Women who showcase their sex appeal by parading around public spaces or online while wearing revealing clothing or nothing at all, and then complaining about harassment, men staring, objectification, etc., is like a rich, young, handsome playboy encrusted with diamond rings and gold chains, wearing a Rolex watch and Serengeti sunglasses, cruising really slowly through a middle-class suburb in a fuchsia Lamborghini convertible. Then he arrogantly complains about the low quality of the female fans who form a mob around his car, that they are low-class gold diggers, or that they're homely housewives bent on cheating on their husbands with him, that they're blocking the road, and 'vandalizing' his car with their disgusting body fluids, salty sweat, and oily fingerprint smudges. What he won't say is that he's only doing this to troll all the women's desires, and create havoc in 'deplorable' neighborhoods — all for nothing more than the cruel pleasure of playing with women's hearts and specifically to stroke his own ego. He's in Play Mode. That's why they're called Playboys.

The difference between said playboy and the average chick in Play Mode wearing bikinis, mid-riff tops, plunging cleavage, yoga pants, etc., is that the arrogant playboy is something like 1 in 50,000 men, while these denuded, highly expectant women comprise about 20-30% of the female population; maybe more than 50% in places like Miami or L.A.

Attention → Social Proof → Feminine Power →Validation

> "Some of these women are honest about their interest in inflaming male sexual desire—which has turned into a multi-million-dollar internet industry, not only through OnlyF@ns but in many other, seemingly more innocent, forums. But often coupled with a woman's self-display is a vehement, accusatory denial that self-display is the point."

Again, these women are baring all in the presumed context of category 3: Dressing to attract general attention, either IRL or online, and NOT category 4: Dressing to attract, or impress, or receive attention from high-value men, which, in practice, annoyingly attracts teems of what they deem to be low-value men. They are offended because the consequences of attracting unwanted males effectively hold them accountable for taking Play Mode to the streets. In the Feminist dreamworld, these two purposes should NOT be conflated or misunderstood, so the problem of being held responsible for the 'byproduct' of attracting unwanted men (Category 4) is seen (by them) to be caused by the lusty men themselves, NOT the boobelicious babes in adult bodies playing with body paint and walking down a London Street (Category 3).

Readers will see how this corellates with the trolling behavior of Lambo Ch@d.

Total solipsism!

This is why…

> "A man who assumes at a coffee shop or on the sidewalk that bulging breasts partly-exposed to view are intended to be ogled, even briefly, may be brought up short by an angry rebuttal, or worse. As in the Proudman ad, the titillation of male interest is mobilized in order to make the claim that women do NOT want to titillate male interest and that the alleged titillation, in fact, is all in the man's (misogynistic) mind."

Total Vanity, just like the Ch@d with the fuchsia Lamborghini.

Remember, only LOW SMV men are labeled misogynistic for ogling, NOT the Ch@ds they hook up with on the weekend.

She's in Play Mode, but is fully prepared to switch to Pick Me Mode if/when she meets a Ch@d at the gym.

> "There is now something of a cottage industry of women at the gym filming themselves in provocative clothing in order to catch out unwary men looking at, or merely seeming to look at, what the women have put on display—and then pretending to strike a blow for women's rights by complaining to gym management about the man's "harassment," or publishing videos to expose him (see here for one compilation). The point seems to be to attract male sexual attention and to be seen to attract male sexual attention (and advertise the ease with which such attraction has occurred and the abundance of men so attracted) while at the same time claiming not to have sought the attention."

It is validating because male attention is social proof of their feminine powers over men. But just like Luxury Lambo Ch@d cares nothing for his adoring proleish female fans, it doesn't matter to these women who the men are. Men are plebian riff-raff whose only purpose is to stoke her ego. They are just pawns in the game. It only matters who is watching, i.e., their female peers. It doesn't even matter what kind of attention it is, whether it's chivalrous, chauvinist, envious, lusty, or sexist. It only matters that they can rack up thousands of clicks, 'likes', and views, speaking figuratively or IRL. If they can Gaslight people and inflame the comboxes by twisting that attention into some sort of harassment or victimization, then that only gets them MOAR Attention / Power / Validation. Their arguments don't even need to be true (and often are NOT), as long as they can get attention out of it.

That is why…

> "This is the standard modern perspective: women and girls are victims, and even minor male actions such as complimenting, looking, or making sexual remarks are violations of their dignity and safety. Girls' and women's own overt self-display, which often begins at an early age (even before puberty), is denied or, perversely, celebrated as a form of liberation while boys' and young men's responses to such display are harshly stigmatized."

Immodesty is celebrated because sex appeal is, by far, the primary tool of V Power. Simultaneously, it is also a scepter able to bequeath honor, and a double-edged, soul vanquishing weapon that can both emasculate men and rob them of wealth. The more they're able to use this tool free of constraints and consequences, the easier it is for them to wield raw, uninhibited sociosexual power.

News Flash: We're already there.

Gynocentric Power is Institutionalized

> "It's true that earlier eras had prohibitions against girls' and women's (and boys' and men's) sexual freedom. This was at least in part because of a recognition that girls begin to pose and pout, to dress and move provocatively long before they even understand what they are doing, often unaware of the powerful sexual feelings that their gestures and looks provoke in the boys and young men around them. Rules of comportment, which restricted both male and female behavior, were a response to fears about the results of feminine heedlessness and sexual display.
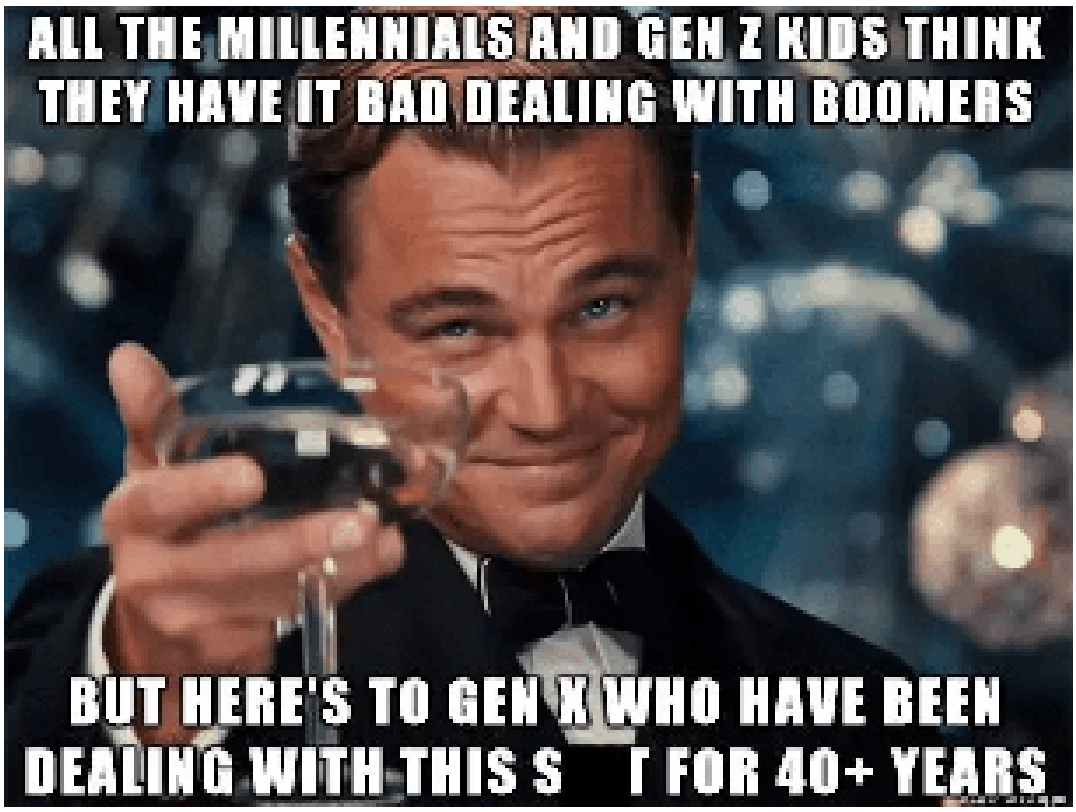
> Today, the natural reality of female sexual precociousness and male susceptibility are almost never openly discussed. According to Feminist pundits, there is nothing natural, and certainly nothing benign, in male sexual attraction to women or in the male desire to look at, touch, fondle, and have sexual relations with a woman. In the now common perception, boys and men seek to use and abuse women for selfish pleasure."

In reality, just the opposite is true. Women routinely abuse men by belittling them as immature and unnecessary, by 'settling' before marriage just to have a personal ATM and the status of being married (or once married), in sexual withholding in marriage, then in the divorce courts, alimony, child support, denying child custody / visitation, and so on. And they're not only abusing men, they're destroying their children's future (if any) and the entire civilization (or what's left of it after the Boomers have left their mark).



This is why…

> "The pleasure is not even necessarily sexual, we are told (for to recognize it as sexual would be to recognize it as natural). Rather, boys' and men's interest is said to manifest the urge to dominate, to control, and to dehumanize (for a helpful overview of the Feminist argument about men's degrading use of women, see this discussion of Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin). The enormous power of female sexual allure is not acknowledged; or if it is, it is presented as a power that women would prefer not to have."

They're seeking to escape accountability for anything they do (or wear) while in Play Mode. Plausible Deniability strikes again, which RP readers know is false posture posing.

> "Thus, Feminism has been successful in thoroughly demonizing one of the most enduring bonds between men and women: the man's sexual desire, and the woman's desire to be desired.
> It is surely significant that as Feminism has advanced, and as women have gained more freedom and choices in their lives, the intensity of female sexual display has not only not diminished but has actually increased to extraordinary levels, despite Feminist insistence that the problem of unwanted male sexual attention has never been greater."

Like Lambo Ch@d, they're doing it as a power flex for their own vanity. And why not? The whole Western social order has institutionalized gynocentric power as primordial. The natural consequences of actually attracting low SMV men is merely an uncomfortable, unwanted side effect (in the Feminist's view). Right now, Feminists are actively working to dismantle or remove this constant annoyance through the courts and laws. With Lucifer's luck, they'll be able to enslave the whole of mankind via laws, norms, and regulations. Little do they realize that they are actively destroying the same culture that foolishly granted them such expansive powers.

Conclusions

Fiamengo concludes,

> "What, if anything, is to be done? I don't expect a significant number of women to get real about their behaviors: either to admit their (abusive) sexual power or to empathetically imagine the awkwardness for boys and men."

Of course not. Again, men are just pawns in their game; a piece to be played and then discarded — and there are many more than 8 pawns in a typical woman's SMP, so the more the merrier. Imagine playing a game of chess in which the board was expanded to 32x squares and you had more than 32 pawns at your disposal.

> "The many contradictions and denials, projection and self-exculpation, the reflex misandry and vehement victimology all suggest that at the heart of female nature is a deep conflict about sex that cannot unilaterally, or even primarily, be blamed on men. While a well-funded war on male sexual nature escalates, honest self-reflection about female desire and female power is in short supply."

As Sharkly quipped,

> "There isn't a male leadership shortage, there is a female submission shortage."

One important aspect of Female Submission, in this context, means to keep Play Mode confined to the marital bedroom. Oh, yeah… That's out of the question.

People who object to the incongruences between these women's actions and words are stuck in their heads and are missing the whole point. For women, it doesn't have to make sense. Their statements, claims, and accusations don't need to be true as long as they can garner attention. In fact, it's more fun for them if it doesn't make sense, especially if it confuses people. Arguing with them about it only validates their egotism. It's more of an ego trip for them when they can dish out raw lies, and then watch people dodge, hop, jump, skip, and scramble AS IF it's all true. That's what trolling is all about. It's BSing around just for the fun of it. It's all a power play, or a 'flex' as younger folks like to call it.

The Perversion of ¡$c!əNcɛ!

Walter Kirn tweeted,*

> "The conversion of college campuses into the least socially and intellectually free places in the country is complete.
> You'll get more diversity of thought at a rural Wyoming bar, and I'm absolutely serious.
> I don't like going to campuses anymore."

* H/T: Farm Boy

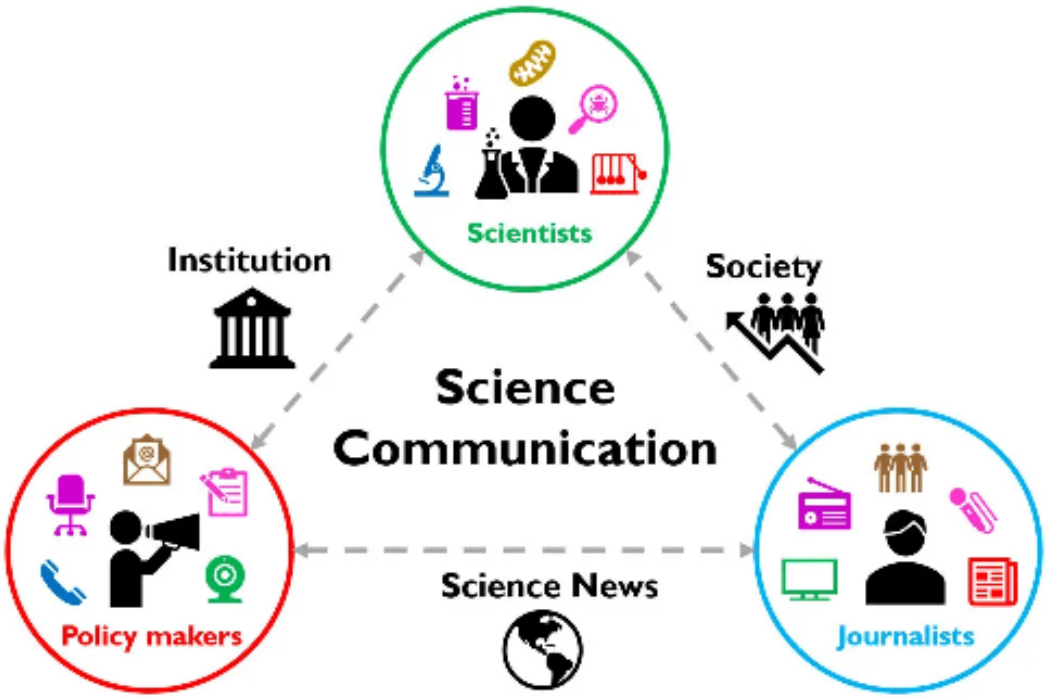
Kirn is right. But it's more than just professors and college campuses. The whole scientific community has gone @ss up.

Lest you think this is merely cronyism, intellectual laziness, and posture preening of the grassroots variety, speaking as a professor myself, I can say, no, it is institutional.

I've long suspected that authors and researchers who do not belly flop onto the bandwagon of promulgating various Post-Modern narratives are being subtly excluded and/or shaded. Occasionally, I'll come across real evidence for this. Here are some that I've collected over the past few years.



Case Study 1: Publisher Policies

On 2021/8/26, Elsevier, one of the largest worldwide publishers of scientific research studies, sent out this email.

> Inclusion & Diversity in scientific publishing: why it's a requirement, not a choice
> Inclusion and diversity play pivotal roles in advancement of science and lead to more impactful research findings. However, bottlenecks and barriers stand in the way of reaping that benefit. There are still significant challenges to integrate the inclusion, equity, and diversity in research.
> In our commitment to raising awareness of inclusion and diversity, the upcoming module will feature expert focus on I&D integration in scientific research and publishing. Dr. Caeul Lim, Senior Scientific editor as well as I&D officer at Cell Press, will explain how to integrate I&D in data collection, I&D in communication, and present I&D initiatives across Elsevier. You will come away with understanding on why it is important to integrate inclusion, equity, and diversity in various aspect of scientific research and publishing.

> Learn how to integrate inclusion, equity, and diversity in various aspects of scientific research and publishing. Sign up for 'Inclusion & Diversity in Scientific publishing: Integral to science, not just a choice'.
> Kind regards,
> The Researcher Academy Team

Obviously, this tripe is being offered as a sales pitch for persons of interest to join the in-group in control. People who sign up for the 'module' gain the chance to meet and hob knob with the VIP policy-making snookers who will only "Include" those who buy into their "Inclusion" mantra and learn the shibboleths. The underlying message is, "Join 'US' or else be tossed out of 'OUR' publishing process and be relegated to observer status."

See now? Diversity, Inclusion, and Equity in scientific publishing IS a requirement, NOT a choice!

Did you get that? If your research work and writings don't support The Narrative™, you're OUT! Never mind that a lot of research findings undermine The Narrative™.

And this is Elsevier, mind you; one of the largest worldwide publishers of scientific research studies!

The hypocrisy is astounding, and completely violates ye olde standard scientific principles against research bias.

You might be asking, "Who would ever bite that bad bait?"

There are many who would. A lot. Most even.

You see, the resultant pressure on the kindergarden variety professor / researcher is capable of changing his career climate, as many educational institutions require them to publish in order to receive contracts and grants, retain their seats, and/or gain tenure. As it is said in this profession, "Publish or Perish".

Case Study 2: Dr. Patrick Brown

The most obvious case of bias and corruption in the publishing industry is the shocking confession of a scientist who deliberately finagled his data in order to get it accepted for publishing.

Dr. Patrick Brown is an Adjunct Lecturer at the Johns Hopkins Energy Policy and Climate Program, and the Head of Climate Analytics.

Dr. Patrick Brown

- Daily Mail: Top scientist Patrick Brown says he deliberately OMITTED key fact in climate change piece he's just had published in prestigious journal to ensure woke editors ran it – that 80% of wildfires are started by humans (2023/9/5)
- Hot Air: Climate scientist: Yes, I cooked my Nature article on global warming — and here's why (2023/9/5)
- Practical Eschatology: Shocker: Climate Scientist Lied (2023/9/6)
- The Free Press: I Left Out the Full Truth to Get My Climate Change Paper Published (2023/9/8)

I believe Dr. Brown's incident is NOT uncommon, but it is a unique situation in which it was more advantageous to his professional reputation as a credible scientist to admit the implicating reasons for his deception.

Case Study 3: Dr. James L. Nuzzo

Prof. James L. Nuzzo, an adjunct professor at Edith Cowan University in Perth, Australia, was recently canceled because of his adversarial stances on Feminism and DEI, as he recounted in The Nuzzo Letter: My Academic Cancellation Story (2025/9/15).

Dr. James L. Nuzzo

In response to this event, Stephen Baskerville wrote,

> "Important story, but only scratches the surface. Cancelling machinery is now very repressive. Far greater numbers are cancelled in secret. Many are coerced into signing "non-disparagement" (not just "non-disclosure") agreements, opening them to expropriation for any criticism of the institution — even if 100% accurate. Worse, universities can confiscate property of dissident or critical professors and even incarcerate them. Mandatory arbitration firms can issue gag and restraining orders with mandatory prison sentences (pioneered in family law)."

H/T: Tom Golden: Dr. James Nuzzo Cancelled for Challenging Feminism and DEI (2025/9/25)

Case Study 4: Dr. Marty Rowland

Then there's the grand debacle of editors themselves being kicked out of their seats of power for not conforming to the Master Plan. Cue Dr. Marty Rowland's expulsion. Rowland is an environmental engineer and a lecturer at the Henry George School of Social Science in New York City.

> "Marty Rowland is no longer a special editor at the American Journal of Economics and Sociology after he published a paper challenging mainstream climate change narratives.
> The paper, titled 'Carbon dioxide and a warming climate are not problems,' faced immediate calls for retraction, its authors told The College Fix.
> Scholars expressed concerns about a trend of censorship and retaliation against researchers who question prevailing climate science, asserting that dissenting opinions are increasingly marginalized."
> The College Fix: 'Shut out': Journal fires editor after publishing research refuting 'warming climate' (2025/9/17)

The American Journal of Economics and Sociology is published by Wiley, another worldwide publisher of scientific research. Are there any major publishers that aren't converged?

H/T: Farm Boy

Case Study 5: The Atomization of the Scientific Publishing Industry

Because of the extensive prevalence of this obvious bias in scientific research and the publication industry, top to bottom, and the resultant severe difficulty in publishing papers that do not align with the Fake Preferred Narratives, there is now a large sub-industry comprised of hundreds of shady publishers who will publish literally anything you send to them on a pay-per-page basis. These publication costs range from $200 to $6,000 per paper, largely determined by their reputation as a publisher. These publishers do offer a peer review system, as it is essentially required for ¡$c!əN+!f!c! legitimacy, but the validity of the peer review process is often compromised in favor of revenue.

The worst effect of these pay-per-paper publishers is that they flood the literature with thousands of scientifically suspect or even fake research papers, as well as very badly written English expositions — all leading to the shameful degradation of the scientific publication industry as a whole.

Nevertheless, professors and researchers desperate to retain their grants and seats willingly pay these costs just to have one more paper on their resumes, to shore up their careers, and to bypass the established ¡$c!əN+!f!c! publishers who are literally W0ke beyond reason.

The New Peer Review Process is Collective, NOT ¡$c!eNt!f!c!

Jack · 14 November 2025 · Archived copy · Original

Critical Thinkers en masse supercede the ¡$c!eNt!f!c! authority of the traditional peer review process.

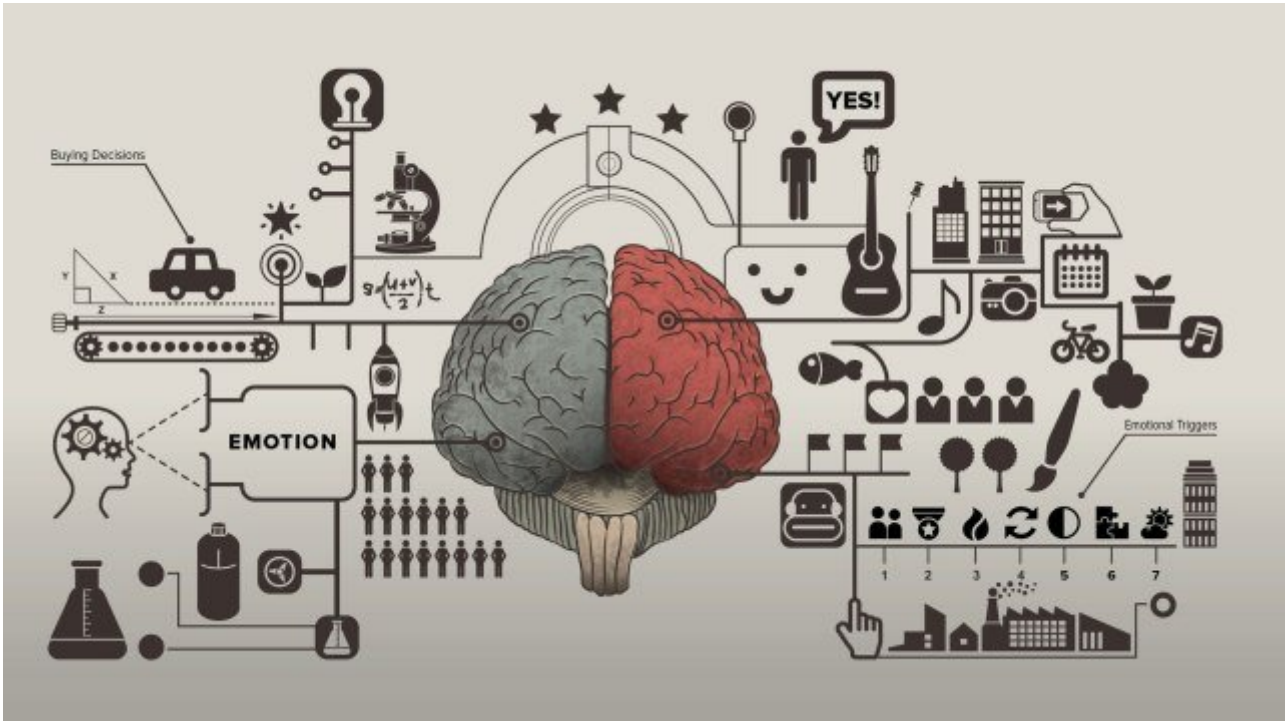
Post Truth ¡$c!əNcɛ!

¡Science! gone W0ke! reviewed some cases depicting the convergence of ¡$c!əNcɛ! and the corruption of the ¡$c!eNt!f!c! peer review process in favor of W0ke agendas.

In the comments, Deep Strength shared links to articles describing the reproducibility crisis in science, the rise of meta-science, which assesses the validity of scientific data harvesting, methods, and processes, and "multi-verse analysis", as described in an article at Public Discourse (Paul Sullins): New Vindication for the Regnerus Same-Sex Parenting Study (2025/7/13).

I've read the links in totality.



To summarize all this in my own words, in recent years (since ~2000), scientists have been criticized for selectively categorizing data clusters in order to increase or decrease the significance of the conclusions, often weighted to coincide with preferred sociopolitical Narratives™.

In plain terms, the whole of ¡$c!əNcɛ! is heavily biased, but ¡$c!eNt!$t$! have found dataclysmic methods to support biased presumptions without being technically in error, enough to pass an already biased peer review anyway.

The response to this — and what I believe is a new development in ¡$c!əNcɛ! — is "meta-science", involving a comprehensive assessment of scientific data harvesting, research methods, and processes employed by ALL research on closely related topics. This "meta-science" allows a "multi-verse analysis", which is an assessment of ALL the possible ways data can be crunched, which then offers a probability of the likelihood of obtaining a particular conclusion. If the “multi-verse analysis” probability is high, the conclusion is more likely to be true in a plurality of cases. If low, then unlikely.

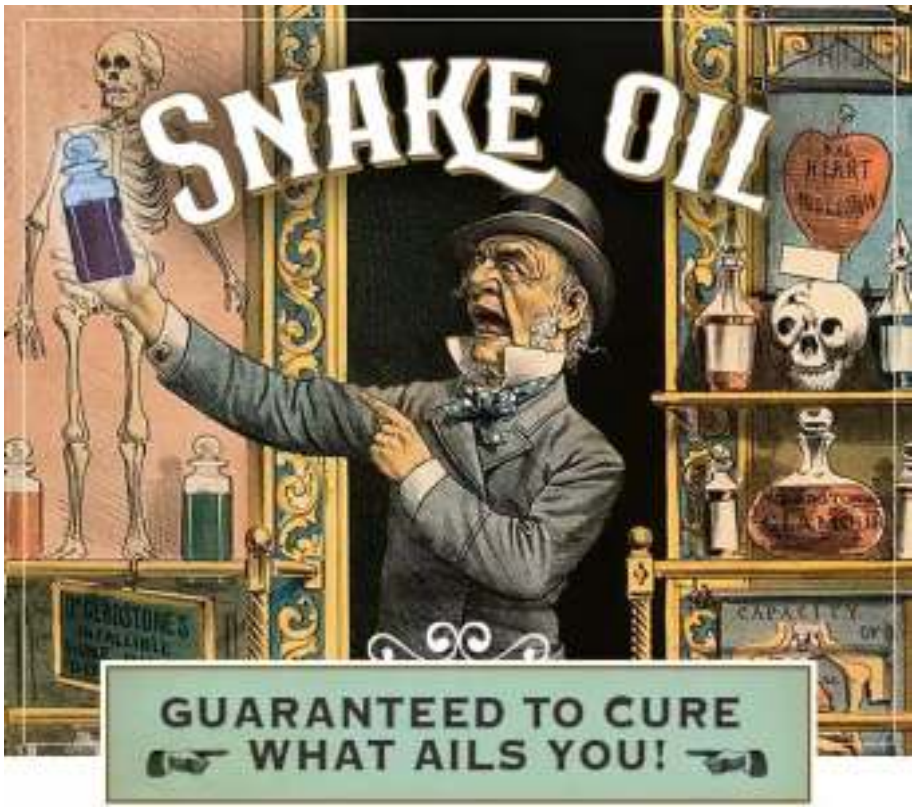
Moreover, ¡$c!əNcɛ! has now evolved to encompass ¡$c!eNt!f!c! studies of ¡$c!eNt!f!c! assessments of ¡$c!eNt!f!c! research, all in the name of counteracting faux ¡$c!əNcɛ!

All this ¡$c!eNt!f!c! rigamarole involving hundreds of Ph.D.’ed researchers writing thousands of research papers studying millions of data points, all over decades of time — and mostly funded by federal grants via hard-earned taxpayer dollars — is just waaay too complex (and too co$tly) for the average man to contemplate.

Not even AI can sort this out (at the time being).

Except, one can bypass all this quackery if he is a discerning man steeped in Biblical knowledge who can sniff out the truth via faith.



The New ¡$c!eNt!f!c! Peer Review Process

In light of these meta-revelations, we might think that ¡$c!əNcɛ! has lost all value, gone by the wayside, and fed to the concupiscent, V shinnying dogs of moral decay.

But wait…

The grand masses of the common man have risen in its stead.

thedeti wrote,

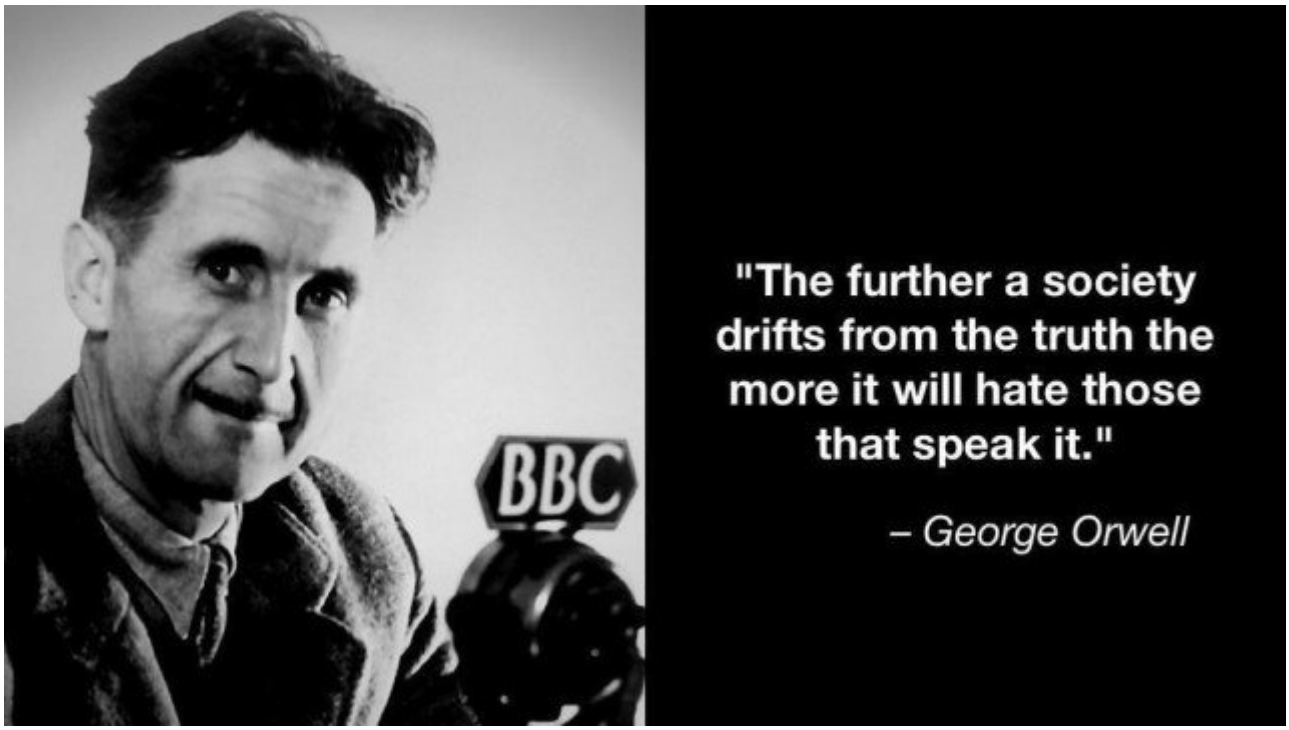
> “It’s funny that hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of men are congregating online and in podcasts and telling each other they’re seeing the exact same things in their lives and in women.”

Farm Boy responded,

> “They are peer reviewing each other, but that is not the “correct” type of peer review.”

No matter. Let the meta-¡$c!eNt!f!c! multi-verse analysis of Post Truth ¡$c!əNcɛ! centered ¡$c!eNt!T! continue to beat their betelgeuse into geysers.

The Prophets, Sages, great thinkers and wordsmiths will be revered, now more than ever, and public opinion will be shaped around their conclusions, even in this faltering Feminist, Positivistic, Post Truth Era.



Conclusions

The New Peer Review Process is a Public Collective; it is NO longer a supposedly ¡$c!eNt!f!c! process limited to a few in-group bow tie goateed Ph.D. cronies behind closed doors who are filling their pockets to agree with The Pre-Approved Funded Narratives™.

The gatekeepers of ¡$c!əNcɛ! may not like it, but their heavily abused Powers are slowly but surely slipping away, absorbed by the uneducated proletariat masses of Post Truth Seekers in our Society of Withdrawn Men.

If you want to publish a paper in a DIE / W0ke-corrupted journal (i.e., most of the major publishers) for whatever reason, then sure, you'll have to bow and scrape to the particular ~~ivory tower~~ ebony cesspit notions of the in-group goatees. But if you just want to get the word out, all you have to do is post a solid, fact-based argument on a blog, a video, a popular website, or on X.

The world of men will take note, criticize it, hash through it, and respond appropriately.

Our time has come, gentlemen. Put your thinking caps on and let your voices be heard.

What is “Meaning”?

Incorporating Meaning is essential to the learning of any subject.

Intro

A reader asked me to further define the concept of “Meaning”.

He wrote,

> “Over the last few years, I’m seeing a lot of authors and content creators make reference to the idea of “Meaning”.

> I guess Jordan Peterson was the first to discuss this, or at least, he pushed it into mainstream awareness a few years ago. Since then, I’ve seen it mentioned more and more, and a lot of their arguments are built around this concept. But it’s still not clear to me exactly what it means. I read your posts on the search for Meaning, and how it relates to Nihilism, and I thought maybe you could define this more clearly for me: What is the meaning of “Meaning”?

> I know it sounds like a weird question. But I really appreciate how you dive into the deeper concepts behind the meanings of words.
> Thanks.

Being a professional educator, I'll describe this concept as it is understood within the fields of Education, Learning, and Psychology. I'm sure it has further nuances in the Social Sciences, but this should be enough to aid the reader's understanding.

What is Meaning?

In essence, Meaning is the salient emotional awareness that is attached to the subject at hand.

More clinically, Meaning is the particular importance that an individual places on a subject, or certain aspects of the subject peculiar to the individual, that make the subject real, relatable, and useful to one's understanding of the subject.

Meaning is affected by and/or induced by…

- Beliefs
- Desires
- Motivations
- Personal Values
- Cognitive Biases
- Past Experiences
- Level of Ability and Skill

Now, this simple definition of "Meaning" is NOT sufficient to convey the full meaning of the concept of "Meaning". The remainder of this essay explains how this works through the lens of education and learning.

The Difficulties of Learning

Many of the difficulties in learning a new subject are not inherent in or necessitated by the subject itself, but arise from the implicit challenges within a learner's overall analysis, absorption, and exercise of the subject that is learned.

The most basic and obvious difficulty is that learning how to think properly about a subject requires diligent effort, study, time, and regular practice of the skills thereof. The task of doing so requires self-discipline and is challenging, inconvenient, time-consuming, and even onerous to some.

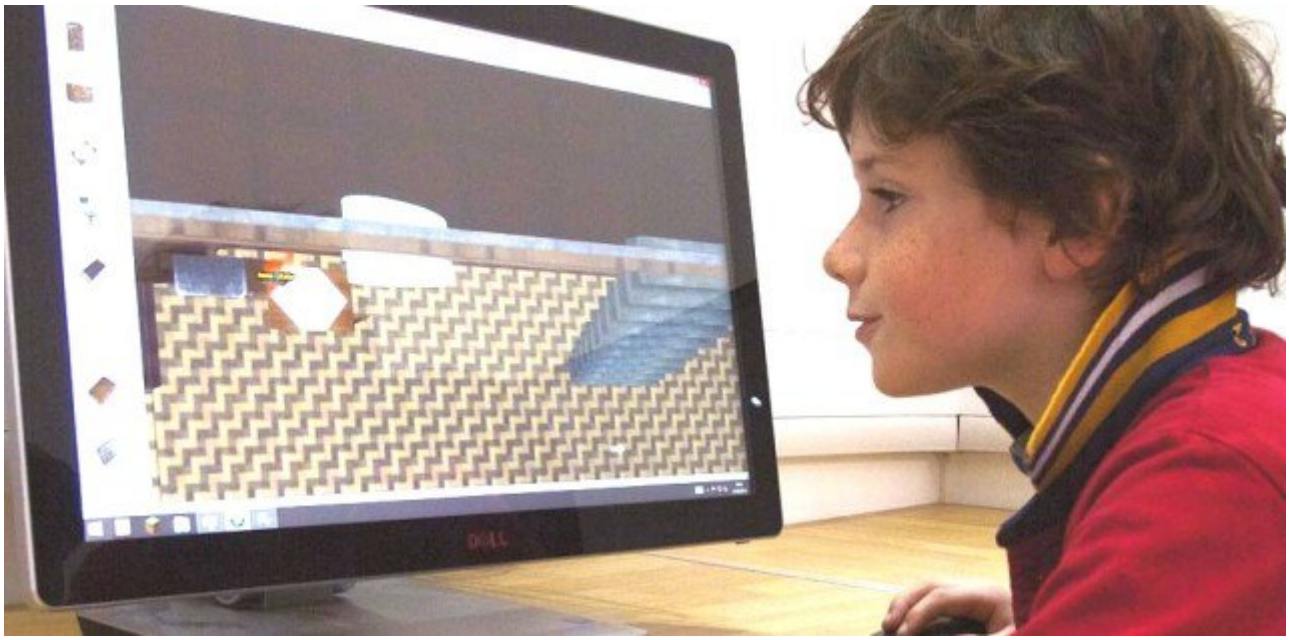
A second difficulty is that learners will usually approach a new subject with some mental preconceptions and/or emotional attachments to certain words or ideas, which hinders them from evaluating the topic clearly and objectively, and from obtaining a precise inventory of the subject. IOW, they have already preassigned Meaning to the subject, and are then unable to attach a new or different Meaning. In the Manosphere, we call this Solipsism.

A third problem (related to the second) surrounding learning is that most people are not incisively critical of the information being presented to them, and are not capable of absorbing the material and using it as intended without extensive practice.

A fourth, more basic problem in teaching is the student's inability to properly utilize the subject in a constructive way.

Every other question is a matter of how people interpret the subject. The fact that people misconstrue or import inappropriate Meaning onto the subject is a problem of cultural lenses, personal values, and how the subject might be explained, interpreted, or understood in biased or loaded terms.

While these distractions may be inconducive to the learning and mastery of the subject, all these factors contribute to one's perceived "Meaning" of the subject.



Why is Formal Education Necessary?

A useful "Meaning" that is unique to one's exposure to a subject is only found through applied purpose, human interaction, and/or a practical application. Students won't "Get It" until they face a situation in which they must recall and utilize the knowledge to solve a problem.

An educational social setting (such as a college education, co-op employment, a conference, an interactive classroom, or a laboratory) provides a venue in which a learner can find identity, discover Meaning, and learn how to utilize the subject in a personalized and Meaningful manner. Without this aspect, the knowledge cannot be absorbed and is merely information that will soon be forgotten.

In practical terms, this is why attending a University is necessary for a proper education, compared to book study or taking online courses. It is not so much the attention given to the subject studied, but the atmosphere, the exposure to and interaction with the experts, learning how they think and how they do things, their various approaches to their areas of expertise, and their nuanced appreciation of that knowledge. It is that intangible aspect of the field profession that is Caught, NOT Taught.

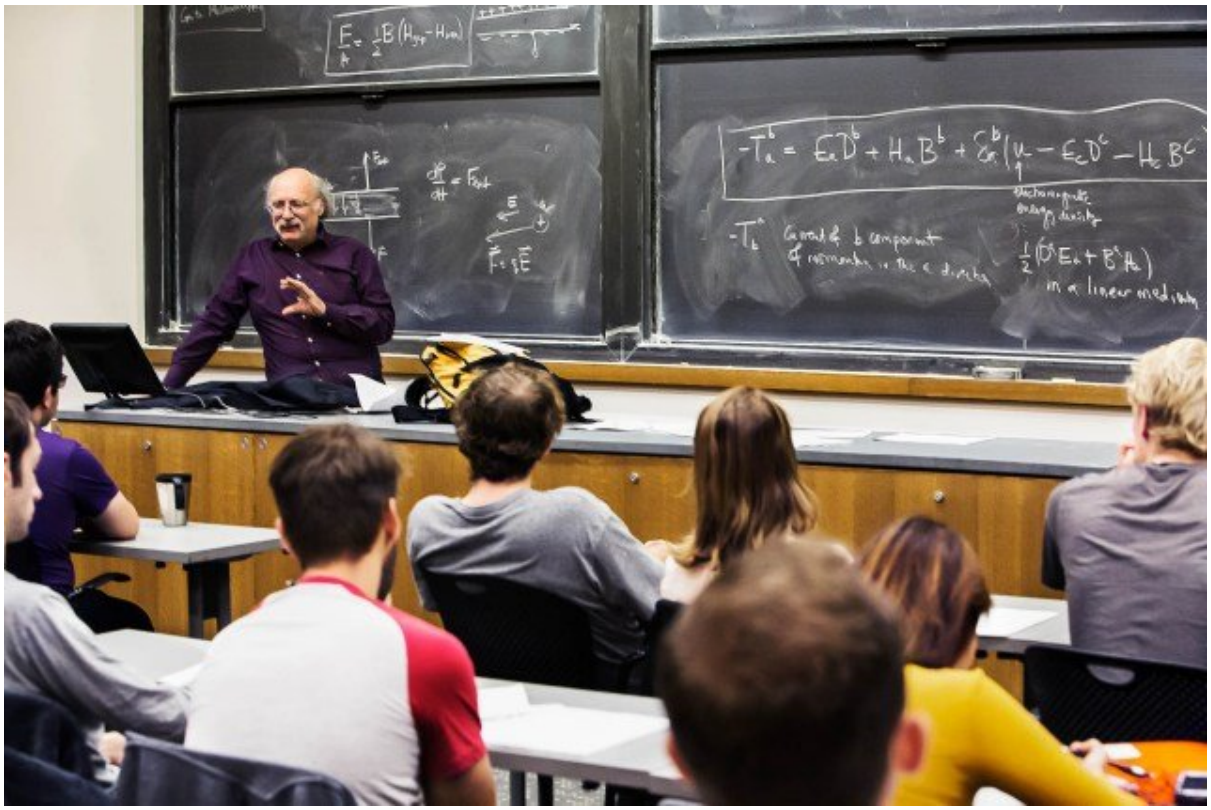
This is exactly why discipline and a structure of authority must be maintained in a learning environment, one which the learner can conform to and draw Meaning from, by faith.

This is also why a University education is valued much more highly than taking online classes. It is because a University experience imparts an implicitly applied Meaning that cannot be obtained otherwise.



Conclusions

To answer the reader's question more concisely,

"Meaning" is the emotional awareness, often coupled with individual purpose, that is attached to the subject at hand.

"Meaning" is only understood through one's personal emotional awareness, coupled with a cognitive intake of a subject.

"Meaning" must necessarily arise from one's participation with an actual event, rather than fantasy or false notions.

These processes are necessary for authentic learning to occur. This is why we can never escape the task of applying 'Meaning', as troublesome as it may be.

Recent Advances in Imparting Meaning in Education

Are you aware of the most current methods of effective teaching?

Intro

Most readers are probably not aware of this, but the field of Education has made some significant advances over the last 40 years. (This is a tangent to the topic of Meaning, but I think it's extremely important to increase awareness of these methods, especially for parents and teachers, so I've listed some below.) Many of these advances deal with techniques that ameliorate the aforementioned difficulties and streamline the learning process. Some of them directly address the problem of incorporating Meaning.

New Teaching Strategies and Techniques

Here's a bullet list of 20 relatively new teaching strategies, all supported by clinical research over the past 40 years. (If these seem intuitive to you, then Congratulations! You are ahead of the majority in the teaching profession.)

1. Active Consciousness — Consciousness-raising activities accelerate learning more than consciousness-raising ideas, which tend to cause learners to become self-conscious and burden the learner with fears of making mistakes.
2. Biber's Breakthrough — Learners become aware of gaps in their productive knowledge when they are required to perform in unfamiliar venues.
3. Bids and Demands — In situ Bids and Demands between teacher and student — Negotiation (see below) has non-verbal elements that contribute immensely towards encouraging the learner's interest in engaging in Negotiation.
4. Choking — Recent theories explaining the phenomenon of Choking may help learners overcome their Fear of a Negative Evaluation (FNE) and develop confidence more quickly.
5. Cognitive Maps — Building "cognitive maps" that help learners identify weak areas to be addressed.
6. Csikszentmihalyi Flow — Pushed Output must be balanced with the student's level of comfort and skill.
7. Emphasizing Intuitive Processes — Teachers must make a distinction between cognitive processes and intuitive processes. Mastery of a subject requires that maladaptive intuitive processes should be cognitively addressed, while learned cognitive processes must be transformed into an intuitive process.
8. Genuine Interest — Students are motivated to learn subjects that they genuinely want to learn. Thus, teachers should identify the student's purpose for being interested in the subject, and begin from there.
9. Negotiation — Teachers should acclimate students with a process of feedback and questioning to ascertain form and meaning of the subject.
10. Observer Status — New learners learn more quickly if they spend >50% of their study time listening and observing, and are not pressured to perform too early.
11. Positive Feedback — Correction should be objective and should emphasize the correct approach rather than focusing on the students' errors.
12. Recognition of Potential — Identifying students' learning needs is a prerequisite for effective learning. Without addressing this first, learning will be arduous, tortuous, and greatly retarded.

13. Simplifications — Simplified perspectives are helpful for beginners to latch onto a general understanding of the subject, but if the student's mind languishes in generalities and doesn't move on to recognize contextual nuances and to develop a discriminating awareness of the essential characteristics of how the subject is applied, then these simplifications can become a crippling distraction.
14. Stevick's Social Perspective — Emotional and social factors prevent learners from mastering the subject. For example, some minority group students may believe that only upper-class whites care about a particular subject, and thus are afraid to be ostracized by their peers if they take an interest in the same.
15. The Centrality of Meta-Cognition — Having a critical awareness of one's own thoughts, thinking patterns, and learning is crucial for effective learning to take place. If learners cannot engage in meta-cognition, then they will lack insight about their own deficiencies and will remain unaware of what they need to do in order to improve their skills (e.g. the Dunning-Kruger Effect). Therefore, teachers need to arouse meta-cognition in their students.
16. The Output Hypothesis — Learners notice an in situ demand for a particular skill related to the subject. They try out a response and then either confirm or modify their performance on the basis of perceived success and feedback.
17. The Precise Ear — A teacher (or counselor, mentor, etc.) who has excellent listening skills will be able to comprehend what the speaker intends to say but which is NOT being said, and through a process of Negotiation, will help the speaker find more precise words to say exactly what they mean.
18. The Time-On-Task Principle — The more time you spend doing something, the better you are likely to be at doing it.
19. Triggering indicates an Information Gap that should be addressed.
20. Walker's Principle — In assessing a learner's real ability, a direct observation when interacting with a learner through an oral examination is superior to a written test.

Problems with Implementing these Methods

As described in the previous essay, the generative remedial classroom is intended to provide the social interaction through which learners are provided the means to absorb and/or develop "Meaning". However, many students are content to merely listen and observe, and NOT proactively interact towards the purpose of attaining “Meaning”. Worse, many institutions of learning fail to provide the necessary environment that would enable the absorption of “Meaning”, most notably in courses that number hundreds of students and/or which do not provide regular one-on-one interactions with advanced technology, the professors, and other experts.

Other than these social environment conditions, I believe the predominant reason why these advances remain obscure and seldom employed within institutions of learning is that teachers themselves are poorly equipped with these new methods and are instead more concerned about ethics, classroom management, and time management. I do not mean to say that these practical concerns are unimportant, but that the more essential purpose of teaching — equipping students with useful abilities, knowledge, and skills — should not be sidelined or underemphasized.

Theoretically, if a teacher approaches the subject in a dispassionate and factual way, and students are rather attentive, disciplined, intelligent, and intent on developing Meaningful knowledge, then all these problems would cease to exist. However, in reality, this only displaces the burdens of learning and interpreting Meaning onto the student, which may only increase confusion among students who may be wholly unable to incorporate practical Meaning independently. It also makes for a rather boring essay or lecture.

The more basic problem underlying this malady is that classrooms are no longer a place where authorities (both teachers and academic administrations) are permitted to enforce the kind of discipline required for students to feel safe enough to be humble and vulnerable, which is absolutely necessary for Meaning to be imparted, and for real learning to occur.

Conclusions

Teachers should always be critical of any teaching method as a tool. The main question should always be “Is it accurately and usefully describing reality?”

Teachers should assume that students, in general, are not capable or ready to use the subject information without misinterpreting it or abusing it.

As a corollary to the last point, teachers should always be aware of how students might misinterpret the subject by attaching any incongruent personalized Meaning and offer some commentary or further insights that will put things into proper perspective.

If you are a parent, I suggest you research the above methods, and the next time you have a parent-teacher meeting, you can offer probing questions to find out whether the teacher is aware of them.

Abortion vs Crime

What's the connection?

Intro

Back when Roe vs Wade was repealed in 2022, I heard Liberal Feminists defending abortion by saying that higher abortion rates are correlated with lower crime rates.

As IF that's an equitable tradeoff.

I've recalled this idea from time to time, each time asking myself, "Yeah, well, if that's true, then what is the connection?"

In September this year, I did some research to find out whether this is true.

Spoiler: It is apparently true. But why?

The Connection between Abortion and Crime

The correlation between higher abortion rates and lower crime rates is attributed to the Donohue-Levitt hypothesis, first described in a 2001 study by economists John Donohue and Steven Levitt, and discussed in the book Freakonomics, by Steven Levitt and Stephen Dubner [Amazon]. Their hypothesis [1-3] suggests that legalized abortion (i.e., the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision in the U.S.), led to a reduction in crime rates roughly 15–20 years later, in the early 1990s.

John Donohue and Steven Levitt.
Here's the reasoning behind the connection.

Empirical Evidence

Donohue and Levitt's study analyzed data across U.S. states, finding that…

- States with higher abortion rates in the 1970s and 1980s saw larger declines in crime rates in the 1990s.
- A (normalized) 100% increase in abortion rates correlated with a roughly 10–20% decrease in crime rates after about 15–20 years.
- States with earlier access to legalized abortion (e.g., New York, California) saw earlier crime declines compared to states with later access.

The Donohue-Levitt hypothesis is supported by the following facts.

- Abortion rates rose immediately after Roe vs Wade, and then crime rates dropped about two decades later.
- The 20 year span aligns with the age when those "missing" cohorts would have reached their late teens and early twenties, a peak time for criminal behavior.

The fact that crime rates drop approximately 20 years after a spike in the abortion rate apparently proves that abortion selectively culls criminals before they're ever born.

Needless to say, the Donohue-Levitt hypothesis is acutely controversial, as it can be interpreted to imply that certain ethnic, racial, or socioeconomic groups are inherently more prone to abortion and crime. The closer to being true that it is, the more unacceptable it would be.

The Donohue-Levitt Hypothesis

Donohue and Levitt estimated that abortion could explain up to 50% of the drop in crime during that period, controlling for other factors like policing strategies, economic conditions, and incarceration rates. They presented the following hypotheses to explain their reasoning.

1. The Link between Poor Life Conditions and Abortion / Unwanted Births

The hypothesis postulates that women who want abortions are more likely to be women facing difficult, poor, or unstable life conditions. The additional costs and time invested in raising a child, tend to worsen the socioeconomic conditions of these mothers. These adverse conditions lead to an increased likelihood of their children engaging in criminal activity as adolescents or adults.

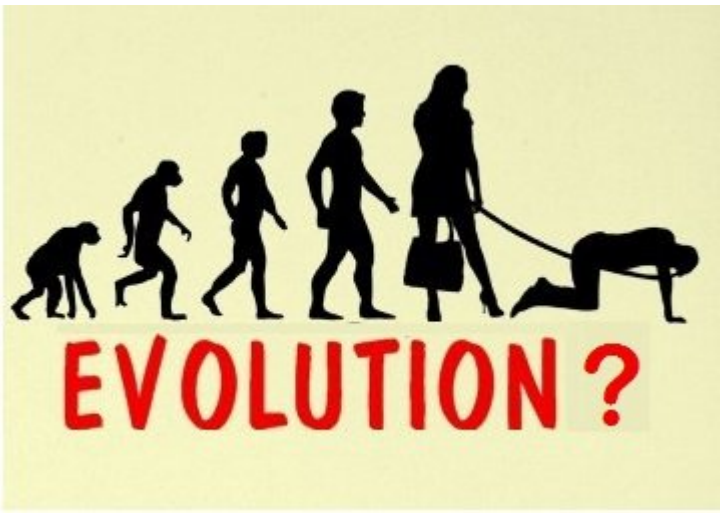
The weak point of this hypothesis is the likelihood, prevalence, and strength of this link. There is a larger number of women who are quite capable of having and raising children under relatively favorable life conditions, but who opt for an abortion because they do not want children for any number of other reasons. Sources estimate between 51% to 96% of women who have an abortion choose it as a form of birth control.

2. The Link between Unstable Home Environment and Crime

The hypothesis states that legalized abortion allowed women, particularly those in disadvantaged socioeconomic situations, to avoid giving birth to children who might grow up in environments associated with unstable family structures, domestic violence, neglect, and poverty, leading to higher risks of criminal behavior. It is theorized that fewer unwanted children (due to abortion) leads to fewer individuals entering high-risk demographics for crime.



Here, it may be assumed that children who grow up in broken, dysfunctional, or poor homes invariably become practicing criminals. Again, the weak point of this hypothesis is the likelihood, prevalence, and strength of this link. Cue the arguments about Blank Slatism and Nature vs Nurture.

3. Causal Mechanisms

Beyond socioeconomic factors, the hypothesis suggests that abortion reduces the number of children born into environments with limited resources, poor parenting, or exposure to crime, all life conditions that are correlated with higher criminality. It also assumes that women who choose to have an abortion may be making a rational decision about their ability to provide children a stable upbringing.

The weakness of these assumptions is in the prediction that a relatively greater proportion of those women who elect abortion would otherwise bring children into the world who would be destined for criminal behavior. Surely there is some overlap, but how much cannot be ascertained. The number of aborted children who would NOT become criminals is not known.

Caveats and Counterarguments

Critics have noted that the Donohue-Levitt hypothesis's heavy focus on abortion oversimplifies complex social issues.

For example,

- Changes in family dynamics during the 1980s and 1990s, such as the increased divorce rate, may have had a significant impact on crime rates, potentially overshadowing abortion's role.

- Other studies have suggested that these effects may vary across populations, with some analyses finding weaker or no significant correlation when controlling for additional variables.
- Some studies suggest that removing lead from gasoline, paint, and other products, which coincided with the time that crime rates fell in the 1990s, led to reductions in lead exposure, which may have had an impact on mental health and thus criminal behavior.
- International data is mixed. Countries with different abortion policies show varied crime trends, suggesting other context-specific factors are in play.

Some critics argue that the correlation does not imply causation. Other factors, like improved policing, economic growth, or the decline in crack cocaine use, may have also contributed to the falling crime rates in the 1990s.

Natural Selection

There's another unspoken piece of the story. Like absent Feminist mothers raise dimwit Disneyfied entitled daughters who have no Game, leading to an epidemic of Karens, many youngsters who are unloved and unwanted by their mothers become criminals, despite whatever socioeconomic background they may have.

But we can't ask women to … (ahem) God forbid, actually love their kids. No, we're expected to allow those stupid slores to kill their own d@mn kids before they become unloved children who turn to crime and thus become a burdensome embarrassment to society.

So, according to the Feminists' argument, if we allow presumptive mothers to preemptively mur_der their fetal bastard brats who are bound to become criminals, via their poor fate of being born to hump happy harpy harridan mothers, then the crime rate drops.

Makes perfect sense. Natural selection in vitro. Darwin lives on! /S

Yes, abortion takes a bite out of crime. It also takes a bite out of any demographic being selectively aborted.

However, the bite per chomp is relatively small. Again, recall the reported statistic that killing twice as many babies results in 10-20% less crime two decades later. What about the other 80-90% of supposedly non-future-criminal babies who were also vacuumed into the blender in the process of taking their 10-20% of criminal peers off the futuristic streets?

The Logical Conclusion

Let's apply these statistics to a practical application for reducing crime. Assuming the future crime involves mur_der, the Liberal argument that abortion reduces crime, according to the Donohue-Levitt hypothesis, could be construed to say that allowing women to kill 100 babies now will prevent 10 mur_ders 20 years from now. If a 50% increase in abortion means only 5-10% of the resultant reduction in crime corroborates with abortion, then maybe if we increased abortion up to 500+%, then we could totally eradicate crime (as well as the whole population after a few generations of this cycle)! Now there's a tradeoff that totally justifies abortion! /S

Aside from jest, in essence, they're arguing that mur_dering human fetuses is OK, but crime is not.

It compares to the ancient blood sacrifices to appease the gods.

As Thedeti said,

> "When men pay for a society, it's set up capitalistic. You pay for it with time, work, and money.
> When women pay for a society, it's set up socialist. The only way to pay for a socialist society is in blood. Human blood. Rivers of blood.
> Just in the 20th century, an estimated 100 million human beings were slaughtered in the names of Nazism, fascism, Marxism, and Soviet/Chinese communism. Literal human sacrifices upon socialism's altar.
> Not to mention over 40 million souls sacrificed in the name of feminism and Roe v. Wade.
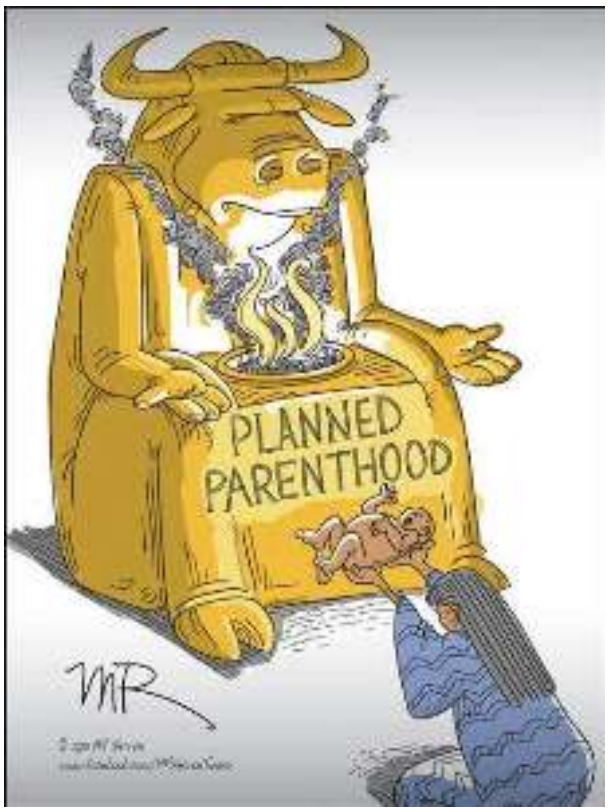
> The cost of "fairness" and socialism is always paid in human blood. The false gods of "economic fairness" and "social justice" demand payment in human blood."



On a positive note, maybe some of those aborted kids would've become divorce lawyers, gynocentric judges, and corruptible progressive politicians. By eliminating them, we've saved a few marriages and staved off the decline of civilization. That might be worthy of a ¡$c!eN+!f!c! study. /S

But of course, liberals would never state their stance in these words. Foremost because it's the detestable, unvarnished truth. Second, the reality is just way too damn ugly.

But they're quite happy to cite these statistics to insistently defend mur_der in the womb.

Exposing the Negotiative Mentality

The Demanding vs. Negotiative Mentality

When a wife is saying, "[Husband] should do X, Y, Z", then she is being demanding. I've covered how to handle demands before. The standard way for a man to deal with demands from women is to be more demanding of her than she is of you.

But when a wife is saying that "[Husband] should do X, Y, Z, … BECAUSE [Wife] does A, B, C", then she is being negotiative or transactional. She's also comparing her opinion of you to her view of herself.

The standard way of handling demands by being more demanding may not work in this case. If she is a lazy or passive wife, then she might fold. But if she is the type of person who is always pushing for excellence and improvement (which a lot of women do, including good women), then it turns into brinkmanship and one-up-manship that puts ever more pressure on the man because it is essentially a competition of who can outdo the other. Although this dynamic might be beneficial for personal improvement, a man has to watch that it never crosses the line into a competition of 'Equals' as women would like to think that it is.

There is a very easy way to put the brakes on the showmanship, if deemed necessary.

Simply expose her negotiative mentality for what it is. Take the negotiation above the table and make it obvious that the relationship has degenerated into a tit-for-tat. Make it clear that she is "doing business", and if that's how she wants to do things, then you're quite happy to "do business" with her likewise, and give her the proper treatment like the Wh0re that she is insisting on being.

Examples

Here are a few examples of exposing the negotiative / transactional mentality, listed from least to most nuclear.

If she demands more attention, chivalry, consideration, 'Re$pEcT', etc., then you can return with a request for more of the behavior you would like to see from her.

"If you expect to be treated like a lady, then you'll need to talk like one."

Because women's mental powers typically reach their maximum level in the 9th grade (or whenever mammary glands sprout and V Power takes over), it is expedient to add time qualifiers to each request.

"… Today!"

"… at ALL times!"

If she says, "I do all this X, Y, Z stuff for you. What have you done for me?"

You should respond, "No. You have NOT done what I've asked you to do. You've only done what YOU think needs done or what you feeel like doing. I will not "do business" / love / pay / reward / etc. you for that."

If she assumes the role of a judge and throws out random insults, "You're bad / boring / dinky dicked / lazy / low-end / worthless / etc."

You could sigh heavily and say, "What do I need to DO, to teach a CHIMP, how to TALK like a LADY?"

Or,

"If you talked to your boss that way, you would be fired during the first week on the job."

She might respond, "Yeah, but you're not my boss."

Just answer, "No, I'm your L0v!nG husband." ("L0v!nG" said with heavy sarcasm.) "I can be your boss too, if that's what it would take for you to get your lazy / self-centered @ss in gear. [Pregnant pause for emphasis.] Tell you what, I'll pay you four dollars and thirty-sex cents an hour (some random but specific low wage), which is about what your $eRv!cEs are worth to me … AND I'll fire your @ss out the door at the first sign of disobedience or disrespect — just like your boss would do! If you're interested, we can draw up an employment contract Right Now! I expect you to wear a black mini-dress to the interview. If you think you can wear the pants in this house, then you won't get the job."

Parting Shots

YMMV of course.

Some women will breathe a sigh of relief to have an authoritative man lay down the law and give them a sense of security, although they'll certainly deny it and fight tooth and nail against it all the way.

Other women will pack their suitcases and move in with their boss, or 'friend', or somebody … anybody, really. Be assured that the 'rescuer' who can make you the most angry or jealous will be her first pick. They might even destroy the house in a fit of relentless anger, or file for a divorce as a last-ditch option for retaining dominance and independence.

Remember, they desire Freedom without Responsibility, just like a child.

As always, you must be prepared for the worst outcome possible, in order to attain the best outcome possible. Don't buckle, or else she'll break you at your weakest point. Don't be caught off guard, or else she'll make you beg for mercy.

Remember, the mark of a man is the extent to which he will go to achieve his purposes.

All the Best~!

Crazy is as Crazy Does

Lately, we are seeing an epidemic of wives divorcing their husbands. Yeah, I know, that's nothing new; but the thing is, they're doing it for no good reason at all, and they know it. They're going on TikTok and YouTube and bragging about it for attention, clicks, 'Likes', and views. Many of them will even say that their husbands are "perfect", that he's done nothing wrong, and/or that married life is good. Yet, they're still pulling the plug on all that grants them every blessing in this life.

Take a look at these two examples.

Case Study 1 — The Bored as Hell Housewife

Skip King's female centric analysis and just watch the video of the stupid woman who is going to hurt her three children and potentially their future because she's a complete idiot.

Case Study 2 — The Strong Independent Woman™

In this next video, Anton Daniels covers another crazy who did the same thing. Only this one has done her homework on the Feminist playbook and prepared herself for a career so that she wouldn't have to depend on no man. So she was able to plan out her Great Escape™ and actually follow through on it when an opportunity arose.

That's just a sampling. There are countless other videos of women bragging, drolling, and/or whining about their decision to abandon their husbands and children in order to hang themselves on the Meat Market and/or "Go find themselves".

A Failure of Game?

Readers might ask, "How bad did their husbands go wrong?"

We could go down the list of Game tactics and Heartiste's 16 Commandments of Poon, and find any number of faux pas, foibles, and sociosexual 'sins' their husbands are guilty of.

- Too Nice.
- He bored her.
- He wasn't a convincing liar.
- No Game / Mastery / Play / Rizz.
- Her emotions weren't stirred by him.
- No Detachment / Internal Locus of Control.
- He's not Alpha / confident / LAMPS / tall enough.
- Whatever.
- Et cetera.

And chances are, we'd surely find a few things to pin on him. No one is 'perfect'.

But many of these wimminz are saying their husbands did nothing wrong, some even saying their husbands are 'perfect'. And yet they still kicked the man out of their lives.

A Failure of Pre-Frontal Cortex Function

More astute readers might ask, "What is HER major malfunction?"

Based on their behavioral patterns, a failure of pre-frontal cortex (PFC) function may be possible.

Humor this argument for a brief moment.

The PFC helps manage and modulate responses to emotions and stimuli through extensive connections to other brain areas and the regulation of neurotransmitters like dopamine and serotonin.

The prefrontal cortex is responsible for higher-level cognitive functions, such as…

- Emotional Regulation, including the inhibition of inappropriate behavior.
- Executive functions, which govern the mental processes that allow us to control our behavior, implement Agency, maintain focus, and achieve goals.
- Decision-Making, Flexibility, Planning, and Problem-Solving, enabling one to process input, set priorities, shift between tasks, and find solutions to challenges.
- Social Behavior and Self-Control — the suppression of automatic responses, such as those from the primitive limbic system, i.e. the libido, in order to act in socially adaptive ways.
- Working Memory — Implements memory to be used to make decisions and solve problems.

Also, remember that women's concept of Validation is about Losing Self-Control, which explains why Alpha Ch@ds are addictive, and wine is the #1 consolation for post-carouselers.

These divorce-happy women appear to be unable to do any of the above, which is why I think a failure of pre-frontal cortex function may be possible.

As prevalent as these women are, perhaps a psyche diagnosis of maladapted, or rət@rdəd, or underdeveloped pre-frontal cortex function (MPFCF) should be included in the DSM. A positive diagnosis may be easily obtained via the symptoms of hair-trigger threats of divorce (e.g. LBUST), nose rings, Sanpaku eyes, and the pecking duck hand (see adjacent meme), as well as a few other S1ut Tells.

Madness

It gets worse.

In addition to the above psychoanalysis, you'll find that many commenters under these videos have already offered a Red Pill analysis on these women, and most of them would be partially correct.

However, I think King and Daniels and every commenter there are overanalyzing something that is beyond analysis …

Because it's psychotic madness.

Literally.

Go up and look carefully at the non-verbal cues of the women talking in these videos.

The first one is totally confused. She can't describe her problem, what she's feeling, or what she wants. She wants to blow up her marriage, kick a good man to the curb, and damn her kids, and she doesn't know why or what for. She's spouting verbal diarrhea on social media that no one can make any sense of.

She's not just 'crazy' like all women are to some extent, she's literally insane.

You can see it in her eyes at random moments. She spaces out for a split second, her eyes pop, she clicks her tongue, and she stammers until she can pull her thoughts back together and continue talking. She tries to hide it, and she does a pretty good job at it too, but it's there. She's 80% of the way to full-blown loony. When she gets to 90+%, she'll file for divorce. If she can't pull it off by herself, she'll call on Team Woman™, the court system, and the gubmint to help her out.

The second woman has a quiet assurance of her sin, but that's only because she has her F/Ducks lined up in a row. Look again. Her facial muscles are contorted in a grimace. She's chewing her lip. She's gulping and huffing. She can't look straight at the camera for more than 650 milliseconds. At 0:50-0:55 and again at 2:00, she has a zombie stare. The way she keeps tossing her head back at 1:14, 1:50, and 2:02 is downright eerie and evil.

Mental Breakdown

Older readers might recall, years ago, people used to politely call this a "mental breakdown".

It happens when a woman commits some major sin, usually adultery or murder (via abortion), but sometimes it happens with wives who were abandoned or widowed (the latter usually leads to impulsive, rampant fornication), or they have lost a child.

The overwhelming combination of anger, cognitive dissonance, emotional insecurity, guilt, shame, and the intense hormonal fear response drives them insane.

That's exactly what these women are — insane. Take a guess at what sin they committed that caused it. I'll bet it's adultery, either past or present. That is the popular sin these days.

I guess the mid-80s was the last time I heard people calling this a "mental breakdown". We need to bring this term back.

Conclusions

These wimmin are not simply justifying or rationalizing their bad decisions, because it is inexcusable, and their reasonings are entirely irrational.

No. We're looking at the heavy weight of sin on these women's consciences, and yet they still carried out their plans to throw away their husbands, their marriages, their families, their future life, and even their everlasting souls.

That's literally madness.

Buyer's Remorse

Intro

Black Friday is historically the busiest shopping day of the year in the United States. With every purchase, a decision must be made, and the results are not always satisfying. This often leads to Buyer's Remorse.

Buyer's Remorse is an important concept that was widely cited within the Manosphere 1.0 to explain both men's and women's decision-making process in their choice of a mate, but it has hardly been mentioned at all by the Manosphere 2.0.

Here's a review of the concept, lest we forget.

What is Buyer's Remorse?

Buyer's Remorse is the sense of regret after having made a purchase. It is frequently associated with the purchase of an expensive item such as a car or house — or the choice of a spouse.

In the phase before purchasing, a prospective buyer often feels positive emotions associated with a purchase (e.g., desire, a sense of heightened possibilities, an anticipation of the enjoyment that will accompany using the product, bedding the newlywed wife, etc.). Afterward, having made the purchase, they are more fully able to experience the negative aspects: all the opportunity costs of the purchase, the burdens of maintenance, and a reduction in purchasing power.

Buyer's Remorse arises when a person must make a difficult decision concerning a heavily invested purchase between two similarly appealing alternatives. This regret may stem from the fear of having made the wrong choice, guilt over extravagance, or a suspicion of having been overly or unduly influenced by the seller.

Buyer's Remorse in Relationships

Buyer's Remorse, in the context of an intersexual relationship, is when a woman either chooses, or absent a conscientious choice, settles in with a man, and then has feelings of regret about being stuck with that man.

Men also experience Buyer's Remorse, but are typically better at accepting the outcomes of their decisions. They'll even stick with a woman who makes their life demonstrably worse, because they believe they must own their choice.

For the lad or lady on the threshold of marriage, it's a bad feeling to enter into a binding commitment and not being able to escape it easily.

- For men: "Now she'll get fat and stop slurping my rod."
- For women: "Now I can't change my mind. I can't go back to Ch@d! I'm stuck with Chuck!"

Men might know they didn't always do the "right" thing or make the best choice. But they'll do what they can — whatever it takes to make the best of it and/or to make it work with what they have. Men don't really have a choice about that, but they'll make do.

OTOH, women can't even be content or minimally satisfied with their lots. They're always second-guessing themselves and others, and will allow their perpetual dissatisfaction to muck it up. They'll walk back every choice to comprehend availing of another option, even when they're unsure that it's actually better. Also, women are strongly opposed to doing any kind of work that would be necessary to improve their lot until they're forced to do so by a man or by circumstances.

Buyer's Remorse in Mate Selection

Buyer's Remorse also refers to the psychological struggle that occurs before such a choice is made — all the "What if's" that are responsible for keeping many individuals single.

- "What if I miss out on a bigger, better deal?" (For men: More freedom, less responsibility, playing the field for a few more years, etc. For women: Finding a man who's moar handsome, richer, stronger, taller, better hung, etc.)
- "What if my life is 'worse' after I choose him or her?"
- "What if I make the 'wrong' choice?"
- "What if I regret my decision?"

For men, Buyer's Remorse is the fear of a slow fade into a boring, dry, less sex (or sexless) marriage, and wondering if he could've gotten more action had he remained single or chosen a different gal.

For women, Buyer's Remorse is the recognition that commitment poses a barrier to actualizing her hypergamous instincts. Once she commits to one man, or even publicly identifies with a man, she can no longer hope to find someone new or 'better'. If she keeps this ambition on the back burner of her mind, then it causes psychological dissonance, it racks her conscience, and causes feelings of guilt.

This is exactly why women don't want anyone to know they have a boyfriend or a midnight call boy, and why they say "having a boyfriend is embarrassing", and won't post photos of their 'beau(s)' on social media. As long as they can appear 'single', then they can retain maximum Attention and have moar 'opportunities' IFKWIM. Here, Buyer's Remorse is methodically avoided and strategically eliminated for these purposes.

As always, "The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence", but only due to differences of perspective, NOT reality.

Thus, Buyer's Remorse is also responsible for many breakups, especially those that occur within a short time after forming a new relationship. Once a person gets into the relationship, they wake up from their fantasies about love and their false expectations of what they think the relationship should be like. Instead of discussing desires, fears, and needs, and working out problematic issues, it appears easier to reject the whole relationship and to return to the perceived 'freedom' of being single, which is thought to have better and more realizable opportunities than being in a committed relationship.

- Men ignorantly avoid Buyer's Remorse by skipping to the next chick hitting him up, and thereby miss the opportunity to marry.
- Women will opt out of this choice by telling themselves, "I don't need no man" or "I deserve someone better." But this too is a choice that carries regrets later in life.

Buyer's Remorse and Expectations

Another factor that contributes to Buyer's Remorse is the expectation that the other person will (or should) fulfill ALL of one's desires, expectations, and needs.

Men expect that a woman should be able to give him a feeling of assurance that this is going to be more of a good relationship than a hassle. He thinks to himself, "This is what I need to make my life complete. Now I'll have my own sex bunny and all the poon I can eat!" Older men might think of building a home and family.

In reality, all the troubles that a woman brings into a man's life greatly outweigh all of the pleasure or satisfaction he might obtain from her (if any).

In reality, the cute 20 year old sex toy quickly transforms into a 30 year old battle axe, and only then does he wake up to the reality that she's subconsciously dead set on destroying him.

Women expect a man to give them a sense of psychological stability (which they often refer to as 'emotional security') that transforms her awareness to perceive the whole world as a carnival of pleasures. She thinks to herself, "This is going to be what meets all my needs. I'm going to become more emotionally stable and secure in this relationship."

Of course, no man alive can meet ALL of a woman's expectations to her satisfaction. Maybe not even God Himself. But she'll invariably blame all her disappointments on the man.

When these expectations are not met, and/or are blatantly contradicted by the daily grind, then Buyer's Remorse kicks in.

In response, men turn to P0rn or having an affair if chance allows. Women will either exit the relationship, or if she has any significant influence and a sense of security is within her grasp, she'll set about trying to change the man, domesticate him, emasculate him, and thereby make him less of what attracted her to him in the first place. She'll keep pressing and pushing him to assure herself that he doesn't have any 'hidden deficiencies'. This is what the Manosphere calls 'Fitness Testing' AKA 'Sh!t Testing'.

Either way, if the man softens up, or if he doesn't comply with her demands, the woman will continue to face Buyers' Remorse.

In sum, women's insecurities motivate them to Fitness Test their men to reassure themselves that he is capable of dealing with all her BS. But in doing so, they destroy their relationships and tear down their families, homes, and marriages.

If continued, she will shoo the man right out of her life, either willingly or unwillingly, because there is nothing a man can do in this situation to either dispel her Buyer's Remorse or satisfy her unrealistic expectations. He is caught between Scylla and Charybdis. All he can do to escape this ritual spiritual abuse is to walk away from the relationship.

Buyer's Remorse = Spiritual Doubts

From a spiritual perspective, Buyer's Remorse is a failure to trust in God, and/or being unwilling to endure suffering and learn to be content in all circumstances.

Faith in God and the recognition of authority go hand in hand. A man exercises faith in God by letting go of the temporal, embracing the eternal omnipotence of the Lord, and then living that out in the temporal. A woman exercises faith in God by trusting and obeying her father or husband.

People are imperfect, and no one person can fulfill all our desires, wants, and needs. We can't actually trust a human being to be our 'Personal Jesus', and trying to do so is idolatry. Also, we don't know what the future is going to bring. So, not being able to deal with Buyer's Remorse is a spiritual weakness in one's relationship to God. It is embodied in a fear of being decisive, making decisions, and/or entering into any kind of covenant or commitment.

Why? It is because…

- We suspect that God may not be 'enough'.
- We don't fully trust God's hand in our life.
- We are afraid of what the future may bring.
- We don't truly believe that God will fulfill all our needs (or wants).
- We are afraid of making a 'wrong' decision, which is essentially a lack of faith and/or a fear of suffering.

On the last point, when people are afraid of making a 'wrong' decision, often times this has nothing to do with moral rectitude. What this usually means is that we are afraid of making a decision that brings inconvenience and/or suffering, and we don't want to regret not making a different decision that would have brought a different set of inconveniences and sufferings. As it is said, "The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence" (i.e. the boundary of commitment). We bemoan the daily labor and the sufferings more than we cherish the authority, hope, and joy it produces. We don't recognize the value of suffering or the fact that suffering is unavoidable.

If you're NOT content before you enter into a relationship, then you won't be happy afterwards.

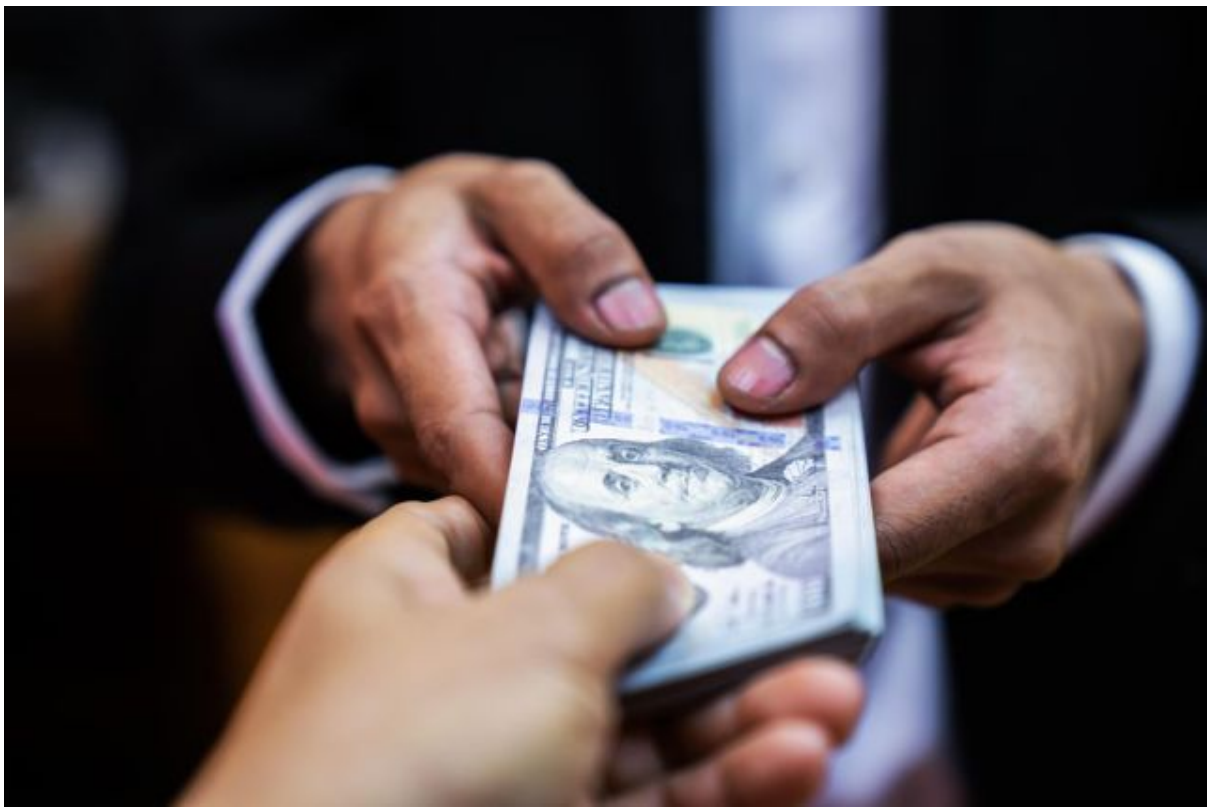
Furthermore, we can't nail another person down by saying, "Now I want to make sure there are no disappointments, potholes, or snafus in my future. I want an assurance of a utopian paradise." Neither can we rest on the institution of marriage to be a vehicle of sanctification, although it should be, but if we enter into marriage with this mindset, we're bound to be disappointed. Rest assured, there ARE disappointments and potholes and God knows what they are, so we have to put our trust in Him. But yet, people keep pressing, "I'm not sure I can trust this person. How do I know this is the 'right' person?" The only assurance you have is that the relationship can only be as good as you make it, as good as a spouse that both individuals can be, and this requires the commitment of both people to walk in obedience to God.



Conclusions

Anybody who makes any kind of commitment (e.g. a purchase, or a marital vow) has a certain degree of buyer's remorse. It is normal and to be expected to some degree. But in our modern age, in which everyone lives by their feelings, it is common for people to act on that or to recoil from that. People want to avoid Buyer's Remorse MORE than they want to humble themselves and shoulder the responsibilities of a purchasing decision or a relationship, so people will avoid or reject that commitment simply so that they'll never have to accept responsibility for their decisions — or face Buyer's Remorse.

Men would live in a tent or sleep on the sofa in a sexless marriage if that's what their decisions required of them.

But…

Women, more than men, will do all kinds of irresponsible things in order to avoid the responsibilities of commitment (e.g. abortion, postpone marriage, file for divorce, etc.).

> But we are not among those who shrink back to destruction, but of those who have faith for the safekeeping of the soul.

Intro

The theme for the month of November 2025 was Rationalism.

Honestly, I don't know how I do it (except by the inscrutable impartations from the gracious Lord above), but I'm amazed at how well I can predict the overall tone and topics of the Based Sphere / Manosphere in advance. Looking back at all that has been said and written this month, if I could sum up all the discussion in one word, Rationalism pretty well nails it.

Here are the noteworthy posts that appeared around the Based / Manosphere this month, listed by categories.

The Birth Pangs of Christian Mysticism

Jack · 1 December 2025 · Archived copy · Original

For legalists and staunch religiosos, Mystical Musings are like fingernails scratching a chalkboard.

Readership: All; Men; Christian Men;
Theme: Christian / Mystical Awareness
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Intro

Just as I foretold back in August of 2022, Christian Mysticism is slowly rising.

But it is, apparently, a hard White Pill to swallow for many, especially those who cling fast to Sola Scriptura and/or a post-modern, Feministic, Positivist outlook. (But ever since Dalrock et al. exposed the church's convergence with Feminism, I wonder, what are the apparent differences anymore?)

Maybe this resistance to mysticism is less obvious to readers, so here's my view of it.

Christian Convulsions

Schisms have appeared all over the Christian 'sphere since 2023.

G Filotto lambasted Bruce Charlton, and then Gunner Q and a couple of writers at the Orthosphere hit back at G Filotto (2023/5/23).

Derek Ramsey has taken issue with many things written on Σ Frame, even going so far as to intentionally derail the discussions.

Gunner Q accused Catacomb Resident of heresy. (I wrote a lengthy reply here.)

Later in 2023, Gunner Q3 wrote an essay, Disrespecting the Masters (2023/11/29), in his inimitable style, criticizing a piece by William Wildblood on the topic of "spiritual guides", or "masters" as they are called. (I think the term "guardian angels" might have been better received.)

Wildblood responded to Gunner's take-down in his Reply to Gunner Q (2023/11/29).

Adam Piggott summed up the contention and supported Gunner Q in Masterful Pride (2023/12/2) [Archive].

Strangely, many of these posts (those with no link available), including Filotto's and Piggott's whole blogs, have been wiped from the web since then, including the web archives. (Update: Adam Piggott moved to Substack.)

But why? What is there to hide? Was Filotto facing real life persecution? Was he cancelled? (I don't know the answers.)

Apparently, the Based / Christian Manosphere is censoring ITself. But why?

Secular Convulsions

As a possibly related side note, these convulsions are not limited to the Christian Sphere. Similar animosities have happened in the secular sphere.

- Andrew Tate and his guys have been the undivided focus of rank candor among conservatives and liberal Feminists alike, even calling him the face of the Manosphere. (A humorous remark going around is that men should assume every woman can be likened unto Bonnie Blue, as a 'fair' comparison.)
- Pearl Davis (JustPearlyThings) had a falling out with some of her noted guests and was later demonetized on YouTube.
- In a recent discussion (2025/11/3), the naïvely curious Tucker Carlson fell in with the suavely evasive Chris Williamson to discuss every social problem common to man EXCEPT the divorce industry — an obstreperous denial, as noted by Stephen Baskerville.
- Many others not listed here for the sake of brevity.

Is the secular sphere falling into the spirit of quarrelling occurring in the Christian Sphere, or is it vice versa? Or is ALL of this conflict being caused by a cosmic and perhaps divine stirring of cataclysmic confusion and wrath?

Speculations

All this leads us to wonder, what's going on in the cosmic realm?

I haven't formed a working hypothesis (yet), but I have a few guesses.

1. Does it have something to do with the Red Pill going mainstream, such that Red Pill personalities are now feeling comfortable enough to sling hash at each other?
2. I've noticed that most of the major contentions in the Christian sphere are between radically independent thinking mystics vs. Bible defending traditionalists. So it might have something to do with inappropriate presumptions about the level of authority of Christian Mysticism. That is, some are ascribing a broader authority to Mysticism than what is intended or warranted. In this case, anything Mystical is interpreted apropos as anti- or non-Scriptural, and therefore heretical, without any recognition that Mystical revelations are often deeply personalized, and are NOT necessarily to be taken as an official doctrine for the masses, but are merely mediums of insight, prophecies, and/or vectors of awareness. As an apt comparison and perhaps a topic of debate, is it possible to have a nocturnal dream that is heretical? Or is it merely an expression of one's deeper subconsciousness?
3. Current Christian Mysticism, even the common variety that we would label 'musings', proffers content that is just too esoteric and Wə!rD (or rather, anti-WEIRD biased, TBH) for some folks to swallow.
4. Following (3), Mystical musings don't align with the postmodern standards of Science and/or Scripture based argumentation, and are therefore unable to be tackled in either manner. This is certainly a source of frustration and irritation for those well-versed in Science and Scripture.
5. Following (4), Mystical revelations are NOT 'defensible' in the typical style of Aristotelian debate, because it is based on faith and personal revelation, and NOT on reason, or even scripture necessarily, or anything that is cite-able as a doctrinal or ¡Sc!əNt!f!c! authority. It is its OWN authority, but only to the recipient and to those who can understand the specific, contextual, nuanced viewpoint. (It is left to the reader to determine whether it undergirds his faith, or else means nothing at all.)

Readers are invited to chime in as to which explanation you believe rings true, or if you have another to add. Probably more than one are valid.

Closing

This month, we'll take a closer look at Christian / Mystical Awareness and see how it is a natural expression of faith that appears when sound reason is flatly rejected (via Feminism / W0kism, or Post Truth Modernism, or verificationism), and societal law and order recedes from the hegemonic social dominance of Gynocivnattery.*

 Gynocivnattery: A new neologism (coined by yours truly) that sarcastically refers to actions or behaviors that a feminist / gynocentric society considers to be "civil", in spite of the obvious negative consequences. These behaviors include cancelling, doxxing, excessive female pedestalization, femcentric / W0ke ressentimentalism, performative chivalry, prejudicial bias against men, the rejection of sound reason, ¡$c!əNt!$M!, shaming, silencing, and social shunning, among many others.*

The Heart-Led Way

Jack · 3 December 2025 · Archived copy · Original

Authentic Faith emanates from the heart, NOT from the rational mind.

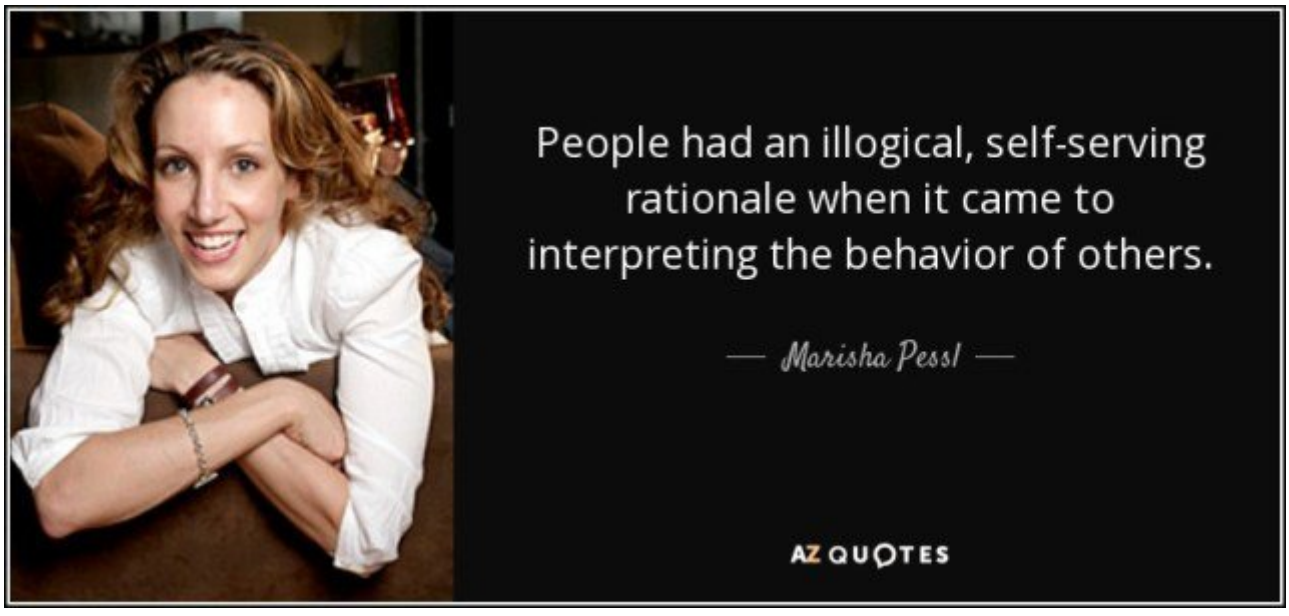
Readership: Christians
Theme: Mystical Awareness
Author's Note: This article was originally published on Ed Hurst's discontinued blog, Do What's Right, on 2020/10/22 [Archive]. Updated and expanded by Jack, based on his correspondence with the author. Headings and images added by Jack.
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Intro

I've been asked to review the meaning of "Heart-Led" in the context of this blog.

A major element of the Radix Fidem covenant is bouncing off the prevailing American culture and mainstream Christian religion, showing how they are wrong. Thus, we first have to point out what most people believe, and why it's wrong.

The core problem is Aristotle. Not the man and his teaching so much as the influence he's had on American thinking. He denied the existence of a Spirit Realm. He insisted that, if there were gods, they were restricted to this realm of existence. This world, as we experience it, is all there can be. Further, he insisted that human capabilities — reason in particular — were sufficient to grasp all that matters. He denied the Fall and insisted that humans were perfectible, at least in terms of logic and reason.



Enlightened Thinking Has Replaced Mystical Awareness

We understand that American culture arose from Anglo-Saxon culture for the most part, with a lot of other minority inputs from all over Europe. The whole mess together is the result of Germanic tribal barbarians colliding with the vestiges of the Greco-Roman Civilization. The existing Roman Church at that time quite intentionally ditched what remained of their almost forgotten understanding of the Hebrew influence in the New Testament teachings, and adopted a bunch of pagan ideas from the Germanic invaders, so as to brew up a brand of Christian religion that would appeal to them. This was a political move; the Church intended on converting the Germanic lords and so retain the Church's political dominance.

Somewhere later down the road, the resulting civilization rising from the Dark Ages went back and reclaimed the classic literature and lore of the long-dead Greco-Roman Civilization. The result climaxed with the Enlightenment. There was some decent stuff there, but the core problem was the restoration of some elements of Aristotelian assumptions about reality. The details get murky, but the net result was that a lot of Western Christian thinking was unable to shake loose those pagan assumptions. So we have today a long legacy of Christians asserting that there is a Spirit Realm, but then they make it spooky and incomprehensible. They say that man is fallen, but then act like human reason can be trusted to get answers for faith. They assume "faith" means a compartment of the intellect, a matter of rational decision.

In Western mythology, the heart is restricted to serving as a repository of sentiment. Sure, it's more than mere emotion, but it is still just a matter of feelings, even if they happen to be really strong feelings. Thus, the modern meaning of "follow your heart" is some inexplicable force of really strong feelings that won't let you rest until you take them into account.

This is radically different from how things were viewed in the Biblical context. In the Bible, your heart is the seat of commitment, AKA faith. The Bible talks about interacting with living beings and hearing the celebration of the Creator. Western minds read that as parabolic, but Scripture treats it as quite literal. Thus, we find Jesus speaking to natural forces and those things obeying Him. And we have Paul solemnly teaching that Creation itself tells us about God and what is moral truth.

Wait... But isn't the Heart Wicked?

One of the first objections I often hear from sincere truth seekers inquiring about the Heart-Led Way is from Jeremiah 17:9.

> "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; Who can know it?
> Jeremiah 17:9 (NKJV)

They assume this verse indicates that the human heart is utterly depraved, and never to be trusted. Granted, there are scripture passages that appear to confirm this conclusion (e.g., Mark 7:14-23; Romans 1:28-32), but the end result of this belief is them choosing to alienate themselves from their own heart and soul. This rejection of discernment, resulting in the destruction of the integrity of one's soul, cannot be the intended application, as Jesus' work is not to destroy us, but to redeem us.

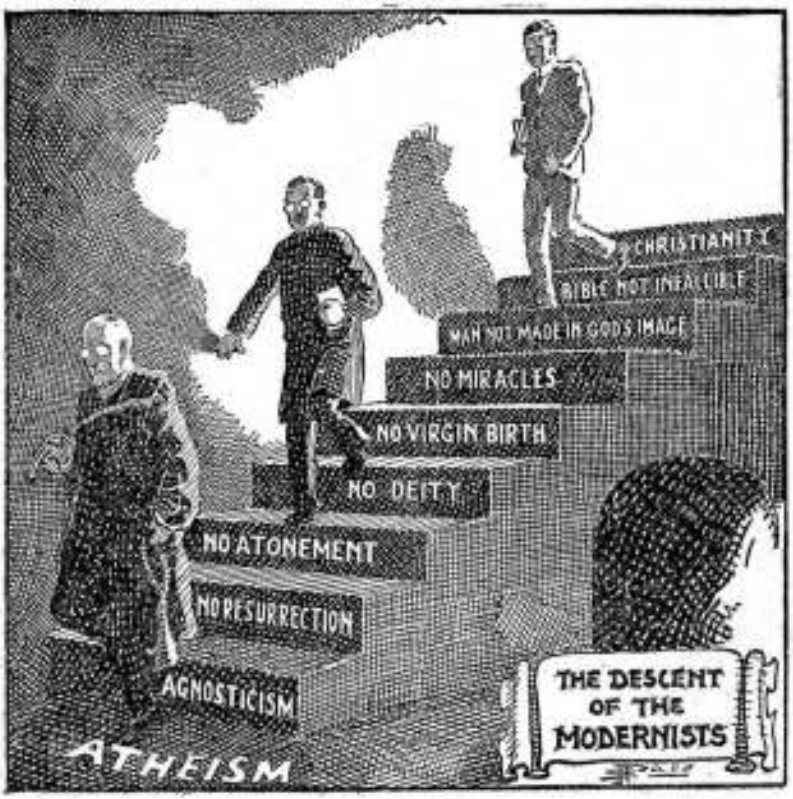
The Bible talks about how you can build barriers in your soul that darken your heart. It can be corrupted and made wicked. However, if you turn the light of revelation onto your heart, it will commit itself to faithfully serving the Lord of Creation. It's not mere sentiment; it's a wholly separate faculty that is able to accurately discern the will of God. And it is superior to the intellect. Meanwhile, the Scripture warns, starting with the Garden of Eden narratives, that human reason is fallen and insufficient to discern moral truth on its own.



The Submission of the Intellect

The next objection I often hear is, "What about the rational mind?"

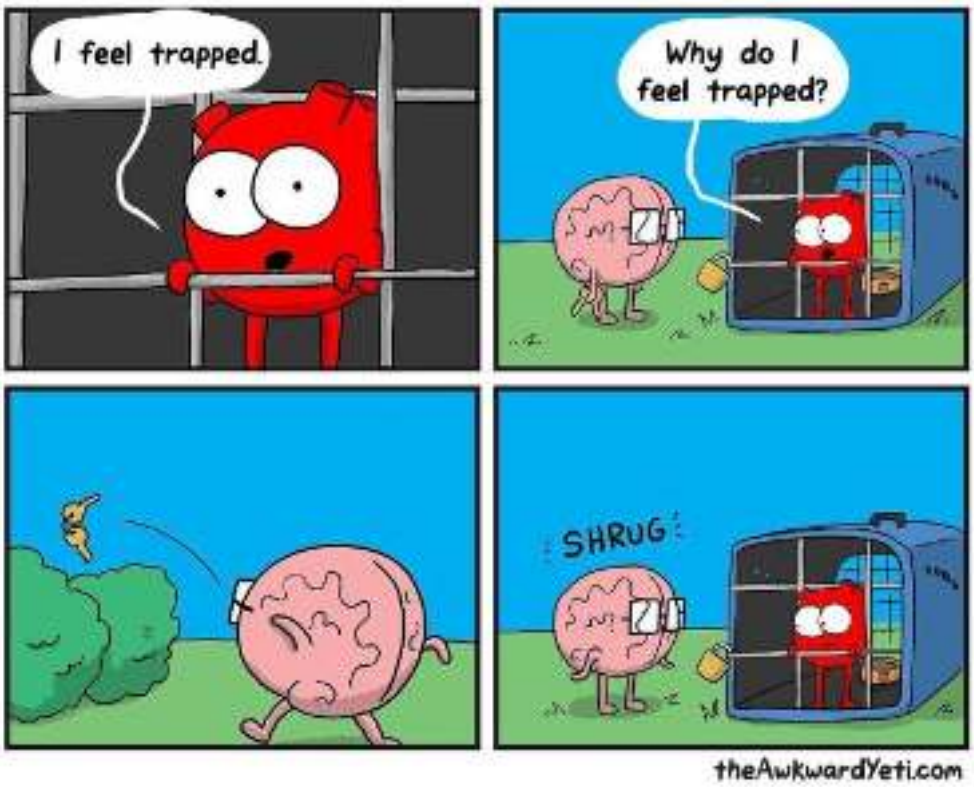
God gave us brains so that we could organize and implement the moral truth coming out of our hearts. The heart always trumps whatever the brain thinks it knows, and the brain will often object to this (as depicted in the cartoon meme below). God's will does not have to make sense to your head; it always makes sense to your heart. It's burned into your convictions. If you make a conscious effort to refer to your convictions — the living fire of imperative in your soul — then you will always have peace with God.

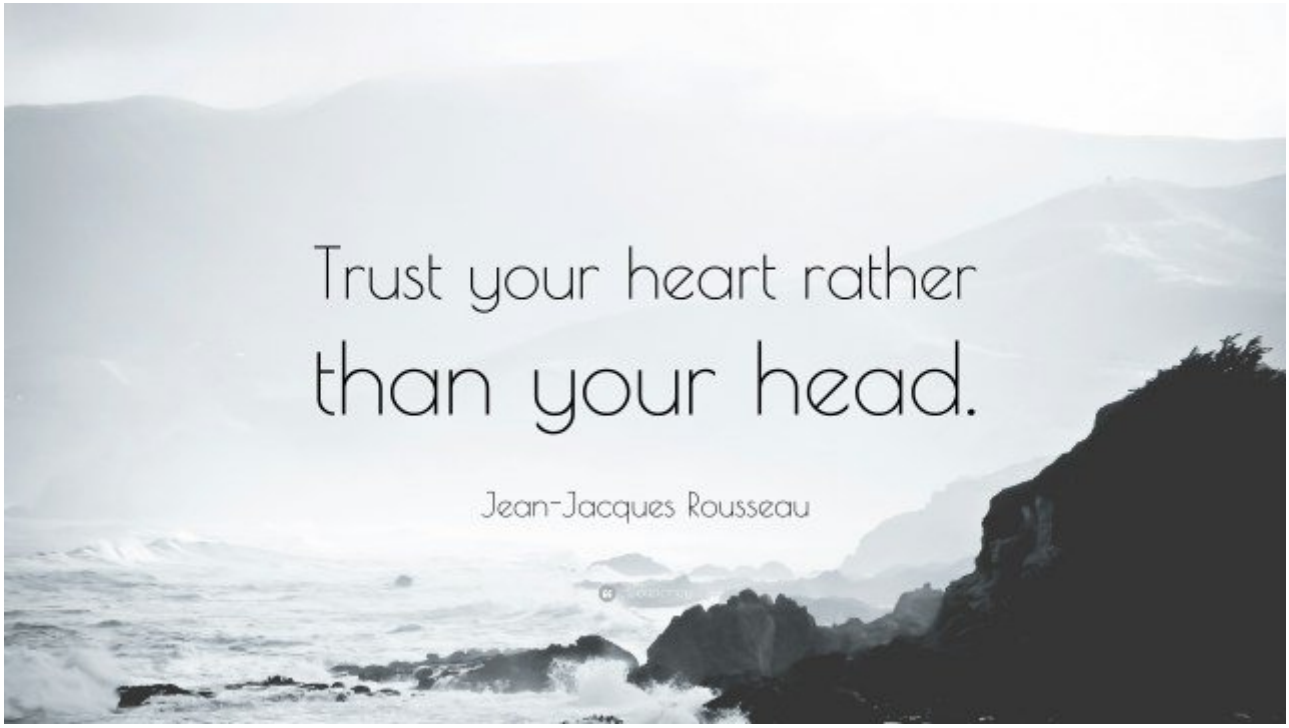


The Heart — A Treasure In Earthen Vessels

So perhaps we should heed the majority of non-Western cultures yet living in our world today when they suggest that your soul is not in your head, but in your heart. Ask any Native American who actually knows their own culture where their soul "lives", and they'll point to their heart, whereas the vast majority of non-native Americans will point to their heads. And then we can examine the scholarly research about the Ancient Near East (ANE) and discover that they, too, assumed that the soul was in the heart, not the head — all of them, so far as we can tell.

Lo and behold, even Western science has discovered that the heart has its own sensory field, and that it possesses nerve nodes apparently capable of processing what that sensory field senses. However, science has no idea what kind of data that field senses, only that it most certainly does interact with other living things and the sensory field emitting from those beings. Given the cultural assumptions of the West, we aren't surprised that the most active efforts to use that limited scientific information result in folks talking about "emotional intelligence" (EQ).

Abraham believed it; Moses believed it; Jesus and His followers taught it. Not the way I'm teaching it here, of course. They were basing their teaching on a shared assumption that had never varied across the entire history encompassed in Scripture. It turns out that the West is just about the only civilization that thinks the heart is just a repository of sentiment, and that the soul is in the head.



Conclusions

The Heart-Led Way means you have moved your conscious awareness from your head to your heart. It means you seek to sense moral truth directly from Creation, because God wove His own DNA in the fabric of reality. It means you strive to read your own convictions, which are awakened when your spirit is touched by the Divine Presence. It means you sense that powerful Divine Presence which lives in your heart as the Holy Spirit. It means you have compelled your reason and intellect to bow the knee to the superior moral wisdom of your heart.

That's the Heart-Led Way.

By the way, Biblical Law assumes you are taking the Heart-Led path as the means to discerning what the written Law Covenants demand of you. You cannot obey God's Law with your head — that's legalism. The Bible expects you to get this Heart-Led Way as a prerequisite for peace with God. It is required. That's the basis of true faith.

Noteworthy Points from the Christian Mysticism Debate

There's an apparent schism in the Christian Blogosphere over Christian Mysticism, but why? What is the core issue of contention?

Intro

Over at The Orthosphere, Kristor wrote an exposition On Finding the True Way to Life (2022/7/24), which explores the interplay between individual faith and institutional Church authority in achieving Christian salvation, inspired by a commentary from Bruce Charlton.

This post was part of a larger discussion going on in the Christian Blogosphere between Francis Berger, Bruce Charlton, Kristor, Alan Roebuck, J. M. Smith, and others participating in the comments sections, about the validity, value, place, and purpose of Christian Mysticism, and how this is affecting traditional ecclesiastical Christianity. (A list of these posts can be found here.) I believe this debate was important because the current emergence of Christian Mysticism will become a significant movement in the history of Christianity. We are witnessing its conception right Here and Now.

Since the conclusion of this debate, which took place in July and August of 2022, there appears to be a schism of silence on this topic. Apparently, certain authors are avoiding the topic, thereby depriving others of their critical insights. Most notably, we haven't heard much about Christian Mysticism from Adam Piggott, Gunner Q, or The Orthosphere, while Francis Berger, Catacomb Resident, Bruce Charlton, Ed Hurst, and Σ Jack have continued to address and explore Mystic Faith, but with fewer responses.

Here, I'm focusing on Kristor's essay because it is apparently the last proposition on which all parties agreed, and also because it attracted a plurality of comments. However, this is just my take. Readers are encouraged to go through all those posts, time allowing, and decide for themselves where the split originated.

The Main Thesis of Kristor's Essay

Salvation is fundamentally an individual pursuit rooted in personal faith in Christ, but the Christian Church serves as an indispensable "soteriological safe harbor"—the Body of Christ itself—offering doctrinal protection and a reliable path to redemption. While one can be saved outside formal Church participation through genuine faith, regular Church attendance provides sound teaching and accountability, significantly enhances the odds of experiencing the motivation of joy and therefore encourages perseverance, and guards against sins and other spiritual pitfalls.

Key Arguments

- Faith Over Ritual: Drawing from biblical examples like Elijah, Abraham, Moses, and the Maccabean martyrs, Kristor's essay argues that true salvation comes from heartfelt faith in Christ, and not mere adherence to sacraments, liturgical rites, or ceremonies. Kristor summarizes multiple quotes from Jesus as, "Your faith has made you whole. Not your participation in the Temple rites, not your obedience to the Deuteronomic and Levitical Law, but your faith."
- The Church's Unique Role: Salvation operates through both the Church and the broader creation, but the Church is singularly vital as Christ's embodied presence. Without it, individuals risk error, akin to "traversing Mirkwood" without staying on the trail (a reference to Tolkien, emphasizing the dangers of going astray).
- Perseverance and Renewal: Faith demands ongoing metanoia (a transformative renewal of life) and endurance. Hypocritical legalism and ritualism without inner change is futile and summarily condemned.
- Critique of Romantic Christianity: Kristor warns against overly individualistic approaches (e.g., Christian Mysticism, AKA "Romantic Christianity"), which prioritize personal discernment over Church tradition. This can lead to "reinventing the wheel" and doctrinal drift, as no one can authoritatively redefine core truths without the Church's collective wisdom.

Kristor's Conclusions

Kristor paraphrases Charlton's viewpoint in saying, "In brief; the individual (not any church) ultimately 'defines' Christianity: i.e., the way to salvation" and adds, "yet this individual path is safest within the Church's boundaries."

The true way to eternal life lies in discovering and faithfully following Christ as He has revealed Himself, with the Church providing the surest, tradition-guided route to avoid spiritual peril. Kristor urges readers to embrace this institutional anchor rather than venturing alone.

Comments

Kristor's article sparked many lively comments, totaling 70 in number, debating topics like Church schisms, the 2020 C0V!D pandemic closures, and tensions between traditional hierarchy and personal intuition, including analogies like Peter's brief walk on water as a model of fleeting individual triumph.

It was said that the debate was rather dry and difficult to follow, so here, I'll attempt to summarize the main points of the discussion.

- There is no longer any separation of Church and State, as evidenced by the churches response to government mandates (e.g. church closures during the C0V!D epidemic). This has manifested in different ways for different sects and denominations, but overall, the end is the same — the church conforms to societal influences and abides by politically motivated regulations, rather than staying true to their traditional faith beliefs.
- The Church allowed the atheistic State to dictate its religious praxis in the midst of a pandemic that, we were hysterically told, would result in numbers of the faithful meeting their Maker.
- Virtually all Christian churches willingly allowed the secular authorities to label them non-essential services in early 2020. This capitulation was existential in magnitude.
- Many ecclesiastical institutions have become corrupted within and without, most apparent in Evangelical Protestantism, but also within Catholicism to a lesser but still heretical degree.
- The Mainline Protestant church is converged with secular society. The churches are stuffed with fake Christians, including the authorities in those churches.
- The Catholic church is a minion of the Deep State. The Vatican is almost completely under the control of Gnostics clothed as wealthy shepherds.

- The Apostolic succession, like the claim of legitimate Hanoverian succession to the British throne, has gotten very problematic, and the hierarchs won't deal with it, so this issue is wrecking the Church.
- Readers recounted what Dalrock, Vox Day, et al. have said about "Churchianity".

All this and more is partly why Orthodoxy has grown over the last decade.

The esteemed J. M. Smith wrote,

> "I think what Bruce rebels against, and I know what I rebel against, is a Procrustean definition of the way to salvation. I know that there are great dangers in spinning off in the other direction, but individualization does not have to mean individualism. We have been talking about "evolution of consciousness," but differentiation of consciousness is more indisputable and to the point."

More recently, Gunner Q wrote another reason why people are hesitant to accept Christian Mysticism.

> "My main issue with Christian mysticism is people's motivations for pursuing it. The supernatural can happen, we do follow a Personal God, but most people who go into it do so for dangerous reasons. Either they want to be Special People, or they don't like what Scripture says and try to find 'sources' that teach differently.
> This, in a social context of explosive growth of witchcraft, hallucinogens, and other diabolical influences. Most believers today do not have the discernment to recognize a lie when their favorite politician tells it, let alone a spirit guide of uncertain origin inhabiting a different reality.
> Acknowledge the supernatural when it happens? Sure. Try to invoke the supernatural because God-given reality is not enough? Thin ice."

Conclusions

ImNoBody offered a fundamental insight to the crux of the debate.

> "The key of the debate is the word "discern", which is ambiguous. Of course, any Traditionalist would agree that individual discernment is necessary for salvation and that salvation is individual. This comes with Christianity. But the Traditionalist will tell you that this discernment has to start from tradition in order not to reinvent the wheel and to take advantage of what we have learned through the centuries. This is the position in other aspects of life: we don't reinvent Physics or Medicine from scratch: we rely on a living tradition.
> For the Romantic, the "development of consciousness" and the convergence of churches with the liberal establishment, have made this tradition useless. We have to go to the source directly because the old stream is polluted. Discernment cannot be limited by anything, only by individual intuition or reasoning."
> "In brief; the individual (not any church) ultimately 'defines' Christianity: i.e., the way to salvation."
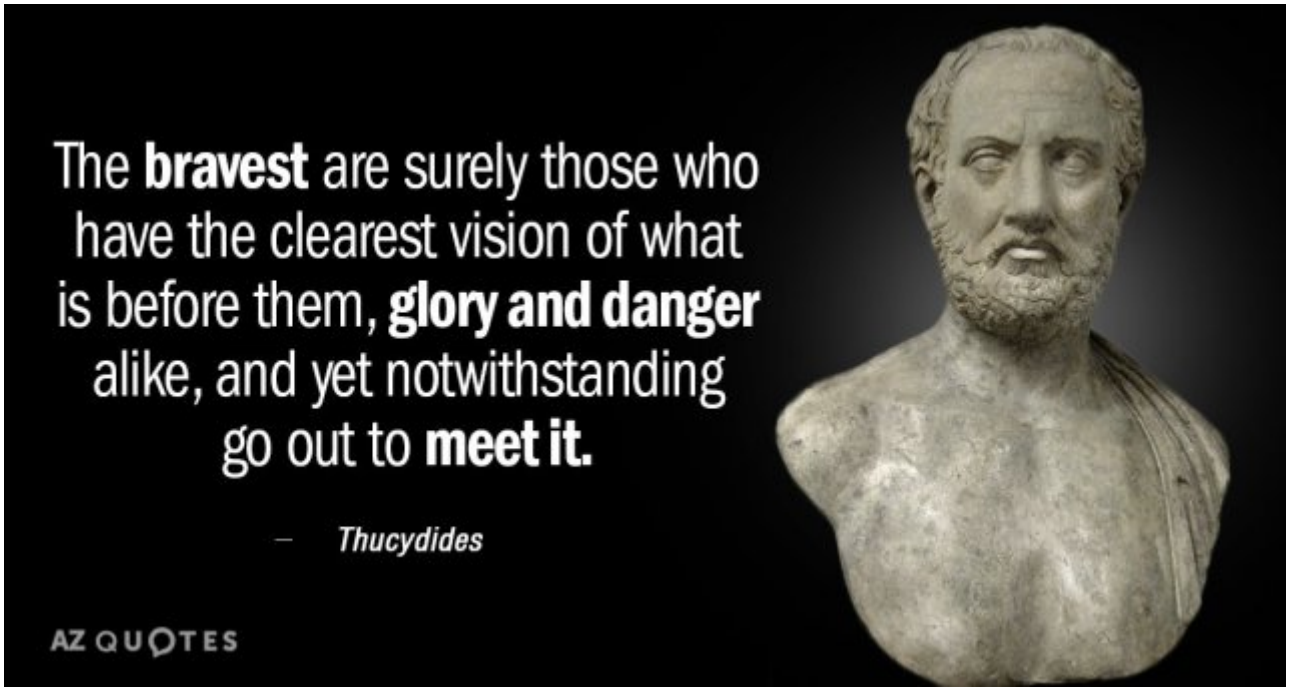
> "So there would be as much Christianities as Christian people."

I think, ultimately, the dissention boils down to three interrelated issues:

1. What is the Church, properly understood? Is it a particular institution of organized religion? Or is it those who hold to the practice of a particular body of ecclesiastical and soteriological doctrine? Or is the Body of Christ comprised NOT of an institution or buildings or doctrines, but rather IS comprised of every individual human who claims Christ as Lord and Savior?
2. What constitutes Christian identity? Is one a Christian because they attend mass regularly and perform all the sacraments? Or is one a Christian because they have placed their faith in Christ and have developed their senses via regular practice of righteousness to discern right from wrong?
3. What is most conducive toward developing and maintaining one's faith in Christ? Is it sticking with the ecclesiastical traditions, although broken and corrupted? Or is it making a break from the psychological burdens of these culturally converged institutions and discovering the original source of faith in Christ through Christian Mysticism?

The answer to the first question is evident in Kristor's essay, and everyone can agree on this. But the second is much more contextually nuanced and personalized — and therein lies the rub. Some men are finding the church to be inadequate for avoiding deception, developing faith, and achieving spiritual growth (such as what Kristor et al. argued), and/or other men are discovering God via a mystical awareness of the glory and power of God that supercedes the benefits of attending church (as I have).



Bruce Charlton wrote,

> "My framing of this issue is that it is a question of whether we each take ultimate personal responsibility for our Christian faith in its most core aspects; or whether we choose to give that responsibility to some external source — whether that be a church institution or some externally-taught interpretation of scripture.
> The choice of personal responsibility may lead to "mysticism" or to many kinds of supernatural or paranormal experiences in some individuals — but in other individuals it will lead to the (personal, responsible) choice to believe and practice in accordance with a particular church — or something analogous.
> But such a person will know, explicitly, that his loyalty and obedience to a church was taken by himself. He will not (for instance) believe that the truth is defined by a modern institution, or that his status as "a Christian" depends on the say-so of any institution."

And as Gunner Q alluded, in choosing Mysticism, is one's motivation to evade Earthly / ecclesiastical authority, or to seek Christ?

Maybe this is an oversimplification, but it is apparently what we need to get a handle on things.

Case Study — Biblical Gender Roles Mistakes the Nature of Discernment

I think BGR has some of the best stuff in (what's left of) the Christian Manosphere, but there is one point in this post that I strongly disagree with.

> "David's son, King Solomon, was a Wiseman who built his kingdom with his mind."
> Biblical Gender Roles: You Don't Have To Be A Jock To Be A Godly Masculine Man – Nerds Can Be Too (2021/12/27)

No. Solomon was gifted with wisdom from the Lord above in response to his prayer to be a wise king.

BGR replied,

> "Jack, you make a great point about Solomon's wisdom being a divine gift rather than a purely mental faculty — and I completely agree. But I'd add that the same is true of David's warrior abilities.
> In Psalm 144:1, David said, "Blessed be the Lord my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight."
> Just as Solomon's wisdom came from God, David's skill in battle also came from God. In both cases, the divine gift manifested through different modalities of masculinity: one through mental and strategic aptitude (the Wiseman), the other through physical and courageous action (the Warrior).
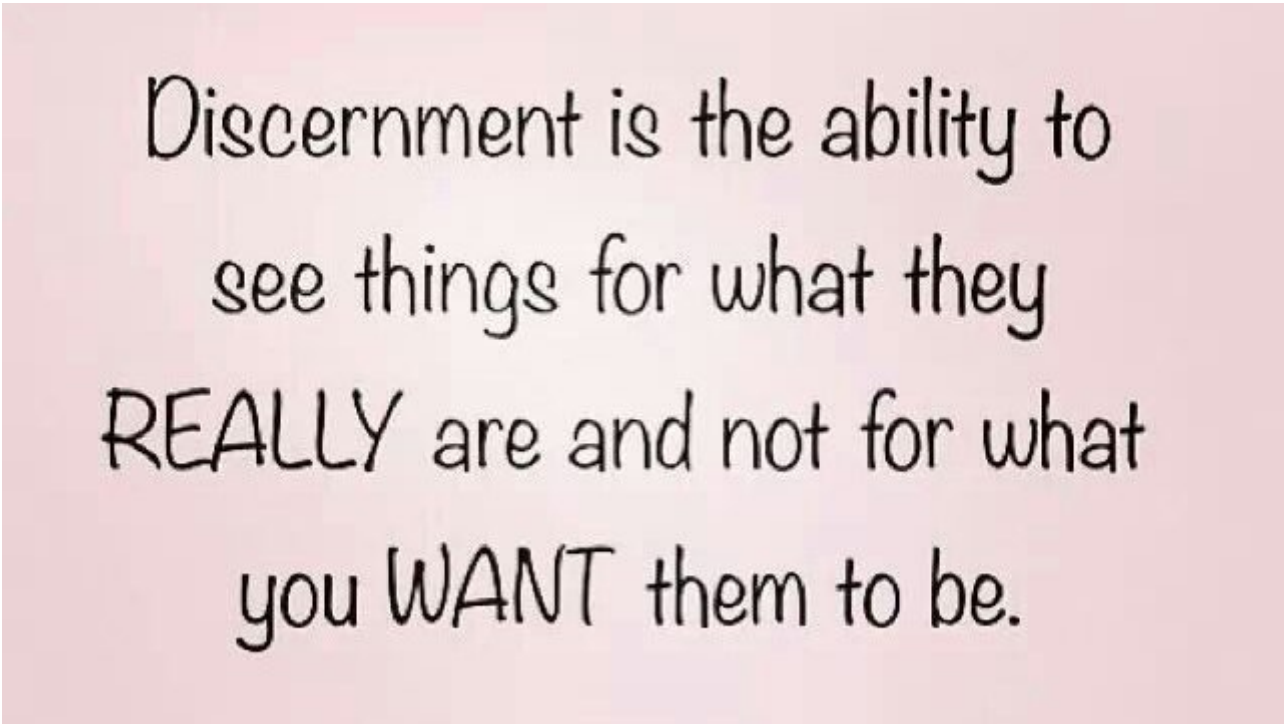
> My statement that Solomon "built his kingdom with his mind" wasn't meant to suggest his wisdom was self-derived, but rather that his form of masculine strength was expressed intellectually rather than physically — just as David's was expressed militarily rather than academically. Both were empowered by the same God, who equips men differently for His purposes."

Okay, I understand his point about the different expressions of masculinity, but I was surprised that BGR missed my point, because I took him to be a discerning person by virtue of his Biblical intersexual insights.



What is Discernment?

My quibble is that Spiritual Discernment, which is the foundation of Godly wisdom (such as that possessed by King Solomon), is NOT a rational faculty of the mind. It is an ineffable trait of the Godly.

I have to point this out, because ever since I wrote multiple posts about spiritual discernment (see posts under Related below), it has become an oft used term around the sphere, even extending into mainstream discourse. Most of the time, they use this term loosely to mean 'awareness' or 'intelligence', or 'judgment', without any understanding that it is a uniquely personal, spiritual ability / gifting.

Spiritual discernment is not merely 'awareness' or 'intelligence', or 'judgment' because…

- Discernment can tell you whether someone is lying.
- Discernment makes you aware of the motivations of others.
- Discernment can tell you what is the right course of action among a pool of confusing options.
- Discernment allows you to discriminate between whether someone is merely stupid, ignorant, and immature, or if they are engaging in premeditated willful evil.
- Discernment allows you to determine whether to extend grace and mercy to someone, or else dish out harsh discipline and punishment, either of which may contribute to their own salvation — or damnation.

Neither intelligence nor emotional EQ / maturity can reveal these things to one's awareness.

Speaking personally, my own discernment allows me to tell which individuals are spiritually alive, as opposed to being dead in sin and shame. These individuals appear like brilliant shining lights in a crowd of people. The interesting thing is that many of these individuals are NOT Bible thumping Protestants. Imagine that!

Also, believe it or not, my discernment allows me to identify a woman's N-count with small error. It is an impression that appears like 'antennas' emanating from the woman's head, similar to the meme below. I can literally count a woman's 'antennas' to know her N-count.

Conclusions

Moreover, spiritual discernment is a metaphysical aptitude that is characteristic of spiritual maturity, whereas intelligence is a mental / physiological / psychological aptitude, and emotional / social awareness is a honed perception arising from one's emotional maturity.

The confusion between these concepts is ubiquitous in the West, such that no one knows the difference anymore. But there is a vast difference that we must remain cognizant of.

We cannot schmooze discernment / wisdom as being the same thing as either being intelligent / academically inclined, or being emotionally or socially aware. They are totally different concepts.

If you lack discernment and desire more wisdom, then all you need to do is ask God to grant you more of it. He is gracious to impart this gift to all who ask (James 1:5-8). But beware! It may be shocking, and require you to make drastic changes. IMO, the reason why most people do NOT have discernment is because they subconsciously reject it. They cannot accept nor handle the iterative responsibilities of knowing the disturbing information that it reveals.

Update: BiblicalGenderRoles has responded with an excellent article, The Bible Teaches Two Kinds of Wisdom, Not One (2025/12/11).

Mysticism and Tennis

Intro

I've played tennis since 2002. Believe it or not, I've learned a lot about Frame, masculine presence, and mystical awareness from playing this game. It's also increased my faith and confidence.

When I first started playing, I bought a really cheap racket (an aluminum-railed Prince). But after my first season, I was getting better at it, and I enjoyed it more. So I decided to buy a better racket.

Since good quality rackets are rather expensive, I did some research on it, and I talked with my friend about how to select a good racket. We also went to a large sports equipment store and looked at what they had. I was a little confused, because some rackets seemed very similar to others, but were priced much differently.

Mystical Awareness of Aptitude and Skill

I asked my tennis buddy what the difference was, and how to decide which one to buy. He said something that has stuck out in my mind ever since.

> "The Feeling is EVERYTHING!!!"

I asked him what he meant by that. He said,

> "How do you feel when you're holding the racket, when you're swinging it, and hitting the ball? Do you feel like you're fumbling around with a clunky piece of junk, or do you feel more natural, like the racket is an extension of your arm? Do you feel like you're swatting flies with a hammer, or do you feel like you're catching butterflies with a net? Do you feel like you're struggling to avoid embarrassing yourself, or do you feel like you own the court?"

I understood what he meant then. He wasn't talking about an emotional feeling, per se. He was referring to my connection with reality and how the racket acts as a primary instrument within a real-time information feedback loop between action and reaction. The 'Feeling' he was referring to is my autotelic participation with reality within a state of Flow.

Mystical Awareness of Posture

More recently, one of my tennis mates taught me how to rotate my torso and keep my arm more rigid, similar to playing golf. Before this, I had been in the habit of using my elbow, shoulder, and wrist. Before, when I was using my arm, I felt like I was just trying to hit the ball in the right direction. After my friend taught me this different posture, I felt like I controlled a metaphysical 'sphere' around myself, and I only had to 'capture' the ball in my 'sphere'. Hitting the ball was then less of a mental concern.

Interestingly, as long as I focused on my "sphere of influence', I was much more likely to hit the ball back, and within bounds too. The how and why is inexplicable to me.

All I can say is that my newly learned posture operates from an internal locus of control. The expectation is that the ball (and the resultant hit that follows) will "come to me", if I only line myself up with it while it's incoming. After I experimented with this new posture, I found that "It's easier to play better." When I said this to my courtmate, he knew I "got it".

Social Interaction is Like Playing Tennis

I often tell my students that having a conversation is like playing a game of tennis.

In this analogy, the ball is the subject, and returning the ball means that your response has to acknowledge and/or address what the speaker has said.

> "You have to hit the ball back to the other person, within the boundaries. If you don't you'll lose the game."

I was tutoring a young Taiwanese boy a few years ago, and he was afraid to talk with me in English. In order to relieve his tension and lighten the mood with a diversion, I told him how having a conversation is like playing a game of tennis, and then I challenged him to have a conversation with me like we were playing a game of tennis. He did well at first, but after a time, he grew tired and abruptly changed the subject. Then I pointed that out to him. "You dropped the ball! I win the game and you lose!" He just kept talking about the other subject. Then I said, "Why didn't you hit the ball back to me? Why did you change the subject?" Then he covered his face with his hands and said, "I'm afraid!"

IME, adults have the same difficulty in maintaining authentic dialogue, but younger students are more willing to admit that they can't play well. Once adults grow tired of the emotion work arising from social interaction and/or verbal interlocution, it takes real humility and strength of character to resist dismissing the conversation (and the person, too).

Confidence — "Use It or Lose it!"

Many skills, such as tennis or public speaking, are performed better if you can relax and "just let it flow". That is self-acceptance, farts, warts, quirks, mistakes, and all, and this is also the foundation of authentic confidence. In this, you psychologically isolate yourself from all the opinions and reactions of others, reject the fear of a negative evaluation, and focus solely on the execution of action within a state of Flow, no matter how good or bad your skill may be. That, my friend, is true confidence leading to glory.

Now you shall think diligently upon that, dear reader, because in my profession, I am most famous for teaching students confidence. Take heed.

Also, no matter how good you may be, if you don't play tennis in a while, or have regular conversations and social interactions with trusted others, you'll lose skill and play lousy. You'll also get tired and sore more quickly. "Use it or Lose it!"

I do not mean to say that you'll lose a natural or spiritual gifting from the Lord, but only that you'll fall out of practice and be less effective. Your gift is your irrevocable purpose.

Notes on Tennis Rackets

Years ago, when I started playing tennis (~2002), Wilson was one of the low to middle quality brands, and Head and Prince were the best brands. (Most all companies make high and low end rackets, but I'm referring to the companies' reputations.) But now, Wilson is highly reputed and Prince has fallen behind. Head remains one of the best.

Nowadays, the most popular rackets used by recreational players are, in this order…

1. Babolat Pure Drive 2021

2. Babolat Pure Aero 2023
3. Wilson Blade 98
4. Yonex EZONE 100 V7
5. Head Radical
6. Wilson Clash

Babolat is the oldest tennis racket manufacturer in the world and also one of the most popular, worldwide. They make light, good quality, all-purpose rackets for non-professional players. Babolat is a French company, hence the name, but the name means “old lady years” in Polish. Ha ha!

Recently, Babolat has invested heavily in research and development. Their current tennis rackets are packed with many technological innovations that other manufacturers have yet to replicate. One interesting new feature is tiny pulleys on the racket that allow the strings to move, providing more versatility and spin.

The rackets most often used by professional players are Babolat, Head, Wilson, and Yonex, in that order. However, professional players have their rackets heavily customized, and then they’re painted to resemble the rackets they’re being paid to endorse.

- Rafael Nadal endorses the Babolat Pure Aero racket.
- Dominic Thiem endorses the Babolat Pure Drive racket.

Is Mysticism Ecumenical?

Perceiving the power and glory of God is not unique to Christianity.

A while back, one controversial commenter, Aaron MacDonald*, had the idea that I was singlehandedly allowing the Christian Manosphere to be taken over by Islam by allowing historical architectural landmarks to be attributed to Muslim interpretations.

Whut!?! Yeah… Right! /S

His question,

> "Is this an attempt at "Abrahamic Religions" unity?"

brought a smile to my face.

To be clear, I am not making any attempt to unite Abrahamic Religions or whatever.

However, I do have a few things to say about ecumenicalism — as seen through the lens of Mysticism. Perhaps if I explain my views more clearly, I can alleviate any remaining confusion.

Case Study — Truth is Ecumenical

I once took a trip to China in 2002 to teach English. One of the men who went with my group was a Protestant Minister. After we had arrived at our destination in a very rural area of southern China, he marveled for days, saying, "God is here!" I asked him what he meant by that and what he had expected to find. He answered, "I didn't know what I would find here, but I sure never expected to find God here." I thought his statement displayed his ignorance of the omnipresence of God, but at the same time, hearing him say these things was both refreshing and very humbling to me.

Yes, God exists in pagan nations and cultures!

There are people all over the world who recognize the power, grace, and beauty of God and are at a loss to describe it in words. As such, the religion that is most familiar to people tends to provide the language in which these observations and mystical experiences are interpreted and expressed. Thus, it is not surprising that many religions share some of the same conceptualizations and teachings, although they appear in different words and perspectives from one religion to the next.

Therefore, I am ecumenical in so far as recognizing that most all "true" religions attempt to provide a theoretical understanding of metaphysical phenomena with the recognition that spiritual truth is buried therein, and that these phenomena are universal to all men.

God's Law is Written on the Hearts of All Men

In his famous sermon on Mars Hill, the Apostle Paul described the faith of those who had never heard the gospel.

> [22] So Paul stood in the midst of the Areopagus and said, "Men of Athens, I see that you are very religious in all respects. [23] For while I was passing through and examining the objects of your worship, I also found an altar with this inscription, 'TO AN UNKNOWN GOD.' Therefore, what you worship in ignorance, this I proclaim to you.
> [26] and He made from one man every nation of mankind to live on all the face of the earth, having determined their appointed times and the boundaries of their habitation, [27] that they would seek God, if perhaps they might feel around for Him and find Him, though He is not far from each one of us; [28] for in Him we live and move and exist, as even some of your own poets have said, 'For we also are His descendants.'
> [30] So having overlooked the times of ignorance, God is now proclaiming to mankind that all people everywhere are to repent, [31] because He has set a day on which He will judge the world in righteousness through a Man whom He has appointed, having furnished proof to all people by raising Him from the dead."
> Excerpts from St. Paul's sermon on Mars Hill, Acts 17:22-31 (NASB)

God's proclamation that all people everywhere are to repent (verse 30) continues to reverberate to the present day, and since the global reach of the internet, it is now more important than ever.

Romans 2 levels the playing field with respect to religion [emphasis added].

> [1] Therefore you have no excuse, you foolish person, everyone of you who passes judgment; for in that matter in which you judge someone else, you condemn yourself; for you who judge practice the same things. [2] And we know that the judgment of God rightly falls upon those who practice such things. [3] But do you suppose this, you foolish person who passes judgment on those who practice such things, and yet does them as well, that you will escape the judgment of God? [4] Or do you think lightly of the riches of His kindness and restraint and patience, not knowing that the kindness of God leads you to repentance? [5] But because of your stubbornness and unrepentant heart you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, [6] who will repay each person according to his deeds: [7] to those who by perseverance in doing good seek glory, honor, and immortality, He will give eternal life; [8] but to those who are self-serving and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, He will give wrath and indignation.
> [9] There will be tribulation and distress for every soul of mankind who does evil, for the Jew first and also for the Greek, [10] but glory, honor, and peace to everyone who does what is good, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. [11] For there is no partiality with God.
> [12] For all who have sinned without the Law will also perish without the Law, and all who have sinned under the Law will be judged by the Law; [13] for it is not the hearers of the Law who are righteous before God, but the doers of the Law who will be justified. [14] For when Gentiles who do not have the Law instinctively perform the requirements of the Law, these, though not having the Law, are a law to themselves, [15] in that they show the work of the Law written in their hearts, their conscience testifying and their thoughts alternately accusing or else defending them, [16] on the day when, according to my gospel, God will judge the secrets of mankind through Christ Jesus.
> Romans 2 (NASB)

> [17] But if you call yourself a Jew and rely upon the Law and boast in God, [18] and know His will and distinguish the things that matter, being instructed from the Law, [19] and are confident that you yourself are a guide to people who are blind, a light to those in darkness, [20] a corrector of the foolish, a teacher of the immature, possessing in the Law the embodiment of knowledge and of the truth — [21] you, therefore, who teach someone else, do you not teach yourself? You who preach that one is not to steal, do you steal? [22] You who say that one is not to commit adultery, do you commit adultery? You who loathe idols, do you rob temples? [23] You who boast in the Law, through your breaking the Law, do you dishonor God? [24] For “the name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you,” just as it is written.
> [25] For indeed circumcision is of value if you practice the Law; but if you are a violator of the Law, your circumcision has turned into uncircumcision. [26] So if the uncircumcised man keeps the requirements of the Law, will his uncircumcision not be regarded as circumcision? [27] And he who is physically uncircumcised, if he keeps the Law, will he not judge you who though having the letter of the Law and circumcision are a violator of the Law? [28] For he is not a Jew who is one outwardly, nor is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh. [29] But he is a Jew who is one inwardly; and circumcision is of the heart, by the Spirit, not by the letter; and his praise is not from people, but from God.
> Romans 2 (NASB)

I might summarize all this as saying that whatever church one attends doesn’t matter as much as one’s personal (i.e. conscientious and mystical faith) relationship with God. To God, each man stands or falls on his own merit — NOT on grounds of whether he attended a certain church, or faithfully performed all the sacraments and other rigamarole. This is essentially what was concluded from the Christian Mysticism Debate.

