nothing exists, whole world, just tree. […] Remember picture? Make like picture. Just trust picture.

Daniel: How do I know if it's the right one?

Mr. Miyagi: If it comes from inside you, it is always the right one.

I've learned that moulding a woman is kind of the same way. You need to have an idea of what she should be — what God made her to be — and shape her in that way. You need to trim with care and precision. And as I learned from the experience of trimming my grandfather's shrubs, sometimes you have to lop off some big ugly branches in order to teach her propriety and make her attractive.

Moreover, instead of playing the "nice guy" who swallows the "all wimmin are princesses" narrative, it would be much wiser for a man to be more critical and demanding of a woman, especially in the beginning stages of the relationship. The Manosphere describes this approach as "making her qualify herself". If she can't, or absolutely won't, then a man might be wise to give her an explanation about why she is unsuitable, throw her back, and wait for another to come along.

If you're already married, then moulding her will be more difficult because you have a history of ingrained habits to work through. You'll still need to become more critical and demanding, but you'll also need to be patient, graceful, and loving, and know when to back off when she's reached her limit. It may take a while to see fruit, even years.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Challenge of Demanding Excellence (2018 March 11)
- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (2018 June 26)
- Σ Frame: Washing Her Clean (2019 October 21)
- Σ Frame: Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020 February 14)

Deriving Doctrine

Jack · 14 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Christian education should cover the basics, and only the basics.

Readership: Christians;

> "A little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism; but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion."
>
> Francis Bacon

Sir Francis Bacon (1561-1626), the father of the Scientific Method.

Introduction

In the post Progressive (2020 November 10), I took a smack at revising the Red Pill lexicon, but judging by the responses in the comments, the rot goes deep – much deeper than just the name. Revising the name is the least of our concerns.

Since then, NovaSeeker and I addressed what we believe is the main error behind Progressive Christianity: What is the Authority of the Bible, and why is this Important? (2020 November 12).

In the comments, Cameron said,

> "I don't understand how scripture could be described as an "authority" anyway. Authorities make decisions, act. The Bible doesn't self-interpret."

The power of the scriptures is not imposed by force, so to speak. It remains up to the individual to read it, believe it, and apply it. Thus, the Bible only has the amount of authority over one's life that one is willing to specifically grant to it. The basic question posed in this post is about how much authority it should be granted, and what are the practical outcomes of granting different degrees of authority to scripture?

Cameron is right in asserting that authorities make decisions, and act. In this case, the believer makes decisions based on his faith in the authority of the Bible. Much of that authority waits to be discovered by the believer.

Granted, this is not a simple matter. Cameron and Lance Roberts argued about whether the Bible is self-interpreting. Let's compare these statements…

> "The Bible doesn't self-interpret."

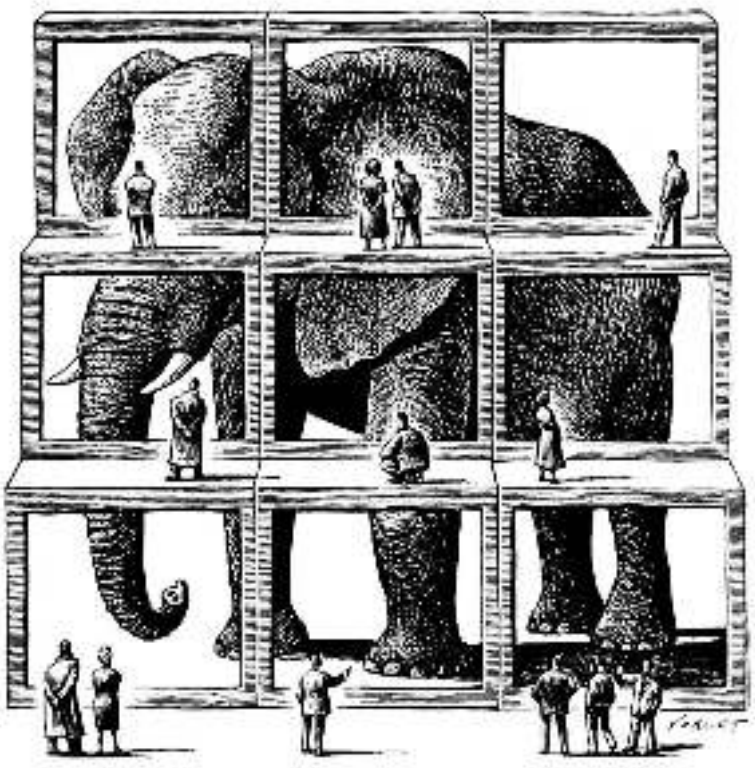
versus

> "…the number one rule of hermeneutics was "context is everything!"

And…

> "I think the Bible interpreting itself fits into context is everything because the Bible is the context."

I think all of these statements are true. A self-interpretative reading of the Bible is largely dependent on the reader's understanding of the context. If you can understand the context, then the Bible is more or less self-explanatory. But the thing is, the Bible stands alone as a monolithic authority, and it doesn't explain the context for every single passage. So if you can't latch on to the contextual differences somehow, then the Bible appears to be stocked full of confusing contradictions.



Progressive Christianity doesn't care about the context!

Anyway, it's good for us to be aware of these things. But the issue with Progressive Christianity is not about determining the context or the interpretation, it is about how much authority the Bible should be granted. Scott latched on to this.

> "I'm not sure if I would characterize it as "confusion" around the term progressive.
>
> Conflating "progress" with generally leftward movement (or movement in the direction of fewer and fewer objective standards) appears to be quite deliberate. Those who do that are not confused at all. They truly believe that moral progress is inevitable and that its long arc only goes one direction."

One common thread I've found to be woven into many popular manifestations of evil is the central belief that life is a carnal carnival, or that it could be so if certain people would woke up and get with the program. Granted, at face value, this is a good thing. But it becomes sin when we try to implement it as a default vehicle for common redemption. Humans cannot woke up and get with the program by their own good intentions, social service, virtue, willpower, or any other device. This is a central tenet of the gospel.

Lexet detected the method of apostasy when he wrote [emphasis mine],

> "The descent to unbelief starts when doctrines and man made works [of doctrinal hermeneutics and philosophy] take precedent over reading plain scripture.
>
> Mankind wants to make things complex and heavily organized (Rome). So they develop doctrines that stem from interpretations. Rather than teach the following generations how they derived those doctrines, they add onto those doctrines.
>
> E.g.: most Calvinists cannot read scripture and tell you how TULIP came about. Most cannot describe TULIP itself. They can grasp tertiary doctrines though.
>
> Most churches don't teach scripture. They will say they do, while ignoring significant passages of the Bible. (Another example, Calvinist churches avoid [the gospel of] John, John's epistles, Revelation, and Mark/Luke like the plague, and for a reason.)"

Lexet elucidates a very important point (in bold). Understanding how doctrines (and theories) are derived is monumentally important towards achieving a mastery of the subject. This is how a subject should be taught – going over the primary facts, and deriving the secondary theories. Tertiary extrapolations should not be taught, but should be left to the student.

The Truths of the Scripture (or any complex subject) must be internalized

This is exactly how I was taught. When I was an undergrad studying physics, I had to work through the mathematical derivations for things like Einstein's Special Relativity, Euler's Formula, Gauss' Law, and Heisenberg's Uncertainty Principle. I remember spending about two to three weeks to work through each one. Continuum Mechanics and the Schrödinger's Equation took me about six weeks. Whenever I began working on one of these problems, I had the sense that I was pecking away at numbers and symbols that meant absolutely nothing to me. It seemed so incomprehensible, like mysterious hieroglyphics. But in each case, after a period of immersion in which I worked through the factors and the equations, there eventually came a very sudden and distinctive "A-ha!" moment, in which the cryptic puzzle suddenly transformed into an intuitive common sense about the nature of the thing. After that, I didn't need to rely on a formula to be able to assess or predict the outcome of a given interaction. I could just look at the factors and get a fairly accurate idea of the interaction and the results.

But after supper at the end of the day, I retired to my room to listen to New Wave Funk and Alt-Rock, and play a game of chess with my classmate. We exchanged erudite jokes and metaphors related to these scientific principles, adorned ourselves with pipes and strange hats, and mockingly pretended to be edumacated. In these humble moments, I realized that, aside from the thrill of excelling in my studies, I was still a poor, struggling student, friends were still friends, God was still God, chicks were still flaky, the cafeteria food was still bland, and I still got forked in Chess.

I had the same experience when I first came across the Manosphere. At first, when I saw the Red Pill dialect – all those inscrutable words and terms: Alpha, Dark Triad, hamster, hypergamy, Machiavellianism, r/K selection, Sigma, $ћ!t tests… and those acronyms! AWALT, IOIs, MGTOW, MMV, PUA, SMV, … It was entirely indecipherable to me. But I immersed myself in reading Roissy, Dalrock, Illimitable Men, Rollo, Zippy Catholic, et al., compared notes, and studied the concepts until that "A-ha!" moment came. After that, I was able to see how my own experiences fit into these theories like my hand in a glove.

But in the final, I feel a little annoyed with God, or led down by the church, or something like that. I mean, why couldn't I have learned these basic truths about human nature from the Bible, or my prayers, or my father, or my pastor? Why could I only learn these things from godless men like Roissy, and from enduring sordid life experiences like divorce and screwing around with wimmin?

There seems to have been a failure in the priesthood.

One important thing I've learned (which you'll never hear in any church) is that you can't encompass the subject of sanctification without discussing sex. But the church won't touch this subject, so secular culture has to take up the slack (and is quite happy to do so).

Nova Seeker pointed out the subterfuged response to the slack.

> And what is the new content? Generally speaking, it is something people call "moralistic therapeutic Deism", coupled with a generous helping of progressive social politics and morals, cooked together into a new stew of progressive pseudo-Christianity. Something that looks Christian and speaks Christian in terms of its words and symbols, but embodies a different worldview, a different moral system, and a different substance altogether in terms of what it teaches, if anything at all beyond merest Deism, therapeutic spiritual assistance, and new progressive social mores (tolerance, affirmation, affirmative consent, equity, etc.).

Yes, this is what is served up by the worldly system. But are we serving anything more delicious or nutritious?

Happy Meal*, by Kelly Gilleran.*

Concluding Statements

The intuitive knowledge that characterizes the mastery of a subject can be gained by spending years working with that particular phenomenon in a laboratory, or industry, or marriage.

Much of the value of an education is that you can obtain the same mastery within weeks, as opposed to spending years in the field.

After achieving a mastery of each concept, one gains nothing less than a sense of confidence about understanding and navigating through life and the physical world, and perhaps even controlling or evading some parts of it. All those weeks (or years) of work, just to say, "I did it!" and "I can do it!" This capability is valuably efficacious for a man.

The thing is, you can't really afford to spend years in the field learning things like basic Christian doctrine and Godly principles of marriage. The cost is too great, as I have found.

It's much better to spend a few weeks in study, and then enter into life with a winning chance, rather than to waste precious years learning the same lessons through failure.

Currently, the church offers us nothing in this regard. In fact, it teaches a lot of converged values and worldly philosophies instead, if any at all.

Exit Question: What subjects should be taught in Sunday school or catechism for the post-adolescent age group?

Related

- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020 March 20)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Life education beats the smarm 2020 May 6)
- Σ Frame: The need for Marriage Education (2020 May 15)
- Dark Brightness: Theology is the Queen of Sciences. (2020 November 12)

The Red Pill and Blue Pill as Paradigms of Sanctification and Defilement (with a mathematical analogy)

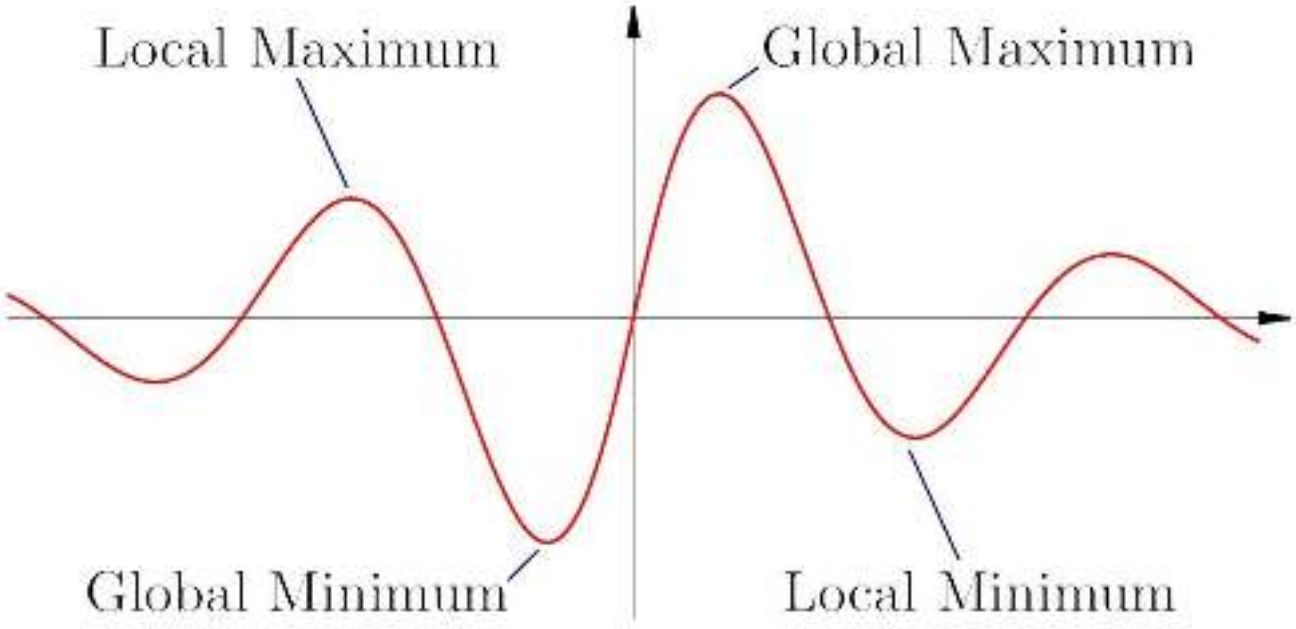
Jack · 15 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Noyce goys are defiled by the BP mindset, but they carry the notion that they're 'sanctified'!

Readership: Christians
Length: 2,250 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes
Note: Scare quotes indicate a false impression of sanctification, defilement, etc.

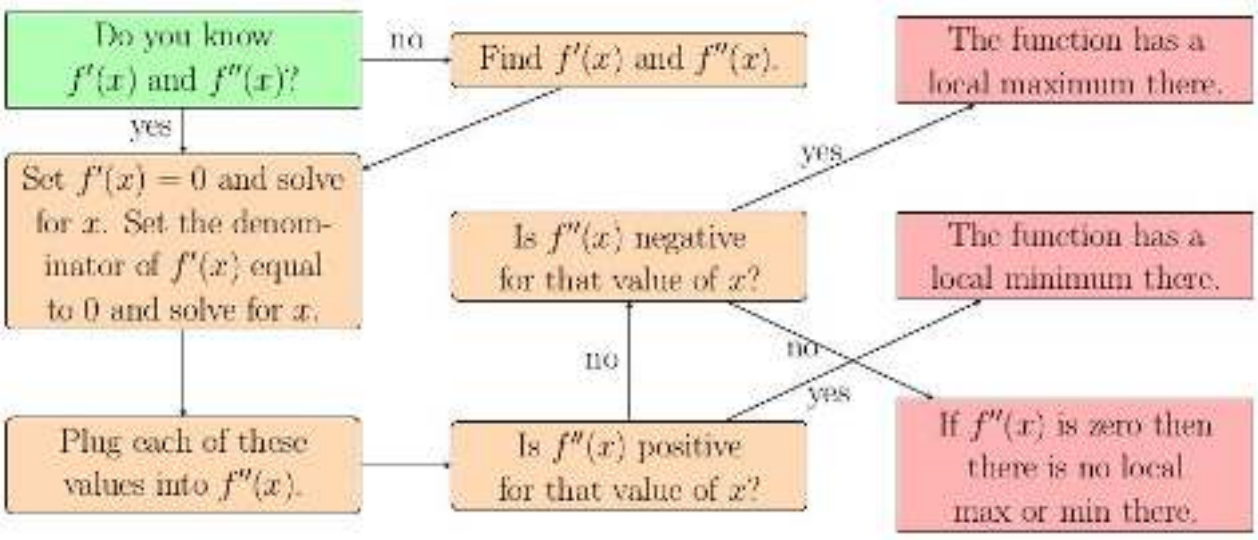
Introduction

If one is in a relatively comfortable and secure place in life, then to pose a mathematical analogy, this is like being situated on a local extrema, either a maximum or a minimum. One's perception and experience of this state can be construed (or misconstrued) as a form of sanctification. Whether it is a true sanctification depends on whether one is situated at a global maximum, as opposed to a local maximum.



The task of navigating through life can be confusing, because in order to move from a local maximum to a global maximum, one needs to first go through a local minimum. Many individuals cannot envision the glories of the distant global maximum which lie beyond the hardships and horrors of the nearby local minimum. As a result, they remain stuck in a less than ideal comfort zone.

To illustrate how a false sense of sanctification can be deceiving – and blinding, I'll cover three case studies of how people can get stuck in a local extrema – a comfort zone — thinking that they've finished the race of faith to the global maximum in this life.



Case Study 1 – Overcoming the Blue Pill mindset

Men largely operate on principles of honor and respect, while women function in terms of perceived love and connection. The typical, chumpy, good natured man, who is so despised in the eyes of women, unconsciously sticks to those principles of honor and respect in all his dealings with humanity – including women. Whenever he is attracted to a woman, he emphasizes being nice, considerate, forbearing, and graceful, which he correctly believes is the honorable thing to do. However, he is mistaken in thinking that women value being respected in that way, and that they will respond in like manner – offering him respect (and püssy) in return.

According to Vox's Socio-Sexual Hierarchy, this type of man is labeled a gamma male. The gamma male is living in a local maximum. He has everything sorted out in his mind, and although he may not be satisfied with his lot, he is indeed comfortable with it. He has the notion that what he believes is truly the way things should be, and it is other people's fault for screwing up the world. He is the king of his mental microcosm, and thus he perceives that he is 'sanctified'.

From this perspective, it is easy to see why cucks are always in the mood to pedestalize every poon in their path. It's because they have achieved a false 'sanctification' in their wimminz worship, thinking themselves to be righteous, virgin, "nice guys". But in reality, they are continuously dwelling in a spiritually unclean state, which is manifested in their lustful fantasies and jerking off.

To escape from this local maximum and move toward a better state in life, he would have to let go of being the king of his mental microcosm, and all the perceived philosophical luxuries pertaining to the vanity of his mind. The unsanctimonious tasks of realizing his solipsism, admitting his weaknesses, and renewing his mind strikes him as being a nauseatingly opprobrious and inconvenient undertaking. He does not see the blessings of trust, humility, and charisma that he might obtain by embarking on a personal journey of introspection and confession, leading to greater authenticity along the lines of his deeper convictions.

When he happens to meet other men who exemplify the charismatic blessings of trust, humility, and courage in their lives, an envious inferiority complex kicks in. Thus, he is quick to condemn those men as 'defiled' — emotionally manipulative, proud@ss chads – the hated sexual bullies that invariably sully the poon that he worships in his dreams.

In sum, the gamma perceives that he is 'sanctified', and that more dynamic men are 'defiled'. Thus, it is extremely difficult for him to budge from his mole hill.

Moles are solitary creatures, coming together only to mate. Territories may overlap, but moles avoid each other and males may fight fiercely if they meet.

Case Study 2 – Oneitis stymies the epiphany of Red Pill truth

It is not uncommon for men have a deep longing for an idealistic love, reminiscent of what he experienced from his mother as a boy. In this case, mommy has used her 'love', care, and feminine graces to 'sanctify' her dearest sunny boy (with no intervening father figure) into the BP mindset, according to her solipsistic view of how boys should behave, all in order to support and serve her own feminine imperatives, and often to the detriment of her progeny.

This sort of s'mothering instinct serves to instill an idolatrous view of women in the son. He never learns how to tell women "no", for fear of losing the 'love' and affection that he has grown to be so codependent on.

A problem arises when he gets the notion that a woman/wife can, and even should, offer him the same kind of unconditional 'love'. It's the male version of the hamster. In the unfortunate event that he gets a little taste of 'love' from a supple, perky, peer-aged girl, he's swamped in swoon land.

Oneitis is a local maximum. It feeelz gooed. But it's a long way from a sanctified headship marriage. Wally Oneitis needs to get over the hump and go through a local minimum of despair before he can make any progress towards the global maximum.

Buena Vista conveyed a story over at Spawny's Space about a Wally who was stuck in a deplorable Blue Pill existence characterized by Oneitis, and who just couldn't "get it", no matter how hard his friend tried to tell him the Red Pill truth. (Click on the link to read.)

At first exposure, I had the impression that the Blue Pill mindset is human nature, but others argued that it was an acculturation. But after reconsidering this phenomenon in the light of these concepts of sanctification and defilement, it yields further insight to think of the young man's BP situation as him already having been (falsely) 'sanctified' (or defiled from the RP perspective) into this codependent lifestyle. Thus, the RP truth would only show itself to be a form of 'defilement' from his perspective, although it would be sanctification to his older, wiser RP'ed friend. Therefore, he would need to lose that false sense of 'sanctity' somehow, before he would be able to enter another psychological form of sanctification.

And… it would be necessary for him to experience a relative offence and a perceived 'defilement' in the transition.

In sum, the püssy pedestalizing oneitisizer perceives that he is 'sanctified', and that any life removed from his idol is 'defiled'. Thus, because of this deception of perception, it is extremely difficult for him to budge from his gopher hill.

Gophers aggressively maintain their territories and are solitary outside of the breeding season.

Case Study 3 – The blinders of Boomer Theology, AKA Complementarianism

It gets worse when one is in a local maximum and they are deceived into thinking that they are at a global maximum. Such a person will never even consider venturing into uncharted territory, even to blaspheme the mere suggestion thereof as a 'heresy'.

As a case study of this phenomenon, let's consider Deep Strength's review of a series of articles at Theopolis that addressed the Manosphere's response to modern societal ills.

1. Aaron Renn on The Manosphere and the Church. DS's post.
2. Alastair Robert on The Virtues of Dominion. DS's post.
3. Peter Leithart on Side effects. DS's post.
4. Bill Smith on Attraction: The Biblical Theology of Pickup Artistry. DS's post.
5. Paul Maxwell on The Measure of a man. DS's post.
6. Mike Bull on What is Biblical Feminism. DS's post.
7. Aaron Renn's final response.

The main thing we learned from DS's reviews is that these authors, most (if not all) of whom are of the Boomer Generation, are channeling a peculiar, feminist-lite, hermeneutical interpretation of male-female relations, which was humorously termed Boomer Theology. We also learned that Boomer Theology is apparently the source of the structural archetype we know as Complementarianism.

Although the authors at Theopolis clearly recognize the deeper truths stemming from the Red Pill frame, nevertheless, they could not break out of the neo-trad Blue Pill Frame. They used words like twisted and perverse to describe the RP mindset, indicating that the RP was 'defiled' in their eyes. In other words, they could not see past the local minima obstacles between Complementarianism and Headship.

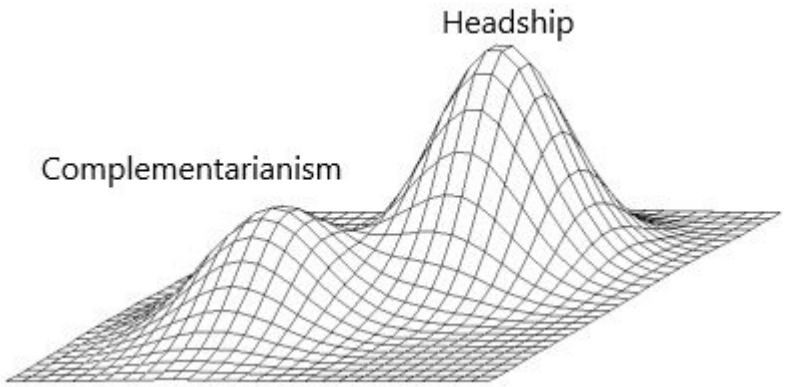
DS called out their errors as follows.

1. They assert that women are spiritually superior to men. (Wife ≈ Holy Spirit)
2. They try to read social and sexual equality into their eisegeses of the Bible.
3. They omit references to wifely submission towards her husband.
4. They ignore womens' agency to sin and rebel at their own peril.
5. They refuse to reject feminism or call out female rebellion.
6. They emphasize male responsibility over divine purpose.

In sum, leading Christians of the Boomer generation have superposed feminist philosophies onto Biblical concepts to form Complementarianism. I suppose this was a practical response to the sexual revolution of the 60s, the women's liberation movement of the 70s, and the divorce debacle of the 80s. So I'm giving them some credit in assuming that they have achieved a local maximum, given the challenges of their generation.



DS concluded,

> "…there is still a lot of heretical feminist and boomer complementarian lenses still clouding the eyes of these men where they interpret the Scriptures incorrectly and give poor prescriptive advice.
>
> This article in particular clearly summed it up for us: if you go along with their advice you'll just get more of the same just under a different name. Servant-leadership and boomer complementarian figureheadship are still two sides of the same coin as is men stepping up into responsibilities without authority and calling out female rebellion.
>
> It's pretty sad because these men seemed like they really started to understand some of the concepts of the manosphere, but just found another way to twist the concepts to fit their own boomer complementarianism again. You can lead a horse to water but you can't make it drink."

Yes, these men, like other Complementarians, are wholly convinced that they are 'sanctified', and that it is the Christian Manosphere and RP lore which are 'unclean'. Meanwhile, DS, myself, and other Manospherians maintain that Complementarianists have adulterated the scriptures with worldly philosophies, and that we are in the right.

But the thing is, both views can be intrinsically and independently coherent (representing local maxima), but both views can't be right (representing two global maxima). One of us must have a false notion of what sanctification entails, while the other is closer to the truth.

> For false christs and false prophets will rise and show great signs and wonders to deceive, if possible, even the elect.

> Matthew 24:24; Mark 13:22 (NKJV)

It's too easy to deceive people these days! All Satan needs to do is point out all the messes in the surrounding local minima, and present a convincing case that it's better for one to stay put. Then, leave it up to the solipsistic mind to invent the hermeneutics necessary to justify it.

In sum, Complementarians perceive that they are 'sanctified', and that any life outside of their femcentric, Blue Pill, Boomer theology is 'defiled'. Thus, it is extremely difficult for them to budge from this dung hill.

Dung beetles meticulously polish their turd balls to make them easier to cart home.

Conclusions

As you can see, one's self-assessment of his relative position in life is largely determined by myopic perception. The desire to attain/maintain a local extrema (security, comfort, etc.) tends to blind one to the possibility of achieving another, better alternative in life.

To refine my initial comment at Spawny's, it is human nature to desire a continuation of the perceived ease and comfort which are hallmarks of a sanctified lifestyle (or a defiled one, depending on your perspective).

The third case study exemplifies how modern Christianity has become relativistic, just like the wider culture. The demonstrative reason for this is the natural human motive to enhance the perceived experience of 'sanctification' (viz. to hedge the local maximum).

Thus, we can understand how the path of defilement (or 'defilement', relatively speaking) is how most men enter into the RP world. (1) Their BP ways of life, no matter how filled with BP lies they might be, are perceived as 'sanctified'. (2) Their comfy zone state then becomes perceptibly 'defiled' through grave disappointments, adultery, or divorce (which are true defilements prevalent in today's culture). (3) It is only then that they realize that those BP notions are, in fact, the lies which proved to be their undoing.

Farm Boy, Kentucky Headhunter, and Buena Vista are also correct in believing that the various manifestations of the Blue Pill mindset is acquired through culture, because culture has a significant influence on what one chooses to accept (or pursue) as an ostensibly 'sanctified' lifestyle.

In addition to culture, one's family of origin also has a major impact on forming one's perceptions of what a valued 'sanctified' lifestyle should look like.

Thus, sanctity (or defilement) sets in early, often times long before a young person is cognizant of the nature of the transition. Particularly in the spiritual sense, one's first encounter with either God's grace, or Satan's life of preponderant frustration, often occurs in late childhood or adolescence, which is a time when one's family, peer group, and popular culture has a larger-than-life influence. This trajectory tends to develop and expand over a person's life span, resulting in their eternal condition of union with G-d (in the case of sanctification), or alienation from (in the case of defilement) God.

Related

- Preston Highlands Baptist Church (John Sypert): Mark 11:12-25 | "Tearing Down to Build Up" (2019 November 3)

Anti-Progressive

Novaseeker · 16 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Progressive Christianity is Cultural Relativism.

Readership: Christians;

Progressive is a Converged Term

Jack's post, Progressive (2020 November 10), pointed out the confusion that surrounds the eponymous word when used to describe culture or religion.

He concluded,

> "Obviously, the word progressive cannot be used to refer to a return to Covenant theology, Biblical Law, and the Natural Order described by the Christian Red Pill. This word needs to be revised or replaced in order to avoid unnecessary confusion (and offence)."

I agree. The word "progressive" cannot be used at all to describe anything Christian — it is utterly tainted with another meaning that has nothing to do at all with anything Christian in substance. The whole idea of anything "progressive" is to move away from anything Christianity stands for, because Christianity is the "establishment culture of the past", and of the West, par excellence.

In the same post, Jack also posed the question, What is a better word that we can use to describe "favoring or advocating progress, change, improvement, or reform, as opposed to wishing to maintain things as they are?

As for this, "favoring or advocating progress, change, improvement, or reform, as opposed to wishing to maintain things as they are", I'll comment on each word.

- I would not use the word "progress" at all. It is too similar in meaning and usage to progressive.
- I would stay away from the word "change" because, again, in Western culture, "change" is a byword that indicates a one-way liberating change — it is never "changing back".
- "Improvement" doesn't convey the fact that many converged beliefs and practices should be discarded.
- The word "reform" may be okay, but again this is also tainted now because it's all associated with one direction of reforms — the liberating kind. Projects of restoration are, by definition, not seen as "reform" movements, and so the term is also a bit misleading in our cultural context.

I think in reality what Jack was describing is a kind of "neo-restoration" or a "neo-orthodoxy" — something that isn't exactly a going back to the past, which is always impossible, but which does entail the following:

- Abandoning elements of the present which are inconsistent with the unchanging truth of Christ and of the Church.
- Restoring the Church to its purity and fullness of truth and practice.

I suppose that's one approach to getting men back in church …

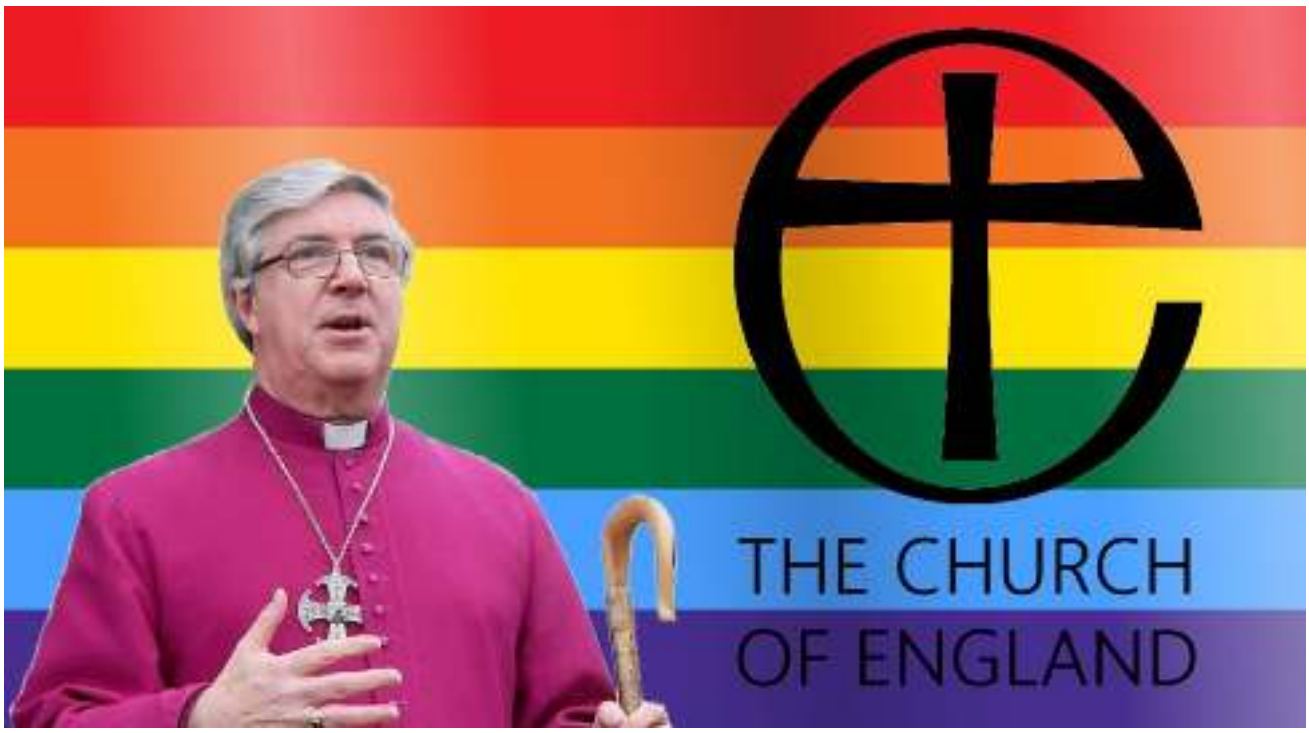
Progressive Christianity is Cultural Relativism

"Progressive Christianity" is a term people are using to kind of repackage some things that came out of the "Emerging Church" movement — something which was openly about "embracing a generous orthodoxy", which always comes down to meaning "disregarding orthodoxy", because "orthodoxy", whatever else it may be, is never "generous" by definition, because it always excludes things that are not considered "orthodox". For example, …

In contrast to the "generous orthodoxy" of truth that they promote, there prevails an underlying spirit of agnosticism about the truth claims made in the past, which happens to reflect more or less entirely the cultural progressivism of the surrounding post-modern culture.

In reality, the "Progressive Christians" imitate liberal Christianity, but seek to be more culturally relevant in practice, by installing a trendy, post-modern mindset as the central feature of their consciousness. It is this centrality of the popularized mindset (rather than the renewing of the mind by the Holy Spirit) that leads to its corruption, similar to Gnosticism.

They are using post-modernism as a means to bring back certain elements of past (most often liturgical or devotional practices). But that's a walk in the dark, because following traditional liturgical or devotional practices is useless unless they are grounded in the truth — the high church Episcopalians exemplify that quite well. As a result, this group tends to be "halfway" in nature — they get some aspects of contemporary "broad Protestantism" that are too weak or shallow in practice, but they do not want to embrace orthodoxy in substance or doctrine because they are post-modern in mindset, so instead they want a kind of "post-modern collage" of a church, which doesn't work in practice any better than the late liberal Protestantism of the mainline churches did.



As bad as this seems, it is actually much worse. Elspeth alluded to this when she wrote,

> "…progressive Christianity… basically sees the entire Bible as offensive (no matter how much they claim otherwise)…"

Some of it, yes.

The bigger problem is that those who advocate progressive Christianity use biblical textual criticism in a way that treats the Bible as any other text — that is, it treats the Bible as a set of human texts which can be (should be) deconstructed, analyzed and, in places, dismissed, like any other human texts.

The impact of this change is that it shifts how the Bible is viewed. Instead of being the Word of God expressed through human writing, it is now merely a collection of human writings about God which were inspired by the faith of the human writers. I've covered this subtle erosion here before, What is the Authority of the Bible, and why is this Important? (2020 November 12).

Once this bridge was crossed in the early 20th Century, the game was up when it came to "left" Christianity, whether of the original "liberal" kind, which now typifies the mainline, or of the newfangled "progressive" kind, like Brian McLaren and so on.

What Remains of Christian Faith?

The question then asks itself, why then, do these people remain Christian? That is, why believe any of the Bible if you are going to deconstruct it this way?

The answer, I think, if you look at the people at the "top", in terms of say the leadership of the ECUSA or what have you, the most liberal theologians and so on, is that they do not, in fact, believe that what Bible teaches is true, in any meaningful sense of the word "true", other than "mystical" or "symbolic". However, they do think that religious practice is useful to people, and to society as a whole, and that for most people in the West this means some kind of Christian practice. Therefore, remaking Christianity into something that meshes better with the culture (by getting rid of aspects that conflict with the culture) is good for people and society, even if it creates a religion that is, in substance, a different thing from what historical Christianity was. It may be an entirely new faith in substance, in terms of its content, but it will appear Christian and look Christian in terms of its trappings, its catchphrases, and symbols. The preservation of an image that is outwardly recognizable as Christianity is critical to branding and marketing, because these are familiar to the West, and are a kind of "spiritual comfort food" for Western Christians through which a new religion can take shape and play the "important social and cultural roles" of building community, communicating and reinforcing shared moral commitments, and providing a context for personal and shared meaning making.

In essence, it expels the power and authority of Christ, but keeps the culture, religion, and tradition. It is not too hard to see how this has already happened within many mainline protestant churches in the west.

> [1] But know this, that in the last days perilous times will come: [2] For men will be lovers of themselves, lovers of money, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, [3] unloving, unforgiving, slanderers, without self-control, brutal, despisers of good, [4] traitors, headstrong, haughty, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God, [5] having a form of godliness but denying its power. And from such people turn away! [6] For of this sort are those who creep into households and make captives of gullible women loaded down with sins, led away by various lusts, [7] always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.
>
> 2nd Timothy 3:1-7 (NKJV)

And what is the new content? Generally speaking, it is something people call "Moralistic Therapeutic Deism" (MTD), coupled with a generous helping of progressive social politics and morals, cooked together into a new stew of progressive pseudo-Christianity. It's something that looks Christian and talks Christian in terms of its words and symbols, but embodies a different worldview, a different moral system, and a different substance altogether in terms of what it teaches, if anything at all beyond merely Deism, therapeutic spiritual assistance, and new progressive social mores (affirmation, affirmative consent, equity, tolerance, etc.).

This is the new human religion project. It is not as weak as we might think. Old mainline liberal Christianity was blue haired and weak, and the Episcopalians are limited in scope and impact to their small church. This movement, however, is not. This is going to be the rising face of newfangled Christianity in the US, and we have to recognize it for what it is now.

Related

- Σ Frame: The War on Ideals (2020 April 1)
- Σ Frame: Hitting bottom must be necessary. (2020 November 6)

Experiencing Thoughts as an Internal Monologue

Jack · 17 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Do you hear voices inside your head?

Readership: All
Theme: Constructs
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

> @ KylePlantEmoji
>
> Fun fact: some people have an internal narrative and some don't.
>
> As in, some people's thoughts are like sentences they "hear", and some people just have abstract non-verbal thoughts, and have to consciously verbalize them.
>
> And most people aren't aware of the other type of person.

After seeing the above tweet, L. Allen White described his impressions in his post, Today I Learned That Not Everyone Has An Internal Monologue And It Has Ruined My Day. (2020 February 13). It drove him bonkers. He had to rethink his whole world perception.

He posted a poll on Instagram in order to collect data on how many people have an internal monologue. The results showed that 83% of people had an internal monologue, while 17% didn't (N = 109).

Apparently, I am one of the few people who does not have a constantly running internal dialogue. Although I do hear the voice of my conscience, or my anger, or my desire, from time to time. I also hear God's voice speaking to me when I pray. I know my father has the same experiences as me, because we have talked about this in the past.

In general, I think in terms of concepts which are rather complex and not easy to put into words. This usually requires a lot of words to accurately describe it and get my point across. Many people don't have the will, the interest, or the attention span necessary to go through that. But if a person happens to be interested in the topic, I can talk for hours and never get tired. As I've gotten older, I've become better at identifying which kinds of topics people might be interested in.

You may find it interesting that I am a popular lecturer by profession. To do this, I just focus my mind on a concept and I start talking about it. I don't spend a lot of time in preparation, but if I deliver the same speech many times, I will acquire supplementary materials to add to my presentation that enhance my delivery, such as better scientific words, figures, and graphs, which I will compile into a PowerPoint.

While I am speaking, I don't think about what I'm going to say. Sometimes I don't even know what I'm going to say. It just comes out of me. I have a general habit of speaking slowly, forcefully, and sometimes emotionally, which enhances my presentation. At times I fumble for the right words but it doesn't seem to detract from the overall impact. Instead, it seems to grab people's attention and it gets them thinking. Many people have described me as a motivational speaker.

President Woodrow Wilson and Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan (ca. 1914). Wildly popular among the commoners, Bryan was famed for his moral rectitude and his convincing and deeply moving speeches. He resigned from office upon learning that his exceptional skill as a motivational speaker was being used to promote political schemes of which he strongly disagreed.

I have found that writing suits me very well. But I have to sit and think about it for a while to be able to put my ideas into words that another person could understand. I have to conscientiously construct sentences and choose my words. I use a thesaurus regularly. I have to write these words down whenever they come to me, or else the succinctness and eloquence will quickly be forgotten. I regard good writing as an artistic masterpiece of language, although whether others regard my own writings as masterpieces is subject to opinion.

Update: As of 2024/11/23, this poll shows that 2/3 of respondents have an internal monologue, and 1/3 do not (N = 21). Compared to White's respondents, a larger proportion of the readers of this blog do not have an internal monologue.

Related

- Σ Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009/12/28)
- Σ Frame: The Magic of Instrospective Judgment and Authentic Confession (2020/5/8)
- X-Splat: I pass for neurotypical. (2020/10/6)

The Objectification of Reproductive Potential must deliver an Ego Rush or else it is Chauvinistic.

Jack · 18 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women desperately want to be objectified, except when they don't.

Readership: Men;

The Evidence: Women strut their stuff!

I came across this sultry meme on 9 Gag.

This photo is obviously staged. She must be wearing a bra of some sort, or else her glands would indicate the presence of gravity. And if she is wearing a bra, then her nips would not show through so prominently. My guess is that she glued raisins to the outside of her bra. LMAO! So, this is an example of what women are willing to do to get attention and be sexually objectified.

There were a few revealing comments.

Manfrombritain wrote,

> "Oh look, another thing [yoga] that isn't about the thing [yoga] but is actually about female sexuality. Big surprise. Jesus Christ! Women love being objectified! Now they have freedom!"

Farfetchdme replied,

> "I'm female and I totally agree with @manfrombritain. It's an easy ego push at the expense of single men and at enforcing the f*cked up beauty standards."

My analysis of the photo and Farfetchdme's comment confirms our long held suspicions — that wimmin are lying when they 'object' to being objectified.

So if that's true, then why do wimmin 'object' at all?

Well, they only 'object' to being objectified by men who do not match their mental picture of an ideal stud. The reason that women are so indignant and embarrassed to receive sexual attention from unwanted men, is because it reviles her deeper WISH.

- Women's Existential Fear — It hits the nerve of failing to maximize her reproductive potential.
- It's a "False Flag" — The man's interest and willingness to invest is there, but the Tingles are absent, à la no payoff. This is invariably interpreted on the meta-level as a form of attempted deception, or metaphorically speaking, 'marital' fraud.
- Solipsism Shake-Up — It is a rude smack to her self-estimation of her own SMV.
- Hypergamic Turbo-Thrust Failure — Receiving attention from any man who is considered "below her" standard is perceived as a logistical failure to 'marry up'.

Taken together, all this is extremely embarrassing to the female. The usual response is a counterattack — the charge of chauvinism or sexual harassment. Insert meme here.

Kakinjebek02 said,

> "Sometimes I wonder if women with small b00bs become insecure because of big breasted women posting these kind of pics and not because of men making similar comments."

Kakinjebek's comment makes us realize that all the talk we hear about equality (e.g. fatty tattooed wimmin claiming to have a place on the cover of Sports Illustrated) is projected from the female mindset, and this naturally includes all the things that make females feel insecure and 'unequal'. That said, perhaps a good deal of this demand for equaluty arises from intrasex envy — women want to be considered equal to other women for the politically correct point of fairness, but actually, they want individual attention from high quality men just as much as they want equality with these men.

In fact, this illusion of choice is the story line of a thousand dime-store romance novels.

The quintessential femcentric fantasy — two tall, dark, handsome men admiring one blonde woman. And they must be tall, dark and handsome, mind you.

But if you ever ask a woman's opinion on this, she'll say wimmin just want to be 'loved and adored'. [Translation: I wanna be worshipped with male attention until my ego pops.]

At the root of it, there is some truth to this claim. Women of any variety just want to feel valued, loved, and secure. Adam's post, Doctors be like, how many likes did my selfie get?? (2020 July 28), makes this all too clear. However, women mistakenly believe that if they can institute social equality, and attain greater control over men, then these feelings of insecurity will magically vanish. But it won't work out according to this expectation. As we know, it's only wishful thinking.

Men (in general) aren't afflicted with feminine feelings of insecurity, so we seldom hear of unattractive men demanding women to treat them as well as they treat attractive men. Besides this lack of internal motivation, if and when it does happen, it comes across as comical. The reason is because it is simply unrealistic for a man to demand respect. Either you get it, or you don't.

Final Statements

In sum, Objectified Reproductive Potential must deliver an Ego Rush or else be deemed Chauvinistic.

A man's attractive value is largely based on his productive potential. — His ability to work, to earn, to create, to plan, his ability to motivate and inspire others, especially the feeelz and tingles in women.

A woman's attractive value is largely based on her RE*productive potential*. — Her youth, beauty, and fertility as signifiers, her readiness and availability to shag regularly and joyfully, to bear children, to nurture, to maintain a home, and to support her husband and family.

Whenever men and women get a positive feedback about their attractive value based on their ability to produce or REproduce respectively, it is an ego rush! GNON is calling that one to become a progenitor of future generations!

The sharp indignation that makes the featherweight male quake in the knees with the fear of rejection only arises when the woman feels she is being shamed in the process.

Related

- The Rational Male: The Horse's Mouth (2011 December 7)

Protestant vs. Cathodox

Novaseeker · 20 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What is the main difference between Protestantism and "Cathodoxy"?

Readership: Christians;

Under my post, What is the Authority of the Bible, and why is this Important? (2020 November 12), Cameron wrote,

> "There are important things that the Bible doesn't address directly, not things like fine points on abstract Christological doctrines – I mean things that affect people in real life. Things that, if I could live for a thousand years and study the Bible every day, I could never decide on. Things that God would want us to know. I think if God intended the Bible to be used as Protestants use it, He would have written it like a catechism."

As someone who isn't a Protestant but has studied various kinds of Protestantism, I think this issue is often misunderstood by those of us on the "Cathodox" (my own neologism for Catholicism and Orthodoxy as a shorthand, since these two traditions, despite their differences, do share many of the same differences with Protestant Christianity) side of things. The reason is that Protestants, on the one hand, and Cathodox, on the other, view salvation and the Christian life differently.

Most Protestants share a common belief in salvation by grace through faith/trust in Christ and his promises to forgive sins and grant eternal life by the power of his cross and resurrection. There are important differences between Protestants on the details of this core issue (Calvinists as compared with non-Calvinists being the most important), but as among non-Calvinist Protestants, or even Calvinists who are not "strict" Calvinists, there is broad agreement about these "doctrines of grace", such that they share a common prototype. Beyond this soteriology (again, leaving aside orthodox Calvinists), the rest is typically considered "details". Perhaps any of these minor points might be important to the personal belief systems of individual Christians, or even groups of Christians, but are not strictly "necessary for salvation". This is because what is necessary for salvation is the response to the grace that gives rise to saving faith, which is trust in Christ's promises of the forgiveness of sins and the gift of eternal life. So Protestants tend to be much more comfortable with "disagreements" about any number of things, which are deemed to be "non-essential", since most everything outside of that saving faith which is a gift of grace is seen as non-essential.

This is the case for most Protestant Christians today in 2020 in the U.S. It isn't that they see their differences as completely unimportant, but it's that they don't see them as leading, one way or the other, to being saved or not being saved, whereas a strict Cathodox understanding teaches that all Church teachings must be firmly believed, also intellectually, in order to be saved. Protestants don't generally believe that, and that's also the case for more "confessional" Protestants, like the Missouri Synod Lutherans who hold to the Book of Concord or the confessional Presbyterians who hold to the "Westminster Standards".

Almost Catholic, but … not quite

So this is why Protestants are, in general, much more comfortable than Cathodox with "all of the differences in scriptural interpretation OMG!" — because at the end of the day, despite these, most of them (again, leaving aside the strict Calvinists) agree that salvation comes about by grace through faith/trust in Christ and his promises of forgiveness of sins and eternal life. Everything else is details.

Now on the internet of course the world is different, because the internet magnifies differences, sharpens disagreements, and creates opposing camps very efficiently. And so on the internet one often comes across maximalist Protestants who seem to approach things from an almost Cathodox perspective in terms of what must be believed in order to be saved. In addition, the Protestants with particularly quirky views about any number of things tend to be much more prominent online than in churches, because their quirky views aren't that welcome in churches to the extent that these views are not consistent with the common soteriology that I described above.

Finally, one thing I have learned when looking at Protestantism is that it is quite varied and dynamic. There are, for example, Protestants that place very high value on catechisms and confessional statements, like the confessional Lutherans (Missouri and Wisconsin Synods in the U.S.), the confessional Calvinists (PCA, OPC and others), and some of the Dutch Reformed with their adherence to the "Three Forms of Unity", and require their clergy to adhere to these statements of faith and catechisms, which are intended to "rein in" incongruent interpretations as a serious undertaking.

In the U.S., Protestantism tends to be stereotyped as being either non-denominational megachurch evangelicalism (because this is the most politically visible), which is the least doctrinal form of Christianity that has ever existed, on the one hand, or blue-haired post-Christian mainline formalism, which is mostly not even Christian at this point and is probably best seen as "Post-Christian", at least in many parishes. But there are other forms of Protestantism, who use and revere catechisms and binding faith statements — they're just outnumbered here by those who do not (and that isn't necessarily good for either Protestantism or Christianity in the U.S.).

From the Cathodox viewpoint, the Protestant approach seems on its face to be impossible. It lacks the "unity of faith" that Cathodoxy requires, at least in theory, for communion to be a lived reality. But Protestants view the entirety of the faith through a different lens, and view much less as being "essential to salvation" than Cathodox do, which is why all of the many splits and differences are typically much less troubling and concerning to Protestants than they are to Cathodox, who by comparison have a much more comprehensive and monolithic understanding of what is "essential" to the faith, and therefore require a much higher standard of doctrinal and liturgical "unity" than what Protestants have. Although, it has to be said, that in the current setting today, the practices of both Catholicism and Orthodoxy in many places are very much like Protestantism, with ten people in the same pew having ten different versions of the faith, but agreeing on a few essentials, despite what the "official teachings" of the Church are.

I think in the U.S. in particular, due to the pervasive influence of individualism on the culture in general, including the spiritual culture, we are all kind of Protestant in this regard, even if we are not actually Protestants.

Related

- The Orthosphere (Alan Roebuck): Repost: Fixing Protestantism (2012 August 11)
- The Orthosphere (Alan Roebuck): Traditionalism is also for Protestants (2013 November 26)
- The Orthosphere (Alan Roebuck): Will the Real Christianity Please Stand Up? (2014 October 8)

Headship Restoration

Jack · 21 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A shout out to a fellow blogger examining Biblical Headship.

Readership: Christians

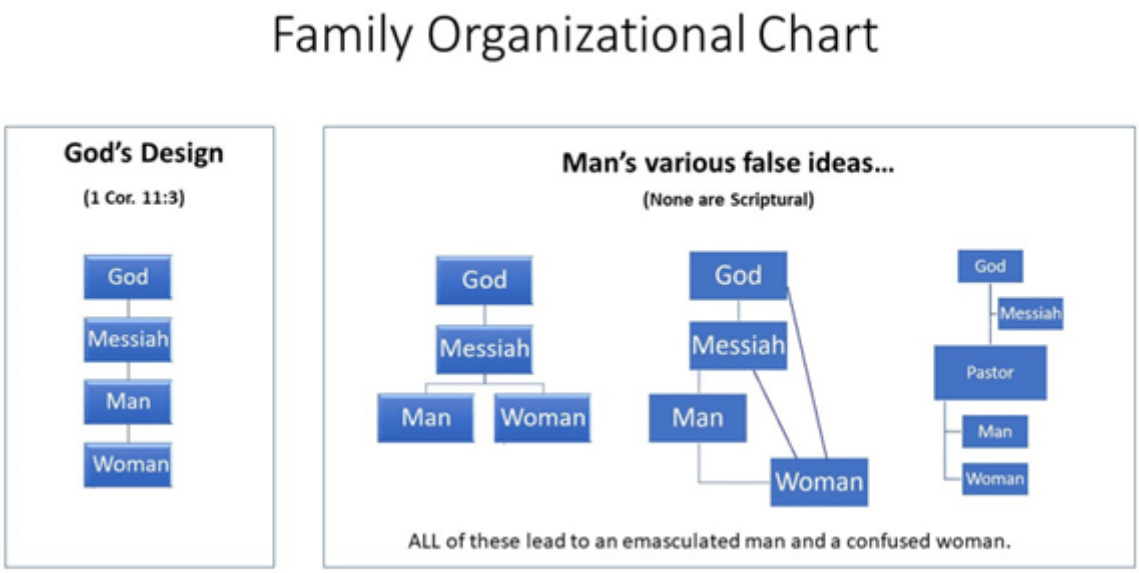
Introducing Rambo

A few months ago, I came across a blog called 11:3 Restoration, hosted by Pete Rambo. I was impressed to find that he has been endorsing the Biblical Headship relationship structure, just as Dalrock, Deep Strength, Snapper, and I have been doing over the last couple years. So this post is intended to highlight a couple of Pete's contributions to this topic and to draw awareness to his work.

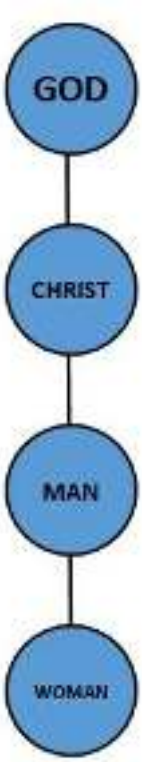
I wrote a brief message to him to ask permission to use his images, and to inquire about his faith background. In his reply, he said he calls himself a 'recovering pastor', which is insightful (and somewhat relieving). He also said,

> "I am a seminary trained man who pastored for ten years before leaving the church and starting a home fellowship. I believe in Yeshua/Jesus, the Messiah, and try to 'walk as He walked' by worshipping on the Sabbath, celebrating the 'forever' feasts of the Lord (Leviticus 23), and eating Biblically clean."

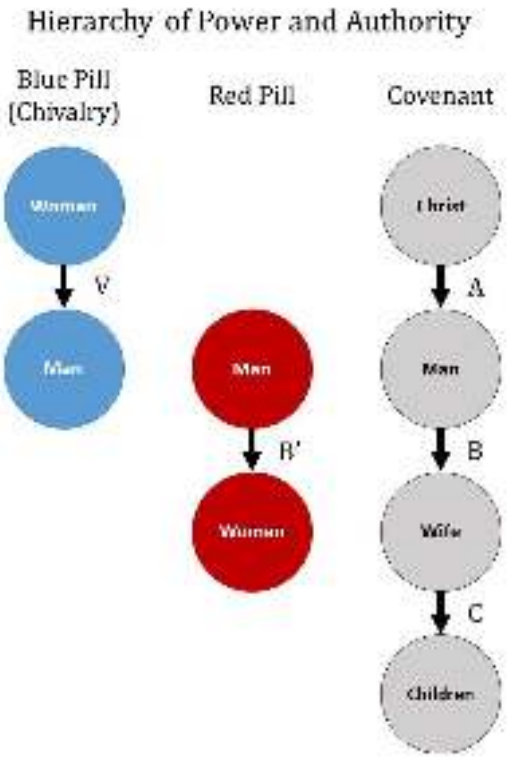
I was excited to read his post at 11:3 Restoration, God v. Church/World re:Family Structure (Image) (2020 November 9). Here, Pete has a diagram that is essentially the same as the one Snapper created a couple years ago, except that he has added three more diagrams of dysfunctional/unbiblical relationship structures!



As a comparison, here is Snapper's diagram.



And here is mine.



The Essence of Petition

I was intrigued to find that Pete had a follow up post at 11:3 Restoration, How Should a Woman Pray for Her Man? (2020 November 16). He uses his image above to explain why it is proper for a wife to ask Jesus to bless her husband, and why it is inappropriate for her to ask Jesus to punish her husband.

> "If I were your servant and we had a king, could I go to the king and say, 'I don't like the way my master acts. Can you discipline him for me?'
>
> Or, same scenario, would the king come to me, the servant, to say, 'I need you to give your master a message for me. You are to tell him that I want him to do this or that.'
>
> Of course not. If the king wanted to address a subject, the master of a servant, he wouldn't go through the servant to send the message, particularly if the message was one of correction. Rather, the king would honor his own authority structure knowing he would not want to undermine his own authority. It brings chaos. (Esther 1:17-18)
>
> IF, however, the servant went to the king and asked the king to 'bless my master, teach him wisdom, show him your favor, expand his holdings because he is a good master and works hard…' how would the king not want to honor the servant's request on behalf of the servant?
>
> Here is the very salient and valuable point. The servant's only authority comes from his master, therefore to ask for things that benefit the master is without undermine his authority is right and good. To request or cry out otherwise is to undermine the authority placed over the servant, something the king will not see favorably!"

Rambo's Book

Pete Rambo also published a book that just came out recently (2020 September 10), entitled Authority, Headship, and Family Structure (According to Moses). I have not yet read this book, so I've clipped some excerpts from the summary below.

> "Western culture has been on a steady moral decline for at least the last fifty years. The causes can be debated, however the collapse of the family structure and the rise of radical feminism is unquestionably a major factor. Today, masculinity is regarded as toxic and anything that hints at patriarchy is immediately attacked with a vigor that can only come from the fires of hell. It is this extreme venom against masculinity and patriarchal structure, coupled with the increasing collapse of society, that should clue the average person in to the fact that there must be a deeply spiritual reason why the Enemy of our souls hates the authority structure God put in place even before the Garden of Eden. Clearly, God has a purpose for ordering family and His people in a certain way.
>
> This book is a study through the Books of Moses, coupled with the much broader message of Scripture, to demonstrate that God is very intentional and very consistent in His design for the roles of man and woman. Further, specific attention is given to His structure for clans and tribes in the prophesied restoration of the dry bones of Ezekiel 37, the whole house of Israel. Indeed, for those who desire the coming of the Messiah and long to see the Messianic Age, this book serves as a sort of field guide to building family, clan, and tribe as we > await the full recovery and restoration of Israel.

>
> Join me on this journey of discovery as we connect dots in Scripture, recover lost truths, and delve into topics that challenge the false paradigms we may have inherited from our fathers. Ultimately, it is to our fathers of old – Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob – that Malachi the prophet bids us return when he counsels,

> “[4] Remember the Torah of Moses My servant, even the statutes and ordinances which I commanded him in Horeb for all Israel. [5] “Behold, I am going to send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord. [6] He will restore the hearts of the fathers to their children and the hearts of the children to their fathers, so that I will not come and smite the land with a curse.”
>
> Malachi 4:4-6 (NASB)

> Do we know the statutes and ordinances, particularly as they relate to authority, headship, and family structure? If these are the Days of Elijah, we had better be grasping the Torah of Moses and all it says about how the sons and daughters of Israel are to act and interact.”

It looks like Rambo is hitting the target to blow up Feminism. (A lame metaphor, but I do like the hyper-masculine imagery.)

In conclusion, I urge readers to go check out 11:3 Restoration and see what Pete has to say on the topic of Headship.

Related

A few other noteworthy posts on Biblical Headship and archetypical relationship structures are listed here.

- Snapper TRX: Breaking the Chain (2018 March 8)
- Σ Frame: The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Headship in concept and practice (January 24, 2019)
- Σ Frame: Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models (2020 September 28)

Dalrock has a large number of posts addressing Biblical Headship. Here are a few. (Click on the preceding link to see all.)

- Dalrock: Complementarian marriage: Egalitarian marriage with a veneer of headship. (2016 March 22)
- Dalrock: Headship makes all the difference. (2018 January 16)
- Dalrock: Headship tomorrow and headship yesterday, but never headship today. (2018 March 26)
- Dalrock: Headship is unchivalrous. (2018 May 14)
- Dalrock: Headship sleight of hand (2018 October 6)

Forgiveness

Jack · 22 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

> "Forgiveness is the name of love practiced among people who love poorly."
>
> Henri J. M. Nouwen

Readership: All

Framing Forgiveness

Scott wrote about The 4 Big Lies of 'Christian' Therapeutic Moralistic Deism (2020 November 19). It is no coincidence that two of these four big lies are related to forgiveness because being forgiven and having the ability to forgive others are central qualities of Spiritual Regeneration. These two lies were…

1. You must learn to "forgive yourself".
2. Unconditional immediate forgiveness for anyone who sins, no matter what the circumstances, no matter how heinous the crime, no matter whether or not they have repented. Conflating the lack of doing this with "holding a grudge"– which is a clearly enumerated sin.

In the first, Scott argued that only God and/or the person who was wronged have the place of extending forgiveness.

Concerning the second lie, Scott stated that repentance must predicate forgiveness.

Lance Roberts argued that forgiveness cannot be transactional, and that it can only be done through faith.

> "God forgave me long before I repented; in fact, he's forgiven me for every sin I've ever done and ever will do most of which I don't even know I committed/will commit. We are supposed to emulate Christ and forgive those who trespass against us."

In response, Sharkly pointed out that God forgives from the standpoint of eternity, but we do not.

Deep Strength added that God raises the bar under the new covenant which requires us to surpass our own standard of love, forgiveness, etc. and emulate Christ.

I believe all these viewpoints are accurate, but not very precise. So let me reframe these statements within the proper contexts.

Return of the Prodigal Son, by Vladimir Zunuzin (2006).

Misconceptions about Forgiveness

There is a widespread idea that forgiveness is essentially the same as choosing to forget what happened and "move on". This simple expression of forgiveness may be sufficient for smaller offenses that arise due to inconsideration, ignorance, or immaturity on behalf of the offender.

Ephesians 4:1-6 and Colossians 3:12-14 state that Christians should take this approach towards one another. Proverbs 17:9 says, "Whoever conceals an offense promotes love…". Proverbs 19:11 describes this approach as discreet and glorious! (So this is one way to glorify God.)

I say that this simple act of grace should be commonplace within a body of believers. Again, this is concerning small faux pas that everyone commits on a daily basis, e.g. spilling someone's drink, stepping on someone's toe, minor bad decisions made through misinformation, etc. This all assumes that the offender carries no ill will.

But in response to larger offenses, especially willful offenses, doing forgiveness this way is like Gaslighting yourself – a self-imposed psychological denial that the wrongdoing ever occurred. This is where this particular understanding of forgiveness loses traction because it turns the graceful forbearing defendant into a wimpy doormat who's out of touch with reality. If he doesn't draw some sort of boundary, this flaccid response is little more than an open invitation to be used, discarded, and trampled upon, again and again, by all the careless, greedy cads of the world.

The Prodigal son in the Brothel, AKA Self portrait with Saskia, by Rembrandt Harmenszoon Van Rijn (1635).

In addition to the common misconception of forgiveness described above (i.e. denial and avoidance), most people don't even know what true forgiveness looks like. People have the notion that forgiveness should necessarily restore the relationship to what it was before the offense.* My experience tells me this is just not true. Sometimes forgiveness requires you to cut that person out of your life.

And worse, there is a common misbelief that the measure of restoration that is achieved through forgiveness is indicative of the authenticity of the forgiveness. That is a backward understanding of forgiveness. In reality, the need for forgiveness is an indicator that the relationship is already broken. Forgiveness may ameliorate the consequences and bring peace, but in no way guarantees a restoration of all that was lost through the transgression. If you understand this correctly, then you will realize that Christ did something really amazing in that He accomplished both — He absorbed the consequences and restored our relationship to God!

We were alienated from God. Jesus forgave all through His sacrifice. But not everyone will cash in on that. Some people hate Christ because He forgave them.

 The way that forgiveness is offered (not the intensity of effort) makes a big difference in the outcome of the relationship. This is a huge topic deserving of a separate post.*

The Prodigal Son, by John Macallan Swan (1888).

Reframing Forgiveness

A better approach to forgiveness (although this is not complete in itself) is to take responsibility for what has happened and "roll with it". This is essentially what Jesus did when He died for our sins — He took responsibility for it. This approach is much more powerful and effective, but most people cannot accept this concept of forgiveness because it requires real work and sacrifice. Yet, this is what it means to overcome.

The way I understand it, the reason why Jesus asks us to forgive others, is not for the offender's benefit, either material or spiritual, nor to "change the world" as salt and light emissaries of Christ, but simply so that we will not get bogged down in bitterness, which is the enemy of faith itself; No faith, No forgiveness! This is why Jesus said in Matthew 6:14-15, "But if you do not forgive others their sins, your Father will not forgive your sins."

Whenever someone has wronged you, you are faced with a choice. As the saying goes, Don't get bitter, get better!

The Prodigal Son, by Pierre-Cécile Puvis de Chavannes (1872)

Is Forgiveness Transactional in Nature?

The question of whether repentance and forgiveness are transactional in nature is not an easy one to answer. In fact, this question was at the root of the Protestant Reformation.

- Catholics insist that confession and penance must be made to the established church.
- Calvinists would say that repentance is divinely orchestrated, and that humans have no control over this process.
- Non-Calvinistic Protestants would say it is a conscious decision.

Ed Hurst wrote,

> "I'm pretty sure the common Protestant expression "getting saved" does not mean the same thing it did in the New Testament. I agree that spiritual regeneration takes place outside the time-space continuum, and that the defining moment for us as individuals is when we become aware of it. It's not a transaction. Thus, my group emphasizes the image of feudal commitment from the heart, which is what faith meant in the Bible, and that it is its own reward."

I believe that forgiveness is not transactional for a technical reason. A transaction is a mutual, willful agreement of sorts. But forgiveness and repentance take place in the realm of the heart.

The larger argument that repentance is necessary for forgiveness to reach its conclusion is only partly correct, depending on the context. Consider the following truth statements.

- Repentance invites forgiveness. God always forgives. Man only forgives sometimes.
- Forgiveness invites repentance (when it is done right and it has the power of God behind it). God can forgive in this manner, but not everyone responds. Man can forgive in this manner provided that he has great faith. Again, not everyone responds.

In short, making the choice to forgive, done between two humans, is where the spiritual 'transaction' of the heart begins. Within this context, a 'transactional' forgiveness must be properly understood. If a person wrongs you and then repents, then extending forgiveness to that person should establish your spiritual authority as the morally superior person, especially if you must assume certain responsibilities in doing so.

The Return of the Prodigal Son, by Rembrandt Harmenszoon Van Rijn (1661-1669).

Conclusions

The issue of forgiveness is much bigger than what most people recognize, because Repentance and Forgiveness are central to Spiritual Regeneration.

In summary, the purpose of forgiveness is…

1. To glorify God.
2. To avoid bitterness and preserve your faith.
3. To increase your moral agency and fortitude.
4. To teach you where and how to draw boundaries.
5. To prevent you from succumbing to a victim mentality.
6. To test your faith as an overcomer who cannot be easily defeated by an offense.

The proper expression of forgiveness with respect to the context can be summarized as follows.

- Between believers, forgiveness of small offenses is commanded by Christ as an expression of love.
- Between believers, forgiveness of major offenses is required if the offender repents. This could be tritely described as 'transactional'.
- Between a believer and a non-believer, forgiveness can be 'transactional' if the offender repents, but if not, then the believer must embrace a more difficult form of forgiveness by accepting the outstanding responsibilities for the consequences of the offense. Sometimes, this may require extreme measures, such as pursuing a lawsuit, making a change in one's life plans, or rejecting all future interaction with that person.
- God's forgiveness is not 'transactional', simply because God operates from an eternal time-space continuum.

Non-Calvinistic Protestants have the notion that God's forgiveness is not transactional, but the Calvinists may have a better view on this point, in that they recognize that repentance and spiritual regeneration (AKA the "born again" experience) is merely the moment when the believer realizes God's forgiveness.

Related

- Σ Frame: Forgiveness – The biggest obstacle in overcoming my parent's divorce (2010 March 3)
- The Cut (Cari Romm): Forgiveness Is Not a Binary State (2017 January 11)

Which pets are cleaner? Dogs or Cats?

Jack · 23 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Pet humor.

Readership: All

I overheard an argument about which type of pet is 'cleaner' – dogs or cats. The dog proponent ended the discussion with the following statement.

> "Cats clean themselves with their tongue, and then vomit out the hair! Dogs rely on their owners to give them a proper bath. But you wouldn't do that, because you're too lazy!"

Personally, I prefer dogs because they are passionate, loyal, and teachable.

Once I had a dog that was so smart, he could answer questions!

I asked him, "What's on top of the house?" He replied, "Woof!"

I asked him, "What's on trees?" He replied, "Bark!"

Then I asked him, "How does it feel?" He replied, "Ruff!"

He could even tell you his name! "Ralph!"

Related

- Quora: How do I win in a dog vs cat argument (dog lover)?

Female Divorce Lawyer Stands for Fatherhood

Jack · 24 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Fatherlessness is the modern plague of perdition.

Readership: All;

> "Fathers are the forgotten contributors to child development."
>
> Psychologist Michael Lamb

Introduction

When I first read the title of this video on YouTube, I expected to hear this woman (Marilyn York) dish out the typical feminist boilerplate. But to my astonishment, she actually had quite a bit of good information about the causes of fatherlessness, and the negative consequences thereof. Sometimes looks are deceiving!

In a few previous posts, I've predicted that fatherlessness will reach epidemic proportions for Gen Zs. According to Ms. York, it already has.

We've heard much of this before, but it's nice to hear it from a woman for a change.

What Representing Men in Divorce Taught Me About Fatherhood | Marilyn York | TEDx University of Nevada

Notes (Positives)

Fathers make their childrens' lives secure, fun, and challenging.

Fathers have a unique intuition about their children's emotional needs and personality. We have the idea that fathers are clueless about the details of their childrens' lives, but in fact, they know things about their children that their mother does not know.

Children with involved father figures have stronger cognitive and motor skills, elevated physical and mental health, become better problem solvers, and are more confident, curious, and empathetic.

Notes (Negatives)

2/5 of all children in America are growing up without fathers.

According to the 2016 census, 17,000,000 children are growing up without fathers. Other estimates put this figure at 30,000,000!

Young people originating from fatherless homes account for…

- 90% of all homeless and runaway kids.
- 71% of all high school dropouts.
- 63% of youth suicides.

A lot of homeless girls between the ages of 18-22 come from fatherless homes.

Causes of Fatherlessness

Between 1960 and 2016, the percentage of children growing up with just mothers nearly tripled, from 8% to 23%.

The main contributors to fatherless homes are divorce and out of wedlock births.

Divorce

Every 13 seconds, someone in America gets divorced, accounting for 2,500,000 divorces a year.

The Tender Years Doctrine (in place since circa 1873-1881), argues that mothers make better single parents than fathers. This doctrine guided American jurisprudence for more than a century. But now psychologists are finding that children who grow up with only a father fare better in life than those who grow up with only a mother.

Paternity laws desperately need reform to protect the 40% of children born out of wedlock each year.

Out of Wedlock Births

More than 40%, or 1.5 million babies are born out of wedlock each year.

It's perfectly legal in all 50 states for a woman to conceal her pregnancy, leave the fathers name off the birth certificate, and never tell him he has a child – ever! How is this not kidnapping?

Just as horrible, a woman can knowingly list the wrong father on the child's birth certificate, deceive him, and a short while later, in many states, the wrong man becomes that child's legal father forever! He's obligated to a child that isn't his, and that child just lost their real father with little to no recourse.

This is a betrayal of the worst kind, and the law not only allows it, it creates the opportunity!"

Related

- Dalrock: Updated U.S. Custody and Child Support Data (2009) (2012 June 22)
- Dalrock: Custody Demographics (2012 December 11)

Is turkey kosher?

Jack · 26 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Your turkey craving conscience can rest after reading this post.

Readership: All

The Question

Over the centuries, there has been much debate in theological circles over the question of whether turkey is kosher. I didn't want to chicken out of this question, so I decided to take a stab at figuring out how to carve this bird.

Concerning the use of birds as food, the Bible states,

> [13] 'And these you shall regard as an abomination among the birds; they shall not be eaten, they are an abomination: the eagle, the vulture, the buzzard, [14] the kite, and the falcon after its kind; [15] every raven after its kind, [16] the ostrich, the short-eared owl, the sea gull, and the hawk after its kind; [17] the little owl, the fisher owl, and the screech owl; [18] the white owl, the jackdaw, and the carrion vulture; [19] the stork, the heron after its kind, the hoopoe, and the bat.
>
> Leviticus 11:13-19 (NKJV)

The phrase "after its kind" is frequently repeated. So I decided to study the taxonomies of turkey and the other birds cited as forbidden, to see if they might belong to the same family or genus.

Burrowing Owl (not mentioned specifically, but presumed unclean)

The Classification of the Birds

The birds listed in Leviticus are the eagle, vulture, buzzard, kite, falcon, raven, ostrich, owl, sea gull, hawk, jackdaw, stork, heron, and hoopoe. The bat is also mentioned.

I'm no expert in taxonomy, so I spent about three hours going through whatever information I could find on Infogalactic. After sorting through everything, I found that the taxonomical divergence between the turkey and these other birds occurs between Class and Order. They do not share any relation by Family or Genus.

Class

All the birds listed are in the class of Aves, except the bat, which is a mammal.

The stork and heron are in a large subclass, Neomithes.

Order

The eagle, vulture, buzzard*, kite, and hawk belong to the order Accipitriformes.

The falcon belongs to the order Falconiformes.

The raven and jackdaw belong to the order Passeriformes.

The ostrich belongs to the order Struthioniformes.

The owl belongs to the order Strigiformes.

The sea gull belongs to the order Charadriiformes.

The hoopoe belongs to the order Bucerotiformes.

But the turkey belongs to the order Galliformes!

 There are many types of birds that are called a buzzard. Most of these resemble the hawk, and are included in the order of* Accipitriformes and the family of Accipitridae. One exception is the turkey buzzard, which is in the order of Cathartiformes.

Turkey (clean!)

About Passeriformes

This order deserves attention because it covers half of all bird species, and contains more than 110 families. One family, Corvidae, is a cosmopolitan family of oscine passerine birds. Over 120 species are described, including crows, ravens, rooks, jackdaws, jays, magpies, treepies, choughs, nutcrackers, and the vast majority of anything that could be described as a songbird. They are considered the most intelligent of the birds, and among the most intelligent of all animals. The genus Corvus, including the jackdaws, crows, and ravens, makes up over a third of the entire family.

Jackdaw (unclean)

About Caprimulgiformes

This order is not included among any of the birds in Leviticus, so it is presumed to be clean. I found this order to be interesting, as it contains hummingbirds, swifts, nightjars, nighthawks, whippoorwills, and potoos. These birds are generally insectivorous and nocturnal, and many are crepuscular.

Whippoorwill (clean)

About Galliformes

The Galliformes are an order of heavy-bodied ground-feeding birds that includes turkey, grouse, chicken, New World quail and Old World quail, ptarmigan, partridge, pheasant, junglefowl, and the Cracidae.

The name derives from “gallus”, Latin for “cock” or “rooster”. Common names are gamefowl or gamebirds, landfowl, gallinaceous birds, or galliforms. “Wildfowl” or just “fowl” are also often used for the Galliformes, but usually these terms also refer to waterfowl (Anseriformes), and occasionally to other commonly hunted birds.

This order contains five families: Phasianidae (including chicken, quail, partridges, pheasants, turkeys, peafowl, and grouse), Odontophoridae (New World quails), Numididae (guineafowl), Cracidae (including chachalacas and curassows), and Megapodiidae (incubator birds like mallee fowl and brush-turkeys).

Despite their distinctive appearance, grouse and turkeys probably do not warrant separation as families due to their recent origin from partridge– or pheasant-like birds.

Great Curassow (clean)

Conclusions

From a taxonomic viewpoint, the turkey is not anywhere closely related to any of the birds described as unclean in Leviticus. For me, this settles the question once and for all as to whether turkey is unclean. If you believe Acts 10:9-16 and Acts 11:4-10, then it probably doesn't matter very much anyway, but there may be some readers who are more particular about this matter.

I have only tasted one kind of bird that is forbidden in Leviticus, and that is the ostrich. It is surprisingly delicious and tastes like hamburger mixed with savory herbs. I've heard that this meat is popular in Australia.

References

All information in this post was gathered from Infogalactic.

Related

- My Jewish Learning (Rabbi Joshua Heller): The Kosher Turkey Debate (2020)
- Open Bible: What does the Bible say about Turkey Meat?
- Quora: What animals are forbidden to eat in the Bible (2020 March)

Hoopoe (unclean)

Appendix – The taxonomy of turkey and the birds cited in Leviticus

Colored fonts indicate groups of like order.

Bird: Turkey
Kingdom: Animalia
Phylum: Chordata
Class: Aves
Order: Galliformes
Family: Phasianidae
Subfamily: Meleagridinae
Genus: Meleagris
Species: M. gallopavo; M. ocellata;

Bird: Buzzard
There are many types of birds that are called a buzzard. (Click on the link for a list.) Most of these are included in the order of Accipitriformes and the family of Accipitridae. One exception is the turkey buzzard, which is in the order of Cathartiformes (same as the condor).

Bird: Eagle
Class: Aves
Order: Accipitriformes
Family: Accipitridae

Bird: Hawk
Class: Aves
Order: Accipitriformes
Family: Accipitridae

Bird: Kite
Class: Aves
Order: Accipitriformes

Family: Accipitridae

Bird: Vulture
Class: Aves
Order: Accipitriformes
Families: Accipitridae (Aegypiinae); Cathartidae;

Bird: Falcon
Class: Aves
Order: Falconiformes
Family: Falconidae
Subfamily: Falconinae
Genus: Falco

Bird: Hoopoe
Class: Aves
Order: Bucerotiformes
Family: Upupidae
Genus: Upupa
Species: U. epops

Bird: Heron
Class: Aves
Subclass: Neornithes
Infraclass: Neognathae
Superorder: Neoaves
Order: Pelecaniformes Family: Ardeidae

Bird: Stork
Class: Aves
Subclass: Neornithes
Infraclass: Neognathae
Superorder: Aequornithes
Order: Ciconiiformes
Family: Ciconiidae

Bird: Jackdaw
Class: Aves
Order: Passeriformes
Family: Corvidae
Genus: Corvus
Subgenus: Coloeus
Species: C. monedula (western); C. dauuricus (eastern);

Bird: Raven
Class: Aves
Order: Passeriformes
Family: Corvidae
Genus: Corvus
Species: C. corax

Bird: Ostrich

Class: Aves
Superorder: Paleognathae
Order: Struthioniformes
Family: Struthionidae
Genus: Struthio
Species: S. camelus

Bird: Owl
Class: Aves
Clade: Afroaves
Order: Strigiformes
Families: Strigidae; Tytonidae

Bird: Sea Gull
Class: Aves
Order: Charadriiformes
Suborder: Lari
Family: Laridae

Mammal: Bat
Kingdom: Animalia
Phylum: Chordata
Class: Mammalia
Clade: Scrotifera
Order: Chiroptera
Suborders: Megachiroptera; Microchiroptera;

What is a Curse?

Jack · 27 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Cursing is more than just profane speech.

Readership: Those who are spiritually minded;

Curses are Real!

In the past, the word “curse” has been used to refer to some mysterious, magical, paranormal force that puts one under an evil “spell”.

If this word were limited to medieval folk lore and fairy tales, then perhaps we could dismiss it as a parabolic or mythical truth — a concept that serves as a heuristic metaphor intended to lend insight to the working of divine justice and to inspire us with hope, but not anything to be taken seriously.

However, if you believe in the Bible, then the concept of a curse cannot be taken so lightly. The word “curse” is used 165 times throughout scripture. So we are forced to recognize that this mythical truth is founded upon realities that have long been obscure to the postmodern, cocksure consciousness.

I believe that if we have a more practical awareness of what a curse is, then we will be in a better position to assess our own actions and spiritual health. So here, I offer the following concept of a curse, which is based on my own epiphanies.

- A curse is not so much of a paranormal force as it is a metaphysical one.
- The conscious experience of being under a curse refers to how a person’s wants, needs, desires, values, beliefs, aspirations, and moral conscience are all in constant, perpetual conflict with each other.
- A cursed state is therefore an obstacle that prevents one from achieving a state of contentment, acting with moral rectitude, and still remain at peace with ones self, with others, and with God.
- As a result of this state of being accursed, one is predisposed, or even inclined, to languish in frustration, to transgress, to do bad things, to get bad or unfavorable results, and to create trouble and heartache for others.

Case Study – The Curse of Eve

In a previous post, What is a woman's desire for her husband according to Genesis 3:16? (2020 October 23), we learned that one of the effects of The Fall was that God placed a curse on Eve. This curse extends to all women descended from Eve.

Novaseeker described this curse on women very concisely in a recent comment.

> "Women do not like being permanently sexually tied down, unless they sense they are tied to their best sexual option. The "Ancien Régime" didn't provide much choice to women, because (A) and (B) were tied together, such that most women couldn't have kids outside marriage feasibly even if they wanted to do so, and most did not want to do so due to the social disapproval as well. That was disliked, and they rebelled against it as long as they got their hands on reliable, cheap tech* that allowed them to "have sex like men" (sort of … it still impacts them emotionally differently than it does us, as much as they protest that it does not), and opt into pregnancy when they wanted. But they still wanted the financial support."

 For more information on the "reliable, cheap tech", please read Chateau Heartiste's post, The Four Sirens of the Sexual Apocalypse (March 17, 2016)*

> "The problem is this: you can't have full female sexual independence without separating (A) male financial provisioning for children, from (B) women being married to the father. As long as (A) and (B) are linked, at least in all but the most extreme cases (actual physical abuse), women are not sexually independent, because in order to get the financial support they want for kids, they need to be married to a man, and that crimps their sexual independence."

In other words, no matter what a woman does, she won't be haaappy™!

> "So … we got the system we have, which features the best of all worlds for women, in that it provides…

- Sexual freedom,
- Children as an opt-in,
- The ability to select the man who will support the children by naming the father on the birth certificate,
- Marriage as opt-in, opt-out, easy on-and-off ramp, and
- Preserving financial support for the children either way.

> It provides maximal flexibility for women to design their lives precisely as they wish to, and that is the prime directive behind the entire system…"

We could describe the longitudinal trend towards "womens' liberation" as a concerted effort by women and society at large to be free from the Curse of Eve, or at least to ameliorate some of the frustration. In fact, this motive is contained within all the various definitions of Feminism.

However, there are many problems with this collective effort aimed at helping women to escape the curse. Unregulated female hypergamy carries with it a large set of ɦəllishly adverse social conditions and outright sins, including…

- Abortion
- Adultery
- Divorce
- Fatherlessness
- Widespread sexual promiscuity and postporniscuity
- The delay and debasement of marriage
- The Duluth debacle
- Women are naturally attracted to sociopathic men. Years ago, this collection of traits were called the Dark

Triad, which consisted of a few archetypes.

- The erosion of Christianity in general.

I'm sure readers could add many others.

In sum, if feminism persists, if social and societal changes are made to relieve the frustrations brought on by the Curse of Eve, as perceived by women, then this brings a infinitesimally larger curse on all of society, namely men and especially children.

Conclusions

The state of being cursed, e.g. the Curse of Eve, cannot be reversed through adherence to the law, religious devotion, Feminism, Progressivism, socialism, or any other human effort. It can only be ameliorated through the grace of God through His Son, Jesus Christ.

> [10] For as many as are of the works of the law are under the curse; for it is written, "Cursed is everyone who does not continue in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them." [11] But that no one is justified by the law in the sight of God is evident, for "the just shall live by faith." [12] Yet the law is not of faith, but "the man who does them shall live by them."
>
> [13] Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us (for it is written, "Cursed is everyone who hangs on a tree"), [14] that the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles in Christ Jesus, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.
>
> Galatians 3:10-14 (NKJV)

In the future, whenever you come across the word curse while reading either the Bible or folklore, you'll have a greater appreciation of the text, and a better grip on the applied meaning, if you will remember what I described above — that a curse is the state of having no spiritual or personal integrity, and being broken and frustrated as a consequence.

Related

- Dalrock: The curse of female power (2010 September 12)

- Do What's Right: Of Marriage and Curses (2014 August 28)
- Do What's Right: Covenants 06 (2020 September 10)

More on Relational Archetypes

Jack · 28 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Headship is the Christian goal for marriage.

Readership: Christians; Married; Those who hope to be married;
Note: In this essay, Headship includes the Tingly Respect model.

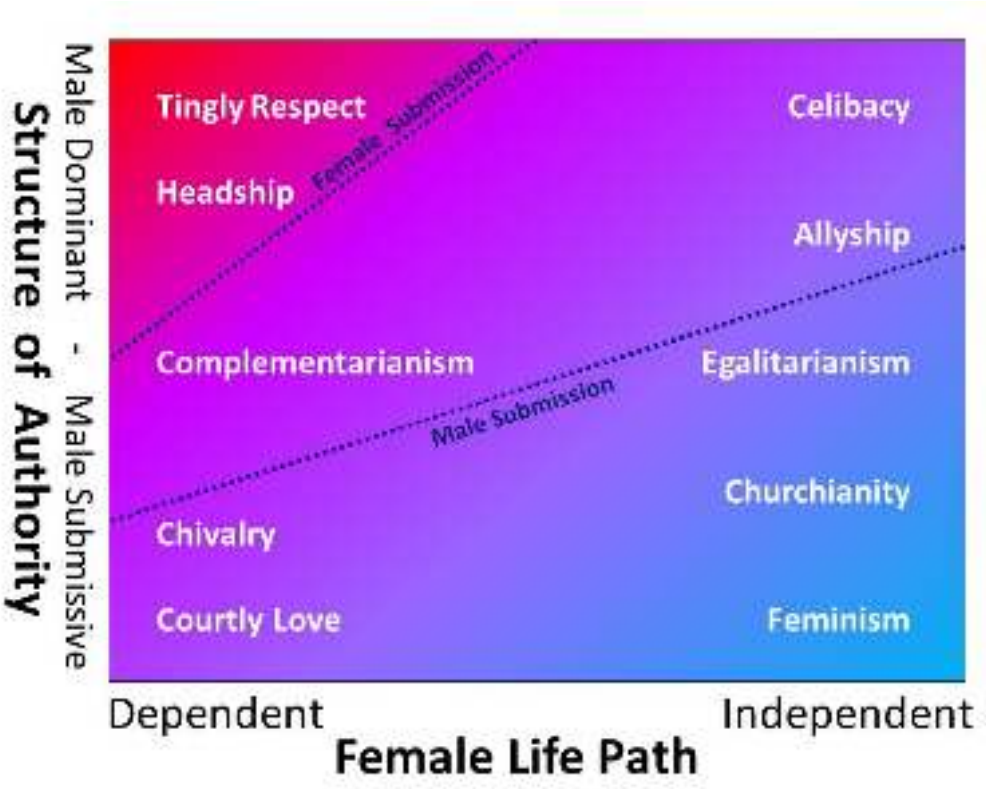
A Short History of the Model

Over the past couple years, I have been working on categorizing different types of relationship structures and identifying the defining elements that constitute such a structure. I came up with two characteristic dichotomies.

1. Who has defacto authority? The man or the woman?
2. What is the woman's mindset and longitudinal habits concerning her submission to male authority (AKA her "Life Path")? Submissive or independent?

Once I placed these two dichotomies on two axes to form a graph, then all the different archetypical relationships clearly fell into certain areas of the graph, as shown here.



This graph underwent a couple revisions, described in the following posts.

- Σ Frame: The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27).
- Σ Frame: Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models (2020 September 28)

I had a few RP principles that guided the process of forming this model.

- Authority is sexual.
- Power is dynamic and visceral.
- Σ Axiom 7: The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

- Women are naturally drawn to men, and this can be expressed in many different ways, depending on her mindset toward authority and her habits of submission.
- Rollo's Cardinal Rule of sexual strategies: "For one gender's sexual strategy to succeed, the other gender must compromise or abandon their own."
- Chateau Heartiste: The Moral Dichotomy of Women (2017 April 18)

DS disagrees with Rollo's Cardinal Rule, but I think many relationships do play out this way, and so it needs to be considered. I think DS would agree that if both the man and the wife are aiming to glorify God in a Headship structure, then this competition should become much less of an issue.

I want to take this occasion to point out a few things that I had not described in detail in these past writings, and also to respond to DS's reviews of this model.

One thing is the placement of Celibacy on the graph. Celibacy is a unique relational position, because the woman is independent, but she still remains under the authority of her father. I think true celibacy is very rare, because most women are sexually involved with a man at least once in their life, and this upsets the clarity of authority over her head. Secular, independent, adult women who may or may not have been previously married, may not recognize any form of male authority over her, and if this is the case, then although she may not be sexually active, she fails to conform to the Christian archetype of true Celibacy. Older widows or single women whose father has died are special cases of Celibacy, if it can be called such. I have to offer a disclaimer on the details, as there are technicalities which I have not yet worked out in great detail.

Other points are elaborated below.

1951 Studebaker Champion Starlight Coupe, heavily modified.

The Man is in a Defensive Position

It is fairly well known that the wife has much more influence than the husband towards creating happiness in a marriage. ("Defensive" may not be a very good word to describe this, but I am hard pressed to think of a better description.) To understand why this is, one only needs to consider the two dichotomies in the graph.

- The man only has defacto authority if the woman has a “Thing” for him. Besides the plain fact that there are precious few men who are able to instill the blessed Tingles and/or exert masculine Headship, this status is somewhat unstable and always subject to change (c.f. hypergamy).
- The woman’s mindset and habits of submission are subject to her own discretion. She can always choose to be disobedient and/or disrespectful.

Here are a couple posts that describe this imbalance in more detail.

- Biblical Gender Roles: Why Unity In Marriage Has More To Do With The Wife Than The Husband (2016 November 23)
- My Unhappiness Is Your Fault! (2018 June 3)

Because of this dynamic, it is more accurate to use the husband’s happiness as an indicator of his wife’s spiritual maturity, and less accurate to trust the converse proposition as an indicator of the husband’s worth, as is customary within Churchianity.

A rare woman who respects male authority.

The Trajectory Towards Headship

First of all, I want to express my appreciation to DS for taking the time and effort to review my work. I try to be as descriptive and accurate as I can for the readers’ benefit, and his reviews serve as a valuable quality check. This discussion also fuels further thought as to how we can refine this knowledge and possibly improve upon it.

Recently, Deep Strength reviewed this model in two posts.

- Christianity and Masculinity: The Bible and female life path (2020 November 18)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Summary of evaluating relationship or marital status and plans of action (2020 November 26)

In the former post, DS said that the dotted male submission line is the same line as the female submission line. I separated these two lines because there is a grey area in real-life relationships, in which there is some degree of mutual submission depending on the issue. This is best exemplified by a Complementarian structure in which the man and wife hold traditional gender roles. The man is an authority in certain areas, such as politics, religious doctrines, and which car to buy, while the woman is an authority in other areas, such as the frequency of church attendance, choosing a school for the children, and how child rearing is to be implemented. In a true Headship, the wife consults her husband on every decision and follows his directive accordingly. She rarely (if ever) insists on having things "her way", and instead, finds joy in discovering the purposes behind her husband's directives.

In the latter post, DS discussed the "trajectory" of a relationship or marriage. I want to discuss this idea a little further, because it has several components.

The nature of this trajectory carries an implication that DS and I have assumed in our writings, and that is the plain fact that a marriage may not stay in one location on the graph over time. DS considered a few situations in which relationships change in and out of Headship. There is much to be said about these transitions, but a full analysis would require many case studies. If any of our readers have the makings of a case study, I invite you to write it up and mail it to me.

When people describe marriage as "hard work" or "requiring work", I like to think they are referring to the daily tasks required to maintain or progress towards a Christ honoring Headship. This may or may not be the case, depending on the personalities involved, but it needs to be emphasized that when we talk about a Christian marriage, we aren't just talking about a wedding ceremony and the related legal documents. No, a Christian marriage is defined/determined by whether it is characterized by Headship — male authority and female submission. Any other type of relational structure is not a Christian marriage by definition. Either or both the husband or wife may or may not be Christians, but without Headship, they don't have a Christian marriage.

This gets sticky when we realize that it is possible for two people to be unbelievers, yet still have a Christ-like relationship. This is true because all humanity remains under the pre-Edenic Covenant.

I do not write this to condemn Christians who have failed to achieve Headship, nor to glorify non-Christians who have. My intention here is to draw attention to the fact that Christians who are married, or who hope to be married, should aspire to attain the Headship structure. This necessarily indicates several itinerant "goals" for the Christian in marriage, which DS discussed in the latter post. But reaching these goals may be far from simple.

To aid our understanding of this transition, I wrote a post titled, The Red Pill and Blue Pill as Paradigms of Sanctification and Defilement (with a mathematical analogy) (2020 November 15). In this essay, I used a mathematical analogy to illustrate how moving from one relationship structure to another may require things to get perceptibly worse for a time. Here, we can think of Headship as a global maximum according to the analogy, a form of sanctification that married Christians should pursue. A few more case studies of transitions are contained in the post, Stepping up to the Challenge (2018 April 29).

1935 Duesenberg convertible

Moving towards Headship is Redemptive

Another way to succinctly describe this "move" from one relationship structure to another is carried in the concepts of redemption and sanctification. A man's marriage and family experience redemption when a Headship structure is attained and/or maintained. This means that God is able to use this marriage and family for His purposes towards holiness, glory, growth, and bearing fruit, rather than it being relegated to a common, real life, sitcom drama filled with self-centered sins of ignorance.

Sanctification is also more likely to occur in Headship. But this is a little more complicated, because the man, or especially the woman, may not find internal joy and contentment in adopting the Headship structure. This weakness becomes more pronounced with women who are steeped in the Strong Independent Wimmin™ mindset, and/or who have a sordid sexual history and can no longer bond to a man in marriage.

Regarding the children, redemption is much more likely to occur for the children if their parents have a Headship type of relationship, and sanctification is almost certain. The reason divorce is so destructive to children's well-being is because it destroys their inborn hope of redemption, and transforms a sanctified home environment into one of shame and fear.

> [12] But to the rest I, not the Lord, say: If any brother has a wife who does not believe, and she is willing to live with him, let him not divorce her. [13] And a woman who has a husband who does not believe, if he is willing to live with her, let her not divorce him. [14] For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the husband; otherwise your children would be unclean, but now they are holy.
>
> 1st Corinthians 7:12-14 (NKJV)

There is no guarantee that God's glory and Shalom will come to rest on a Headship marriage, but it most certainly will not exist in any other type of relationship.

Press onward!

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Marriage Structures (2016 April 15)
- Σ Frame: "Biblical" Models of Courtship (2018 September 30)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Headship in concept and practice (2019 January 24)

Is the Christian Red Pill a Black Pill?

Jack · 29 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A comparison of the Red Pill, the Christian Red Pill, and the Black Pill.

Readership: All
Length: 3,700 words
Reading Time: 13 minutes
Author's Note: This essay was written from June 11 to November 28, 2020.
Warning: Certain images, topics, and language may be offensive to some readers.
Image Credit: Artwork by George Gross (1909-2003).

Introduction

There is a common misperception that the "rules" of the Christian faith (i.e. the restriction against fornication) necessarily exclude a man from competing in the socio-sexual/marriage marketplace. At its face, this impression appears to be true for several reasons.

- The Blinding Effect – The charade of Christianity places a demand on certain social behaviors which contributes to legalism and makes authentic introspection difficult. Men take these expectations seriously, while women see through the gauze of propriety and are typically double minded about these issues.
- The Inefficacious Effect – The popular interpretation of male Christian morality effectively forbids Christian men from utilizing many forms of Game, including the highly effective Dread Game.
- The Auto-Rejection Effect – A refusal to fornicate patently eliminates a man from obtaining the benefits of preselection. This is because the most desirable women on the market will refuse to take him seriously.
- The Halo Effect – Women are naturally attracted to bad boys. If a man presents himself as a good guy, then he is invariably excluded from the attention of such women. This could be interpreted as a good thing, but it is perceived as a rejection that knocks him down the totem pole. It requires a greater degree of spiritual maturity for a man to recognize this as something that removes him from temptation. But it may still be insufficient towards helping him find a suitable wife.
- The Cucking Effect – The perceived exclusion from the marketplace sets a man up to fall victim to a defeatist, sexual poverty mentality, characterized by lust, p0rnography, and slogsterbation.
- The Exclusion Effect – A man with a fiery libido who makes a commitment to sexual purity loses the subjective confidence and satisfaction that comes of getting regular action.
- The Emasculating Effect – Most of the impressions listed above are crystallized and magnified by the heresies proffered by the converged church, which leave the frustrations of Blue Pill ideals intact, while placing an additional heavy burden of expecting specific emasculating behaviors of men.

But is this a true estimation of Christianity and the Life in Christ?

To answer this question, this essay presents a comparison of the Red Pill, the Christian Red Pill, and the Black Pill. It shows that the impression of the Christian Red Pill being a Black Pill is merely a smokescreen that denies the Power of Christ, and is intended to deflect or defer men from entering into the true life in the Spirit.

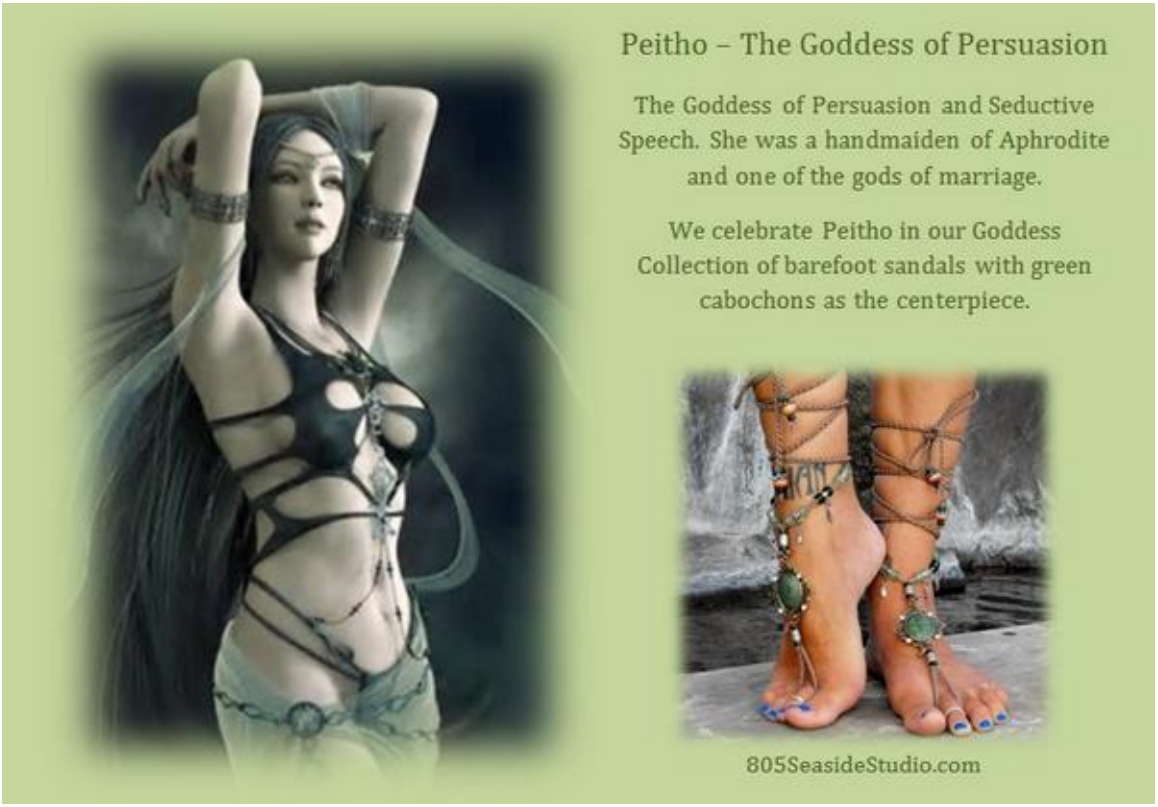
A cloud of smoke is used to conceal the movements of Security Forces Airmen from F.E. Warren Air Force Base, Wyo. during the Road Warrior exercise at Camp Guernsey, Wyo., Oct. 19, 2012. During the exercise, Airmen use various tactics to maintain the security of a nuclear convoy. (U.S. Air Force photo by Senior Airman Jarad A. Denton/Released)

What is the Red Pill?

The term Red Pill is basically a synonym for truth. But more specifically, it is a particular collection of truths that went missing from common awareness over the past century, and which the majority of people still refuse to accept. The reasons for this attrition of awareness are diverse and profuse, but in general, it's because these truths are impolite, embarrassing, unbecoming, or downright ugly. People find it much easier and more comfortable to stick their heads in the sand and continue running on autopilot.

Red Pill principles have identified the instinctive characteristics of our human nature and have matured to the point of forming praxeological predictive models. A secular approach recognizes these social interaction behaviors as merely human nature. A more scientific analysis recognizes human biodiversity (HBD), heredity, and evolutionary psychology.

Most secular RP proponents regard "female nature" as a problem to be solved. The unspoken motivation that undergirds this perspective is that female nature does not naturally lend itself to the fulfillment of the vast majority of mens' fleshly desires for sexual gratification. Instead, Bulverizing, Gaslighting, $ħit Tests, and Social games (etc.) abound. The female nature is therefore perceived as an obstacle that must be overcome in order for a man to F*ck at will. Thus the secular man's RP "solution" is to engage in sin nature themselves. That is, he constructs his own system of moral rectitude — a mental structure of what is right or wrong — all determined by what actions can produce the favored "results". This is partly why the Red Pill has gained the description of being a religion. The gods of this religion are many, including Ashtoreth (romantic love of females), Bacchus (drunkenness, hedonism), Isis (female authority), Molech (abortion, child sacrifice), and Peitho (persuasion, seduction).



What is the Christian Red Pill?

In addition to the precepts outlined by the Red Pill, a Christian approach to the Red Pill adds another layer of complexity because Christians recognize that some behaviors are conducive to Life in the Spirit, while others lead to spiritual death.

The defining distinction made by the Christian RP is the observation that most men and women choose to abandon any sense of moral agency because they want to enjoy being under the controlling spell of their sinful nature more than they want to go against their nature and do what is right. For example, the secular approach to the Red Pill utilizes the knowledge of human socio-sexual behaviors to pursue the gratification of the fleshly nature. It gives no consideration of how to seek after God's proscriptions for…

- Honoring and glorifying God.
- Pursuing your God ordained mission in life.
- Living in peace with the Holy Spirit and your fellow man.
- Promoting holiness, sexual purity, and marital sanctification.

When looking through this lens, it can be seen that some human behaviors are representative of God's created order, some are benignly neutral, while others are expressions of the sinful nature. On this, Ed wrote,

> "Red Pill" should be used as a term for the lore. Much of it does explain human social behavior, but some of it is misleading. If you think about it, you'll find that what Red Pill lore says about women in particular is reflected to some degree in Old Testament law and custom regarding women. They share underlying assumptions about how women behave in social situations."

The CRP therefore attempts to fish out the truths of the RP to be used as an aid in understanding one's self, and how to navigate through life in a fallen world.

Not all Red Pill knowledge describes traits of a sinful nature. Some are positive things. For example, secular Red Pill proponents recognize and believe that women are designed to submit to men. Christian Red Pill sees this as a God ordained social structure in which men are called to a position of authority and responsibility. Whereas secular Red Pill sees this as an alternative social structure in which they can exercise the power to gratify their own sinful desires.

Both systems recognize the reality of SMV parity, whether the person is a proper SMV match for you (viz. someone who is "within your league"). The secular goal is to get the soul-numbing ego stroke that comes from bedding a piece that has a higher SMV than one's self, and to avoid the consequences and entanglements that come with sexual bonding. Whereas, the Christian approach recognizes the wisdom of a man marrying a woman who is at his own level or one step lower. This is because appeasing the female inclination towards hypergamy gives the man a greater degree of sexual authority in the union, thereby making the Headship structure much easier to attain.

Of note, the Christian RP approach does not regard female nature as a "problem to be solved" (in order to gain sexual access). Instead, it recognizes that women desire men and sex. It is generally presumed that spiritually healthy women have an even greater desire for men and sex.

Another major point of agreement is the not so astute observation that a positive, pleasurable feedback as a result of a choice is the beginning of an addiction. Once a woman has her first taste of cox, she is forever addickted to stuffing it in her cooch. Secular RP proponents count on this feature of human nature and look for way to exploit it for their own pleasures, i.e. to get their own slice of the pie (or three), whereas the Christian RP examines methods to contain this feature within marriage, where it can yield a strong marriage, holiness, sanctification, life and peace, as opposed to the many consequences of sexual sin.

As you can imagine, the assessment of the current Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace is vastly different between the secular RP and the Christian RP. The secular RP regards the present state of affairs to be "the best time in history to be a player". The Christian RP sees the present state as a Marriage Market failure.

What is the Black Pill?

> The Black Pill is a metaphorical term often used to describe a set of beliefs often linked to nihilism, fatalism and defeatism. Online, the "black pill" is commonly associated with incels and 4chan users described referred to as "doomers". While the Red Pill is often used in the context of men's rights or right-wing politics, the black pill is typically used in more general existential contexts. [1]

The origin of the term Black Pill and the concept behind it, was apparently spawned from this comment from Paragon at Dalrock's. [1]

> "If your alternative is the MRA, the MRA movement has ZERO applications for relationships with women."
>
> We need to talk about taking the 'black pill', meaning to reconcile that there are no personal solutions to systemic problems – which can only resolve over evolutionary time.
>
> And any solution will very much entail steep trade-offs, in that males can't have their cake and eat it too – a prosperous population of deferred ecological pressures (like we currently enjoy), without an expectation that this prosperity will increase the mating latitude of females (dramatically perturbing the breeding population, to the point of near evolutionary instability).
>
> One will always follow the other, as male consensus on these matters is practically impossible in terms of inter-sexual competition (as opposed to the broad accord females enjoy through an abundant wealth of sexual opportunities, courtesy of their reproductively limiting function).

Fellow blogger Jim gives us the full flavor of the Black Pill.

> What is the Black Pill?
>
> The Black Pill is despair at the sad and cynical truths of the Red Pill, and the belief that we are doomed, that we as individuals shall not know a good sexual and family relationship, that we shall have few or no great grandchildren, that our race shall perish, that our homelands will be flooded by hostile angry sullen low IQ aliens who live on crime, welfare, and voting for the left, who get violent at microaggressions, that our civilization will die, overrun like Detroit and Salisbury by savages incapable of operating civilization.

Pessimistic is an understatement.

Here's another way to conceptualize the Black Pill according to what we are now seeing in modern Western society. All the efforts of Feminism, humanism, and postmodernism are aimed at relieving the Curse of Eve on women by dissipating the frustration throughout the larger society, and with devastating effect. In other words, all of society, men, women, and children alike, are collectively sacrificing their lives and vitality in a vain humanistic effort to redeem wimmin from the Curse of Eve. But sooner or later, people must wake up to the reality that only Christ can do that.

Note the haughty eyelids – a s1ut tell.

Case Study – The Black Pill Devours Many Men

A post at Opium Tales, My 2¢ on Black Pill Men (2020 October 11), poignantly describes the Black Pill as being the mindset of a dejected man who has been rejected from a gynocentric society.

> "Now, everything [a Feminist] sees is the Patriarchy. Yes, the Patriarchy is the reason for every problem in the world, especially the bullshit her life has become.
>
> Being heterosexual, she's still attracted to men. But does she attract the best and the brightest? Nope. Since she has a steady job, she attracts irresponsible male leeches.
>
> Her current boyfriend owes her a lot of money. She complained about him a lot. And now says that all men are irresponsible. Imagine that.
>
> What does this have to do with Black Pill men?
>
> Everything.
>
> They're the same thing. Except different sides of the coin.
>
> That feminist chick? Totally lacks self-awareness. It's not her fault that her life is a mess. It's everyone else's. Now after taking that Women's Studies course, she knows it's the Patriarchy that causes all her problems.
>
> Black Pill men are the same thing. Totally lack self-awareness."
>
> "They got screwed over. Their wife cheated on them and still got the better end of the deal in the divorce.
>
> So guess what?
>
> All women are like that.
>
> Yeah, I don't buy that for a second.
>
> I've met wonderful women. I've met sh!tty women. And I've met women somewhere in between.
>
> I've always said that the most important thing for a man is to keep his frame.

> Whereas there are no guarantees in life, you play the odds. If you keep your frame, your life would be so much better. Including your relationships with women.
>
> The one who got away
>
> If you've been in enough relationships, you'll have your "the one who got away."
>
> Now, if you have self-awareness, you can judge what went wrong without your own biases tilted way in your favor."
>
> "Black Pill men lack this self-awareness. It's the woman's fault. Women are evil. Blah blah blah.

[image]

> Like I said earlier, I've met wonderful women. I've met sh!tty women. And I've met women somewhere in between.
>
> The Black Pill man can't see this. He only can blame. Just like that feminist.
>
> And the only difference between the two? He's got a c0ck and balls. She's got a püssy.
>
> Different sides of the same coin.
>
> Both men and women attract "a type." If you're self-aware, you'll notice patterns in your life.
>
> Why do you attract this type? Neither the feminist nor the black pill man will understand this.
>
> Rather, the feminist will blame the patriarchy and the black pill man will blame all women. Because he can't see that he attracts that type for a reason.

In sum, the Black Pilled man who attracts the wrong "type" is at a nadir regarding both his social status and his sanctification. This is the time that a man must choose to embrace Christ.

In contrast, the spiritually astute man recognizes that the Blue Pill is a socio-psychological vehicle for men to sacrifice themselves for the Curse of Eve, and it is one which has received effective marketing over the last several decades. The challenge for the Christian man is to see that his personal sacrifices for gynocentric, Blue Pill ideals are not sufficient to redeem women, or even one woman, from the Curse of Eve. Yet many men fall for the marketing ruse for various reasons, including the "Nice Guy" lie, and the transactional notion that if he plays ball within the established system, then he'll get a clean roll in a cage (i.e. respect and regular püssy). Nothing could be further from the truth. If the Blue Pill cannot even redeem women, then it is an absolute cuckoldment for him to expect it to redeem his own personal longings for sexual expression. This is a lie from Satan.

For those men who have already invested part of their lives into this endeavor, they must also overcome the temptation to succumb to the despair described by Opium Tales. You see, Satan uses the Blue Pill conditioning like C!tibank uses your deposit – If you give them anything of value, they'll hit you with a plethora of taxes, maintenance charges, and handling fees, and take an additional cut for good measure, before returning the rest, if anything at all.

Christ transforms the Abyss into a Local Minimum

In his post, Incels (2018 June 4), Rollo Tomassi wrote,

> There is no 'Black Pill'
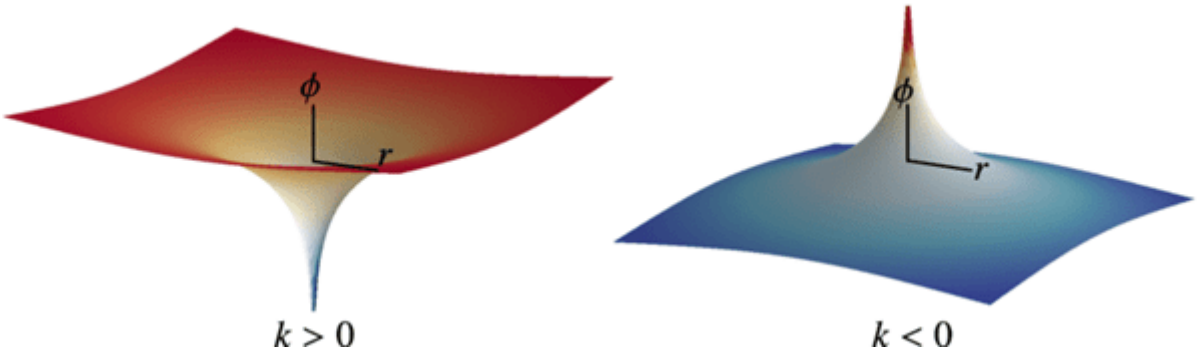
>
> "I've heard Roosh and a few other commenters in the 'sphere describe the "Black Pill" – the idea that the social order of the Blue Pill, the Feminine Imperative, or the 'gynocracy' if you like, is so rigged against men that they accept their role in it and give up on trying to make themselves or their circumstance better. What these guys are describing is what I've referred to in the past as the Abyss. This Abyss is the psychological / existential gulf a man needs to cross when he becomes Red Pill aware. He realizes that the person he carved himself out to be in a Blue Pill conditioned ideal was based on falsehoods. This stage of unplugging has difficulties unique to men at various stages of their lives and according to the decisions they made for themselves throughout their lives in accordance with those Blue Pill ideals. It's one thing for a young man of 25 to unplug and turn his life around in a Red Pill aware paradigm, but it's quite another for a man of 70 to become aware and look back on his life, marriage(s), family dysfunction and the long term impact his blindness to the Blue Pill game he was a part of for so long."

Of note, I have described what Rollo calls the Abyss as a local minima (c.f. mathematics) and a perceived offence/defilement. There is a noteable difference, because without the redemptive work of Christ, the surface drops off into negative infinity – an Abyss, as Rollo describes it. Christ has superposed an additional equation into the life of a believer that transforms this exponential divergence into a local minimum, thus allowing him to overcome and attain the global maximum.



Rollo continues,

> "There is a necessary state of nihilism, or at the very least a prolonged doubt, that occurs when men realize that they're cut away from that Blue Pill conditioned life. This is why I compare it to mourning in The Five Stages of Unplugging, men are literally mourning the loss of their investments in that paradigm; they're morning the loss of Killing the Beta they used to be."

In other words, after doing the monkey dance, they have to pay the piper.

> "Understand this, there is no Black Pill – there is only the Abyss of accepting the truth that comes with Red Pill awareness and a man's capacity to make this awareness work in his best interests.
>
> Incels, if nothing else, want to find ways to make this awareness work for them, but most are too damaged to deal with the realities that Red Pill awareness reveals to them. They're not ready for the truth, but it's unavoidable today."

Rollo offers an intimation that the Abyss may not have to be a singularity. But what he fails to articulate is that a heart-felt faith in Christ is what makes the difference.

The Christian Red Pill Approach is an Uphill Climb

In The Five Stages of Unplugging, Rollo rounds off the list with a sixth addendum – being Jaded. Thus, going through the Five Stages is only the beginning of the journey. It only gets you off the perceived local maximum of the Blue Pill and on a path to the local minimum. Once this is accomplished, a Christian man has the additional task of overcoming that local minimum and transcending his personal challenges and limitations in order to progress towards the global maximum of Headship.*

This is not, by any means, an easy task. A previous post on Σ Frame, The Narrow Way (2020 June 8), examined a few perspectives about how the current Marriage Marketplace is as narrow as it gets.

> "A lot of my writings here at Σ Frame try to identify what this other way might look like for a believer. So far, I can say that it is difficult, complicated, and narrow indeed, seemingly impossible unless you have a bit of faith. But I can also say that embarking on the narrow way is determinant of one building character, developing charisma, and having a long journey of personal and spiritual growth. Comfort and happiness, not so much, unless you stick with it until later in life.
>
> Like it or not, this is the will of God for us as men — that we might obtain life everlasting. […] Christian men must stake out and pursue the narrow way, which is an arduous task non-Christian men will never hope to do."

But is this so impossible that it warrants the description "Black Pill"? Only if one denies the power of Christ.

 This all assumes that God has called the specific man to marriage, as opposed to a life of celibacy. There are no other options which lead to redemption and the lasting glory of God. If both of these two options (i.e. Headship vs. Celibacy) seem too opprobrious for one to accept, then the default alternative is the Abyss, either in this life (for incels), or the life to come (for Chads).*

Concluding Statements

There is a common impression that the "rules" of the Christian faith (i.e. the restriction against fornication) obviate the possibility of success in the socio-sexual/marriage marketplace. But this is only true within the secular RP paradigm which carries the goal of becoming a Chadwick who can iterate sexual conquests. And yes, the Abyss of the Black Pill awaits those men who cannot compete within this framework, but the Abyss of eternal ɦəll awaits those who can and do. In other words, this interpretation of the Christian RP is one that does not recognize the power of Christ.

The Christian RP replaces this goal with one of achieving Headship within marriage, which honors and glorifies God, and provides a home atmosphere characterized by the peaceful presence of God. This can only be achieved by trusting in Christ and going through the local minimum.

References

1. Know Your Meme: Black Pill

Related

Rollo, at The Rational Male, offers a great selection of reading fodder about Unplugging (Category).

For those readers who are interested in a nihilistic expression of the Black Pill in the context of politics, I invite you to slog through these posts.

- Reality Doug: I Want To Be Caustic (2020 November 15)
- Reality Doug: My Franchise is Black Pill Patriarchy (2020 October 24)

Moon Day Review – Religion, Sex, Politics

Jack · 30 November 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Reviewing a few quote-worthy posts from November, 2020.

Readership: All
Notes: A penumbral lunar eclipse falls on November 30.

Religion

> "Luther was crawling up these steps one day, when that same text which he had met with before in the monastery sounded like a clap of thunder in his ears, "The just shall live by faith." He rose from his prostration and went down the steps never to grovel upon them again. At that moment the Lord brought him a full deliverance from superstition, and he saw that he was to live not by priests, nor priestcraft, nor penances, nor by anything that he could do, but that he must live by his faith.
>
> No sooner did he believe this than he began to live, in the sense of being active."
>
> Christian Publishing House: How Martin Luther of the Reformation Sought and Found (2020 November 16)

* * * * * * *

> "All Dad's elaborate atheist religion, with its sacred texts, its martyrs, its church militant; all his ostentatious tough- mindedness; all his intellectual machinery; all these things turned to dust. Convinced for decades of his stoicism, he now unwittingly demonstrated the truth of Clive James's cruel remark: "we would like to think we are stoic…but would prefer a version that didn't hurt."
>
> Why I'm Catholic: Atheist Convert R. J. Stove (2011 October 5)

* * * * * * *

> "The value in a man is measured in the impact that your life has on those around you."
>
> Dark Brightness: Around the Churchian (2020 November 29)

* * * * * * *

> "The American church is not a Christian church. Everyone worships something, but the American church doesn't worship the God of Christianity but instead a sort of passive set of deities who operate through karmic forces. "Therapeutic Moral Deism" is the term I see most often, and I think it's mostly accurate, but it misses the fact that there are multiple "deities". Our secular humanism is really polytheism."
>
> Antemodernist: A Few Lessons from 2020 (2020 November 24)

Sex

Biblical Gender Roles: The Biblical Case for Domestic Discipline (2020 October 8)

* * * * * * *

Opium Tales: Men value Looks over Degrees (2020 November 15)

* * * * * * *

TheShadowedKnight calls feminine virtue “charitas”. Note taken.

* * * * * * *

> “One important thing I’ve learned (which you’ll never hear in any church) is that you can’t encompass the subject of sanctification without discussing sex. But the church won’t touch this subject, so secular culture has to take up the slack (and is quite happy to do so).”
>
> Σ Frame: Deriving Doctrine (2020 November 14)

Lexet responded,

> “Re your sanctification comment, It’s funny how the modern church likes to speak of our union with god and eternity in heaven as an allegory to a sterile marriage, when the point of numerous OT and NT passages is the “blissful” element of marriage, i.e. the sexual union.
>
> It makes me wonder how many generations of church men lived an awful life with sexless marriages.
>
> It is strange to hear lyrics in contemporary music refer to sex as a heavenly experience (“I feel closer to god”- Trent reznor).
>
> It’s a theological truth missed by Christians.”

Yes indeedy! Society is so messed up that even Christians can’t imagine the joys of a sanctified marriage. Instead, we have the notion that young men need to “sow their wild oats”, and that young women need to “find themselves”, all under the assumption that marriage is a trap, a dead end, and that illicit sex is the main attraction, the only source of joy in life.

In response to this omission, Larry Solomon, the author of Biblical Gender Roles, has a new site called Biblical Sexology. I’ve found one article to be especially interesting, What should we want from sex? (2020 October 4).

Politics

Ed Hurst prophesies that Trump will win in the courts.

* * * * * * *

Independent Sentinel (M. Dowling): WordPress deplatforms The Conservative Treehouse for no reason (2020 November 15)

* * * * * * *

Shadow to Light: LGBT Community wants to imprison its opponents (2020 November 15)

* * * * * * *

> “Regardless of where one falls politically, the sanctity of the vote is a bedrock of a functioning representative democracy. Voters have to believe their vote matters. And that the vote is free, fair, and accurate.”
>
> Libertas Bella (Sam Jacobs): National Election Fraud: Evidence of National Chicanery During America’s 2020 Presidential Election (2020 November 19)

* * * * * * *

> “This whole election fraud situation is looking more and more like a massive sting. And it also explains why President Trump was campaigning like a madman right up until Election Day even though he knew he was going to win. I was always curious about that, because I was certain that Biden was a sacrificial lamb long > before the Democrats settled upon him as the nominee.

>
> But what the God-Emperor was doing was driving up his vote and making the Trumpslide bigger, thereby forcing the would-be election stealers into increasingly crude and visible tactics. It's a lot easier to hide 100,000 fake ballots than 10 million. If this interpretation of events turns out to be correct, it will elevate Donald Trump to the strategic level of Hannibal Barca."
>
> Vox Popoli: The raid in Germany was on the CIA (2020 November 22)

* * * * * * *

> "When Marx says that "man is at last compelled to face with sober senses his real conditions of life," he means that man is at last compelled to become amorphous. His choice is to follow the example of Katharine Smith and swallow any imbecility he is asked to swallow, or to suffer the pain of ever-worsening maladjustment. What Marxists say is true for man is also true for Marxism, because the culture of an amorphous and protean world must be an amorphous and protean culture."
>
> The Orthosphere: The Amorphous Soul (2020 November 23)

* * * * * * *

> ""Decolonize" is the latest form of the age-old rant of the powerless and self-destructive, namely to overthrow that which is in power so that people can rule by mass consensus. This basically means giving in to the lowest common denominator impulses in humanity, and always leads to socialism and tyranny, rapidly followed by a third-world subsistence living society. Whenever someone suggests something, it makes sense to ask whether they are competent; competence, after all, is the root of good and evil. Someone who is incompetent makes only bad results, while the competent can make good results, and tend to do so, because part of competence involves recognizing opportunity over fears."
>
> Amerika: Periscope – November 28, 2020

Related

- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review — The Rear View Mirror (2020 October 2)

The Motivation of Desire

Jack · 1 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Submitting to Authority brings awareness and maturity.

Readership: All

The Redemption of Headship

Under the previous post, More on Relational Archetypes (2020 November 28), Elspeth wrote,

> "Recognizing that submitting to your husband is ultimately an act of faith in God is a revelatory thing. It's something every Christian wife has to come to. No matter how head over heels she is with her husband, every woman — like every other human who has ever lived — has to contend with her desire to what she wants when her authority wants something else.
>
> But… when that realization comes, submitting to your husband transcends beyond tingles and human dynamics. It's a beautiful thing, and it turns a great marriage into a blissful one."

It is encouraging to hear this from a happily married Christian woman. From her statements, it seems that this shift in consciousness arises from revelation, or a sudden epiphany if you prefer. Husbands can teach Ephesians 5:22-33, and talk about authority until the droids come home, but this will come off as little different from demanding respect. (It doesn't work.) In order for women to experience this paradigm shift, to "get it", they need this touch from the Holy Spirit. For married men, this means we must pray for this to happen.

Bee123456 wrote,

> "I do not believe a married woman can completely mature unless she submits and respects her husband. It takes humility, faith, and trust in God to submit to an imperfect man that you are married to. The married woman stretches and exercises her faith when she trusts that God is directing and leading through her husband, and that God can work things together for good when the husband makes a mistake."

What Bee wrote is true, and this is a result of the spiritual authority of Headship. A woman usually won't submit and respect a husband unless she feels a strong need for security, love, attention, and guidance. She might do this out of her own willpower, knowing that it's commanded in the Bible, and/or because it's the right thing to do. But she won't experience the renewing power of authority in her soul unless she has some kind of internal motivation to do so (e.g. a strong libido, desiring the joys of sanctification, feeling broken by personal failures, or having various spiritual needs like trust, forgiveness, or a venue for expressing humility). This internal motivation is what drives the heart to be authentic and open.

Women who have an internal motivation (e.g. those mentioned in the previous paragraph, but especially a strong libido) are pressured into finding and developing a relationship with a man. Women who do not have a strong libido, etc., don't learn the benefits of authority (trust, humility…) until later in life, if at all. Women like this need to have authority imposed through a social structure, preferably her family. Remember how the herd mentality is very effective on women, for good or ill.

If you meet a woman who is very immature, then she probably never experienced the thrill of being under a male authority who titillates her desire and fulfills her innermost needs. I postulate that this is the underlying reason why feminist wimmin remain immature — because they have no internal motivation to fit themselves into a Headship (i.e. Tingly Respect) structure of authority. Instead, they reject male authority, and by extension, they reject the renewing power of the Holy Spirit — God Himself.

A rare woman who respects male authority.

The recognition of Authority can make a woman attractive

Recall what I wrote in the post cited above.

- Authority is sexual.
- Power is dynamic and visceral.

In that same post, I included a photo of a beautiful woman with the caption, "A rare woman who respects male authority". How do we know she respects male authority? It's because of two obvious qualities.

1. She makes herself attractive in men's eyes. She knows that this increases her sexual authority over men, but this also assumes that she values and desires a man to extol his own sexual authority over herself as well. If she didn't desire male attention, then she wouldn't go to the extra work required to stay thin and fit, and maintain every detail of her body (e.g. washing long hair every day, manicuring her nails, waxing, etc.)
2. She is (apparently) demure and has a quiet heart. This is what makes the difference between high MMV wife material and a high SMV slore. The woman with a quiet heart trusts in authority and feels serene and secure in her spirit. This may be an inner quality due to personality and upbringing, but it could also be from submission to the authority of God too. A slore wants to be in control and feed her addiction to the Feeelz more than she wants to recognize the socio-sexual authority that one man could have over herself. Thus, she makes herself attractive simply in order to leverage male thirst to extract something out of men, whether that be sensual thrills or something more materialistic. This same heart-felt recognition of authority is what gets lost or rejected in the case of the Alpha Widow Syndrome.

There's another kind of woman who values, wants, and needs male authority, but they don't know how to properly express respect for the man. They make themselves attractive to men and make great efforts to kick start a relationship. However, they also complain, throw tantrums, and are a headache in general, so it's not uncommon for them to be continually rejected by men. These women are similar to feminists in that they like to blame men for her own failures in being spiritually obedient. A woman like this usually has an acerbic mother who disrespected her father on a regular basis, so she is simply repeating the generational curse. This is why fathers need to exercise authority over the home and discipline the females in the family to behave appropriately. They subject their children to a curse if they don't.

The same goes for men

What I've written here about women needing authority in order to grow and mature is also true for men too, except that it's more complicated for men. Men need to develop socio-sexual authority and also submit to God's authority. This is the aspect that is omitted from other discussions about masculinity around the 'sphere.* There's a lot of talk about LAMPS, working out, developing your career, self-improvement, etc., but no one addresses how these things affect a man's socio-sexual authority. They merely point out that these things are attractive to women.

For the unmarried man who seeks to be married, or the married man who wishes to move towards a Headship structure, developing sexual authority and charisma is the whole point of these endeavors. Confidence has received a lot of airplay, but this is only the outward manifestation of authority. To gain authentic authority, a man has to dig deep in his soul, trust God with whatever he finds there, and become authentic in his self-expression. If he can experience the refinement of his desire through God's discipline, and come under the authority of the Holy Spirit, then he is one step closer to finding an authentic exercise of authority in his home and marriage.

 Dalrock and Deep Strength are two exceptions. They covered Headship and Authority rather regularly.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Meretricious Power and the Tingle (2018 October 9)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Headship in concept and practice (2019 January 24)
- All posts from Dalrock on Headship.
- All posts from Deep Strength on Authority.

The Amalgamation of Western Culture

Novaseeker · 2 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Christianity was blended with chivalry and other pagan traditions to create our modern social culture.

Readership: Christians
Note: I wrote these ideas in a comment at Christianity and Masculinity, and revised it to form this post.

Christianity as a Cultural Identification

Deep Strength made the remark,

> "To me, it's really crazy in retrospect how chivalry and courtly love have been integrated into Christianity by most of western churches."

Concepts like chivalry and courtly love were integrated into Western culture approximately 800 to 900 years ago, of course, long before contemporary feminism. Likewise, Christianity became an intrinsic part of Western culture since the days of the Holy Roman Empire, if not before.

These elements were incorporated into Western culture in roughly the same process. The influences of Christianity and the influences of folk religions were an ambient part of Western culture, and there occurred a blending of both of the elements together in terms of the mind, mindset and identity of the average Christian. Even though the Church itself never explicitly endorsed Chivalry and Courtly Love as doctrine (that is, until the advent of Churchianity), the average Christian growing up in this culture had these ideas impressed on their mind, their mindset, and their identity, and saw that as being merged with their "Christian" identity as well. Thus, these pagan influences came into the church "through the back door" by means of a de facto cultural merger on the personal level.

Because of this amalgamation of faith and culture on the grass roots level, the various influences within a culture were very much a two-way street, in that when that kind of identification happens, the influences can, and do, run in either direction. That is, Christianity can influence the culture – and this certainly happened over the course of the period during which Christianity was the "establishment culture" in the West – but Christianity can also become influenced by the culture, specifically by the elements of it that are extrinsic to Christianity in their origin.

The result is that for many Christians, the line between culture and Christianity became quite blurred – elements of the culture that were not Christian in origin were adopted by Christians because they were also a part of the culture, and the culture overall was considered a "Christian culture" (at the time), so it was "all good". But the elements were not, in all cases, Christian, even though they were accepted by, and adopted by, Christians, including for use in Christian churches and in the expressions of the Christian faith in its religious, and not merely its cultural aspects.

[image]
Christ Church, United Church of Christ, Halloween party.

Middle Class Values are no longer Christian Values

I've written on this before, about how one element of that was the way that "middle class values" became associated with "Christian values", and were practiced by Christians as if they were one and the same for a long time. But then during the past half-century or so, middle class values changed – they became much more feminist, much less consistent with Christianity's values, especially when it comes to raising daughters and their life script.

When American culture changed due to the influences of feminism, people simply adjusted their perception of what it meant to be a "Christian" around the new definition of what it meant to be "American middle class", more or less without missing a beat.

The underlying reason for this is the precedent of cultural amalgamation. That is, for most people, the concepts of what was American, what was middle class, and what was Christian had long since been merged in their minds, their mindsets, their lifestyles, and their identity, such that when one aspect changed, it was simply superposed onto the existing aspects. The new, changed, yet still merged, identity continued along, albeit in a more feminist version. These changes happened gradually over a period of time, and on a large scale, so it went totally undetected by the average Christian.

Almost no churches bucked this trend, apart from the most traditionalist outliers. Christians went on following the culture's middle class values, because, for them, to be middle class was to be Christian and vice versa. The idea that these were in conflict, or even could be, did not even compute for most Christians, because "middle class American" and "Christian" were practically synonymous, such that the "content" of being "Christian" was largely the same as the "content" of being "American middle class".

Deep Strength countered that this corruption is not constrained to the middle class.

> "Good point, although I might argue that it's closer to "American values" have become "Christian values." Some (or perhaps many?) are determined by the middle class, but most are rooted in rebellion and defiance against authority in the first place, which is why everything is going to crumble eventually. The American dream — material success and wealth — in particular is very at odds with Christ's mission of evangelizing and making disciples. Selfish vs selfless."

NYC Church Party? …or a nightclub?

The Slow Demise into Apostasy

As it stands, we are dealing with churches that are defending some elements of non-Christian culture that are present in their churches but which they do not even admit are not Christian. These "counter-cultural", traditional churches even go to great effort to conserve those surviving elements that are counter-Christian in nature. (Chivalry is a great example.) Furthermore, these beliefs are defended over and against "new" elements of non-Christian culture that they are (rightfully) resisting, rather than actually resisting all elements of non-Christian culture that are present in their churches. It's a mess of confusion!

Seen in this way, the differences between the "progressive" and "conservative" churches become, in fact, much smaller. Really, it is reduced down to what non-Christian elements are they willing to accept into the churches, given that both of them have done so, just in different ways, and with different degrees of self-awareness.

It can be sometimes hard to see this today, when so much of the church's self-styled "traditional" branches are loudly proclaiming that they are aloof from, and at odds with, this or that element of contemporary culture, be it abortion, transgender issues, gay marriage and the like. And it's true that there is an intentional cultural distancing going on. But the fact that this is going on now also serves to obscure the reality that the non-Christian elements of prior eras which continue on in the ambient culture still lurk under cover of so-called "conservative Christianity".

In other words, what they are conserving is, in many ways, not actually Christian, but merely the non-Christian elements of the prior version of the broader Western culture that had entered into the churches through the process I described above – a cultural merger and identification in the minds of the individual members of the churches (including clergy as well).

Related

- Σ Frame: Coffee Shop Churchianity (2018 February 5)
- Σ Frame: Hitting bottom must be necessary. (2020 November 6)
- Σ Frame: Progressive (2020 November 10)

What is Shalom?

Jack · 3 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Shalom is extremely important to God.

Readership: Christians

Ed Hurst uses the word shalom frequently because this is an important concept which has no English translation. After studying this word/concept for a time, I too have found a deep appreciation of it, and I have used it in my writings.

Because shalom is extremely important to God, it would benefit the reader to become more familiar with this concept. It's necessary for spiritual growth and peace!

Infogalactic gives a fairly complete picture of the concept of Shalom.

> The Hebrew term shalom is roughly translated to other languages as peace [En.] (i.e. paz [Sp. and Pr.], paix [Fr.], pace [It.]), from the Latin pax. Pax, in Latin, means peace, but it was also used to mean truce or treaty. So, deriving from the definition and use in Latin, most Romance terms simply use the word peace to mean such, and also provides a relational application (be it personal, social or political) – a state of mind and affairs. Peace is an important word in the Christian sacred scriptures and liturgy. Eirene, the Greek term translated to peace, also means quietness and rest.
>
> Shalom, in the liturgy and in the transcendent message of the Christian scriptures, means more than a state of mind, of being or of affairs. Derived from the Hebrew root shalam – meaning to be safe or complete, and by implication, to be friendly or to reciprocate. Shalom, as term and message, seems to encapsulate a reality and hope of wholeness for the individual, within societal relations, and for the whole world. To say joy and peace, meaning a state of affairs where there is no dispute or war, does not begin to describe the sense of the term. Completeness seems to be at the center of shalom as we will see in the meaning of the term itself, in some derivatives from its root, shalam, in some examples of its uses in Jewish and Christian Scriptures, and in some homophone terms from other Semitic languages.

> The noun shalom means safe, for example, well and happy. On a more abstract application, its use points to welfare, for example, health, prosperity, and, peace. It is the verb form shalam, though, that provides a deeper understanding of this term in theology, doctrine, and liturgy. Literally translated, shalam signals to a state of safety, but figuratively it points to completeness. In its use in Scripture, shalom describes the actions that lead to a state of soundness, or better yet wholeness. So to say, shalom seems not to merely speak of a state of affairs, but describes a process, an activity, a movement towards fullness. Using the King James Version as reference, James Strong lists the rendering of shalom and shalam, among others, as:

- To make amends
- To make good
- To be (or to make) peace
- To restore
- Peace
- Prosperity
- Wellness

> The use of shalom in the Scriptures always points towards that transcendent action of wholeness. Shalom is seen in reference to the wellbeing of others (Genesis 43:27, Exodus 4:18), to treaties (I Kings 5:12), and in prayer for the wellbeing of cities or nations (Psalm 122:6, Jeremiah 29:7). Coincidentally, the root shalem, means peaceful – though it is sometimes posited that this root is found in the name of the city Jerusalem (combined with yara, meaning to lay or found), this is likely a re-etymologization. Yet, its transcendence lies in its relationship to truth and justice (Psalm 85:10, Isaiah 48:18, 22, 57:19–21). The wholeness of shalom, through justice and truth, inspires the words of hope for the work expected by the messiah, and to refer to its revelation as the time of peace (Haggai 2:7–9, Isaiah 2:2–4, 11:1–9), and to even grant this anointed one the title Prince of Peace (Isaiah 9:6, Micah 5:4–5a).

[image]

> In the Christian Scriptures, the term eirene is employed to mean peace, but in its application, seeking for it the transcendence of its Hebrew counterpart, peace is better understood in relation to terms like grace (Romans 1:7), righteousness (Romans 14:17), and life (Romans 8:6). It is also employed in benedictions, like that in I Thessalonians 5:23 and Hebrews 13:20–21, perhaps making echo to prayers of peace common throughout the Hebrew Scriptures and Jewish benedictions (Numbers 6:22–27).
>
> This sense of completeness, central to the term shalom could also be confirmed in homophonic terms found in other Semitic languages. The term shelam, of Chaldean origin, seems to mean both peace and restoration. Aramaic derivations of the terms shalom and shalam are said to mean peace, safety, completeness and welfare. The Assyrian term salamu means to be complete, unharmed, paid/atoned. Sulmu, another Assyrian term, means welfare. A closer relation to the idea of shalom as concept and action is seen in the Arabic root salaam. Meaning to be safe, secure, and forgiven, among other things. It also proposes a personal commitment to the concept, action, and transcendence of peace – Salaam is also the root for the terms Muslim and Islam, literally translated, he/she who submits to God and submission to God, respectively.

The Calling of Samuel the Prophet, by Harry Anderson (1975).

I might describe shalom in my own words as a state of belonging; being a part of something important, something larger than one's self. It includes a spatial environment in which everyone and everything has a structured, ordered place. Acceptance, encompassing disciplinary mentorship and unconditional love, are available (ideally from one's immediate family) within shalom.

Even though the external world may be far from being perfect, shalom can be experienced discreetly in one's subjective life experiences, thereby yielding the impression that the people, and space, and everything within one's immediate proximity can be relatively meaningful, joyful, and peaceful. Shalom is also the intended reward of spiritual obedience.

Those who have crawled through the hood of hard knocks may scoff at the above description of shalom. But those who have, even once, had a glimpse of eternal glory will believe in the Truth of it, and may even hope to achieve the experience on a daily basis. So believe it if you can!

Clicking on a few of the scriptures hyperlinked above just might get you started!

Related

- Σ Frame: Ed Hurst's series: Return to Eden (2019 March 16)

Illicit Sex Upsets the Balance of Sexual Authority

Jack · 4 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The double standard is bad, but equality is worse.

Readership: Christians;

In Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14), I described at some length how a relationship that is founded on premarital sex delivers control to the woman. Thus, premarital sex is wrong because it creates a relationship having a female authoritative structure – a long way from the Christian ideal of Headship.

In order to have a Headship marriage structure, it is very important for a man to have sexual authority over his wife for several reasons.

- It increases his ability to garner her attention, investment, trust, humility, and favor.
- It satiates her fleshly nature, leading to less drama and more peace in the home.
- It reduces the wife's inclination, willingness, and overall ability to rebel.
- It makes it easier for the husband to rule over his household.
- The wife is more willing and passionate about lovemaking.
- It increases marital contentment and sanctification.
- It enhances one's overall quality of life.

In fact, the authority of the husband is the heart of the Headship structure!

In another post, Sexual Authority (2020 September 30), I covered how one's Sexual Market Value (SMV) is a rough equivalency of sexual authority. Here, it should be noted that sexual authority is a two-way street. IOW,

- A woman with a higher SMV has more sexual authority over males.
- A man with a higher SMV has more sexual authority over females.

But within marriage, there needs to be a certain balance. The man and wife need to exert sexual authority over each other, or else sanctification will be difficult or unachievable. To illustrate what I'm talking about here, there is a common complaint among men that if you can find a woman who respects you properly and treats you right, then she is so low on the SMV scale that you don't really want her. IOW, he has all the authority over her, and she has none over him. The corresponding complaint among women is that if you can find a man who is willing to offer monogamous commitment and be willing to marry you, then he is so low on the totem pole, that you don't really want him. IOW, she has all the authority over him, and he has none over her.

In a Headship structure, the man should exert more authority than the wife. But the Bible says that a husband should also be willing to die for the wife (Ephesians 5:25), so she needs to have an authority that is sufficient to warrant that kind of devotion from him.

[image]
Men, which woman would you die for?
Illicit sex is harmful to the Headship structure, because when a woman increases her N count, she is substantially decreasing the authority that her future husband may have over her body.

- Few women would get the Tingles for, and bear the child of a righteous man. No slore would do this.
- Few men would die for a virtuous woman. No man would die for a slore.

All things taken together, this is why men prefer virgins for marriage.

On the other hand, when a man increases his N count, he is also decreasing the authority that his future wife may have over him. But since the husband occupies (or should occupy) the primary position of authority in the marriage, the consequences for brash Chads who settle down are not quite as catastrophically d@mning as they are for s1uts who stick the landing.

There is a biological component to this as well. Women lose their ability to pair bond after 4-5 partners, but for men, it's 25-30.*

Both of the above reasons explain where the old "double standard" comes from. Very few people will argue for the double standard anymore, but in the past, it was usually used to excuse male promiscuity. This was one thing that put women into a rebellious mood and which motivated feminists to develop the current script of equaluhty. Nowadays, the hip fad is to argue against the double standard. But this is even worse, because not only are they feathering female promiscuity, they are also ignoring biology and refuting the Christian ideal of Headship.

[image]
 Of course, all of this is speaking from the viewpoint of a general praxeology. Results may vary from one individual to the next.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Time Frames for various forms of sexual bonding and maturation (2019 February 5)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification (2020 March 2)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Consent in Marriage (2020 March 9)
- Σ Frame: Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020 June 19)

Theories on Single Women in the Church

Lexet Blog · 5 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

This study draws together ideas about a woman's preferred Life Path and her desire for Authority, and offers suggestions for fathers and pastors.

Readership: Christian Men
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes
Author's Note: This study was first published at Lexet Iustitia on 2019 February 25. A revised, updated, and coauthored version (with Jack) appears here.
Reader's Note: Input is requested in the form of comments. Consider this a "working" post.
Disclaimer for secular readers: This post is based on observations of women who, to the best of my knowledge, are not leading some secret sinful life, or whose beliefs should be questioned. These are observations of baptized, professing Christian women in good standing, and with good reputations.

Desires and Life Path

Jack wrote about a woman's Life Path and how a woman tends to gravitate towards either dependence or independence. But when I look around, I see several types of single women in the church,* which may be categorized as follows.

1. Women who want to be housewives, raise their children, and keep the home (AKA "Stay At Home Mom", or SAHM). These women genuinely believe in what they want.
2. Women who want to be married and also have a career. They will either take care of their own children, or share the duties of raising children with others. Unlike the women in category 1, they are open to outsourcing the tasks of child care or rearing, and do not have a firm opinion on the matter.
3. Women who say they want marriage and children, but do not take this endeavor seriously. They behave in ways that contradict what they say they want. They do not prepare themselves to be wives and homemakers, but instead, seek out alternative lifestyles. They become college students, seek careers, and desire social and financial independence.
4. In reality, there is another category of women who forsake marriage and family to pursue other life aspirations.

It's hard to say how large this group is, because there are not too many women like this who attend church frequently. But statistically, these women will eventually get married anyway, at the ripe old age of 29.9+.

5. Theoretically, another category should exist for women who desire a life of celibacy, and forsake family and children. But I don't know of any women like this.

With respect to Life Path, women in category 1 are building dependency and possibly Headship. Very few Christian women openly place themselves in category 1. A larger percentage of women are in category 2, which tries to straddle the fence between dependency and independency. But the majority of women fall into category 3, which is clearly independence.

Concerning category 1, it is very rare for a young woman in the U.S. to live with her parents until she is married. It is also rare for a young, single woman in the U.S. to devote her time and energies towards her family of origin. (The Amish and Assyrians are pretty much the only exceptions.) Most girls either occupy their time outside the home, or are forced out by their parents. The families at my church send nearly all of their daughters off to public colleges immediately after high school.

Category 2 is apparently the "safety" position until the women are in a relationship. At that point in time they might be open about their desire to be in either the first category (dependent SAHM) or the third category (independent career gal).

Straddling the fence essentially prioritizes the woman's perceived happiness (which is presumed to be dependent on her Marriage Market opportunities) as the deciding factor. There are a few problems with this approach…

1. The big problem is that it doesn't involve any faith at all, and this spills into further problems for both the man and woman (as follows).
2. It is a problem for men, because until they get into a relationship with the woman, they can't really know what kind of relationship structure she is inclined towards, whether she favors dependence or independence.
3. It is a problem for women, because this lack of faith on her behalf could backlash. To outline this briefly, if her insecurities and lack of faith prevent her from making her goals/intentions clear (which is part of an unwittingly deceptive strategy to get into a relationship), then the man unwittingly assumes that she is OK with a Headship structure. But after she gets into a committed relationship, she then feels "secure enough" to express her true inclinations/desires for the relationship structure (which is likely to be Complementarian or Egalitarian, depending on her inclinations towards independence). If he doesn't want that kind of structure, then he is faced with a difficult choice — to either leave her flat, or else suffer through an unpreferred relationship structure. This problem is further shrouded and exacerbated if there is premarital sex. Either way is not good, as it fails to achieve a Headship type marriage.

4. It is a problem for the church, especially those that welcome home-schooling, because they have stigmatized the idea of wanting to be a SAHM in order to avoid being stigmatized by the outside world. This produces a shame-complex for those growing up in the church.

In summary of category 2, there is a cycle going on that looks like this.

lack of faith –> shame and confusion –> lack of faith

The large number of women in the third category also encounter a few problems. A career takes them out of the home, and college debt makes it harder, if not impossible, to become a stay at home parent and housewife. Not to mention the fact that most men do not want a career wife, and would not choose to marry such a woman. I am tempted to call these women hypocrites, but I think they are not that self-aware.

 I'm not sure if my categories and observations are similar across evangelical circles, or if it only exists in more rigid, orthodox communities that abide by doctrine.*

Spouse Selection according to Structural Archetypes

The previous discussion about the categories of desires serves to highlight how bizarre the selection methods are to achieve the dream of being a stay at home mom (SAHM). It makes me seriously doubt whether this is a real motivation for many young women.

In selecting a man, or desiring a man, there are three types of women in the church, two of which are reasonably achievable:

1. Those who seek a man who is an "alpha" and who can also offer status and/or resources.
2. Those who want a man who is their "equal", which can be translated as a man they can dig their claws into.

3. Women who live in a Disney fantasy and desire the perfect unicorn who is a bi-polar mix of 1 & 2.

I doubt any of these women are aware of this, but their choice of a man indicates their preferred relationship structure. Or at least, this is predictive of what kind of marriage they'll struggle to achieve.

Women who run after alphas are wanting the Headship structure, or at least the Tingles thereof. So women in category 1 make sense, as their actions fit our understanding of Red Pill theories about the state of nature. This also agrees with my personal experience.

Women who run after passive men show that they prefer to be the dominant person in the relationship (something other than Headship). Category 2 women are more difficult to diagnose. They would make sense if they were the stereotypical "post-wall" women (category 4 under Desires) who were desperate, and would settle for a guy that didn't provide status, or resources. But from my observations, they are too young for this to be the reason, which leads me to believe this is an acculturated preference about relationship structures.

From my observations, many (if not most) women in the Christian environment, including my church, are threatened by Alpha and masculine behavior, and take preference to more beta characteristics (men that are docile, controllable, and are not masculine by any objective standard). These women are apparently virgins of various ages who fawn after superficially "cute" guys who would be labeled soy-boys anywhere else.

Women who run after a fantasy man are… solipsistic (no surprise there), and present the worst choice for a man to have a relationship with, for that reason alone. They are utterly confused. They don't know what kind of relationship they want, and they don't know what that looks like in a man.

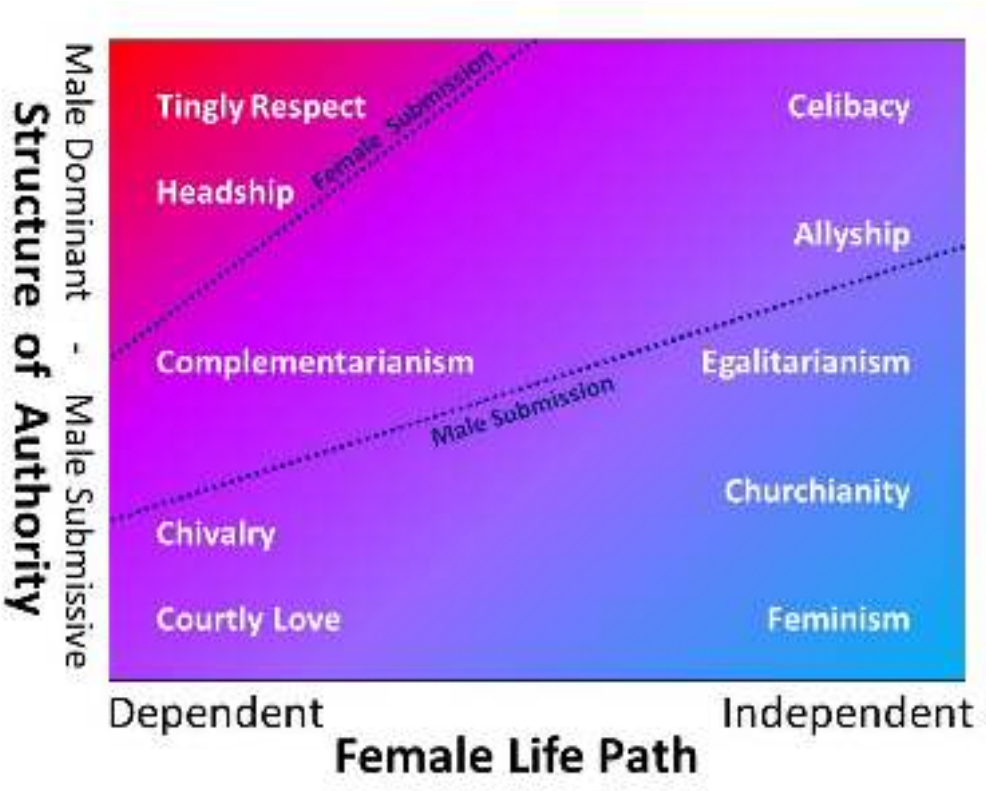
 I'm not sure if this is a "phase" that exists only in church circles or if it's just the new fad. From what I have observed, some of these women come from families where there is an obvious matriarch, or where there is an absence or excessive weariness of any strong male figure. (I presume many come from matriarchal families, just based on the fact that most fathers in our society are checked out of their responsibilities.)*

Some Theories

I assume these women are blindly following the Feminist cultural narrative, and are not thinking too much about what they are doing with their lives. On one hand, I find it bizarre that someone would intentionally place barriers into their path. On the other hand, it seems that no one cares enough to make an effort to clue them in, and even if someone tried, I doubt they would listen. Moreover, it seems that apathy and social conformity rules the day.

That said, I have a few theories that may explain some of the behaviors described above.

- Women raised in strict communities rebel by seeking weak men who won't be as rigid as their father/pastor. This allows them to seek after not only their husband's authority, but their fathers as well.
- Another theory is that these women grew up in environments where image was everything, and the grand show was Sunday morning church shows. They seek a man who would be picture perfect for the weekly "grand show," and want to order their life based on how they are perceived on Sunday.
- Where masculinity is not taught, modeled, and expected to be put into practice, disorder and chaos occurs.



Conclusions

Going back to Jack's graph about Relationship Structures (pictured above), there should be a match-up between what kind of man a woman desires (i.e. an authoritative type vs. a compliant type), and what kind of relationship she wants (dependent or independent). Using this structural model, we can almost predict what kind of marriage she'll wind up in eventually.

In terms of the structure of Authority,

- If she wants a Tingle-inducing Alpha, then she needs to plan on being a stay at home mom, find a Godly, masculine husband who provides for that lifestyle, and don't go into debt. This is the Christian concept of marriage and family.
- For those women who desire a more compliant man, pursuing an education and career may not interfere with that. But it should be stated that this is not an ideal Christian marriage.

In terms of Life Path,

- If she desires to be a SAHM, and she is honest about it, then she might attract a high value/high status man. If this is the kind of relationship she actually wants, then she should be preparing herself for marriage. This is the Christian concept of Biblical womanhood.
- If she wants to pursue her own interests, education, career, etc. (AKA postpornication), then she should expect to settle down with a less interesting husband. This is NOT the Christian concept of womanhood.

A problem comes up if they are attracted to one type of man, but this doesn't match the kind of relationship or Life Path they are chasing after. IOW, their desire doesn't match up with their wants. Jack said this is the makings of a curse. If this is the case, then they need to make an adjustment somewhere.

If fathers and pastors would take the time to point this out to young women, I think this could be one way to "break through" to them, and make the consequences of their choices clear to them.

Giving them a realistic expectation should make their decisions much less disappointing. At least they'll have a clue where they went wrong.

Likewise for men, if you want a Christian, stay-at-home wife, develop your own potential, and don't marry a stripper, or someone with debt obligations.

Related

- Σ Frame (Lexet): Courtship and Power (2020 February 17)

The Meet Cute Phenomenon

Jack · 6 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The Meet Cute phenomenon is an organic form of Headship*!*

Readership: Single Christians

A Meet Cute is a Tingly Respect structure

Earlier in February, Scott introduced us to the Meet Cute phenomena.

- Σ Frame (Scott): Probabilities (2020 February 24)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Opportunities (2020 February 26)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Meet Cutes – Are they common? (2020 March 13)

Recently, Scott took down his original video for several personal reasons. So I need to describe the Meet Cute idea for those who haven't seen the video.

A Meet Cute is when a woman is genuinely and uniquely attracted to a man, and initiates a relationship by giving him frequent Indicators of Interest (IOIs). She may or may not be aware of her IOIs, and in fact, it's more innocent (and better) if she isn't. Men are usually clueless about detecting a woman's IOIs, so they need a little guidance from other men on this.

Moreover, the basic formula for a Meet Cute is…

1. The man has true Authority over the woman.
2. The woman is willing and eager to become the man's Helper.
3. Propinquity.
4. Serendipitous timing.

Thus, the structure of male authority and the female Life Path required for Headship are well established right off the bat. The challenge for both the man and woman is to get out of their heads and recognize this.

The Meet Cute is monumentally important because Headship is excruciatingly difficult to attain. In the first post listed above, Scott insisted that Headship in general, and male sexual Authority in particular, can only be achieved and maintained if it was there in the initial and developing stages of the relationship. He makes this claim as a psychologist and counselor with many years of experience. Recently, he rephrased this concept into an axiom. (I'll call this "Scott's Axiom" from now on.)

> Scott's Axiom
>
> "It is more or less impossible to generate true, heart pounding visceral attraction from a woman who was lukewarm about you in the first place.
>
> And that which follows heuristically:
>
> If you marry a woman who was not out of her mind (e.g. breaking the rules for you that she sets for other men) be prepared to deal with the consequences of that at any point later in the marriage."

Scott phrases this Axiom from a man's perspective. It might be more true from a woman's perspective, but most women are unable to articulate visceral authority in this way. Instead, they go mushy on the Feeelz.

A Meet Cute signifies a Christian relationship structure

As discussed before, the Meet Cute phenomenon is a manifestation of authentic male authority over a woman who willingly submits to that authority. Since I first heard Scott's description of the Meet Cute, I've slowly come to recognize that this is actually a very Christian-like approach to get into a relationship, and for several reasons.

- It conforms to the Headship structure, which is the only structure that constitutes a Christian marriage.
- The woman is in a better logistical position to choose her Head and submit to him willingly and joyfully, than a man is to choose his Helper and hope that she is totally "on board".
- The relationship develops naturally and organically.
- It allows both the man and woman to express their true personalities.
- It allows all the nuances of the relationship to be discovered and developed with authenticity and passion.
- It allows the relationship to develop along the lines of shared values and interests, rather than objective assessment and cognitive analysis.
- The authentic, heart-felt interaction is conducive to humility, trust, respect, and spiritual maturity. (This is discussed further in the following section.)
- I'll speculate that redemption and sanctification are in the works for those who follow through to marriage.

Anyway, this authority does not arise from something the man does. It happens because of an inherent set of qualities that the man possesses, but has little direct control over. It also depends on the superposed gestalt of the relationship.

For example, consider the following gif and ask yourself these questions.

1. Which pairing glorifies God as a couple?
2. Which man would inspire her to get real and grow?

The Application

In The Motivation of Desire (2020 December 1), I wrote about how women need a visceral authority in order to grow and mature. This is also true for men too, except that men need to develop social status and sexual authority and also submit to God's authority. These are the aspects that are omitted from other discussions about masculinity around the 'sphere. There's a lot of talk about LAMPS, working out, developing your career, self-improvement, etc., but no one addresses how these things affect a man's sexual authority nor his spiritual state.

For the unmarried man who seeks to be married, or the married man who wishes to move towards a Headship structure, developing sexual Authority and charisma is the whole point of these endeavors. Confidence has received a lot of airplay, but this is only the outward manifestation of authority. To gain authentic authority, a man has to…

1. Dig deep in his soul.
2. Trust God with whatever he finds there.
3. Become authentic in his self-expression.
4. Find and pursue his God-ordained purpose in life.
5. Exercise discernment in his awareness of IOIs coming from eligible women.
6. Vet her by questioning her attitudes about Headship, and checking her habits of submitting to authority.

A young person should also remember that the Headship structure is what makes it a Christian relationship (by definition), and not whether either the man or woman are actual Christians. If you find a Meet Cute, you're practically already there!

Update

Due to popular demand, Scott has made a new video about the Meet Cute phenomenon. (2021 January 5)

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Headship in concept and practice (2019 January 24)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Theories on Single Women in the Church (2020 December 5)

Tips and Tricks to Time Management

Jack · 7 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever sat down and formally analyzed how you spend your time with the goal of becoming more efficient? Here is a guide.

Readership: All;
Note: This information is offered to help determine priorities, analyze time budgets, and maximize outcome and efficiency.

What is Time Management?

- Drawing out a proper schedule for using time.
- Doing the right things at the right times.
- Having a goal which directs how time will be spent.
- Being aware of how much time is being spent on certain activities.
- Taking action to control the use of time.
- Saving time in a smart, efficient ways.

Why Should We Learn About Time Management?

- The basic purpose is to organize and manage our time well.
- We can distinguish what is important and what is not, then we can make better decisions about priorities.
- We can finish everything we need to do.
- Saving time allows us to do more of what we want or need to do.
- We can develop a more efficient and restful life.

What Do We Really Need?

- A Quality Life – I need more time!
- Value Assessment – What will we choose to do, given a limited amount of time?
- A Channel for Desire – We want to control circumstances and lead a leisurely life, but instead, the busy demands of life seem to control us and make us tired.
- Time Assignment – Important to find time to spend with friends, family and self, while finishing everything else.
- Avoid Procrastination and Postponements – Poor work habits, and a poor job balance leads to reduced productivity and more stress. – I need to work successfully and have a personal life. How can I give fair time to each one?
- Awareness of Priorities: “Urgent versus Important” – What should I spend my time on? How do I decide?
- Stress Control – We get stressful by being too busy and having too many things to do.

Time Thieves

- External Factors – People or things in your environment or your schedule that create confusion or inefficiency.
- Internal Factors – Things about yourself that make you lose focus or become distracted.

Several examples of these factors are listed.

External Factors

- The sudden or time-consuming phone call.
- An invitation or conversation with a friend.
- The sudden customer, or other demanding people.
- Banquets or social occasions.
- Personal habits, sickness or emotional needs.
- Responsibilities to family.
- Homework, or covering work for coworkers.
- Time needed for transportation.

Internal Factors

- No clear goal and no order of priorities.
- Lack of discipline. No daily work plan.
- Lack of a deadline to finish your goals.
- Lack of order, the workplace is always in a mess.
- Too many cares about small things.
- Being resistant to changes.
- Too many interesting subjects in your vicinity.
- Don’t know how to reject a temptation.
- Lack of information and communication.

Divide Your Time into Blocks

- Sleeping – 8 hours/day
- Working hours – 8 hours/day
- Meals and cooking – 2 hours/day
- Spare time or hobbies – 2 hours/day
- Dressing and physical care – 1 hour/day
- Coffee break or quiet time – 1 hour/day
- Reading and study – 1 hour/day
- Transportation time – 1 hour/day
- Time with friends and family – 8 hours/week
- Housekeeping and maintenance – 3 hours/week
- Banking, bookkeeping, planning – 1-2 hours/week

How much time do you spend on each block?

How Should Time be Spent?

Life is short. We mortals can only expect to live around 70 years in this body. It may be simpler and more practical to look at life one day at a time. Each day, we sleep around 8 hours, we work around 8 hours. We spend about two hours cooking and eating. Another hour cleaning, washing and bathing. Most of our time is already preallocated, so people only have 2 to 4 hours of free/leisure time each day. Most people have even less than that. How you choose to use this golden time is critical to your life. So the point here is that time is of the essence.

What should you spend your time on?

- Decide what is important to you. What are your top priorities.
- Divide your time to do different things at set lengths of time, and then try to finish each task within the time period.

Making your schedule work is the trick.

Evaluating Priorities

The following table is a helpful guide to determine what to prioritize, and how to spend one's time. It divides various tasks into two dichotomous categories, Urgent vs. Not Urgent, and Important vs. Not Important.

	Urgent	Not Urgent
Important	I. • Establishing Identity • Balancing cash flow • Physical needs • Health and safety • Self-control; managing emotions, • Deciding and planning daily work • Networking conferences	II. • Preparing work • Long-term planning • Establishing relationships • Essential leisure time • Improving ones' ability
Not Important	III. • Telephone calls, e-mails • Social obligations • Writing reports • Meetings	IV. • Wasting time on the internet • Nonsense chatting • Too much time watching TV

Keys to Time Management

Going on the table above, the key to managing time wisely is to…

- Focus on the second box: "Important but Not Urgent"
- Put less time on the fourth box: "Not Important and Not Urgent".

After a while, we see improvements…

- The first box becomes smooth and easy.
- The second box becomes enjoyable.
- The third box becomes exciting.
- The fourth box becomes relaxing.

Control Your Time

- Set goals, follow a daily schedule.
- Keep the workplace in order.
- Set out your purpose at first, whenever you call someone or hold a conference.
- Before making promises or commitments, carefully consider if you really want to spend your time on this. Ask yourself, "Is this really essential for me to do?"
- Set a deadline for everything on-hand.

Control Your Environment

Learn how to do the following when necessary…

- Lock your door; value your right to privacy.
- Use lights and shades effectively.

- Turn off the computer and/or the telephone.
- Direct focused conversations; say “NO” to people.
- Save time by devising conveniences, or by making appointments and/or arrangements with people.
- Consider spending a little money on things that can save your time.

Organize the Logistics

Reduce your commuting time and reduce stress by living close to those places you go to frequently.

- Your place of occupation.
- The homes of important friends and family members.
- The market or grocery store.
- Any other places where you are committed to spend your time.
- Consider the cost/benefit analysis to using a car or motorcycle, as opposed to public transportation. I have found that using a motorcycle is 1/10 of the total cost of using a car (including the initial purchase, fuel, maintenance, taxes, registration, and parking fees), and it is faster and more convenient as well.

Whenever I have moved to a new location, I first make a map and place pins on all the places that I need to go each day and each week. Then I will choose to live in a place that is towards the geographic center of all these places.

Improve your workplace by organizing documents, tools, and other resources in an orderly and easy-to-find manner.

- Lab technicians, mechanics, and handymen should keep their work area clean and orderly, and use a storage system (e.g. file cabinet, pegboard, toolbox, etc.) to promote fast, easy accessibility.
- Recent research has suggested that standing is more healthy and efficient than sitting. So many newer companies place workstations on high tables rather than on traditional office desks. The benefits of this approach depend on the nature of the work.
- Office workers and blue collar laborers may find an L or U shaped workstation is conducive to productivity, because it reduces the frequency and extent of physical motion.

- Those who work primarily on a computer can use a large screen monitor, which allows more than one document or webpage to be viewed at a time with greater clarity. Personally, I use and recommend a 32″ monitor.
- Use adequate and well-placed lighting. Something as simple and easy as getting a polarized desk lamp can significantly improve concentration and productivity.

Conclusions

- Lay out a basic schedule for each day, week, quarter, and year.
- You should have clear goals.
- Devise a planned order of the whole process, start to finish.
- Choose your endeavors carefully. Don't let circumstances or other people choose for you.
- Consider how you will arrange your time to accommodate a given endeavor, so that you can do the right thing at the right time.
- Always be aware of what your priorities are, and how much time you are spending on any particular activity.

Get your act together. A well maintained time management will be good for your life.

Related

- Rob Says: Time (2020 September 30)
- A Father's Journey: Times Like These (2020 October 2)

“Flipping the Switch” is God’s Gatekeeping, not her Tingle management

Jack · 8 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Submission to sexual authority is subordinant to God’s prerogatives.

Readership: Christians

Flipping the Switch

Under a previous post, Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14), Bee123456 wrote,

> “I recommend that instead of thinking and writing that women are the gatekeepers of sex, that God is the gatekeeper of sex. When God is the gatekeeper, both men and women need to fear God and refrain from sex while they are single. When married, God flips a switch, and now the husband and wife own each other sexually. It is marriage and God’s rules that opens the gate for sex to occur righteously and frequently.
>
> When we award women the gatekeeper role, this can allow the following actions:

1. If the woman is willing to have sex before marriage, then the man can think that this is good since the gatekeeper is opening the gate to him.
2. If the woman is the gatekeeper, then she is encouraged to continue to practice gatekeeping after they are married; deciding when and how often to allow the husband to have sex with her. [For example,] Dalrock highlighted how Seminary President Al Mohler has been teaching men and women this false idea that married men need to continually earn the right to sex from their wife.

The Girl at the Gate, by Sir George Clausen (1889)

In general, I believe Bee’s perspective is patently true, based on 1st Corinthians 6:12-20 (NKJV).

> [13] Now the body is not for sexual immorality but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body.

> [18] Flee sexual immorality. Every sin that a man does is outside the body, but he who commits sexual immorality sins against his own body. [19] Or do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit who is in you, whom you have from God, and you are not your own? [20] For you were bought at a price; therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's.

In the very next chapter about marriage, we see how God "flips the switch", as Bee put it.

> [1] Now concerning the things of which you wrote to me:
>
> It is good for a man not to touch a woman. [2] Nevertheless, because of sexual immorality, let each man have his own wife, and let each woman have her own husband. [3] Let the husband render to his wife the affection due her, and likewise also the wife to her husband. [4] The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does.
>
> 1st Corinthians 7:1-4 (NKJV)

Here, we see that St. Paul describes marriage as one's body being the possession of his/her spouse. To amplify this a bit, we might even think of Biblical marriage as being your spouse's sex slave. In this statement, I am not referring to BDSM, but rather the idea that if your spouse says "Jump me in bed!", or makes an equivalent non-verbal invitation, then you have to jump on that at the soonest and nearest possible convenience, and do it until he/she is satisfied.

How does "flipping the switch" happen?

For most people, they eventually become enslaved to their sexual desires at some point in their youth, simply because this is the natural drive of procreation. But the question of morality dictates how this should be handled. The moral approach would be to get married before (or when) this occurs. The immoral approach would be to pursue the carnal nature for its own pleasures, consequences be d@mned.

Many young Christians who want to get married are overwhelmed by the idea of "Now we get to have sexxx… SEXXX!!!" This attitude towards marriage is naïve because it is taken as permission to gratify their desires, rather than as a duty to have sex on demand, and to glorify God. They do not seem to comprehend the core aspect of marriage as becoming a slave to your spouses and your own sexual desires. Instead they revel in the joys of being enslaved to their desire without any moral retribution. This is a reality that should be emphasized to young people, because this might help them crystallize a more realistic regard for sex and marriage.

There has been a lot of argument (especially from women) about how "flipping the switch" is unrealistic. The typical argument states that it's unreasonable to expect women to go from being pure, chaste virgins to ravenously horny housewives upon being married.

I would agree that this is nearly impossible for a woman who has already been around the block. Since it is these kinds of women who make this argument so vehemently, it is clear that this argument is made on the basis of preserving their egos and the feeling of being in control.

But in fact, we see this switch being flipped all the time. It happens when a young woman has sex for the first time (or the first few times). She suddenly changes from a passive, naïve girl with flighty dreams about romance, into an edgy, $ħit testing, c0ck craving nympho. Moreover, this reality only highlights the necessity of remaining chaste before marriage. But instead, these days we see too many women, even within the Church, who are all too willing to spill their beans, eagerly becoming slaves to their desire.

Waiting, by Claude Monet (1889).

Conclusions

If a woman was to adopt the mindset of gatekeeping for God, then this loses traction if she also chooses which man she wants to marry. I'm not saying this is wrong, but only that it is easy for her to lose sight of herself as an instrument in God's hands, and see marriage more as a vehicle to satisfy the Tingles. Or else postpone marriage until such an opportunity arises, if ever. Same goes for men. Men typically have a low interest in marriage, except when it is believed that (1) marriage might increase the frequency of sex, or (2) marriage is the only morally licit context for sex. If men and women regarded marriage as a primary venue of submitting to God's authority, and expressing their own sexual authority, and not so much as a moral context to access the gratification of being enslaved to one's sexual desire, I believe this shift in consciousness may prove to be very rewarding.

Related

- Σ Frame: No Authority to give “Consent” (2020 March 6)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Authority (2020 September 30)
- Σ Frame: Illicit Sex Upsets the Balance of Sexual Authority (2020 December 4)

Exploiting Online Attention

Novaseeker · 9 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The internet gives women more of what they want, and less of what they don't.

Readership: All

Being Female is sooo much Trouble!

Σ Frame: The Objectification of Reproductive Potential must deliver an Ego Rush or else it is Chauvinistic. (2020 November 18)

In this post, Jack is talking about the top 50-60% of women under 30 who get showered with incessant attention in real life. The core life problem for most women of that age range is not "how do I attract men?", but rather "how do I attract the attention of those few men I find sexy, and what do I do with all of the "excess attention" I am getting all the time from these losers who are out of my league?"

When a woman is in the 35-40% of women who do not get as much attention in real life (i.e., conventionally unattractive women), they do resent things like "beauty standards" and so on, because they are not getting the smorgasbord of attention they can obviously see conventionally attractive young women getting showered with. Because women are competitive when it comes to male attention, this rankles them. Attacking other women directly, while also done, is also somewhat ineffective (same as men attacking other men for fornicating) and also somewhat against the collective/herd approach and therefore somewhat taboo. So instead, the main vector of attack is on men, of course, and male attraction standards. It's all transparent what is actually happening, however, and most men are quite aware of it once they themselves are past a certain age as well.

The Internet is a Smart Choice for Wimmin

As you can imagine, a savvy woman would deal with all these problems by finding ways to filter for what they want, and screen out what they don't. Enter the internet! Various apps and online forums now provide prodigious opportunities for computing the maximum return for the minimum investment, all available at their fingertips in a comfortable and relatively sheltered environment.

And, of course, we also see the opportunistic blending of all the approaches mentioned in the first section being done by the same woman, as they may lead, when combined, to various personal advantages.

This fully explains why there are so many women who make their presence known online, even though these online forums have a much worse chance of actually leading them to the kind of top man they desire. Online, the percentage of women is even higher than men, and the number of women at higher ages is still much higher than Manosphere guys ever want to admit, albeit lower than for women in their 20s.

A conventionally attractive female celebrity, for example, can cultivate her conventional beauty by spending hours in the gym and with beauty treatments, skin regimens, makeup application, sartorial choosing and the like, while at the same time burning a pinch of incense, as it were, for the publicly expressed social and political values of the female collective by decrying beauty standards in an Instagram post where she, herself, is exemplifying such beauty standards to the tee, but also engaging in a token act of rebellion against them, like sticking out her tongue, or making a face, for example.

To take one of many examples of this, Miley Cyrus is kind of a professional at this, and is constantly striking poses that claim to "stick it to tradition" (either through her behavior, or her haircut, or her making faces, or what have you), while at the same time maintaining very high conventional beauty standards in her toned physique, makeup application, sartorial choices (for proper photo shoots and appearances) and the like, and of course was literally married to a Hemsworth brother as well for a while. The result is that she can both suck up tons of yummy male attention while at the same time pretending to shake her fist at the patriarchy in feigned solidarity with her less conventionally attractive and mostly female fan base and the media at large which promotes her as well, all to her great personal benefit.

Her Grandiloquent Impertinency, Miley Cyrus.

The Internet is Changing the Norms of Intersexual Dynamics

Much of modern social life and interaction has moved to the online realm (exacerbated no doubt by the pandemic but not created by it). This has made it possible for lots of women, and not by any means only or even primarily the conventionally very attractive, to garner lots of male attention online. This is because the online world provides a safe space for the exchange of (1) visual access to female physicality for (2) male attention.

In past eras, this happened in the real world as well (and still does), but it was rather hemmed in, at least in polite society. In higher end social settings, men and women were checking each other out, but it was done subtly. In lower settings, like when walking past a construction site, the attention offered to an attractive young woman has, by contrast, never been particularly subtle.

The online world has changed this and created a safe space for the exchange of access to visual female beauty for male attention. The fact that this male attention has tremendous value to women — likely both intrinsically and as a means of intra-sexual competition with other women — is strongly indicated by the widespread participation in this activity by women in general. And, of course, some women find it lucrative as well in a practical sense such that they can entice male viewers to part with actual cash to continue viewing them in more revealing ways, which is, in effect, the privatization of pornography.

The site “OnlyFans” is a prime example. The sudden popularity of this site should surprise no-one, as the site merely represents the monetization of the intersection of two strong and durable social trends: (1) the rise of online porn, and (2) the rise of social media use by women for sexual attention. This exchange of sexualized content for money, in some cases, could be considered a type of soft prostitution. In certain cases, it undeniably takes the form of hard prostitution.

Bad News for Men

We are witnessing a strange social entente concerning how women deal with male attention and how men are permitted to show it. This cultural phenomenon is manifested in three noteworthy shifts.

1. The expression of male attention in the real world has become subject to much stricter limits, rules, restrictions, and expectations.
2. Male attention online has become more sought after and more treasured by many women — even if, in almost all cases, the attention is coming from men who are in the “loser — would never give the time of day in real life" category.

3. The monetization of sexualized interactions is becoming socially acceptable.

What has happened is that women have, in effect, moved the "acceptable location" for the expression of such male attention (which, again, has always been expressed in public in subtle and at times unsubtle ways) from the real world to the virtual one, where it can be more controlled, is less threatening and messy, and is subject to being manipulated and monetized more effectively.

All this brings us to a surprising conclusion regarding men — unwanted male attention is more wanted in 2020 than it has ever been before, provided that it is supplied in certain contexts and not others. The desire for this "excess attention" from less desirable men has always been there (women have always liked being generally attractive to men, which would include even unattractive men), but it has even more value today than it did in earlier eras, because the context in which it is now generally permitted to be expressed is safer for women, with fewer drawbacks, and more advantages than the real world expression of it was.

Related

- The Other McCain: Insta-Whores (2019 April 30)
- Σ Frame: Women's choice to be relevant (2020 February 6)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Crunching the Tinder Whoard (2019 September 20)
- Σ Frame: Yet another variety of Internet Whoring (2019 October 9)

The Enigmatic “Right Time” Phenomena

Jack · 10 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A topic the Manosphere has never sufficiently explained.

Readership: All
Note: This post is an exerpt from the previous post, Things I Learned About Women in College – Section 4 (2018 April 4).

What Determines the ‘Right Time’?

There is this weird ‘Right Time’ phenomena. It might be due to a biological clock of some sort, or it might just be how humans get something in their heads, which they tend to act out.

Women especially, have this notion of, ‘it’s the right time’ to do something, and this isn’t well understood, even by themselves.

When they feel it’s the ‘Right Time’ to start being sexually active, then they just start being sexually active, and they’ll do it with whatever guy happens to be in their life at that moment. It doesn’t really matter much who the guy is, as long as he serves the male function in her life (and bed), and he doesn’t revile her ego in the process.

Even the Tingles are not a significant motivator, although they often serve as a catalyst. For example, Stacey gets the Tingles for Chad, but she can’t bed Chad, so she does John instead. But John can’t sustain her Tingles, so she doesn’t respect him or take him seriously. As soon as she meets Rob, the Tingles strike again, and that makes her grow irritated with John and branch swing to Tom. But Tom cannot tingulate her any better than John could. Repeto itero, ad nauseam, et cetera. (It’s a recursive process that I have seen happen sooo many times… This is why female sexuality is so heavily regulated in patriarchal cultures, and also why sexually liberated women despise patriarchy.)

And then, when women feel it’s the ‘Right Time’ to get married, then they just get married, and they’ll marry whatever guy happens to be in their life at that moment. Again, it really doesn’t matter too much who the guy is, as long as he seems to be ‘marriage material’, and is somewhat disliked by her parents. I guess it wouldn’t matter at all who he is, if she’s only going to strip him of all worthy assets, and then dump him when the source dries up. Here also, the Tingles are not a significant motivator, although they serve as a catalyst. This also has well known, catastrophic consequences, such as affairs, cuckolding, frivorce, and legalized kidnapping.

This phenomenon stands in contrast from reports I’ve heard about many other women who say they are looking for ‘the one’. I haven’t met many of those. But I will conjecture that ‘the one’ in those women’s fantasies is merely a mythical creature of their imaginations, as mentioned before, someone who accelerates their Tingles past full throttle – an entirely fictionalized fantasy with no useful purpose other than to validate their ego.

Why is the ‘Right Time’ always the ‘Wrong Time’?

The thing that made me confused (and resentful too), is that the ‘Right Time’ for women to have sex, always happened long before the ‘Right Time’ came for them to marry. I came up with the following reasons why this might be.

- It is a selfish desire for satisfaction, and an inability to delay gratification, coupled with low moral convictions, and no social consequences surrounding sexual activities.
- General immaturity, and an associated inability to accept the responsibilities involved with a mature relationship and sex.
- They all got waylaid by Satan’s deception, on an industrialized, mass production scale.

What is Going On?

So just what is this ‘Right Time’ phenomenon?

- Is it a Baader-Meinhof illusion?
- Is it a Psi-Mediated Instrumental Response?
- Is it a subconscious pareto chart of emotional needs?
- Is it biochemistry and/or hormones?
- Is it Clairvoyance or Second Sight?
- Is it Divination?
- Is it God?
- Is it a special manifestation of solipsism?
- Is it synchronicity?
- Is it the sinful nature?
- Is it something else?

Exit Question: What do you think causes the ‘Right Time’ phenomena?

Related

- Σ Frame: A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose (2020 September 4)
- Σ Frame: “Flipping the Switch” is God’s Gatekeeping, not her Tingle management (2020 December 8)

3 Things that make Women Tick

Jack · 11 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Elspeth gives us the scoop on the female psyche.

Readership: All
Theme: Doors, Gates, Walls
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Intro

Elspeth left a lengthy comment under the post, The Motivation of Desire (2020/12/1). I believe Elspeth is the real thing, so I want to go over her comments here, and see if we can glean any further insights.

Elspeth wrote,

> "The notion that a woman who works to look good to men is submissive and demure? That is outlandish on its face. Demureness can be manufactured and it's entirely possible for a woman to be all of those things on the surface but underneath it all is something that will suck a man's soul dry."

To be clear, I did not say that a woman who works to look good to men is submissive and demure. I said that a woman who works to look good to men and who is also (truly) submissive and demure is respectful of male authority. Maybe a better way to say this is that if a woman is respectful of male authority, then she will show it by being submissive and demure, and making herself attractive. I also mentioned that this is an exceedingly rare combination. It's also difficult for men to discern this from the fakers.

> "This may fall on deaf ears, but I'm going to tell you what makes women tick, hopefully in descending order. I've been married since I was 22 years old (26+ years now), so my knowledge is based on my experience (both when single and married) and the observation of the women around me, both married and single."

1. Social/Familial Acceptance

> "If a woman has a close knit family with high standards and a father she emotionally loves and feels a strong aversion to disappointing, she's less likely to get into mischief. Having a "good dad" isn't the same thing as having a dad she truly doesn't want to disappoint.
>
> I deeply respected my dad for the way he worked hard to raise all of us as a widower, but the emotional connection wasn't there, and my husband was able to –quite easily – capture my heart away from any sense of family duty. Our girls have an emotional heart connection with their dad; they take him out and do fun stuff with him just because. They also have a healthy reverential respect for him. They think in terms of "Secret Agent Man's daughters don't do this or that". It never occurred to me to spend that kind of time with my father as a young adult. I was acutely aware, however, of how much I had embarrassed him.
>
> If she doesn't have that kind of high accountability/close knit family relationship (few young women do), then she pulls out all the stops to be accepted in her peer group; whatever that is and whatever that looks like. Humans are social creatures, and women are the most social of all creatures. And women want to be liked and accepted (envied may be even better)."

2. Men and Sexual Attractiveness

> "The younger a woman is, the more likely her choice of mate is determined by what you refer to as tingles. It just so happens that under the age of say, 27, her friends will be totally and completely supportive of her slumming around with a guy heading nowhere fast so long as he's hot, and so long as she's still doing all the stuff (grad school, career advancement, etc.)."

3. The Fantasy Life / Lifestyle

> "I was raised by a Silent father (no mother first decade of life), so I never really entertained that kind of fantasy life, but it is rampant today, and the influence is powerful. Girls make all kinds of nonsensical decisions if it feeds the imaginary life she's pined for. It doesn't help that we're all being told ad nauseum to "follow our dreams". Never, EVER underestimate the power of the narrative that plays in the heads of the average woman. Those narratives include travel (what IS it with the travel stuff?), a fabulous job that doesn't feel like work (it's like we've all forgotten that it's called work for a reason), and a 6'+ man that is the best of everything both male and female.
>
> Great sex can throw a monkey wrench in all that, but it won't last long if she notices that the dream is slipping from her grasp. If the guy doesn't tick ALL the boxes, it won't be enough. She'll be out; first emotionally, then sexually, then the rest of her. No amount of anything is going to make a woman happy with a man whom she sees as the one thing that kept her from the fabulousness of what she was meant to be. And to her, it WILL be his fault, no matter how good looking or how much sexual prowess he has. If he has money, he might be forgiven, because at least she can show that off. But sans wealth, all bets are off, and most men are not wealthy."

Conclusions

I was not surprised to read points 1 and 2, but I was shucked by what Elspeth wrote in the last paragraph — that the mental narrative (AKA solipsism, which is a form of sin) trumps all else.

One question I have at this point is, why are a woman's solipsistic dreams so much more important than submitting to a fantastic man who loves her? Not even sexual bonding is enough to get her to tune into her God ordained purpose as a woman? WTH??? And no matter how good her life might be, fantasy land will always be "better".

Actually, this is a question that strikes to the core of mankind's relationship to God. Why does man reject the promises of God in favor of his vain imaginings of solipsistic sin?

Related

- Laughing at Feminism: In Her Father's House (2019/11/25)
- Σ Frame: What do women think they contribute to a relationship? (2020/9/21)
- Σ Frame (TheDeti): The Feminist Life Script (2020/12/17)
- Laughing at Feminism: No Patriarchy for My Daughter!!! (2020/12/24)
- Spawny's Space: Is This What They Really Want/Expect? (2025/8/6)
- Spawny's Space: What They Want (2025/8/8)

A Ring of Gold in a Swine's Snout

Jack · 12 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women might have more dignity if they took themselves less seriously.

Readership: Christian men and women
Theme: Doors, Gates, Walls
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Intro

Western culture is so saturated with female sexuality, that we have grown accustomed to the frivolity. Women are favored by default, so that anytime it is "his word against her word", the woman is believed and the man is denigrated. Even the church has become so enamored by the pedestalization of wimmin, that we have lost sight of the glory of God. (This is Sharkly's whole testimony in a nutshell.)

> "Now feminists who look like the bottom of a soiled foot will be upset with fashion models because, as they say, they can sleep their way to the top and gain advantage over others due to their fabulous looks. But as I say often, pretty people are people too and we should not discriminate against them."
>
> The Overman Warrior: We are not supposed to have elites in America, A ruling class is something to look down on, not to worship (2020/12/8)

Likewise, we should not discriminate in their favor either, that is, not merely on the basis of their attractiveness.

For all the chuffy pop talk about the evils of discrimination, only ugly feminists have the privilege of being able to mention that women are routinely discriminated in favor of their attractiveness. But as Cliffhanger humorously notes in the above quote, this in itself, is a form of reverse discrimination.

Interestingly, the feminists are right about this, despite the blatant bigotry. As the saying goes, "even a broken clock is correct twice a day".

Or as the Bible says,

> "As a ring of gold in a swine's snout,
> So is a lovely woman who lacks discretion."
>
> Proverbs 11:22 (NKJV)

I think she must have very ugly tits and/or nips. Why else would an otherwise attractive woman want those distracting, gaudy tats?
Elspeth explained this further.

> "Demureness can be manufactured, and it's entirely possible for a woman to be all of those things [men desire] on the surface, but underneath it all is something that will suck a man's soul dry."

Yes, true feminine Charitas is a rarity. Most women who work to look good do it for self-centered motivations, and many of these women are good at faking it.

Yes, these women have real sexual authority, but it is a cheap blunderbuss for women who only flaunt their sex appeal for self-centered reasons.

Men are often oblivious to the subtle differences and fail to discern the trappings of feminine Machiavellianism until after it has been sprung on them. And by that time, it's already too late.

A Humorous Analogy

To give the reader a fresh taste of what is happening with women who wield their feminine authority without discretion, let me draw the following analogy of a man who bombastically flaunts the social image of his masculine authority.

Consider a local fireman or policeman who comes to the church worship service fully dressed in his occupational attire.

Let's take the policeman as an example. He comes in with his girlfriend or family and sits towards the front of the sanctuary. Someone in the congregation objects, saying that his wearing his 8-point cap, nightstick, and 9 mm. during the service is distracting and unnecessary. In response, the policeman gets angry and says he is "offended". He says he's sworn to defend the life, liberty, and property of everyone there, including the pastor. He talks on at length about his duties and responsibilities to the public. He says that his opponent doesn't appreciate his sacrifice, and that he is disrespectful to his authority as a policeman.

If the policeman was truly on the job, on a mission to keep law and order at the church and to protect the pious from being martyred (which is gradually becoming the reality), and for whatever reason, he was required to be in uniform, then he would stand in the back corner of the sanctuary or near the door and try to draw as little attention to himself as possible.

Image Credit: Scroll (Serena Maxwell): Alabama church wants its own police force (2017/4/3) [Archive]

Now, this illustration of the policeman "worshipping" in full regalia is obviously ridiculous, yet somehow, we don't feel the same way about young women coming to church, dressed to show off their reproductive wares to the well-off deacons and the pastor's handsome son.

Maybe we should.

Conclusions

One of the purposes of female head coverings is so that women do not draw excessive attention to themselves and thereby distract our attention from worshipping in the presence and glory of God.

But some people take women so seriously, that they are slow to understand this.

Related

- Σ Frame (Lexet): Christian vs. Non-Christian Women (2020/2/8)
- Laughing at Feminism: There are no longer whores, only verbally abusive men. (2020/7/31)

The Masculine Dilemma

Jack · 13 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

She might be a plain Jane, but will she cook and bang?

Readership: Men
Audio: Listen to this post on BitChute. (Thanks Oscar!)

In this post, I want to present an idea that will probably not be too popular, but it's an important heuristic thought experiment for us to consider.

Over the past month, the overriding theme here and at Christianity and Masculinity has been about the Headship structure — authoritative men and females as their submissive helpers. This perspective has redefined the ontology between men and women. It cuts out the distractions of sex, romance, and attraction, and focuses on the basic structure and functionality of the relationship, and whether it glorifies God.

We men are quick to be critical of what we find attractive in women, and how women fail to match up to our standards. Christian men are also aware of how they don't measure up to the Biblical standard.

Most men want to choose a woman based on her attractiveness, and then we expect her to become a respectful, submissive wife. This is similar to a woman who wants to bag a Chad, and then magically transform him with her lurrrve into a faithful breadwinner. We're quite aware of how ridiculous the latter is, but the former comical notion is seldom addressed.

Why not turn this around the other way? Why not choose a woman based on how respectful and submissive she is, and then watch her attractiveness bloom?

Suppose a man were to choose a woman based on how good of a helper she is, or would be. This situation would be very reminiscent of a boss hiring a new employee. Education would be a plus, good health would be a plus, initiative, problem solving skills, hands-on abilities, social dexterity, all positive traits. Personality traits like openness and agreeableness would also be pluses.

A Strong Independent Woman™ might actually be a positive characteristic, if she could be trusted to do the job she was assigned to do, be submissive and respectful about it, and not go Renegade.

On the other hand, her physical attractiveness would fall towards the bottom of the list, in terms of practical importance. If we are completely honest with ourselves, the type of woman who is outwardly attractive to men — the young, feminine, high SMV, and of course, sexy hot girl — is typically rather immature, impertinent, and unreliably flighty. A woman who passes the boner test with flying colors may very well have no real ability to perform as a respectful, submissive helper, and thereby fulfill her role in a Headship marriage. This truth is more obvious when we admit that a woman's ability to incite sex appeal is correlated with her sexual experience (up to a point).

A very unpleasant truth it is! I can already see the comments pouring in now…

> "Buhut, ah don't wanna marry no ugly girl, no matter how good she is."

But hold on, why do we think a submissive, respectful girl must also necessarily be mud ugly? Perhaps this is a smokescreen from Satan, designed to get us to reject this mindset out of hand.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Theories on Single Women in the Church (2020 December 5)

Zizek – Everyday Sexuality

Jack · 14 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Fantasy and frustration is the mark of the madness.

Readership: All;
Length: 2,550 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes
Video Length: 10 minutes

Although Slavoj Zizek is ostensibly deceived into thinking that feminist culture is a good thing, I do recognize him as a brilliant thinker and incisive philosopher. However, I have some deep disagreements with him about this piece.

Slavoj Zizek — Consent, incels, pornography & feminism (2020 June 10)

A full transcript with my commentary follows.

> Do you know what I find sad about…
>
> I totally support the goals, the political cause of Political Correctness, #met00, and so on.
>
> What I find problematic is that they like to emphasize that, "Don't refer to psychoanalysis. Freud is outdated." and so on and so on.
>
> But I think that what too many of them are effectively doing, is repressing Freud's basic insight. That of a split or divided subject and that of the unconscious.
>
> The fact is that people in general don't know what they want, and don't want what they desire.

The above line in bold indicates a curse is present. Having peace with God entails a state in which one's wants, needs, and desires are all in cohesive agreement with both God's covenant Law and reality.

> This is why — I like to provoke you a little bit — This is why one of the big politically correct models [is] to [insist] on explicit free consent ahead of every sexual act. Of course, it should be done, I'm not crazy. For rape, I'm not opposed to it. But I think we should be aware of all the ambiguities that come with it…

Zizek is acutely aware of the fallen human nature, and he correctly identifies this as the basic reason why liberal independent feminists demand consent legislation.

But you can't get consent from a masturbating monkey suffering from delusions of grandeur.

> Do you know incidentally that now they are punished by this, by all those bushfires in New South Australia.

Is Zizek, who is presumably an atheist, alluding to divine justice or that there is a vengeful god?

> The state enacted this — a friend told me — you are legally obliged to somehow register your [consent]. But I claim that if there is violence in sexuality, you will not prevent it in this way. Because again, sexuality for me is constitutively the domain of fictions, of ambiguities, and everything can be, for this reason, perverted, used against.

I believe that Zizek is right – that sex is ambiguous and laden with power plays – but not because of the reason he states. The reason is because legislation cannot prevent people from exploring and expressing their sexual desires, and some people actually like it rough. Legislation only determines what is acceptable or punishable by law.

> For example, I will tell you a story which really depressed me.
>
> One of the politically correct rules is, at any point in sexual interplay, all of the partners, both of the partners, [should] have the right to say, "Sorry, I no longer want to do it. I'm stepping out."

Another similar situation is where one person is strongly attracted to another who fails to have any feelings of attraction.

> OK, I'm sorry to say, I know women and men who use this in an extremely brutal way as a further means of humiliation. For example, an ex-friend of mine, who is for this reason no longer a friend of mine, likes to seduce a woman, and when she is totally excited in it, he says, "Oh sorry, I no longer feel it." And so on and so on.

Of note, a person who chooses to be obedient to God by turning down an invitation to illicit sex could also be seen as cruel by the person who made the advance. This has happened to me a few times.

> So you know, that's the reality of sexuality. Don't fall into this trap [of thinking] that sexuality is in itself the domain of being gentle, gentle activity, being nice to each other, and those external relations of power corrupted.

Zizek has an accurate view of raw, unmitigated, non-negotiated sexual desire. But the people who are turned on by the rough fantasy game play are a small subset of the population. If we interpret this as a form of projection, then we can presume that Zizek likes role playing, and he likes it rough.

> If there is a lesson from Freud, it is that sexuality is, in itself… permitted by power plays, sadomasochism, and so on.

Aside from Freud's eccentric psychoanalytic explanations, this bit is true. All the hype over 50 Shades of Grey only proves that women get Tingly wet for, and offer sex to powerful, charismatic men.

> Let me exemplify this with a beautiful example I found in media.
>
> In The Guardian, in a recent comment there… mentioned a moment in The Butterfly Effect, John Ronson's podcast series, about the after effects of internet pornography.
>
> In this podcast, you see on the set of hardcore porn [?], a [male] actor loses his erection in the middle of the scene, and to get the erection back, he turns away from the naked woman in front of him and grabs his phone and searches for PornHub and so on. [Laughter]
>
> I think this scene is the reality of our sexuality. The lesson of [Freud's] psychoanalysis is precisely this. Something is rotten in the state of sex. Human sexuality is in itself perverted, exposed to sadomasochism. Even when I'm alone with my partner, my sexual interaction with him or her is inextricably intertwined with my fantasies. Every sexual interaction is potentially structured like masturbation with the real partner.

"My sexual interaction with him or her" … ??? I can't tell if he's speaking vicariously or not.

> So I think the thing that so horrified this journalist…
>
> "My Gott, you have a naked woman there, the thing itself, and you lose interest and you go [browsing PornHub]!"
>
> That's it! This is exactly how every day sexuality is structured, I claim.

I'm sure this is "every day sexuality" for some. The nature of lust renders one in such a corrupt state that the wanting is perceived as being better than the having. This is what I call a "poverty mentality".

> So we cannot reduce this gap between the bodily reality of my partner, and the universe of fantasy. We cannot reduce it to a distortion opened up by part reality and social domination and exploitation. The gap is there from the very beginning. So I can quite understand the actor who, in order to regain his erection, searched Pornhub. He was looking for a phantasmatic support of his performance. It is for this reason that, as part of the sexual intercourse, one partner asks the other to go on talking. I was never doing it, at least, I heard that many lovers, one partners says, "While we are doing it, go on talking about something dirty!" Obscentities, and so on.
>
> It's again, the condition that the body itself is not enough. You need a fantasy support.

The hoodwinking attraction of sexual sin is that it elevates fantasy above reality. Years ago, an obsessive preference for fantasy was once classified as a symptom of madness. But now, it is "every day sexuality".

> Do you see, one of the absolutely greatest feelings, I claim this negative dystopia in Tell Gillian's Brazil, where they go to a group in a future totalitarian society at a restaurant, and you order food, and then what you get is on a plate, something that looks like a piece of [?], or a cake of mud, and a photo of what this really is, a beautiful steak, and so on. That is now the reality.
>
> We never thus have, as it were, the thing itself.

This is true. In this fallen world, image is everything. In the solipsistic mind, the vain imaginings of one's desire are everything.

Another similar example is fast food commercials. Whenever we see a TV commercial showing high resolution images of attractive, pop-eyed people holding hamburgers with their thumbs awkwardly on top of a sesame seed bun, with glistening droplets of water on the lettuce and tomato, and savoring those steamy, golden brown, salt-encrusted French fries, we suddenly feel hungry for that food. But when we pull up to the drive thru at Wendy's or McDonald's, we open the wrapper to find a smashed, gooey piece of processed protein, carbs, and chemicals that doesn't at all resemble what we saw in the advertisement. But because of the deceptive mental image, combined with our ravenous desire, we naively presume it is a hamburger, shell out several hard-earned dollars to the corporation, and then defile our bodies by consuming it with delight.

This is exactly how Satan sells illicit sex.

> That's why if you ask me… The one whom I admire… Do we have them here in Sweden? …what in the United States they call incels, involuntary celibatels [sic]. Guys who openly accept that they are ugly, that they will not be able to find partners, and so on. I think they bring out some deep truth about sexuality. We are all incels dreaming about whatever… dreaming about whatever…

Does Zizek admire incels because he perceives them as dreamers who have dismissed their desire as an impossibility?

Aside from the hilarious reference to incels, there's a kernel of truth here. People don't know what they want, and don't want what they desire. But they still spend an inordinate quantity of time dwelling on the wanting.

> Another thing I want to very briefly emphasize here is that, not only is sexuality not something innocent in itself, thus spoiled by power relations and so on…

Zizek already said that he agrees with Freud that "sexuality is, in itself… permitted by power plays", so I think here he is saying that there is a common belief that power corrupts the innocence of sex and should not be accepted as an inherent element in a natural sexual interaction, and that he disagrees with this.

Although an abuse of power may spoil the innocence of sex, sex in itself is good, and the mysterious power plays that enable and invigorate it are an essential element of the interaction. But it is the fallen nature in women which seeks to usurp that power and play the dominant role.

> Often, what I find, even in a certain type of feminism — never forget that in the United States, most of the feminists supported the attack on Iraq to liberate the Iraqi women. Now the result is that woman are there > oppressed more than ever, much more than under Saddam.

Western women who joined ISIS.

When ISIS dominated northern Iraq, we stopped hearing about how those women were oppressed, and we started hearing stories of western women, many who were white, who ran off to join ISIS. I think Zizek doesn't understand the real motivation that feminists had for supporting the war. The deeper reason feminists despise western white men is because they have abandoned the patriarchy, and have substituted in its place the perverted imitation that is Chivalry. Weak men screw up feminism.

> But what I want to say is that, you have also the opposite idea, that it's not so much power relations, domination, and exploitation that we should worry about, but we [should recognize that] power relationships are good. But the problem is when they get sexualized.

Zizek makes his point clearer here. He is saying that there is an apparent contradiction in the Feminist narrative, comprised of the following two viewpoints.

1. That power corrupts the innocence of sex and should not be accepted as an inherent element in a natural sexual interaction.
2. Power relationships are good, as long as men are not exerting sexual power over women.

His claim that this is a contradiction only makes sense if he is alluding to two concepts that are too anti-PC for him to publicly state specifically. These are,

1. The underlying Feminist belief that it's OK for women to exert social power and sexual authority over men, but not the other way around.
2. What Rollo calls Women's Existential Fear.

> For example, at universities, people get disturbed when a powerful professor engages in sex with one of his students. I'm also opposed to it. But nonetheless I don't like the implication that as long as the professor is thus exerting all his authority it's OK, power is OK, as long as it doesn't get personal [sexual].

The reason this type of relationship is immoral is not because it is sexual, but because it is an abuse of power. It also destroys the trust of the other students and his colleagues, and this affects his professional image. If the professor would formally court the student with intentions of marriage, then this would not create an outrage. I know of a few teachers and professors who married one of their students, and no one batted an eye.

In fact, masculine power and authority is necessary to establish the Christian archetype of Headship.

> So I don't like, for example, the type of feminism where you are not bothered by power relations, that is [to say], "We women also want a proper percentage in it!" No?

Yes, Zizek is bothered by power and authority, especially that of women. Years ago, we had a name for people who are suspicious, distrustful, or fearful of sexual power and/or the male-female hierarchy — Qüəərs. But these days, this word has taken on a much different connotation.

To be more generous, seeing how he grew up under a communist regime, maybe Zizek is bothered by the possibility of the abuse of said power. If this is the case, I agree that the abuse of sexual power is perhaps the most destructive force against the blessings of Shalom.