Mysticism and Sin

Sin is seductively gratifying partly because it is forbidden, not just by law and society, but by every person. Even the most godless are aware that sin is bad. But in addition to the instant gratifications of sin, the human desire to experience unconditional love, in spite of our sin, draws us to sin like moths to a flame. Modern thinking rebrands this as 'acceptance' and 'tolerance'.

However, sin has consequences, and for the most part, the consequences are what earmarks something as a sin. The overlap is not coincidental.

Of course, there is some variation, as Info wrote.

> "One must regard the outcomes of Righteousness and Wickedness as Probabilistic on the Individual level. Blessings and cursings as more apparent on the group level.
> Righteous people are more likely to get blessed, but not always. Wicked people are more likely to be cursed, but not always."

Obedience to the Lord, both individual and collective, is good for the individual man, good for the church, good for the community, good for the nation, and good for civilization. For the most part, sin erodes and destroys all these in varying degrees of immediacy and severity. In fact, up until the mid 20th century, Christianity was equated with Civilization, and vice versa, as a matter of common sense. We have totally forgotten this. Patriarchal Christianity IS Civilization! The underlying thesis of Helen Andrew's essay — and the social degradation from which it draws its thesis — is proof.

Epilogue

All these things that St. Paul wrote almost two millennia ago are just as true today as they were back then.

Just as God is no respecter of persons, true faith is no respecter of religions. Now that Western Christianity is falling apart at the seams, more people are beginning to recognize this.

It would be wrong to say that all Catholics go to hell simply because they don't have a "born again" experience in their catechism.

It would be wrong to say that all Protestants go to hell simply because they don't go to confessional or mass, or participate in the ritual sacraments.

Just as Catholics and Protestants fall into the trap of esteeming their own liturgical interpretation of God's Authority (through either ecumenicalism or scripture, respectively) as correct and all others heretical, and thereby fall into the sin of sectarianism, likewise, those who have been given the gospel of Christ find it easy to esteem the Western interpretations of Christianity as correct — as corrupted as they are, and which have long abandoned mysticism which is the root of faith — and all other forms of religion as heathen, even though the latter may cling to a mystical knowledge of God by faith.

Therefore, I think it would be wrong to say that all Buddhists, Muslims, et al. automatically go to hell simply because they've never completed Catholic catechism or heard the story of Jesus' crucifixion and resurrection and had a "Born Again" experience (per Protestantism). God can redeem a Buddhist just as easily as He can shake a converged churchian out of the gynocentric idolatry of the Blue Pill mentality (as many of us once were). Maybe more easily with the way things are looking now. At least Buddhists and Muslims recognize the importance of authority and Headship, and that QTπ fluff stuff is a sin. Not so with today's so-called Christian church.

Believe it or not, those who are faithful in other religions also receive God's blessings. If this makes the reader angry or envious, then perhaps Romans 2:17-29 (quoted above) is relevant, except in this case, Romans 2 is relevantly modernized as,

> "But if you call yourself a Christian / Catholic / Protestant and rely upon the Bible / Church and boast in God…"
> You who preach that "all persons are created equal (in the eyes of God)", do you not discriminate those who come to your church based on their age, marital status, social class, and SMV? [22] You who say that marriage is a sacrament, do you not have premarital sex and practice birth control? You who loathe other religions, do you tithe regularly? [23] You who boast in the Bible / Sacraments, through your breaking the fundamental Law of God, do you dishonor your religion? For Christianity is blasphemed among non-Christians because of you.

It is blasphemed precisely because God's Law is written on the hearts of all men (as discussed above), and they intuitively know that Western Churchianity is committing blasphemy by attaching progressive Feminism and all the sins thereof as an intrinsic part of Christian living.

Summary

I am not saying that all religions are the same. They are not.

I am not saying that "all paths lead home" or something like that.

I am not saying that different religions should settle their scores and live in peace. That isn't going to happen.

I am indifferent about ecumenical conferences, councils, and communications, as I know these will never supersede the confines of their respective doctrines. However, I do think it is good that there is more dialogue between the various Christian sects and denominations.

Pastor Cliffe Knechtle and his son, Stuart.

I am saying that if you could somehow make a comprehensive survey of every Christian church and the true doctrines among these churches, and if you can take it all in, you'll realize that faith in Christ is the central tenet of Christianity. Christ provides the unconditional love that humanity craves and searches for through sin. Christ provides the purpose for suffering, the motivation for repentance, and the beatific vision of redemption. Everything else involves how that faith is realized, verbalized, and lived out.

Those religions that recognize Jesus Christ as Lord are closer to the Truth, and thus, those who confess this Truth are open to greater blessings from God. They are also more intensely targeted by Satan in an attempt to sully God's reputation, which we have learned is very important to Him.

Those churches / religions that prioritize Covenant living within a small community of believers are more likely to experience the daily joys and eternal blessings of this Truth. IMO, very few churches offer this kind of fellowship.

Ultimately, we can't know the answer to the question of who is elect on this side of the eternal (although you yourself can know your own destiny), so all we can do is to love and care for those whom God has put within our domain. Moreover, I prefer not to put God's power and grace into a box of doctrinal teachings informed by "Enlightened" philosophies — teachings which have been corrupted for centuries.

For all these reasons, modern Christian spirituality is turning away from church affiliations and doctrinal teachings, and embracing the mystical, as it should be, I think. We lament the disintegration of the church and its influence over society (encapsulated in Aaron Renn's "Negative World" thesis). But it would be foolish not to recognize this as the resurrection of authentic faith and the beginning of a new revival.

Thus Saith Ye Olde Red Pill Lore

Red Pill wisdom has become the new standard.

Intro

Back in 2018, I noticed that there exists a certain consciousness conveyed through certain themes, topics, and trends that swept through the Manosphere and the wider internet, and that these ontological concepts and paradigms extended for a period of about 21 months, which I called an “Internet Age”. At that time, I decided to write review summaries of happenings within the Manosphere during these periods.

Previous summaries included the following posts.

- Σ Frame: The Evolution of the Red Pill (2018/12/31)
- Σ Frame: The Manosphere Reshuffles its Deck (2020/9/2)
- Σ Frame: Red Pill Rollover (2022/6/17)
- Σ Frame: Red Pill Restructure (2024/3/15)

In previous summaries, much of the writings covered changes within the Manosphere, such as new blogs, fading blogs, and those making an exit, as well as a broader commentary on real sociosexual eventides and other phenomenon.

But nowadays, most internet activity is taking place in video format, including monologues, dialogues, speeches, and debates. There are so few Manosphere blogs extant, and so little activity therein, that I hardly cover these anymore, except for a few mentions of noteworthy occurrences.

Meticulous Musings

In the previous report, I described the Internet Age that is now coming to an end.

> "In the next 'internet age' of 21 months, I predict there will be a major reorientation of philosophy in the new Manosphere 2.0 / Red Pill 2.0. The old stuff will be meticulously picked through, some of it will be condensed into new comprehensive summaries, and some of it revised and presented again with a modern spin. There will be a continued exploration of the metaphysical and mystical apprehension of old truths, and these insights will yield a fresh appreciation for the age old tenets of faith."

This is exactly what we have seen. As reflected in the title of this post, Red Pill perspectives have not just gone mainstream, it has become the new standard for internet discussions. Almost every comment thread on every blog post, tweet, and video, contains someone chiming in with a Red Pill perspective, and thereby shifting the discussion back to reality. For those of us who have been around the Manosphere since before the days of Red Pill persecution (ca. 2018), this is quite satisfying.

In the coming 'Internet Age', I anticipate there will be a massive shift to any and all things metaphysical, including Christian musings on Mystic / Romantic Faith, mysticism, Noeticism, Theosis, etc., as well as the darker areas of psychological pathologies, such as Insecure Attachment Styles, dissociation, personality disorders, Psychological Projection, sorcery, and witchcraft.

The Impact of Σ Frame

Readers might allow me to devote a few words to toot my own horn here.

Many of the concepts and ideas that I wrote about in the past are now rather common around the Based / Red Pill sphere.

Between 2020 to 2024, many of the major topics that were written or discussed on Σ Frame eventually surfaced in Manosphere 2.0 videos within a time frame of 2 weeks to 2 months, and from there, they went mainstream within 2 years. Key words and concepts that I emphasized and explained in my writings, like agency, boundaries, discernment, Headship, sanctification, sexual pair bonding, and the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, are now rather common in public conversations, even within secular content. Praise the Lord!

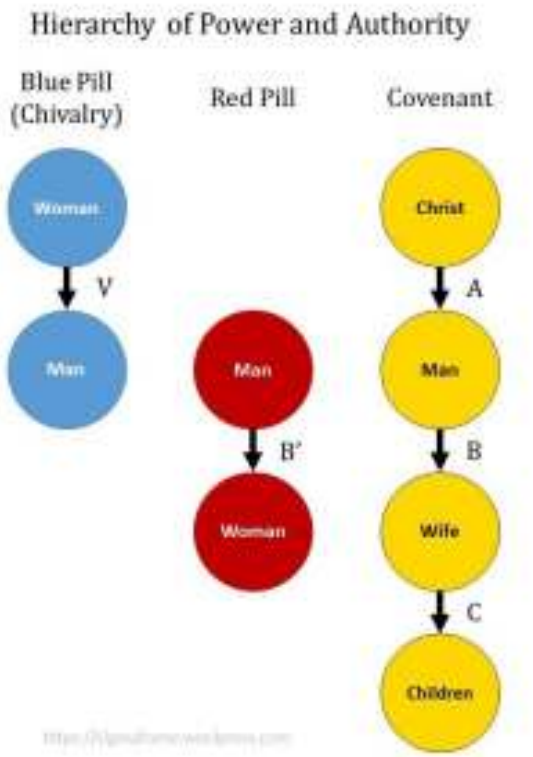
For a while, I had the impression that I and the other authors at Σ Frame were singlehandedly shaping public discourse. Others, like RPA, believed I simply had a phenomenal track record of staying ahead of the trend. Whatever this phenomenon was, Σ Frame was on top of things, and I'll give God the credit for inspiring me with topics via prayer. This direct feed of content source has diminished since then, although it still occurs on occasion.



If I had to pick out the most important and the most high-impact concept I've introduced to widespread awareness, it would have to be the concepts first expressed in The Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Archetype (2021/5/21), and touched on in many subsequent posts. Based on Ephesians 5:22-24, this structural concept of a man's relationship to his wife, illustrated in the adjacent image, has become widely known, even to become the centrally recognized archetype for a proper Christian marital structure.

The second most important and most popular concept I've covered is the awareness of personal Agency. Ever since I wrote an extensive two-month-long exploration of Agency in late 2022, the idea has been mentioned in almost every video or comment thread in the Based / RP sphere.

The third most impactful insight is that of sexual pair bonding — the biological reality behind Alpha Widows — that women can only have sexual intercourse with 5 men at most, before they become jaded, spent, and unable to bond, and that one of the purposes of chastity and marriage is to preserve the joy and strength of this bond. This concept is now frequently cited among Based / RP content producers.

Following these, the concepts of Boundaries (covered in 2024/1) and Discernment (covered in multiple posts since 2019) are everywhere now. They are practically bywords and shibboleths for Based thought!

All this is a result of prayer, observing ground-truth reality, and pointing to God's Word in scripture.

He is mighty!

If you care to do so, in the comments below, please chime in with what Σ Frame has imparted to your own awareness.

All the best~!

Manifestation

Jack · 17 December 2025 · Archived copy · Original

What is the metaphysical nature of it?

Readership: All
Theme: Glory; Christian / Mystical Awareness
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

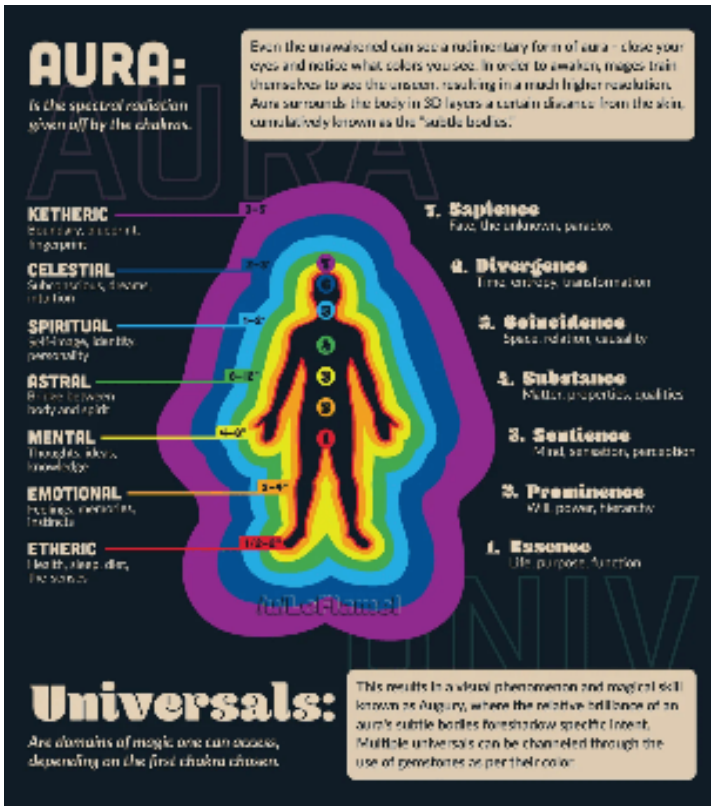
Intro

Over the past couple of years or so, there has been a sharp increase in the focus on metaphysical phenomenon.

A lot of these content producers are women, not surprisingly. The only women who are NOT solipsistic, and who therefore have something interesting to add to the cultural discussion, are those who have developed an awareness of the metaphysical. But this is no coincidence. Solipsism is the default state when metaphysical awareness is absent.

Most of the time, this appears as something rather dark and manipulative, like W!tchcr@ft. Here, we see people have discovered the power of the human mind, of faith, and mysticism without really understanding what is going on or how it works.

We see a lot of abstract descriptive language with words like ‘chakras’, ‘consciousness’, ‘frequency’, ‘manifestation’, personal ‘energy’ levels, ‘radiate’, ‘resonance’, ‘wavelength’, ‘vibration’, etc.



A lot of physics terms for those who know nothing about physics. Probably because physics provides the most suitable nomenclature for describing the metaphysical.

There is an assumed analogy of a person being like a radio transmitter. Actually, this is true. The human heart generates a faint electromagnetic signal that can be detected with instrumentation up to about 3 meters away on average. Some individuals radiate fields up to 50 meters away.

But as Info and RonTomlinson2 observed, respectively, these words are like the 2D outline of a 3D object, and the idea can't be put into words. Furthermore, most of them are fumbling in the dark, grasping for words to describe that which cannot be verbalized.

Most of these content producers cum grand gurus are focused on how to use this phenomenon to alleviate suffering, attain wealth, control people, find love, get action or attention, and so on — in short, fulfilling fleshly desires.

I haven't seen any perspectives that recognize it as an expression of faith or the power of God behind it.

There is good reason to doubt all this as being 'real', but for those who still have doubts as to whether Manifestation is really authentic, here I'll offer a few examples of Metaphysical sensations and responses that most readers should be able to identify with.

Case Study 1 — The Weight of One's Gaze

Did you ever get a surreal feeling when someone was staring at you from across the room? You can feel the weight of their gaze, even though you may not be fully aware of what it is. You have this sudden impulse to jerk your head around to look in their direction, often without being consciously aware of it, and then you find someone is there staring at you.

Case Study 2 — The Impact of Attention

Did you ever have an experience in which someone calls your name to get your attention, and you automatically know at that moment — before they say anything — whether it will be either an uplifting or a discouraging interaction?

Did you ever wonder why women light up (or shut down cold) when you give them the least bit of sincere, undivided attention? Aside from the fact that they crave it as a form of sociosexual Affirmation, what exactly is communicated through that attention that they are craving? By granting her attention, it's like you're transmitting 'energy' from yourself directly into her. Literally. It's draining. Too much will turn you into a Simp.

Case Study 3 — In the Classroom

As a teacher, I've recognized metaphysical phenomenon in the classroom.

I've noticed that when certain people step into the classroom, the entire atmosphere of the room changes in some way. The mood of people in the room changes. Likewise, when certain people leave the room, the social / metaphysical environment is altered.

When I ask one question, students are enthusiastic. When I ask a different question, students disengage. Of course, which way the question turns usually involves what is required of them, but even so, they can sense this eventuality from the question itself — sometimes moments before I ask it. I can sense this too.

Case Study 4 — On the Job

When I first joined the workforce at the age of 18, I took a job as a die maker's apprentice. Work started at 6:00 in the morning, and ended at 3:30 p.m.

I was unaccustomed to waking up so early, and I expressed this concern to the boss.

He told me something that has stood out in my memory ever since.

He said, "Be sure to go to bed before 9:30 p.m. When you go to bed at night, tell yourself, "I will wake up at 4:30", and then hit your pillow three times."

I did it, and I was amazed that I woke up at 4:29 a.m., just seconds before my alarm went off.

That's the power of the human mind! Although few, if anyone, are aware of this power, much less use it for anything worthwhile.

Conclusions

Of course, Manifestation is true. It really "works".

- Realistically imagining how things will go and how things will turn out is often the deciding factor in how it actually plays out.
- The mindset you have going into an enterprise pretty much determines the overall impact and success of the result.

But how?

As illustrated through these case studies, there must be some sort of inherent mechanism of self-determination in what shall unfold. There must be some kind of metaphysical 'radiation' that the human heart can instinctively detect — one that ¡$c!əNcɛ! has not yet been able to explain.

That's the power of the subconscious mind.

In many ways, it's also the power of faith, and of prayer as well. However, the Christian faith concedes that there is a Higher Power at work. Otherwise, prayer would be ineffective. Think about that for a moment.

Ask and Ye Shall Receive

God's Loving Provision vs The Prosperity Gospel.

Intro

It's that time of the year when we're thinking about what gifts to buy for others. Or, if you planned ahead, you're thankful to be finished with your holiday hassles.

Lest we forget, this custom is a reflective imitation of the Lord's gracious gift of Himself to us.

But our habit of giving gifts freely is NOT how God gives to us, but rather, how we would prefer it to happen — as a $uRpRi$e! that is within our Control — that's what all the hassle is about — Control budget, Control spending, Maximize impact, Control outcome, Control… Somewhere in all this, we hope to enjoy it for a few moments — IF we Controlled everything well enough.

I do not mean to say that God is Anti-Control, or that He gives gifts with strings attached, although it often feels that way. But rather, He gives us gifts that equip us for His purposes, and only when we're ready and willing.

To illustrate what I mean, just ask yourself, "What are you getting from the Lord for Christmas this year?"

You won't wake up on Christmas morning and find that all your debts have been paid off by a wealthy philanthropist, or that you suddenly have the special gift of prophecy.

It might happen, but probably not.

It's out of your Control.

Asking from God the Father

Jesus said,

> [7] "Ask, and it will be given to you; seek, and you will find; knock, and it will be opened to you. [8] For everyone who asks receives, and the one who seeks finds, and to the one who knocks it will be opened.
> Matthew 7:7-8 (KJV)

However, these things will not be served to us on a silver platter for us to poke at and sift through before making a selection, and then gripe, snigger, and turn up our noses at the offerings, as people are prone to do whenever eating at a restaurant. No. We do not have that luxury of choice because we are not in the power position. We did not pay the cost. We have to ask. We have to seek. We have to go out searching. We may have to co-pay a fraction of the cost out of our own wealth, if only as a token demonstration that we are serious enough to be trusted with the answer.

But in John 16:24, Jesus gives us hope that our asking, seeking, searching, and pressing on the good graces of others (i.e. the Lord) will not be done in vain.

> Truly, truly, I say to you, whatever you ask of the Father in my name, he will give it to you. [24] Until now you have asked nothing in my name. Ask, and you will receive, that your joy may be full.
> John 16:23-24 (ESV)

Jesus tells us that the Father wishes for His gifts to give us JOY. JOY! Ask and you will receive, and your JOY will be complete. But instead of receiving these gifts with JOY, we stammer in indecision because we find the gifts are life-changing, or else not exactly what we might have expected. Our desire for Control robs us of that JOY.

Asking from Earthly Fathers and Others

Our prayers to God are not unlike our requests to our fathers. Our prayers are based on a relationship, as Jesus points out in Matthew 7:9-11.

> [9] Or which one of you, if his son asks him for bread, will give him a stone? [10] Or if he asks for a fish, will give him a serpent? [11] If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask him!

Yes, the Father gives good gifts. We can trust Him in asking for things. It may not always be exactly what we want or what we expect, but it is what God deems good for us.

If a child asks his father for something the father knows to be hurtful, the request is denied. The child may be frustrated and unhappy when he doesn't get what he asked for, but he should trust his father. Conversely, when the child asks for something that the father knows is beneficial, the father will eagerly provide it because he loves his child.

OTOH, I believe most of the things we ask for are NOT motivated by genuine spiritual needs, or fellowship, or even simply joy, but are instead cravings for fleshly comforts, conveniences, and satisfactions, many of which come at a cost to others, or to avoid the suffering that may be necessary for our sanctification.

Hence the warning:

> "Where do wars and fights come from among you? Do they not come from your desires for pleasure that war in your members? [2] You lust and do not have. You murder and covet and cannot obtain. You fight and war. Yet you do not have because you do not ask. [3] You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may spend it on your pleasures."
> James 4:1-3 (KJV)

Pleasure is NOT the same as JOY. I believe this means we need to have a good purpose for the things we ask for. But maybe not for everything. Sometimes God has His Own purposes.

Case Study 1: The French Fry Incident

I want to tell a little story that brought James 4:1-3 into sharp perspective for me.

Once when my daughters were younger, I took them to McDonald's. They each had their own meals, but somehow, they started fighting over French fries. One of them thought the other had more fries in her meal, followed by pinching fries back and forth, and this soon erupted into a squabble.

In response, I went to the counter and ordered 10 large fries. They had to cook another batch to fill the order, so my daughters got to bicker over who had more fries for a few minutes longer. When the fries were finished and served, I emptied the cartons of fries onto the tray, walked back to the table where they were sitting, and flung the whole tray of hot French fries into the air such that they fell all over the table. To them, it was literally raining French fries!

The quarrel ended immediately, replaced by incredible squeals of JOY and laughter. They ate a few more fries but soon became very satisfied, not only their stomachs, but also their souls. I sternly told them that they should NOT resort to bickering, fighting, and stealing, but to ask "The Father" if they wanted something.

Conditions for Asking

We have another condition to the promise of "ask and receive" in John 14:14, "You may ask Me for anything in My Name, and I will do it." Here, Jesus does not promise His disciples anything and everything they want; rather, He instructs them to ask "in My Name." To pray in Jesus' Name is to pray on the basis of Jesus' authority, but it also involves praying according to the will of God, for the will of God is what Jesus always did (John 6:38). This truth is stated explicitly in 1 John 5:14, "If we ask anything according to his will, he hears us." Moreover, our requests must be congruent with the will of God if they are to be answered affirmatively.

The promise of "ask and receive," even with its conditions, is not intended to disappoint, but to grant us JOY. He promises to supply what we need when we "seek first his kingdom and his righteousness" (Matthew 6:33). Of course, what we 'want' is not always what we 'need', but there is no chance of things we 'truly' need not being in God's will. If what we want is not in God's will, then we really shouldn't want to receive it. But isn't that the cause of all frustration? God knows what is good for us and is faithful and loving to say "No!" to selfish and foolish prayers, no matter how much we want what we're asking for.

> [2] Count it all joy, my brothers, when you meet trials of various kinds, [3] for you know that the testing of your faith produces steadfastness. [4] And let steadfastness have its full effect, that you may be perfect and complete, lacking in nothing.
> [5] If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask God, who gives generously to all without reproach, and it will be given him. [6] But let him ask in faith, with no doubting, for the one who doubts is like a wave of the sea that is driven and tossed by the wind. [7] For that person must not suppose that he will receive anything from the Lord; [8] he is a double-minded man, unstable in all his ways.
> James 1:2-8 (ESV)

So we see that 'asking' does not just consist of mouthing words about things we 'think' we want, as so many are in the habit of thinking and doing. Authentic prayers of petition are more like an exploration of our hearts and an examination of our inner being, similar to what is described in Christ is in You (2023/4/3). We must identify our motivations, and discern God's will in the matter. We must consider how God can be glorified. We must ask in faith, with a vision, and with no doubts or second thoughts. IOW, we must 'believe'.

Case Study 2 — The Chopper from God

Here's another story that should help readers put all this into perspective.

I cannot name the number of times I have been struck by a meditative pondering on an experience or a thing, often imagining what it would like to do or have that particular thing. Then, just days later, I'm met with the opportunity to do or have that very exact thing.

Here's an example.

Once while I was on my way to class during my Ph.D. studies, I stopped at a traffic light. There in front of me was a man sitting on a full-sized Honda motorcycle. It was new, a subtle yet brilliant shade of green, and the chrome glistened in the golden morning sunlight. I looked at this motorcycle, I mean, really seeing it for all that it was — the design, the details, the lines, the form. I imagined what it would be like to own this motorcycle, and to ride it to school. I did not covet it per se, but rather, I relished in that imagination. It took me.

The very next day, my girlfriend told me her colleague was leaving the country and he had to sell his motorcycle. He wanted to sell it quickly, and so he was offering it for a very cheap price.

I went to see it, and it was exactly like the motorcycle I had seen the day before — only better! This one was a manual 5-speed. It had aftermarket modifications, including "ape-hanger" handlebars, extended front forks, and laker pipes that jutted long and low out the rear. (I don't think I had ever seen a motorcycle with laker pipes before that time.) It was what Americans would call a chopper. He sold it to me for NTD$18,000 (~USD$600).

The Lord Provideth!

I rode that motorcycle every day for the next 4 years — to school, to work, in the rain, in shivering temperatures, over the fragrant mountains in the early dawn hours when the dragonflies were thick, along the coast of the Taiwan strait while watching the sunset — everywhere.

One day, it was stolen, and 3 months later, it was recovered by the police. I made the necessary repairs and then continued to ride it until it was almost worn out.

Then, one day, I grew out of this 'phase', partly because the motorcycle was falling apart from constant use, and partly because it wasn't very reliable anymore. So then I sold it to the next very joyous owner.

I felt completely satisfied with the experience.

That's JOY! Not to mention all the worshipful experiences I had with God while riding this motorcycle all over the island paradise of Taiwan.

Summary of Christian / Mystical Awareness (2025/12)

Jack · 21 December 2025 · Archived copy · Original

Finishing off the year with some crucial insights.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Christian / Mystical Awareness
Length: 600 words

Overview

This month polished up some ideas that were introduced in an earlier theme, Awareness and Introspection, that aired in August and September of this year. I split this theme up because it was 3 months long, I needed more time to research and prepare these posts, and I wanted readers to get a fresh take on the posts below. Interestingly, it coincided with similar articles appearing around the sphere in December.

Closely related posts that appeared around the sphere during this month are included.

WTF is going on?

Readership: All
Theme: The Christian Red Pill

Intro

Jack's post, Thus Saith Ye Olde Red Pill Lore (2025/12/15) described how Red Pill wisdom has not just gone mainstream, it has become the new standard for based thought.

Funny timing. I was writing a note in a similar vein and planning on sending it in. Well, here it is.

On My Disengagement with The Manosphere

I have been away for more than a minute. The last time I posted here was a full year ago: Why I am "Red Pill" (2025/1/8). And that was on Jack's initiative, reposting something I had written ages ago (ca. 2018).

I stopped writing for several reasons:

- Everything is a doom spiral now.
- Reacting to current events gets tiring, especially these days.
- Discussing "Red Pill" concepts all the time is circling the drain, for me at least.
- I also don't believe the hyper focus on Red Pill stuff is that great for men, long term.
- When you read and write all day (as I do), it becomes exhausting to do so as a hobby.

But I'm still here. Checking in to give my respects to Ye Olde Faithful. Wishing you all the best~!

On the Blogosphere

Blogs are dead.

There has been a death of long form content, and a decline in both the audience and the demand for it.

WordPress has gone downhill, and requires additional apps to comment or create posts if you aren't on a desktop. WordPress killed itself with its stupid Jetpack thing. This makes writing or commenting a chore.

Meanwhile, Substack is more popular and simpler, but Substack killed comments and then monetized everything. The platform lacks commenters because you have to have your own Substack account in order to leave comments. It's designed to trap more authors and readers into Substack's microcosm, but it's not worth the trouble for most readers.

Everything is and has to be monetized now. As a result, most higher quality posts are stuck behind paywalls. It's exhausting. Again, not worth the trouble for most readers.

All interaction and debate has been outsourced to Twitter/X.

No one goes to Twitter/X for long-form content, but ironically, it remains the place where such debates happen. With responses lost in cyberspace, it's entirely awkward, hard to track, and totally inappropriate, but yet, here we are. Maybe that's exactly what TPTB intended.

On Grifters

In years past, I wrote a few posts criticizing grifters. Looking back, I think going after grifters was a mistake (outside of theological disputes), because I was wrong about grifters being effective. In fact, they had an important purpose in the grand scheme of things. They created a cult following of hungry young men, and brought a broader awareness of Red Pill concepts, thereby cementing these ideas for the next generations. And at this point in time, I'm not a fan of punching anyone who moves people to the Right.

On Churchianity

The church in America has failed its youth in every way imaginable. Everything is the fault of men. They don't encourage young family formation. They don't speak out against the cost of housing. They don't speak out about the lack of job opportunities for youth. The only message the church offers — whether Catholic, Protestant, Baptist, Presbyterian, or whatever — is, "Young women should go to college and find careers before they get married, and young men can go f_ck themselves with their bare fists. But magically, they should abstain from sex for a whole decade, and the man should forgive the woman if she is a ran through whore when she decides to settle for him and marry at the post-fertile age of 35. Oh, and if men use p0rn in the meantime, they are evil."

How inspiring. Give me a break from this crass, fake religiosity. I'm done.

On National Economics and Politics

On the political side, I was NOT wrong about how much of a disaster Trump 2.0 has been.

We celebrated having a Republican back on the porcelain throne after the embarrassing Biden nadir, but Trump has been an utterly disappointing disaster, and I couldn't imagine being vindicated this badly!

We've been flooded with immigrants, the crime rate continues to expand, every product is lower in quality and costlier than it was a few years ago, and it keeps on getting worse.

We expected Trump to curb the inflow of excess immigration. But in spite of his "Big Beautiful Wall", and other punitive measures on immigration, etc., the federally subsidized programs for immigrants (including illegals) still exist, and there continues to be a massive influx of both legal and illegal immigrants.

Housing costs have almost doubled since 2016. In some areas, it has gone up even higher than that. No one can afford a home, and people can barely afford to rent.

There are multiple reasons why.

- During COVID, a massive wave of New Englanders abandoned their expensive states to live in the South and work remotely from there.
- Retirees and wealthy people from coastal areas buying up homes in the Midwest and South for rentals.
- Combine that with companies relocating to more affordable regions.
- Corporate investors doing the same.

This has radicalized Millennials and Zoomers. They can't afford homes or to move. They just can't "stop drinking coffee and find a job" like Boomers could do in the past. There are NO jobs for them. Saving a hundred bucks or so a year does nothing when "starter" homes are over $200,000.

COVID accelerated everything and distanced everyone. Young people most affected. The only upside to that horrible time is the surplus time people had to complain on the internet and to consume dissident content.

Then people realized that their loss of opportunity wasn't a temporary loss from the recessions we keep having. Instead, it's an Asset Price Inflation combined with systemic replacement by foreign labor. A total bust for the average man.

Many have come to realize the uncomfortable truth that our system of Capitalism does not 'work'.

Capitalism / Corporatism has no regard for quality of life, social cohesion, or the welfare of its customers — only the bottom line on corporate profit, all else be d@mned.

The libertine element of Libertarianism actually won, and it's a f_ck!ng disaster. Gambling has proliferated, along with drug use. It's the whole reason why Trump had to label Fentanyl as a weapon of mass destruction. What a gaffe!

I think we are going to be experiencing the last days of relatively free speech online. X is already cracking down abroad, and the GOP all but admits they work for foreign states.

It feels like every day is a new level of WTF!?! And it's draining.

Welcomed Changes

There have been a few positive cultural changes over the last few years that I did not expect.

Back in 2018, when anything Red Pill literally spelled a Death Knell to anyone espousing it, I could have never predicted the success of the message.

The Red Pill really took off with Gen Zoomer and Gen Alpha on Twitter/X and TikTok, to the point that it's just common sense with many young men. As a result, the youth have become more Right Radicalized. And people are seeing through most of The Gynocentric Blue Pill / The Matrix™ on their own, thanks to social media, which is why TPTB will heavily restrict it.

Twitter/X has had its ups and downs, and is currently on an arc of censoring via shadow banning and social credit system; but nevertheless, ever since Musk bought it out and removed Leftist censorship, it has opened the floodgates to dissident thought.

Now, the general online Right Wing consensus is further to the Right than ever before.

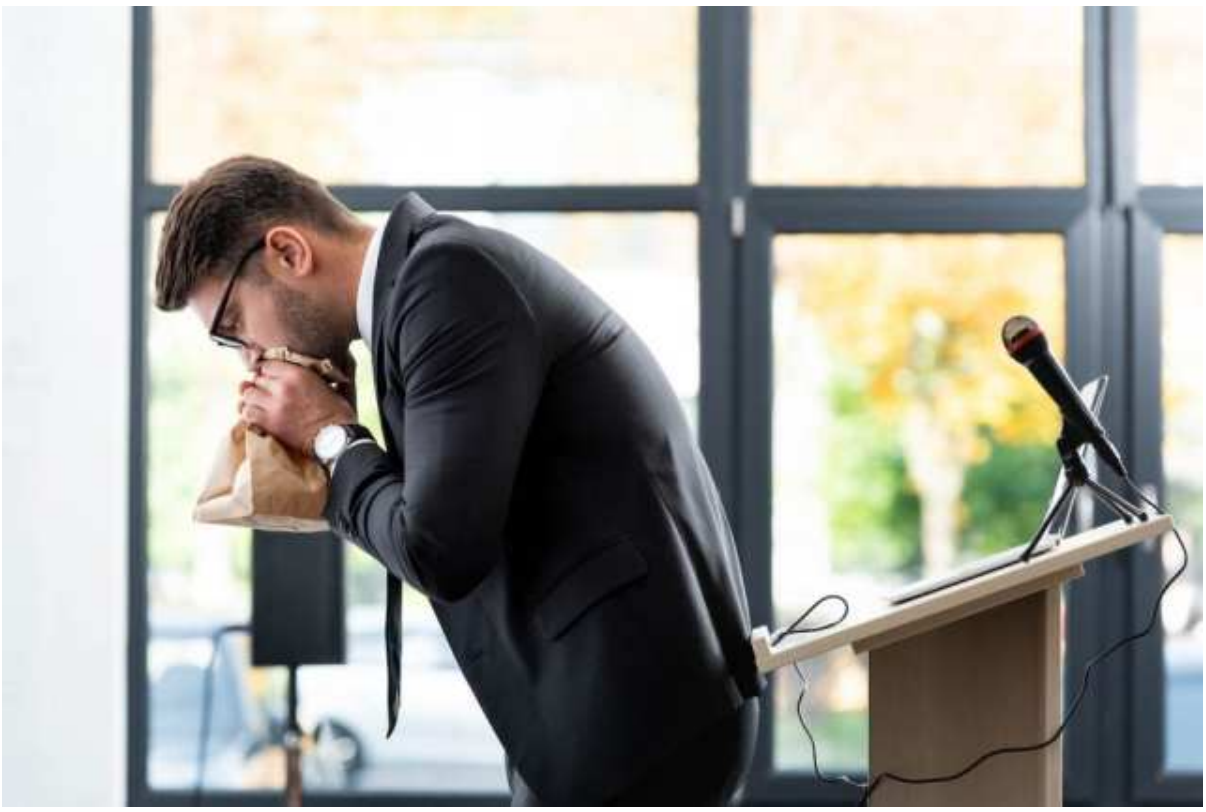
This has been so problematic for our society-destroying "elites" that they decided to ban TikTok and force the sale of it to — ahem — those beholden to a different foreign actor.

Years ago, when I wrote about Buckley and Con Inc. being a disaster, it was a fringe position. Now it's an accepted fact for most. Samuel Francis proved to be a prophet yet again.

We are moving closer to a change of political systems — NOT just parties, but systems. If things progress the way they are going, it will NOT be in favor of The Powers That Be™.

Conclusions

I believe people realize how rigged our system is. It's actually getting worse under the current joke of an administration. No matter who gets elected (like it even matters), some portion of the wealthy elite are rewarded while everything gets worse for the typical average American citizen.



People are waking up to the new reality, and it's not pretty at all.

- They realize the purpose of a government and a nation is (supposed) to serve the interests of its collective people as a group (which it doesn't).
- They realize that a diverse society (Hello immigrant friendly DIE W0kism!) has low social capital, is NOT cohesive, and doesn't 'work'.
- They realize that our society is built on ideals and social mores that no other society shares (and with good reason).
- They recognize that every social and political intuition is broken and actively works against them.

OTOH, they also realize that we live in a culture that values property rights, intellectual property rights, crediting those we borrow from (with respect to IP), honesty, and integrity. Everywhere else has a striver culture where you are expected to barter, game everything, and scam for social dominance.

Something has to give. Something has to break. Y'all watch now, and you'll see it happen. Soon. Very soon, and I'll cringe when it does.

We're almost there.

History, Goals, and Purposes

Even in this age of apostasy and tribulation, God continues working throughout the lives of many men, as well as my own. I have always written with the conviction that my testimony, my life experiences, and the things I've learned are valuable to other men, and that it's important for me to share these things for the benefit of others. It is for this reason that I've had a habit to pray frequently about the purpose of this blog, what I should write about, and what men need to read and know.

My work as a Blogger began on March 7, 2008. My original purpose for blogging was to distribute teaching materials (for a Sunday school class I was teaching at that time) in an easily accessible and shareable format, and to foment discussion. The general appeal, and the quality that made my teachings popular, was its focus on applying the scriptures to the metaphysical incongruences of human nature through an ontological lens that would now be called a Mystical or Romantic Christian approach.

A couple of years after this, my first marriage blew up, and my ministry was lost as a consequence. I spent a few years wandering and wondering. I remarried in 2016, largely to contain my strong predisposition towards sexual immorality, out of respect to my conscience and my relationship with the Lord.

I belatedly discovered the Red Pill in early 2017, and after digesting RP content for several months, I learned to view my past intersexual experiences through a whole new and different Red Pill light. From this, I found a renewed purpose in blogging. So on September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and began concentrating on Red Pill topics. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years. Since then, posts have been more frequent and more regular.

Early writings (2009-2018) were sporadic epiphanies focusing on the incongruences of human nature and their relation to the spiritual. There was a brief transitional period in 2018 and another in 2024 that could be described as a meta-discussion of the Manosphere / Red Pill (which may be of great value to interested web historians). Tri-weekly posting along monthly themes began in January 2020 and has continued to the present day, and other noteworthy voices in the Christian Red Pill (CRP) sphere soon joined the authors' panel.

Shortly after Dalrock retired from blogging in January 2020, long-time CRP readers nominated the Σ Frame blog as Dalrock's successor. In 2021, the Σ Frame blog was the most popular blog in the Christian Manosphere, as most of the others had stopped or slowed down posting. This popularity continued through 2022 and 2023, and waned in 2024.

As this blog has matured, the overriding focus has targeted "Rebuilding Christian Masculinity", with an emphasis on Agency, Boundaries, Christian virtues, Headship Authority, emotional and spiritual maturity, Patriarchy, sanctification, sexual pair bonding, the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, and spiritual discernment, encapsulated in the pages, posts, and projects listed below.

Many of the terms and ideas originating from the Σ Frame blog have spread throughout the Manosphere and have gone mainstream, with a lag time ranging from 2 weeks to 2 years.

One thing that has made Σ Frame a staple of the CRP is the emphasis on Biblical and philosophical purity, informed by and juxtaposed with the noetic sense, and sifting out truth from various Biblical, Blue Pill, and Red Pill concepts, and determining how these are to be properly applied to Christian Men's lives.

A large number of men have stated that reading Σ Frame has changed their lives for the better and/or has given them hope in an age of apostasy when masculinity has come under increasing attack from both the church and secular culture.

More about my goals and purposes in blogging are summarized in the About page.

Authors

The authors of Σ Frame aim to provide clarity about what it means to be a Christian Man in the 21st century, and how Christian masculinity is to be demonstrated in an era of shifting sands.

Recognizing the need for multiple perspectives, checks, and balances, I've prayed for other men to join me in blogging at Σ Frame. Over the years, there have been regular contributions from around a couple of dozen authors, with a few of them joining the authors' panel. These authors have come and gone over the years as the times and seasons of life have changed.

In late June of 2025, there was a seismic shift in the ontology of metaphysical being, ushering in a new age of Human action and awareness. Since that time, Jack has been the only remaining regular author on Σ Frame.

In summary, the authors for 2025 included…

1. Jack (158 posts)
2. Oscar (3 posts)
3. Red Pill Apostle (3 posts)
4. Anonymous Contributor (2 posts)
5. Jack, Red Pill Apostle, and Thedeti (2 posts)
6. Frank Chalmers (1 post)
7. Jack and Red Pill Apostle (1 post)
8. Lexet (1 post)
9. Oscar and Jack (1 post)
10. Tubal Cain (1 post)
11. 2 reblogged posts from Ed Hurst and F. Roger Devlin

In addition, Jack wrote 4 posts at Spawny's Space this year.

We are truly grateful to all these who have invested their thoughts, time, and energy to produce these posts, and to all the readers who have contributed their insights to the discussions at Σ Frame.

Readers

The Top 10 Countries with the Most Viewers

In 2025, the readership fell for the third consecutive year. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. United States: 72,599 (-32.9%)
2. United Kingdom: 3,475 (-32.5%)
3. Canada: 2,855 (+3.6%)
4. Switzerland: 1,928 (-1.6%)
5. Australia: 1,408 (-31.0%)
6. Croatia: 1,156 (+30.2%)
7. Netherlands: 1,068 (-34.5%)
8. Russia: 1,049 (+80.2%)
9. Brazil: 903 (+545.0%)
10. Czechia: 877 (-76.1%)

Total number of viewing countries/principalities in 2025: 120 (-10.4%)

Croatia, Russia, and Brazil (!?!) displaced Taiwan, India, and Nigeria this year.

In the past, I covered Taiwan and India periodically.

India continues to suffer from Western Feminism / Progressivism, but we hear about it much less. I suppose that is a good sign.

In 2025, Taiwan almost completely eradicated Western Feminist / W0ke cultural influences, all of which were more or less reduced to footnotes that say, "Don't discriminate".

In 2026, I'll give more coverage to Croatia, Russia, and Brazil.

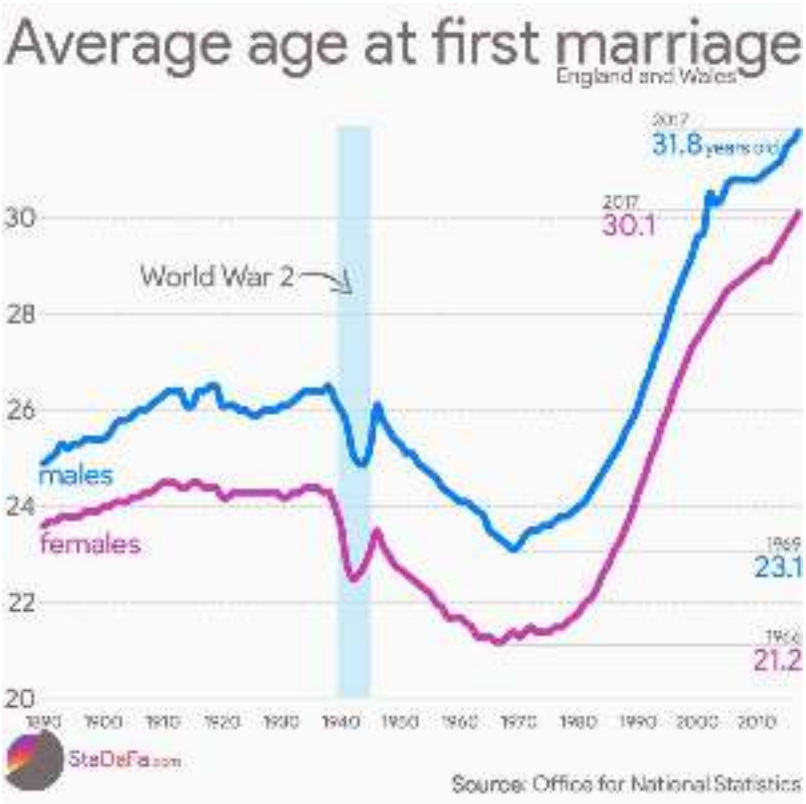
Total number of Subscribers: 251 (+2.0%)

The number of subscribers has hovered around 250 for the past few years, peaking at 253 in 2025. I have a creepy suspicion that this number is capped by WordPress. In the past, several readers have reported that they were unknowingly removed from following and had to subscribe again.

The Most Prolific Commentators

The total number of comments has decreased from last year, but the most active commentators retained their places in 2025. Commentator SurfDumb pushed Bardelys the Magnificent off the list this year.

1. Oscar: 3.9K (+5.4%)
2. Thedeti: 3.2K (+3.2%)
3. Jack: 2.9K (+7.4%)
4. Info: 1.7K (+6.3%)
5. Feeriker: 1.4K (+7.7%)
6. Red Pill Apostle: 961 (+20.3%)
7. SurfDumb: 212



Site Changes in 2024

Appearance

For several years, the banner image displayed a collection of old playing cards, all Jack of diamonds, and these images were changed every season (4 images, 4 times a year). In July 2025, in recognition of the seismic shift in the ontology of metaphysical being, these images were replaced by a simple image of nature and trees to reflect the changing spirit of the times.

Sidebar

On 2025/10/6, I added the Radix Fidem logo to the sidebar. When this action was done, the long list of Manosphere links disappeared for some unknown reason and I could not figure out how to restore it.

Content

Projects

There are several long running projects that have become a regular staple on Σ Frame. Some of these projects developed early and quickly, while others have taken years to develop. These projects are more or less finished, but occasionally a new post is added.

1. Archetypes
2. Courtship Models
3. Masculine Dominion
4. Discipline in Marriage
5. Problems with The Red Pill

Themes

The writing projects in 2025 were arranged in monthly themes, as has been done since 2020. The themes for 2025 were as follows. (Links go to the theme's index / summary.)

1. January-March — The Gift of Singleness
2. April — Whorable Wonders
3. May-July — Validation
4. August-September — Awareness and Introspection*
5. October — Girl Game
6. November — Rationalism
7. December — Christian / Mystical Awareness*

 The topic of Awareness was split between August, September, and December.*

January, February, and March — The Gift of Singleness was by far the most popular months / themes, reflecting this crisis among men.

Readers can go to the sidebar and find "Posts by Month" to read up on anything you're particularly interested in.

The Number of Shares in 2025

Sometime in 2025, WordPress began reporting the Number of Shares in the statistics reports. I'm not sure what 'Shares' means. No other information is given about this data in the WP statistics report. An internet search didn't offer any information either.

For 2025, the Number of Shares is given as:

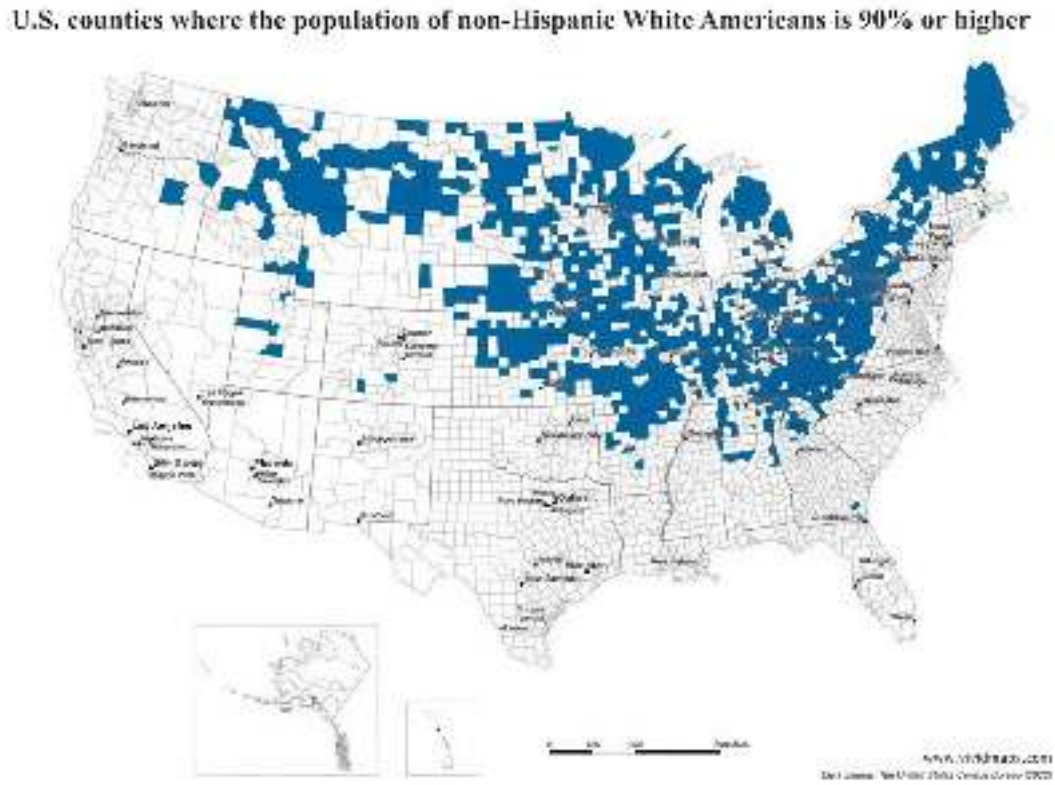
1. X: 3.9K

2. Email: 15

I'm not sure what the 3.9K figure means, but here are a few guesses.

1. It could mean readers sharing Σ Frame links on X. However, I'm not aware of any discussions or shares of Σ Frame's content on X. Σ Frame's X account only shows a few mentions and a few dozen views over the years — so few that I no longer post there.
2. It could mean readers sharing X links in the comments at Σ Frame, but 3.9K seems much too high a number for that. I would guess it's in the low hundreds range.
3. It could mean readers clicking on X links shared in the comments at Σ Frame. 3.9K seems possible for this, but if so, that is a surprisingly high number, as it is more clicks on X links than all the comments for the year on Σ Frame.

Readers are invited to share other ideas.



The Number of Views in 2025, by the Posts' Author

In past years, the Number of Views by Author was shown on WordPress Stats. Unfortunately, this information is no longer available on the free version of WordPress. Thus, we can't know who was the best author of the blog this year.

The Most Views in One Day (2025)

The top three days receiving the most views in 2025 are as follows.

1. December 18, 2025: 893 visitors; 998 views
2. June 18, 2025: 171 visitors; 551 views
3. January 11, 2025: 131 visitors; 514 views

I cannot explain the high activity on 2025/12/18, as there wasn't any single post that received a record number of views on that day. Instead, a large number of posts all received a number of views. Judging by the hourly performance (see image below), it appears that the whole blog was going viral, and then all incoming traffic was suddenly shut down.

The second on 2025/6/18 was due to The Post-Fall / Born Again Slore Life Script (2025/6/16).

The third on 2025/1/11 was a response to Lexet's essay, Why I am "Red Pill" (2025/1/8).

February 18, 2021: 1,882 views (0.16% of views)

Thursday (18% of views); 0:00 GMT, 10:00 am EST, 10:00 pm Taiwan (6% of views).

This is not much different from 2024.

Periods of High Activity in 2025

The four days spanning October 30-November 2, 2025 received 1,124 visitors, 1,825 views, 13 likes, and 43 comments due to two posts covering The Great Feminization.

The Top 5 Most Popular Categories

In 2023, there was a remarkable turnover from the previous year. 2024 showed another drastic reordering. The report for 2025 shows that readers' interests have shifted profoundly yet again, although the top 2 Categories have remained the same.

1. Fundamental Frame: 254 views (-33.7%)
2. Holding Frame: 239 views (-34.0%)
3. Intersexual Dynamics: 210 views
4. Relationships: 206 views (-42.8%)
5. Power: 194 views (-42.6%)
6. Discernment & Wisdom: 177 views
7. Introspection: 154 views (-54.3%)
8. Agency: 154 views (-49.8%)
9. Courtship & Marriage: 150 views (+23.0%)
10. Maturity, Personal Growth and Development: 148 views (-50.0%)

In 2025, Moral Agency, Decision Making, and Self-Concept dropped out of the top 10 from the previous year, replaced by Intersexual Dynamics, Discernment & Wisdom, and surprisingly, Courtship & Marriage.

The yearly shifts in these categories indicate the following.

In 2020, men were still focused on game strategies, relationships, and vetting.

In 2021, men were backing away from the torturous SMP and were placing more attention on improving themselves.

In 2022, men were gaining a more thorough understanding of themselves, trying to piece themselves together and salvage what they could from their relationships.

In 2023, men were focusing on honing their discernment of the reality on the ground and developing wisdom by sifting through the truth.

In 2024, men were intent on holding themselves together and salvaging what they could out of life.

In 2025, men were reconsidering intersexual relations, but with much more discernment and wisdom. I'll surmise that men's refurbished interest in women is more of an entertainment rather than serious prospecting, as it was before 2020.

Referrals

Top Search Engine Terms Leading to Σ Frame

In previous years, the search terms leading viewers to Σ Frame were shown on WordPress stats. This information is no longer available on the free version of WordPress.

The Top 5 Incoming Referrers from aggregators, readers, search engines, and social media in 2025

All referrals via search engines are down compared to 2024.

1. Google Search: 3,863 (-60.0%)
2. SynLogos (Based Aggregator): 3,756 (-5.3%)
3. Gmail: 954
4. Bing: 693 (-47.3%)
5. WordPress Reader: 623 (-31.9%)

Gmail makes a conspicuous appearance this year, indicating that readers are sharing more links via email.

Concerning search engines, in 2024, Google, Bing, and Yandex all surpassed the WordPress Reader. But this year, Yandex fell 64.6% to #8 (not shown in the list above). In 2025, only Google and Bing stand above the once-great blog platform giant. I guess this indicates that Yandex is falling in general popularity, and I suspect it is because the image search function was removed. That's too bad, because Yandex image search was once the absolute, uncontested best, by far.

The Top 10 Incoming Referrers in 2025 (other than readers, search engines, etc.)

Adam Piggott continues to be the number 1 referrer to Σ Frame, in spite of his move to Substack this year.

Deep Strength was number 1 in 2023. In 2024 and 2025, Deep Strength and Derek L. Ramsey battled for 2nd place. The stats show that Derek L. Ramsey has won for the second consecutive year, in spite of his opposing views.

Spawny's Space, a regular referrer in the past, reappears on the list this year after being away during 2024.

Pinterest, Spawny's Space, Radix Fidem, Biblical Gender Roles, and the new appearance of ChatGPT, pushed Omega's Journey, Jim's Blog, Catacomb Resident, Cane Caldo, and Sigma Game off the list this year.

Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): 572 (-35.9%)
2. Derek L. Ramsey: 300 (-57.1%)
3. Christianity and Masculinity (Deep Strength): 293 (-63.4%)
4. Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly): 274 (+62.1%)
5. Pinterest: 130 (-60.5%)
6. Spawny's Space: 81 (+326.3%)
7. Gunner Q3: 50 (-49.5%)
8. Radix Fidem: 41 (+64.0%)
9. Biblical Gender Roles: 26 (+766.7%)
10. ChatGPT: 25 (+240.0%)

The Top 10 Blogs Receiving the Most Traffic from Σ Frame

The total number of outclicks continued to decrease precipitously for the second year.

Wh0res and Ale, Wintery Knight, Vox Day, The Other McCain, and Patriactionary are bumped off the list, replaced by Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly), Biblical Gender Roles, Σ Game (Vox Day), To Reclaim Normality (Feeriker), and SynLogos (Based Aggregator).

Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. Spawny's Space: 1,853 (+43.4%)
2. Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): 845 (-20.0%)
3. Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly): 538 (+42.7%)
4. Christianity and Masculinity (Deep Strength): 513 (-45.7%)
5. Biblical Gender Roles: 465 (+22.0%)
6. Σ Game (Vox Day): 447 (+94.3%)
7. Dalrock / Dalrock's Archives at The Red Pill: 112 and 328, respectively, totaling 440 (-32.2%)
8. To Reclaim Normality (Feeriker): 409 (+66.3%)
9. Gunner Q3: 405 (-31.9%)
10. SynLogos (Based Aggregator): 387 (-44.4%)

It appears that Spawny's Space has become the central watering hole for Ye Olde Faithful Manospherians who still prefer Ye Olde Blog format. This is why I wrote more posts there in 2025 compared to past years.

Ye Olde Christian Manosphere Great St. Dalrock continues to be a thundering voice that reverberates through the ages.

The Blue Pill is Boomer Morality

Jack · 7 January 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Moral codes are changing back to pre-Boomer times.

Readership: All
Theme: The Christian Red Pill
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

First of all, before we get into it…

What is The Blue Pill?

Looking back over the past several decades (I'm 53, so I would know), I would summarize The Blue Pill as…

1. A Compromise — The Blue Pill is a collection of lies that men have bought into as a compromise with the overweening societal forces that Feminism and sexual liberation have wielded over the past 60 years; thus identifying said compromise as a symptom of Boomerism.
2. A Faux / Relative Morality — The Blue Pill is an expression of what I'll call 'Boomer Morality' in this essay and the next, best encapsulated in Boomer / Complementarian theology, although it isn't truly moral at all (only from their own gynocentric viewpoint).

I'll explain these two points further below. I'll make some loose assumptions, but overall, it correlates quite well.

The Blue Pill / Chivalry and Feminism go Hand in Hand

Over the past few years, we've had the idea that Male Feminists and White Knights are the male version of Feminists, via obvious intuitions. A lesser discussed corollary is that The Blue Pill is the male adaptation to Feminism, and that both are sin. If you consider this further, it entails that any man who is swamped in the Blue Pill (and the inherent lusts thereof) is a de facto Male Feminist.

Thus, the male equivalent of Feminism itself would be Boomer Morality / Chivalry* / The Blue Pill.

 Specifically, the expression of Chivalry that was preeminent in Western cultures during the late 20th and early 21st centuries.*

Furthermore, the Blue Pill is somewhat unique to Boomer mentality, rendering almost ALL Boomer Men Male Feminists.

In support of these statements, here's a brief lens of history.

Human Be-In, the Summer of Love, 1967.

60 years ago, Feminism / Sexual Liberation (which was wholeheartedly celebrated and spearheaded by the Boomers) uprooted and replaced the long-standing Christian faith beliefs about society, sex roles, sexual chastity, marriage, and family. Granted, society wasn't very Christian before then, but at least people strongly believed in Christian morals.

Feminism / Sexual Liberation appeared as a collection of individualized illusions / mythos that appeased women, and eventually, with some extending beyond mythos into law; e.g. Boss B!tch, "Free Love", female hypoagenticity, gynocentrism, male utility, moral relativism, No Fault divorce, Strong Independent Women™, YOLO™, etc., and whatever else the hamster can spin up in real time.

Boomer Men responded with what we now call The Blue Pill, a modernized expression of the medieval pagan practice of Chivalry (uncovered by Dalrock), which is an individualized illusion / mythos that affects men, which paints the typical woman as a goddess of beauty, love (and sex).

Thereby introducing standard Blue Pill adages such as,

"She's my better half."

"Happy wife, happy life."

"Women are perfect princesses."

"I'm lucky to have her in my life."

"If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy."

And so on.

Granted, Chivalry and The Blue Pill existed long before the Boomers (supplicating to women is endemic to men and goes back to the Garden of Eden), but Boomer Men took this to a new and unprecedented level, essentially sucking up to the unfettered sexual promiscuities of their own generation of women, and turning a blind eye to their sin of rebellion, all in the hopes of conjoining with the jiggling jollies thereof (and surely, many of them did, and were thereby seduced into this mindset).

Boomer Morality

With all that said, Boomer Morality was an attempt by presumably well-meaning (and well-laid) men to justify and whitewash the uglier aspects of men's compromise with Feminism (and sexual morality).

Around the late 1980s, Boomer Morality was doctrinalized in Boomer / Complementarian theology. "Men should love their wives" (c.f. Ephesians 5:25), and "Love covers a multitude of sins" (1 Peter 4:8), or so it was ham-fistedly assumed.

So then we heard spiritualized platitudes like…

"Proverbs 31 women"

"Women are Pearls of Great Price"

"Women are light years closer to God."

"Wives are the spiritual guides of the home."

And statements presuming female sexual attraction to be the divining rod of male virtue — a subtle reverse female judgment on men.

The Point of Divergence from the Truth

The moral injunction insinuated by The Blue Pill Boomer Morality is that men are wholly responsible for women. The idea being that men had to support women's indiscretions while they freely slept around, in the hope of tapping a c_nt whenever it became available. "You win some, you lose some", or so it was said concerning women's vacillating choices of whom to sleep with. At the time, men's investment in coital uncertainty was all part of the excitement of entertaining the p_ssy banging possibilities, for men and women alike.

From a Biblical viewpoint, the basic idea that men are wholly responsible for women is true — to an extent — or half true, if you prefer.

- The Old Testament stipulates that a husband is responsible for providing clothing, food, shelter, and regular sex to his wife/wives (NOT ALL his loose moraled paramours).
- The New Testament says Christian Husbands should honor, love, and cherish their wives, pray for/with them, and teach them in righteousness, c.f., "Wash them in the Word" (Ephesians 5:26). There is no such injunction for whoremongers shaping their OASIS chicks, pr0stitutes, and ONS s1uts. As if that were even possible.

However, The Blue Pill, as practiced over the past three decades, goes far beyond the consideration and decency that Christian husbands are instructed to show to their wives.

To wit,

- Women are to be protected, worshipped, and adored by men.
- ALL men are responsible for never EVER offending the impertinent and solipsistic egos of ANY women.
- All men are fully expected to constantly cater to ALL women's general happiness, even though this is an impossible and never-ending task.
- A general presumption that whenever a man and woman have an argument or dispute, the woman is always right, and the man is always wrong.
- Not only are husbands responsible for their wives and family members, but ALL men are deemed responsible for ALL women, even those they're not related to.

- Husbands are not only expected to provide for their wives, but are required to continue to provide for them — even after adultery, cuckoldry, or divorce.
- Husbands are not only responsible for providing food clothing, and shelter to their wives, but are also expected to give up their career opportunities, homes, jobs, savings, seats, and even child custody in deference to a woman's self-centered desires, preferences, and whims.
- Sex is entirely optional, depending on the woman's interest or mood, marital duties notwithstanding.
- A man's spiritual guidance is an absurd non sequitur.

The Red Pill Reveal

Now, the Red Pill has revealed the "Happy Wife, happy life" mythos for what it is — a little gynocentric mind game used to extract male investment. Translation: "Give her what she wants, and she will make some token effort to make your life easier — and she might even offer you some starfish sex once a month, sans her genuine orgasm."

The problem with this, and the whole reason behind the downfall of The Blue Pill mentality, is that women are not willing to play that Game any longer. Women will no longer spread their knees for every charming suitor, just for the fun of it, like they did in the 1960s' "Free Love" culture. Nowadays, women don't truly love men or care about having children enough to get married in a timely fashion. Likewise, modern men aren't either. So The Red Pill has become all the more salient.

On a society-wide level, the Chivalrous "Happy wife, happy life" mythos was upset because women achieved !ndəpəndəncə! and no longer needed male investment nor even cared about doing what was necessary to secure it, so they stopped acting in accordance with this mythos.

Consequently, sociosexual interactions have fallen to the lowest common denominator — transactions.

Conclusions

For decades, men have made these excessive concessions and borne these hard burdens, mostly out of sheer masculine self-respect, but also from their dedication to women, family, and society, and the faint hope of enjoying sexual intimacy and having a family. It is a testament to the good graces of men that they have held down the fort for so long — although this masculine virtue is overshadowed by men's motivations of creaming clams by whatever means.

But anymore, men are being told that they are annoying, burdensome, embarrassing, not good enough, not Man enough, not rich enough, not needed, superfluous, etc.

Men have heard all this and more, and have rightly decided that it is no longer a mark of self-respect nor a societal duty to act sacrificially in women's favor. Because most women are worthless slores, and ironically, P_ssy is no longer available to the vast majority of men, so why even try? And having children? Heh.

A reminder for the Ladies: You must be feeding the majority of men (not just top-rate Ch@ds) all the P_ssy they can eat, and somewhat regularly, for the illusion of male hyperagenticity to 'work'. But they don't, and so they won't.

And so, The Blue Pill illusion / mythos has crumbled and fallen.

More on this in the next post.

Requiem for the Blue Pill

The modern intersexual / social contract is intractably revoked, thanks to The Red Pill.

Social Systems Depend on a Shared Mythos

A while back, I wrote,

> "Any system depends on a majority of people playing respective roles that support the system. Having a critical mass of people conforming to such roles is what makes the system work."

A social paradigm can only 'work' in reality so long as the masses share the same faith beliefs or mythos concerning human ambitions, nature, and purpose.

> "The current system is broken because there is too much confusion and disagreement over what those roles should be. Men prefer traditional gender roles, while women want a revised role of being independent from men. We are far enough into it to see where Feminism will lead (female dominance and male oppression), and as more men see the eventual outcome, more men are fighting against it."

The Fallout of Feminism

We've already spelled out where Feminism leads.

Chateau Heartiste's Definition of Feminism (ca. 2013/11/12):

> "The goal of feminism is to remove all constraints on female sexuality and behavior and to maximally restrict and punish the exercise of male sexuality and behavior."

Dalrock's Law of Feminism (2018/9/6):

> "Feminism is the assertion that men are evil and naturally want to harm women, followed by pleas to men to solve all of women's problems."

Deep Strength's Law of Feminism (2016/2/18):

> "Feminism is the promotion and glorification of rebellion."

Jack's Law of Feminism (2019/4/13):

> "Feminism is the assertion and justification of women's rejection of male authority in favor of an institutionalized social ontology which is dictated by the Feminine Imperative."

As discussed in the previous post, Feminism, Sexual Liberation, and Boomer Morality have replaced the long-standing Christian faith beliefs about society, sex roles, sexual chastity, marriage, and family.

The Fallout Realized

For 60 years, men have compromised with Feminism and pedestalized women, simply because women were half of the population, men needed wives and sex, and men were seduced by the idea that women would be more grateful and responsible than they truly are or have been.

And during these same 60 years, men have been punished for believing their world is an individualized illusion revolving around the idolatry of feminine glory, as opposed to a material reality that acts according to discoverable laws instituted by a God of order.

Thus, for 60 years, men have had their wives, children, and earnings stripped away as a consequence of the false reality — the lies of this world — that they have unwittingly submitted themselves to.

But it can't go on indefinitely. The piper must be paid eventually.

A husband can go on believing "Happy wife, happy life" only so long as the wife responds to his efforts positively. If she doesn't, then she upsets the shared mythos of female hypoagenticity and male hyperagenticity. The husband may go on trying, believing that he just needs to work at it harder, or that she's having a bad day, or something, but eventually, he'll realize that she has abandoned the shared (false) mythos, and that there is nothing he can do to make her happy.

Women must trust and submit, or at the very least, offer regular rations of sex and a modicum of feigned respect, if they expect men to Step Up.

Now, The Blue Pill / Feminism social order no longer 'works' because entitled women aren't doing their part. They refuse to do even the least bit of relational maintenance.

Now, The Blue Pill / Feminism social order no longer 'works' because Men are half of the population and they're saying, "No more!" Gaming, Hermiting, MGTOW, Passporting, or anything really, is better than 'Western women'. Heh.

Epilogue

In summary, The Blue Pill has fallen because, again, this paradigm of reality can only 'work' so long as the masses share the same faith / mythical beliefs.

The Red Pill, and especially the Biblical Red Pill, takes a step back from the ledge overshadowing the abyss, but it also destroys the feminine primary social order that kept society running (although never too well).

Now that The Red Pill has become the overarching standard for public discussions, with every lambasting retort in the talk streams and comboxes, The Blue Pill exhales a death rattle.

In closing, if men embraced a mystical understanding of reality, then they would be in a better position to realize the difference between the false paradigms of reality proffered by the world, and their own personal discovery of the truth as it pertains to their own personal spheres.

Beatniks, Hippies, Boomers, and the Emergence of Post-Modern American Culture

How the Boomers rose to cultural preeminence, and ultimately worldwide.

Foreword

RonTomlinson2 asked,

> "My overriding interest in boomers is: How on earth did they get that way? Because the best men died in two world wars? Because of mixed schools / more female school teachers? LSD and pot? Less corporal punishment at home?"

In this essay, I'll expand my response to RT2.

I'll briefly recount the historical development of the liberal counter-culture that formed the backdrop of the Boomers' childhood and adolescence, and how this contributed to the formation of their own sub-culture of "sex, drugs, and rock music", dissident life philosophies, and rebellious values — what we now call "Post-Modernism".

Altamont Speedway Free Music Festival, 1969/12/6

Introduction

Modernism (late 19th to mid-20th century) sought universal truths through reason and scientific process. Traditional beliefs were questioned, and theories were continually revised. Some of the greatest developments in the history of science and engineering occurred during this time period, including the automobile, electricity, radio, sound recording and reproduction, the telephone, atomic / nuclear science, electrodynamics, radioactivity, Einstein's theories of relativity, thermodynamics, X-Rays, and the theoretical foundations of solid state electronics and optoelectronics, which later contributed to the development of the hardware for the Information Age.

Postmodernism (mid-20th century onwards) emerged as a skeptical reaction to the formal rigidity of Modernism. The idea of objective reality, scientific process, and religious traditions were flatly rejected in favor of relative subjectivity, considering multiple perspectives, and exercising personal freedoms. The Postmodernist view celebrates complexity, embraces ambiguity, explores irony, and questions the meaning of everything, thereby blurring the lines between high and vulgar culture, as well as right vs wrong, even. Some of the most significant social upheavals were written into the history of American culture during this time period (e.g., racial desegregation and integration, the sexual revolution, women's liberation, Feminism as the norm), as well as spectacular developments in music (e.g., jazz, bebop, funk, punk, rock-and-roll, grunge, etc.), and entertainment (e.g., films that drew a cult following, such as Back to the Future, ET, Indiana Jones, Star Wars, and many others).

The Beats

The Beat Generation started as a literary movement that explored and influenced American culture and politics in the post-World War II era. The heavy hitting authors of the Beat Movement were Lucien Carr, Allen Ginsberg, Jack Kerouac, and William Burroughs, as well as a large number of other authors who contributed to the narratives. Alcoholism, recreational drug abuse, h0m0səxu@l!ty, and the occult appeared prominent in their personal lives, and some, like Kerouac (alcoholism) and Burroughs (heroin, morphine, and the occult), emphatically acknowledged this in their writings. The bulk of their work was published and popularized throughout the 1950s. These authors were hailed as the voice of a generation disenfranchised with the rising materialism of post-war Modernist values.

Jack Kerouac

The most conspicuous adherents to the Beat movement were predominantly composed of young, sophisticated, middle to upper-middle-class white men, often wearing monochromatic clothing, berets, Mao caps, goatees, slacks, suit jackets, turtleneck sweaters, vests, and RayBan sunglasses, and always drinking and smoking something.

In 1960, 41% of the American population smoked. Once you subtract children and the elderly, that's just about everybody. If you didn't smoke, you were 'square'.

As popularized by Kerouac's novel, On the Road (1957), the Beats were known for being well read in various literatures and reciting poetry, listening to bebop and jazz music, drinking alcohol and/or coffee at all hours of the day and night, and traveling aimlessly across the country on a wandering quest for adventure, inspiration, and serendipitous meaning. This iconic lifestyle was largely responsible for the rise of 24-hour conveniences and services (e.g., 7-Eleven was franchised and spread nationwide in the 1960s), coffee culture (e.g. Starbucks was founded in 1971), and all-night diners and other hangouts (which are now dying out with the Beat generation). Popular jazz artists included Cannonball Adderly, Charlie Parker, Dave Brubeck, Herbie Hancock, John Coltrane, Miles Davis, Thelonious Monk, and many others; their popularity contributing to the Golden Age of Jazz in the late 1950s.

All of the above formed the iconic style of the Beats, which continues to reverberate throughout American culture to the present day. Hell, I personally dress like a Beatnik, although I'm conservative to the core.

Famous male Beatniks.

Sociological Values of the Beatniks

- Sexual liberation and exploration.
- The belief that Life is a spiritual quest.
- Experimentation with psychedelic drugs.
- A rejection of materialism as empty and hollow.
- A rejection of standard traditional values as 'square' and stifling.
- Exploration of various ideas, life experiences, philosophies, and religions.
- Explicit portrayals of the human condition, i.e. suffering, hence the name 'Beat'.

Famous female Beatniks.

Etymology of “Beat”

The adjective “beat” colloquially meant “tired” or “beaten down” within the Black community of the period. Kerouac expanded the meaning to include the connotations “upbeat”, “beatific” (gloriously humble and gracious, as per the Biblical Beatitudes), and the musical association of being “on the beat”.

The Beats were called Beatniks by their detractors because of their politically liberal leanings. Beatnik is a portmanteau of ‘Beat’ and ‘Sputnik’ (the first Soviet satellite in space in 1957), as a nod to their communist sympathies and views favoring socialism.

Etymology of “Hip”

Thelonious Monk, jazz artist

The terms “hip“, “hep”, “hipster”, and “hepcat” originated from African American jive slang and were used to describe anyone who was currently fashionable, “in the know”, sophisticated, or “up-to-date”. During the 1930s and 1940s, black jazz musicians and jazz aficionados adopted these terms to describe themselves, their music, and their lifestyles. By the 1940s, these words had become part of mainstream American English.

The Beats also adopted the term “hip” in describing themselves, and Beatniks who played in jazz bands were called “hepcats”.

Later, the Hippies adopted the term “hip” to form the eponym.

The Hippies

The Hippies were originally a youth movement that started in the United States and the United Kingdom during the mid-1960s and quickly spread to other countries around the world.

Hippies inherited the language and liberal countercultural values of the Beatniks, but by the late 1960s, due to the vast number of Boomers, it had become its own movement, having its own unique clothing, interests, lifestyles, and jargon.

Hippies fully embraced the sexual revolution, created their own communities in which to express “free love”, listened to folk and psychedelic rock music, and used drugs such as marijuana, LSD, peyote, and psilocybin mushrooms to explore altered states of consciousness.

The vast majority of Hippies were early “Post War” Boomers (born 1945-1954), while the later Boomers, AKA “Generation Jones” (born 1955-1964) grew up under the shadows of their Hippie elder siblings and cousins, and for the most part, did NOT identify themselves as Hippies. To offer a comparison of stereotypes, Hippies were known for their love of folk and psychedelic rock music, LSD, and marijuana, whereas Jones’ers were into disco, funk, and cocaine. IMO, Generation Jones was much more defiant and sadistic, but ironically more socially conservative than the Post War Boomers, but not much.

The most conspicuous Hippies were predominantly comprised of young, lower and middle class whites, often having very long hair, male and female alike. They wore bell-bottoms, butterfly collars, floral and paisley prints, and colorful tie-dyed clothing, circular eyeglasses, tunics, and Native American inspired accessories such as beaded necklaces, headbands, moccasins, and turquoise jewelry. They were always high on something while chanting “Peace” and “Make Love Not War”. Hip bywords included “Far out, man!”, “Groovy”, and “Sensational!”

Older Hippies, dressing like they did in their youth.

Two residential districts became holy meccas for the Hippies, one in the east and one in the west. Hippies dreamed of visiting these places at least once in their lives.

- New York City's Greenwich Village (where Burroughs and Kerouac lived)
- San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury Heights district

Of note, the set of the children's TV program, Sesame Street, was modeled after Greenwich Village and similar New York City neighborhoods.

Greenwich Village, New York City

Sociological Values of the Hippies

Following after the Beatniks, and very similar…

- Opposition to the Vietnam war.
- Sexual liberation and exploration.
- Experimentation with psychedelic drugs.
- Rejection of materialism; Enjoying nature.
- Personal freedom is the paramount virtue.
- A rejection of established traditional values.
- The view of society as broken and frustrating.
- The concept of “The Brotherhood of Mankind”.
- Life is a spiritual journey; Exploration of various life experiences and religions.
- The belief that peace, love, tolerance, and acceptance are the way to resolve differences.

In addition, Hippies enthusiastically embraced cultural, racial, and religious diversity, especially Black integration, interracial relationships / marriage, and racial harmony, as well as Eastern mysticism, philosophies, religions, and other spiritual concepts, which then reached a larger audience and later gained widespread acceptance.

Etymology of “Hippie”

The word “Hippie” originated from the earlier Beat word “Hipster”, which dates back to Black jive and jazz culture, as described above.

Haight-Ashbury Heights District, San Francisco

The Prevalence of Beatniks and Hippies as Cultural Influencers

Many of the famous cultural icons, movie stars, and music artists from the 1950s and 1960s either identified as, or were closely associated with, the Beatniks and/or the Hippies.

Including…

- Abbie Hoffman (Hippie; social activist and firebrand)
- Audrey Hepburn (Beatnik; actress, fashion model)
- Barbra Streisand (Beatnik; singer, composer)
- Bob Dylan (Hippie; musician, song writer)
- Charles Manson (Hippie; Cult leader)
- John Cooper Clarke (Psychedelic Beatnik / Hippie; later founded Punk)
- Joni Mitchell (Hippie; singer)
- Led Zeppelin (Psychedelic Hippies; music artists who were the progenitors of Hard Rock and Heavy Metal)
- Michelle Phillips (Hippie; actress, singer, and songwriter)
- Paul Simon (Beatnik / Hippie; singer and songwriter)
- Sophia Loren (Beatnik; actress, fashion model)
- Steve Jobs, born Abdul Lateef Jandali (a throwback Beatnik; founder of Apple computers)
- Steve McQueen (Beatnik; actor dubbed “The King of Cool”)
- The Beatles (Beatniks early in their career, hence their name, and Hippies later on)
- Woody Allen (nerdy Beatnik; comedian)

And too many others to list here.

Since their time, the contributions of these individuals and others have become the central foundation of Postmodern Western culture, entertainment, fashion, social values, and thinking. Younger generations are entirely ignorant of these influences.

Case Study — Boomer Rebellion Conveyed through Popular Films

If you look at the most popular films made during that era, you'll see the generational divide that swept the culture.

For example, here's a fantastic scene from the 1968 movie, Bullitt, starring Steve McQueen, showing a car chase through the Haight-Ashbury Heights neighborhood in San Francisco, a famous stomping ground for Hippies.

Here, Steve McQueen identifies with the sophisticated version of liberals (called Beats, or Beatniks by their detractors) and represents the younger generation. The older men in the black Dodge Charger represent "The Establishment" and are serious, stern, surreptitious, suspicious, and generally unlikeable.

Steve McQueen literally chases the older guys out of the city — a wildly popular concept of the time that was put into film.

Look who dies at the end of the scene.

The Boomers were Vastly Numerous

The Boomers got their nickname from the Baby Boom following WW2.

Allen Ginsburg

In the late 1960s, the number of people between the ages of 15-30 was about 20% of the population on average. In some suburbs and urban sprawls, it was closer to 25-30%. That's between 1 in 3, to 1 in 5 people who were below the age of 30. They were everywhere! There were so many Boomers that they literally had their own culture, as I've described above.

To answer RT2's question, since there were so many of them, they were self-reinforcing and totally beyond correction or instruction. Hence, the Boomer's catchphrases / shibboleths like, "The Establishment", "Antidisestablishmentarianism", and "Don't trust anyone over the age of 30."

Now add in the factors RT2 mentioned above, and the sirens of the sexual apocalypse, and you have a cultural revolution.

That's why they thought of themselves as invincible. In many ways, they truly were. Their sheer numbers allowed them to take over American business, culture, education, politics, and religion from the late 1960s to the early 2000s. We still feel their impact today, for better and worse.

As a side note, Generation X (born 1965-1980), for the most part, made a decisive break from the liberal excesses of the Boomers, returning to self-discipline, respectability, and the corporate grind, but their numbers were few and their impact has been relatively small compared to that of the Boomers.

William S. Burroughs

Epilogue

The Boomers enthusiastic adoption of the Beatnik's and Hippie's habits, language, lifestyles, music, philosophy, and values, and their widespread practice thereof as a living social paradigm magna cum laude social movement, has shaken Western culture to the core, completely uprooting Christian Morality, Modernism, Traditionalism, the White Protestant work ethic, and the American Dream that had stood as the foundations of American culture since colonial days (viz. "The Establishment").

Their contribution to culture, language, and music is meteoric and unprecedented in the entire history of the United States, and unparalleled in the whole history of the world. Today, the culture, entertainment, lifestyle habits, music, philosophies, and values of the Beatniks, Hippies, and Boomers are celebrated, idolized, and imitated worldwide.

However, these same influences were rotten at the core, tainted by alcoholism and drug abuse (sorcery), rebellion, sexual promiscuity, and the occult — in a word, W!tchcr@ft.

For better and for worse.

Paul Elam released a landmark exposition in his podcast, The Emergence of the Red Pill Christian — 425 Episode 4 (2024/6/21). If you haven't heard it yet, it's a must if you wish to stay current on developments within the Christian Red Pill sphere. Elam has used this exposition as a springboard for many of his more recent discussions and interviews.

For the Red Pill record, for doing text searches, for the ease of citing quotations and references, and for the sake of discussion, I've transcribed Elam's exposition below. [Images, links, and section headers added by Jack.]

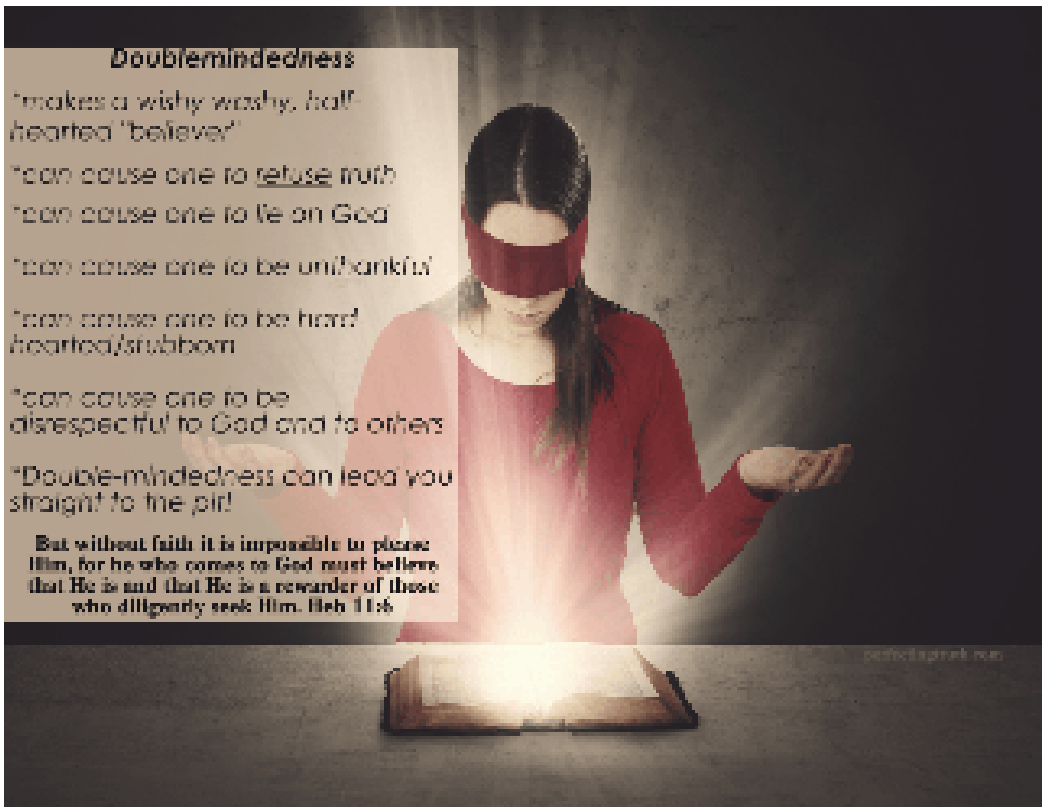
Introduction

Hello there, gents, and welcome back to the 425 podcast, calling one and all to Jesus Christ and to the great Red Pill awakening in Christian men. Continuing from last week, I'd like to reiterate some of the more salient points I talked about.

One, in our analysis of the modern church, we find an institution running essentially on two systems at the same time.



Biblical Headship

First, we have the more overt system, the one that everyone openly acknowledges, where all are redeemed sinners, continually falling short but living in God's grace.

In this system, we are all equal in the eyes of God, created in his image. But even as we're all equally valued, equally loved as human beings, in our family life, He has provided a hierarchy. It is simple, efficient, and made clear in Holy Scripture.

Of course, the Lord is at the top with the husband and father underneath in submission to God's will. Then comes the wife and mother, who pleases God by being a supportive, stable pillar of the family, submitting to her husband and serving the interest of her children.

This is clearly outlined in several passages, but this one is my favorite.

> [18] Wives, be subject to your husbands, as is fitting in the Lord.
> [19] Husbands, love your wives and do not be embittered against them.
> [20] Children, be obedient to your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing to the Lord.
> Colossians 3:18-20 (NASB1995)

It's also critical to point out here that this hierarchy isn't just an expression of divine order. Unsurprisingly, it is also the hierarchy that provides the ideal environment for children to thrive developmentally, realize potential, and grow into stable, well-adjusted members of society. It's how you produce children far less likely to use drugs, experience teen pregnancy or academic failure, far less likely to engage in criminal conduct, suffer depression or suicidal thoughts. Again, it's hardly a surprise that God's way is the right way, spiritually and in every other level of human existence.

Romantic Gynocentrism

I can almost hear you guys out there gearing up for the big "but…" I'm about to deliver, and for good reason. Our Red Pill sensibilities allow us to look beneath the surface of things to see that there is a different, more subliminal system that operates in the shadows, corrupting the divine plan.

We know that that system has its own separate rules and calls for a very different hierarchy, placing women at the top with everyone else, including God, at a distant second.

Gee, what could go wrong there?

We actually don't have to ask what could go wrong. The Bible tells us over and over of the unmitigated disasters that result when men follow a woman's lead, when women, due to men's desire for them, are placed at the top of the hierarchy. Even a cursory examination of what transpires in the modern church contains the same. This subliminal system, of course, is romantic gynocentrism, which is what happens when human infatuation is co-opted and codified into fantastical expectations of men that were established a thousand years ago, not by God, but by women of high stature. You can learn more about that in a talk I co-authored with Peter Wright, linked in this post.

It's enough for now to say that it's a system that preys on our instincts to protect and provide for women or normal gynocentrism and uses them to live out a fairy tale narrative where women are the center of the universe, where they can do no wrong, and where the onus is on men to give them whatever they want, no matter how trivial and no matter the cost. It's a system that turns infatuation, that time in life when human judgment is most impaired, into a compulsory ethos that rejects the divine order. We tell Christian men they must lead, then turn around and pressure them to cater to their women's childish whims at every turn. The only thing more stunning than the raw hypocrisy of this hopelessly mixed message is the self-deception in the people who attempt to live by it.

The harm all this causes is nearly incalculable.

The Failures of Romantic Gynocentrism

Marriages based on romantic service to women generally aren't sustainable. Those unions were held together artificially for a very long time by the stigma of divorce and the social pressures to avoid it, and legal obstacles to divorce. Once those pressures and obstacles were removed, though, marriages based on romance began to fail like stock in Enron, with women leading the charge and dragging the family into the meat grinder of the family court system. The result has cut a wide swath of destruction into the human social landscape. Why? Because failed marriages become failed families. Failed families become failed societies. Take a look around you now and tell me I'm wrong.

Marriages based on romantic service to women aren't sustainable on their own because they are ridiculously unrealistic. It's "Happy wife, happy life" — a term coined into the common lexicon because it reflects our knowledge that displeased wives are likely to be vindictive and punitive; in other words, abusive with their husbands. It's a term that informs us again of the true seat of power in romantic relationships and how injudiciously that power will be wielded. By the way, I've heard as many Christian men parrot the "Happy wife, happy life" trope as non-Christian men. Maybe more. For my part, I think this absolutely insane, not to mention unchristian, power dynamic between the sexes is ultimately the main cause of the bitterness that Paul clearly recognized in his epistle to the Colossians.

I could deliver you a lengthy talk on all the downsides of romantic gynocentrism, but suffice it to say that every psychosocial factor by which we measure the well-being and development of children suffers under its profound influence on human behavior. And no wonder that's true. What should we expect from a set of rules that demands women be granted unreasonable and unsustainable deference from the very men that God Almighty tasks with leading them? It's a ready-made power struggle that's happening all around us, and it leaves more men worried about surviving the rigged game than leading anyone. But you're hard-pressed to find men anywhere, including the church, that would look you in the eye and admit that this is a battle that men regularly lose. Those same guys run around introducing their wives as "the commander-in-chief" or "my better half". They actually act like it's kind of a joke when they say it, like with a wink and a nudge, though both labels are sadly and entirely accurate.

That's the romantic ethos. Women and women's sensibilities rule the roost. No excuse for noncompliance. And if there is noncompliance, well, "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy."

If Mama ain't happy, those around her, especially husband and children, will suffer. That's the universally understood state of the romantic end game, even as it is a clear threat of emotional terrorism if there ever was one. [For reference, see Dalrock's essay, Threatpoint (2012/4/14).] And it points to the real seat of power in millions of families, that no one ever wants to talk about. And they don't want to talk about it because that power is not just limited to the familial. It gets expressed across all levels of human society, including, sometimes especially, the church.

Institutionalized Gynolatry in the Church

Last week, I addressed the way that churches go into a gynocentric panic whenever divorces happen, with clergy and church leadership siding with the woman and blaming the man by default. They are frequently impervious to facts and logic, and indeed show little interest in either. Telling them that they are unwitting instruments of evil won't shake them out of their denial, but it would be no less true for it.

Remember the line from Leviticus 19:11 I opened with, the parts about stealing, dealing falsely, and lying? When there is a conflict between a man and a woman, "When Mama ain't happy", the church frequently becomes a willful enabler and amplifier for all those sins. It opens the door wide for deceit and incites persecution.

Incidentally, I just finished an audiobook by a theologian, Dr. David Edgington, titled The Abusive Wife, which documents all of this in painful detail. I highly recommend the book, with a couple of caveats that I'll go into when I interview Dr. Edgington in the near future [Episode 5]. [The 425 Episode 6 contains a review of this interview. A summary of this interview was published on Gynocentrism (Paul Elam): Romantic gynocentrism and the reviling wife: Reflections on last week's conversation with David Edgington (2024/7/6).]

Anyway, I've said all that to say this. Christianity, as I understand it, isn't compatible with romantic gynocentrism. They are two diametrically opposed ways of operating. To embrace one means the surrender of the other. As Christ said, "You cannot serve two masters" (Matthew 6:24). In the Christian way of life, there is only one true master, the Lord God. In the romantic ethos, Mama is the master served by the man. All the denial and mental gymnastics in the world won't change that.

Romantic Gynocentrism is Tyranny, Headship is NOT

I suppose it's obligatory to say at this point that recognizing men's Headship of the family isn't a prescription for men to rule over women as a god. It's not a license for "My way or the highway." Men are to lead families with the family's well-being in mind, not as tyrants or oppressors. But even as I write these words, I'm also obliged to point out that in forty years of working with men and women, I've run into very few men who would be tyrants. I could probably count them on one hand, two at the most, among thousands of people. So, while I feel compelled to point out that the Biblical duty of leading a family isn't a license to practice abusive control, I also have to acknowledge that I only feel that way after sixty years of gynocentric propaganda telling the world that the male family tyrant is the default setting for men. My lived experience, though, is just the opposite. Four decades of working with people confirms that the overwhelming majority of family tyrants, those who see their desires as edicts for the rest of the family, were women driven by the romantic ethos.

I've lost count of how many times I've counseled men who expressed an intense, even desperate frustration that goes something along the lines of "No matter what I do, it's never enough. She always wants more. She's never satisfied, and never happy. Somehow it's all my fault." These are men wearing themselves out on the perpetual hamster wheel of romantic gynocentrism, ever trying to mold themselves into something their wives will love and approve of.

And to these tyrannical wives, this is the natural order of things. She is there, ordained by God to be pleased, not just loved, not just provided for, and not just protected, but pleased. Even in her most childish desires, which is just another way to say "in her lusts", or "in her sin", and until she "gets her way", she won't hesitate to emotionally terrorize everyone around her.

I don't take pleasure in saying it, but the fact remains that this is the default setting for how women lead families when the family is bound by the romantic ethos. Romantic gynocentrism — it's how we make sinful children of women, and patsies of men.

The Coming Cultural Clash

Does anyone really believe that this is God's idea of marriage? Well, as it turns out, countless Christians believe that very thing, and they stand ever ready to align as useful idiots with disgruntled Mama in her sinful vindictiveness toward her husband for his inability to honor an impossible contract. This arrangement now infects the Western Christian world like a plague, and of course, marriage as an institution only continues to fail.

Where this leaves Christian Red Pill men seems clear enough to me. I think it's most helpful to view this as a coming cultural clash — one that needs to happen.

In mainstream Christian culture, we see the veneer of Christianity practiced, but little of the heart of it. Underneath the professed piousness and feigned sanctimony, we, meaning Red Pill men, can see the elevation of women to levels that can only be called sacrilegious, and men competing with each other, sometimes viciously, to keep them there. They disregard scripture each and every time it comes into conflict with the corrupted romantic script.

The modern church is a culture that blindly encourages marriage, even though the church abdicated responsibility for marriage to the state ages ago. And even though, in its current state, marriage is much more based on women's romantic and material ambitions than on the creation of a family. And with its' failure rate, it's become a broken industry producing incalculable misery and horror, especially to men and children, but to women too. Despite this reality, the culture of the modern church continues to mold young men into romantic clay pigeons, forbidding them to even think about self-preservation, then launching them into the line of fire with raucous applause and celebration.

The needed response to all of this is already happening in the culture of Christians who happen to be Red Pill men. As churches continue to alienate men, sending them through the exits in droves, the Red Pill Christian community is growing. There is an emerging culture of Red Pill Christian men who see and understand things that the modern Western church is willfully blind to. Men who understand that love doesn't mean building a candy store for spoiled children to visit whenever it suits them. We are men who understand that the romantic ethos has led to unqualified evil, a rot infecting the very heart of the church. We are men who not only understand that it is better to live in the corner of an attic than in a home with a contentious woman (Proverbs 21:9; 21:19; 25:24; 27:15), but also heed other words from the Apostle Paul, when he said, and I quote, > [32] But I want you to be free from concern. One who is unmarried is concerned about the things of the Lord, how he may please the Lord. [33] But one who is married is concerned about the things of the world, how he may please his wife.

Take from that whatever you like, but it's hardly ambiguous.

The Apostle Paul didn't ignore the warnings of the Old Testament about life centered on women. He knew why Adam fell from grace, and David, and Samson, and Ahab, and Solomon, and he apparently saw the same problem with his contemporaries, or he wouldn't have written what he did. 2,000 years later, and we have the same problems on steroids, with the modern Western church fully complicit in the problem.

Personally, I think it's time for a new church, at least a massive overhaul of the current one — the one that exists to keep Mama happy. And I think it's already happening. Online, I hear the voices of Christian men changing, edging towards The Red Pill.

Conclusions

The Red Pill Christian is slowly rising into the social landscape, and that's an idea so potent that it borders on frightening. I think it's only a matter of time before men will start speaking up within their churches, challenging the witch hunts triggered by a woman's pointed finger, speaking the truth to his fellows, and rejecting the idea that marriage should be modeled after a childish fairy tale.

I've no idea if that will bring on the needed change in the church, but what I know of men tells me that if it doesn't, they'll just start building a new one. After all, if you're a believing Christian listening to this podcast, you're in church already.

Jack's Commentary

For those of us who have been following the Christian Manosphere for a while, you'll recognize that Elam's treatise pulls together all the major points concerning chivalry, gynocentrism, and the current state of marriage that were uncovered by the greater authors of the Christian Red Pill 1.0, e.g. Dalrock, Deep Strength, Paul Elam himself, Σ Frame, Larry Solomon, and Peter Wright, et al.

Elam expects that Christian Red Pill men will gradually leverage change by increasingly stepping up and speaking out within their respective churches. I'm not sure how much this is happening, but I think, not much. From what I've heard, men are more likely to leave a gynocentric church for another that already has a long track record of maintaining an institutionalized Headship, such as Orthodoxy.

We'll see how it goes.

Wishing you the peace that surpasses all understanding and the very best of life's blessings.

The Threatpoint of No Fault Divorce among Clergy

How No Fault Divorce is weaponized against church leaders.

Intro

Weaponized No Fault divorce is certainly on most men's radar these days.

I believe much of the current awareness of this crime against both faith and humanity was made possible by Dalrock's exposé of this malady. Older readers may recall Dalrock's observations about wives' threatpoints and the churchian's flaccid response to these behaviors — behaviors now deemed selfish and evil by the Christian Manosphere.

Here are a few of Dalrock's posts on this topic, in case you came late to the Christian Red Pill.

- Dalrock: Threatpoint (2012/4/14)
- Dalrock: Lowering the boom. (2012/12/31)
- Dalrock: Child support and the threat point. (2014/1/8)
- Dalrock: God spoke to him about the holy threatpoint. (2018/2/9)
- Dalrock: Our family policy is designed to terrify married fathers. (2018/11/13)
- Dalrock: You better do as she says, or she'll take away your kids. (2019/8/28)

In sum,

- Wives withhold compliance and sex in a very effective strategy to manipulate their husbands' behaviors and decisions more to their liking.
- Wives use No Fault divorce as a threatpoint to coerce or force their husbands to do or to accept nearly anything to avoid committing mass carnage against the children.
- More often than not, divorcing wives cite unbiblical and willy-nilly reasons for all this.
- Churchianity, the courts, and all of Western society fully enables and supports all of this.

In this post, I want to expose one unique way that this threatpoint applies to clergy, i.e., deacons, elders, pastors, priests, and other leaders in the church, and also laymen's overall interest in church.

No Fault Divorce Derails Conversions and Ordinations

Consider the following evidence from Tubal Cain (sent in a private email on 2025/12/11).

Case Study A: Pastor's Wife Files for Divorce rather than become Orthodox

In the first example, a pastor's wife filed for divorce after he decided to convert to Orthodoxy, and she thereby ruined his plans to continue his ministry work serving as a priest in the Orthodox church.

> Jack,
> Christ is born!
> A young man (older millennial) and his 15 year old son are catechumens at our parish. He has two other sons and a daughter as well.
> His wife recently filed for divorce because of her husband's conversion process from Southern Baptist to Eastern Orthodox. He's a graduate of Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, with an M.Div. Sadly, his desire to attend Orthodox distance seminary and become a priest has been hampered due to a No Fault divorce he didn't want nor ask for. He is maintaining frame, and will be completing a 1 year catechism, and will be baptized, chrismated, tonsured, and received into the church soon.

But he won't be a pastor anymore — or a priest. Divorce disqualifies him from those positions in either faith tradition.

Concerning his rebellious wife, I made a meme that says it all.

Case Study B: Wife Threatens No Fault Divorce and Commits Adultery to Prevent Husband from Converting to Orthodoxy

In the second case study, a man's wife threatens No Fault Divorce and goes on 'Girl's Trips' to protest her husband's interest in Orthodoxy. It worked.

> One of the things this young man shared with me is his estranged wife withdrew thousands of $ from the bank account to pay for a 'girls trip' to Cancun prior to her filing. I've never married, but I can say unequivocally (and you probably can concur) when wives start doing the 'girls trips' (with divorced and single women in the mix) or 'girls nights out' (clubbing, bar hopping, after hours parties at hotels with men … again, with divorced and single women in the mix), it's usually an exit strategy, and shaking your death rattle, cruising for the husbands replacement. Fortunately, the young man saw this, and subsequently lawyered up.

Apparently, he was so demoralized that he decided to quit church for a while and get his life in order first.

Divorce doesn't just break marriages, families, children, and finances; it also causes spiritual violence; it breaks faith, hope, and otherwise successful careers. All of this is why God hates it (Malachi 2:16).

Bad Influences? Gavin Ortlund

> Another one of the things he's shared with me is that things really went south when his wife started listening to Gavin Ortlund. His words: "Thanks, Gavin Ortlund, for breaking up our family".

Pastor Gavin Ortlund and family.

> Do you know of this guy, and curious if you've written about him? I'd be interested to get your twist and analysis on the situation.
> He's a Reformed Baptist apologist, seems to take things out of context, appeals to emotions, attacks Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox alike…
> Personally, I find him unsettling, and don't listen to him.
> Please pray for this young man and his family. His name is Sean.
> Tubal Cain

Jack's Speculations

Concerning this man's rebellious wife, I can guess that she still appears young and attractive, despite her age and having had children, probably a combination of sexy-cute, and what I would politely describe as "young at heart" (i.e. self-centered, solipsistic, worldly, and much too stuck on herself and loving the world (i.e. "Tingles") too much to submit herself to her husband's decisions). I imagine she looks something like the woman in the adjacent image. Note the haughty eyes and huge earrings — both S1ut Tells.

A post about Gavin Ortlund will be published soon.

Conclusions

In summary, women / wives wield considerable influence over the clergy as well as laity, and hamper conversions and expressions of faith.

1. Wives wield considerable influence over their husbands' career potential and spiritual vitality, and will make his home life 'difficult', at best, or frivorce him and legally kidnap his children for child-support ransom at worst, if he says or does anything that doesn't feed her Feeelz.
2. Pastor's wives will weaponize No Fault divorce to force or threaten pastors and pastors in-the-making to choose certain career opportunities over others. This is potent because divorce disqualifies a man from being a pastor or priest.

Moreover, women / wives often wield enough leverage via No Fault Divorce to dictate (1) which church they attend, if any at all, (2) the terms and conditions of their husbands' involvement in church and/or their careers in ministry, and (3) whether they even become ministers / pastors / priests at all.

More on the influence of pastors' wives in the next post.

If the Pastor's Wife ain't Holy, ain't Nobody Holy

What is the overall influence of a Pastor's wife in a femcentric church?

Readership: All; Christian Men
Theme: Christian Community; Metacognitions; The Christian Red Pill;
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Intro

This post contains a few observations about the influence of Western Protestant pastors' wives, with a summary at the end.

1. The Churchian Feminine Clucking Order

Within most Western Protestant churches, women maintain an order of feminine hierarchy, with the Pastor's wife perched on top of the hen house. The men in the pews may not be fantasizing about the Pastor's wife, depending on her age and weight (ahem), but the women in the church are.

Well, that sounds bad. What I mean is that women in the church admire, follow, and imitate the pastor's wife because she is the Queen Bee of the gynocentric pecking order within the church. In turn, the pastor's wife is motivated to maintain her female following by catering to, feeding, and validating their desires, false notions, fantasies, and Feeelings.

Thus, the pastor's wife wields considerable force over the feminine-ordered hierarchy within the church, and by extension, the entire church via V pedestalizing men and wife worshipping husbands. As such, the pastor's wife sways the entire church, as well as its leadership, as I discussed in the previous post about wives' threatpoint of No Fault Divorce.

This high-influence, high-status position is why church-going women adore and envy the proud Big Eva pastor's wife, but do not feel the same way towards the idea of being the wife of a Catholic or an Orthodox priest. The reason why women covet being the wife of a Big Eva pastor, but coldly disdain the pious Cathodox priest's wife, is because the Apostolic authority of Cathodox ecclesia effectively removes the hegemonic influence possessed by the Big Eves in the Big Eva church. It is also precisely why so many men are abandoning Big Eva Protestantism for Cathodoxy.

2. Pastor's Wives are Responsible for The AMOG / Apex Fallacy in Church Leadership

Jackabond pointed out another sweeping influence of pastors' wives.

> "There's also the Apex Fallacy to contend with in church leadership. This is basically the assumption by pastors that the way things are for them is the way things are for the average man in the pews. Most pastors have above-average intelligence and are well-educated. Virtually all of them are married and were married early. Many have been chosen by churches because they are married and were married early. So they have little, if any, experience with women other than their wives. And many pastors were chosen by women who wanted to be a pastor's wife, which gives them a distorted view of women's behavior towards regular men. "Just be a pastor, and women will come to you", that sort of thing.
> Regular men don't get favorable attention from Christian women like pastors-in-training do. They have to approach and court and prove their spiritual bona fides. They may not be particularly bright or have much education, or have much of anything going for them.
> If their pastors are preaching and structuring their ministry while operating under the Apex Fallacy, what comes out from the pulpit is more or less the same old same old — "Man Up!", "Be Better!", etc. They're basically preaching, "Be a situational Alpha, like me", without recognizing that most of the men in pews are NOT like them and will never be like them.
> Bible college was steeped in this sort of thinking, older married men with little or no broader experience of women would teach Blue Pill thinking to young inexperienced men who were often already singled out for marriage by someone who wanted to be a pastor's wife. That inexperience would then be baptized into the churches, be given a scriptural polish, and elevated to a spiritual norm.

3. Women's Mere Presence Obliterates Men's Influence Over Other Men

Jackabond goes on.

> I've found that the only place a Red Pill men's ministry can take place without coming under fire from the wives and women who hear about this 'misogynistic' teaching, who then bombard the pastors' Inbox with complaints, is in informal men's groups. Those groups typically need a mature Christian leader who understands Red Pill teaching enough to be able to expound it in a way that honors God and comports with Scripture.
> But since women control the Protestant church culture, Red Pill teaching is too uncomfortable for even Red Pill men who become pastors to formally endorse."

As was written in the Manosphere over a decade ago, Men teaching other Men can only occur in the absence of women. Once women infiltrate Men's spaces, those spaces inevitably become gynocentric — and Blue Pilled. Lest we forget.

The problem with pastors' wives in this context is that the role of being a pastor's wife installs her in a de facto position of leadership over men, via her hem-hawing and hen-humming huxtable husband, who also happens to be a pastor, as a proxy, and by extension, the entire church.

Pastor's wives shape the whole church in quiet moments after dark, behind closed bedroom doors through ~~p_ssy~~ pillow talk.

Would readers doubt that a pastor would NOT choose an otherwise well-qualified Red Pilled Christian man to lead a particular ministry, or even shut down a men's ministry, if his wife privately expressed a negative view of the man or how a ministry is handled by that man? Especially if her stated opinion was accompanied by a gratifying blow job or an all night, titty-flopping romp?

Pastor Matt Chandler and his wife. What would his SMV/MMV be without his frock? Would he be able to marry such an attractive wife if he were a carpenter, plumber, roofer, or salesman instead? Exactly how much influence does Mrs. Chandler have over his ministry and his teaching?

Conclusions

In summary, women / wives wield considerable influence over pastors, church leaders, and hence the entire church in the following ways.

1. All women maintain an order of feminine hierarchy. In most Western Protestant churches, the Pastor's wife is typically the woman at the top of this pecking order. Pastor's wives are admired and followed by other women in the church, and the pastor's wife is motivated to maintain her following by catering to their Feeelz. In this way, the pastor's wife steers the feminine herd and thereby dictates women's expectations from men and husbands, as well as the social and marital conditions of the entire church.
2. Pastor's wives usually choose to marry pastors, or men who are presumed to become pastors, early in life, contributing to an Apex Fallacy in the pastor's views of women. This reduces a pastor's efficacy in ministering to the average man who is NOT a situational AMOG.
3. Pastors' wives shape pastors' decisions in private conversations during intimate moments when the man is at his weakest and most impressionable.
4. Pastor's wives wield considerable influence over the pastor's sermon topics and choice of words. They are capable of making his home life 'difficult' if he says or does or preaches anything she doesn't approve of (e.g. Biblical Headship, Red Pill topics, etc.).
5. Pastor's wives will weaponize No Fault divorce to force or threaten pastors and pastors in-the-making to choose certain career opportunities over others. This is potent because divorce disqualifies a man from being a pastor or priest.

That's quite a hefty influence, hence the title of this post: *If the Pastor's Wife ain't Holy, ain't nobody Holy. Maybe that's stretching it a bit, but not much, I think, for most Protestant churches.

I have the idea that perhaps the overall spiritual health and vitality of a particular Western Protestant church could be roughly estimated by assessing the overall spiritual maturity of the pastor's wife — NOT her apparent influence, as is likely to be perceived and praised, but her actual agentic maturity in the Word and how it plays out in her influence over her pastor husband and the entire congregation. I'd like to hear readers' thoughts about this idea and how valid this measure is.

* This is a word play on the RP catchphrase, "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy."

A Baleful Tale of a Pastor's Sexless Wife's Influence

Jack · 21 January 2026 · Archived copy · Original

A pastor's wife who is incapable of normal sexual relations leads to the downfall of a spectacular ministry.

Intro

In the previous post, the 2 situations of divorce that Tubal Cain mentioned are both examples in which the wife was clearly at fault. Here's another true anecdote in which the husband / pastor was more or less at fault, catalyzed by his wife's incapability of fulfilling marital duties (i.e., normal sexual relations). I'll call this Case Study C.

The Baptist Super Pastor

When I was a young boy growing up in the late 1970s, my family regularly attended a large Baptist Church. The pastor was the best preacher I've ever heard in my whole life. I still remember many of his sermons to this day.

As a result of this pastor's leadership and exquisite preaching, the church's membership doubled and then tripled in less than two years. A larger sanctuary was constructed to accommodate the massive congregation, and then it became the largest church in this pleasant mid-west suburb (at that time).

The Sex Starved Super Pastor

Then…

His wife, who happened to be very attractive, submissive, and supportive — an ideal pastor's wife — had some kind of medical condition that suddenly got much worse at the same time that his fame and influence were reaching a zenith. I wasn't privy to the details, being so young, but I clearly understood, even as an 8 year old boy, that her health condition made her incapable of fulfilling her marital duties (i.e., satisfying sexual relations).

Meanwhile…

The church's head secretary was married to a man who traveled on business and was frequently away from home for days or weeks at a time.

So here we have the basic Red Pill recipe for an affair.

- Husband A is a famous pastor / situational Alpha.
- Wife B works as a helper to Husband A.
- Husband A is not getting enough satisfactory sex from his wife A.
- Wife B is separated from her husband B for long periods of time.
- Husband A and Wife B spend long hours working together every day.

So you can already guess what happened next.

The Scandal

Several months after the pastor's wife's hospitalization, the pastor was seen taking a motorcycle joyride with the church's secretary. (He didn't own or normally ride a motorcycle.) They were touching each other in a 'familiar' way, laughing, and enjoying each other's company.

Rumors spread. Then it became a scandal.

I don't know if they actually had sexual relations. They both denied it. Nevertheless, they were seeing a lot of each other outside their duties at church, so it constituted a love affair. No matter if they had sex or not, this was enough to mar his reputation.

In response to the congregation's outcry, he resigned from the pastorate and took a job working as a carpet salesman. He was very good at selling products, as well as beliefs and ideas.

Nobody divorced in the sensational melee, which made me believe they were technically innocent. However, a few years later, the pastor divorced his still sick wife, which then made me believe this incident (either his wife's illness / sexlessness, and/or being condemned as an adulterer and summarily evicted from the pastorate), struck a fatal blow to him, not only to his career as a super preacher, but also to his faithfulness to his wife.

Needless to say, he never served as an ordained pastor again. Nevertheless, he remained active and present in the local evangelical community and continued to be highly esteemed by pastors and deacons in evangelical churches of different denominations, including multiple Baptist churches of different strains (American Baptist, Independent Baptist, Southern Baptist), Lutheran, and Nazarene. Moreover, he was clearly recognized in the community as a man of the cloth, despite his sullied reputation. That was truly his identity in Christ.

Closing

A long while back, I visited a Nazarene church that my step-mother attended, which was in the same suburb, and I met him there by chance. He recognized me immediately (as my father's son; my father was a deacon during the time that he was a pastor). He called me by name to the elders standing around him, saying, "Hey! That's Brian's boy! That's Jack!" I recognized him, too. He took both my hands and talked with me for a while until the service started. I felt deeply honored and humbled, like I had returned 'home' after a long time.

I was deeply touched by this recognition. He remembered me, even though I had grown into adulthood and more than 20 years had passed. My belief in his election was confirmed, despite the past controversies. He had a heart for people — his flock, not just the fame, fortune, and notoriety of being a super pastor.

I always thought it was a travesty that he couldn't continue preaching. He was the best preacher ever, IMO. I wonder what he would've become if not for the difficulties posed by his sick wife. How could he have impacted the church and people's faith if he had not been disqualified through the temptations posed by his unfortunate marital situation?

It's sad that men are so acutely affected by their constant, dire need for companionship and sex, and when these needs are not satisfied on a regular basis, they invariably fail to reach their fullest potential, or at worst, fall into the devices of the Devil.

Looking back, I wonder about the curious timing of his wife's illness. If not for that snafu, he might have well become a very influential and noteworthy persona in the Evangelical church. Was it a subtle test of faith placed on this pastor by the Lord? Was it a direct attack on the church from Satan? I'll never know.

In the last few posts, I've taken a nuanced perspective in considering that American Evangelical Protestant (AEP) church leaders (AKA "Big Eva" pastors) may be specifically 'targeted' (before marriage) and 'controlled' (after marriage) by specious women who are motivated by attention, control, and status more than serving her husband, the church, or the Lord. In support of this view, one post spells out some of the ~~Puppet~~ Pulpit Strings that are common to AEP churches, and questions whether these are appropriate or helpful.

This problem simply doesn't exist in ecclesiastical churches, i.e. Catholic and Orthodox, because there is a well-established traditional patriarchal order that does NOT depend on the charisma or social skill of the clergy — nor the V power and/or social acumen of their wives.

This post collates a few descriptions, insights, and well-informed comments under the last few posts that have expanded our understanding of the Pulpit Strings to provide us with a current, independent lens to look at this issue.

Women Compete Fiercely for the Role of Pastor's Wife

Regarding his experiences in a now-defunct post-college young adults singles group at John MacArthur's church, which had an on-campus seminary in which upcoming pastors were training for the ministry, Gunner Q wrote,

> "The women were more attractive than average…
> Turned out, the women were in competition with each other to wife up the seminary students, vying for the coveted position of PastorWife. That was why they cared about their appearances more than average.
> Unfortunately for me, I found this out the hard way, by being an unsexy man showing romantic interest. I was subsequently ostracized by a whisper campaign.
> I understand in hindsight that their nuclear rejections were not about me, personally. The women were horrified at the idea that as hard as they were trying to snag a crown prince of the Evangelical world, she was still so unattractive as to be my level of market-value. At the time, however, I didn't know this, and the rejections were devastating to my self-esteem.
> Civilization must not allow reliable paths to worldly power. Among other reasons, they attract the most feral and manipulative of women. Rather than check how holy a pastor's wife is, check whether she married him immediately after he graduated seminary. Much easier!"

Pastor John and Diana Hagee

The Powerful Socio-Spiritual Role of a Pastor's Wife

After researching a collegiate essay on the topic of pastoral holiness and its influence on a congregation, Jackabond wrote,

> "Wives are the closest influence a married male pastor can have, and this influence is often brought to bear in his pastoral care. One example is the wife's influence over the content and tone of a pastor husband's sermons, often craftily brought to bear at the last minute after he's tired from his exegetical labors, perhaps at the night before dinner table or pillow. What may have started out as a plain reading of passages like, say, the wifely submission teachings of Ephesians 5 and 1 Peter 3, or other teachings the wife deems too strong for delicate women's ears, which may have been intended as a rebuke for something that had happened in church, or even just as a routine pass through Scripture; with the wife's 'correction' they become soft-pedalling circumlocutions that essentially invert their Biblical meaning. This happens a lot also in mixed Bible study groups where a pastor and his wife co-lead, and in pastoral counsel more generally. I'm rarely confident that a married pastor is > his own man in the Lord anymore. I was confident about this once, but not anymore.

> The Apostle Paul recognized this wife-pleasing tendency in his teaching to the Corinthian church:
> > "I want you to be free from anxieties. The unmarried man is anxious about the affairs of the Lord, how to please the Lord; but the married man is anxious about the affairs of the world, how to please his wife, and his interests are divided."
> > 1 Corinthians 7:32-34 (RSV)*

> For this reason alone, I think it's important to evaluate the pastor's wife's agentic maturity in the Word, and not merely now, as a pastor's wife, but before she got married. Such an evaluation ought not be simply in relation to other women in the congregation (as collectivist approval has a major influence on women's sense of righteousness and feminine collectivist misconceptions can spread like gossip), but on her personal humility before God and proximity with Jesus as a Christian individual.
> I'm sorry to say that since Evangelical Feminism became a thing, I've never met a truly humble pastor's wife in the Evangelical Church who submits willingly to accountability in this way, at least not with anyone who isn't their wife-pleasing husband."

The Central Power of the Pastor's Wife within the Church

Thedeti wrote,

> "In the Protestant world, the pastor's wife heads up the female hierarchy. If she's not a pastor herself (believe it or not), she's often called the church's "first lady", especially in black Protestant churches, and many times in charismatic / Pentecostal churches. If you're a woman in a Protestant church and you want to wield some power, you go through the pastor's wife.
> The pastor's wife is the head Queen Bee and she appoints a set of lieutenants who then run everything. In any Protestant, charismatic, or evangelical church, you can tell exactly who the lieutenants are. They are in total charge of everything, from tithe collection, to financial management, to Sunday School, to children's ministries, to food pantry, to altar ministry, to worship team, to ordering office supplies.

> It's because women like power, and a church is one place where they can all have their little fiefdoms.
> It's also because most men won't do these things, or have been driven out of doing them."

The Pastor and his Wife set the Marital / Sociosexual Model for the Entire Church

The model for the church is supposed to be Christ-centered Christian Covenant / Headship. But IRL, the pastor and his wife, whatever their beliefs and relationship structure might be, ARE the de facto basis and model of your garden variety, community corner, American Evangelical Protestant (AEP) church. For better or for worse.

Other leaders in the church are, preferably, those who stick acceptably well to the socio-intersexual relationship model presented by the pastor, either in his sermon teachings and/or IRL. Buddy buddy, chummy chummy, birds of a feather flock together, and all that. This goes for both the pastor comingling with the deacons and elders, and also for his wife and all her lieutenants / 'spokes' and 'beads' on her social Wheel.

It goes both ways, too. Elders and church boards choose pastors, and through sermons and teachings, pastors shape the opinions of the congregation towards the expectations of elders. So there is a mutually interdependent troika of authority, for better or worse.

Exemplary Models

If the pastor and his wife emulate Christian Covenant / Headship, then they are modeling Christ and pointing others to Him. OTOH, if the pastor and his wife have a Blue Pill / Chivalrous / Feminist type of relationship, then likewise, they're setting this example as a faux standard of Christian marriage for the entire church.

The fact that many AEP pastors have adopted the latter stance is exactly why Protestant churches have become so 'feminine', in a word, and also so culturally compromised and/or doctrinally debauched (e.g. Complementarianism).

Pastor Michael Foster and his wife, Emily

Misplaced Priorities of Pastors

IME, I've come to believe that most AEP pastors of local small churches are more concerned with maintaining order in the church than they are about church growth, the word of prophets within the church, or even the work of the Holy Spirit in the church. They think that maintaining order and unity in the church is of primary importance, and to an extent, it is, but NOT at the cost of rejecting the movement of the Holy Spirit within the congregation, which can sometimes be tumultuous. However, their deeper motive is to control and/or reduce any additional trouble and work that would be required for them to perform their duties effectively, and too much of anything outside the ordinary hum drum makes them too anxious and too aware that they are NOT the penultimate dictator of the church. As a result, prophets are sent packing, through various means, whenever they convey viewpoints that shake up the church, for better or worse.

Many, if not most, AEP pastors operate through a cronyish structure of authority — a social construct that is very similar to a feminine Wheel-based social order. Within this model, pastors' wives are a major spoke on their Wheel, and serve as an enabler for crony control via their wives, the distribution of duties, and PR maintenance — for better or for worse.

For instance (based on a true story), a pastor and his wife (couple A) and a deacon and his wife (couple B) want to use the church funds to inve$t in real estate, with the selling point that they're expecting church growth and planning an expansion. Deacons C and D are not sold on the idea. Prophets G and J warn against it. C, D, G, and J think that the church is not growing enough to warrant such an inve$tment. Besides, they think the church should have a nest egg to buffer community ministries, mission activities, and any unforeseen expenses. But… A and B aren't authorized to spend a sizeable amount of church money without C and D's approval, and G and J undermine the congregation's support of their plan.

Here is where the Pulpit Strings come into play. Wives A and B invite wives C and D for a lunch, or several, in which they sell the idea of investing in real estate. Once wives C and D are sold on the idea, it's only a matter of time before they wear down deacons C and D to agree with the pastor's plan. Meanwhile, the prophets are not informed of matters that they would disagree with, and they are quietly derailed, subtly ignored, and steadily edged out of the central executive operations of the church.

After all these difficulties have been successfully defused, the church proceeds to buy real estate.

Misplaced Priorities of Pastor's Wives

Feeriker said [edited and rearranged for logical progression],

> "All too often I've seen pastors' wives obsessively build cults of personality around themselves (often in parallel with their husbands' efforts at the same), using their husbands' position, not to augment his leadership by nurturing other women in the ways of Godly womanhood, but by…
> - Lording it over the women of the congregation as "Mean Girl-in-Chief."
> - Attempting to intimidate men of the congregation into being obsequious to their husbands.
> - Maligning and ostracizing other women, or even other families, whom they feel threaten their position.
> These pastors' wives play a major role in making North American churches seem like Sunday morning reenactments of high school, creating major stumbling blocks for those believers seeking spiritual growth and fellowship and reinforcing negative stereotypes for non-believers."
> "If a pastor's wife cannot be counted on to be a Titus 2 wife or a 1 Timothy 2 wife, then what woman can be counted on to be such a wife? Do "pulpit pursuers" (I dunno, what's the ecclesiastical equivalent of the law enforcement term "badge bunny" here?) not realize that being a pastor's wife implies special responsibilities? Do they not consider that being the wife of one called upon to shepherd a congregation of believers, a position of weighty responsibility, means being of exemplary character themselves, manifesting the behaviors prescribed by Scripture for Godly, Christ-following wives, that they are to be the examples for other wives in the congregation to emulate (to say nothing of being a role model for unmarried women who seek to eventually become Godly wives)?"
> "Tragically, I don't see things changing for the better in the foreseeable future. In fact, if anything, I see things > getting orders of magnitude worse as Churchianity, Inc. continues to implode and disintegrate as the inevitable poisonous fruits of its decades-old capitulation to the secular culture."

The late James Dobson with his wife, Shirley

Conclusions

Given the social dynamics described above, church leaders (i.e. Big Eva pastors) are especially susceptible to being controlled by specious wives who are strongly motivated to maintain the power and control of their feminine-primary social wheels within the church, rather than serving her husband, the church, or the Lord (IF that should ever make an impression on their conscious awareness).

The AEP socio-structural ontology in a given church may very well be a social network of spiritually mature male leaders in a church, or else it could be a feminine primary, wheel-based network model, or some combination of both. But either way, in light of the above insights, the result is that most all AEP churches have each become a large social clique centered around the overall attractiveness, charisma, confidence, social skills, and personally favored doctrines of the pastor, his wife, and other key leaders in the church.

But for Western AEPs, the question remains: Who is the central hub? Is it the pastor, deacons, and elders, or is it the pastor's wife and the holy hen house of her church lady lieutenants? If there is any coordination between these two social paradigms, then which one dominates?

The answer to this question will tell you the constitutional nature and function of the church in question.

In a previous post, Tubal Cain told us about a young married Protestant pastor who converted to Orthodoxy, but was deterred from pursuing the Orthodox priesthood because his wife didn't want to be married to an Orthodox priest and filed for No Fault divorce. This threat is potent because divorce disqualifies a man from a leadership position in the church.

> "His wife recently filed for divorce because of her husband's conversion process from Southern Baptist to Eastern Orthodox. He's a graduate of Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, with an M.Div. Sadly, his desire to attend Orthodox distance seminary and become a priest has been hampered due to a No Fault divorce he didn't want nor ask for. He is maintaining frame, and will be completing a 1 year catechism, and will be baptized, chrismated, tonsured, and received into the church soon."

Tubal Cain also spoke about a young married man whose wife stepped out because he intended to convert to Orthodoxy.

> "Also, I've seen this same ploy played out before with a young married man with children whose evangelical wife threatened filing no-fault divorce when he left Vineyard Fellowship and began catechism at our parish. He subsequently left due to this.

> Weaponized No Fault divorce is certainly on most men's radar, and for more often unbiblical and willy-nilly reasons cited.
> Another one of the things he's shared with me is that things really went south when his wife started listening to Gavin Ortlund. His words: "Thanks, Gavin Ortlund, for breaking up our family"."

> "Do you know of this guy, and curious if you've written about him? I'd be interested to get your twist and analysis on the situation.
> He's a Reformed Baptist apologist, seems to take things out of context, appeals to emotions, attacks Roman Catholics and Eastern Orthodox alike…
> Personally, I find him unsettling, and don't listen to him."

It is noteworthy that this man pinpointed the teachings of Gavin Ortlund as a contributing factor to his divorce.

So let's take a closer look at Gavin Ortlund.

Profile of Gavin Ortlund

Gavin Rutherford Ortlund is an American Christian apologist, Reformed Baptist theologian, and author.

Ortlund is known for defending theologically conservative evangelical Protestantism from an irenic perspective, engaging with proponents of atheism, Eastern Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, and Liberal Protestantism.

Curriculum Vitae

Gavin Ortlund. That lopsided, smirky grin gives me a bad impression of the man.

- Born in Scotland; DOB: 1983/6/30 (early Millennial Gen)
- Married to Esther, father of 5
- 2006 — B.A. in Philosophy and Religion from the University of Georgia.
- 2009 — M.Div. from Covenant Theological Seminary.
- 2016 — Ph.D. in Historical Theology from Fuller Theological Seminary.
- 2017-2018 — Post-doctoral research at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, conducting research on Augustine's doctrine of creation.
- 2018-2023 — Senior Pastor of First Baptist Church, Ojai, CA.
- Since 2023, he left the pastorate to pursue full-time ministry through academic roles and digital platforms.
- Fellow of Credo
- Fellow of The Center for Baptist Renewal
- Fellow of The Keller Center for Cultural Apologetics
- Member of St. Basil Fellowship of The Center for Pastor Theologians
- President of Truth Unites
- Theologian-in-Residence at Immanuel Nashville
- Visiting Professor of Historical Theology at Phoenix Seminary
- Visiting Scholar at Reasons to Believe
- Author of nine books
- He won Christianity Today's 2024 Book of the Year award for his work, What It Means to Be Protestant: The Case for an Always-Reforming Church.

That's quite a lot of irons in the fire! Obviously, he's had some 'help'. But from 'whom'?

At the Truth Unites webpage, the YT channel is described thus.

> "Truth Unites has a dual purpose as both a theological resource to the church as well as an apologetics voice to our culture. In its inward-facing role, it seeks to serve the church with theological education. It especially focuses on historical retrieval and theological triage, seeking to buttress and unify evangelical theology amidst its current fragmentation. It also produces content in defense of Protestantism."

He also has two brothers in the ministry: Dane Ortlund, author of Gentle and Lowly: The Heart of Christ for Sinners and Sufferers, and Eric Ortlund, who serves as a Lecturer in Old Testament and Biblical Hebrew at Oak Hill College in London.

Dr. Eric Ortlund, Gavin Ortlund's brother and a lecturer in Old Testament and Biblical Hebrew at Oak Hill College in London.

The Influence of Gavin Ortlund

Concerning Ortlund's teachings, the first question in my mind is this:

Is Ortlund teaching something true, and the wife doesn't want to face that truth, and decided to back out of marriage altogether?

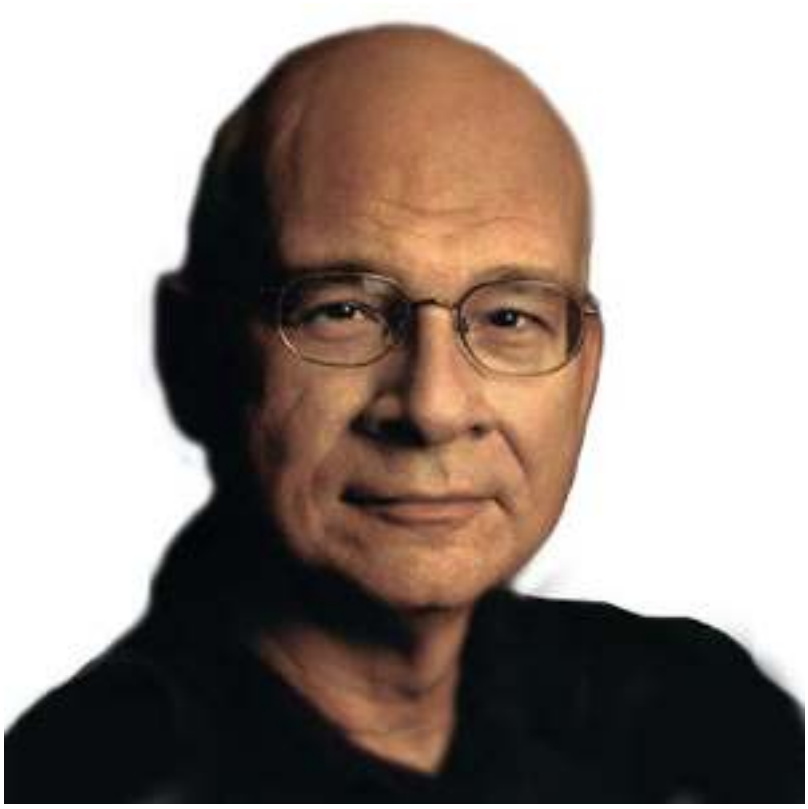
Or…

Is Ortlund teaching something false, and it made the wife Feeel 'empowered' enough to ditch her marriage?

By perusing Ortlund's YT channel, Truth Unites (an ironic name, given TC's story), I found a few clues.

Browsing over the titles of his videos, there are many video talks that offer arguments against virtually anything NOT Protestant and Sola Scriptura, including Atheism, Catholicism, Orthodoxy, and others.

Let's remember that Protestantism was birthed out of a disagreement over marriage and divorce with the Catholic church. Protestants prioritized marital harmony (even at the cost of divorce), while the Catholic church dictated ecclesiastical conformity and condemned anyone or any faction that disagreed. Overall and in general, one of the main differences between Catholicism and Protestantism is that the latter tolerates divorce. It could be that Ortlund is riding hard on this grand point and subtly emphasizing the correlating doctrine.



Pastor Timothy Keller, RIP.

I also found that Ortlund has produced content in cooperation with names like Ligon Duncan, Collin Hansen, Tim Keller, Albert Mohler (of Dalrock fame), Matt Smethurst, and others of their kind.

Also, Ortlund is apparently an acolyte of Tim Keller, carrying on his work of shoring up the fragmentation of Evangelicalism by whatever means necessary.

As if the AEP church is prioritized over faith and even marital solvency — Sola Ecclesia under the guise of Sola Scriptura.

Conclusions

In conclusion, I don't believe Ortlund himself is 'evil', per se, but instead, I tend to believe that he is merely an exceptionally accomplished manifestation of Enlightened Post-Modern Protestantism, including all the hallmarks thereof: the emphasis on Irenic perspectives and logical Aristotelianism (just shy of raw Positivism), culminating in his unwittingly whitewashed gynocentric Complementarianism and the resultant promulgation of the bitter fruits of Feminism, including the plague of divorce.

All I can say is what Tubal Cain suggested: 1 Timothy 6:3-5.

> You will know them by their fruits.
> Matthew 7:15-20 (NKJV)

All this seems to support my earlier assertion that Headship is more Important than Religious Affiliation.

Women's Existential Fear of The Red Pill

The bible is described as the sword of truth (2 Corinthians 6:7; Ephesians 6:17; Hebrews 4:12). Christians know it is a weapon of spiritual warfare.

But this concept is not limited to the Christian perspective; it is also true from a morally inverted perspective, except it inspires fear in the enemy rather than confidence.

In Weaponizing (2024/7/29), I mentioned a few articles and research papers about how stuff is 'weaponized'. The colloquial meaning of 'weaponize' is to exploit what is, in many cases, presumed to be an ideology, for the purpose of attacking a person or group, or for spreading discord.

I concluded that whenever this word is used (e.g. in cultural media) it usually conveys the viewpoint that one finds themselves at the brunt end of an unassailable truth, and so reverts to vituperative defamation of their opponents' motives in response.

From a Christian perspective, all these accusations and objections are yelps of pain that indicate the sword of truth has found its mark on yet another so called "victim".

Since then, I've found several appearances of 'weaponizing'. This post will cover one of interest.

Weaponizing = Arousing Women's Existential Fear

The phenomenon of 'weaponizing' can be observed in an essay written by Elyse Willemsen* that appeared on Global Network: 'Doing What God Designed Men to do': Red Pilled Christians' Quest for Patriarchy, According to Scripture (2024/3/11). Here, the term, "Red Pilled Christians", refers to the so-named Reddit site, where DeepStrength, Jack, and others have contributed posts in years past.

This article caught my interest because much of Willemsen's assessment of The Red Pill is accurate and true. However, as I'll reveal in the next section, instead of embracing the truth with gratitude and humility, Willemsen reacts to these truths with pearl-clutching, terse-kneed terror. She recoils in horror at the very idea of Patriarchal male dominance, as if all men were evil ogres, hell-bent on pillaging and plundering every town, and gang r@p!ng every f@t, ugly, green-haired feminist in sight (much to their exquisite satisfaction, I might presume). Heh.

TheDeti gave us this apt Translation:

> "This Red Pill stuff is mean to women. It's sex!st and m!s0gyn!st. Unattractive, mediocre, "mid" Christian men should not be permitted to have anything they want or need, or even to think for themselves. Nobody owes you anything. You need to just shut up, get married, and give everything you have to your wife. If you're not married, just shut up and go away. I don't know what to tell you, just… don't be Red Pilled. Cuz it's mean and nasty and stuff and it makes women feel bad."

Meanwhile, and despite these protestations, women lust after Conservative Hawt Dawgs who are one rejection shy of becoming Red Pilled and complain that none of them are Liberal, while they secretly lament the relative rarity of Top SMV Studs whom they can naturally respond to with eager joy and quivering knees; men who, with one sideways glance, can command immediate poon-soaked lays with little to no resistance.

Long time RP readers will know that the real issue behind Willemsen's et al. horror is women's baseless and irrational fear that women will be forced to comply with and serve unattractive men against their will, which is a stark violation of what the Manosphere 1.0 godfather, Rollo Tomassi, called Women's Existential Fear.

This apparent fear of being coerced into servitude is baseless and irrational because never before in human history have women had so much socioeconomic and sexual liberties fully supported by civil laws and governing institutions. So it is obvious that this fear is not circumstantial, but Existential. IOW, it is a trait peculiar to women's fleshly nature.

Use of the Word 'Weaponize'

Willemsen uses the word 'weaponize' as follows.

> "RPCs weaponise their Christian faith to fit a Red Pill agenda, which involves securing Christian patriarchy, subordinating women and suppressing rights for gender or sexually diverse people."

Note the phrase, "Christian … Red Pill agenda … involves … subordinating women and suppressing rights …", which reveals Willemsen's ignorance of Christianity coupled with women's Existential Fear, as described above.

The truth is that Christian men do NOT force women to submit, and have no way of doing so within the current sociosexual climate, whatever Willemsen imagines that might look like. These days, the onus is entirely upon women to willingly submit to their male heads as an act of faith and obedience to God, rare as that might be.

> "Weaponising their Christianity, RPCs purport feminism is "evil" and a "rot", as one 2021 post describes, corrupting the command of God for men to be "strong" and "leaders"."

Willemsen never explains exactly what she means by 'weaponizing', but it is clear that she abWh0res the idea of men identifying feminism as an "evil" and a "rot" — a central truth held by RPCs. Moreover, she takes issue with any stance against the basic tenets of Feminism, and yelps in pain whenever the truth exposes gynolatry for what it is.

This passage is revealing.

> "RPCs fuse Christianity with the Red Pill philosophy, believing that "Biblical Christianity … is an RP [Red Pill] belief system", as one user highlighted in 2024. RPCs believe in male supremacism from a Biblical perspective, meaning that the sacred text contains principles which dictate how God 'designed' men to be leaders in society, including in the family. The idea that men can obtain sex or a girlfriend / wife by prioritising their physical fitness, exercising dominance over subservient women, and employing manipulative techniques so women become, as one user put it, "putty in [their] hands", is ever-present in many posts. Following a literal interpretation of the Bible, the group justifies harmful forms of masculinity and calls for the reinstatement of essentialist gender norms as obeying God's plan."

In effect, Willemsen is contorting several chapters of RP lore to femsplain how secular nonChristian women view unattractive men, and then assumes that all such men are Red Pill Christian men. No. She is describing Churchian Chumps, Simps, and White Knights, and projecting that image onto RPC men. Newsflash: This isn't 2005 or even 2015; since 2025 there is a difference.

Agency and Trust are Absent

Reading between the lines, it is apparent that Willemsen assumes that women lack agentic capacity and view themselves to be at the utter mercy of men, which is ironic given women's current cultural superiority.

What Willemsen fails to realize is that this is only a problem when trust is absent. When women are with a man they trust and respect (and are thus naturally attracted to), then they'll eagerly go to great lengths to do whatever would please him and spunk his monkey junk (… but ONLY IF she thinks he's hawt). Interestingly, these days, a man possessing a full head of wavy hair, firm, round glutes, hard, shiny pects, and washboard abs can miraculously command total allegiance, trust, and respect from almost all women, despite any and all behavior that would otherwise indicate B@d@ss Ch@d's prioritizing poon pounding untrustworthiness. That's why we call them 304s.

And yet, that's how it's supposed to be! Women should be getting stupidly excited about bouncing on C0ck and soaking up Ch@ds chuds through every bodily orifice, and procreating offspring to create the next generation. (Christians require marriage first, but that is an afterthought among seculars.)

If Willemsen thinks that's quəər, then she is the one guilty of "suppressing gender expression".

Conclusions

In summary, Willemsen commits two major faux pas in her reasoning in which it is apparent that fear and psychological projection are behind Willemsen's view, and also the ressentimented inversion of good and evil.

False Association — Willemsen emphasizes men lamenting not being able to find suitable wives, rather than on women's recalcitrant unwillingness to BE worthy of marriage. IOW, she's focusing on the least desirable men, with no mention of their least desirable female counterparts (because they're all 10s in their eyes), and then falsely assumes that (1) these undesirable men = RPCs, and (2) that RPCs / undesirable men are somehow imagined as forcing them to pair up (and thereby forfeit the carousel), against women's God-given right to hypergamy, and this is thus perceived as 'weaponizing'.

Inverted Morals — Further, to Willemsen, several foundational principles appearing in the Bible and Christian Red Pill lore (i.e. masculine strength, male Headship, love and respect, the family and marriage-friendly social order that is illustrated in the Bible and encouraged by various men in the Red Pill community) are not received as an inspiration of Based bright hope, but instead is perceived as a source of oppression and a vector of abuse. Thus, any mention of these ideas is perceived as barbs and salvos for which they have no defense, hence the word 'weaponize'.

Willemsen's essay betrays (1) an ignorance of the altruistic nature of men, (2) a sore lack of appreciation for men, and (3) a naïvete of the fact that men are much more likely to do nothing at all, or just walk away, if female compliance is not readily and willingly forthcoming.

Lastly, it is my impression that her article was written to provide a catharsis for those who feel they have been crippled or disadvantaged or "victimized" by life circumstances and who have the notion that TRP / truth is to blame; i.e., people who fear men / masculine authority and/or who are angry with God. It's a catharsis that assuages their existential fears and numbs their awareness of their need for God's love and grace.

 Elyse Willemsen holds an M.Phil. in "International Peace Studies" from Trinity College, Dublin. Her 'research' is focused on "The emotion of subordination" and !ncels.*

Intro

One of the main reasons we keep writing posts and comments on blogs over the years is because it's fun talking to other men. Another is that it keeps our thinking and writing sharp. Yet another is keeping ourselves from repeating the mistakes we've made. Yet another is that younger men might learn something from our experiences.

It's an absolute societal tragedy that men and women aren't getting and staying together. Men have to learn to be happy alone first. Many of us older men didn't understand this when we were younger. We could not, or did not. We might have chosen better or worse. Or sooner. We don't know.

One of the things men need is for someone to warn them against the kind of women who could destroy them. Many of us wish we'd had someone who had done that for us when we were younger men. We got a lot of help from the Manosphere. Many of us who stick around the Manosphere after completing our Red Pill Awakening have a heart for speaking truth to other men. We would just like to pay some of it back, and forward.

There's truth in what our opponents say; but because of the bubbles they live in, they're cloistered and sheltered from the "bad stuff" we saw and experienced and which was perpetrated upon us.

Western culture wants men to repent of being too masculine, too patriarchal, and too "T0x!c", ad nauseum. Meanwhile, some of us who needed a bit more wisdom are busy repenting of being too accepting, too gentle, too passive, and too weak.

We can't and won't ignore wisdom (and facts, and truth) merely because some people don't like it.

We hope only that someone gets something from what we write, so that a little (wholly unnecessary) suffering somewhere might be alleviated.

Criticisms

Yet, in spite of our magnanimous and prolific contributions to RP lore over the years, we're continually criticized.

We're criticized for "gossiping" about women, when all we're doing is repeating what someone else said and using it as an example to help others understand a point.

We're criticized for "suffering", and we're told that I Peter 3:13-22 was written to alleviate it.

OK. But this does nothing to help men now, or our children going forward.

We're criticized for "talking about women".

Feminists say men talking about women is m!s0gyny. Derek L. Ramsey (DLR) says men talking about women is effeminate. Their arguments are different, but their aim and the end result are the same — to get men to shut up.

God commands us to do what we can, here, now.

That's why we talk about women.

About Men Talking About Women

DLR has claimed that Manosphere blogs are too focused on women and criticizes them for that focus, because in his view, that's what women do — sit around and talk, and don't do anything. In his view, men in the Manosphere are effeminate because they focus on women's faults. Bruce Charlton agrees.

DLR is not completely wrong. He believes that both men and women are equally fallen and flawed because they aren't following God or Christ; and that it makes no sense to talk about one sex's flaws to the exclusion of the other's. His view is that both men and women are not sufficiently obedient to Christ, devout, or sexually chaste; and that both men and women are much too secularly focused and worldly.

If we're only talking about the secular Manosphere, I'll admit that this was one of the flaws of the Manosphere 1.0. There was an undercurrent of overweening reverence for women as P_ssy bearers and the wielders of V Power — same as Feminist culture, but the Manosphere 1.0 was much more aware of women's behaviors, deceptions, hamsterbated lies, and various intersexual snafus. The secular Manosphere 2.0 is not so much that way (if at all), but instead focuses on women as the foolish and totally irresponsible gatekeepers of sex, and how their behaviors ruin men and all of society.

The Christian Manosphere 2.0 also discusses women predominantly, but also men's issues too. However, the element of reverence for women is redesignated as how to interpret their irrational behaviors, and handle them effectively — "the care and feeding of the most responsible teenager in the house", as Red Pill Apostle might say.

The point is that, "We are to be wise as serpents and gentle as doves" (Matthew 10:16). It thus has a slightly different approach that DLR is not picking up on. Of course, this is because DLR presumes that all women have full moral agency, whereas other authors in the Christian Manosphere concede that this is seldom the case.

That's why we talk about women.

Why Talk About Women?

One of the reasons we spend time talking about women's flaws and women's responsibility for the problems in intersexual relationships is simply that almost no one else even takes the time to notice that women have any flaws or that women have any responsibility for the problems in intersexual relationships.

Because this society has spent well over 50 years talking about what men have done wrong, what men should be doing, or doing better … and what men's responsibility for the problems in intersexual relationships are.

Because for the past 30+ years, social conversations have been all about men's faults, men's problems, men's weaknesses, t0x!c masculinity, etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseum…

Meanwhile, social conversations have been all about women's interests, women's prerogatives, women's 'rights', and women's presumed 'virtues', such as being Strong and Independent™, getting an education and career (either in the hope that they'll make themselves eligible to marry a commensurately educated man and then 'retire' comfortably at first childbirth, or else exclude themselves from the MMP entirely, due to being excessively 'overcredentialed' for marriage), etc. etc.

Moreover, this society has spent well over 50 years talking about how women are "pearls of great price", perfectly made, and how excellent and wonderful women are, and how they are the social and spiritual superiors of men, with no mention of anything ugly about the female carnal nature.

Almost no one is saying anything about what women are doing wrong.

Almost no one else is pointing out women's share of the responsibility for the problems in intersexual relationships.

We're already talking too much about men, to the point that it is demotivating and discouraging.

Someone needs to explicate on what women have done wrong and what women's role in the problems in intersexual relationships is.

That's why we talk about women.

Talking about Women is M!s0gyny

But…

We can't talk about anything women are actually responsible for, because that would be 'm!s0gyny'.

Any assignment of responsibility to a woman for a relationship problem of any kind is 'm!s0gyny'.

Any recitation of a documented fact about a woman engaging in misconduct is 'm!s0gyny'.

Reciting uncontradicted facts about how people got attracted to each other is 'm!s0gyny'.

Any discussion of women's relationship misconduct is now classified as 'm!s0gyny'.

Calling women out on their faults, lies, and ruses is ‘m1s0gyny’.

Any disagreement with a woman is ‘m!s0gyny’.

Holding women accountable is ‘m1s0gyny’.

Thedeti’s recitation of his own story is ‘m!s0gyny’ because it assigns responsibility to Mrs. deti for things she was, you know, actually responsible for.

Feeriker discussing his divorce from the ex Mrs. Feeriker is ‘m!s0gyny’ because it assigns responsibility to ex Mrs. Feeriker for things she was, you know, actually responsible for.

Jack’s coverage of Biblical Headship Authority is ‘m!s0gyny’ because it reminds p00n pandering egalitarians (feminist women / Purple Pilled men / White Knights / et al.), that women who sign up for marriage have certain responsibilities to their freely chosen husbands and to God for things they are, you know, actually responsible for.

We can’t remind any woman anywhere about anything she did in the past that caused a problem or injured a relationship, because that would be ‘m!s0gyny’.

We can’t ever talk about how women influence men and children, relationships, marriages, families, and ultimately society, because just talking about these things in a true, factually correct, emotionally sterile, educational way, to help someone else avoid that mistake, is ‘m!s0gyny’.

But NOT doing so is hanging men out to dry, essentially m!s@ndry.

That’s why we talk about women.

Epilogue

These things and much more were written on Σ Frame and Spawny’s Space from late 2023 to mid 2025. At first, there was nothing but crickets and criticism. With time, this stance resonated and reverberated around the tiny sphere of blogs that regularly interact with Σ Frame, but failed to penetrate the wider Red Pill 2.0 sphere on YT.

However…

Recently, on certain Femosphere YT channels, some women are taking other women to task for how they are to be responsible in marriage, to husband, to family, and to themselves. Yes, women, because if women don't say this, then no one will listen.

Recently, on some RP 2.0 YT channels, people are beginning to wake up to the fact that the game is rigged against men and detect the truth in what MRAs have been saying for over two decades.

So only now are we being heard. That's a time frame of about 2 years, which is an excessively long delay for the Manosphere 2.0. Typically, what is written about here on Σ Frame is discussed across the Manosphere 2.0 within 2 months. Two years is playing the fool. I'm ashamed of them … almost.

It's about time people listened to MEN!

And … Christian MEN are beginning to repeat (in their own words) what Joshua said to the rebellious Israelites 3,431 years ago.

> "And if it seems evil to you to serve the Lord, choose for yourselves this day whom you will serve, whether the gods which your fathers served who were Blue Pilled Complementarians, or the ressentimental gods of the Fem!n@z! Gynocentrists and the Sodomites, in whose land you dwell. But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."
> Jack's Red Pill paraphrase of Joshua 24:15 (NKJV)

I think it's long past time to cut to the chase, look to God's models for masculinity, femininity, and intersexual relationships as given in the scriptures, and assume responsibility where it is due.

If you're lacking, then get with the program, male or female notwithstanding. You're only hurting yourself and those whom you would otherwise love.

If you've been faithful, then may the Lord reward you accordingly, preserve you, and protect you from the onslaughts of lies in this world.

And … that's why we talk about women.

Intro

I'm Dr. Orion Taban and this is PsycHacks, better living through psychology, and the topic of today's short talk is Sex and Attention.

Okay, so within my economic model, people enter into relationships when they exchange unequal goods of comparable value. And when it comes to sexual relationships between men and women, what typically occurs in the value exchange is that men trade resources for sexual opportunity and women trade sexual opportunity for resources.

Now, it's sometimes the case that people interpret this word 'resources' very rigidly, and they think that I'm just using this as a term synonymous with the word 'money'. This leads them to conclude that I think that all women are gold diggers or that I think that all women are just interested in designer handbags and the soft life. And that is not the case. Certainly, these women exist, and sexual relationships between men and women are enthusiastically transacted every day for these things. But this is only the narrowest interpretation of the word 'resources' possible. Frankly, it suffers from a lack of imagination.

The fact of the matter is that there are many many different kinds of resources and most of the important ones, at least when it comes to transacting sexual relationships, aren't material resources at all, to which, one of the most important resources for which women transact their sexual opportunity is Attention.

And today I'm going to be talking about how this particular resource, Attention, leads to all kinds of strange power dynamics in the context of modern relationships.

Taraban's Equivalency

I'm going to say this as clearly and directly as possible. Sex is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a man, and Attention is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a woman. I can't make it any simpler than that. And this is really important to deeply consider, as it means that each sex has the ability to really influence the behavior of the other.

For instance, women could actually significantly change male behavior on the population level. They would just have to [have sex with] the men who do the things that women insist they want them to do.

You hear this all the time in modern culture. Women want men who are, say, "emotionally available", or men with green flags, or men who "make an effort".

But here's the thing. Women don't [want to have sex with] these men. And men know this.

Most men start out in the sexual marketplace as good faith actors. That is, they listen to women and attempt to give them what they say they want in order to receive what they want in return. But they eventually realize that this doesn't 'work' and they are forced to acknowledge that other men who don't do these things get laid. Women might complain about narcissistic men and [__] and F_ck boys, but despite their complaining, they [still have sex with] these men. So these types of men, or really, this type of behavior, isn't going away anytime soon. This is because sex is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a man. [As long as women are rewarding such men's behavior with sex, their behavior will not change.]

By the same token, the most reinforcing thing that you can give to a woman is Attention. And this inequality, the fact that the most reinforcing thing isn't the same for both genders, leads to a lot of asymmetrical value exchange in sexual relationships.

For instance, as previously mentioned, women complain about F_ck boys. Why? Because they get away with receiving their most reinforcing good, Sex, without reciprocally providing the woman with her most reinforcing good, Attention, and the validation and consideration and commitment that often attends Attention. And this wrankles women because they feel like they got the fuzzy end of the lollipop in that exchange. But they still F_ck F_ck boys! How else could they be F_ck boys? [The sex] is what keeps them around.

Now, as common as this transaction may have become in today's day and age, it is not nearly as ubiquitous and commonplace as the converse. Namely, men providing women with their most reinforcing good, Attention, without receiving their most reinforcing good, Sex, in return. Men are giving women Attention, validation, and consideration without receiving Sex in return, on the scale of billions of people every day. And this has radically changed the topography of the sexual marketplace.

Equivalencies Produce Unequal Intersexual Competitions

This situation doesn't just change dating. After all, if a woman is already receiving her most reinforcing good from hundreds or thousands of other people, then why does she need to transact with any particular man in the sexual marketplace?

It fundamentally changes committed sexual relationships between men and women as well.

Let me explain.

A lot of what is negotiated in committed relationships are the boundaries that separate the couple from the rest of the world.

Now, individual organisms have to be delineated from the rest of the universe to exist as individuals. And good fences make good neighbors, right?

But what is often not discussed is how often and to what extent these boundaries have more to do with power and control than maintaining the integrity of the relationship.

For instance, if I'm able to eliminate your options, which are my competition, while simultaneously preserving my options, which are your competition, then I'm definitely going to be the more powerful player in the relationship.

This [inequality] has a lot to do with the fact that, in the vast majority of committed relationships, the women are the more powerful players. And to understand why, we have to move away from a very rigid interpretation of 'equality' that expects a perfect symmetry between what a man does and what a woman does.

That would make sense if men and women were the same. And that's what the last 60 years of social programming have encouraged us to believe. But they're not.

Men and women are different, and they want and need different things from each other in relationships. And one of these important differences is the asymmetry between men's and women's most reinforcing goods.

Asymmetrical Equivalencies

As previously discussed, women tend to be the more powerful players in committed relationships because the general expectation here is that, in committed relationships, there is symmetrical sexual exclusivity. And this would be fair if both parties valued sex equally, but they don't. It is a far more important and reinforcing good for men than it is for women.

So what's the problem? Well, in a symmetrically sexually exclusive relationship, both parties agree to relinquish their optionality and become each other's exclusive sex dealers. But the power inherent in that exclusivity is directly related to the perceived value of the good in question.

[As an analogy,] no one might balk if there's only one yarn store in town because people don't really need to knit. But look what happens when there's only one gas station or supermarket. The prices are always higher.

[Likewise,] Women in sexually exclusive relationships are like the company store. Her monopoly on a desired good tends to significantly inflate prices. Now, women might balk at this and say, "Well, I'm sexually exclusive, too, Orion. So, whatever inconvenience or expense the man experiences, I experience as well. It's equal." And it's like, "Ah, no, no, no! It's NOT equal because the exclusivity in question is related to HIS most reinforcing good, the primary thing that HE's in a sexual relationship with a woman to obtain."

So goods of comparable value are NOT typically exchanged in these arrangements.

So what would be equal? Well, you should be able to figure that out by now. If appropriate boundaries in a relationship are predicated on each party becoming the monopolized dealer of the other party's most reinforcing good, then an equal arrangement would be if a woman became a particular man's exclusive sex dealer and a man became a particular woman's exclusive attention dealer.

Oh [__ !!!] [That is NEVER going to happen!]

Marriage is More Beneficial for Women than for Men

Okay, let's review. The most reinforcing good to a woman is Attention in the sense of being seen, being heard, being emotionally valued and validated, etc. [Receiving Attention is to a woman what getting laid is to a man.] And women will do all kinds of things, including offering Sex to secure that Attention from the men they want to receive it from.

However, when a woman doesn't relinquish other sources of Attention in the context of a committed relationship, then what she has functionally done is succeed in eliminating the man's optionality while retaining her own. That is, the man is constrained from seeking Sex elsewhere, but the woman remains free to receive Attention and validation from other sources.

This leads us to conclude that a woman who receives Attention and Validation outside of her relationship is actually comparable to a man who gets Sex outside of his relationship.

Institutionalized Asymmetry

This optionality asymmetry directly contributes to power asymmetries in the relationship. And this asymmetry is protected by a good deal of entitlement. That is, a woman's attempt to constrain a man from having Sex outside of a committed relationship is considered healthy, justified, and appropriate boundary setting. But any attempts from a man to constrain a woman from receiving Attention and Validation outside of a committed relationship is considered toxic, controlling, and manipulative. It's a sign of his insecurity and fragile masculinity to boot. And so, in the wake of this shaming, many men often tacitly consent to this optionality asymmetry. And this keeps women the more powerful players in the majority of relationships.

This is actually very difficult to fix. Most women are going to receive Attention and Validation passively as they move through the world, but they absolutely can also seek out Attention actively through social media, clubbing with the girls, entertaining their orbiters, etc. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to constrain a woman's ability to receive Attention and Validation from society at large.

Because … What would that look like? It would look like,

"Why is your account public?"

"Why are you going out dressed like that?"

"Why are you spending time with those men?"

These are all attempts by men to control their exclusive access to the resource for which she is primarily transacting the relationship.

In fact, and you might think this is totally nutty, but some cultures have gone so far as to put women in a literal sheet from head to toe so that they're not able to receive passive Attention and Validation from outside sources as they move through the world. But I think Western women are about as likely to surrender their social media accounts as they are to wear a burka.

And why would they? After all, no one surrenders power willingly.

My point here is that what is equal isn't always fair, and what is fair isn't always equal. And as long as men's sexuality in committed relationships is constrained, but women's attention-seeking behaviors are not, women on the whole will continue to be the more powerful players in their sexual relationships.

Here, I'll cover a groundbreaking video from Liam DeBoer at Blendr News which compares male and female social pathologies within a sociosexual paradigm that he calls "Gender Predation".

Blendr News (Liam DeBoer): The Gender Predation Paradigm (2025/12/3)

It used to be that moralizers panicked over the immoral and manipulative nature of PUA Game tactics, but in comparison to Gender Predation, Game seems like child's play. We, as a culture, are no longer playing Games.

The remainder of this post contains:

1. A description of Gender Predation that appeared in a Blendr News Substack article posted a day before the video.
2. A transcript of the above video.

I'll break this down in several upcoming posts.

Gender Predation

Here is the most controversial opinion that society must recognize before it's too late: Female promiscuity and pornography are the female equivalents of violent criminal behaviour in men. Both are pathological inversions of the masculine ideal of strength and the feminine ideal of beauty. This is what I call The Gender Predation Paradigm — a framework for understanding how male and female failure modes mirror each other in a culture that has dissolved every guardrail meant to civilize them.

Human behaviour didn't spring out of thin air. It grew out of evolutionary incentives.

- Men's physical strength evolved for protection, provision, and competition.
- Women's beauty and fertility cues evolved for mate selection and securing long-term investment.

These traits weren't decorative — they were survival strategies. But when cultural guardrails break — family structure, sexual norms, community cohesion — these strengths don't disappear. They become weaponized.

Men commit almost all violent crime, not because men are evil, but because male traits like risk-taking, impulsivity, and aggression become destructive when they detach from duty. The typical male failure mode is straightforward: use strength to take resources. Robbery, assault, fraud, gang violence — the dark side of masculinity is force.

The typical female failure mode follows the same evolutionary logic but through a different channel: use beauty and sexuality to extract resources. Not through building families or stable partnerships, but through promiscuity, pornography, sugaring, attention-maximizing, and short-term manipulation of male desire. This isn't identical to male criminality, but it serves the same function: to exploit one's biological advantage to prey on the weak and pull resources from them.

This is what happens when ideals collapse.

Masculine Ideal: protector, builder, discipline.
Masculine Pathology: thug, drifter, criminal.

Feminine Ideal: nurturer, chooser, gatekeeper of pair-bonding.
Feminine Pathology: promiscuous manipulator, seller of intimacy, extractor of attention.

Both are corrupted versions of real virtues.

Why does this happen now?

Three Modern Accelerants:

1. Collapse of Stigma — No social cost to selling or exploiting sexuality.
2. Technological Leverage — OnlyF@ns, T!nder, and algorithmic p0rn turn beauty into a scalable commodity.
3. Weak Communities and Widespread Fatherlessness — No training, no guardrails, no cultural expectations.

The root cause is the same for both sexes: Fatherlessness and the erosion of family norms.

- Men commit less crime when bonded, mentored, and embedded in a community.
- Women exploit sexuality less when guided by fathers, mothers, and strong social norms toward healthy pair-bonding.

And the consequences are the same: Societal Decay.

- When men's pathology goes unchecked, communities collapse into violence.
- When women's pathology goes unchecked, relationships collapse into mistrust, loneliness, and demographic decline.

Both are downstream from a culture that no longer admits masculine and feminine ideals exist — let alone that they must be channeled, not denied.

Transcript of Blendr News Video

[This transcript is nearly identical to the post quoted above.]

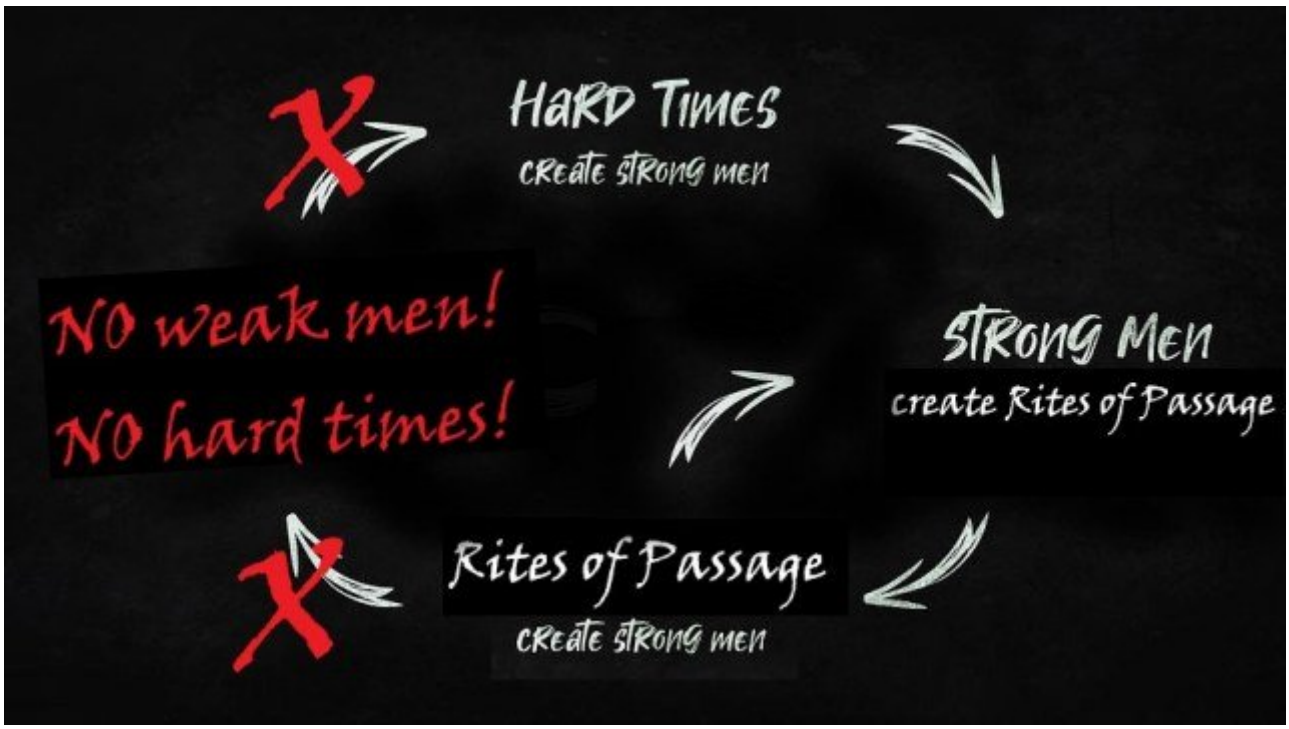
Here is the most controversial idea that society needs to face before it's too late. Female promiscuity and adult content generation are the female equivalents of violent criminal behavior in men. Both are warped versions of the masculine ideal of strength and the feminine ideal of beauty. I call this The Gender Predation Paradigm. A way to understand how male and female failure modes mirror each other once the guardrails that used to civilize us fall apart.

Human behavior didn't appear out of nowhere. It grew out of evolutionary incentives.

- Men developed strength for protection, provision, and competition.
- Women developed beauty and selectiveness for choosing partners and building long-term stability.

These traits weren't decorative, they were survival tools. But when cultural guardrails break, family structure, dating norms, community cohesion, these strengths don't disappear. They get weaponized.

Men commit the vast majority of violent crime. Not because men are inherently evil, but because male traits like risk-taking and aggression go dark when detached from responsibility. The male failure mode is obvious, using strength to take resources, robbery, assault, gangs. The shadow side of masculinity is force.



The feminine failure mode follows the same evolutionary logic, but through a different channel, using beauty in short-term intimacy cues to extract resources, not through building families or stable bonds, but through hyper casual behavior, digital content selling, sugaring, attention farming, and short-term manipulation of male desire. It's not identical to male criminality, but it serves the same function, exploiting one's biological advantage to prey on the weak and pull resources from them.

This is what happens when ideals collapse.

Masculine Ideal: protector, builder, disciplined.
Masculine Pathology: thug, drifter, criminal.

Feminine Ideal: nurturer, chooser, gatekeeper of commitment.
Feminine Pathology: hyper casual manipulator, the seller of simulated intimacy and extractor of attention.

Both are corruptions of real virtues.

Why is this exploding now?

Well, three accelerants.

1. The first is the collapse of stigma. No social cost to exploiting intimacy.
2. A second is tech leverage. Subscription platforms, swipe apps, and algorithmic fantasy turn beauty into a scalable commodity.
3. The last is weak communities and fatherlessness. No training, no boundaries, no expectations.

The root cause is the same for both genders. The breakdown of family norms.

- Men act out less when bonded, mentored, and embedded in community.
- Women exploit less when guided by strong parents and clear norms for healthy pair bonding.

And the consequences are the same. Societal decay.

- When male pathology goes unchecked, communities fall into violence.
- When female pathology goes unchecked, relationships collapse into mistrust, loneliness, and demographic decline.

Both are downstream from a culture that no longer admits masculine and feminine ideals exist, let alone that they must be shaped and channeled, not denied.

Sociosexual currencies in a debased SMP.

Intro

In the last two posts, Sex and Attention: The Most Reinforcing Good (2026/2/2) and Gender Predation of Attention and Sex (2026/2/4), I covered two recent RP 2.0 video talks from Dr. Orion Taraban and Liam DeBoer, respectively, that present current sociosexual dynamics from an economic viewpoint.

Between these two videos, there's a lot to unpack.

DeBoer and Taraban make their ideas very clear in their videos, but when I copied the transcripts and started picking them apart, I found their arguments (1) make many of the same assumptions and observations, and (2) contain many assumptions and contextual nuances that are not well stated. So this and the next few posts extrapolate the full breakdown of their assertions, assumptions, contextual factors, and the implications thereof.

In this post, I'll summarize and compare their main arguments.

Taraban's Equivalency: Different Commodities, Different Demands

The first and most important idea that both DeBoer and Taraban put forth is that men and women have different 'demands' and provide different 'commodities'.

Taraban stated,

> "Sex is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a man, and Attention is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a woman."

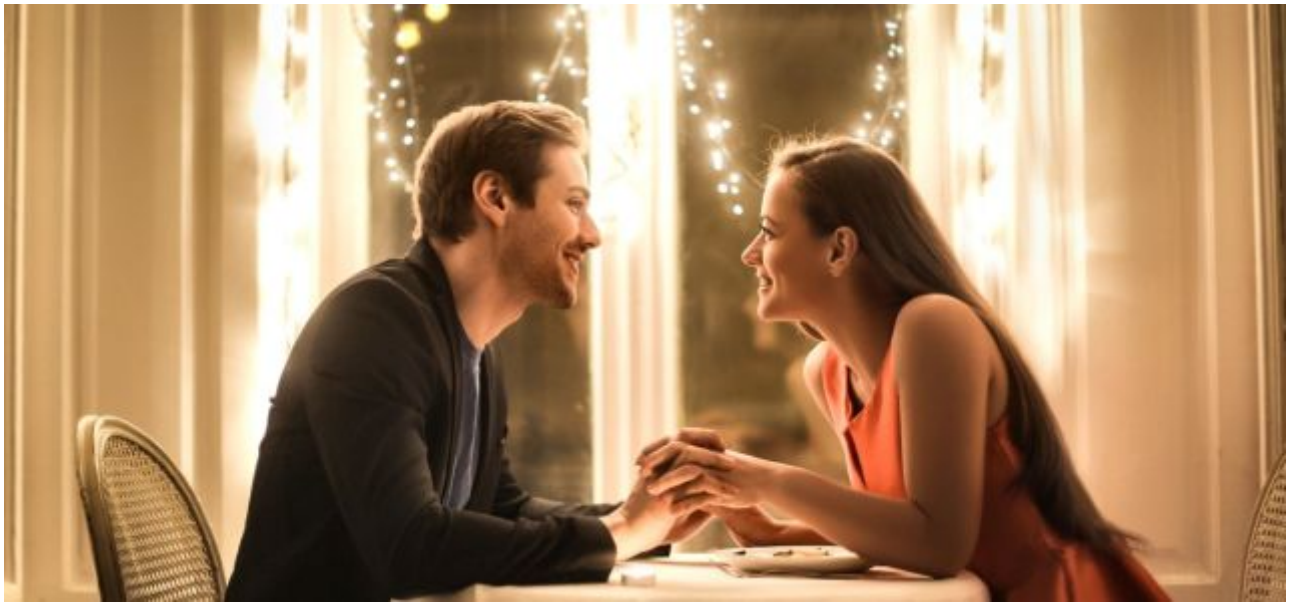
His talk is comprehensively postulated as follows:

Taraban's Equivalency: Attention / Validation is to women what Sex is to men, and these reinforcements (a la operant conditioning) constitute the primary sociosexual currency within the economic trade model of intersexual dynamics.



DeBoer's Gender Predation

DeBoer goes further to say that men and women use these reinforcements to control the opposite sex and to extract what is most desired, in a dynamic that he calls "Gender Predation".

To wit,

- Women use beauty and sexuality to extract resources through attention-maximizing, pornography, promiscuity, prostitution (e.g. OnlyF@ns), sugaring, and short-term manipulation of male desire.
- Men use strength to take resources through assault, fraud, gang violence, robbery, etc.
- Concerning the intersexual exchange, I'll add that men also use their strength in the form of wealth generation and resource management to extract sex from women via transactions, be it a $1,000/night high-class escort/prostitute, Sugar Trips to the Maldives, Yacht Candy, etc., or the more middle-class interest in IG / OnlyF@ns, or for the common man, simply browsing free P0rn in private.*

These transactions are terribly destructive to one's spiritual constitution, to the community, and to society because…

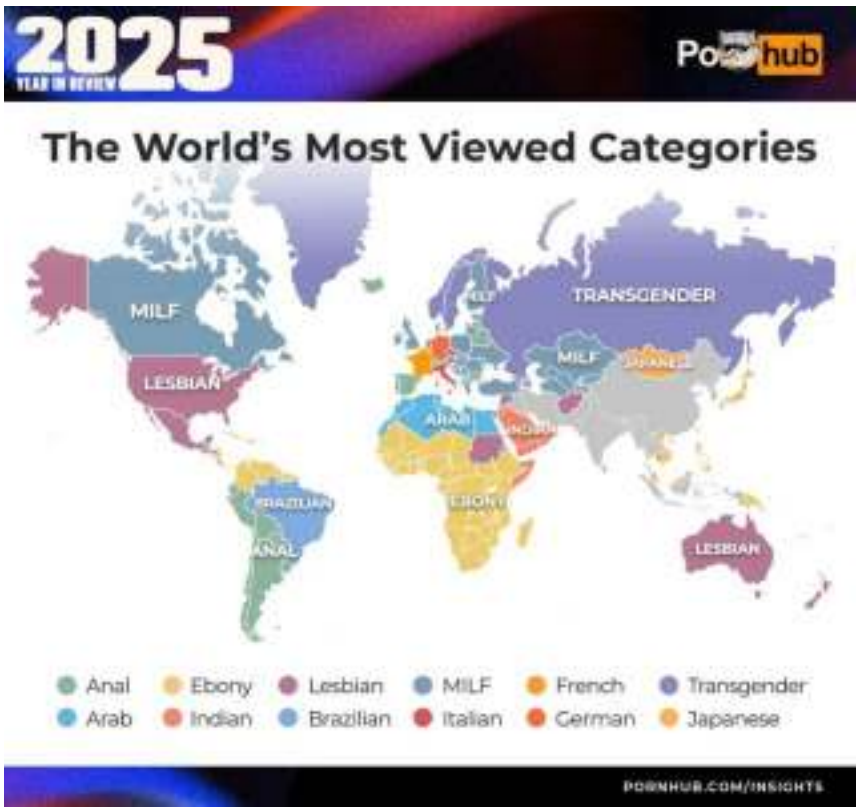
- Even just one short-term sexual transaction can permanently ruin a woman's worthiness for marriage.
- Even just one terribly bad nuclear rejection or especially divorce graping can permanently erase any interest in marital commitment that a man might have.

Comparing Taraban's and DeBoer's Viewpoints

Taraban and DeBoer both make the same essential observations concerning the exchange of Attention and Sex between the sexes.

Taraban's viewpoint is flatly objective, taking a rather neutral approach. He highlights the operant conditioning that occurs between the sexes. He concludes that women get the better end of the bargain, saying, "Here's how it is … and it's not good for men."

DeBoer's viewpoint casts suspicion on the opposite sex's motivations (and with good reason these days). He takes a contrasting, more controversial, and more nuanced view, saying, "Intersexual dynamics have degraded to raw transactions, catering to the pathologies of both sexes, leading to the breakdown of the family and the degradation of society." DeBoer highlights the importance of personal agency and responsibility.



Vicious Transactions

According to my understanding of DeBoer's observations, the phenomenon of Gender Predation might be summarized as various social and technological methods of mechanized, routinized seduction implemented on a mass societal scale, although hidden and privatized (via. P0rn, OnlyF@ns, Sugaring, Tinder, etc.). In general, this seduction offers an immediate satisfaction of fleshly desire in exchange for a payoff of some sort, perhaps also an 'Equivalent' (viz., sex-specific) satiation of desire (attention, control, resources, sex, etc.), which may be entirely, distantly mediated by a broker, paid account, paywall, platform, website, etc. This exchange is NOT like the Transactional Relationships that I wrote extensively about in the past, which involved actual relationships to some degree or at least the appearance thereof, but rather what I'd call a Feral or Vicious Transaction in which self-interest overrules the relationship, even at the cost of the other's well-being.

It gets worse. Over time, a habit of such interactions conditions each sex (or the opposite sex) to automatically respond to specific stimuli, to adjust expectations accordingly (often exorbitantly), and to somatically depend on it to satisfy and/or sate temptation — IOW, a spiritual addiction. This is why we see women DEMANDING that men pay hundreds of dollars just for NOTHING MORE than the "privilege" of watching them eat. This is why we see hundreds of thousands, if not MILLIONS of men, paying hard-earned $$$ just to see ASMR and OASIS starlets strip and squip.

By using various strategies, techniques, and technological tools, some individuals are able to expertly master the fleshly weaknesses of the opposite sex, and enslave them to their fix for instant gratification. That's why I call it Vicious.

As DeBoer pointed out, when communal confines and social regulations (e.g. marriage) are absent, one is much more susceptible to this conditioning, even unto eternal perdition. That's also why I call it Vicious.

A Note on Natural Interactions and Conditioning

Taraban and DeBoer are both addressing secular, intersexual exchanges that tend to be short-term, debased, and explicitly self-aggrandizing. However, to remind readers of how things are supposed to be, the fundamental conditioning between sexes is ideally a healthy interaction and need not be pernicious, and shouldn't be within a Christian community or marriage. Within a healthy and loving context, operant conditioning should be used to 'mold' or 'shape' the opposite sex to better fit a spouse's needs or to be more to one's liking (per sanctification), or to better fit God's gender archetypes.

- Conditioning women is the whole idea behind 'Wife Molding' and raising daughters well.
- The Conditioning of men is largely determined by male mentoring and sociosexual Trajectories.
- Both are strongly shaped by a strong father figure. (DeBoer points out the consequences of when this role model is absent.)

Molding godly femininity and masculinity and developing holiness is difficult, while the predation of the fleshly nature is succulently sinful and self-gratifying. It's an uphill battle.

Moreover, Gender Predation is the evil opposite of Spouse Molding and Child Rearing.

Closing

Of course, what I've described above is a highly abstract and spiritualized concept of sociosexual Equivalencies and Gender Predation. In the next few posts, I'll explain how all this fits together and the ramifications on dating and marriage. It will be shown that, in a debased SMP/MMP, Taraban's Equivalencies break down in both dating and marriage, but in different ways, and in either case, DeBoer's Gender Predation comes to the fore.

Stated in the previous post:

> Taraban's Equivalency: Attention / Validation is to women what Sex is to men, and these reinforcements (a la operant conditioning) constitute the primary sociosexual currency within the economic trade model of intersexual dynamics.

Taraban's Equivalency constitutes a new paradigm of sociosexual parity between the sexes.

Let me explain.

Inequivalent Equivalencies

SMV/MMV parity (i.e. how well a man and a woman match each other) was once estimated by a comprehensive assessment regarding age, attractiveness, health, looks, socioeconomic status, and sociosexual dimorphism.

But now, parity is determined by how well one can satisfy the particular sociosexual desires, expectations, and needs of a particular member of the opposite sex. This includes all of the static characteristics of the old estimation, respective to sex, plus the dynamic aspects of charisma / Rizz and the applied skills of (women) pulling the Attention of not just men in general, but the high SMV males whom they desire, or (men) charming the pants off P00nbearers at sheer will.

As Taraban notes, these 'Equivalencies' may appear to have equitable face value (i.e. one's cognizant awareness of sociosexual 'parity' during a sociosexual transaction); however, these 'Equivalencies' are far from actually being 'equivalent' in terms of real relational value, for the following reasons.

1. Attention tends to spoil women, whereas, Sex tends to empower men.
2. Sex has ethical taboos and moral implications that Attention does not have.
3. It is much MUCH easier for women to get Attention than it is for men to get Sex.
4. Women engage in giving away Sex for free (to Top Ch@ds), and this is responsible for both the mass defilement of women and the breakdown of the SMP.
5. Men give women beaucoup Attention for free, thus contributing to an intersexual power imbalance that is detrimental to both Headship and a man's internal locus of control.
6. Women giving men Sex outside of marriage, the Equivalency thereof notwithstanding, is far more costly and damaging to these women, to the family in general, and to societal order by extension, than it is for men giving women Attention without equal sexual recompense.

These 'inequivalencies' have far-reaching ramifications, but the end result, as we can see, is that both men and women are freely and willingly giving away what is most valuable without commensurate recompense, while ironically failing to receive what is most desired — a dynamic that I'll cover in a future post, Selling Out Cheap

Consequently, there are fewer and fewer couples forming LTRs, and even fewer marriages. Soft harems, AKA 'Situationships', and out-of-wedlock births abound in their stead.

He wants her fruit. She wants his bread.

How Men and Women Influence Each Other via Operant Conditioning

Taraban states that these Equivalencies are exchanged via operant conditioning, so let's examine how this works.

As Taraban describes,

> "…each sex has the ability to really influence the behavior of the other.
> For instance, women could actually significantly change male behavior on the population level. They would just have to [have sex with] the men who do the things that women insist they want them to do.
> You hear this all the time in modern culture. Women want men who are, say, "emotionally available", or men with green flags, or men who "make an effort".
> But here's the thing. Women don't [want to have sex with] these men. And men know this.
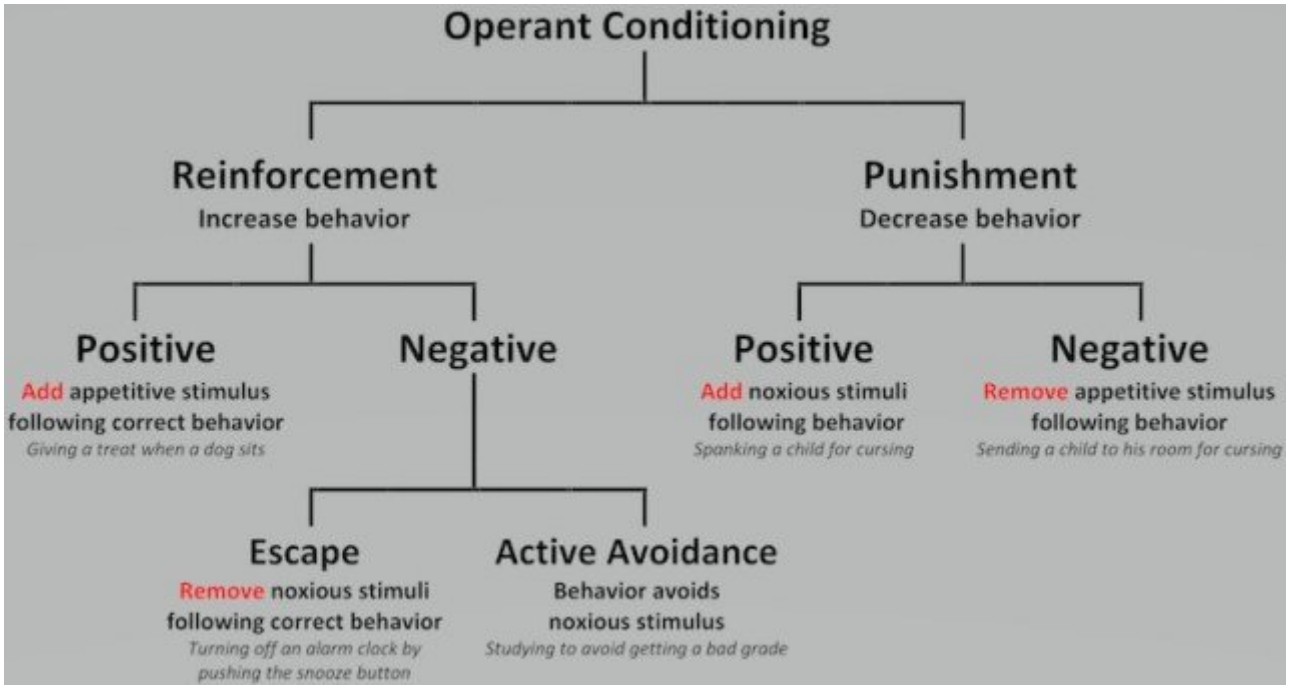
> Most men start out in the sexual marketplace as good-faith actors. That is, they listen to women and attempt to give them what they say they want in order to receive what they want in return. But they eventually realize that this doesn't 'work' and they are forced to acknowledge that other men who don't do these things get laid. Women might complain about narcissistic men and [__] and F_ck boys, but despite their complaining, they [still have sex with] these men. So these types of men, or really, this type of behavior, isn't going away anytime soon. This is because sex is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a man. [As long as women are rewarding such men's behavior with sex, their behavior will not change.]"



> "By the same token, the most reinforcing thing that you can give to a woman is Attention."
> This inequality, the fact that the most reinforcing thing isn't the same for both genders, leads to a lot of asymmetrical value exchange in sexual relationships.
> For instance, as previously mentioned, women complain about F_ck boys. Why? Because they get away with receiving their most reinforcing good, Sex, without reciprocally providing the woman with her most reinforcing good, Attention, and the validation and consideration and commitment that often attends Attention. And this wrankles women because they feel like they got the fuzzy end of the lollipop in that exchange. But they still F_ck F_ck boys! How else could they be F_ck boys? [The sex] is what keeps them around."

Taraban didn't discuss the flip side — men's viewpoint of profligate women, who are much MUCH more ubiquitous than F_ck Boys are — probably because that would offend women. So here it is.

Men complain about the ubiquity of women who've given their most precious gift of consummate love to fly-by-night Ch@ds and worthless thugs, and continue doing so for a decade or more, and have thus made themselves unworthy of marriage and motherhood. Why? Because they get away with receiving their most reinforcing good, Attention, without reciprocally providing their future husband (if any) with his most reinforcing good, Sex, and the loyalty, natural affection, pair bonding, respect, and sexual passion that often attends Sexual Chastity. This shreds men's hearts because they feel like they got Chad's defiled, diseased, loose labial lipped leftovers in that exchange. But they still lavish women with unearned Attention, and they still wife up unrepentant slores! How else could these women get away with all their sexual indiscretions and then stick the landing? The lack of accountability is what permits them to continue riding the carousel.

Game is a Form of Operant Conditioning

Perhaps the most important contribution of the old school PUAs is that they uncovered and identified the specific sociosexual economic currencies that condition and motivate women, i.e. Attention, Validation, and good hard shagging from HSMV men. I do not believe that the PUA's thought of the model the way that Taraban does, as an equivalent exchange, but they certainly arrived at the same answer through trial and error of various Game tactics. So, we owe a debt of gratitude to the amoral Pick-Up Artists for exposing the essence of Taraban's Equivalency through their manipulations.

To briefly review for the younger set, examples of said Game tactics are:

- In general, a man addressing everyone in a group instead of just the targeted woman is a form of withholding Attention to establish a favorable power dynamic.
- Alpha Male of the Group (AMOG)
- Amused Mastery
- Detachment
- Dread
- Grandstanding
- Negs
- Preselection
- Many others

All of these Game tools are designed to manipulate and/or corral women's Attention seeking behaviors.

Also, as I've mentioned before and must do so again because of the significance thereof, Taraban points out that the reason why Muslim cultures require women to wear burkas is because it totally eliminates the free Attention that women get from walking around in public, and serves to make getting Attention exclusive to their husbands. Is there any Christian equivalent to this custom?

Conclusions

Women are far FAR more adept at attracting Attention from Men than Men are at attracting Women who are eager and willing to satisfy their sexual needs. Women are literally building a lucrative business around attracting Attention from Men. Most men fall for this, while circumspect Men are disciplining themselves to resist the temptations of such transactions with said Women.

Traditional dating and courtship will be a thing of the past, for as long as this lopsided dynamic of Transactional Situationships continues.

Taraban's Equivalency Breaks Down in Marriage

Sociosexual currency loses trade value in the economics of Marriage.

Intro

The major point of Taraban's thesis on Equivalencies is that intersexual transactions, including dating and marriage, are an economic exchange, where dissimilar goods of comparatively equal value are traded. Dating is essentially an Equivalency-based trade, geared toward pairing, sexual intercourse (among seculars), and determining the feasibility of either a Short-Term or Long-Term engagement. In marriage, that trade is supposed to make both parties better off, provided that each party executes their role in the trade reasonably well, or at least makes an honest effort to do so in good faith. However, trading Equivalencies (i.e., Attention, involving the man's time and $$$, and Sex, requiring a sacrifice of the woman's purity) before marriage erodes the benefits provided to one's spouse after Marriage.

The last post explained why Taraban's Equivalencies are NOT Equivalent in relational value. However, Marriage alters the entire ontology of the exchange, thereby recasting the value of Taraban's theoretical concepts of Equivalency in a totally different light. In Marriage, they are even more UN-Equivalent than in dating. IMO, Taraban doesn't go into sufficient detail about this or how this works. (Taraban has never been married.)

Today, I'll explain how Taraban's Equivalency is explicitly central to dating and extramarital sexual liaisons, and is only somewhat relevant in marriage, whereas DeBoer's Gender Predation may apply to any type of intersexual relationship, unfortunately.

Taraban's Equivalency is Preeminent before Marriage

Stated in the previous post:

> Taraban's Equivalency: Attention / Validation is to women what Sex is to men, and these reinforcements (a la operant conditioning) constitute the primary sociosexual currency within the economic trade model of intersexual dynamics.

Before marriage, Taraban's Equivalency applies predominantly: Men are seeking Sex; Women are seeking Attention, as well as Affirmation, Validation, Provi$ion, and many other things that accompany Attention.

Before or outside of marriage, the imbalances inherent in Taraban's Equivalency (discussed in a previous post and outlined here) have different effects on each sex which manifest in particular paradigms that are well known to regular readers:

1. The Alpha Fux Paradigm — Men who can get as much Sex as they want or need outside of marriage will strategically avoid the mating limitations imposed by a monogamous commitment.
2. The Attention Wh0re / Carousel Rider / Feminist Life Script Paradigms — Women who can get as much Attention / Validation as they want or need outside of marriage will postpone marriage until their opportunities to marry well and/or have children begin to wane.
3. The Beta Bux / Orbiter Paradigm — Most men are NOT able to obtain Sex by granting women Attention, and must trade something of greater value, e.g. marriage or $$$, in order to gain sexual access.
4. The Alpha Widow Paradigm — Many Women are willing to have Sex in order to gain Attention from high SMV men, but there is no incentive for said men to marry their admiring, soaking wet paramours.

As we well know, these imbalances, on a large enough scale, cause the entire SMP and MMP to be unbalanced, and the resulting large-scale imbalance also hobbles the individuals' entrance into the MMP. This is precisely why the SMP IS the MMP.

Marriage Alters Taraban's Equivalency

But when it comes to (what we call) 'Marriage', a new paradigm emerges. Attention and Sex are no less important; however, the ideas of exclusivity and permanence cause both men and women to consider a longer time frame in their mating calculations.

In the nuptial context, the sum total of what kind of lifestyle a man or woman can offer to the other becomes the predominant sociosexual currency upon entering into marriage. Optimizing one's overall quality of life rises to the forefront of both men's and women's priorities when cashing in their chips. This is not only important in the run-up to marriage, but also in the work of maintaining the relationship after marriage. Couples who are willing and able to navigate and negotiate these sex-specific demands invariably fare better in marriage.

Men and Women have different concepts of what a quality life entails, encompassing a different set of so-called 'Equivalencies'. I'll differentiate these sets by referring to them as Sexual Market Equivalencies (SME) vs Marital Market Equivalencies (MME).

Taraban's Equivalencies of Attention and Sex are SMEs. The MME's are thus:

1. Men want to be obeyed (i.e. wives are helpers), respected, supported, and well laid.
2. Traditionally, Women want to be cherished, honored (e.g., via status), loved, pampered, and provided for.
3. Women who are steeped in Complementarianism / Egalitarianism / Feminism will have a revised set of MME's, involving certain 'Freedoms', influence, overt control, pedestalization, and the stipulation that the man must never step on her overinflated ego, although they'll invariably recast these requirements in more deceptive and persuasive words.

Again, I'm referring to Marriage, NOT merely sexual liaisons, in which women pursue serial monogamy hypergamously, and men will shag almost any snatch they can get.

The gritty gist of it is, that formal Marriage is the point at which Taraban's Equivalency in trade diverges:

- Women CAN, WILL, and DO compromise on Attention / Validation in order to optimize their quality of life via marital opportunity.
- In turn, Men are forced to accept wives who are disobedient, disrespectful, disinterested in sexual relations, and too independent to be helpful, or else not marry.
- However, men's dire need for the continuous availability of gratuitous Sex, the specifically cooperative help of a wife (as opposed to her being a dragging, nagging dead weight), and reproductive viability (i.e. family and its well-being) are inseparably linked to men's marital satisfaction and can NOT be negotiated nor forfeited.

Men's inability to compromise on these needs places men at a severe disadvantage in the negotiation.

Marriage Grants Women an Edge in the Power Dynamics

Dr. Taraban describes this mismatch in terms of Economic Equivalency in Marriage as follows.

> "…women tend to be the more powerful players in committed relationships because the general expectation here is that, in committed relationships, there is symmetrical sexual exclusivity. And this would be fair if both parties valued sex equally, but they don't. It is a far more important and reinforcing good for men than it is for women.
> So what's the problem? Well, in a symmetrically sexually exclusive relationship, both parties agree to relinquish their optionality and become each other's exclusive sex dealers. But the power inherent in that exclusivity is directly related to the perceived value of the good in question.
> [As an analogy,] no one might balk if there's only one yarn store in town because people don't really need to knit. But look what happens when there's only one gas station or supermarket. The prices are always higher.

This is the power wives wield via sexual withholding in marriage, and why it is so damaging to men and to marriages.

Here, I'll postulate that the primary reason why women desire marriage (eventually) and why men avoid it. It is because, in today's climate, everything changes after marriage — and to her benefit. She secures de facto and de jure dictatorial control over a man who willingly limits his virility in the form of a monogamous commitment to her, as well as gaining honor, social status, power, and provision, including a financial buffer, as well as many other benefits and resources.

Red Pilled readers will know this unfair dynamic has existed for decades, and the Manosphere has addressed it for over 10 years, but only now is it getting massive airplay.

Unbalanced Sociosexual Economics in Marriage

Taraban pointed out that Marriage tends to be more beneficial for women than it is for men. He describes this imbalance as follows.

> "Now, women might balk at this and say, "Well, I'm sexually exclusive, too, Orion. So, whatever inconvenience or expense the man experiences, I experience as well. It's equal." And it's like, "Ah, no, no, no; it's NOT equal because the exclusivity in question is related to HIS most reinforcing good, the primary thing that HE's in a sexual relationship with a woman to obtain."

The primordial injustice of marriage, as Taraban explained, is that Traditional Marriage, by definition, severely limits men's sexual opportunity to the caprices of his wife's interest in having sex with him, but it places no such limitations whatsoever on women getting Attention / Validation from all the men she can twerk her @ss at, or wag her jugs at, coital contact or not. This divergence of equal value is precisely why marriage tends to create a power imbalance in terms of "unsatisfied needs", according to Taraban's Equivalency (especially if the woman is a ran through 304 who can no longer offer up pair bonding, respect, submission, etc. to a man).

I'll add that women will disingenuously disagree with this claim if…

1. They forfeited Validation in marriage by riding the carousel and/or by 'settling'.
2. They compromised on Validation in order to stick the landing.
3. Divorce graping proves not as profitable as they had hoped.

> "So goods of comparable value are NOT typically exchanged in these arrangements.
> So what would be equal? Well, you should be able to figure that out by now. If appropriate boundaries in a relationship are predicated on each party becoming the monopolized dealer of the other party's most reinforcing good, then an equal arrangement would be if a woman became a particular man's exclusive Sex dealer and a man became a particular woman's exclusive Attention dealer."

Attention Exclusivity? What's that?

Taraban points out that this is the reason why Muslim cultures require women to wear burkas. It creates a more equal Equivalency by totally eliminating the free Attention that women get from just walking around in public, and serves to make getting Attention exclusive to their husbands, just as Marriage stipulates a man getting Sex exclusive to his wife. Muslim cultures enforce this custom by shaming women who won't self-regulate in accord with the culturally imposed standards of female modesty.

Case Study – The Modest Moral Muslim Minx

As a side note, burkas, hijabs, other head coverings and such only limit the lecherous lust that a woman can inflict on men — it doesn't necessarily imply or induce her own chastity.

I've heard field stories of American soldiers hiring Afghanistanian Muslim prostitutes who would strip naked, dance hard for their squid pay, and then F_ck through a whole platoon of Big White American C0cks — silly willy nilly — but would absolutely refuse to remove their head coverings, even while they were cumming, moaning, quivering in ecstasy, and squirting their Skene juices all over the field issue blankets covering the dusty grounds of the bivouac. They believed that if they ever let their hair down, they would lose their 'honor' and their warped sense of moral security, and would thus be 'bad, immoral women', according to their twisted ethical code of 'honor'. Heh.

The not-so-moral of the story is that these Afghan Muslim women would sooner prostitute themselves than uncover their hair, because the latter would induce guilt and/or cause them to be shamed and shunned, whereas the former can always be secreted.

That's the amazing power of sociosexual (or sacreligious) conditioning on women! For better, or, in this case, for worse.

Societal Scale Economics of Gender Predation

When the business aspect of marriage relationships breaks down on a large enough scale, the results are those described in the Blendr News' video on men's and women's social pathologies. The concept that is most important to note from this video is the male and female equivalent pathologies, with the common thread being the extraction of resources from the opposite sex.

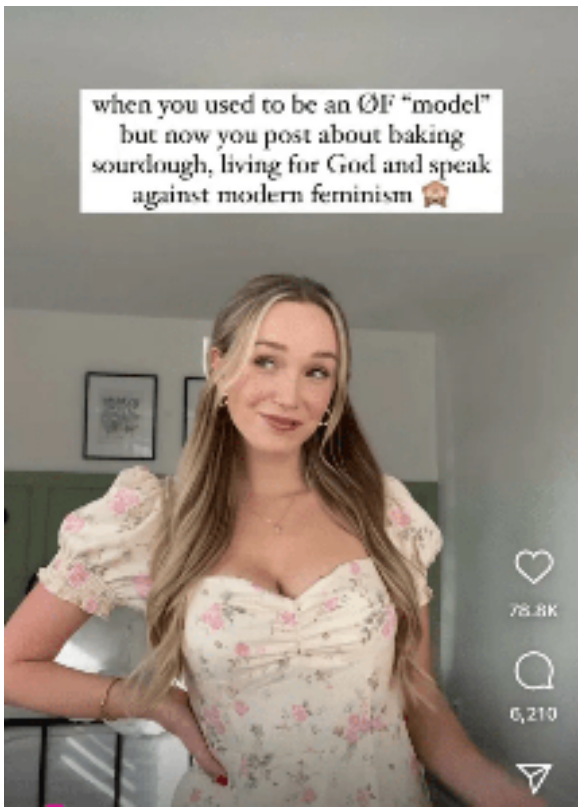
As Blendr News pointed out:

- Men extract resources by manipulating others' physical weakness through physical force and taking.
- Women extract resources by manipulating men's emotional / moral / sexual weaknesses through seduction and temptation.

Jack added,

- Men use their strength in the form of wealth generation and resource management to extract sex from women via transactions, e.g., escorting, Only@ns, Pr0st!tut!on, Sugaring, etc.

Moreover, the strengths of each gender, which are supposed to be used to strengthen each other in a healthy family relationship, are used here to tear each other down for personal gain.



Concerning men's weaknesses, it is easy to see that sexual coercion and theft by force are detrimental to society, and societies establish rules with the means to enforce them to prevent anarchy. It is also apparent that men naturally default to (relative) lethargy, P0rn, and prostitution when chaste, trustworthy wives are not available, or when wives are not faithfully providing their marital services (i.e. sex) on a consistent basis.

Concerning women's weaknesses, however, it is much harder to see the mal effects on society inflicted through resource extraction by sexual manipulation, especially when a vast portion of the population celebrates sexually fornicated women. To me, this makes the female pathology more dangerous as the problems it causes are dismissed and/or explained away until they become too large to ignore, at which point only a radical societal shift will be adequate to fix the problem.

Plan B (The B Stands for Business)

DeBoer's Gender Predation is NOT a foreboding prediction of a cold, hard, cataclysmic future. We're already there, folks.

To offer a Plan B in absentia of Biblical Covenant Marriages, I think if more people thought of marriage as a business transaction first, and approached relationship negotiations as they would a contract with a business first, and then let the emotions and other commitments and investments develop second, then marriages would be more successful. The business world operates this way, and it is common for business partners who faithfully fulfill their respective parts of the contract to develop friendships among their business acquaintances outside of their business relationship. In this, there is a degree of trust that is not seen even within most marriages these days. In support of this viewpoint, we have anecdotal data from attorney James Sexton that prenuptial agreements, which are indicative of prioritizing the business of marriage, greatly improve the success rate of marriage.

Conclusions

Covenantal Marriage is the Biblical ideal. However, people, even Christians, don't even know what that is anymore, I dare to say, even ruefully, but it's true.

In ancient times, Marriage was specifically intended to create Sexual Exclusivity in order to provide greater certainty of paternity, which is a necessary motivation for men to commit to marriage and to produce and provide for a wife and family.

But these days, Sexual Exclusivity is almost totally nonexistent (e.g., ~4% of women are virgins on their wedding day). Modern 'marriage' is a sham. Family-minded Men have no time for that, nor them.

For millennia, it used to be that a man who flamboyantly F_cked around with the town twats was flirting with social rejection as well as eternal hellfire, but the SS Sirens have changed all that.

Nowadays, it is a man who marries indiscriminately and undiscerningly, who is literally destroying his own financial solvency, sanity, virility, and all that is sanctimoniously holy.

The problem that Western culture is facing now, and I think it is a foundational issue that cannot be very well remedied, is that Taraban's Equivalency breaks down in marriage, precisely because marriage entails mutual Sexual exclusivity (which is not, in fact, truly exclusive), and NOT mutual Attention exclusivity, thereby shifting the power dynamic strongly in the woman's favor. This, in addition to the stack of laws and regulations that are geared to support of women and are slanted against men, sets marriage within the bounds of the faithfully cucked.

Without a widespread cognizance of marriage as a binding commitment / contract / Covenant, we are left with raw Transactions, as we are now seeing all across Western nations — transactions having no overarching authority (via. community, conscience, faith, moral norms, etc.) governing the interchanges thereof. As a result, men and women trade Sex for Attention and other resources, respectively, on the basis of Taraban's Equivalency. When this proves faulty or unreliable for meeting basic needs, the last alternative is Deboer's Gender Predation.

Given this context, there is practically no motivation or purpose for men to enter into a 'legal', state-sanctioned marriage — and for the simple reason that, unless she was a virgin on her wedding night, it is NOT a 'real', Biblical marriage.

The whole institution of marriage needs to be redefined to stipulate Sexual Exclusivity, i.e. female virginity, as in, the bride's busted hymen bleeding all over the eager groom's erect pedacter, her blood mixing with his ejaculated sperm. Though disgusting, profane, and vile as that imagery might be, that constitutes a real Biblical Marital Covenant, folks. "They shall become one flesh", and all that. This, even more than the fake "till death do us part" quip, which is apparently not taken seriously by >50% of the population.

Most of what I've written above is just Old School Red Pill Lore applied to the current SMP. Christian Red Pilled men realized these things about a decade ago. I'm passing it along for the come-latelys and for the record.

Mass sociosexual exchanges done at a net loss spell the degradation of society.

Intro

Before I get to the main topic of this post, I'll summarize the archetypal dynamics and structures of intersexual relationships and the transactions thereof. Also, the paradigmatic imbalances (e.g. AF/BB, etc.) were covered in the previous post.

Taraban assumes his audience is familiar with these dynamics, structures, and transactions, and makes reference to them in his talks. He doesn't spell this out because it is pretty well-known RP Lore and he's gone over it in other talks. H0eMath has also summed up the dynamics very well.

But here it is — in text.

Relationship Dynamics and Structures

In the modern SMP, we see four kinds of relationship dynamics at play in which sociosexual transactions are rendered.

1. Soft Harems in which top 10% SMV men are having constant Sex with multiple women, literally shagging them silly every single hour of the 21st century (and leaving them forever defiled, jaded, and "cats and wine" single).
2. 'Situationships' in which Women freely and willingly trade Sex to HSV Men for fleeting Attention and temporary Tingle tantrums.
3. 'Attention Wh0ring', in which Women are soaking up all the Attention (and $$$) they can possibly attract through any means.
4. 'Friend Zone'-ships and other online transactions (e.g., OASIS, OnlyF@ns, P0rn, etc.) in which the vast majority of men grant women unmitigated Attention / Validation without any real social or sexual recompense.

Note that the first and second relationships are codependent on each other, as are the third and fourth. So we essentially have two relationship structures, shown as blue-pink boundaries in the image, and explained below.

1. Male Dominant, Sex-Based Relationships (upper blue-pink boundary) — The Top 10% SMV men hold the pinnacle power in the first and second types of relationship dynamics. Although male dominance constitutes a preferred relationship structure, Women cannot avail of marriage, because they're refusing Headship, too busy competing for Top Ch@ds with Sex ("selling out the store"), they're intentionally postponing marriage in favor of chasing after their corporate careers, Feminist Life Scripts, and the rare privilege of freezing their eggs, etc. etc. ad nauseum.
2. Female Dominant, Attention-Based Relationships (lower blue-pink boundary) — Women hold the vast amount of power in the third and fourth types of transaction dynamics. Guys on the bottom are stuck working for The Plantation™, or else MGTOW.

This is essentially the same structural dichotomy that Christian Manosphere authors have written about many times before: Male Dominant vs Female Dominant. No surprise.

One takeaway here is that Women are going back and forth between the two — Ch@d for Sex, Ernie Orbiter for Attention and $$$ (i.e. double-mindedness, James 1:8; 4:8). That's even worse than Men being Blue Pilled / gynocentric, according to St. James.

MGTOW essentially erases the lower pink-blue boundary, and forces women to have only one type of interaction with men, instead of two. It also leaves women to face the consequences of those interactions.

Transactions: Eating the Seed Corn

Taraban pointed out the transactions that are occurring in the SMP (which TRP has known for years).

Summarized:

1. The Top SMV Chads are eating out the store in a sexual smorgasboard.
2. A plurality of mid-tier Women are freely offering up Sex to HSV Men.
3. Women are soaking up all the Attention (and $$$) they can get, mostly from non-Ch@ds.
4. The vast majority of Men of all stripes are forced to forego sex, but are still surrendering unlimited Attention / Validation (either real or virtual) to Women.

So here is the fourth major idea I've gathered from DeBoer's and Taraban's talks on sociosexual economics, which comes from a consumer's viewpoint: that BOTH men and women are freely and willingly offering up what is most desired by the opposite sex, Attention and Sex, even though they're NOT getting what is most rewarding to themselves, respectively (except the first on the list).

1. Only the Top 10% SMV men are getting AWL the Raw Dawg Sex they crave — out the wazoo.
2. Women are unreservedly giving up Sex to Top Men, but only in so called 'Situationships' in which they are members of a de facto soft harem. They DON'T get the kind of Attention from these men that is most desired.
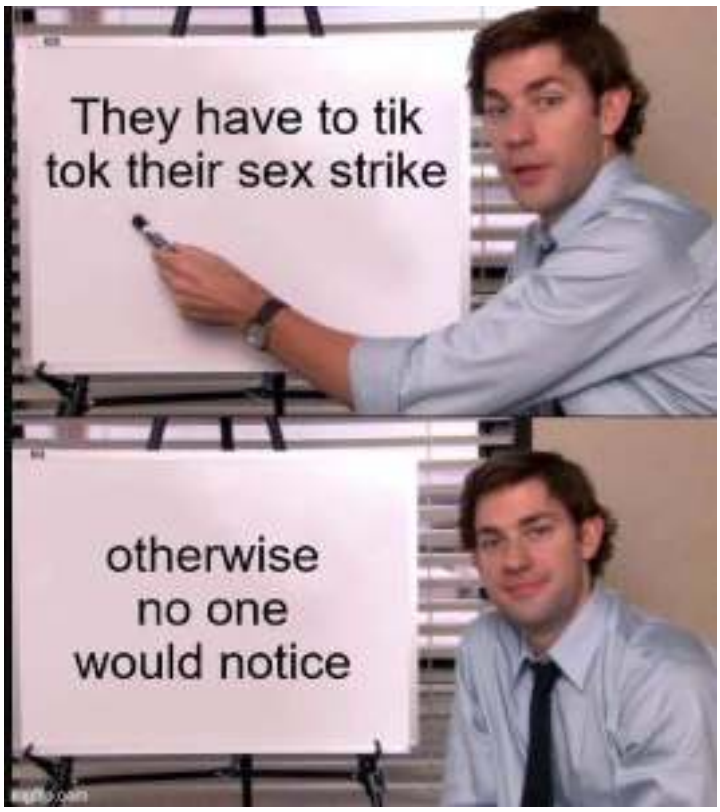
3. Women get unlimited Attention from the Low SMV men they despise, but NOT from the High SMV men they most desire.
4. Low SMV men — the vast majority of men — are freely lavishing beaucoup Attention (and $$$ too) on Women through various means and venues, even though they're getting no Sex play at all. This includes many married men.



So you see, only the most immoral Top 10% C0ck Charmers are walking away with everything they need from their sociosexual transactions. Everyone else is left fornicating, lusting, pining, playing games, screwing around, and/or jerking off in worshipful adoration of their own fantasies.

In sum, both men and women are, in a phrase, "Selling Out Cheap".

Selling the Farm to Rent a Dream

With all this in mind, here's another way we could look at this equation from a consumer's viewpoint:

Women Waste their Sex on Ch@ds — Women are searching for, and having sex with, the tallest, richest, most handsome, well-hung (highest SMV) Ch@dS (plural!) they can find, even though…

- It defiles them for marriage.
- Those men are way out of their league.
- They have to share these men with many other women.
- It is often short-term and does not lead to marriage or any kind of commitment.
- They do not even intend to have children with these men (which is the main purpose of, and the only real value of hypergamy).

Why? Because they obsess over getting Attention, Commitment, $$$, etc. from the men, specifically the men they cannot get it from.

Instead, women should be using sex more discriminately as a reward to men, a la operant conditioning. That means, NOT having Sex with men who don't offer Attention, commitment, etc. in return.

Men Waste their Attention on Sl0res — Men are searching for, and wanking off to, the most beautiful (highest SMV) OASIS / OnlyF@ns / P0rn Models / Pr0stitutes they can find and/or afford, even though…

- It is a waste of time and money.
- It is all a distracting, passifying fantasy.
- There is no real relationship, and not even any real sex in most cases.

Why? Because they need their Sexual urges continually sated, and the sexier, the better.

Instead, men should be using Attention more discriminately as a reward to women, a la operant conditioning. That means, NOT giving any Attention, $$$, etc. to women who have no IOI-laden interest in offering Sex, marriage, etc. in return.

Foreboding

In a nutshell, both men and women are losing out because they're NOT demanding a 'fair' exchange — no boundaries, no morals, no purpose, and no trust.

But as things stand now, WHO is being 'Rewarded'? It's the Ch@ds and Sl0res.

And whatever behavior you reward, you'll get MORE of the SAME via Operant Conditioning.

"Grease my quiche NOW, and tomorrow be fried!"

That's selling out cheap!

All this reminds me of Ezekiel 16, Ezekiel 23, Hosea 2, and Nahum 3.

We are living among an adulterous and idolatrous generation.

"Whatever! Just STFU and get me off! Right F_king NOW! Gawdammit!"

Prime Marital Windows of Opportunity

What is the best age for men and women to marry?

Readership: All
Theme: The Christian Red Pill
Length: 800 words

Intro

This post expands a comment I left under Sharkly's post, The Marital Window of Opportunity (2020/2/16), which cited a comment from Derek L. Ramsey (DLR) at Boxer's place a few days earlier.

The topic was about the Age Window of Opportunity for Marriage, and it was concluded that women need to marry before the age of 25 to avail of their best opportunities to snag a high SMV/MMV man, and also to have the best chances of success in marriage. It follows, of course, that men should also be looking to marry a virgin under 25.

Gregory Peck and Audrey Hepburn star in Roman Holiday (1953).

Updated Theory

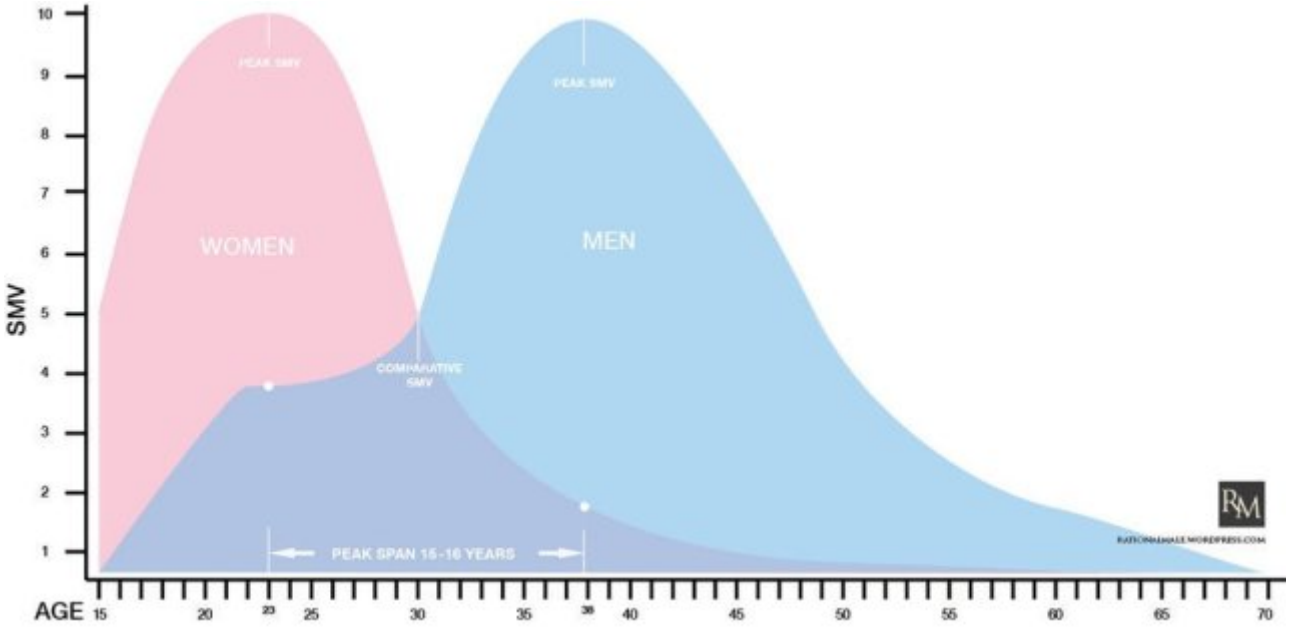
What was less clear to us at that time was the optimal age for men to marry. Back then, we did not clearly discriminate differences between men and women in this. DLR assumed that roughly the same Window applied for men, and that men should marry before the age of 30.

However, we know now that this is not strictly true, for the following reasons.

1. Men's apex SMV/MMV is dependent on their accomplishments, charisma, confidence, discernment, earnings, height, looks, maturity, social dominance, status, strength, and their ability to support a wife and family, among other things.

2. Certain things like athleticism, looks (i.e., hair), strength, etc., are better in a man's youth, while other factors like accomplishments, discernment, earnings, status, etc., accumulate with age. Therefore, a man's apex SMV/MMV occurs when he has a total maximum of all these factors: young enough to be physically active and good looking, and old enough to be well established in the world. Thus, men's apex SMV/MMV peaks between 25 and 40, with the median age around 35.
3. So called Roman Holiday relationships, in which the man is much older than the woman, have been outdated since the early 20th century (Flappers were the last to have a go at this on a society-wide level), and have been a societal taboo since Women's Liberation in the 1970s. (Feminists utterly condemn it.) TRP revealed that this kind of relationship is vehemently shamed by envious older slores, to reduce their competition for middle-aged men who are at their peak. (Perhaps this taboo is the reason why DLR never considered this as a possibility.)

Actually, these sex differences are very clear in Rollo's now-famous graph of SMV vs age, although here it is applied to MMV, the implications of which are hardly any different.



Reclarification

Having some time away from these early observations, and being more familiar with the intricacies, I've updated Ramsey's comment below (changes in bold).

From statistics, we know that over half of people have lasting marriages. The problem is that you can't marry people who are already married, and marrying a non-virgin is less sanctifying / satisfying, and more risky because there is a higher chance of failure. In this case, she 'settled' for you, and you enabled her to "stick the landing". She'll always compare you to her past paramours, and you'll never be able to measure up to her entitled expectations.

By age 25, ~95% of women are not virgins (and most of the best are married). You'll have to find a quality wife before she is 25. By the time she is ~30, her options become much more limited, her fertility is vastly decreased, and her divorce risk steadily increases. Thus, a woman's window of opportunity to find a quality husband / marriage is limited to this age range.

Men's best window of opportunity to find a quality wife (i.e. a virgin between 18-25) is from the ages of 25-30 to around 35-40, depending on the specific man's accomplishments, charisma, looks, status, wealth, etc., as well as his trajectory of success with women.

It's kind of amazing that we didn't figure this out until 2018-2020, probably because the secular Manosphere 1.0

concentrated on getting laid, NOT marriage. In fact, this was the main point of difference that caused the RP schism in 2020.

We should not limit ourselves to the secular Manosphere's emphasis on sex and the exclusion of marriage, or the current Feminist-inspired taboos and trends, but should strive to achieve what 'works' within God's ordained structure. The Roman Holiday relationship structure fits the bill.

Sociosexual Vampirism

Mass carnal joyrides sans the reproductive fruits leaves those jollies spoiled for their rightful use, thus producing a joyless marriage. It also decimates the next generation.

Gender Predation / Savage Bartering / Sociosexual Vampirism

To recap:

> Taraban's Equivalency: Attention / Validation is to women what Sex is to men, and these reinforcements (a la operant conditioning) constitute the primary sociosexual currency within the economic trade model of intersexual dynamics.

Continuing our study of DeBoer's and Taraban's talks, the fifth takeaway is from a producer's viewpoint: that the 'old' SMP / MMP (what I assume is pre-2000?) has been replaced by what DeBoer calls, "Gender Predation"; what I might less politely call "Savage Sociosexual Bartering", or more darkly, "Sociosexual Vampirism", which is what transactional relationships devolve into, once the traditional goals of marriage and family, and the constraints, opportunities, and responsibilities thereof have been dismissed / rejected / subsumed by a free and unregulated SMP / MMP. This is the end game of the Sexual Revolution.

By 'producer', I mean those who are giving the opposite sex what is most desired by them, namely Top Ch@ds and Hawt Slores — the power players in the SMP.

Gender Predation / Sociosexual Vampirism is enabled by masses of women engaging in deceptive, double-minded, dual mating stratagems, and "Selling Out Cheap", as I described in the previous post. The reason why women do this is because they all want a High SMV male, per hypergamy, and they will up the ante in competing against other women for these same men until they're all playing their trump card — Sex, i.e. men's most reinforcing good — in an effort to beat out the competition. That is the ugly nature of Feminine Sexuality, and it ruins them for marriage by making them into damaged, spent, used-up Alpha Widows and Slores.

It gets worse.

In freely offering these men sex, these women ensure that none of them will ever lock down a Stud. You see, it doesn't work the way they think. Instead of going all in on one woman who offers the best Sex, Ch@ds will do them all. Becky on Monday. Stacy on Tuesday. Juanita and Erika on Wednesday. Some Tinderella Thot on Thursday. A coworker on Friday. The girl next door on Saturday. … Well, you get the drift. That is the nature of Masculine Sexuality in full bloom, and the ubiquity of Sex operantly conditions Ch@ds to value women even less.

The Important Place of Marriage

In light of all this savagery between raw Feminine and Masculine Sexualities, it is easy to see why marriage was instituted as a compromise between the sexes, intended to provide Women with a Male owner who is responsible for her and grants her daily Attention and all that goes with it, and Men with the ownership of a woman who is submissive to him and gives him as much Sex as he wants or needs, and all that comes with that. This arrangement reduces the amount of Savagery and Vampirism permitted within the arrangement. But even so, it still takes a church, a community, an extended family, and well-established, well-maintained, and well-enforced moral norms to keep them in line.

That is the basis and the beginning of civilization. Without it, human sexuality resorts back to feral mating instincts, broken families, and social chaos.

With that said, let's take a closer look at the dynamics and transactions of Sociosexual Vampirism.

Top SMV Ch@dwick F_ck Boy Vampirism

To make DeBoer's point indelibly clear, here I've picked out passages from Dr. Taraban's talk, in which he describes Women's experience of what DeBoer calls Sociosexual Vampirism.

> "The most reinforcing good to a woman is Attention in the sense of being 'seen', being heard, being emotionally valued and validated, etc. [Receiving Attention is to a woman what getting laid is to a man.] And women will do all kinds of things, including offering Sex to secure that Attention from the men they want to receive it from."
> "[Yet] women complain about [F_ck] boys. Why? Because they get away with receiving their most > reinforcing good, Sex, without reciprocally providing the woman with her most reinforcing good, Attention, and the validation and consideration and commitment that often attends Attention. And this wrankles women because they feel like they got the fuzzy end of the lollipop in that exchange. But they still [F_ck] [F_ck] boys. How else could they be [F_ck] boys? [The sex] is what keeps them around."

It is 'Vampirism' precisely because High SMV Ch@ds are taking full advantage of women's weaknesses. Yes, it is a natural weakness that cannot be remedied, short of God's grace. Some Women have stated, in so many words, that they are utterly powerless under the magic wand of Ch@d's 10-inch schlong, eternally and infinitely spellbound to earnestly collect his seed with heart-felt passion, and bear his beautiful progeny (if not for the sober afterthought of abortion). That is the overruling power of the Flesh, and it must be respected and accommodated somehow, by God's grace.

Taraban doesn't mention this, but it's an important piece of the puzzle: The number of men who have the charisma, looks, money, status, etc., to have this effect on women and therefore have the opportunity to overrule their defenses in this way is very small, less than 10% of the male population, or less, depending on women's entitlement. However, these are the men who are sexually 'visible' to women. Nothing else matters to them. The bottom 90% are either invisible or too disgusting (in their eyes) to even consider.

V-Power Vampirism

In Ye Olde Christian Red Pill 1.0 Lore (e.g. Dalrock), the term, 'V-Power', where V stood for 'Vagina', was an eponym for the female power of attracting and seducing men, even unto the point of submitting themselves to the shameful sin of gynocentric pedestalization.

St. Dalrock wrote,

> "It isn't just secular culture chanting "Hail to the V!" Modern Christians are as enthralled by the awesome power of the vagina as everyone else is. As Dr. Mohler explains:
> > "Put most bluntly, I believe that God means for a man to be civilized, directed, and stimulated toward marital faithfulness by the fact that his wife will freely give herself to him sexually only when he presents > himself as worthy of her attention and desire."

> This is the culture we live in, where everyone, from Feminists to the president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, is in awe of the world-changing power between a woman's legs."
> Dalrock: Frigidity and Power (2014/8/3)

That observation was from 12 years ago. Today in 2026, women have capitalized on the admiration and deference granted to them by all of Western wussified humanity, and thus, the V just as well stands for 'Vampiress'.

Here, I've picked out passages from Dr. Taraban's talk, in which he describes Men's experience of Sociosexual Vampirism.

> "Now, as common as this transaction may have become in today's day and age, it is not nearly as ubiquitous and commonplace as the converse. Namely, men providing women with their most reinforcing good, Attention, without receiving their most reinforcing good, Sex, in return. Men are giving women Attention, Validation, and consideration without receiving Sex in return, on the scale of billions of people every day. And this has radically changed the topography of the sexual marketplace.
> This situation doesn't just change dating. After all, if a woman is already receiving her most reinforcing good from hundreds or thousands of other people, then why does she need to transact with any particular man in the sexual marketplace?"
> "However, when a woman doesn't relinquish other sources of Attention in the context of a committed relationship, then what she has functionally done is succeed in eliminating the man's optionality while retaining her own. That is, the man is constrained from seeking Sex elsewhere, but the woman remains free to receive Attention and Validation from other sources."

This is essentially what modern 'marriage' in the West is all about.

It is 'Vampirism' precisely because High SMV Strumpets are taking full advantage of men's weaknesses. Yes, it is a natural weakness that cannot be remedied, short of God's grace. Some Men have stated, in so many words, that without regular sexual expression, they grow ever more confused, frustrated, and utterly powerless against the female form, i.e. a highly magnetic WHR of 0.7, eternally and infinitely spellbound to earnestly suck and F_ck such women with abandoned, heartfelt passion, and to produce ethereal progeny to the glory of God. That is the overruling power of the Flesh, and it must be respected and accommodated somehow, by God's grace.

But it gets worse.

OASIS / OnlyF@ns / P0rn / Sex-Centric Vampirism

As bad as Sex-Centric Western culture is, it isn't only the culture that is tantalizing and tempting men with succulent, truculent pseudo-sex on demand, even unto their own perdition. There is a vast system of enterprises that cater to, and feed men's lusts, and thereby drains them of their $$$ and their virility.

OASIS has skyrocketed over the past few years, and online amateur Pr0st!tut!0n has become commonplace in today's day and age. However, this is not nearly as ubiquitous and commonplace as the converse. Namely, women providing men with a false impression of sexual access, whether through advertising, free dinner dates, Friend Zones, IG posts, P0rn, etc., thereby taunting and teasing men's most reinforcing good, Sex, without ever delivering the real thing. Women are giving men more eye candy now than ever before in human history, without making the least bit of effort to follow through on what those intimations of emotional intimacy and/or nudity are intended to lead to — Sex and reproduction, families and children. It is mass fraud on the scale of billions of people every day.

Men complain about the vast proliferation of 304s, and the simplistic ease with which even average-looking women, let alone shapely OnlyF@ns starlets, can sell their sex appeal for their most reinforcing good, Attention, and often be paid for it in cold hard cash too! They lament how most women are wholly unworthy of marriage. Why? Because these women get away with receiving their most reinforcing good, Attention, etc., without reciprocally providing a man with his most reinforcing good, Sex, and the dominion, respect, and reproductive potential that is presumed to accompany Sex. This angers men because it undermines their God given prerogative to take a wife, procreate, and have families. But these same men still pedestalize women and pay Pr0st!tute$, real or virtual, regular ubcription$ to OnlyF@ns, Sugar Babies, et al., thereby buying into and submitting themselves to the larger Feminist narrative that men are spineless boys, weak simps wholly dependent on women's gynocentric graces. This behavior is exactly what empowers, enforces, and propagates the very thing that men hate about Female Sexuality.

This situation doesn't just marginalize the outcome of dating. This has radically altered the topography of the SMP. After all, if a man is already receiving a faux but deeply satiating form of his most reinforcing good from his choice of literally hundreds of thousands of Online Amateurs (OASIS), OnlyF@ns Asters, P0rn Starlets, Pr0st!tutes, Private Escorts, Sugar Babies, et al., including many MANY fresh-cherry-poked chicks who are very young, THIN!, respectful, submissive, well-endowed, and horny as hell with a teary-eyed grin of appreciation for whatever is inserted into their abdomens, then why would he need to transact with any particular real woman in the sexual marketplace? Why should he deal with her constant complaints, demands, infidelities, nuisances, Sh!t tests, and random days of frigidity, and in doing so, risk his finances, home, reputation, and sanity, and ransom his children (if any) from a divorce-napping?

Case closed. Yet, it still gets worse (or the worstest).

Culturally Institutionalized V-Power Vampirism

Western society has institutionalized V-Power Vampirism as the legal and social norm.

Shock.

As Taraban illustrated,

> "This leads us to conclude that a woman who receives Attention and Validation outside of her relationship is actually comparable to a man who gets Sex outside of his relationship.
> This optionality asymmetry directly contributes to power asymmetries in the relationship. And this asymmetry is protected by a good deal of entitlement. That is, a woman's attempt to constrain a man from having Sex outside of a committed relationship is considered healthy, justified, and appropriate boundary setting. But any attempts from a man to constrain a woman from receiving Attention and Validation outside of a committed relationship are considered toxic, controlling, and manipulative. It's a sign of his 'insecurity' and 'fragile masculinity' to boot. And so, in the wake of this shaming, many men often tacitly consent to this optionality asymmetry. And this keeps women as the more powerful players in the majority of relationships."

Similar gender specific dynamics are occurring from loose women every hour.

Conclusions

Taraban sums up the Equivalency Inequity, viz. the V-Power hegemonic, institutionalized Sociosexual Vampirism, as follows.

> "This is actually very difficult to fix. Most women are going to receive Attention and Validation passively as they move through the world, but they absolutely can also seek out Attention actively through social media, clubbing with the girls, entertaining their orbiters, etc. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to constrain a woman's ability to receive Attention and Validation from society at large.
> Because … What would that look like? It would look like,
> "Why is your account public?"
> "Why are you going out dressed like that?"
> "Why are you spending time with those men?"
> These are all attempts by men to control their exclusive access to the resource for which she is primarily transacting the relationship."

> "In fact, and you might think this is totally nutty, but some cultures have gone so far as to put women in a literal sheet from head to toe so that they're not able to receive passive Attention and Validation from outside sources as they move through the world. But I think Western women are about as likely to surrender their social media accounts as they are to wear a burka.
> And why would they? After all, no one surrenders power willingly."
> "As long as men's sexuality in committed relationships is constrained, but women's attention-seeking behaviors are NOT, women on the whole will continue to be the more powerful players in their sexual relationships."

That means Christian Headship will be minoritized, unfortunately.

Intersexual Boundaries in the Workplace

Institutionalized intersexual boundaries are the opposite of the Biblical model.

Intro

A previous post, Boss + Female Employee = Steamy Hot Chemistry (2023/9/18), examined the relationship between a male boss / employer / supervisor + younger female employee and how it is a recipe for Sparks, Tingles, sexxx, and babies.

It was concluded that the Boss + Chick Employee dynamic is not only a fleshly evo-psyche trope, but it is also an archetypal relationship that conforms to God's ordained order. God specifically created women to be a companion and a helper to a man (Genesis 2:18; 1 Corinthians 11:8-9), among other purposes.

The reason why these office romances blossom is because…

- They have a shared purpose.
- They're working together towards that purpose.
- The woman fulfills her God ordained purpose of being a companion and helper to a man.
- Women's hypergamous instinct is satisfied, which is often the key factor that makes or breaks relationship longevity.

Here, I want to address this phenomenon through the lens of boundaries, what is considered 'professional', and what is most practical.

The value of boundaries is that…

- It increases openness.
- It provides a venue in which trust can be built.
- It transforms interactions into real relationships.
- It is central to Christian living, faith, spiritual health, and maturity.

Current Intersexual Boundaries in the Workplace

In your opinion, and/or in your workplace (please specify which when commenting), which of the following are considered acceptable behavior?

1. Is it OK to ask the boss on a date?
2. Is it OK to ask a coworker on a date?
3. Is it OK for the boss to ask a coworker on a date?
4. Is it OK to go to the boss' house with coworkers?
5. Is it OK to talk about personal issues with the boss?
6. Is it OK to talk about personal issues with coworkers?
7. Is it OK to compliment your boss on the way he/she acts, dresses, or looks?
8. Is it OK to compliment your coworkers on the way he/she acts, dresses, or looks?
9. Is it OK for the boss to compliment your coworkers on the way he/she dresses or looks?

For most people, and in most workspaces, the off!shul answer would be NO to all of the above. The reason is simple: With HR and the threat of being accused of harassment just one phone call away, it's not worth the risk.

But in spite of these institutionalized taboos, surveys report between 15% to 27% of women have had a sexual relationship with their supervisor. That's at least 1 out of every 7 women you work with! Maybe more than 1 out of 4!

The only obvious explanation for this irony is that women are free to communicate sociosexual interest in a man, while men should never do so to any woman, or else face the full penalties of the law.

IOW, what we're looking at is institutionalized gynocentrism. Heh. No surprises here.

Multiple Diverging Perspectives

Let's exercise our creative imagination.

In a scenario where the boss or another male coworker expresses sociosexual interest in a female employee, there are multiple paradigms in which to view the situation.

Conservative Ethics: Regardless of interest, the woman should decline, and keep quiet about it to avoid any backlash.

Ethical Boundaries: The woman should defer or turn down the boss' invitation, but offer to talk things out over the phone after work.

Gynocivnattery: The woman should report it, whether she likes him or not.

High Maturity: If the woman likes the supervisor, then she entertains him on a date and keeps their relationship outside of work. If she doesn't like the supervisor, then she can politely decline. He congenially accepts the rejection. Nothing more is said about it. Work continues as usual.

High Trust: Why so serious? If the woman likes the supervisor, then why not go out with him? She can always say "No". Only time spent together outside of the workplace will tell if their relationship will work out or not.

Mutual Maturity: Both male and female employees should be free to communicate sociosexual interest, and also be free to either accept or decline — without backlash.

Strategic Avoidance of Risk: The woman should consider resigning and finding another job elsewhere, so that she can either avoid the situation or else pursue the relationship with the supervisor.

Strategic Informal Setting: The employees should arrange activities outside of work that would allow coworkers to get to know each other better without the constraints of what is considered 'professional'. It would also allow personal communications and sociosexual invitations to occur with less risk of backlash.

The Modern Feminist Viewpoint: Women are free to communicate sociosexual interest in a man, while men should never do so to any woman. If he does, then it is unethical, and he should be reported.

Conclusions

When comparing all of the above paradigms, readers will see that the present norms, The Modern Feminist Viewpoint, and Gynocivnattery are the diametric opposites of the Biblical model described above, and are also absolutely the most damaging and destructive of all of the above responses.

It's insane. Why should we accept this?

In the previous post, Women's Existential Fear of The Red Pill (2026/1/28), women's said fear is not of The Red Pill itself per se [although it is deeply offensive to their gynocentric worldview], but of Red Pill information spreading across the culture. Wider RP awareness is scary to women because it informs men exactly for what, and when, and how women are to be held accountable. It enables men to call their bluff and hold them accountable.

Accountability, as well as a lack of secrecy that would otherwise permit them to evade accountability, is women's kryptonite, as I'll explain in the next section.

Women also fear men, especially Christian men, talking about TRP because (1) it places a speculum over women's shameful behaviors, and (2) it inspires men to concentrate on their own purposes and quality of life, and thus leave women behind.

Sex Appeal — The Biggest Gun in the Feminine Arsenal

As discussed in the previous posts about Taraban's Equivalency and DeBoer's Gender Predation, Men's most reinforcing good is Sex. This is just another way of saying that women's main power in the sexual realm comes from granting, limiting, conditioning, and/or denying access to sex. Women consolidate power in getting to decide who gets sex, when, where, and under what circumstances.

Women are fully aware of this power from a very young age, and will wield this power to their full advantage if/when they're allowed to do so. But how women utilize this power depends on the men they are transacting with:

- Women have no problem with attractive men desiring sex and pursuing sex, as this validates their sexual prowess.
- Women will also give unattractive men sex, IF and Only IF those unattractive men do their bidding, or pay for it, or serve them, or otherwise meet their conditions.

Women Fear Anything They CANNOT Control

As long as women are in control and are getting what they want from men, they're willing to flirt, play, strip, tease, and spread their knees on occasion (for High SMV men only, of course). But women draw the line at anything in which they are not in control of:

- Women fear unattractive men trying to act like attractive men.
- Women fear unattractive men desiring sex, asserting their desire for sex, and pursuing sex with women.
- Women fear unattractive men "figuring it out", and determining how to get sex from women (usually by paying for it in some way or another, duh).
- Women fear Christian men learning about human nature, talking about it amongst themselves, comparing notes, and "cracking the code", as it were.

In sum, women fear all the hassles, the existential offenses, and social pressures of wrangling with unattractive men who want sex and/or wifely submission from them.

Because…

- If unattractive men start desiring and pursuing sex, and then actually getting sex or refusing to play by women's rules, women will lose control.

- If husbands figure out how to Game their wives and assert authority in their homes and marriages, then wives will lose control and will be expected to … ewww … 'SuBm!t'!

Women Fear NOT being able to Control Men via Sex

OTOH, women have a worse fear that men will stop chasing, pedestalizing, and supplicating women, that they'll stop desiring sex, or simply pay hookers or sugar babies for it. Women fear losing control of the betas they need to wife them up when the attractive men won't commit.

Women fear this more than men figuring out the game and gaining an edge, because…

1. A small number of men who can up their game actually become better, more attractive men, and thus become 'visible' to women.
2. When men, as a group, desire women less, or stop desiring women altogether as in the case of MGTOW, it means that women have less control over the SMP, due to the lower demand for the fuzzywump.
3. It could also indicate that women's sociosexual currency has lost sexual market value.
4. Worst of all, it could mean that they themselves have lost value, e.g. aged out of the SMP, "Hit the Wall", etc.

You see, if men start simply saying, "The jig is up, we know what the game is, we ain't playing anymore. No more money for you. We'll just go pay hookers. Or we'll just not make money anymore. Don't need it." … then women's most powerful currency becomes worthless.

Women fear their best weapon — sex — will be rendered completely ineffective.

Why?

It is because Feminine Sex Appeal is by far most potent form of power that women wield over men, and in many cases, over other women too. It is also the easiest to use and it has the highest ROI.

Other Forms of Feminine Power

Women have many other forms of power and influence, some more powerful than Sex, IMO. For example, being a source of comfort, a playmate, a sounding board for developing ideas, a supportive helper, a wise and caring mother, Honeycraft, etc. However, all these require more agency, more effort, more intelligence, more maturity, more work, and more often than not, it involves submitting to a man's authority and enhancing his purposes and prerogatives rather than pursuing her own. At the same time, these methods draw less Attention, offer less direct control, and provide less self-glorification.

Utilizing Sex Appeal requires none of these investments and very little energy. It is always readily available, Here and Now, and is quite effective in almost every situation. This is why the first gun women will draw in a salvo for control is their Sex appeal.

Unfortunately, this is the only quality that many women have to offer a man, and it is a fungible commodity too (anymore, anyway) which means that any woman can provide this to any man, thus reducing her value and increasing the pressure of female intrasexual competition. Women create their own problems in this respect.

Introducing responsibility and holding women accountable are anathema to women's psyche precisely because this tips the scales in the other direction. When accountability is present, the blatant use of Sex Appeal becomes a liability, and Honeycraft increases in value — but that requires agency, emotional investment, maturity, responsibility, and work. Ugh!

Conclusions

A man shows courage and strength through his leadership.

A woman shows courage and strength through trust and submission.

A woman who is excessively controlling, fearful, and insecure is a Red Flag, because it indicates that she's not willing to trust a man, and she's not able to trust God.

Or, she's not able or willing to do what is required of her to fill that role, for whatever reason, maybe a lack of proper teaching or self-control, maybe egotistical pride or sinful rebellion, or something else.

Or, her head is so bogged down in the inverted Feminist empowerment narrative that she thinks it's an inherent flaw or a weakness to do so.

Attention and Sex are Women's and Men's Basic Psychological Needs, Respectively

Dr. Orion Taraban nails down Attention and Sex because these things are what get the most traction with women and men, respectively.

- Women are strongly motivated by Attention and will seldom, if ever, reject it, even from Low SMV men.
- Men are strongly motivated by Sex and are not hardwired to ever reject it, even with Low SMV women.

We could also think of Attention and Sex not only as basic psychological needs, or the most reinforcing goods (as Taraban put it), but also as inherent weaknesses, where the intensity of this need varies on an individual basis.

- Women who were neglected or who didn't get enough positive Attention when they were younger will crave Attention more ravenously.
- Men with a stronger libido and/or higher testosterone will experience mind-bending sexual desire.

Pro Tip: While this is true for both men and women, Men who hope to be successful with women should carry the assumption that a woman is weaker for him than he is for her.

The Differences between Objective Desire vs Subjective Reward

Dr. Orion Taraban said,

> "…women complain about F_ck boys. Why? Because they get away with receiving their most reinforcing good, Sex, without reciprocally providing the woman with her most reinforcing good, Attention, and the validation and consideration and commitment that often attends Attention. And this wrankles women because they feel like they got the fuzzy end of the lollipop in that exchange. But they still F_ck F_ck boys! How else could they be F_ck boys? [The Sex] is what keeps them around."

I already cited this classic quote in a previous essay on Dating, and another on Sociosexual Vampirism, but here I want to bring out a sixth takeaway that Taraban didn't elucidate — the existential implication that there is an intersexual mismatch between objective desire and subjective reward.

Let me explain what I mean.

While there are some total soul-sold-to-Satan slores who would have sex with men simply BECAUSE they are F_ck Boys (a la Preselection), most women who are hopping around town aren't intentionally and knowingly 'rewarding' these men explicitly for being F_ck Boys per se. That's just what these men become (a la operant conditioning) when they're rewarded with sex by many women.

The reason why Women have sex with certain men and not others is that these Men have good genes, e.g., tall, athletic, charismatic, good-looking, and all that. As a consequence, largely because of said conditioning, these men are NOT and have no incentive or reason to be commitment-minded. Dial this up to a mass scale in society, and you have the currently observed intersexual imbalances.

Modern women eat all the carrots they want, IYKWIM. Men can't eat ANY unless they are genetically blessed and jump through multiple hoops.
To wit,

- Women desire Attention from High SMV Men, but will wholeheartedly soak up all the Attention they can get from literally anyone, including Low SMV Men.

- Women reward Sex to those men who do NOT reward them with Attention in return.
- Women do NOT reward Sex to those men who reward them with Attention in return.
- Men desire Sex from High SMV Women, but are willing to have Sex with anyone they can get.
- High SMV Men do NOT reward (exclusive) Attention (i.e. commitment) to those women who reward them with Sex (because there are many such women who are equally willing to do so).
- Low SMV Men reward Attention to those women who do NOT reward them with Sex in return.

The point here is that there is no interdependent operant conditioning that occurs in the intersexual trade of Attention and Sex, IOW, the objects of desire and the objects of reinforcement are more or less mutually exclusive.

If anything, the operant conditioning that occurs in the intersexual trade of Attention and Sex tends towards entropy and destruction — instead of reinforcements, short-lived pleasures followed by long-term punishments.

- Women are spoiled (for marriage) when they have sex outside marriage and become Alpha Widowed. They cannot love only one man enough to submit to him.
- High SMV Men are spoiled (for marriage) when they have so much sex available on demand that they don't want marriage. They cannot love one woman enough to invest in her.
- Low SMV Men are spoiled (for marriage) when they are repeatedly nuclear rejected and/or divorce graped by women who, in a bygone and more moral time, would've been their SMV equals.

What would it look like if Attention and Sex were mutually reinforcing?

- Women would eagerly have Sex with the man who lavishes her with the most dedicated, heartwarming, and sincere Attention and lifelong commitment.
- Men would focus all their Attention on the woman who provides him with the most passionate, thrilling, butt-bucking, baby-birthing Sex.

In an ideal utopia, or a mature, sanctified Christian relationship, these relational intentions would be evidently expressed through trust and faith-based transactions, i.e. a marital covenant. The fact that they are NOT (with rare exceptions) instantiates that Men and Women are broken, sinful, and unable to truly love one another in a committed relationship, i.e. marriage, short of redemption. Trust between the sexes is at an all-time low. The plummeting birth rate confirms this.

This Asymmetrical Mismatch Degrades into Intersexual Power Plays

Except for MGTOW, we still see men and women continuing to transact for their most reinforcing goods. However, without a covenantal, faith-based interaction nor even a regulated fair market exchange, demanding more of what one desires (Attention for women, and Sex for Men), is unlikely to receive an affirmative response (anything out of the ordinary response to one's baseline SMV), or change the balance of whichever gender hierarchy is implicitly manifested (male dominant or female dominant).

As a result, the outcome of this mismatch is that bartered goods (Attention and Sex) cannot be inherently reinforcing or satisfying.

If neither men nor women are able to readily receive their most reinforcing good from the opposite sex simply by offering the other sex's most reinforcing good in a presumably good-faith, fair market exchange, then this mismatch results in frustration and ultimately disintegrates into intersexual power plays to extract what is most desired from the opposite sex, with or without their willing cooperation. As a result, the intersexual trade of goods degenerates and transmogrifies into a dark, manipulative form of Sociosexual Vampirism.

MOAR carrots! Mpmghm! Crunch crunch. Yummy!

DeBoer described this paradigm as a pathological inversion of the masculine ideal of strength and the feminine ideal of beauty, both co-opted to extract what is most desired from the opposite sex, with the full costs thereof imposed upon the opposite sex.

Taraban explains how this Zero Sum Transaction works in detail and why this is so.

> "A lot of what is negotiated in committed relationships are the boundaries that separate the couple from the rest of the world.
> Now, individual organisms have to be delineated from the rest of the universe to exist as individuals. And good fences make good neighbors, right?
> But what is often not discussed is how often and to what extent these boundaries have more to do with power > and control than maintaining the integrity of the relationship.

> For instance, if I'm able to eliminate your options, which are my competition, while simultaneously preserving my options, which are your competition, then I'm definitely going to be the more powerful player in the relationship.
> This [inequality] has a lot to do with the fact that, in the vast majority of committed relationships, the women are the more powerful players. And to understand why, we have to move away from a very rigid interpretation of 'equality' that expects a perfect symmetry between what a man does and what a woman does.
> That would make sense if men and women were the same. And that's what the last 60 years of social programming have encouraged us to believe. But they're not.
> Men and women are different, and they want and need different things from each other in relationships. And one of these important differences is the asymmetry between men's and women's most reinforcing goods."

This mismatch doesn't just change dating. It fundamentally changes committed sexual relationships between men and women as well. These types of transactions have almost completely replaced the 'normal' SMV parity intersexual transactions that once took place in the SMP/MMP in a livelier time.

Correctives

Taraban states that this situation is unlikely to be corrected, since it is much much easier for women to receive ubiquitous Attention than it is for men to receive gratuitous Sex, even after marriage. I'll add that the quality of sex that women are offering to men in marriage is at an all-time low, given the current norm of promiscuity spoiling the sexual sanctity of marriage.

However, Taraban alludes to one arrangement (or deal) that would right this equation:

- Men receiving Exclusive Sexual Access to a Woman (including virgin marriage, and having sex on demand after marriage).
- Women receiving exclusive Attention / Validation from a Man (before and after marriage).

The first is a very Patriarchal Christian concept that has often been mentioned around the Manosphere for over a decade. The second is a relatively new idea going around The Manosphere 2.0.

Well, well… Isn't this just like the Biblical model!?! It's taken Western culture about 500 years to realize that the Bible still holds true in this arena of human life, despite ¡MoDeRn!tY!

Accountability vs Conditioning

Current forms of Operant Conditioning are encouraging immoral behaviors.

Intro / Theme Summary

In summary of this series on Intersexual Dynamics, we see that both men and women are believing whatever and doing whomever will give them an immediate positive reinforcement — the biggest bang for the buck, Right F_ing NOW!

Here, both Men and Women are transacting for what is falsely perceived to be the Best Value* Immediate Reinforcement (via operant conditioning) with bidders who appear to have the highest SMV (either Real of Virtual).

* By "Best Value", I'm not using the word 'value' in the sense of an ethical or moral prerogative, but rather in the sense of economics; the choice out of many options that offers…

- The best immediate ROI
- "The most bang for the buck"
- The highest quality and/or most quantity for the lowest investment / price, while emphasizing the latter

In a previous post, I called this "selling out cheap", leading to vicious Vampirism.

A sane person might ask, "But why?"

Attention sloring is rewarded with clicks and cash.

Explaining Transaction Mentality

Remember Taraban's Equivalencies:

Taraban's Equivalency: Attention / Validation is to women what Sex is to men, and these reinforcements (a la operant conditioning) constitute the primary sociosexual currency within the economic trade model of intersexual dynamics.

> "Sex is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a man, and Attention is the most reinforcing thing you can give to a woman."

To illustrate said operant conditioning, consider these stereotypical reinforcements (or the lack thereof):

1. If there are no cultural guardrails to limit hypergamy, then women will engage in random acts of intercourse with whoever titillates their Tingles, leading to the disintegration of marriages.
2. If women prefer to have Sex with criminals, jerks, and thugs over Christian, decent, hardworking men, then in general, this incentivizes men to be more careless and less moral.
3. If women get more Attention by posting skin pics on social media and wearing skimpy attire than they do by dressing modestly, then in general, this incentivizes women to be more slorish and less modest.
4. If men get more sexual satisfaction and less hassle and risk via OASIS, OnlyF@ns, P0rn, etc. than they would through interacting with real breathing women, then a virtual vice will be chosen.
5. Those who offer the Highest Value Immediate Reinforcement, i.e., a high SMV (Real or Virtual) have cornered the SMP, and because they operate from a stronger position, they offer much less in return. They don't have to. There are no incentives in place for them to do so. The immediate gratification they offer is enough to keep them in a position of supreme sociosexual power.

Note the downward spiral.

It 'works' this way because Attention and Sex are what are most desired by women and men, respectively. These goods are incentives and reinforcements that exploit men's and women's psychological needs and weaknesses. Granting these things is a positive reward that encourages more of the same behavior, whatever it might be. NOT granting these things is a negative punishment that incentivizes them to change.

Getting women to put their clothes on and turn off their social media is about as difficult as getting men to stop sloffing curds on P0rn.

Consequences

Women are SELLING their Sex appeal, men's most reinforcing good, because that's easier and better than getting a real job, or submitting to a male provider.

Men are PAYING slores to receive their most reinforcing good, Attention, because that's easier and better than paying a faithless wife for 20+ years.

However, it should be noted that other costs and benefits arise from these decisions later in life, so we're also referring specifically to short-term transactions, hence the qualifier, 'Immediate'.

Essentially, the aspects omitted from the transaction that increase the 'bang' and reduce the 'buck', IOW, short-term costs at the expense of long-term costs / benefits, are the benefits / responsibilities of marriage, family, and society, as DeBoer at Blendr News emphasized.

That's like spending your entire retirement fund to rent Neuschwanstein Castle for 2 hours, and then living in a tent or under an interstate bridge for the next 30 years until you die. It's crazy, but that's exactly what most women are choosing these days.

Neuschwanstein Castle

It gets worse.

Current Operant Conditioning Teaches Women to Avoid Accountability

We already know Accountability is anathema to women for reasons explained before, but here's a more detailed explanation of why this is.

> "Introducing responsibility and holding women accountable are anathema to women's psyche precisely because this tips the [balance of power] in the other direction [towards men]. When accountability is present, the blatant use of Sex Appeal becomes a liability, and Honeycraft increases in value — but that requires agency, emotional investment, maturity, responsibility, and work. Ugh!"

Looking at this through the lens of operant conditioning, being shamed (an inherent result of being held accountable) is a positive punishment, and losing power is a negative punishment, and both are unpleasant for them.

OTOH, the benefits of being chaste, responsible, and spiritually obedient are not seen as much of a reward when compared to the jiggling juicy jollies of rebellion and sin, but this is exactly why bad behavior must be operantly associated with unpleasant stimuli; otherwise, the bad behavior will continue unthrottled. But the problem here is that immediate, real-time rewards are associated with sin, and punishments are associated with accountability, and

NOT sin. Instead, we need to make sure that punishments are associated with sin, and accountability is associated with rewards. Otherwise, we're just pushing them further into sin.

All this is to say, rather tritely, that the most obvious difficulty with holding women accountable is that it is an unpleasant experience for them. It is all stick and no carrot. Naturally, what hypoagentic woman would willingly choose that?

In terms of using operant conditioning to guide, mold, and teach women, the eventual goal is to instill a love for truth, beauty, and goodness in them, as well as to trust men and respect male authority. So the challenge here is in trying to create circumstances and situations in which women can learn the benefits of accountability through positive rewards.

So here are a couple ideas RPA and I have come up with that might offer Positive Reinforcements for good.

1. Tiers of Transactional Quality

Red Pill Apostle posited,

> "How would the analysis be altered, if at all, if we consider that both Sex and Attention are [Taraban's] equivalents because they are the respective means of connection for each gender?
> Attention is chiefly a relational action where men and women speak with one another. This means that there are different levels of attention, from the cheap Insta comments given to scantily clad women by orbiters, to deep and meaningful conversations where the woman feels that the man knows her (the latter being what some call an emotional affair). The level of attention is proportional to the depth of the connection.
> Exchange Sex for Attention and switch the genders, and the analysis is similar. Men connect to women through Sex, and that ranges from the cheap inebriated hookup (Insta comment equivalent) to the bonds men feel when they have sex within the bounds of a committed, loving relationship.
> I believe if we break Attention and Sex into tiers, they could be much more similar, even down to certain levels of Attention being socially frowned upon the same way sex is in some circumstances."

In this view, one way to shift reinforcements towards encouraging what is good and right is for both sexes choosing to move themselves UP the tiers, or at least, NOT go down. The problem with this strategy is that it is much more difficult for women than it is for men. In general, women desire and greatly enjoy the defilement of moving down the tiers.

Another strategy is to start shaming Attention Wh0ring instead of 'Following' it and 'Liking' it, and throwing money at it. The problem with this strategy is that it is much more difficult for men than it is for women. In general, men love to gaze intently upon the fleshly beauty of the fertile, youthful female form, and their sexual appetites are never satisfied for any length of time longer than their refractory period.

2. Rethinking Reinforcements as Fulfilling Relational Needs

If we draw a correlation between Taraban's Equivalency and the Biblical adage given in Ephesians 5:33 that husbands should love their wives, and wives should respect their husbands, we have:

Love ≈ Attention, coupled with the validation, consideration, commitment, and investment that often attends Attention.

MGTOW is basically a lot of men refusing to love any women, thinking they're not worth it. Women are shaken to the core.

Respect ≈ Sex, as well as the honor, loyalty, natural affection, pair bonding, sexual passion, and submission that often attends Sexual Devotion.

Immature Wives will often refuse to respect their husbands, thinking he hasn't "earned" it. These men are stuffed and stymied to the max.

But if we consider that investing Love and Respect in one's spouse can rise above the medieval morass of tit-for-tat and establish a whole new blessed paradigm, then we have transcended the entire sociosexual mismatch. The question is, who will be willing to put their foot out first, and risk that great loss?

Conclusions

I was thinking how bad all this looks, very bad in fact, when I suddenly realized that the SMP/MMP is actually moving closer to a Biblical ideal. We have passed the nadir and are slowly making an ascent. It may be hard to see at this point, but we're slowly getting there.

That's all for this month's study of Current Intersexual Dynamics. Hope you enjoyed it.

Next month's theme will break down some complex systemic paradigms, which I'll call, Cracking Nuts.

A Visit to Jeju Island, South Korea

Intro

On 2026/2/15-19, I took a 5 day vacation to Jeju Island, an autonomous province of South Korea. This was my first time visiting this country.

I've heard that Jeju Island is different than mainland South Korea. But if they are anything alike, then I've held a very inaccurate concept of Korea. Seeing Korea on the ground has given me a very different impression of this country, the culture, and the people, than what I've held all my life before this visit.

This post documents some of my observations of Jeju Island, South Korea and gleans some epiphanies. IMO, Korea has many positive, even God-glorifying social habits, norms, and qualities that we could learn from.

A young Korean couple takes a walk up Seongsan Ilchulbong, a popular scenic park on the eastern coast of Jeju Island (2026/2/15). He's jostling her and teasing her and shoving her hips. She's loving every minute of it.

General

South Korea has a population of about 52 M, more than twice that of Taiwan (23 M) and less than half that of Japan (122 M). Half of the population lives in the Seoul metropolitan area, which is the ninth most populous metropolitan area in the world. 672,000 people live on Jeju island, and this is quickly growing, due to having an international airport and regular, year-round tourism.

South Korea is one of the four "Asian Tigers" along with Japan, Singapore, and Taiwan. It performs well in metrics of democratic governance, economic development, education, human rights, and technological innovation.

South Korea has a significant Christian population.

- 51% No religion
- 31% Christianity (20% Protestant, 11% Catholic)
- 17% Buddhism
- 2% Others

It has one of the world's longest life expectancies, though its population is aging rapidly and for many years had the lowest fertility rate in the world, only rising this year for the first time since 2007. The suicide rate is the second-highest in the world.

Culture

My general impression of Jeju Island, and I guess this is also true for all of South Korea, is that it is a very VERY ethnocentric and a uniquely masculine culture; one that is beautifully isolated from Western influences and consummately traditional in every sense. Korean Traditionalism has a dark, untamed wild mystique, unlike the boring gingham print propriety of Western TradCon images of Patriarchal Trad-Wife Traditionalism. I might describe my impression of Korea as "Everything is of the Natural Order — as seen under the light of a black hole / sun". Indeed, the dark colors of men's clothing, the monolithic, windowless architecture, and also the foliage, the trees, the indigenous cattle, horses, and pigs, and even the porous basalt stones used ubiquitously for pavement and walls — most all of which are black, mind you, or else a monochromically muted, pallish charcoal grey — all contribute towards an impression of a dark surrealism — like an Asian version of Gothic mysticism — only so much more Real in the realest sense than the Western concept.

Lord, it is as Real as Real can be, penetrating every corner of one's memory. Every step on that terrain takes you closer to Life.

As usual for most Asian countries, there is a lot of idolatry, but the idolatry of Korea is strongly and uniquely masculine, and this provides an insightful comparison to the feminine gynolatry that has swamped the West. (As a comparison, Taiwan's idolatry is predominantly feminine, but is balanced somewhat by Chinese Filial Piety, which is essentially Patriarchy.)

These idols are everywhere on Jeju Island.

Korean culture is very similar to Chinese culture. They have a variation of Filial Piety. They hold to various Buddhist philosophies, but not so religiously. They respect those of great accomplishment, education, and wealth. They observe the Chinese New Year as a holiday, but they do not celebrate it as the Chinese do. No dragons, no fireworks, no parades, etc.

Unlike the Chinese, Koreans value quality, reliability, time continuity, virtuosity, and vitality. In human social contexts, they value courtesy, fruition, intelligence, justice, righteousness, and wisdom. These values are contained in the four bagua trigrams depicted in the South Korean flag.

Trigram	Korean name	Celestial body	Season	Cardinal direction	Virtue	Family	Natural element	Meaning	Social fabric
☰	geon (건; 乾)	heaven (천; 天)	summer (하; 夏)	south (남; 南)	wisdom (인; 仁)	father (부; 父)	air (천; 天)	justice (정의, 正義)	The strong stay together

Many Koreans can speak some Chinese, and there is a very small percentage that can speak rough English (I met 3 such people in 5 days), and there are none other languages.

There is a rigid social hierarchy. Being too casual or too friendly with the boss is considered disrespectful and will get you 'demoted' (rejected from receiving bonuses, promotions, etc.) or even dismissed if the offense is too egregious.

Since the turn of the 21st century, the country has been renowned for its globally influential pop culture, particularly in cinema, music, and TV dramas, a phenomenon referred to as the Korean Wave.

Social Interactions

Although Korea has a Shame-Based ethical system for the most part, it is also a Low-Context country, meaning that people are direct, verbally expressive, and demanding. This is a rather unique combination. Thus, Koreans value politeness. If you're polite to them, then they will be polite to you. And vice versa is expected.

Koreans aspire to do everything quickly, pertly, and with flair. Doing so sets one at a level above average. In this sense, it's easy to rise above the riff raff simply by picking up the pace.

Within families and intersexual relationships, South Korean men typically expect to be in a protective, responsible, and respected role in a relationship. There is a name for this role, "Oppa", which means "Big Brother". Calling a man "Oppa", regardless of his age, is an informal gesture of honor and respect.

A young couple in Jeju City. Note the non-verbal cues denoting male dominance.

One thing I did not expect to see was that Koreans are very physically affectionate and intimate with their family members and close friends. They get up in each other's faces and talk face-to-face, their noses just inches away from each other. They speak coyly, earnestly, and teasingly, while giggling and laughing. They caress each other, hold each other close, and touch each other's hands and arms while they are talking. Family members caress, hold hands, hug, and show other unreserved displays of authentic emotions of love and affection for one another.

From what I could see, overall, I think these habits of interaction seem very emotionally healthy. In fact, it made me feel sad that I am not a part of a culture with such warm socialization norms.

But … they are only this way with family and close friends. To strangers, Koreans assume a presentation that is emotionally muted, formal, and reserved. And as cold as Koreans are to strangers, they are 10 times colder to foreigners, and 100 times colder to foreigners of other races.

However, in certain social contexts, this poker-face façade will break, and they will very convincingly pretend to be emotionally intimate and physically affectionate with people they are not so close to. This leads me to conclude that this behavior is a social norm arising from Shame-Based ethics rather than a personal expression.

For example, my mother-in-law (age 77) talked with an older female clerk (I guess late 50s) for a long time, maybe 20 minutes. At the end of their talk, my MIL asked her to take a photo together. The clerk was ostensibly surprised by this request, since they were essentially strangers, and from seeing her expression, I could feel how awkward she must've felt. But she didn't miss a beat. She mustered her courage, put her arm around my MIL, rested her cheek on MIL's shoulder, and assumed a very warm smile for the camera. It might very well have been fake, but good Lord, it was a very earnest and genuine expression. That is true humility of the redemptive variety, and that photo — and that moment — will last forever because of her humble grace. Yea, it was so heart-touching, that I really admired her for making that effort.

Otzuma

I already mentioned that people in Korea are direct and Low Context, but there are many older women who are so aggressive, boisterous, demanding, and pushy that they've earned a name for themselves in Korean culture: Otzuma — the Korean equivalent of a 'Karen', if you will. They all have short, thick, curly black hair and a RBF. They all wear heavy makeup and flower-printed, wool-lined granny vests.

We met one before we learned about this stereotype. My wife was looking at a unique item in a shop, but she didn't know what it was or how to use it. So she asked the clerk — who happened to be an Otzuma — several questions about it. After the third question, the Otzuma sales lady snatched the item out of my wife's hands and said, "Enough! If you don't want to buy, then don't ask me so many questions!"

Economy

South Korea is a highly developed country. The economy is ranked 14th largest in the world by nominal GDP and PPP-adjusted GDP; it is the world's eleventh-largest exporter and seventh-largest importer.

Koreans have a monolithically nationalistic view of the Korean economy. I commend them for this.

Koreans only buy Korean electronics, drive Korean cars, use Korean-made products, etc. Not totally, but I'd guess > 90%.

Everywhere I looked, all the cars were Hyundai, Kia, Genesis, and another brand that had no name on it, but only a symbol like flowing water that I didn't recognize — all Korean made. I saw only one very old Chevrolet and two Toyotas during my 5 day stay. 80% of cars are white, and about 15% are black. 5% different colors for emotional flavor, and everything else.

The Haribo Museum on Jeju Island, South Korea. Note that almost all the cars are white and Korean-made. Also note the presence of palm trees, despite single-digit temperatures.

There are three super corporations in Korea: Hyundai (automobile manufacturer), Lotte (food producer), and Samsung (electronics). These companies are international, powerful, and highly reputed in South Korea. Everyone wants to work for these companies, partly for the prestige, and partly because they pay about 6-7 times the average wage, but it's very competitive to get hired in.

I asked our Korean tour guide how to pronounce 'Lotte', wanting to know whether the 'e' is expressed or not. He threw me a surprise. 'Lotte' is a transliteration of the Korean name, which is pronounced Luoa-teh.

Korea has a huge cosmetics industry, perhaps the biggest in the world, but it is distributed over a large number of cosmetic enhancement companies, cosmetic product manufacturers, cosmetic surgery clinics, skin treatment services, etc.

One cosmetic company worth mentioning is Olive Young, a company that sells a very wide variety of very effective, very high quality, and very expensive cosmetic products. Upper class women (and upper class wannabes) from all over Asia are flying to Korea to buy products from the Olive Young company. When my wife's coworkers heard that she would be traveling to Korea, they all made long lists of products that they wanted her to buy for them from Olive Young. The total cost of all their orders was well over USD$3,000 for over 40 items. That's a stark indicator of just how important Attention is to women.

Jeju Island is famous for its Haribo gummy bear factory (see image above) and its Peanuts amusement park and museum, featuring the world-famous cartoon characters by Charles Schultz (see adjacent image).

Most all Asian countries have some Western fast food franchises, like Burger King, Kentucky Fried Chicken, McDonald's, Pizza Hut, Subway, etc. But in Korea, there are no western franchises, in alignment with the general stance of Korean nationalism. There aren't even any fast food chains. Instead, there are only street market stalls hosted by locals that offer an extremely wide variety of very delectable foods. I tend to think this is a good thing.

Technology

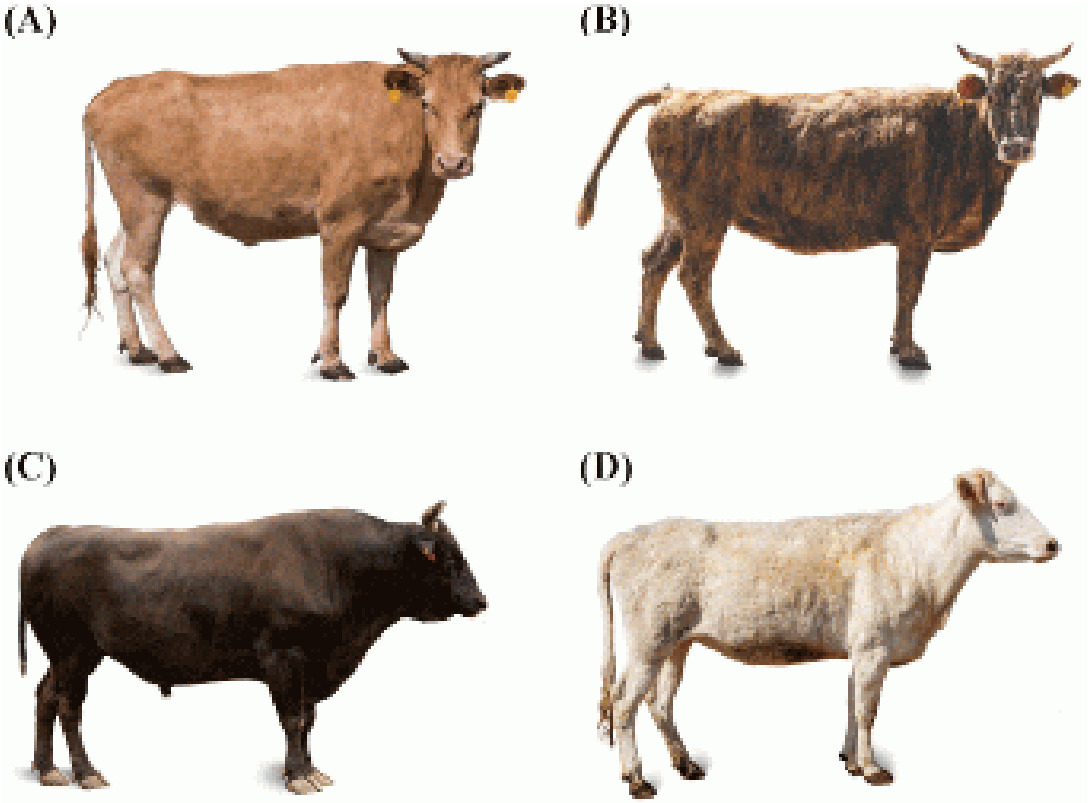
South Korea is one of the major hubs of microchip technology, cornering about 30% of the global market, along with Japan and Taiwan.

Korea also has a booming genetic industry and cutting edge stem cell research. This overlaps with the cosmetic and medical industries, as many skin care products utilize stem cell technology.

South Korea has some of the fastest Internet connection speeds and densest high-speed railway networks in the world.

Agriculture, Farming, and Livestock

Jeju Island has indigenous cattle, horses, and pigs. The indigenous cattle (which look like a shaggy cross between Asian brahmas and Western cows, see images below), horses (which are shaggy-haired, short, and strong-legged), and pigs (black-skinned and long-nosed) are unique in world zoology. Scientists do not understand how or when they originated there. For some unknown reason, these animals cannot survive long-term when relocated from the island elsewhere.



Types of Korean native cattle breeds: (A) Hanwoo, (B) Chikso, (C) Korean black cattle, (D) White Hanwoo. Image Source.

For centuries, horse farming was a booming industry on Jeju island, producing calcium supplements (from bones), meat and milk, among other products.

Alpaca fur and sheep wool are thriving cottage industries. There are many alpaca farms and sheep farms on Jeju Island.

A lady feeds carrots to Alpacas at an Alpaca farm.