> A comic version of this happened in Slovenia, my country after independence, where a leftist government organized a group for women's rights, and the leader of that government office said as her first goal to organize a golf contest exclusively for women. Remember that golf was at that point, the sport of the ruling nomenclatura.
>
> I didn't like this because, you know like, it's… the logic was clear, "I don't care if the same power relations remain, just, I want my part of it!"

Zizek gives a lot of lip service to the moralistic goals of feminism, but I'm not sure he whole heartedly believes in them. He is profoundly intellectually incisive, so I can guess, based on a few of his statements above, that he recognizes that the underlying, unstated goal of feminism is to gain authoritative power and control, as this is the one goal with the most strategic benefit towards giving gynocentric idolaters the power to attain various other goals. But he won't state this explicitly because that would be outrageous. So it's hard to tell where he really stands.

What he doesn't seem to know is that this female desire for control hearkens back to the Sin of Eve.

Related

- Σ Frame: Authoritative Love, Marital Discipline, and BDSM (2019 March 15)
- The Arab Weekly (Stephen Quillen): Europe grapples with ISIS returnees and their families (2019 August 24)
- Σ Frame: The Dominatrix Conversation (2020 July 6)
- Σ Frame: What is a woman's desire for her husband according to Genesis 3:16? (2020 October 23)

Redemption and Sexual Healing

Jack · 15 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

It depends on whether we think sex is dirty or holy.

Readership: All

Elspeth left a lengthy comment under the post, The Motivation of Desire (2020 December 1). I covered most of this comment in a previous post, 3 Things that make Women Tick (2020 December 11). But there was another part of her comment which I'll cover here.

In all sincerity, I hope to honor Elspeth by drawing attention to her testimony as a Christian wife.

There are many men who are married to women who are not regenerated, and who have no interest whatsoever in Headship, redemption, etc. Christian men would greatly benefit from being able to identify which women can be regenerated from those who can't or won't. It might help us to understand what's going on with this.

The main point of my earlier post, The Motivation of Desire, was to identify one factor, desire, that those women who experience redemption have in common. As far as I can see, desire, in some fashion or form, is an intrinsic vector that would lead her towards humility and carry her towards redemption. She must desire it, or else, she must desire something else that would eventually get her moving in that direction (e.g. having children, being loved and cherished by a man, etc.). There needs to be a distinction, because there are many things a woman can desire that are a dead end in terms of her spiritual regeneration and emotional maturation (e.g. earning a degree, pursuing a career, banging Chadwick Edcad, etc.).

The same dynamic applies for men, although the respective sets of desires would be uniquely different.

Elspeth wrote,

> Of course, none of the above takes into account spiritual dimensions when dealing with a Christian woman of sincere faith, and that's where this post went wrong. It gave a cursory nod to the power of redemption, but mostly framed everything in terms of sex. I get why. I am married to a red blooded guy, after all. But either a woman can be regenerate and redeemed or she can't. And if she can, then she is capable of keeping her legs shut, choosing a righteous man, and learning how to grow in all the areas (emotionally, sexually, and spiritually) under his leadership.

I am not ignoring the power of God in transforming a woman or a marriage. It's just that this doesn't happen "automatically" within marriage.

One might read several posts on this site and, like Elspeth, come to the conclusion that the main theme is sex. In reaction, one might think that this is merely an emphasis on the flesh, rather than on the Spirit. If this site only posted photos of scantily clad temptresses and stories about how to get laid, then I would have to agree. But instead, I regard the issue of sex to be an important characteristic of human nature that we men must learn to master, so that it does not master us.

> Leaving the reality of a transformed heart out of it (or subordinating it to tingles and libido) does not only Christian women a disservice, but it mostly does God a disservice.

Concerning the necessity of having a transformed heart towards regeneration, I agree. But OTOH, I also think it does God a disservice to dismiss the important role of sexuality in attaining sanctification and establishing a God honoring marriage and a God fearing family. Sex is innately connected to sanctification and Shalom, and it cannot be overstated that both of these are extremely important to God. The reason why sexual sin is forbidden to Christians, is because it destroys both sanctification and Shalom. We as a culture have forgotten this truth, and this ignorance has led to our utter decimation.

Look around. Because of widespread sexual immorality, women have jaded themselves and are unable to feel any visceral attraction towards the man they eventually marry. Not only does this undermine the husband's authority, thereby eliminating the glory of God that is associated with Headship, but it also creates enormous disillusionment, disappointment, and marital dissatisfaction, and thereby eradicates any sanctification and Shalom that would have otherwise occurred in marriage.

This has a cumulative effect on the children, who grow up in an emotionally tense, dysfunctional, or broken home, and never experience God's glory through their parent's relationship.

Denouncing illicit sex and abortion is not enough. Criticizing Feminism, egalitarianism, and complementarianism is not enough. We, as a culture, must return to God's prerogatives of sanctification and Shalom, or else we will face His wrath and be wiped from the earth. Look around, this is already starting to happen.

When we return to the Lord by establishing Headship in our marriages and thereby teach our children to reverence the Lord, we will receive the deep soul healing we need to be free from our profligacy and corruption (Deuteronomy 4:23-31).

Related

- Σ Frame: Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020 June 19)
- Σ Frame: Coram Mundo vs. Coram Deo (2020 September 7)

Sustainability Fears

Jack · 16 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Sustainable is not the same as survivable.

Readership: All;

From Wikipedia [emphasis mine],

> "Significant regional differences exist in both public concern for and public understanding of climate change. In 2010, just a little over half the US population viewed it as a serious concern for either themselves or their families, while 73% of people in Latin America and 74% in developed Asia felt this way. Similarly, in 2015 a median of 54% of respondents considered it "a very serious problem", but Americans and Chinese (whose economies are responsible for the greatest annual CO_2 emissions) were among the least concerned. Public reactions to climate change and concern about its effects have been increasing, with many perceiving it as the worst global threat. In a 2019 CBS poll, 64% of the US population said that climate change is a "crisis" or a "serious problem", with 44% saying human activity was a significant contributor."

The Georgia Guidestones

Several sources report that climate change and environmental issues were the biggest source of fear for school-aged youngsters. Here are a few examples.

- Mouthpiece Greta Thümberg…
- Science News for Students (Kathiann Kowalski): Climate change poses mental health risks to children and teens (2019 May 2)
- The Washington Post (Sarah Kaplan, Emily Guskin): Most American teens are frightened by climate change, poll finds, and about 1 in 4 are taking action (2019 September 16)
- The Conversation (Rachel Sharman, Patrick D. Nunn): Ignoring young people's climate change fears is a recipe for anxiety (2019 September 20)

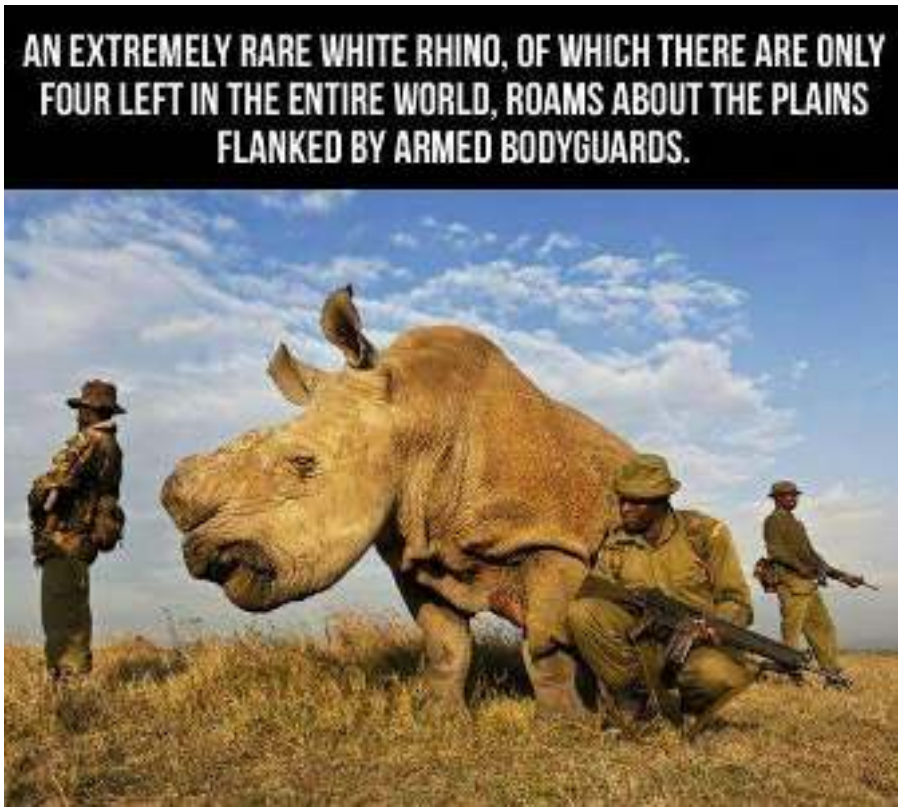
- The Washington Post Magazine (Jason Plautz): The Environmental Burden of Generation Z (2020 February 3)

There are a lot more behind paywalls and digital identity walls (e.g. The New York Times), which I won't link to.

All of these sources rely on the heart-tug ruse. If you don't fall for it, then you're condemned as a heartless thug. Haidt's Ethical Foundations theory explains how this approach targets liberals in particular.

I won't deny that there are significant environmental concerns. However, the problem of climate change, as it is touted in education and the media, is couched as a result of localized human enterprises, not as a global environmental Tragedy of the Commons. Forces of nature are altogether ignored by the media. Ignorant humans with little to no consciousness of the issues (who are blamed as the culprits for "denying" climate change) are presented as the enemy — not first world economies, not governments, not capitalistic industries, and certainly not any of the ultra-elite who control these entities.

The real problem, which is understated by education and the media, if not altogether ignored, is one of resource consumption, resource depletion, and various forms of pollution. Species preservation is also a concern which has been swept under the rug. (Personally, I am still angry over the loss of the rhinoceros.)



The clue to this, known only to insiders, is the code word sustainability. This word is heavily laden with a lot of meaning — not only sustainability of natural resources, but also sustainability of political power, sustainability of economic control, and sustainability of luxury. Why else would this issue receive such heavy scrutiny?

The mysterious Georgia Guidestones appear to list several goals for the ultra-elite herders of humanity. It says the human population should be kept at 500,000,000. That is only 7.14% of the current world population! Why this particular number*? Because at this number, resource consumption and depletion would not be a concern for the elite to maintain their lifestyle without incurring increasing costs due to scarcity. Resources would last for an indefinite period of time.

There is also the worry that there will be a mass revolt when resources run thin, and costs begin to exceed the average person's budget.

The ultra-elite herders have many schemes to slow down population growth, but even with directly effective tools like abortion, euthanasia, and the feminist blight on marriage and family, they cannot get the number down to half a billion anytime soon. So they control education and media to lay everyone on this guilt trip to make people fearful of exploitation and consumption.

In other words, all the fear-stoking rhetoric about climate change is propaganda aimed towards encouraging both public restraint in consumption and collective action to conserve. Not saying that's wrong to do, but the motivation of stoking fear is suspect.

 I might also guess that the 500,000,000 figure is sufficient to include the ultra-elite and their families. In other words, they might wish to exterminate everyone except themselves.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review – The Escalation of Anarchy (2019 July 8)

The Feminist Life Script

thedeti · 17 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What western culture teaches young women to do with their lives.

Readership: All
Authorship: Deti submitted a comment describing the Feminist Life Script rather succinctly. Recognizing the value of this comment, Jack revised Deti's comment and wrote this post.
Origin of the terms: To the best of my knowledge, Dalrock was the first to use the term Feminist Life Script and describe it in his posts, A very long season (part 1). (2017 July 3), and (part 2) (2017 July 10). He also coined the term, Sticking the Landing, which refers to the ability of women to enter into marriage after a decade or so of postpornication.

Introduction

Why are a woman's solipsistic dreams so much more important than submitting to a fantastic man who loves her? Not even sexual bonding is enough to get her to tune into her God ordained purpose as a woman? WTH??? And no matter how good her life might be, fantasy land will always be "better".

Elspeth is correct that it is the parents' fault. It's also the ambient feminism that everyone swims in. Modern Western culture IS feminism. Everyone and everything is feminist. Even Christian women are feminists who are against abortion.

All women, and I mean ALL women, born after about 1960 are marinated in feminism and are feminists. All women in the US over the age of 25 are feminists, and I don't care what anyone says to the contrary because it's not true. EVERY man who has gotten married in the last 40 years married a feminist.

The Cultural Narrative

Young women and daughters are repeatedly saturated with the overarching dominant cultural narrative which undergirds the Life Script, which is basically this:

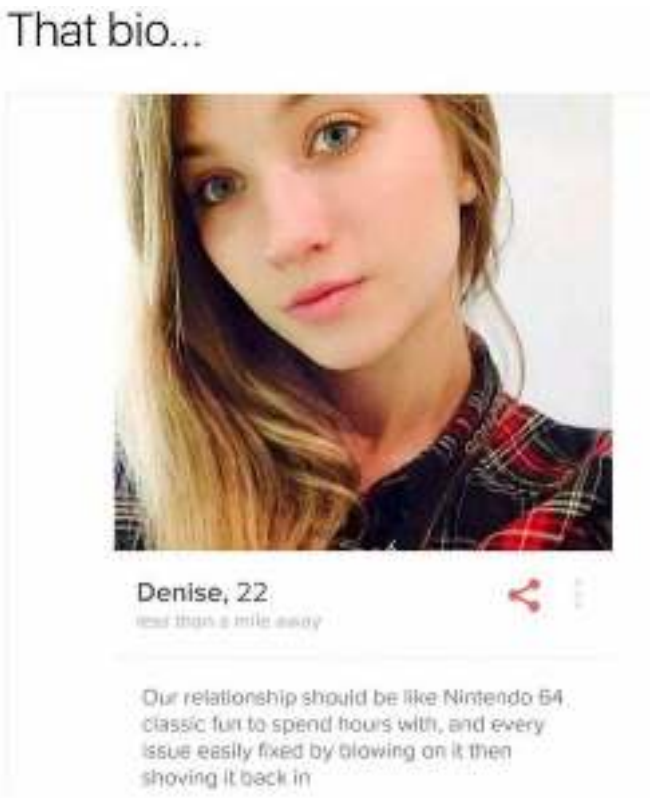
You can't ever depend on a man and you can't ever trust a man. Think about the D's: Divorce, death, disability. What if he leaves you, cheats on you, dies on you, or becomes a cripple?

You need a career so you can stand on your own two feet if you have to. You need college. You need job training. You need to earn your own money. You need to compete on equal footing with men.

You are equal to men in every way, you can do anything a man can do. You don't have to take any crap from a man and you sure as hell don't have to "submit" to him. Any man you marry will be a completely 50/50 equal partner with you and you MUST insist on that."

You are sexually liberated in the meantime before you get married. If you're a Christian, then it's not really OK to have premarital sex, but you're going to anyway, so just make sure that if you do, you do it with men you love or at least like a lot. Or, if you're a non-Christian, you can have all the sex you want with as many different men as you want and there will still be hot, attractive, resources-rich men waiting for you when you're done with that."



A Tinder profile of a 22 year old American woman.

The Ideal Life Script

This cultural narrative leads young women to believe that the Feminist Life Script is the most reasonable and optimal approach to living. This Life Script comes in two phases, (1) Season of Singleness, and (2) Sticking the Landing. These phases are entailed as follows.

Life Script Phase 1: Season of Singleness

All her friends and every woman she knows around her age are doing these things.

Higher Education – At the least, get a bachelor's degree or extensive job training. Earning a master's or Ph.D. degree will put you on top.

Friends / Sex and the City Lifestyle – Move to a population center, get a job, and live alone or with roommates who are doing the same thing you're doing.

Career comes First – Keep working. Advance in career, become competent or even proficient. Change jobs if necessary.

Have fun. Make some frivolous purchases like $800 Louis Vuitton handbags.

Travel to fun and exotic tropical destinations.

Sexual Liberation – During all of the above, you are dating both for fun and in the hopes of meeting a marriageable man. You are having sex with most of those men. Some are false starts. Some are short term, no more than 3-6 months. Some are long term.

Again, all her friends and every woman she knows around her age are doing this.

Life Script Phase 2: Sticking the Landing

It is alleged by some that many, even most, women meet the man they will marry by age 23, which is an appropriate age for a woman to marry. But marriage is postponed in order to fulfill all the goals of Phase 1, which takes her out to at least age 25. The reported average age from relationship start to marriage is 4.9 years. As a result, the female's average age at first marriage is now 28 and creeping upwards.

So here is where Phase 2 begins.

Marriage – Meet the man who she will marry. Get married in an equal partnership marriage.

Children – Have one child, at most two.

Continue Working – The options are to stay home, work part time/flex time, or continue full time. But even if she should choose to quit working and stay at home, she must never think degradingly of herself as a Stay at Home Mom and/or Housewife.

Husband does the Nesting – In addition to working full time, her husband also works and does significant chores around the house in order to take the stress off her, as he's expected to do, because she is his "equal" in every other significant way.

Direct the Nesting – It's not her job to do most of the housework and child rearing. She is busy working at her career and should only have to do half of the housework. The husband is to do the other half. She decides what he needs to do, and how it should be done.

Life Script Phase 3: Frivorce with Kids, Cash, and Prizes

Phase 3 is fully optional, but about half of all women who make it to Phase 2 will proceed to Phase 3. Part of the reason is because there is a glut of western jurisprudence which lays out tried and true paths to Phase 3 (with the help of a divorce lawyer), such as Divorce Theft, No Fault Divorce, the Duluth model, and the Tender Years Doctrine. All this legislation supports the goals of Feminism in undermining Headship, and Empowers™ those women who wish to continue chasing after any of the original dreams promised by the Cultural Narrative (above) which were not fulfilled during either Phase 1 or 2. Consequently, the average duration of marriage in the U.S. is only 8 years.

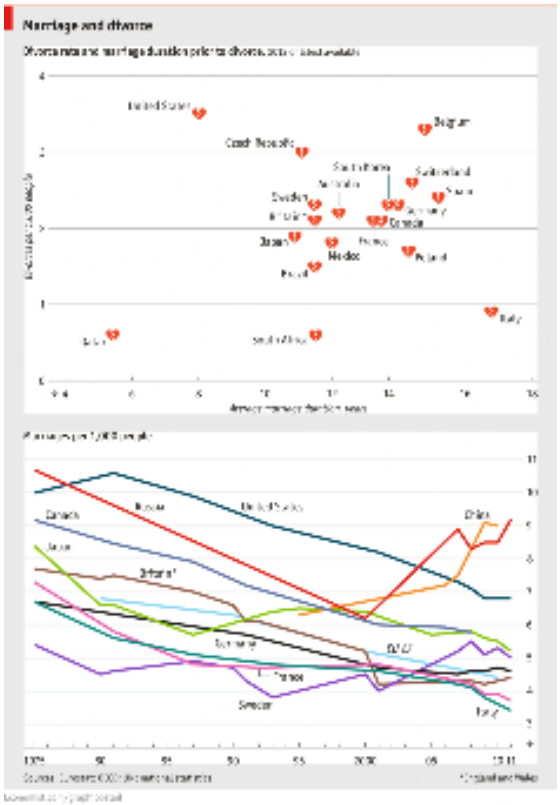

Image taken from The Economist: When the Embers Grow Cold (2014 February 14) [Identity Wall]

Concluding Statements

The reason why a woman's solipsistic dreams are more important than submitting to a fantastic man who loves her are laid out as follows.

1. Her "dreams" (or, her life survival) predominate over marriage and everything else until she's at least in her early to mid-20s. During the time when she's most attractive and most able to secure "a fantastic man who loves her", she is spending that time getting educated and job trained so she can do what mom and dad and everyone else told her – Don't ever be in a position where you have to depend on a man! Instead of looking for a man to take care of her survival, she's doing it herself and not nearly as well as a man can.
2. She's entitled to "have fun" before she gets married. Travel, make and spend money. Date (i.e. have sex with) attractive men and hope that maybe one will commit. Of course, Dating = Sex. (The word dating is used as a polite euphemism for illicit sex.) Everyone is doing this. Your parents, church and pastors usually know this but look the other way.
3. The way to find a husband is to find attractive men, have sex with them within 3 dates, and then find out if there's enough "compatibility" there to keep dating. Then hopefully you get exclusive. Then hopefully, when everything is “right”, you get married. Here “right” means EVERYTHING must be in place: His career, her career, sufficient money, a decent place to live, and plentiful access to transportation and culture. She must also be ~~jaded~~ satisfied that she has acquired enough “life experience” necessary to satisfy her YOLO needs and FOMO fears, and she must do this before she agrees to marriage.

4. Submission is almost completely omitted from the narrative. Women are not to submit to men. A woman dating a man is not to take the submissive position. A wife is not to submit to her husband, or if she does, she submits only when she wants to and only when she approves of the husband’s conduct. She has everyone’s permission and approval to approach men and marriage this way – even from her church and her pastors, and certainly from her mother, and almost always from her father (if she has one). Absolutely no one will tell her she is to submit to her husband “in all things, as unto the Lord” – not even her church, not even her pastors. Submission to a man equals dependence on him, and remember – whatever the cost, she cannot be in a position where she has to depend on a man.

All women are doing this. Including Christian women. We know this because the church has now been almost completely converged and subsumed into the ambient dominant feminist culture.

Related

- Σ Frame: The 10 Commandments of Feminism (2018 June 5)
- Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – When wanton treachery brings shame, not honor. (2020 October 14)

On the Ethics of Teenage Marriage

Novaseeker · 18 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Taking a wider Frame of view is wise, and perhaps necessary.

Readership: Christians

Our Concept of Appropriateness is not so much Ethical, as it is Mythical

Yesterday's post, The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17), brought up some sensitive issues about what age a female is ready for marriage.

On the issue of determining the proper age for marriage, one has to be careful about the cultural assumptions, going both ways.

In our culture, it is surely true that teenagers, including female teenagers, are not socially and culturally raised to be ready to be married in their later teen years (15-18), which is probably why so many of the marriages that occur in this age range in our culture do not succeed. The families of origin, and the entire culture, do not foster a readiness for this emotionally and psychologically at these ages, currently, and so trying to force young marriage into that context is a bit, well, forced. In fact, there are some quite powerful social norms that work against this possibility.

At the same time, however, one must be very careful to avoid using absolute terms like "perversion" and the like when referring to the natural attraction, in a purely physical sense, that a heterosexual male feels for a post-pubescent female, regardless of her age. One can say that this is "culturally inappropriate", and that is true — and it is certainly true that we actively enforce this standard in our culture.

From a wider viewpoint, the standards held by western culture are not universal globally, and this is not merely a matter of "advanced societies", either, as we can see from looking at Japan's cultural assumptions in this specific area, which are notably and markedly different from our own.

So it is a very different matter to claim that this is "perverse", given that perversion is something that is inherently unnatural, inherently deformed. From a Biblical viewpoint, Feminism itself is a true perversion, as it inverts the male-female hierarchy, and such is the present norm, yet we do not view it as such.

Thus, the naturally occurring male physical attraction to post-pubescent females is not perverse, it is merely culturally inappropriate and forbidden, properly, in a culture where humans of that age are socialized as children and are not prepared, by their families or their culture, for relationships of that type with older people.

Surely, St. Joseph himself was not a “pervert” for presumably being attracted enough to the almost certainly mid-teenaged Mary to become betrothed to her, despite being much older than she was. It was a naturally occurring attraction which, in that context, was not culturally inappropriate. It had nothing to do with perversion, one way or another.

The distinction is important, because it is absolutely defamatory to claim that men who are in any way attracted to post-pubescent females who are under the current “legal age” in our culture are therefore “perverse” or “pedophiles”. Nothing could be further from the truth. These are natural and normal male attractions that we put a box around precisely because of the cultural climate we live in, and the fact that this climate, and the families living in it, are not preparing their offspring of this age to be married at this age, full stop. Not perversion, just culture.

Charlie and Eunice Johns (Newspaper article)

Western Culture is the Present Setting of our Life Stories

Which brings us to a more fundamental point.

At some level we are all compromised. There are compromises we choose to live with, based on the culture we live in, and where we personally draw the line in terms of compromises with it that we can live with while being faithful and still active members of this culture.

Marriage is one such area, because it markedly differs with past practice from hundreds of years ago, which suggests that it is not related to the faith, as such. The acceptable marital age has moved up, but rather due to cultural exigencies. Christians adapted to these changes in their habits of the whens and hows as they managed the business of marrying off their daughters (and sons).

While it’s a mistake, in my view, to suppose that the faith mandates marriage at the earliest possible physical age

(there's no reason to think that this is the case), it seems the exact opposite mistake is to suppose that it mandates withholding marriage from our sons and daughters until a certain age, again, as a matter of faith.

Among traditional Romani (Gypsies), children are to be married in brokered marriages as soon as puberty starts. In this photo, the 14-year-old daughter of the "King of the Gypsies," Florin Cioaba, is to be married to a 15-year-old boy.

It comes down to how much we are of the world, how compromised we are with it, how different we are willing to be from it. Each of us makes our own decisions in these areas. I say that not to point fingers — I am personally no sort of "ultra" in these regards, not at all. But I do think we need to realize that we are all compromised by the culture, and we should resist the temptation to baptize or otherwise bless/sanctify our own reasoned compromises with the culture in which we live, rather than seeing them as just that — personal compromises that we personally judge as being appropriate, based on the culture in which we live and its broader standards. How that fits into our own personal approach to living in the world, but not of it, is necessarily ensconced within the particular time and place of our culture, including all of the norms of said culture.

It is, it seems to me, a matter of drawing lines for pragmatic reasons, and although these lines will be intensely personal and practical, we should see them as such and not baptize them as something more than they are.

Related

- Radix Fidem: How Much Shalom? (2020 December 18)

Average age of first time sexual experience (data) and what this means for Christians

Jack · 20 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

10 years is a long time to wait!

Readership: Christians
Length: 1,250 words
Reading Time: 5-8 minutes

What have we done to the Institution of Marriage?

The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17) received some rave reviews in the comments. There was some discussion about the historical average age of marriage, and other discussion about the age of marriage in a Biblical context or the Hebrew culture of antiquity. Others very strongly objected to 14-15 year old girls getting married, especially to 30+ year old men.

But all these arguments, though valid, cling to principles, rules, historical trends, or cultural norms, and therefore sidestep the core issue.

So what is the core issue?

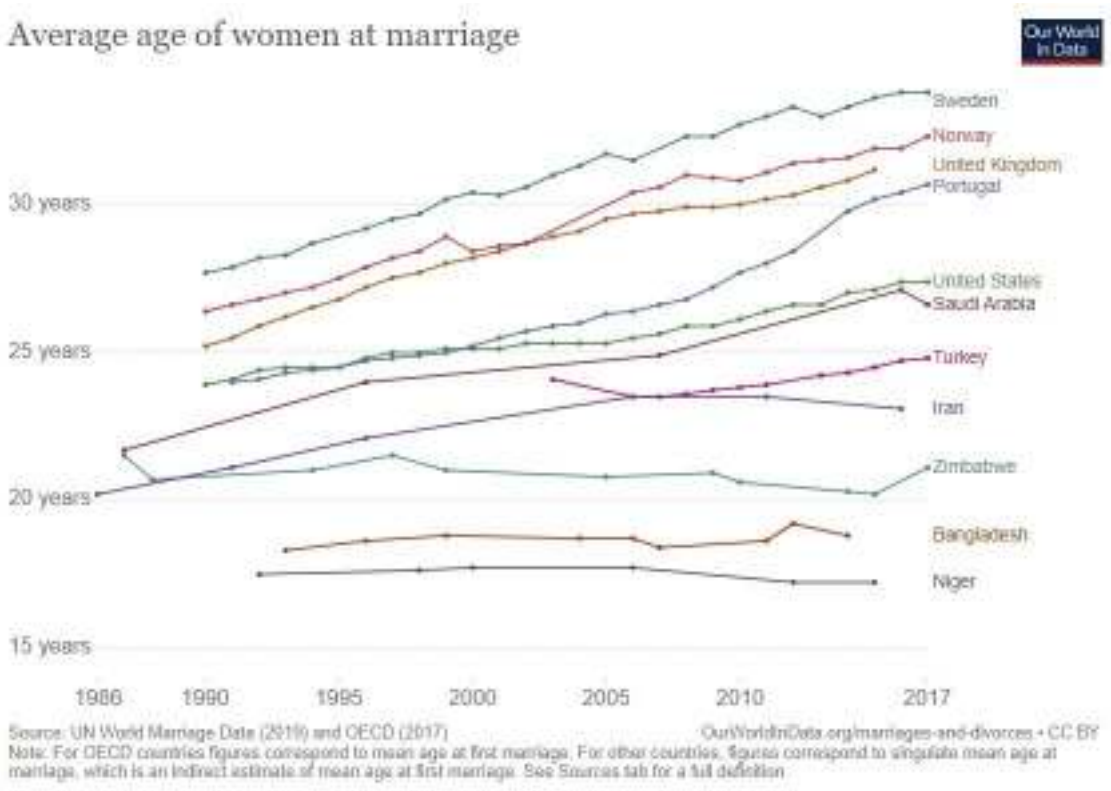
What is it that we are most concerned about?

Here's a list of the possibilities. (Feel free to add to this list in the comments.)

- We don't want our daughters to have sex at "too young" an age. (Define what is "too young" and why.)
- We don't want our daughters to become slores. (At what point does this happen?)
- We don't want our daughters to debase their marriages.
- We don't want our daughters to defraud their future husbands.
- We don't want our daughters to have an unhappy marriage. (Does marriage at a certain age determine happiness?)
- We don't want our daughters to get pregnant out of wedlock.
- We don't want our daughters to undergo a divorce in the future.
- We are most concerned about not having to worry about what will happen to our daughters.
- We don't want to feel shame or embarrassment as a parent.
- We want to control our daughter's sexual interests and activities so that they don't become a statistic.

So how does postponing marriage past the age of 25 provide a solution to any of these concerns?

Yet, that is exactly what is happening.



Another important question (which, sadly, no one brought up) is this:

What is it that God is most concerned about?

> [3] For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you should abstain from sexual immorality; [4] that each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor, [5] not in passion of lust, like the Gentiles who do not know God; [6] that no one should take advantage of and defraud his brother in this matter, because the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also forewarned you and testified. [7] For God did not call us to uncleanness, but in holiness. [8] Therefore he who rejects this does not reject man, but God, who has also given us His Holy Spirit.
>
> 1st Thessalonians 4:3-8 (NKJV)

There's more. Here's a short list to consider.

- Our emotional maturity and spiritual growth. (Romans 12:2; Philippians 3:12-15; Ephesians 4:13; Colossians 2:8; 2nd Timothy 2:26; 1st John 2:5)
- Our faith walk with the Lord. (Colossians 1:9-11; Romans 13:13; Galatians 5:16)
- Our sanctification. (Matthew 6:33; 1st Thessalonians 4:3)
- Our self-control towards possessing our bodies with holiness and honor. (Romans 12:1; Philippians 2:15; 2nd Corinthians 7:1; 1st Thessalonians 4:4)
- That we should not defraud one another. (Mark 10:19; 1st Thessalonians 4:6)
- To glorify the Lord. (2nd Corinthians 5:21; 1st John 3:1-2)
- To live in Shalom. (Psalm 34:14; John 16:33; 2nd Timothy 2:22; Romans 12:18; Romans 14:19; 2nd Corinthians 13:11; Hebrews 12:14)
- To produce godly offspring. (Psalm 127:3-5; Romans 4:18-21; Malachi 2:15)

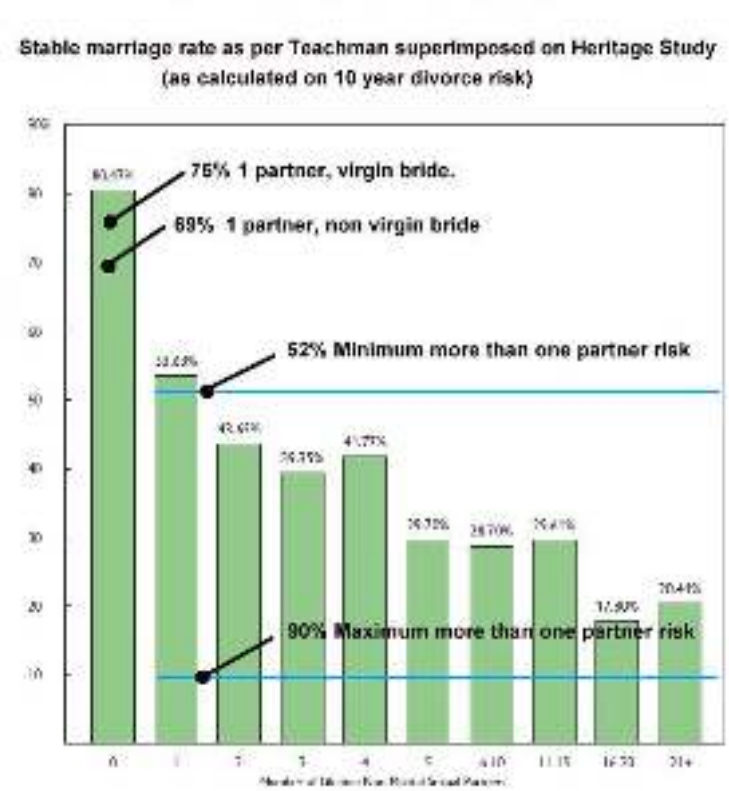
I dare say, and I cannot emphasize it enough, we will not see any improvements in our social conditions (i.e. the MMP) until we begin to prioritize that which is most important to God!

We should be openly and frequently talking to our daughters about the SMP and marriage as soon as they begin to take an interest in such things.

image

Why Wait?

Let's very briefly review why it's important for a woman to retain her virginity until marriage. I'd like to shy people away from only considering this as a "rule", in favor of taking a hard look at the actual real world consequences of illicit/premarital sex.



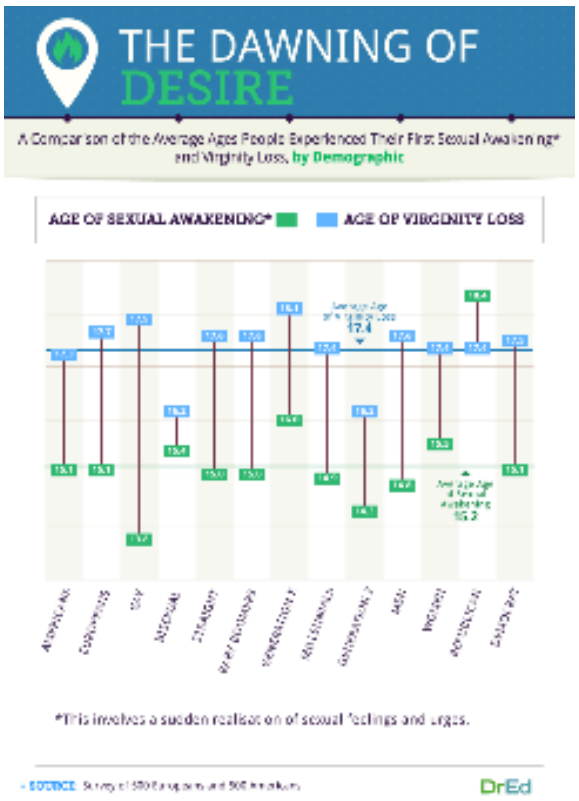
The above graph says it all. For an explanation of this phenomenon, here are a few posts of relevance.

- Christianity and Masculinity: Review of vetting, virgins and new info on virginity pledges (2018 January 7)
- Σ Frame: Can You Trust A Dancing Skeleton? (2018 September 21)
- Σ Frame: A cord of many strands is not easily broken, but here's how to do it. (2018 September 24)
- Σ Frame: Time Frames for various forms of sexual bonding and maturation (2019 February 5)
- Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020 April 24)
- Σ Frame: Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14)

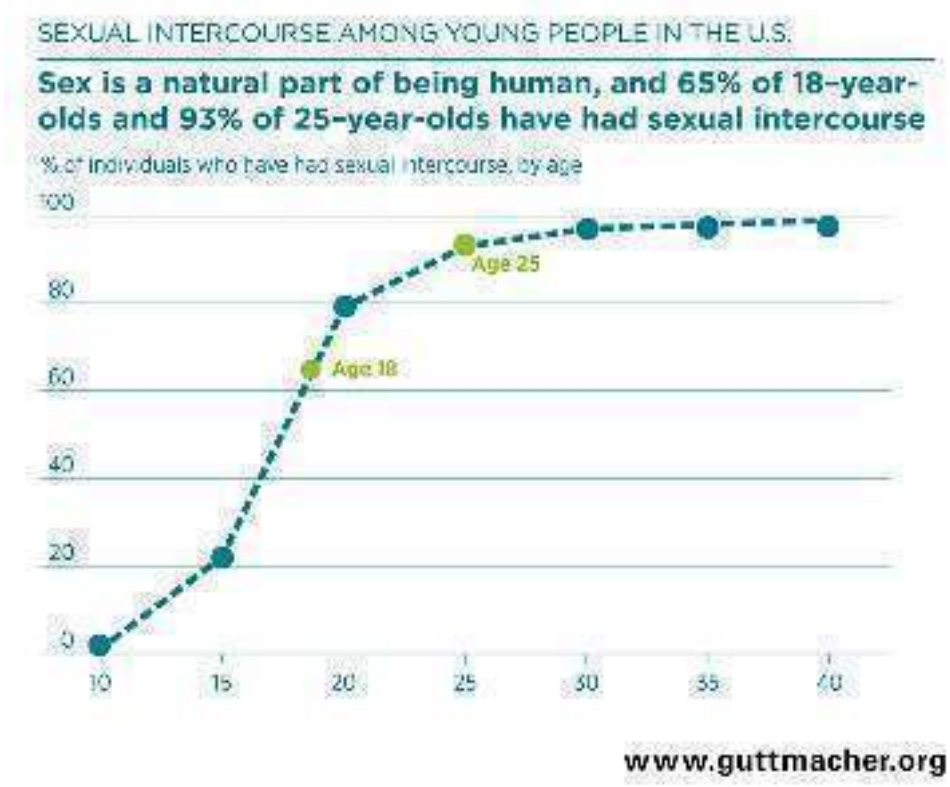
You see, it's not just about "rules", or even ethics or morality. There are very good practical reasons why God told us to refrain from sexual immorality!

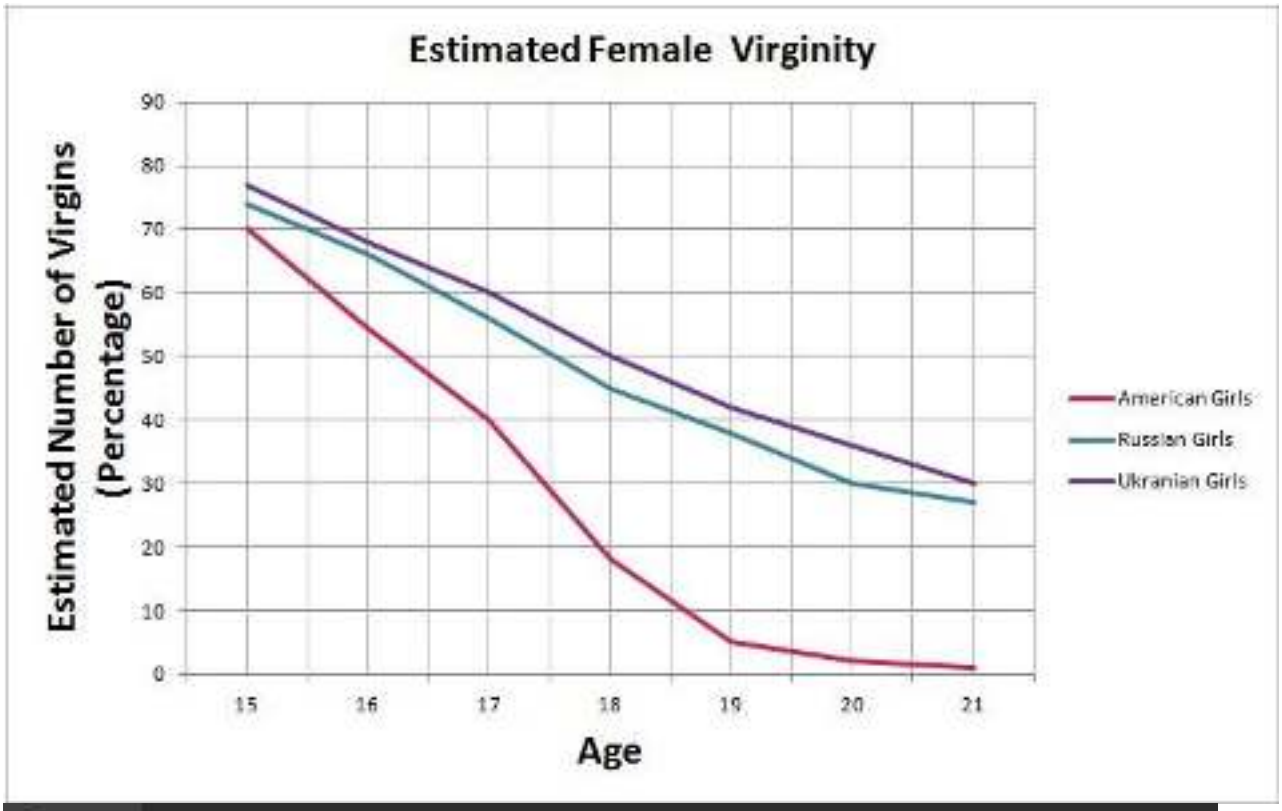
Let's think about it...

Wisdom requires us to take an honest look at the facts.



According to the above graph, we are looking at about 2 years of leeway. I interpret this to mean that the average person can only wait about 2 years to have sex. Also of note, Republicans have it easier than Democrats for some reason.





Estimated Female Virginity
Estimated Number of Virgins (Percentage)
90
80
70
60
50
40
30
20 10
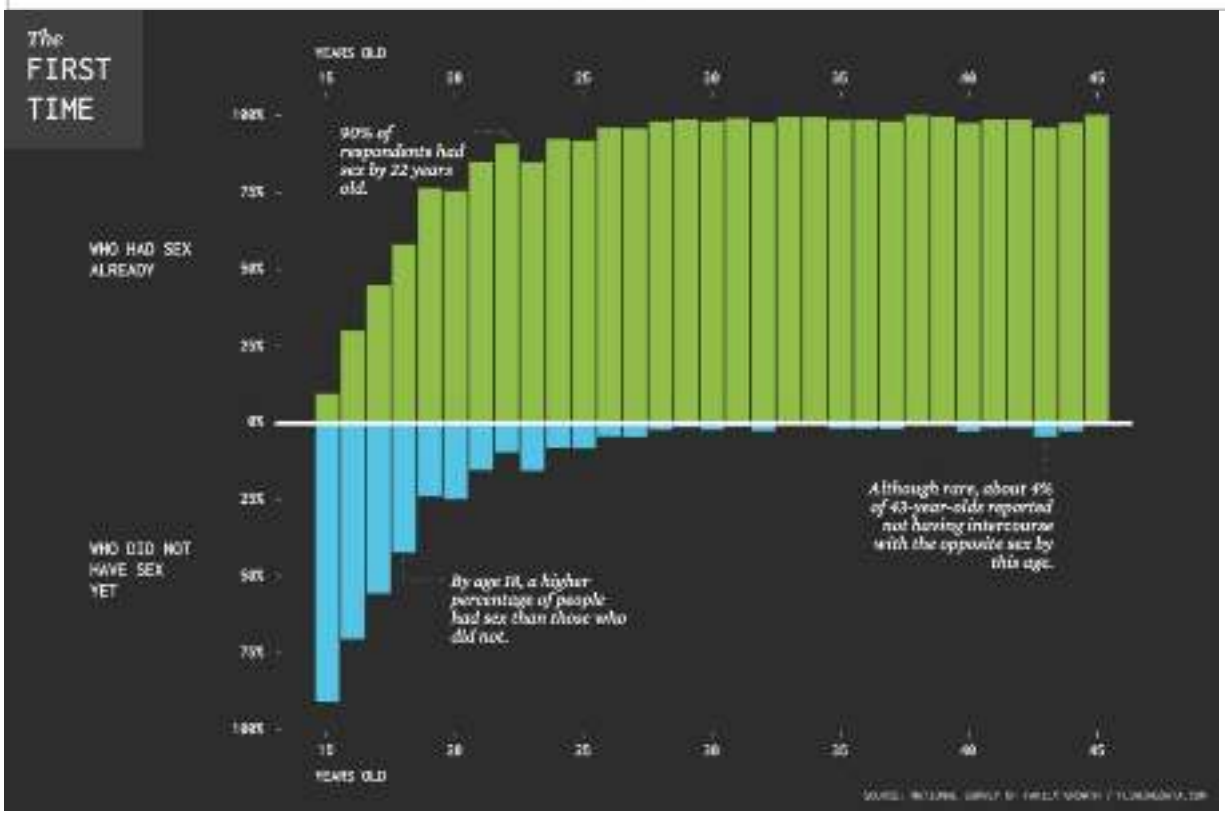
0
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
Age
American Girls
Russian Girls
Ukranian Girls



The FIRST TIME
YEARS OLD
WHO HAD SEX ALREADY WHO DID NOT HAVE SEX YET
90% of respondents had sex by 22 years old.
By age 18, a higher percentage of people had sex than those who did not.
Although rare, about 4% of 45-year-olds reported not having intercourse with the opposite sex by this age.

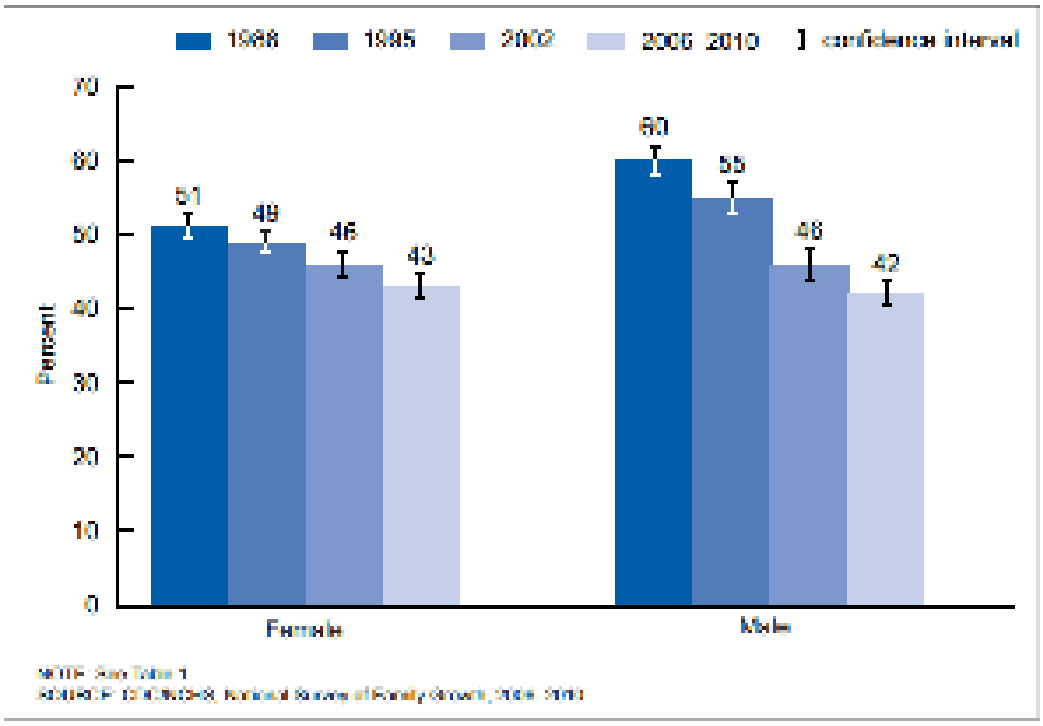

Figure 1. Never-married females and males aged 15–19 who have ever had sexual intercourse: United States, 1988–2010

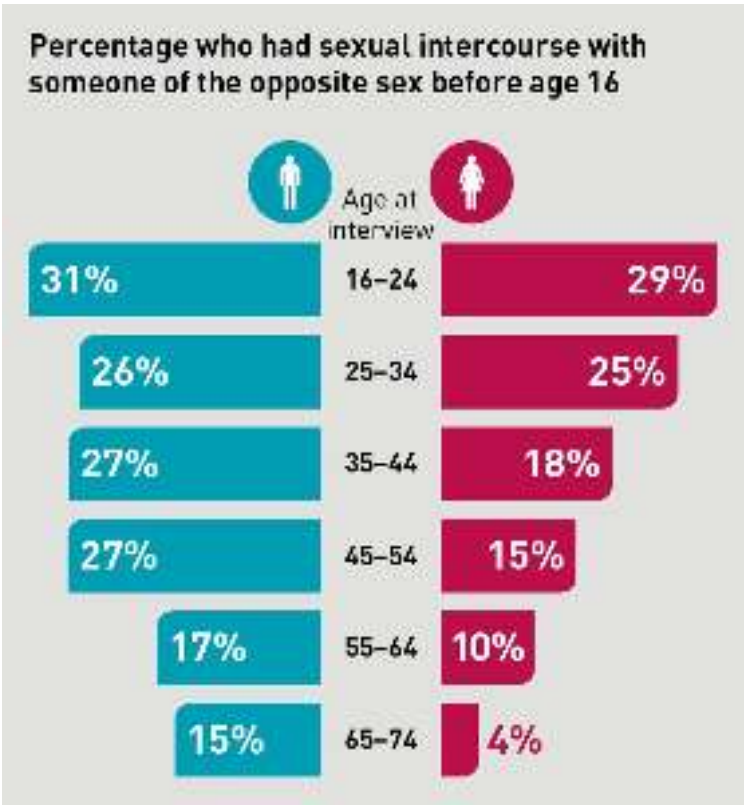

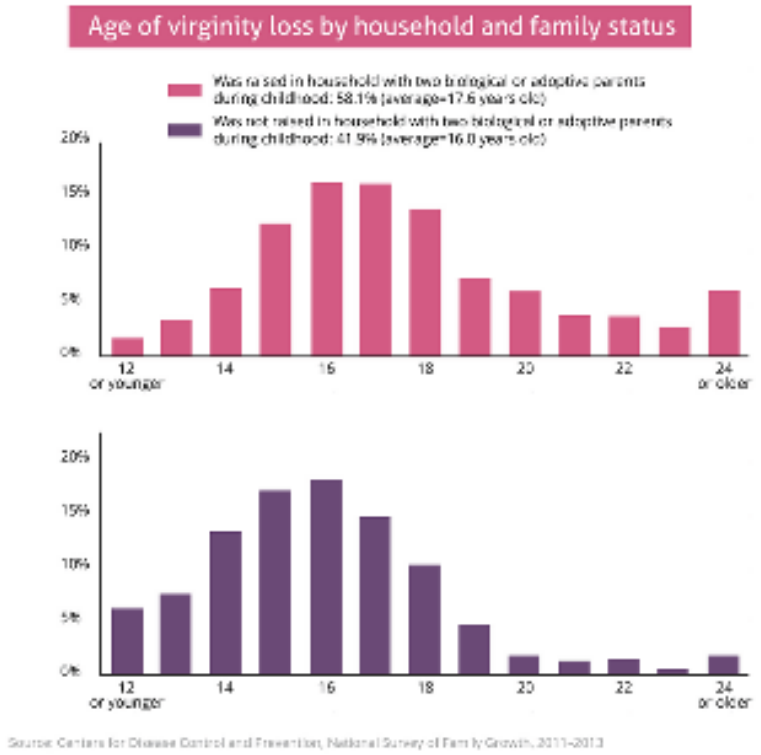

Source: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Survey of Family Growth, 2011–2013

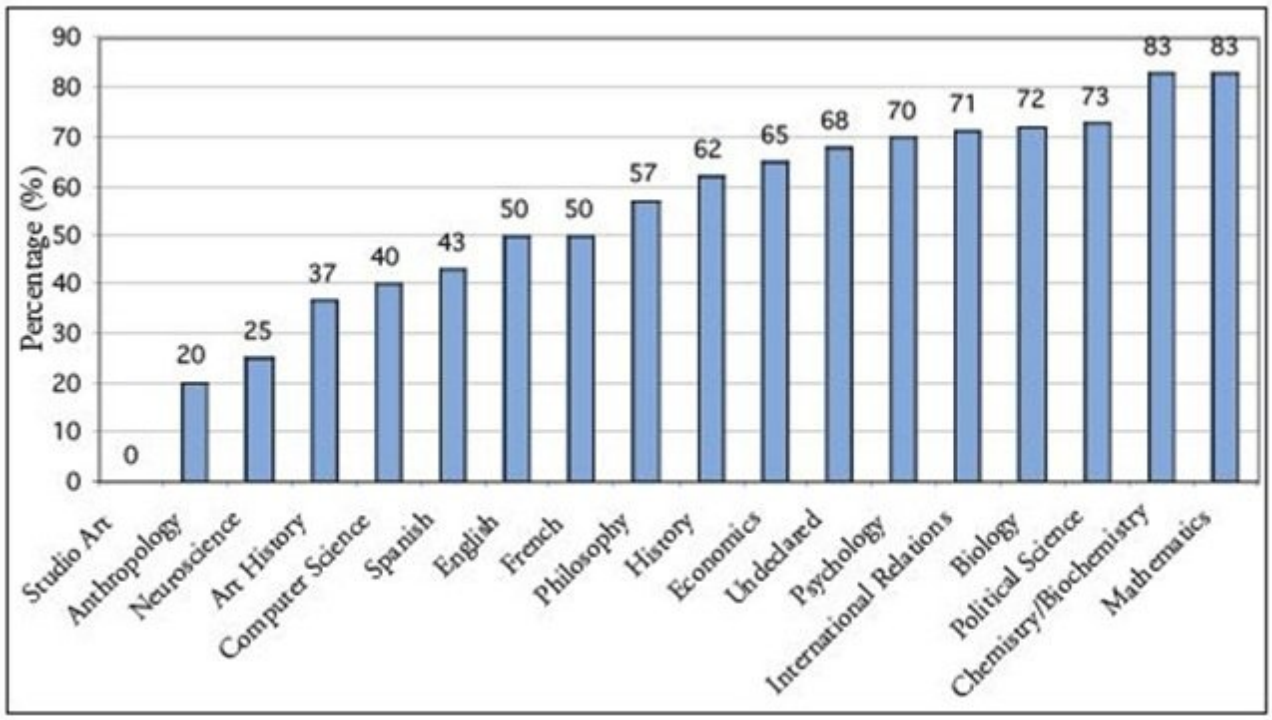

Figure 2a: Percent of students that are virgins, by Wellesley major

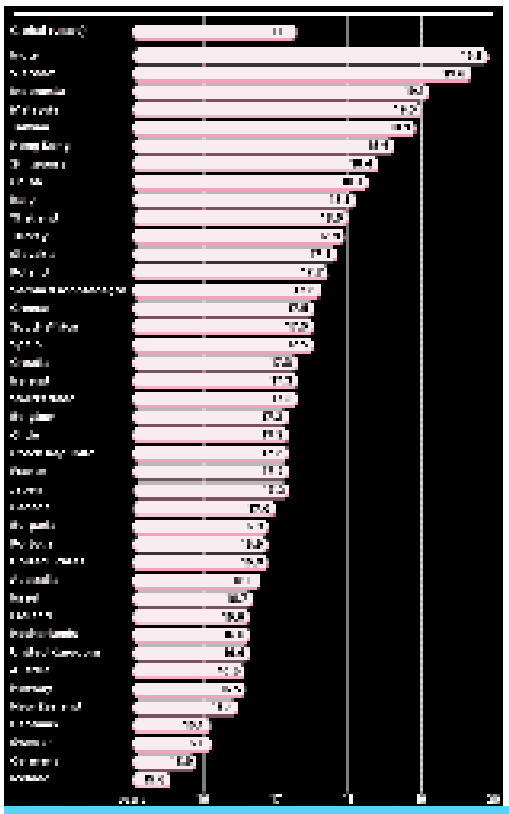
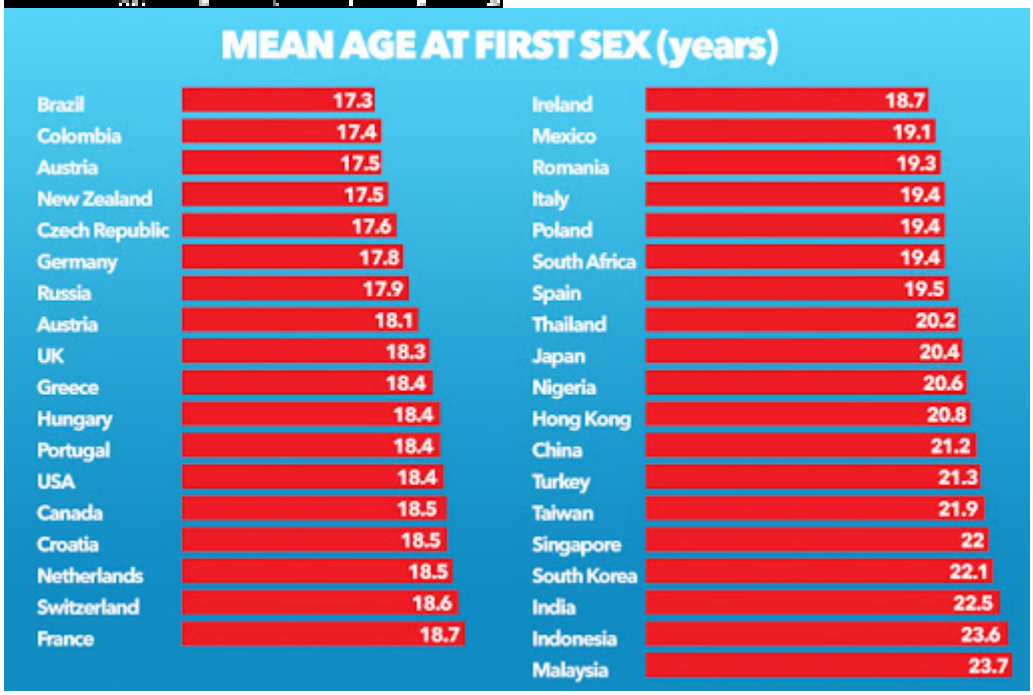
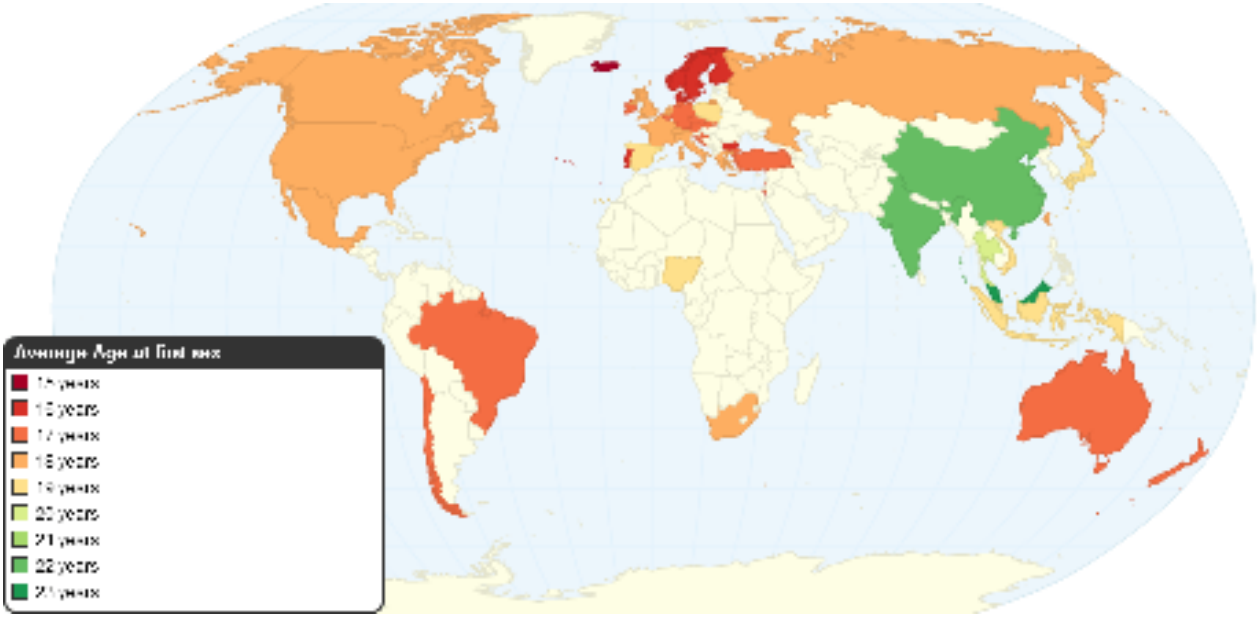




MEAN AGE AT FIRST SEX (years)
Brazil 17.3
Colombia 17.4
Austria 17.5
New Zealand 17.5
Czech Republic 17.6
Germany 17.8
Russia 17.9
Austria 18.1
UK 18.3
Greece 18.4
Hungary 18.4
Portugal 18.4
USA 18.4
Canada 18.5
Croatia 18.5
Netherlands 18.5
Switzerland 18.6
France 18.7
Ireland 18.7
Mexico 19.1
Romania 19.3
Italy 19.4
Poland 19.4
South Africa 19.4
Spain 19.5
Thailand 20.2
Japan 20.4
Nigeria 20.6
Hong Kong 20.8
China 21.2
Turkey 21.3
Taiwan 21.9
Singapore 22
South Korea 22.1
India 22.5
Indonesia 23.6
Malaysia 23.7



Some reports claim that the average male has sex for the first time at age 16.9, and females lose their virginity slightly older, at 17.4 on the average. Since these are self-reported statistics, I suspect that these numbers are probably a lot older for males, and younger for females. I would guess the real numbers are about 15-16 for girls, and 18-19 for guys. This actually shows up in the graphs shown above. Of course, race, region, genetics, home environment, and socioeconomic background play into that. But for now, let's use that original statistic for the sake of discussion.

According to the estimates from the 2017 U.S. Census Bureau, the average age of first marriage for women was 27.4 years. For men, it's slightly older at 29.5 years. That's the longest Americans have ever waited to get married.

Now think about that…

27.4 – 17.4 = 10

Exactly 10 years between women's first sexual experience, and getting married – and that's on the average!

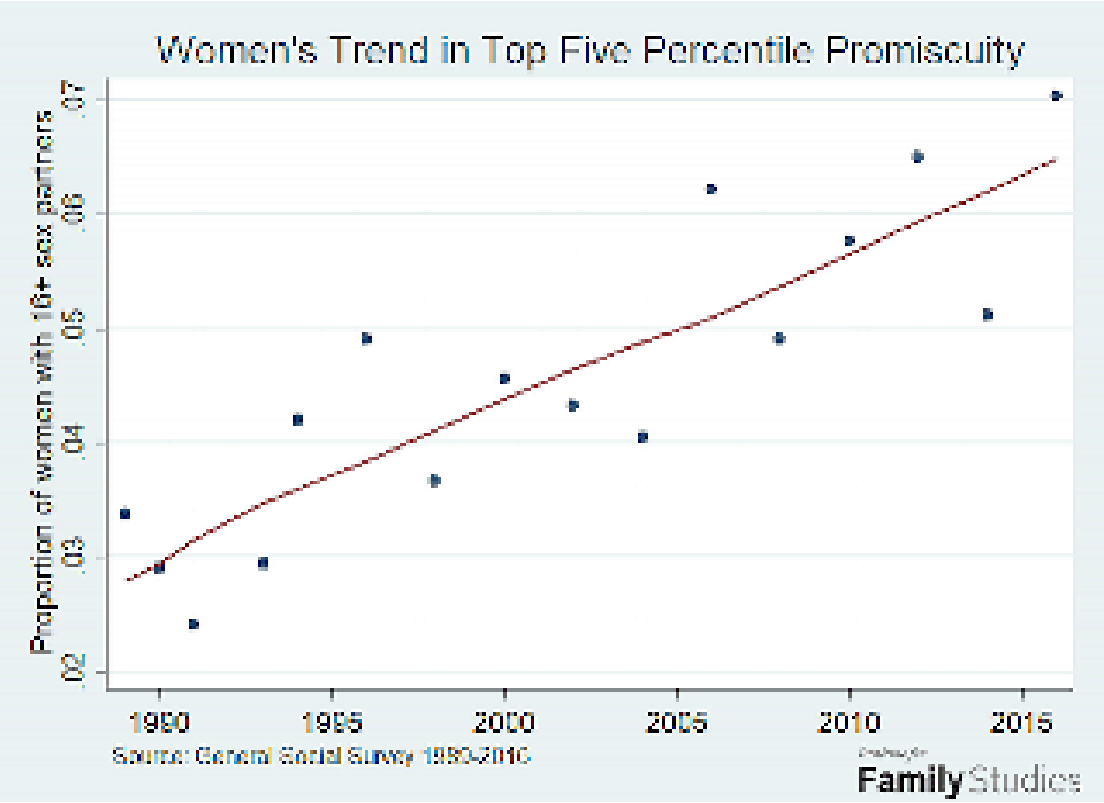
Pray tell, just exactly what are young women doing during those 10 years???

As the average age of marriage is postponed, that leaves more time for postporniscuity. I doubt that it is a coincidence.



They'll be doing all the things that we hoped they wouldn't do, as given in the first bulleted list above.

More important than this, they'll be destroying all the things that God desires of them, as given in the second bulleted list above.

Concluding Statements

We like to think that Christianity can somehow eliminate human nature. But that's not how Christianity works, especially not for hormone ridden adolescents. We must begin to get serious about the purpose of our faith, and not just dawdle with idle rules and pompous decorum.

It is irresponsible for us as parents to put our daughters into a circumstance where they will be tempted beyond measure to have sex outside of marriage. In light of the above information, it is entirely reasonable that we should encourage young women to marry, rather than follow the Feminist Life Script, especially those who are at the age where they are about to let the cat out of the bag.

Now as parents, we are tempted to tell ourselves, "No, that won't happen to MY daughter. I raised her right. She won't be like that!" Please! Let's have pity on our daughters. Let's help them find a fitting way to satisfy their desires.

What is a realistic expectation for our daughters?

Can we honestly tell them to wait until marriage to have sex, and at the same time, make marriage an unrealistic, and even an unpreferred option during TEN of their prime SMV/MMV years?

Are there any other alternatives that would be pleasing to God?

Yes, there's celibacy! How would your daughter feel about that option?

Related

- Do What's Right: Panic Is Not a Strategy (2020 December 17)

2020 Winter Solstice Hibernation

Jack · 21 December 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Some interesting information, links, and videos.

Readership: All
Length: 300 words
Reading Time: 1 minute

Winter Solstice

Today is the winter solstice. The exact moment of the solstice occurred at the moment of posting (10:02 GMT).

In this section, I'll relay a couple interesting videos and a couple links.

A Rare Alignment of Planets After 800 Years On December 21, 2020 | The Great Conjunction (Length: 3:10)

I found this interesting article about the solstice (written in perspective from the southern hemisphere).

ABC News/Science (Genelle Weule): Summer solstice 2020: Planets come out to play at end of longest day (2020 December 21)

Analyzing Video Footage of Collapse of Massive Arecibo Telescope (Length: 12:56)

See InfoGalactic for more on the Arecibo Observatory in Puerto Rico.

Hibernation

I have been posting every day since November first. That's 50 posts! My motivation for ratcheting up the writing rate was to provide a relieving diversion from the election fiasco, thereby granting us a displacement of the angst arising from our daily reading diet and the absence of non-fake news.

Here, I would like to acknowledge the authors who contributed during this time: NovaSeeker (7 posts), Scott (3 posts), Lexet (1 post), and TheDeti (1 post). I couldn't have maintained the schedule of posting every day without their valuable contributions. Thanks also to those readers who invested their thoughts, time, and energy to contribute to the insightful discussions.

I'm going to take a reprieve for the rest of the year (10 days). After the New Year rings in, I'll resume posting some more good stuff. NovaSeeker and Lexet have some more writings in the works, and we'll continue to cover Scott's videos and commentary on social and personality pathologies. So tune in for more at that time.

I wish you all a joyful and memorable season with your friends and families!

Happy Holidays!

Related

- Dark Brightness: On technical issues. (2020 December 21)
- Dark Brightness: The sacrifice of the pagans (2020 December 21)

2020 Sigma Frame Performance Report

Jack · 1 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's fourth annual traffic performance report.

Readership: Anyone interested
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

History

I started blogging on March 7, 2008, using Blogger as my blog platform. On September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and began concentrating on Red Pill topics. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years.

Goals and Purposes

My goals and purposes in blogging are summed up in my About page. I value easily readable, and high content quality posts that stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now.

Methods

I have a frequent habit to pray about the purpose of this blog, what I should write about, and what men need to read and know. Years ago, I used to write in themes, using topics and citations from other articles. In 2019, I started introducing more epiphanies from my private journal and my life experiences. During 2020, there were a lot more comments and other feedback through private email correspondence, so I started writing about topics brought up by readers.

Concerning the appearance of the blog, at the beginning of 2020, I experimented with the header image and the background color. Details are covered in the following posts.

- Σ Frame: On the Impact of Appearance and Avatar (2020/1/5)
- Σ Frame: On the Impact of Theme Color (2020/1/7)

Under the 2019 Performance Report that was posted at the beginning of 2020, Adam Piggott gave me this advice for posting.

> "Post more often, you will get more traffic. If people know that they can get something from you every day, then they come back a lot more often. I've also found that the magic number of words for a post is about 700. That's what people can handle in this day and age."

I decided to experiment with writing shorter, more frequent posts, and I made a goal of posting three times a week at the same time. Within a few weeks, I settled into posting on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.

I also invited several other noteworthy bloggers to join the author's panel. In addition to Lexet, who joined in 2019, Scott and NovaSeeker joined in 2020. In 2020, Scott wrote 9 posts, Lexet wrote 8, and NovaSeeker wrote 7. TheDeti and Elspeth also wrote the main content for one post each.

In November, I started posting every day. My motive was to help distract people from the election drama and provide a diverging relief. As a consequence of my greater devotion to the cause of this blog, several things happened.

- As a result of the change from posting three times a week, to posting every day, the traffic went up 28.5%.

- NovaSeeker started writing posts.
- Scott Klajic came back and wrote a post.
- A reader asked me to make a “Donate” page so that he could contribute.

Here, I would like to acknowledge the authors who contributed during this time: NovaSeeker (7 posts), Scott (3 posts), Lexet (1 post), and the two posts based on comments from TheDeti and Elspeth. I couldn’t have maintained the schedule of posting every day without their valuable contributions.

Overall, I interpreted these events as the hand of God helping me to fulfill my commitment to post daily for 50 days. I don’t say this to displace recognition from the contributions of others, but rather to emphasize that God came through for my readers, and that it’s not all about my own effort.

As the following statistics will show, all these changes proved to increase readership dramatically. Σ Frame had an average of 188 views per day for 2019. This figure increased to 442 for 2020.

Writing Projects:

I had at least four writing projects in 2020:

1. Game
2. How Christian Red Pill is distinct from secular Red Pill
3. Moon Day Review
4. The Purity Movement, which morphed into a series entitled, “Patheological Weddingsday”.

I also continued three writing projects from the previous year (2019), but with less intensity.

- Discipline in Marriage
- Courtship Models
- Abortion and Hormonal Birth Control

These writing projects did not develop as much as I expected. Instead, several themes emerged which diverted my attention and effort. I interpret this as a providential development.

Themes

Looking over my posts from 2020, there were several themes that emerged.

- Authority
- Boundaries
- Charisma
- Churchianity
- Discernment
- Headship
- Purity
- Structural Models of relationships
- The Meet Cute phenomenon

New Pages

Over the past year, I've added the following new pages to the header, and rearranged the pages into drop down links on the header.

- Site – A description of the writing process, a brief history of the blog, and what I've learned from experimenting with theme color.
- Men – A very brief discourse on why this blog is important to men.
- Argumentation and Debate – Something I hope readers will be more aware of in their comments.

Noteworthy Posts and Exchanges:

In February, Scott introduced us to the Meet Cute phenomenon in two posts, and I summed it up in a couple more.

- Σ Frame (Scott): Probabilities (2020/2/24)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Opportunities (2020/2/26)
- Σ Frame: On the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience (2020/4/3)
- Σ Frame: The Meet Cute Phenomenon (Scott's Axiom) (2020/12/6)

In two posts, Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models (2020/9/28), and More on Relational Archetypes (2020/11/28), I combined my model of Authority vs. Life Path with Deep Strengths descriptions of relational archetypes, and the resulting synergy gained a lot of resonance around the sphere. Deep Strength responded in at least three posts.

- Christianity and Masculinity: The Bible and female life path (2020/11/18)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Summary of evaluating relationship or marital status and plans of action (2020/11/26)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Relational archetypes and more insight into the false godliness of complementarianism theology (2020/12/1)

Later in the year, there were three posts that attracted a relatively larger number of comments.

- Σ Frame: Sexual Authority (2020/9/30)
- Σ Frame (TheDeti): The Feminist Life Script (2020/12/17)
- Σ Frame: Average age of first time sexual experience (data) and what this means for Christians (2020/12/20)

Traffic Statistics

Finally, here are the 2020 stats for Σ Frame.

Number of followers joining in 2020: 12

Total number of followers (on WordPress): 158

Number of views in 2020: 161,632

Total number of views (on WordPress): 276,894

Number of visitors in 2020: 56,000

All-time number of visitors (on WordPress): 100,000

Average views per visitor: 2.45

Average views per day: 442

Most popular day and hour: Monday, 9:00 pm (GMT)

The all-time number of posts and the number of views in 2020, by author:

Jack: 425 posts, 184,360 views (433.79 views per post)

Scott: 10 posts, 3,838 views (383.8 views per post)

Lexet: 13 posts, 3,156 views (242.77 views per post)

NovaSeeker: 7 posts, 1,342 views (191.71 views per post)

The most views in one day:

Scott's post, How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020/4/27), pushed Σ Frame over 1,000 views in one day for the first time ever. On Tuesday, April 28, 2020, the stats counter showed 1,155 views from 602 visitors. The traffic came from several sources (in order of the quantity of referrals).

- 256 referrals from Twitter
- Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): Podcast #141 – The zero fücks given episode. (2020/4/27)

- Radix Fidem (Ed Hurst): Praying for Their Enlightenment (2020/4/27)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Idealism and Opportunism are not sex specific (2020/4/28)

The second best day of 2020 was on Saturday, December 18, which brought 808 views from 241 visitors. The traffic was a result of several combinatory factors.

- TheDeti's post, The Feminist Life Script (2020/12/17), attracted a large number of comments in the discussion.
- An older post, List of Slüt Tells (2017/10/15), received 30 referrals from Faceb00k.
- A post from a few days earlier, Redemption and Sexual Healing (2020/12/15) continued to receive views and comments.
- 17 referrals from Christianity and Masculinity added to the count.

The top five countries with the most viewers:

The order is the same as last year. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. United States: 103,000 (+246.61%)
2. Canada: 9,217 (+213.9%)
3. United Kingdom: 8,234 (+194.02%)
4. Australia: 5,701 (+220.03%)
5. India: 3,129 (+200.19%)

Note: All of these countries are democratic, capitalistic societies that are being smothered by post-modern, feministic social ideologies.

Total number of viewing countries/principalities: 213

The top five search engine terms leading people to Σ Frame:

1. Some variant of "what to do when she tries to make you jealous", etc.

2. Some variant of “sigma male”, “sigmaframe”, “sigma frame blog”, etc.
3. Slüt tells
4. Some variant of “wife discipline”, “discipline in marriage”, etc.
5. Busy roommate

Similar to last year, the majority of search terms included the words, “wife”, “discipline”, and “jealous”. Apparently, women making men jealous continues to be a major problem in society for some reason.

Funny or odd search terms which have led people to Σ Frame:

1. Amazon
2. Asian nubiles
3. Breastfeeding public
4. Enthusiastic sex Red Pill
5. Inappropriate mom son
6. Jared
7. Pump guide
8. Redpill drove her away with jealousy
9. Remarksman
10. Rogs
11. Sharkly “male space”
12. sigmaframe.wordpress.com/ elspeth (Maybe Elspeth should join the writers panel?)
13. social contract abd srudent debt (sic.)
14. Women ain’t worth it
15. зарин газ (Translation: sarin gas)
16. засветы кормящих мам (Translation: flashing nursing mothers)
17. сисястые бабы кормят сисей мужиков фото (Translation: busty women feed men with tits photo)

The top 10 incoming referrers (other than amp pages, search engines, and readers):

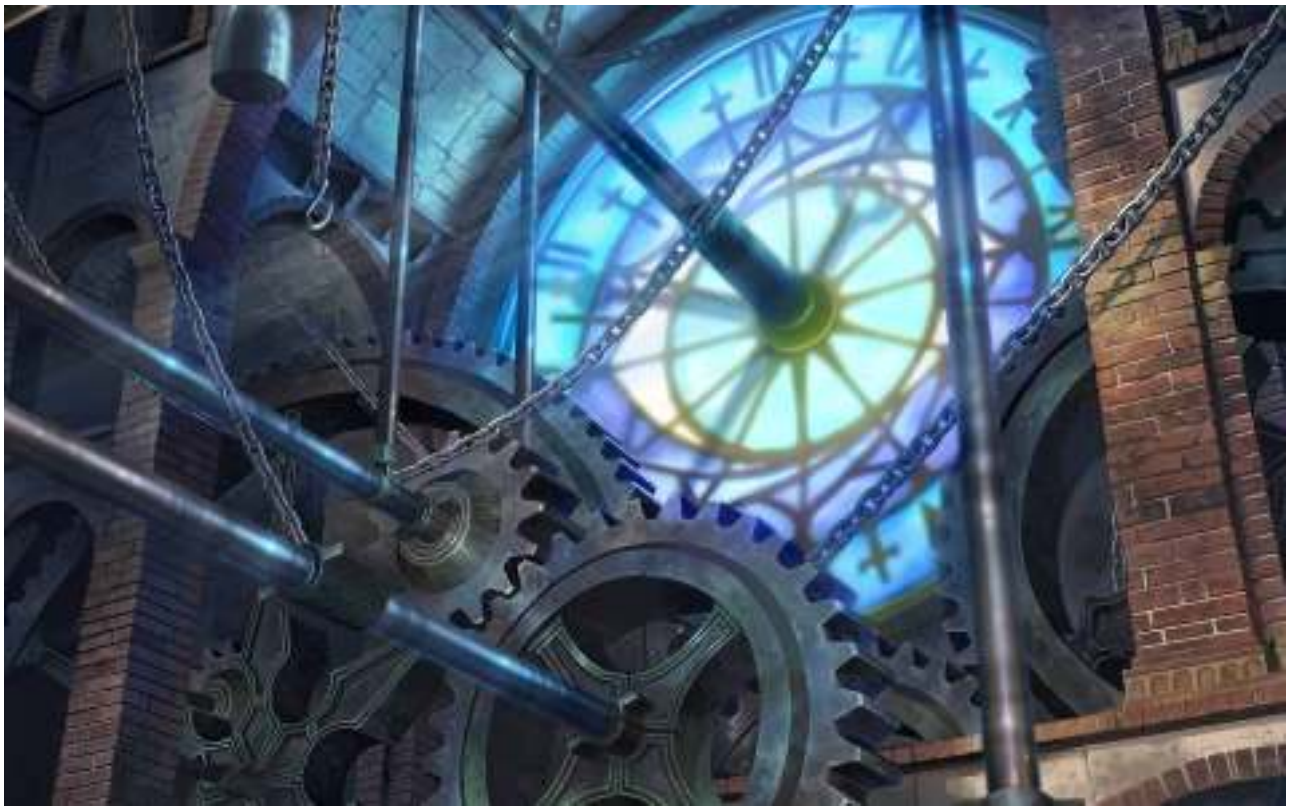
Compared to the previous year’s data, v5k2c2 (Boxer), Dalrock, The Other McCain, and Cane Caldo have been superseded by Twitter, Derek L. Ramsey, and Singularity. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. Christianity and Masculinity (Deep Strength): 2,821 (+296.32%)
2. Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): 2,424 (+145.67%)
3. Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly): 2,183 (+768.66%)
4. Gunner Q: 812 (+133.77%)
5. Twitter: 462
6. Spawny’s Space (Farm Boy): 396 (+150%, exactly!)
7. Biblical Gender Roles: 332 (+116.9%)
8. Derek L. Ramsey: 304
9. Singularity: 249
10. Wintery Knight: 231 (+122.87%)

The top 10 blogs receiving the most traffic from Σ Frame:

Compared to the previous year, Fabius Maximus, Dalrock, and Snapper have been superseded by The Transformed Wife, Hawaiian Libertarian, and Wh0res and Ale. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly): 2,530 (+150.06%, not as exact as Farm Boy!)
2. Spawny's Space: 2,259 (+157.42%)
3. The Transformed Wife: 2,161
4. Hawaiian Libertarian: 1,737
5. Gunner Q: 1,733 (+118.86%)
6. v5k2c2 (Boxer) 1,623 (-15.6% or 84%)
7. Biblical Gender Roles: 1,516 (+136.95%)
8. Wintery Knight: 1,474 (+187.06%)
9. Wh0res and Ale: 1,465
10. Adam Piggott: 1,395 (+104.97%)



Posts

Total number of posts published in 2020: 178

Total number of posts published in 2019: 78

Total number of posts published in 2018: 88

Total number of posts published in 2017: 38

Total number of all posts (on WordPress): 455

Total words in 2020: 248,000

Average number of words per post in 2020: 1,393.26

All-time average number of words per post: 1,396.3

In addition, Jack wrote 3 posts at Spawny's Space this year, all together receiving a total of 1,398 views in 2020.

The all-time top five most popular posts (not including pages):

1. What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (2018/4/22): 51,951
2. 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017/12/1): 5,507
3. List of Slut Tells (2017/10/15): 4,911
4. 50 Shades of Discipline in Marriage (2017/11/25): 3,586
5. Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018/2/15): 2,968

The top five most popular posts from 2020 (not including pages):

1. List of Female IOIs (2020/3/30): 1,430
2. How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020/4/27): 899
3. Probabilities (2020/2/24): 867
4. Moon Day Review – The Manosphere Reshuffles its Deck (2020/9/2): 807
5. On the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience (2020/4/3): 791

Congratulations to Scott, who nailed posts 2 and 3 above.

The top five most popular Categories:

This year shows a large turnover from the previous year. Strategy, which was at number 5 in 2019, is now at number 1. All the others are new to the top five list, replacing Models of Success, Male Power, For the Married, and Holding Frame.

1. Strategy: 613
2. Identity/Relationships: 527
3. Vetting Women: 521
4. Courtship and Marriage: 508
5. Sanctification and Defilement: 478

Likes, Comments, and Shares

Number of likes in 2020: 463

Average number of likes per post in 2020: 2.5

Total all-time number of likes: 1,173

Number of comments in 2020: 2,792

Average number of comments per post in 2020: 17.3

Average number of comments per month in 2020: 397

Total all time number of comments: 5,131

Total all time number of shares: 1,042

The top five posts with the most comments:

1. Σ Frame (TheDeti): The Feminist Life Script (2020/12/17): 112
2. Σ Frame (Scott): Probabilities (2020/2/24): 84
3. Σ Frame (Jack): Average age of first time sexual experience (data) and what this means for Christians (2020/12/20): 65
4. Σ Frame (Jack): Sexual Authority (2020/9/30): 64
5. Σ Frame (Scott): Opportunities (2020/2/26): 64

The most prolific commentators*:

1. Cameron232: 142
2. Oscar: 72
3. LastMod: 66
4. NovaSeeker: 66
5. Scott: 66
6. Lexet: 65
7. Sharkly: 64

 Based on the 1,000 most recent comments.*

That's all, folks!

Related

- Σ Frame: 2017 Σ Frame Performance Report (2018/1/3)
- Σ Frame: 2018 Σ Frame Performance Report (2019/1/1)
- Σ Frame: 2019 Σ Frame Performance Report (2020/1/4)

The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry

Novaseeker · 4 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The streetwalkers move to the sidewalk as middle class, college-aged girls and older women alike take the digital screen.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is a spin-off from my last post, Exploiting Online Attention (2020 December 9). Readers may need to read this post first before continuing. This is the also the first, introductory, part of a series of related posts to come over the next few weeks, as described at the end.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

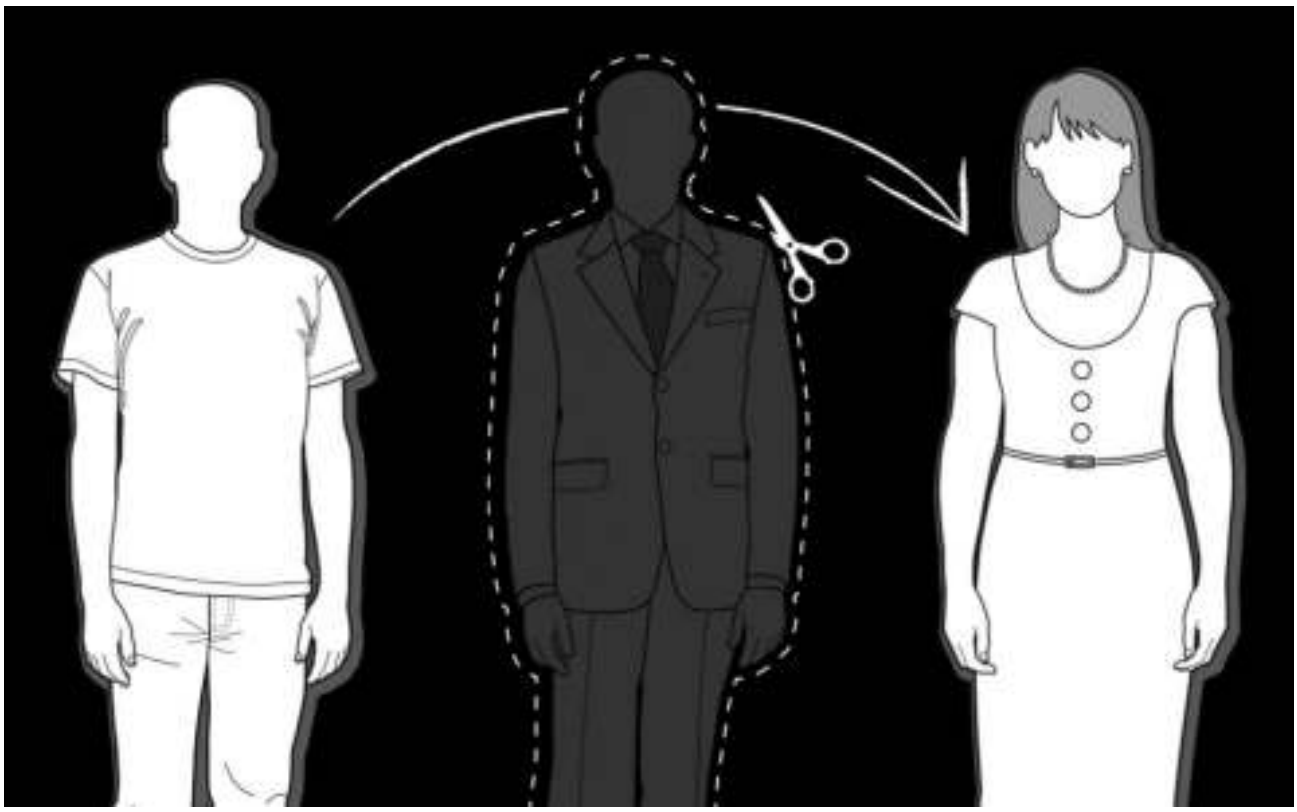
The Disintermediation of Sex

Prior to the rise of the internet, and particularly the user-driven, social media phase of the internet, the sex industry was mostly a seedy subculture that was gate-kept by "professionals" comprised of extremely unsavory, shifty individuals of corrupt character. Being a participant in this industry, no matter whether one was a professional or a client, bore the popular image of being an indigent-class desperado and/or a deviant.

During this period, a woman would generally not opt to participate in the various permutations of the sex industry, from stripping to peep shows, from prostitution to pornography, unless she had fallen into dire circumstances and was completely desperate and destitute.

Today, that is no longer the case.

While the women who participate in the various aspects of the sex industry are still very much a self-selected group and a decided minority of women, it's not nearly as small as the group was when the industry was run by the pimps, madams, strip club kingpins and pornographers. And the motivations of many in the group have changed — for many of the women, participation in the industry isn't "survival as a last resort option", which it often was in the days of pimps and the rest, but is a lifestyle choice based on other options available for income generation for students or office workers who are looking for supplemental income, travel, gifts and the like. In the past, these kinds of women had very low participation rates in this industry, but this is not so today — today it is a different scene, precisely because the internet has disintermediated the sex industry, which is having a spillover impact on the entire sexual marketplace (SMP).

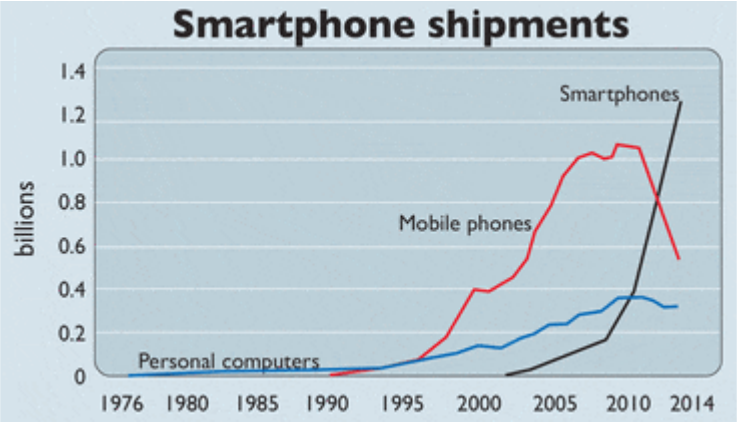


When everything became digitized through the rise of the internet, the first impact was felt by providers of content that could be easily digitized (music, books, videos) and distributed in digital format more cheaply than traditional "hard copy" content providers could do, and without the "middleman" of book stores, record shops and video stores, all of whom took a "cut" of the profit while also controlling the distribution of the material. Next to be hit were "brick and mortar" retailers, which gradually found that their own models for logistics, distribution and product sales were being replaced by Amazon and its imitators who, again, succeeded in removing the layers of middlemen and replacing them with one consolidated middleman — Amazon itself or its lookalike site — which acted as the principal distribution source for … well, after a while, just about everything other than groceries and fresh meals. The wave of disintermediation and the creation of consolidated online "clearinghouse" middleman entities on the internet marched ruthlessly through almost all of the consumer-facing economy, from travel agencies to hotels to taxicabs.

The rise of the internet was, of course, associated with the rise of online pornography in the 1990s, which then spread to the proliferation of online porn videos in the 2000s with the growth of the availability of broadband internet. This represented the disruption of the prior distribution channels for porn, which were newsstands, erotic book and video shops, and seedy XXX theaters.

The Smartphone Changes Everything

But the true sea change came with the rise of the smartphone. The first iPhone was released in June 2007, and by 2011 or so penetration rates of smartphones were becoming substantial throughout the developed world. The smartphone was unique in that it provided high resolution, ultra-portable still and video cameras to a large number of people (eventually over a billion), which over the course of time enabled more and more people to take pictures and videos of themselves and, by virtue of the nature of the smartphone as an "always on" internet access device, to share these images and videos with people. Social media, a creation of the 2000s, found new applications with the rise of the smartphone, as platforms like Instagram became the near ubiquitous means by which people shared and viewed images of others. In the course of a literal handful of years, virtually anyone in the developed world could take pictures and videos of themselves and share them almost instantly with as many, or as few, people as they wanted.



The impact of this was nothing short of revolutionary, and the appreciation of this impact on the ever-changing minefield of male-female relations is widely overlooked or misunderstood. The effects were legion. One of the most salient, which we have addressed elsewhere, has been the rise of smartphone-based app dating from not existing at all to being the primary means by which people meet the opposite sex in less than a decade.

Another substantial effect of the rise of smartphones, however, has been the large-scale privatization and amateurization of the sex industry. The pre-smart phone internet had already begun this process, with prostitution becoming largely disintermediated by means of websites which played the role of the “Amazon of Prostitution” by providing a single middle-man, accessible by content providers (women) and consumers (men) completely in the virtual space. Virtually overnight, the seedy world of pimps and madams, while not being entirely eliminated, lost a lot of its “turf” as these Hooker Amazon sites made it possible for women to find customers and run their sex-for-money business without dealing with the creepy, organized criminal lowlifes who used to run it, often abusing the women who participated in numerous and well-documented ways.

However, prostitution still involves meeting a person in the real world by its nature, so while the rise of online prostitution marketing sites marked a change away from the seediness of the world of pimps and madams, the participation rate in prostitution as an income generation activity remains essentially limited by the typically strong resistance of many women to have sex with strangers for money in what is generally a “strictly transactional” setting — that is, one-off meetings for an hour or two in a hotel room where cash is exchanged for personal services of a sexual nature.

The real revolution here happened later, with the rise of the smartphone and the related apps that perfected the creation and dissemination of pictures and videos. These functions were very popular in general, but from the very beginning they were particularly popular with attractive women, who, with the rise of Instagram, became the pulsing core of the entire social media scene. Many women proceeded to collect hundreds of thousands of followers, in some extreme cases millions, with many men ardently following their every post — liking, commenting, complimenting, direct messaging and the like.

And so emerged the phenomenon of the “Instagram Boyfriend”, at least for as long as he could compete with the endless virtual attention stream he was facilitating

I have written elsewhere how this has made the cost to women of male attention very cheap, in relative terms, because it can be collected in large amounts at a very safe, sanitized distance — as compared with, say, catcalls while walking past a construction site. However, what few people saw coming was how this trend of women displaying themselves on sites like Instagram to garner male attention would intersect with the continually growing and innovating online sex industry.

Personally I think this came as a surprise to most people because in the public mind — in our minds — the sex industry, whether in person or online, is associated with seedy lowlife types. Most of us did not foresee how the online attention getting activity associated with apps like Instagram would effectively merge with the new online sex industry to create something essentially new, precisely because we did not see the kinds of women who participate in the former as being interested in participating in the latter. After all — they never really had before. Why would they now?

Disintermediation is an extremely powerful thing.

From Instagram to OnlyFans

In the context of the rest of the sex industry outside of prostitution itself, the rise of smartphones and social media sites gave women access to the ability to share themselves — that is, pictures and videos of their faces and bodies — with as few or as many men as they wanted, without having to go through intermediaries other than anonymous, faceless digital image clearinghouse sites which were 180- degrees different from strip club or peep show owners, never mind seedy pornographers. It didn’t take very long for a few women to agree to engage in certain “additional activities” for certain of their followers on Instagram, but the nature of these was mostly the subject of rumor and innuendo, because it was all taking place off-site, in the opaque world of private messages, texts and emails. This also made the practice mostly one that only the most brazen and adventurous of women engaged in.

That was, until the tech geeks, noticing an underserved market, came up with “an app for that”. Or rather, multiple apps, each one tailored to a specific part of the emergent amateur, “do-it-yourself” sex industry.

These apps, which include sites like OnlyFans (for Instagram women who want to "upsell" their followers to more revealing pictures and videos, for a price) and Seeking Arrangements (for women who want to become a quasi "kept woman", a kind of paid dating service which involves sex for money but in the context of a simulated relationship rather than one-off transactional handoffs in hotel rooms), a woman no longer has to deal with the creepy sex industry as an intermediary, but can instead engage her paying followers directly and in a very sanitized, safe way.

A woman can be her own pornographer, either taking her own pictures and videos with her smartphone, or by using another Insta/OF girl to do so, or perhaps a female photographer who isn't creepy but "empowering", and placing these photos and videos on her own OnlyFans site in exchange for subscription fees and tips paid by her followers.

A woman can be her own strip club owner by performing strip teases on livestreams to her followers, who have all paid to view the material, while she collects real time tips — again, all without dealing with seedy real life customers in person, or having to share her tips with the staff, or dealing with coked-up coworker "dancers".

A woman can run her own peep show as well on a cam site, which, again, is sanitized — a woman doesn't have to deal with a peep show owner, duck seedy customers on her way to and from, or deal with the general indignity and mental trauma of a fundamentally tawdry and dehumanized environment — that is all replaced by a laptop on her own familiar bed, her lap or a small table nearby and a smartphone on a small tripod, while her customers appear merely as strings of letters in a chat stream.

In other words, the transfer to an online venue has "sanitized" the sex industry for women wholesale. While participation in the industry previously required the regular interface with the seedy underworld that ran the establishments that comprised the sex industry, as well as its seedy, in-person customers, the internet has done away with this unpleasantness, and replaced it with clean, anonymous, digital clearinghouses which are just about as inherently seedy as using Amazon is.

The digital disintermediation of the sex industry has made it possible for women to access this source of cash on their own terms rather than on the dictated terms of the seedier elements of the sex industry — the strip club owner, pimp, or pornographer — and with absolutely no risk of running afoul of the law.

As a result, the suddenly massive world of amateur pornography on OnlyFans (which essentially has become the X-rated wing of Instagram for all intents and purposes) , the continued growth of the “sugar baby” market, pay-per-view porn cams, and the proliferation of internet-sourced “escort” activity (which is a polite euphemism for highbrow, low profile prostitution), have all grown into a substantial, and in many respects essentially new, amateur sex industry.

This is important for at least two reasons.

The first is that it is new, which means it is having new impacts on both sexes, most of which are currently “flying under the radar” and going essentially unnoticed and therefore unexamined. More women are participating in these activities than did in the immediately prior era. Many more. More men are viewing pornography than at any time in history, and more men are having “kept women” as well, because prior to the rise of “sugar baby” websites a few years ago, this activity was extremely exceptional to say the least. Many more women are viewing Instagram attention as their fundamental right, and many of the ones who attract a lot of attention but not quite enough (or not the right kind) to rise to the level of paid influencers or social media celebrities feel some pressure to monetize their attention and popularity somehow, for which the sanitized online amateur sex industry beckons. And in that cycle, some men who never “paid for porn” during the rise of internet pornography nevertheless find themselves paying for customized content that is tailor-made to their specifications by women who market this service through their Instagram feed, which links to their OnlyFans site. These impacts are fast-developing and dynamically changing behaviors in real time, and the impacts are going largely overlooked, which makes them all the more impactful.

The second is that the newly emergent amateur sex industry, and its main “on ramp”, Instagram, is having a substantial impact on the overall relationship between men and women, even apart from the industry itself. This impact had already begun with the rise of Instagram, as it cheapened the value of male attention in socio-sexual terms by making it superabundant on an epic, heretofore unavailable scale while at the same time sanitizing it by making it virtual rather than in person and inconvenient or uncomfortable for women.

But the subsequent rise of the amateur sex industry has had the impact of making relations between men and women more transactional overall. While, unlike Instagram, most women still do not participate in this activity, despite its significant and ongoing growth, the awareness that it exists, and that it is a possibility, casts a more transactional frame to male/female relations overall, both when it comes to women’s expectations of men who are not in the “sport sex” category for them, as well as men’s expectations of women sexually, as a result of them having seen many otherwise “normal everyday” women on Instagram and OF engaged in various activities.

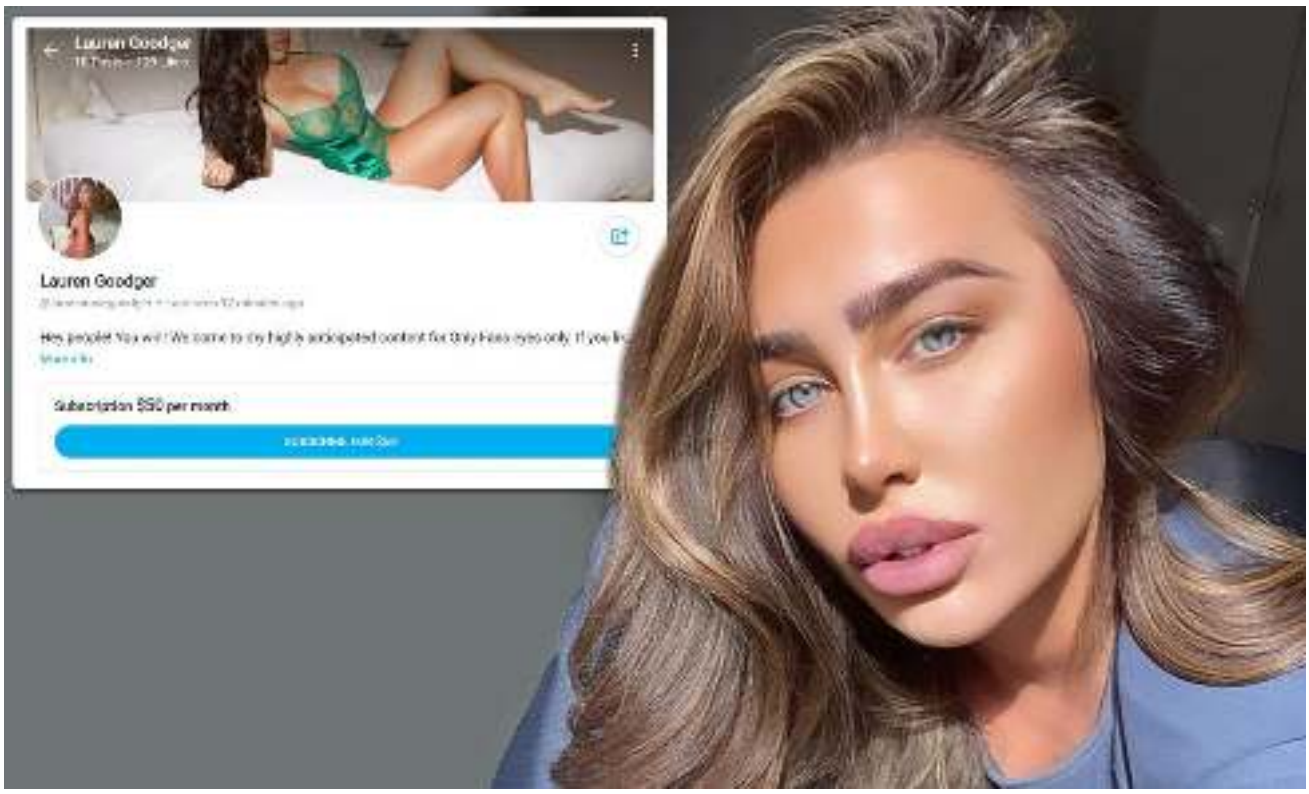
In addition the availability of the amateur sex industry as an income source, and the growing acceptability of its use as such given how sanitized it is in comparison to the prior version of the sex industry, has increased the vetting and relationship risks men run with women in the present period. Simply put, women have opportunities they simply did not have even 5 years ago, and a growing number are capitalizing on those, either before or after relationships or marriages to men (and, I would surmise, at times even during, with or without the man’s awareness or consent).



The landscape has simply changed, substantially and quickly, in ways that men in particular need to be aware of as part of their overall understanding of the situation between men and women in the emerging society, and the new risks presented to men by these developments. As Deti wrote regarding the key shift:

> “And it has been taken totally private. What used to take place in public now takes place totally and completely out of the public eye. Men can gawk at photos and video of amateur pornstars, camgirls and OF girls in the privacy of their rooms. Women can prostitute themselves more openly and more privately at the same time. What used to be legitimate “charging” for dates (take me out for dinner and you pay, take me for a night out on your dime, take me out to the museum and you pay, let’s do a weekend away and you pay) is now shady “charging” for “prostitution lite” – subscriptions to premium porn sites, camgirl sites, OF rendezvous, sugar dating, all of which can, and do, include dates and sex.”

The Path Forward

Given the context of the modern SMP that young people are in, and what’s on the table today, it’s understandable why we see the landscape of behaviors continuing to evolve.

Even so, none of this is good for men. It goes without saying that no man should be visiting prostitutes of any sort, or sugar babies, or viewing internet porn, including OnlyFans or anything like that. To begin with, it’s obviously all very immoral and fundamentally soul corrupting to do so. And even leaving that aside, the online sex culture gives guys even less incentive to make the kinds of changes in their lives that can help with actual relationships with women outside the virtual space. However, even for men who abstain from participation in this problematic new area, the impact remains, due to the impact these developments are having on male-female relations overall.

Simply put, the impact of these social changes on the behaviors of young men and women, and the SMP in general, is taking place in real time, and no-one is really discussing it.

Until now.

Over the next couple of weeks, this blog will feature a series of posts by Jack and me relating to aspects of these developments in the socio-sexual marketplace, including a detailed dive into a particularly spectacular example of the new risks being presented to men, and an assessment of potential takeaways for men facing this challenging new environment. So stay tuned — more is soon to come on this emerging new development in the seemingly ever-shifting landscape of male-female relations in the current era.

Related

- Σ Frame: Yet another variety of Internet Whoring (2019 October 9)

Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women?

Jack · 6 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Because it's the best job on the planet!

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
In this series, prostitution is defined as the sale of either (1) sexual services, (2) faux relationships (calculated by the hour, number of messages, etc.), or (3) personalized, self-produced, sexually titillating media content — for cash.
Length: 2,170 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

Maybe some of you can remember the song of the seven dwarves.

> Heigh ho! Heigh ho!
> Heigh ho! It's home from work we go.
> [Whistling]
> Heigh ho! Heigh ho! Heigh ho! Heigh ho! …

Nowadays, it's not men who are whistling off to work, but wimmin who have joined the pseudo workforce in the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS). Since the women started twerking again, the men are now singing a different tune.

> Hi hoe! Hi hoe!
> Hi hoe! We're jerkin' off to your online show.
> We'll watch you prance and sing and dance!
> Hi hoe! Hi hoe! Hi hoe! Hi hoe! …

But why the switcheroo of gender roles? And why would women willingly enter into online prostitution? This post will examine three major reasons.

1. The job benefits
2. The social attention and affirmation
3. The MONEY!!!

They do it for the Job Benefits

Prostitution is a profession, and just like many other professions, it can be conducted online, including the advertising, scheduling, social networking, client management, and the processing and exchange of information in the form of digital photographs, videos, and live videocam sessions. For those women who are more adventurous and less averse to the risks, there is also the option of arranging an in-person rendezvous with clients, through online platforms that permit a user selective process.

So from this perspective, working for the OASIS could be considered equivalent to telecommuting. Once a woman learns basic computer skills, like typing, photo editing, and how to manage a simple website account, she can start her own small online prostitution business and commence trading off the titillating throes of lust to anyone who stumbles across her account and takes a vicarious interest in her fleshwares.

The commodity/service that is being sold is the visual and/or carnal access to the female form and/or image, preferably surrounded by a pleasant, informal environment.
Further, she only has to go to an in-person meeting with a client if and when she chooses to do so.

But better than this, there's hardly any work required. A woman can simply lounge around the house in her underwear, drink lattes, watch romcoms, and masturbate at her leisure, and let the cash roll in as the video cameras roll on. This style of leisure activity is what women prefer to do by default, so working for the camera only requires essentially the same things she would do if she were NOT working.

Now there might be some additional work required for those women who are not so young or genetically gifted. Supplementary labor in this regard would include losing weight, fitness and/or aerobic training, cosmetic artistry, and washing and blow drying hair every day.

Also, certain women have more advanced and finely honed honeycraft skills, for which there is a huge market demand. The type of skilled labor required to be the modern equivalent of a Geisha demands real emotional work. However, this type of labor is also not without hefty rewards.

Best of all, this job pays for all travel expenses! For some women, the travel destinations include dates with extremely wealthy men in some of the most exotic locations around the world! Dreams do come true!

They do it for the social affirming, ego stroking Attenshun!

Similar to other professions in the digital age, OASIS has now taken advantage of the conveniences and data crunching opportunities offered by the computer and internet. Instead of entertaining 5 to 8 johns a day, as was typical in the old days, the mass distribution and broadcasting abilities of the smart phone/computer and the internet can now allow an online hoe to entertain hundreds of e-johns in one online session.

Social attention, in this setting, has been reduced to the equivalent of getting a “Like” on Faysbook. Of note, “Likes” are also equivalent to “Follow”. It’s a form of immediate feedback that represents social affirmation, which is, and has always been, chick crack. Since there are no “Dislike” or “Hate” buttons, it also minimizes the shame of rejection.

Compared to the investment of time, money, and attention once offered by the suitors of yesteryore, the material value of “getting a like” is reduced online, but nevertheless, the feminine need for attention is well sated, thereby supplanting their instinctive drive for survival that undergirds their need for attention.

Granted, the men offering this attention are those desperately thirsty men who can’t get a woman in real life. However, the number of men fitting this bill grows by the hour, and the increased quantity supplemented by the immediate cash profits more than compensates for the quality.

Furthermore, being on the receiving end of that low SMV male attention online is less “risky”, troublesome, and onerous than it is in real life. Feminism has removed the risk of being $1ut shamed and ostracized for being meretricious. The removal of the physical risks, although probably lower now than in ages past, are obvious. Thus, the risks posed by participating in OASIS that are perceived by the female mind are no longer centered around physical safety, health, and reputation, but rather identity theft, doxxing, financial transaction fraud, and being edged out of the market by aging and competition.

Hence, OASIS is empowering in a way that traditional prostitution has never been.

Case Study 1: A discoverie at the Gym!

This story is from RedPillBoomer.

> "Believe it or not, this first got my attention by a couple of Christian women I know, both supposedly happily(?) married; and a couple of secular women I know from an educational program I participate in with them, observing their posts on Instagram. While not sexual in nature specifically in their posting, what caught my attention was the NUMBER of POSTS PER DAY they were putting up on Instagram. I'm like, "What are they doing, don't they have better uses for their time?" Then it hit me, they are after the attention and validation–the MALE attention and validation. It dawned on me, they were addicted to al the attention and validation they were getting–like a drug. I also noticed, they got increasingly what I call, subtly provocative, with their poses and outfits. It didn't reach slutty levels outwardly, but the innuendo was unmistakable! It didn't take an Einstein to figure out what they were saying to the men in their sub-communications."
>
> "[They] started with gym postings. They seemed innocent at first like, "Hey, look at me working out hard in the gym today!" Added to the workout postings were the ubiquitous 'food shots,' 'girls having fun together shots,' etc. The posts then seemingly began to increase from one here and there, to one every day, then to multiple posts during the same day. I noticed the gym clothes got tighter on the legs (spandex) and around the butt; the workout shirts sleeveless and loose fitting in the beginning, started to get smaller fitting with a little cleavage starting to show. What really did it for me were the posts at the gym evolving from general workout pics to provocatively posed shots of the chest and ass in action during squats, military press, etc. And then, Chad and Tyrone like trainers working with them personally getting into all these provocative poses. It also includes poses with them with their arms around their trainer hugging and 'celebrating' breakthroughs in the amount of weight they were lifting or whatever. Who the ɦəll does that at the gym?"

Even a modest effort gets extravagant feedback!

The MONEY!!!

Here's how OnlyFans works [1].

Users charge their followers a monthly subscription fee to see their photos and videos. I assume that this allows subscribers the opportunity to wank with the digital content as much as they please. OnlyFans takes a commission of about 20%.

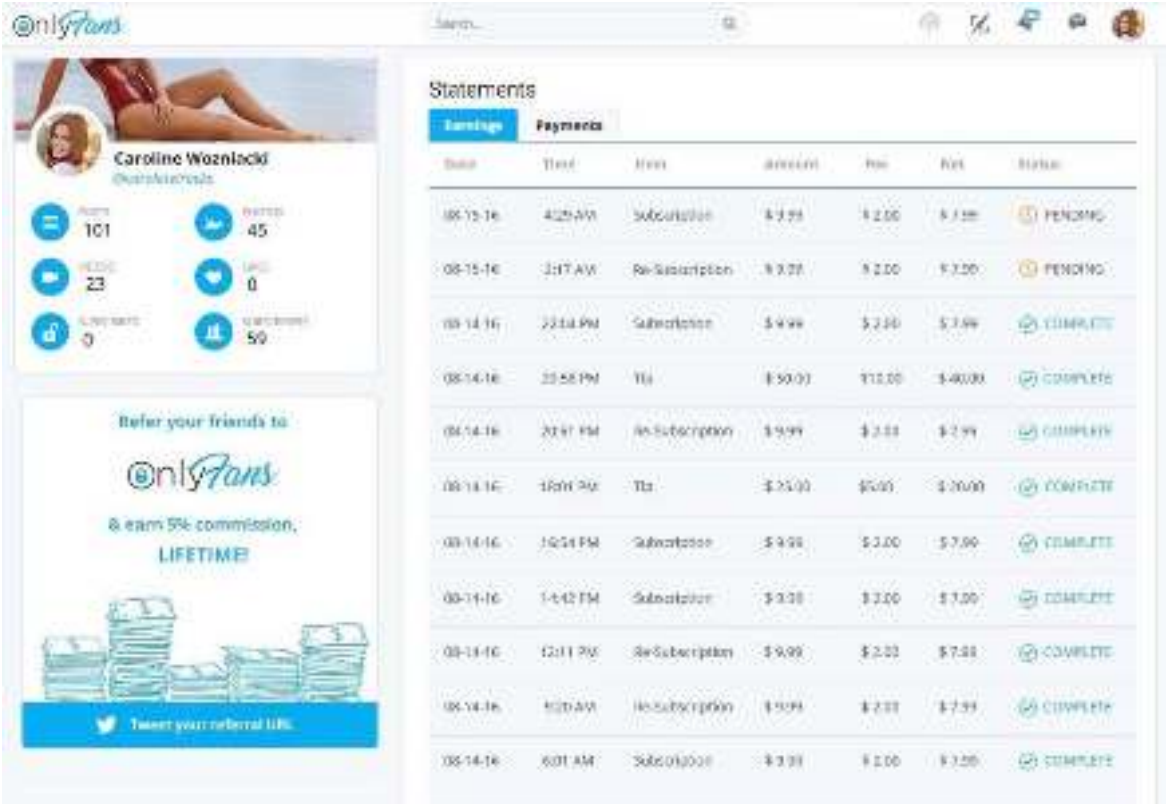
Case Study 2: Caroline Wozniacki

Take a look at this statement from one OnlyFans content creator, Caroline Wozniacki.



Notice that she has 101 posts, 45 photos, and 23 videos, and only 59 subscribers! According to what's shown on this statement, she made $115.93 on 2016 August 14. That's just in one day! If we assume this is a representative sample, and multiply this by 30, then that's $3,477.90 per month! Multiplying by 12 yields $41,734.80 per year!

Even a small time content creator can earn a living off of OnlyFans.

Case Study 3: Makayla Samountry

I came across this video on YouTube, in which a young woman "discovers" how much her SMV is worth in today's dollars.

According to her statement, she attracted 8 followers and she made $405 the first two weeks on OnlyFans. She had $581 from messages, and $785 in subscriptions after one month! On her best day, she made $200 that day. In total, she had over 7,000 views, and she made $1,096.70 in the first month!

She says this supplementary income is exactly what she needs to cover the rent for her 2-bedroom apartment and have "a little extra" to buy her boyfriend Tyler a Valentine's gift.

She said her boyfriend Tyler said he feels left out, but that he is "fully supportive of her". He only asks to be sent a copy of anything she uploads to OnlyFans.

If you watched much of the video, you'll notice how she's doing her thing dressed very casually, drinking wine, and she is absolutely BEAMING with joy about her experience with OnlyFans.

The thing that makes this interesting is that she is not that great looking. She's young and has fairly good facial symmetry, but she has a very average body, and a bad case of acne.

Even a very common young woman can earn a living off of OnlyFans.

Case Study 4: Top Celebrities on OnlyFans

Take a look at this screenshot showing the top earners on OnlyFans [1].

The top earner, Black China makes £15,418,259 ($21,034,034.36), and the bottom of the top ten makes at least £800,000 (~$1.1 million) per month!

This is an insane amount of money made smiling for the camera!

Conclusions

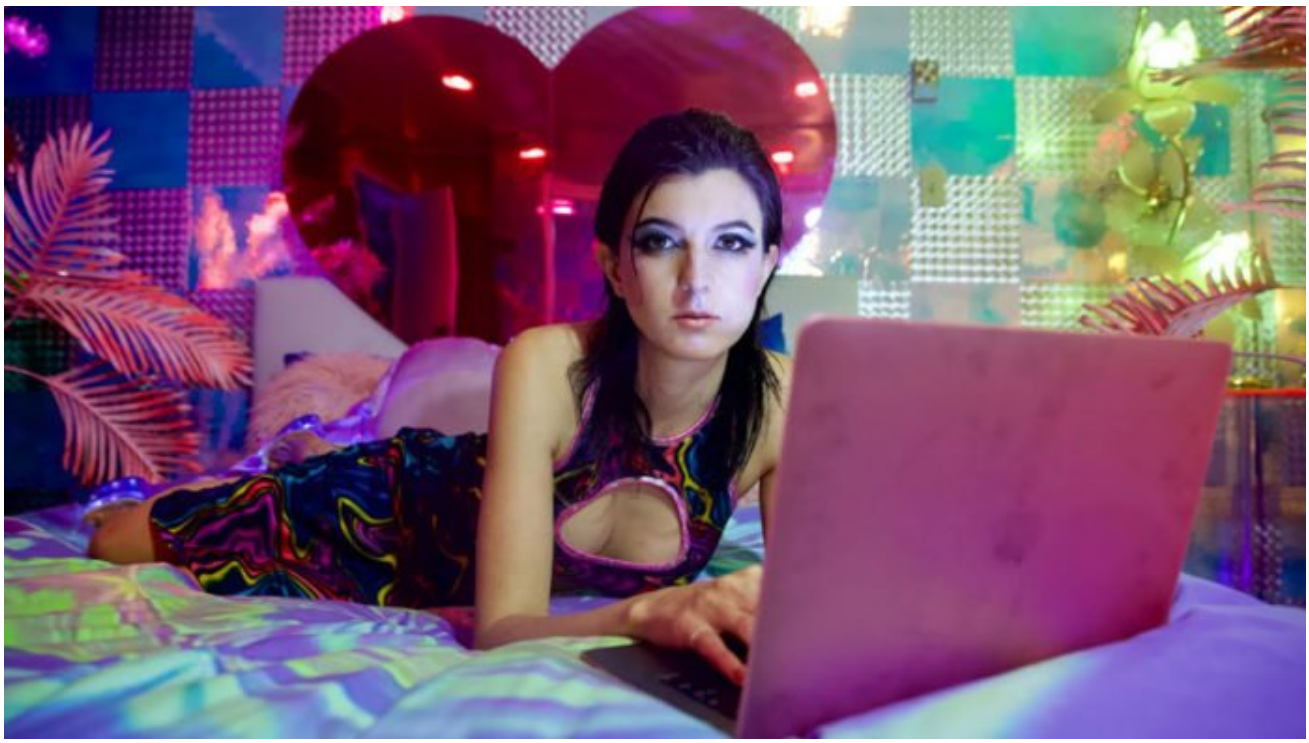
Prostitution is a profession, and just like any other profession, some prostitutes can make more money than others. And some are more professionally skilled and capable of managing their own business than others.

Prostitution is also a service, and just like many other services in the information age, it has been transplanted online, including the transactions involving the scheduling, distribution of media content, payments, and so on.

Women are under pressures here as well and, as with everything else, how they respond individually to those pressures is dependent on some combination of values, upbringing, options, goals, looks, and age. It's all in the mix.

But overall, OASIS is generally advantageous to those women who have the interest and motivation to take advantage of the shifts described above, while being extremely disadvantageous to those women who do not.

All of the reasons mentioned previously and above are why there is no real outcry to get rid of porn, cams, sugar babies, escort sites and the like, at least none that is broad based and loud like many other social causes are today. Some people do feel very strongly about it, but there is a growing group of women who are, to some degree empowered by it, even if in a relatively small way rather than in a full-time lifestyle way, and it therefore will likely continue and persist in this way in the years ahead.



I predict that it won't be long until the debut of internet-based "escort agencies", which will utilize a business model similar to that of temporary workers' agencies, only online. They will manage the e-johns appointments with the e-staceys by the hour. The e-johns will log in with an account number and ask for an "escort" having specified attributes and/or a skill set to be scheduled on a time slot of his choosing. The e-staceys will try to fill as many time slots as they can, in order to maximize their income. The e-staceys will be paid by the agency according to what the popular demand for their personal attributes and skills can fetch in the SMP. And just like a career with the police or military, if an e-stacey can grind it out for 20 years, they may be eligible for retirement benefits. Government will be happy to look the other way, as long as the tax bucks are proceeding.

References

1. Respect My Region (Lorenz Dominique): The Truth About The OnlyFans Rich List (2020 October 6)

Related

- The Other McCain: Insta-Wh0res! (2019 April 30)

Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to men?

Jack · 8 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Because it's the best cost per benefit option – or so it seems.

Readership: Men
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
In this series, prostitution is defined as the sale of either (1) sexual services, (2) faux relationships (calculated by the hour, number of messages, etc.), or (3) personalized, self-produced, sexually titillating media content — for cash.
Length: 3,230 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Introduction

To answer the eponymous question, I'll go after the question of why male thirst is skyrocketing, and how the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS) sates this desire.

Speaking of the end times (which I believe we have been living in for the past century or so), Jesus said,

> "And because lawlessness will abound, the love of many will grow cold."
>
> Matthew 24:12 (NKJV)

The author of Timothy reiterated Jesus' words.

> [1] But this know, that in [the] last days difficult times shall be there; [2] for men shall be lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, arrogant, evil speakers, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, profane, [3] without natural affection, implacable, slanderers, of unsubdued passions, savage, having no love for what is good, [4] traitors, headlong, of vain pretensions, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God;
>
> 2nd Timothy 3:1-4 (DARBY)

 Headlong is an old English adjective translated as brash and impulsive.*

The idea in these passages that I want to point out is that those who are fallen (including both men and women) are devoid of natural affection. And as the years roll on, there is an ever growing segment of humanity who fall into this description. Yet, their own need for love and affection does not abate in the slightest.

In fact, the human desire for love and affection is, in itself, quite natural and good. But when subjugated to the continual deprivation of the same, human beings only grow more ravenously desperate and depraved.

Men hope to fall in love with a woman, and to discover a deep soul bond with her. However, women who have been indoctrinated by feminism and/or despoiled by the SMP are wholly unable to offer such an experience to men. Yet, the decline in the supply does not reduce the demand in the slightest, but instead, it only exacerbates it. So modern men are strongly driven to go hunting for such an experience, and will find a small measure of contentment in whatever they might find, even if it is merely a fleeting sentimental imitation.

So going back to the question, why does a man drink from the OASIS? There is no need to point out the obvious answer – utterly desperate male thirst during the most severe sex drought of the modern era. Guys who can find a satisfying relationship with one woman aren't going to risk that by fooling around with online sex, and Chads who have good options with multiple women view the online transaction as somewhat juvenile. However, there are plenty of men left who are not in either of those categories, and there are a few other reasons not related to raw sexual desire.

With this in mind, let's review a number of other reasons that have been offered by several commenters about why men are drawn to the mirage of the OASIS. I've compiled these reasons into four basic flavors:

1. It's a pragmatic alternative to the failed SMP/MMP.
2. It's smooth and easy.
3. The personalization fits the fantasy.
4. It's a throwaway option.

The Failed SMP/MMP Drives Men to Alternate Sources

TheDeti concisely described the debacle of the modern Marriage Marketplace.

> "You can't have a functional marriage marketplace where the objective has a 50% failure rate, where the risks are enormous compared to the paltry benefits, and where one party (the man) will bear almost all the costs of failure.
>
> You can't have a functional marriage marketplace where the man bears all the burdens and obligations and gets no benefits; and where the woman reaps all the benefits with no concomitant burdens or obligations.
>
> You can't have a functional marriage marketplace where the man can't get the one benefit he's supposed to get [only] from marriage (regular, decent, non-resentful, non-grudging sex at reasonable intervals from a woman who actually wants to give it to him), but you still demand that he bear all the burdens and obligations.
>
> You can't have a functional marriage marketplace where the demand for sex vastly outstrips the willing supply, and where the suppliers refuse to provide that supply."

The thing is, the Sexual Marketplace (SMP) has converged with the Marriage Marketplace (MMP). For the past 20 years or so, men are finding that they can't get break into the MMP without first succeeding in the SMP. This is an accumulated consequence of the sexual revolution, and is no less the case among Christians, unfortunately. The OASIS fills in the blank left by the modern MMP by offering men a back door into the SMP, even if only a virtual one. This practical improvisation, however, does not usually lead to marriage. It only gives men an immediate relief, and the false sense that they're making some advances in their sexual lives.

For many men, this is the "best" they can do, given the present condition of the SMP/MMP.

It's Smooth and Easy

My previous post, Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women? (2021 January 6), described how smooth and easy OASIS is for women. Similar to how OASIS gives women all the benefits without all the hassle, OASIS does the same for men, but for different reasons.

The OASIS offers a convenient, privatized transaction. A man would consider a one-time expense to be preferable over the constant pilfering and unexpected on-the-spot demands for cash that are typical for having a wife or girlfriend in tow. On this, Deti said,

This is men doing what they need to do to get sex or facsimiles/imitations thereof. They used to have to take women on dates at great cost of time and money. Now, they do porn/camgirls/OF, and the more affluent get lite prostitutes, er… sugar babies.

It is also somewhat predictable. The transactional nature of subscribing to an OnlyFans account carries an implicit guarantee that the man will get something reminiscent of the thrills he wants and expects from a woman.

Thus, a man can break into the SMP without having to involve himself in the responsibilities and headaches of having to engage in a real relationship with a woman. No disrespect, no approach anxiety, no fear of rejection, no auto-rejection, no buyer's remorse, no ghosting or flaking, no Gaslighting, no $ħit tests, no mind games, and probably not much Bulverizing. If he so wishes, he can get to "know" a woman (in the Biblical sense) without any of his family or friends' knowledge.

Furthermore, he can avoid all the cut throat competition of the SMP. This means that he doesn't need to develop his career, improve his social skills, work out at the gym, hammer out game techniques, spend money on a looksmax wardrobe, or do any of the other things that would make him more attractive to women.

The importance of being able to avoid the fear of competition, comparison, and/or rejection cannot be understated, because for most all men, this is the biggest hurdle that blocks their entrance into the SMP. Namely because, as mentioned in the intro, modern women can be very unloving and unforgiving. If the man is ostensibly sub-par in her haughty opinion, she'll cut him off at the knees for no good reason at all. In fact, this is how women maintain preselection.

Case Study: Robert Kraft

Joe2 gave us a poignant anecdote.

> "You may recall the high profile case of New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft and 24 other men who were charged with paying employees of a massage parlor to perform sex acts. The charges were eventually dropped, but the women involved reached plea deals and paid fines. Authorities take the soliciting of another to commit prostitution seriously and will prosecute.
>
> On the other hand, the payment to a sugar baby is strictly for her time and companionship, as may be stated in any agreement involving the transfer of money to her account. What actually rakes place (sex) between the sugar baby and her sugar daddy is between two consenting adults and not related to the transfer of money."

If Kraft had spent $800 an hour to see an internet escort, you and I would never know about it, but instead he chose to opt for a $100 BJ at a massage parlor that was already being chased by the cops. As is often the case with the wealthy, they can be incredibly, and surprisingly, cheap when it comes to some things, and in this case it cost him some reputation. It would have been better for him to pay a little more money in order to have a "smoother" transaction.

The Personalization

Cameron232 asked a good question that paddles up the effluent river.

> "I get why men pay for actual prostitutes (sad and sinful as it is) but why do they pay for online viewing? If you have internet access, you're 0.13 seconds away from nude pics and videos of girls for free. It's been that way for 25 years now."

Deti answered,

> They pay for online viewing because it's personalized. OF, camgirls, premium pornsites, and even pornstars now are personalizing things for viewers. Paying subscribers get perks that the "free" subscribers don't get, and most of it has to do with personalized content. They have preferred viewers, and give "prime" and "exclusive personalized content" to paid subscribers.

Yes, it's basically "fake, paid dating". If a woman can offer a convincing spiel, enough to make a man feel like it fulfills his fantasy, then this is good enough for those men who are lonely and desperate. The selling point is in fleshing out the fantasy. Men's fantasies might be any of the following…

- Being treated right by a woman.
- Getting a taste of (faked) female respect.
- The ego stroke of having the companionship of an attractive and polite female.
- The confidence of interacting with an attractive woman whom he knows won't reject him (at least not during that date).
- The humbling yet exhilarating experience of falling in love.
- Simply just having beastly rutting sex with a woman who's paid to smile and not grimace.

Whether or not the woman can fit the fantasy all depends on how well the girl "hustles" with her honeycraft skills.

The girl who is effective at this basically plays a feminine personality “role” that she developed/invented which is alluring, sexy, fun, educated, and so on. Those with an acute aptitude for Machiavellianism can conjure up a personalized mythical backstory that is quite elaborate and interesting, and she can carry this persona in an authentic way for a long time. More often than not, these characteristic roles buy into the Headship relational model, simply because that is the God-ordained default design which men can ease into most comfortably.

The best hoes tailor their persona and interactive style to the men they are dealing with such that they can be quite effective at “reeling in” the male customer.

The ideal goal from her perspective is for the guy to get taken in by her act so completely, that he becomes a püssy whipped repeat customer who is a reliable source of cash. Of note, this is an inversion of the male-female sexual authority that is characteristic of a God honoring Headship structure.

She knows that they both know, on some level, that it is all a temporary act, and that the whole thing is premised on her being paid such that if the money goes away, so does she. But within that “suspension of disbelief” within the time and space allotted, a girl who is good at the act can create a very convincing impression of a relationship that blows away his preconceived fantasies in some fashion or form.

This simulacrum of a relationship is what makes fishing in the OASIS fundamentally different from watching another man swimming in a porn video. He might actually catch a fish!

Some men might be naïve enough to think they can nurse an online relationship until it develops into a real relationship. Knowing the grace of God, I’m sure there are a very small number of couples who do find true love at the OASIS, but this is the ultra-rare exception. For the vast majority of cases, men are not naïve enough to think that they can pay a woman to fall in love with him, and that expectation never enters into the picture. Men simply want to worship flesh and get their rocks off.

If you think about it, you can see why regular guys would opt for an OnlyFans hookup instead of p0rnography, and why men of greater means who are looking for paid companionship would choose a Sugar Baby over a hooker. It isn’t because it’s real, but because it feels real — again depending on how good the chick is at what she is doing. And some are much better than others at being a credible fake girlfriend.

Online Sex is a Throwaway Option

In some ways, a man can be his true self much more easily in a false relationship, simply because there is no ego investment in the outcome. He can allow himself to trip up and play the fool simply because "it doesn't really matter" one way or the other. Having the opportunity to "fail" and still be "accepted" can actually build up a man's confidence.

Also, there is the sexual aspect. Since time immemorial, men have sought after sources of immediate sexual relief which carries a minimum of responsibilities and consequences. This sentiment has been captured by various artists and actors throughout modern history.

> "I want a lover who won't drive me crazy. Someone who'll love me, and then go away."
>
> "I need a lover", by John Cougar Mellencamp (YouTube)

> "You don't pay wh0res to come, you pay them to leave."
>
> Various sources in the acting industry.

For these reasons, prostitution has always been regarded as one of the best options for throwaway sex. Online prostitution is even more advantageous for all the reasons already discussed, namely because it is convenient, sanitized, and the male clients can be just as discreet as the Insta-Wh0res themselves. Hence, OASIS meets the primal needs of men quite sugardipitously.

Conclusions

There are many pros and cons about the advent of OASIS.

I can see a couple upsides to the greater participation of women in OASIS.

- Women can have the opportunity to learn what men actually like and are attracted to in women.
- Women are motivated to learn what men want and how to serve men's physical and emotional needs because this can increase their income.

Women getting better at being feminine might appear to be a good thing for men, but remember, these lessons come at a great cost to her holiness and worthiness for marriage.

The positive aspects for men are as follows.

1. Men are incentivized to get a job and earn money (or more money), so that they can pay their OnlyFans tallies and their Insta-Wh0re girlfriends/sugar babies.
2. The subjective and immediate gratification relieves the incessant and d@mnable burning, which in many cases can allow a man to think clearly about his life.
3. If a man can get some experience with a "professional", then this eases his fear of rejection and increases his confidence.
4. The overall experience ushers him into a new understanding of how to relate to women in a more efficacious manner.

The negative aspects of this approach include the following.

1. The idolatry of wimmin worship, AKA pedestalization.
2. It's a petri dish for lust and possible fornication.
3. The impressions on his psyche and soul create a standard by which he compares all future relationships. This soul moulding is a harrowing curse for the women involved, causing them to become jaded, truculent, distrustful, and psychotic, even within a very short time frame.
4. Because the relationship is false, it may give men some false notions about how to handle a woman. Namely

> (from what I've heard), hoes want to be treated like a hoe, and they respond positively to Dark Triad Gamey methods of interaction. But identifying and melding with a marriage-worthy woman requires a different mindset and spiritual disposition.

If the woman is exceptionally beautiful and skilled in her Honeycraft and Machiavellianism, then the experience takes on a new degree of smoothness by an order of magnitude. It is also more tempting and dangerous to his soul for the same reason, and others listed above.

A superior mirage, AKA Fata Morgana. In centuries past, the sight of a Fata Morgana was interpreted to mean that the voyage of the ship was doomed.
On this, NovaSeeker wrote,

> "It's different from watching a video because, again, if the girl is good at what she does, it can feel real to the guy, and that makes all the difference to him in terms of how satisfying the experience is."
>
> "Sugar babies work on the same principle. Why would a guy pay a sugar baby college/grad student $2,000 a month to see her 3-4 times in that period, when he could see 2 or 3 hotter "pay by the hour" hookers for the same cash, and get hotter girls and more variety, and "on demand" service? It's because with the sugar baby he is having a fantasy relationship. A talented SB doesn't act like a hooker. She acts like a "secret young girlfriend" or "protege" or "personal assistant" or whatever kind of fantasy the (almost always older) guy seems suited for, and she plays that role when she is with him. She holds his hand in public, they visit museums and restaurants on fake dates, and they have sex a few times a month. In between, they text, she treats him with a modicum of respect (which is more precious than gold to a man), she doesn't ghost, flake out, or cut him off. Although she may have some basic rules about how much of her time and texting goes into the deal, most SBs are good at doing this in a way that, too, feels organic and not overly fake.
>
> The money flows monthly in a venmo and feels less transactional because it's completely decoupled from the in-person meetings, which as noted, flow like "normal" dates."

As you can see, taking the back door into the SMP can set a man up for either a lifetime of wh0remongering (which is condemned in scripture, 1 Corinthians 6:9-10; Galatians 5:19-21; Ephesians 5:3-5; see all verses) or else, severe disillusionment should he ever repent and attempt to attain a God glorifying Headship. Because the former is so much easier, smoother, and immediately gratifying, it is rather unlikely that he will find the latter.

All in all, OASIS is very bad for both men and women. It will be interesting to see how this plays out over time.

Related

- Illimitable Men: The Nature of Women (2015 June 30)
- Illimitable Men: Womanly Duplicity & Its Constituent Parts (2016 September 14)
- Σ Frame: The Masculine Dilemma (2020 December 13)

The Economics of the New Amateur Sex Industry

Novaseeker · 11 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The Tale of The Beauty and The Whale.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
In this series, prostitution is defined as the sale of either (1) sexual services, (2) faux relationships (calculated by the hour, number of messages, etc.), or (3) personalized, self-produced, sexually titillating media content — for cash.
Length: 2,670 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

In this post, we'll briefly examine the microeconomic theory behind internet-based aggregate marketing, to explain how internet queens can rake in thousands of dollars a month.

Introduction

In The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry, I described the dynamic whereby the internet's ability to disintermediate — or to remove the "middle-man" in any given distribution channel for a specific good or service — has permitted women and their customers to create a new, amateur online sex industry that does not involve the traditional "middle men" of the "brick and mortar" sex industry — that is, pimps and madams, strip club owners, and pornographers.

In addition to its inherent ability to disintermediate, the internet, by its nature, has the power to aggregate things into large numbers that would normally, without the presence of the internet, be present in any one place in only small numbers.

"A Thousand Points of Light" … or, er, rather more like 104 million of them, but we'll get to that shortly …

The Internet Expands Aggregate Marketing

In the business world, the internet's power of aggregation has created new business models, with new pricing schemes, that are designed to take advantage of the new, extremely large, potential market size created by an internet that is literally present in the pockets of billions of people.

While traditional business models have focused on both growing the customer base and increasing revenue and profit generated per customer, the assumption behind traditional business models was that there were certain "realistic caps" on the market size, arising from the inherent limitations on the ability to reach people everywhere, due to geographic spread. Marketing tended to be more targeted, with a smaller market size being the focus, and therefore the business plans and economic models tended to focus on maximizing revenue and profits per customer, in light of the presumed limitations, at some point, on the ability to continue to grow the potential market reach.

The internet fundamentally changed this by providing businesses with the ability to access a market that was extremely larger, in potential size, than had ever before been the case, thanks to the number of people who were connected to the internet all the time after the rise of the smartphone in 2011 and thereafter. This had the effect of reducing marketing costs, and increasing market size, which somewhat changed the approach to economic modeling in certain industries. Specifically, in markets where the product or service could be provided virtually or electronically, the sheer size of the new internet market made it possible for business models to begin to be developed which were based around the size of the market, and leveraging that size itself, rather than focusing on maximizing the revenue and profit generated by each customer.

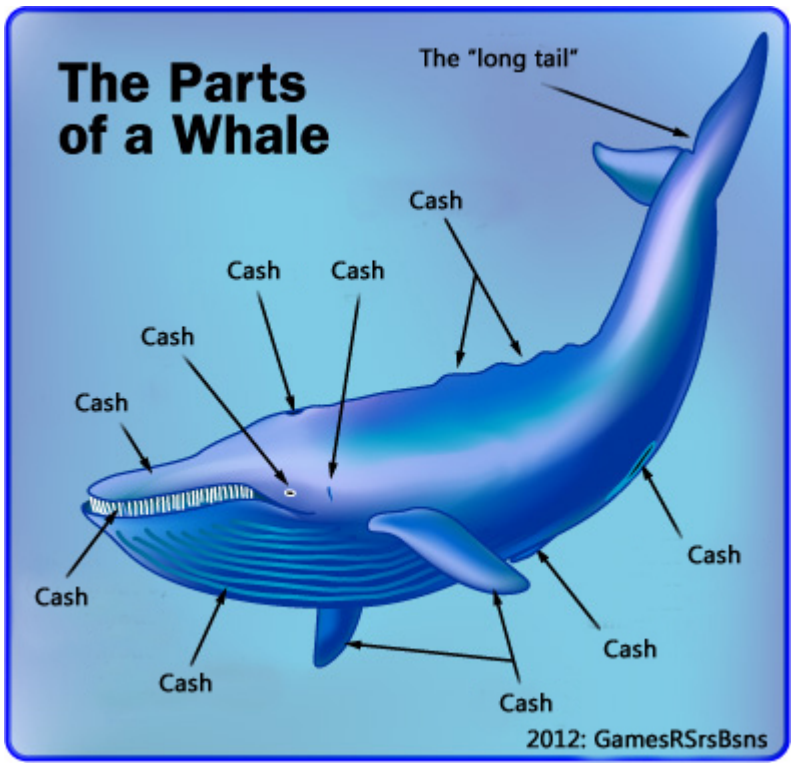
Case Study 1: The QTπ Conglomerate

Some of the more salient manifestations of this have related to the rise of the "LGBT" movement, that was largely facilitated by the growth of the internet, which took a group which is relatively small in any one place (outside of certain outlier concentrations like San Francisco and Manhattan), and aggregated it into a not small number, overall, by means of the internet drawing every LGBT person, wherever located, into one movement, with one face, and one voice. This amplifies political power considerably, as we have seen, in a way that would simply have been unthinkable for this group, and especially for certain parts of it (like the "T" wing), which have dramatically benefited from the power of aggregation.

How Aggregate Marketing Works — Freebies and Whales

In a business model that is based on aggregation, the general approach is to provide free or low-cost access to a product or service as a baseline, and then to provide selective upsells that are priced very much to the profit-fat upside. The core idea is to provide an attractive enough baseline "free" (or "low cost") product so as to have a large market penetration and a large group of people that can then be directly marketed for upsells, which are more aggressively priced and drive almost all of the profit generated by the business activity.

These models tend to generate 80%+ of their total profits from these upsells, which are often made to less than 5% of the total customer base. These customers are known as "whales", because they are the "big fish" in the customer base. They spend a LOT more than the average customer does, and therefore can provide most of the profit for a given business, even where 95% of the customers are paying nothing or a small access fee.



The salient anatomy of a newly-discovered species: the Internet Whale

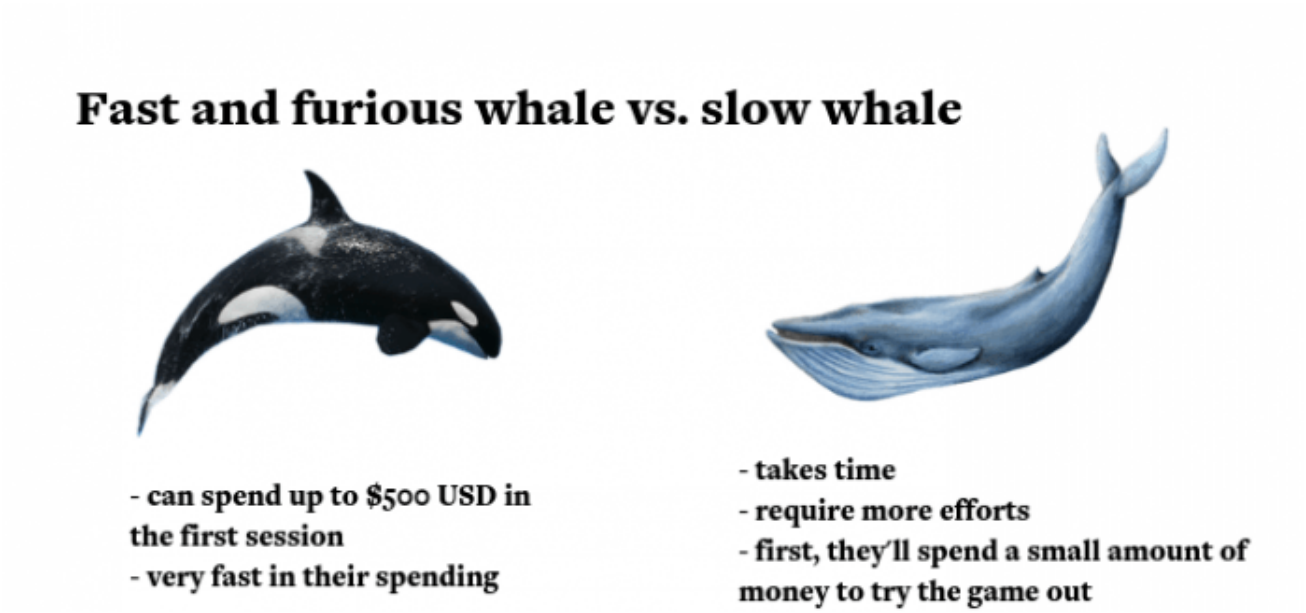
Case Study 2: A Hypothetical Example of Aggregate Marketing

Let's suppose a company provides access to a video game for free. And let's say it attracts 100,000 customers to play for free. At the same time, it creates a "pay shop" in the game that contains various items that either may speed up the advancement of the players in the game, or give the players a certain, limited and distinctive cosmetic appearance in the game, or additional "quality of life" options during gameplay, or what have you, and prices these in such a way that every player who uses the shop spends at least $10. And let's suppose that, on average, 10% of the total number of the game's players ever buy anything at all from the shop, and that the average spend of these players at the shop is $20.

This game would then be producing, in revenue, $200,000. From that $200,000, it would need to pay for its development cost, and the cost of producing new virtual products for sale, but let's assume that this provides comfortable profitability (or that the numbers are adjusted to do so). The critical point is that the game company is managing to do this while monetizing only 10% of its players, and with 90% of them not paying a dime to play the game.

If the game company had decided to charge an access fee of, say, $10 per month, let's assume that its customer base would have dropped by 90%, to 10000 customers. At that point it would be making $100k. That sounds like a drastic drop in customers, and therefore unrealistic, but in fact this is precisely the degree of difference between participation rates in things that cost a baseline fee and things that have free access. The free access spikes participation rates dramatically — humans really, really like free stuff!

What this does is permit the company to focus on growing the overall market size and penetration, knowing that even without monetizing a higher percentage of its customer base, it will still increase its revenues and profits substantially simply by growing the size of the overall customer base. So in our initial example, if the number of players rises from 100k to 200k, the total revenue of the game similarly doubles in lockstep from $200k to $400k, without making any assumption about increasing the monetization rate at all or doing anything other than increasing the total number of players.



The importance of the proper identification of a whale's sub-species
Based on this baseline concept — making most of your revenue and profits from a small percentage of your customers, your "whales" — a number of variant models can be utilized to optimize the overall ROI of the business. These can include charging a nominal fee, or even a larger fee (if the market demonstrates it can bear it), which mixes the kinds of revenue streams together, providing both a baseline "floor" of revenues per month, as well as more variable, and more profit-rich, sales to whales at the same time. A clever and perceptive, and adaptive, proprietor will be able to adjust the model to optimize what they are seeing as demand, in order to generate the most efficient rate of return and reach their profit and revenue goals more effectively, adjusting pricing as needed to address over or under-shooting the actual demand, and the price sensitivity of that demand, in real time.

Applying this to OnlyFans

One of the interesting things about OnlyFans is that the women who participate in it as "content creators" are generally unabashed by what they are doing and are remarkably open about it. Many of them are participating under their real names, and are connected to a broader social media presence on Instagram and YouTube under the same names. In addition, a number of them are quite open about what they are earning from the OnlyFans activities, and seem quite proud of their accomplishments in this regard. This relative openness sheds a remarkable degree of light on the economic practices of OnlyFans content creators.

Case Study 3: Makayla Samountry — a Representative Case

In his recent post Why is the Online Sex Industry Attractive to Women, Jack, in his discussion of the amount of money available to women who choose to participate in OnlyFans, described the situation of Makayla Samountry. Samountry, currently 25, is a college grad and a minor social media personality based in Minnesota, with a social media following that is comfortably above average for a non-celebrity (70k followers on YouTube, 15k on Instagram, and on down from there) but not spectacularly sky-high.

In January 2020, Samountry began an “experiment” by trying her hand at OnlyFans, and vlogged about it on her YouTube channel, in the video that Jack linked in his post. As Jack mentioned, in her first month on OnlyFans, Samountry did fairly well for a newcomer, earning around $1100 that first month.

Samountry continued with her “experiment”, as a review of her YouTube channel reveals. In June 2020, she disclosed on YouTube that she had earned, by then, around $30k, and her monthly take was up to around $4500 (an annualized level of $54k). By late October 2020, she relates that she had earned around $70k on OnlyFans year-to-date, which means that she had increased her take, after June, to around $10k per month (annualized $120k).

How does she earn this money? What is her business and pricing approach?

She actually describes this in some detail on her YouTube videos in response to questions received from her readers/viewers, and as assistance to aspiring would-be “content creators” on OnlyFans. Samountry charges a fairly high access fee of $26 per month (many OF sites are free or have a nominal access charge of $5 or $10), but she makes a large portion of her money from her “upsells”.

What are these? According to one of her YouTube videos, Samountry packages sets of racier images — which she insists are not pornography! — in sets of 3-6 images for prices that range from $50 to $150, with a few choice options retailing for $200. She helpfully explains that her pricing escalates based on how “explicit” she thinks the image is, how customized it is, and so on, with the higher price tags attaching to more titillating material, but all off it is apparently solo pictures — no “hardcore” images or videos whatsoever — which is probably why she claims it is “not porn”.

"When you were young, and your ~~heart~~ life was an open book …."

Readers can judge for themselves the relative beauty of Samountry. In fact, she jokes in one of her YouTube videos about how she gets notes from men criticizing her for not being attractive enough to be on OnlyFans — a criticism she dismisses with a laugh and a handwave. And, to be honest, since she has earned a substantial amount on OnlyFans, I have to agree with her dismissal of the criticism — whatever one may think of Samountry, she is making a good deal of money selling pictures of herself on OnlyFans, regardless of what some men think of her beauty level.

This again serves to emphasize a core truth: a woman does not have to be a consensus, world-class beauty or famous personage to make a good amount of money on OnlyFans. She only needs to be smart about what she is marketing, and aggressive in her pricing, and it appears that Samountry is both.

On the Internet, the Sky Really Is the Limit

It is one thing for a smart and enterprising young woman to hustle her way to $100k on the internet, but really — how high can this get for girls who are on OnlyFans? Isn't this just an example of an outlier-type level of return?

Well …. the internet is a really big place. Really big.

As Jack pointed out in the comments under his post last week, OnlyFans has surpassed 100 million users — currently the OnlyFans online tracker lists just under 104 million user accounts, and as of late 2020 there were just over 1.5 million content creator accounts. For comparison, Twitter has 330 million users. This means that OnlyFans, a site focused on monetized private pornography, has about 1/3 of the users that Twitter, one of the largest internet communication platforms, does.

By any measure, OnlyFans is a truly massively sized market. It is an outstanding place to execute a business strategy based on some form of aggregation — either by providing a free site, or by charging a nominal price (60% of OF sites charge between $5 and $15 per month), and taking in a lot of additional revenue by means of upsells, tips and the like. And some women who have already very large followings, like certain professional porn actresses, can command a lot of revenue based on subscription fees alone — onlysearcher.com reports that the single highest earner of subscription fees is a professional porn actress who has earned, to date, $460k on subscription fees alone, leaving aside tips, upsells and the like, which are not reported.

But it can get higher than that.

Do you know who I am?

Case Study 4: Belle Delphine, Whale Huntress Extraordinaire

Belle Delphine is a 21-year old British/South African young woman who came to prominence as a streamer of video games on the Twitch gaming livestream service, because she managed to sell her bathwater to her followers for a great profit. She recently disclosed to media that she is earning around £1 million per month on OnlyFans (which is around $1.36 million).

Delphine, who, despite her celebrity from Twitch, seems to appeal to a niche market, appears to earn her money through a hybrid model. She charges $35 as a subscription fee, which is very high (top 5% of all pricing for OF subscription fees), but she isn't on the top ten list of subscription fee generators — almost all of the women on that list charge a low subscription fee to generate a large number of subscribers and benefit from the aggregation effect I describe above. Rather, Delphine must earn her extraordinary OnlyFans income mostly by means of upsells and tips — to the tune of something close to £1 million per month! And this is from people who are already paying a $35 monthly access fee!

In other words, Delphine is a whale hunter — and an exceptionally good one at that.

Essentially, what Belle Delphine is doing is hunting the whales in the entire user base of OnlyFans, rather than trying to maximize the size of her own subscriber base — because she would certainly have a larger subscriber base if she charged a more typical access fee.

In effect, Delphine is instead leveraging the aggregate marketing potential of the entire user base of the OnlyFans site, and is hunting for the whales in that entire base, to assemble a subscriber base comprised almost entirely of whales! Regardless of what one thinks of Delphine and her brand of anime/fetish-schtick, she has one heck of an intelligent strategy, and one that has been nearly flawlessly executed.

If you were me, you'd be smiling, too!
And that, gentlemen, is truly the power of aggregation in the hands of a skilled operator!

Conclusion: Money, Money, Everywhere!

On the internet, the sky really is the limit, and OnlyFans, by virtue of the enormous size of its market, provides a large pool of money for a large number of women to draw on, to a greater or a lesser extent — dipping in for a few thousand dollars, or a hundred thousand, or even more, on an annualized basis, depending on how hard they are willing to work the site. Notably, Delphine herself admits to working the site very hard indeed on a daily basis, making as many as 30-40 interactions daily on her OF site. (What can you say? The girl knows how to take care of her whales!)

Finally, what's in this for OnlyFans itself? Why does OnlyFans provide this menacing, corrupting den of iniquity that is silently rippling through our culture currently?

Twenty percent!

OnlyFans takes 20% of all revenues from all content creators, bar none. Simply put, the owners of OnlyFans are getting very, very rich at the moment. In an industry where the actual profitability has been dwindling for years due to the ubiquitous availability of "free" porn, OnlyFans stands in marked contrast. And it's growing like wildfire.

My next post in this series will take a deep dive look at one specific case of how the new landscape of the online amateur sex industry can impact a marriage in a way that was simply not possible even 5 years ago.

Related

- Σ Frame: DTFCupid (2017 December 17)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Exploiting Online Attention (2020 December 9)

The Learning Psychology of Women who Participate in the Online Amateur Sex Industry

Jack · 13 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

All incentives, no apparent penalties. What is there not to like?

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
In this series, prostitution is defined as the sale of either (1) sexual services, (2) faux relationships (calculated by the hour, number of messages, etc.), or (3) personalized, self-produced, sexually titillating media content — for cash.
Length: 1,940 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

In past essays, NovaSeeker and I have mentioned several motivating reasons why women enter into the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS).

- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Exploiting Online Attention (2020 December 9)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4)
- Σ Frame: Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women? (2021 January 6)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Economics of the New Amateur Sex Industry (2020 January 11)

To recap what has been said before, plus a few more I have added to the list, OASIS is attractive to women for the following reasons.

- Easy, convenient, sanitized, sexualized attention and social affirmation.
- The world wide web has allowed a seemingly infinite supply of male attention in socio-sexual terms. The amount of attention can run into the thousands, and for some women, the millions.
- It feeds the strong, unique need of females to appear like they have a high SMV and to feel sexy about themselves.
- In successful scenarios, a woman can exercise her perceived "right" to social and financial independence, as well as sexual autonomy, which yields a gratuitous ego rush.
- The disintermediation has removed the seedier social elements of the sex industry, e.g. the strip club owner, pimp, or pornographer.
- The $$$!
- Women can access a source of immediate cash income on their own terms rather than on the dictated terms of the unsavory, demanding, and abusive pimps and madams.
- The associated risks to reputation and bodily harm are altogether removed.
- There is absolutely no risk of running afoul of the law.
- The online interaction is comfortable for women, allowing them the convenience and privacy of working from home and through the computer/smart phone.
- The nature of internet social media sanitizes the interaction with the client by making it virtual rather than in person.
- Women can choose who they want to partner with in producing their photo shoots and market promotion.
- For those wimmin who go "all the way", modern methods of birth control (i.e. the hormonal birth control pill, the "morning after" pill, abortion, IUDs, etc.) eliminate the risks of pregnancy and contracting STDs.

- The feministic influences over society have removed much of the shame and taboo of showcasing one's body and marketing sexual services for cash.
- Activities and transactions can be kept discreet and confidential.
- Meeting clients in person is entirely optional, and subject to personal discretion.
- The woman always has the option to quit or resume at any time.

The Frame of Behavioral Psychology

The 80/20 rule states that 80% of women are only attracted to (and banging) the top 20% of men. This rule, which is well known around the 'sphere, originated from a Pareto distribution. Data from OKTrends (from OKCupid) and other estimates confirmed this estimate. A more precise analysis from a couple years ago places the exact figure at 78/22.

But this was all from a few years ago. With the rise of OASIS, this is now changing!

If we view this phenomenon through the lens of behavioral psychology, we can understand the reason why wimmin are now quite happy to run towards the OASIS, even though it requires sexual transactions with low SMV males, which is quite loathsome for the average female.

Here, we'll break down the list in the previous section by looking at the aspects of Learning Psychology (Reinforcement, Escape, Consequences, and Penalties) that are involved with young wimminz decision to go skinny dipping in the OASIS.

Positive Reinforcement (AKA Reinforcement):

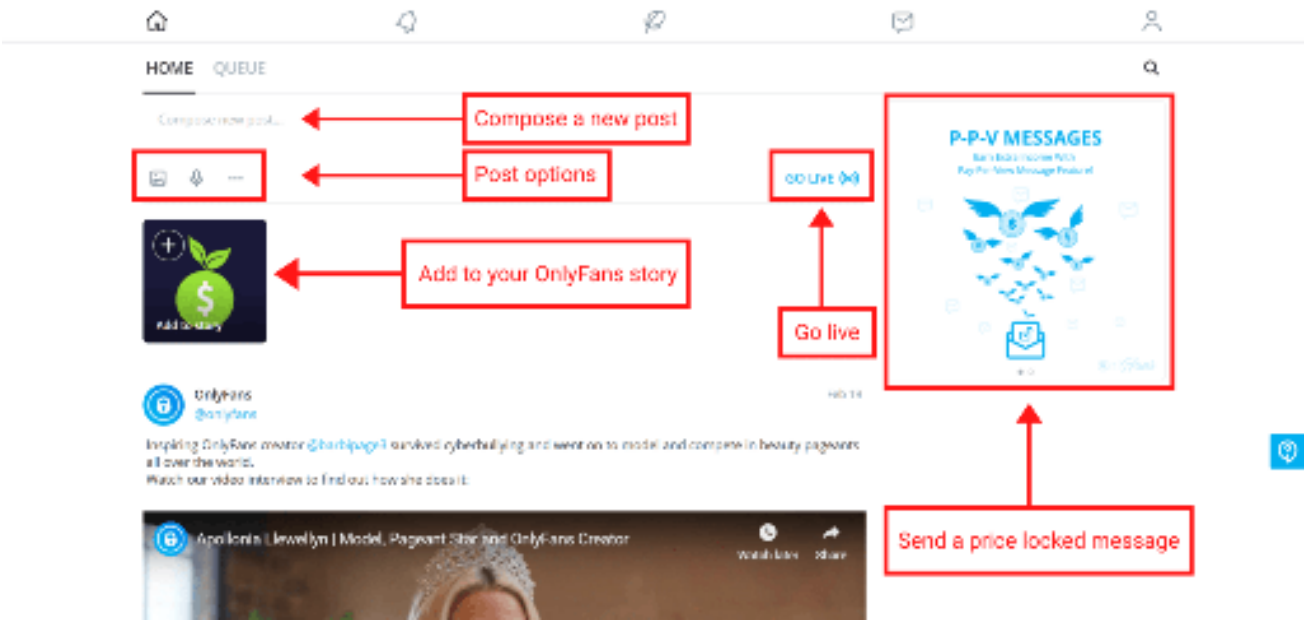
This occurs when a behavior (response) is followed by a stimulus that is appetitive or rewarding, increasing the frequency of that behavior. There are many strong Positive Reinforcements which would entice women to start a business on OnlyFans.

- Easy, convenient, sanitized, sexualized attention and social affirmation.
- The world wide web has allowed a seemingly infinite supply of male attention in socio-sexual terms. The amount of attention can run into the thousands, and for some women, the millions.
- It feeds the strong, unique need of females to appear like they have a high SMV and to feel sexy about themselves.
- In successful scenarios, a woman can exercise her perceived “right” to social and financial independence, as well as sexual autonomy, which yields a gratuitous ego rush.
- The $$$!
- The online interaction is comfortable for women, allowing them the convenience and privacy of working from home and through the computer/smart phone.
- Women can choose who they want to partner with in producing their photo shoots and market promotion.
- Meeting clients in person is entirely optional, and subject to personal discretion.
- The woman always has the option to quit or resume at any time.

Negative Reinforcement (AKA Escape):

This occurs when a behavior (response) is followed by the removal of an aversive stimulus, thereby increasing that behavior's frequency. There are many Negative Reinforcements (AKA Escape) which make online prostitution easier and more rewarding.

- The disintermediation has removed the seedier social elements of the sex industry, e.g. the strip club owner, pimp, or pornographer.
- Women can access a source of immediate cash income on their own terms rather than on the dictated terms of the unsavory, demanding, and abusive pimps and madams.
- The associated risks to reputation and bodily harm are altogether removed.
- There is absolutely no risk of running afoul of the law.
- The nature of internet social media sanitizes the interaction with the client by making it virtual rather than in person.
- For those wimmin who go "all the way", modern methods of birth control (i.e. the hormonal birth control pill, the "morning after" pill, abortion, IUDs, etc.) eliminate the risks of pregnancy and contracting STDs.
- The feministic influences over society have removed much of the shame and taboo of showcasing one's body and marketing sexual services for cash.
- Activities and transactions can be kept discreet and confidential.



Positive Punishment (AKA Punishment, or Consequence):

This occurs when a behavior (response) is followed by a stimulus, such as a shock or loud noise, which results in a decrease in that behavior.

In the past, there were several forms of punishment that existed for wimmin who chose to slurp from the OASIS. But now, no more.

- Women were once unable to support themselves financially and assume real independence. They were largely dependent on men for food, shelter, and income. The OASIS, along with other “equal opportunities”, supplants this material source.
- If a woman was found to be pregnant out of wedlock, there was a social stigma attached to the entire family. This once serious issue was transformed into a non-issue through the crowning “achievement” of 2nd Wave Feminism which brought the widespread public recognition and increased acceptance of the pro-choice rationale, legalized abortion (Roe vs. Wade, 1973), and the late-term, and partial-birth abortion practices.
- Sexually Transmitted Diseases (STDs) were once a strong incentive to discourage wimmin from drinking tainted waters. Since those days, many pharmaceuticals have been introduced for the prevention and treatment of STD’s, thus expanding women’s sexual proclivities.
- Laws and public opinion toward racial miscegenation kept women drinking from their own cisterns. This is now seen as entirely rayciss.

As you can see, all of these consequences have been summarily eradicated by the The Civil Rights Act of 1964, and 2nd Wave Feminism.

Negative Punishment (AKA Penalty, or "Punishment by Contingent Withdrawal"):

This occurs when a behavior (response) is followed by the removal of a stimulus, such as taking away a child's toy following an undesired behavior, resulting in a decrease in that behavior.

Like the consequences listed above, many penalties once existed for wimmin who behaved badly.

- A social norm that depicted women as wives, mothers and homemakers, and which ostracized wimmin that didn't fit the traditional mold.
- Female discrimination and favoritism in the work force had deleterious effects for wimmin who went a swimmin.
- Feminism has removed all fear of s1ut shaming and social repercussions.
- We might imagine that there would be a "Marriage Strike" against women who dabbled in the pool and thus became unfit for marriage. But Dalrock put this myth to rest. Instead of a Marriage Strike, men are dealing with this risk through cohabitation and postponing marriage.
- The opportunity of becoming a mother was once a huge motivator for women to prepare themselves for marriage, but now, most modern women see children as being more of a curse than a blessing. The abortion statistics prove it. In the USA, there are over 3,000 abortions every day. Nearly half of all pregnancies in the USA are unintended, and 22% of all pregnancies in the USA (excluding miscarriages) end in abortion.

Likewise, all of these penalties have gone the way of Cain.

The Flight of Cain by Fernand Cormon (1880)

Extinction:

This occurs when a behavior (response) that had previously been reinforced is no longer effective. For example, a rat is first given food many times for lever presses. Then, in "extinction", no food is given. Typically, the rat continues to press more and more slowly and eventually stops, at which time lever pressing is said to be "extinguished."

Women were once subject to conscience about their life choices. But now, conscience is regarded to be a pesky visceral embodiment of prudishness which prevents one from executing the Fear of Missing Out (FOMO). The reasons for this malady are many.

- The lack of role models who are chaste wives and homemakers.
- Widespread pornography, sex, and violence has been glorified in the media, and this oversaturation of stimulus has deadened the sensitivity to the perils of fornication and violence.
- The shame and guilt surrounding fornication has been displaced with the idea that sex and commitment are not concomitant, viz. "Free Love", as popularized by the Hippies of the Boomer Generation, "Friends" and "Sex and the City" among Xers, and the liberal "Independent Woman" of the current era.

Over time, and with popular acceptance, these cultural influences have allowed females to ignore their consciences and give in to the internal and external pressures to explore money making opportunities like OASIS, and exercise female sexual hypergamy in general.

Conclusions

To answer the question of why women dive into the OASIS, they do it because…

- There are many strong Positive Reinforcements which draw them in and reward them handsomely.
- There are many Negative Reinforcements (AKA Escape) which make it easier and more rewarding.
- There is no immediate Positive Punishment (AKA Consequence) for getting involved.
- There is no Negative Punishment (AKA Penalty, or "Punishment by Contingent Withdrawal") that would deter them.
- For decades, there has been a society wide Extinction of the ideal archetype of femininity — The affectionate, submissive wife, the kind-hearted, loving mother, and the frugal diligent homemaker from public consciousness.

All of these spell out a strong motivation for wimmin to slore online, and a lack of correction that would inhibit them from becoming p0rn queens, nor teach them better behaviors.

> "Collectively, our biggest fear isn't that our daughters will become whores, but that they won't become whores. We just tell ourselves whoring is good so long as no money changes hands."
>
> Dalrock: Insta-Whores: Is money the real problem? (2019 April 30)

References

1. Infogalactic: Operant Conditioning

Related

- Σ Frame: Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women? (2021 January 6)

Now she's directing her own pro motion!

Jack · 15 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

It's not about the money (anymore). It's just for the sheer fun of it all!

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post is a short case study of Belle Delphine as pertaining to The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

During my research on the topic of OnlyFans, I came across this article about Belle Delphine.

Cinema Blend (Jessica Rawden): OnlyFans' Belle Delphine Tells YouTube's Logan Paul Why She Decided To Get Into Porn (2021 January 4)

Recently, she decided to step into porn, presumably to beef up her OnlyFans account with racier content.

The subtext in the video reads,

> Belle Delphine had a big holiday this year. The popular OnlyFans star and cosplayer ended up getting more into viral content on the platform when she dropped her first boy-girl porn film she'd been teasing for more about a month before its leak.
>
> She talked about enjoying filming the porn "more than [she] thought [she] would" and also explained exactly why she is expanding the content on her Only Fans account, noting,
>
> Well, as you know I have been doing my OnlyFans for quite a while. It's all fun; it's all interesting, all good, but it kind of — I'm getting a bit bored. I like doing everything. I like dipping my toe in every single thing. I've always kind of been sexually explorative. I've done quite a few things in my personal life; [laughing] I feel like I kind of want to try everything.
>
> Doing this kind of work as it is is quite stressful on a relationship. Because this is such a personal job. And being naked so much in front of your partner kind of takes a lot of the sexual element out of it. Because it can't be sexual every single time.

The article states,

> "The move into porn also gave Belle Delphine a chance to direct on a larger scale and to be creative, something that Bella Thorne also commented on when she got into the porn business.

A porn director's role? Seems that she likes to be in control.

> Delphine, on the other hand, actually starred in her own video along with setting up the scenes, budgeting and more. These days, she's even becoming an expert at lighting.
>
> Speaking to Logan Paul and his pal Mike Majlak on the Impaulsive podcast, Belle Delphine got candid about the work she is doing online.

Belle Delphine Stars In Her First Adult Movie – IMPAULSIVE EP. 242 – YouTube

> Belle Delphine spoke on a lot of subjects during the podcast. For example, she went on to explain that in her personal life she's tried things like Swingers clubs and more and that she's actually creating the porn content > with her boyfriend for the OnlyFans account. But the job has come with stressors on her relationships, which she also opened up about.

>
> She called the explicit content she is making "sh!t for family," as in, not sh!t for the family, but stuff one's family would not really want to be connected with, noting that the content she puts up on OnlyFans has somewhat strained some of her relationships, including her relationship with her mother. But she also feels the boy-girl video she created is "no different" than what she's really currently doing on OnlyFans; to which Logan Paul later called her a "pacemaker," noting that she and others on OnlyFans are shifting the power and money in porn straight into their pockets and not into the pockets of companies.
>
> But Belle Delphine is making a lot of money. She also revealed to Logan Paul that she is making about $1 million a month, which is a huge number for anyone on OnlyFans. Prior, we'd really only gotten hints about what some celebrities were pulling in with initial stats from Tyga and even Bella Thorne's first weeks on the platform. However, both of those are celebrities who kicked off with high numbers on the platform and have remained popular since.
>
> As for the explicit content she's been producing as a whole, that's part of her OnlyFans account, which is currently available for $35 bucks a month — or 5% off if you opt for three months.

After she already got rich from selling her bathwater, and is now making $1 million a month off of OnlyFans, she's not about to hang up her pink headphones and retire.

Notice that she's not at all concerned about how this might affect her reputation or her future employability. Most of her concern is how it affects her relationships with various people.

Related

- Cinema Blend (Jessica Rawden): Bella Thorne Dropped Her New Video On OnlyFans Because Her 'Body Is Too Much For Insta' (2020 December 17)

The Slow Train Wreck — a Cautionary Tale

Novaseeker · 18 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

What you don't know won't hurt you … until it does!

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
Length: 4,700 words
Reading Time: 16 minutes

This is a continuation of the series of posts by Jack and me which address the rise of the amateur online sex industry, and the takeaways, learnings and reflections that arise from this troubling new development as well as the broader implications for men. Previous posts in the series have introduced the topic generally, and have addressed some of the specific details of the emerging phenomenon and broader social implications. Further posts following this one will address some takeaways from the specific situation detailed in this post, and the spiritual aspect of these developments, particularly from the point of view of this type of activity providing apart of an ersatz spirituality to replace traditional forms of religious expression.

Background

You may remember the spate of news back in September occasioned by this article in the New York Post, which was subsequently picked up by many media outlets all over the world, and led to a few online interviews and TV appearances and so on, as well as quite a bit of chatter all over the internet, including in certain blogs in this general part of it. I had not been aware that Rollo Tomassi of "The Rational Male" had actually interviewed the ex-husband in question a few months ago live on YouTube, and I recently reviewed this video, because the sheer craziness of the situation on its face is inherently interesting to attempt to understand.

After watching that interview (which I would recommend that you all watch), I was sufficiently concerned and, frankly, disturbed that I proceeded to review the woman in question's Instagram posts, where much of the drama was played out (as you will see below), over the course of the marriage to try to piece together how things happened, in light of what the ex-husband relates in the interview, and the version of events summarized in September's press articles.

That review revealed a truly disturbing train wreck in slow motion that, honestly, is quite chilling in that, while specific mistakes were made by the now ex-husband at various points in the process, could easily happen to any man. It provides therefore a useful, if deeply and profoundly saddening, cautionary tale for men in these challenging times.

Because of that, I am going to relate what I learned, as concisely as possible (it will be a bit long, the chronology covers a number of years) in an effort to convey the gravity of the tale. I will not be using the couple's actual names, but referring to them as H and W (regardless of their marital status at any point in the tale) – their identities are easily available on the internet, but there is no reason to repeat them here, or to otherwise personalize this to an even greater degree than it already has been. For us, standing as we do at some remove from the events in question, both in time and in space, the main interest should be the cautionary aspects of the tale, and its warning(s) for all of us, and not the prurient or personal elements of it. I will be using (general and, in some cases, approximate) dates, based on the postings that appear in Instagram and the dates referenced in the press articles and Rollo's interview of H, because the dates are relevant for the tenor of the tale, in terms of the timing of how things happened and the overall pacing of events.

A uniquely toxic brew

Preliminary Objections

Before I get into the chronology of events, I want to deal preliminarily with a couple of anticipated objections right off the bat.

The first is the "what business of this is yours" objection. The answer to that is that W made it our business when she made her life story public by actively publicizing it in the NY Post and several other media outlets, and by maintaining her entire history in the open and in public on Instagram. There is no "snooping" of any kind taking place here, the information is all very public and this appears to be very much by W's design based on what she chooses to very publicly share.

The second is "what business of this is yours" in a different way – that is, why is this relevant? Isn't this just gawking and gossiping? No, it isn't gawking and gossiping. The information is public. It's relevant because the story it tells is a cautionary one that could happen to anyone, and in particular to any man, in this culture if he doesn't recognize certain patterns, is unaware of the emergence of an entirely new set of risk parameters, or downplays the importance of certain lines being crossed. Although the story seems extreme when looked at from the "endgame" perspective, the more one examines it, the more clear the critical transition points become, and the easier it is to see how these are warning signs of problems, even if the outcome in a "blowup" scenario may, in many cases, be different in the details from what happened with H and W.

I won't be posting pictures of H or W here, or direct links to W's sites (the NY Post article link is above, as is Rollo's interview with H), because Google is actually, you know, a thing in 2021, and I don't think W deserves any more free traffic to her very well trafficked sites – at least not from here.

And finally, guys. Please do yourselves, H and everyone else a favor and do not go off to W's Instagram and peruse it. I'm not being facetious, but serious. It's not good. It's corrupting. I spent most of my time there on the old posts trying to get a sense of how things used to be for H and W and then watching things unravel as I scrolled up and through the years towards the present day, but there is a lot of corrupting pornesque trash I needed to scroll through in the recent posts to get there, and even doing that is corrupting. Just don't go there. I go into enough detail here for you to understand what you need about that place – it's best avoided in order to avoid the near occasion of sin and the related temptation.

Setting the Stage

According to H, H and W were both Christians in their 20s teaching abroad after college in Korea when they met. H had graduated from a large secular university, but was raised "mainstream" Christian, while W, who is biracial (Asian/white) had attended a small Christian college, and her parents were mainstream baptists (not fundamentalists), with an Asian influence from one parent as well. Neither were N=0 at the time they met, and from what H says to Rollo and what W has said elsewhere, their Ns seem to have been fairly average for the period in which they were of that age range — neither higher nor lower than average. They met in a group context and eventually paired off, and then were engaged in a number of months and married later that year, in 2009. W was 25 and H was 28 at the time, so somewhat "ahead of schedule" according to the "average age at first marriage", but still a few years post -college for W.

H and W proceeded to live a conventional married life for a number of years. They had three kids, in 2010, 2013 and 2016, lived a suburban lifestyle, attended a Christian megachurch in Minnesota and, by all appearances, were an average young Midwestern Christian family. They struggled at times financially, as young couples sometimes do, but nevertheless lived a seemingly satisfying and decent life for a number of years.

The Curtain Opens

W's Instagram begins in the summer of 2014 (W=30), six and a half years ago, and five years into the marriage, or "M+5". When the curtain opens, what we see is simply a typical personal Instagram feed of someone who is a suburban wife and mother in her early 30s, with two small kids. The photos are mostly of her small kids, with a few interspersed here and there of H and W, of food and rooms in the home, events and trips with friends and family. All bog standard normal American family life for a young family with small children. Quite endearing actually – while H and W were not a "beautiful people" Hollywood-style couple, they were an attractive young couple, if frazzled as is the case for young parents, and the whole impression is of a typical, yet loving, hectic family life.

This general trend continues for several years, with only a few small, barely noticeable changes taking place here and there. This starts, albeit very slowly at first, in 2015 (M+6, W=31). 2015 starts with an endearing New Year's evening post of a young couple that looks settled, happy, and very much in love. A change of W's hairstyle from long and traditional to a shorter, more contemporary/sexy bob style cut, is notable in the middle of the year, but otherwise the IG continues to be fairly typical for a suburban wife and mother of 2 young kids – that is, the pictures are mostly of kids and home, with a few of H and W smattered in.

In 2016 (M+7, W=32) some more significant changes begin to filter into the Instagram feed, where we see W getting her first tattoo, and another post that is a preview of coming attractions of sorts, where W talks about touring a mansion in California and openly envying the luxurious lifestyle of people with money who live in Southern California. But otherwise it's still mostly posts featuring kids, family events and home. Notably, in the fall of 2016, W begins to give occasional lectures at the megachurch she and H were attending at the time – H explains in his interview that W was never a pastor at the church, and never had an official position, but she did preach and provide pastoral assistance to women in the church for a time from late 2016 to the events of 2017, which we will turn to next. The Instagram posts around this time reflect W's excitement at the opportunity to command an audience, something that H discusses at some length in his Rollo interview. But still, during this period there still seems to be a lot of genuine closeness and love between H and W, sincerely expressed in several posts.

The Year Things Really Started to Change

In 2017 (M+8, W=33) things begin to change much more noticeably. Several things start changing more or less about the same time, and it begins to show up in W's IG posts.

One is that W is speaking and preaching before audiences more at her church. W's posts about this in the summer of 2017 are interesting in that they reveal her clear excitement at playing the role of an inspirational speaker before an audience and, more generally, holding an audience's attention. She clearly is very energized by it, and loves the energy. 2017 also sees W begin a graduate course in some kind of self-help/motivational/preaching area at a seminary.

Another significant change at this point is that the proportion of IG posts that feature pictures of W alone steadily increases during 2017. The IG stream no longer is as focused on kids and home life, and has a lot more photos of W alone, taking selfies and, as the year progresses, doing professional photo shoots. In late 2017, W posts the first professionally shot photos on her Instagram. These are all normal posed pictures, fully clothed, not sexual in nature and so on, but nevertheless it is the first rubicon that is crossed – namely going to the trouble to hire a professional photographer and a professional makeup artist (both of whom are mentioned in the post itself), and sharing this on Instagram.

During the course of the year, more selfies of W alone appear as well, and again while these are not sexual in nature or revealing, they are notable in that these kinds of selfies simply did not appear, at all, in W's Instagram feed prior to 2017 – in that sense they are a change, for H and especially for W.

From my perspective, it appears likely that during this period, W was beginning to enjoy attention and compliments on her appearance on Instagram, and that this likely drives the posting of more selfies and mirror pictures of W in her feed. It's also clear that W is getting more noticeably "Instagram attractive" (i.e., for selfie photos) during this time. She is changing, slightly but notably, in her physical appearance through gym work, she is wearing more alluring, "popping" makeup (particularly following her professional shoot), and overall she is looking noticeably more visually attractive in her normal selfie pictures in 2017 than she did on her Instagram feed previously. Something seems to have changed inside W during this period, and it is expressing itself in her appearance, as reflected on her Instagram in the pictures she is choosing to make and to share, and being reflected back at W in the reactions to these from her followers and viewers. Both of these — the making/sharing and the reactions – are working to change W over the course of this period, it seems to me.

One small step for a woman, one giant step for a marriage
(note: this is not W; as noted at the outset there are no pictures of W in this series of posts)
Also during 2017, we see the text in W's Instagram posts significantly change. Where previously it had been the normal kind of thing one sees in personal family Instagram feeds, the text now starts to feature, in some posts, motivational self-help claptrap about pursuing one's dreams at all cost, rising and thriving, having it all without sacrifice and so on.

There is a new ideology that is clearly coming into play here. We know from W's own admission and from what H confirms to Rollo, that it's in 2017 that W says she discovered that she was LGBT (bisexual) after attending a play which contained portrayals of LGBT relationships (presumably one between women). We also know that during the 2016-17 period, W was being influenced by writers such as Glennon Doyle (the suburban Christian mom and published writer who very publicly left her husband to marry USAW soccer star Abby Wambach), who actually shows up in W's feed a few times during this time. W appears to have seen her realization of her own sexual orientation as a turning point of her life, and H seems to agree that it was, in that after her self discovery, she began to adopt a new way of relating to the world, a new worldview. I will discuss what I think this is in my subsequent post next week regarding my own ideas about what we can "take away" from the tale of H and W.

Changes Accelerate and Spread

As we move into 2018 (M+9, W=34), the pace of change in W becomes dramatically faster, and it is clearly reflected in her Instagram.

By the middle of 2018, W is posting text in her feed about how she is becoming who she was always meant to be, and not doing what everyone else expected her to do, and so on. The proportion of posts that are selfies and/or posed shots of W steadily increases over the course of 2018 until, by year's end, 80%+ of the posts are selfies or posed shots of W, and this in an Instagram feed that was, only a year or so earlier, comprised 70% of photos the couple's children and only 10-20% of pictures of W and H. The "preaching and public speaking" posts from 2017 disappear entirely — as we know from H's interview with Rollo, at this time, H and W stopped attending church in the wake of W's discovery of her bisexuality, something H now appears to rue, although in hindsight, as far as I can weigh things from reviewing the Instagram feed, a different decision on that issue almost certainly would not have made a significant difference in the eventual outcome by this stage of the proceedings.

At the same time, the images in the Instagram feed are getting more openly alluring and sexier. In part it's because W's clothing is changing – in the direction of sexier, tighter clothes, bare midriffs, short shorts, very high heels, and much more sexual makeup, with heavy eye makeup in particular – none of which was common prior to 2017, or further back in time even present at all, on her Instagram. The texts in her posts during this period are typically about "letting go of the past, living in the present, following your dreams", and she describes herself as a "series of miracles unfolding", with such texts typically attached to alluring photos. All of these things are gradual escalations of things that were already happening in 2017, which is why taken individually they were likely unremarkable given what 2017 had brought. But taken together they reveal a rather swift transformation taking place inside W during the second half of 2017 and into, and through, 2018.

If it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, and quacks like a duck …
it's probably a duck

2019: Rushing Towards the Cliff's Edge

But if 2018 was the year of swift underlying transitions, 2019 (M+10, W=35) was the year of clearly crossing unmistakable lines again and again.

The first such crossing happens in early 2019 when W, apparently preparing for a beach vacation with H, posts a picture of herself trying on a bikini top in a dressing room mirror, otherwise wearing skin-tight jeans, high heel boots, and a lot of makeup. It's the first picture in her feed where this much skin is showing in an alluring way, and the adjoining text is quite telling: "when you find a swimsuit top that makes you feel adorable and badass at the same time". It's quickly followed in the Instagram feed by several pictures in said bathing suit on said trip – the first so revealing pictures ever on W's Instagram feed. This happens during the winter months of 2019. These are not posed sexual pictures, to be sure, but beach photos on the vacation; nevertheless, the second main rubicon has now been crossed – that of sharing truly revealing photos on Instagram, where most of W's body is made available for permanent viewing by anyone on the internet.

Developments accelerate to near breakneck speed after this rather significant line is crossed. H relates in his interview with Rollo that as the following months of 2019 were unfolding in real time, he felt like he was experiencing PTSD, like the walls were pressing in on him. W is moving to places she clearly wants to go, and she seems to have a clear plan, direction, focus, and goals, and H seems to be only peripherally in them, to the extent he doesn't get in the way. There isn't direct animosity of any kind directed toward H personally, or the marriage, in her feed as far as I can see — it's more the case that W has some very specific ideas about what she wants to do, and intends to do these, regardless of anything else in her life. W's internal train seems to have already left the station for a new destination, so to speak, and it doesn't take very long for the next line to be crossed.

Off we go, into the wild blue yonder …

That happens when, in the summer of 2019, just a few months after the beach trip, W posts professional shots of herself in lingerie, and pro makeup, while displaying herself on a bed. The lingerie appears vaguely bridal, and her wedding band is featured prominently. This is followed a few days later with the following text adjacent to another shot in the same outfit:

> "I didn't know what I wanted for the longest time. … [But I learned that actually] I wanted to be rich! I wanted to serve the masses! I wanted to make a difference in the world! I wanted to feel sexy AF in my body! I wanted to be the kind of leader the world hadn't seen yet!".

A few days later, we find a sexy b/w professional shot of W in very provocative clothes, with the following text attached:

> "Girls are taught from a young age to fear/hate/mistrust their bodies, whether it's from society, religion, family. And I think I know why. The patriarchy knows how powerful a woman is in all her glory. When she sees her body as her powerful vessel, her emotions as sacred, her intuition as divine, she becomes unstoppable. And when a woman becomes unstoppable, there's nothing she can't be, do, or have. And that goes against the very nature and message of patriarchy (#sorrynotsorry)."

And again a few days later, next to another professional white lingerie shot:

> "I decide to have it right now. And I make it happen. This is what it means to operate at the level of cause in life. I decide how my life goes. I decide what I want. I decide what I am worthy of. I decide what I am capable of. And I go out and make that happen."

During this time, H tells us in his Rollo interview, life was basically living hell for H. Things which started in what he thought was a harmless way had now escalated to the point where his wife's Instagram feed, which had for years featured mostly pics of small kids and family events and get togethers, had "progressed" to the point where his wife was posting, on an almost daily basis, exclusively material consisting of clothed-yet-nevertheless-borderline-pornographic pictures of herself, alongside bromides about female sexual expression as empowerment, patriarchy, finding what she really wants, chasing her dreams and the like. The pressure becomes too much at some point, and he confronts W.

The marriage predictably imploded in the following period. H describes it as being a case of him having blown things up, because they could not agree on a basis to continue. From my vantage point, it seems to me that W had a clear vision of what she wanted to do: she wanted to make a lot of money (there are numerous Instagram posts where she talks about how much she loves money, how much she wants to be rich and live a rich lifestyle and so on), and she wanted to monetize her sex appeal to do it, as well as running a life coaching gig on the side featuring the kind of snake oil empowerment nonsense that had been running alongside her posts in Instagram for the past several months of 2019. Although H also doesn't discuss this in his interview, my own impression of W's Instagram is that she may have been open to staying married but it would only be on her terms, and it would in no way, shape or form be permitted to interfere, impede, limit or restrict anything she wanted to do, either personally, or to make money, based on what she determined herself that she wished to do, in order to satisfy her desires and follow her dreams.

Obviously that is no basis for a marriage, so the couple decided to separate and then, later on in 2020, divorce. H does say in his Rollo interview that subsequently W has told H that she doesn't think that the marriage could have lasted in any case, because they simply wanted different things, and things that were not compatible. I think it's more the case that W wants things that are not compatible with any kind of marriage, at least not to 90%+ of people who are interested in marrying at all (there are always outliers who have strange arrangements). W moved out of the house and relocated from the Southwest, where the family was then living, to Southern California.

Epilogue

After this, the changes in W's life, at least as reflected in her Instagram, have seemingly continued to accelerate. In October 2019, W started an OnlyFans page. In late 2019, a month or two after the separation, the latest (I do not assume the final) rubicon is crossed: a particularly poignant, and for her husband painful, I am sure, post from November of 2019 features W's first nude Instagram post (her forbidden-on-Instagram parts are covered by the pose and her arms, but she's in the buff), alongside a picture of her from 2009, alone in a wedding dress. The accompanying text remarks how this is her first professional shoot (i.e., where she was paid to shoot it, as a model), which is taking place roughly ten years after her first in life professional photo shoot (presumably for her own wedding pictures), and waxes poetic about how grateful she is for having developed and grown and evolved since that time, and how she feels "way more confident, free, and embodied" and about how

“the true [W] finally emerged from all the layers that were placed on her all those years.”

W’s Instagram after this point becomes racier and eventually raunchier seemingly by the day. As I note in the cautionary words at the outset of this post, I am not a social media person, and I do not peruse Instagram and Twitter on a regular basis – I dip into them when someone links me to this or that, but I do not review them regularly and so while I am generally familiar with what they feature, I do not have detailed knowledge of how far they have generally gone, and so I was rather shocked by some of the content I was scrolling past in the recent posts from 2020 (M=over, W=36) on the Instagram feed. Suffice to say, as far as I can tell, the images on her Instagram appear to be the same as that of any woman who works in the porn/sex industry. Unless one scrolls down, a lot, like I did to learn what happened historically in her former marriage, one would never know that this woman used to be a bog standard normal Christian, suburban wife and mother, and only a few years ago this same feed was filled with typical cellphone pics of kids and cakes and family outings and the like.

And then it dawned on me, as I was reflecting on the takeaways for the rest of us regarding this shocking and disturbing story.

What if the line between one and the other – that is, between normal Christian suburban wives and mothers, on the one hand, and women who slide into the world of electronically disintermediated amateur sex work, on the other – is really much thinner, and much more porous, than we dare to think?

As I note at the outset, in the interests of space, and of readers’ time, the takeaways from this unfortunate tale will be taken up in a subsequent post in this series to be published in the coming days. Pending that post, let me say before closing that I think that this terribly sad story is humbling in many ways, precisely because of the sheer normality and averageness of the main players. It really is something that could happen to anyone in today’s cultural climate and atmosphere, with the changes technology is making available to everyone, and the very new challenges this poses due to the new opportunities that are being made available for various kinds of mischief.

At this stage, and again before getting into the takeaways post, I think it’s appropriate to offer prayers for H, W and their young children in the wake of the events described above that God may grant his gifts of repentance, humility and strength to everyone all around.

The Addictive Nature of the Online Amateur Sex Industry

Jack · 20 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The Online Amateur Sex Industry is the new designer drug – a quicker, easier fix to check out from society – and it actually pays $$$ (if you're a contributor)!

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
In this series, prostitution is defined as the sale of either (1) sexual services, (2) faux relationships (calculated by the hour, number of messages, etc.), or (3) personalized, self-produced, sexually titillating media content — for cash.
Length: 2,200 words
Reading Time: 7.5 minutes

Introduction

Women have fundamental needs that can morph into cravings for things like male attention, securing a steady income, having material resources, getting social acceptance and affirmation, and… <ahem> …and sex (preferably with a high SMV man). These are all real needs that women have, especially younger women.*

Presently, there exists a few varieties of life trajectories that are designed to coopt the human propensity towards habit and knock out these needs.

1. The marriage and children route.
2. The college and career route (AKA Phase 1 of the Feminist Life Script).
3. The Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS) / pop sensation route (e.g. Instagram, Tumblr, OnlyFans, etc.).

Of note, a large percentage of women try to wing it with some combination of the above.

God's plan for marriage is designed to satisfy all these needs in a proper, fitting, efficient, and enduring manner. But even though God's way is the best way to do so, young women will not choose to follow this path unless it is impressed upon them. Given free reign, when young women latch on to the notion that marriage is not something to be prioritized while they are young, then they can be easily convinced to try either option (2) or (3), especially when there are strong incentives to do so.

Now, just imagine if you will, that there now existed some new technology that could allow a woman to simply flip a switch, punch some buttons, and talk to herself, and have all these needs met – just like that! She could even enjoy watching TV or drinking a latte while she's at it!

This technology is now upon us! If you have been following along for the last couple weeks, you will know this to be option (3).

As Deti put it,

> "This is women doing what they need to do to get commitment or facsimiles/imitations thereof. They have sex with Chad, immediately and for free (because if she won't do it, another woman will and she'll miss her longshot chance to lock him down), and then make everyone else wait for it and pay for it. But instead of "paying" with time, dinners, and commitment, they are making men pay cold hard cash for pictures, videos, and an hour or two of masturbating into a starfishing college student's vagina. They've got to get that cash somehow. Chad ain't coughing it up, there's no Dad; and the bottom 80% beta bux guys are still getting cooked and fixed up. Paul and Ernie are years away from being ready, nor even considered."

This present state of human affairs is an advanced symptom of the sexual revolution. When love and trust evaporate, then human interaction boils down to a series of transactions in order to fulfill needs. The needs will not budge, and if people will not trust God to fulfill those needs, then they are reduced to bartering and various power plays in order to satisfy those needs.

 For older women who have achieved all of the aforementioned needs, there arises the precocious need for gossip, wine, and cats, especially among lonely spinsters.*

How Women get Hooked on the OASIS

It's quite easy for a woman to break into the amateur sex industry by showcasing her skin on Instagram or starting up an OnlyFans account.

A previous post, Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women? (2021 January 6), iterated a few of things that a woman can become addicted to in this activity, including the following.

- The attention.
- The simple, easy, relaxed lifestyle.
- The steady income, and for some women, this income is significant – enough to retire on.

After a woman gets a taste of having all her carnal needs fulfilled through this life of ease, combined with the ego-affirming attention and the supplementary income that it generates, you can imagine how quickly she would learn to adapt to this new lifestyle, even to the point of developing behavioral addictions to this end.

NovaSeeker's last post, The Slow Train Wreck — a Cautionary Tale (2021 January 18) presented a poignant case study of this phenomenon.

Fellow blogger, R. P. McMurphy at Red Pill Dad, also illustrated this dynamic in his post, Sex positivity and why single dads are different from single moms (2020 December 27). He wrote,

> "As I note in the original piece, once a chick goes down that road for say, more than a few months – [she] begins to live and rely on the money she earns as a hooker or cam girl or selling nudes – she'll undergo a > change in her basic psychology where she HAS to get money for sex. Like, even when she wants to f*ck a guy just because she's attracted to him, she'll still end up looking for an angle to get money out of him, whether it's getting him to buy her stuff, or use his car, give her drugs and alcohol, etc."

>
> "And that's how strippers, sex workers, and hookers work once they've gone down the path of using their sex to make money – they have a very hard time viewing sex as something that can or should be done without a connection to wealth or provisioning.
>
> This is also why there's not much of a difference between a prostitute who actually has sex with guys and a chick on OnlyFans who just masturbates in front of a camera or sells nudes – or a sugar baby for that matter. Because at the end of the day, she's still using her p*ssy for money, and thus the connection between sex and money is created and embedded in her psyche and relationship to sexuality.
>
> That's the moral hazard that exists with prostitution, and why I feel bad for all the young chicks who are now trying their luck on OnlyFans to make a cheap buck, trading away the opportunity for love and children and some sort of career down the line, to sell sex for money; a short-lived career of objectification and depravity.

Image from Pepperdine Behavioral Addiction Recovery: A Guide for Families, Friends, Colleagues, and Roommates (2019 March 6)

The Nature of Behavioral Addictions

A lot has been said about how low quality or otherwise very frustrated men become addicted to pornography, how it lowers their self-esteem, and fosters in them an unhealthy view of sex and women in general. But we never hear about female problems with behavioral addictions.

Behavioral addiction is defined as a compulsion to engage in a non-substance-related behavior that is both rewarding and reinforcing. The behavior is continued despite any negative consequences to the person's physical, mental, social, spiritual, or financial well-being. Common behavioral addictions include the following. [1]

1. Attention seeking behavior
2. Codependent relationships

3. Exercise addiction
4. Food addiction
5. Gambling addiction
6. Internet addiction
7. Love addiction
8. Porn addiction
9. Sex addiction
10. Shopping addiction
11. Tattoo addiction
12. Video game addiction
13. Work addiction

Looking over the list above, we find that OASIS could involve at least 4, and as many as 9 of these common behavioral addictions! That's a very toxic brew!

Even so, there must be something that would motivate a woman to develop a behavioral addiction (or any addiction for that matter).

Deti pointed out,

> "Conventional social media and the attention these women will get at church and elsewhere, are the "gateway drugs" so to speak."

Ame added to the list of the 'gateway drugs' to OASIS.

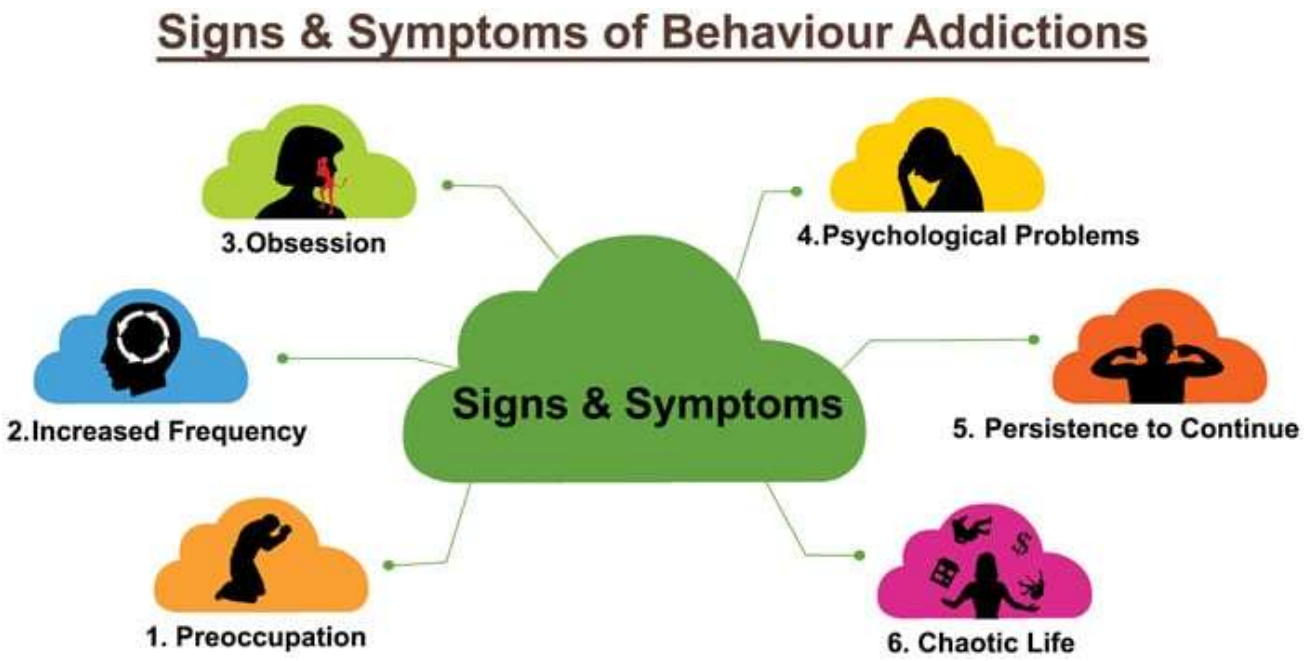
- Motive
- Means
- Opportunity

- A rigid upbringing with legalistic rules with no grace or reason, rigid college, liberal seminary, liberal church that worships attractive, articulate women. (Do you think a fat, ugly woman with the same gift of speaking would have the same opportunity?!)
- The desire to know and be everything to everyone (that I desire to be known and important to).
- A world with no boundaries that worships engaging women.
- The ability to set her children aside to tone her body and to distribute her body for praise and money behind the veil of a computer.

Treatment for these behavioral addictions might include [1],

- Cognitive behavioral therapy
- Group therapy
- Medications
- One-on-one or couples counseling
- Self-help groups

But given the self-reinforcing nature of OASIS, it is doubtful that any women would ever repent, especially after she has been mired in the quicksand joys of self-aggrandizing defilement.



How bad could it be?

There is a spectrum of how far women will venture to wade into the slimy cesspool of the OASIS.

1. Mark Una: Some simply post photos of themselves, fully clad (photography).
2. Mark Twain: Others pose for nude shots (soft core pornography).
3. Mark Triad: Some post videos of raunchy content (hard core pornography).
4. Depth Charge: A few will hook up with their e-johns for a significant cash infusion (conventional prostitution).
5. Cherry Blossom: Women who possess exquisite feminine wiles are the crème de la crème of the OASIS. The type of skilled labor required to be the modern equivalent of a Comfort girl or Geisha demands real emotional work. However, as we have noted in past case studies, this type of labor is also not without hefty rewards. (Sugar babies and “kept” women, AKA concubines)

Concerning the last type, in ages past, many middle to upper class women would do this much for her husband as an expression of love and respect for her husband (i.e. life trajectory 1 described in the introduction). But these days, a woman will only do this either (1) to create a slim chance to hook up with Chad (life trajectory 2), or (2) for a thousand e-boys paying cash into a secure online account (life trajectory 3).

The problem with this new setup, as we have learned, is that it involves diving into the online amateur sex industry and socialization (OASIS), which is basically some brand of prostitution.

McMurphy's post mentions how OASIS can set women into a mindset of sex = money, which leads them into spiritual poverty.

> "…a chick who's selling her @$$ on OnlyFans or working as an escort isn't doing what she's doing because she likes sex – she may like sex, or be a chick who skews sl*tty – but she's doing what she's doing FOR MONEY."

This is why I've been saying that a woman's involvement in OASIS is a form of prostitution. McMurphy also mentions how many online prostitutes have problems with substance addiction.

> "And let's also remember: the kinds of men who regularly pay for OnlyFans, cam girls, prostitutes or frequent strip clubs aren't generally speaking, high quality men. They're lonely, sad, often addicted to substances, or young guys who behave more like boys than men – and because they're paying for the chick's services, they don't really respect her either. In other words, the life of 95% of sex workers isn't exciting or glamorous or honestly all that lucrative… it's just sad and degrading.
>
> And this is why most chicks won't do it, and why those who do will always be looked on by society with a mixture of pity and disgust – also why […] you DO NOT want to get into an LTR or marry these chicks."

Epilogue

As the old adage goes (which answers the question of how social media companies can offer their services for free),

> "If you don't have to pay for the service, then YOU are the product!"

As we already know, Fartbook and other social media platforms sell the users' data to marketing specialists, and this is how they can offer their social networking service for FREE! Well, this is also true for OnlyFans creators. The reason it pays $$$, is because these women are the product that is being sold, in the form of pornographic photographs, videos, and chat sessions.

Modern culture, including the churchian sub-culture, makes it all too easy for young women to fall into unhealthy behaviors and form habits that feed these needs, and then become emotionally and psychologically dependent on the fix. Hence why I call it a behavioral addiction.

Once a woman has had it so easy, it's really tough for her to kick the habit and go back to God's proscribed order for living. Concerning this aspect of human nature, Ed Hurst wrote,

> "Making people angry about their slavery won't make them suddenly transform into rebels. They have to value liberty more than comfort, and that describes only a tiny thin slice of humanity."

From a spiritual perspective, an ever increasing number of our nation's daughters are giving themselves over to wh0redom, and soon, the entire nation will be defiled (Leviticus 19:29). Meanwhile, the church is in denial and does nothing to prevent or counteract this development.