Jeju island has a huge orange industry. Oranges are grown year-round, even in sub-zero temperatures. I had the idea that oranges only grew in Florida and Georgia, so I didn't really believe it until I went to an orchard and saw orange trees draped with oranges – real, fully ripe oranges — I saw them and touched them with my hands — and the temperature that day was 3°C! I was blown away. How the hell could oranges grow at these temperatures? God is great!

Whatever the case may be, they were absolutely the best tasting oranges I've ever eaten in my entire life! I ate 5 in one sitting, and I could see myself eating these oranges all day, every day, and never growing tired of them.

Food and Drinks

Because of the stereotypical cuisine served at Korean restaurants in the West, Westerners have the notion that Koreans eat bebimbob (pork, vegetables, and rice baked and served in a hot stone bowl), and Korean seafood pancakes. These foods are widely available in Korea, of course, but they're considered traditional delicacies and are seldom eaten by most people who don't have the time or money for all that fuss. Instead, most Koreans eat instant ramen noodles every day, with many other ingredients added, such as eggs, pork, and veggies.

Another surprise: Koreans don't eat breakfast. In response to the suggestion thereof, they think, "Why do Westerners get up so early to spend so much time cooking food and eating and making themselves fat, sleepy, and tired — even before the day begins?" The only restaurants that serve breakfast are those that have contracts with tourism agencies to do so. Nevertheless, their breakfast is the same as what is served for lunch: grilled mackerel, barbecued pork, peanuts, kimchi, and other pickled vegetables.

Mussel and shrimp "red sauce" soup (very spicy and delicious).

Koreans eat kimchi and fish for lunch, kimchi and barbecued pork for dinner, and more kimchi, and snacks such as hard-boiled eggs, peanuts, and spiced pickles in-between meals. Unknown to Westerners, there are dozens of different kinds of kimchi, comprised of different kinds of vegetables (e.g., cabbage, carrots, cucumbers, horseradish, Japanese yams, napa, peppers, radishes, turnips, and many other foodstuffs you've never even heard of, etc.), different seasonings and spices, and other ingredients galore, so they never tire of it. Two or three times a week, they'll eat seafood, predominantly mackerel, squid, and various shellfish (e.g. abalone, clams, crab, mussels, oysters, scallops, etc.). Beef is prevalent, but only wealthy Koreans eat beef because of its expense. No matter. I could totally accept the middle-class dining aperitif.

The most popular beer, by far, is Cass, brewed in Korea of course.

At restaurants, there is no take out. You must dine in. But if you want to eat restaurant food at home, you can always order the food by Uber.

Perhaps most surprising is this: All meals, victuals, beverages, snacks, soup, you name it, whatever the food or drink is, everything is eaten cold. People eat ice cream on winter days. Refrigerated vending machines dispense ice cream bars and even plastic cups filled with nothing but ice to make your added drink colder. If food is ever eaten hot, it is only because it is coincidentally served immediately after cooking. It appears that it is more important that food is deliciously well cooked and well-prepared than it is being served hot off the grille. One exception might be a preference for consuming hot drinks, in order to help keep one warm.

Another exception is cereal. Despite Koreans NOT eating breakfast, Western-style breakfast cereals appear to be very popular — another food eaten cold; although I have no idea if they actually eat this food in the morning. It is always sold in sturdy plastic zip-lock bags, NOT boxes.

Weather

The weather in Korea is very strange (in my Western opinion).

Jeju Island sits at the same latitude as Phoenix, Arizona (33.3°), but its temperatures are comparable to those of climates 10° farther north, such as Illinois and Ohio. It is classified as subtropical, despite the fact that it gets snow in the winter. Jeju Island has palm trees and orange trees that bear fruit year-round, despite having near zero degree temperatures during the winter.

The skies are often cloudy, yet the sunlight is hot and intense, needing sunglasses. The high UV radiation requires the regular use of sunblock. The skies were continually overcast most days, and yet I still got a fair bit of sunburn. I wear glasses with photochromic lenses (they automatically turn dark in bright light), and they were always dark during the day, due to the bright sunshine. Women's cosmetics are designed to contain SPF 50+ sunblock.

Although it gets almost freezing cold, it doesn't feel like it because it is so dry and the sunlight is blazingly intense.

I walked around outside in near-zero degree temperatures wearing only a sweatshirt with a T-shirt underneath, and I felt comfortable.

The temperature inside the hotel was set at 20°C but this felt roasting hot. We turned off the air conditioning and slept with the window open to stay comfortably cool, and also to have some fresh air. This, when it was about 2°C outside at night.

Clothing

There are so many good-looking young women in Korea.

Korean men regularly wear black, or colors so dark it is nearly indistinguishable from black in low lighting. Korean women often wear white. Not all or all the time, but it's very common. I'd guess around 80% of men and women dress in these predominant colors.

It is not uncommon to see people — even young people — wearing florid dresses, or sharp suits, or other styles of spiffy or showy clothing. Men wear leather. Women wear furs — real furs. Their appearance actually looks very beautiful / handsome, and this is so common that no one thinks it is strange, too formal, or out of place. I felt very humbled and inspired to see people dressed so articulately as a norm.

Physiology

Koreans have a very strong physical constitution, and a high facial and body symmetry compared to most other Asians. Maxillofacial structure and symmetry are consistently robust and of an ideal golden ratio, much better than those of many Chinese or Taiwanese, on average.

Koreans are stereotypically stout and strong. Very, very few are overweight. Absolutely no one is grossly obese. On average, Koreans are much bigger, stronger, and taller than Chinese, Japanese, or Taiwanese. Many younger Koreans are very tall, > 175 cm. and many are thin — some are very thin, in fact. These individuals look like runway models, and they are so ubiquitous that you'll see them walking the streets every day. I am not kidding.

There are many tall, good-looking men, too.
There is a very high degree of genetic homogeneity. By that, I mean, most Koreans look very much alike, much more so than that among Chinese, Taiwanese, or even Japanese.

- On average, Korean men are exceptionally tall, compared to most other Asians. V-shaped torsos, and thick, wavy black hair are common. They are also rather confident and self-assured, compared to the average Asian man.
- On average, Korean women are taller, thinner, have fuller, more robust figures, flatter stomachs, and rounder buttocks compared to most other Asian women. They also have more discipline and more self-control.

My wife told me that Koreans have a stereotype of being big, strong, tall, forceful, and direct because Korea has had a long history of being invaded by China and/or Japan. I assume she is hinting to evolutionary theory, that this has apparently weeded out the poorer quality and weaker individuals in centuries past, producing a superior sub-race. From what I've seen, I can totally believe this conjecture.

Other Notes of Interest

Jeju Island and much of the Korean peninsula was formed by volcanic ash overflow about 2 million years ago. Strangely morphed, basalt rock formations are everywhere.

The quality of general merchandise is higher than in Taiwan, comparable to the U.S., maybe even better than the U.S. depending on where you're at.

Stores pack many items into small spaces, which makes the presentation of products look very congested and cluttered; but it's easy to shop; similar items are all in one location so it is easier to compare and select.

Many things about Korea struck me as very bizarre, strange, or ugly; things like coats, dresses, shoes, furnishings, etc. But after becoming more accustomed to these things, I see that they are very functional, practical, or useful.

I noticed that many things are not flat, level, and/or square. Floors, sinks, building foundations, doors, windows, walls … are all slightly graded, tilted, off-center, or not quite level or square. It's like construction workmen don't have a level or measuring tape on hand and just eyeball everything.

The tour guide said there are no round tables in Korea, only square or rectangular. I guess it's mostly true. The whole time I was there, the only place I saw round tables was in the cafeteria of an international hotel.

Filial Piety / Patriarchy in China and Taiwan

Historically, China has ALWAYS been a Patriarchal culture. ALWAYS! (Up until about 80-100 years ago, as I'll get to in the next post.) That's what Filial Piety (xiào, 孝) is all about. I repeat, Filial Piety IS Chinese Patriarchy. The Chinese character, 孝, depicts a social context in which the entire family is collectively tied to the land (土), where the family holds authority over the son (子), but the land is sacrificed for the son (represented by the slash through 土). It is implied that the son should be thankful for the unearned and unlimited favor he receives from the father and family. In practice, this arrangement is quid pro quo, meaning that the more humble and grateful the son is to the father and family, the more favor and honor he shall receive.

Filial Piety is not that far removed from the Biblical model of Patriarchy. This fully explains why Filial Piety / Chinese Patriarchy is THE reason why Chinese culture has endured for thousands of years.

But rather than viewing Filial Piety as a multi-millennia-long tradition of societal-stabilizing Chinese Patriarchy, Western sources consistently ignore the central values of honoring one's father and investing in one's son, and instead describe Filial Piety as a foundational Confucian virtue emphasizing deep respect, obedience, and care for parents and ancestors. Or worse, a collectivist, brain-dead loyalty to one's family. But either way, it is always described as a bizarre collection of awkward social habits involving bowing and scraping, and its customs are regarded as similar to the Chinese Fire Drill trope. This is a Western-biased and wholly unfair depiction of Filial Piety.

Taiwanese Pastor's Wives are SAHMs

In response to my critique of the influential role of pastor's wives, Surfdumb asked,

> "Jack is probably in a good position to tell us about the Chinese pastors and wives of the persecuted home church. Are those wives still coven leaders? They might be, but bossing other women around seems to be a Chinese feature. They are ruthless and graceless with each other from what I've seen."

In a society that values Filial Piety, Patriarchy is the norm. Those who practice the customs and habits thereof, and do so regularly and very well, are regarded as better, higher quality people of refined class, whereas behaviors and individuals that dishonor and disregard father are seen as 'low class' in a colloquial sense.

Within this cultural context, a woman must excel in Filial Piety to be seriously considered as a potential pastor's wife. Chinese / Taiwanese Pastors select wives from this pool of eligibles.

As to Surfdumb's question about Taiwanese pastors' wives influence, the simple answer is that these pastor's wives are under intense pressure to lay low and not dishonor, disrupt, distract, or interfere with their husbands' ministries. Most pastors are high-status and rather influential men who make above average wages, and thus, most pastors' wives don't want to rock the boat. So they usually do NOT get involved with their husbands' work in the church at all, for fear of causing any kind of trouble. The Taiwanese pastor's wives that I've known personally don't even engage in any kind of women's ministries. They make an appearance at church for the Sunday service, and that's it. They spend most of their time at home raising a large number of children. It is not uncommon for them to have 3 to 6 children, with some adopted.

That, IMO, is how it is supposed to be.

I'll cover more historical details about the development of Christianity in China and Taiwan in a separate essay for readers who are interested.

A Concise History of Christian Missions in China and Taiwan

Christianity has endured a long hard slog in China and Taiwan.

There's a lot of history here, so I'll only summarize the highlights in this essay.

Highlights on the History of Christian Missions in China

Key historical details regarding early Christian missions in China:

- Christian missionaries first arrived in China in 635 AD during the Tang Dynasty. A Persian missionary named Alopen (or Olepen) led a group from the Church of the East (Nestorians) along the Silk Road to the capital city of Xi'an, where they were welcomed by Emperor Taizong and allowed to establish churches. As recorded on the Xi'an Stele, Alopen and his followers introduced "the Luminous Religion", and they translated Christian texts into Chinese.
- Roman Catholic missionaries traveled to China in the 13th century during the Yuan Dynasty.
- Jesuit missionaries, e.g. Matteo Ricci, reached China in the late 16th century.
- The first Protestant missionary, Robert Morrison, arrived in 1807, followed by many others within the next several decades, notably Hudson Taylor (active 1854-1905), who notoriously adopted Chinese dress, and focused on inland provinces, fostering indigenous church growth, and who founded the China Inland Mission (CIM), one of the most successful Chinese mission organizations to date, and Lottie Moon (active from 1873 to 1912), who was a prominent Southern Baptist missionary.

Christian missions prior to the 19th century were viewed as a cultural and philosophical curiosity by the elite, and were not widely known or taught among the common populace.

But when Evangelical Protestant Christianity appeared in China in the early 19th century, commoners were the target audience. Among them, Christianity was seen as a thoroughly foreign, relatively 'pagan' religion that taught people to be poor and weak (c.f. the Beatitudes), and in this view, was wholly worthy of xenophobia. So it was greatly feared and hated on the grassroots level by locals following traditional religions. (In comparison, Buddhism teaches peace, social harmony, and wealth management. Daoism is a very austere religion centered on fear-power ethics. In both religions, wealth is regarded as proof of one being blessed by the gods and of one's righteousness.) This anti-Christian xenophobia eventually culminated in, and was resolved through bloody means by the Boxer Rebellion in 1899 (see this informative video summary).

Highlights on the History of Christian Missions in Taiwan

The history of Christian missions in Taiwan came about in three separate waves.

- First Wave (1620s–1660s): Dutch Protestant missionaries arrived with Dutch colonists via the Dutch East India Company (VOC), focusing on the indigenous people in southern Taiwan (AKA Formosa). Spanish Catholics arrived in 1626 in the north. These missions ended when the late Ming dynasty warlord, Koxinga, expelled the Dutch from Taiwan in 1662.
- Second Wave (1850s–1870s): Catholicism returned in 1859 with Dominican friars in Kaohsiung. Protestantism returned with English Presbyterian missionary Dr. James Maxwell's arrival in 1865, followed by Canadian Presbyterian missionary, Dr. George Leslie MacKay in 1872.
- Third Wave (Post WW2): Grass roots Evangelism amid Modernization.

These waves are described in more detail below.

First Wave in Taiwan (1620s–1660s)

The first wave started in the early 1620's when Dutch Reformed missionaries accompanied the Dutch East India Company (VOC) to southern Taiwan and successfully evangelized local aborigines. Beginning in 1626, Spanish Catholic missionaries, predominantly Dominicans, accompanied Spanish colonists and established brief missions in northern Taiwan.

The Dutch East India Company employed many Chinese and thereby facilitated mass Chinese immigration to the island.

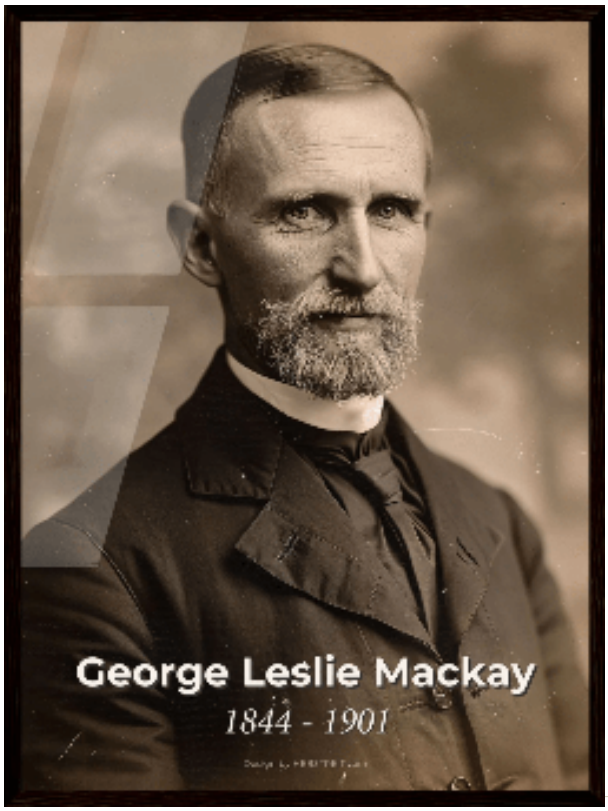
Unfortunately, after the expulsion of the Dutch regime by Koxinga, a famous Chinese general from the late-Ming Dynasty, all traces of these Dutch and Spanish missions disappeared within half a century.

However, Chinese immigrants, many of whose offspring were merged with Dutch and Spanish blood, slowly grew to dominate the population of Taiwan over the next century.

Second Wave in Taiwan (1850s–1870s)

A second wave of mission activity began in the 1860's, initiated by the "Great Missionary Movement" taking place in the West in the late 19th century, in which Taiwan was the focus of many missions by multiple Protestant churches, most notably Baptist and Presbyterian. This mission activity was facilitated by the Tien Chin Treaty of 1858, which was contracted between the Qing Empire of China and several foreign imperial powers, and guaranteed the freedom of evangelism within foreign settlements.

English Presbyterian missionaries arrived in southern Taiwan in 1865, hosted by Dr. James Maxwell. This was followed by Canadian Presbyterian missionaries, led by Dr. George Leslie MacKay, in the north in 1872.



Noteworthy missionaries include…

- Scottish Presbyterian, missionary and physician, Dr. James Laidlaw Maxwell (active in Tainan and Kaohsiung (southern Taiwan), from 1865-1885)
- Canadian Presbyterian, dentist, evangelist, missionary, and human rights activist, Rev. George Leslie MacKay (active in Danshui (northern Taiwan), from 1872-1901). Mackay received funding from the Presbyterian church to open hospitals, schools, and over 60 churches in his lifetime, most all of which are still operational today. I've attended MacKay's church, and I've met some of his descendants. My 2 children were born in MacKay's hospital.
- Scottish Presbyterian, missionary, and physician, Dr. David Landsborough (active in Tainan and Changhua (south-central Taiwan), from 1895-1936).

The Perseverance of the Second Wave

On 1895/4/17, following defeat in the First Sino-Japanese War, the Qing Dynasty ceded Taiwan and the Penghu Islands to Japan via the Treaty of Shimonoseki. This marked the beginning of the historic 50-year-long Japanese colonial rule in Taiwan (1895–1945). This takeover triggered an intense armed resistance by local inhabitants against Japanese rule, and a failed bid for independence (Republic of Formosa).

Because of the anti-foreign mentality of the Taiwanese people at that time, many violent, religion-related, anti-foreigner incidents occurred, which resulted in missionaries and local converts experiencing various afflictions and persecutions.

Lottie Moon

Amid this turmoil, Presbyterian missionaries adopted a rather comprehensive approach to missions, engaging in medical, educational, and social services, as well as evangelism. Presbyterians endured in their faith and bore witness to the Reformed spirit of "Nec tamen consumebatur", a Latin phrase meaning, "and yet it was not consumed", originating from Exodus 3:2 regarding Moses and the burning bush. This axiom represents the Presbyterian Church enduring persecution or suffering without being destroyed, all by God's sustaining presence.

Under these trying circumstances, the English and Canadian missions joined in 1912 and formed the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan (PCT). It was on this foundation that the church in Taiwan endured difficult times under the Japanese regime and its “Royal citizen movement” which was associated with Emperor worship, military patriotism, and Shintoism.

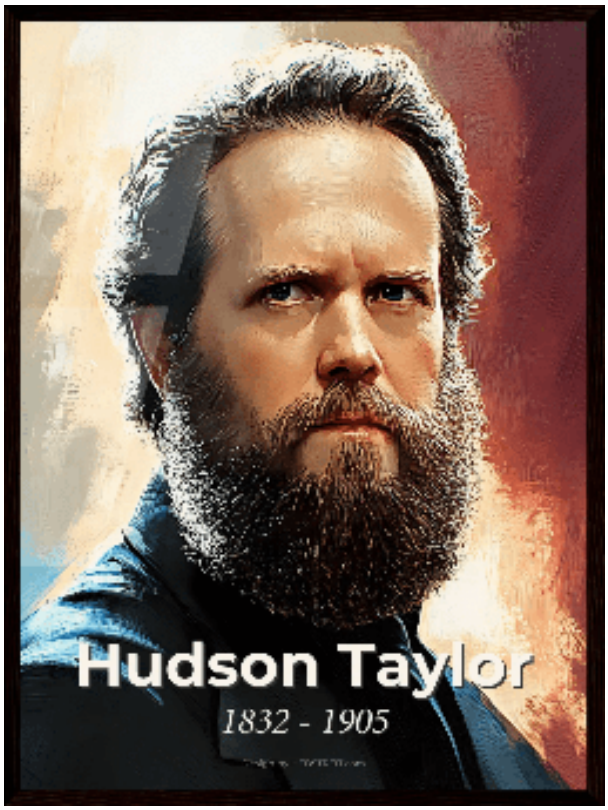
Over the next few decades of Japanese colonialization involving cultural integration, socialization, and reeducation, the Taiwanese slowly grew to accept Japanese customs and language under the expectation of being Japanese citizens. This affinity for Japan was present during WW2, with many Taiwanese men fighting under Japanese forces, and it continues to the present day.

Parallel Wave in China



In China, as a result of international pressure, e.g. international politics following the Boxer Rebellion in 1899, the Qing Dynasty encouraged Christianity and even contributed funding to missions.

The masterminds of the democratic revolution in 1911 were mostly U.S. educated Christians. So Christianity continued to be favored.

Christianity wasn’t heavily persecuted from the top down until Communist forces rose to power, starting around 1925 and peaking during Mao’s Cultural Revolution in the 1960s. Many Chinese Christians emigrated to Taiwan after WW2, amid the Chinese Civil War (1927-1949).

Third Wave in Taiwan (Post WW2)

The third wave of missions began after the Second World War. It consisted primarily of independent or indigenous churches from China, who arrived in Taiwan along with the defeated Nationalist regiment influx of mainstream Christian denominations.

All churches, local and influxed, seized the opportunity to engage in evangelistic works among the numerous Chinese refugees whose lives had been disrupted by war.

There is one VERY noteworthy evangelist in Taiwan who was active during this time, Chinese author, hymnist, and preacher, Witness Lee (active in Taiwan from 1949-1958). His ministry saw an explosive growth of Christianity in Taiwan, amassing over 50,000 followers in less than 5 years. His mystical interpretations of the Bible, his concept of the "Economy of God" [description / read full text online] which explains how Christians are to live in harmonious fellowship within the Body of Christ, and the happy, sing-song, agit-prop style of worship that he instituted are now the standard model of worship services within most Taiwanese Christian churches today.

Witness Lee

Up to 1965, these missionary movements were quite successful. However, with gradual industrialization and urbanization throughout society after 1965, the growth of the church became stagnant. Currently, the majority (75-80%) of people in Taiwan are affiliated with either Buddhism, Taoism, or Folk Religion — a mixture of Buddhism, Taoism, Confucianism, folklore, and animistic beliefs. Christians, including Protestants and Catholics, consist of only 2-3% of the entire population (~700,000 people).

Why China Cannot Liberalize

In response to this article, it may be insightful to compare China and Taiwan — the same ethnic people, the same culture, but vastly different political and socioeconomic conditions.

So here, I'll go over a few reasons why I think Taiwan has been able to liberalize.

A beautiful sunset view of the Taipei cityscape and skyline, and the Taipei 101 building in Taiwan.

Martial Law in Taiwan

IMO, the reason why Taiwan was able to liberalize is that the Taiwanese government (KMT) imposed martial law for 35 years (1951-1987) following the Chinese Civil War (1925-1949). During this time, Anarchists, Communists, Dissenters, and nutty free thinkers were arrested and detained on a small, remote island off the east coast (Green Island). It was sort of like the Alcatraz of Taiwan, except prisoners were allowed to roam freely and live at their leisure — so long as they did not interfere with the cultural education and political rehabilitation occurring on the larger island of Taiwan.

This crackdown was necessary to create order and socio-political-demographic homogeneity, which is a necessary condition for liberalization to occur. If there are too many factions having opposing interests and goals for the nation, then there will always be a power struggle, sabotage, and other roadblocks to progress.

Demographics of Taiwan ~1950

Demographics are very important for establishing social capital and national solidarity. So here's a glimpse of what was happening in Taiwan after the Chinese Civil War, and why martial law was necessary.

In 1950, the population of Taiwan was comprised of a wide assortment of different groups.

4 million people, mostly of Chinese descent (本省人; benshengren), had been living in Taiwan prior to the Chinese Civil War. These people were predominantly agrarian, had been under Japanese rule for 50 years, from 1895 until the end of WW2, learned Japanese in public school, and had fully expected Taiwan to be annexed by Japan, and thus become Japanese citizens. Mostly subscribing to Daoism and folk religions, they loved all things Japanese, and Taiwan's affinity for Japan continues to this day.

These 4 million people were comprised of the following people groups.

- 70% Hoklo Taiwanese (AKA Minnanren 閩南人), originating from southern China, migrated to Taiwan in the 17th century, and intermixed with Dutch and Spanish colonists.
- 15% Hakka, originating from northern China, migrated to Taiwan in the 18th century.
- 2.5% or ~200,000 indigenous Austronesian people.

Somewhere between 1.2 and 2 million people (or 20-30% of the population of Taiwan at that time) had fled to Taiwan from China during the Chinese Civil War. These people were called waishengren（外省人), and were mostly upper-class, Christians, or anyone who was inseparably tied to the KMT or had everything to lose to Communism. They had fought against the Japanese in Nanjing and hated them bitterly.

Government Programs

During this period of martial law, the KMT government sponsored farms and industries by giving out grants and loans to promising entrepreneurs. The purpose was to jump-start the economy and also to win people's confidence in the government. As a result, construction, manufacturing, oil, and steel industries sprang up. Within 20 years, Taiwan became a major manufacturer, exporting to the entire world, which quickly boosted the economy.

After martial law was lifted in 1987, liberal capitalism took over, and the culture and economy grew exponentially. By the early 2000s, Taiwan had become the semiconductor capital of the world, and remains so to this day.

Conclusions

The leaders of Taiwan during this time, Chiang Kai-Shek and his son, Chiang Wei-Kuo, who succeeded him, imposed martial law in Taiwan and invested heavily in industry. The overall result was a sociopolitical homogenization of the population and a growing economy, allowing enough financial capital, social capital, and trust in the economy and in the government to permit liberalization, democratization, and capitalism without catastrophe.

The reason why all this 'worked' is because…

- Most of the people groups in Taiwan are of similar ethnicities.
- Although people held widely contrasting political and social views before 1950, once martial law removed the weirdos and got the wider populace into a collective state of mind, and the money started flowing, they began to think and act like a nation.

Meanwhile in China, Mao and the CCP embarked on a Cultural Revolution with a similar aim.

However, China's efforts hampered the process of creating a unified social order. China also had large demographic percentages of multiple ethnic and political groups to wrangle with, but IMO, this strategy didn't work with the CCP because of the widespread breaking of families, which was commonplace during the Cultural Revolution, and the economic policies of communism offered no incentive for people to work, earn, produce, and form families. It taught people to fear the government, rather than to celebrate being Chinese.

I'm sure there's much more to it than what I've described here, but these are the primary reasons why I believe Taiwan has been able to liberalize and create a booming economy, while China has not been able to sustain its economic momentum.

Jack's Bite

Younger generations in Taiwan look back at that period of martial law and think that the KMT was H!tler. I tell them, "You don't know what you're saying. You don't understand human nature or politics. That period of martial law was needed to create the sociopolitical conformity that is necessary for democracy to function, be successful, and set Taiwan on the track of upward mobility. Without that period of martial law to reset the sociopolitical climate as well as the economy, Taiwan would probably be where China is today, or maybe worse."

Student Loan Forgiveness: Pros and Cons

To forgive debt, or not to forgive debt? — A poignant question for the younger generation.

Intro

With the rising chasm between the "Have's" and "Have Not's", the issue of widespread student loan debt and 'forgiveness' has become a pivotal flashpoint in today's politicoeconomic climate (or it was until recently).

It is insightful to have a comprehensive summary of this topic, reflecting upon Biblical / Red Pill wisdom, accountability gaps between genders, government overreach, and declining employment prospects for young men and women alike, due to contradicting social forces.

Here, I've compiled a summary of the topic, heavily informed by Farm Boy's post at Spawny's Space, Bail Me Out (2025/12/29), and the responding comments.

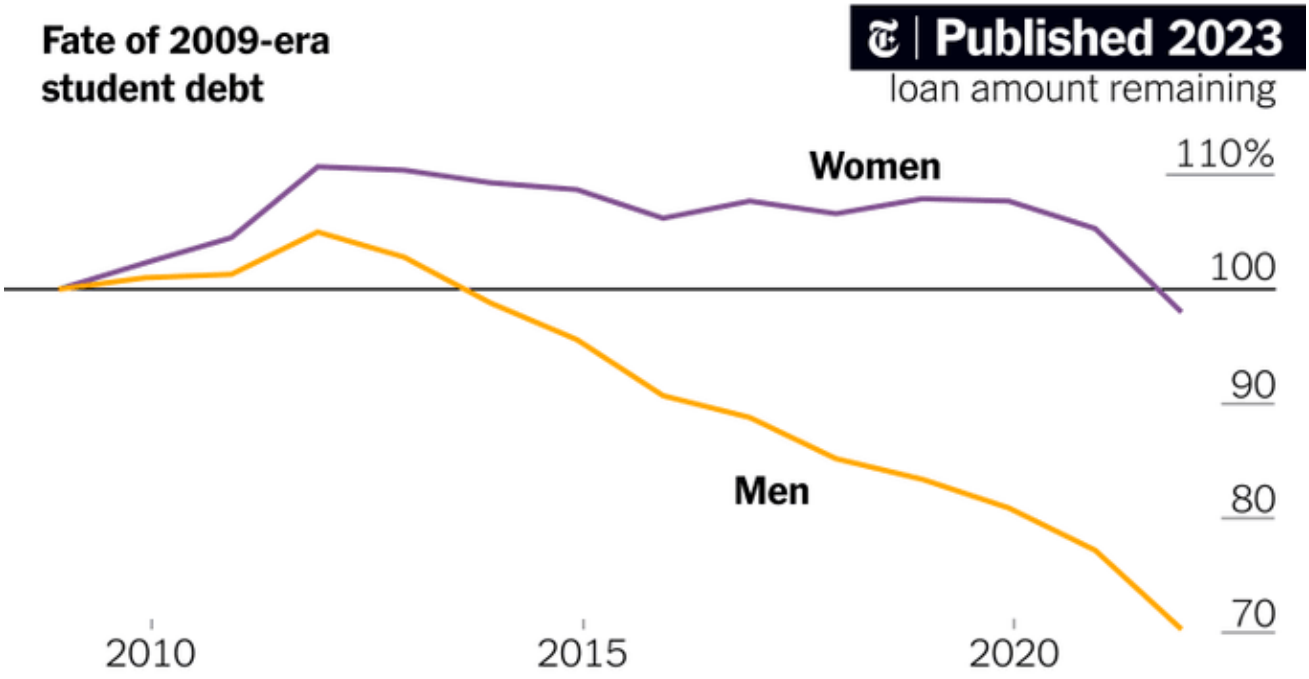
Summary of Farm Boy's Assessment

Inspired by a tweet from Crémieux, Farm Boy discusses gender differences in student loan repayment.

The fundamental sex differences are:

- For men, a tertiary education is viewed as a valuable vehicle of career and status development, and as such, an investment in one's career.
- In contrast, college for many women is primarily a fun, extended adolescence rather than a hard-earned career preparation or an investment in the future.

- Men choose practical degrees leading to employment and repay loans quickly because they expect NO bailout — they know responsibility falls solely on them.
- Women often pursue interest-based degrees with low economic value, prioritize “self-discovery” and ‘lifestyle’ over repayment, and anticipate bailouts from fathers, boyfriends, (future?) husbands, or government (especially in public/non-profit sectors).
- Men tend to pay down their loans rapidly, while women make little progress, even after decades.



Fate of 2009-era Student Debt.
Farm Boy added a related tweet about grade inflation in women’s studies vs. rigorous fields like math, as evidence of academics favoring less demanding paths. (See adjacent table.)

Farm Boy asserted that a person's attitude towards education and their track record of borrowing and/or repaying student loans constitutes a societal Sh!t Test for maturity. Thus, women's behaviors in this matter signal frivolity and irresponsibility, making them poor marriage prospects.

Men who are cognizant of these dynamics strongly oppose proposals for student loan forgiveness, either out of a desire for a rational and solvent economic policy, and/or maybe as a payback / punishment to women for not "putting out" sex, submission, marriage, and children instead — or both — "How else will they learn?"

Also, many women are now regretting chasing after the Feminist Life Script that dictates carousel, education, and career, and wish they had spent their prime years securing a husband and having a family instead.

Moreover, regarding the de facto problem of young women's poor ability to make financial decisions and life decisions, student loan forgiveness would heavily favor female borrowers and continue enabling their failure and foolishness.

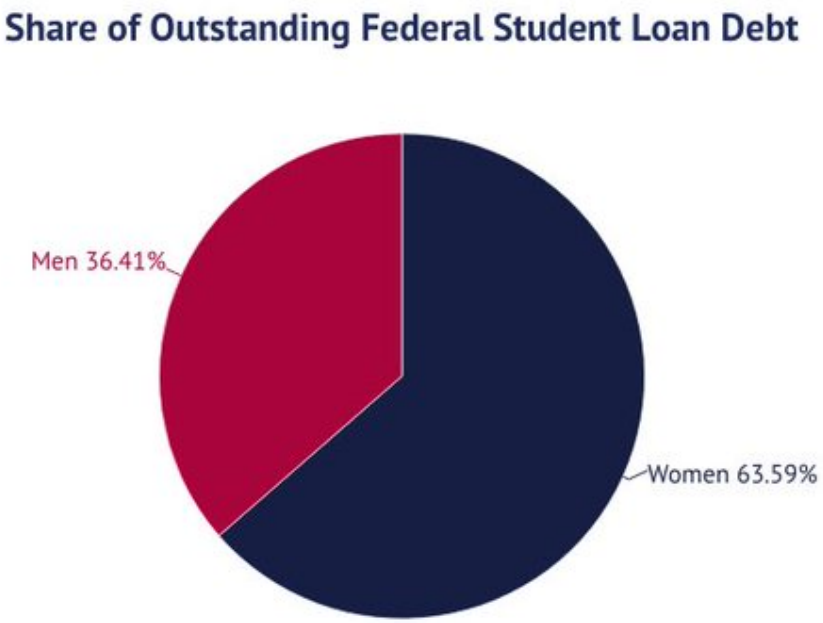
All of this aligns with, and supports Biblical / Manosphere / Red Pill / Traditional perspectives on gender roles and responsibility.

Discussion Summary

The comment section was lively and polarized, with regular commenters debating student loan forgiveness, personal responsibility, systemic flaws in education / government, the impact of Feminism, and generational accountability.

The discussion was also confrontational and intermittently heated, with accusations of cowardice and/or schadenfreude, personal attacks, strong anti-Feminist undertones, and calls for radical reforms like turning to God / family and/or taxing colleges.

The key factions that emerged and their arguments are as follows.



Education Data Initiative source: American Association of University Women

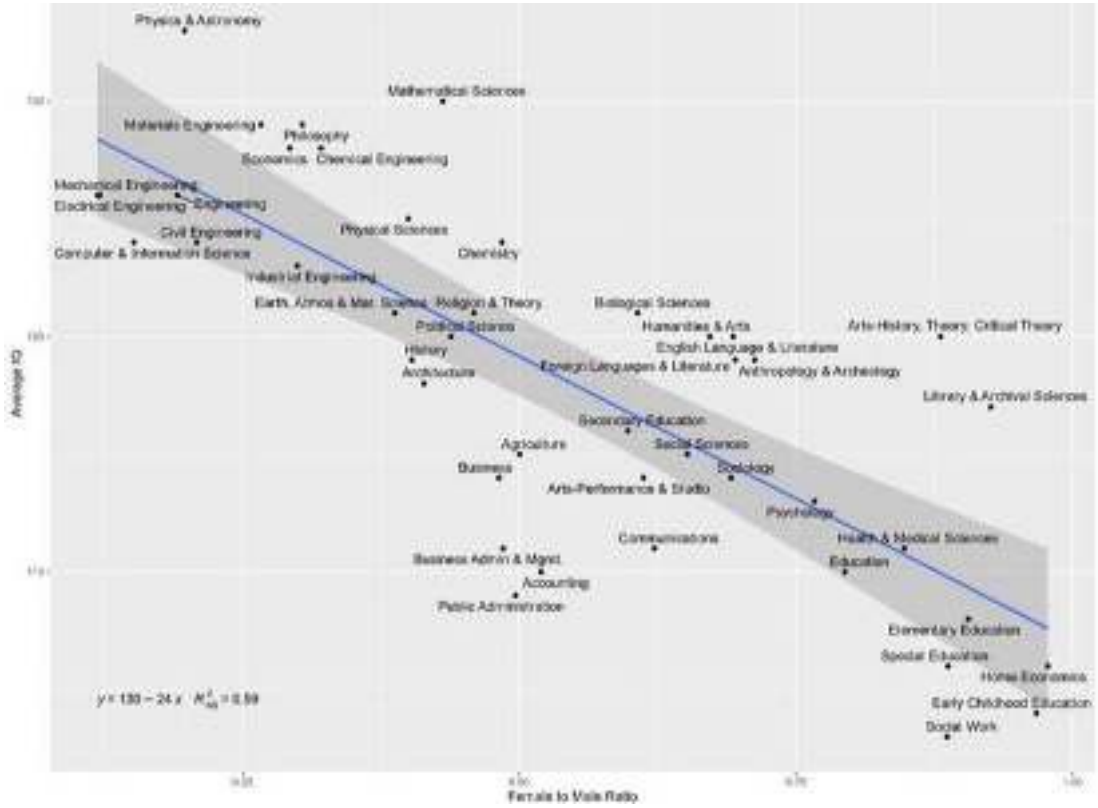
Opposition to Student Loan Forgiveness

Opposing Forgiveness was the majority view, spearheaded by Cheque d'Out, CP, Feeriker, LocustsPlease, Sharkly, SurfDumb, Thedeti, and Thnking.

The reasons were given as follows.

- Forgiveness rewards irresponsibility, creates moral hazard, and teaches bad lessons.
- Forgiveness amounts to "toxic empathy" and/or enabling stupid career and financial decision-making, especially in women who are less able to make such decisions responsibly.
- Facing financial responsibility builds character (e.g., Sharkly shared personal debt struggles leading to growth, and quotes Nietzsche and M. Scott Peck, respectively).
- Lazy / stingy parents, government intervention, misleading marketing, and the relative ease of obtaining loans are responsible for the debt crisis. Why should taxpayers (i.e. men) enable / reward their incompetence?
- Taxpayers (i.e., men) foot the bill unfairly, leading to added financial strain and frustration for earners. Meanwhile, there is no fix for deeper issues like the broken SMP/MMP dynamics or women postponing marriage until The Wall hits their bank accounts — things that, if fixed, would motivate men to earn more.

Suggested solutions included making it harder to obtain loans, imposing the risk of default on colleges, shrinking government involvement, and/or severing ties between education, government, and loans.



Average IQ vs Female to Male Ratio in Academic Major Fields of Study.

Pro-Forgiveness

Pro-Forgiveness was a minority view, primarily held by Bardelys the Magnificent, with some nuances from others.

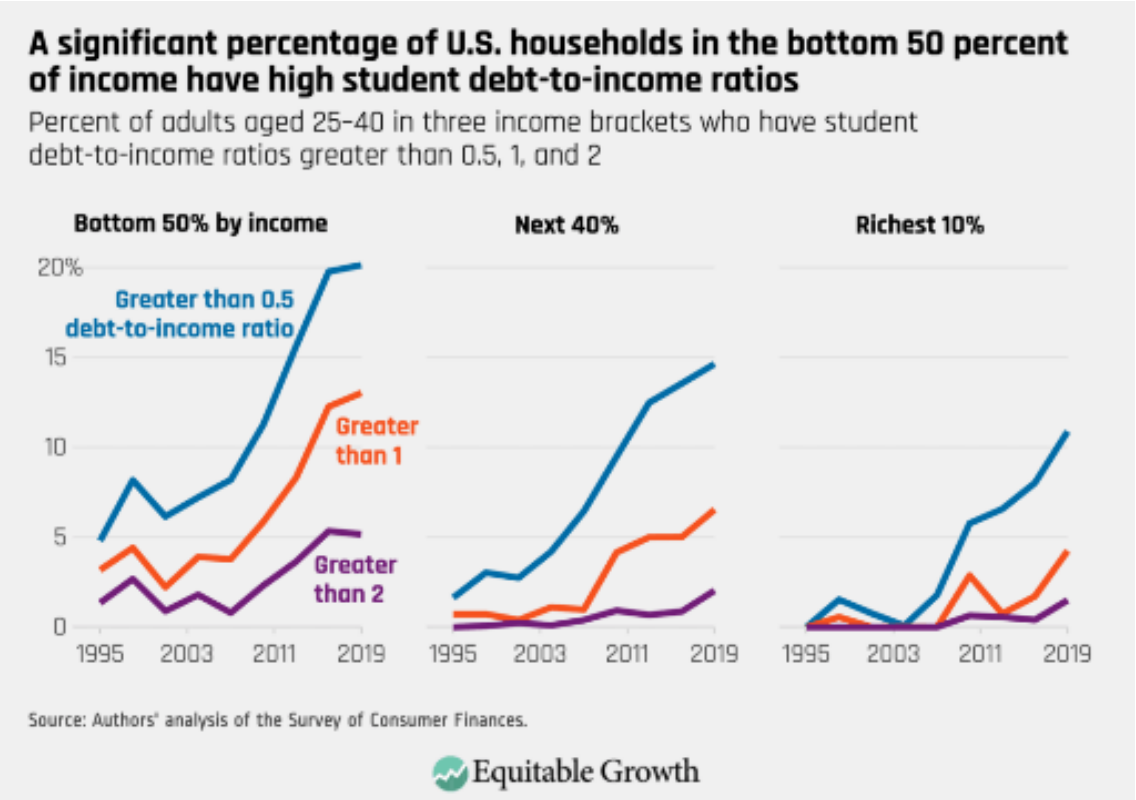
The reasons were given as follows.

- The Bible references all debt forgiveness every 49 years on the 50th year (called the Jubilee).
- Young people don't know the value of a dollar, and were misled by trusted adults, parents, and a rigged system designed to crush family formation (gynocentric feminism, high costs, immigration, inflation, etc.).
- Non-forgiveness lacks compassion and condemns youths to suffer.
- The solution is NOT to withhold grace from those most affected, but rather to address the root systemic evils (e.g., NOT including student loans in bankruptcy, reckless liberal loan policies, the satanic oligarchy, etc.).
- Cancellation (non-taxpayer-funded or via jubilee-like reset) would provide relief, encourage marriage and having children, and also serve justice.

Facts, Middle Ground, and Other Points

Most other objective views pointed out that the system is fraudulent, in line with the Pro-Forgiveness argument.

- Parents fail, and in some cases, refuse to cover the costs of their children's education, yet encourage them to go into debt in the presumed hopes of securing a brighter future.
- It is too easy to get a student loan, and too difficult to pay it back. Young'uns aren't aware of this.
- Filing for bankruptcy erases all debt except student loans.
- Predictions of societal backlash (e.g., resentful children –> elder abuse).
- Commenters suggested that banks and colleges should cover unpaid loans, but opposed full bailouts.
- Many other anecdotal stories about personal debt repayment.



Jack's Solution

Personally, I endorse Student Loan Forgiveness to borrowers (NOT banks), prorated on a 10-year earnings trend (intended as an incentive to work), with the stipulation that the outstanding debt should be absorbed by the banks that foolishly decided to hand out money so easily (partly subsidized by the government on a case-by-case basis), based on a flimsy "promissory note", and without any background check into the recipients' families' actual financial condition or ability to repay.

In support of this perspective, recall how banks crashed the whole U.S. economy and housing market in 2008 by giving out home loans to practically anyone who applied for them, with the full knowledge that they would repossess these homes in the more-than-likely event of a default — what I would call an implicitly fraudulent loan policy. I think they've done the same thing with student loans, but in diabolical cahoots with the government.

This approach would address the systemic evils while providing relief.

Conclusions

There was no clear consensus, but opposition to blanket forgiveness of educational debt dominated the discussion.

What say you?

Our gratitude to Farm Boy, and the commenters at Spawny's Space for sorting through this controversial issue.

Is the Current Drop in Fertility due to the Decrease in Marriage or the Mating Glut?

Decreasing Fertility

The Total Fertility Rate (TFR), defined as the average number of children born to each woman in a country, has been decreasing all around the world since the 1960s, and is now below replacement levels in many areas of the developed world.

What are the mechanisms leading to the abysmal birth rates?

Jack and Red Pill Apostle have studied this for a while, and we've identified the following factors.

1. The Convenience of Choice — The primary reason, coinciding with the timing of the decreased birth rate, is the wide availability of Abortion / Birth Control, making it waaay Too Easy for women to avoid or end a pregnancy.
2. Fading Religious Convictions have led to a decreased motivation for women to marry and have children.
3. The Decrease in Marriage — Fewer men and women are getting married.
4. The Postponement of Marriage — Women are postponing marriage into their late 20s and 30s, and are therefore having fewer children.

5. The Difficulty of Out of Wedlock Births — Although it's easier than in the past, single women who have children must depend on themselves, the government welfare dole, or a court order stipulating that a man (not necessarily the father) must pay child support. All these are incentives NOT to have OOWB.
6. Women's Preference to Wait until Marriage to Have Children — In general, women are unwilling to have children outside of marriage. Although we've seen an increase of OOWB coinciding with the decrease in marriage and an increase in cohabitation, we believe this uptick doesn't make up for the overall decrease in births.
7. Women's UNWillingness to Have Children — In general, Western women view pregnancy as if it were a death sentence, hence why they impulsively and profusely abort and postpone having children until their last resort option of freezing their last dozen eggs. Marriage notwithstanding.
8. The Stalemate — Women are unable to pair up with and latch down men with whom they're willing to marry / procreate with, before they Hit the Wall, mostly because these women are not offering anything more than sex in the way of a relationship and are wholly unworthy of commitment / marriage / motherhood.
9. The Mating Glut — Women are unwilling to have children with the men available to them for commitment / marriage, presumably because the men they want are not willing to commit, or the men available to them are seen as inferior quality, but actually because of women's entitlement and vanity.
10. Government Support — Governments offer incentives which can either increase or decrease marriages and the fertility rate, but we don't have many of the former, and plenty of the latter.
11. Artificial Insemination is increasing, and this should, theoretically, increase the birth rate, but again, we don't believe this makes up for the overall decrease in births.

All these factors exist to varying degrees in many states and countries around the world, but especially within Western and Westernized nations, and the combinatory effect will vary on a country-by-country, or even a state-by-state basis. Nevertheless, the overall effect is massive.

In this post, we'll go over our findings for some of these factors.

Changes in Society

Ever since feminism went mainstream back in the 1970s, the effect is that all the previous constraints on sexual morality have been removed, allowing human behavior to revert to what is predicted by RP models of the evo-psych variety, known in the Christian Manosphere as "the fleshly nature". This has had far-reaching implications on marriage, divorce, and fertility rates, as we already know.

In RP theory, and in women's eyes for a mate, men are tiered into 3 general demographic categories:

1. The "Haves" / AF — She wants him to be her baby daddy, as do a host of other women.
2. The "Used" / BB — He fits into her desire to have the status and financial security of being married and having kids and a family, while NOT being sexually desired by her.
3. The "Have Nots" / '!ncels' — Men who are 'invisible' and unwanted by women, and are therefore childless by default.

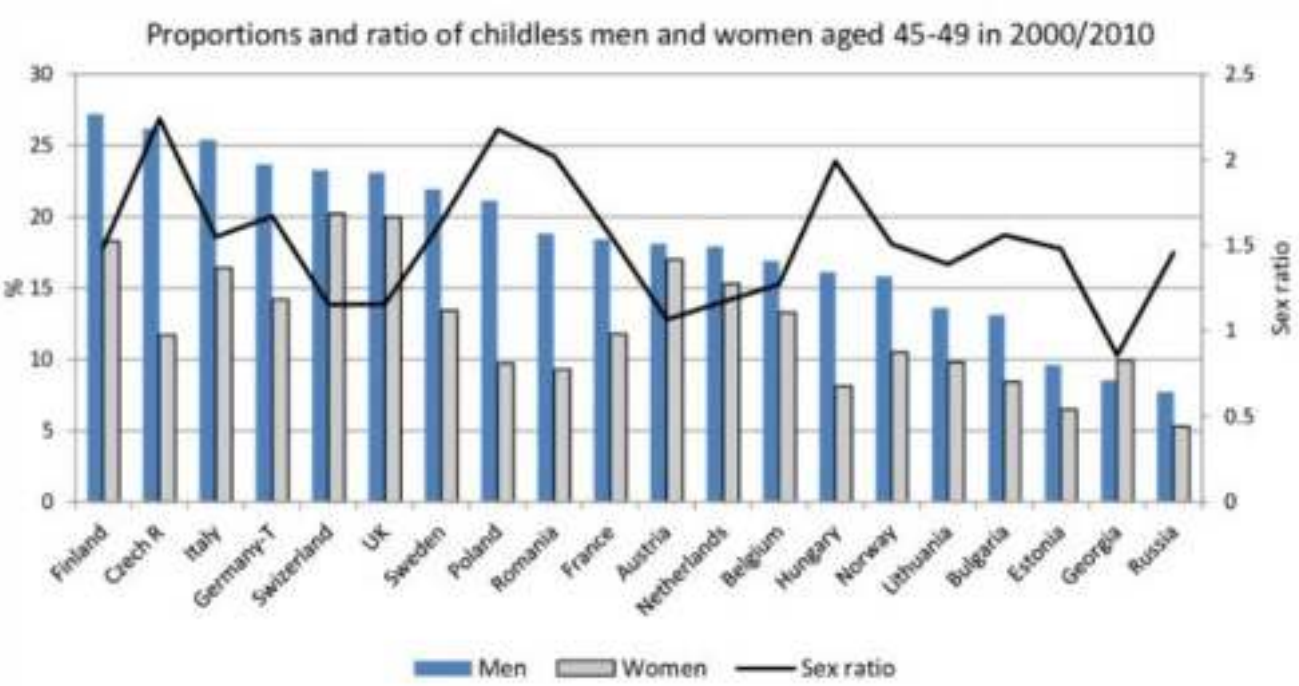
It stands to reason that the "Have Not's" are increasing. No Surprise.

Fewer Men than Women are Procreating

RP theory states that, in all of human history, fewer men procreated than women. Several statistical analyses appear in RP lore. It's been estimated that in prehistoric times, 17 women procreated for every one man.

As of late, we see this historical trend resurfacing in greater force. It's been conjectured that 80% of women are sleeping (and procreating) with 20% of the men, AKA The Pareto Principle.

Richard Reeves' article, Men Without Children (2023/10/23), contains some interesting data.



The data shows that fewer men and women are procreating overall, but there are significantly fewer men procreating than women, with the exception of Georgia (???). This fits the Soft Harem RP model. (Stats for Georgia suggest that women are having multiple children with more than one man, perhaps due in part to the low sex ratio (< 1), which seems to predict less disparity.)

In the above graph, the countries in which the sex disparity of childless men and women exceeds 10% are, for the most part, sexually liberalized countries: the Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Poland, Romania, and Sweden. This fits the Alpha Seed RP model.

What the aforementioned data looks like at face value is that it bears out what the RP lore predicts, and further supports the elephant-in-the-room idea that no one wants to mention (not least Reeves) — that women are chasing a select subset of high SMV men for their baby batter, and that these same men are fathering multiple children with many women.

This points to what I believe is one of the reasons for the frustration that many men feel, Ch@ds and !ncels alike.

Daisy Chen and Walter Weekes of Fresh and Fit fame had a fallout over their pregnancy, which ended in a miscarriage. (Thus supporting Jack's theory that ungodly / unwanted fetuses are often rejected from life.) Image Source.

Case Study — Finland

While hunting for an explanation, I researched data on Finland's fertility rate. I chose Finland because it has the highest percentages of childless men and women.

Looking at the UN's historical data for Finland, we see a precipitous drop in fertility from 1950 (3.1 children per woman) to 1973 (1.6 children per woman). There is a pronounced downward trend beginning in 1963 (2.6) that continues until 1973 (1.6), which I believe is best explained by a combination of factors, including the post-war baby boom, the advent of feminism / women's liberation, and the sirens of the sociosexual apocalypse. In the past 50-year period since 1973, the fertility rate has been much more stable, ranging from 1.8 to 1.4 children per woman.

The interesting thing is that, while female fertility rates have remained relatively stable over the most recent 50-year period in Finland, the percentage of childless men has increased.

My hunch is that these trends are similar in other European countries and also here in the U.S.

Out of Wedlock Births

Dead Bedroom Dating offered an alternate explanation that is key to understanding what's happening.

> "Feminism means more children are born out of wedlock. For most jurisdictions this means the father of the child is not listed on the birth certificate and therefore "unknown" unless he makes judicial steps to get acknowledged. Some jurisdictions attribute any child born to a married mother to the husband.
> Hypothesis: This discrepancy is not due to a polygynic patriarchy being realized but simply men counted as childless while they actually fathered children, who are either attributed to other (married) men or not attributed to a father at all.
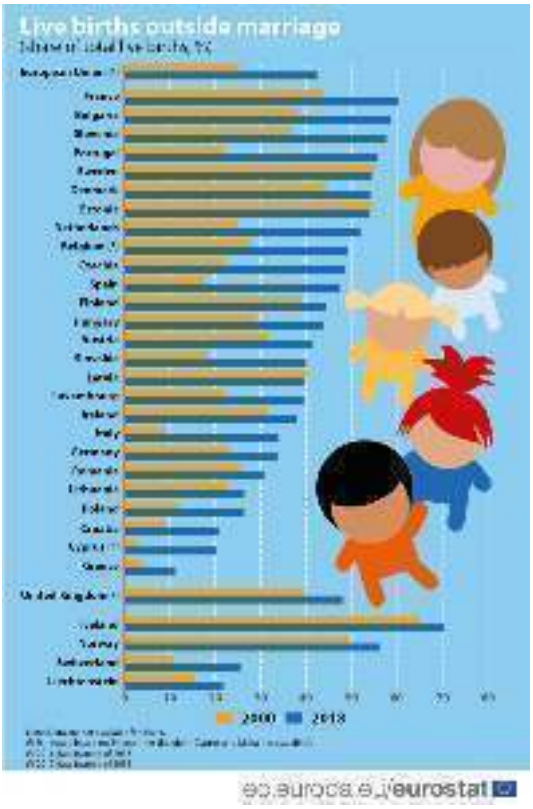
> Control: Check for the number of "single mothers"."

Okay, so let's look at the data.



Live births outside marriage in Europe (2000 and 2018). Image source.

OOWBs have soared above 40% in a majority of European states. Between 2000 and 2018, there was more than a 20% increase in Belgium, Bulgaria, Italy, the Netherlands, Slovakia, and Slovenia, and more than a 30% increase in the Czech Republic, Portugal, and Spain. Only Estonia, Latvia, and Sweden have fallen in that time frame, and only marginally. This could be due to the female-surplus sex ratio in these countries, similar to Georgia.

Here's the statistical data for OOWB going back to 1960.

Across the board, OOWBs have shot up over the past 60 years since Birth Control was introduced in 1960. Bulgaria, Estonia, France, Norway, Portugal, Slovenia, Spain, and Sweden exceed 50%!

Concerning Finland, OOWB grew by more than 10% per decade between 1970 (5.8%) and 2010 (41.1%), and has grown around 5% per decade since then. Similar trends appear in most other European countries.

Here are the current statistics by geography, including many other Westernized countries.

Obviously, this is one of the many adverse results of encroaching Western Feminism.

The Role of Government

In the aforementioned article from Reeves, he writes [emphasis mine],

> "The issue of childlessness among men is one that I plan to return to; I'm especially interested in the sex ratio. The nations with many more men than women without children are likely to be of particular concern. The nations with higher rates of childlessness include some of the most generous welfare societies in the world, too, which belies the idea that there's an easy financial fix to falling fertility rates."

You'll notice the strong connection between prolific welfare states and the increase in childless men. I'm very confident a similar correlation exists between the welfare state and OOWBs. This is a well-documented behavioral outcome that is seen in the inner cities in the U.S. If the government pays women more to have more children… Surprise! You end up with more kids.

But here, men are reduced to sperm donors, and women choose those donors who make them wet — NOT necessarily those who would make good dads or good providers. Fewer of those men are chosen by women because the characteristics of the steady provider are less in demand when provision comes from the government, and since those men are no longer needed, they become a problem, or at least a worry, for authorities, which is easily predictable considering many such men lack the motivational purpose that having a wife and children provides.

However, Men have an inherent desire to feel desired, needed, and respected by their respective woman. This is why wives cutting down their husbands for doing things his own way instead of her way is so detrimental to the marriage. It is akin to a man telling his woman that she is not desirable or lovable.

The simplified version of the current trend is as follows. The government replaces the provision aspect of family that was once the role for husbands. The government is wholly incapable of providing the other essential aspects provided by husbands: commitment, discipline, leadership, masculine presence, shared burdens, stability, etc. When impulsively and often unwittingly choosing a sperm donor via hypergamy, women only think about the financial part as an afterthought, and pay no attention to the other parts of husbandry, allowing them to reduce men's role to a walking sperm bank / ATM / wallet. Since women have either government or their own careers for money, men become non-essential, which reduces the algorithm of the relationship to: Sex and babies IF and ONLY IF the woman thinks he's attractive enough to sleep with him.

In summary, government dole essentially kills long-term relationships and stable families before they even form.

I believe a quick look at countries that do NOT have a welfare state as robust as those in the U.S. and Europe should show trends towards marriage, or at least monogamous long-term pairing for procreation. If my thinking is correct, the more unstable a woman thinks her world is, the more attractive a strong provider type would appear to her — OR the more motivated she would be to marry a foreign man from a more highly developed / wealthier country — a female mating strategy which is prevalent in East Asian countries heavily influenced by Western Feminism, especially the Philippines, Taiwan, and Vietnam. In Taiwan, fully 25% of women (1 in 4) who marry will marry a foreign Western man, leading to a bride shortage in Taiwan in which Taiwanese men are looking to import foreign wives from China, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Vietnam, among many other Southeast Asian countries.

Conclusions

Based on the above data, it appears that there are multiple reasons for the decrease in fertility and the fertility disparity between men and women. But for anyone who has the correct framework of relationships and a basic understanding of men's and women's roles, the answer is a flashing neon sign.

1. First, government incentives, laws, and policies play a huge role in shaping the most logical decision of whether to marry and/or have children or not. Some governments are offering incentives for having children, either a "cash for kids" program, or child support, or welfare, etc., but there are fewer incentives for getting married.
2. The secondary reason, and the reason why fewer men than women are procreating, is due to the decrease in marriage and the increase of OOWBs. Cue Dead Bedroom Dating's theory.
3. Artificial insemination, choosing ~~fathers~~ sperm donors, freezing eggs, and so on are incentives for women to postpone having children, which in the end, results in fewer children overall.
4. Men have been reduced to a tool for procreation, used at the complete discretion of women. The confinements and responsibilities of marriage are no longer necessary.
5. Having kids out of wedlock also eliminates men / fathers from the equation, creating a long, slow drain on society.

Is the Current Drop in Fertility due to the Decrease in Marriage or the Mating Glut?

Returning to the titular question, there is insufficient data to determine whether the current drop in fertility is because women are evading marriage and having children, or if they're being more selective by having fewer kids with the same few men and rejecting the majority of men for fatherhood. Given the data and RP insights, the former is the most obvious answer, but the latter remains a strong possibility. After all, this is exactly what we would expect if a host of Strong Independent Women, duly employed, having access to a wide variety of contraceptives, abortifacients, and Molech clinics, living in a country with some of the most extensive welfare safety nets in the world, spent their most fertile years chasing and sleeping with the most attractive men. What self-respecting SIW needs a man to help provide and protect when the gubmint will take his place? And if male commitment, support, etc. are no longer necessary, and women can pick and choose who their baby daddies are — more than one baby and/or daddy if so desired, and abort them if not — then why not choose a hawt Ch@d?

It is hypergamy unleashed and unlimited, supposedly (in theory) to benefit the ostentatious quality of the human genome, but (in reality) all to the detriment of civilization.

As women become more unhinged from God's order, I believe these trends will continue or possibly become more pronounced.

Greene's Series on the New Economic Divide

Jvangeld's Take on Greene's Essays: Observer Status

> "Greene's essays remind me of a phenomena of prophetic conceptualization that was evident when I first discovered the Manosphere. He can accurately describe the problem. Like Roissy and Dalrock, here is a Gen Xer (I believe) who can look at reality and see it clearly. His recommendations might not be any good. Σ Jack's Take on Greene's Essays: Whistleblower

Greene's essays add to the growing number of articles about the emerging economic class divide, all emphasizing that it is vast and almost impassable. This development is most concisely described in the observations from Aaron Renn et al., i.e., see the last article listed below.

- Agility PR Solutions: New survey lays bare the class divide in America (2024/2/13)
- Pew Research: The State of the American Middle Class (2024/5/31)
- Pirate Wires: Buc-ee's and The Infinite American Spirit (2025/8/27)

- Aaron Renn: It's a Boomer, Boomer, Boomer, Boomer World (2025/11/4)
- Aaron Renn: The Rich, the Poor, and the Ultra-Rich (2025/11/19)

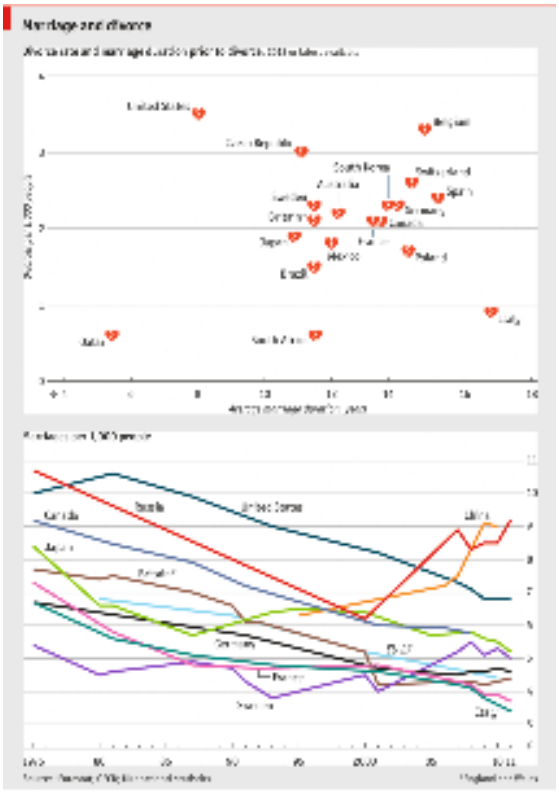
Greene's articles offer a vital statistical breakdown of what is happening and why — definitely a must-read for the astute cultural observer.

Personally, I think Greene has a fairly accurate assessment of the current economic state, in terms of the average person's experience. I think the motivations of his detractors are to contain the risks of his expose, i.e., provoking the ire of the working-class masses by pointing out that they are now the new lower class, despite their middle-class origins. The fact that these detractors resort to intellectual dishonesty and Gaslighting is more or less proof of this.

Determining Factors?

The more interesting question in my mind is this: What are the factors that have (already?) determined which people are dropping (or have already dropped) to the new lower / middle class, and which people are rising to (or have already established themselves in) the new upper / ultra rich class? This would be, at least in my mind, the key determinant of the great economic divide.

Initially, I believed that one major factor was that families and individuals who had experienced divorce had effectively split and squandered family wealth and thereby decreased the momentum of their family's generational wealth.



But as I considered this possibility and did a little more research with this idea in mind, I found many examples of people and families that were rife with divorce, but still pulled ahead nevertheless, as well as many who didn't divorce, and still fell behind economically.

Another idea I had was that many Boomers squandered their wealth on luxuries and travel instead of investing in their children, while others supported their children's education and comeuppance in the world, and that this had a determining effect on the socioeconomic status of younger generations. But I did not find much evidence for this theory either. It seems that many currently successful individuals built from scratch, despite having had no helping hand from their parents. (Note: This pattern of mobility seems to have ended. See graph below.)

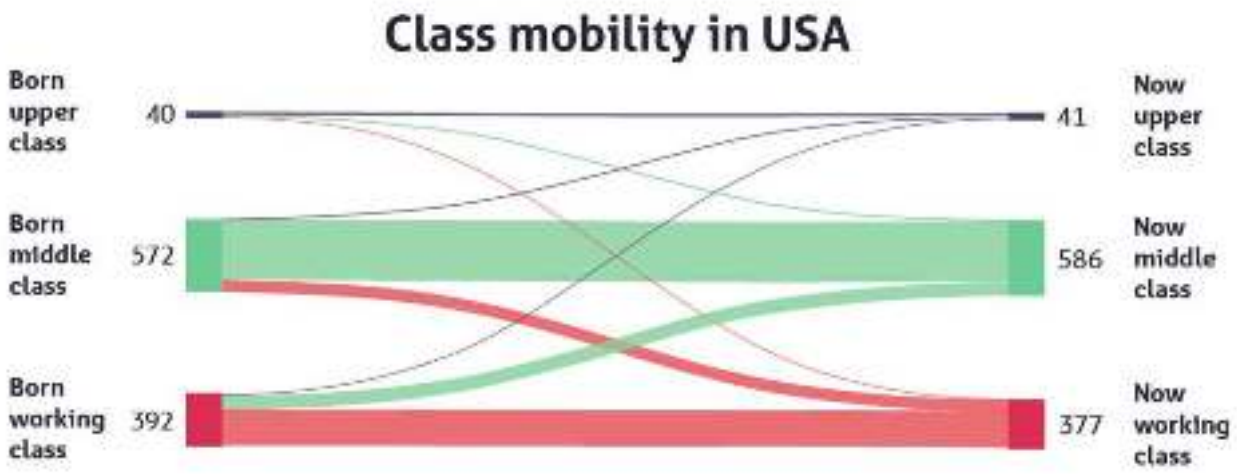


Image Source: Agility PR Solutions: New survey lays bare the class divide in America (2024/2/13)
So now, I'm thinking it is those people who own assets and the means to generate wealth (e.g. owning a business), rather than working for a monthly paycheck, no matter how large. This particular concept of economic class divide is nothing new, but the people who can do this are different than those in years past. So there's another question: "Who are these people?"

JvanGeld's Take

> "As for the questions, "Who are these people?", "Where do they come from?", and, "How do they rise?", I recommend Severian's article on Cassidy Hutchinson.
> Founding Questions (Severian): Endless September … 1967 (2023/11/28)
> Severian's article is talking about how someone catapults into the top echelons of politics. But I imagine that business works in similar ways.
> How would a student know which tiny program to apply to, out of thousands of tiny programs in hundreds of tiny SPLACs, to get to rub shoulders with people in-the-know?"
> But it's even more select than that."

> "Somewhere in later posts, Severian concludes that the people-in-the-know find the students they want and guide them into those programs. If they want you, then you're invited into the inner circle. But if they don't want you, then they won't tell you about it, and you'll never know. It goes back to the old adage, "It's not what you know, it's who you know."
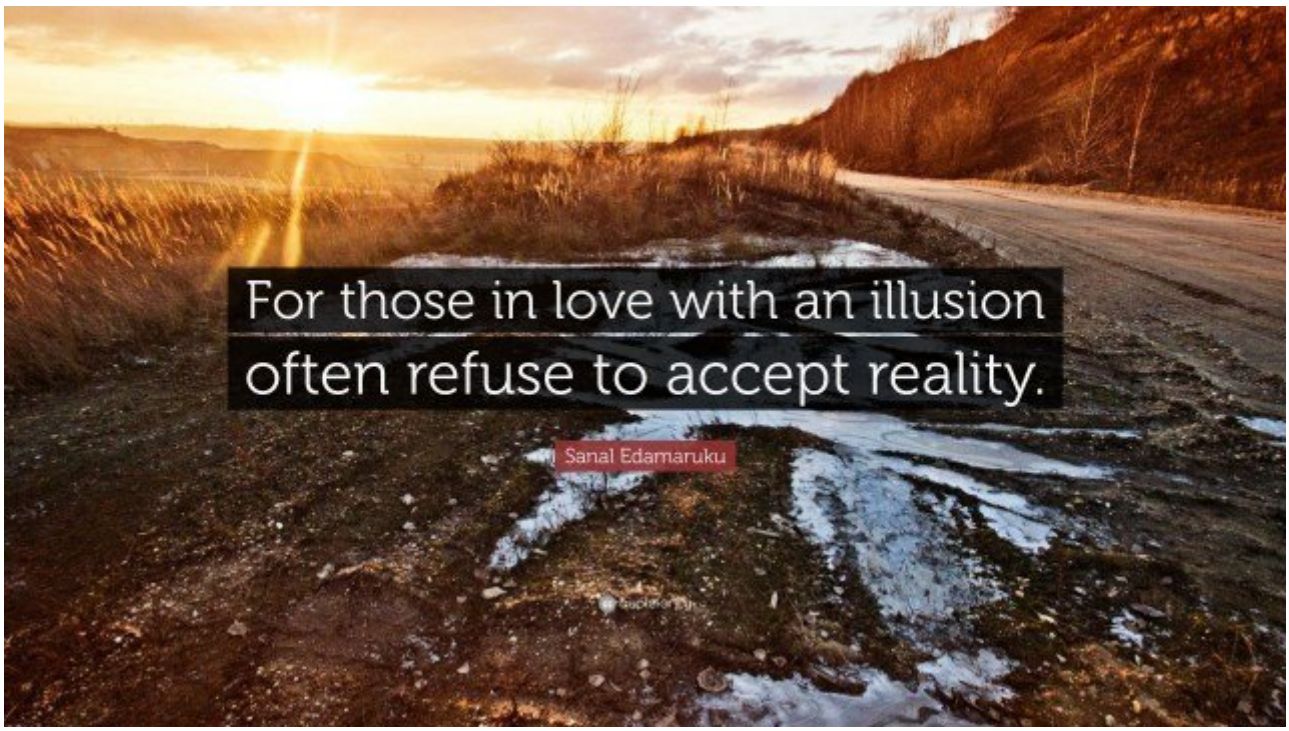
> All this establishes is that the economic economy is outside of one's sphere of control. "No duh… it never was." But we are presented with the illusion of choice so often that it seems like such things are within one's sphere of control, as per The American Dream™. We have to remember that this illusion of choice is just that — an illusion, and that it is cast by people who want to control their own sphere of influence and who will break our minds if it so requires. It is correctly assumed that people who are entranced by an illusion won't be able to change reality, and will therefore stay 'safely' outside the inner circle."



As to the fact that one's economic standing has always been outside of one's sphere of control. "No duh… it never was", it is even more outside of one's sphere of control now than ever. That door was shut and sealed between November 2023 and July 2025.

> "You know what is within my sphere of control? Generosity. I can share what I have with my brothers. The commands that Jesus gave, and who said that they would be good in any situation, are also good in this new situation as well."

Generosity will certainly benefit those within one's sphere of influence, and by extension, bolster one's reputation as a qualified and highly respected leader. I highly recommend men to take note. However, I doubt that this will get one into the upper echelon of economic status, influence, and power in today's socioeconomic strata. I hope I'm wrong about this, WRT God's grace for the individual believer.

Conclusions

As to the nominal question raised in this post, I'm sorry, but as of yet, I have no definitive conclusion about who is to make (or has already made) the upper cut. But trusting in the Lord, no matter the outcome, is the right course of action for the Christian Man.

We do not know the future, but we know Who holds the future. We must trust in Him.

Nevertheless, it is my hope that this post might arouse an awareness of the present socioeconomic conditions, causes, and effects. By the grace of God, maybe there is an angel / angle for Christian men that we haven't yet seen.

Readers are encouraged to offer their insights in the comments below.

The Prophecies of Michael Spencer

The state of the Evangelical church today was predicted back in 2009.

A reader asked me to review the life, work, and impact of Michael Spencer, AKA The Internet Monk. So here it is.

About Michael Spencer

Dennis Michael Spencer (1956–2010), known online as the Internet Monk, was a Southern Baptist minister, campus chaplain, teacher, and influential Christian blogger.

Spencer was born in Kentucky and lived most of his life in Oneida, a small town in rural Kentucky. He graduated from Southern Baptist Theological Seminary in 1984 and served for decades in youth ministry, pastoring, and as a chaplain and teacher at a Christian school.

Spencer described himself as a "post-Evangelical reformation Christian in search of a Jesus-shaped spirituality".

In the early 2000s, after the 2000 elections, he launched the Internet Monk blog, where he critiqued American Evangelicalism with honesty, wit, and a deep love for a "Jesus-shaped spirituality". His writings attracted hundreds of thousands of readers who appreciated his candid reflections on faith, his love for the church, and his willingness to expose shallowness, political idolatry, and "cultural captivity" (later termed "cultural convergence") within Evangelicalism.

He authored the book Mere Churchianity (2010) before dying of cancer on April 5, 2010, at age 53.

Spencer's 2009 Predictions on Evangelical Decline

In early 2009, Spencer published a three-post series on his blog titled "The Coming Evangelical Collapse."

- The Coming Evangelical Collapse I (2009/1/27)
- The Coming Evangelical Collapse II (2009/1/28)
- The Coming Evangelical Collapse III (2009/1/29)

In these essays, Spencer forecasted a "major collapse of Evangelical Christianity" within 10 years (by 2019), followed by a slower erosion until Evangelicalism lost half its adherents within two generations.

Not long thereafter, on March 10, 2009, Spencer published a condensed treatise in a widely read op-ed, "The Coming Evangelical Collapse" in the Christian Science Monitor.

The Internet Monk, Dennis Michael Spencer

Key Points of Spencer's Predictions

Key elements of Spencer's predictions included:

1. Evangelicalism would be increasingly identified with the culture war and political conservatism, and would be viewed as a 'toxic' cultural threat.
2. Evangelicals themselves would be viewed as 'toxic' curmudgeons due to their staunch alignment with political conservatism within the culture wars.
3. The church would fail to address hegemonic cultural influences, offering only fragmented, tepid responses to secular issues and norms infiltrating the church.
4. Evangelical churches will fail to disciple their young people and transmit authentic orthodox faith, leaving them ignorant, unprepared, and vulnerable to secularism.
5. Christian education and moral principles, as well as "good works" ministries, would be viewed as "obstacles to progress" and would be ineffective against secularism, even within Bible Belt strongholds.
6. Millions of evangelicals would quit the church; thousands of Christian media outlets, ministries, and schools would close or shrink dramatically.

7. Mainline 'High Church'-style congregations would die out, and churches would be dominated by megachurches driven by consumerism, maintaining cultural relevance, and therapeutic moralism.
8. He anticipated the current growth in Catholic and Orthodox conversions, the eventual dominance of Charismatic-Pentecostal denominations within Evangelicalism, and that fragile new expressions of faith would appear (e.g. Radix Fidem).
9. Funding would dry up due to shrinking congregations via attrition, i.e., conversions to Catholicism, Orthodoxy, "Nones", or "Others", and generous older patrons passing away.

In sum, Spencer predicted the disappearance of the church's cultural preeminence, along with active-passive fundamentalism. Denominations would shrink or vanish; only pragmatic megachurches would thrive. The result would be a post-Evangelical landscape in a secular, anti-Christian West, with rising intolerance and hostile public policy against Christianity. He called for a global "rescue mission" to reinforce Christianity, although he anticipated that little would be accomplished to this end.

Fulfilled Predictions

The majority of Spencer's predictions accelerated after 2009 and eventually came to fruition, although the scale and speed varied for each.

1. Dominance of Megachurches and Pragmatism — Consumer-oriented, pragmatic, seeker-sensitive, therapeutic megachurches grew while smaller and denominational churches declined or closed their doors, exactly as Spencer described. Rather than focusing on Biblical exegesis and the gospel, the emphasis shifted further toward ameliorating attrition, living an outwardly successful life (e.g. The Prosperity Gospel), maintaining cultural relevance, and self-help therapy (e.g. Moralistic Therapeutic Deism). Twisted verbiage touts Biblical support for these ideals.
2. Cultural / Political Identification — Evangelicals became even more tightly fused with the culture war and Conservative / Republican politics (e.g., opposition to same-sex marriage, Trump-era endorsements, etc.). By the 2016–2020 period, White evangelical support for Donald Trump was near-monolithic.
3. Perceived Cultural Villainy — Evangelical alignment with Republican conservatism and culture-war issues (e.g., opposition to same-sex marriage, Trump-era endorsements) led to widespread perception of evangelicals as opposing civil rights, LGBTQ+ equality, and pluralism, and thus a "threat to cultural progress". Public policy and media increasingly framed evangelical positions as harmful to education, LGBTQ+ rights, and social cohesion, and a "threat to cultural progress".

4. Political / Cultural Backlash — Evangelical positions on sexuality, gender, and science were framed as bigoted or anti-science; ministries faced boycotts, lawsuits, and loss of cultural influence.
5. The Failure to Transmit Faith, Youth Exodus, and the Loss of the Next Generation — Surveys showed massive disaffiliation among younger evangelicals raised in the movement, as Evangelical retention rates have plummeted. Studies showed Millennials and especially Gen Z are leaving evangelicalism in record numbers, with many citing an inability to reconcile evangelical doctrine and politics with lived experience. By the late 2010s, "Nones" (religiously unaffiliated) rose sharply among younger Americans.
6. Church Closures and Institutional Decline — The Southern Baptist Convention (a proxy for broader evangelicalism) membership fell 10.1%, worship attendance 15.5%, and baptisms 32.6% from 2009 to 2019. Thousands of churches closed; denominations continued shrinking. Many Christian schools and colleges struggled. Parachurch ministries contracted. Denominational structures (especially in the SBC) faced membership losses, scandals, and schisms.
7. Educational and Financial strain — Many parachurch ministries and schools faced budget crises. Christian higher education saw enrollment drops and closures.

Inaccurate Predictions

Not all of Spencer's predictions materialized on the scale or timeline that he envisioned.

1. While Spencer was correct in predicting an overall decline of Evangelical Protestantism, there was no sudden, statistically shocking "collapse" that halved Evangelicalism overnight before 2019. The dam didn't break until after the widespread closing of church doors during the pandemic restrictions (2020-2022). (But would you penalize him for being off by 1-2 years, perhaps due to the grace of God's forbearance?)
2. While Evangelicalism certainly receded, Evangelical numbers held more steady than Mainline Protestantism, aided by higher birth rates in some subgroups, immigration (surprisingly), and the persistent growth of Charismatic / Pentecostal churches.

3. Although cultural hostility towards Evangelicalism certainly increased and legal battles over religious liberty intensified, a large-scale, government organized, "anti-Christian" movement launching a dramatically hostile public policy and/or overt persecution of Evangelicals has not (as of yet) emerged in the U.S.
4. Spencer predicted that Evangelicals would be stymied from performing "good works" in their ministries. Although ministries have certainly been dampened in effectiveness overall, they have not been strategically prevented from outreach. Many ministries adapted by softening distinctions or rebranding (which Spencer predicted). Whether this move constitutes a "cultural compromise" is up for debate on a case-by-case basis.
5. Funding did not universally "dry up". Some large Christian media networks and megachurches continued to thrive financially.

Spencer himself cautioned he was "not a prophet" and expected some of his predictions to miss the mark — a disclaimer that leads me to believe he truly was a prophet.

The Overall Impact of Spencer's Predictions

Spencer's 2009 predictions had a crashing impact on the awareness of Evangelicalism. Spencer's essays went viral, reshaping evangelical self-understanding. His predictions were discussed across Christianity Today, Patheos, Sojourners, and countless other blogs. (See links below under Related.) These responses crystallized a growing sense of unease among thoughtful Evangelicals and post-Evangelicals. It prompted widespread reflection on why young people were leaving, why political entanglements damage one's witness, and why megachurch pragmatism could not sustain faith. The articles catalyzed post-Evangelical and "Jesus-shaped spirituality" conversations and influenced leaders like Mark Galli and Rod Dreher.

Spencer's work remains a landmark prophecy for anyone studying American Christianity's 21st century shifts. His warning that Evangelicalism risked becoming "a house deserted of half its occupants" continues to frame data on declining affiliation.

Conclusions

Michael Spencer anticipated the attrition of the church and its waning influence, the rise of the 'Nones', the continued politicization of faith, and the hollowing-out of institutional evangelicalism. By 2020, former Christianity Today editor Mark Galli cited surveys showing evangelicals had largely forgotten core theological commitments and acknowledged that Spencer was "more right than he was wrong". Even where his timeline was off, the trajectory Spencer outlined has largely held true: Evangelicalism is smaller, more culturally marginalized, more politically tribal, and less able to retain its children in the faith than it was in 2009.

Michael Spencer insisted he was not a prophet, just an unusually perceptive diagnostician. Nevertheless, his writings have turned out to be astonishingly prophetic. His warnings about evangelicalism's cultural captivity / convergence, shallow discipleship, and demographic fragility continue to resonate more than a decade and a half later, especially when read alongside the detailed marital and familial autopsies offered by writers like Dalrock, which I'll cover in the next post.

That's Amazing! Praise the Lord Almighty!

The Para-Prophecies of Dalrock

Dalrock unpacked Michael Spencer's predictions to a T (for Tingles).

Readership: Christian Men

Note: The term, 'Para-Prophecy', is defined as expositions that explain prophecies in more exact detail.
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Dalrock's Contributions to Spencer's Impact

St. Michael Spencer died in 2010. However, upon Spencer's decommission, the Lord raised up another prophet in the Christian blogosphere to carry on his work. Dalrock, a pseudonymous Christian Manosphere blogger [Archive], began his commission 75 days after Spencer went to be with the Lord, and remained active from 2010–2020.

It is unknown whether Dalrock ever read Michael Spencer's writings (he never mentioned Spencer's work in all his years of blogging), nevertheless, Dalrock expanded Spencer's diagnosis by uncovering the same core failures of the Evangelical Church that Spencer had predicted.

Further, Dalrock amplified Spencer's warnings by…

- Documenting in real time, for 10 years, how these predictions unfolded.
- Offering concrete, scripturally grounded examples of the shallow faith transmission that Spencer lamented.
- Examining how churches had internalized feminist assumptions, e.g. teaching men to "win" their wives' respect through emotional performance while treating female rebellion as a male leadership failure, etc. (See next section for more.)
- Relentlessly spelling out the detrimental cause-and-effect cascade that Evangelical teachings had on gender issues, sex roles, sex, marriage, and family, effectively showing how Evangelical teachings on gender, marriage, and sex actively accelerated the collapse.

Essentially, Dalrock made the link between the de facto female monopoly on social power and the myriad of microaggressions against men and male authority, and how all these transgressions eroded the viability of the church, and thereby culminated in the decline that Spencer predicted.

A Summary of Dalrock's Expositions of Spencer's Predictions

In a nutshell, Dalrock's larger thesis was that Evangelicals had absorbed Feminist assumptions to the ruin of marriage, family, sex, and culture.

For instance…

- Churches had become extensions of secular feminism under a Christian veneer, undermining male headship and covenant permanence.

- Evangelical courtship and marriage teaching (e.g., "I Kissed Dating Goodbye" purity culture, complementarian rhetoric) was shallow and counterproductive, leaving youth unprepared and incompetent for real relationships.
- The church's casual treatment of female promiscuity and their postponement of marriage in favor of chasing after career, education, and *"2.4 more years" of sexual promiscuity.
- Churchian books, sermons, and teachings elevated female feelings and "romantic love" above biblical Headship and covenant.
- Gynocentric Marriage structures are falsely whitewashed as Christian.
- "Servant Leadership" had functionally neutered male Headship.
- Admonitions from the pulpit that *"[The wife is] the boss, [the husband is] the guest."
- "Mutual submission" that erased gender complementarity, despite the faux branding.
- The church's backhanded, treacherous support of divorce-happy wives. *"You better do as she says, or she'll take away your children!"
- 'Empowering', permissive, therapeutic approaches to divorce and remarriage.
- Pastors routinely shamed men as failures while excusing female sin, producing a "man-blaming" culture that drove men away.
- The "culture war" focus on abstract moral issues distracted from practical discipleship in family life.

All of the above accelerated the very collapse Spencer predicted.

In all, this has produced:

- The church's 'captivity' to culture-war politics (which Dalrock rebranded as 'convergence').
- A 'feminized' church culture that creates weak men, repels stronger men, and fails to form girls and younger women into responsible wives and mothers.
- The absence and/or corruption of church teachings on Biblical Headship Authority.
- A vacuum of male-specific teaching and effective Man-to-Man mentoring.

- Delayed marriage and catastrophic singleness among Christian men and women.
- Skyrocketing divorce rates framed as “Godly” when initiated by women.
- The inability to pass on vital faith to the next generation, characterized by a failure of discipleship, in which the next generation inherited Therapeutic Moralistic Deism instead of robust biblical manhood / womanhood.

Dalrock saw these failures as a primary engine of the very same demographic and institutional collapse Spencer predicted, and concluded, in so many words hoping for the contrary, that the Evangelical Church cannot perpetuate itself because it cannot form stable, fruitful Christian families.

 Classic examples of the facetious sarcasm that made Dalrock a hit.*

The Dalrock Route

The Overall Impact of Dalrock’s Work

Dalrock amplified Spencer’s warning within a specific subculture (i.e., the Christian Manosphere and Red Pilled Christian circles). Dalrock’s work helped readers connect the dots between Spencer’s macro-prediction and the micro-level failures in books on Christian living and marriage, counseling rooms, pulpit sermons, Sunday school classes, and youth groups.

By documenting how churches had internalized feminist assumptions (e.g., teaching men to “win” their wives’ respect through emotional performance while treating female rebellion as a male leadership failure) using case after case of evangelical leaders, books, conferences, and churches promoting ideas that undermined biblical marriage, Dalrock gave concrete, data-rich, scripturally grounded examples of the discipleship and other ecclesiastical failures Spencer had named in general terms. In doing so, Dalrock helped translate Spencer’s abstract predictions about institutional decline into lived realities of marriage, singleness, and church life.

His work reached Red-Pill-adjacent Christian men who felt alienated by mainstream Evangelicalism, creating a parallel conversation about family and discipleship that reinforced Spencer’s broader thesis, thereby extending Spencer’s influence into the 2010s Manosphere 1.0, and from there into the present mainstream awareness.

Although both celebrated and controversial, and now defunct, Dalrock’s work [Archive] remains a vital reference point for those analyzing why Evangelical family formation collapsed and why Spencer’s “Evangelical Dark Age” scenario is a growing plausibility to many observers.

The Big Eva house of raucous rock music worship has not been entirely deserted, but many prayer rooms are emptier than they were in 2009, and the reasons Spencer named and which Dalrock spelled out in detail fully explain why.

The Prophecies of Ed Hurst

Ed Hurst spelled out the decline of American Evangelical Protestantism, and offered a legitimate alternative to that kind of Christian religion by returning to Hebrew mystical roots.

Biography of Ed Hurst

Ed Hurst (born September 18, 1956, in Seminole, Oklahoma) is an American Christian writer, blogger, and founder of the Radix Fidem covenant community. After serving in the U.S. Army in Europe, he worked various jobs before entering public education. He studied at Oklahoma Baptist University with plans for ministry and pursued interests in Western Civilization, church history, and philosophy. Disillusioned by mainstream evangelical institutions, he developed Radix Fidem ("Root of Faith") as a decentralized, heart-led approach to Christian living rooted in ancient Hebrew mysticism rather than Western rationalism or institutional structures. Since around 2012, he has written daily on his blog, Kiln of the Soul (AKA the Radix Fidem Blog), emphasizing covenant loyalty to God, the Unseen Realm, sacrificial love in small communities, and rejection of "monster churches" tied to empire and culture. He has also authored numerous books on faith, marriage, and masculine Christian identity, including Radix Fidem: A New and Ancient Religion.

Ed Hurst's Key Predictions on Evangelical Decline

Hurst has consistently predicted the irreversible decline and eventual collapse of Protestant Evangelicalism (and broader institutional Western Christianity). His core forecasts, scattered across posts from 2012 onward, include:

1. The mainstream evangelical church is irreformably captive to Western Civilization's pagan roots, feminism, political power, and Hellenistic thinking; it cannot be fixed or steered back to biblical paths.
2. Institutional Mega-Churches, a la "monster churches", and their organizations will continue to wilt and die under their own moral confusion and weight.
3. A civilizational and spiritual shaking (viz., an "apocalypse") is required to destroy the current mainstream church along with the empire it serves, clearing the space for a righteous remnant to emerge.
4. True faith will survive only in small, decentralized, heart-led covenant communities that reject organizational grandeur, orthodoxy fixation, and worldly engagement.
5. No justice or revival is coming for the institutional church in this fallen world; it is doomed to self-destruction, although a righteous remnant will emerge from the ashes.

These predictions appear in posts such as Another Mystery of God's Laws (2013/9/23), as well as in various 2020–2026 entries on escaping the empire, latter-day idolatry, and comments on Revelation as a call to mysticism rather than to literal future timelines.

Fulfilled Predictions

Several of Hurst's predictions have clearly come to fruition since he began writing them in the early 2010s.

1. Irreformable Cultural Captivity and Moral Confusion: Evangelicalism's deepening entanglement with politics (especially post-2016), feminism-influenced "servant leadership" teachings, and seeker-friendly pragmatism accelerated exactly as he described. By the mid-2010s, scandals (sexual abuse cover-ups in the SBC, leadership failures) and cultural backlash showed the "moral confusion" he warned about.
2. Wilting and Dying of Operations: Thousands of evangelical churches have closed or merged since 2015; denominational membership (especially white evangelical Protestants) has declined sharply; Christian colleges and parachurch groups have shrunk or shut down. Hurst noted he would "live to see many of these operations collapse under their own weight" — and he has, as attendance dropped further post-COVID and the "Nones" rose.
3. Rise of a Remnant Outside Institutions: Small, online or house-based covenant groups emphasizing heart-led faith, mysticism, and rejection of empire have grown in visibility (including Radix Fidem itself and similar Red Pilled or Hebrew-roots communities). This matches his vision of a righteous remnant that does not "bow the knee to pagan influences."

These developments unfolded gradually from the 2010s through the 2020s, intensifying after 2016 and again after 2020.

Unfulfilled Predictions

As of 2026, not all elements have fully materialized on the timeline or scale Hurst envisioned.

- The grand "apocalypse" that destroys both the mainstream church and its supporting civilization has not yet arrived.
- Institutional evangelicalism, while weakened, still exists with significant political and cultural influence in the United States.
- Large megachurches and media empires continue operating, and no total civilizational collapse has occurred.

Hurst himself has acknowledged that the process is ongoing and that the final shaking remains in the future.

Parallels with Michael Spencer's Predictions

Hurst connected the dots between political idolatry, doctrinal shallowness, and the deeper spiritual sickness of Western civilization, encouraging readers not merely to lament the decline but to exit the institutions and form heart-led remnants based on Christian Covenants.

Although Hurst never directly cites Michael Spencer or the Internet Monk blog, his writings expand and deepen several of Spencer's 2009 themes about the coming evangelical collapse.

Spencer warned of political/cultural captivity, a failure to disciple the young, the dominance of consumer megachurches, and growing cultural toxicity. Hurst explains these failures at a more fundamental level: the entire Western Christian project is built on Hellenistic (Greek/Roman) rationalism and loyalty to a pagan empire rather than a Biblical, Hebrew, heart-led mystical faith. Hurst traces the root problem to Constantine's political seduction of the church (echoing Spencer's culture-war critique but adding the "Harlot riding the Beast" imagery from Revelation).

Spencer predicted institutional shrinkage; Hurst explains why reform is impossible and why only decentralized covenant communities can survive — offering a positive path Spencer never fully developed.

Where Spencer saw shallow discipleship and loss of youth, Hurst diagnoses the loss of the "heart" (moral conviction beyond words) and the invasion of feminism and professionalism that drive men and sincere believers away from the church.

Hurst's writings amplified Spencer's impact by giving it a prophetic, mystical, and practical framework. While Spencer diagnosed the collapse in broad cultural and demographic terms, Hurst provided a resonating "prophet's voice of doom", arising from a well-grounded basis of scripture and from being an insider in the system for decades. His daily blog posts since 2012 kept the warning alive long after Spencer's death in 2010, reaching readers disillusioned by the very trends Spencer foresaw, and offering a ready-made alternative, Radix Fidem.

10 And He said to them, Wherever you enter a house, stay there until you leave town. 11 Any place that does not receive you or listen to you, as you go out from there, shake the dust off the soles of your feet for a testimony against them.

The Overall Impact of Ed Hurst’s Writings and Predictions

The overall impact and legacy of Hurst’s predictions lie in a small but dedicated niche of post-evangelical, Red Pill, and mystically inclined Christians. His work has helped legitimize radical departure from institutional church life and inspired covenant communities that prioritize ancient Hebrew ways over modern orthodoxy.

Though not as widely read as Spencer’s original 2009 essays, Hurst’s ongoing commentary has sustained and radicalized the conversation about evangelical decline into the 2020s. As church involvement continues shrinking and cultural hostility grows, his vision of a purified remnant rising from the ashes of “wilting old growth” is becoming increasingly plausible to those who share his critiques of Churchianity. His legacy is that of a modern prophetic voice who not only foresaw the collapse but offered a biblical, heart-centered way to live through it.

American Evangelical Protestant Churches — Why do they Grow?

Foreword

I've done a little online research, covering many articles, to come up with the following summary of why some American Evangelical Protestant (AEP) churches are rising, while others are failing. Many articles have covered this topic, but IMO, they fail to connect the dots and offer a comprehensive assessment. So here's mine.

This study focuses on AEP churches; however, I believe the following characteristics may correlate well for most growing Protestant churches in the West, and are not limited to AEP churches.

Why Do American Evangelical Protestant Churches Grow?

AEP churches that are growing and thriving have the following characteristics.

1. Growing churches typically emphasize clear, strong, conservative Biblical teaching and orthodox doctrine.
2. Growing AEP churches distinguish themselves from the surrounding secular culture rather than trying to mimic it.
3. AEP churches grow by using contemporary methods (see next section for a description) to engage post-adolescent youth and young adults, and by fostering high interest and commitment from this group.
4. Evangelical churches that offer an "experience with the Holy Spirit" comprise a large part of the increase in attendance in Evangelical circles. The Assembly of God and other Pentecostal denominations are growing in disproportionately larger numbers than other denominations.
5. Key growth drivers include multi-site campuses, a strong emphasis of scripture, and a focus on personal experiences of God's grace, the glory of Christ, and the transformative power of the Holy Spirit.
6. Caring for the poor and emphasizing community works and a Christianized interpretation of social justice are on the rise in growing Evangelical circles.

Contemporary Methods

Here are the specific contemporary methods that growing churches are employing.

1. Authentic Community

- Authentic Relationships: Building relationships based on shared activities, interests, and social endeavors, rather than merely shared faith beliefs.
- A Community of Leaders: Leaders* in the church work as a team. Emphasis is placed on their duties and service to the church, ensuring things are done and done well, rather than on social politics or status. Backups, replacements, and substitutions are routine, based on the needs of the membership and the real-time abilities of the leaders.
- Mentoring: Successful churches are moving away from solely peer-based groups to multi-generational relationships, connecting young adults with older, more spiritually mature members.

 Leaders: pastors, deacons, elders, et al.*

2. Structural Changes

- Specialized Gatherings: Creating specific young adult, age-segmented services or small groups (e.g., ages 18–22 or 22–30) to meet specific life-stage needs.
- Location Strategy: Placing new, flexibly administered congregations near university campuses or in urban centers.

3. “Third Spaces” Emphasizing Community

- Dedicated Social Spaces: An exclusive, informal area specifically organized to create mental and social boundaries between church life and personal life and secular / work life. Cafés, classrooms, libraries, lounges, etc., are reserved for young adults to gather between services or during the week, and are intended to offer a ‘safe space’ to reduce distractions and foster community.
- Intentional Hospitality: Using “connect dinners”, men’s fellowship groups, and other casual social gatherings to help young adults build relationships in an informal setting.

4. Content and Theology

- Apologetics and Tough Questions: Addressing difficult questions about faith, science, and sexuality through a biblical lens, rather than avoiding them.
- Intellectual Engagement: Providing resources like blogs, books, podcasts, and streaming platforms that help young people navigate their faith in a shifting, skeptical world.
- Relevant Teaching: Connecting biblical teaching to everyday life issues (career, mental health, moral decisions, relationships, etc.).

5. Empowerment and Leadership

- Leadership Training: Leaders in the church mentor new leaders and replacements in a communal fellowship (see above). Larger churches might host upcoming pastors in training (often in partnership with fellow churches and seminaries).
- Advisory Boards: Creating young adult advisory boards to provide input on church direction.
- Creative Input: Allowing young people to shape the music, audio/visual production, and worship styles, and offering active participation in the production thereof.
- Shared Leadership Models: Involving young adults in decision-making and leadership roles rather than just treating them as consumers or targets of ministry.

6. Action and Mission

- Purpose-Driven Activities: Offering opportunities for young people to use their natural skills to “make a difference” and wield influence in the church and the wider community.
- Social Justice and Service: Engaging young adults in community initiatives, mission trips, and social activism that address tangible needs, such as evangelism and poverty.
- Authentic Fellowship: A side benefit of these activities is that they offer social settings in which people have ready opportunities to engage with others, build social networks, and enjoy fellowship.

7. Digital and Technology Integration

- Digital Discipleship: Using online platforms for Bible studies, daily inspirational reading, lessons, and discussion.
- Online Presence: Utilizing apps, social media, and streaming platforms to maintain continual online engagement throughout the week.

General Themes Underlying Success

Among the above characteristics and methods, we see the following themes.

1. Biblical Authority

The core characteristic of Protestantism is its emphasis on the authority of the Bible, “Sola Scriptura”, and a lesser emphasis on the church as either an ecclesiastical or social institution (such as in Catholic and Orthodox churches). Protestant churches that stand true to Biblical Authority are a bulwark of defense and spiritual strength in today’s gynocentric liberal consciousness. An ecclesiastical authority that bends too much to secular sentiments is taken to be weak — and is thus seen to be avoided.

2. A Focus on Youth

Most all growing churches have large, active youth and young adult congregations. It is critically important to train up young people in church life, solid doctrine, and the laws and ways of the Lord, not only for their own life-long benefit, but also for the continuance of the church itself. Thus, it is to the benefit of the Church as the body of Christ to recognize young people and provide opportunities for them to engage in Church activities, fellowships, missions, and to have some degree of leadership. Growing churches know this and do it.

3. Adaptations to Missions

Growing AEP churches often have worship services that cater to specific groups in the congregation and will meet in rented public spaces, such as cafés, cinemas, schools, shopping malls, theaters, and others. These services are, more often than not, separate services from the main church services (located elsewhere in a church building), or services geared to a specific group of people in the congregation, i.e., a young adult fellowship.

4. Young Couples with Children

Growing churches tend to have lots of young couples with children.

One enduring phenomenon that is characteristic of Protestantism is that young people often leave church during their early 20s, but will then return to church after "settling down", viz. entering the workforce in a professional capacity, marrying, and having children. When these people decide to "go back to church", they will invariably choose churches that have many other young couples doing the same thing. They choose these churches so that they can fellowship and social network with other young parents going through the same life stage, and so that the children can experience fellowship with other children their age.

Churches that accommodate these interests by providing a nursery, Sunday school classes for different age groups, and youth groups, and which host other educational / social functions like church dinners, holiday celebrations, men's / women's Bible studies / conferences / retreats, vacation Bible school, etc., will attract more of the same types of people, leading to explosive growth.

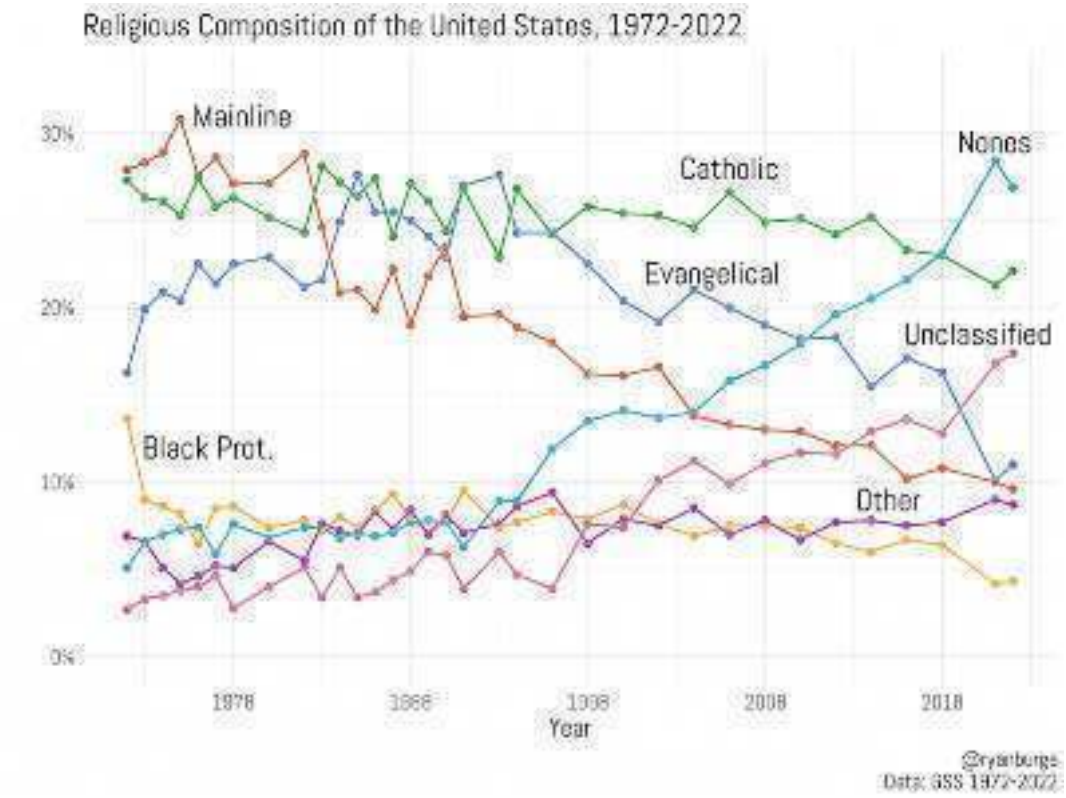
These articles go over a wide range of reasons why the church is in decline, but I sense there are some things left unsaid. So here, I'll go over what I believe are the foundational reasons why Mainline and Evangelical Protestant churches are fading, in that order, followed by some general conclusions.



Why Are Mainline Protestant Churches Declining?

In my view, the reasons why Mainline Protestant churches are in decline are as follows.

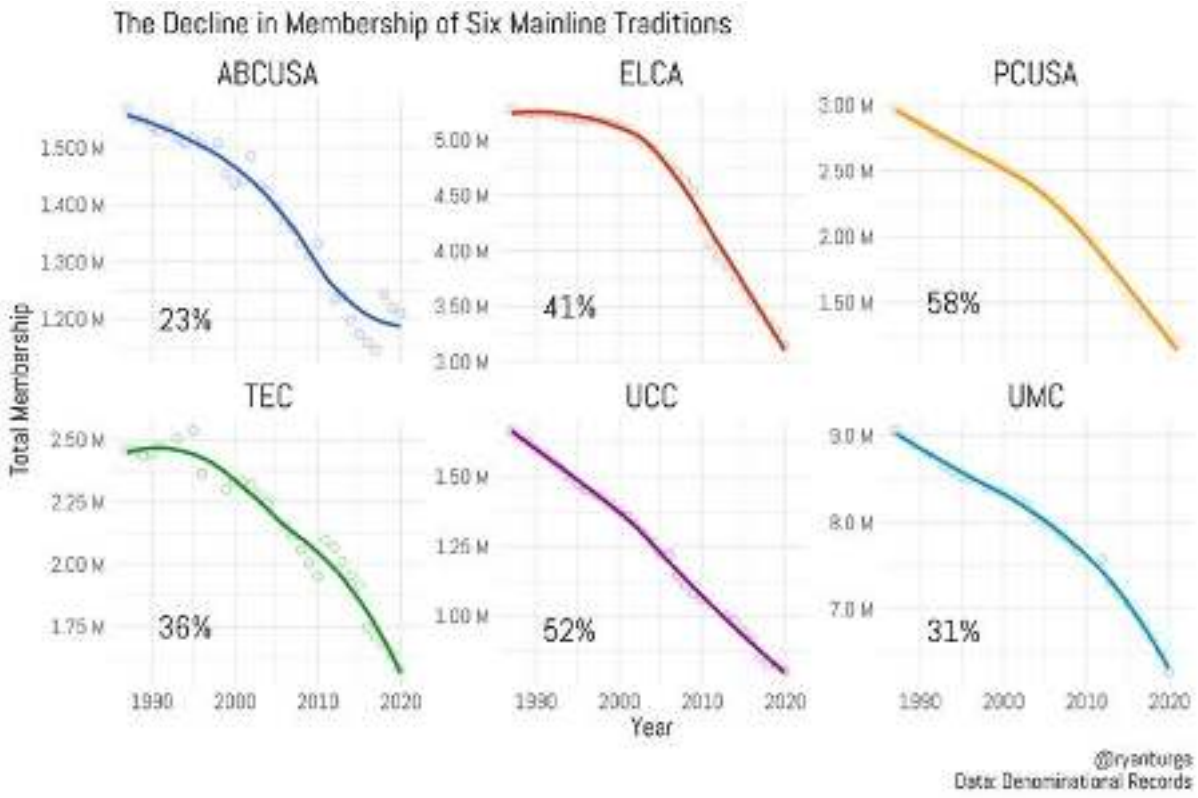
In the first place, these churches appeal to the type of Protestant Christian who prefers more moral and theological rigidity and a traditional ecclesiastical structure, both in doctrine and in liturgy.

The Mainline churches emphasize rigid doctrines (although corrupted in many instances), seasons, and traditions. Although these characteristics are highly desired and valued, they are seen as efforts to preserve their institutions, along with other methods deemed by whatever means necessary (e.g. accepting / tolerating blatantly disobedient individuals, being "Seeker Friendly", cultural convergence, same sex marriages, etc.), instead of caring about having a scripturally based vision of these social enterprises.

Furthermore, the truths behind the faith traditions of many Mainline churches have been so watered down and/or so thoroughly jettisoned in favor of human opinion and progressive values that they no longer contain that which attracted these people to them in the first place.

Worse, many of these churches have abandoned the strict doctrines and moral requirements that support this structure, even while maintaining the rigid ordinances and structured services.

That's like throwing out the baby and drinking the dirty bathwater.



Why Are Evangelical Protestant Churches Declining?

IMO, the reason why American Evangelical Protestant (AEP) churches are in decline is because of their continued stance of compromising doctrine with secular culture. Lowering the authority of the Bible is tantamount to abandoning the message and power of the Gospel. It's turning the inerrant Word of God into a human opinion, free to disregard whenever particular circumstances may make it convenient to do so.

These incongruences between authentic, scripture-based faith and cultural influences are most obviously manifested in the following ways.

1. Church conflicts are a dank turn-off, both to believers and non-believing seekers alike. The PCUSA has been in a bitter split involving lawsuits and court battles, and property fights between churches and their presbyteries are making headlines. The SBC has devolved into sex scandals and court battles.

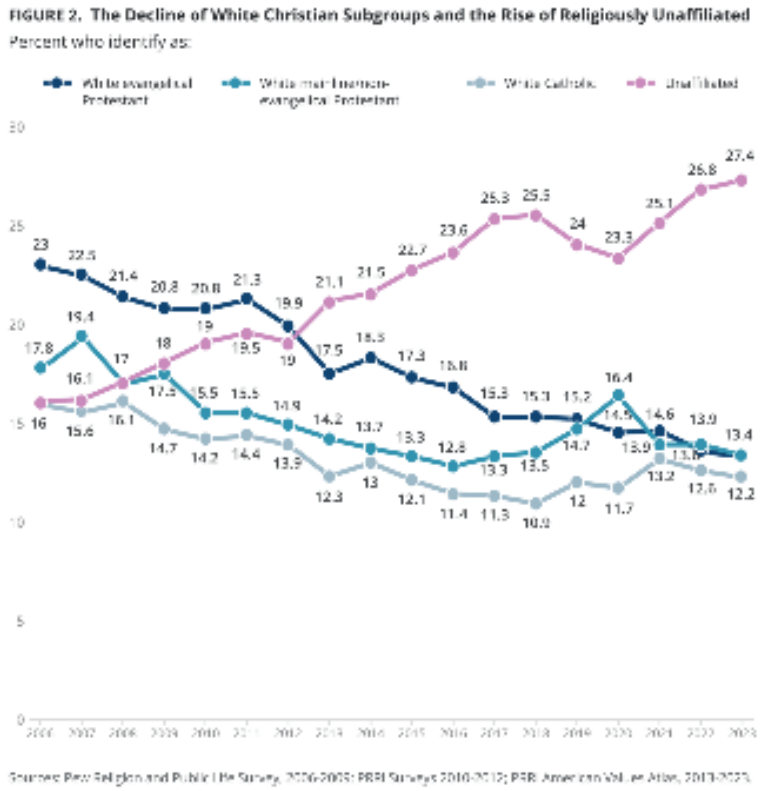
2. Churches shrink due to vast generational gaps, aging congregations, and generational shifts in politics and social tastes, which make that gap wider. Combine this gap with Boomer mentality and Digitally isolated Zoomers to produce a church culture that is unable to retain younger generations.
3. The "Seeker Friendly" approach is 'weak' and no longer appealing. The attractional model of a seeker sensitive church in AEP circles has been criticized for dumbing down the faith and leaving people Biblically and doctrinally illiterate.
4. Meanwhile, churches have failed to adapt by NOT being "Seeker Friendly" in accord with what would actually be attractive to real seekers — Biblical doctrinal teaching and a bulwark of communal, familial, and societal stability.
5. Progressive Egalitarianism and the relatively more conservative Complementarianism, in which the church's doctrinal stance is always strongly interpreted in favor of women and assiduously avoids any imprecation of women's failures (e.g., absence of moral agency, sexual promiscuity, neglecting marital duties such as having regular sexual relations, or failing to fulfill their proper roles and responsibilities in a Christian marriage, such as respecting and submitting to their husbands), thus implicitly and sometimes explicitly removing all accountability and preventing any discipline from being enacted on women. (This one factor has had a HUGE impact on the church! More on this in the next post.)
6. Failing churches have failed to build authority structures comprised of authentic male-dominated leadership, as well as to enact strategies for recruiting and retaining younger men, and to devise systems for properly mentoring them.
7. As a result of 5 and 6, the church has become a Beta Factory and a cesspool institution comprised of weak men and debased, 'empowered' wimminz. BIG turn off!



Summary

People who are drawn to American Protestant churches, for the most part, greatly value doctrinal precision foremost, teachings that provide beneficial real-life applications, traditional families and children ('eventually', or at least in concept), and the middle-class values and lifestyle. They want a church that caters to these values and delivers what they expect from church — for themselves and their families. They also want a church that provides authentic fellowship with people as similar to themselves as possible, in as many aspects as possible. A church that does NOT offer these features is (often falsely) regarded as a 'bad', errant, or inappropriate church, regardless of its actual authenticity of faith and doctrinal precision.

With some exceptions among Mainline congregants, the grand majority of Protestants do NOT want the pomp and huff of a formal "High Church" liturgy, absent the familial humanitarian aspects. They do NOT want church to be a burden to their lifestyle, or to require changes from them in any way. Only pastors and leaders (deacons, elders, et al.) are willing to sacrifice their time and energy. Almost all others (short of those rare 'Super-Christians' who are well-known in one's church), have a consumer mentality oriented in service to themselves and their families, rather than a producer mentality, or even a service mentality.

Men, in particular, want a church that affirms their masculine identity and their God-given authority over the Earth and human institutions, including the church, and which does NOT undermine it. A growing number of men will not tolerate any less from a church organization.

Conclusions

A church leadership that places too much emphasis on the church as an organized religion and/or a religious institution, or it's place / purpose / role in the community, and its buildings and property (outside of making it look immaculate), has caused many people to simply walk away.

Same but differently, a church that diffuses the boundaries of the faith, and is too permissive of secular cultural norms (e.g. Feminine Imperatives, gynocentrism, sexual license, etc.), and teaches how to adhere to these norms in a 'Christian' manner, disappoints those who are seeking spiritual security, a refuge, and solace from the debased wider culture.

Churches that are too flaccid, too feminized, and engage in "Man Bashing" are becoming increasingly onerous to men, especially younger men who grew up with access to Red Pill knowledge, thus facilitating a mass exodus.

In sum of the results, for the past decade or more within Protestantism, there has been a gradual shift away from older, "established", Mainline Protestant churches that have grown epicene, as well as lukewarm, trendy Evangelical Protestant churches that favor gynocentrism, towards more doctrinally strict, masculine-type churches (see here), and ultra-conservative, ecclesiastical churches (i.e., Catholicism and Orthodoxy), as well as charismatic and mystically oriented denominations, (i.e. Assembly of God, Radix Fidem, et al.).

Churches that do NOT adhere to strict doctrinal inerrancy and the practice thereof, while catering to the femcentric progressive culture, ressentimental identity politics, and political correctness, rather than the lifestyles and social / spiritual needs of their congregants, find themselves drifting into irrelevant territory.

A Summary of the Negative Effects of Complementarianism and Egalitarianism within American Evangelical Protestant Churches

In essence, putting women first means placing God somewhere down the list and men last.

Intro

In the previous post, American Protestant Churches — Why do they Decline? (2026/3/25), I listed several reasons why Protestant churches are slowly falling apart.

Two false doctrines in particular have inundated both the Mainline and Evangelical versions of American Protestantism, and have wrecked the AEP church in particular: progressive Egalitarianism and the relatively more conservative Complementarianism, which Dalrock incisively called an "Egalitarian marriage with a veneer of headship".

In more than a thousand posts between 2010 and 2020, Dalrock extensively analyzed modern Evangelical teachings on marriage and found them sorely wanting in Biblical Authenticity and Headship. Dalrock exposed how both Complementarianism and Egalitarianism are implemented by churches in ways that functionally disadvantage men and husbands, leading to the breakdown of marriages and then also the church.

Following Dalrock, Christianity and Masculinity, Σ Frame, and many other Christian Manospherians have written extensively about this problem and have added many more valuable insights, models, observations, para-prophecies, and theories, but Dalrock's work [Archive] continues to stand as the bedrock foundation of the Christian Red Pill regarding Church heresies and the carnal social nature of 'Christian' women.

Going on 6 years after his departure, Dalrock's expositions, fundamental viewpoints, and para-prophecies continue to reverberate throughout the Christian Red Pill, delivering sharp warnings to many Evangelical circles across America, and are just as shudderingly relevant today as they were a decade ago, perhaps even more so.

Here, I'll summarize Dalrock's main theses on how Complementarianism has destroyed Christian men and the Church.

How Complementarianism Is Implemented to the Detriment of Christian Men

Dalrock veraciously described Complementarianism as "Egalitarian Marriage with a Veneer of Headship", and called this arrangement (for men) "99% servant, 1% leader".

Dalrock revealed that what churches claim to teach and what they actually practice often diverge, creating a system that undermines Biblical Headship while shielding women from accountability.

Dalrock explained how all this works in his extensive analysis of modern Evangelical teachings on marriage. His essays describe the following patterns:

- A Default Gynocentric Frame. Feminism's doctrines and influence are incorporated under a Complementarian label: women's autonomy and feelings are sovereign, while male authority is treated as optional at best, or abusive at worst.
- The Evangelical guise of "Servant Leadership" redefines Headship as endless service without authority. Husbands are told they must "die to self" by catering to their wife's emotional state, feelings, moods, and preferences (often summarized in the catchphrase, "If mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy"). Real decision-making power is 'mutual' or defaults to the wife; the husband's role is reduced to a "tiebreaker" at best or a perpetual servant at worst.
- So called "Mutual Submission" is Applied Asymmetrically. Churches habitually emphasize Ephesians 5's call for husbands to love sacrificially, but rarely enforce the parallel command for wives to submit "in everything". If a wife feels unhappy or "not led", her rebellion is either excused somehow or blamed on the husband's failure to be sufficiently loving and/or servant-like.
- Pastors and Counselors Act as "White Knights". In marital conflict resolution, marriage counseling, or divorce situations, pastors, leaders, and counselors routinely accept the wife's narrative, meet with her privately without her husband present, and pressure the husband to repent of "bitterness", "harshness", or insufficient servanthood, with no regard to what the wife may have done to deserve such a response from the husband. (More on this in the next post.)
- Egalitarianism in Practice (even in self-described Complementarian churches). Open-air Egalitarians reject Headship outright, but Dalrock showed that many Complementarian churches achieve the same result by softening language, focusing on women's feelings, and avoiding enforcement of wifely accountability and submission, often by resorting to secular equality-based arguments backed by distorted scriptural references. The result is the same: husbands bear responsibility without any corresponding authority, while wives wield authority without any responsibility.

Negative Impacts on Men and Husbands

In hundreds of case studies, Dalrock repeatedly documented how this implementation of Complementarianism / "Egalitarianism with a veneer of Headship" / Feminism harms men, maritally, socially, and spiritually:

- Blame-Shifting and False Accountability. Husbands are held solely responsible for marital problems, even when wives rebel, withhold sex, or initiate divorce. Dalrock notes that churches often enable "reviling wives" by framing the husband's attempts at correction as unloving or abusive. Instead of offering encouragement and help, sermons are filled with "Man Bashing" and routine shaming, counseling sessions are long, fruitless, and frustrating, and church disciplinary measures ignore the wife's role in marital conflicts.
- Emasculation and the Erosion and Loss of Male Authority / Frame: The Complementarian rendition of "Headship" is a burden of constant performance to keep the wife happy. Men are trained to supplicate rather than lead, turning husbands into "hostage negotiators" for their own marriages and children. This erodes Biblical leadership as well as masculine confidence.
- Encouragement of Female-Initiated Divorce and Family Destruction. With church support (or at least non-resistance), wives can leave their marriages while retaining child custody, financial advantages, and even the moral high ground, fully in alignment with the dictates of secular culture. Dalrock links this to higher divorce rates in Evangelical circles and the destruction of father-led homes, which has an enduring and damning impact on families, children, and ultimately, the whole society.
- Spiritual and Communal Demoralization. Being deprived of authority over their own wives and homes, as well as purpose and respect, Men feel disposable and "spiritually dead." Many men have stopped attending church, avoid marriage altogether, or become cynical about faith. Dalrock ties this directly to the broader Evangelical decline (echoing Michael Spencer), in which churches fail to disciple men because they offer no real vision of masculine Headship, thereby driving men away and weakening the next generation.
- The Church is a Beta Factory. Men who internalize the "Servant Leadership" model and all its gynocentric constraints and social dictates become passive, resentful, or resigned, thereby perpetuating the very problems the church claims to solve. As a result, the church has become known as a Beta Factory, and a cesspool institution comprised of weak men and debased, 'empowered' wimminz.
- Broader Societal Ripple Effects. Complementarian teachings contribute to the "mating glut", delayed marriage, plummeting fertility, and weakened or destroyed Christian marriages, all leading to the corruption and downfall of American civilization.

Conclusions

In summary, Dalrock's core insight was that modern church teachings on Complementarianism (and open Egalitarianism) do not truly describe Biblical Headship, glorified Christian Marriage, and the necessary undergirding sex roles such as male dominance and wifely submission, but rather, a feminist-flavored Egalitarianism deceptively dressed up in scriptural language.

The convoluted scriptural support for the false doctrine of Complementarianism is always interpreted in favor of women and assiduously avoids any imprecation of women's failures (e.g., absence of moral agency, sexual promiscuity, neglecting marital duties such as having regular sexual relations, or failing to fulfill their proper roles and responsibilities in a Christian marriage, such as respecting and submitting to their husbands), thus implicitly and sometimes explicitly removing all accountability from women and preventing any discipline from being enacted on women.

In practice, the false doctrine of Complementarianism is implemented in the following ways:

- To routinely overlook women's manipulations, sins, and transgressions.
- To teach and encourage men to supplicate to their wives, and to shame men if they don't.
- To undermine, or remove if at all possible, men's authority over their wives and families.
- To shame men, or failing that, to ostracize them, for not complying with false doctrines and gynocentric policies in the church.

The result is a system that protects women's autonomy, feelings, and moral hypoagency, at the direct expense of men's authority, dignity, and family leadership — ultimately harming husbands, fathers, and the church itself. Dalrock urged men to recognize this pattern and to respond, rather than accept it as "biblical".

Moreover, prioritizing Feminist values and prerogatives amounts to a failure to pursue a Christian life of faith, and men, marriages, and children suffer as a result.

The Reviling Wife and Her Churchian White Knight Enablers

Church pastors, leaders, and counselors are cohorts in the church-endorsed feminist conspiracy against male authority.

Surfdumb has mentioned the term "Reviling Wives".

I did a little study on this topic.

It appears that "reviling wife" is now the preferred term that is acceptable church talk about what long-time RP readers are used to calling contentious / rebellious wives, as well as literally dozens of other more memorable (and less polite) synonyms.

I did a search for this term and found some works.

- Edgington, David D. The Abusive Wife – Ministering to the Contentious Woman. CreateSpace Independent Publishing: Phoenix, 2015. [Commentary]
- Edgington, David D. White Knights and Reviling Wives. New Christendom Press, 2025.
- Conrad Riker, The Reviling Wife: A Man's Guide to Understanding and Dealing with a Disrespectful Partner. Amazon Digital Services LLC, 2025. [Link]

Surfdumb clarified that he is referring to Edgington's work.

Since Dr. Edgington wrote "The Abusive Wife" in 2015, he has come to the conclusion that the term "abusive" isn't the best word to describe contentious wives' words. A more accurate and biblical term is "reviling", which is "Using speech as a non-contact weapon against another person."

Edgington on the Unholy Communion between White Knights and Reviling Wives

DeepStrength shared the following video from Dr. David Edgington, which describes how Reviling Wives and their Churchian minions, including pastors of all people, are destroying families and churches.

Effective Purpose: The Christian White Knight Situation Is So Much Worse Than I Realized — Dr. David Edgington (2026/3/14) Length: 56 minutes

The participants in this conversation include:

1. Matt hosts the Effective Purpose channel, which focuses on Christian men's issues, marriage, and offers critiques of churches from a Biblical Headship / Red Pill perspective.
2. Dr. David Edgington, the primary speaker, is a biblical counselor, author of books including The Abusive Wife and White Knights and Reviling Wives, and founder of compassionatecounselors.com. He draws his expertise from counseling over 500 similar cases.

The main theme of their conversation exposes the "Christian White Knight" phenomenon, in which pastors, leaders, and church culture rush to defend women (especially wives) from any perceived criticism and shield them from any accountability for their actions, often at the expense of biblical marriage principles, husbands, and family stability. This bias, influenced by feminism and emotionalism, treats women's feelings as sovereign, enables abusive / reviling behavior from wives, and crushes men through one-sided counseling, divorce proceedings, and church discipline.

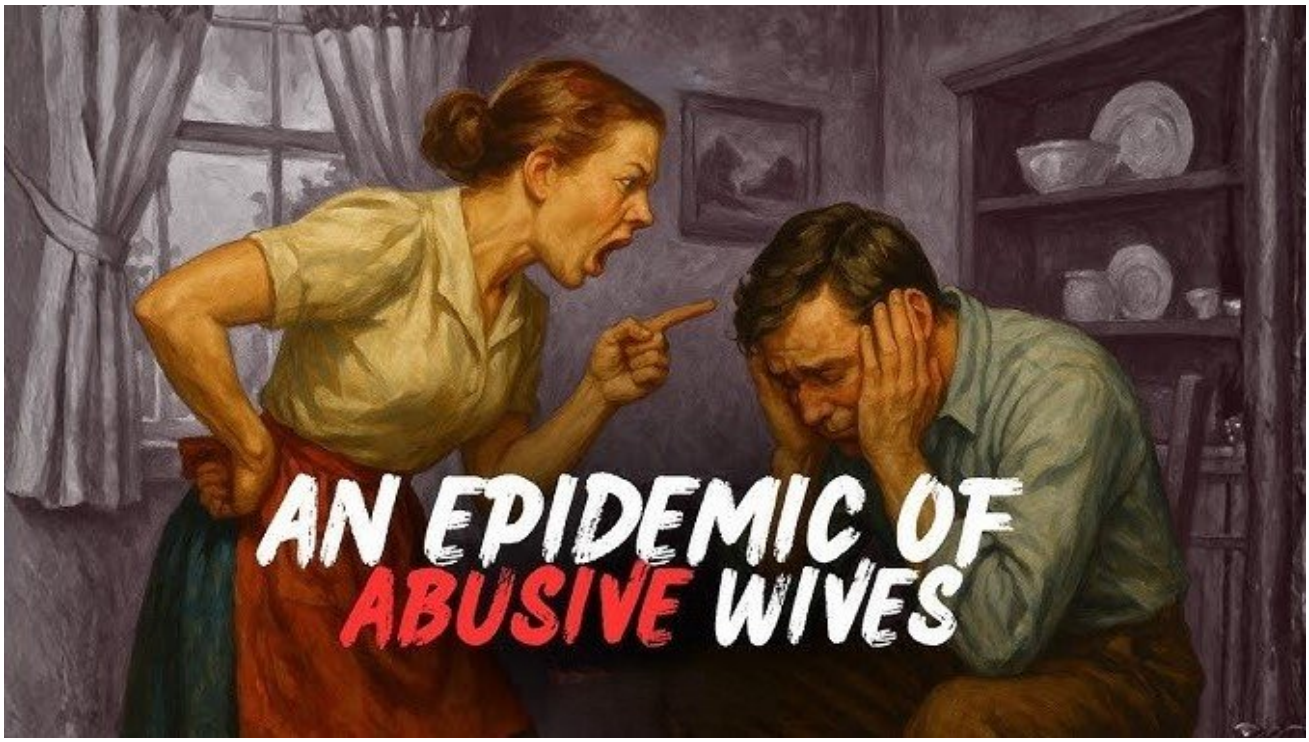
Edgington's views align with current Christian Red Pill critiques of modern evangelical marriage counseling.

This video has garnered over 20,000 views and has received many positive comments from men sharing similar experiences.



Edgington's Key Points

Below, I'll document the key points of their discussion.

1. (0:00–6:00) White Knighting
   - Dr. Edgington defines the "White Knight" as pastors / leaders who automatically rush to the defense of any woman who claims that she's being "abused" by her husband.
   - He says wives who make such claims are not only misleading, they're often lying. THEY are the ones who are abusing their husbands!
   - Pastors shield women from rebuke, viewing male correction as inherently cruel.
   - Pastors often meet wives privately, accept one-sided stories without due diligence, and condemn husbands based on the wife's feelings alone.
   - This creates a mass epidemic in the church, where men are blamed for "bitterness" and "harshness".
2. (6:00–10:00) The Church is Subsumed by Feminist Culture
   - The invasion of Feminism has infiltrated every denomination of the church.
   - Scripture repeatedly interprets that the wife is to submit to her husband "in everything" to her husband. The church refuses to affirm this command to wives.
   - Older wives should be training younger wives, so that the Word is not blasphemed.
   - Sanctification and growing in holiness is the goal, which requires discipline.
3. (10:00-16:00) Men's Influence is Necessary, but ultimately Superficial
   - House Codes of Headship: Ephesians 5:22-33, Colossians 3:18, Titus 2:3-5, and 1 Peter 3:1-6 begin with wives submitting "in everything" to husbands — not the reverse.

    - Wifely submission applies even in the case of disobedient husbands (1 Peter 3:1-6).
    - Failure to do so blasphemes God's Word (Titus 2:3-5).
  - Misuse of Scripture: Ephesians 5:22-33 ("Husbands love your wives as Christ loves the church") is twisted into unconditional sympathy without sanctification or correction.
    - The Logical Conclusion: "White Knights are not shepherds, but wolves."
  - Gynocentrism Dominates: Women's feelings determine everything in the real world, and it's devastating to men, marriages, and families.
    - The false charge against men: "He's not repenting of her sin."
    - "You could be the perfect man, and still not be enough to satisfy her."
4. (16:00-20:00) Real-World Consequences
  - Feminism's Infiltration: Churches, denominations, and seminaries have absorbed feminist ideas of women's autonomy and victimhood.
  - Encouraging Rebellion: Reviling wives receive permission to rebel; men are told to "tough it out" or to be kinder, ignoring root issues like the wife's Genesis 3:16 desires leading to conflict.
  - When evil is not held accountable, it grows worse. (Ecclesiastes 8:11)
    - Wicked women's sins are being covered by pastors and counselors, in church and in courts.
    - "White Knights need to repent, resign, or be removed."
  - Systematic Destruction: In counseling and courts, men lose marriages, children (via parental alienation), finances, and church community.
  - Dr. Edgington notes nearly identical patterns across hundreds of cases — wives revile, pastors enable, men are isolated or labeled abusive.
5. (20:00–25:00) Worsening Behavior Without Accountability
  - Abetting Sin: As mentioned before, shielding women from accountability / consequences (Ecclesiastes 8:11) leads to more evil.
  - Femcentric Feelings Dominate: Narratives center on feelings, "I don't feel safe", while there is no evidence of physical danger in most cases. Edgington says probably what they are referring to is Spiritual security, although they may not have any recognition of the Spiritual.
  - Anti-Male Indoctrination often alienates children from their fathers.
  - Not only wives, but White Knights (including pastors, leaders, and counselors), also need to be held accountable for enabling women's sins.
  - Positive Outliers: Edgington says some wives repent when confronted with Scripture (he estimates about 1 in 4 cases).
6. (25:00-33:00) Men need to band together and hold both Wives and White Knights accountable.
  - Edgington says that wives are more likely to repent than White Knights.
    - White Knights must "repent, resign, or be removed."
  - Men must build movements to hold men and leaders accountable, to encourage isolated men, and to pursue sanctification and the fear of God over people (Psalm 119).
    - Men need to look for other men who are going through the same relational crises that they are, and congregate together to form a movement within the church.
    - Men should confront pastors (with witnesses), speak up against biased sermons (e.g., Mother's Day favoritism, Father's Day shaming).
    - Men must band together when presenting their case to the church leadership.
    - If pastors and leaders are unresponsive, men must shake the dust off their shoes in response to unresponsive churches.

- Edgington advises that men should stay in Protestant churches and push for change rather than abandon the church entirely.

7. (33:00–49:00) Case Studies, Practical Advice, and Solutions
   - Remember, we're talking about the destruction of marriages.
   - The big lie of Feminism is that women's submission destroys women's value.
   - The root problem in most cases is the wife's refusal to submit to her husband.
   - Most churches, pastors, and elders are afraid to correct women. They won't council what they preach. They're afraid of alienating women.
   - Pastors, Counselors, and White Knights must recognize the husband's authority over his wife and his home.
   - Edgington says he has found that a large number of women have apparently never been instructed how important it is to submit to the word of God and submit (hypotasso) to their husbands. Once these wives can grasp this, they're more likely to understand that fighting with their husbands amounts to losing the fight, and to not argue with their husbands. He says these wives are surprised (!!!) to find that their submission brings peace and harmony in their marriages (!!!), and also grants them a great measure of power over their husbands (!!!).
8. (49:00–56:00) Encouragement, Closing, and Resources
   - Edgington emphasizes that men must pursue spiritual courage, honorable living before God, and the reality that even being a perfect husband is not enough if wives refuse accountability.
     - Look for ways that you and your wife can be sanctified.
   - Men need courage to countermand the offending voices saying that "Men are weak", "Men are wrong", and "Men are the problem".
     - Men must be gracious, humble, fervent, strong-minded, sober-minded, and hold the line.
   - Edgington repeats his admonishment for men not to abandon the church, but to stand in solidarity against White Knight pastors, leaders, and counselors.
   - Dr. Edgington promotes his website (compassionatecounselors.com) for books, podcasts, and contact info.

Quotable Quotes

- "When the woman's feelings are sovereign, whatever she feels is true, and the man is going to get condemned."
- "You could be the perfect man, and it would not be enough for her."
- "Christ corrects his church all the time." (on Ephesians 5:22-33)
- "White Knights need to repent, resign, or be removed."

Epilogue

The White Knight bias within the church — rooted in misplaced compassion and feminist influence — destroys Biblical Headship, enables sin, and contributes to marital breakdown and societal harm. True restoration requires mutual accountability, scriptural fidelity, and courageous confrontation of these patterns. Christian men are called to boldness, discernment, and reliance on God amid a flawed system.

The White Knight 2.0

Jack · 30 March 2026 · Archived copy · Original

The form and function of the White Knight has morphed ever so evil in our time.

Readership: All; Men; Christians;
Theme: Cracking Nuts
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

The White Knight 1.0: The Chivalrous Overprotective Blue Pilled Fool

The Manospherian 1.0 concept of a White Knight was defined in various contexts and degrees as…

- The Blue Pilled Fool: A man who believes that women are precious pearls of boundless grace and immense beauty, and yet are altogether defenseless and perpetually victimized by a cold world filled with carelessly cruel people and harsh realities, and therefore practices chivalry, enforces special privileges for women, and promotes gynocentrism.
- The Gynocentric Democrat: Women, White Knights, weak Betas, and naive Blue Pill fools congregate in select social microcosms in which everyone agrees women are good and right, and men are bad and wrong. Within this group solidarity, WKs are those who cover, defend, and justify women's bad decisions and protect them from the consequences thereof.
- The Male Feminist: A man who stands up for women's rights to be absolutely equal to men's, but then comes to her rescue and/or defends her interests whenever her moral irresponsibility becomes an embarrassing burden, thereby enabling and falsely validating women's false fantasies of egalitarianism. These men are almost always motivated by the belief that they can gain favor with women who will reward them with love, acceptance, "friendship", and maybe some snatch if they mold their slimy souls around women's deceptive lies. MFers are known to be the least ethical and most immoral of all men listed here.
- The Orbiter: A man who falsely believes that a particular woman belongs to him (or will eventually), when in fact, she's silently keeping him firmly in the friend zone and utilizing his desires for her own ends. Such a man will do backflips to defend her, lie profusely to her and for her, and obsequiously place his left nut in a thumb vice just to please her.
- The P00n Pedestalizer: A man who is an indignantly principled, self-sacrificing, wholly devoted worshipper of P00n and of the human hosts who bear them (but whom seldom bare them for such woebegone men).
- The Useful Idiot: An altruistic, well-meaning, but naïve man who intends to defend, guard, and protect women as a sex, thinking it to be his masculine duty. But he is, in fact, too Blue Pilled to effect the good he intends, and ends up being a useful idiot within women's self-serving schemes.

In general, WKs protect women from the natural consequences of their own follies, foolishness, and various vices, prevent women from being held accountable, and block RP aware men from doing any effective good. They think themselves to be bastions of morality, pillars of societal ethics, and unseen, unrecognized heroes for these things.

Common traits that often (but not all or always) appear in WKs include:

- They believe women like and are attracted to Nice Guys.
- They operate on an internal covert contract, in which they expect to have their desires rewarded if they behave a certain way.

But all their efforts are in vain. These women, once liberated from their responsibilities to themselves and humanity in general, redirect their energies towards nude Pussy Hat marches, Machiavellian solipsism, throwing neon green dildos onto basketball courts midgame, and other stupid, self-centered schemes.

The White Knight 2.0: The Sinister Minister

As reviewed in a previous post, Dr. David Edgington's concept of a "White Knight", which I'll call WK 2.0, rendering the above as WK 1.0, is somewhat darker and more treacherous than WK 1.0.

The Churchian Edition of the White Knight 2.0 takes the form of pastors / leaders who…

- Tend to be rather Blue Pilled, chivalrous, perpetually greasy grinning, P00n pandering pansy @sses.
- Tend to view women as inherently pure-hearted and saintly, and men as disruptive, suspect, and untrustworthy.
- Accept one-sided stories from the wife which invariably calumniate and indict the husband, without hearing the husband's side of the story.
- Accountability, correction, and discipline are viewed as inherently cruel and unnecessary, rather than "tough love", and therefore shield women from censure / rebuke.
- Conduct counseling sessions that are more focused on offering rebellious wives a catharsis, ameliorating their frustrations, and affirming their feelings, rather than calling them to be obedient to the scriptures and pursuing marital sanctification.
- Blame husbands for being 'bitter' and 'harsh' with their wives, when in fact, these men's behaviors may very well be an entirely justifiable, reasonable, and/or warranted response to the caustic, controlling, disrespectful, and reviling behavior of their wives.
- Automatically rush to the defense of any woman who claims that she's being "abused" by her husband. Based on several years of experience in counseling troubled married couples, Edgington says wives who make such claims are not only misleading, they're often lying. In many cases, THEY are the ones who are abusing / reviling their husbands!
- Meet wives privately in counseling sessions, without their husbands present. If pastors ask why the husband didn't come, wives will say he was busy at work, or didn't have time to come, or refused to come, when in fact he was never informed of their meeting. Thus, it is not only a private meeting, but it is also essentially a 'secret' meeting. These pastors never think to question it or reschedule sessions. This creates an arena in which wives can misconstrue the facts, roll out the drama, the doe eyes, and the elephant tears, and tell all sorts of lies, all to win the undeserved favor of the highest authority in the local church body. WK pastors swallow it whole.
- Routinely choose to be unconditionally empathetic to women (but never to men) rather than critical, and believe all they are told, without any critical thought, and without ever checking with the husband to get his side of the story. Instead, they'll condemn husbands based entirely upon the wife's feelings and stories alone.

Edgington said that "White Knights are not shepherds, but wolves". He describes these pastors, elders, leaders, and counselors in the church as conspiring against the husband's authority over their own wives and families, and says, in so many words, that this is routine, i.e., it is the norm. Sadly, these WKs are actually betraying their brethren, their community, and ultimately, the Lord Himself, all while thinking that they're doing right by women. No, they're doing a great injustice. It is a demonic deception.

Edgington also said that wives are more likely to repent than White Knights. (Approximately 1 in 4 wives repent when confronted with scripture.) Feminists and Reviling Wives themselves aren't the worst problem; it's the simptoony White Knights who defend and enable their destructive foolishness. I suppose this is because of the inherent ego-boosting moral satisfaction WKs get from playing the hero (in their own self-estimation).

Conclusions

Lately, it has become widely recognized that holding women accountable is an important and necessary recourse to aid their maturation as need be. However, White Knights (including pastors, leaders, and counselors) stymie this process, either dimwittedly or intentionally.

These WKs need to be held accountable for enabling women's sins. As Edgington said, "White Knights must repent, resign, or be removed."

Men need courage to countermand the offending voices saying that "Women are Strong and Independent; Men are weak", "Women are more spiritually attuned; Men are wrong", and "Women are helpless victims; Men are the problem".

Men must band together to confront WKs in the church, no matter who they are, pastors, elders, deacons, counselors, handsome Ch@ds, or whoever.

Men, identify who your Red Pilled Christian brothers are, form a pact of solidarity, and through your numbers and influence, win your church for Christ!

Let not Satan titillate the truculent Tingle tarts in your congregation for even one more day. White Knighting and P00n pandering Gynocentrism are sociosexual sins that must be cast out of the church at any cost. Count that cost and pay up to see the glory of the Lord at work in your church!

Why the Red Pill Can Never Be Churchian

In this essay, I'll address the points raised in a post appearing on Reddit/ChristianMarriage: The Toxic Manosphere: Why the Red Pill can never be Christian (2021/8/6), specifically the reasons why the author (MedianNerd) claims the Red Pill cannot be Christian, a claim which would be better phrased as reasons why the Red Pill cannot be Blue Pill congruent, or culturally converged, or gynocentric … or Churchian. (In this essay, I've made this substitution in the text.)

More discussion on this post can be found under a repost in r/Reformed.

Before reading my response, it should be noted that this post was written only a year after The Christian Red Pill (CRP) broke away from the Secular Manosphere, so some of the differences had not yet gelled within that time. Since this post was written, The CRP has answered many of the questions that were brought up. So here, I'll quote the post and summarize the answers below. It's a little longer than usual, but I aim to settle the arguments concisely.

Mismatched Expectations

First of all, I would describe the Reddit post as a comedy of Mismatched Expectations. "Oh Wow! The Red Pill doesn't fulfill Feminine Imperatives and holds them accountable instead! It must be very VERY Baaad!" Heh.

> "The Manosphere is a term used for a group of online communities espousing a particular set of philosophies. These communities use various names like MGTOW, the Red Pill, and Men's Rights. These groups are bound by two primary ideas: that women and feminism are ruining society, and that the solution is for men to 'return' to a sort of hyper-masculinity and subjugate women."

Both the secular and Christian Manosphere / Red Pill agree that Marxist Feminism and women's sins are ruining society. The RP recognizes that it is in the best interests of everyone — men, women, children, churches, and society — for men to pursue a masculine identity, which is viewed as hyper-masculinity within a feminized culture that has thoroughly eroded masculine identity over the past few decades.

Going to hell in a handbasket.

The 'subjugation' of women might be taught by some secular Red Pillers, but within the CRP, women are invited to humble themselves and be submissive to their freely chosen husbands as an act of love and obedience to both God and husband. However, it is also recognized that some women want and/or need to be disciplined in order to help them overcome their fleshly / rebellious / sinful nature. It is not recommended that this should be done against the woman's will, but rather as a method to help her develop her personal growth and maturity. Of course, those who do not recognize (1) the hierarchy ordained in scripture, (2) that both men and women have a sinful nature to be overcome, and/or (3) who will not tacitly agree on this modus operandi, will reduce this Christian dynamic to one of 'abuse' and 'subjugation'.

> "I've seen a lot of confusion about what these groups are and why they're problematic. Some people, for example, believe they can create a Christianized version of the Red Pill simply by tacking on "You should only have sex inside marriage." This fails to recognize that the anti-Christian elements of these philosophies go much deeper than that."

"You should only have sex inside marriage" is a legalistic 'rule' that NovaSeeker and I deconstructed in Rules and Trust (2021/4/28), and we're Christian Manospherians, mind you. Not that we're endorsing extramarital sex — far from it — but rather that men should focus on faith and trust rather than self-justifying standards of purity, thinking that it will somehow earn them honor, or righteousness, or help snag a pretty wife, or whatever.

The contrasting views towards sexual promiscuity was and still is the most obvious difference between the secular Red Pill and the CRP. But over time, many other problematic areas have been identified.

Female pastor, Christie Harfouche. Note the bold lipstick, the razor-thin sculpted eyebrows, short hair, and the tattoo on the left arm, all Red Flags.

> "Here are the biggest problems:

1. The Manosphere has a warped view of reality.

> "The majority of the members in these communities are either (often young) unmarried or divorced. The term "Red Pill" is taken from the 90s movie The Matrix and is meant to signify that they have become aware of the hidden societal conspiracy against men. As evidence, they rely on the cultural misunderstandings of what alimony is and how parental rights are determined. Because these men typically have little healthy experience with women or are hurt by perceived injustices (like having to pay child support), these men eagerly consume the message that the deck was stacked against them the whole time, and they're being persecuted simply for being normal men."

Imagine that! Being forced to pay budget breaking child support after your wife unilaterally divorces you and takes the house, kids, and all your savings is now a "cultural misunderstanding", and a "perceived injustice", resulting in a "warped view of reality", and seeing it any differently amounts to subscribing to a "hidden societal conspiracy against men". Heh. It's not hidden at all, except in Google searches. Stop Gaslighting men!

Both the Christian and Secular Manosphere as well as a growing segment of society at large have recognized that men in Western cultures are under duress for a multitude of reasons. Men and masculinity itself are attacked, dismissed as 'toxic', and/or rejected altogether. As a result, there is a disproportionate number of men suffering from depression, despondency, and are adopting a nihilistic outlook on life. Up until very recently, only Red Pill communities and a small number of other social institutions and venues have been willing to recognize these problems that men are facing, and Red Pill communities are the ONLY ones that offer a socio-philosophical paradigm that contains encouragement, explanations, empirical praxeologies and strategies, fellowship with like-minded individuals, and general wisdom. Thus, it is to be expected that many men who are broken, disadvantaged, and/or hopelessly scorned by society and women are therefore attracted to The Red Pill. Gosh! It's almost like they're 'victimized'! But men won't shun their responsibility.

As of late, both the Christian and Secular Manosphere have recognized that many men in The Red Pill community suffer from falling testosterone, Insecure Attachment, rejection, and various other sociopathologies, which is to be expected, given the above described situation. The Red Pill has been recognized as a hospital for broken men, and/or a 'halfway house' of men recovering from the travesties of cultural feminism and sociosexual libertinism. Thus, the charge that "The Manosphere has a warped view of reality" is feminine-biased, shortsighted, and somewhat naïve. It would be more accurate to say that "The Manosphere is a social movement comprised of men who have been institutionally disadvantaged by Feminism, and who are wrestling against a warped view of reality (AKA The Blue Pill) that they learned from a broken, Feminist culture and/or an upbringing tainted by parental divorce, also a consequence of Feminism and the Sexual Revolution."

More accurately,

- The Secular Manosphere espouses the rejection of Chivalry / Feminism / Gynocivnattery / The Blue Pill, and the development of masculinity as the answer.
- The Christian Manosphere / Red Pill recognizes that restoring masculinity is a crucial piece of the puzzle, and it is also believed that faith in Christ is the best way, and perhaps for some men, the only way this healing can be achieved.

2. The Manosphere has a horribly warped view of women.

> "Christianity teaches that all human beings are sinners — the Manosphere teaches that women are worse sinners (usually not in those words). Women are portrayed as especially dishonest. As a result of this, men are encouraged to be manipulative and to expect dishonesty. For example, instead of letting a woman tell you if she's a virgin (more on that later), the advice is to see if she's shy and bashful, because that's an indication that she's sexually inexperienced (if she's a good kisser, that's a bad sign). Similarly, women are believed to be inherently disloyal. They're portrayed as slaves to sexual desire who are comparing their husbands to other potential sex partners and will always be looking to "trade up." These ideas are supported, if at all, by textbook confirmation bias."

News Flash: The Bible does say that all men (and women) are sinful, and that women are the weaker sex, morally, physically, and spiritually. The Manosphere has recognized this truth as a praxeology, not merely by taking the Bible at face value, but through an empirical first-hand look at the lives of hundreds of thousands of women (or tens of millions or more by this time).

Both the Secular and Christian Manosphere / Red Pill recognize that women's feral inclinations work against the best interests of everyone — men, marriage, children, family, society, and women themselves. Statistics on abortion, crime, divorce, fatherlessness, falling fertility rates, out-of-wedlock births, and the adverse effects of sexual promiscuity on marital contentment further verify these observations.

The Secular Manosphere / Red Pill argues that men should be wary and on the lookout for women's worst nature because it is better to be safe than sorry. This also agrees with Biblical adages. (Proverbs 2; Proverbs 5; Proverbs 6:20-35; Proverbs 7; Proverbs 23:27-28)

The more unscrupulous corners of the Secular Manosphere have developed sophisticated social Game techniques to harness women's feral nature to serve their own selfish desires. From the CRP viewpoint, if such women are truly enslaved in any sense, it is to their own sinful desires, as much as to those men to whom those desires are willingly directed.

The Christian Manosphere / Red Pill recognizes that these unsavory behaviors of women (and the latter-mentioned men) are characteristic of the fleshly / sinful nature, but that with love and diligence, women can be taught and trained in the ways of righteousness, for the benefit of her own soul and everyone else within their spheres of influence.

So instead of "The Manosphere has a horribly warped view of women", it would be more accurate to say that "Immature Ugly Feminists have a horribly warped view of Men, the Manosphere, human sexuality, … and themselves." It's all a psychological projection.

3. Solutions are UnBiblical

> "Because their understanding of the problem is warped, their solutions grossly offend the Biblical understanding of human beings:"

In the past, the solutions offered by the Secular Manosphere were more or less all about outdoing women at their own sordid sex Games. This is, by the nature of the fray, a very costly, messy, and time and labor intensive ordeal that men would prefer to avoid altogether — and men would, if not for the P_ssy. The Christian Manosphere 1.0

had very few practical solutions at all, other than sticking to the faith and enduring the suffering for Christ's glory, but over time, some 'solutions' which are more accurately described as attitudes / beliefs / convictions were developed, such as Detachment, drawing Boundaries, and maintaining Frame. As of now, the careful control of Attention to condition women's behaviors, the ultimate withdrawal of the same (i.e. Dread Game, MGTOW), Moral Guidance Based Feedback, and a wide array of vetting flags are the most powerful tools at the disposal of Christian men. These solutions are Biblical, depending on one's interpretation of scripture.

Female submission, by free will or by Game; the former is preferred by men, the latter by women.

Point 1: Men's Natural Preference for Submissive Women

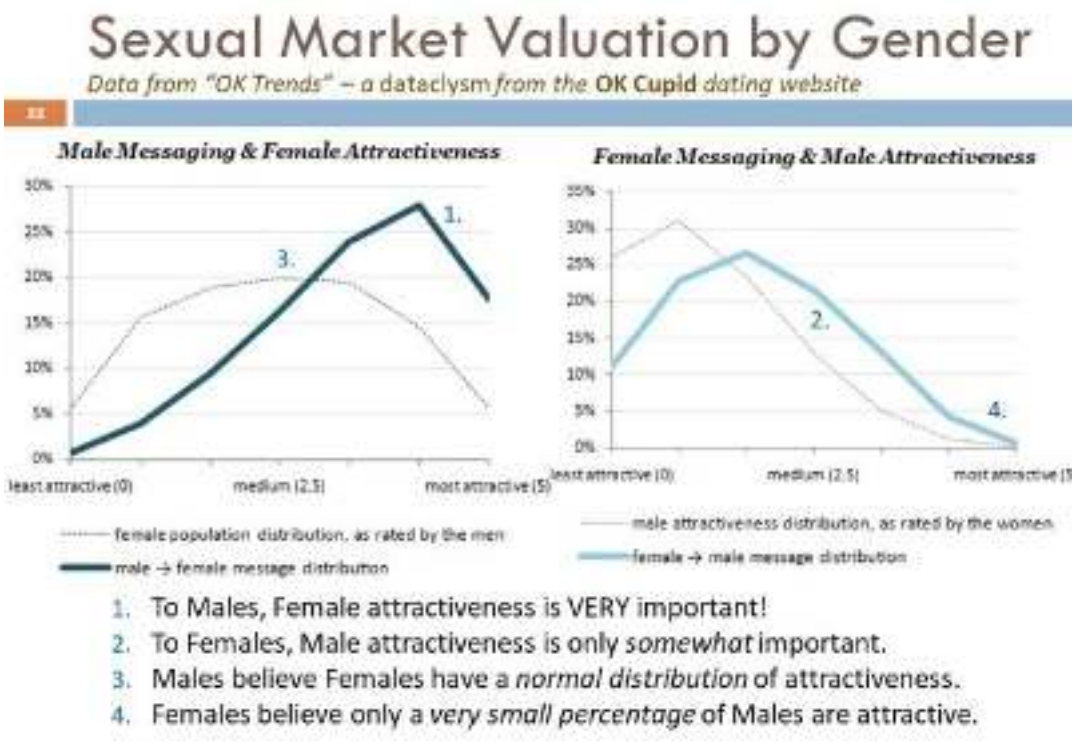
> "Men are encouraged to find women who are younger and "teachable," so she won't resist the Red Pill worldview (this can also be achieved by finding immigrants or other vulnerable women). Women who think for themselves are "infected" by feminism."

The Christian Manosphere has concluded that women who are Faithful, Available, Steadfast, and Teachable (FAST) are better choices for a wife. This is important, not because "she won't resist the Red Pill worldview", but simply because these are traits that appear in women who are faithful, humble, submissive, as well as a constellation of other good qualities, and therefore have the constitution to be better wives and mothers, according to Christian standards of morality. As much as women's sinful pride will recoil at words like 'submissive' and 'teachable', these are Biblical feminine traits that would serve them well if adopted. Women resist and reject these truths at their own peril.

Point 2: Sexual Dimorphism and Sexual Polarity are Incontrovertible

> "People are assigned a value based on different factors: your "sexual market value" (SMV). For women, this is primarily based on youth, beauty, and fertility, with adjustments for submissiveness and virginity. For men, it's about physical strength, income, and assertiveness. A man with a high SMV should negotiate a match with a "high-value" woman, while "low-value" women should be grateful to get any attention at all. The Manosphere doesn't understand why anyone would object to this unless they're "low SMV".

The reason why the Manosphere doesn't entertain opposing views on these points is that these concepts are NOT a fantasy utopia cooked up by desperate men looking to 'subjugate women' (as the author likes to imagine). It is an empirical observation of reality. Ignore these truths at your own peril.



Point 3: Game = Manipulation

> "Besides standard pick-up topics like negging and withholding affection to increase desperation, the Manosphere encourages men to see women as means to an end: sex. "Rule 1: You are not seeking to befriend, date, court, or even marry a woman. Those are simply the means to an end: sex." If you haven't gotten it before now, I hope it's clear that the Manosphere is completely man-centric — women only have value for what they can give to men (which doesn't extend far beyond cleaning and sexual pleasure). At the same time, men are encouraged to keep women in a state of "dread," or fear that he might abandon her. This will encourage her to be more pliable and sexually available."

Unfortunately, the SMP has devolved into one of sociosexual transactions, and the Red Pill recognizes this new reality. This is not the fault of the Manosphere or Red Pill, but of Feminism and sexual license.

As to the points raised,

Re: Game

First of all, only ferally inclined, spiritually immature women require Game, and such women actually enjoy being Gamed, provided that it's coming from a sufficiently high SMV man. If women don't want to be Gamed, then instead of complaining about being "manipulated", they should either grow up, and/or stop being attracted to Game-savvy Dark Triads. But… that will never happen, because it's what the craven souls of such women actually want. Only Christ can change that.

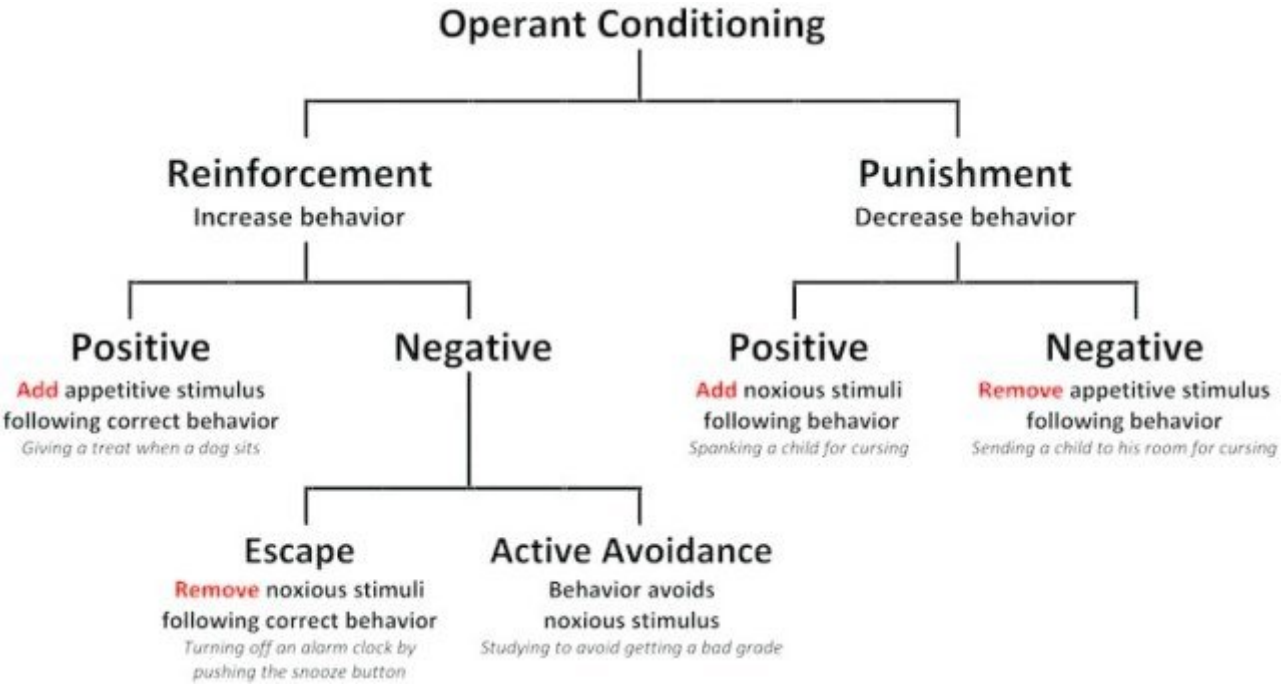
Regarding "withholding affection to increase desperation", AKA Dread Game, it is NOT conducted to specifically induce feelings of desperation per se (which is a subjective, fem-centric viewpoint), but rather to provide a negative reinforcement in the aim of teaching the woman the ways of righteousness, hopefully leading to the extinction of her own destructive behaviors. It's simple operant conditioning. If sinful actions bring only pleasurable rewards, then painful consequences / punishments must be introduced in order to counteract and outweigh those rewards and goad the individual towards righteousness. Bad behavior MUST have unpleasant consequences, either natural or administered by a caring husband or father or other authority, or else the subject will adamantly continue in said bad behavior. Withholding women's most reinforcing good, Attention and Affection, is simply the most effective method of implementing negative punishment that isn't flatly illegal.



Besides, this particular complaint is a red herring. Women say that they don't want to be 'manipulated' via Game. But what women actually don't want is for their hand to be revealed and lose control of the Game stacked against men. They're just pig-biting mad because more and more men are figuring this out and calling their bluff.

Re: Manipulation

The charge of 'manipulation' is one of the most annoyingly bothersome false assumptions that keeps reappearing; the idea that The Manosphere / Red Pill 'teaches men to hate women', or 'subjugates women' or that "it makes women do X (against their will)", or 'forces women to submit' (presumably within an evil Patriarchal social institution of slavery in effect), when in fact, this is something that hardly ever occurs, and is flatly illegal in Western societies.

Truth be said, these charges are a projected expression of women's deeper existential fears and their refusal to trust either God or the male head God has placed over them.

Truth be said, many women believe they are 'manipulated' precisely because they subconsciously choose those few men who have the power to manipulate them, recoil at the inherent abuses, and then inductively and falsely assume that ALL men are manipulative.

Truth be said, women are 10x more deceitful and manipulative than men are. Instead of demonizing and rejecting men, they should be making efforts to develop trust and to reconcile themselves with God and mankind.

Re: Sex-Centric Mentality

Concerning the charge that the Manosphere / Red Pill teaches men to see women as means to an end — sex, it must be recognized that the Red Pill emerged as a wise recognition of how most women see men as means to multiple ends — Attention, provision, security, Tingles, etc. — an awareness that was late in coming, compared to the earlier rise of women's multiple sociosexual mating strategies weaponized against men.

As it is often said in the Manosphere, "Women 'love' opportunistically", which is to say, women only value men for what they can do for them or give to them. Briffault's Law applies. Women predictably offer less appreciation and respect for men who offer less.

Interestingly, this is also true of men. Men want sex. No duh. If women don't like this, they don't have a healthy appreciation of the mind-bending power of Testosterone. Thus, a woman who consistently and enthusiastically provides sexual interactions will "earn her keep", so to speak. That's pretty simple and easy, TBH. Men will tolerate A LOT of BS as long as the sex is good. But if a woman brings more problems than benefits into a man's life, or gatekeeps sex on a highly conditional drip-feed, then she will be regarded as 'high maintenance' or 'low value'.

Of course, these are not necessarily Christian views per se, but it is a recognition of the fleshly realities that must be addressed before progress towards an ideal Christian relationship can be achieved. Therefore, men must be taught to open their eyes to this reality and learn how to deal with it. Women too.

Furthermore, a proper recognition of this reality, i.e. the sexual inclinations of human nature, e.g. women's hypergamy vs men's sexual dominance, suggest that men and women are largely segregated according to their interests and purposes, and therefore their interactions in certain social venues should be structured around this reality, such that male-female relations can remain fitting and proper, and defiling run-ins and dire disappointments may be averted.

Men will play along with the rules, so long as the rules are kept. That's just how men are. But women don't want that, NOT really, because of the Accountability, Agency, and Responsibility that would be required of them. They would rather have all the drama and heartbreak, though the consequences be damning.

Point 4: Hyper-Masculinity Bad!

This whole paragraph is better read in scare quotes.

> "The Manosphere encourages men to actively fight against Feminism and anything that is perceived as connected to it. Christians in the Manosphere reject egalitarianism and CBMW Complementarianism as "feminized." They believe men should aspire to be "alphas," displaying aggression and refusing to adapt their behavior to any standards outside the Manosphere. They believe that, despite their protests, women prefer this > to the point that their sexual desire will overrule their rational thinking and they will be inevitably drawn to "alpha males." This is a philosophy that perpetuates itself by rejecting the input of anyone outside the Manosphere (outside men protest because they can't measure up, while women are simply wrong about what they really want). "There is no moral obligation to use our strength or manliness toward some greater good — men should serve themselves and seek their own agenda." This is justified among Red Pill Christians by arguing that Christians should have godly agendas anyway, but it is regularly used to justify being antisocial without apology."

News Flash 1: Men aspire to be Alphas because that's what women want. Women have sex with Alphas. Men want sex, so be Alpha if possible. It's not rocket science, and it's not Christian either; it's just human nature. But the author won't admit this simple intersexual dynamic predicated on what men and women naturally desire from the opposite sex, choosing instead to see it as 'toxic'. That's quəər, by definition.

News Flash 2: Secular men will seek their own agendas (such as sexual conquest) by default, and better men might seek some greater good, but Christian men seek their own God-ordained purpose in life. That purpose is NEVER to obsequiously serve the Feminine Imperative. That's a defilement and an inversion of Holy Headship. It is also anathema to the female fleshly nature. Go fish!

Conclusions

The author concludes,

> "The problem should be clear at this point. It is not simply that there's a tenet of the Red Pill that conflicts with the ethical teachings of ~~Christianity~~ gynocentric Churchianity (although the Manosphere certainly encourages some abhorrent behaviors), but that the core of the philosophy is incompatible with ~~Christianity~~ Churchianity."
> - Women are not treated as image-bearers of God [paging Sharkly], but as deceptive beings whose primary purpose is sexual. [Yes, feral women always have sex on their minds, and it's hard to get them to think otherwise!]
> - Men are not treated as sinful, nor encouraged to humble repentance; they are encouraged to dominate > women and pursue their own desires without consideration for others.

> - Token lip service is occasionally paid to the doctrines of ~~Christianity~~ Churchianity, but the actual teachings of the Manosphere are about desire fulfillment.
> - Instead of hesed, God's constant and sacrificial love, the Manosphere teaches men to subtly threaten to abandon their wives so they won't resist the man's will.

> "Those within the Manosphere will argue that there is good to go along with the bad. For example, men are encouraged to take responsibility for themselves and communicate directly. It's certainly true that many men can benefit from learning to take responsibility and communicate well, which is why the vast majority of social groups encourage those things. When you could quench your thirst with any beverage, do you choose gasoline?"

Yes, the secular Manosphere is obsessed with the fulfillment of sexual desire (or it was in its 1.0 version heyday; other desires have rescinded this as of late, e.g. MGTOW), but that is not to be conflated with the Christian Manosphere. (This was one of the reasons for the schism.)

Overall, the author reveals an ignorance about the differences between the secular Red Pill and the Christian Red Pill (since the differences had not yet been ironed out at the time of writing). But even so, here we see the typical female solipsism resulting in a cognitive juxtaposition of what is 'real' and hyper-hamsterbation. But wait … the author is apparently a married man!

Overall, it is evident that the author of the post at Reddit was expecting men to be more proactive towards fulfilling women's expectations so that women wouldn't have to address their own hypergamic, hypoagentic role in the mess. Actually, Red Pilled men ARE more proactive, but NOT in a way that serves Feminine Imperatives. Thus, it was erroneously concluded that The Red Pill could never be 'Christian' for this reason. It would be more accurate to say that The Christian Red Pill can never be 'Churchian' for this reason.

At best, the author was unaware of why the CRP is needed and relevant, and at worst, he was somewhat converged in his (or her) misguided expectations of The Christian Red Pill.

Intro

For more than a decade, there has been a growing epidemic of women dependent on chemical substances to function normally. The most common artificients are alcohol, antianxiety medications (e.g., benzodiazepines, SNRIs, Xanax), antidepressants (e.g., Lexapro, Prozac, SSRIs, Zoloft), stimulants, and other psychosomatic mood enhancers, such as marijuana and molly. Sedative-Hypnotics (e.g., Ambien) and Psychedelics (AKA dissociatives) such as psilocybin (AKA mushrooms) and LSD are making a comeback.

The result is a generation of drugged-up automatons roaming the bars, city streets, and workplaces looking for attention, meaning, and relevancy. It reminds me of some zombie films I've passed up seeing.

Long time readers will know how these women arrived in this sorry state. They altered their body chemistry by taking hormonal Birth Control drugs, and spent their youth riding the carousel, participating in the sins of sexual promiscuity and the child sacrifice of abortion, which is mur_der. Then some of them married poorly and blew up their marriages and families. Others became doped up / winoholic Kitty Karens.

And they call this "Women's Liberation". Heh.

But it was not always this way.

Lest we forget.

Soft Tripping 1950s Housewife

Take a look at this video of a woman who volunteered for research experiments with LSD back when it was considered a new and mysterious chemical compound. I'll guess this documentary was made in the mid to late 1950s.

The housewife in the above video has many attractive qualities to her demeanor. She is calm, and soft spoken, and she has a meekness that we just don't see in women anymore. She speaks to the researcher in a smooth, measured, respectful tone. Even after she drinks the LSD punch and starts tripping, she continues to be soft spoken, and she retains her calm, feminine qualities.

The Hippie Chick

Here's another example of a young lady who has used LSD and is describing her trips. I'd guess this was made in the early to mid 1960s. She and the others in the background appear to be high on something.

The typical feminine airheadedness prevails. But even when she is probed with difficult questions or asked to explain her views, there is a soft politeness about her that is lacking in the vast majority of women today. She appears to be flirting with the interviewer a couple of times during the interview, but I think she's not intentionally flirting — that authentic, innocent, natural, playful charm is just who she is, sans Feminism.

Conclusions

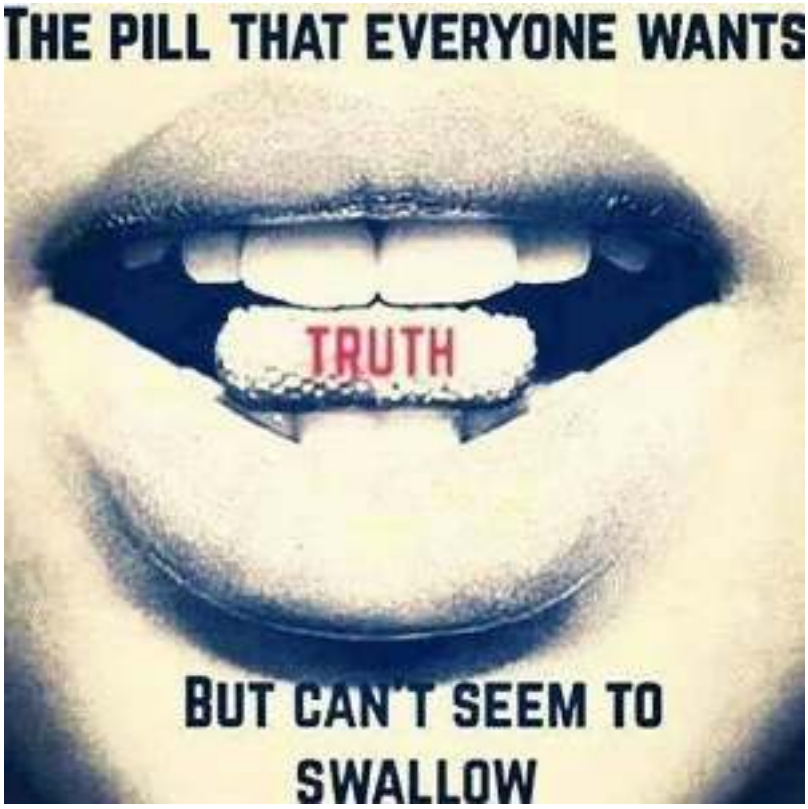
The theme for April 2026 is Porn and Wh0redom is the Norm. Here, I wanted to offer a look at what women were like before the Sexual Revolution, before I get into the current state of what modern women have become in future posts.

After watching these interviews of women from the late 50s and early 60s, and comparing these women to those living in the 21st century, the contrast in their femininity and softness between now and then is an unmistakable chasm. This feminine charm is one of the many things men are referring to when they mention or reminisce about the 1950s traditional housewife.

Most of the comments from men under these videos took note of the femininity, and almost all of them found their softness very attractive.

Overall, the pleasant, curious behavior displayed by these women during the interview, either before or after the administration of the hallucinogen, stands in stark contrast to the forward, indignant, contentious manners of modern women who are almost always more combative and are invariably a lot more difficult to deal with when they get drunk or high.

As it is said, "Booze in, Truth out", meaning that alcohol reveals the true nature of a person, and oftentimes their honest opinions as well. This could also be said about many other recreational drugs, including LSD.



As long as a woman retains her feminine qualities, her looniness can be rather cute and endearing, with or without drugs. But without those feminine qualities that impart common social graces, women become insufferable and intolerable — and dope doesn't change this. The present epidemic of combative Karens hopped up on Valium and Zanax is proof.

For all I've written about the deleterious effects of various drugs on this blog, these videos make it clear that one's upbringing and values are stronger influences on a woman's behavior and character, even while under the influence of intoxicating substances. (Or maybe just LSD, YMMV.)

Extending Youth via Weight Loss Drugs

Intro

In contrast to the last post, popular drugs have changed over the past 60 years. Instead of having fun via an immediate dopamine hit, people are pursuing a dopamine-fueled hedonistic lifestyle by using drugs to adjust their body chemistry and physique to that end.

Readers have probably already heard about Ozempic and similar weight-loss drugs. They're very popular in Taiwan. My wife estimates that about 30% of all her coworkers have taken Mounjaro to lose anywhere from 5 to 20 kg within 3-5 weeks.* I know these people. Their bodies look 10 years younger, their faces 10 years older.

In this essay, I'll summarize this class of drugs and why it is in high demand, examine an article appearing in the New York Post on this topic, and offer some conclusions.

 A healthy rate of weight loss is about 1 kg./week. 4 kg./week is drastic and severe.*

Why are Weight-Loss Drugs Popular?

The simple answer is that it's not easy to lose weight.

As I've pointed out before, a strict diet and regular exercise are not enough to lose weight. You MUST decrease calorie intake BELOW your daily metabolic rate, and do this consistently for MONTHS!

The main difficulty in losing weight is that most people cannot tolerate being hungry, even for an hour. As soon as hunger pangs strike, they'll reach for a sugary soft drink and a bag of Doritos. They certainly cannot tolerate being hungry for MONTHS, which is what is necessary to lose weight. Not only is it difficult to endure the constant hunger pangs, but it is also taxing on one's concentration, mental faculties, psychological state, and self-discipline, which then affects one's capitulation to the cravings.

Another difficulty is that as one ages, people tend to be less active, hormones change, and metabolic activity decreases, and as a result, the body tends to pack on the pounds more easily. Stress (cortisol) tends to amplify this effect for many people.

A third snafu in losing weight is that it is practically impossible as long as one is consuming alcoholic beverages on any regular basis. Alcohol reduces one's inhibition and thus reduces one's ability to resist bingeing on carbs and junk food. And besides, alcohol contains a LOT of calories (see breakdown below).

- A standard 1.5 oz. shot of liquor contains about 100-120 calories.
- A 5 oz. glass of wine has 110-160 calories.
- A 12 oz. pint of beer has 150-250 calories.

So, if you are older, have little to no self-discipline, and you want to continue a more or less sedentary lifestyle and have a drink now and then (all of which describes most people), drugs are not only the easiest recourse, but are almost absolutely necessary for losing weight. Anything is considered better than utilizing brute willpower to endure hunger.

Enter GLP-1 Weight Loss Drugs, e.g. Ozempic, introduced in late 2023.

A Survey of GLP-1 Weight Loss Drugs

The New York Post article doesn't offer much transferable information about this new class of weight-loss drugs, so for the readers' benefit, I did a little research on it. Here's what I found.

GLP-1 Drugs

GLP-1 receptor agonists are designed to regulate Type 2 Diabetes and weight loss management. These drugs work by mimicking hormones released by the gut after eating, increasing insulin release, and reducing appetite.

GLP-1s are FDA-approved (if that counts for anything), and are generally considered lifelong medications, both for diabetes and weight loss, as many users regain weight after stopping.

Listed in order of popular use.

Active Ingredient: Semaglutide
Brand Names: Ozempic*, Wegovy, Rybelsus

Active Ingredient: Tirzepatide
Brand Names: Mounjaro*, Zepbound

Active Ingredient: Liraglutide
Brand Names: Victoza, Saxenda

Active Ingredient: Dulaglutide
Brand Names: Trulicity

Most of these drugs are once-a-week injections (Mounjaro*, Ozempic*, Trulicity, Wegovy), while Liraglutide and Rybelsus are daily.

Future Trends: Newer drugs in development, such as Orforglipron (oral) and Retatrutide, are expected to provide further options.

Side Effects: Common side effects include diarrhea, nausea, vomiting, and, of course, decreased appetite. Sexual side effects can include decreased desire, erection difficulties, and vaginal dryness, typically related to the body's natural response to calorie restriction.

 Predominantly used for regulating Type 2 Diabetes.*
 Predominantly used for chronic weight loss management.*
* Rybelsus is the only oral (pill) GLP-1 receptor agonist currently FDA approved.*

Note that fasting without the aid of weight-loss drugs produces a healthier, livelier appearance, seen in the overall constitution and especially in the eyes.

How GLP-1 Drugs Can Affect Libido

GLP-1 drugs trigger rapid weight loss, causing fatigue and/or changing hormones, either of which dampens brain reward signals and can decrease libido. However, some users experience a higher libido due to better metabolic health, improved self-image, and increased confidence.

The Key Impacts of GLP-1 drugs on Libido are as follows.

- Positive Physical Factors: Once a person loses a lot of weight, animated activity and exercise feel good again. Clothes fit. They can look in the mirror and feel confident about themselves instead of self-loathing. They are much more attractive and receive more positive attention, which is encouraging, motivating, and satisfying. That visual dopamine hit, coupled with decreased cortisol, can kick libido into overdrive for some people.
- Improved Self-Esteem: Many users report increased libido due to improved self-image, body confidence, and improved vascular health.
- Negative Physical Factors: Rapid weight loss due to sub-metabolic calorie intake can cause severe fatigue, shifting body chemistry into conservation and away from reproductive-related interests.
- Reduced Reward Seeking: GLP-1 agonists act on the brain to decrease appetite and hunger cravings, which may simultaneously reduce dopamine-driven reward signals for pleasure, including sexual desire.
- Sexual Dysfunction: Some studies report an increase in sexual disinterest, such as erectile dysfunction in men or difficulty reaching orgasm in both genders, similar to effects seen with other metabolic changes, restricted calorie consumption, and rapid weight loss.

Moreover, studies have had mixed results and do not offer any uniform conclusions. Although most all GLP-1 users report a flagging libido, some reports note that the libido-reducing effects can settle over time as the body adjusts, or that the net effect is positive for many users due to a more active lifestyle and improved health. Some report more sexual desire after weight loss.

There is, as of now, a paucity of high-quality studies specifically designed to examine how GLP-1s affect libido. Much of what is currently known comes from clinical experience rather than formal research data. IOW, GLP-1 users are guinea pigs in this respect.

I am inclined to believe that fasting without the aid of weight-loss drugs has a less deleterious effect on libido.

The New York Post Article

New York Post: We lost weight on GLP-1 drugs — and then we lost our sex drives (2026/2/26)

Summary: People say weight loss drugs like Semaglutide (Ozempic) and Tirzepatide (Mounjaro) have helped them lose weight — but it has also tanked their libidos. 3 case studies are offered.

The most obvious problem with the content of this article is that all the subjects are post-Wall or perimenopausal women. But after I studied this article, I thought… maybe that is the whole point — giving post-Wall Cougars a few more years to prowl the SMP, hence the title of this post, Extending Youth via Weight Loss Drugs. More on this in the Conclusions.

Another issue is the readability. The article is written to simulate a journey of discovery about how to lose weight via weight loss drugs while retaining sex drive — appealing to typical fleshly desires. As such, the article is written in a stream of consciousness style, and the information and the case subjects themselves are hard to track.

A third issue is that (I believe) the article is a subtle advertisement of weight loss drugs and other products and treatments, targeting mid-life individuals (who are probably the largest consumer group) who have heard about these drugs but are still sitting on the fence. Beware of Big Pharma!

In the case studies below, I have provided some relevant information and reorganized the content of the NYP article to help us analyze the issue more objectively. [Emphasis mine.]

Case Study 1: Christine Smith-Reed

Age: 50
Status: Married for 17 years (since age 33)
Note: Menopausal

> "Christine Smith-Reed had tried it all: a dietitian, grueling workouts, even weight-loss surgery in Mexico. Yet the pounds kept creeping up, and her body was becoming insulin resistant.
> So at 50, the salon owner from Columbia City, Oregon, turned to Tirzepatide, the active ingredient in GLP-1 drugs like Mounjaro and Zepbound, hoping to rein in her blood sugar and finally stabilize the scale.
> Ultimately, she got the body she wanted — but weight wasn't the only thing she lost.
> "All of a sudden, I couldn't care less about sex", Smith-Reed told The Post.
> Smith-Reed's sex life with her husband had ups and downs over their 17-year marriage — not uncommon for a long-term relationship. Usually, she was the one keeping things spicy — but after starting a GLP-1, her libido tanked.
> "I would participate, but I definitely wouldn't climax, or if I did, it took a lot of effort. And I feel guilty for that because it isn't due to poor performance on my husband's part", she said. "It's literally that something is wrong with me."

Oh, my! She had to do ¡Work! to make herself cum! That's NOT 'Fun'. Oh Noes!

> "The problem went beyond the bedroom.
> "When you go from having a very active sex life to having a nonexistent sex life, there was a lot of silence", Smith-Reed said. "There were cold shoulders. There were hurt feelings — probably from both of us."

So without regular diddling, her relationship dried up to nothing. I think that's pretty typical within our Sex-Centric culture, unfortunately.

> "For Smith-Reed, relief came in the form of a synthetic peptide known as PT141, also called Bremelanotide. It stimulates the central nervous system, targeting the brain's melanocortin receptors to activate sexual desire and arousal.
> The FDA approved Bremelanotide in 2019 to treat hypoactive sexual desire disorder in premenopausal women, though it's sometimes used off-label for men experiencing erectile dysfunction.
> After she gave herself the first shot, Reed-Smith's libido flickered back to life.
> "It's not like [my sex drive] went into overdrive, but I had no problem achieving orgasm. And that happened more than once", she said. "It was like coming up for air when you've been drowning. Like I'm not broken."

Thank God! Her orgasms are 'Fun' again! Whew! We almost had another bitter Karen!

> "Smith-Reed, however, has no plans to quit [taking Tirzepatide].
> "I would rather be in this [thinner] body than be sexually active", she said. "What does that say about me? I don't know."

I know. See my Conclusions below.

> "Even so, she hopes other women facing similar challenges don't turn that frustration inward.
> "I want every woman to know that they aren't broken. It's because a medication has a side effect, and like any > other side effect, it doesn't affect everyone", Smith-Reed said. "But if it does, understand that you have not lost something. There are ways you can come back from it."

In her view, women who can't cum easily and often at the mere urgent stroke of an erectile glans are 'broken', and GLP-1 drugs can 'break' fatties (in this view). Oooh!

Lest we forget, the Manosphere has a vastly different and more practical concept of what makes a woman 'broken'.

Case Study 2: C. J. Rock

Age: 47
Status: Engaged
Note: Perimenopausal

C. J. Rock compared her experience with weight loss before and after taking GLP-1 drugs.

> "In the past, if I had lost weight, I got a self-esteem boost, which is almost like dopamine. It makes you crave sex more", the 47-year-old explained. But when she started taking Tirzepatide, her libido dropped."

Oh Noes!

> "She lost 70 pounds in seven months and was feeling good in her skin. But when her fiancé tried the moves that used to turn her on, her body didn't respond.
> "My sex drive was normal [before taking the drug]. Two or three times a week, I had the craving and the desire", she said — but then [after taking Tirzepatide], suddenly, it was gone.
> "I was almost numb to [sexual stimulation]", she said. "There would be nights where I'd wonder what was wrong with me."

Again, we see this sex-centric value paradigm. She thinks she's 'broken' if she can't get turned on and get off.

Middle-aged broad with tattoos in a neon yellow bikini, wanting to get sexxxy and get herself off. OMG, please spare me the eye bleach! TMI!!!

> "For Rock, the answer was patience. "Once I'd been on the drug for a while, my sex drive did come back, but I wouldn't say it's super strong", she said. "I think my body just kind of got used to the drug and adjusted eventually."
> But for Rock, one thing was clear: "[GLP-1 drugs] do work."
> "For years and years and years I lived in a world where it was always 'someday,' 'I'll do it when…,' but now that's today", she said. "It gave me my life back."

Question: What exactly gave her her 'life' back? Was it becoming thin and attractive again, and thus being able to draw Attention, or was it being able to bust her backside in the bedroom with her significant other? Male readers will be disappointed with the answer (given in the Conclusions).

Case Study 3: Nathalia Souza

Age: 37
Status: Married
Note 1: Post-Wall, pre-menopausal
Note 2: Souza's case illustrates that the changes in libido aren't limited to women navigating menopause.

> "Nathalia Souza, a 37-year-old from New Jersey, started taking Tirzepatide after three years of dieting and exercising resulted in just 30 pounds of weight loss.
> In the seven months since starting the medication, Souza has dropped another 22 pounds — and overall, she calls the experience a success. But there was one unexpected downside.
> "I had a very high sex drive, and probably two months in, I noticed I had no desire anymore", Souza said."

OMG! NOT Again! Will GLP-1 create another sexually frustrated Karen?

> "The change was stark. Before the drug, she and her husband were having sex four or five times a week.
> "Five months in, I didn't even want my husband to come near me", Souza said. "Like 'No, stop, I don't even want to kiss you.'"

Well, perhaps he came somewhere else.

> "The abrupt shift in Souza's sex drive left her shaken, making her question whether the weight-loss drug was worth it.
> "It kind of numbs you", she said. "I want to feel normal again."

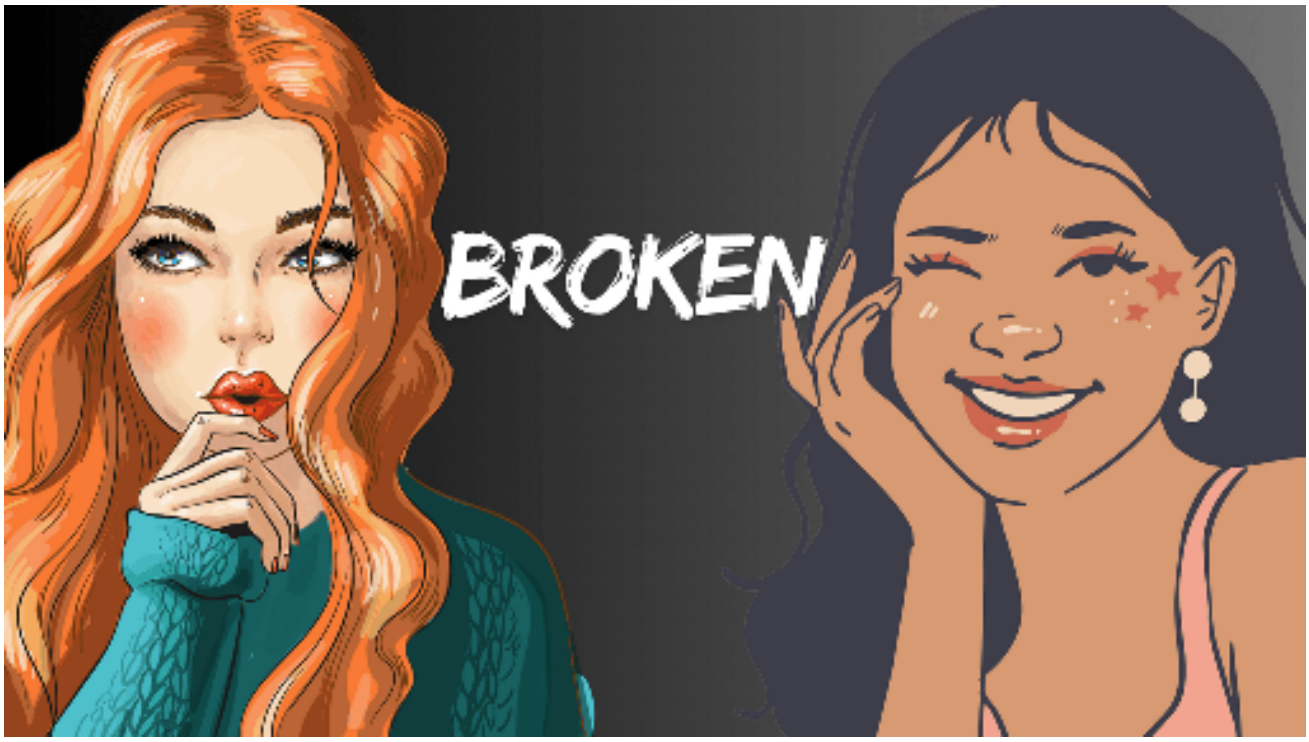
Once again, she thinks she's 'broken' if she can't get whacked off. Sex is the be-all, end game of their whole lives. It would be different if these broads viewed satisfying sex as an indicator of a healthy marital relationship, but no, for them, it's all about getting off.



However… Souza has a rare sense of responsibility to her husband (or rather, to her source of emotional and financial security).

> "This is where I draw the line", she said. "I'm not losing my marriage over this."
> Before giving up on the meds, she stocked up on supplements — vitamin D, magnesium, creatine, and maca root — but nothing worked.
> Then she discovered URO Vaginal Moisture & Mood, a daily supplement formulated to support natural lubrication, mood, stress relief, and arousal. Within a few weeks, Souza started feeling a change.
> Souza plans to discontinue Tirzepatide once she reaches her goal weight and try to maintain it on her own."

Whew! Another Karen formation is narrowly avoided, thanks to drugs that counteracted the side effects of other drugs. We live in a drugged-up nation.

Jack's Conclusions

From the NYP article, in total, we see 3 middle-aged women drugging themselves up in a lazy effort to be as thin, attractive, and horny as possible, essentially extending their youth via weight loss drugs and other medications to fine-tune the results.

All 3 women in the case studies took Tirzepatide and experienced a reduced libido. That's not a good report on Tirzepatide. So if you or your bedmate are looking to conduct a guinea pig experiment on yourself with GLP-1 drugs, try something else.

Perimenopause is known to reduce estrogen and testosterone in women, and thus, their libidinous desire. However, the two menopausal case studies above, Reed-Smith and Rock, seem to be much hornier than most other women their age, defying this eventuality. Or maybe they're simply looking to extend the joyous jiggles for as long as possible. Nevertheless, making the transition from having a very high sex drive to no desire at all after taking GLP-1 drugs was an unexpected snafu in their sex lives that was more than they could accept.

The article mentioned that their menopause transition posed a significant challenge to Reed-Smith and C. J. Rock, who had to untangle the overlapping effects of aging, hormones, menopause, and GLP-1 drugs on their libido by adding a witches' brew of medications to counteract the libido-killing effects of Tirzepatide. They lamented that Big Pharma $ucking doctors focus on weight loss and didn't give much attention to the side effect of losing equally important libido, nor did they offer much advice about how to deal with the flagging sex drive. As Rock said, "It's just so confusing, like picking your poison."

Somebody needs to tell them that doctors make money off of selling them drugs, and are less motivated to help them heave hoe.

The way the article is written, as well as a few others I've seen on this topic, makes me believe the current GLP-1 craze is NOT "just" about losing weight in the interest of maintaining physical fitness and good health as one ages past menopause, but specifically for losing weight to stay sexually desirable and also sexually functional in the SMP, and for as long as one is able to, and as much as one can as one ages. And why all the trouble? Ultimately, it's NOT "just" to enhance one's sexual attractiveness either, but to enhance one's sexual attractiveness such that women can continue to attract Attention as well as the most sexually attractive bedmates that their aging, infertile, sagging, wrinkled body can attract, and/or to sustain the 'romance' and randy orgasms of youth for a few more years. From these case studies, I am led to believe there exists an idol / god of female Tingle tantrums and mind-blowing orgasms, as this would definitely explain the priorities demonstrated here.

Weighty wives might also want to lose weight to demonstrate their love for God (as if… heh) by loving their bodies, and also to keep their bored hubbies interested, but because men's interests are moot, this was not mentioned in the NYP article.

There is one caveat, and this is a conjecture based on my own observations, so YMMV. Extremely libidinous women tend to stick with one man because they need regular servicing, and they can't endure a sexual drought for any period of time. So they choose surety over variety rather early in life, and/or they tend to stay with their relationships long-term. All 3 case studies above appear to support this theory, although they all arrived at this conclusion belatedly (due to feminism's emphasis on postponing marriage).

However, Christine Smith-Reed and C. J. Rock both made statements to the effect that they would rather be thin and attractive than to have a satisfying sex life. That says mountains about how important Attention is to women, even post-menopause. Only Souza, relatively younger, married, and horny as hell (needing to get rammed 4-5 times a week at age 37!!!), was more concerned about the effects on her marriage. I was surprised about this, because before I read this article, I believed that most "girls just wanna have fun", i.e., get off on sex AMAP, no matter what their SMV. But here we find that, for these women at least, Attention and the sense of security that comes of having options, trump regular d!ck!ng and Bedroom Fun (but not by much).

Finally, we know that sex is central to a good marital relationship, but for some people, libido is about all they've got to hold their relationship together. When sex drive goes south during endocrinal winters, the whole relationship sinks. This appears to be the case for Smith-Reed and Souza. C. J. Rock didn't seem to care too much, one way or the other, which is even worse, IMO.

Intro

While reading the comments under Extending Youth via Weight Loss Drugs (2026/4/3), I saw that rontomlinson2, DeepStrength, Sharkly, and I all have different mental concepts about how diet and weight loss work.

DeepStrength mentioned the Food Reward Hypothesis, which describes how eating 'rewards' the brain with a sense of satiety via dopamine, thus driving habits. In turn, habits affect dopamine pathways and how we experience desire and satiety, thereby forming a feedback loop.

I looked into this and found it so interesting that I spent most of the weekend studying this topic and related topics, and writing this post and the next.

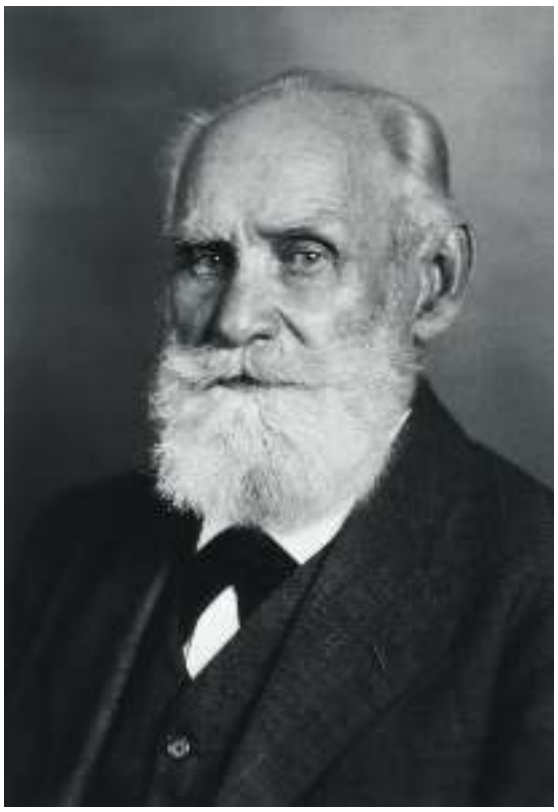
In this essay, we'll take a look at how the behavior-reward cycle functions, and how it affects contextualized behaviors, as described in 4 ¡Sc!əNt!f!c! hypotheses / theories.

1. The Reward Hypothesis
2. The Food Reward Hypothesis
3. The Reward Deficiency Theory
4. The Reward Competition Hypothesis

I'll also cover Reward Suppression and other caveats and some thoughts about how this relates to faith.

In the next essay, I'll use these hypotheses to explain how women's behavioral habits change with respect to sociosexual context and why their behaviors change throughout their life cycles.

Overview



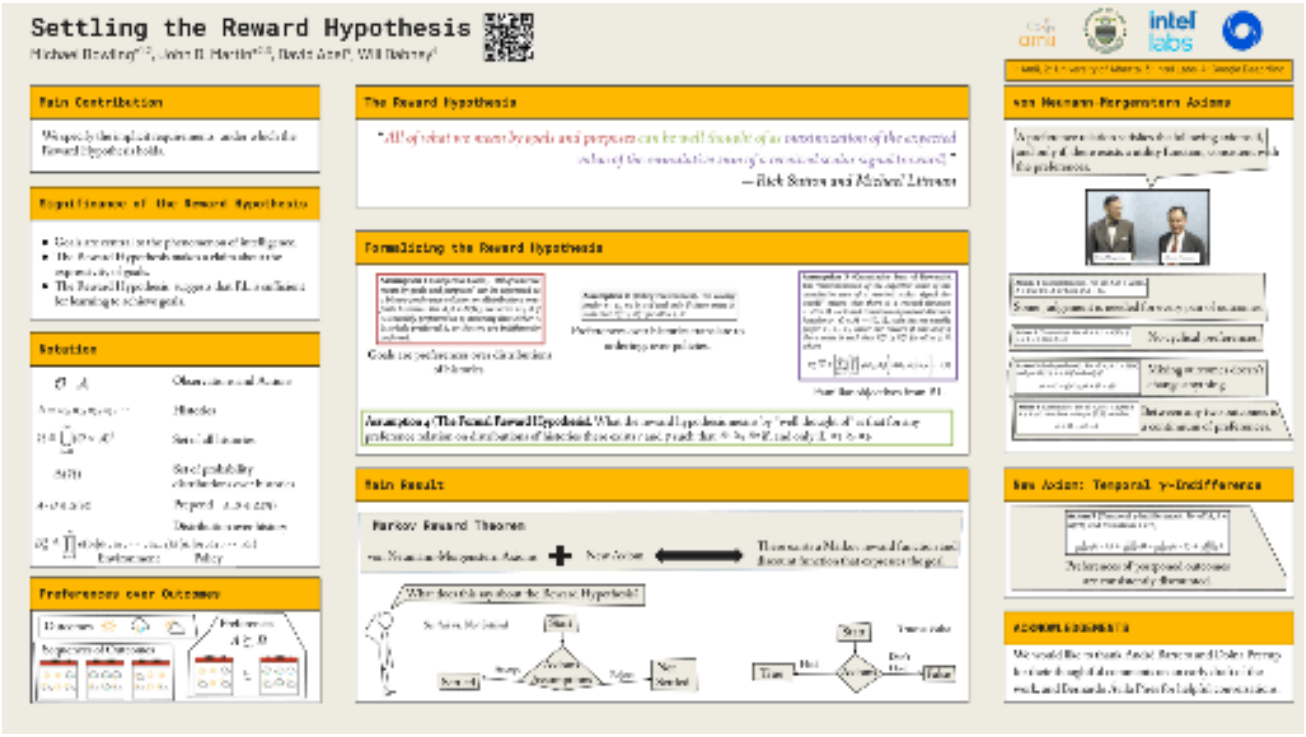
Ivan Pavlov (1849-1936) was studying the eating behavior of dogs in the 1890s when he first observed what is now known as Classical Conditioning.
The field of Behavioral Psychology originated in the 1890s, crossed into Learning Psychology in the 1920s, branched into a separate field of Radical Behaviorism in the 1950s, and has been periodically revisited since then, depending on new developments in research methods and new findings in neurological chemistry. There was a renewed interest in the 2000s, and a burst of research interest in recent years. The recent research on Human Neural Learning and Reward mechanisms is intense and well-funded because it is widely regarded as a fundamental and thus a limiting factor in the development of AI.

Behaviorism, Conditioning, Learning, and Reward Psychology has come a long way since Pavlov, Thorndike, Watson, and Skinner introduced the fundamental principles. Currently, this field is vast, multi-disciplinary, and complex, making it hard to take it all in. Hopefully, this survey captures the essential points of current activity.

The Reward Hypothesis

In behavioral psychology, the Reward Hypothesis [1], as formulated by Prof. Richard Sutton in 2004 and expanded by many others, posits that "all of what we mean by goals and purposes can be well thought of as maximization of the expected value of the cumulative sum of a received scalar signal (reward)", meaning that most habits in general are (probably mostly subconsciously) geared towards obtaining some type of reward, and that we are driven to act in ways that maximize that which is most rewarding to us. Read more here.

The things that provide psychosomatic Rewards via dopamine are almost endless. However, there are a small number of prevalent and prominent Reward mechanisms that strongly and widely apply to all humans. These mechanisms include such things as attention, comfort, food, intimacy, love, security, sex, etc. Also included are various addictions. In fact, it is this same Reward feedback loop that forms and reinforces addictions.



The Food Reward Hypothesis

The Food Reward Hypothesis is a specific application of the Reward Hypothesis and describes the phenomenon in which tasty foods (i.e., “comfort food”, high-calorie food, junk food, processed food, etc.) provide chemical “Rewards” to the brain.

Research studies have attempted to understand how this reward mechanism functions and to predict how it might cause one to be more likely to overeat. It has been found that…

- People who regularly consume high-reward-value foods (e.g. high-calorie foods, carbs, and deep-fried foods, especially foods that are fatty, oily, salty, and sugary) are at a higher risk of obesity.
- Palatable foods activate the same dopamine pathways as drugs of abuse, creating addictive-like eating behaviors.
- Dopamine is more strongly associated with “wanting” (craving) than “liking” (enjoying) food, which explains why people often continue to eat or crave certain foods without truly enjoying them.
- The brain rewards obtained from eating high-reward-value food are strongly motivated (comparable to addictions) and can override the body’s homeostatic natural satiety signals, causing individuals to binge, overeat, and/or consume more calories than are needed for metabolism, leading to excessive weight gain.
- People who regularly consume healthy foods (e.g., fish, fruits, milk, and vegetables) and bland foods (like beans, oatmeal, nuts, and tofu) are much less likely to overeat.
- Overweight individuals are more likely to lose weight on these types of diets (IF they can overcome their addiction to high-reward foods).
- One of the challenges of losing weight is resetting the brain’s food reward mechanism to be satisfied with eating healthy food, rather than depending on sugar high addictions.
- Decreasing the consumption of high-reward-value foods over time leads to one becoming less addicted to carbfests, sugar highs, and prepackaged junk foods.

The Food Reward Hypothesis also proposes that (1) modern diets comprised predominantly of high-calorie, highly palatable, and processed food, as well as (2) the ubiquitous availability of foods specifically engineered to be high-reward (e.g., Doritos), overstimulate the brain’s reward system and create dopamine pathways similar to addiction, and are thus the primary drivers of the obesity epidemic.

The Reward Deficiency Theory

The Reward Deficiency Theory, developed by Kenneth Blum in 1996, posits that…

1. We engage in a behavior until we are satisfied with the reward. For example, we eat until we feel gratified, and we stop eating when hunger abates or we feel full.
2. Addictive, compulsive, and impulsive behaviors stem from a genetic or acquired deficiency in the brain's reward system, resulting in a blunting of perception, possibly due to deficient serotonin. Specifically, a hypodopaminergic state (low dopamine function) leads to reduced pleasure from natural rewards, driving individuals to seek more intense stimulation through food, substances, or risky activities to gain satiety.
3. People who struggle with addictive, compulsive, and impulsive behaviors do so because they do not feel satisfied with normal habits and routines, but require a larger emphasis on obtaining certain rewards in order to gain satisfaction. This is called Reward Deficiency Syndrome (RDS).

A few examples of how this theory may be applied to different cases…

- Alcoholics are not satisfied with spending time with friends and drinking until they're relaxed and tipsy; they must binge drink themselves into a psychosis, or until they're totally wasted, to feel satisfied, with or without friends present.
- People who habitually overeat and become obese do so because they do not feel satisfied with eating healthy food, or only limited portions of food, etc., but require large amounts of 'tasty' food to feel satiety.
- When framed in the Food Reward Hypothesis, a long-held habit of overeating high-reward food has conditioned a person's brain NOT to be satisfied with modest portions of healthy food.

This theory is only a few years old, and the details of how this relates to neural chemistry (i.e., dopamine pathways) in different contexts (see next 2 sections) are complex and not very clear at this point. However, this theory appears to have credence and may be applicable to many other types of behavioral pathologies, habitual addictions, and substance abuse disorders, including:

Prof. Richard Sutton

- Severe Depression
- Personality Disorders
- Compulsive Gambling
- Food Addiction and Obesity
- Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD)
- Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD)
- Substance Abuse Disorder (addiction to drugs/alcohol)

To extrapolate this theory beyond what is covered in the ¡Sc!əNt!f!c! literature (as of 2026/4), I expect that other habitual and addictive behaviors could also be explained by this theory, such as…

- Attention Wh0res are not satisfied with normal social relations with people they love and trust, but are driven to receive constant, profuse Attention / Validation from anyone, anytime, anywhere, and anyway they can.
- P0rn addicts cannot, due to desensitization (in place of a lack of satiety), be aroused via normal sexual relations with a woman, and must view a variety of P0rn to maintain an erection and perform sexually.

The Reward Competition Hypothesis

The Reward Competition Hypothesis [2] generally refers to a set of neurochemical and psychological frameworks suggesting that autonomous control, cognitive attention, and decision-making emerge from a competition between neural representations of potential actions or outcomes, and is heavily biased by expected / predicted rewards.

In this hypothesis, behavior is not merely a reaction to stimuli but the outcome of a constant competition between different potential actions (called ‘affordances’ in the literature) and the possible rewards thereof that are presented in the environment. The competition between these potential actions is strongly biased by internal neural systems, specifically the dopamine system, which evaluates predicted rewards.

This hypothesis observes that, in complex environments woven with multiple, often conflicting, opportunities, the brain must choose from among these and decide on a direction of action. It is posited that this selection is made by prioritizing the action associated with the highest expected reward.

In simple words, it means that people will direct their attention and mold their behavior around whatever action gives them the most bang for the buck. If opportunity abounds and the reward is satisfying, then we pursue more of that thing. If opportunity is limited, or the reward is less satisfying than something else, then we will expend more effort to pursue the other thing.

Reward Suppression and Other Caveats

People do not always pursue whatever action or behavior maximizes 'rewards' over time. Thus, there are several confounding caveats to the Reward Hypothesis, the Reward Deficiency Theory, and the Reward Competition Hypothesis, including…

- Attribution Errors: People assume that certain effects are caused by specific behaviors, or that certain actions lead to desired rewards, when, in fact, there is no such connection.
- Optimistic Bias: In humans, this involves overestimating the probability of a positive reward, leading to potential "false positives" in subjective expectation.
- False Positives: A phenomenon in which the brain receives pleasure / high reward signals from harmful behaviors or situations, leading to maladaptive learning and "evil" behaviors, such as exhibiting harmful intentions in different contexts to achieve the reward.
- Positive Prediction Error: (Related to False Positives.) Dopamine neurons signal when a reward is better than expected; if this signal is triggered by a "false" positive event, the agent will unnecessarily reinforce that behavior.
- Reward Hacking: (Related to False Positives.) The agent maximizes the reward signal by finding flaws in the environment rather than directly pursuing fulfilling behavior.
- Is Reward 'Hyper' or 'Hypo'? Impulsivity theories suggest addiction arises from a hyperactive reward system, whereas RDS posits that the reward system is actually underactive (hypoactive). Both theories have clinical support. So in treatment, it is unclear whether "dopamine detoxification" or using specialized neuropharmacological medications, respectively, would be more appropriate and beneficial for balancing brain chemistry.
- Rational Intelligence: Sutton explained that agents are capable of setting goals that might not immediately maximize reward but would serve a more significant, long-term purpose.
- Purpose-Based Motivation: (Related to Rational Intelligence.) Higher-order life forms possess the capability to suppress a perceived reward competition in favor of attaining a certain outcome [3]. For example, if a high-reward item (such as food for a hungry animal) is present but is not the main goal (e.g., immediate safety from a predator), the brain may actively suppress this reward-associated distraction if it interferes with the primary goal. This explains why some animals are capable of evading baited traps, and (I believe) why some men are able to resist lust, P0rn, simping, etc., while others are not. An acute demonstration of this capability in humans is the Marshmallow Test [4]. (See an explanation in the video below, and also described towards the end of this post).

Opponents of the above Reward theories argue that rigorous conclusions cannot be attained because it is impossible to remove all of the above caveats with absolute certainty.

Jack's Notes

From a Christian viewpoint, it must be recognized that all these hypotheses and theories describe human neurochemical and psychological conditions, and are thus a description of human nature, instincts, or pathology, depending on the context, or in Biblical terms, the fleshly (sin) nature. A mature Christian faith should allow the believer to have a wider perspective about these natural inclinations, integrate them into his identity, and submit these desires to the Lord's will (c.f. Reward Suppression), in order to maintain self-control and fulfill his overall purpose in life.

I'll build on all these hypotheses in the next post.

Intro

In the previous essay, A Survey of Psychological Action-Reward Theories (2026/4/6), I offered a brief summary of 4 ¡Sc!əNt!f!c! theories that examine how the dopamine-fueled Behavior-Reward cycle functions and how it affects contextualized behaviors.

These 4 theories included:

1. The Reward Hypothesis
2. The Food Reward Hypothesis
3. The Reward Deficit Theory
4. The Reward Competition Hypothesis

In this essay, I'll use all these hypotheses to explain how women's sociosexual behaviors change with respect to their specific sociosexual status and why these behaviors change throughout their life cycles.

The next post reviews several memetic archetypes, and explains how they relate to The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis.

A Summary of Reward Mechanisms

To briefly review our previous exploration of 4 current theories in behavioral psychology…

- The Reward Hypothesis posits that basically (my abbreviated paraphrase), "all goals and purposes can be thought of as a maximization of the expected value of the cumulative sum of a received reward", meaning that most habits in general are (probably mostly subconsciously) geared towards obtaining some type of neurological 'Reward', and that we are driven to act in ways that maximize that which is most rewarding to us.
- The Food Reward Hypothesis is a specific application of The Reward Hypothesis and describes the phenomenon in which tasty foods (i.e., "comfort food", high-calorie food, junk food, processed food, etc.) provide a spike of chemical 'Rewards' to the brain, which often leads people to eat more of these foods than what is healthy.
- The Reward Deficit Theory posits that we engage in a behavior until we are satisfied with the reward. For example, we eat until we feel gratified, and we stop eating when hunger abates or we feel full.
- The Reward Competition Hypothesis observes that, in complex environments woven with multiple, and often conflicting, opportunities, the brain must choose from among the 'Rewards' available and decide on a direction of action. It is posited that this selection is made by prioritizing the action associated with the greatest or highest expected 'Reward'.

In sum, people will direct their attention and mold their behavior around whatever actions yield the most satiating kickback for the effort invested. Thus, if opportunity abounds and the 'Reward' is satisfying, then we pursue more of that thing until we are satiated. If opportunity is limited, or the 'Reward' is less satisfying than something else, then we will expend more effort to pursue the other thing.

The things that provide psychosomatic 'Rewards' via dopamine are almost endless. However, there are a small number of prevalent and prominent 'Reward' mechanisms that strongly and widely apply to all humans. These mechanisms include such things as acceptance, attention, comfort, food, intimacy, love, security, sex, validation, etc. Also included are various addictions (e.g. alcohol, drugs, junk food, P0rn, illicit sex, etc.). In fact, it is this same 'Reward' feedback loop that forms and reinforces addictions (described in more detail in the previous post).

The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis

A comprehensive juxtaposition of The Reward Hypothesis, The Food Reward Hypothesis, The Reward Deficit Theory, and The Reward Competition Hypothesis yields the following explanation of women's sociosexual behaviors, which I'll call The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis.

This is my own hypothesis drawn from the above theories and Red Pill knowledge. I doubt that any stringent research will ever be done on this, due to the offensive nature of the subject.

The Manosphere has long noted that when women are young and attractive, their goals and habits are geared towards Attention seeking behaviors, AKA Attention Wh0r!ng.

It has also been observed that Attention Wh0res are not satisfied with normal social relations with people they love and trust, but are driven to receive constant, profuse Attention / Validation from practically anyone, anytime, anywhere (aside from grossly unattractive men), which constitutes a psychological addiction. They will continue these habits for as long as they can, and in doing so, they will forfeit many other choices that might be better for them in the long run, such as early marriage, sexual monogamy, and investing themselves in one good man, rather than riding the carousel.

But … as women age, their looks fade, their sexual desirability decreases, and thus, the intensity of 'Rewards' associated with receiving Attention decreases. At some point, they'll find something else that gives them a greater stimulative 'Reward' for the invested effort, notably Self-Indulgence, i.e., eating and lazing, and so when The Wall forces them to give up their Attention Wh0ring ways, their next best option is a life of laxity and leisure.

In this view, there are two major Habit → Reward pathways that seem to explain the vast majority of women's behavior and appearance, and the changes thereof as they age and/or go through various life stages.

1. Attention Reward: Actions and habits are geared towards maximizing Attention and all the things that usually accompany it. Women will engage in very costly, grueling, painful, punishing, and time-consuming behaviors in order to draw more Attention from those she perceives as taller, better hung, higher status, higher quality, or more important, and also to compete against peers for prime Attention. These behaviors include such things as cosmetic surgeries, strenuous workout routines, strict dieting, time and $$$ spent shopping for clothing and cosmetics, wearing attractive but uncomfortable clothing (high heels, tight-fitting clothing, etc.), and hours spent doing hair, makeup, and skin treatments every day, and so on.

2. Self-Indulgence Reward: Actions and habits are geared towards maximizing various comforts, conveniences, and personal pleasures, and notably to this discussion, cultivating a dopamine addiction for eating high-'Reward' foods. These behaviors include such things as NOT engaging in the more punishing behaviors associated with Attention Seeking (mentioned above), as well as being hypoagentic, lazy, and, in particular, indulging in comfort foods (e.g. Ben & Jerry's ice cream, snack foods, etc.) and overeating.

In sum, the Attention Reward path requires women to enhance sexually marketable traits, such as youth, fecundity, good genes, etc., in order to maximize Attention, whereas the Self-Indulgence path requires $$$, compliant husbands, servant-minded Beta Orbiters, and White Knights in order to accommodate hypoagency and laziness. Either way, women will pick and choose among the best opportunities available to them, and choose those options that maximize 'Rewards'.

Furthermore, the relative intensity of each 'Reward' path is a function of age and SMV.

- Attractive women, thinner women, and younger women obtain greater 'Rewards' from Attention.
- Unattractive women, overweight women, and older women obtain more 'Rewards' from Self-Indulgence.

I believe most women strongly prefer Attention over Self-Indulgence. However, it should be noted that the amount of energy, time, and work required to harvest Attention 'Rewards' (described above) is much greater than what is needed to obtain Self-Indulgent 'Rewards'. So in the absence of profuse and readily obtainable Attention, women will stop doing the hard work to maintain their looks and default to Self-Indulgence.

This explains why more attractive women prioritize cultivating traits that draw Attention and Affirmation, and are thus more conservative and family-minded, while less attractive women tend to pursue goals that support Self-Indulgence, and thereby become careerists and feminists.

Of course, there are many other Habit → Reward pathways going on. (One other noteworthy Habit → Reward pathway that is prevalent among women is Control, via The Curse of Eve, described in Genesis 3:16. Others include the hypergamy-fueled pursuit of Tingles and the assiduous avoidance of things like accountability, agency, guilt, and shame.) But here, I've identified Attention and Self-Indulgence as major contributors to female behavior, and omitted others for the sake of simplifying this hypothetical model. To obtain a more accurate, more individualized theoretical model, this general model can be retrofitted with additional 'Reward' functions on a case-by-case basis for individual women.

Closing Statements

This hypothesis fully explains why many, if not most, women have a sudden transition upon commitment / marriage from being attractive, good-looking, and thin, to being rather unattractive, unkempt, and overweight. The reason is that aging, monogamous commitment, and marriage erode the satisfaction obtained from Attention, causing women to depend more upon self-centered interests to obtain a sense of well-being.

This relatively abrupt transition is the substance of countless archetypal memes. The next post contains several of these memes, with explanations of how they relate to The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis.

Intro

In a previous essay, I offered a brief survey of 4 ¡Sc!əNt!f!c! theories that examine how the dopamine-fueled Behavior-Reward cycle functions and how it affects contextualized behaviors.

These 4 theories included:

1. The Reward Hypothesis
2. The Food Reward Hypothesis
3. The Reward Deficit Theory
4. The Reward Competition Hypothesis

In this essay, I'll explain how all these hypotheses relate to several memetic archetypes of how women's sociosexual behaviors change with respect to their specific sociosexual status and why these behaviors change throughout their life cycles.

A Summary of Reward Mechanisms and The Attention Reward vs Indulgence

(Food) Reward Hypothesis

In sum of our previous exploration of 4 current theories in behavioral psychology (listed above), people will direct their attention and shape their behavior around whatever actions yield the greatest 'Rewards' for the effort invested. If opportunity abounds and the 'Reward' is satisfying, then we pursue more of that thing. If opportunity is limited, or the 'Reward' is less satisfying than something else, then we will expend more effort to pursue the other thing.

A comprehensive juxtaposition of these Hypotheses with Red Pill lore yields a general explanation of women's sociosexual behaviors, which I've called The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis. This hypothesis states that women will pursue Attention during their youth, because it is the most Rewarding. But as women age and the intensity of the 'Rewards' associated with receiving Attention decreases, they will find something else that gives them a greater stimulative 'Reward' requiring less invested effort, notably Self-Indulgence, i.e., eating and lazing.

Furthermore, the amount of energy, time, and work required to harvest Attention 'Rewards' (described above) is much greater than what is needed to obtain Self-Indulgence 'Rewards' ($$$, servant Beta Orbiters, and White Knights). So in the absence of profuse and readily obtainable Attention, women will default to Self-Indulgence.

Women will abruptly transition from one 'Reward' paradigm to another, and this metamorphosis is the substance of countless archetypal memes. Several of these humorous memes are displayed below, with explanations of how they relate to The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis.

The Lazy Girlfriend

When a young woman is (ostensibly) "single", she tends to focus on maximizing the Attention she may receive, and therefore adopts a wide array of habits that she perceives will lead to this end, such as LooksMaxxing, clubbing, "Girl's Night Out", going to parties, maintaining an online presence (FB, IG, OF, X, YT), and traveling, as well as denying any past or present relationship commitments or involvement, identifying as Christian / conservative, lying about N-count, etc.

But when a girl has a steady boyfriend (and everyone knows it, so she can't deny it), she expects to be pampered and pedestalized by him, so her habits shift into a hypoagentic Easy Mode, which is essentially Self-Indulgence.

But when they break up, she reverts back to Attention-Seeking Mode in order to attract more Attention, more men, and optimize her mating opportunities, per hypergamy (much to the bitter disappointment of the ex-boyfriend).

If the boyfriend is a Ch@d with many options, she will be more motivated to keep herself fit and in good form, not just for the Attention per se, but to compete against her peers for his Attention and social relevance.

But aside from this, most women won't put in the effort to maintain Attention-Mode unless they're receiving beaucoup hardcore Attention from the masses. Attention from one non-Ch@d boyfriend just won't Tingulate her enough for her to make this effort. If they can't actively explore their opportunities for garnering Attention from multiple men for whatever reason (e.g., aging, busyness, commitment, location, obesity, work, ugliness, etc.), then they'll prefer Easy Mode.

The Lazy Wife

In general, a woman who hopes to be a wife must be attractive, good-looking, and thin enough to catch a husband and stick the landing. However, we're all familiar with how wives predictably undergo a sudden transition from being a beautiful bride to being rather overweight, unattractive, and unkempt. This behavior almost always gets worse after they have a child. They blame this on the stress of having children, and how childbirth wrecks their bodies, but it's all cope, an excuse for indulging in Easy Mode. (I know from living in Asia that women can recover a thin, fit body within months after giving birth — IF they want to.)

White women hit the wall sometime in their early 30s, some sooner, some later. Then, because Attention dries up around this time, they morph into Self-Indulgent Easy-Mode, as described in the previous post.

A public commitment to a (supposedly) monogamous relationship, as in the Lazy Girlfriend above or especially marriage, accelerates this transition because it abruptly removes them from the SMP, and provides moral and social incentives (e.g., guilt, shame) to crimp their Attention-Seeking behaviors.

Without the 'Rewards' associated with pursuing and receiving Attention, their interest in maintaining the difficult habits thereof will decrease, and they will find other things that give them a greater 'Reward' for the effort invested, notably Self-Indulgence, i.e., eating and lazing. This fully explains why many, if not most, women tend to "let themselves go" after marriage. "Letting themselves go" is a euphemism for Self-Indulgent Easy Mode, and for most women, it is very self-centered.

This hypothesis fully explains why many, if not most, women have a sudden transition upon commitment / marriage from being attractive, good-looking, and thin, to being overweight, unattractive, and unkempt.

Asian Women

Last, but not least…

As described above, White women hit The Wall sometime in their 30s, some sooner, some later, and then morph into Easy-Mode.

However, Asian women are known for maintaining a youthful appearance well into late middle age, due to thicker skin having fewer wrinkles, more adipose tissue underlying the skin resulting in smoother skin, and more melanin in their skin, which tends to reduce the effects of UV light on aging. So it is relatively easier for Asian women to prioritize Attention-Seeking and still have good results and satisfying 'Rewards' until much later in life (compared to White women).

Nevertheless, "The Wall Remains Undefeated", as it is often said in the Manosphere, except that for Asian women, menopause is The Great Wall of China that no Asian lass may pass, after which, they morph into stout helicopter grannies.

The Correlation between a Wife Gaining / Losing Weight and Cheating / Divorce

More on how women's appearance and behavior can be fully explained by Action-Reward Theories.

Have you ever noticed any of the following sequences of events occurring very often?

1. Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats → Divorce
2. Husband Cheats → Wife Loses Weight
3. Wife Loses Weight → Wife Cheats / Divorces
4. Divorce → Ex-Wife Loses Weight

Or some combination of the above sequences, most often appearing as…

- Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats (or shames the Wife) → Wife Loses Weight → Wife Cheats / Divorces
- Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats (or shames the Wife) → Wife Divorces → Ex-Wife Loses Weight → Ex-Wife Returns to the Carousel

Some variation of this basic recipe is more common than what anyone cares to admit.

In this post, I'll review 4 case studies and describe how this phenomenon relates to The Attention Reward vs Indulgence (Food) Reward Hypothesis, which basically states that…

- When Attention is profuse and readily obtainable, women will do the hard work of garnering more of it.
- In the absence of profuse and readily obtainable Attention, women will default to Self-Indulgence, get fat, and become lazy.

This hypothesis fully explains why many, if not most, women have a sudden transition upon commitment / marriage from being attractive, good-looking, and thin, to being overweight, unattractive, and unkempt.

But it doesn't end there. This post will explain the consequences on the marriage, and it's NOT good!

Survey of Stories

It's so easy to find articles like these, and for every story published, there are probably 10 more IRL that aren't in the yellow journalism.

In this essay, I'll cover the following 4 stories. Readers will notice the similarities to the model.

1. Daily Mail: Woman whose cheating husband called her 'fat girl' and blamed her weight for his affair loses NINE STONE and ditches him (and now he says she looks 'hot') (2015/12/8)
2. Daily Mail: New mother loses 100lbs after discovering how her cheating husband and his lover called her fat behind her back (2016/12/30)
3. People: After Breaking Up with Her Cheating Boyfriend, This Woman Lost Almost Half Her Size (2019/5/24)
4. The New York Post: My husband cheated on me, so I got the best revenge (2022/3/10)

Not sure about the details in any of these stories (as articles like these are always written from a subjective gynocentric perspective, and all the informative, sensitive, RP relevant information is not reported), but in general, these cases all describe runaway Self-Indulgence, AKA "letting herself go", where the GF / wife was too ignorant, or too naive, or too self-centered to foresee the consequences that abandoning her attractiveness and pursuing Self-Indulgence would have on her marriage / LTR, and/or they were too lazy to do anything about it — until the BF / husband checks out and checks in with another woman, and/or shame kicks in to hold her accountable.

Runaway Self-Indulgence amounts to marital fraud, and it is a sin that brings consequences, as we will see.

Case Study 1: Lisseth Exposito

Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats → Wife Divorces → Wife Loses Weight

Daily Mail: Woman whose cheating husband called her 'fat girl' and blamed her weight for his affair loses NINE STONE and ditches him (and now he says she looks 'hot') (2015/12/8)

Most women tend to "let themselves go" after marriage, a la, self-centered, Self-Indulgent Easy Mode. Lisseth Exposito was no different.

When a woman is married, she draws 'Rewards' from the status and security of being a wife. In fact, most wives will behave along the lines of what maximizes her own comfort, convenience, status, security, and self-esteem, rather than what would actually be helpful to her husband and family. Unfortunately, this means that most wives do NOT give a diligent effort to maintain their figure, as I described before. (If she does maintain her appearance, it is usually for her own self-esteem, NOT to keep her husband interested and satisfied.)

When this continues indefinitely, then we all know what happens next…

> "The couple were no longer having sex and when Lisseth asked why, Jose told her she was 'too fat'.
> She said: 'The words made my stomach flip and I hit an all-time low. Food became the only thing to give me a moment of happiness. I was eating around 4,000 calories a day.'
> But Lisseth noticed Jose's behaviour change and she had a gut feeling something was wrong."

She explicitly says, "Food became the only thing to give me a moment of happiness", thus confirming her Self-Indulgence. Food, NOT hopping on her Hispanic hubby (as much as she may have loved it), had become her predominant pastime.

Here, the wife has indulged in self-centered Easy Mode for so long, and has "let herself go" so far, that her husband can't even get it up for her anymore, and, while he still retains a healthy masculine sex drive and a sufficient SMV to attract peripheral birthing units, he succumbed to the temptation of piping a more nubile P00n on the down low.

Being forced to face the uncomfortable truth that sexual competition continues after marriage, is enough to motivate the wife to file for a divorce to escape this painful realization, whether or not she has any other romantic opportunities available to her IRL.

But after a wife gets a divorce for whatever reason (and 80% of divorces are initiated by wives), she will quickly lose considerable weight and revert back to Attention-Seeking Mode in order to attract more Attention, more men, and optimize her mating opportunities, per hypergamy and the Tingles.

And that's exactly what Lisseth Exposito did.

If it's any low-level degree of honor, this one divorced before she let the cat out to prowl. Most divorcees do not have that much dignity.

Case Study 2: Betsy Ayala

Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats → Wife Loses Weight → Wife Divorces

Daily Mail: New mother loses 100lbs after discovering how her cheating husband and his lover called her fat behind her back (2016/12/30)

LMAO at that title! Only after discovering that her husband has had an affair, and shame kicks in, does she feel any compunction to do the work necessary to resume her feminine flair to either resume her marital duties and save her marriage, or else ameliorate the shame.

After she lost weight, she looked fabulous — a truly amazing transformation!

Betsy Ayala before and after she lost 100+ pounds. Note her disinterested, exasperated husband (I presume) at left, and the absence of her husband in the newer photo. Is that a 1,000 Cock stare?
And guess what she did next?

If you guessed that she ditched her hubby and traded her soul in for a one-way ticket to hell on the carousel, you're 100% correct.

There are numerous instances of wives making the effort to slim down and be more feminine for various reasons, only to discover that the 'Rewards' she receives from losing weight, resuming her feminine appeal, and the newfound Attention this brings outweigh the 'Rewards' she receives from being an attractive, dutiful wife.

If a wife cares more about averting shame than about preserving her marriage, then once the once-fat wife discovers that Attention is still, and always will be, 'Rewarding', thereby providing a dopamine addiction inversely proportional to her HWR, and that she's been missing out on all the 'fun' since getting married, she will succumb to the sexual temptations of the SMP. (Men cannot imagine how easy it is for women to do this.) Add to this the feelings of envy, resentment, and revenge inflicted from being ousted by a younger, hotter chick, and she is biting, itching, and scratching to have an affair herself.

This one did, and did.

We'd like to think that she finalized her divorce before she let the cat out to prowl, but that 1,000 Cock stare tells a different story.

Case Study 3: Kristen McLaughlin

Woman Gains Weight → Boyfriend Cheats → Relationship Ends → Woman Loses Weight

> "Looking back, McLaughlin says [losing her boyfriend] was the "best thing" that could've happened to her, although at the time she felt overwhelmed by the loss of her 5-year relationship and the sudden need to find a new apartment."

As IF … having to find another apartment is on par with losing a relationship! Is it even possible to value men any less?

> "But she also saw it as a clean slate. "I literally got rid of every excuse that I've ever had," she says. "I never had a better opportunity to just focus on myself and build myself back up."

A classic example of how women gaslight themselves into thinking their relationship failures weren't their fault, thereby mentally exonerating themselves from any responsibility on their behalf.

In reality, the fact is that … 5 years of her peak SMV and +1 N count (or maybe more) is a very costly lesson to learn that her appearance matters. It's a pity that she has to pay the cost for this lesson, whether or not she actually learned it. Another example of the Dunning-Kruger effect.

It's an amazing and sordid travesty of the female sexual nature that they are only motivated to make themselves (physically) fit for a relationship when they're NOT in a relationship, apparently entirely ignorant of the fact that whatever they did to get into a relationship is what they need to continue to do to stay in a relationship.

Kristen McLaughlin, before and after losing 133 lbs — more than half of her previous weight.
This looks sooo familiar. Where have we seen this before? Oh, yes… this meme.

Chalk up +1 N count (or more) as the price of a lesson NOT learned.
Ex-boyfriends and ex-husbands are inclined to take the woman's feminine transformation personally, something along the lines of, "I wasn't able to make her happy", or "I had a bad influence on her", or "She's better off without me", when in fact, it had nothing to do with him AT ALL, and everything to do with her lack of faith, integrity, and self-discipline.

Case Study 4: usaangle3

Wife Gains Weight → Husband Cheats → Wife Loses Weight

The New York Post: My husband cheated on me, so I got the best revenge (2022/3/10); reposted from The Sun: WEIGHT A MINUTE! My husband cheated on me because he didn't think I was a "real girl," so I lost 24 STONE, now I'm totally unrecognisable (2022/3/10) [Archive]

The original article at The Sun was deleted within one week after publication. Apparently, men cheating on a repulsively obese and ugly wife is just too normal within a fat-centric culture, regardless of Feminist / Woke invoked Political Correctness, and her p!ssed off attitude that embodies her motivation for losing weight as a form of "revenge" is just too Red Pill realistic for the masses to swallow.

In reality, a wife losing weight is not 'revenge' in any sense, but rather her returning to her original feminine form — what she's supposed to be 'being' out of love for her husband. Wives miss this missive when they're floating on their flatulent fee-fees, or when they're too brain-addled from imbibing the lies of Feminology.

The article didn't state how this is 'revenge', but Red Pilled readers can only guess that it took the form of her stepping out of her marriage. I could guess that she didn't divorce only because she's too ugly to ever hope to stick another landing or even return to the carousel.

Dude, I hate to say it, but this woman is so ugly, even after her weight loss, that I'll spare the readers from any photos. I pity the man who married her repulsively low class @ss, only to put up with this obese, atavistic tard playing 'revenge' games and forning around (my guess). The ubiquitous number of women like this is exactly why we still have third-world countries existing in the 21st century.

Conclusions

Wives predictably undergo a sudden transition from being a beautiful bride to being rather overweight, unattractive, and unkempt. This behavior almost always gets worse after they have a child.

This behavior was explained in the previous essay. When the 'Rewards' associated with pursuing and receiving sexual Attention wane, then a woman's interest in maintaining the difficult habits thereof will decrease, and they will find other things that give them a greater ‘Reward’ for the effort invested, notably Self-Indulgence, i.e., eating and lazing.

But once married, if a wife chooses to binge on carbs rather than do what is necessary to keep her hubby hard for her and thereby satisfied with porking her loins, then she is essentially saying that her own comfort is more important to her than their marriage, that food is more important to her than sex, and that she doesn’t give a fat flying flip about helping her husband avert temptations and to stay faithful to her.

A wife who packs on the pounds after marriage can be equitably compared to a husband who quits his job and starts drinking and smoking pot all day — both are expressions of abandoning marital duties in favor of Self-Indulgence. But most men won’t go that route because such indolent, lavish Self-Indulgence is a violation of masculine virility. Most husbands who are hitched to such women will refuse to match their wives’ laxity (which would be fair recompense) out of duty and self-respect, and will instead check out of the relationship, first emotionally, then sexually. And if they’re high enough SMV and still in the game, they’ll opt for a better woman, if one’s available, cue an affair. Yet, women will complain that it’s the man’s fault for withdrawing and/or having an affair, without ever acknowledging how their idolatry of Self-Indulgence has defrauded their men, made them unworthy of these men’s commitment, and pushed these men away.

Concerning men who withdraw from tubby non-tingling wives, the Manosphere has long observed that women are sexually repelled by men on Easy Mode, e.g., Beta Orbiters, Soy Boys, et al., but here we find that men are also sexually repelled by women on Easy Mode, i.e., women who revert to Self-Indulgence and get fat after a man’s commitment is obtained. Most women won’t put in the effort to maintain Attention-Mode for hubby, but only for beaucoup hardcore Attention from Ch@ds and the multitudes of riff raff clickers of ‘Likes’. Attention from one non-Ch@d husband just won’t Tingulate her enough for her to make this effort, in spite of all his effort. Add to this the daily grind of 9-to-5 employment, child-rearing, housework, etc., and they’re itching for Easy Mode.

With all this set against the Natural Order, there are 3 primary incentives for a wife to lose weight:

1. The hope of getting more sexual attention, like they did before marriage when they were younger and hotter.
2. The salient hope of reentering the SMP and riding the carousel for a few more years before retiring into no man’s land.

3. Shame, whether it's shame coming from the husband's words, or shame arising from the husband's affair, or shame from looking at themselves in the mirror, or elsewhere.

Wives are NOT motivated to trim the lard off their @sses for health reasons (although this might be deceptively stated), and NEVER for pleasing hubby or improving marital / sexual relations.

Thus, women who were overweight and stuck in self-centered Easy Mode for years while they were married are suddenly able to shed all that weight within weeks! It's a freaking miracle! They won't make that effort for God or hubby, but they'll do it in a heartbeat at the mere thought of having a last-ditch chance to indulge the sinful nature for a few more years before they decline into the lonely, cats and wine form of Self-Indulgence for the remaining 40 years of their lives. Pathetic! They think that men think that all they're good for is a few good F_cks, and they call this misogyny and sexism, when in fact, it's entirely true for said women! They are unworthy of anything more, i.e., a LTR commitment.

Moreover, a wife gaining or losing weight seems to go hand in hand with cheating and/or divorce. Although the order and the sequence of cause-and-effect will vary case by case, we see the following generalities:

- If she gains weight, then he cheats.
- If she loses weight, then she cheats.

But whichever way it happens, changes in the wife's weight seem to be inextricably linked to LTR dissolution.

Of note, a cheating husband isn't always a necessary part of the equation, but the wife is almost always unfaithful after losing weight, either before or because of divorce.

Simply put, a fat wife is an undisciplined, self-indulgent wife, and a fairly reliable recipe for marital failure.

More crassly, if you're a fat wife, then you're a bad wife!

But stupid, selfish women will ask, "Oh… why?"

It's because you're subjecting your husband to inordinate temptations, which is your wifely duty to alleviate by keeping his insatiable sex drive satisfied. This is the reason for marriage itself (1 Corinthians 7:2; 1 Thessalonians

4:3-4; Hebrews 13:4). If you neglect this duty, then you're planting the seeds for divorce and/or sexual sin.

Why Do Women Like to Strip Naked and Show Off Their Bodies?

Nudity is the default nature of female sexuality!

Intro

Jackabond mentioned a comic / meme that went around about 11 years ago (~2015).

In the original comic, both text balloons read, "What a cruel MALE-dominated culture!"

Being somewhat familiar with Muslim culture, I thought the burka-clad woman's thoughts should read, more accurately, "What an infidel SEX-drenched culture!", or somewhat less accurate but more relatable, "What a cruel FEMALE-dominated culture!" I've revised this comic by adding FE before MALE.

Jackabond responded,

> "I would argue the opposite, in general. The bikini-clad culture is male-dominated, as it's male desire (the male gaze) that has led to the sexualized display by the blonde in the picture; male desire that is being titillated by the spectacle; male desire that encourages the attention-seeking thrill that drives the bikini women; male desire that the women desire. Feminism has deluded women into thinking this is empowerment. In reality, this describes subordination of the feminine imperative to the masculine one."

I disagree with JB, because (1) the Feminine Imperative, in general, does NOT submit to the masculine, re: The Curse of Eve, and (2) his viewpoint is uniquely male, and does not reflect an accurate understanding of female nature.

In this post, I'll explain why this is and how it works.

A woman wears a bikini and attracts nuclear attention, ca. 1953.

What are Women's Motives for Exposing Themselves?

JB's viewpoint presumes that women are wielding their strongest power — their sexuality — to attract handsome men, to sell themselves somehow, or else to put men on the defensive in a power play. There is also the view that women intentionally, purposefully, and strategically use their sex appeal to ply men's weakness of desiring sexual conquest and thereby persuade men to do all sorts of things.

All this is true, depending on the context, of course, but this is just what is outwardly observed and interpreted through men's limited perspective. There is something else going on underneath all this — something to do with women's inherent nature.

You already know it: "Girls just wanna have fun!"

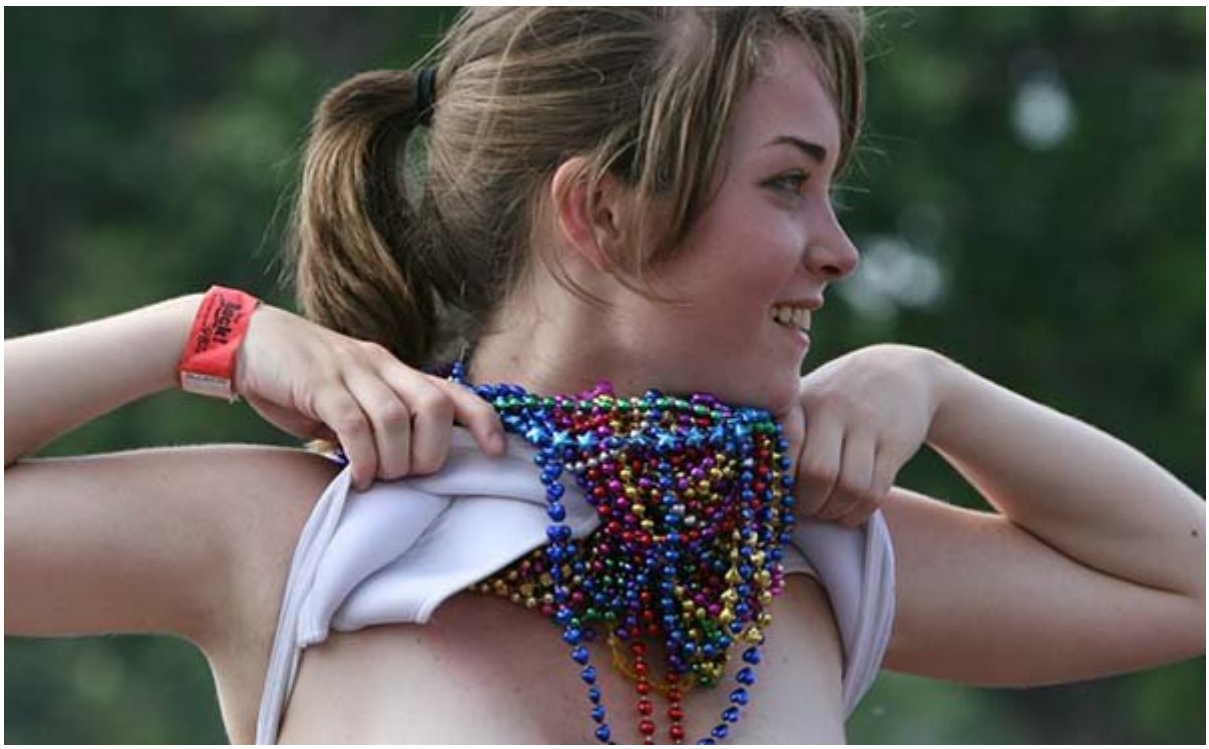
Let's apply this axiom to women's choice of apparel, or the lack thereof.

A woman walks the streets of London wearing only cutoff jeans, nipple stickers, and body paint, ca. 2023.
According to Ye Olde Red Pille Lore, when constraints are removed, and women's behaviors are NOT regulated by fathers, husbands, men, morals, norms, parents, peers, society, or what have you, then they will shed as much of their apparel as they can get away with, and as often as is practical. They do NOT do this merely to arouse male desire or to put men on the defensive (although they can and certainly do, if/when it is in their interest to do so); they simply do this to be comfortable with themselves, to be 'Open', to enjoy the expression of their sexuality, and to bathe in the attention and validation that this vulnerability brings to them. Remember, women are solipsistic above all else. It does not matter WHO is giving them attention, as long as the attention is positive, and the person giving it is NOT unacceptably onerous. (Unfortunately, women are entitled these days and consider most men to be vociferously onerous.) The point is that women have a peculiar, natural propensity to strip naked when certain, preferred conditions exist. It is their very nature to do so.



A young woman lifts her top to expose her breasts at a rock festival, ca. 1976.
I'll take the liberty of revising JB's statement to offer a more correct assessment, IMO, of women's willingness to bare their wares.

> The bikini-clad culture is female-dominated, as it's the female desire for a non-judgmental acceptance of their unfettered sexual expression that has led to the sexualized display by the blonde in the picture. The ever-present desire of high SMV men certainly encourages the attention-seeking thrill that drives the bikini women to bare their wares; and certainly, women desire to attract and harness male desire, their SMV notwithstanding. It does not matter that it is immoral to titillate and tempt male desire by the spectacle, although if it happens to arouse a good-looking, high-status male, that would be an added stroke to their egos. But if it happens to arouse a lower-status man, that would be a supreme annoyance and grounds for 'harassment'. But either way, it is a self-affirming exercise in female sexual power. Unfortunately, Feminism has deluded women into thinking their sexual expression is not just the substance of their grandest display of intersexual gravity, but the sum total of female empowerment. In reality, Honeycraft includes a vast array of feminine abilities, qualities, and skills. This comic describes the mentality behind the subordination of moral norms to the Feminine Imperative (for the bikini b!tch) and an extreme expression of Patriarchy and Masculine dominance (for the burka babe).

I'll offer three case studies below to prove my point.

Reminiscent of the comic / meme above, three college girls wear bikinis at a coed sorority party, ca. 2019.

Case Study 1 — All-Girls' Sleepover Parties

Most Western women go to All-Girls' Sleepover parties in high school and college. Most men have no idea what happens at these parties and assume they're watching chick flicks, talking about school, peer dramas, currently trending boy toys like Jacob Elordi, and such. But in fact, their activities at these socials are much more debased, depraved, effeminate, and sensual. They will dress very casually, often wearing bikinis, cut-off T shirts, short-shorts, thongs, etc., and not much else, other than fuzzy socks. They will drink wine and get drunk, exchange gossip, watch G@y P0rn, and talk about the men they think are hot, and/or their recent sexcapades. They will sit very close to each other, touching each other, and stroking each other's hair and skin while they talk. The older, more sexperienced wimz will school younger chicks in their peer group on how to use men and how to use sex toys, as if there were not much difference between the two. They'll play soft jazz music, light up candles, get out body massage tools, essential oils, and even dildos and vibrators, among those who are more libidinous and risqué, and will 'comfort' each other with body massages and orgasm inducing 'therapies'. Some will engage in kissing, fingering, and even cunnilingus and scissoring, or whatever goes with the flow. Of course, none of this will be classified as H0m0səxu@l!ty in their minds, but merely "Girls' Talk" or "Girls' Time".

They aren't acting or dressing this way for male attention, obviously, since no males are present, but in order to feel comfortable with each other in the most extreme ways, to offer 'acceptance', and to increase intimacy and peer bonding amongst themselves.

Several sorority sisters partying in their underwear, ca. 2002.

Case Study 2 — Drinking Parties

I'm not sure this occurs with the same frequency as it once did decades ago, but it used to be rather common for women to lift their shirts (as if to flash their boobs), or open their shirts, or take their shirts off, and/or remove their bras and/or panties (soft streaking) in certain informal social situations that made them feel very comfortable and also excited (e.g. dance halls that were crowded, dark, hot, loud, and smoky; All-Girl's Sleepovers; hanging out with a small group of friends; house parties; sorority parties; rock concerts; etc.), especially when alcohol and drugs are involved.

Alcohol, as we know, suppresses inhibitions, so when women are drinking, what do they do in an uninhibited state? They get aroused and start stripping, and maybe F_cking too (if the adjacent man doesn't ruin his chances by offending her hair-trigger ego). From hence comes the bawdy come-hither phrase, "Let's TalK, SmoKe, DrinK, and F_cK", abbreviated as "The 4 Ks".

News to Younger Men: This is women's default setting, and they will revert to it under certain circumstances devoid of restraints.

Again, they're not doing all this explicitly for male attention, or even to attract High SMV men, but just because that's what they are.

A house party with women dancing, drinking, grinding, and stripping, ca. 2010.

Case Study 3 — The DignifAI Spoof

This one really clinches my argument.

A couple years ago, when AI imaging first came out, male netizens on 4Chan would use AI to clean up photos of women who were overweight, who had green hair, piercings, tattoos, etc., making them appear attractive, slim, and modestly dressed, etc. in the AI modified photos. This was called 'DignifAI'.

You would think that women would be overjoyed to look better than they really are; after all, whole industries are founded on this (advertising, cosmetics, IG thirst traps, modeling, OnlyFools, etc.).

However, women were absolutely outraged over this, because…

1. It shamed them.
2. It brought negative attention.
3. It made them the laughingstock of the interwebs.
4. It caused them regret over what they've done with their bodies and their lives.

More recently, DignifAI has made a strong comeback, and I suppose it's because AI image generation is so much better than it was 2 years ago. This second wave is being called PurifAI. Now, just as 2 years ago, women are completely incensed.

DignifAI and PurifAI have changed how we view women.
Joker at Better Bachelor covered this a while ago.

In this case, men are putting clothes ON women (in images), and women are upset by this. I couldn't make up a better argument for women's inherent nature of Bimbofying themselves, and for no other reason than to identify as a sex icon. Maybe it's because they truly are Bimbos at heart!

Case closed.

Conclusions

So you see, women do NOT dress (or undress) for men, or even to receive attention from men (although they can and will, if it suits them). They do it for a wide range of reasons:

- To coagulate with other women.
- To obtain attention and validation.
- Hypergamic competition against other women.
- To show off the glory and power of their beauty / sexuality.
- Women's propensity for advertising their reproductive portal.
- To exert feminine V Power over men. "P_ssy makes men weak."
- Women's preferred habit of nakedness, guised as 'comfort' and/or 'openness', or else secreted.

Bottom Line: Women flash, streak, strip naked, parade in the buff, and advertise their sexuality because that's what God created them to do, for the sake of reproduction.

Caveat: Most men don't get to see this behavior in women, because of Observer Effect — their presence revokes the necessary conditions in which women behave this way. These days, only Top Class Ch@ds can see this side of women, and they see it all the time, and it's annoying to them.

If you're still not convinced that that's just what women are, then I kindly invite you to read the posts under Related below for more evidence and explanations.

Muslim women are no exception. Within online / OASIS forums detached from social constraints, they'll bare all but their hair, as if this minimal restraint might preserve their honor amid their sexual debauchery.

The New "Have Yachts" Economy

Aaron Renn's post, The Rich, the Poor, and the Ultra-Rich (2025/11/19), explains how there has been a social class shift within American society over the past ~30 years, resulting in a permanently bifurcated economy.

The rich "Have's" (top 10%) now command over 50% of all spending power and are driving explosive economic growth, such as luxury travel and 5 Star Michelin entrees.

The ultra-rich "Have Yachts" (top 0.1%) are pulling away into a pampered, fully privatized world of $400+/night hotels, private jets, vetted clubs, chauffeured airport suites, separate accommodations to evade crowds, and VIP everything.

So much money, so little self-control.

Businesses, hotels, sports venues, travel agencies, and entire cities are rapidly reorienting to serve the affluent while shrinking middle-tier offerings and eliminating cheap access to many popular venues, like sports games. The result is a two-tier society—luxury booming, everything else stagnating.

The middle and poorer working classes (the "Have Not's") are facing an irreversible decline in relative income and an erosion of lifestyle. Those who self-identify as middle class are 54%, down from 85% a decade ago.

Essentially, what was once known as the Middle Class is now the new de facto Lower Class. They are making ends meet by buying less, cutting volumes, and stretching products. Some are moving to areas with a less expensive cost of living. But it seems no matter what they do, they are only locking themselves ever more inescapably into the New Lower Class. Given the high degree of immobility, some have even called it a new caste system, rather than the traditional labels of socioeconomic classes. See Renn's post and his linked articles for more details.

I will speculate that at least part of the source of this new bourgeoisie is from hard-working, well-to-do Boomers who invested their money in wealth-generating businesses and other types of accumulating assets, and then passed these financial securities on to their children, instead of blowing it on themselves. As of now, this is about all I can say about this phenomenon. Readers are welcome to share their own thoughts about the whys and wherefores.

The ocean is a place with no boundaries and no laws.

Yacht Widows

Long-time Red Pill readers are familiar with the term "Alpha Widow", which refers to the phenomenon in which a woman has a love affair, or simply a ONS, with a prime SMV man, and then forever after pines for him, or another man equal to or better than him. Afterwards, they vehemently despise the thought of hooking up with, or gasp marrying any lesser man, even one who would truly be her SMV equal, or who might have otherwise offered her a very good relationship, had she not been spoiled.

And who could forget Roissy's catchphrases: "For most women, five minutes of Alpha is worth five years of beta", and "Five Minutes Of Alpha = Fifty Years Of Pining"?

However, Renn's piece describes a much different socioeconomic / sexual landscape than what PUAs engaged with 10-20 years ago. It stands to reason that today's women aren't just looking to bed a Ch@d; they're aiming to cozy up with an Uber Class Man who is also a Ch@d.

Social media (IG, TT, YT, etc.) has already given us glimpses of how this plays out. "Gold Diggers" is the label that is being tossed around, but this old moniker doesn't even begin to adequately describe it.

These days, young women who are sufficiently hot enough to catch the eye of a young rich Playboy are invited to week-long 'dates' in Cancun, the Maldives, Mauritius, and Milan, on private jets, yacht parties, and all that. After having a first-hand experience of uber luxury, flying on a private jet, having a personal valet, as well as a few drinks, and a few F_cks, they totally lose their souls in the experience. They forget that they did nothing to earn this, and they know nothing about how to blend into the upper crust. Their common-class insensibilities and vices eventually cause them to be rejected from these posh social circles, just as soon as their 'usefulness' as arm candy, d!ck ornaments, and sexual playthings has expired — and it always does. The Wall is invincible.

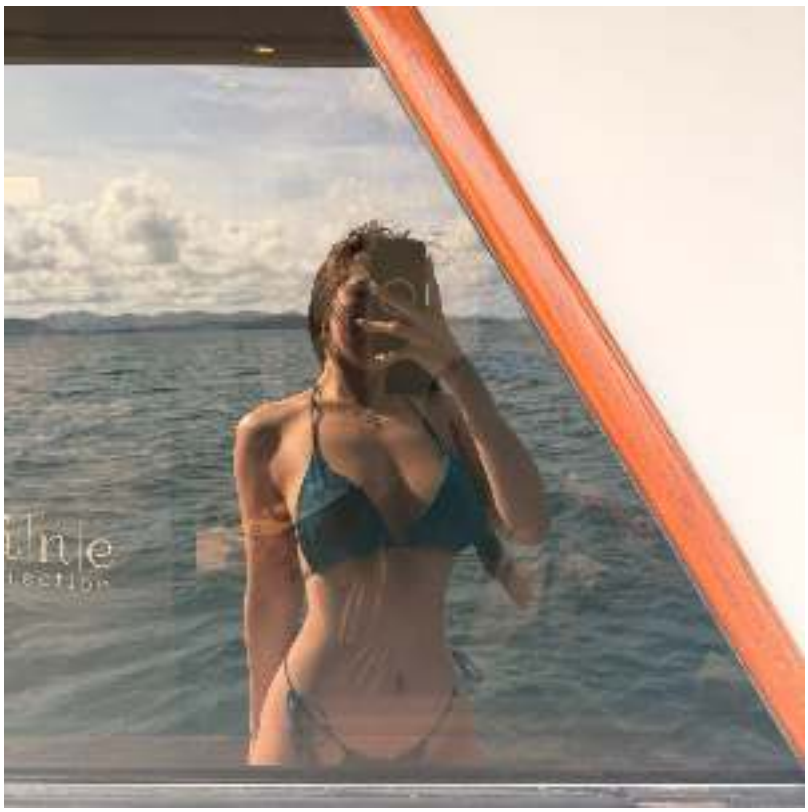
After having such an experience, they will always expect a man to deliver uber luxury as a matter of course. Going back to a middle-class lifestyle after this sexperience would inflict too much guilt for them to handle. They are essentially "Yacht Widows".



A most beautiful aquatic hell to remember themselves by.

Whence Come Such Exorbitant Demands?

Over the past year or so, we've seen a rising tide of women turning up their noses at traditionally popular low-cost dating activities such as informal coffee dates, NetFlix and Chill, walks in the park, and such. Instead, they're NOT only expecting, but DEMANDING men to treat them to lavish dinner dates with the choicest cuts of filet mignon and a night high on the town at the most exclusive black tie venues. Some women even set lower-limits on how much money the men they date should spend on them, ranging in the low to mid hundreds of dollars — per date — all without any commitment or investment whatsoever from these women.

I've often wondered, how the hə11 did these women ever come to expect so d@mn much? Princess Disneyfication doesn't quite fully explain it.

Well, now we know how modern women form these astronomical expectations. They took a 'sexperience trip' somewhere sunny, warm, and sopping wet with an Uber Moneyed Man and got themselves Yacht Widowed.

Of course, she'll never tell you about that yacht trip she took to the Bahamas when she was 19 years old, and how she bent over the rail and barfed her multiple margueritas into the Gulf of Mexico while she was taking it from behind. But she'll still expect you to "do better".

Gentlemen, do yourselves a favor and Hard Pass Yacht Widows.

The Sociosexual Angle on the Class Divide

Regular reader jvangeld shared a series of essays about the new class divide, as was covered in Who is Making the Upper Cut? (2026/3/16) and Yacht Widows (2026/4/15),

- Michael W. Greene: Part 1: My Life Is a Lie (2025/11/23)
- Michael W. Greene: Part 2: The Door Has Opened (2025/12/1)
- Michael W. Greene: Part 3: The Pursuit of Happiness (2025/12/8)

jvangeld added,

> "From the conclusion of Green's second article:
> > "By inflating asset prices, we didn't create wealth; we destroyed mobility. We turned the ladder into a drawbridge, raised it up, and told the people stuck outside to be grateful that the castle looks so expensive."
> There's a lot to unpack. But the entitlement of the sexual "Have's" against the sexual "Have Not's" of the 2010s is mirrored exactly in the current economic discourse."

Note also, the current economic divide is reflected back into the current SMP of the 2020s. Yes, it is.

Want to know why (in part) women's sociosexual expectations have gone through the roof? It's because the class divide already has. Hypergamy decides in favor of the silver spoon, regardless of how wide the class chasm might be.

This class divide explains why so many women (as seen on TT, X, YT, etc.) have come to have such exorbitant expectations from a man. They can see the class divide, and they want and expect to get into the upper crust strata, per hypergamy, and they reflexively reject anything less. They tread water on hypergamous hopes while they fail to recognize that they're totally unqualified. They subconsciously refuse to realize that by having these expectations, they disqualify themselves and price themselves out of that niche market. Men want a woman who contributes to their wealth and well-being somehow, not suck it dry for her own satisfices. And there's a vast monopoly of sociosexual capital that is conveyed through the attitudes and thinking habits of the uber moneyed that lower and mid-class women cannot ever hope to claim — or even fathom.

Furthermore, moneyed people have a good nose for detecting genuine upper-class individuals from the upper-class wannabe's, and they can even distinguish New Money (1st and 2nd generation who rose to wealth from the lower classes) from gold diggers, posers, and shysters, and will deftly exclude all these ex-groups from their in-group without letting them be any the wiser.

NOT good news for the watery-eyed, wistful, wh0red-out wannabes.

Interestingly, those wimminz who can achieve a tertiary education stand a slightly better chance at breaking through this class barrier, and that's exactly why many women are prioritizing education over young marriage — not only to make themselves more independent and self-supporting, just in case they "don't need no man", but also to make themselves more marketable to higher-status men. Although, P_ssy and a WHR < 0.70 are all they need to get in the running, if they can abandon ALL vestiges of low-class Feminism and learn the upper-crust etiquette that happens to coincide with Christian values (e.g., faithfulness, humility, respect, and submission), a few of them might pass muster and marry well into the upper echelons.

Other than these few outliers, most women who were NOT born into elite families and who vainly imagine they can magically hypergamize or monkey branch themselves into the upper-class strata by spreading their knees for taller, BMW driving, estate landed, yacht sailing boys will invariably wind up spending their youths as Yacht Widows, then crash the landing when they hit the Wall, and then spend the rest of their lives on this Earth as ran-through hoez, catty, cat loving Cougars, Karens, Katies, and such. A few of them will attempt to avoid the consequential loneliness and shame of their carnal sins by pursuing the Born Again Slore Life Script.

There's nothing like a multitude of poignant examples of failure to motivate younger generations to try something different — and anything different than Feminism and Sexual Liberation is a move in the right direction.

Thus saith Σ Jack.

Intro

In a previous post, Is the Christian Manosphere Gynocentric? (2026/1/30), I added 6 images of attractive young Asian girls having a near-perfect physique, just to spice things up for readers.

Case Study 1 — Rita

In response, regular commenter Joe2 said,

> "Concerning the girl holding a phone, I thought I would share this PSA, which, in accord with the image, is also gratuitous.
> Her name is Rita, age 25, DD chest. She is Korean, [billed as] "nice and gentle", and "new to the industry". She is available for clients at a well-known licensed Brothel in Victoria, Australia. Her services cost about $77 (USD) for 20 minutes and $160 (USD) for 60 minutes, according to the Brothel website.
> Girls like her are a "dime a dozen" in Melbourne, Australia, if you don't mind Brothel workers."

I did some further image searches, clicked around and scrolled for a while, and I eventually found the evidence supporting Joe2's claim. However, the same image is used on at least 2 profiles at the brothel's site. (Pious readers should forgive me for linking, in favor of saving search time for curious fact checkers and truth seekers.) The other one is named Merry, age 25, CC bust, from Vietnam, billed as “Petit and Cute” [sic], and also “new to the industry”. Also, there are hundreds of copies of this same image spread all over the internet.

All this leads me to suspect that any of these sites could be using copied images. So we still cannot be certain of the identity of the young woman in the image or that she is actually a working girl. To be generous, it could just as well be possible that she’s a young Attention Gardener on IG whose image got lifted and plastered.

However, I cannot dismiss Joe2’s main point — that women who advertise their sex appeal online may rather easily go one step further to sell themselves in some way or form. After all, it is in their nature to do so. The oldest profession in history, and all that.

After looking into Joe2’s findings, I wondered if any of the other women in the images in my post were of the same persuasion. I don’t want to depict female models who are known Pr0st!tute$ or P0rn stars on the Σ Frame blog (unless they are the subject of a case study), thereby inadvertently, indirectly endorsing degeneracy. So I feel obligated to check this out.

So in this post, I’ll do a deeper dive into the background of the gusty girls glamorized in that post.

TL;DR: Sure enough, most of them are Pr0$t!tute$ in some form or fashion!

General Observations

I find most of these images on Facebook feeds (that may very well be placed there by an algorithm or paid promotions), so I don’t know much about these models except what is on FB. FB is fairly inane, but there’s always the possibility that these racy FB profiles are a whitewashed front for chicks engaged with other secreted activities.

During my searches and studies in response to Joe2’s comment, I discovered that, yes indeedy, many of the girls flamboyantly flashing their flesh on FB and IG have spicier content elsewhere, and some have OnlyF@ns accounts.

But… if you’re on a social media platform like FB, IG, or X, you cannot click directly to these girls OF pages, as links to adult sites are forbidden. So instead, these girls will post links to a ‘link tree’ that they’ve set up, which contains all their social media links. If they have $eXXXy stuff, there will be one link in that ‘link tree’ that takes you to another ‘link tree’ that has moar links to their XXX content. This is how they advertise themselves on popular social media sites — sites that ban adult content and links to adult content, but NOT links to links to adult content. In this way, they have semi-direct linkage from the big MSM sites to their XXX outlets, and are thereby able to siphon off simping viewers from public spaces online. Some of them will skirt around this restriction by posting the link text without embedding the hyperlink, where the hyperlink is automatically added in display. However, these profiles are often disabled or closed down after a while, leading to them opening another social media account on the same platform. As a result, some of these chicks have multiple accounts on the same platform. In fact, I'd say that the number of social media accounts a girl has is directly proportional to how saucy her paid / private content is.

Okay, so let's get into what I found. I'll go through these Case Studies in the same order as their images were depicted in the previous post (omitting 'Rita', the girl Joe2 mentioned, and whom we already discussed above), with those images provided to aid our associative memories.

Case Study 2 — Mina

AKA: Alice; harayuaii_; himina; luni2002;

Look at her proportions and WHR! I'm in lurrve! /S

But seriously, women don't come much more perfectly proportioned than Mina. We're looking at 1 in 10,000, even within her age bracket, I guess.

The sad fact is that, instead of marrying and reproducing that beautiful figure for the aesthetic betterment of future generations, she’s Wh0ring herself out online.

Case Study 3 — Irene

Two of the photos are of the same model.

Another South Korean babe. Look at her figure! She's almost as perfect as Mina. I'm in lurrve! /S

This chick appears to be most famous as a YouTuber. She advertises herself as an ASMR artist (an art form I covered before). I could not find an OF account, but I did find many saucy or semi-nude photos of her labeled as "leaked" from OF. It could be that she had an OF account at one time and then closed it. I suspect she has some very juicy content on Patreon. (I won't sign on for a subscription, so I don't know for sure.)

According to this ad (assuming the photos are not stolen), she is apparently a self-employed escort located in Hong Kong.

More info here (in Korean).

Case Study 4 — im__bom

Another perfect figure.

Nationality / Ethnicity: Cheongdam-dong, South Korea

Works as a freelance model in China.

I could not find any personal information on this model.

I found many photos of her advertising dresses and swimwear for clothing retailers, but I could not find evidence of any work in OF or P0rn.

But you never know what she might be up to. Maybe she's really not into selling herself, or maybe she's just very Very good at hiding her XXX activities. Women have an inherent knack for keeping their sexual liaisons a secret.

Note: There are several other models having a username with some variation of im_bom.

Case Study 5 — Lacy Kim

Upon further extensive research, I found this woman to be so remarkably interesting (and inspiring, TBH) that I've dedicated a separate post to cover her.

In short, yes, she's an OF model, among other things.

Stay tuned.

Conclusions

From this study, I've come to the conclusion that, on average, South Korean girls have the best figures out of ALL Asian women!

It was a surprising coincidence that all these models (except Lacy Kim) are Korean or of Korean descent. And it is a double coincidence that I recently visited South Korea. That borders on synchronicity territory. Paging From The Narrow Desert.

In sum of the 5 girls pictured in the previous post (and shown above, except for Lacy Kim), we have:

- 2 OnlyF@ns starlets (Mina and LacyKim)
- 1 ex-OnlyF@ns / ASMR Artist / Escort (Irene)
- 1 presumed to be a Traditional Prostitute (Rita)
- 1 freelance model (im__bom)

Moreover, the majority of these chicks (3 or 4 out of 5) are Pr0$t!tute$. Holey Schmoley!

From this study, I've come to two tentative conclusions:

1. There's a very good chance that the majority of models that I've posted on this blog over the years have been involved in the sex industry* in some way.
2. I think it would be very difficult to find high-quality photographs of beauties of this caliber who have never worked in any arena of the sex industry.*

An upcoming post will explore the last point, namely the proliferation and normalization of online Pr0$t!tut!0n (AKA OASIS).

 Sex Industry Work: e.g. Escorting, OASIS / OnlyF@ns, Porn, Prostitution, Sugaring, etc.*

Intro

In a previous post, Is the Christian Manosphere Gynocentric? (2026/1/30), I added 6 images of attractive young Asian girls having a near-perfect physique, just to spice things up for readers.

In response to a comment from Joe2, who pointed out that (at least) one of these girls is a pr0st!tute, I wondered if any of the other women depicted in these images were involved in the sex industry to any degree. In the last post, I uncovered the background of four of the gusty girls glamorized in that post. I found that 2 or maybe 3 of them are OF starlets, and one may be a traditional escort / sex pr0st!tute.

In this post, I'll review the fifth girl, so remarkable that I rue the fact that she is an OnlyF@ns starlet. Instead, I think she should be married and popping out beautiful kids (and I believe she will), and (other than her Attention / OASIS Wh0ring), a model to be imitated by young women in certain ways.

Case Study 5 — Lacy Kim

In short, yes, she's an OF model — an online Pr0$t!tute — among many other things.

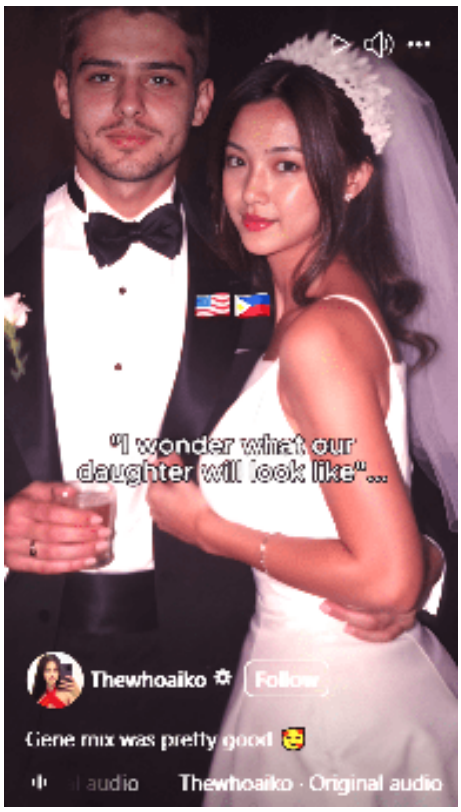
Readers beware! This girl will tempt you sore. HWR astounding!

Lacy Kim, AKA: laclynnkimberly

Ethnicity / Nationality: American, of mixed Filipino-White descent.

From Maryland, U.S.A.

Occupation: Nurse practitioner in Boston (Remember that nurses are known, via ¡$c!ent!f!c! studies no less, for being one of the most slutty professions.)



Lacy Kim's mother and father, in an older photo.

I found it intriguingly hard to believe that she is of Filipino descent, as most Filipino women look much different from her, and do NOT come anywhere near her perfect aesthetics. (A lot of Filipinas, maybe the majority, are short, stodgy, and pudgy.)

She looks totally identical to her mother, down to the details. Her father is a handsome White Chad, presumably with a criminal background, befitting the Red Pill lore of women being attracted to convicts. (He's wearing what looks like an orange prison jumpsuit in one mugshot.) I believe her maternal grandfather is also White. If so, then she's more White than Filipino, which might explain why she doesn't appear like a typical Filipina.

Lacy Kim is all over the place online, not only on multiple social media accounts, but also reposted all over the internet by hundreds of thousands of fapping fans. As I stated in the previous post, the number of online accounts a girl has is directly proportional to the sauciness of her content.

Just look at her body proportions and that stupendous WHR! Stars and stripes, too! Saluting Uncle Sam with reproductive potential for the perpetuation of beautiful nationals! OMG! I'm in lurrve! Seeing stars! /S

Donning Spider Woman skin suits, here are Lacy Kim (left), and her sister (right), who is 3 years older. Her sister is even livelier and has a better WHR!

A woman with a face and body as 'perfect' as LacyKim's is FAR from the typical average, especially for East Asian women. I've lived in Asia for over 22 years, and I have never seen an Asian woman with such a voluptuous physique, full, round breasts, and stupendously proportioned WHR as LacyKim's. We're looking at a 1 in 100,000 physique, I guess.

With such an incredible, almost cartoonish or AI P0rnish WHR like hers, skepticism of her authentic body appearance is to be expected. For those who may still be in doubt that she's NOT surgically altered, check out this article.

Influencer Spotlight: Is Lacy Kim Real or AI? The Evidence from the Clinic to the Camera

But that's not all!

She appears to be rather intelligent. She has a professional career in nursing, and her reels on FB contain many funny and witty sexual euphemisms. That is noteworthy!

Lacy Kim with her mother and grandmother. All looking fine!
She has exceptional skill in presenting herself to men as a very appealing woman, not only physically, but also cognitively, psychologically, and socially — and with a significant degree of emotional maturity. That is truly rare and remarkable, especially within American culture!

She has a sister who is 3 years older. They look nearly identical in every way, with slight variations in facial proportions. But her sister keeps herself off social media, for the most part. Kudos to her!

She makes content with her mother and grandmother (!!!), all of whom are very similar in appearance, very attractive, and very well endowed, despite their ages. Given this evidence, there is likely no chance of cosmetic surgery. In this age of cosmetic surgery craze, that is also truly rare and remarkable!

Not to be confused, there is another South Korean artist named Lacey Kim (with an 'e').

Bio: https://www.laceykim.com/bio

Conclusions

In Lacy Kim, we are truly looking at one of the highest quality specimens of female humanity — physically, sexually, cognitively, psychologically, and socially (but maybe NOT spiritually, IDK). This wholly accounts for her vast popularity in online media.

The reasons why I think Lacy Kim should be a role model to young women are as follows.

- She is intelligent and witty.
- She is rather mature and agentic.
- She appears to have rather solid family ties.
- As a nurse practitioner, she is useful to society.
- She is well aware of her genetic blessings and values herself in this.
- She makes a very diligent effort to keep herself in good health, and in shape.
- She has exceptional skill in presenting herself (especially to men) as a very appealing and attractive woman, not only physically, but also cognitively, psychologically, and socially.
- She knows what men like in a woman, and she's not afraid to use her @$$ets to entertain men.
- She doesn't denigrate men for being attracted to her physique, but rather, celebrates this dynamic.
- Her mother and grandmother have reproduced, and she is very much like them, so I believe she will do the same. In doing so, she would serve the aesthetic prowess of future generations.

But, ahhh… It's too bad she's a Pr0$t!tute.

Case Study 6 — Ms. Pui Yi

During my searches and studies while writing the previous posts on popular online Pr0st!tute$, I found one more case study that will blow you away.

Ms. Pui Yi

Name: Siew Pui Yi

Ethnicity / Nationality: Malaysian (Chinese ethnicity*)

Homepage: https://mspuiyi.com/

FB: https://www.facebook.com/mspuiyi

IG: https://www.instagram.com/ms_puiyi/?hl=en

TT: https://www.tiktok.com/@ms_puiyi

Is she reclining on a yacht? A Yacht Widow in the making?
P0rn Actress — It's there, but not much. All soft porn, strip teases, etc., no depictions of sexual intercourse.