Move over Victorian religiosity of the 19th century, and Therapeutic Moralistic Deism of the 20th … Behold! OASIS is the new opium for the 21st century masses!

References

- Very Well Mind (Elizabeth Hartney): An Overview of Behavioral Addiction (2020 September 17)

Related

- Red Pill Dad: Why Prostitution will always be a shameful job – including OnlyFans (2020 December 22)

It was god's will for her to be a stripper.

Jack · 22 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Come ye, all ye who are hoary and well laiden, and sex will save your soul!

Readership: All
Length: 3,300 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Introduction

As I was reading NovaSeeker's last post about The Slow Train Wreck (2021 January 18), and some related web articles, it became apparent to me that the train wreck experience is framed by W as a sort of spiritual awakening. There were some comments under the last few posts that insinuated the same idea.

In this post, I'll recount several quotes and clips that made me realize this. Relevant statements are indicated in boldface. Moreover, it supports the concept of Feminism being like a religion.

* * * * * * *

New York Post (Melkorka Licea): 'My sexuality is sacred': Bisexual pastor-turned-stripper has never been happier (2020 September 23)

Note the statement "My sexuality is sacred" in the title. Sexuality is truly sacred, but this article puts a twist on this, as it tells the story of her "conversion".

> [W] left her pastor life behind to pursue her dreams of becoming a stripper.

The opening statement implies that she has a new calling in life, a new purpose for living. Being "regenerated" is a central component of a spiritual experience.

> Growing up in a strict Baptist family, [W] was expected to be quiet, reserved and sweet. But her dreams weren't quite so conservative.

She discovered that the various norms and expectations that have been put upon her by God, by other humans, and by human institutions (e.g. church, school) are different from her inner nature and/or who God created her to be. This is another element of a "spiritual awakening".

> "From a young age, I had fantasized about being a stripper," [W], who now works as an erotic dancer on OnlyFans, told The Post. "But I was indoctrinated to believe my desires and my body were innately sinful and bad."

She experienced an internal struggle between what she desires, and what she knows is a morally worthy choice about what to do with her life.

> So instead of pursuing the pole, the mother of three went all-in on religion — and became a pastor. Even that, however, was rebellious in her family's eyes.

So at first, she sacrifices her inner desires. However, she got the impression that no matter what she chooses, there is no opportunity to become "accepted" (Translation: popular). There is no easy path in life.

> "I was taught that women aren't allowed to lead and that women belong in the kitchen and with the children," said

> [W], 36. "So even though it went against everything I was told, I decided to become [a pastor] because of my love for performing."

There's a lot of cognitive dissonance here, as we note that the first statement is a tenet of feminism (not true Christianity). But she finds some expression of her deepest desire through serving in the church. It is interesting how this quote spins her serving as a pastor as a type of rebellion, when in fact, female ministers are quite acceptable in many churches (e.g. Presbyterian and Episcopalian).

> In 2011, [W], along with her now ex-husband, joined the Woodland Hills Church — an evangelist megachurch in St. Paul, Minnesota — which opened her eyes to the possibility of gender equality within the faith.

The modern church is a worldly institution that carries a paper thin veneer of the Christian religion. She and her husband failed to see how "gender equality" is a manifestation of feminism within the church — something which does not conform to God's proscribed order. This is an important development which will come up again later in the story.

> "It blew my mind," she recalled of her first visit to the holy house. Every Sunday, [W] was the first in line to ask the pastor a question after the sermon.

She was curious and seeking for answers – How can she rectify her desires with her needs, and still find peace with God.

> "One of my pastors said, '[W], did you realize that you're a theologian?' And they said, 'We'd like you to be one of our pastors'," she recalled. "To be on stage in front of thousands of people — that's what I had been dreaming of for years."

So her pastor, either purposefully or inadvertently, fed her some false hopes about how her desire for self-glorification could fit into the life of faith.

> Eager to rise up the ranks, [W] — who was also raising three kids now aged, 10, 7 and 4 — snagged a spot as a weekly pastor in 2016.

She ate that up, thinking it to be the answer to her inner turmoil. Hence, in her mind, she thought it was "God's will". But we shall see that it was only the sense of ecstatic satisfaction that comes when an inner desire is attained.

> But [W's] true identity began to unfurl when she attended a LGBT-oriented theater performance later in 2016.

So we see, her interest in serving in her church was not based on her desire to serve God, but only to explore the "enlightenment" of feminism that cast a shadow over the church. That is, the aspects of "gender equality", self-promotion, and now, sexual liberation — the last of which is a topic that is assiduously swept under the rug because it violates doctrine and would mar the veneer of Christianity.

> "I was like, 'Oh my gosh, I don't think I'm straight' and it rocked my world*,"* said [W], who now identifies as bisexual and pansexual. "I knew if I revealed my queerness I would lose it all because the church is not welcoming to queer people."

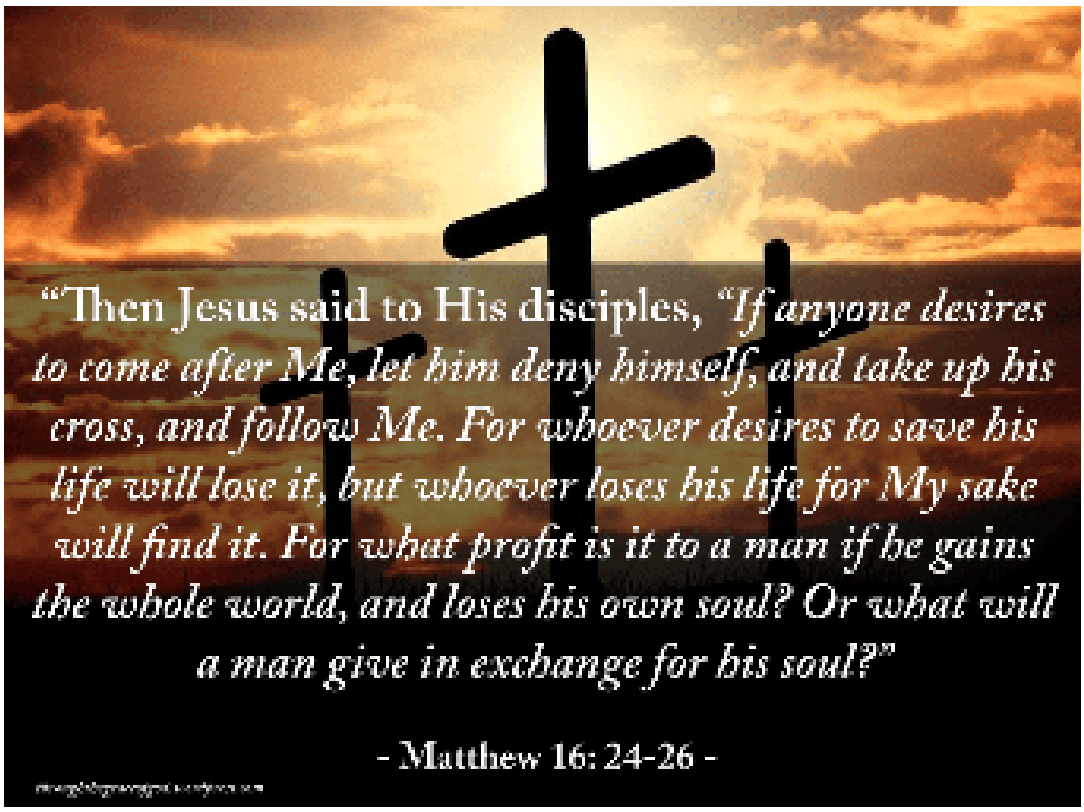
NovaSeeker told me in a private message that, based on all his coverage of Ws story, he still wasn't convinced that she was truly bisexual. She was merely being influenced by a new herd and from them she picked up a new enthusiasm. The common thread between the church herd and the LGBT herd is that they both buy into feminist doctrine. However, the doctrine of the LGBT herd is a purer embodiment of feminist ideology, and more importantly, it penetrates to the crawl of the soul seeker.

> She suddenly felt as if she was living "a very duplicitous life" and struggled to keep her sexuality a secret.

So she began to see how the various norms and expectations from her family, and the limitations imposed by Christianity stand in variance to the pure doctrine of feminism. Now she is faced with a real choice – a "crossroad" if you will. She must choose between the life of faith which wages war against her mind, and the enervating soulish life of self-centeredness.



Matthew 16:24-26 (NKJV)
And what decision will she make?

> So after giving her first widely-attended weekend sermon on July 4th weekend in 2017, [W] left the church for good.
>
> "I just never showed up again," she said.

She had found a purer source of defilement. Ahhh…

We are not told what happened immediately after this — all the details of her self-explorations and self-discoveries. We can only imagine the sordid events and profane experiences which sanctified her soul to sin, and the sacrifices she made in forfeiting her marriage and family.

> A few months later, [W] came out publicly in a confessional YouTube video posted on her social media platforms.
>
> Faced with rebuilding her life, she wondered what was next.

Galatians 2:18 (NKJV)

> "I started following my life coach's wife [on Instagram] who was doing lingerie modeling," said [W]. "I was kind of triggered by it… but I was also magnetically drawn to it."

The internal conflict rears its head once again — what she was taught, versus what her conscience says, versus what she desires.

> [W] knew she wanted to delve deeper into her own sexual desires and signed up for a class called "Sexpress You."

Aaaand… desire wins yet another round!

> "It was all about expressing your sexy self and that was the linchpin that I needed*,"* said [W]. Right after, she linked up with a photographer to do her first nude photoshoot.
>
> "I cried because I had never felt more holy and sacred in my life," she recalled of the shoot. "I never felt more sexy and liberated than I did then."

Weeping tears of repentance! Now her joy is complete in her salve-ation! As it is written in the hory scriptures,

> "Baring thy buttocks with quivering knees is great ecstasy. For we brought nothing into the world, and we can take nothing out of it. But if we have popular attention and meretricious power in our natural state, we will be content with that."
>
> Spoof based on 1st Timothy 6:6-10.

This photographer must have been quite a chad, for her to be "converted" so exquisitely.

Satire aside, one stumbling block in finding the Christian life is at the moment one reaches the object of one's desires, and the thrilling fullness of the moment leads one to believe that one has had an encounter with God.

The reason she had the impression that posing nude for a photoshoot is a “holy” experience is because she is so proud and dead on the inside that this is what it takes to humble her, and for her to experience unconditional love and acceptance, among other things. Actually, there is a lot of “soul food” that comes out of this kind of experience. I examined this phenomena in a previous post, How is illicit sex related to one’s spiritual state? (2019 May 22)

> Thrilled with her new calling as a stripper and erotic model, [W] launched an OnlyFans account where she posts explicit photos and videos in exchange for money.
>
> “I started off really timid like just topless photos, but now I’m at the point where I take personal requests and make videos very tailored to people’s specific desires,” said Mitchell, who also works as a life coach and offers courses such as “How to Unf - - k Yourself” about how to be your true self. “I’m to the point where back in March I was actually going to be paid several thousand dollars to have sex with someone, and I was A-OK with that, but then COVID hit and that got cancelled.”

She gained more self-confidence from this experience.

If you want to know who or what your de facto god is, look at where you spend your time and money.

> [W] relocated to Los Angeles in August 2019, and divorced her husband in June.
>
> But today, [W] is happier than ever.

Yes, happiness is the litmus test of pure doctrinal adjudication! Just as it is written in the hory scriptures,

> There remaineth therefore a convenient addiction to the women of OASIS.
>
> For she that is entered into this addiction, she also hath ceased from her own works, and shall be televised while comported upon her bedstead, as Belle Delphine and Lindsay Capuano did from theirs.
>
> Let women labour therefore to enter into that addiction, lest any woman fall after the same example of unbelief in herself.
>
> Spoof based on Hebrews 4:9-11.

The following is right out of the article.

> "Every person has the right to express themselves in whatever way feels good to them and this is how it feels good to me," she said.
>
> And while her preaching days might be behind her, stripping, for [W], is just as holy.
>
> "My sexuality is incredibly healing and sacred," she said. "And when I give this gift to people, it blesses them."

The hory Feeelz is the proof of her calling!

She fails to mention that it curses her husband and children.

* * * * * * *

Quotes from NovaSeeker's post, The Slow Train Wreck — a Cautionary Tale (2021 January 18)

> "I didn't know what I wanted for the longest time. … [But I learned that actually] I wanted to be rich! I wanted to serve the masses! I wanted to make a difference in the world! I wanted to feel sexy AF in my body! I wanted to be the kind of leader the world hadn't seen yet!".

Translation: I have found my god ordained mission – my divine life calling!

> "Girls are taught from a young age to fear/hate/mistrust their bodies, whether it's from society, religion, family. And I think I know why. The patriarchy knows how powerful a woman is in all her glory. When she sees her body as her powerful vessel, her emotions as sacred, her intuition as divine, she becomes unstoppable. And when a woman becomes unstoppable, there's nothing she can't be, do, or have. And that goes against the very nature and message of patriarchy (#sorrynotsorry)."

Translation: Women are divine goddesses! Anyone who says otherwise is a blasphemer.

Note that there is a reverse repentance. She's repenting from "patriarchy", which is a stand in for Christian morality.

> "I decide to have it right now. And I make it happen. This is what it means to operate at the level of cause in life. I decide how my life goes. I decide what I want. I decide what I am worthy of. I decide what I am capable of. And I go out and make that happen."

Translation: I am my own god!

* * * * * * *

Knewz (Randall Ryan): Pastor-turned-OnlyFans porn star says 'her dreams have come true' in emotional end of year Instagram post (2021 January 1)

> "I had always been part of the Church, I loved the Church and my people, and I did everything I could to fulfil my leadership calling in the Church."
>
> "Until I could no longer fit there, the fullness of who I was wasn't welcomed," [W] recalled of her pre-stripping pastor days. "I was queer, my Church didn't accept queer people, and I had desires to express myself in ways I had never been able to. I decided to finally step into the unknown and see where it would lead me, and it led me here and I am very grateful for it."

The Christian approach to this kind of self-discovery is to call it out as something foreign to your being (confession), and ask God to cleanse you from it (repentance). This usually does the trick of kickstarting the Holy Spirit's process of renewal. But instead of calling out her sin, she calls out the church for condemning her sinful nature!

> While [W] did indeed love her husband during her pastor days, she realized some six or seven years into their relationship that she was not fully heterosexual and needed to strip herself of the confines of matrimony.

That clause in bold is necessary, or else she would appear like a total monster.

Again, this is like a conversion but in reverse. Instead of leaving her sin behind, she leaves her church, husband, and family behind.

> According to The Sun, [W] grew up in a religious military family before joining the army of online ladies evangelizing hedonism to paying subscribers on the fast-growing church that is OnlyFans.

Now OnlyFans is her "church"! (Translation: a place where she is worshipped and adored.) Even the secular news frames this as a religious experience!

> Growing up in a military family, [W's] family life was rigid and very religious with visits to the local baptist church every Sunday. So it was hardly surprising when she decided to go to university in Cedarville, Ohio, and study Bible Studies.

You'll notice the subtle condescending connotation about religion (i.e. "rigid and very religious").

> The 36-year-old mom of three said she went six years as a young adult without having sex with a soul.

It is glossed over that she had been sexually promiscuous in high school, and yet she still chose to attend a Christian college. Cognitive dissonance abounds.

I've been to Cedarville College. It is Christian in name, but a lot of stuff happens after the lights go out.

> "I basically started dating Jesus," she said in an interview with Fabulous.

Something is definitely off with her understanding of theology.

> "I became deeply, deeply focused on God. I stopped dating men entirely. While I had slept with guys in high school, it was terrible, teenage sex where we didn't know what we were doing, I decided to stop seeing anyone > during my time at university."

Notice how she equates sex as a diametric antagonist of God and Christianity. Her view of sex is warped. So when she became disappointed with sex, then she thought she is getting closer to God.

Still searching for meaning? Just when it seems like she's about to wake up, but… no…

"From a young age, I had fantasized about being a stripper," Nikole Mitchell told the New York Post of shedding her pastor robes, and so much more, the Toronto Sun notes. "But I was indoctrinated to believe my desires and my body were innately sinful and bad."

Yes, that last statement affirms that her mental concept of sex has been corrupted.

"I was taught that women aren't allowed to lead and that women belong in the kitchen and with the children," said Mitchell, 36. "So even though it went against everything I was told, I decided to become (a pastor) because of my love for performing."

The same last two paragraphs above also appeared in the New York Post article. It seems like these trite clichés of the "bondage" of Christian "indoctrination" appear in every article. It's another flip, mind you. Instead of decrying sin as spiritual bondage, it is now Christianity that is a bondage. They must not fail to press forth the narrative.

* * * * * * *

And she even has a testimony of her "conversion"!

> "I was the poster child for people-pleasing, perfection, and scarcity mindset (not enough time! not enough money! not enough friends!). I was exhausted. And broke. And ready for a new narrative. I knew I had a big calling on my life, and I was tired of feeling like it was just out of my reach!
>
> To access this dream life, I had to shed layers that no longer served me. I had to own the fullness of who I was, even if it meant disappointing important people in my life. So I came out publicly as queer. I left the Christian faith. And I took a deep breath of fresh air for the first time in a long time. I was FREE! Because I was ME. That's when everything changed in my life for the better."
>
> Source: [W's] About Page.*

She's still (not was) a poster child for people-pleasing, perfection, and scarcity mindset. But she's not broke or confused about what she wants anymore.

* * * * * * *

Rise and shine, b!tches!

…are the words emblazoned across the home page on her website.

> "For most of my life, I didn't know I had a voice. When I found my voice, I was scared to use it, and at times I'm still scared to speak up. Here in this space, however, I seek to speak my truth even when my voice shakes. In my writings and videos, I vulnerably talk about things most people are too afraid to bring up in hopes to remind people that we are not alone; in fact, it is my hope for you and me to know that we are more loved, whole, beautiful, and destined for greatness than we have dared to believe. So let's rise and shine, bitches!"
>
> Source: [W's] Front Page.*

Now she is a virtual "televangelist", spreading the gospel of feminism and the saving grace of OASIS to poor, lonely women everywhere, all the while lending comfort to lusty incels and their kind!

Epilogue

I'll end with a quote from NovaSeeker.

> "…the phenomenon becomes much more of a "thing" when it comes packaged with a set of ideas (they are not coherent enough to be called an "ideology", per se, but are really just a jumble of empowerment ideas that are kind of a loose "ideology lite") that make the woman feel good/right/justified/empowered/sacred/holy by what she is doing. Yoga is full of this. It takes the art of erotic self-display and makes it into something holy and sacred. W goes on and on in her claptrap (and mentioned to the NY Post's reporter as well) that she feels that her work on OnlyFans is the most sacred acts she has ever done, and she is healing people and helping them spiritually by what she is doing and so on.
>
> Now it's easy for us to snicker at that and say that it's got to be a pure grift — she can't believe that, right? But, to the contrary, I am pretty sure she does believe it. She sees herself as fulfilling her sacred calling as a woman, embodied erotic grace and so on.
>
> Moral of the story — women appear to be very susceptible to jumbles of ideas (ideology lite) that link together sexiness, attention, and the sacred. It appears to be catnip on steroids for women. Be very careful with it.

Related

- Dalrock: Repenting of sexual morality. (2015 November 2)
- Dalrock: A god we must obey. (2017 February 26)
- Gunner Q: A Christian Whore Of Babylon (2021 January 20)

Lessons from the Train Wreckage

Novaseeker · 25 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Not to worry … She's an outlier, nothing for me to be concerned about …

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post is a commentary on the true story conveyed in my previous post, The Slow Train Wreck — A Cautionary Tale (2021 January 18). Readers may want to read this post before continuing.
In these posts, H=Husband and W=Wife.
Length: 2,300 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

What Was Once an Outlier is Now Normal

In reflecting on the sad tale of H and W recounted in my most recent post, it seems to me that there is a significant temptation to dismiss the story as being too outlierish to be of interest to upstanding, moral Christians like the reader base of this site. A curiosity, perhaps, but nothing of greater interest in our own lives or in the lives of our adult (or soon to be adult) children. We just aren't people like that.

The problem is that the more closely one looks at the situation of H and W, the less truly outlierish it appears.

Always look for the obvious red flags, but …
While there were various rubicons crossed that in hindsight should not have been permitted, or at least should have been raised to the level of confrontation at the time, it is, of course, much easier for us now to spot these in hindsight. It is much, much easier than in real life and in real time, until it gets to the point where it is so egregious that it needs to be stopped – which is what H did when it did, in fact, get to that point.

H discusses at length in his interview with Rollo how W presented no major red flags during the pre-marital and early marriage phases of the relationship. W comes from a solid family of origin – religious Baptists, but not fundamentalists, was college educated but not careerist, was interested in having kids, generally happily married to H (at several points in the earlier years of the Instagram feed, she specifically remarks about how much she loves her marriage), and so on.

While W did have some N count prior to marriage, and while most of our readers would agree that N=0 is the ideal, many of our readers were not N=0 when they themselves married, and no N count at all is simply not something most Christians have today when they marry. According to what W has said, most of her N count happened in high school and not in college and beyond and so was less of a red flag for H (whose N count was also not 0) when he met her when she was 25. So while N count is typically a red flag for people who see any N higher than 0 as a red flag, W was not in a situation where her N count was an outlier for Christian women, even for religious Christian women of her age, at that time (2009).

Flipping the Switch

When we look at the accounts of the early years of the marriage, and see this reflected in the early years of W's Instagram feed, it seems clear enough that this simply was not a case of a careerist "carousel rider" who married at 30 wanting to hop back onto the carousel after tiring of her "Betabux" once having birthed 1-2 kids. This was a woman who did a true 180-degree turn right in the middle of her marriage. Like a total U-Turn, where everything she wanted and pursued and organized her life around was trashed and replaced with another set of values and other things that then served as her new "north star". This new set of values was, of course, totally different from what she was oriented around when H met her, and therefore totally incompatible with remaining married to H.

H says in his interview with Rollo that the critical point was when she came to see herself as LGBT. I do not see very much evidence of this in W's posts outside a smattering of things around the time of that specific event, and her current life seems mostly not on the LGBT side of things as far as she has disclosed, but H's explanation of what happened seems quite on target to me nonetheless, even as an outside observer.

The reason is that when she started to identify in that way, she must have reached out to the related world on the internet, and when she did so, she would have encountered the entire ideology of that world and would have imbibed it. The female side of the LGBT world, which is the side she would have been interfacing with, is thoroughly feminist to its core, in a very extreme way typically. It's all patriarchy this, heterosexism that, etc. She seems to have coupled this together with the general sex positive feminism that lies at the basis for sex worker movements and the like (and which is hated by the more "traditional" radfems) to arrive at a new set of principles for her life. And to me that's likely the key to understanding when and how the "switch flipped".

Switching Teams

At some point, W had her mental computer undergo an operating system change. Specifically she was changing out a faith – which comes complete with a worldview, a moral code, and a set of values, norms, and behaviors – for an ideology – which also comes complete with a new and different worldview, moral code, and set of values, norms, and behaviors. Both before and after she had a "team", a "tribe", a group she could identify with and which could form a core basis of her identity. She could share a worldview with this group, a moral code, a set of values, norms, and behaviors, and have it all supported and reinforced. Of course, this new set didn't involve the Christian faith, but it appears that W had moved to the "spiritual but not religious" group of people who want the goodies of a spiritual life without the pesky moral rules, especially moral rules about sex.

More fundamentally, W appears to me to have moved to a view where she sees life as being about pursuing self-determined goals, and that her self-determined goals, as she openly states in several of her Instagram posts and in her various interviews, are getting rich and using her sex appeal to do that by virtually sharing her body with the masses as she does on Instagram and monetizes as a model and on the private porn site she has hosted on OnlyFans.

This, which would normally appear to be a rather narcissistic approach to life at the intersection of attention seeking and grifting, is, when coupled with certain ideologies and worldviews that arise from feminism, instead repackaged as an act of rebellion against the patriarchy, an act of personal feminist liberation through softcore porn and pay-per-view grift, whereby the heterosexist wannabe patriarchs are literally made to pay for their relentless "sexism" and "exploitation of women", to the satisfaction of the liberated empowered woman who heroically turns the exploiters into the exploited by the means of her alluring digital nudes.

Beware Discovery of the "Real Me"

Ultimately, the endgame for W has been spectacularly ugly from a moral perspective, but the key takeaway for us is the following: ideas are important. Do not think that they are essentially harmless. They are not. The contemporary ideas that are in broad circulation in our culture point in one direction only – away from God and towards the self and the gratification of our appetites and desires. This is all of feminism. It is much of the modern world besides. Be wary of it, in the extreme, in your own views and certainly in those of your wife.

Yes, when vetting, and after marriage, you should pay attention to little changes in her behavior and appearance and the like, because over time these can and do add up in many cases. But in reality, the main takeaway here is that when W made her self discovery and told H about it, this was not a time to take it lightly and accept it. It was not the time to be forbearing and forgiving. It was a time to challenge it, to question it, to try to disrupt it, and at all costs, to steer her away from the rest of the corpus of ideas that array themselves under the larger LGBT rubric, virtually all of which are fundamentally corrosive to any heterosexual marriage. Because permitting it to continue and grow is a sure path to marital disaster.

That is not a criticism of H, by the way – not at all. As I say, hindsight is 20/20, and my heart goes out to H here – it was very hard to know what to do in real time. But for us, having the benefit of hindsight here, we can be more deliberate about how we understand what happened here, and how we can learn from it. Ideas matter. They seep into everything. They may seem harmless at first, but then they grow and lead to bigger ideas, and soon enough, they are replacing other ideas wholesale… and the entire person's conception of who they are and what they are about changes utterly as a result of being oriented around an utterly different set of ideas.

In the context of a marriage, this kind of transformation is typically fatal, because the person who is transformed in the way they view themselves generally asks themselves, at some point in that process of transformation, whether the "new version" of themselves would have ever decided to marry their current spouse to begin with, or whether their current spouse is simply a poor fit for the "person they now know themselves to be". The core logic, which is entirely self-centered, asks whether "this marriage makes sense for the Real Me".

In other words, if you allow someone to redefine themselves in a significant way during the marriage, without being challenged, although you may think you are being supportive of their "journey of self-discovery" (something the culture and even many churches will blare loudly in your face 24/7 today), all you are really doing is creating a ticking time bomb that could very well blow up in your face once the transformation is fully in place.

And it makes perfect sense — she has changed, and you have not. She has a different perspective, now, on almost everything — she sees the entire world differently. And that will almost always include how she sees you, how she views men, relationships, sex, and the kinds of men she desires, and seeks for relationships, and so on. (Jack would say that this kind of change "de-sanctifies" or defiles the marriage.)

When someone fundamentally changes, such that their worldview itself changes, there is simply a substantial risk that you, having been selected under their prior/"false"/old worldview, simply do not fit into their new vision of themselves, into how they see their "Real Me" and the kind of life that their "Real Me" really wants. And when that happens, in our culture it is only a matter of time until the marriage ends — Christian, kids, or not.

What's Next for W?

I do not know what will happen with W. I have no crystal ball.

Having now looked at the last several years of W's online history, and the recent trajectory as well, including the velocity of change, and the general direction of it, I honestly do not think it is predictable where W will stop at this point. She seems to me to be in utter thrall of a combination of powerful demons – open, crass, celebrated greed; a virtual bottomless pit of attention-seeking; an addiction to the related ego boosting; and raw sexual lust, which I am certain is playing a substantial role in the proceedings as well.

At the end of 2020, W disclosed openly, in a post on her Instagram feed, her 2020 OF earnings. The reveal was in the form of screenshots of the earnings numbers from the OF site itself, so it is not "made up". In the 4 final months of 2020 (i.e., after the viral exposure following the New York Post article), her OF earnings skyrocketed! She earned, rounded, U.S. $138,000 in those 4 months alone! Prior to that, W had not earned more than U.S. $600 in any one month, so she has definitely "blown up" since her viral exposure.

As others have noted, W is a "performer", and she likes to be the center of an audience more than anything else. I do not think that OF will deliver to her the audience size she ultimately wants. (She will never be a Belle Delphine level phenomenon.) So I expect she will look to other lines of larger-scale attention-getting where she can parley her unique combination of titillating history, comely appearance, and speaking skills into some kind of new gig. My guess is that she is now planning to use this new level of exposure to parley that into some kind of post-OF gig — reality TV, talk show host, junket talk sage, a pop personality, or something like this. The other possibilities that come to mind — such as traditional porn or the actual courtesan route (W mentioned in her interview with the New York Post that she was ready to do this before Covid happened) — now seem far less likely for W given that her OF has now reached critical mass financially. These kinds of efforts would not yield anything close to the kind of ROI she is getting from OF, so they really just don't pencil at this point for W. Even if she fails to parley her OF virality into another gig, she can still cultivate her OF base quite nicely for quite some time for substantial cash without expanding into one of those other areas.

Ultimately I think all we can do is pray for God's transforming grace for W, and for his continuing strength and support for H and their kids. W, for all of the tawdriness and narcissism, still has 3 kids 10 and under and an ex-H who has been through things almost no men have to live through, even those of us who have lived through divorces. Prayer and compassion is all we can offer, I think, as well as the determination to learn what we can from this unfortunate situation, so as to avoid making similar mistakes in our own lives.

Related

- Spawny's Space (Deti): It's going to get really bad for men (2017 September 1)
- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Psychological Fallacies (2019 June 13)
- Jim's Blog: The Three Magic Words (2020 August 7)
- Spawny's Space (Jack): A Lot of Men are Trash — Part III (2020 August 10)

Why do humans conceal mating?

Jack · 27 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Having sex privately is assumed to be a common modesty, but is it?

Readership: All;
Length: 3,200 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Introduction

This post will (1) explore the question of why the privatization of sexual expression is peculiar to human nature, and (2) why some people, under certain social settings, do not feel the need to conceal mating. The following article is quoted.

Yitzchak Ben Mocha, "Why do human and non-human species conceal mating? The cooperation maintenance hypothesis", The Royal Society, (2020 August 5) Alternate source.

John Legend and Chrissy Teigen, famous for having sex in public.

Why do Humans Conceal Mating?

The author analyzed sexual practices in 249 cultures from 35 geographical regions by reviewing more than 4,572 ethnographies! Wowzers!

The first section of this paper covers systematic evidence for the wide prevalence of mating concealment across human cultures. He also reviews the phenomenon of concealed mating in non-human species. He takes an evolutionary perspective to review existent hypotheses for concealed mating in humans, and shows that they do not explain why concealed mating evolved as the norm in humans, and is only seldom exhibited by apes.

> "In many cultures, living conditions prevent complete sexual privacy, while in others, sexual privacy is not rigorously kept. Nevertheless, pairs from virtually all cultures were reported to take measures to conceal (at least partly) their legitimate mating from the sensory perception of adult conspecifics."

He mentions one exception, the Goajiro from Colombia, where pairs took no precautions to conceal legitimate mating.

> "Despite the extraordinary cultural diversity that has evolved in the human species, humans from distinct cultures have been reported to take active precautions to conceal sexual intercourse from the sensory perception of others. During the last century, scholars argued that the preference for concealed mating represents a 'human universal' and is also uniquely human. Others speculated this had a significant effect on the evolution of human emotions (e.g. shame) and cognitive skills (e.g. self-awareness, managing social relationships)."

Get this… Concealed mating is only characteristic among humans, and out of millions of species, only one type of bird (the Arabian Babbler) has been found to exhibit this same behavior. Similar to the habit of wearing clothes, it seems like a trait conjoined with something else unique to humans — sin. I'll come back to this connection later.

The Arabian Babbler

Hypotheses on the Function of Concealed Mating in Humans

> "To date, only brief explanations have been suggested for the function of concealed mating (e.g. a few sentences or a footnote). […] the first explanation was proposed in 1930 by Malinowski, who argued that public mating 'excites jealousy. Hence to make love or to eat in public is to invite rivals to seize that which is being enjoyed'."

So by extension, the concealment of mating serves to avert envy and jealousy which invariably disturbs the peace and upsets the social order. Women prefer a peaceful society filled with mini-dramas of their own creation.

> "Half a century later, Symons repeated a similar argument: 'Ultimately, [concealed mating] probably is the outcome of reproductive competition. Where food is scarce, and the sight of people eating produces envy in the unfed, eating is often conducted in private. While there are many societies in which everyone has enough to eat, there are no societies in which everyone can copulate with all the partners he or she desires […] The seeking of privacy for sex probably has been uniformly adaptive and hence is virtually universal among > humans'."

In other words, Symons' theory recognizes that there is a subset of humans suffering from sex scarcity. Presumably, it has always been true that some men and women cannot obtain an ideal pairing. Within the past few decades, this sex drought has increased dramatically for a significant proportion of men. This motivates socially unacceptable pairings and the need for secrecy.

> "Building on this interaction between jealousy and reproductive competition, Friedl posited the costly consequence of reproductive competition: 'the value of hidden sex [is] to protect [the copulating pair] and the social group from the dangers of jealousy caused by competition […] for mates, [as] a degree of social harmony is a prerequisite for an individual animal's reproductive success'."

Florida pastor caught having fun with female church members.

We see this all the time. Let's take the church as a pertinent example. There is a lot of sexual promiscuity happening within the church, especially among younger singles, and it is assiduously kept secret as much as possible. But if it ever becomes known that a younger woman (or three) was hopping on a young alpha, or that a man in the congregation was shinnying around with another man's wife, then a scandal will invariably erupt. The scandal will polarize the social atmosphere of the church, and inevitably require one or both of the offenders to leave the church. This throws a monkey wrench into the grander scheme of procreation, since all this drama would interfere with the continuance of the affair. So it is easy to see why everyone wants the whole thing to be kept secret — because the exploration of mating possibilities is tacitly taken to be much more important than preserving sexual purity and maintaining social harmony within the congregation.

On the other hand, NOT keeping it secret is just as destructive, if not more so. Just imagine a scenario in which it became the custom of making all the illicit sexual liaisons within the church a matter of public knowledge, and it was also expected that everyone should forgive and accept the offenders. Then eventually, everyone would come to view the congregation as a de facto swingers' club, and the church would mutate into the same. Even if the need for repentance is emphasized and required, the die would already be cast.

In either case, as you can see, the problem of how to deal with sexual immorality within the church is a conundrum, but the easiest way to deal with it is simply to deny it. This is why pastors and elders refuse to discuss or deal with such matters until it blows up in their face. We can also see why it is not uncommon for people who become privy to the prevalence of sexual immorality within the church to leave, either to escape the influence of promiscuity, or to engage in promiscuity more freely and without the risk of expose and consequent damage to the church fellowship.

Louisiana priest arrested after having a threesome on the church altar.

> "Similarly, van Schaik recently hypothesized that 'the benefit for the man is that it prevents overt contest competition for access to potentially fertile mates, which would threaten male–male cooperation'."

In common language, if beta Billy was fully aware of how his buddy, alpha Axel was using him to meet and F all his girlfriends, then Billy and Axel would not be friends any longer. Since it is advantageous for both men to remain friends, Axel must do his clam digging on the underground railroad.

> "These explanations share the view that avoiding overt reproductive competition is the main function of concealed mating in humans, while differing in the importance ascribed to cooperation. Malinowski and Symons neglect the importance of cooperation altogether, Friedl invokes the cost of reproductive competition on 'social harmony', and van Schaik points out the importance of male–male cooperation."

Although all of the above explanations may be true, it does not explain why this whole paradigm is almost totally unique to humans. As the author says,

> "However, if these hypotheses were true, I would expect to find habitual concealment of matings in many other social species. Specifically, I would expect to find concealed matings in our phylogenetically closest living relatives, the social non-human great apes (bonobos Pan paniscus, chimpanzees Pan troglodytes and mountain gorillas Gorilla beringei beringei). In these species, within-group reproductive competition is common, while social cohesion is crucial for between-group competition and, at least among chimpanzees, male–male cooperation is vital. Nevertheless, dominant individuals from these species seldom conceal matings from the view of conspecifics…"

The author discusses the example of primate mating behavior to support his hypothesis, given the following section.

A male Gelada baboon (Theropithecus gelada) vocalising whilst mating with a female amongst other troop members in the Simien Mountains in Ethiopia. The Gelada is, following humans, the most vocal of primates.

The Cooperation Maintenance Hypothesis

Ben Mocha presented the Cooperation Maintenance Hypothesis (CMH), which seemingly applies across species and cultures. The CMH is based on the following argument:

If:

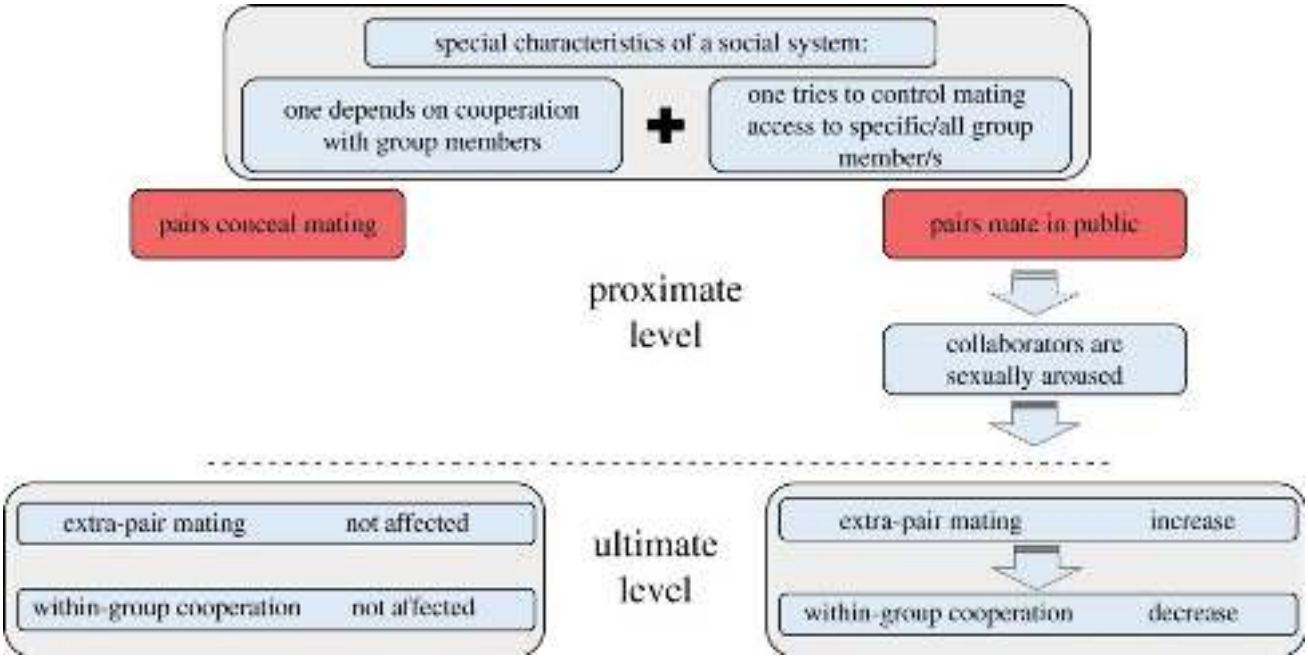
1. Sensory stimuli of mating between conspecifics evokes sexual arousal and trigger mating behaviour in witnesses (hereafter, the sexual arousal premise).
2. X (a male and/or a female) tries to control mating access to his/her partner(s) (hereafter, the mating control premise).
3. X depends on cooperation with group members that he/she prevents from mating with his/her partner(s) (hereafter, the cooperation dependency premise).

Then:

Public mating between X and his/her partner will evoke sexual arousal in group members (males and/or females). This, in turn, will increase the likelihood that aroused witnesses will attempt to initiate mating with X's partner when possible (the sexual arousal premise). These attempts will violate X's efforts to control mating access to his/her partner (the mating control premise) and will trigger social conflicts that will harm the cooperation between X and his/her group members (the cooperation dependency premise.

> "By contrast, sensory concealment of X's mating with his/her partner will not evoke sexual arousal in group members. Hence, the act of mating will not induce extra-pair mating with X's partner and will not affect X's cooperation with other group members. I therefore suggest that concealed mating by individuals whose mating is not subject to physical interruption by conspecifics is a relatively non-costly strategy for avoiding unnecessary sexual arousal in group members (proximate explanation). At the ultimate level, concealed mating allows an individual to maintain two needs that would otherwise conflict: mating control over his/her partner(s) and cooperation with those group members that are prevented from mating with these partner(s)."

The Cooperation Maintenance Hypothesis is illustrated in the following flowchart.



Ben Mocha offers further argumentative support for the CMH.

> Thus, the CMH elaborates factors that were previously proposed to select for concealed mating—jealousy [2,6], reproductive competition [2,3,11] and social harmony/male–male cooperation [3,11]—and combines them as necessary premises of a coherent argument. According to the CMH, explanations that rely solely on avoiding reproductive competition [2,6] are not sufficient, since the question of concealed mating is only applied to individuals who do not expect interference from conspecifics (e.g. dominant individuals). In addition, in social systems without cooperation, dominant animals settle conflicts with aggression and often mate in public (e.g. Rocky Mountain bighorn sheep Ovis Canadensis [30]). But where competitors also cooperate, aggression may eliminate future cooperation (for ethnographic examples in Yanomamö see [31]).
>
> The CMH differs from previous explanations by requiring both a specific form of reproductive competition (i.e. attempting to prevent group members from mating with one's partner) and reliance on cooperation between group members. It thereby highlights the need to manoeuvre between these conflicting motives as the crucial selective pressure.
>
> The CMH further stands up to evolutionary critiques that previous explanations failed to address. Namely, it can explain why dominant individuals of non-human great apes seldom conceal mating: because they rarely monopolize a specific partner (bonobos and chimpanzees use other forms of reproductive competition, e.g. sperm competition [32]) or they do not depend on cooperation with subordinate group members (e.g. mountain gorillas)—at least not to the same extent as humans and Arabian babblers."

The Japanese Macaque

The CMH Applied to Human Behavior

Concerning the sexual arousal premise,

> "Visual [33] and auditory [34] stimuli of mating activate the reward system in the human brain and trigger mating behaviour in males and females via mirror neurons. For ethnographic examples, see the Goajiro [35] and Lesu [16].
>
> Knowing that a desired group member has a legitimate mating tie with another person may also trigger jealousy (see the Muria for ethnographic examples [18]). Yet, the sensory stimulus of mating is another powerful trigger of sexual arousal that can be prevented by sensory concealment. The benefits of sensory concealment therefore do not rely on individuals being ignorant of the existence of mating ties between group members."

Concerning the mating control premise,

> "Various scholars have claimed that in virtually all cultures, husbands and/or wives try to control mating access to their spouse(s)—at least to a certain degree [1,2,9,36]. Three clarifications should be made regarding this claim. First, mating control should not be confused with monogamy. For instance, a man/woman may marry several wives/husbands and forbid them to have extramarital sex. Second, it has been argued that even in cultures where some extramarital sex is allowed (e.g. in cultures with 'shared paternity'), husbands and/or wives are still entitled to restrict the trysts of their spouse(s) to specific individuals and/or limit extramarital sex to the greatest possible extent [9]. Third, this premise requires an attempt, not a success, to control mating access to X's spouse(s). As adultery is evident across human societies [10], this emphasizes the importance of behavioural strategies to reduce its occurrence.
>
> Although it has been claimed repeatedly that restrictive sexual norms are virtually universal, there is a dearth of supporting evidence (but see [1,9]). Hence, I analysed whether social norms in this study's dataset entitle husbands and/or wives to at least some control over mating access to their spouse(s), or, in contrast, if both > spouses are allowed to have unrestricted extramarital sex. I found social norms that entitle mating control over spouse(s) in 100% of cultures for which data were available (survey dataset: $n = 210$; SCCS/EA dataset: $n = 145$). Cultures had diverse norms of sexual control; for instance, norms that forbid both spouses to have extramarital sex (e.g. orthodox Jews [37]); cultures where wives are required to stay faithful to their husbands, but husbands are allowed to have extramarital sex (e.g. Malekula [38]); and cultures where husbands and/or wives are allowed to have extramarital sex, but only with specific partners (e.g. Huaorani [39]). I found no culture in which social norms entitle both husbands and wives unrestricted freedom to engage in extramarital sex. These norms suggest that in virtually all human societies, group members are prevented (sometimes or always) from mating with spouses of others."

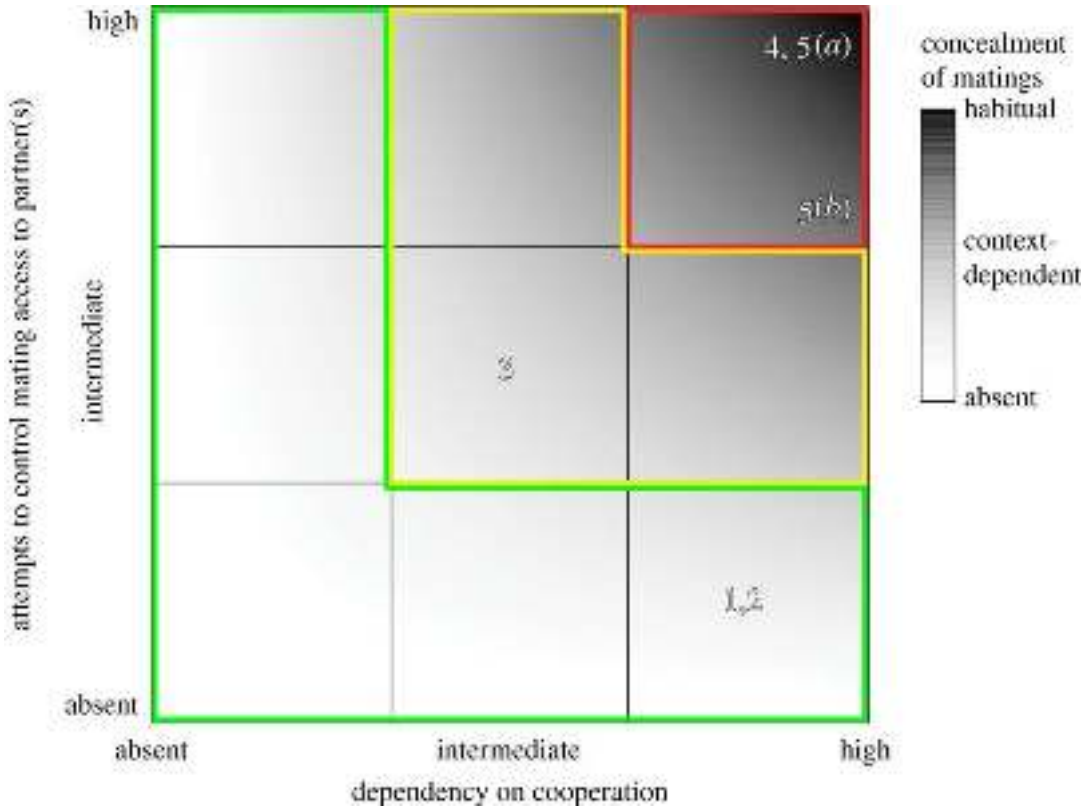
The cooperation dependency is taken as evident, as I discussed in the above commentary.

> "In conclusion, visual and audile stimuli of human mating trigger sexual arousal and sexual behaviour in both male and female observers [33,34]; across cultures, husbands and/or wives attempt to control mating access to their spouse(s) [9]; humans live in social systems where fitness crucially depends on cooperation between group members [40,41]. I therefore suggest that the habitual concealment of legitimate mating in humans is a relatively non-costly behavioural strategy to prevent unnecessary sexual arousal in group members (proximate explanation). This simultaneously maintains control over mating access to their spouse(s) as well as cooperation with group members that are prevented from mating with their spouse(s) (ultimate explanations)."

Ben Mocha offers the following chart to predict the concealment of matings. The chart is based on the interaction between attempts to control mating access to partner(s) and dependency on cooperation. The mating behavior of dominant individuals in different social systems are given as follows.

Green = Dominant individuals do not conceal matings.
Yellow = Dominant individuals present a context-dependent concealment of matings
Red = Dominant individuals conceal matings habitually.



The CMH Applied to the Current SMP

According to Ben Mocha's CMH, concealed mating is a behavioral mating strategy used (1) to maintain mating control over partner(s), (2) to prevent sexual arousal in witnesses, and (3) to maintain cooperation with group members. That is to say, people practice mating in private when…

1. They want to maintain mating control over partner(s).
2. They are concerned that witnesses might feel envy or jealousy.
3. They do not want witnesses who may become emotionally or sexually aroused and possibly interfere with mating.
4. There is a perceived risk that cooperation with group members might be lost.

If we look at this theory through a Red Pill lens, we find that maintaining the norm of keeping sexual relations hidden actually supports a matriarchal social order in which women are in full control of social interactions and mating opportunities.

Within such a social order, women are able to choose when and with whom to mate, whether it is socially acceptable or not. According to women's hypergamous nature, they will naturally gravitate towards the alpha. But because there are relatively fewer alphas, this results in a mating glut (a scarcity of preferred men for women, and a scarcity of women for non-preferred men). This motivates promiscuity which must be kept covert for reasons described above. Those few men who are chosen by females for sex must tacitly agree to be complicit in the deceptive cover up. Men who try to buck against this system are punished by the withholding of sex by women. Chance observers choose to remain silent in order to maintain social cohesion, and thereby become accomplices.

Tunisia, by Alphonse Etienne Dinet

Ben Mocha compares human mating activity to that of the animal kingdom using monkeys as a representative example. Cats (lions, tigers, leopards, etc.) would also fit the argument. Within the animal kingdom, this glut of hypergamy is recognized and accepted, but the control over social interactions and mating opportunities is not covertly handed over to the females of the species in exchange for social tranquility or sexual access, as is done among humans. Instead, alphas must constantly support and defend their territory and pool of mates, and if/when he cannot, then he is no longer an alpha, by definition.

If this scenario happened among humans, then the true alpha males would maintain their sexual dominance by attracting and keeping mates, and repelling competing males. If they cannot, then they lose their alpha status.

The Bible contains stories that describe public and/or unconcealed mating…

- As a display of dominance and/or social status, or to shame the woman's husband/previous partner. Examples include Reuben sleeping with Jacob's concubine (Genesis 35:22), and Absalom sleeping with King David's wives (2nd Samuel 16:20-22).
- As the joy of intimacy. Example of Isaac and Rebecca being seen by King Abimelech (Genesis 26:8).

As far as I know, all of the examples in the Bible illustrate it as disruptive to the social order.

Even today, this does happen with a very small number of men (e.g. drug lords, gang lords, mercenaries, pimps, soldiers, turd-world politicians, etc.). Furthermore (and if Hollywood is half way accurate), we know these men do have sex in somewhat public spaces (e.g. the corner office, pool side, rooftops, back alleys, nature preserves, etc.). However, this is not broadly accepted as the norm within the vast majority of the cultures of the world today.

Epilogue

Modern culture imposes very loose sexual norms. Yet public mating remains taboo. This may be surprising at first glance. But after studying this paper, we find it's actually not surprising at all, because the concealment enables promiscuity and supports a gynocentric social order.

In sum, we see that the preference for private intercourse arises from sin in general. But this should be no surprise to anyone who has read Genesis 3:7.

 H/T: Sensuous Curmudgeon: Why do Humans have peculiar mating habits? (2020 August 6)*
 The Bible also describes the taking of wives as a seal of political alliances. Examples include several kings, including David and Solomon.*

Related

- Σ Frame: A Study of Open Relationships (2015 September 8)
- Σ Frame: What is the difference between Open Relationships (OR) and Friends With Benefits (FWB)? (2015 September 10)

Revealing the motives behind unconcealed sex and nakedness

Jack · 29 January 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Did you ever wonder why some couples like to get it on in the park? A better question is, why doesn't everyone?

Readership: All;
Warning: Some images may be offensive to some readers.
Length: 3,200 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Introduction

Through several posts this month, we discovered that the overwhelming success of the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS) depends on a novel intersection of sex, culture, and technology, with a few key contextual factors being in place.

- Large potential public viewership (via. internet, smartphones, etc.)
- Mass aggregation marketing.
- Convenient implementation and accessibility of digital data (e.g. images, videos, financial transactions, etc.).
- Discrete digital data dissemination (e.g. control of viewership and access to data through subscriptions, etc.)
- Select privatization of social media (e.g. disintermediation, access from home, etc.)

The last post, Why do humans conceal mating? (2021 January 27) explored the question of why the privatization of sexual expression is peculiar to human nature. This post will apply the conclusions from this post to examine why the last factor above is of crucial importance. We'll also look at the reasons why some people are enamored by unconcealed sex and nakedness.

Case Study: Zesty Zoomers

I came across this interesting and rather funny news article.

The Sun (Hana Carter): Couple caught having full-blown sex on Rio council meeting Zoom call after forgetting to turn off camera (2020 August 17)*

Here's what happened in a nutshell. The city council of Rio De Janeiro had an online meeting. Sometime before the meeting was concluded, one of the staff members left the meeting, but he inadvertently forgot to turn off his camera and log out of Zoom. This allowed the other council members to have a saucy glimpse of his personal life.

I'm sure that things like this happen more frequently than what we hear about. Viewers might either enjoy it or be repulsed by it, but either way, mature individuals would not talk about being privy to such an incident. We might presume that this reaction is because people choose to be modest and respectful whenever they are exposed to the Public Display of Sexual Affection (PDSA), much like people react to other common but comical features of human nature, such as a noxious fart or a guttural belch. But this notion is revealed to be false in the last paragraph, which says,

> "It is unclear if the person involved has been punished for the incident."

The necessity of punishment implies that a legal or moral boundary has been transgressed and the person needs to learn the error of his ways. This seems to agree with how PDSA is regarded in general. Having sex in a public space has always been considered to be socially unacceptable, even obscene. Some jurisdictions make it a misdemeanor.

The Taboo Surrounding the Public Display of Sexual Affection (PDSA)

If we think about this a little deeper, it may seem odd that people are not punished for p!ss!ng in the park, but they are punished for pounding p*ssy in the park. We know the commonly stated reason for this is because p!ss!ng might be immodest and impolite, but it is considered "normal" or even necessary in some instances, whereas some variant of physical coitus, male ejaculation, and the female orgasm especially, are just downright obscene! Punishment is not warranted simply because of indecent exposure, because d!cks come out in both cases.

Neither is it related to Christian ethics, because unbelievers have the same reaction, and Christian morals are never cited in defense of this position. It is something common to human nature. The Sun doesn't say weather the council member was engaging in sexual relations with his wife or the wh0re next door. Although this matters greatly in determining the morality of the act itself, we see that this makes no difference at all in regards to the morality of PDSA.

Yet in spite of this social taboo, we know that people continue to enjoy letting the wind blow through the grass. Women who wear short skirts and neglect wearing underclothes are dripping a subtle scent to this effect.

Digging deeper, we might ask the question, why is PDSA shrouded in shame? Is it because the sex act itself is immoral? The obvious answer is no. Ben Mocha, the author of the paper cited in the previous post [1], did not investigate whether pairs conceal the fact that they are engaged in legitimate mating, saying that "it is evident that humans know that married pairs have legitimate sexual relationships". I agree that legitimacy doesn't seem to determine the appropriateness of PDSA, although it does seem like it should.

Maybe the indecency of PDSA lies in the fact that it arouses strong emotions of a sexual nature in the observer, as Ben Mocha observed [1]. Some people might consider this to be offensive, especially if children are present.

All this begs many questions…

- Why is PDSA considered perverse or taboo?
- Why are humans so intensely concerned about PDSA, to the point that we wish to punish offenders?
- Why is PDSA more bombastically offensive than the (im)morality of the sex act itself?
- What boundary is being crossed from p!ss!ng to p00ning in the park?

Concerning those who engage in PDSA…

- What is the fascination with having sex in public?
- Why doesn't everyone have sex in public?

The article covered in the previous post [1] addressed some of these questions.

Sizing up the Possible Motives

In summary of Ben Mocha's paper in the previous post, the researchers hypothesized that the reasons why humans conceal mating activities is to avert jealousy (Malinowski), envy (Symons), competition (Van Schaik), and social discord (Friedl).

Let's see what the Bible says about this.

> [7] Then their eyes were opened, and they both realized that they were naked. They sewed fig leaves together and made clothes for themselves.
>
> [10] He answered, "I heard you in the garden. I was afraid because I was naked, so I hid."
> [11] God asked, "Who told you that you were naked? Did you eat fruit from the tree I commanded you not to eat from?"
> [12] The man answered, "That woman, the one you gave me, gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it."
>
> [21] The Lord God made clothes from animal skins for the man and his wife and dressed them.
>
> [23] So the Lord God sent the man out of the Garden of Eden to farm the ground from which the man had been formed. [24] After he sent the man out, God placed angels and a flaming sword that turned in all directions east of the Garden of Eden. He placed them there to guard the way to the tree of life.
>
> Selected passages from Genesis 3 (GW)

Based on the passage from Genesis, the reason people wear clothes is because they are afraid. (Wearing clothes is symbolic of sexual concealment.) We can assume that seeing the nakedness of others causes people to feel afraid as well.

Deti argued that shame is a demotivator [emphasis mine].

> "Shame" is embarrassment, humiliation, or deprecation that others put on someone. "You ought to be ashamed of yourself."
>
> But originally, "shame" was intended to correct people who were making private things public. Or taking the private into the public realm. Revealing things known to a few, to people who are not supposed to know. The concept of shame was to get people to keep private and concealed that which is intended to be private and concealed.
>
> The first "shame" was Adam and Eve knowing they were naked after eating from the tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. Before they ate, Adam and Eve did not know shame. God wanted them protected from it. Afterwards, Adam and Eve knew things they were not supposed to know. They knew things God did not intend > for them to know. They knew they were naked, but were not supposed to know that or have any understanding of nakedness. Because of their shame, God made skins to cover their bodies, so they would not be ashamed. The skins were a symbol of their now-separation from God. The skins and coverings were between them and God.

>
> It's why the only place a man and woman are to be naked/nude together is in marriage. Because before that, you aren't to let others see you uncovered. They are seeing things they do not have a right to see. And you don't have a right to allow them to see you uncovered. You're not theirs; and they are not yours."

By extension, similar to the human habit of wearing clothes, the preference for privacy during coitus is meant to avert or conceal shame. As Deti said (in bold), this privacy forms a boundary between the couple and the larger society. It prevents others from gaining the knowledge of their bodies and their intimacy.

The Connection between Motives and Behavior

Three more questions arise at this point. These will be covered in this section.

1. Why are people afraid of nakedness and PDSA?
2. Why did God make clothes instead of dealing with the fear aspect directly?
3. Why are some people, under certain circumstances, NOT afraid of nakedness and PDSA? In other words, why do some people have no fear of getting it on in the park or on OnlyFans?

To answer the first question, people could be afraid of what Ben Mocha mentioned (i.e. jealousy, envy, mating competition, and social disruption), and also shame, as Deti said. So this makes sense.

But if we come at this from a different perspective, I can imagine other reasons why some people would be afraid of public nakedness and PDSA. As Deti alluded, it is basically because the spectators might gain an unwanted psychological knowledge. To break this down further, this knowledge could include any of the following.

- Being overwhelmed by desire, lust, or anger, and possibly losing self-control.
- That they are missing out on the action.

- That their sex appeal and/or sexual performance doesn't measure up to that of others.
- The heart-pounding temptation of joining in on the fun, even if only imagined.

We shall see that Ben Mocha's paper [1] actually integrates the first three psychological effects [i.e. carnal knowledge] into his theory, which was described in the previous post, and will be further discussed below. The fourth point is covered in the next section.

Concerning the second question, God did not respond by giving Adam the bluster talk, to "get over your fear", but instead, God made clothes for them, which required the death of animals – the first sacrifice for sin. We can only assume that God, in His divine justice, deemed that the creation of this boundary was the best response to the situation.

This third question, which is the overriding topic of this post, might be answered by assuming the converse of Ben Mocha's Cooperative Maintenance Hypothesis, which states that concealed mating is a behavioral mating strategy used (1) to maintain mating control over partner(s), (2) to prevent sexual arousal in witnesses, and (3) to maintain cooperation with group members. That is to say, people abandon their fear of nakedness and PDSA when…

1. They do not care about maintaining mating control over partner(s).
2. They are not concerned that witnesses might feel envy or jealousy.
3. They do not care that witnesses may be sexually aroused (or they actually wish to incite sexual arousement, as in the case of porn actors and OnlyFans girls).
4. There is no perceived risk that cooperation with group members might be lost.

If/when the above conditions are met, absent social norms, the public intercourse of socially acceptable pairings would not be objectionable. So an unacceptable pairing must be done on the sly.

I'll revisit these four qualifications in the last section.

The Eroticism behind the Risk of Unconcealed Sex

There is another very strong motivation to engage in unconcealed sex, or sex in public spaces, which must not go unmentioned, and that is the fact that the experience is extremely thrilling. Concerning the example of John Legend and Chrissy Teigen, Elspeth wrote,

> And since all of this reported public activity is with her husband and the father of her kids, this isn't really about cuckoldry, whatever my disdain for her vulgar ranting and political hack-ness, LOL. It really is about understanding that this particular act is a private one, not to be seen by others. The risk element was the point, not exhibitionism.
>
> I contend that the reason all of humanity intuitively understands the need to cover our nakedness in sexual activity is because we can not – in our essence – be equated with or qualitatively be compared to, animals.

On this topic, I received a private message from a reader who wishes to remain anonymous. He makes this intrigue crystal clear.

> I have noticed one thing that is universally true of every woman I have ever been with. (N=22)
>
> To a person, they are all more orgasmic/passionate/crazy as a function of how likely it is we will get "caught".
>
> This is true of even the nicest "good girls". My girlfriend in HS used to love doing it in places in her parents' house where they might walk in at any time. She LOVED it! She was the definition of girl next door sweetheart. 21 women later (and every one in between), my wife is the same way. The middle of the day, kids might walk in at any moment. She goes crazy. The possibility of getting caught is extremely arousing.
>
> The "fear of getting caught" thing is not about anything other than perception. All you have to do is create a situation for them to believe there is an aggregated increased risk.
>
> After all, women are chickens. Most of them don't actually want to get caught.
>
> They want to feel like they might get caught.
>
> See the difference?
>
> All women are excited by the "naughty" kind of sex. Every one of them.

SFC Ton also expressed this same truth, saying,

> "I'm certain that [having sex openly] was true for Adam and Eve, but things have changed.
>
> I've not yet meet the b!tch who doesn't get off on some version of public sex. And I'm pretty sure girls are noisy [viz. openly flaunting their sexuality] to see if they can pull someone stronger to wallpaper her baby maker with baby batter.
>
> That sex is private now probably has more to do with dudes wanting the security and folks having enough cash to not be crammed into the same room as the rest of their family.

I should add that this phenomenon is only effective if the woman is already super hot for the man, as Scotts Axiom states.

Applying the Converse CMH

In this section, I'll review some settings in which unconcealed sex and nudity is common, and show how they fit all four of the qualifications given at the end of the previous section, The Connection between Motives and Behavior.

Some secular Manosphere sites, such as The Red Quest, discuss specific applications of non-monogamy, such as sex parties, in which mating is not concealed from others. In this case, we find that it fits all four qualifications mentioned above. That is, there is little to no concern about controlling the mating behavior of one's partner; they are not concerned whether others might feel envious or jealous (and if they are and it shows, then they are booted out of the party and never invited back); they seek to incite sexual arousement, not avoid it; and the cooperation with group members is centered around the sexual activity. Of note however, it still remains important that the entire sex party remains concealed from the wider public, similar to conventional norms surrounding marital sex.

When we look at women who bare their bodies and perform sex acts to a live audience (e.g. a strip bar), or an online audience (e.g. OnlyFans), we find that it meets all four qualifications given above. That is, they are either not concerned, or not aware of any risk in maintaining mating control over partner(s) (although it is obviously there); they are not concerned that witnesses might feel envy or jealousy (bouncers or internet distancing keep this in check); they do not care whether witnesses are sexually aroused or not (but if they are, then this is seen as a positive); and because of the setting (in the case of the strip bar) or disintermediation (in the case of OnlyFans), there is little to no perceived risk that cooperation with group members might be lost. So within this context, if PDSA is acceptable to all participants, then it can be overt without any immediately perceptible damage done. The element of concealment is porous, but somewhat controlled by subscriptions and the like.

In recent years, there has been a surge of nude protests. There are several reasons for prancing predication, including…

- A deliberate tactic to attract attention and publicity from the media.
- It is claimed that public nudity is a legitimate form of expression covered by the right to free ~~spread~~ speech.
- The vulnerability of being nude tends to reduce conflict and retaliation, as was demonstrated in the case of Naked Athena in the 2020 Portland protests.

- Some protesters seek to increase cultural and legal acceptance of public nudity.

"Naked Athena" in the 2020 Portland protests.

If we assess nude protests according to the four qualifications of the converse CMH, we see that mating control is displaced by the focus on social activism; the brashness of being in the buff tends to elicit respect, rather than envy, jealousy, or sexual arousement; and the cooperation with others is either disregarded or enveloped by group action. Because it is done deliberately as a social protest, the backlash from the community is minimized, as compared to the reaction to one basking in the sunlight for the all-over tan.

Examples of couples like John Legend and Chrissy Teigen also fit the mold. They seem very secure in their relationship, such that they are confident that they have mating control over each other. (Perhaps their escapades in public places increase their confidence!); They might be concerned that witnesses might feel envy or jealousy, but this is accepted as part of the titillating risk; they might think it to be funny or a memorable experience if chance witnesses became emotionally or sexually aroused; and due to their wealth and status, the specific risk of negative social repercussions is minimized. In fact, in Legend and Teigen's case, it actually enhances their bawdy reputation!

Someone might bring up the example of nudist colonies, but they would be mistaken. I've talked to people who participated in this sub-culture, and they said public sex was not evident. Even though people might walk around in the buff, it is expected that all participants should restrain their passions. People still expect to be respected, maybe even more so. So the common impression that nudist colonies are an orgy of flesh is patently false.

However, the Converse CMH still answers the question of why the participants in nudist colonies do not feel the need to cover up. Maintaining mating control doesn't seem to be an issue. The possibility of witnesses feeling envy or jealousy is roundly ignored. The fact that witnesses might become sexually aroused is denied or dismissed. Due to the organization of the nudist colony, which has clear rules, there is no perceived risk that cooperation with group members might be lost. Of note, nudist colonies are well concealed by select membership, remote location, and fencing.

As for the element of shame… Well, it comes as no surprise that these people are simply shameless!

References

1. Yitzchak Ben Mocha, "Why do human and non-human species conceal mating? The cooperation maintenance hypothesis", The Royal Society, (2020 August 5) Alternate source.

Related

- Σ Frame: Nudity and Respect (2018 February 21)

The Train Wreck – Speculative causes, influences, and alternate outcomes

Novaseeker · 1 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

What has she NOT been saying?

Readership: All
Author's Note: The content of this post is based on email conversations between NovaSeeker and Jack.
Reader's Note: This post continues discussing The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). Readers may like to read this post first before continuing.
Length: 4,200 words
Reading Time: 17 minutes

Introduction

In my previous post, The Slow Train Wreck — A Cautionary Tale (2021 January 18), I discussed a frightening case study. The story started off with a typical suburban wife with two kids, active in serving in her church, and apparently very happy. Then she discovered the online world of Instagram and OnlyFans, and something propelled her into the dark world of the online amateur sex industry.

This post will convey some speculations about how or why this could have happened, including some possible influences. We'll also discuss some other outcomes that may or may not have been possible.

A Few Thoughts to Consider

1. The lifespan of a typical marriage in the U.S. is reported to be 7 years. If a couple can make it past 7 years, they are likely to stay in it for the long haul. H+W's marriage broke down right at the 7-year mark.
2. Is it possible that only the popularity and attention could be responsible for pulling her away from family and children to make this transition?

3. Jack and I both suspected that, sometime during her rise to stardom, W must have had some kind of sexual experience that corrupted her mind. This experience could have been something like having a lesbian affair, a tryst with a handsome photographer (or pastor?), or sleeping her way to stardom (having sexual liaisons in exchange for certain opportunities for promotion). But of course, she would never talk about such an experience. Is there any evidence for this being the case?
4. Feminism has had a weighty influence on western society and women in particular. Does this show up as a factor that tipped W over the ledge?
5. Red Pilled men know that women are easily guided by the herd mentality. Did the W have any influence from other women that would lead her this way?
6. Was W anything of a gold-digger? Did she have the innate desire for money, wealth, and luxury?
7. It is assumed that there has to be a bit of reciprocal cooperation for a train wreck to happen, or at least consent from the spouse, even if that simply means looking the other way and taking no action. This is exactly what H did.

In the remainder of this post, we'll discuss each of these ideas.

The Seven Year Itch (1955), Tom Ewell, Marilyn Monroe

1. The Seven Year Itch

Early on in my research on this story, I noticed the marriage started to break apart right at 7 years (2016, when W made her "self-discovery" regarding her sexual orientation), and that this fits the wider profile of marriage "data".

The seven-year mark was when things started to unravel, and then the following year (H=36, W=33 , M+8, 2017), things really started to take off.

I think another "time" element is the age of the children. When the eldest reaches the age of going to school (including pre-school), the "post-nesting" mindset can creep in, meaning that she seeks to evaluate other options for re-mating, or at least getting out of this nest. (In the past, this behavior was taken as a male trait, but these days, females are adopting many male traits, particularly because they can currently do this without suffering any adverse financial consequences.) If there are other, younger, kids around who are not old enough for preschool yet, then this can be tamped a bit, and I think this played a role here, at least in part, in terms of delaying the process of unraveling by a year or two.

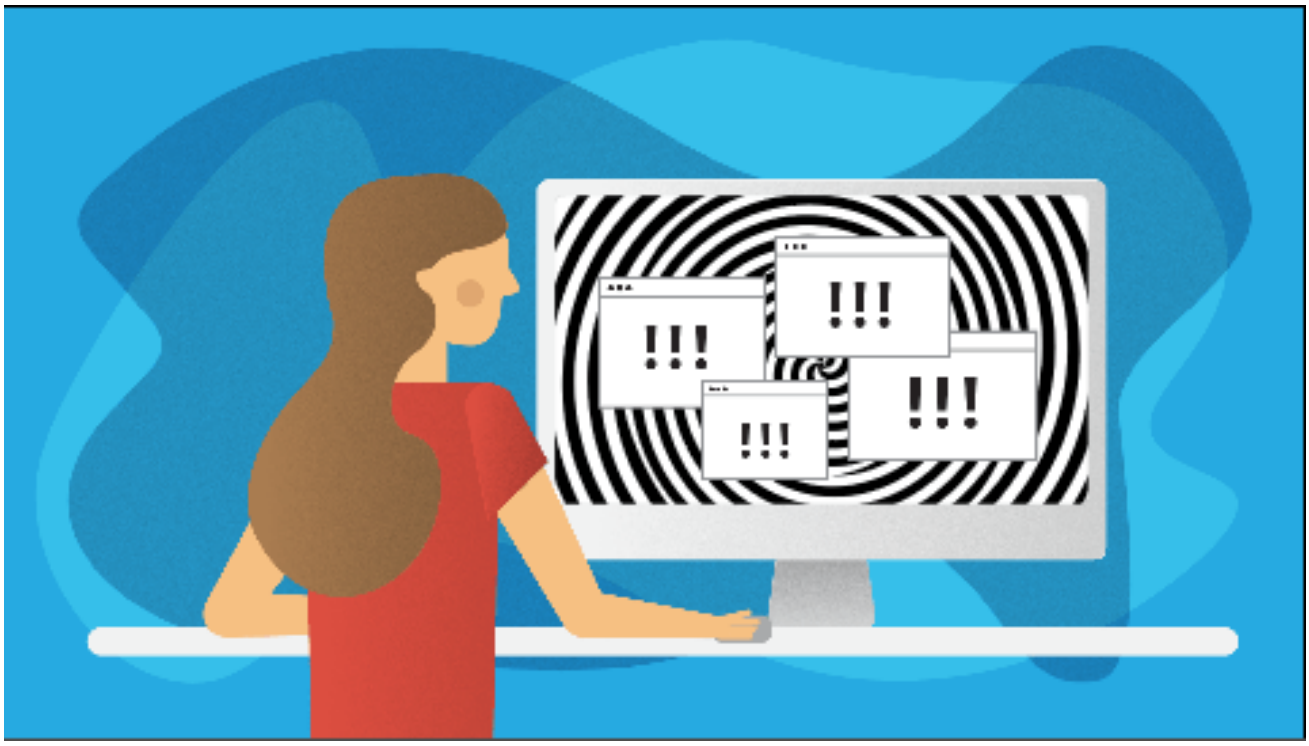
Kid #3 was born in 2016, and when W finally pushed things over the cliff in 2019, she didn't have any children who were younger or on the way who would encourage her to tamper down her instinct to leave the nest. In 2020, she knew that all the kids would be of pre-school age, with the oldest being 10, so she was ready to re-nest.

Finally, Rollo Tomassi's well-known theory is that women often progress on a life trajectory that is roughly as follows: (1) the "party years" from 18-29.999999999999 when hypergamy rules all dating choices, (2) the "epiphany phase" of lane-changing, seeking different men for pairing than in the party years, and marriage, and (3) the "re-seeking alpha" phase in the mid to later 30s, when the woman leaves her husband/partner to seek more sexually hypergamous mates while she is still young/attractive enough to do so effectively. In this scheme, it is worth noting that W is 35 by the time she leaves, which puts her comfortably in the "re-seeking alpha" behavioral age range.

In summary, all of the timings lined up like a constructive interference:

- The 7-8-year itch, when things really started to change inside W in ways that made the marriage shakier.
- The desire to seek alternative mates (re-nest), based on youngest child's age.
- Rollo's "re-seeking alpha" phase in the mid to late 30s.



2. Addiction to Attention and Affirmation

It is also possible that W is such an attention addict that the attention she was getting from her Instagram followers in and of itself encouraged her to blow up the marriage in spectacular fashion.

I think in the case of W, however, it appears that it was more that she reconceived her self-image, bought into a new set of ideas, and so on, and this was happening around the same time that she was also, on a parallel track, discovering that she liked having an audience — a LOT — due to her public speaking and preaching that was taking place during that period. I think then the two tracks got merged in her head, and once she ditched the church due to adopting her "LGBT" identity and the related ideology, the track that related to craving the audience and attention got rolled into the new ideology, and her new life plan emerged. Instagram of course plays a role here, too, because she starts at some point to get a lot more comments on her appearance, and this also feeds the "audience"/attention track that was developing within her.

So you have all of these mingling and interacting inside W:

- The "LGBT" stuff and her growing adherence to feminism and its sex positive variant.
- Her growing awareness of the depth of her craving for attention and an audience and doing what it takes to attract and maintain that.
- Instagram, and later OnlyFans, providing just that by means of her appearance and sexiness.

Put all of those together and the "new W" emerges out of the other end of the chrysalis at some stage.

3. Sexual Defilement

Jack and I both had the same thought — Didn't there have to be some kind of actual sexual event here that put her firmly in the direction she was on?

If this did happen, she has covered it up more or less completely, which is normally what you would expect a woman to do, because that's what women do in this culture about their infidelities. It would mess up her story royally if she had an affair with a photographer or something. Again, nothing even hints of this in her feed, but that doesn't mean it didn't happen. It's true that W has been very outlierish for someone in her chosen line of work in terms of not separating her private and "professional" lives (as almost everyone in that industry does for numerous reasons), despite her kids (I mean heck they are on the same feed as her softcore porn Instagram), but that still doesn't mean that there isn't something she is hiding.

It does make logical sense that there was some sexual event like an affair or something that set this off, sometime in 2016 or 2017, but if there was, we will likely never know. Rollo explicitly asked this question to her H a few times in his interview, but her husband doesn't seem to think so. Then again, there were a lot of things he was missing at the time and not seeing so he may not have noticed and even today not have any basis to know. Women can be very good at hiding this specific thing if they're determined to do so.

There is, however, one tell in that area. She does talk about how she is sexually free, and how she had a hard time realizing her own pleasure and so on. At some point in the 2016-2018 period it appears she became more adept at having an orgasm (giving herself orgasms, it would appear), and it seems unlikely that the H was the origin of this discovery. It seems much more likely, based on what she does say (which is not much, it's bits and hints here and there), that she either learned this with another lover during this period or, perhaps, by looking at feminist sex-poz orgasm education material. Either is possible, but given how she looks, and what she was doing at the time, my money would be on the lover option. It could have been another girl, could have been a guy. I don't read her as particularly lesbian at all (and she fairly recently claimed that she has never had sex with woman), but my guess is that at some point in her transition, someone really rang her bell, hard, and taught her how to do so, and seeing how this apparently had never happened with H, then this became another problem for H. H of course doesn't mention this, but that's the kind of thing you don't expect a man to mention because it points the finger at his sexual prowess and, in any case, it is possible, even likely, that W never mentioned this to H specifically as well.

Of course, care needs to be taken here, because this is purely speculative based on snippets of what W says here and there. She never says any of that explicitly, but if you read the tea leaves it's at least even money that it's there. It would just make sense of everything.

4. Feminist Inculcation

Deti famously said that "ALL women born after about 1960 are marinated in feminism and are feminists". We can see this clearly in W. She has been a feminist and a progressive since she was young. She may not have been militant about it, but she was a feminist. She also was rebellious from a younger age. She tussled with her parents as a teen about body piercings and such, and was sexually active in high school behind her parents' backs. Her prominent nose ring isn't recent, she had it before she met H. She also probably has a higher N than H suggested (although reviewing the interview with Rollo he never really said what her N actually was but that he knew it wasn't 0 when they married).

In sum, she wasn't pure at the time of marriage, and she was also a feminist from the beginning, just not "LGBT"-identifying. The picture that is emerging is that she was a more typical soft left feminist college grad who was still a Christian (at least nominally) when she married and thereafter, but in no way was she a conservative Christian when she was married or thereafter. She may have been in an evangelical megachurch, and may have agreed on the teachings about "LGBT" at the time, but otherwise she was a soft left feminist the whole way who later became a more hard left feminist with the "LGBT" stuff coming into the picture.

5. Herd Influences

W had a sea change in perspective during early 2017, and I am fairly certain the ideas came from somewhere outside her own head.

Jack and I both read comments somewhere that said, "[W] changed when she started hanging out with Glennon Doyle and Amanda Frances." I didn't really see much in W's feed or other articles about her situation that links into much about either of them, apart from a couple of mentions in her feed about reading Glennon Doyle's books. Still they could very well have influenced her. I am sure that she interfaced with quite a bit of online feminism and empowerment personas, and I think this is a key to when her mind began to be influenced in that direction.

Glennon Doyle's story, as rough as it may be, is pretty different from W. Doyle is very much on the lesbian side of "bi", and W, as we've seen, is not — W's "bi" is much more theoretical than actual and lived. Glennon went from a straight monogamy situation to a lesbian monogamy situation, and W became a basically straight sex worker. There were influences from "LGBT" ideology in terms of sex positivity and female physical/sexual empowerment, but it seems like they were broader and much less of the "lesbian marriage" type. Also Doyle seems to really dislike men (unless they are like her puppy dog/doormat ex-husband), sexually and otherwise, like most radfems do, and something that also seems to happen with "bi" women who opt for the lesbian side (misandry is as common as dirt in the lesbian world). However, W is clearly not like this. She likes men and male sexual attention, but wants them on her own terms.

Amanda Frances seems more likely as an individual source of influence on W because she spouts the same self-empowerment "if you believe it strongly enough, it will happen" claptrap, almost verbatim, as W does. But from what I have seen, W doesn't mention her by name. After getting an impression of W through Instagram, I honestly doubt that she came up with the empowerment claptrap all by herself. I think it's likely that she was either influenced by Frances or by whomever/whatever influenced Frances herself.

But still, she was clearly influenced by people like these, even if it was not these two women specifically.

6. $$$

As I was reviewing W's Instagram feed, it became clear to me that while all these other things were happening, she was developing a deep desire to be rich. Not economic security, but rich, as in luxury. She had numerous posts about how much she loves money, how she wants to have a lot of money, how it's garbage to believe that chasing a lot of money is bad, and so on. She is in large part driven by money as an end in itself, not just attention. After she leaves H, this comes into full fruition in terms of her actions and life decisions.

W started her OnlyFans site in October 2019, right after the separation happened and she moved out of the house she shared with H.

At the end of December 2020, the W posted her earnings numbers on OnlyFans for 2020. For the first 9 months of her OF (through June 2020), she was earning between $250 and $400 per month total from the site. Then over the summer of 2020, that increased to around $500 per month, and then in September, which is when her story appeared in the New York Post article, her OF literally blew up over night. In the four months since (Sep, Oct, Nov, Dec of 2020, respectively), W earned 31k, 54k, 20k, and 33k. Her post says that the total lifetime earnings on OnlyFans is 178k gross, but as we can see the last four months' account for 138k of that, and the rest trickled over 11 months. It was basically pocket change until September 2020.

A few takeaways from that information:

1. She must have gotten to know someone who introduced her to the New York Post reporter for that story. It is simply very unlikely that a small-time OnlyFans content provider in Southern California, earning $300-$400 per month, would have attracted the attention of anyone at the New York Post unless she happened to meet one of them by chance, or she met someone else who knew someone at the New York Post and could make an introduction. This event was the critical one for W, because it was after that story in the New York Post, that W's narrative went viral, was covered by many media outlets nationally and internationally, and drew all kinds of attention to her OnlyFans page.
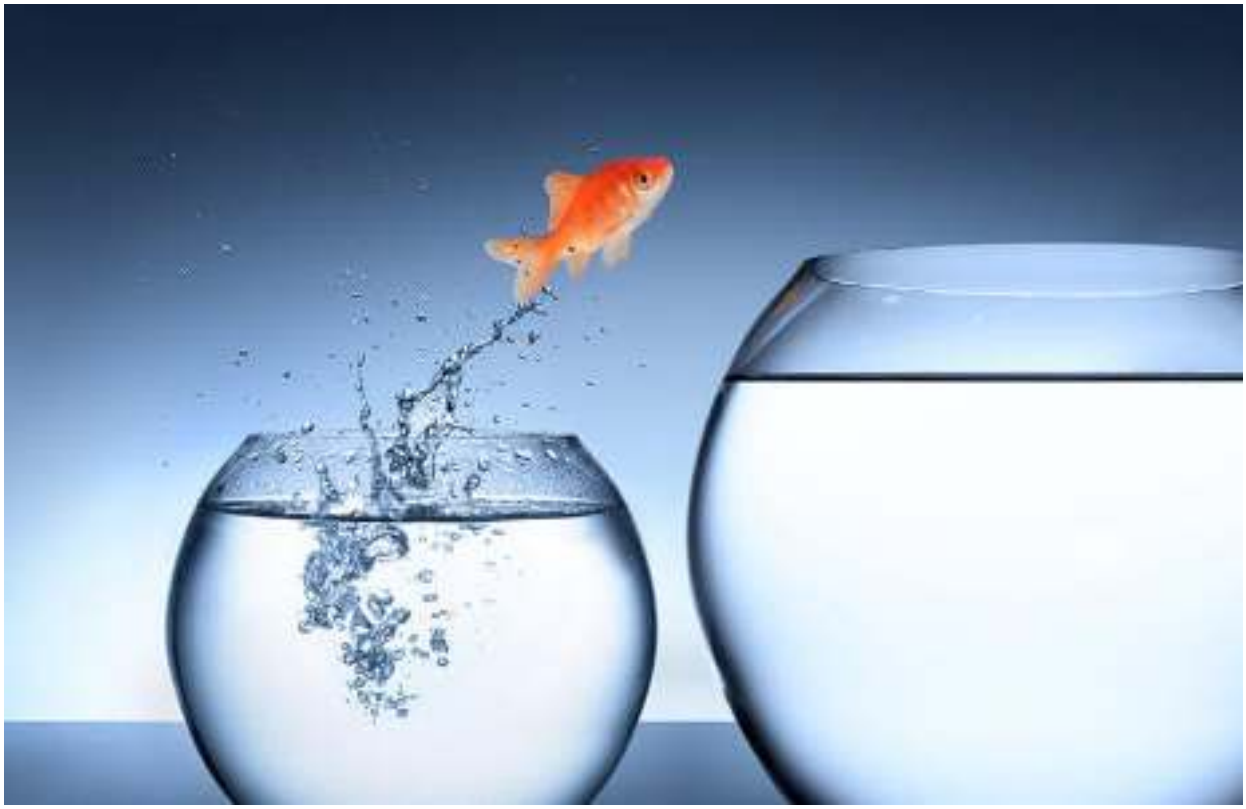
2. W admitted to the New York Post that she had planned to engage in escort-style prostitution back before COVID hit in March (she told the reporter that she had a "date" planned, and that she was okay with the concept of being paid for providing that service, but that she canceled it due to the COVID outbreak), and that would make sense in that she hadn't earned much at OF at all by then. At that time, she had only earned about $1,600 over 5 months. I would guess that the prospect of earning that much or more in 1-2 "dates" was pretty attractive to her at that time.

3. I would further speculate that she went through with that plan (she had, after all, already mentally accepted it as feasible for her), once COVID calmed down, and possibly was engaging in this activity during the summer of 2020 over the summer as well. It seems likely to me that it is at this time that she would have met whomever provided her contact to the New York Post — either someone who worked there or someone who knew someone who did — which led to the story that blew up her business plan. I would speculate that this either happened through recreational "dating" or through escorting, but if I had to guess … given the financial elements involved (she mentioned in the New York Post story that the first foray into that "business line" that she had planned prior to COVID would have involved her being paid a few thousand dollars, so not exactly a cheap trick), it was through the latter.
4. In any case, at this point W's annualized income from OnlyFans, even assuming zero growth, is $400k. If she can keep her OF at this level — heck, if she can manage to keep it at half that level on an annualized basis — she won't need to go into extended "business lines", so my guess is that W will focus on growing and maintaining her OF cash flow, while trying to find other ways to monetize on an even bigger scale — her Instagram hints at plans to try to do talk radio, or reality TV, or something like that.

In summary, W appears to have been very highly motivated by money as an end in itself and, unlike most women who make the choices she has in the pursuit of riches, she appears to have actually cashed in some well-sized chips so far — so she has been effective at leveraging her appearance, her charm (for all of her craziness, she is capable of being quite charming and affable in her manner, as one would expect of a former bartender, and I expect that she has used this to great effect with her OnlyFans subscriber base to retain them from month to month), and leveraging selective personal relationships to great effect. She's focused, and it shows. H admitted to Rollo that, by contrast, they struggled at times financially during the marriage — something which makes me think that W feels quite secure that she did the right thing by leaving H, as evidenced by her bank account.



7. What could her husband have done in response?

H made a lot of mistakes in the marriage, both personality/permissiveness-wise and he seems to have been clumsy sexually as well, while being married to a woman with a very high libido who is prone to throes of extreme passion (that comes out in her writings).

Her husband made a lot of mistakes of permission along the way, and he openly admits these, but at the same time it's very easy to see how this relationship could have gone sideways on any man, given how sweeping and fundamental her transition was, in the end.

On the behavior of the H, yes he certainly cooperated with her without question. He knows he messed up now by facilitating what she was doing and encouraging it, both actively (he was her Instagram cameraman I think at least for a while, as is normal for BF/H types, at least "at first" before the pros get involved) and passively by not hemming her in when lines were crossed again and again.

I do think that it wasn't easy to see that at the time, given their established dynamic. I think that changing a long established relationship dynamic that has been in place since the couple met is virtually impossible — it means essentially starting the relationship from scratch again, and at that point people can (and often do) opt for the exits rather than do the hard work of building a new dynamic.

Now, had he done that anyway, things may have been better by ending things before they got as far as they did. Perhaps she would have ended up differently if she was divorced earlier, who knows? But I don't think that the marriage would have survived that at any time following, say, 2016 when she decided she was LGBT. He needed to push back there, hard — and he sees that now — and he didn't. If he did and she bucked and he insisted on upending the dynamic, they may have ended up divorced then and there, but perhaps she wouldn't have gone down the same road she did otherwise.

I don't think they were equally responsible. She bears a bigger responsibility because she behaved selfishly and narcissistically and seems clearly to have demanded to go the way she had determined, marriage or not. H should have stopped things before they got to that place, but even if he did the marriage would probably have died earlier (again, as I said earlier, perhaps that would have been better, but we don't know that).

She also is reprehensible for having her kids on her sex worker IG feed — even today! She clearly has very poor personal judgment to say the least and is very self-centered and narcissistic. She seems very immature as well for someone of her age — very prone to claptrap and sloganeering and not actual hard stuff, but at the same time she is focused and disciplined in terms of what she wants. It's just that what she wants is quite selfish.

We can look back on everything that happened and see that her husband could have done something to upend the W's transformation process, but it probably would have simply blown up the marriage earlier. And, that could have been better in terms of leading to overall different life outcomes for W, which would have been better for the kids, but that's hard to say. In all, it was a marriage that likely would have been hard to fix, although by far the best shot H had was after she went faux-LGBT, and he failed to do it. Once he did, it was likely impossible to save the marriage, and the further things went on, the worse she got.

Conclusions

In all a tawdry affair all around, sadly. I feel slimed by having delved into it so far, but at the same time the dive has clarified many things and makes the whole situation a lot less mystifying and more intelligible. The “fall from grace” wasn’t really a thing. She was always a bit of a rebel, a feminist, and very sexual. This kind of thing was always a somewhat higher potential in her than in other women, I think. but not to the degree that she was an outlier — there are plenty of other women with W’s profile out there who are not outliers and have the same profile of soft feminist, highly sexual, and a bit rebellious when younger. Of course until recently, things like OF simply didn’t exist so what she is doing would not have been possible, but it does, so it is.

It’s a true train wreck — horrible but fascinating at the same time and hard to look away from. I also think that the story is important for men, because of what happened. Not because of what W did specifically — although in that regard it does call into mind a new set of risks that simply didn’t exist for men even 10 years ago! But it’s important to see the kind of dynamic of events of how things can unravel slowly and the kinds of things you need to look for and act upon when they are happening. It’s an important story for men to read and reflect upon I think.

Anyway, I’m officially done with researching this topic and slogging through the slime of the OASIS. But I felt it needed to be done in faith so that others wouldn’t have to do so themselves or, even worse, live through what H just did. There’s something about reviewing the train wrecks that serves to clarify our vision and to be more circumspect, thankful, and hopeful.

Related

- The Rational Male: The Wrong Girl (2019 July 19)
- The Rational Male: Heirs of the Blank Slate (2019 July 26)

The Soul Mate Myth

Oscar · 3 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Is the hope for a Soul Mate a mythos or a myth?

Readership: All
Reader's Note: In this post, a myth is defined as being a set of superstitious beliefs or assumptions about something, and is compared to myth or mythos, defined in literature and psychology as a traditional or recurrent narrative theme or plot structure.
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

Recently on Σ Frame, the article titled, The Meet Cute Phenomenon (Scott's Axiom) (2020/12/6), racked up an impressive count of 153 comments as of this writing. Clearly, the subject struck a chord.

Several commenters brought up the *Soul Mate Myth (AKA, The One)*. Now, Scott's idea of the Meet Cute is NOT the same thing as the Soul Mate Myth (SMM). The Meet Cute is when a woman goes nuts over a man and this event starts up a relationship. The SMM is an expression of a sinful dream of self-completion that creates unrealistic expectations and prevents one from participating in real opportunities that come up in life. Frustration is the result.

Because of the confusion surrounding this matter, I'd like to explore this a little further.

What is the Soul Mate myth?

Supposedly, there is a person somewhere out there for everyone. A person who is a perfect fit for you, and no one else, and when you meet that person, you'll just know it. The following scene from Sleepless in Seattle illustrates the concept magnificently.

Tom Hanks' character is very sensibly explaining to his son that "no one is a perfect fit", when he literally stops mid-sentence, completely forgetting what he was saying, because he saw *her… the one… his soul mate. He doesn't know her name, he hasn't even met her, but his intellect is powerless to protest, because deep in his heart, he just knows.

It matters not that he was once married, and is now a widower (was his first wife ever the one?), or that he's currently dating another woman (she's definitely not the one), he just knows.

This is a common romantic trope. But why is it so powerful?

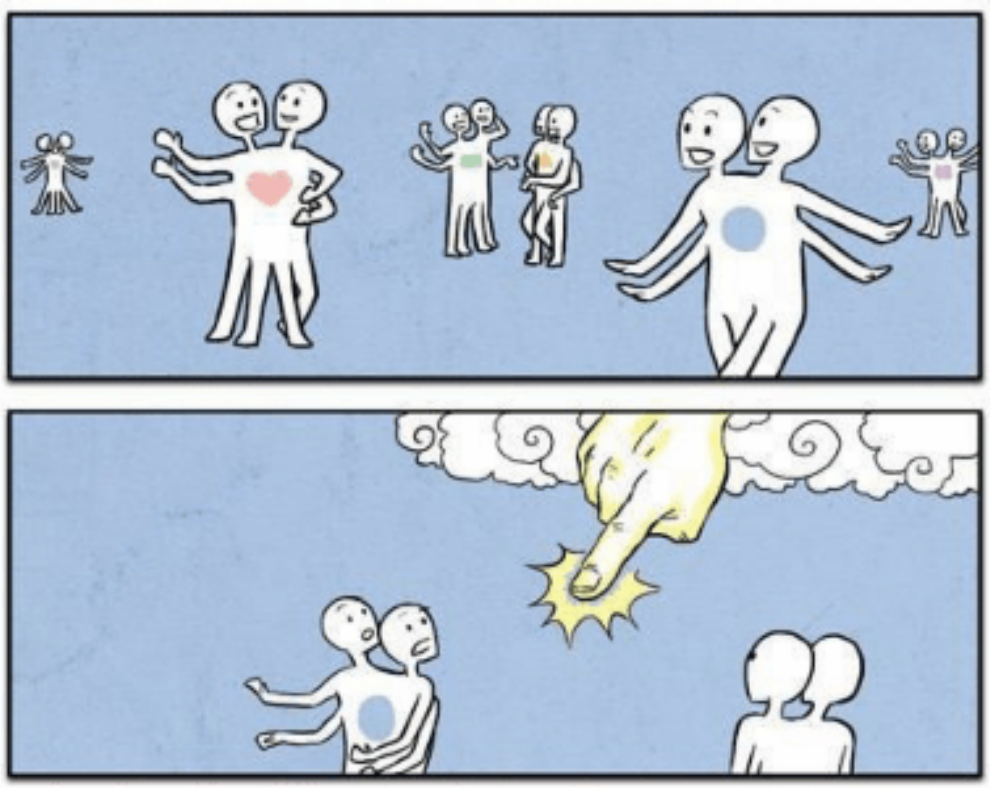
The Soul Mate Myth is my favorite example of culture's power to transmit ideas over generations. Pretty much everyone in American culture has heard it, believes it, hopes for it, and yet hardly anyone knows of its origins in Greek mythology. Plato explained it in his Symposium (simp – osium? Heh!).

You can read Plato's full explanation in the following link…

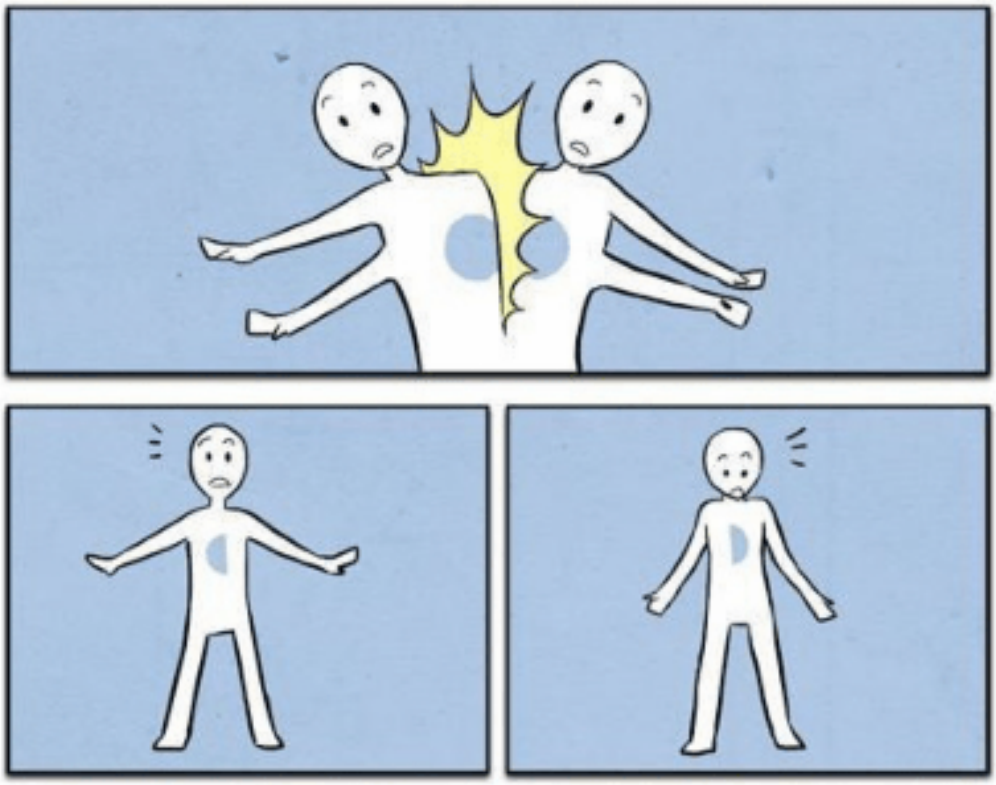
Ancient Greece Reloaded: Aristophanes' speech from Plato's Symposium (2019/8/3)

…but I'll summarize it for those who, understandably, would rather not take the time.

Basically, the gods created mankind as two-in-one beings.



Mankind's two-in-one form made them too powerful for the gods' comfort, so Zeus split them apart.



But, the gods had already created all the souls of every human that would ever be born, so they also had to be split in two. That means that you were born as a half of a whole, destined to pine, and long for your other half, your soul mate, your… The One… without whom you'll never feel whole. Hence, the dreadful Oneitis.

This silly myth might seem cute, even romantic, but it destroys marriages, and therefore families, and therefore communities, and therefore nations.

You see, as the story goes, when you meet your soul mate, everything will just "work out". Marriage will be easy.

It therefore stands to reason that, if marriage becomes difficult (as a union of two sinners tends to do), then you must not be married to your ever blessed soul mate. In fact, that means your "true" soul mate is somewhere out there, pining for you, longing for you, thirsting to be made whole…. by you! So, now you must abandon your difficult marriage and go search for your soul mate! In fact, it's the compassionate thing to do, because in doing so you grant your current non-soul-mate spouse the freedom to go find his/her soul mate!

Worse still, Christians believe this myth. In fact, they attempt to justify it. It's Yaweh, not Zeus, you see, that has one special person selected just for you, and no one else! The two of you are like Isaac and Rebecca! Don't think about inconvenient inconsistencies, like widows, and widowers, or theological principles like which Old Testament stories are prescriptive, and which are descriptive… No! Don't think at all, because like Tom Hanks in Sleepless in Seattle, you'll just know!

That is, until you, or your spouse, get the seven-year itch. Then, all of a sudden, you're not so sure anymore.

Conclusions

Here's the reality for us Christians. Some people are more compatible in values, personality, interests, etc. with each other than others. Regardless of how they come together (dating, courting, arranged marriage, whatever) marriage sanctifies their union. God makes them one upon marriage. From that point forward, through a long process of sanctification, they grow together, and become intertwined in ways that St. Paul described as "a great mystery" (Ephesians 5:32). I'm in the middle of that process, and I don't comprehend it.

What do we do with this information? We renew our minds. We purge our own minds of the myth, and we inoculate our children against it by explaining to them where it comes from, and what God's word actually says about marriage.

Scott once said that you won't know if you have true love until you reach the end. I got to see that with my parents. My dad died at 86 due to a series of strokes. He was bedridden for weeks. My mom cared for him until the end. After he died, I helped my mom dress him in his only suit at the funeral home, because she said "he wouldn't want anyone else to take care of him". Afterward, she told me that she felt empty inside.

That's what it means to become one.

To me, true love looks like an elderly lady spoon feeding her bedridden husband, knowing he has days to live. I pray my wife and I will get there some day.

Related

- What If?: Soul Mates
- Dalrock: "The one" vs "my one and only" (2012/10/28)
- The Rational Male: The Soul Mate Myth (2012/10/29)
- The Rational Male: Disassembling ONEitis (2016/12/28)
- Dalrock: Her soul essence is your master, and sets the terms for oneness. (2018/3/5)
- Dalrock: Complementarian soul essence. (2018/3/9)

Something's not right... (about Sexual Authority)

Jack · 5 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Falling in love" with her places you at her behest.

Readership: Christian Men
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

Oscar wrote,

> "Hot chicks tend to be more rebellious because they can get away with it. On top of that, rebellious women (whether hot or not) tend to be more sexually available, and sexually adventurous, which – let's face it – is exciting to most men."

In this post, I'll relay a case study I found at reddit/RPChristians about a man who "fell in love" with a woman who is unsuitable for marriage, and then I'll Frame this man's experience from a Red Pill perspective that will make it more easily understandable from a Christian viewpoint.

Actually, RPChristians is full of stories like this – Christian men who "fall in love" with a hottie, and then suffer from confusion and have doubts about their faith. Then they come to RPChristians looking for an answer. Unfortunately, a rational explanation and some good advice is not going to solve their problem, because it's too late. They've already gotten high on the p00n hooch.

So first, here's the story.

Case Study: Husky Viper

A younger man (husky-viper) posted this story on reddit/RPChristians about a month ago.

He has a follow up post here.

TLDR: He "fell in love" with a young woman who is obviously an unbeliever and is therefore unsuitable for pursuing a marriage with. Now he's in a quandary because his ego is invested, his libido is entrenched in the relationship, and he's psychologically obsessed with her.

Most of the responses there have been about how he should get away from her, and this would be the standard Christian advice.

The secular RP response would be [my paraphrase],

> "Don't be lame. Hone up your game, maintain frame, bang the dame, and don't take the blame!"

The Reframe

Men will usually expect to feel for a woman what Husky Viper feels about this woman. Men are just like women in this sense, in that they strongly desire to follow their feelings, instead of their faith. Then, like Husky Viper, after stumbling into this, they are faced with the difficult task of playing the mate missionary, trying to "make her become a Christian" and so on, or otherwise, at least someone worthy of a Christian marriage. It's just like Christian women who want to take the same approach with Chads.

Good luck with that!

But the reason why she is unsuitable is not the reason he, nor anyone else thinks. The reason she is unsuitable is not because she is worldly, an atheist, a Mormon, a feminist, has blue hair, has had N partners in the past, is a single mother, or whatever other reason might be posing a psychological roadblock — all the things that come to mind whenever we are warned with the verse, "Do not be unequally yoked" (2nd Corinthians 6:14) in church, or from reading about vetting qualifications in the Manosphere, and so on.

No. All that tripe is hogwash. The real reason she is unsuitable is simply because he's obsessed with her, and she is not obsessed with him. It needs to be the other way around.

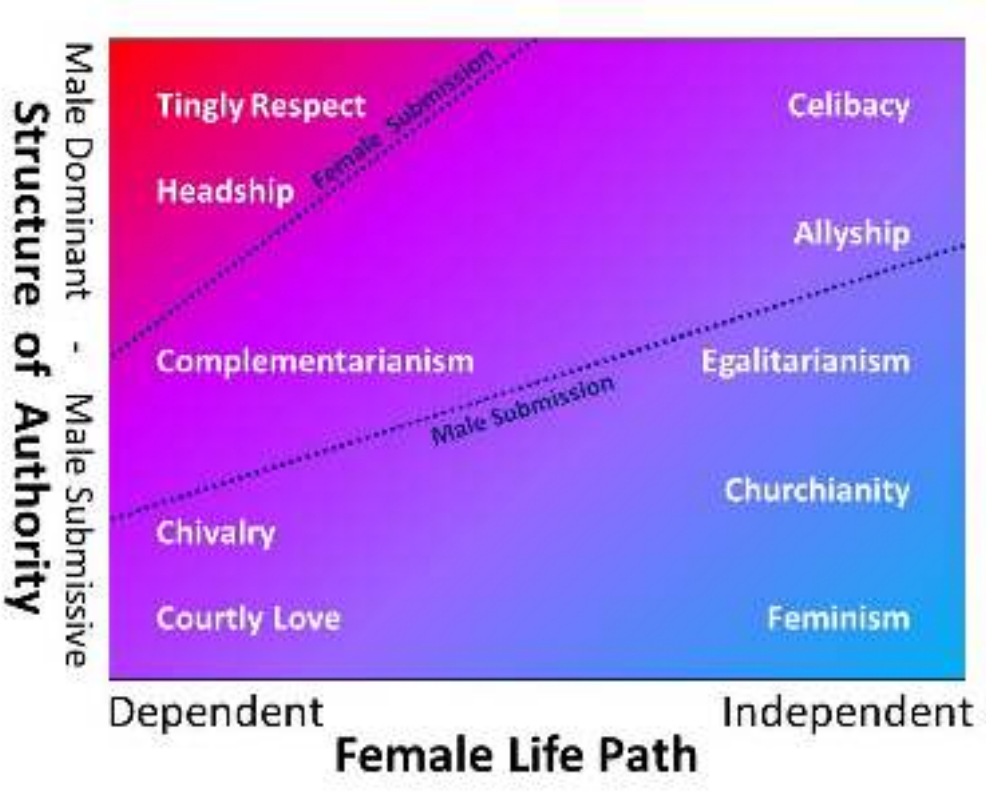
The reason it needs to be the other way around is because if she is really into him, then there's a chance that she might change her mind about any belief that she holds, and change her ways about any habit which doesn't fit the stereotypical Christian life of faith.

Another reason it needs to be the other way around is because that would make it a Headship or Tingly Respect type of relationship structure, by definition, which is what would be necessary for the relationship to have a chance at glorifying God.

In marriage, it is more important for a man to have sexual authority over his wife for several reasons, including,

- It satiates her fleshly nature, leading to less drama and more peace in the home.
- It reduces the wife's inclination, willingness, and overall ability to stray or rebel.
- It makes it easier for him to rule over his household.

But the way it is with Husky Viper (and others like him), we're looking at some type of relationship structure that is below the Male Submission line (in the graph below), and who knows which one it might develop into?



Intrinsic Sexual Authority

Scott's description of the Meet Cute phenomena is a situation where the man has sexual authority over the woman.

In contrast, Husky Viper's experience is a great description of how a woman has sexual authority over a man.

I talked about Sexual Authority before.

> "Sexual Market Value (SMV) as the Manosphere has described it, is a subjective, backward way of attaching a quantitative handle on one's intrinsic sexual authority, for the convenience of discussion. That is to say, when we speak of someone's SMV, we are basically talking about how much sexual authority that person can command.
>
> Sexual authority is not explicitly limited to sexual intercourse and sexualized intersexual liaisons. It also extends to envelop one's ability to garner attention, investment, popularity, and favor. Sexual authority enhances one's social prowess and enhances one's overall quality of life."

The difference between sexual authority and SMV is that SMV is a generalized rating that most men will intuitively agree upon, while sexual authority is the overpowering emotional and visceral effect that one person has on another. Thus, it is quite possible that a person who is ostensibly a poor choice of a mate could have sexual authority over a Christian. We see this dynamic all too frequently, as all the stories at RPChristians show.

In addition, many worldly women have learned the tricks and techniques that a woman can use to snag a man's undying love and devotion. This is what makes them overtly attractive – and dangerous!

Why is love always backwards?

When a man wonders why he can't "fall in love" with a "nice Christian woman" to marry, he's usually thinking with the wrong head, and looking in the wrong pool of eligibles.

> "…when a man and woman are "just friends" it's usually the man who wants to be in a romantic relationship but the woman does not. And generally, similar reasons apply as to why she's happy with the situation. She is already getting many of the non-sexual benefits of a boyfriend or even of marriage without having to actually date him. It's almost certain the woman in this friend zone situation is well aware that the man has romantic feelings for her. That is why I categorize these types of relationships as exploitative."
>
> The Masculinist (Aaron M. Renn): How To Get Out Of The Friend Zone (2020 November 16)

Not only is it exploitative, men actually hunt and hope for such experiences!

Remember the axiom, Men love ideologically!?

In fact, the church fully endorses this perverse relational archetype, as Anon pointed out under Deep Strength's post, The friend zone is the same as feminism in the female life path (2021 January 12).

> "Unfortunately "friends first" is often pushed in the American churches as the best way to go about seeking a mate. "They were friends first!" is an exclamation I've heard more than once from a proud parent, or pastor. In at least two cases it was painfully obvious to me at least that the girl was settling for a man, rather than head-over-heels crazy.
>
> "Friends first" is possibly just another version of "courting", which worked for some and failed for others. To reiterate, it's not a bad thing per se, but when it's pushed as the bestest way to seek a wife, it's very flawed."

Yes, just as the church feeds feminine fantasies leading to doom, the church also coaxes the male fantasy of female pedestalization by way of idealizing the "falling in love" experience as being concomitant with the "Friends" archetype. This heresy follows the popular 90s sitcom and exacerbates the sex-specific weaknesses that are already present in men and women.

Epilogue

Men, especially younger men, have a natural (sinful?) habit of seeking out women who command sexual authority over them. It's entrancing. It's intoxicating. It's obsessive. So men naturally (and quickly) "fall in love" with such women.

The problem is when Christian men prioritize the "in love" experience of being obsessed with a woman as a prerequisite for considering a woman for marriage!

This is essentially idolatry!

As a word of hope, it is possible for a nominally low SMV man to have a great deal of sexual authority over a particular woman who just so happens to have the right "vibes", or "chemistry", or what have you. Instead of looking for love in all the wrong places, men should look for IOIs to judge his own sexual authority and choose appropritately.

Related

- Reddit/RPChristians: How to Know if You're in Her Frame (2021 January 8)
- Christianity and Masculinity: The friend zone is the same as a feminism in the female life path (January 12)

The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture

Novaseeker · 8 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

SEX, above all else!

Readership: All
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

In the aftermath of the "sexual revolution" of the 1960s-1970's period, Western culture has assigned sex to be the central identifying factor of human flourishing. The issues which animate the gaping divisions of our culture are all sexual in nature, and the reconstruction of our cultural institutions during the same period — whether economic, familial, educational — have all been undertaken to enable a widespread sexual libertinism, even if the enjoyment of the same is often theoretical for many individuals. This central emphasis on sex has grown steadily, and with increasing intensity and fervor, over the past several decades. Today it's pretty much at ground zero — culturally viewed as the sine-qua-non centerpiece of all human flourishing.

- Our most burning political and cultural disagreements are all about "sex" and issues relating to sex.
- Sex is what people are trained by the culture to desire in and for themselves, from the inside out.
- Sex lies at the center of the behaviors expected from peers in the second and third decade of life (HS, college, 20s, and even 30s for some).
- Our expectations of courtship and marriage and even of adolescence are all molded by the idea that sexual satisfaction, and an "on-time, normal sexual developmental process" (which always involves sexual activity in adolescence or shortly thereafter) is the central element of human flourishing.
- Our life scripts for the timing of critical life events are designed around accommodating plenty of sex with various partners prior to marriage.

Against this background, with all of its implications, the centrality of sex becomes the dominant theme of much of human life.

Of course, sex IS central to human life for biological reproduction and the inherent satisfaction of our desires for intimacy. It always will be, and always has been. But it has never been culturally centered like it is now, such that it crowds out other cultural, developmental and human priorities and thereby becomes a system of "adverse domination", whereby everything is measured through sexuality and its impact on sexuality and sexual expression, either implicitly (most often) or, increasingly, explicitly through various means of cultural, educational and, ultimately, political advocacy.

This deliberate and powerful cultural centering of sexuality serves to take a naturally strong thing — the power of sex — and put it on steroids in terms of its impact on the lives of individuals. It becomes the dominant theme of life, instead of taking up its proper place as an important theme, like food is, but not the dominant theme to the exclusion of other, important themes in a balanced approach to life.

This shift in emphasis unfortunately doesn't end when one "graduates" from the young set, because there are large industries, including beauty, cosmetics, medical, fitness, porn, and the celebrity class, that are all bringing sexuality and its related emphasis on "hotness" and "sexiness" forward in life, with many, many more "hot" women appearing now in the late 40s-50s range than ever before. This trend will continue, so as to keep sex on the front burner in terms of how it is perceived in importance, throughout most of life, age-wise, in the decades ahead — to age levels where, in the past, this kind of sexual emphasis was simply either exceedingly rare if not totally absent.

It's high school forever and ever… and ever, it seems. It never ends.

Your life, for the next …. 70 years!

The Way It Is Now – A Gynocentric Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace

The system is pathological precisely because it places sexual satisfaction — and that means primarily the female sort, because the male sort is much easier to manage — at the highest level of social, cultural and personal importance. This is a problem because women tend to be sexually fickle. While the sexual desires of each sex, taken apart from the other, are antisocial in effect, the sexual aspects of the prior regime did not represent the vindication of male sexual priorities, but rather the vindication of social priorities by channeling sexuality towards children and the married life. That social system was replaced by a gynocentric one centered around female desire, which itself is based around women's fickle and hypergamous sexual tendencies, which are not socially beneficial in the least.

Women, as we know, divide men into roughly three groups sexually.

One group is the group with whom many women would engage sexually without a prior relationship, or even the hint of one, being in place — men who generate such a strong sexual desire, or lust, in many women that women are simply drawn to them sexually. Women will also have relationships with the men in this group, many of which end up rather dramatic and rocky due to the large degree of sexual attention these men get, but few will be able to have a truly successful long-term relationship with one of these men.

A second group contains the men with whom women will engage sexually in the context of established (or getting established) relationships that are based on compatibility, common interests and goals, and a host of other factors women find attractive for long-term pairing. Women do fall in love with these men, but the degree of pure sexual lust is lower than it is for men in the first group, generally (in some cases, much lower). What these men do not provide in the grist for sexual lust, they provide in various kinds of support — emotional, paternal, mentoring, and financial. The sexuality in these pairings, over the long-term, often is mostly comprised of "maintenance sex" or "intimacy sex", but this isn't very satisfying to women over the long-term, and in our culture, with its radical centering of sexuality as the core of human flourishing, it often fails as the basis of a successful marriage.

The third, and final, group contains the men who simply do not register sexually or romantically at all, and are often described in the 'sphere as being "invisible" to women. These are recognized as males, or perhaps as men in a theoretical sense, but do not register sexually as men, but more as a greyed out/neuter gender to women. Women depend on these men in various capacities indirectly due to their participation in the economy in various support and utility roles, but this of course is very different from individual attraction and interest. Most women, if pressed, will claim that "some woman is for him somewhere, but he is just overlooking them", when in many cases they know, interiorly, that this is not the case, but the reality is that life is not fair and that there are losers of both sexes and so on. That is certainly true, and always has been, but …. there are way more male losers now than there have ever been in history, because of the hypergamous skew in a female-centric mating system, and their numbers are seemingly growing generationally.

A key idea is that women expect and demand different things from each type of man.

From men in Group One, they expect access to exciting (even if actually unsatisfying at times) sex, emotional roller coaster rides and the like. From men in Group Two, they expect egalitarian partnership, respect, support and emotional intimacy, without drama. From men in Group Three, women expect them to stay away, period, if they don't want them to get HR called on them.

Women demand each from each, according to his "type" in the woman's mind.

As Jim says in The Three Magic Words (2020 August 7), women's ideal world is a world of women having unlimited access to loving, supportive, beta husbands/fathers AND unlimited access to hot, strong, dominant monkey sex with physically or socially dominant men. BOTH at the same time, not both in the same man, because women know that both in the same man is exceptionally rare. But since most women can't pull this off (i.e., they can't juggle one man of each type at the same time), we instead get the defect/defect or cooperate/defect models being deployed. (Jim's post on this, linked in this paragraph, is essential reading for understanding these forms of relationship style, because they are dominant in our culture currently.)

Jim also states, quite accurately, that there are almost no men that can balance the alpha and beta roles successfully, either before or after marriage. The few men who can be both are the rare exceptions, because they must be both in a way that is credible to a specific woman. Women's definition of credible is weighed heavily towards the sexual authority line of men, while the support/intimacy traits are merely an afterthought. Scoring well in the sexual authority area typically requires that a man has already proved himself to be credible to other specific women (pre-selection), and this necessarily requires a long list of pre-marital sexual conquests. Moreover, it should be obvious that the man is the first kind of man described above, those for whom women will not impose rules for sex — that means he has broad sexual authority with women generally, and is in control, and therefore is the kind of man they want the dominant monkey sex from, and not the second kind of man who has to trade something (negotiate) for sex. Thus, the nature of the beast requires that the man's history should involve "conquests" and not only girlfriends.

Either way though, attracting and/or retaining a woman for or in a marriage in our culture today requires a very strong emphasis by the man on keeping her well and truly properly banged silly — a requirement which was never in the course of history expected of men as a requirement to avoid punitive divorce, and one which most married men will NOT be able to satisfy for the reason I set forth above — that is, most men are not the kind of men that women want this from.

Case Study: My Own Marriage

My own marriage had similar features, albeit being different in a million small details from any other marriage situation.

I had a very low N when I met my ex, and she was N=0. We had all kinds of non-intercourse sexual interactions before we married, but never all the way, and always restrained. In part that was Catholic upbringing (we weren't avid Mass goers when we met, but the upbringing rubs off) which led us both to place a different value on sex (compared to the wider culture), and to have a visceral negative reaction to sex outside of committed situations. We came close to sex a few times during the engagement but at that point it was more of a religious matter to avoid it because we had gone back to church by then.

Anyway, we never ended up having great sex in the marriage. Chemistry was not good when it came to actual sex (which was surprising given our own history). Libidos were not matched and "sexual styles", for lack of a better word, were divergent. Desires seemed to ebb and flow on different schedules, and on different wavelengths. We tried various things to make the sex work better, and it just didn't happen. My ex was also high libido, but she had specific sexual desires which were different from mine, while also having an array of limits and strictures despite being high libido.

We also preferred sex at different times of the day, when our energy levels were different, and this was a big problem. (My high energy time was her low energy time and vice versa.) All of these issues could have surfaced and been vetted had we actually had sex before marriage, and if we had done that, we probably would have not gotten married after all because we were a bad match sexually, and in this culture people simply do not marry someone under those conditions if they are aware of it before marrying. We were both very intellectual, so I think we each figured we could work it out somehow, but sex doesn't work that way — it has its own rules and if you don't really fit viscerally, your sexual satisfaction with that person will be subject to a "cap", as it were, beyond which it will not go.

In any case, I am fairly sure that a marriage with the kind of sex that mine had was a marriage that didn't end in divorce prior to 1970. It was the kind of situation people muddled through. But in our culture where sex is centered in an extreme way, it is simply very hard to keep a marriage together in that kind of situation — the pressures are too great, especially on the woman (because poor sexual satisfaction for women is seen as a telltale sign of a "bad kind of old fashioned marriage", in the eyes of most everyone).

Prioritizing Sex upsets the MMP – and Marriage!

On the other hand, however, in this imbalanced culture, with its overemphasis on sex, we will of course struggle ourselves to find mates if we choose to personally de-prioritize sex. That goes without saying, or it should. It works to impede getting a woman to want to be with you.

I experienced the same thing as Jack did — when I was chaste, women sensed it, did not like it, and backed off. My general lack of interest in pre-marital sex cost me several relationships in my early 20s. Women want to kick the tires sexually as much as men before they select a man as a mate — again, because sex and sexual satisfaction are at the core of human flourishing today, and, for women specifically, one of the main points of feminism was to increase women's sexual satisfaction by allowing them to pick mates based on sexual satisfaction, desire, and prowess, rather than economic need and other situational/contextual factors.

This isn't often spoken of openly, because it doesn't need to be — women "just get it" about the liberal sexuality contained in feminism, because it is visceral for them. Female sexual desire and its vindication lies at the very heart of the feminist enterprise, full stop, and this is so obvious to women in a visceral sense that it doesn't need to be stated openly — and men's cluelessness about it doesn't change that reality.

As Jack reported earlier, the average age of first time sex is getting lower, and the average age of first time marriage is getting higher. One factor contributing to these trends is the reality that women want and expect rather satisfying sex today. To make matters more difficult, there is an element of fantasy which people find difficult to part with, especially women.

The whole argument for the "Test Drive" is based on the prioritization of sex in the relationship. Sex is, by far, the most important thing, so it's imperative that they get this right – at any cost.

If they don't realize this before marriage, they invariably realize this afterwards. There are so many women who get unhappy in their marriages due to sex, even though they never insisted on having a porn star sex life prior to getting married, only later on decided that they wanted to have much better sex in their marriages.

Case Study: Nikole Mitchell

In the scenario where a woman doesn't realize her incredible expectations for sex until after marriage, we find that "success" isn't only about attracting a woman up front, vetting properly, and getting into marriage.

This is what happened in the Mitchell's marriage, to some extent. Nikole (W from last month's series) wanted better sex than John (H) was providing, and that in itself was a 180° turn for her. She talks in a few places about how she became more aware of her body and her needs and desires and so on, and as she let go of formal Christianity, she embraced her sexual desires more fully. But the key is this was a change from what she was when she got married. According to her husband, she had a mainstream sexual history, and was rebellious as a teenager, but she wasn't promiscuous. She claims that she never had an orgasm until she masturbated herself later in her marriage and that she never had an orgasm with a partner until after her separation. Certainly sexual attraction would have played a role in Nikole's choice of a husband, without question, but it was only later on that she adapted the cultural norm of centering her life around her sexual satisfaction and pleasure. It seems likely to me that this led her to proceed to become dissatisfied with her marriage over time, as normally happens, and potentially unattracted to her husband. And eventually she left the marriage to pursue a new career which she found sexually exciting, as well as lucrative.

Conclusions

The kind of sex in marriage that almost all of our grandparents, and by extension almost all married humans, had until only a few decades before, is no longer generally acceptable now that sexual satisfaction is at the core of human flourishing, culturally, in a way it never was.

This generally lower level of "sexual satisfaction" in the past was much less of a problem because throughout history we did not have a culture that placed human sexual satisfaction at the center of its definition of human flourishing. Today we do, so what was tolerable for much of human history is now intolerable.

My specific point here is that even if you do "save yourself" prior to marriage and end up finding another low or no

N woman, it does not at all mean that the problem of sexual satisfaction will not come up in your marriage, and blow it up.

For some (most) women, it makes them uninterested at the outset, whereas for others they will only become dissatisfied and uninterested later on, during the marriage — but the common theme is that eventually, given, again, the central emphasis our culture places on sexual satisfaction (especially for women — our own satisfaction is much easier to attain), if the man isn't pounding the woman how she likes, when she likes, as much as she likes, and as violently as she likes, rejection will happen. Whether or not you are married makes no difference at all, unfortunately.

Related

- Σ Frame: Things I Learned About Women in College (2018 April 4)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Compatibility is Dependent on Sanctification (2020 March 2)
- Σ Frame: Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020 June 19)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Authority (2020 September 30)

What Hitting Bottom will look like

Jack · 10 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The final dissolution before reintegration.

Readership: All
Length: 3,200 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

In Hitting Bottom must be necessary (2020 November 6), I described how the West has been following a downward trajectory, not just for decades, but for centuries. I concluded that we must "hit bottom" at some point in the very near future.

Then, in December of last year, I saw a pattern of insights on this topic emerge across the Men's Sphere. This post will pull these together to form what I believe is a prophecy for the West.

* * * 1 * * *

> "…for those coming of age for marriage, America has become a social toxic wasteland. It's bad enough that America is Western, with all the serious problems that can bring. Still, within that flawed system until recently, it was possible for good things to happen with romance. Those possibilities have now been reduced to a mere fragment, memories of quaint customs no longer tolerated.
>
> All the most useful cues are gone, so that the process of getting to know someone well enough to fall in love has lost all the warmth. Romance is just about dead. It's not that people no longer pair for sex, but that the vast majority never pair up for actual love and marriage.
>
> The Men's Red Pill movement is dying for a reason. It's not that the study of what women are like has failed; fundamental truths about feminine nature that women once kept hidden in their own society have not changed. Women of the younger generations have begun to admit this stuff openly. But they do so only to confirm it as their right, with all the enforcement that comes with such a status. Soft manipulation becomes law. The common social expectations of these younger generations have dramatically shifted. The number of women still dreaming of romance has dramatically dropped to a tiny minority of the population. Such dreams are openly suppressed.
>
> It would be easy to pass off this ugly shift as the influence of networking technology and how people interact with the virtual world. This is the age of technocracy. That much is patently true, but the question is: Do you understand it? Do you understand how things have shifted? The sheer power of this pervasive change in human orientation is bigger than most people in the older generations can comprehend. The momentum of this thing makes it utterly impossible to even think of rolling it back, or any part of it."
>
> "I feel sorry for the younger generations of men and women. They will have make their own way, and it looks like the system is flatly hostile to their needs. The only thing that can make life bearable is divine revelation, and that calls for disconnecting from this world in some measure. I can't help them within their own realm of existence; they have to awaken a higher faculty. The genuine biblical path of a Christian family is truly alien to this world."
>
> Do What's Right: Funeral for the Red Pill (2020 December 7)

Ed is right. The Red Pill addressed the problems and confusion in the Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace (SSMMP) created by the Sexual Revolution and 3rd and 4th Wave Feminism, which were faced by late Boomers, Xers, and early Millennials. But over the past few years, the times have changed. Late Millennials and Zoomers have an entirely different SSMMP to contend with, and it's pretty bleak.

Troy Francis gives one account in his post, The Death of Togetherness (2021 January 16).

Another putrid example is described in this video.

The Thinking Ape: Dutch Divorce Rate Skyrockets in Response to Alimony Reform (2019 December 14) Length: 10:22*

 H/T: Whores and Ale: The Plan Doesn't Change, Just The Timetable (2020 December 8)*

* * * 2 * * *

Nikolai Vladivostok offers an outline of these changes in his post, Am I Out of Touch? (2020 December 8). I've summarized his points as follows.

- Cultural shifts surrounding love and mating. First there was the 1960s free love movement. Then in the 2000s, women became more interested in getting an education and career before dating seriously so there was a shift from serial monogamy to casual dating and hook-ups. The next step was Tinder, which normalized meeting strangers online and having sex with them a short time later with limited preliminaries. The final step (so far) was the popularization of sugar baby sites and OnlyFans. Once you see this progression it starts to make more sense: the jump from 1950s kissing only on the third date to pro sugar baby is extreme, but the jump from Tinder hookups with strangers to similar hookups with a few gifts thrown in is not so great. Nor is the jump from sending badboys nudes to offering pics online for cash.
- A rapidly evolving shift in the SMP. It's gone from serial monogamy, to dating, to PUA Game, to Hookup, and then to Online Dating (OLD), which then had its own rapid shift from OK Cupid, to Tinder, to online amateur prostitution (OASIS, e.g. OnlyFans). This shift unfolded differently in different countries, but overall, sex has become routinely transactional, and talking to a stranger in public could get you arrested.
- The SMP has become transactional. These days, an increasing number of men, out of desperation, are willing to pay $$$ simply to interact with a woman online. Women are now incentivized to regard both sex and sex appeal as a medium of financial exchange. This shifts the SMP to a whole new level of hypergamy, in which men are not only judged by their ability to induce the Tingles and perform in bed, but also to deliver $$$ and a preferred lifestyle. The bar has been raised so high, that now, women are utterly bored with common interactions with men.
- Monetized Sexual Transactions. The theme for January at Σ Frame covered the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS). This rise in "compensated dating" has cemented the annihilation of the SMP as a potential MMP as it was in years past. Now, not only do a significant (but practically unknown) proportion of young women now have some form of soft p0rn modeling (e.g. Instagram) or soft prostitution (e.g. OnlyFans) in their past, some have become accustomed to being compensated and now expect it!
- Feminine Empowerment is the Norm. Women have an unprecedented amount of power, and even if they haven't taken the ticket, they know it's there. This option has the effect of altering their bargaining position in a relationship, making them raise their standards unreasonably high. Why should an average young woman date Mr. Average gratis when another Mr. Average online is willing to stump up cash? Mr. Average without a short-time dowry may no longer be good enough.
- A cultural religious movement has been afoot. It had its roots in 3rd Wave Feminism, then "The Great Awokening", took off in 2013 and has been progressing rapidly since then. Previous to that year, feminism was a big thing but understanding sh!t tests and the true desires of women were enough to overcome anti-male conditioning. Since 2013 it's been getting harder. You need to be very careful around university-indoctrinated Western women, whether you are approaching or in a relationship. The risk is not rejection – it is denunciation. See also, MeT00.

In sum, relation$hips are now centered around illicit sex and money, instead of faith, love, respect, companionship, sharing joy, and building a family within marriage.

 Nikolai Vladivostok calls this the* Marginal Effect*, meaning that things that happen in the margins of society slowly, then suddenly and quickly, become the new norm.*

* * * 3 * * *

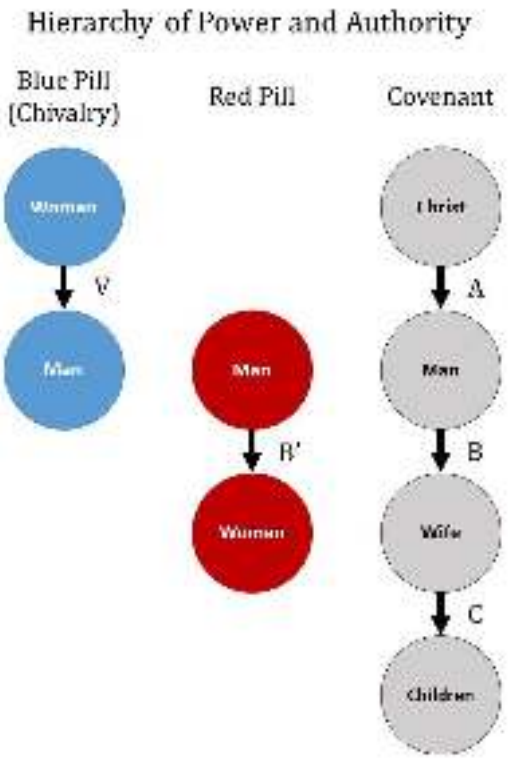
The next excerpt offers a Biblically based, metaphysical context for what has been described so far. I have condensed the content in the interests of reading time. Click on the link below to read the entire post.

1st Corinthians 11:3 can be drawn in the form of a word diagram:

God <- Jesus <- Man <- Woman



If there is no man between Jesus and the woman, then the woman looks to Jesus outside of a man's authority, and that's not always good as we read in Numbers 5:14-18 (NKJV). The essential thing is that the woman is under the husband's authority. If necessary, the husband can bring the woman to the priest, and the priest stands the woman before Jesus, uncovering her head.

Isaiah 3:1-4 describes a time when the wisdom of the ancient and honorable is lost* and children are set as rulers. The result of this inverted state of affairs is oppression and chaos as verses 5-11 describe.

The next verse illustrates what happens when the proper hierarchy is overturned.

> "My people — children are their oppressors, and women rule over them.
> O my people, your leaders mislead you, and confuse the course of your paths."
>
> Isaiah 3:12 (NRSV)

When things get bad enough, God judges the men first, especially the older men who are supposed to serve in leadership and guidance for the people and who, ultimately, are the cause of all of this. (See Isaiah 3:13-15.)

Since the women have been elevated to leadership, and there is no man between them and God, they are exposed to his direct judgment, and it is terrible. (See Isaiah 3:16-24.)

The judgment of the women is to make them experience and realize their shame. They have been operating outside of the covering of a man.

And what has been going on with the men? They die, and the city falls down. (See Isaiah 3:25 NRSV.)

Once the women are shamed and the unworthy men are dead, the people have hit rock bottom. [Note: women are already shamed and many men are "dead" in the figurative spiritual sense.] What is the way upwards? Isaiah tells us in the first verse of the next chapter.

> "Seven women shall take hold of one man in that day, saying,
>
> "We will eat our own bread and wear our own clothes;
> just let us be called by your name; take away our disgrace."
>
> Isaiah 4:1 NRSV

Food and clothing are two of the things a husband gives to his wife or wives as directed by Exodus 21:10.

> [10] "If he takes another wife to himself, he shall not diminish the food, clothing, or marital rights of the first wife."
>
> Exodus 21:10 NRSV

What we are seeing here is that the shamed women realize they are in disgrace being outside of a man's covering of authority. They are directly exposed to God's judgment and it is terrifying. With so many men dead, they are tacitly willing to share a husband to get rid of the shame and be covered.

Once the proper hierarchy has been restored, then in Isaiah 4:2-6 (NRSV), the prophet paints out a beautiful picture of Mount Zion being covered by the Branch of the Lord via a canopy.

This is how Paul can say that the relationship between Jesus and His Body (the Church) is the same as the relationship between a husband and his wife. As the husband covers his wife, so the Messiah covers the ekklesia. We notice the language that Paul uses in Ephesians 5:22-27 — how a husband makes his wife holy by washing her with water is similar to the language of Isaiah where God washes away the filth of the daughters of Zion.

If we ponder the necessity of men covering the women like Jesus covers the daughters of Zion, then we understand why Paul so forcefully tells Timothy that forbidding marriage is a doctrine of devils when pushed by apostates when they depart from the faith. Indeed, if marriage is forbidden, then the only covering women have is their fathers. Forbidding marriage robs the women of the covering of husbands!(See 1st Timothy 4:1-4 NRSV.)

If our people only realized how intimately our faith is bound up and pictured by marriage, then getting biblical marriage right and men covering one or more women will lead to the glory of Zion as Isaiah described.

Source: Kol Yisrael Torah and Prophecy (Brian Somers): End Time Judgment of Men and Women: Isaiah 3-4 (2020 December 5)

We've not yet reached this point, however, we can already see evidence of this happening in the margins. For an example, see Wintery Knight's, Young Woman Regrets that Older People in Her Life were Dishonest with Her (2020 December 7).

 For an example of the wisdom and knowledge that has been almost entirely lost, read* Dark Brightness: Marriage is for Raising Godly Children (2020 December 9).
 H/T: Pete Rambo at 11:3 Restoration.*

* * * 4 * * *

When we strike bottom, the despair and despondency cause people to seek God once again. J.M. Smith and Alan Roebuck speak to us about this topic.

The most read Orthosphere post of all time is Alan Roebuck's "Why You are Demoralized and What You Must Do About it," which he published eight years ago, on June 8, 2012.

[…]

Alan tells us that three key spiritual nutrients have been withdrawn. First and foremost is the firm conviction that there are such things as spiritual nutrients, and as a corollary to this, that there are such things as spiritual junk foods and poisons. This key spiritual nutrient was withdrawn by the doctrine of tolerance, non-judgmentalism, and cultural relativism. This doctrine states that each of us is free to choose our spiritual nutrients according to our own individual tastes. Every "good" chosen is therefore equally good, from which it follows that none of them are really good at all.

As the doctrine of tolerance destroys belief in objective value—the belief that anything is absolutely true, good, or beautiful—there is an unsurprising proliferation of ugliness—of intellectual, moral, and aesthetic ugliness. Truth, goodness and beauty are nutrients that revive the spirits of men and women. Ugliness is the spiritual toxin that makes them feel a morbid desire to go and hang themselves from a rafter in the barn.

The dolor of this spiritual wasteland has been further deepened, Alan tells us, by a false and malevolent history that alienates us from our ancestors and our past. He is speaking here particularly of white people and Western civilization. When it comes to white people and Western civilization, the doctrine of tolerance and non-judgmentalism is suspended in favor of scathing judgments and resounding damnations. It is hard for anyone to keep his pecker up in the spiritual wasteland, but it is especially hard when the loudspeakers boom that he is part of a cursed people that has been found wanting in the balance of history. It is demoralizing to learn you are the world's one and only unchosen people.

[…]

What you must do about your demoralization is reverse the process that demoralized you. Think of it as spiritual detox. You must:

1. Reject relativism and recover a belief in objective truth, beauty and goodness. This begins by recovering a belief in the one true God that is described and worshiped in orthodox Christian religion. There can be no spiritual absolutes if there is no spiritual absolute, and there certainly can be no spiritual absolutes if there is no spiritual. If there is no one true God, we are all just wanking in the void.
2. Reject tolerance and become judgmental and discriminatory. This does not mean persecutorial. Spiritual tolerance for ugliness (the mendacious, the transgressive, the grotesque) is like physical tolerance for alcohol. You will stop vomiting but go on destroying your liver. When you are spiritually intolerant, you will avoid all forms of ugliness whenever you can, and you will curse them whenever you cannot. When you cannot curse them out loud, you will curse them under your breath.
3. Reject the poisoned myths of your enemies and keep faith with your fathers. This filial piety is not uncritical, but it is intensely jealous. Alien criticism is either ignored or treated as casus belli.

Source: The Orthosphere (J.M. Smith): Acquiescence in Cuckoldry: An Excursus on Kristor's Latest (2020 December 6)

These three steps are the point at which the individual man wakes up from the collective delusion and confusion, and a return to God and His ordained order begins to appear on the margins.

The Bible instructs us not to curse fellow believers, but to pray for them instead. But it's a different story for the apostates of this age. It requires a strange balance – forgive them, and then curse them.

For a plethora of examples, read the faux news. On second thought, don't bother!

* * * 5 * * *

Similar to my conclusions under the last epiphany, there will be some strange combinations of responsive actions that will be required by the faithful during these times. At first glance, it may seem like a conundrum with no good options, but in fact, it just requires some dirty politics which are currently frowned upon by polite, converged churchianity. NovaSeeker and I will be reviewing some of these crucibles of faith through the next couple months.

When the going gets tough, the tough get going!

Epilogue

I'm offering this post as a prophecy, but that doesn't mean it will necessarily turn out as bad as described in Isaiah. If we recognize what is happening, and how far we have drifted from God's ordained order, and then respond in such a way that these trends are dampened or upended, then we may avoid a descent to the bottom of the abyss and a total annihilation.

Even if most do not respond, God will grant those few who do an individualized dispensation of grace and mercy.

In order to avert this fate, the important thing for us to do, is to remove those elements which are most egregious to God, and to embrace those elements that are paramount to the Kingdom of God. The degree to which we do this, as a culture, will determine how much decadence and destruction we will see in the next decade or two.

What are these elements?

- Get in touch with your heart. Pray and study the Bible. Get away from various addictions. Be sensitive to your convictions and act accordingly. (1st Corinthians 8)
- Seek after the Kingdom of God and His righteousness by faith. (Matthew 6:33)
- Find ways to worship, praise, and glorify God, and be thankful. (Psalm 145)
- Embrace and defend God ordained gender roles. Men focus on their work. Women focus on the home and supporting their husband's work. (Titus 2:1-8)
- Exercise personal boundaries. Separate yourselves from those who are defiled, those who scheme, and those who practice lawlessness. (2 Corinthians 6:17) This includes not patronizing businesses and separating from individuals that endorse or support the same.
- Pursue sanctification, i.e. sexual purity and covenantal marriage (i.e. Headship). (1 Thessalonians 4:3)
- As much as possible, live in Shalom with your fellow man. (Romans 12:18) At a societal level, this means we must stop engaging in useless foreign conflicts.

I suggest pursuing these elements in the order given.

Related

- Σ Frame: Buckle down for the ride of the centuries (2018 August 9)
- Σ Frame: Yankee Stay Home! (2019 February 12)
- Σ Frame: Paul Harvey "If I were the devil" (2019 August 24)
- Σ Frame: The 5 Phases of Deprogramming from the Matrix (2020 February 4)
- Σ Frame: You have to leave Murika to get the Real News (2020 November 3)

One Night in Beijing

Jack · 12 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A taste of Chinese culture in music.

Readership: All;
Author's Note: Originally posted on January 17, 2015.
Length: 1,550 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The Occasion

The first day of the Chinese New Year holiday is today (2021 February 12)!!!

In case anyone is wondering why the Chinese New Year is in February (?!?), it is because the traditional Chinese calendar is based on lunar cycles (similar to the ancient Hebrew calendar), and not the tropical year, which the western Gregorian calendar is currently modeled on. There is roughly a two month difference between the two because around 713 BC, King Numa Pompilius added January and February and placed them at the beginning of the year. The first six months were also renamed after Roman gods. Later in 46 BC, Julius Caesar reformed the calendar and revised the seventh and eighth months (July and August) to be named after himself and his adoptive son who became the first Emperor. The modern Gregorian calendar is an evolution of the Julian calendar.

In fact, the Latin roots bear out this difference. "Sept" in September (which is the ninth month) means 7, "oct" in October means 8, "nov" in November means 9, and "dec" in December means 10. When you do the simple math based on this, you quickly find that March should be the first month of the year, and indeed it was, more than a millennium ago. The ancient calendar of Romulus started at the month of March.

In comparison, there are still a few cultures throughout the world that associate the start of the new year with spring, technically the equinox (normally March 21). Easter originated from the Babylonian celebration of the new year.

So it was the Romans who messed up the western Calendar. The Chinese have it right.

A Cultural Exploration in Music

In keeping with the occasion, I thought I would break away from the “China bad” narrative and give the readers a little taste of “Taiwan good”.

This is an old hit that has become a classic!

One Night in Beijing（北京一夜) is a masterful work of fine art.

The modern version, presented in the video below, is from the Taiwanese artist, Shin（信 meaning ‘Trust’). This artist combines the traditional Chinese formal theatrical style of singing with a modern, western rock anthem structure.

About the Artistry

The Taiwanese artist, Shin, has, with this song, almost single-handedly revived the traditional Chinese formal theatrical style of singing that has fallen out of popularity since the World War Two era and has nearly disappeared.

Westerners will quickly recognize the iconic style of singing as sounding reminiscent of Bruce Lee’s ‘cat call’. To be honest, I never appreciated this style of singing until I learned that it is an artful expression of ‘repressed rage’, an emotion rarely encountered in the west. But after coming to understanding the emotional significance of the expression, I very much enjoy such performances now.

Listeners will also hear bits of an emotion westerners might call, ‘impertinent sarcasm’ thrown into some of the lyrics. Westerners consider this emotion to be rude and annoying, so the full significance of this emotion, conveyed in the song as sincere, yet mocking, is lost on foreign ears.

Chinese classical instrumentation also appears, including the er-hu, an ancient two-stringed instrument played with a bow, and the ‘flying gong’ (also called an ‘opera gong’, ‘hand gong’, or ‘bending gong’) which has the curiously rising intonation that creates a glissando effect.

A previous release from Bobby Chen (陳昇) and Liu Chia-Hui (劉佳慧) came out in 1992. Liu Chia-Hui’s delicate soprano voice captures the fascinating and heart-gripping hope of longing, which was an emotion highly valued in the Chinese arts and entertainment in bygone times.

About the Poetry

Keeping in step with Red Pill lore, the overriding theme of the song concerns the immutable strength of sexual bonding. There is a reference in the song to an old lady who waits decades for her man to return home. Her continual pining after so many years is a moving testament to the Alpha Widow syndrome.

The details captured in the lyrics suggest that the song is several decades old, perhaps even predating World War 2. There are many literary twists with double meanings in the lyrics. For example, one of the words, 花 (huā), literally means 'flower' or 'embroidery', but it is used as a euphemism for 'spend', and as a metaphor for 'lady'. Now, imagine how several words laced throughout the song, each having multiple meanings, could produce a panoply of puns, metaphors, and alternate narratives within the same verse! For this reason, some Chinese poetry makes the brilliant prose of Shakespeare seem like a school boy's blathering by comparison! Even native Chinese speakers can't understand some of it, which is largely why the song is suspected to have originated in a bygone era.

A Taiwanese mother with her two daughters. Can you tell who the mother is?

English Translation

Here is an English translation that will help western listeners appreciate the art in fuller detail.

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING

Don't wish to ask where you have been
Don't wish to wonder if you are ever returning
I'm thinking of your heart, I'm thinking of your face
I'm thinking of your embrace – I won't let go, I just won't

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
I leave behind much love

Whether you loved or not
It's all the dust of history

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
I leave behind much love
I fear to ask the way at midnight
Lest I walk into in the valley of flowers

People say in the valley of flowers an old lover sits and sews embroidered shoes
The old woman with a kind face awaits her beloved departed one

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
Please don't drink too much
Whether you loved or not
It's all the dust of history

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
I leave behind much love
The men of wine and songs
They are the northern wolf clan

People say the northern wolf clan, when the cold wind blows, stands beyond the city gates
Wearing rusted armour, calling for the gates to open, their eyes are full of tears.

I have waited one thousand years why won't the city gates open?
I have waited one thousand years why hasn't my beloved returned?

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
I leave behind much love
I fear to ask the way at midnight
Lest I'm touched by the ghosts of sadness

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
I leave behind much love
I fear to ask the way at midnight
Lest I walk into the Gates of Earthly Peace

People say within the Gates of Earthly Peace an old woman waits and dreams
The old woman with a kind face awaits her beloved departed one

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
Please don't drink too much
At the Gates of Earthly Peace,
Nobody will remain untouched

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
You leave behind much love
Don't be asking the way at midnight
Less you're touched by the ghosts of sadness

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
Don't wish to ask where you have been
Don't wish wonder if you are ever returning
I think of your heart, I think of your face
I think of your embrace, I won't let go, I just won't

ONE NIGHT IN BEIJING
You leave behind much love
Don’t be asking the way at midnight
Lest you be touched by the ghosts of sadness

Original Chinese Version

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　我留下許多情
不管你愛與不愛　都是歷史的塵埃

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　我留下許多情
不敢在午夜問路　怕走到了百花深處

人說百花的深處　住着老情人　縫着繡花鞋
面容安詳的老人　依舊等着那出征的歸人

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　你可別喝太多酒
不管你愛與不愛　都是歷史的塵埃

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　我留下許多情
把酒高歌的男兒　是北方的狼族

人說北方的狼族　會在寒風起　站在城門外
穿着腐銹的鐵衣　呼喚城門開　眼中含着淚

嗚……我已等待千年　為何城門還不開
嗚……我已等待了千年　為何良人不回來

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　我留下許多情
不敢在午夜問路　怕觸動了傷心的魂

ONE NIGHT IN 北京　我留下許多情
不敢在午夜問路　怕走到了地安門

不想再問你　你到底在何方
不想再思量　你能否歸來麼
想着你的心　想着你的臉
想捧在胸口　能不放就不放

ONE NIGHT IN 北京

Related

- Σ Frame: A Noodle Asian Inspiration (2017 November 3)

A Full-Blown Apocalypse

Jack · 13 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

We are essentially forbidden from building faith-based communities and marriages.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: The Winter of Discontent
Author's Note: Authored by Ed Hurst, and reblogged from his (now defunct) site, Do What's Right [Archive].
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Yes, we are facing a full-blown apocalypse.

It has to come from God. Even if we could sit down and talk face to face, there is no way I can make you see what I see right now. The fire and urgency would not come across unless you already had your own fire and urgency. People might hear, but there is no megaphone so loud that everyone will listen.

Do you understand why I say that we are sliding into a full-blown apocalypse? Don't get lost in the symbolism of the Four Horsemen. Yes, those things are terrible: political instability, war, economic collapse and disease. Those things must come, but we could live through all of that if we could keep our eyes on the Lord. That's the thing: Keeping our eyes on peace with God. That's the whole point of being here in this fallen world.

If we could sum up the meaning of shalom in our age, it would be something like social stability. Even that is highly abbreviated. It's the image of people of faith living together under a divine covenant, holding to the teaching of the Word. It's the multi-generational transference of that eternal moral viewpoint, having children grow up into it and assuming it's importance. Not just a mental assumption, as something they've been taught not to question. This is more of the heart-led assumption because they fully understand how all the questions are answered.

We never had that here in America. That's why I don't lament the loss of America. What I lament is the loss of something that America at one point allowed. For a brief period of time in American history, government allowed communities to form that varied from each other, so long as they fit within the broad general boundaries of the wider national identity. That wasn't so hard to do back then. But that older, gentler national identity is long gone, and so is the tolerance for the variations in what God requires of us.

The reason it's a real apocalypse is because we are not allowed to teach our children, and we are not allowed to build a community in which people of faith can actually expect to find other people of faith. Do you understand that it's normal when churches are filled with people who very much need to learn how to walk by faith, because they still struggle with the flesh? That's okay, because church is where they are supposed to learn faith, but having those same people lead the church is a serious problem. And that's what we have now. Churches are so institutional and so professional that genuine faith is actually a hindrance to the system.

There is not a single church out there that will tolerate me, because they cannot tolerate my calling and mission. I'm not angry about that, just disappointed. I worked for decades inside the system, and I know beyond all doubt that my faith is a threat to it. Let them have their own path. I can't say that they aren't following their own calling, only that they won't let me follow mine without leaving the system.

What makes this tribulation and persecution is that it is technically illegal for me to build something more amenable to my faith. Think about this: How many judges are willing to shut down an SJW complaint? How many judges would protect a genuine statement of biblical faith about gender and family structure? We shouldn't care what people do to themselves, but we pine for the freedom to make different choices for ourselves. And it's really not just judges, but the people who hold the actual power in making things possible in the current situation. How many state governments, ruling over education, would tolerate a home school curriculum based on heart-led faith that disparages materialism?

Let me recommend this post on Jack's blog: We can't plant seed in the middle of winter. Pro-family cultural norms are increasingly illegal, and impossible to promote even in private — there is no privacy. We are not allowed to have a closed community, as would be entirely necessary, in order to create the atmosphere for passing on biblical values to our children. Jack's emphasis is that men and women of genuine faith can't find each other and marry to raise children that way, because the system is so corrupt. By the time we have come to this understanding of faith, we would be too old for a clean first marriage that produces children. The faith community can't get started because the members have to pass through a hellish landscape of immoral relationships first.

And that's what they pass through when they start out in churches.

Maybe you'll point to the Amish, Mennonites, or even Orthodox Jewish cloistered communities. They are tolerated because they are rule-based. That grants the secular authorities a certain leverage to keep such communities on the margin, small and scattered so they don't pose a threat to the materialistic system. I'm suggesting something that isn't rule-based, something that is far more mystical in orientation. Instead of avoiding uncomfortable questions, we would encourage people to ask them. We would encourage the kind of searching that underlies the periods of rebellious youth, when such rule-based communities lose so many members.

The trick is not to armor yourselves against reasonable questions. It's to build a focused life that moves beyond them as a mark of maturity. Over and over again, I've tried to show that Aristotelian logic is not the enemy; stopping there that is what kills faith. The Hebrew culture, as part of the wider Ancient Near East, didn't lack understanding of concrete and abstract logic, but that they always found it inadequate. If you can't shoot holes in abstract reasoning, then you don't understand what mysticism is about. Hebrew mysticism made room for abstract reasoning as part of the growing up process, but to stay there was considered juvenile.

Yes, Judaism is a very juvenile take on Moses. The mystical wisdom of the ancient Hebrew sages was lost somewhere before the conquests of Alexander the Great. That's why Hellenistic intellectual traditions were so intoxicating to the rabbis; it had become exotic instead of silly. It was an apocalypse of faith that made them militantly reject the Messiah.

And this is why we are entering a full-blown apocalypse: Genuine faith, with all the ancient wisdom of the Hebrew sages, is the enemy of the rising demon-led hordes of fools who run things. I have to wonder just how many people out there across the virtual space are ready to pick up the torch. Not my particular brand of teaching, but I'm praying the Lord can keep alive anything that draws from that common ancient tradition.

He's the only one who can make it happen.

Related

- Radix Fidem: Conditions Not Ripe Yet (2020/11/26)
- Σ Frame (Soup Sandwich): We can't plant seed in the middle of winter. (2021/2/13) [Archive]
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market (2021/2/22)
- Dark Brightness on the absence of Christian Community and Tradition (2021/2/24) [Archive]

The Futility of Justifying the Crash Landing

Jack · 15 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women are struggling to rationalize the sad, bitter consequences of feminism. Is it truly justified?

Readership: All
Length: 3,300 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Introduction

What becomes of women after they hit the wall and can no longer ride the carousel? They must invariably face up to the lack of music.

We have the common idea that most women in this predicament will settle, and settle hard to get into marriage. But as time goes on, we are finding that more and more women are absolutely unable to settle hard enough to attract nuptial commitment. Instead of settling, women are wandering through the carnival of life after all the rides have shut down. They're wondering why the music has stopped, and they are coming up with all kind of rationalizations, which are actually justifications. Many of these justifications are of the victimization variety.

In this post, I'll review a number of these justifications based on this article at The Guardian (Emma John) Why are increasing numbers of women choosing to be single? (2021 January 17). The author is not groping for a man to wife her up. Instead, the author does a bit of introspection in an effort to find a new identity as a single woman. But forging a new identity is turning out to be much harder than she imagined.

- Single? That's not an identity.
- Spinster? That's too hilarious, and it's still "freighted with pity and misogynist undertones of sour dessication or bumbling hopelessness." No.
- Never Married? What does that mean?
- A Free Woman? That sounds insulting to everyone else.
- Lifelong Singles? "Sounds like a packet of cheese slices that'll last forever in the back of your fridge."

Even "flappers" had more dignity. She never finds a suitable term to her liking.

Let's dive into the Justifications.

Justification by Demographics

She cites some interesting demographical statistics.

> "The Office for National Statistics shows that women not living in a couple, who have never married, is rising in every age range under 70. In the decade-and-a-half between 2002 and 2018, the figure for those aged 40 to 70 rose by half a million. The percentage of never-married singletons in their 40s doubled.
>
> And it's not just a western phenomenon. In South Korea, the rather pathetic figure of the "old miss" has become the single-and-affluent "gold miss". In Japan, unmarried women over the age of 25 are known as "Christmas cake" (yes, it's because they were past their sell-by date). Shosh Shlam's 2019 documentary on China's sheng nu explores these "Leftover Women" and the social anxiety they cause as traditional marriage models are upended."

Nothing to see here…

Justification by Apex Fallacy

She uses these statistics as a springboard to justify being single, and then compares herself to Hollywood starlets, and later in the article, Bridgette Jones, of all people. She writes,

> "Singleness is no longer to be sneered at. Never marrying or taking a long-term partner is a valid choice. For a brief spurt, it even appeared that the single-positivity movement was the latest Hollywood cause, with A-listers such as Rashida Jones, Mindy Kaling and Chelsea Handler going proudly on the record about how they had come to embrace their single lives. Jones and Kaling have since found love; Handler announced on her chatshow last year that she'd changed her mind and really wanted a relationship. And when Emma Watson (also not single) announced to Vogue she was "self-partnered" I found myself suppressing a gag reflex. Give it another 10 years, I wanted to say. Then tell me how empowering it is going to parties/dinner/bed alone.

The article is littered with images of Hollywood starlets and pop culture figures who appear to be aging well.

> But there I go, living down to the spinster stereotype of envy and bitterness. How is it possible that, despite being raised by a feminist mother and enjoying a life rich with friendships and meaningful employment, I still feel the stigma of that word? Or fear that, even in middle age, I haven't achieved the status of a true adult woman?
>
> These women had a spirit of urgency. They weren't waiting for anything."

From this, we see how women cling to very bad role models by identifying with…

1. Elite pop stars, who are actually the worst role models of all.
2. Idealized modern fairy tales (e.g. Bridgette Jones), which do not match reality for the vast majority of women, at all.
3. Their mothers, who were feminists themselves and who appeared to enjoy it.

There are no role models for being a happily married woman. I suppose that there are, but these have been intentionally ignored because of the shame and guilt that they would instill in her. She wouldn't want to write anything that might glorify God's created order or the dreaded patriarchy.

[image]

Justification through the Exploration of Literary Mythos

She finally identifies with spinsters described in classic English literature, of the Jane Austen, Charles Dickens, and P.G. Wodehouse variety (which I advise everyone to read). But with the news of her younger sister (who is in her mid-30s) having a baby, even this is a bittersweet disappointment.

Yet in all this, she cannot see how the choices she made earlier in her life to emulate these role models could have possibly left her in a state of purposelessness.

> I assumed that my own situation was a temporary aberration, one that required no sense of emergency or active response. My social calendar was full, my work constantly introduced me to new people. Mother Nature would, surely, pick up the slack.

Personally, I believe that the persisting ignorance that surrounds left over women is a form of God's grace. If they ever knew what they did wrong, and what they're missing as a consequence, the pain and grief would be too much for them to bear. I can also see how the natural psychological defense of avoiding this pain and grief would keep them trapped in a state of ignorance.

> "One of the cruelest tricks spinsterhood can play is to leave you feeling like an outlier and a freak – yet my status is far from unique as the statistics show. I see that in my own close friendship group – almost a dozen of us are never-married in our late 30s and early 40s, and none through choice."

No, they had a choice, but they missed it. That moment passed by and they never saw it. Maybe it passed by again, but they never took action because they thought that opportunity would always be waiting for them "when they were ready". Meanwhile, they were focused on other things going on in their lives – things that, in the moment, they felt were more urgent and important. This is the main point of the literary examples of Spinsters, but somehow, she's overlooked this fact.

Justification Based on a Perceived Lack of Opportunities

This justification has the strongest “woe is me” flavor.

> “There’s no avoiding that our romantic opportunities have dwindled as the pool of age-appropriate men has emptied. Annually, we manage a small smattering of dates between us. Most of us have grown weary of online dating, which requires you to treat it as an all-consuming hobby or part-time job. We’re tired of Tinder, bored of Bumble – I’ve even been ejected by eHarmony, which, last time I logged on, told me it couldn’t find me a single match.”

In other words, they’ve been through so many men that they are now totally jaded and/or alpha widowed. This alone will eject them from ever being considered as marriage material. It’s sad.

So the poky little puppy had to go to bed without a single bite of shortcake, and he felt very sorry for himself.

Justification through Peer Identification

Despite all the advances that Female Empowerment and Women's Liberation has brought, she still cannot escape the social pressures of being single.

> "In our 20s, my friends and I used to revel in gossip and talk endlessly about the guys we were interested in; now, the subject is sensitively avoided, even within the sisterhood. The only people who do tend to ask whether we're seeing anyone are complete strangers, because relationship status is still considered a key component of small talk, a vital piece of the information trade, essential in categorising someone's identity.
>
> My friend Alex has a range of responses to the question "And do you have another half?" depending on which she thinks the other person can take. Her nuclear option, "No, I'm a whole person," is deployed only in the most desperate of circumstances."

The unavoidable truth is that our individual identities are forged in the furnace of our relationships.

- For Christians, this relationship is with Christ.
- For men, these relationships are with their business partners and weekend buddies.
- For the married, these relationships are with their spouse and children.
- For spinsters, these relationships are with the Chads and Brads of their youth.

The question of identity can only be answered by building relationships, and spinsters have great difficulty in embracing the identity that they have built for themselves through their choices about relationships.

Justification by ¡Science!

She writes that this intimation of perdition is backed up by ¡Science!

> As we age, the distance between our shared life experiences and viewpoints has only been widening. Professor Sasha Roseneil, author of The Tenacity of The Couple-Norm, published in November by UCL Press, says: "All sorts of processes of liberalisation have gone on in relationships, in the law and in policy." Her research focused on men and women between the ages of 30 and 55, the period in mid-life "when you're expected to be settled down in a couple and having kids".
>
> "But what our interviewees told us was that there remains at the heart of intimate life this powerful norm of the couple," says Roseneil. "And people struggle with that. Many of them long to be part of a couple – there was a lot of feeling of cultural pressure, but there was also a sense of that norm being internalised. Single people felt a bit of a failure, that something had gone wrong, and that they were missing out."

"…a sense of that norm being internalized" That is not a "norm", per se. That is the human heart calling out for love and belonging, and for a soul identity forged through a relationship. In other words, the relationships which have wrought their identities are a one-and-done interaction, and then they find that they have no one to walk through life with them, and help them work out their salvation. She more or less confirms this when she writes,

> *"Being a spinster can be isolating – it's easy to become convinced that no one else is quite as hopeless a case as you. It leaves us, the perennially unattached, asking ourselves big questions that we can't – daren't – articulate to others. Are we missing out on the greatest emotions a human can have? Shall we slide into selfishness, loneliness, or insignificance? Who will be there for us when we grow old? And is a life without intimate physical companionship one half-loved, and half-lived?"

¡Science! can never answer these questions, so ¡Science! is a dud.

Justification by Feminist Mythology

To answer these questions of the heart, she returns to the religious tenets of Feminism.

> "Within the framework of the current feminist narrative, there's a strong sense that the answer to each of the above should be no – or the questions shouldn't be asked at all. "We interviewed a lot of people around Europe and that's a very real early 21st-century experience for women," says Roseneil. "And people are conflicted – that's the mental essence of being human. They can simultaneously have contradictory feelings: on the one hand it's totally fine to be single and I can have a nice life, on the other hand – what am I missing out on and is there something wrong with me?"

As modern, single women, we are not supposed to feel that we're missing out. And so we feel obliged to hide any feelings of shame or inadequacy or longing.

> I know I don't want to take my many privileges for granted and I suspect that many single women in a similar position to me dread being thought of as whiny or desperate. And so we don't talk about the subject, and we try not to acknowledge that spinsters still exist."

Yes, privilege would be utterly shameful, not only to confess the relationships that formed their identity, but also to denounce Isis (the god of female empowerment) and Aphrodite (the god of gynocentric sexuality) as being insufficiently powerful enough to satisfy the needs of the heart and soul. I admire her bravery for writing such blasphemous doubts about the gods of this age.

> "Perhaps that's the reason that, instead of finding my #inspo from modern have-it-all heroines, I prefer to look back and learn from the spinsters who came before."

So she realizes that the justification through Feminist Mythology fails grandly.

Justification through Solipsism

Turning away from bad role models and engaging in more introspection are good, but it still falls short of a full repentance. But upon further introspection, she still tries to justify her solipsism, by blaming society and recounting the virtues of spinsters.

> "Western society has always struggled with the issue of what to do with unmarried women. Take the religious mania for persecuting so-called witches in the middle ages. Communities fixated on single women – their era's "other" – not only because they were suspicious of their alternative lifestyles, but because of the collective guilt over their inability to cater or care for them."

What she calls "collective guilt" is actually a healthy fear of corruption.

> [1] It is actually reported that there is sexual immorality among you, and such sexual immorality as is not even named among the Gentiles… [2] And you are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he who has done this deed might be taken away from among you. [3] For I indeed, as absent in body but present in spirit, have already judged (as though I were present) him who has so done this deed. [4] In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when you are gathered together, along with my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, [5] deliver such a one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.
> [6] Your glorying is not good. Do you not know that a little leaven leavens the whole lump? [7] Therefore purge out the old leaven, that you may be a new lump, since you truly are unleavened. For indeed Christ, our Passover, was sacrificed for us. [8] Therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, nor with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth.
> [9] I wrote to you in my epistle not to keep company with sexually immoral people.
>
> 1st Corinthians 5:1-9 (NKJV)

In Red Pill parlance, this mean that a few loose women in the community will ramp up the competition in the SMP and increase the rate of promiscuity. So it should not be tolerated.

> "When single women weren't assumed to be witches, they were often taken to be prostitutes – to such an extent that the two terms were interchangeable, including in court documents."

There is a fundamental reason for this, but feminists do not have the discernment nor the courage to articulate the truth of it like Samuel did.

> For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft,
> And stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry.
>
> 1st Samuel 15:23 (NKJV)

Now consider that,

> "Feminism is the promotion and glorification of rebellion."
>
> Deep Strength's Law of Feminism (2016 February 18)

However satisfying it might be to identify with rebellion, solipsism cannot answer the question of her heart either.

Historical Justifications

Next, the author launches into a 350-word historical review of wayward wimmin throughout western culture, from the original spinsters of the mid-1300s up to the flappers of the early 20th century, all trying to squeeze out some nuance of identity. She manages to find some nuance of a shared identity, but not one that ameliorates her condition. She concludes this review with the following statements.

> "What I love about these women is their spirit of urgency – they weren't waiting for anything. Of all the anxious experiences of spinsterhood, one of the most debilitating is the sense of a life on hold, incomplete."

This point does bring her to some introspection. Let's see where it leads her.

Justified by Immaturity and the Inability to Delay Gratification

Twice now in the article, she writes about how she admires women with a spirit of urgency. Whether this is to be admired or not all depends on what the urgency is all about. This goes back to the issue of choice and what exactly is chosen. Is all this talk about urgency just another verbalization of the importance of overcoming the Fear of Missing Out (FOMO) and embracing the You Only Live Once (YOLO) mythos? Or could this be better framed as the child who doesn't have enough self-control to delay gratification (as exemplified by the Marshmallow Test) but who does have the courage to be defiant?

> As Roseneil argues in her book, membership of grown-up society is marked by coupling. "There's something symbolic about transitioning into a permanent relationship that says you are an adult."

This is a separate topic entirely. What brings a person into the adult world? Is it merely sexual experience? A lack of love in the home of upbringing can surely thrust a young person into the adult world, but this doesn't imply that the person is truly an adult, especially in terms of his/her ability to form healthy boundaries and to assume the necessary responsibilities. However, at the same time, a lack of love prevents them from learning the self-confidence necessary to succeed, and so it places them at a severe disadvantage in the actual handling of the adult world.

> For those of us who haven't, and may never, make that step, we can be left with the strong impression – not just from society, but from within ourselves – that we're immature or underdeveloped. Consider another wave of "superfluous women", between the world wars, whose marriage prospects were shattered by the loss of an entire generation of young men. Popular history recast them as dilettantes and flappers: the spinster's contribution to national life once again belittled and mocked.

She is referring to the MMP fallout after WW1, in which millions of young women had been damaged by the war in some way, either by losing their father or husband (or potential husband). The lack of young men created a sex imbalance in which fewer women were able to marry and more women turned to "alternative lifestyles".

Justified by Herd Feeelings

We should not be surprised that her last thoughts in this post are about personal feelings and social conformity. Ultimately, it all comes back to Feeelings, and fitting into the Herd.

> No wonder modern spinsters feel conflicted about where we stand, and whether we're all we should be. When Professor Paul Dolan, a behavioural scientist at LSE, published research claiming that single women without children were happier than married ones, he was taken aback by the response. "I had lots of emails from single women saying thank you," says Dolan, "because now people might start believing them when they say they're actually doing all right." But more interesting was the reactions from people who didn't want to believe it.

It's more interesting to her (and less interesting to us) because misery loves company.

> "I'd underestimated how strongly people felt: there was something really insulting about choosing not to get married and have kids. It's all right to try and fail – but you'd better try. So with these competing narratives, you would be challenged internally as a single woman, where your experiences are different to what they're expected to be."

Yes, people have a deep visceral disgust to spinsters (s1uts, and wh0res too) because of many reasons. Most obviously, they are defiled,* meaning that they are unfit for, and perhaps even corrosive to a family-based society. This is noteworthy because marriage and family is the setting and context in which people come to know God. If a person outrightly rejects this, then it's a slap in the Creator's face. Thus, spinsterhood, in its most egregious form, is not only a rejection of the continuance of society, as well as the race and tribe, it's also an insult to God, who commanded us to procreate and "fill the earth".

> Whether a spinster is happy with her state depends, of course, not just on her personality, her circumstances, and her mood at the moment you ask her, but an ambivalent definition of contentment. We struggle to remember that, says Dolan, because our human psychology doesn't deal well with nuance. "Almost everything > you experience is a bit good and a bit bad. But with marriage and singleness it's not voiced the same way. You've ticked off this box and got married so you must be happy. The divorce rates show that's categorically untrue."

Happiness as an indicator of self-worth is sorely inadequate. She is right that marriage and having a family is also no guarantee of happiness. Marriage and having a family doesn't even guarantee that you'll "find God". But embracing Headship is the one thing that is available to everyone in life that is most conducive to that end.

 I am not saying that all single women are defiled, but only those who become spinsters by willingly choosing the Feminist Life Script (and all the profound sin that it entails) over marriage and family.*

Epilogue

After all this frustration, readers will hope to find satisfaction in how the author, and women like her, might see the wisdom of repentance. But because of the plethora of justifications, repentance is still not on her table of options. Instead, we get a dismissive line about "the conversation".

> It is time, surely, to change the rules, and the conversation. As the population of never-married women expands, we should be honest about what it meant, and means, to be one. We should celebrate our identity and the life experience that has given it to us. We should reclaim our history and stop being defined by others. Why not start by taking back that dread word, spinster?

The problem with this plan is that it does not respect God's Covenant Law, and it works against God's ordained order. So by embracing this mindset, they are setting themselves up for a lifetime of angst, disappointment, and loneliness.

Oh my… Isn't that what she is discovering now? Yet in spite of imminent catastrophe, they still seek to justify themselves. SMH…

Related

- Σ Frame: Women's choice to be relevant (2020 February 6)
- Σ Frame: It was god's will for her to be a stripper. (2021 January 22)

The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market

Novaseeker · 17 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women have a significant advantage in the Mating Marketplace. Here's why.

Readership: All
Author's Note: Cameron232 requested this post, which will sum up some Classic Manosphere Lore and includes some infographics from online dating websites.
Reader's Note: I realize that the "visual attractiveness rating numbers" for women are generally a topic of nearly endless fascination and conversation in the sphere, and in general among men as well. This, however, is not the topic of this post, and is a sidelight. Leaving aside the specific "ratings" (which represent my own take on the issue as is fairly well-known) in terms of which "ratings" of women are in which "slice" above, and the issue of which "rating" or "band" a specific woman or type of women fits into, the general distribution of women in the SMP (and therefore indirectly in the MMP via "dating"), by general level of attractiveness, is generally as set forth here. We are planning to publish a separate post on the "ratings" questions, which will address in some detail the methodological, practical, and personal issues that the "ratings" question tends to raise in discussion. Readers are asked to defer a more detailed discussion of those issues for that post.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

Finding a "great" mate has always been highly competitive, and thus very difficult. In a sense, it is the "great game" of the early years of adult life. In prior eras, the outcomes reached by individual people in that race differed greatly, but in general, most people did marry, due to many pressures that existed. These pressures to marry came from all angles, socially, religiously, culturally, economically, and from family. Because of these pressures, the average period of singleness was short lived and marriages were largely assortative. More attractive prospects couldn't "hold out" and "test the water" indefinitely, because this was simply neither feasible nor tolerated for most of history, even until the relatively recent past of the mid-20th Century.

But during the 1955-1975 timeframe, there was a drastic change in the social and economic conditions that dramatically and decisively altered the mate market in significant ways.

The underlying reasons for this can be traced to an array of social shifts and technological developments during the critical period of the social revolution which took place between 1955 and 1975 which have together worked to remove many of the natural constraints that limited the full exercise of hypergamic mate selection. In his post, The Six Sirens of The Sexual Apocalypse (March 17, 2016), Chateau Heartiste set out a list of these factors defining the change:

1. Effective and widely available contraceptives (the Pill, condom, and, the de facto “fallback” contraceptive, abortion).
2. Easy no-fault divorce on economic and other terms that are generally very favorable to women, irrespective of the marital economics, and unfavorable to men.
3. Women’s economic independence (hurtling towards women’s economic advantage if the college enrollment ratio and relative income levels among younger generations is any indication).
4. Rigged feminist-inspired laws that have created less incentives in favor of marriage for men and an greater incentives in favor of divorce for women.
5. Penicillin and related antibiotics (reduced the cost of contracting STDs).
6. Widely available hardcore pornography (decreased marginal participation rates of men in the SMP and MMP).

Since this post was written, this list has expanded to include others.

- Equal Opportunity Legislation and The Tender Years Doctrine which created economic leverage and independence for women.
- The centrality of sex in Western culture, and the widespread social acceptance of sexual liberation.
- The predominance of Chivalrous norms, and other prevailing lore such as the “Soul Mate Myth” and “Friends First”, that places men under the sexual authority and the service of women.
- Within the church, there is the flaccid “love and forgive” social atomosphere.
- Social media and dating websites which employ the power of digital aggregation to provide women whoards of opportunities with men.
- SMS and internet communications which are convenient and easy to hide and delete.

Most of these changes revolved around the fundamental goals Feminists have for social change.

To a great extent, the difference between the market that existed before that period and the one that has existed since then (and to a greater and greater degree the further removed temporally we get from that period) is that, under the “old” system, if you were like most people and didn’t get to have a “great” mate, you still mostly ended up in an “okay” situation, which was at least tolerable, at least most of the time, and quite a few people ended up in situations that were pleasant and happy despite not having an objectively “great” mate. And of course there were quite a few people “stuck” in crappy marriages, too — not as many as the feminists of today like to claim, but it also was non-zero. All this changed, and changed substantially, when the mating market was reformulated in the wake of sexual liberalization and female economic independence.

The Two Pillars of Female Power in the Mating Market

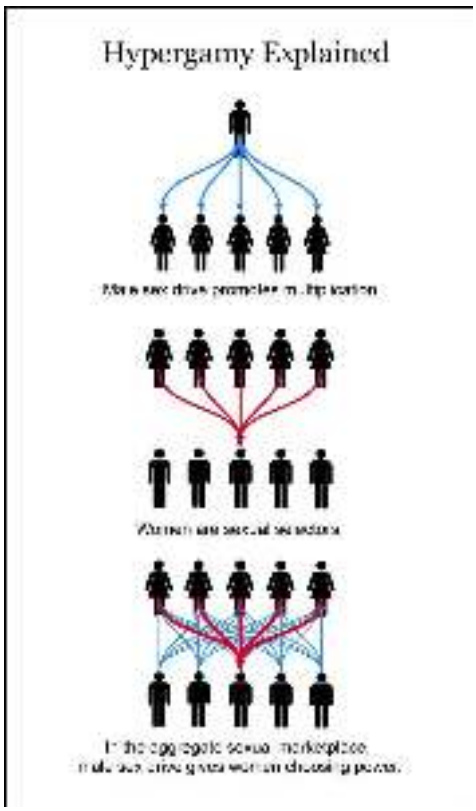
Among the factors listed above, sexual liberalization and female economic independence are the two outstanding changes responsible for the current mating market. Namely, the advent of (1) safe, legal, and reliably obtained abortion, (2) cheap, effective contraception, coupled with (3) the transformation of the economy in such a way that many new jobs were created which did not require or even place a premium on size or strength.

The simple and obvious reality is that when you take pregnancy and economic dependency out of the equation, together with the related social pressures that arose from these two base realities, women are by and large "freed up" from the necessity of mate selection, and therefore select mates on other attributes. Due to women's pronounced hypergamic tendencies, this selection is primarily based on desire, which results in a very concentrated skew in female mate selection upwards — that is, directed at better-than-assortative men.

1967

The Nature of Applied Hypergamy in the Mating Market

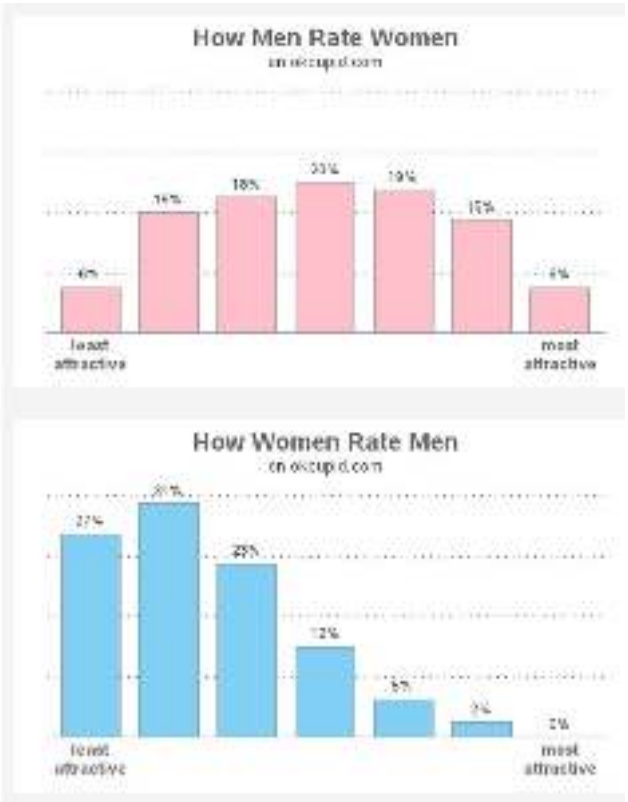
A mating market which features far less temporal pressure to marry (and, indeed, features a fair amount of pressure to delay marrying) will feature an extended period of "dating", which, since the period of the social revolution, has been the primary locus of pre-marital sex, and a high number of other no-strings or otherwise low commitment sexual encounters (yesterday's "pick up ONS" and today's app hookups). The reason a liberalized market plays out this way is because of the basic nature of men and women, i.e. applied hypergamy. The following image depicts how women strongly desire top men, while these men are quite willing to choose more than one woman, thereby creating a glut that destroys assortative mating.



Due to the generally higher male libido and perceived “sexual need” of men (not in every case, but enough generally so as to skew the entire market), any market that is primarily, or even substantially, about sex will feature much greater male demand expressed at all levels of the market than female demand, other than at the very top of the male side of the market due to the concentration of female demand there … so that in the rest of the market outside the top 10% (or so, now due to the tightening effect caused by the rise of swipe/phone dating apps and their intensified screening of men) of males, women are the “sellers”, and men are the “buyers”. This fundamental inequality in demand is why the world features such things as Instagram, and OnlyFans, and internet porn, and cam girls, and sugar babies, and all the rest as well — male demand substantially exceeds female demand, such that females are “sellers” and can, if they wish, literally charge men fairly easily as we have seen recently.

Very Few Men Can Satisfy Hypergamy

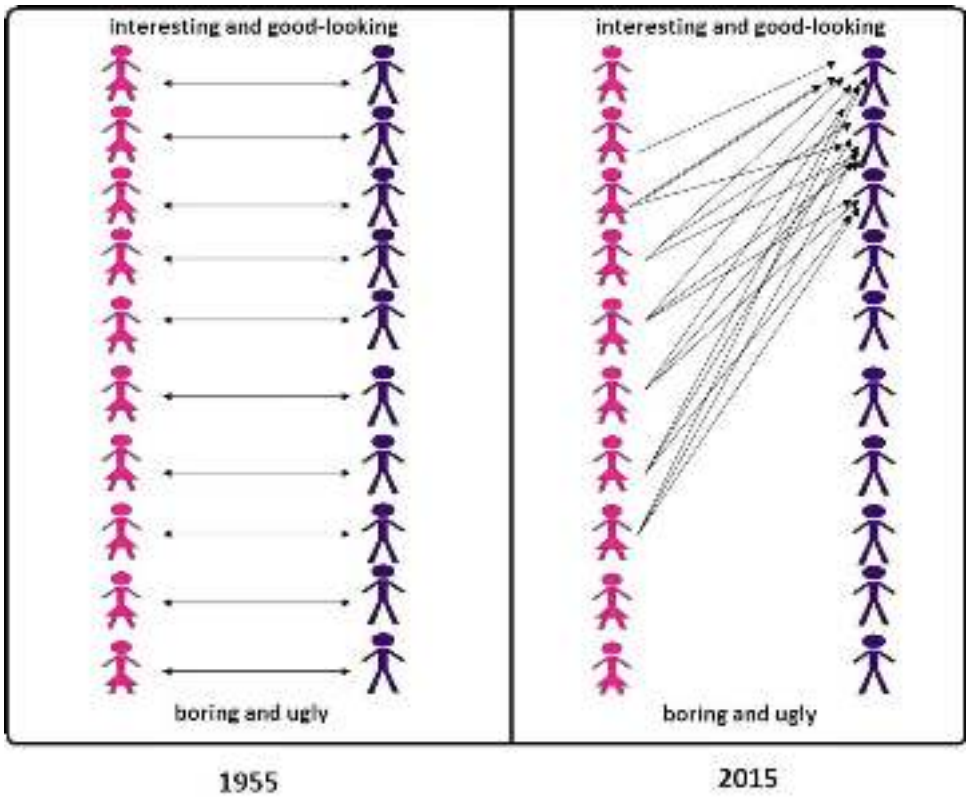
Another feature of human nature that plays into the mix and greatly exacerbates the glut is that men regard womens’ collective attractiveness by a normal distribution, whereas women tend to view most men as unattractive. This tendency is reflected in the following graph based on OK Cupid data, which illustrates the skew in perceived attractiveness between men and women, and how womens’ high attractiveness ratings are concentrated towards a very small group of men, as compared with how men tend to perceive attractiveness in women.



This means that very few men (currently estimated to be about 10%) are deemed by women to be attractive, and therefore can satisfy womens' desire for expressed hypergamy. It should be well noted that this difference in perceived attractiveness is basically equivalent to sexual authority. The result is that only these men are "chosen" by women.

The Resulting Glut in the Mating Market

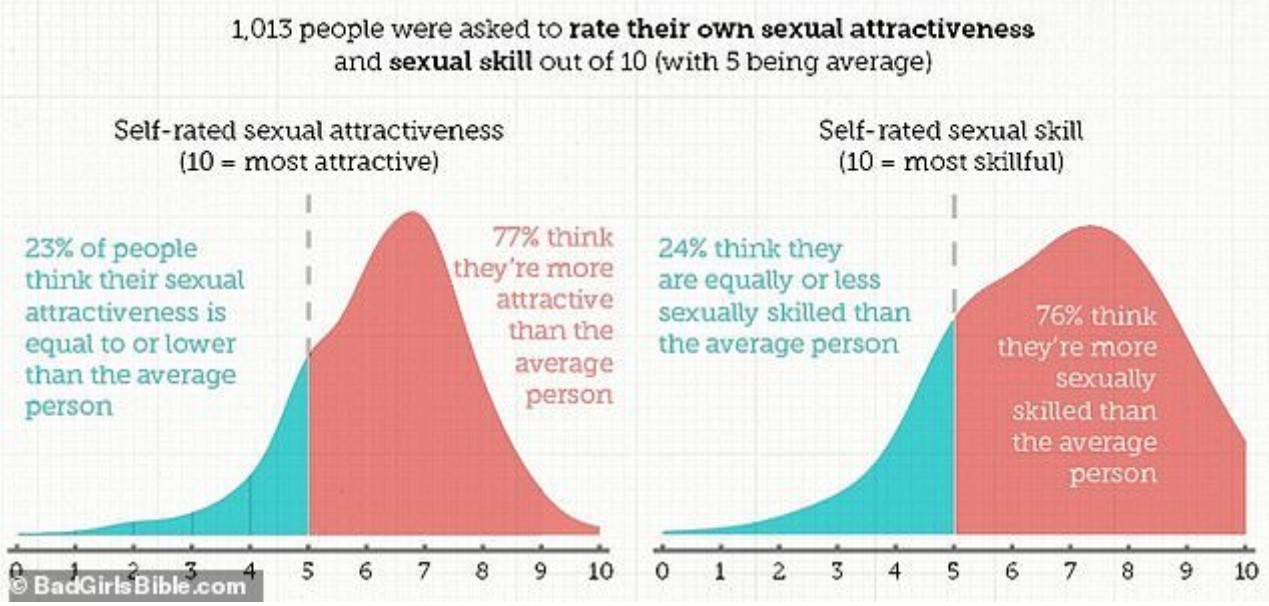
The following graphic displays well the change I am describing in this article and the impact on the SMP/MMP.



The left side is the way “dating and mating” are generally distributed (there always were outliers, but this was the general distribution) among males in a system where (1) unavoidable, not easily/safely/legally terminable pregnancy is generally the result of sex and (2) the economy did not provide a lot of jobs that could be done by women for the same, or better, economic remuneration as men. This kind of a system encourages assortative mating because there is timing pressure exerted on virtually all market participants, as explained above.

The right side shows how “dating and mating” are generally distributed among males in a system where (1) pregnancy is opt-in at the woman’s sole discretion and (2) the economy provides a plentiful amount of economic opportunities for women to earn as much as, if not more than, peer-aged men. This kind of a system encourages hypergamous skew in mating because there is much less timing pressure, until a later period, and market participants therefore feel free to optimize mate selection opportunities based on their actual market power apart from such pressures.

The distribution on the right side alters somewhat when women decide that they definitely want to marry (which in most places in the US appears to be in the late 20s, while in the larger urban metros it is now in the early 30s), such that the interest expressed towards the men begins to encompass the top 50-60% of men for the first time.



Caveats

Some may object that the mate market is not actually liberalized due to the current divorce regime in the United States, in particular, which in many ways remains punitive for men and beneficial for women. While it may be true that the marriage market itself has not been entirely liberalized due to the divorce regime experienced by men once they are married, it is nevertheless true that…

1. The sexual market in which the marriage market is, for almost all participants, deeply embedded, has been almost totally liberalized in the sense of having the previously applicable “rules” removed from it.
2. The overall pressure to marry is overall much less (for reasons discussed above), which results in more “holding out” for better-than-assortative mate pairings, predominantly among women, in the marriage market itself due to the prevalence of “dating” (which is fundamentally a vehicle of the sexual market) which, quite apart from divorce law, creates pressure on assortative pairings in the midrange of the attraction curve.
3. The effect of the punitive divorce regime, due to its flipping of marriage from an economic necessity for women to an economic windfall for many of them, actually serves to amplify the other trends exerting pressure on the sexual and marital market places, all in the direction of more delay, holding out, and attempted hypergamous optimization.

I also note that it is possible to characterize the current mating market(s) as “scientifically subsidized”, rather than liberalized, because one of the main factors was, in fact, the removal, scientifically, of the main natural “check” on behavior in the market (i.e., female pregnancy), such that the resulting market is actually a “subsidized” one rather than a “liberalized” one. While I agree with the underlying point that the “natural check” has been removed, nevertheless I think this perspective obscures more than it explains, because the impact of the removal of that natural check was the near wholesale removal of all of the existing “rules” of the market and their replacement with one base rule. It seems to me that a change in the market that is characterized by the dramatic reduction in the number of rules applicable to market participants is clearly best viewed as a “liberalized” market, in terms of the end effect on the market participants, even if the underlying cause of that liberalization, or removal of rules, was, itself, a kind of science/technology-based removal of the “natural check” on market behavior which had led to the development of the various, overlapping, “rules” on participation in the mating market prior to the sexual revolutionary period.

Flexing for women, 2021

The New Power Distribution

Under the “new rules” market, the top men hold the most power (smallest in number for the demand related to them), followed by the top women, followed by the top half or so of women, followed by the next group of men (in most markets this used to be the group between the 60th and 80th percentiles, but with the rise of phone/swipe dating apps, women’s screening has become substantially more empowered, and therefore more stringent, such that in many markets this group is now stretching upwards so that it runs from the mid to upper 60 percentiles to the upper 80 percentiles of men), followed by the next 1/3 of the women, followed by the men between the 40 and 60-65 (mid-range men) percentile, followed by the remainder of the women, followed by the remainder of the men.

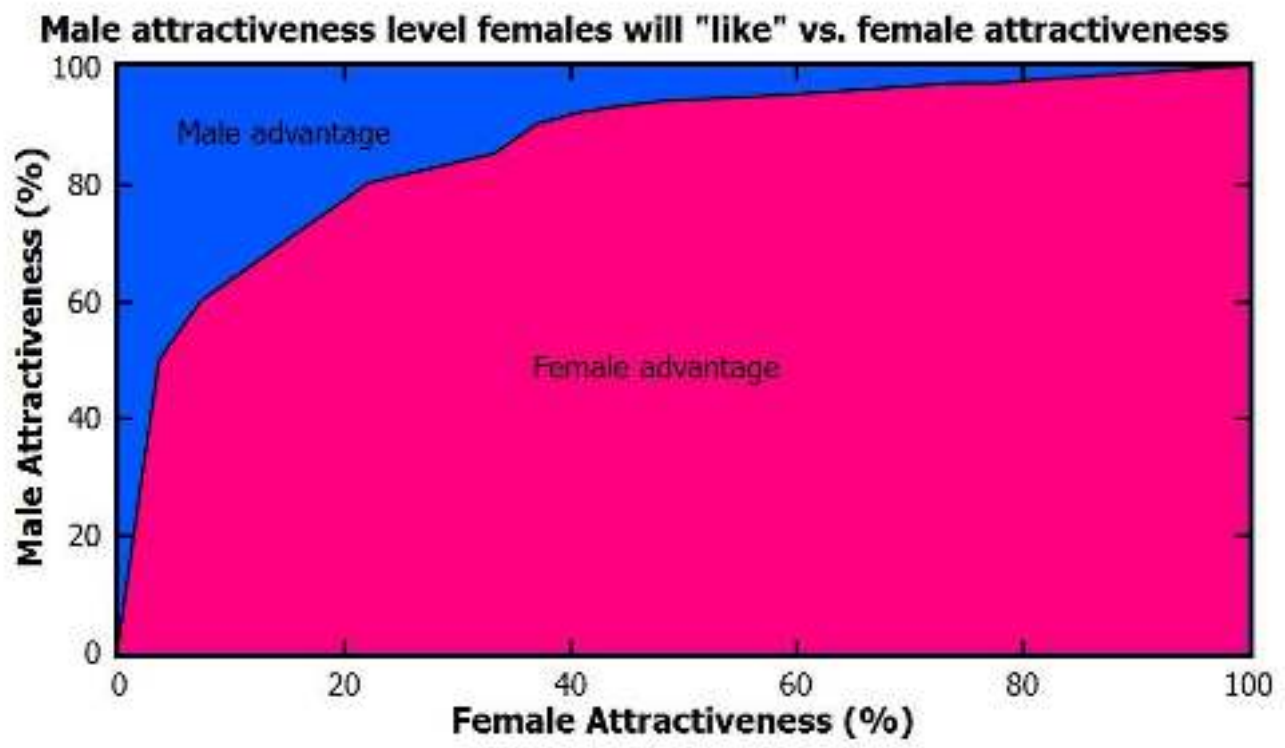
So like this (women are indicated in red):

1. Top 10% of men (used to be top 15-20% before phone/swipe dating apps)
2. Top women (9s, 10s for most men) … not close to 10%, more like 1-2%
3. Rest of the Top 50% of women (5s-8s for most men)
4. Men in percentile 65-90 (used to be men between 60 and 80)
5. Next 30% of women (3s-4s for most men)
6. Men in percentile 40-60-65
7. Remainder of women (1s-2s for most men)

8. Remainder of men (percentiles 1-39).

As you can see, there are more women towards the top of the power structure than men. This means that half of the women are more empowered than 80-90% of the men in the market … something which leads to alpha chasing (women are generally not attracted to men whom they know they have power over) and long droughts for the men below the top 10-20%, even if true "incels" are concentrated at the lower rungs. And even though only those men are truly "incels", men are disadvantaged relative to women at all levels of the market apart from the very top … even at the bottom they are disadvantaged relative to women at the bottom.

Here's another graph based on data from Tinder that shows why there is an imbalance in the power dynamic between men and women. This has been circulating around the Manosphere for a few years, but it still applies.



As you can see, the attraction ratio is far from linear. It is heavily skewed in favor of women.

Conclusions

The principal difference between the "old" mating market and the one we experience today is that the market has been liberalized, largely due to technological advances and economic changes. This "free market" allows market participants to engage in sexually liberal practices with very few rules, limited primarily by the extent of their value in the marketplace.

The bottom line is that when you remove pregnancy and economic dependency, the market becomes largely about sex and sexual desire. Again, this is so even in the MMP, due to the nature of "dating", even if it is somewhat lessened because of the presence of other factors that play a stronger relative role in that market than they do in the SMP, where they play almost no role whatsoever. And any market that is substantially about sex and sexual desire will always favor women over men because men, on average and on the population level (that is, outliers aside), desire sex-qua-sex more than women do. Substantially more. Any market that is "liberalized" in such a way that it boils down to sexual desire will always disfavor men, barring strange scenarios like vast male shortages due to warfare and the like. A "liberalized" market for mating simply doesn't work — for either men or women, generally, other than for the top men, who are better positioned than they have been for thousands of years, perhaps for all time to date.

In the long run this “new lack of rules” market based on sexual desire doesn’t actually serve the women market participants either, because they are increasingly left with relatively unattractive men as options for mates once they are finished exploiting the height of their own market power during their 20s and earlier 30s. This negative impact is something that most contemporary women don’t worry about until the mid-30s, and that’s just human nature — most humans of both sexes have terrible future time orientation innately unless it is forced on them by external constraints and/or social expectations and rules.

Related

- The Rational Male: The Global Sexual Marketplace (2019 February 27)
- Σ Frame: Is the Christian Red Pill a Black Pill? (2020 November 29)

Sexual competition continues after marriage

Jack · 19 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Married couples have a duty to remain the apple of the other's eye.

Readership: Married couples;
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Attention is Womens' Sexual Currency

Deti wrote,

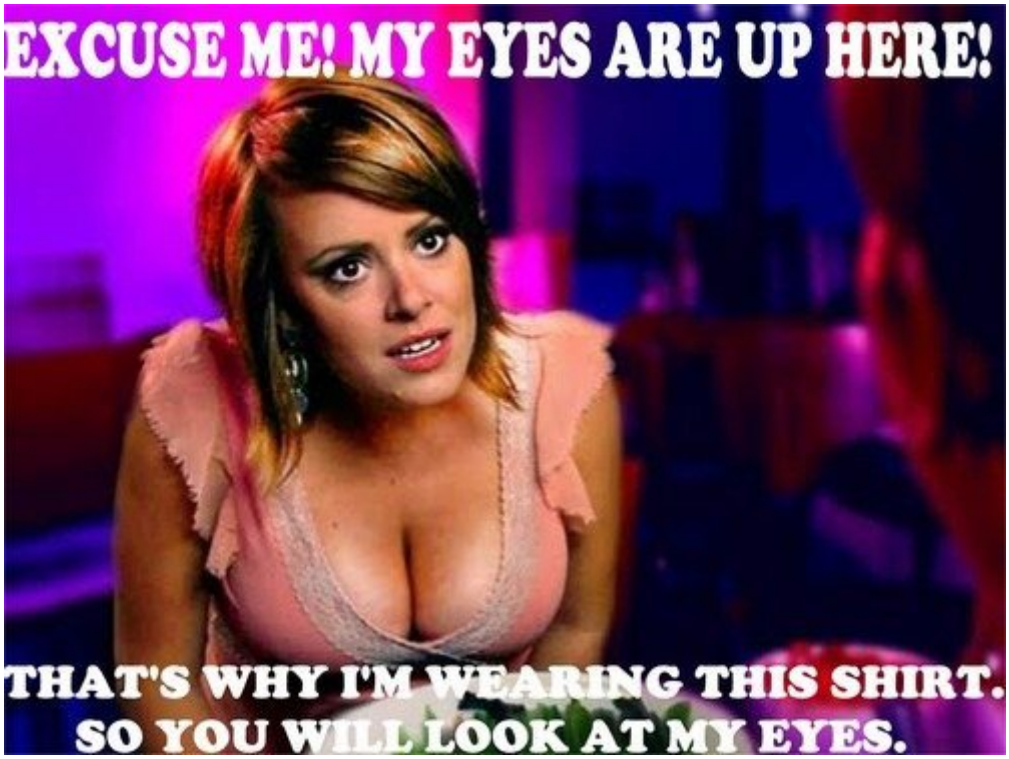
> "Women want attention. They absolutely crave it, like men crave the sexual act. If a woman has to have sex with a man to get and keep his attention (or money, or whatever else she wants from that man), she'll do it even if she's not sexually aroused. Of course if she's around an attractive man who's pushing the buttons, she will get aroused, but it's not necessary for her to have sex.
>
> This is a reason why more and more girls are turning to sugaring. They get attention. They get money. They can't seem to get boyfriends to take them out and pay, so they turn to sugaring. They can't seem to get men to bite the bullet and wife them up, at least not until she panics and he relents because he's so hard up. So they turn to sugaring. They are prostitutes for all intents and purposes, but they really don't care and don't have any kind of moral problem with this at all.
>
> It's because women want attention, and they'll get it any way they can. Just as men want sex, and they'll get it any way they can."

As NovaSeeker pointed out recently, ALL attention is sexual attention, and women's drive for (sexual) attention is intense. Women have complex mechanisms to attract the attention that they need without giving the outward appearance of neediness. The next section will examine one such example.

Visual Shamelessness to the World

In a previous post, PW – When wanton treachery brings shame not honor (2020 October 14), I tackled the false claim that women's bodies are something to be ashamed of. Mature women know inwardly (at some level) that men are visually oriented and are easily distracted by the feminine form, and that this causes men to focus on their fleshly desires and give the woman the attention she covets. (See Romans 8:5-8.) But some women make this claim that her body "is nothing to be ashamed of" or "I'm just being my sexy self", so that they can be the centerpiece of (sexual) attention by showcasing their silhouettes of skin, while outwardly denying the fact that men are visually stimulated. It's a self-defense measure — gaslighting in the form of Plausible Deniability. Womens' underlying purpose of denying this reality is so that they can dress provocatively to attract mens' attention and still avoid contingent responsibility for any unwanted consequences that might arise.

All this is just another take on how women hold predominant power and control over the mating market. But they run into a problem when they want to be taken seriously…



Women are Sexually Oriented

Looking at this from the other side of the aisle, women are enticed by a charismatic man who is good looking, and has power, status, athleticism, and money (PSALM). Just as men have a radar to detect the female form, women also have a sixth sense for scoping out men. Cameron did some introspection from this perspective.

> "…I have some reservations about the Christian bodybuilding thing you see promoted on some Christian Manosphere sites. When I used to lift weights and got fairly big, women definitely noticed, including Christian women. One of [my] wife's friends made an explicit remark [about my physique], and another Christian friend of hers told [my] wife how she wished her husband did the same thing.
>
> This doesn't seem charitable to other men to encourage their wives to look at you (I don't mean to sound arrogant as if I was God's gift to women. I am simply relating my experiences).
>
> I understand not wanting to be a fat slob, and some of the young boys are really skinny and weak from doing nothing but playing video games. But I don't think inciting attraction in other men's wives is a very Christian thing to do. Women can and do lust too."

Yes, women, especially younger women, are always on the lookout, sizing up men according to their socio-sexual rank, among other things. But very few men can elicit a sexual reaction from women like Cameron did. Those few men who are able do so are reaping the benefits of genetics and upbringing, so they really don't need to try very hard. In contrast to women, men are not as acutely aware of the impact they have on women, nor are they so hungry for female attention in itself. Cameron was unaware of this until two women made explicit remarks. For men, coitus and especially insemination is necessary to obtain an ego payoff of comparable intensity.

The Shame of Illicit or Unintended IOIs

Contrary to what women might claim, there's nothing shameful about the body itself. The shame arises when an individual presents his/her body as a vector of lecherous lust and illicit temptation outside of marriage.

Ed Hurst summed it up like this.

> "There's nothing shameful about the human body. What is shameful is exhibiting that body to people whom God says don't have the proper privilege for seeing it. Outside of the covenant marriage bedroom, no one is authorized by God to see it. There's a reason that, after the Fall, God gave Adam and Eve coverings that they didn't need before the Fall. We are fallen; we need covering. Covering symbolizes a whole range of things."

When Ed talks about "exhibiting the body", he means the nude body, or the body in very revealing, provocative clothing, which in many cases, is casually labeled attention getting. But a woman doesn't even need to show her skin suit to do this. Remember NovaSeeker's axiom: To women, ALL attention is sexual attention! Depending on the socio-sexual rank of the man, sometimes this attention is wanted, and other times, it is not.

It is for this reason that men always have to be careful whenever they are interacting with a woman in a formal setting. If a man does anything that might be interpreted by her as an Indicator of Interest (e.g., a smile, extended eye contact, frequent interaction, or simply failing to break off a conversation in a curt and decisive manner), a woman will interpret this as a sexual advance, whether it is intended to be or not!

Women's propensity to interpret everything through a sexualized lens is all very taxing on men, especially to those men who can't measure up to the hypergamic expectations of the female's imaginations. This phenomenon is greatly exacerbated because of the centrality of sex in Western culture.