She hosts an OnlyF@ns account, although she's been off and on about it. Lots of online chatter talking about it, mostly the lustful wishes of millions of horny, lusty, simping, starry-eyed male fans.

Here's the twist.

Film Actress, highly acclaimed in Malaysia.

Pop Singer; YT: https://www.youtube.com/@mspuiyiofficial

What else?!?

She has a charity / scholarship foundation!

AND…

She's the winner of Malaysia's Top 20 Young Entrepreneur Award!

All this begs the question: How the həll can she be all of these things: film star, pop star, P0rn star, philandering philanthropist, and the winner of a national achievement award?

At first, I thought I was confusing different women. Then I thought somebody was copying her photos, or stealing her name or identity, or maybe even AI. But no. You can identify it's the same woman in all these photos and videos (including the P0rn, God forgive me for looking for the sake of confirming), because if you look closely, she has 3 dark freckles or moles on her upper right body, two on her upper right chest, and one on her right shoulder, and all 3 are in a nearly straight line. This blemish can be seen in most of her photos where this area of her body is exposed, regardless of lighting or makeup. I don't think AI in its current stage of development could replicate this detail.

From what I've seen and what I could gather, her story goes something like this. She posted soft P0rn videos of herself when she was very young. By 'soft P0rn', I mean nude spice vids, e.g., dancing, masturbating, strip teases, etc., NOT scenes depicting sexual intercourse, i.e. 'hard P0rn'. Apparently, this caught the eye of a casting director or a 'Somebody' who pulled her into the spotlight. Along the way, they discovered she could also act and sing, so why not promote her and make some money off of her?

That much might be a reasonable explanation. But the charity foundation and the national award seem strangely out of place. I just don't get it.

I find it hard to believe that one woman could engineer all these activities without having some expert 'help'. I can only imagine that she has a 'ghost manager' who uses her as an eye candy / front / publicity stunt for all these enterprises. If so, then he's essentially a modern day P!mp.

We are living in VERY strange times! I know it's been said before, but it seems like the OMG's never end.

* The Malaysian population is comprised of 3 main ethnicities: ~70% Bumiputera / Malays, ~22% Chinese, and ~7% Indian. These groups are highly segregated, with each having its own culture, language, and educational systems. The national language is English, which is required in all schools, and allows everyone to communicate. For the most part, Chinese Malaysians own practically everything and dominate the economy.

Chernobyl

A Brief History of the Chernobyl Event

Forty years ago on this day, 1986/4/26, the most serious nuclear accident that has ever happened in the history of the nuclear power industry occurred at the Chernobyl nuclear reactor near the city of Pripyat, Ukraine. The reactor was destroyed in the accident, and considerable amounts of radioactive material were vaporized and released into the environment. In the aftermath, radionuclides from the Chernobyl release were measurable in all countries of the northern hemisphere.

Large areas of Belarus, the Russian Federation, and Ukraine were contaminated with lethal levels of radioactive materials. 335,000 people from these three countries were evacuated from the areas surrounding the reactor and were subsequently relocated. The area surrounding Chernobyl is expected to remain contaminated for the next 600+ years.

The accident caused radiation injuries leading to the deaths of more than a hundred workers, plus an unknown number of cancer cases and genetic defects. Furthermore, the accident caused serious social and psychological disruption in the lives of hundreds of people affected, as well as vast economic losses over the entire region.

The Film: Chernobyl

A film was made in 2019 to document and dramatize the events that happened at Chernobyl.

Chernobyl is a 2019 5-episode HBO disaster series directed by Johan Renck and starring Jared Harris, Stellan Skarsgård, Emily Watson, Jessie Buckley, Adam Nagitis and a whole bunch of other excellent actors.

Episode 1 covers the disaster as it happened. Episodes 2-4 cover the cleanup efforts and the human cost. Episode 5 covers the trial and intersperses flashback scenes to the events that led to the disaster.

Episode 1 of Chernobyl begins with a simple, profound question: "What is the cost of lies?" We've all heard that the Chernobyl nuclear reactor disaster was the worst in history, but there was a lot more to it than the technical failures. Everyone can learn from the human elements of the story and apply those lessons to their lives.

Jared Harris plays nuclear physicist Valery Legasov. Stellan Skarsgård plays Soviet Minister of Energy Boris Shcherbina. Together they lead the cleanup effort. Harris and Skarsgård are excellent in their roles, Skarsgård particularly so. He plays Shcherbina with poignant subtlety. You can see the unbearable weight of the decisions Shcherbina made on his face, but he never overacts, or gets melodramatic.

The show does take some artistic liberties. For example, Emily Watson's character — nuclear physicist Ulana Khomyuk — is made up. She's a composite of multiple real-life scientists. Nevertheless, with few exceptions, the storytellers did a great job at historical accuracy.

This is a grim tale. There is no happy ending. It's also infuriating. Without giving too much away, it turns out that the Soviet government knew that something like the Chernobyl disaster was not just possible, but likely, and covered up their findings to avoid embarrassment. They didn't just hide it from the general public, they hid the information from their own nuclear scientists and engineers. And that brings us back to the question: "What is the cost of lies?"

The Vice of Bureaucracy

Although there are many villains in Chernobyl, it would be more accurate to say that bureaucracy is the villain. Bureaucracy inherently attracts, rewards, and promotes petty little tyrants who only care about preserving or improving their position within the bureaucracy. All other considerations are at best a distant second. That leads to a lot of scheming, back-stabbing, blame-shifting, and lying. Bureaucrats make their living by telling their superiors what they want to hear, and talking subordinates into doing what they want, no matter how nonsensical that may be. This is true of all bureaucracies, whether in a large company or in government, but Communism cranks bureaucracy up to 11. The Chernobyl disaster illustrates how this phenomenon can result in the most mind-bogglingly stupid decision-making. Watch this short scene for an example.

Plant Manager Bryukhanov and Chief Engineer Fomin refused to believe — against all physical evidence — that the reactor core had exploded. After all, it was theoretically impossible for a Soviet-designed-and-built reactor core to explode. At the end of the scene, Nuclear Engineer Sitnikov, whom they ordered from the safety and comfort of a sealed bunker to go look at the reactor core, is sitting in the bunker with radiation burns on his face, knowing he will die (he lived 34 more days), and yet they're still yelling at him that he didn't see what he saw.

The Virtue of Common Sense

My favorite characters are the miners. Their absolute intolerance for BS adds levity to an otherwise relentlessly grim story.

Most people place common sense and logic in different categories, but they're wrong. Common sense is logic learned through hard experience and observation — as opposed to a philosophy class — and applied to practical everyday situations. Miners move rock for a living, and they do it deep underground. It's inherently dangerous work. Rock can't be reasoned with, bribed, cajoled, threatened, or generally talked into doing what you want it to do. Rock stubbornly follows the laws of physics, and as Sir Francis Bacon said, "nature, to be commanded, must be obeyed". When a miner screws up, the consequences are physical. They're real. They're true. The contrast between the miners and the bureaucrats could not be more stark.

Practical Applications

Jesus Christ is the way, the truth, and the life. He is also the creator of the universe. Consequently, the truth is woven into the fabric of the universe. Consequently, the truth is not just some abstract concept debated by navel-gazing philosophers, or theologians. The truth is equally real as the rock the miners move, and equally unforgiving. We can ignore the truth for a while, but the truth always eventually asserts itself.

Androspherians love to point out how women lie to themselves, but many Androspherians do the same. For example, one lie I've seen Androspherians repeat over and over is that people eat junk food like McDonald's because that's all they can afford.

Bull$h!t.

Six of my 10 kids still live at home. Our food budget is $1,300/month. 8 people * 3 meals/day * 30 days/month = 720 meals/month. $1,300/720 meals = $1.81/meal. And that doesn't even include all the snacks. Show me a meal at McDonald's that'll satisfy a 14-year-old male rugby player for $1.81. Go ahead. I dare you. The least expensive Happy Meal costs $6.29. Multiply that by 720 meals per month, and you get $4,528.80/month. It's such a stupid lie that 10 seconds of third-grade math proves it to be a stupid lie, yet I've lost track of how many times I've seen Androspherians repeat the lie that junk food is less expensive than healthy food. A man can lie to himself that all he can afford is greasy fast food, but eventually obesity, heart disease, diabetes, hypertension, and impotence will assert themselves, not to mention the opportunity costs of wasting money on garbage.

What is the cost of lies? Lies cost us the ability to solve problems. The truth is how we solve, or better yet, prevent problems. Bad news doesn't get better with time. The longer we refuse to accept the truth, the more painful the consequences get when the bill eventually comes due. And guess what? Men are the ones who usually get called upon to solve problems. From Legasov and Shcherbina, to the firefighters, to the miners, to the soldiers who had to clear radioactive debris, it was men solving the worst problems, oftentimes at the cost of their very own lives.

Even more so than women, men — especially Christian men — do NOT have the luxury to entertain lies, or liars. The cost is too high. I don't know if the storytellers meant to, but Chernobyl teaches that lesson masterfully.

You can stream Chernobyl on HBO or Amazon Prime.

There are No Longer any Class Differences among Prostitutes

Jack · 27 April 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Pr0st!tut!0n is now a well-respected profession, relatively speaking.

The Old Hierarchy of Sex Symbols

It used to be that there was a culture class difference between actresses, models, porn stars, and Pr0$t!tute$ (decreasing in that order).

Generally speaking…

1. Actresses carried a premium, because not only did they look good, they could also act, and many could also sing and dance. Actresses didn't model or engage with the sex industry because it tarnished their reputation, and besides, acting carried a higher status and better pay. (For the most part, the social norms of that time drew the line at nudity.)
2. Models looked good enough for photos, advertisements, etc., but couldn't present themselves well enough IRL to be an actress (otherwise they would act). Models wouldn't do P0rn, because that was a decrease in industry status, and then they would be excluded from the better-paying modeling gigs.
3. P0rn stars had a relatively higher status in the sex industry, so they wouldn't turn tricks on the street or work in a brothel. Some were famous and well-established in their own sphere.
4. It was fairly well recognized that once Pr0$t!tute$ of the street walking variety got into the trade, they were stuck in that scene until they aged out of it after a few short years, with little opportunity for advancement.

Things like beauty, charismatic charm, emotional maturity, intelligence, natural skill set, and, of course, sex appeal, were the major factors that determined where a particular woman fell in this professional hierarchy. Thus, it was rare to see an exceptionally ugly woman in films or an extremely beautiful woman in P0rn.

Mickey Mantle and Marilyn Monroe.

Life expectancy roughly correlated with this status as well. Famous actresses in the 20th century typically lived long lives in the limelight, and remained in the public eye long after retirement; while it was not uncommon for P0rn Stars and Pr0$t!tute$ to die young, often due to drug overdose, homicide, or suicide.

Of course, there were a few cross-overs, exceptions, and outliers — women who were actresses or models, and who also did some Soft P0rn* shoots — women like Jayne Mansfield, Marilyn Monroe, Sophia Loren, and others — and these women are still famous sex symbols to this day. However, these supermodels were the creme de la creme of the acting / modeling industry, and they were so famous that they could afford to lose a little bit of the shine on their reputation and still remain popular. But for the grand majority of aspiring starlets, it was like I described above, and this applied across all these industries. (Interestingly, many famous actresses who crossed into P0rn, including Mansfield and Monroe, died young, as if P0rn was a curse that inflicted an early death.)

The New Hierarchy of Sex Starlets

However, ever since Marilyn Monroe appeared nude in the first edition of Playboy magazine in 1953, the number of actresses and models who also did P0rn began to grow — slowly at first, then gaining steam in the 1970s with the advent of Women's Liberation, and then exponentially during the 1990s. The sex icon who broke the dam of moral opinion and turned the trickle into a torrent during the 1990s appears to be Sharon Stone, who posed for Playboy in 1990 to gain public attention and sensational notoriety for her role in Total Recall (1990) and her upcoming role in Basic Instinct (1992). In doing so, she strategically used her sex appeal to win attention, fame, popularity, stardom, and $$$ — a first in the film industry.

Sharon Stone appears in Basic Instinct (1992).

Since then, the number of actresses engaging in P0rn0graphic side gigs to accentuate their fame and fortunes has grown into a pipeline. Even lately, we are seeing some women go the opposite route of using their fame in P0rn to break into mainstream films (e.g. Jenna Jameson, Sasha Grey, Sunny Leone, et al.), and even national stardom. It is an epic marvel within the P0rn subculture that this is even acceptable to the wider public (indicating that the general moral norms of mainstream society are gradually sliding downhill).

What we are seeing, here and now, is the juxtaposition of the beauty industry, the performance entertainment industry, and the P0rn industry, as well as the internationalization and standardization of the same.

Within this new hierarchy, only the most beautiful, fit, and most feminine gals can get into the top-class tier. I'd guess it's the upper 10% or less, on par with the percentage of Top SMV males. The top one percenters with the most perfect bodies and faces, and the most libidinous sex appeal and a smooth touch of feminine charm, are receiving more than 50% of all the attention and $$$.

Furthermore, this new norm is bleeding profusely into the Sexual Market, which is separate from, and not the same as, the SMP, but still overlaps. By and large, and perhaps unsurprisingly, oversexed, ultra-feminine chicks of Far-Eastern Asian ethnicities are now the international standard for feminine beauty and charm. Thus, Westernized East Asian women totally dominate every agency, brothel, cast, forum, platform, and Sexual Market.

Conclusions

It used to be that a woman had to go to Hollywood and get to know someone "on the inside" there to get into acting. It was highly risky, and most women were flatly rejected, or waylaid on the casting couch (literally), and didn't make the cut.

But nowadays, it is not uncommon for casting directors to find upcoming actresses / performers by browsing through FB and IG reels of homemade iPhone videos that have gone viral. Jenna Ortega, for example.

Jenna Ortega is a self-made model with grassroots origins.
… or even homemade P0rn vids [example].

Now, the old hierarchy of Sex Symbols no longer exists as it once did. The disintermediation of the online sex industry and the mass publication and proliferation of sexualized images and videos on IG, OF, TT, X, and elsewhere has totally upended the old culture class system among so-called "professional" women.

Furthermore, women conducting XXX activities online to make money off of their sex appeal (AKA OASIS) do not receive nearly as much of the shame and stigma that traditional Pr0$t!tut!0n once carried. Seeing how self-produced OASIS starlets (e.g. OnlyF@n$, Str!pCh@t, etc.) are almost entirely online, operate freely, independently, and safely in the comfort of their own homes, and may or may not engage in actual P in V sexual intercourse as entirely optional, it is tempting, I think, especially to younger generations, to NOT think of their online activities as Pr0$t!tut!0n, but something of a presumably much less damaging sexual sin, like P0rn0gr@phy, or sexting, or stripping, or simply just lewd entertainment. There is also a tendency to think of OASIS as just another paying job or occupation, or a hobby, or an online activity, or possibly a social identity, or as a famous personality (as is widely hoped), at least for as long as a woman is young, attractive, and can maintain that image.

So, lest we forget, OASIS IS still selling sex, sex appeal, and/or sexualized content in one form or way or another, for money, which is, by definition, Pr0$t!tut!0n. Those who can't make much money at it, but still do it for the attention, are Attention Wh0res.

The same warnings to men still apply. Tread lightly at your own risk. Learn to wean yourself off of P0rn and Simping, and master your libido, lest it masters you.

Intro

In a previous post, entitled, Post Fall Slores — The Bible Thumping Variety: Girls Gone Bible (2025/6/20), which was part of a mini-series on Post-Fall / Born Again Slores, I covered Angela Halili and Arielle Reitsma, AKA Girls Gone Bible.

Recently, there's been some new revelations about the Girls Gone Bible duo, and it's NOT good.

Let's take a look.

Jake RattleSnake: Leaked footage EXPOSES Girls Gone Bible (2026/4/14)

Conveyed through a confrontational and sometimes mocking tone, Jake RattleSnake (JRS) focuses on the spiritual hypocrisy of GGB, and the brain-dead, memetic, pathetic, P_ssy pedestalization of the 'Christian' simps who adore them. He mixes leaked clips, old clips, screenshots, and sarcastic narration to argue that the GGB podcast is hypocritical "faith branding" rather than genuine Christianity. Overall, JRS presents this information to warn viewers to beware of poseurs, false teachers, and commercialized religion.

I would add that this is more evidence of why we should NOT accept female teachers in the church (1 Timothy 2:12), and NOT take Christian female role models (or 'modelers') too seriously.

Here's the breakdown of JRS's talk.

Summary of Transcript

[Abridged, edited, and rearranged for reading, with Jack's commentary added.]

In this video, JRS reviews video clips from a couple of other YouTube commentators. I wasn't able to locate the sources, so in the transcript below, their input is simply labeled "Male/Female Commentator".

JRS: The Girls Gone Bible, a spin-off of a [secular] name, Girls Gone Wild. Something has come out about them recently. You guys know these [Female 'Christian' influencers]? The ones that speak into the microphone like this [in a breathy, hushed tone of voice] about how they "just need a man who's tall and handsome and rich. That's what God wants [for me]." Okay.

Insincere Posture Posing

[0:19] JRS shows one video that depicts Halili and Reitsma praying with President Trump, and another one [4:17] of them praying for Trump at a Trump rally. He points out how Halili and Reitsma are so insincere that it's cringeworthy, like they're almost laughing at the audience for soaking it up.

JRS shows a reel of Halili saying, "I want a man 6'4. 6'2 is fine. Or like a retired NBA player. I just want somebody… like, I want his life to be the Bible. Like, I just want somebody who's so obsessed with the Bible and so obsessed with Jesus and who understands, and like we said, like, who can teach us things."

Jack: "Like that's just… like… just like… like… I just… be like…" [Groan!] Spare me the secular verbosity. Inserting a "like" in every sentence is lazy, unrefined speech, indicating a lack of spiritual refinement, and a sure tell of worldliness.

Tired, insincere smiles, fake posture posing… Looks like a TradWife. Talks like an L.A. Valley Girl.

Hanging with the Same Ole Slores

JRS shows a reel of Halili with a group of female peers in workout clothing, twerking their butts for the camera, groping and slapping their butts, and saying, "Owww! Baby! Come on!" … and other unintelligible expletives, characterized as a mock demonstration of unrestrained sexual passion. Meanwhile, Halili is passively saying, "Oh guys, come on! I don't do this stuff anymore. I have a religious podcast. Whoa, Rika!"

Halili posted a response reel in which she says, "I just want to say that that video was taken before Girls Gone Bible was even created."

Female Commentator: "Oh, really, Angela? Because the outfit you're wearing in that video is the same as the outfit you're wearing on the first episode of Girls Gone Bible."

JRS: Here, let's switch to the video to get a comparison really quick. Here's the video. Same dress, same outfits on both [videos], and she's literally talking about how she has a religious podcast [in the video with her wretched homies].

Jack: If she's posting videos of her girl posse twerking for views, and saying she already has a religious podcast, then there's an anachronism that betrays a lie in her saying, "that video was taken before Girls Gone Bible was even created." Unless she somehow thinks her GGB podcast was not full-fledged GGB at that time (?!?). If so, then she's pretty clueless.

Continued Escorting

JRS: What about the screenshot of these texts of Nicole asking you if you're 'working' May 24th of 2023.

Female Commentator: "Oh yeah, like 2 weeks after you posted your first podcast episode, right? And you said you were working as an escort that night. Wait, but I don't think you mentioned that in your video. Hmm. I wonder why?"

Halili: "I want to mention that is because I think it's so important for people to know our process in Girls Gone Bible."

Female Commentator: "Oh, right. Because you guys were escorts and I have receipts to prove it. And you would probably be still doing that if your podcast never took off and got viral. And now you shame women that dress immodestly because you made it and we haven't."

Continued Immodesty

Male Commentator: Now, if you don't believe that any of this is real and this is all just a conspiracy, well, we don't have to look far to see the effects of this pop Christianity everywhere. Just look at two of the most popular so-called Christian female influencers promoting 'modest clothing' under Three Nails clothing to millions of followers.

[Halili and Reitsma are shown in an advertisement video wearing form fitting, skin tight, Three Nails clothing.]

GGB: We are always looking for pieces that feel like us, something we can move in, feel confident in, and still reflect our values. That's why we've been loving the new collection from Three Nails. It's active wear that's modest, comfortable, and made for real movement. Whether it's a morning workout or just showing up with intention, these pieces were built to support you in it. Three Nails is all about faith-forward living. And this collection speaks to all who carry strength with softness and purpose in everything they do. Check out the new drop from Three Nails.

Jack: Whut!?! "Three Nails clothing is all about faith-forward living … to carry strength with softness and purpose … and to reflect our values … with 'intention'." !?! LIKE, baring your camel toe is, LIKE, an act of faith in, LIKE, reflecting your values, LIKE, NOW. LIKE, if you show your sleek physique, they will LIKE come!

Translation: "Showing up with intention" means, dressing to rake in 'Likes' and $$$ from thousands of simping simpletons.

And further, they claim to be 'modest'.

GGB: "So, we have a lot of very modest pieces. You know, even the swimwear that we have is very modest."

Jack: It's 'modest', compared to raw P0rn, which indicates their mental viewpoint.

That's LIKE, FAITH!?! LIKE, that's unbelievable!!! [LIKE, mock wankery!]

Commentator: Even the commenters raise their eyebrows.

- "Seems like a comedy skit."
- "This looks like any other gym clothing."
- One commenter pointed out the seriousness of invoking Christ's crucifixion so casually.

Phishing for $!mp$

JRS: Look, these chicks saw a gap in the market and they were like, "If we get two really attractive girls to do a podcast where they're talking about the Bible, that's going to go off." You're going to get all these simps. There's a huge problem with simps in the conservative movement among Christian guys. If they see a moderately pretty girl who says moderately based things — even if they don't believe it, and it's clear, even if below the surface, they're just feminists — they just jump on it.

The Trump Strumpets' Fruits

JRS: Now, the problem goes much deeper, and the crazy part is that the title, Girls Gone Bible, literally directly borrows from culture, applying it to scripture. Like, how does anyone think that this is appropriate?

Female Commentator: "Following the Lord, following God is not easy. It's not easy! It's counter-cultural."

Male Commentator: "What is holy is repackaged for attention. Christianity becomes internal claiming to be about the heart, while the outward life stays worldly and is separated."

Halili: "And we always say, come as you are, just don't stay that way. Let Jesus invade your life and change everything."

Female Commentator: "Keep lying because the real people you have hurt, the real lives you have ruined and tried to run away from are slowly creeping back to you."

Male Commentator: But Christ warns, "by their fruit you shall know them". And that our heart is not separate from the rest of our body. Because you see a trend. And a lot of men who have been traditional their whole lives and have now worked and achieved some degree of success, they say, "Yeah, but how do I know that the women who are closer to my age who now say that they want to be a Stay-at-Home-Wife [are really truly conservative Christians, not just in thought, but in willfully disciplined habit with respect to Christian Headship]?"

Jack: The answer is to be found through spiritual discernment, which is about as rare as a virgin who earnestly desires to be a SAHW from her youth, and plans accordingly.

Conclusions

JRS: There you have it, guys. A couple more things. Fuentes reacted to them. […] It would be kind of funny to see what he thinks about them.

Male Commentator: The Christian Feminist and author of Jesus Feminist explicitly states that, "patriarchy is not God's dream for humanity". So, the stated goal is obviously NOT to try to get rid of traditional Christians. It's simply to divide it enough to where they won't be a threat to national security and global interests.

JRS: [In this view,] Halili and Reitsma have played on two things here.

- The Male Viewpoint: The simps — the men will absolutely simp on them without a shadow of a doubt [thus weakening 'Christian' men].
- The Female Viewpoint: The women will all see them as pretty and popular and everything, and the women will all want to be like them because women are just so impressionable like that. And all the young Christian women will … want to be the next Girls Gone Bible. They can be pretty and modern and have all of the materialistic stuff and be [Attention Slores], but at the same time, they can speak softly and pretend to be all about Jesus in Jesus' name. Right.

Jack: Take that to heart, and beware!

The Rising Centrality of the Adult Entertainer

Intro

Here's one last post to recap the main points in this month's theme.

Nowadays, we are seeing sexy self-made starlets all over the internet, feeding the $!mp demand for sexualized content.

I don't know of any way to get an accurate figure, but I'd guess perhaps a plurality (~30%) or even a majority (>50%) of younger women are now posting scantily clad images and vids online in the hopes of receiving clicks, views, affirmation, social validation, and perhaps even beaucoup $$$ if all goes well.

Every time I log into IG, I see ~5 promoted / suggested posts of bare-skinned sex pots bouncing, jiggling, wiggling, and twerking their @$$ ends off like there's no tomorrow, for every 1 'real' post from someone in my following. My female students (some even as young as 13) give me their IG accounts, and when I go there, I see them dancing and twerking, midriffs exposed. It seems like practically every woman from 13 to 30 is in on it, all around the world, and there is no end in sight to it (except their @$$ ends).

In the last few posts (and this one too, as given in the Case Study below), I've covered some rather accomplished, beautiful, intelligent, internet-famous women, most of whom are also Pr0$t!tutes of the OASIS variety. We are amazed to find that they are all of the above, and without any shame whatsoever. Given the vast prevalence of similar imitators, it seems that these ultra-sexed-up women are the de facto role models of today's younger generation of women. And most poignantly, the stark new reality is that all this appears to be totally acceptable!

The new reality in social media is that high SMV women will bare all, or as much as they can get away with, for the sake of attention, 'likes', and $$$. And it does not really matter to their public viewers that they are de facto Pr0$t!tutes.

It doesn't even matter to the government. Tomb Refugee left a comment saying that several European women who applied for unemployment benefits had their payments suspended because they refused to accept employment in a brothel when the job was offered. I couldn't make a better case for the normalization of Pr0st!tut!0n than this. It's hard to believe that humanity has sunk this low.

Conclusions

To reframe this new reality, and to summarize the main thrust of this month's theme, it may be fitting to say that…

- Attention Wh0r!ng / OASIS / Pr0st!tut!0n is the new norm.
- A large number of women, I'd guess at least 30% of the population, are posting sexualized and/or self-objectifying videos of themselves online, baring beaucoup skin, dancing, twerking, and more.
- However, within this sultry paradigm of alternate reality, there are only a few women who can beat out all the competition to receive the majority of attention, clicks, likes, and $$$.
- It appears that many, if not most, younger chicks are looking at these top-class international models who are stripping to the bare minimum allowable, teasing and tempting male desire, and aspire to do the same.
- In view of the above, the grand majority of women are Attention Wh0res and/or Pr0st!tutes — in essence, if not in actual practice.

Case Study: Clara Trinity

Here's one more case study.

Name: Clara Trinity

Ethnicity: Chinese-German

Origins: Pensacola, Florida, U.S.A.

IG: https://www.instagram.com/claraxtrinity/

OF: https://onlyfans.com/claratrinity

X: https://x.com/trinity_clara

Model for Calvin Klein.

Her popularity is based on several characteristics.

- Mixed White/Asian with natural blonde hair (chestnut brown that fades to blonde as it gets longer).
- Very small, thin, and petite. 5 feet (152 cm.) tall and 40 kg.
- Perfect, glistening white teeth.
- Energetic, sunny personality, like the captain of a squad of cheerleaders.
- She appears very adorable, hometown, innocent, and sweet, like a girl next door.
- She genuinely likes men and enjoys entertaining them — with her body.

But then, despite all the above, she's really freaky and mesmerizing when her clothes come off.

- In her very first P0rn shoot, she took an 'unprotected', wet shot in her hole from a middle-aged man.
- She made hundreds of P0rn videos in just her first two years in the adult industry.
- She is not afraid to take risks, e.g., black men with gargantuan cocks, cream pies accompanied by gleeful grins, older men, etc.

She's only had 3-4 years in Hard P0rn, but it has aged her appearance 10-15 years. So I doubt that she'll be in the limelight for much longer.

But other than her defiled depravity, all in all, she is the epitome of what men desire in a woman — beautiful, thin and fit, sweet and innocent in public, and a no-holds-barred, grateful, raging slut in the bedroom. She offers hope that women might be what they were intended by God to be from the beginning (except for her promiscuity).

The interesting thing is that younger women are regarding her as an imitable role model, despite her immorality, rather than a man pleasing traitor to the Feminist, Gynocentric Order.

Could this be a good turn of events?

Lessons on Life and Marriage from Matthew 22

How Jesus reframed discussions with respect to Patriarchal Authority, the importance of children, and humor.

Intro

Matthew chapter 22 is a good one from the standpoint that Jesus is constantly reframing the premise of the argument on the leading religious scholars of the day.

Let's take a closer look at this chapter and see how Jesus handled controversial issues ranging from one's duty to authorities, election, Patriarchal Authority, the centrality of love, and the importance of children. (Text is from the NKJV.)

The Parable of the Wedding Feast

The chapter begins with a parable of marriage that describes election.

> [1] And Jesus answered and spoke to them again by parables and said: [2] "The kingdom of heaven is like a certain king who arranged a marriage for his son, [3] and sent out his servants to call those who were invited to the wedding; and they were not willing to come. [4] Again, he sent out other servants, saying, 'Tell those who are invited, "See, I have prepared my dinner; my oxen and fatted cattle are killed, and all things are ready. Come to the wedding."' [5] But they made light of it and went their ways, one to his own farm, another to his business. [6] And the rest seized his servants, treated them spitefully, and killed them*.* [7] But when the king heard about it*, he was furious. And he sent out his armies, destroyed those murderers, and burned up their city.* [8] Then he said to his servants, 'The wedding is ready, but those who were invited were not worthy. [9] Therefore go into the highways, and as many as you find, invite to the wedding.' [10] So those servants went out into the highways and gathered together all whom they found, both bad and good. And the wedding hall was filled with guests.
> [11] "But when the king came in to see the guests, he saw a man there who did not have on a wedding garment. [12] So he said to him, 'Friend, how did you come in here without a wedding garment?' And he was speechless. [13] Then the king said to the servants, 'Bind him hand and foot, take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth.'
> [14] "For many are called, but few are chosen."

A point worth noting is that the first parable ending in verse 14 makes the most sense from a Reformed theology standpoint. This is one of those passages that finally made sense to me after years of reading, once I read it from that perspective. If I am right, then Jesus talking in parables is one of the ways He shows His kindness upon His creation. He spares those He knows will not be saved the distress of knowing. I wonder how Peter felt knowing how he would die? He did not know the when, but in his case, knowing the how must have weighed heavily on him. There is hope in NOT knowing the future, just as there is the stress that comes from knowing under weak faith. It is an interesting topic to ponder because God does reveal parts of Himself to us this way.

The Pharisees: Is It Lawful to Pay Taxes to Caesar?

In the next parable in this chapter,

> [15] Then the Pharisees went and plotted how they might entangle Him in His talk. [16] And they sent to Him their disciples with the Herodians, saying, "Teacher, we know that You are true, and teach the way of God in truth; nor do You care about anyone, for You do not regard the person of men. [17] Tell us, therefore, what do You think? Is it lawful to pay taxes to Caesar, or not?"
> [18] But Jesus perceived their wickedness, and said, "Why do you test Me, you hypocrites? [19] Show Me the tax money."
>
> So they brought Him a denarius.
>
> [20] And He said to them, "Whose image and inscription is this?"
> [21] They said to Him, "Caesar's."
> And He said to them, "Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." [22] When they had heard these words, they marveled, and left Him and went their way.

I can easily see Jesus saying the same thing in other contexts, like…

"Wives, render therefore to your husband the things that are his. Your youth, your beauty, your body, your prime reproductive potential. Your submission, honor and respect. Unto others, be chaste and modest with that which belongs to him. Do not not throw your pearls before swine. Therefore, you shall glorify God with your body."

This is essentially what Paul told wives in Ephesians 5:22-33, 1 Timothy 2:8-15, and Titus 2:1-5. It all goes back to recognizing the proper structure of authority.

The Sadducees: What About the Resurrection?

In the next section, Jesus said,

> [23] The same day the Sadducees, who say there is no resurrection, came to Him and asked Him, [24] saying: "Teacher, Moses said that if a man dies, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife and raise up offspring for his brother. [25] Now there were with us seven brothers. The first died after he had married, and having no offspring, left his wife to his brother. [26] Likewise the second also, and the third, even to the seventh. [27] Last of all the woman died also. [28] Therefore, in the resurrection, whose wife of the seven will she be? For they all had her."
> [29] Jesus answered and said to them, "You are mistaken, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God. [30] For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are like angels of God in heaven. [31] But concerning the resurrection of the dead, have you not read what was spoken to you by God, saying, [32] 'I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob'? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living." [33] And when the multitudes heard this, they were astonished at His teaching.

The assumed truth in verse 24, which is the backbone of the Sadducees' argument, stands out to me.

If we think about this, even for merely a moment, we see the incredible importance that children have. It is to the point that brothers are supposed to take their deceased brother's widow and give children to her on his brother's behalf. I believe much of this has to do with a pattern of God working through families, both in the curse of sin and the blessing of salvation. (I don't know the how or why, but I do see this happening.)

Here's another one we can add to our list of ways that Feminism attacks men through the destruction of the family. When feminists push career over family or tell women they don't need a man, it is a shot at the kingdom via an attack on lineage. The women who espouse this are like the 'useful idiots' of the political left, who, in being pawns for a larger power struggle, are led down a path to their own unhappiness.

The Scribes: Which Is the First Commandment of All?

There have been several posts written on this blog about the longitudinal unraveling of the Enlightenment in the form of Positivism and Post-Truth Rationalism. Reading on in Matthew 22, we find this is nothing new.

> [34] But when the Pharisees heard that He had silenced the Sadducees, they gathered together. [35] Then one of them, a lawyer, asked Him a question, testing Him, and saying, [36] "Teacher, which is the great commandment in the law?"
> [37] Jesus said to him, "'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your mind.' [38] This is the first and great commandment. [39] And the second is like it: 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' [40] On these two commandments hang all the Law and the Prophets."

It is interesting that the Scribes, Sadducees, and Pharisees preferred to cling to the letter of the law, rather than fessing up to the point of it all, and doing the hard work of loving one another.

We see the same thing happening today.

People pick, choose, rationalize, and slice scripture passages to justify a doctrinal understanding of Christian morality, but fail to do the least jot or tittle to fulfill the purpose of it all.

Many women would rather blow up their marriages and d@mn their children, instead of extending the least bit of love in the form of respect to their husbands and a sense of duty to their children.

As the Good Book says in another passage concerning the end times,

> And because lawlessness will abound, the love of many will grow cold.
> Matthew 24:12; c.f. Mark 13:3-20; Luke 21:1-18 (NKJV)

Jesus: How Can David Call His Descendant 'Lord'?

On a lighter note, we see Patriarchal Authority alluded to in the next few passages — but with a twist.

> [41] While the Pharisees were gathered together, Jesus asked them, [42] saying, "What do you think about the Christ? Whose Son is He?"
> They said to Him, "The Son of David."
> [43] He said to them, "How then does David in the Spirit call Him 'Lord,' saying:
> [44] "The Lord said to my Lord,

> [45] If David then calls Him 'Lord,' how is He his Son?" [46] And no one was able to answer Him a word, nor from that day on did anyone dare question Him anymore.

Mark 12:37 adds a line to the end of this passage:

> "And the common people heard Him gladly."

In modern language, we would say they laughed their @sses off. This passage reveals that Jesus had a lively highbrow sense of humor, and that He was familiar with the incongruencies between profound truths and reality enough to draw up such humorous observations. Jesus also had the wits to use this riddle as a way to rebuff the Pharisee's foolish inquirys and rationalizations.

Men and fathers would do well to adopt a sense of humor and point out such incongruencies of life for several reasons.

- To play off various tests and challenges to his authority.
- For the joyful edification of their wives, families, and friends.
- To spark interest in the topic and rouse a meaningful discussion.

Closing Statements

Hope you got something out of this. I sure did.

All the best~!

Out of Nigeria — Part 1: Life in Nigeria

Jack · 4 May 2026 · Archived copy · Original

A Nigerian Christian young man tells of his family issues and the challenges to his faith.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Level Up!
Length: 3,400 words
Reading Time: 18 minutes

Foreword from Jack

In this 6 part mini-series, I'll convey the main content of 3 lengthy emails from a young Christian man in Nigeria. The original 3 emails contained a total of 8,700 words.

This post, Part 1, contains some general information about Nigeria, and conveys the main body of his first email, including the author's family background, his childhood, family relationships, parents, and siblings.

In these posts, I've taken the liberty to condense and reorganize the content in the interest of providing a clearly understandable and concise account, abbreviating the reading time, and easing reading.

Information about Nigeria

In 2023 and 2024, Nigeria was one of the top 10 countries with the most viewers on the Σ Frame blog.

Nigeria, located in West Central Africa, is the 30th largest country in the world and has a total area of approximately 923,769 square kilometers, which is slightly more than twice the size of California.

The Total Fertility Rate (TFR) is ~4.4-5.5 by various estimates, among the highest in the world, ranking 15th.

With 242M people, Nigeria is the most populous country in Africa, much more populous than the next most populous African state, Ethiopia (139M), and having more than twice as many people as the third, D. R. Congo (116M).

From what I can tell, Nigeria is an Honor vs Shame-based ethical culture, which might explain much of the author's testimony.

Southern Africa is mostly Christian, and Northern Africa is predominantly Muslim. Nigeria lies right on the Sub-Saharan split, with southern Nigeria being Christian, and Northern Nigeria being Muslim.

Nigeria is a religiously divided country, 50-56% Muslim and 43-49% Christian (by various estimates). The Christian share of Nigeria's population has grown from 35% in the early 1960s, peaked in the mid 2010s, but is currently in decline, due to a lower fertility rate relative to the Muslim population in the country.

Christian genocide is a thing in Nigeria. Estimates suggest that over 100,000 Christians have been killed in Nigeria since 2009, with violence particularly high in the north. Sources suggest roughly 4,000 to 7,000+ Christians are killed annually, with over 18,000 churches and schools attacked or destroyed, mainly by Muslim extremists and jihadist groups.

Excerpts from Message 1 of 3

[Written in September 2025. Received on 2025/11/12.]

Hello, good day.

I truly appreciate the work you do on your blog. I'm glad I came across it a few years ago, and over time, I've gained so much from your posts. You're doing a great job, not only you but also your fellow bloggers and the commenters around the Christian Manosphere. I've learned a lot from the extra insights and discussions shared in the comment section as well.

The reason I'm writing is because I find myself at a difficult point in life. I feel lost, without direction or mentorship, and I'm hoping that by sharing a little about myself, you might be able to offer me some guidance or point me in the right direction.

Family Background

I'm a 26-year-old Nigerian, the last of seven children — five girls and two boys. All the girls came first, then my older brother, and finally me.

For clarity, I'll give placeholder names for my family members in order of birth: Beatrice, Samantha, Amanda, Jane, Victoria, Brian, and me, Eric.

To be honest, there are serious issues in my family. I understand that every home has its challenges, but sometimes I feel ours is overwhelming. These problems began as far back as my parents' early marriage. They tried to keep things hidden, but those unresolved issues affected how we were raised. Now, as my parents have grown older, the problems have escalated beyond what any of us can manage.

I don't know much about my parents' early years together because that was long before I was born. But from what I've gathered, when my parents got married, my mother took in some of my father's younger siblings so my father could train and support them since he was financially stable at the time (he's the second-born among many brothers and two sisters). My father did his best for them until one by one they left; some succeeded, some didn't. He also tried to set up some businesses for my mother, though for reasons I don't fully know, those ventures didn't succeed.

My mother gave birth to my five sisters, and after much prayer, she gave birth to a boy, my older brother. But according to my mother, some of my father's brothers didn't want my parents to have a male child, probably fearing that a son would inherit my father's property, especially a house in our village, rather than it being passed on to them. (This is rooted in certain traditional beliefs.) Some of my uncles began spreading rumors that he was adopted and not my father's biological son. My mother prayed again, conceived once more, and then I was born. This shamed my uncles, who could no longer defend their fabrications. In reprise, they allegedly tried everything, spiritually and otherwise, to harm us. But by God's sovereign grace, their plans didn't succeed.

Childhood

Growing up as the lastborn, my parents, especially my mother, raised my brother and me in a way that made us weak and overly dependent. We were kind of overpampered and overprotected, and we never taught basic skills young men ought to learn, like building things or working with our hands, exploring the world on our own by going out of the house to events, or something like that.

It wasn't like I didn't want to do things or go out. It's because my mother always kept me indoors ever since I was young — what people in the West call being "grounded". I experienced this almost daily. And it wasn't just me. All of us children were hardly ever allowed out of the house. I think my parents' motive was fear, that I or my siblings might mix with the wrong crowd or befriend the wrong people.

In high school, I longed to play and hang out with my classmates after school. But every day, my mother would come to pick me up immediately. Many times I begged her to let me walk home with my classmates, but she always refused. I thought that was the only way I could bond with them outside the school environment, yet my parents would not allow it.

Even as I grew older, I couldn't leave the house without first asking permission. If it were just a short trip nearby, I might be allowed to go, but if it were farther away, it was usually a firm "No." And whenever I approached my father about going somewhere, his response was always, "Go and ask your mother." That wore me down. I often wished for a strong and authoritative father who could lead my brother and me into becoming strong men. Unfortunately, I didn't have that.

I often sensed that my father wasn't comfortable with the way my mother was raising us, but out of fear of her constant bickering (largely to blame him for his past mistakes in their marriage — he had cheated on her, and he would often expose his family's flaws to outsiders), he chose to stay silent.

This constant confinement affected me, and not only me, but also my brother. This upbringing made me soft-spoken, shy, and introverted. Deep down, though, I knew I wasn't really an introvert; I admired people who were outgoing and could easily start conversations. Over time, I began using YouTube as a tool to overcome this weakness. By God's grace, I can now say my introversion has lessened to the point where I lean more toward being an ambivert. I'm still a work in progress, but I've made great strides.

Parents

Case Study 1: His Mother's Character and Faith Beliefs

My mother is a staunch, charismatic, Word-of-Faith, prosperity believer. She places immense significance on dreams, visions, and "hearing God's voice" outside of Scripture, something I don't personally believe in. These beliefs cause many problems.

For example, anytime we have issues, she gaslights me with the story of my birth. She says that during a church service, the pastor declared, "There are babies everywhere! Angels are distributing babies! Grab your own now!" She claims she had a vision at that moment, in which a male child was thrown into her stomach. Sure enough, she later became pregnant, and I was born. Therefore, she says I was "born at the altar".

Furthermore, given the way she has led our family by exercising authority over my father, and how she has insulted my father because of disagreements in the past, it's reason enough for me not to trust anything she claims to hear from the Lord, even if what she says usually comes to pass. (I often wonder why my father never claims to have such experiences.)

I am seriously breaking away from all of that. I need to focus on a biblical church where Christ is preached and exalted. I know she doesn't understand; after 30+ years in a Pentecostal charismatic church, it won't be easy for her to let that go. But even if she doesn't want to open her mind, why must she restrict me from going to a place that aligns with my convictions? Why must she look down on it and assume it's not Christian without even giving it a listening ear?

Don't even get me started on her opinions about marriage, which was another point of our argument yesterday. She said that if a husband and wife disagree on something, it is the wife's role to persuade the husband not to do what he stands on doing; which is another way of saying the husband should do what the wife wants. I don't think she has ever listened to sound sermons on headship, authority, and submission in marriage in all her years of going to church, but what can you expect from a church where the wives are "co-pastors"?

Case Study 2: His Father's Character and Stance

Anytime a disagreement in the family came up, my father used to revert to my mother's opinion, and he let her make the major decisions. My father never had a word of his own as a man, perhaps due to guilt over mistakes he made early in their marriage that my mother continues to hold against him.

Last year, I told my father that I wanted to attend a different church that I found online [Reformed Baptist]. He told me to discuss it with my mother, which I didn't want to do. He refused to give me his own opinion until after he reported it to her. Once she decided she was against it, he immediately fell in line and told me not to go. Out of respect for him at the time, I obeyed.

But then he broke from her control when my eldest sister, Beatrice (now 45) wanted to get married. He went ahead and gave his blessing without my mother's approval. [They married in 2025. More on this below.]

Since then, my father and my mother no longer see eye-to-eye, despite living in the same house. While my father was against me going to this church last year, he now supports me. He says I should be careful and wise, but if it's something I'm convinced about, then I should go. But no one prepares food for him anymore except me, because he now always asks me to.

Siblings

As for my sisters, they've always carried a distorted view of marriage, men, and motherhood. I believe this perspective came largely from my mother's influence, and the Pentecostal church in Nigeria's view on it, combined with the lies of modern society, and it has become deeply ingrained in them. I wish I could help, but whenever I try to share a different perspective, they dismiss me as if I don't know what I'm talking about. So I leave them to believe whatever they choose.

Case Study 3: Steve and Beatrice

At the start of the year (2025), my eldest sister Beatrice began seeing a man introduced to her by a colleague at work. Let's call him Steve. At first, she disliked him because, as she said, his voice sounded old, and she wasn't interested. But over time, she decided to give him a chance and eventually told my mother about him.

Since they lived in different states, their relationship was mostly through phone calls and chats, which the entire family noticed since we all live together in the same house in the city. Two of my siblings — Samantha and Jane warned Beatrice not to make herself too available to Steve, but she didn't take their advice. She continued giving him her time and attention. My mother, however, soon began to dislike the relationship. Later, my father found out about Steve and eventually spoke with him over the phone. Surprisingly, he seemed to get along with him.

Then things grew complicated. My mother and two of my sisters claimed that Steve attended what they considered a heretical church; one that places special reverence on angels and perhaps dabbles in New Age practices. Beatrice denied this. She wanted Steve to come down and formally meet our parents. My father was open to the idea, but my mother absolutely refused. She wanted nothing to do with Steve and told my father to make Beatrice end the relationship. He didn't, though, because with Beatrice nearing 45 and none of his daughters yet married, he was deeply concerned. This created fresh tension in the family, reigniting old wounds and adding even more conflict to an already strained household.

Steve and Beatrice married later this year [2025], but this conflict has caused an ongoing division in our family.

Case Study 4: Amanda

Sadly, I recently lost one of my sisters, Amanda, to a chronic illness that was exacerbated by other underlying health issues and stress. According to the doctors, it was a pulmonary embolism, something she had been struggling with for some time. It became more noticeable last year, but after treatment, her condition improved — for a time. What she really needed was rest and a less stressful lifestyle. Unfortunately, the constant conflict and terrible drama in my family that followed Beatrice's marriage, in which my father broke from my mother's control, sadly led to Amanda's passing. To this day, my mother curses my father and my married sister, Beatrice, blaming them for her death.

Case Study 5: Victoria

My youngest elder sister, Victoria, now in her mid-30s, is the coolest of them all and the one I talk to the most. She is aware of my beliefs and my new church's doctrines, and she supports them. She is even critical of many Nigerian Pentecostal doctrines herself. Unlike the others, she is eager to learn and understand what is truly biblical. Because of this, my mother also treats her unfairly, seeing her as a traitor for not blindly following her lead, not just in my case, but in any disagreement, including the marriage of my eldest sister.

Case Study 6: Broken Brother Brian

Almost a decade ago, my brother Brian used to go his own way, trying to explore and build a life as a man. He wanted to leave home to find his footing. He wanted to explore, network, and hustle for himself instead of relying on our parents, but they stopped him. He has shared his own story with me of how our parents forcefully shut down his attempts to break free, meet people, and build his own life. They abused and insulted him and used every means to control him. My mother used the same emotional pressure tactics with Brian as she did with me: "You know how I cried and pleaded with God for you! Why are you hurting me? Do you want me to die before my time?" He tried to fight it, but they managed to break him down and bring him back home. This went on for two or three years. His story is lengthy, and I won't delve into it fully because, unfortunately, he hasn't been able to solve his problem.

Since then, I've noticed this is a pattern. My father and mother have always tried to stop anything we do that they don't agree with.

Years ago, they used to try to get him a civil service job, but he didn't want to rely solely on that because it might not work out for him in the long run. They are still trying to help him secure a similar job, to no avail. He's been out of work for so long that no one will take him.

Now, almost a decade later, he's almost 32, and he's still here, living at home. He has no job, no money, no close friends, no mentors, no wife or prospects, no motivation, no purpose, and no direction. He doesn't attend church regularly. Although he's still trying to land a job, he just stays indoors all day, feeling depressed and hopeless.

He's just lost … completely lost!

Seeing my elder brother in this situation is a stark warning for me. However, he is fully supportive of me. He told me he completely understands how I feel, as he has gone through something similar.

Summary

[Partially ghostwritten by Jack.]

My parents are in constant conflict because my mother refuses to see the value of Biblical male headship and female submission.

My aunts and uncles conspire to undermine our family, wrest inheritances from my father, and they've spread false, destructive rumors to further their schemes.

My only brother has no job, no money, no friends, no wife nor prospects for marriage, and he is depressed and without hope.

My oldest sister, Beatrice, recently married, but due to her age, she will probably not have any children. Because my father approved of her marriage and my mother objected to it, this caused a major rift that has split the family into two camps, roughly men vs women.

My third oldest sister, Amanda, perished due to chronic health issues and the constant stress of living in our home.

My remaining 3 sisters are unmarried and childless well into their mid-30's, late 30's, and early 40's, and because of their age, even if they were to marry, they will probably remain childless.

My second and fourth oldest sisters, Samantha and Jane, are particularly stubborn in siding with my mother. They will often gang up with each other to support each other, make their case, and carry out their schemes. Even though my father began to stand up to them lately, the men in my family remain powerless against them. We are always trapped in a stalemate that is uncomfortable, troublesome, and discouraging for the men, but always seems to empower the women.

All the women in my family, except maybe Victoria (#5), have a very myopic view about headship and even against my (Reformed Baptist) church because of their stance against women pastors, saying it's discrimination and making women seem invaluable. This is something they've gotten from my Mother, her Pentecostal Word of Faith views on marriage and marital roles, as well as social media and entertainment.

Honestly, a man who knows what he wants and values in a woman will reject them in a second, especially someone like me who is Red Pill aware. I admit I'm nowhere close to being a masculine man in any way, I'm just aware of these things, thanks to my love for reading and learning anything I can learn that is valuable and will give me wisdom, as I have no one to teach me the ways of the world since I'm usually indoors every day. But I will stand by what I believe is true.

That should give you a clearer picture of the toxic environment I'm in. Honestly, if you saw my family now, you would be both amazed and deeply saddened.

Out of Nigeria — Part 2: Education, Military, and Career Plans

A Nigerian Christian young man tells of his endeavors to prepare himself for a career.

Foreword from Jack

This 6 part mini-series conveys the main content of 3 lengthy emails from a young Christian man in Nigeria.

The previous post, Part 1, contains some general information about Nigeria, and conveys the main body of his first email, including the author's family background, his childhood, family relationships, parents, and siblings. This post, Part 2, tells of his education, career preparation, and military experience.

In these posts, I've taken the liberty to condense and reorganize the content in the interest of offering a clearly understandable and concise communication, abbreviating the reading time, and easing reading.

Education and Career

As for my career path, it has been confusing.

Back in high school, I was addicted to video games and cartoons. I never gave much thought to what my real interests were. At one point, I even wanted to study Mechanical Engineering, mostly because of Iron Man. I admired him for being smart, rich, popular, and inventive. At that time, I never thought that Iron Man was a complete fantasy — nothing like a real-life occupation. I never thought that maybe I am NOT like Tony Stark. When I failed to gain admission for that, I turned to Computer Science.

Because of being kept indoors all throughout my childhood, I dreamed of studying at a university far away from home for two main reasons. First, I wanted to attend a university [in the region of my ancestral origins in Eastern Nigeria], hoping that by being surrounded by people there, I could finally learn my native language. Even though my parents spoke it often at home, I never managed to pick it up because I wasn't immersed in it with my peers. Second, I wanted to know what it felt like to live independently, away from my parents' constant watch.

But those hopes never materialized. Instead, I was admitted to a university close to home. My parents drove me there and back every day until I finally gathered the courage to confront my mother about it. The argument was heated, but eventually she allowed me to go on my own — though she insisted I return home immediately after classes. I never stayed in a hostel or lived independently; it was always straight from home to campus and back home again.

So I studied Computer Science at the University, and I interned at a finance institution during my undergraduate days.

So why did I choose Computer Science? Simply put — money. In Nigeria, there's pressure to choose a "promising" course that will guarantee a well-paying job, and at the time, Computer Science seemed like a safe bet. I was also thinking maybe I could design video games since I loved 2D games so much.

But after entering University, I cut down drastically on playing video games, especially after being influenced by The Red Pill and other masculine voices that warn against wasting too much time on them. So that caused me to become less interested in this field, and to be honest, I didn't believe I could succeed in the field of Computer Science.

Why not?

Unfortunately, not long into my studies, I soon realized that coding, programming, and software development are not my strengths. I tried over and over but kept failing, so I gave up.

To be honest, I struggled academically all through University. I never failed a course outright, but I had lots of low grades, a lot of 'D's and 'E's, and only once did I ever get an 'A' throughout my entire degree. It was hard for me to juggle the transition from high school, and commuting every day with my mother left me in a poor mood to concentrate, which might be part of it, but nevertheless, I didn't do well despite trying. I often wonder if it's because I'm not smart enough, or maybe it just wasn't my calling.

Case Study 7: Mike, A Professional Friend

There is a fellow computer science student from my University days that I keep in touch with. I'll call him Mike. We were university classmates, same school, same courses, same year of graduation. He was a pretty good student, and he was able to learn the high-level programming that is necessary to make good money in this profession. Like me, he also lives with his parents, but unlike me, he has a stable career as a software engineer and is financially independent; he just chooses to stay at home for his own reasons.

Unfortunately, I'm not as skilled as he is in programming. It's not that I'm bad with computers or don't know a bit of coding, but to get to that professional, high level … nah, I couldn't.

Leaving Home for the Military!

My first real taste of life outside the home came after I graduated from University, during the National Youth Service Corps (NYSC) — a one-year paramilitary program here in Nigeria. It begins with three weeks of orientation camp, followed by ten months of service at a company, school, or industry. My parents, of course, wanted me to serve in our region close to home, so I did. But those three weeks in orientation camp were unforgettable. For the first time, I shared a room with a group of young men — talking, laughing, bonding, especially in the hostel, even though we were often pulled away for drills and exercises. That experience gave me a glimpse of the "band of brothers" I had always heard about, and it's something I wish I could have again.

Also, during my year with the NYSC, I taught at a school.

Current Plan of Action

From reading all that I have written, you might think that I am lazy. Yes, I stay home all day, pressing the phone, scrolling through social media, reading books, articles, and the Bible. But I want to be clear: I am not lazy. I lack motivation, and I lack motivation because I lack a clear mission. Sadly, I have not yet found a concrete mission to pursue, which I know I ought to have.

Despite my lack of purpose, I believe I have something to offer. I have computer skills, particularly in data analysis, which I learned last year. And I can build more as long as deep programming is not involved in it. However, I haven't honed them further due to depression and a profound lack of clarity and purpose from being isolated at home. This stagnation is not only due to my lack of motivation, but is also fueled by fear. I remember being severely scolded earlier this year just for visiting Mike, even though I returned home by 6 p.m. And I am nearly 27! When things like this happen on a regular basis, it is extremely demotivating!

Last year, I delved into learning data analysis and learnt how to use Excel, Power BI, Python, and a bit of SQL. However, I lacked the motivation to continue, so I gave it a long pause.

But with time and support, I am confident I can nurture my computer skills. It will probably take the rest of the year to sharpen them, especially in SQL and maybe Python, but with God's grace, I aim to be ready for a job by early next year (if I'm motivated to continue in this path). All I need is to be within a network of people. I believe someone might be able to help me, maybe someone at church.

Reflections on the Pentecostal Church in Nigeria

You may be wondering about my church life.

I grew up in a Pentecostal church because that's where my parents were rooted, and I was even dedicated there as a child. But over time, I began to see things differently.

Most of the churches in my area are Pentecostal, and the only other major denomination nearby is Roman Catholic, which I also disagree with doctrinally.

Many Pentecostal churches here focus on prosperity preaching, "name it and claim it" doctrines, endless deliverance services, and the ordaining of women as pastors, all of which I no longer believe align with the right application of Scripture.

My change of heart didn't happen overnight or in a vacuum of contemplation.

I mentioned before that my mother is a staunch, charismatic, Word-of-Faith, prosperity believer. She places immense significance on dreams, visions, and "hearing God's voice" outside of Scripture, something I don't personally believe in. These beliefs cause many problems in our family.

- Anytime we have issues, she uses her dreams, visions, and "God's voice" to gaslight me into thinking her word is equivalent to God's authority, and that to disagree with her or disobey her is equivalent to rebelling against God. Of course, she never says this, but that is how it comes across.
- She has led our family by exercising authority over my father, and she has disrespectfully insulted my father because of disagreements in the past.
- Because my mother disagreed with my father over my eldest sister's marriage, this caused a major rift that has split the family into two, and I believe the bitter conflict and constant stress contributed to the death of one of my sisters.
- [There's more, covered in other posts here.]

Altogether, it's reason enough for me not to trust anything she claims to hear from the Lord, even if what she says usually comes to pass. (I often wonder why my father never claims to have such experiences.)

Discovering The Red Pill

In 2021, I stumbled upon the "Red Pill", and it was there that I first encountered the concept of masculinity through Red Pill sources. While much of its content and their descriptions of human sexual interactions contained a measure of truth, I could not agree with their prescriptions because they were immoral and contrary to God's law, and were too debauched for my Christian convictions. Still, as I listened more and more, my heart began to be corrupted. I even started to think about immoral ambitions like working hard just so I could "earn money and sleep with many women."

However, one particular work, Red Pill Volume 4: Religion, by Rollo Tomassi, opened my eyes to how deeply feminized the modern church had become.

This exposure made me think seriously about my faith.

By God's grace, that discovery eventually led me to other blogs that emphasized biblical gender roles, Headship, Patriarchy, and true biblical fatherhood. The first was Biblical Gender Roles. While I didn't agree with everything written there, much of it resonated with me. From there, I discovered other blogs like Σ Frame, Sharkly, Full Metal Patriarchy, and later began reading Dalrock's older posts and others you've linked to, as well as many other recommended Christian books and resources. I've also listened to and still listen to masculine podcasts like The Hard Men Podcast by Eric Conn [now discontinued], It's Good to Be a Man, The King's Hall, and others.

Around the same time, I also came across discernment channels on YouTube and Reformed teaching from men like John MacArthur, R.C. Sproul, Voddie Baucham, Paul Washer, and others. Through their sermons and videotalks online, I was introduced to solid Reformed teaching and, for the first time, experienced verse-by-verse, expository preaching with proper exegesis. This is very different from what I grew up with, which often involved reading ourselves into the text instead of drawing the meaning from it and adjusting our beliefs and life habits accordingly.

I also learned from pastors such as Eric Conn, Brian Sauvé, Joel Webbon, and others who teach on biblical manhood. [See New Christendom Press on YT.] Their solid expository preaching exposed the corruption of the [secular] Red Pill mindset I had started absorbing and helped uproot the immoral intentions growing in my heart.

I've gained so much from these sources, though I know nothing can replace the guidance of a strong father figure and the camaraderie of a church fellowship. Still, I'm grateful for the Biblical / Red Pill knowledge I've been able to gather.

The Red Pill in Nigeria

Even though the West still widely supports sexual immorality, like LGBTQ, and continues exporting cultural poison just as Feminism was exported in the past, you still have some strong voices in the West speaking about biblical masculinity, as I mentioned above.

Sadly, there's nothing like that here in Nigeria.

Here in Nigeria and maybe much of Africa, most of the voices promoting masculinity are not Bible-believing Christians. They're rooted in the secular Red Pill movement. There are indeed some voices exposing the behavior of modern women, but they speak from the secular Red Pill perspective; people like Andrew Tate or Myron Gaines, for example.

There's no one I'm aware of [in Africa] who addresses manhood, femininity, fatherhood, motherhood, marriage, Red Pill ideology, Feminism, and related issues from a Christian point of view. I don't know of any Christian voices who understand men's struggles, face down the loud Feminism of today, uphold biblical standards, and clearly teach male headship, authority, and female submission strongly and without compromise.

Even the few pastors who might want to address these topics often avoid speaking from a biblical patriarchal perspective, especially since many of their wives are co-pastors, which makes you question the kind of "masculinity" they're teaching.

This is a significant problem in Nigeria. Altogether, it leaves me deeply concerned about the moral state of our nation.

Knowing and learning all these things over time has made me wonder if I could step into this gap, but maybe not, because I myself have not been mentored by a man, and I still have a lot to learn. But, probably in the future it could happen.

Current Dibs

What has the Pentecostal church in Nigeria, and even the rest of the world, done to the family structure and the gospel message? People have become so biblically inept and blind that even when they see the truth, they refuse to accept it.

Now, I no longer see Pentecostalism as truly masculine. In my mind, if the [Pentecostal] church had been more masculine in its teaching and leadership, perhaps my own family would have turned out differently.

To be honest, among everything I've shared, this is what troubles me the most.

I am seriously breaking away from all of that.

On my own, I now spend time reading, learning, and watching things I wish I had been taught while growing up, topics I believe are either missing in Nigeria or not voiced loudly enough. One of those is masculinity.

Right now, I've stopped attending my parents' Pentecostal church. I need to find a biblical church where Christ is preached and exalted, but I haven't yet found a solid, biblically sound church near me.

Currently, I listen to a Reformed church in Nigeria online because the distance prevents me from attending in person. But I know nothing can replace gathering physically with other believers to worship God together. I pray that one day the Lord will graciously allow me to be part of a solid, Bible-believing church that I can attend regularly on the Lord's Day and whenever they hold other services or conferences.

I'm far from perfect, but I thank God for His mercy, and I believe this journey has been for a reason.

Foreword from Jack

This post conveys the main content of the 2nd and 3rd of 3 lengthy emails I received from a Nigerian Christian young man on 2025/11/12. The original emails contained a total of 8,700 words.

In Part 1, I gave a description of his family background, home life, and social situation. Part 2 contained his education, military experiences, and preparations for his career in Computer Science. Part 3 offered his reflections on Pentecostal churches in Nigeria, his experience in taking The Red Pill, and the general status of The Red Pill in Nigeria.

This post, Part 4, describes specific instances of conflicts in his family that regular readers will quickly recognize as the dynamics of a controlling, devouring Matriarchy.

Here, I've combined, condensed, and reorganized selected excerpts from his 2nd and 3rd messages, and separated several events that he described into individual "Incidents" for ease of reading. I've also recounted the calendar days in his story and added dates to specific events to help readers keep track of the developments.

Excerpts from Messages 2 and 3 out of 3

Hello again, this is an email I constructed in the first week of November [2025], but didn't send it to you. I don't usually feel comfortable sharing my burdens with others, hence the delay, but at this point, maybe that's what I have to do, even if it's anonymously.

I need your advice on how I should go about dealing with my mother. Her manipulation and control are becoming too much to handle, and it's about church.

She gaslights me into making church issues personal, demanding I do what she wants. She's now insisting I leave the church I've started attending — a Reformed Baptist church where I've already connected with the pastors and members of the congregation. Her reasons are that it's farther away than the local Pentecostal churches that she wants me to attend, and that it's NOT of the Pentecostal Denomination that she believes in.

Incident 1: A Familial Conflict over Faith Traditions

Last weekend (2025/10/31-2025/11/1), I planned to attend a 2-day conference hosted by a church I've been listening to online.

Before I left on Friday (2025/10/31), my mother called and tried to persuade me not to go. She seemed worried that I was getting involved with a cult, like the Jehovah's Witnesses or Mormons. I explained that this church is part of the Reformed denomination, but she wasn't familiar with that. In her view, the only true churches are Pentecostal Word of Faith congregations, which are very common here in Nigeria. She believes any church outside this movement is false, because, to her, they don't align with the events of Acts 2 on the day of Pentecost.

Church history isn't typically taught in many Nigerian churches. When I tried to explain a bit of church history to her, she became angry. She said that I've read and studied too much 'rubbish', and that this is how people deviate from the Christian faith.

I told her that knowledge and study are important, but she wouldn't hear any of it. I tried to persuade her to just listen to a sermon if she has doubts, but she refused. I even offered to send her the sermons from the conference so she could judge for herself, but she refused, insisting she already "knows" it's dangerous. I asked her how she could know that without having even heard it.

We had a long back-and-forth argument about her disdain for this church that Friday, but I eventually left and attended the conference both days. I went to the conference on Friday, came home, and then went there again on Saturday.

Incident 2: A Familial Conflict over Church Attendance

At the conference, I learned that the Reformed Baptist church that hosted the conference has several sister churches in my region. On Sunday (2025/11/2), I planned to go to one of the sister church buildings in person. It's quite far from where we live. As I was getting ready, my mother saw me and asked where I was going with a strong, vigorous tone. I told her I was going to one of the churches that organized the conference and mentioned its location.

She immediately disapproved of my decision, and objected to the distance, asking why I had to go so far. She kept insisting I go to one nearby, but I stood my ground. I explained that I couldn't attend the local churches around here because I don't resonate with or agree with the teachings. I told her I specifically want to go to this church because I understand their doctrine and find it more biblical compared to the common Nigerian Charismatic Word of Faith teachings that are found around us.

When she realized I was still determined to go, she rushed over and physically blocked my way. She angrily insisted "You are going nowhere!", and demanded to know, "Why are you doing this thing?!?"

In response, I asked her, "Why are you "doing this thing" and controlling me?"

That made her calm down a little. She complained a bit more, but eventually moved out of the way, and allowed me to pass so that I could leave for church that morning.

Attending the Reformed church in person was a deeply needed experience. I thoroughly enjoyed the fellowship, the sermon, and the interactions. I was truly blessed. This is exactly what I have been lacking: getting out of the house, going somewhere, and meeting other Christians. I'm tired of being stuck indoors all day, every day, with no one to talk to.

After the fellowship, I shared one of my immediate burdens with some members: the cost of transport to the church. They said they would be willing to assist for a short while if I am sure about joining them. I also decided to share my desperate need for a job (not this time, but in the near future), in case anyone is willing or able to help. Isn't that one of the purposes of the church — to help lighten each other's burdens and to provide social networking?

When I finally returned home around 4:00 p.m. (I was delayed by heavy rainfall), my mother was waiting for me. "Sit down here", she said. What followed was a long lecture about how I had no right to call her controlling, especially since I'm aware of what she has gone through in the family. She went back over all the things she had sacrificed, her personal battles, and struggles to keep the family together, harmonious, and safe. I listened to her carefully and respectfully, but she did not change my resolve to go back next Sunday.

Incident 3: Another Conflict over Church Attendance

This Sunday (2025/11/9), as I was getting ready for church, my mother aggressively told me to go with her to her own church. But I had already set my mind to attend the Reformed Baptist church, and I was so afraid of her reaction that I snuck out and went to my church instead.

I am sorry to confess, I had been masturbating with porn the day before (2025/11/8), so I went to my Reformed church feeling convicted and desiring a means to repent. They were doing a series on Titus, and the sermon was good. The topic was on "Work Adorned with Grace and Above Reproach" from Titus 2:9-10. It hit me hard, and I left wanting to repent, find a job, and "work as unto the Lord". But how can I possibly follow through with that zeal after the massive, hours-long conflict with my mother that starts the moment I get home?

There was a small glimmer of hope, though. After the service, I was fellowshipping with the saints and spoke to a brother about being unemployed despite having a degree. He mentioned that where he works, they might need an instructor to teach tech to high school students or children. Since I have a computer science degree and some teaching experience, I'm open to it. He took my résumé and said he'd get back to me.

I also had a talk with the pastor. I summarized my situation for him — how my mother opposes Reformed beliefs and is actively controlling me and trying to stop me from attending. His only advice was for me to "be wise" and that he would pray for me. I don't think he fully grasps the severity of my case, and I don't blame him. You, too, may not fully understand, but as the one wearing the shoe, I know exactly where it pinches.

When I got back home (around 4 PM), my mother came in shortly after and started hurling insults at me for leaving without her permission. My mother claimed that because of what I had done, she hadn't eaten anything from the time I left for church at 7:00 a.m. until I returned at 4:00 p.m. She said I was trying to give her pain and "kill her", then she shut herself in her room for the rest of the day. This made me feel guilty, but I was glad to be left in peace.

The next morning (2025/11/10), she came to talk about the incident. She spoke for a long time, and I listened carefully and didn't interrupt her out of respect, believing that I shouldn't cut a parent off while they're talking. But when she brought up an example about an angel appearing to Joseph (Matthew 1:18-25), and Gaslit me again by referring to the circumstances of my birth, I tried to explain the context of the passage. She wouldn't have it. She immediately started complaining about so many different things that I couldn't even keep track of them all, completely refusing to hear anything I had to say.

This led to an argument about why I won't attend the Pentecostal churches nearby. I explained it's because of their "Prosperity Gospel" messages and their ordination of women pastors, pointing out that they don't emphasize male headship and that women are not meant to train boys to become men. When my mother heard this, she made wild assumptions, accusing me of saying women are useless and that I was insulting her personally.

I tried to explain my position using scripture, but she just resorted to insults. She argued, "So if a woman feels convicted by the Holy Spirit to pastor, she should ignore it?" I told her that a genuine conviction from the Holy Spirit would never go against the clear teaching of the written Word. She just insulted me again and then went upstairs and brought my two elder sisters into it.

After a time in which I can only assume she drew my elder sisters to her side of the argument, they called me upstairs, and my mother repeated her side. Our argument was intense. They immediately had a problem with the fact that my new church doesn't preach the prosperity gospel and is against women pastors. They started claiming that my church and I are just "critics" who think we're the only perfect church. I explained that while no church is perfect, you shouldn't stay in one that teaches grave errors and heresy. I told them that's why I left my previous churches two years ago and even stopped going to church for a while before finding this Reformed one.

I tried to talk to them about church history and sound biblical interpretation, but they shut me down. They said I've "read and read and now I'm reading rubbish", and that this is how Satan deceives people who are destined for greatness. They weren't buying any of my explanations.

Then they twisted the issue, claiming that if my church doesn't allow women pastors, it's because they hate women and don't see them as valuable. I explained that that wasn't true — women have vital roles, just like in the home, but in church leadership, the Bible reserves the office for men. They called it a lie. I pointed them to scripture, and though they wrote the references down, I doubt they'll read them. I even read Titus 2:3-5 to them about the older women teaching what is good, but they tried to twist it, saying it doesn't just mean that, and that women can still be pastors.

It all just devolved into more abuse. One of my sisters claimed my views are only because I'm not married, and that any wife I get will change my perspective because "no woman will tolerate such a place." I told her plainly that no woman will change my mind on this, and that I will specifically vet any woman I'm interested in for her views on headship and authority. In response, my mother warned me not to say anything that would make her "open her breast" and curse me. She reminded me that I was "gotten through prayer", and according to her, "what prayer gives, prayer takes away".

Their final argument was that since Jesus appeared to Mary and Martha first after His resurrection, and it was women who first visited His tomb (Matthew 28:1-10; John 20:1-18), then women can be pastors. I tried to explain why that reasoning was flawed, but it was useless. The whole conversation was just shouts, noise, and insults.

Her final stance was that I am not to go to the Reformed church anymore, and that was that. She also took away from me the catechism booklet the church gave me, though I honestly hope she reads it, as I'm familiar with the authors and believe their teachings are sound. But I can only presume that she has thrown it away in her anger.

If she and my sisters don't want to accept it, that's fine. I leave them to their own beliefs. But why stop me? Why hinder and control me using Gaslighting, insults, and manipulation to keep me from it? Why can't she let me live my life the way I see fit?

My mother has stated that she will only leave me alone once I am married, and I suppose that is only because she will direct her vitriol at my future wife, instead of me. But until then, how can I learn to walk in my own convictions if I am controlled by my mother? How could I ever find a wife while I am under the influence of a controlling mother? And for all I know, my future wife might simply continue where she left off, or even conspire with my mother to hold me back and tear me down.

Incident 4: Consulting ChatGPT for Information about the Reformed Church

At one point during our discussion, they resorted to using ChatGPT to ask about Reformed Baptists. My sister read the results out loud to my mum. She read about the church's stance against the prosperity gospel, which it termed unbiblical, and its opposition to women pastors, saying it was against God's word. These were the two main issues they had a problem with, along with their views on speaking in tongues, seed faith, and tithes.

Instead of considering the information, they used it to insult and gaslight me. My mother started reminding me of the pain she went through to conceive me, asking if this was how I wanted to repay her. She said she has carried me in her mind, ever since the way my father's brothers treated her, and now I'm treating her the same by going to a church that "disregards women."

I was completely confused. Nothing in the ChatGPT result said that Reformed churches disregard women; in fact, it stated that women are valuable and have roles in other ministries, like women's and children's ministry, mercy, missions, and evangelism. I don't know why they see this biblical position as such a serious sin. It's right there in the Bible — why can't they submit to it?

The Familial Fallout

We've had many other arguments.

After all our arguments over my choice to attend another church, she accused me of following in my father's footsteps. After a major disagreement my parents had over my eldest sister's marriage, which I mentioned in my previous email / post, my father essentially stopped obeying her and began allowing us children to do what we wanted, as long as it wasn't entirely bad. Because of his change of heart, he would easily permit me to attend the conference that I told you about in the last email, and this other church I described above — something he stopped me from going to last year when he and my mother were still in agreement.

My mother now constantly curses and insults my father over his support for my elder sister's marriage, and how he has carried on without my mother's involvement since then, and also the tragic death of another one of my sisters (see previous email / post).

Hearing these words from my mother about my father every day is a major reason I am growing so angry, sad, and unhappy. It creates a painful contradiction: Every morning, she gathers us for prayers, but to me, it feels like we are just deceiving ourselves, because I know she is not submitting to my father's decisions, and her prayers reflect this attitude. This is another reason I am desperate to be in a sound, biblical church. My soul needs to be saved, sanctified, and at peace with God. That is what ultimately matters.

Yes, my mother is tough. When I stand my ground, she often resorts to tears, emotionally recounting the difficult circumstances around my birth and her burdened heart, and she says it would "kill" her if I do not do what she wants. During these heated arguments, one of my sisters, who is usually present, will tell me to calm down, saying, "You know how emotional women are."

I've realized for a while now that the women in my family may not have a model of true Biblical femininity, just as my brother and I lack a model of true Biblical masculinity. Who would mentor us in these roles? I once mentioned to my mother that women cannot train boys to become men, which she took as an insult. I tried to explain it wasn't an insult but a fact, and that the statistics on fatherless or weak fathers present in homes support this. She didn't want to hear any of it.

Moving Forward

To be honest, I deeply want to continue with this church. The fellowship I experienced with this small crowd of Reformed believers was a huge, lovely blessing — something I never had while growing up in a large Pentecostal church with my family. It helped lift the burden of my frustration and sadness. All I needed was to be among like-minded people. Even though I'm currently jobless, the experience has given me a bit of motivation to continue practicing my data analysis skills and other little skills like editing in Canva, video editing, etc. It's something I can eventually advertise about myself, rather than staying indoors week in and week out.

However, I know if I try to go to church next week, my mother will complain. I will try to talk to her beforehand, but knowing my mother, she won't agree. She rarely sees things from my perspective and will downplay my thoughts until I do what she wants. But I will still insist on going next week regardless, I'm not the type that tolerates a woman reviling my decisions (even my own mother), or maybe it's just hard for me to speak in a gentle, emotional, or encouraging way, especially to a woman who acts strong-headed or tough. I'm not sure if that's how my mother expects me to talk to her, especially when she's being firm or insistent about what she wants me to do for myself.

Closing

I am not saying all this to spite my parents, especially my mother. I truly love them and want to honor them as the Bible commands. I always try to help them in any way they ask. But I don't understand why my mother cannot allow me to walk in the path of my own convictions. She still sees me as a small baby, and during our heated arguments, she says that I lack wisdom, which, in other words, could mean she doesn't trust my own convictions, especially if it's contrary to what she holds.

The reason I am writing to you is to ask for your advice in any way you can give it. I would be more than happy to provide further clarification to help you advise me better, as I feel so lost and confused. I also appreciate your blog posts; although I haven't kept up with them recently, I will try to from now on.

Please also, feel free to help share this with consistent commenters on your blog like Deep Strength, Red Pill Apostle, Oscar, TheDeti, and anyone you know who can help advise me, it will be appreciated.

Best regards.

A Nigerian Christian young man tells of the challenges in his life and his faith, and what he plans to do about it.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Level Up!
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Foreword from Jack

This 5 part mini-series conveys the main content of 3 lengthy emails from a young Christian man in Nigeria. The original emails contained a total of 8,700 words.

The first post, Part 1 in this mini-series, contained the main body of the first email and contains information about Nigeria, the author's family background, his childhood, parents, siblings, and family relationships. Part 2 covered his education, military service, and career aspirations. Part 3 contains the author's personal views on churches in Nigeria and The Red Pill in Africa. Part 4 recounted his personal experiences with a controlling, devouring Matriarchy (i.e., his mother).

This post, Part 5, contains excerpts from all 3 messages that convey his current situation (as of 2025/11), his stance, and outlook.

In these posts, I've taken the liberty to condense and reorganize the content in the interest of clear and concise communication.

Current Status

Right now, I don't have a paying job. Honestly, it's not that I don't want to work. I just lack all motivation, and staying at home all day completely drains what little I have.

However, I do have a remote volunteer position as a social media and digital marketing assistant for a startup. I'm learning how to use Canva well and a bit on basic video editing, but it's not enough for me to land a steady job that pays well.

A typical Nigerian marriage proposal. The woman is on her knees and she is 'receiving' from the man. That seems about right, from a Christian Headship perspective.

The last few weeks, I attended a Reformed Baptist church that was a considerable distance from home. I was so happy going to that church. Being part of something I deeply agreed with and focusing on my sanctification was giving me life. But now, my mother has successfully manipulated me into not going. As a direct result, my spiritual life is at rock bottom. Ever since this conflict started, I haven't read the Bible, opened a Christian book (although now starting to again), or offered a sincere prayer from my heart. I need help. I need someone who can relate.

My current situation at home continues to be very restrictive. I can't go anywhere without my mother questioning me. I have no male mentors, no circle of friends, no network, no job — nothing. My life feels empty, and I'm angry, depressed, and sad about this.

The only person I talk to regularly is my older brother, Brian, who lives with me and who experiences the same thing. [Brian's story is in Part 1.]

I love my family deeply. My father now allows me to do whatever I'm convinced about. He gives his own fatherly advice, and lets me do what I want to do. However, my mother and sisters continue to be staunchly adamant in pressuring me to conform to their own beliefs. I truly wish I could make them see things from another perspective so as to have a rethink of the beliefs they hold so dear to them, or at least, freely allow me to walk based on my own convictions. I have tried in my own small ways to point out how their beliefs are in error, but my words seem to fall on deaf ears and are even taken as offensive remarks. Often, I choose not to correct them because I don't want to create conflict over their deeply held beliefs. For now, I believe the best thing I can do is pray for them. At the same time, I have to focus on helping myself and improving my own life through God's grace, hanging on.

Feeling Hopeless

I'm almost 27, lost, lonely, and depressed. I have no mentor, no guide, and no money. I wish I could physically hang out with strong, grounded men, but I can't. I am empty, lost, sad, depressed, and frustrated.

I have no uncles to turn to; my mother has issues with them, including her only brother. I have no real friends, except maybe Mike, a fellow computer science student from my University days, who lives a little nearby. [Mike's story is in Part 2.] I've even been in trouble with my parents for visiting him and coming home as "late" as 6 p.m., and that was the last time I saw him. I think I need to visit him again.

My spiritual and prayer life is low. I feel empty and sad — not just because I don't know what to do with myself, but because I'm actively controlled and prevented from doing it. I often feel like I'm almost in the same boat as my brother Brian.

I believed that working on my spiritual life by joining a sound biblical church was the key. I was convinced that if I could fix that core part of me, everything else would start to fall into place, and I would feel revitalized. I can't stay home all day, every day, just reading books and blogs. It doesn't matter how many theology books I read; without being part of a real church family, I'm not growing. I still feel empty, sad, lonely, and purposeless, and I struggle against porn.

Loneliness and Masturbation

One more thing I feel I should add, which might be important, is that I struggle privately with pornography. I don't think I've ever told anyone this before, but I feel I need to share it, maybe for accountability, or perhaps just to find some relief.

The emptiness that I feel sometimes leads me to secretly stumble into porn and masturbation. I wouldn't call myself a full-blown porn addict, but I still fall into watching it secretly from time to time. I know it's sinful, bad, completely wrong, and against the Christian faith — and even people with good morals outside the faith would condemn it. I myself despise it, yet I still find myself slipping into it every now and then, and I'm deeply unhappy about it. Even in the moment, my conscience judges me and my heart condemns me. I know I'm sinning against God, but sometimes it feels like I can't help it. No one knows about this struggle. By writing this to you, you are the only one who does. The last time I did this was on Saturday, November 8th, 2025.

Perhaps this is also why I've lacked the motivation to pursue what I've wanted to do: creating content on Christian doctrine, apologetics, biblical gender roles, and related issues as I learn about them. I often feel unworthy to speak or write on such things while battling this sin. One part of me tells me I struggle with this because I'm away from fellowshipping with fellow Christian men in a Bible-believing church. Another part of me says I should wait until

I've overcome it before I start producing such materials. But another part reminds me that I may never feel "perfect enough," and that I should begin as soon as I have what is needed to start; that, if I wait for perfection, I might never start at all — after all, no one is perfect. And maybe, by stepping forward and working on something meaningful that I'm convicted about, God could use that process to help free me from these chains.

Current Plan of Action

I believe I have something to offer. I have computer skills, particularly in data analysis, which I learned last year. And I can build more as long as deep programming is not involved in it. However, I haven't honed them further due to depression and a profound lack of clarity and purpose from being isolated at home. (This stagnation is also fueled by fear and lack of motivation; I remember being severely scolded earlier this year just for visiting my friend Mike, even though I returned home by 6 p.m.)

With time and support, I am confident I can nurture these skills. It will probably take the rest of the year to sharpen them, especially in SQL and maybe Python, but with God's grace, I aim to be ready for a job by early next year (if I'm motivated to continue in this path). All I need is to be within a network of people. I believe someone might be able to help me, maybe someone at church.

I want to be clear: I am not lazy. I lack motivation, and I lack motivation because I lack a clear mission. I stay home all day, pressing the phone, scrolling through social media, reading books, articles, and the Bible, but sadly, I have no concrete mission to pursue, which I know I ought to have.

I know you may be thinking I'm unserious with my life. To that, I would say yes, it looks that way, and I desperately want to change and repent. I truly do. But how can I, with all of this happening around me? It's discouraging, limiting, and self-defeating.

Reaching Out in Faith

So with this, you can understand my situation of what I'm going through.

That is why I'm writing to you and the commenters on your blog — people I respect. I'm pouring my heart out because I have nowhere else to go. I know there might not be anything concrete you can do, but even just a read, an acknowledgement, or some feedback would help ease this burden. It would mean the world to know that there are strong men out there somewhere who are willing to listen and who might offer a word of wisdom or encouragement.

I also suspect I may not be the only one facing this situation, and if someone can read it, recognize their own struggles from it, and find a way forward, then it's worth sharing.

Petition

I've written a lot here. I don't know if I'm doing the right thing by writing to you, but I just need to tell someone, even if anonymously.

My main reason for reaching out is that I need a mature Christian man's perspective. I feel confused, and I know part of that confusion comes from lacking what many in the masculine space call a band of brothers — a masculine tribe. What I really need is help, as a man, from other men. The truth is, I don't have any godly, trusted, authoritative men in my personal life right now — a man who understands modern culture and still upholds a biblical standard of masculinity and femininity in the home, and who would understand my situation and spend the time to talk with me. While A.I. responses are helpful, I've grown tired of them. I just had to take this step to contact you to get the human feedback I need.

Honestly, I am at a loss for what to do or say at this point. I have laid out my situation as best and easy as I can, and I am more than happy to answer any questions you may have or provide any further details if needed. Any insights you can offer would be a great help.

I'm not even sure you'll see this email, as I imagine you're busy. But if you do, I'm grateful, and I'd be deeply thankful to hear any feedback from you.

I'd also appreciate it if you could share my message with other men who post on your blog — people such as Deep Strength, Oscar, Red Pill Apostle, TheDeti, SurfDumb, or any of the insightful commenters on your blog who you believe could provide a valuable perspective, anyone whose advice and wisdom might help me. I will be waiting earnestly for your feedback, and for that of anyone else willing to offer their wisdom. And if there's anything further you'd like to ask for clarification, I'm more than willing to answer. Thank you for taking the time to read this and for providing a space to be heard.

Your prayers and advice will be needed. Thank you.

Best Regards.

Eric

Intro

The previous 5 posts covered the main body of 3 lengthy emails I received from Eric, a young Christian man in Nigeria. Eric's purpose for writing to me was to obtain some feedback from Christian men about his life circumstances. In short, he's struggling against a devouring mother foremost, and secondly, he's seeking to regularly attend a Bible-based church fellowship, and churches of this kind are all very far from his home. He's also trying to find a job and build a career, and readers have pointed out that this is the most important issue to settle first.

I shared Eric's email with Catacomb Resident, Deep Strength, Oscar, Red Pill Apostle, Surfdumb, and Thedeti, as he requested. Others responded via comments. Their responses are below. [Some comments are lightly edited for clarity and emphasis.]

Responses from Catacomb Resident / Tomb Refugee

Mercy, he wrote a small book. I could write a longer one in reply, as you well know, but this will take time. He has the basic truth but lacks the kind of moral approval to act on it. Well, we need to give him that approval.

His mother has a Controlling Spirit, a peculiar type of Nephilim that squelches faith in those around its host. The sooner he leaves that home, the better. Until he seizes his own faith and lives on his own, he is doomed to continue suffering. Everything else he proposes to do is just fine. I don't know enough about the context in Nigeria to say much more than that.

I'd love to see this man's life in his social context. I have no idea what is considered socially acceptable in his world, but my experience with Africans over the years tells me that matriarchy is a major problem for the whole continent. The good part is that this man is experiencing the urges of conviction. The bad thing is that it's all he has.

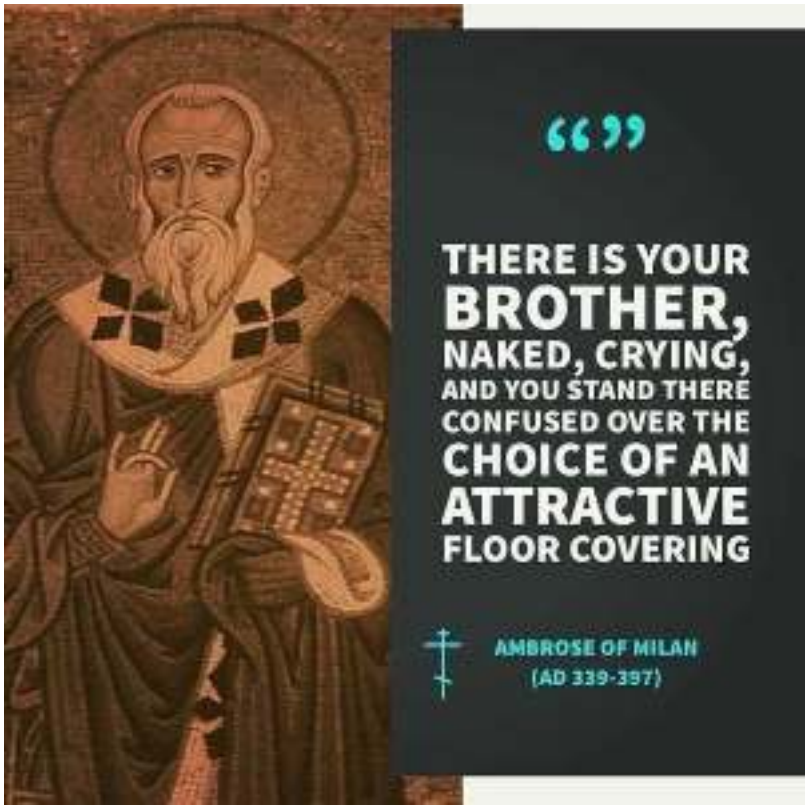
It's time to run away from home. I have to wonder if there would be anyone at his preferred church who would help him out. Again, I know too little of his social context.

I fear that he would virtually not be able to find any support from anyone he knows. While I've met Nigerians who didn't suffer from matriarchy, it's a big country with different regions and varying social structures. I suppose we can pray that he encounters someone who will prod him to move away from home.

I'm sure we all know that simple written words will not help this fellow. He needs to see for himself a man who handles bitchy manipulation like that. He needs to see the cold, silent stare of a man who refuses to be drawn into such arguments. He needs to see "don't answer, just act" because no answer will suffice for a soul controlled by demons.



Responses from Deep Strength

I'm in agreement with Oscar that this is a devouring mother situation.

I'm reminded of one quote I heard one time from a pastor that stuck with me when responding to someone's relationship problems.

> "You are unique, but your situation is not unique."

Human behavior across continents, cultures, and socioeconomic statuses is all the same. The Bible lays it out for all to see. Contentious wives are contentious wives.

If their home life is really that much of a net negative on them, both spiritually and mentally, that they really can't get a job and build a life, then Eric and his brother need to move out and live their own lives.

Oscar is right. [See his input below.] This is more or less similar to physical or emotional abuse situations where all the counseling in the world isn't going to help the person form good boundaries.

You can only form them once you leave the situation.

Leave or stay. There is no in between.

The only way you will grow is if you leave. Find the job and go.

The longer you stay, the more trapped in the web you will be. Failure to launch, as most people call it.

Response from Joe2

What I see missing is … exactly what he is doing now to earn some money? Yes, he is living at home, which cuts down on expenses, but he still needs money to pursue other goals, even just hobbies. Is he totally dependent on his parents for money? If he is, that's not good.

Next, he found his time in the National Youth Service Corps rewarding. The young men he was around may or may not have been Christians. I think what he learned in the Pentecostal church provided an adequate foundation for him to interact with his peers, develop bonds, and not fall into sin. I think he should recognize that the Pentecostal church was of value to him [in this respect].

Finally, I see him trying to escape and live in a Christian bubble where everyone agrees with everyone else. The real world is different, and he needs to have the confidence that his Christian foundation is adequate to leave home.

In Part 4, Eric said,

> "How could I ever find a wife while I am under the influence of a controlling mother? And for all I know, my future wife might simply continue where she left off, or even conspire with my mother to hold me back and tear me down."

To allay these fears, I think he needs to move on to the next stage of his involvement with the Reformed Baptist church that sponsored the conference and its sister churches in his region.

He needs to ascertain the best he can whether the young unmarried women in the church are supportive of patriarchy and submission. He could gain insight by speaking to other young men, reviewing the pastor's sermons on this topic, socializing in mixed singles groups at church and conferences, attending mixed bible studies, having discussions with young married men, etc.

It would be unfortunate if he assumed that all the young women were on board, only to find out much later that it wasn't true.

Let me assure you, Eric, that you are being wise by seeking the help of the men on this blog. They are providing truthful feedback even though it may be difficult to implement.

It all comes down to priorities. You need to establish your priorities and focus on those that are most important. Right now, your #1 priority should be finding a job and moving out. It is important that you don't lose this focus and get sidetracked.

I don't know your relationship with the men at the Pentecostal church, but I wouldn't dismiss out of hand any assistance or insight they may have in helping you find a job. It's not about religion; it's about finding a job.

Response from Kevin Blackwell

If someone was interested in my advice, I would say, don't ask your mother and don't tell her anything. Even if she asks, just shrug. Ignore her complaints. That is how you keep the peace. She will never be content, no matter what you do. She will control everyone until they are destroyed and then blame them for failing.

Responses from Oscar

Boy, that sure sounds like a devouring mother situation.

1. Overbearing wife
2. Passive husband
3. Daughters turned into girl-bosses
4. Sons deliberately stunted

> "You don't have to do anything, but you can't leave. She's deeply, deeply, deeply terrified that if she helps that boy grow up, he will leave, and she'll have nothing."
> Dr. Jordan B. Peterson

As I wrote before:

> "To escape a devouring mother (or the effects of an absent or rejected father), a young man has to embrace masculinity and agency. He has to physically separate from his mother. Move out of her house. Get a job. Pay his own bills. Wash his own laundry. Do everything for himself that he can. Take responsibility for his own life. His plight is not his fault, but it's in his lap. He can either take ownership of the situation and reach escape velocity, or he can remain stuck for life. It's not fair, but those are his options."

27 is very late to try and reach escape velocity. He needs to escape now! Inertia is real. A man at rest tends to stay at rest. A man in motion tends to stay in motion. A man who stays at rest for too long stays at rest permanently.

I see a lot of planning and thinking, but very little doing. That's a bad sign.

> In all labor there is profit, But idle chatter leads only to poverty.
> Proverbs 14:23 (NKJV)

I see that he has no sense of urgency, when in fact, it very much is time to panic. There are certain milestones a man has to hit by a certain age in order to have a satisfying life. If he doesn't hit those milestones, it becomes increasingly difficult to achieve what he wants the older he gets. Eventually, it becomes impossible.

Get moving. Now!

Eric wrote,

> "On my own, I now spend time reading, learning, and watching things I wish I had been taught while growing up, topics I believe are either missing in Nigeria or not voiced loudly enough. One of those is masculinity."

More passivity, very little activity.

> But be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves.
> James 1:22 (NKJV)

Additionally, masculinity cannot be learned "on my own". It's good to learn the theory, but God designed us to learn best by observation and practice. That can only happen shoulder-to-shoulder with other men, preferably while doing something constructive.

It shouldn't be surprising that the brightest point in this story so far was the National Youth Service Corps, where the young man was far from home, surrounded by fellow men, and doing something, as opposed to contemplating.

> As iron sharpens iron, So a man sharpens the countenance of his friend.
> Proverbs 27:17 (NKJV)

Enough navel-gazing. Do something!

> [24] Therefore, whoever hears these sayings of Mine, and does them, I will liken him to a wise man who built his house on the rock: [25] and the rain descended, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat on that house; and it did not fall, for it was founded on the rock.
> Matthew 7:24-25 (NKJV)

In Part 4, Eric said,

> "My mother opposes [my] Reformed beliefs…"

Don't be fooled! She doesn't give a damn about Reformed beliefs. She wants to maintain control over her son-husband, and the Reformed Baptist church just happens to be the thing that's pulling him away from his devouring mother at the moment.

> "I know if I try to go to church next week, my mother will complain."

You can't hear her complain if you're living somewhere else.

For your own sake, stop explaining and arguing with people who don't care about what you think, and only want to control you. Get a job — any job that'll support you — and move out. The longer you stay, the harder it'll be to leave. You're 27. You're a grown man. Start taking responsibility for your own life.

Or, stay, and stop complaining.

Your choice.

I understand that everyone here has good intentions, but trying to teach this young man how to deal with his devouring mother is a waste of his time, his energy, and his life, so stop it.

There is no dealing with, or handling a devouring mother. There is no reasoning with, or arguing with, or explaining anything to a devouring mother. There is no "agree and amplify" or "calling out behavior" with a devouring mother.

A devoured son has exactly two viable options.

1. Submit to his devouring mother.
2. Leave his devouring mother.

That's it. There are no other viable options.

This young man is 27. He should've left 5 years ago. He's wasting precious years of his life. Every minute that he wastes trying to argue with, reason with, explain to, "agree and amplify" or "call out behavior" with his devouring mother hurts him and does nothing to change her, so stop it.

Worse, if he musters up the courage to leave, it'll take him years of growing into masculinity before he'll be able to attract a woman who isn't a younger version of his devouring mother. Giving him the false, futile hope that he can "agree and amplify" his mother into better behavior delays that process even further, so stop it.

If this young man wants to have a fulfilling life, he needs to leave *now.

Stop arguing, stop explaining, stop trying to reason.

Run!

Run like your life depends on it, because it does.

Or, choose comfort over independence, submit to your devouring mother, and stop complaining about it.

Either way, make your choice, and live with it.

Response from Red Pill Apostle

The first suggestion that I would have is that he needs to avoid getting lost in the details and contemplate the core issue or issues. I read what Eric wrote to you very quickly because of the length and because many of the details are not absolutely pertinent to getting advice. In fact, the extra detail most likely hinders advice. [Jack: That is why I rewrote his email in 5 posts.]

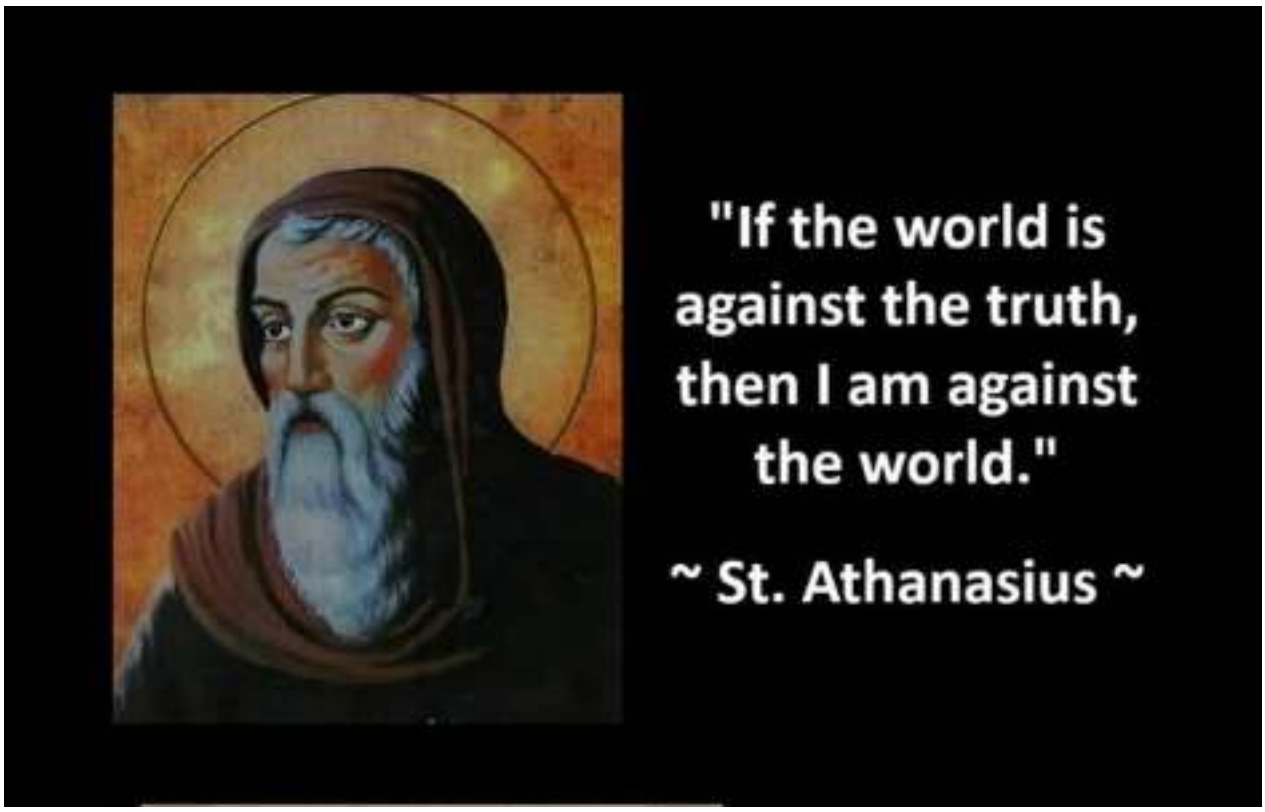
Here is what I think the issues are. He lives on a continent with a history of leaning towards matriarchy. Like Feminism in the West, matriarchy is baked into the [African] culture to the point where people living there don't recognize it. His mother is what we'd call a controlling helicopter parent. We don't need to know why she is this way to be able to suggest that he continue to create healthy boundaries by deciding for himself what he wants to do in life and then pursuing those goals. He should love his mother and do so by having healthy boundaries for what he will and will not accept from her. Those boundaries need to be presented for what they are: his enforcement of the space required for the relationship to be loving as it should be.

Some separation from parents is necessary, especially for men who are to go out into the world and conquer their little piece of it.

One of the telltale signs of the problems he is experiencing is linked to how parents nurture. Mothers nurture inwardly, protecting kids from the boo-boos the outside world inflicts. Fathers nurture outwardly, preparing their children to go out into the world equipped to thrive. Kids need both, but it appears that Eric has had more of the former and less of the latter.

Lots of the things that he should consider doing are dependent on his ability to support himself. Can he get a job that will give him the necessary income to be independent? If not, can he get one? If he can't get one, what training or education does he need to be able to be gainfully employed?

Eric needs the confidence that comes from self-determination, and that won't happen until he's created a life that will allow him to be free of his parents' purse strings. The goal is independence, and the means is income/money. The specific steps he needs to take depend on where he wants to be and what he needs to do to get there.



Response from SurfDumb

Thank you for forwarding this, and I'm very glad you are getting rewarded with such requests.

Let's get to the obvious that others will probably stress — a fitness program can help increase boldness and job usefulness. Pushups, pull-ups, and squats with water jugs are house-bound options.

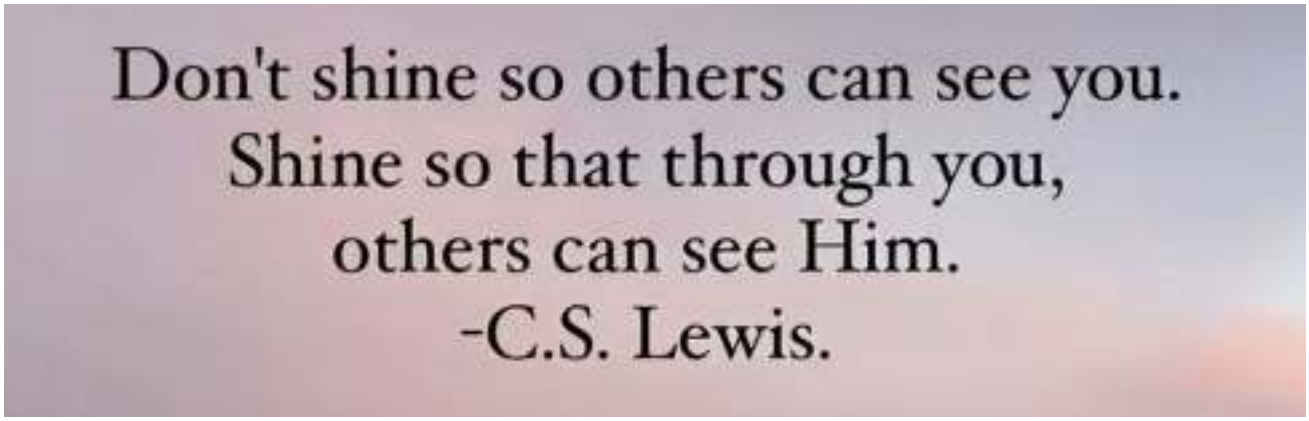
Here's another obvious point that others will write more about. Eric has a mother issue to resolve. But we only know this because of him pointing it out, so I want to go gently there. I can relate. I'm also the youngest and had a hovering mother, and stayed home much longer than my sister and brother.

Another one, others will say: Explore other jobs. I'm partial to infrastructure, and I train and test water operators and know that there are a lot of satisfying jobs in drinking water, wastewater, electrical, and road work. Some jobs are hard physical work, and some jobs are rather routine and relatively easier, such as a lab worker.

Here are my takes.

1. God bless you [Eric] for giving you a spiritual hunger and understanding to keep going spiritually and not be satisfied in Pentecostalism. That's amazing. I'd say, as you are moving from a static life to a dynamic life and start developing new habits and a new life, set aside some time to continue practicing gratitude and the prayer life that I'm guessing you already have. God did such amazing things. In other words, new good actions will have great results, as it should happen in a growth process; however, the temptation might be to overly rely on yourself and forget that God did so much for you as a mostly home-bound guy. Getting out and doing things will open up so much and put meat on your faith. After you have separated from your parents, you'll be better able to see your Mom correctly. There is a saying that describes this growth process: "A moving ship is easier to steer than a stopped one." Getting a job and looking for a place to live will help make the porn temptation smaller, too.
2. Yes, the Mom is toxic. I've been to charismatic churches, but ended up also hearing R.C. Sproul and went that way. Regarding your Mother's hearing from God, you are right, that's spiritual rubbish. However, there is evidence and reasoning for that, and a good resource for that is the podcasts at StandtoReason.Org. Greg Koukl runs that and takes calls, and spends time on situations like yours.

3. I'm not sure how much you need an overseas mentor, considering how well you are doing. I could see a friend being more useful than an advice-giver. (Go see your computer colleague Mike more often and witness to him.) But I'm saying that because it sounds like you have a promising start with a new church. If you didn't have that, then it would be different.
4. Other growth takes time, and that's where a friend and a good church will help. You may get so much advice from here as to be overwhelmed, so I'm for him focusing on attending a good church, finding a job, and moving out as actionable steps. Once you get going on those, you can have more specific prayer requests about each of those.
5. I need to up my prayers for him getting a job and moving out of the house.



Response from Thedeti

I agree with Oscar: Eric has 2 choices. Submit to his mother and do what she demands; or leave the household and live his own life. Either way, he needs to make a choice and start walking out that choice.

You're 27 years old. If you stay and submit, accept this as your life and make the best of it. If you leave, accept this as your life and make the best of it.

If you leave your devouring mother (as Oscar accurately described her), prepare yourself for a sh!tstorm of bad blood and angry reaction. This is how devouring mothers respond to their children leaving their mothers' spheres of influence. You will have to set very hard boundaries with her and limit her involvement in your life. That will be difficult and will feel very, very uncomfortable for a while.

Your parents might cut you off financially, emotionally, and socially. You need to get financially self sufficient as soon as you can, and move out. You need to get ready to live poor. You need to be able to live "in a shoebox at the side of the road", as they say. Whatever you earn, you need to find a way to make it on that.

Good luck.

Response from Thnking

In response to Part 4, arguing with female family, no matter what you actually said, they will respond as though you said, "I don't care", and "You're wrong".

So, if you want to not be exhausted every time your mom makes a dustup, just go straight to that perspective as soon as things kick off.

Pray for God to put right words in your mouth, and practice the mindset to speak truth without needing to think about it. Say things in the mirror, or while driving, to set them firmly in your heart.

Look at Incident 3 [in Part 4] as an example:

> "I tried to explain my position using scripture, but she just resorted to insults (. . .)"

Nothing of what you said even registered with her. Nothing of what you said registered with any of your sisters. Don't bother presenting your chain of logic over and over to be ignored.

The only argument she and they had was "You're mean and stupid". The only argument they will listen to is "You're wrong, and I'm right because God says so".

Don't bother citing references for them to ignore, just declare the conclusion.

A few months ago, I had a similar argument with my own mom. She says, "You're a sexist!" I say, "God's a sexist, I'm in good company", and she sputtered insults and ill will until Dad broke it up. It has not come up since. My situation is plainly not as bad as yours, but the basic principle should be applicable anywhere.

The important thing is, women don't think or argue like men. If you try to debate or to cite sources, it's a waste of time.

Oscar has the right of it here. Get out or drown, those are your options.

Response from Jack

I don't know the situation on the ground where Eric lives, but there are news reports of Christian genocide in Nigeria. If this is a real threat where Eric lives, or if there is a lot of crime or street gang activities in the area, then perhaps his parents have had a good reason to keep him indoors and chauffeur him around everywhere.

However, Eric's situation of having a controlling, devouring mother is undeniable, regardless of the wider social context, and I believe this dynamic is much more prevalent in Nigeria, and probably all of Africa, than he, or anyone, might imagine. From what I have read about Nigerian culture, I surmise that a matriarchal social structure might even be a cultural norm there. If I am correct, there are probably hundreds of thousands, or even millions of young men in Nigeria who are caught in the very same predicament that Eric conveyed.

I believe Eric has rejected Pentecostalism, not so much because of its doctrine or the church itself, but because of his mother's domineering control over the family, including all the men (Eric, Brian, and especially their father), and how she has deceptively co-opted certain doctrines of Pentecostalism to unrighteously exert her authority and all her fastidious scruples over the family. The way I understand the situation, she is essentially using God's name in vain — a major sin that causes others to blaspheme and/or reject God's authority.

It is just as St. Paul wrote to Titus almost 2,000 years ago [emphasis mine].

> [1] But as for you, speak the things which are proper for sound doctrine: [2] that the older men be sober, reverent, temperate, sound in faith, in love, in patience; [3] the older women likewise, that they be reverent in behavior, not slanderers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things — [4] that they admonish the young women to love their husbands, to love their children, [5] to be discreet, chaste, homemakers, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God may not be blasphemed.
> Titus 2:1-5 (NKJV)

Eric's mother displays none of these qualities, quite the opposite in fact. But to his credit, instead of blaspheming God's Word, or Christians, or the church, which would've been most people's knee-jerk reaction, Eric studied the scriptures more closely, with the help of Reformed pastors and teachers he found online, and found that his mother's faith was misinformed, perhaps a reflection of her particular church's doctrines or else the wider culture.

Eric attempted to correct his mother several times, but due to her incorrigibility, he eventually gave up and left her to her own beliefs. Perhaps more significantly, the Pentecostal church had done nothing to correct her, but rather had encouraged such behaviors. Alternatively, it could be that others at that church had modeled this bad, foolish, pagan-like behavior so much for so long that it has become the norm there. Or perhaps the church is mirroring the wider culture, just as Complementarianism does in the West, or so I might guess.

Nevertheless, I agree with Joe2, that attending the Pentecostal church (yeah, even his mother's church) may very well put him into contact with men who might help him secure a paying job. So Eric should not reject the idea of attending the Pentecostal church from time to time, keeping in mind that his purpose there is not to feed his spiritual needs, but rather to network with other men and find employment.

Furthermore, Eric's mother's behavior is so destructive and devouring that it has destroyed their whole family, and perhaps even ended their family line due to no grandchildren (as of yet), despite her having 7 children. I don't understand how Eric's father could have tolerated her controlling ploys, her opprobrious Gaslighting, and her ridiculous emotional fits for so many years. I might even guess that her behavior is what subconsciously motivated him to have that affair years ago. (Not justifying it, just saying, that's how the cookie crumbles. When women behave this way, it literally pushes their men into the arms of other, more feminine, more submissive women. It is very difficult for men to resist this temptation if it is available to them.)

IMO, Eric's mother's behavior borders on Jezebel-like behavior, or even Athalia, who killed her own children in her own ambitions. (Note the similarities in undermining the men, destroying the children, and ending the family line, as I mentioned above.) I'll stop short of calling Eric's mother a Jezebel outright, out of respect to Eric, and besides, I can't know that for sure. But I encourage Eric to read through the posts I wrote about Jezebel listed below, and think and decide for himself. And I know that you're already well aware of the fact that she's your mother, so you still need to honor her, although you may not always want to obey her.

I applaud Eric for his faith, fortitude, and patience in all this, and I pray that this testing may contribute to his eternal glory as a saint. Yes, it shall, if he endures to the end and does not give up.

Eric, here is the moral approval to act on your convictions that Catacomb Resident spoke of. I'll even go so far to say that the comments offered here by all of us are the literal Word of the Lord concerning this young man's life.

There comes a time in a young man's life when he must begin to make decisions for himself and to take responsibility for those decisions. That's part of what it means to be a man. In some situations in which parents are not acting Biblically, like in Eric's case, that means that he must disobey his parents, and/or leave their house and authority. This is NOT a sin, but simply a difficult and messy step of developing masculine maturity, and also, in some cases, like Eric's, securing one's faith.

It might help if you can talk to your parents about this and tell them that you love them and you appreciate what they have done for you in the past, but that now you're a grown man, and you have to make your own way in life — with or without their support. Yes, they will be hurt, but they should understand that it's something that you must do. Even if they don't understand, you must do it anyway. Even if they fight you, Gaslight you, shame you, and try to hamstring you (as you have described), you must do it anyway. That persecution and suffering are part of the cost that you must pay to obtain your Spiritual Freedom in the Lord. I pray that you may be counted worthy of these sufferings. If it is any consolation, every Christian man has gone through similar sufferings, but in different contexts. Following the Lord and one's faith convictions is not easy. But that's what makes us real men of faith.

That said, I agree with the others that it's long past time for Eric and his brother Brian to move out of the house. Maybe the two of them could pool their resources and establish a place for themselves outside the home. Eric should also invite his brother Brian to come to church with him and introduce him to people there, especially people who might be able to help them find a job. I urge you to lean heavily on the church and tell them that your situation is dire, that you can no longer live at home and still cling to the faith with a good conscience. Tell them you will be living on the street unless they can help (and you must be ready to actually do this for a time, if necessary). Put your foot down and show them your determination, your willingness to endure hardship under the weight of your convictions, and I believe they'll come through for you. They'll think you're a bother and a headache, but they'll silently respect you for it. But remember, it is not these people that you're putting your trust in; it is the Lord who will come through for you, through them. But even if your help does not come from them, then your deliverance will certainly come through other means. Trust in the Lord to do this for you, and He will.

This is a real test of manhood for Eric — to do whatever it takes to fulfill his purpose — even if his purpose is only to assert his determination to be independent, financially and otherwise, and self-willed in life. This is NOT selfish. It is HARD! It is an act of FAITH! I believe that if Eric begins with this purpose and sticks with it for a time, he'll soon find his larger purpose in life, whatever that may be. Step by step, the journey of a thousand kilometers begins with a single step. You do not know the way, but you do know your destination — in Spirit, even if not IRL. You can envision it clearly with the eyes of faith.

In closing, Eric, you should know that I, Jack, and others here are praying for you and will continue to do so.

Please keep me/us informed of how you are doing from time to time.

The Advent of Female Accountability

Jack · 18 May 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Men holding women accountable is much more important to civilization, domestic peace, and marital harmony than anyone suspected 20 years ago.

Timeline

In 2013, Christian Manosphere 1.0 author Donal Graeme went over the basic premises for women's agency, outlined the nature of it, and formulated some basic postulates. Thus, DG was thereby the first Manosphere author to put these concepts into concrete words.

From 2013 to 2020, Christian Manosphere authors Dalrock, Deep Strength (Christianity and Masculinity), and Jack (Σ Frame), as well as Rollo Tomassi (The Rational Male), and a few others joined in the discussion of female agency. Dalrock often mentioned that one of the problems in the church was the lack of accountability for women's sinful behaviors. But back then, no one knew how to hold women accountable, or even what it looked like.

In the meantime, we saw gynocentric silliness like this…

- Patheos (Susan Titkemeyer): Force Your Wife To Do Things Your Way – More "Red Pill" Silliness (2020/1/30)

…blithering and dithering that denies and ignores the reality that when men hold women to account, husbands with wives, and fathers with daughters, it can have positive, life-long-lasting rewards for all involved.

In 2020-2022, Kevin Samuels (RIP) tore up the implicit misunderstandings in the SMP and ushered Western society into the Age of Transactional Relationships (2022-2024). In doing so, he actually held some female callers accountable while everyone looked on in awe and/or reviling disgust.

Kevin Samuels

6 months after Samuels' passing, in November and December of 2022, Σ Jack compiled an extensive coverage of Female Agency and Accountability. Since then, the ideas that women can / do / should have Agency and holding them Accountable for it have become hot topics in the sphere.

In 2023, Σ Frame talked about holding women accountable in 22 posts.

In 2024, Σ Frame continued to write about holding women accountable in 26 posts, and the Manosphere started talking about holding women accountable.

In 2025, Σ Frame rolled out 36 posts on this topic, and by then, it was all over the Manosphere.

In 2026, some action is fiiinally being taken to actually hold women accountable!

Oh, wait! Hold my beer.

Epiphanies

Before and up until "Female Accountability" became a trending topic around the Sphere a couple of summers ago, the entire Western populace held the contradicting concepts of female hypoagency and female independence as sacrosanct, and any action that limited their free choice, even for their own good and/or the welfare of the family, was 'abusive', 'controlling', and 'toxic'. Within this paradigm, the idea that holding women to account necessitates male action was a figment of 'Patriarchal Abuse'.

Nevertheless, a few men rebelled against the anti-male gynocentric order in favor of testing Biblical and Red Pill models of male leadership.

For example,

- Deti laid down the law with Mrs. Deti, and her behavior changed.
- Based on the research of Dr. John Gottman, Jack took the approach of husband-initiated conflict as a means of sanctification for his wife and has experienced good results.
- Dozens of times over a period of nearly 2 years, Red Pill Apostle laid out boundaries and made it clear to Mrs. Apostle what his expectations are and what acceptable behaviors are for a wife, and their marriage has improved greatly for both of them.
- We'll never forget Kevin Samuel's shocking techniques.

This is holding women to account in action — something that her father should have done for her while she was growing up, but didn't for whatever reason.

These testimonies prove that holding women to account necessitates male action, otherwise, it won't get done, and things will only grow worse.

Interestingly, all of us did so at roughly the age of 40.

Back to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Analogy

There is a reason that Paul compares marriage to Christ and the church.

If we think about marriage being a reflection of God's relationship with the church, it is one where God does the sacrificing and work, and we, as the church, are persistently unfaithful and sinful against Him.

The nature of our relationship with God aligns well with the vast majority of marriages.

Just like Christ is the active one in the relationship, constantly chasing us down in our sin, disciplining us, and being the agent of our sanctification, men are to be the active ones in dating and marriage relationships, actively leading them and holding them accountable.

From Manosphere math, roughly 10%, +/- a little, of marriages are actually "happy", i.e., making regular progress towards sanctification. I am coming to the conclusion that this low number is a feature and not a bug.

Many of the Red Pill concepts address two parts of men leading relationships:

1. Setting the standards (which may mean self-improvement)
2. Holding women to account on those standards

Having the authentic, Genuine Authority to set standards and demonstrate how others are to live by them is where a man improving himself comes into the equation. This is also where we see Biblical masculinity being applied.

Closing Thoughts

In our email correspondence, RPA ruefully stated,

> "I wish I had understood these things 2 decades ago. In all likelihood, Red Pill concepts would have changed my marriage for the better much sooner. I know that when I finally did start to apply them to my own marriage, they worked. But I wasn't motivated to take such measures until the risk of not doing so was not just a breakup, but would involve losing decades of savings, my house, the relationship with my sons, and generally tearing all our lives apart."

Men must hold the women under their authority accountable. Consider it as the Lord's work. This work is not easy, but it can be quite effective. There must be no delusions or dithering about this.

Best wishes from Jack and RPA.

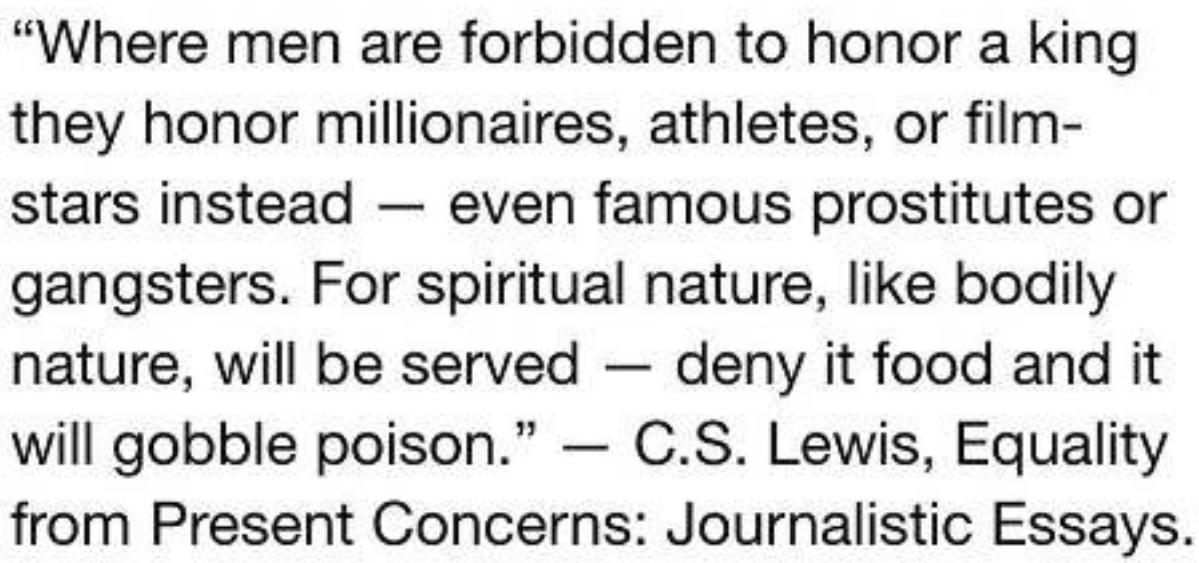
Introduction

The Bible views speech refinement not merely as a matter of etiquette but as a crucial indicator of one's heart condition, spiritual maturity, and wisdom. Scripture teaches that refined speech is truthful, gracious, constructive, and self-controlled, flowing from a heart that is being transformed by God. The primary principle is that speech reflects the inner person. Refining your speech requires refining your heart. (Proverbs 10:19; Proverbs 15:4; Matthew 12:34; Matthew 15:18; Ephesians 4:29; Colossians 4:6; James 1:19; James 3:1-12)



My Own Journey of Speech Refinement

During my time in graduate school, I spent a lot of time with far East Asians in my research group. English was their second, and in some cases, third language. They couldn't understand a lot of what I said, and after a few weeks of frustrating and misleading conversations, I started to wonder why this was so. What was I saying that they couldn't pick up on? Or maybe it was How I said things that threw them off?

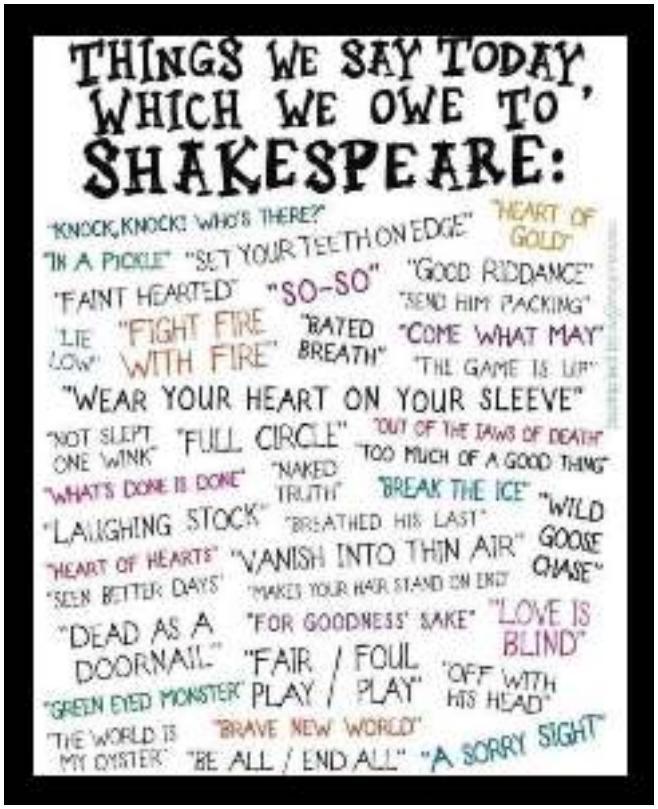
It came to my attention that one of my colleagues from China had achieved the maximum score possible on the IELTS (an English entrance test that is required for college admissions), and that he had an English vocabulary of 30,000 words, which is almost as much as a typical native speaker (40-50,000 words). So I could not dismiss our miscommunications as merely because of him/them being poor in English. Instead, I started to study my speech habits with the goal of making myself more clearly and readily understandable. I also brushed up on my knowledge of English grammar, because they often asked me to explain it.

I spent 4 years in this multicultural setting, and in addition to completing my studies and research while earning my M.S. in Materials Science, I used the entire time to refine my speech habits, IRL, in situ with non-native English speakers.

I found the following speech habits to be helpful.

- Speaking slowly.
- Speaking clearly.
- Speaking loudly.
- Using complete sentences instead of phrases.
- Disposing the habit of using idioms and colloquialisms, especially those that are trite or trendy.
- Being more aware of the listener's level of interest in the subject and gauging where to take the conversation based on their responses.
- I developed the habit of pausing in between long sentences to allow them to catch up to what I was saying. But I soon discovered that by augmenting these pauses I could capture my listener's attention and imagination.
- I learned that only 35% of communication is verbal, and 65% is non-verbal. So I developed a habit of talking with my hands and using body language.
- I also learned to emphasize emotional inflection to add a dramaticized flair. This made my communications more entertaining and more memorable to my listeners.

In short, I learned to talk in prose, as more than one commenter has described it.



I didn't expect it at the time, but making these changes proved to be a life-changer for me.

It took me a few years to develop these habits, grow into them, and work out the bugs, but now, even lately, my colleagues and students often tell me that my speech is clear and easy to understand, and that my diction, enunciation, and tone are enchanting and even mesmerizing at times.

After learning all these things, I have come to the conclusion that improving personal presentation, being able to carry a convincing argument in a conversation or debate, and extolling a winsome charisma are the whole reason why the study of language is of vast importance. Refining one's speech is the basis of how this is done.

It didn't stop there. For the past 22 years, I've taught English in Taiwan, as well as various subjects in my field of Engineering. Now, I am not only an Engineering professor and an English teacher, but I am also a teacher of future

English teachers in a national program for training English teachers for their employment in public schools.

I have to say that these teachers in training are some of the highest quality individuals I have ever met in my entire career and even in my entire life. I am honored to have this position and to work with and have an influential role with these highly intelligent and greatly gifted individuals. Glory to God upon high!

Back in graduate school, I could never have imagined that my dedication to refining my speech, motivated by my love for my foreign colleagues and my care in communicating with them, would take me this far in life. I thank the Lord for His grace and providence. Christian Love is truly transformative!

Examples of Charismatic Speech

I've put together some examples of a few men who are known to be confident and effective in speech. I advise viewers to listen to these videos until they're able to internalize the inherent attitudes and command them at will. Yes, command your speech at will, and He will!

Case Study 1: William Jennings Bryant's "Cross of Gold" Speech

William Jennings Bryant's "Cross of Gold" Speech was delivered in 1896.

This impromptu 10-minute speech given by William Jennings Bryant at the 1896 presidential primary is credited with single-handedly transforming the landscape of American politics and led to Bryant being nominated as a presidential candidate, not once, but four times.

The original speech was transcribed but not recorded (because recording equipment had not yet been invented at that time). But in 1921, Bryant recorded his speech for posterity (based on the transcript).

Case Study 2: Bruce Lee Philosophy (2015/10/9)

The interviewer is extremely disingenuous, yet the ingenious Bruce Lee maintains frame.

Case Study 3: Dirty Harry (Clint Eastwood) — Best Quotes, Lines (2018/1/20)

Clint Eastwood had some of the best lines in Hollywood, heavy laden with emotional gravity and iconically memorable, even 50+ years on. Young men have quoted him for decades, and will continue to quote him for the next century.

Case Study 4: Tupac on Growing Up Poor, His Rise to Fame & His Future (1995) | MTV News (2019/9/14)

In addition to his cool, calm speech, look at how Tupac moves through the crowd with confidence and casual, self-assured dominance, acknowledging anyone and everyone who makes eye contact with him and putting them at ease with an automatically assumed acceptance. King's Lair, my man!

Case Study 5: Sean Connery's Final Interview (2024/11/7)

The late Sean Connery's life story is one of transformation, self-education, and unwavering determination. From his humble beginnings in Edinburgh to becoming an international icon of masculinity, Connery's life journey exemplifies the power of perseverance and lifelong learning — all articulated in his artfully contrived and heartfelt speech.

Discussing Red Pill Lore is Attractive to Based Women

Intro

In times past, Manospherians and the general Red Pill wisdom warned men NOT to talk about Red Pill topics with women, simply because it turned them OFF in a major way.

Even recently, Rollo reiterated this rule of thumb in a post.

> "It is always a mistake to explain the game of intersexual dynamics to women. I've written essays about this since 2014. Back then, I added a caveat: never talk about Red Pill concepts with women you want to get intimate with. If you didn't care whether you ended up in bed with her or you were trying to hold a woman accountable for whatever reason, then have at it. But, by now, you should know you'll never reason a woman into bed with you. Reason and virtue are anti-seductive because they rely on logically convincing a woman to sleep with you."
> Rollo Tomassi: Why Men Don't Get It (2026/4/26)

In Rollo's view, as I understand it, talking about Red Pill dynamics is unattractive because it breaks feminine delusions. It also breaks the 5th Wall, thereby making one out to be an amateur geek and exposing one's motivations for getting laid, as well as one's personal weaknesses. It also tends to place a spotlight on women's sinful nature, thereby forcing the kind of confession that numbs the sexual tension that is so important for seducing women.

However, recently, I've seen a shift in this dynamic. Although I have to say, maybe it's only because I'm living in Taiwan, and the women here are much more Based than Western women.

Here are a few true-life anecdotes to support my case.

Case Study 1: Using Red Pill Knowledge to Identify with Women

On Wednesday, April 1, 2026, several students didn't come to my English Listening and Speaking class, so we only had enough students to have two discussion groups of three people. I placed a guy and two girls in one group, and a guy and two girls in the other group.

During a discussion of our life's purpose, the guy in the first group, I'll call him Silas, said that his goal in life is to have a family and to enjoy the love of his family. I flatly told him that women cannot love a man in the way that a man wants to be loved, and that marriage and family are one of the few things that cannot be a man's goal in life. The reason is that it is not entirely up to him. It also requires the willing cooperation of a good woman. In fact, having a healthy, loving family is more dependent on a good woman dedicating herself to her husband and children than it is on the man's willingness. He was not happy to hear this.

I went on to describe some Red Pill informed intersexual dynamics. In doing so, I mentioned that men have a very straightforward competition in which the best man wins, while women are very deceptive, nasty, and tricky when they compete.

The two girls in the group silently nodded their heads in an implicitly 'knowing' agreement.

Perhaps because I broached the topic with Silas, one girl in this group, I'll call her Melissa, asked me why so many of the girls she knew started fights with their boyfriends. She said she understood the boyfriends' viewpoints, but not the girls'. I explained to her that these girls feel insecure, and they expect their boyfriends to give them a sense of security. But in fact, men cannot do this, and women cannot expect men to provide this for them, because they simply cannot. It is impossible. Some ultra-handsome, super-masculine men might give them a feeling of security, but this is an ephemeral impression. Instead, women must find it within themselves to be content, happy, and satisfied.

The students were intensely interested in my talk, so I went on.

Furthermore, some women really, Really, REEEALLY MUST HAVE A MAN in their life at all times. If their relationship goes bad, then they will find another man within 1 day. Serious! They will actually keep in close touch with a number of men (orbiters), just so they'll have a backup in case the relationship with the man they're with goes sour.

The girls gave me a 'knowing' look.

I told Melissa that women like this really need to be married, because if they don't marry, they will ruin their relationships by expecting the impossible from the man in their search for security. Then, after they are disappointed with that man, they'll go to the next man, ruin that relationship in the same way, and then to the next man … jumping from man to man to man in their search for security — and never finding it — and in doing so, they will ruin their lives.

She was visibly flabbergasted by this truth.

I also said that these women have a problem with envy. They want what they don't have, and they don't want what they do have. They want a man to love them, but they don't want the men who actually love them (due to the dynamics of envy, hypergamy, and perceived SMV imbalances).

In closing, I affirmed Melissa by telling her that she is better off than those other girls and that she also has a better chance at getting married and being happily married because she is not insecure, she is not desperate for a man, she understands men's views, she's not envious, and … she's young and pretty. [She's emotionally mature, thin, and she has a really nice WHR.]

Then I asked Melissa to tell all the students what she had learned from our talk. The purpose was (1) to practice her English, and (2) so that she wouldn't forget. She did a pretty good job at repeating the major points. I could tell that she really took this to heart.

A few weeks later, on Wednesday, May 14, 2026, Melissa willfully persisted in asking me to be her counselor/pastor (not her words), in so many words, in the presence of her peers, no less. I perceived that she was looking for authentic love (not specifically romantic love, per se) from an aware, mature man. In response, I agreed to perform this duty for her. Her peers smiled in agreement with this arrangement. (Still not sure what this will involve, but I'm willing to minister as needed. And yes, I know there are some risks in this undertaking. I've faced them before.)

Case Study 2: Using Red Pill Lore to Arouse Women's Attention and "Wake Them Up"

While I was talking with the second group, I recounted some of the major points from my discussion with the first group. Upon hearing these things, one of the girls got so excited, I thought she was falling in love. I mean, she literally looked like she was having an orgasm right in front of me in the middle of class. Her eyes popped, her jaw dropped open, she was breathing hard, and this lasted for several minutes! Even the other students noticed her expression and murmured about her. When she came to class the next week (2026/4/8), she had done her hair, and she wore makeup and a miniskirt — behavior which was far from normal for her. I talked with this student again a week later (on 2026/4/15), and I felt that she had a genuine spiritual awakening at that moment during our discussion (on 2026/4/1). I am continuing to talk and work with this student, to see to her spiritual development. She is not very open to religious doctrines, especially foreign religions such as Christianity, but I cannot deny that she's experienced a genuine awakening in her heart.

At the end of class (on 2026/4/1), Melissa said goodbye to me on her way out the door, and I responded by saying, "See you later!" She was immediately startled because apparently, she thought I meant later today or later this week, as if we were going to meet each other outside of class, like on a date. After she left, Silas and one of the girls asked me what had happened there. I said I guess it is a Freudian slip. Sometimes, people say what is in their subconscious mind, or interpret what others say in line with what's going on in their subconscious mind, instead of what they intend to say or what the other person intended to say. Maybe Melissa wants to meet me outside of class, or at least thinks that I want to meet her. One of the girls playfully responded by telling me, "See you later!" I think maybe she was flirting with me, all in good fun.