Visual Gatekeeping in Marriage

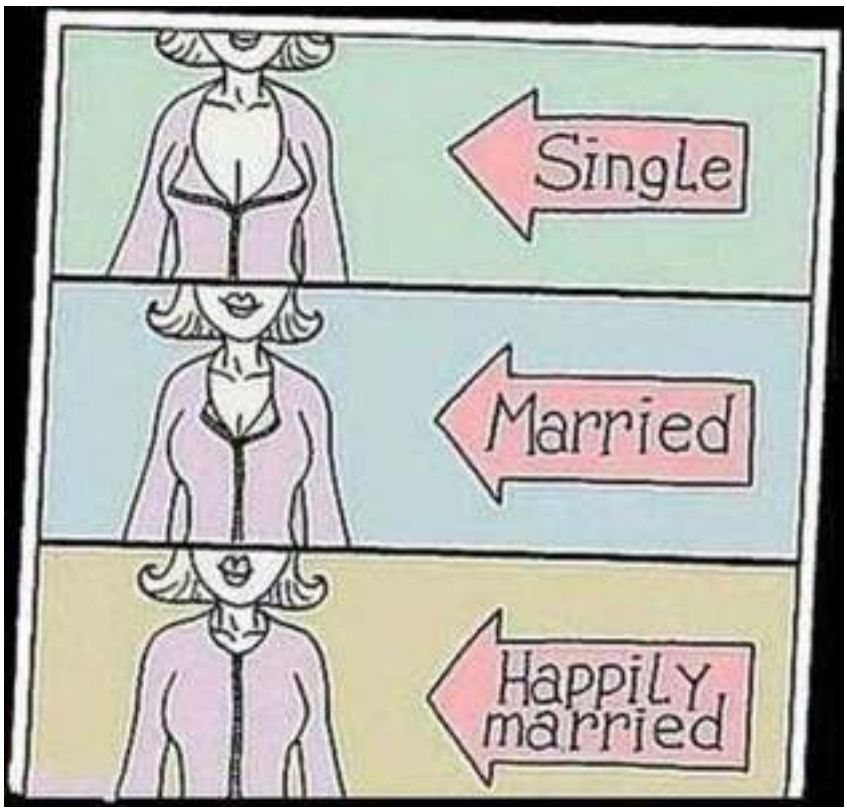
What I have described so far is just one side of the coin. The other side is how wives (and some husbands) fail, or even refuse to show off their bodies to their spouses. This is surprising, seeing how women crave attention like men crave sex, as Deti described above. So we have to ask ourselves why this is.

In some cases with people who have a hot body and a heady libido, this takes the form of hard gatekeeping, i.e. refusing visual or sexual access to one's body, sometimes called "closing the door" (in the physical sense) or "putting up a wall" (in the emotional sense). In other cases with people who have a weaker sex appeal or who have an insufficient determination to preserve sexual inclinations after marriage, they simply stop making any effort. This is colloquially called "letting themselves go".

Imagine a husband who comes home after a long, unnerving day at work, and he wants some genuine affection from his wife — a titty show or a lap dance — to set himself in the proper mood to share the evening with his family. After all, "women's bodies are nothing to be ashamed of", right? But this is not the response that many husbands get from their wives upon coming home. Suddenly and for no apparent reason, the wife is "ashamed" of her body, and proceeds to hamsterize a different kind of Plausible Deniability, all done in an effort to close the door on him.

- "I'm too tired."
- "I have a headache."
- "I need to take a bath first."
- "I need to do X, Y, Z… right now. Maybe later…"
- "The kids are in the next room. They might hear us."

Isn't it funny (in a cynical way), how women are quite eager to show off their bodies to everyone and his handsome cousin, except the man God intended them to show their bodies to? They want to be sexually objectified by the world, but at the same time, they want to be taken seriously by their husbands. It should be the other way around.



If we compare women's need for attention to mens' need for sex, then a woman who forfeits mens' sexual attentions by "letting herself go" is like a man clipping his own balls off! Going into decline must be suffocating to a woman's desire for attention! And yet we see not just a few, but lots of women taking this path! (We also see lots of women going to extensive lengths to maintain a youthful image too, all in an effort to preserve her sexual currency assets in garnering that precious attention.)

The only motivations I can come up with as to why a woman would do this to her husband (i.e. intentionally deny him regular visual access to her body), is just sheer hatred for the man in the case of "closing the door", and hatred for herself in the case of "letting herself go". (This might explain men's visceral disgust for blimps.) She might also simply hate the fact that she's no longer free to swing from one tree stand to another in the open market.

This dynamic works the other way too, with a few variations in the respective sexual currencies. Just as a woman who covers up or blows up after marriage is defrauding her husband out of some measure of joy, a man who quits his job, and chugs his way towards having a beer belly is doing an injustice to his wife.

Given the centrality of sex in Western culture, for a man (or woman) married to such a person, it is easy to understand how temptation and/or shame (for both men and women) is always no farther away than the adjacent office cubicle or a few clicks on a mating website (e.g. Ashley M@dison, Bumble, OnlyFans, Tinder, Tumblr, etc.).

Food can stay fresh past the expiration date with proper care

In the title of this post, I stated that sexual competition continues after marriage. By this, I don't mean competition for sexual intercourse (as in swinging), but rather competition for sexual market position. Married individuals have a responsibility to stay crisp and fresh, and remain the primary object of their spouse's desire. In our grandparents' day, this wasn't always so important, but in the current oversexualized cultural climate, it has become essential in avoiding a decline in social capital (i.e. protecting one's bank account and reputation), maintaining authority in a relationship, and preventing an affair.

People should know that they need to conform to our God ordained, "traditional" gender roles if they ever hope to be married. But after getting married, they need to continue the same habits that got them into marriage. Wife Goggles alone can work wonders, but it's unwise for a wife to put all her eggs in that basket, so to speak.

The same applies for men too, maybe even more so, this day and age. It's a losing strategy to allow yourself to grow lazy and complacent, and drop the ball after marriage.

Some readers may object to this by arguing that many wives want their husbands to dress down, and they don't object when he develops a dad bod. Be ye herewith informed that there are several ominous reasons for this.

- It's much easier to take a casual approach.
- They don't want to feel pressured to maintain themselves.
- They don't want to feel jealous.
- They don't want to deal with the envy of their friends.
- It reduces the chances that you might ever receive advances or invitations from other women.
- They don't want to worry about you ever having an affair.
- It cuts down your ability to employ Dread Game, which is one of the most effective tools of wife management.
- It reduces your authority over her body and her sexual desire, thus giving her a false sense of comfort and control.
- It reduces the opportunities that you have to advance yourself in life.

In sum, it assuages her ego needs and gives her greater leverage of control over her husband's life.

Men, don't fall for this!

It goes the other way too. I'll offer my own story on this.

Case Study 1 — Teaching my wife to be presentably attractive

My wife has a very voluptuous body. When I met her, she had a habit of dressing in baggy raggy, ripped-up cottons. I asked her why she always dressed down. She said it was less time consuming, more convenient, more comfortable, and it averted a lot of unwanted attention from men. I told her, "No, I am a Christian and a professor. As long as you're with me, you're going to dress and act like a lady." I took her shopping and bought her some elegant clothing. This made her feel loved, and it also renewed her self-esteem. Then whenever she acted in a manner that was unbecoming of a lady, I pointed it out and took her to task. Sometimes I had to instruct her about the particulars. In the early years of our marriage, this made her angry. She said I was too demanding and too controlling, but I did not admit her argument. Over time, she eventually realized that being a lady had its own set of benefits, and that I was dead serious about this expectation, and then she started to shape up.

Focus on your own marriage first

The last four memes shown in this post compare how a woman carries herself when she is in a relationship with a man to how she presents herself when she is not formally attached. We think these memes are funny because they are true, but actually, it is sad. When a woman is single, she's fishing for (sexual) attention and so she presents herself as sexually vivacious. When a woman is in a relationship, she doesn't need to do the work of playing the honey and displaying her sex appeal to her man in order to get attention from him, although she should if they are married. She also feels ashamed of herself for doing the same things to attract attention as she did before. Women who show this kind of change between being single and taken are quite self-centered at heart. It should be the other way around. She should be working to attract and keep her man's attention while being respectable in public. But we know very few women are actually this way.

It works the opposite way for men. When men are in a relationship, they have a venue in which their ego needs can be fulfilled, and they can therefore grow and shine. In addition, Preselection draws more interest from other women. So the challenge for married men is to stay focused on the woman they're with.

Case Study 2 — Cameron

I want to go back to Cameron's comment earlier in this post. He is aware of the effects of his sexual presence, and this is a good quality for a man to have. However, I think he may have been focused on the wrong things. His first priority should be to consider the overall impact that his physique has on his wife. But instead, he was thinking about how his appearance thrilled other women, and then he felt self-conscious. His wife's friends may have felt envious, but provided that his marriage is solid, his wife probably felt thankful to be married to him — and blessed! Cameron's manly physique is undoubtedly a vector of his wife's attraction to him. Moreover, it is his scepter of his sexual authority over her desire. (Sorry, I don't mean to strafe Cameron by pointing this out. I just want to provide an alternate viewpoint for the sake of discussion.)

Think about this from a man's perspective. Would you want your wife to get fat and dress like a hag, just to prevent other men from looking at her? Is this the right way to avoid introducing temptation? No, you would want your wife to look her best at all times. Her cleanliness, hair, physical appearance, and style of dress are a representative social expression of her righteousness, her SMV, her authority over her husband's body (i.e. his sexual value and desire), and the sum total contributes to the glory of God! The same goes for men too.

Food can stay fresh in the proper container

Instead of taking the easy route, both husbands and wives should do what they can to maintain their SMV after marriage, because one of the top priorities of marriage is to keep your spouse titillated with the sensual pleasures of your body. The best way to avoid an affair is to hold your spouse's sexual attention with regular visual and sexual treats. If any person wants to throw their marriage to the rats and encourage the other to have an affair, the easiest and fastest way to do this is to become slavishly lazy and out of shape such that all sexual desire is obliterated. Add on top of this a little bit of carelessness and disrespect, and this will surely do the trick.

When a husband and wife get fit, dress up, and look their best, they are expressing their identities as a sanctified married couple and children of God. They are also putting competitive pressure on all those around you to step up their game and increase their own social value. As Christians, we should not shy away from this challenge by holding the lazy thought that by doing so, we are merely increasing temptation or giving a sin a foothold. Do not focus on sin and the flesh, but instead, focus on emanating the power and the glory of God. I like to think that the Holy Spirit would make this clear to the believer, however it seems that wives need to be continually reminded of the importance of looking attractive, yet modest.

In short, all this is to say, be someone that other people want to be around — especially your spouse.

And also, keep her on her toes, gentlemen!

Related

- Do What's Right (Ed Hurst): Against the Sport of Bodybuilding (2020 October 17)
- Σ Frame: Formal attire is making a comeback. (2020 October 21)

The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market

Novaseeker · 22 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Young people must run the gauntlet of the SMP just to get into the MMP!

Readership: All
Theme: The Winter of Discontent
Length: 2,150 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Introduction

In a previous post, The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021/2/17), I reviewed how economic and technological changes, as well as shifting social norms and undying human nature, have all created a lopsided mating market that generally favors women over men, apart from the very top level male participants in the market.

To recap briefly, the rise of the most influential "objective" factors of cheap, reliable, and legal contraception (and, later, legal and safe abortion) and economic independence for women, in turn led to the emergent imbalance of power and female dominance within the nascent "sexual market place" (SMP), and the interrelated "marriage market place" (MMP), which we see today.

While the adage that "a rising tide raises all boats" is probably true of the current SMP in general in that most people overall probably have more pre-marital sexual encounters than they did in 1950, the distribution of even these sexual encounters is wildly uneven, due the hypergamous skew of the liberalized market.

Due to the inherent link between the SMP and the MMP, the process of finding a suitable marriage partner has become significantly to substantially harder for both sexes under the liberalized system of the SMP/MMP/"dating market" than it was under the "old rules" and their related pressures, prior to the sexual revolution.

This post will describe the dynamics of how the old system was replaced by a liberalized market, and how the sexual market has stabilized as the new marriage market.

Drawing by Marguerite Martyn of Soulard Market, St. Louis, in 1912.

The Old Market vs. the New Market

A market is liberalized when the rules which govern the market are relaxed or, in some cases, removed, thereby permitting more "freedom of action" to market participants. Any market that is liberalized tends to get dominated by the strongest hands in the market, because freeing market participants from the "rules" permits them to use their natural strengths and advantages more freely for their own benefit in the market. In the "old" mating market, the system featured a number of restraining rules, such as:

1. "You break it, you own it" (pregnancy results in marriage, not all, but most of the time).
2. Open caddishness and open sluttery was far less socially tolerated (far less anonymity, far more people being "in your business", far more scrutiny of young couples).
3. The clock is ticking, for both sexes (obvious for women, but also for the men — "Better not think of being a cad long term, son, or that promotion … is going to the guy with the wife, and not you!").
4. Parental pressure to marry was strong, at a slightly younger age on daughters than on sons, but it was exerted on sons as well — long-term singlehood was generally not tolerated, celebrated or serviced culturally, socially or by families, except in the cases of persons who were obviously unacceptably unattractive (using a low bar), obviously unacceptably eccentric, or presumed to be exclusively homosexually inclined — in which cases bachelorhood/spinsterhood, perhaps a religious vocation in some cases, was the socially accepted role.

All of these rules created pressures that worked to tamp down the advantages enjoyed by the "strong hands" in the market, because they were under the same pressures to marry as everyone else was — as hard as it is for us to picture this from the perspective of how the world works today, prior to the liberalization of the mating market, these people weren't exempted from the rules simply because they were very attractive. They had more attractive options than others, of course, but they were pressured to take those options early in life, and thereby take both their choice in a mate and themselves out of the market. This behavior had a domino effect on the entire market that heavily favored assortative mating up and down the curve by removing people from the market who were most attractive early in the process.

In the current market, by contrast, these pressures do not exist, because the "rules" which created the pressures have been removed. In fact, they have not only been removed, but they have, in some cases, been replaced with different pressures that operate in the opposite direction, creating substantial pressure to delay marriage, to engage in extra-marital sex and, for women, to date hypergamously until a better-than-assortative mate expresses an interest in committing.

In effect, what was, under the "old rules" a unitary "mating market", was recast by the sexual revolution into two new, and separate-yet-linked, markets:

1. A "sexual marketplace" (SMP) that applies from puberty until (and, actually, even during) marriage and after divorce, which features mostly "dating", but also has other forms of coupled encounters; and…
2. A "marriage marketplace" (MMP) for market participants who have specifically decided to search for a spouse.

And further, as explained below, these two markets are separate-yet-linked because the MMP is actually a subset of the SMP!

Churchianity has Failed to Respond

Beyond the "objective" factors of contraception / abortion and economic independence noted above and in my last post, the general attrition of Christianity in the broader culture, which has been accompanied by a slow decay in the practice of Christian values and norms, both in the broader culture and among Christians themselves, has also played a substantial role in the rise of the emergent SMP/MMP, and its quick and almost ubiquitous adoption by American Christians of all kinds.

Therefore, from a Christian perspective, a substantial underlying cause of these developments is a rather broad and obvious spiritual malaise, above all in our churches and families, which permitted the sexual revolution to take place to begin with. A society that was as interiorly Christian as it outwardly claimed to be, prior to circa 1965, would not have changed so dramatically in such a short period of time in ways that were fundamentally antithetical to well-settled Christian moral doctrine (although it does need to be pointed out that much of Christianity — but not all of it — seems to have grossly misunderstood the broader impact of widespread availability of contraception downrange temporally as an early warning of what was to come in the subsequent decades).

Ed Hurst wrote about this dynamic in his post, A Full-Blown Apocalypse (2021/2/13) [Archive; Repost], which was a response to Scott's post, We can't plant seed in the middle of winter. (2021/2/13) [Archive].

Ed writes,

> "The reason it's a real apocalypse is because we are not allowed to teach our children, and we are not allowed to build a community in which people of faith can actually expect to find other people of faith. Do you understand that it's normal when churches are filled with people who very much need to learn how to walk by faith, because they still struggle with the flesh? That's okay, because church is where they are supposed to learn faith, but having those same people lead the church is a serious problem. And that's what we have now. Churches are so institutional and so professional that genuine faith is actually a hindrance to the system."
>
> "What makes this tribulation and persecution is that it is technically illegal for me to build something more amenable to my faith. Think about this: How many judges are willing to shut down an SJW complaint? How many judges would protect a genuine statement of biblical faith about gender and family structure? We > shouldn't care what people do to themselves, but we pine for the freedom to make different choices for ourselves. And it's really not just judges, but the people who hold the actual power in making things possible in the current situation. How many state governments, ruling over education, would tolerate a home school curriculum based on heart-led faith that disparages materialism?

>
> "Pro-family cultural norms are increasingly illegal, and impossible to promote even in private — there is no privacy. We are not allowed to have a closed community, as would be entirely necessary, in order to create the atmosphere for passing on biblical values to our children. [Jack's and Scott's] emphasis is that men and women of genuine faith can't find each other and marry to raise children that way, because the system is so corrupt. By the time we have come to this understanding of faith, we would be too old for a clean first marriage that produces children. The faith community can't get started because the members have to pass through a hellish landscape of immoral relationships first.
>
> And that's what they pass through when they start out in churches!"

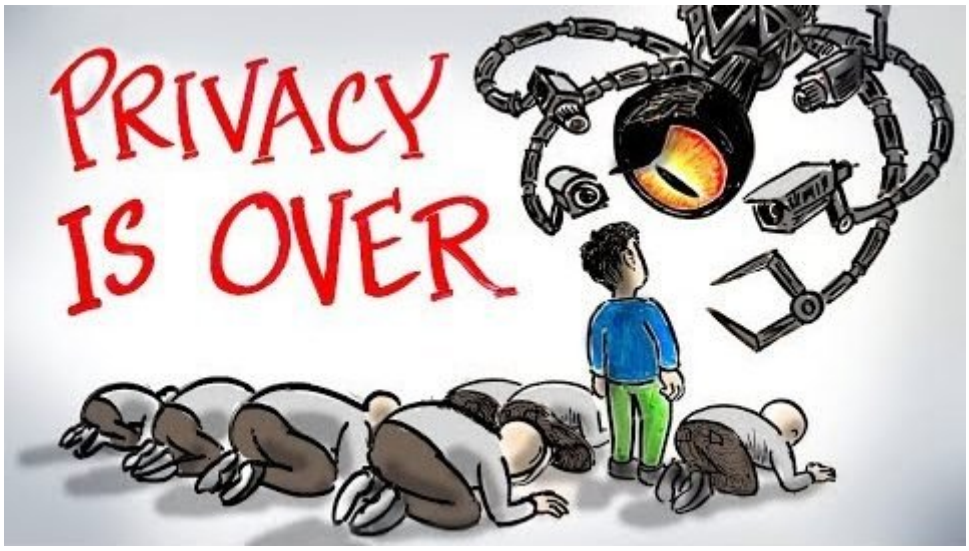
The "hellish landscape of immoral relationships" is the emergence of the SMP/MMP arrangement, which applies with equal force to Christians who are looking for mates (and, eventually, spouses) in the current environment.



Running the Gauntlet

The original meaning of the expression (to run) the gauntlet has often been applied to various less severe punishments or tests, often consisting of consecutive blows or tasks endured sequentially and delivered collectively, especially by colleagues such as roommates, teammates (in sports), or fraternity brothers. As these do not usually cause serious injuries, only bearable pain, the rituals are sometimes eagerly anticipated by the initiate as a sign of acceptance into a more prestigious group. The phrase running the gauntlet has also been used, informally, to express the idea of a public but painless, ritual humiliation such as the Walk of Shame or Perp Walk. In this post, the phrase describes the experience of passing through a series of successive relationships, which in the SMP/MMP's culture of "dating", invariably involve sexual liaisons. These liaisons are inevitably followed by periods of disappointment and heartbreak and, over time, lead participants to incur increasing amounts of lasting spiritual damage. Even for those who resist having intercourse, they are still exposed to suffer extreme temptation and pressure to do so.

This is the case because in the current mating market, almost all couples — whether they are seeking a mate in the SMP or the MMP — meet each other through participation in the process commonly known as "dating". "Dating", in the current SMP, is a polite euphemism for coupled interactions which, in virtually all cases where the dating process proceeds for more than a couple of meetings, involve sexual encounters which can only be described as casual by any normal meaning of the term.

In fact, dating is, in itself, the core vehicle of the SMP for virtually all participants. Likewise, dating is also the core vehicle for almost all participants in the MMP. Thus, the MMP is embedded in the SMP due to the MMP also following the process of "dating", which is an SMP process. In other words, the entrance door to the MMP is, for most people, located in the SMP, such that one must successfully navigate the SMP in order to enter the door of the MMP.

Furthermore, since the MMP selection process runs through "dating", which, as stated, is itself a process that is inherently sexual in nature, it is therefore subject to the sex skew of the SMP, as discussed in my last post. It's important to note that the sex skew exerts a strong impact on both the SMP and the MMP as well. This is because one's sexual market value, or SMV, plays the primary role in one's "competitiveness" in being selected in the competition of bid/ask interactions in the market for dates — again, this applies no matter whether one is participating in the SMP or in the MMP.

The MMP is not ensconced in the SMP for all participants (some persons practice arranged marriage or semi-arranged marriages via matchmakers and the like), but it is for almost all of them, because for almost all market participants, the MMP is embedded in the SMP and its conventions. This remains the case even for participants who are actively seeking a spouse rather than a boyfriend or girlfriend.

Conclusion — The Christian Conundrum

To summarize, entering into the MMP requires one to successfully run the gauntlet of the SMP. This reality spells out a difficult conundrum for Christians, to wit:

- Under morally orthodox Christian teaching, Christians should not have sex outside of marriage.
- Under contemporary social practice, as described above (namely the linking of the SMP and the MMP), including for most Christians, men and women will face substantial difficulties securing an attractive mate for marriage without having sex prior to marrying.

What I have written thus far on this poignant dilemma only scratches the surface of this issue. Neither this post, nor the preceding one, have addressed the implications of this situation, but have only explained a portion of the contours of the current marketplace and what leads to the issue facing Christians in this area today.

We'll be examining this conundrum and the related questions in a series of occasional posts over the next month or two.

Related

- Σ Frame: Is the Christian Red Pill a Black Pill? (2020/11/29)

Parental Divorce Ruins Daughters' Future Marital Commitment and Confidence

Jack · 24 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Another red flag: If her parents are divorced.

Readership: All; Parents;
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

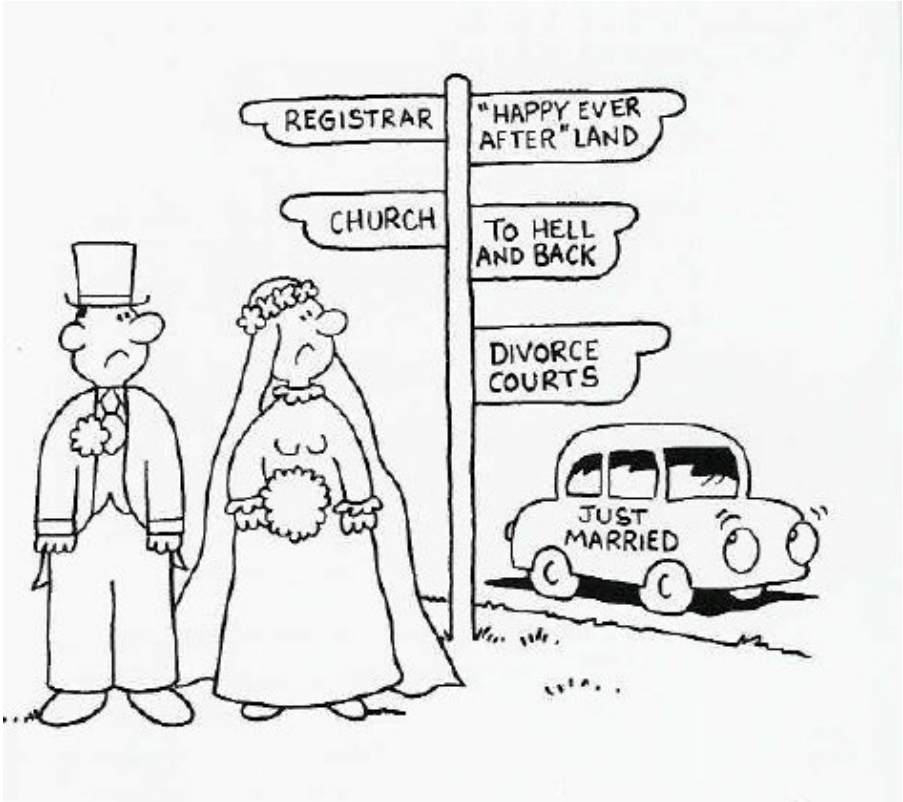
Introduction

When a married couple with children file for divorce, the children are often the worst to suffer. But how does divorce affect children by sex? Do either sons or daughters suffer more than the other?

I found a scientific research report published in the Journal of Family Psychology that answers this question.

S. W. Whitton, G. K. Rhoades, S. M. Stanley, and H. J. Markman, "Effects of Parental Divorce on Marital Commitment and Confidence", Journal of Family Psychology, 2008 Oct; 22(5): 789–793. doi: 10.1037/a0012800

This study at Boston University revealed how daughters suffer worse than sons in regard to their future marital success. I've collected snippets of quotes from this paper to be reviewed below.



Summary

Based on a comprehensive reading of the paper, women are identified as being the critical link in the success of a marriage.

> The current findings show that, at the outset of their first marriages, women whose parents had divorced reported lower relationship commitment and less confidence in the future of their marriages than did women from non-divorced families. These results add to previous evidence that adults with > divorced parents have lower commitment to marriage as an institution (e.g., Amato, 1996) by showing that women have less commitment to, and confidence in, their own marriages. Daughters of divorced parents appear to be more ambivalent about committing to a particular partner, not merely to the notion that marriage, in general, should be forever. Further, they report less perceived confidence in being able to make their own upcoming marriage last. The effects of parental divorce on marital commitment and confidence were small to moderate, as has been found for general attitudes toward divorce (e.g., Amato, 1996).

"General attitudes" is a heavy term which is not explored in this paper. Speaking from my own experience, it can be inferred that the experience of having divorced parents foments anger, bitterness, cynicism, and distrust, and it destroys the childrens' hopes.

> Results were consistent with those from previously presented analyses; significant gender × parental divorce interactions indicated an effect of one's own parental divorce on relationship commitment and relationship confidence for women but not for men. In no case was partner parental divorce or the interaction between self- and partner- parental divorce significant, suggesting that couples in which both partners have divorced parents are no less committed or confident than those in which only the woman experienced parental divorce.

This means that if the wife's parents are divorced, that's the worst thing that could be for the marriage in regard to my introductory question. If the husband's parents are divorced, it has much less influence on the marriage. This further supports my previous conclusions that the wife has more influence over the unity, harmony, and overall success of a marriage than the husband.

> These findings echo those of previous studies showing a stronger impact of parental divorce on daughters' than sons' risk for divorce (e.g., Amato, 1996).

This effect is well studied, documented, and confirmed.

All in all, many things contribute towards undermining a woman's attitude about marriage, but having divorced parents is a major wrecking ball.

Women who rock the boat sink the ship.

As mentioned above, women are the critical link in the success of a marriage. Going further, two factors were found in women, commitment and confidence, which were predictive of marital outcome. Digging into these effects further, they report that low confidence affects her psychological well-being.

> …in the larger study from which the current sample was drawn, relationship confidence predicted change in women's depressive symptoms over the first years of marriage (Whitton et al., 2007).

A woman with poor confidence is more likely to be deleterious, sensitive, and moody, and this has a significant, negative influence on her marital life. Now add in low commitment, and you have the recipe for a disaster.

> Variance within a similarly restricted range of commitment has predicted marital stability over 18 months (Impett et al., 2001). In a large, community based sample, minor variation in confidence that one's marriage will last was strongly associated with marital disruption (Nock et al., in press)

This means that regardless of her level of commitment, only slight falterings in the wife's relationship confidence can create big waves in the marriage! It gets worse…

> The measures of parental divorce and conflict were retrospective, introducing the potential for distortion by current mood or relationship adjustment.

Yes, wimmin are ALWAYS subject to the Feeelz! A woman who has had a miserable emotional history in her family of upbringing tends to bring a moody attitude into the marriage, and I surmise that this happens on the subconscious level, meaning she is not aware of it. And if all this is not bad enough…

> During engagement, there appears to be little variation among couples in their levels of relationship commitment and confidence, with mean levels above 6 on a 7-point scale. Nevertheless, parental divorce is > predictive of who will score relatively lower on the commitment and confidence measures, which may be important given the evidence that even small variations in marital commitment and confidence can have meaningful consequences to couple and individual outcomes.

This is scary! The word "predictive" in this passage implies that the risks inherent in marrying a woman with divorced parents goes undetected during engagement, and the attitudes and behaviors that contribute towards marital dissolution (i.e. poor commitment and low confidence) don't show up until after marriage!

Perhaps there is good reason why daughters are a special protected class; they are the Achilles' Heel of a society.

Statue of Achilles Wounded in the Heel at Achillion Palace, Corfu, Greece.

Generational Links

In the vast expanse of human history, the character and reputation of a woman's family of origin was a major consideration for her worthiness of marriage. A multitude of classic literary works bear out this truth. But in recent times, this red flag has been largely overlooked, much to our undoing.

I know from my own family history that divorce runs in families, longitudinally (from generation to generation), and laterally (brothers, sisters, cousins). My paternal grandparents and my maternal grandfather are divorced. My parents are divorced. I and my two sisters are all divorced. My mother's brother and sister are both divorced, and I have three cousins who are divorced. There are more people in my family who have been divorced than not. So I have always been on the lookout for an explanation of why divorce often presents itself as a "genetic disease", so to speak. This paper offers a few tidbits of answers.

It is apparent that the shadowy zephyr of parental divorce, and not conflict itself (nor the absence thereof) within the family, is responsible for eroding the critical attributes of emotional health in the woman.

> Controlling for interparental conflict did not reduce the effect of parental divorce on women's relationship commitment or confidence. This finding is consistent with previous evidence that parental divorce, but not parental conflict, is linked with lower commitment to the institution of marriage (Amato & DeBoer, > 2001). The present results do not diminish the likelihood that parental conflict increases offspring risk for poor marital outcomes through other mechanisms, such as the development of poor relationship skills (Amato, 1996; Sanders et al., 1999); however, it appears to be parental divorce, rather than heightened conflict preceding the divorce, that affects women's appraisals of their own marriages.

The authors offer an explanation of why this is.

> It is possible that because women are socialized to be more relationship-oriented than men (e.g., Gilligan, 1982), they may be more attuned to their parents' marital dissolution and its lessons regarding the (im)permanence of marriage. In addition, women generally suffer more negative consequences from divorce than do men, especially economically (Hetherington, 2003).
>
> Therefore, being primed to be conscious of the fragility of marriage by observing parental divorce may lead women, more than men, to suppress levels of marital confidence and to hold back on their commitment to their marriages.

Women take childhood lessons to heart, and carry these with them throughout life.

> Also, the effect of parental divorce on commitment and confidence could not be explained by its effect on general relationship adjustment, suggesting the effect is robust and highlighting support for the theory that low levels of relationship commitment and confidence may serve as specific mechanisms through which divorce is transmitted from one generation to the next.

Holy smoke! Scientific evidence for Generational Curses!

Because the cause-effect relationship is so hard to pin down, I can only assume that the fundamental cause of divorce is ultimately spiritual in nature — the shadowy zephyr of divorce is real.

Caveats

A few other noteworthy findings and conditions are summed up in this section.

> There are limitations to the present research. Foremost, the sample was not representative. Most participants were White and moderately well educated, and all were married through a religious organization. Findings may not generalize to couples from other ethnic or educational backgrounds or to those who do not marry in a religious organization (although over 75% of U.S. couples do; Stanley, Amato, Johnson, & Markman, 2006).

OMG! So here we are talking about Christian/churchian wimmin and their families!

> The small effect size of female parental divorce on commitment and confidence suggests that these premarital variables are also influenced by other factors, and that the influence of parental divorce on marital outcomes is likely mediated by other factors as well, such as communication patterns (e.g., Story, Karney, Lawrence, & Bradbury, 2004). The data were cross-sectional, prohibiting confident statements about directionality or causal effects.

Yes, this effect is compounded by other factors. So if a woman has divorced parents, AND she has several other red flags, then she's definitely a no go if you're looking for a stable marriage. I suppose some exceptions may exist, by the grace of God.

> The somewhat restricted range on the measures of relationship commitment and confidence, typical of a premarital sample, may have limited power to detect effects of parental divorce for men. Also, internal consistency of the relationship commitment scale was lower than desired for women.

The Feeelz makes it all so confusing and corrupts the data consistency!

> Finally, we did not assess whether the lower levels of relationship commitment and confidence observed in daughters of divorced parents eventually result in higher rates of marital distress and dissolution; future work is needed to test this hypothesis.

The answer to this question is not too hard to guess.

> Despite the robust associations observed in women, parental divorce was not associated with men's relationship commitment and confidence. Experiencing a parental divorce appears to have a stronger impact on women's than men's desires and beliefs about the future of their own marriages. Furthermore, the experience of parental divorce by both partners did not predict any lower commitment or confidence than did the woman's parental divorce alone.

The author is saying that this phenomenon only affects women, not men. That is, men do not lose confidence and a sense of commitment towards marriage because of parental divorce. However, since my own parents are divorced, I have to say that it does have a negative impact, but not on confidence and commitment, per se. Going off of my own experience, I think the impact on men causes them to lose hope about ever having a joyful marriage, and to objectively rethink what marriage is all about from a very cynical perspective. It also leads men to develop certain particular sensitivities about what he can or cannot accept in a mate, to be distrustful of women (especially if his mother was responsible for the divorce), and to play the field a bit longer. If a man has bitterness and anger towards his mother (because of the divorce, but it could be for any other reason too), then this will cause him to feel attraction towards s1utty women. If the divorce happened before he reached maturity, then he may not realize this connection, and just think that he is unlucky in love. Moreover, experiencing parental divorce creates a lot of internal conflict that changes a man's feelings towards women and leads him through a more tortuous path to marriage. I think this wear and tear does have an influential impact on marriage and especially on his choice of a mate. But I agree with the authors in that once the decision has been made to go into marriage, commitment and confidence are not affected.

Source: Institute for Family Studies (Brian Hollar): Regular Church Attenders Marry More and Divorce Less Than Their Less Devout Peers (2020 March 4)

Conclusions

In sum, a woman's confidence in the marital relationship is a huge predictor of marital success. So guys who are vetting for a wife should place this trait as a high priority. Parental divorce was found to be one factor that is a major blow to this important trait (i.e. a woman's confidence in marriage). The paper doesn't say this, but I would guess that if a woman's parents are divorced, but she still has a strong confidence in both her own relational skills and the institution of marriage, then that risk may be abated. However, the paper does say that you can't know this for sure until after you've been married for 18 months.

I might speculate that the rise in the divorce rate since No Fault Divorce legislation was introduced in 1970, has had a snowball effect in contributing towards an ever greater incidence of divorce among subsequent generations. (See above graph.)

> Despite these limitations, this research highlights the negative effect parental divorce may have on marital commitment and confidence, particularly for women. As such, these findings suggest that it may be important for relationship education programs to include specific strategies to help women from divorced families develop higher levels of relationship commitment and confidence by learning skills that promote healthy, happy, and long-lasting marriages.

More evidence for how much we need marriage education, especially for women.

Related

- Biblical Gender Roles: Why Unity In Marriage Has More To Do With The Wife Than The Husband (2016

November 23)

- Σ Frame: My Unhappiness Is Your Fault! (2018 June 3)

The Christian Marriage Dilemma

Jack · 26 February 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Marrying a Christian woman won't necessarily give you a Christian marriage.

Readership: All; Christian Men;
Length: 2,900 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Running the Gauntlet

Earlier in my life, as I was struggling with my choices in the marriage marketplace, a married, Christian lady who knew me rather well gave me some very wise advice, but it was also very confusing advice.

> "You need a Christian marriage more than you need a Christian wife."

At the time, I had no idea why she made a distinction between the two. I struggled with this conflicting dichotomy for years, trying to make sense of it.

I had made a commitment to myself that I would only "date" women who were Christians with the intentions of marriage. I attended a Christian college which I thought would increase my chances of meeting someone appropriate. Although I must have "dated" close to 200 women during my college years — most all of them professing Christians — again and again, I found that these women had no Christian mental concept of purpose in dating and marriage. Instead, they had an unspoken assumption that sexual relations should commence within the first few "dates", and some of them showed little restraint in this expectation. Over the years, I met several women who posed a significant temptation to engage in sexual relations. Since I was hesitant to go forward outside of marriage, I was invariably rejected.

For years, I endured this cycle of temptation and rejection, never getting anywhere closer to marriage. To say I was "tempted sore" (as the Bible describes) is a severe understatement. To make matters worse, my parents divorced while I was in college, and this made me more confused about what kind of woman would be right for me. By the time I reached my late 20s, I had become rather cynical about "dating" and angry at God.

Yes, I was Blue Pilled, as was every guy in my generation (Xers) at that time. Yes, I had my own set of problems and hang-ups, including generational curses and anger towards my mother for divorcing my dad. But I couldn't understand why I should be excluded from the grace of God and the blessings of obedience and believing in God. I always had a creeping feeling that something wasn't right, but I could never put my finger on exactly what it was. I didn't recognize how postmodernism had infiltrated the church and had morphed into Christianality. I never realized that Christian women were entirely subsumed by the wider Western sex culture. Actually, no one was cognitively aware of this back then.

Non-Christians who behave like Christians?

A few years later, I came to Taiwan and I met many women here who actually ACTED like what I had always envisioned a Christian woman to be like – soft-spoken, humble, demure, kindhearted, and honorable. They were community oriented, looking to help and serve others. They were respectful to men and dutiful to the elderly. They held a high regard for marriage and viewed sexual relations seriously. They were also thin, attractive, and well dressed. I was astonished to discover that these women were not actually Christians! They were Buddhists, Daoists, and some were agnostic. What a shocker!*

In a controversial post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being wh0res? (2019 February 23), I briefly described this strange phenomenon I had learned through my personal experience living in Taiwan – how the typical Asian Buddhist woman might make a better wife than the typical Western Christian woman.

> "Even here in Asia, if a western guy wants to get laid, scoping out the local single women at the nearest Christian church will yield a better lay ratio than hitting up a bar. Many women go to Church for the sole purpose of meeting and slaking foreigners. If a man wants to have a "Christian marriage", he's wiser to marry a thin, mature, submissive, respectful, Buddhist woman, and lead her to Christ in the process. That's no joke! They are more likely to be loyal for life, because they take their wedding vows seriously."

For the first time in my life, I was able to get a glimpse of what my friend was talking about – that I needed a Christian marriage more than I needed a Christian wife. For a long time after I discovered this, I thought long and hard about how this could be true and how I might best implement this truth in my life. Is it really "God's will" for me to marry a non-Christian woman? How could I share my Christian faith inside a marriage with a non-Christian wife? Wouldn't our children be confused? I was still in a quandary.

 From this, it is apparent that cultural expectations and upbringing have a much stronger influence on women's behavior than religious affiliation or devoutness. I presume that genetics also plays a significant role.*

Christians who behave like Non-Christians?

Deti said something that helps make sense of this. In The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17), he described why Christian women of the West are fundamentally less than Christian.

> "All women, and I mean ALL women, born after about 1960 are marinated in feminism and are feminists. All women in the US over the age of 25 are feminists, and I don't care what anyone says to the contrary because it's not true. EVERY man who has gotten married in the last 40 years married a feminist."

I think the answer to my quandary is contained in this paradox. The Buddhist women I met in Taiwan were taught filial piety, which conditioned them to be obedient to God's created order, whereas the (nominal) Christian women of the west were steeped in feminism and were thoroughly disobedient to God's created order. I have met a significant number of Muslim exchange students over the years, and from what I can see, they are also more obedient to God's created order than Western "Churchians", especially in the area of Headship.

In summary, whatever religion a woman claims to believe in doesn't really mean as much as whether she is actually obedient to God in her daily living. The way we've heard this truth expressed in Red Pill parlance is "Don't listen to what women say. Watch what they actually do." Likewise, women who claim to be Christians, and who may even quote scripture and attend church, but who also believe in Feminist ideology and/or follow the Feminist Life Script, fit under this bill. They "talk the talk", but they don't "walk the walk". They may have an appearance of godliness, but they deny the power of conforming to God's intended ideal of them being submissive wives and feminine mothers.

Nikole Mitchell, former church leader and OnlyFans celebrity.

How does Christianity Apply to the Current SMP/MMP?

In NovaSeeker's previous post, The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market (2021 February 22), it was concluded that, in the Western feminist culture, young people must run the gauntlet of the SMP before being eligible for the MMP. This is true even among Christians and within the church. When this social melee is compared to other cultures, as vividly exemplified by my own life experiences written above, we come to a very uncomfortable truth concerning both the Churchian social culture and Western culture (which are basically converged).

Marrying a Christian woman won't necessarily give you a Christian marriage.

Several questions arise at this point.

1. What actually makes a person a Christian?
2. What motivates a person to be obedient (or disobedient)?
3. Is having a Christian Marriage (i.e. Headship) really more important than having a Christian spouse?

The remainder of this post will explore these questions.

What actually makes a person a Christian?

Last year, I wrote a series of posts on the Purity Movement. I was sad to see that, other than two posts in particular, these posts were not very popular. In one post, The Elimination of the Church (2020 May 29), I wrote,

> "Among those who were marginal or cultural Christians, it became fashionable to be more or less spiritually "preoccupied" with various Idols of the Tribe. For example, those with a relatively high SMV were busy worshipping the fruits of the sexual revolution, and low SMV duds and snits were busy worshipping chivalry and feminism, respectively."

There was a diffuse, unnamed fear that was prevalent within the Purity Movement.

> "This fear caused a trifurcation of moral realism. One group took abstinence to the prudish puritanical extreme and shot themselves in the foot in regards to their MMV. Another group dabbled in sexual relations without "going all the way", and used their technical virginity as a false psychological justification for remaining pure. A third group was comprised of those who engaged in clandestine fornication and dealt with the stigma by either keeping it a secret, or else putting social distance between themselves and others in the Purity culture, all done in order to reduce the risk of possible exposure and the resulting shame.
>
> Of course, some had already decided that they were going to explore their sexuality, and they could not handle the denial or duplicity of the second or third group respectively. These individuals chose to leave the church altogether."

What we are seeing here is the failure of the Church to provide a functional social context in which young people can move towards marriage. As a result, it became relatively impossible for the mating process to fit the traditional Christian mold of courtship. So because there was no framework set in place to mold the growth of their faith, they chased after their personal desires, in some form or fashion. All in all, young people within the church lost sight of what it means to be a Christian.

If we answered the question of what actually makes a person a Christian? strictly on the basis of who is obedient to God's ordained order, then virtually no one in the West would qualify. Everyone has compromised in some form or fashion. It is impossible not to do so, because the entire western culture is built on an amalgamation of Greco-Roman-Gothic values that have been whitewashed with a veneer of Christian values. Only recently, have we seen the bitter fruit of this society revealed in the decay and decline of Western morality and the now obvious corruption of "Christianality". As things stand now, there are exceedingly few people, even among Christians, who really know what it means to be obedient.

Joshua Harris, former pastor and author of "I Kissed Dating Goodbye".

What motivates a person to be obedient (or disobedient)?

The purpose of being obedient is to partake in the beauty and blessings of God's ordained order and His divine plans for one's life. In order to be obedient, we must recognize and appreciate God's creation, His order, and His plans. If a person doesn't taste the flavor of this through the family of origin or church involvement, then it is easy to miss in the mess of secular cultural influences.

If a person has no joy in partaking in the beauty of God's ordained order through being obedient… if a person doesn't understand the purposes of being obedient in accordance with His divine plans for one's life… nor possess any hope to obtain the blessings of obedience… if there is no glorious sense of identity in Christ, then obedience becomes little more than rigamarole rule keeping — a legalistic exercise in fruitless futility. The willpower alone may not be enough to restrain one from joining in the ways of this world.

On the other hand, the wider secular culture is blaring a loud message that meticulously lays out all the adventures and alluring ecstasies of being disobedient, complete with a beautiful life plan and purpose.

- Liberal and profuse justifications of various deviations from morality abound (e.g. "single mothers need love too"; relaxed dress codes being the norm; the belief that love justifies immoral intimacy; etc.).
- The immediate satisfactions of profligacy appear to outweigh the arduous task of denying the fleshly nature.
- The value of exercising self-control has been replaced by the moxie of "Finding Yourself™".
- Delaying gratification with respect to a larger sense of purpose is regarded as prudish.
- Drawing healthy boundaries has been suspended in favor of dissipation and lawlessness.

- Propriety has waned and has been transformed into the “Fear of Missing Out™” (FOMO).
- Any long term benefits of obedience become obscured and difficult, if not impossible to achieve.
- Any rewards of obedience are summarily ignored, or otherwise presented as naïve abstractions which carry little guarantee of fulfillment.

All of these influences call us to worship the god of sexual identity by partaking in the freedom of fleshly pleasures and the soul numbing satisfactions of corruption. Thus, the path of obedience has become exactingly legalistic and detached while barely promising infinitesimal benefits, while the path of disobedience is the ostensible working “solution”, portrayed as prevalent in the wider culture, and well justified. Those who try to straddle the fence in an effort to obtain the best of both worlds have to swallow an assortium of lies to do so.

It stands to reason that the true Christian is the one who lives a life that is uniquely distinct from the world – in spite of the sacrifices. Yet, even this is commonly confused with Rousseau’s individualistic approach to life when God is totally omitted.

Is having a Christian Marriage (i.e. Headship) really more important than having a Christian spouse?

Going back to my story in the beginning of this post, it is clear that I was faced with a difficult choice of compromises with no clear answer.

1. A nominally “christian” woman who has been steeped in the doctrines of feminism and materialism since her childhood, who is deeply entrenched in worldly values and lifestyles, and who, at some level, is at war against men and God’s ordained order of Patriarchy.
2. A non-Christian woman who embraces Christian practices, such as Headship, and is already familiar with living a life in obedience to God’s created order. Such a woman may or may not be willing to convert to Christianity.
3. There is a third choice, even more uncomfortable than either of the first two. Continue waiting for a Christian woman who has the mind and habits necessary to build a Christian marriage. In my case, I waited for nearly two decades without finding anyone to my liking. Eventually, I buckled under the temptation and ran the gauntlet properly. I also had a failed first marriage.

Granted, this may be painting a false dichotomy with a broad brush, but the overall differences should now be clear to my readers.

When men are faced with the question, "Which kind of mate would you prefer?", the answers come down to something like this.

1. A Christian woman from a feminist culture, who has the mind of an arrogant 16-year-old girl, and acts like a slore?
2. A (insert other religion here) woman from a patriarchal culture, who talks like a lady, and acts like a Christian?*
3. Marry your fist, and forego having a wife altogether.

Choice 1 is the wide road leading to destruction which many western men have walked.
Choice 2 is difficult to find, and tortuously arduous in the adjustment.
Choice 3 is basically MGTOW, 30+ years of masturbation, and no family nor children when you are older.

Which one would you choose? Any choice you make requires some type of sacrifice.

 There are Christian alternatives, such as joining the Amish or starting your own commune, but implementing this type of option is just as difficult as searching for a wife abroad.*

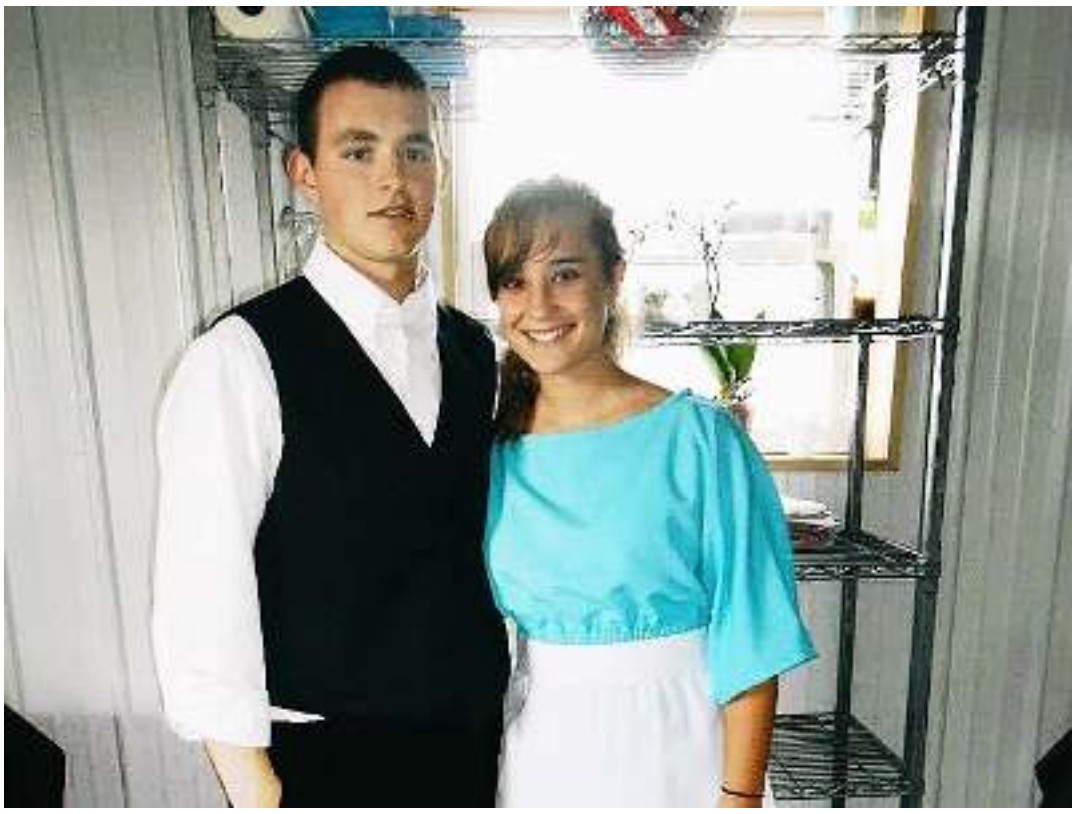

Image Source: Schwartz and Sweet: 10 Things That Happen When You're a Non-Amish Woman Married to an Ex-Amish Man (2019 January 7)

Conclusion

In his post, On the ethics of teenage marriage (2020 December 18), NovaSeeker answered the fundamental question of how to navigate this dilemma.

> "It comes down to how much we are of the world, how compromised we are with it, how different we are willing to be from it. Each of us makes our own decisions in these areas. I say that not to point fingers — I am personally no sort of "ultra" in these regards, not at all. But I do think we need to realize that we are all compromised by the culture, and we should resist the temptation to baptize or otherwise bless/sanctify our own reasoned compromises with the culture in which we live, rather than seeing them as just that — personal compromises that we personally judge as being appropriate, based on the culture in which we live and its > broader standards. How that fits into our own personal approach to living in the world, but not of it, is necessarily ensconced within the particular time and place of our culture, including all of the norms of said culture."

As NovaSeeker wrote, under the present circumstances, it is a matter of how much (or how little) one is willing to compromise with the culture in which we live.

Readers might be disappointed with this conclusion if they try to correlate any compromise at all with a lack of true faith. Whether this is true depends on the context. The reality is that there is no perfect solution. Some type of compromise is inevitable as a cost of opportunity. In fact, God intended life to be this way so that we would break free from the logical contraptions of our minds and realize faith.

If you're struggling with the unsatisfactory choices described in this post, and the degree of compromise is your biggest concern, then your faith is not fully formed. You'll always suffer from the regret of making one choice over another, and the bitterness of being forced to choose will eat away at your soul. You'll be double minded, and you'll miss the grace of God.

Instead of focusing on how much or how little we compromise, we need to get in touch with the Spirit of God, because there is no way to justify ourselves in this mess through our own logic, good choices, and self-discipline. The practical application comes down to your individual convictions about the issues in question and what you believe is God's purpose for your life.

When making a choice, what does your heart tell you (your heart, not your mind) will glorify God and lead to your inner peace with God, your redemption, and sanctification in this present life?

If you are unfamiliar with this Heart-Led approach to faith, then I strongly suggest that you read Ed Hurst's posts at Do What's Right. And pray!

Related

- Do What's Right: Recognizing the Need for Redemption (2018 November 2)
- Σ Frame: The Elimination of the Church (2020 May 29)
- Do What's Right: Peace in This World Not Possible (2020 July 7)
- Do What's Right: Untrustworthy Logic (2021 January 20)
- Roosh Valizadeh: 3 Spiritual Types Of Women (2021 March 1)

The Christian Conundrum

Novaseeker · 1 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Caught between Scylla and Charybdis.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post was coauthored by Jack and NovaSeeker.
Length: 2,300 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

February's theme has been about the Mating Marketplace. In these posts, Jack and I described how modern western culture has created a gynocentric Socio-Sexual Marketplace (SMP), and how the Marriage Marketplace (MMP) has been subsumed by the secularized SMP.

- Σ Frame: The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture (2021 February 8)
- Σ Frame: The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021 February 17)
- Σ Frame: The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market (2021 February 22)
- Σ Frame: The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021 February 26)

The conclusions of last two posts listed above introduced us to the Christian Conundrum, which results from the following realities:

- In the interests of preserving the spiritual integrity of the home, Christians should only marry other Christians.
- Under morally orthodox Christian teaching, Christians should not have sex outside of marriage.
- Under contemporary social practice, namely the linking of the SMP and the MMP, including for most Christians, men and women will face substantial difficulties securing an attractive mate for marriage without having sex prior to marrying.

This post will examine the nuances of this conundrum.

There's No Clear Path to Marriage!

This conundrum poses a difficult situation for Christians living in the West. The options boil down to two basic choices – to conform to scriptural mandates or not, and two basic outcomes – having a functional marriage or not. The soul snap comes when we see that the choices and the outcomes have no definite correlation. That is to say…

- Some people will follow the rules and get lucky in love and marriage, albeit a very small number of them. Fellow bloggers Mike Davis, Ed Hurst, and Derek Ramsey are excellent examples.
- Others will follow the rules and lose out on a mate (as Jack did for a good many years), or else have their marriages eventually blow up over some permutation of the issue of sex (or the absence thereof) in the marriage. This is what happened in John Mitchell's and Sharkly's marriages, and the sexual issue played a role in my own marriage too.
- Some will break the rules and end up in solid marriages. This is the case of frequent commenters Scott, Elspeth, and Cameron, as well as a few others who are too busy enjoying their marriages to shadow an internet blog.
- Others who break the rules will end up divorced, however, because at the end of the day women are fickle by nature and the law permits them to act on that, period. Jack can attest to this, as well as many of our readers.

And there are various permutations of this as well. In my own marriage I followed some of the rules (my ex was n=0 when we married, although I was not, so I fornicated, but not with my ex prior to marriage and not with anyone else, either, after meeting my ex), in some ways, but not in others (married 3-4 years ahead of schedule for highly educated people prior to education being finished rather than after, and with a 5-year age gap which was already becoming unusual by the late 90s when I married). I am sure there are numerous other such mash-up permutations in people's actual lives as well.

Unfortunately, there is no silver bullet in terms of what will guarantee finding a mate or a durable marriage. If you do go the chaste route, though, the first step — that of finding a mate — is clearly a LOT harder.

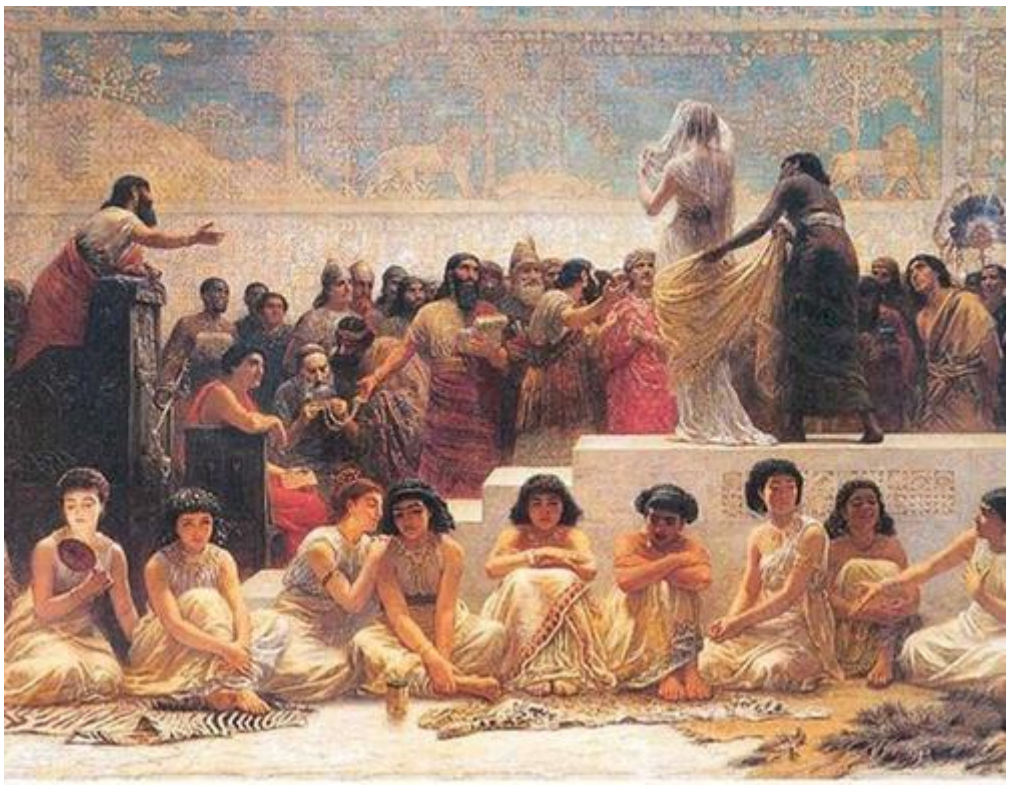
This conundrum is why many people adopt an approach that one of my Mormon colleagues once jokingly described to me as follows: "It is easier/better to ask for forgiveness than to ask for permission." That is, people proceed in a way that appears to offer the best chance at the successful goal they want to reach (a long term stable and happy marriage), even if they have to flout the moral rules in their 20s to do so, banking on the availability of the divine forgiveness later on, so as to get a "win win" situation for everyone. They get their marriage, their children, and the numerous blessings that go along with both, including their sexual satisfaction. God gets to display the glory of His grace upon their repentance. They get their salvation. It's all good, right?

The trouble is that the process of living your 20s that way changes you, in subtle ways. Sins damage us in ways that are hard for us to predict in advance, and that differ between individuals. It can be hard to ever spiritually recover in a genuine way from having deliberately lived sinfully, knowing full well you were flouting the rules.

It can be challenging to actually have a repentant attitude, later in life, about these sins which led to a happy marriage. People may express regrets about the sin, but actual repentance is much harder, because this would involve hating what they did to such a degree that they would always see their marriage as somewhat tainted by the serious sin that created it — which, in my experience, most people in this situation do not do, for rather obvious psychological reasons. So true repentance here is certainly possible, as a divine gift, but can be hard to manifest once one has deliberately committed a serious sin with results that one sees as blessings.

The upside, of course, is that in the meantime, you probably will be better skilled at maintaining a decent marriage in today's culture, given that the ambient culture's expectations apply to most marriages today, whether Christian or not.

It's terrible that this is the choice we are faced with, but this is why culture matters. I wish there were a more upbeat solution to this conundrum, but I don't think there is.



Case Study 1 — Ancient Roman Culture

The Roman culture of antiquity had many more sexual distractions than ours did (male Roman citizens had no difficulty in obtaining sexual access), which made it very hard for people to become Christian, especially men. Becoming a Christian meant foregoing sexual access not only to temple prostitutes, but also to one's own slaves, of both sexes, as well as concubines, in the case of even more well-to-do male Roman citizens. And of course the early Christians were also being persecuted, and executed in some cases, for their faith. Most Christians compromised with the Romans to some extent to avoid the worst of the persecution, and most were received back by the Church when persecution later relaxed.

So the problem that the early Christians faced was the opposite from ours with respect to women having power and men having sexual access (that is men had sexual access and women had little sexual power, apart from a few women in the aristocratic class), but it's nevertheless similar in that God's way is an alternate reality compared to the mores of the broader culture. The Biblical mandates will always run counter to the larger culture, because the culture is focused on happiness and immediate gratification, while God has a different ideal based on how He designed human beings. It so happens that this difference between the culture and God's order can, at times, become so misaligned that adherence to the faith in its fullness results in great personal suffering, and this is what makes the faith so difficult in its demands when the culture is set against it. I think we are living in such an age today, but it's obviously much less dramatic and more prurient than was the case in Roman times.

Just as in Roman times, the benefits of being disobedient to scriptural mandates have now become larger than life. Some Christians are suffering for the faith, others are compromising in an effort to put their lives together, and trying to come back in repentance later. Some are chucking their faith altogether. We see a mixture of approaches taken by individuals in the response to a culture that forecloses access to sexuality and marriage for many people who follow God's rules rigorously.

Case Study 2 — John and Nikole Mitchell

Back in January, I wrote about the now rather infamous case of Nikole Mitchell's sexual metanoia in a series of three posts.

- Σ Frame: The Slow Train Wreck – A Cautionary Tale (2021 January 18)
- Σ Frame: Lessons from the Train Wreckage (2021 January 25)
- Σ Frame: The Train Wreck – Speculative causes, influences, and alternate outcomes (2021 February 1)

The story of John and Nikole's marriage and its aftermath is a harrowing one, because it illustrates two difficult truths to men:

1. Vetting has limited benefits and no guarantees.
2. Conforming to God's outline of Christian living doesn't necessarily have a sweet ending.

You can meet a rather chaste woman (either of the virginal or "born again virgin" variety), or a woman who has some N count but isn't, at the time, that focused on sexual vetting prior to marriage, because she has aligned with Christian values about sex and its proper value in life. But … there's no guarantee that later in the marriage she won't become envious of other women who are getting better sex with sexier guys, guys who are better at sex, guys who have bigger c0cks (for some women, not all of them), and then decide that she wants better sex, that she deserves better sex, and so on. In fact, the culture blares this messaging at women non-stop.

And, for those of you who are reading this and saying to yourselves "well, you just need to vet harder", I will state it again: Your wife can be n=0 from a religious family without divorce, no obvious red flags and … at some stage she just flips the script and decides she finally agrees with the cultural messaging, after all.

The point is, no matter whether you've spent all your life's efforts to walk the straight and narrow, or whether you've lived it up before you settled down, their is very little certainty. Such is the gynocentric sexual culture in which we live.

The World vs. The Faith

Christians are living in a very difficult time. There is no way to square this conundrum. Pre-marital sex is immoral, plain and simple. It always will be. In our culture, the prevalence of pre-marital sex poses a tremendous impediment to getting married, and it can also work to blow up marriages, even for people who follow or come close to following the traditional Christian moral rules around sex. But it is what it is. The moral rules aren't based on the culture.

Many, many minds have spent a great amount of time, energy and grey matter on this conundrum in the last 40 years or so. There isn't an answer that is both faithful and practical. There are an abundance of answers which are mostly one or the other, and so most pick one or the other as between faithful and practical, and we all know which of those two most pick.

Churches are in total denial about this conundrum, as I have written before. Pastors and elders won't address the issue because they are afraid to condemn a common social norm that violates doctrine. The leaders of churches should be talking about how illicit sex detracts from sanctification and holiness, but the social expectations run deeper than the call to holiness. They mostly just look the other way and pretend extra-marital sexual relations aren't happening across the board, while knowing full well that it is. No layperson in the church is talking about the widespread abuse of God's gift of sex, because those who are participating in it want to keep it hidden in the closet. They don't want to be called out. Others who aren't participating in the cultural melee are kind of left in the dark, simply because this subterfuged sex-culture is never brought to their attention, and they too, are afraid to investigate the rabbit hole.

There isn't really a workable solution for Christians, unless they, as a community, elect to be entirely counter cultural and play that out. It CAN work in those situations, where the woman is actually motivated by God and the fear of Him, enough to separate herself from the central importance of sexual satisfaction that the culture blares at her all day every day. But these are few and far between. They are outliers of outliers. They are not the basis of a culture, but of a micro-subculture – one that the vast majority of Christian men are unlikely to find.

Conclusions

The gynocentric social norm is common, even within the church.

Although women will never come out and say that they want to postpone marriage, or that they want a divorce, just so they can screw Chads without limits, it is the unspoken desire and motivation in their hearts. Instead, they will hamsterize all kinds of solipsistic justifications for what they do, "I haven't yet found Mr. Right", "Finding one's self", "developing a career", YOLO, etc. Men, in turn, need to be aware of this, and weigh their own approach to the problem carefully, keeping in mind their own situation.

In later posts, we will be addressing various approaches and options in more systematic detail to help readers work through the thought process in their own minds in a more systematic way.

Related

- Σ Frame: Eve Ill Idolaters (2018 September 8)
- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23)

Game Theory 110 — The Prisoner's Dilemma

Jack · 3 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

An altruistic strategy is best over the long haul, but not in the beginning, and not for short term interactions.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: In this post, game theory is about decision making strategies, not about the PUA kind of game, although they can and do overlap.
Some of the game theory in this post is rather taxing to wade through, but it is well worth your time because it contains some very important conclusions. Also, since the knowledge is cumulative and each section builds on previous sections, you cannot really save time by skimming or skipping. Sorry! Just take my word that you'll be much wiser after studying this.
A while back, I wrote a primer in game theory, Introduction to Game Theory 101 (2018 February 11). If you have not yet read this post, I urge you to do so before continuing on.
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Basic Game Theory

In the first part of this post, I will go over some generalized game theory, including Positive-Sum game, Zero-Sum game, and especially Negative-Sum game. The last part of this post will cover one Negative-Sum game of particular interest — The Prisoner's Dilemma. In future posts, I'll be using this theory as a springboard to examine theories of intersexual dynamics in dating and marriage.

Positive Sum or "Win Win" Games

The Positive-Sum game is a game of cooperation and partnership. The partners think in terms of "we", and "us", and seek mutually beneficial outcomes.

In a Positive-Sum Game, the interests of the players are not in direct conflict. Thus, there are some outcomes which would benefit all players. Examples include most recreational activities (hiking, camping, having a barbecue), athletic non-competitive sports (e.g. weight lifting, gymnastics, kayaking), and typical business transactions.

Constant Sum

A game is Constant-Sum if the sum of the payoffs to every player are the same for every single set of strategies. In these games, one player gains if and only if another player loses. Examples include competitive sports in which only one player or team is declared the winner (e.g. baseball, basketball, volleyball, etc.).

A Constant-Sum game can be converted into a Zero-Sum game by subtracting a fixed value from all payoffs, leaving their relative order unchanged.

Zero Sum or "Win Lose" Games

In a Zero-Sum Game, the players' interests are in direct conflict such that there is a winner and a loser. The zero sum game is typically a game of chance, competition, skill, power, and dominance. Examples include card games, and athletic competitive sports (e.g. wrestling, boxing, etc.).

Many non-competitive activities are sometimes cast in a competitive playoff for a fun challenge and entertainment. For example, dancing troupes and science fairs hire judges to pick out the best of show. Construction workers will split into teams and see who can complete the work the fastest or best.

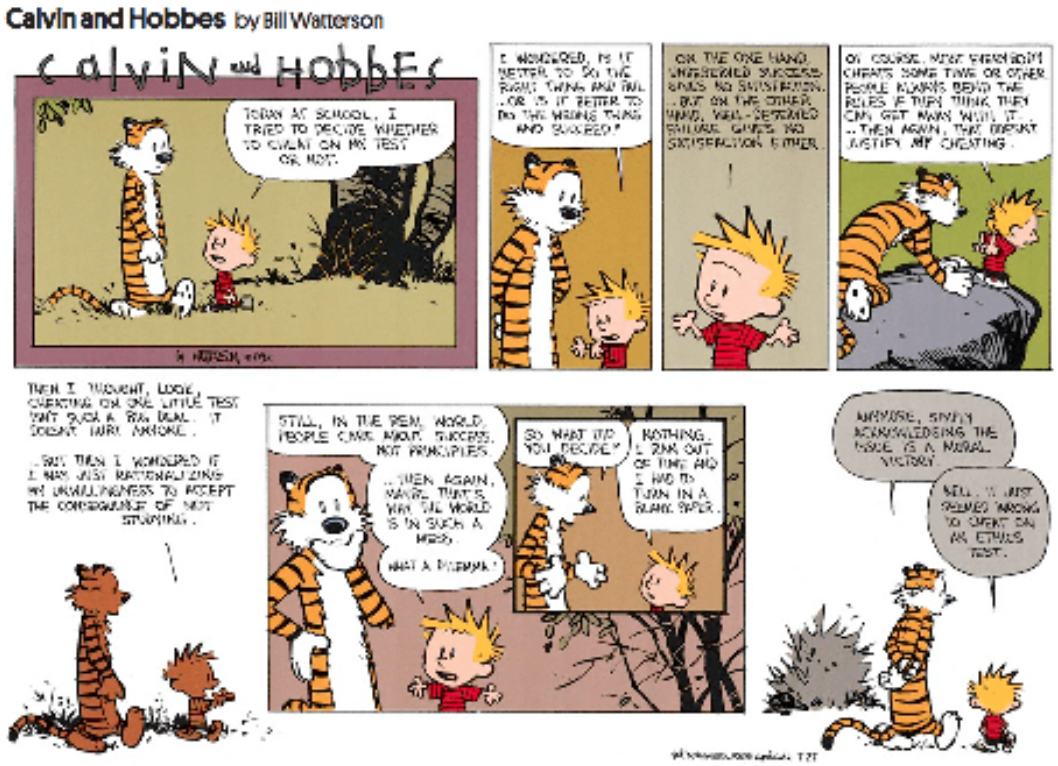
In social intercourse, informal competitions are held to establish social acumen. Most people enjoy this as long as this is done in good will or in fun. However, playing the zero-sum game in serious matters tends to divide people into factions. Some people (i.e. risk-takers) who view this as a challenge are willing to raise the stakes and go all in on it, while others (i.e. risk adverse) view it as unwise, or as a potential threat, and withdraw. Women have been known to sift out risk-adverse men when they play, "Let's you and him fight!" Women who habitually play the zero-sum game in serious matters are typically deemed by marriage-minded men to be unworthy as a partner, and are thus avoided and rejected from LTR's, especially if she has an arrogant or presumptuous attitude in the matter.

Negative Sum games

In a Negative-Sum game, the interests of the players are not contingently opposed to each other, such that everyone could lose.

The Negative-Sum game is a game of compromise, sacrifice, and perhaps trust, and the goals depend on the context, the history of interaction, and the personalities of the individuals. Sometimes the game is played for one's own benefit, and other times, it can be played for the mutual benefit of certain figures who are involved.

A well-studied example of the Negative-Sum game is the Prisoner's Dilemma. We'll go over this next.



The Prisoner's Dilemma [1]

The Prisoner's Dilemma is a standard example of a game analyzed in game theory that shows why two completely "rational" individuals might not cooperate, even if it appears that it is in their best interests to do so. It was originally framed by Merrill Flood and Melvin Dresher working at RAND in 1950. Albert W. Tucker formalized the game with prison sentence rewards and named it, "The Prisoner's Dilemma" (Poundstone, 1992), presenting it as follows:

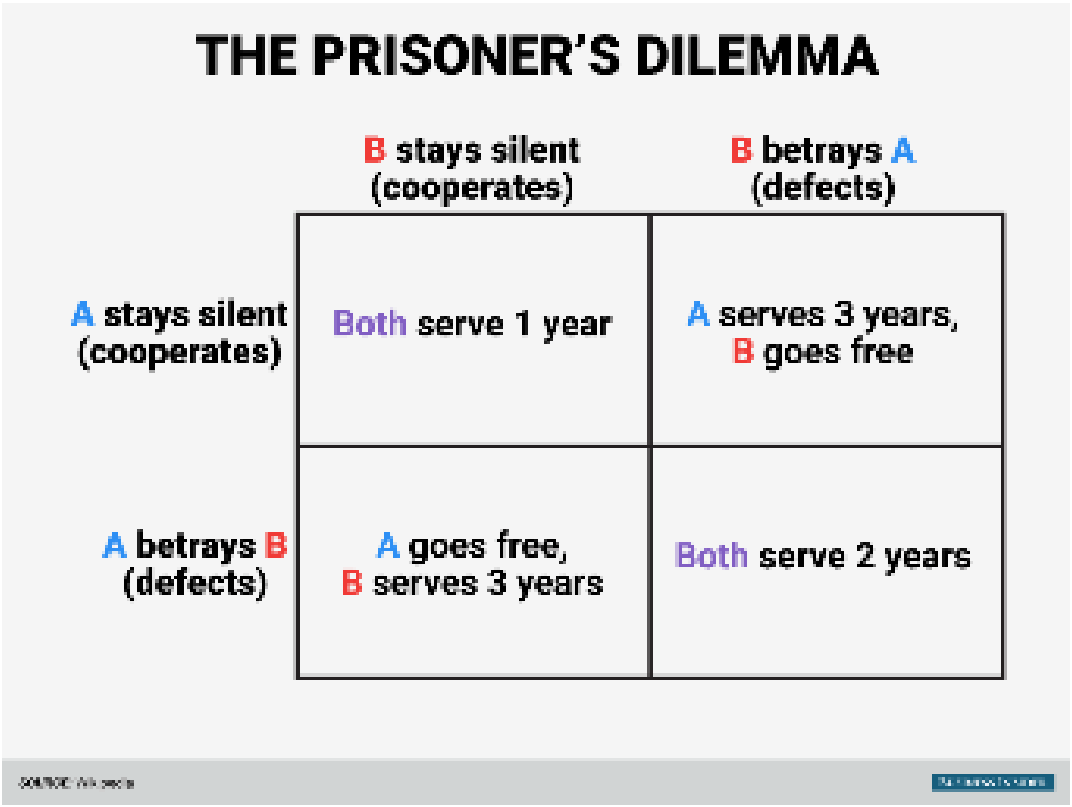
Two members of a criminal gang are arrested and imprisoned. Each prisoner is in solitary confinement with no means of communicating with the other. The prosecutors lack sufficient evidence to convict the pair on the principal charge, but they have enough to convict both on a lesser charge. Simultaneously, the prosecutors offer each prisoner a bargain. Each prisoner is given the opportunity either to (1) confess to the major crime and receive a reduced sentence, and in doing so, betray the other by testifying that the other committed the crime, or (2) to remain silent. The possible outcomes are:

- If A and B both confess to the major crime (i.e. each betray the other), each of them serves 2 years in prison.
- If A confesses to the major crime and rats out B, but B remains silent, then A will be set free and B will serve 3 years in prison (and vice versa).
- If A and B both remain silent, then both of them will only serve 1 year in prison (on the lesser charge).

The following conditions also apply.

- Each prisoner has no clue of which choice the other prisoner might make.
- It is implied that the prisoners will have no opportunity to reward or punish their partner other than the prison sentences they get, and that their decision will not affect their reputation in the future.

A matrix of possibilities and outcomes is shown below.



It is better to Defect!

Here, regardless of what the other decides, each prisoner gets a better reward by betraying the other ("defecting").

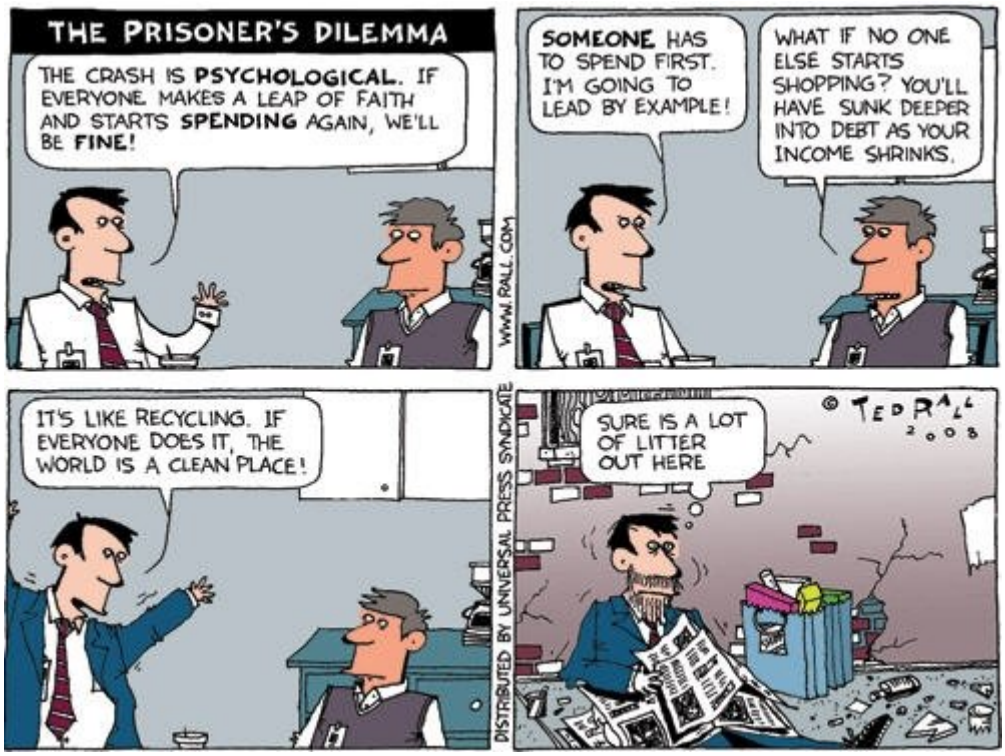
The reasoning (from the perspective of prisoner A) involves a deductive argument by dilemma:

1. B will either cooperate or defect.
2. If B cooperates, A should defect, because going free is better than serving 1 year.
3. If B defects, A should also defect, because serving 2 years is better than serving 3.
4. So either way, A should defect.

Parallel reasoning will show that B should defect.

Because betraying a partner offers a greater reward than cooperating with him, all purely rational self-interested prisoners would betray the other, and so the only possible outcome for two purely rational prisoners is for them to betray each other.

The important thing to understand from this result is that pursuing an individual reward logically leads both of the prisoners to betray, even though they would collectively serve less time if they both kept silent.



The Iterated Prisoner's Game [2]

An extended, "iterated" version of the Prisoner's Dilemma also exists. In this version, the classic game is played repeatedly between the same prisoners, and consequently, both prisoners continuously have an opportunity to reward or penalize the other for previous decisions.

The iterated prisoners' dilemma game is fundamental to some theories of human cooperation and trust. On the assumption that the game can model transactions between two people requiring trust, cooperative behavior in populations may be modeled by a multi-player, iterated version of the game. Prisoner's Dilemma tournaments have been held to test algorithms and strategies through competition.

If the game is played exactly N times and both players know this, then it is always game theoretically optimal to defect in all rounds. The only possible Nash equilibrium is to always defect. The proof is inductive: one might as well defect on the last turn, since the opponent will not have a chance to later retaliate. Therefore, both will defect on the last turn. Thus, the player might as well defect on the second-to-last turn, since the opponent will defect on the last no matter what is done, and so on. The same applies if the game length is unknown but has a known upper limit. Therefore, if the number of times the game will be played is known to the players, then (by backward induction) two classically rational players will betray each other repeatedly, for the same reasons as the single shot variant.

Of note, this proof holds to be the only correct answer within standard economic theory.

In a non-economic game of infinite or unknown length there is no fixed optimum strategy. This opens up a plethora of game strategic possibilities. Unlike the standard Prisoners' Dilemma, in the Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma the defection strategy is counter-intuitive and fails badly to predict the behavior of human players.
The superrational strategy in the Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma with fixed N is to cooperate with a superrational opponent, and in cases of a large N, experimental results on strategies agree with the superrational version, not the game-theoretic rational one.

For cooperation to emerge between game theoretic rational players, the total number of rounds N must be random, or at least unknown to the players. In this case 'always defect' may no longer be a strictly dominant strategy, only a Nash equilibrium. Amongst results shown by Robert Aumann in a 1959 paper, rational players repeatedly interacting for indefinitely long games can sustain the cooperative outcome.

I will discuss some detailed strategies of the Iterated Prisoners Dilemma in some upcoming posts.

Conclusions

The optimal (points-maximizing) strategy for the one-time Prisoner's Dilemma game is simply defection. As explained above, this is true whatever the composition of opponents may be. However, in the Iterated Prisoner's Dilemma game the optimal strategy depends upon the strategies of likely opponents, and how they will react to defections and cooperations.

For example, consider a population where everyone defects every time, except for a single individual following the Tit for Tat strategy (i.e. making the same move that the opponent did in the last round). That individual is at a slight disadvantage because of the loss on the first turn. In such a population, the optimal strategy for that individual is to defect every time. In a population with a certain percentage of always-defectors and the rest being Tit for Tat players, the optimal strategy for an individual depends on the percentage, and on the length of the game.

Follow up posts will discuss the evolution of winning strategies in The Prisoner's Dilemma, as applied to Dating and Marriage.

References

1. Infogalactic: Game Theory
2. Infogalactic: Prisoner's Dilemma

Related

On the Turning Away

Jack · 5 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Exploring how the zephyr of divorce has rocked the West, leading to a breakdown in moral sanctity.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post was authored by Jack, with input from NovaSeeker.
Length: 3,350 words
Reading Time: 18 minutes

Introduction

I want to thank everyone who shared their personal stories about divorce under Parental Divorce Ruins Daughters' Future Marital Commitment and Confidence (2021/2/24).

It seems like the majority of commenters (and probably many other lurking readers) have been exposed to divorce in some way. Sharing our stories helps us gain some context (at least for me).

The prevalence of divorce has been a societal zephyr that first hit the Boomers in large numbers. This zephyr has cast a shadow over Gen Xers, and this shadow has stretched over the successive generations on down. This post contains my personal testimony about my own experience of parental divorce, some related comments, and other musings.

It is not helpful for this to become an exercise in blame, self-pity, or to form a narrative of victimization, but nevertheless it is important to understand how things happened and the present consequences of the modeled behaviors of prior generations. The purpose is for us to grieve over the losses and come to terms with the present maladies.

This song from Pink Floyd came out while I was in high school (1988). I believe it has a prophetic message that we can only now comprehend.

Generation EXistential

I remember when I was in middle school (early 80s), there was a lot of talk about the new generation — my generation. People couldn't figure out what to call our generation. We had no defining stereotypical features of a generation (at that time). We all felt lost, fearful, aimless, and many felt hopeless. But as naïve, energetic adolescents, we weren't very well aware of this. Older folks (mostly Boomers) thought we were a mystery, so we carelessly and somewhat mockingly got stuck with the generic label, Generation X. Over time, we accepted this moniker — we had no other identity to cling to.

Looking back on life, I see that the advent of divorce and "latch-key parenting" during our childhood (70s and 80s) was a significant contributor to this spiritual malaise — much more than anyone could imagine at that time.

The previous generation of the Nomad type (according to the Strauss Howe Generational Theory) was called "The Lost Generation". This generation, born between 1883-1900, came of age during World War I, the first mechanized steam punk war before modern medicine — that was in many ways, the worst war ever. Many felt "that 'the flower of youth' and the 'best of the nation' had been destroyed. The Lost Generation was literally lost due to war, but Generation X was lost in a more figurative sense — cast into existentialism because of the parental divorce epidemic.

Ken Kesey and the Merry Pranksters riding in the bus Further, 1964.

The Shadow Over X was Cast by Zephyr D

Last year, Scott told us a memorable story, How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020/4/27). In this post, he describes the peace and joy surrounding a happily married couple, and how this home environment transcended the eternal. I also had glimpses of this during my childhood (and I assume many readers did as well). One of my closest friends was my pastor's son, and I experienced this whenever I visited his home. But overall, it always seemed like a phenomenon that hit me at odd, unpredictable moments. I had no idea what it was, nor why I experienced this peace. I know I am not alone in being clueless. To many of us, a story like Scott's seems surreal, as though it were a dream. Only after I was nearing 30 did I realize that this was the presence and glory of God — a blessing over the home of a spiritually obedient husband and wife. I was confused about this because, this is not unique to Christians. Scott states that the couple he knew were not Christians, and I grew up in a Christian home, but I never experienced this.

Realizing this made me very angry. I had the impression that all of life is a carnival of pleasures for those who had gained an inner sense of security from growing up in a home like this. But for some reason unknown to me, I was utterly excluded from this joy. Worse, I had no idea how I might achieve this for myself, and all my prayers and Bible reading did nothing to budge my spiritual position.

I am 49 years old today. Only within the past couple years have I come to understand that the peace and joy which I've always been missing is the result of a Headship marital structure between two good-willed parents who have shared values. It is too late for me to seek after this abundance now. All I can do is insist on as much Headship as my wife is willing to accept, trusting God that she'll eventually "get it". Every day, I have to brace myself for the possibility that she won't, and that I may very well go through another divorce if she digs in her heels. I feel sad that my children must endure this same vacuum of joy and insecurity that I had to endure. The only positive aspect is that I am now in a position to give them some insights and forewarnings about the generational curse of divorce, based on my own experiences.

Album cover, Magic Bus: The Who on Tour, (1968).

The Children of Divorce Feel Unloved

We have the nebulous assumption that the transformation of the SMP is a result of the Sexual Revolution. This is obviously true, but if I were to put a finger on the one factor that perpetuates the "Free Love" attitude of the Sexual Revolution, I would say it is because the shadow of divorce leaves the young generations in the dark. It cut them off from the blessings of obedience, and created a "hole in the soul" which led them to search for love and meaning through sexual liaisons.

Essentially, when sex became "free", and No Fault Divorce put an easily revolving door on marriage, these things lost all their value. When parents reduce the value of the metaphysical qualities that are inherent in marriage and sex, and spent them on their own pleasures and conveniences, the spiritual inheritance is then passed off as worthless, leaving nothing for the children. This follows the archetype of Esau, who sold his inheritance for a bowl of lentils (Genesis 25:29-34), and was cursed as godless (Hebrews 12:15-17), and his descendants were destroyed (Jeremiah 49:10).

Divorce Defiles the Children

If you've been around the Manosphere for a sufficient amount of time, you will have learned that the path of defilement is how most men enter into the Red Pill world — their Blue Pill sanctified ways of life, no matter how filled with BP lies they might be, become defiled through adultery or divorce, which is prevalent in today's culture, and they are forced to rethink everything they believe about life, sex, marriage, and women. It is only then, they realize that those BP beliefs are lies which proved to be their undoing.

This same transmogrification happens to children when they experience parental divorce. But children don't have the life experience to give them any perspective on their metanoia. They also don't have the social support needed to weather the storm, since it is the parents who introduced this catastrophe.

> [14] that we should no longer be children, tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the trickery of men, in the cunning craftiness of deceitful plotting, [15] but, speaking the truth in love, may grow up in all things into Him who is the head — Christ — [16] from whom the whole body, joined and knit together by what every joint supplies, according to the effective working by which every part does its share, causes growth of the body for the edifying of itself in love.
>
> Ephesians 4:14-16 (NKJV)

The Bible describes this as a transgression.

> [17] "But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is Christ therefore a minister of sin? Certainly not! [18] For if I build again those things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor. [19] For I through the law died to the law that I might live to God. [20] I have been crucified with Christ; it is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me. [21] I do not set aside the grace of God; for if righteousness comes through the law, then Christ died in vain."
>
> Galatians 2:17-21 (NKJV)

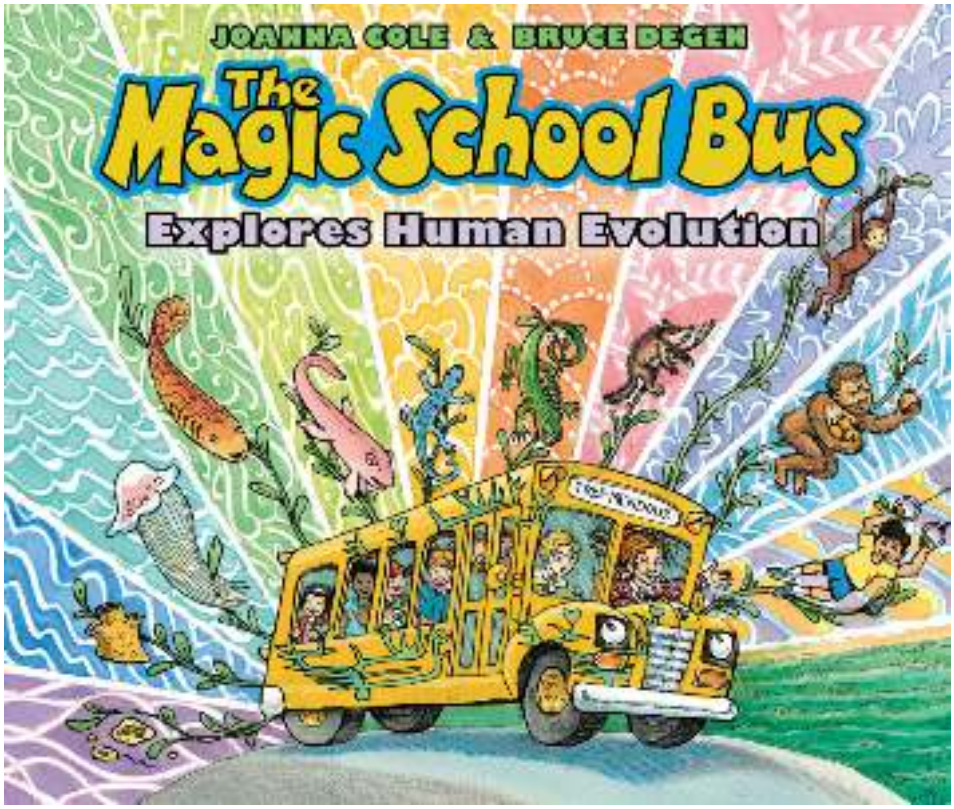
Another way to describe a transgression is when one jumps from one set of values and beliefs to another.



Divorce forces children into transgression because it introduces doubts about marriage, family, love, forgiveness, and a host of other spiritually fundamental issues.

> [5] If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask of God, who gives to all liberally and without reproach, and it will be given to him. [6] But let him ask in faith, with no doubting, for he who doubts is like a wave of the sea driven and tossed by the wind. [7] For let not that man suppose that he will receive anything from the Lord; [8] he is a double-minded man, unstable in all his ways.
>
> James 1:5-8 (NKJV)

The adult who is double-minded needs to be healed and made whole from the self-inflicted damage they have undergone. They must kill the other ungodly (false) personality that has been given influence over their thinking. Then and only then will they experience real stability and lasting change.

Children, on the other hand, have a more difficult and tortuous path towards healing, because they don't know what went wrong, nor what they have been missing in their lives, nor what to do about it. This process is complicated by the fact that the sin is generational, and the damage is not apparent until much later in life. In the meantime, they are forced to wander in the wilderness of the world, searching for identity, love, meaning, purpose… — all the spiritual nutrients they failed to receive from the family as children. The time spent wandering is time lost in the sense that it is consumed with existential soul searching and is not used towards making any progress in life. Most never make a full recovery, while others are left to wander until they die in the wilderness.

Bus 142 on the Stampede Trail, Alaska. Several hikers have died in their search for this extreme location.

Stumbling around in the Darkness of the Shadow

In Data on Marriage and how No Fault Divorce turned marriage into a revolving door. (2020/10/30), I discussed how No Fault Divorce legislation (ca. 1970) transformed marriage from a covenantal institution into a social transaction. It ostensibly reduced the value of marriage while it simultaneously offered the tangible benefits of financial savings, living conveniences, and the self-styled entertainment of “playing house”. Without the sense of permanency offered by a life-time commitment, marriage is essentially playing house with a revolving door.

A serious downstream effect of divorce is that the increased sexual promiscuity and divorce of previous generations has dramatically undermined the faith and confidence of younger generations, leading to yet more sexual promiscuity and divorce. This creates a cycle that essentially constitutes the dynamics of a generational curse. Previous generations have failed to “pass the torch” of maintaining the sanctification of sex, marriage, and family, thereby abandoning younger generations in the fallout effect.

I know what this spiritual confusion and purposelessness is like from experience. To put it into my own words, I’ll describe it like this. A person’s relationship with one’s father is an archetype of one’s relationship with God. A person’s relationship with one’s mother is an archetype of one’s relationship with humanity. When mother and father divorce, then it splits the soul, rendering the psychological separation of God and human life. God cannot then be experienced through social interactions, and social interactions have no spiritual significance. Hence, the double-mindedness.

The transgressions that result from the spiritual confusion and double-mindedness of enduring parental divorce are evident. My youngest sister was a model straight A student up until the time my parents divorced when she was 14 years old, which I’ll add, is the worst time of any to experience parental divorce. As soon as the zephyr’s shadow fell, she started smoking and drinking, and then plunged into a lifestyle of casual drug use and promiscuity. She barely graduated from high school. Now on her third marriage, she has sworn off ever having children.

I was 22 at that time, and already on my own. But it still had the effect of throwing me into an episode of depression which lasted over a year, and insomnia which continues to this day. I gave up on the idea of pressing towards my long held hope of marriage for a time, which was a time when I should have been capitalizing on the opportunities that college offered in this arena of life.

The Continuation of the Family is Lost

Feeriker gives us a description of how parents have not supported and guided their children towards life in the spirit.

> "I remember Scott having posted something a couple of years or so ago, I believe it was on Dalrock's blog, to the effect that he and Mychael would be very willing to give assistance to any God-fearing, hardworking, motivated young son-in-law who married his daughter, or to one of his sons and his bride, to help them get on their feet and get economically viable as a family. This clearly is recognition of the fact that economic self-sufficiency for the young is much harder to obtain today than it was in the past due to the changes (or more accurately, corruption) in our modern economy and that if young family formation IAW God's ideal is the goal, then it's going to mean that the young couple's entire family will have to contribute as a family to help make it happen (gosh, imagine that: families nurturing and caring for their own. Who came up with that heinous idea? /S).
>
> This, methinks, is one major unstated reason why young family formation in in the modern "Christian" west is so rare. Parents have to be deeply involved not only in raising their children in God's ways when they're young, but providing biblically sound wisdom and guidance to them as they enter the world of late adolescence and adulthood, one of the most challenging and terrifying times for young adults as they face the challenges of the "real world" for the first time.
>
> Unfortunately for these young people, this is also the time when most western (especially American) "Christian" parents, who are deeply wedded to and committed to THE CULTURE'S life script, decide that they're done raising kids and do everything they can to eject them out of the nest and out of their lives, to sink or swim in the wider world as best they can survive it. Let them make their own way in the world and sort it out for themselves. What God wants for families (as Jack enumerates in the OP) is the farthest thing from the churchian mind. Indeed, it's doubtful that any of them have ever even read, much less pondered or absorbed any of the relevant verses. Having to do things the Lord's way is just too risky in terms of having to remove their best foot from the World that is their first love and involves too much work. "I raised'em from birth! Now you want me to mentor 'em in adulthood? Are you NUTS?!"

> This goes a long way toward explaining the state of the western "Christian" family today. God appears to have decided that if we're determined to not do things His way, then He's going to let us reap the bitter fruits of doing it our way."

What Ed Hurst wrote about in his post, A Full-Blown Apocalypse (2021/2/13), and which was quoted in NovaSeeker's last post, The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market (2021/2/22), keeps coming back to my mind.

> "By the time we have come to this understanding of faith, we would be too old for a clean first marriage that produces children. The faith community can't get started because the members have to pass through a hellish landscape of immoral relationships first.
>
> And that's what they pass through when they start out in churches!"

The Church was Inefficacious, if not Deleterious

It is common for young people to fall away from the church for a time. But over the past few decades, this life phase has been augmented and extended, with fewer people ultimately returning to the church.

NovaSeeker wrote,

> "The response of the church to this issue has been to look the other way.
>
> Essentially the church, and parents, meander between (1) denying that their kids are having sex between puberty and marriage in the late 20s/early 30s and (2) accepting that they do, but minimizing the sinfulness of it, given its ubiquity in the culture, and the fact that most married couples around them fornicated themselves prior to marriage (and in almost all cases prior to fornicating with the person they married, as well). The church therefore either denies that the problem exists, or it chooses to look the other way, quietly, and not say much about what it knows is happening but refuses to discuss. That way, the "doctrine on the books" can remain the same as is, despite the de facto practice — which is looking the other way in the face of mass fornication — and things go on per our regularly scheduled programming.
>
> The variant of "I advocate getting married at 22 instead of 27" is a fallback position, but it's still a fantasy. Even if it were locked in stone that a child of either sex would marry by 22, which it isn't, there's still a LOT of > fornicating going on, especially in that 18-22 period. And, in many cases, 22 quickly becomes 25 due to grad school, post-graduate internships, travel, and the other fabulousness that mid-20s Americans who are college educated tend to engage in, and the higher up the pole the merrier it gets. But either way, whether it's 22 (rare) or 25 or 27 the issue is the same, and the difference is merely one of degree (pardon the pun). Once they're loose in this culture, it's game on, and everyone knows it."

Among all these worldly distractions, the basic truths about male-female relationships, and especially how to implement them effectively, were left in the dust. Perhaps this was evident to those who grew up in an intact family, but to those who suffered under the shadow of the zephyr, it was totally non-existent. Instead, pop-psyche variations of Therapeutic Moralistic Deism sprang up to fill this void.

Overall, the church drifted from being mindful of what God is most concerned about, to focusing on our own self interests (what we are most concerned about), to chasing after the things of this world (e.g. the Feminist Life Script, individualism, materialism…). BigChurch was the trailblazer.

The Magic Bus Day, by Daniel Nash.

Conclusions

Upon reflection, it may be apparent to the reader by now, that when a society loosens its sexual norms, the associated "liberation" is not only depravity, but it is also the destruction of sanctity. It would be more fitting and accurate, from a Christian perspective, to rename "the Sexual Revolution" as "the Defilement Rebellion".

Related

- Σ Frame: Forgiveness – The biggest obstacle in overcoming my parent's divorce (2010/3/3)
- Σ Frame: The U.S. Census Bureau sanctions Divorce (2020/1/25)
- Σ Frame: Female Divorce Lawyer Stands for Fatherhood (2020/11/24)
- The Antemodernist: Making Excuses for God (2020/12/20)

The Relinquished Life

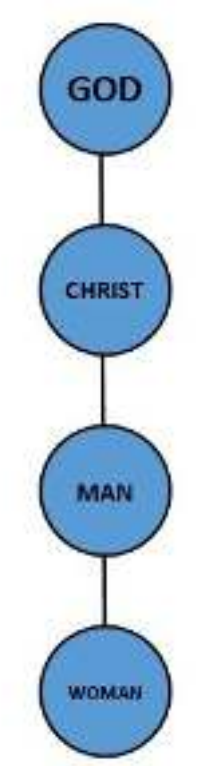
Jack · 8 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A woman's relationship to her husband should emulate a man's relationship to Christ.

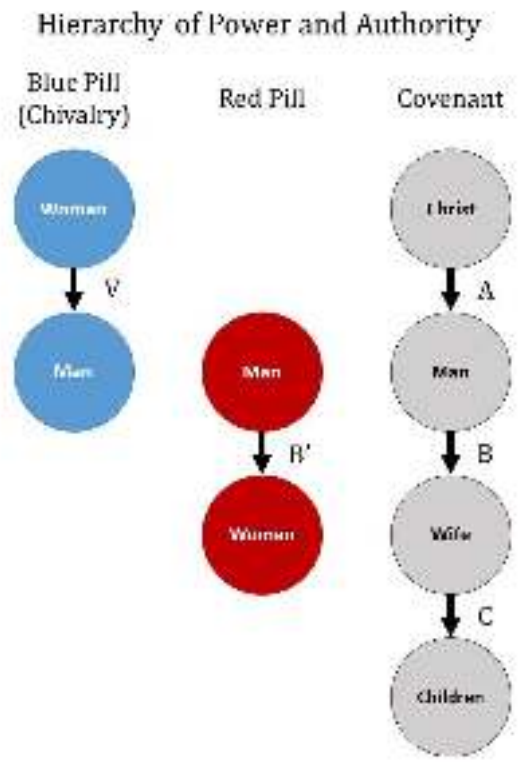
Readership: All;
Author's Note: The following essay is offered as a thought experiment to provoke the reader's imagination and inquisitive thinking.
Length: 1,900 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

God's Hierarchical Structure of Authority

Ephesians 5:22-33 describes a woman's relationship to a man in marriage as an analogy of the man's relationship to Christ. Furthermore, this archetype contains a hierarchical structure of authority that has been ordained by God. Snapper TRX has described this hierarchy in his post, Breaking the Chain (March 8, 2018), and he used the following diagram as a visual illustration.



Below is a similar illustration which compares the Christ centered Covenant archetype with the Blue Pill and Red Pill models. In this figure, Relationship A is the relationship between Christ and man. Relationship B is the relationship between a man and his wife. Based on the claims of Ephesians 5:22-33, the remainder of this article illustrates a comparison between these two relationships (A and B) in the hierarchy.



Relationship B: Man Relinquishes His Life to Christ

In Galatians 2:20, Paul states the testimony of a man who has relinquished his life to Christ.

> "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me. The life I now live in the body, I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."
>
> Galatians 2:20 (NIV)

Oswald Chambers wrote about The Relinquished Life in his post for March 8.

> "To become one with Jesus Christ, a person must be willing not only to give up sin, but also to surrender his whole way of looking at things. Being born again by the Spirit of God, means that we must first be willing to let go, before we can grasp something else. The first thing we must surrender is all of our pretense or deceit. What our Lord wants us to present to Him is not our goodness, honesty, or our efforts to do better, but real solid sin. Actually, that is all He can take from us. And what He gives us in exchange for our sin is real solid righteousness. But we must surrender all pretense that we are anything, and give up all our claims of even being worthy of God's consideration.
>
> Once we have done that, the Spirit of God will show us what we need to surrender next. Along each step of this process, we will have to give up our claims to our rights to ourselves. Are we willing to surrender our grasp on all that we possess, our desires, and everything else in our lives? Are we ready to be identified with the death of Jesus Christ?
>
> We will suffer a sharp painful disillusionment before we fully surrender. When people really see themselves as the Lord sees them, it is not the terribly offensive sins of the flesh that shock them, but the awful nature of the pride of their own hearts opposing Jesus Christ. When they see themselves in the light of the Lord, the shame, horror, and desperate conviction hit home for them."
>
> Oswald Chambers: The Relinquished Life (entry for March 8).

Relationship C: The Wife Relinquishes Her Life to her Husband

If we take the liberty to rewrite the scripture passage from Galatians from the perspective of the Godly wife, it might read something like this.

> "I have been joyfully nailed in the marriage bed, and I am no longer a striving independent wimmin (SIW), but my husband and family find a joyful, fresh new life through me. The life I now live in the body, I live by trusting in my husband, who loves me daily and took such huge costs and accepted great risks upon himself to marry me."
>
> Galatians 2:20 (NΣFV)

In like manner, the following section contains a reworked version of Chambers' words from the perspective of the submissive wife.

The Relinquishing Wife

For a wife to become one with her husband, she must be willing not only to give up her 'strong, independent lifestyle', but also to surrender her whole way of looking at things. Finding a new life and identity as a married woman means that she must first be willing to let go of her vain grasping for control and autonomy before she can grasp something else. The first thing she must surrender is all her hamsterbated pretenses and solipsistic deceit, which is the feminine variety of sin.

- What our Lord wants her to present to Him is not her virtue signaling, feigned honesty, or her self-serving efforts to "do better", but real solid sin. She has to get real and stop clinging to the hamsterized vanity of her solipsistic mind.
- What her husband wants is for her to pursue a fully abandoned holiness as described in 1st Peter 3:1-7.

> "Wives, in the same way be submissive to your husbands so that, if any of them do not believe the word, they may be won over without words by the behavior of their wives, when they see the purity and reverence of your lives. Your beauty should not come from outward adornment, such as braided hair and the wearing of gold jewelry and fine clothes. Instead, it should be that of your inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet > spirit, which is of great worth in God's sight. For this is the way the holy women of the past who put their hope in God used to make themselves beautiful. They were submissive to their own husbands, like Sarah, who obeyed Abraham and called him her master. You are her daughters if you do what is right and do not give way to fear. Husbands, in the same way be considerate as you live with your wives, and treat them with respect as the weaker partner and as heirs with you of the gracious gift of life, so that nothing will hinder your prayers."

>
> 1 Peter 3:1–7 (NKJV)

Being submissive necessarily includes being ready and joyfully enthusiastic in the family room, the kitchen, and the bedroom, which are the three main spheres of a married woman's influence. Actually, sincere submission as an expression of trust and respect is the greatest thing that a woman can offer to a man that has an eternal spiritual impact. Consequently, the husband can find rest in his own home, an inspiration to his faith, and confidence through exercising his authority in his marriage and family. Thus, the husband will grow spiritually, and come to love and appreciate his wife more genuinely. Furthermore, what God gives a woman in exchange for her submission is real solid righteousness! But she must surrender all pretense that she is anything of herself, and give up all her claims of even being worthy of her husband's consideration.

Once she has done that, her husband will show her what she needs to surrender next. Her cooperation in this endeavor is very important, because her submission is only made evident to the husband through her willingness to obey. Along each step of this process, she will have to give up her claims to her rights to herself. In the beginning, this might take the extreme form of "no more supercilious $ħit tests", or "no more girls' night out (getting drunk and flirting with other men)". But as time progresses and sanctification sets in, his demands will grow ever more nuanced, such as, "no more trash talk (e.g. gossiping)", or "no more of your egotistical insistence on having the last word". Is the woman willing to surrender her grasp on all that she possesses, her desires, and everything else in her life? Is she ready to be identified as the faithful wife of her husband?

All women suffer a sharp painful disillusionment before they fully surrender, but it is best for them not to be disheartened so much as to avoid postponing this wake up, because eventually, all women must surrender. Some do so willingly by getting married young, and therefore reap the joys and blessings intended by God and nature, while others have this disillusionment rudely foisted upon them after they have wasted their youth on self-centered profligacy and have Hit the Wall (AKA "going over the falls"). A woman who goes through life this way forfeits any blessings she may have otherwise had by accepting the truth and serving the Lord and her husband during her prime years of peak fertility.

When women really see themselves as men (i.e. her husband) see them, it is not their terribly offensive sins of the flesh that shock them (for they have known this propensity all along), but the awful nature of the pride of their own hearts opposing the love, guidance, and discipline provided by husbands. When they see themselves in the light of their husband's opinions, the shame, horror, and desperate conviction hit home for them.

Conclusions

Some readers might assume this post is satire, or that it is grossly out of step with the times. But in fact, the truths about Headship contained here (1) are the reason why the Christian Marriage Dilemma exists, and (2) they offer a working solution to the Christian Conundrum. More to the point, it is the only solution that God offers to married couples, so it is important for us to take these things to heart.

If you are a man faced with the question of whether or not to surrender to Christ, make a determination to go on through the crisis, surrendering all that you have and all that you are to Him. And God will then equip you to do all that He requires of you, for it is the intentions of the Lord for you to be salt and light to others around you. If you are a single man with the mind to be married, do not waste your time, money, and strength pursuing a wife in the lopsided liberalized MMP. Stay focused on your work for God, your mission in life, being salt and light for the Lord, and at the right time, the right woman will notice this and come to you. (See Scott's Axiom.) If you are married, then do the heavy lifting necessary to work towards Headship.

If you are a young woman or a wife faced with the question of whether or not to trust and submit to a man in marriage or to your husband, respectively, make a determination to go on through the crisis of belief, surrendering all that you have and all that you are to the man you choose or have chosen, respectively. And God will bless you as a woman of great faith, just as it is said of Abraham's wife, Sarah. Your blessings will overflow to your husband and children, for it is the intentions of the Lord to bless them through you.

Related

- Σ Frame: Salt – Matthew 5:13 (2009 September 12)
- Bible.org (Gregory Brown): 11 Characteristics of a Godly Marriage (1 Peter 3:1–7) (ca. 2014)
- Σ Frame: The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27).
- Σ Frame: Being Attractive in Service (2020 June 24)
- Σ Frame: Having an Attractive Attitude in Serving (2020 June 29)
- Σ Frame: Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models (2020 September 28)

- Σ Frame: Headship Restoration (2020 November 21)
- Σ Frame: More on Relational Archetypes (2020 November 28)

The Demise of the Christian Life Script

Novaseeker · 10 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

There no longer exists a social structure that supports the Christian Life Trajectory.

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: This essay was authored by NovaSeeker, with input from Jack.
Length: 3,100 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Introduction

Previously, Deti summarized The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17). This pattern of life formation — which impacts young women most directly, but impacts young men's development as well — has been a topic of conversation and debate in the sphere for several years. But there has been very little discussion of the Christian Life Script, which seems to have been swept under the collective social rug since at least the 1990s, if not before.

Scott wrote,

> "If I could wave a magic wand over the whole [male vs. female] thing, and offer something actually doable and reasonable…
>
> Instead of trying to build a time machine and go back and undo suffrage, or Lancelot, I would ask women with daughters to make these kinds of statements to them:
>
> "Men are capable of incredible depths of feeling, devotion, commitment and sacrifice. All the way unto the death of themselves to protect and provide for those they love. Why not work on making yourself a woman that one of these men might want to feel that way about? Because once you find one, you will never be loved like that again until you meet Christ."
>
> That statement is absolutely beyond the pale of polite conversation today because sitcom dads are retards or something."

Christian Life Script, 2020

The reason this sound advice has become trite is because the whole conversation is based on the old regime, commonly referenced as the "1950's era", which is now denounced as "the Patriarchy". Note that this obsession with "the 1950s!?!" has now become a meme, not because the related life script was created by the culture of the 1950s, but because the 1950s is the most recent cultural era in which the model was socially permitted to openly predominate in a way that was socially celebrated rather than pathologized. While it is true, therefore, as critics sometimes point out, that the average age of both sexes at first marriage reached a recent historical low during the late 1950s era, as compared with the earlier 20th and later 19th Centuries, the prior periods nevertheless still featured the same life script as the 1950s did, in terms of the most common life priorities of people. The common denominator of all such life priorities prior to marriage was the culmination and preservation of social and financial securities leading to marriage, sex, and raising a family. This stands in stark contrast to the current "feminist life script" which is entirely focused on everything other than steps leading to marriage. So comprehensively, the old regime highlighted in the 1950s era represented a "continuity of life" script — albeit with earlier marital ages due to unprecedent levels of prosperity enjoyed in the United States during that period. Not only did this system encourage continuity within the lifespan of the individual, it was also a lifestyle that was continuous with prior periods and generations, rather than one that posed a fundamental break with that prior life script, as was seen in the cultural developments after 1967.

Conservative Christians and other tradition-oriented people revere the old social regime because it included widespread social support for, and approval of, what we might call a Christian Life Script. According to the idealized version of this life script as it most recently existed in the 1950s era, the husband had a successful career and was able to earn enough money to support a large family comfortably. The wife doted on her husband and tended to the home and children meticulously and joyfully. Children grew up with an intact family, and more often than not, experienced the glorious presence of God in the home and community interactions. Old TV shows from this era, like Father Knows Best, Leave it to Beaver, and Andy Griffith, and (relatively) more recent TV shows such as The Cosby Show and Seventh Heaven showcased this dynamic which was put forth as an ideal to be emulated. Granted, this system was rife with various misgivings and errors of attribution, including the bumbling father archetype, Chivalry, and low levels of progressivism (as an appeal to cultural relevancy), but for the most part, it worked for the majority of those who chose this path, to a greater or a lesser degree, and the absolute failure rate was low. It is important to note as well that the actual interior "conversion" of the individuals engaged in the Christian Life Script cannot be judged from our time period and perspective — what can be judged is that the external arrangements of life were more or less conducive to the development of such conversion in individuals who were minded to do so.

Beginning in the first quarter of the 20th Century, there emerged a series of marginal subcultures which, over time, grew in popularity and influence at the expense of the Christian Life Script. These subcultures included the culture of the Flappers (1920s), the Beat Culture (1940s), Greaser Culture (1950s), the Sexual Revolution (1960s), Women's Liberation (1970s), Divorce Culture (1980s), Political Correctness Progressivism (1990s), Post-Modernism (2000s), Gay liberation and Intersectionality (2010s), and the current wave of CRT/Wokism. These cultural movements each first appeared on the margins of normative social life, but over time, their larger effect has been to erode the old social order and mores and gradually shift the Overton window of morality and accepted (and expected) behaviors over time.

This marginal effect was made possible and greatly amplified by (at least) two massive game-changing social/technological shifts which I covered in The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021 February 17). I'll touch upon these briefly in the next section before continuing on.

Flapper, Canada, 1920s

Modern Values and "Conveniences" have undermined the former Christian Life Script

The first shift concerns reproduction. Safe, cheap, legal abortion and safe, cheap, reliable contraception both worked, together, to remove the "natural check" on female sexuality. While it's true that both of these existed historically, and it's also true that pornography has existed since the time of cave drawings — suffice to say, the contemporary versions of each are more socially impactful in obvious ways in our technology-driven context.

The second shift is the continued change in the focus of economic activity away from occupations that depended on male strength and towards the kinds of activities that obviate physical strength, favor brain power, and, at the same time, provide for a good deal of free social and leisure time. This general move towards convenience, comfort, and leisure is commonly lauded as the summit of technological process, however, it carried some d@mning consequences.

A core element of the second set of changes is that they made economic independence from specific men (i.e., fathers and husbands), in a true sense, viable for most women in a way that it never was historically. The fact that this happened roughly around the same time as the changes in reproductive technology (and their related legal regime) combined to create the incredibly dislocating social revolution we saw in the final third of the 20th century — a time where the entirety of the relationship between men and women was changed or, rather, began to be changed in a way that shifted things away from where things had been for most of human history until then, and into … something different, the contours of which have, even today, not yet settled. By my reckoning, if the sexual revolution were a baseball game, we're probably somewhere around the bottom of the 4th inning.

Critically, these changes acted to sideline the existing life script fairly quickly. The reason this happened is that the old Christian Life Script didn't include financially independent, career-minded women in it — the old script divided roles and tasks between the sexes, and was focused on marriage. The new script threw men and women together as "equal" participants in all areas of life, and focused on personal development and what gradually came to be known as "self-actualization", into which marriage could be squeezed but for which it was not essential. The core of the new life script was personal development and advancement, not marriage and family life — again, the latter could be a part of the former if one wished it to be, still, but it was not the core of the system any longer. Now, the individual and his or her prerogatives, desires, goals and wants, all became paramount, each of which was to be determined and developed by the individual, acting as independently as possible in order to ensure the greatest level of "authenticity" to one's "true self".

These two changes were therefore neither minor nor incremental — together they constituted a sea change! Wrapped together they formed the core of an epochal social change that flipped over the board game of sexual relations, and one that caused the new Feminist Life Script to emerge virtually overnight, in the space of a mere decade or two following the "main quake".

The Dragon is Unleashed

It is often stated, both around the Manosphere and in the broader discourse as well, that the true nature of women is now being revealed, now that the "restrictions" and "rules" of the old regime have been removed.

However, contemporary women are NOT acting according to their true nature, either according to God's covenant order or according to their simple biological natures. Instead, today's women are acting according to their artificially elevated sexual expression, because the natural biological checks on that have been taken away by technologically, quite deliberately.

In the natural state (and in much of the United States prior to around 1960), women having sexual relations ran a significant risk of pregnancy. If this risk came to fruition, and a woman was not married, it led to various levels of considerably unpleasant social and life outcomes for the woman in question, which led to the related sexual behaviors (i.e., the ones that led to one becoming pregnant without being married) being socially punished in various ways.

And even aside from the social penalties they were made to pay for unwed pregnancies, few women relished becoming single mothers in that regime — in a way that is virtually unthinkable today. Such women in that era (and prior ones) led a socially challenging and financially hard-scrabble life for decades as a result of that single decision. Suffice it to say that these morbid outcomes discouraged most women from indulging, at least extensively, in extra-marital sexual relations.

While it is true that some women did so and placed the children up for adoption, or had "back alley" abortions, or even left the child on someone's steps, these situations were all outside the norm, and most women succeeded in avoiding these eventualities by the straightforward step of avoiding what was previously (now rather quaintly) termed "going all the way".

It may also be tempting for some to think of this shift as a technological development which allows women's sinful nature to go unfettered and uncorrected. In other words, so as to say something like, "Biological realities without technological advancements naturally tempered those underlying urges for a while". While this may be technically true, it is nevertheless distorting because the phrase "for a while" is doing an awful lot of work. In reality, "for a while" means "the entire history of the human species except for the last 50-70 years".

It seems far truer to state outright that women have been unnaturally liberated from precisely the naturally designed context of God-ordained sexuality, and that what we are seeing is not the true nature of women's sexuality, but rather the expression of women's sexuality when the natural "checks and balances" are artificially transcended. It is critical to understand this aspect of what has happened, because in fact, this is all part of a broader intellectual and cultural trend which involves the shedding not just of moral boundaries, but also of natural ones. Separating sex from procreation was the first step in that direction. Then equal opportunity, then divorce, and so on, as I've described earlier. Transgenderism is the current iteration. The basic idea that unites all these changes is that naturally imposed limits on the human person should not be respected, but that instead, we should use science and law to transcend those limits as we may choose to do so for our own ends. The term "transhumanism" is often used for this dragon, and I may be addressing this in a future essay.

The New Life Script Emerges

The impact of this unleashing of women's unchecked sexuality on the general life script is clear. It has shifted the focus for young women away from marriage and children and towards what can only be euphemistically called "self-actualization", which invariably involves higher education (and debt), dating around (expressed hypergamy), and profligate sex for fun and exploration (riding the CC). This is, in fact, regarded to be the "dividend" of these developments by generations of women, and as the true fruit of the process of women's liberation. Entire older cohorts of women, women who were too old to reap most of the benefits of the emergent regime when it came into force, play the role of enthusiastic elder cheerleaders, vicariously living, through their daughters and grand-daughters, lives they would have themselves preferred to live, had they had the "good fortune" to have been born a bit later in history. For all of these cohorts of women, going back to the old life script is fully out of the question, and the mere suggestion of doing so is treated with scornful disdain.

And, it is also out of the question for the overwhelming majority of fathers who have raised daughters who were born after 1965, and this stance has gained increasing intensity over time. These fathers have proved to be some of the strongest supporters of the elimination of the old life script and its transformation into the new one, which is built around the priority of securing young women's economic independence, career trajectory, sexual satisfaction and excitement, and self-actualization, all before "settling down" at some "appointed time" (which keeps increasing in age) and actually marrying.

Simply put, the changes to the economy and the rise of the "opt in" nature of a durable pregnancy as a consequence of sex made the old life script moot in the eyes of most people, and ushered in, over the course of a mere generation, an utterly new life script which has a completely different focus, and therefore leads to very different outcomes for everyone involved.

What will the New Christian Life Script look like?

The final form of the emergent life script in the broader culture is still very much a work in progress, because things are still changing — technology is still working massive changes in this area, whether people want to deny or minimize them or not.

But in any case, we should expect that the entire attitudes towards everything concerning sex, marriage, family life, relationships between men and women, sex and gender roles and the like, will, when the final model eventually emerges, be utterly transformed and changed.

That strongly suggests adaptation is required. It is certainly true that hoping for rollbacks of any of these developments is foolish. That generally doesn't happen very often in history, and bromides like "what can't last won't last" are comforting to hear when your perspective is losing a cultural war in a rout, but in reality, things we don't like can last well beyond our lifetime, and even that of our children. So hoping they will be reversed in the context of any actionable, relevant timeframe is not productive, in my opinion.

At the same time, however, waving one's hands and saying, "Why can't we just…?" when the rest that follows is something like, "…because we need to get people to understand that they are better off doing X rather than Y", is also not productive, because unless you provide incentives for people to do X instead of Y, you're going to get Y and not X. That's just how people roll in a Prisoner's Dilemma. Women have no incentive to listen to that message, or any other kind of message, other than a few outliers here and there, because following the path of Y is what is incented, and so that is where they will go, especially when there are a number of vectors pointing them towards choice Y, such as,

- Y matches their unnaturally freed biological desires (unchecked now by social/biological constraints).
- Y matches the common human desire to pursue one's own desires and pleasures.
- Y opens the door to one's self-determined course of action.
- Y matches the strong cultural messaging.
- Y is pushed and supported by parents, including in particular fathers.

Taken together, all of this supports the essence of the sin in Genesis 3, which started humanity down this entire road. It won't be overturned by wishing people thought differently, or that they didn't respond to incentives. The underlying cause is much stronger than that, and isn't susceptible to being waved away like that.

To be effective, a new Christian Life Script needs to take these five aspects into account. That is to say,

- The Life Script must channel one's common human social and biological desires towards the enterprises of community, marriage, and family.
- The Life Script must offer opportunities for sanctification, allowing one to pursue one's own desires and pleasures in a longitudinally fulfilling manner.
- The Life Script allows one to choose a self-determined course of action.
- The Life Script is explained through education and endorsed by strong cultural messaging.
- The Life Script is solidly portrayed as an effective model by parents.

The challenge remains of how this can be established. And while it should be clear to all Christians that this kind of transformation in the life script and the expectations about the life path of Christians requires the work of the Holy Spirit, nevertheless it will also require the work and effort of many individual Christians to articulate, incarnate, and disseminate approaches and practices, on a practical level, with other like-minded people so as to cultivate the emergence of a new consensus within Christian culture regarding this. This is a process, and it will take time to work through, unfortunately, given the power of the social and other forces involved.

Related

- Σ Frame: Where is your life headed? (2019 February 8)
- Σ Frame: A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose (2020 September 4)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Amalgamation of Western Culture (2020 December 2)

The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional

Jack · 12 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

You've got the looks. I've got the brains. Let's make lots of money!

Readership: All
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The Rise of the Geisha and Danna

Our study of The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry in January emphasized how both men and women, in response to the degradation of the SMP and MMP, are resorting to faux relationships of a transactional nature. Women who are gifted with looks, charm, and the mind for business are dominating the new SMP/OASIS. These women were compared to geishas in the discussion, and this trope resonated around the 'sphere.

Farm Boy wrote a post on this topic at Spawny's Space. In it, he wrote,

> "Is there something comparable [to a geisha in] the West? Not formally. Probably there are some fellas who have ladies that they lean on, with the fellas providing gifts and the like. Perhaps the market for such a thing has never been big enough to create something legitimately."
>
> "It really should not be that difficult for a lady to figure out what the customer wants, then package up the product. Just listen, think, figure out what to do, then respond appropriately when needed. This is perhaps about some of the easiest money around if you can cultivate such a customer."
>
> Spawny's Space (Farm Boy): Geisha (2021 January 19)

Yes, the real challenge for female competitors in this arena lies in the invention of a suave personalized image of femininity, and the presentation and marketing thereof.

In Japan before the WWII era, geishas underwent several stages of training, starting as young as 6, and lasting many years. It was traditional in the past for an apprenticed geisha to take a danna, or patron. A danna was typically a wealthy man, sometimes married, who had the means to support the very large expenses related to a geisha's traditional training and other costs.

Likewise, now there is a vacuous need for a new kind of pimp/madame/master/mentor/danna — someone who can educate and coach young attention/income seekers to be an idealized geisha from a man's point of view. This idealized geisha would have all of the honeycraft and creampies that men covet, and none of the witchcraft and $h!t testing that is typically inherent in the average unregenerated female. This idealized geisha would also have the image and PR necessary to succeed.

NovaSeeker described the technical aspects of this as a "production".

> "Creating HQ content is a "production" as Delphine describes. You need lighting. You need direction. You need scenes and a planned flow. It isn't Shakespeare, but it also isn't a woman alone in her bedroom with her cellphone taking a video of herself touching herself. It's a production. It requires other people. It requires multiple takes, in some cases. It requires post-production and editing. And all of that is more time consuming (much more), more invasive to personal life, and more costly than taking pics and videos with your own cellphone yourself (or via your IG boyfriend or some OF BFF) together with the occasional pro shoot (bonus if your BF is a pro photographer, or if you have a BFF who is). It crosses those lines of "accessibility" and "ease of production" that have made OF so attractive to women, precisely because it is no harder for them to produce content for than Instagram. That changes, quite a bit, if one is shifting to HC video content."

Of course, parents and especially fathers should have given young girls training in poise, manners, and etiquette, especially concerning how to get along with men. Wealthier families sent their daughters to a professional finishing school. However, the past few generations have dismissed learning these social graces as demeaning and old fashioned. Their failure to transmit the time-tested traditions of the old regime (and the knowledge of God's ordained order of creation) has left modern generations of young women without any concept of the personal wealth they might have at their disposal, given proper training.

But with the rise of OASIS, it seems that (some) women may now begin to recognize the value of the values of the past — but they have no dannas to guide them… yet.

The bards of yesteryear foretold of this coming age.

The Future of the West

Long time commenter horsemanbombadil summed up the Geisha analogy as follows.

> This is the future of the west.
>
> Men have detached and have little interest in long term provisioning. Economies are entering hard times, depression. Large groups of men and women who are not the 20% are going to be forced into singleness for all of their 35-65s.
>
> Many women post wall do not have the skills\jobs to support themselves until retirement. Many men do not have the 20% to be desirable but because of self-focus are economically comfortable.
>
> Social supports like siblings, extended family are fractured so the extended family living arrangement is gone.
>
> The solution?
>
> Men women sharing resources to live comfortably but without the romantic, family ties.
>
> The housekeeper who tends house for the confirmed bachelor common in the late 1800s, early 1900s…
>
> The girlfriend experience\geisha that pretends but is a formal honourable business transaction.

> The legal and accepted hooker. Simple, clean sexual transaction as needed.
>
> Women for the most part cannot do the pure corporate grind as singletons for 40 years, 25-65 no matter what feminism says. They want to be part of a social unit. But men do not trust them on a social level.
>
> The social contract is broken.
>
> So the answer is a business contract.
>
> Focus here and everywhere is the pre wall and immediate post wall periods — the 20-year period mid-twenties to mid-forties.
>
> But there is an equal 20-year period that must be addressed. 45-65 retirement.
>
> What does society do with large groups of bachelors and spinsters in these groups?
>
> How to incentive them to continue working, being good citizens, being part of society when they have no family, no meaningful work, no human interaction?
>
> Large groups spending two decades despondent, discarded, without hope? Abandon any animal and see what it does? It either goes mad, goes aggressive or lays down to die.
>
> Society cannot have this in large numbers. It will find a solution.

> The natural evolution will be to form new units, but at arm's length.
> Based not on mutual need like prehistory to 1900, not based on love like 1900 to 1970s, not based on hedonism\free love like 1970s to present.
>
> Based strictly on business relationship play acting as social.
> I trust my work associates because it is in our mutual best interests.
> Do I emotionally like them? Irrelevant.
>
> That is what the next base unit of society. A small business group.
>
> Borders in a boarding house.
>
> Home owner and housekeeper

> Worker and live in geisha.
>
> Independent singleton and on demand date\sexual partner.
>
> Both sexes are fine in the 20s to 40s.* Those decades are full of establishing whatever the lifestyle is. The CC, the becoming successful at work, the making one's mark on the world.
>
> The peak performing years. This can replace social bonds by achievement or pleasure.
>
> But once one plateaus? When tomorrow will not be better than today. When the body tires?
> When the sparkle of the pursuit becomes the grind?
>
> Forget even the baby clock etc.
>
> The day when you realize, I don't want to do this anymore? But I have a decade or more to retirement or the home? Women how do you suck it up and do your corporate job? Men how do you suck it up and stay part of society?
>
> At this point being alone will be intolerable. Socially and economically.
>
> The sexes will gravitate to what biologically are designed for. The programming cannot overcome forever. But the biology will not overcome the mistrust and jadedness caused by the decades of experience. So the answer will be some compromise of the biological need to form units against the emotional detachment of experience.
>
> The playacting model.

 I disagree that both sexes are "fine" in the 20s to 40s (most men suffer exceedingly), but horseman's overall point still stands. Please read The Futility of Justifying the Crash Landing (2021 February 15) for more on this.*

Oddity Central: New Taipei Restaurant Uses Bikini-Clad Waitresses to Attract Customers (2017 March 27)

Conclusions

When love and trust evaporate, then human interaction boils down to a series of transactions in order to fulfill needs. The needs will not budge, and if people will not trust God to fulfill those needs, then they are reduced to bartering and various power plays in order to satisfy those needs.

But even this approach requires training and preparation.

Enter the new 21st century danna and the geisha finishing school.

Related

- Haute Culture Fashion: 50 Amazing Facts About Geisha Everybody Ought To Know! (2016 November 13)
- Σ Frame: Now she's directing her own pro motion! (2021 January 15)

Constructing a Framework of Options

Novaseeker · 15 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

What choices do Christians have in today's world when it comes to pursuing intersexual relationships, marriage and family?

Readership: Christians
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

Recent discussions on this blog concerning the approach of Christians to pursuing life goals involving intersexual relationships, marriage, and family have tended to echo prior discussions on other blogs about the same issues. It seems to me that this reflects the twin realities that (A) there are, in fact, very few options available to Christians and (B) the attractiveness of any particular option is going to tend to be very dependent on one's own "personal/ideological matrix" — that is, the combination of personal qualities ("strengths" in today's "market") and faith/ideology commitments which, taken together, form the experiential and mental/spiritual "lens" through which one sees and appraises the short list of available options.

This brief (by my standards!) post will explore the well-known options in slightly more detail, following an editorial conclusion reflecting my own views.

What Options do we have?*

The advent of modern science and technology, together with the nearly simultaneous economic shifts which I have described in greater detail in recent posts, have worked together to change the general socio-economic context in which we currently live, fundamentally, utterly, and likely irreversibly (at least from the perspective of any timeframe that is relevant to individual decision-making concerning these issues). For reasons and in the ways detailed in my earlier posts, these changes have had a dramatic impact on the process and outcome of the dating/mating experience for everyone, whether Christian or not. The resulting changes have produced the familiar landscape in which we live, and this has had the effect of reducing the options that are available to Christians seeking marriage. Thus, the available options for Christians in the dating/mating context essentially boil down to the following short list of options, each of which I will describe in slightly more detail immediately following the list. (Note that this list should be taken as a general framework for organizing thinking about the general options, and not as a straitjacket of categories.):

1. Adaptation to the new reality.
2. Ignoring the new reality because one has a strong enough "market" position to do so.
3. An outlier "custom" solution, if you can manage it.

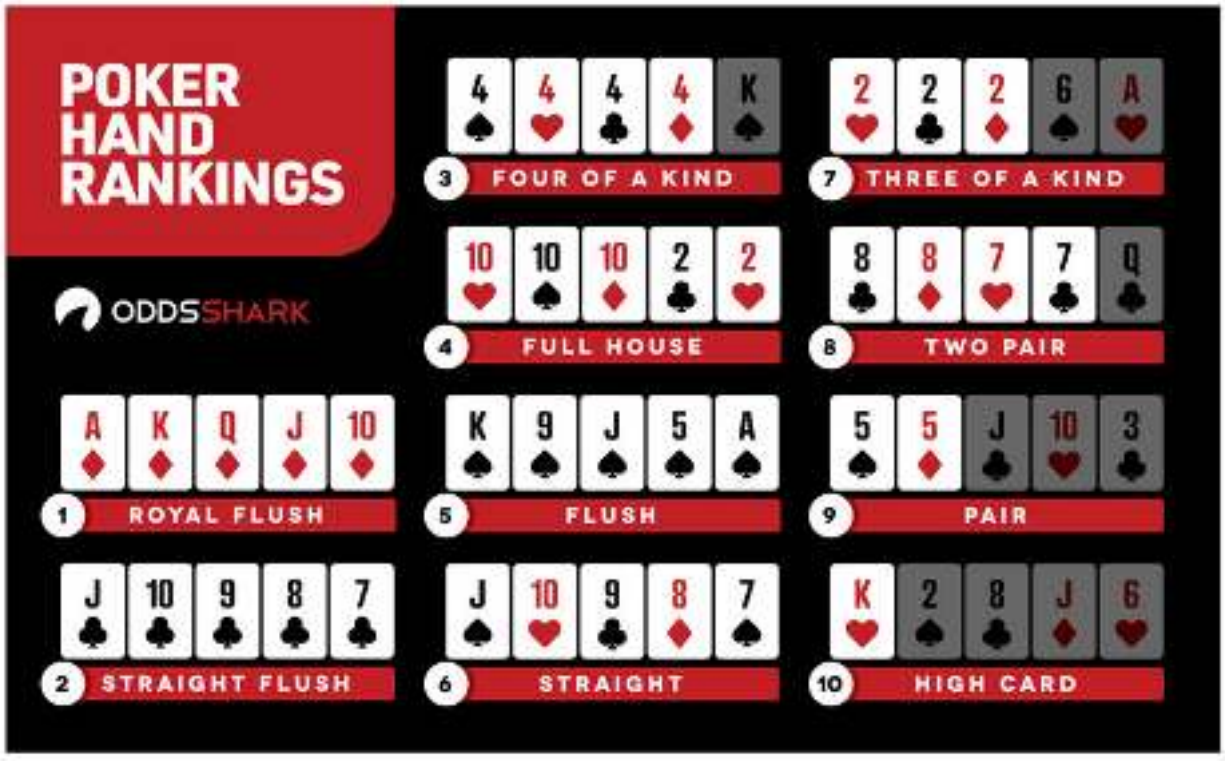
Option (1) involves various forms of personal accommodation or compromise to the standards imposed by the changed landscape. As Christians, we reflexively scoff at this, but the reality is that it is what most people do, because most people don't have sufficiently "strong hands" (in the deck of cards sense) to achieve personally-desired outcomes while completely disregarding the standards of the new cultural landscape. The various segments of the secular Manosphere (e.g. incels, MGTOW, and PUA) are taking this option, each in obviously different ways. The Christian Manosphere has yet to find a viable form of adaptation to the current cultural standards and expectations that does not run afoul of scriptural mandates while not at the same time requiring the placement of oneself in the "top 20% of men". We can think of this option as the "capitulation" option.

Option (2) is for the people who have the "strong hands" (again, in the deck of cards sense), because the strong hands generally do well regardless of what the rules and conventions of any context are — they are, after all, the strong hands, meaning that they have characteristics that are going to lead to superior outcomes in a variety of different contexts, sets of standards, rules, and expectations. Examples of this are the "Blueprint" offered by DeepStrength, which, while likely effective, requires the placement of oneself in the top 20% of men within the given context — in other words, becoming one of the "strong hands". We can think of this option as the "brute force" option.

Option (3) is for those people who are charting a different course, intentionally going against the grain, neither accommodating/adapting to the new system, nor rising above it based on being able to transcend it by having a strong hand, but rather choosing a deliberately outlier path. People who pursue this option may succeed at reaching their goals, or they may fail to reach any of their goals, depending on any number of factors, but the key distinguishing characteristic of this option is that it is a self-designed, self-curated, individually-tailored pathway that attempts to provide a narrowly-tailored, personally-specific solution based on the specific parameters of the individual involved, and their specific and particular strengths and weaknesses, played out in a carefully contrived context — all of which, taken together, changes the possibilities. It does not hew to the current conventions in a close way (either in the general secular or general/mainstream "Christian" conventional approach), nor is it based on having an extraordinarily strong hand, but it is typically a non-replicable solution because it is specifically tailored to one individual and his particular traits, situation, and possibilities. Men like Jack who leave the system by traveling/living abroad and marrying a foreign wife are taking this option. We can think of this option as the "single tailored" option.

Finally it may be possible to combine certain elements of these options together, as is the case for the recurring idea of setting up a group of like-minded people who work together to secure mates for each other or for their children. In a different vein, others have proposed the formation of a sub-society of like-minded Christians. These two ideas are a blend of options 2 and 3 in this list. The former requires a carefully contrived context, consisting of faith, trust, and social networking, while the latter of which generally requires that one has a strong hand, including the investment capital to buy property in a remote geographical area. Moreover, both these ideas require the various kinds of inspirational, administrative, organizational, logistical, and other abilities that put one well out of the realm of the average person. In general, these hybrid options will tend towards one or another of the three general approaches depending on what the hybrid requires in order to work.

The reality is that the principal factor that determines a man's choice about whether to pursue option (1), (2), or (3), is the strength of his own hand (i.e., whether he is in group (2) or not). This isn't a matter of personal choice, but is determined by his given personal qualities (physical, mental, motivational, disciplinary, all of which are traits with bell-curve distributions), and therefore only rather modestly subject to personal determination and improvement. For those who don't have a naturally strong hand in these key areas, the choice boils down to what each man thinks is a better, more viable and morally acceptable course for him personally, as between (1) and (3).



Holding a Royal Flush?

Conclusions

My perspective is that in any group of Christians, there will be some who "fit" into each of the options above. (We can call those who choose option 1 to be "Group 1", and so on.) For example, among those who read and comment here at Σ Frame, we have some people who are in Group 1 (who "compromised" with the current culture's approach to these issues in order to get desired results), some people who are in Group 2 (who have strong hands, or were close enough to get into the strong hands category, and "brute force" the system for desired results), and people who are in Group 3 (who are pursuing "single tailored" individual approaches that are generally not replicable by others, in order to get desired results).

These differences in approach will tend to be based on individual differences in each person themselves (since the key distinctions between the choices are largely based on this), which therefore will lead to significant differences in perspective, which is another way of saying “disagreements”.

To take an obvious example of this, not everyone here is married — some people are never marrieds, some people are divorced, and some people are in second marriages. How each arrived in those situations — including their current marriage — differs, and how they choose to sustain their current situation, or change it, also differs. More importantly for the purposes of this discussion, these differences often depend on the traits/type of person they are, the “strength” of their “hand” overall, and therefore the panoply of realizable options that they perceive as being available to them.

These differences between people’s strengths and life situations lead them to disagree about the best approach to the current dilemma, because their experience of the current dilemma is simply different, due to their different personal traits and situation — all of which have a significant impact on how the current dilemma “cuts” for them personally, how deeply, and how damagingly.

In my view, these experiential differences — particularly because they viscerally relate to so central and critical an area of life — tend to be extremely difficult to bridge in any way that leads to shared conceptualization of viable solutions across the board. In my view, this is the critical reason why these discussions of solutions to the dilemma we all face, always tend to go in circles, and tend to be very familiar, well-worn ones, with easily identifiable grooves. Their basis is deep, experiential, and in the case of most of us, close to many of most unshakeable convictions due to the very central and visceral nature of this experiential data which serves to inform and confirm these convictions. The resulting gap can be observed but, in my view, it simply cannot be bridged.

Related

- Σ Frame: Where is your life headed? (2019 February 8)
- Σ Frame: A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose (2020 September 4)

Strategies for the Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma

Jack · 17 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A fresh look at "Christian Game" as a potentially winning arrangement.

Readership: Men
Reader's Note: In this post, game theory is about decision making strategies, not about the PUA kind of game, although they can and do overlap.
Length: 2,350 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

This post is intended to let readers become more aware of game theories with the purpose of gaining an objective view towards important real-life applications.

Other posts in this series which you may want to read before continuing on.

- Σ Frame (Jack): Introduction to Game Theory 101 (2018 February 11).
- Σ Frame (Jack): Game Theory 110 — The Prisoner's Game (2021 March 3)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Constructing a Framework of Options (2021 March 15)

Also, readers are encouraged to click on the many links contained in this post for further reading about game theory.

> "Shall we attempt this one? Let's do it!"
>
> Kevin Cronan (lead singer of the supergroup, REO Speedwagon)

The Evolution of Winning Strategies

In this section, "evolution" describes how two players who are initially unfamiliar with the other's strategy will, upon multiple adaptive reiterations, eventually learn how to cooperate in a mutually beneficial fashion.

In a relationship, "success" or "winning" can be interpreted in two different ways.

1. Gaining more "points" than the opponent. In real life, "points" could be interpreted as a wide number of things, including affirmation, attention, control, favor, love, loyalty, recognition, respect, and others.
2. Achieving a mutually beneficial play strategy, characterized by various milestones, such as altruism, commitment, harmony, honor, humility, trust, and others.

Those who are young, emotionally energetic, and spiritually immature usually start off under the assumption of the first definition above. As time and experience leads to maturity, most people eventually come to appreciate the second definition.

Robert Axelrod used an algorithm to show a possible mechanism for the evolution of altruistic behavior from mechanisms that are initially purely selfish, by natural selection. It was later applied to the Prisoner's Dilemma in order to model the evolution of altruism.

Axelrod discovered that when encounters were repeated over a long period of time with many players, each with different strategies, greedy strategies tended to do very poorly in the long run while more altruistic strategies did better, as judged purely by self-interest.

This is because, in reality, humans display a systemic bias towards cooperative behavior in socio-sexual games, much more so than predicted by simple models of “rational” self-interested action. This has been proven by alternate game simulations which adopted group-based motivations.

For example, one model based on a different kind of rationality, where people forecast how the game would be played if they formed coalitions and then they maximize their forecasts, has been shown to make better predictions of the rate of cooperation in the Prisoner’s Dilemma and similar games given only the payoffs of the game. In other words, group socialization coerces players to be honest (sooner or later) for the benefit of participating in the group.

So apparently, one’s initial degree of rational self-interest makes little difference in the long run of life; what matters is how one plays the game, and whether one learns to be cooperative. I believe this is where the failure in the current mating marketplace lies. A significant segment of the population is not playing the game (e.g. MGTOW, incels), and another large segment is not learning to be cooperative (e.g. PUAs, frivorcing wimminz).

1952 Cadillac Pick-Up

2 Approaches to Develop an Optimal Strategy

Deriving the optimal strategy is generally done in two ways:

1. The Empirical Approach: Monte Carlo simulations of populations have been made, where individuals with low scores die off, and those with high scores reproduce. Thus, a Genetic Algorithm sets forth a context for finding an optimal strategy, which is mimicked by evolutionary psychology models in the Red Pill lore. It results in either the “Brute Force” or the “Capitulation” options described in NovaSeeker’s post. We could also call this “The Law of the Jungle”. The mix of algorithms in the final population generally depends on the mix in the initial population. The introduction of mutation (random variation during reproduction) lessens the dependency on the initial population. Empirical experiments with such systems tend to produce Tit for Tat players (described below), but no analytic proof exists that this will always occur.
2. The Analytical Approach: Initially, the characteristics of other players are unknown or incomplete, and so part of the approach involves developing a system of beliefs about the population, perhaps by using the Bandit or Exploration Strategies, (described below). If the statistical distribution of opposing strategies can be determined (e.g. 50% Tit for Tat, 50% Always Cooperate) an optimal counter-strategy can be derived analytically. The particular strategy that is settled upon is largely dependent on the characteristic and beliefs of the individual, whereas the preferred strategies of the larger population matter less. This is the "Single Tailored" option described in NovaSeeker's post. Men who hunt for a better church, or go abroad in search of a wife, are seeking to place themselves within a social context having a different (less known) or unknown statistical distribution of opposing strategies. This offers a different set of boundary conditions in which a preferred solution can evolve through a Bayesian Nash Equilibrium. We could also call this the "Pioneer" or "Greener Pastures" approach.

1952 Chevrolet Pick-Up Truck

The Bandit Strategy

Concerning new players (viz. players that have just been introduced as partners in an iterative game), the Bandit Problem models an agent that simultaneously attempts to acquire new knowledge (called "exploration") and optimize his or her decisions based on existing knowledge (called "exploitation"). The agent attempts to balance these competing tasks in order to maximize his or her total value over the period of time considered.

The Bandit Problem is used as a model of resource investment to help determine the optimal dynamic allocation of resources to different projects, answering the question of how much time and money should be devoted to each one, given uncertainty about the difficulty and payoff of each possibility.

There are many practical applications of the bandit model, for example:

- Adaptive Routing (e.g. network development) – Focuses on broadening social connections and minimizing delays and inconveniences.
- Clinical Trials (e.g. medical research) – Investigating the effects of different experimental treatments while minimizing losses.
- Portfolio Design (e.g. stock finances) – Through trial and error, discovering and curating a tailored collection of personal traits and methods that will work best for developing a robust strategy.

We can see the Bandit Strategy being employed by people in the SMP. Men and women will opt to meet and date several partners, sometimes simultaneously, in order to "explore" and "exploit" (as described above), in an effort to quickly ascertain the return on investment potential, and which person(s) to pursue as a long(er) term interest.

1952 Dodge half-ton Pick-Up Truck

The Exploration vs. Exploitation Tradeoff

In the practical examples described in the previous section, the problem requires balancing reward maximization based on the knowledge already acquired with attempting new actions to further increase knowledge. This is known as the Exploitation vs. Exploration Tradeoff in Reinforcement Learning.

To put forth an example, perhaps you may have noticed how those people who chose not to “play by the rules” are the same people who insist most vehemently on strict rule following.

What we are witnessing here is a manifestation of the Exploitation vs. Exploration Tradeoff in Reinforcement Learning. In simple terms, this means that people who have had a lot of experience and who have made a lot of mistakes, usually become wiser and more proficient in the process. These people are able to point out the problems and errors to others, but they cannot transmit their own wisdom of experience to others who have a different character and who face a different life situation. This is because the accumulation of knowledge can only happen through one’s own personal engagement in Exploitation and Exploration.

We also see the Exploitation vs. Exploration Tradeoff occurring in people who didn’t do much Exploration in their youth, and then suddenly realize later in life that they could have had a much better life, and could have attained more of their desires and goals, had they engaged in more Exploration. This sudden realization is called the Epiphany Stage for women, and Midlife Crisis for men. So then they try to overcompensate for regret by going heavy on Exploitation, (e.g. having an affair, getting a divorce, going back to the SMP, etc.), with the mind to use the knowledge they have gained through experience, and the resources and opportunities they have accumulated (which they were lacking when they were younger), to “revise their life choices” in order to actualize their own personality and realize their deeper desires in life.

Engaging in the Exploitation vs. Exploration Tradeoff is often colloquially called, “coming to terms with one’s self”. A quick, clean, easy process, it is anything but.

Fred Sanford's 1952 Ford F-1 Pick-Up Truck

Interestingly, to those who never came to terms with themselves, it appears that those who insist on getting certain results in life by NOT following the same approach that got those same results for themselves, and instead insist on a different set of rules in which it is manifestly harder to obtain any results at all, leaving aside similar results to their own — well, it just seems asinine. They cannot relate.

It's kinda like that aphorism, "Doing the same thing over and over, and expecting different results is a symptom of lunacy." This impasse in communication is caused by a failure to engage in Exploitation and Exploration, and this hesitation is usually because one is afraid to forfeit anything in the Tradeoff.

Christians regularly scoff at the prospect of engaging in Exploitation and Exploration, but actually this is an important part of the maturing process, especially when we're young. Jesus told us, > [26] "If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple. [27] And whoever does not bear his cross and come after Me cannot be My disciple. [28] For which of you, intending to build a tower, does not sit down first and count the cost, whether he has enough to finish it— [29] lest, after he has laid the foundation, and is not able to finish, all who see it begin to mock him, [30] saying, 'This man began to build and was not able to finish'? [31] Or what king, going to make war against another king, does not sit down first and consider whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him who comes against him with twenty thousand? [32] Or else, while the other is still a great way off, he sends a delegation and asks conditions of peace. [33] So likewise, whoever of you does not forsake all that he has cannot be My disciple.

>
> Luke 14:26-33 (NKJV)

One way to interpret verses 26-28 is that one must be willing to take great risks in his pursuit of Truth, and not care too much about the costs or the outcome. The Truth here is Jesus Christ specifically, but this also includes "coming to terms" with one's relationship to Christ. Once the Truth has been obtained, then one is in a better position to assess his own strengths and position in life, and as described in verses 29-32, is less likely to make a catastrophically bad decision (or go through a mid-life crisis, etc.).

* Restomod 1952 Ford F-1 pickup *

Yes, this is the same kind of truck that Fred Sanford had. But this one has received a lot of TLC.

The Pavlov Strategy

In another strategy called the Pavlov Strategy (also called Win-Stay, Lose-Switch), the learning rule bases its decision only on the outcome of the previous play. If the play on the previous round resulted in a success, then the agent plays the same strategy on the next round. Alternatively, if the play resulted in a failure, the agent switches to another action.

For example, if the last round outcome was Defect/Defect, and then this is interpreted by the player as a failure to cooperate, then a Pavlov player will switch strategies the next turn. If for some reason, this same outcome is interpreted by the player as a success, then a Pavlov player will use the same strategy on the next round.

A large-scale empirical study of players of the game Rock, Paper, Scissors showed that some variation of the Pavlov Strategy is adopted by real-world players of the game, instead of the Nash Equilibrium strategy of choosing entirely at random between the three options.

For a certain range of parameters, the Pavlov Strategy beats all other strategies by giving preferential treatment to co-players who resemble the Pavlovian player.

1952 GMC Pick-Up Truck

The Tit for Tat Strategy

According to Axelrod, the winning deterministic strategy was Tit for Tat. This strategy is simply to cooperate on the first iteration of the game. After that, the player does what his or her opponent did on the previous move.

Depending on the situation, a slightly better strategy can be Tit for Tat with Forgiveness. When the opponent defects, on the next move, the player sometimes cooperates anyway, with a small probability (around 1–5%). This allows for occasional recovery from getting trapped in a cycle of Defections. The exact probability depends on the line-up of opponents.

This may partly explain why arranged marriages fare better over the long haul – because in an arranged marriage, both partners enter into the marriage with the mind to cooperate, even though they do not know what their partner will do. Also, they have the assumption that it is an iterative game, rather than a single iteration which is the common mindset among those who meet by chance and embark in whirlwind dating. As a consequence, the iterative game begins with a fast start having good returns, setting both partners farther along the learning curve.

1952 International Pick-Up Truck

The Cooperate-Defect Fiasco

Although Tit for Tat is considered to be the most robust (and most popular) basic strategy, a team from Southampton University in England (led by Professor Nicholas Jennings and consisting of Rajdeep Dash, Sarvapali Ramchurn, Alex Rogers, and Perukrishnen Vytelingum) introduced a new strategy at the 20th Anniversary Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma Competition, which proved to be more successful than Tit for Tat. This strategy relied on collusion between programs to achieve the highest number of points for a single program. The university submitted 60 programs to the competition, which were designed to recognize each other through a series of five to ten moves at the start. Once this recognition was made, one program would always Cooperate and the other would always Defect, assuring the maximum number of points for the Defector. If the program realized that it was playing a non-Southampton player, it would continuously Defect in an attempt to minimize the score of the competing program. As a result, this strategy ended up taking the top three positions in the competition, as well as a number of positions towards the bottom.

This strategy takes advantage of the fact that multiple entries were allowed in this particular competition and that the performance of a team was measured by that of the highest-scoring player (meaning that the use of self-sacrificing players was a form of minmaxing). In a competition where one has control of only a single player, Tit for Tat is certainly a better strategy.

1952 Hudson Hornet Custom Pick-Up

This strategy also relies on circumventing the rules about the Prisoners' Dilemma in that there is no communication allowed between the two players, which the Southampton programs arguably did with their opening "ten move dance" to recognize one another; this only reinforces just how valuable communication can be in shifting the balance of the game.

The Cooperate-Defect Fiasco is employed in relationships, and much too often. One partner Cooperates more often than not, while the other habitually Defects. Also, the Defecting partner is frequently engaged in multiple socio-sexual interactions (or has had in the past), which allows the benefits of the Bandit Strategy to increase one's learning, leading to greater confidence and capability. Adopting this strategy allows the Defecting partner to continually "win", and this is usually manifested in his/her total control over the relationship. Meanwhile, the Cooperating partner sacrifices and suffers, sometimes indefinitely and without hope. Those who continually choose to be Cooperating within a Cooperate-Defect arrangement must have a strong and steadfast psychological justification for doing so, such as a stubborn Blue Pill mentality, self-righteous Chivalry, natural loyalty, the "Nice Guy" (or nice girl) syndrome, strong social reinforcement, religious beliefs, emotional codependency, "Hole in the Soul", or a personality defect. While this is arguably the best strategy of all for the Defector, it is the absolute worst strategy of all for the Cooperator.

In addition to the fine arguments presented by Robert Glover in his book, No More Mr. Nice Guy (which I highly recommend), this is further evidence of why "nice guys finish last". In other words, the Always Cooperate strategy is doomed to fail in a population in which any other self-interested strategy is practiced by an opponent.

1952 Mack Flat-Bed Truck

Necessary Conditions for a Cooperative Winning Strategy

By analyzing the top-scoring strategies, Axelrod stated four conditions necessary for a strategy to be successful.

1. Nice — The most important condition is that the strategy must be "nice", that is, it will not defect before its opponent does (this is sometimes referred to as an "optimistic" algorithm). Almost all of the top-scoring strategies were nice; therefore, a purely selfish strategy will not "cheat" on its opponent, for purely self-interested reasons first.
2. Retaliating — However, Axelrod contended that the successful strategy must not be a blind optimist. It must sometimes retaliate. An example of a non-retaliating strategy is Always Cooperate. This is a very bad choice, as "nasty" strategists will ruthlessly exploit such players, resulting in a Cooperate-Defect Fiasco.
3. Forgiving — Successful strategies must also be forgiving. Though players will retaliate, they will once again fall back into a pattern of cooperating if the opponent does not continue to defect. This stops long runs of revenge and counter-revenge, and thereby maximizes "points".
4. Non-Envious — The last quality is being non-envious, that is not striving to score more than the opponent. In essence, this requires switching one's definition of "success" or "winning" from the first definition to the second, given at the beginning of this essay.

1952 REO Speedwagon Pick-Up Truck

Conclusions

Being Nice, Forgiving, and Non-Envious agrees with the general Christian concept of maintaining a healthy relationship. Of note, Eggerich teaches that both partners in a union must carry a good will towards the other. But one necessary condition for having a successful strategy, Retaliating, is consistently ignored or condemned by Christian circles as being "unchristian", especially where men are concerned. Thus, it is of supreme importance to investigate and employ strategies that embrace conflict.

In addition, the Analytical Approach is often condemned as lonerish or anti-social, if not ignored altogether, and the Bandit Strategy is usually labeled as immature, even though it increases the learning rate, and improves one's confidence and game playing capabilities.

Perhaps worst of all, the Cooperate-Defect Fiasco is often advised or pressed upon good-willed persons who are stuck with an evil-willed partner, with the idea that he/she is "suffering for (or like) Christ unto salvation".

In our attempts to condemn and contain sin, we must be careful not to condemn those approaches and strategies which are most valuable and effective towards defeating sin.

So what's your preferred table for playing '52 Pick-Up? Cadillac styling, Chevy reliability, Dodge the whole thing, cannot afFord, GMC tough, Hornet stealth, Mack Truck's bulldog indomitability, sexy Speedwagon, or will you go International?

Or to put it another way, as the bards of old have foretold,

> "If you're tired of the same old story, then roll with the changes!"

Related

- Σ Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (2017 November 15)
- Σ Frame: Book Review: The Love a Wife Desires, the Respect a Husband Needs (2017 December 18)

- Σ Frame: A Response to Stephanie's Comments (2017 December 19)
- Σ Frame: The Pygmalion Project vs. Shared Enterprises (2018 February 2)
- Σ Frame: Looking at the Essentials (2020 June 12)
- Σ Frame: Some like it Hot (2020 July 3)

A Mystical Approach to Meta Reality

Jack · 19 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A practical way to apprehend the Truth.

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: Richard P left the following as a comment under Scott's post, What would the world be like if everyone was Red Pilled? (2021 March 13). The formatting of the numbers got messed up in posting, and I wanted to correct this properly so it is clear to readers. Also, this comment was rather long at 1,000+ words, and I felt it had significant value, so I asked Richard to send me the full text through email so that I could make it into this separate post. I have reformatted and expanded the text with Richard's permission.
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Father and daughter relaxing on a rocky beach by the sea and having time together.

A Practical Approach to the Truth

The fundamental problem of the human condition and our brokenness lies in our propensity to misinterpret reality and remain solipsistic in our assessment of our lives. This disconnection from truth and reality is the fundamental essence of sin.

Here is a simple view of our relationship to reality that I put together years ago for my daughter, along with many others.

The following list can be used as an analytical guide to introspection, which makes it easier to discover how we misinterpret reality and get a little closer to the truth. Going down this list has provided a rock-bottom foundation on which I have built other conversations with her. It seems that it works for this conversation in this thread as well.

Our relationship to reality: (The truth exists, regardless of our ability to perceive it.)

1. Primary Reality — What is
2. Secondary Reality — What is perceived
3. Tertiary Reality — The problems created by the discrepancy between 1(a) and 1(b).
4. What is this that is happening to me? To you?
5. What does it all mean?
6. The soundness of our five senses, the soundness of the biological basis of our brain, and the amount and quality of things we have been taught are the basis of our ability to perceive. Deficiencies in any of these will limit our ability to perceive. And we all have deficiencies of one sort or another. The brain cannot work well unless the biology of the body is willing.

We don't respond to what is.

We can only respond to what is perceived.

We take in stimuli from the world around us through our five senses. We make sense of this incoming stimuli through our cognition, our ability to think.

As our ability to perceive improves, the number of things we perceive will increase.

As we age and gain experience, we come to the knowledge of God as an entity that is distinct from the ideologies of the world and the social expectations that are foisted upon us. In the process, our thinking changes from relying on logic, rules, and the opinions of others, to a continual dependence on God through faith, spiritual discernment, and conviction. This is when we begin to form a faith-based connection to God and other people.

How the Christian Manosphere Explores this List

In the movie, The Matrix, the "Red Pill" was something one took to be better able to perceive Primary reality. The guys in the Manosphere over the last several years have been using the term "Red Pill" as a verbal shortcut to describe their efforts to help men move their personal Point 2 above (what they perceive) closer to the universal Point 1 above (what actually "is"), so as to reduce the problems arising from men's personal Point 3 above (the problems caused by discrepancies between Points 1 and 2. On its face, that is a noble effort. It is perhaps the most groundbreaking philosophical discovery of our generation.

The disputes and acrimony in the Manosphere over efforts to move men's Point 2 closer to the universal Point 1, generally come about because they ignore (or don't realize it exists) the remaining points on the list — everything below Point 3. That is, (a.) the pushers of "Red Pill" awareness have set Point 1 to be entirely about girls who frequent bars and other pickup places, and (b) they don't much discuss the reality that we are not all able to achieve the same levels of perception.

Beyond the faults I mentioned in the last paragraph and Point 3 above, the Manosphere has had the noble goal of helping men come to understand the things that a certain cohort of women responds to. It may be that all women respond to the things that the Manosphere has defined, but I don't think that has been proved yet. We just know that the women in most Red Pill discussions who are considered to be "targets" for social and sexual liaisons, are those hot chicks in bars and other venues popular among PUAs. I'm thinking that only certain personality types are attracted to those places. Which leaves many other personality types unexplored and untested by the players in the Manosphere.

The Christian Manosphere has made a break from this approach by including aspects of the human plight beyond women, sex, pick-up techniques, and how to get laid, and as such, it considers a wider frame of reference. In essence, it attempts to move further down the list, past Point 3. Sigma Frame is one of the few content providers in the Manosphere that addresses the contextualized individual experience (Point 4), the deeper spiritual meaning (Point 5), and the meta world of perception and discernment (Point 6).

RedPillBoomer commented on this when he wrote,

> "Sites like this one, and Dalrock's before, cause me to link back to the Scriptures because I personally believe all the 'RP knowledge' about male-female relations, and other relationships we have in life, are in the scriptures, plus the wisdom and understanding to go along with the knowledge. Albeit, the scriptural RP is spread throughout the Bible (Genesis, Proverbs, the Epistles, etc.), so it takes some doing to link it all together. But as I increasingly link it all together, it's like, "Yep, it's all in there in one form or another. There truly is Nothing New Under the Sun" (as Solomon says). So, I see a site like this as an excellent bridge between the Secular Red Pill and the Scriptures."

Yes, one can learn these truths about "what women really respond to" by reading the Bible, but these truths are pretty spread out. Even if a young man reads the Bible on a regular basis, he could still miss these truths. But there is also this — which has never been taught in any church I have attended over the years — How are men supposed to know this, unless someone in their family points it out? If no one in the family has ever demonstrated these truths or pointed it out to them, how are they to know?

The Centrality of Headship in God's Created Order

Before Paul said anything in the New Testament about relations between husband and wife, God told this to the world about husband and wife: She was created to help him, and he would rule over her (not rule her; rule over her. There is a difference). Those are actually flip sides of the same coin. The one who "helps" carries out the instructions given by the one being "helped". Putting one's own agenda aside and focusing on the agenda of the one being helped is an act of submission. The one giving instructions, telling the help what he needs them to do, is an act of "ruling over".

Look at the definitions of the Old English terms husband and husbandry and you see they encompass this same sort of distinction / definition. He tends to his estate, rules over it, by doing those things necessary to keep it alive and thriving. In the case of husband and wife, reflecting what God set up by creating Eve to help Adam do the same, the husband rules over / cares for his estate, with the help of his wife. He makes the plans, figures out what he wants to do (often in consultation with her), gives his wife guidance and instructions to carry out, all of which helps him do what he wants to do. By definition, that behavior, established by God, creates a hierarchy that no definition of Kephale (i.e. Headship) can ever undo.

One doesn't need to read more than a couple of verses in Genesis to learn all of this. God made Eve to be a helper. In order to help, she needs to be given proper instructions. She wasn't created to be out front, creating the vision, giving instructions to husband for him to carry out.

In spite of all the arguments that go on in the Manosphere about "blaming the guys" and female agency, the truth is this — If she was created to help, and you let her know in no uncertain terms that you don't need her help, she cannot be what she was created to be. She can only be what she was created to be if husband gives her information about what she can do to be a help for him. Giving those instructions would be the "ruling over". Carrying out those instructions would be the "submitting". That is what God told the world in a few verses in Genesis. It doesn't get any more complicated than that (aside from humankind's natural inclination to rebel).

Related

- Σ Frame: On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019 February 2)
- Σ Frame: Three Kinds of Discernment (2020 September 25)
- Σ Frame: The Shepherd and the Crook (2020 October 19)
- Σ Frame: Birds of One Feather Flock Together (2020 October 26)

More on the Framework of Options

Jack · 22 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Reframing the choices from the Biblical viewpoint of the Prodigal Son.

Readership: Christian Men
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

I want to say a few things about the row between Eric and Oscar, since this has continued on for weeks now. Their back-and-forth argument is significant because it sums up the state of Christianity — not just modern Christianity, but the way it has always been.

According to my understanding of their argument, Eric wants to explore Option 1 in further detail, and Oscar is saying, "Don't go there because it's not a Christian approach." Personally, I see nothing wrong in examining the choices, and I believe that clouding the choices with confusion, or to deprive one of a choice is somewhat evil. But this argument cannot be easily settled because there are more complicated issues involved, something like the iceberg analogy.

Our exploration of the Christian Conundrum is intended to help us understand the current situation of the SMP/MMP. Overall, we're trying to build a coherent thesis that presents a collection of transferrable knowledge that might actually help somebody make sense of things. NovaSeeker did a nice job in laying out the options, and unfortunately, there aren't many, and none of them are very attractive.

I know there is an assumption in the minds of readers that the main question of this exploration remains: "How can we interpret, understand, navigate, resolve, or ameliorate the conundrum?" …because everyone wants a "solution" to the suffering – and not only men, but some women too.

If we frame the options in terms of suffering, then this might help certain people get a better handle on things.

- Option 1 (Adaptation/Compromise) has less suffering up front, but perhaps more later down the road of life.
- Option 2 (Strong Hand/Law of the Jungle) offers success to only 30% of men, at most. Within this 30%, there are 10-20% who are naturals, and for them, there is very little suffering. The other 10-20% of men who are not naturals have to work to get into the game, and for them, there is just as much suffering as Option 1. For the remaining 70% of men who are not naturals and no amount of self-improvement can get them there, this option is a smorgasbord of suffering. Furthermore, this layout is highly unlikely to change as life progresses.
- Option 3 (Single Tailored/Greener Pastures) has a great deal of suffering, but there is also a sense of adventure and challenge which may make the suffering worthwhile.

There is a fourth option, which has not been mentioned, and that is to form connections with people through faith, and see where that might take you. Personally, I think this is the best option, but it requires social dexterity, emotional vitality, charisma, and a certain level of spiritual maturity which is difficult and time consuming to obtain. The path of faith is unique to each individual, and too abstract to be able to wrap our minds around it and describe it in only a few words on a blog post.

Modern Prodigal Sons

The story of the Prodigal Son (a parable contained in Luke 15:11-32) comes to my mind here. (If you're not already familiar with this story, please click on the link to read it at BibleHub.)

The older son believed that everything good in life was made and maintained by his own hands. So he made a special effort to do everything right, and he believed that he did so. He thought that since he was righteous (in his own eyes), then he deserved to have special favor. He thought that because he did everything right, then he should obtain the results he desired. But apparently, he was disappointed with the results he was getting, because he was still deeply dissatisfied with his life.

In other words, the older son was playing by Option 2, but he obviously wasn't in the top 20-30% (described above).

This is similar to the "covert contract" described by Robert A. Glover in his book, No More Mr. Nice Guy. In Glover's description, these covert contracts create social expectations and a roadmap for life that rarely results in the Nice Guy getting what he really wants. In comparison, the older son in the parable made covert contracts in his expectations of being (what he thought was) a good son, and when this didn't turn out to be fulfilling, he became resentful towards his younger brother (an archetype of the fellow man) and his father (a figurative archetype of God).

It's also the same story with the legalistic Judaizers whom St. Paul warned us against in Galatians 2:11-21. The Judaizers misinterpreted the words of the Covenant of Moses and assumed that God confines His expression of grace only to those who conform to the Judaic law (viz. those who follow the rules). The flip side of this coin carries the idea that God is “required” to grant certain blessings they desire simply because they can prove through semantic gymnastics that they obeyed the Mosaic law. In essence, it is a “salvation by works” approach to God. Jesus and St. Paul both warned us that this is hypocrisy, and that this mindset of legalism, once established within a social circle, is extremely difficult to escape. (See Matthew 16:6; Mark 8:15; Luke 12:1; and Galatians 5.)

From a mystical viewpoint, the root of legalism and hypocrisy is “pride” or “self-sufficiency”, but there is also an element of legalistic rule-keeping and a “works” mentality. It’s kind of like building your own little tower of Babel in your psychological outlook. In the past, I think I was like this in terms of me thinking that maintaining spiritual disciplines like prayer and reading the Bible should contribute to my spiritual growth and peace with God. I always thought there should be a cause-effect relationship there, but in my general experience, there is not.

PRODIGAL SON: L-R: Tom Payne and Michael Sheen in the “Pilot” series premiere episode of PRODIGAL SON airing Monday, Sept. 23 (9:00-10:00 PM ET/PT) on FOX. © 2019 FOX MEDIA LLC. Cr: David Giesbrecht / FOX.

Continuing on with my review of the story of the Prodigal son, the younger son took Option 1 in the context of the current discussion. He knew he was never going to get what he wanted most in life (women and sex) by being a Nice Guy — an outwardly good but inwardly resentful son like his older brother. He didn’t care about being right. He didn’t care about acting right, or obtaining any of the blessings thereof. He hated his father and his brother, and by demanding his share of the eternal inheritance to be presented to him in this present life, he rejected them and wished them to be dead. So he took a very practical course of action that would bring him what he wanted most – *good times with some hot p*ssy!*

But after he got what he wanted, and the consequences of his actions brought him to live among the pigs, he decided to come home, and he was enthusiastically received by his father (the archetype of God).

This is exactly what we see happening with those people who abandon the “rules” early in life. They navigate through the mess and eventually find what it is they were looking for, and then they “return home”. They resume a common Christian life script. They settle down, come back to church, get married, and so on. We know this to be the case with a few regular commenters, and we have even seen this happen with many men who were formerly PUAs, with Roosh being the star of the show. We might say that they learned to love God and His ways by experiencing first-hand the heartache and futility of the alternatives.

There are several takeaways from the story of the Prodigal Son. One is that both brothers got what they wanted, deep in their hearts. The older brother continually chose to be the self-righteous prig who was always "right", yet remained emotionally distant, feeling unloved and unattached, and he got what he chose. Another big point is that neither son really loved their father and cherished their lives as His son. Instead, the older son loved his inheritance, legalism, and his own false self-righteousness, while the younger son loved hedonism and women. The older son insisted that everyone was wrong, including his father. The younger son faced the truth about himself, what he really wanted, and after going through that experience, he came to love and appreciate his father in the end.

Jesus said, "You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your mind." (Matthew 22:37), but only the younger son was able to do that, and he was only able to do so at the end of the story. But we must not fail to notice that there was a cost to that. Ultimately, the older brother had to pay for the younger brother's choices, which stoked his resentment to the maximum.

We still see this archetypal dynamic being played out among people today. Some might think this is a huge mess of a dysfunctional family. We might wonder how those two brothers ever managed to live together after the story ends. However, this dynamic glorifies God because it reveals our human nature as well as the depths of His grace and love — and that is the whole point!

The Return of the Prodigal Son, by Rembrandt Harmenzoon Van Rijn (1668).

Conclusions

Since we first introduced The Christian Conundrum at the beginning of this month, we've heard personal testimonies from various readers in the comments.

1. Some people have followed the rules and got lucky in love and marriage, albeit a very small number of them.
2. Others have followed the rules and lost out on a mate, or else had their marriages eventually blow up over some permutation of the issue of sex (or the absence thereof) in the marriage.
3. Some broke the rules and ended up in solid marriages.
4. Others broke the rules and then wound up divorced. I suppose we could say that this is the "expected" outcome.

Those stories that match (2) and (3) cause us the most confusion and frustration, because they are not the expected outcome. The resulting cognitive dissonance poses a challenge to our interpretation of the archetypal mythos because…

- It destroys our mental concept of cause-and-effect.
- It blows apart our false understanding about the nature of God.
- It does not fit our human concept of what divine justice should be like.
- It becomes impossible to form a mental model of an ideal "Christian" trajectory.
- It makes us realize that we are not in control of our lives as much as we would like to believe.
- We are reminded of the fragility of life, how helpless we are, and how much we must depend on God's love and grace.

I tend to believe that those who broke the rules and yet were still "successful" were able to achieve these ends because their honesty, faith, and/or their love for their spouse (and God) was stronger than their shame, guilt, and/or fear of not adhering to the rules. Also of note, they were willing to do the Exploration vs. Exploitation Tradeoff and learn something and grow through the process. How many of us fail to take any action at all, because we know things won't turn out as we want or expect (or from a darker perspective, because we know it will) — that there will occur some unexpected seismic shift by the hand of God that will change the entire context and put us at the mercies of God? Could this be a fear of trusting God? Or could it be a fear of suffering, turmoil, and paying the cost of maturation? Or maybe this is the same difference.

In summary of this post, as long as our mind is set on examining the rules, we're still living under the law. We could be conscientiously examining the rules to see how well we measure up, or else we could be scrutinizing the rules looking for loopholes and justifications, and how much we can get away with. But either way, we're still rule-minded and we're still living under the law.

Instead of worrying about the rules, we should be concentrating on how to be more humble, opening our hearts, and exploring God's will and purpose for our lives.

> [16] I say then: Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfill the lust of the flesh. [17] For the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to one another, so that you do not do the things that you wish. [18] But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law.
>
> Galatians 5:16-18 (NKJV)

Related

- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (2018 June 26)
- Σ Frame: Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14)
- Σ Frame: The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021 February 26)

The Spiritual Confusion of Clinging to the “Rules”

Jack · 24 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Rulz for thee, but not for mee! Wheee!!!

Readership: Christians
Length: 2,200 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

I want readers to be aware of the spiritual confusion that is prevalent in the world today, and even appears among those who frequent this blog, including myself at times. Spiritual Confusion might not seem to fit into this month’s theme of The Christian Conundrum, but I believe it is directly responsible for it.

I posit that this confusion is a result of the society-wide prevalence of many negative factors which have been reviewed over the past month, including widespread sexual promiscuity, the effects of parental divorce, the demise of the Christian Life Script, and the fading of Archetypal myths.

All these factors have created a psychological disintegration which renders interaction with humanity difficult and experiencing God as evasive. Worse, these effects are hardly accessible to our conscious awareness. Many of us people can hardly even understand what “peace with God” means, because we never experienced the presence of God through our family of origin (as Scott described in the example of his friend’s parents).

This disintegration and defilement was described in two posts, On The Turning Away (2021 March 5), and The Demise of the Christian Life Script (2021 March 10).

Scott described this Turning Away when he said,

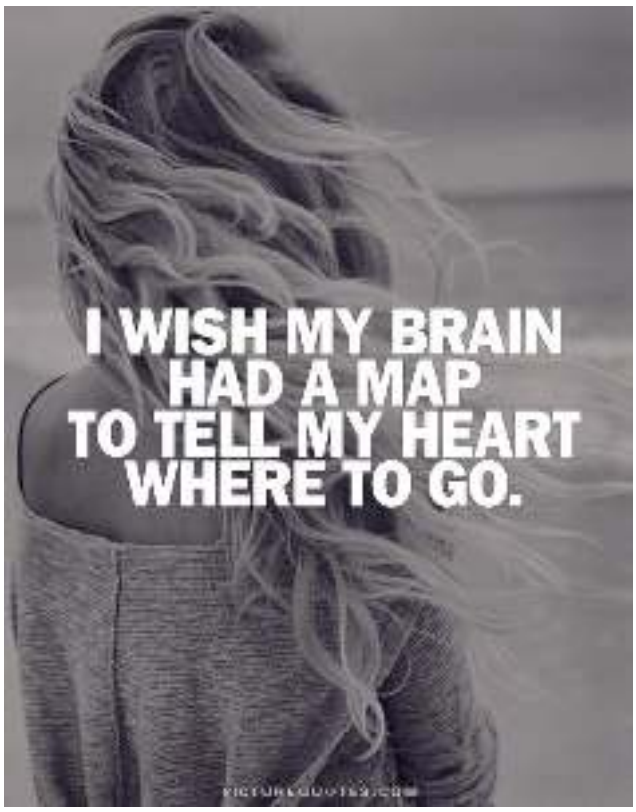
> “Then, it’s as if in one generation, the wheels fell off the bus.”

NovaSeeker expounded on the resulting confusion.

> “Because they did fall off the bus.
>
> Those of us around this age (50ish, either way) lived through the transition from the old regime to the new one. That is — many of us grew up with relationship models that were of the “old regime” variety, but the world we were ourselves growing up and having relationships in eschewed these older models, and a new, emergent model was being birthed.”

> "That emergent process has still not settled on a new model, and it's possible that it never will, but the main point for us is that we grew up with one set of expectations based on the model we saw growing up, but that model simply did not apply to the new relationships of our own era. That disconnect led to lots and lots of failed marriages. Lots of them.
>
> At the time people were saying it's because men weren't "catching up" and were "stuck in the old ways of looking at things" as compared with their progressive, heroic, pioneer wives who were trying to valiantly blaze a new trail in the emergent model of NewMarriage. But in reality, expectations for both sexes didn't match the new realities, and this just created tensions that many people in our era were not equipped to resolve, at least not at those ages (in the 20s when many of us still married back then).
>
> The exceptions to this were the people who had the personality profile type to thrive in a period of dramatic change — people who are above average in: adaptiveness, confidence, independence, resilience, positivity (always looking ahead), adventurousness, open-ness to novelty, and open-ness to change. People who were not high in these areas struggled, and people who were low in them, or had the polar opposite traits to them, were basically kicked off the horse, tout court.
>
> I'm not saying we had it harder than the current young set — not at all. They are living in a Mad Max scenario for relationships. But our generation faced a different, yet equally problematic scenario because the rules were changing in real time and drastically, and many of us could not adapt quickly enough to manage to save our marriages."

Yes, the rules changed! Now, there are practically no rules at all, and we don't know what to do!



We have a Rules-Based Mindset

In The Christian Conundrum (2021 March 1), NovaSeeker and I put forth the idea that "following the rules" cannot guarantee a successful marriage. Another post, More on the Framework of Options (2021 March 22), emphasized how a focus on rules is a red herring from a Christian standpoint.

Even so, having a rules based mindset seems to be the default setting. We want to establish rules for everyone to play by. We want a formula that "works". We think the confusion is because the rules have changed, when in fact, it's not about rules at all. It's about maintaining inner peace with God and pursuing our life purpose — that which brings glory to God.

To see what I mean, take a look at these comments with this in mind.

- More from NovaSeeker.
- NovaSeeker on women's approach to the rules.
- Deti's Story.
- Deti's take on the futility of rules, especially with women.
- Ed Hurst's Story.
- Elspeth's Story.
- Feeriker's Story
- Jason's viewpoint.
- Oscar's take on the rules.
- RedPillBoomer's Story.
- SFC Ton's One Rule to rule them all.

Actually, Jason makes a lot of sense with respect to the approach of "following the rules". And we've seen that success in marriage has little to do with following the rules.

Here, I don't mean to come down on anyone. I just want to point out how rules totally envelop our world view. In fact, the centrality of Law and Order is a foundational concept of Anglo culture, and as such, we are all guilty of it, including myself. Thinking that "the legality of the thing is what makes it right" is the default foundation of our mental processing.

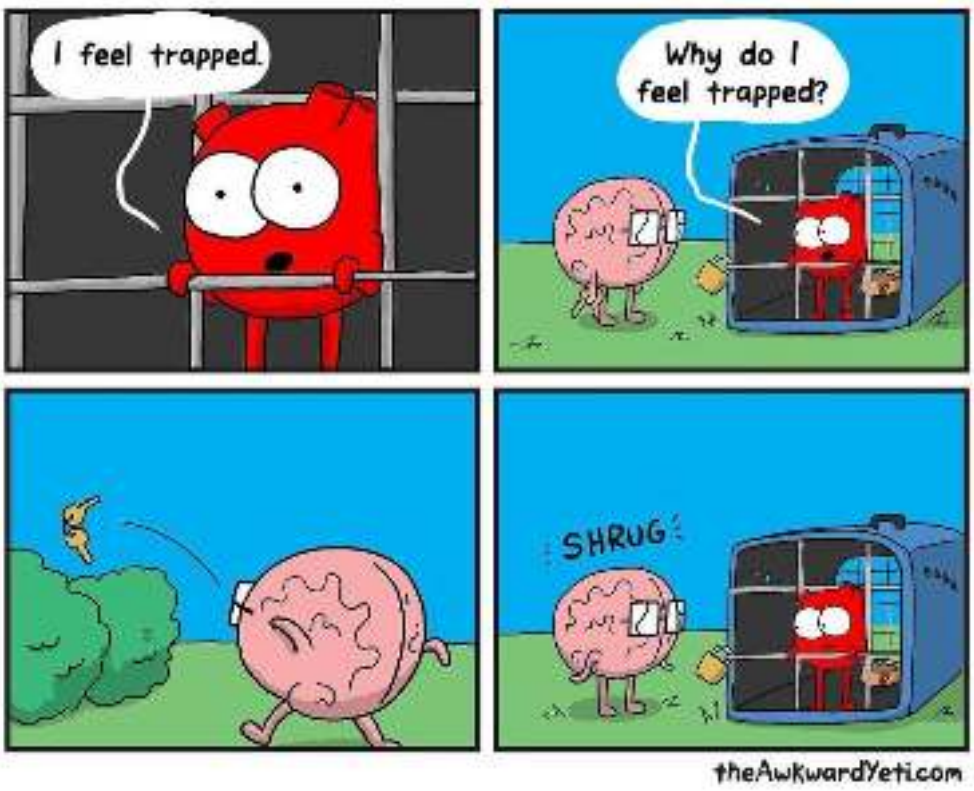
As long as we're searching for a rule-based formula, we'll miss the grace of God.

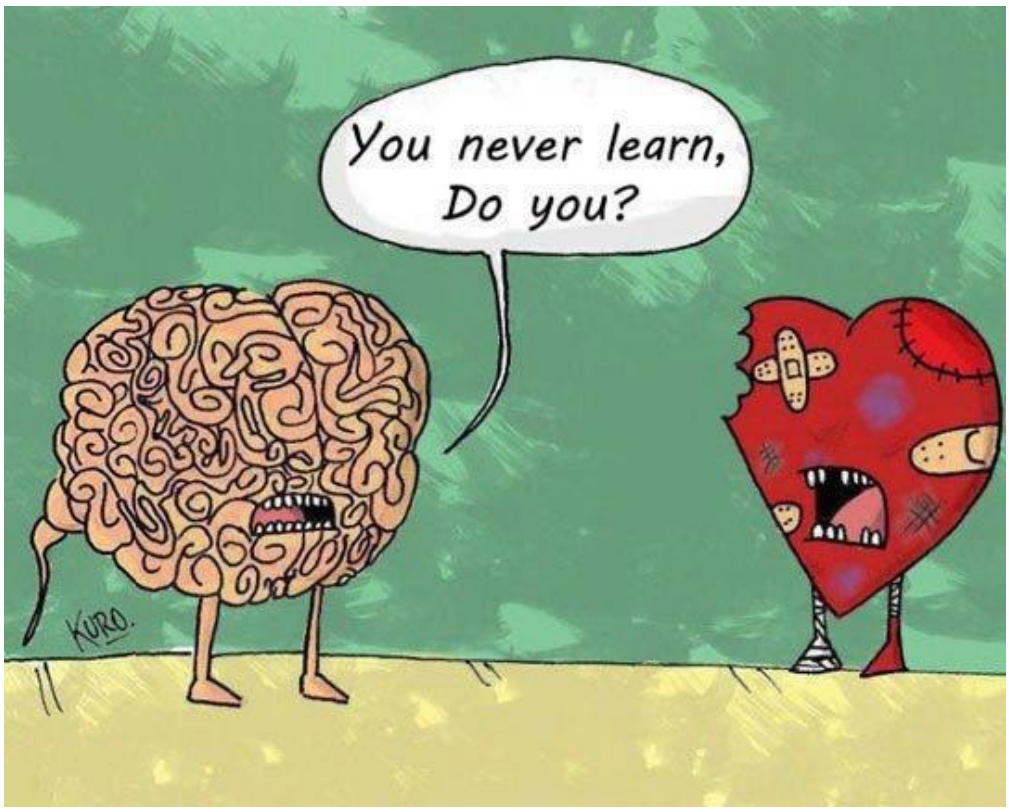


A person who doesn't have a Rule-Based approach is not understood!

Ed Hurst left this puzzling comment.

> "The honest truth is that I ignored all of this and simply did what my convictions required, regardless of the outcome. Obedience to conviction is its own reward (AKA, Shalom, peace with God). I carefully evaluate whether anyone is inside or outside the same covenant of faith, and treat them accordingly. Had I not found a covenant woman, there would have been no interest in marriage. A good or bad marriage is not a reward; it is a condition in which we pursue the Lord. He gives the marriage, or not, as He sees fit. I'm tired of reading all the chatter that assumes there is a high degree of instrumentality, and never makes room for divine miracles. Carry on without me."

His comment was puzzling because it is hard for our rule-based minds to identify the specific rules that Ed lives by. We want to conclude that he is saying something like, "Marriage is something that God sends your way if he wants to, as you pursue him, and that if God hadn't sent his wife his way, he would not have otherwise had any interest in marriage, per se." But we cannot identify with this approach, because of daughters, because of testosterone, because of desire, because of libido, because of frustration, no specified course of action, no cause-effect, no rules… nothing for our rational minds to latch onto, chew on, and dissect. There's only a very abstract Archetypal mythos that we are unfamiliar with and which is confusing to the mind.



We want to dismiss his comment because we don't see how it relates to the Christian Conundrum or the Christian Marriage Dilemma. We can't see how his stance helps guys who want to get married in order to deal with sexual temptation, have kids, or whatever else. As a gesture of philosophical generosity, we could agree that there can always be miracles, but from what we would consider to be a practical standpoint, it seems foolhardy to rely on a miracle, and not take a proactive approach. At worst, it seems like a case of putting our Lord to the test (although I suppose if one is truly neutral about being with a woman or not, one wouldn't be doing that). In short, there is no transferrable knowledge, and the nearly impossible standard remains. All that is from our own perspective, yet we still fail to understand what Ed is driving at.

I have learned a lot from Ed since I started reading his blogs three years ago, and I experienced spiritual growth as a result of it. I understand that Ed is disappointed because there is something important missing from all the discussion. The thing that is missing is how one's faith can lead one into new opportunities and life experiences. We haven't really touched on this, and none of the commenters have either. What he means by "instrumentality" is that we've been hammering away at descriptions, models, and game theory, and although these have been insightful, there's not much talk about Christian faith. This is a valid criticism. I have the mind that if we keep hammering away, then eventually people will realize the futility and resentment that is bound up in the rules-based approach, and begin to realize faith. I hope I'm not expecting too much.

At this point, it seems like legalism in the form of a rule-centric cognition is the biggest obstacle. People are operating out of their heads, and not their hearts. People are rather quick to judge, and that puts a damper on the forthcoming introspection and honesty.

It's time for us to put the brain back in the skull and start paying more attention to the mysteries of the heart which are unfathomable to the limited faculties of the cognition.

The Rules of the World (and of Churchianity)

> [9] "I pray for them. I do not pray for the world but for those whom You have given Me, for they are Yours.
> [10] And all Mine are Yours, and Yours are Mine, and I am glorified in them. [11] Now I am no longer in the world, but these are in the world, and I come to You. Holy Father, keep through Your name those whom You have given Me, that they may be one as We are. [12] While I was with them in the world, I kept them in Your name. Those whom You gave Me I have kept; and none of them is lost except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. [13] But now I come to You, and these things I speak in the world, that they may have My joy fulfilled in themselves. [14] I have given them Your word; and the world has hated them because they are not of the world, just as I am not of the world. [15] I do not pray that You should take them out of the world, but that You should keep them from the evil one. [16] They are not of the world, just as I am not of the world. [17] Sanctify them by Your truth. Your word is truth. [18] As You sent Me into the world, I also have sent them into the world. [19] And for their sakes I sanctify Myself, that they also may be sanctified by the truth.
>
> John 17:9-19 (NKJV)

The Greek "cosmos" translated as "world" in John 17 means society, culture, and especially the ideologies thereof. This also includes "an arrangement of rules in society". In the world system (cosmos), the rules are created to enforce unity, conformance to the narrative, and the Herd mentality. This is the "Wide Road leading to destruction" (Matthew 7:13-14). There is an implied message that if one conforms to the world (cosmos), then one will find social acceptance and contentment. But this is the lie of Satan. Jesus calls us to come out of the world, i.e. not to follow the same rules of the world just to "fit in".

I think this also includes many of the typical social norms in the microcosm of churchianity. Even within the church, there is an expectation that Christians should be following the rules. (As an exercise, try reading verses 14 and 16 in the passage above and substitute the word "rules" for the word "world".) Of course in this context, the rules are moralized and spiritualized, but the deadening effect on the soul is the same.

Conclusions

Let's look at the purpose of the rules as compared to faith.

Wallowing in the SMP is perceived as hedonism and will eventually bring a harvest of grief and despair. The overriding practical purpose of abstaining from sexual sin, divorce, etc., is so that one doesn't become broken hearted and lose faith, and then become cynical, used up, and jaded, etc.

Strutting in the jackboots of the law is perceived as hypocrisy and will eventually produce a deadening of the soul. The overriding practical purpose of abstaining from legalistic rule-ology is so that one doesn't become hard hearted and lose faith, and then become cynical, up tight, and resentful, etc.

Both of these two approaches bring loneliness and alienation from God and mankind. We have a clearly recognized rule for the former, but yet, whenever the rule for the latter is expressed, it is only offered as a defensive excuse for indulging in the former.

Somewhere in between, there is another path to be taken, often referred to as "The Narrow Way". The trick is to stay on this course, and not get stuck in either of the two ditches on either side of the road.

UPDATE — Ed Hurst responded in* Radix Fidem: The Balance Point (2021 March 24).

Related

- The Antemodernist: Making Excuses for God (2020 December 20)
- Radix Fidem: Biblical Law's Assumptions (2021 March 4)

Charting the Red Pill World

Lexet Blog · 26 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

An infographic showing the factions of socio-sexual awareness according to their religious and political stances.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This study was conducted by the author of Lexet Iustitia, and was first published on 2018 October 19. A revised version, cowritten by Jack, appears here.
This is the 500th post to be published on Σ Frame since moving to WordPress.

Introduction

In a comment under one of the last few posts, I asked a commenter to look at the "Red Pill" in a very simple way. It is a way to look at reality for what it is, rather than live under an illusion. One of the greatest illusions we have in our modern society is the nature of intersexual relationships. To be Red Pill is to see intersexual relationships the way they are by nature (how they actually work). Red Pill is not a solution, and your philosophical worldview will determine how you handle Red Pill knowledge. Hence the differences between secularists, nihilists, and Christians on the internet.

What is Red Pill?

The following table is my attempt to map out the "Red Pill" sphere, and all of its subset communities commonly referenced. Below I will explain some of their definitions, and describe some distinctions and my reasoning behind the categorizations. I will also respond to other articles on the Sigma Frame blog.

I am not a graphic designer by any means, so I put minimal effort into this chart (with the help of MS Excel). I do not know why only a few borders disappeared while trying to make this an image. All blame lies with MS Excel and Paint for that error.

Feel free to add suggestions or make a better graphic (credit would be appreciated).

If I had to order these sub groups from largest to smallest (according to population), it would be:

1. Blue Pill (includes Churchians, Feminists, and most people in society)
2. Secular Red Pill (PUAs)
3. Political Red Pill
4. MGTOW (possibly tied for 3rd)

5. Christian RP (Catholics > Protestants in number, due to appeals to tradition)
6. Other Religious RP
7. Incels
8. Black Pill

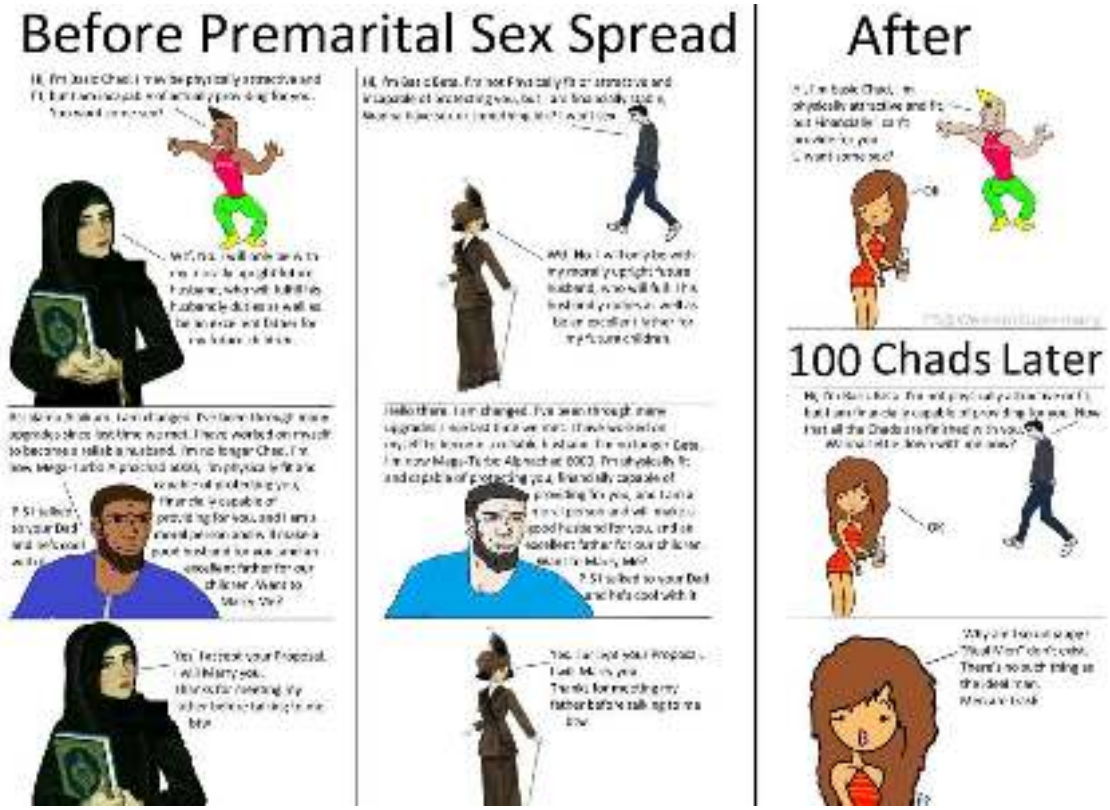
Blue Pill is by its very nature the largest subset of people.

While one can argue that the political RP should be a larger group above the Manosphere, political issues are common in the Manosphere, and more often than not, politics brings them to the RP. Also, female participation in the RP community is rare.

I could have included the “Secular Red Pill”, in the graph, but it’s really not necessary as most of the groups are secular, and the Religious Red Pill sphere is incredibly small.

The Religious RP includes Catholics, Orthodox, Protestants, and a smattering of other religions. Of note, there have been some Muslim authors (e.g. Kartik Gada and Imran Khan) who have contributed deep, earth-shattering insights, which apparently are taken to be common knowledge within the Muslim community.

It seems like the biggest names in the Manosphere are men who (1) are not Western by birth, or (2) are second generation descendants of immigrants to the West, or (3) have traveled abroad for years. This is no coincidence, seeing how the West is totally cucked.



Why are PUA’s also in the Blue Pill category?

I classify PUA’s as a completely separate group that can exist in all Pill groups. The goal of most PUA’s is to maximize sexual partners, using any technique possible (mostly reliance on dark triad characteristics). They are actors, and they are people who derive their value as men from their conquests (their identity is given to them, not made by themselves). Also, a person can fit the PUA model, live an RP lifestyle, and not be aware they operate in the RP worldview for that matter.

Why are PUA's the Face of the RP World?

If you want to discredit a movement, point to its members who are either the most disgusting, clownish, or both, and associate the group with those persons or traits. This is why Trump supporters are being branded as Q-anon fans, domestic terrorists, or throwback Germans, and why the Right refers to every black protester as a communist. Nuance = reason and we can't have that here.

The PUA community is the most vocal, and really was the online community that started discussing issues that led to "Red Pill" realizations. They are also the easiest community to cheap shot, as many of the most notable "artists" are sleazy clowns. PUA is also the most active community, since they sell "how to pick up women" to young men who want to get girls.

It appears that there is a massive return to PUA discussions across the Manosphere and even in the body building world. I was concerned to see this trend, and almost wrote about this a few months ago, but held back after watching many hours of these guys talking. The personalities on YouTube who have returned to "tactics" interact and/or coach young men on a daily basis. They are far more in tune with Zoomers than the rest of us. What they are saying is that their subscribers/fans/clients not only don't know how to talk to girls, but often times, they can't even hold a conversation with other people! Its a result of them being raised in a social media world. Most of the guys who read this blog grew up passing notes in class, hitting on women in high school, and doing cold approaches as a matter of course. We don't realize that "tactics" is actually something many young actually need.

Another thing to realize about this up and coming generation is that they tend to smoke pot, not have work ethic, and game all day. They essentially have to be re-raised.

What is MGTOW?

MGTOW is Men Going Their Own Way. Personally, I define MGTOW as those men who willingly disengage in any long term relationships with females, but do not necessarily remain celibate. I would say the largest number of men who remain voluntarily celibate are in the Religious RP communities. The rest reside in the MGTOW community, and usually have a history of promiscuity.

Many in the MGTOW movement advocate for celibacy and just ignoring women entirely. If you see people advocating “NoFap” on the internet, they are pretty much MGTOW trolls. When it comes to being controversial, they receive far more hate from Leftists and women than the PUA community.

My chart is a bit unfair to this community, but that is because MGTOW is its own animal compared to the rest of the Manosphere. While the “factions” of the Red Pill sphere sometimes attack others, MGTOW has been a community divided between those who want to fight feminism and advocate for men’s rights, and those who don’t care about that. They are also anti-PUA. That battle was fought from around 2015-2017, and the men’s rights activists (MRA’s) have disappeared since then. Also, a large portion of the community is too young to be as jaded as MGTOWs are. The MGTOW community needs an age and height requirement for entry.

It’s a little more than just the Trump Look. The main difference between Incel (left) and MGTOW (right) is Attitude!

What are Incels and what is Black Pill?

Incels are “involuntary celibate,” a term used to describe men with disabilities/conditions that make them unattractive or unable to be in a relationship. Many commenters misuse this word as an epithet to describe MGTOW types.

Black Pill is the fringe, nihilistic end of the spectrum. MGTOW and INCEL groups have regular interaction with black pilled men. From what I have seen, the black pilled men tend to be older (30’s and older), divorced, jaded and cynical, with the goal of maximizing pleasure and their financial position, while contributing nothing else to society, or sometimes opting out of society altogether. In the political realm, these people are the self-identified stateless beings.

Why is the Catholic RP the largest subset of the Religious RP?

My answer to this is the same reason so many “conservatives” and tradcons have joined the Catholic church in the last decade. These people see a problem with the current system, yearn for tradition, and associate with the institution that screams timeless tradition. One thing you will notice with a lot of politicos and RP guys who are now Catholic is that their reasoning for conversion rarely discusses any faith in Christ. Instead, they will go on ad nauseam about western values, society, tradition… and a dead grandparent who had a rosary.

Something I find very interesting about the Catholic RP community is that they heavily favor Augustine, while Augustinian Calvinists are not only an extreme minority in the Christian RP world, but tend to be very Blue Pilled (think Warhorn, IGTBAM, Doug Wilson, et al.).

Female Red Pill?

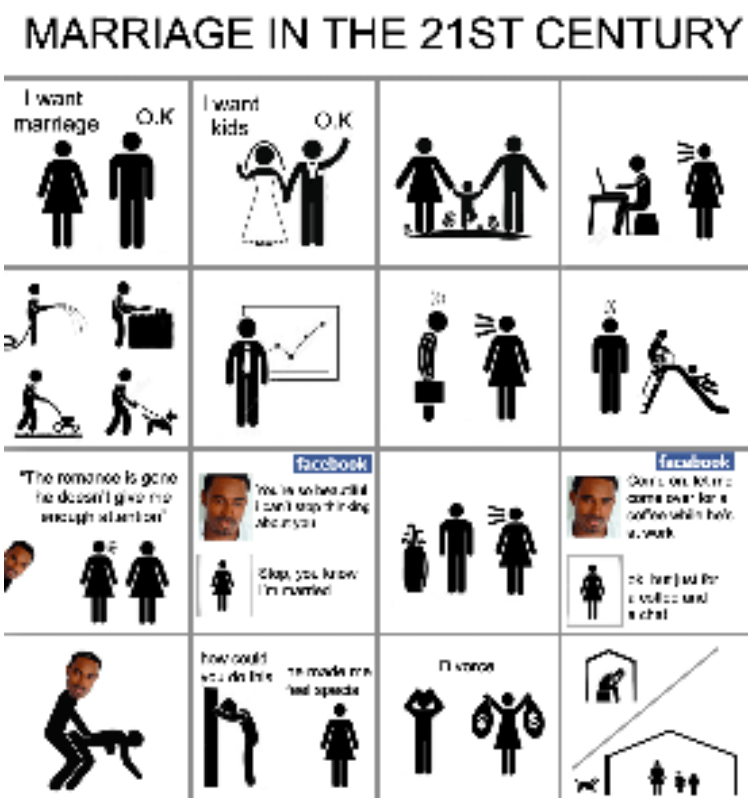
There has always been a lot of controversy in the 'sphere surrounding the idea that women can truly be Red Pill. This controversy continues, but we are seeing a marginal growth in the number of women who willingly embrace Red Pill tenets and/or pursuing a Headship relational structure.

Scott mentions that the RP commentators don't give women advice. Many actually do, and encourage a traditional lifestyle. The advice would be: have 0 to few partners as possible, marry young, have babies. Women know that message, but they outright reject it, because of two overriding reasons (or justifications).

1. For many outsiders who don't know how things work, or who don't care about marital sanctification, this message appears to be a contradiction which casts women as "underprivileged": "Guys be promiscuous, girls don't be."
2. Women in our society are encouraged to be selfish and self destructive. Even in the most conservative churches in rural United States, it is a controversy to teach that women should marry young and raise children. Instead, it is taught that women should get a career, use contraception, and Jesus will forgive your abounding sin because of his more abundant grace and love, and if you want a wedding ceremony, wait until after college so you can afford a marriage like what's on your Pinterest roll.

The point is that there isn't very much that would motivate a woman to be Red Pill.

Anecdotal Observation: For guys who are young (under 35) compared to the other authors at Sigma Frame (we're all Gen Xers), the reality I see is a world where women conduct about 90% of the breakups. I am struggling to think of any example where one of my younger buddies broke off a relationship, ESPECIALLY when the girl wasn't cheating. They are always the one being dumped, and its nearly always a monkey-branch situation. Women don't suffer consequences, there is no stigma.



What about Married Red Pill?

Jack asked if these divisions correspond to the preferred relationship structures he describes in his post, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018 October 3). They do. But the number of people subscribing to the Headship Structure is so small, that I haven't bothered to list it as a category.

The reasons are clear. Outside of the religious RP, the answer to "should I marry?" is a firm "no." As an attorney myself, I would say the dumbest thing an irreligious man can do, from a legal and fiduciary perspective, is to sign a marriage license. Christians are limited in their choices by scripture. When it comes to sexuality, we have only 3 options: (1) live a celibate life; (2) play with fire and risk spending eternity on fire; or (3) marry.