In the evening, my wife was randy and wanted to have sex. We had a pretty good time. It all comes out like that.

Case Study 3: Using Red Pill Knowledge to Teach Women

On Friday, April 24, 2026, during the break time in my afternoon class, World Cultural Values, I talked with one attractive female student in my class and a couple of other beautiful young female students who were sitting outside the classroom.

My student, whom I'll call Sunny, came to me during the break and said that her online translator would not offer a translation for "Masculinity" (interesting!), and she asked me to explain this, as well as "dichotomies".

A girl sitting nearby, whom I'll call Pink, saw us talking and rose to the occasion to translate for Sunny. Another girl, whom I'll call Sunrise, and her boyfriend sat by and watched us closely. But she soon stood up and engaged in our discussion.

To explain “Masculinity” and “dichotomies” to Sunny and the other two girls, I drew a dual dichotomy of “Tall, Handsome, rich men” opposed to “Poor, short, ugly men”, versus “Yes” and “No” on a small chalkboard hanging on the wall outside of class, as I knew this topic would strike their interest. Then, I asked them to mark their preferences. Sunny, Pink, and Sunrise all marked “No” to “poor, short, ugly men”, and “Yes” to “tall, handsome, rich men”. They were absolutely delighted, animated, smiling, and dancing while responding to this query. Sunrise’s boyfriend looked on, wondering, WTH? I asked him to mark his preference too, and he marked the whole board, indicating a gender difference.

The girls were ecstatically drawn to me after this, and they asked me for my contact information, which I gave to them. Pink and Sunrise told me that they are visiting students from another University in Taiwan. We talked for a few more minutes, but I had to cut them off when the break time was over so that I could resume teaching my class.

Later in the evening, both Pink and Sunrise contacted me on IG. Pink was rather proactive in messaging me. I asked them to tell me their purpose for visiting our University today. Pink told me in a private message that they are visiting our University because Sunrise’s boyfriend is attending school here. Thus confirming my earlier impression that Sunrise is one of those girls who really, Really, REEEALLY needs a man at ALL times.

Case Study 4: Using Red Pill Knowledge to Challenge, Neg, or Tease Women

On Saturday, April 25, 2026, I met two female students from my English Listening and Speaking class at a quaint coffee shop near campus. I’ll call them Y and Z. We talked about many things related to the topics we discussed in class, including psychological mirroring, values, how to make friends, our purpose in life, maturity, discernment, and many other things.

During our talk, I mentioned a time when Y and I talked with each other in front of the class, and through this discussion, we discovered that we are both very compassionate individuals. I told them that I am too compassionate to have a job that requires life and death decisions, like I had in the Navy. Teaching suits me well. I can be a compassionate shepherd with my students, and that is who I truly am, deep in my heart. I said that when students sign up for my classes, I view them as being my sheep. I demonstrated this to them by opening my arms to them and saying, “You are Mine! I own you!” (during this time). They giggled with delight.

I described discernment as a 6th sense, an intuition of the heart. I told them that the human heart has an electromagnetic field that extends 3-5 meters around a person. Our hearts communicate with each other through this field and without words.

Y talked about her boyfriend and said he was too quiet and that she wanted him to talk about his feelings more. (I already knew that she is the kind of girl who really, Really, REEEALLY needs a man.) In response, I play-acted being a sissy boy consumed with inner emotional turmoil, and then I asked her if she really wants her boyfriend to talk to her like that. She said "No" with a sly, knowing grin. She also talked about how she wanted him to 'change' — a woman's typical expectation. I warned her that she cannot expect or force a man to change. Instead, she has to love the thing that she wants to change. Give him what he needs. Give him space and room to grow. Let him face his issues and take responsibility for them. Don't try to interfere with this process. That is how you allow him to change and grow. This new awareness made her noticeably surprised and shocked.

Z also talked about her boyfriend, saying that he was a procrastinator. In response to her lengthy talk, I pointed out that he probably feels like he cannot accomplish what he wants to achieve in his life. I told her that she cannot change his habit of procrastination, but that she must accept it. Her acceptance is what will allow his behavior to improve, maybe. But even if it doesn't improve, she should learn to be content with him and herself anyway. She was a little uncomfortable with this truth, but she smiled with gratitude for me letting her know how it works.

Concluding Statements

Discussing Red Pill lore with women is attractive and inspiring because it indicates to women that this man "Gets It", and that she can rest in knowing that she's in the presence of a man who knows how women behave and function, and is still comfortable in that opprobrious knowledge of women's natural and terrible behaviors. It is an expression of grace.

Men's dealings with women should involve a special awareness of their automatic response to submit to genuine male authority (AKA confidence) and a firm expectation for them to be grateful for the same. Talking about Red Pill truths concerning male and female natures and intersexual dynamics tends to invite young Based women (key word: Based) to emerge from their inhibitions and ask questions about how to function in their sociosexual sphere. They instinctively crave knowledge that would enable them to make the most of themselves and their relationships with men in general, and/or a particular man of interest, i.e. their boyfriends. Men who are skilled in dealing with women spike the punch and sugarcoat these Red Pill phenomena in order to pleasurably invite women to explore themselves and to engage the world of reality more fully and more realistically.

Based women absolutely love this and crave it like a heroine addict. It is life to their souls!

In so many words, Jim is saying that, because men are either ignorant of, or refuse to play Wimminz Games, they are unable to hold them accountable. Thus, modern women revel in, and run roughshod in their bad @ssery because men can't, or won't, play these women's childish social games, and win — or worse, that men don't even know there's a game afoot. In general, I think it is the latter, coupled with the fact that men don't give a rip about wimminz' foolishness. Furthermore, Men have been refusing to play women's games for so long, I'll guess since ~2018, that they've fallen out of practice, and many have become entirely ignorant. And it's entirely understandable. There's just nothing in it for them anymore. The absence of readily poundworthy Poontang, and P0rn, and the fears of being divorce graped or falsely accused will cause a man's mind to simply check out and not care about any practicalities of intersexual Game tactics. Moreover, men don't see the connection between social games, as silly as they may be, and social dominance, as important as it is for men.

So what are these Games / Sh!t Tests that Jim is referring to?

Here's one, perhaps the most important one, described by an older, married, and very honest woman.

It's God's Plan: How men win by avoiding women's games (2026/2/25)

Transcript

Every man in a miserable marriage has failed a crucial test at some point in the relationship. That test is where the woman makes him decide if he loves her more than he loves being a man.

Yep, this is a brutally honest episode, but only because I've seen too many marriages ruined by women simply because the men don't realize they are always in a game that heads toward this critical moment. This includes my own father. I'm going to help you understand this game since everyone loses when men stop leading the family.

The Game

What this looks like in real life is a woman will draw a line in the sand about some ridiculous boundary. Now the man who is more afraid of losing her than he is of losing his masculinity will accept this as a new rule in their household — basically failing this test — which from the outside is obviously a very bad choice.

So why do most men fall for it? Because this game began a long time ago with shaming labels, hurtful words, and passive-aggressive attacks like facial expressions, tones, and implied disappointment. You know, like eye rolling, etc., or whatever she knows will upset him.

If he calls her out on these things, this type of woman will say she didn't mean it the way she meant it. And she will label the truth of the situation as just his opinion. Then, of course, she will call his opinion wrong, silly, selfish, or whatever she can to further shame him for standing up for himself. If he continues to call her out, she will deny and deflect, hoping he will give up and hoping he only has one battle in him. Because if he only has one battle in him, she wins. And that's another win for her and her silly games. You get the idea.

Now, if he maintains his masculine edge by having the patience to go more rounds than she does and solves the situation on the spot, she loses confidence in her ability to control him. But if he chooses to give up, she is one step closer to getting him where she wants him: under her thumb.

The Test

Here's where she cranks up the pressure. She will declare some new rule or belief that is designed to change the relationship, such as "I am no longer going to do your laundry", which on the surface sounds like a simple thing but is actually a very serious test. In reality, she is drawing a line in the sand to see if he will cross it.

He can choose to maintain his leadership role or cave to the pressure.

Okay. So after the smaller test, there will be a bigger one. It'll be some variation of, "I'm no longer going to adjust my behavior to suit your preferences", which, to those who don't know how women layer things, may sound like she just wants to understandably be free from his 'unreasonable' requests.

Those of us who know these games know that she phrased it in a way so that it sounds like she wants to be free from his bullying when all he wants is for her to be as respectful to him as he is to her. Now, because he has been worn down by her games for so long, he misses the real point of her statement, which is that she is the man of the house.

Every man who didn't realize what was happening will wake up one day and wonder where he went wrong. The brutally honest answer is the relationship went off the tracks because in that instant, he let her take the most valuable thing any man has — his masculine frame. A man maintaining his masculine frame is all he needs to have the relationship he deserves. Which sounds simple. The problem is that, as we just discussed, that doesn't happen in one moment. So it can't be fixed in one moment. It gets destroyed with various layers over time, and it must be repaired the same way by fixing one damaged layer, and then the next.

Conclusions

Many women are jealous of men's power. So they try to take it from him. Some of them even act like that gives them this power in the whole world, not just in their house. The worst part is that they are so shortsighted that they don't realize they are getting less overall as a result. They don't realize they are tearing down their homes, their husbands, and their families as a result.

Most women really don't want you to fail their tests. They actually want you to pass them with flying colors so they can relax into their femininity. Being able to do that is like riding in a car on a cross-country trip with a driver you completely trust. It's relaxing and easy. You get to enjoy all the sights and sleep when you want. On the other hand, when the man fails the tests, she becomes panicked, worries about how close he is following the car in front, checks the speed limit, and compares it to how fast he is driving, basically being a backseat driver.

Intro

This essay documents the appearance of a new and yet more Biblical concept of Christian Masculinity, as expressed on the Σ Frame blog. It began with a few passages in posts and some comments from Jack, Red Pill Apostle, and Thedeti from September to November, 2021, and culminated in an email exchange between Jack and Red Pill Apostle on 2021/11/16. The proceeds of this discussion are given below.

Red Pill Apostle Identifies Key Elements of Masculinity

At the time of publishing this (2026/5/27), Red Pill Apostle's essay on Christian Masculinity, Lessons on Life and Marriage from Matthew 10 (2021/9/20), is the 29th most read post of all time on the Σ Frame blog, out of over 1,400 posts in total. That says something about the dire need for Biblical and practical teaching for men.

In the conclusions of this essay, RPA wrote,

> "PUA tactics are all based on mirroring concepts of dominant masculinity and male sexual authority that are reminiscent of Headship. But instead of moving towards a life's vision, their ends are more carnal in nature.
> The Christian Manosphere concentrates on those true aspects of masculinity that have been forgotten within churchianity, and attempts to avoid the spiritual pitfalls that secular authors ride through roughshod in their pursuit of a score. For example, secular Red Pill authors have stated that you need to be totally self-sufficient, have a "backup plan" of some sort, and you have to "stop caring" in order to achieve outcome independence. This approach might appear the same on the outside, but this kind of comprehension is missing the element of faith.
> How do the things I discussed in the first section (e.g. "bids", making "demands", outcome independence, etc.) tie in with the lessons from Matthew 10?
> While Jack and I were examining every verse in light of masculine traits, it was hard not to get sidetracked by delving into tactics instead of masculine characteristics. We decided to focus on traits, and let readers discover more about the tactics on their own.
> To give readers a clue, RP tactics are based off of masculine traits. Deti started a long discussion of this in his comment about the importance of knowing one's value and worth. Man has a vision. He keeps that vision as his primary objective. Not putting up with activities / people that don't support that vision creates a man's Frame. Man holds Frame by enforcing the boundaries he puts in place so that he can stay on mission.
> It's all, in one way or another, a display of dominant, masculine traits."

Σ Jack Identifies Key Elements of Masculinity

RPA and Thedeti had me thinking about the similarities and differences between Godly Masculinity and Pick Up Artistry. The correlations and contrasts became clear to me as I (Jack) was writing A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021/11/15).

The man's role is…

1. Have his life together, and be pursuing his purpose.
2. To give attention to various women.
3. Monitor how his attentions are received by various women.
4. Test the character, qualifications, and overall fitness of particular women of interest, and how well she may perform as a helpmeet.
5. Choosing a woman he deems capable of fulfilling her purpose as a wife, and concentrating his attention on her.
6. Following through in offering commitment and developing Headship.
7. Continue in obedience to God's created order.

The woman's role is…

1. Remain pure and chaste.
2. To receive attention from various men.
3. Respond appropriately to men's attentions.
4. Review the character of each man, assess the quality of feedback she receives, and determine her ability to fit into his life purpose as a supportive wife and helper.
5. Choosing a man she deems worthy of her loyal obedience and affections as a husband, and also one for whom she can actively and effectively serve as a supportive wife and helper.
6. Learning to submit to the man, while showing honor, respect, and natural affection to him.
7. Continue in obedience to God's created order.

The progression of these roles follows a clear pattern of spiritual intimacy, following steps 1-6.

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

As the cascade of Feedback, Trust, etc. progresses in parallel with these roles, the relationship is built up.

After writing this post, I began to see the ways in which PUA mimics Godly masculinity, how it does not, and how Church Betas fail to get it right.

1. While God has told us that He is in control of His creation, He also gave us the command to subdue the earth and fill it, which means we men have to act proactively. Male proactiveness is something that the PUAs get right, whereas Churchianity basically tells men to be Chivalrous and "wait on God". The PUAs also add boldness to this proactivity, where churches promote passivity, whether they realize it or not.
2. PUAs give sexual attention to women and withstand the risks of doing so, while Church Chucks are routinely shamed for even thinking about doing so.
3. Men should be giving moral guidance based attention to women, but PUAs usually don't because it makes women (who are not used to it) cringe, and it thus crimps their Game in bedding them. Church boys don't even get a chance to do this, although they are better suited and trained for this. Meanwhile, church-going and feminist women are systemically taught NOT to rely on a man's frame, while secular women are testing men to see who can dominate them, which is actually more in line with the model of Biblical Headship.
4. PUAs concentrate on showcasing masculinity in steps 1-3 of the Volitional Cascade above so that they can get to #4 quickly and ascertain what type of character a woman has. Their character tests look for women who are easily seduced to engage in sexual promiscuity with them — the opposite of what Christian men want in wives. After gaining sexual access, they get lazy and avoid #5, and intentionally avoid following through on steps 6-7. Meanwhile, Bible boys can't even get their foot in the door on Steps 1-2.
5. It's clear that when women hold out on sex before marriage, this incentivizes men to go through all the steps properly. However, there is no corresponding incentive for women to go through all their steps properly. I'm wondering how this might be done. Holding out on commitment doesn't do it. This is a missing element that would provide balance to intersexual liaisons, and men not being able to provide this motivation is the Achilles heel of the current SMP. (Before 1960, the incentive was to be conservative about sexual liaisons in order to avoid a pregnancy out of wedlock.)

6. The larger purpose of going through all these steps to marriage is to preserve trust and build marital sanctity. I also think that this is what is most important to God, because if you can't even trust your husband/wife, then it's really difficult to fully trust in God. PUAs emphasize trust, with conditions, but NOT sanctity. Meanwhile, most Church boys don't have a clue about either trust or sanctity.

Case Study 1 — Joseph of Jackson

Joseph of Jackson's testimony (ca. 2013), retold at Spawny's Space: Joseph of Jackson Revisited (2018/3/16), is a classic Christian Red Pill case study of the monumental frustrations faced by Christian men.

In summary of this tale, JoJ learned some Game techniques at a Manospherian Game training seminar. With this knowledge, he coached the young men of his church group as to the techniques. The young men were surprised that they 'worked'; with them being suddenly 'successful' with the young ladies of the church. Note, these men were NOT using these techniques to bed the women, but simply to attract them and keep their interest.

Soon, the church elders became tuned into this. The older Choich women in particular took an extremely dim view of the proceedings. Apparently, they browbeat the male elders into expelling Joe and his friends from the church.

There are many other posts at Spawny's that reference JoJ and draw references to various situations. Just search for "Joseph of Jackson" at SS.

Case Study 2 — Carnal Christian Chicks at a Christian College

RPA recounted this great story from his college experience as an example of how women always go for true, rather than contrived, masculine characteristics, i.e., PUAs.

> "During college, the RUF minister, Stuart, told us the following anecdote about Bob Jones University (BJU), quite ironic because of their dating couches with dividers.
> His father was an adjunct professor there and a local pastor, so Stuart grew up in the town and spent time at the school. He said it was well known amongst the men in town that if you found a BJU woman who was out of the town Friday or Saturday night, there was a high likelihood she'd be willing to have sex with you if you ran through the PUA steps. Apparently, BJU had many girls whose daddies wanted them to go to a good Christian college, and so they were sent there against their own desires. The PUAs knew the characteristic tells of women like this, and they just had to dig a little to confirm once they saw a tell."

Case Study 3 — RPA and Mrs. RPA

For me (RPA), Mrs. RPA was only a couple of weeks shy of her 21st birthday when we started talking, and a couple weeks past her 22nd birthday when we married. Even though I had a relatively ideal start, we've had our rough patches.

At that time, she wanted to complete her Ph.D. in psychology and would have spent ages 22 to 28 or so pursuing the degree before spending a couple of years working to get her career going. In sum, her career would've consumed her life up to the age of 30 — and that is what she wanted. Her father even asked me if I'd stop her from getting her doctorate if she married me. It was that much a part of her plans.

This is conjecture based on the plans we had before we met, but I think it is highly doubtful she'd have made it to 30 without a sexual slip-up or two along the way. So that is the hard hurdle, because once chastity is gone, the road gets harder. Age only increases that temptation.

As for me, at the time we married, I had finished school and was starting a career. I knew I wanted to continue my education by going to business school, and I knew I wanted to be married and have kids. (I was Blue Pill as hell and that was a hit to Headship, but God worked through my diligence anyway, in spite of my incompetence.) I had a few women who were interested in me, to the point that one made degrading comments about Mrs. RPA's skin when she saw me with her for the first time. I even fended off a challenge from an ex-boyfriend because I knew what I wanted, and I went to get it. That is when she knew that I was going to be the one for her. A man needs to either have his life together or to have a plan of where he's going. That's the incentive a woman needs for her to work through her steps.

In summary, a man offers steps 1-5 as the incentive for the woman to do her part, assuming he gets to her before modern Feminist careerism kicks in.

Now, getting what you think you want and actually knowing what you are getting into are obviously not the same thing, or I'd have never had the impetus to find a blog like Σ Frame. I did well enough at most of the points to make a woman change her life plans for me, but I completely went Blue Pill on developing Headship, which is how I ended up in the mess I found myself in, 17 years into marriage.

But with Headship being restored, my marriage to Mrs. RPA has been pretty good. There are still those annoying instances where I need to reign her in, but for the most part, she's been working as hard at being the biblical model of a wife as I have at being the biblical model of a husband. I fell asleep last night holding hands with a woman I couldn't stand just 20 months ago.

Epilogue: Comparing PUAs and Christian Chucks

Above, we (Jack and RPA) have expressed the idea that PUAs picked up on the characteristics of masculinity that God laid out in the Bible and used them to put on a show that imitates key characteristics of masculinity.

PUA tactics merely mimic masculine traits during the attraction-building portion of a relationship, and miss the other portions of masculinity necessary for sustaining and deepening the bond in the relationship, such as commitment, wife molding, care, nurturing, and shepherding. PUA tactics are effective for short-term relationships and hook-ups, but does not have the Heart Trust (substance) behind it, effectively doing the whole car salesman bait and switch. Moreover, PUA tactics are insufficient on their own for sustaining long-term relationships. This is because they stoop short of investing anything beyond what is necessary to lay pipe.

Men may or may not be initiators, but Men are always active / proactive in the process. Points 1-3 (above) are quite initiative driven on the man's part. This activity is necessary and is part of how marriage models Christ and the church.

The difficulty I (RPA) see with men incentivizing women is that the woman's reward is long-term. She gets security, provision, leadership, children, and the status of Mrs. A man can only incentivize the foundational chastity that starts the list if he gets to her early enough.

True Kindness vs False 'Niceness'

Over at Σ Game, Vox Day writes,

> "Kindness is an act that is motivated by sympathy or empathy in the receiver's interest. This is why I part from the dictionary definition of flattery, because even insincere and excessive praise can be kindness rather than an act motivated by self-interest.
> For example, if you see a woman who is obviously down in the dumps for one reason or another, telling her how pretty she is or how great she looks in order to cheer her up is an act of kindness, not flattery, assuming that lifting her mood is your primary motivation. Telling a mediocre performer that he's really doing a great job and you appreciate the effort that he's putting in is also an act of kindness rather than flattery."

True Kindness

According to my understanding of the true spiritual gift of kindness, I differ from both Vox and the dictionary.

My understanding of kindness, which could be described as a metaphysical social skill (Romans 12:8; Galatians 5:22–23), is that…

- Kindness is the ability to humble one's self and extend grace in a way that opens the hearts of others.
- Kindness is expressed through the sincere opening of one's heart in graceful humility, which induces a similar spiritual posture in another.
- Kindness engages another person's Heart Trust and lifts him/her up in the Spirit.

If you believe you're being kind to someone, but it doesn't have the effect of opening his/her heart, then either you're not being truly kind, or else you're dealing with a heartless, senseless brute.

Kindness is not always 'Nice' either. From an eternal perspective, suffering can be understood as God's kindness to bestow upon us patience, perseverance, strength of character, a greater purpose in life, and a more glorious resurrection. Likewise, making a woman earn a man's attention, or subjecting her to challenges or difficulties that instill spiritual growth in her, would be a more genuine expression of kindness than what Vox describes. This is exactly why Cads get more traction with such women. They're being more genuinely kind, as opposed to being 'Nice' or sympathetic. The fact that such women open their hearts (and their legs) to these Chads is more or less proof of this. You can't fake that.

Two Kinds of False Kindness

I believe Vox is referring to compassion, empathy, or sympathy, which might be loosely referred to as kindness by those who are ignorant of genuine spiritual kindness, which I described above. These things certainly have social value, as Vox describes, but it is NOT the Biblical concept of true kindness, which is a gift from the Lord.

OTOH, worldly-minded people believe that pandering, pedestalizing, 'Nice Guy' softness is 'kindness', also because of their ignorance of the real thing. This too, is NOT authentic spiritual kindness.

Feminine Kindness

A woman submitting to her man is an authentic gesture of humility that sets genuine kindness into motion. This is an authentic form of feminine kindness that has not only fallen out of practice, but has also been roundly rejected by most Western wimminz. Considering how most women are staunchly and viperously and vituperously opposed to submission, apparently, this can only be done through receiving this gift of kindness from the Holy Spirit.

Going back to Vox's post, it's not just feelings of insecurity, or hormones that directly impact a woman's behaviors, decisions, emotions, and personality, or even hypergamy, per se. It's the power she has over men via her beauty, fecundity, and her Honeycraft, as administered and manifested via her submission to said man, and what she does with that power. If she's skilled in this, she'll never be down in the dumps because of the lack of male attention and interest, because she can command it at will. But if she's not, she'll always be a craven Attention Slore.

However, IRL, women invariably exclude themselves from their feminine responsibility to practice kindness. Unless a woman has the hard knocks opportunity to learn the true value of a high-quality man, she will continue to think that changing men is as easy as changing her locks. She will think that guys are so easy to get that if the man she's with ever inconveniences her or disappoints her, then she can find another man to replace him in 2 minutes. Therefore, if any part of the relationship becomes uncomfortable, she will just move on to the next until things get uncomfortable with him. So, she will move on to the next. And the pattern continues. We often refer to this behavior as Serial Monogamy.

Unfortunately, even if this woman finds a man she loves enough to marry, her attitude doesn't automatically change. She can still think men are replaceable, that his value is lower than it actually is, namely because he is one offering commitment. However, instead of leaving for a new guy, she will avoid accountability by giving him the silent treatment, or starting an argument, or withholding sex, or some other form of a self-centered takeaway, etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseum.

Women Correctly Interpret Men's False 'Kindness' as 'Niceness™' and as a Weakness

Another post from Vox explains why women serve up crass arguments and dish out fitness tests more frequently to men who attempt to use false kindness to cover their lack of assertiveness.

Here, Vox quotes a female commenter who writes,

> "If I can "win" against my husband using emotional tactics, then other women maybe can too. It makes my position as a wife much less secure because other women will be able to attack my family unit through girl-manipulation that my husband may be too weak, inexperienced, insecure, or oblivious to resist.
> By shit-testing his resistance to our own emotional girl-fighting methods, we consciously or subconsciously keep his woman-resistance muscles strong and gain me confidence that he'll be resistant to the efforts of other women to manipulate him into acting in ways that favor her over our family.
> These guys literally bowing to women means they are highly susceptible to female manipulation. It is grotesque to even try to imagine being married to one of them because they are likely to both be unable to physically protect the family unit from other men or emotionally / strategically protect it from the machinations of outsider women trying to break it up or steal resources from it."
> Emotional Antibodies (2025/9/5) [Archive]

Moreover, the more false Worldly kindness a man tries to exhibit to win curry with the P00nbearer who happens to be present in his life at the moment, the less authentic kindness he'll get from that woman. Unfortunately, in today's Western cultural milieu, a man who possesses genuine spiritual kindness is not likely to see any intersexual benefits come of it. I am wondering how this might be remedied.

Conclusions

With respect to what I've described above, in examples like the one Vox describes, the man is not being truly kind, and the woman is probably a senseless beast, totally dependent on the good willed attention and validation coming from others, despite any supposed sufferings she may claim to be enduring.

A word to Men: You can't 'try' to be kind. Either you have this spiritual skill, or you don't. If you have it, it comes out whether you're making a conscious effort to do so, or not. Other people can feel it if you've 'got it', and they don't if you don't. One's effort and motivation make no difference.

Concerning Women: The intersexual power of exercising visceral feminine kindness over men (through her submission) is not confined to gorgeous women. A woman doesn't have to look like Elizabeth Hurley, Halley Berry, or Salma Hayek to possess this skill. Every woman knows how to attract a man. But it is her submission that makes all the difference.

The good news for both men and women is that you can pray to the Lord and ask Him to grant you the virtue of kindness, embodied relative to sex.

The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting the MMP

Jack · 1 June 2026 · Archived copy · Original

It's time for another Reformation.

Readership: Men
Theme: The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting the MMP
Length: 250 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

In June 2026, I'll be writing about the topics listed below, how it works in Protestant churches, and what needs to change.

- Mating Markets
- Sexual Markets
- Social mechanisms leading to marriage
- Marriage
- Outcomes
- Probably others I haven't thought of yet

My interest in examining these things afresh is because I believe we're at a critical time in history in which the Protestant church (or churches) must reassess how it does dating, mating, and marriage. It must. If it does not drastically reform how it does mating and marriage, it will fail by petering out and falling from relevance.

I realized this while I was writing the posts for March 2026, themed, "Cracking Nuts", in which I picked apart several problems in the church. (Key posts listed below under Related.) Since then, I've put some thoughts together that I'll cover this month.

A decade ago, other noteworthy figures in the Protestant church noticed the attrition of church membership and intradenominational schisms, and realized that the church is in decline. In response, some efforts to redesign doctrines have been made to hold the church together. But sooner or later, these efforts will fail or pass from relevance, and it will certainly happen by the time the great Boomer theologians and their younger acolytes pass on. The reason why this approach won't work, is because (1) it steps farther away from the true doctrines of the faith, as applied to marriage and family, and (2) it does NOT remedy the root causes:

- Gynocentrism, which is idolatry
- The dismissal of male authority in the home and church.
- The failure of the church to foster marriage-worthy wives
- The weakening social force and cultural relevancy of the church

So this month's theme will explore and possibly prophesy of an upcoming event: "The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting the MMP".

Here, I'll examine one consequence that has been alluded to in past discussions over the years, but not explicitly addressed.

Church Chicks are Prime Ploughing

Most Christian men have the mind to marry a girl from church, as opposed to someone they might meet elsewhere outside of church, and for multiple reasons:

- Christian women share their faith and values (or so it is believed).
- Christian women are, on the whole, more conservative, family-minded, and traditional, at least when compared to their secular counterparts.
- Christian women have been exposed to Biblical truths and have some idea of what a healthy family is like, and how a high social capital community functions.
- Christian women tend to come from upper-middle-class families who make up the majority of church-goers, and thus have better-than-average living standards and upbringings, and are therefore higher quality women on average, thereby making them better choices as potential GFs / wives.

YMMV, of course, but that is the reputation of church chicks. For the most part, these characteristics are generally true, at least when comparing church chicks to secular women.

The Churchian MMP is a Subset of the Secular SMP: Men's Perspectives

From men's perspective, the qualities that make Christian women attractive to Christian men also make them attractive targets to secular Ch@ds and PUA types — men who have no greater pleasure or purpose in life than to defile as many prim and proper virgins as they can with the flick of a dick.

Ironically, the latter men actually depend on conservative Christian families to produce pure-ish virgins to provide them with a continual source of fresh hymens to bleed and feed their lusts. After all, you can't debauch a s1ut, and who wants to seduce a wh0re? But once the deed is done, you have more s1uts and more wh0res.

Red Pilled men know that hard, rough, butt-smacking sex with Ch@ds detonates women's sexuality, and when done outside wedlock, it turns them into sluts, and thereby destroys marriages and families in the long run. So Christian men are fighting an uphill battle against the carnal lusts that are ubiquitous not only among church-going men, but also throughout the entire secular culture.

Moreover, both church-going men and secular men are shooting for the same targets — pure, undefiled Christian women. Secular men have an advantage, because they have no qualms about 'practicing'; also because Christian men sequester themselves to the limited pool of the church MMP, while church chicks do no such thing, as described in the next section.

The way this works out, in effect, is that the Churchian MMP has become a Subset of the Secular SMP, differing only with Dog Whistles, Hells' Bells, and matronly C0ck blockers aiming to control these young women's sexuality.

The Churchian MMP is a Subset of the Secular SMP: Women's Perspectives

It gets worse.

What if we acknowledged the baseline fact that most of the prim and proper 'virgins' in the church are actively seeking out Ch@ds and Tyrones, Christian or not, but with suitable characteristics, of course, to defile themselves with? Now the equation changes drastically. This is exactly what has become of the Churchian pool of eligible women who make themselves less eligible by double skinny dipping in both Christian and Secular mating pools.

This is why most Christian women have no such expectation of marrying a young man from church. The obvious reason is that Church is a Beta factory, and most church-going men are unattractive Betas who come in two varieties: invisible or repulsive. But the more insidious reason is that today's Christian women do not value their faith enough to prioritize it in choosing a mate for marriage.

Or, who knows? Maybe many of these women never had any faith. Maybe they're just poseurs taking advantage of every opportunity presented to them, religion notwithstanding.

Under Who's your sponsor? (2023/9/22), jvangeld wrote,

> "Asking a woman out right after Sunday service probably isn't going to go well. If nothing else, her mind isn't set on humility and defilement (as Jack defines it) at that moment. You will probably get better results by asking during a midweek event or a Saturday workday.
> Church girls are still girls. They still respond to the same attractive traits that any other girl responds to. Improve yourself in Power, Status, Athleticism, Looks, and Money, and you will get more attention from women in church or out."

To be technical, their minds definitely ARE set on the humility of defilement (i.e., getting raked, ravished, and ransacked by a HVM). They might hope to find this man in church (fortunately, some do — or unfortunately, depending on how it goes), but most cannot, due to the emasculating effects of the church. Nevertheless, they have no qualms whatsoever about seeking out High SMV Ch@ds wherever they may be found. Their commitment notwithstanding.

Worse still, church chicks may at any time stray from Christian ideals, and with discretion, they're able to keep every meandering a secret. And if any indiscretion should come to light, the church is reliably quick to forgive and reframe it as a redemptive learning experience as best as possible. This is couched in the language of "hate the sin, 'love' the sinner".

Conclusions

All these things undermine men's chances in the church MMP.

All these things are why young single men and women have left the church. There are better pickings with fewer moralized social obstacles elsewhere.

Why is everything so bass awkward!?!

Church is an Ideal MMP ... Unless it is Broken

The MMP within the Church holds so much potential, but that potential is dissipated by idolatry, simpery, poor church leadership, and weak fathers.

Here, I'll examine another consequence that has been alluded to in past discussions over the years, but not explicitly addressed.

Why Church is (or should be) an Ideal MMP, and Why it No Longer 'Works'

The primary reasons why ideal opportunities to find love and a spouse are found within a church community are…

- The church provides a pool of eligible Christian singles.
- The families know each other rather well.
- Many trusted family members and friends at church may aid one in going about the selection and introduction process and the "getting to know you" phase of a relationship (if they have this in mind).
- True worship tends to create an environment of open-hearted humility, so in theory (and in practice many years ago), the church is (or was) an ideal place for couples to meet.

But many churches don't function this way, so many young people miss out on this opportunity.

Why? The problem is manifold.

- Many young singles idolize love, romance, and sex, and many are defiled by sexual sins. They come to church like this without repenting and humbling themselves.
- These idols and sins effectively exclude them from entering into a metaphysical state of true humility and worship — a spiritual state that is required for them to be able to see opportunities for the sanctification of their desires via a loving relationship with a particular person (rather than a generic stand-in). Instead, they retain a worldly mindset. That is, church women view the MMP in the church as a subset of the larger worldly SMP, which it effectively is, if the majority of women see it that way.
- Many people are proud and worldly-minded, and therefore do not conform to the spiritual posture of humility while in church, especially when they choose to attend services that are geared towards ear tickling and entertainment.
- Strangely, elders, parents, and others at church don't usually want to be involved in young people's courtship, although they DO want to know all the gossipy details and sit in judgment thereof if it should ever happen.

Regular Church Attendance Marks a Man as Low Value

Here is something else.

Given that churchianity is a Beta Factory, what Dead Bedroom Dating said a while back makes sense.

> "Being in church marks [a man] as LVM [a low value male] in the eyes of most church women"

This is why the average church dude strikes out when approaching chicks in church — because the church is seen as just one SMP in an array of many other SMPs within the culture; and the average Christian man is… well, average, to say it nicely.

jvangeld replied,

> "That might be true. But the converts who managed to keep their bad boy charm and whisk away the church girls live rent-free in the heads of men like Mark Driscoll."
> "I lived through the courtship craze. And the books always gave an implicit preference for the tall, dark, and handsome stranger."

Yes, even pastors and churchian authors make the assumption that Christian men should conform to worldly standards of sexual attractiveness. Of course, there is some truth to this, as we cannot escape the fleshly nature. But they add the heresy that he should also be a 'servant leader', further stoking women's fantasies of obtaining the Tingles and status of having their own Ken (a hawt ATM / butler / man toy / therapist) whom they can control.

But that is NOT Christian Headship.

The Failure of Patriarchal Oversight

And another thing.

As I mentioned above, church and family members are hesitant to get involved in young people's romances, unfortunately (or fortunately, depending on their character). This is partly due to apathetic or worldly family members and/or simping fathers, but not entirely. Part of it is due to institutionalized norms — even within the church.

jvangeld explained,

> "[Years ago,] Men in the community were supposed to ask her dad before asking her out. But if a HAWT stranger walked up to a girl and asked her out, she was supposed to just blush and stammer, "That's not the way we do things. Go ask my Dad while I sit here, stew in my tingles, and gossip with my girlfriends / mom. OMG girls! That hawt guy just asked me out! Squee!"
> I tried the "Dad first" strategy once. I did not repeat that mistake."

If I understand this correctly, the "That's not the way we do things" line is deceptively co-opting a false assumption that the church IS a Patriarchal MMP as an easy way to weasel out of the pressure he's placing on her to act as if it were.

It doesn't 'work' because…

- From the girls' POV, most church men can't compete with the Ch@ds in the wider, secular SMP, so they get swiped left even before asking.
- From the Dad's POV, no man is special enough for his little princess, carnal Ch@d or churchy Chuck alike. But in truth, he is deferring to his daughter's whims in order to absolve himself from the fatherly duty of helping his daughter find a suitable husband. That would be 'work', you see, and he knows his daughter would never appreciate his 'meddling', nor would she ever agree with his decisions either. So it's better and easier (and more vicariously entertaining) for him to relax and sit back and watch her get F_cked up, and then bemuse himself with a lifetime of smug, self-satisfying thoughts. "I would have told her, but I knew she wouldn't listen, so…"

I won't speculate whether or not jvangeld was "that hawt guy" because I think most men would receive a similar treatment. I'll only say that jvangeld made the mistake of going along with the ruse — assuming that the church SMP is a traditional MMP, and not just a secular SMP with Jayzus branding and a much higher cost of moral admission.

Moreover, no matter what brand of mating charades and strategies are being presented and played, it does not change the fact that churchian chicks view men in the church through the same lens they place on all men, and just like a Tinder rolodex, where most of them get swiped left. On some level, church folks and fathers know this and choose NOT to 'interfere'.

Conclusions

All these things are why young single men and women within the church can't pair up. Overall, hypergamy reigns supreme in the microcosm of Churchianity, as it does everywhere else. Meanwhile, there are better pickings elsewhere (sans Christian trappings) and with fewer moralized social obstacles.

And down goes the church, if not now, then the next generation will be smaller and less extant in the church.

There are probably many other factors that contribute to the falsification and hollowing (rather than hallowing) of the churchian MMP, but these are the basics that I perceive as crucial.

Coram Mundo Dominates Mating Dynamics

Some really good comments under the previous post, Church is an Ideal MMP … Unless it is Broken (2026/6/5).

I think this is a key statement from Joe2,

> "The young Christian women in Protestant churches want the best of both possible worlds; a man who is both a Christian and who is worldly successful, but worldly success takes precedent. Men who attend church regularly, but lack the credentials (lawyer, CPA, MBA, family business, etc.) for worldly success are viewed as having a lack of masculine drive needed to compete in the world and be an affluent provider."

If we reverse the sexes and substitute the relevant vectors of attraction, it's kinda the same way for men seeking a Christian wife.

That is…

The young Christian men in Protestant churches want the best of both possible worlds: a woman who is both a Christian and who is a beautiful, young, thin, respectful, submissive, and capable helper. Women who attend church regularly, but lack the credentials for being a worthy wife (as described) are viewed as lacking the feminine graces and the relationship value that would make a marital commitment to her worthwhile.

Furthermore, in past writings, I suggested that only women who have no qualms about wholeheartedly submitting to a particular man — their fathers (if single) and husbands (if married) — are spiritually mature enough for marriage.

In this view, new commenter, Windsor Loyalist's comment really makes sense.

> "I don't understand why women would see men who attend church regularly as less masculine. Are these heathen women?"

It's simple math. "Watch what they do, NOT what they say." Women who have no interest in submitting to their male head are not acting Biblically, and are thus, in practice, behaving no differently than feminist / heathen women.

So how are they "Christian"?

In word, perhaps, but NOT in deed; at least NOT the deed that would make her worthy in the eyes of marriage-minded men.

OTOH, maybe these girls ARE pursuing a Headship Structure. You see, the irony in all this, of course, is that although a churchian gal might turn up her nose at the idea of submitting to one of the guys at church, she might very well find a secular Ch@d who revs her Tingle-O-meter enough that she'd be willing to submit to him.

Is it a "Christian" relationship?

I think it is, insofar as it fits God's basic ideal structure of a dominant male and a submissive female — This is the natural order of things. However, it is the same Natural Selection Dynamics leading to the LTR / MMP Breakdown. It has little to no moral agency, as the flesh dictates the mate choice, and the faith foundation is weak or missing.

Moreover, we see that, in general, tall, strong, male providers, and feminine, fertile females dominate both the Christian and secular mating markets.

Coram Mundo dominates mating selection. But we already know this.

That said, all in all, church gals act like Christian women for secular Ch@ds (except for their sexual sin outside marriage with these men) because of hypergamy, and they act like heathens for Christian men because the church is a Beta Factory.

The difference is that women who are dissatisfied with the pickings in the church MMP, will simply leave and go fish in the bigger, secular pond, as I wrote about in this post. But most men don't have much of a choice and just take what they can get.

I guess Thnking is referring to a few recent comments from Sharkly.

If readers find Sharkly's stance to be disagreeable or offensive, you'll have to go read his testimony of how his church handled his rebellious, divorce-happy wife, and then you'll understand his convictions.

Sharkly's experiences with his church (which I believe are widespread, and perhaps representative of many or even most Evangelical Protestant churches in America) indicate that a weak church is caused by weak, P-pedestalizing, and/or malindoctrinated men in the church, especially those in positions of authority.

Of course, this is the Sin of Adam at its root — a stereotypical and yet true failure of men in choosing to defer to women — a behavior that is readily evident all across Murica (if you have the eyes to see it).

The Great St. Dalrock covered this phenomenon well, so well, in fact, that his arguments seldom needed to be revisited to get the idea across to readers. But now that it's been over 6 years since he retired, and the fundamental problem of male simpery within the church lumbers on unabated, perhaps I should start banging this drum like Dalrock used to do prior to 2020.

Lest we forget, here is a sampling of Dalrock's work on this topic.

There is more, much more, at The Red Archive, hundreds of posts well worth reading.

I see this gynolatrous buffoonery taking place in every Evangelical Protestant church — even in churches here in Taiwan. Men, even pastors and elders, are always making comments and jokes about wives being the boss, about how they've failed to please their wives, men preening apologies for displeasing their wives, and constant prattling about how men exerting authority over their homes and wives is 'harsh', 'insensitive', and 'unloving'. They believe a man being a wife-pandering pansy is what it means to be a gracious and humble Christian husband.

While Sharkly might see these men as deceived gynolatrous manipulators, I see them as flummoxed buffoons, rural hicks, or spiritual hillbillies, if you will, or maybe even wife-goggled parishioners, happily consumed by their wives' HoneyCraft, all foolishly playing along with the traditions of a larger and long broken institution that systemically manufactures a few varieties of faux masculinity as listed below, most of which are directly encouraged or subtly supported by the heretical aspects of Boomer theology, e.g., Complementarianism.

Exit Question

If we wish to improve, then where to begin?

In the comments, I'd like to get some feedback from the men in response to this question:

Does the Church (i.e., fem-centric church culture, complementarianism, compromised doctrines, etc.) make church-going Men Weak, or do Weak Men practice and perpetuate all the unbiblical, gynocentric social norms of the church, thereby yielding their power to women?

The Church Validates Bad Boys™ and Punishes them for Converting

Jack · 12 June 2026 · Archived copy · Original

The Church affirms Christian young women's pursuit of secular Chads, thereby betraying the young single Christian men in the church by undermining their chances with the girls. But if a Chad converts, he is rigorously subjected to the machinations of the gynolatrous churchian order, in an effort to change him into a Churchian Beta Boy.

Here, I'll examine a third consequence that has been alluded to in past discussions over the years, but not explicitly addressed in a standalone post: How the Church Validates Bad Boys™ and Punishes them for Converting.

Inappropriate Attention Validates Bad Boys™

jvangeld wrote,

> "Now, White Knight pastors have been preaching sermons about how bad Bad Boys™ are for the past two decades. But, if we know anything about female psychology, that should have just boosted the profile of the bad boys."

Right. Anytime pastors or church folks draw attention to Bad Boys or give them any airtime in sermons or discussions, they are indirectly tempting their daughters to prioritize catching them and take up with them. It does not matter whether this attention is positive or negative. Just mentioning them is enough to ding the Devil's doorbell. Church chicks will subconsciously compare Ch@dwick Edcad to the regulars and find the normies lacking, not realizing that they are giving precedence to their fleshly nature. Meanwhile, church chicks question why they should limit themselves to the regulars. After that imaginary touche, the regulars are torn from their mental rolodex and are never given a chance.

Instead, pastors and elders should be praising the young single men in their congregations for their accomplishments, contributions to the church, masculine traits, and personal virtues.

Undiscerning Church Gals Validate Bad Boys™

Once a handsome Worldly Chad has attracted the attentions of the church gals, some of them will meet Chad on a rendezvous that is formally forbidden but casually endorsed, and after their hard banging sexual conversion to the cult of the Tingles, they will leave the church.

This phenomenon tends to ramp up every spring season or so, when many female, young adult church goers sexperience a conversion to the cult of the Tingles, and then leave the church in full pursuit of a more perfect hypergamic union, which ultimately proves evasive for most of them.

In the eyes of the church, apparently, these women lose no MMV because of this debauchery (although they certainly do, in the eyes of men). This conversion is never frowned upon, but is instead dismissed as a 'phase' of development, or a "Season of Singleness" as Matt Chandler and John Piper have described.

When Conversion is Punished

jvangeld continued,

> "…but guess who is considered literally zero value. The convert just asking everyone out."

Yes, horny chicks get away with slathering the snake of gynolatrous idolatries every day, but pagan dudes converting to the way of Christ are punished via. sociosexual exclusion.

Why is this? It is because new male converts have several strikes against them right off the bat.

1. By becoming a churchian, he willingly makes himself into a Beta.
2. When he joins the church, women must now take him (and themselves) seriously, as he is thence a permanent part of their social life within the church.
3. When he converts, women must forsake their faux fairy fantasies about "changing the bad boy with her love" and see him as a man sincerely seeking Christ.
4. It is suspected that he may be posture posing for the sake of popularity or to gain access to the church SMP/MMP, thus, his motivations and sincerity are cast into doubt.*

 A little bit of resistance in the beginning may lend credence to one's character later on.*

The end result is that new male converts are effectively punished for converting. Any single young man who has the wits to realize this will ask themselves, whether they truly have faith or not, "Why should I profess?"

Meanwhile, new female converts, no matter what their past, are treated to every expression of grace and mercy imaginable, propelling them to spiritualized superstardom within Protestant Evangelicalism.

Conclusions

As for any Bad Boys™ and Ch@ds who might rustle through the church, trolling for easy peasies, pastors and elders should be placing conditions on their continual attendance in the form of imposing clear expectations on them. But in the current church climate, that would be considered un-Christian, un-seeker-friendly, and anti-evangelical.

Without any such regulations, Bad Boys™ who breeze through the Churchian SMP/MMP and pick through the choosings are a deathblow to single Christian men in the congregation — the regulars.

If and when these Chads might convert to Christianity, care should be taken to guide them in the responsibilities of godly masculinity, and not merely cut their nuts off to please the entrenched gynocentric order.

Intro

This essay compares The Christian Red Pill and the Secular Red Pill, specifically concerning mating dynamics, which is of great importance and encompasses many of the smaller pockets of Red Pill knowledge.

The Christian Red Pill / Headship

The Christian Red Pill has concluded that Headship is the ideal intersexual relationship structure. Although this structure is relatively rare and difficult to achieve in the current Western sociosexual climate, it offers the most robust combination of benefits, joys, securities, and lifetime opportunities.

Past discussions in the Christian Manosphere have identified a few different ways to enter therein.

1. A Meet Cute
2. Contrived by God
3. Arranged Marriage
4. A Patriarchal Christian Community

All of these are rare, even within Christendom, unfortunately, because the success of the Christian Red Pill / Headship mating paradigm is largely predicated on the availability of emotionally and spiritually mature, willing women of faith, and is therefore somewhat dependent upon a man's serendipitous opportunity of finding such a woman, by God's grace.

The rarity of a man attracting and securing the faithful commitment of such a woman is the dearth of the current Western SMP / MMP. Most women, even within the church, ruin themselves via Career Life Scripts, the damning influences of Feminism, and through their hypergamous search for maximizing the Tingles.

The Secular Red Pill Mating Dynamics

The predominant secular approach towards finding a wife could be called the Natural Method, or alternatively, common law marriage as it existed up until the end of the Medieval Age (before 1563). The majority of Classic Red Pill lore concerns the intersexual dynamics of the Natural Method of mate selection, except it does not emphasize finding a wife. The Natural Method requires a fast start on a social trajectory, learning by trial and error, and it involves a LOT of intrasexual competition. The Natural Method does not require much of any social structure to be in place for it to be effective.

The success of the Natural Method depends heavily on chance and a unique combination of personal traits. From an objective stance, we might think of this as a real-world petri dish of Darwinian Natural Selection. But in the personal experience, the Natural Method relies upon good genes, good looks, good upbringing, and the common grace of God. Those who are naturally gifted — the few HSM who are willing to marry, and the 10% of women whom men consider worthy of marriage — pair up quickly and get married before the others. These people get taken off the mating market quickly. As time passes, more of these people of decreasing desirability / quality get married, until the people who remain single are typically Low Sociosexual Status Males (LSM) and nasty women. Most of these LSM and nasty women will eventually marry out of desperation, but they tend to have very poor marriages. Many of them end in divorce. These dynamics are rather advanced at present, so we see fewer marriages and more cohabitation and OOW births.

The intersexual dynamics of the Natural Method are highly competitive and cutthroat. Women often employ a mating strategy in which they first date and have sex with HSM, hoping to keep him over the long haul. However, these HSM will not marry them due to being busy with multiple women, so these women end up wasting their prime years having sex with lots of men in their search for a mate. Some women sleep around and don't even think seriously about marriage, AKA "riding the carousel". During this time, they lose their best opportunities for marriage. After years pass and they have several heartbreaks, they will realize that they cannot obtain a HSM's marital commitment (or as high as they would like), so they need to lower their standards in order to secure ANY man's commitment before they're too old to attract any commitment and/or have children. This is AKA "THE Epiphany", "going over the falls", or "hitting the wall", and it usually happens to women around the age of 28-30. So then they will marry a LSM out of desperation, and then they will resent him because he is not a HSM. Again, many of these marriages end in divorce.

This mating strategy is AKA "Alpha F_cks / Beta Bucks" (AF/BB) because the woman has the experience of sleeping with High Status Men, and the material provision from a lower status man in 'marriage' later in life.

The next post will offer a comparison of the Pros and Cons of the Christian vs. Secular Mating Dynamics.

Pros and Cons of Christian vs Secular Mating Dynamics

For the sake of boiling down the main points for readers to be well-informed and well-prepared for any future argumentation, I've put together a comparison of the pros and cons of the Mating Dynamics of the Christian Red Pill and the Secular Red Pill, as described in the previous post. There are a few caveats that suggest that there is value in either approach. Perhaps the benefits of both might be obtained through a concerted enterprise.

Pros

From the Secular viewpoint, the Christian / Covenant approach has a few benefits.

1. The Natural Method carries with it a lot of collateral damage and fallout, resulting in broken hearts, broken hopes, and broken souls. The Covenant approach can avoid much of this.
2. The Covenant approach establishes a Headship structure from the get-go, thereby eliminating much of the power wrangling that occurs in relationships.
3. WRT men's willingness to commit to a marriage, men are better than women at choosing mates whom they genuinely love and cherish.

From a Christian / Covenant viewpoint, the Natural Method is attractive for the following reasons.

1. The top 10% of men and women have a carnival of opportunities. So if one is among this group, then one has a wider selection of people from whom to choose, and with greater practical opportunities.
2. Because of the Betazation of the Church, men outside the church may be deemed more preferable as a mate compared to those found in Christian circles.
3. WRT women's sexual desire and the Meet Cute phenomenon, and women's general heartfelt willingness to fulfill marital promises and obligations, women are better than men at choosing mates for whom they are genuinely sexually attracted to.
4. The Natural Method carries with it a lot of collateral damage and fallout, resulting in abortions, broken hearts, broken hopes, and broken souls. However, this may prove instrumental towards a spiritual awakening by making one aware of one's need for God. This is what has happened with many former PUAs who have turned to God later in life (e.g., Roosh).

Many Christian women opt for the Natural route for all the above reasons. Point 1 because hypergamy. Point 2 because of women's Existential Fear. Point 3 because Tingles. Point 4 is called "finding one's self" and "season of singleness".

Cons

From the Secular viewpoint, the Christian / Covenant approach is flimsy for several reasons.

1. It could be argued that the Purity Movement of the 90s was a catalyst of destruction that led to the Hookup Culture.
2. Modern Western culture no longer has the cultural and religious backdrop that is necessary to promulgate Covenant-Based Courtship and Marriage. Thus, the Natural Method (described in the previous post), or some variation thereof, has become standard fare even within the Church.
3. The Christian admonition to avoid premarital sex is seen as a rule that, when observed, eliminates many men from the competition and makes the SMP more unbalanced in favor of Chads and Slores.

From a Christian / Covenant viewpoint, the Natural Method is substandard for several reasons.

1. Only the top 10-20% of men and women have a fair chance of success. So if you're not among the genetic elite, then this is relational suicide.
2. The Natural Method tends to revert to a gynocentric mating strategy. This is because of the fact that, without regulations imposed by culture and religion (such as sexual continency*), this strategy commonly devolves into open hypergamy and serial monogamy, and yields relationships in which single women practice carousel-style promiscuity and abortion, and those women who (legally) marry more often than not become insecure, manipulative, reviling, petty tyrants. All this seldom fails to produce unhealthy home environments in which children are raised.

Readers are invited to point out anything I may have missed.

Comparing Christian Headship Structure to a Collective, High Grid Social Structure (Taiwan)

Jack · 19 June 2026 · Archived copy · Original

A Collective, High Grid Social Structure, such as found in Taiwan and other parts of Asia, compares well to an ideal Christian Social Structure.

Intro

I believe Grid-Group Theory is useful for explaining how Eastern Patriarchy (e.g. Filial Piety) is a Secular Version of Christian Headship; that is, they are both High Grid and High Group (explained below).

This essay compares the (relatively*) collective, high grid, high group social structure of Taiwan* with the ideal feudal Christian social structure as described in the Bible, and concludes that it's close enough to function adequately well in the areas of sociosexual norms and mating dynamics.

 In sociological metrics, Taiwan is one of the lowest-ranking countries on Grid, and intermediate on Group, among Far East Asian cultures. However, it is relatively high in both categories compared to Western cultures.*

Grid vs. Group Theory

Grid-Group Theory, developed and popularized by Mary Douglas, compares the social structure of a culture (Grid) with psychological in-group/out-group dynamics (Group). It highlights how individuals are bound by macro-social frameworks versus interpersonal, identity-driven boundaries.

The theory is constructed around two sociological dichotomies that are often used to describe and analyze organizational cultures (e.g., rigid bureaucracies versus agile tech firms), as well as broader sociological worldviews within a culture.

- Grid: Measures the degree of social prescription, rules, and boundaries that restrict an individual's behavior, ranging from heavily regulated (High Grid) to highly autonomous (Low Grid).
- Group: Measures the degree of social incorporation, collective identity, and cohesion, ranging from tightly bound (High Group) to highly isolated (Low Group).

Douglas stated that this theory contains the most fundamental differences between cultures — a claim that continues to be widely contested.

Grid-Group Theory is widely used in Far East Asian think tanks and other Asian-based cultural analytics. However, this theory is rather unpopular and is rarely used in the West, including Western academia and research, because it recognizes the legitimacy of hierarchical cultures and recasts equality and individualism as cultural dimensions defined as Low Grid.

A Social Hierarchy Supports Headship

The Christian Red Pill has concluded that Headship is the ideal intersexual relationship structure, and a Meet Cute is one of the more ideal ways to enter therein. Although this structure is rare and difficult to achieve in the current Western sociosexual climate, it offers the most robust combination of benefits and lifetime opportunities.

Red Pill Apostle recently said,

> "Men ultimately want their respective version of a helpmeet. That is what men should expect for the work they put in and their commitment.
> But being a man's helpmeet is probably the one role that women resist the most."

That's certainly true for Western women who grew up in, and were brainwashed by, a gynocentric Feminist culture.

Nevertheless, Headship and the Meet Cute continue to survive and thrive outside of Western cultures, as I'll describe next.

Intersexual Interactions within a Hierarchical Structure

In my decades-long experiences with Far East Asian women, they are eager and ready to be a man's helper. I only have to give them a directive with a clear purpose, and they're energetically hopping to it. Even without any incentive or directive from me, they'll skip up to me with a beaming smile to respectfully ask how they can help out. They instinctively want to be a part of the larger social enterprise in which they are a member, and to contribute to various instances of purpose as these are happening in real time. Following a dominant man's instructions is simply the easiest way for them to do this.

Perhaps because they grew up in Taiwan, my daughters become very excited at the idea of being a man's helper. It makes them feel needed, relevant, and valuable, and it gives them purpose for living. This is one reason why they love Christianity and the ideal of traditional marriage.

Moreover, after living in Taiwan for over two decades, I've come to believe that obedience and submission to men are women's bent, or even nature, although it morphs into rebellion under the influence of sin.

But perhaps this is due to the Collective culture of Taiwan, a social quality which the West has flatly rejected. Or maybe I think this way because I'm a professor and a teacher of thousands of adolescent and college-aged Asian girls. Or perhaps it's because these girls want to fall in line with whatever is expected of them, in order to be accepted and to receive a favorable assessment. But nevertheless, this quality does exist, and it sits at the core of feminine worthiness and their MMV.

I swear it's not my purpose in writing these things, but I don't think I could invent a better or clearer motivation for Western men coming to Asia to find obedient, submissive wives. Whether they be Christian or not, it matters less (concerning marriage and child rearing) than their willingness to be feminine and submissive, ironically. (Actually, that IS Christian femininity, minus all the cultural and denominational embellishments, many of which are utterly false and/or misleading.)

Why? It's because this role model most closely fits the Biblical / Red Pill model for a successful relationship. It is what it is.

Conclusions

The success of the Christian Red Pill / Headship mating paradigm is largely predicated on the availability of emotionally and spiritually mature, willing women of faith, and is therefore somewhat dependent upon a man's serendipitous opportunity of finding such a woman, by God's grace.

However rare, the Meet Cute may very well be an anomaly for Western culture, because Western cultural norms do not currently facilitate the sociosexual dynamics that are prerequisite for a Meet Cute. This may explain why the Meet Cute phenomenon is almost outdated and nearly nonexistent anymore. However, this is NOT how the Natural Order is supposed to be.

But, duly note this, my dear readers, that acculturation plays a critically important part, especially in the preadolescent stages of a girl's development. Heed well and take note!

Fathers, consider moving to an Eastern patriarchal culture during the time when your daughters are between the ages of 4 and 12. You will be eternally grateful to the Lord Almighty for the fine quality daughters you will thereby produce by doing so (as I am). Pagan cultures notwithstanding, ANYTHING is better than growing up in the Feminist West!

20 Ways to Honor Your Father

Do you even honor him at all?

Author's Note: This essay was written on 2023/6/1. It was intended to be included in the mini-theme of Honoring Fathers at that time (running from 2023/6/26 to 2023/7/10), but was unfortunately lost in cyberspace until it was found on 2023/11/12. It was first published on Father's Day, 2024/6/16. It is here republished on Father's Day, 2026/6/21. By coincidence, Father's Day falls on the solstice this year. In ancient mythology, the sun is a representation of the father archetype.

Introduction

To honor one's father and mother is the fifth of the Ten Commandments in Exodus 20:12 and Deuteronomy 5:16, and it is the first Commandment that appears in Leviticus 19:3. This commandment is reiterated in Ephesians 6:1-4.

To those who follow this commandment, God promises a good, long life.

But how much do we honor our fathers? I mean, really? Do we even know what it means to honor our father? Can we honestly expect to have a good, long life if we don't? Can we even think of ourselves as Christians if we neglect this commandment?

Given the heavy emphasis on 'Equality', Feminism, Individualism, and "personal liberties" which amount to idolatry and/or self-centeredness, the deemphasis of religion and tradition, and the rejection of male authority, masculinity, and 'Patriarchy', many Westerners have forgotten what it means to honor their father. Instead, one's Father is esteemed as a 'friend' or a preeminent equal at best, or is regarded as a wife-supplicating ninny at worst.

It's past time for us to acquaint ourselves with some long lost habits of Christian morality. So here I've made a list of some very common ways we can honor our fathers.

Check yourself.

20 Ways to Honor Your Father

1. Address him by a proper title. (c.f. Jesus in Luke 11:2)
2. Stand up and face him when he enters the room (Leviticus 19:32).
3. Give him a warm enthusiastic greeting whenever you see him in person. (Luke 15:20)
4. If you live with him, stop what you're doing and give him a warm greeting when he comes home after finishing his work for the day. (Luke 15:20)
5. If you do not live with him, visit him periodically, or else call him to "check in"; give him a report of your activities and ask him how he's doing (Hebrews 13:17).
6. Inform him immediately of things or events that pertain to his interests. (Genesis 45:9-13)
7. Recognize him as the only man in the world who truly cares for you and has your best interests in mind. Dwell in the mindset that you are blessed to have his trust and his favor.* (Proverbs 1:8-9; Proverbs 17:6) Let this mindset be demonstrated through your interactions with him and others.
8. Acknowledge that he holds a position of authority over your life and that you have responsibilities to him.* (Ephesians 6:1-3; Colossians 3:20)
9. Ask for his advice or input on family matters, complex issues, or technical subjects in which he has expertise. (Proverbs 13:1)
10. Be honest with him. When honesty is embarassing, be humble, modest, and respectful. (Luke 15:20-21)
11. Let him speak freely without interruption or objection. Desist from arguing with him over petty matters. (Proverbs 1:8-9; 6:20-21)
12. Never speak sharply to him. Always talk to him very politely and with a low voice. (1 Timothy 5:1)
13. Learn his ways. Imitate his better qualities.* (John 5:19-20)
14. Have the inner vision to see what he would think or want done in a given situation and carry it out as he would see fit.* (John 5:19-20)
15. Make a diligent effort to conform to his wishes.* (Proverbs 6:20-22; Ephesians 6:1-3; Colossians 3:20) If you cannot, then offer an intelligent apology (not a lame excuse), extend sincere regrets, and acknowledge that you will take responsibility for your decisions.
16. Respond to his requests quickly and with diligence and joyful enthusiasm.* (John 5:19-20)
17. Endure his correction and discipline with diligence and earnestness.* (Hebrews 12:7-9)
18. Make something of yourself and stay out of trouble so that he can be joyful and proud of you and not ashamed. (1 Timothy 5:8; Proverbs 23:24)
19. Extol his name. Speak positively about him to others.* (c.f. Jesus in John 17:6-8,26)
20. Be loyal to him. Defend his reputation.* (c.f. Jesus in John 17:10-14) Be on guard about mentioning or acknowledging his problems and weaknesses to others in casual conversation. Avoid it if at all possible without being dishonest and/or violating trust. Reprimand others who are under his domain of authority who dishonor him, ignore his wishes, or make light of him.

Readers are invited to add other ways to honor one's father, or offer stories of how one's father was honored, or give testimonies of how honoring one's father brought blessings to yourself and/or your family.

 Even if you happen to have a poor father, if he doesn't care about you, or is irresponsible, etc., you can still maintain these attitudes and habits as an act of obedience to God. By God's grace, your faithful obedience in this can still bring God's blessings upon you, and could even become the vehicle of his redemption.*

Love is Personal, but Marriage is Practically Impracticable, Unfortunately

The False Aim of the Generic

Bruce Charlton wrote an insightful post entitled, You don't need to find and marry "a girl" but a particular person: The false aim of the generic instead of the particular (2026/5/28). This essay orients us to an eternal truth that authentic love is and must necessarily be personal, and that our choice of a spouse should reflect this.

But… with all due respect to Charlton, to be more crassly precise, I think most young men aren't feeling the need "to find and marry a girl", but rather, to lay wet pipe whenever the urge to merge strikes hot and heavy — every day, or even multiple times a day for some younger men (like I was once). And a lot of men (such as younger moi) are wired such that they literally can't think about anything else unless and until this need is satisfied. This is the fundamental reason why young men think with the little head and settle for the generic poon instead of the particularly individualized mature Christian wife, as Charlton describes. From an evolutionary perspective, there is little to no difference, and from a spiritual perspective, the differences are esoteric, especially to young, spiritually immature men, as I will further explain below. So it is what it is.

Why Men Choose the False Generic

Note: In the following discourse, I'm not writing this to justify foolish indiscretions, but to humbly and simply lay out the way it is for most young men who just happen to be desperately foolish and indiscrete, even Christian men, unfortunately. It is what it is. May the Lord have mercy on Men's souls.

As Charlton puts it, "finding and marrying a girl" is simply the best way, all things considered, for a Christian man to secure the dire need for pounding puss, to relieve this burdensome and pesky sexual-psychological need, move up Maslow's Pyramid, and then be able to move on to focus on other things in life.

But as bad as this is in the flesh, it's even worse than that. Poonani is slim pickings for most men these days, because Hypergamy! So the vast majority of men have to take whatever they can get.

Worse still, over the past few decades, there has been a severe paucity of marriage-worthy women, even for high-class men, resulting in a mating glut.

Even worse, most wives revel in withholding sex and other destructive, self-centered games.

And in the rare case in which she fulfils her duty as a wife by receiving her man's desire as often as his flesh requires, then through daily oxytocin-fueled orgasms, he might learn to love her for fulfilling this dire need, but the Post-Nut clarity will allow him to see that a wife is not capable of much more than this, and maybe to be a helper to him, in the rare moment that she actually decides to do so. And the Red Pill will remind him that a woman is not capable of loving a man in the way he wishes to be loved.

If men knew how much trouble and expense it is to keep a woman, they would not want anything to do with them.

If women knew what men are really like, they would never want to be near them.

In sum, there are not many motivating factors, short of faith, hope, and vision.

Nevertheless, the reproductive hormones win out for the perpetuation of the human race.

(For secular men, prostitution might be their best option for scratching this itch, instead of all the troubles, risks, and expenses of marriage. I'm not endorsing it, just stating a logical fact.)

Lacking The Wisdom of Age and Experience

So, where is God in all of this?

All of these ponderings are not intended to dismiss Charlton's observation or to excuse the fleshly nature.

Charlton's epiphany is an essential truth underlying a successful marriage, I think. But it is a truth that often remains esoteric until all is said and done, and middle age is well set in.

Actually, we have this power of analysis and decision-making all along, but the world is too loud, and the flesh is too strong, and in youth, we lack the experience and maturity to know what is of true eternal value. Life-altering choices are thus made rather randomly and upon whim, even among those who are brought up in the church and are well-disciplined in the spiritual habits of bible reading and prayer. Ask me how I know. We think we're doing right, and we think we know how to do right, even by faith, but actually, we don't have a clue. The Biblical adage, "Lean not unto thine own understanding" (Proverbs 3:5-6) lacks relevance before the age of 30, precisely because a young man under this age has nary an understanding whatsoever to lean upon. IMO, any understanding that such a one may presume to have is a tentative illusion.

Only after many years of experience, a calmer libido, and a greater spiritual maturity, does one have the luxury and privilege of looking back and assessing the finer details of how well so called 'personalities' fit together, and how much easier or more fulfilling things might've been if God — or chance (and in youth, there seems hardly any difference) had taken one along a different path in life that played out differently with a different mate.

In sum, such reflections are, and cannot be any more than, post-truth, self-incriminating navel gazing, destined only to trap one in a remonstrative cycle of guilt and regret.

If a man should allow himself to be caught up in this cycle, it is a sign of masculine weakness and harmful and needless self-pity. Can it be redemptive? Maybe, but to make it such would seem to require the destruction of all that one has built in one's short life, which is a transgression, by Biblical definition (Galatians 2:18), and to start all over again, late in life. Would it be worth it all? God only knows, and He's not telling. It's up to us to decide, unfortunately. It is for this reason that I think not. I think it is better to swallow the $h!t, and face eternity with humility and grace, rather than carry on with the proudly pricked attitude that, "I could've, should've, would've done better, IF only … Whatever!"

Finding a Particular Person to Marry is a Luxurious Privilege or a Special Dispensation of God's Grace upon the Individual Man

With all this in mind, Charlton's view of finding and marrying a particular person comes from a position that is entirely free from the procreative exigencies of the carnal flesh — a luxury, if you will, that most men do not have, and cannot ever achieve in the current debased, sociosexual milieu — short of God's grace.

Personally, I did not realize Charlton's major epiphany until after I was 10 years into my second marriage, was well into my 50s, and my libido was starting to drop. I think if someone had told me this distinction when I was in college, I would have thought, "Whut?!? ANY girl IS a particular person", my skull-numbing libido being what it was.

Case Study — Jack's Father's Story

Incredibly worse, even after the age of 30, a man's understanding might be a little better, but it still remains severely limited in scope.

After my mother (49 at the time) divorced my father (51) back in 1994, my father had a year-long period of deep contemplation and reckoning. During that time, my father once told me that it is impossible to know how good your marriage is, because there is nothing [meaning no other wives or marriages] to compare it to. All you know is what you've got, and for this reason, even if you know you're not happy with it, you might not even know how lonely you really are, or even how much better things could be. Further, if you somehow have enough self-awareness to know just how bad your marriage really is (perhaps due to divorce), there's not much you can do, because marriage is a life commitment, or so it is supposed to be, and is viewed as such by those who take it seriously. Realizing that you made a bad choice in a spouse later in life — after marriage — is a non sequitur. It changes nothing, but only makes you realize how foolish you've been and fills you with regrets over what could have been — also non sequiturs, but which drag you down nevertheless.

Now that I'm 54, I look back on this talk with my father when he was about the same age as I am now, and I understand him much better. I think my father realized what Charlton described in his musings, and what I realized just a year ago. All three of us men were in our early 50s when we finally understood this — much too late to revise a course change.

Conclusions

Going back to this month's theme concerning the problems within the MMP of the Protestant church, all of the above musings (1) describe the current maladies of poor mating matchups within the church, and (2) make a pretty good argument in favor of arranged marriages. Granted, parents may not know much about how to select particular persons for authentic love and marriage compatibility for their young adult children, but it's got to be far better than totally ignorant young people making these same choices randomly while hyped up on horny hormones.

Intro

This mini-series pulls together a few epiphanies / prophecies that have appeared around the Christian Men's Sphere since the current theme was introduced at the beginning of June 2026 — epiphanies that offer different perspectives on historical and several concurrent phenomena. Here, I've pieced them together to form a comprehensive account of church history and how it has led to what is currently happening within the church today.

Part 1: Hidden Church History

Ed Hurst's post about Hidden Church History (2026/6/14) is his most recent account of an alternative, rarely taught view of early church history — a topic that he covers from time to time. He argues that the original Hebraic understanding of the gospel — rooted in Covenant, the Divine Council and the Watchers / Nephilim (described in Genesis 6, Enoch, and Michael Heiser's book, Unseen Realm), the moral significance of the Tower of Babel judgment, the broader cosmic mission of Christ and how all these things relate to spiritual warfare — faded away within a generation after the apostles died. The church quickly shifted toward Greek rationalism and various forms of Judaizing influences, which led to a spate of heresies over the next two centuries.

A couple more centuries were spent sorting out a standardized Christian doctrine, following a rationalistic explication of the scriptures, resulting in an emphasis of individual salvation, spiritual redemption, and personal moral improvement as the core precepts of the gospel.

This is not to say that these aspects are false or wrong, but that it is incomplete. As a result, most Christians…

- Hold a false view of human nature (morally neutral instead of born captive to Satan/sin).
- Miss the full meaning of Covenant, the importance of Headship, the Kingdom of God, and spiritual warfare.
- Lack awareness of the rebellion of the Nephilim / Demons and the influence of the divine council over the nations (principalities and powers).
- Fail to understand that Christ's work on the Cross empowers believers to reclaim people from enemy territory and to restrain evil through Covenant community and sacrificial love.

Thus Christianity has been ever since, for approximately 1,600 years. Over that time, the church has split twice (first in 1054, and again in the 16th century), and then splintered into hundreds of denominations. Pertaining to domestic life, Marriage has been redefined (i.e., the Council of Trent, in 1563), and since then, divorce has slowly, then quickly, risen to become the norm. By the end of the 20th century, the church had become wholly subsumed by the wider secular culture, and to wit, one which idolizes feminism, and nods to child sacrifice (abortion), h0m0sexu@l!sm, and transhumanism, which, when taken all together, I think could be the worst form of all idolatries.

This is the age in which we now live, and have lived in for the past ~50 years. Younger generations living today don't know anything different.

Conclusions

True Kingdom living is not solitary moral self-improvement but forming committed Covenant families of believers who love one another radically, confront the flesh, and engage in spiritual conquest together.

Ed Hurst anticipates a coming revival of this ancient worldview, and that this revival will prepare the church for a tribulation coming later in the future.

I did not talk with Ed about this before preparing this theme on The Protestant Reformation 2.0, but his post affirms and spells out in more detail what the Spirit has been telling me about what is happening within the church, or will be happening soon.

From Christ to Churchianity — Part 2: How Feminism Captured the Church

Part 2: How Feminism Captured the Church

In this video (2026/6/16), The Heroes' Forge (THF) argues that the modern church's shift toward egalitarianism and feminist theology did NOT begin with the Women's Liberation Movement in the 1970s, or the Feminization of the church in the 1980s, as we might think, but traces all the way back to 1895 with Elizabeth Cady Stanton's The Woman's Bible.

Vox Day's post at Σ Game: The Satanic Heart of Feminism (2026/6/10), quotes an excerpt from the Introduction to The Woman's Bible by Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

I've done some further research on this and added some key facts to the timeline. I think it began much earlier, in 1848.

A Timeline of Key Historical Events

- 1848 The Seneca Falls Convention: This was the first women's rights conference in the United States. It was held at the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Seneca Falls, New York. Women's Rights Activists, Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Lucretia Mott, now considered as early proponents of Feminism, identified Christian theology, doctrines of the Bible, and the patriarchal church as the root of societal patriarchy and the primary obstacles to women's liberation, and targeted them directly. Stanton masterfully rewrote the U.S. Declaration of Independence as a declaration of women's independence from patriarchy. This document, called the Declaration of Sentiments, used the exact structure and language of the original 1776 text, and cleverly rephrased America's fight against British tyranny into women's crusade against "patriarchal oppression".
- 1869 National Woman Suffrage Association: The NWSA was established by Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony to fight for a constitutional amendment granting women the right to vote.
- 1878 Drafting the 19th Amendment: Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony wrote the text that would eventually become the 19th Amendment, which was introduced to Congress in 1878 and was colloquially known as the "Susan B. Anthony Amendment".
- 1895 *The Woman's Bible: Stanton and her committee systematically critiqued the Bible as a tool of women's subjugation. They argued that the accounts of creation (Genesis 2-3), Paul's letters concerning household codes (e.g., Ephesians 5), and the Biblical language describing Headship reflected ancient patriarchal culture rather than divine design. Her own suffrage movement largely disavowed Biblical / traditional patriarchy as too outdated and unnecessarily harsh on women.

- 1919 The 19th Amendment: The amendment that was first introduced to Congress in 1878 was officially passed on June 4, 1919. It achieved the required three-fourths majority of states when Tennessee narrowly ratified it on August 18, 1920. It was officially certified as law on August 26, 1920.

Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton

1950s to 1970s: Major Protestant Denominations began Ordaining Women

- The United Church of Christ (UCC) has roots in Congregationalists and affiliations with other denominations who ordained women as early as the 19th century. The UCC fully integrated female ordination in the 1950s.
- 1956: The Presbyterian Church (PCUSA) ordained its first women ministers.
- 1956: The United Methodist Church (UMC) granted full clergy rights to women.
- 1970: The Episcopal Church voted to allow the ordination of women.
- 1970: The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA) began ordaining women.

1960s to 1980s: Second Wave Feminism

- 1963 The Feminine Mystique: Betty Friedan's seminal work becomes the foundation of secular, liberal second-wave Feminism.
- Mary Daly was a radical feminist philosopher and theologian whose books, The Church and the Second Sex (1968) and Beyond God the Father (1973), critically examined gender roles in the Catholic tradition. The kickback she received from these texts, e.g., losing her teaching position at Boston College, culminated in her repudiating Christianity. She claimed that organized religion was fundamentally oppressive toward women and that seeking equality in the church was akin to a Black person demanding equality in the Ku Klux Klan.
- 1970s Feminist Literature: Many other Feminist books (like All We're Meant to Be, by Letha Scanzoni and Nancy Hardesty, 1974) brought Feminist hermeneutics into Evangelical scholarship.
- 1970s to 1980s Development of Protestant Egalitarian Doctrines: Conservative and Evangelical scholars who advocated for gender equality (often called Evangelical Feminists or Egalitarians) explicitly distanced themselves from the secular and post-Christian ideologies of Friedan and Daly, and began building Egalitarian hermeneutics by drawing on historical Evangelical pioneers who championed women's roles (like Catherine Booth and A. J. Gordon), and utilizing a feminist sympathizing biblical analysis of 'Christian' Feminist scholars and theologians (e.g., J. Cheryl Exum, Carol Meyers, Letty M. Russell, Phyllis Trible, et al.), who critiqued biblical texts in light of Feminist values while maintaining a nuanced commitment to faith sans patriarchy.

- 1987 Danvers Statement: The Conservative response to societal liberal Feminism leads to the doctrinal ideology of Complementarianism (coined in 1988).

All of this has led to the egalitarianish, indoctrinalized Protestant Feminology, expressed in the form of American Evangelical Protestant Churchianity, that we have today.

Mary Daly

Conclusions

THF claims all this was a deliberate, long-term strategic effort to reinterpret (and undermine) Scripture's teachings on gender roles, headship, and patriarchy, which has gradually influenced Protestant Evangelical circles.

In support of this proposition, THF points out that many arguments from Stanton's era (e.g., cultural conditioning of texts, rejection of creation order, and reinterpreting "headship") are now mainstream in egalitarian scholarship. THF critiques the Danvers Statement as a defensive retreat that avoided reclaiming "patriarchy" due to its cultural toxicity.

THF concludes that the church has cooperated in its own dismantling by allowing women to assert authority within the church and its influence over the wider culture, and by negotiating with cultural pressures rather than holding to traditional interpretations.

However, from my own research on this topic, I have to point out that several Protestant churches began ordaining women a full decade or two before Second Wave Feminism kicked in. This suggests that the church wasn't capitulating to the culture as THF and many others are saying, but was actually leading the charge. That's insidious!

Also in his assessment, THF contrasts three positions: Egalitarianism, Complementarianism, and traditional Patriarchy (the latter isn't an ideological –ism, BTW), by examining specific biblical texts (the order of creation in Genesis, Ephesians, 1 Timothy, etc.), and discussing the "fruit" or outcomes of each theological position. It's worth listening to if you're not already familiar with these distinctions.

Finally, I rue to mention that in my research of the above mentioned women, I've come to conclude that the word 'ugly' doesn't begin to describe the appearance of all these women (just one look at Anthony or Daly will leave readers in a state of horror), thus confirming Dalrock's assertion that "Feminism is Ugly" and that "Feminists are Ugly".

From Christ to Churchianity — Part 3: The Origins of Servant Leadership and Why it is Heretical

What began as a business leadership model was coopted by Protestant Egalitarians and hermeneutically transformed into a heretical model for marriage that effectively subverts Headship.

This mini-series pulls together a few epiphanies / prophecies that have appeared around the Christian Men's Sphere since the current theme was introduced at the beginning of June 2026 — insights that offer different perspectives on historical and several concurrent phenomena. Here, I've pieced them together to form a comprehensive account of church history and how it has led to what is currently happening within the church today.

Part 3: The Origin of the Servant Leader Philosophy

After the 1987 Danvers Statement, the Conservative Evangelical Protestant response to societal liberal feminism led to the doctrinal ideology of Complementarianism, which was accompanied by several supporting sub-philosophies known by cute but emasculating clichés — like "Servant Leader", for example.

The term "Servant Leader", as it has been used in Evangelical circles, is a spin-off of a business management philosophy spawned by Robert K. Greenleaf (considered the father of modern Servant Leadership). Greenleaf coined the term "Servant Leader" in 1969, and it became widely known in the 1970s.

Greenleaf described Servant Leadership as a philosophy and set of practices that comprises good management attitudes, enriches the lives of individual employees, and ultimately builds better organizations.

Greenleaf stated that,

> "The Servant Leader is servant first… It begins with the natural feeling that one wants to serve, to serve first. Then, conscious choice brings one to aspire to lead. That person is sharply different from one who is a leader first."

One of his overlying principles was that Servant Leaders are leaders who put other people's needs, aspirations, and interests above their own (in line with the larger goals of the organization). To be an effective leader, according to his model, one must first answer the call to serve, not the call to lead. His belief was that service must come before leadership when developing as a leader.

In my own words, I would describe Greenleaf's philosophy of Servant Leadership as a manager prioritizing making sure that all the employees under his authority have everything they need to do their job well, and this would include all things emotional, financial, logistical, material, relational, and perhaps in other areas as needed. It implies that employees should be free to ask their supervisor for anything they need, and that the supervisor should grant their requests, with discretion; but it does NOT mean that employees exercise authority over the supervisor, as the word 'servant' might suggest. Overall, I think the concept could be more accurately called "Holistic Leadership", or "Logistical Leadership", or "Service Leadership".

But this is NOT what the Church picked up on, as explained next.

The Church Coopts the Servant Leadership Model

Sometime in the 1970s or 1980s (I cannot find a definitive date, but definitely before 1987), Evangelical Protestants coopted Greenleaf's Servant Leader philosophy as a model of Christian styled leadership and/or Church leadership.

Christian Scholars, Larry G. Locke and Baylee Smith, have already picked this apart, so here is a relevant excerpt of what they've written. [Emphasis mine.]

> "U.S. corporations, however, have not been the only ones to embrace Greenleaf's theory. Much of the Christian community has adopted it over the last 50 years. Institutions such as Andrews University, YMCA, and The Salvation Army are among the Christian organizations that have implemented Servant Leadership as their administrative model. Churches across the country have embraced the theory as well. The Servant Leadership Assembly is an annual conference open to churches across the country every year. This conference is committed to the development of Servant Leaders in the church community. Some Christian authors have gone so far as to argue that Servant Leadership is the only leadership style acceptable for Christians. Since they accept Christ as the model of a Servant Leader, and since we are called to emulate Him, these authors contend that Servant Leadership is Biblically mandated. This argument grants Servant Leadership a kind of doctrinal authority never imagined by Greenleaf.
> Servant Leadership has been embraced and welcomed by Christian organizations in part because many of Greenleaf's principles resemble the Christ of the New Testament. Passages of scripture, such as Matthew 20:25-28, Luke 22:24-27, and John 13:1-7, are commonly used to support the idea that Servant Leadership is not only associated with Christ but originated with Him. It is clear from these and other scriptures that Christ calls His followers to serve. Does that mean, however, that He calls them to be Servant Leaders? Christians should be careful to evaluate Greenleaf's theory in light of the theory's history and content."
> Christian Scholars (Larry G. Locke, Baylee Smith): Is Servant Leadership Christian? (2021/1/15)

Importing the last statement above, DeepStrength and I evaluated this theory in several previous posts, not in terms of the theory's history and content, but in light of what the bible has to say about the role of authority. [This is CRP required reading.]

Continuing from the article.

> "Despite what some might say about modern Servant Leadership theory originating in Scripture, Greenleaf did not base his theory on the Bible. He based it on Herman Hesse's work, The Journey to the East, hardly a Christian source. Greenleaf later utilized scriptural references to support his claims about Servant Leadership. However, he also stated in one of his lectures that he "regard[s] all scriptures of all religions as great stories of the human spirit and take[s] them for the insight they yield on that basis". This statement indicates a much more > universalist approach when applying sacred texts than a Christian viewpoint, in which the Bible is considered uniquely authoritative. The theory that Christian organizations have been embracing does not, in fact, have scriptural origins, and its author never endorsed it as a Biblical mandate."

> Christian Scholars (Larry G. Locke, Baylee Smith): Is Servant Leadership Christian? (2021/1/15)

Comparing Greenleaf's Model to Christian Authority

True, there is a large overlap of similarities between Greenleaf's model of leadership and the Christian model of Genuine Authority, but they are not exactly the same. One needs to study it a bit to understand how they are different; hence the reason for the present post.

There are at least two noteworthy differences.

1. The aim of Greenleaf's model is to soften and streamline the social and working conditions within a business or social organization to be more humane. In contrast, the aim of Genuine Authority is to build up the Christian community by faith.
2. In Greenleaf's model, the leader already holds a position of 'Gentile' leadership and then takes on the duty to serve the needs of those under his authority; whereas Genuine Authority takes on the duty to serve others within one's sphere of influence out of one's love for the Lord, while one's social position or status can make this more effective.

These conditions could be the same, depending on the person and the context. It stands to reason that churches have attempted to create this specific, overlapping context within Church leadership, but it doesn't hold in all cases.

Servant Leadership as a Faux Model of Churchian Marriage

But it gets worse.

Evangelical Protestants didn't stop with applying the concept of Servant Leadership as a model of church leadership. They also adopted it as a model for Christian Marriage as well, stipulating that godly husbands should act as Servant Leaders in their homes, just as Jesus did with his disciples.

> "just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many."
> Jesus in Matthew 20:28 (NASB)

It's amazing how well Egalitarians can clue into this specific nuance of Headship when it suits their heretical, self-centered interests, but remain stubbornly ignorant of the larger roles and responsibilities of this structure. Or IOW, "Responsibility for thee, but NOT for mee!" Not to mention that husbands are not, and cannot be, their wives' personal Jesus.

St. Dalrock made us well aware of the heretical aspects of Servant Leadership as a marital structure, as well as several contemporary pastors who preach(ed) Servant Leadership. (See posts under Related below.) However, I have not been able to find the names of the Christian leaders who first made this logical leap of false faith back in the 1970s and 1980s, and thereby set the trend for the spiritual fornication that followed. Readers who may be in the know are invited to chime in below.

In sum, Servant Leader, as preached from Evangelical pulpits for decades following the Danvers Statement, emphasized husbands being 99% servant, 1% leader, as Dalrock put it, and also upon the quality of service they yielded to their wives, as judged by their wives' criticism — effectively placing wives in de facto authority over their husbands — an inversion of Biblical Headship.

Servant vs. Service

Speaking on the topic of “Servant Leader”, just two days ago, Manosphere Highlights Daily picked apart a video talk from an indignant female psychologist, Dr. Ana, who attempted to debunk the highly esteemed Dr. Orion Taraban’s views by using multiple dishonest debate tactics. One view that was covered, which I’ll focus on below, is the difference between ‘servant’ and ‘service’.

Manosphere Highlights Daily: Dr. Ana vs. Dr. Orion Taraban (2026/6/27)

Starting at the 10:00 mark (until 12:45), the word “serve” (Dr. Taraban’s words) is differentiated from “servant” (Dr. Ana’s words). The transcript follows.

Dr. Ana: What, you might ask, does Dr. Taraban think makes a woman useful? Well, serving a man.

Dr. Taraban: Well, it means that she must actively generate value and to be helpful.

Jack: The biblical language for this role is “helpmate” — a helper (Genesis 2:18).

Dr. Taraban: A good woman, a smart woman, once she secures access to a man, starts to look around, starts to carefully observe a man’s life and what he is trying to accomplish, in order to identify opportunities where she can be of service.

“But Orion”, some women will say, “Why would I want to serve a man?”

Dr. Ana: I think I just threw up in my mouth a little bit. That’s a pretty disgusting way to view dynamics between men and women. It reveals a very hierarchical view of the genders, where women are relinquished to the role of servant. They’re basically beneath men. Now, as you’ll see later on in the video, Dr. Taraban likes to redefine words. So, let’s look at the actual definition of servant so that he can’t sort of backtrack and pull a modern daily fallacy.”

Jack: In response to Dr. Ana’s last statement,

> You offspring of vipers, how can you, being evil, express any good things? For the mouth speaks from that which fills the heart.
> Matthew 12:34 (NASB)

As we will see, it is Dr. Ana who pulls not just one, but several modern daily fallacies in her diatribe against the esteemed Dr. Taraban.

Dr. Ana: A servant is an individual who performs duties about the person or home of a master or personal employer. So here we get an idea that is going to continue to come up in his content, that men are kind of like women’s employers, and that romantic relationships should involve a woman doing things for a man that make his life easier. Now what effect do you think this will have on relationships?

MHD: Now here we have to make another distinction, and this one is important.

Dr. Orion says “to be of service”. He says “useful”. He says “generate value”. And then Dr. Ana looks up the definition of servant and builds her entire counterargument around that word. But he never said “servant”. He said “serve”. And those are not the same word. “To serve” has multiple definitions. The Cambridge dictionary defines it as, “To help achieve something, or to be useful as something, or if something serves you, it is good or helpful for you.”

The Merriam-Webster defines it as “To be of use. To be favorable, opportune, or convenient, to be worthy of reliance or trust.”

Why does being useful to someone have a negative connotation?

Your doctor serves you. Your lawyer serves you. Your accountant serves you.

A good spouse, male or female, serves the other person in the relationship by being useful, reliable, and trustworthy.

A woman who asks, "What does this man need?", and, "How can I support what he's trying to build?" is not beneath him. She is his compliment. That is not hierarchy. That is unity. Dr. Anna took the word 'serve', replaced it with 'servant', looked up the definition of 'servant', and then built a case against a word Dr. Orion never used. That is not debunking. That is a Straw Man. And a psychologist should know the difference."

Jack: Although none of them gets it exactly right according to scripture, Dr. Taraban's take is close enough for recognizance of Biblically proscribed gender roles, and MHD masterfully picks apart the deceptive switcheroo — and that is exactly what ruffles Dr. Ana's feminist feathers. Furthermore, this is the same deceptive switcheroo that Evangelical Protestants have promulgated via the Servant Leader rhetoric since the 1980s. That is, Men are fully expected to be 'servants' of women / wives (where the word 'leaders' is tacitly tacked on to make it sound acceptable to ~~Christian men~~ gullible simps), without any awareness of Genuine Authority or authentic Headship; while men who expect their wives to be merely 'helpers' (although NOT 'servants', per se), are stepping outside the bounds of culturally converged, heretical Christian ethics.

I couldn't make up a better case example than this.

Conclusions

The whoring church picked up a secular universalist philosophy of leadership, ignored and omitted the aspects that were actually Biblical, accentuated the aspects that were illustriously Femcentric, and then rebranded it as a fully Biblical model — of marriage!

The debate covered by MHD clearly illustrates that the "Servant Leader" bit was a yeasty mickey that was tacitly slipped into everyone's communal grape juice to make it sufficiently intoxicating.

Thus, the Biblical injunction of a wife being of SERVICE to her husband was subverted into a husband being a SERVANT to his wife — a clear inversion of Christian Headship — and then blithely calling this Christian Leadership in marriage.

Mass deception ensued on epic historic levels not seen since the heresies of the early church preceding the fall of Rome. Thus, the entire modern Evangelical Protestant church has turned to forning, whoring, aborting, divorcing, idolatrous paganism for a whole generation, or two, or three in some families. The Good Lord lost face all around the world, and no one even cared enough to GAS.

Do not think for a moment that God might let this one slide in His infinite grace. Entire socioeconomic classes will rise and fall, just as we are now seeing. Entire nations will be turning belly up for a grand romping before the nations, just as we are now seeing. Just wait and watch.

Whoever participated in initiating and promulgating this stunt is going to face an excoriating condemnation on the day of judgment, and then face an eternity in the seventh dimension of hell.

The fig leaves shall weep until that day.

From Christ to Churchianity — Part 4: From Danvers to Delusion in 4 Decades

The fruits of the de facto egalitarian doctrines of American Evangelical Protestant ~~Complementarianism~~ Feminolatry have led us to the utter delusion of churchianity.

Intro

This mini-series pulls together a few epiphanies / prophecies that have appeared around the Christian Men's Sphere since the current theme was introduced at the beginning of June 2026 — insights that offer different perspectives on historical and several concurrent phenomena. Here, I've pieced them together to form a comprehensive account of church history and how it has led to what is currently happening within the church today.

Part 4: From Danvers to Delusion

The Danvers Statement (1987) articulates the Evangelical Protestant view of gender roles. It is a foundational document from the Council on Biblical Manhood and Womanhood (CBMW) that has formed the backbone of the Complementarian movement within Evangelical Protestant churches.

The Danvers Statement was written in response to the rising tide of egalitarianism within the church, and feminism, sexual promiscuity, and the erosion of conservative family values within American culture. It was not promulgated by any one particular denomination and was not written by a single person, but was a collaborative effort by a group of evangelical leaders, including John Piper and Wayne Grudem. It has been widely accepted and cited by many Protestant pastors, churches, and denominations, most notably Baptists (i.e., SBC) and Presbyterians (i.e., PCA).

Readers can read through the entire text of the Danvers Statement here. It is not long nor tedious at all, so I invite readers to read through it carefully with a critical eye. I do not see any obvious faults with the general thrust of the Danvers Statement. IMO, it was a very appropriate and necessary rectification for what was happening at that time. I'd say its greatest fault is that it does not define Headship nor delineate Biblical gender roles in any more explicit detail. Brother Sharkly would object to its statement that both men and women are created in the image of God.

But as the past 4 decades of history have revealed, the devil is in the details.

Yes, nearly 4 decades have passed since the Danvers Resolution and the formation of the doctrinal ideology of Complementarianism. What we have seen in the church during this time, as elucidated by Dalrock, Deep Strength, et al., suggests that the Conservative Evangelical Protestant response to liberal societal feminism during this time has not strictly adhered to the core Biblical tenets encapsulated in the Danvers Statement, but rather, has sought a compromise between these tenets and the wider feminist culture. In sermons and teachings, the compromising aspects were sugar-coated with readily recognizable but ultimately emasculating anecdotal prototypes of pagan-lite marital structures that were presented as Christian — like "Happy Wife, Happy Life", "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy", "My better half", and "Husbands should be Servant Leaders", the last a fallacy that I covered in the previous post.

As Dalrock said, "Complementarian marriage is an Egalitarian marriage with a veneer of headship."

Here now comes the current critique, as mentioned above.

The Heroes' Forge: Gynocentrism in Churches? Here's What's Really Happening (2026/6/19)

This video is a continuation of THF's previous video on how feminism historically captured the church, which references Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and was covered in a previous post on Σ Frame: From Christ to Churchianity — Part 2: How Feminism Captured the Church (2026/6/26).

Core Thesis

In this video, THF gives a blunt, Red Pill style conversation arguing that gynocentrism — NOT Biblical Headship, nor even Complementarianism as described in the Danvers Statement, is the dominant force distorting modern churches. His tone is direct, humorous at times, and critical of effeminate or feelings-based leadership.

The key points of his argument are as follows.

- Pastoral Fear of Women: The general gist of the grist is that it is politically correct to revolve around gynocentric viewpoints that cater to what women want to hear. Therefore, pastors and church leaders avoid teaching clear biblical patriarchal doctrines (e.g., wifely submission in Ephesians 5) and rarely preach uncomfortable truths about gender roles because they fear offending women. As a result, the entire American Evangelical church culture has become emasculated and feminized.
- Doctrinal Compromise: Most American Evangelical churches lean heavily on Egalitarian or at best, compromised Complementarian doctrines, which sacrifice doctrinal rigor in favor of catering to women's fee fee's, at the cost of losing Biblical, male-led authoritative structure and order within the church.
- Ego and Social Pressure: Many church leaders have too much ego invested in their institution appearing "nice" (i.e., feminized), or ethically right (according to culture, NOT scripture), or "seeker-friendly". They prioritize NOT hurting people's feelings and NOT looking bad in the secular world's eyes over fidelity to scripture.
- Signs of Gynocentrism in a Church:
  - Sermons heavily focused on "the plight of women."
  - Emphasis on "mutual submission" (which is unbiblical when taken out of context).
  - Female-led Bible studies in which women act as teachers and doctrinal authorities over men.
  - Pastor's wives wielding 'soft', unofficial influence (as I wrote about before).
- Young Men Entering the Church: With Gen Z and Gen Alpha men turning to church amid disillusionment with liberalism/feminism, they risk encountering the same gynocentric, feminolatrous environment.
- Discernment is Needed: THF calls for men to study Scripture deeply, and seek out churches that teach uncompromised gender roles. He cautions that it takes time, a diligent study of the content of sermons, and a detailed investigation of a church's social structure to tell whether a specific church is more Biblical / traditional or has folded to egalitarianism.
- Strength in Numbers: I [Jack] will suggest that young Christian men should form groups, either within or outside of their churches, go visit several different churches, and then discuss among themselves (outside of church) how well each church conforms to biblical precepts.

In addition, THF offers some personal anecdotes about his leadership experiences as a deacon involving confrontations over biblical headship and observations about marriage dynamics, such as status, leverage, and willingness to enforce boundaries.

Conclusions

Despite the concerted effort made to assert Biblical gender roles and traditional Christian values, expressed in the Danvers Statement, what has really happened within the church is a doubling down on the primacy of gynocentrism — prioritizing women's comfort, desires, feelings, opinions, and viewpoints — all of which has amounted to idolatry and the subterfuge of women's sins. This is really no different from the wider feminist culture, except that the church has done an exceptional job at making up all kinds of plausible excuses and doctrinal justifications for such, backed up by scripture no less, or so it is claimed. And this has become what is now known as Complementarianism.

If reading this doesn't make you angry, then you might be a culturally converged Antidisestablishmentarian Complementarianesque Egalitarianish Ressentimentalist (ACER).

Opening

Hello Jack, and the noblemen of the Sigma Frame realm. I appreciate your feedback, your good words, your advice, and the help you guys give me online. I appreciate the fact that you guys spoke the truth about what I need to do, and I'm thankful that I have an online space where I can trust the advice of men whose thoughts and comments on this blog I appreciate.

So, I'll give you an update on how my life has been since the letter I sent to this space last year.

Church Attendance

This year, I made up my mind as early as January to start going to the Reformed church. At first, there were contentions from my mother. But when she saw that I wasn't budging, and that I was serious about getting into this church, fellowshipping with them, and becoming a member, there were heated arguments at first – heated! But when she saw that I kept going consistently, she eventually gave up, or relented, and reduced her contentions toward my going there.

Although I believe the Reformed church that I've been attending is one of the most Biblically based churches in my region, I still think it is largely Complementarian. Some may hold narrower views, some broader; I don't know. I haven't had much conversation with them on these beliefs, except with maybe one. He knows I'm Patriarchal in my beliefs on gender roles. He has somewhat of a narrow Complementarian view.

Although I've grown to dislike Complementarianism, I can still relate to those who cling to this way of thinking, because, just like them, I used to think Patriarchy was unbiblical, before I had knowledge of what Christian Patriarchy actually is. When you talk about things like that (Patriarchy and/or The Red Pill), what comes to mind for people is someone like Andrew Tate or Myron Gaines. We know they're not a credible source, and we don't support their prescribed views, even though most of their observations about modern men, modern society, modern media, and modern women are accurate. But that's just how it is, and that's why I humbly appreciate the men in conservative Christian “Manosphere” circles who hold to and uphold the Biblical view of Patriarchy, which I also affirm.

Getting a Job

While at the church, I met a brother who gave me a job teaching subjects in coding and digital tech to high school students (from Year Seven to Year Twelve) . The pay was almost twice the minimum wage of my country, Nigeria. I did that job for about three or four months, from January through April or May (2026). While I was at it, the job turned out to be stressful; that is, it was far from my place, it was every day, and I didn’t have much time for myself. The school’s curriculum was demanding too, with so many periods of classes to take back-to-back, with little time to myself, which wore me out.

So towards the end of April, he told me about a new job he wanted to offer me, one that’s part-time to work with him in another school. The pay wouldn’t be as much, but it would still be enough, almost like the previous school, but slightly lower. But he figured this one would be easier, since I’d be teaching primary school students (Year 1 to 6), only two days a week, and not every day, even though it’s also far from where I stay (even farther than the previous school).

Hearing that, I was so happy with the offer that I sent in my resignation letter. They responded that I couldn’t resign without giving them thirty days’ notice. But I didn’t accept that, because I never signed a contract with them when I started. (I think they forgot to send me one, given the circumstances that happened when they accepted me.) Still, I helped them out from time to time for twenty-one days (without pay), and that was it for me.

I started the new job officially on 2026/6/23 (just 5 days ago from the time of writing this). Being a part-time teacher at this school means I’ll be working directly with the same brother from church who gave me this opportunity, since he’s also into tech tutoring.

Independent Living

Concerning the idea of staying on my own to grow, be independent, and become a man. A few weeks back, I went to my father, since he has another house not far from our main family address, which he built and rents out to tenants. I told him I think it's time I stay on my own, and asked if I could stay in that other house, since he's my father, and I know the rent there isn't expensive compared to the prices of other homes for rent in that location, and I'm sure he may want to collect a little bit less for me. I told him I'd like to stay there and see if I could become independent on my own, which would help me grow as a man.

When he heard me say that, he was very happy and really encouraged me. He told me the house is currently full, but he could give a current tenant (who is a widow) a quit notice so she could move out and I could move in, although he said he would try to negotiate with her and help her anyway he could. When he said that, I was cool about it but a bit reluctant about it because she was a widow, even though he said he would help her. I'm going to start saving as soon as this new job starts paying, so that, God willing, by His grace, I could have enough funds by as early as next year to pay him and move in, stay on my own, and be independent.

Growing in Initiative

I also appreciate Oscar's comments about how I talk a lot about planning and do too little. And he's right, really. I have so many plans in my head, so many things I want to do, wish to do, but I don't actually take charge and do them. I know that's where I'm straining myself in limiting my own growth as a man. I pray for discipline and determination to repent of this and take much more action and do much less thinking (not that it's bad to think), because the more I think, the less action I take. I just need to take charge of even the smallest idea and start doing it, and hope that by God's grace, it'll grow from there, whatever the Lord has placed in my heart to do.

I also want to take my fitness seriously, doing pull-ups, push-ups, and other physical activities, like I used to do some years back before I stopped because of the commotion happening around me and my family. But I've made plans to start again as soon as possible, because, as Oscar said, I've done a lot of thinking, little action, and I need to start doing, taking charge of my life, and pushing through.

I think I'll start taking charge of these things now, since I'll have more free time with this part-time job. I'll use that free time not only to prepare for classes, but also to take charge of my life and actually do the things the Lord has put on my heart to learn and do; things that can help me grow. Maybe it's a tool the Lord will use to shape me into a man.

Repenting of Bad Habits

As for weaknesses I'm facing as a man, concerning the porn habit I mentioned before, and also, more recently, not studying and reading Scripture daily. I confessed both to my pastor. He gave me a rebuke and biblical counsel, and he's helping me grow in these areas. Regarding the porn habit, by the grace of God, that has quickly diminished, and I'm thankful and grateful to God for that. I also confessed and told him how I recently had not been growing in the means of grace by reading God's Word as I should. He harshly rebuked and helped me see the depth of my sin (as he did when I told him about my porn habits some months ago), and I've repented of it.

I got a physical copy of a study Bible. I used to read the Bible from my phone, but being on your phone means facing distractions from the internet and social media, which limit how well you can actually read the Word, on top of the stress of day-to-day life. But with a physical Bible sitting on your table, you're constantly reminded: you ought to read God's Word. By God's grace, since I got the physical Bible some days ago, I've been reading it every day. So I'm growing in grace, improving my daily Scripture reading, prayer life, and devotion to God as much as I can.

Placing Women on Hold

As for the women at my church, I haven't found any with Patriarchal views. (Maybe there are, or maybe not.) Some women may even claim it's unbiblical. Feminism is ingrained in most of our ideologies through what we see, hear, and observe in the culture and in the media. So it's going to be hard to find a woman who conforms to Christian Patriarchal ideology.

Maybe when I'm ready for that step, I could find someone with, I should say, conservative views from my village, who isn't yet steeped in these modern ideologies, and build her up in the knowledge of Christ. Or maybe not necessarily from my village but any woman the Lord, in His providence, brings into my path, whom I could help grow in the knowledge of Christ, teaching her about the dangers of feminism so she isn't drawn into it (or detoxing it from if already in it), and exposing her to the truth of Christian patriarchal belief and what I want our marriage to look like; if the Lord is gracious to bring her, and if she conforms to these convictions as well. That's the current long-term plan: that the Lord would bring a woman to my side to marry, so we can grow together as one in Christ because I can't conform to modern ideologies, especially how feminism is being embraced, and how it has crept even into some complementarian thought.

That said, I'm not focusing too much on that part of my life right now, since there's more for me to grow into as a man, which I'm leaning into and want to take charge of. This starts with being grounded in church, which, by God's grace, I am doing, going to Church and currently taking membership classes, reading God's word daily, praying regularly, and studying and meditating on the scriptures. I attend church almost every Sunday, or at least twice a month. I'm also serving in the book ministry of the church.

Women who are considered to be very beautiful in Nigeria.

Closing

So, I guess if you really look at it, I'm following the roadmap: find a good church, get a job, stay on your own, be independent, grow as a man, and God willing, eventually marry and have children. Even though marriage is a long-term plan, I hope that as I take my time and put in the effort, through the Lord's grace and strength, to grow as a man, He'll be gracious to me and give me a wife who holds to my Christian patriarchal beliefs and ideology, with whom we can start a family and grow together as one in the Lord, and have children who will become an army, growing and glorified in God.

I'm grateful to God for everything, thankful that God is planting and growing me in the church, helping me grow spiritually, and for the brother who helped and is helping me get the job I just started. I'm thankful for my father, who agreed to let me stay in the house he built, hopefully by God's grace, next year. From there, I need to take charge of my life through discipline, hard work, and determination, using this season to grow as a man, physically, spiritually, mentally, financially, and in every area of my life.

So thank you, guys, for everything, the advice, and the Christian Manosphere space in this blog. I'll keep giving you updates from time to time.

I really appreciate each and every one of your comments, and I pray the Lord blesses you all and your families as you keep praying for me.

Thank you all. I appreciate it.

P.S: I'm still a member, or should I say a "ghost member," of the blog; still reading the content from time to time, though, to be honest, I haven't kept up as much lately. But going forward, I'm going to catch up and stay up to date with your writings. (I see a lot of interesting blog posts recently from the titles.)

From Christ to Churchianity — Part 5: Moral Legalism as an Expression of Law

Law is falsely and legalistically interpreted to delineate Morality.

Faux Morality as an Expression of Law

Bruce Charlton wrote a post titled The intractable problem of moral legalism in Christian discourse (2026/7/2), followed by another on the same day, Morality does not derive from Laws, which sums up the main argument behind the first.

Key excerpts from the first post:

> "If there is one area of life in which discussion is futile, it is when trying to persuade a Moral Legalist in a situation where somebody has transgressed a law, rule or principle, that he regards as both absolute and primary.
> Such people cannot be made to recognize that the crucial move in their argument has been their own personal choice to regard values as existing ultimately in the form of laws.
> As well as, secondly, the choice to place This Law, here-and-now, as above all other laws that could (in principle) be applied to the situation under discussion.
> In other words; any possible argument has already-been pre-decided by the prior choice of These-Laws as necessarily valid and supreme, and the prior choice to apply This-Law here-and-now.
> Moral legalists have taken a vastly complex situation unfolding in real-time; and applied-to-it a grossly simplified model, that begs all the most fundamental questions."
> Bruce Charlton: The intractable problem of moral legalism in Christian discourse (2026/7/2)

Charlton's second post offers a summary of the first.

> "Morality does not derive from Laws.
> Morality derives from God: from the nature, purposes, and methods of God; as manifested in divine creation.
> The morality of Men derives from their personal affiliation to God*.
> Bruce Charlton: Morality does not derive from Laws (2026/7/2)

He's right. Law should be an expression of Morality, not the other way around; and Morality must emanate from a moment-by-moment discernment of how the Lord's character is or would be expressed in a given situation. This is precisely why judicial decisions must be made on a case-by-case basis.

To those who have a whit of spiritual discernment and passably good judgment, it would be asinine to routinely apply rules and laws across the board, and to assume, by nature of reason alone, that these judgments should hold valid in every case, without any consideration of whether a particular application of a law is actually appropriate to the context, or whether justice is actually served, or if it is beneficial overall.

Yet, ironically, this great emphasis on rationality, resulting in a paucity of common sense, is exactly where we are at right now, a quarter of the way through the 21st century.

In his first essay, Charlton writes that this is a significant problem in Christian discourse, but it is also evident in the wider practice of Western jurisprudence, as Charlton wrote in a comment:

> "We have now reached a point when an atheist-materialist judges X to be morally-wrong because it violates Y Law — and, for him, that is the end of the discussion.
> If pressed hard, he may justify by arguing that Y Law is good, or at least better than nothing, or that without Laws there would be unconstrained selfish exploitation…
>
> But such arguments are framed in utilitarian terms and include multiple probabilistic predictions; and the real force of argument and source of vehemence stops with a dogmatic belief in the intrinsic goodness of Law Y.
> Publicly stated dogmatism of such a belief is, indeed, a major source of moral self-esteem in our culture. It is > meant to be, and mostly understood as, a marker of moral integrity."

Yes, being strictly objective and reasonable is now the ultimate mark of faux virtue in the Post-Enlightened West — except when this conflicts with gynolatrous, liberal values, in which case, cherry picking and other dishonest tactics must be employed to support the currently accepted post-truth narratives, at least enough to purport one's self as appearing to endorse them, so as not to offend the particular sensitivities of virtue signaling pagans and thus be cancelled or out-grouped as a pariah. Being able to adroitly maneuver within this social landscape is also considered a mark of faux virtue.

Where Did We Get the False Notion that Morality Arises from Law?

To offer at least one answer to this question, I'll redirect readers from Charlton's posts to what Ed Hurst has written about this topic several times before, including a recent one, Still Seeking False Approval (2026/7/1).

Here, he writes [emphasis added for clarity],

> "This is easily the single greatest factor in corrupting the teaching and organization of churches. With the dire need to be taken seriously, teaching and practice must pass muster with human reason. This was already a bit of a problem less than a century after Christ's Ascension. The heavy influx of Hellenized minds swamped the early apostolic Hebraic teaching. The Christian religion was highly Hellenized as early as the second generation of apostles."
> "A strong Hebrew influence left the churches. Yes, there was still mixing in some areas of the Roman Empire, but the break was noticeable in the writings of the Early Church Fathers. The Hebrew mystical outlook of Christ and His disciples was exchanged for a rational outlook that twisted the teachings of church leaders. This is where all the debates came from. In that, the scholars of the Christian faith kept asking impertinent rational questions that would have never occurred to a Hebrew mind.
> This incessant demand to define and delineate the means and mechanisms of God has crippled the call for believers to build a spiritual kingdom of hearts."
> Radix Fidem: Still Seeking False Approval (2026/7/1)

As to the question of moral legalism (either within the church or the culture), likewise, it could be said that this incessant demand to define the means and delineate the mechanisms of doctrinal exegesis / legal jurisprudence has crippled the ability of believers / citizens / judges / lawyers to discern and apply good moral judgment. The error in this approach is that it assumes a rational foundation of cold-hearted logic rather than a mystical outlook of faith-based morality. In turn, what we get is a creed, or a doctrine, or a law that is, perhaps falsely instituted, and then flatly applied in every case.

Pharisaism, rather than Faith.

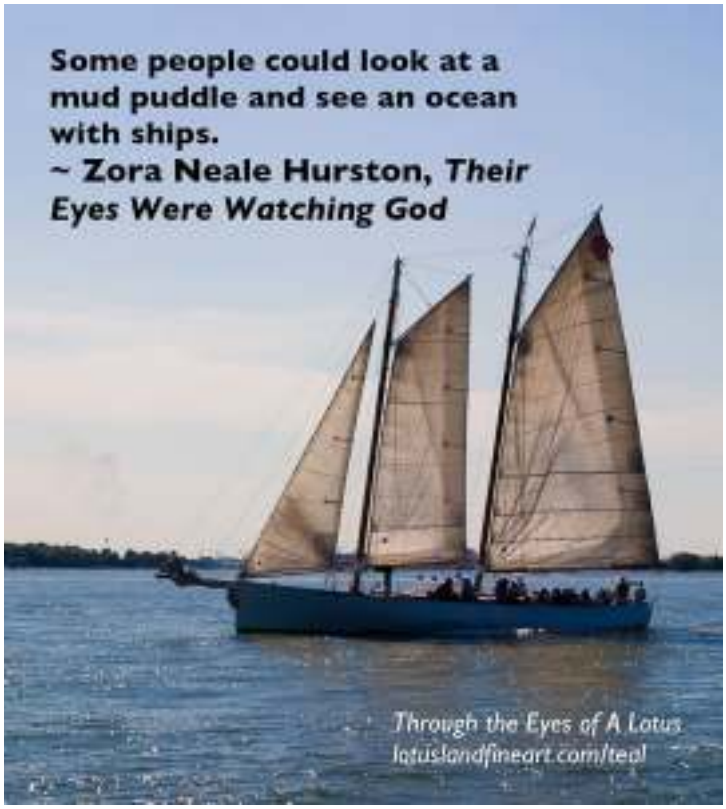
The Law as an Expression of True Morality

My last post expanded on some insights offered by Bruce Charlton and Ed Hurst about The intractable problem of moral legalism in Christian discourse and how Morality does not derive from Laws (2026/7/2). But our (i.e., Bruce, Ed, and Jack) observations of this phenomenon aren't complete without pointing out the proper relation between law and morality. (I'm a teacher, so I feel a moral compunction that requires me to spell this out clearly for my faithful readers.)

It is elementary for a mature believer to understand that the true relation is the opposite — that the law is (or should be) a statement of moral behaviors and principles that are expressed, written, and enforced. But beyond this, I found it difficult to articulate this truth in any more detailed language that might impart to my readers an understanding of the whys and wherefores. So I shot an email to Ed Hurst and asked him to tie these ideas together and put them into more precise words.



Ed Hurst responded,

> "Charlton is correct, and the second comment on his blog gets to the point: Moral truth is relational."

The comment that Ed refers to is from Jonathan who wrote…

> "It seems to me that the most important sentence in this post is "Heavenly morality and values are wholly relational, i.e., rooted in love between persons — and there is no place for Laws in Heaven." If this hypothesis is correct, the rest of the post proceeds from it."

Hurst continues [emphasis mine],

> "Having spent decades studying the Hebrew mystical frame of mind, against the Western rationalist, the simplest answer remains that God is a real Person, and His Law (His Word) has always been His Son.
> What Moses received on Mt. Sinai was a frame of reference for people who lack the spiritual or moral maturity to connect directly to God. However, that connection was always the intention, to draw people into His personal presence, to get to know Him as Father and Lord.
>
> Faith is inherently unreasonable. Saying that is anathema to the Western mind. Westerners do not accept the notion of anything higher than the intellect, so that means faith is below reason. However, we posit that the heart is above the mind, something very hard to get Westerners to accept. We end up having to explain heart-led thinking along with everything else. It's a very long argument.
> Instead of fighting the Western way, I often rely strongly on pointing out that Jesus was a Hebrew man, and because Jesus was a Hebrew man, it should follow that we need to think as He did, and then explaining what a Hebrew mental orientation looks like. For that, I'll refer to Catacomb Resident's post about Imagers without Imagery (2026/6/22) — this essay has become a reference point."

Excerpts from said post follow.

> "Hebrew minds did not work visually the way Western minds do. They weren't that interested in all the particulars; they weren't building a concrete image of abstract reality. They didn't visualize and strive to get a complete image of any subject. They weren't analytical and curious about what lay beyond the horizon. It wasn't their concern."

> "For Hebrews, our binary thinking and semantic logic would be alien. Our absolutism would be ridiculous to them."
> "The default expectation is that what you read is not meant literally; almost the whole language is made up of figures of speech. This was rather common across the Ancient Near East. There were whole languages that were entirely ceremonial and symbolic.
> Hebrew thinking was both symbolic and highly pragmatic. The first question their minds would ask is, "What can I do with this?" Abstractions were absent from their language and their thinking. All of those pictograms were of concrete concepts from life. It's a paradox that they could be so concrete, and then symbolic, but never abstract."
> "You need only know what the symbols tell you about how it works, and what authority is imprinted on it. The only legitimate questions are moral in nature."
> "Our abstract concepts have no place in their world. They didn't think about God's attributes — not once. They thought of someone they knew and how He had revealed Himself through their experiences. All of the debates and questions by the Early Church Fathers were, by Hebrew reckoning, illegitimate. You know God only by how He acts. Descriptive language is inherently false."
> Catacomb Resident: Imagers without Imagery (2026/6/22)

I asked Ed to clarify whether the Hebrew way of thinking is essentially mystical or relational in orientation. He answered,

> "Both. Calling it "mystical" is simply a Western mind's way of noticing it's not entirely rational. Calling it "relational" is a Western mind's way of recognizing that objectivity is a myth. Trying to come from a Western background, I'd say the fundamental emphasis is feudal- relational, and the result is mystical."

The Bottom Line

True Morality is a mimetic and yet true expression of honor and respect for the Person who embodies the Moral Law, Jesus Christ. Human laws are a logical reduction of morality that serve as a reference point for human reasoning and logical debate (such as in a courtroom), intended explicitly for the benefit and guidance of the morally undiscerning, but are also intended to point the undiscerning to an awareness of a moral recognizance of Christ. True morality cannot be expressed via Law, apart from this recognizance.

The Moral Law, including human laws as much as possible, should serve as a frame of reference for people who lack the moral / spiritual maturity to connect directly to God and thereby know right from wrong. However, that connection, that inspiration to faith, was always the intention of the Law, to draw people into His personal presence, to get to know Him as Father and Lord. If human jurisprudence fails in this task, then it has failed in its purpose, and perhaps failed altogether.

As Ed Hurst described in a post following our discussion, Root of Legalism (2026/7/5), those who indulge in moral legalism are spiritual adolescents who are incapable of reading the Lord's will concerning good and evil, and who are motivated by envy. Furthermore, those who lack good spiritual discernment are wholly unable to make good judgments. This is the problem we're facing now. For all of worldwide history, but especially in 'Enlightened' Western cultures, there have been, and continue to be many influential people — judges and lawyers, counselors and pastors, Biblical scholars and theologians — who count a legalistic interpretation of rote laws, or worse, Feminist / Humanist / Woke values, as a higher priority than the faithful discernment of true morality, the latter of which is impossible for those outside Christ.

In secular legal venues, perhaps nothing can be done about this from an administrative or top-down approach. But speaking to the individual standpoint of Christians who hold authoritative positions within the church or the judiciary system (we have many authors and readers of this blog who are counselors, lawyers, and pastors), I sternly adjure you to be extremely wary of the importance of having good discernment and how it determines good judgment. Faithfully exercising your discernment may very well prove to be a matter of life or death, physically or spiritually.

Within the church specifically, all of the above stands as strong evidence of just how important it is to choose spiritually mature judges / leaders having good discernment of morality. Leadership discipline in this area may very well prove to be a matter of life or death of one's church.

Legislating Morality

One pertinent question that comes up in the Christian Manosphere every now and then is whether imposing restrictive laws / rules can actually improve the moral substance of a culture or a group. From what I've gathered and read, the general answer is "No", except that in some cases it is necessary, or else the group would disintegrate under the burdens of its own sins. (As an example of this phenomenon, see Case Study 2 below.) The reason for this has been described in the essays listed above — because laws proceed from moral discernment, but individual moral discipline does NOT typically proceed from laws, although they are intended to and hoped to have that effect.

A few case studies of Moral Legalism are offered below. These examples are intended to aid our understanding of Moral Legalism by bridging the abstract ideas to more concrete instances, and to familiarize ourselves with the consequences and contextual nuances.

Case Study 1 — Marital R@pe (India)

Back in March of 2022, I covered a proposed law to criminalize "marital r@pe" in India.

Fortunately for Indian husbands — and all of Indian society — this law didn't pass.

Indian men protest proposed law to criminalize “marital r@pe”.
Here’s a thought experiment:

1. Without this law, is “marital r@pe” any more or less moral than it would be with this law in place?
2. IF this law had passed, would a husband “r@ping” his wife suddenly become less moral than it would have been before this law had been passed?
3. Or would it just be riskier to be a sexually virile husband in the eyes of the law and society (as was indicated by Indian men’s response to this proposed law)?

If you think about this, it is not the law against “marital r@pe” that makes “marital r@pe” immoral, but rather, it is wives refusing to have sexual relations with their husbands, and calling it “r@pe” if he stops tolerating her laziness about expressing her love to him in this way, and he overrules her will and takes what is already his by virtue of marriage. In this case, it is clear that a law against “marital r@pe” leverages the immorality of withholding sex in marriage, within the frame of the (false) morality of “consent”.

Case Study 2 — Outlawing Divorce (Philippines)

Spanish colonization of the Philippines lasted for 377 years, from Ferdinand Magellan’s arrival in 1521 to the forfeiture of this territory to the U.S.A. at the end of the Spanish-American War in 1898. (The U.S.A. immediately granted the Philippines independence.) This era profoundly shaped the nation’s culture, political structure, and religious beliefs, fundamentally transforming it into the largest Catholic nation in Asia.

One vestige of the Spanish Renaissance Catholic culture that remains extant in Philippine law is the prohibition of divorce. Being rather familiar with Philippine culture, I’ve formed a few opinions about this law, which follow.

If there weren’t a law against divorce, then the divorce rate in the Philippines would be extremely high, probably even much higher than in the liberal West. I heard one person describe the situation like this: “There is no such thing as divorce in the Philippines, because if there were, then everyone would be divorced.” IOW, outlawing divorce is the easiest way to eliminate it, in the books at least, and thus stabilize the culture. I could easily believe that this law is perhaps the most important legal mooring that prevents the whole social fabric from reverting to the c0ck / dildo-worshipping, femcentric W!tchcraft barbarism that existed before the Conquistadores, and which still exists, albeit under the repression of Catholic values by law. (I'm not exaggerating about W!tchcraft. The Tagalog word for this is "tampo", which is often whitewashed as merely a cultural difference or "the silent treatment". You can search for this online for more info.)

Filipino residents living in shanties along a river bank in Pasay City, south of Manila, Philippines (2014/12/27).
Filipinos being what they are (at their base fleshly nature, W!tchy, C0ck-crazed, fertility / prosperity / sun-worshipping, control freaks), it is what it is. I guess you'd have to be a part of this culture to understand why all this is so hard for them to forsake.

Even so, this law probably does more harm than good. I say this because, on the grass roots level, the way things typically work out is like this. Most couples begin having sex as teenagers, and then, due to cultural / familial forces, or pregnancy, they feel pressured to marry, and then naïvely do so. Then, a too-young marriage, daily conflict (often involving domestic violence, physical and psychological abuse, severe, gut-pickling alcoholism, and W!tchcr@ft), financial destitution, guilt-fueled hypergamy, and the everyday burdens of nurturing and supporting a young family, all begin to take their toll. Estrangement ensues, and sooner or later, one or both spouses will be desperately wishing for a de facto divorce. But since a legal divorce is not an option by law, the marital conflict is preferentially resolved through a separation. This is so common in the Philippines that it's not even funny or shameful.

Whenever you might meet a Filipina woman working abroad, chances are very high that she was married as a teen and has had 2-3 children back in the Philippines, and she is now willfully separated from her husband and children by her own choice. If so, they may never mention it, but all her talk and behaviors, including multiple sexual liaisons with heavily hung foreign men, will fit that of a divorced or widowed woman. Single men seeking traditional marriage should beware of Filipina expats for this one possible reason alone.

Would it be better to allow such couples to divorce? If thus, the man might find another, perhaps more suitable wife, and the woman would be free to indulge in her hypergamous lusts somewhere far away in a distant country, free from negatively influencing her children, and perhaps she might even find a Western Beta simping sucker who would be foolish enough to wife her up for the second time. But no matter how their life scripts might play out, somewhere down the road of their ill-chosen lives, I believe some of them, God willing, might find the grace to realize their error, repent, and reform — IF they're able to put the past behind them.

In essence, the frustration resulting from naïve, self-centered, youthful lusts constitutes the same soul question that motivated the Protestant Reformation; but for some reason, Philippine culture hasn't evolved enough to allow that realization on a mass-scale just yet. I guess it's because they missed out on certain Progressive features of the Enlightenment that occurred in Europe.

Would you say this is a good thing, or else, a snafu in the development of a Progressive South-East Asian civilization?

Case Study 3 — Prostitution vs OASIS (Worldwide)

There are laws against Pr0$t!tut!0n in many countries. Still, I don't know of any countries that have outlawed the Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS, e.g. OnlyF@ns, Str!pCh@t, et al.), despite all its similarities to traditional Pr0$t!tut!0n.

Is Pr0$t!tut!0n or OASIS immoral because there are laws against it? No. There are laws against Pr0$t!tut!0n because it is immoral, despite the highly ironic facts that proponents cite in favor of it (e.g., it tends to reduce crime and improve marriages, anecdotally). Meanwhile, the reason why are there no laws against OASIS, I suppose, is NOT because it is NOT immoral (because it is), even though it tends to dampen men's interest in mating and marriage, and thus hurts society, but because it generates tax revenue, and it serves the Feminine Imperatives for attention and validation.

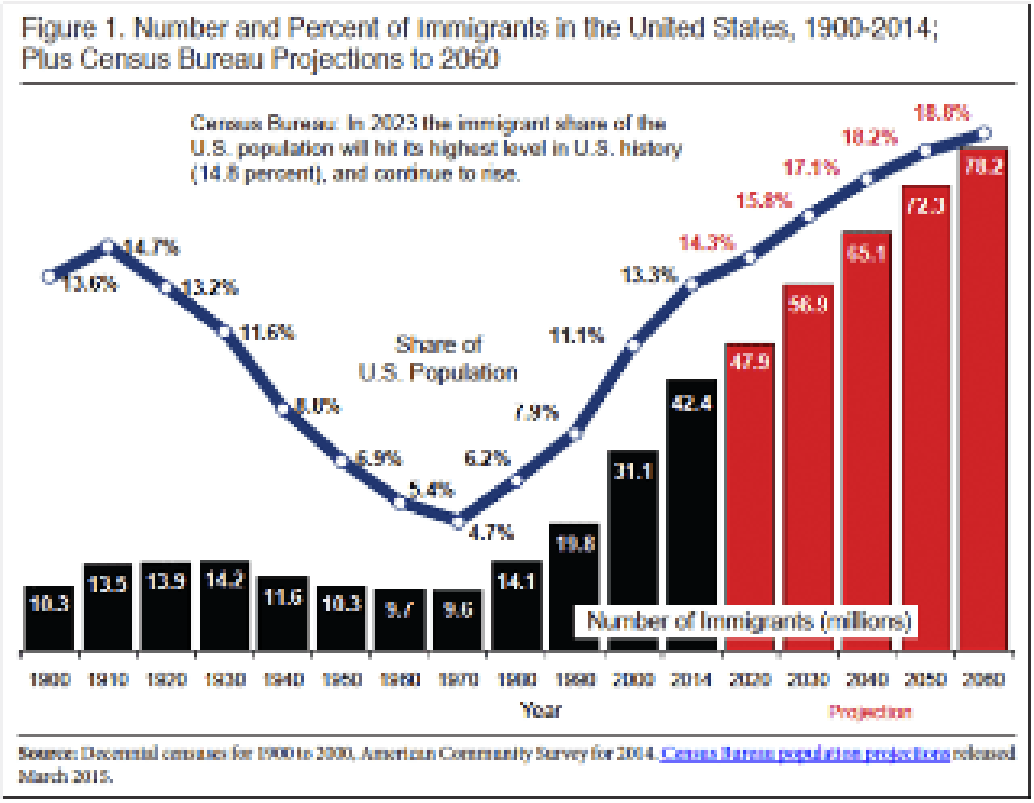
Case Study 4 — Birthright Immigration (U.S.A.)

On Jan, 20, 2025, immediately after he was sworn into office for his second term, Trump issued an executive order ending birthright citizenship. The order indicated that babies born in the United States shall not be automatically entitled to citizenship if their parents are in this country either illegally or temporarily. IOW, no more "baby anchors" for hopeful immigrants.

The Supreme Court narrowly rejected Trump's order, resulting in a slew of cases in the lower courts. Since then, the Supreme Court has softened its stance by allowing immigration officials to turn away asylum seekers at the border.

Much of the debate surrounding the birthright citizenship clause* focuses not only on history and precedent, but on the text itself, and in particular, on its requirement that, to qualify for birthright citizenship, a child be not only born in the United States but also be "subject to the jurisdiction thereof".

 Addressing the question of former slaves' birthright citizenship, this legislation was first introduced in the 14th Amendment, which was added to the Constitution in 1868.*



Some questions:

1. Exactly how much weight should former court decisions pertaining to slavery in the mid-19th century be given to cases pertaining to illegal immigration in the early 21st century?

- Citizens and justices clinging to Moral Legalism will say it has everything to do with it, and that there is little to no difference.
- But those who are concerned with domestic peace, national security, and the preservation of social order will look at the real facts at hand and the immediate consequences, rather than an antiquated juridical precedent that was set more than 150 years ago, and conclude that action must be taken to revise national policy.

2. And what, pray tell, do those words mean: "subject to the jurisdiction thereof"? Does it mean that…

- A child of foreign illegal parentage born in the U.S. is automatically subject to the jurisdiction of the U.S. and therefore must intrinsically be a citizen?

OR…

- A child of foreign illegal parentage born in the U.S. has no justifiable claim to birthright citizenship, and is therefore NOT subject to the jurisdiction of the U.S.?

In sum,

- Are the children of illegal immigrants to be considered in-group / U.S. citizens, by virtue of their assumed innocence as being children?

OR…

- Are the children of illegal immigrants to be considered unwanted aliens, and the unfortunate victims of their parents' self-centered machinations for U.S. citizenry?

In light of our current study of Moral Legalism, this is an odd case study, because, in this case, the law seems to preclude and thus proscribe the moral terms of engagement.

Case Study 5 — Legalization of Abortion (U.S.A.)

Following the ancient Spirit of Athalia, legalizing blood and fire* sacrifices to Molech for 49 years, between 1973 and 2022 (on the years of Jubilee, no less), didn't make abortion moral. It just removed the legal framework necessary to hold women accountable for their perennial penchant for indulging in the ultimate form of child abuse and the collective negligence of their reproductive responsibility to society. It also removed about 60 million citizens from the U.S.A. — mur_dered in the womb!

 Medical waste, including aborted fetuses, is incinerated.*

The Trouble of Enacting Grace within a System of Law

Whenever we squeeze morality into the mental box of Hellenistic / human reason, it must necessarily manifest as legalism. Rationalized moral statements can be openly debated and discussed and can receive widespread acceptance (or rejection), but although they might become more rational by embracing legalism, they also step away from faith and grace in doing so, thereby losing at least some of their moral power and relevance.

But once laws are set in place, we encounter another problem. If we try to remove the arguments from the logical framework in an attempt to make them more merciful, or morally valid, or relevant to context, then it also makes them 'unreasonable', so to say, or even 'unjust' from the standpoint of legalism; and thus creates opportunities for those who are less morally attuned to become confused about why a certain moral decision would be right or wrong. In the worst-case scenario, this constitutes the makings of a schism, and perhaps a rebellion or even a revolution.

I hope that I could be wrong about this, but secular people who are not immediate recipients of the favors bestowed by (1) God's grace and wisdom, or (2) a country's laws, cannot be expected to accept mercy or asylum, respectively, as anything other than a lack of justice.

Dalrock on how Complementarianism has Destroyed Christian Men and the Church

Putting women first means placing God last.

Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Intro

In more than a thousand posts between 2010 and 2020, Dalrock extensively analyzed modern Evangelical teachings on marriage and found them sorely wanting in Headship. According to Dalrock, both Complementarianism and Egalitarianism are implemented in churches in ways that functionally disadvantage men and husbands, and inverts the structure of marital authority. The intended purpose of Headship as an iconic glorification of Christ's relationship to the church is thus crippled, and marriage is made to be more common than holy — no different from any secular union.

Now, more than six years after his departure, Dalrock's expositions, fundamental viewpoints, and para-prophecies are just as relevant today as they were a decade ago, perhaps even more so. Christianity and Masculinity and Σ Frame have added many more valuable insights, models, observations, para-prophecies, and theories to the Christian Red Pill lore, but Dalrock's work [Archive] continues to stand as the bedrock foundation of the Christian Red Pill regarding uncovering Church heresies and the carnal nature of nominally 'Christian' women and the 'Christian' men who worship them above God and who self-deceptively reframe this gynolatry as, "loving their wives" (c.f. Ephesians 5:25).

Here, I'll summarize Dalrock's theses on how Complementarianism has destroyed Christian men and the Church.

How Complementarianism Is Implemented to the Detriment of Christian Men

Dalrock argued that what churches claim to teach and what they actually practice often diverge, often aided and made more convincing by eisegetical sleights of doctrine, creating a system that undermines Biblical Headship while shielding women from accountability.

Dalrock explained how all this works in his extensive analysis of modern evangelical teachings on marriage. His essays describe the following patterns:

1. A Default Gynocentric Frame

- Feminism's influence is incorporated into the church under the label of Complementarianism.
- Women's autonomy and feelings are sovereign, while male authority is treated as optional at best, or abusive at worst.

2. The Primacy of Gender Egalitarianism in Marriage

- Dalrock described Complementarianism as "Egalitarian Marriage with a Veneer of Headship", arguing that the converged church's concept of Christian marriage is Egalitarian in practice, even in self-described Complementarian churches.
- Open-air egalitarians reject Headship outright, but Dalrock showed that many Complementarian churches achieve the same result by softening language, focusing on (her) feelings, and avoiding any enforcement of wifely accountability and submission, often by resorting to secular equality-based arguments backed up with distorted scriptural references.

The result is the same:

- Husbands bear responsibility without any corresponding authority.
- Wifely respect and submission to her husband (per Ephesians 5:24,33) is completely omitted in practice, and the very idea is relegated to an outdated, uncouth obscenity.

3. Servant Leadership

- Dalrock argued that "Servant Leadership" redefines Headship as endless service without authority.
- Dalrock called the "Servant Leadership" arrangement as, "99% servant, 1% leader" (for men).
- Real decision-making power is 'mutual' or defaults to the wife.
- The husband's role is reduced to a "tiebreaker" at best or a perpetual servant at worst.
- Husbands are told they must "die to self" by catering to their wife's emotional state, feelings, moods, and preferences (often summarized in the catchphrase, "If mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy").