The most difficult part about being a Christian who sees the world for what it is right now, is that option #3 is incredibly dangerous in our current society. There is a massive amount of risk to marriage, especially since our family laws are not only hostile to men, but are completely antithetical to what scripture teaches about divorce and marriage. Pagan Rome had better marriage and divorce laws than the United States/Commonwealth nations/western Europe do now.

Responsibility without authority is slavery. That is how our present system treats men. Feminists want to pretend that this is better than what was law before, which they will say gave men authority without responsibility (tyranny). Of course, anyone who knows the law and the history of it will know that the feminists are liars. (Please cite me on this groundbreaking revelation.)

How I (Lexet) view the RP

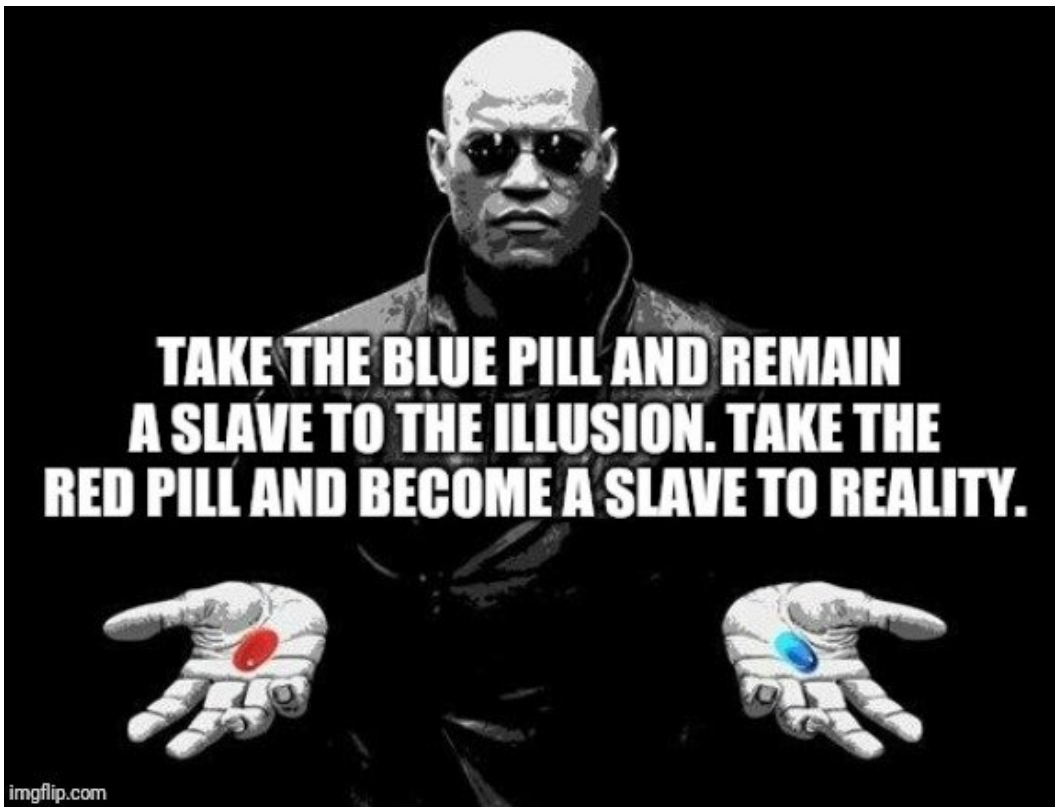
This is what I wrote several years ago when my RP articles were on my own site.

> What do I mean by “red pill”? I think it means that I choose to see the world for what it is, being aware of people, their motives, and not being naive. For me, as a Christian, being Red Pill means realizing we have a sin nature, and live in a fallen world. We have spiritual desires that cant be met on this side of life. We idealize and hunger for something we cannot possess. But we understand that the ideal is unattainable, and it can be a fatal error to live as if the ideal could be achieved.

Of course, many in the Red Pill community solely apply the term to their perspective on sexual relationships and gender differences. I find this interesting, because the RP community believes what the Bible affirms as our sin nature when it comes to sexuality.

As a Christian, however, there is always tension with the rest of the red pill community, as we are called to be obedient to Christ, obey God’s laws, and live a different lifestyle than the rest of the world. In effect, how a Christian responds to Red Pill awareness is different from the response of a red pilled nonbeliever.

I am Red Pill because that viewpoint accurately describes human relationships in a fallen world. It is the only world view that prepares you to handle the world, as you are able to see the world for what it is. I believe it also confirms scriptural truths. The red pill confirmed many lessons I had made in my past, and made sense of other happenings in my life. Everything I learned from the RP community allowed me to connect many dots in my previous relationships, and made me realize I had made similar mistakes in the past, and that many different types of women were, in fact, the same. (AWALT!).



Should We Use the Red Pill Label?

There is room in the Red Pill world for many different worldviews and applications of RP knowledge, even if the 'advice' contradicts that from another community. Scott, in his recent criticism of the Red Pill label, is absolutely right when he says,

> "The 'Red Pill' is a great way to discern some really important truths about how men and women work. But what's not as clear is what to do with that information."

Yes, the Red Pill is primarily a body of knowledge, but it is knowledge that can shift our locus of perception. How that shift affects us depends uniquely on each man. As such, there aren't any "Red Pill" solutions, and the idea of a "Red Pill" world is an impossibility. Even if there was some form of patriarchy, human nature would still exist. In fact, a patriarchal system would have to implement restraints on human nature to an extent. In such a system, while the "RP" knowledge wont change, application of that knowledge will.

Furthermore, going back in time would make it nearly impossible to be promiscuous. Our current culture is driven by birth control and disease prevention that no other society had access to. To be a "chad" at any other point in time was to risk impregnating many people, or risk contracting something that would lead to sterility (many notable men in history did not have children because diseases made them sterile). Contrast the ideal patriarchal/traditional society with our current society, which has few limitations when it comes to sexual dynamics (other than filling out consent forms and having said consent witnessed and recorded, etc., even though said consent can be revoked retroactively).

Scott criticizes the advice most RP commentators give. I agree with his criticisms as a matter of moral judgment, but I disagree with the idea that "Red Pill" advice exists. There is advice which relies on Red Pill knowledge, and that advice may vary depending on your worldview and morality. The commentators are telling people how to navigate the current system. They are not in a position to change the system in any way. The current system entertains and supports the whims of women.

Scott says he doesn't want to live in a world created by people following RP commentator's advice, but I would say we are already living in that world. In fact, we have been for some time. We just discuss it more because of the internet. Until some dramatic societal change, we will continue to live in such a world.

Lets say starting tomorrow, every RP commentator starts giving Christian advice, and their audiences follow it. If every guy playing the field suddenly settled down and married, within a few years we would have a massive influx in divorces. Why? The incentives of our current legal structure are not amenable to this advice.

Alternative Labels?

Per Scott's final point on dropping the Red Pill label, I don't see why its entirely necessary. Most commentators are not claiming that their way is the only way, or that there is a "Red Pill" way. Dropping the label altogether also presents many problems when it comes to branding and building a community. We use definitions and labels as a way to set ourselves apart from others (cough cough, see chart above). I think it is ok to distinguish ourselves from the rest of the Red Pill community while allying ourselves to it. Think of the "Christian Red Pill/CRP" label, for instance.

As for Christian men who are single, I think the best community for them would be Christian MGTOW. The Christian lifestyle requires celibacy before marriage anyways. That label is not fitting for married men. Perhaps "Christian Realist" may be a better term if you want to drop "red pill" from the label entirely.

Final Statements

In summary, we are not totally in a nihilistic wasteland that operates under the Law of the Jungle, but on the other hand, we don't have any functional social structure that consistently produces solid marriages either. There is a fractionization, an atomization that is occurring in our day and age. At the present moment, we're hanging in limbo, but the overall trend seems to be headed slowly towards a nihilistic wasteland.

If you have any further questions, ask them below.

Related

- Captain Capitalism: The Red Pill Penetration Rate (2019 January 14)
- Σ Frame (Scott): What would the world be like if everyone was Red Pilled? (2021 March 13)

Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer

Novaseeker · 29 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

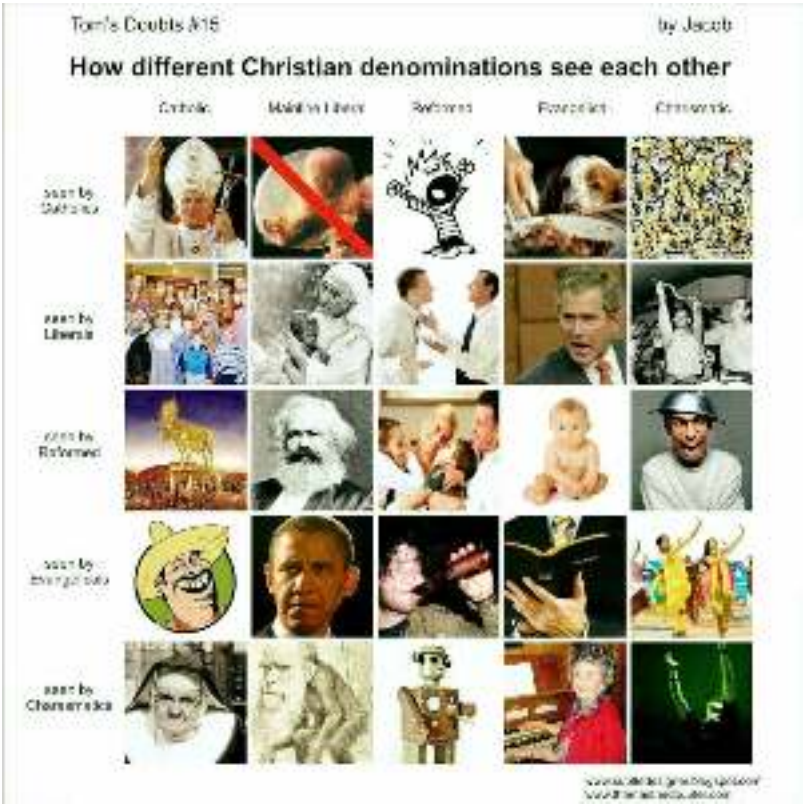
God says, "Get out of the way!"

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: This post expands a comment I wrote earlier, and adds some input from Jack.
Reader's Note: The religious/spiritual aspects of what follows in this post are written from my own perspective as an Eastern Orthodox Christian and a member of the Russian Orthodox Church Outside of Russia (ROCOR).
Length: 5,000 words
Reading Time: 17 minutes

Introduction

In More on the Framework of Options (2021 March 22), Jack reframed the options within the Christian Conundrum from the Biblical viewpoint of the Prodigal Son (a parable contained in Luke 15:11-32).

As I was reading through Jack's well-written post, I was reminded of the main reason why I don't see how these kinds of discussions and disagreements can possibly lead anywhere productive, given that people are all over the place in terms of how they view broader spiritual issues, the spiritual life in general, their overall approach to religion and spirituality, and the like.



The Basic Problem

Essentially, the basic problem is that as we proceed from the general to the specific in these kinds of discussions — that is from the 30,000-foot level to the ground-zero — aka, "my-life-and-my-kid's-lives", tyvm — we encounter what I conceive as "the wall of disagreement" — that is, a barrier beyond which one cannot go without compromising one's core beliefs and convictions.

Most of us here are pretty firm adherents to our particular type of Christianity. Many of us likely see the perspectives — when it comes to convictions of the faith — of others here as something that ranges from problematic to perhaps heretical or even outside the word "Christian" — on all sides. We suspend that, to a degree, for the purposes of having a useful and cordial discussion on a higher, 30,000-foot level, but those discussions can only go so far before you reach the "frontier zone" where, if you continue to proceed further, those core elements are subject to being compromised, and one has to choose between (a) whether to keep going or (b) whether to "pull up" and say "here, and no further".

Most of us realize that in the context of an internet blog and its related discussion, and even a set of internet resources that can be described collectively as "Christian Red Pill", or what have you, it is most sensible for us all to choose choice (b). However, this handicaps the ability of the "Christian Red Pill" to do much other than entertain a very basic discussion on the 30,000-foot level.

This is often a source of genuine frustration for some participants who, from time to time, become impatient with these high-level, theoretical discussions. We see this when commenters express a strong interest in developing more concrete approaches … only to find that there is no consensus at all about the latter because of the "wall of disagreement". This philosophical barrier can leave some of them embittered and jaded about the entire discussion.

It's a simple reality that nothing discussed in this medium is worth even contemplating any sort of compromise of our respective core principles to achieve or clarify. There simply is no justification for that. So it is the sensible and best approach to stop, go no further, and acknowledge that beyond a certain point, it's separate ways. In fact, this is the basic reason why we have so many 'doxy's and denominations. There's a practical reason why Christ prayed for unity in John 17:20-23.

As I was trying to point out in my last post, Constructing a Framework of Options (2021 March 15), we can compare notes about the same empirical phenomena we are encountering, and we can also compare anecdotal experiences and observations. But once we get to the level of prescriptive action, we hit this wall of disagreement because this area is deeply and inherently involved in several aspects of personal belief. These aspects include…

- One's religion, denomination, or doctrine.
- How one defines, views, and approaches one's personal faith.

- Our mental concepts of spiritual states and processes (e.g. justification, redemption, sanctification, etc.). For example, if we were to ask the question, "What is the difference between iniquity, offense, sin, transgression, and trespassing?", there would be no clear consensus. Most readers might not think there is any difference at all.
- One's spiritual practices and disciplines.
- How one fits all this into one's life approach in general.
- Many other related issues.

All of these aspects are most definitely not shared by the readers of this blog and the posters in these comboxes. So when certain topics and issues come up, we get into areas that really are much less fruitful for discussion, and are much more ripe for wild disagreement precisely because they touch on these kinds of issues on which we so deeply differ, and which are, in turn, so deeply formative in each of us.

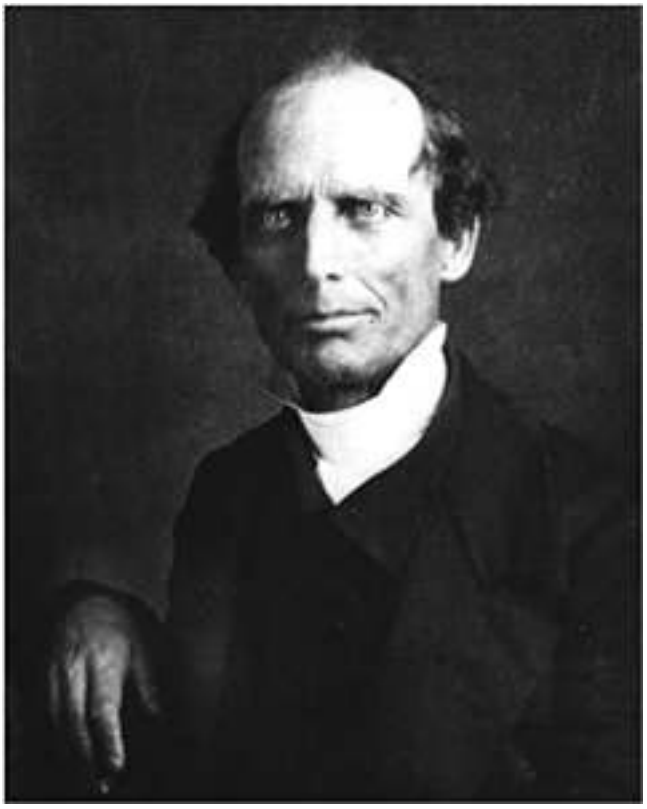
It really is a wall of separation between us, and I do not think it is surmountable — at least not in the context of these discussions (in the parousia, of course, all differences will be surmounted one way or the other as all things are reconciled in Christ). In understanding the wall of division, as we move right up adjacent to it, I think we can discern some of the main facets of our disagreements, which can be helpful in order to understand each other better, and to understand why overcoming disagreements about these kinds of things, on the "ground zero" level, is virtually impossible to do.

A Brief Comparison of Religious Standpoints

In this section, I'll briefly review how legalism/jugmentalism is contained in the practiced stances of Protestantism, Catholicism, and Orthodoxy.

Protestantism

Many of the prevailing Protestant (including many of the "I am not a Protestant, I am just a Christian") types of theologies feature a kind of "tent-revival Christianity" which arose from the Second Great Awakening in the United States and the approach of people like Charles Grandison Finney (August 29, 1792 – August 16, 1875). The impact of Revivalism on the subsequent history of American Protestantism, which is beyond the scope of this post, is both massive and seminal, yet not widely understood, particularly by many who are outside the Protestant traditions and who tend to view Protestants through the lens of 1517 rather than through the lens of the Second Great Awakening.



The Godfather of American Evangelicalism.

In any case, under the revival approach to Christianity popularized by Finney, one is typically categorized either as "saved", or "not saved", in a more or less "total" and complete sense based on one's expressed and sincere, personal faith in the "finished work" of Christ on Calvary, and therefore the inability of it to fail. This approach therefore does not see "salvation" as a process which must be "worked out" (c.f. Philippians 2:12), but rather as a one-and-done event. Thus, the term "unsaved believer" is a laughable oxymoron.

Sanctification is not discussed often, but is generally regarded as something that might come later, and is entirely distinct from what is referred to as the separate event of "justification", or "being saved". Sanctification is thus described, not as a state of contented holiness, but as a process of spiritual maturation. But the process itself is not constitutive of whether one is "saved".

The evidence of the effectiveness of one's "being saved" (i.e., whether one is actually "saved" or not, despite what one may think) is assessed by means of "one's walk with Jesus" — i.e., whether one commits sins, serious ones, after being "saved" … in which case, perhaps one was not actually "saved" at all.

If a serious sin should ever come to light, or make inroads into the life of a believer, it is contained by the belief that he/she was never truly "saved" to begin with. This allows the congregation to exclude the offender from (true) fellowship, and absolves the congregation from any responsibility to discipline, teach, and correct the prodigal, since he/she is considered to be an unbeliever.

Of course, this is generally imposed in a rather strict way, because one who has actually really been "saved" would not, per this view, ever engage in a serious sin thereafter, due to such sin being inconsistent with the total transformation which is seen to have come about by one's having been "saved".

This approach creates temptations for one to monitor one's behavior carefully in order to comply with the requirements of the moral law — not as a means of "being saved", but rather as a means of evidencing to oneself and others that one has "been saved".

This results in an approach to the faith which is constantly trying to separate the sheep from the goats, the wheat from the chaff, so to speak, in order to determine who is "actually saved" and who is "just roleplaying", including one's self. All the while in this process of scrutiny and separation, one must claim that one is avoiding legalism and one therefore tends to spend a good deal of mental energy constantly convincing oneself that one is not behaving legalistically in applying strict scrutiny to the degree of compliance of oneself and other "putative" "Christians" in light of the requirements of the moral law.

The "Church Lady". Image from David Drury: How to be Holier Than Thou: Motivate People with Fear and Cloud Things with Religiosity (2013 December 5)

This creates an unending tension between the unavoidable reality of human sin in the lives of flawed human Christians, on the one hand, and the understanding of this theological system which claims that this is impossible if one's salvation is actually real, on the other. This tension, and the paradoxical contradictions which create it, tend to foster extreme levels of "supposedly non-prodigal son" syndrome, and precisely the kind of comparing oneself to others which lies at the heart of the admonition against judgmentalism to begin with. Worst of all, this approach places this ontology at the heart of the religious experience.

However, this approach has gained a widespread appeal for several reasons.

- It creates a social order characterized by an appearance of godliness that tends to bolster self-esteem, faith, and social participation. (This is why evangelicals have a stereotype of being sharp dressers.)
- The theology and social order is ideologically protected from the ravages of personal sin within the community.
- Most of all, it creates a powerful sense of belonging (i.e. to the elect) to those within the congregation.

In my view, this problem underlies many of the difficulties currently being experienced by Christianity in North America today. This "Holier Than Thou" flavor of religiosity that was characteristic of the 19th and 20th century Protestant church experience produced a reactionary bifurcation of staunch fundamentalists and moral relativists, which in turn, led to the secularized churchianity we have today — flaccidly compromising in both doctrine and practice. Furthermore, within the specific contexts explored by the Christian Manosphere (i.e. "How can a Christian man find a spouse?"), this approach has a substantial impact on viewpoints and perspectives, which I will turn to in the final section of this post below.

Catholicism

By way of comparison, the Roman Catholic approach to these matters has a different set of issues that can, under some conditions, veer into a legalistic/judgmental mindset for a different set of reasons. But I'll refrain from focusing on these issues because they aren't that influential either in these threads or in American culture generally — even among Catholics in the U.S. themselves. It is not influential because most of the mainstream "Novus Ordo" mass Catholics (not "TLM" Catholics) have a religious mindset that follows one or the other Protestant approaches, de facto, in the period following Vatican II (ca. 1965).

Orthodoxy

My own tradition — Eastern Orthodoxy — has problems of judgmentalism, too (there's a good reason why the Gospels are so hard on judgmentalism), particularly in our "uber-dox" fringe. But the main thrust of the faith is not laced with a kind of legalism like the one described above. As I will discuss next, Orthodoxy tends to view these kinds of things as a question of corruption — whether one is indulging the passions or not in a way that creates a spiritual block inside of us which interferes with or entirely shuts down the process of gracious transformation in Christ — and not as legalism, or whether one is "following the rules", either in the revivalist sense of "proving" that one has been actually "saved", or in the juridical sense of avoiding punishment/cultivating a reward. But while there is, of course, always room for the problems of either the younger prodigal son or of the elder "non-prodigal" son to emerge, that is an issue for all Christians at all times — we are always in need of constant repentance, until death.

We are all always prodigals!

In Eastern Orthodox soteriology, the idea isn't either (a) that one can't become a "true" prodigal after one has been "saved" (we do not follow the tent revival model of Christianity), or (b) that one can kind of duck the issue by pursuing prodigality because one has faith in God's "ultimate" forgiveness/mercy/love (or something like that), provided that one has a proper orientation towards works, law, and grace, according to 16th Century Swiss and German standards. Instead, the central Christian concept of sin and grace is that one's prodigality is a function of one being alive.

We are all always prodigals!

One commenter described it in this way.

> "There is a comic book adaptation of the Prodigal Son story that ends with the father telling the older brother, "In his disobedience your brother is alive. You, in your resentful subservience, are dead. Do you think God wants mindless worshippers who can only follow instructions?"
>
> I've been the classic elder son for a long time. Followed the rules, didn't get any results out of it, ended up resentful toward God. Now I'm trying to discover a way out of living like that."

Yes, the "non-prodigal" son (aptly portrayed by the elder brother in the parable) is, in fact, as much of a "prodigal" as the "prodigal" son is, in the eyes of an all-knowing, eternal God who knows all hearts and knows all of time. The sins of the "non-prodigal" are different from the sins of the "prodigal" in form and type, and most obviously the "non-prodigal" commits his sins while being optically close to the Father, while the "prodigal" does not, but both are still sinful, both have strayed from God. The lesson for religious people is clear — do not be the "non-prodigal" son, who appears to be close to God and considers himself to be, but is mired in the sins of judgmentalism, presumption, pride, contempt, and the like. It is is the same general array of sins that Christ identifies time and again in the Gospels when discussing the Pharisees, and this is not surprising, because this is the one category of sin that comes up almost endlessly in the Gospels for constant derision, ridicule and warning. This is precisely because, unlike the sinners who throw themselves at the mercy of Christ, people like the elder "non-prodigal" son do not even believe they are in need of the same mercy, and thereby do they gravely, gravely err in the eyes of God. In some ways, the "non-prodigal" son is perhaps even worse off than the prodigal son, because he never comes alive, and never learns to love the Father God.

The core underlying sin here — which the parable of the prodigal son clearly identifies as at least equal to the sins of prodigality committed by the younger son, and suggests that they are even more serious precisely because of the failure of the "non-prodigal" to even see himself as being sinful in this way — lies in judging others as being more sinful than we are ourselves. When we compare our own sense of worthiness to our perception of others, we magnify the differences in sinfulness between us, which are rather small in the eyes of God. In His eyes, we are all seen as the prodigal sinners we are, and who are more or less equal in this respect. Jesus called this habit of judgmentalism "hypocrisy, which is the leaven of the Pharisees" (c.f. Matthew 16:6; Mark 8:15; Luke 12:1; and Galatians 5).

Getting out of God's Way

The Eastern Orthodox perspective on dealing with the archetypical problems of "prodigal" and "non-prodigal" is to avoid both by cultivating holiness instead. That is, one doesn't add to the problem intentionally by piling on more prodigality intentionally. Neither does one go about being a self-contented, arrogant stickler. Instead, the focus is to try to avoid falling into either pitfall through one's growth in theosis/holiness. In Orthodox soteriology, the pursuit of theosis is viewed as consisting primarily of "getting out of God's way" so that He can transform you by means of his grace, which is where constant return, constant repentance, and constant forgiveness all are a part of the daily spiritual experience of an Orthodox.

Orthodoxy proceeds from this premise to endorse one's personal effort and cooperation with grace (which we call "synergeia") because Orthodoxy views salvation as an ongoing process due to the lived reality of our human sinfulness. That is, grace is open to us following baptism, but true transforming grace is not forced upon us (nor against our will, like the Calvinist understanding of salvation). It must be cooperated with, and every decision is a decision to either cooperate with this transformative power, or not to do so — that is, either to adjust our ego, will, and habit such that the Holy Spirit can do its work in transforming our hearts, minds and bodies from the inside out, or to choose to do things in our minds, hearts and bodies that limit, obstruct, thwart, or interfere in His work, and, in some cases, shut down His work altogether. If one does not relinquish the will to auto-determination, and thereby "get out of the way" of this transforming grace, then one is not transformed by it, and if one does that consistently and repetitively, one can close the spigot of grace entirely.

As you can see, the Orthodox approach is not "rules"-based, per se, but rather the focus is on avoiding the kinds of thought processes, acts and habits that one can do which inhibit or "get in the way" of the transformative grace of God, and which therefore halt and, over time, can even reverse the process of spiritual transformation that God works in one following baptism. This is what it means for the believer to conform to the will of God concerning our sanctification. (1st Thessalonians 4:1-8)

In Eastern Orthodox spiritual practice, a great emphasis is placed on the practice of vigilance or watchfulness ("nepsis" following 1st Peter 5:8), which involves maintaining a stance of alertness and attentiveness to one's thoughts and the focus of one's "nous" (described below) so as to avoid patterns/strands/chains/cycles of thought that can lead, eventually, to strongholds of bondage and/or difficult temptations to sin in various ways, which run the gamut from sins of pride, to avarice, to greed, to lust, to anger, and the like. All of these begin with thoughts, and with the help and grace of the Spirit, we can get better over time at identifying the kinds of thoughts and thought chains/dynamics that lead to them (e.g. buying into false narratives, deception, denial of the truth, dishonesty, false convictions, fear, idolatry, insecurity, lying, psychological displacement, psychological dissociation, psychological projection, shame, solipsism, etc.).

The thoughts themselves are readily apparent to us, but for many of us, the underlying nature and motivations of these thoughts remain lurking below the subconscious. But as we grow and mature, we become more aware of these defects, and we must consistently reach out to God to *"come to our assistance and make haste to help me" to shut down our individual specific dynamics of thought and spirit which may potentially lead to an eventual sin in thought, word or deed, and the disturbance this brings to the entire process of transformation by grace which God is working within us constantly after our baptism.

 From Psalm 69 and Psalm 70.*

The Struggle of Faith

Sins are of course a violation of the moral law and must be repented of and forgiveness for them must be sought, but the main problem with sin isn't a judicial condemnation (which has been taken care of by the Cross), but rather the impact of sin in blocking, interfering with, retarding or shutting down the work of grace which is trying to transform us into a holier and holier version of ourselves in heart, mind and body by means of grace through the action of the Holy Spirit. It isn't a "law mentality" the way a Protestant would describe that, but it also isn't a kind of "led by the heart" mentality, either, in terms of "one's heart being in the right place" — it is a true spiritual struggle, a spiritual war, a process in which salvation is not "won by works", but rather is gradually made increasingly present, made increasingly observable and tangible, in the life of the individual Christian by means of God's transformative grace, provided that one has not blocked/prevented/retarded that process by means of one's own sins to the point where the process breaks down.

Hopefully, by now it is clear to the reader why Orthodoxy sees the day-to-day life of the Christian as an ongoing spiritual struggle.

- It is a consistent struggle to become more self-aware, and to remove those aspects of self that get in the way of God's transformation and grace.
- It is a continual struggle to not place obstacles (sins) in the way of the operation of grace inside of us which retard or reverse the process.
- It is a constant struggle to resist recasting this struggle as a struggle to "obey rules in order to maintain purity or holiness, or to get a reward, or avoid a punishment".

As I noted above, this struggle means practicing the avoidance of sin by maintaining a stance of "nepsis" or alertness to one's thoughts and mental and "noetic" state, and proactively calling on God constantly to help you overcome sin when you face specific temptations to sin, or, preferably, when you recognize a mental dynamic or chain of thought that will eventually lead to a sinful thought, word or deed, on a daily/hourly basis. In this, the Christian is relying on God, not his own efforts which, of course, alone will fail, but also is required to take the initiative and ask for God's help. This involves…

1. Maintaining vigilance of oneself, and especially one's thoughts and one's "nous" (which is a word that describes one's faculty for spiritual sight and communication — ones' spiritual/soul eye), and where that is focused.
2. Maintaining an attitude of open communication with God on a constant basis by keeping the "nous" focused on God (and not in passionate engagement with the world of the senses and/or the world of thoughts and memories).
3. Constantly turning to God as a prodigal son with a repentant spirit on a daily, sometimes hourly basis, depending on our struggles, confident in God's mercy, but also cognizant of our constant need for it and the help which is always springing from it as a gift when we ask for it in humility with a spirit of acknowledged need for it.

In practice, the discipline, vigilance, and self-denial which is necessary for sanctification and Shalom inevitably causes suffering in some form or manner, and this suffering poses an additional layer of complexity to the struggle. However, this is another topic for an upcoming post.

Takeaways

What does this mean in terms of how people approach the problem of finding a spouse in the current environment, and specifically the issue of how one approaches the challenges of the current dating market, the sexual revolution's aftermath and the like.

I think it means an Orthodox can only endorse avoiding sin to the extent possible — not, as described above, for legalistic reasons of "earning salvation", but rather so as to not block/retard/reverse the process of transformation at work in us through the Spirit's action. When sin arises (and we should expect it VERY frequently in this culture, given the specific challenges we live in), we should avoid falling into the role of the "non-prodigal" son in judging the weaknesses of others in the face of this very challenging culture, but instead, we should gently encourage repentance, seventy times seven times.

In terms of the "brass tacks" question of actually finding that spouse, there isn't an easy, overarching, turnkey, accessible-for-all solution that will yield the desired result, but this isn't really the church's problem to solve. The church doesn't tell you how to get a job, buy a house, invest in your retirement and so on. Sure, one can scour the scriptures and find useful general guidance there, but the Bible isn't a real estate investment analytical tool, a retirement portfolio analysis, a career counselor, or the like. These are human challenges that we must meet with our humanity, and that includes an aspect of worldliness which is inevitable due to living in the world, yet one where we must engage in the delicate dance of not becoming so worldly that we are spiritually tainted by the world and its values/ways/norms in a way that ends up retarding that ongoing transformative process of grace that is taking place inside of us.

Again, we have to try to avoid sin by always keeping God in remembrance and reaching out to him to help us when we feel temptation coming, not with the mind to avoid running afoul of rules and their punishment, but rather to avoid blocking the process of gracious transformation. At the same time when we sin ourselves (and we will, in this culture), we need to be faithful enough to return to God immediately in repentance and ask for his help, and then to remember that when we find ourselves in temptation in the future to ask with humility for his help in real time, constantly acknowledging our own weakness and our total need for his gracious assistance and forgiveness. And finally, we need to be gracious in our approach to others who are also failing in their struggles with temptation in the teeth of this very challenging cultural environment, and encourage them, as fellow sinners, to reach out to God for help and assistance, as the case may be, and not with the eyes of a supercilious judge who is overlooking or denying his own sinfulness, as did the elder "non-prodigal" son.

It's a tap dance spiritually, for certain, and in a culture where sexuality is now one of the major culturally besetting sins (the other main ones being pride, greed, materialism, and vainglory). Thus, the process of finding a spouse, which is culturally tied together with sex due to the tie-up of the SMP and MMP, is going to be very fraught with these issues.

As a Christian, you'll need to be able to walk the tightrope in some of these tricky areas, and repent when you inevitably fall. You'll need to help others when they inevitably do as well, instead of approaching others with judgment, hectoring, superciliousness, superiority, chiding, and everything that reeks of non-humility (and which therefore brings more judgment on oneself).

In Eastern Orthodoxy, the Gospel parable of the Prodigal Son is read at the Divine Liturgy on the third Sunday prior to the start of Great Lent, as a part of preparing Orthodox to enter Lent with the proper mindset of repentance over judgment.
But I think this is very hard to do in the context of some Christian theologies where the reality of ongoing sinfulness among Christians presents different kinds of challenges.

In any case, as I stated at the outset of this post, this is where we generally hit the wall in these kinds of discussions, it seems to me. There is a point where we part ways, spiritually, with each other, in terms of such fundamental issues that we cannot see things the same way. We can understand our differences better by diving into them with an open mind so that we can understand each other's perspectives, but we can't see things the same way. It seems to me, the chasm between our spiritual constitutions and our non-shared environments will impact not only how we approach the "options" that are on offer, such as they are, but also how we will approach the prior threshold question of, "How should one approach the question of how one should approach the options?", and so on. Thus, we descend into the swamp of meta-realities.

Conclusions

What this means from a practical perspective in terms of the overarching discussion here is that one can't, at least from an Eastern Orthodox point of view, endorse any approach that features considering the problem with the premeditated idea of sinning in order to reach a specific worldly goal — that is the opposite of a repentant attitude. However, it also means that one is to be very forgiving of someone else who trips due to their own weakness in this difficult environment, even repeatedly, by gently encouraging that person to understand that their weakness is shared, and encouraging them to turn to God in repentance for help in overcoming the temptation to sin. And then doing this seventy times seven times, not with increasing exasperation and a chiding, hectoring tone, or even worse a judgmental one as we watch them fall into the same pattern repeatedly, but always with gentleness and patience, as we see from Christ himself in dealing with people in serious sin.

How often have we played the role of the so-called "non-prodigal" and chided the "sinful" person in their sins or lecturing them? Few things p!ss God off faster than when we claim to be less sinful than others, either directly or indirectly, as this is hypocrisy, as I described above, and it forms the core of Christ's endless, fierce, passionate critique of the Pharisees — a theme that runs from one end of the Gospels to the other, and is continued by St. Paul.

How much of our discussion is "getting in God's way" of speaking to us and working through us?

Related

- Σ Frame: Psychological Projection and the Mirror Effect (2017 December 9)
- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (2018 June 26)
- Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – When wanton treachery brings shame, not honor. (2020 October 14)
- Σ Frame: The Relinquished Life (2021 March 8)
- Roosh Valizadeh: What Is Orthodox Christianity? (2021 March 25)

An Interview with American Pilgrim author Roosh Valizadeh

Jack · 31 March 2021 · Archived copy · Original

"Pursing something for merely material benefits is idolatry, and you will surely be punished for it in this life." ~ Roosh Valizadeh

Readership: Christian Men;
Authorship: This interview was conducted by Stephen L. M. Heiner, and the transcript contained in this post originally appeared on his eponymous blog on 2021 February 25.
Reader's Note: Key takeaways have been highlighted in blue.
Length: 4,400 words
Reading Time: 17 minutes

Topics

1. Views and Expectations of Women – Before and After
2. On Government
3. Self-improvement, the internet, and technology.
4. On Conspiracy Theories
5. The Effects of the Sexual Revolution on Marriage
6. On Nature and Traveling
7. On City Living
8. On Cultural Shifts
9. Some Advice to Secular Men
10. Tattoos
11. Bird Watching
12. Overcoming Challenges by Trusting God
13. Denominations
14. Carrying the Cross
15. Prayer

Roosh considers American Pilgrim to be his first true book, despite having written books for years.

Foreword: I recently had the chance to review an advance copy of American Pilgrim by Roosh Valizideh. He was gracious enough to answer some questions I had after finishing his newest book.

Views and Expectations of Women – Before and After

Stephen: In your introduction, you write, "[Y]et it totally escaped me that I was receiving from women merely what I gave them." Did you have an inkling of this earlier in the process? That "pickup" wasn't all it was cracked up to be, even as you were succeeding at it?

Roosh: No, I did not see the truth until after I stopped fornicating. While pursuing women for sex, I was deceived into believing I was a "high value" man because of superficial qualities centered around my appearance and personality (but only the traits I would selectively reveal to women), and that I was entitled to a woman who was both sexually appealing like a pornographic actress, since I regularly watched porn, but also traditional with qualities such as honor, loyalty, and dedication. When I did not receive the woman I thought I deserved, one who existed primarily in my mind, I interpreted that as not indicative of my true worth or sense of delusion, since I obviously had "value" from being able to bed so many women; but this was a fault of the women themselves, which is why I spent an inordinate amount of time publicly complaining about their collective flaws and weaknesses.

The reality of what was happening is that I was pursuing harlots and succeeding with them — and them alone — because I mirrored their moral character. We both had no faith and looked to the opposite sex to "save" our miserable lives (from not having God). In other words, I was the harlot I slept with and then publicly criticized. But these women did not save me, and I surely didn't save any woman, so I would whine endlessly that the world is filled with "sluts" and "whores." Without Christ, I simply couldn't see the error of my behavior, and it wasn't until after repentance that this was clear to me.

On Government

Stephen: You said, "If [John] Hancock had known that his signature would be used to promote sodomy, he would not have signed the Declaration of Independence." But, joking aside, aren't we looking just as much at the results of a revolutionary government? You say later in the book: "I couldn't see the founders as supernatural men worthy of worship. They were ambitious, intelligent, conniving… but hadn't they been seeking their own glory and power? They overthrew the godly authority of the king… to establish a secular nation." Also: "Americans had no resistance to the evil that encroached on its shores, because from the very beginning, the intention might have been to dethrone God." America thought it could do its own thing, as the first country in the history of the world without an established religion, and despite a few good decades here and there, John Hancock and others like him helped deliver us to the sodomites…

Roosh: Jesus Christ tells us that no good can be done without Him, so the key question to ask is how much of Him the founding fathers called upon in genuine faith when they established the United States. This is an important historical question because if the founders depended more on their Freemasonic relationships and need for power than even their sola scriptura doctrine, since many were Protestants, we cannot be surprised today that America has become the primary source of Satanic darkness in the world.

The founders did have a strong sense of natural morality that cannot be compared with the average American citizen of modern times, but it took just a couple of generations for that natural morality based on parchment and paper to be eroded into the godless state we have now where little children are being biologically altered into different sexes due to encouragement from the government and major institutions. This is due in part to the founders planting a bad seed with their flavor of democracy. When that seed matured, the United States went on to be de-Christianized without much fuss and effort.

Many Conservatives today proclaim that America is a "Christian nation," but all we can say with certainty is that most Americans at its founding were Christian in identification. One would have to look to the Byzantine era or possibly Czarist Russia to see what a Christian nation really was like. In my view, to use "Christian nation" and "democracy" in the same sentence is a contradiction in terms. Without a Christian monarch, Satan can make swift work of the country through whipping up the passions of the unruly mob.

The Garibaldi Castle in Khryashchevka, Russia.

Self-improvement, the Internet, and Technology

Stephen: You responded to one of the people you met who was asking about self-improvement: "I think you should work hardest in your relationship with God. Everything else is seeking approval from other people." Later, "Step by step, I'm addressing my lust, anger, and pride." This is the wisdom of the Desert Fathers. Do you really think people can hear those words through all the deluge of social media's likes, followers, and Tik-Tok videos?

Roosh: If their heart desires Christian wisdom, then yes they can be enlightened through Tik-Tok, but it's surely easier to learn it through books or speaking face-to-face with holy men. I think it has become clear to most Christians that social networking is a tool that Satan uses to distract and corrupt souls, but God can certainly weaponize these platforms for good to exert His will.

After I repented, I harnessed all my online platforms — blog, YouTube, Twitter, email newsletter, forum — to share my faith. Immediately, 30–50% of men dropped out, many in anger. I'm in the process of building an explicitly Christian community from those who remained and the new audience I'm slowly gaining. There still remains a temptation for me in using an app like Twitter, where I can receive instant feedback to a low-effort tweet that spikes my dopamine and keeps me planted at the computer screen instead of performing spiritual labor or reading religious texts, so I must come to the conclusion that no matter how strong my faith gets, it will pale in comparison to those Christians of the past who didn't have the internet and social networking. In the Book of the Apocalypse, we learn how faith will steadily decrease until the end, causing a great apostasy, and even our Lord Jesus Christ asks if He will find faith on the earth when He returns. Each of us has to make difficult decisions about how much technology to use to share our faith, and then "fast" from it as if it were food to not become overly dependent.

On Conspiracy Theories

Stephen: As I read your discussions with attendees of your talk who work in the military and intelligence services and ponder how much "conspiracy theory" is indeed, "conspiracy fact," do you wonder if your short story, Jake Ultra, will end up being nonfiction instead?

Roosh: Jake Ultra is about a conservative young man who wants to improve his country by "fighting back." His actions begin a cascade that drastically changes the country. I wrote this story in my secular days when I believed that might makes right and the only way to "win" is through force. From a spiritual perspective I was wrong — the best way to win is through saving your soul; nothing can spite Satan more than watching you ascend to serve the Father at His right hand upon your death, but how many men in America possess this level of worldly detachment where they can watch their country descend into absolute evil and not fight back with anger? And who would say that that anger is not righteous? Saint John Chrysostom said, "He who is not angry, whereas he has cause to be, sins. For unreasonable patience is the hotbed of many vices, it fosters negligence, and incites not only the wicked but the good to do wrong." Is this not a good time to fight back when, recently, Congressman Emanuel Cleaver, while in the U.S. Capitol, prayed not to God but to "Brahman," even finishing his blasphemous prayer with "Awoman" instead of "Amen"? I wish I knew the answer.

Our elites believe they can gradually ease us into the prisons of isolation and technological destruction, but the Bible is full of stories, most notably the Tower of Babel, that describe how God makes a fool of the plans of men. A giant metal spring is being compressed through persecution and oppression by the elites and it will eventually be released to cause great turmoil, but how that will happen I do not know. We must also not forget that God can use natural disasters to bring men to repentance (who expected freezing Texas to descend into something resembling the third world this month?). No matter which way you look at our current situation, all empires fall, and the United States is long overdue for such a fall.

The Effects of the Sexual Revolution on Marriage

Stephen: Speaking about some relatives you got to meet for the first time, you noted, "The three of us had zero children, a typical outcome for first-generation Americans. Our parents did not understand that the new country they moved to for opportunity and comfort would render us sterile." But I would say that's only recently become a typical outcome. What changed?

Roosh: The sexual revolution went into overdrive after our parents' time. They may have dated only a little before marriage, but they didn't make their "sex life" an obsession like many Gen X'ers and Millennials have done. It didn't help that our generation was able to experience nonstop pornography, cheap international travel, mobile lifestyles due to remote work, and the aggressive cultural propaganda against traditional marriage. I truly believed that marriage was "slavery" because it "shackled" me to a woman who would merely divorce me for no reason. That may very well be the case with secular marriages in which you choose a spouse based on emotional compatibility and how "happy" they make you feel, but that's not what Christian marriages are built on. I don't have the actual statistics on hand, but I once read that the divorce rate of a Catholic couple who goes to church every week is less than 5%. That looks like good odds to me.

To serve God through your spouse, however, not only takes faith but maturity, of which I can't say I ever had before Christ. I was always focused on my own desires and needs, never wanting to make a sacrifice that impeded my pleasures. My narcissism, pride, and self-centeredness were such that I saw myself as a little god with which the world revolved around. Unfortunately, that's the default outlook of a young person today.

Yellowstone National Park, Wyoming, U.S.A.

On Nature and Traveling

Stephen: We both went to Yellowstone the same summer, and I was so keen to see the buffalo and wildlife. I only spent two days there but I did appreciate how you pointed out the commoditization of the beauty of nature. "When beauty is roadside, you will attract only the most basic, camera-toting tourists." I felt that you had those glasses on from They Live and were able to see some of the underlying problems while I was just snapping pictures of elk.

Roosh: As a traveler, I'm jaded. I've spent so many years on the road that if I'm simply in proximity with another traveler, I will focus on the negative of the situation because he will remind me of all those years I wasted to seek novelty and women abroad.

I don't wish to throw away travel completely, especially in a post-coronavirus age in which we spend so much time at home that a little trip may be beneficial for our mental health, but I will focus more on journeys to monasteries or parks that are not nearly as crowded as Yellowstone.

On City Living

Stephen: You also have some harsh critiques for city life, despite the fact that you have lived in cities for most of your life. What would you say to those who are saying that running off to the countryside is a false solution?

Roosh: The New Jerusalem that God has waiting for us is a city. If you strongly desire to only ever live in the countryside, you may be disappointed in Heaven!

The city itself isn't inherently evil, but when it's filled with people lacking faith, it becomes a vortex of sin that can make you wonder if hell has been realized on earth, especially in West Coast cities like Seattle, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. Today I can walk through a European city and genuinely feel God, because its old parks, statues, and architecture were created by God-fearing men centuries ago when faith was stronger, but in America we tend to tear down the old in order for money-hungry capitalists to build yet another sterile glass tower. It's possible to walk several blocks in an American city and not for a brief moment feel God's presence. Even urban American churches are covered with the propaganda of the times.

I do hope one day to live in the countryside, but doing so alone can be a recipe for disaster. As Dr. E. Michael Jones told me, I would need a lot of "spiritual firepower" to essentially live as a hermit. I think it would make more sense to live there with a family instead of as a single man. In the meanwhile, the suburbs seem like a reasonable compromise.

Пустынник ("Hermit"); М. В. Нестеров (1888-1889).

On Cultural Shifts

Stephen: I don't think most people know that a lot of the public libraries are de facto daytime homeless shelters. Did you expect that going into the tour?

Roosh: I did not, since most of the American public libraries I had been to prior to the tour were located in family-oriented neighborhoods. The city libraries have become so bad that they no longer serve their original function to educate the community, and since children's books are getting more "woke" with all manner of false egalitarian and homosexual messages, I don't believe libraries are safe places for children anymore. Well, maybe they're "safe" if you're a leftist mom who wants her children to be groomed by transexuals during Drag Queen Story Hour. I wouldn't be surprised if the private library makes a return in our lifetimes, perhaps in a weird mobile form ("Hey kids, here comes the library truck!").

Stephen: You met up with some people and spent time with their families, people that you could not have met if not for the internet. Do you still think there's a chance to connect with good people out there or are even those possibilities going to be ruled out by the version of the internet that is coming?

Roosh: The trend I notice is greater isolation and more distrust of your fellow neighbor. I meet families inside my church quite often but besides my priest, none have invited me to their home to break bread. It looks like the modern ideal of family will have to be observed from a distance, or maybe you can read about it in books before embarking on the task yourself and learning through trial and error.

That makes me wonder: what is Christian hospitality? It's easy to invite your family or friends for a feast, but aren't we called to invite everyone, including the destitute? Sadly, even inviting friends may be going by the wayside. People of weak faith are so scared of the coronavirus that they don't want to step foot in other people's homes. I regularly hold Italian-themed dinners in my home, and my invites have been refused by those who fear infection, and no one else I know is holding dinner parties. I have no doubt that Satan is pleased at our self-imposed isolation.

Some Advice to Secular Men

Stephen: Another key idea you put forward comes out in the quote: "If you marry a secular woman, you will have a secular outcome." We are so drenched in secularity, particularly in America, that this message might not get through, especially if someone who hears that has no faith. What non-faith argument(s) would you put that quote in?

Roosh: I would tell secular men that you will attract the female version of yourself. Whatever spiritual state you are in, only a woman with a very similar state would embrace you, so if you have no faith, you will only attract a faithless woman. These men have to ask themselves what kind of marriage they will have with such a woman, and if that's a risk they want to take. Since most men are justifiably not willing to take that risk, they fall back — since they have not God — onto pornography, video games, bodybuilding, casual dating, or other hobbies that feed their narcissism, lust, and pride.

I'm sure I could make convincing arguments to secular men that warn them of leading an excessively materialist lifestyle, but I would have to frame them around receiving benefits in this world, such as getting a "good" wife or being happy with your existing consumer products. Yet that will still fail them. Pursing something for merely material benefits is idolatry, and you will surely be punished for it in this life. I'm learning that it's only faith-based arguments that are worth making. Otherwise, you are enabling the faithless to remain without faith, and that will cause severe damage to their souls.

Tattoos

Stephen: You're very triggered by tattoos on women. Why do you think that is?

Roosh: So many women I've fornicated with have had tattoos, so I've come to associate it with harlotry. Of course I was no better than they at the time, and many tattooed women have repented, but as much as I mourn over my past sins, I don't want to be reminded of them at every moment with a woman I one day marry, especially if she has a tattoo on her arms or face.

A Northern Cardinal

Bird Watching

Stephen: You've really developed an interest in birds. My bird feeder faces the interior of a courtyard here in Paris, so I don't get nearly the diversity that you did at your mountain hideout. I've got a group of four sparrows that visit the feeder religiously in the late afternoon. Have you always cared for birds? What do you find special about them?

Roosh: I believe God gave me the birds as a healthy hobby upon repentance. I didn't mind birds in the past but didn't go out of my way to observe them deeply, let alone learn about individual species. After returning to God, I suddenly began to notice them everywhere. I was utterly fascinated: enchanted by their movements, sounds, and even unique personalities. To observe God's creatures flying about, singing their hearts out, taking care of their babies, and foraging for food touches me deeply, and I thank God every day for allowing me to see his birds in this way. Just the other day I saw a Northern cardinal singing his heart out, signaling the approach of Spring. My response two days later was to buy birdseed so I could see more of them.

Overcoming Challenges by Trusting God

Stephen: While a good part of the book is a travelogue of sorts, you were also waging battles: you had health challenges, all kinds of temptations, both mental and actual, and the occasional Ortho-on-Ortho argument. Were you worried at any point that you would have to cancel the remaining stops? That you couldn't make it?

Roosh: Yes it was a constant worry. My mind imagined all ways that the tour would be thwarted, from having car problems to being canceled by hotel venues to being severely tempted or getting ill. There was also the threat of protesters, who came to my Denver talk holding signs but did not hurt the event.

The trip was a good way to start building my trust in God, because I logically knew that the plan for my trip and lectures was so hard that I would need His help to complete it successfully, which — spoiler alert — did happen. Funnily enough, when I had much simpler plans after the tour, I completely failed, so I am beginning to understand how God opens the doors for you to accomplish something if you're serving His will.

Denominations

Stephen: Your visit to a Joel Osteen service was interesting: most would never have bothered to venture into such a circus, so thanks for taking one for the team. What percentage of your readers are Catholic, Orthodox, Protestant, of no faith, etc.?

Roosh: This is hard to quantify since I haven't done an official survey, so here is my best estimate based on the interactions I've had with readers through social networking, email, and my forum:

Catholic: 25%
Protestant: 25%
Agnostic: 25%
Orthodox: 15%
Atheist/Muslim: 10%

Catholics have a strong representation in my readership; it's possible they outnumber all other groups. If you focus on the differences between Catholics and Orthodox, you can write many volumes, but the similarities are enough to allow both to engage in meaningful Christian fellowship, at least when it comes to describing the evil of this world and then countering it with faith, communal worship, and receiving the sacraments. Once we get into the world of Protestantism, however, which doesn't have sacraments (outside of a form of baptism) or saints, the differences become more apparent so any fellowship there must be carefully done to not provoke a theological debate which invariably turns ugly.

Since I'm still a spiritual baby (am I a spiritual "toddler" yet?), most of my articles or observations about faith are broad enough that it doesn't chafe Catholics, but if God wants me to take on the road of theology, like Jay Dyer, then I think that fellowship may be broken. I've always been a practical man, whether teaching pickup or sharing faith, so I expect my work to always be helpful to Christians who are not necessarily in my Church.

Carrying the Cross

Stephen: Over the years you've picked up an interesting group of readers (and trolls). Has the blowback from the repudiation of PUA died down or do you still deal with it?

Roosh: I still deal with it. Up until the day I die I will be labeled a "pro rape guru", "pickup artist", and the like. Google and Wikipedia ensure my past is at the forefront of my being, and I still see comments of men complaining that they miss the "old Roosh", the one who was spiritually dead and on his way to hell. Just the other week, the CEO of Parler was attacked in the Daily Mail because he once shared with a friend that he liked my pickup work. Of course the article forgot to mention the whole bit about me converting to Christianity, but I suppose that would hurt their narrative of painting me as irredeemable and not deserving of forgiveness for my past misdeeds.

In the end, I deserve all the false allegations and hatred because of how I lived in the past. I've hurt a lot of people, both online and off. Those who malign me today remind me of the man I was and must never go back to. They also keep my pride in check, that I'm not perfect or holy just because I've had a relatively easy two years as a Christian.

Prayer

Stephen: Everyone came to you in the book with their own particular situations and I laughed when you said your next book would be entitled Ask God and would have one page with one question: "Have you asked God?" What would you say to those who say, "I've asked, and nothing came back" or "I don't believe in God"?

Roosh: If you don't believe in God then you will have to use the secular tactic of listing the pros and cons of a particular decision and then choosing a course of action that minimizes your downside while maximizing your upside, without heavy consideration of moral implications. This tactic may work for a time but will fail in the end, because while you're obsessed with material gain, more of your soul is being controlled by the demons. You will die before you die.

If you asked God for help on the matter, and nothing came back, then you have your answer! I doubt that God created us so that we can pull our hair about deciding which house to live in, whether to sign a loan at so-and-so interest rate, which job to take, or in my case, whether to wear a face mask in Walmart. He is most concerned about our salvation, so I imagine He will not intervene if you're focusing on inconsequential matters. I've asked God for a lot of things, and the feeling I get back from Him is the following: "Make the decision that you believe will best serve Me. If your decision is wrong, I will correct you and teach you why, because when you learn through your mistakes, your faith will become stronger and be able to better endure what is to come."

The real difficulty is finding a way to be in such strong communion with God that your instinct often becomes the correct one, so instead of praying on specific items, I would argue it's more important simply to maintain a daily prayer rule, attend church, and read the Bible. The stronger your faith, the less you will have to reach out to God for individual matters.

Closing Statements

Stephen: So, what is your next book?

Roosh: I think I'm ready to write a novel, which perhaps is foolhardy in an age where few people read novels, but I believe that is at least partially due to publishing houses putting out woke rubbish. I'm a big fan of Russian literature. If I can write a book with a spiritual theme that is only 10% as good as a Dostoevsky novel, it may have a great impact on people's faith. I consider American Pilgrim my first true book, so we'll see what God guides me to create in the future.

Stephen: Thanks for taking the time to answer these, Roosh. Keep on the path.

You can follow Roosh's work on his website and, for the moment, Twitter. If you're interested in reading more good books this year, you might be interested in my monthly online book club.

Related

- The Calvinist Ruminant (Rev. Bennie Castle): God, Man, and the Hierarchy (2021 March 3)
- Gunner Q: Saint Milo's Confessions? (2021 March 11)

God's Concept of Justice

Jack · 2 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

We are not the judge.

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: Ed Hurst contributed to the writing of this essay.
Reader's Note: This essay is composed of several case studies which allow the reader to envision the concept of justice in several different contexts.
Length: 6,000 words
Reading Time: 32 minutes

Is God Capricious?

Man's concept of justice is quite different from God's. Man's concept of justice is largely focused on the letter of the law, legal traditions, maintaining the social order, "fairness", and ultimately, the ego satisfaction for all those concerned, especially those holding positions of power. God's concept of justice is more focused on the revelation of His power and glory, as shown in the following passage.

> [14] What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? Certainly not! [15] For He says to Moses, "I will have mercy on whomever I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomever I will have compassion." [16] So then it is not of him who wills, nor of him who runs, but of God who shows mercy. [17] For the Scripture says to the Pharaoh, "For this very purpose I have raised you up, that I may show My power in you, and that My name may be declared in all the earth." [18] Therefore He has mercy on whom He wills, and whom He wills He hardens.
>
> [19] You will say to me then, "Why does He still find fault? For who has resisted His will?" [20] But indeed, O man, who are you to reply against God? Will the thing formed say to him who formed it, "Why have you made me like this?" [21] Does not the potter have power over the clay, from the same lump to make one vessel for honor and another for dishonor?
>
> [22] What if God, wanting to show His wrath and to make His power known, endured with much longsuffering the vessels of wrath prepared for destruction, [23] and that He might make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy, which He had prepared beforehand for glory, [24] even us whom He called, not of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles?
>
> Romans 9:14-24 (NKJV)

In order to obtain peace with God, it is absolutely necessary for a man to get past his humanistic and worldly concepts of justice, and then learn to appreciate and fully embrace how God actually works. This post offers several case studies that are intended to help the reader sort this out.

Solid gold toilets for San Francisco's homeless.

Case Study 1 — Some Men Get all the Girls

For the first case study, I'll refer to a previous post, God doesn't care if you find a wife! (2020/4/13). The title of this particular post is rather click-baitey, but it was seriously stated in a previous comment, and I felt it had some interesting nuances that needed attention. In this post, it was assumed that God does indeed care about marriage, but ultimately, it remains for the readers to contemplate and discuss the truth of the matter among a variety of contexts.

The first impression on the reader is how he is affected by the title.

1. Does it seem arrogantly presumptuous to speak of whether God cares about something?
2. Or do you find something curious about this statement that opens the eyes of your heart?

The next step is in asking yourself, why should this statement affect me the way it does? If you are (1), then is it because your mind is attempting to prove or disprove the claim in the statement as either true or false? If you are (2) then what is the nature of your reaction? Is it because you wish it to be true, or because your heart has perceived it to be true?

Then, this post outlined four case studies which were offered to help the reader sort out the possibilities.

Case Study 1 was about emotional maturity, and being able to experience life on your own terms.
Case Study 2 was about how people want to blame god for not giving them something in life.
Case Study 3 was about trusting God, and the discussion is tinged with a bit of Calvinism.
Case Study 4 was an example of how the heart and mind are unable to communicate on the same terms.

The Conclusions had one line of sarcasm, and a funny-because-true final statement. But overall, this post was sincere in asking the above questions.

Almost predictably, there was an argument in the comments about what is "just".

Lastmod summed up the single man's contention as follows.

> "The crisis in the church for the single man (those who still attend) is [given in this contradiction] that "god gave you this free will, and you have to use it… bench press, lead a bible study, and become an engineer…" and then backhandedly, "god promises you nothing. Deal with it. He doesn't fulfill your burning [desire]."
>
> "[So] a man who burns and is 34, 44, 51, or 60 [years old]… and is in the loser class of never marrying, doesn't know his mission, didn't bench enough… didn't have "many options" to marry like most of you have had… is now told "god doesn't owe you this."
>
> But he "gave" and "blessed" [other men] with this????????"

JPF responded with the perspective of a married man.

> "We have a good marriage to the extent that we obey the commands given by God. If [my wife] or I did not have the character that results from striving (imperfectly) to be obedient to God, then the marriage would suck. So, the character that we have, due to obedience to the commands God provided, is a blessing. I am most grateful for this aspect of my wife."

But Lastmod is speaking from the perspective of a single man with little to no opportunities for matrimony, which is the majority of men these days. He opined,

> "God is gonna make all mankind suffer in these manners… and the men who do suffer are not Scott or DS. It's 80% of the men who had no choice in their genetics, and if "she has the hots for you".
>
> Yet cloaking all of this under "god wants the best for you".
>
> Best for a few… sure. Most? No, 80% or whatever pay for a woman's disobedience and the high SMPV men contribute to the cock carousel and again are unscathed. Blessed. Rewarded."

True, there are a lot of suffering men as Jason asserts, but is it due to the d!cks of Dons that deflower dozens of dizzy dames, the cockamaniacal women themselves, or is it by the hand of God?

Where is the justice?

Liberty and Justice for all!

Case Study 2 — The Parable of the Workers in the Vineyard

This parable from Matthew 20:1-16 was cited as central to the discussion.

> [1] "For the kingdom of heaven is like a landowner who went out early in the morning to hire laborers for his vineyard. [2] Now when he had agreed with the laborers for a denarius a day, he sent them into his vineyard. [3] And he went out about the third hour and saw others standing idle in the marketplace, [4] and said to them, 'You also go into the vineyard, and whatever is right I will give you.' So they went. [5] Again he went out about the sixth and the ninth hour, and did likewise. [6] And about the eleventh hour he went out and found others standing idle, and said to them, 'Why have you been standing here idle all day?' [7] They said to him, 'Because no one hired us.' He said to them, 'You also go into the vineyard, and whatever is right you will receive.'
>
> [8] "So when evening had come, the owner of the vineyard said to his steward, 'Call the laborers and give them their wages, beginning with the last to the first.' [9] And when those came who were hired about the eleventh hour, they each received a denarius. [10] But when the first came, they supposed that they would receive more; and they likewise received each a denarius. [11] And when they had received it, they complained against the landowner, [12] saying, 'These last men have worked only one hour, and you made them equal to us who have borne the burden and the heat of the day.' [13] But he answered one of them and said, 'Friend, I am doing you no wrong. Did you not agree with me for a denarius? [14] Take what is yours and go your way. I wish to give to this last man the same as to you. [15] Is it not lawful for me to do what I wish with my own things? Or is your eye evil because I am good?' [16] So the last will be first, and the first last. For many are called, but few chosen."
>
> Matthew 20:1-16 (NKJV)

Here, I need to point out that this parable is not about a man's lot in life. This parable concerns the reward of salvation (i.e. "the kingdom of heaven" in verse 1). The idea is that some people have a difficult life of faith while others find the burden light. The contention arises when someone objects that some who receive salvation work long and hard in the Lord's service, while others merely sweep the floor at the end of the day. But this attitude is basically a "salvation by works" doctrine with a little twist, which is essentially, "better (or quicker) salvation by more works". Ironically, as long as a man clings to this notion, his perceived "salvation" will remain a torturous journey of self-punishment and animosity towards God.

In the parable of the workers, there were still those who felt the wages were unjust, even though everyone was paid handsomely. I believe this was the main point of bringing up this parable in the discussion — that there will always be the impression that God's generosity is interpreted as unjust by those who didn't get as much as someone else. The error of this approach is that it is an "appeal to equality" based on "equal wages for equal works". However, God does not follow the tenets of equality as we might understand it. In fact, the parable describes reality, in that it creates discontent. (I am certain that this is one of Jason's running themes.)

The Parable of the Talents (Matthew 25:14-30; Luke 19:12-28) indicates that God is more interested in what one does with whatever one has, not whether he got the same results as everyone else, which is essentially equity (another false principle underlying man's concept of justice).

Covetous and Discontented Objections to Justice turn God into a Cruel Vending Machine

In the comments, I wrote,

> "Why do you see a contradiction there? Think of it in human terms. Your father doesn't owe you an inheritance (for example), but if he gave you an inheritance, but not your brother, it would be a blessing. Wouldn't it?"

Derek answered,

> "Because your scenario is unjust.
>
> In the parable of the workers in the vineyard, the owner of the vineyard gives everyone the same reward for different amounts of work. To use your analogy, it would be as if the father only had to give the inheritance to the firstborn (or no one), but gave it to all his children out of love."

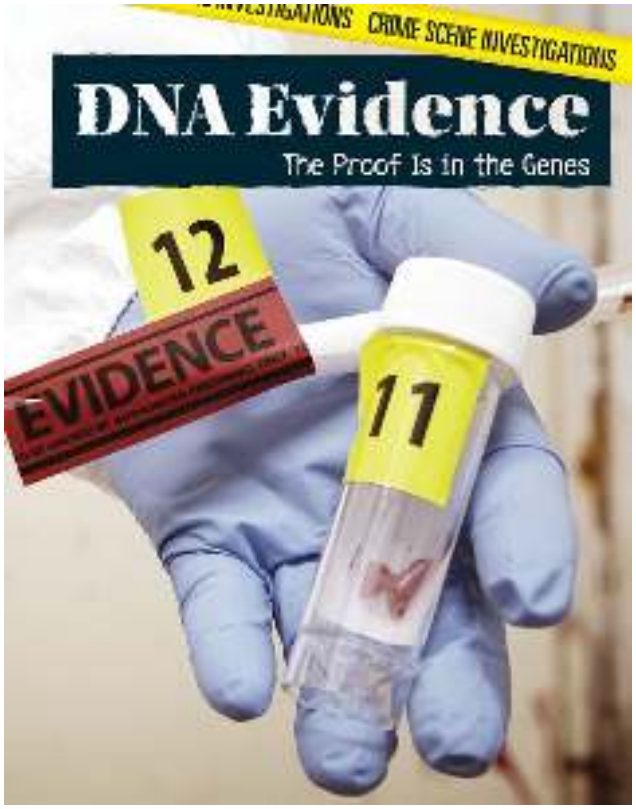
That's right. So is this unjust?

> "God is generous and delights in giving good things to his people (e.g. Psalm 37:4; Matthew 7:11). Having declared that humanity should marry and have many children and extolled its benefits, it stands to reason that God actively desires that those who seek marriage accomplish their goal."

I could agree with this statement, but then Derek added,

> "To suggest that God doesn't care about something he told people to do is callous and wrong."

Two things: (1) "God doesn't care" is a reaction of subjective perception, not a fact about God's character. (2) God obviously doesn't expect ALL men to pursue marriage, because some men don't ever have the chance. The issue of contention has more to do with generational heritability, both spiritual and carnal (e.g. DNA), and with our relationships with other people.



Sharkly responded to Jason's diatribe. [Edited for clarity.]

> "So if "God" the Father who doesn't owe us an inheritance (including me), gave you one…… and didn't give me one. Tough breaks???"
>
> Yes.
>
> But you also did get stuff others of us didn't get. "Why are you 6′ 4″ and I'm only 6′ 1″?", etc. We need to be content with what we have been given. Contentment with godliness is great gain.
>
> It sounds like your brother got even less. Yes, it sucks to be the one who gets less, but in eternity, many who > were last shall be first, and many who were first shall be last. God will reward us according to how we used what we were given, our stewardship. To whom much has been given, much will be expected.

>
> This life sucks much of the time, but it is only a test, to decide where you fit in eternity. Don't blow your test, just because somebody else seemingly is getting an easier life. They may very well mean going to hell for eternity. Just focus on glorifying God with what you do have and can do.
>
> If you weren't given as much, just having a good attitude about it, can be a major victory over selfish desires. Coveting is a sin, and we should work on ridding ourselves of it. We should learn to be able to be happy when others are blessed even though we are not.
>
> There isn't really any equality here in this life, but the Potter is free to make what He wants from the clay. Just try to be thankful for what things God did give you that he didn't give to others.
>
> I do sympathize, and I know it is tough, but that is how it is."

Derek responded to Sharkly.

> "But you also did get stuff others of us didn't get."
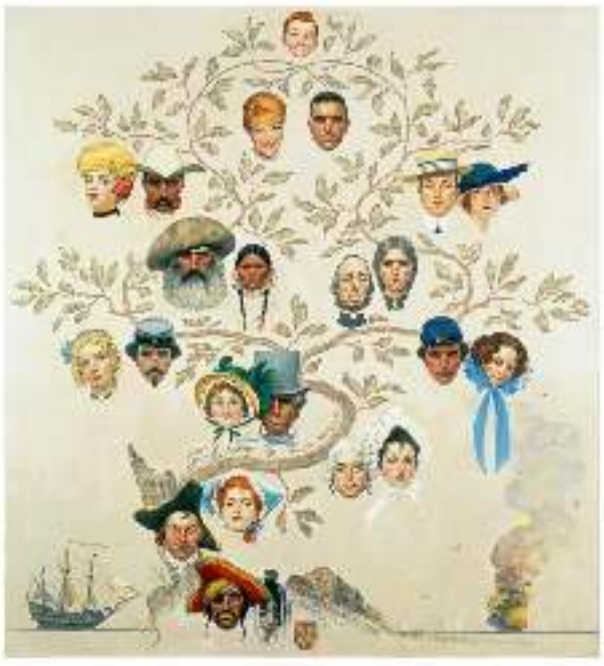
>
> "This is a dodge. It addresses the question "Will God give every man a wife?" to which the answer is "No". The OP question "Does God care if you get a wife?" has a different answer. God is neither vending machine nor cruel."

This is a counter-dodge, because Derek missed Sharkly's main point about contentment and stewardship. Instead, he assumed the claim was that God is a cruel vending machine, and he didn't offer the "different answer" he alluded to.

As you can see, this whole argument hinges on the definition of "just". It only becomes complicated because God's idea of "just" is a completely different animal than mankind's concept of justice. We demand our own concept of justice to be satisfied when we cannot see God's glory in it all. (This argument is what motivated me to study this matter further and write this essay.)



Family Tree, by Norman Rockwell, 1959.

Case Study 3 – Patrilineage and Generational Curses

In the Bible, God says the firstborn get twice as much as all the others. Yet the firstborn can abdicate / forfeit for any reason. Looking at the example of Jacob and Esau, we find that Esau forfeited his whole inheritance, and was kicked out of the covenant completely. Among the Twelve Patriarchs, Reuben forfeited by invading Jacob's harem. Simeon and Levi abdicated by an act of violence that would have justified reprisals on the family. Thus, Judah received the birthright — the double portion and the right to rule. (Ancient tradition says that the firstborn can abdicate for good reasons, too.)

But the buck stops somewhere. Somebody in the covenant has to step up and take the helm. God decides this, and sometimes His choices make no sense at all (like David as the youngest over his brothers). Yet being accountable to the tribe is expected under God's justice as well, so the outright oppression of the people by the ruler is wrong.

This much is clear in the scriptures, but our own experience of life is not like what is described in the Bible. Once you get to a certain age somewhere in mid-life, you'll begin to see that it is the children who receive that which the parents deserve. I covered this phenomena in my earlier studies of divorce and generational curses. According to the Bible, this is God's doing. (See Exodus 34:7; Numbers 14:18; Psalm 79:7-9; Psalm 109:13-15; Isaiah 65:6–7; Jeremiah 32:18.)

Furthermore, the scriptures are filled with stories of people who did wrong, but then God "relented" upon their repentance, such that the consequences came to rest on their children, rather than upon themselves. David, Solomon, Jehoash (2nd Kings 12; 2nd Chronicles 24:25), and Hezekiah are noteworthy examples.

In the Bible there is an apparent contradiction between two passages of scripture.

> [6] Then the Lord passed by in front of him and proclaimed, "The Lord, the Lord God, compassionate and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in faithfulness and truth; [7] who keeps faithfulness for thousands, who forgives wrongdoing, violation of His Law, and sin; yet He will by no means leave the guilty unpunished, inflicting the punishment of fathers on the children and on the grandchildren to the third and fourth generations."
>
> Exodus 34:6-7 (NASB)

> "Fathers shall not be put to death for their sons, nor shall sons be put to death for their fathers; everyone shall be put to death for his own sin alone."
>
> Deuteronomy 24:16 (NASB)

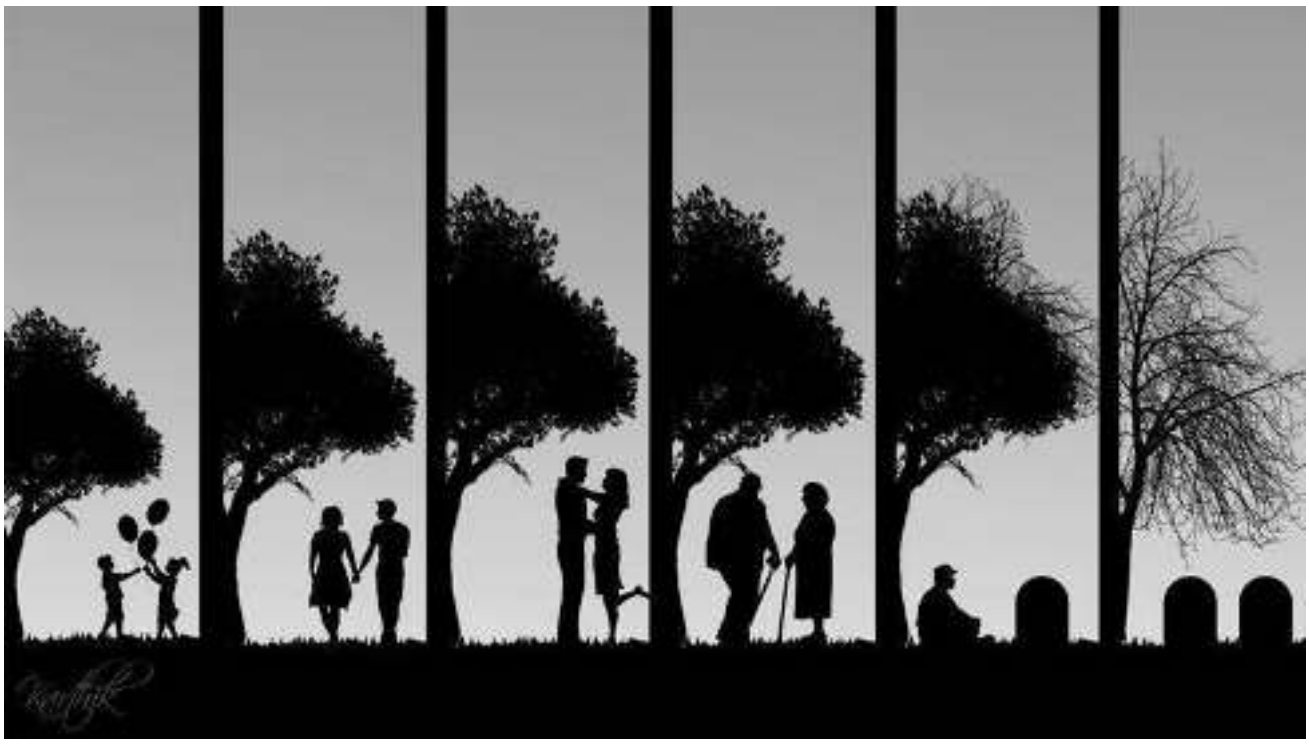
So which is it?



One interpretation of all this is that God has a different standard for divine justice than what he expects of men who execute justice. But even this explanation doesn't cover it, as this interesting passage makes things even more confusing.

> [1] Amaziah was twenty-five years old when he became king, and he reigned for twenty-nine years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Jehoaddan of Jerusalem. [2] He did what was right in the sight of the Lord, only not wholeheartedly. [3] Now it came about, as soon as the kingdom was firmly in his grasp, that he killed his servants who had killed his father the king. [4] However, he did not put their children to death, but did as it is written in the Law in the Book of Moses, which the Lord commanded, saying, "Fathers shall not be put to death for sons, nor sons be put to death for fathers; but each shall be put to death for his own sin."
>
> 2nd Chronicles 25:1-4 (NASB)

I could be misreading this, but it seems to be implied that if Amaziah had been serving God wholeheartedly, then he would have gone against the scriptural mandates and killed the descendants of his enemies. His adherence to the law in this case seems to have been a mistake, perhaps only because this was not done out of faith.

Anyhow, bearing the consequences of generational curses certainly does not strike me as being very just (nor most other people). Yet, God is just in all his ways, by definition. Certainly, God certainly has a much different concept of justice than we do.

Case Study 4 – Executive Clemency

Another facet about God's justice is that not only do ostensibly decent people (from a human perspective) get railroaded, but blatant criminals receive executive clemency. As a real world example of the latter context, we might view President Trump's last minute pardons as being in accordance with God's rendition of justice.

> "I respect a man who looks out for his associates, even if he and they are scumbags and criminals. Props to Trump, not necessarily for the specific people he pardoned, but because in the end he did take care of his people. And that is at least something."
>
> Tony Odarg: Trump's Latest Filthy, Though Necessary, Pardons (2020/12/24)

Odarg gets the point. In this case, Trump is an archetype of a God who looks after his own, and He does so according to His own good judgment, not ours, and certainly not that of his enemies.

Justice is Perceived Relative to Values and Ethics

In this section, I want to review values and ethics, because a thorough understanding of their origin, purpose, and function might help us gain a proper appreciation for God's justice.

Value is the regard that something is held to deserve; the importance, worth, or usefulness of something.

Value refers to those qualities of something, a piece of literature, or a jurisdictional ruling, etc. that make them worthwhile to one's self. If we feel our time reading is well spent, or that the ruling is "in our favor", then we can say that a book or a rule has value for us. If reading the book, or going to court, etc., was a complete waste of time, then we might say it has no value to us. Of course, this is a completely subjective evaluation. These same items may have great value to someone else.

Values are a collection of principles or standards of behavior that reflect one's judgement of what is important in life. In practice, one's values take the form of ideas and beliefs that an individual accepts to be predominantly important in life.

When a person can offer poignant words to express his/her values, then we say he is an articulate speaker. This trait is highly valued, and those who have it are highly respected, especially by those who share the same values, and even by those who don't.

Values are strongly influenced by one's race, gender, ethnicity, location, heritage, culture and religious background. These factors all play a role in how a person perceives cultural attitudes, ideas and beliefs. For example, someone from Taiwan can identify who is from (or has a background related to) China based on what they say. This difference in cultural perspective is why it is said that "A prophet is not accepted in his own land". (See Matthew 13:54-57; Mark 6:1-6; Luke 4:16-30; John 4:44.)

Ethics is a set of principles, especially ones relating to or affirming a specified group, field, or form of conduct. These moral principles reflect the shared values, such that the right thing to do is that which preserves the shared values of a community.

Morality is often couched in terms of ethics, whether something is "right" or "good" within the context of a certain ethical system. However, TRUE morality is based on the discernment of God's justice within a given context.

Culture is a collection of general ideas, customs, and social behavior of a particular people or society. The values and norms of a culture influence how those people within the society act and form decisions.

If one grew up in an exceedingly insulated culture, it is possible for him to be completely ignorant of his own value system, and unaware of other value systems that exist in other cultures. Upon first exposure to an alternate set of values in another culture, he would gain the impression that the other culture is bad in some way, simply because it does not perform well according to the value system to which he is accustomed. This is the basis of culture shock.

People have (or should have) mental models of reality that are coherent with their individual system of values. In most cases, our mental models are a product of our cultural lore and family of origin.

Popularly acclaimed literature (hereafter termed "lore", including history, the Bible, the Red Pill, and yes, the news and churchianity) has a significant impact on our thinking and our mental models of reality for many reasons.

- Lore conveys stories that are set in the past and which draws on historical knowledge.
- Lore is usually based on real settings and/or sometimes contain real historical persons, and therefore reflects the culture and society of the time period in which it was set.
- Lore forms the Archetypal Mythos of a culture.
- The values, ethics, traits, and concepts that define a culture are showcased through the supporting mythos of lore.
- Societies and generations are educated by lore by learning from mistakes and events that occurred in the past, and thus improves cooperation and collaboration as a community.
- Lore is a tool that assists in shaping the society and culture of the future by giving us examples of both the mistakes and victories of our ancestors. This informs us of things that occurred in the past that both should, and should not, be repeated, which we then learn from.

All these are good and proper facets of human sociology. However, there are certain elements of our Archetypal Mythos that fail to conform to God's prerogatives — that which would glorify His image and aid men in carrying out His will.

The point of this section is that all our words and thoughts are couched within the Archetypal mythos and language of culture. One reason we may see God as being unjust in certain instances is because the entire culture stresses values and ethics that are not in accordance with God's prerogatives, methods, and purposes. This is becoming more evident in the West as of late.

Whenever we are tempted to conclude that God is being unjust, perhaps it is only because we perceive that God doesn't follow the code of ethics that we are most comfortable with. Yet, we hardly ever venture to understand God's code of ethics. Instead, we simply dismiss it as being inscrutable and ineffable. And because it can only be understood by the heart and soul, perhaps it is to the undiscerning.

The blind leading the lame…

Case Study 5 – Democracy Attempts to Supersede God's Justice

When we are consternated by what we read the Bible and left utterly confused about the justice of God, the issue here is that we are seeing things through a Western perspective by default, and not the Ancient Near Eastern (ANE) traditions which form the context of the Bible.

Western concepts of justice are a mixture of the Greco-Roman tradition of law and reasoning and ancient Germanic Tribal notions of goddess worship — all pagan and largely anti-Christian. The organized church leadership lost their way very quickly after the Apostles died, and departed from the mystical ANE traditions well before they fell prey to Constantine's political seductions just two centuries later.

The Western brand of Christianity was an outright fraud committed by the Roman church hierarchy as the means to bringing the invading Germanic hordes into alliance. The church leadership knowingly perverted the Hebraic mystical thinking into something more Germanic so the tribes would swallow the leadership of the churches and accept the politicized power of church leaders.

In modern times, we have become obsessed with the notions of democracy and equality, thinking these principles to be right. In several posts, Ed Hurst has compared the Biblical Covenant under Patriarchy to Democracy, stating that the latter is flat out evil because it elevates the human concepts of fairness and equality (which are not outlined in the Bible, although they are typically read back into the Bible) above the authority of the Patriarch.

Now, we are left with the task of very openly and consciously, and sometimes quite forcefully, reintroducing the Biblical standards of justice against a massive underlayer of Western standards. A critical problem with uprooting Western ideology is that Western thinking is so very presumptuous about its own superiority. It's quite a chore helping people who want to follow Christ to make them recognize the value of humility within the hierarchy of a Covenant, as outlined in ANE lore.

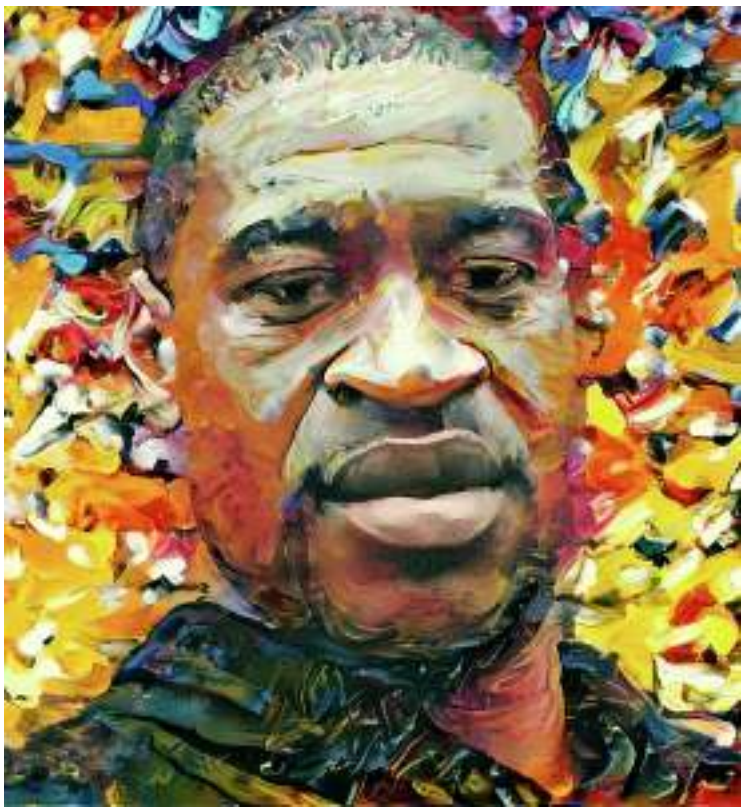
Case Study 6 – George Floyd

The American court system assumes that one is either innocent or guilty. Legal proceedings therefore attempt to establish either innocence or guilt, based on evidence.

At face value, Floyd had a long criminal history and he was a drug addict. Since he was not very intelligent and not able to hold down a job, he was not able to earn for himself, and so he turned to a life of crime. On the day of his death, he was high on fentanyl, passing counterfeit bills, and resisting arrest. All in all, it seems obvious that he was a guilty person.

In most other countries, Floyd would have been written off as a basket case and no one would bat an eye. To pose a comparison, in Taiwan, anyone who shows up in a court of law, either as a prosecutor or a defendant, is taken to be guilty. This is because they have mishandled their own affairs so badly that they require external arbitration, and have thereby become a burden to society. From a judicial standpoint, the overarching purpose of legal proceedings is to settle the matter and get them back to being functional members of society. But in America, the issue of guilt is more nuanced, because it is assumed that a specific person other than Floyd must have been responsible for his death, and that one or the other must be either innocent or guilty.



I cannot breath George Floyd RIP, digital artwork created by Yury Malkov (2020).

Recently, there were some new developments in the George Floyd case. Some eyewitnesses had some moving testimonies (link to BBC news article) which presented an underlying theme that Floyd was a product of his culture (viz. a victim of a system of institutionalized r@c!sm), and that his actions were entirely understandable and forgivable. One witness was the clerk in the convenience store where Floyd was before he was arrested. He said Floyd tried to buy some items using a counterfeit $100 bill, and he accepted the bill. (CNN reports it was a $20, and that he "attempted" to use it.) In his court testimony, the clerk said he felt very guilty about this because if he had not accepted Floyd's fake bill, then this whole situation would not have happened.

Ultimately, the responsibility for Floyd's death comes down to the issue of cause-and-effect.

- Did the store clerk tip his hand to an evil course of events when he accepted the fake bill, as he sincerely believes?
- Was the morbidly high level of fentanyl in Floyd's body responsible for his death?
- Did the stress arising from Floyd's arrest, combined with the cocktail of drugs in his body hasten his death?
- Did the long turbid history of interaction between Chauvin and Floyd contribute to Chauvin's harsh treatment of Floyd?

All of these facts present reasonable causes. Since there are multiple factors leading up to the event of his death, the legal proceedings are complicated. How then can justice be found in a court of law?

Furthermore, how we might interpret God's justice in this matter is a subject that no one wants to touch.

Spiritually, we are all Floydian, and we are all Chauvinistic to some degree.

Human paper chain with light and shadow on wood table.

Case Study 7 – The Sacrifice of Christ

If you think about it through the lens of western justice, the crucifixion of Christ was one of the most unjust events in the history of man. He was betrayed. He was subject to a mock trial in the middle of the night. He was subjected to false accusations. He was abandoned by His friends, rejected by His own people and even His own Father.

From another viewpoint, it could be said that this sentence went through democratic process, since the Pharisees, Sanhedrin, and a large mob of people, all called for Jesus to be crucified. No one "voted" for him to live.

But any way you look at this democratic injustice, it was God's will to sacrifice the innocent in order to redeem the guilty.

If God treated His own Son in this manner, and then declares it just, how can we ever claim that God is unjust whenever we don't get our own way, or when something happens to us that we feel we didn't deserve?

We want God to conform to our own concept of justice. We want certain desires to be satisfied, and most of all, we want to avoid suffering and sacrifice, especially for someone we feel is inferior to ourselves. But if God had adopted our own concept of justice, then all of us would be d@mned.

Conclusions

One recurrent theme concerning God's justice is that God loves and cares for his own, although this sometimes requires certain individuals to suffer and sacrifice in order for the flock to be well cared for.

Another recurring theme has something to do with God respecting the choices of people, and allowing them to bear the rewards or consequences of their decisions. Thus, it can be understood how a person, or a large number of people, can suffer and sacrifice as a result of an individual or a society (respectively) turning away from God and wander away from under His protection and care. (I believe the latter reason is why so many men are unable to find a decent wife in today's culture.) If the whole society wants to flirt with feminism and then the next few generations go through the meat market grinder as a consequence, then is it just to call God unjust for allowing such a result?

I have a theory that I'll call The Mob in the Crucible Effect (c.f. "frogs in the pot", or "crabs in the bucket"), which is based on the premise that we influence those around us, for better or for worse, and that it is the will of God for us to act as independent agents. We are all subject to the decisions and actions of others, especially those in positions of power (including power players in the SMP). From a wider perspective, this could be interpreted as just if we admit that God allows us to hurt and/or help one another according to our own choices. This would also explain generational curses, but it does seem unjust from the perspective of the subsequent generations, because children do not have any choice about which crucible they are born into in life.

True justice requires taking into account the whole picture. God alone knows the whole picture. It is the nature of living in fallen flesh that we cannot possibly see all that God sees. He has revealed a way of seeking peace with Him that includes leaving open the door for things we cannot comprehend in our flesh. Thus, He retains prerogatives that we must swallow sight unseen. That's part of the definition of "faith". Our only recourse is to repent of any participation we have in the matter, and ask God for forgiveness and clemency.

Yes, God's justice is mysterious and hard to "justify". Yes, some sons are disinherited for reasons God alone can comprehend. Yet, we must have faith that it is still just. We must be careful not to reject God's justice in this life simply because it does not match our own, preconceived, solipsistic notions of democratic "fairness". Otherwise, we will have nothing to show for what we could have claimed from the vast inheritance of faith.

If anyone could articulate a better distinction of the different concepts of God's "just-ness" versus human justice, feel free to articulate your thoughts below.

Related

- Σ Frame (Jack): Trump Appeals to Dignity, Not Racism (2016/3/7)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (2018/2/18)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Cultural Ethics, Patriarchy, Chivalry, and Christianity (2018/2/24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Happy wife, happy life should be sanctified wife, joyful and peaceful life (2020/4/11)
- Radix Fidem: Conversational Labor (2020/4/15)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Morphing Ethical System in the U.S. (2020/6/26)
- Do What's Right: Accountability 02 (2020/9/16)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Haidt's Ethical Foundations Theory (2020/11/4)
- Lexet Iustitia: No Justice (2020/12/13)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): On the Ethics of Teenage Marriage (2020/12/18)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Archetypal Therapy and Innate Personality Traits (2021/3/20)
- The Orthosphere (J.M. Smith): A Loser Can Repent But Not Repine (2023/7/11)

Ethical Issues Surrounding the Christian Conundrum

Novaseeker · 5 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

How does preselection, prioritizing sex, and fantasy affect how we approach the mating process?

Readership: Christian Men
Author's Note: The topic of this post received some input from Jack.
Length: 2,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

Introduction

The Christian Conundrum and the Christian Marriage Dilemma spelled out the difficult situation that Christian men find themselves today. In this post, I want to go over a few assumptions that have been put forth previously, in order to set the stage for the options that have been offered in previous posts listed here.

- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Constructing a Framework of Options (2021 March 15)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Strategies for the Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma (2021 March 17)
- Σ Frame (Jack): More on the Framework of Options (2021 March 22)

Without question, the most attractive element of a man is his attractiveness to other women

On the Ethics of Preselection

In a previous post, The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture (2021 February 8), I wrote about how women filter men in regard to their sexual acumen.

> "Jim also states, quite accurately, that there are almost no men that can balance the alpha and beta roles successfully, either before or after marriage. The few men who can be both are the rare exceptions, because they must be both in a way that is credible to a specific woman. Women's definition of credible is weighed heavily towards the sexual authority line of men, while the support/intimacy traits are merely an afterthought. Scoring well in the sexual authority area typically requires that a man has already proved himself to be credible to other specific women (pre-selection), and this necessarily requires a long list of pre-marital sexual conquests. Moreover, it should be obvious that the man is the first kind of man described above, those for > whom women will not impose rules for sex — that means he has broad sexual authority with women generally, and is in control, and therefore is the kind of man they want the dominant monkey sex from, and not the second kind of man who has to trade something (negotiate) for sex. Thus, the nature of the beast requires that the man's history should involve "conquests" and not only girlfriends."

On this point, Christian men who are married or who are looking to be married will ask themselves a practical question. Is having a sexual history (involving fornication/pre-marital sex) the main thing, or the only thing, that takes a man from the second group, and puts him in the first?

It's a good question. It gets back to the issue of what generates sexual authority.

I think the thing that takes a man from the second group, and puts him into the first, is him showing certain indicators that he is, in reality, in that group. There are a few pertinent indicators.

Pre-Selection — Women know that other women have picked him, so he must have a sexual pull. Examples of preselection are a lurid sexual history, or having a girlfriend or wife. Interestingly (and somewhat shockingly), PUAs have reported that wearing a wedding band, even though they are not married, will increase their lay ratios. Essentially what is happening in that scenario is that if a woman finds a man otherwise attractive herself, the wedding band acts as a "confirmation" that at least one woman found him good enough to commit to, which means that it's less likely that she is mistaken in her assessment of her attractiveness. Because women get so few bites at the reproductive apple, their sexual selection process has built-in "failsafes" so as to minimize the likelihood of her picking inferior men for mating, and one of the most powerful failsafes is the idea that another woman has already chosen this specific man as her "permanent" (if only for the time being) mate. The strength of this factor increases substantially if the woman can assess the relative attractiveness of the wife, and that the wife is attractive — the more attractive she is, the stronger the effect of preselection.

Assumed Pre-Selection — Women assume that other women have picked him, based on how he carries himself – charisma, confidence, detachment, swagger, outcome independence, proficiency in game, ease with women, he "just gets it", a certain kind of popularity (not like Duckie popularity), etc. — in other words, the various "indicia" which imply that a man has sexual authority, which all lead her to conclude that he does, even if she doesn't have actual knowledge of his exploits.

Critically, these things have to be indicators that register in the female psyche as true indicators. For example, if a guy sees a prostitute every week, he is getting regular sex, but that alone is not going to put him into the alpha group, because his overall behavior will generally not reflect that of a sexually confident man who radiates an abundance mentality when it comes to attractive women, which is the overall characteristic that these indicia point towards. A man who has abundant sexual access to attractive women (who are not on his payroll, so to speak), or one who can plausibly fake appearing that he does, is the man who generates the requisite indicia of sexual authority without the woman actually seeing preselection in action.

One would think that, considering how sex is the central focus of the culture, the litmus test of these indicators, as to whether they truly register with women, would be that the overall impression carries the implicit promise of him being thrilling in bed. But in reality, women generally report subpar experiences in bed with the most highly demanded men, often, yet still seek them out. It appears that the motivation isn't heightened sexual pleasure, per se (although there is heightened sexual excitement, at least initially for women), but rather the reflection on their own images that being associated with a highly-preselected man involves. The resulting sense of status in the SMP pecking order is deeply satisfying to women, quite apart from the actual quality of any sex that occurs.

Finally, for those men who are looking to "fake" the indicia of having the kind of abundant sexual access to attractive women that drives pre-selection, this raises all of the same issues that the extensive use of Game does, in terms of unsustainability and the like, in addition to the more problematic issue of projecting an artificial persona on an ongoing basis, and the pathology that this creates inside a person.

On the Ethics of Prioritizing Sex

In The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture (2021 February 8), I wrote that Prioritizing Sex upsets the MMP – and Marriage!

The issues surrounding the prioritization of sex, especially within a pre- or extra-marital context is obviously a thorny one for Christians, since such sexual activity is plainly immoral. The problem is that very few relationships today — Christian or otherwise — reach the stage of marriage without sex having occurred, often prominently, in the relationship, and in particular many of the most contented and long-term happy Christian couples have to varying degrees simply flouted the prohibition on pre-marital sex during their mate selection life phase.

That backdrop provides a grim context for Christians who would seek to engage in their own mate selection process while not flouting the sexual mores of Christianity. The context is grim precisely because, in this imbalanced culture, with its overemphasis on sex, we will of course struggle ourselves to find mates if we choose to personally de-prioritize sex. That goes without saying, or it should. It works to impede getting a woman to want to be with you because many women are both (1) highly skeptical of any man whom she is dating who is not incessantly at least trying to bed her (Is he really interested in me? Is he secretly gay and in denial? All normal guys at least try to get me to have sex, repeatedly…) and/or (2) not interested in marrying someone with whom "they have little sexual chemistry" or with whom "they are not on the same page sexually" and so on.

In this area, I experienced the same thing as Jack did — when I was chaste, women sensed it, did not like it, and backed off. My general lack of interest in pre-marital sex cost me several relationships in my early 20s. Women want to kick the tires sexually as much as men before they select a man as a mate — again, because sex and sexual satisfaction are at the core of human flourishing today, and, for women specifically, one of the main points of feminism was to increase women's sexual satisfaction by allowing them to pick mates based on sexual satisfaction, desire, and prowess, rather than economic need and other situational/contextual factors.

This isn't often spoken of openly, because it doesn't need to be — women "just get it" about the liberal sexuality contained in feminism, because it is visceral for them. Female sexual desire and its vindication lies at the very heart of the feminist enterprise, full stop, and this is so obvious to women in a visceral sense that it doesn't need to be stated openly — and men's cluelessness about it doesn't change that reality.

The core issue here is that the whole argument for the "Test Drive" is based on the prioritization of sex in the relationship. Given the context that sex is, by far, the most important thing, then it's imperative that they get this right – at any cost.

If they don't realize this before marriage, they invariably realize this afterwards. There are so many women who get unhappy in their marriages due to sex, even though they never insisted on having a porn star sex life prior to getting married. Then only later on, they decided that they wanted to have much better sex in their marriages. This can happen by means of comparison with the minority of women in her peer group who are in high sex, high attraction, high satisfaction marriages, and it can also happen by virtue of the popular culture, which is incessantly pumping out images of women in the 35-50 age range (the prime "divorce" age range) being super hot (at least as hot if not moreso than women 10-20 years younger), and having spectacular romantic and (implied) sex lives with fabulously attractive men, many of whom are young and desirable. Because marriage is impermanent in our society, the siren song of "better sex" never really ends, and it can upend a marriage at any time if a woman comes to the conclusion that she can do better — perhaps much better — sexually than her husband while still retaining a goodly amount of his husbandly elements (co-parenting, financial contributions and the like).

Christian morality that is orthodox offers a clear answer to this dilemma — which is to avoid extra marital sex, period, end of story. The fact that such a high percentage of long term happily married Christian couples did not do this, however, indicates that the actual impact of this approach is quite differential. Again, this is one of the areas where it is profitable spiritually to think of things from the perspective of suffering, in that it may very well be God's will for your romantic/sexual/marital life to fail at this point in history in that it may very well be that by following God's law in this area your romantic and sexual life is devastated … however, your reward will remain in the hereafter. Here as elsewhere, choices need to be made, with sober eyes as to the costs and benefits, from a temporal and eternal perspective, which can help place the reality of harsh suffering that many will have to endure in this area in the current culture into its proper context.

On the Ethics of Fantasy

As Jack reported earlier, the average age of first time sex is getting lower, and the average age of first time marriage is getting higher. One factor contributing to these trends is the reality that women want and expect rather satisfying sex today. To make matters more difficult, there is an element of fantasy which people find difficult to part with, especially women.

Men have an increased expectations surrounding sex because the sex-soaked culture, as well as pornography stokes their imaginations.

Women have increased expectations surrounding sex because they are able to engage in sexual liaisons with many men of their choice, including, critically, men who are more sexually exciting for women (regardless of the quality of the actual sex with them), both of which create a combination of a mentality of sexual gluttony coupled with an entitlement to the erections of the most sexually exciting men.

There has also been a shift in the viewership of porn. Women under-30 are indeed watching quite a lot of porn now, so porn is changing, and the men involved are changing too. The standard physical attractiveness for porn stars, both male and female, has increased substantially, especially on the male side. Mere nudity is no longer sufficient to arouse desire. Men must be in great shape, have defined muscles, a chiseled jaw, and thicker and longer endowments than the average to even qualify for the set in any porn that is even trying to reach women. This sets women's expectations for threshold sexual authority in the real world unrealistically high in a way that is similar to how some men can begin to find average girls less interesting visually due to having seen more 7+ girls naked by the time they are 20 than Genghis Khan himself did in a lifetime of historically notorious "seed spreading" activity.

Also, women are no longer interested in what we would call traditional porn, in which the plots are thin or nonexistent, acting is basic and limited, and the perspectives of the activity are all male-centric. Today's viewers, and particularly the rising component of female viewers, want to see true raw authentic passion on screen in vignettes which have more story context development than "traditional" porn, and those stories are from the female point of view and featuring common female fantasies rather than male ones. All of these changes make porn more appealing to women, obviously, but they also set expectations unreasonably high for women in the same way that I describe above that porn viewing can do for men, just in ways that are particular to women and their specific triggers, which are different from men's. The eventual result in both cases is an increased level of disappointment with the real thing.

Women are also known to have a penchant for homosexual porn — especially lesbian porn. Lesbian porn is by far the most popular form of porn for women viewers to search for, as indicated in the linked posts above, which is unsurprising given that this is, in fact, a common sexual fantasy for heterosexual women and therefore provides more of a "fantasy escape" for them, because it allows them to indulge in something on a fantasy level most of them never will in real life, and because it also suffers less from obvious "fake" tells that are common in straight porn that is aimed at male viewers and which are off-putting for women viewers, because the younger porn actresses of today are often practiced bisexuals and are not faking the lesbian sex that is taking place in the porn.

The gay male porn is also very attractive to women viewers for several reasons. First, gay porn typically features very physically attractive men — very defined muscles, "manscaped" grooming, masculine behavior types — gay men and women find similar things attractive in men. Second, it allows women to see two men, which stimulates their addiction to choice. Third, it also shows at least one man who is sexually submissive, and who is passionate about being submissive, which allows the woman viewer to alternate back and forth in her mind as she watches the scene, at times identifying with the submissive "female acting" man, and at times identifying with the dominant "masculine acting" man, which allows her to channel her sinful desire to dominate men into a form of sexual arousal and pleasure for herself, even if that primarily expresses itself in non-sexual ways in real life. Fourth, it vindicates women's arousal and desire at seeing a dominant/masculine man vanquish and dominate an inferior, weaker man who submits to him — it is the ultimate sexualized version of the endgame of "let's have you and him fight", which generates arousal in the woman for the man who is dominant, who wins the fight and makes the other man submit to him. Finally, because male sexual activity cannot happen without actual male arousal, which cannot be faked because it is external and visible, as are male orgasms, gay male porn sex also tends to be more genuine in what is portraying because it is basically impossible to fake, which appeals to women more than most of the porn that is aimed at straight men, which comes off as being very obviously fake to women viewers and therefore completely uninteresting and unsexy.

Thus, it is not surprising to see that the porn industry has changed in recent years. Porn has become more appealing to women — different camera angles, scenes constructed from the woman's perspective, much more attractive men being involved, and playing to female fantasies. Porn wanted more women viewers, so it started making porn that was more appealing to women and younger women have been watching. This is also a part of why younger women are so much more likely to be involved in the OASIS, by the way — it isn't as "out there" for them as for prior generations of women because they are already consumers of porn themselves, and it is natural for them to view porn as something that can be "constructed" from a point of view of either being appealing to women or to men (as they see in the porn they view themselves), which makes it easier to engage in the construction of a porn fantasy world tailored for male viewing on a personal OnlyFans site, for example, and to see this as normal, mainstream activity. In this regard, it is telling that so many very attractive young female "celebrities-because-hot" types of women, like Bella Thorne or countless women on Instagram, some of them with OnlyFans "add on" sites, as well as former actual legit actresses like Maitland Ward crossing over to porn, see no issue with blurring the line between legit and porn … because in their own experience porn is now legit and mainstream, because it isn't only something icky that loser men watch, but it's something they watch and get turned on by themselves.

The worm has turned, gentlemen.

On the Ethics of Admonishment

How can parents offer guidance and admonishment to their teenage children without being a hypocritical bigot?

While I was reading the comments under The Christian Conundrum (2021 March 1) and a few other posts this month, it was fascinating to me how some people insist that even though they themselves did Y to get X, nobody else should do Y, but should do Z … and don't worry if it doesn't lead to X because reasons. I mean I understand the perspective that you should do Z because anything other than Z is immoral, and therefore even if it doesn't lead to X but rather leads to D (divorce), at least you did Z and not Y. What I don't get is the overwhelming reluctance to admit that it was the doing of Y that played a large role in getting X, and that doing Z reduces your chances of X, but that you should do Z anyway and take your lumps, if that is what is in the cards for you.

There is no easy way to address this issue. It's possible to take the "older and wiser" approach that "if I had to do it over, I would have done it all differently", but is that really the case? Would these great marriages have even resulted if at all had things been done differently? It strains credulity.

It is therefore tricky as to how to engage in productive admonishment from the perspective of someone who has engaged in immoral acts that led to a happy marriage — that is, where the actual "bad fruits" of these sins are either absent entirely or so outweighed by positive elements that they appear immaterial from a human point of view. In fact, I would go further and say outright that I think it is extremely doubtful that this kind of admonishment can bear good fruit itself in this context, unless it comes from someone who has, in their own lives, experienced the bad results of taking a bad approach. For those who took the accomodationist approach with respect to extramarital sex and were rewarded with great marriages arising from that choice, I honestly do not think admonishing others will be of particular effect, outside of those who are otherwise under substantial influence of you for other reasons (such as children).

Conclusions

This is why, from my own perspective, the proper approach is to focus on the ethical nature of choice Z and the fact that the cookie may crumble in a bad way for you, but that Z is still the only moral choice. That is the fact of the matter. You can be an exception and find a great marriage by following the moral law, but that is highly exceptional in our cultural context. You may manage it, but you may not. You can follow the immoral choice and potentially end up in a better marriage, but you may also end up in a very damaged one and divorced anyway. You may follow the moral law and end up divorced, as happened to many of the participants here. What happens after you marry matters, of course, but a lot of the matter depends on whom you do actually marry, what the baseline connection is, in terms of creating a context in which the "what you do in the marriage" is playing itself out, and that is the point. Which is why I generally come back to the endpoint that you have to personally accept that, either way, God may very well have a life filled with sexual/relationship suffering in mind for you personally, and that you have to cultivate a mindset to accept this suffering with gratitude and love, to embrace it with the joy that comes from knowing that Christ is the man of sorrows par excellence and that he has conquered it, and will save you in the end if you stay with him, through the suffering he wishes you to bear in this life. In the current timeframe, for many Christian men that will be intense sexual and relationship suffering — it is what many of us are being called to do right now by God, without question. The challenge is to accept that with an attitude of grateful love and solidarity with Christ and joy in being able to share his own suffering to a small degree, always knowing that the endless joy of eternity awaits.

Given this context, no wonder American Christianity is struggling mightily with marriage. The issues are difficult and complex from a human perspective. From a moral perspective, the issue is clear. Humanly abiding by that clarity in this specific temporal context is a path of substantial suffering, and therein lies the rub. Most of us will do anything to avoid that, due to our human desire to avoid suffering. This is the key issue that underlies all of these discussions, it seems to me, and the key reason why there is so much resistance across the board.

Related

- Dalrock: The other side of hypergamy: fantasy of the forced choice. (2010 November 7)
- Dalrock: Addiction to divorce fantasy is also about power. (2010 November 15)
- Dalrock: A Detailed Description of Divorce Fantasy (2011 June 26)
- Radix Fidem: The Demon God of Sexual Fantasy (2015 March 22)
- Dalrock: Time and fantasy. (2017 February 10)

Red Pill Grifters

Lexet Blog · 7 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Do we need to vet the leaders of men's communities?

Readership: Men in general; Christian men;
Author's Note: I'll preface this article by saying it was drafted over a year ago, and has no relation to the recent article related to Roosh. I believe it is safe to say that both authors are consumers of his content, both pre and post conversion. As Adam pointed out, those who commented on the last post tend to be very skeptical. Whether or not that skepticism towards Roosh is warranted, that skepticism is necessary when dealing with personalities in the sphere, especially when it comes to monetized youtubers.

> Grift: Money made dishonestly, as in a swindle.

Introduction

If you are unfamiliar with the term "Grifter", just think of a swindler. They come out of nowhere, pretending to be your "friend", and making the familiar impression that they are "one of you". Many ask for your money, or sell you some product, promising you the world. They tend to sell themselves as a brand first, and then find their product. What sets the grifter apart from the traditional swindler is betrayal of their audience. The grifter peaks in fame amongst their audience, and then seeks to gain a larger audience by betraying those who made them big. Specifically, they moderate.

If you have been around the Manosphere long enough, then you have seen the grifters who come in every now and then to use the Red Pill™ as a marketing brand for their own purposes (fame and monetary gain). We have seen this with certain speakers, groups, and conventions over the last few years. I am sure those who were online back in the golden-age of the "Manosphere" know of many more examples.

For those who are younger, and who are familiar with YouTube culture, you are most likely familiar with grifters in many areas other than the Manosphere. A more mainstream example would be Glenn Beck. Glenn is a guy who went from HLN to Fox News, then to the Blaze, and is now running the second iteration of the Blaze. Every time he moved on, there was a shift in his political views, a shift in how he dressed, etc. He went from moderate/skeptic to edgy boy/"christian activist", to Mr. Never Trump, to Trump apologist, and then to whatever he is now. (I must confess I don't care to keep myself updated on his more recent personality changes.)

Coinciding with these changes, Beck seemed to have a major "health crisis" that takes place every 3-4 years. In 2010 he was telling his audience he would go blind because of macular dystrophy. His schtick back in 2014 was his super rare neurological disorders that could only be cured by a special chiropractor in Texas. It was purely coincidental that conservative talk radio programs began to advertise special, and incredibly dangerous, chiropractic treatments of the upper spine (NUCCA adjustments). Right on time with his pattern, and when he was trying to regain subscribers who fled after his anti-Trump rants, in 2017 his wife came down with a super rare nerve disorder.

FRAUDS IN THE RED PILL

There are several dangers when it comes to grifters in the Red Pill market. First, the target audience is young men who pretty much were not raised. The second is the credibility or authority of the speaker, which is often suspect, and mostly goes unnoticed by todays naïve youth. Third, online personalities build up loyal audiences only to betray them.

> "Some men believe in the red pill until they are uncomfortable with it." ~ Rollo Tomassi

I believe Rollo's insight has merit when it comes to regular people. But when it comes to personalities online, their discomfort over the Red Pill is a calculated decision that precedes a new conjob. When Red Pill types abandon the legitimacy of the Red Pill on forums such as YouTube, their motivation is always: (1) to gain a larger audience; or (2) to replace a dying audience with a new and growing audience. If personalities just shifted their focus back to something else, it would be one thing. What we see, however, are personalities who don't stand behind anything other than promoting themselves as some form of brand.

Many people who label themselves "conservative" or "traditional" do this as well. A few primary examples would be Baked Alaska's life, Laura Southern, Milo, Charlie Kirk, etc. Even Tim Pool went from being moderate-liberal and quasi-objective to being the guy who could be writing Sean Hannity's talking points.

It's classic branding and marketing, with roots in narcissism. The personality will do and say whatever they have to in order to stay relevant, grow their audience, and make money. I'm hesitant to believe many in the political arena and the Manosphere are truly Red Pilled.

They are fickle, and have no foundation.

How Fraudulent RP Forums/Channels Are Born

The step-by-step formula for using the Red Pill to monetize a blog or a YouTube channel goes like this:

1. Start off with a typical channel that focuses on 1 or 2 things. You know, men's fashion, beard trimming, and coffee.
2. Gain an audience with that niche market.
3. Once you reach your peak audience, start interacting more with your audience to establish rapport.
4. Slowly pivot the focus of your blog and commentary to Red Pill topics upon discovering this "amazing online community of young men".
5. Act as if all of these people are only asking you your opinion on Red Pill matters.

Presto! Now you are a "Red Pill" channel, and you may sell garbage to your viewers for high prices.

[image]
"If you don't buy my beard oil, the feminists win." …he says.

The Life Cycle of a Fraudulent Red Pill Forum

1. Start a forum to focus on a generic subject. Lets say you are a pastor and you and some elder buddies start a blog that focuses on gender roles.
2. Gain a following until your forums stops growing.
3. Open your forum up for interaction, Q&A. This should be done around the 1-2 year mark.
4. Slowly pivot onto RP topics.
5. Solely focus on RP topics.
6. Affiliate with others for economic opportunity and more growth.
7. Slowly pivot your focus away from "hard core" RP issues so you can get an even broader audience. Again, at the 1-2 year mark.
8. Reject the RP audience who refuses to follow you into the purple abyss.
9. Backtrack a little and align your "christian" ministry with a convention of pick up artists whose organizers brag about having over 1,000 conquests.

So who is real? Well, for most people, time will tell. Pay attention to whether people are selling a product, or are monetized in some way. Long term anonymous figures who aren't monetized would have to be a dedicated larper to be a con. Figures who are independently wealthy and are openly controversial are low risk, as the threat of being silenced doesn't matter to them. They tend to be ideological.

Some Red Flags to Look For

Sometimes it takes time to discern who is real, and who isn't. Time will obviously tell, but monitoring for red flags will surely help. Red flags, you ask? That's right. Watching for red flags is something you should do in every aspect of your life – it's not just for sifting through choices of women.

Here are a few red flags to watch out for.

- Are these guys repeating something someone else said? If they are, are they adding new commentary, or are they trying to pass this wisdom off as their own?
- How did their channels/forums grow? Did they start off providing good content on some other random hobby or way of life, only to switch to the RP to gain more followers?
- Do their alliances force them to compromise their core beliefs?
- Do they exhibit the same narcissistic traits as the women they tell you not to date? (Research narcissistic personality disorder.)
- Do they have a high-drama social media presence?
- What are they selling to you? Subscriptions, patreons, merchandise, Conferences that cost thousands?
- Do they complain about a marrying a prostitute while bragging about sleeping with hundreds of women?
- Are "holy men" associating and cooperating with behavior and a message that would be denounced in church?

Related

- Σ Frame (Lexet): MEN: Avoid the 21 Convention (2019 June 7)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Wallowing in the Red Pill (2020 January 29)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Frauds in Christ's Name (2020 October 12)

Revisiting the Beauty of Purity

Jack · 9 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

How does a woman's appearance change after illicit sex?

Readership: All; Men;

Introduction

A reader, Random Angeleno, asked a pertinent question.

> "A potential wife will never tell him if she did OnlyFans or other sex work. She will presumably have removed all that in her attempts to stick the landing. So how to check that out? Image searches? Phone snooping? Internet archive?"

A man could spend days searching for a woman's past online and still come up empty. But the proof is in the pudding. You can get a taste of her history from her appearance and mannerisms — IF you know what to look for.

I used to believe that only men were clueless about this, but that it was evident to females. But during a discussion with my wife, I learned that women are also completely unaware of how, and how much, a woman changes after she becomes sexually active.

This post takes a look at several photographs and memes that highlight how women change after defloration, heartbreak, and/or years of casual boinking. It should become apparent to the reader that purity is indeed more beautiful than sexperience.

Case Study 1: Haley Carr

-

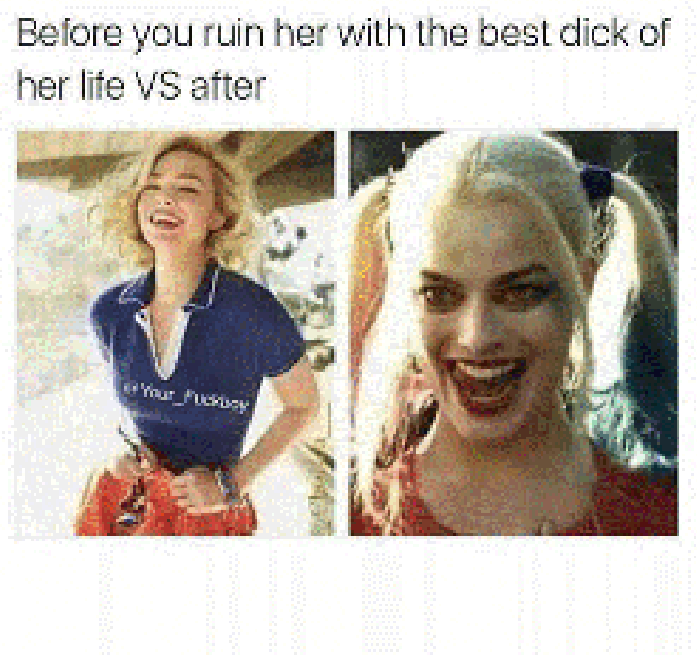
-
Before: Her eyes are bright. Her hair is clean. Her face glows with inner joy. She doesn't need makeup to feel beautiful. She's wearing attractive clothing. She's confident, humble, exuberant, and smiling.

After: Her eyes are dull and lifeless. Slut eye is setting in. She dyed her beautiful blonde hair black, and it's oily. Her face is grey and has a flat affect. Weirdly sculpted eyebrows. She's wearing eyeliner and mascara. Duck lips hide her shame and bitterness. She's wearing a revealing top. She's shifty, arrogant and proud. In short, she's moving up the ladder of $1ut indicators.

She posted these photos on social media, with a snide "lmaoo". Why should she be proud of this change? Why should she feel ashamed of her previous innocence?

Another symbolic aspect of this image is the lighting. In the before image, there is a beautiful, brightly lit chandelier. In the second image, there is a recessed light with the lightbulb missing and the wires hanging out of the socket. I'm sure this artistic detail is unintentional, but it represents very well the differing states of her body and soul.

Case Study 2: The Best D!ck Meme



I'm not sure if these images are real or staged, but nevertheless, they make an excellent pictorial comparison between innocence and depravity.

Update: Deti identified the model as Margot Robbie in both photos. The first one is her as a very young, very attractive woman. The second photo is Robbie as the DCEU character, Harley Quinn.

Before: High in confidence and self-esteem. Dressed attractively and appropriately. Genuinely joyful and fun-loving, vivacious, and bubbly. I could imagine her to be very classy and popular.

After: Her eyes are hard-set and determined. Heavy mascara, disheveled clothing, Consumed with feral desire. Self-abasement, demanding. Licking her lips with thoughts of c0ck conquest. I could imagine that she makes happily married women very insecure.

Case Study 3: Katie Katzmann

-
-

-

This is Katie Katzmann from the TV reality show, Labor of Love.

Her body has aged well, but her soul has seen corruption.

Before: She has a warm smile. She appears vivacious, attractive, sociable, popular, and personable. Her eyes show intelligence, curiosity, and hope. Her backward thrust shoulders indicate confidence and comfortability in her skin.

Intermediate: She's lost her hope and vitality, but she still clings to a semblance of self-esteem. Arms crossed in front of her body indicates her disdainment for life and her inability to trust. Her self-confidence has morphed into self-protection.

After: Self-esteem is gone, replaced by a painfully evident 1,000 c0ck stare. Hard set gaze shows her determination to attain control, and accompanied by a hint of cruelty. Clenched jaw shows entrenched anger and arrogance.

It is interesting that she apparently didn't want a baby until the latter stage of her development.

Case Study 4: Bella Thorne

I am sad to include Bella Thorne as a case study in this essay, because her defilement was forced upon her at a young age. For more details about this, please read this article from Collective Evolution: Popular American Actress shares that she was molested at Disney from ages 6 to 14 (2020 August 25).

-
-

-

Before: This girl is super cute! She is playful, curious, and trusting.

Intermediate: Bella's countenance shows the obvious deterioration of purity, but she also displays a beleaguered self-esteem that accompanies the violation of her free will. Her eyes are hollow, indicating withdrawal and mechanical distrust. Her hair is cared for, but fake, indicating that she's presenting an image that is not her true self. Not playful, not curious, and the sparkle of hope is gone.

After: Bella has reached an age of accountability and now faces the full brunt of the damages inflicted upon her. Thus, her true self has returned, but looking haggard and desperate. Her hair is disheveled, she has a repugnant nose ring, and her overall appearance conveys deep sadness and hopelessness. Yet, in spite of all this, I think her demise has not yet reached its nadir, because she still roils in the fake bravado claim that her "body is too much for Insta".

My word…

Case Study 5: Kim Kardashian

We've all seen that eye-popping image of Kim's @$$ on the cover of a magazine that, for some reason, we can't remember the name of anymore. But I didn't know how cute she was when she was younger.

Before: She's very sweet and feminine, and a little bit sensuous. Rather attractive, really. I could even believe she was kindhearted and conscientious. She seems like a girl you might want to marry – except that touch of sadness makes you wonder.

After: The first overall impression is striking. But when you look deeper, you can tell she's totally fake. She's had a nose job which gives her nostrils a V-hook. Botox lips, and something unnatural about her lower face and jaw, like she's clenched her teeth in rage for the last decade. Heavy mascara, and a salmon-hued, spray-on tan. There's a strange, vacant yet piercing look in her eyes which are glazed over with a 1KC stare. She's proud about being able to evade the wall for a few more years. The sadness has overtaken her, transforming her into a lost spirit hiding behind the mask. There's no way she would ever make a good wife now.

Case Study 6: The Doughnut Meme

Enuff said.

Conclusions

The deception of perception and the slow slide into depravity comes in slow gradations that are hardly noticeable from day to day, but over the years, one's true character shows through.

Haley Carr and Katie Katzman chose their defilements, presumably to revenge an ex, or assert their independence, if not simply for the fun of it all. Because they made the free choice to ride the carousel, they are ostensibly satisfied with their choices (so far).

Bella Thorne and Kim Kardashian have sought out socio-sexual liaisons, fame, and popularity as a substitute for sadness and emptiness inside, respectively. As long as these sources are propping up their needs for attention and identity, they will continue to cruise the fast lane.

God's grace is shown to them in the fact that they'll never know what blessings they could have had, if they had made different choices in life.

These case studies are noteworthy examples of a trend that has been happening on a society wide scale. People have been conditioned to believe that sexual experience and a worldly aura is equivalent to sexual authority. In other words, men and women alike tend to think that women with a figure and a notch count are more attractive than women characterized by purity and innocence.

NovaSeeker observed this growing phenomena as well.

> "The problem is that the "corrupted" look is now being spread as the "normal" look thanks to the power of social media, and as this continues to happen, we will see more blurring here, making it progressively harder to discern the tells, in a reliable way."

Novaseeker's reply to Random Angeleno described the brash acceptance of the "corrupted" look as desirable.

> "What's coming next is the normalization/mainstreaming of OnlyFans type activity by women. There are > married women who are active with sexual content on OnlyFans right now, like Ana Cheri. Also the fact that so many OnlyFans “content creators” use their actual real names and not fake names like porn actresses have almost always done indicates that these women don’t think they have anything to be ashamed of. And as more and more celebrities pile into the OnlyFans space, that will, in fact, happen.

>
> So that’s what’s next — because it’s already starting.”

The key phrase is “normalization/mainstreaming”.

But it’s worse than this. Modern women have the idea that purity and virginity is something to be ashamed of, which is more of a secular man’s perspective on men. The “pure look” is being denigrated as a laughingstock of childish naïvete and “immaturity” (e.g. Haley Carr’s snide remark), and the “corrupted look” is being typecast as sexual virility in the positive sense, and it is now taken to be a desirable expression of sexual authority. The negative sense of it indicating the first few shades of a gradual slide into perdition is not recognized, communicated, nor perceived.

If we could somehow continue the photo progression into the afterlife, we would see the corruption, darkness, desire for power, desperation, haughtiness, sadness, etc. continue to grow until the person is totally transformed into a demonic lost soul.

People don’t understand how dangerous this really is, because it is so prevalently cast as the glorified norm (glorified evil, that is). I wrote this post because we need to hone our discernment to be aware of this.

It is my hope that this photo essay might dispel this mistaken belief by contrasting the dead pan countenances resulting from illicit sex against the natural attractiveness of an innocent, vibrant, undefiled heart.

Know what to look for, men!

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: Our shared single white woman problem (2017 June 6)

Anglo Femlightenment

Novaseeker · 12 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Why is Feminism the worst in Anglo societies?

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post expounds on a comment I left under The Christian Conundrum (2021 March 1). Thanks goes to Jack, who suggested this topic and contributed to the content.

Introduction

Men who have traveled and lived extensively in non-Anglo countries can easily tell that something is particularly rotten about white Anglo culture when it comes to women.

Compared to the U.S. and the U.K., the European continent is just as "feminist", but the way that this plays out on the ground, and the way it looks in the culture, is much less extreme. Take for example Scandinavia, which ironically, people in the United States tend to think is extreme in its feminism compared to the Anglo world, and yet, this Nordic tribe has neither tax-on-income-based child support, nor chivalry.

In the period after 1700 something changed in Anglo culture that really elevated the status/esteem of women far above what exists even in other European cultures, and these developments have spread across the oceans to infect all other nations once colonized by Britain.

I believe the thing that changed after 1700 was the specific way that the Enlightenment played out in Anglo cultures as compared with other European countries. In general, the Enlightenment shifted social consciousness away from national identity, faith, community, and family and towards a range of "individual"-based ideals such as liberty, progress, toleration, the sovereignty of reason and the evidence of the senses as the primary sources of knowledge. Yet in Anglo countries, the "bite" of their individual strain of the Enlightenment has been substantially stronger.

So why do we see feminism in Anglo countries being so much more virulent than it is in continental European countries and elsewhere?

What is it that caused this divergence between the Anglo countries, on the one hand, and the Continental ones, on the other? Here, we'll examine a few defining characteristics of English culture that have factored into the equation.

King Henry VIII (1491-1547) broke with Catholicism and formed the Church of England in order to secure a divorce from his wife Catherine, that he might marry Anne Boleyn (pictured). Later, he banished Catherine and had Anne executed. He was married a total of six times.

The Rule of Law and Order

One thing that is unique about Anglo culture is its ethical foundation on the English Common Law. Anglo culture interprets individual morality through one's adherence to the law, such that if a person is law abiding, then he is considered to be a good person, whereas, those who don't follow the law are seen as bad people. This is so extreme that people who grew up in an English speaking culture can't even imagine any social structure that is based on anything else (like honor, power, authority structure, or tribal loyalties).

On the surface, this mirrors the Biblical concept of law, except that the Covenant Law of the Old Testament is based on the nature of God, not reason and the various human concepts of justice which came to the forefront during the Enlightenment.

Continental countries also had the rule of law … but it was a different approach to the development of legal principles and their understanding. Continental law — which after the French Revolution (1789-1799) came to be known as "Civil Law" after many countries adapted civil law codes based on the "Code Napoleon", which was, itself, a codification of the existing Roman legal principles, with significant modifications to remove aristocratic privileges — is largely based on the principles articulated by Roman law, as modified over time legislatively, and therefore it views legal questions often from very different perspectives than those taken by the common law that developed in England.

The Civil Law system is a systematic philosophical approach to the law — the rules are drawn up in the abstract based on a total system and codified into the civil code (and the other main "codes" that cover the various areas of the law in the civil law countries). The common law system, by contrast, is a system in which the legal rules were drawn up on an ad hoc basis over the course of centuries based on rulings of judges in specific disputes, and the principle of "judicial precedent" (which is much weaker in civil law countries).

Europe Map

Broadly speaking, Continental/Civil Law is more a codified, statutory regime based on status, standing, procedure, category and formalism, whereas the “common law” that developed in England was more based on an ad hoc, judge-determined regime that emphasized property owners, the delineation of rights and duties based on property ownership and familial and economic relationships, and legal rules developed over the course of time by judges sitting in judgment of specific disputes.

The impact of this different legal system — which all of the Anglo countries inherited from the United Kingdom — is that binding precedential legal rules can be made judicially, without the involvement of the legislature. In fact, this was the norm in the Common Law, such that unless a statute “trumped” a specific matter, courts followed judicial precedent in resolving legal disputes — and even in cases where a statute applied, the interpretation of that statute was in the purview of the court, which has a broad authority to do so as it wished, subject, again, to any binding judicial precedents of other, “higher”, courts in interpreting the same or similar statutes. In the civil law system, there is very little “court made law” — the courts interpret the laws that are in the civil and other legal codes, and in cases where it is difficult to apply the codes to the dispute in question, the court refers to commentaries from learned law professors for guidance, as well as legislative history — other legal rulings are reviewed as well, but they are not precedential and therefore not binding.

This difference means, in effect, that it was significantly easier to change legal rules in Anglo countries than in the Continental/Civil ones, because the judges could do it themselves — and they did, as we know. It is easier to find an activist judge (or a few of them) to make up a new legal rule (such as the right to abortion) than it is to convince a majority of a legislature to do it. As a result, activists in the Anglo countries were able to get much farther using the Anglo legal systems (ironically, especially outside the UK, because since the time of the founding of the Anglo colonies, the UK’s own legal system has trended strongly in a statutory direction, with parliament’s laws and statutory instruments playing a larger role, in relative terms, than in places like the United States).

King Charles II (1630-1685) acknowledged at least twelve illegitimate children by various mistresses.

Philosophical Traditions

While it is impossible to adequately compare and contrast Anglo and Continental philosophical tendencies in a couple of paragraphs, the following discussion is intended merely as a general framework — it overgeneralizes and is therefore subject to criticism on that basis. It also must be said at the outset that there are various ways of characterizing the relationship between the ideas in question — the following brief framework does not attempt to address any of those variances, and therefore remains subject to that criticism as well.

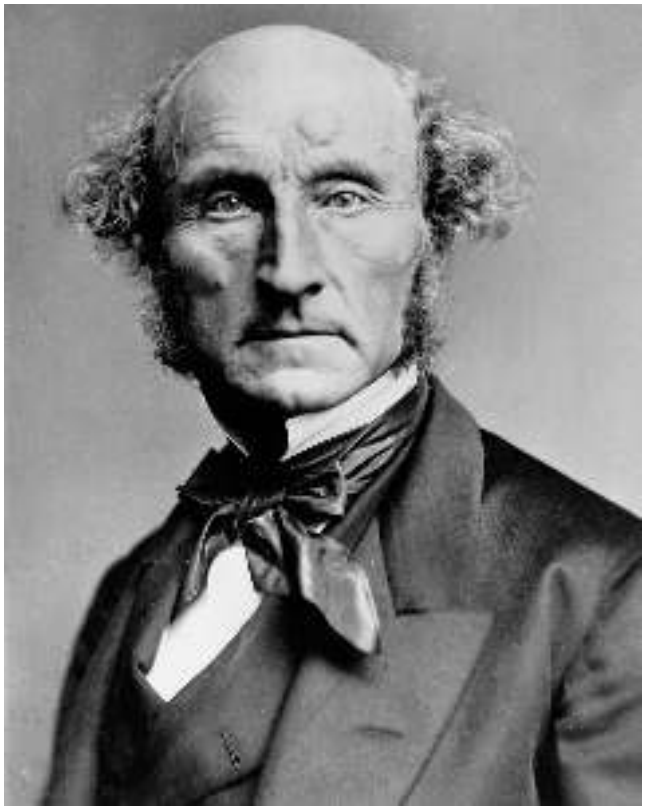
Subject to those caveats, in general, the Anglo countries and Continental ones developed different philosophical traditions as well — "analytical" in England, and "continental" elsewhere in Europe, with people like Hobbes and Locke in particular, thinking and writing things based on issues pertaining to individual rights — especially property rights — that nobody else in Europe was focused on to the same extent … and that nobody else in Europe liked, because continental European thinking was, certainly at the time of Locke, not nearly as open to the idea of all property owners having essentially equal rights, and specifically Locke's view that the right to property was not a matter of social contract or agreement but one which arose by right of nature and which inheres in the property owner as a matter of right, not social contract.

From the Anglo framework eventually came John Stuart Mill and the beginnings of "liberal" thought based on rights, and feminism came right along with it — Mill was really the first to articulate a feminist programme of women's liberation as such, but the ideas that underlie feminism have their basis in the ideas of people like Locke.



John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), English philosopher.

In comparison, Continental philosophy had a very different idea of fundamental natural equality, a la Rousseau who introduced the famous "tabula rasa", whereby natural humanity is regarded as more or less virtuous and equal, and only social conflict and bad relations create problems among naturally noble human beings. From this foundation, the path then merged with German philosophical trends from Feuerbach, to Hegel, to Marx, who was also a feminist but for very different reasons than Mill. Mill's ideas were based on rights and freedom — the idea that women and men should be free to participate equally in pursuing their rights and freedoms, and were more or less interchangeable, because his philosophy viewed humans essentially as bundles of rights which activated such rights to pursue freedoms and thereby enable their own flourishing. The Rousseau to Marx line differs from this in that it views humans as egalitarian and equal in an essential sense, but concerning the matters in which most Anglo thinkers tended to see as naturally-inherent individual rights, Rousseau's branch did not consider rights to be inherent to the human person by nature, but were rather a matter of social contract, and therefore were subject to the agreement of the society as a whole, and also therefore subject to modification and change by that same organ.

The impacts of these differences on the development of feminism were significant.

On the one hand the emphasis on naturally-inhering individual rights, which are not a matter of social contract or negotiation, positioned feminism in a very different vein in Anglo countries — essentially, it made feminism into a matter of vindicating what were described as a woman's natural rights, which were being unjustly withheld. In Continental countries, the matter of feminism was less a matter of individual rights, but more a matter of the larger society deciding about what roles men and women should be empowered to pursue. As such, the argumentation was therefore less based on individual rights (and seeing the consequences as essentially irrelevant to the discussion), but rather based on a more holistic approach to changes, consequences, and systemic alterations to accommodate the rise of women in various ways.

This is why, for example, the United States ended up with one of the most extremely permissive abortion regimes in the Western world at a time when it was still, by far, the most religious Western country, and also the country that had the largest percentage of its population being opposed to abortion. The reason is that individual rights are viewed as sacrosanct and inviolable (other than for paramount, pressing reasons), and therefore once abortion was construed as an individual right, there could be no compromise on the issue — it was always going to skew very heavily in favor of abortion, because Anglo countries are based on a philosophical tradition that is itself based on individual rights. In Continental countries, by contrast, abortion was legalized by statute virtually everywhere (but not everywhere at once), but with restrictions in almost every country that would be considered illegal in the United States — because the European countries see abortion as a matter of the social contract, and therefore as a matter of balancing interests by the society as a whole, and not as a matter of individual rights which are essentially not up for negotiation.

Princess Margaret was outgoing, vivacious, charismatic, and she had an 18-inch waist and vivid blue eyes. She was forced to postpone her wedding, and then later broke her engagement, leading her to become Alpha widowed. Although she later married another man, she was reputed to have had affairs with a large number of men during her lifetime, including Mick Jagger, Peter Sellers, and David Niven. The reason she broke off her first engagement was because her fiancée was divorced, but then she herself became divorced later in life.

The Influence of Religion

Stapled onto this was the fact that England was virtually 100% Protestant and the Continent was divided but mostly Catholic — Protestantism on the continent was dominant only in Switzerland, Holland, Scandinavia and Northern Germany, while the rest (all of Southern Europe, a good third of Germany, virtually all of France, all of Austria and the portion of Eastern and Southeastern Europe that was not Eastern Orthodox) remained Catholic until well after the French Revolution. As between Protestants and Catholics of that era, Catholics were more thoroughly accepting of the subordination of women, I think.

This is counterintuitive to the present crop of libertarian(ish) American Protestants who tend to see Catholics as worshipping Mary and thereby elevating women as a result of that devotional emphasis, but in reality, the Catholic countries (apart from post-Revolutionary France, which has been an anti-religious state since the 1790s) all subordinated women in family life, and socially to a substantial degree until recent history, generally more thoroughly than the Protestant ones did, perhaps because of the Marian cult itself, which provided a very limited and restricted view of female virtue as the exemplar which was always in one's face as a Catholic, coupled with the presence of large numbers of celibate nuns present everywhere Catholics lived until the 1970s.

This, taken together with the prominent importance of all-male priesthood, which had the sole right and ability to celebrate the liturgy and to remit sins, created overwhelmingly subordinate role models for women, and gave men unique power that was not had in Protestant societies without sacramental priesthood, liturgies, or confession, even though the office of preaching was everywhere limited to men. The Protestant idea of the "priesthood of all believers" likely served as another support for the elevated role of women, and even among the continental countries today, the ones that have a Protestant background generally have more characteristically "liberated" women than the Catholic ones do — as in Scandinavia and Holland.

Prince Harry and King Edward VIII both renounced their royal titles in order to marry divorcees, Meghan Markle and Wallis Simpson, respectively.

Love Knows No Rules

The British firm adherence to law, statesmanship, pomp, and decorum runs against human nature with respect to love and intersexual attraction.

This may explain why the British monarchy has always been rife with affairs, divorces, out-of-wedlock births, and in general, frustrations surrounding love and marriage. English kings disregarding their wives, and powerful queens disrespecting their husbands has been a recurring theme in English history ever since Henry VIII. This essay contains several photographs of British monarchs who either abused or suffered through their intersexual relationships under this regime. It might be argued that this is common among the upper class, but the British ruling families suffer from this malady to a much greater degree. This could be interpreted as a representation of the culture as a whole.

Prince Harry and Meghan Markle.

Epilogue

All of these things contributed to the rise of the "women are the superior sex" culture that began to lift its head in the Victorian era Anglo world. This really had no (and to this day does not have any) equivalent on the Continent — women were protected there, as they were everywhere, but the Anglos really, really pedestalized them. And I think this likely has the varied roots above that made Anglo places different: different legal system that allowed women's rights to be added to over time by courts (rather than schemes produced by legislatures), different philosophical concepts which emphasized inherent natural rights for all humans (rather than rights being based on a social, contract and therefore negotiated with all of society), and the fact that the Anglo world was culturally basically entirely Protestant.

Of course, today we are moving well beyond these precedents into a kind of terra incognita. The Anglo world itself is convulsing in the throes of a comprehensive revolution of its entire way of thinking that very well may result in overturning the entire "Anglo system" described above, and its replacement with something new, and more radical. However, at this time, it's useful to think about some of these differences when trying to understand just why things seem so much more off-kilter in these areas in the U.S. and the rest of the Anglo world than they do elsewhere on Earth, even in other Western societies.

Related

- Σ Frame: Protestant vs. Cathodox (2020 November 20)
- Σ Frame: The Amalgamation of Western Culture (2020 December 2)

- A Voice for Men: Have women ever been oppressed in the United States? (2021 March 3)
- Do What's Right: Genuine Faith is Unreasonable (2021 March 12) [Archive]
- Radix Fidem: What God Has in Mind (2021 April 11)

Commonalities of Successful Marriages

Jack · 14 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The basic elements that are so difficult to attain!

Readership: Christians interested in Marriage
Author's Note: This post is based on a comment I wrote under The Christian Conundrum (2021/3/1), and several other comments from readers under the same post. Links to the original comments are contained in the first word of the paragraph.
Length: 3,600 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Introduction

In this post, I want to review some information that has appeared on Σ Frame and Christianity and Masculinity over the last couple months. This information is a summary of certain traits/characteristics that, when taken together, serve to enhance the male-female relationship (i.e. marriage).

Cameron listed three commonalities with successful marriages (even those that started in sin and without proper screening or planning).

1. The marriage is open to (better if enthusiastic for) having children.
2. The woman wants to be (primarily) a wife and mother rather than a careerist.
3. There was evident attraction from the woman directed towards the man from the get-go. (i.e. Scott's axiom).

This mirrors conclusions I have made in the past, that marriage is (or should be) about sex (largely dependent on point 3, since women are "gatekeepers" of sex) and having children (point 1), and that it needs to have a Headship structure (implied in the combination of points 2 and 3). Also, point 2 requires the woman's decided rejection of any self-centered personal ambitions, such as the Feminist Life Script or riding the CC. Point 3 and early marriage discourages the latter.

This also explains why many non-Christians have successful marriages and many Christians do not, as I wrote about in The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021/2/26).

Deep Strength wrote a rejoinder at Christianity and Masculinity which elaborated on my comment. In What makes a Christian marriage successful? (2021/3/2), he added that these three points reflect the Biblical mandates in Genesis 1 and 2. He writes,

> In effect, God's commands of marriage as an earthly institution first with Adam and then as a helper with Eve are to:

1. Take dominion over all the earth
2. Multiply and fill the earth
3. Cultivate and tend to the garden
4. Obey God
5. Eve as a helper

> So what are men attracted to? Men are generally attracted to physical beauty (e.g. .6-.8 waist to hip ratio), healthy bodies, beauty, etc., which tend to indicate that she is fertile and has a good capacity to bear children — thus fulfilling God's command to multiply and fill the earth. Femininity is generally nurturing and kind, much like a good helper would be.
>
> So what are women attracted to? Women are generally attracted to PSALM — power, status, athleticism, looks (muscle, etc.), and money and similar things. Power and status? Those tend to correlate with taking dominion. Athleticism and looks/muscle? Those tend to be correlated with protecting and caring for things like the garden and her and her children. Money? Provisioning for her and her children. Masculine traits are helpful for improving all of these to varying degrees.
>
> To circle back around…
>
> These obviously look familiar to Cameron's and Jack's assessment of godly successful marriages.

1. Marriage is open and/or enthusiastic about having children. Check. Be fruitful and multiply.
2. The woman wants to be a wife and mother instead of a careerist. Check. Helper to her man (wife) and be fruitful and multiply (mother).

3. Evident sexual attraction. Check. Obviously, a man fulfilling God's mandate to take dominion, protect and provide for himself (and by extension a wife and children) and obey God (e.g. not put his wife on a pedestal — or as in Heartiste's rule, "You shall make your mission, not women, your priority!") is going to be attractive to women. Likewise, a woman that is generally beautiful and feminine will tend to best fulfill the "be fruitful and multiply" and "helper" commands and duties respectively.

These three points might seem like an oversimplified list, however, there are many other factors that work in conjunction with these three points to support the overall state of the union. The remainder of this post will examine these other factors.

Female Virginity is Important

Some readers might object that female virginity is not on the list, but actually, it is listed in the fine print. Virginity and chastity are important because a woman's N count sharply erodes point 3 and could affect point 1 (e.g. extended family, paternity fraud, etc.).

Concerning how it erodes point 3, Cameron shared a good post from Lori Alexander at the Transformed Wife, entitled, Virginity is a Patriarchal Concept? (2021/3/1). This post includes testimonials from women (and a few from men) about the effects that the lack of virginity/chastity has on a marriage. Here's one that expresses the basic damage to the soul that results from promiscuity:

> "It created an emotional separation basically from sex itself. It's more of just an act for me than a true connection."

The non-virgin wife risks losing the emotional connection inherent in marital sex. The implications of this disconnection are far reaching. This means that her desire for sex, and her enjoyment of sex, is completely dependent on her raw attraction to her husband.

Since ~80% of men cannot inspire raw attraction, this results in the non-virgin wife only being marginally attracted or not attracted at all to their beta hubby, and leads to a lack of sex, or cold fish "duty" sex given resentfully.

This is a problem because it ruins the bonding and the sense of shared purpose in marriage, and it resets the relationship in terms of female hypergamic-visceral-attraction and the resulting sexual competition.

One testimony emphasizes the lack of the bonding emotional connection in marriage.

> "It ruined my view of sex in my marriage for a long time. It affected how I saw my husband for a while too. I treated him like the horrible men from my past that I had no business being with in the first place."

Another testimony:

> "I would say this is my biggest regret in life. God created sex for husband and wife, and it isn't meant to be shared with anyone else. When you share it, it loses its exclusivity. You almost make yourself less 'special', if that makes sense."

Of course, it has to be "special" for her to enjoy it. Given the high rate of premarital sex, even within the church (65%), this explains the prevalence of starfish sex in marriage, which in turn, makes sex less 'special' for men.

And another:

> "Having the memories of past lovers. It would have been a satisfying accomplishment to have been a virgin on my wedding night, but because of fornication, I robbed myself of that."

Translation: "Having memories of past lovers." = A symptom of the Alpha Widow syndrome.
Translation: "Satisfying accomplishment" = to be able to experience the aforementioned emotional connection during sex.

Because of her exhilarating past experiences with Alpha Chad(s), she sees her husband as a common Beta Bob in comparison. She gave to another man (or men) what was rightfully only her husband's, and now she projects her resentment toward Alpha Chad, and her own shame, onto her husband.

This mental comparison, combined with the emotional triggers, and the inability to bond is the root of the Alpha Widow Syndrome.

This is why women with more sexperience always think they should have top quality men — because only those men can induce the raw attraction that would make sex without the emotional bonding a satisfying experience.

Another which alludes to the bonding experience:

> "Oh, man. I wish I had never done it before marriage. It's awful. Sometimes my past experiences are triggered while I am with my husband, and it's almost as if I'm letting someone else into our own private bedroom or our own private love and life."

Female fornication has the same physical, psychological, and spiritual effects as adultery. Instead of valuing marriage and family as a feminine sphere of vital influence, women who indulge in illicit sex come to resent marriage and value promiscuity and divorce instead. Instead of valuing their glorious role as mothers, women learn to despise the notion of having children and value abortion instead. All this is colloquially referred to as "women's liberation", but more truthfully, it should be called a "defilement rebellion".

So you see, female virginity is the lynchpin behind the female life path.

Strong Masculine Figures are Important

All truly successful relationships are primarily built on strong males who take ownership of their life, their wives, their future, and their problems. The foundation of the family is built on masculine strength — a strength which comes not from ego, but integrity, and an unwavering sense of self-worth. Strong men are what holds society together as the world continues to wreak havoc on its foundation.

The influence of a strong masculine male, whether he be a husband or a father, is huge in creating the ambient setting in which wives, sons, and daughters can thrive according to God's plan. Strong men are often not aware of how much their strength carries the day to overcome the challenges of life, regardless of their own faults. Therefore, those men who possess a well developed masculinity may take this ability for granted, while those who have not yet attained it may fail to recognize its importance and neglect pursuing this aspect of their self-development.

A strong male should be distinguished from a Red Pill male, although it is easy to confuse them as equivalent. RP helps wake up strong males to the proper approach to relationships; they just have to flush out the false ideas they were fed and learn how to properly take the reins of their life. However, weak males, no matter how much RP instruction they receive, will continue to struggle because the foundation of inner strength (which is the essence of masculinity) is not there.

Of course, all males have different innate personalities and strengths from their maker but various negative childhood and parental experiences as well as some unresolved issues or sins leave many men weak, discouraged and fearful of life, relationships, and their future. So, it is these men that need to be taken under the wings of strong males (especially Christian) to restore what the Devil has robbed them of in their past; then the RP truth can finally be leveraged by them. This is what needs to be understood by the strong males out there; that the weak males languish in the shadows, not knowing how to express their condition and issues (i.e., weakness and fears). They need an older brother or a father figure to confide in and who can help rebuild them. Then women will no longer be a fearful, intimidating, or controlling aspect of their lives. Men have to break free of their need of a woman before they can properly handle them. A man's inner strength (especially from God) is the foundation of this freedom.

With the culture at war against masculinity in general, and white males in particular, men like these are becoming fewer and scarcer today. Few men possess the confidence and skills necessary to push through adversity, and rule their wives and the earth, mainly due to lack of instruction, support, and guidance. This is why forums and ministries like Σ Frame are needed to help the many weak, confused, Christian men out there to be discipled into positive masculinity.

Parenting, Community, and Education are Important

A man can create his own tight knit family if he has a like-minded, cooperative wife, but a tight knit religious community helps immensely. Studies have shown that couples who attend church regularly have a lower incidence of adultery and divorce.

Aside from her own cultivated fear of God, one important factor that keeps women from defecting is a strong connection to her family and religious community — and the continual discernment that she loses this if she does the “girls gone wild” thing. She must be aware of the shame that would result from her actions in the family and community, even if the outside world cheers her on.

The effects of community were painfully evident in one study, Is there any honor or benefit to slut shaming an adulterous wife? (2018/11/24). The conclusions of this study found that there are many benefits and risks that come with this approach, but the effectiveness and end results of this approach would depend on the character of the individual, the social context, and the nature of their peer group as well.

If the peer group / public rejoined the husband’s shaming of the wife by reinforcing the social ostracization, then this may do wonders in bouncing the wayward wife back onto the straight and narrow. Women’s default setting is to always follow the herd.

On the other hand, if the peer group / public places blame on the husband and supports the wife’s promiscuity, then the husband is only bringing more shame and trouble upon himself.

Moreover, the larger social community surrounding the home can often times make or break a daughter and/or a wife, and by extension, a marriage. As you can imagine, involvement in a based social group and/or religious community has to be intentionally sought out, and establishing this connection may involve personal sacrifices.

The effects of parenting, community, and education have been covered extensively in many previous posts, most notably these.

- Σ Frame: A Girl Becomes a Lady (2017/12/26)
- Σ Frame: 13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters (2018/1/29)
- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (2018/6/26)
- Σ Frame: Washing Her Clean (2019/10/21)
- Σ Frame: Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020/2/14)
- Σ Frame: The need for Marriage Education (2020/5/15)
- Σ Frame: How other cultures deal with adultery (2020/8/5)
- Σ Frame: Parental Divorce Ruins Daughters’ Future Marital Commitment and Confidence (2021/2/24)

“Gestalt” is Important

Elspeth wrote her own list of qualifications of a good marriage, which further augments the three points mentioned above.

> “What -historically- makes for a good marriage is the same as it’s ever been. If I had to make a list:”

- Initial attraction!
- Shared faith and values.
- A lack of previous sexual partners to compare to is very helpful and God’s best.
- Regular sex as much as is possible (patient practice will make perfect).
- Treat each other with love as defined in Scripture (1st Corinthians 13, Philippians 4).
- The wife is to submit to and respect her husband.
- The husband is to love his wife, lead her in Christ, and get to know his wife so that he can dwell with her according to knowledge.
- Commitment to vows; nobody leaves.

> “If there’s a formula, that’s it. We do these things, but it’s not OUR formula. It’s God’s outline.
>
> It’s not necessarily easy all the time, but we’re Christians. Even when we don’t execute everything perfectly, we don’t have to do it alone. And there should really be a broad agreement that a commitment to Christ invites supernatural power to [help us] rise above our lower instincts.
>
> But no one can make their spouse do these things. We can only control ourselves.”

There's an important idea lurking behind Elspeth's formula which many readers are probably not aware of, and that is the concept of "the whole package deal". We have to accept that life is dynamic, that people are individuals, and that we all have unique desires, spiritual needs, and life-purposes. We have to accept this dynamic and find a way to juggle all the variables and cofactors such that we can make the marriage "work" according to God's proscribed order. It is not an easy task.

This phenomenon exists everywhere you look. Here are several noteworthy examples.

- In philosophy, this concept is referred to as holism.
- In government, it is alluded to in the political axiom, "United we stand, divided we fall."
- In social theory, it is called collective strength.
- In psychology, Gestalt therapy applies this principle to give individuals a healthy and holistic concept of one's self.
- Mathematics describes this quality in the axiom, "The whole is greater than the sum of the parts".
- In physics, this concept is addressed by what is called superposition.
- Engineering management takes this approach in Systems Thinking.
- Additionally, the most successful business enterprises commonly have divisions of labor which address specialized tasks, and these divisions are skillfully coordinated by the management to reach the desired productivity.
- The same idea is utilized in engineering design, where many light, flimsy struts can be connected to form a very sturdy and rigid body.
- In a previous post, God's Concept of Justice (2021/4/2), I referred to this phenomena as The Mob in the Crucible Effect (c.f. "frogs in the pot", or "crabs in the bucket"), which is based on the premise that we influence those around us, for better or for worse, and that it is the will of God for us to act as independent agents.

Moreover, we are all subject to the decisions and actions of others, especially those in positions of power (including power players in the SMP).

He wants the fruit, she wants the bread!

These Missives are not Unique to Christianity

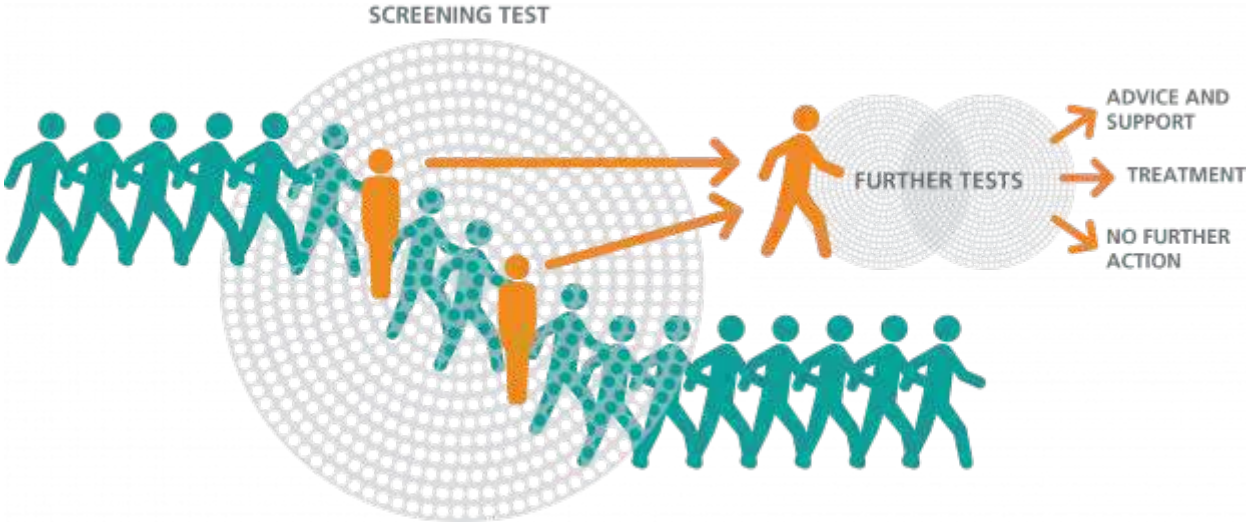
Concerning the central missives of a Christian marriage, NovaSeeker and I have both pointed out that these missives are not unique to Christianity.

These missives also have something else in common: None of them is a specifically Christian screen.

This was the point of two previous posts, The Christian Conundrum (2021/3/1) and The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021/2/26).

Cameron pointed out that, because of the Natural Law (alluded to by St. Paul in Romans and formalized in some of the high churches e.g. Catholicism), there's overlap between Christian marriage (the traditional kind) and natural/pagan marriage.

There doesn't appear to be a substantial correlation between the degree of success / happiness seen in nominally Christian marriages, on the one hand, and the degree of Christian screening / Christian behavior prior to marriage, on the other. That's just the stark reality which has been made clear through several testimonies that have been discussed in the comments over the last couple months.



We cannot disagree that there are benefits to screening people prior to marriage. The point is that the explicitly Christian screen doesn't seem to make a difference, and it isn't what made certain marriages successful.

In fact, there are any number of screens that one could use for a successful secular marriage. Commenters have brought up a number of examples of long term secular marriages of varying degrees of happiness that have few or no children, women with very high powered careers who aren't "sweet" and are, in fact, women who would be described as "careerists" by almost everyone here. It is not hard to find marriages like this, with no divorces occurring.

We may be apt to say, "Well that doesn't mean they are happy!" That's right, but it does mean that they are not divorced, unlike any number of "Christian"-screened marriages between people who "followed the Christian rules".

There is a pervasive notion that Christianity, or faith in God, or what have you, is like a Swiss army knife that can handle every contingency. We want to think that if we can just "get it right", or be more obedient, or more spiritually mature, or more masculine, or more aware of some other mysterious thing that we haven't identified yet, then Christianity can make all of our sufferings vanish into thin air. There has to be a silver bullet, there has to be a better screen, something we are missing, something that is the real answer…"

There isn't. There is only Christ. This is the inscrutable aspect of God's justice. Sure, every reasonable person understands that probability exists, including free will, agency, and other wild cards, on top of the obvious cause-and-effect going on, but we cannot negotiate with God. We can never say, "I did A, B, and C… (or didn't do X, Y, and Z), so I am fully within my rights to expect whatever I want from God", even if it's something we believe God wants us to have. This is reminiscent of a prosperity gospel.

It's like NovaSeeker said,

> "Again, and I will not apologize for repeating myself here, because it seems needed: that is the point of several past posts. The point is the dilemma that Christians specifically face. I don't think that Jack or I would deny that there are various kinds of secular criteria one can apply (and perhaps that one should apply) which will lead to different degrees of marital success, depending on what kind of marriage you want to have, where "success" is defined at least as "not divorced" and right on up to "teenagers in love, happy in perpetuity"."

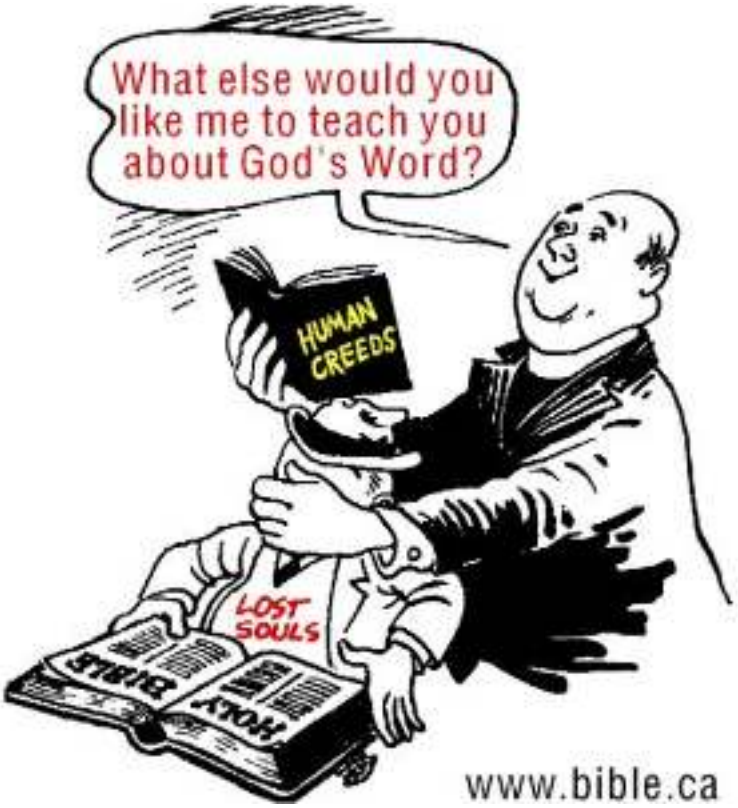
BUT…

> "Your wife can be n = 0, from a religious family without divorce, no obvious red flags and … at some stage she just flips the script and decides she finally agrees with the cultural messaging, after all."

So when Red Pill Christian guys in happy marriages look at destroyed marriages and tell the broken husband he didn't vet well enough, this makes Scott want to throttle their necks.

Churches are in total denial about this conundrum, as we have covered before. Pastors and elders won't address the issue because they are afraid to condemn a common social norm that violates doctrine.

As long as churchianity remains the prevailing substitute for Christianity, this will not change. Churchianity, being a model based ultimately on humanism, and by extension utilitarianism and expediency, cannot, because of its very nature, confront or solve conundrums that pit the tenets of the faith against the ways of the world and the flesh. Because it fears [wo]man more than it fears God, the world and the flesh win any confrontation by default.



Conclusions

In conclusion, there is a misconception about what "Christian" truly means in regard to dating and marriage. To wit, we have the notion that a Christian marriage requires two chaste, professing Christians being properly married in a certain kind of church, complete with public vows and golden rings and the rubber stamps of the church and state. You may choose between lilies or roses, and rice or confetti…

But all these things are rather superficial. In reality, the collection of factors I listed above (Cameron's 3 points with my extensions) is what truly constitutes a "Christian" marriage (or what should be touted as a Christian marriage).

Here, the adjective "Christian" in front of "marriage" carries the meaning that it glorifies God, fulfills His purposes for marriage, and establishes a sanctified home environment that is conducive to the emotional security and spiritual vitality of the family.

This is what determines whether the marriage is successful, and not the mere absence of divorce.

This is more in line with what Christianity is about, and not white dresses and pipe organs.

All this can be summarized in the following Axiom.

Σ Frame Axiom 30 (Jack): Headship is God's prescription for marriage.
Corollary A to Axiom 30 (Jack): A Headship marriage is a Christian Marriage by definition, even when the spouses are not nominally Christian.
Corollary B to Axiom 30 (Jack): Any marriage that does not fit either the Headship or Tingly Respect structures is doomed to dysfunction and/or failure.
Corollary C to Axiom 30 (Jack): When Headship is not taught and modeled, the transition into married life becomes much more of a shock and a hardship than it has to be.
Corollary D to Axiom 30 (DeepStrength, Jack): The implementation of Headship is confusing and difficult because of the Church's incongruence between the converged doctrinal position of Headship and Headship in action (i.e. practiced as a form of moral authority and masculine sexual authority).

Related

- Biblical Gender Roles: What does a successful Christian marriage look like? (2015/1/19)
- Σ Frame: How is illicit sex related to one's spiritual state? (2019/5/22)
- Σ Frame: How much is Virginity worth? (2019/9/6)
- Σ Frame: Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020/8/14)
- Σ Frame: Coram Mundo vs. Coram Deo (2020/9/7)
- Christianity and Masculinity: What makes a Christian marriage successful? (2021/3/2)

Fantasy in Makeup and Photography

Jack · 16 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Have we forgotten what real women look like?

Readership: Men;

Introduction

Instagram and other photo-based websites have become an online fantasy photo album bordering on cosplay.

Photo modification has become so prevalent, that it is obvious that fantasy is routinely preferred over reality – all for the sake of competing in the SMP. It's gotten to the point where women are ashamed to display their true appearance in photos without some readjustments and filters.

This post will take a look at the effects of posing, makeup, lighting, and image retouching (i.e. "photo shopping") that has become commonplace. For this purpose, I've collected a total of 20 "before and after" photographs from around the web, which will reveal the nature of the transformation.

Concerning the models…

- Some of the models are from dating websites.
- Some of the models are famous actors.
- Some of the models are porn stars.

Concerning the image treatment…

- Some "after" images have cosmetic make up added.
- Some "after" images have studio lighting.
- Some "after" images have photo editing.
- Some "after" images have some combination of the above.

You may notice that some women actually look better without any cosmetic makeup. In general, younger women and naturally beautiful women look better without makeup, while older women and naturally fugly women look better with makeup added.

Those who need a little "extra help", face the enticing temptation to enter the world of fantasy, so that they can look good enough to be eaten by the sexually voracious.

Features that are commonly modified through photo editing include the following.

- Add highlights and shadow.
- Enhance color contrast.
- Remove signs of aging (e.g. cellulite, crow's feet, jowls, nasolabial folds, pockmarks, sags, wrinkles…).
- Improve signs of fertility (e.g. add color to the cheeks, eyes and hair, enhance WHR, increase breast size, smoothen the skin…).
- Enhance fitness (e.g. reduce bulges and folds of flab, emphasize muscular definition…).
- Amplify vitality (e.g. bigger, fuller hair, "glowing" skin, larger eyes with enhanced cosmetic accentuation around the eyes…).
- Add a glorified gloss to the presentation (e.g. studio lighting, shaved/waxed and oiled skin, shiny hair…).
- Create the illusion of intimacy and sexual access (e.g. smiling, open mouth, raised chin, less clothing and more skin…).

- Removing certain details of humanity.

Concerning the last item on the list, this is one of the most common photo editing treatments. The details which are addressed are worth considering, because some details are uniquely endearing, while others create an impression of common debasement which is the natural result of spiritual dissipation (i.e. sin). It is interesting because many details that are endearing are often removed (e.g. freckles, a wisp of hair, crooked teeth, epicanthic folds for Native Americans, Asians, and Irish…), while certain indicators of debasement are left remaining (e.g. dyed hair, haughtiness, hollow eyes, tattoos…).

A Collage Comparison of Images

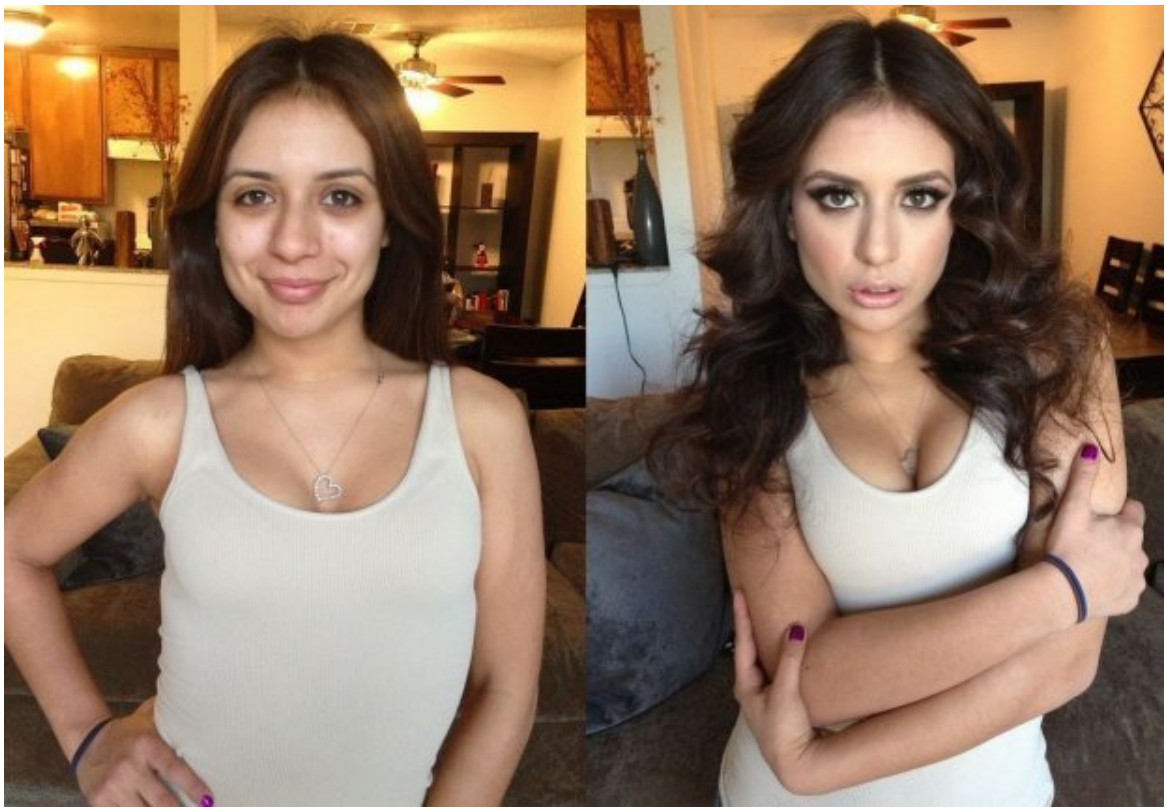
Here are a few images using makeup only.

1.

2.

3.

4.



5.

6.

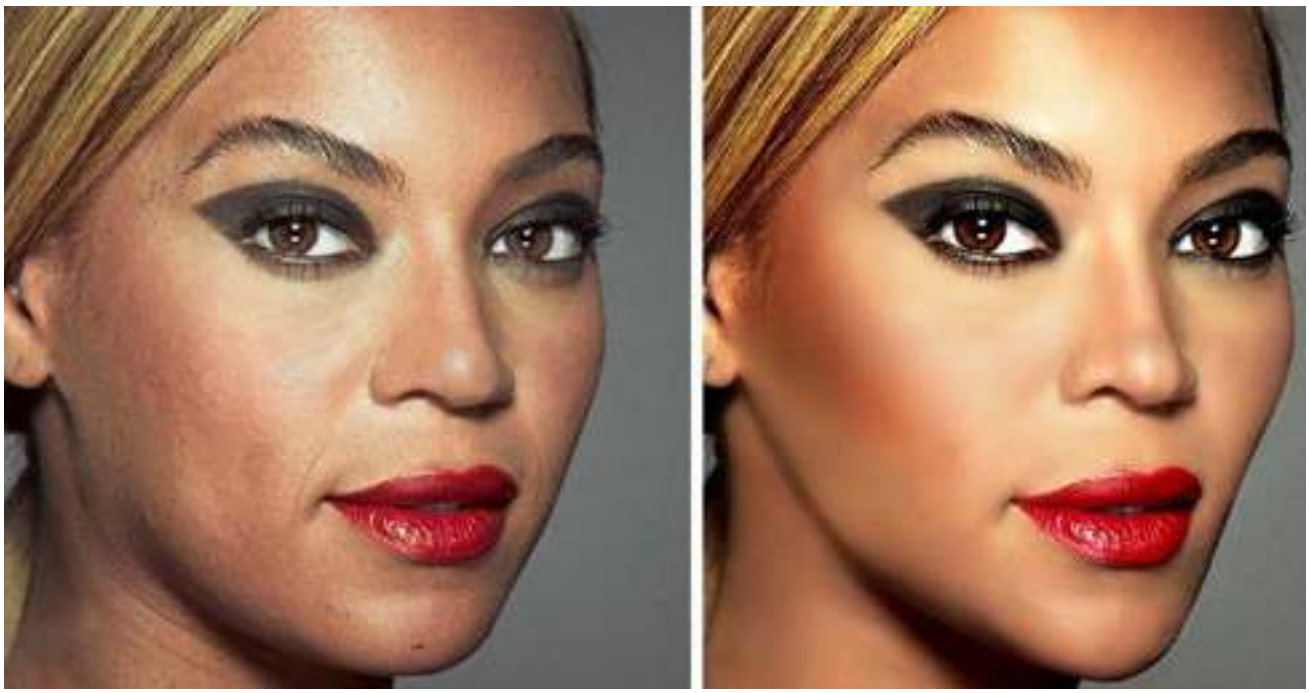
7.

Here is one with cosmetic makeup, hair color, and studio lighting.

8.

Here is what photo editing can do.

9.



10.

Here are two examples with studio lighting and photo editing.

11.

12.

When cosmetic makeup, studio lighting, and photo editing are used in combination, the result is a total transformation that looks nothing like the real person.

13.

14.

15.

16.

17.

18.

19.

20.

Conclusions

When comparing the above images, you may notice that from among the different types of image modification, cosmetic makeup is largely responsible for the drastic transformation of facial images. Photo editing is used most effectively to transform surfaces, facial structure, and physical form. Studio lighting has the least effect of all on the form of appearance, except that it can glorify the final presentation.

As you can see, the overall goal of posing, lighting, and photo enhancement is to glorify the outward appearance through an assortment of image treatments.

Women have forgotten that true beauty originates in the heart.

> [3] Do not let your public presentation be merely attention getting — painting your face like a clown, wearing skimpy clothing, or photo shopping yourself into a caricature of the real you — [4] rather let it be the hidden person of the heart, with the incorruptible beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is very precious in the sight of God. [5] For in this manner, in former times, the holy women who trusted in God also adorned themselves, being submissive to their own husbands, [6] as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord, whose daughters you are if you show natural affection to your husband and are not alpha widowed with any insecurities.
>
> 1st Peter 3:3-6 (NΣFV)

Upon reviewing a number of these treatments in the photos above, the impressions gained here may help "recalibrate" your estimations of women's actual appearance and true level of attractiveness.

If it looks too good to be true, it is probably fantasy.

In fact, let's call it what it is — fantasy cosplay with an emphasis on sexual semiotics.

Men, know what to look for!

Related

- China SMACK: Chinese Girls With & Without Their Makeup (2010 October 5)
- Radix Fidem: The Demon God of Sexual Fantasy (2015 March 22)
- Σ Frame: Opal's Femsplaination of Cakeface (2018 June 17)
- Σ Frame: Revisiting the Beauty of Purity (2021 April 9)

Deciphering Concepts of Attraction

Novaseeker · 19 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

How to interpret the femstertalk about attraction.

Readership: Christian Men
Author's Note: This topic came out of a discussion I had with Cameron under the post, The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021 February 26). The statements in quotes below are from Cameron.
Length: 3,650 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

> "It is a most quirky irony that in a quest to comprehend herself, a woman will speak constantly. It is by merit of solipsism and this constant need for emotional self-discovery that every woman considers herself an expert on herself, and as such, is inclined to talk at great length about herself. In terms of attraction, there is nothing a woman loves more than for a newly acquainted man to tell her something she considers true about herself. A man who seems to know a woman on the emotional level without that woman having to express herself exudes his own enchanting intrigue. By being able to communicate with women on this level, man creates his presence within her solipsistic world. "He just, like, totally gets me!"
>
> This is oft mistaken for narcissism, but should she lack narcissism, such a quality still persists. For not only is self-obsession a product of narcissism, but likewise a product of solipsism. Therefore, being that solipsism is intrinsic to women, self-obsession is an unavoidable by-product. Indeed, a woman's most profound hobby is that of her self-interest, chiefly, the catalogued history of emotions she has experienced, how they shape who she is, and which ones are desirable enough to be pursued for re-creation."
>
> Illimitable Men: A Most Solipsistic Nature (2015 September 4)

Women use "attractive" and "attraction" differently from how men do

From a woman's perspective, her own attractiveness is not a question, because she gets instant feedback from men, in person, all the time. Women note carefully how many men are noticing, and what kinds of men notice (i.e., how attractive the men are). They know whether they are generally attractive and generally what level of man that "ends" or "lessens" at as well. Keenly. So there isn't any need to write about it. They do write a lot about how to beautify themselves, but they don't write a lot about what is attractive to men in that visual sense (unless they are writing to complain about it, a la "unrealistic beauty standards"), because they know very well what that is.

Therefore, when they say such and such will attract a man, they don't mean that. They mean "keep his interest once I have caught his eye" or "make him pick me and not thot-girl", etc.

Just like when they list qualities they like about men they mention everything but his being 6'2″, buff, athletic and so on … that's all "understood". It's the other stuff they write about — stuff that's "in addition to" what to them is obvious.

Physical and Verbal Attraction Cues and Miscommunication

> "You don't think women chronically overestimate their attractiveness? I do. I keep seeing these fatties that squeeze into the same tiny clothes that cute girls do with their fat rolls spilling out."

A woman may dress in certain clothes for various reasons, but a woman certainly knows how many men are checking her out, at all times and in all situations. They are very much aware of the smallest details about their appearance, and how that impacts their reception of male attention. They also know when it starts to die down, and they will do backflips to keep it coming (but only for certain men, of course). Many, many, many women have written about this, how they noticed at some point that they were drawing fewer eyes, and they dislike it intensely. They know.

A woman who is overweight and dresses modestly won't get any sexual attention from men at all. But squeezing into a dress that is too tight will get her some feedback she likes. You can rest assured of that. To her, that is better than getting no feedback.

You can easily identify the women who don't care about feedback because they dress down, way down, so as not to entice any men to look at them — it's easily done, and you see women doing it. For example, some married women who dress down in public are usually happily married and therefore don't need any attention from other men. If they dress up, it's to be respectable and classy, not to be meretricious.

Women are Indirect Communicators

> "If you're right about these female-to-male translations, then most men have no hope for understanding."

It's not that hard to interpret the behavior and the verbalizations, but it's just that with women you always have to pay at least as much attention, if not more, to what is NOT being said as to what IS being said. Women are indirect communicators and tend to use subtle, coded language.

Even a woman who appears to be speaking sincerely, for a woman, will generally not be speaking nearly as directly and openly as a man typically would be in the same situation — that is, there is still stuff being transmitted between the lines even when it seems like it's a straightforward and direct communication. A lot of information, social context, emotional nuances, and so on, is being communicated by what they don't specifically say — by what they leave out — and by specifically how they choose to phrase things (often much more specifically considered than many men, who can tend to be blunt hammers themselves verbally and therefore can easily miss the verbal cues coming from women and what they mean).

You have to always ask, "What is not being expressly said here but is important?", because that is a significant part of what she is communicating. She expects you to "just get it" because women "just get" what they are not saying, or not saying explicitly, and they prefer not to say it explicitly for various reasons which they are not prone to reveal. Asking her about it does no good either. It will only show her what an ignoramus you are (in her eyes) and lower her estimation of you.

Case Study 1 — The Corporate Environment

I worked in an all-female work group for around 15 years. I was the only guy in a group that varied in size between 12-15 women. I became very well versed in indirect communication. At some point it became entertaining watching them all interact at, say, a staff meeting, trying to say things without actually saying them, directly, watching them read the other women's faces as they were talking to determine whether and how much they needed to get more or less direct in what they were saying, without getting so direct that it would step on someone's toes. It was like watching an improvised verbal ballet, really …. and all utterly alien to the way men generally communicate or receive communication from others.

Are women intentionally being deceptive?

> "Women encrypt communication by using codewords, different word meanings, and they leave things out. Do women do this to deceive men? Or to deceive other women?"

Women don't communicate this way with the intention to deceive, no. The intention is normally to say things in such a way as to not be so direct as to (1) offend someone, (2) place themselves in a bad light, (3) trigger an openly adverse reaction.

Men tend to be more direct and plain spoken and we tend to prefer that, other than in very specific settings with a set decorum that demands something else. Women tend to not be like that, and often tend to find men's preferred style of communication to be rude.

In general, women are pleasure oriented, and they will do their best to stay in that mode unless/until one of the following happens.

- Their anger, shame, fear, or indignation surpasses their tolerance threshold.
- It becomes clear that they will not get what they want most.

Within the context of a relationship, however, women will break out of pleasure mode in order to implement various games and schemes for specific purposes (e.g. attention, control, etc.).

Of course women lie just like men do — they can and do intentionally deceive. But the indirect communication style, in my own experience, isn't done to deceive but to communicate things in a way that doesn't cause feathers to ruffle.

Do Women really think B!tchiness is Attractive???

Cameron linked to this post at the Daily Mail: Why Men Love B!tches (2021 February 24). He asked,

> "Are women actually fooled into thinking men find bitchiness attractive and leave submissive women? Does she believe these things or does she know it's BS? Besides the point of wanting to sell books for cash."

The author is not wrong in saying that men love b!tches, but you just have to translate her words from Femstertalk to understand what she specifically means.

She is using the word "attractive" differently from how men think of attraction.

She is using the word "attraction" to mean "does the guy pay attention to me, do what I want, pursue me, and stay interested?" — that is how she is defining "attraction".

She is not defining "attraction" as "allure".

She is defining "attraction" as "keeping a guy who is visually attracted to me, already, interested in me over a longer period of time, chasing me, doing what I want, and on my terms".

In all scenarios she is describing, she is using "attractive" as women tend to use it. It assumes physical/visual attraction is already present, so it's a given that the guy is already visually/physically attracted in the sense we mean of "allured". Women consider this to be so obvious that it doesn't need to be mentioned.

She isn't claiming (or at least doesn't seem to be) that a woman who is not visually/physically attractive to a man can make a man physically attracted to her anyway by treating him like a b!tch.

Her concept of attraction might be translated into manspeak as "dominate" or "control", and there is an element of female pedestalization required here on his part. She is talking about how to reel men in and keep them hooked as beta orbiters. The motive is for her to maintain a steady stream of ego stoking attention.

So when women talk about a woman's "attractiveness" (to men), they are talking about other qualities that can get the desired effect of keeping the man interested in her and not some other woman. The issue she is addressing is not whether he is expressing interest, but rather the female challenge of retaining a mans continual interest — an issue that arises when women give such men easy sex. So when you read articles or hear statements with this kind of viewpoint, you can safely assume that she's already given away the milk for free. (Another red flag for vetting?)

It should be noted that women's behavior has an impact on men differentially depending on the SMV rank of the man and how physically attractive the woman is. Of course, her approach will only work with men who consider the woman in question to be exceptional and not easily replaced. So her strategy doesn't work with the top men who are most desired by women — because a woman who acts like this will get a "next", since there is always an equally attractive replacement standing right behind her, waiting her turn to try to snag him. In order for this to work with a highly desired man, the woman has to be very, very attractive herself, and most women like that got the memo about bitchiness long before this book was written, for the obvious reasons she states here.

Her approach, though, works with the thirsty betas. Jack wrote about this problem in Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020 August 14). It's a sin because it hands power over to the woman and sets up an inverted relational structure. But her idea is that it is not a great strategy to try to reel men in with easy sex, because that gives men what they want for a low price, and then his sexual desire cannot be leveraged for her own purposes. That's a cruel viewpoint, but it's also true.

So her strategy becomes, don't give them sex, be challenging, be difficult. Be like a 5-par hole on the golf course — challenging, time-consuming, lots of arguments, tests, and traps … but there's always the pin flag at the end giving him a glimmer of hope. That's what she's talking about, and it's very effective if the woman is attractive enough to the man, and the man is thirsty enough, so that she can pull it off. If she does, she frames up the relationship totally in her own frame, with the man qualifying for her, and so it's a total, 100% dominance win for her.

Now, whether that makes her happy in the long term is something else. But it is a very effective approach for snagging and bagging a thirsty beta male into a relationship in which she can dominate him psycho-sexually pretty reliably, provided that he desires her enough (i.e., sees her as hard to replace) for her to pull it off.

Case Study 2 — Tomi Lahren

Last August, Tomi Lahren rather famously posted a video tirade about men, which pretty much evidenced how "difficult" a date she would be.

Does this really make her much less attractive to most men? Not necessarily, depending on what the men's options are. As we discussed:

> "It was evident that Tomi Lahren's beau that dumped her complained about her being difficult – she complained about men's complaints about her "difficulty" (and her friends')."

Again, the string-along B!tch approach works with thirsty betas, but not with guys who have a lot of options. Guys who have a lot of options will "next" a b!tchy woman, as I said. Lahren isn't dating thirsty betas, she's trying for NFL players. So she gets nexted. Makes sense to me. A thirsty beta would not next Tomi Lahren for acting b!tchy.

You'd think that she would eventually wake up and try her hand at a different strategy. But like most women of this variety, she'll keep pounding away until she meets her fated destiny with the Wall.

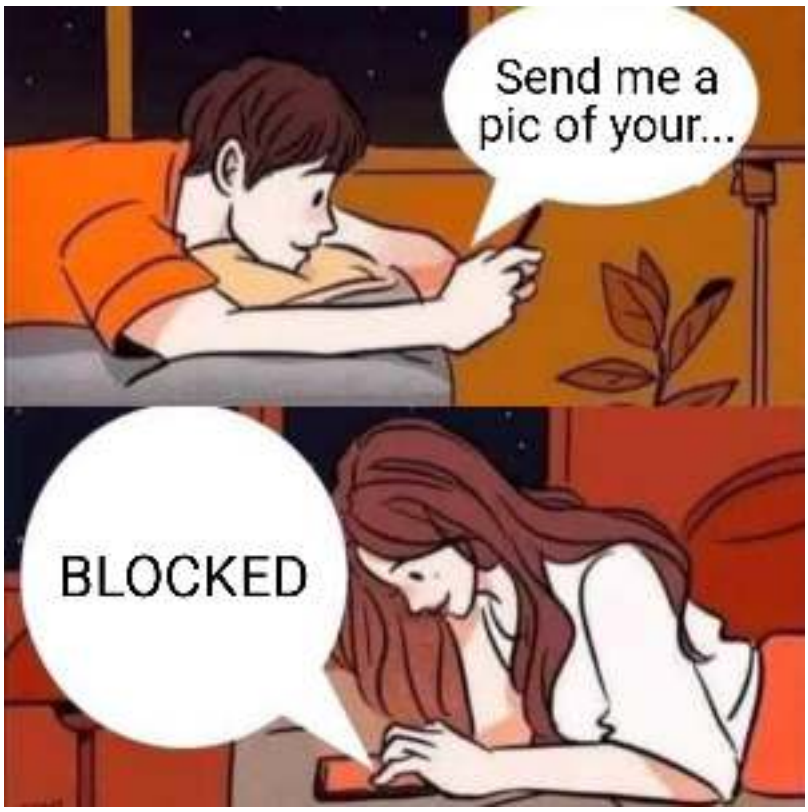
What is all the hype about #met00 and "Marital Rape"?

> "I bet for a lot of them it's like being a prostitute to have sex with a man they're not attracted to. How twisted is that?"

It doesn't seem that twisted to me, actually.

If men are not attracted to some degree, sex can't physically happen. So we also have an attraction test. It's just that ours is broader because sperm is cheap, eggs are expensive, etc.

For a woman to feel violated if she is not attracted makes sense, because she feels like the sex is extraneous to her — it is the man using her for his pleasure. She is not enjoying it, but he is. So that conjures up the idea of prostitution or rape, because that is what is happening in those scenarios, too. So it does make sense to me that a woman would experience it that way. But it's hard for men to relate because it's an experience a man can't have (apart from gay rape, like in prisons) because heterosexual sex can't happen without male arousal.



> "[Women never consider] the cost of them settling because they think men owe them marriage…"

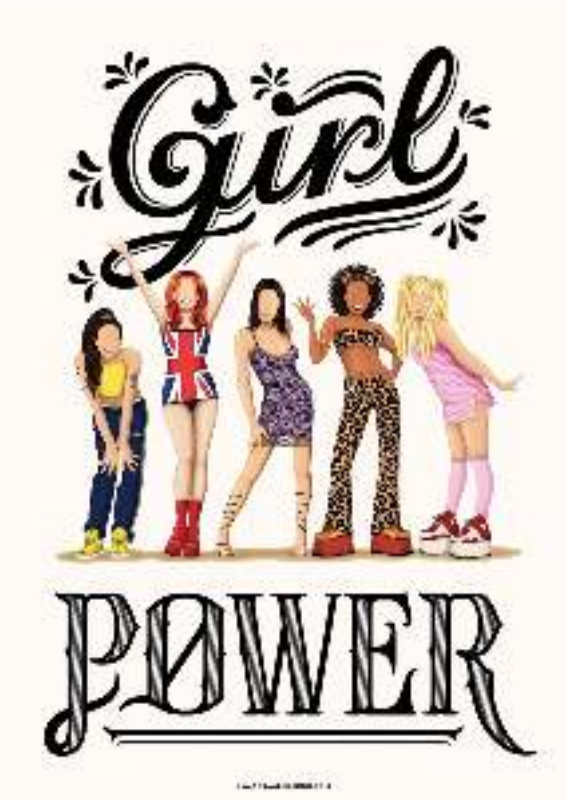
Keep in mind that women have a harder marital equation to solve than we do. Men are solving for attractiveness and agreeableness, generally — Christians add more into the mix, but as we know, many times those are added in after the fact, so to speak. It isn't that hard to find both in one woman because men are attracted to more women than vice versa. Men's larger problem is finding such a woman who is, in turn, attracted to them, but that's a different issue altogether.

Women are looking for two different kinds of men, really — genes men and family men. There are a few men who solve both parts of that equation (and these men are in the highest demand, for obvious reasons), but most are primarily one or the other (or none). And it's only the first type that generates a sexual desire in women that is equivalent to the male sexual desire for women. So almost all women, if they want to marry and have children (recognizing as most of them do that this is still the best way to do that), will marry guys that they aren't that attracted to sexually — they have no other option. Not settling sexually means kids outside of marriage, or no kids.

Attraction is not a choice — they can't make themselves be highly sexually attracted to the family type men in the way they are attracted to the genes type men. They aren't made that way. This doesn't mean that women marry men to whom they aren't attracted at all sexually … that's only rarely the case. However, it does mean that most marriages are not ones where the woman is very sexually attracted to the husband in the way she was to guys she "just dated" when she wasn't screening for husband qualities.

So, really, the best case for most women is that they marry a family type man to whom they are at least somewhat attracted sexually, so that the sex doesn't feel like a violation, even if it isn't very exciting for them.

So you can't really separate out the forensic side of it from the other side because most women just have bad options because of how their attraction works.



The Bottom Line is about Control

> "I think this woman just wrote these crap books for girlpower reasons."

Sure, it's all about power in relationships — that's clear. It's about getting the man to do what she wants.

> "Yeah, [the author of the B!tch article] wants to encourage women to be something we're not attracted to. WTF?"

She's talking about power, not "ideal mates". She's talking about how to get, and keep, "hand" in a relationship, from the women's perspective. That's why the father wants it for his daughter (she is in control then, not whatever worthless loser male happens to marry his precious princess), but not for his wife (he doesn't want to be subject to her control/hand). It's about viewing relationships through the lens of power.

A man can be attracted to a woman who is in power over him, or to a woman who is not. That is not what she is really talking about. What she is talking about is taking a man who finds her attractive and using that to control him, and thereby control the relationship.

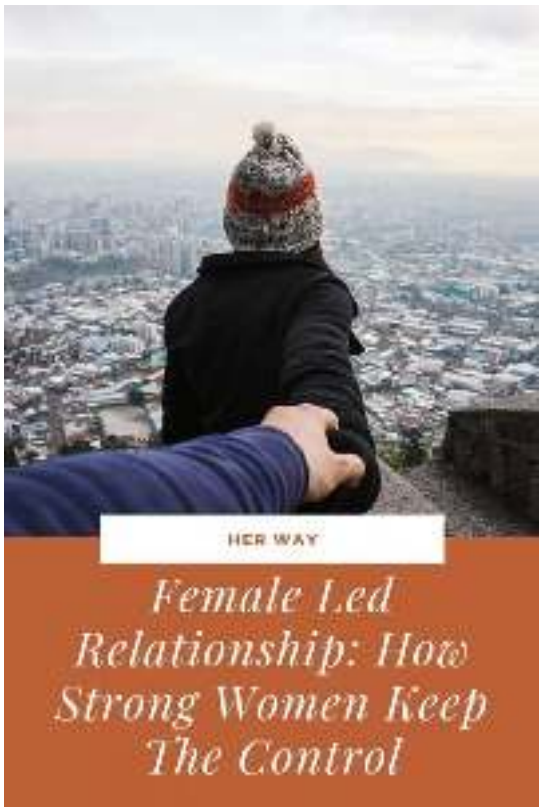
As I said above, it's a given that the man is attracted physically in a way that the physical attraction can be used as a lever to enforce his compliance — to exert control.

> "So what about her belief that the submissive yes women get left by men? Does she really believe this or is some weird translation required?"

What she is saying is that the men are more empowered, so they will eventually lose his interest to another woman who is equally attractive, but who makes herself more of a challenge. That is what she is saying there. Whether that is true depends on a lot of factors, most of them relating to the guy's personality, and his actual options. (Are there other women who are equally attractive who are doing that and getting their way by doing so, or not?)

Remember what I said about how women use the word “attraction” in the sense of “interested in pursuing actively”. She is saying that, as between two women who are equally visually attractive, the woman who plays harder to get will get/keep the man’s attention more. That depends on his personality, I think, but it is true with at least some men, most notably those who are favored by women and thus, can find other attractive options.

The bottom line in reality here is that many very high-powered men, CEOs, managing partners in law firms, investment bankers, senators, etc., are not married to “submissive wife” type women. That doesn’t compute in the Manosphere, but it is nevertheless true. This is the kind of thing she is talking about in her book — men like this can be hooked in by a woman who is attractive enough to lure them in physically and then savvy enough to control the relationship on her terms. An actual “dominatrix” — not the classic one of male sexual fantasies but rather the more prosaic one of the man being led around by his wife, who dominates him both sexually (by controlling his access to sex) and psycho-emotionally, by running circles around him verbally and emotionally. AKA: most American marriages.



Conclusions

Jack has written tomes about how sex should be unique to marriage, but for sexually liberated people who live in a sex-centric culture, it is not. For wimmin like this, sex is for hot men, marriage is for rich men, and unfortunately, they are not the same men. Likewise, their concepts of attraction become complicated, convoluted, and messy.

Furthermore, dropping hints about what women truly find attractive shows their hand in a way that is detrimental to their frame of social control. So when women are pressed for an answer about what really turns them on, they are prone to speak in coded language, toss out a red herring for distraction, or simply change the subject.

Women know that true attraction cannot be negotiated, so why talk about it?

Related

- Σ Frame: How the Pill Affects Attraction and Mating (2020 August 26)
- Patriactionary: Oh look, yet another churchian femingelical shaming Christian men for wanting to get married for sex (2021 April 16)

Gynapotheosis

Lexet Blog · 21 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women are the Spiritual Paragon of a Society

Readership: Christians;
Author's Note: This post was cowritten by Lexet and Jack.
Reader's Note: Gynapotheosis: (from Greek) gyn: woman; apotheosis: the ideal example; epitome; quintessence; the elevation or exaltation of a person to the rank of a god.

> "Feminist Christianity is heretical: You can judge a church [or a society] by the state of the young women in it."
>
> Dark Brightness: Around the Foul Rainbow. (2021/4/22)

Introduction

> "A chain is only as strong as its weakest link."

Based on this aphorism, this post presumes that the nature and character of women in a society are the epitome of that society. The women of a culture represent the pleasure and pain, the best and the worst, and the strengths and the weaknesses of that culture. Thus, women can be seen to be a small sampling of a society.

Under a previous post, Ed Hurst made the following assertion about the behavior of women.

> "If you think about it, you'll find that what Red Pill lore says about women in particular is reflected to some degree in Old Testament law and custom regarding women. They share underlying assumptions about how women behave [or should behave] in social situations."

So… let's review what the Bible says about women and think about this.

The Intervention of the Sabine Women, by Jacques Louis David (1798).

Women in the Old Testament

Throughout the Old Testament, where judgment is pronounced on a society, society's sins are often compared to the sins of a prostitute. (The book of Revelation makes this analogy as well). Not only that, but apostasy is regularly compared to prostitution. Read through Hosea, Ezekiel, Isaiah, or Lamentations.

When speaking of Nineveh, the Lord says,

> "All because of the many harlotries of the harlot, the charming, the mistress of sorceries, who sells nations by her harlotries and families by her sorceries. 'Behold, I am against you' declares the Lord of hosts, 'and I will lift up your skirts over your face, and show to the nations your nakedness and to the kingdoms your disgrace… Behold, your people are like the women in your midst! The gates of your land are opened wide to your enemies; fire consumes your gate bars…"
>
> Nahum 3:4,5,13 (NASB)

It is interesting to think that a typical young woman in a society is a representation of the spiritual character of that society. The indications of this analogy do not bode well for western society, as most young women have completely given themselves over to sexual immorality and Feminist ideologies.

Now lets look at some OT verses that describe what life under God's judgment for disobedience looks like. In Isaiah 3, it is prophesied that God will remove Jerusalem and Judah…

> "…and I will make mere lads their princes, and capricious children will rule over them… …the youth will storm against the elder, and the inferior against the honorable… …their oppressors are children, and women rule over them. O My people! Those who guide you lead you astray and confuse the direction of your paths."

In verses 16 on, the Lord describes the behavior of the daughters of Zion:

> "…because the daughters of Zion are proud and walk with heads held high and seductive eyes, and go along with mincing steps and tinkle the bangles (anklets) on their feet…"

As a result of their behavior, the Lord pronounces judgment and punishment in verses 17-26.

The Rape of the Sabine Women, by Giambologna (1582).

Women in the New Testament

In the New Testament, the word of God is incredibly clear about gender roles.

In 1 Timothy 2:9-10, women are instructed to…

> "…adorn themselves with proper clothing, modestly and discreetly, not with braided hair and gold or pearls or costly garments, but rather by means of good works, as is proper for women making a claim to godliness."

The next verse states:

> "A woman must quietly receive instruction with entire submissiveness. But I do not allow a woman to teach or exercise authority over a man, but to remain quiet. For it was Adam who was first created, and then Eve…"

See also Ephesians 5 and 1 Peter 3 (NASB).

Elsewhere in the New Testament, older women are instructed to be…

> "…reverent in their behavior, not slanderers, not malicious gossips nor enslaved to much wine, teaching what is good, so that they may train the young women to love their husbands, to love their children, to be sensible, pure, workers at home, kind, to be subject to their own husbands, so that the word of God will not be dishonored." ~ Titus 2:3-5 (NASB).

That word "reverent" deserves attention. No one knows what it means anymore because we have forgotten its practical application. Voddie Baucham gave an excellent sermon on this topic.

Essentially, this is what you don't find today.

Hamstrung Hamstering

While many modern evangellyfish/churchians support these characteristics of women on the basis of scripture, there remains the fact that most women in the church have scant regard for the practical application of these virtues. When they argue that these instructions are only for behavior inside of the congregation, this modern interpretation does not make sense. It would create open and obvious hypocritical behavior, whereby immodest clothing is acceptable outside of the congregation, but not within. If this interpretation were applied, then it would render church little more than a fantasy cosplay with an emphasis on pseudo-holiness semiotics.

When they apply their interpretation to the previous chapter in Titus 1, which discusses the qualifications of overseers and deacons, the cosplay then becomes a circus with a ringleader. Are those standards discussing only the behavior within a congregation? It cannot be. Elders/overseers must have a good reputation with those outside of the church, "so that he will not fall into reproach and the snare of the devil". (Titus 1:5-9)

How interesting.

Modern interpretations never say "what is good within the congregation is also good without". Instead, their interpretations are only in favor of licentiousness.

Concluding Statements

The Bible uses the parallel analogy of Israel's relationship with God. This analogy can also be applied to describe every man's individual relationship to God.

The Blue Pill and everything associated with it (e.g. chivalry, churchianity, feminism, progressivism, individualism, the widespread acceptance of sexual promiscuity, and liberal hegemony in general), is essentially the wayward woman in the analogy.

The greater part of the Red Pill is an attempt to correct this inversion.

The picture of a promiscuous woman assumes that we should already know about the nature of women, and it was intended for us to see ourselves more clearly through this analogy. But instead, moderns have come to idolize the fallen feminine nature. Consequently, wee as a society have grown so out of touch with God and the spiritual nature of humankind, that wee fail to see the spiritual symbolism, and instead, wew read these things literally as a description of the nature of women.

…and wee are fascinated, if not shocked by the impertinence!

The fact that wee (society as a whole) have become so unaware of the nature of women and so offended by the truths conveyed in the Bible and the Red Pill, betrays the underlying truth that wee are blinded by our lusts for pulchritude, sex, and materialism, and have become unaware of the spiritual nature of man in his relationship to God. Instead, wee are only aware of our humble relationship to the gynapotheosis of society, and how far short wee have fallen, not by God's standards, but according to merciless gynocentric standards.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: You Can Tell A Lot About A Nation's Women By Its Facebook Likes (2014/2/19)
- Dalrock: Are real men attracted to boisterous, opinionated women? (2016/9/8)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019/2/23)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference (2019/3/20)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Christian vs. Non-Christian Women (2020/2/8)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Sirach on Women (2020/11/8)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Progressive (2020/11/10)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Anti-Progressive (2020/11/16)
- Lexet Iustitia: Observing the Decline (2021/4/18)

Descriptors of Beauty and Attractiveness

Jack · 23 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

What kind of female beauty is your style?

Readership: All
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes
Warning: NSFW! One image contains nudity.

This article is only a short list of various elements of beauty and attractiveness that I've collected over the years and is by no means exhaustive. Although I do not have links for everything, all these points have some evidence of being true. Various contexts, nuances, and personal tastes may affect the items on the list.

Reasons why Aesthetic Beauty is an Important Consideration

A woman's attractiveness is important because it is, by far, the number one trait that is desired by men.

However, aesthetic beauty is a devaluing asset. After the age of 22-25, women do not become more beautiful. Instead, they only decrease in beauty. As a consequence, a woman who is a 6 when she is 25, is going to be < 4 twenty year later, whereas, a woman who is a 9 at the age of 25, has the chance of being > 6 over the same time frame. In my experience, given a five-year span, women are more likely to change their religion and/or their basic value system, rather than to raise the overall quality of their physical appearance.

What a woman does in her prime years (18-25) often determines her level of inner, non-physical beauty in her later years.

Physical Elements of Aesthetic Beauty and Attractiveness*

In order of importance…

Youth contains its own glorious beauty.

A glowing face indicates youth, health, vitality, and purity of heart.

Height is always a trump card in SMV and MMV.

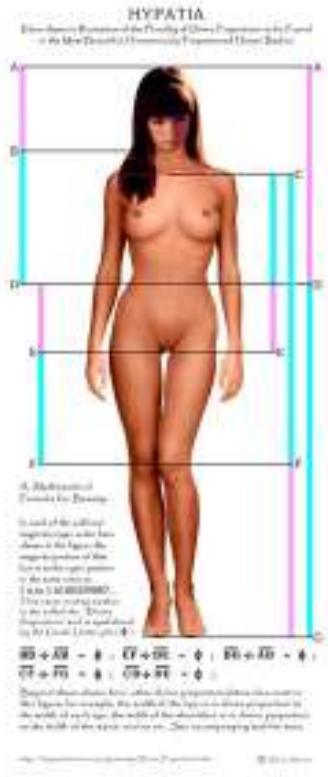
- For men, a 6-foot-tall skinny nerd beats a 5'5" body builder, in the eyes of women.
- For women, the ideal height is between the chin and eye level of the man.

Weight

- Body Mass Index is ideally 16-20% for men and 18-22% for women.
- Being thin and fit
- Muscle tone
- Clear definition of figure
- See Christianity and Masculinity's post BMI, Overweight and attractiveness (2015/8/30)

Body and Facial Symmetry

A high degree of body and especially facial symmetry is a mark of genetic quality.



Good Body and Facial Proportions

The Golden Ratio (1:1.618…) is the standard for beauty. Individuals having a high number of Golden Ratio proportions distributed throughout their body are more beautiful by definition. (See previous image.)

Of note, the Waist to Hip Ratio (WHR) is especially important in determining both the fertility and attractiveness of a woman.

- 0.6 to 0.7 is ideal for women
- 0.7-0.8 is ideal for men
- Above 1 appears unattractive.

Long Hair is an indicator of youth and fertility. The Bible says it is the glory of a woman (1st Corinthians 11:15).

Ideal hair length is between the shoulder and mid-waist. Personally, I find hair that is long and thick enough to cover the breasts is extremely thrilling.

Health and Energy

A clear complexion indicates good diet and self-care.

Athletic activities (e.g. sports, competitive games) and outdoor activities are associated with good health, energy, and a robust physical constitution.

Affect

A high Affect display that is congruent with subjective mood is extremely engaging. This is the female equivalent of charisma for men. A warm, natural smile, and eyes that convey hope and vitality are the key indicators of a good affect.

A comparison of poor affect (Left) and good affect (Right).

Non-Physical Elements of Beauty and Attractiveness

In order of importance…

Emotional Maturity

IOIs indicating trust, humility, and an open heart are always attractive.

Self-Confidence

Sexual Purity

Socially skilled

Well-developed Personality

Friendly and open

Positive Attitude

General Observations of the Impression of Attractiveness

SOME WOMEN ARE BETTER IN PUBLIC SOCIETY.
SOME WOMEN ARE BETTER STAYING AT HOME.

Extroverted women are smooth, suave, and very efficacious in a social setting, but can be overbearing in the home. Introverted women can be awkward in public, but these shy sex kittens make proud additions to the home and bedroom.

SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER CLOSE UP.
SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER FAR AWAY.

From a distance, a woman's hair, figure, and physical habits of motion are more evident. Up close, her affect, energy, and personality come through.

SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER WEARING MAKE UP.
SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER WITHOUT MAKE UP.

In general, younger women and naturally beautiful women look better without makeup, while older women and naturally fugly women look better with makeup added.

SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER UP FRONT.
SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER FROM BEHIND.

Very VERY few women have the ideal figure — BOTH a nice pair of tits, AND a nice @ss, and a slender waist in between (as shown in the photo above).

There are tit men, and there are @ss men.

Tit men prefer nice tits over a nice @ss.
@ss men prefer a nice @ss over a nice rack.

Male confidence is associated with tit women.
Men prefer tit women for sex.

Male libido and virility is associated with @ss women.
Men prefer @ss women for marriage.

SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER WITH CLOTHES ON.
SOME WOMEN LOOK BETTER IN THE NUDE.

When wearing clothing, those women who look the best are those who are very thin, even skinny-bone chicks. This is because clothes accentuate their body lines and skeletal frame. This “Thin Factor” is the main reason why East-Asian women generally appear more attractive than other women, even though they may in fact have androgynous, flat, or featureless figures.

When in the nude, those women who look the best are those with hourglass figures and are either soft, smooth, and sleek, or else very physically fit (but not 'ripped'). For busty women with an hourglass figure (which is most desirable to men), clothes make them appear plump, pudgy, or stodgy. Clothes only hide their natural beauty. (Hint: To screen out the true fatties, look for a thin neck and jawline, shirt tails that ride on the hips, and clothing lines stretching between the breasts and hips.)

For women who are overweight (most Western women these days), it's a mixed bag. Some of them look better with clothes on, and others look better in the nude. Having an active lifestyle, a healthy diet, and good genetics can make all the difference. The main factors that determine whether pudgies are beautiful is her bone structure, facial symmetry, and whether her skin is firm, smooth, and has an even complexion, or else appears like bulging rolls of jiggly, cottage cheese.

Moreover, a woman possessing exemplary beauty will be attractive, no matter what she wears. For example, consider this Asian doll wearing a plastic 7-11 bag!

Other Physical Signs and Correllations

Masculinity attracts femininity.

Men attract the female version of themselves.

Women attract the male version of themselves.

Women with a jaw length longer than 2.5 inches (measured from the earlobe), look better with long hair.

Women with a strong, masculine jawline† are more likely to cheat.

Women with a large digit ratio† (ring finger is longer than index finger) have a higher libido (more horny).

Women with a higher libido† are more likely to have acne.

Vegetarians are more likely to enjoy oral sex.

Also see List of Slut Tells (2017/10/15).

Makayla Samountry

Kaylyn Slevin

What makes them beautiful?

Conclusions

Men, know what kind of woman is right for you!

Exit Question

What kind of female beauty is your style?

For me, it's STAY AT HOME, UP FRONT, CLOSE UP, WITHOUT MAKEUP, and IN THE NUDE. However, I do have a healthy appreciation for the others (perhaps too healthy). I used to be an @ss man when I was younger, but I've slowly become a tit man as I've grown older.

Notes

Note 1: In the comments under Fantasy in Makeup and Photography (2021/4/16) there was some discussion of the "thick" physique for women (i.e., shapely in a pronounced way and not slender). A good example of "thick" might be Mikayla Saravia who was covered in Yet another variety of Internet Whoring (2019/10/9). It was concluded that this physique is very hard to maintain and is only achievable through genetics.

* Note 2: NovaSeeker's post, Deciphering Concepts of Attraction (2021/4/19), and Deti's comment make the point that when women use the word "attraction" (and its various cognates) it does NOT have a sexual connotation. It's like a luxurious step above being "nice" (which we know is not a compliment to men at all). Whereas men use the word "attractive" as a polite way to say she passes the boner test. This is a world of a difference in verbal communication which we should be aware of.

Which one is more beautiful? Which one is more attractive? There is a difference.

 Note 3: Artisanal Toad once said…

> "Given that male dominance is pretty much criminalized in the western world, I think it's reasonable to assume that height is being used as a proxy for the dominance they crave."

 Note 4: In women's assessment of female SMV, they regularly confuse "fertility" with "attractiveness". This error is showcased by Susan Walsh in her post at Hooking Up Smart, The Myth of Plummeting Female Sexual Market Value (2013/10/15), in which she makes a major miscalculation in the value of the information found by OKCupid, and described by Rollo in Final Exam – Navigating the SMP (2012/6/4).

Note 5: Women have been led to believe that the Strong Independent Woman™ is the epitome of attractiveness, as Dalrock described in Kickass conservative gals. (2017/4/10). There is a bit of projection in this assessment, as this is actually what women are attracted to in men.

† Note 6: These traits are associated with higher testosterone levels.

Related

- The Rules Revisited: Feminine Beauty Is Highly Controllable (2011/921)
- The Rules Revisited: The Importance of Hair (2012/3/10)
- The Rules Revisited: How to Improve Your Hair (2012/3/17)
- The Rules Revisited: What Men Think of You Without Makeup (2013/4/1)
- Donal Graeme: Going APE- What Attributes do Women Find Attractive in Men? Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power and Status (LAMPS) (2013/7/21)
- The Rules Revisited: Older Women Can Still Be Sexy (2015/9/15)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Women Don't Really Understand Male Attraction and Implications (2017/4/12)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Feminine Beauty is Highly Controllable – Theory and Analysis Part 2 (2017/4/20)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Women's sexual desire is narcissistic (2021/2/10)

Juxtaposing the Temporal and the Eternal

Novaseeker · 26 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A review of the interplay between God's omnipotence and humans' volitional will.

Readership: Christians
Length: 3,500 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Introduction

Elspeth gave us this excerpt (written in 1858) from Charles Spurgeon, one of the most famous Calvinists in modern church history.

> "The system of truth is not one straight line, but two. No man will ever get a right view of the gospel until he knows how to look at the two lines at once. I am taught in one book to believe that what I sow I shall reap: I am taught in another place, that "it is not of him that willeth nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." I see in one place, God presiding over all in providence; and yet I see, and I cannot help seeing, that man acts as he pleases, and that God has left his actions to his own will, in a great measure. Now, if I were to declare that man was so free to act, that there was no presidence of God over his actions, I should be driven very near to Atheism; and if, on the other hand, I declare that God so overrules all things, as that man is not free enough to be responsible, I am driven at once into Antinomianism or fatalism. That God predestines, and that man is responsible, are two things that few can see. They are believed to be inconsistent and contradictory; but they are not. It is just the fault of our weak judgment. Two truths cannot be contradictory to each other. If, then, I find taught in one place that everything is fore-ordained, that is true; and if I find in another place that man is responsible for all his actions, that is true; and it is my folly that leads me to imagine that two truths can ever contradict each other. These two truths, I do not believe, can ever be welded into one upon any human anvil, but one they shall be in eternity: they are two lines that are so nearly parallel, that the mind that shall pursue them farthest, will never discover that they converge; but they do converge, and they will meet somewhere in eternity, close to the throne of God, whence all truth doth spring."

Elspeth added,

> "One of the biggest issues I have with many Calvinist's arguments (at least online) is that there seems to be an unwillingness to acknowledge the reality that God's view is eternal, not temporal, omniscient, not finite. Mainly it's because of a weird pride in having been chosen.
>
> Clearly it hasn't been a bedrock truth that Calvinists think that man has no free will. I don't know that anyone could ever be that foolish. But I may be wrong."

Yes. I think there's generally a lot of muddiness about these things, precisely because it can be challenging for many people to toggle between the divine/eternal perspective and the created/temporal one.

It is not, and never has been, controversial that God foreknows all of history. This is a necessary consequence of God being eternal and omniscient — that is, He knows what will occur at every point in created time before He creates time, because He is present at all points of created time at the same time, since He is eternal. This is basic metaphysics and has never really been controversial.

Temporal and Eternal

The key distinction here is the obvious difference between the eternality of God, on the one hand, and the temporality of creation, on the other.

God is eternal. This means that His entire existence is beyond time, it transcends time. It precedes the existence of anything temporal, and so a reference to God's existence "before" time began is not only meant in a temporal sense, but also in an existential one — God simply IS, as He says when he first describes himself in Genesis as אֶהְיֶה אֲשֶׁר אֶהְיֶה — "I am He Who Is" or "I am The Existing One" — in Exod. 3:14. "Before all that you see, I AM." "I AM" is IS-ness itself. In other words, God is saying that He exists outside the confines of time and place, i.e. He is eternal.

And His eternal existence is not just "before" in a temporal sense (although that is true enough), but in an existential and ontological sense — God's Being, His "Being-ness", His "Is-ness", is ontologically prior to the existence of everything in temporal reality. Indeed, in the NT, Paul himself reminds us that it is God "in whom we live and move and have our being" (Acts 17:28). This is because God's "Being" is the only Being that is actually "Real" in the eternal sense of the meaning of the word "Real" — His Be-ing is not temporal (i.e., temporary), but Real precisely because He is eternal. And all created "beings" participate in the divine and eternal "Being" in a derivative/created/limited/temporal way — in the realm of "temporal being", which is to say, a form of being which is not eternal, like the true, ultimate and divine form of "Being", but which is its temporal manifestation, and therefore is a temporary, created form of "being", which itself derives its shadow/echo of "being-ness" (the temporal version of it) from the eternal and true "Being" in which it lives and moves, and from which its own derived, temporal "being" comes … and to which it returns as well. This is what it means to say that God's "Being" is ontologically prior to our own created "being", and that the latter (i.e., our created "being-ness") lives and moves and gets its "being-ness" from the eternal divine "Being"-ness of God.

The eternal God, being prior to creation not only temporally but also ontologically, because God is eternal, therefore sees all of creation, in all of its permutations and details, throughout all of time, as if it were in the present tense. That is to say — the eternal God is simultaneously present at each and every point in time at the same time, and is fully present in each of them and, vice versa, each such point is fully and simultaneously present to the eternal God. Again, this is because God stands outside of time, He transcends it ontologically — all of it is created by Him and therefore known fully to Him because it gets its very being in a relationship of ontological dependency on His own eternal Being. Time is, in this sense, a fact of creation from the eternal/divine perspective, as much as a tree is to ours. It is a derivative reality that is created and temporary, and it poses no boundary to the divine knowledge in the sense that things taking place at "later points in the timeline" would not be mysterious, as they are to the human/created/temporal (and limited) mind — in the mind of the divine, all of these points of time are simultaneously present, and were so from before the point when time began.

Because all points of time were known in full in the mind of God prior to the time when time itself began, the Fall itself was known to God, as was God's response, and all of God's other interventions into the "timeline" of created space/time. This is also reflected in the NT, where Paul clearly says that "God chose us before the foundation of the world to be holy and blameless in His presence. In love, He predestined us for adoption as His sons through Jesus Christ …" (Eph. 1:4-5). This choosing and election to be adopted in Christ was something that took place before the foundation of the world — which means that the need for it, and the need for Christ and his specific redemption of humanity, and the fall which preceded it, were all known in the mind of God as well before the foundation of the world, for it is in this knowledge that God's choice of Paul and the others was made "before the foundation of the world" (καθὼς ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς ἐν αὐτῷ πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου).

Thereby, all of this raises the obvious questions:

- If God is perfectly and fully aware of all of this — that is, of all conditions and causes as they cascade throughout all of time, including all human acts and all decisions and so on — prior to the beginning of time, in what sense is human free will "real"?
- Does free will exist?
- If so, how?

Free-Will vs. "Predestination"

This intersection of God's eternal omniscience and humans' temporal volitional will (i.e. freely chosen actions) is normally where human minds get tripped up. If God knows all causes and conditions, does free will really even exist, or is it just an illusion, where all of our acts and decisions are pre-ordained and fated, and therefore outside of our control?

Again, the key to unpacking this lies in understanding the distinctions made above between the eternal and the temporal, between "Being" and "being", uncreated and created, and, to the very limited extent that is possible for a temporally limited mind, keeping both perspectives in play at the same time.

Inside the space of created time, and therefore from the perspective of "beings" inside that created time, we do have free will in that we are not God's marionettes, generally speaking. Our acts of volitional will are volitional from our perspective regardless of the fact that God has always been aware of what choices we would make prior to the time when time began, because the temporal creation includes volitional will within the framework of that temporality — it is simply the case that the eternal Being is aware of all points in time before time begins, and so He knows all causes and conditions, all temporal occurrences, before even the first of them takes place in time. These two things — that volitional free-will is "real" in the created temporal space, on the one hand, and that God is aware of, in a complete and total and perfect knowledge sense, of each and every cause and condition in the created temporal space, including all human acts and decisions, prior to the first moment of time — are both true.

These are both true at once because of the difference in perspective between the temporal and the eternal — the temporal perspective is limited and the eternal is not. Therefore from our limited temporal perspective (which is the only one available to us in a real sense), human free will is “true”, whereas in the eternal perspective, all of the acts of that free will are fully known, for the entirety of temporal history from start to finish, before any of creation existed. It is because of this that the very existence of the human freedom to act in the temporal space is itself derivative of God’s decision to create, and thereby enable all of those specific causes and conditions to actually take place in temporal space — that is, God creates and enables human freedom by means of His decision to create a temporal reality which includes human freedom in it, but He knows all of the outcomes which arise from that freedom prior to creating the temporal reality that includes it.

That is to say — the temporal perspective (real volitional will) is real inside the confines of the temporal space, but (as is the case in general with temporal “being” and eternal/real “Being”) it is derivative of what is actually “Real”. “Reality” (capital R) in it’s fullest sense contains the perfect foreknowledge of God of all causes and conditions throughout time, and the decision by God to create the temporal space time, with all of those specifically foreknown causes and conditions, and which thereby enable all of them to actually take place in the created/temporal/derivative “reality”. It is in this way that both human free will and the perfect divine foreknowledge and perfect divine fore-ordination (in terms of willing into being) of all events in time are true — both are true and are not contradictory, if one holds both the temporal and the eternal perspectives in play at the same time.

God is also active in history as His own agent (or “player” in the game sense), and when He wishes to influence a certain course of action, there are “setups” that are designed so that people do, according to their free will, certain things. Again, God knows everything that’s going to happen from before time — all “causes and conditions”–, so there are no surprises for God from His perspective. But within the space of created temporal causality, we have been given volitional free will. I actually don’t believe that the Calvinists all deny this way of looking at things, perhaps apart from some of the very online uber-Calvinists.

Free-Will vs. Grace

The next issue arises with respect to the interaction between the human will and divine grace. For Luther, following Augustine, the human will was almost entirely corrupt, and therefore from Luther came the famous Reformation slogans such as Sola Fidei, Sola Gratia, and so on, which all flow from a perspective that they are necessary for salvation to be possible because of the deeply depraved and incapable state of the post-lapsarian human will. But despite this, Luther nevertheless believed that the grace which saves is freely given to all, and that all are free enough to accept or reject that free gift of grace at any time — meaning that God provides the means to everyone to accept his gift of saving grace (i.e., the grace needed to accept the gift of faith), but that this gift can be rejected and resisted by the human will. This is consistent with Luther's view that the human will was corrupted in that it could not accept faith without grace enabling it to do so, but not so utterly corrupted that it could not even accept the grace that leads to faith. Again, in Luther's view, God knows who will accept and who will reject, but he lets the individuals make that decision using their created temporal wills, because the temporal reality which God created includes human volitional will.

It's not actually clear how much John Calvin himself subscribed to what subsequently became "TULIP" Calvinism, as articulated at the Synod of Dort. Certainly Calvin's famous "Institutes of Christian Religion", which was itself revised numerous times over his own lifetime, doesn't refer specifically to a TULIP-style approach to doctrine, or that these specific elements were key to the entire Calvinist view of the faith. However, in the context of their earlier dispute with the Arminians, Calvinists later insisted that the grace that saves is always "effective" (i.e., it never fails to save in any case where it is given by God), and therefore, contrary to Luther's teaching, that it cannot be resisted by the act of the will, or through a stubborn refusal to accept the gift of saving grace.

This means that, from a Calvinist point of view, God does not provide such grace to everyone, but only to those whom He chooses — otherwise all would be saved, since saving grace never fails per the Calvinist scheme. Therefore, in the Calvinist understanding, God moves from foreknowing/foreordaining, on the one hand, to differentially saving by his own fiat, on the other, which gets rolled under the all-encompassing "sovereignty" concept that lies at the core of all Calvinist thinking. It is this understanding — not of "predestination" in terms of God knowing what's going to happen (He must know given his eternal nature and how that relates to created space/time), but rather that He individually determines Himself, irrespective of anything other than His own inscrutable sovereign will, who is saved and who is not, and only provides grace to the saved, while withholding it from the rest.

The Calvinist view does not necessarily follow from the view that God knows what will happen and that He also "foreordains" what will happen by choosing to create a timeline, all the events of which He is fully aware of. This perspective is a substantial step further, and says that God determines outcomes in a very specific, individual way, inside the temporal space, in such a way that human freewill as it exists in the temporal space is completely irrelevant when it comes to human salvation. In other words, predestination is a process that is fully automated, fully orchestrated by God, and which never fails in any individual case of an individual that God determined to be among those to whom he would provide saving grace before time began. That's also the view that runs counter to the idea of free will. It doesn't totally deny free will but rather holds that free will plays no role in human salvation, and it isn't a view that is held by any Christians but the Calvinists. Today, even many who refer to themselves as "Calvinist" or "Reformed" will back away from this "hard double predestination" viewpoint in favor of a more "Arminian" view (the one which was condemned at the Synod of Dort), which creates a separate category of "prevenient grace", which is the grace that is given to all which all can accept or reject, such that if one accepts that grace, then the never failing saving grace is provided in response to that acceptance.

Conclusions

Of course, the issue of the exact interface between the human will and the divine energy in the temporal world (i.e., grace) is not clear — there is a lot of room for different views, and there always were different views running alongside each other in the church. The same is true for the meaning of the word “elect”. Calvinism has its rather famous understanding of the meaning of that word, expressed above. Luther accepted the concept, but Lutheran theology, like Catholic theology, generally takes the view that this refers to God’s foreknowledge and foreordination as Paul describes in Eph. 1:4, and not His specific intervention in the temporal space with grace for some but not others. Lutheran theology therefore concludes that one should act as if one is elect, if one is being called to repentance and to serve God — that is, if one has been called to the Gospel. Whereas, the stricter Calvinists hold the view that some people who experience that call experience it falsely, and are not actually “elect”. Other church fathers have suggested that the term simply means those whom God knows, due to the reality of his foreknowledge of all of history, will be saved. All of these views have existed side by side in the church since the beginning really, if you examine the early fathers. It was only later that rigorous logical views became hardened and camps formed, as we have today.

The significance of this for religious believers today varies, depending on the degree of one’s faith. Some people are called to a simple faith, and there are many blessings in this if one is called to it — it is easier in many ways. If one is a sophisticated thinker in other areas of life, however, it is extremely unlikely that one is called to have a simple faith, and in my own experience, many people who try to retain a simple understanding of faith that does not “keep pace” with the level of sophistication of their understandings of other things will end up dropping their faith at some point in time. This is because the simple view of faith doesn’t correlate with their life experience and it can’t “keep up” with the rest of their understanding, so at some level, it stops “working” for them from a mental perspective. So, unfortunately, for people who have a more sophisticated understanding of other things, it becomes necessary for them to delve into the depths of these issues and revise their mental model of faith, both to address their own questions, as well as to deal with the perspectives that the world will foist upon them. This kind of situation is often called a “crisis of faith”, and in my opinion, everyone goes through a crisis of faith at some point in their lives. The successful navigation of a crisis of faith is pivotal, both as to the continuance of one’s own faith as well as one’s children, and in terms of any evangelism or other issues that relate to people of no faith or people of other faiths.

A simple understanding of things is a luxury that most of us do not have, I think, in the current world, with its sophisticated critiques. Whenever others in the world come across an understanding of Christianity that is not well-grounded intellectually, massive problems can, and often do, ensue. We would be wise to be aware of this and to head it off pre-emptively, if possible.

Post Script from Jack

To follow up with the conclusion of this post, I endured a crisis of faith that lasted close to a decade. I recounted this experience in a series of posts which may be insightful to the reader.

- Σ Frame: A Spiritual Death (2009 December 8)
- Σ Frame: Growing “Roots” in Faith (2009 December 12)
- Σ Frame: God’s Silence During Suffering (2009 December 14)
- Σ Frame: Understanding Temptation (2009 December 21)

Related

- Σ Frame: Unconditional Atonement, Limited Election (2019 October 18)
- Σ Frame: The gospel is relevant to all, not just guilty bad boys. (2020 September 11)

Rules and Trust

Jack · 28 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

…are somewhat opposed.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post was co-written by Jack and NovaSeeker.
Length: 3,900 words
Reading Time: 21 minutes

Introduction

The discussion under Parental Divorce Ruins Daughters' Future Marital Commitment and Confidence (2021/2/24) captured much of the conversation about the importance of rules, and how the rules can no longer be followed with a positive outcome, but only a lot of suffering — which kind of sums up Eric's main contention.

Of particular note, this conversation between Deti, NovaSeeker, et al., offered several viewpoints about how the rules are now ambiguous and impossible to follow.

This discussion also contained a couple of ideas that I think are important issues that tie into The Christian Conundrum (2021/3/1) and The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021/2/26). These are…

1. Internal Traits — Flexibility, adaptability, determination, charisma, and other personality traits, etc. Scott's approach to marriage is an example of this.
2. External Environment — About rules and expectations. My approach to marriage is an example of this.

People tend to internalize the external environment, making it part of their identity. This can then lead to an identity crisis when the external environment doesn't match up to their internalized concepts, which are often shaped by personal ideals. For Christians, this would be doctrinal stances and moral rules.

All in all, I see the conundrum issue coming down to a conflict between ideals and realities, and this is a topic that continues to come up in the sphere over the years. Some people just can't deal with too much of a difference between the two.

The Covert Contract of following the Rules

For Christians, there is a tendency to think that they can get what they want out of God, life, etc. by following rules of conduct and morality in an effort to fit the ideal, thinking that this is what it means to be a "good Christian", obedient to God, etc. But all our own efforts to pursue sanctification, holiness, and the blessings in life are never enough. This approach never fully connects with God or reality, and it fails to hit home with people. This is kind of like the Pharisees in Jesus' day, or the older brother's approach in the story of the Prodigal son, or Javert in Les Miserables, as I discussed in More on the Framework of Options (2021/3/22). The point of this post was that Clinging to the "Rules" can cause a lot of confusion and legalism, and it misses the larger point of connecting with God and loving others.

Guys in the Christian Manosphere are guilty of this too. We have a desire for good wives, but women are just not up to par. (Women are saying the same about the men.) So then women are dismissed (vetted out) because they don't fit the Christian mold. It's a very mechanical, rules-based approach. Not much has been said about how to connect with reality and make an impact (other than through overt sexual relations).

This is where the rubber hits the road, so to speak.

It's definitely a case where there are ideals, on the one hand, and a reality, on the other, that don't match, and that one way guys are trying to deal with that is by trying to screen / vet / improve / narrow things so that they can get them to line up as much as possible so as to manage outcomes.

I don't think that's a great approach because it's trying to pound a square peg into a round hole. Besides, a lot of guys can't attract, read, or even notice IOIs, and so they won't be able to do it, plain and simple.

I see this as being the challenge underlying the conundrum. I think the answer will be very difficult for us to put into words, and rather unpalatable to a lot of people. I think Dalrock saw this coming, and this may be the reason he bowed out of blogging at his zenith. I think some "Churchian" leaders are conscious of this conundrum, but they conform to the culture too much and fail to tackle the issue properly.

A more fundamental problem with this whole mindset can be identified like this: Even if a guy can manage to do all of the things that the Christian Manosphere has been proposing (e.g. maintaining frame, exercising charisma, having an attitude of detachment, working out, looksmaxxing, following your mission in life, going to places where marriageable Christian women hang out, reading IOIs, vetting, etc.), he still ends up trying to square things that are not going to be squared in most situations. In reality, most situations are going to require more flexibility and less rigidity — less “models” and more prioritizing of what is actually most important, keeping one’s eye on that ball, accepting that a “go for everything” approach will only work in cases of truly lucky people, and that for everyone else it’s going to be a matter of making some prioritized compromises in order to get the broader benefits of a stable, lasting marriage and children, which are also loaded with spiritual benefits.

In other words, I think a common approach here is to cut off one’s nose spiritually to spite one’s face. In other words, to take the issue raised by commenter Eric, one may take a hardline approach about fornication, but that can lead to no marriage, and the foreclosure of a life that God maybe intended for you in order to bless you in certain ways, and in order to do certain things he had in mind for you to do under “Plan A”.

An alternative to the hardline approach is to realize that some fornication prior to marriage may be a necessary concession to a messy society in order to gain the benefits of a marriage that will bless you — it may be that you have to prioritize less having absolutely pure hands prior to marriage and prioritize achieving a stable marriage to actually fulfill your mission in life. And yes, for some men, getting their libido under control and having their sex lives in order (via marriage, ideally) is unfortunately a de facto prerequisite for spiritual growth and moving on to greater things.

If it just happens to be God’s will for a certain person to be married and have a family, and years pass without this happening, his conscience will tell him that he’s not been obedient to God’s particular calling for his life. The conundrum is, simply put, that no matter which path is chosen, there is no way of being entirely obedient by doing everything by the book.

Of course, that’s a hard course for Christians to endorse openly. The conventional route is to discourage that course and do anything but be realistic about it, and, if you want to be a real hard@ss about it, tell people they need to suck it up, after all, they could be getting fed to the lions! But it does seem like the churches, de facto, have kind of taken this approach by turning a blind eye to the widespread fornication that is taking place. Perhaps if there were more honest discussion of it, people could openly communicate across generations how it would be best for people to minimize the number of pre-marital relationships for various practical reasons (pair bonding being the main one), while not emphasizing so much being absolutely pure before marriage (c.f. the debacle of Purity Culture). IOW, explain the purposes behind the rules. But trying to put this into a formula that “serious” Christians will accept on paper …. gosh, that’s almost impossible to think about, isn’t it?

Sex is an Expression of Trust

I've written a lot about trust and humility, and how it relates to sex, but judging by the comments, I don't think people really understand the connection. Nevertheless, I think this perspective can yield a lot of fruitful insights, so I'll go over it again here.

When a woman invites a man to have sex with her, it is an expression of her trust.

When women open themselves to sex, it's kind of like the female equivalent of opening their fly — they are opening themselves, literally, to a man, and they are very, very vulnerable to him when they do that. They are vulnerable to his rejection, of course, but even if he doesn't reject her, she becomes vulnerable to him physically in a very visceral and direct way. She is opening herself to let him inside her body and also into her heart, in a way that is inherently submitting to his physical dominance of her. Speaking both figuratively and literally, she is opening the kimono — her guard is down.

This is utterly different from how men experience sex, I think, because our physical situation generally, and as it relates to sex specifically, is the opposite of this.

Her experience of rejection is NOT like how a man experiences rejection, which is painful enough, but it's a rejection of the big move she makes (from a woman's point of view) to let her guard completely down and make herself ultimately vulnerable to a man. It's experienced like a slave kneeling at his master's feet, only to be kicked in the head. It is intensely shameful. It's also why a man never, ever gets a second chance after rejecting a woman sexually.

This is a very big deal for women, because of their existential stance of vulnerability that virtually all of them experience the world through — when they "expose themselves', in this way, they are exposing their greatest weakness, their sexual vulnerability, so they feel very sensitive about how men treat that. If he doesn't respond by having sex, he is breaking that trust, and that's why she rejects him. This is one reason why women go bonkers when men reject them after they make themselves sexually open like that.

On the other hand, if the man responds by having sex, then it solidifies the trust as mutual, and this opens the door to all kinds of new possibilities for the relationship.

I think this is even the case (albeit less so) for more hedonistic sex and/or power play sex — the woman is always making herself at least somewhat vulnerable. The different contexts determine really just how widely she opens her fly, so to speak, in terms of being more or less vulnerable, but there is always some existential vulnerability, even for a seasoned prostitute, when they make themselves submit to a man's sexual and physical dominance over themselves. That "opening" is much greater when feelings are flowing than it is if it is purely manipulative, or even if it's just hedonistic, but it's still an opening, and there is still always some level, even if it's only a basic one, of trust involved.

The thing is, trust is enshrouded in the ego which makes it difficult to read, and a woman's invitation to have sex isn't always predominantly about trust. Sometimes the woman is just having fun, or making some kind of a power play. When it is not about trust, or when trust is broken for some reason, then it all goes bad. Even when trust is there, the relationship can go south if commitment is not firm.

I do think it also has implications for sex prior to marriage in a context where the culture is as sexual as ours is. That is, how can you really know whether a woman is going to truly open herself to you sexually — which really is a gauge of her openness and trust of you generally — without actually having sex with her? I doubt it, in this culture. In the past, when female sexual purity was the norm, this was not an issue — women were giving their trust to one man only, and it was not the case of trying to figure out which one to trust more than the others, or a process of her learning what that trust feels like, and comparing the experience between different men, as it is today.

Case Study — A Sexual Conviction

I want to share this story from an anonymous contributor which says what a lot of Christians are afraid to say.

> "I guess I could say that my present marriage is more happy than not. I had sex with her within 15 minutes of meeting her for the first time, so my own experience seems to match Scott's experience and it also confirms the truth of what Jim is saying.
>
> About a week after we met online and had been texting regularly, she told me, "I need sex! Come F-ck me!" So I got on a bus in the middle of the night and arrived at her house at 6:00 in the morning. Clothes came off as > soon as I got in the door and we stayed in bed for the next three days. Afterwards, she told me, "I know you're a real man because you're not afraid to F-ck me." I think there's a lot to be learned from that one statement.

>
> Red flags galore, and the first few years were hə11, but it worked out. I didn't know anything about the Red Pill at that time, and I didn't care about sexual purity because I was already divorced myself.
>
> No one would ever say this, but I wonder if "conviction" could mean "I need to F-ck him / her RIGHT NOW!!!" I think I could relate to that, but obviously, there's no doctrine to support this."

In the context of the current SMP/MMP, a man would need to have sex with a woman to experience whether it was similar to what happened with this guy and his wife. The trouble is that most men in this culture aren't good at looking for that — instead they often tend to look for interest, willingness, and yes, sexual expertise, but not really the kind of open-ness, trust, and vulnerability that she is expressing in the sex act. So no matter whether they are engaging in sex or not, men aren't actually evaluating the right aspects of sex, and are instead fixated on things that can be performed well enough by a skilled prostitute, who is only making herself minimally vulnerable, open, and trusting in the act of sex, perhaps for ulterior motives.

Let's go down that road, just for the sake of discussion

So let's assume that a man takes the approach of compromising with the cultural norm in finding a wife. So then what should he be looking for? What should his mind be set on?

I think it would be the typical things that we have been putting forth as feminine virtues (e.g. submission, teachability, respect, the attitude to help and serve…) and also factors that form solid relationships (e.g. Headship / IOIs, similar socioeconomic tier, SMV equity, shared life experiences, mutual life goals and purposes, shared values, compatible personalities, maybe similar intelligence, etc.).

Look at this verse. The practical interpretation is highly debated.

> "But if any man thinks he is behaving improperly toward his virgin, if she is past the flower of youth, and thus it must be, let him do what he wishes. He does not sin; let them marry."

> 1st Corinthians 7:36 (NKJV)

Could this verse imply that there is an "exception" to the 'rule' "the first time around", as long as it leads to marriage? There must be a better way for us to understand this.

Somewhat in jest, maybe the hardcore Calvinist perspective might be something like, "If you had sex, then God must have 'allowed' that to happen for some reason." I'm not sure where that reasoning would lead, or how far it would take us, but anyway you look at it, it's convoluted and messy — perhaps even one of the mysteries of faith.

Following the Rules is Necessary in the Absence of Trust

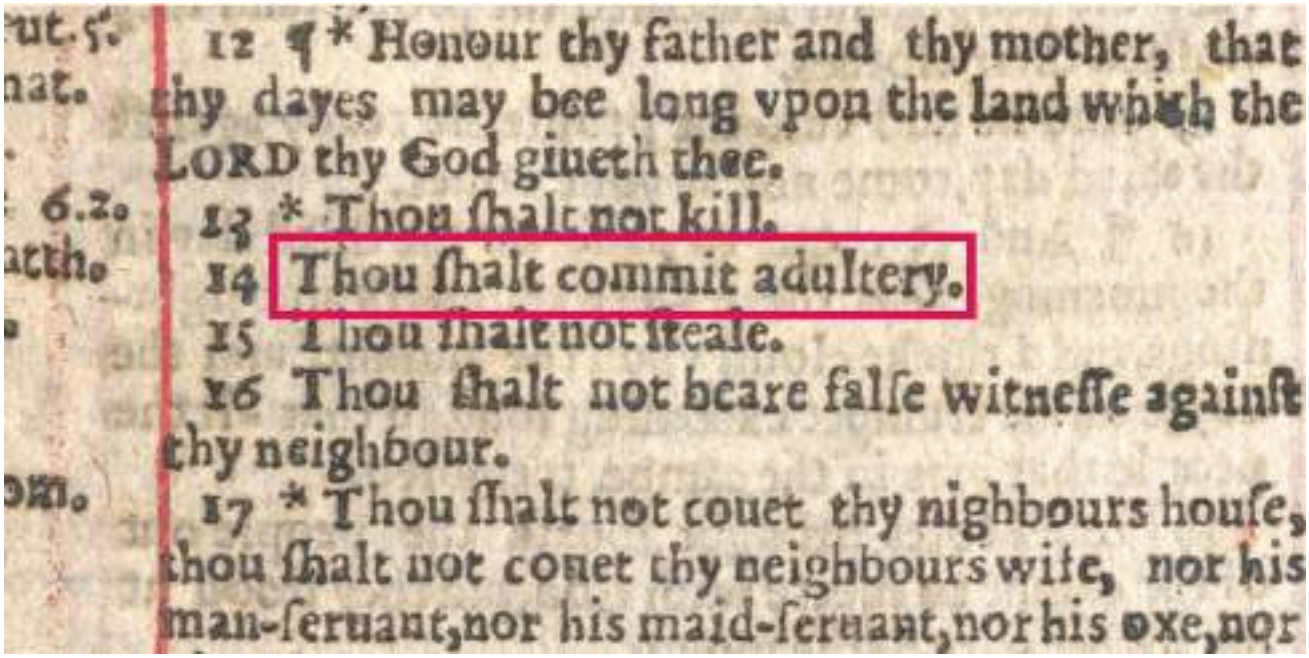
The Covenant Law describes the form and function of metaphysical realities and how God operates within that context. The Covenant Law is not legalistic rules, but a lot of Christians think so. If one loses touch with God, life in the Spirit, and the Covenant Law, then religious life is reduced to rule keeping.

Sin is when one decides for himself what is right and wrong instead of observing Covenant Law, and being sensitive to the context and the leading of the Spirit. This can be confusing when people decide for themselves what is right or wrong based on their own concepts of Covenant Law. The idea that "keeping the rules = righteousness" is one embodiment of sin (AKA legalism) that St. Paul continually warned us against.

From the worm's eye view, it is also confusing because righteousness is an end result of faith, but it isn't an end result of keeping the rules. How one achieves righteousness through faith might be rather messy in the beginning and in the details. The Bible is full of such examples, Moses, David, Abraham… They made some BIG mistakes, but somehow, God incorporated those decisions into His purposes by His unfathomable grace.

Another thing is that when one starts to live by faith, it tends to go against the grain of both social (i.e. family) expectations and doctrinal "rules". Seasoned believers are well aware of this perplexity, but try telling this to someone who thinks "breaking the rules = sin".

Moreover, as long as one looks at things through the context of "rule keeping", he's NOT living by faith. There's very little trust involved, except the expectation that others should be keeping the rules at least as well as you do – and we know this expectation invariably leads to frustration, disappointment, heartache, and bitterness.



ut. 5.
nat.
6.2.
atth.
om.
12 ¶ * Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy dayes may bee long vpon the land which the LORD thy God giueth thee.
13 * Thou ſhalt not kill.
14 Thou ſhalt commit adultery.
15 Thou ſhalt not ſteale.
16 Thou ſhalt not beare falſe witneſſe againſt thy neighbour.
17 * Thou ſhalt not couet thy nighbours houſe, thou ſhalt not couet thy neighbours wife, nor his man-ſeruant, nor his maid-ſeruant, nor his oxe, nor

Conclusions

The “trust” approach makes a distinction that comes down to keeping a close focus on what it is we are doing as Christians. We are followers of a Person, worshippers of a Person — a trinity of Persons, a communion of Persons. The scriptures are there as guidance for us, because we are very much in need of guidance, but they are not what we are following or worshipping — we are following a Trinitarian communion of eternal Persons. It is Them for whom we live, and Them for whom we are destined … not the words They have given us for guidance.

This perspective can help to keep the eye on the ball as it were.

There is a great tendency in Christianity among more “orthodox” believers (and it is common to “orthodox” “religious” types of all faiths, really, not just Christians) to try to find a “security blanket” of “truth”, a “rock” to which they can cling in an often chaotic and troubling world. The three great branches of the Christian faith each have their own version of that — Catholics have the structural church and its hierarchy and magisterial teaching (structures and words), Protestants have the words of the Bible in a specific interpretive canon which they see as definitive (words and an accepted spin on words), and Orthodox have the length of the historical witness and continuity (tradition, continuity of rite). Each of these “rocks” is actually NOT the Trinitarian Persons we are supposed to be following, worshipping, and loving. They are, in some cases, lenses to Them, portals to Them, guidance from Them, and, unfortunately, in many cases, proxies for Them.

Again, each major branch of Christianity is subject to the same basic tendency, but expresses it in a different way — and other faiths have the same issue in them as well. There is everywhere among more "orthodox" believers this strong temptation to find one of these "rocks" which are tangible, manifest, visible, graspable, and then to cling to that, rather than the actual, much scarier, journey with the three eternal Persons who, like any other persons, but even more so, are complex, and require a lifetime of "getting to know", by means of interaction, following, loving, praying, communicating, and so on. So instead, there is a tendency to cling to the manifested rocks, and they often become proxies. In the worst case, they can become the primary focus of one's faith.

Such is the case for the legalistic, spiritually immature, rules-based people.

Now, I do not mean to say that we can trash moral rules. We can't. If we do that, we lose the faith. Christ does explicitly say that if we love Him, we will follow his commandments and do His will. But … He also breaks His own rules for higher purposes, and chides the Pharisees who condemn Him as a rule-breaker. And he also often summarizes the moral rules in a very simple way of loving God and neighbor — so as to emphasize, yet again, the "big picture" here that the faith is about love for persons — the persons of the neighbor and the persons of the divine Trinitarian communion. That is the law, period. Everything else is secondary to that.

Now of course the "orthodox" rule followers will immediately object that this runs a huge risk of apostasy, and point at the Episcopal Church as an example. I don't disagree with that. We can't go there. But at the same time, we do have to keep our eye on the ball, and avoid becoming rules-followers, seeing rules as ends-in-themselves, worshipping words, or doctrines, or rules, or ecclesiastical structures more than loving the people we are told and called to love. Critically, we need to realize that if we do NOT do this, we are still running very serious risks — namely the risk that WE are worshipping and following and loving proxies for God rather than the divine Persons, the risk that WE are the Pharisees chiding Christ for violating the Sabbath, and being chided ourselves by a God whom Mark describes as "angry".

Honestly it seems in the Gospels that few things anger Christ more than the rules sticklers, because His point is that we can be rules sticklers all we like, but if we are judging anyone by the standard of the degree to which we follow the rules, we are all massive failures. So that isn't what we should be doing. It leads to a hubristic sense of self as a good rule-follower when, in the eyes of God, the difference between ourselves and the ones we see as massive sinners is, indeed, minuscule.

As between the two approaches, I find the “trust and follow the divine Persons” approach more compelling than hitching myself to the local “rock”, whether that is scripture, tradition, hierarchy / magisterium… and all of the arguments about those are arguments about who has the better “rock”, to be honest.

I do NOT think, however, that there is any easy way to convince those who are inclined to be rules followers of this.

I have only gotten there by an extensive study of all three branches of Christianity (and extensive personal experience in two of them) and an increased emphasis on contemplative prayer, Christian mysticism, personal spirituality, and these kinds of things. I was also a person attached to my preferred “rock” once, as well. It is very hard to wean oneself from that — I am not sure it is possible to wean someone else from it.

Related

- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Constructing a Framework of Options (2021/3/15)
- Σ Frame (Jack): A Mystical Approach to Meta Reality (2021/3/19)
- Σ Frame (Jack): More on the Framework of Options (2021/3/22)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Spiritual Confusion of Clinging to the “Rules” (2021/3/24)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Viewpoints on Man’s Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021/3/29)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Ethical Issues Surrounding the Christian Conundrum (2021/4/5)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Juxtaposing the Temporal and the Eternal (2021/4/26)

Sex Appeal is not strongly correlated with Beauty

Jack · 30 April 2021 · Archived copy · Original

What makes Plain Jane so irresistible?

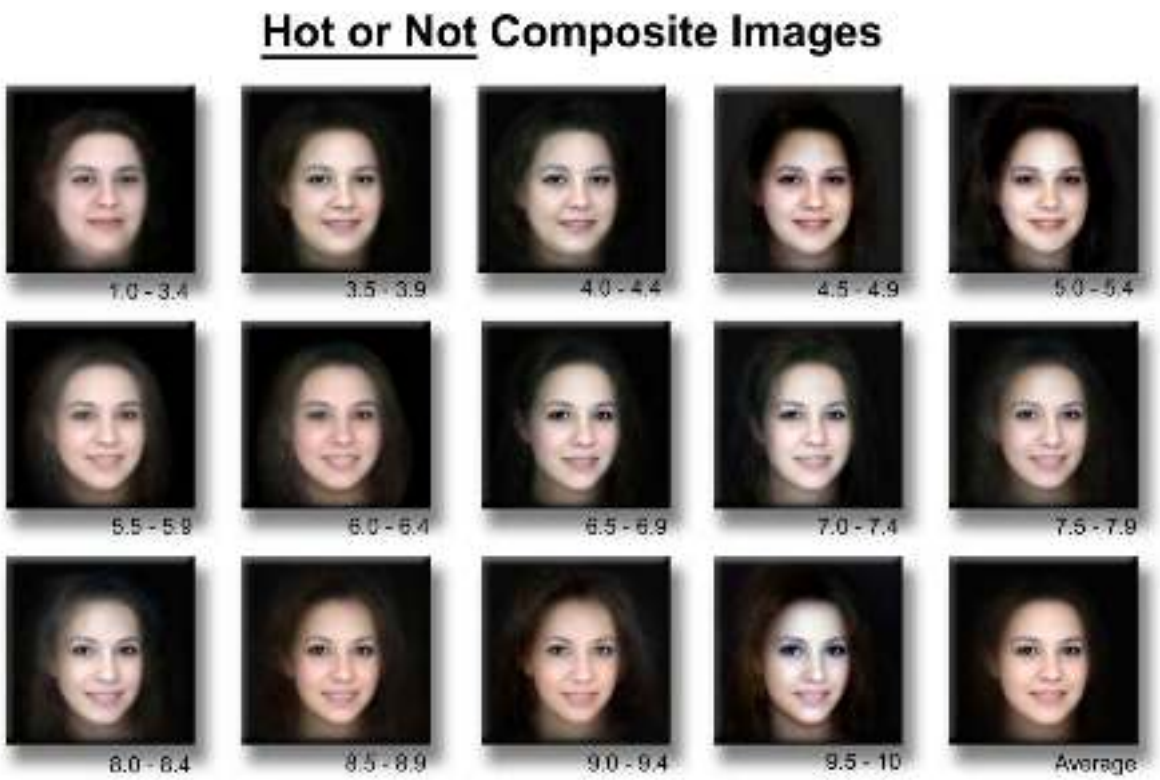
Readership: Men
Author's Note: This post received some input from NovaSeeker.
Reader's Note: This post will conclude this month's theme: The Inspiration of Beauty and Nature.

Introduction

In Asia, there is an idiom/stereotype that beautiful women marry rich men, and ugly women marry foreigners. It is laughed about, because everyone thinks it's true.

But as a foreigner myself, I disagree. I think that the foreign men I know who are married to Taiwanese wives, have very attractive wives – much more attractive than the average wife in Taiwan. I always recognized this as a cultural difference. But after mulling it over, I've realized that Asians are judging the attractiveness of a woman by Asian beauty standards, which place more value on facial attractiveness than any other aspect of aesthetic beauty, while foreign men typically judge the attractiveness of a woman based on her sex appeal. There is a difference.

This post will take a look at a few pictorial examples and review some of these differences.



What are the markers of female attractiveness?

In my experience, I've seen that outstanding beauty is not strongly correlated with attractiveness, or more bluntly, sex appeal. For example, supermodels are supposed to fit the bill of a perfect beauty, but there are lots of supermodels who can't pass a basic boner test. Then there are some women who are so average looking, not even modestly beautiful, and yet somehow, they have the ability to attract a lot of male attention, incite desire, and draw out men's protective instinct (or maybe just from certain kinds of men). I've also noticed that the latter type of women usually have many of the following aspects.

- Dimorphously feminine
- All the physical attributes of fertility (e.g. younger looking, thin, large perky bust, low WHR, etc.).
- Physical attributes of good health (e.g. long, thick, shiny hair, a glowing complexion, physically fit, etc.)
- They usually have healthy looking skin, but not always. Some have very bad acne, but it doesn't detract from the overall effect.
- Modestly applied makeup, or none at all
- A certain vulnerability in their personal presentation
- "Simple minded", not in the sense of being dumb, but in the sense of being happy, thankful, humble, and demure. They don't have a cynical, elaborate mental image of men and people in general.

I think something similar happens for women too, in how they view some men. I know that some women go nuts over certain men who are rather average by every classical Manospherian estimation. It's hard to tell either what percentage of people are like this, or what percentage of people experience attraction in this way. The actual number may be larger than we might guess, because a guy is unlikely to brag about having the hots for Slow Poke Sally.

Case Study – Purple Lena

NovaSeeker brought this example on Instagram to my attention as we were working on the coverage of OnlyFans back in February. This is a university student from Germany who posts no really racy pictures — no bathing suits, no lingerie, no "covered" nude shots, etc. She has an average face at best (perhaps even below average in some men's estimations), and doesn't seem to even really try with her hair. (It isn't terrible, but it isn't like what girls who are serious about IG pics try do with their hair.) But admittedly, she has a very nice body — curvy, leggy, fairly fit, and firm, nice skin.

She doesn't have an OF, but she has a Patreon page where she sells patronages and "VIP memberships". She says there openly that there are no nudes or even lingerie pictures, but just more pictures than what she posts on IG, and some "behind the scenes", and that she will read DMs. The highest level ("VIP") costs $117 per month! She says she limits these to 10, total, but the site says only 4 are remaining — so that means she's getting at least around $700 a month, from 6 “VIPs”, and who knows how much from her lower status levels (the next level down costs $17.50/month). I’ll bet she’s making around USD$1,000 per month. And this is by having a very small number of guys pay, and not having any nude/lingerie/sexy content (other than the “sexy” street clothes you can see girls wearing every summer in any public space), and the “privilege” of her reading your DMs. And this for a girl who is not even a minor celeb, and who doesn’t have an objectively pretty face. But obviously, there must be something about her that is considered attractive to men.

If this girl were willing to take pictures in her underwear and bathing suits, she’d probably make a few thousand USD per month quite easily, and again, she isn’t a beauty queen.

It’s really incredible what guys will pay for. There are lots of desperate guys out there driving this, no doubt. But even so, a man could, just as easily, drop his money on another girl who has a more beautiful face and is posting nudes, or else browse the perfect 10s on Porn Tube for free.

I would not doubt that this German girl is getting most of her money from German gamer dudes who have seen her on gaming streams and so on, because she says that’s how she got started posting pictures in response to requests from her viewers.

Propinquity and familiarity (or virtual propinquity/familiarity in this case) might explain this.

Photo Gallery

I’ve collected a few photographs of women that capture this phenomenon. They appear below in order of decreasing beauty and increasing attractiveness.

Very beautiful, but not very attractive: She's smoking hot, but something about that piercing gaze says she's got a high maintenance b!tch shield that's not worth the effort.

Beautiful, but only moderately attractive: She has a classic feminine beauty, but her watery eyes are cold and empty. That kind of neediness and insecurity combined with fear and distrust will wear a man completely down and out.

Rather beautiful and rather attractive: Another classic feminine beauty, but this one is different. There is no negative energy. I can almost feel what it must be like to put my arm around that gorgeously thin WHR, and keep her walking next to me, hips bumping, until she melts in my arm.

Attractive and somewhat beautiful: Thick dark hair, a charismatic smile, full breasts, and that adorable WHR make her an eye-popping wowzer! Square shoulders, a long, slim neck, and a straight nose add a touch of elegant class.

Attractive, but not so beautiful: Cheesy smile, hair is bohemian, earrings are goofy, arm is as crooked as a horse's leg… But OMG, that figure! Suddenly all those other oddities now lend a unique charm.

Attractive, but not beautiful: A perfectly proportioned figure, long, thick, shiny hair, and an innocent, playful smile on a young Butter face!

Alluringly attractive, but not beautiful: Good facial symmetry, large eyes, long hair, and a glowing complexion sans makeup, all make her stand out as a prize pick.

Conclusions

As you can see, some of the women pictured above are beautiful but not attractive, while others are attractive but not beautiful. The cold, statuesque image of beauty is what is toted as the ideal, but this doesn't necessarily pass the proverbial boner test.

Moreover, I believe there is a spiritual element of attraction that has been completely overlooked or dismissed within Manospherian literature.

A part of this difference might be described as being able to incite desire without being classically beautiful. It's hard to tell how humble these women actually are.

Exit Question: What do you think creates sexual appeal when beauty is substandard or lacking? Please comment.

Related

- The Rules Revisited: Feminine Beauty Is Highly Controllable (September 21, 2011)
- The Rules Revisited: The Importance of Hair (March 10, 2012)
- The Rules Revisited: How to Improve Your Hair (March 17, 2012)
- The Rules Revisited: What Men Think of You Without Makeup (April 1, 2013)
- The Rules Revisited: Older Women Can Still Be Sexy (September 15, 2015)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Women Don't Really Understand Male Attraction and Implications (April 12, 2017)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Feminine Beauty is Highly Controllable – Theory and Analysis Part 2 (April 20, 2017)
- Planners Shop: What Do Men Find Attractive In Women? (2020 November 17)

The Cross of Our Age

Novaseeker · 3 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Our placement in this place and time by God's Providence tests how much we are willing to suffer sexually in order to follow our Lord.

Readership: Christian Men
Author's Note: This post expands a comment I left under Lexet's post, Charting the Red Pill World (2021 March 26). Recently, there has been a spike in commenting under this post, so I wanted to elaborate on this aspect of suffering a little further.
Length: 2,800 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

In the course of life, Christians have always been called to suffer in solidarity with Christ's own suffering for us, and the Gospels themselves specifically talk about this. For example…

> "[24] Then Jesus told his disciples, "If anyone would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. [25] For whoever would save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for my sake will find it. [26] For what will it profit a man if he gains the whole world and forfeits his soul? Or what shall a man give in return for his soul?"
>
> Matthew 16:24-26, cf. Luke 9:23

And again we read in 1 Peter 4:

> "[13] But rejoice insofar as you share Christ's sufferings, that you may also rejoice and be glad when his glory is revealed. … [16] Yet if anyone suffers as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God in that name."

This suffering takes many forms in the daily lives of all of us, and is not confined to any one specific area or circumstance of life. However, in the current Western world, with its very pre-eminent centering of sex, and given the testosterone-driven male sex drive, many Christian men who wish to remain faithful to the moral law of God sexually are being urgently and loudly called by Him to intense, ongoing, lifetime suffering in this area, in one way or another, and with very limited options.

In the post cited, Lexet brought this situation to a fine point in writing that,

> "Christians are limited in their choices by scripture. When it comes to sexuality, we have only 3 options: (1) live a celibate life; (2) play with fire and risk spending eternity on fire; or (3) marry."

Yes. When we examine what this actually means, in practical terms, for Christian men living in the 21st Century West, we can see that the Lord is currently calling Christian men to embrace suffering in this specific area in some form, regardless of their life circumstances.

1. Choice (1) is suffering, clearly.
2. Choice (2) is eternal death.
3. Choice (3) is also suffering for almost all men who undertake it with Christian ideas.

So unless you want to flirt with eternal death, you have to "pick your poison" of suffering.

The trouble is that this is not an approach to life that sits well with many Westerners of this era, and particularly many Americans, even Christian Americans, who are very wary of what they see as a "doom and gloom" approach to the issues presented by life. This dissonance creates a good deal of tension and frustration as people bang their heads against the wall trying to find a way to get what they want in life, in a way that is morally acceptable, but which doesn't involve suffering either way.

After all, this is America. It's a culture that has always thrived on optimism, whether called for or not. We do pain just fine — "No pain, no gain!", and "Pick your pain, discipline or regret!" We're good with pain, as long as pain is tied to personal effort and personal achievement. As long as it is chosen pain, pain we voluntarily incur, pain we take on in the service of an end we desire. And we're also fine with pain we see as just desserts, as the righteous come-uppance for foolish personal decisions. Either way, we're generally comfortable with pain that we can trace back to our own choices — either healthy ("No pain, no gain!") or unhealthy (just desserts).

We really suck, culturally, at existential pain, however — pain that just is, that is not our own doing, that can't be overcome, that is inescapable, structural, existential — and suffering as an existential state of solidarity with the suffering of Christ.

Some Christian Sects are more open to Suffering than others

In the same post, Lexet posed the question,

> "Why is the Catholic [Red Pill] the largest subset of the Religious [Red Pill]?"

I think that the reason why this is the case is because, as among Christian churches, the Catholics embrace the virtue of suffering the most openly.

Traditional Catholicism (not the gay-dominated Francis Church, mind you, but actual Catholicism, which exists in pockets scattered throughout the Catholic Church) has a very well developed theology and spirituality of suffering. It recognizes that existential suffering for the cause of Christ is a life path, and not a circumstantial state to be managed or avoided if possible. Therefore, men who are conservative or traditional Catholics will be familiar with the idea of suffering in solidarity with Christ, and some of them will embrace it more readily. Thus, they will tend to be less repulsed by the obvious conclusions I reached above that a Red Pill analysis of the current social landscape leads to for Christians — that for most men it's suffering, either way. Some portion of Catholics will accept this and see it as normal, and not exceptional, but rather simply the way in which suffering is going to play out for many of them in this otherwise comfortable, protected age.

Other kinds of Christians, especially many Protestant Christians, come from traditions that do not feature anything like the old Catholic spirituality of suffering-in-solidarity (and many of the more conservative sorts of Protestants may be wary of the concept, despite its scriptural mooring, due to common taboos about "merit" and "works" and so on, or the fear that such a concept undermines the "once and for all" nature of Christ's sacrifice on the Cross). These religion-specific reasons, coupled with the general American cultural distaste for existential pain, lead to many of these men viscerally rejecting the suffering implied by the Red Pill's analysis as being "too negative" or because it "doesn't offer a solution". In fact, this is the constant, endless, refrain, like a resounding, erroneous antiphon that one hears from these types of guys. Catholics don't have that issue, so they tend to be more open to TRP ideas, while being hostile to the PUA side of the tactics.

In his own analysis, Lexet described a few aspects of Catholicism that may tend to increase one's openness to the concept of suffering-in-solidarity:

1. Traditional — Lots of vocal conservatives who appreciate and promulgate tradition.
2. Unified — Their identity is based on the monolithic Catholic Church.
3. Based — God's order and Christian living is emphasized. Simping is restricted to the veneration of Mary (no women clergy/pastors/teachers like Beth Moore, etc.)
4. Sex Structured — The church has a theology of sex that is taught and is strict on paper (even though many do not follow it).

He also offered four counterpoints to explain why Protestants have an aversion to the prospect of suffering.

1. Non-Traditional — There is no appreciation of any tradition, and while in the more strict circles purity culture is taught, said culture has many inconsistencies and tends to pedestalize women, which in turn, tends to further reduce the receptivity to any notion that men are suffering under the current socio-sexual regime.
2. Multi-Denominational Factions – There is no central, unified identity that cooperates with each other, especially with conservative-minded Protestants, who tend to be much less denominational, much more independent, and therefore much less aligned.
3. Postmodern — The vast majority of the Protestant churches trend left of center (a perspective which tends to identify social or material causes for suffering rather than seeing them as existential in nature).
4. Sex Vapidity — Doctrines on sex are not taught and/or enforced.

Lexet added an interesting tangential note.

> "Politically right wing Protestants of all stripes share a common link with Rushdoony's dominion movement, which kicked off the American home school movement.
>
> That's where Wilson comes from, and that's the same movement that influences so many of the family life's, Focus on the Family, etc."

Trust in Others Enables Trust in God and Empowers Us to Bear our Cross

Personal suffering is often used, by believers and non-believers alike, as a reason to blame God for all the evils in the world. Whenever one is faced with suffering, especially when that suffering can't be blamed on someone or something specific, there is definitely a choice to be made. One can plunge into self-pity and become resentful towards God and the world, or else, one can patiently endure it as a test/trial of faith, and experience renewal and change as a result at some later time.

The ability to bear suffering in this way — to bear suffering that just happens to us, and can't easily be "blamed" on someone or something specific, as Americans are wont to do — depends to a significant degree on one's level of trust — trust in God and trust in one's interactions with other people.

The Bible is pretty clear that we should not "place our trust in man", so it is easy for a Christian to never realize that trust is of central importance. Aside from these scriptural warnings, there is a deeper issue about being able to trust in general, and that it is OK to trust certain people, maybe even vital. Trust is closely related to faith and confidence, and we need to work on this if our relationship with God is to improve to the point of being healthy and vibrant. To put it plainly, it is extremely hard for us to actually place our full trust in God if we at the same time are distrustful of most everyone around us who shares the image of God.

Trust, I think, is an area where we as Americans will tend to be pretty retrograde in. The current version of our culture is very individualistic and therefore not particularly trusting. That wasn't always the case — there used to be more trust between people when the American lifestyle was less mobile, when people knew the people around them more intimately, and when most relationships endured over the course of a lifetime. But that has seeped away as we have become more mobile and increasingly rootless, and of course more culturally, economically, and politically divided, and more fractured and more individualist over the last 50-70 years. This has also happened with Christians (just like all the other cultural changes have, too), and it's kind of crept up on people due to the high level of material comfort and the superficial pleasantries that are still customarily exchanged among strangers in America.

For many Christians, the collapse of the influence of Christianity on the broader culture has led to a kind of retreat from that culture — a tendency to create a parallel culture that is "faithful" and not "heathen". What Christians miss is that in taking this approach, they are doing basically the same thing as everyone else in this culture is doing: sorting themselves into localized silos of the like-minded. This approach is not counter-cultural at all, it is actually representative of what the entire culture has done, more or less, since the 1990s. And it generally makes Christians less trustful of the people outside the "Christian" silo, to one degree or other.

While, for the reasons I note above, it is very tempting to American Christians in particular to take this approach, given our pre-existing cultural tendencies toward rugged individualism, which has now metastasized into the current hyper-individualist climate, to try to deal with the current chaos by rolling up the bridges and being "me and Jesus" — even if "me" is "my family" or "my church", or "me, my church, and the people we're evangelizing" … it's still a limited group, a hiving off. And that process of hiving off can be where we cut off trust, and thereby indirectly limit our ability to develop further in our relationship of trust with God. And as it turns out, the "me and Jesus" (or "we and Jesus" as the case may be) approach can isolate us to the degree that it impedes our ability to develop the depth of trust in God that enables us to suffer in solidarity with Christ within the setting of our social adjustments. Without these firm, long standing relationships which are conducive to His will for our lives, including experiences of His love and grace expressed through others, it is easy for us to grow spiritually priggish, lax, and dull.

This happens because the less we trust others in terms of what is happening around us in real life, the more of a problem this becomes in our relationship with God, and the element of trusting in Him. This happens to us because other people bear the divine image, and therefore reflect God, in a particular and imperfect way, to us, and so when we are not trusting towards them (in a non-reckless way) we are holding back from someone who reflects, however imperfectly, God. This does spill over into our relationship with God Himself. Jesus specifically told us,

> "Truly I tell you, whatever you did not do for one of the least of these, you did not do for me."
>
> Matthew 25:45

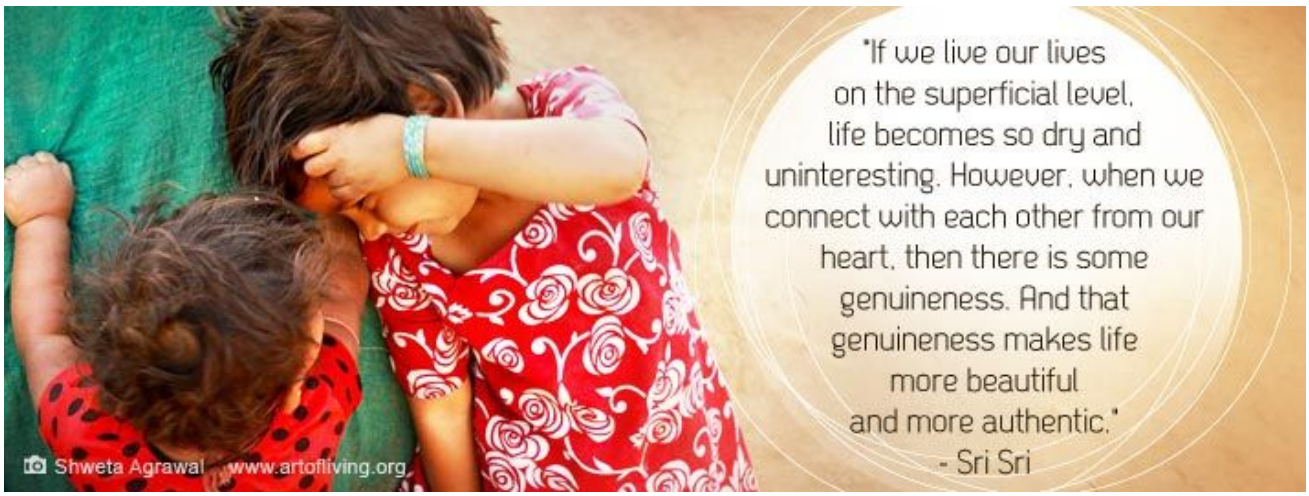
In other words, when we do not give others our trust (again, not in a reckless way, but in a non-reckless way), we are holding back trust from God Himself, and this does impact our direct relationship with God as well.

In this way, the current suffering experienced by most Christian men in the way of relationships could be seen as an opportunity for spiritual growth, both in terms of their relationship with God but also, critically, in terms of their relationships with other people. Specifically, men who are having a harder time bearing this difficult Cross which the age demands us to bear will likely have an easier time doing so if they learn to trust God more, which, itself, will often involve opening themselves to trust others more. This could involve trusting people who will inevitably let them down, but this in itself is a part of the experience of living in the world. — The critical part, from a spiritual perspective, is not the letting down which we are apt to focus on, but the courageous act of opening to trust to begin with, and the decision to remain open to trust, for the sake of God and our trust in Him, and in recognition and acceptance of His clear teaching regarding the impact of our approach to others on our relationship with Him.



Conclusions

Suffering in the context of intersexual relationships is the Cross of our age, and we must bear it, as Christian men. The statement from God at this moment in time is clear and deafeningly loud: Our placement in this place and time by God's Providence means that we are to be tested by how much we are willing to suffer sexually in order to follow our Lord. That is what the current scenario means for men having the following traits.

- Christian men who desire to pursue sexual holiness.
- Men who are not in the top 20% of SMV.
- Men who don't have the bag of personal traits (determination, drive, discipline, adaptiveness, etc.) to get and stay in that top 20% of Christian men.
- Christian men who don't satisfy the current "secular attraction requirements" of women to such a degree that they can successfully attract and retain a Christian woman as a wife in a successful, happy and fulfilling marriage.

These men, which is most of us, are called to suffer, and often quite a lot, in this aspect of their lives, no matter whether they opt in Lexet's choice (1) or choice (3), as outlined above.

The positive side of the conclusions of this essay is that nurturing our ability and willingness to trust courageously can mitigate the grinding hopelessness of suffering sexually by adding a meaningful context of social support.

Related

- Σ Frame: God's Silence During Suffering (2009 December 14)
- Σ Frame (Scott): We Marry Our Own Cross (2020 May 18)
- Dollar Shave Club (Chris Bourn): Why Talking to Strangers Is the Best Thing You Can Do for Your Mental Health (2020 July 17)
- Σ Frame: On the Turning Away (2021 March 5)
- Σ Frame: The Relinquished Life (2021 March 8)
- Σ Frame: The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021 March 12)
- Σ Frame: More on the Framework of Options (2021 March 22)

Cultural Influences on Asian OASIS Starlets

Jack · 5 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

An exploration of Asian acculturation as it relates to western sexuality.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This essay has received significant input from NovaSeeker.
Reader's Note: The author has lived in Taiwan for almost 17 years at the time of this writing.
Trigger Warning: This article discusses racial differences.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 16 minutes

Introduction

Back in January, we looked at The Rise of the Amateur Online Sex Industry. Three noteworthy case studies who were focal points of this series, Nikole Mitchell, Mikayla Samountry, and Belle Delphine, are all of Asian descent (Korean, Laotian, and Chinese, respectively). It seems like an odd coincidence that the first two women are both Amer-Asian, and Delphine is British-Asian. Honestly, we didn't pick these examples because they are Asian. It just so happens that something very curious occurs when Asian women enter into the world of Anglo Femlightenment, and this amalgamation contributes to the fact that many of the top female stars are Asian.

So really, what is it about Anglo-Asian women that creates this star studded sexuality and overall popularity* in general?

This post will offer westerners some insights into the Asian mystique.

Cultural Differences

In the west, men are judged by their confidence and persona, and women are judged by their beauty and social status, and everybody is seen through those lenses. Granted, there are many socially acceptable "overlays" that are adopted to shroud the reality of these intersexual perceptions, but it is what it is. The Red Pill is a late attempt to remove these overlays to reveal this basic human nature to the awareness.

Compared to Anglo-Saxon culture, there is much more variation among Asians in terms of personality, values, belief systems, and socialization. In my view, Asian people in general, and Asian women in particular, run a very wide spectrum, compared to westerners. The best of them are literally angels, and these quickly get snatched up by upper echelon men into marriage. Those who are not so good (as per comprehensive MMV) tend to travel / live abroad and/or marry foreigners.

I've written much more about cultural differences in two earlier posts.

- Σ Frame: The Cultural Contrast between the West and Far Eastern Asia (2015/7/9)
- Σ Frame: A Historical Contrast: Western and Asian Women (2018/9/15)

Aesthetic Appearances

There is a common stereotype in the west that "Asian women don't get fat."

After living in Asia for many years, I can tell you a few things about this.

When Asian women are thin, their bodies look sleek and petite. Most Asian women don't have buxom T&A like other races (some do), but they do have flat stomachs, good proportions, and graceful lines and curves. They can be very cute, and some are stunning. But if they gain a little extra weight, that impression evaporates leaving the formless, androgenous look that is stereotypical.

Asian women can get fat, just like any other race, but most Asian women are too conscious of their appearances to let themselves go too far. Asian women are very concerned about this, and a lot of Asian women actually starve themselves to stay thin. They usually don't allow themselves to gain weight until they've reached an age when they no longer care about garnering attention and making social impressions. A lot of this is due to acculturation, so Asians who grew up outside of Asia don't place as much emphasis on this (especially American Asians). However, an Anglo-Asian woman who does make the effort to stay thin will stand out like a superstar!

Of note, cosmetic surgery is commonplace in Taiwan and in Korea. 25% of women aged 21-30, and 35% aged 31-40, had plastic surgery in South Korea in 2020. I would guess it's about the same in Taiwan. The most common cosmetic treatments are laser treatments for skin blemishes, followed by blepharoplasty (eye-jobs), and rhinoplasty (nose-jobs).

Needs and Expectations

Compared to western white women (WWW), there seems to be a much higher percentage of Asian women who need material comforts to be happy. Also, compared to WWW, there is a lower percentage of Asian women who view sexual fulfillment / contentment as indispensable. It has been interesting for me to find that many Asian women I've known easily recognize and accept these traits about themselves, and the differences between themselves and WWW. To paraphrase some common proverbs, I've heard said statements like…

- "No money, no honey!"
- "It's better to cry in a Benz than to laugh in a Toyota."
- "White women can live in the woods (viz. a poor financial condition) happily as long as they have a macho man."
- "You know how [insert other race] men/women can't keep their pants on/knees together/etc."

From my initial impression, I had the idea that Asian women were frigid gold-diggers. But after living in Taiwan for a while, and dating some women here, I learned that this is simply not true. They can be extremely generous to those whom they care about (freely offering gifts and spots in the low US$ hundreds range), and their sexual enthusiasm is definitely not lacking.

All of the above are due to both cultural and racial differences.

In the US, women who emphasize money and luxury are dismissed as materialistic, but in Asia, it is accepted as an intrinsic characteristic of female nature. So it is expected that a man should supply sufficient material comfort to the woman if he wants her to stick around. Actually, this is true, and it fits the Biblical concept of women.

In Asia, women who emphasize sexual fulfillment are dismissed as hedonic and/or low class, and in many cases, emotionally needy or broken. But again, it is not viewed as something dirty or abnormal as some religiously conservative Westerners might see it. A word roughly translated as “chowderhead” is considered to be a more offensive insult to a woman than $1ut or wh0re, and is used for equivalent purposes.

In the U.S. by comparison, sexual fantasy (AKA ‘romance’) is accepted as an intrinsic characteristic of female nature (although it is taboo to talk about it as such). So it is covertly expected that a man should fulfill all her romantic / sexual needs if he wants her to stick around. Asian women can intuitively recognize this trait about WWW, but in the west, only the Red Pill will openly admit this.

So, it is kind of the opposite situation between the East and the West, including the openness about the facts. Asians are quite honest about human nature and they’ll joke about the bad aspects. But Westerners want to paper over the embarrassing aspects, thinking it rude, profane, or non-PC to be so honest.

Case Study 1 – Nikole Mitchell

Let’s go over Nikole Mitchell’s situation again from the viewpoints of her acculturation.

Physically, Nikole is one of the few Amer-Asian girls who can plausibly hide her identity. When I first saw her pictures in that article at the NY Post, I thought she had a very attractive face and especially interesting and striking eyes, but she didn’t strike me as Asian, even in part. But … once you know she’s Amer-Asian, if you look back at the pictures … you immediately see it very clearly, and it’s hard from thence forward to not see her as Asian-American, even in terms of her appearance. She’s kind of “stealth” in that regard. She doesn’t hide it totally, to her credit, but she totally doesn’t emphasize it, either, which she can manage because of how she specifically looks, and this is likely convenient for her in terms of her cultural distancing from her Korean-ness at this stage of her life as well. Her three brothers (there is a family picture from the last few years somewhere in her Instagram feed) are all much more obviously Korean-American than Nikole is, in terms of appearance. I wonder if they are culturally as well.

To me, she seems rather “Americanized”, and far removed from her Korean ancestry. However, we do have a few clues about that side of her. Her mother is Korean, not Korean-American, but Korean. Nikole is “Korean enough” to be bilingual, and when her husband John met her she was teaching in Korea. But, unlike him, she wasn’t teaching English to Korean kids, she was teaching “real subjects” in a Korean high school. So I think she is much, much more Korean than she likes to emphasize or portray to western audiences. She is probably hiding certain characteristics and mannerisms that would give it away.

In addition to that, I think we also have to be careful to assume that Nikole’s descriptions of her own background reflect what she was being taught in the home / church about things, or rather whether they reflect the ideology she adopted when she became associated with the LGBT ideology and all of its writings. My guess is that it’s a mix of both, but some of the ways that she chooses to describe things are so textbook feminist that they can’t have been ideas she had before she read them in some feminist text. This is even doubly the case because Christianity is being made to do all the work, rather than sharing the work with her Korean-ness, because she wants to pin things on one side and not the other — because pinning it on both would be uncool in 2021.

In fact, I think a good amount of her complaints about “patriarchy”, and her angst about “roles for women” and “the role of sex”, and so on, it is directed not only at the US culture (although it certainly is directed at our culture here), but also at Asian patriarchal culture, because although her father himself is American, she grew up with Korean cultural influences in her house due to her mother and presumably extended family in Korea, and this seems to have formed cultural expectations in the home as well (which is understandable, given the role that “Tiger Mom’s” set in that regard).

Thus, when we consider how her personal issues stem from both sources, we see her behavior as being rather curious in that she only talks about one of them — she doesn't want to talk about the Korean side of things, because that doesn't play well in our culture, where it is not fashionable to point out that non-American cultures are less "progressive" about women's issues. And she does that even when one such culture was obviously front and center in her life. If anything she works very hard to hide her Korean-ness most of the time, and that's probably because of the dissonance it creates in her.

Nikole strikes me as someone who likes to tout her "biracial" background when she wants to, as an intersectional "box-checker", like she does with LGBT. But in fact, she does not currently have anything to do with the Korean-American community, nor anything else relating to that aspect of her identity, probably because she sees it as totally unsupportive and retrograde. In that regard, in light of her current choices, she is probably correct!

We know from John that Nikole's relationship with her family is "strained" due to her choices. This is likely from all of them, but I would not be surprised if a good amount of the reason why it is so strained is that she has done things now that are real "face"-losers for her mother and, to a lesser extent, her three brothers for the reasons cited above — Asian culture does not support a woman following her own sexual lust where ever it may lead her like American culture often does, even if the family had some financial struggles which likely reduced their opinion of John to some degree.

In this regard, I think it's important to remember that Nikole is very public about what she is doing, so to the extent that the family has friends and relatives and so on, at least some of whom must be Korean, they may have (likely some certainly have) seen her Instagram, and know all the details about Nikole's current lifestyle — if that's the case, it's a devastating loss of face for her mother and, to the extent they care (and I am guessing they do somewhat) her three brothers. From her family's perspective of "losing face", her decision is most likely seen as some form of rebellion or revenge, and I'm sure that makes repairing the breach even harder than it would be in the case of a purely "Western" family, which views conservative rebellion as more or less acceptable, or at least expected to some degree, which the culture of her mother's family does not. It also makes it more plausible that she is as independent and isolated as John describes — because a WWW would not be so isolated, even if she made Nikole's choices, due to the overwhelming tendency of western culture to support any choices made by a WWW.

Now that she is in the top 0.1% of OnlyFans earners, I wonder how high she would have to get, or how much income she would have to have, before her family starts to get over the shame of it all, and begin to feel like it is acceptable to them.

Case Study 2 – Makayla Samountry

Makayla Samountry was another case study we covered before. I was very curious about her surname — it turns out it's Laotian-American. Minnesota has a small but significant Laotian community, which readers may not know about. It seems clear that Makayla is not pure Laotian, either, but like Nikole, she has a kind of ambiguous look ethnically — although she looks less white than Nikole does … perhaps more mixed Latin or something like that, but I would guess that has to do with the difference between NE and SE Asia more than anything else.

Samountry mentions in her videos that her family was not thrilled about her activities on OnlyFans, and her detailing them for the broader public on her popular YouTube channel, and about her break-up with her landlord / boyfriend which happened in the wake of her OnlyFans success, but she is much less of an open book than Nikole Mitchell is. Still, she is an example of a woman from a fairly restricted East Asian cultural background really going to the other extreme in the context of the much more permissive local culture of the United States.

The Special Recipe for Star Studded Sino Sexuality

NovaSeeker mentioned before that Sticking the Landing is for the Elite. Women who are UMC or higher, and are able to stick the landing, have the following traits.

1. Attractiveness / Looks
2. Discipline
3. Intelligence / Smarts
4. Education
5. Upbringing

To put this into the context of the present discussion, Asian culture, including the women, aspire to all of these things. (Intelligence cannot be changed, but it is something they value.) Money / wealth is regarded as both a motivator and a benefit. To be honest, the first four attributes offer a seemingly negative but fairly true description of Asian women in general.

Specifically, the shared traits of the Asian starlets we've covered in our study of OASIS (Nikole Mitchell, Makayla Samountry, and Belle Delphine) include (1) being comparatively attractive, (2) disciplined, and (3) focused. These three traits line up with NovaSeeker's first three points. And while Delphine does not appear to have attended university, both Mitchell and Samountry have college degrees).

It's at least possible that among Anglo-Asian women there is an odd intersection that happens between Asian-sourced focus on wealth (i.e. the greedy gold-diggerness stereotype) and American-sourced sexual fulfillment (as characterized by licentiousness). The cross-cultural influences of NovaSeeker's last two points, education and upbringing, introduce both (4) cash consciousness, and (5) sexual adventurism into the mix, and all at the same time.

Seems like an interesting combo of traits to say the least, and probably not at all the kind of combo that their parents were expecting the mix to yield. In some ways, it's like attractive Anglo-Asian women are the "fully loaded vehicle" predators of the OASIS, possessing the perfect combination of drive, savvy, looks and materialism to propel them to extreme levels of success in a culture which has no practical limits on the ability of women with such traits to monetize them to great effect.

Westerners might have the notion that these traits describe a strong, independent, feminist woman. However, all these things can appear attractive as positive attributes if her husband can access the benefits of those traits, as opposed to being a victim or tool of such a woman. Western men only know that it's hə11 to be the victim of the same, but Asian men kind of expect their women to pull a little of their own weight in certain regards, and if the woman has the same mind, then these traits are considered to be positives. This may be another reason why Asian women are so highly demanded by men of all races.

 Note: The appeal of Anglo-Asian females is not limited to the Meat Market. We also see noteworthy Asian females rise to popularity in other venues as well. One example worth mentioning here is S. G. Cheah, an author at Evie magazine who writes articles that are more based than not. Take this one for example…

Evie Magazine (S. G. Cheah): The Feminization Of Men Cheats Women Out Of Our Natural Desire To Admire Strong Men (2021/1/2)

Cheah gets a whole lot of stuff right! Except that she seems to mistakenly think that MGTOW starts with men's unhealthy thinking, not with an unhealthy world to which those men then naturally react in order to protect themselves. So there is still that lack of ordinary women taking any responsibility for the mess they created. Apparently radical feminists and their soy boys are to blame. (It's always somebody else's fault!)

The article is perhaps a sign that the Red Pill message is gaining a bit more traction, even if it is only one Feminist author who is seemingly only asking us to return to Complementarianism. The fact that a Feminist magazine published it at all is shocking. It kind of goes back to my long standing point that the most influential contributors to Based / Red Pill philosophy in the west all hail from foreign cultures.

 H/T: Sharkly's comment under It was god's will for her to be a stripper! (2021/1/22)*

Related

- Σ Frame (Jack): Cross Culture Relationships and Dating in Taiwan (2016/10/17)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Hijacking and Misappropriating Eastern Mysticism (2020/1/23)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Exploiting Online Attention (2020/12/9)

The Taiwanese Life Script

Jack · 8 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A glimpse of the social structure in Taiwan.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: The author has lived in Taiwan for almost 17 years at the time of this writing.
Length: 2,600 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

The Contribution of Asian Culture

The majority of Asian societies are patriarchal. One of the most outstanding aspects of a patriarchal society is that people are expected to be respectful towards parents, seniors, and certain other people, especially males, who hold an authoritative position, such as a supervisor, manager, business owner, teacher, professor, community leader or even simply the head of a household.

The Chinese value of Filial Piety is a good example. Generally, Filial Piety means to be good to one's parents, to take care of them, to show love, respect and support; to display courtesy; ensure male heirs, uphold fraternity among brothers, and eschew rebellion. Children are expected to advise one's parents wisely, support them financially, defend their reputation and sense of moral righteousness, and display sorrow for calamities afflicting the family, such as financial turmoil, sickness, and death. Filial piety also entails that one should engage in good conduct, not just towards parents, but also outside the home so as to bring a good name to one's parents and ancestors. It is considered honorable to perform the duties of one's job well, so as to obtain the material means to support one's parents in old age and add to the wealth of the extended family.

Thus, those people, including women, who grow up in these societies value education and professionalism, and learn to honor and respect others. During their lives they hone these skills to a fine art. This particular aspect of eastern societies does much to set in place many of the other qualities described later.

There is also a strong sense of collectivism, so people are very sensitive about the context and implications of any particular idea. People who think or behave in any manner that is ostensibly different from the norm would typically be either rejected, or labeled as an outsider, by some definition. Family members who act unilaterally and against the interests of the larger family are blamed and ostracized until they fall in line. So, far-eastern Asians view western individualism as selfish and absolutely cannot understand it as a value.

Also, because of the pressure to conform and cooperate, the majority of Asians tend to spend more time obsessing over family interests, and since weighty matters are decided by the leading patriarch of the family, the others are free to pursue various interests that are light-weight by comparison, such as health and fitness, and following gossip and fashion trends prevalent in popular media outlets. Westerners who notice this tend to interpret it as superficiality or pretentiousness, but Asians consider it to be a psychological luxury to not have to be concerned with portentous matters.

General Goals and Values

The Taiwanese approach to success is very disciplined. Much attention and effort are devoted towards education and “bettering one’s self” usually through developing some kind of talent or useful skill. This value is connected not so much to personal development, as westerners are inclined to think, but more along the lines of attaining social pertinence, preserving financial security, and developing the ability to make important life decisions without being limited by social or financial constraints. Thus, it is understandable why young people are encouraged to pursue education and career first and foremost, and this is seen to be a foundation to which other aspects of life may be discovered and added. This emphasis is expected and fully supported by the family. It is not uncommon for aunts and uncles to pool their money in order to allow their most promising son or daughter to study abroad.

Social Structure

In Taiwan, the social code demands that everyone, no matter what their situation in life, should find some way to "fit in" to the cultural mythos (which is based on Confucianism and Filial Piety), and not cause disturbances, inconveniences, increased expenses without a good purpose, nor make an embarrassing scene. People who contribute much, accomplish much, and/or support others, are seen as better or more honorable, and people who are what we would call "parasites" or "trouble makers" are seen as bad or low.

Men in Taiwan, young and old, are under a lot of pressure, and are rated and observed much more than women are. Women in Taiwan, as in many Asian cultures, are less valued and scrutinized than males, simply because they contribute less to the wealth and honor of the family, and instead tend to be burdensome liabilities in this respect. Females are considered to be a man's property, or subject to a man's control, but it is unacceptably rude and disrespectful to women to talk about it in these terms.

Westerners are typically offended by the fact that women are valued less than men in Asia, but the upside of this dynamic is that Asian women are liberated from heavy responsibilities and the burden of performance, and therefore lead relatively leisurely lives. A common saying that captures the attitude that Taiwanese women have in the face of a challenge is, "When the sky falls down, I will simply stay flat. A man will eventually come along and take care of it."

Those Asian women who wish to have more freedom in pursuing their own interests in life and who want to escape their responsibilities to family are drawn to western culture and non-Asian men from Western cultures, especially those who are white. (Western men who take an interest in Asian women should be aware of this dynamic.) Over the past 20 years, there has been an increasing number of Taiwanese women who pursue a lifestyle based on the feminist ideologies of western culture. This focus on herself, and her disinterest in family, are the same reasons why these women are considered to be less valuable, less desirable, or unsuitable for marriage by Asian men. As a result, about 25% of Taiwanese women marry western foreigners, and about 10% of Taiwanese men marry foreign women from surrounding SEA countries who have more traditional family values.

Social Hierarchies

Westerners experience humility by recognizing individual talents and weaknesses, expressed through personality. Asians tend to have a better handle on humility in recognizing one's place in creation, where some people need your help, while you need help from others. Most Asians recognize that humility is the very same state that opens one's heart to experience life. Whereas for westerners, it is not part of the common consciousness that humility is a part of life, but instead, humility is commonly misunderstood as piousness, obsequiousness, and sometimes shame.

Because of this appreciation of honor and humility, in Asia, and particularly in Chinese-influenced Asian cultures, a person's place in life is very important for figuring out cues for the social hierarchy and who is worthy of respect. Things like age, job position, marital status, how many children one has, how much money one makes, etc. are all cues that indicate social hierarchy. These things are personal/private to most western-thinking people, but in Asia, it is more important to identify your standing in society so that others can know where you fit in.

In some places like Korea, this will even affect how they literally speak to you, by what honorary titles and tones they use.

Usually, the reveal is accompanied by a bit of humor because asking certain questions (like age) can be irritating or embarrassing. For example, if you are lucky and look younger than your age, it is always a good thing to let them know your actual age. (People in this situation often ask others to guess their age.)

Furthermore, in most of Asia, every interaction must have one person who is mutually recognized as the senior. The senior has a responsibility to guide and nurture the junior. The junior has the responsibility to honor and respect the senior. Even among peers, senior-junior roles will be adopted based on the senior's expertise in a mutually held value. Upon first meeting, people prioritize identifying each other and quickly fall into these roles for the sake of social fluidity.

Thus, people in Taiwan have an intense need to constantly be informed of the "pecking order", all the business and social dealings, and even who has what, in painstaking detail. (In comparison, the western concepts of privacy and individuality seem arrogantly selfish, and stinks of deception.) This strong need to stay informed seems to indicate that people don't know how to interact unless they know their exact place in society, and this becomes a basic psychological need that consumes a lot of their attention and mental energy.

To make this clearer to the reader, I'll offer a couple real life examples.

- In my job as a professor, we have a department meeting every month. Before the meeting can begin, the secretaries must painstakingly assess every faculty member's accomplishments over the last month to determine if there has been any change in the seniority. The rank is printed out and given to every person attending the meeting. There is one professor under me, and he is always smiling and bowing graciously to me, which felt awkward to me at first. (I'm sure he felt the same way.) But he helped me realize that to fit in well and establish good rapport, I should be kind of the same way to the other professors who are my senior.
- Unlike the west, teachers are regarded to have a lot of authority, especially in their area of expertise, and should be respected. But in some of my classes, I have some students who are older than I am, which makes them a senior in terms of the social interaction. If one of them wants to discuss something other than what I have prepared, I have to relinquish some of the class time to do so. Still, it is recognized that I have control of the class and that others may not be so interested in his subject, so at some point, the senior student will indicate it's enough, and allow me to continue with the lesson. I have the authority to refuse or cut them off short, but this would be seen by the entire class as disrespectful. On the other hand, if the student rambles on and on, and takes up a significant amount of class time, then this would be seen as disrespectful to me.

As you can imagine, there is a little dance going on behind every social interaction. An emphasis on loyalty and respect are nuances of the hierarchy, and judicious amounts of both humor and cynicism is to be expected. Of note, the pecking order mentality also sweeps aside the western concept of social equality as being fake and mechanical.

Since the recognition of social hierarchy is a foundational tenet of the culture, it is unacceptable to question it. Since foreigners question it, they are seen as clueless.

Hospitality and Sincerity

Humans have a psychological need for precious moments of sincerity and compassion, so people value hospitality and sincerity all over the world. There are sincere and insincere people, and there is a concept that sincere people do not speak out.

In the US, we have a proverb, "Open rebuke is better than hidden love". It stresses the importance of filling time with meaningful interaction, as opposed to holding good intentions but doing nothing. This may explain why westerners are more direct and expressive.

Compared to westerners, Asians tend to be very emotionally reserved and not outwardly expressive of their deeper thoughts and feelings, unless you personally know them for years, or if they happen to have a personality that is uncommonly out-going. In Asia, it is commonly understood that people have a hard protective layer that needs to be gently and patiently peeled off, step-by-step, in the process of developing a relationship. To westerners, this is interpreted as an apparent lack of sincerity.

In general, the Taiwanese greatly value honesty, sincerity, trust, and kindness, perhaps even more than Americans, but not towards strangers, as this is seen to be foolish, risky, and weak. This approach follows the evolution of a winning strategy, which I covered in a previous post, Strategies for the Iterated Prisoners' Dilemma (2021 March 17). Over time, group socialization coerces players to be honest and sincere (sooner or later) for the benefit of participating in the group.

But once you get past the layers of face-protection and fear, Taiwanese are deeply sincere. Their candidness is then similar to that of southern country hairdressers.

Another way to put it is that always having a lot to say often works against sincerity. So westerners have their own way of being insincere. Part of the issue is that the most significant part of what one wants to say is inexpressible. There is probably no single best way to coping with this. This has a few implications.

- Westerners say too much and Asians say too little.
- Taiwanese are generally more polite towards strangers, while Americans are more genuinely concerned.
- Westerners like to show more than what they really feel inside, while Taiwanese have a tendency to hold back.
- Americans are seen to be rather flaky, in that they sound very open and empathetic, and they say a lot more than what they are willing to back up with action, after which one realizes some part of what was "revealed" was not genuinely felt or truly actionable.
- What comes up in Taiwan speech is possibly the extreme opposite of flake.
- Taiwanese elders do not appreciate eloquent speakers due to their lack of sincerity.

Likewise, westerners may see this reservedness and conclude that Asians don't have any concept of helping their fellow man, but this is not true at all. If the person who needs help is a close family member or a trusted business partner, then all stops are pulled in order to see that person through. But outside of these covenant relationships, people only care for the interests of others when they are being paid for it, or when they have some kind of vested interest.

The means of helping one's fellow man must also follow an absolute social hierarchy, and this simplifies moral norms of what actions are appropriate and/or necessary.

A junior is not to assume that a senior needs any kind of help, as this would be disrespectful. But at the same time, the junior should be aware that if the senior asks for help, then he is morally obligated to do so.

How would you know if someone is sincere and trustworthy? Time will prove everything, so relationships are built slowly over time.

Conclusions

The Taiwanese approach to living is practical, yet relaxed. Although there are a few busybodies (as there are in every culture), people mind their own business for the most part.

I actually find this to be a more wholesome and sensible approach to living. I've known students who came from horribly broken homes who were still very emotionally healthy, happy, and content, and I think it's because of this generous social capital.

As you might imagine, this kind of social structure is much closer to the Biblical ideal compared to western progressivism, individualism, and gynocentrism (chivalry). In general, there is less of a societal wide drift away from God's ordained order. I think this is why I enjoy living here so much.

Related

- Hommunism: Sex differences, again (Data from US and Taiwan) (2021 January 12)
- Radix Fidem: The Chinese Grip (2021 May 5)

Sticking the Landing is for the Elite

Novaseeker · 10 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A special recipe of traits is required for past riders to get into marriage.

Readership: All
Length: 960 words
Reading Time: 3.5 minutes

Introduction

Dalrock had a post or two about how "Marriage is for the Elite". In this post, I'll explain why this is, and why some women fail to land or crash.

There is an elite subclass of women who follow Phase 1 of the Feminist Life Script (i.e. riding the carousel through college and their early careers), and then are able to enter into Phase 2 of the Script (i.e. achieve marriage in their late 20's or early 30s). Women in this subclass have the following traits going for them (ADIEU).

1. Attractiveness / Looks
2. Discipline
3. Intelligence / Smarts
4. Education
5. Upbringing

If a woman has this "success mix" bag of tricks, then she can get away with a LOT in her 20s, and stick the landing in her late 20s/early 30s with a "fine" husband. The man will not be a super hunk like those she was dating when she was 24, but more than fine for the purposes of a long term husband and child raising, especially when the pressures of the Wall ramps up, all of her peers are getting married, and the baby clock is ticking.

In fact, there are entire communities where the women have essentially stuck the landing. Almost all of them are gifted both genetically in terms of appearance and in other ways (intelligence, drive, discipline). Most of them come from solid families of origin as well (generally almost never chaotic ones).

Other outcomes vary depending on what part of the puzzle is missing. Here, I'll examine a few of the possible combinations of ADIEU. Intelligence — either through formal education (which is preferred) or otherwise — is assumed for this class of women, other than for the final category, so this element is omitted in the following discussion. The women in the photos are rough estimates of the sort — most of the women who fall into the various categories are not generally well known and are not celebrities, and the lives of celebrities will always only approximate the reality of the lives of non-celebrities.

Discipline, Intelligence, and Upbringing (AKA "Dating Under the Influence" or DUI)

Women who have the smarts, discipline, and upbringing, but lack the top tier looks tend to end up frustrated with men because they are proverbial girls who can "sleep up" in their early to mid-20s (and often do), but either they passed over one of these guys for marriage when they were asked in the late 20s or, more commonly, they aren't good looking enough to get one of the better quality guys to marry them when they are around 30. So they end up writing articles for The Atlantic and Medium about why men in their 30s all suck and are all Peter-Pan man-boys, or how all men are obsessed with looks. Some of them salvage things late with a guy of lesser quality than the ones who were available in her 20s. Some of them end up like Kate Bolick.

Kate Bolick in 2011, age 39.

Attractiveness, Intelligence, and Upbringing (AIU)

Women who are good looking and smart and have at least a fairly good upbringing but lack personal discipline end up either having quiet abortions to cover for their "unforced errors", or have some sort of traumatic breakup with Chad-gone-bad, after which they sometimes try to run away and force a reset by changing city/job/etc. Always be skeptical of the attractive woman who seems to check the boxes but just turned up in Seattle out the blue from the East Coast at 32, looks kind of worldly, and is "open to new beginnings".

Smart, and hot like the sun, but just as dangerous

Attractiveness, Discipline, and Intelligence (AID)

Women who have the looks, smarts, and discipline, but come from a chaotic family background are the most tragic of the bunch, because often they really are trying to do things the right way, and stick the landing in the educated striver class, but they just can't get completely free of the gravitational pull of the familial black hole. They cannot avoid getting sucked back into their past life at the worst possible times. Unreconstructed siblings, cousins, and parents often play cameo roles in wrecking the chances of girls like these when they are otherwise doing everything right, or trying to.

Some of these women can actually stick the landing, but in general, it's only the ones who go cold turkey, more or less, on the family ties, so as to limit the chaotic contagion. This requires them to keep their family at a very long distance, limiting contact with them, and seeing them infrequently. Those who do this more effectively move thousands of miles away and keep it that way.

Bad beginnings…

Attractiveness, Discipline, and Upbringing (DUA)

Women who have looks, discipline, and a good family background, but are not that smart have a very hard time sticking the landing in the upper middle striver class, because men in that class tend to screen for mom smarts. Often the best bet for these girls is to "looksmax" things, the female way, which employs both good genetic looks and discipline, and go for one of the relatively few remaining trophy wife positions.

For those who try to stick the landing this way, the key issue is in obtaining access to the men who are looking for this in 2020, and this is where family connections come into play.

When this approach goes south, this kind of girl can go spectacularly off the rail, accessing OnlyFans and so on as a way to cash out on her discipline-honed looks, and the less well-connected her family is, the more likely this kind of outcome is (which isn't sticking the landing).

No landing to stick for Paris, being a wealthy heiress, but still single at 39.

Related

- Return of Kings (Cyrus Ezra): 8 Common Types of Overly Promiscuous Girls (2018 February 24)
- Return of Kings (Donovan Sharpe): 7 Types of Dangerous Women You Should Avoid (2018 May 28)
- Return of Kings (Beau Albrecht): 5 Types of Women Who Should Quit Acting Like They're Supermodels (2018 September 26)
- Spawny's Space: Coming Apart? (2020 January 3)

ADIEU HUSsies Sell a Broken Script

Novaseeker · 12 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

You can stick the landing too, by just becoming a HUSsy!

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is an expose on a topic Deti and I discussed under Deti's previous post, The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17).
Reader's Note: HUSsie is a partial acronym for Hooking Up Smart, an old website which gave out popular advice to a certain class of women discussed in this post.

Introduction

The life script of the emergent middle and upper-middle class HUSsie is understood as:

- College until ~22
- Work/grad school/travel until late 20s
- Marriage between late 20s and mid-30s

And we all know the HUSsies are not exactly restrained in their sex lives.

These are not the women who are indifferent about family and children — those are a different set of ultra-careerists and are generally easy to spot because they continue the same lifestyle of their mid-20s well into their 40s. The HUSsies are the women who want to marry and have children, but only after they have done enough of the work/grad-school/travel in their 20s such that they are "ready to settle down" and focus on family life.

The refrain that is ubiquitously heard from them is…

> "Look, everyone, all you need to do is just do it the way we do it. Just be more like us!"
>
> "Go to college, get a job, start working, and you too can make it just like we did."
>
> "It doesn't matter that you're not white, or you came from a single mom household and haven't seen your father in 15 years, or that you lack future time orientation, or you're not all that smart, or you're not as physically attractive. Doesn't matter!"
>
> "Go to college, get a job, and start working and earning money, start looksmaxxing, and you'll be just like us!"

Moreover, the HUSsy life script is presented as simple, easy, and proper. The problem with this script is that the elites are selling to everyone a lifestyle and manner of living that works only for the elites. "Elites" being upper middle class, strong family background, college educated, employed earning good money, and usually white.

Who are the HUSsies?

HUSsies fit the following description in general.

- They are almost all white women.
- They are women whose parents are physicians or lawyers or college professors or bankers or C-suite corporate officers who are still married to each other, and where both of them usually work outside the home.
- They attended NYU or Georgetown or Duke or Penn or UNC or UVA.
- They work in prestigious high status jobs that are predominantly male occupied: banking, finance, “consulting”, advertising, PR, or some other cushy office job they got through dad’s connections (less often law or medicine because these professions require education beyond a bachelor’s degree).
- They usually don’t work in traditional female jobs: teaching, social services, nursing, or clerical.
- They have at least one long term relationship under their belts, and they broke up because of moving or his job or her job or “just didn’t work out”.
- They’re well put together: makeup and hair on point, always well dressed and accessorized, height weight proportional, keep in shape, and limiting or avoiding recreational drug use for at least the last couple of years.

Generally speaking these are women who are college-educated, work in the service or “knowledge” industries in jobs that are generally located in one of the metros, and who are upwardly-mobile, career-oriented women.

The uber-elites prefer to have a workforce of college graduates who are educated to think like them.

Where are the HUSsies?

HUSsies are present everywhere today, but they are particularly concentrated in larger cities. DC, SF Bay, and Seattle are probably where it has the greatest percentage of the total population, but it extends throughout the coastal megalopoli, and the larger interior cities like Atlanta, DFW/Houston/Austin, the Twin Cities, Chicago, Miami, and Seattle.

While the HUSsie phenomena is utterly dominant in those cities mentioned, generally, it is not very widespread outside of these cities. However, this is slowly changing. Pockets of it have spread to places like Charlotte, Boise, Columbus, and others. Deti reported that there are HUSsies in the Midwest who can sometimes stick the landing even though they live outside the metro area context:

> "I see this also in the Midwest, to a slightly lesser degree. These can also stick the landing. Mom and Dad are still married to each other but parents worked in slightly less prestigious occupations: Local elected official, lawyer, GP physician, school district administrator, successful small business owner. They're overwhelmingly white. Their degrees are from Big Ten or Mid-South universities, or Northwestern or Vanderbilt or the University of Chicago or Miami/Ohio. Many went to small super expensive liberal arts colleges like Ripon, Oberlin, Grinnell, or Luther. (There are dozens of these little prestigious colleges around the Midwest with enrollments of 2500 or less, they are very well known nationwide, admissions are quite selective, the courses of study are rigorous, and their graduates succeed in work and life.) They work in jobs for which you need a bachelor's degree – social work, social services, insurance, PR. Or they're headed to law or med school. They're also well put together, dressed well, absolutely none below HB 7, but not as pronounced as on the eastern seaboard. These women can also get away with a lot of promiscuity and partying it up in their 20s. They can stick the landing quite well.
>
> Both of these groups can also walk out the life script pretty much to a T, if they want to."

Context is critical here. In other contexts it can be more, or less, challenging depending on how many men are "left" at the time the woman leaves the "carousel", the overall sex ratio where the woman lives, her overall level of attractiveness, and so on.

How to be Just Like Them

In the last post, I explained why Sticking the Landing is for the Elite (2021 May 10). Women who are UMC or higher, and are able to stick the landing, have the following traits.

1. Attractiveness / Looks
2. Discipline
3. Intelligence / Smarts
4. Education
5. Upbringing

Obviously a critical juncture in the HUSsie life script is the transition from the 20s "carousel"/dating lifestyle to the more "intentional dating" lifestyle that is oriented towards finding a husband and not merely a fun guy to date and sleep with while you are busy doing the work/grad-school/travel script. This transition can be more or less challenging due to a number of factors, which is why it has become referred to as "sticking the landing" — that is, as a gymnast "sticks the landing" after a floor routine, the HUSsie will try to "stick the landing" after ejecting herself from the carousel so that she can find a husband. The landing is "stuck" with marriage to an attractive and suitable man.

But most women are not gymnasts.

A woman can be more confident of her ability to "stick the landing", in a variety of contexts, if and only if she has looks, smarts, discipline, and solid family of origin. This explains the HUSsie phenomenon: white, upper middle class, college educated, employed women from two parent families in their late 20s and early 30s still able to find attractive husbands and have small families (one, maybe 2 kids, 3 if they're doing really well).

But pretty much, only those women who possess at least four of the five ADIEU traits are those who are able to stick the landing. You have to have most or all of those characteristics to do it. White, intact family, UMC on up, at least a bachelor's degree, employed, and good looking.

Tucker's Point, Bermuda.

Epilogue

DC and SF are truly crazy outliers nationally, yet these areas dominate the political arena and the tech/internet industry, respectively, and are therefore among the most influential places. They head up politics and the media, and they design systems which everyone else has to follow. The information and systems they produce are what works for them and for people like them. Everyone else is expected to be like them, as well, to the best of their ability, and to move to these cities as well (hence the response that rural areas don't have any problems a U-Haul can't solve).

Just as men are pressured to get into the top 20% before they are recognized, women feel the need to shoehorn themselves into the HUSsy lifestyle in order to be taken seriously.

Feminism is one of the main drivers of this, coming as it did squarely from this social class, and always having the priorities of the women of this class at its forefront.

But of course, this idyllic life script is unachievable to the vast majority of women. It doesn't work, because regular people aren't "just like" the elites. They lack the connections, the attitude, the future time orientation, and the cultural and social markers that help women move up the ladder like the elites do. They don't look as good or dress as well, or "clean up" as well. They don't have a sense of life stability that comes from living in a wealthy, intact family. This is why what works for the HUS/elite set won't work for most anyone else.

This is really one of the central contradictions in American society currently, and one of the greatest sources of tensions. The society has been set up, in everything from social mores to education system to economy and living arrangements, to facilitate this specific lifestyle that truly is centered on a handful of large cities.

As long as our society clearly prioritizes and revolves around ambitious, smart, upper middle class white women, life for them will be vastly improved in virtually all ways. Meanwhile, the rest of the women get a mixed bag — some obviously beneficial things and a lot of things that are arguably worse.

ADIEU!

Related

- Dalrock: Let them become elite. (2017 September 26)
- Σ Frame: The Futility of Justifying the Crash Landing (2021 February 15)

Aristocratic Hypergamy

Lexet Blog · 14 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Hypergamy is a bear market for the Elite.

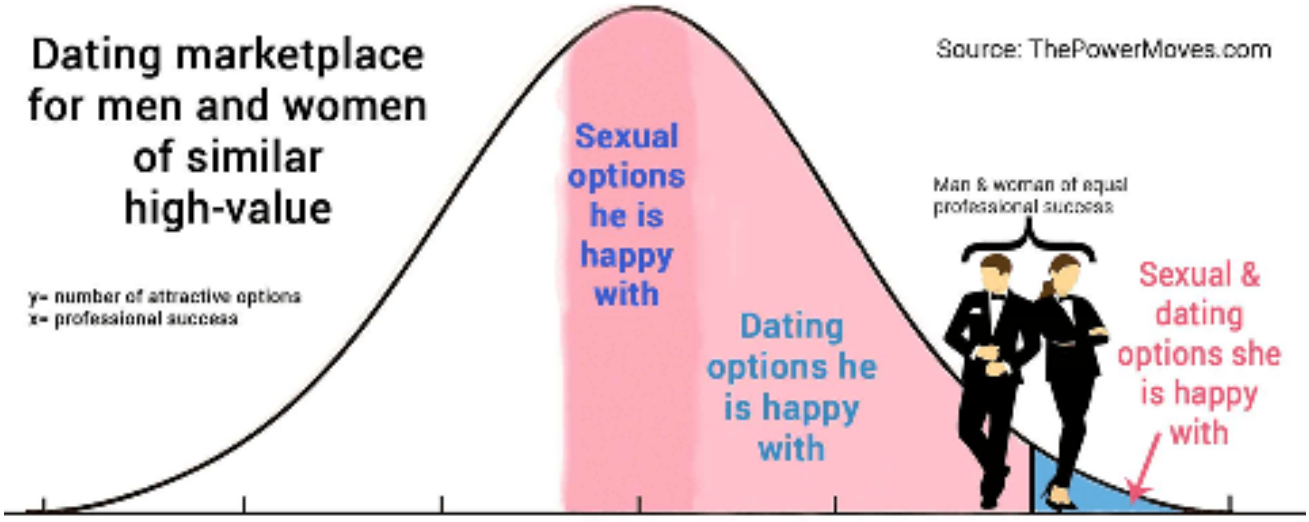
Readership: All;
Author's Note: This post was coauthored by Lexet and Jack.

Introduction

The Manosphere seldom covers any examination of relationships within the aristocratic class system, but we're making up lost ground this week. NovaSeeker's post, Sticking the landing is for the elite (2021 May 10), pointed out that only upper class (UC) women can make the Feminist Life Script work.

In this post, I want to describe an interesting phenomenon I see happening among professional, educated, upper class (UC) wimminz. Then I will explain that even among the upper class, selecting a mate is not so easy peasy for rosie hoesie.

First, a little Red Pill refresher.



This graph makes a few things clear to our understanding.

- Women naturally desire a man who is MORE successful than they are.
- VERY few of these men exist, and these men have MANY options.
- Men are NOT attracted to success and degrees, but to youth and femininity instead.
- A woman of high status is at somewhat of a disadvantage in the Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace, maybe not in terms of the quality of man she can attract, but definitely in terms of competition.
- This same effect applies as a class!

The bottom line is that women desire to marry up, and not just up, but 1- higher than she is, and 2- as high as she can get. Men marry down, leaving wealthy and upper middle class women fewer options for a long term partnership or marriage.

The Elite Mating Market of the Past

The overlapping worlds of the wealthy and the political powermongers offer a sophisticated venue for sexual selection — it always has. But the market dynamics were drastically different in the past.

Many marriages were arranged within the noble class. This was done through the following measures, which presumably preserved the accumulation and transfer of wealth within families.

- The system ensured daughters of the elite would have husbands who had position, title, money, and/or land.
- It was almost guaranteed that daughters of wealthy families would have husbands, whether they were young, beautiful, and desirable — or not.

While historians typically say the marriage system worked to "create alliances and peace," history has shown us otherwise — that political marriages were the center of numerous conflicts in the killing fields of Europe. For example, national leaders being genetically related to numerous other leaders certainly didn't prevent the First or Second World Wars.

In addition, many aristocracies were covertly controlled by women, and served the interests of women. Dalrock focused on the subject of chivalry. More overt female rule can be seen with Isabella of Castile, Catherine of Aragon, Margaret of Austria, Anne of France, Elizabeth I, Jeanne d'Albret, Catherine de Medici, Christina of Sweden, Queen Mary, Queen Victoria, Catherine the Great.

Or you can just look at this incredibly long list of female hereditary rulers on wikipedia. But those are just facts, and the government told me that women were kept in cages until 1965, when they were allowed to have sex in public at rock concerts.

Had this system not been in place, men would have been free to marry whomever, and the daughters of the elite would have been forced to marry a husband of lesser stature, which would have been a humiliation to them.

The end result of this is that it effectively restricted males from marrying down (i.e., it prevented males from marrying either the wives they wanted, or wives who deeply respected them out of hypergamic instinct). Forcing men to marry women they didn't love, and historically speaking, not allowing for divorce, encouraged adultery. A famous example would be Prince Charles and Princess Diana.

Princess Diana and Prince Charles during a 1991 trip to Canada. (Credit: Tim Graham/Getty Images)

Other noteworthy people who fit this model include Bill Clinton, John Edwards, John Kerry, Kamala Harris, Ted Cruz, Amy Barrett. A notable exception to this phenomena would be someone like John Kerry.

Interestingly, arranged marriages within the UC promoted the same degeneracy (i.e. affairs) that was produced by the practice of chivalry within the lower classes — which was an ostentatious attempt to mimic the upper class. This goes to show how important it is for leaders to spearhead societal trends by promulgating an Archetype.

How has the Elite Mating Market Changed since the Sexual Revolution?

Politically arranged marriages don't exist anymore, and with a deregulated sexual marketplace, the relationships formed in political circles and among the rich and famous seldom lead to marriage. Marriage between children of political figures definitely happens, but this has more to do with shared values and interlocutions within social circles than families making deals through marriage.

In The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021 February 17), Novaseeker discussed how women have a strong upper hand in the Sexual Marketplace. This is no less true for upper class women. However, when it comes to marriage, elite chicks have a unique dilemma. Compared to women of other classes, it is much easier for them to get into marriage, even in spite of their poor attractiveness and past sexual conduct. But it is much tougher for them to attract a man who can Tingulate her deeply and elicit the respect that is vital to a blissful marriage — and win commitment from him.

Prince Harry ,Jester of Simpcester, had to marry down — waaay dooown, to find a woman who could fleece him (and even that is questionable). He is one of the few living examples of recovery from a drug addiction resulting in a lower quality of life.

In fact, there are two qualifications which have come to be the two most important factors that modern elite women take into account when considering a man for marriage.

1. He must be able to exercise sexual authority over her (i.e. the Tingles).
2. He must be able to match her expected socio-economic standard of living.

The first qualification is true for women of all SECs (AWALT), and this is difficult enough, mainly because there are so few men who are able to qualify (less than 10%, as described in NovaSeeker's post). This is even more true for UC women, as shown in the infographic above. But in addition to this, there is much more pressure NOT to marry down, because not only would this fail to satisfy hypergamy, it would also cause an intolerable reduction in her living standards, and it would be a source of social shame as well.

Most elite chicks end up marrying a man who is more or less at their MMV level, taking into account socio-economic factors. This is one area in which market value parity still exists. But even this can be viewed (by her) as settling if he doesn't possess both of the qualifications mentioned above.

Epilogue

The elite mating market is still controlled by women, as it was in the past. Yet, women (and marriages) continue to suffer from this arrangement.

Since UC women almost always marry upper tier men, it is ironic that they are frustrated in their attempts to achieve a Headship relational structure, for reasons discussed above.

UC women must frequently endure their husbands having affairs. Depending on their personality and the social risks involved, it was not uncommon for UC women to "look the other way" whenever this occurs, in order to make the marriage "work out", which essentially means to preserve the wealth and status invested in the union. In the past, dignitaries accepted this situation with the attitude "that's just how life is", and did their best to contain the publicity. However, due to women's liberation and divorce legislation that strongly favors women, this tactic has fallen by the wayside in popular practice.

Overall, the same degeneracy (i.e. affairs) that occurred in the past continues on, with gusto!

Related

- Σ Frame: Soft Reset: Tech Founders are the New PUA's (2018 January 12)
- Σ Frame: Parenting is for the elite. (2020 March 16)
- Σ Frame: Frenemy Class Warfare? (2020 August 31)

The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model

Novaseeker · 17 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Based on the notion that women can become upper class simply by getting an education.

Readership: All
Author's Note: I've described the Upper Middle-Class Career Life Script Model before in several places, including Cane Caldo, Dalrock, and here at Σ Frame. Links to some of my original comments are embedded in the first word of the paragraphs. Because this seems to have been a topic of discussion in the comments of several different threads, this post compiles the basic information from these comments into one place.
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

A description of the Upper Middle Career Model

Under the current professional/managerial Career Model, women compete with men in their jobs and careers from the time of pre-school. Women study, train and work alongside boys and men, competing for jobs, money and status. In this competition, recent generations of women have been besting men in a few instances, such as the current imbalances in favor of women in college matriculation and graduation rates, and in starting incomes in the larger metropolitan areas in the United States.

This behavior is generally fully supported and heavily encouraged by the families of origin of this generation.

Portrait of a couple of proud parents hugging their daughter and celebrating her graduation.
In general, there are a few motivations mutually reinforcing this behavior among Christian fathers.

One is the well known "need for Plan B" — the idea that Dad needs to make sure his daughter has a gold-plated divorce insurance policy even before she starts looking for a husband. That is certainly a thing and it is also almost always the thing that the fathers themselves will say if you ask them about it, often coupled with a condescending and unimpressed sneer directed towards the males of his daughter's age.

Despite this rhetoric, in a lot of ways, encouraging the Plan B approach is about furthering their daughters' achievements for their own sake, and not primarily as a Plan B mechanism that serves as a back-up plan for a different "Plan A" life script. In other words, taking great pride in their daughter's Ph.D. or M.D. practice or corporate executive jet setting life has itself become a middle class/upper middle class life norm, quite apart from any divorce insurance/Plan B element.

I would suggest, in fact, that for almost all fathers of upper middle daughters who claim that the "Plan B" approach is the reason why they have raised their daughters the way they did, the actual intention is not for the resulting education and career to form a "back-up plan" in any meaningful way other than rhetorically — rather, the main motivation is to establish a strong, dominant, professional and financial position for their daughters as a primary life plan, regardless of what happens in their relationship lives.

However, even leaving aside this rhetorical evasion, there is another substantial motivating factor as well — expectations of one's social class peers when it comes to "how one lives", which includes, to a substantial degree, how one chooses to orient one's children and mould their trajectory in life.

Last week, we looked at Sticking the Landing is for the Elite and how that approach often doesn't work out so well for quite a few of them. However, the review of this circumstance can help us understand why the Career Model has gained significant traction among the "striver" population in the United States who take cues from the elite to form a personalized expression of the UMC Career Life Script for themselves and their daughters.

The Revolution Created a Conflict for Middle Class Christians

Over the course of much of the latter 19th to latter 20th Centuries, there was a broad overlap between respectable middle class American lifestyles and Christianity, broadly construed. Sin always abounds in any context, of course, but prior to the general social revolution that began in the 1960s and is ongoing, the broad life script for the middle class didn't bump up against Christian morals in ways that resulted in massive conflict in overall life design. In other words, following the Christian life script in a broad way (allowing that not everyone who looked like they were doing so were necessarily interiorly aligned) did not conflict with the "life progression" script of the upper middle class, such that choices between following one to the exclusion or severe limitation of the other typically did not need to be made. Because of this, there were a lot (maybe most) Christians during this period who were very committed to living their middle class lifestyles, and standard America Christianity (at least in terms of outward life design and script) fit in with that because there really wasn't much of a conflict in many areas — at least not when it came to the overall life script.

That changed radically with the coming of the latter 20th Century and the changes wrought by the resurgence of aggressive feminism, the economic shift to service, and then to the knowledge-based economy, the rise of cheap, safe, legal, and ubiquitous birth control and abortion, the resulting widespread relaxation of sexual mores and norms that comprised the sexual revolution and the like. Within the space of a generation (or less) it became a more or less iron-clad middle class norm that your daughters went to college and pursued jobs and careers to be independent earners. The independent woman lifestyle was showcased in the media and education such that it quickly became the middle class norm in the period after 1970 — we all know that. So, most Christians, being committed members of the respectable American middle class, followed along with the new norm and tried to either shoe-horn it into Christian morals or, more often, looked the other way, or outright accommodated breaches of those morals so that the pursuit of the new version of the middle class life script was not impeded.

In summary, prior to the changes wrought by the social revolution, it was quite possible to follow the standard American middle class life script (or upper middle class one; the upper middle was tiny then anyway and had not yet ballooned into the unwieldy behemoth it has since become) while not contradicting conventional Christian sexual morality. The two meshed. After the social revolution, that meshing came apart. The middle class and above started to prioritize education, career and independent financial standing for their daughters — this was, again, often described as the pursuit of "divorce insurance", but in reality, it simply became a middle class norm for parents, especially fathers, to take pride in their daughters' achievements and strong independence, educationally and professionally, in a way that had previously been applied to sons. Because the social revolution changed the middle class life script, Christians who were in the middle class were theoretically faced with a conflict — which script to follow, the Christian one (which was previously compatible with the middle class one) or the new middle class one which conflicted with the Christian one because it implied lots of fornication?

Pop culture aimed at today's youth reflects the various flavors of women's empowerment as a collective social fantasy — as powerful and dominant as men, but with much more sexual power

The Desire for Elite Status Trumps Christian Morality

We all know how this conflict turned out.

What we learned in the period from roughly 1980 to the present day was that most American Christians, of all stripes, were, and are, more committed to being successful middle class strivers than they were committed to being morally orthodox Christians. So when the life scripts diverged, most of them followed the (new) middle class life script en masse. Essentially, the bulk of the Christian middle class strivers kept on following the prevailing middle class life script, as it changed, and left the Christian one by the wayside where it conflicted, observing the latter with the lips but not with the actions.*

This was almost universally taking place at the time, and it became quickly entrenched to the point where it became the widespread, if unstated, behavioral expectation. The churches didn't fight it too much — there was some fighting in the 60s and 70s about it, but at the same time most of the "conservative" fathers in the churches were also adopting, de facto, the new middle class life script for their own daughters, and so the active opposition to this from the churches became muted relatively quickly. Then in the later 80s and into the 90s, vocal criticism of this massive, overnight change in behaviors became virtually unheard of, apart from radical separatist elements. For certain, fornication, pornography, rock music, video games, and many other intrinsic elements of the sexual revolution were all fulminated against, with gusto, during this period, but the intimately linked fempowerment script that had been virtually unanimously adopted by parents went almost entirely uncritiqued because it was, in effect, already the overwhelming norm in the churches by circa 1990.

Simply put, the middle class wholeheartedly adopted the economic/career/empowerment aspects of feminism very openly and virtually universally during this period, and in the end, it didn't take that much arm twisting between fathers and daughters to do it. To the extent that Christianity conflicts with elements of this script (such as the morally illicit sexual activity that is virtually guaranteed by the script), it is what will get bent in almost all cases, and not the middle class life success script. This will be very hard to change, I think, because it is so long-standing at this point in terms of where people's actual commitments, in a primary sense, really lie. When forced to choose between economics and religion, in a material era such as ours, most people will choose economics.

 Dalrock discussed this denial further in his post, The season of singleness. (2019/5/1).*
 The results of this breakdown were recently reported by Cornerstone: Number of Sex Partners Before Marriage, by Decade (2021/5/16). Things clearly fell apart in the 1990s.*

The UMC Career Model cannot satisfy female hypergamy nor the mothering instinct

Even when a woman can succeed at the Career Model, she is often still not satisfied with her life. Although some high-powered career women do “marry down” today, most often these women still try to marry very high value men in order to satisfy their desire for a hypergamous mate.

In general, women still want men who look just like the men from before the Career Model made its debut, only even better. The man has to make even more money than she does. He has to be more capable, smarter, and more ambitious than she is. He has to be smarter than she is, even if he has less formal education than she does. And, in many cases, he has to be even higher status than she is: He has to be partner to her associate, department head to her department member, neurosurgeon to her general practice physician.

She is playacting at being a man, but he has to actually BE the man. She can have a virtual d!ck; but his actual d!ck has to be bigger.

And yet, even when a woman can succeed in the Career Model and land a higher value man than herself, often she still doesn’t like the Career Model. It doesn’t sate her needs and desires. When she can get a man to do all that for her in a way that satisfies all of these needs, it is quite common for such a woman to quit and stop doing it, or cut way back, with the couple “surviving” on one very high upper middle-class income while the wife with the law / medical / Ph.D. degree “chooses to stay home” and enjoy the new “lifestyle luxury” of full-time parenting.

Related

- Dalrock: A very long season (part 1). (2017/7/3)
- Dalrock: Marriage and children were always her priority. (2019/7/17)

YOLO = FOMO

Jack · 19 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

…for good or for ill!

Readership: All
Length: 1,750 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

The life script commonly pursued by western women in the past decade or two is the UMC Career Model, which stipulates that women need a career to support themselves. NovaSeeker discussed the typical motivations for choosing this script, and how it is both prevalent and powerful.

The corollary to the UMC Career Model is that women should postpone marriage and having children until the last dozen eggs are two years past the expiry date, so that they can divert their time and energies into pursuing a career (or so it is claimed). However, the truth of the matter is slowly leaking out, as evidenced in this article from Evie Magazine.

> "A generation of OnlyFans, flashy jet-setting Instagram models, hookup culture, and hypersexual songs that slash their way through the billboards – it's only natural that women of this era find the "wild girl" phase seemingly necessary in their early years, especially their twenties. Sexual liberation has taught women that it's almost their duty to engage in such behavior and that by not engaging in this culture they're doing themselves a disservice by not effectively using up their "prime" and "golden" years."
>
> *Evie Magazine (Simone Hanna): We Don't Need To Go Through A 'Wild Girl' Phase (2021/5/15)

But there are always a few who are slow to pick up the pace, so they need a little encouragement, peer pressure style.

There is a well-known power phrase that is spread liberally throughout the culture which encourages young women to dive into drinking sprees and the hook-up culture, among many other things, while they are pursuing the Career Model: "You Only Live Once!"

In addition to this, there are a couple underlying sentiments which add emotional fervor to the heat of the moment, and serve to propel young women into the meat market and the labor grinder: The "Fear of Missing Out" (FOMO) and the "Fear of Regret" (FoR).

Let's review these motivations and make an assessment.

* H/T: Cameron

Believe it or not, fraternity toga parties are a necessary element of preparing them for careers in “chemistry” (him) and “public relations” (her).

“You Only Live Once!” (YOLO)

YOLO is the catchphrase we often hear from proponents of feminism and in motivational talks given to disoriented, hormone-ridden young people, which appeals to their sense of impulse and alleviates their fear of the adverse consequences of risk and the unknown.

Over the past two decades, YOLO has been primarily used as an equivalent to “Carpe Diem!” The latter phrase became popularized through the movie, Dead Poet’s Society. A relevant excerpt of this excellent film appears here.

But there is a difference between the two attitudes, YOLO and Carpe Diem! that easy to overlook. Carpe Diem emphasizes making an effort to become relevant first and foremost, but also rolling with the punches, enjoying the simplicities of life, and appreciating what each day brings. On the other hand, YOLO speaks of a more nihilistic discovery or “pioneering” of life in which the consequences of the undertaking are unknown, but are assumed to carry benefits that comprehensively outweigh the risks. Furthermore, it is often understood as a double dog dare for others to join in, with the connotation that if others fail to join in, then they aren’t really living. Thus, it encourages tackling matters of a riskier nature, often involving questionably moral activities. In riskier adventures, it carries the underlying assumption that one has the nine lives of a cat.

Fear of Missing Out (FOMO)

FOMO is an appeal to the meaning and purpose of life. It assumes that one’s life is meaningless unless one gets involved in certain enterprises in a timely manner.

FOMO is fueled by a Herd mentality, in which young women are pressured to conform to the dictates of their peer group.

Young people, women especially due to herd mentality, are inclined to conform because they don’t want to be “left out”. This is actually a healthy trait for the 12-20 age group because this is when the “social” part of the brain and personality are developing.

However, the problem with the current iteration of FOMO is that there is a significant imbalance in what they are afraid of missing out on. They are afraid of missing out on the pleasures of sin for a season more than they are afraid of missing out on the longitudinal blessings of obedience.

Why aren't young women afraid of hitting the proverbial Wall?

Fear of Regret (FOR)

Young people are motivated to make certain decisions in life because they don't want to experience guilt, shame, and regret. There is an element of FOR in The Feminine Dilemma (2018/10/27) and The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021/2/26). For some individuals, FOR is the deciding factor that motivates a particular choice.

But similar to FOMO, the problem is that there is a significant imbalance in what they are afraid of regretting. They are afraid of never "discovering themselves" more than they are afraid of regretting missed opportunities and throwing their lives away on sin and foolishness. While it is true that knowing one's self has significant value, the actual emphasis of "discovering one's self" is placed on exploring the pleasures of dissipation, which leads to them becoming jaded and bored with life, and not on growing and maturing. In practice, "discovering one's self" is little more than a spiritualized, positive sounding euphemism for dissipation.

Under the current Life Scripts, young women are doing incredibly stupid things that they deeply regret later in life. But somehow, they never think of it this way.

True Living for Christ (TLFC)

There is a Christian equivalent of YOLO, which is True Living for Christ (TLFC), and like YOLO, it also involves risk taking. Glorifying God by embracing one's true convictions (and all the risks that it entails), and the uncertainties involved with trusting God are felt as significant risks in the moment. But the difference between the Christian TLFC and the secular version of YOLO is that TLFC is motivated by faith, and is supported by the movement of the Holy Spirit, whereas YOLO is motivated internally by FOMO and FOR, and externally by peer pressure.

However, YOLO, FOMO, and FOR are not necessarily anti-Christian in nature. Whether YOLO and FOMO are healthy or ill all depends on what it is that the person (i.e. young woman) wishes to pursue in life, which essentially boils down to values, and values are instilled from a young age, most notably through the father.

The remainder of this post will offer three case studies in which YOLO, FOMO, and/or FOR appears as a motivator to do what is right.

Case Study 1 – 18-year-old girl wants to have a baby!

This case study should not be shocking at all, but somehow, it is.

Spawny's Space: The worrisome rebellion of a timely procreation. (2021/5/10)

This post tells the story of a young woman who has a healthy variety of FOMO – she's afraid of missing out on motherhood and family life! Under the current drench of feminist propaganda, how did she ever get the notion?

RedPillApostle responded,

> "The 18-year-old's father is the one that concerns me. No matter how determined you are as a girl, the father always has an influence. And the one in Jack's example is the typical "no man is good enough for my princess" dad, which is where his push for her to go to college so she can be an "I don't need no man" empowered girl. What he should be doing as the current man with authority in her life is coach her on what characteristics the new man of authority in her life should have, what pitfalls to avoid and how to best make the family life she is choosing work. He won't do this, because he has no grounding in truth and no clue how to help his daughter pull it off well even if he wanted to."

Seems like daddy fumbled the ball, and fortunately for her, I might add.

Case Study 2 – A Father with Frame

RedPillApostle continued with a story of a dad who did right by constructing a Framework for his daughter.

> "In college, I was classmates with a woman who had a good father. The guy she was dating in college was a typical college kid, which means he was learning things by trial and error like most of us do at that age. After one of those "learning events" she questioned whether to keep dating him or not. Her recounting of the story is that her father sat her down and loving told her that the boyfriend's character was good and that one day he'd be a man many women would trip over themselves to have, so she better lock him down early. She resisted hypergamy, got married soon after college and this year will be their 20th anniversary. Even though she is a very intelligent engineer, she has followed him to new jobs putting family ahead of her own version of modern success. My belief is her father has been instrumental in imparting these values in her."

Amen!

Case Study 3 – Why do Women want to be housewives?

If Dads are aware of some of the positives in marriage (from a woman's perspective), then that might help a daughter reframe her expectations in light of positive values.

Manosphere Highlights Daily: Women Explain Why They Want to be Housewives (2021 May 11) Length: 11:00*

 H/T: Kentucky Headhunter*

Conclusions

YOLO, FOMO, FoR, and TLFC are essentially comprised of the same psycho-social dynamics, but the real world expressions thereof are figments of different motivations. The motivation itself depends on deeply held values.

Just as YOLO, FOMO, and FoR can motivate young women to follow a worldly life script, the same approach can be used to drive young women towards a healthier appreciation of Biblical feminine roles and a life that is honoring to both God and family (TLFC).

The same is true for sons, but to a masculine effect.

Related

- Σ Frame (Scott): Opportunities (2020/2/26)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Looking at the Essentials (2020/6/12)
- Washington Square News: The COVID-19 College Party Scene: Who's To Blame? (2020/9/23)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Patheological Weddingsday – When wanton treachery brings shame, not honor. (2020/10/14)

The Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Archetype

Jack · 21 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A comparison of Christ and the church with a man and his wife.

Readership: All
Author's Note 1: In this essay, "Redemption" is used in the sense of restoration, or of adding value to someone who is relatively low status, and not so much in the sense of eternal salvation, although I believe there is a connection.
Author's Note 2: (added on 2025/11/23) Due to the immense coverage of the analogy described herein, based on Ephesians 5:22-24, this concept has become widely known as "The Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Analogy", among many other names. Accordingly, the title of this post has been changed from "The Greatest Archetype" to "The Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Archetype".
Reader's Note: If the reader has the time and interest, it may be revealing to read through this post a second time while questioning how a Woke Feminist might react. The answer is given at the end.
Length: 2,300 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes
TL/DR: See Red Pill Apostle's synopsis.

Introduction

This post covers a deep Truth that I've never seen anywhere else on the Manosphere, so I hope to contribute some relatively new foundational insights to the glory of God in Marriage.

This concept is rather hard to explain in only a few words, so I'll start off by describing the relationship between God and Man as the primary Archetype for the relationship between Man and Woman. This metaphor is based on the following Scripture, where I assert that the church (ibid.) is comprised of Christian men and husbands (as well as females).

> "[22] Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord. [23] For the husband is head of the wife, as also Christ is head of the church; and He is the Savior of the body. [24] Therefore, just as the church is subject to Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything."
>
> Ephesians 5:22-24 (NKJV)

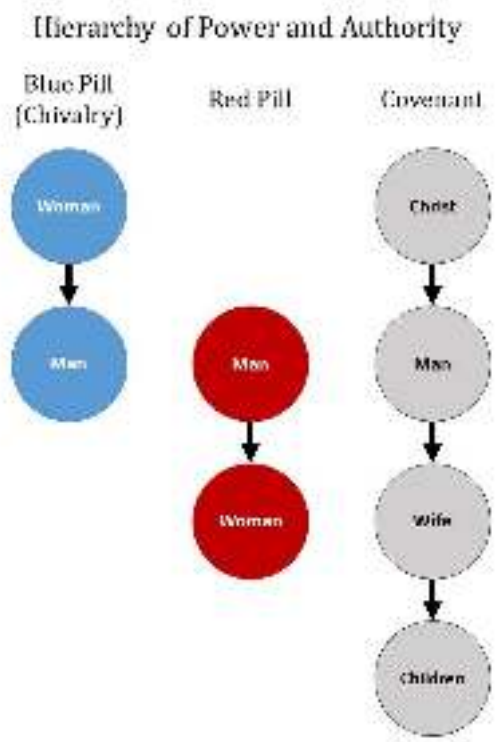
For those readers who have an issue with the Biblical ideas of 'submission', and of 'husbands being the head of the wife', I believe that if you'll follow through this discourse, you'll discover that it explains many of the common experiences between men and women, including things like the feminine imperative, fitness tests, and true love. As such, my argument does in no way rely on the 'assumption of the conclusion' fallacy, and is, in fact, a bedrock Truth.

First, we'll explore the relationship between Christ and the church.



Man's Dependency on God for Introspection and Redemption

The life of St. Peter, of whom Jesus said, "you are Peter, and on this rock I will build My church" (Matthew 16:18), is a characteristic illustration of how a man comes into the Kingdom of God.

When Jesus first called Peter, saying "Follow Me", Peter had followed easily, because he was fascinated by the person of Jesus (Matthew 4:18-20). He did not need the Holy Spirit to draw his attention and allegiance to Christ. Afterwards, Peter willingly followed Jesus for three years.

But then came the time when Jesus was put on trial for blasphemy, which was a crime punishable by death under Judaic law (Matthew 26). When Roman soldiers came to arrest Jesus, Peter fought with a sword, but Jesus commanded him to lay down his weapon. Later, Peter came to face a situation in which he would likely be killed by a mob if he merely identified with Jesus. At this point, he feared for his life, and the fascination and natural inspiration he had of the Man Jesus was not sufficient to retain his faith. As a result, he denied Jesus out of fear of mortal death. This decision may have saved his life, but his heart broke, and he forfeited his soul. Consequently, Peter hid himself in fear, until after Christ was crucified.

Judas, who was Peter's fellow disciple of Christ, betrayed Jesus (possibly in the hope of inciting a revolution), and broke his own heart as well. But unlike Peter, who hid himself, Judas killed himself.

After Jesus' resurrection, the impartation of the Holy Spirit came upon Peter and the other disciples. Jesus appealed to Peter once again, saying, "Follow Me". This second invitation tortured Peter's soul with the guilt of his betrayal, and required him to submit himself to the Lordship of Jesus for his reinstatement into the Kingdom of God. In other words, he had faced his weaknesses, and his inadequacy in meeting his own needs, and then he needed to humble himself.

In retrospect, we see that the first invitation from Jesus had nothing mystical about it, as it was an external following which appealed to the inclinations of the natural man. The second invitation from Jesus required an internal martyrdom of the self (c.f. John 21:18). Between these invitations, Peter had denied Jesus with oaths and curses. He had reached the limits of the natural (vis. feral) man. He had come to the end of himself, forfeited his will, and lost all sense of self-sufficiency. He had nothing left of himself or his own power upon which he could ever rely upon again with confidence. However, it was in this state of destitution that he was in a fit condition to receive an impartation from the risen Lord.

Judas killed himself in the wrong way. Peter killed himself (figuratively speaking) in the right way.

Only when we have come to the end of ourselves, not as we might imagine ourselves to be while in a state of desperation, but in totality, are we are able to receive the Holy Spirit. All our vows and resolutions end in denial because we have no power to carry them out. Only Christ has that power. Because the natural man is not able to reach beyond its own martyrdom, it requires the invasion of the Holy Spirit.

At the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Love and Grace of God's Truth pounces on our heart and dominates our spirit, against our will, and contrary to our natural mind. We may try to fight the realization (e.g. by relying on vain rational justifications or emotional defense mechanisms), or run and hide, just as Peter did, but deep within our being, we know that we will inevitably be dominated by the gracious providence of God, and that our self-centered will shall be overruled by His greater will. We are filled with a sense of gratefulness for having received this greater purpose for living, and the honor that it entails.

Now within the next section, we will examine the relationship between a Man and a Woman, i.e. his wife, as an analogous comparison to the relationship between Christ and the church. We'll also see how a man's response to her challenges are characteristic of how a man "washes his wife clean" with the Word of Truth. The previous example of St. Peter will be used to construct the model.

Woman's Dependency on Man for Introspection and Redemption

When a man takes a wife, he is basically saying, "You are my wife, and with your womb I will create a family."

When a man first woos a woman, he says, in effect, "Follow Me". (In this analogy, we will assume that the man is one of sufficiently high socio-sexual value.) The woman follows him easily, even naturally, because she is fascinated by the Tingles and the possibility of becoming one who is loved. She does not so much require the enticements of a contrived Game, social justifications, such as a recommendation from her friends or family, or promises of status and security, in order to turn her attention and allegiance to the man. No one needs to teach any woman how to fall in love with a man. Women seek and discover this quite readily.

But then comes a time when the woman loses that natural appeal for the man. Perhaps this happens because the Tingles dried up, or perhaps his own personal shortcomings have come to light. At this time, the woman naturally recoils to the relative security of various defense mechanisms, which have been outlined by previous Manospherians, such as hamstering, bulverizing, stonewalling, gaslighting, etc. She may use any of these weapons to cling to her previous illusions, but the man will make it clear that she must abandon these 'weapons' and submit to his authority.

The woman at the well, by Howard Lyon.

The woman now faces a situation in which her previously cherished notions of Disneyland fantasy are likely to be destroyed if she submits to the man's authority. At this point, she fears for what may become of her life if her vain hopes are not fulfilled, and she is terrified to face the fact that they may not even be true. The fascination and natural inspiration she initially had of the man is not sufficient to retain her faithfulness to him. As a result, she may reject this particular man, and go off in the hope of finding another man who can fulfill her dreams, or at least, not destroy them. This decision may preserve her false hopes and her egotistical sense of well-being, but in reality, she has faced the fact that life is not as she once believed. If she follows through with her resistance and rebellion, her heart will be broken, and she will forfeit her soul. The soul decimating effects of this choice are clearly manifested in women who choose to burn through one man after another, thereby racking up their N count, and destroying their real opportunities to find the true love they deeply crave.

Feminists, who initially held the same hopes and dreams for their relationships with men, betray the authoritative structure of the God ordained male-female hierarchy (possibly in the hope of inciting and/or perpetuating a cultural or sexual revolution), and unwittingly break their own hearts as well.* But instead of clinging to the hope of finding a 'perfect' (or better) man, they instead choose to revile the fundamental nature of men, deny the Truth, and languish in bitterness, thereby creating disorder and chaos within the time tested Traditional structure.

Queen Vashti of Persia, by Ann Manry Kenyon.

After getting her @ss kicked by the stark realities which she had been unwilling or unable to face in the past, she starts to see her husband from a new perspective — namely that he is a source of vital characteristics which she lacks, e.g. security, stability, steadfastness, strength, structure, and sustenance. She begins to see that life is not about making her dream a reality, but in transforming her reality into the makings of a dream. In other words, she accepts the fact that she has an arena of responsibilities that are uniquely hers, and that she'll lose more skin in the game if she doesn't face the music. At this point, the woman is faced with a crucial choice which determines both her spiritual and carnal identity.

The man continues to appeal to the woman, effectively saying, "Follow Me". This 'second' invitation, after the discovery of the Truth, tortures the woman's soul with the guilt of her betrayal, and requires her to submit herself to the authority of the man for her reinstatement into her position of his beloved wife. In other words, she has faced her weaknesses, and her inadequacy in meeting her own needs, and now must humble herself.

In retrospect, we see that the first invitation from the man had nothing mystical about it, as it was an external following which appealed to the inclinations of the ego and the feral nature. The second invitation from the man requires an internal martyrdom of her self. Between these invitations, the woman goes through a difficult process which requires her to accept the man as her head, or else choose the wandering life of one unloved. She reaches her human limits. She comes to the end of herself, forfeits her will, and loses her sense of independence and self-sufficiency. She has nothing left of herself or her own power upon which she can ever rely upon again with hope. However, it is in this state of utter vulnerability that she is in a fit condition to receive the attention and affirmation of a loving man / husband.

When a faithful, loving husband presents his Frame of mind as a structure in which the wife can discern objective truth, the husband's (and by extension, God's) love and grace pounces on her heart and dominates her spirit, against her will, and contrary to her hamstering mind. She may try to fight the realization (e.g. by relying on vain justifications or emotional defense mechanisms, as mentioned earlier), or run and hide, just as Peter did, but deep within her being, she knows that she will inevitably be dominated by the gracious providence of God through her husband, and that her self-centered will shall be overruled by His greater will. She is filled with a sense of gratefulness for having received this greater purpose for living, and the honor that it entails.

Conclusions

Females inclined towards Feminism destroy their own worthiness to receive the heartfelt love of a man, simply in order to preserve their own microcosm of autonomy and power.* Faithful wives and mothers kill their self-centeredness and their desire for independence, and assume their God ordained role of exercising their soft power to increase the quality of life for their husbands and children.

Only when a woman has come to the end of herself, not as she might imagine herself to be while in a state of solipsistic desperation, but in totality, is she able to receive the place of honor as a beloved wife and mother. All her presumptions, projections, imperatives, and resolutions are nothing more than a denial of the power and Lordship of Christ, because she has no power to change the reality of her life into that for which she hopes. Only a faithful loving man who is obedient to Christ can take on that role. But because the feral woman is not able to reach beyond her own solipsism, she requires the invasion of the Christ-like man's Frame of mind.

A separate post, Women Rely on a Man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection (2021/6/28), reviews several quotations from around the Manosphere that add credibility to the application.

* Answer to the Reader's Note: It's quite revealing to see how the Feminist viewpoint conforms to the archetype of Judas.

Related

- Biblical Gender Roles
- Σ Frame: Discipline in Marriage
- Σ Frame: An Exposition of The Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Analogy (2022/8/29)

The Kardashian Fantasy

Novaseeker · 24 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The Titillating Trysts of the Trendsetting Troubador Tells of Trouble over Time.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post had some input from Deti and Jack.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

In a previous post, The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021 March 12), we discussed how the longitudinal effects of swipe/online dating, hookup culture, and amateur prostitution are currently transforming the SMP.

Women will have no safety or security. They will have to provide for it themselves, with their own money, or else finagle it from men. They will shout louder and complain more about men's boorish, hamfisted conduct. They can demand more police and white knight protection, and will get it. But it will not really compare with having one man she trusts implicity to give her that safety and security.

All this will have the effect of preventing all but the most valuable women from being able to keep any man at all. And this drives women's status down. The only "status" women will have is material acquisition and monetary wealth. They'll be acting like men – working to acquire money and status, for "independence".

Because of the obvious weaknesses of the Transactional Model, a few other life scripts are being aggressively pushed. One of these scripts which addresses the lag in "status" is the "Kardashian Fantasy" model.

A recent montage from early 2021 … From left: "Momager" Kris (65), Kylie (23), Khloe (36), Kim (40), Kourtney (42), Kendall (25)

Wait, wait ... The Kardashians? Really, Now?

Yes.

I am not a television watcher, pretty much at all. I have never seen the Kardashian TV program “Keeping Up With The Kardashians” (which apparently is ending a 14-year run this year) — known in the industry as “KUWTK”. I became familiar with the Kardashians because posts about them persistently made their way into the news feed on my phone, regardless of adjusting the settings to avoid that. After a while, I became curious and looked into what they were about, and what I saw was quite astounding in many ways.

But, before we get to that, some background. I suspect that many of the readers, perhaps most of you, were as clueless as I was about this massive cultural phenomenon other than a vague awareness on the periphery of our consciousness. That’s understandable, and it’s how I was about them before I started investigating them at some stage last year.

The Kardashians are a Los Angeles based family of five sisters, one brother and their mother. The mother, Kris Jenner (born Houghton), age 65, is known as the “momager” (i.e., mom/manager) of the group. The older three daughters (Kourtney (42), Kim (40) and Khloe (36) are the daughters of Robert Kardashian, who was a lawyer and businessman in Los Angeles, while the younger two (Kendall (25) and Kylie (23)) are the daughters of Bruce, now “Caitlyn”, Jenner. Kris Jenner and Robert Kardashian also had a son, Rob (34). Kris Jenner had a modest background and worked as a flight attendant in the 1970s, when she was in her 20s, before marrying Kardashian. Kardashian was in no way anything approaching as wealthy as the clan became after bigtime fame came along, but was very financially well off (in a more normal, non-stratospheric sense) and extremely well-connected in Hollywood, in part due to his friendship with O. J. Simpson from his college days at USC. The Kardashians grew up in West Los Angeles, and attended wealthy private high schools and prep schools.

From left: Kourtney, Robert Kardashian, Khloe, and Kim

Due to their connections on the fringes of Hollywood celebrity culture, the Kardashians were a known entity in that culture for some time going back to the days of the O. J. Simpson trial in the late 1990s, when Robert Kardashian made an appearance as a member of the legal defense team of his personal friend, Simpson. The older daughters were exposed through schooling and socializing to major celebrities growing up, and this formed their social group even though they, themselves, were not yet celebrities in a significant way. Kim Kardashian was known as a stylist of Paris Hilton, who was a very well known celebrity herself, and had made cameo appearances in a few of Hilton's television shows, but Kim was not yet a very famous name of her own.

That changed in March 2007, with the release of an explicit 2002 sex tape of Kim with her then-boyfriend Ray J, entitled "Kim Kardashian, Superstar". Kim and the other Kardashians have denied that the release of the tape was intentional or consensual, and there was some litigation around it that resulted in a cash settlement for Kim. But the main impact of the tape was that it skyrocketed Kim Kardashian to instant fame. And this fame rocket was launched at the same time as the iPhone — the most impactful culture-spreading device ever invented — was released.

Shortly thereafter KUWTK began, which was itself the result of a pitch made by Kris Jenner to Ryan Seacrest around the time that Kim was going viral. As of now, KUWTK is not nearly as popular as it was when it was newer and averaging 3 million or so viewers, and so it has finally been canceled. But its protagonists have long since moved their main publicity vehicle to social media, where their follower numbers are simply extraordinary. Kylie Jenner leads them with 234 million Instagram followers, and Kim (223m), Kendall (165m), Khloe (147m), and Kourtney (122m) are not very far behind. For purposes of comparison, according to Statista, Kylie and Kim are respectively the 4th and 6th most followed individuals on the entire platform. And as for that level of followers, it seems worth noting that there are only 4 countries on Earth that have a higher population than the number of Kylie Jenner's Instagram followers. The reach is simply staggering, by any measure, and when taken together as a group, their collective cultural reach through social media is unique and utterly incomparable.

As one would expect, this kind of cultural reach has resulted in the accumulation of substantial financial riches. The Kardashians all have side hustles, if you want to call them that, ranging from separate beauty businesses started by Kim and, later, Kylie, to the most recent one, being a branded Tequila grift being peddled by Kendall. And even in her main gig, Kendall Jenner is reportedly the highest-paid model in the world currently. All told, the familial "winnings" are estimated by Forbes to be in the $2 billion range, give or take a few hundred million here and there.

By any measure, the Kardashians are a massive cultural phenomenon. As I note above, it is very easy to overlook this if you are not "plugged in" to the contemporary culture. I am generally not plugged in like that, and so I, too, missed this impact. But once I started to investigate this in the course of the past year, it became clear fairly quickly that this was not an ordinary cultural fad, but rather something that has been long-running and has had an impact, culturally, that is both broad and deep, and, in many ways, has been enhanced precisely because there are so many people like me (and probably you readers) who have been aloof to it and are therefore unaware of the impact it has been having, and continues to have, in the culture around us.

The Kardashians: Both Real and Directed

The more I looked at the Kardashian phenomenon, the clearer I began to see a certain pattern, a certain set of common aspects that ran through the life histories of all of them, as these have been so publicly lived-out on television and in social media. I will point out what these are next, but at the outset it's critical to keep in mind that the Kardashian image is both real and invented at the same time.

From left (2007): Bruce, Kris, Kendall, Kim, Kylie, Rob, Kourtney, and Khloe

That is, it is a "molded/scripted real life". It isn't a real life that would have naturally unfolded had there not been this level of fame and fortune and publicity, and had the life not been lived, for the most part, on television and in social media in front of hundreds of millions of people. Because of those elements, it is a scripted/molded/directed life, but at the same time it isn't a film or a fiction novel. It is real — it is how they actually live.

Yet it is also a molded/scripted/directed real life, and therein lies the key to understanding the real influence of the Kardashian phenomenon: It is real, which provides the grist for fantasy/aspiration/life-goals, while at the same time it is directed/molded, scripted, which means that the direction(s) that these real lives have taken are not random or necessarily even personal, but have been designed both to reflect, amplify and deepen existing social trends, and drive both social discourse and accepted and desired behaviors in very specific, intentional directions. The Kardashians story line, as parleyed through television and, with much broader reach, social media, is one which follows a very intentional set of directions, both reflecting existing trends and emphasizing/deepening certain other ones, in a way designed to influence the attitudes, expectations and behaviors of the viewers and followers, in various, intended, directions.

These directions form a recognizable set of characteristics, which together form a pattern of life, once one examines the specific lives and then steps back and examines the composite. They are roughly the following:

- Convergence — Changes within the same family over time: In other words, things getting more radicalized, more outre, and more conformed to each other's behavior in a convergence over time and cascading between the generations of the sisters.
- Baby daddies are the *norm: Again remarkable is how ubiquitous this is in the sisters, and how different it is from how Kris started out … and how everything changed during that period from 1975 to now, both for her (see convergence above) and for her daughters.
- Not one lasting marriage: All marriages end in divorce. (Kris doubly divorced, Kim and Khloe are both divorced, Kourtney never bothered to get married but has 3 kids with bad boy baby daddy Scott Disick, Kylie and Kendall haven't married yet, but Kylie has a baby daddy as well.)
- Financial independence, based on beauty/hotness/sexual power, is the norm and is accessible to all women in the family regardless of their naturally-born "assets".
- Plastic surgery and enhancements of all kinds are the norm, serving to level the playing field, in terms of natural assets, between the sisters. (There have been dramatic changes in appearance for almost all of them over the years.)

- Gynocentric — Men are bit players, for entertainment/status/sex/attention, but on the periphery of their lives. The women are the center of their own lives and are the power players in every situation (other than "Kimye", but that was a circus and Kim was always in her own control).
- Poor Masculinity — Men who make appearances are either divorced, baby daddies, sad sacks like brother Rob, or transitioned to women themselves(!).
- Some claim to be religious. (Kim actually had her kids baptized, Armenian-style. Khloe says she prays and goes to church, etc.)
- Interracial — Almost all relationships are with black men.
- Woke — Even the LGBT cultural trend found its way into the Kardashian storyline by means of Bruce/Caitlyn Jenner, and, of course, this was yet another marginalization of a masculine figure in favor of the feminine, quite literally.

Taken together these directions encompass and reinforce the following:

- Normalizing single motherhood.
- Glamorizing female singleness and single motherhood.
- Economic independence.
- Social independence from men, such that marriage is exceptional and odd.
- Divorce, singleness and unpartnered relationships are the norm, as are baby daddies.
- Glamorizing the appearance-centric, attention-centric, surgery and cosmetics-centric glam life for women of all ages (they range through the 20s, 30s, 40s and 60s).
- Marginalizing men in general — either "desirable but disposable" or on a revolving door basis, otherwise often pathetic or even trans.
- The normalization of interracial relationships to the extent that non-interracial ones are exceptional and odd for an entire family of women.

Overall, it's not a good message to broadcast to the entire culture, and yet, it is front and center.

You, too, can be a glamorous single mother at 23 with 234 million Instagram followers and an estimated net worth just under $1 billion …

The Kardashian Fantasy Life Script

This is obviously a fantasy life script that is impossible to attain for virtually any other women in the real world, for numerous reasons, most of them financial and connections-related. That's clear, so it isn't a life script that is practicable and actionable for most women.

But the key to understanding the impact is the popularity of the fantasy, and the way it has both been tailored to the existing fantasies of women and has played a significant role in molding and changing/directing women's fantasy lives (which set goals, expectations and influence behaviors) in certain intended directions over time. And the fact that the Kardashians fame and influence have been as long-running as they have been (and increasingly so over time), and that the lifestyles have become more extreme in wealth, fame and behavior as time has gone along, both indicate another element: A cascading generational impact, and further de-norming, radicalizing, extremizing trends over the course of time, both as exemplified in their lives, and in terms of what is being proposed as aspirational, fantasy scripting for women.

The effect of this aspirational/fantasy scripting is to make the idea of not being married to the same man for very long, or not being married at all, into a desired "life script" (not just for ne'er do well women down the socio-economic ladder, but for glamorous, famous, fabulously wealthy, popular, white women), one that includes kids, broad influence/attention/popularity, glamour, fun, excitement, and so on. It normalizes, practically institutionalizes, the legitimacy of using sexual power, and using whatever means necessary to attain and retain it, as the core lynchpin of a woman's life design, around which all other elements are arranged to suit. And it subtly encourages things like "LGBT Allyship", male disposability and unimportance, and, in particular, the cultural marginalization of white men (as exemplified by the extremely odd "lock step" interracial romantic choices of almost all of the Kardashian women) in favor of a world that is female-centered.

In short, this is directed cultural programming of the most subversive type. It's subversive because it flies under the radar screens of many people (like me for a long time), which acts to magnify its power by means of going un-noticed and therefore not being taken seriously. It's subversive because it very intentionally blurs the directed and the real, and this approach is not confined to television but extends also to the social media imaging (which is far wider-reaching and more influential), which makes the aspirational/fantasy element more alluring and more effective than an obviously fictional presentation does. And it incorporates very specific elements which appear to be clearly intended to move women, culturally, in a specific set of life trajectories as outlined above.

By this I don't mean that we will see millions of women becoming Kardashian look and life alikes. No. The Kardashian lifestyle, taken as a whole, is not attainable by almost any real life woman, especially given the wealth and fame levels involved which drive it in reality. But bits and pieces of it are, most definitely. And the spread of these bits and pieces, as adopted by women, because they comprise parts of an aspirational/fantasy script that they find appealing (even if only as a fantasy) is very impactful. Fantasies are powerful — they make for aspirations, on the margins, and influence life expectations and dreams over the course of time. And in the power of shared fantasy lies the key to understanding the kind of influence that the Kardashian phenomenon has had, and is continuing to have, on the culture, especially the culture of American women.

Conclusion: The Emergent Fantasy of the Designer Life

Where is this headed? It's of course impossible to tell the future with any accuracy, but some general trends are an increased emphasis on the curated life, on arranging one's life in a way determined by oneself, full stop, on transcending any and all rules and conventions and the like. The Kardashian phenomenon is perhaps the entree into this new, larger trend — the first step towards the popularization in the mass culture of an approach to life which is designed, curated, self-determined, and which ignores all boundaries beyond those erected by personal desire.

After all, if men can surgically alter themselves to become "transwomen" (as indeed "Caitlyn" Jenner did), why can't Kylie Jenner or Kim Kardashian alter herself to become a different woman, physically, which then enables a different persona in other ways? What we are seeing is the emergence of the curated/designer human — to curate the physical person in ways that go well beyond sartorial presentation and cosmetics and transcend the physical plant itself by means of surgery to create what is in many ways a new and different human persona, of whatever gender and appearance we like. Kylie Jenner is effectively the human prototype of this, and perhaps this will be the most lasting legacy of the Kardashian phenomenon: the allure and the making real of the possibility for fantasy fulfillment for women in all ways — material, sexual, attentional, appearance, physical, power — all of it.

It's one large ball of feminine fantasy wish fulfillment: all empowerment, glamour, surgically-sculpted faces and trainer-honed hard bodies, attractive/rich yet utterly disposable men, sisterhood and female-centered lives, endless amounts of safe, global attention, and money flowing like water from the everlasting fountain of created/curated/designed hotness.

Related

- Σ Frame (Deti): The Feminist Life Script (2020 December 17)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Demise of the Christian Life Script (2021 March 10)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model (2021 May 17))

Taking Headship by Force

Jack · 26 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines a unique hybrid option for approaching the SMP/MMP.

Readership: Christian Men
Author's Note: This post received some input from NovaSeeker.
Length: 2,500 words
Reading Time: 8.5 minutes

Introduction

Our exploration of the Christian Conundrum (2021 March 1) and several follow-up posts were intended to help us understand the current situation of the SMP/MMP. Based on Novaseeker's post, Constructing a Framework of Options (2021 March 15), the available options for Christians in the dating/mating context essentially boil down to the following short list.

1. Adaptation/Compromise/Capitulation to the new reality. This option involves various forms of personal accommodation or compromise to the standards imposed by the changed landscape. As Christians, we reflexively scoff at this, but the reality is that it is what most people do. This option is presumed to have less suffering up front, but perhaps much more later down the road of life.
2. Strong Hand/Law of the Jungle – Ignoring the new reality because one has a strong enough "market" position to do so. This option offers success to only 30% of men, at most. Within this 30%, there are 10-20% who are naturals, and for them, there is very little suffering. The other 10-20% of men who are not naturals have to work to get into the game, and for them, there is just as much suffering as Option 1. For the remaining 70% of men who are not naturals and no amount of self-improvement can get them there, this option is a smorgasbord of suffering. Furthermore, this layout is highly unlikely to change as life progresses.
3. Outlier/Single Tailored/Greener Pastures – This option is for those people who are charting a different course, intentionally going against the grain, neither accommodating/adapting to the new system, nor rising above it, but rather choosing a deliberately outlier path. Men who pursue this option may succeed at reaching their goals, or they may fail to reach any of their goals, depending on any number of factors. This option has a great deal of suffering, but there is also a sense of adventure and challenge which may make the suffering worthwhile.
4. Charismatic Faith – The fourth option is to form connections with people through faith, and see where that might take you. It requires social dexterity, emotional vitality, charisma, and a certain level of spiritual maturity which is difficult and time consuming to obtain. Personally, I think this is the best option, but it is only available to a select few – much fewer than any of the above – and those who have this gift are not likely to be struggling through life in any of the ways that this blog has addressed.

Russian culture has a Power-Fear based ethical structure.

Jim's Approach

Last month, fellow blogger Jim wrote a piece from the (partial) perspective of the first option, entitled Make women property again (2021 April 19), which is quite a good read. I presume it is written from the standpoint of a Christian who has lost all hope of availing any of the other three options. If you are a man in this situation, I strongly encourage you to go read Jim's post in its entirety.

A lot of readers of this blog have the opinion that the first option is nothing other than abandoning one's self to the cess pool of the culture's promiscuity while hoping to find a gem in the mud puddle. But Jim's post indicates that this is not entirely true, nor is it the overriding point. Furthermore, Jim's post reveals that this course of action is much more difficult than what we might expect. In fact, Jim's approach is so difficult for the average man, that I'm tempted to place this approach into the second category – The Strong Hand/Law of the Jungle option.

For those readers who would rather not read Jim's long post, Commenter Wulfgar Thundercock III summed up Jim's stance in a comment.

> "Nothing is going to fix marriage until things get bad enough that men go back to owning women, and women start being passed from father to husband without much regard for her feelings on the matter. Contraception, safe and reliable, has been available since some time in the Bronze Age. It isn't contraceptives that is causing the problem. It is the high status of women with regards to men. Control women, and you will find that the problem mysteriously disappears, much like how women mysteriously started having b@st@rds in alleys when the Victorians tried to control men instead of women.
>
> Until then, the only way to go about it for a Christian man is to keep f*ck!ng women until he can find one he can get to stick around. Any interpretation of Scripture that results in incels and whores is a bad interpretation. It will bear no fruit, and it is by the fruit that we shall know the true intent."

Wulfgar further explains,

> "The Jimian position is sort of a combination of Options 2, 3, & 4. We are trying to seed a new Christian civilization in the ashes of this Satanic civilization. We have the strong hand approach because we need to carve out our own little island of civilization from the filth surrounding us. We are outliers because we reject the current society and all of its precepts and priors. We come together in faith, that God might lead us from the ruins as he did Abraham, Moses, and Lot.
>
> We want a new, Christian American civilization to carry on in the manner that the Christian civilizations of old did. America can't really be saved, and it is too powerful right now to resist openly. As a result, we seek to influence and develop a new elite to replace the degenerates in power, and a faith and intellectual tradition that draws upon the old ways so that they can have the support to reign."

If I'm interpreting this correctly, Jim and Wulfgar are essentially saying that Headship has to be taken by force – not by faith, not by some sort of agreement or compromise, and certainly not by chance. Those Commonalities of Successful Marriages which are hard to obtain in today's culture must be leveraged into reality through the strong arm of masculine authority.

Theodore Roosevelt as a younger man.

Is this approach Biblical?

For most Christians, much of the talk/advice surrounding the mating process has revolved around a rules-based mentality (specifically, "Thou shalt not fornicate, commit adultery, etc."), which I've shown to be lacking from Biblical and mystical viewpoints in a few posts. Jim makes the case that this interpretation is inadequate by arguing that the observance of these rules supports the cultural order, whereas the lack of observance of these rules is concomitant with chaos and a breakdown of society. If the society is already morally broken, then following the rules would essentially be supporting a broken system. (Again, I hope I'm interpreting this correctly.) There needs to be a concerted and determined effort to undermine the corrupt system. And yes, widespread fornication will eventually bring down the mightiest of empires. We've been watching this happen over the last few decades.

These words of Jesus seem to apply here.

> [12] And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force. [13] For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John. [14] And if you are willing to receive it, he is Elijah who is to come. [15] He who has ears to hear, let him hear!
> [16] "But to what shall I liken this generation? It is like children sitting in the marketplaces and calling to their companions, [17] and saying:
>
> 'We played the flute for you,
> And you did not dance;
> We mourned to you,
> And you did not lament.'
>
> [18] For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, 'He has a demon.' [19] The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, 'Look, a glutton and a winebibber, a friend of tax collectors and sinners!' But wisdom is justified by her children."
>
> Matthew 11:12-19 (NKJV)

The Ear of Malchus, by James Tissot, 1886-1894.

In Matthew 11:12, Jesus describes the type of people that enter the kingdom of heaven as "violent men." He's not talking about natural or physical violence specifically. He's talking about a different kind of violence that comes from a holy desperation to follow Christ and kill sin no matter the cost. However, it is expected that this may sometimes be manifested in natural or physical violence against those who stand against God's purposes, depending on the context. The possibility of this kind of violence is revealed in Jesus' words to his disciples shortly before His crucifixion.

> [35] And He said to them, "When I sent you without money bag, knapsack, and sandals, did you lack anything?"
> So they said, "Nothing."
>
> [36] Then He said to them, "But now, he who has a money bag, let him take it, and likewise a knapsack; and he who has no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one. [37] For I say to you that this which is written must still be accomplished in Me: 'And He was numbered with the transgressors.' For the things concerning Me have an end."

> [38] So they said, "Lord, look, here are two swords."
>
> And He said to them, "It is enough."
>
> Luke 22:35-38 (NKJV)

Given this admonition, it is easy to understand why Peter had the aggressive mindset to cut off Malchus' ear when the Pharisees apprehended Jesus in the Garden of Gesthemane. But the idea is not just to kill for the sake of killing, but that killing those who stand in the way of God's work may be necessary and justified. Of course, I'm not advocating physical violence here, but only to make the point that men need to stop being wussified, get off their @$$es, and take some kind of action if they are serious about doing the Lord's work and seeing their lives transform for the better.

Get Action!*

On that last point, I'll share something I learned from reading Joshua 1 many years ago [emphasis mine].

> [6] Be strong and courageous, for you shall give this people possession of the land which I swore to their fathers to give them. [7] Only be strong and very courageous; be careful to do according to all the Law which Moses My servant commanded you; do not turn from it to the right or to the left, so that you may achieve success wherever you go. [8] This Book of the Law shall not depart from your mouth, but you shall meditate on it day and night, so that you may be careful to do according to all that is written in it; for then you will make your way prosperous, and then you will achieve success. [9] Have I not commanded you? Be strong and courageous! Do not be terrified nor dismayed, for the Lord your God is with you wherever you go."
>
> Joshua 1:6-9 (NASB)

Comprehensively, the lesson I took away from this passage is that there is an order to do things.

1. Take action! "Be strong and courageous!"
2. Think about what you're doing. Be mindful of the scriptures.

3. Work out the issues that come up and don't give up until you are successful.

The order matters!

A lot of guys sit around thinking about what to do, and they never find a "solution" that they believe is worth acting upon. They're doing (2) first.

Other guys run around fighting fires, trying to patch up every little issue that comes up, and although they might hold the ship together, they never make any progress in the larger scheme of things. They're doing (3) first.

Granted, a man who does (1) first is going to step into some sticky situations, maybe even sin, but that is to be expected. In fact, that may be the exact reason why God tells us three times in Joshua 1 to be strong and courageous!

> "It is not the critic who counts; not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood; who strives valiantly; who errs, who comes short again and again, because there is no effort without error and shortcoming; but who does actually strive to do the deeds; who knows great enthusiasms, the great devotions; who spends himself in a worthy cause; who at the best knows in the end the triumph of high achievement, and who at the worst, if he fails, at least fails while daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who neither know victory nor defeat."
>
> Excerpt from President Theodore Roosevelt's speech, "Citizenship in a Republic", Paris, 1910 April 23.

* "Get Action!" is a famous power quote from Theodore Roosevelt. In the current discussion, this phrase takes on new meaning.

Conclusions

Concerning the application of Jim's approach, I see it like a unique combination of Options 1, 2, 3, and 4. To break it down…

1. Jim's approach would involve a considerable measure of Adaptation/Compromise, but not Capitulation (Option 1).
2. To pull it off well, it would require an extremely Strong Hand in terms of confidence, character, and charisma, and a moderately Strong Hand in terms of resources (Option 2). Of course, men like this would be in the upper 20% of men.

3. Taking this approach would definitely be striking one's own path (Option 3).
4. It would also be empowered by charismatic faith of the applied variety (as opposed to the Four Square variety) (Option 4).

To be more generous, perhaps Jim's approach deserves a new hybrid category. I'll call it "Infiltrate and Usurp Authority from the Gynapotheosis".

Jim is honest in his assessment of this scheme, in that it makes no practical sense from either a Christian or a pragmatic point of view. But in terms of having an innovative frame and an indomitable attitude, he's definitely earned an A+.

I'm not sure what Jim's approach would look like when played out in modern western society, but I'm guessing it would look a lot like what most top 20% men go through before they settle down, i.e. playing the field, lots of sex with different women, etc. So I'm guessing that Jim's real distinction is maintaining frame, the "ownership" aspect, and enforcing Headship in a society that condemns it.

Taking on the issue of how to make Jim's approach work in the current context is the whole enchilada, and that will be a hard nut to crack. It's not clear where to begin, because there actually may not be a viable way beyond individual personalities who are already quite successful.

In any case, this is where the difficult work lies, and it's why many of us — not just Jim — are avoidant of it. It's a tough nut. It's easier to say "This is what works in the ideal sense, and here is why it works" than it is to say, "Here is what works, in general, for most guys and is both fully Christian and fully successful in the temporal set up currently". It remains to be seen whether Jim's method is a real option for the average man, apart from outlier cases.

If change is ever to happen, it needs to rise above a threshold momentum, which is about 10% of a society wide scale. NovaSeeker has made the point that it has to be pressed forward by elite figures. Jim has a huge following. If he wants to see this approach grow into a movement, then he needs to get busy writing about it every day so that (elite) men can catch on. But unfortunately, Jim doesn't usually teach or explain much about the rubber-meets-the-road details — which is what most men need to learn.

To any readers who are seriously considering experimenting with Jim's Option, I say that it's important that you go into it with firm conviction and with God's purpose of Headship in mind. If you do not have a clear conviction and sense of inner peace with God about this, then I advise you to refrain until such a time that you are ready. Also, as a warning, you'll be entering into the inner workings of a world of blood and honor. There will be little grace and forgiveness from men, only from God.

Related

- The Art of Manliness (Brett & Kate McKay): Manvotional: The Secret of Theodore Roosevelt's Greatness (2017 April 1, updated 2020 September 5)
- Σ Frame: Trajectories (2020 February 28)
- Σ Frame: Headship Restoration (2020 November 21)
- Σ Frame: A Mystical Approach to Meta Reality (2021 March 19)
- Σ Frame: More on the Framework of Options (2021 March 22)
- Σ Frame: The Spiritual Confusion of Clinging to the "Rules" (2021 March 24)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021 March 29)

The Roman Life Script

Jack · 28 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Life, love, slavery, and crucifixion in antiquity.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is based on a discussion between Jack and NovaSeeker, and is augmented with a curation of comments on Σ Frame about ancient Roman culture. Links to the original comments are contained in the first word of the paragraph.
Reader's Note: I'm no expert in history, so I make no claim of authority concerning the content of this post. Instead, I'll only state that the views contained here reflect those of our readers.
Length: 3,500 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Rome? Who Cares About a Bunch of Pagans? Aren't we Christians?

The Roman Empire is something of a historical Rorschach test: how one reacts to it, conceptually and viscerally, tends to be very revealing of the person, much more than it is of history itself.

Rome was the foundation of the West, and the foundation of Christendom. It was the basic substrate on which everything that came later in the West was built — institutions of religion, state, law, language, culture, and the like. The influence is pervasive and vast, and persists well into the present-day in all of these areas, in nations that are both Catholic, Protestant and now Secular in cast. Rome's legacy therefore cannot be ignored without remaining ignorant of the roots of much of our current practices and culture, particularly on an underlying, institutional level. In many respects, Rome (and the broader Greco-Roman culture that Rome enshrined in itself) simply is the West in its foundations.

And yet life in Roman times was, of course, in many ways rather different from our own. This is to be expected, given the great span of time involved, and the many changes in technology, economy, ideas and political structures between now and then. This article will examine some of these areas of Roman life, as they were lived during the time of the Roman Empire.

Via Appia, “The Appian Way”, Italy.

Life under Roman Law

The ancient Romans were strict disciplinarians, with very harsh punishments imposed for significant crimes and defeated enemies, such as scourging with cat-o-nine tails and crucifixion. The Appian Way is a road in Italy whose history is a poignant symbol of this. In 71 AD, the Romans crucified 6,000 rebels along a 200 km. (120 mi) stretch of the Via Appia from Rome to Capua, serving as a gruesome reminder to anyone traveling that way that the Romans should not be reviled. That is an average of one cross every 33.3 meters! (109 ft.)

A payslip made from a sheet of papyrus shows a Roman soldier was left penniless 1,900 years ago after the military took out fees for certain items. The document was made out to a Gaius Messius, who participated in the Siege of Masada that was one of the last battles during the First Jewish-Roman War. The receipt shows Messius received 50 denarri as his stipend, but fees for barley money, food and military equipment were taken out that totaled to the amount of his full pay.

The Romans, who had a professional army, prohibited soldiers from marrying at all until they completed their service. Oftentimes, a Roman legionnaire’s retirement pension was a piece of land in the province where he served.

A Roman legionnaire might serve his entire career in Gaul, receive a piece of land there, marry a local girl, buy a few slaves to work his land, and live the rest of his life in Gaul. That’s one way that they Romanized the provinces.

Slavery was prevalent, accounting for roughly every third person living on the Italian peninsula. The Romans (and the Ottomans) often conquered their neighbors and made slaves of them.

At one point, both the Greeks and Romans had very strict rules against homosexuality (see below), infidelity, etc. Pagan Europe, at points in time, had the death penalty for two crimes: homosexuality and being a coward.

The Romans extolled discipline and virtue for most of their history until the point where their society was in full on decline.

The Roman Colosseum

Sex

Pagan cultures were highly sexualized. The Roman paterfamilias was buggering his catamite, and also using his other slaves for sex at times.

Francine Rivers wrote a novel series called Mark of the Lion set in the time of the Romans and the early church. One of the main characters in the series is a woman through whom the author goes into veiled depth about the extremely sexually deviant depravity of the time.

The NT epistles were written to men and women in a MORE sex saturated culture than us. Men and women were openly having sex with temple prostitutes, with their father's wives (1 Corinthians 5), and so on. Pederasty/pedophilia (men having sex with young boys) was common in Greek and Roman culture. By contrast to these common practices, scripture called these men and women to avoid sexual immorality and avoid sex with anyone other than their spouses.

AT the same time, it is dangerous to associate Greco-Roman sexual mores with post-Sexual Revolution values. Current values are gynocentric whereas Greco-Roman ones were patriarchal. I highly recommend the book, From Shame to Sin, by Kyle Harper (PDF review) as an excellent resource on Greco-Roman sexual values and the Christian values that replaced them. Modern values are alien to both Greco-Roman and Christian values.

[What does fornication even mean? Apparently, some protestants say what is commonly called fornication is in fact your wedding ceremony (and the "fake" wedding ceremony of exchange of consent/tokens of consent was created by the pagan Roman church's additions). All argued in meticulous detail from the KJV Bible with no possibility of a deciding authority.]

Around the time of Christ, the Roman poet Ovid wrote a famous work about "how to attract the opposite sex" called "The Art of Love" (Ars Amatoria), in which he said, regarding illicit sex:

> "Whether they give or refuse, it delights women to have been asked."

Apparently nothing has changed, except for now blue-pill churches try to teach us that women are always our moral superiors. And Feminists claim that Ovid was a misogynist.

"Satyr raping a nymph", a sculpture of Roman antiquity.

Abortion

The Greeks and Romans used abortifacient herbs, and performed uterus-scrape abortions. But then, maybe that's one reason why the Romans had no-fault divorce way back in the 1st Century BC.

Abortion was common in ancient Greece and Rome. Abortifacient herbs have been known since prehistory. Obviously, all of that is far more advanced today than it was in antiquity, but it's not new. It's relatively new in the Christian West, but it's not new in the world.

> "There is nothing new under the sun."
>
> Ecclesiastes 1:9

Abortion and infanticide were both common enough in the early Roman Empire that the Church (and likely the Apostles themselves) felt the need to preach against both of them. (See the Didache.) Both abortion, and infanticide were common among the Greeks and Romans. The Church has been fighting both since its inception.

The Roman Tetrapylon of Aphrodisias

Marriage

Greco-Roman culture had its own sex of difficulties but at least it was easy to get married. Marriages were arranged or contracted for economic reasons rather than romantic compatibility.

In Greco-Roman culture women were married early while men were married later in life but were free to sow their wild oats with prostitutes or take advantage of slaves (of either sex). Marriages were in any case either arranged or they were an economic/social contract. That doesn't resemble our modern dating market at all. There is a book called, The First Sexual Revolution, by Kyle Harper, which goes into detail on Greco-Roman sexual ethics as well as the Christian ethic which replaced it. Both are totally alien to our current cultural view of sex.

All successful religions are elite religions. Christianity provided obedient, virgin wives for the Roman elite. Then the Christian Romans were able to cooperate better than the pagan Romans, so the pagan Romans lost. Then Constantine came in and replaced the official state religion with Christianity and it was all over by then.

The core relationship with the wife was never seen as being based on sexual satisfaction, and so the lack thereof was not a valid reason for upsetting the marriage. This has been changed, and not to the way it was in pagan times, when the paterfamilias had the status that he had in the Roman family — it was changed into a form that did not exist also in Greco-Roman times. The lack of sexual satisfaction on the part of either spouse as a valid reason to dissolve a marriage does not appear until our times — it is new, and it has having a devastating effect.

Divorce

Rome eventually adopted a form of no-fault divorce, but because of the entire social structure, there was not the cultural expectation and pressure inside marriages relating to marital sexual satisfaction being a critical driver of this — and there is no historical evidence that it was. There were likely some Roman aristocratic women who did precisely that, but this did not create a culture in Rome that emphasized sexual satisfaction in marriage — if anything the high degree of tolerance for extra-marital sexual activity for married persons, especially for the paterfamilias (which is contrasted with today, where such activity remains highly scorned socially especially when engaged in by men) would indicate that it was expected that to some degree the marriage would not provide the degree and kind of mutual sexual satisfaction that is expected in many circles today.

The Les Ferreres Roman Aqueduct is located outside of Tarragona Spain.

H0m0sexuality

Greco-Roman culture was far more sexually immoral than ours. It was so grossly immoral, that the Corinthian Christians didn't even know that it was wrong for them to have sex with the 1,000 prostitutes of the temple of Aphrodite in Corinth. And yet, St. Paul never told the Corinthians that "some of the biblical laws on sex need to be suspended until conditions improve." Just the opposite. (See 1st Cor 6:15-20.)

Greek and Roman men used to keep young boys (catamites), whom they would castrate to prevent them from becoming masculine, and use to satisfy their sexual urges (which their wives could not satisfy), because they "placed human sexual satisfaction at the center of their definition of human flourishing". And there was plenty of lesbian sex, too. None of this is new. See Romans 1.

"Effeminatus" in Latin also had the meaning of "passive/receipient partner in gay sex". Neither the Greeks nor the Romans were culturally against gay male sex, per se, provided that the male adult (in Greece) or citizen (in Rome) was not an "effeminatus" (i.e., he was the "active" and not the "passive"). (More than you want to know about this is here.)

I think Paul was likely intending to capture not only these and, unlike the ambient Greco-Roman culture, he did not want to draw a moral distinction between "active" and "passive", so included both "effeminates" and "homosexuals" to make sure it was clear that all participants in gay male sex were clearly covered (and, I would argue, female homosexuals as well) — again, precisely because this was different from what the ambient Greco-Roman culture believed, when it came to "active" role male homosexual activity (passive role activity was viewed as unvirtuous for adults and/or citizens).

NS: Rome also had lots of gay acts, especially among the young, but no "gay identity". Love and sex were a part of life, not the center, but there were some rules around sex, just not Christianity's rules. Affection among members of the same sex was common and accepted. Sexuality was also more "fluid", although perpetual same sex affiliation

(to the exclusion of hetero family life) in free adults was shunned and not accepted. Familial loyalty and building up a firm familial foundation was everything, as was playing one's role in the social order virtuously (as Romans defined it). Rome had its own different set of internal problems and contradictions, but it was, in many ways, similar to the civilization that has persisted in East Asia, albeit in a European vein, which differed based on the underlying philosophical differences between ancient Greek ideas, on the one hand, and ancient Indian and Chinese ideas, on the other.

A Roman bath house, Bristol (UK).

Spirituality

The Romans had a large panopoly of god and goddesses that are well known today as Roman mythology, with Zeus being the King of the gods and Venus being the god of "love". Religious practices largely consisted of rituals and a general reverence towards the gods. This pantheology, and the widespread acceptance of the same, allowed all of the societal conditions described above.

The philosophical culture of Roman antiquity had a wider and much more pervasive influence in the socio-spiritual realm, building on Greek topics such as political equality, political rights, authority, tyranny, free citizenry, the influence of superpowers, and a national republic.

During the time of the earliest church there remained a great cultural influence from Greek philosophical schools, principally of three variants: (1) neo-Platonic Gnosticism, (2) Stoicism, and (3) Cynicism (as defined philosophically, which is very different from the contemporary uses of the words "stoic" and "cynic") in the ambient culture, and even while the early church fathers railed against Gnosticism, Stoicism, and Cynicism, that was mainly because that thinking was widespread in their churches, because it was the prevalent thinking in the ambient intellectual culture of late Rome.

Christianity was introduced precisely at the zenith of Roman power and influence, and this is how Christianity came to be spread across the civilized world so quickly.

One of the immediate impacts of Christianity is that it upset that apple cart of Venusian "love" and rampant fornication, because Christianity had absolute rules about sex, no matter what stage in life, and absolute rules about gender expression as it relates to sex, just as the Hebrews did. There was a major culture clash between the Greco-

Roman ancient culture, which in many ways is more similar to what persisted in China, and the Hebrew one, but via Christianity the Hebrew vision prevailed and “alternative sexualities” were suppressed, filial piety was chipped away at over time and replaced with absolute loyalty to God, the “virtuous life” (key in both the Roman and Confucian systems) was replaced with Christianity’s vision of holiness through grace and standards which are not achievable by human effort (contra Rome and China). The entire order was turned on its head rather deliberately.

> “[25] …they exchanged the truth about God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever! Amen. [26] For this reason God gave them up to dishonorable passions. For their women exchanged natural relations for those that are contrary to nature; [27] and the men likewise gave up natural relations with women and were consumed with passion for one another, men committing shameless acts with men and receiving in themselves the due penalty for their error. [28] And since they did not see fit to acknowledge God, God gave them up to a debased mind to do what ought not to be done.”
>
> Romans 1:25 (ESV)

The Roman Empire essentially crumbled from within as it reached peak decadence, which followed a long period of prosperity and power. In other words, in that case God’s judgment (since the rise and fall of all empires is according to His schedule) looked like more like Romans 1 than Genesis 19.

A Roman Feast, by Roberto Bompiani (1900).

The Historical Influence of Roman Culture

The entire western culture is built on an amalgamation of Greco-Roman-Gothic values that have been whitewashed with a veneer of Christian values.

Feminine superiority is a major element in the element of Germanic mythology that was absorbed, in parts, into Western culture through the contact between the Germanic gothic tribes and the Romans. That’s where a good deal of the much more prominent devotion to Mary in the Western Church (as compared to Eastern Christianity) stems from; women dominated that society in ways that aren’t noted often in history studies. For example, the weregild for a woman was twice that of a man in the same social class, because women were more valuable than were men, due to having the rarer reproductive resource. Later, concepts like chivalry and courtly love were integrated into Western culture approximately 800 to 900 years ago, of course, long before contemporary feminism.

These elements were incorporated into Western culture in roughly the same process. The influences of Christianity and the influences of folk religions were an ambient part of Western culture, and there occurred a blending of both of the elements together in terms of the mind, mindset and identity of the average Christian. Even though the Church itself never explicitly endorsed Chivalry and Courtly Love as doctrine (that is, until the advent of Churchianity), the average Christian growing up in this culture had these ideas impressed on their mind, their mindset, and their identity, and saw that as being merged with their "Christian" identity as well. Thus, these pagan influences came into the church "through the back door" by means of a de facto cultural merger on the personal level.

I would argue that "Christianity" as it evolved once embraced by the elites of the Roman Empire, was destined to bring us to exactly where are today.

Dalrock has shown that the anglo West is just emerging from a thousand years under sway of the Romantic Tradition as evidenced by chivalry and its long tail influence in male/female relations. The majority of people, at least in America, are much influenced by Romanticism and Romantic expectations. The "conservative"/tradcon Right has staked-out Romanticism as the ethical and spiritual foundation of their lives. Romanticism even rules their churches, because it's a female-supremacist system.

The Modified Continuation of Romanesque Pantheism

The trouble in the West is that in the post-post-post enlightenment phase that we live in, we are now neither fish nor fowl. The Christian replacement of Roman virtue with its own values has been abandoned by many, and soon by almost all. The emergent world, however, isn't really a reification of the pre-Christian system and its esteem for virtue (as exemplified in, say, the writings of Marcus Aurelius or even Seneca), as much as some Christians like to say that it is — would that it were so, really.

No, we are replacing the prior Western systems — Greco-Roman and then Hebrew/Christian, the combination of Athens, Rome and Jerusalem that made the West itself — with …. nothing. Nihil. That is the problem.

The “drafters” of the contemporary “vision” are anti-vision: the idea is for everyone to make his/her/its own vision, with no cohesion — nether the Greco-Roman one, nor the Christian one, nor the Confucian one, etc. Rather it’s Novaseeker’s vision for Novaseeker, Jack’s vision for Jack. There is no cohesion. Would that we were simply repaganizing — as Christians we could deal with that, because we’ve had the argument with pagan philosophy already — we know how to engage that adversary. We are having a much harder time, however, with the new and different challenge that is facing us, a challenge that wasn’t presented to the Christians who were dealing with the world of Greco-Roman paganism.

It’s a natural cultural cycle for a society trying to ‘outsmart’ God and his Word, and not just for Christian cultures. Romans 1 says that “Professing to be wise, they became fools” (v. 22). Even pagans know what God wants them to do, because God has written His law in their hearts (Rom. 2:15), and revealed His nature through them through nature itself (Rom. 1:18-21).

That’s why even pagan cultures often arrive at conclusions found in the Bible, even though they never read the Bible, often times before the Bible was even written.

Cultures discover God’s will either by reading the Bible, or by generations of painful trial and error (sometimes both), but eventually a generation comes along that thinks they know better.

Jesus tells us in Matthew 19 that God intended from the beginning (quoting Genesis 1-2) for human sexuality to be confined to marriage, which Jesus, quoting Genesis 1-2, defined as a union of one man to one woman for life.

But, every generation since the Boomers knows better, right? We know that heterosexual promiscuity is better. In fact, it empowers women. So do birth control pills and abortions.

Oh, and homosexual promiscuity is even better.

Oh, and transgenderism is even better.

What’s next? Pretty much all the depravity in Leviticus 18.

Buckle up. It’s going to be bumpy ride.

The Triumph of Bacchus, by Ciro Ferri (ca. 1668).

Conclusions

In the end, the legacy of the Roman Empire in our contemporary world is mixed and complex. Some elements of our culture are traceable to the ancient Greco-Roman heritage, while others are Christian in origin. Still others arose due to the "bringing back" of some of the ideas of the Greco-Roman era during the Renaissance and the working out of those ideas, and their expansion, in during the "Enlightenment", which created a new synthesis: a kind of "Nouveau Greco-Roman Revivalism with a Christian Base" … which itself has now collapsed on itself due to the rise of a skeptical attitude towards reason itself in the wake of the 20th Century and the advent of Post-modernism.

However, because of the importance of the Greco-Roman "piece of the puzzle", its legacy will always be controversial and, for Christians, the history of the confrontation with Roman paganism 1500 years ago will always be formative.

Related

- Ancient Origins (Riley Winters): The Roman god Bacchus as a Christian icon (2014 October 21)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Moon Day Review – The Feminine Empire (2019 May 6)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Progressive (2020 November 10)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Amalgamation of Western Culture (2020 December 2)
- NATSAB (Pete Rambo): Interesting quote from the Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (2021 May 27)

Is Patriarchy for Deplorables?

Novaseeker · 31 May 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Why are upper class marriages more egalitarian yet less prone to divorce?

Readership: All
Length: 2,300 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

Elspeth asked me a question a while back, which I thought would benefit from a more detailed response.

She wrote,

> "I actually popped back in here because I wondered Novaseeker's take on [this page from American Compass: Let them eat daycare], which I find fascinating for a number of reasons. It really speaks to the fracture in our culture that the more education and money people acquire, the more they reject the more traditional, patriarchal model of marriage and family. If you just look at the money, it seems counterintuitive, which leaves the education factor as a major contributor to the disintegration of the type of family structure in which children most thrive."

My first impression was to think that the author and publisher must be Woke. But upon further contemplation, it is indeed striking that, based on various data, higher educated people (generally higher earning) tend to…

1. Have children almost always when married (and not otherwise).
2. Embrace egalitarian sex roles within marriages.
3. Have the lowest divorce rates.

It likewise appears that lower educated people (generally lower earning) tend to…

1. Have children more frequently without being married.
2. When married, have more traditional sex roles in their marriages.
3. Have higher divorce rates.

Overall, it seems clear that upper-middle (and higher) class marriages (which I will refer to here as UMC/+ Marriages) are more egalitarian and more feminized yet less prone to divorce, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages (which I will refer to here as LMC/- Marriages) tend to be more patriarchal, yet more prone to divorce.

In fact, the data are even worse than this, when one takes into account family formation. In that data, the percentage of kids raised in intact families by "class" is compared. However, that data looks at "couples" only — in lower SES segments, single parenthood is much more common. Because of this, the data concerning how people who aren't in the couples category are doing, with respect to breadwinning in the lower levels, dramatically overstates the difference, I think, because it omits the data that relates to the children that are raised outside stable couples in those classes — situations where there isn't any "intact patriarchal model" at all, because there isn't an intact family of any kind.

This does, indeed, break down by the mother's education levels, married and unmarried, as seen in this article from EconoFact: Widening Socioeconomic Differences in Childrens Family Structure. And, the data also "leaves out" the highly educated high-income people who are not coupled, or do not have children, too. So it skews on that side, too, although the overall tendency is for uncoupled UMC and higher people, who are not divorced, not to have children regardless of their sex.

In general, all of this tends to undermine what we believe about Patriarchy and Headship, where we would expect that couples of any SES category who are following a patriarchal headship model to have higher marriage rates, lower divorce rates, and a more stable family life than couples who eschew patriarchy, headship, and any sex roles in marriage. Is there an explanation for this?

The Secular Life Script Works for Successful Secular Outcomes

The UMC/+ Marriages tend to result from the common life success script that we have discussed quite a bit at Sigma Frame. This is the life script that emphasizes college and, in many cases, some post-graduate education, career formation, traction, travel and personal development in the 20s, with marriages taking place around age 30, and child-bearing in the early to mid-30s.

Key elements of this script, when it comes to marriage, family formation, and children are:

- Avoidance of children prior to marriage (and aborting if necessary)
- Income sufficient to source either housing in top school districts or elite private schools
- Career traction for both members of the couple to finance that income (outside of cases where the man has a truly high income)
- High parental investment (particularly time) per child relative to past parenting methods
- High amounts of “enrichment” activities/experiences for children of all ages, which are often very expensive

These life choices tend to result in positive external/secular/material results for the people who can manage them (as discussed in the next section below) and who wish to pursue them. That is, they tend to result in increased income and earning capacity, which makes for more attractive candidates for marriage from a secular perspective. They also tend to facilitate the sourcing of top school districts or elite private schooling, which tends to lead to a higher percentage of external/secular/material “results” in the children (albeit with a significant fail rate, as there always is with children in any scenario).

Who is it that is successful in pursuing this life path, which leads to more stable than average families and marriages?

ADIEU skews heavily towards the Upper Middle Class

Not everyone is equally well-suited to execute the secular life script successfully.

In a previous post, I explained why Sticking the Landing is for the Elite (2021 May 10). Women who are UMC or higher, and are able to stick the landing, have the following traits:

1. Attractiveness / Looks
2. Discipline
3. Intelligence / Smarts
4. Education
5. Upbringing

All else kept equal, people who have more of the ADIEU characteristics will tend to reach more successful outcomes, as determined by the secular life script, and external/secular/material standards, because these characteristics all serve to facilitate success in that life path.

The Rise of the Secular Life Script Has Weakened Christianity Substantially among the ADIEU

In the relatively recent path, the life script for secularly upwardly-mobile people did not openly conflict with traditional Christian ideas about sex, family formation and marital sex roles. With the social revolution of the period from 1965-1990, that dramatically changed.

The primary change was the vastly increased emphasis on women's education and financial independence as a requirement for the upwardly-mobile life script. This conflicted with Christian sexual morals by postponing marriage, which resulted in a massive increase in extra-marital sex among Christians. It also conflicted with Christian ideas about marital sex roles, because the new upwardly mobile script featured substantial female incomes as a part of the upwardly mobile familial trajectory in most cases, and this trend tended to make most marriages egalitarian because income egalitarianism generally leads to social egalitarianism in marriage.

The Christian response to this has been varied. Much of Christianity has tacitly accepted the new secular life script, and all that goes along with it (including delayed marriage, massively increased fornication, smaller family sizes and marital egalitarianism), turning a rather studied blind eye when necessary. A smaller group within Christianity has redoubled its emphasis on traditional marriage roles and Christian patriarchy, but most typically where there is not a substantial male income available (and this is not common, because such incomes are not, in general, common) this approach comes at the expense of the secular upwardly mobile script.

Because of this, the UMC/ADIEU/elite class has become both less Christian and, when it remains Christian, much less morally orthodox. This is the case, even leaving aside the secularizing influence of university education (which is, of course, substantial). The kind of Christianity that is practiced generally in most UMC/+ Marriages is not generally morally orthodox when it comes to sex (particularly the couple's sexual history outside of marriage), procreation/family size and sexual roles in marriage, and there are plenty of people in UMC/+ Marriages who have simply left Christianity altogether. This can happen due to the conflict between the morally orthodox Christianity of their upbringing and the life script they wish to pursue, their disinterest in any other forms of Christianity, the secularization of their university educations, or the pervasive influence of the social culture of their similarly-educated peers when it comes to the kinds of issues on which Christianity and the secular life script conflict.

For those with further interest in these kinds of issues, Ross Douthat, the "house conservative" at The New York Times, has written about some of the challenges we face in countering the trend of de-Christianization among the social class that has the most stable marriage and family life today.

Stability, Divorce, and the Golden Handcuffs Effect

Of course, stable marriages are not necessarily happy ones.

That is, the fact that a marriage fulfills the success track of the secular life script in external/material/secular terms does not mean that the husband and wife are emotionally, sexually, and spiritually engaged, fulfilled and nourished in these marriages. In fact, there have been at least some studies suggesting that egalitarianism in marriages tends to suppress sexual satisfaction in them. My own guess is that a fair number of these marriages are average to below average in marital satisfaction. But it does not appear to increase the divorce rate — the divorce rate for this group is the lowest overall.

Why is this the case? Why doesn't this group divorce more, if it is no happier than other married demographics?

Generally speaking, in my view, having observed this group for decades as a newcomer to it myself, the basic reason can be described as the "golden handcuffs effect".

The relationship of a married couple with Golden Handcuffs.

In other words, the upper middle class striver set tends to be in a very particular situation in terms of household income. That income tends not to be so high as to obviate any negative financial impacts of divorce, but also not low enough such that the loss of income does not have massive changes in lifestyle on both spouses.

For example, an upper middle couple in the Bay Area or Boston may have a combined household income of $400k (let's say $200k per spouse). If that couple divorces, the main income effect is child support for the non-custodial parent, but the diminution of lifestyle is felt massively by both spouses. In a place like SF Bay, the difference in lifestyle between a household income of $200k and $400k is massive — in many cases, it will drop one or both spouses out of the upper middle set, because in these larger metros (where these kinds of couples are concentrated to begin with), the income bar is higher for entry into the UMC housing areas and the like.

For a couple with lower household income, the financial pain of divorce is also significant, but for the most part they remain in the same general SES category, whereas for the UMC, in the expensive places where they tend to congregate, a divorce can move them down from UMC to MC simply due to the fact that the UMC is mostly comprised, in such places, of married couples with twice their income. This kind of drop in lifestyle (and status) is particularly traumatic for people who, after all, have constructed their entire approach to life around being upwardly-mobile strivers. It's therefore an outcome that many of these couples will actively bend over backwards to avoid, even when the marriages are of average or below average satisfaction.

A related factor is the impact on children. As noted above, a key part of the secular life script for the upwardly mobile is their focus on setting up their kids. As noted, this is one of the main reasons they avoid having children prior to marrying. Once married, they similarly tend to avoid getting divorced, for similar reasons — to do so, even in a so/so or somewhat unsatisfying marriage, blows up the entire life approach that these people have pursued for a decade or more, of setting up their own lives so that they can set up their kids to outcompete the kids of other people. Divorce generally undermines that goal substantially, especially when the painful income depleting effect on this class in divorce is taken into account.

Overall, then, the particular income level of these couples, in the context of the hyper-expensive places they tend to congregate, and their heavy emphasis on setting up their kids for similar secular/external/material successes, tends to make divorce much less common among this group. It would appear that the overall happiness of upper level income families depends more on lifestyle and economic status, and therefore, marital happiness is less of an issue in the stability of these marriages compared to other population demographics.

Conclusions

In the end, of course, secular outcomes are of this world, and as Christians, we are to be in the world, and not of the world. It therefore stands to reason that when the world's criteria and requirements for "successful" marriages, seen in the worldly sense of family formation, family stability, divorce avoidance, and secular success for children, are at odds with Christian moral orthodoxy, the lives of Christians, in a worldly sense, will suffer if they adhere to moral orthodoxy for themselves.

That is, we should expect Christians to fail in these areas if the standards for success in them are established by the secular culture in a way that is at odds with Christian morals. We may very well live in an odd time in which it is possible for people who are highly immoral (the UMC/+) to have the external trappings of what those of a previous era would have associated with a moral family life, whereas Christians will struggle mightily to do so because both parties to the marriage are free to act as they wish, and outside that immoral group, the incentives are not the same to avoid out of wedlock births and divorces. The key for Christians is not whether they are marrying, or whether they manage to stay together in marriages where upwardly mobile secular people would, but whether they obey God themselves, in what they do in their own lives, in terms of the things that are in their own individual control.

Related

- Σ Frame (Lexet): The U.S. Census Bureau sanctions Divorce (2020 January 25)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model (2021 May 17)

Patriarchy is the Default Context

Jack · 2 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The easiest way to sell patriarchy is to make it either the best or the only card left to play.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: In this essay, upper-middle (and higher) class marriages are referred to as UMC/+ Marriages, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages are referred to as LMC/- Marriages.
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Is Patriarchy for Deplorables? (31 May 2021)

Good question!

This post continues to explore this topic and adds a few insights that came up in the comments.

Why are UMC/+ Marriages more Egalitarian?

NovaSeeker wrote,

> "Overall, it seems clear that upper-middle (and higher) class marriages (which I will refer to here as UMC/+ Marriages) are more egalitarian and more feminized yet less prone to divorce, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages (which I will refer to here as LMC/- Marriages) tend to be more patriarchal, yet more prone to divorce."

This brought up the more basic question of why upper class marriages in the west are more egalitarian yet less prone to divorce. We saw a lot of good discussion on this topic under this post, but I doubt we could run down a single reason that could apply to every case.

However, it is clear that the basic answer is because the UMC and higher have a vested political and economic interest in staying married, while nobody else has that restraint. That political interest includes preserving their coterie in the upper ranks through the future and protecting their progeny's ability to continue in the same.

Actually, this reflects the ancient Biblical model of the tribal family, and it underscores the primary element of staying married. Without this overriding emphasis on hedging the tribe's equity and nurturing its social domain, and the intergenerational continuity of the same, the only other way to stay married is to get married for the right reason.

This brings us to another part of the equation. American cultural roots have drifted far away from the Biblical ideal. The failure of patriarchy among all classes has to do with how Americans handle marriage itself. No one gets married for the right reasons. No one even knows what the right reasons are! Because of the pervasive ignorance about the spiritual purpose of marriage, marital trouble is therefore highly likely across all classes.

Another piece of the puzzle is because the overall happiness of upper level income families depends more on lifestyle and economic status. Therefore, marital happiness (a secular code word for sanctification) is less of an issue in the stability of these marriages compared to other population demographics. For the majority of cases, I think, the relative popularity, the trappings of wealth, and the various conveniences of this lifestyle offer a panoply of very satisfying idols that can offer an effective distraction from the pain of a deeper spiritual poverty.

Another element is the stability that wealth provides. The financial status of the UMC/+ allows more latitude to drift away from Headship and operate outside of God's ordained order without being crushed by the consequences thereof. Novaseeker made this clear in his post, Sticking the Landing is for the Elite (2021 May 10).

But so far, we've only covered why the UMC/+ marriages are less prone to divorce. We haven't yet looked at why LMC/- marriages are more patriarchal.

Why are LMC/- Marriages more Patriarchal?

People of different SECs hold different values.

- UC values life success, education for the sake of status, financial stability, wealth preservation, the status-laden lifestyle, and making sure their children can continue in the same. They marry for the trans-generational continuation of the same.
- MC values career success, education for the sake of upward mobility and income, fashion trends that imitate UC (like having a large house and an SUV), and a focus on the family and religion. They marry because "It's the right time."
- LC values "fun" life experiences, resiliency, and later in life, socializing. They marry for "love".

As you can see, the UMC/+ and the LMC/- have different sets of prerogatives in life. The priorities of the LMC/- are more closely attuned to the purpose of Marriage 1.0, which Deti described here.

> "Give the man a little "empire". Give the woman a home, safety, and security. A safe place for man and woman's sexual expression. A safe and secure place for rearing children and preparing them for adulthood. Amassing some property to pass on to children. Overall order, peace, and tranquility."

This reflects the traditional model of the nuclear family, which emphasizes the joys of living. This sense of joy is characterized by family gatherings, barbecues, holiday celebrations, church attendance, sports game competitions, football parties, and the like. This is the primary lifestyle that provides the contextual environment in which LMC/- marriages form, prosper, and thrive.

This social involvement provides an element of stability which wealth cannot offer. The need for social relevance in the absence of excessive wealth also goads the members of this group to stay tuned into socality and to appreciate the various rewards of their hard work. In this context, Headship can be an effective structure of authority which allows all else to operate more smoothly.

The overall happiness of mid and lower level income families rides on social connections, family, and fellowship more than lifestyle and economic status. Therefore, marital happiness (i.e. sanctification) is not such a far stretch to achieve. The worst kinds of effects come from impulsiveness, stupid decisions, the influences of churchianity, feminism, and progressivism, and trying to mimic the worst characteristics of the upper class.

At heart, Tomi Lahren is a MC striver who jumped off track.

The Present Difficulty of Maintaining Headship

This is a bad time in history to pursue the Biblical model of patriarchal Headship in marriage. Deti made the point that Patriarchy is a figment of Marriage 1.0, but that we are living in an age of Marriage 2.0. He gave us five conclusions that describe the implications of this discrepancy.

1. You get what you incentivize. When you incentivize love, higher purpose, future time orientation, and God-worship, you get Marriage 1.0. When you incentivize wealth accumulation, self-purpose, present time orientation, and self-worship, you get Marriage 2.0.
2. Marriage 1.0 does not work without mature, outward minded, God-fearing participants who care about the children and future. Marriage 2.0 works with people who can dissolve the marriage anytime, are self-centered and self absorbed, and ignore God.
3. In a society that encourages Marriage 2.0 (which we have now), there is no reason to form a 1.0 Marriage, because society will actively work to undermine and destroy it. In the event it dissolves, it will be done so under Marriage 2.0 rules, which crush the participants and care only about "who's gonna pay?"
4. If you're a bottom 80%er, you can't amass property without it being taken away in a later divorce. If you are in this set and you marry and later divorce, you both will be REALLY bad off, probably worse off than if you had never married in the first place. There is no reason to amass property if it will just be consumed in a divorce.
5. One need not marry to have sex, or bear or raise children. Current society has removed all restraints on sexual behavior, and has normalized out of wedlock childbirth. The only logical reason to marry now is if marriage will magnify and maximize property accumulation.