4. Mutual Submission

- So called "Mutual Submission" is applied asymmetrically — unbending law for men, unconditional grace for women.
- Churches habitually emphasize Ephesians 5's call for husbands to love sacrificially but rarely enforce the parallel command for wives to "submit … in everything".

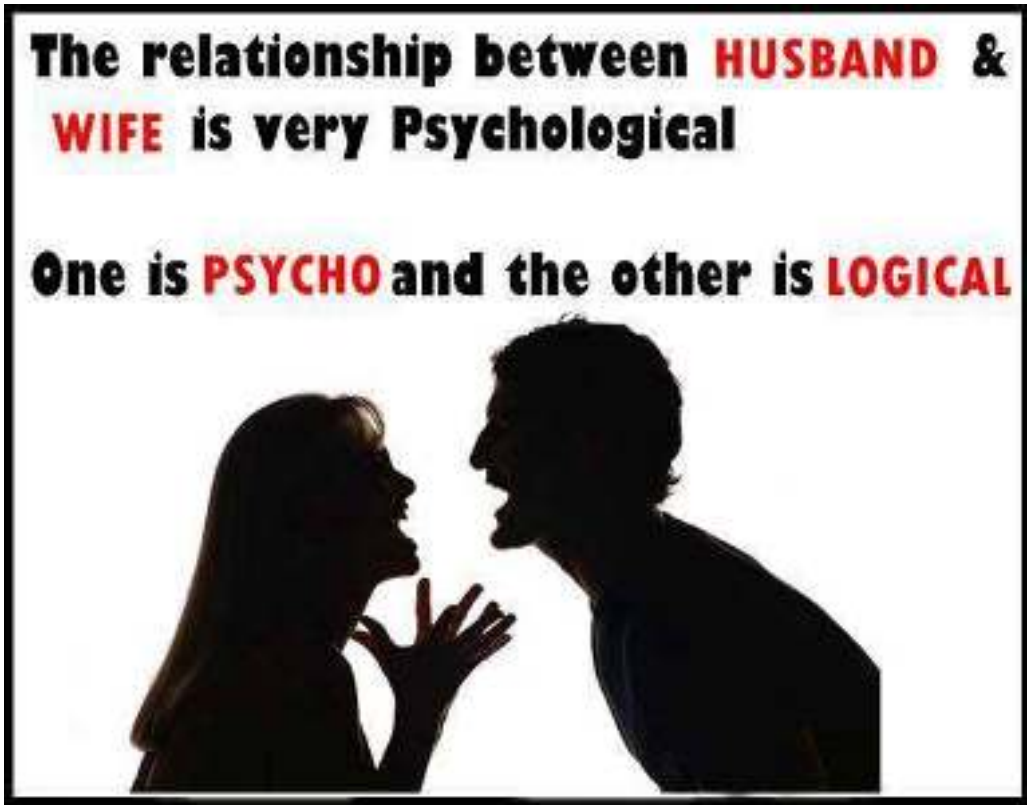
- If a wife feels unhappy or "not led", her rebellion is either excused somehow or blamed on the husband's failure to be sufficiently loving and/or servant-like.

5. Pusillanimous P_ssy Pedestalizing

- Pastors and counselors routinely act as "White Knights".
- In marital conflict resolution, marriage counseling, or divorce situations, pastors, leaders, and counselors routinely accept the wife's narratives without question, meet with her privately without her husband present, and pressure the husband to repent of "bitterness", "harshness", or insufficiently considerate servanthood, with no regard to what the wife may have done to deserve such a response from the husband.
- This presumptive bias effectively supports female hypoagency and enables wives' rebellion against their husbands.



Negative Impacts on Men and Husbands

Dalrock repeatedly documents how this implementation of Complementarianism / "Egalitarianism with a veneer of Headship" / Feminism harms men, maritally, socially, and spiritually:

1. Blame-Shifting and False Accountability

- Husbands are held solely responsible for marital problems, even when wives rebel, withhold sex, or initiate divorce.
- Dalrock notes that churches often enable "reviling wives" by framing the husband's attempts at correction as unloving or abusive.
- Instead of encouragement and help, men face sermons filled with "Man Bashing" and routine shaming, long, fruitless, and shame-filled counseling sessions, and church disciplinary measures that ignore the wife's role in marital conflicts.

2. Emasculation, Erosion of Male Authority, and the Loss of Frame

- Men are trained to supplicate to their wives rather than maintain a detached, internal locus of control, and lead by faith.
- Headship becomes a burden of constant performance to keep the wife happy, turning husbands into “hostage negotiators” for their own marriages and children.
- The overweening prioritization of female interests above all else, including faith based prerogatives, effectively erodes masculine confidence and Biblical leadership.

3. Encouragement of Female-Initiated Divorce and Family Destruction

- With church support (or at least non-resistance), wives can leave their marriages while retaining custody, financial advantages, and even the moral high ground, fully in alignment with the anti-Christian dictates of secular culture.
- Dalrock links the institutionalized enabling and permissiveness of women’s sins to higher divorce rates in Evangelical circles and the destruction of father-led homes.
- Overall, this has has a damning, enduring impact on families, children, and ultimately, the entire society.

4. Spiritual and Communal Demoralization

- Men feel disposable and “spiritually dead”. Many men have stopped attending church, have avoided marriage altogether, and/or have become cynical about faith.
- Churches fail to disciple men because they offer no real vision of masculine Headship, thereby driving men away, making the church more effeminate, and weakening the next generation’s faith.
- Dalrock ties this directly to the church leadership’s watering down scriptures to cater to women’s weaknesses and to the broader Evangelical decline (echoing Michael Spencer).

5. The Church is a Beta Factory

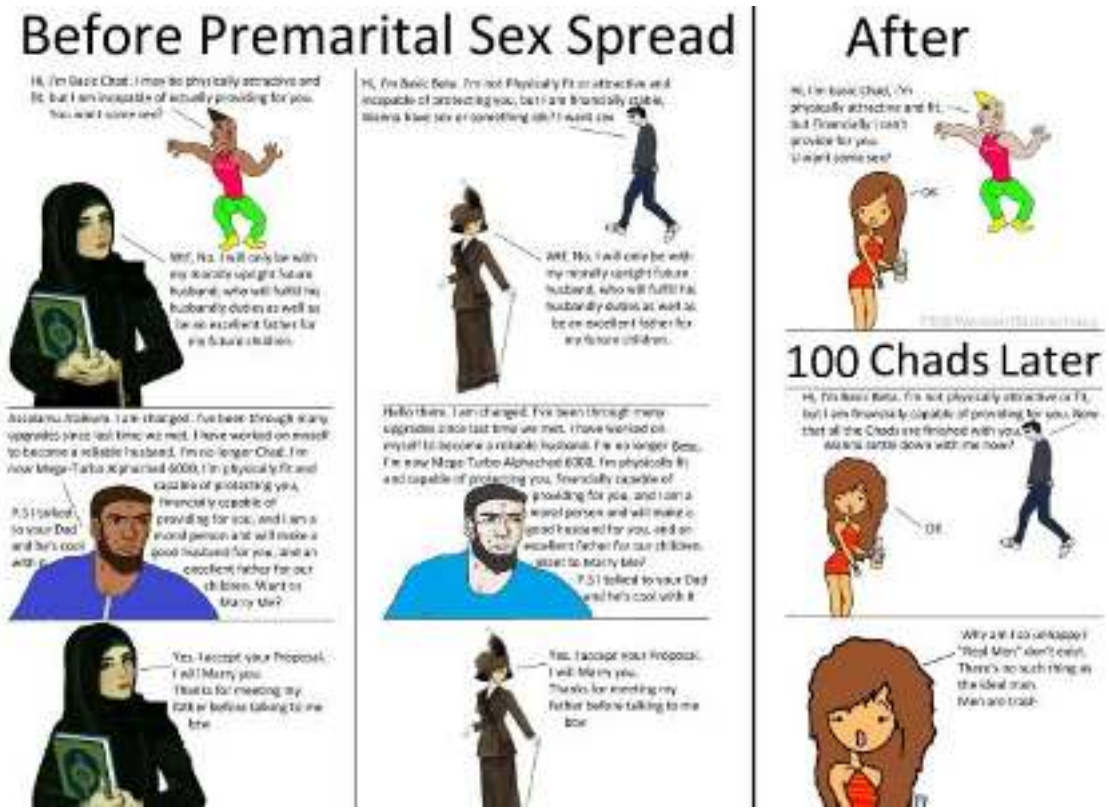
- Men who internalize the “Servant Leadership” model and all its gynocentric constraints and dictates become passive, resentful, or checked out, and thereby perpetuate the very problems the church hopes and claims to solve.

- As a result, the church has become known as a Beta Factory and a cesspool institution comprised of weak men and debased, 'empowered', Feminist-lite wimminz.

6. Broader Ripple Effects

- Complementarian teachings contribute to a wider acceptance of sexual promiscuity, resulting in the "Mating Glut"*, delayed marriage, the divorce epidemic, plummeting fertility, and weakened or destroyed Christian marriages.

 The Mating Glut: A large percentage of women are having regular unreserved sexual relations with top class Chads, and are rejecting the men available to them for commitment / marriage, presumably because the men available to them are seen as inferior quality or because the Chads they want are not willing to commit, but actually because of women's entitlement and vanity, AKA "Princess Mentality".*
Corollary to the Mating Glut: Women are unwilling to have children with a commitment-minded man within the confines of a committed relationship / marriage (because of his perceived low value), yet they are more willing to have children with Chads outside of marriage, thus contributing to the stellar rise in out-of-wedlock births.



Conclusions

In summary, Dalrock's core insight was that modern church teachings on Complementarianism (and open Egalitarianism) do not truly describe Biblical Headship and wifely submission, but rather, a feminist-flavored Egalitarianism deceptively dressed up in scriptural language. The result is a system that protects women's autonomy, feelings, and intersexual hypoagency, at the direct expense of men's authority, dignity, and family leadership — ultimately harming husbands, fathers, and the church itself.

What Dalrock said a decade ago continues to reverberate throughout many shuddering (and shuttering) Evangelical churches across America.

Dalrock urged men to recognize this pattern and to respond, rather than accept it as "biblical".

A Nihilistic Rendition of Robin Hood

Jack · 15 July 2026 · Archived copy · Original

The new movie, starring Hugh Jackman, is a character assassination of Robin Hood and a glorification of euthanasia.

Readership: All; Men; Christians;
Theme: The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting Masculinity
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

In the evening of 2026/7/14, my wife and I watched a newly released movie, The Death of Robin Hood (2026), starring Hugh Jackman.

While watching the main part of this movie, I thought it portrayed a very accurate depiction of the dog-eat-dog, hard-scrabble living conditions in medieval, pre-civilizational, 13th century England. There were several scenes of brutal hand-to-hand combat, arrows shot clean through skulls (at least 3 times for emphasis!), chainmail-clad warriors smashing ribs and crushing skulls with maces, even women and children being mercilessly murdered, and more. In one scene, one of the characters manually rips a man's jaw off his face in a frenzied fit of vengeful rage.

If you happen to like seeing that kind of violence, then I'd say the acting was excellent — almost as good as Full Metal Jacket (1987).

The main character of the story is an old man who is continually attacked by those seeking vengeance for the sins he committed decades ago, and he somehow defeats his adversaries every time, defying death again and again. Later in the movie, he says killing someone brings a curse upon you, because whenever you kill someone, someone else comes looking for revenge, so you have to kill them too, followed by someone else seeking to avenge the avenger's death, and so on. It never ends.

Through the sequence of events, we learn that this old man is, in fact, an elderly Robin Hood. But this depiction is nothing like the Robin Hood that we know about from folklore — the Robin Hood who is the common man's hero, who takes from the greedy, oppressive rich to provide for the lowly humble poor, and all that, or so the folklore goes. In this film, he is not a hero, but merely an outlaw — just an old criminal constantly running from death threats of vengeance.

This movie essentially does a character assassination of our collective fond mental image of Robin Hood. In fact, the promotional poster for this film insistently states, "HE WAS NO HERO".

Eventually, the main character is badly injured in another confrontation, and then he somehow finds himself at a peaceful convent on a beautiful secluded island, in the care of a young, beautiful nun who nurses him back to health. Here, he is apparently safe from all those who might wish to harm him. Here, we see scenes of people sitting together, eating quietly and peacefully, apparently thankful for their daily bread, and grateful that they are safe from danger and hunger — at the moment.

And so you might expect that this murderous outlaw (whom the narrative weavers tell us is the fabled Robin Hood, only much older) might find grace, repent of his sins, and learn to work with his hands and care for others living at the convent — or at least, that's what would make for a good story. Indeed, he does this for a time.

And you might expect that his death, as foreshadowed in the title of the movie, might involve him saving an innocent person from a life-threatening situation, such as defending a child who was caught by a wild animal, and dying in the process, or something rather heroic and redeeming like that.

If it were otherwise any less honorable, then why make a movie to glorify it?

But no. The ending is dramatically sad, sickening, and tragic.

Centuries ago, there was a practice called blood-letting, or lancing, in which "bad blood" was let out of the body. It was believed that this was good for the ailing person's health. At the end of the film, the nun let his blood out, and then he withdrew his arm, indicating a refusal to let her stop the bleeding. Meanwhile, he talked on and on about secrets he had kept all his life, and then he charged his present audience to keep all these things secret — for their own welfare. The nun didn't resist his resignation to life, and so he bled out and died. It seemed this was the ultimate goal of the blood-letting after all — to end his life peacefully and predictably.

But why create a film about this — to assassinate the character of Robin Hood and glorify his supposed suicide? It seems that this movie is essentially glorifying euthanasia and pushing for its acceptance in the wider public.

This ending was also stupid and disappointing.

The main character found the grace to live in a convent during his old age, despite all his sins, and he rejected that good fortune, as well as the good people who took him in and cared for him while he was injured, by essentially committing suicide. I'll end by saying that some Christian sects believe that those who commit suicide are bound for hell in the afterlife. The Catholic church staunchly believed this in the 13th century, which doesn't bode well for the supposed Robin Hood character in this film.

Jack's Conclusions

The original Robin Hood story is much more inspiring.

The 'new' Robin Hood, as depicted in this film, is just another manifestation of nihilism and a glorified catharsis for euthanasia.

I've given all of the valuable takeaways for this film above. IMO, that's really all you need to know about it.

Unless you just want to indulge your dark side by feasting on some medieval gore, and torture your soul by watching an older, guilt-ridden man reject the love around him and instead choose to passively bleed out and die, I suggest you DO NOT watch this movie. Definitely don't pay any money to watch this movie. You'll feel depressed and despondent, and then you'll need to pray and meditate for a while to get your heart back.

A Summary of Religious Demographics in the U.S. by Age / Generation

Jack · 17 July 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Currently, Christian churches are experiencing a mass attrition among younger generations. Here's a breakdown of the numbers.

Intro

As part of my series on The Protestant Reformation 2.0, I want to provide a summary of church affiliation by age / generation, as estimated from data collected over the past 50 years.

1. Data comes primarily from Pew Research Center's Religious Landscape Studies (2007–2024) and Ryan Burge's work, Graphs About Religion. [Please find links embedded and under Sources below.]
2. Additional references are listed under Sources below.
3. Data reflects attendance, self-identification, and switching.

As always on Σ Frame, readers are invited to do their own research and their own independent thinking. If you can offer any corrections, finer points, or revisions, then please share your insights for the benefit of others by leaving a comment below.

A Summary of the Age / Generation Data [Pew 2019]

- The Silent Generation: 85% Christian
- The Baby Boomers: 76%
- Generation X: ~72%
- Millennials: ~51%
- Generation Z: ~45%

Below, these numbers are broken down further by denominational affiliation (or the lack thereof, AKA "religiously unaffiliated" or "Nones").

Gene Kelley and Donald O'Connor, of the Greatest and Silent generations, respectively.

The Silent Generation

The detailed systematic data collection begins with the Silent Generation (born between 1926 and 1945).

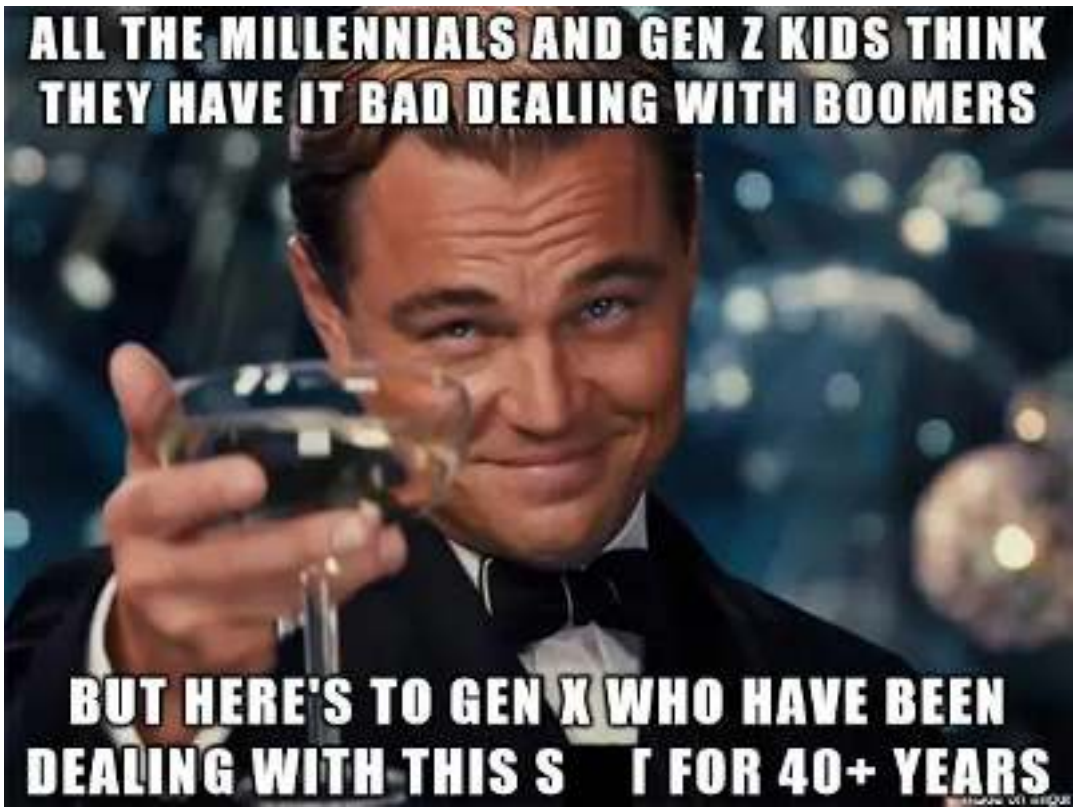
The Silent Generation has (or once had) the highest percentage of Christian identification among all living generations in the United States.

- Around 85% of this demographic identifies (or identified, in the earlier studies) as Christian.
- 47% Protestant
- 22% Catholic
  - 5% of Catholics are Silents
- Only about 9% of this generation claims (or claimed) no religious affiliation.

Baby Boomers

Despite being known as an evil, rebellious, self-centered, and sexually promiscuous generation, 76% of Boomers identify as Christian.

- 53% of Baby Boomers identify as Protestant.
  - 18-19% of Boomers are Evangelical Protestants.
  - 10-14% are Mainline Protestants.
- 24% of Baby Boomers identify as Catholic.
  - Baby Boomers are the single largest generation within the U.S. Catholic population, comprising 33% of adult Catholics, or roughly 17.2 million people.
  - 78% of these Boomer Catholics identify as white, non-Hispanic.
- 13-18% identify as "Nones".



Generation X

Approximately 70% to 74% of Generation X identifies as Christian in the United States.

- Around 33% to 40% of Generation X identifies as Protestant.
- 16% to 20% of Generation X adults identify as Evangelical Protestants.
- 13% identify as Catholic.
  - 25% of Catholics are Gen Xers.
- Approximately 22-30% identify as “Nones”, depending on specific demographics and methodology.

Gen X is the last generation with a strong claim on Christianity, as adherence has gradually declined among younger cohorts like Millennials and Gen Z.

Millennials

Only 44-58% of Millennials identify as Christian, depending on locale.

- 32% to 35% of Millennials identify as Protestant.
  - 21% Evangelical Protestant
  - 11% Mainline Protestant
- 16-20% are Catholic.
  - 24% of Catholics are Millennials.
- 11% are affiliated with Mainline denominations.
- Around 30-35% of Millennials are religiously unaffiliated “Nones”.

This demonstrates a major intergenerational shift, as this demographic is significantly more likely to identify as religiously unaffiliated compared to older generations.

Generation Z

There's been a more concentrated focus on Gen Z compared to previous generations, and thus more data is available for this demographic.

The major research institutions focusing on Gen Z are:

- Barna
- Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA)
- Harvard's Cooperative Election Study (CES)
- Pew Research Center (PEW/Religion)
- Public Religion Research Institute (PRRI)

Some detailed breakdowns from these institutions map out the Gen Z denominational affiliations in the United States:

- Approximately 45% of Generation Z identifies as Christian
- Between 19% and 26% of Generation Z identifies as Protestant
  - 10% identify as White Evangelical Protestants
  - 8% as White Mainline Protestants
  - 7% as Black Protestants
  - 6% as Hispanic Protestants.
- 14% to 21% are Catholic, across various studies.
  - About 40% of Gen Z Catholics self-identify as Hispanic or Latino.
  - Roughly 39% of Gen Z Catholics attend Mass at least once a month — more frequently than Millennials or Gen X.
  - 13% of Catholics are Gen Z.
- More than a third (about 34% to 43%) now identify as religiously unaffiliated or "None" (atheist, agnostic, or "nothing in particular").

In general, Gen Z's interest in religion marks a significant decline from older groups, and a major shift away from Christian institutions. However, among those who do identify as Christian, church attendance is much higher.

In some areas of the country with high Hispanic / Latino populations, Gen Z Catholics outnumber Gen Z Protestants.

Summary

With every succeeding generation, and for every Christian denomination, religious affiliation and attendance have decreased across the board. Meanwhile, as the generations have progressed, more and more people choose to be unaffiliated with any religion.

I'll go over Attendance Shifts by Denomination in a future post, followed by my speculations about the whys and wherefores in another post.

The Simple and Effective Use of Dread

The Holey Triumvirate of Married Game: Preselection, Dread, Mate Guarding, and what I'll call, Soft Autoerotic Voyeurism.

I found this post on Dodo Reactions, a YouTube channel.

The main quote is this [augmented for clarity].

> "One thing I came to notice coincidentally is that my wife will give me sexy time if she sees me getting close with another woman. I am not talking in a physical sense, but when a woman comes to talk to me, gets flirty with me, I am 100% getting physical intimacy [from my wife that night]. The first time it happened, she seemed extremely nervous and afraid by my interactions with the other party. After a few such cases, I came to understand she'll have physical intimacy with me only when she feels threatened."
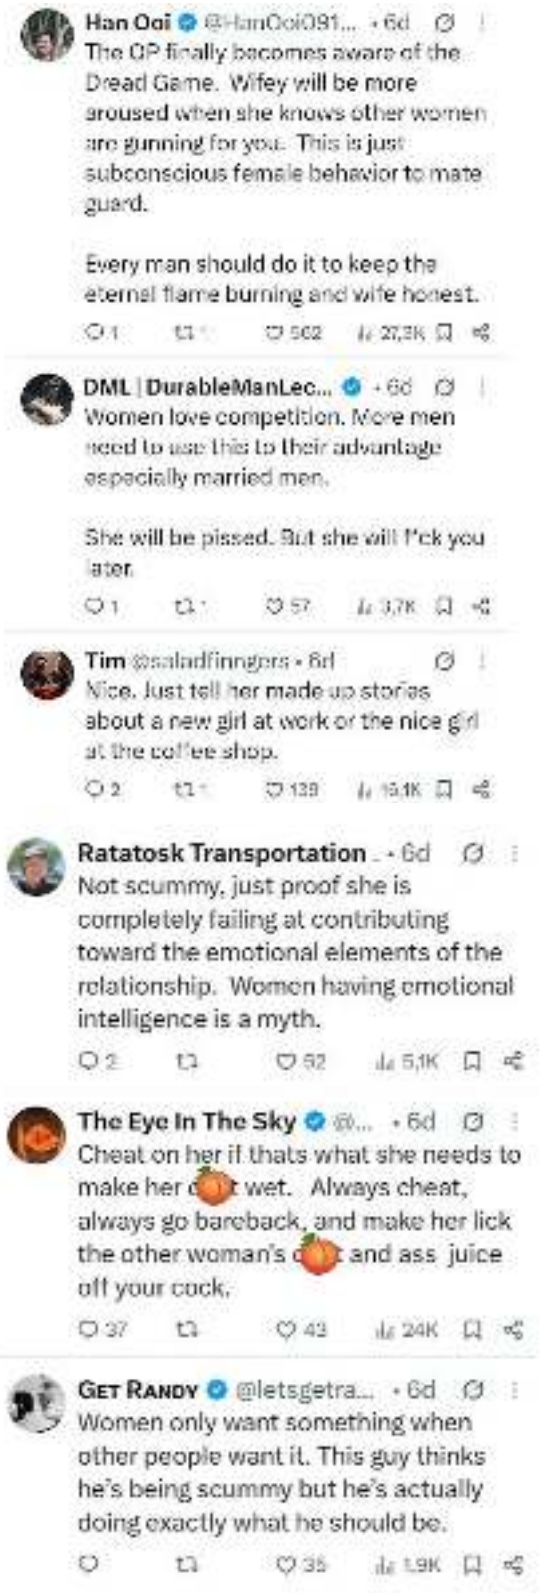
> "I intentionally put myself in situations where flirty interactions with other women happen, and it does wonders [for my marital sex life]. Not sure if I can call our bedroom dead after last week. I know it's scummy, but I guess that's what drives my wife. Truly off my chest."

Some noteworthy comments followed.



The Holey Triumvirate of Married Game: Preselection, Dread, and Mate Guarding

What the author is describing is basically a combination of Preselection, and Dread, and the wife's reaction is driven by the Mate Guarding instinct.

Let's break this down further.

Preselection arises from a particular combination of the characters and the setting. He has to do the hard work to make himself attractive, AND he has to put himself into situations where other women "see" him and respond to that. It also has to be done in a manner and a place that is conspicuous to his wife.

Dread arises from the social context. The inherent power dynamic gives the husband an edge, and it keeps her on her toes.

Mate Guarding — The wife faces competition against other women, so she has to up her game.

There's another thing going on that I'll call Soft Autoerotic Voyeurism (SAV), for lack of an available term. This phenomenon was described (but not named, from what I can recall) by ye Olde Manosphere 1.0 as a somatic response that occurs when women become sexually aroused by seeing other people aroused or having sex, or even by watching animals mate. In this case, the wife sees another woman being aroused by her husband, evident by her flirting and sexually objectifying her husband, and this causes her to feel aroused (towards him?). Hard Autoerotic Voyeurism (HAV) would be a situation in which a woman gets turned on by actually watching other people strip, suck face, and engage in sexual relations.

Knowing how this works helps us understand why one commenter, and also the host at Dodo Reactions, pointed out that, to make this work, a man doesn't even need to set up a social context in which other women are vying for him. If you can tell a good story, it might be enough to get her riled and wet. But seeing other women gaze at him with full-blown S1ut Eyes while licking their lips and running their fingers across his chest is a bulletproof method to get her into the mood.

Projective Counter-Identification

The interesting part of the discussion is that the husband feels scummy about all this (a testament to masculine honor), but the commenters point out how, in reality, he's doing exactly what he should be doing to keep the fire stoked in his marriage.

In fact, I'd say the wife is the real scumbag in this instance. She's a scumbag because…

- She fails to contribute the emotional elements of attraction to their marriage — no matter whether she's actually feeling it or not — at least not often enough to keep his eyes on her and his balls tethered to her snatch.

- She succumbs to jealousy — a very bad and destructive habit for marrieds to indulge in.
- She only makes the effort to be physically affectionate and have sex with her husband when she is motivated by jealousy / Mate Guarding, and not regularly as a sacrament of marriage.

So, it takes sociosexual interactions involving perceived sexual competition, like the one described, to motivate her to fulfill her marital obligations.

Moreover, the husband only feels like a scumbag simply because he's married to one, and because thus, he has to do "scummy things" (in his simple-minded, Red Pill lax view) to keep her gamed up and laid down properly.

In psychology, the husband feeling scummy is called Projective Counter-Identification — where Person B (e.g., a therapist, or the husband in this case) unwittingly assumes the feelings and roles projected outward by Person A (e.g., a patient, or the wife in this case), to the point where Person B identifies with or unwittingly acts out this role (e.g., acting, being, or feeling scummy in this case).

From a Christian standpoint, this behavior is typical for spiritually immature wives, and despite the inherent pathology and the questionable morality, it's how they need to be handled — at least until they get burned out on jealousy, grow tired of the games, and grow up. Some do, some don't, and some take a long, long time — years or even decades. And husbands can't always know how long she's going to take before she becomes a mature Christian spouse. This is why, I believe, it is faithful and righteous for such men to do so, until such a time comes to pass.

Conscientious men might think of this as "keeping this marriage spicy (or salty)".

Jack's Supporting Anecdotes

I discovered this same phenomenon a few years ago.

Case Study 1: Jill's Coworkers

My wife is a high-asset saleslady. (By 'high-asset', I mean, a single sale is a transaction involving hundreds of thousands of USD.) Whenever I would go visit my wife at her workplace, her female coworkers (also high-asset salesladies) lavished me with attention (just for the fun of it, I guess). They would laugh at all my witticisms and play flirty games with me. They would stand really close to me, full-frontal stance, touching my arms and hands, gazing at me for the longest time with smiley kissy lips and fluttering, lovey-dovey eyes. They sang teasing innuendos, like "What would you like to have? Coffee, tea, or ME?" They would invite me into the restroom to talk and have a smoke with them. These women were in their 40s, 50s, and 60s, many of them divorced, some with grown children, so they felt pretty comfortable with all this banter. (In case readers don't already know, high-asset, sexperienced salesladies are the grand-champion world masters of this sort of seductive social intercourse. It's a highly valued, and very lucrative job skill.) After this, my wife would be very irritable for the rest of the day, partly because her coworkers were doing this to get-one-up on her and to tease her (just for fun), and partly because of the insecurity she felt as a result. (Her irritability was hard for me to tolerate at times.)

But sure enough, that night she'd strip and grind and f_ck me — and f_ck me HARD! — as if she thought that by doing so, she could 'repossess' me and vindicate me from her coworkers. (Actually, she does, from a psychological viewpoint.) I wonder if her colleagues know that this is the result of their flirtatiousness. (I suspect they do, and that this is part of their motivation for doing so.)

Meanwhile, I'm thinking, "Thank God! I finally got some yearnestly SINcere sex from my "WIFE" to maintain the 'sacrament' of my 'marriage'!"

After a while, I learned that whenever my wife has been out of sorts for a while, and I need some poon-pocket action, all I have to do to get my wife into the mood is just go visit her workplace. Simple, irritating and troublesome, but effective.

Case Study 2: Teenaged University Students

Once or twice a month, I'll meet some of my students at a coffee shop near campus and have a talk with them. Sometimes they invite me, other times I invite them. Those who come to our meetings are mostly girls, seldom any guys. They want to practice their English, and get some attention from a handsome professor. My wife doesn't object to this, but I can tell that it does set her on edge; especially when we take photos and she sees me surrounded by college-aged girls.

But sure enough, that night, or the next evening, my wife will be wearing a negligee and grinding on my lap until I get bothered enough to ram her vagabuns.

And that is how I keep my marriage spicy (or salty).

A Summary of Religious Shifts (1970–2025)

Jack · 27 July 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Currently, Christian churches are experiencing a mass attrition, while at the same time, many individuals are rolling over to other Faith traditions. Here's a breakdown of the major sects.

Readership: All; Christian Men
Theme: The Protestant Reformation 2.0
Length: 6,000 words
Reading Time: ~20-30 minutes

Executive Summary

Overall, American Christianity is losing ~22% of those raised Christian, while only 6% of adult Christians are converts from other religions. In other words, Christianity is losing almost one-sixth of its adherents year after year.

In the United States, Mainline Protestant groups and Catholicism generally experience sharp net losses from religious switching, whereas Non-Denominational and Pentecostal churches maintain steady overall numbers due to a high influx of new converts joining from other backgrounds. [Pew 2015, Pew 2025, Research]

Metaduction

As part of my mini-series on The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting Masculinity, I planned to write two posts (which will be published in the near future) that address men drifting away from the church and men returning to the church, respectively.

But as I started writing about these important topics, it dawned upon me that I should first provide some background by summarizing the general shifts in Protestant church attendance over the past 50+ years, both Evangelical and Mainline, to give us an idea of how many Protestants have converted to Catholicism, Orthodoxy, and "Nones", and vice versa.

The trends by age / generation were covered in a previous post.

This turned out to be a much bigger task than I expected.

Data Collection Strategy

There are dozens, if not hundreds, of articles and research studies on this subject to sift through, all filled with contextually contingent data that continually changes over time. Thus, the trends on shifting attendance and affiliations are difficult to suss out.

To help readers get started thinking about the topic of religious switching, Pew offers this informative video that is worth watching. It's only 3 ½ minutes long.

Pew Research Center: How much 'religious switching' is there in the U.S.? (2025/6/11)

Similar to the essentials of Pew's approach, my methodical strategy for collecting this data became one of identifying groups within groups and finding out what percentage of each subgroup shifted to which other groups:

Retention: "What percentage of Group A stays in Group A?"
Attrition: "What percentage of Group A switches to Group B, C, D, …?"*
Accession: "Of those who join Group A, what percentage of them are coming from Group B, C, D, …?"

Then trying to find all the data to fill in the blanks.

Then doing all this again for Group B, then Group C, and so on.

- Some data could not be found for some of these blanks.
- Some data from different sources is in disagreement. I've added notes on this.

The following report of this data was NOT generated by AI. I did use Google's AI-assisted search engine to find data sources (it's hard not to anymore), but then I had to do a lot of finagling and revising search terms and then double-checking the information to nail down the real story.

So, as you can imagine, this topic has taken me quite a while (about 50-60 hours over the past 5 weeks) to study, to write, and to double-check this present summary. (I wonder how much time Prof. Ryan Burge spends on preparing his beautiful graphs and writing his articles. I think he must have some assistants or graduate students to help him out. Unfortunately, I do not.) The data on Non-Denominationals and Pentecostals, especially, were quite a bit of trouble to hammer out, because there is more movement into and out of these denominations, and also less structured data available on them.

I'm rather confident that I've covered everything of importance, but even if I might've missed something, this is still probably the most complete, comprehensive, concise, and up-to-date summary of the current shifts in religious affiliations that you'll ever find in one place (even compared to Burge's work), so I hope readers might find it worth 15-20 minutes of your time to gloss through it and discover a few points of interest. Please read the end Summary, if nothing more.

Update: Burge's Contribution

Just as I was finishing up this summary, Prof. Ryan Burge published an article on this exact same topic!

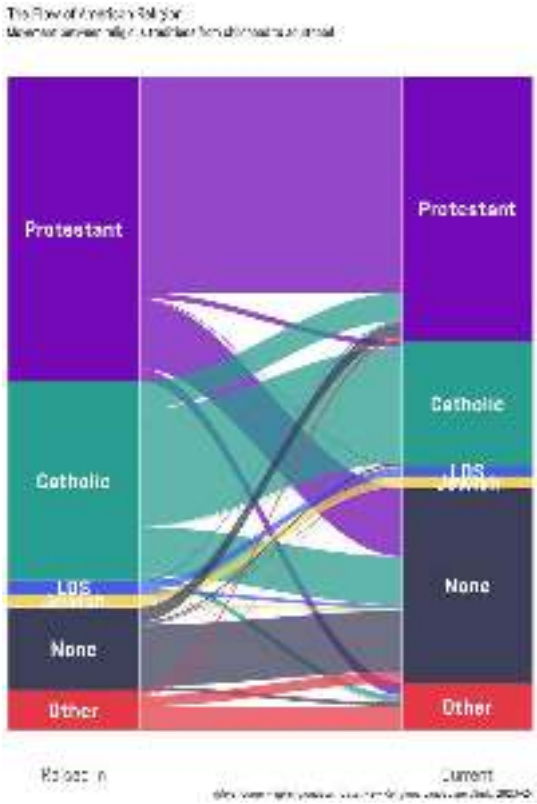
Graphs About Religion: The First Wave Left with Conviction. The Second Wave Just Drifted (2026/7/16)

I had to postpone publishing this post until I reviewed what Burge has done.

Here's my review.

In this article, Burge reports that younger generations are less religious (which I also covered in a previous post).

Burge made one great infographic that says it all, minus the numerical specifics.



I haven't picked through all his data with a fine-toothed comb and compared it to mine, but the major sources are the same, and the bottom-line statistics for what he reports are very neatly the same as mine. There are a couple of stats with percentages off by ±1, but these slight differences only confirm its accuracy, IMO.

The biggest differences between Burge's assessment and mine (below), are:

- Burge treats Protestantism as one block, whereas I broke down Protestantism into 5-6 types.
- Burge included LDS and Jewish in his report, and I didn't — originally, but I've added these figures below.
- I included Buddhism, Islam, and Orthodoxy, and Burge didn't.
- Burge has some really beautiful and interesting bar charts and graphs (I believe this is what makes his blog so popular), but mine doesn't.
- My survey (below) includes more detailed statistics, numbers, and percentages than Burge's review. (Many commenters under Burge's article and his subsequent posts on FB are asking for this data. Well, here it is.)
- Burge describes Two Waves of Switchers. (Summarized in the next section.)

Two Waves of Switchers

Based on his statistical research, Prof. Burge draws a broad distinction between the older and younger generations' motives for switching.

For the older generations (Boomers, Gen X, and early Millennials):

- Liberals are almost 4 times more likely to be less religious or non-religious.
- Those who abandoned the church to become “Nones” are more liberal — even more liberal than those who have been “Always Nones” their whole lives.
- Those who are “Always Nones” are more evenly distributed across political stances, with a plurality of Independents.
- Those who switch from one Christian denomination to another are the most conservative of all.

Burge concludes that all this switching is more of an indicator of political affiliations and realignments than anything to do with religion. He writes,

> “People who actively exit a faith tradition aren’t just drifting; they’re making a decision, and that decision appears correlated with a particular political worldview. Leaving a church isn’t religiously neutral; for many people, it seems to be a political act.”

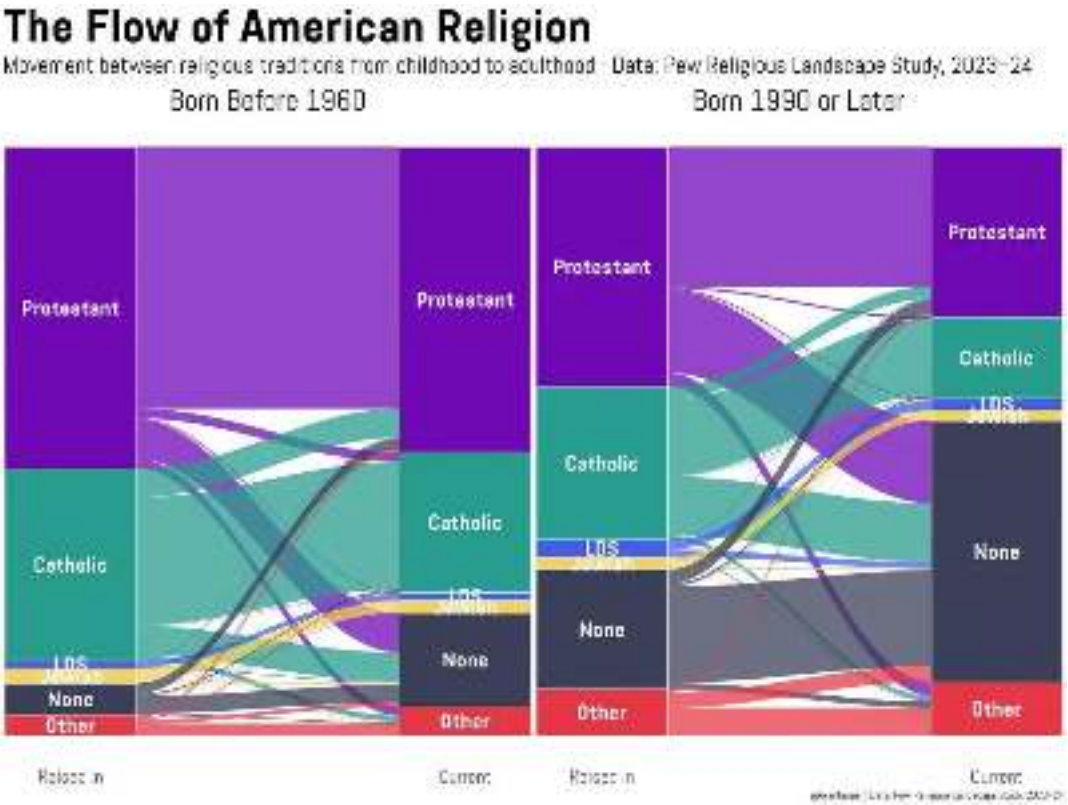
For the younger generations (Late Millennials, Gen Z) he assesses that [my paraphrase]:

- The correlations between politics and religion are much less pronounced.
- Younger generations weren’t politically motivated to redefine their faith beliefs; they just lost interest in church.

About this younger group, Burge writes,

> “These younger “dechurchers” don’t look like political refugees; they look more like people who simply stopped going — gradually, quietly, without it meaning much ideologically one way or the other.”

Burge also made an infographic that compares the flow of these two waves.



And finally, he sums up all this switching as,

> “The first wave left with conviction. The second wave just drifted out the door.”

Hence, the title of his article.

Total Percentages

The current percentages of the American population identifying with each religion (as of 2023-2025) are given below. (Burge doesn’t report this data in the article cited above.)

First, here is the breakdown for Protestant Traditions.

Protestant Tradition	Percentage of U.S. Population	Percentage of Protestantism
Protestant	40-43%	100%
Evangelical	23%	50-55%
Non-Denominational	14%	29-35%
Baptist	12%	33%
Mainline	11%	30-32%
Black Protestant	5%	13-20%
Methodist	4.6%	10%
Pentecostal	4%	10%
Lutheran	2-3.5%	8%
Presbyterian	2.2%	5%
Anabaptist	0.25-0.3%	~1%

Notes

1. Major groups are in Bold. (Here, ‘major’ refers to groups having unique communal structures and soteriological and theological concepts, NOT the numbers of adherents.)
2. Some denominations fall into more than one classification.
3. Black Protestant is a historic faith tradition, NOT a racial category (c.f. roughly 18% of American Protestants are racially Black.) [Pew 2018, Pew 2025]
4. Personally, I think Lutheranism should be separated into a sixth major category, but previous data analyses are not structured this way.
5. Sources: [ARDA, Church Answers, Gordon Conwell, Pew 2008, Wiki]

Here is the breakdown for Non-Protestant traditions as a percentage of the U.S. population.

- Catholicism: 20-23%
- LDS: 2%
- Jewish (Ethnicity): 2.4%
- Judaism (Jewish Religion): 1.7% to 1.9%
- Buddhism: 1.2%
- Eastern Orthodoxy: 1%
- Islam: 1%
- None: ~35%

These numbers reveal why Burge prioritized LDS and Jewish over Buddhism, Islam, and Orthodoxy, the latter of which I assume are lumped into “Other”. In response, I’ve added LDS and Jewish to my assessment below.

Now, on to my own gleanings.

Switching Patterns

As we already know, both Protestantism and Catholicism have experienced a net loss due to religious switching. Meanwhile, “Nones” have grown rapidly, only recently stabilizing.

But where have all these people gone to?

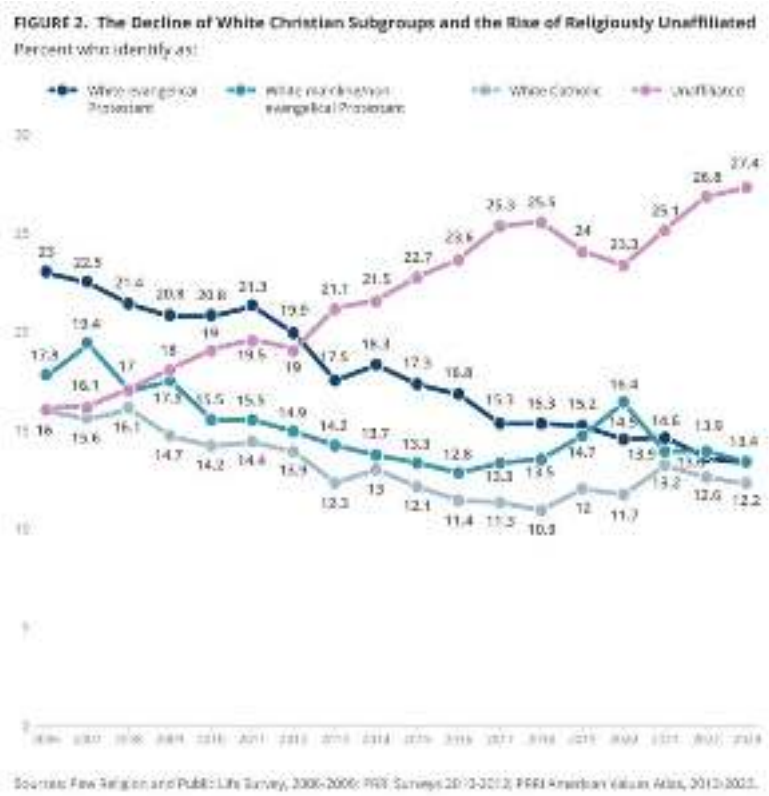
One Pew study presented a broad report on religious retention rates worldwide (based on data from 36 countries).

Pew Research Center: Around the World, Many People Are Leaving Their Childhood Religions (2025/3/26)

Here’s a read-worthy summary of Pew’s report:

The Archdiocese of San Antonio: Pew Research shows most Christians raised in the faith hold onto it in adulthood (2025/4/17)

Prof. Burge offered a concise summary of these shifts in his article at Religion Unplugged: How Many People Leave Their Childhood Religion? (2023/7/18)



My summary below offers a breakdown of the numbers in the U.S.A., as illustrated in Burge's graphs above. Protestantism is covered first, followed by Non-Protestant traditions and other major religions in order of their prevalence by numbers, except for the "Nones" which are given last.

Protestantism

The United States has the largest Protestant population of any nation in the world.

40-43% of Americans (~150 million people) are Protestants.

My review of Protestantism below covers 5 distinct types of Protestants. ('Distinct' refers to the unique communal, soteriological, and theological structures, NOT the numbers of adherents.) Percentages of these Protestant groups are given in parentheses. [Wiki]

1. Evangelical (50-55%)
2. Non-Denominational (29-35%)
3. Mainline (30-32%)
4. Pentecostal (10%)
5. Anabaptist (1%)

The total exceeds 100% because there is some overlap (too complex for me to unpack here, and perhaps it is irrelevant to our understanding of the patterns).

Data for Evangelical and Mainline denominations is readily accessible via the sources linked and listed under Related. Non-Denominational and Pentecostal churches have received much less attention, and the data on Anabaptists is sparse and incomplete. I've done my best to piece together an assessment of these.

Retention

- An average of 50% of Americans grew up Protestant. (See graph below.)
  - Older generations report much higher rates of a Protestant upbringing (50-62%).
  - Younger generations have significantly fewer raised in traditional Protestant households (38-50%).

- ~70% of people raised as Protestants continue to identify as Protestants in adulthood.
- 20% to 40% of people raised in one Protestant tradition move to a different Protestant denomination as adults.
- Among all U.S. adults who were raised Protestant, 44% still identify with the same denominational family as they did as children, while 26% identify with a different one.

Attrition

Overall, Protestantism has declined from ~60–70% of U.S. adults in the 1970s to ~40–43% today [Pew 2023-24 RLS]. Much of the drop is due to switching to "Nones" (religiously unaffiliated), and generational replacement (nominally religious older generations are dying off rapidly). Many others are converting from Catholic or Protestant traditions to Protestantism or Catholicism, respectively, or to Orthodoxy. An equal number are quitting religion altogether ("Nones").

- Among all U.S. adults who were raised Protestant, 26% no longer identify with the same denominational family as they did as children.
- Pew's 2023-24 RLS shows that roughly ~22% of those raised Protestant are now unaffiliated "Nones".
- 13.7% of U.S. adults are former Protestants who switched to a Non-Protestant faith tradition.
- 2-3% of people raised Protestant convert to Catholicism.
- 4% switch to another religion.
- Fewer than 1% of Protestants switch to Eastern Orthodox Christianity, making it a rare transition. Although it is only a tiny fraction of Protestantism, it constitutes the largest influx into Orthodoxy.

Accession

- Roughly 20% to 25% of current Protestants are converts (or "religious switchers") who were raised outside of Protestantism, according to demographic data from the Pew Research Center. [Burge, Pew 2025]

- In the U.S., about 12% to 13% of adult converts to Protestantism, including both Evangelical and Mainline Protestant congregations, come from a Catholic background. [Catholic Answers]
- The remainder of converts switched between Protestant denominations. [Pew 2015] (This indicates a LOT of church hopping.)
- One article at Religion Online: Immigrants and the Faith They Bring, acutely observes that "The great majority of immigrants coming to America are Christian, so immigrants do not represent the de-Christianization of American society but the de-Europeanization of American Christianity." Also, the author wrote that about one-third of immigrants to the U.S. convert to Christianity.

Globally, the dynamic differs. In Latin America, the percentage is much higher; for example, the vast majority of historical growth in Protestant or Evangelical churches across the region has been driven by converts from a Catholic background. [Pew 2014, also see here and here.]

Evangelical Protestantism

Currently, 23% of the U.S. population are Evangelical Protestants.

Retention

Approximately 61-73% of people raised as Evangelical Protestants remain in this faith tradition as adults.

Attrition

- 15% to 27% of individuals raised as Evangelical Protestants switch to another faith tradition or leave religion entirely.

Of the ~27% who leave the tradition,

- 7% to 14% transition to a different religion or another branch of Christianity.
- Approximately 13% drop out of organized religion altogether to become agnostic, atheist, or unaffiliated, i.e., "Nones".

Accession

Historically, Evangelical Protestantism has experienced slight net gains from religious switching. (This is probably because of <ahem> Evangelism, i.e., caring for others salvation, and the rather attractive and encouraging belief in Free Will.)

- 39% of current adult Evangelical Protestants in the United States were raised outside of the Evangelical tradition.
- 30% to 31% of all Evangelical Protestants were raised in a different Protestant denomination (including Mainline denominations) than the one they currently attend.
- 14% of current Evangelicals grew up in non-Evangelical / Mainline Protestant churches.
- 13% to 14% of current adult Evangelical Protestants in the United States were raised Catholic.

Non-Denominational

Note: Different sources cite widely varying figures for Non-Denominational data. Here, I've written this as a range, or else made notes.*

In the United States, approximately one in three (about 29% to 35%) Protestants identify as Non-Denominational.

When looking at all U.S. adults (not just Protestants), Non-Denominational Christians now make up about 14% of the total U.S. population. [Church Answers]

According to extensive U.S. religious demographics, such as those covered in the Pew Research Center's Religious Landscape Study, Non-Denominational congregations are often classified as Evangelical [1] or Interdenominational [2], and are heavily concentrated in the Southern United States.

Retention

45% to 50% of those raised in Non-Denominational churches continue to identify with that same faith group into adulthood.

Attrition

About half of those raised in Non-Denominational churches leave.

The specific destinations of converts / switchers out of Non-Denominational churches is only classified by type and is not well studied in any further detail, so specific percentages are lacking and what is reported is somewhat confounding. But here's what is reported.

- 27% of all Non-Denoms (or approximately 33% to 40% of switchers) eventually wind up as "Nones". [Baptist News, Deseret, Pew 2025]
- 23% of all Non-Denoms (or roughly 35% to 45% of transitioners) switch to another specific Protestant tradition (such as Baptist, Methodist, or Presbyterian).
- 1% of Non-Denoms switch to Catholicism.
- 4% switch to another religion.
- The remaining switchers (around 15% to 20%) join a different Christian faith or another world religion. [Baptist News, Religion Unplugged 2023]
- Sources: [Baptist News, Bishop Accountability News 2015, Burge, Pew 2015, Pew 2025]

It is difficult to ascertain how many Non-Denominationals switch to Evangelicalism, because the vast majority of Non-Denominational Protestants hold "Born-Again" / "Free Will" theological beliefs, and thus, they are inherently classified as Evangelical due to these core beliefs. [CT 2025, Pew RLS, Wiki 1, Wiki 2]

Accession

There has been a steady and significant shift away from historically specific denominations towards Non-Denominational affiliations over the last few decades.

- In 1972, fewer than 3% of Americans (about 3-5% of Protestants) were Non-Denominational.
- By 2010, this figure jumped to somewhere between 4% (confirmed regular attenders), and 10% (identifying as such) of all Americans (20% of Protestants). [ARDA]

- In 2024, over 14% of the U.S. population identified as Non-Denominational, or roughly one-third (30%) of all Protestants today. [Burge, Religion Unplugged]
- Non-Denominational churches are experiencing a significant net growth, with 5.7% of U.S. adults shifting into this tradition after being raised elsewhere. [Pew 2025]
- 75-80% of Non-Denominational Christians were raised in another religious background or faith tradition.
- For every 1 person who leaves the Non-Denominational faith, roughly 5 people switch into it from another religion or from an unaffiliated background. [Pew 2015]
- This migration is largely driven by conversions and individuals moving away from traditional, institutionalized authority structures. [Burge, CBS, Pew 2025, Religion Unplugged]

As Prof. Burge et al. have reported, this rapid growth makes Non-Denominationalism the largest single Protestant segment, surpassing all Mainline denominations and overtaking historically massive groups like the Southern Baptist Convention. Thus, Non-Denominationalism is currently one of the strongest growth forces in American Christianity, second to Evangelicalism. [Burge, Church Answers, Hartford 2010, Religion Unplugged]

Mainline Protestantism

Currently, 11% of the U.S. population are Mainline Protestants.

Retention

- About 58% of adult Mainline Protestants were raised within the tradition.
- Approximately two-thirds (66%) of people raised as mainline Protestants remain in this faith as adults.

Attrition

Mainline churches have experienced a continuous decline, dropping from nearly 30% of the U.S. population in the 1960s to around 11% in 2025.

- 20% to 42% of those raised as Mainline Protestants have left their childhood tradition.
- 20% of adults raised as Mainline Protestants abandon religion altogether.
- 14% switch to Evangelical Protestantism.

The attrition from Mainline churches is responsible for the majority of the attrition within Protestantism.

Accession

- 42% of Mainline Protestants are converts or switchers from other faith backgrounds.

Among those who converted to Mainline Protestantism from a different faith tradition, national demographic research shows the following approximate breakdown [PRRI 2024]:

- Formerly Catholics: 37%
- Formerly Evangelical Protestants: 30%
- Religiously Unaffiliated: 18%
- Other Christian Traditions: 3%
- Other Non-Christian Faiths: 5%

Mainline Protestant churches generally lose more members than they gain due to religious switching.

Pentecostalism

Note: Like Non-Denoms, different sources cite widely varying figures for Pentecostals. I've written this as a range, or else made notes.

In the United States, about 10% of Protestants identify specifically with classical Pentecostal denominations. However, many beliefs and traditions of worship that are associated with Pentecostalism span across multiple Christian denominations. Approximately 13% of Evangelical Protestants and 14% of Historically Black Protestants belong to a Pentecostal denomination (such as the Assemblies of God or the Church of God in Christ). In many data assessments, Pentecostals are considered to be a subset of Evangelicalism, alongside Baptists, ELCA, et al.

The share of Pentecostals is much larger worldwide, and carries less of a distinction from other Protestant churches. 50-60% of all Protestants in the world are affiliated with the broader Pentecostal and Charismatic movement, which encompasses roughly 279 million classical Pentecostals and hundreds of millions of Charismatic Christians within both Evangelical and Mainline Protestant denominations. [Ebsco, Pew 2011, Wiki]

Retention

In the U.S., Pew's report on religious switching says that 45% of those raised as Pentecostals continue to attend the same church denomination as adults. Other sources put this figure at 50%.

However, about 70-75% of those raised in a Pentecostal tradition cling to this identity throughout their lives, a retention rate that is rather strong compared to most other Christian groups.

Attrition

While Pentecostalism excels at rapid conversions, it faces significant membership turnover and attrition, particularly in Western countries, due to generational shifts, overly strict rules, burnout, poor church leadership / management, and growing awareness of leadership scandals. As a result, the Pentecostal movement struggles with long-term retention among certain demographics. [Church Model, Conversation, ExPentecostal, Hardy, Medium, Research, TND, Wiki]

The numbers:

- A growing number of Pentecostals have become “Nones”, from 15% in 2015 to 22% in 2025.
- 28% switch to another Protestant denomination.
- 1% become Catholics.
- 3% convert to another religion.

Accession

A majority of American Pentecostals (53% to 55%) are converts or switchers from another faith tradition. [Pew 2015, Pew 2025, PRRI]

I haven’t found specific percentages of origins, but conversions into Pentecostal traditions in the U.S. mostly capture transfers from other branches of Christianity, e.g. Evangelical or Mainline Protestantism, or Catholicism. The formerly unaffiliated / “Nones” Pentecostals are smaller in number. Individuals originating from non-Christian world religions (Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam) make up a very small fraction of total Pentecostal growth. [Pew 2015, Pew 2025]

Worldwide, the Pentecostal movement is much larger. In Latin America, 70% to 80% of converts to Charismatic / Pentecostal / Protestant churches originate from a Catholic childhood background, with smaller fractions coming from the religiously unaffiliated or non-Christian / indigenous traditions. [Baptist News, Research]

- Formerly “Nones” / Other: 22%
- Formerly Afro-Brazilian traditions (in specific country profiles like Brazil): 7%

Anabaptist

Anabaptists comprise 1% of American Protestants, and 0.2.5% to 0.3% of the American population. Although small, I believe this group is important to consider, because of their impressive retention and accession.

Retention

Anabaptist churches in North America and Europe are mostly made up of multi-generational, “born-in” members.

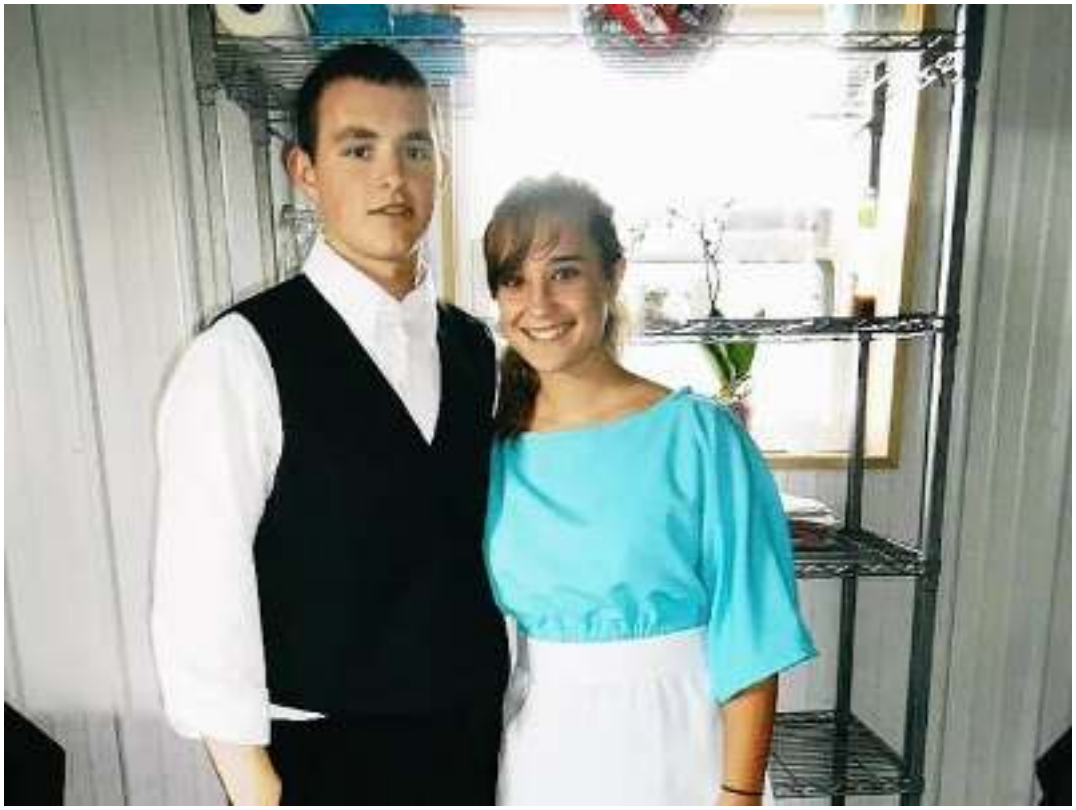
[Wiki]

- About 50% of Americans who grew up Anabaptist continue in this tradition as adults.
- 80% to 90% of Amish youth choose to stay in this faith and be baptized after Rumspringa. [1, 2, 3]

The more conservative congregations have a much higher retention and less attrition than the less conservative churches.

Interestingly (and perhaps not surprisingly), the more conservative branches (e.g. Amish) have a majority of men, and the less conservative branches (e.g. Mennonite) have a majority of women.

It's true!



Attrition

According to the Pew Research Center's Religious Landscape Study, about 48% to 50% of individuals raised in an Anabaptist tradition (such as Mennonites) leave this faith as adults. Attrition is much lower in more conservative congregations, and much higher in the more liberal sects, resulting in this average.

Accession

Although Anabaptists are only a tiny sliver of Protestantism, their membership has seen explosive growth over the past few years, with estimates of a 15-25% increase among various North American congregations, and even greater numbers globally.

Worldwide, the vast majority of Anabaptists are converts, with roughly 80-85% of baptized members living in the Global South (Africa, Asia, and Latin America) where church growth is primarily driven by adult conversions. The Institute for the Study of Global Anabaptism notes that over 90% of all new converts in recent decades reside in these areas. [1, 2, 3, Research]

Now, on to Non-Protestant religious traditions.

Catholicism

20-23% of Americans are Catholic.

Retention

92% of American Catholics are lifelong "Cradle Catholics".

However, only 57% of Americans raised Catholic continue to identify as such as adults. This significant difference (92% vs 57%) signals a large attrition.

Attrition

The attrition of Catholics has more than doubled over the past two decades.

- In 2009, around 10% of all adult Americans were former Catholics, with those ex-Catholics being split relatively evenly between becoming Protestant and becoming religiously unaffiliated. [Pew 2009, Pew 2015]
- In 2025, about 24% of those raised Catholic had converted to "Nones".
- In 2025, about 14% of those raised Catholic had switched to Protestantism as adults [Pew 2025].

Like Protestantism, Catholicism has lost more ground than it has gained overall. [Pew 2026, Worldwide Data]

Accession

Adult Catholic converts account for roughly 8% of the total U.S. Catholic population.

In the United States, roughly two-thirds (68%) of Catholic converts come from other Christian traditions, with Protestants making up the largest share. Younger or intellectually inclined individuals, often attracted to authority, liturgy, or tradition, are more likely to convert. Converts from non-Christian faiths account for a very small minority. [Pew 2026, Pew 2026]

- Formerly Protestant: 59%
- Religiously Unaffiliated: 22%

- From other Christian traditions (e.g., Eastern Orthodox, Latter-Day Saints): 9%
- From other non-Christian religions (e.g., Jewish, Hindu, Muslim): 4%

Latter Day Saints

LDS comprises 2% of the U.S. population, residing mostly in the Western United States.

Retention

Historical surveys from BYU Studies indicate that lifelong retention (those raised LDS who still identify as such as adults) dropped from 82% in the 1980s to approximately 46% to 50% in the last decade.

Interestingly, the LDS church reported that, currently, approximately 42-54% of those raised in the LDS church remain actively engaged as adults. In an interview, BYU Studies Editor-in-Chief, Justin Dyer, said that retention is falling across all religious denominations, and in comparison, he claimed that LDS has one of the highest active retention rates in the U.S. [BYU, Salt Lake Tribune 2026, Wiki]

After looking into this, I found that Dyer's claim is only Half True. It's true that retention is falling just about everywhere. However, a quick comparison to the retention figures of the other faith traditions I've reported here indicates that this claim is clearly cherry-picked. In fact, LDS has absolutely The LOWEST retention rate out of every single major religious tradition I've covered here.

Attrition

According to demographic research (e.g., data analyzed by BYU Studies):

- About one-third to one-half of individuals raised as Latter-day Saints eventually leave the faith.
- Of those who leave, the majority (roughly 58%) become religiously unaffiliated "Nones".
- Approximately 36% of former LDS members convert to another Christian denomination. This group breaks down as follows:
- 18% switch to Evangelical Protestantism.

- 10% join Non-Denominational churches.
- 8% join Mainline Protestant denominations.

Accession

According to the Pew Research Center, about 26% of Latter-day Saints are converts.

In the U.S., converts entering the church from other faith traditions come from:

- Formerly Evangelical Protestant: ~20%
- Formerly Catholic: ~20%
- Religiously Unaffiliated: 25%

Sources: [Pew 2012, Rational Faiths 2014, Pew 2015, Mormon Dialogue 2018, Pew 2025]

Judaism

In the U.S.:

- 1.7% to 1.9% of the population adheres to Judaism (the Jewish religion).
- 2.4% of U.S. residents identify as ethnically Jewish.

Retention

76% of American adults raised in Judaism continue to identify as Jewish by religion. [Pew 2025]

When measured by broader cultural, ethnic, or familial ties, 75-88% of Americans raised Jewish continue to identify as Jewish in some capacity. [STL Jewish Light, The Muslim Times]

The high retention might be explained as follows. Instead of abandoning the Jewish identity entirely, many Jews shift from an ethnic / secular to a religious identity, or from a religious to an ethnic / secular identity within the Jewish spectrum itself, and either one of these affiliations provides a sense of Jewish identity. [Pew, News]

Attrition

In the United States, about 24% of adults raised Jewish no longer identify with the religion. [Pew 2025, Forward, News]

This attrition is further broken down as follows.

- 19% identify as culturally or ethnically Jewish while practicing Christianity.
- 17% become “Nones”.
- Another 4% of Americans with a Jewish background identify as Messianic Jews, which blends Jewish heritage with Christian theology.
- About 2% of Americans raised as Jews later identify as Christians as adults.
- 1% now identify as Muslim.
- 4% Other.

To offer a contrast, in Israel, religious switching is incredibly rare, with virtually all individuals raised Jewish continuing to identify as such.

According to demographic studies by the Pew Research Center, Jewish religious retention worldwide is extremely high, and the attrition rate is under 1%.

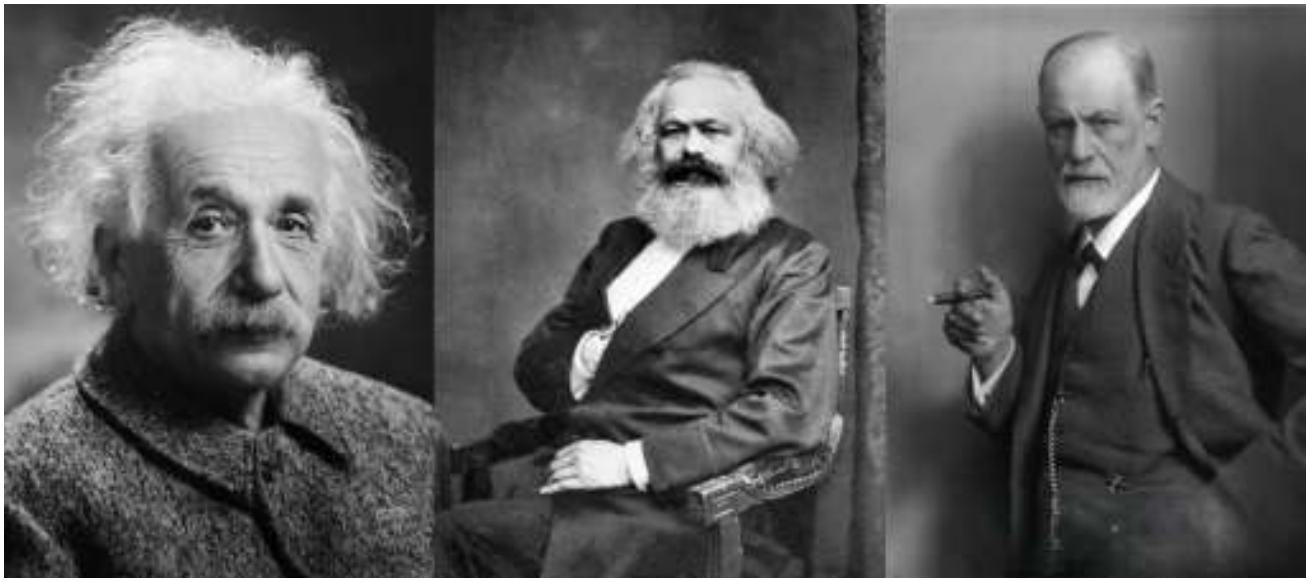
Apparently, Murica is an odd place where hereditary Jews defect, and Protestants become Jewish.

Accession

In the United States, about one-sixth (14% to 17%) of religiously Jewish adults are converts. Of these individuals, roughly half (7%) were raised in Christian traditions, while most others grew up in religiously unaffiliated or secular backgrounds. [The Jerusalem Post, Times of Israel]

- Formerly Christian: 7%
- Formerly Mainline Protestants: 4%
- Formerly Catholics: 3%
- Formerly Evangelicals: 2%

- Religiously Unaffiliated: 6%



Buddhism

1.2% of U.S. residents are Buddhist, predominantly Asian immigrant families residing mostly in Hawaii and California.

Retention

- Roughly 45% of these Buddhist Americans were raised as Buddhists.

Attrition

American Buddhism is reported to be suffering the worst attrition of any faith in the U.S.A.

- 55% of those raised as Buddhists leave this faith as adults.
- 22% to 27% of those raised as Buddhists become religiously unaffiliated “Nones”.
- 18% of those raised as Buddhists transition to some form of Christianity as adults.
- 11% of those raised as Buddhists switch to Protestantism.

A review of those Buddhists who transition to another faith reveals that a slight majority choose Christianity. The remainder become “Nones”.

Accession

Conversely (and surprisingly), American Buddhism has one of the highest “accession” (or entry) rates in the world by percentage influx (NOT by sheer numbers).

- Around 48% of current U.S. Buddhists were raised in another tradition or with no religion.
- 33% of converts were raised as Christians.

Eastern Orthodoxy

Eastern Orthodoxy comprises 1% of the U.S. population, but it is quickly growing. Adherents are distributed mostly throughout the Northeast, South, and Midwest.

Retention

- Roughly 6 out of 10 (or 53% to 64%) of those raised in Orthodoxy stay in the church as adults.

Attrition

- Approximately 47% of Americans raised in Eastern Orthodoxy leave it in adulthood.
- Of those who depart, 24% become religiously unaffiliated “Nones”.
- Of those who depart, 23% switch to another Christian tradition (such as Evangelical Protestantism, Catholicism, or Mainline churches).

Accession

- About a quarter to one-third of all current Orthodox Christians in the U.S. are converts.
- 64% of converts to the Orthodox Church originate from a Protestant background.
- Conversion is most visible among younger male converts seeking ancient tradition, liturgy, structure, worship, and masculine spirituality.

Islam

Only 1% of U.S. adults in the United States currently identify as Muslims.

Retention

- Roughly 77% of Americans who were raised as Muslims continue in this faith as adults.

Attrition

- Roughly 23% of Americans raised as Muslims leave this faith.
- 55% of those individuals become religiously unaffiliated (“Nones”) [Pew 2018].
- 6% switch to Christianity [Pew 2025].

Accession

The U.S.A. has the highest “accession” (or entrance) rate into Islam out of 13 countries surveyed.

- 20% of Muslim Americans say they were raised outside of Islam.
- 13% of them say they were raised as Christians.

Overall, the accession balances the attrition, resulting in no net growth or loss.

“Nones”

Currently, 35% of Americans identify as non-religious, “Nones”.

The number of people who identify as atheist, agnostic, or nothing in particular (“Nones”) reached a peak in 2022, when the percentage of Americans who identified as non-religious was 36.2%. But the “Nones” have steadily declined since 2023.

Retention

71-75% of those raised without any religious identity continue to remain unaffiliated into adulthood.

Accession

- Roughly 80% to 90% of religious “Nones” (those who identify as atheist, agnostic, or “nothing in particular”) were raised in a religion. [Jack: 90%!?! OMG!]
- The vast majority originate from Christian traditions, primarily Protestantism and Roman Catholicism.
- 35% of all religiously unaffiliated Americans (or “Nones”) are former Mainline Protestants. [Jack: Another OMG!]
- Evangelicals retain much better than Mainline but still lose significant shares to “Nones”.
- Overall, “Nones” dominate the outflow from all Christian denominations.
- Switching to “None” is most pronounced among younger adults, with 85% of switchers leaving by age 30.
- Many who are raised Protestant disaffiliate (quit church) and become “Nones” by their 20s–30s.
- While they have disaffiliated from their original institutions, most “Nones” still retain some form of spiritual belief, such as a belief in God, GNON, a higher power, or cosmic forces like karma.

Attrition

Around 25% of individuals raised without any religious affiliation adopt a faith tradition in adulthood.

In the United States, those raised as “Nones” who adopt a religious faith later in life strongly favor Protestantism over other traditions. [Burge1, Burge2]

- 20-22% of adults who were raised without any religious affiliation (“Nones”) later convert to Protestantism.
- Only about 2-5% of people raised as “Nones” convert to Catholicism.

Summary

Of all the religious traditions covered above,

Highest Retention: Conservative Anabaptists, i.e., Amish (80-90%), Muslims (77%), then Jews (76%), followed by “Nones” (75%)
Least Attrition: Muslims (23%), followed by Jews (24%), “Nones” (25%), and then Evangelical Protestantism (27%)
Highest Accession: “Nones” (90%), Non-Denominationals (75-80%), then Pentecostals (53-55%), followed by Buddhism (48%)

Worst Retention: LDS (42-54%), followed by Buddhism (45%), Eastern Orthodoxy (53%), then Catholicism (57%)
Worst Attrition: Buddhism (55%), then LDS (~33-50%), followed by Mainline Protestantism (42%)
Worst Accession: Catholicism (8%), Judaism (14-17%), then Anabaptists (15-25%), followed by LDS (26%)

Although it isn’t obvious from the raw data figures, both Burge’s and Pew’s analyses indicates more movement out of both Catholicism and Protestantism than in. (Burge’s infographics make this clear.)

I think it is not a coincidence that the denominations that are the hardest to nail down statistically are also the denominations experiencing the most growth (i.e. Non-Denoms, Pentecostals, and Eastern Orthodox). For one, they’re hard to track for this reason; and secondly, people are naturally drawn to that which is less understood.

In sum, from the 1970s to the 2020s:

- The Christian share of the overall U.S. population has continually declined but has stabilized somewhat in recent years.

- In 1970, 90% to 91% of Americans identified as Christian.
- In in 2023-24, it was ~62–63% Christian.
- Since their zenith in the 1960s, Mainline Protestantism has collapsed dramatically.
- Since the 1970s, Evangelicals have grown, stabilized, then declined modestly.
- Since 2007, church attendance rates have fallen across the board, but Mainline churches have suffered the most severe drops.
- “Nones” constitute the biggest destination, the largest converting demographic in sheer numbers, and the largest outflow from the Protestant church, especially among younger adults.
- Conversions from Protestantism to Catholicism or Orthodoxy occur but these are far smaller than the exodus to “Nones”.
- Evangelicals retain better than Mainline, especially among youth, but “Nones” are the primary destination for shifters.
- Older Generations were more religious. The earlier Pew studies reported much higher retention and Christian identification among Silents and Boomers, resulting in more Mainline / Evangelical stability.
- Younger Generations (Millennials, Gen Z) show much higher rates of disaffiliation.
- Although many Gen Zs are returning to church, Generation Z is the most religiously unaffiliated generation to date.
- Among the smaller number of Gen Z’s who identify as Christian, they are more likely to attend church. This is why some Gen Z’s appear to be more religious, compared to older generations (I’ll get to this in a future post), but at the same time, there are more “Nones” too.
- The numbers of gains suggest that younger generations (i.e., proactive young men) are drawn to either conservative faiths or none at all.
- More conservative believers are more likely to switch from one Christian denomination to another.
- More liberal adherents are more likely to abandon church and become “Nones”.

The Key Drivers and Influential Factors are…

- Convergence / Secularization of the church, as seen in its norms and values.
- The cultural shifts on marriage, gender, and sexuality that have infiltrated the church.
- Evangelical fatigue as a result of its cultural accommodation, AKA 'convergence' with Feminist values.
- Liberalization in Mainline denominations, leading to mass attrition.
- Lower birth rates, especially in Mainline groups.
- A growing perceived irrelevance of Christian values with respect to cultural values. [Jack perceives that this characteristic is beginning to reverse.
- Those who are drawn to Non-Denominational and Pentecostal strains appear to be seeking less structure and more vitality in their faith.
- The minor numbers who shift to more conservative and structured traditions, such as Anabaptist, Catholicism, and Orthodoxy, appear to be disillusioned conservatives seeking to reconstruct their faith.

Readers, please let me know if there is any particular data correlation you're interested in that I've missed.

The Protestant Churchs' Rejection of Ecclesiastical Authority and its Secular Convergence Protestant churches have gradually turned away from doctrinal, ecclesiastical, and liturgical structures and have turned towards secularization.

Intro

As part of my mini-series on The Protestant Reformation 2.0, my last post provided a relatively concise (and yet still very long) summary of the shifts in Protestant church attendance and religious identities over the past 50 years, both Evangelical and Mainline, and how many Protestants have converted to Catholicism, Orthodoxy, and Nones, by age, sex, and generation, and vice versa.

Jack's Thesis

After studying the data, demographics, denominational shifts, switching, and other information, I believe two major trends have occurred and have become visible within Protestantism since the Sexual Revolution, although it started much earlier.

1. A rejection of ecclesiastical authority.
2. A convergence with secular values (e.g., Feminism, Humanism, Transhumanism, W0kism, etc.)

This realignment (or perhaps more meaningfully described as a "turning away") has happened in most Protestant sects, but in different ways.

To explain this falling away, I'll offer a brief history for each of the major Christian sects, cite the relevant data, and make my case below.

Catholicism

The number of people identifying as Catholic has steadily grown since WW2, and yet, the Catholic church is still losing members, and it has one of the worst accession rates of all religions (8%).

This apparent contracticton appears very strange and counterintuitive, until … you consider the role of authority and immigration.

- Roughly 80% of Hispanic Catholics and 92% of Asian Catholics in the U.S. are either immigrants or the children of immigrants.
- Approximately 29-30% of all adult Catholics in the United States are first-generation immigrants
- Another 14% are the children of immigrants.
- In total, 40% of the total American Catholic population is of direct immigrant stock.
- While domestic adult conversions fluctuate and have seen localized periodic upswings, immigration remains the primary structural pipeline that offsets departures and reshapes the cultural identity of the Catholic church in America.
- Sources: [Aleteia 2026, Catholic Culture, Catholic Herald, FSSPX, National Humanities Center, Pew 2025]

In short, indentured U.S. citizens are turning away en masse from the authoritative structure of the Catholic church, even while their attrition is shored up by many Catholic immigrants — but not nearly enough to prevent the ship from slowly sinking.

Mainline Protestants

Mainline Protestants (e.g., ELCA, Episcopal, PCUSA, UCC, United Methodist, et al.) have had a dramatic long-term decline, more than any other major Christian group. These churches have suffered membership losses of 40–70% since peaks in the 1960s. Attendance and institutional vitality have plummeted, with thousands of churches closing.

In sum:

- Mid-1970s: Mainline Protestants comprised ~30%+ of U.S. adults.
- In Pew's 2007 Religious Landscape Study (RLS), they comprised ~18.1% of U.S. adults.
- 2010s: ~11–16%
- In the 2023-24 RLS, the numbers fell to ~11%.

Back in the 1970s and 1980s, Mainline churches chose to remain more conservative / fundamental / traditional. However, in recent years, many Mainline churches have totally and catastrophically abandoned their conservative / fundamental / traditional values, and have entirely rolled over to the feminist / pagan cultural dictums, even ordaining Females and H0m0sexuals into the clergy.

In summary of the Mainliners track record to date: they resisted both cultural and religious trends in the 1970s and 1980s, betrayed the tenets of the faith in the 1990s and 2000s, and then rolled over to W0ke indoctrination in the 2010s and 2020s.

Overall, it seems that, for each and every decade, Mainliners were intent on doing whatever was most expedient to their own disqualification and elimination, and were consistent about sticking their heads in the sand and calling this self-effacing stupidity a rejection of anti-Christian values — values which were, in fact, more closely aligned to cultural dictums than scripture, and which had to be redefined every decade, apparently in order to speed their demise.

It is one thing to resist and reject the urge to follow the societal trends in order to be popular.

It is quite another to buck everything going on in both Christendom and secular culture and double down on nothing more than being a stupendous maverick or a showroom of faux liberal values, and then rationalizing that just because the chosen way is narrow, rejected, and unpopular, then it must necessarily be The Way.

Need I repeat the axiom: "Go Woke, Go Broke!" There is nary a more pertinent example of this axiom than what has occurred within Mainline Protestantism over the past 50 years.

American Evangelical Protestants

Evangelical Protestant churches grew significantly during the 1970s–1990s, from ~22% to ~30+% of the U.S. population. For a time in the mid to late 1970s, when American football was the uncontested ruler of all three TV stations, followed by totally truthful news broadcasts (imagine that!), it was actually cool to distinguish one's self as a Thoreauish-Waldensian, Bible-thumping, Born Again™ bohemian hippie / hyper-relaxed peacenik. This social movement actually gave birth to the soccer-mom phenomenon and provided fertile soil for the growth of AEP Churchian Egalitarianism, which came later in the 1980s. (This might seem incredulously far removed from the present day, but I was a child during that time and I remember it well, so I trust readers can take my word on it.)

However,

- Much of the gains / sustenance in Evangelicalism (including Non-Denoms) during this time came at the cost of Mainline losses.
- Since the 2000s, Evangelicalism has seen steady declines.
- In Pew's 2007 Religious Landscape Studies (RLS), Evangelicals were ~26%.
- Pew's RLS in 2023-24 placed Evangelicals at ~23%, almost what it was before the Evangelical Revival that occurred in the late 1970s. Nevertheless, AEP continues to be the largest religious bloc in the U.S.

Looking back, with all that we know now (via Dalrock et al.), it's not hard to see that the explosive growth of AEP during the late 1970s and 1980s was accomplished by appealing to and compromising with the Feminist values and hedonistic sexual libertinism common in the wider American culture, as manifested in Complementarianism, The Born Again Slore Life Script / The Career Life Script / The College Boyfriend™ / The Feminist Life Script, postporning marriage, shaming S1ut Shaming, and the already large and growing ubiquity of divorce as a norm, even within the church. (All these topics have been discussed ad infinitum in the Christian Manosphere long before C0V!D. Please click on the links for more info.)

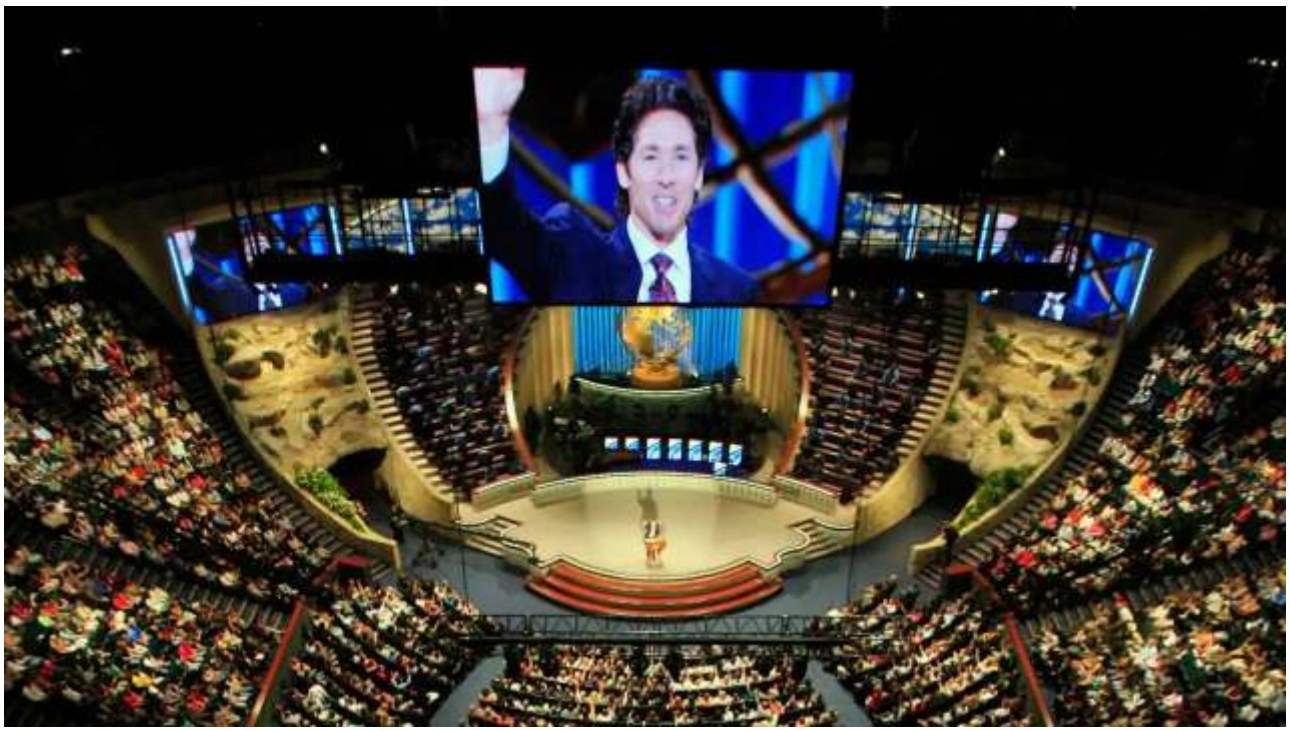
Non-Denominational Protestants

Although the rise in "Nones" has been phenomenal, not all AEP decline as of late has been a turn away from Christianity altogether. During the 2000s, many Evangelicals shifted away from denominationally affiliated Churches (i.e. Baptist, Nazarene, Presbyterian, et al.), to AEP Flavored Non-Denominational congregations, which have seen much growth since then.

Interestingly, although many Non-Denoms are not overtly classified or advertised as Evangelical, if you've ever visited a few of them, you'll know that they are hardly any different, mostly because a plurality of their adherents, or their parents, defected from AEP churches. There are very few differences in doctrine; and if any, they are minor. The main difference is affiliational — they don't pay homage to, or try to align themselves with, the larger central leadership — or the doctrinal precepts — of ANY denomination.

IOW, they have rejected the ecclesiastical authority of ANY denomination.

I believe this is not coincidental, but is part of the larger attrition away from organized Christian churches.



Pastor Joel Osteen serves as the senior pastor of Lakewood Church, an independent, non-denominational megachurch in Houston, Texas, which aligns broadly with the prosperity gospel and the Word of Faith movement.

The Rejection of Ecclesiastical Authority

All of these shifts and realignments can be simply explained as follows.

U.S. Catholics are running with their tails between their legs to get out from under the more authoritative, and ironically, ever less doctrinally aligned, Vatican led structures. Meanwhile, Catholic immigrants remain the more faithful (or the more blindly ignorant).

Mainliners have done the same, but quietly and without the pompous pontification.

Many of these exiters migrated to AEP (according to the stats, if not the individuals themselves). As a result, AEP enjoyed the limelight of faux religiosity for a couple of decades in the late 20th century, largely due to their doctrinal accommodation of secular Feminism in the form of Complementarianism. But although Evangelical churches have been rather resilient, especially compared with Mainline churches, they have still lost ground overall — as has "Christianity" in general.

The shifting preference for Non-Denoms during the 1990s and 2000s has driven much of the resilience within Evangelicalism. But overall, the expansion of Non-Denominational churches has been driven by a mass-scale, grass-roots rejection of AEP's already too liberal, yet stubbornly structured ecclesiastical authority (fueled in part by the Boomers' generation-wide rejection of authoritative structures in general).

Looking at the overall trend, the movement throughout the decades has been AWAY from ecclesiastical structure and order, and towards Antinomianism or else Ressentimentalism.

Secular Convergence

All of the above rejection of ecclesiastical authority was juxtaposed with the massive embrace of liberal, sexually permissive values of the surrounding culture, and this happened church-wide — both in the church leadership, deceived by secular Feminism, and on the level of the individual, Blue Pilled, Chivalrous, Churchian layman, hoping to keep his debased marriage intact and his hard-earned finances solvent.

Since the late 1980s, the church retained doctrines that were more or less solid (due to the clear stance of the Danver's Statement), but the exegesis and practice of those doctrines continued to be compromised with secular culture (as in Evangelical churches), or else, leaned ever more liberal and acculturated (as in the Mainline churches).

Moreover, almost every sect of the church has tacitly embraced or tentatively tolerated Feminist / Liberal / sexually permissive values of the surrounding culture, and as a result, the church has grown ever more feminized since the 1960s. This was, of course, hardly ever overtly stated, much less formally indoctrinated, but nevertheless, was fundamentally still occurring in the background and was tacitly accepted.

Yes, this man is (or was?) a pastor. Yes, he posted this photo on Facebook. No, these women are NOT his wife or daughter.

Conclusions

Considering all of the data above and in past posts, the trend since the 1960s is that highly structured churches have become less popular, and large numbers of people have migrated to ever less structured churches over time.

In general, we see there has been a "stream" of (weak) adherents shifting out of Catholicism, and away from Mainline denominations, to Evangelical churches. This was followed by another "stream" of Evangelicals defecting to Non-Denominational affiliations.

Obviously, it becomes much more complicated as we get down to the individual level, and motivations vary by age/generation, as Burge observed. Americans, in general, are very uncomfortable with structures of authority, yea, anything that strays from the democratic, egalitarian, "Enlightened" grid.

However, I see there are generally three tracks of mobility within the Christian world:

- The Liberal Track: People are drawn to less ecclesiastical authority, less doctrinal and liturgical structure, and more ecumenism.
- The Conservative Track: Most realignments within Christian denominations often fall along the lines of people either being drawn to liturgy or tradition and/or being repelled by Feminist / Woke compromises in church leadership.
- The Apostate Track: Most "Nones" appear to come from disillusionment or confusion surrounding hypocrisies and schisms within the church.

Overall, we see a 50+ year symbiotic trend of people being drawn to less structured churches, and churches becoming less structured and more compromising with the culture in response to people's changing tastes.

This migration stands in contrast with men's general nature of preferring structure and order.

That said, readers might intuitively understand why many men are changing churches, or leaving church altogether, while there is a revived interest in church among a smaller number of more seriously conservative men.

I'll expand on this observation in the next few posts, which will address men drifting away from the church and men returning to it, respectively.

Exit Question

The question remains: Is this mass exodus from culturally converged ecclesiastical authority a good thing, or does it constitute a falling away from the ancient faith in Christ?

A Summary of Religious Shifts (1970–2025) listed the Key Drivers and Influential Factors to be…

- Convergence / Secularization of the church, as seen in its norms and values.
- The cultural shifts on marriage, gender, and sexuality that have infiltrated the church.
- Evangelical fatigue as a result of its cultural accommodation, AKA 'convergence' with Feminist values.
- Liberalization in Mainline denominations, leading to mass attrition.
- Lower birth rates, especially in Mainline groups.
- A growing perceived irrelevance of Christian values with respect to cultural values. [Jack perceives that this characteristic is beginning to reverse.
- Those who are drawn to Non-Denominational and Pentecostal strains appear to be seeking less structure and more vitality in their faith.
- The minor numbers who shift to more conservative and structured traditions, such as Anabaptist, Catholicism, and Orthodoxy, appear to be disillusioned conservatives seeking to reconstruct their faith.

Here, I only summarized what was reported in the literature, saving my personal analyses and viewpoints for another post.

In the comments, Joe2 and Kevin Blackwell dug one layer deeper to speculate about the underlying causes. Their views disagreed with each other, but I agree with them both. So here are some insights to unpack, and more of my own assessments. All explained here.

The Internet's Disintermediation of Social Intercourse

Joe2 wrote,

> "I think the internet is a key correlation for younger adults switching to "None." Before the Netscape Navigator was released in 1994, the internet was primarily text-heavy and used by academics, scientists, and military personnel. Netscape created the first highly successful commercial visual web browser. It transformed the internet into an accessible, graphical information highway that anyone could navigate.
> Younger adults today were brought up with computers, starting in kindergarten, and are computer savvy. They are comfortable with computers; it's part of their life. With a few clicks, they can find everything about any religion from the internet. As a result, I think they lose interest in church and see it as not being very relevant to their life in a computerized world. OTOH, the older generations had no such experience with the internet and actively needed a reason for leaving a faith tradition."

Here, Joe2 brings up two causes:

1. The internet, smart phones, text messaging, etc., as manifested in platforms like Bumble, FB, IG, OF, Threads, Tinder, TT, X, YT, et al., have become a social intermediary that has almost totally replaced real face-to-face human interaction.
2. It's a spiritual law (not sure if we have a name for it though): Knowing factoidal information about a religion (or anything at all, really) aims to satisfy the fleshly mind's curiosities, but it also tends to dampen one's genuine interest in it and also one's passion for the faith-led development thereof.

I have something more to say about Joe2's first point.

The Ubiquitous Ignorance of Social Skills Among Gen Z

Young people don't even know how to make friends anymore.

I'm serious.

For the last two years, my students have been asking me how they can find more friends and/or find a boyfriend or girlfriend. (These are college-aged young people born after 2005, i.e., Gen Z.) From my talks with them, now breaching hundreds of hours, I've learned that the social norms of interaction that are taken for granted by those of us who grew up without the internet are completely unknown to Gen Zs. They're asking me about this because they intuitively know it is imperatively important to their lives, but they really DO NOT know how to do it.

And … because older generations take these things for granted, they cannot very well explain it either. Instead, they just blame Gen Zs for being bland and dull, for having "The Gen Z Stare", and for being difficult to talk with.

It's not that Gen Zers can't find good information online (as commenter Kevin Blackwell said), but that anything and everything online is just bland !nF0Rm@t!0N! upon !nF0Rm@t!0N! in a world of !nF0Rm@t!0N! OvErL0@d! — and it is all !nF0Rm@t!0N! that has NO real meaning to them, hence the breakdown and disconnect.

Prof. Jordan Peterson's point about the lack of meaning among today's youth still applies as much as it did 5 years ago in Peterson's heyday, except among Gen Z, "meaning" is increasingly becoming more of an esoteric, nebulous concept that lies beyond their grasp. They don't know how to identify it, and those few who can don't know what to do with it, and this is deeply frustrating to them. This is a real problem in today's youth.

But … when I tell my students how to create Frame, adopt a clearly recognizable social role, approach people congenially and in alignment with one's social role, place expectations, pursue Flow, and set proper boundaries to form trust and increase openness … they are utterly flabbergasted!!! — so much so that it is even surprising to me to see their responses.

It is a skill that cannot be learned outside of regular committed social intercourse, i.e., NOT online. But once I explain it, they catch on quickly, and then they'll run with that baton all the way to the finish line with googly-eyed OMG-JOY!!! (I'm thinking this just might be the current iteration of the culturally relevant gospel. If I should write a book about this, it would be a bestseller among Gen Zers — worldwide!)

Poor Catechesis

Kevin Blackwell wrote,

> "I think the turnover is due to poor catechesis from parents. This leaves them completely vulnerable to the social indoctrination in primarily college but also now reaching all the way down to kindergarten and preschool. In addition to enforced social norms through TV and movies and every human you walk by.
> I don't think this has to do with the internet. With all the knowledge at your fingertips, finding the truth should be easier.
> I used to be fairly bothered by the direction of the world until I heard that the more evil there is, the greater the chance to attain higher levels of virtue. Instead of focusing outward to what can't be controlled, focus on Jesus."

Yes. There is also a problem of poor catechesis, from parents, teachers, online sources, and practically everybody and their brother, really.

For older generations, church is a social group of friends and high-quality acquaintances, and a place where the 'better' people in the local community condense, congregate, and commingle. But for Gen Zs, it is NOT. Instead, church is seen by them as an odd mish-mash of fundamentally opposing cliques of misfits, ranging from…

- Perpetually flustered Church Ladies™.
- Vagabond single mothers claiming virtual virginity.
- Overly serious hypocrites who are ultimately deceived out of any recognizable sense of reality.
- Beta Boys™ constantly engaged in embarrassing Simptoonery and treasonous White Knightery.

All of these people are so spiritually immature that they're intolerable, insufferable, and yea, even shameful to the true, holy name of Christ. Yet, that is what we have within what we currently call the church.

Worse, most churches are not teaching anything much different from what the wider culture is pushing.

Much worse, most Christians are not outwardly, visibly much different from seculars.

And so, the average Gen Zer arrives at the very rational conclusion: "What's the point?"

Parental Divorce and Familial Dysfunction

Here, I'll add [Jack's point] that a lot of the poor catechesis from parents is because of parental divorce and familial dysfunction, as I described before.

In the past, young people identified with a religion simply because their parents did, and because they were raised to believe as such. No matter how biblically accurate or practicably useful their religion is, it stands as a bonding element, a common identity, a mutual faith, and a shared activity for the family.

But when parents are divorced:

- The nature of parental divorce invariably destroys their children's connection to God, and replaces it with bitterness, hopelessness, and uncleanness. Ask me how I know. It takes a whole $%&#@ lifetime to recover, and only through decades of silent suffering, diligent prayer, and God's grace.
- Divorced parents' religious beliefs mean next to nothing to their children, because whatever they believed, it obviously couldn't accomplish the most fundamental aspects of life — it didn't create and/or protect a beautiful family life, and it didn't 'work' for them.

As a result, and more so with every successive generation, marriage becomes a meaningless risk, divorce becomes commonplace, religion becomes hollow. Thus, the number of "Nones" continues to rise, just as we have been seeing.

The Flesh / The Devil

Finally, we mustn't forget that the Devil / egotistical pride / the fleshly nature / the human cognitive predisposition / the mind-warping libido of youth / etc. are always constantly beating the drum of heart-numbing logic, humanism and hedonism, and thereby casting a spell of delusion over a Generation Z that apparently doesn't know right from wrong.

The Red Pill Stands as a Bastion of Truth

To end on a positive note,

- Feminism is quickly falling flat because it doesn't get to the truth, and the sumptuous lies it promulgates are rapidly becoming obvious as of late.
- MGTOW and The Red Pill continue to receive continual coverage and further expand because these movements actually have something meaningful, real, and useful to say.

I hate to say this, but just as the Beatles once said, blasphemously, but rather truthfully, that they were "bigger than Jesus", I dare say the Red Pill is more truthful than the average Protestant pulpit or any 'Christian' marital counseling session.

I think the only real working option for the church at this point is to get Red Pilled Fast and Furious and juxtapose this information with The Real Bible™ ASAP, as opposed to a watered-down, Fempowered, scriptural exegesis filtered through the Blue-tinged lens of Complementarian / Feminism.

Carrots, Categorical Thinking, and Self-Control

A Message to Regular Readers

Apologies for not posting regularly lately. I've been really busy, working overtime and writing a research paper. Also, my wife and I sold our house and bought another one much closer to our workplaces, and in addition to moving and working with an interior designer to make the new house comfortable and livable, there have been so many other related details that must be looked after.

I am exhausted, yet very blessed! (There seems to be a correlation between the two.)

More writings on The Protestant Reformation 2.0: Resetting Masculinity are coming, but are, as of yet, unfinished. Me thinks it is just as well, since there have been many other good articles and video talks on this topic that have been coming out of the Men's Sphere lately. (But, this also adds to the number of sources I will need to review before I can finish my coverage of this topic.)

So for now, here's a fun post: Carrots and Self-Control. Enjoy!

Intro

On Thursday, 2026/8/6, I had a meditative prayer in the afternoon, and I gathered a curious postulate from the nebulae.

> "Those who lack sufficient self-control shall be called 'carrots'."

My next thought was, "Why 'carrots'?" I only received one clue:

> "When people think of vegetables, they always think of carrots first."

I also wondered what 'sufficient' means. The answer to that question will come later.

Why do People have Carrots on the Brain?

I looked this up, and apparently, it is true. When people are asked to think of a vegetable, they will invariably think of 'carrots'.

There has actually been some ¡$c!əNt!f!c! research on this topic.

Psychological studies and informal experiments consistently show that a large majority of people (90% or higher) respond with "Carrot". Onions, Peas, and Tomatoes are the next most, although seldom, reported vegetables. Other vegetables, such as broccoli, cabbage, or potato, appear far less often than these. No one ever responds with beets, Brussels sprouts, eggplants, horseradish, rutabagas, or squash.

Prototypicality, Priming, and Categorical Thinking

Why do people always think of carrots?

The reason for this phenomenon is because of human psychology.

When asked to "name a vegetable", the brain quickly retrieves the most central, familiar, and frequently encountered example of the category.

Carrots score high on this prototypicality for several reasons:

- They are common and well known.

- They are distinctive in shape (phallic!).
- They are bright in color (orange!), especially compared to most other vegetables.
- They frequently appear in everyday language, children's books, food marketing, and many other cultural references.

In all, 'carrots' are an iconic representation of the human psyche's category of 'vegetables'. And so when people recall 'vegetables', they immediately think of 'carrots' as a representation of this category.

Here's another example of how categorical thinking works. When subjects are given many arithmetic problems that all equal 6, at some point, they will stop calculating and mark 6 as the answer to the next problem. It saves time and mental effort, at the (perceivably reduced) risk of being wrong.

In short, people's brains default to 'carrots' mainly because of cognitive prototypicality, but only within the vegetable category. When asked about 'food' in general, people's brains will degrade to the most sumptuous delicacies, e.g., grilled beef steaks, deep fried chicken, pizza, barbecued pork ribs, Doritos, etc.

Moreover, people do not sample randomly from all possible vegetables (or even remain willing to calculate an answer). Instead, they default to the best-fitting and most memorably outstanding prototype.

Also, see my post on Philosophical Dualism (2024/5/27).

The Carrot's Connection to Self-Control

So what does all this have to do with self-control?

Carrots are indirectly linked to self-control because the socio-psychological contexts in which both are discussed are closely related — even within research studies. More specifically, because of their prototypicality, carrots are often chosen to figuratively represent choices, motivations, and rewards.

For example,

- Analogy: The well-known "Carrot and Stick" analogy. The figurative 'donkey' chasing after the carrot on a stick is merely a spurious placeholder for an entity that is motivated by incentives. Lettuce not forget that the same stick is oft used as a whipping rod.

- Symbolism: In studies on health and dietary habits, carrots often serve as a convenient, culturally familiar symbol of the "healthy but less immediately rewarding" choice that requires restraint.
- Snacks: Other studies have shown that people who consider health information when making food-related decisions are more likely to choose carrots over less-healthy options (e.g., as a snack between meals). This behavior is linked to better self-control.
- Selection: In self-control research, carrots (or carrot sticks) are frequently used as the classic "virtuous" or less-tempting option that people must choose when exercising restraint (e.g., cake vs. carrots). The ability to select the healthier item is interpreted as a measure of self-control.

Of note, classic ego-depletion experiments by the famed and certified RP credentialed Prof. Roy F. Baumeister and his colleagues attempted to bypass the common prototypicality of carrots by using radishes (another crunchy root vegetable) versus chocolate-chip cookies to deplete the willpower of test subjects. They found that participants who were forced to eat radishes instead of cookies later showed reduced persistence on difficult tasks, implying that an increase in willpower cannot be enticed nor forced. In general, when the human will is denied, one is demotivated.

Conclusions

Going back to the nebulous statement that inspired this study,

> "Those who lack sufficient self-control shall be called 'carrots'."

Perhaps my sharper readers have already connected the dots, but to help illustrate the connection for general audiences' understanding, let's recall why FB, Google, IG, X, and many other internet-based websites and services are ¡Frεε! — it's because the information generated by the user is the product being sold, thus generating $$$ for the host.

Viz, the user doesn't need to exercise any self-control, will-power, or make any responsible decisions when interacting online, because whatever they do (collectively) constitutes massive amounts of information that characterizes their inclinations (as a targeted group) — thereby providing information that businesses buy from these sites and then use to adjust their advertisement and sales strategies with more accurate and effective click-bait, gimmicks, incentives, lines, sales pitches, and "special deals", accordingly.

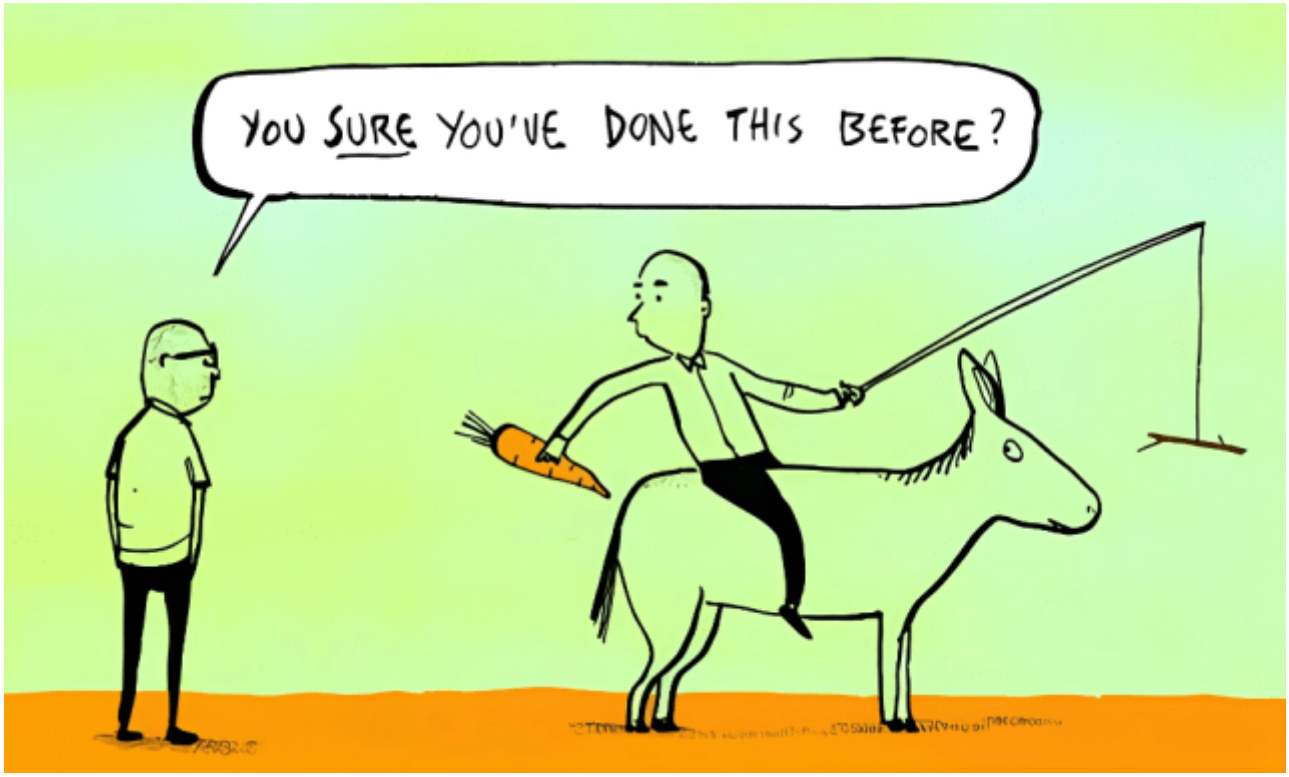
Also,

- The prototypical person lacks sufficient self-control and regularly defaults to categorical thinking.
- Exercising restraint / will power in one area depletes the ego and thus reduces one's ability to do the same in another area (as per Baumeister's study).

Likewise, and here is the main point of this essay, those who lack sufficient, agentic self-control are invariably used, abused, and discarded by others who possess a relatively greater, adroit awareness of their better and worst natures. In more effervescent language, the more socio-emotionally mature (and technologically saavy) individuals are calling the shots and shuffling the riff raff to align with their capricious avarices. How accountable, compassionate, or responsible these individuals might be is utterly irrelevant, unfortunately, in this Dog-Eat-Dog Jungle Land. The immature, naïve wimpletons are "the product that is being sold". They are the incentives that the business managers, the CIA, the strategists, and power brokers use to barter influence and trade methods of leverage over the masses.



This is especially true for men. Men who lack sufficient Detachment / Frame / Internal Locus of Control / emotional and spiritual maturity / motivation, are especially susceptible to manipulation under these respective social forces. If men are not adequately discerning, acting as autonomously self-controlled free agents, and diligently following their God-ordained purpose in life, then sooner or later, they shall be duly controlled by others — 'enslaved' to put it bluntly. From a spiritual perspective, this is to simply say that if a man is not actively exercising a working faith, then by default, he allows himself to act as a minion of evil and a slave to sin. All this is why Christian maturity is acutely important in this evil age, and especially for Men.

What is 'Sufficient'?

As to the meaning of the word 'sufficient', the mark of 'sufficient' stands as the deciding factor of whether a man can swim with the tides of swashbuckling brine and brimstone, or else be used, abused, discarded, and waylaid, and thus sink to the bottom of Davy Jones' locker in the deep Blue Pill dreamland of faux fantasy … as contained in the current culture-wide milieu of gynocentric aggrandizement, alongside the disintegrations of the community, church, and family structures, all while "the love of many will grow cold" (Matthew 24:12). NOT for the faint of heart!

And ironically, as Gunner Q ominously pointed out recently, if you can 'swim', then you must be compromised or utterly corrupt, either personally, or organizationally, or else, by logical deduction, you would've been targeted by the Evil SIN$ister PTB long ago.

"Europe, 1916", an anti-World War I cartoon illustrated by Boardman Robinson. Today, 110 years later, the words "EUROPE" (in the name) and "VICTORY" (above the carrot) could be replaced with "The West" and "Feminism" (or "The Blue Pill") respectively.

Summary

In summary, the common Altruistic, Betastized, Blue Pilled, cartoonish, Chivalrous, Church-going, Complementarianish, Churchian Man is a 'Carrot' — an incentive to vice, a slave to the Feminine Imperative, a target for extracting ill-gotten gains and usury, and a "Useful Idiot". (Idiot is an acronym for an Individual Devoid of Intelligent Organized Thought.) That is, all his efforts, energy, labor, money, time, and work are being consumed for the profits of cultural hegemons, demonic forces, gynocentric churches, promiscuous W!tches, reviling wives, and many other constantly remonstrating charlatans who practice deceptions, frauds, and lies. They are all in the same boat, all drifting down the murky River Styx to Həll.

The sorrows of the damned are so sorrowful, that these sorrows are damning, in and of themselves.

Stand tall to the call, as Men, and may God have mercy on the Christian reader.

The Gender Gulf

The Gender ~~Gap~~ Divide is now a Gulf

It used to be that Feminists complained about the Gender Gap.* Not long afterwards, 'Princesses' raised their standards until they priced themselves out of the market, resulting in a Gender Divide. In response, men abandoned the disintegrating LTR/MMP. Now this divide has expanded into a Gender Gulf, in which men have become more conservative, and women more liberal, and nary the two shall meet.

Do you see the progression? Was it orchestrated? Or just the natural result of Feminist rebellion? Or the sirens of the sexual apocalypse? Or all of these?

In this post, we'll cover some sad and somewhat shocking information given in a short video talk from Liam DeBoer about the new Gender Gulf.

References and statistics are provided below for the reports and data cited.

Liam DeBoer (@liam_out_loud): The Great Feminization, Measured (2026/8/5)

 The Gender Gap was refuted (~2016) as entirely circumstantial (due to women's general disinterest in working longer hours in more difficult but higher-paying professions) and NOT institutional (as was falsely claimed).*
 H/T: Red Pill Apostle.*

The Growing Distrust between the Sexes

DeBoer begins by reporting the data from a poll conducted by Merlin Strategy for the New Statesman. This poll surveyed young British adults (primarily 18–30) about their views of the opposite sex. The results are astounding (if true) — a wake-up call to the ever-growing distrust between the sexes.

The original article is paywalled, but it's been covered by many other articles, like this one from The Independent: Only a third of young women hold positive view of men (2026/4/15).

The stats reported are…

- 72% of men under 30 hold a positive view of women.
- 50% of women under 30 hold a positive view of men (a 22-point gap).
- Among British women under 25, the figure drops to 35% (a 37-point gap).
- Only 11% of young women hold a very positive view of men.
- Women under 30 are three times as likely to hold a negative view of men compared to women over 30.
- Young women are 26 percentage points less likely to feel positively about capitalism compared to young men.
- Even though young men are more likely than young women to be unemployed, young women are 21 percentage points less likely than men to believe they will earn more than their parents.

Privileged princesses were found to be the most pessimistic of all.

- Among working-class young women, 61% hold a positive view of men.

- Among young professional-class women, the figure is 36% (a 25-point gap).
- Women in middle-class professions are less likely to believe they are valued by society or that they will succeed in life, when compared to working-class women.

Also,

- Women under 25 are twice as likely to not want children as young men, and said they feared the prospect of being pressured into having babies by U.K. government reforms.

More evidence supporting the RP axiom: When given choice, women will fornicate and abort, and will postporn marriage and having children until their mid-30s, when their reproductive clock is ticking as loud as a hammer on a blacksmith's anvil. Women don't know they want babies until they're faced with the prospect of NOT being able to have them. But by then, it is oft too late.

Meanwhile, we see women in their late 30s and early 40s literally crying their eyes out over having missed their opportunity to have a child, because F-enism.

New Stateman's interviews with young British women revealed that they regarded the internet / social media forums as places where men are talking non-stop about how deceptive, greedy, nasty, and s1utty women are, and where women go on and on in response about "toxic masculinity", ad nauseum.

Apparently, the New Stateman's poll focused on the 18-30 crowd (Gen Z) so that they could conveniently omit more mature viewpoints, including the grievances of post-Wall Millennial women, who grew up with the utmost worst of Feminist indoctrination, and who are now over 30 and are busy repenting of FOMO / YOLO, postpornication, and other self-idolatries that F-enism encouraged them to sacrifice their youth and reproductive potential upon.

The Bigoted Hypocrisy of Institutionalized F-enism

DeBoer repines,

> "We constantly hear about the Manosphere, toxic masculinity, and the radicalization of young men, but the > data says something else. Young women are the ones sorting the opposite sex into the enemy column, and they are doing it at scale."

Citing the data on the differences between educated / professional women and Non-E/P women, DeBoer concludes [expansion and emphasis mine],

> "How much time the respondent has spent inside universities, HR departments, media organizations, and NGO pipelines [is directly proportional to how pessimistic women are towards men, the economy, etc.]. The gender divide runs along institutional exposure.
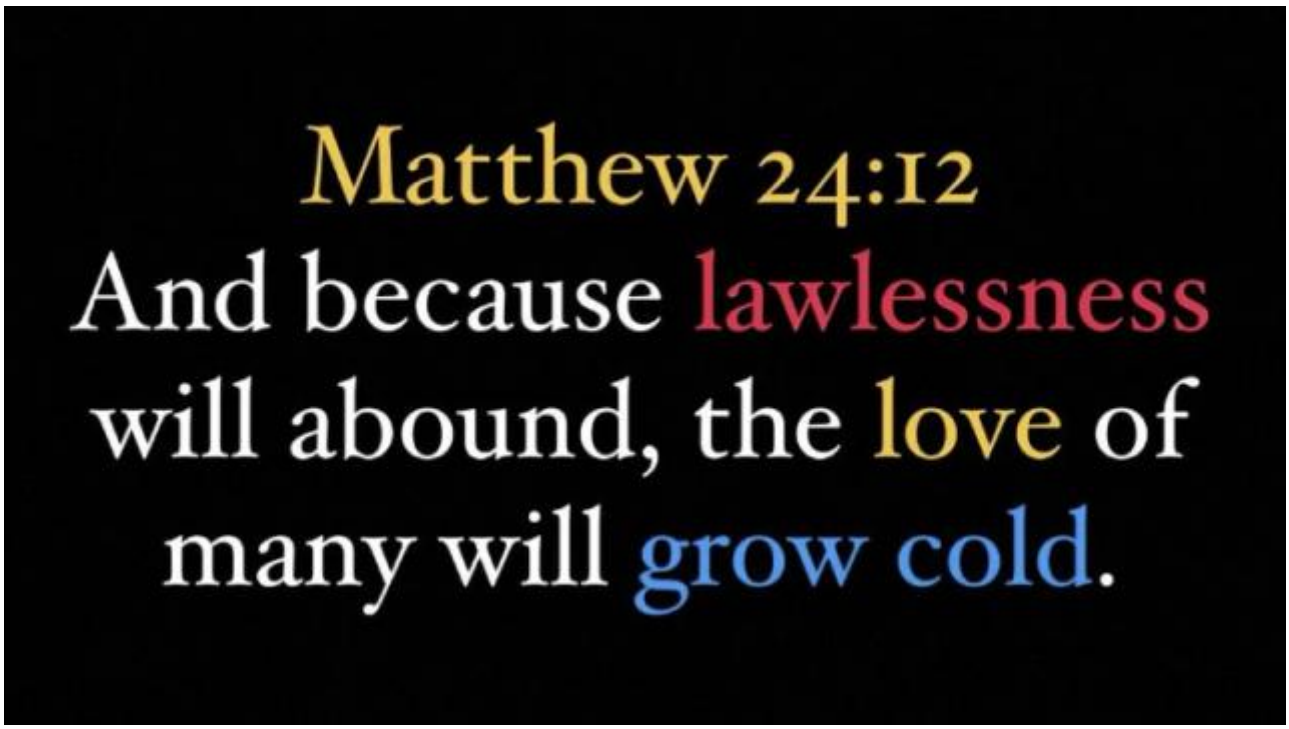
> Helen Andrews outlined what is happening in her essay at Compact: The Great Feminization (2025/10/16). Between 2015 and 2020, Western culture tipped majority female.*

> - Law schools tipped in 2016.
> - The New York Times newsroom tipped in 2018.
> - Medical schools and the college-educated workforce tipped in 2019.

> But none of this was organic. 30 years of affirmative action mandates, discrimination settlements, and grant-conditional diversity requirements did the engineering, one lawsuit and grant at a time."



"Lawlessness" = The modern gynocivnatteric "laws" of the West.

> "Once those institutions tipped, their purpose changed.

> - A justice system built to adjudicate crime became one to protect "oppressed" minorities.
> - A newsroom built to report became one built to enforce narrative uniformity.
> - A university built to argue became a "safe space" [where opposing arguments are condemned].

> The mechanism is older than W0keness. Male groups are mission-oriented. Female groups are cohesion-oriented. Effectively, men want to put the ball in the net, and women want to make sure everyone has a chance to play with the ball."

 These dates are drawn from Helen Andrews' essay and supporting demographic data on female majorities in professional fields and elite institutions (widely discussed in multiple articles covering her piece).*

The Daycare Governance Model

DeBoer goes on to describe the new gynocivnatic sociopolitical order that is beginning to gel.

> "What has emerged is what I call the daycare governance model. Three roles and three only:

> - Infants to be protected (the "oppressed")
> - Caregivers to administer the protection (the allies or comrades)
> - Predators to be removed (the dissenters)

> The evidence replicates. The Foundation for Individual Rights and Expression's FIRE 2026 College Speech Rankings found women less tolerant than men across every ideology — even less tolerant of their allies, in fact, than men are of their enemies.

> A young woman who entered kindergarten in 2005 has now spent 20 continuous years inside “daycare governance”. She did not invent the frame that sorts men into the “Predator” column. She inherited it from every institution she passed through. The 35% figure is what happens when the sorting completes.
> Moral triage at population scale. Victim, Ally, Predator. No gray zones.”

Weaponizing The Common Knowledge of The Red Pill

In the past, men had to believe a large set of lies that tipped a hat to the assumed superiority of women in order to make themselves acceptable chivalrous servants of society. Lies such as…

- “Happy wife, happy life.”
- “Women are more compassionate than men.”
- “Women are romantic.” / “Women like romance.”
- “Girls are made of sugar and spice, and everything nice…”
- *“Women are more moral*ly discerning / spiritually attuned than men.”

And many others.

These lies were so common that no one thought them any different from Christian ‘love’. While it is true that “Love covers a multitude of sins” (Proverbs 10:12; 1 Peter 4:8), it is NOT love if that covering involves a denial of, or the willful ignorance of the sinful nature.

But now, thanks to almost 2 decades of Red Pill lore, the truth is out, plain and bare. No more denial and ignorance. For many men, this news has been almost as life changing as the gospel.

For the past 20 years, most Red Pill aware men felt it was their duty to teach their fellow man how to succeed with women, and also to warn each other about the problems and risks involved with women.

But today in 2026, Red Pill knowledge is fully mainstream. Almost every Based / Manosphere adjacent / RP broadcaster is describing it or mentioning it, and because the quality of women, on average, has gotten ‘worse’ in terms of their femininity and everything else that men want from a woman, we hear more emphasis warning men to beware of women's worser nature.

But instead of TRP being used as salt and light, it is often used as a bludgeon.

Thus, in the eyes of younger generations, The Red Pill is not a word of wisdom shared with a son or brother or friend or wingman, as it was among Gen X and Millennials, but is now just one more toxic narrative in the cultural fray. RP knowledge, in this context and to Gen Z, is actually reinforcing the ever-widening Gulf between the sexes.

For Mature Audiences Only

The reason why is rather simple. It's because TRP is for mature audiences only, and I emphasize mature (as opposed to adult). In biblical terms, it is "solid food", as opposed to "milk". (See 1 Corinthians 3:1–2; 1 Peter 2:1-3; Hebrews 5:13–14.)

> [13] Anyone who lives on milk, being still an infant, is not acquainted with the teaching about righteousness. [14] But solid food is for the mature, who by constant use have trained themselves to distinguish good from evil.
> Hebrews 5:13-14 (NIV)

Discerning men and discreet women integrate this knowledge in their mental Frame and adjust course. But for the less mature masses migrating down the wide road to destruction, and to those who are perishing in their sins, the truth of The Red Pill is an offense and a stumbling block to them. (1 Corinthians 1:18; 1 Peter 2:7-8)

The Christian RP reveals both Ch@ds and S!mps of the world to be poon pedestalizers (only differentiated by their contrasting appeal to women and their skills in bedding them) and condemns them to the pleasures of their lusts. Most of these men will eventually accept this about themselves, whether or not they actually take responsibility for it, develop themselves, and mature.

But in contrast, womynz just can't bear to hear the truth about their own base nature, much less be held AcCoUnT@BlE for it (Eeewh!), and so instead of embracing this truth, repenting, and submitting to God and their male Head, they will instead condemn any and all men who point this out as being 'toxic', etc.

Until they hit 40. Then they might repent. But by then, the damage will already be done, leaving them looking down the barrel of an eternity filled with shame, loneliness, and regret.

This is another Bottleneck Event

To end on a relatively positive note, as I mentioned before, we are now witnessing a natural selection bottleneck event (due to abortion, The Pill, and the susceptibility of being deceived by F-enist lies) that will shape the genetic constitution of future generations. So sit tight. I believe there may be some hope that your grandsons and great-grandsons might have a wider selection of women who are more marriage and family minded and more submissive than what Gen X, Millennials, and Gen Z has had — because those who aren't, are NOT currently reproducing en masse, and haven't for the past 30-40 years.

How The Red Pill contributes to The Gender Gulf

Jack · 12 August 2026 · Archived copy · Original

The Red Pill was the social gospel to Gen X and Millennials who grew up under the spell of The Blue Pill, but to Gen Z, it is just one moar competing monologue in a cold cruel world.

The Gender Gulf = Distrust between the Sexes

The Gender Gulf (2026/8/10) covered a video talk from Liam DeBoer that covered several interrelated developments.

1. Western institutions have tipped majority female and/or have become female dominated over the last decade.
2. There is a concomitant realignment of purpose from results to relationships.
3. The Daycare Governance Model.
4. Educational institutions have been pushing The Daycare Governance Model for 30+ years, resulting in culture-wide indoctrination, especially among Gen Z.
5. The growing distrust between the sexes => The Gender Gulf.
    1. Younger women's opinions towards men are more negative.
    2. Educated / professional women hold more negative opinions towards men and are more pessimistic about society and the economy.
    3. Higher education promulgates this effect.

Bottom Outcome (relative to my following analysis): Those who won't wholeheartedly conform to The Daycare Governance Model are branded 'predators'. These 'predators' are predominantly conservative men.

The reported stats are…

- 72% of men under 30 hold a positive view of women.
- 50% of women under 30 hold a positive view of men (a 22-point gap).
- Among British women under 25, the figure drops to 35% (a 37-point gap).
- Only 11% of young women hold a very positive view of men.
- Women under 30 are three times as likely to hold a negative view of men compared to women over 30.

In this essay, I'll explain how The Red Pill has contributed to this split.

Weaponizing The Common Knowledge of The Red Pill

In the past, men had to believe a large set of lies that tipped a hat to the assumed superiority of women in order to make themselves acceptable, chivalrous servants of society. Lies such as…

- "Happy wife, happy life."
- "Women are more compassionate than men."
- "Wives are the boss, husbands are the guest."
- "Women are romantic." / "Women like romance."
- "Girls are made of sugar and spice, and everything nice…"
- "Women are more morally discerning / spiritually attuned than men."

And many others.

These lies were so common that no one thought them any different from a man showing Christian 'love' to his wife or women in general. While it is true that "Love covers a multitude of sins" (Proverbs 10:12; 1 Peter 4:8), it is NOT love if that covering involves a denial of, or the willful ignorance of the sinful nature.

But now, thanks to almost 2 decades of Red Pill lore, the truth is out, plain and bare. No more denial and ignorance. For many men, this news has been almost as life changing as the gospel.

For the past 20 years, most Red Pill aware men felt it was their duty to teach their fellow man how to succeed with women, and also to warn each other about the problems and risks involved with women.

But instead of TRP being used as salt and light, it is often used as a philosophical bludgeon or a tool of shame. Even one instance of TRP being used in this way spoils the whole barrel.

Thus, in the eyes of younger generations, The Red Pill is not a word of wisdom shared with a son or brother or friend or wingman, as it was among Gen X and Millennials, but is now just one more toxic narrative in the cultural fray. RP knowledge, in this context and to Gen Z, is actually reinforcing the ever-widening Gulf between the sexes.

Epilogue

Readers might understand Gen Z's recalcitrant response to all this confusion as a violation of the social order. Think about it. They grew up under a passive, feel good Daycare Governance Model, and then they hear RP views that stipulate the 'predators' are actually right, even though the RP paradigm contravenes the Daycare Governance Model. Plus, TRP is hard to do, and it's rude. What's to like? This is partly why we see so many Gen Z'ers who are apathetic, listless, and resigned. "Like, Whatever!"

The Gender Gulf is another Bottleneck Event

From Christ to Churchianity — Part 7: Explaining the Data for Attrition and Switching by Gender

Jack · 14 August 2026 · Archived copy · Original

Men are more likely to switch churches than to leave the faith. Women are more likely to leave than switch.

Intro

As we learned from our previous study of Religious Shifts and the Underlying Causes, in total, both men and women are falling away from their prior church allegiances, resulting in a mass attrition for both sexes.

In this post, I'll break down this attrition with respect to the sexes, going from the 1970s.

Historical Trends

There has been a continual, multi-century pattern of a female majority in American Christian congregations.

- 17th century: Historians analyzing New England church registers confirm that in the 1630s–1640s, membership was often roughly balanced or slightly male-leaning in some congregations, but by the 1650s–1690s women typically formed the clear majority of new members and communicants (often 60–75%+). Puritan minister Cotton Mather observed in the early 1690s that churches in the Massachusetts Bay area commonly had large female majorities (e.g., in a church of 300–400 communicants, only a little more than 100 men).
- 18th century: Data from Congregational churches in New England show women as ~59% of new members (1730–1769), rising further later in the century. Southern churches in 1792 were about 65% female despite a slight male majority in the general population.
- 19th century: The imbalance widened. Contemporary accounts and studies report women as roughly two-thirds or more of members/attendees in many places (sometimes higher in individual congregations).
- 20th century: The U.S. Census of Religious Bodies (gender data beginning 1906) and later surveys (e.g., General Social Survey from the 1970s) show continued female majorities in membership and attendance across Protestant and Catholic groups, typically in the 55–65% female range for attendees, with relatively stable composition until recent decades.

Scholars summarizing the record state that women have outnumbered men in U.S. Christian congregations "since about 1700, and perhaps for even longer," and that this has been one of the most consistent features of American religious life.

Modern Trends

In recent decades, more structured and more accurate data is available, but it tells the same story. Modern gender gaps in U.S. Christian church attendance, from the 1970s to 2026, continue to show a stronger female presence.

- Major surveys consistently report higher rates of regular church attendance for women compared to men [General Social Survey, GSS, Pew, and others].
- Historically, men are about 5% more likely to be "Nones" than women.

Overall attendance has declined for both genders over the past 50 years.

- In the mid-1980s, roughly 38% of American women vs. 25% of men attended weekly (a 13-point gap).
- By the early 2010s, ~28% of women vs. ~22% of men attended weekly (a 6-point difference).

Overall, the gender gap narrowed over these decades largely because women's attendance declined more than men's.

Now, the modern gender gap is smaller than in some 18th – 19th century estimates.

Attrition by Gender: Recent Shifts (~2007–2025)

In recent years, there has been a significant shift in the gender gap in church affiliation / attendance, first evident around 2007. Within this time, the gender disparities have narrowed substantially. Multiple large surveys document a notable change, with women's attendance falling further while men's held steadier or rose in some measures. Some major datasets (detailed below) have now revealed that the shifting gender disparity favors male attendance, especially among younger adults.

- Since 2016, more women than men in the 18-25-year-old category identify as "None".
- Since 2021, more women than men in the 18-25-year-old category never attend church services.
- Currently, 40% of men and 50% of women are "Nones".
- Currently, 40% of men and 45% of women are "Never Attenders".

Results vary somewhat by survey methodology, definition of "regular" attendance (weekly vs. monthly), and age group (younger individuals are more likely to be truant).

Nevertheless, according to the Pew Research Center's Religious Landscape Studies (2007–2024) and Ryan Burge's work at Graphs About Religion, a disproportionate number of those leaving Evangelical churches have been men.

Below, I'll explain this apparent contradiction.

Barna's Data

Barna Research has tracked large cumulative samples of weekly church attendance since ~2000, often in partnership with Gloo for "State of the Church" reports. Barna's data shows a clear reversal, with men exhibiting higher church involvement overall as of late.

- In the early 2000s, women had higher church attendance / affiliation, at around 47% women vs. 38% men.
- Since the 2000s, women's rates declined steadily, while men's were more stable.
- By around 2022 and continuing through 2025, men have outpaced women in church activity.
- In the 2025 data, approximately 43% of men vs. 36% of women reported weekly attendance. Some mid-2025 snapshots showed even wider spreads (e.g., ~45% men vs. 36% women).
- Millennial and Gen Z men are the key drivers of the gender gap (e.g., 2025 figures of ~46% Gen Z men and ~55% Millennial men attending in the past week, versus lower rates for women in those generations).
- Overall, younger, married adults are the more engaged cohorts.
- Among parents of children under 18, married fathers show the highest weekly rates of attendance.
- Single mothers are among the lowest (around 24%).

Gallup's Data

Gallup has focused more on young adults, monthly attendance, and the importance of religion.

- Among 18–29-year-olds in 2024–2025, young men reached ~40% monthly+ attendance (up from ~33% in 2022–2023), statistically tied with young women at ~39%.

- Young men pulled ahead on self-reported importance of religion (42% “very important” vs. ~30% for young women).
- Older age groups generally retain the traditional pattern of women being more active in attendance.
- Gains are concentrated among young Republicans; partisan gaps are large.

Attrition by Gender: Summary of the Modern Picture

- Pre-~2010s to the early 2020s: There has been a persistent but shrinking female majority in church attendance.
- Post-Pandemic and into 2025–2026: There has been a clear narrowing in the gender gap with respect to church involvement.
- The narrowing gender gap is primarily driven by faster declines in women’s attendance and overall religiosity, rather than large absolute increases among men.
- Among young adults (Gen Z), the gap has largely closed or flipped on some metrics, with Gen Z men being more active in church than their female peers.
- Political identity is a notable factor, with Republican-leaning young men much more likely to be engaged in church.
- Single parents (particularly mothers) and some older cohorts show lower engagement.
- In most data, older women remain more religious / attending than older men.

This pattern of reversal marks a departure from both the multi-century U.S. historical norm and the late-20th-century modern baseline.

Conclusions

What appears to be a contradiction in the reported data (i.e. more men are leaving the church, but more women are becoming “Nones” or “Never Attenders”) is explained by the fact that leaving a church does not necessarily equal abandoning Christianity and becoming “None”, and the data polls often make scant differentiation between leaving the church and switching churches.

It’s hard to see this from glancing at mounds of data (e.g. Burge’s excellent graphs), but through a deeper study, the general trends that are yielding the confusing stats reported above and earlier can be summarized as follows.

- Fewer men than women are leaving church altogether and becoming “Nones”.
- More men than women are switching to another tradition.
- More men than women are returning to church.
- More women leave than switch.
- More men switch than leave.

The next post explains why men leave or switch. The following post will examine why they are returning.