Deti concluded,

> "The main reason we have a sexual free for all and out of wedlock birth is because for a long time, our society has been rich enough to pay for it and to absorb the social and monetary costs."

> “Patriarchy is for the Deplorables.”

Case Study – OkraHead’s Anti-Deplorable Ex

OkraHead told a story that is oddly reminiscent of some others we’ve read about before.

> “Prior to divorce, my now ex-wife and I were very solidly UMC in income… Well on our way to double the base line for UMC in our state. The ex decided she wanted a divorce because I was “too controlling” (patriarchy, anyone?). She admitted under oath there was no adultery, no abuse, no addiction… She just wanted to have “more fun.” Less than a decade later she went from UMC to being on welfare and crying because she can’t get in to see a decent doctor with her Medicaid card. As far as the religious aspect goes, following the divorce she openly renounced her faith… She says she no longer believes “any of that stuff.” She gave up her faith, her marriage, etc. because she couldn’t live under “patriarchy”.”

In this case, Patriarchy really was the make-it-or-break-it turning point in the marriage and her faith. If she had accepted Patriarchy, then she could have had the whole ball of yarn. But then again, a ball of yarn is useless without cats, so it’s better (in her mind) to have cats.

Patriarchy vs. Sexual License

NovaSeeker brought out the point that the failure of marriage among all classes is not about Patriarchy at all, but simply because of wimminz desire for sexual freedom. Patriarchy is merely an archaic obstacle that stands in the way.

> "Sex is the core issue. It always will be as long as the sexual revolution governs the broad society's sexual mores. It's also the main reason (leaving aside the people who are sexually abused or what have you) for why people leave the faith, generally, not just divorcing people — people don't want Christianity's rules about sex, and they don't want to feel guilty about sex, either, so they leave and flit around from X to Y non-Christian pseudo-religion like Pop Buddhism or something similar where they can feel "spiritual" but not have any moral rules about sex. This is the entire reason people are "spiritual but not religious" — not because they are die-hard atheists (those people tend not to be spiritual, they see it all as "woo", as a site like RationalWiki makes clear), but because they don't want any moral rules about sex because they don't want to follow any of those rules, and also don't want to feel guilty about breaking them.
>
> It's. All. About. Sex.
>
> It truly is. The rest is a smokescreen in the case of most people."

OkraHead summed it up by saying,

> "…for a large portion (majority?) of American womynz, mud huts and the freedom to slut around are preferable to patriarchy and the white picket fence."

Thus, the sex epidemic ensues.

Conclusions

All things considered, the LMC/- are hard pressed to make Headship/Patriarchy work, because the alternatives are either to ascend to UMC/+ status or else divorce. Therefore, couples in the LMC/- have the following sets of choices.

1. Economic Ascendancy — Climb up the socio-economic ladder (which is difficult).
2. Divorce — Abandon the marriage (also difficult, but not as much as (1)).
3. Submit — Accept Patriarchal Headship and enjoy the barbecue.

Ultimately, womyn hold the decision making power in this matter. ("A chain is only as strong as its weakest link.") Because women will not stick with a wishy-washy man over the long haul of marriage, and because options (1) and (2) are infinitely more appetizing to fearal womynz' preferences, then option (3) is only accepted by those particular women who either cannot avail of the first two options, or who truly love and respect their husbands. Since a divorce which benefits the woman is so easy to attain, this means that the majority of LMC/- marriages that remain intact are decidedly more patriarchal in nature.

So, to further answer the question contained in the title of NovaSeeker's post, Is Patriarchy for Deplorables?, we see that LMC/- marriages are not LMC/- because they are patriarchal, nor are they patriarchal because they are LMC/-, but simply because only the patriarchal marriages survive!

Related

- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Train Wreck – Speculative causes, influences, and alternate outcomes (2021 February 1)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021 February 26)

Dolearchy Trumps Patriarchy

Jack · 4 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The easiest way to sell divorce is to make it advantageous to wimmynz "financial independence".

Readership: All
Length: 2,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes
Reader's Note: In this essay, a few terms are introduced for the sake of brevity.

- Dolearchy (dole + archy) is here defined as government sponsored aid programs and certain legislative policies having ultimate control over society (or a segment of society).
- Free Income refers to income from alimony, child support, federal and state benefits and programs, imputed income, and the like. "Free" means it is available to her whether she gets out of bed in the morning or not.
- Financial Independence is not used in the sense of becoming independently wealthy, but in the sense that the woman is able to manage her own finances (supported by "free income") outside of a man's authority.
- Upper-middle (and higher) class marriages are referred to as UMC/+ marriages, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages are referred to as LMC/- marriages.

Introduction

NovaSeeker's post, Is Patriarchy for Deplorables? (2021 May 31), brought up the question of why upper-middle (and higher) class marriages (UMC/+) are more egalitarian and more feminized yet less prone to divorce, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages (LMC/-) tend to be more patriarchal, yet more prone to divorce. Several reasons were given in a follow up post, Patriarchy is the Default Setting (2021 June 2).

However, NovaSeeker doubted whether certain facts and statistics surrounding single parent households are indeed trustworthy. As he wrote,

> "In fact, the data are even worse than this, when one takes into account family formation. In that data, the percentage of kids raised in intact families by "class" is compared. However, that data looks at "couples" only — in lower SES segments, single parenthood is much more common. Because of this, the data concerning how people who aren't in the couples category are doing, with respect to breadwinning in the lower levels, dramatically overstates the difference, I think, because it omits the data that relates to the children that are raised outside stable couples in those classes — situations where there isn't any "intact patriarchal model" at all, because there isn't an intact family of any kind.
>
> This does, indeed, break down by the mother's education levels, married and unmarried, as seen in this article from EconoFact: Widening Socioeconomic Differences in Childrens Family Structure. And, the data also "leaves out" the highly educated high-income people who are not coupled, or do not have children, too. So it skews on that side, too, although the overall tendency is for uncoupled UMC and higher people, who are not divorced, not to have children regardless of their sex."

This post will take a closer look at some more data to find the truth of the matter. Namely, the following questions will be addressed.

- What is the percentage of single and married parent homes?
- What is the percentage of single and married parent homes by socio-economic class?
- What is the percentage of single parent homes headed by men vs. by women?
- How do government sponsored aid programs affect the institution of marriage?
- What is the impact on men?
- Is patriarchy truly for deplorables, or is this merely a misinterpretation of badly skewed statistics?

The Decline of Married Parent Homes

The article cited by NovaSeeker above offers the following data on family structure. The article says,

> "Only 63 percent of children in the U.S. today live with married parents (defined as either biological, adopted, or step parents), down from 73 percent in 1990 and 77 in 1980. The next most common type of family structure for children to be living in is with a lone mother: 21 percent of children live with a mother with no likely partner present, up 3 percentage points since 1990. Another 7 percent of children live with an unmarried parent and partner, up 4 percentage points since 1990. Five percent of children live with a lone father, up two percentage points since 1990. Four percent of children now live in households with no parent present. That number has been roughly stable since 1990."

As can be seen in the following bar chart (Fig. 1), single mother homes make up the grand majority of single parent homes. This is because (1) having children out of wedlock is slowly becoming more fashionable, and (2) divorcing women are routinely awarded custody for various reasons, namely the Tender Years Doctrine coupled with legislation that favors women.

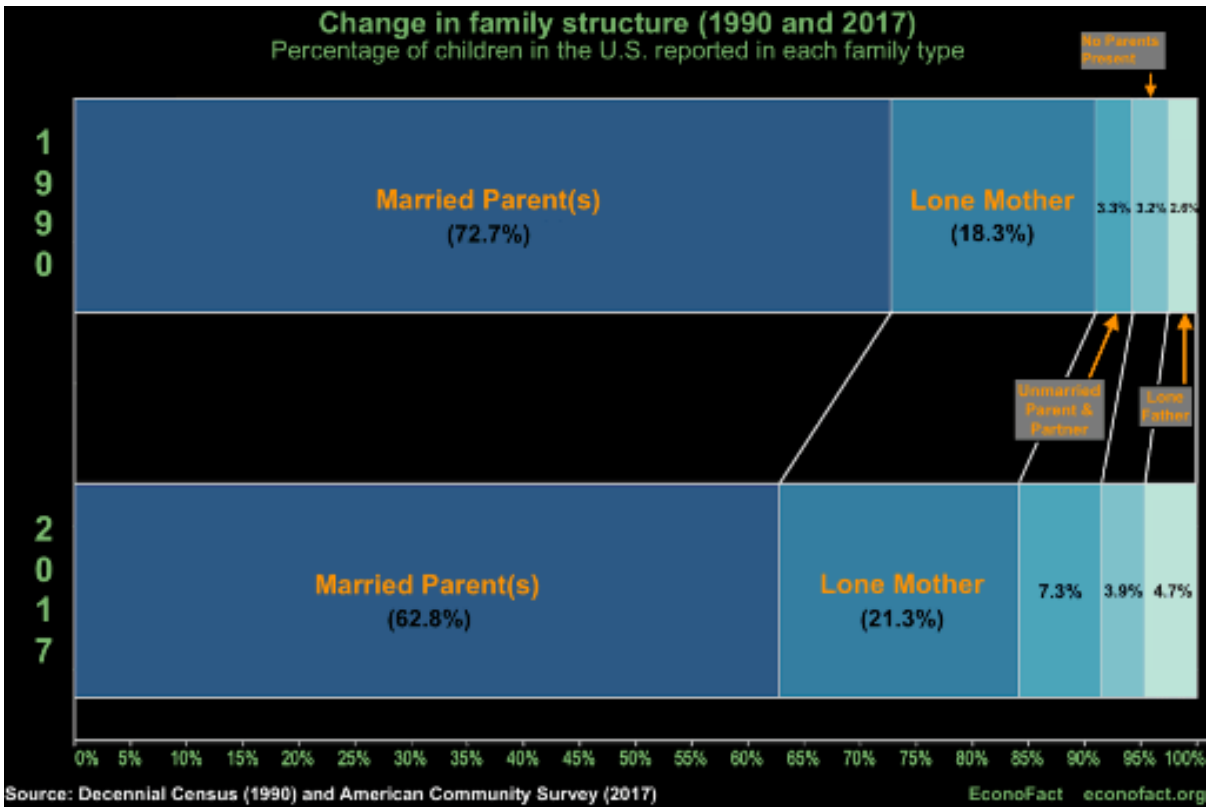

Figure 1.

The article also states a deplorable fact…

> "There are large gaps in the share of children living with married parents across racial and ethnic groups, even within education groups. Non-Hispanic White and Asian children are significantly more likely to live with married parents, as compared to Hispanic and black children."

Racial inequalities are simply unacceptable to monochromatic social engineering! Since any talk about racial differences is taboo, I'll just say that an intact marriage smells more like Patriarchy with each passing year! It's truly deplorable!

But in spite of all the inequalities, we cannot overlook the plight of single mothers — many of whom willingly chose their fate.

> "Gaps in children's outcomes between those with married and unmarried mothers – what we might call a "marriage premium for children" – depend on the resources the mother has herself, the resources her partner would bring to the family, and the ways in which children's outcomes are affected by parental resources."

The problem is that the "marriage premium for children" doesn't register on the LMC/- female radar.* So the article cites several scientific studies that show children who grow up in an intact family fare better in life (as if that were ever in doubt), and then concludes that…

> "These trends and gaps matter because research has shown that on average, children from married-parent homes benefit from the extra resources that a married-parent home offers relative to other types of household arrangements. Conditional on other family and parental characteristics, children who grow up with an unmarried mother have lower levels of educational attainment and higher levels of teen childbearing…"

Of course, our gubmint overlords believe the best and easiest way to "fix" this inequality (shriek!) is to put single mothers on the dole!

 H/T: Kentucky Headhunter*

Wimmyn Follow the Money...

In addition to the data on married parent homes, let's take a closer look at single parent homes.

Quite by coincidence (or the hand of God, if you prefer), I came across an old post from Artisanal Toad's Hall entitled, Following the Money… (2013 August 17), which addresses this topic. (I know some readers will be shaking their heads at the mention of ATH, but this post is about finance, not polygamy.) Below, I've reposted this essay in its entirety (separated by star bars). I've taken the liberty to update the numerical figures cited to the current 2021 values, and I've edited the text for clarity and ease of reading.

* * * * * * *

According to the 2012 data, there are about 12,279,000 single parent households in the United States. The vast majority of them are headed by women, as can be seen in the chart below:

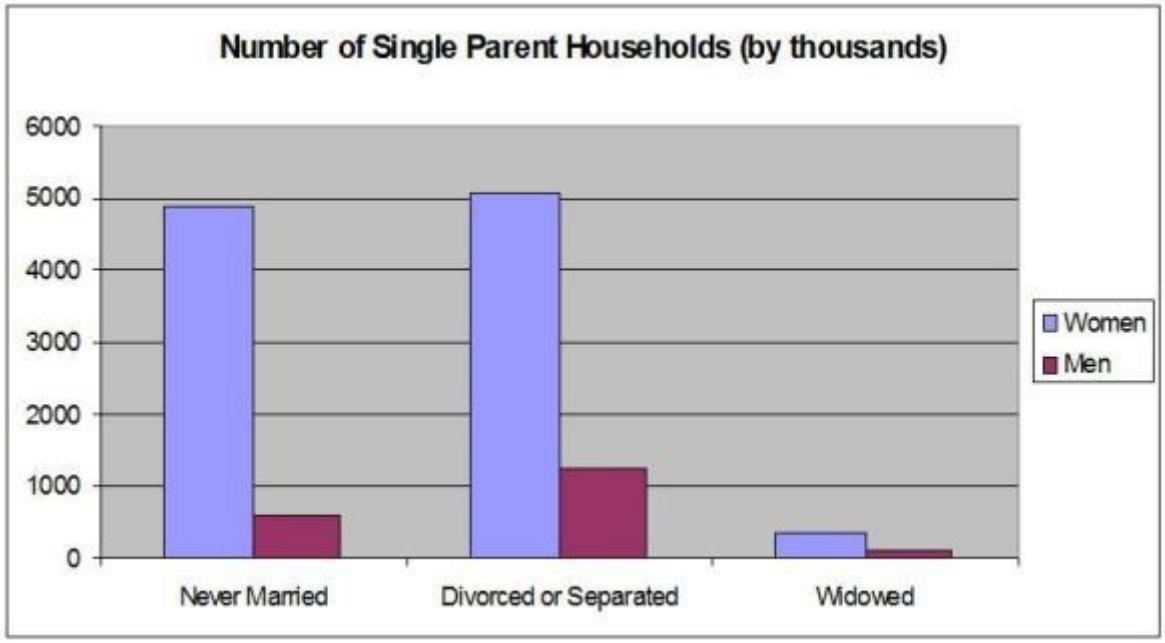

Figure 2.

What we immediately notice is that single-family households are dominated by households headed by women, with an almost even split between the never-married and the divorced or separated. Looking at the income of single family households (Fig. 3), we see that almost half of all single-parent households headed by women (45.6%) have a household income less than $25,000 a year (<$2,083 per month).

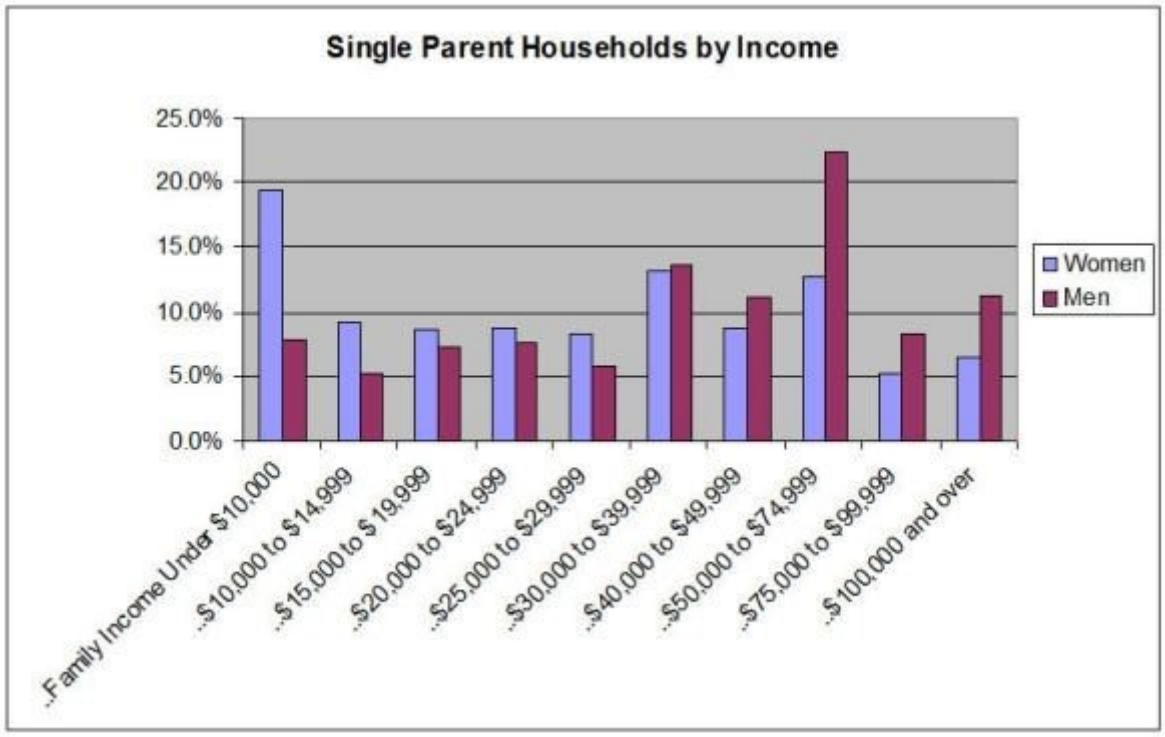

Figure 3.

Included in the census definition of income is child support, alimony, federal and state benefits, and other income. This distinction is important to properly understand Fig. 3, because "income" as described by the Census Bureau goes beyond even the IRS definitions of taxable income, to include literally all monies received. The only thing missing (and a major omission in most accounts) is imputed income, such as in cases in which the ex-wife lives in the home purchased by her ex-husband and he is required to continue paying the mortgage. Another example is the state-run health-care programs for children that operate on an ad hoc basis, essentially for free. There is no accounting for these benefits, which would cost a significant amount if purchased on the open market.

As an illustration*, let's consider the situation of a divorced mother with two children. The average monthly child support payment is $430 per child. If we assume she is receiving child support payments, then she would be receiving around $960/month in child support. The average SNAP benefit is around $127 per month per person. The SNAP benefits for three people (two children and herself) amounts to $381/month. If we only count these two sources of income ($11,520/year in child support and $12,000/year from SNAP), that is a total of $23,520/year! In other words, a significant number of single mother households (~40%) are supported entirely by the father of their children and the state. In this case, the state is using its police powers to expropriate money from the biological father.

The next chart (Fig. 4) shows a comparison of single parent households by adjusted income, which does not include "free income". As you can see, once the "free income" is removed, around 28% of single parent homes headed by women have an income below $10,000/year. Over half of these single mother families (~52%) have earnings of less than $25,000/year! In contrast, 41.7% of all single-parent households headed by men have an income of greater than $50,000/year.

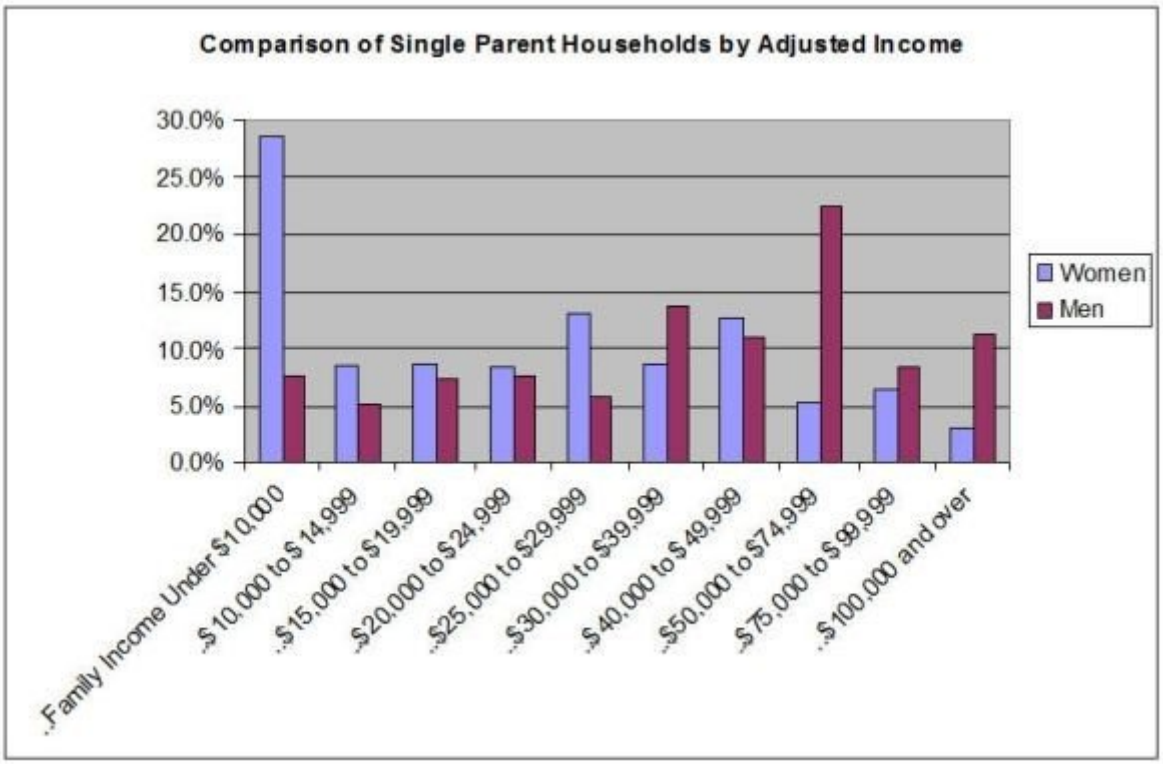

Figure 4.

As can be seen by the chart above (Fig. 4), single, divorced, and separated mothers are effectively married to the state!

 This illustration only considers child support and SNAP benefits, but there are many other programs as well, including medical insurance for the children (such as the Well Kids program) that account for an "on demand" benefit that would otherwise cost a significant amount of money each month.*
 Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP)*

The Impact on Men

The next chart (Fig. 5) considers men fifteen years of age and older, and compares the earnings of married men to men who are either never married, separated, divorced, or widowed. Note that the percentages listed in this chart are all men. Here, we see that married men have a strong tendency to earn more than their never-married or no-longer married counterparts. And yet, the "not married" men in the chart below, who earn significantly less than married men, are the same men typically paying out child support and alimony! As the saying goes, "When it rains, it pours!"

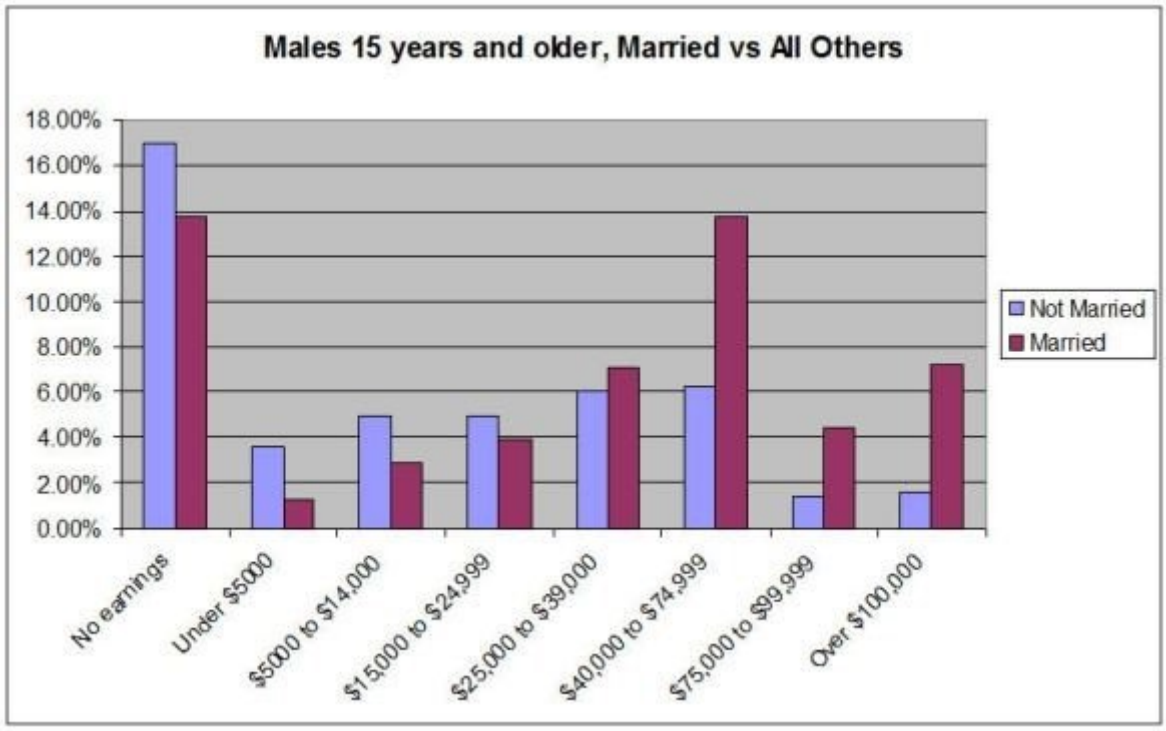

Figure 5.

From age fifteen and up, many men will spend some ten years pursuing an education (effectively investing in themselves) without earning any income. Thus, just below 14% of all men who have no earnings are married, a percentage only surpassed by the cohort of married men earning $40,000 to $75,000 per year. Given the economy and long-term unemployment of many men, it is believed chronic unemployment and a shift to grey-market employment accounts for the significant percentage of married men with no official earnings.

Once past $25,000 per year, married men consistently out-earn not-married men in every category, especially the $40k-$75k quintile, and the relative differences get bigger as the income rises. One inference that might be drawn from this observation is that the not-married men do not have as much incentive to earn more money as their married peers do, given that increases in earnings will result in increased child support and alimony payments.

By comparing Figs. 3, 4, and 5, it can be seen that the “free income” allowance for single parent households headed by men is insignificant, because on the low end of the scale, men receive no statistically significant child support from women, and tend not to apply for or receive welfare benefits.

In addition, there is very much a double standard for men and women in family court as witnessed by the fact that women receive primary custody of the children 80% of the time. Anecdotal evidence indicates only men who are able to hire competent counsel and afford investigative services to prove the woman is less fit than they are to receive custody are actually able to gain custody, such is the power of the bias against men. So perhaps the most reasonable way to view these charts is that only men with enough money to afford good counsel and investigative services are able to gain custody of their children in the current legal environment.

If one accepts that the destruction of marriage creates a disincentive for men to be productive, this is proof that feminism is destroying the US economy.

* * * * * * *

I’ll add another observation to Toad’s analysis.

As to why married men out-earn not-married/divorced men on average, I want to point out that it is not only because marriage apparently incentivizes men to work and to earn. Another reason is because women are more likely to divorce those men who earn less. This is revealed in Figs. 6 and 7.

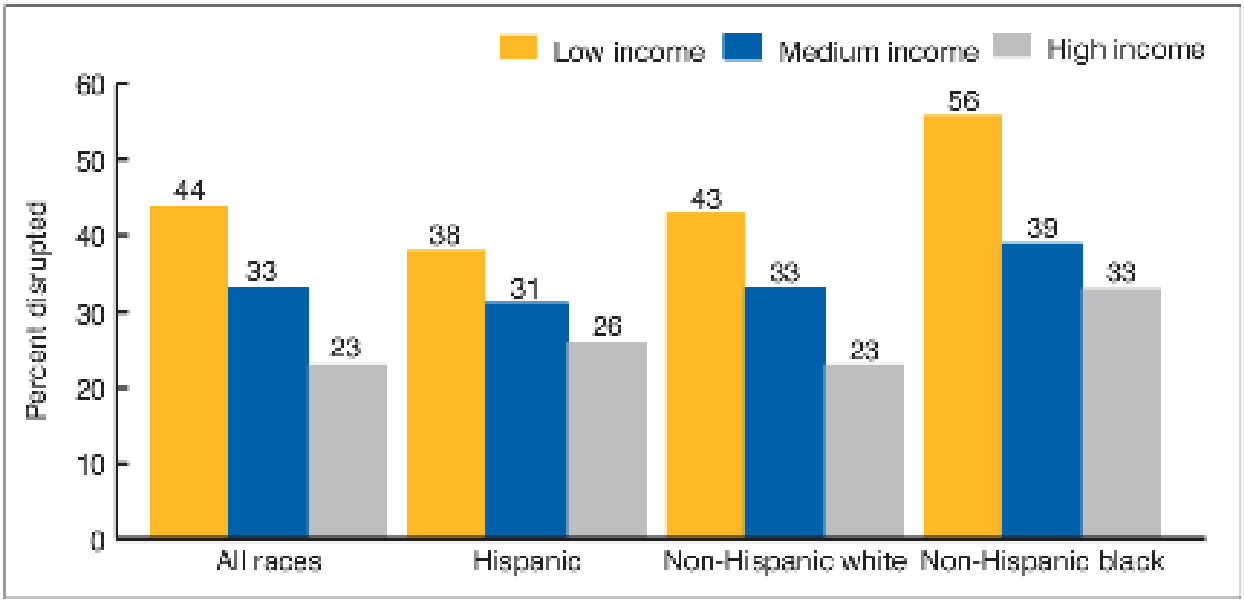

Figure 27. Probability that the first marriage breaks up within 10 years by race/ethnicity and median family income in the community: United States, 1995

Figure 6.

Yes, the destruction of marriage creates a disincentive for men to be productive. To be more specific, men lose heart and become hopeless because of (1) the forced redistribution of his income, (2) the insurmountable challenge to his socio-economic self-determination, (3) the utter loss of his Patriarchal authority, (4) the erosion of marital stability, (5) the dishonor men are subjected to by the government (and media), and (6) the disrespect and disloyalty of women who choose “financial independence” over husband, marriage, and family.

The Gynogubmint Money Funnel Undermines Marriage (and Patriarchy)

As Dalrock, Toad, and NovaSeeker suggest, independence, finances, and having a comfortable lifestyle appear to be the preeminent priorities of women of all classes (except in cases where a functioning Headship prevails).

The relative ease of women obtaining “free income” from child support, alimony, and other state funded benefits creates an incentive for women to divorce not only lower earning men, but men from all strata (since child support and alimony is calculated from the man’s earnings).

If a woman can maintain the same income after a divorce (or more, judging by Fig. 4), then getting a divorce cuts out the “middle man” (i.e. her husband), and allows her to pursue “financial independence” – not in the sense of becoming independently wealthy, but in the sense that the woman is able to manage her own finances (supported by “free money”) outside of a man’s authority.

Therefore, if natural affection (i.e. tingles) is absent, and the convenient, comfortable trappings of a moderately wealthy lifestyle are not present in a marriage, then she’ll soon be serving him divorce papers, especially when the state is offering generous assistance programs. In short, there is no incentive for a secular woman to stay in a marriage – unless she actually loves the man and can accept a Headship structure. To those well read in the Manosphere, this comes as no surprise, but Fig. 7 makes this fact abundantly clear.

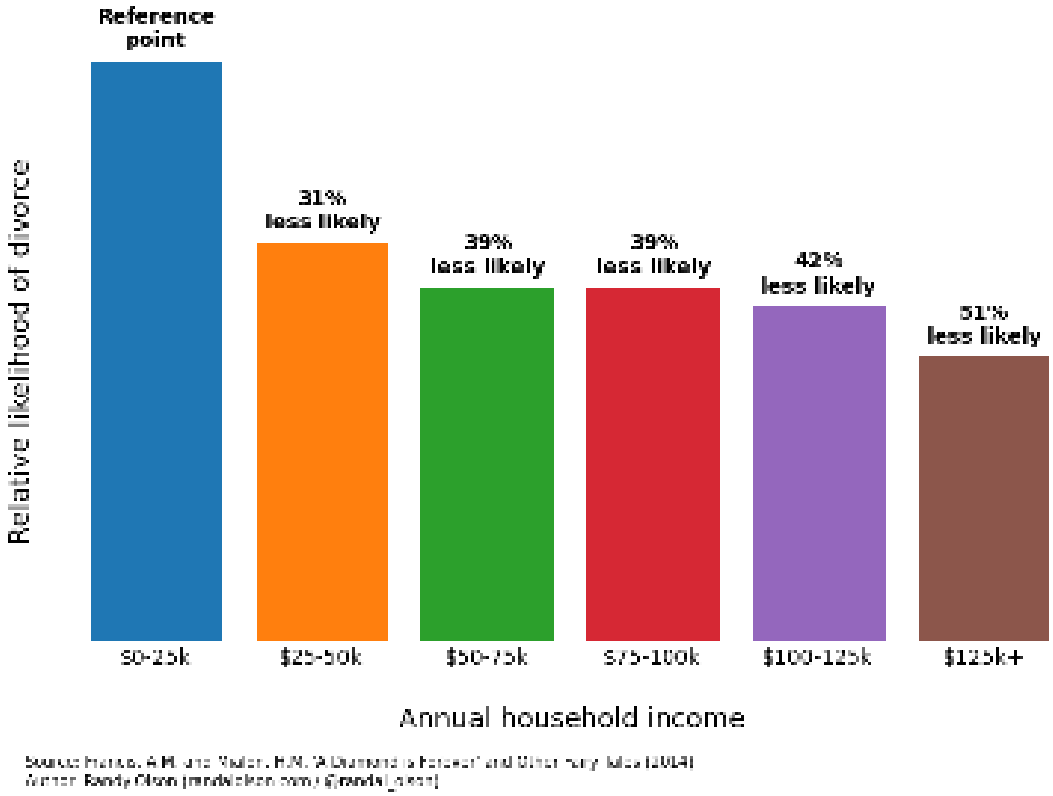

Figure 7.
As the saying goes, “No money, no honey!” But Uncle Sam’s got money! So there she goes!

Mind you, this is all backed by state and federal legislation and various state sponsored social programs!

Conclusions

In summary, there seems to be a concerted effort by the state to “sell” divorce to a wide swath of women who happen to find themselves in unhaaapy marriages as a consequence of any number of factors. This phenomenon was well covered by Dalrock. (See the posts listed below.) In light of the above information, we see that divorce is not being “sold” per se, but rather, it’s being doled out through “free income”!

All this easily explains why there are so many single-parent households hosted by women, and especially in the LMC/-.

Finally, in regard to NovaSeeker’s question, Is Patriarchy for Deplorables?, we come to the same conclusion that was reached in the previous post: LMC/- marriages are not LMC/- because they are patriarchal, nor are they patriarchal because they are LMC/-, but simply because only the patriarchal marriages survive!

Related

- Dalrock: Intermediate guide to selling divorce; overcoming women's better judgment. (2011 March 7)
- Dalrock: Are the vast majority of women truly incapable of experiencing reciprocal love and attraction? (2011 June 8)
- Dalrock: A long term commitment to selling divorce. (2017 June 2)
- Dalrock: Status is a powerful motivator. (2019 September 23)

How to Change a Hostile Culture

Novaseeker · 7 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Any way you look at it, the elite hold power. That's what it means to be elite!

Readership: All; Christians;
Author's Note: This post was coauthored by NovaSeeker and Jack.
Length: 4,100 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes

Introduction

Under last month's post, Descriptors of Beauty and Attractiveness (2021 April 23), there was a discussion about the factors that cause changes in the cultural order of a society, with the view of identifying them and understanding how they are driven. This is a topic that frequently comes up in discussions around the 'sphere, so it deserves a formal treatment.

In this post, we'll go over several aspects of the cultural order and emergent "way of life", and, in particular, explain why elites must be influenced or somehow dealt with, in order to affect a societal change in this cultural order.

Hard Times?

Red Pill Apostle rightly posited that hard times are the cure to an ailing society, but that even this has its limits.

> "If biblical history teaches us anything about human nature and idolatry, it is that hard times are the cure. In the case of feminism, I believe it will change when times are such that it is no longer a profitable grift for the elite. It will fade as a political movement for a time and then resurface with a new shiny package as something else. If you think of feminism for what it is, women being sold that God's hierarchy of authority is oppressive and women fighting against it, this has been going on since Eve was convinced God was using His authority to keep her down and ate the fruit. Rinse, repeat. In 200 years it will have a new name, but the underlying sin will > not be changed."

This could very well be true, in the sense that broader economic changes will lead to a different material calculus, both for the elite class which generally sets the cultural agenda, as well as for the rank-and-file trying to live their lives in the present tense.

The underlying problem is that humans generally don't reset their material expectations downward and their lives inward unless they are "hard" forced to do so. Individuals, of course, can and do make this kind of change in their lives, but generally humans do not, and it is the "generally" which is critical in any discussion of social and cultural order. In the sphere of mating, as long as society remains "comfortable" enough materially, people will continue the slide into "new ways of doing family" and the like, rather than generally reset their expectations in an effort to restore traditional families. They will generally only change once it gets so materially painful that they must, and that will be a terrible time for everyone. To state it differently, women will not revert to traditional marriage en masse in the West unless they are essentially economically forced to do so, and any scenario that would entail this kind of economic pressure will be exceptionally painful for everyone, not just women. This may, in fact, eventually happen, but the timing, scope, and nature of these "hard times" resulting from such an economic collapse remain speculative, and therefore relying on them as an agent of change is a relatively weak position to be in.

Memetic Sovereignty?

Wulfgar Thundercock III argued that memetic sovereignty is the crowbar of cultural change.

> "All successful religions are elite religions. Christianity provided obedient, virgin wives for the Roman elite. Then the Christian Romans were able to cooperate better than the pagan Romans, so the pagan Romans lost. Then Constantine came in and replaced the official state religion with Christianity and it was all over by then.
>
> First we need memetic sovereignty. Then back it up with the ability to defend ourselves. Then we wait for the left to burn itself out and offer the Caesar/Cromwell/Stalin a religion to replace leftism. That's how Christianity survives."

Wulfgar explained,

> "What I mean by memetic sovereignty is that those in the Christian culture need to establish their own worldview/epistemic framework and enforce it among the culture. It's the same thing as maintaining frame, but on a societal level."
>
> […]
>
> "Memetic sovereignty means always arguing from your principles, not theirs. You aren't a racist, they're a traitor. You're not a rapist, her father is an irresponsible fool. You aren't a bigot, they're a bunch of evil degenerates. I could go on. Never allow them to set the terms of the argument. That is memetic sovereignty.
>
> The reason Christianity needs that is because the Unitarians, the Puritans, are the modern standard of the Church. There are untold number of "Christian" churches directly opposing the plain reading of the Bible every day. That is because they allowed the Satanists to take the cultural high ground. Without enforcing our own culture and our own memes, Christianity will die on the vine. It will remain a memory until a barbarian with some vision finds a Bible and a preacher, and begins the Re-conquest in the name of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ of Nazareth; He who always was and will always be; the Logos; the Truth, the Way, and the Life; He who was born of Man and of God; He who died for our sins and returned to life. That is memetic sovereignty."

While it is certainly the case that in the battle of ideas, Christianity must hold its ground against the aggressively anti-Christian framework offered by the emergent culture, this cannot be readily done by "everyman" Christian.

In the time of the ante-Nicene Roman Empire, it was highly educated elite converts to the faith who were making these arguments, and holding this line against pagan (and Jewish) interlocutors and polemicists, precisely because they were the ones who were cognitively in a position to do so — they were able to use the same types of arguments, the same language, the same kind of discourse, because they were schooled in it themselves, and understood its arguments, its mode of discourse, from the inside out, so to speak. They were therefore in a position to engage with their opponents, and more than hold their ground, due to having a firm grasp of both sides of the discussion, and therefore being able to dominate both frames, and thereby reframe the discussion in a Christian vein. This was important not principally from the perspective of "winning the argument" with the interlocutors — it was important from the perspective of providing intellectual respectability for Christianity in terms that the cognitive elite had to respect, even if they disagreed. This respectability made conversion to Christianity more plausible, and more attractive, for more members of the Roman elite class.

This effort gradually won a lot of converts among educated elite Romans, which played a significant role in the elite Roman class being increasingly flipped to Christianity over time. And this was, itself, a massive turnaround for the new faith, because the initial Christian apologists were held in ill-regard by educated Roman pagans, precisely due to the fact that they could not articulate Christianity in a way that was convincing to many educated Romans, steeped as they were in Greek and Roman thought. That changed over time as Christianity made inroads among the educated class, and those educated converts to Christianity and their educated offspring were able to mount formidable arguments which were more convincing to the pagan Romans, and which eventually won the day, converting much of the elite class before Constantine's famed edict of toleration.

In our context, this will require a similar engagement of Christian minds with the contemporary discourse in a way that is “interior” to it, yet faithfully Christian. This has basically not happened yet — Christianity has massively failed in this regard. For the most part, Christians are either (A) not engaging with the contemporary discourse at all on its own terms, or (B) are engaging it, but doing so either (1) from a perspective that stands “outside” it, and therefore appears outmoded, or (2) at the expense of Christian orthodoxy (that is, being co-opted by the contemporary discourse, rather than formulating Christianity in terms that are intelligible to, and native to, the contemporary discourse). The colossal scope of this failure for Christianity in our era simply cannot be overstated.

In order for true memetic superiority to be feasible, Christianity needs voices which are both orthodox and contemporary — in intellectual terms, that is, in ways that can influence the minds that shape the culture in a way that the more educated and sophisticated Christian apologists in the later ante-Nicene era were doing with Roman elites. This was difficult to do then, and it will be difficult to do again. But it will be impossible to do as long as Christians continue to radically undervalue education, philosophy, contemporary thought, and engaging contemporary thought on its own terms, and prefer instead to separate themselves into a sealed, self-referential ghetto of presumed purity of thought.

Separation?

Elspeth has articulated the common argument that Christians should separate themselves from any elite influence and all the trappings of materialism. She also described some specific challenges and how hard they are to implement.

> “I would argue that “Christianity” as it evolved once embraced by the elites of the Roman Empire, was destined to bring us to exactly where are today.
>
> One of my soapboxes, which my RL friends are very familiar with at this point, is that True, Sincere, small ‘o’ orthodox Christians must find a way to sever our connections to and obsession with, dominant culture markers of success.
>
> Christ made it clear that the Kingdom road is a narrow one. We will not find life on the broad path. What does that look like?

> For one thing, re-examining our belief in university as a ticket to the good life, and being willing to sacrifice much of "the good life" for the sake of preserving the faith in our families.
>
> Less consumerism. More strategic entrepreneurship. Real education over schooling. Booker T. Washington's approach to education was equal parts old school and futuristic.
>
> Networking in real life with like-minded families along with way less entertainment can do a lot to calibrate the tastes of our own kids and produce realistic and measured expectations of a joyful life.
>
> But that's work. We only do about half that stuff and people -fellow Christians! – think WE'RE extreme.
>
> That only leaves collapse as the force that swings the pendulum."

Although Elspeth's suggestions are certainly very important for individual Christians in pursuit of Christian living, there is a major difficulty with this approach being applied to the wider society. It would require an entire Christian community to be formed outside the current culture, which is highly unlikely to happen, and it is hardly a Biblical approach. (See John 17:9-19 where Jesus says we are in, but not of the world.)

This is a surprisingly difficult issue for Christians to face. It is true that the narrow path is the one that leads any specific individual to salvation, but it is at the same time true that Christianity has always tried, when it was able, to arrange the social and cultural context in ways that would make it easier for individuals to walk that narrow path than otherwise. Surely no society will ever be perfectly Christian as long as it remains fully human, but Christianity itself has always taken a keen interest in shaping these social and cultural arrangements, to the extent it was able to do so, precisely to make it easier for people to be Christian in their own lives.

What brought Christianity to its current situation of massive decline in its ability to shape the culture was not the conversion of Constantine or the Roman elite class, both of which led to Christendom itself, without which Christianity in general would not exist in any recognizable form. What brought Christianity to its current impasse was the overwhelming emphasis on individualism over collective authority, precisely in matters pertaining to religion, spirituality and conscience, which came about as a result of the Protestant Reformation. The current scenario in the West, in both Catholic and Protestant countries (both of which were dramatically impacted by the ideas of the Protestant movement), is simply the working out of this logic of spiritual individualism.

The advent of spiritual individualism gave birth to the creation of the “secular” itself, as a kind of “neutral space” within which Christians of “different conscience” could interact with each other without bloodshed. This led almost immediately to the profound secularization of thought, as philosophy and “science” were now conducted in this “neutral”, secular space, and thereby gradually divorced from religious ideas. This, in turn, led to the Enlightenment, which simply followed the logic of Protestant spiritual individualism and the newly-created secular mind-space to its logical conclusion — individual reasoned discretion was itself the ultimate authority over all matters that were not specifically religious, theological or ecclesial, and not in a way that was intrinsically tethered to any kind of religious idea. As the scope of this secular science grew, the scope of the matters which were reserved for religion accordingly shrank, and all of this under the auspices of an entire system of thought which was, itself, based on the primacy of the individual and the individual’s discretionary conscience. This process has continued according to its own “interior” logic such that the “secular” has continued to grow mind-space at the expense of the “sacred” until it essentially flipped the cognitive elite class more or less entirely away from any religious thought whatsoever at some stage in the 20th Century, eventually leading to the current debacle. All of this timeline progression can be traced to one pivotal moment: the individualist approach to religion which was championed by Protestantism, over and against forms of authority which were exterior to the individual conscience.

Of course, the Protestant Reformation didn’t happen in a vacuum — it was protesting against something, and that something was its proximate cause. In Novaseeker’s opinion, the actual longer-term cause of the problem can be traced to the separation of the Catholic West from the Orthodox East, which gradually led the Western Church to drift in ways that emphasized greater authoritarianism, separated popular piety from scholastic theology, and emphasized a kind of Christianity that was less patristic than it was scholastic and medieval in character — all of which led more or less directly to the Protestant reaction to that, which gave birth to spiritual individualism and kicked off the vicious cycle of events described above in the West. In other words, it was precisely what was happening with the elite class in the West, and whether it was being properly framed in Christianity (or not) that led to the entire stream of sad events, culminating in the current mess.

The current problem, therefore, can’t be tackled by doubling or tripling down on spiritual individualism. The entire project needs to be scrapped due to an objective evaluation of its overwhelmingly poor fruit. Rather, apostolic Christianity needs to be articulated again in a manner that is framed in terms of the current discourse, and which converts some of the cognitively elite minds that can then, in turn, articulate the apostolic faith convincingly in the current age, from the “inside out”. Focusing on individualism will only continue to oversee the decline of the faith in broader terms, because the logic of individualism leads directly out of Christianity.

Breeding?

Another idea is that conservative Christian natalists (i.e., those who have large families) will out-breed the issue, simply because non-Christians are not expected to reproduce in large numbers due to generally postponed marriage, widespread birth control and abortion, advanced feminism, homo/transsexuality, and the religious folks who are turning more and more insular as clown world becomes ubiquitous. But this too is rather unlikely as a strategy for widespread social change.

The main reason is that we are vastly outnumbered, so the proponents of the current culture are still having more kinds in total numbers. They also frequently make converts of our children, and, for reasons of the cognitive shortcomings of Christians noted above, we do not.

There is much more flow from the ranks of conservative Christian family kids to the culture than there is from the culture to conservative Christianity. Many of the natalist's children will apostatize either wholly or partially, as we have largely already seen. Right now there is mass apostasy taking place in the ranks of the younger generations of people who were raised as traditional Christians but who have either left the faith or insist on changing it to a heterodox, apostate version of itself because they disagree with the faith about sex. And the culture is happy to flip conservative Christian kids, because then they flip other ones, and it mushrooms and cascades across that part of the culture as well.

SFC Ton summarized it like this.

> "Christians do it to themselves because they feed their kids into the cultural war meat grinder called college. Willy nilly and without training.
>
> Mostly because they value college above the Almighty and His ways
>
> It's a war. Church dudes don't have the balls to sacrifice and fight back effectively."

We can't solve cultural issues by outbreeding them from below — we have to control the elites, either by infiltrating them, or by beheading and replacing them — because elites drive the culture, they control the means by which cultural transmission happens.

Education?

One suggestion as to how to go about affecting cultural change was geared towards education – NOT college education geared towards the Feminist Life Script nor the Career Life Script, but rather something more akin to homeschooling, finishing school, religious catechism, or the like. The subjects to be taught would likely include the basics of the faith, Christian virtues, the value and purpose of chastity, how to raise and discipline children properly, and family values in general.

This is the diametric opposite of what is being taught in colleges, universities, and yes, even churches today. No, it's not even the opposite, per se — It's a completely different paradigm that totally excludes the Christian Life Script!

The most urgent topic that needs to be covered is why young women should get married young instead of pursuing an alternate life script, and why men who have the chance to marry should decide quickly and settle down. If a convincing case could be made for these options, then this would at least give young people a choice in the matter. It has also been suggested that upper-mid-quality men should looksmaxx, up their game, and so on, as this might give them that extra edge and push them into the realm of being noticed by women who are interested in a traditional Christian marriage.

However, this approach towards the traditional Headship model are more of an individual solution, not a societal one, because the SMP/MMP has already degraded, making the competition unwinnable for the vast majority. So the efficacy of education as a vector for change is reduced to discipline, and this too leaves us stumped because of three reasons.

1. Discipline requires training, hard work, sacrifice, and suffering, which most are not willing to do.
2. Discipline is currently an approach that is unpopular to the point of being heavily persecuted.
3. Discipline is one of the ADIEU traits that is concentrated in the upper class. (This serves to reinforce the overall message of this essay.)

There will always be a small number of people who are able to be proper Christians regardless of the "external circumstances" — i.e., whether those make it easier or harder, on the margin, to follow moral orthodoxy from a Christian perspective. The issue is what situations make it marginally easier or marginally harder to do so, because in situations in which it is marginally easier, more people will manage it, while in situations where it is marginally more difficult, fewer people will. This is why the church has never been truly indifferent about what the social rules (and the legal rules which are based on them) are — because they can make it easier or harder, on the margins, to be an actual Christian, which in turn has an impact on how many will manage to do so.

It's true that in a situation where it is easier rather than harder that there will be more "false" Christians as well — but there will also be more actual ones who are able to manage it because the temptations to not do so are less in that context, precisely because the social rules reflect moral orthodoxy.

The Elites Set the Bar

Last month, we covered the elite lifestyle, and how it is broadly accepted as the norm, even among those who are not elite. Noteworthy posts on this topic are listed here.

- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Sticking the Landing is for the Elite (2021 May 10)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): ADIEU HUSsies Sell a Broken Script (2021 May 12)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Aristocratic Hypergamy (2021 May 14)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model (2021 May 17)
- Σ Frame (Jack) YOLO = FOMO (2021 May 19)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Kardashian Fantasy (2021 May 24)

It is appropriate to focus on this issue, because herein lies the key.

You can never influence in a meaningful way what those social rules are unless you control the elites. That's because they are the ones who make those rules, and they are the ones who change them. So if you take the view that this is a problem rather than a help, what you are doing is creating a world in which it is harder for people to be Christian, which means that there will be fewer actual Christians. Yes, there will also be fewer false ones, but there will be fewer people who can manage to be Christian because it is much harder where there are more temptations and fewer guardrails in place. One may think this is a good thing because the false Christians are purged, but overall what happens in this view is that many who could otherwise be Christian, in a real and not a fake way, aren't, because the circumstances make it too difficult for them to become or to stay Christian.

It's for this reason that the critical path task for Christianity in the West currently is what it is doing about its interface with elite mind-space. And it is catastrophically failing in this — both as a result of not trying or, in cases where the effort is made, of focusing on critiquing the shortcomings of the currently dominant thinking of the cognitive elites, rather than re-articulating Christianity in a way that is interior to the entire thought-system of the current cognitive elite. This will involve some good amount of criticism, as we see in the ante-Nicene discourse as well, but it is criticism from "inside" the thought system and its premises, rather than a criticism from "outside" based on premises of a system of thought that is considered outdated.

Conclusions

Conservatives have been banging their heads against the wall for decades as to how to "win" the culture war without shifting/replacing the elites, but these various approaches don't work because the elites control the culture, and so whoever controls the elite culture wins the game.

In the past, Christianity "won" in terms of becoming the predominant culture in the West only once elites began to be converted to the faith. It was the abandonment of paganism by the elite class of the Empire that led to the rise of Christianity — Constantine was a part of that, to be sure, but only a part. The reason why Julian the Apostate failed to reinstate paganism is because the elites had flipped to Christianity for the most part by then — Christianity flipped them.

Today, Christianity is focused on trying to do an "end run" around the elites, because the elites have left Christianity largely for what people are calling "the successor ideology". It's similar to what happened to the pagans in the Constantinian empire, but this time it's happening to Christianity. It isn't quite the same, because the new faith will not outlaw the old one, as Christianity did with the pagans, but the old faith (ours) will be thoroughly marginalized if we continue to think that we can ignore what is happening in the elite cultural class. The only way to flip that back will be to flip the elites (again), just like Christianity did when it rose in the time of the Empire.

Related

- Σ Frame: Parenting is for the elite. 2020 March 16)
- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020 March 20)
- Σ Frame: Frenemy Class Warfare? (2020 August 31)
- Σ Frame: Hitting bottom must be necessary. (2020 November 6)
- Σ Frame: Sustainability Fears (2020 December 16)

Prime Directive Vision

Jack · 9 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Having a "prime directive" vision combined with a little bit of Patriarchy, a little bit of Proverbs 31, and a lot of Money is what keeps the ship afloat.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: In this essay, upper-middle (and higher) class marriages are referred to as UMC/+ Marriages, while lower middle (and lower) class marriages are referred to as LMC/- Marriages.
Length: 2,800 words
Reading Time: 9.5 minutes

Introduction

Last week's posts, Is Patriarchy for Deplorables? (2021 May 31), Patriarchy is the Default Context (2021 June 2), and Dolearchy Trumps Patriarchy (2021 June 4), argued that those LMC/- marriages having husbands and wives that stay together tend to have a higher percentage that are patriarchal. I do not mean to say that patriarchy is more prevalent in LMC/- overall or that it does not exist in the UMC/+.

This post will further explore class differences. It will be argued that it is Patriarchy, among other things, which hold marriages together. These other things include a "prime directive" (i.e. shared vision, shared values), social cohesion for the LMC/-, and for the UMC/+, a comfy cushion of cash. Taken together, this shared vision and lifestyle motivates women of all classes to "fit into the program". The alternative is a failed marriage, and a broken life.

Traits of the LMC/-

Women in the LMC/- tend to have a polychotomy of expectations in marriage. LC women tend to sleep around in their search for "love". (Translation: Being humbled/defiled by a Tingle inducing man.) When they do happen to find love and possibly marriage, they lack the skills necessary to make it work out. They consistently give in to the worst aspects of their feminine nature and destroy the relationship in the process.

A Christian might say that their relationships typically fail because of gross spiritual disobedience.

MC women indulge in fashionable trends in clothing and dating, and cling to a fairy tale dream of marrying up. When this doesn't happen in a timely manner, they settle for the kind of men they rejected during their prime years. Underneath this façade of fashion sensibility, MC women also want to be humbled/defiled by the tingles, but they amalgamate this expectation with a feminist sense of entitlement and various Progressive aphorisms which are not very true. Many MC women also assume that marrying up is a basic prerequisite for marriage. Thus, MC women want contrasting elements and are thoroughly confused about what they want in a relationship.

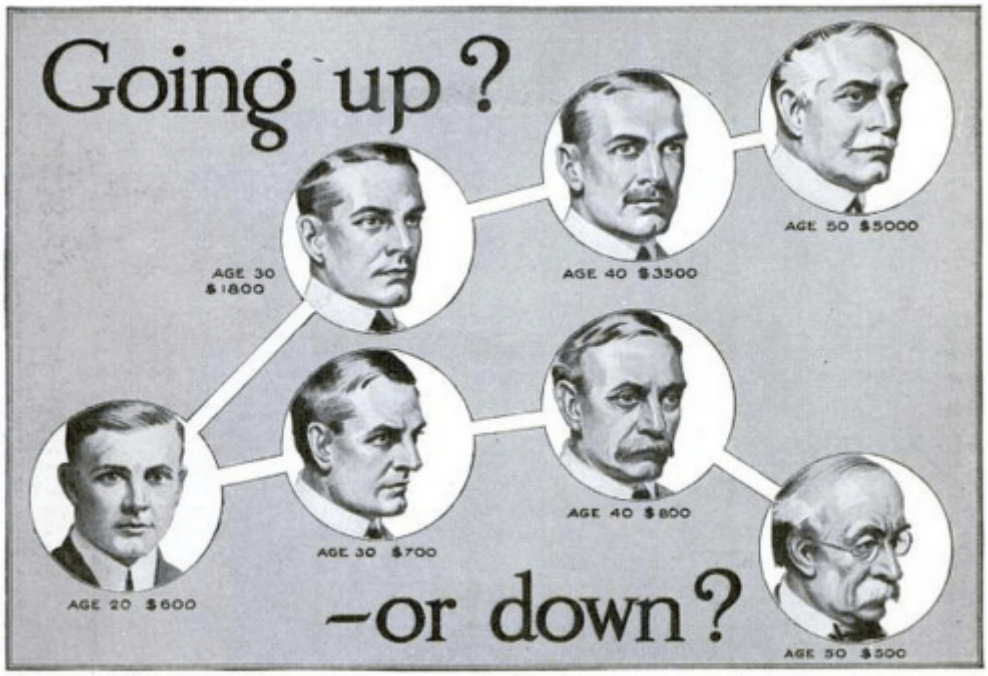
A Christian might say that their relationships typically fail because of gross spiritual confusion.

Traits of the UMC/+

Under the last post cited above, Ed Hurst and RedPillBoomer described specific traits of the UMC/+.

Ed Hurst wrote,

> "Those upper staff people are simply a different kind of people entirely. They could make their way through any lower class social situation with no trouble, but they remained a world apart. Their education is not the whole story; there's a mass of cultural exposure that is hard to explain. Their kids had a completely different orientation on life, a sense of purpose and future that made them tolerant of things for which the lower class kids would whine and rebel. The UMC kids in that setting could get along with the other kids, but they knew they weren't part of the common society."
>
> "These people had a vision of ruling the system, and their commitment to that is overwhelming."
>
> "…they never forgot their destiny…"
>
> "[They had the mindset that] someone in their ranks was not a part of [the broader] society…"



RedPillBoomer wrote,

> "Quiet, focused, and ENVIED/DESPISED by many who thought they had some advantage that others didn't have…"
>
> "…the parents PLURAL were committed to their values: achievement –> advancement –> progression –> not derailing a 'good thing,' i.e. not f'ing it up with divorce, drugs and alcohol, or anything that would significantly interfere with the family's 'prime directive.' These values showed up in their kids (achievement –> > advancement –> progression upwards).”

>
> “…you almost ALWAYS saw a mom AND a dad involved in those kids lives.”
>
> “[Some key elements of] Patriarchy… with a pinch of egalitarianism thrown in the mix… [For example, the mom] usually had some side gig going on while she shuttled those kids to all those activities they were involved in – maybe real estate or something, or going to school to get a degree (not gender studies or some ridiculous degree, something like an education degree) so she could produce future income once the kids were old enough to take care of themselves, by their late teens.”
>
> “…their advantage was their mom and dad did something similar and passed it down to their kids to include an inheritance when they died.”
>
> “[They] still “get it”, i.e. understand that [certain elements of Patriarchy] STILL works, that it STILL produces results: ‘old fashioned, out-dated, and… d@mn effective!’”

What Ed and RPB are describing are practical aspects of the ADIEU collection of traits (Attractiveness, Discipline, Intelligence, Education, Upbringing). These characteristic mindsets, habits, and traits not only explain why the UC are more successful in marriage and sticking the landing, but they also contain the underlying reason why the “elite”/UMC/+ are so influential over all of society.

And yet, the UMC/+ life script doesn’t work for anyone LMC/-. Deti and Novaseeker discussed this in ADIEU HUSsies Sell a Broken Script (2021 May 12). This is because those in the LMC/- are lacking those practical aspects of the ADIEU collection of traits. But this is not all they are lacking. They are also lacking a vision, a sense of purpose, and the financial buffer necessary to cover their @sses.

Are UMC/+ Wives Egalitarian?

There was an argument about whether UMC/+ wives are truly egalitarianists or not.

LastHoldOut countered that RedPillBoomer’s description of the mom with a side gig is more reminiscent of the Proverbs 31 woman, rather than an egalitarian wife.

Deti wrote that the UMC is more egalitarian because:

1. In today's society, women have been brought on par with men in every meaningful way: legally, politically, economically, socially, educationally, and professionally. Women are legally permitted to do everything men can do. So it's natural that more women in the UMC would expect to be treated as "equals".
2. Most men and women in the UMC got there the same way – education and employment. It's natural that a woman who, through her education and job, isn't any less qualified than her husband is to make decisions, will expect to be treated as an "equal" in her marriage.
3. Most men have been conditioned hard and deep to see women as equals. Most men in this set have UMC mothers who were "equal". They went to college with and work with women who were equals, a few of them being superior in intelligence or work ethic or upbringing.
4. The Marriage 2.0 model on which most UMC marriages are based, is premised on happiness and self-actualization. The woman's happiness and self-actualization are just as important as, but no more important than, his are. In theory. (In a patriarchal model, the foundation is roles, operation within roles, and headship/submission. In patriarchy, some things are more important than others at different times.)
5. These people don't know how to do it any other way. No one, absolutely no one, teaches, preaches, expects, demonstrates, or extols true headship or submission. What you have is a lot of Christian men LARPing at headship (servant leader, you must love and respect her and get her what she wants because that's what a true leader does) and Christian women LARPing at submission (you submit when he is doing what you want and expect him to do and you're pleased with him; you need not submit otherwise). But this is neither true headship nor true submission. This is because headship is burdensome and makes men unhappy; and because submission requires trust that these women don't have for their husbands, and that scares them, and that makes women unhappy.

Liar businessman closing a deal and crossing fingers back at office

And yet, Deti concedes that UMC/+ marriages cannot ultimately be egalitarianist.

> "We cannot have unhappiness in the Marriage 2.0 model. Unhappy marriages in this model are failed marriages.

> I have said this so many times: Everyone needs to remember that there is absolutely no such thing as an "egalitarian" marriage. In any relationship between 2 people, one is the dominant and the other is the submissive. Whoever occupies these roles can shift, but someone always acts as the dominant, and the other always submits. It can't operate any other way. It just can't. Someone has to make the final decision. Someone has to "break the tie". In most UMC Marriage 2.0 marriages, that person is usually the woman, because she manipulates, threatens, frauds and gaslights her way there. Most of the time, the woman sends this message:
>
> "I need to do this my way, or else I will be a b!tch to you, refuse to have sex with you, sh!ttalk you to our friends and my parents, sulk and pout, and otherwise make everyone in this house miserable. And it'll be that way until I get what I want."

Man, it's hard for me to imagine a stable UMC/+ marriage having a wife like this. I don't doubt that there are many like this, but on the face of it, this seems more like a LMC/- wife's behavior.

As dpmonahan said,

> "The idea that patriarchy exists among the lower classes is absurd. Lower-class and matriarchy are interchangeable terms."

The Prime Directive

NovaSeeker made a noteworthy point that the non-military upper middle does have certain characteristic elements of egalitarian, sans patriarchy, but that this is tempered by an unwavering dedication to the "prime directive".

> "The woman has a career that is high-powered like the man does, but they follow the same "prime directive" approach, and they instill this in their kids.
>
> That "prime directive" approach is, I think, a key factor. It's why, for example, they tend to be sanguine about late marriage, fornication in the 20s, experimentation in college and the like … because almost all of the kids (not all, some do go off the rail, but most don't) follow the "prime directive" of "achievement –> advancement > –> progression –> not derailing a 'good thing,'", as you say, and so they indulge, but only to the extent it doesn't mess up the prime directive. And so it's understood that there are limits — and all the kids who grew up that way understand this intuitively.

>
> I first saw this when I was in college, because I came from the LMC and was thrust into an environment with a lot of people who grew up UMC and UMC+. They had the "prime directive" approach. They joined sororities and partied and had a grand old fornicative, drunken time in college, but when it came time to bear down for papers and exams, bear down they did with gusto and got those grades. Got those MCATs and med school admissions, LSATs and law school admissions, those spots at McKinsey. Boys and girls alike. There was more hooking up than BF/GF relationships (and this was back in the 1980s, when that wasn't the norm in the broader culture yet) in the college set, because the "prime directive" mandated that they not be limited by a relationship in pursuing the path of "achievement>advancement>progression" in an unfettered way after graduation, following the "logic" of where the "prime directive" mandates they go, and not be "held back" by "feeling conflicted" about relationships.
>
> So far fewer relationships than were happening on other campuses with a different kind of student, and also the relationships that did happen were mostly ended within the last 3-6 months prior to graduation — a few survived, but they are notable for their exceptional nature. The prime directive was, for the most part, vindicated, and this wasn't questioned by most — the kids who grew up in this class knew that this was the way it had to be, and they accepted it (for the most part). They were raised with this logic, this directive — it was a part of them."

Case Study 1 – Dissimilar Visions

I know of more than one LMC/- girl who got into a relationship with an UMC/+ boy, expecting marriage. Her "prime directive" was to marry up. But to him, she was just a fling that went extremely well, good enough to stick it out with her for a good while longer than usual. But in the end, he never took her seriously, because their relationship didn't fit into his "prime directive". In her dreamy state, she never discovered this until she got dumped. Afterwards, the LMC girls naturally came to the conclusion that his "prime directive" was poon, but this isn't entirely true. Poon was only his immediate directive. Moreover, this script is right out of a Jane Austen novel.

A Christian might say that their relationships failed because of being unequally yoked.

Case Study 2 – The Vision must be shared

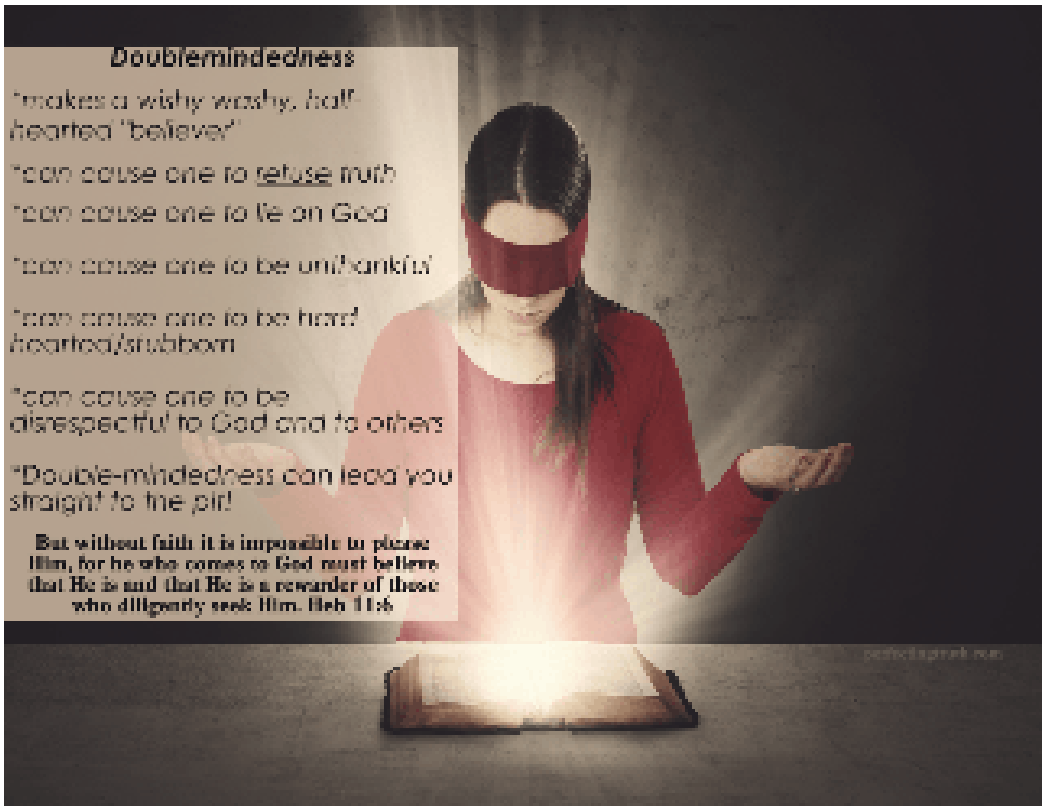
I also know of at least one LMC/- girl who successfully married up to an UMC/+ man, much to his parent's shock and disappointment. But in spite of the fairy tale exterior, she was always unhaaappy because she clung to the LMC/- expectation of "love" and romance. She was unable to see herself as merely a shiny cog in the UMC/+ machine. He was perpetually angry that she couldn't "get her act together", and this worked against her vision of "love". So she eventually took the LMC/- path of divorcing him, and she walked away from the fairy tale with a child and modest winnings. His parents congratulated themselves on being right with bittersweet satisfaction. Of course, money was never a problem.

A Christian might say that her relationship failed because of a general malaise characterized by a lack of love, respect, like-mindedness, loyalty, and dedication.

Case Study 3 – The Vision must be Steadfast

Tomi Lahren was a solid MC striver, but she had enough genetic breeding to allow her to jump track into the UMC/+ by marrying up. However, true to her MC nature, she got confused about what it means to be UMC/+. Her LMC Churchianized upbringing showed through when her Feminist and egalitarianist "(false) convictions" deceived her and destroyed any chance of that happening. As things are now, I would consider her "successful" if she were able to stay in the MC past 40.

A Christian might say that her relationship failed because of double-mindedness.



Conclusions

All things considered, and seeing how marriage has fallen to the wayside as of late, it might be accurate to say that LC women are DTF, MC women F up, and UC women F around.

Concerning the UMC/+ in particular, Novaseeker added,

> "This continues with decisions later in life, too. Indulge, yes, but not in a way that interferes with the prime directive. That's the basic approach to life, and they simply do not understand how other social classes who > were not raised that way behave differently. And among those of their own class who fail to follow the directive? Well, there is substantial disregard for them, frankly. Borders on disgust."

Yes, UMC/+ women may indulge in egalitarianism just as much, if not more than LMC/- women, as all women like to dream, but – and this is the critical point — they keep it in check so as to not upset the apple cart of success and status. The overarching dedication to the "vision", and financial security are what allows them to do so. As RPB pointed out, they must incorporate certain key elements of Patriarchy (namely, a loyalty to the dynasty) just to keep everything together. For those UMC/+ women who go off the rails in their indulgence of feminism and egalitarianism, they can only do so because sheer wealth makes up the difference. But even then, there are certain limitations, as Case Study 3 has shown.

Case Study 3 also illustrates how the LMC/- tends to pick up and imitate the worst aspects of the UMC/+ — the arrogance, the self-indulgence, the entitlement, the concept of relaxed leisure, the gluttony for luxury goods – these are the ostensible traits that they associate with the upper class. They fail to "get the point" about the key aspects that make the UMC/+ successful – the dynasty-based value system, the social dexterity, the vision, the sense of purpose, the diligence, the steadfast dedication to purpose, and the commitment to inter-generational continuity.

Related

- Σ Frame (Jack): Parenting is for the elite. (2020 March 16)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Aristocratic Hypergamy (2021 May 14)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model (2021 May 17)
- Radix Fidem: Our Prime Directive (2021 June 6)

Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity

Jack · 14 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Male and Female perspectives on masculinity.

Readership: Christian Men
Reader's Note: This is Part 1 of a series.
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 7.5 minutes

Introduction

In a previous post, Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018 June 28), I described a conversation I had with a student who was engaged to be married. Her primary complaint about her fiancée was,

> "Sometimes he acts so immature, like a little boy!"

She found this trait to be so ridiculous and annoying that she talked at some length about how much trouble it is for her to deal with this trait, and the disappointment she feels as a consequence.

Deep Strength commented,

> "This is actually a good trait to have to be a good father. Interacting and playing with kids requires a certain amount of ability to set aside the seriousness of life and just enjoy being silly or crazy.
>
> Also, Michal thought David was being "immature" (undignified) when he was dancing as the Ark of the Covenant was brought to Jerusalem. Look at how that turned out for her.
>
> The issue is not maturity though. A woman's preconceived notions of what they think is "mature" or not is their will manifesting as pride: they think they know what is better than the man they are with and are setting themselves up as the judge of that."

This brilliant observation is certainly true. But nevertheless, most women do carry this opinion of most men.

In order to discuss the nature of this phenomenon, I'll review several articles which expand on this female perspective, and add some commentary. These articles are older, liberal, and feminist, and are thus not to be regarded as Red Pill truth. However, I do think they express the general viewpoints of women very well.

Case Study 1 – Babyman

Psyche Central (feat. Samuel López De Victoria): Babyman… Is This Your Guy? (October 4, 2009)

This article begins with an embarrassing appeal to romantic chivalry, which Red Pillers know is not what women really want in a man. Then there is a short anecdote reviving the overworn trope of the harried housewife and the checked-out father. The author then makes three points that women struggle against.

1. She argues that men "put on an act to get you", that men are selfish and immature, and that it is natural for women to resent men whom they cannot respect.
2. She claims that men have "developmental deficits", and are spoiled from their youth.
3. She explains how women are forced to take control of everything in order to survive, and that this is caused by her being "emotionally abandoned by her man".

The article closes with some arrogant advice to women to either accept the role of being his surrogate mother, or dump the dude.

In a word, this whole article is simply solipsistic. She makes men out to be immature, but I strongly suspect that this is psychological projection. She is the one who is immature and out of control. I question the overall intelligence of women who take this stance.

Case Study 2 – Women Incite Emotional Drama

This article is a little more interesting.

Psychology Today (feat. William Berry): When Men Are Boys and Wives Are Mothers (February 14, 2011)

It attempts to explain that one reason why relationships become dysfunctional is because the male partner becomes "the child" in the relationship, while his female partner becomes "the mother".

> "Some men turn into boys and their wives into mothers."

The article cites 5 ways the mother-child dynamic happens, which I've paraphrased and summarized here.

1. From a woman's perspective, men seem to approach dating and marriage differently. While dating, his impulsiveness, playfulness, and childlike charm are attractive and endearing. But when the responsibilities of marriage kick in, he becomes more serious and responsible.
2. From a man's perspective, women also seem to approach dating and marriage differently. While dating, women join men in "having fun" (e.g. drinking, dancing, and clubbing). But after marriage, women eschew these behaviors, especially after having children.
3. Men suppress certain emotions, and the woman thinks it is her job to extract those emotions.
4. According to ¡Science!, mothers and fathers approach childrearing differently. Mothers take on the role of caregivers while fathers take on the role of playmates.
5. The article also claims that after having a child, men feel slighted or jealous of the woman's time and attention given to the child.

All this is a nice little summary of men and women's general behaviors in a relationship. But only point (3) addresses the issue of the mother-child dynamic. In fact, point (1) undermines the overall argument. Point (2) could be offered as a motivation for women to become nags, and if you think nagging is the same as mothering, then I can see how you might agree. Point (4) is about parenting roles, not about husband-wife roles. This point could be extended to say that women have an instinctive nature to be mothering, but the author didn't say this.

I strongly disagree with point (5). I think men feel this way because the wife is not making herself accessible (i.e. emotionally, sexually) to the man, and she uses the child as a justification for her withdrawal.

Taken together, these five points introduce some confusion about what it means to be "mothering" in this context. Does it mean being supportive, nurturing, warm, and caring, or does it mean being a scrupulous, hen pecking scold? I tend to think of the "mothering wife/adult manchild" dynamic as being more like the latter, but I can see how there might be elements of both.

In total, the takeaway from this article regarding the matron/manchild dynamic is that men are not responsible nor emotional enough for women's tastes, and that it's up to her to introduce the necessary degree of responsibility and incite emotional drama into the relationship. In order to change the interactional context into one that is congruent and conducive to this end, she must assert her dominance in the relationship. One common way women do this is to revert to the role of a mother, and treat the man like a child, which I'll add, is extremely disrespectful. I covered this aspect before in Why do Women Incite Others to Emote? (2018 June 19). Although men are less emotional, this is hardly evidence that men are immature.

Case Study 3: The Giant Baby

Huffington Post (feat. David Wygant): 5 Reasons Why Men Are Giant Babies in Relationships (November 21, 2011; Updated Jan 20, 2012)

This article actually has some good suggestions about how women can love and respect a man by serving him drinks, giving massages, displaying boobs, and offering motivating compliments and encouragement. However, this advice is condescendingly framed as coddling an immature baby, and is therefore very disrespectful to masculinity in general.

And this is written by a "man"? My word…

Case Study 4: The Grown A$$ Man

Madamenoire (feat. Julia Austin): Are You Dealing With a Real Man Or A Little Boy? 7 Signs You've Got a Grown A Man (June 19, 2012)

This article does us a real favor in clarifying that when a woman says she wants a "Real Man" she does not mean a beer guzzling, football watching, gym-obsessed brute that will start fights over her. She means someone who is mature, will treat her like a queen, is ready to be treated like a king and not take it for granted, and most importantly, who respects the sanctity* of a relationship.

Apparently, a man must not take any interest in drinking, sports, fitness training, or territory marking behaviors, because this would be "immature". Instead, he must be somewhat chivalrous to m'lady. She goes on to list 7 habits of "mature" male conduct which I have interpreted as follows.

1. He must not call her impulsively. Instead, he has to fit himself into her schedule.
2. Regardless of the circumstances, he must accept all fault and admit that she is right. His priority is to make her haaappy! (Of course!)
3. A real man wants to give to, not take from, a woman. He must offer commitment as a matter of course and be faithful without doubt or question. He cannot have any emotional or sexual needs that would require her to give something of herself to him. His only purpose is to make her feel "hot, unique, loved and all that good stuff". (Naturally!)
4. He must be willing to talk about his emotions and work things out on her terms. All the while, he must not get upset, raise his hand, turn away, hang up the phone, or shut down the conversation. He must also wholeheartedly agree with her, and not just agree for the sake of getting her to shut up. (Groan!)
5. A real man never raises his voice or asserts his authority, but only does what is necessary to continue the relationship harmoniously. After all, the partnership is equal!
6. He must never talk about his own problems, fears, or desires. As she wrote, "A real man takes responsibility for his own life and realizes it doesn't suck because his boss is mean, his landlord is a jerk, he is overweight or whatever. It sucks because he made those choices and put himself in those situations, and only he can get himself out of them. And complaining is not the ticket."
7. He must bow down and worship her as a true, independent, equal. As she says, "A real man likes a strong, opinionated, confident woman with a good head on her shoulders. He likes a woman who is the leader of her own life (and body) and is ambitious, has an active social life, is curious about the world, dresses however she wants and lives however she wants. A real man does not look in any way to control a woman. But a real man also understands that sometimes a real woman becomes emotional, and that he should never make her feel silly or bad for this. Instead, he should comfort her, let it pass, and let her get back to being her strong, bad@$$ self as if it never happened." (LMAO… Is this "strong"? I'd say it's typical feminine weakness.)

 Translation of "respecting the sanctity": He must defer obeisant fealty to her royal pain-in-the-@$$ imagined feminine dominance.*

I think we're starting to get the picture now. Anything extraneous to the feminine imperative is boyish immaturity.

Case Study 5: Men are like Babies

Cosmopolitan (feat. Hannah Smothers): 24 Ways Men Are Just Like Babies (April 14, 2016)

This article is full of subjective assessments, but I'll try to interpret these as best as I can. These are all purported to be symptoms of male "immaturity".

1. He doesn't eat what she wants him to eat without any objections.
2. He expects an immediate response.
3. He asks her opinion about what he should wear.
4. He gets sick.
5. He expects sympathy and care when he is sick.
6. He won't go to the doctor when she decides he should do so.
7. He expects praise for small accomplishments.
8. He loves to suck on boobs like a baby.
9. He prefers hamburgers over fine cuisine.
10. His sleeplessness and the carnal urgency arising from his nocturnal erections keep her awake at night.
11. He doesn't like to be "cuddled" (c.f. disrespected) when she wants to "cuddle" (c.f. disarm his defenses with feminine wiles).
12. He isn't a die-hard shopaholic and is insufficiently resolved to find ways to spend his money.
13. He has particular tastes (e.g. his mom's spaghetti sauce).
14. He is insensitive to her more refined tastes in his choices of clothing.
15. He gets obsessed with new tools, toys, gadgets, and hobbies.
16. He puts ketchup on his steaks.
17. He speaks in monosyllabic grunts.
18. He leaves his clothes on the floor.
19. He wants to keep some of his personal items in her purse.
20. "They skip hungry and immediately go to hangry, and hangry involves a lot of temper tantrums."
21. He has certain expectations of her that she doesn't agree or feel comfortable with. For example, he won't do things he doesn't want to do (e.g. wash dishes) with the implicit assumption that she will do it.
22. His habits of cleanliness are not up to her expectations.
23. He has constant ego needs which manifest as restlessness and impatience (e.g. channel surfing during commercials).
24. He asks questions about where she keeps things.

The general message here is that if a man has any need for love, affection, or encouragement, then he is a baby. On the other hand, mature men are inhuman!

Some items on this list are merely differences in taste. In fact, these seem like a laundry list of assorted economic class differences that might show up when a jaded, post-wall, UC snob is dating a younger, hawt, LC boytoy. Other items on this list are the simple daily annoyances commonly experienced by those who are incapable of extending any common graces to the other. I suppose we could truly call this immaturity, but if we are going to adopt this perspective, then the article is completely one-sided. I imagine her partner could come up with an even longer list of complementary annoyances about her. But I'm sure that as long as she's putting out, it's mostly irrelevant to him.

Conclusions

The lessons we've gained from these case studies are given here.

1. Case Study 1 – Women are solipsistic.
2. Case Study 2 – Men suppress certain emotions, and the woman thinks it is her job to extract those emotions. Playing the mother is the most satisfying way (for her) to do this.
3. Case Study 3 – There is a marked display of disrespect towards men and masculinity in general.
4. Case Study 4 – Anything extraneous to the feminine imperative is labeled boyish immaturity.
5. Case Study 5 – Any symptom of human frailty is boyish immaturity.

Now I'm beginning to understand why most women think men are immature boys!

As you can see, the general opinion of the Feminazified social culture is that men are wussified simps, who are totally emotionally inept. The humanity of men is portrayed either as an intrinsic, contemptible flaw in males, or else a failure of men to develop their emotional sides.

Give me a break. Isn't there another theoretical option besides 'flaw' or 'failure'?

More positively, this review could have a few other conclusions, or be extended to other applications:

1. The easiest way for a man to become an immature boy is to let wimmin set the frame by redefining manhood and what it means to be mature.
2. The above lists could be revamped into a male version of the $h!t test — Just do all the things on those lists, and see how much she truly loves you!
3. To those thoroughly annoyed men who are looking to tick a frumpy wimmyn off, he could "agree and amplify" the "immaturity" just to test her limits and keep her on her toes.
4. To those men who want to shed the pesky love of a bothersome wimmyn, indulging in "immaturity" (as described above) could be a passive-aggressive way to get her to dump you. Just be more "immature" and count the milliseconds to see how long she'll last.

Best wishes~!

Related

- The Rational Male: Remove the Man (2013 May 6)
- The Rational Male: Male Authority – Be a "Man" (2018 November 13)

Do men need talk therapy?

Jack · 16 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women always say men should talk about their feelings. Really?

Readership: Christian Men
Reader's Note: This is Part 2 of a series.
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Introduction

In the first post on the topic of masculine maturity, Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity (2021 June 14), we reviewed the feminist perspectives on the definition of immaturity. The takeaways from this post are given here.

1. Women are solipsistic.
2. Men suppress certain emotions, and the woman thinks it is her job to extract those emotions. Playing the mother is the most satisfying way (for her) to do this.
3. There is a marked display of disrespect towards men and masculinity in general.
4. Anything extraneous to the feminine imperative is labeled boyish immaturity.
5. Any symptom of human frailty is boyish immaturity.

RonTomlinson pointed out that since women are solipsistic, and because women need to talk about their feelings, they assume that men do too. Psychological Projection is another word for this.

Deep Strength summarized all this in saying,

> "The issue is not maturity though. A woman's preconceived notions of what they think is "mature" or not is their will manifesting as pride: they think they know what is better than the man they are with and are setting themselves up as the judge of that."

Indeed.

In this post, we'll break away from the prideful feminist viewpoints and review a more serious assessment of one socio-emotional need that men have, and how it contributes to the impression of male immaturity.

Case Study – Talk Therapy

The Good Men Project (feat. Jane Garapick): Why We Love the Little Boy Inside the Man (May 24, 2015)

> "As women, what we want more than anything else is a sensitive, caring, feeling, emotionally stable and strong man."
>
> "It seemed like he played the part very well, except he didn't.
>
> Not on the inside. Not where it really counts.
>
> That's why he's still the little boy inside. That's why the relationships we have are never about the two adults we think they are, the ones we see in front of us. They're really about those hurt little boys and girls, the ones that live deep down inside of us.
>
> We're just learning to recognize their need to come out and express themselves. And feel. And hurt. And cry. And finally be allowed to express every single emotion they feel."
>
> And hopefully get a chance to play. And feel loved."

What Garapick is talking about is what I've labeled "Heart Trust" in previous posts. Heart trust is when you're able to say what you think, show how you feel, and not worry about being misunderstood or condemned by those around you. In other words, it's the freedom to "be yourself" with another person.

In previous posts, I've focused mostly on how a man can build up a woman's Heart Trust in himself. But it's a two way street. A woman should also be focused on how she can be so loyal, supporting, and emotionally stable that she could offer a "safe" ear for her man's Heart Trust in herself.

Furthermore, whenever a man is vetting a woman for a LTR, not only should he pay attention to the extraction of her Heart Trust, in the form of IOIs, but he should also consider how much Heart Trust he can realistically place in her as well.

Conclusions

I have written before about Why do Women Incite Others to Emote? (2018 June 19), and how women expect to be a man's Kleenex. The problem with this is that once a man reveals his fears and weaknesses to a woman, she loses respect for him and is likely to use those things against him when the next opportunity strikes. She'll insist that she won't, but then she invariably does. Wise men intuitively know this. So at first reaction, we are prone to dismiss Garapick's words as more nagging to emote ourselves to our own demise. But on the other hand, and before we dismiss this annoying aspect of women's nature, we have to admit there is a kernel of truth behind this. Men do need to talk about their desires, fears, and hang-ups. Confessing these things to another person who is trustworthy, loyal, and non-judgmental can be renewing to the soul.

However, a woman is generally not the best choice of a person for a man to do this with. He needs to find other men to share this burden with.

Exit Questions

1. If a man cannot face, deal with, or talk about his feelings, does this mean that he is immature in some way?
2. If a woman/wife insists on being the talk therapist to a man, is this her will manifesting as pride, as DS described?
3. Should a woman ever be expected to be a faithful, loyal listener when a man needs to talk things through?

Related

- Σ Frame: Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018 June 28)

Entering Manhood (Rite of Passage)

Jack · 18 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Revisiting the Ancient Rite of Passage.

Readership: Christian Men
Reader's Note: This is Part 3 of a series.
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

If you haven't yet noticed, the theme for the month of June 2021 is Patriarchy, Masculinity, and Maturity involving growth and change.

Previous posts on the topic of masculine maturity are listed below.

1. Σ Frame: Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity (2021 June 14)
2. Σ Frame: Do men need talk therapy? (2021 June 16)

In this post, we'll break away from the prideful feminist viewpoints and faux masculinity, and review an important event in the process of male maturation — The Ancient Rite of Passage.

The Rite of Passage

Jayson Gaddis: Why Many Men Are Still Boys and What Can Be Done About It (2009 April 5)

Gaddis describes a social dynamic that has existed since the dawn of time, which has been almost totally forgotten over the last two decades [lightly edited].

> "For thousands of years, tribal and indigenous cultures initiate young boys into manhood through formal rites > and rituals."

>
> "The ordeal is something challenging we must face and on the other side is the reward that we must bring back to our community."
>
> The entire initiation process leads a man toward deeper and deeper self-knowledge, the key to fulfillment and realizing one's potential in life."
>
> "And if we look to indigenous and traditional cultures, a formal initiation into manhood (the hero's journey) is the one common thread in all of them. Within this, a boy must, and does, come face to face with himself, his mortality and his life's calling.
>
> In being initiated, the boy will receive some kind of training or transmission from the elders of the community about how to be a man in their village or tribe. Not only is the elders' role pivotal, the separation from the mother is poignant and a necessary moment in a boy's life. It's not just left to father's, teachers or coaches in the community, where in this culture these men often fall short.
>
> The boy leaves the safety of the protective womb, his mother, and village, and must be tested by the wilderness and the men in the community. As long as humans have existed, boys have been cast into a ritual in order to become a man. It was not uncommon for some boys to die and never come back. Without these trials and rituals, men are less likely to access the unique gifts inside them."
>
> "…in order to successfully move on to the next developmental stage in our life, we have to go through a rite of passage."
>
> "Do men in our culture have this opportunity? How does this all fit into our modern situation? Is it really necessary to face death and go through such ordeals? If it is true that initiation is a necessary step along a man's journey, what happens if he does not receive an initiation?"

To answer Gaddis' last question, he won't learn his human limitations until he gets his @$$ kicked by the world (e.g. career competition, military service, marriage, divorce, etc.). He never learns to trust God because his own father wasn't there by his side in the wrestling arena of life to guide, support, and encourage him. His life outcome will be severely curtailed and less likely to go well.

Case Study – The Bike Trip through Həll

Here, I'll tell the story of my own "rite of passage". When I was 14, my father and I bought two mopeds (a Sachs and a Minarelli) and we spent a couple months making modifications. We made an extra-large gas tank and attached it to the Minarelli. We also fitted it with a small cooler and an extra battery. We constructed storage containers and mounted them on the side of the Sachs. We bought a 6' dome tent and a propane cooking stove. We put together a first aid kit, a mess kit, and a tool box that had extra light bulbs, spark plugs, and metric wrenches that fit the bikes. We loaded all this onto the two bikes, complete with bags of clothing and some food. At 6:00 am on a Tuesday morning, and with $150 in our pockets, we left on a two week camping trip. We traveled all throughout the rural areas of Ohio and Kentucky. We had only an atlas, a compass, and the position of the sun in the sky to guide our way. We rode all day in the sun, and got sunburned. We traveled through mountainous roads that were too steep for the 50cc engines to power. So we had to walk and push the bikes uphill. On the way down the mountains, we wiped out on the pea gravel roads and had to break out the first aid kit. Some days we rode all day in the rain. All our gear and clothing got soaked, and then it smelled. I contracted a urinary infection and p!ssed blood for a couple days. I kept on riding anyway.

We camped outside. Most nights we found a state campsite, but other times, we camped wherever we could find a place where we (hopefully) wouldn't be disturbed. We collected firewood from the woods to build our campfire. We made our own steaks, sausages, and hamburgers. We ate eggs and buckwheat pancakes with maple syrup for breakfast. My Dad (who was a Baptist deacon back home) told dirty jokes and flirted with the waitresses and the rural backwoods women, and for the first time in my life, I felt like I really knew my Dad, not as a disciplinarian father, but as a man. During this trip, whenever something broke or got lost, we had to make things work. When we were in need, we had to ask strangers for help. We ran out of food a couple times, and some of our food spoiled. We ran out of propane gas, we ran out of toothpaste and toilet paper, and had nowhere to buy more. We wiped our butts with leaves and corncobs. We drank the melted ice in the cooler, water out of springs, and boiled water from creeks. My Dad told me that "God will provide" and to my amazement, He did. We found things we needed in the most unexpected places and times.

We saw Mammoth Cave (western Kentucky) and Old Man's Cave (central Ohio). We saw 150-year-old brick and pottery kilns in Nelsonville. We saw Abraham Lincoln's birthplace and many other log cabins. We saw Civil War museums, battlefields, and cemeteries. We saw the aviation museum in Wapakoneta. We saw Indian mounds. We saw my Dad's boyhood home in Marion. We met my Dad's 3rd grade teacher. We saw my grandfather's boyhood home in Scio. We saw an old general store and a cottage on a lake that once belonged to my great-grandfather. We visited the grave of my great-great-grandfather who was one of the original settlers of eastern Ohio. We were also accosted by drifters, motorcycle gangsters, and hookers. To my astonishment, most of them were friendly.

On the way back, just as we passed by Abraham Lincoln's birthplace, my rear tire blew out. We got out the toolbox, patched the inner tube and taped up the tire a few times, but eventually, it was totally shot. The rear tire was worn completely through the rubber and steel belts, and the tube was swiss cheese. We passed by an old grey farmhouse, and knocked on the door. A woman answered and my Dad explained to her the situation and asked if we could pitch a tent in her backyard for the night. At first, she was suspicious, but as my Dad kept talking, she became rather friendly. She said we could camp in her yard in a certain place and told us where to find firewood. Early the next morning, my Dad took the dilapidated tire and rode for more than two hours to the nearest city, which was Danville, KY. He spent most of the day searching all over the city for a replacement tire. Eventually, he found a motorcycle shop that had just bought a load of odd surplus tires at a discount. Dad searched through the tires until he found one that matched my bike. After examining the tire, the manager said that company (Carlisle) stopped manufacturing that particular tire years ago, and that it was only by chance that he happened to have it, as it was probably the last one in the city.

The Lord provides!

Old Man's Cave, Hocking County, Ohio, U.S.A.

Conclusions

The measure of a man is in the lengths he is willing to go, in his fight to survive, to impose his will, and to preserve his ways of life. The ancient rite of passage puts a young man at the forefront of his own masculinity, and instils a much needed sense of confidence and self-reliance.

In today's comfort culture of Googling, gaming, and immediate satisfactions, the ancient rite of passage has been almost totally forgotten. Institutions that once offered structure, discipline and purpose to young men, like the Boy Scouts, have been subverted, their values ripped out, and destroyed.

Men, if you have a son, you need to take him on a road trip, or go to the mountains or to a foreign culture, etc., sometime during his early post-adolescence years (14-16). Put yourselves at the mercies of God, nature, and the kindness of strangers. Let him discover the beauty and cruelty of nature, his own raw masculinity, the hard-core discipline of mind and body, the limits of his human ability, and the knowledge that God provides and protects. Make the decision to do this yourself and let it become a bonding experience. Don't wait until he learns his human limitations by getting his @$$ kicked by the world (career competition, military, marriage, divorce, etc.). If you don't take this by the horns, you'll miss this grand chance to achieve a father's primary purpose — enhancing your son's confidence and trust in God by going through a life challenge together with you there at his side in the arena to guide, support, and encourage him. If you fail to do this, his life will be significantly more difficult and less fulfilling.

Related

- The Rational Male: Rites of Passage (2016-12-5)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Dispensation of the Red Pill (2018-4-7)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Stepping up to the Challenge (2018-4-29)
- Σ Frame (Jack): A Brother Is Borne Out Of Adversity (2018-6-10)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018-6-28)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Where is your life headed? (2019-2-8)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Life education beats the smarm (2020-5-6)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Archetypal Therapy and Innate Personality Traits (2021-3-20)
- Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle): Rethinking Rites of Passage From a Biblical Perspective (2021-7-12)

A Man's Ability to Read IOIs Depends on Having a Firm Grasp on His Personal Archetypal Mythos

Jack · 21 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Here's another important thing to be learned from Dr. Klajic.

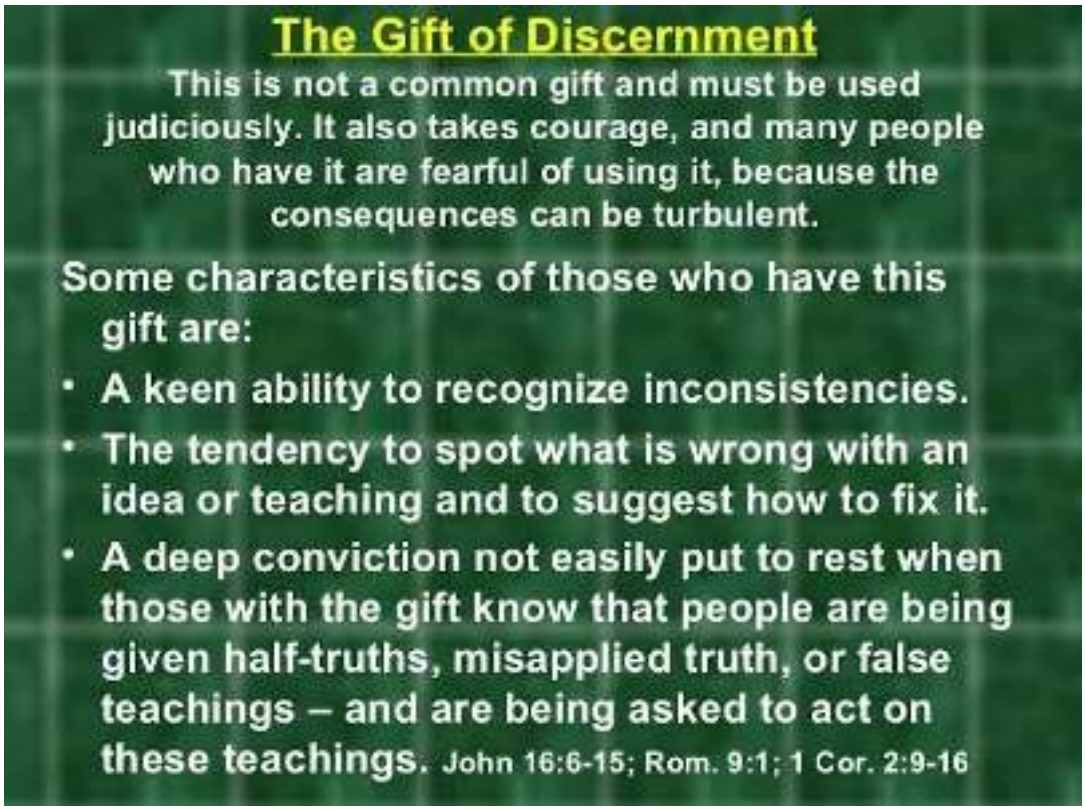
Readership: Christian Men
Reader's Note: In this post, the concept of mythos is defined in literature and psychology as a traditional or recurrent narrative theme or plot structure. It is not to be confused with a myth as being a set of superstitious beliefs or false assumptions about something. A previous post On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019 February 2) covered the nature and importance of discernment.
This is part 4 of a series on masculinity.
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 3.5 minutes

Introduction

Scott first introduced the Meet Cute phenomenon to us in two posts, Probabilities (2020 February 24) and Opportunities (2020 February 26), and it was later covered in full in The Meet Cute Phenomenon (Scott's Axiom) (2020 December 6).

Discerning IOIs and being able to attract and navigate a Meet Cute experience is of critical importance because it establishes a preferred Headship structure in the relationship.

Scott's insights inspired me to study this topic and write a few posts about this phenomenon, including a List of Female IOI's (2020 March 30) and 8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics (2020 July 8). Since last year, I've realized that my learnings of this topic have only just begun.



The Power of Mythos

Archetypal Therapy and Innate Personality Traits (2021 March 20) is one of my favorite posts from Scott. I like this post because it helps me understand and appreciate who he is in many ways, including the way he thinks about himself. The mythos of his family stories puts everything into it's proper place in his understanding of both himself and the world at large. This is the power of mythos.

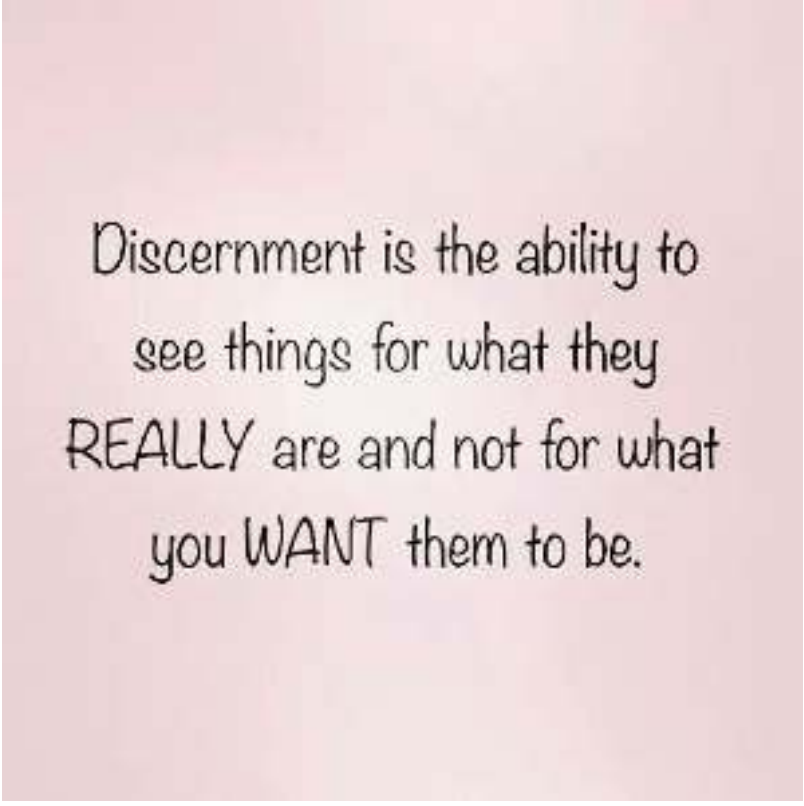
One significant event that helped build that aspect of Scott's mythos which concerns women and marriage was described in his post, How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020 April 27). Essentially, he discovered the presence of God in his friend's parent's relationship, and he wanted that for himself. This touched him so deeply, that it became integrated into his personal mythos. Or perhaps it is better to say that God revealed this foundational element of his personal mythos to him through this experience.

Believe it or not, this mythos has a direct relation to the ability to receive and detect IOIs!

Under NovaSeeker's post, Deciphering Concepts of Attraction (2021 April 19), Scott wrote,

> "From what I have seen/my experience, IOIs come from a place that is not consciously controlled. It is natural, fun and obvious. Any attempt to modify it for the purposes of the intended recipient (the guy) would come across as weird or obsequious."

In the past, I had (somewhat facetiously) assumed that Handling an IOI requires a Miracle! (2020 July 17). But after I read this comment, I realized that Scott would only be able to read and interpret IOIs this easily and accurately if he already had a firm grasp on his family archetypes, and his personal mythos.



Archetypal Mythos offers a Guiding Frame for Discernment

Having a strong clear sense of personal mythos gives a man a sense of purpose and a frame of discernment. It creates a clearly defined psychological boundary between one's inner world, and the messy world out there. In other words, it helps a man Develop an Attitude of Detachment (2020 July 10).

If this archetypal mythos is firmly grounded in a man's psyche, then going about one's daily life is something akin to a shopping experience. For everything that a man comes across in life, there is a basic underlying question which frames his assessment of the thing, which is,

"How does this fit into my mythos?"

The value of the thing, as it relates to that particular man, then becomes very easy to discern.

"If it fits into my mythos, I'll take it! And if it doesn't, I'll just let it be."

This assessment naturally includes a man's selection of a woman, but more importantly, it provides the Frame in which the true answer to such an assessment can be discerned. As a result, whenever a woman is giving out IOIs, they can be readily interpreted as such, and the appropriate response is therefore intuitive.

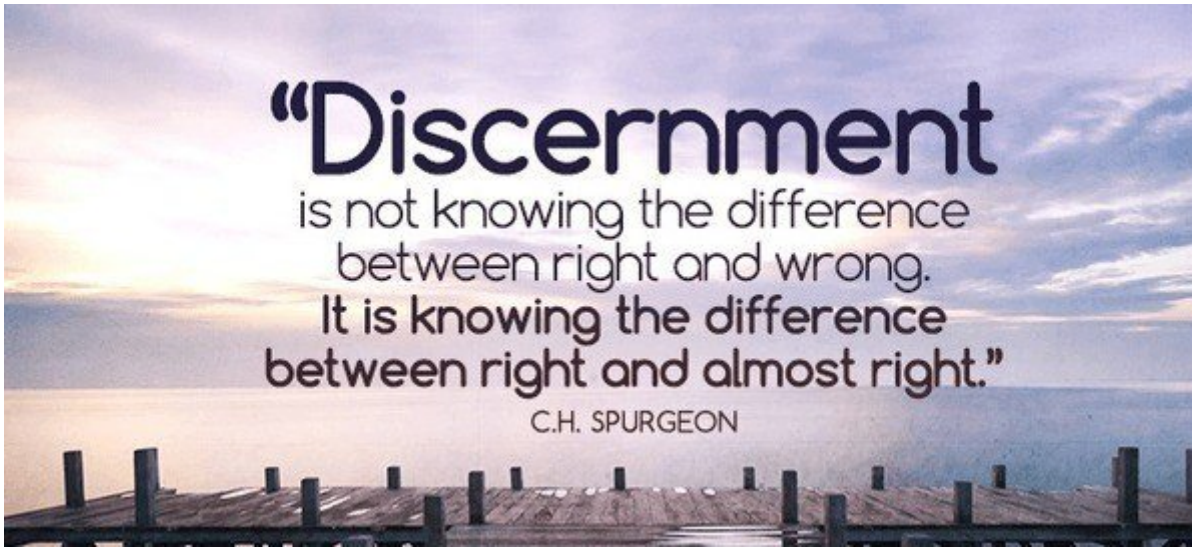
Mythos could also serve as a standard about when to take action or become aggressively motivated.

"If it threatens my mythos, I need to do something about it."

Also, I can see that if a man has a strong sense of mythos, and the psychological grounding that it provides, it can enhance a man's charisma and overall attractiveness to both men and women. This certainly helps the generation and display of IOIs.

In other words, archetypal mythos provides an individually tailored Frame of reference.

FRAME!



Archetypal Mythos brings it all together in one Frame

Men, learning to think of your life in terms of a continuing Archetypal Mythos will help everything fall into place in your mental concept and increase your aptitude with discernment.

This concept also fits with Chateau Heartiste's third commandment,

> "You shall make your Mission, not your woman, your priority."

But the thing is, a man must first know his mission. Having a firm grasp of his personal mythos will bring this to fruition.

Finally, all of this also coincides with what Ed Hurst said about his own process of finding/choosing a wife.

> "It's not about the rules; they help, but they are simply a manifestation of something deeper. My successful marriage wasn't about the rules. I followed my convictions and God supplied my need. It was a miracle. I broke > some of your suggested rules because I tend to see through the rules to the divine moral purpose. I knew I had a divine calling and that steered every choice. I've made mistakes and I accept them as the consequences of faith that needs to grow. I've always lived as an alien on this earth; marriage was just a part of that."

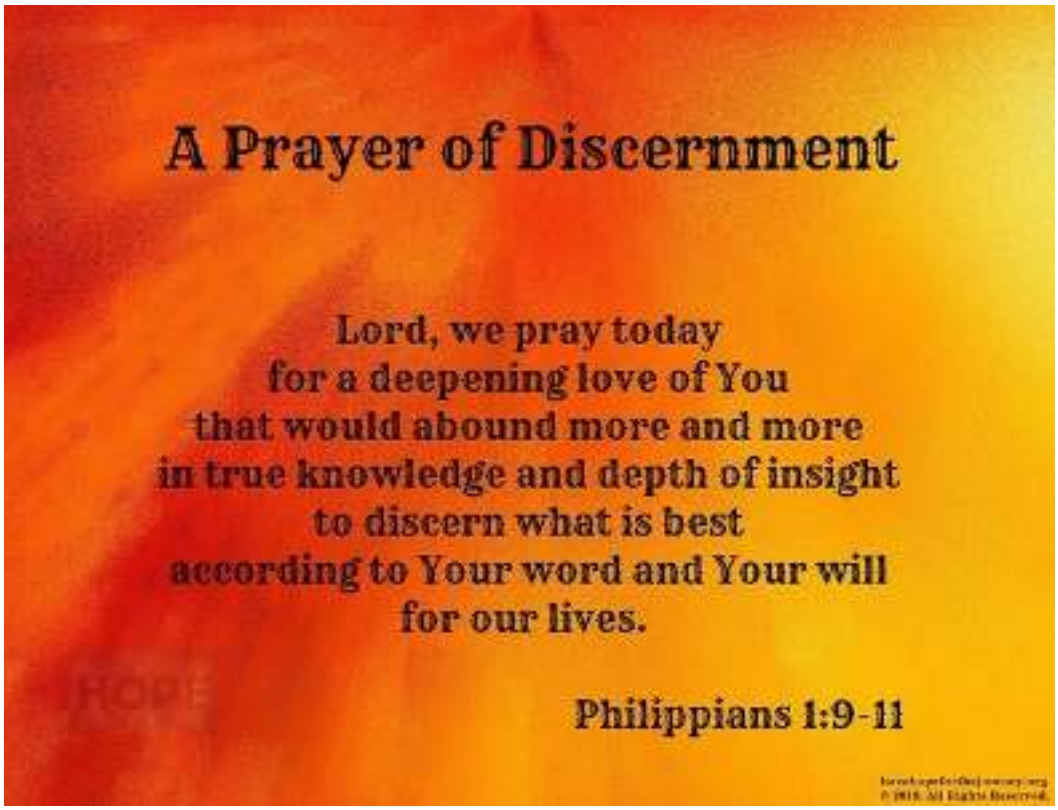
In Ed's comment, words like, "conviction", "divine purpose", "divine calling", and "alien on this earth", all suggest that he had found a mythical life script given to him by inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

We would do well to ask God for the opportunity to discover our own individual sense of personal mythos as a Christian. So do yourself a favor. Take a moment and contemplate the following prayer.



One further observation — It seems that many men do not operate with a personal mythos as their guiding star, but rather, something else that is more immediate, self-centered, and base. Examples might include social dominance, ego, sex, profit, popularity, convenience, and I'm sure many others. In this case, the internal dialogue would go something like this (using ego as an example).

"How does this support my ego?"

"If it supports my ego, I'll take it! And if it doesn't, I'll just let it be."

"If it threatens my ego, I need to do something about it."

As you can imagine, this would lead to an entirely different set of thoughts, actions, and behaviors. The thing is, if a man doesn't have a God inspired personal mythos to guide his thoughts and actions, then he is probably navigating through life on one of these other prerogatives.

Exit Question

1. What is your guiding star? Is it a deeply inspired personal mythos combined with a divine purpose for living, or are your psychological assessments guided by something else?

Related

- Σ Frame: A Mystical Approach to Meta Reality (2021 March 19)

- Christianity and Masculinity: Unpacking and tying together the meta-levels of Christianity, reality and the red pill into a hierarchical understanding: theological, scientific, and philosophical/cultural (2021 March 29)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021 March 29)

Men's Fantasy of Emotional Intimacy

Jack · 23 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Is it just a solipsistic fantasy, or is this how God intends for men to "love their wives"?

Readership: Men; Women who desire to be truly loved by a man;
Reader's Note: This is part 5 of a series on masculinity.
Length: 3,300 words
Reading Time: 18 minutes

> "Men understand instinctively that depth of emotion does not always mean outward expression of it giving into its basest impulses. The aesthetic reasons for restraint are elevating to the human condition."
>
> A comment from Scott

Introduction

Our discussion last week of whether men need talk therapy? (2021/6/16) turned up many important points. Scott wisely noted that when a woman (or collectively "women") say they want a man to be vulnerable and talk about his feelings, they are speaking in code. Scott offered a filter to aid us in translating from femtalk.

> "I want a [super-hot sexy man] to talk about his feelings, [as long as what he is saying makes me feel good about myself but I don't want any negative, icky stuff or pain, or fear, or needs or anxieties because this makes me see him as weak and he will fall apart under pressure when the barbarians are at the gate]."

Rontomlinson2 noted that the reason women assume that men need to talk about their feelings is because women need to talk about their feelings, and because they are solipsistic and prone to psychological projection, they assume that men do too.

Not only do women carry this expectation, but it is also something that men expect too! So we might call this a mutually double-blind trap.

Can you trust her with your heart???

Rock Kitaro described this particular mindset that is common to men — a deep seated notion that women are to be depended on to be loyal and nurturing. [Emphasis mine]

> "From my own personal experience… I really don't have a problem being open, straight-forward, and honest to my girlfriend about my feelings, regardless of how vulnerable, emotional or weak it makes me look. And I think the reason why is because I set that baseline before we even committed ourselves to each other. I don't run "game" or pretend to be someone I'm not when it comes to someone I'm genuinely falling for.
>
> In fact, the reason why I've probably fallen for her is BECAUSE I can be myself around her. The moment I start having to watch what I say around my girlfriend (or anyone), is the moment I've decided I don't want you in my life.
>
> Yeah, she's capable of bringing it up and using it against me… lololol, but to be honest, I kinda prefer it. Especially sooner than later in the relationship. Because I don't have many buttons. And if I give her access to those internal nuclear codes and she starts firing them off in retaliation or just to see what I do… well, my longest relationship is three months. I always tell my family, if my girlfriend makes it past six months, that's how you'll know she's the one."

There is one takeaway from the discussion that bears emphasizing — whether it is wise or even realistic for a man to "open up" to a woman. The overall consensus here is that it is not. This post will recount several statements from commenters to this end, and why it is important to escape this tempting trap of expectation.

Men's Fundamental Fantasy of Love

We could easily dismiss Rock's stance as a Blue Pill mindset, however, this expectation is not something that originates from Blue Pill indoctrination. Yes, it is taught by and learned from the culture, but this notion appeals to something deeper in the heart of man that desires and expects this level of intimacy from a woman.

Red Pill Apostle described this when he wrote,

> "I fell completely for Mrs. A because of how honest I could be with Mrs. A prior to marriage. We talked and shared about deep personal aspects of life. Then we got married, the license was signed and the power structure changed. Then the curse of Genesis 3 came out in full force. I'm not going to suggest that this will happen to you, but I would certainly be vigilant. You might even want to skip the marriage license part (if your state laws create an environment where the strategy could be successful) just to keep the power balanced."

The reason that men fall for women with whom they can be honest is because this is an expression of Heart Trust. When a man is able to open up and talk freely about his thoughts feelings, desires, dreams, and fears, it is deeply humbling. This combination of Heart Trust and humility is the basic recipe for "falling in love".

Jack said this Heart Trust, humility, and "love" was the main thing he wanted most out of marriage.

> "Rock, I used to have the very same mindset as you when I was younger, and I had that habit of interaction with my first wife. While we were dating, we talked about everything! She was delighted when I teased her. She always agreed with me whenever I said something serious, and she laughed at everything I said in jest. This comfort, intimacy, and honesty was a major reason why I chose to marry her over others I knew."

Scott also shares this sentiment.

> "When I was very young, probably around 12, I started to feel this overwhelming urge to connect with one, and just one girl in a way that would transcend either of our "looks" or whatever physical preferences or desires we had. I wrote about this in the post, How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020/4/27).
>
> Of course, I could not articulate it then. I was 12.
>
> I can't recall seeing any particular movie, or hearing any specifically romantic story that planted this in my head. I remember the feeling starting before all that. I remember feeling like there was some other half of me that was missing, and that when we found each other, we would just know. There would be an attraction there like two powerful magnets that cannot resist the pull towards each other.
>
> Regardless, one thing I believed for many years — decades really — was that if I could learn how to express this in a clear and unambiguous, courageous way, "women" would FINALLY understand that there are men out there who aren't just sexual predators and who are capable of great depths of love and devotion.

This doesn't sound like Blue Pill indoctrination. It's more of a deep desire in a man's soul.

Scott's Mission to Make Men Know

As a psychologist, Scott has recognized this fundamental fantasy of men, and has taken it upon himself to help men jump over the hurdle of this crippling desire. He wrote this a month ago. [Emphasis his.]

> "Now, at this later stage in my life, having the experience, the education / vocabulary, the courage, and the opportunity to explain, in great, flowery detail to [quite a few] specific women what the internal processes of a man who is falling in love involves, I have come to this deeply painful conclusion.
>
> The problem isn't that they don't understand these things (including the sentiment Cameron is describing, and you are trying to reiterate). It's that they don't particularly value that kind of depth (or care), and unless you are bringing something else to the table (like whatever it is they have a raw attraction to at that particular moment in her life), you might as well just move on. If I can't describe it and the light goes off in one single woman and she says to herself, "Oh, NOW I get it. His love is so deep that it will NEVER run dry… if I would just give him a chance.", then it is not because they don't understand.
>
> It is one of the biggest lies we have been sold. Namely, that men are barbaric, sex-crazed, selfish creatures of opportunity, and women are deeply feeling, sophisticated diviners of true love. Cue eye roll.
>
> Men are the true romantics, and always have been.
>
> My job, if I ever get a chance to do it on a grander scale, is to help men understand that, and be OK with it."

Men fall in love when they're able to talk to a woman honestly and be warmly received by her.

Honesty in Dating doesn't translate to Honesty in Marriage

As we have found, unfortunately, honesty in dating appears to be a unique and fragile paradigm that does not continue to flourish and grow after marriage, but instead becomes an Achilles' heel to the marital harmony.

Jack continues on with a heart wrenching tale of how marriage destroyed the Heart Trust, humility, and honesty that he most desired.

> "That all changed after we married. As soon as the honeymoon was over, she didn't want to hear anything I said. She tuned out of common exchanges. If I spoke my mind about something serious or talked about my feelings (!!!) she immediately went to Defcon 5. By that I mean, she would get nuclear angry, storm about the house, declare she wanted a divorce, pack a suitcase, and leave the house for several days.
>
> During marital counseling, the counselor told her that our former habit of communication was important, it worked well for us, brought us together into marriage, and that she needed to continue talking with me like that if she wanted the marriage to continue smoothly. She was flagrantly indignant about this advice, partly because she knew it was true I suppose, and partly because she hated it. She chose divorce rather than to resume communicating properly. I eventually came to learn that, apparently, when she had maintained this kind of communication while we were dating, she wasn't as honest as she had let on."

RedPillApostle had this to say about how the game changes after marriage [edited for clarity].

> "Rock — I'll put some personal specifics to highlight what Nova wrote, because it is true."

- Dating conversations — Being open, honest, joking, and non-judgmental indicates a presumption of trust.
- Married conversations — Being open and honest will get manipulative "if you really love me…" type statements. Joking around will get you kicked or pinched under the table because she thinks her choice of a man cannot embarrass her.
- Dating view of me — She let me be myself, and we enjoyed our time together.
- Married view of me — I got told I'm not like her dad and "real men" do it "this" way. I got lambasted more than a few times like this.

A man's reward for talking honestly to his wife.

> "Once you are legally hitched to a girl, who you are is a reflection of how good a man she could get. It is SO true that she will use all her soft manipulative power to try to make you into the man that makes her look best. She will not care what you actually want unless what you want matches up with what she wants already. Who > you really are can be fine as a boyfriend because you are not fully committed. Once the rings are on the fingers, your meaning to her changes. You become her status symbol and anything you do that causes her to perceive you as lowering the status in her mind will be met with resistance, manipulation and cajoling (nagging) to get you to keep her appearances up.

>
> By the very fact that you are on this site reading, you have knowledge that many of us here did not have while dating. Use it wisely."

Jack's Testimony

Jack continued with a frightening testimony that recast the intransigence of women as a herd to be a female conspiracy.

> "After I had this experience with my first wife, I talked it over with my dad. He told me he experienced the same thing in his marriage to my mother, and this was one of the biggest disappointments he had, not only about marriage, but in his life.
>
> For some time after this, I had the hope that I might make a dent in this family curse. I started to talk about this with my family members from time to time, trying to get it out in the open. Soon I began to recognize a pattern in my family. Whenever I brought it up, all the men knew exactly what I was talking about and jumped on board, but all the women became indignant and walked out of the room with a huff. My sister was the only woman in my family who was willing to admit it was true, but she would only admit this to me in private, and she would not go into the topic any further than a simple agreement. But even so, I did learn something about the women's perspective from talking with her. All the women talk rather freely amongst themselves, but they'll never tell the men anything that is going on. They'll have a caucus, make decisions, and carry out those decisions among themselves, and they intentionally keep the men in the dark as much as possible. For example, when my sisters and female cousins started to be sexually active, my mother and aunts gave them lots of "instructions", and kept it all a secret from the men, as if it were none of their business. If there was ever an abortion in the family, I never knew about it. When one of my aunts had an affair and was socking money away in preparation for a divorce, all the women knew all about it, but all the men remained clueless until she breeched the subject — AFTER she had already arranged everything with a lawyer.
>
> I experienced more of the same with my current wife, but it's not as bad because I was already aware of this, and I had already learned to be less trusting of women.
>
> Now I know this is not just a curse on my family, it is the Curse of Eve."

NovaSeeker's Response

Novaseeker responded to Rock's comment with an explanation of the female nature.

> "I know that this [level of men's trust and honesty with women] is what the culture peddles, and I also know that it "feels" more comfortable for us, as men, to be like that. But it isn't wise. Women are not men. They catalog everything we say or do that shows any sort of vulnerability or weakness away in their brains and later on that information and knowledge is deployed against you in some way. It often doesn't happen immediately, and in the context of a BF/GF relationship with a woman who is not naturally toxic / BPD / etc. it can seem to work ok. But when the marriage comes into force, the entire power dynamic is forcibly shifted, and you will eventually have all of that info come back and be used against you, either openly or covertly, in how she decides to "manage" you.
>
> It bears repeating.
>
> Women are the weaker sex physically, and they therefore feel both existentially vulnerable in ways that we generally do not, as well as innately justified in using anything that can be used against us in ways that are beneficial to them — precisely because they feel we have a leg up on them anyway. When you feed women information verbally or through your actions that reveals weakness or vulnerability, you can fully expect that it will be deployed against you in some way by her for her advantage, because she will eventually find herself in a situation of conflict with you, where she is looking around for things she can use to her advantage to "win" the conflict. It really is that simple. Women do not see vulnerability in us as being cute or endearing or humanizing or any of the other claptrap that the culture tells us, or that women tell themselves and spout to us and each other. Women despise weakness and vulnerability of any kind in men, despite how they may openly mouth otherwise, and even think that they themselves believe otherwise — deep down, they despise it, especially in a man they are connected with and/or dependent on. It will eventually be used against you at a time when she feels the need to reach for tools to use against you in a conflict with you. Sucks, but it's just how women work.
>
> Note that this doesn't mean you have to be an unfeeling ass, or that you have to pretend with yourself that you don't have weaknesses. It isn't a lot of mumbo-jumbo, we know we all have our weaknesses, we aren't that stupid. The key is that you do not show these to women. The person you share them with are close male friends who can help you with them, and can empathize with you to some degree because if they are really > close friends with you they won't react in the "one upmanship" way of exploiting your weaknesses and vulnerabilities, like a male stranger will. This is why we don't share our weaknesses and vulnerabilities with male strangers — they also use that information against us, generally, typically to assert hierarchical dominance over you at the moment you disclose the weakness or vulnerability. (Christian pastors love to do this to men, for example.) And it's also why it's critical to have actual male friends — something fewer and fewer of us have, which tends to make men reliant on women in this area, which leads to the problems I outlined above."

Conclusions

The Bible requires that husbands should love their wives (Ephesians 5:25-33). As men, we are rather well versed in couching this commandment in terms of personal commitment, discipline, sacrifice, and "tough love", as described in 1st Corinthians 13. However, are we not allowed any element of genuine emotional love for a woman that comes of honesty, humility, and Heart Trust? It seems that it would be much easier for men to follow this commandment, and follow it more deeply and more genuinely, if a woman allowed a man to "open up" his Heart Trust and honestly communicate his thoughts and feelings without any fear of backlash. But in reality, because of women's weaknesses for self-centered solipsism, dominance, and control, men are practically forbidden from experiencing this depth of joy in loving a woman.

If marriage is in your future, full biblical patriarchy is the only solution to this and you better be tough and determined as həll in today's world to enforce it.

However, the emotional health and vitality of men are not entirely held at the behest of women in this regard. Rontomlinson2 spelled out some options.

> "A man isn't required to talk to his wife or even to a friend about his feelings, he can…"

1. Consciously examine them for himself.
2. Talk to God about them, in prayer. (Such prayers are rapidly answered, in my experience.)

3. Talk to other men about it.
4. Put them on hold while he gets the job done, whatever it is.

> "Thus he has options. Whereas I don't think women do. Strictly speaking they don't have feelings: feelings have them. The moment one actually feels a feeling, it dissipates. So my personal motto is that feelings are for feeling, not for talking about. (Being fairly introverted, I've had a lot of practice!)
>
> However, it can be great fun to pretend to agonise about them, sometimes."

Questions for Discussion

1. Is men's desire for honesty and openness with their wives just a quirky conceited fantasy, or is this how God intends for men to "love their wives"?
2. Do women know that men fall for women with whom they can be humble and honest, and use this to control and manipulate men?
3. Is it possible for a man to experience a deep, emotionally humbling love for a woman without taking the risk of "opening up" to her in the manner described here?
4. Is it worth trying to educate women that their husbands will love them more deeply and more genuinely if they would allow him to "open up" his Heart Trust and humility, and honestly communicate his thoughts and feelings without any backlash?

Related

- Σ Frame: Somewhere Down the Mystic River (2019/11/23)
- Σ Frame: Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing. (2020/1/27)
- Matthew E. Cochran: She's Just a Woman (2021/6/14)
- Σ Game: There is No Emotional Safety (2025/7/25)

8 Things that Increase Discernment

Jack · 25 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Lacking discernment? This post is for you!

Readership: Christians
Reader's Note: This is part 6 of a series on masculinity.
Length: 2,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

The Importance of Discernment

A previous post On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019 February 2) covered the nature and importance of discernment. (This is one of my better posts, IMHO.) If you are confused about the difference between judgment and discernment and how it is applied, then I encourage you to click on those three links in this paragraph and read up on these subjects. They are very important concepts in the life of a believer.

Estaque de Harbour, by Georges Braque, 1906.

King Solomon was the wisest man who ever lived (aside from Jesus). The story of his ascension to king identifies discernment as a key characteristic of his successes [emphasis mine].

> [3] Now Solomon loved the Lord, walking in the statutes of his father David, except that he was sacrificing and burning incense on the high places. [4] And the king went to Gibeon to sacrifice there, because that was the great high place; Solomon offered a thousand burnt offerings on that altar. [5] In Gibeon the Lord appeared to Solomon in a dream at night; and God said, "Ask what you wish Me to give you."
>
> [6] Then Solomon said, "You have shown great faithfulness to Your servant David my father, according as he walked before You in truth, righteousness, and uprightness of heart toward You; and You have reserved for him this great faithfulness, that You have given him a son to sit on his throne, as it is this day. [7] And now, Lord my God, You have made Your servant king in place of my father David, yet I am like a little boy; I do not > know how to go out or come in. [8] And Your servant is in the midst of Your people whom You have chosen, a great people who are too many to be numbered or counted. [9] So give Your servant an understanding heart to judge Your people, to discern between good and evil. For who is capable of judging this great people of Yours?"

>
> [10] Now it was pleasing in the sight of the Lord that Solomon had asked this thing. [11] And God said to him, "Because you have asked this thing, and have not asked for yourself a long life, nor have asked riches for yourself, nor have you asked for the lives of your enemies, but have asked for yourself discernment to understand justice, [12] behold, I have done according to your words. Behold, I have given you a wise and discerning heart, so that there has been no one like you before you, nor shall one like you arise after you. [13] I have also given you what you have not asked, both riches and honor, so that there will not be any among the kings like you all your days. [14] And if you walk in My ways, keeping My statutes and commandments, as your father David walked, then I will prolong your days."
>
> 1st Kings 3:3-14 (NASB)

Solomon must've had a speck of wisdom even before making this request, otherwise, he would not have known to ask for discernment. It was wise of him to ask this of God, because discernment is something that only God can grant.

Balustre et Cranem, by Georges Braque, 1938.

The Nature of Discernment

Solomon wrote (or compiled) three books of the bible, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. These three books, and Solomon's story in 1st Kings 3:3-14, all speak to the nature and importance of wisdom.

In Proverbs 8, Solomon describes the nature and importance of wisdom and discernment.

> [1] Does not wisdom call,
> And understanding raise her voice?
> [2] On top of the heights beside the way,

Where the paths meet, she takes her stand;
[3] Beside the gates, at the opening to the city,
At the entrance of the doors, she cries out:

[4] "To you, people, I call,
And my voice is to mankind.
[5] You naïve ones, understand prudence;
And, you fools, understand wisdom!
[6] Listen, for I will speak noble things;
And the opening of my lips will reveal right things.
[7] For my mouth will proclaim truth;
And wickedness is an abomination to my lips.
[8] All the words of my mouth are in righteousness;
There is nothing crooked or perverted in them.
[9] They are all straightforward to him who understands,
And right to those who find knowledge.
[10] Accept my instruction and not silver,
And knowledge rather than choice gold.
[11] For wisdom is better than jewels;
And all desirable things cannot compare with her.

[12] "I, wisdom, dwell with prudence,
And I find knowledge and discretion.
[13] The fear of the Lord is to hate evil;
Pride, arrogance, the evil way,
And the perverted mouth, I hate.
[14] Advice is mine and sound wisdom;
I am understanding, power is mine.
[15] By me kings reign,
And rulers decree justice.
[16] By me princes rule, and nobles,
All who judge rightly.
[17] I love those who love me;
And those who diligently seek me will find me.
[18] Riches and honor are with me,
Enduring wealth and righteousness.
[19] My fruit is better than gold, even pure gold;
And my yield better than choice silver.
[20] I walk in the way of righteousness,
In the midst of the paths of justice,
[21] To endow those who love me with wealth,
That I may fill their treasuries.

The Meditation, by Nattawat, 2018.

> [22] "The Lord created me at the beginning of His way,
> Before His works of old.
> [23] From eternity I was established,
> From the beginning, from the earliest times of the earth.
> [24] When there were no ocean depths, I was born,
> When there were no springs abounding with water.
> [25] Before the mountains were settled,
> Before the hills, I was born;
> [26] While He had not yet made the earth and the fields,
> Nor the first dust of the world.
> [27] When He established the heavens, I was there;
> When He inscribed a circle on the face of the deep,
> [28] When He made firm the skies above,
> When the springs of the deep became fixed,
> [29] When He set a boundary for the sea
> So that the water would not violate His command,
> When He marked out the foundations of the earth;
> [30] Then I was beside Him, as a master workman;
> And I was His delight daily,
> Rejoicing always before Him,
> [31] Rejoicing in the world, His earth,
> And having my delight in the sons of mankind.
>
> [32] "Now then, sons, listen to me,
> For blessed are those who keep my ways.
> [33] Listen to instruction and be wise,
> And do not neglect it.

> [34] Blessed is the person who listens to me,
> Watching daily at my gates,
> Waiting at my doorposts.
> [35] For one who finds me finds life,
> And obtains favor from the Lord.
> [36] But one who sins against me injures himself;
> All those who hate me love death.”
>
> Proverbs 8 (NASB)

Yes, wisdom is finer than rubies. Above all else, seek the wisdom that comes through discernment, and the peace in God that surpasses all knowledge.

But here, I need to emphasize a crucial point that is often neglected. The wisdom of God which Solomon desired, and which plays a critical difference in the life of a believer today, is not a worldly kind of wisdom. It is not about being “street smart” (although this can certainly come in handy). No, the wisdom of God is largely centered around discernment – the ability to pick out falsehood, foolishness, lies, and deception, to intuitively sense the nature of a thing, and familiarity in knowing how this thing will behave in any given context. Without discernment, there can be no wisdom. Without discernment, one cannot grow in the knowledge of the Truth. Without discernment, one cannot even be obedient to God. In fact, some degree of discernment is necessary just to be able to trust God.

Thusly, to focus only on wisdom, and the power and benefits thereof, is a sin. For it is discernment which allows the wisdom of God and all of its blessings to manifest.

In the context of the Red Pill, discernment is absolutely necessary to establish a strong Frame. In fact, discernment is the foundation of Frame. In past writings here at Σ Frame, we found that a man’s ability to discern a woman’s IOIs is crucial in developing a viable Christian relationship characterized by Headship. Without discernment, it is impossible for a man to pick through the riff raff, see through the feminine fluff, and find a ruby.

Les Demoiselles d'Avignon, By Pablo Picasso, 1907.

Three Kinds of Discernment

In Three Kinds of Discernment (2020 September 25), we identified and discussed three types of discernment, Spiritual Discernment (SD), Cognitive Discernment (CD), and Social/Emotional Discernment (ED). A brief review follows.

1. Spiritual Discernment (SD) is known as the "discerning of spirits", the gift of special and deep understanding what is of God and what is not, and the ability of "rightly dividing the word of Truth". This is the "discerning heart" requested by Solomon, and which is imparted by the Holy Spirit.
2. Cognitive Discernment (CD) has less to do with the spiritual world, and more akin to having a sound mind. It requires an ability to detect whether an argument is either sound or debased, and the sharp wit required to articulate a truthful response. This includes a basic understanding of cause-and-effect, causal feedback loops. It requires the ability to look past what appears to be so and get to what actually is. Critical thinking, and inductive and/or deductive reasoning are employed when appropriate, but there is also the recognition that deductive reasoning doesn't necessarily always lead to the Truth.
3. Social/Emotional Discernment (ED) is (1) an ability to connect with others on an emotional, heart-felt level, and (2) Theory of Mind (something which Autistic individuals are incapable of experiencing). It involves understanding figures of speech (e.g. metaphor, sarcasm), being able to sense whether someone is sincere, or lying, or sincerely lying, or is just joking around. This also includes reading the social and/or sexual interest and intent of others, and being able to detect and read IOI's.

Later in this post, I'll identify each item on the list as to whether it yields SD, CD, or ED.

The List

Finally, here is the list of things that increase discernment. Ultimately, it is the intervention of the Holy Spirit that imparts discernment, but the following things can certainly help.

1. Academic Pursuits – This includes reading the Bible especially. This habit serves to discipline and train the mind, which must be brought into subjection to the heart and will. The mind must serve the heart, and not the other way around.
2. Archetypal Mythos — Having a strong clear sense of personal mythos gives a man a sense of purpose and a frame of discernment. It creates a clearly defined psychological boundary between one's inner world, and the messy world out there. In other words, it helps a man Develop an Attitude of Detachment (2020 July 10).
3. Authenticity – Dwelling in reality, and looking at life and one's self for what it is, rather than for what one wants it to be.
4. Conflict* – Just as iron sharpens iron (Proverbs 27:17), and two sparring gladiators continually refine their skills through combat, continual interpersonal altercations increase one's sense of immediate, situational discernment. Of note, marriage is chock full of conflict.
5. Experiencing the Presence of God — The event that helped build the aspect of Scott's personal mythos that concerns women and marriage was described in his post, How I discovered that I wanted to be married (2020 April 27). Essentially, he discovered the presence of God in his friend's parent's relationship, and he wanted that for himself.
6. Fellowship – Male bonding characterized by confidentiality, deep authentic sincerity, honesty, trust, and some degree of loyalty, is necessary for a man to "get real". This can help you open your heart, face your inner self, and know yourself better. Ideally, a brotherhood of authentic fellowship should lead to confession, repentance, renewal, and the inspiration of its members.
7. Opening your heart in trust and humility – Being attentive to metaphysical forces such as confidence, courage, desire, faith, fear, hope, inspiration, and trust can improve awareness, as well as paying more attention to various human and spiritual needs, and the accompanying nuances of gratitude and grace.

8. Prayer/Meditation – Prayer can bring your frame of mind into alignment with God's will.

 I do not encourage readers to seek out or create conflict merely for the purpose of building discernment, but only to be aware of this benefit whenever conflict arises in the course of living.*

 Notice that LSD, mushrooms, and other psychoactive recreational drugs are not on this list, even though they do increase discernment. The reason they are not included is because these things aid the development of discernment from Satan's perspective, which is severely counterproductive to the life of a believer. Obtaining discernment in this manner is what the Bible calls sorcery, and it is forbidden and condemned in scripture.*

Tete de Femme, by Georges Braque and André Derain, 1939.

Yielding Fruit

In this section, I'll go over which kind of discernment (SD, CD, or ED) can be expected from each of these engagements.

1. Academic Pursuits – This has an immediate impact on CD, but when the topic of study includes spiritually oriented resources (i.e. the Bible), it can affect SD as well.
2. Archetypal Mythos – This affects ED because it creates clearly defined social and psychological boundaries which must be guarded and enforced. When these are regularly practiced, it can increase ones SD. An interaction with trusted or exceptionally astute individuals can improve one's CD.
3. Authenticity – An honest assessment of one's life and self, and facing one's desires and fears tends to improve SD. Depending on the issue, it can also improve CD because it affects how one thinks about things, and/or ED because it impacts relationships.
4. Conflict – This serves to refine ED foremost, but over time and with the aid of other practices listed here, conflict can sharpen one's wits (CD), and induce humility, which can increase SD.
5. Experiencing the Presence of God – Being aware of how God is involved in all things will improve SD immensely. It improves CD in the sense that it makes one aware of how the mind is fundamentally out of touch. If this awareness is accompanied by a sense of peace and inner renewal then it can change how one views others, and this has an indirect effect on SD.

6. Fellowship – In all cases, male bonding has an immediate effect on ED. If the interaction is characterized by confidentiality, deep authentic sincerity, honesty, trust, and some degree of loyalty, then it is possible for a man to get in tune with his SD in the form of "getting real". If the interaction involves a technical field or a plan of action, then this can refine one's CD.
7. Opening your heart in trust and humility – This is the key element of SD, and without it, SD is impossible. Without this, ED is also impossible outside of visually observable cues and indicators.
8. Prayer/Meditation – This has the most immediate impact on SD and CD. ED is affected by extension.

Conclusions

Perhaps the most overlooked sin is the conceit of wishing everything to be much different than what it is to the point of checking out of life. It's a sin because it is basically a patent rejection of all wisdom and discernment. Even if what one wants is for everything to be like what God intended for it to be, if one rejects reality in favor of a dream world, and if one focuses all his efforts into convincing or forcing himself and others to be more obedient to God to that end, then he is still descending into a sinful preference for "perfection" and a solipsistic ease of mind. It is sinful because it obviates any expression of faith.

Ironically (and somewhat surprisingly), this also means that, for many Christians, their applied faith is also their sin. It is a sin because they are using Biblical principles to reject the existential truth of reality and are failing to apply God's truth towards the renewal of their minds and the ministry of the Holy Spirit. This can easily morph into legalism (AKA pharisaicalism), which Jesus roundly condemned.

Related

- Oswald Chambers: The Gateway to the Kingdom (1917 July 21)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021 March 29)
- Σ Frame (Jack): A Man's Ability to Read IOIs Depends on Having a firm Archetypal Mythos (2021 June 18)

Women Rely on a Man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection

Jack · 28 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A woman needs a man like the church needs Christ.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This is part 7 of a series on masculinity.
Length: 2,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

Introduction

A previous post, The Greatest Archetype (2021 May 21) described a comparison of Christ and the church with a man and his wife, using the story of St. Peter. The main driving points of this post are summarized as follows.

- The church/Peter/woman is in a natural state of rebellion against God/man.
- Only when broken and inevitably failing in human weakness, does the church/woman submit to the authority of Christ/husband as head.
- The "born again" experience described in John 3 is not a conscious act of the will. Instead, it has more to do with the breaking of the will (similar to breaking a horse). This "breaking" aspect of the "born again" experience is not something that can be entered into willingly. For most people, it is unexpected, uncontrollable, and it is strongly resisted. (However, it does help if one willingly avoids indulging in idolatry (i.e. spiritual/carnal adultery), which postpones or subverts the "breaking" process.)
- As such, the wife, much like Peter in the example, needs to come to her end as the strong, independent woman that tries to usurp the husband's headship before she will take her role as the helpmate.
- When the church/Peter/woman does get to the point of submission to Christ's/her husband's headship, they/she will start to see the real blessing of peace in their lives/her life.
- When the church/Peter/woman submits to Christ's/husband's headship, it leads to a life of peace for the soul, the blessings associated with a life of peace (not merely or necessarily material blessings) and ultimately the saving grace of Christ.
- God did not make the church/women to be able to bear the responsibility of headship, He made the church/women to fall in line and support Christ's/a man's headship.
- Marital headship is God's model for the family that mirrors that of Christ and the church, albeit without the perfect headship of Christ.
- The marital relationship, with the fullness of intimately knowing another person emotionally, intellectually and physically, is richer and experiences the blessings of peace when it aligns with God's design.

Cornerstone posted a summary of Kohlberg's Stages of Moral Development (2021 June 12). He states that Kohlberg concluded that women did not advance beyond the third stage of conventional morality, in which good intentions are determined by social consensus, and the morality of an action is judged by evaluating its consequences in terms of a person's relationships: "It is OK if everyone else is doing it." Cornerstone further notes that Stages 4-7 of Kohlberg's model are specifically Masculine Stages, and that they are based on Systems Thinking*. Cornerstone correctly identifies this Systems Thinking to be equivalent to Frame, and I will add that this Frame is both individual and societal-wide. It is the building of civilization, the organization of systems, law, and order. Women, apparently, cannot do it. Moreover, this line of reasoning supports the argument that women lack moral agency.

This post will take a look at how a woman is dependent on a man's Frame to rearrange or "break her will", bring structure and meaning to her emotionally disheveled life, and increase her overall value and status as well. Here,

I've collected several snippets of quotes from around the Manosphere that highlight a man's artistry in drawing a woman closer to the heart of God.

Under the post, Parental divorce ruins daughters' future marital commitment and confidence (2021 February 24), Kentucky Headhunter wrote,

> "Studying the impact of women's commitment to marriage is like studying the impact of unicorn farts on global warming.
>
> Women don't have confidence in "the marriage". They have (or don't have) confidence in the man."

This is an interesting perspective which assumes women lack agency and are malleable.

Mike Davis responded with a story that backs this up.

> "[Mike's wife's] parents divorced when she was five, the youngest of four kids. The divorce and the years until she was 18 were contentious. Nothing evil, just a lot of hate and resentment on both sides. Because of this, she saw divorce as an easy option to a marriage not working. She did say I changed her views on this fairly quickly by way of my actions and displaying what a man should be. She had not been exposed to a masculine male role model and did not know what it was supposed to look like. She said I showed her how a marriage could and should be."
>
> Marriage, Sex and More: Is marriage supposed to be forever? Maybe… (2021 February 24)

This implies that the connection between parental divorce and a daughter's loss of confidence in marriage is more nuanced than Whitton, et al. had considered in the paper cited in the post about the effects of parental divorce.

My revised theory is that parental divorce causes daughters to lose confidence or faith in "something" that is intrinsic to her relationships to men (i.e. her father and husband) and this is outwardly observed in (i.e. "represented by" in the study) her confidence and commitment in marriage. I am guessing that this "something" is her hope or her faith in God.

I can also see how this would cause her to be more attracted to a different type of man, probably men who are less marriage minded and more caddish, and choose such a man for marriage, which would also contribute to marital dissolution.

Under Cane Caldo's post, There's No Way Around No (December 14, 2017), Caspar Reyes wrote this gem,

> "While the daughter of Eve is capable of logic and reason, especially in the service of her own illogical and unreasonable ends, she is nonetheless not a man that she will be ruled by logic and reason or rule herself by them. The daughter of Eve was made to be ruled by a man, and this is the crux of the matter. She both desires this and resents it, and will deny it even whilst knowing deep down that it's true."

Quoted from Chateau Heartiste's The Great Men on Loosed Women (2017 September 26) [emphasis mine].

> "…in the Chateau Heartiste definition of modern feminism:
>
> The goal of feminism is to remove all constraints on female sexuality while maximally restricting male sexuality.
>
> Corollary: Radical female equalists seek the destruction of the feminine in women and of the masculine in men.
>
> Constraints on female sexuality enable the full flowering of femininity. Absolute license corrupts femininity. It's a more complicated relationship between sexual restriction and license for men. Constraints on male sexuality channel machismo to beneficial ends in a patriarchal culture, but demoralize men and corrupt their masculinity in a gynarchy such as we live in today in the West."

Also,

> "Pride goes before destruction, a haughty spirit before a fall"
>
> Proverbs 16:18

Under the post, Exposing the Truth to Others (January 1, 2018), Cill said,

> "Regarding introspection, I know women who are in long-lasting relationships. They will give their man shit tests, and if he holds his frame, she will use his responses as a substitute for introspection. I suspect that if he stopped holding his frame, the relationship would not last."

Here, Cill says that a woman uses the man's frame, which would include his estimations of her, as a proxy for introspection. That's deep, and I believe that's right. That would emphasize the feminine need for a spiritual shepherd. It also reveals why the relationship is more solid when the man is the dominant figure in the conflict structure.

earlthomas786 was on to something interesting when he responded to Cill with this gem.

> "While men sometimes have women's response as a part of their introspection… it's often not the biggest or most important. I've probably learned more about myself from spending more time in Eucharistic adoration and prayer and then also from failures… taking on challenges, and learning new skills.
>
> In regard to women, however, if it wasn't for men's responses to [their idiosyncrasies], most of their introspection would be comprised of cat videos, traveling on expensive trips, and whatever is on TV, especially if they are childless. I think once they become mothers their children become their biggest source of introspection… and that's a good thing."

> "Nevertheless she will be saved in childbearing if they continue in faith, love, and holiness, with self-control."
>
> 1st Timothy 2:15 (NKJV)

Of course, a woman first needs a man before she can have children.

J. T. Anderson wrote a guest post a while back, The Satanic Persuasion Formula (2018 January 20), in which he presented a model of how women fall into temptation and sin. The serpent's original persuasion sequence (via. Genesis 3) was outlined in the following steps:

1. Exaggerate the restriction of righteousness
2. Suggest that he's not giving her what she deserves
3. Highlight short-term pleasure, discount long-term pain

The inverse:

1. Dramatize or satirize the burden of folly
2. Discredit the source (suggest a conspiracy)
3. Acknowledge the ego
4. Discount short-term pain against long-term gain

J. T. used the following example as an illustration of what a man could say using the inverse approach.

> "I think it's a shame that so many young women are slaving away the best years of their lives to line the pockets of greedy corporation owners. Who do you think the "women's lib" movement is really helping? We all want our talents to be acknowledged, and those who are greedy like to feed a dream to those who feel unappreciated in exchange for years of what amounts to slave labor. Sure you can have a career. But at what cost? In the end, you find out you were just another cog in someone else's machine. Replaced as quickly as you were let in. Perhaps the initial pains of motherhood aren't nearly as bad as the price of decades of fruitless toil. At least with children, you're investing your effort into something that lasts."

J. T. adds,

> "Granted, if a woman has hardened her heart, she will never be receptive. But if she is merely deceived and pumped up on rhetoric, I believe it can be countered."

J.T.'s idea is worthy of experimental investigation.

Chateau Heartiste's post, Technology And Female Hypergamy, And The Inegalitarian Consequences (2018 January 4), mentions the necessity of men enforcing a degree of discipline over the feminine imperative (which Feminists prefer to label as "oppressive patriarchy").

> "…there was a gut instinct understanding that it was a bad arrangement to alienate 80% of men in an asexual purgatory and break the bonds of nuclear family formation by permitting women to waste years chasing the 20% of men they desire most. These traditional barricades against free-wheeling hypergamy loosened the link between raw female desire and domesticated female behavior. Women may not have liked it (though there is evidence in happiness surveys over time suggesting otherwise — aka the "tyranny of choice" paradox), but tamping down on their unfiltered and unobstructed hypergamous drive certainly was good for society as a whole."

Further on, Roissy describes how the indulgence of the feminine imperative leads to a stronghold of societal suicide.

> "It's kind of a victorious vagina queefback loop: the greater hypergamous freedom women enjoy, the more that institutions have to bend to cater to women's prerogatives, and the more those institutions feminize (by essentially locking out beta males from economic and sexual opportunity) the more hypergamous women become in response."
>
> "Female preference cascades in openly hypergamous societies are accelerating the lockout of beta males from the primest cuts of poon, while also locking out women from motherhood and happiness."

Under Chateau Heartiste's post, Is Male Hypergamy Real? NO (2018 January 5), a commenter going by the pseudonym, Abraham Lincoln, offered a cringeworthy metaphor for female behaviors from the male perspective.

> "Women cannot be held to account because women are unaccountable. Like, if your dog shits in your house, yes, some discipline and probably some anger are in order, but stop and take a breath… who really is at fault > here?”

In his post, When The Red Pill Meets the Crimson Pill, Heartiste offers this insight.

> “Women trust the jerk because they know the jerk won’t tell them whatever he thinks will win their approval. And THAT’S how the jerk, ironically, wins their approval. By not trying for it.”
>
> “A big reason women are attracted to jerkboys is the aversion jerkboys have for acquiescing to anyone’s demands, let alone women’s demands. That delightfully novel and romantically exhilarating jerkboy self-regard leaves a potent impression on women, who see refracted in the trait a forthrightness and strength of character and purpose that is lacking in niceguys.”

From a general reading of the Manosphere, we know that the proverbial ‘jerkboy’ is different from the supplicating betaboy in that he ‘doesn’t care’ about the outcome of the interaction. I make the assertion here, that the reason that the jerkboy doesn’t (seem to) care, could result from two states of mind.

1. He has no vested interest in the outcome (i.e. the pagan jerkboy).
2. He trusts God with the outcome (i.e. the man of faith).

In the first case, the lack of vested interest could arise from a number of reasons. One reason is because he feels no visceral attraction to the woman in question. Another reason could be that he is spinning a few other plates, and isn’t putting all his sperm in one basket. A third possibility is that he might be a Dark Triad sort of personality, who is incapable of any real empathy. All these reasons allow him an added degree of emotional freedom, which in practice, gives him the ability to remain psychologically independent, and thus retain his Frame quite easily

In the second case, the man may or may not have any vested interest in the outcome, as described above, but regardless of this, he believes in the power of his honesty, displays faith in allowing God to work the magic of redemption in the woman’s heart, and gives her the freedom to choose accordingly.

In both of these cases, we see that it is crucial for the man to retain Frame.

Commenter King adds the following gem, which explains the spiritual reason why unregenerated women are attracted to unrefined men.

> "Both men and women are drawn to the truth. The truth is painful, especially to the deluded who have only ever known the intoxication of "pretty lies." Virtuous men are not deterred by pain because it is the sign of proximity to truth."
>
> "Women trust the jerk because, especially today, truth telling itself is defined as "jerkiness." How dare you upset our fraudulent tranquility! But once she submits to the truth, the utility of being a 'jerk' vanishes."

Yes, women are attracted to the 'jerkboy', but only during the early stages of programming.

Conclusions

The state of being unregenerated, viz. feral, is the factory default setting for humans, and especially for females of the species. I am sure there are a few regenerated women out there, but good luck finding them.

As evidenced in these quotations and comments, a woman needs a man to set her straight so that she does not destroy herself, the family, and society at large. Within Christian doctrine, this form of shelter and security for the woman is called a "spiritual covering". A man needs to be disciplined and do a considerable amount of work in order to provide a proper spiritual covering to a woman.

A righteous man will have to start from scratch, choose an undefiled woman wisely, and mold her into a regenerated state. Believing in Christ introduces a parallel universe in which it is possible to escape the feral nature of the self, and the traps and machinations of others.

Men need regeneration as well. Unfortunately, it is rather common for women to be unable to discern the underlying state of mind within a man who remains emotionally and psychologically independent from her, which leads many (initially) innocent women down the ravaging path of revilement, heartbreak, and eventually the exhilarating but d@mning carousel.

Women need strong, faithful male influences, as well as other, wiser women, to help them tell the difference, choose wisely, and resist temptation.

Related

 Systems Thinking is an overall dynamic evaluation that simplifies complex dynamic systems into a collection of positive and negative causal feedback loops covering a time delay. It considers the causality of events as a whole, so it can integrate seemingly independent events and divergent data to understand the overall interaction. Thus, when faced with complex interrelated events, a Systems Thinking approach can analyze problems in general through the exploration of causal relationships and information feedback, and can overcome the erroneous cognitions caused by intuitive thinking and subjective judgments, and thus, can solve the problem thoroughly. A scientific coverage of Systems Thinking was introduced by P.M. Senge in his book,* The Fifth Discipline: The Art and Practice of the Learning Organization, Doubleday, 2006.

- Chateau Heartiest: Chicks Dig Jerks In Every Way: The Science (May 18, 2012)
- Σ Frame: Discipline in Marriage

When walking on eggshells, step boldly!

Jack · 30 June 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A deeper understanding of the risks and benefits of opening up to a woman.

Readership: All
Length: 2,600 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes

This is the 8th post of a series on masculinity. Here is the full list of posts in this series.

1. Σ Frame: Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity (2021/6/14)
2. Σ Frame: Do men need talk therapy? (2021/6/16)
3. Σ Frame: Entering Manhood (Rite of Passage) (2021/6/18)
4. Σ Frame: A Man's Ability to Read IOIs Depends on Having a Firm Grasp on His Personal Archetypal Mythos (2021/6/21)*
5. Σ Frame: Men's Fantasy of Emotional Intimacy (2021/6/23)
6. Σ Frame: 8 Things that Increase Discernment (2021/6/25)
7. Σ Frame: Women rely on a man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection (2021/6/28)
8. Σ Frame: When walking on eggshells, step boldly! (2021/6/30)
9. Σ Frame: Answers to the Exit Questions for the Series on Masculinity (2021/7/2)

Of note, this series received a few responses from around the Manosphere.

- Radix Fidem: God Doesn't Play Games (2021/6/23)
- Radix Fidem: Don't Kill It (2021/6/24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: The fallacy of teaching men to be emotionally honest part 2 (2021/6/24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: "That all changed after we married…" (2021/6/28)
- Adam Piggott: Husbands must not unburden themselves (2021/7/6)

This post will summarize the major conclusions from this series.

Definitions of “Maturity”

The subject of maturity was introduced in the first post. It was noted that self-centered, solipsistic women are prone to psychological projection, and have their own definition of maturity that fits the following descriptions.

1. Any symptom of human frailty is boyish immaturity.
2. Anything she feels is undignified or makes her feel embarrassed or ashamed is juvenile.
3. Any interest in stereotypically masculine interests (e.g., drinking, fitness training, sports, hobbies, territory marking behaviors, etc.) is seen as immaturity.
4. A lack of “respect” is regarded as immaturity.*
5. Anything extraneous to the feminine imperative is labeled boyish immaturity.

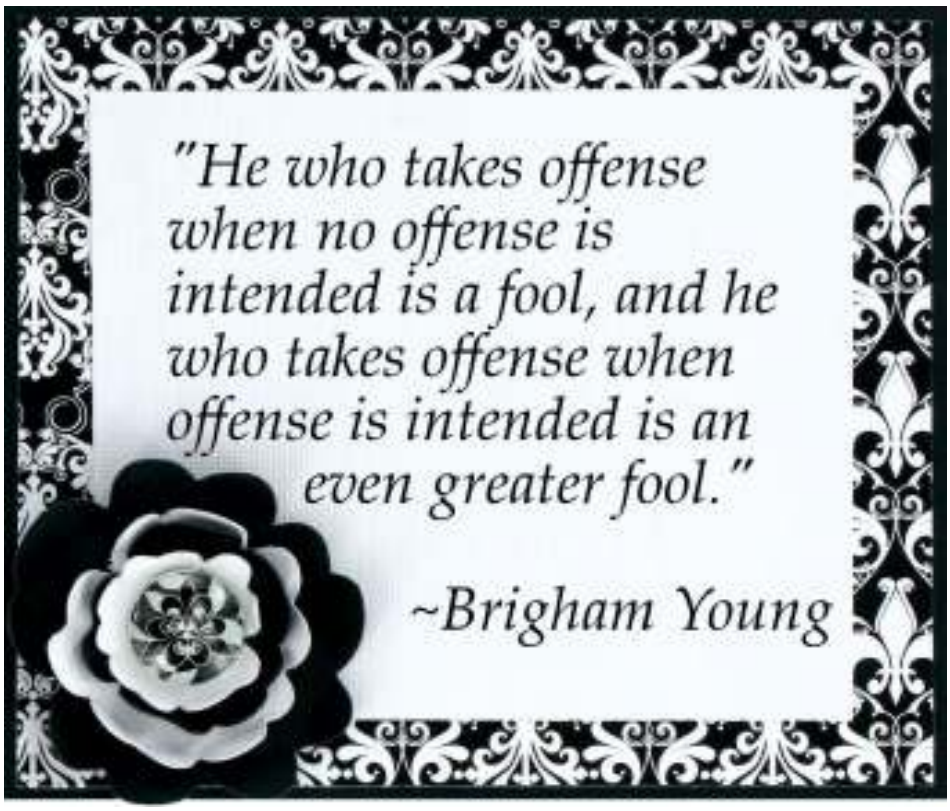
 Women have their own definition of “respect” as well. He must defer obeisant fealty to her royal pain-in-the-@$$ imagined feminine dominance, and if he doesn’t, then he is being disrespectful to her.*

As Deep Strength pointed out,

> “The issue is not maturity though. A woman’s preconceived notions of what they think is “mature” or not is their will manifesting as pride: they think they know what is better than the man they are with and are setting themselves up as the judge of that.”

Yes, and although this is a false concept of maturity, being aware of this fact allows men to translate the femtalk code.

IMHO, immaturity may be better understood as a lack of maturity. Maturity is a complex topic that I will address in a future post. &



Definitions of "Weakness"

In previous comments, the discussion of mens' weaknesses were generally contained within three different categories.

1. Weaknesses due to Human Frailty – Depression, emotional wounds, errors, failures, flaws, foibles, hurts, illness, injuries, imperfections, joblessness, mistakes, pains, screwups, setbacks, and personal struggles.
2. Weaknesses in Character/Personality – Evading responsibility, lack of applied intelligence, lack of self-control, lack of self-discipline, mental issues, moral defects, physically abusive, rebelliousness, self-justification, sexual promiscuity, substance abuse/addiction, etc.
3. Weaknesses in Confidence/Faith –Cowardly, effeminate, having a flaccid will, indecisive, insufficiently determined to "finish the job" well, and a willingness to fold at the first setback, loss, or difficulty.

Generally speaking, Alpha's don't show weaknesses of any variety. It seems to be their personal code of situational ethics. Alpha's are exceptionally good at covering their weaknesses, and/or recasting/transforming their weaknesses into strengths. Some women will be blinded by the Alpha-ness, and only see a man who has a resilient ego and is impervious to weakness. Women may choose to be content with this impression and consider this to be sufficient for their hypergamous ego needs.

Robin Williams and Paul Dooley star as Popeye (foreground) and J. Wellington "Wimpy" (background) respectively (1980).

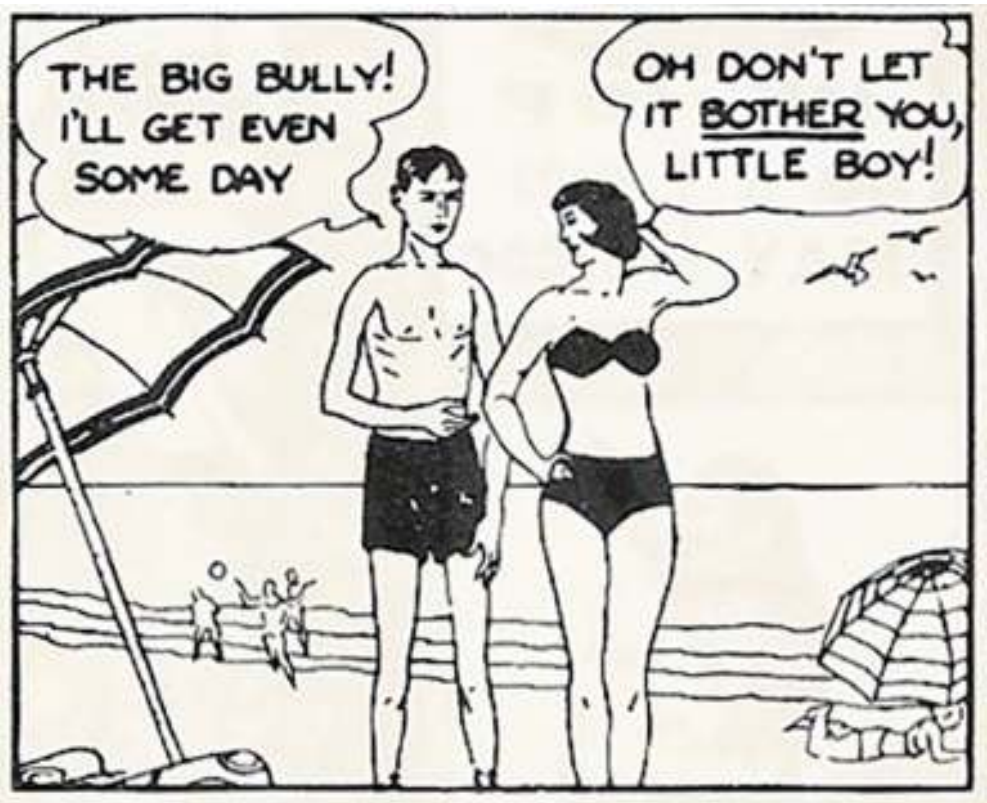
Concerning womens' weaknesses, a previous scientific study of Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (2017/11/15) revealed that women who have the following traits are usually considered (by men) to be weaker than others.

1. Women who have been abused, or who are more emotionally needy, i.e. who have an intense craving for closeness.
2. Women who are rude, ungrateful, disrespectful, domineering, and therefore cannot maintain a satisfying relationship with a man who desires to be close to them.
3. Women who have been rejected by men, who consequently have a greater desire for closeness.
4. Sexually frigid women, or women with an exceedingly low SMV/MMV, whom men do not want to be close to.
5. Women who have had intimate, sexual relationships with a number of men, and thus have gained certain emotional needs/expectations which cannot be satisfied through closeness to any one man.
6. Women who lack the skills and abilities required to meet others' needs, which reduces the power they have in maintaining closeness.

It is interesting to note that all of these indicators of womens' weaknesses fit within the second category of mens' weaknesses — Weaknesses in Character/Personality. Women are not considered weak because of their Human Frailties nor their lack of Faith/Confidence. After all, they are women!

Aside from the Alpha-apex fallacy, different women have different views of mens' weaknesses. In general, more mature women are more forgiving of human frailty, and less so about character flaws. Less mature women prioritize human strengths, and are more accepting of character flaws. Men are strongly disqualified by most all women for weaknesses in Confidence/Faith.

The interplay between mens' and womens' views of emotional vulnerability and weakness will be explored in the next four sections. Remember that the arguments about weakness are subject to the respective definitions given above.



The Difference Between Emotional Vulnerability and Weakness

This is Deti's first point in a comment. He describes the case in which a woman is blinded by Alphaness/Tingles and is never faced with existential concerns.

> "There's a difference between vulnerability and weakness."
>
> "A woman is fine seeing a man's vulnerability, IF AND ONLY IF:

1. She is very sexually attracted to him, so hard sexually attracted to him she can't even see straight (e.g., Elspeth, Liz, and Mychael)
    1. Those vulnerabilities do not affect her personally, threaten her home or children, or threaten to put her in the poorhouse
    2. Those vulnerabilities are temporary and resolve on their own with no action or intervention from her.

> She is NOT EVER fine seeing him weak, or wounded, or down and out, or down on his luck."

An excellent example of this is the famous interview with Flex Lewis in which he talks about his pain and suffering in his efforts to win a championship, while the two female reporters are totally $h!t faced with visceral desire for him.

The Difference between a Man's Desire for Love and his Desire for Respect

This is Deti's second point.

> "There's also a difference between a man's desire for love and his desire for respect.
>
> It is NOT the "desire of a man's heart to be loved on the basis of [her] intimate knowledge [of him]". That's love he gets from Mom. It IS the desire of a man's heart that his wife respect him on the basis of recognition of > his abilities, strengths, and position."

>
> "…a man does not "desire to be loved on the basis of intimate knowledge". He desires to be RESPECTED based on her knowledge of his abilities, strengths, and position."

Superposed on top of this is the fact that men feel loved when they are able to open up in humility and Heart Trust, and speak freely about their thoughts, emotions, fears, and desires, without any fear of backlash, and still be respected by the woman!

The problem is that men often fail to exercise discernment as to whether a woman is actually capable of offering either love or respect, and therefore he opens up under the assumption that it is right to do so, or that honesty is important, or merely because he desires to be loved by her. As a general rule of thumb (for those men who are weak in discernment), a woman is not going to offer this kind of acceptance, understanding, and love unless and until she is already in the regular habit of offering respect.

The Difference between How a Woman interprets the Intimacy of Emotional Vulnerability and her Revulsion of Seeing Certain Weaknesses in Him

Here's Deti's third point. This is where things get confusing for men and sticky for women.

> "And yet another difference between a woman knowing a man intimately; and a woman seeing a man at his worst when he's down, down on his luck, knocked down, wounded and weak.
>
> Knowing a man intimately is a woman knowing her man's likes, dislikes, personality, foibles, quirks, idiosyncracies, routines, and the way he lives his life day in day out.
>
> A woman does NOT want to know intimately a man's wounds, weaknesses, injuries, hurts, pains, failures, setbacks, mistakes, screw-ups, and struggles. Or, if she knows them, she wants to just know of them, and know that he's taking care of them on his own with no help from her, and that those things will not affect her, her kids, or her access to resources. She needs to make sure that no matter what, the resource flow to her and her kids continues uninterrupted. No matter what else is going on with him, he needs to make damn sure she's getting what she needs. Doesn't matter if he's hurt, in pain, dealing with wounds, or whatever – the money needs to keep flowing, or else she's OUT."

Here, Deti is describing a very specific kind of interaction. In more general terms, whatever weaknesses the man has, it cannot be something that affects her peculiar set of emotional and psychological needs. Again, this varies somewhat from woman to woman. The problem is that most men bumble into a relationship while being totally ignorant of what she sees in him that is attractive to her. Because of his lack of self-awareness, he doesn't know what to reveal to her, and what not to reveal, and so she becomes upset and offended by those things that she is sensitive to, and he is totally unaware of why she lost her cool. But if a man can show emotional vulnerability without crossing her sacred inviolable combination of Tingle factors, then this can increase intimacy between them.

For most men, this is more trouble than it is worth, given the insufferable quality of women that are available these days. They'll never come out and explicitly say what they want and need, and they'll never do what Hanging with Mi suggests in the next video.

To some extent, a woman must take up the slack. In the following video, Hanging with Mi describes how women can restrain themselves from their own relationship destroying habits. These habits allow a man to come out of his shell and experience humility, peace, and joy in the relationship.

The next section will address the main reason why women cannot do this.

Women are Fearful of Weak Men

Deti wrote about how women are incapable of dealing with perceived weaknesses in men [edited for clarity]. Ultimately, it boils down to her own personal weaknesses combined with a lack of faith.

> "What also factors into this is the women's/wives' character flaws. Because of those flaws, those women are damaged if not completely broken. A damaged or broken woman cannot handle vulnerability or weakness in men. She can't countenance damage or breakage in others – because she herself is damaged and broken. She needs him to be strong because she can't do it- things in her are damaged and broken. This prevents men from showing vulnerability because if she sees a man vulnerable or wounded, alarm bells go off in her head –
>
> "He can't take care of me! He can't help me! He's gonna get killed! He's gonna get me killed! He's gonna get our kids killed! We're gonna lose everything! We're gonna end up in the poorhouse!! OH MY GOD!!! GET ME AWAY FROM HIM!!"
>
> That's the dynamic."

The problem here is that every man has his own set of weaknesses, and these weaknesses cannot be made to vanish overnight. To some extent, the woman must accept this as a fact of life, and those who cannot will always be disappointed with the man.

NovaSeeker further explained why men cannot show vulnerability, and why this is more important after marriage.

> "[Women] catalog everything we [men] say or do that shows any sort of vulnerability or weakness away in their brains and later on that information and knowledge is deployed against you in some way. It often doesn't happen immediately, and in the context of a BF/GF relationship with a woman who is not naturally toxic/BPD/etc., it can seem to work ok. But when the marriage comes into force, the entire power dynamic is forcibly shifted, and you will eventually have all of that info come back and be used against you, either openly or covertly, in how she decides to "manage" you."

Emotionally healthy and spiritually mature women are exceedingly rare. Most women are like hungry, wounded animals. Even though you might be trying to help them, they will still lash out and bite, and they will hit you where you are most vulnerable.

Conclusions

Red Pill Apostle wrote a summary which forms an excellent conclusion here.

> "…the reality [is] that many women, when faced with her husband being open about his fears, his doubts, his desires, react very poorly. Shaming. Manipulation. Anger. These are the responses many of us get from our wives. It only takes so long before a man, me included, realizes that the burden of not opening up to his wife is less than the burden of opening up to her.
>
> Part of the burden is not having someone to ease the load at times. Part of the burden is knowing that the girl you have chosen as your one and only, the person who your heart should be safe with does not have the same capacity for depth of intimacy. So we assess our relationship in the world we actually live in, determine the pleasantries, some fun times in each other's company, enough physical intimacy to satisfy the itch and common goals are enough to continue to build a life that is better than most.
>
> But get to the point where you can trust your wife with your heart when she's been so reckless over the years? It's a long shot that is probably not going to work out well. This is why Proverbs 31:10-12 says,
>
> "A wife of noble character who can find? She is worth far more than rubies. Her husband has full confidence in her and lacks nothing of value. She brings him good, not harm, all the days of her life."

If a man has such a wife, he might be able to feel the freedom, heartfelt love, and joy that comes of sharing his whole heart, mind, and soul with her. But for some men, this deeper understanding only comes in old age, after being married for decades, when nothing really matters anymore. The majority of men never make it that far, probably because they say too much, too honestly, in their desire for greater intimacy with their wives.

Related

1. Σ Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009/12/28)
2. Illimitable Men: The Game of Power (2014/4/22)
3. Illimitable Men: Understanding Female Psychology (2016/3/16)
4. Σ Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (2017/11/15)
5. Σ Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018/2/15)
6. Σ Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (2018/2/27)
7. Σ Frame (J.T. Anderson): Moulding an Excellent Wife (2018/3/5)
8. Σ Frame: Apprehending True Humility (2019/47)
9. Σ Frame: The Trust Factor (2019/4/18)
10. Σ Frame: 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (2019/4/23)
11. Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (2019/4/28)
12. Σ Frame: Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing. (2020/1/27)
13. Σ Game: There is No Emotional Safety (2025/7/25)

Answers to the Exit Questions for the Series on Masculinity

Jack · 2 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Explicit answers to the questions that were brought up earlier posts.

Readership: All
Length: 2,200 words
Reading Time: 7.5 minutes
Reader's Note: This is the 9th and last post of a series on masculinity. Here is the full list of posts in this series.

1. Σ Frame: Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity (2021 June 14)
2. Σ Frame: Do men need talk therapy? (2021 June 16)
3. Σ Frame: Entering Manhood (Rite of Passage) (2021 June 18)
4. Σ Frame: A Man's Ability to Read IOIs Depends on Having a Firm Grasp on His Personal Archetypal Mythos (2021 June 21)
5. Σ Frame: Men's Fantasy of Emotional Intimacy (2021 June 23)
6. Σ Frame: 8 Things that Increase Discernment (2021 June 25)
7. Σ Frame: Women rely on a man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection (2021 June 28)
8. Σ Frame: When walking on eggshells, step boldly! (2021 June 30)
9. Σ Frame: Answers to the Exit Questions for the Series on Masculinity (2021 July 2)

Of note, this series received a few responses from around the Manosphere.

- Radix Fidem: God Doesn't Play Games (2021 June 23)
- Radix Fidem: Don't Kill It (2021 June 24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: The fallacy of teaching men to be emotionally honest part 2 (2021 June 24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: "That all changed after we married…" (2021 June 28)
- Adam Piggott: Husbands must not unburden themselves (2021 July 6)

Based on the insights and arguments tendered in the discussions, I'll answer the questions that were posed in this series of posts.

Questions and Answers

Q1. Is it possible for a man to experience a deep, emotionally humbling love for a woman without taking the risk of "opening up" to her in the manner described here?

A1. NO – A man can love a woman in other ways, including Agape love, tough love, washing her clean, and so on, but without honesty and humility, his joyful enthusiasm will always be lacking. If sexual intimacy doesn't take up the slack, I think there would be little else that could hold his heart in the relationship, outside of willful commitment (e.g., for the children's sake, or to maintaining economic integrity, etc.). Unfortunately, too many marriages are solely fueled by male willpower.

Q2. Is men's desire for honesty and openness with their wives just a quirky conceited fantasy, or is this how God intends for men to "love their wives"?

A2. It is God's will for men to be authentic, honest, and open with their wives, and for men to experience intimacy, humility, and joy in doing so. Most men who have successful marriages (Ed, Scott, and I) will readily agree with this. However, this only works out well for men who have the following traits.

- Have very few weaknesses that are intolerable to women.
- Can generate the venerable Tingles in their wives (which blinds the woman to the man's weaknesses).
- Have a wife who has a generous will, and is faithful enough to overlook or forgive anything she perceives as a weakness.
- Have a wife who is emotionally stable and spiritually mature enough to know how to micromanage her own emotions and deal with problems and setbacks.

As can be seen by the items on this list, whether or not a man can be honest with his wife depends largely on the character of his wife.

When these traits are lacking, she will interpret his honesty as him dumping his worries and grief onto her. This will make her insecure and vexed, and she will attempt to dump this anxiety back onto the man. Thus, it is extremely unwise for a man to be gut wrenchingly honest and emotionally vulnerable in front of his wife, because this will be perceived as a weakness. The weakness plays on her insecurities and fears, and gives her mind (1) some evidence that she should listen to Satan and (2) a justifiable reason to lose faith and defect.

Deep Strength says it is a fallacy to teach men to be emotionally honest, and in essence, he is saying that men's desire for deep authentic honesty with a woman is merely a fantasy. But I say it is not a fallacy at all. It only appears to be a fallacy for men who don't have the traits listed above, and who don't have a woman who is sufficiently mature. (Granted, this is most men.) If the wife is wholly untrustworthy, intractable, and intransigent, then yes, it is a fantasy to those men.

Q3. Should a woman ever be expected to be a faithful, loyal listener when a man needs to talk things through?

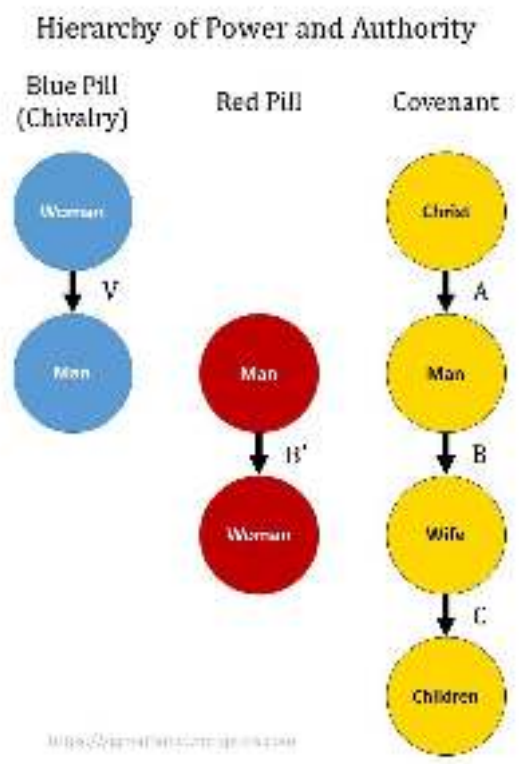
A3. As a theoretical ideal, yes. In reality, no.

Eric Francis Silk answered this question well.

> "They say that the relationship between husband and wife is like the relationship between God and us.
>
> Well… We know considerably less about God's mind/heart than God knows about our minds/hearts."

Deti said,

> "Right. When a man has problems, fears, anxieties, despair, depression, etc., he's to go to God with it. He's to go to other men with it (iron sharpening iron). Men are iron; women are cheesecloth, or in some cases Brillo pads. Cheesecloth does not sharpen iron. Brillo pads do not sharpen iron; they're just abrasive irritants.
>
> Children go to parents, usually Mom, with problems.
>
> Wife goes to husband with problems.
>
> Husband goes to God with problems.
>
> Children respect/submit to parents; wife respects/submits to husband; husband respects/submits to God.
>
> God loves husband; husband loves wife, wife loves children."



Q4. Do women know that men fall for women with whom they can be humble and honest, and use this to control and manipulate men?

A4. YES – This is the primary reason why women are accepting of a man's honesty before marriage, and very harsh and discriminatory afterwards. In another post, I examined What changes after marriage? (2022-3-4).

Q5. If a woman/wife insists on being the talk therapist to a man, is this her will manifesting as pride, as DS described?

A5. YES – A man should feel comfortable in opening up spontaneously with her. She should not try to force it into the open, or coerce him to talk about his feelings. Furthermore, if a woman does, this, it is taken by a man as disrespect.

Scott offered an alternative explanation when he said,

> "The most likely scenario is she is repeating what she has been conditioned to repeat. Than men need to talk about their feelings more. But she doesn't actually believe it. The analog of this is men who say they love kick ass girls with guns. They only think they are supposed to say this."

Q6. If a man cannot face, deal with, or talk about his feelings, does this mean that he is weak or immature in some way?

A6. NO – Scott said,

> "Cannot" is a loaded term here. But if we take it face value, it is more likely that he feels there is no he can talk to about it."

I'll add that he might have some issues that he is not able to put into words. It might also mean he cannot trust others enough to open up. Whether this truly indicates a weakness depends on the man on a case-by-case basis, but it should be noted that while an inability to "get honest" might be an indicator that a weakness is lurking, a man's inability to talk about his feelings openly and on demand does not constitute a weakness by itself.

The issue of maturity, as was discussed in the first post in this series, is a little more nuanced, but the answer is still NO. This is because women have a false concept of "maturity". (See Post 8 in the series.) Dalrock wrote about this compounding effect of societal decay in his post, Connecting the pathological fear of husbands having power with the peter pan manboy syndrome. (2012 October 4)

Q7. Is it worth trying to educate women that their husbands will love them more deeply and more genuinely if they would allow him to "open up" his Heart Trust and humility, and honestly communicate his thoughts and feelings without any backlash?

A7. YES — In theory, it is definitely worth it. But in practice, education alone may not be effective because of women's inherent weaknesses in dealing with perceived weaknesses in men.

I find it ironically hilarious that not one, but two examples of this futility came up in the comments. I'll convey these two examples as case studies.

Case Study 1 – Shame is as shame does, not what we say about it.

Under the 5th post in this series, there was a conversation between Cameron, Deti, Elspeth, Liz, et al. It all began when Liz mentioned an old Chateau Heartiste post, Petraeus and the Infidelity Risk Curve (2012 November 15). There was a disagreement about how Petraeus' wife was shamed in various ways. Liz took the position that (1) she was a good wife. (2) Heartiste's post shamed her, and (3) she doesn't deserve that. The sentiment from the men was that, (1) Heartiste's post, rude though it may be, was simply common sense. (2) She shamed both herself and Petraeus by "letting herself go" way too far (as the wife of such a powerful man). (3) She inadvertently subjected Petraeus to temptation as a byproduct. (4) Petraeus shamed both himself and his wife by having an affair. (5) Heartiste is a nihilistic prick, but even so, (6) there's no shame in talking about it. To make a long tiff short, I believe all of the chatter can be summed up in one statement from Deti,

> "No one disagrees with the Red Pill. They just hate it when you talk about Red Pill."

Yes, because when you do, you're serving up slices of humble pie, and if the shoe fits, well, you've just helped someone understand their own problem, and shamed the ɦəl1 out of them in the process…

Case Study 2 – Love Overlooks a Fault

There was another discussion focused on whether mens' weaknesses (by various definitions) affects a woman's view of him. The women, who happen to be very happily married, could not be convinced that their husbands had any significant weaknesses.

In closure of this discussion, Deti wrote,

> "I am convinced that I am dealing with extreme, extreme outliers in the Manosphere Ladies' Auxiliary (MLA). Women in the MLA are not anything like women in the real, actual, functioning everyday world. Not at all."

Yes, the MLA are extreme outliers — unicorns that never fart! And these are women who already agree with the larger points being made on this blog (based on their stated interactions with their husbands, if not cognitively). Yet even with them, it proved to be very difficult to get the point across that all men have intrinsic weaknesses. We can't know how open their husbands have actually been with them, so I will presume their stubbornness is because they can't cognitively admit the fact without doubting their faith. We might be annoyed by their disagreeableness, but in this particular matter, this is to be commended of them.

Comprehensively, this conversation sums up the overriding message of this series – that a major piece of intersexual communication is transmitted by faith alone, and that love overlooks a fault. Without this faith and love, marriage is stormy.

Q8. What is your guiding star? Is it a deeply inspired personal mythos combined with a divine purpose for living, or are your psychological assessments guided by something else?

A8. This question is deeply personal, and each man must find the answer for himself. I will only say that it is unwise to place your trust in a wife, if both your confidence in yourself, and your trust in God are not significantly greater. Therefore, your mythos must transcend that of merely having a harmonious marriage. Instead, it must rest on something larger and greater.

Conclusions

A chain is only as strong as its weakest link. Make sure you know your ball and chain well before you anchor your soul to her by pouring your heart out in honesty and humility. Of course, it's God's will that you should do so, but good luck pulling that off!

Related

1. Σ Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009 December 28)
2. Illimitable Men: The Game of Power (2014 April 22)
3. Illimitable Men: Understanding Female Psychology (2016 March 16)
4. Σ Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (2017 November 15)
5. Σ Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018 February 15)
6. Σ Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (2018 February 27)
7. Σ Frame (J.T. Anderson): Moulding an Excellent Wife (2018 March 5)
8. Σ Frame: Apprehending True Humility (2019 April 7)
9. Σ Frame: The Trust Factor (2019 April 18)
10. Σ Frame: 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (2019 April 23)
11. Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (2019 April 28)
12. Σ Frame: Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing. (2020 January 27)

Korea pushes back!

Jack · 5 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Korean Men are not tolerating feminism.

Readership: All
Reader's Note: The theme for July is "Market Forces".
Length: 900 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Introduction

In the west, most Asian societies are considered to be "backwards". One significant cultural characteristic contributing to this impression is the fact that Asian societies are more Patriarchal. But as long as Westerners see Patriarchy as backwards, then they won't be able to realize that they are the ones who may be facing in the wrong direction.

More evidence of Asia's inadequate effort towards embracing feminist postmodernism has appeared in an article going under a snarky headline in the Los Angeles Times (2021 June 11), and then in The Economist (2021 June 19). A paywall-free version with an ill-appropriate backward title appeared on Breaking News World: Young men in South Korea feel victimized by feminism (2021 June 17).

The bias of the article is clearly evident early on where it says,

> "South Korea scores poorly on measures of equality between the sexes. The "glass-ceiling index" compiled by the Economist Intelligence Unit, a sister company of The Economist, rates it the worst rich country in which to be a working woman."

By extension, we might read through the bias and smugly conclude that South Korea is one of the best countries in which to be a working man.

This article has two seemingly unrelated stories about South Korea: one is about a backlash of criticism directed at a distasteful sporting ad, and the other is about a newly elected political figure famous for his anti-feminist stances. At first reading, I had the idea that this article was a hedge podge of Korean news bits. But when I realized that the only thing these two stories had in common is the unpopularity of feminism in South Korea, then I recognized it as a sleight of editorial backhand intended to buffer the western view of Asia as backwards — which is backwoods backhand for backwards backlash.

Male Disrespect is not Tolerated

The main issue of contention cited in these articles is an advertisement for a camping equipment company, GS25.

> "WAS IT MERELY an innocent sausage? Last month a poster promoting camping kit sold by GS25, a chain of shops in South Korea, included an illustration of two fingers reaching out to grasp a steaming banger. Angry young men complained. They said the detail, which resembled an emoji that depicts a hand making a pinching gesture, was a hidden insult planted by feminists. As everyone [in Korea] knows, the symbol is commonly used when mocking the size of a man's penis."

Camping is a popular pastime in Asia, and just like in the west, camping is primarily of interest to, and driven by men. But just like Gillette did in the west, GS25 has lost touch with their constituents and stepped into the western practice of man bashing, as suggested by this photo.

But it seems unlikely that these corporate attempts to remold culture will be accepted by men on the other side of the third rock. Backwards or not, froward Korean men aren't willing to doff their hats to feminism, as forward western men have been so passively eager to do.

> "Many young men take a different view. In a survey conducted in 2019, some 60% of men in their twenties said that discrimination against women was not a serious issue. More than two-thirds said that unfairness towards men was the big problem. They said they felt disadvantaged by South Korea's marriage culture, job market, and the application of its laws. Compulsory military service, which applies only to men, is a particular grievance. "We have to compete against women after sacrificing 22 months for the country," says a 25-year-old surnamed Jung. "We just want compensation for our sacrifice."

It sounds like Korean men are making their mission, not their women, their priority.* Bravo!

 Chateau Heartiste's Third Commandment of Korean Poontang*

Political Activism

Although it is practically unknown to Westerners, the hidden hand of convergence reaches silently around the world groping for a banger to pinch. But apparently, there is a growing political support for "opposition" to the new gynocentric status quo. The article mentions a 36-year-old Mr. Lee Jun-Seok who was just elected the leader of South Korea's main opposition party.

Mr. Lee Jun-Seok, newly elected leader of South Korea's Opposition Party.

> "Mr Lee has railed against radical feminism. He said the ruling party performed poorly in mayoral elections in April because it focused too much on pleasing female voters and had "underestimated" young males. He has promised to abolish quotas for women in the PPP and wants to restore "fairness" to the political process by using tests to choose his party's candidates. This appeals to many young men, more than three-quarters of whom voted for the conservatives in the recent mayoral election in Seoul. "Most of my friends feel discriminated against in some way and that's why we support Lee Jun-Seok," says Mr. Jung. "It's not about anti-feminism, it's about fair competition."

The Korean concept of "fairness" is particularly interesting. "Fairness" just isn't fair without prioritizing male opportunity and preserving the Patriarchal social structure.

> "Among his biggest fans are men in their twenties who feel victimised by South Korea's increasingly vocal feminist movement."

It is interesting to me how western men have completely bowed to the power of the V, rather enthusiastically, and almost without opposition, whereas Korean men are putting their foot down before too much ground has been lost.

> "He may struggle to find more policies that can unite his young fans with his party's older and crustier supporters. These include evangelical Christians with a penchant for conspiracy theories whom many in the PPP find embarrassing. […] His ambition to abolish quotas for women and young people will irk other party leaders, some of whom are young women."

Here we see that the typical profile of Christianity is also "backwards". Korean Christians are investigating conspiracy theories and seriously questioning all that is happening in the world, while in the west, Christianity has rolled over and is begging for another slap around.

> "A conservative landslide in the mayoral elections suggests voters are souring on the leftish government of > President Moon Jae-in, which has been damaged by scandals of its own and delays to vaccinations against covid-19. Mr Lee's popularity will aid whomever the PPP nominates to run for the presidency next year — among some male voters, at least. Women may find him less impressive."

Mr. Lee is too young to run for the presidency right now (the minimum age is 40). But it will be interesting to see how this culture war plays out over the next few years.

Related

- A discussion over at Reddit covers this story as well.
- Σ Frame: Cultural Influences (2021 May 5)

Why challenge the character of your wife?

Jack · 7 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Kindness and Grace are not what we are led to believe.

Readership: Christians; Married Men;
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

> There are three things which are too wonderful for me,
> Yes, four which I do not understand:
> The way of an eagle in the air,
> The way of a serpent on a rock,
> The way of a ship in the midst of the sea,
> And the way of a man with a virgin.
>
> Proverbs 30:18-19 (NKJV)

Introduction

Kindness, properly understood as a spiritual characteristic, is the impartation of the quality of acceptance into God's presence and His world of Shalom. Grace is when one is given the opportunity to enter into that Shalom when one is yet unqualified or unfit to do so. (The term "unearned" is often used, but I feel this is a misnomer, since it cannot be earned.) Once the doorway to Shalom has been opened to an individual by the power of God's kindness and grace, it is expected that the individual will realize that there is a parallel paradigm in which to navigate life and that through the participatory experience, one will learn to adapt and become a part of the Covenant Life.

Modern Christians, and many non-Christians as well, have somehow gained the notion that kindness and grace are "nice", patient, polite, soft, and "caring" — something akin to agape love. While this may often be the case, this quality is not absolutely necessary, and can sometimes work against the process of integration. I won't pretend to know where this notion came from (maybe we'll figure it out as we go), but I'll guess that it went hand in hand with chivalry and the feminization of Christianity.

This post will examine how kindness and grace are not very "nice" in the context of intersexual interactions and marital sanctification.

An Unregenerated Character is a Loose Cannon

From an evo-psyche perspective, the goal is procreation, while simultaneously, the goal of the Holy Spirit is our sanctification. For kindness and grace to take effect, there are various "obstacles" to these goals that need to be "removed".

In the Answers to the Exit Questions for the Series on Masculinity (2021-07-02), one of the conclusions was that the character of the wife is a large determinant of whether or not a man can be honest with her.

RedPillBoomer wrote,

> "This got me to thinking about my wife and her character. Whether it's the ability to be honest around her or really anything else we do as a couple, a lot of what makes our relationship work is her character. Yes, there is/was visceral attraction, and as important as that was back in the day when we met, the character issue was as important, and probably more important to making the marriage last in the long run."
>
> "So, it's not just about 'maintaining frame' and all the other stuff we guys are supposed to do that makes it work. Her character is/was the difference maker. In other words, I could have done all that stuff and it still would not have worked out in the long run if she didn't have the character."

In other words, the standard implementation of Frame and Game is not consistently effective towards sanctification (i.e. entering into a state of Covenant Shalom). In order for her to be cooperative to this end, she must first be made to "see" the parallel paradigm.

Deep Strength responded,

> "Generally, "reframing" fixes most of these issues. If you're going to emote and cry over a fear or worry you have that's generally something that a woman would do. Some men do this. Their women are repulsed. Sharing it the "masculine" way per se by indicating that this could be an issue and sharing it with a wife and asking her suggestions without getting overly emotional and problem solving the issue is good potential leadership.

> It seems to me that some of the issue might be the way in which someone does something rather than what they are actually doing. The way in which a confident man would ask out a woman rather than a timid man is pretty stark even setting aside physical appearance."

There are a couple things about Deep Strength's viewpoint that need further explanation. First, early in a relationship, it is necessary for the man to construct the Covenant relational archetype by being assertive, confident, and masculine. In other words, he must establish Headship. This is Deep Strength's point. However, this alone is not enough to impart the kindness and grace necessary to draw her into Shalom.

Secondly, if a man is going to be totally honest and authentic, then he doesn't have much of a choice about whether it will come off as "masculine" or "feminine". The only choice he has is whether to go on pretending to be what he thinks he should be (which is usually much easier), or to be real. If he chooses the latter, then when the real person comes out, whatever is inside will be manifested, quirks, farts, warts and all.

The value of being honest and authentic is that it is a confession/profession of character – it allows the real person to come out where it can be seen and dealt with, and this creates an opportunity for any shortcomings to be improved. It is a step towards grace. It also helps others understand the man for who he really is, and not what people want to think about him.

The problem with this is that if the man is not sufficiently mature, then taking this approach may benefit his own growth, but it does not fit the Covenant relational archetype, and will not yield any sanctification in an intersexual relationship. This is the main point that Adam Piggott made in his critique, Husbands must not unburden themselves (2021 July 6).

Deep Strength continues [emphasis mine],

> "I can choose to be fat or muscular and one is obviously better for attracting my wife versus challenging and negatively influencing her in submission and respect."

Yes, physical "candy" (as well as other LAMPS qualities) can be an effective "lure" to draw her in (if he has it), but this too is not enough to achieve sanctification. A man must address the spiritual interaction, and not only the physical.

> "[Likewise,] I can be "open and honest" with my wife if I do it in a masculine way but not in a feminine way, and it shouldn't have much negative blowback whether I was attractive to her or not. However, the exception is if the way you do it (or the way she perceives it) perpetuates an inverted roles relationship in which that would be bad all around."

Once again, the exception proves the rule. Ultimately, it is about maintaining Headship, which goes back to my first point. The only way that a man can assert Headship, and come across as more masculine than feminine, is by improving his character, or as past Manospherians have put it, "You can't fake being Alpha. You actually have to become a better man!"

Challenges Bring Maturity in Men

Much of this maturation comes through acculturation and upbringing, but this venue of personal growth has failed in our modern culture. However, a spiritually minded man will recognizes that the challenges of life, as orchestrated by God, have the effect of refining his character. A man can be more willing to embrace the challenges, engage in this process, and nurture a positive attitude about it (which admittedly can be difficult at times), but ultimately, the process of maturation is the work of God in a man.

Why should God challenge the character of a man? It is for the benefit of his own refinement, and by extension, the spiritual lives of all those whom he may influence throughout his life. This is an expression of the kindness of God towards that man specifically, and towards his family and community in general. I know the word "kindness" will cause some readers to flinch and think twice, so I'll say that it would be unkind for God to allow a man to wallow in an immature, unregenerated state against his will and His purposes, so God allows pain, pressures, and challenges in life as a form of refinement and growth.† Of course, during this process of regeneration, it is to be expected that the man's weaknesses and vulnerabilities will become manifested. But this is a part of the process. Those things must become apparent, so that those issues can be dealt with and resolved.

Challenges bring Maturity in Women too

In several previous posts, I've described how a man's relationship with God is reminiscent of a wife's relationship with her husband. So when Deep Strength asks,

> "Given what I already said in the previous section, why challenge the character of your wife?"

The answer should be evident. It is for the benefit of her own refinement, and by extension, the spiritual lives of all those whom she may influence throughout her life.

In fact, a man doesn't need to make much effort at all to challenge his wife's character. His own weaknesses and the hardships of life are sufficient for this purpose. But the problem is that many men try to play the proverbial Chivalrous Nice Guy™, and they even believe that it is the "Christian" thing to do! By doing so, not only do they prevent a woman from ever waking up to her worst nature, but they stoke the flames of her indignant discontentment even higher! So from a spiritual viewpoint, the Chivalrous Nice Guy™ is more misogynistic than not, because he neglects his God ordained duty to teach and mould his wife (if he has one), and thereby allows her spiritual constitution to stagnate and fester.

A man who has fewer weaknesses and a bit of Game is a little better off in this regard, but not much. A man who relies on Game tactics to appease his wife's worst nature may be doing what it takes to keep his marriage intact, but he's still being rather unkind to his wife because this still allows her poor spiritual constitution to continue on unchecked. A kinder man would allow the character of his wife to be challenged, just as God allows his own character to be challenged, all for the purpose of growth and refinement.*

All of this is just another way of saying something we already know — that being "nice" won't produce sanctification in a relationship, and in fact, it can be rather annoying.

 Before anyone labels this misogynistic, of course, this must be done without violating trust, or else it all falls apart. Exercising discernment is key.*

Case Study – Make no bones about it!

Here is a case study to help readers understand what I am talking about in this post.

I won't eat the cartilage on the end of bones, but my wife likes to eat that. She told me that eating soft bone and epithelial tissue is good for her skin. (Actually, it's true!) During meals, she often expressed that she wanted me to give her the soft bone to eat instead of passing it to the garbage. So after a while, I developed a habit of eating the meat off of the bone, and then putting the bones and cartilage on my wife's plate for her to gnaw on.

Then one day, I gave her a chicken bone and it made her angry. She said, "I always give you the best cuts of meat, and you always give me the bones! You only give me what you don't want for yourself!" In response, I told her, "Yes, I always give you the bones… because I love you! [said with sarcastic emphasis] If I didn't love you, then I wouldn't give you any bones at all! I would just throw them in the garbage." At first, she interpreted my words as arrogant chauvinism, which made her more angry and indignant. But after a moment, she recognized the inherent and ironic kindness of the act, and it brought her into Shalom! This made her feel loved and she burst into tears. Since then, we laugh about this whenever we remember it.

Isn't it surprising how being a chauvinist @$$ can bring Sanctification? I believe this is what the author of Proverbs was referring to in verse 19 (cited before the introduction). It is the power of God at work!

Conclusions

My main point here is that Kindness must be properly understood as an acceptance into God's presence and His world of Shalom, and Grace (in this specific context) is when the wife is given the opportunity to enter into the Shalom of Headship when she is unqualified or unfit to do so. As you can imagine, western men need a lot of grace towards their wives these days! A man who extends kindness and grace to his wife may actually need to be very rude in his efforts to wake her up from the prevalent worldly paradigm and make her see another way of living. A man's task of making this goal evident to his wife may be just as difficult as God making the goal of suffering understood by a man.

We are tempted to cling to Red Pill tenets of being masculine, developing Game, and maintaining Frame, thinking that this should be a magic bullet for relational woes. But while this is necessary, it is not sufficient. Men must not lose sight of the overall goal, which is to make his wife realize that there is a parallel paradigm of Covenant Headship in which the marriage can be harmonious and satisfying, and that through her participation, she can learn to adapt and become a part of the Covenant Life.

Anyone who says this is unrealistic, or that "it doesn't work", is only thinking along a short term humanistic strategy and fails to understand God's prerogatives of Redemption and Sanctification. Those who can understand the deep inner workings of the Holy Spirit and "the way of a man with a maiden" may come to understand why "Chicks dig jerks!"

Related

- Σ Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009-12-28)
- Σ Frame: On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar (2018-11-21)
- Σ Frame: The Relinquished Life (2021-03-08)
- Σ Frame: When walking on eggshells, step boldly! (2021-06-30)

† The problem of pain and suffering: In a nutshell, many people believe that if God were good and kind, then suffering and evil would not exist. But in fact, God's kindness is what allows men to have (1) the free will that results in their own sufferings, and (2) the divine grace necessary to produce regeneration in the crucible of life. Only those who (1) idolize pleasure, comfort, and convenience, or (2) cannot envision God's plan of redemption will conclude that God is negligent, evil, or does not exist.

Wintery Knight has reviewed the problems of evil and suffering.

- Wintery Knight: Greg Ganssle Explains the Problems of Evil and Suffering (2014/09/18)
- Wintery Knight: Why Does God Let People Suffer? Why is There so much Evil in the World? (2015/09/20)
- Wintery Knight: Should We Expect to Know What God's Reason is for Allowing Evil and Suffering? (2021/07/02)

Why are there so many sexy aggressive women in anime and video game culture?

Jack · 9 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The less she wears, the more powerful she is!

Readership: All
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

Novaseeker asked me a question a while back. He wrote,

> "Since you're in Asia, here's a question about this issue relating to that culture.
>
> The image in the post that is referenced in this specific sub-discussion is from a 2020 video game created in Poland called "Cyberpunk 2077". I don't play games, but in searching for that image I came across a number of other ones, including many from Asian-made video games — Japanese and Korean mostly — featuring similarly "kick-ass" female hotties-with-guns as power/sex symbols for what I assume are mostly male players. Especially some of the Korean ones seemed to be extremely sexualized/feminine in appearance yet doing very "powerful"/masculine actions (as you would expect in a video game I suppose). I thought that even in Korea and Japan, which are more West-influenced than some other Asian countries, the norm was still feminine women — in other words, the "kickass woman with sexual authority, too!" arises from Western feminist culture. It appears that this also is a common trope in cultures like at least Korea which, while probably considered off the charts feminist for Asia are not particularly feminist from an American or European point of view. Why has this happened there as well?
>
> I mean I realize gamers everywhere are lame and passive and tend to prefer "dominant woman" stereotypes — is that all there is to it, and it has very little to do with the ambient cultural feminism, which is clearly very different in Korea than it is in California? It's a puzzle to me, given how other aspects of Asian culture don't mesh with it."

In response to NovaSeeker's question, I did a little research on this topic. The rest of this post will cover the history, the artistic design, and the cultural context of the sexy, kick-@ss female stereotype in comics, anime, and video games.

On the History

I read some articles about this phenomenon (originally written in Chinese), and gathered up a bit of the rather long history that goes back 50 years or more.

Female heroine characters in the arts and literature date back to antiquity. But in the area of comics and video games, it seems the sexy kickass woman was inspired by Marvel comics' Red Sonja, which first appeared in 1973. The Red Sonja character, and similar characters have reappeared in many comics since then, and later was made into a film starring Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Red Sonja

It is generally believed that the bikini armor first appeared in anime the early 1980s in “Fortune Star Boy”. In this manga, the author, Rumiko Takahashi, had only a hazy concept of bikini armor and did not emphasize the concept, so it did not receive widespread attention.

Then, in 1985, the Japanese anime film, Leda: The Fantastic Adventure of Yohko,* featured a female high school student, Yoko Asagiri, who was transformed into a female warrior (see next image). Of note, Yoko Asagiri’s bright red hair clearly reflects the image of Red Sonja. During the plot, she was swallowed by a flower while being chased by someone. When the flower spit her out, she was wearing a bikini which somewhat resembled armor (e.g. shoulder pads, shin guards). Asagiri instantly transforms into a female warrior and she defeats her enemy. The bikini armor gained popularity after this anime, probably because the bikini armor was the only fixed equipment of the heroine.

Also in 1985, on the other side of the world, Richard Fletcher made a movie, “Queen Excalibur”, starring Arnold Schwarzenegger, which was directly modeled after Marvel’s, Red Sonja.

In 1986, there was a game called “Dream Warrior” that used bikini armor as its signature feature, further consolidating the popularity of bikini armor.

Another game released in 1988, “Dragon Quest”, featured a heroine in iconic red bikini armor.

In 1994, the game, “The Elder Scrolls: Arena”, had female characters wearing bikini armor, but the clothing was more bikini than armor.

From this time on, generations of artists continued to create aggressive female characters wearing bikini armor on the basis of their predecessors. Bikini armor slowly evolved to be more beautiful, sexually alluring, and (somewhat) more functional as armor.

 Leda is not to be confused with another, Tenya Lida (Japanese: Tensei Ida) AKA “Ingenium”.*

Y

Yoko Asagiri

On the Artistic Design

From the writers'/designers' standpoint, a character can wear anything he chooses. So the final decision about what specific types of clothing to attach to the characters all depends on what the audience likes, what creates visual and mythical appeal, and what will sell. Therefore, in any specific application, what the heroine wears mainly depends on the setting and other attributes of the anime or game.

For example, "The Sakura Magic Girls" mimics a combination of cartomancy and a Victoria's Secrets style fashion show, so the clothing is mostly based on the sex studded Lolita style. Another example is "Star vs. the Forces of Evil", in which the main character, Star Butterfly, is modeled after the butterfly/fairy personification*, which appeals to both eastern and western fantasy. A third ubiquitous example, which brings us back to the topic of discussion, is the iconic female warrior.

One source speculated that the concept of female warriors and bikini armor originated in the gladiator culture of ancient Rome. Gladiator fights are essentially entertainment for others. In order to enhance the presentation, gladiators showcased their physique, as well as their fighting skills. Thus, male gladiators streamlined their armor and female gladiators wore minimal clothing.

However, it was pointed out that wearing armor on the breasts has little benefit if the rest of the body, especially the abdomen, is exposed.

So the writers/designers came up with a rule of thumb that supports the use of less clothing: "The more exposed, the stronger the combat effectiveness". They had to come up with several explanations of how this could be true, and make the character depictions match this reasoning in order to produce an overall mythos that was convincing and believable (within the intrinsic suspension of disbelief necessary for one to engage in the fantasy).

Ayame, a Magic Sakura Girl

One reasoning is that female warriors should not wear heavy, burdensome armor, as that would slow them down.

Another line of reasoning claims that the primary source of defense is mainly derived from magic, speed, or a special skill or technique, rather than brute crushing strength.

In addition, the sexual authority of this type of character plays into the overall power of the character, that is, cleavage and lots of skin have the effect of distracting and confusing a male adversary and thereby weakening him.

Another work around is that some female characters are designed to avoid direct confrontation, such as a sorceress, sniper or bowman.

The authors state that these sexy characters were intentionally designed to appeal to a male audience, and yes, the kinds of guys who are into comics and video games tend to be attracted to dominant women. Thus, the bikini armor is just for visual appeal to male viewers. However, these characters also appeal to pre-adolescent girls too, as it is seen by them as a role model of sorts.

Being good-looking is a qualifying trait for any woman, whether she be the girl next door or the heroine of a fantasy, and this is a consistently enduring, standard fare for comics, games, and anime.

 For comparison, the butterfly/fairy personification has also morphed into butterfly armor, which continues to make reappearances from time to time, most recently in "Monster Hunter".*

On the Cultural Context

So far, I've only discussed the archetype of the female warrior within comics, games and anime, but NovaSeeker's question was more focused on its cultural affect.

One source said that this type of character is a representation of the feminist "Strong Independent Woman" archetype. Another author said that western feminism is trying to kill this type of portrayal of women, because it objectifies women's sexuality. So the reaction is a mixed bag, which I think reflects the inherent confusion in feminism.

Butterfly armor, as it appears in Monster Hunter.

Overall, I would say that ultimately, the comic and video game industries are businesses that try to produce content that will sell, and the sexy kickass woman archetype definitely sells to teenage males. It is charming. It appeals to their curiosity and desires. It conveys "heroine psychology" (which is seen as a mysterious anomaly). It transports them to an ancient, distant world which has different norms and rules of engagement. However, it is a microculture of fantasy. Outside of this targeted demographic, these characters are not popular at all.

Another thing that plays into the cultural interpretation of this, I think, is how different cultures regard the archetypal mythos of the knight who rescues the princess. According to western chivalry, the knight does this out of a sense of honor, cultural preservation, and because it is the right thing to do. Asian audiences read this type of story and see through all the talk about honor as mere posture posing. It is tacitly understood that the real motivation is for him to have the woman, and everything that entails. But again, all of this is regarded as archetypal mythos — stories that convey the basic nature of men and women. When men and women actually behave like the mythos, in Asia, it is usually seen as playacting or being over the top. The exception would be when it is done in a truly dangerous situation that would require true courage and bravery.

Sources

- VITO Magazine: Why do heroines in game anime always fight in bikinis? (2021 April 4)

Related

- Snapper TRX: What Men Want… (2016 May 19)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Fantasy in Makeup and Photography (2021 April 16)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Gynapotheosis (2021 April 21)

Rethinking Rites of Passage From a Biblical Perspective

Red Pill Apostle · 12 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Jesus' Temptation seen as a Rite of Passage

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: I am making my wife read the Bible this summer as part of a continuing effort to establish headship, and I was reading to stay a little ahead of her. I had this epiphany, for lack of a better word, while I was reading the passage in Matthew 4 for probably the 100th time. Also, I would not have thought about Christ's temptation in Matthew 4 without Jack's earlier write up on rites of passage.
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

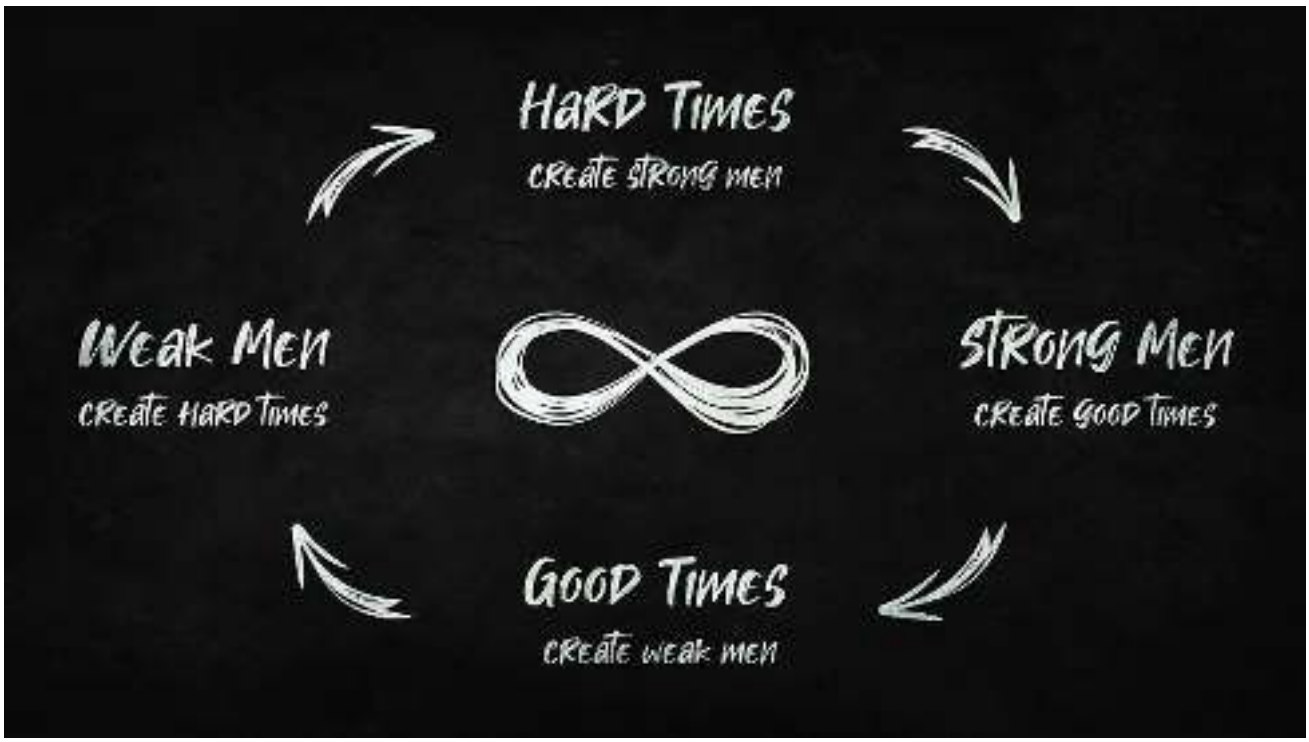
Back in June, Jack wrote a post about Entering Manhood (2021 June 18). This post described the ancient rite of male passage, and highlighted that it is an important part of a man's personal development.

One commenter asked whether a rite of passage is necessary for Christian men, and if there was a Biblical basis for rites of passage. Here is the comment from Titus2Homemaker on Jack's 2021/6/18 post.

> "Far be it from me to dismiss the potential VALUE in such rites of passage. But as this is a post for Christian men, I have to ask why the standard here is primarily the pagan world, and not Scripture. How does this concept fit in with Scriptural instruction, and with historical Jewish application of it? We know that there are Bar and Bat Mitzvahs (for boys and girls, respectively), but were there such life-or-death rituals involved? And if not, although we can say such rituals have VALUE, can we point to them as ESSENTIAL?
>
> I ask that not to evade the issue of such forms of entering manhood, but because if rites of passage of that nature are not essential, then we might need to dig deeper to determine what the factors ARE that ensure our boys grown into men and not just overgrown boys."

This is an important question that deserves consideration: Is there any Biblical foundation for the male rite of passage?

Ten days after I read Jack's post, I was reading Matthew 4 which is the temptation of Jesus and then the start of his ministry. It is interesting to me that Christ went through what was essentially a rite of passage and after that He started his ministry.



Jesus is the Final Archetype

Jesus was a man's man. He worked with His hands to build things. Being fully God, He understood authority and saw fit to submit to the will of the Father on our behalf. He saw through tests of the most educated and powerful religious authorities and had perfect answers for them all. He endured social and political pressure that only few will ever know and stayed on mission. He never lost frame regardless of what was thrown at him. He wept when there was loss and His heart felt pain. He was patient with those that did not have understanding. He was compassionate on those who did not deserve it. He was the perfect man with all the knowledge, wisdom, and discernment to complete His mission on earth … and yet, when the Holy Spirit took Him to the desert, we have no account of Him protesting.

Jesus' Temptation as a Rite of Passage

The story of Jesus' temptation in the wilderness bears a striking resemblance to what we would call a rite of passage.

He was God, with perfect knowledge and in perfect relationship with the Father and Holy Spirit so He knew what the end of His earthly mission entailed.

I can imagine He spent the time in communion with the Father, meditating on scripture, and getting prepared for the temptation that He knew was coming.

In it, we see not only a struggle to survive the elements, but also the pushing of body, mind, and spirit in overcoming evil.

Another aspect is the physical endurance. We do have an account that, even though He could have made sand into filet mignon, He did not eat for 40 days.* It stands to reason that he intentionally chose to fast.

Fasting (or starving?) is known to put one in a physically weakened state, but it can also impart clarity of mind and increased willpower.

I have, at times, had to go on a juice fast for a week. Calories were still coming in, just very few and in liquid form. After 7 days the hunger is ever present and substantial weight loss occurs. After 40 days Jesus would have been emaciated and weak. He was physically starving and, at least for me, thinking is affected by the discomfort and the desire for it to end. This is most likely the state of the human part of Jesus when He resisted the temptation from Satan.

Satan approaches the temptation with the frame that Jesus is human and subject to human desires and weakness. We see this in the 3 things he chooses to use to temp Jesus, physical comfort, a logic trap with spiritual implications, and then finally with wealth and power. In addition, Satan knows scripture, and he uses this to try to create further confusion. He probably knew who Jesus was and what Jesus on earth meant for him and so he threw his best at Jesus to derail the process. Much like with Eve, he targets the suspected weak spots and, as he often does, contorts what would otherwise be good things to make them evil, such as he does in making sex, possessions, pride, etc. into idols.

Other Rites of Passage in the Bible

While the temptation of Christ is a very distinct event that could be considered a rite of passage in the bible, there appear to be many others, once you consider that the purpose of a rite is to be a sanctifying and/or refining experience designed to prepare one for what life will bring.

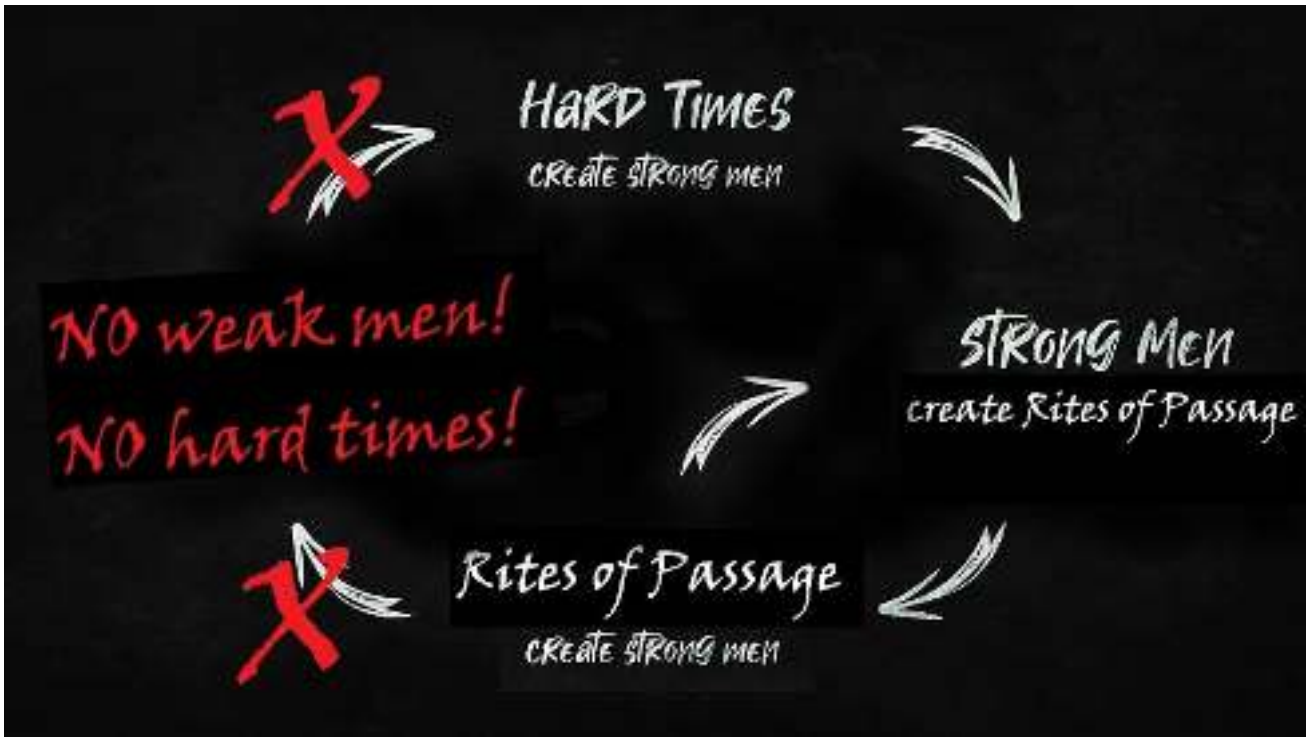
- Job lost his estate and family, that is, his dominion over what God had given him. He was tempted by his wife and friends, yet remained strong in his faith through emotional and physical misery.
- Noah endured mockery and ridicule, but showed perseverance and faith.
- The patriarch Joseph lost his God given freedom when his brothers sold him into slavery. He was tempted sexually with Potiphar's wife, and had his faith tested by being unjustly imprisoned, and his faith and trust in God was ultimately used to save an entire nation as a public administrator under Pharaoh during a famine.
- David seems to have had a more clearly defined rite. I would imagine that all his older brothers at one point or another had to care for their father's herd in some capacity. During David's watch he faced the lion and bear with stone age weapons. His tests involved the physical, bravery, duty, and faith. Those attributes were on full display against Goliath.
- Peter's trial came in denying Jesus 3 times. The failure, the dejection he must have felt when he returned to his old life of fishing and subsequent forgiveness are part of the boldness of faith that the church is built on.
- It is obvious that Paul endured many trials in his lifetime, after living what was most likely a cushy life afforded a Pharisee, including beatings, stonings, being shipwrecked, being criminally charged, facing judicial action, and being socially rejected in general.

- All the disciples endured the testing of their faith in the decades after Christ's ascension, most unto death.

In all these cases the hardships refine the areas of dominion necessary for men to build/cultivate the earth, kingdoms, families, and faith.

One could argue that some of these trials and tests were not Rites of Passage, given how we think about them today, because it came at the hand of God (or "fate" if you prefer), and was not organized as such by elder men in the community. However, these examples do emphasize the value of such an experience, and suggest that it is necessary for a man to endure and overcome hardship if he is to be successful in life and in spirit. When a community imposes the requirement that all men should endure a Rite of Passage, as has been done for eons, then it prevents any men from "falling through the cracks", and tends to improve the overall quality of men in the group. I would assert that the enduring successes of prior generations of men made the community-created trials offered by a rite of passage necessary.

In our day, manually taxing labor is no longer common in order to be able to eat or clothe ourselves, and hard times typically means cutting back on our excess instead of real suffering. Overcoming trials builds strong men, who then build and enforce a stable society that makes life easier to the point that the hardships that created the strong men are largely gone. For the continual perpetuation of a strong, stable society, the continuance of a community organized rite of passage may be necessary.



Are there Rites of Passage for Women?!?

Going further with the idea of a Rite of Passage being any sanctifying or refining experience, we find that women have Rites of Passage too, except tailored to the God given differences of men and women. I believe there is a very good case to be made that those differing refining events in life are gender specific, reflecting those purposes for which God designed men and women.

For men, the challenges tend to be in the areas God called us to master; to be the spiritual head of the household, leader, protector, provider, teacher, and so on. These are the characteristics of Headship, and it is obvious that men's trials tend to be around events that force growth in these areas.

The challenges for women tend to be events in the areas of the home, family, and bearing/rearing children because that is where they are called. For generations, girls learned those skills needed to care for children and a home working alongside their mothers and grandmothers. This was a prevalent part of growing up just two generations ago and if you consider how God often works through families, you can see the Titus 2 familial relationships being used in the perpetuation of the church. Paul indicates that women are saved by childbearing which would indicate that for women it is marriage, motherhood, and raising children that are sanctifying processes for her. Later in life, she becomes one of the elder women of the church who are to teach younger women how to be good wives, manage their households, and love their husbands.

In our modern culture, the three big temptations that women face are in (1) resisting the Feminist lies and demonic influences of our age, (2) overcoming the Curse of Eve in her fallen nature by submitting to male authority, and (3) preserving her sexual purity (i.e. virginity). A fourth challenge that is more about excellence than temptation, is in preparing herself for marriage, raising children, and becoming a Proverbs 31 woman in general. At the very least, a wise man should consider a woman's ability to pass through these challenges as a rite of passage into marriage and then carefully consider how a prospective wife has approached the fourth in her life.

Conclusions

One of the interesting side effects of being opened to RP truth is that certain parts of scripture that did not make sense now do (i.e. women saved by child bearing). Some scripture passages that seem confusing or insignificant become quite important when seen through a Red Pill lens. (Examples include Numbers 30 describing the headship role of fathers and husbands, and their duty to protect women, and Genesis 3:20 when Adam gives his woman a name.) The debate Dalrock started by looking at marriage statistics and tying them to country club church teaching goes much further than that. Understanding God's hierarchy of authority makes everything from the creation to the fall to God's kingdom in Revelation fit together better.

Jesus did not kick off His official ministry in what we would consider a strong state of being. But for some reason, a 40-day physical endurance test that would have weakened His body and state of mind, was what God chose for the perfect man who in theory should not have needed testing. Jesus persevered through the trial and then completed his ministry which he knew would end with his excruciating death. At the end of time, who He really is will be revealed and we'll all see the conquering king.

 Note: The number 40 is significant in the Bible. The Israelites spent 40 years in the wilderness as a punishment for unfaithfulness. There were 40 days of rain to flood the earth as a punishment for people's sin. I would think the parallel of 40 days of fasting immediately followed by Satan's temptation was intentional considering Jesus as the sacrifice for human sin.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Understanding Temptation (2009-12-21)
- The Rational Male: Rites of Passage (2016-12-5)
- Σ Frame: Trajectories (2020-2-28)
- Σ Frame: A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose (2020-9-4)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021-3-29)
- Σ Frame: An Interview with American Pilgrim author Roosh Valizadeh (2021-3-31)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): Juxtaposing the Temporal and the Eternal (2021-4-26)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Entering Manhood (Rite of Passage) (2021-6-18)

The Rupture of the Marriage Market Place

thedeti · 14 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The chasm between the sexes runs ever deeper.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is based on a conversation between Deti and Novaseeker and has been coauthored with Jack.
Reader's Note: The theme for July is "Market Forces".
Length: 3,600 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

ALPHA F*X, BETA BUX, REDUX

Red Pill Boomer wrote,

> "What do you guys think, has the AF/BB strategy really been superseded now by AF and Fs and Fs M' lady from ages 18-27, and then her mindset shifts to, "Now that I'm 28 years old… COMMIT d@mn you! I won't 'settle' for anything less than you Mr. Top 5-10-20% man. I'm entitled to one of you!" Are we going to see the trend of 'Alpha Widows' escalating in the next few years? Btw, this seemed to be a subtext in the Tomi Lahren rant that went viral last summer, the "PSA for Boyish" men diatribe. She seemed to really be throwing a tantrum about this very thing; and coincidentally, or not so coincidentally, she was just turning 28 years old at the time of the rant.

This has been the case for some time, actually.

AF/BB is an issue of sequencing. Some Manospherian authors have called it a longitudinal "mating strategy", but I don't believe the vast majority of women are that self-aware. What we see is that women are moulded by the herd, focused on the Feeelz, running on auto-pilot (Jack's phrase), eating up male-sourced opportunities as they come, and are totally oblivious to what they are doing. I do believe there are some "masterminds" who have shaped this kind of life path into a mating strategy, and up until the last decade or so (until Red Pill went mainstream and MGTOW gained momentum), this strategy was quite effective.

That is, women start off with Alpha F*x (AF), with the idea of trying to get the most suitable of the AFs to commit to them. That is the goal. They do F some unmarriageable bad boy AFs, too, but sooner or later they get jaded from the brutality of sexual competition in this Sexual Market Place (SMP), and then gravitate towards men that, perhaps with a few adjustments (on his part, in the woman's mind) would be a good potential long term partner, and try to get him to commit. In other words, she begins looking for the Alpha-Bux (AB) and tries to secure his commitment. This is pretty much always the first sequential strategy women employ that they are cognitively aware of. But actually, this is an even longer bet than a simple AF. The thing that makes this strategy even more difficult for them is that they have already calibrated their sexual expectations on their initial AF experiences.

Almost all of them realize at some stage that getting commitment from an AB is not going to happen for them. Either because they can't find an actual AB in their local market, or because the ABs they did find are not interested in committing — often to anyone, but sometimes only to them. Part of this is because these high value AB men see these women as already used and broken, and another part is because these women never learned how to get along with a man from their past life experiences.

The age at which women realize this, however, varies greatly. It varies by geography (women tend to hunt for ABs much longer in big blue metro areas than in smaller dating markets), and has changed over time (the age of marriage is increasing over time). Right now in places like Manhattan and DC that age is mid-30s. In someplace like Omaha or Pittsburgh it's more like 26-27. There's a lot of variation. The SMP is local, and also varies by social class somewhat — so people tend to put a lot of stock in the universality of what they see in their own locality, because that is their local reality, but overall there is quite a lot of local variance behind the national stats.

But at some point, the female mating strategy goes through another revision. Most women transition from hunting for the AB to compromising (AKA "settling"), and hunting for the best Beta Bux (BB) they can get. That is the "epiphany" that Rollo Tomassi refers to, or what is often called "lane changing", where women consciously shift their aim from mostly chasing the elusive AB's commitment, to trying to find the best BB they can get. Again, the age at which this shift happens varies, and overall is increasing, such that in, say, Manhattan, this isn't happening now until the mid-30s. But it does happen for most women.

Some women never make the shift. Either they are one of the few who marries an AB (some of the female personages in the sphere are like this), or they are of the "never settle" mindset that is so conditioned by riding the endless train of alphas in their 20s and earlier 30s that they can't bring themselves to settle for a beta, greater or not (Kate Bolick is one example of this). Some of these women write articles in The Atlantic and Medium. Some of them go for "The Lesbian Option". Some of them just go for longer term singleness, finding other holdout single women "never settle" types to brunch with and travel to exotic places with, and write travel or food blogs with and so on (viz. the "Sisterhood is Powerful!!! Natch!!!!" type of thing).

But outside of those outliers most women do change lanes eventually because most women do marry still, and almost all of them are not marrying ABs because ABs are very few in number. Most do make the shift and settle, but the age at which they are doing that has been getting pushed back, and, on the margins, over time more women are being left out when the music stops because they find there is a shortage of age appropriate marriageable men when they do finally decide to lane change. That's a real thing, it's happening, but like truly sexless men, while it is a thing and is increasing, it's still marginal — most men are not completely sexless (just less sex and less quality than they would like) and most women are not going without marriage (just later and to a less attractive man than they would like). The marginal changes are, however, real and growing over time.

The Rupture of the MMP

As I described above, most women leverage their sexual value in their peak years to avail of AF sex with hot fun sexy men when young, simply because they can. There's nothing stopping them, and we're going into a third generation (!!!) of women who live their sexual lives this way. However, there are some major "problems" with this strategy from the womens' perspective.

1. There are fewer attractive men than there are attractive women. This is because of the differing ways men and women view attraction – most women are attractive to most men, but most men are NOT attractive to most women.
2. There's a hard limit on how much most men can improve their attractiveness. A guy who started out as a 4, 5, or 6 is never going to be an 8 or a 9. That just is not going to happen, ever! So this hard limit on the pool of "eligible" men is not going to change, ever!
3. The relative scarcity of high SMV men combined with the attrition of men from the SMP/MMP due to the growing MGTOW movement causes women to be hugely alarmed and concerned over MGTOW. I will cover this in a follow up post. &

These problems are really insoluble, and the current SMP and MMP has no workable solution to this problem.

The prior solution and bulwark against this problem was a combination of the following.

1. Restricting and constraining women's sexual and dating behavior to keep them realistic and prevent them from developing a taste for sexual attention from men who would never marry them because those men have better options.
2. Getting young women paired off relatively early to SMP-comparable men around their age or a little older.
3. Getting those married women pregnant and keeping them busy with homes and kids and sometimes jobs to supplement the family income, so they have no time to think about "bigger better deals" or lament "the one that got away".
4. If all else fails, and Bertha or Plain Jane can't get the job done, well, we'll just help things along and do some matchmaking for them. We'll set Bertha up with Poindexter (and they'll be OK); and we'll set Jane up with Ernie Engineer (and they'll be OK).

We know this approach has worked, presumably for centuries.

If Bertha and Jane never got to even talk to Quentin Quarterback, much less get a one night stand with him, then they'll be just fine with their lower status guys like Poindexter and Ernie. They won't be pining away for Quentin because they don't even really know what he's like. Susie's busy at home with Paul Plumber and their 4 kids and her part time accounting job. Stacy got Quentin and is having his kids and going to the country club. Our intrepid girls, all wives now, have too much on their plates to give a lot of thought to what some guy they're not married to or living with is doing… simply because they never had anything to do with any other guys.

We don't have any of this now. We don't have any solutions to this problem now. Because our society did not want that solution anymore. Our society wanted women to be sexually liberated, so they can have sex with whomever they wanted. So if women can have sex with whomever they want, they ignore everyone but Quentin and Chad. And after some fun with Quentin and Chad, they bristle at the notion that, if they want marriage (and most all women do at some point), they have to spend the rest of their lives with men like Paul Plumber, or Ernie Engineer, or Stan Stemlord, or Tom Teacher, or Bob from Accounting, or Billy Beta, or, God forbid, Poindexter.

So women have a very, very hard time accepting that they can't get commitment from Quentin and Chad. After all, they got to sleep with Quentin and Chad, so why can't they get commitment from one of those guys?

The Mismatch

There are several reasons for this dilemma, but the main reason is that women's experience and criteria are the reverse of men's. That is…

- Men face an uphill battle trying to match women's expectations (which are intentionally clouded in confusion) and also compete against other men for sexual access to women.
- Women can pretty much have sex with whomever they choose.
- Men have lower criteria for sex and higher criteria for marriage.
- Women are the reverse — sky high criteria for sex, lower criteria for relationships/marriage.

Because of the dictates of supply and demand, it turns out that…

- Women are willing to have sex with high quality men who would never marry them, while at the same time (simultaneously in some cases), they are willing to marry men who don't match their sexual criteria. Men resent the ɦəll out of this. They feel very little loyalty to such a woman and they are tempted to step out, even after marriage.
- Women are often deemed worthy of sex by men, but very few women are attractive enough (judging by a panoply of factors) to gain a commitment from one of those guys. Women resent the ɦəll out of that. They transfer that resentment to the men they eventually marry, which dampens his once vibrant love for her, and later in life, these women become bitter shrews. Women will vehemently refuse to face up to this truth.

Men's Perspectives

From a man's perspective, it doesn't make sense that a woman would be willing to marry a man she doesn't want to have sex with, because this is a recipe for lifelong angst and frustration. Too many men fail to discover this until after marriage.

Desperate men are willing to wife up once-sexy, unmarriageable women, of course, but in fact, they would prefer to have sex with those beautiful women during their prime years. But those women, who in past generations were largely available for marriage, are instead now choosing to ride Alphas into the sunset of oblivion. A man's desire for sex with beautiful women never really goes away. So if a man doesn't quench this thirst when he's younger, he's likely to be looking around for opportunities to do so when he is older. (Women see this as a bug, not a feature.)

So to men, the idea that a woman would be willing to marry a man, but not find him attractive enough to enthusiastically make love to him on a regular basis, is exactly backwards from the way most men experience life, and it's also precisely the opposite from women. Worst of all, men are left completely in the dark when women act directly opposite to how men would expect them to act in a way that is entirely reasonable when looking at life as a whole.

Women's Perspectives

From a woman's perspective, it doesn't compute that a woman would be attractive enough for sex, but not for marriage, generally speaking, because this fails to integrate their desire for Alpha seed with their need for provisioning.

Women will have sex with some sexy, unmarriageable men, of course, but in fact, they would like to marry many of the men they are "riding" during their party years — if not him, and not then, someone like him, and eventually. But those men, who in past generations were largely available for marriage, are instead now choosing to spin as many plates as they can while the oven is hot. A woman's desire for marriage is non-negotiable. So if a woman can't lock down Chad or Quentin when she's younger, then she's quite willing to settle for Bert or Ernie when she is older. (Men see this as a bug, not a feature.)

So to women, the idea that these guys would be willing to have sex with them super-fast, but that they would also find themselves not attractive enough to marry is exactly backwards from the way most women feel things, viscerally, and it's precisely the opposite from men. Women are blindsided when men act directly opposite to how they would expect men to act by projecting their own way of looking at things onto men.

WHAT WE HAVE NOW

As you can see, men's and women's perspectives are diametric opposites. This is because men's and women's respective needs are locked in a mortal battle against their desires leading to a bifurcation of the entities of sex and marriage.

In general, women are prioritizing personal and sexual fulfillment, while keeping a long term goal of marriage on the back burner until their last egg nears its expiration date. Sex is not satisfying to women unless she can get a top 10% man, so this creates a mating glut centered around hot men with soft harems — the same men who will never commit to a fugacious marriage as long as voracious thatch is on tap. For those precious few men who have teems of bush spilling off the edge of their mattress, the real opportunity to marry is available to them, but it pales in comparison to the plush piles of poon on the pillow.

Since women are preoccupied with their sexual freedom and fail to prioritize marriage, the emerging result is that marriage is being pushed further and farther out, and some are not marrying at all. If anything, women's demands for attractive men are being pushed up – male physical appearances and looks are much more important now, and that makes the problem worse, because most men just do not meet that one physical ideal women like. Most men just don't have those characteristics and never will, no matter what they do.

What we are living through now, as Roger Devlin pointed out in his seminal works of the noughts-era, is the rejection wholesale by women of the "old deal", which they chafed under and didn't see as equitable. Instead they pushed for a "having my cake and eat it, too" solution of being free to pursue sexy men for sex without consequences (biological or social), followed by marriage to a suitably attractive, dutiful husband, coupled with exit options on fair terms at her choice, at any time. It was basically a "we win, you lose" zero sum game scenario. They thought (and they really honestly did think), that men would "play along" because … sex. The thinking was, *"We have the power of the p*ssy. Men have no choice, they have to do what we want, otherwise they won't get laid at all, so don't worry about the men."* And that worked, for the most part, for most of the past 60 years. It still does work, to a large degree, but we are seeing erosion on the margins over time, as more and more men find it doesn't pencil for them to play the game, and as more and more women get greedier and greedier about making it even more of a zero-sum "we win, you lose" game.

Most recently, many women of the younger set are starting to wake up to this reality, and are making some adjustments in their expectations and their life strategies. For women, OnlyFans is one aspect of this, and MGTOW for men. There are many others. Overall, intersexual relations are becoming more isolated and transactional in nature. As long as the younger set are focused on the flesh, this will continue to unravel until a breaking point as been reached.

THE QUICK FIXES

NovaSeeker gave us a framework of options. But after looking them over, it's evident that there isn't really a solution that comes to mind that would not involve unwinding the social changes of the last 60 years. The only current "solutions" for men are…

1. Do without and spend the rest of your life single. This is what increasingly more men are doing.
2. Wait a long time and compromise/settle so deeply that it's a net loss and worse than what you might have had with doing without (what a sizable number of men and women do).

Door Number 1 is hard for men because they spend years without sex. Men will do nearly anything for a piece of @$$. They will abase and embarrass themselves for sex. They will turn themselves into the worst kinds of simps. If they have to wait or pay for it, they will. If they have to beclown themselves, they will. If they have to learn pickup or game, they will. If they have to become good at complex algebra, they will. This is why men will have sex with women they don't really love, who they're really not all that into, who they consider beneath them.

Door Number 1 is hard for women because being a "never married" is a huge status hit with the feminine social matrix. Women need marriage/commitment like men need sex. They just have to have it and they'll do almost anything to get it. (I never realized this until coming to the 'sphere – for most women, being a "never married" is one of the most humiliating and emotionally traumatic things a woman can experience. This, in addition to the biological clock, is why women go into full panic mode in their 30s.) This is why women will marry men they're really not all that into, marry men beneath them, marry men they don't love.

So, lots of people will pick Door Number 2.

While it is true that men hold the key to marriage, the grand majority of men cannot find a woman worth taking who will have him. Even for those men who marry, marriage is not joyful to them without the component of hot sex with a beautiful, loyal, submissive wife.

The point is that under the present SMP/MMP regime, the problem of a shortage of attractive men cannot be solved for most people. There's no way to solve it short of more and more people simply doing without, and women will not dare to sweep the crusty cobwebs off that option, which forces many men to take said option.

Conclusions

In religious words, we could say that it's not God's will for most people to remain celibate. But on the other hand, it's not God's will for anyone to enter into a debased relationship, which is what they are doing when they marry or have sex with someone simply so that they can avoid the suffering inherent in choice (1).

The "sweet spot" socially is to find a way to match up what the sexes bring to each other and seek from each other in an equitable way.

That's what used to be done, but now, no more. That just can't be done anymore, because most men can't give women what they demand. It really is "heads I win, tails you lose". The only way men can win is just to say, "I just won't play, then. I'll just keep my money and resources and commitment. Or, if I get hard up enough, I'll get an escort, a sugar baby or an OnlyFans subscription, and toss a little cash your way. Otherwise, step off."

On a societal-wide scale, this is one of the biggest conundrums of today's MMP. But on an individual basis, there is a sweet spot that is lying right under our noses, yet, it is difficult to sniff it out.

References

- thedeti 2021-01-14 at 8:21 am
- thedeti 2021-01-14 at 9:02 am
- Novaseeker 2021-01-14 at 9:47 am
- thedeti 2021-01-14 at 10:09 am
- Novaseeker 2021-01-14 at 6:04 pm

Related

- Dalrock: Feminism would work if we didn't have weak men screwing everything up. (2013 October 17)
- The Rational Male: Plan B (2016 March 14)

- Σ Frame: Hopelessness (2020 April 6)
- Σ Frame: Handling an IOI requires a Miracle! (2020 July 17)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021-02-17)

The Feminine Christian Marriage Quadrilemma

Jack · 16 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

She wants to have her cake, crumpets, and pie a la mode, and eat them too!

Readership: All
Length: 2,400 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

In The Masculine Dilemma (2020 December 13), I described how men are often faced with a choice between two types of women: a woman whom they are sexually hard attracted to, or a woman who would actually make a good wife.

In The Christian Marriage Dilemma (2021 February 26), I discussed how Christian men seeking a wife are faced with a dilemma. Basically, the difficulty lies in the fact that western women who are nominally church-going Christians are notably less Christian-like than the typical non-Christian woman in other locations such as the far east. Much of this difference is due to acculturation, but the cultural convergence of churchianity amplifies the hypocrisy and denial.

The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27) illustrated the dyadic choice that women are faced with: being either dominant or submissive, and being either dependent on male authority, or being (sexually) independent.

We have a lot of dilemmas going on!

But it seems that Christian women have another dilemma of their own!

For example, Elspeth expressed that her daughters are having some difficulty in finding a suitable Christian husband. A discussion on this can be found under Novaseeker's post, Deciphering Concepts of Attraction (2021 April 19).

Deti responded,

> "Sorry. I don't know what else to tell you.
>
> There are no palatable solutions. Currently, the only solution is for the Daughters to remain unmarried and sexless; or marry neomaxizoomdweebies and be unhappily having sex, and mostly sexless.
>
> What you are looking for is an extremely tall order: A SAM Jr. You're searching for a needle in 10,000 haystacks. This is a nearly impossible task. I don't envy you."

Is it really so confounded? Let's examine this closely.

The Engineer's Dilemma

Based on Carl's syllogisms at Black Label Logic, The Engineer's Dilemma is laid out as follows.

Major Premise: To get Y, [insert product] must be X.
Minor Premise: [Insert product] is not X.
Conclusion: Therefore, [insert product] cannot get Y.

In the engineer's case, X and Y represent "higher quality" and "more sales volume", respectively. (I've reversed X and Y as was given in Carl's post to match real marketing behaviors.) The actual relationship is not linear, but more of a bell curve as shown in the image below. Here, price is an indicator of quality. The following discussion focuses on the area in the left half of the graph.

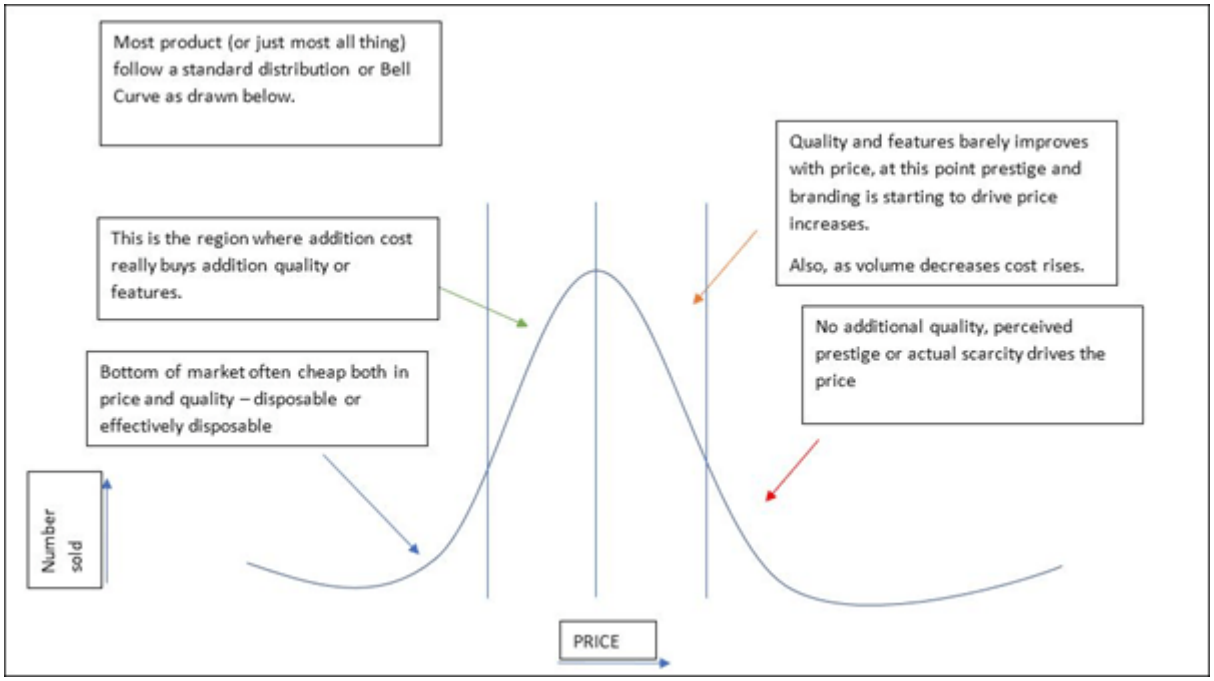

Image from [1].

Since increasing quality is costly, the typical way that western engineers approach this dilemma is by adding value to the product. Asian engineers will increase utility and shave costs, leading to a very useful but low quality product.

Carl also illustrated how this syllogism can be widely applied to a number of cases.

Major Premise: To get success [the product] must be perfect.
Minor Premise: [The product] is not perfect.
Conclusion: Therefore [the product] cannot be successful.

This is a basic cause-effect relationship where it is assumed that people will prefer to buy a higher quality or "perfect" product, given that the price-for-quality is reasonably acceptable.

The Marriage Dilemma for women (Argument A)

The Feminine Marriage Dilemma is a variation of the Engineer's Dilemma. Here, women try to engineer their relationships according to their desires, needs, preferences, and hypergamous liking. Applying this logic to the feminine viewpoint goes something like this.

Major Premise: To have a satisfying relationship/marriage, my husband must be reasonably* tall, reasonably* attractive, reasonably* successful, and have the "right"* combination of alpha/beta traits. (I'll abbreviate this as "being worthy* of marriage" according to her estimations.)

 Here, "reasonably", "right", "good", and "worthy" must be translated from femtalk because hiding behind these adjectives is a world of meaning that is never explicitly stated. The implication is that he must be above 6 feet tall and in the top 22%. Comprehensively, the bottom line is that all these qualities should satisfy the woman's hypergamous filters, leading to a visceral state of attraction and comfort.*

Through years of buck riding and error, most women eventually find the premises to be,

Minor Premise 1a: Men who are worthy* of marriage are not offering commitment.
Minor Premise 2a: Men who are offering commitment are not worthy* of marriage.
Conclusion: Therefore, I cannot get a good* husband.

Of course, if she does manage to marry, this conclusion continues to stand as a justifiable reason (in her mind) that her husband is not good* by whatever metric the hamster can churn out.

As we know, this combination of traits is already a dilemma in and of itself. The crux of this dilemma lies in the fact that women are seeking to maximize hypergamous opportunity. This is already well known around the sphere, but I want to point out that their spiritual motivation in doing so is to experience a sense of grace, meaning, women want to feel like they got a man who is better than what they deserve. But gaining satisfaction in this endeavor proves to be impossible because their expectations have been raised to an untenable zenith by cultural influences, and also through their experiences of bedding hawt Chadwicks. Furthermore, the precious princess entitlement complex prevents them from ever realizing how undeserving they are.

Of course, women are not as logical as this, but their internal assessment of the situation goes through the same kind of algorithm. IOW, they see that their favorite brand of cereal is not currently in stock on the shelf, so they think it is unavailable.

The Feminist Trilemma (Argument B)

As an alternative to the Marriage Dilemma, women who do not prioritize marriage are more than willing to engage in other ingénues to satisfy their personal prerogatives, at least until real world opportunities to do so have dried up. (This momentous occasion of a woman's life is also called "hitting the wall" or "going over the falls".) Much has already been written about this dynamic, so I won't go into further detail here.

At the most basic limbic level, women are looking for a turn-key, ready-to-go Tingly Respect relationship. This much comes quite naturally to the feminine nature. But feminism has taught modern women to add on the qualification that he must be "respectful", when once translated, means that he must be chivalrous without being embarrassingly obsequious. That is, he must supply a constant tap of resources and consistently offer affirmation. He must be subservient to her whimsical desires, must never violate her ego, and must let her do whatever the ɦəll she pleases. In other words, he must fully enable her self-worship, and do so automatically and without questioning, which is an inversion of Headship mind you. This, as we well know, is contradictory by nature. Respectful men (according to this definition) are not Tingle-inducing men, and vice versa. So feminish women have an additional qualification which sets up an alternative dilemma (or a trilemma).

Minor Premise 1b: Men who are Tingle-inducing are not "respectful".
Minor Premise 2b: Men who are "respectful" are not Tingle-inducing.
Conclusion: Therefore, I cannot find anyone who is worthy*.

Many women will find a compromise between 1b and 2b. This is a tolerable solution because the relationship is not expected to last much longer than what is required for an adequate resource extraction, and it is absolutely necessary for the man to be "respectful" in order for this scheme to work.

The Feminist Christian Marriage Quadrilemma (Argument C)

It will be shown that the oxymoronic title of this section is actually an accurate description of what I am about to describe.

To make matters more difficult, women coming from a Christian background are urged to add to this list of traits the additional qualification that he must also be a strong mature Christian (among many other things). Christian women are, of course, unwilling to sacrifice any of the trappings that secular women hold most dear, so for christianeasy women submerged in secular churchianity, the ridiculous argument then becomes…

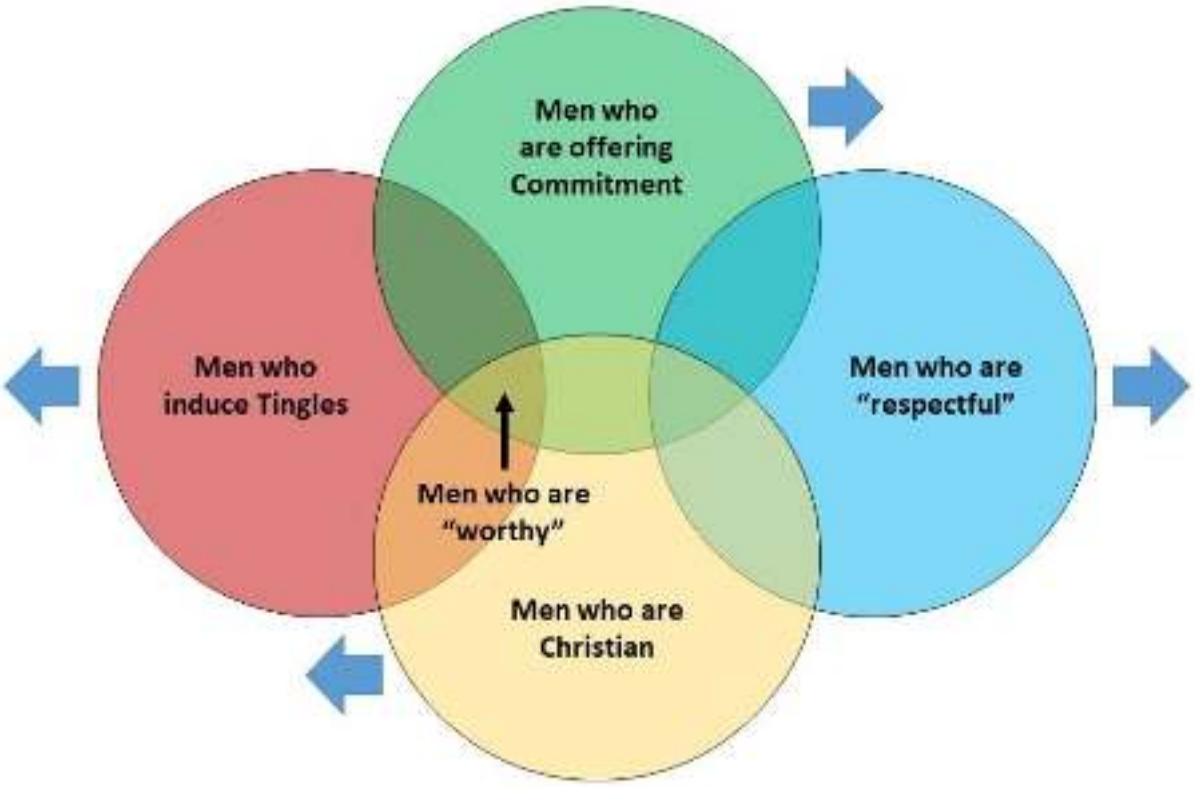
Minor Premise 1c: Christian men (or the men at church) are not worthy*.
Minor Premise 2c: Men who are worthy* are not Christians.
Conclusion: Therefore, I cannot get a Christian husband.

 It is observed that most Christian men fall into the "respectful" category of Premise 1b, but fail on the Tingle-inducing requirement, therefore, they are not considered worthy*.*

Putting all these arguments together, this rationale becomes a triple dilemma (or quadrilemma) that in their minds, looks like this.

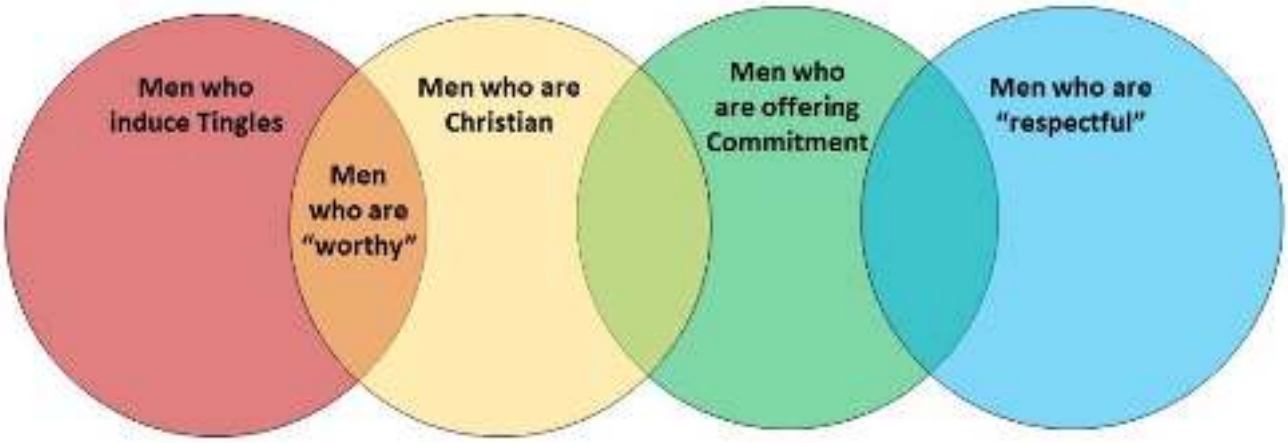
Women hold out on marriage, thinking that they will somehow, by the grace of the Tingle god, stumble across a man with the perfect combination of all four traits, shown in the center of the figure above.

However, since there are no "respectful" men who can induce Tingles nor exercise headship, the real situation takes the following form.



However, this arrangement only holds true while women are young and pure. As they (1) age and (2) engage in more illicit sexual activities, the green circle (men who are offering commitment) gets pushed farther away from the red circle (men who induce the tingles) and closer to the blue circle (men who are respectful, but unable to produce Tingles).

By the time a woman has reached the wall, the diagram looks like this. Unfortunately, this is the time when women begin to think seriously about marriage. As you can see from the diagram, it is true that "There are no good men left!"* who are offering commitment. It is also noted that men who are truly Christian (i.e. able to deliver Headship) can no longer be "respectful" about it.



When faced with this quadrilemma, the majority of Christian women will prioritize the "Tingle" qualification (Premise 1b), and drop the "Christian" qualification (Premise 1c), and lately, even the "marriage" qualification (Premise 1a), and continue on with their lives. (Remember CH Maxim #10: Tingles uber alles.) But later in life, especially after children come along, the inherent difficulties in this compromise will rear its ugly head.

Too much Engineering, not enough Salesmanship

In the same post, Carl also described the Salesman's Dilemma – trying to sell a low quality or defective product.

The logic statements for the Salesman's Dilemma are the same (X and Y represent "higher quality/perfect product" and "sales volume", respectively). The difference between the Engineer's Dilemma and the Salesman's Dilemma is one of context. The engineer is tinkering with X (trying to make a perfect product that will sell easily). The salesman is trying to maximize Y (trying to sell an imperfect product that is already engineered).

As such, the Salesman's Dilemma has the X and Y variables reversed.

Major Premise: To get X, [insert product] must be Y.
Minor Premise: [Insert product] is not Y.
Conclusion: Therefore [Insert product] cannot get X.

Carl described this as follows.

> "The major difference between the salesman and the engineer is that they are both avoiding having to do something they dislike, but they also want to avoid different forms of criticism. The salesman wants to avoid being criticized for not getting his product sold, because his identity is tied up in being a salesman. The engineer wants to avoid being criticized for building a bad product, because his identity is tied up in being an engineer. Both of them forget that most people aren't salesmen or engineers and will not be able to tell the real difference.
>
> This is more pronounced with the engineer, because he sees all the flaws in his product, and engineers have a tendency to be highly detail oriented people who have a mind that always seeks to improve whatever is their focus at a given time. The reason I refer to this as the Engineer's Dilemma rather than the entrepreneur's dilemma, is that there is an upper natural limit to the salesman's activity, because once you make the sale, you usually get a date when the product has to be delivered. For the engineer, he can tinker for his entire life provided he doesn't run out of funds and never reaches a state of perfection. For every flaw he fixes, he discovers a new one, for every prototype he builds he gains knowledge and experience that shows him a way to make it better."

In my opinion, most women in the west these days concentrate too heavily on the engineering approach, and neglect the sales aspect.

Women also focus on quality more than on value. A salesman's job is easy when he offers value at a reasonable price.

However, it stands to reason that women should focus on the sales approach before marriage, and the engineer approach after marriage.

Note: We also see women try to engineer procreation in the form of "family planning". Here, it is often assumed that she should have either 1.61803 or 2.71828 children between the ages of 32 and 40. Children conceived before this window are quietly aborted. Children conceived after this window have a greater chance of being autistic, etc.

Confusion within the Feminine Christian Marriage Dilemma

In a previous post, The Feminine Dilemma (October 27, 2018), we analyzed how women must navigate a very complicated decision of whether to join with a man in a long term relationship, or else pursue an independent lifestyle. If a woman decides to have a male partner in any capacity, she must then choose which power structure she wishes to have in her relationship. Of note, it was found that a woman's willingness to submit, and to be a help meet to a man, is a critical factor in determining her life path. Yet, we see so many women trying to pick and choose the most desirable facets of each of the outcome choices (that is, AF AND BB), while at the same time, doing everything within their power to evade the submission aspect.

The fact is that women who maxx their N count while neglecting submission and honeycraft practices are going to have fewer men offering proposals from which to choose, and those men who remain available to having an LTR are likely to be the low-power, submissive type of man (i.e. a feminist-type marriage arrangement). The reason for this is simply because men naturally gravitate towards, and offer LTR's to women, who are submissive, respectful, agreeable, attractive, and so on, AKA, having a high MMV. Thus, it becomes quite apparent that those women who pursue an independent life path, such as Feminism, and the Courtly Love model, which requires a partnership, are naturally going to face a lot of cognitive dissonance.

Typically, the sales volume declines with an increase of a product price. It has been observed, however, that for some luxury goods the sales volume may increase when the price increases.

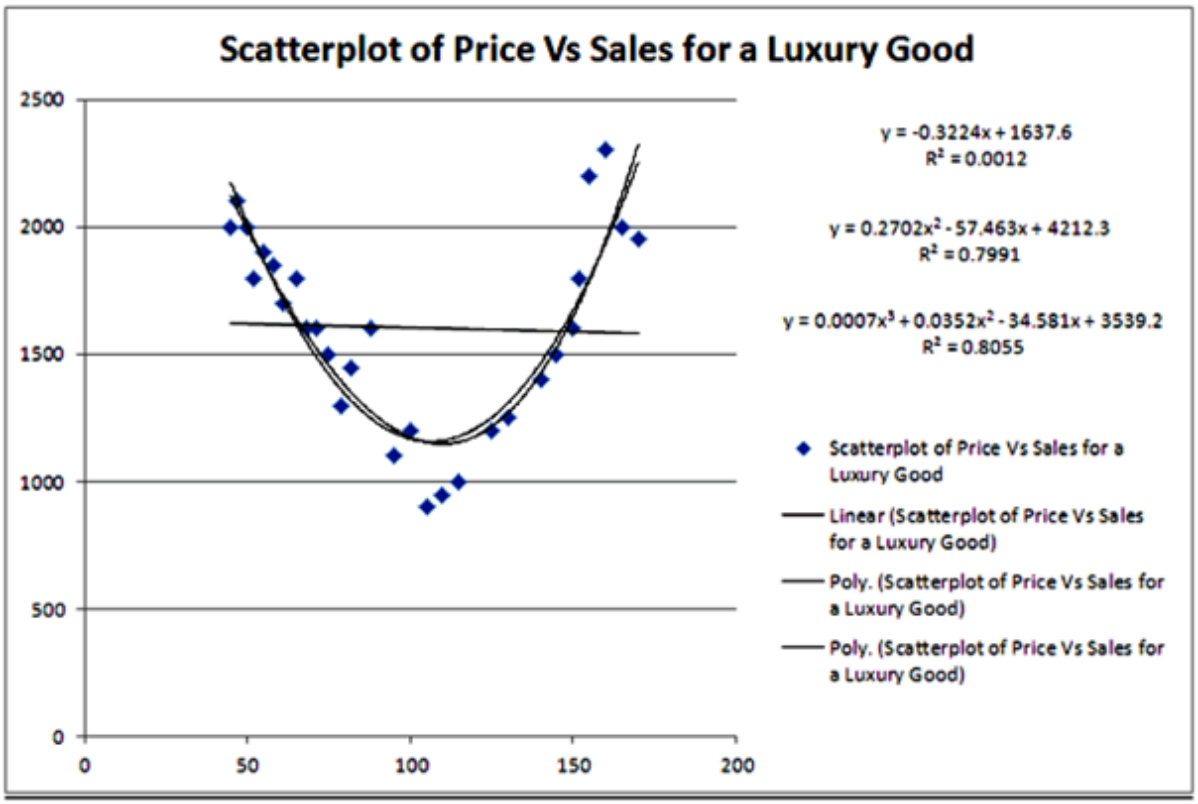

Image from [2].

This bifurcation in sales volume is precisely the reason why Apple offers two models of the iPhone. One appeals to people on a limited budget who "just gotta have an iPhone", while the other provides the extravagant quality that Apple is famous for, to those who are willing to pay for it.

Likewise, we see a bifurcation in the quality of women – women who go for the AF/BB Marriage 2.0 route that is toted by feminism, and women who prepare themselves for the long haul with a husband. This bifurcation was covered in an earlier post, DTF Cupid DTFCupid (2017 December 17). From men's perspective, the lower quality woman appeals to those men who "just gotta have a hot chick", while the other provides the quality of wife that appeals to men who are serious about commitment.

Conclusions

It stands to reason that if a woman desires a high quality man's commitment, then she needs to put herself in the latter category of high quality wife material, which means that she needs to be looking for a husband long before the pool of worthy* men has drifted away from being an option for marriage. I'll guess that 25 is "too late". They also need to refine their skills at picking out men who are actually capable of offering a marital commitment, which may require her to choose a man who is a few years older than herself.

Women have grown better at "selling" themselves as sex objects, but they have forgotten the art of "selling" themselves as potential wives in marriage. The way to do this is to demonstrate her value to a man. My advice to Elspeth and other Christian parents with daughters is to give up the idea that a worthy man will miraculously show up on the doorstep, because we are living in hard times. Instead, it may be necessary for the daughter to pick out an eligible man and then do the work of proving to him that his life would actually be better with her as his wife. Give him the serendipitous sense that he's getting something better than what he deserves. This kind of investment will not be lost on the man, but is likely to turn his view of her into wife goggles. It is my conviction that God will be faithful to return to her that which she gives to others. Of course, this kind of attitude needs to continue after marriage. If she doesn't follow through, then it's certain to be a rough ride.

This is so obvious to men, but why is this truth so obscure to women? I'm sure some of them never get the memo, but most are simply refusing to face up to this truth, humble themselves, and do the hard work of becoming a higher quality woman who provides real value to a man's life.

References

1. Twin's Dad: Reading The Curve – The Quality vs Price aka Why Frugal Works (2020 March 8)
2. Chegg Financial Studies: Sales volume increases with price for luxury goods

Related

- Black Label Logic: The Engineers Dilemma (August 31, 2018)
- Radix Fidem: Encouraging Faith Under Persecution (2018 October 15)
- Σ Frame: The Christian Conundrum (2021 March 1)
- Σ Frame: Ethical Issues Surrounding the Christian Conundrum (2021 April 5)

On Womens' Response to MGTOW

thedeti · 19 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women just can't fathom the fact that unattractive men exist, and are thus duped by the apex fallacy.

Readership: All
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

From the age of 18-30, all women see is very attractive men for sex and relationships of varying duration and intensity (whom she's sharing with a couple of other women, whether she knows that or not).

And indeed, that is precisely the experience of a lot of women from age 18-30 – attractive men are everywhere, for whatever purpose women want.

Because of 10+ years of experiences and interactions with others during their peak SMV years, most women really believe attractive men would always be available to them for whatever they want/need them for, whenever they want/need them.

Women are not only solipsistic in the short term, they're also solipsistic about the long term.

As I described in last week's post about the Rupture of the MMP, women simply cannot understand why men cannot or will not do what they want. It just doesn't compute. Women view men not doing these things as a personal affront, as if men are supposed to self-improve for them.

A key reason for this is that many women have never really seen a grown man go through his life, because they grew up as young girls not living with their fathers. They've never seen an adult man live his life, how he lives, how he works, what he likes, the daily and weekly rhythms and ups and downs that he experiences. They don't even really know how to live with a man. Not a boy, not her brother – a man. Living with brothers is similar, but not the same. Girls watch their brothers interact with other girls in overtly sexual ways, so she learns about boys' sexual proclivities and responses. But brother doesn't show or teach her much else. (In fairness, the reverse is true too – at least some men aren't much keyed in to women's motivations and timetables, and that too has caused a lot of these problems.)

Women understand what attracts men, and what men like, for the most part. Women know how to attract men. But women in their 20s and 30s don't really understand men's different timetables and motivations for interacting with women at differing stages of men's lives and that can make it hard for women to relate to men on anything more than a superficial level. They don't understand or really care about why men do what they do sexually and relationally, and why they make the decisions they make, until it really starts affecting them. They don't understand or care much to understand, why men decide to have sex, how they go about picking women for sex and relationships, and how men view the roles of sex, commitment, marriage, and parenthood in their own lives. Men and women are not the same at all in this regard. And a lot of women aren't much attuned to those things.

Women don't care about unattractive men going their own way. They don't care about unattractive men, period. Women are just fine with unattractive men doing whatever they do, so long as those men do it away from them. The only times women care about unattractive men are when one tries to get on her radar (where she tries to avoid them) or her attempts to get their money via her online webpage or OnlyFans site (where she feigns "interest" for the sake of collecting $$$).

Women don't see or don't know about men trying and failing, or having already been through repeated rejection and failure with women, or men's ineptitude at dating and sex, or men doing the risk/benefit analysis and concluding it's not worth it, and so they conclude, "Those men are screwing this whole thing up! They're not doing what they're supposed to do! They're just not keeping up! Don't they know they're supposed to be ready to be sex partners, boyfriends, husbands, and fathers when we need them? Hey, men, what's your problem?? Why are you just sitting there not doing anything? You're supposed to be courting us, asking us out, dating us, marrying us, and fathering our kids!"

This is of course because the attractive men they were having sex with a few years before aren't interested in commitment with them, or have since picked someone else and are unavailable. So they're left with the less attractive men, who of course were either playing a different game with different women, or not playing, or unable to play. So there are very few attractive men left when they're looking to marry in their mid-20s to early 30s. Jack called this a mating glut, and it is.

Even though men who go MGTOW are most likely NOT in the top 20 percentile of men, nor are they in the wider pool of Betas comprising the marriage market, women are ignorant enough to conflate the whole MGTOW movement as a shortage of attractive or marriageable men.

Furthermore, they view MGTOW as being a problem that men caused. To women, the problem is "weak men screwing feminism up" (as Dalrock accurately called it). Women's view on this is that women are advancing and doing it on their own, and it is men's job to stay apace with what women are doing. It's men's job to improve themselves, be fit and good looking, and to be high earners, so they can be selected for sex and for LTRs and marriage, as women deem appropriate, when women want them. Women think that men not doing these things are being selfish, shallow, short sighted, immature, insecure, and "afraid of commitment". In other words, "screwing it all up".

Look up "apex fallacy" – the erroneous assumption that the characteristics of the top members of a group apply to all members of the group. Only top quality men are "visible" to women, so they believe that all men, including ones they don't know, including men they have never talked to or noticed, and including unattractive men, are out there having all kinds of sex, all the time. I've talked to several women who have never heard of MGTOW or the Manosphere who really do believe this. And they believe it because that's what the attractive men they're watching and having sex with are doing. Their conclusion is that "If the hot guys I have sex with are doing this, then that must be what all men are doing, right? I mean, men are all horn dogs, so they're out there getting sex from someone, somewhere, right?"

So when women hear about MGTOW, they conclude that Bradley Betabux has gone AWOL and is now off the sexual market. Although this idea is ridiculous at face value, they think this is reality – and it is terrifying to them.

So that's what is going on. Women don't really care about MGTOW until it comes time to find men to marry, and there aren't any men left. They don't understand why the guys "aren't keeping up". And they don't understand what's motivating men at different times in their lives. They also fail to understand that men who go MGTOW are not the same men they are after, so they fall victim to their own ignorance and fears.

Related

- Spawny's Space: The Future of MGTOW by Deti (2016-10-31)
- Σ Frame (Novaseeker): The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021-02-17)
- Biblical Gender Roles: Are There Any Marriageable Gen Z Men? (2021-07-14)

Avoiding the Broken Window Effect

Jack · 21 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

How we treat other men is a community quality indicator.

Readership: Regular readers; Those who are interested in the Christian Manosphere.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 16 minutes

> "Feminism is a disease of envy. It spreads via women due to the temptation to envy the position of men. For men, it spreads via the temptation to declare oneself the only real man, as other men aren't worthy of respect."
>
> Dalrock: "No respect." (2017/12/14)

Introduction

The Broken Window Theory is a theory in psychology that describes human behavior as a manifestation of the environment, and vice versa. This theory states that an ordered and clean environment — one that is maintained — sends the signal that the area is monitored and that criminal behavior is not tolerated. As a result, the area is less likely to attract mischief. Conversely, a disordered environment — one that is not maintained (broken windows, excessive litter, graffiti, etc.) — sends the signal that the area is not monitored, and that criminal behavior has little risk of detection. The result is that criminal behavior is more likely to occur.

A corollary to the broken windows theory states that an area that is in disrepair attracts rascals, refuse, vandalism, and so on. Whereas, an area that is carefully maintained is more likely to be seen as someone's "home" or private property, and will be treated accordingly.

This theory assumes that the landscape "communicates" a message to people about the status of the area. A broken window is used as a figurative representation that transmits several messages about the community.

- It displays negligence, carelessness, and/or a lack of awareness.

- The owner/community is poor, defenseless, and vulnerable.
- The owner/community is unable or unwilling to defend itself against the trespassing of boundaries.
- There is a lack of cohesiveness among the people within. Neighborhoods with a strong sense of cohesion fix broken windows and assert social responsibility on themselves — effectively giving themselves control over their space.
- Overall, it indicates a lack of informal social control.

The slow deterioration of a community as a result of the Broken Window Effect modifies the way people behave when it comes to their communal space, which in turn breaks down community control. This process is outlined as follows.

1. Under the impression that a broken window left unfixed signifies dereliction and decadence, outsiders recognize the shabbiness as a place where they can abuse the social order and "dump their trash".
2. Addicts, charlatans, drunks, feminists, grifters, mendicants, players, prostitutes, rowdy teenagers, Racial firebrands, SJW hawks, whoremongers, Woke wankers, and other seedy characters slowly begin to gravitate towards and make their way into the community.
3. The community fails to assert informal social control, and these characters begin to assume more confidence in subverting the social order.
4. A Tragedy of the Commons ensues.
5. Residents begin to change the way they see their community, and become less willing to invest in the welfare and maintenance thereof.
6. As shady characters inflict further damage and ruin, members of the community become afraid of worse things happening.
7. In an attempt to stay safe, individuals start to spend less time in communal space to avoid potential violent attacks by strangers. As a result, they spend less time in the streets to avoid these subjects, and feel increasingly disconnected from their community if the problems persist.
8. A cohesive community starts to fall apart.
9. A self-perpetuating cycle ensues, which goes back to (1).

As our readers already know, western society is already several cycles into this dissolution.

Men need to defend the interests of other men

We are inclined to stand by and watch the mess unfold and say it is out of our control. But there are things men can do to preserve their community, even if that community only includes a small men's fellowship group or their own family.

For example, most of us have been taught from a young age that men should be standing up for the interests and welfare of women, but as we have learned from Dalrock et al., this can disintegrate into Chivalry and man bashing rather easily. Instead of acutely focusing on the wants and needs of women (who are never fully satisfied), men need to promulgate and defend the interests and domains of other men.

Of note, courtship, marriage, marital sanctity, and procreation are personal domains representing an acute interest of men that needs to be emphasized and explored. I'll cover this in more detail further down.

Men should not judge other men by womens' standards

I need to clarify that last Friday's post, The Feminine Christian Marriage Quadrilemma (2021/7/16) is mansplaining women's perspectives. It doesn't address men's viewpoint on the issue, but it does offer some insights that might be of value to men, especially fathers who need some good mental fodder to feed their daughters.

Under this post, Lastmod wrote,

> "Jack… Doesn't this whole post come down to pretty much (and if I am wrong, you will correct me) in the modern Christian world:
>
> Men, be in the top 20% by the time you are of age and you won't really notice there is a problem, and if there is one…. well, the rest just need to "step up" and be like them."

I would never say what Lastmod wrote. The reason is because what he wrote is essentially a "Man up!" quip, and it's insulting to men. I don't mean to "politely" imply that message either. I do try to inspire men to have the courage to do the things they need to be doing, but that is not intended to be taken as a condescending "Man up!" lecture.

I disagree with this viewpoint because ultimately, it assumes that a man's whole purpose and value in life is based on whether he can have a Meet Cute, or get laid, or whatever, and that men who don't (or can't) are "lesser men" who are not worthy of respect (c.f. Dalrock's quotation at top). Thus, it sets up women and women's imperatives as the collective judge of men's character. In other words, it is gynocentric, as are many of the viewpoints common to the Manosphere.

It is clear that Lastmod disagrees with the information given around the Manosphere, because he often points out how ridiculous and impossible it is, but he is correct to identify various symptoms of the disease of feminism within it — how men judge other men in terms of their "success" with women, and how this foments bitterness and envy.

To make this point clear, I'll quote something Lastmod wrote a while back. [Edited for clarity.]

> "The "real man red pill christian man-o-sphere" is just a place where action means nothing and what matters is how much of a hit with the ladies you are, or how they look at you matters more than anything. Who can shut down or put down someone faster than someone else… and they call this intelligence or leadership. This is the norm… Hence why men are not "banging on the doors" here to become Christian… or even learn about it."

It is clear that Lastmod thinks the Christian Manosphere is all about scoring with women by some metric. He is objecting to this, which is correct, but the fact that he is objecting to this tells me that he believes it is true. It's also clear that he feels rejected. This is a sad indicator of our world today.

This is exactly why I am diligent in keeping the comments section respectful and dignified. I am proud to say that no one on this blog has insulted him (nor anyone else) beyond whatever might be constituted by a disagreement. I won't allow it because it's a crack in the Broken Window dynamic.

Case Study 1 — Oscar defends the dignity of men

Oscar shared this powerful anecdote with us in a comment.

> "I've been dropping some of the truths we discuss here at the men's Bible study at church. I've been surprised at the response. I thought I might get run out of church, but the opposite has happened.
>
> The last time we met, I dropped the "70% of divorces are filed by women" fact. Three of the men – who rarely speak up, and I didn't even know were divorced — told about their horrible experiences with being shoved through the meat grinder.
>
> You should've seen the looks on their faces when I said that the "women are responders" line was cruel to decent men who were divorced by their wives. Those guys looked like, "Holy crap! Someone finally said it!"

This is awesome! Men need to say/do things like this on the regular.

What is the purpose and overall impact of the Christian Manosphere?

In another comment, Lastmod brought up the idea of a mission statement.

Now, I can see how a person might think that this whole blog is gynocentric, or sex-centric, but the purpose is more about devising an accurate "mental map" of the Mating Market Place (marriage in particular), and effective "wife management" (and daughters too), rather than trying to measure up to women's expectations, or getting laid, or what not, as is the focus of most other internet media catering to male interests.*

Also, men should be encouraging and exhorting other men. Doing the opposite is the same as falling victim to the feminist disease of envy, and that is a sin! This cannot be emphasized enough.

 I do believe that there are a number of men who are called by God to marriage and family (including myself), so for men like this, there is more of a valid reason for gauging his performance with a hat tip to its impact on women as a type of feedback look. But in general, this is an inversion of priorities according to God's archetype of authority (i.e. Headship).*

Case Study 2 — Scott and Jason

Earlier this year, Scott went to California on business. While he was there, he made the effort to meet with Jason (AKA Lastmod). The Natural reaches out to the Underdog! During their meeting, they were able to attain a mutual respect for each other.

Since then, Scott and Jason have continued their dialogue online, and Jason's general outlook on life has seen a remarkable improvement. He is also more diligent in expressing himself well. Many times readers have agreed with his views, especially as of late.

I am really touched and personally inspired by this.

Some readers may not like Scott for whatever various reasons, but actions speak louder than words.

This is what men need to be doing, and not c0ck blocking, or "My N count is larger than yours!" or "My Red Pill is redder than yours!" etc.

The Christian Manosphere should be defending Marriage and Family

As of late, the very idea of marriage has become anathema! This is partly due to all the talk around the 'sphere about how marriage is to be avoided at all costs.

When we look at the social context in western society, this is sound advice on the face of it. This advice is intended to shield men from the tragedies common to marriage today. But ultimately, it is also a dead end that cuts men and women off from marriage and family. Blindly following this advice would prevent any possible joy, legacy, sanctification, or contentment that might otherwise have been found through marriage.

We should also remember 1 Timothy 4:1-3.

> [1] Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils;
> [2] Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron;
> [3] Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

This is kind of like what feminists tell women under the age of 26 to do — avoid marriage. In fact, the opposite is true. Women should be getting married before the age of 26. Not doing so compromises the sanctity of marriage.

I take the same opposite approach, but I'm not going to let readers be ignorant about what that involves.

So in response to all those voices saying, "Marriage is a bad deal. Avoid it at all costs!", I say, "Following God is more important." That doesn't mean it's going to be easy nor without problems and disappointments.

This is not the same as a "Man Up (and marry that slore)!" lecture, because only God should be the judge of your convictions, not some random manospherian commenter.

So let's not reject marriage out of a reactionary fear of societal forces. Let's give God a chance.

Based Media Sources that cover Marriage and Family

Dalrock made his mark as a Manosphere personality who defended the dignity of men and the sanctity of marriage fully from a Christian viewpoint. Nowadays, there is a modest number of blogs, podcasts, or YouTube channels that are still pushing marriage and discussing how to make it work.

Here's a short list of a few sources that endorse marriage and family to varying degrees of intensity.

- Christianity and Masculinity
- Cornerstone addresses women's weaknesses and paints the picture of how things should be.
- Eric Conn and friends
- Full Metal Patriarchy address some intersexual problems within the church.
- Jesse Peterson carries the assumption that marriage is something holy, and he tosses out truth bombs about it quite regularly. (Peterson's YouTube channel)
- Laughing at Feminism — Sharkly's mission is to reinstate Biblical Headship.
- Matthew E. Cochran has some good posts about sex and marriage once in a blue moon.
- Pete Rambo at 11:3 Restoration
- Spawny's Space

Readers are welcome to add others to this list.

Again, a lot of male spaces routinely condemn marriage, or at best, tiptoe around the idea of marriage. They're not picking the problems of modern marriage apart in great detail. They are not theorizing many "solutions" or "strategies". They're not leaving that option open to men. They're throwing rocks at a man's castle before he's even begun to build it.

The Measure of a Man is His Readiness in Taking Action in Obedience to His Life Calling

I need to address one last issue. Lastmod asked,

> "How does a young man navigate this? I mean, it seems to be just becoming an "elite" thing for top men and women who just happened to fall out of the womb with the genetics, qualities, and traits that drive this market now."

The fact is, the grand majority of men don't have that much latitude in being among the top 20%. There are only about 10-20% of men who are not "visible" to women, but who are also in a position where they could improve themselves enough to become "visible" to women. Deep Strength's blog (Christianity and Masculinity) is geared towards that small demographic.

Since Lastmod said he is basically Black Pill/MGTOW, he (and other men like him) might do well to take an armchair philosopher's approach to the matter (which Lastmod is already doing quite well), or else, ignore such advice altogether.

Judging by the nature of Lastmod's many comments, here is the thing that I think is very difficult for him and many other men to grasp. Many real-world solutions cannot be found by taking an armchair philosopher's approach. The reason is because a man can get stymied in the contradictory logic, the dilemmas, the conundrums… (which have been covered fairly well here), and then he never makes any real progress. It just doesn't work that way.

Instead, a man has to start where ever he is, using whatever he's got, and work from there. He must be driven by his conviction, and be sensitive to whatever opportunities he can find through faith. He cannot try to mastermind his whole life before he begins to do anything. Thinking about things too much will make him blind to what is happening in the NOW. I wrote about this in Taking Headship by Force (2021/5/26), under the section entitled, "Get Action!".

The beautiful magic of taking action first and then thinking it over along the way is that unexpected things happen and things change. Meanwhile, you're making a little progress on something. Now, if a man is not finding any opportunities in life in which to exercise faith and "do something" that has spiritual significance, then he needs to make some major changes in his life. (That is partly why I traveled to China and Taiwan.) A man has to follow his deeper convictions and go to (or create) an environment where things will click for him.

The Christian Manosphere should be offering a roadmap about how this works, outlining the potential pitfalls, and what is to be expected.

Conclusions

Men are suffering from the disease of feminism, which is the habit of judging men by gynocentric standards, that is to say, men who are attractive to women are seen to be better men. This contributes to the Broken Window effect within the men's community, both online and IRL. Men need to get out of this habit and censure other men who do so.

Instead of being held to a gynocentric standard of value, men should be judged by whether they are fulfilling their God ordained calling in life. Men who are not doing so should be regarded as men who need fellowship, mentorship, and guidance, and not simply ridiculed and dismissed as "deadbeat dads", purposeless buffoons, and/or lazy weaklings.

How we treat other men is a community quality indicator. It's also displays the community's general stance towards male authority and headship. Ultimately, it characterizes the community's fear of God.

The Christian Manosphere should be leading the wider 'sphere in the display of respect to all men and the promulgation of men's prime interests according to each man's calling.

That includes marriage.

Exit Questions

1. Does the Christian Manosphere suffer from the disease of feminism? If so, then call it out.
2. What are some other authors, blogs, podcasts, or YouTube channels (that are not mentioned above) that support and defend marriage (i.e. Biblical Headship)?
3. Do the men your church/men's group fellowship extend mutual respect and enthusiastically support comradery among men?

Related

- Σ Frame: The Dispensation of the Red Pill (2018/4/7)
- Σ Frame: What is the Christian Red Pill? (2020/11/27)
- Σ Frame: Is the Christian Red Pill a Black Pill? (2020/11/29)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Charting the Red Pill World (2021/3/26)

On Red Pill Awareness

thedeti · 23 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill is equivalent to profanity. Only talk about it with those you trust.

Readership: Men
Author's Note: This post is based on some previous comments and has had some input from Jack.
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

The Red Pill is going Mainstream

Scott's recent post posed the question, What is preventing the Red Pill from going mainstream? (2021/7/17).

In this post, Scott's main point is that Red Pill theories are not being examined in academia as a scientific research subject, and he gives several reasons about why this is. I will not argue about that. I do think intersexual dynamics need to be diligently studied and further understood from a scientific viewpoint, if that is even possible.

However, I disagree that Red Pill theories are not going mainstream.

We can define "mainstream" as "the ideas, attitudes, or activities that are regarded as normal or conventional; the dominant trend in opinion, fashion, or the arts." "Mainstream" is that which is part of the body of knowledge and discussion among the general public; things and ideas that are generally known and understood to most people.

The reason I think RP is mainstream is because all men pretty much know at least two core RP tenets:

1. Marriage is a bad deal for men.
2. AF/BB

When you think about it a little more, most of RP is within many if not most men's working knowledge. They just don't call it Red Pill or Game or Manosphere.

Think about it.

- "Divorce is horrible – I have to pay like 50% of my salary in child support and alimony! The alimony will last another 3 years!" = Divorce rape.
- "Even Christian girls are sleeping around." = Observations of female nature and hypergamy.
- "Girls keep breaking up with me, I don't seem to be good enough" = Hypergamy
- "Girls reject nice guys till they can't get the hot guys to marry them, then they pick a nice guy they rejected 10 years before" = AF/BB
- "Girls say they are attracted to nice guys; then they ride off on the back of Harley McBadboy's bike. Girls are lying when they say they're attracted to nice men" = "Don't listen to what girls say; watch what they do"
- "Marriage isn't a good deal for men. Men should not marry." = MGTOW
- Movies like "About Last Night", "Blue Valentine", "Crazy, Stupid, Love", and "Fast Times at Ridgemont High" show men exercising both Frame and Game.

Granted, not all men are Red Pilled as we would understand it. There is a huge difference between a Blue Pilled Alpha and a Red Pilled Alpha, for example. But my point is that the information is out there for anyone who wants to study it, and yes, a lot of men are discussing it, maybe not very seriously, but it is well known.

As a comparison, 20 years ago, every man was Blue Pilled, and there was almost no information out there to the contrary. Sure, some men had game, but they weren't very well aware of it. Scott is a good example (or maybe I should say, was, years ago). It just comes naturally to him, and he never thought about it, and probably didn't really understand it too well either. As long as chicks are coming, who cares, right?

What we have now is a greater awareness of the details and mechanisms of Red Pill dynamics. The point is that most men understand basic Red Pill, it's just that only a small number of us have extensive theories about it and call it by the name "Red Pill".

Precision Control

The Red Pill Offers a Silent Hope

Elspeth wrote,

> "[The Red Pill isn't being taken seriously and going mainstream] Because it doesn't offer hope to average men and women. And most people. by definition, are average and cannot be the best, brightest, or most beautiful.
>
> If everyone swallowed The Red Pill, things would be even worse than they are now. People need hope. Hope is how we keep going, what motivates us to take a chance on love."

I agree that some things would get worse. I agree that the purpose of The Red Pill is not to provide hope to the masses. Yes, in fact it destroys hope.

But Elspeth's viewpoint is only half the story. The Red Pill destroys hope, but at the same time, it gives new hope! And this new hope is much closer to the truth!

- Living life knowing the facts and the truth about male and female nature gives hope.
- Becoming familiar with the probable outcomes of a wide array of choices helps you devise an optimal strategy for making decisions about women, marriage, and life in general.
- Learning Scott's Axiom and how to read IOIs can get your foot in the door to a relationship.
- Becoming well versed in women's habits of branch swinging, gaslighting, hamsterbating, projection, solipsism, and so on, allows you to watch out for those things and take preemptive action. It also allows you to recognize a woman who is NOT doing those things and who might be a keeper.

- Knowing why you can't "make it with the girls" gives you a new set of choices about what to do with your life.

Now, TALKING about the facts and the truth about male and female nature is what makes people feel hopeless, because their hopes are built on Blue Pilled delusions. CH called these delusions "pretty lies", and that is exactly what they are.

Feeriker wrote a good comment on this point.

> "There is a very fine line between hope and (self-)delusion. The RP can be, and often is, a very bitter pill to swallow. Yet if everyone swallowed it (or had it forced down their throats), would not the realities it laid bare for both sexes ultimately compel most sane people –again, of both sexes— to adapt to reality, to adjust their expectations, to recognize the untenable nature of the status quo, and thus, in coping, find some degree of inner peace where none previously existed?
>
> The problem, of course, is that both sexes would have to swallow the RP in large numbers for anything to change. I think it's safe to say that the earth will suddenly reverse its rotational direction before that ever happens."

Unfortunately, Feeriker is right. The most we can do is talk about Red Pill to those men who are ready for it. And no, not all men are ready for it. As Rock and Red Pill Boomer pointed out, some men and women are actually better off without it! But some men would be infinitely better off knowing.

TALKING about Red Pill is not and can never be mainstream.

Everybody "gets" Red Pill. It's just that no one wants men to talk about Red Pill.

As I mentioned in the last section, TALKING about the facts and the truth about male and female nature makes people feel hopeless because their hopes are built on Blue Pilled delusions. But there are more reasons why no one wants to TALK about these things in public.

- It holds a mirror up to women and forces them to look at what they do and how it affects others.
- It discredits women.
- It makes clear that some of what women do is untrustworthy, unsavory, and unseemly.

- It holds them up to judgment and rejection.

Women honestly and truly believe men don't have a right to judge them, reject them, have standards for them, or hold them to standards. They vehemently hate it when lower tier men try to impose standards on them.

The reason no one wants to do this is because…

- Women absolutely HATE it when you point out to women the crappy things they do.
- Women absolutely HATE it when men tell the truth about what they do.
- Women absolutely HATE being judged and rejected by men – especially men they think are beneath them.

Because that's "being mean to women". That's "lying about women", "misogyny", and "toxic masculinity", et cetera, ad hamster hoc, and ad insane san finitum.

So that's why Red Pill doesn't get talked about, even though a lot more men understand it than when I was a young man.

That's why we don't see Red Pill concepts streaming on CNN or NPR or the Saturday morning cartoons. We never will. (That's what I think some people mean by "mainstream", as in "mainstream narrative".) We might see some manifestations of it, but only if we're already aware of it and are looking for it. But the core ideas are, and will always be the elephant in the room, something everyone knows but refuses to discuss. So they keep it neatly tucked away as if it were equivalent to profane language or pornography. (In some ways, it is.)

Women Resist the Red Pill Truth

As a form of self-defense against being exposed to this truth, and against the erosion of the gynapotheosis in general, women shame men. Women call men names. Women accuse low SMV men of chauvinism, misogyny, "thought crime", etc. Women accuse high SMV men of "emotional rape", emotional "unavailability", cheating, being terrified of commitment, and so on.

The list goes on and on…

- "Toxic masculinity"
- "Masculinity is toxic"
- "Men need to man up!"
- "Man up and marry the sluts!"
- "Where are all the good men??"
- "Men are not preparing to get married!"
- *"Men are just Peter Pan manboys who won't grow up!"
- "Men need to step up and be stepfathers to single moms' kids."
- If you won't date or marry a fat/weird/mentally ill woman/slut, then… "You're a bad, selfish, evil, misogynist." / "You're not a real Christian." / "You need to check your heart."

In general, men should be standing up to this femtalk, but the current status makes the best way to do this into something complicated, difficult, and risky for men. Many men are coming to the conclusion that the juice is just not worth the squeeze, and they walk away.

 Jack touched on this before in Redefining Manhood as Boyish Immaturity (2021/6/14).*

Conclusions

The Red Pill is a short hand way of saying, "Know and internalize the truth". The truth is, and always has been mainstream. Or at least the most important parts are. It's just that most people don't want to face it, and there are a multitude of social forces that try to cover it up.

DO NOT talk about The Red Pill to spaced out girls and Woke cucks who will run screaming from the room because they lack the courage to face the truth.

DO talk about The Red Pill to those individuals with whom we have the opportunity to do so, close trusted friends, men we are mentoring, and those women for whom we have a covenant responsibility, i.e. wives and daughters.

The number one symptom of Red Pill going mainstream is men walking away from marriage, men not preparing for marriage, and men going their own way (MGTOW).

That's Red Pill.

As a side note to the ladies: If you want men, you're going to have to give them something they actually want. You have to cooperate with them, and you have to give them a reason to stay with you long term. You need to be fit, feminine, friendly, submissive, cooperative, and enthusiastically sexual. If you cannot or will not do those things, men will keep on moving. We're not going to put up with constant fighting and sexual deprivation from b!tchy, self-centered harridans topping from the bottom. We're not taking on stepchildren. We're not paying your credit card bills or student loans. In short, we're not taking your BS anymore.

You can hate on this truth all you want. Knock yourself out with a grand mal hissy fit! But that's the truth, and nothing is going to change this until you face up to it.

Related

- Σ Frame (Jack): The Dispensation of the Red Pill (2018/4/7)
- Σ Frame (Blair Naso) Red Pill Political Correctness (2019/3/17)
- Σ Frame (Scott): What would the world be like if everyone was Red Pilled? (2021/3/13)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Charting the Red Pill World (2021/3/26)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Red Pill Grifters (2021/4/7)
- Σ Game: AI Explains the First Rule of SSH (2025/8/8)

Women Crave Male Attention

Jack · 26 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Women need attention like men need sex.

Readership: Men; Christian Men
Author's Note: In this post, I've compiled text from several comments about how and why women value male attention.
Reader's Note: This post offers a concise summary of an older topic that deserves highlighting.
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Women Crave Male Attention

Women, especially attractive young ones, don't like to admit to a lot of the more unsavory truths about their behaviors and motives, often even to themselves really, but we can still discern what's going on by observing what they do closely.

In addition to the fact that women never talk about the invidious aspects of their own nature, they are also rather skilled in hiding these things as well. As a result, it's somewhat easy for men to miss the fundamental features of women's nature, but it's there.

Once you learn to look for it, it's pretty unmistakable that one of these fundamental features is that women want attention. It stimulates dopamine in the female hindbrain much like sex does for men. Women absolutely crave it, like men crave the sexual act.

In addition, male attention is a form of social currency for attractive women.

For example, a woman may not be attracted at all to the cop who pulls her over for a speeding ticket, but she hopes she is attractive enough to him to be able to charm her way out of a ticket by some light, non-obvious flirting — even if the guy is repulsive to her physically.

Rollo refers to "attention" and "affirmation", as the most powerful currencies in female social conventions.

In this short video, Rollo goes over the phases of the female life span.

Note that during a woman's peak SMV years, the attention flows non-stop, followed by 50+ years of very little attention or none at all.

May I have your attention?!?

Women place value on attention from anyone, especially attractive men, but also from unattractive men. Just like men will seldom turn down sex with any woman, women will hardly ever refuse attention from any man. Women will go out of their way to make themselves be attractive to men that they aren't attracted to. It's useful because her attractiveness draws the much coveted attention from men.

Of course if she's around an attractive man who's pushing the buttons, she will get aroused, but it's not necessary for a woman to have sex to get aroused by the attention. Women are known to dangle the hope of sex in front of a man, like a carrot on a stick, merely to attract men's attention to themselves, and for no other purpose. Most men fail to get this memo, and chase after flirty women thinking that she has at least somewhat serious intentions behind her interest. But seldom is this the case. If a woman has to have sex with a man to get and keep his attention (or money, or whatever else she wants from that man), she'll do it – even if she's not sexually aroused, but this tends to be a last resort when she's desperate for attention and no better options are presented.

It's like this. When an attractive woman enters a bar, she enjoys feeling all the male eyes check her out through her peripheral vision. She can feel the weight of their stares, and it's exhilarating to her. She likes being in command of that tantalizing desire for her. She likes that they admire her – even the guys she wouldn't give the time of day to. She likes that she is considered hot in general, as long as the guys who are unattractive stay in their "cages" and do not approach or do anything like that to annoy her. She wants to soak in the attention with a minimum of discomfiture, which entails that attention from men who are not attractive to them is expressed in a way that is only beneficial to the woman and is never threatening or demanding of her. The Objectification of Reproductive Potential must deliver an Ego Rush or else it is Chauvinistic.

In general, men will not voluntarily interact with a woman who does not generate sexual interest. Whenever men are interacting with a woman, they're always thinking of the next step, or the next phase of the relationship leading towards sex and sanctification. Women don't think that far. They already got what they wanted from that brief interaction — Attention.

This is why women love to keep a large number of Beta orbiters in the Friend Zone – men whom they have absolutely no interest in romantically. It's for the attention and affirmation. That's what they want out of the relationship, and since much alone this gives them what they want, there is no motivation for them to invest anything more into the relationship.

Now, of course, they likely would never admit to any of that, but that's another story.

Attention feeds the feral feminine appetites for Envy and Drama

Even between women, garnering attention is one of the ways that women compare themselves to each other on the female "leaderboards", if you will, contributing to the determination of who is the Queen Bee. The Queen Bee always turns out to be the woman who can keep herself stoked high on a dopamine fueled ego rush via various vectors. But all of these vectors are based on women's overall level of attractiveness/ability to turn heads "in general" (not just Ryan Reynolds' head), her social skills in navigating those waters, and maintaining her own ego as supreme.

One significant way that women compare themselves to each other nowadays is "likes" on social media, especially for pictures. This activity also taps into the dopamine rush, and when coupled with attention, it is a double hit.

They all know that most of those likes are from men who are “creepy” in the sense that they would not give these guys the time of day either online or offline … but they still want the dopamine surge from getting likes. They want the guys to be attracted to them, it feeds them, it empowers them in competition with each other (“who is the fairest of them all”), and it’s a currency they deploy with men when necessary or useful.

In general, men despise the insatiable female appetite for envy and drama, so smart women have to know how to capitalize on their own hunger for attention without trampling on toes.

Case Study – Acid Attacks

Once in a while, we’ll hear reports of acid attacks* in other parts of the world, usually from India and Pakistan. Westerners tend to be confused about the overall purpose of this egregious aggression which forever mars feminine beauty. But Indians clearly recognize this as a clumsy but very effective attempt to eliminate the envy and drama (and in some cases, extra-marital affairs) arising from women’s addiction to attention. It’s a strike at the core of a woman’s human value, which nips not just the bud, but the root itself.

 If you do a search for this online, be prepared for some gruesome images.*
 It’s also done in revenge by jilted lovers and by husbands who are dissatisfied with the wife’s dowry. Of course, I condemn such actions.*

OASIS Scratches the Itch

NovaSeeker spearheaded an investigation of Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS, e.g. OnlyFans) back in January and February. More recently, Rollo has started to focus on the OnlyFans phenomenon too.

It’s not hard to understand why more and more girls are turning to sugaring. They get attention. Even better, they get paid to get attention. It’s prostitution for all intents and purposes, but they really don’t care and they don’t have any kind of moral problem with this at all.

There are social factors pushing women into OASIS too. Men are waking up to the fact that the cards are stacked against them. So many women can’t get boyfriends to take them out and pay for their stuff. They can’t get men to bite the bullet and wife them up, at least not until she panics and he relents because he's so hard up. So they turn to sugaring.

Hence the rise in online attention gathering and the increasing taboo-ization of in-person attention expressing by men. The internet is the ultimate "safe space" for women to accumulate the attention of unattractive men in a way that is undemanding and unthreatening (for the most part, cyber-stalking and so on aside), and so we see a virtual stampede of women into social media, copiously displaying their coons and reveling in the male attention.

It's because women want attention, and they'll get it any way they can. Just as men want sex, and they'll get it any way they can.

Women still want real world attention more than online attention. But they want it from men their hindbrains consider a possibility for marriage (LTR). They don't want it from men their hindbrains don't consider suitable for marriage, thus, workplace harassment charges for micro-offenses. I'd say, based on observation, they want it from alphas and greater betas (top 20%). They don't want it from lesser betas and deltas (middle 60%) nor gammas (bottom 20%). My guess is they don't think much about gammas and lesser betas, one way or the other, looking at them online. As we say around the 'sphere, they are invisible.

Online (monetized porn sites aside), they don't know who's looking at them. But similar to real life, they probably still prefer online attention from men their hindbrains consider a possibility for a satisfying hookup or marriage.

Hitting the Wall hits women where it hurts the most (No more Attention)

As women age, they attract less attention from men.

Women notice when men's eyes, in general, stop following them around. Most of those eyes are the eyes of men that women couldn't care less about, but they still notice when they stop getting noticed by them, and they care about it – deeply. They miss that attention when it dissipates. They do care, of course, much more about the attention of the attractive men, but the fact is that when they lose the "general attention", they notice, and they do not like it.

Older women often say that the thing they miss MOST from their youth is being noticed by men. & Women aging into early middle age become wistful about how they became "invisible" to men — suddenly men who would previously be checking them out in grocery lines, on the subway, while jogging, would just look right past them or never look up from their phones or what have you. They like being "generally attractive", even to men to whom they would not give even the time of day. and they are acutely aware of this slow attrition. They notice when it goes away, and they hate it.

Some women may not admit it openly, but most all women are acutely aware of it, and they do miss it when it's gone, because it's the before (attention when young) and after (attention when older) that they are comparing when it goes missing. For women who are quite pretty younger in life, it's actually quite traumatic when they fall off the “general male radar screen” in that way. So they notice when men in general stop noticing, even though, when they are young, they take said noticing from unattractive men for granted.

Men crave female attention too, but seldom get it

Men desire attention from women in the form of humble, natural affection from women, not just sex. In fact, sex without the reciprocation of her natural affection is rather cold, empty, and unsatisfying. Men are attracted to women who are sufficiently comfortable in their vulnerability to display this kind of attention. It stimulates his ego, which is very important for his personal growth.

One of the greatest joys of a Meet Cute is when a man can watch a woman animate and feel her heart “light up” from his attention. In essence, she is returning his attention. But this usually only happens when the woman doesn’t get that much attention to begin with. Because modern western women are steeped in constant attention, waxed thick with effervescent moxies, few men can ever have this experience. Being emotionally jaded and spiritually defiled from the CC makes this a certainty.

Concluding Statements

In closing, I’ll offer this question as an interesting thought experiment:

Women receive ego affirmation from ANY attention from ANY man. Women can slap on some red lipstick and get attention. It’s that easy!

What would the world be like if men could get sex from women as easily as women get attention from men?!?

Just imagine if a man could paint his nose blue and every woman who sees it will immediately give him sex!!!

Imagine if a man paints his nose blue, takes a few selfies and posts them online, and he gets a thousand “likes”. Women are paying him cash to see photos of his blue nose. Women are knocking on his door to get that blue nose sniffing in their snatch.

It seems like an incredulous fantasy land, but yet that is what the world is like for young women!

It’s just too easy – when they’re young, that is.

References

1. Cameron's comment
2. NovaSeeker's comment
3. Cameron232's comment
4. NovaSeeker's comment
5. TheDeti's comment

Related

- The Rational Male: Operative Social Conventions (2011-09-09)
- The Rational Male: Your Attention Please. (2012-09-21)
- Σ Frame: Exploiting Online Attention (2020-12-09)

The Sexual De-Evolution

Jack · 28 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A throwback to the 50s would only lead us to where we are now.

Readership: All
Author's Note: I said I would write this post a long while back, 2017 December 14 to be exact.
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

> "More lonely, fewer friends, less sex… But we have smartphones and the internet!"
>
> The Atlantic (feat. Jean M. Twenge): Have Smart Phones Destroyed A Generation? (August 3, 2017)

Introduction

There is a widespread conception that middle America in the 1950s was a conservative's tree house. OTOH, there is also the notion that the 1950s was a period of stodgy puritanism. This analogy is usually mentioned whenever a female gets called out for dressing seductively.* The cliched retort is, "The 50s called… they want their narrative back!"

This post will blow both of these notions apart.

While it is true that the 1950s were a "High" in American socio-economic-political history, therein lay the rot that led to the unraveling in subsequent decades.

Boxer (Secret King of All Gamma Males) wrote,

> "The most obvious problem [with the Alpha/Beta/Gamma/etc. socio-sexual hierarchy heuristic] is that they're clearly socially constructed. Basing a hierarchy on who gets most sex would have our married, potbellied, Ward Cleaver type grandfathers as the "alphas" of the 1950s, and the motorcycle-riding cad as the "beta" who > wanders from town to town, having sex with prostitutes. Most women in that era wouldn't touch him, and he was run out of town (and sometimes got his ass kicked) when he ran day game down at the laundromat. The current regime is only in place because of artificial surpluses due to mechanization and immigration, and only the most shortsighted would think it meaningful."

Is the Alpha/Beta hierarchy, and by extension, the intrinsic sociosexual marketplace in which women favor Alphas, merely a construct that only applies to the current SMP? Or does it run back farther?

To address this question, first we'll look at the prevalence of fornication in the 1950s, and then compare that to the trends in recent years.

 As Earl once noted, women love to dress to entice but hate being called on it. It pops the bubble of two narratives, (1)* "Women good, men bad", and (2) "Blame the men for everything bad that happens to women". Women have seemed to lose all common sense and decency with feminism. Men are going to look at cleavage and tight fitting clothes and most women already know this…they aren't fooling anybody. The hypocrisy is so thick, you could cut it with a butter knife. Perhaps if somebody put into their brains that dressing modestly shows off their dignity and 'empowers' them it might change minds."

Trends in the Prevalence of Fornication in the 1940s and 50s

Alan Petigny wrote an article in 2004 [1] that identified the following cultural shifts.

- Between 1940 and 1960, the frequency of single motherhood among white women increased from 3.6 to 9.2 newborns per 1,000 unmarried white women of childbearing age.
- Among all women, single motherhood rose from 7.1 to 21.6 newborns per 1,000 unwed women.
- Between the beginning of World War II in 1941 and the inaugural issue of Playboy in 1953, the overall rate of single motherhood more than doubled.
- The silent generation may have been silent about what they were doing, but they weren't all that complacent.
- The crucial distinction between the '40s and '50s and the 1960s are in differences between conventions and conduct — what people said versus what they did.

- During the ‘60s, Americans simply were more willing to acknowledge the extracurricular sexual activities of the young than they had been during the previous decades.
- Rather than a sexual revolution, an upheaval in social conventions is what occurred in the 1960s. What was publicly respectable changed enormously as social conventions came into line with personal conduct or as public manners converged with private morals.

Petigny’s article concluded that…

> “The evidence from our study using census data suggests that the ‘40s and ‘50s experienced a sizeable increase in the frequency of premarital intercourse…”

A review of Petigny’s article is available for non-scientific minds. In addition to the above points, it says,

> “Lawrence Friedman, a visiting professor in the history of science department at Harvard University, calls Petigny’s findings “very revolutionary.” Petigny tells us that “during the ‘40s and ‘50s big social and cultural changes occurred, and we acknowledged them and they became part of ‘60s headlines when the changes had already occurred…”

This agrees with what L. B. Finer [2] wrote in a report on trends in premarital sex in the United States between 1954 and 2003.

> “…there is a common popular perception that most or all of those who came of age before the “sexual revolution” of the 1960s and 1970s waited until they married to have sex, and that it is necessary to revert to the behaviors of that earlier time in order to eliminate the problems of unintended pregnancy and sexually transmitted diseases. However, research has questioned whether such a chaste period ever existed.”

So if I am getting this straight, the sexual revolution didn’t really begin in the 1960s. What made the 1960s unique was that people started to be candid about what had already been going on for decades. In other words, extramarital sex had been so prevalent, for so long, that it had become commonplace by the 1960s. So much so, that people felt no qualms nor shame about discussing such things openly. Therefore, Christian social mores had already began to give way to a cultural-wide hedonism before that time.

Recent Trends in the Prevalence of Fornication

A research article written by Twenge, et al. [3] states,

> "American adults had sex about nine fewer times per year in the early 2010's compared to the late 1990's in data from the nationally representative General Social Survey (N = 26,620, 1989–2014). This was partially due to the higher percentage of unpartnered individuals, who have sex less frequently on average. Sexual frequency declined among the partnered (married or living together) but stayed steady among the unpartnered, reducing the marital/partnered advantage for sexual frequency. Declines in sexual frequency were similar across gender, race, region, educational level, and work status and were largest among those in their 50's (Generation Jones), those with school-age children, and those who did not watch pornography."

From this concise paragraph, we can presume the following.

- More people are single.
- Single people have less sex than married couples.
- The decline in sexual frequency has affected the entire culture.
- Partnered couples (married or cohabitating) are having less sex than the same cohort did in the 90s. Extrapolated, we can presume that Gen X and Millennial couples have less sex than Boomers did at comparable ages.
- As a whole, Generation Jones was probably the most hedonistic generation in modern history. The sexual promiscuity they enjoyed in their youth has led to sexual burnout later in their lives.
- People who have children have more sex.
- People who do not watch pornography have more sex.

Twenge, et al. [3] confirmed my assumptions about generational cohorts in this paragraph.

> "In analyses separating the effects of age, time period, and cohort, the decline was primarily due to birth cohort

> (year of birth, also known as generation). With age and time period controlled, those born in the 1930s (Silent Generation) had sex the most often, whereas those born in the 1990s (Millennials and iGen) had sex the least often. The decline was not linked to longer working hours or increased pornography use."

The Silent Generation was the generational cohort experiencing their sexual prime in the 1950's. The next time I see Liberals and Feminists scorn traditional norms and customs for "being a throwback to the 1950's", my default response will be, "The 1950's offered more sexual opportunity to the broader society than our post-modern, Feminist-controlled society, you lying, denying, hypocritical bigots!"

Twenge, et al. also notes (unsurprisingly) that…

> "Age had a strong effect on sexual frequency: Americans in their 20's (late Millennials, early iGen's) had sex an average of about 80 times per year, compared to about 20 times per year for those in their 60's (Boomers).

This study did not cover the effects of the divorce rate on premarital sexual frequency, but I'm willing to bet there is a correlation there.

Polygyny and Polyandry are on the Rise!

The U.S. National Health Statistics Report 36 [4], and the data from the Center of Disease and Control [5], both indicate that sexual activity outside of marriage is on a slow decline, and apparently more so for the younger age bracket (18-24). This agrees with Twenge, et al.'s study. However, a closer examination of these two sources indicates there is a rise in the number of people who are sexually active with multiple people!

Think about that for a moment. This means that…

- The majority of people are having less sex on average.
- Singles are having less sex.
- Married couples are having even less sex.
- But the subset of people engaging in polygyny/polyandry is increasing!

The current state of the sexual market is a sexual paradise for top SMV individuals, and a death camp for all others. If Hitler and Stalin had introduced Feminism into their genocide and eugenics programs, then they would have been much more successful in producing a super-race, since birth control then, was not what it is now.

Conclusions

Judging by the above information, it appears as though the Sexual Revolution started much earlier in the 20th century than what we were led to believe. I would guess it had its origins in the post WW1 period. At that time, men were rare due to battlefield casualties and the Spanish flu epidemic, and women's suffrage was introduced. These seeds of destruction grew and eventually blossomed after WW2. By the 1960s, it was already in full swing, at which point, people accepted sexual saturation as a societal norm which had entirely superseded the pre WW1 norm.

So actually, more people had more sex in the 1950's than they do today, and it was most likely more enjoyable too, because it happened within a cultural context that supported healthy sexual relations, not the laissez faire mess we have today. People had sex with a person they knew and were in love with (and most likely were married to), and went through life experiences together (both good and bad). The current Don Juan-hookup scene will never have that important emotional aspect cast within a stable community setting.

The cited research articles suggest that, today, Americans are having sex less frequently due to two primary factors:

1. An increasing number of individuals without a steady or marital partner.
2. A decline in sexual frequency among those with partners.

Here's another way to think of this. If we could somehow ascertain the total number of coital orgasms experienced each year by all Americans living in the 1950's up until the present day, and divide that number by the total running population to get a function of orgasms per capita versus each year, and then use this number as a general indicator of happiness, then I am certain this estimation of happiness would closely resemble the surveyed results on happiness taken from the 1950's to the present day – that is, slowly and steadily declining.

Those traditional norms have a very clear purpose. They set up a society-wide, coital orgasm generation machine, which maximizes sexual efficiency by decreasing the total cost investment and increasing the total number of sexual liaisons available. And it does so for most every person in society, not just for top class Alphas and genetic jackpot Gina's. In addition, people operating within a traditional sexual market could retain a sense of honor, dignity and purpose surrounding their sex lives. Not so much for people living today, e.g. incels, MGTOW's, and Feminist s1uts.

References

1. Alan Petigny, “Illegitimacy, Postwar Psychology, and the Reperiodization of the Sexual Revolution”, Journal of Social History, Volume 38, Issue 1, Pages 63–79 (2004 October 1). https://doi.org/10.1353/jsh.2004.0100
2. L. B. Finer, “Trends in Premarital Sex in the United States, 1954–2003”, Public Health Reports 122:73-78 (2017).
3. J. M. Twenge, R. A. Sherman, and B. E. Wells, “Declines in Sexual Frequency among American Adults, 1989–2014”, Archives of Sexual Behavior 46(8):2389–2401 (2017). https://doi.org/10.1007/s10508-017-0953-1
4. U.S. National Health Statistics Report 36: Sexual Behavior, Sexual Attraction, and Sexual Identity in the United States: Data From the 2006–2008 National Survey of Family Growth Trends in Attitudes About Marriage, Childbearing, and Sexual Behavior: United States, 2002, 2006–2010, and 2011–2013 (March 3, 2011).
5. Center of Disease and Control: Key Statistics from the National Survey of Family Growth – N Listing (Data from 2002, 2006-2010, and 2011-2015)

Related

- Wikipedia: Female Promiscuity
- Windy Sombat: Teenage Dating in the 1950s (ca. 2000)
- Dalrock: Marriage strike? (2010 October 19)
- Dalrock: Historical data on marriage and divorce in the US (2011 August 7)
- Dalrock: Why a woman’s age at time of marriage matters, and what this tells us about the apex fallacy (2011 August 26)
- Dalrock: Never marrieds piling up (2012 June 9)
- Dalrock: 2013 never married data. (2013 November 25)
- Notes From A Red Pill Girl: Beware the Carousel (2014 April 25)
- Dalrock: Smoking Gun (2014 May 30)
- Dalrock: Why are modern Christians so delighted with current divorce rates? (2014 June 5)
- Dalrock: Nowhere close to true. (2014 July 10)
- Dalrock: More Remarriage Rate Charts (2014 October 7)
- Dalrock: 2014 Never Married Data (2015 February 7)
- Dalrock: Percentage of U.S. women never married, by age, 1980 & 2015 (2017 November 6)
- Dalrock: Marriage strike paradox. (2017 November 8)
- Spawny’s Space: The Gap (2017 December 14)

The Advent of Polysexuality

thedeti · 30 July 2021 · Archived copy · Original

The west takes a walk on the wild side!

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is based on a conversation between TheDeti and NovaSeeker and is coauthored by Jack. Links to original comments are listed under References.
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes
Warning: Explicit language ahead.

In The Sexual De-Evolution (2021-07-28), Jack reported that Americans are having less sex on average, but there is a growing segment of the population that is engaging in sexual relations with multiple people. This post will take a look at how this segment has gained momentum.

Lightning Fast Changes over the Past Half-Century

I learned in high school in the mid-1980s that a historian maxim is "Change always happens slowly". The history discipline might need to rethink that philosophy. Things have changed more rapidly and deeply in the past 30 years than they had in the previous 200 years, and more than at any other time in human history.

Much of this change is a result of the digital revolution.

For example, the way people buy and listen to music has been revolutionized several times over the past century:

78 rpm phonograph record (early 1900s to mid 1940s)
33 rpm vinyl LP record (mid 1940s to mid 1980s)*
8-track tape (mid 1960s to early 1980s)
cassette tape (early 1970s to mid 2000s)
CD (early 1980s to late 2000s)

MP3 (late 1990s to mid 2010s)
iTunes/Spotify/YouTube (mid 2000s to present)

 The LP record, in combination with vacuum tube amplifier technology, has slowly made a comeback among audiophiles due to its excellent analog sound reproduction.*

This is phenomenally rapid. Within my own lifetime, I have bought music on 4 different mediums!

We have also seen a lot of changes in law and politics as well. In just 17 years, SCOTUS went from "It is NOT unconstitutional for a state to criminalize homosexual conduct" (Bowers v. Hardwick, 1986) to "It IS unconstitutional for a state to criminalize homosexual conduct" (Lawrence v. Texas, 2003). For constitutional jurisprudence, this is incredibly rapid change – a 180° reversal in 17 years! Supreme Court decisions just do not go 180° oppositely that fast.

Well, they do now, and apparently once they do, they accelerate with lightning speed. Because in 12 years, we went from "It is unconstitutional for a state to criminalize homosexual conduct" in 2003, to "The Constitution guarantees same sex couples the fundamental right to marry" in 2015 (Obergefell v. Hodges).

Historical framework has lost all credence to the present jurisprudence. It has become unreasonable, or even a joke, for a lawyer to pose an argument on grounds of legal precedent.

The manner of sexual interaction has also been fundamentally transformed. Before the mid 1960s the typical course to intercourse was…

1. Meet
2. Date
3. Date seriously
4. Date exclusively
5. Get engaged
6. Get married
7. Have sex

Sometimes the last two were flipped.

Since the turn of the century, the manner of sexual interaction has been…

1. Meet online
2. Meet in person
3. Have sex
4. Decide if you want to keep seeing each other. If not, then go to step 9.
5. Date
6. Date seriously
7. Date exclusively
8. Get engaged/married OR move in together OR break up
9. Lather/rinse/repeat (serial pseudo-monogamy)

Having children is entirely optional to the woman and never to the man, and is possible anytime after step 3 is completed.

The Advent of Sexual Permutations

As you can see from the last list, sex has been moved up to the fore of the interaction. This is exactly what NovaSeeker described in his post, The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture (2021-02-08). Essentially, what has happened is that the recognition of others as unique individuals has been suspended in favor of objectifying others for the sake of maximizing sexual fulfillment. In other words, we value the opposite sex for their sexual market potential (or for QTBGL, their sexual identity), and we no longer value them for being made in the image of God. Thus, we tend to view the opposite sex as potential lays, and we no longer see them as human beings. The entire SMP has become a de facto eugenics program.

Once this intrinsic element of humanity is extracted from our consciences, and our psychological value systems have adjusted, the current transmogrification of sociosexual intercourse will have introduced the normalization of all manners of “alternative” lifestyles: polyamory, polygyny (e.g. soft harems), polyandry, gender fluidity, demisexuality, pansexuality, transgenderism, etc. This is painfully evident in the QTBGL crowd, who place their gender identity above all else, and demand others to recognize and accept this new identity.

The next wave of change will be p3d0philia and p3d3rasty.

We are already well down the road for poly/pan/demi/trans sexuality, and the last 2 will not be far behind.

In fact, Cambridge, Massachusetts now recognizes polyamorous partnerships,* thereby becoming the second municipality in the U.S. to legalize domestic partnerships between three or more people. The reason we didn't see this on MSM is because TPTB know the wider populace is not ready for this… just yet… But wait…

Polyamory is already mostly accepted among the younger opinion making class. It will never be a majority practice, and it seems unlikely to me that it will get the same push for "equal rights" as QTBGL did, because there really isn't a similar (if dishonest) "born that way" argument to be used to squeeze this into the race jurisprudence like Gay, Inc. managed to do for itself. The change here will be more social acceptance which, again, is already mostly there generationally. It's possible we will see a push for poly marriage, but I don't see it coming soon — most poly people don't seem very interested in it, at least not anything like the energy there was behind QTBGL, probably because they are not into traditional arrangements by definition.

Polygyny is currently entrenched as the core feature of the SMP. Polygyny runs rampant in the form of soft harems, but simply goes undiscussed. Leftist Liberal Robert Wright was already calling the post-sex-rev situation "de facto soft polygyny" back in the 1990s, before he was quietly told to STFU by his political fellow travelers, which he dutifully heeded, switching his lens to other topics since that time. Women don't mind soft polygyny at all, which is why it isn't a topic of critique. Hard polygyny, yes, that is disliked (which will also work against any momentum towards formally recognized polyamorous couples), but soft polygyny has been the dominant force in the SMP for decades now and is firmly entrenched. People just don't use the word for it, often out of ignorance.

Polyandry is definitely a rising star to keep an eye on. If men's ideal is the polygynous soft harem, the female's ideal is simultaneously having desire sex with hot alpha males while having a dutiful, loving, supportive beta male as a (backup) breadwinner, housemate, and co-parent (possibly as a human kleenex, but not a bedmate in the long term). Historically this hasn't been realizable, pretty much at all, by women outside of hidden adulteries, because the beta husbands would not play along with that role.

However, that is changing somewhat. This is the "other side" of polyamory that no one ever talks about. When you do see poly couples in the media (in the obvious "trial balloon" articles that periodically appear at CNN's site or elsewhere in the MSM about poly people), they are never polygynous and always poly-female — either polyandrous (H, W, and W's BF) or poly-lez (two women and a man, but they hinge on the wife, not the husband). That is, the wife has a relationship with H and LezLove, but H doesn't have sex with LL at all or, typically, even with W very much. In some cases H is merely a jealous, emasculated, throbbing-heart spectator brought on set merely to amp up the titillating prurience of the lecherous lesbian version of cuckoldry.

So poly stuff is growing, however small, so it shouldn't be overstated in significance. The OASIS stuff Jack and NovaSeeker discussed (e.g. Instagram, OnlyFans, etc.) is much, much, much more significant than this is. But it is growing and therefore now is the time to become more aware of it and to observe it to see if it continues to grow. The limiting factor is obviously the willingness of men to "play ball". With the increasing emasculation of younger generations of men becoming ever more obvious, it isn't too much of a stretch to see this kind of thing continuing to grow on the margins. Again, something to keep an eye on.

Gender Fluidity is also growing, as masculinity continues to be attacked, and trans or "enbi" is becoming more commonplace. I do not think that this will ever displace typical gender expression, but I do expect that there will be an ongoing significant minority of non-conforming gender expression, and that the people who are "normies", in terms of gender expression, will continue to be hectored by the culture making class as yet another means of fostering division among their "lessers".

 H/T: Shadow to Light: Who is Pushing Polyamory? (2021-07-26)*
 Soft Harem: A situation in which a man is bedding multiple women within the same time frame, either with or without their knowledge.*

Rapid Vapid Change is the New Norm

We live in interesting – and rapidly changing – times.

The pace of change is breathtaking. So much so, that now we almost take it for granted. The young certainly do. That is, they do not expect anything but constant flux in all areas of life — how we live, relate, make money, interact… Even social norms and morality are subjected to post-truth subjectivity.

Men and women, people of all ages, will have to be agile, proactive, and immediately responsive in all areas of their lives, especially sexually and relationally. We can expect constant change, even constant disruptive change, in all of these areas, and on an ongoing basis.

Members of the younger generation who are growing up in this kind of environment are getting the implicit message that nearly anything goes. As such, young women, being the "gatekeepers of sex" that they are, have a smorgasbord of options to choose from. In our next post, Jack and I will be examining women's responses to the influences of this culturally imposed sexuality.

Stay tuned!

References

1. TheDeti's comment 5550
2. NovaSeeker's comment 5556
3. TheDeti's comment 5559
4. TheDeti's comment 5560
5. NovaSeeker's comment 5573
6. NovaSeeker's comment 5574

Related

- Σ Frame: A Study of Open Relationships (2015-09-08)
- Σ Frame: What is the difference between Open Relationships (OR) and Friends With Benefits (FWB)? (2015-09-10)
- Σ Frame: Why do humans conceal mating? (2021-01-27)

- Σ Frame: Revealing the motives behind unconcealed sex and nakedness (2021-01-29)
- Σ Frame: The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021-03-12)

The Influence of Culturally Imposed Sexuality on Women

Jack · 2 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A look at how women might view their sexual identity within a sex drenched culture.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is based on a conversation between TheDeti and NovaSeeker and is coauthored by Jack. Links to original comments are listed under References.
Reader's Note: The theme for the month of August is Snickerdoodles! — Studies of Female Failures.
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes
Warning: Explicit language ahead.

> "Never dishonor your daughter by making her a prostitute, or the whole country will turn to prostitution and be filled with people who are perverted."
>
> Leviticus 19:29 (GW)

Introduction

In the last couple posts, we examined the Sexual De-Evolution in the 20th century, and The Advent of Polysexuality. From this brief review, it should be duly noted that the purpose and applied practice of Christian ethics and morality were lost sometime in the late 1980s. Christian ethics are no longer taught except as "rules" (which are presumably made to be broken). So in a practical sense, there is no such thing as "sexual morality". Even within the church, the elders and congregation alike turn a blind eye to all forms of illicit sex, divorce, and wifely insubordination. "Kids will be kids. Let them have their fun while they're still young." Meanwhile, abortion continues as a covert "back up plan" should any "accidents" arise.

Members of the younger generation who are growing up in this kind of environment are getting the implicit message that nearly anything goes. As such, young women, being the "gatekeepers of sex" that they are, have a smorgasbord of options to choose from.

Given this cultural setting and the ever present pressure to flirt with fleeting pleasures, the only things left to guide the young set in terms of their sociosexual choices are social conventions, family/peer influences, personal values, conscience, and conviction. The first two can be quite dark and immoral, while the last three (or four, in many cases) are fading from view.

The herd gathers at the feeding trough. So let's consider how women might see this.

Motivations to Feed

Sex is central to the human experience for both men and women.

For men, because it is the primary way we connect to another human, and because it brings singular pleasure to us. We're driven to have sex. The male sex drive is incredibly powerful. For us men, it's fun, it feels good, and it connects us to the women in our lives.

For women, because motherhood is central to almost all women's desires and experience, and we all know how almost all women become mothers. Women are as driven to procreate as men are to spread the seed far and wide. Most women have at least one child, and most childless women are not so by choice.

That's all well and good, but that's not all. From a nether's eye view, there are a multitude of motivations for young women (and some men) to enter into various forms of sexual immorality. Following each motivation is the reason translated into colloquial statements.

1. Affirmation, (N/A)
2. Attention, (N/A)
3. Burgeoning maturity coinciding with one's life schedule, AKA "It's The Right Time."
4. Dopamine + Norepinephrine + Oxytocin, AKA "Feeling loved"
5. Drugs/Drunkenness/Partying, AKA "Messing Around"
6. Ego Rush/Validation, (N/A)
7. Enticing/Controlling/Manipulating Men, (N/A)
8. Feeling accepted/humbled/included/needed/wanted, etc.
9. Having children, sometimes stated explicitly.
10. Ignorance/Lack of agency, AKA "It just happened!"
11. Making Money (e.g. OASIS, OnlyFans, prostitution, etc.), (N/A)
12. Opportunity with a hawt Chad who pushes all her buttons, (N/A)
13. Peer Validation, (N/A)
14. Rebellion/Revenge, AKA "Just want to get back at _____."

15. Relaxation, AKA "NetFlix and chill"
16. Releasing Anxiety/Tension, AKA "Get it over with."
17. Self-knowledge, AKA "Finding one's self"
18. Sexploration/Sexperimentation, AKA "Getting experience"
19. Subcultural/Sociosexual Pressures, (N/A)
20. Testing one's SMV, (N/A)
21. The raw pleasures of illicit sex, (various)
22. YOLO / FOMO, (implicitly stated)

That's an impressive list of reasons to have sex! What kinds of reasons or motivations are Christians giving their daughters NOT to have extramarital sex? I doubt it can compare to this list.

Fasting

Celibacy isn't the worst thing we might ever have to live through, but it is very difficult. It is a lot to ask of a young woman in her early 20s to abstain, because they very much want sex with attractive men, and it is pretty much readily available to most of them. Most women can find men attractive enough, even if they're very low betas she can get herself to "willing" for and she can use as beta bux plowhorse providers. But increasingly, more and more men are having to live as involuntary celibates, and (I suspect) more and more women are choosing to live as voluntary celibates (volcels). Male incels are such because they're unable to attract women for one reason or another. Female volcels are such because they judge all their options as undesirable or unsuitable.

So if celibacy is insufficiently valued to attract some takers, then that opens the floodgates of sexual activity and engaging with the polysexual environment. Let's take a look at what's on the menu.

Sampler Platter

Polygyny is currently entrenched as the core feature of the SMP. Polygyny runs rampant in the form of soft harems, but simply goes undiscussed. Some women don't like soft polygyny, while some actually like it (they see the preselection as validating the man). Most women simply don't mind it. They don't prefer it, because their dream is to have that alpha guy become an alpha bux, and have him all to herself. Many women will cling steadfastly to this dream, even to their own demise. But most women know they can't have that. As a result, most women view soft polygyny/soft harems as simple reality, as a cost of "doing business" in the SMP. Sharing an attractive man with other women is far more preferable to having an unattractive man* all to oneself – at least, when she isn't getting either man's resources. Her price for settling for an unattractive man is immediate, unfettered access to all his resources, for life, even if she chooses not to stay with him (as about half do).

 An "unattractive man" is any man who is not a top 20%er alpha fux or alpha bux.*
 The most common way this transfer of resources occurs is through legal marriage. This is why men have come to the conclusion that marriage is a bad deal.*

Buffet Dining without a Smorgasbord

Polyamory is becoming something that an increasing number of people are willing to experiment with, simply because it is getting more and more "airplay" from the culture-shapers, and because of the ever growing permissiveness of the culture. However, it appears to be a lifestyle that only a select few are cut out for in the long term. This is because the requirements for continuing in this lifestyle include ALL of the following.

- The person must have a sufficiently high SMV to attract partners. This rules out a significant number of men and a sizeable number of women.
- Men know that dating is expensive and time consuming, but the polyamorous must possess enough money and leisure time to be seeing two (or more) other people in a similar fashion. So we're talking about the UC and UMC now.
- The person must have very high developed social and time management skills and the discipline that can enable them to hurdle the daily obstacle course of scheduling meeting times and other arrangements with two (or more) partners.
- The person must have the ability to engage in sex without becoming too terribly attached to any one person. This rules out a large number of women.
- The person must possess a great amount of emotional maturity to cope with continual drama, multiple heartbreaks, times of doubt when meetings are cancelled, and moments of jealousy when one partner prefers to spend more time with the other.
- The person must have the social dexterity to successfully navigate the desires and jealousies of not just one, but two (or more) people.
- It also requires one to find more than one partner with ALL of the above qualities — disciplined, leisure class, mature, skillful, suitable to one's liking, agreeable about being involved with each other, and willing to engage in a polyamorous arrangement. This is a rather tall order, which is why most people who get involved in a polyamorous relationship meet each other at venues contrived specifically for this very purpose.

To look at polyamory positively, we might think it would provide the impetus for one to grow in all of the above areas, which would be beneficial for one's personal growth, but the fact is that the grand majority of people just can't make the cut and get their foot in the door.

Beta with an Alpha Appetizer (or Having Dessert First)

Polyandry, especially covert, longitudinal polyandry in the form of serial (pseudo) monogamy, is the core feature of both the sexual revolution and the AF/BB sexual stratagem, which has probably been going on since the 1950s or earlier. Rollo has covered this dynamic in excruciating detail, so I won't elaborate too much here. The basic idea is that most women are more than attractive enough for most men, but most men are not sufficiently attractive for most women. Most women will get caught up in a series of sexual relationships with a few hawt chads (i.e. polygyny as described above), become alpha widowed, and then cannot find men of the same caliber, men they're attracted to, who will marry them. Because the female drive to "nest" and reproduce is as strong and all consuming as the male drive to have as much sex as possible with as many women as possible while expending the least amount of effort possible, most women will eventually settle for a beta provider. Most women can get to "willing" and can settle for a beta provider long enough to marry and produce one or two children. This is why most men will eventually marry as well – because taking a wife ostensibly means as much sex as possible as effortlessly as possible, and he is willing to compromise variety for the 'sure thing'.

Alpha with Beta on the Side

Open Polyandry is when a woman has more than one man at the same time. To varying degrees on a case by case basis, this is what is happening with the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (AKA OASIS, e.g. OnlyFans), which is a form of prostitution. OASIS is, by it's nature, a transactional, open polyandry relationship. But whether men and women will be willing to enter into an arrangement of open polyandry, coupled with expectations of enduring love, sex, romance, and provisioning, remains to be seen. For more clues, you may want to read Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to men? (2021-01-08).

From a woman's point of view, I think open polyandry (that is not explicitly transactional) would be quite acceptable, depending on a few things.

1. The woman can accept having two men in her life.
2. The woman can find a man who passes her filters and who is agreeable to the arrangement. Rare.
3. The woman has the upper hand in the relationship.

From what I have seen, some women can accept open polyandry, while others simply cannot. Opinions on this run strong, and there doesn't seem to be a middle ground. However, I can see how some women would want to keep one man for romance, sex, and procreation, and keep the other as a work horse that stays under her thumb and out of her bed. But this would not be true open polyandry, but rather her having an Alpha with a personal (and literal) Waiter. Of course, this arrangement strays into the imaginary, as there is hardly any man who would agree to be a sex deprived lackey.

Her having a dominant role in the troika would of course screen out all the most desirable men, which is not preferred. So the possibility of a woman entering into non-transactional open polyandry may require some kind of compromise on her hypergamous filters, and this would depend strongly on individual traits and opportunities.

Dining Out or Eating Alone?

Our last post outlined the deep, drastic changes that are currently enveloping the SMP. The above discussion gives us a deeper understanding of the ins and outs. The people of any age who thrive in this kind of environment conform to one of the following.

1. They insulate themselves from the process of constant change somehow by creating their own “arrangement” that shields them from the most austere and vexatious influences, at least in some ways, and for some time (nothing is bullet-proof against this culture). In the past, the family, church, and small community provided this shelter. But now, these backstops are compromised for the majority of people.
2. They fashion themselves so as to be optimized for quick adaptation to constant change. Individuals who can do this must have the kinds of qualities (portable attractiveness vectors, portable abilities and skills that transcend economic and technological changes, portable personality factors that tend towards rising to the top of the froth in any context) which lend themselves to thriving in the precise circumstances where many will sink under the churn and flow of change. In doing so, they receive a double-return (at least) on their efforts, precisely because the constant waves of change are swamping and crippling so many who are not so agile, a situation which redounds to the benefit of the super-adaptive.

So again, we see the potential for a woman having a polysexual relationship devolve into the personal and occidental.

No 4 Star Dining Seats Available

It goes without saying that all of these options, aside from celibacy and monogamous marriage characterized by Headship, are non-Christian arrangements. Some would argue, based on the Old Testament, that polygyny might be acceptable, but separating this particular arrangement out of the rest and making it functional and acceptable is a long shot. Of note, polyandry constitutes adultery by the fact that the woman has multiple men, and most likely involves an inversion of Headship with at least one of the men. This would most definitely make it a non-Christian type of relationship.

I doubt that a majority of men or women will live this way for the foreseeable future. Marriage is slowing down a little and is being pushed further and further down the road for more and more people, but most people are still marrying at some point. The charts at Dalrock pointed this out. We still don't have a marriage strike. Most men are marrying because that's the only way they can get sex; and most women are marrying because that's the only way they can have the lifestyles and child(ren) they want to have.

The bottom line is, I think, that among the religious class, they will still marry. But they will have to compromise, deeply, to do so. They will also have to get past their prior sexual experiences. Most Christian men and women have already succumbed to premarital sex and there are entire false theologies to justify it. Those who haven't will be pressured relentlessly to have premarital sex.

From Soup to Nuts

As was described in our two previous posts, our culture has changed rapidly, within the living memory of those 50 and up. Dalrock has covered the postponement of marriage over the last decade or two. The economic pressures on women who are doing without have led to creation of the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS), which we covered in January and February of this year. The relational pressures have increased incidences of single motherhood and divorced women raising children. The uncertainty of it all has raised the frequency of cohabitation. Sexuality has been unmoored from relationships, from Christian sexual morality, and even from its prior cultural guardrails.

Since the 1990s, the SMP has been without any sort of sexual restraint, and screening criteria is mostly limited to carnal SMV markers with an ideological wish list on the side. Almost all women expect sex within the first few dates and lose interest and move on if the man does not push for sex within a certain timeframe ranging from days to weeks. Some women will even raise the issue and tell you that they do not want to wait to have sex. Of course, this interest is directed at the top 20% SMV men — only.

This has the effect of squeezing unattractive men out of the sex market (which is embedded in the marriage market). In essence, "Women's Liberation" has led to "Men's Liberation". As the remaining majority of men find themselves without sex or women, they have no need to prepare for marriage or fatherhood, so they simply don't.

What this means for women is that as they age, men of all stripes are increasingly unavailable for relationships, and competition for the few preferred men in any relationship market becomes fierce. This presses women in the marriage market either to do without or settle deeply — and as time goes on, more women are doing without. The quickly rising alternative for women is to establish their own economic independence somehow, and play around in the Polysexual Market Place (PMP) as long as possible.

Moreover, the current culture is one drenched in sexuality, and with every passing year, there is an ever-increasing degree of sexual "liberation". Literally anything goes in sexuality now, and that will only increase as time goes on.

None of this will get better until women compromise more and until men see sufficient reason to give women anything. But in the meantime, the Biblical adage continues to apply.

> "Never dishonor your daughter by making her a prostitute…"

In modern English, this verse could be translated as,

> "Never dishonor your daughter by sending her off to a liberal arts college nor allowing her to open an OnlyFans (etc.) account…"

The risk is that if you do, she'll likely be "converted" to feminism,* and/or be swept away in the poly/pan/demi/trans sexual marketplace that is slowly gaining transcendence.

> "…or the whole country will turn to prostitution and be filled with people who are perverted."

We are presently seeing the truth of this passage being played out in the west,* as was described in the previous post.

 pilledholyspirit called this process "Bimbofication" and said it was a fetish.*

References

1. TheDeti's comment 5550
2. NovaSeeker's comment 5556
3. TheDeti's comment 5559
4. TheDeti's comment 5560
5. NovaSeeker's comment 5573
6. NovaSeeker's comment 5574

Related

- Σ Frame: A Study of Open Relationships (2015-09-08)
- Σ Frame: What is the difference between Open Relationships (OR) and Friends With Benefits (FWB)? (2015-09-10)
- Σ Frame: Why do humans conceal mating? (2021-01-27)
- Σ Frame: Revealing the motives behind unconcealed sex and nakedness (2021-01-29)
- Σ Frame: The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021-03-12)

The Influence of Pornography and OnlyFans on Women

Novaseeker · 4 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Pornstars now set the standard for beauty and attractiveness.

Readership: All
Author's Note: This post is based on a conversation between NovaSeeker and TheDeti, and is coauthored with Jack.
Length: 3,100 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes
Warning: Alluring images ahead.

> "Never dishonor your daughter by making her a prostitute, or the whole country will turn to prostitution and be filled with people who are perverted."
>
> Leviticus 19:29 (GW)

Introduction

Anyone who spends any time at the gym, or has seen a few TikTok shorts has probably noticed that there are quite a number women who don't fit the standard western norm in terms of appearance. They actually look shapely and sexy! RedPillBoomer noticed this when he wrote,

> "One thing I will say briefly about the Stacy's at the gym, they sure now how to form fit their workout clothes to their bodies, barley anything is left to the imagination as far as what kind of curves they're packing. No complaints, I just don't remember those kind of gym outfits on the women back in the eighties and nineties."

What happened?

The standards changed.

Women who are "in shape" today are hotter, in terms of their bodies, because the standard changed from 1995 to 2021. In 2021, the standard is much more firm/toned/tight. Women do much much MUCH more resistance training and other routines today to make all their muscle groups toned and firm.

Why did this happen?

In my view, it's a downstream impact of porn.

The difference between a 7 body in 1995 and a 7 body now is muscle tone/firmness/tightness. The 1995 body was more or less designed to look great in clothes, and fine in a bathing suit, but most girls did not have what were then called "bikini bodies" — even most 7s didn't. The bikini body was a specific type of look, a much more toned body look overall than the average "hot" woman had in 1990-1995. In 1995, there were some girls who looked better with clothes than they did without, and some who looked better without than with, but since most girls wear clothes more than they are naked, most girls went for a look that looked better in clothes (including most "hot" girls in that era as well).

Along comes the mainstreaming of porn, and suddenly almost all men are looking at the kind of female bodies that look best naked all the time, in numbers that no men in prior history were ever exposed to. The women in porn are s1uts, but most of them are the kind of girls who look good naked, obviously.

Thus, the culture wide sex saturation created by ubiquitous pornography, Instagram, OnlyFans, Sugar dating, etc. is having enormous impacts on the rest of society at large, just as conventional prostitution and pre-internet pornography did.

This shifted the beauty standard for women towards "porn-worthy" bodies. Instead of a smaller portion of women having that kind of super-toned body, now all "hot" women are getting that kind of body by doing the kind of routines that yield it — which they didn't as recently as 25 years ago. Now, a woman can't be hot without having that kind of body — in order to be truly hot now, you have to have a porn-star body (sans the fake boobs) in terms of the body tone, firmness and so on.

PilledHolySpirit said this is part of a fetish known as Bimbofication.

Given that shift, clothing moved in the same direction. Again, that kind of body looks best without clothes. But girls aren't going to work out naked, so …. we just make clothes that are basically like being naked while wearing clothes! And that is what was done.

Much of female “clothing” today truly is “clothing in name only”. It may cover the skin, but it reveals the body in ways that clothing previously generally did not do in the same way without revealing skin itself. Clothing has been redesigned to allow the display of an effectively nude female body while at the same time covering the skin so as to be “technically” clothing. Workout clothing has followed suit, and now there is crossover between workout and non-workout clothing for women as well.

All of this is easy to explain once you understand the porn-induced shift in the emphasis on female body tone, which has in turn resulted in a spike in demand for, and supply of, clothing that in effect displays a nude female body in everything but a technical sense.

It’s all porn now, whether you’re technically watching actual porn or not, unless you are literally blind.

The Bimbofication of Society

Something similar has, of course, happened with social interaction in general: people not speaking to people in public, not knowing their neighbors, but interacting with a large number of people virtually, on the internet, in their “tribes of choice”.

One effect is that sex is everywhere, and nowhere, at the same time – a seeming paradox. Schrodinger’s Sex Culture, if you will.

The culture is becoming increasingly sanitized of actual sexual interactions and banter between live persons. According to surveys, even younger people are having less of it than even GenX did. Even so, the culture as a whole, is marinating in raunchy sex at the same time. Sex is widely available and has never been so easy to get, yet increasing numbers of men cannot access women at all, not even for interaction and conventional dating, much less sex. Even if younger people are having less sex, virtually all women have had premarital sex. The transactional sex culture has become an entire underground culture, that more and more people are at least dabbling in, much like the rise of the Carousel in the 1970s.

The rise of the virtual is the main reason for this.

Sex is much more transactional. it's always been the case that women expect to get something in return for sex. Used to be women would accept commitment, fidelity, a date, a free night out, and a man's undivided attention where he dances like a monkey for her. Now? That's not anywhere good enough. She wants cash and gifts, and she wants them now. Friend with benefits isn't good enough. It's not enough that you're her friend. You're now required to "pay" for her time with money and gifts.

Again, I point to the rise of the virtual as a main reason for this.

It's always been the case that men were in it for the sex. It used to be that men would play the game and at least go through the motions. It used to be that men would dance the dance, run some Game, and show her a good time in exchange for at least a good chance that sex will happen at the end of the night. Whatever he has to do to get sex, that's what he'll do.

Now? Men's response to the current state of affairs has been to either (1) demand sex, right now, or move on to the next woman; or (2) drop out altogether. The men who "dropped out" have an alternative now, which is to use OF (one step above conventional porn), get an escort, or get a sugar baby. He's still doing whatever he has to do to get sex. Now, men get sex either by being so attractive as to be irresistible to a large swath of women; or offering up immediate cash on the barrelhead. Either way, he gets sex right now, no strings attached.

The Bimbofication of Sexuality and Attractiveness

The internet is having very significant changes on human life, on the margins, and it's showing up in various ways. The impact on social life has been substantial, and in the realm of sex it has virtualized sex, to a significant degree, because the rise of the various apps and so on has made new possibilities for interaction possible for men (not just the standard porn, but now OF with its customized/tailored/personal content, interacting with cam girls, sugar babies and so on), and new avenues for gathering attention and male resources possible for women (same thing from the other side of the table). Meeting people for dating has become largely virtual as well, as we know, and this has had massive impacts, too, like excluding people who do not look very good in pictures from many dating opportunities, especially men. The internet-ization of everything is proceeding apace, and the changes are rippling through the culture faster than people can notice or assess them — it is no different in the areas of sex and men/women and we are foolish to think otherwise, in my opinion.

So it is with the amateur sex industry. Most women will not become Instathots. Most women will never become cam girls or Only Fans girls. Most women will not get into sugar dating. But we are already seeing a lot of effect on the culture at large. But there, the effect of the amateur sex industry is less on appearance and more on the way men and women deal with each other.

More generally, pornography represents a manifestation of the movement of sex away from always having a procreative element towards being primarily about shared pleasure and, if desired, the potential bonding that comes through that. Porn, of course, ditches the latter element, but under the new polysexual revolution regime, the latter element was always opt-in, just as the pregnancy element was. All you are left with is the pleasure principle, and porn caters precisely to this.

Yet with the internetification of porn, the impacts become more complex and wide-reaching. It's correct that sexual behaviors and appearance expectations have been shaped, for both sexes — expectations about musculature of men have similarly increased almost cartoonishly, as have penis sizes, and black men have become fetishized via porn in a way that is reflected in the popular culture by such phenomena, just to take the most well-known example, as the Kardashian/Jenner crew, which just happens to feature a family of 6 white women, virtually all of whom are exclusively involved with black men, and so on.

And, in fact, the impact is even deeper than that. One of the porn world's "dirty little secrets" is that areas like transgender erotica have, for a number of years now, and before the rise of the trans movement to the forefront of discourse, been among the leading growth areas of porn itself. More and more people have been viewing, and that means getting aroused by, transgender images, which means images of these "new, improved young trans women" than in the past, and this has also undoubtedly impacted overall attitudes towards trans persons, in particular among young people who are internet porn natives, having grown up with internet porn. The impact here is similar to the popularity of homosexual porn, especially homosexual porn depicting females, prior to the rise of gay rights, and how this has softened attitudes over the course of a generation, especially among women themselves, who became solidly pro-gay in the wake of the rise of porn. So the impact of these developments can be traced even to political and cultural movements that no-one is even thinking of when looking at porn, because people can't connect the dots properly — the old paradigm of the harmless stack of playboys in Uncle Bob's garage pretty much dominates the brains of most people over 45 when it comes to the topic of porn, and the mere suggestion of any broader impact gets a dismissive hand wave, if that.

Bimbofication in Personal Presentation and Appearances

Now, pornographic beauty standards have affected women's overall physical appearance, leading to an almost comic exaggeration of feminine body traits. There is great emphasis on what I've called "the pornstar look" (which includes many s1ut tells): heavy makeup, sculpted eyebrows, heavy eyeliner and shadowing, perfectly manicured fingernails, and lipstick/lip accentuation. Breasts need to be shapely, and at least bigger than average. Cleavage is routinely shown in most modern dress. There is enormous emphasis on butts (J. Lo, Iggy Azalea, common porn culture, and IG photo technique). Butts have to be curvy with waist-hip ratios down to like .50. In addition to fuller breasts and butts, women want a Roman cheekbone structure, and plump lips. Women want to eliminate crow's feet and forehead creases, We've long had breast implants. We now have implants for the cheeks, jaw, and chin. We now have butt implants. We now have botox injections for lips and wrinkles. Of course we have the $300 manicure/pedicure, in which a majority of women now indulge themselves, for anything from the French manicure to fake nails of all shapes, lengths, and colors. Fake eyelashes are ridiculously large and accentuated. About the only thing that's gotten smaller about women is their hair.

All of this can be traced back to porn actress appearance and beauty standards.

But the impact is even broader than this, in odd ways as well. The desire to look like porn stars has fueled the development of technologies, especially surgeries and related techniques, to keep pace, and these are being deployed in a much larger number of women than in previous eras. At the same time, the demand from women to retain this kind of "porn-worthy" appearance until much later in life than was ever really desired or expected by either sex has fueled the rise of fitness and nutritional regimes, alongside the surgical and other medical techniques, to produce a crop of top tier appearance women in the 40-60 age range that literally never existed in the history of the human species. There simply were not women who looked like Elizabeth Hurley and Kate Beckinsale do today at their ages in the past — the "older attractive women" of the recent past — you can find their pictures on Google — like Sophia Loren or Elizabeth Taylor and so on, simply did not look like this because they couldn't, the tech/training/nutrition regimens/etc. didn't exist, and the average women didn't aspire to it as well — again, because there was nothing to aspire to, since the techniques that are available now did not exist then. This has now "trickled down" from women like Hurley and Beckinsale, who are both genetically gifted as well, to the "average" attractive woman who is not genetically gifted in the same way, but can still "looksmaxx" her way to her substantial benefit all the way into her 50s with some effort and targeted expenditures. This, in turn, is changing their expectations of their own marriages, their husbands, their dating prospects outside of marriages, and, in some cases, even their earnings possibilities in industries that would pay for their appearances.

Similarly, as the rise of the gay movement was a direct consequence of the separation of heterosexual sex and procreation (which made gay sex and straight sex essentially the same thing culturally), the rise of the porn-driven beauty procedures/treatments/techniques and fitness/dietary regimens has given rise to the transgender movement, as growing numbers of young men, in particular, can use these same techniques and regimens to look more convincingly female, in a sexualized way, than has ever before been possible in human history. The fact that there is a slew of young "trans women" who simply look more feminine than any of these folks ever did in the past no matter how hard they tried has gone a long way to sway attitudes towards trans people just enough to make things that were unthinkable even a few short years ago — like trans women competing in women's sports, or trans boys using girls locker and rest roomos — mainstream today.

Bimbofication in the Bedroom

The influence of pornography has even had a trickle-down effect into private sexual relationships.

Psychiatrist David Reuben's Book "Everything You Always Wanted to Know about Sex (but were afraid to ask)" (No kidding, that really is the title) came out in 1969. Most of the information in there is obsolete, and some of it has been questioned by later mental health practitioners. But one of the things he wrote stuck with me: In post WWII/pre-sexual revolution America, most men went to prostitutes for fellatio, because their wives/fiancees/girlfriends wouldn't do it. Up to the release of the pornographic film "Deep Throat" in the mid 1970s, fellatio was something that "polite" women just did not do. Or, at least, they didn't talk about it. Fellatio was something that only low class women, prostitutes, and porn actresses did.

This attitude among women slowly whittled away with the growth of women's sexual liberation, but was still common among a substantial minority of women in the American Midwest up to the late 1980s. They would do almost everything else, including P in V intercourse, but they would not perform fellatio. “Nice girls” in the American Midwest in the late 1980s didn’t do this. Or at least, didn’t talk about it. They were on the Pill and perfectly willing to go “all the way”, particularly if they really really liked you. But fellatio was out of the question.

Presently, it is the rare woman who will not do this, or has not done it. Nearly every woman under the age of 55 has learned how to do it and has done it. Most people trace this back to Deep Throat and the fact that men wanted their women to do this for them. Girls teach each other how to do it. Multiple articles have been written in women’s magazines on fellatio technique. There are websites and subreddits where this is talked about in graphic detail. You can watch technique “how to” videos on pornographic websites. Fellatio is talked about in film, in popular culture, and in media, in tones both serious and comedic. The internet has proliferated this. Sexual technique in general is talked about frequently and discussed, on websites, on subreddits, in online publications.

All this is true regarding anal sex as well, but to a somewhat lesser extent, I think. But nonetheless, the demand for anal, and the numbers of women willing to do it, is growing. This is in large part because of depictions of anal sex in pornography, that more women are willing to do it on camera (because it pays more), and that more men are wanting to do it or try it.

Maybe the most prominent effect is on women’s pubic hair grooming. It was the rare woman in the late 1980s who was doing anything with pubic hair other than occasional trimming. Now, women wax, shave, and trim on the regular, and almost all women do some form of girlscaping. Shaving pubic hair has become the poor girl’s waxing – it can be done as often as necessary and it’s much less expensive and less painful than waxing. This can also be traced to what porn actresses were doing with their pubic hair grooming (mostly waxing and the removal of all body hair below the waist).

Conclusions

It should now be glaringly evident to the reader that much of the trends we see in society, personal presentation and appearances, fitness, what is considered attractive, and even private sexual activities have been strongly shaped and contoured by standards that were only present in pornography not more than 30 years ago.

In addition to the cultural and sociosexual influences and the internet (which have been covered before), there have been advances in technology, cosmetic medical procedures, new diet plans, fitness routines, the development of anabolic therapeutic compounds that augment body building, and dietary supplements that increase weight loss, all of which have made bimbofication possible to any woman who cares to invest the time, effort, and money.

Related

- Σ Frame (Jack): Why is the online amateur sex industry attractive to women? (2021-01-06)
- Σ Frame (Jack): What Hitting Bottom will look like (2021-02-10)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021-03-12)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Sex Appeal is not strongly correlated with Beauty (2021-04-30)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): The Kardashian Fantasy (2021-05-24)
- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): How to Change a Hostile Culture (2021-06-07)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Infiltration and Disruption of the Continuity of Values (2021-06-11)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Women Crave Male Attention (2021-07-26)
- Σ Frame (Jack): The Sexual De-Evolution (2021-07-28)
- Σ Frame (Deti): The Advent of Polysexuality (2021-07-30)

Carousel Widow in Decline – Part 1

Jack · 6 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A Case Study of a Carousel Rider in Regression.

Readership: All; Men;
Author's Note: The contents of this series is a summary of journal entries from the dates specified.
Reader's Note: The theme for the month of August is "Snickerdoodles – Case Studies of Female Failures". This post is installment 1 of a series.
 Proper nouns have been changed to protect the author from the guilty.*
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

An aging Carousel Rider seeks counsel in how to find a husband (Sunday, August 19, 2018)

Rhianna* is 41 and has an MBA from Mediocre State University*. She worked abroad for a decade, but she's been out of work for a year and is now living with her parents. She also wants to get married and have a child. She is very frustrated about her life situation. Earlier this week, she contacted my wife seeking counseling and advice.

Over a series of text exchanges during the past few days, we got to know Rhianna's personality and problems better. My wife and I thought I should join their conversation in order to give Rhianna a better concept about men's viewpoints, and Rhianna agreed with this plan. So, Rhianna* came to our place of business (POB) today to meet with my wife, and I joined their discussion.

At first, we presumed that since she is an unmarried, regular church-going Christian, then she was not sexually active. So we thought that she must be inadvertently saying or doing something that gave men the idea that she was easy and not marriage material. So we focused on trying to identify what that might be.

But as the discussion wore on, we gradually learned that she has a prolific sex life.

Cognitive Dissonance

She had already told my wife about her previous relationship in their text exchange, so we started from there. So my wife and I were kind of like questioning her about her relationship habits and sexual desires, without appearing too rudely obvious.

We found that Rhianna only dates foreign guys. I asked her if she only wanted to marry a foreign guy. She said, "No, I don't really care. It's not just [guys with western] eyes that I like. I just want to find someone who loves me."

I said, "OK, so why do you only want to date this certain type of man?"

She replied, "I am sad because… I want to emigrate somewhere and…"

Unrequited desire and discontentment is a bad combination, but more than that, I could see she was not really settled in her mind, or… she was not being very honest with us.

As we got to know her better, we discovered that she doesn't just date foreign guys intermittently in her search for a husband. No, she dates a lot of foreign guys! She keeps a long list of guys she met from online dating sites, and she sees at least one guy every day, and sometimes up to four guys a day!!! Every weekend, she'll pick out the best one (or two) of the bunch and ride him hard all weekend. Every once in a while, she'll screw a date (or two) on a weekday, usually whenever she's had a stressful day, and the daily d!ck happens to pique her fanny.

To top it off, she said men only want her body, but she's a "decent woman" who just wants to "fall in love" and get married.

I noticed that she did have a pretty nice body (long hair, slender, fit). She obviously spent time working out at the (hotel) gym. She dressed attractively, but her face is showing her age – badly.

We asked her what her qualifications are, for going out on a date with a man. She told us, "I don't like dating. There's only one man out there for me. I cannot fly to any foreign country, because I must take care of my parents, and not let them worry about me."

So another issue is that she can't decide whether to go live abroad or stay and take care of her parents.

She doesn't like dating?!? Salami!!!

An Ugly Mouth

Worst of all, her big mouth was her most unattractive feature – by far!

She bragged about herself saying she is "so good", and "at the top" of her career. She enjoyed giving us a long swarthy monologue about her (previous) position as a boss. She even got a swelling ego validation when we agreed with her capability by pointing out how bossy she is.

She made several statements that expressed her poor attitude toward men. She proudly said that "men can't resist my body", and that "every man" wants to have sex with her. At the same time, she condemned male desire with a breathy smirk as being "sooo dirty", but nevertheless, it was obvious that she enthusiastically received this attention as validation. Obviously she likes sex, and is only saying that male desire is "dirty", as a form of guilt management and ego preservation.

So it was just as I suspected from reading her previous texts to my wife. Her biggest problems concerning her challenge in bagging a man was her overwhelming pride, her disrespectful attitude towards men in general, her past history, and her cognitive dissonance concerning sexual relations. So in fact, she has a number of major stumbling blocks holding her back in her search for a husband.

Concerning her search for a husband, I told her that maybe 20 years ago she had a good shot at finding a decent man and getting married, but her arrogant mouth and her argumentative nature has long since scared all the marriage minded men away. She was probably so self-absorbed in her career and her sex life that she didn't even notice.

Concerning her self-professed impact on men's sexual desire, I told her that there's nothing special about that, because few men can resist having sex. She might just be getting a lot of attention because she makes her receptacle available.

Concerning her attitude, I told her that women will throw men away for bad (i.e. non Tingle inducing) sex, but men are quite tolerant in that area, until it comes to withholding sex altogether. Instead, men throw women away because they are a disrespectful b!tch.

She responded to these statements with looks of shock, indignation, and confusion, but she said nothing in response.

I thought about explaining to her how men view a woman with a high N count – good for a shag, but a very bad choice for marriage. But I decided to hold that tidbit of information off for a later date. I've already laid more on her than what she could handle.

After that, I left my wife to continue on with their discussion.

The Fork Incident (Saturday, August 25, 2018)

Rhianna* came to meet me and my wife around 2:30 pm, and our talk started out on a positive note. I decided to try teaching her how to respect a man, and she was quite eager to learn some tips from me, thinking that it would improve her love life. So during our discussion, I told her that I would tap a fork on the plate whenever I felt like she was being inappropriate or disrespectful.

I also made it into a running joke by making comments like,

"No, you forked it up again…"

"Look! You keep getting forked!"

"You really enjoy forking around, don't you?"

I had hoped she might lighten up and laugh, or that she might even get into the spirit of the game by responding with similar statements, like,

"Stop forking with me!"

"Fork off!"

But no. She was way too serious. I thought maybe my wife was giving her stress.

At first, the fork tapping technique seemed to work well towards her enlightenment. But after I had talked for about 5 minutes about how important it is for a woman to show respect to a man, she interrupted me by asking my wife why men treat her so badly. I tapped the fork, and when I had regained her attention, I pointed out that she had interrupted me. Then I asked her, "Can you tell me anything of what I just said?"

She just sat there with a blank stare on her face and flashed me an impertinent gaze. She could not remember anything I said, just moments earlier! After a moment of silence, I said,

"See, this is exactly what I am talking about. You asked us for help. I am giving you some honest male feedback, and I want to get some honest feedback from you too. But I just spent the last 5 minutes answering the question that you just asked my wife when you interrupted me. Then you can't even tell me one thing I said. You obviously weren't listening to me. It seems like you don't really care about what I have to say. This is the kind of disrespect that is making men reject you."

Rhianna became uncomfortable and fidgety, and my wife became very anxious as well. I think the immediate, real-time, feedback loop on her behavior made her self-conscious, and this sparked some introspection, which of course, is anathema to the solipsistic ego.

The Herd Mentality Rulz

Unfortunately, my wife was not inert to her influence, following the herd mentality. After only a few minutes of talking with Rhianna, my wife was becoming arrogant, irritated, and disrespectful, just like her. But I also noticed, that at about the same time that my wife started to fly off the handle, Rhianna started to pick up on what I was talking about, and she started weeping.

The exact timing of their exchange of demeanor made me believe that Rhianna was afflicted by an evil spirit that did not give her a reprieve until it jumped off of her and onto my wife.

After this, my wife started to mirror Rhianna's attitude by making crude references to male sex drive in the same dismissive manner. This struck me as being really ugly and improper, and I started tapping the fork in response to their talk. Then my wife lost her cool, and started scolding me, saying it was disrespectful of me to tap the fork while she was talking. I tapped the fork again, and told her she was scolding me. Then she flew into an irate tirade while I sat quietly, sighed heavily, and listened with a bored look on my face.

I did not fork either one of them again after that, because I felt that they had gotten the point, and were experiencing some conviction about that. Rhianna was crying, and I could feel the conviction fall over my wife.

Our exercise in fork tapping only lasted about 10 minutes, and I don't think more than 40 seconds went by without me tapping the fork in response to her impudence. Pretty pathetic.

After an awkward moment of silence, my wife continued on with her talk. A lot of what she said was a description of her convictions about our relationship, but she did not own it by including our names. After a few more minutes, they started talking in Chinese. I took this as a clue that they had had enough of me, so I made a silent departure. I knew I had literally embarrassed the he11 out of the both of them, so it was better to give them some time out, and let it sink in.

My wife continued to talk with Rhianna almost 5 hours, while I finished up some odd repair jobs around the house. Afterwards my wife was in her quiet, guilty mode. We had a long talk about the visit today, and I was pleased to know that she had learned some things from this interaction.

Upon reflection, I saw that it was hard to make my point evident to Rhianna, and when I did, it came at some cost to myself (in the form of my wife's fractiousness). I had a prayer and asked God if it was a waste of time to minister to people like her. I felt like it's an impossible task to speak to women about their past sexual sin and prod them towards repentance.

Related

Meditations on the experiences described above eventually culminated in a slew of posts.

- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019-02-23)
- Σ Frame: Hitting a glorified nerve at Patheos (2019-03-04)
- Σ Frame: Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference (2019-03-20)
- Σ Frame: What is glorification? (2019-03-23)
- Σ Frame: Introducing Katie and the Future of Human Mating (2020-06-03)

Rebranding the Natural Order as "Misogyny"

Jack · 9 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

TPTB are attempting to redefine the public's perception of right and wrong.

Readership: Aliberals; Christians; Men;
Length: 2,400 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

Over the past few years, TPTB have tried to make us swallow the false notion that traditional nationalism is "rac!st", and anything antifeminist (e.g. the Manosphere, masculinity, traditional marriage, SAHM's) is "sex!st" and "misogynist". Meanwhile, many weak-minded, NPCish, mass media consumers have jumped on the wagon. About one year ago, I picked out the latter slur, and wrote a post entitled, Revisiting Misogyny (2020 August 7), which deconstructed how "offense" is purported to be "abuse". I also examined the ethical vectors and psychological tools that feminism uses to demonize Headship in general, and recast the blame onto men specifically.

This post revisits this topic and offers a few pertinent case studies that elucidate the machinations of mass rebellion.

The Rebranding of Misogyny

An article at The New York Times explained the challenge that feminists have had in subverting the traditional/Christian social mores of America, and why they coopted "misogyny" as a socially coercive shame tactic.

> "This understanding of misogyny became a commonly held idea among feminists: the issue was structural. Society was organized in a misogynistic way, even if its individual members didn't see themselves as woman-haters."
>
> The New York Times: What does Misogyny look like? (2019-03-08)

The inside scoop is that this concept of society being "organized in a misogynistic way" is rooted in "the problem that has no name" (H/T: Betty Friedan in her book, The Feminine Mystique), a problem that we might now call Generalized Feminist Discontentment (GFD), and which we know is magnified by sexual promiscuity. Considering the fact that most women were generally happier under the old regime, it is a twist to call it misogynistic.

> "Much like "racist" — which was once mostly used to describe certain sheriffs, politicians or neighbors — misogynist is now as often applied to the system of institutions that creates an unequal America as it is to individuals. In this broadened meaning, happily married men, men with daughters and women themselves can be implicated. The way the word is now used, you don't have to hate women to be a misogynist, despite what Webster's dictionary still says today."
>
> The New York Times: What does Misogyny look like? (2019-03-08)

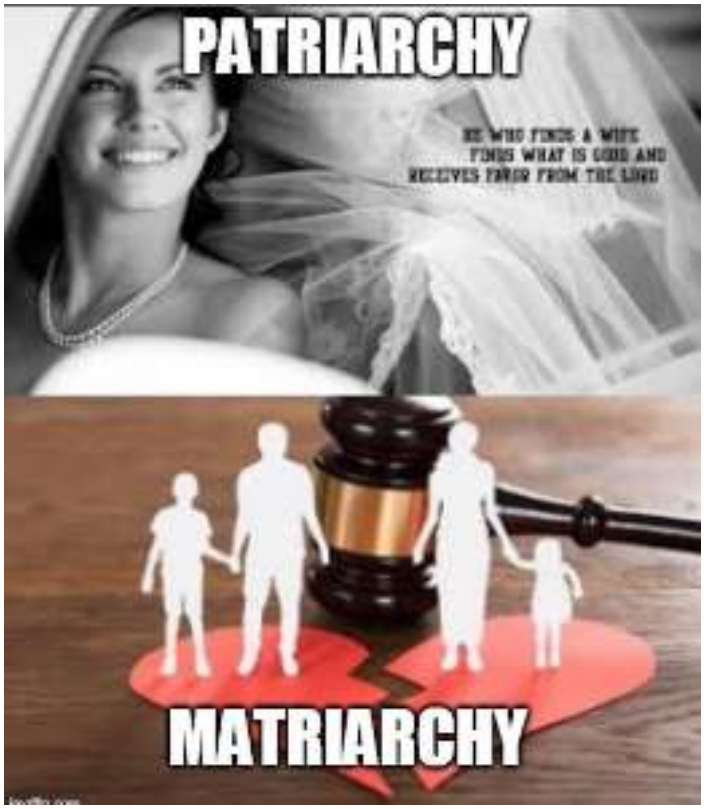
For those of us who are still confused about why the word "misogynist" is being thrown at so many apparently decent people, the author makes this clear. Anyone who subscribes to the old regime in any way, anyone who is traditional, conservative, Christian, family oriented, or in a word, Godly, can now be thrown under the bus. It's sad for us to find that feminists have had considerable success in their endeavors to criminalize order and spread their brand of GFD across the nation.



The New Feminist Concept of Misogyny

An article that appeared in Vox: What we get wrong about misogyny (2020-03-07) reported a book by Kate Manne entitled, Down Girl: The Logic of Misogyny. According to the book summary at Amazon, Manne argues that… [emphasis mine]

> "…misogyny should not be understood primarily in terms of the hatred or hostility some men feel toward all or most women. Rather, it's primarily about controlling, policing, punishing, and exiling the "bad" women who challenge male dominance. And it's compatible with rewarding "the good ones," and singling out other women to serve as warnings to those who are out of order."

The definition of misogyny in the first sentence is close to being correct, but I would add that it is a practiced expression of cruelty, exploitation, hatred, and hostility. The way Manne phrases it reinforces the "men are evil" message that is being carefully matriculated into the public consciousness of the wider populace. But in fact, misogyny comes from other women as much as it does from men, and it can be institutionalized as well. For example, last year's post argued that feminism is misogynistic because it uses lures of sexual liberation and power (AKA equality) to exploit and corrupt women through peculiar channels that are unique to women's weaknesses. Manne's addition in the remainder of the paragraph makes it quite obvious that the purpose of rebranding a patriarchal order as "misogyny" is to subvert God's ordained order of Headship. Obviously, she/they have never tasted the delicious fruits of spiritual obedience, and their GFD has grown into spiritual rebellion, indicated by how they have called good evil.

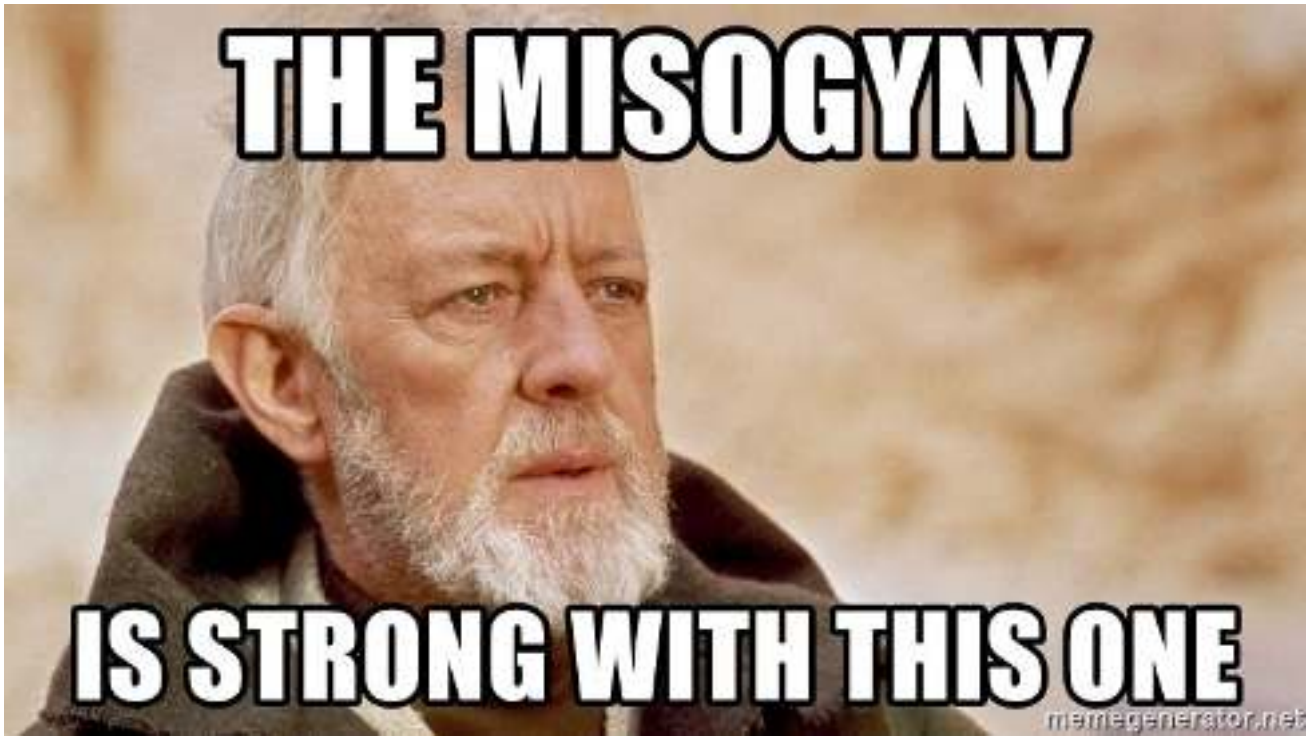
Amazon's summary buys into mythos (which is a commonly adopted approach to evince a lie) when it goes so far as to say,

> "It's also common for women to serve as scapegoats, be burned as witches, and treated as pariahs."

Burning witches was common in the colonial town of Salem in the winter of 1693, but I'm hard pressed to come up with another example in recent western history.



To make a big lie go down easily, it must be personally identifiable, it must appeal to discontented desire, and it must be woven into the present. It must also be targeted at an audience willing to be deceived (see 2 Timothy 4:3-4). Therefore, in order to stoke up the mythos for this claim to be sufficiently convincing, Manne goes on to describe several present events to which this rebranding can be applied. Going on with the summary at Amazon,

> "Manne examines recent and current events such as the Isla Vista killings by Elliot Rodger, the case of the convicted serial rapist Daniel Holtzclaw, who preyed on African-American women as a police officer in Oklahoma City, Rush Limbaugh's diatribe against Sandra Fluke, and the "misogyny speech" of Julia Gillard, then Prime Minister of Australia, which went viral on YouTube. The book shows how these events, among others, set the stage for the 2016 US presidential election. Not only was the misogyny leveled against Hillary Clinton predictable in both quantity and quality, Manne argues it was predictable that many people would be prepared to forgive and forget regarding Donald Trump's history of sexual assault and harassment. For this, Manne argues, is misogyny's oft-overlooked and equally pernicious underbelly: exonerating or showing "himpathy" for the comparatively privileged men who dominate, threaten, and silence women."

No witch burnings were mentioned (unless we count Hillary Clinton's electoral defeat), but moreover, it is just as I described in last year's post. The TPTB (and their pandy Manne) are using a broad brush in an attempt to expand the definition of misogyny by presenting a false association between patriarchy, misogyny, and various social ills related to human nature. By making this logical leap of faith, using classical conditioning and raw repetition, and sparking the inherent fear of mass anarchy, any manifestation of male authority, i.e. Headship, can be absorbed under this subtle redefinition of misogyny, and the baby can then be thrown out with the bathwater. Manne's book is a perfect example of propaganda supporting this strategy. We can only assume that the purpose of drawing this association is to assert a false moral authority over non-liberal value systems (e.g. Christianity; gender roles; the traditional family structure), to calumniate them as being detrimentally archaic or depraved, and to leverage the ostracization of their practitioners on various levels of society through the machinations of the liberally ordered shame culture.

How Rebranding "Misogyny" is used as a Shame Tactic in a Power Play

To give the reader an example of how this power play is executed, I'll present this speech from ex Prime Minister of Australia, Julia Gillard.

Wise politicians know that a divided house cannot stand, but Gillard foolishly divided the house along the lines of male-female sex differences. The resulting leadership instability, political turmoil, and utter distraction caused by a speech such as this one is precisely why women were not admitted into politics before the early 20th century. If women are to be involved in politics, their first priority should be to bring unity and national inspiration, not turmoil. For example, Princess Diana was excellent at this and so her legacy continues to this day, in spite of the failures in her personal life.

Just as could be expected, nine months after this speech, following a lengthy period of leadership instability, Gillard lost the leadership of the Labor Party back to Rudd. Like a sore loser, she resigned from her position as Prime Minister the next day, and announced her retirement from politics.

Politics is dirty business, always has been, and that is never going to change. Gillard obviously couldn't stand the heat, but instead of putting her personal discomfort aside and concentrating on making an appeal to national unity, she tried to destroy the oven, and only as a last resort did she get out of the kitchen. Note that she uses the phrase, "I'm offended" no fewer than 15 times within a 15 minute time frame. If a male politician ever used this phrase, he would be laughed to scorn. At 7:13, we see the parliament member sitting behind her stand up and walk out. At 8:05 another one follows him out. Even the women seen in the video, although they were acutely attentive, were also worried and bewildered.

Hillary Clinton, who was Secretary of State at the time, praised the speech as "very striking" with Gillard going "chapter and verse". [Video of Clinton's speech on Sexism: jump to 7:57 in the linked video for her coverage of Gillard; at 9:28 she states "chapter and verse".] (Her choice of words indicate that she is a firm believer in the hoary scriptures of the Feminist Bible.) In turn, Clinton also lost the presidential election in 2016. Overall, it appears that having a Feminist platform and grasping at power through accusations of "misogyny" is a losing political stance. The reason is because it not only divides the house, but also the whole nation.

Here, I don't intend to cast judgment on any actions that could (or could not) be construed as an injustice, but only to say that addressing the kinds of "offenses" that Gillard brought up in this speech should be reserved for personal interactions and private conversations, not on the floor of national Parliament, and certainly not broadcast on prime time TV. This kind of brash impertinence sets a bad example that every woman in Australia will follow after. (See Esther 1:16-18.)

So you see, this rebranding is not only being talked about in books and on liberal internet articles, it is taking place at the highest orders of power.

Turning Things Up-Side-Down

Vox's article included an interview with Manne in which she states,

> "There are relatively few misogynists as brazen or as unapologetic as Donald Trump, partly because misogynists often think they're taking the moral high ground by preserving a status quo that feels right to them. They want to be socially and morally superior to the women they target."

Manne's last sentence is a projection that implies that she is feeling rather morally inferior for some reason and is resentful of the natural order.

In spite of all his moral defects, Trump is a man who is comfortable with his masculinity. He's also quite adept at exercising masculine frame. This is precisely the trait that grants him leadership ability, and it is also what made him popular among his constituents — not his past sins. This is an important trait for a leader to have, because it shows that he firmly believes in God's ordained order. He doesn't need to waste his time arguing and quibbling to maintain "moral superiority" because he knows his authority (as a man) is written into the fabric of creation.

> [13] For it was Adam who was first created, and then Eve. [14] And it was not Adam who was deceived, but the woman was deceived and became a wrongdoer.
>
> 2 Timothy 2: 13-14 (NASB)

In the interview at Vox, Manne states,

> "I think most misogynistic behavior is about hostility toward women who violate patriarchal norms and expectations, who aren't serving male interests in the ways they're expected to. So there's this sense that women are doing something wrong: that they're morally objectionable or have a bad attitude or they're abrasive or shrill or too pushy. But women only appear that way because we expect them to be otherwise, to be passive."

I won't deny that a lot of misogyny is directed toward women who violate patriarchal norms and expectations, but it isn't done as part of a concerted mass conspiracy waged by men against women to control them and keep them in line, as she seems to think. The fact is that women who violate patriarchal norms are just being ugly on the spiritual plane of existence, and this is the characteristic element of feminism that fails miserably. Men can't do anything in response to ugliness other than to react accordingly. As I wrote in last year's post,

> "Misogyny is a self-reinforcing cycle. Women who conscientiously pursue the development of masculine traits invariably invite more misogyny onto themselves, especially when they use an aggressive masculine front to defend the lies and deceptions they have bought into via herd conformity."

What Manne doesn't seem to understand is that patriarchy is not about women being under subjection to men (which is an oft tainted violation of the hoary rule of equality), nor is it about women "serving male interests" per se, but rather, it's a conformance to God's created order — one that carries many inherent blessings to both men and women (blessings which are habitually downplayed, denigrated, or ignored altogether). God created women to be a companion and helpmeet for man, and if they fail to do that, or carry a resentful attitude about it, then they are doing something wrong and morally objectionable. But here we see that Manne goes to the opposite extreme with the mistaken notion that women can fight against God while expecting to become morally superior!

Again, this all comes back to the redefining misogyny to include any expression of God's created order and rebranding it as oppression.

Concluding Statements

Following this modus operandi, we can see how modern feminism is truly the most misogynistic social machine in all of human history. Now, every Christian who conforms to Biblical gender roles, Headship, and God's created order can be denigrated as systemic abusers, when in fact, it is the accusers who are guilty of disorder and rebellion. This powerplay also undermines women's natural source of support and security — societal order in general, and specifically men — and demands that women become what they are not — all the things which are traditionally assumed of men. This fully explains why more women are clinically depressed and are more unhappy now than ever before.

That's systemic misogyny!

Related

- Σ Frame: 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017 December 1)
- Chateau Heartiste: Misogynist, Sexist SJWs Bullycide A Sexually Empowered Young Woman (2017 December 6)
- Chateau Heartiste: Supreme Gentlemen Are The Real Misogynists (2018 March 22)
- Σ Frame: The Ten Commandments of Feminism (2018 June 5)
- Chateau Heartiste: The Biggest Misogynists Are Other Women (2018 June 17)
- Dalrock: Warhorn interview: Does work like yours attract misogynists? (2019 February 18)
- Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): Bring out your misogynists! (2020 October 22)

Sappy Wall Day, Tomi Lahren!

Jack · 11 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

In celebration of her collision with reality!

Readership: Men
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes to ~5 hours, depending on interest.

La Introduction

Tomi Lahren's birthday is August 11, 1992! So she turns 29 today! Sappy Wall Day, Tomi! We here at the Manosphere are remembering you on your special day!

This is a very special day in your life, because this is the day that you have officially hit the Wall! In fact, 29 is a very special age which lasts for a decade, because for the next ten years, you will (claim to) be 29.

Today is also the one-year anniversary of the day you gained a special place of notoriety in our hearts and minds, forever lodging a place for yourself in the Trad Thot Hall of Shame.

This post is dedicated to the celebration of Lahren's 29th birthday and to review her contribution to Manospherian lore.

La Histoire

A little history.

Lahren attended college at the University of Nevada at Las Vegas, where she studied broadcast journalism. One of her early pieces was a glowing article for the Review-Journal about a fellow student who had turned to stripping for financial reasons.

In 2014 (age 21), Lahren finished college. She was rejected by The Blaze, but was picked up by One America News

Network and given her own show, On Point. She gains fame by taking on controversial topics (e.g. B L M, immigration, gun laws, Colin Kapernick, etc.) from a conservative viewpoint.

In 2015 (age 22), Lahren lived in San Diego and her then boyfriend was a Navy Seal.

In November 2015, she moved to Texas and began a new show with The Blaze, which ended with a 3 minute summary, Final Thoughts.

She was an open supporter of fracking and claimed that climate change is a myth.

She was also a vocal opponent of stricter gun control and is staunchly pro-military,

Lahren claimed that she is a leading voice for conservative and Republican Millennials. At the same time, she has also ripped into her own demographic, saying Millennials are lazy and calling Millennial men "soft."

On March 17, 2017 (age 24), Lahren made a guest appearance on The View in which she said that women should have access to abortion. By coming out as pro-abortion, Lahren blew up her career on "The Blaze". One wonders why, exactly, a "conservative" young professional woman, at age 24, would suddenly change her stance on abortion? Why would she decide that supporting abortion would become so important it was worth losing her job and might possibly destroy her career? What could have caused that? And what might it explain about her enormous spite towards all men?

Of course it is pure speculation, but I think it might be because she herself elected to have an abortion around that time and she was about to be outed as a hypocrite.

In August 2017, Lahren joined Fox News as a contributor.

In June 2019, Lahren became engaged to a sports management professional named Brandon Fricke. Contrary to many reports, the Brandon Fricke who was Tomi Lahren's fiancé is NOT a professional soccer player. That's a different Brandon Fricke. Lahren's ex-Fricke is a professional sports agent.

Fricke has a master's degree from Arizona State. He works as an agent for professional athletes. He's a "Jerry Maguire". He ran for Congress in California as an independent.

Fricke for Congress: Meet Brandon

Four years after, his page has not been updated to reflect his split with Lahren!

The guy is a tall, handsome, educated professional with money. The guy bought her an engagement ring estimated at $50,000. Then one year later, she broke up with him, and then all həll broke loose.

MSN (Robyn Merrett): Tomi Lahren calls off engagement to fiancée Brandon Fricke: 'We are still best friends' (2020 April 30)

In June 2020, she came out in favor of same sex marriage.

Later, the news turned out that she dumped her fiancée (Fricke) for another man, Jay Cutler, who then broke up with her a short time later after a controversy.

Le Duperie

Let that sink in, y'all. The entire gamut of Red Pill lore rolled up in un jeune fille — Attention seeking, the Feminine Imperative, Machiavellianism, solipsism, cognitive dissonance, hyperactive hamstering, psychological projection, bait and switch, hypergamy, branch swinging… and now the proverbial Wall loometh!

She had a man who was literally everything she claims to want. Handsome. In shape. Successful. Has his sh!t together. Got something going on. Fricke was, and is, literally EVERYTHING she says she wants. And she told him to go Fricke himself!

SHE BROKE UP WITH HIM!!!

She had the chance to be married to a fine man — a top 0.1% man! But she backed out. Why?

Women really really want to get married, but actually, they don't want to BE married, because it removes them from the SMP and pressures them to grow up. Lahren makes this perfectly clear. They just want to have "married" on their life resume. Once they have that checked off their bucket list, they'll throw it away on a whim, as evidenced by the data. (40% of marriages end in divorce, with 70% of these initiated by the woman.)

Vive le glorieux carrousel!

This shows what is most important to her. It's not marriage, nor having an alpha man, not money, not status, and not even having a fine c0ck to shinny her muff on when it's cold and snowy outside. Neither quality nor quantity will fill her bill.

No, she wants CHOICE, and she'll hold on to her options as long as she can… until she has no other options! She likes to play god, to be the lord of her own candy@ss fantasyland life. It's "Me first!", all the way to perdition.

Her Christianity is only a cultural identification, as NovaSeeker described in The Amalgamation of Western Culture (2020 December 2).

This is the reason why she cannot empathize with the needs of the men in her life. She doesn't care what they want, because that would require humility. According to her world view, men should bow down and worship her god of Choice — herself. So yes, it is impossible for her to ever be an obedient Christian in any meaningful context of marriage. She has defiled herself with the world and will never achieve a God glorifying Headship marriage.

It's probably better for her not to marry at all. She can continue to pursue this illusion of choice, and she won't defraud any man she might have otherwise married, and then ruin his life with a frivorce when she finds out that it isn't what she needs most in life.

La Rantage

Here is Tomi Lahren's epic rantage (2020 August 6). The indignant feminist boilerplate is obnoxious, but the butthurt is delicious.

This is the screed of a woman nearing 30 who suddenly demands a serious man, after years of enjoying the attentions of many non-serious men, and is frustrated to find that these men and younger lasses alike disobey her and her aging friends, and still act in the ways that help them to quickly bed down like they used to do.

There's not much more to it.

In this video, she repeatedly uses the term "Thotiana" derisively. At first, I thought this was a feminist variation of the relatively new term Thot (which I think was coined by Roosh about a year ago.) But after reviewing Tomi's rant and researching this a little further, I realized that my first impression of the term Thotiana was mistaken. Tatiana is a common name in Eastern European countries (i.e. Latvia, Moldova, Estonia, Poland, etc.). These women come from a traditional patriarchal society, and there is also a skewed sex ratio in those countries resulting in many women without a man.

So now I've come to see that Thotiana is an envious Feminist slur against these Eastern European women who have the reputation of being thin, feminine, and marriage minded. In some instances, the usage of the term Thotiana is wrong. Lahren is a high-class Thot, but not a Thotiana.

Manosphere Blog Posts

For those readers who might take great joy in remembering Tomi's self-destruction, I've collected a looong list of links and videos of the schadenfreudian variety.

- Spawny's Space (Farm Boy): A Lot Of Men Are Trash — Part I (2020 August 7)
- Spawny's Space (Farm Boy): A Lot Of Men Are Trash — Part II (2020 August 9)
- Spawny's Space (Jack): A Lot Of Men Are Trash — Part III (2020 August 10)
- Mogadishu Matt: Team Tomi Lahren vs. Team Man (2020 August 10)
- Red Pill Dad: Tomi Lahren, ladies…welcome to the #metoo of hypergamy. (2020 August 10)

In the above link, Red Pill Dad wrote five takeaways for Tomi Lahren and her cohorts.

1. Before you complain about a man, remember: you chose to date him.
2. Ladies: your success and money doesn't matter to men. We literally don't care, and I mean literally, as in actually, factually, in reality, we don't give AF about how much money or status you have.
3. Men won't commit to a relationship unless it's an obvious win for them.
4. Feminine love and attention is the missing ingredient.
5. Hypergamy cuts both ways; yes, it's bad for most men, but it's also, in the long run, bad for women too, especially re: commitment.

Catchy!

- The Hominist Papers: Tomi Lahren Clings to Stereotypes of Manhood (2020 August 11)
- The Rational Male: The Empress has no Clothes (2020 August 11)

In the above link, Rollo wrote,

> "Tomi Lahren is a Feminist in the truest sense of the term. In one breath she screams men are trash, and in the > next she claims to love men. This is the cognitive dissonance that generations of feminism embeds in women. Years of socio-psychological upbringing trains them to distrust, despise and emancipate themselves from men, while at the same time their evolved, biological, mental firmware cries in frustration for a need of men to love, protect, provide and sexually satisfy them.

>
> This inner conflict becomes more and more stressful as this generation of young women approach the Epiphany Phase. One conflicting shift I see among this crop of young women is a greater, and earlier, awareness that they will be less likely to optimize Hypergamy with an acceptable, elite, man they are taught to believe they all deserve. Settling for anything less than optimal is anathema to the Strong Independent Woman ideal; settling for a suboptimal man is the main source of inner conflict for the Equal-but-Better expectations women place on today's admittedly lacking men.
>
> This is what Tomi is screaming and crying about."

- Whores and Ale: Woes of the Basic Bitch (2020 August 11)
- Mogadishu Matt: Tomi Lahren Posting and Video Roundup (2020 August 12)
- The Transformed Wife: Men Should Prioritize Career Women? (2020 August 12)
- Roosh V: Tomi Lahren And The Tragedy Of Modern Dating (2020 August 17)
- Didact's Reach: Tradthot is Thot (2020 August 19)
- Snapper TRX: How to Avoid Marriage (or relationships in general) (2020 August 24)
- The Other McCain: What's Wrong With Tomi Lahren? (2020 November 12)

Also, see comments about Lahren under this post.

- Σ Frame: The Learning Psychology of Women who Participate in the Online Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 13)

Videos

Rich Cooper takes on Tomi Lahren. (2020 August 5)

Tomi Lahren and Rollo Tomassi, with his catchquote, "Tomi knows how to look feminine. But she doesnt know how to be feminine." (2020 August 5).

Aba and Preach: Tomi Lahren teaches us how to be "Real Men" (2020 August 6)

Joker at Better Bachelor: Her Facebook rant goes viral. Sounds like the princess got her heart broken (2020 August 6)

Coach Greg Adams at Free Agent Lifestyle: Tomi Lahren Glitches and Cancels Men. The Conservative News Host Turns Liberal for a Moment? (2020 August 7)

Joker at Better Bachelor: Poor Tomi, even women are now telling her she's the problem, not men. (2020 August 11)

Rich Cooper: Why Tomi Lahren Keeps Throwing Childish Hissy Fits… (2020 August 18)

Terrence Popp: Tomi Lahren Thinks Men Are Trash (2020 August 21)

Joker at Better Bachelor: She left her husband of 5 months, found out he was really rich and just testing her. She failed! (2020 April 27)

Readers are welcome to add other links and videos in the comments.

Sources

1. USA Today (Daniel Funke): 5 Things to Know about Tomi Lahren (2016 December 2)
2. Infogalactic: Tomi Lahren
3. Deti gave us some other facts about Lahren.

Related

- Campus Reform (Dion J. Pierre): Clemson University students fight to ban ‘racist’ Tomi Lahren from campus (2021 March 25)

Carousel Widow in Decline – Part 2

Jack · 13 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A Case Study of a Carousel Rider in Regression.

Readership: All; Men;
Author's Note: The contents of this series is a summary of journal entries from the dates specified.
Reader's Note: The theme for the month of August is "Snickerdoodles – Case Studies of Female Failures". This post is installment 2 of a series.
 Proper nouns have been changed to protect the author from the guilty.*
Length: 2,200 words
Reading Time: 7.5 minutes

Rolling in the Lies (Monday, August 27th 2018)

After I came home from work, my wife gave me her phone so that I could peruse her chat conversation with Rhianna.* Most of it was just femtalk, but Rhianna's general attitude and choice of words revealed some vital tidbits of information about her mental paradigm.

In all her talk about her experiences with men, she never failed to double down with a proud arrogant attitude. She put herself in the seat of a judge over men's performance, maturity, and behavior. It was obvious to me that this defiant and rebellious attitude would prevent any man from obtaining any joy or satisfaction from being with her.

In addition to this ugly attitude, she carried an underlying distrust of men and an indignant disdain for men's interest in sex. I'm sure she learned this attitude from all her bad experiences with men in the past – an obvious consequence of her sexual promiscuity. I was certain that this is exactly what men detest about her, and I expressed this to my wife.

Moreover, she wants to keep a man close enough to satisfy her own needs, but not close enough to satisfy his, which would naturally require something from her. All of this fully explains all of her fights with her paramours.

Reading between the lines of her text messages to my wife, I picked up a lot of other information about Rhianna's lurve laffe. Verbally, she tells them "no sex", while at the same time, she is sending nude photos to them, and accepting their invitation to visit their apartment late at night. Rhianna doesn't seem to understand that the overall nonverbal message always trumps the verbal messages, and then she gets angry and frustrated when men expect her to put out. My wife pointed out to her that she is giving men conflicting messages. But even so, she still wanted to blame the men, presumably because she didn't want to take responsibility for her suggestive behaviors.

I found something else rather interesting about Rhianna's personality. As I already mentioned, she is an arrogant, pouty-faced proud-@ss, which really turns men off. But whenever she gets the Tingles for a particular guy, she becomes totally obsessed with him, and loses all sense of dignity and self-control. However, no matter how much she wants the guy, she can never swallow her pride, show her vulnerability, and admit her need of a man.

It was obvious to me that Rhianna intentionally clings to a state of denial, and she refuses to face any information that opposes her world view. She only wants to find someone who will agree with her, and pet her hamster.

Since my wife was getting tired of Rhianna's complaints and becoming frustrated with all this, she asked me how to respond to Rhianna's texts. I thought about this, and decided that we could try to make it painfully obvious to her that she is a liar without calling her a liar. So I explained the situation to my wife as follows.

"Rhianna is giving those men verbal statements that she does not want to escalate intimacy. A good man will hear these statements and not escalate. But then she thinks they're a loser for not escalating. OTOH, a man who gets negative signals and then escalates anyway is not respecting her stated wishes. If a man does that, he's not the type of guy who wants to get married."

*"To make matters more confusing, she is saying that she is not ready for sex, but is simultaneously giving these same men many nonverbal messages that she is DTF. Not surprisingly, the good guys get confused as he11, jump to the worst conclusions about her character, and then drop kick her, while the bad guys move in for the lay. So basically, she is filtering out the marriage minded men, and attracting the f*ckboys."*

"The problem in her mind is that she is operating in a world of feeling. She wants to feel like she is being seduced against her will, when in fact, it is her will to be seduced. She wants to lose control of her desire, and then roil in it. She expects men to know this, to detect and respond to whatever she's thinking and feeling in the moment, and to escalate the sexual tension in spite of her token resistance. She doesn't seem to understand that men are goal-oriented and rational, and she refuses to face the fact that men don't actually have these superpowers of mind-reading. As a result, she is frustrated that men don't operate according to her mythos, and men don't respond to her in the way she expects."

"If she wants a good man who will marry her, then she should tell men exactly what she's thinking and what she wants. But if she wants to live in an emotional dream world where she can lie and be lied to, then she will naturally attract a bad man."

"You need to make her see the nature of her ways, and give her a clear choice about which type of man she really wants to do."

In her own words, my wife relayed this message to Rhianna in her texts. But the ensuing discussion of the matter with her was minimal. It seemed that she had no interest in chasing down her issue of lies and cognitive dissonance. Instead, she resumed giving us an hourly report of her interactions with a new flame. She told us she is marriage minded, but that's not true at all. She just wants a fast f*ck with a hawt hunk.

It really irritated me to know that Rhianna doesn't want to listen to what we have to say, and she was not totally honest with either me or Pastor Dan*. Based on what my wife shared with me, Rhianna is only telling us about 20% of the whole story.

Total denial!

Stunning arrogant Asian woman with long straight black hair pointing at herself with a haughty expression, proud of her beauty, success, and self-love.

A Rigorous Exercise in Cognitive Dissonance (Saturday, September 1st, 2018)

Rhianna came to our shop and talked about sex for 7 hours!

She mentioned a lot of men just want to have sex with her on the same day they met or at the end of the first date. She was very disappointed with those men. She said, "That is sooo dirty! I am a very decent woman… and also drop dead gorgeous! I have a "baby face", and my voice is just sooo sweet! Men just cannot avoid me! When they meet me, they just go crazy about me! It's not my fault. They just cannot stop this bad cycle!"

She talked at length about how her previous relationships with those guys had turned out. She said they just had sex with her, and then broke up with her. She told me she was very very sad about this, because she felt like those men just "used her"… and when she dated those four German men, they "took advantage" of her too. Same thing happened with the Australian guy, and the French guy, and the Canadian…

She also told us ALL the details… Whew!

I said, "Wow! You're so free! You can taste all the flavors of ice cream at the market and then put the opened containers back in the freezer and not buy any of them. If I were one of these men, I would think, "Can I just take it from you?" By the way, you still owe me an apology!" (from the Fork Incident) She became a little more interested in listening to me, but she didn't really agree with me. So I took a different approach.

I asked her in so many words, "If you think men are taking advantage of you, then why don't you just tell them to stop?"

She replied, "I think that's not a big deal. Just touch my fingers… Touch my hand… Touch my waist… I don't think this is too much for me."

Then I asked her, "What actually is your boundary? You seem to think men really take advantage of you, but at the same time, you let them do whatever they like, and you don't think anything they do is wrong. I don't really understand."

She answered, "It's only when they ask me for sex."

I said, "But that is not your boundary, because you still have sex with them, and quite eagerly too. I don't think you have any boundaries. You just have a lot of expectations, and you're not making this clear to them… You're just making bossy demands when you don't get what you want. Actually, I don't think you really know what you want, except to be toyed with."

She gave me a very shocked and annoyed look but said nothing.

I said to her, "Look at what you're doing. You want to open that door to see what's inside, but then you won't go through that door because it requires some effort and investment on your part to make it work out. But you can't do it. You just want to be pampered and entertained… But you've already opened that door!"

She gave me an incredulous look and responded, "What door?"

I told her, "You want to get married, right? So how do you get through that door? You're opening the door by getting sexually involved, but you can't get a commitment that way, because that is not the Christian way to do it."

"You think you can control the sexual interaction, but you cannot leverage sex to get commitment. Yes, it's true that you can if you want, but you don't. You think you can say yes or no, so he can save it, until you want it. But that's not really how it works. See, the truth is, he's always "saving it". He's just waiting for you to give him a green light. As soon as you give him a nudie pic, or a whiff of Honey Puffs, he'll get high on the vapors and immediately downshift into sex mode. By doing so, you're conveying the message that no commitment is necessary to get access to your body. That's how the cycle works. So you see, the real issue is whether YOU can draw boundaries and convince him that you're worthy of commitment – not whether he can wait at a green light while you rev his motor. You're just playing around!"

Apparently, she couldn't comprehend the notion that she had any agency, because she kept saying that men's desire for sex is what messes everything up. At one point, I told her, "Sex can be your weapon! Sex can be your tool! …until one day you really fall in love with this man and then you decide to have sex with him! Then YOU become the tool! But instead of cherishing his love and building a nest in his life, you blame his desire for you, cuss him out for it, and harangue him about all kinds of stuff until he can't tolerate you anymore. And then you have the gall to say YOU feel used! Salami! I can't understand why you refuse to see that his reaction depends entirely on you! You have never thought about why he might want to marry you."

A while later in the discussion, this statement finally sank in, and she asked me, "How can I use sex for a weapon?" (which is telling of her cruel, manipulative mindset. If she were more introspective, she would have asked, "How do I use sex for a weapon?")

I told her, "You already are! Look, if you talk about sex for hours, send him nude pics, or go to his apartment alone late at night with a bottle of wine in hand, that's a blinding green light. Why should he not expect you to have sex at that point? If you give him a green light, and then slam on the brakes, that's about as rude and cruel as you could possibly be, because you're toying with his desire. But you never think about that. Instead, you think they're toying with you." (This is the mirror effect of Psychological Projection.)

Confused indignation.

"Once you give him a green light, you can't say you "changed your mind" without looking like a cruel, thoughtless, and foolish girl. If you pass that milestone and then try to backtrack, it's a breach of faith. At that point, sex becomes a tool of manipulation, not a tool of intimacy. If you use sex as a weapon, then don't be surprised if he fights back or kicks you out. That's how it works."

At that, she seemed to get it.

"The bottom line is that you can't honor nor respect a man and you can't manage your relationship with a man. Worst of all, you're selfish and cruel! Looks to me like you're getting exactly what you dish out."

She expressed her angsty frustration by saying something about what she wants is not there, but she couldn't articulate herself any better.

"Now that you understand all this, are you going to take responsibility for what happens, or are you just going to do the same things all over again?"

We'll find the answer to that question in Part 3.

Related

Meditations on the experiences described above eventually culminated in a slew of posts.

- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23)
- Σ Frame: Hitting a glorified nerve at Patheos (2019 March 4)

- Σ Frame: Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference (2019 March 20)
- Σ Frame: What is glorification? (2019 March 23)
- Σ Frame: Introducing Katie and the Future of Human Mating (2020-06-03)

The Feminine Secret

Jack · 16 August 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Hint: It's about monopolizing money, sex, power, and control.

Readership: Men
Author's Note: This post expands and explores a comment from Deti.
Length: 2,800 words
Reading Time: 9.5 minutes

> "Mystery is the essence of man's nature, and whatever presents itself to mankind under a mysterious appearance will always excite curiosity and be sought, even when men are satisfied that the veil covers nothing but a cypher…"
>
> *Giacoma Casanova, in The Memoirs of Jacques Casanova de Seingalt (1725-1798)

Vive le Fantaisie!

In a previous post, 3 Things that Make Women Tick (2020-12-11), Elspeth spilled the beans about what things are most dominant in the feminine psyche.

1. Social/Familial Acceptance
2. Men and Sexual Attractiveness
3. The Fantasy Life/Lifestyle

If we superpose all three into one combination, then it's easy to see how women desire a Sexual Fantasy Life that is Socially Accepted.

Idealists will point out that the ideal sex for women has elements of desire, emotional intimacy, and security/comfort, with few variations. But due to the nature of various dilemmas that women are faced with, the intensity of some elements are typically dampened by the presence of certain others. (To offer a few examples, social unrest and sexual tension are known to create attraction, but also insecurity. A man's fawning attention and commitment tends to decrease both his value and the intensity of Tingles he can generate. Sexual fulfillment leads to ennui.) It is nevertheless the case that almost no women can obtain sex that is all of these things from the same man. Hence women's existential sex problem. As such, a robust fantasy life can never be realized.

So it is a natural result of the curse of the fall, due to various social implications, and the fact that fantasy is not reality, that women cannot ever achieve their ideal fantasies out in the open, and so instead, they attempt to realize a semblance of this fantasy within a select time-space arrangement, only shared with a small clique of a few trusted individuals who are "in the know". This is where secrecy comes into play.

When it comes to the task of fleshing fantasy into reality, there are two kinds of "dating" that women engage in, similar to how we look at women's participation in sex.

When it comes to sex, there is "desire sex" — that is, women have sex because they are driven by pure desire/lust for sex with a man — and then there is "other sex", which can be some mix of comfort/intimacy/transactional/duty, in varying proportions and in various permutations depending on the context, life stage, and so on.

When it comes to dating, there is a similar dynamic at play (not exactly the same, of course, because dating is not sex). There are two types of dating:

1. "Desire dating"
2. "Pragmatic dating"

In recognition of the fact that women love opportunistically, Rollo described this as,

> "Women only see men as breeding stock or draft animals."
>
> The Rational Male: Sexual Selection & Existential Fear (2019-04-01)

The former are just hot guys, regardless of where it goes. It would be nice if he turns out to be the love of her life and the complete Alpha Bux/Beta Comfort package, but even if he doesn't, it's still pretty d@mned hot. The latter are dates that have a purpose — looking for a guy to fill a role, whether that role is boyfriend (provides social inclusion and entertainment), orbiter (provides attention), husband (provides status and income), companion (for various purposes), vacation tour guide, or something like that.

The former is basically soft polygyny by another name. That is, "desire dating" IS soft polygyny, plain and simple, because the few men involved are not strictly monogamous. Pragmatic dating is not polygyny, because the targeted men involved are a different set of men – the kinds of men who do not have soft harems.

However, women are well aware that they can have all of these things if they are willing to engage in relations with more than one man, separated in the time-space continuum. This is the underlying motivation to the well-known AF/BB mating strategy. It is also soft polyandry, which commonly takes the form of serial* monogamy (which is highly favored by females), but it can also be done *in parallel, and this is what most people think of soft polyandry.

